TERRORISM NEWS:

FAA Official, FBI Agent Boost Prosecution Case At Moussaoui Trial. Former FAA security official Robert J. Cammaroto and former FBI Special Agent Aaron testified yesterday at the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's trial, and both said that airline security and law enforcement measures could have been taken that may have thwarted the 9/11 attacks had Moussaoui told FBI agents what he knew about al Qaeda's plans. News reports credit their testimony with getting the prosecution's case for the death penalty back on track after last week's witness-coaching incident the mixed testimony from the FBI's Harry Samit and Michael Rolince.

Under the headline "Case For Moussaoui Execution Seems Bolstered by 2 Witnesses," The New York Times (3/23, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "The detailed testimony of the two witnesses provided the prosecution's strongest presentation to date at the trial." Cammaroto said, "We could have taken several steps," and listed "among others the banning of all knives, shifting resources like air marshals to domestic flights, ordering physical 'pat-downs' of passengers and making metal detectors more sensitive." Zebley "testified that information discovered after the attacks could have provided important leads beforehand. He noted that Mr. Moussaoui had received payments for his flight training from the same person who had sent money to some of the hijackers."

The Washington Post (3/23, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds that Cammaroto's "testimony was the initial step in the government's effort to rebuild its case," although he "acknowledged on cross-examination that in August 2001, the FAA was aware of al-Qaeda threats to hijack airplanes but had not increased airport security in response." Former Arizona flight school manager Margaret Chevrette also testified about providing flight training to hijacker Hani Hanjour and "recalled how she had expressed alarm about her student to the Federal Aviation Administration," which "did little in response" to her report that he lacked adequate English-language skills.

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Serrano, 958K) reports, "Asked by Assistant U.S. Atty. David J. Novak how swiftly airport security officials would have reacted had Moussaoui revealed that the Sept. 11 hijackers planned to smuggle small knives aboard planes and then commandeer the cockpits, Cammaroto said: 'It could have been done fairly quickly. In a matter of hours.' But under cross-examination…Cammaroto conceded that in the late summer of 2001, the approach to airport security was far more relaxed than it is today."

Focusing on Chevette's testimony, the AP (3/23, Barakat) notes, "It was the second time this week jurors heard witnesses testify that people in positions of authority in the federal government responded either slowly, negatively — or not at all — to warnings about a possible terrorist attack."

Agence France-Presse (3/23) reports, "Prosecutors called both witnesses in a bid to prove that Moussaoui's should be executed because his 'lies' gave the September 11 suicide crews time to pull off their spectacular attacks, which killed nearly 3,000 people. … They showed Zebley a Statement of Facts, in which the Frenchman pleaded guilty last year to plotting with Al-Qaeda to fly planes into US buildings -- more than three years after he was accused of such a crime. … Just the fact that he was admitted Al-Qaeda member would have been enough to set of a nationwide search for accomplices, Zebley testified. … An admission that he was a trainee pilot would have sent agents to flight schools to track other would-be attackers and information on Al-Qaeda financiers could have helped them follow the money to those behind the plot."

Administration Seeks Dismissal Of Guantanamo Detainee Lawsuits. The Washington Post (3/23, A15, White, 744K) reports Bush Administration lawyers "argued yesterday that a new law forces the dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in federal courts on behalf of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, urging" the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia "to instead adopt a far more limited process that still would give the prisoners access to judicial review." The court will "decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 retroactively stripped the court of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus cases challenging detentions at the military prison in Cuba. Lawyers representing the detainees argued that the new law does not apply to pending cases, while the government has maintained that all cases essentially should be wiped away."

The AP (3/23, Locy) reports, "Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph seemed willing to accept the administration's view that the act forces dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in U.S. District Court here on behalf of over 300 detainees. … But no one on the panel appeared to agree with the administration's take on what would happen next if detainees sought to essentially transfer their challenges to the appeals court." The AP notes, "Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer, argued that judges would be limited to reviewing the sufficiency of the administrative hearings held by the military because the detainees - who are aliens held outside the United States - have no rights under the Constitution. … Sentelle was incredulous. He reminded Katsas of a 2004 Supreme Court decision that cleared the way for detainees to file court challenges to their detentions. … 'You are saying that every single one of their claims are going to fail,' Sentelle said. 'You are saying that all the Supreme Court did ... was give (detainees) a right to file a piece of paper that cannot possibly grant release.'"

Dismissed Juror Says US Hasn't Made Convincing Case In California Terror Trial. In what is widely-reported as a bad sign for federal prosecutors at the trial of Hamid Hayat – accused of attending a terror training camp in Pakistan – a juror dismissed yesterday told reporters, "I don't think at this point in time the government has made its case." In particular, Andrea Clabaugh felt that FBI agents "badgered" Hayat into confessing on the videotaped interrogation shown to jurors. Clabaugh was dismissed after she volunteered to the judge that she had inadvertently failed to reveal during jury selection that she had dated a California law enforcement officer.

The Los Angeles Times (3/22, Tempest, 958K) reports, "Clabaugh said she was troubled by the way FBI agents appeared to 'badger'" Hayat, adding "I felt that in some respects he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything." She also "said the agents appeared to be 'feeding names' to Hayat. 'I didn't see him volunteering anything,' Clabaugh said."

The Sacramento Bee (3/23, Walsh, 301K) adds that Clabaugh "said as she left the federal courthouse that, if she had to decide now, she would vote to acquit" Hayat. Addressing Hayat's conversations with FBI informant Naseem Khan about attending the terror camp, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid who wanted to impress an older man, but it doesn't mean those were things he would actually follow through on."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/23, Bulwa) notes Claubaugh said of the FBI interrogation and Hayat's confession, "In my notes, I recall writing down something about the agents feeding him names. It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything." Additionally, Clabaugh said Khan "was just doing the job he was hired to do," and added that he "did not either help or hurt the case."

The AP (3/23, Thompson) reports Clabaugh said, "They've shown that Hamid was interested in acting against America and those ideas and thoughts, but they haven't proven that he actually attended a camp, that he took weapons training and that he (intended) to come back here and do anything." She added that Khan's "questioning was meant to entrap" Hayat.

The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/23, Bohm) also reports the story, under the headline "Former Hayat Juror: Government Has Not Proved Its Case."

Case Raises Questions About Reliance On FBI Undercover Informants. The Washington Post (3/23, A3, Geis, 744K) reports that the trial of Hamid and Umer Hayat "is the latest in a string of prosecutions brought since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks under a law that criminalizes providing 'material support' to terrorists," which had yielded mixed success for federal prosecutors. "The Lodi case provides a rare, detailed look at how one FBI informant functioned and raises questions about the effectiveness of the government's strategy of infiltrating the community with an outsider. Defense lawyers say their clients' arrests were made in desperation because there wasn't any real terrorist activity to find in Lodi." The Post notes, "Naseem Khan's credibility suffered a blow last week when he maintained he had seen" Ayman al-Zawahiri and other terror suspects in Lodi.

Posada To Remain In Federal Detention. The Miami Herald (3/23, Corral, 323K) reports that ICE announced yesterday that "the U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, who has been detained in a federal immigration facility since May," and "is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98." However, "ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba." The AP (3/23, Anderson) and AFP (3/23) also report on the ICE ruling.

Judge Clears Posada As Witness At Florida Weapons Trial. The Miami Herald (3/23, Corral, Weaver, 323K) reports, "A U.S. district judge has authorized lawyers for Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, two friends of Posada who were arrested last year on federal weapons charges, to have Posada brought to South Florida by federal marshals in the next few weeks as a potential witness in the case. … Alvarez and Mitat's legal strategy seems to be partly focused on political arguments to help free the men," with defense attorneys planning to "argue that the FBI may have used Cuban intelligence to nab the two men. 'Sadly, the FBI and Castro's regime have a well-documented and regrettable history in this community,' the defense's motion seeking evidence states, noting that 'the FBI paid Cuban double agent, Juan Pablo Roque, over $6,720.42 for information regarding exile organizations' -- information that later led to the 1996 downing of the Brothers to the Rescue planes and the death of three Cuban-Americans and a Cuban exile."

Defense Department Mulls Formal Ban On Evidence From Torture. The New York Times (3/23, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said "the Defense Department is considering a formal rule prohibiting the introduction of evidence obtained through torture at military tribunals for terror suspects detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." The "introduction of evidence gained through torture is not expressly prohibited, although military prosecutors have said that such evidence would not be permitted." The AP (3/23, Burns) also reports this story.

British Prosecutors Say Al Qaeda Suspect Sought Atomic Bomb. The New York Times (3/23, Lyall, 1.19M) reports British prosecutors said one of seven defendants "accused of having links to Al Qaeda and plotting to carry out bomb attacks in Britain" had "inquired about buying an atomic bomb from Russian mafia figures in Belgium." Prosecutor David Waters said "the defendant, Salahuddin Amin, 30, had been asked by a man he met at a mosque in Luton, his hometown, to contact a third man, Abu Annis, about a 'radioisotope bomb.'" Annis "told him that 'they had made contact with the Russian mafia in Belgium and from the mafia they were trying to buy this bomb,' Mr. Waters said. While Mr. Amin later told the police that he did not believe it was likely that 'you can go and pick an atomic bomb up and use it,' the prosecutor said the incident was 'an indication as to Amin's position in, and his usefulness to, the organization.'"

Ridicule Seen As Effective Tool To Dismantle Terrorists' Ideology. In a USA Today op-ed (3/23), Hoover Institution fellow Peter Schweizer says, "Is America taking terrorists too seriously? In the wake of continued threats, that might seem like a ridiculous question. But in terms of the psychology of the war on terrorism, it's a question that needs to be asked." In a "brilliant new white paper on public diplomacy, Michael Waller, the Walter and Leonore Annenberg chair in International Communication at The Institute of World Politics, makes a strong case for America's employing a new powerful weapon against the terrorists: ridicule." History "teaches that ridicule weakens the moral and political capital of our enemies."

PATRIOT ACT:

Judge Holds Closed-Door Hearing In Passaro Case. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (3/23) reports, "A federal judge (in Raleigh, NC) held a closed-door hearing (on Wednesday) to decide what, if any, classified information David Passaro's defense lawyers can use at trial." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Terrence W. Boyle ordered the hearing closed from its start at 9 a.m. No media or members of the public were allowed into the courtroom. … Passaro's trial has been tentatively set to start next month." The AP adds, "Passaro, 39, a former Green Beret from Lillington, is charged with assault of Abdul Wali, a suspect in rocket attacks on a military outpost in Asadabad, Afghanistan. Passaro was part of a covert paramilitary team. Prosecutors say he beat Wali with a flashlight and punched and kicked him during an interrogation. Wali died during his third day in U.S. custody in June 2003. … Passaro was the first American charged in the aftermath of the prisoner-abuse scandals in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was also the first civilian charged under the USA Patriot Act, which extended the reach of stateside prosecutors to military bases overseas."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Political Groups Claim FBI, Police Surveillance Have "Increased Markedly." Under the headline "FBI, Police Spying Is Rising, Groups Allege," The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Marks, 61K) reports, "Political activists from New York to Colorado to California report that they believe police and FBI surveillance of their activities has increased markedly since…Congress approved the USA Patriot Act loosening some of the strictures on law enforcement," prompting the ACLU to file FOIA "requests for more than 150 groups and individuals in more than 20 states who believe their first amendment rights are being violated." The Monitor notes, "Local police and the FBI insist that none of their activities is aimed at chilling political speech."

Hale To Leave DHS In Early May. The Washington Post (3/23, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Janet Hale, undersecretary for management at the Department of Homeland Security, "will resign in early May." Hale "has been planning to leave the department for the past year but stayed on at the request of Secretary Michael Chertoff to help with his review of departmental operations, officials said." Hale "has been at the center of one of the biggest changes in the civil service in more than 50 years -- the department's plan to overhaul employee compensation and pay according to occupation, geographic location and job performance."

French Citizen Arrested After Throwing Package Over White House Gate. A French citizen was charged with disorderly conduct yesterday after he threw a bumble of papers over a gate of the White House. The Washington Post (3/23, B3, Wilber, Cauvin, 744K) reports that the incident forced police "to call in the bomb squad, seal the area and close off Lafayette Square, authorities said. The bundle turned out to contain nothing dangerous, but it took about an hour before authorities issued an all-clear."

Army Corps, FEMA Say Louisiana Levees Will Be Ready For Hurricane Season. The Washington Times (3/23, Hudson, 90K) reports, "Federal officials are working around the clock to complete repairs to Louisiana's levee system in time for the looming hurricane season." Paul Johnston, spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers, said "half the work required" has been completed so far, but that "the other half can and will be finished in 10 weeks." R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said they "are going to be ready," and that he's been meeting "three times a week with Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff as they reorganize the agency."

Last Of Children Reported Missing After Gulf Hurricanes Reunited With Family. Federal officials announced that all of the missing children displaced by Hurricane Katrina – over 5,000 – have been reunited with their families. However, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children acknowledges there may still be missing children, and other agencies are still searching for children for whom they have not yet accounted.

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 2, 2:20, Osunsami, 8.78M) reported, "4-year-old Cortez Stewart has given the National Center for Missing Children a big reason to celebrate. According to their records, she's the last of up to 5,000 children that went missing after Hurricane Katrina." But "there are still a number of missing Gulf Coast children. But the different agencies looking for them haven't been working together to keep the numbers straight. The Find Family National Call Center, keeping count in Louisiana, are still searching for 104 children. 25 of them are toddlers. 29 of the children are between 6 and 10. Most of the children are 11 to 15 years old. Today, for the first time, they contacted other agencies and traded notes, hoping to solve a few cases."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "A happy milestone to report tonight on the long road back from last year's devastating hurricane season: 5,192 children were reported missing after hurricanes Katrina and Rita. All but 12 were found alive and as of last week, all of them are back with their families. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children worked with the FBI, FEMA, the Red Cross and other agencies to bring the children and their parents back together."

The Washington Times/AP (3/23, Plaisance) reports Stewart, who "was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Texas last week," was "the last of 5,192 Gulf Coast children listed as missing or displaced after the storms struck more than six months ago. The effort to reunite those youngsters became the largest child-recovery effort in US history. The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children worked with the FBI, Federal Emergency Management Agency, U.S. Postal Service, Red Cross and other agencies to reunite children separated from their parents or guardians when Katrina hit Aug. 29 and Rita followed Sept. 24."

Absentee Ballots To Play Major Role In New Orleans Elections. NBC Nightly News(3/22, story 11, 2:35, Brown, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "There will be elections exactly a month from now for Mayor, City Council and several other municipal offices. There are more than 20 candidates for Mayor alone, and today was the last day to register to vote in those elections. And tonight, many are wondering will their votes count." NBC (Reid) added, "About 60% of New Orleans' pre-Katrina population still lives outside the city, forcing candidates to campaign in Houston, Dallas, Memphis and Atlanta, where at a candidate forum last weekend, prospective voters complained about Louisiana's refusal to set up polling places in other states, requiring out-of-state evacuees, most of whom are black, to vote by absentee ballot." Political analyst Silas Lee "says a flood of absentee ballots could lead to a fiasco." Silas Lee, political analyst: "My biggest fear is that this is a repeat of Florida 2000. We will not have chads, but we will have the question of voter participation and ballots being counted." Reid: "But election officials say they're doing all they can, from looser absentee ballot rules to an aggressive voter education campaign in eight states."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Continues Defense Of Iraq War. For the fifth day in a row, President Bush yesterday defended his Administration's Iraq policy, this time before an audience of military families in Wheeling, West Virginia. Bush's comments on Iraq received extensive media coverage, but not as much as much as in previous days. For example, while the story was covered by all three networks ABC mentioned his appearance in a larger story about media coverage of the war, while CBS and NBC mentioned it in very brief segments. In addition, some major newspapers covered Bush's trip to Wheeling, but they chose to focus on other parts of his remarks there -- USA Today (3/23, 2.31M) concentrates on his comments about his proposed nuclear deal with India, and the Washington Post (3/23, A1, Constable, 744K) notes Bush's comments about the trial of a Christian man in Afghanistan as part of a larger story on that issue. Likewise, the local Wheeling News-Register (3/23, McCabe) highlights Bush's remarks about the coal industry.

Many media reports this morning focus more on the "strategy" behind Bush's defense of his Iraq policies than on his arguments in Wheeling. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Bash) reported, "If you're looking for headlines in today's event, you're not going to find any. And that is really the point. The point at this event and what we've been seeing over the past several days is for the President to just keep talking about Iraq, keep communicating in a way that many people, even the President's supporters, say he simply has not done." Fox News' Special Report (3/22, Cameron) run a similar report, noting Bush "took questions and held court for more than an hour. Aides believe that the more they hear the President the better. … Aides say they are quite pleased by the question and answer sessions. And they plan many more of them.'"

The AP (3/23, Loven) reports, "Whether he's before a friendly West Virginia audience, a Cleveland club proud of its interrogation skills or a White House news conference…Bush is drawing on his plainspoken manner in freewheeling venues to defend his Iraq strategy." Yesterday, "the president bantered with the locals, his shoulders bouncing up and down as they do when he's pleased with his own jokes. Then he brought down the house with his trademark I-won't-back-down pledge." The AP quotes Wayne Fields, "a specialist in presidential rhetoric at Washington University in St. Louis," saying about the President's push for his Iraq polices, "The problem is that clearly he's doing this because of the polls and that adds a level of desperation."

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "spent another day trying to convince Americans that things are not as bad as they seem in Iraq." At the West Virginia event, Bush "heard this from the wife of a military journalist, who was just back from Iraq." Gayle Taylor, wife of military journalist: "It seems that our major media networks don't want to portray the good. They just want to focus…" Taylor's remarks were then drowned out by the cheers of the audience.

The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 7, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bush "told an audience there that it is time for the Iraqi government to unify the country and for the Iraqi army to defend democracy." The New York Times (3/23, Bumiller, 1.19M) also focuses on that issue, in a story titled "Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly." Bush, notes the Times, "did not repeat his widely published remark from a news conference on Tuesday suggesting that American forces would be in Iraq at least until 2009. … White House officials said Mr. Bush's remark was not an open-ended comment. 'The question was, Will there be zero, when will there be zero -- or no American troops in Iraq,' Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One. Mr. Bush's response was that the decision would be made by 'future presidents and future governments of Iraq.'" NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 5, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Bush "said election year politics would have no impact on his decisions regarding how many US troops need to be in Iraq."

The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, McCloskey) reports Bush "said that while he has the duty of being commander-in-chief of US military forces, he also holds the responsibility of being 'educator-in-chief' and explaining to US citizens why he chose to send forces into Iraq." Said Bush, "'It doesn't matter whether you agree with my decision or not. … But all of us should agree with the fact that we have a remarkable country."

A number of print sources emphasize that the crowd was very supportive of Bush. The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, Townsend) reports, "Many people who attended President Bush's Wednesday appearance in Wheeling said they weren't sure what to expect from the speech and subsequent question-and-answer period, but several area residents said afterward that they were impressed with the chief executive's statements and responses." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/23, O'Toole, 261K) says "West Virginians cheered as President Bush maintained that the war in Iraq and his assertive foreign policy were 'laying the foundation of peace for a generation to come.'" The Post-Gazette also calls Bush's arguments about Iraq "familiar but impassioned."

The Washington Times (3/23, Dinan, 90K) reports the audience "was favorable. A man with two sons in the military told the president, 'I thank God you're our commander in chief.'" That "drew a standing ovation from the crowd." The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Gerstenzang, 958K) calls the audience "overwhelmingly friendly," and says Bush "used colloquial, often blunt, language as he reduced his arguments for the war to their most basic. 'We're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins,' he vowed." The Times adds, "Unlike a similar speech and question-and-answer session two days earlier in Cleveland, where Bush faced polite but tough questions, he was bathed today in repeated rounds of applause. Audience members prefaced their questions with praise for his presidency." The President "responded by reaching out to the region's religious roots and saluting its contributions to the military."

The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, King) reports, "When the US president comes to a community for an official visit, local politicians show up to greet Air Force One — regardless of their political party." West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, a Democrat, "was among the first to shake…Bush's hand when he got off the plane Wednesday at the Ohio County Airport." Bush "acknowledged Manchin during his speech at the Capitol Music Hall. 'He's a good, decent man,' Bush said of Manchin."

Iraq Seen As Threatening Bush's Legacy. NBC last night also ran a story examining Iraq in the context of Bush's legacy. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 6, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "George W. Bush has defined his Presidency by a war of his own choosing. His mission in the Middle East built on a doctrine of preemption has become the great gamble of his political capital." Critics "argue Mr. Bush had a vision with blinders. The war in Iraq was part of a larger struggle between good and evil, a war effort of biblical proportions says Kevin Phillips, the author of 'American Theocracy.'" But "three years later, reality in Iraq has cost the President even his most reliable support, as Mr. Bush's vision for democracy in that country now suffers from new fears of failure."

Reid Calls Bush "Dangerously Incompetent." The AP (3/23) reports, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called President Bush 'dangerously incompetent' on Wednesday and said the administration ought to be doing more to prevent increasing sectarian violence in Iraq. 'Where is (Secretary of State) Condoleezza Rice? Why isn't she over in the Middle East, as the chief diplomat of this country should be, trying to get the political forces to form a government over there?' Reid told The Associated Press." Reid "criticized Bush for a series of recent appearances in key political states in which the president defended his Iraq war policies. 'Why isn't he spending time with these leaders in the Middle East trying to get this government formed?' Reid said."

Cheney Rallies Soldiers, Families At Scott Air Force Base. The Collinsville Herald (3/22, Gerstenecker) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "is on a mission, and that assignment is to drum up support for America's war effort in Iraq. He did that Tuesday during an appearance at Scott Air Force Base." In remarks to an audience of 3,000 -- mostly military members and their family – Cheney "was articulate and wavered only slightly from his prepared, eight-page speech, which was interrupted 12 times by applause."

Bush Uncle Made $2.7 Million From Sale Of Military Contracting Firm. The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Roche, 958K) reports that as President Bush "embarks on a new effort to shore up public support for the war in Iraq, an uncle of the commander in chief is collecting $2.7 million in cash and stock from the recent sale of a company that profited from the war." An SEC filing "shows that William H.T. Bush collected just under $1.9 million in cash plus stock valued at more than $800,000 from the sale of Engineered Support Systems Inc. to DRS Technologies of New Jersey. The $1.7-billion deal closed Jan. 31. Both firms have extensive military contracts."

Insurgent Attack On Police Station Thwarted. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The second, brazen attack in as many days on an Iraqi police station. 60 insurgents stormed the station. This time, the attack was thwarted by Iraqi and US forces." The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 6, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In Iraq today, about 50 insurgents were captured after they attacked a police station. They struck a post southeast of Baghdad, killing four officers," but "the US and Iraqi troops and police reinforcements did move in and overwhelmed the attackers." The New York Times (3/23, Wong, 1.19M) also reports the story under the headline "Insurgents Shower Iraq Police Center With Mortar Shells," while USA Today/AP (3/23) and the Los Angeles Times (3/23, Boudreaux, 958K), among other sources, also run stories on the attack.

Shiite Pilgrims Killed. The Washington Post (3/23, A17, Anderson, 744K) mentions the police station incident in a story about "at least five Shiite Muslim pilgrims" who "were killed in Baghdad on Wednesday." Gunmen "fired on the pilgrims' vehicles as they were headed home from celebrating a major religious holiday. Their deaths were the latest in a four-week stretch of sectarian violence involving Shiite and Sunni Arabs."

Journalists Said To Face "Increasing" Threats To Safety As Well As Criticism. USA Today (3/23, Memmott, 2.31M) reports, "As they begin a fourth year covering the war in Iraq, journalists there face increasing threats to their safety and increasing criticism of their work." It "started as arguably the best-covered war in history: Hundreds of reporters traveled with the military as it invaded Iraq, and then hundreds more moved freely around the country as troops secured Baghdad. Today, it has become for some journalists the least-covered war. … To get to the news, they generally must either "embed" with U.S. or Iraqi forces, work the phones from their hotels or houses, send Iraqi staff to events or make carefully planned reporting trips protected by hired guards." Meanwhile, "high-profile critics are stepping up their complaints about the media's work." USA Today goes on to cite criticism from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and President Bush.

The Administration's claim that media coverage of negative developments in Iraq has drowned out progress made led ABC News to devote broadcast time or print to self-examination. ABC ran two segments examining its Iraq coverage, highlighting positive news stories it has reported and pointing out the dangers to journalists in the country. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "That the violence makes it increasingly difficult for reporters to travel the country in safety to get out and see as much as they'd like. 86 journalists have been killed since the US was invaded by Iraq. Earlier this year, our colleagues Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt were badly injured in an attack on their convoy. They had been reporting on the capability of the new Iraqi security forces. But it's also true that we cover all kinds of stories in Iraq. The last story Bob filed before that attack was about a Baghdad ice cream parlor, a business that was flourishing in a very rough neighborhood." The news is "sometimes good. It is sometimes bad. It is almost always complicated."

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 4, 2:10, Tapper, 8.78M) reported on the development of Iraqi television comedies, noting "the lack of security in present-day Iraq means comedy can still quickly be overtaken by tragedy. While are cameras were rolling, the producer received terrible news. That's him grabbing the show's director and telling him that their boss, Amjad Hameed, just minutes before, had been assassinated." Within "moments, what had been a set full of fun and laughter was quickly replaced by fear."

Former CPA Officials Suggest "Switch" In Roles Between Jaafari, Talabani. Dan Senor and Roman Martinez, former advisers to the Bush administration who served in Iraq from April 2003 through June 2004, write in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) that "there is…a creative solution to the impasse" over the new Iraqi government: "Instead of sticking with Mr. Jaafari, the UIA and the other leading parties should consider a compromise that marks a clear break from the status quo. Mr. Jaafari could agree to become Iraq's new president, and Jalal Talabani, the current president and a Kurd, could become prime minister -- a switch." They add, "Such a deal would install an Iraqi leader genuinely capable of getting along with all ethnic and sectarian factions, allow Mr. Jaafari to save face by not losing out to a fellow Shiite, and show Sunni Arab politicians that their participation in last December's vote is paying political dividends."

Novak Says Corruption, Not Insurgency, Behind Iraq "Oil Crisis." Syndicated columnist Robert Novak writes in the Chicago Sun Times (3/23), "While the formal line in Washington and Baghdad blames insurgents for the oil crisis, US officials who are close to the situation gave me a totally different explanation. They blame corruption at every level, from the oil ministry on down, that is common to Iraq. … Everybody with any familiarity with this situation believes the only answer is that the new Iraqi government, still unformed three months after the election, must gain control over corruption."

Saddam's Foreign Minister Was Passing Information To CIA. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Blitzer) reported that "a key member of Saddam Hussein's regime was actually a secret source for information that was eventually passed on to the CIA. That man is Naji Sabri. He was Iraq's foreign minister at the time of the U.S.-led invasion. Sources tell CNN he supplied information to French intelligence that was then passed on to the United States before the U.S. invasion in 2003. The same sources say Sabri was actually paid about $100,000." The Washington Post (3/23, A17, Pincus, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Ex-Iraqi Official Unveiled As Spy." The Post says that "publicly Sabri was insisting that Iraq had no prohibited weapons of mass destruction. Privately, the sources said, he provided information that the Iraqi dictator had ambitions for a nuclear program but that it was not active, and that no biological weapons were being produced or stockpiled, although research was underway."

Army Dog Handler Gets Six-Month Sentence For Prisoner Abuse. The Washington Post (3/23, A15, White, 744K) reports, "Military jurors sentenced an Army dog handler to less than six months behind bars yesterday for using his Belgian shepherd to intimidate detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, one of the lightest sentences so far for a soldier implicated in the notorious abuse." Sgt. Michael J. Smith "was ordered to serve 179 days in confinement and to forfeit $2,250 in pay for convictions on five criminal counts, including maltreatment of detainees, dereliction of duty and an indecent act. Smith will also be reduced to the rank of private, E-1, and will receive a bad-conduct discharge at the end of his prison term, according to an Army spokeswoman at Fort Meade, where the court-martial ended yesterday." The jury "could have sent Smith to prison for as long as 8 1/2 years."

The New York Times (3/23, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports, "With the conviction on Tuesday of an Army dog handler, the military has now tried and found guilty another low-ranking soldier in connection with the pattern of abuses that first surfaced two years ago at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq." But "once again, an attempt by defense lawyers to point a finger of responsibility at higher-ranking officers failed in the latest case to convince a military jury that ultimate responsibility for the abuses lay farther up the chain of command." The Washington Times/AP (3/23, Dishneau) also reports the story.

In an editorial titled "The Joy Of Being Blameless," the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "About the only high-ranking officer whose career has suffered over Abu Ghraib is Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, who was the commander in Iraq at the time. General Sanchez should certainly take responsibility, but he was also a victim of administration blunders." Sanchez "was vaulted inappropriately from head of the First Armored Division to overall commander because Mr. Bush declared 'mission accomplished': the war's over. He was then denied the staff, soldiers and equipment he needed to deal with the insurgency that quickly broke out and produced thousands of prisoners." Bush "has refused to hold himself or any of his top political appointees accountable for those catastrophic errors. Indeed, he has promoted many of them. And this is not an isolated problem. It's just one example, among many, of how this president's men run no risk of being blamed for anything that happens, not matter how egregious."

Service To Country Reported As Top Reason For Iraq Volunteer Service. The Washington Post (3/23, A21, 744K) excerpts an article by Shawn Dorman, titled "Iraq Service and Beyond," from the March issue of the Foreign Service Journal. Asked "what motivated you to volunteer for Iraq service," the "most frequently stated response was, in various iterations, 'to serve my country.' Many spoke of a desire to serve where they are most needed. Some respondents mentioned an additional hope that Iraq service would be career-enhancing, while others pointed to the financial incentives."

Herbert Notes Study Estimating War's Cost At "Possibly More Than $2 Trillion." Columnist Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M), "Bush's war in Iraq was never supposed to be particularly expensive. Administration types tossed out numbers like $50 billion and $60 billion. When Lawrence Lindsey, the president's chief economic adviser, said the war was likely to cost $100 billion to $200 billion, he was fired. Some in the White House tried to spread the fantasy that Iraqi oil revenues would pay for the war. … The president and his hot-for-war associates were as wrong about the money as they were about the weapons of mass destruction." He adds, "Now comes a study by Joseph Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize-winning economist at Columbia University, and a colleague, Linda Bilmes of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, that estimates the 'true costs' of the war at more than $1 trillion, and possibly more than $2 trillion." Bilmes "said that the $1 trillion we're spending on Iraq amounts to about $10,000 for every household in the US."

Bush, Rice Criticize Trial Of Afghan Christian Convert. The AP (3/22, Schweid) reports President Bush "called on Afghanistan on Wednesday to respect the religious freedom of an Afghan citizen on trial for his life for converting from Islam to Christianity." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Secretary Rice told Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, in a previously scheduled meeting, that "she was deeply troubled by the case and called the prosecution 'contrary to universal democratic values.'" Bush and Rice's remarks "toughened the U.S. stance in a controversy that has spread beyond Southeast Asia, evoking statements of concern, for instance, in Germany and Italy." The AP notes the US has been careful not to call publicly for an end to the trial or the prisoner's release.

The Washington Times (3/23, Dinan, 90K) also quotes Bush saying yesterday "he was 'deeply' troubled by the trial in Afghanistan." The US State Department "on Tuesday was more tepid, calling the case a matter for Afghan authorities. Yesterday, Mr. Bush took a much firmer stance. 'We have got influence in Afghanistan, and we are going to use it to remind them that there are universal values,' he said."

On its website, Time (3/23, Karon) reports, "When a Christian believer in a nation wholly dependent on US support faces trial and possibly execution simply for embracing the same faith as the President of the United States, you'd think that country would be read the riot act. Instead, Washington's response to the trial in Afghanistan of Abdul Rahman has been rather muted."

The Washington Post (3/23, A1, Constable, 744K) runs a 1,500-word front-page story calling the case "a clash of values" and reporting that it "has unleashed a blizzard of condemnation from the West this week and exposed a conflict in values between Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country, and the foreign countries that have helped defend and rebuild it in the four years since the fall of the Taliban."

The New York Times (3/23, Goodstein, 1.19M) runs a story titled "Allies Troubled By Afghan Threat To Christian Convert From Islam," reporting, "Officials from Germany, Italy and Canada, which all have troops serving in Afghanistan, have voiced their concerns to Mr. Karzai's government." The Italian foreign minister and deputy prime minister, Gianfranco Fini, "said Tuesday that he had received assurance that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, but he did not elaborate." The Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington, "called for Mr. Rahman's release, saying that the Koran supported religious freedom and that Islam was never compulsory."

In an editorial titled "Outrage In Afghanistan," the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "What's the point of the United States' propping up the government of Afghanistan if it's not even going to pretend to respect basic human rights? President Bush himself said it was 'deeply troubling' that an Afghan man is facing the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity. In fact, the case is more than deeply troubling; it's barbaric, and we were glad that Mr. Bush promised yesterday to press for religious freedom in Afghanistan." The Times adds, "And maybe Afghanistan should also return to stoning women to death for adultery? The United States, Britain and every other country helping the Afghan government should take a hard look at its legal institutions."

Afghan Foreign Minister Sacked. The AP (3/22, Shah) reported Abdullah Abdullah, "the man who has held Afghanistan's foreign minister post since the fall of the Taliban regime four years ago will be replaced in a Cabinet reshuffle." The new Cabinet will include 26 instead of 27 ministers, eighteen of whom are continuing in government. The AP said Abdullah "has had close ties with Washington" and will be replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, a presidential adviser on foreign affairs. "The move had been long anticipated because of an apparent falling out between Abdullah and Karzai over how the ministry was directing foreign affairs."

Yale Criticized For Admitting Former Taliban Official. In a Wall Street Journal column (3/23), John Fund says Yale University has "for three weeks…refused to make any comment or defense beyond a vague 144-word statement about its decision to admit Sayed Rahmatullah Hashemi -- a former ambassador-at-large of the murderous Afghan Taliban -- as a special student." Yale professor David Gelernter said, "The intelligentsia haven't told Yalies what to think yet, because even they haven't made up their minds." Gelernter "clearly has: He calls the Taliban 'an evil and macabre terrorist group. . . . The fact that Hashemi didn't do actual killing does not absolve him. Goebbels didn't shoot anyone either.'"

US Seeking To Build Anti-Terrorist Forces In Saharan Africa. ABC last night examined the US military's effort to build a terrorist-fighting capacity among the African nations bordering or encompassed by the Sahara Desert, which is feared to have the potential to become a terrorist haven. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 6, 2:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "US officials worry the poorly-policed, mostly-Muslim region, could become the next Afghanistan, a place where terrorists can take root. So, working with nine African countries, the US has launched an ambitious counterterrorism program there." ABC (Karl) added, "Throughout the Sahara Desert, America's elite Special Forces are at work. Training alongside Algerian commandos. Working with paratroopers in Niger, the poorest Muslim country in the world. And flying with the Mali army in skies not far from Timbuktu. The Pentagon plans to spend $500 million over the next five years dispatching Special Forces units throughout the Sahara, training North African armies to combat terrorists." Terrorists "from this region have been found in the ranks of foreign fighters in Iraq and Afghanistan. But the soldiers we met here said they don't think there's much of a threat out here in the desert."

DOJ:

Kim Named Solicitor General For DC. The AP (3/23) reports, "Todd Kim has been appointed Solicitor General for the District of Columbia. … Mayor Anthony Williams announced Wednesdday that Kim will come over from the Justice Department on April third." The AP continues, "The solicitor general's office represents the District government in all appellate level court cases. Establishing the office is really a renaming of a branch of the D.C. Attorney General's office. … The measure is part of the mayor's continuing effort to reshape the District government to resemble state governments. The Office of Corporation Counsel was renamed the attorney general's office for the same reason in 2004."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer Ties Lay, Skilling To Fraud Allegations. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, McWilliams, Davis) reports, "A high-ranking former Enron Corp. executive tied the company's former top executives, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, to activities at the heart of the government's conspiracy and fraud allegations -- approving the improper use of reserves, misleading investors and hiding losses." The Journal continues, "Describing his meetings with Messrs. Lay and Skilling, former company treasurer Ben Glisan Jr.3 alleged that the defendants authorized the use of accounting reserves to pad earnings and investment vehicles to hide losses. They also ignored calls to write down billions of dollars of soured investments, he alleged. … When Mr. Skilling was reviewing a plan in a 2000 board meeting to use Enron stock to hedge investments, he replied that he wouldn't recommend the plan 'except that it allowed him to circumvent accounting rules,' alleged Mr. Glisan. Mr. Lay's reaction to the idea was 'to giggle...in delight,' he added."

The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "During a break in Glisan's testimony Wednesday afternoon, a visibly annoyed Lay told reporters, 'I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life.' Lay's wife, Linda, nodded her head and added, 'Unbelievable.'" The AP continues, "Glisan testified that Lay assigned him to feel out credit-rating agencies about how large some required accounting writedowns could be without jeopardizing Enron's rating. … 'That's backwards,' Glisan told jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Lay and Skilling.

'What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequences.' … Glisan said Lay and Skilling knew Enron, then a reputed powerhouse, was actually weak and faced multibillion-dollar losses and writedowns on poorly performing or overvalued assets."

The Houston Chronicle (3/23, FLOOD) reports that Glisan was the "last big gun the government is expected to call before it rests, possibly next week," and that his testimony "went to the heart of key defenses — that Lay and… Skilling didn't know about wrongdoing or massive financial problems at Enron and that the company fell because of a 'run on the bank' started by revelations of former CFO Andrew Fastow's secret thieving." The Chronicle adds, "An articulate and even-keeled Glisan testified that both Skilling and Lay knew a great deal about deep-seated financial woes at the company, signed off on improper deals and repeatedly misrepresented Enron's finances to the public. The defendants have said the company was in good shape and they didn't know about problems."

The New York Times (3/23, Barrionuevo) reports that Glisan "delivered stinging testimony on Wednesday that contradicted Mr. Lay's claims that he had been unaware of the company's crumbling financial picture and had not known about some of the illicit side deals involving top managers. … In a full day of questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay had lied to credit-rating agencies, employees and Wall Street analysts about the company's performance and need for more urgent action, even as he participated in internal discussions with managers about what to do about Enron's 'dire' financial situation. … Mr. Glisan offered the strongest testimony yet that there was a criminal conspiracy at Enron involving" Lay, Skilling and other top Enron managers "to manipulate earnings and mislead investors about mounting problems. … Mr. Glisan's appearance was considered critical because, like Mr. Fastow, his former boss, who testified earlier in the trial, Mr. Glisan was in the inner circle of top decision makers at Enron. … Mr. Glisan was also deeply involved in trying to rein in the mounting credit and liquidity crisis that enveloped the company in the four months before it collapsed into bankruptcy. . But unlike Mr. Fastow or any other major witness who has testified, Mr. Glisan could end up being the crucial witness in the trial. That is because Mr. Glisan, the only major Enron figure who has already been sentenced, is under no obligation to testify. He is unlikely to receive any consideration, like a shorter sentence, from the government in return for his testimony. He is on furlough from a minimum-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., while testifying."

Bloomberg (3/23, Calkins) reports, "Defense lawyers say prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and that the two executives were victims of unscrupulous subordinates, such as Glisan's former boss, ex-Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow. … Glisan is in the middle of serving a five-year sentence for securities fraud in a federal prison east of Houston. He's testifying for a second day on furlough under an immunity agreement with prosecutors. He admitted falsifying Enron's reported financial results to make the company look more successful than it was."

Former Enron Task Force Head Drops In On Trial. The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "The man who brought the indictment against former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling visited his fraud and conspiracy trial Wednesday with a slew of law students in tow." The AP continues, "Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches a course in corporate crime at the University of Texas School of Law, brought his students to sit in on the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals. … 'I feel like this is a distant memory in my life,' Buell said, 'but it continues on. It gives you a sense of how epic these cases are. They just go on for years.'" The AP adds, "Buell was assigned to the task force at its inception in January 2002 and joined the university as a visiting professor after he stepped down in March 2004. He secured the government's indictment against Skilling a month before. … Skilling's co-defendant, Enron founder Kenneth Lay, was indicted in July 2004."

SEC Formalizes Accounting Probe Of Mills Corp. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Chittum) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a formal investigation of Mills Corp. after more than two months of informal inquiry into accounting problems at the shopping-mall real-estate investment trust." The Journal continues, "The investigation, disclosed by the company in a filing late yesterday, turns up the heat on Mills management and may further pressure the company's stock, which is off about 54% from its high in August." The Journal adds, "The Arlington, Va., REIT has made numerous missteps in the past 13 months. In that time, it has restated earnings twice, delayed three earnings reports, written off 10 projects and fired almost 10% of its work force. … Mills shares have plunged by about 21% since last Thursday on analyst downgrades and the disclosure that the company has uncovered five new areas of accounting problems, including ones that could have led to overstated earnings and revenue. The company is now reviewing about a dozen aspects of its books. … The Massachusetts attorney general and treasurer filed a motion Tuesday to become lead plaintiff in a class-action shareholder lawsuit against Mills, saying the state's pension fund has lost $5 million because of what it alleges was fraudulent activity by the company."

NEC Says Unit Employee Faked Deals, Inflated Revenue. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Kachi) reports, "NEC Corp. said an internal investigation has found that an employee at its NEC Engineering Ltd. unit fabricated business deals for years, inflating sales figures by 36.3 billion yen, or about $309.5 million, from the fiscal year ended March 2002." The Journal continues, "The maker of computers and network equipment said that the 50-year-old employee at unlisted NEC Engineering conducted multiple fraudulent transactions in which he created fake deals between NEC Engineering and its suppliers and customers starting in March 2002. The management-level employee created phony documents to enable the transactions, NEC said." The Journal adds, "The company discovered the fraud in December. It said it would file a criminal complaint against the employee, who allegedly embezzled money from the transactions. … The news comes at a time when NEC is suffering from a falloff in profit as its chip and mobile-phone operations struggle amid increased competition. It posted group net profit of 20.78 billion yen for the quarter ended Dec. 31, down 47% from a year earlier."

Former Refco Director Seeks Payment Of Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Rebello) reports, "Thomas H. Lee, who helped orchestrate Refco Inc.'s initial public offering of stock, says creditors of the commodity brokerage firm, now under bankruptcy protection, are 'improperly' trying to bar him from tapping Refco's insurance policies to pay his legal costs." The Journal continues, "Mr. Lee, who recently left the prominent private-equity firm named after him, Thomas H. Lee Partners, is petitioning the bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy to get insurance payments to cover the legal costs of 14 lawsuits related to Refco's collapse. … Mr. Lee was a Refco director, as were other employees at Thomas H. Lee, which helped bring Refco public. He and other directors, including those who didn't work for the private-equity firm, are fighting the lawsuits, which center on claims that they should have known about the problems that led to Refco's implosion." The Journal adds, "Mr. Lee said Refco directors submitted claims to the brokerage's insurer, U.S. Specialty Insurance Co., which sought court permission to pay those costs. Refco's creditors committee objected."

Banks, Brokerage Firms Cracking Down On Strip Club Meetings. USA Today (3/23, O'Donnell) reports, "Some women on Wall Street want to know how it can be fair — or legal — for their managers and male colleagues to exclude them when they fraternize at strip clubs, often with the women's clients. Strip club clientele is hardly limited to Wall Street. Adult entertainment is enjoyed by men — and some women — in most every industry in the USA, and it's a tax-deductible business expense allowed by the IRS." USA continues, "Investment banks and brokerage firms are taking the lead in cracking down on the practice. The National Association of Securities Dealers and the New York Stock Exchange both recently proposed rules that would force firms to adopt business entertainment policies that cap amounts and specify appropriate venues. The move is expected to rule out company-paid or work-related strip club jaunts at the more than 5,000 brokerage firms in the USA. … The stock exchange and the NASD acted in large part because of lawsuits brought by female employees. The women who have sued say strip clubs are emblematic of a larger problem on Wall Street: a macho culture that leaves them behind in all areas."

Freddie Mac To Replace CFO. Freddie Mac has announced that it will replace its chief financial officer Martin Baumann. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports, "The move follows two embarrassing snags that have delayed the U.S. mortgage-finance company's effort to return to regular, timely reporting of results in the wake of a 2003 accounting scandal. In light of those snags, Mr. Baumann said in an interview, he and the company's top officers -- Chief Executive Richard Syron and Chief Operating Officer Eugene McQuade -- agreed that Freddie needed a finance chief with more expertise in upgrading the computer systems used to generate financial results."

CRIMINAL LAW:

CIA Says It Can't Comply With Libby Request For Documents. Fox News' Special Report (3/22, Hume) reported, "The CIA says it cannot comply with a court order to provide former Cheney chief of staff Scooter Libby with documents he says he needs for his defense in his upcoming perjury case because, says the CIA, doing so would jeopardize national security. On March 10, a judge ordered the CIA to produce partially censored copies of the President's Daily Intelligence Briefings which Libby says shows he was preoccupied with many other policy matters at the time he may have disclosed the identity of Valerie Plame. But the CIA says devoting resources to completing the task by the court imposed deadline would quote would detract from the ability to provide the most our senior leaders of our government with critical intelligence information. If the agency refuses to comply, the case could be dismissed."

Administration Won't Exercise Executive Privilege On PDBs. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that the Bush Administration isn't planning to cite executive privilege for the Presidential Daily Briefings sought by former vice presidential aide I. Lewis Libby. Federal prosecutors "said in a court filing that since the judge has limited the production of the daily intelligence briefings to redacted documents and topic overviews that would be viewed only by Libby and four of his attorneys in a sealed room, 'there is a reasonable prospect that the government could avoid a blanket assertion of privilege and instead be able to comply with the court's order.'"

Judge Says Ryan Jurors Having Difficulty Reaching Verdict. In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Chicago Tribune (3/23, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "The federal jury in former Illinois Gov. George Ryan's trial has hit a stumbling block in its deliberations, the judge disclosed on its seventh day of deliberations Wednesday. After holding two lengthy closed-door sessions with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said she planned to instruct jurors Thursday morning to continue on with their discussions." Pallmeyer told reporters "she had received two notes in the last two days from jurors 'that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict, or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations.'" The Chicago Sun-Times (3/23, Korecki) notes, "Pallmeyer on Wednesday twice met privately with lawyers in the case to discuss the matters. The second meeting stretched to 1-1/2 hours."

Prosecutors Play Incriminating FBI Wiretaps At Nevada Bribery Trial. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (3/22, Allen) reports, "Prosecutors played more FBI wiretaps Wednesday in the G-Sting political corruption case," which alleges former commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey took bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi through his lobbyist, Lance Malone. "For Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, some of those wiretaps may spell trouble. But Dario Herrera's defense team says they liked what they heard. In a July 2001 FBI wiretap, Galardi tells Malone "to give Mary Kincaid-Chauncey a message: 'Tell her I'm going to get her another five whenever she wants it.'"

Witness' Former Lawyer Corroborates Testimony Linking "Mafia Cops" To Mob. Newsday (3/23, DeStephano) reports, "The testimony of Burton Kaplan, a key government witness in the 'Mafia Cops' trial, was buttressed Wednesday by his former defense attorney, who said Kaplan admitted being the intermediary between the mob" and former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. Attorney Judd Burstein "said that he was first told by his client about Kaplan's alleged dealings with the former cops when it was known that former acting Luchese boss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso became a government witness. … 'He said "this was a big problem for me; I was the go-between Casso and the cops on this killing and other matters,"' Burstein remembered Kaplan saying." The New York Times (3/23, Feuer, 1.19M) adds the trial "turned yesterday to what may have been its weirdest witness yet, or at least most professionally complicated" with testimony from Burstein, who "bolstered the witness's account that he once served as the liaison between the detectives…and their patron in the mob." Under the headline "Att'y Burns 'Mafia Cops'," The New York Daily News (3/23, Marzulli, 729K) notes, "Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler suggested Burstein came forward because he had read media reports last summer that the judge might toss the case on a legal technicality. Another government witness, Steven Corso, testified yesterday how Eppolito was so desperate to raise cash for his screenplay business he was willing to launder drug money and involve his son Anthony in a drug deal."

The New York Post (3/23, Haberman, 624K) reports Burstein testified that when Kaplan "picked up a copy of The Post on March 25, 1994, he got some exclusive news -- and instantly knew it was time to disappear. The drug-dealing mob associate was shaken after reading an exclusive report by Murray Weiss, which revealed that…Casso had hired two NYPD mob cops as hit men. Kaplan immediately told his lawyer about the report and feared he had to flee to China." The New York Sun (3/23, Capeci) also reports on Kaplan's and Burstein's testimony in its "Gang Land" column, under the headline "Devastating Testimony May Bury 'Mafia Cops'."

Prison Minister Backs Gotti Claim To Have Left Mob Life. The New York Post (3/22, Mangan, Smith, 624K) reported "corrections officer-turned-minister" Bobby Hargraves "is backing John 'Junior' Gotti's claim that he quit the Mafia in the late 1990s, saying Gotti repeatedly told him in jail – 'I'm not involved in that life, that life has been nothing but trouble for me.' .. Hargraves 'vividly' remembers up to five conversations with Gotti in which 'he said, "I'm no longer a part of that life anymore."' Gotti also avoided fellow Gambino crime family defendants in jail before pleading guilty in that case in 1999, and told Hargraves he was interested in moving his family to Canada, the ex-officer said."

Five Californians Arrested In Alleged $20 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (3/22, Hong, 958K) reported, "Five Southern Californians were arrested Tuesday and charged with defrauding Medicare out of $20 million by recruiting patients for unnecessary medical treatment and then billing the agency for the services. An Altadena couple, two of their relatives and an associate are accused of 'beneficiary sharing' or 'patient rotating,' in which 'marketers' obtain data about Medicare beneficiaries and sell the information to clinics or diagnostic testing centers that then prepare fraudulent billings." The Pasadena Star News (3/22, Allen) added, "The FBI names Konstantin Grigoryan as leader of the group, which is said to have began its elaborate scheme in 1997. … The defendants further concealed their fraud by laundering their money 'into a maze of bank accounts of "management" and "consulting" companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account,' the affidavit said."

The AP (3/22) noted, "Grigoryan, his wife Mayya and their son-in-law Eduard Gershelis were charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, money laundering and making false statements. Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law Aleksandr Treynker and a fifth defendant, Haroutyun Gulderyan, also face similar charges."

Federal Officials To Announce Louisiana Health Care Fraud Indictment Today. The Lafayette Daily Advertiser (3/23, Gagnet) reports, "Federal authorities have scheduled a news conference Thursday in Lafayette to announce a 95-count indictment alleging health care fraud." In addition to US Attorney Donald Washington, "representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services also will be present."

Former NFL Kicker Indicted For Insurance Fraud. The San Jose Mercury News (3/23, Foo) reports, "Ray Wersching, the retired San Francisco 49ers kicker who booted field goals in two Super Bowl victories, was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of embezzling $8 million from an insurance company and tax evasion." The News continues, "Wersching, 55, the owner of Ray Wersching Insurance Agency in Redwood City, is accused of diverting premiums earmarked for Farmers Insurance from 1997 to 2000. He is also alleged to have evaded paying taxes on $3.6 million in corporate income from 1999 to 2000." The News adds, "Wersching has been served with a summons to appear Monday in U.S. District Court in San Francisco before Magistrate Judge Bernard Zimmerman, said U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay. … 'This action,' Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said in a statement, 'makes it clear that in California, no one -- whether an average citizen or a former football star -- will escape prosecution if they are suspected of insurance fraud.'" The News notes, "Wersching, an ex-University of California football star, faces five allegations -- embezzlement; permitting a felon convicted of dishonesty to participate in an insurance business; failing to file a corporate tax return; and two counts of tax evasion."

Supreme Court Rules Warrant Needed When Household Divided On Search. The Supreme Court yesterday ruled on a perplexing 4th Amendment issue, whether police need a search warrant when one member of a household extends an invitation to them to enter a property but another household member refuses. The court ruled, 5-

3, with Justice Samuel Alito not participating, that police must have consent from both parties to search without a warrant. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 7, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The legal drama from Americus, Georgia sounds like an episode of 'Law and Order'. A couple that once lived in this house was in a rocky marriage. She called police and said her husband, Scott Randolph, used drugs. The police asked to come in. She said fine, he said no way. But the police went in anyhow, found evidence of cocaine and arrested him. Today, by a vote of five to three, the Supreme Court said the police had no right to enter. The decision said the normal rule allowing police without a warrant to conduct a search if they're invited in does not apply when another person at the door objects." Today's ruling "applies to homes, apartments, even college dorm rooms, but the person objecting must be at the door."

USA Today (3/23, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the decision "drew a sharp dissent from Chief Justice John Roberts. He said the majority, led by the high court's more liberal justices, misapplied the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and set a rule based on 'random' circumstances." The ruling, written by Justice David Souter, "says that if police search a home after being invited in by one resident over the protest of another, the evidence that is seized cannot be used in court. The decision emphasized respect for privacy in the home." The New York Times (3/23, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the case "drew back the curtain to reveal the strains behind the surface placidity and collegiality of the young Roberts court." The case "provoked…Roberts…to write his first dissenting opinion." The Times also reports that there was a "pointed, personal and acerbic tone" when "the justices expressed their disagreement over whether the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches was violated" in the case. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Bravin, 2.11M), Knight Ridder (3/23, Henderson), Washington Times (3/23, Taylor, 90K) the Washington Post (3/23, A1, Lane, 744K) and the Fulton County Daily Report (3/23, Palmer) also report on the ruling.

Maryland Prosecutor Seeks Death Penalty In Guard's Killing. The Baltimore Sun (3/23, Garland) reports, "Washington County's top prosecutor said Wednesday that he will seek the death penalty for a prison inmate who is accused of killing a correctional officer at a Hagerstown hospital." The Sun continues, "State's Attorney Charles P. Strong Jr. filed notice in Circuit Court that he will seek to have the inmate, Brandon Morris, put to death for the killing of Jeffery A. Wroten. … The death penalty applies because Morris, 20, 'committed the murder in furtherance of an escape' and because of other aggravating circumstances, the prosecutor wrote." The Sun adds, "Strong said he spoke with Wroten's family before making the decision because he wanted to make sure they understood that death penalty cases are often long, involved and intense. … Morris, of Baltimore, is accused of shooting Wroten in the face at Washington County Hospital on Jan. 26 as the officer lay on the floor, pleading for his life. The 44-year-old Wroten, who worked at Roxbury Correctional Institution, died the next day."

Treasury Department To Auction Items Received By Cunningham. The Treasury Department today will auction off items received by former Rep. Duke Cunningham as part of his bribery scheme. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Solomon, Sanders, 2.11M) reports, "Auction officials won't disclose what they expect Mr. Cunningham's items to fetch."

The Washington Post (3/23, C1, Booth, 744K) reports, "The Cunningham Collection includes a dozen Oriental or Persian carpets (some machine-made), a few knickknacks and the furniture, which includes armoires and nightstands as well as" a "lingerie cabinet (like a wardrobe, with drawers inside) and the French commode (commode not being a toilet or chamber pot, but a style of chest of drawers that sits on low legs)."

Montgomery County Police Union's Web Site Draws Heated Comments. The Washington Post (3/23, A1, Londoño) reports, "What's up with the cop in Silver Spring who's ratting out colleagues? That was the question raised by a police officer who started a thread on the online message board of the Montgomery County police union on July 15, 2004." The Post continues, "Within minutes, a flurry of responses began pouring in to the site, one of many online forums that have changed the way police gripe and gossip. … They called the African American officer in question a 'rat,' a racist and a lazy cop who needed to 'be put in her place.' Then her husband -- the department's former diversity training teacher, who was brought in after the agency came under scrutiny over allegations of racial profiling -- was dragged into the online onslaught." The Post adds, "The message board was designed as a forum where officers could trade tips, complaints and light banter. But several officers say it has become an outlet for personal attacks -- often laced with racist language, sexual harassment and disparaging remarks about police supervisors, county leaders, immigrants and residents. … Copies of the messages from the password-protected Web site provided to The Post provide a rare glimpse of some officers talking among themselves. The authenticity of the messages, posted from 2004 to this year, was verified by officers with access to the site."

Prosecutors Try To Reinstate Some Charges Against DeLay. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Blitzer) reported, "In Texas, prosecutors are trying to bring back some of the charges against Congressman Tom DeLay that were dismissed last fall. They're asking an appeals court to restore one conspiracy charge against DeLay and part of another. DeLay still faces one money laundering charge in the campaign finance-related indictment against him. A ruling on the appeal isn't expected for at least another month. DeLay denies any wrongdoing." USA Today (3/23, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports DeLay's lawyer "had one primary wish Wednesday when he went before a Texas appeals court deliberating whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against his client: Whatever you decide, do it soon." The Washington Post (3/23, A4, Moreno, 744K) also reports on the hearing.

The AP (3/23, Castro) reports DeLay "spent the day campaigning in what many consider his most serious election challenge since voters sent him to Congress in 1984. The Republican faces Democratic former Rep. Nick Lampson in November." The Washington Times (3/23, Aynesworth, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "DeLay Campaigns As Lawyers Battle."

Baltimore City Council President Decries Probe. The Baltimore Sun (3/23, Donovan) reports, "Baltimore City Council President Sheila Dixon broke her silence Wednesday over an investigation into her ties to two city contractors by saying the state probe is 'trying to destroy my character.'" An initial round of subpoenas from Maryland State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh "requested documents related to $600,000 of work awarded over the past six years -- most of the time without a contract -- to Dixon's former campaign chairman, Dale G. Clark, and his company, Ultimate Network Integration. A second batch of subpoenas…requested documents relating to Union Technologies, a company that employs the council president's sister, Janice Dixon, and has received city work from two major government contractors; Comcast, the city's cable television provider; and TeleCommunications Systems Inc., which manages the city's computer network." The probe began after The Sun reported last week "that Dixon might have breached the city's ethics law by not disclosing her sister's employment and by participating in public hearings and votes over the past two years that involved and benefited Utech."

Los Angeles Uses Injunctions To Curb Gangs. The Los Angeles Times (3/23, McGreevy, Banks) reports, "After more than a decade of successfully using restrictive court injunctions to battle dangerous street gangs, some Los Angeles officials now fear that key provisions have unfairly held back young people struggling to go straight." The Times continues, "Police Chief William J. Bratton said Wednesday that though he wants to expand the use of a tool that has proved effective in the city's fight against an estimated 39,000 hoodlums, he and City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo have agreed to first conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the injunction program. … 'We want to take a look at all of them, do a top-to-bottom review that will include making sure the appropriate people are [listed] in them, because some of these injunctions go back 13 years,' Bratton said." The Times adds, "City Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents a district plagued by some of the worst gang violence in the city, said the injunction program appears to be doing harm as well as good. … Hahn said that after she and Bratton attended a recent community meeting in Watts, she became concerned because no one has ever succeeded in getting removed from an injunction's official list of restricted gang members. … Young people covered by injunctions can have trouble getting jobs because the injunctions show up in employment background checks. Some have trouble getting to work or even school because they cannot ride in cars or buses if other gang members are present. … And they may be disqualified from participating in school sports if former associates play in the same league. … Critics say the injunctions sometimes target people who were never in a gang but had relatives or friends who were."

to give national defense information to officials of the Israeli government, "would herald a dangerous aggrandizement of the government's power not merely to prosecute leaks but to force ordinary Americans to keep its secrets." The Post notes that "prosecutors have not accused either man of spying. Rather, the government has charged them under an old and vaguely worded law that prohibits people in possession of such information from disclosing it further." Prosecutors "have proceeded under a legal theory that must alarm anyone who values open debate."

Court Approves Equity Panel In Delphi Bankruptcy Case. Dow Jones (3/23) reports, "A federal court on Wednesday approved a request from a hedge fund seeking an official voice for equity holders in Delphi Corp.'s Chapter 11 case, departing from typical bankruptcy practice. … 'Clearly this company has extremely difficult problems to resolve,' and shareholders need a voice in that process, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain said." Dow Jones continues, "Appaloosa Management L.P., one of Delphi's largest shareholders with about 9% of its stock, has asked the auto parts maker to move ahead with a canceled shareholder meeting and wanted the court to appoint an official committee to represent stockholders in the case. Another money management firm that holds about 5% of Delphi's equity supported the motion. … Over a two-day trial, experts and attorneys for Delphi and Appaloosa argued widely differing positions about the company's prospects for reducing labor and retiree costs and how its securities would perform upon emergence from bankruptcy." Dow Jones notes, "Appaloosa attorney Thomas Lauria said he was happy Delphi's shareholders have a voice and said it seemed likely Appaloosa would fight for a seat on the committee when the US Trustee names its members. … Appaloosa has said any equity panel would closely monitor the case and be involved in negotiations or litigation involving the relationship between Delphi and its former parent General Motors Corp. … Appaloosa accumulated its Delphi stake after the company filed for bankruptcy protection and began its push for an official shareholder panel in November. The U.S. Trustee's Office - an arm of the Justice Department that normally appoints committees in bankruptcy case - was considering an equity committee request from Appaloosa but hadn't yet made a decision when the firm asked the court for a committee. The U.S. Trustee objected to Appaloosa's motion, as did the company's unsecured creditors committee."

GM, Delphi Offer Buyouts To Hourly Workers. General Motors and its major parts supplier, Delphi, yesterday offered 113,000 hourly workers a severance package ranging from $35,000-145,000. The companies' goal is to shed 30,000 hourly workers in order to reduce costs, and some analysts say the move will pay for itself by the second year, if not the first. The story is receiving extensive media coverage, including stories in most major newspapers. Last night all three networks led their newscasts with it. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, lead story, 2:55, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the strategy was a "bold move," a "drastic move to keep an ailing company afloat." ABC (Reynolds) added, "One industry analyst says it could mark the end of 20th century industrial America." Daniel Howes, business columnist, Detroit News: "Tens of thousands of UAW members of GM and Delphi are likely to retire or go away under this deal." The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 1, 3:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (3/22, lead story, 2:45, Brown, 9.87M) ran similar reports. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 2, 2:00, Brown, 9.87M) also reported on the potential impact of the buyout plan on GM workers and their communities.

Federal Judge Chastises LAPD For Failing To Comply With Reform Decree. The AP (3/23) reports, "A federal judge scolded city officials for failing to meet key provisions of a 2001 court consent decree to reform the Police Department." The AP continues, "The decree was the result of a settlement with the Justice Department and was designed to correct conditions that led to police corruption scandals involving officers beating and framing suspects and stealing evidence." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Gary A. Feess said city officials were trying to 'gut' a key provision and warned at a hearing Tuesday that he would likely extend the decree beyond its June 15 expiration date. … The judge chastised the LAPD for failing to implement a computer system required by the decree to serve as an early warning system by tracking officers' use of force, pursuits, collisions, citizen complaints and civil claims."

Navy Prayer Rule Draws Criticism. A new Navy rule encouraging chaplains to use only nonsectarian language outside divine service is drawing criticism saying the regulation of prayer services is a violation of the chaplains' First Amendment Rights. The Washington Times (3/23, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Under new rules signed by Secretary of the Navy Donald C. Winter, chaplains of all faiths in the Navy are asked to consider the views of their audience before invoking specific religious beliefs in prayer. 'I'm very disappointed with the secretary of the Navy,' said Navy chaplain Lt. Gordon James Klingenschmitt. 'He's doing the opposite of what President Bush wants.' Klingenschmitt "is urging Mr. Bush to sign an executive order to allow military chaplains to pray according to their individual faith tradition."

WPost Says States Should Discontinue Use Of Diebold Voting Machines. An editorial in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "Diebold, the electronic voting machine maker, suffered another sharp setback recently, when Maryland's House of Delegates voted 137-to-0 to drop its machines and switch to paper ballots. The vote came in the same week that Texas held elections marred by electronic voting troubles. Maryland's State Senate should join the House in voting to discontinue the use of the Diebold machines, and other states should follow Maryland's lead."

Three Samsung Executives Plead Guilty In Price-Fixing Probe. The New York Times (3/23, Flynn) reports, "Three executives of Samsung, the largest supplier of computer memory for consumer electronics, have agreed to plead guilty and serve prison sentences in the United States for their roles in a price-fixing conspiracy, federal prosecutors said on Wednesday." The Times continues, "The plea agreements are the latest development in the Justice Department's three-and-a-half-year investigation of the volatile market for dynamic random access memory chips, the most common type of computer memory products, used in personal computers, printers and electronic devices like cellphones and digital cameras."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Anderson) reports, "The Justice Department said it has charged four companies and 12 individuals so far in its investigation, which has led to fines totaling more than $731 million. … The three Samsung executives, who will serve their jail time in the U.S., are Sun Woo Lee, senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, an associate director in the U.S.; and Young Woo Lee, sales director in Germany." The Journal adds, "Samsung Electronics, of South Korea, is the world's largest maker of DRAM components and has previously pleaded guilty and agreed to $300 million in fines in the price-fixing conspiracy." The Journal notes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, 'These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct.'"

The AP (3/23) reports, "Each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 fine, cooperate with federal authorities on the investigation and serve prison sentences ranging from seven to eight months for their role in a scheme to raise prices for dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. A federal judge in San Francisco must approve the deal."

Bloomberg (3/23, Rowley) reports, "Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of sales for DRAM chips, agreed to serve an eight-month prison term, and the other two will serve seven months, the government said. … 'True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms and not just when corporations pay criminal fines,' Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "The government said leading victims of the conspiracy include computer makers such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Compaq Computer Corp., now owned by Hewlett- Packard. … All three Samsung executives agreed to plead guilty to price fixing, the Justice Department said. The charges filed against them in federal court in San Francisco say the defendants attended meetings with competitors to discuss setting prices for DRAM chips. They also exchanged sales information to help the participating companies monitor compliance with the cartel agreements, court documents said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/23, Pimentel) reports, "In a statement, Samsung said the company is 'strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior.' … According to the Justice Department, the Samsung executives took part in meetings and agreements to sell DRAM chips 'at certain levels' to manufacturers."

MarketWatch (3/23, Schroeder), IDG News Service (3/23, Gross), and Yonhap News (South Korea) (3/23, Dong-min) also report on the pleas.

FTC Could Resist Plavix Settlement. Dow Jones (3/23) reports, "The proposed settlement of patent-infringement litigation surrounding the blockbuster drug Plavix could run into regulatory resistance, but government enforcers might not have much muscle, legal experts and analysts say." Dow Jones continues, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Sanofi-Aventis said late Tuesday that they reached a settlement with Apotex Inc., a Toronto company that had sought to sell a generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner, before the expiration of a key patent. The settlement calls for Apotex to wait until 2011, under certain conditions, to begin selling generic Plavix through a license deal. Bristol- Myers and Sanofi also would make undisclosed payments to Apotex." Dow Jones adds, "The settlement is subject to antitrust review and clearance by the Federal Trade Commission. Some analysts and legal experts believe the FTC might try to challenge the deal because it calls for Apotex to wait as much as five years before selling generic Plavix, and Bristol-Myers and Sanofi have agreed to pay Apotex. … The companies said in a statement that the agreement wasn't an act of collusion to keep a generic drug off the market, but they acknowledged that there's 'significant risk' they would be unable to obtain the required antitrust clearance. … The FTC has taken a dim view of similar drug patent-infringement settlements in the past because it believed they could harm consumers by delaying the introduction of cheaper, generic alternatives to branded prescription drugs."

Dell To Purchase Alienware. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Lawton) reports, "Dell Inc. said it agreed to buy closely held Alienware Corp., a maker of high-end personal computers favored by gamers." The Journal continues, "Terms were not disclosed. But the deal is considered a significant strategy shift for Dell, which rarely makes acquisitions and has tended to focus more on machines purchased by businesses." The Journal adds, "While Dell has transformed the PC business by focusing on direct sales and streamlined manufacturing, Alienware has built a loyal following among computer users willing to pay a premium for powerful machines with sleek designs and odd colors such as 'cyborg green.' … The transaction also is being closely watched in the semiconductor industry. Dell, which has its own line of gaming PCs, exclusively uses chips from Intel. But Alienware also uses chips from rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. … A Dell spokesman said Miami-based Alienware, which will be run as a separate subsidiary, can continue to do so. 'They will sell their own products, and they will continue to use AMD as part of that,' he said."

Microsoft Takes New Tack To Avoid EU Sanctions. The AP (3/23, Casert) reports, "Microsoft Corp. today offered 'free, unlimited technical support' to rivals interested in making their software work with the software giant's servers, saying it wanted to comply with a landmark EU antitrust ruling. … 'We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the (European) Commission's concerns,' Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said in a statement." The AP continues, "A spokesman for the EU's antitrust office said the Microsoft offer 'seems to be a constructive proposal,' but said the company needed to make more efforts to fully fall in line with the EU's 2004 ruling. … 'Microsoft will naturally be well placed to answer questions from licensees on specific points of the technical documents,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. … He insisted, however, that even two years after the ruling that forced Microsoft to share technical details with rivals, Microsoft's efforts remained insufficient."

The Financial Times (3/23, Buck) reports, "The latest concessions come in response to accusations by the Commission that Microsoft has failed to implement one of the key elements of its landmark ruling. … Brussels has told Microsoft that it has failed to provide complete and accurate inter-operability information about Windows to rival companies. It believes the information – which will be licensed in return for a fee – is needed so that other companies can develop server software that meshes with Windows-driven computers and servers."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Stern) reports, "An independent monitor in the regulatory case has found the documents provided by Microsoft needed a drastic overhaul to make them workable. The monitor, computer-science professor Neil Barrett, wrote a critical report about Microsoft's efforts to comply with the commission's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions. … Microsoft, which has accused Mr. Barrett of being uninformed and colluding with its rivals, also pledged yesterday to do additional work on technical documentation. But it said five European computer-science professors believe existing documentation already meets requirements."

EU To Confront France, Spain Over Energy Industry Protections. Bloomberg (3/23, Stearns) reports, "The European Union is set to confront France and Spain for protecting energy companies from foreign takeovers, raising the prospect of a clash among EU leaders at a meeting meant to revive a push for market integration." Bloomberg continues, "EU leaders meet this evening in Brussels for the first time since the French government arranged a merger between utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA to avert a possible bid for Suez by Italy's Enel SpA. The two-day summit also comes after the Spanish government imposed rules to hinder a takeover of power company Endesa SA by Germany's E.ON AG. … 'Member states are reluctant to accept the rules,' Loyola de Palacio, EU energy commissioner for five years until November 2004, said by telephone from Madrid two days ago. 'They are very proud when one of their companies goes abroad and makes a takeover but aren't very happy when somebody else makes a takeover in their country.'" Bloomberg adds, "National obstacles and monopolies in Europe's 250 billion-euro ($302 billion) electricity and natural-gas market threaten to boost bills for companies and consumers, curtail supply and undermine the economy. The fragmentation may also hinder efforts to prevent the 25-nation EU's dependency on energy imports from rising to 70 percent by 2030 from 50 percent now."

EU Ends Antitrust Dispute Over Soccer Broadcasts. The AP (3/23, Casert) reports, "The European Union closed a long-standing antitrust dispute with England's Premier League on Wednesday, forcing one the of richest leagues in the world to stop selling the rights to its live soccer matches exclusively to one TV channel. … 'The solution we have reached will benefit football fans while allowing the Premier League to maintain its timetable for the sale of its rights,' said EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes, after the EU executive finalized the deal between both sides." The AP continues, "Under the agreement, live TV rights will be sold in six balanced packages with no one bidder being allowed to buy them all. … Premier League Chief Executive Richard Scudamore said the decision was 'a good outcome for supporters, whether in the stadium or watching our broadcasts.' … He added the Premier League 'believes that the conditions are now in place to create maximum interest for our audiovisual rights and to take the world's most popular domestic football competition from strength to strength.'" The AP notes, "British Sky Broadcasting Group PLC - a pay channel owned by media mogul Rupert Murdoch - has held the exclusive rights to the richest broadcast contract in European sport for the past 13 years. The satellite broadcaster dominates Britain's pay-TV market with close to 8 million subscribers."

Bush Says Coal Reserves Key To Curing US "Addiction" To Foreign Oil. The Wheeling News-Register (3/23, McCabe) reports, "West Virginia's coal reserves could be one of the keys to curing the United States' 'addiction' and dependence on foreign oil, President Bush said Wednesday." During his remarks at the Capitol Music Hall in Wheeling, "underwritten by the Ogden Newspapers Inc. and other local sponsors and hosted by the Wheeling Area Chamber of Commerce, the president spoke of a brief meeting he had with Gov. Joe Manchin on the way downtown from the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport." During that meeting, "Manchin discussed coal liquefaction — a chemical process that turns coal into a fuel that can be used in vehicles -- as an alternative energy source for the nation." Said Bush, "First thing is, we've got a lot of coal, a 250-year supply of coal, which helps us on our electricity. And we're spending a lot of money on clean coal technology. The whole idea is to use taxpayers' money to develop a technology that will enable us to have zero-emission plants, which will help us achieve an environmental objective, as well as an energy independence objective."

Bush Administration To Release More Stringent Fuel Economy Rules. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 3, 2:15, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "The Bush Administration is ready to slap fuel economy requirements on the largest gas guzzlers. While the proposal would affect all jumbo sport utility vehicles and vans, GM, which makes the popular Chevy Suburban and the ultra-trendy Hummer H2, would be hardest hit." Sources "say the rule, still being reviewed by the White House, would require the giant SUVs to get more than 20 miles per gallon by 2011. Currently, the Chevy Suburban and the GMC Yukon average 15 and the Hummer only 13." To "get these monsters to 20 miles a gallon, car makers would have to spend millions on redesign. Sticker prices would likely jump by a thousand dollars or more. However, the improved mileage could save drivers more than a billion dollars a year in gasoline costs, but the heaviest pickup trucks would still be exempt from the new gas mileage requirements and that loophole rankles auto industry watchdogs."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 3, 0:40, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "The bottom line: A fleet-wide average of 24 miles per gallon for light trucks, minivans, and SUVs. That's an increase of 1.8 miles per gallon."

Senate Aide Says Passing Administration Pollution Rules Is Tall Order. John Shanahan, majority counsel for the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, told the National Coal Council yesterday that Congress would have a difficult time passing legislation this year to reinstate the Bush Administration anti-pollution regulations for coal burning power plants that were rejected by a federal appeals court last week. CQ (3/22, Evans) reported that Shanahan "said passing legislation to reinstate the administration's rules would be almost impossible in the Senate, where it takes 60 votes to break a filibuster. … The only possibility, he said, would be to attach language addressing the anti-pollution regulations to a larger, more important bill."

EPA Lists States With Worst Air Pollution, Cancer Risk. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 4, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Car and truck exhaust fumes are a main source of pollutants cited in a new study of air quality and cancer risk. The EPA report says that New York, California and Oregon have the most polluted air and the highest risk of related cancer. The cleanest air in the country: Wyoming, South Dakota and Montana."

WSJournal Blasts Court Ruling On Bush Clean Air Strategy. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) says that the DC Circuit Court of Appeals' decision last week to strike down "a major plank of the Bush Administration's clean air strategy" is "based on a bad reading of the law, and -- unless successfully challenged -- will lock the U.S. into an old-fashioned approach to regulation when better alternatives are available. … If the D.C. Circuit ruling stands, the Bush clean air strategy will lie in ruins, since it relies on a so-called 'cap-and-trade' pollution permit system to allow the market to figure out how best to achieve emission reductions." The Journal adds, "If the Bush Administration doesn't want to abandon its own policy, it has little choice but to fight back."

WPost Calls Decision "Common-Sense Ruling." An editorial in the Washington Post (3/23, A22, 744K) says, "One might hope that after its rebuke last week by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the Bush administration would reconsider its efforts to rewrite the rules governing power plant emissions. … Unfortunately, there is no particular reason to expect the administration to come to its senses in response. It is still trying to curtail enforcement against old coal-fired plants that fail to install new pollution-control technologies." The Post adds, "The court's common-sense ruling last week is a promising sign that its judges won't sit still for further efforts to ignore the law."

Wall Street Prepares For Bird Flu Pandemic. USA Today (3/23, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "Bird flu has yet to come even close to the USA's borders, but Wall Street analysts are already crafting advice on how investors can inoculate their portfolios if a pandemic breaks out." In response to growing fears, stock analysts have been "busy concocting what-if scenarios, handicapping winning and losing stock sectors, and educating clients in the science of bird flu." The newspaper says that "not since the SARS scare in Asia in spring 2003…has a health-related crisis put investors on edge."

Schools Told To Prepare For Bird Flu. The AP (3/23 Feller) reports, "The nation's schools, recognized incubators of respiratory diseases among children, are being told to plan for the possibility of an outbreak of bird flu. Federal health leaders say it is not alarmist or premature for schools to make preparations, such as finding ways to teach kids even if they've all been sent home." In North Carolina on Tuesday, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said schools must be aware that they may have to close their buildings—or that their schools may need to be used as makeshift hospitals, quarantine sites or vaccination centers."

Researchers Shed More Light On Bird Flu Spread Among Humans. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, A2, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Scientists have a new clue why the feared H5N1 strain of the avian-influenza virus hasn't spread easily among people." According to research published this week in the journal Science by teams in the US and the Netherlands, the virus "primarily infects cells deep in the human lung, possibly making it difficult for the germ to spread." In a separate study released yesterday by the journal Nature, a research group said that "to spread between humans, the virus would need to adapt in a way that enabled it to attach to a different type of molecule present in cells higher in the respiratory tract."

The Washington Post (3/23, A13, Brown, 744K) says the research "suggests that people need close and heavy exposure to the H5N1 virus for it to get into the lungs. But once it takes hold, it causes extensive damage." The New York Times (3/23, Wade, 1.19M) also reports on the findings.

China Agrees To Hand Over Bird Flu Samples. The Financial Times (3/23, Yeh) reports, "Chinese officials have promised to provide numerous bird flu virus samples to global health researchers, a rare move that will help accelerate research into the lethal disease," World Health Organization officials said Wednesday. The Times says "Beijing's compliance, if followed through, is a sign of more intimate cooperation with the global health community," and "reflects a change in attitude among Chinese government researchers, who at times have been reluctant to share samples for fear of not being recognized for any breakthrough findings published overseas."

Man Cleared In Theft Of Nevada Petroglyph Says He Wanted To Protect Art. The AP (3/23, Sonner) reports, "One of two men whose federal conviction for stealing American Indian artwork was overturned says the pair simply wanted to protect the ancient petroglyphs from encroaching development." The AP continues, "Carroll Mizell, who served 10 months in prison after being found guilty in June 2004 of stealing the rock art said 'we wanted to save the property. … My whole intent was to free these things so they wouldn't be destroyed,' Mizell told The Associated Press on Wednesday from Redmond, Ore. … 'We didn't do this because we wanted to put them on e-Bay,' he said." The AP adds, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that the Justice Department failed to prove the rock art taken from a national forest on the edge of Reno had a market value of more than $1,000, a requirement for a felony conviction of government theft. … Mizell and John Ligon of Reno admitted during their federal court trial in Reno that they took three boulders with etchings of an archer and bighorn sheep from the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest. But they insisted they didn't know it was illegal, partly because there were no signs marking the site. … Forest Service officials believe the petroglyphs are at least 1,000 years old. They were located within a few hundred yards of backyards in a neighborhood in northwest Reno where hundreds of new homes are scheduled to be built. … Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, said federal prosecutors are considering asking the appeals court to reconsider the case but they had no further comment."

New Hampshire Lawmakers Approve Eminent Domain Limits. The AP (3/23) reports, "New Hampshire lawmakers gave preliminary approval Wednesday to a constitutional amendment that would limit government's ability to seize private property." The AP continues, "The measure was prompted by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year that allowed New London, Conn., to take a group of older homes along the waterfront and turn them over to a developer who plans to build offices, a hotel and a convention center." The AP adds, "The state House and Senate voted overwhelmingly in favor of identical resolutions. For the measure to win approval, both chambers must pick one resolution and pass it. … Then the amendment would be put to a statewide vote, probably in November. Two-thirds approval would be needed for ratification. … The amendment would prohibit the taking of private property for use by private developers."

Virginia Lawmakers Criticized For Not Acting To Curb Eminent Domain. Jeremy Hopkins, counsel with Waldo & Lyle, P.C., a Virginia law firm that represents property owners in eminent domain cases, writes in the Washington Times (3/23), "The Supreme Court's infamous decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which allows the government to take property from one person simply to give it to another, caused most states to take action to prohibit such abuses. However, the General Assembly refuses to limit the power of eminent domain in Virginia. It ended its 2006 legislative session without passing legislation to eliminate the abuses in Kelo." Hopkins adds, "Virginians' own state agencies and local governments, as well as large private corporations that have the power of eminent domain, spare no expense in fighting to ensure that the General Assembly does not place any real restrictions on their power to take people's property. … Unless and until Virginians demand a constitutional amendment to place real restrictions on the General Assembly's power of eminent domain, no Virginian's home, farm or business will be secure."

Moore Says ESA Failing Property Owners. Stephen Moore writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) that the Endangered Species Act "tries to achieve the societal policy goal of saving species from extinction by imposing all of the costs on a hapless few. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo has sensibly proposed reforms that allow landowners to get fair compensation from the government if their land is depressed in value due to a wetlands or endangered species designation. That seems equitable: If society wants to preserve habitat for the common good, then the cost should be borne by all taxpayers, not individual landowners, who would no longer regard endangered species as an economic plague." Moore adds that the ESA "isn't just failing property owners but the very irreplaceable species it was designed to protect."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Justice Department Announces Major Drug Smuggling Indictment. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 10, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "The US Justice Department announced the biggest drug trafficking indictment in history today. It charges 50 leaders of a Colombian rebel group with shipping $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their attacks and with murder and kidnapping. Only three of the 50 are in custody."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 8, 0:45, Brown) reported it is "being described by the Justice Department as the biggest narcotics trafficking indictment in American history. It accuses 50 people in Colombia's largest guerilla group, known as FARC, of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries."

In a widely distributed story, the AP (3/23, Sherman) reports, "The United States charged 50 leaders of Colombia's largest guerrilla group with sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their fight at home, a federal indictment that depicts the rebels as major narco-terrorists. … The indictment made public Wednesday in U.S. District Court said the leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, ordered the killings of Colombian farmers who did not cooperate with the group, the kidnapping and killing of U.S. citizens and the downing of U.S. planes seeking to fumigate coca crops." The AP adds, "U.S. officials said the indictment strikes a blow against the group because it lays out the FARC's hierarchy and details of its operations. 'Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. … He acknowledged that 47 of those charged remain at large, probably in well-defended jungle strongholds that have so far proved beyond the reach of Colombian authorities."

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Muskal) reports, "The U.S. will seek to extradite three of the defendants who are in custody in Colombia and offered rewards that total $75 million for information leading to the arrest of the others who are believed to be in areas controlled by the militia." The Times adds, "U.S. officials say FARC has sent about 60% of the cocaine imported into the U.S., then used the money to support its long-term insurgency against Colombia, now led by pro-U.S. President Alvaro Uribe. … 'This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine,' said Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales. 'Because of unprecedented cooperation between United States and Colombian authorities, we are closer than ever before to reaching our goal of bringing the leaders of this narco-terrorist group to justice in the United States.' … Among the leaders being sought are the seven figures who sit on the FARC Secretariat, the militia's ruling body, and 17 members of the estado mayor, or governing council, U.S. officials said at a news conference this morning in Washington."

The New York Times (3/23, Forero) reports that the indictment accuses FARC "of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States. … 'We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence,' Mr. Gonzales said. … The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government. Three are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition, American officials said."

In the "Nation/Politics" section, The Washington Times (3/23, Seper) reports Tandy said, "From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans. … Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Knight Ridder (3/23, Bachelet, Dudley) reports, "The indictment is likely to make it easier for the U.S. Congress to continue funding for Plan Colombia, a multibillion dollar effort to combat drug trafficking, and military aid for the conservative government of President Alvaro Uribe, one of the strongest U.S. allies in the region. … But analysts said it may not have much impact on an estimated 18,000-strong guerrilla force whose leaders are deeply entrenched in the far reaches of a country the size of France, flush with drug money and showing signs lately of recovering from a three-year-old military offensive." Knight Ridder notes that FARC "has long been known to collect payments from coca farmers and drug traffickers, as well as businessmen, cattle ranchers and shop owners, to finance its four-decades-old insurgency. … But the indictment unveiled by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington alleges that the FARC has taken its involvement in the drug trade significantly further in recent years, earning as much as $25 billion. … 'The FARC has evolved into the world's largest supplier of cocaine and cocaine paste,' a semi-processed product that must be refined into cocaine, the indictment alleges. … 'This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country,' Gonzales said."

Bloomberg (3/23, Arthur) reports, "The Justice Department calls FARC, the largest guerrilla group in Colombia, a 'narco-terrorist' group and views it as one of the 'highest priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking,' Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington." Bloomberg notes, "The U.S. State Department is offering rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the FARC leaders charged in the indictment. … 'This the beginning of the process,' Gonzales said when asked the chances of capturing the 47 at-large FARC members. … Gonzales didn't rule out the use of U.S. troops in the battle against FARC. … 'We consider all options, all effective options,' he said."

CNN.com (3/23, Frieden) reports, "Among other allegations, the indictment states that the charged FARC leaders set the price at which Colombian coca farmers could sell cocaine paste, a raw form of the drug that was transported to jungle laboratories and turned into the finished product. … Farmers who undercut the price or otherwise violated FARC's strict cocaine policies, which also dictated to which buyers the farmers could sell, were punished severely, according to the indictment. … 'Colombian farmers who violated FARC rules were allegedly shot, stabbed, or dismembered alive, and the bodies of murdered farmers were cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers,' according to a DEA news release.U.S. pushes for extradition"

Agence France-Presse (3/23), the Financial Times (3/23, Johnson), Voice of America (3/23, Malone), UPI (3/23), and the BBC (3/23) also report on the indictments.

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 10, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "The US Justice Department announced the biggest drug trafficking indictment in history today. It charges 50 leaders of a Colombian rebel group with shipping $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their attacks and with murder and kidnapping. Only three of the 50 are in custody."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 8, 0:45, Brown) reported, "Also in Washington today what is being described by the Justice Department as the biggest narcotics trafficking indictment in American history. It accuses 50 people in Colombia's largest guerilla group, known as FARC, of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries. This video shows government raids on some of the cocoa farms and jungle laboratories involved in the ring, which also allegedly kidnapped and killed American and Colombian citizens. Three of the ring leaders are in custody, but most of the others indicted today are fugitives."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (3/22, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "Along with the war on terror there's a war on narco terror, and a major US offensive. Fifty leaders of a Colombian rebel group claim narco terrorists are being charged in Washington with sending this country $25 billion worth of cocaine. The rebel group, called FARC, is a designated terror organization, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says both countries will benefit by bringing it down. … Only three of the 50 indicted leaders are in custody."

FOX News (3/22, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "The United States has indicted the leaders of the Armed Forces of Columbia or FARC with trafficking in cocaine. The U.S. says it will seek the extradition of the suspects already in custody.

MSNBC (3/22, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "Fifty [leaders] of a Colombian narco-terrorist group. The group known as FARC is accused of using money from drug sales to fund terrorist operations in Colombia. The attorney general says the group imported more than $25 billion worth of coke into the United States and other countries."

BBC World News (3/22, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The biggest drugs indictment of its kind in the US. Fifty Colombian rebels have been charged with importing devastating amounts of cocaine into the United States. The group is said to supply 50% of the world's cocaine and more than 60% of the cocaine that enters the US. The announcement was made by the US Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales. A federal indictment was unsealed today in Washington, D.C., charging 50 members of FARC's policy-making and operational leadership with importing more than

PBS Coverage. NewsHour with Jim Lehrer (3/22, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The U.S. justice department announced the indictment today of 50 rebels in Colombia for cocaine trafficking. It said their group, known as FARC, supplies most of the cocaine for the world and the U.S. Attorney General Gonzales acknowledged nearly all the suspects are at large. But he said it's clear they're worried. … The indictment said FARC has kidnapped and killed Americans and shot down U.S. planes trying to eradicate coca plants. The attorney general would not say if the indictment clears the way for U.S. troops to go after the rebel leaders, but he did not rule it out."

Local TV Coverage. WTVJ-TV, Miami-Ft. Lauderdale, Florida (3/22, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Gonzalez says 50 members of the narco terrorist group have been charged with importing more than $25 billion of cocaine into the U.S. and other countries. That's more than 60% of the cocaine that comes into this country. Three of the top FARC leaders charged today are already in custody in Colombia. … The remaining 47 are at large, hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia, surrounded by heavily-armed guerrillas."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (3/22, 4:30 p.m.) reported, "The U.S. Justice Department has indicted 50 leaders of a Colombian terrorist group. Authorities say the group supplies half the world's cocaine. According to the indictment, the Revolutionary Armed Forces Of Colombia or FARC imported more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the U.S. and other [countries]. Authorities say the group also allegedly ordered the killings of farmers who refused to cooperate with them and kidnapped and killed U.S. citizens and others who got in their way."

KRIS-TV, Corpus Christi, Texas (3/22, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Authorities say they're responsible for supplying half the world's cocaine. According to the indictment, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or FARC imported more than 25-billion dollars worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today's indictment is part of the U.S. push to pursue and prosecute drug dealers."

California Seeks To Get Medical Marijuana Lawsuit Dismissed. According to the AP (3/22), the state of California "has filed a motion seeking to dismiss a San Diego County lawsuit that challenges a decade-old law permitting in California the use of marijuana for medical purposes. The attorney general's office filed the court documents Tuesday. In them, the state contends county officials simply 'disliked' the law and that there was no legal reason for the court to consider the lawsuit."

San Diego's North County Times (3/22) reports, "The county of San Diego, in a move that angered local medical marijuana patients and marijuana advocacy groups, filed a lawsuit in December in federal court seeking to overturn the Compassionate Use Act, which allows the use of medicinal marijuana. The supervisors ---- who have collectively opposed the law since it was placed on the 1996 ballot ---- argue that it should be 'pre-empted' by federal law, which says that all marijuana use is illegal and that the drug has no medicinal value."

IMMIGRATION:

Clinton Says GOP Immigration Bill Would "Criminalize Good Samaritan," Jesus. The New York Times (3/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton invoked the Bible yesterday to criticize a stringent border security measure that, among other things, would make it a federal crime to offer aid to illegal immigrants." The immigration bill to which she was referring was sponsored by Sen. Bill Frist. Said Clinton, "It is hard to believe that a Republican leadership that is constantly talking about values and about faith would put forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation. … It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself." The New York Post (3/23, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Clinton's comments, saying she "ratcheted up her talk about religion yesterday" and stated "a GOP-sponsored bill making it a felony to be in the United States illegally would have 'criminalized' Jesus."

Reid Says He Would Filibuster Frist Bill. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has proposed an immigration bill that would bypass the Judiciary Committee, which has been considering sweeping reforms, including a guest-worker program. The AP (3/23, Spagat) reports that Minority Leader Harry Reid "vowed Wednesday to do everything in his power, including filibuster, to thwart…Frist's proposed overhaul." Reid said immigration reform "must include heightened border enforcement, a 'guest worker' program and a 'path to citizenship' for the estimated 11 million people in the United States illegally." Frist's bill "sidesteps the question of temporary work permits." Reid said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/22), "America needs comprehensive immigration reform. I have spent the day down here with the people who are in the trenches, so to speak. They acknowledge that immigration is not one problem. It's not a guess-worker program only. It's not enforcement only. It's not only dealing with the 11 million people here who are undocumented. It's all of them. Now, we have to make sure that we deal with all of these."

Farmers Support "Carrots And Sticks" Approach To Immigration Reform. The New York Times (3/23, Porter, 1.19M) reports "the experience of farmers…underscores why most experts say that simply tightening the border with Mexico will not work." The Times adds, "To curb illegal immigration, they say, the government needs both carrots and sticks: legal work channels for future immigrants and the current population of workers unlawfully in the country along with a much more effective bar against hiring illegal labor."

Probe Finds Immigration Violations At Kentucky Restaurant. The Murray (KY) Ledger & Times (3/23, Taylor) reports, "An investigation last month into an indentured servitude complaint at Murray's Asian Buffet proved the allegation false, but five people were taken into custody for immigration violations." The L&T continues, "U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Gail Montenegro said interviews conducted Feb. 8 at the Murray restaurant revealed no indication of human trafficking of indentured servitude. The federal investigators were responding to a complaint that workers were being held against their will. … Following the investigation, five people were taken into custody for immigration violations. Montenegro said that included one Mexican juvenile female, three Mexican adult males and one Chinese female." The L&T adds, "Montenegro didn't have the individuals' names because the ICE agent who worked on the case was traveling. Even so, she said the agency doesn't usually release names until people have been deported or if their identity is in the public's interest for safety reasons."

TAX:

DOJ Sues North Carolina Tax Preparers. The Charlotte Observer (3/23, Drummond) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department today filed lawsuits to stop two area tax preparers from preparing returns." The Observer continues, "The government said Jerry Adams and Demetria Adams prepared more than 1,600 tax returns in 2004 and 2005 at First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby." The Observer adds, "In the suits filed in federal court in Charlotte, the government alleges the two understated wages and overstated credits for the past two years. The 'excessive refunds' cost the U.S. Treasury more than $3.8 million, the lawsuits claim. … The government wants the court to order the pair to turn over names, addresses and Social Security numbers of customers. … Since 2001, the Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax return preparers and promoters."

KPMG Revises Terms Of Tax-Shelter Settlement Payout. The New York Times (3/23, Browning) reports, "The accounting firm KPMG said yesterday that it had reached a revised settlement with tax shelter investors, but warned that the reduced agreement could still fall apart." The Times continues, "The previous $195 million deal, brokered last September through Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the prominent class-action law firm, collapsed in recent months when nearly one in four eligible investors chose not to take part, saying that it did not offer them enough compensation. … Under the complex terms of the revised settlement, some 60 investors who chose not to join can come back in. But investors who are currently in the deal can now elect not to participate."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Reilly) reports, "Accounting giant KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin LLP took a fresh stab at settling a class-action lawsuit related to the sale of questionable tax shelters. … The firms last month shelved a previous version of the settlement, which called for a $195 million payout to those who had bought the tax shelters, because too many people had opted out of the agreement." The Journal continues, "Under the new version of the settlement, filed yesterday in federal court in New Jersey, KPMG and Sidley Austin would pay no more than, but most likely far less than, the $195 million originally envisaged, as well as up to $30 million in legal fees. … KPMG, which sold the questionable tax shelters, will bear the brunt of this cost, while Chicago-based Sidley Austin, which gave legal advice on the shelters, will pay about 20%." The Journal adds, "The revised settlement terms would reduce the amount the firms will pay based on the number of plaintiffs who opt out. The amounts to be received by individuals won't necessarily decline because of this reduction. They would depend on the specific claims of each individual investor."

Consumer, Privacy Groups Criticize IRS Rules On Selling Taxpayer Data. Proposed IRS rules that would spell out how tax return preparers may legally sell financial information from their clients' returns are drawing fire from consumer groups and privacy advocates. The Washington Post (3/23, D1, Crenshaw, 744K) reports, "The proposal, issued in December, was billed by the IRS as improving privacy protections for taxpayers, detailing the steps for getting permission to use the information. But it has focused attention on a little-known fact: Although law forbids the unauthorized disclosure of taxpayer information, return-preparers have long been allowed to disclose it, even sell it, if they obtain their clients' permission." The rules "also specify what a preparer must do to get permission from a taxpayer to disclose return information, up to and including the entire return."

WSJournal Cites Revenue Data As Proof Of Tax Cuts' Success. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) notes "the latest Treasury figures on booming federal tax revenue." The Journal says the revenue data "are further proof of the success of the Bush tax cuts of 2003. The fastest way to stop this revenue windfall, and blow an even larger hole in the deficit, would be to fail to extend the 15% tax rate on capital gains and dividends through 2010, thus assuring a huge tax increase after 2008."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Seen As Fueling Speculation About Staff Changes. The New York Times (3/23, Nagourney, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports President Bush's "suggestion on Tuesday that he may add a new senior figure to his White House team raised questions about the future of" Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who have "increasingly been forced to fend off rebellious Congressional Republicans, complaints about the administration's competence and calls from within their party for an infusion of fresh thinking into the White House." Rove "told associates in recent days that he was confident he could resist calls to bring in new advisers." But Bush's "decision not to squelch speculation about such a move" did "nothing to restore diminished Republican confidence in a White House team that once promoted a reputation for efficiency, order and impeccable political instincts." Two GOP sources said "the names being suggested to the president included" HHS Secretary Michael O. Leavitt, former RNC Chairman Marc Racicot, former Commerce Secretary Donald L. Evans, former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie, and former Reps. Thomas G. Loeffler and Bill Paxon. The Times adds in an interview last week, Card "defended Mr. Rove and…took the blame for any problems." For his part, Rove "dismissed the notion that he was fatigued or had lost his touch." The Times adds Rove "has assured worried Republicans that the party will endure just minor losses in the midterm elections. Associates said Mr. Rove appeared increasingly certain that he would not be indicted for his role in the leaking of a C.I.A. operative's name."

AARP Launches Ad Campaign To Push Medicare Drug Plan. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that the AARP has launched a new ad campaign encouraging seniors to sign up for the Medicare drug benefit. According to the Journal, "The print ads, featuring vignettes and photos of seniors saving money with the new coverage, target low-income people eligible for extra federal subsidies of their medication costs. The ads will appear in publications for seniors and minorities in communities with high numbers of low-income seniors who haven't yet signed up for the drug benefit."

Medicare, Medicaid Recipients' Personal Data Said To Be At Risk. USA Today (3/23, Appleby, 2.31M) reports Federal investigators say "medical and financial information gathered on millions of Americans by Medicare, Medicaid and other government programs is vulnerable to thieves or pranksters because of inadequate computer security." The Government Accountability Office says "'significant weaknesses in information security controls' increase the risk from those who would 'inadvertently or deliberately disclose, modify or destroy' sensitive data." Sen. Charles Grassley says, "Instead of firewalls to safeguard sensitive data, we have Swiss cheese."

Gov. Dirk Kempthorne as Interior secretary in an effort to protect his state from offshore drilling." Kempthorne's supporters "are confident that they have the votes to override such a move," and he is "all but certain to earn the requisite votes when the Energy and Natural Resources Committee takes up his nomination in late March or early April, but senators can raise the bar for confirmation to 60 votes by placing a hold on the confirmation process when it moves to the floor."

Bush Presides Over Second-Longest Veto-Free Period. USA Today (3/23, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports President Bush "today becomes the longest-sitting president since Thomas Jefferson not to exercise his veto, surpassing James Monroe." Today is Bush's "1,889th day in office, and no veto is in sight. As of Wednesday, Congress had sent him 1,091 bills. He signed them all." Some analysts "say Bush's failure to use his veto shows an unwillingness to confront fellow Republicans who control Congress."

In an analysis story, USA Today (3/23, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports For most of his presidency, Congress has been dominated by fellow Republicans." Colby College professor G. Calvin Mackenzie said, "Presidents generally do not want to draw a line between themselves and their party." USA adds Bush "and the Republican Congress saw eye to eye on a string of major legislation, including five tax cuts, a bankruptcy overhaul bill, an energy bill, a Medicare prescription-drug plan, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and a bipartisan resolution to go to war in Iraq. Bush's defeats have often come over items Congress never passed."

Ryan Promotes Line-Item Veto Legislation. In a USA Today op-ed (3/23), Rep. Paul Ryan explains his proposal to give the President a line-item veto, saying, "We propose beefing up the president's existing authority to ask Congress to rescind wasteful spending items. Today, the president can make such a request, but Congress can just ignore it." Under the "bipartisan legislation, the president can sign a spending bill but put a temporary hold on any wasteful provision and request that Congress rescind it. After two days, any member of Congress could introduce the rescission proposal and it would have to be voted on within 10 legislative days, guaranteeing fast-track consideration."

Competitive Sourcing Seen As Failing To Meet White House Hopes. The Washington Post (3/23, A21, Lee, 744K) reports President Bush "called" competitive sourcing "his top management priority when he took office in 2001, saying federal workers should compete with contractors for as many as 850,000 government jobs that are considered commercial, jobs as diverse as janitorial services and computer network design." But the program has "gone far less smoothly, and far more slowly, than the White House had hoped, with fewer than 50,000 jobs studied by the end of 2005. And federal workers have won the job competitions more than 80 percent of the time."

Bill Would Exempt DC From Hatch Act. DC officials have proposed legislation that would exempt the city from enforcement of the Hatch Act and govern itself on the matter. The Washington Times (3/23, Doolittle, 90K) reports, "D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, introduced the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, last week. Their bill would exempt the District from the Hatch Act, a 1939 anti-corruption law designed to prohibit federal workers from participating in political campaigns." Enactment of the bill "is contingent upon the D.C. Council passing a bill similar to the Hatch Act. Mrs. Norton said she expects her bill to easily pass both the House and the Senate."

Effectiveness Of US Arab-Language TV Station Considered. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 8, 3:45, Andrews, 7.66M) reported on al Hurra, the Arab-language TV station run by the US government for $70 million per year. Based in Virginia, al Hurra "launched two years ago as an antidote to al Jazeera, the influential Arabic channel that often specializes in anti-American views. Al Hurra's mission is to present news from an American perspective and promote democracy. Is this station a success?" Shibley Telhami, University of Maryland: "No." Andrews: Telhami "has done surveys in the Arab world that rank al Hurra dead last in news popularity. Most Arabs watch al Jazeera he says precisely because they want to hear what's wrong with American policy. Telhami believes the al Hurra message is dead on arrival." But the "real measure of al Hurra is whether the station is earning the United States more understanding or even more sympathy in the Arab world. Is al Hurra doing anything to win hearts and minds? Al Hurra has its own surveys showing that over 20 million Arabs watch at some point every week, and that most of them -- 70% -- find al Hurra's news credible, an achievement says the news director earned the hard way."

Study Finds Most Americans View Muslims Favorably. A Pew study released yesterday finds that most Americans hold favorable views of Muslims, and nearly half say Islam does not encourage violence more than other religions. The Washington Times (3/23, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, that the study from the Pew forum on Religion and Public Life offers "hope that Muslims eventually will be accepted and integrated into American society as people of other faiths have been." However, the Times adds that "many Americans remain wary of Muslims and Islam."

NYTimes Says Campaign Finance Regulations Need Updating. An editorial in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says the campaign finance reforms implemented after Watergate are "now badly in need of updating to keep pace with the big-money dynamics of private fund-raising, which has retightened its lock on politics. Don't expect much help from the current Congress, so clearly in thrall to special interests' campaign money."

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Predicts Wage Growth Will Accelerate. USA Today (3/23, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Treasury Secretary John Snow predicted Wednesday that US wage growth would accelerate in coming months, as he tried to combat negative consumer attitudes about the economy and White House policies." In a meeting with reporters, Snow "said that as labor markets tighten -- with the unemployment rate falling to 4.8% in February from 6.3% in mid-2003 -- companies will boost compensation." USA Today adds, "Several measures of compensation, including hourly wage growth, have lagged behind inflation during much of the recovery from the 2001 recession. Average hourly wages rose 3.2% in 2005, while the consumer inflation rate was up 3.4%." There are "signs that wages are starting to pick up. The Labor Department said hourly wages for non-supervisory workers, about 80% of the workforce, rose 5 cents in February and 3.5% from February 2004."

The Washington Post (3/23, D3, Henderson, 744K) reports Snow also said "the income gap between rich and poor in the United States has shrunk in recent years. … The top 5 percent of Americans, ranked by income, earned 15.4 percent of the nation's after-tax income in 2003, down from 19 percent in 2000, Treasury figures show. The bottom 20 percent took home 2.5 percent of all U.S. after-tax income, up from 2.3 percent in 2000." But "much of the decline in inequality," adds the Post, "reflected the popping of the stock market bubble, which peaked in 2000, when executives pocketed fat bonuses and stockholders reaped huge profits from selling shares, according to economists inside and outside the Bush administration."

Stock Markets Rebound, Dow Reaches Highest Level In Almost Five Years. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 4, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks finished higher. The Dow was up nearly 82 points [to close at 11,317.43]. The NASDAQ gained just over 9 points on the day [to close at 2,303.35]." The New York Times (3/23, News, 1.19M) reports the Dow Jones industrial average "rose yesterday to its highest level in almost five years as the outlook for corporate earnings improved." Also, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 7.81 points, or 0.6 percent, to 1,305.04. USA Today (3/23, 2.31M) and the Wall Street Journal (3/23, Patterson, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

S&P 500's Poor Performance Said To Undermine Bush "Ownership Society" Vision. Bloomberg (3/23, Murray) reports President George W. Bush has "tried to sell Americans on an 'ownership society' that would create more wealth -- and more Republicans in the process. The stock market hasn't accommodated." The Standard & Poor's 500 Index, "the benchmark for American equities -- is down 2.8 percent since Bush took office five years and two months ago. That's the worst performance during the same stage of any two-term administration in the past half century except that of Richard M. Nixon."

Republicans Don't Want Stem Cell Research To Be Wedge Issue. Bloomberg (3/23, Roberts) reports supporters of stem cell research "present a quandary for Republicans, who are split over whether to allow federal funding for research on new stem cells from human embryos. Senate Democrats plan to force a debate on the issue in the coming months and use it in the campaign leading up to the November elections." Republicans "plan their own debate over bioethics in an effort to limit the damage from letting stem cells become 'a wedge issue that divides Republicans,' Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said in an interview."

Disabled Iraq Veteran Wins Democratic House Primary In Illinois. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Tammy

Duckworth, the Iraq veteran who lost her legs when her Blackhawk helicopter was hit by an RPG, won the Democratic primary for Illinois' 6th CD. Duckworth was "wooed by Democrats looking to get credibility on security issues." CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Crowley) called Duckworth "the Polaris in a galaxy of Democratic hopes this election year, running in the once solidly Republican, now evolving, west suburbs of Chicago for a seat long held by Republican Henry Hyde." Duckworth "is a natural, a newcomer, young, female, an Iraqi war veteran who opposed the war and proudly served." The New York Times (3/23, Ruethling, 1.19M) reports "Duckworth's opponents in Tuesday's primary were critical of the amount of support and financing she received from outside the district."

The AP (3/23, Conrad) says Duckworth "is now leading the charge for the Fighting Democrats." In November, Duckworth "will face state Sen. Peter Roskam, a well-to-do lawyer and conservative from Wheaton who ran unopposed in the GOP primary. Roskam also drew support from Vice President Dick Cheney, who helped with a fundraiser that brought in an estimated $200,000." On its website, Time (3/23, Kerkenhoff) reports Republicans "are confident that Hyde's conservative legacy remains very much alive in the west suburban District. And they note that Roskam, while criticized as too far right for a district becoming more diverse, is a loyal Bush supporter running in a district that voted for him in 2004, even as the President handily lost the state as a whole." The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Paulson, 61K) also says that "despite Duckworth's high profile -- and backing from party leaders such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. John Kerry, and Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Richard Durbin -- taking the seat from the GOP will be tough, most analysts agree.

The Washington Post (3/23, A4, Lydersen, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Election officials here resumed counting ballots Wednesday after problems with new electronic voting machines around Cook County forced them to halt the count in a key local race in Tuesday's primary that also had voters casting ballots for governor and Congress. … The problems Tuesday night did not significantly affect tabulations for one of the nation's key congressional primaries." Illinois "has received more than $144 million in federal grants to comply with the Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed in 2002 in response to the controversy over the disputed election in South Florida in 2000."

Number Of Physicians Providing Charity Care Has Declined. A new study to be released today by the Center for Studying Health System Change, found that the proportion of American doctors providing charity care has declined over past decade. The Washington Post (3/23, A9, Connolly, 744K) reports, "In 2004-2005, 68 percent of doctors said they delivered some free or discounted care to low-income patients, down from the 76 percent recorded 10 years earlier" according to the study. The Post adds, "Overall, higher-paid specialists or doctors working in small private practices were more likely to provide charity care than internists, pediatricians or those employed by large managed-care companies, the survey found."

Duncan Says O'Malley Isn't Solving Baltimore Crime Problem. Maryland Democratic gubernatorial candidate Douglas M. Duncan writes in the Washington Post (3/23, A23, 744K) that "when it comes to crime, Baltimore is not healthy. … The mayor of Baltimore can't seem to crack the problem. He's on his fourth police commissioner, and the police department itself is dealing with a major scandal. The mayor openly spars with prosecutors when they need to be working together. And sadly, politics are being put ahead of people." Duncan adds, "Mayor Martin O'Malley repeatedly refers to a 40 percent decline in violent crime. Independent experts say it may be more like 23 percent. While campaigning in Montgomery County, O'Malley claimed it was 50 percent."

Brooks Says Many Republicans Believe Culture Matters Most. David Brooks writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M), "The setbacks in Iraq, the failure to limit the size of government and plummeting poll numbers have changed the way Republicans talk and govern. If you wanted to put these changes in a nutshell, you'd say the Republicans have gone from soaring Bushian universalism to nervous, dumbed-down Huntingtonism. … Today, many Republicans have lost patience with Bush's high-minded creedal statements. Like the Harvard political scientist Samuel Huntington, they have come to believe that culture matters most. … In short, Republicans seem to have gone from believing that culture is nothing, to believing that culture is everything — from idealism to fatalism in the blink of an eye."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS:

Rice Eyes Agreement On Iran Despite Roadblock. The AP (3/22, Sidoti) reported Secretary Rice "expressed confidence Wednesday that Russia and China would eventually resolve their differences with the United States and its European allies on how to pressure Iran to stop enriching uranium." A separate AP (3/22, Wadhams) piece said the slow pace of discussions this week "reflected just how much the United States and its European allies had failed to get Russia and China on board during a meeting of high-level diplomats in New York the night before. One council diplomat described that meeting as a setback for" US, UK and French" efforts to craft a tough council response to Iran, which the West believes is seeking nuclear weapons."

Another AP dispatch (3/23, Schweid) reports the Bush Administration "questioned on Wednesday the motives of Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq, but did not shut the door entirely." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "It is a matter of curious timing." He was "suggesting," adds the AP, that "Iran was trying to deflect international pressure from its nuclear programs now under critical discussion at the United Nations."

70% Of Americans Think Iran Building Nuclear Weapon. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) reports, "A large majority of Americans believe Iran is using its uranium research program to build a nuclear weapon, according to a recent Harris Interactive poll. About 85% of Americans say the US 'should be concerned' about Iran's nuclear research activities, according to the telephone survey of 2,435 U.S. adults." And "70% say they think Iran is using its research to build a nuclear weapon, the poll shows, while another 25% say they aren't sure."

More Commentary On Iraq. Nir Boms, vice president of the Center for Freedom in the Middle East, and Reza Bulorchi, executive director of the US Alliance for Democratic Iran, write in the Washington Times (3/23, 90K) that "the vast majority of Iranians are opposed to the theocratic regime's drive that has pushed their country to the verge of a military confrontation. An internal classified report prepared by a state-run polling center has reportedly concluded that only 31 percent of Iranians consider the nuclear program a 'national' project. The report adds that 86 percent of Iranians believe the nuclear energy is not worth entering a war."

Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (3/23, A23, 744K), "Ask administration hard-liners about Iran's sudden acceptance of the US offer to talk about stability in Iraq and you hear this reaction: It's a booby trap. These hawks are right. Put the same question to moderates on the Bush team and this is the response: It's an opening in the confrontation and a necessary step toward an exit strategy for Iraq. The remarkable thing is that these doves are right, too." President Bush "must treat the Iranian decision to open discussions in Baghdad as trap and opportunity. It is both. The administration should pursue this small opening in the Iranian wall with discipline and attention to maintaining a united front with its European and Asian partners."

Bush, Rice, Burns Lobby For India Nuclear Pact. The AP (3/22, Schweid) reports President Bush made public comments Wednesday urging the US Congress "to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India — a deal that could be a tough sell to lawmakers." Bush "said India has proven itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator." Secretary Rice will testify before Congress in support of the pact, which requires Congressional approval to exempt New Delhi from nuclear trade restriction laws. Under Secretary Burns made supportive public comments, and Assistant Secretaries Rademaker and Boucher will promote the plan to the Nuclear Suppliers Group in Vienna.

Pentagon Plan Would Base "Star Wars" Interceptors In UK. The Financial Times (3/23, Dinmore) reports Pentagon plans call for placing "interceptor missiles… in the UK as part of the US 'Star Wars' missile defence system." The plans are "likely to attract more unwelcome attention for prime minister Tony Blair's government over the nature of the transatlantic relationship." Lt Gen Trey Obering, "head of the Missile Defense Agency, disclosed at a military conference in Washington this week that the US had formally selected Britain as possible site for the interceptors in Europe." But Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said on Wednesday that negotiations had not taken place on basing interceptors in the UK."

Bahamas Trip Seems To Have Achieved Most Of Rice's Goals. The New York Times (3/23, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice's two-day trip to the Bahamas "appeared to have cooled" regional leaders' "anger toward the United States but failed to persuade them to embrace the new government in Haiti." Rice had aimed "to persuade the other Caribbean nations to take forceful steps to help the new Haitian government stabilize the country and deal with its crushing problems. What she got was a commitment to readmit Haiti to the Caribbean Community of nations and a vague promise to help Haiti in the future." The Times says US relations with Caribbean nations "have been strained and embittered for two years" and "she and her aides said they realized that she had to come here to begin turning the situation around."

Senators' Promotion Of Trade, Freedom In Beijing Gets Mixed Reaction. The Washington Post (3/23, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports Senators Tom Coburn, Lindsey Graham and Charles Schumer "came to one of China's most prestigious universities on Wednesday, ostensibly to talk about trade. What they delivered was an expansive, almost evangelical campaign for American values -- one that received pushback from their audience of students and faculty." While touting trade, the senators, in what the Post calls "strikingly moral tones," said they will push Beijing "to liberalize not only its currency regime but also its political culture, using trade as a wedge for broader reform." The Post says this and other US efforts to achieve a free-floating yuan have "backfired in some quarters. Many here resent the specter of the world's lone superpower seemingly attempting to dictate how Beijing should manage its economy and the values that should govern Chinese society." The Post notes the high-level and opulent attention afforded the senators "attests to the gravity of the issue for China's leaders, who are cognizant of the angry mood in Washington." The New York Times (3/23, Kahn, 1.19M) makes a similar point in a story titled "China Tries To Charm Couple Of Senate Skeptics."

USA Today (3/23, Macleod, 2.31M) notes Graham and Schumer "are co-authors of a bill that proposes a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports into the United States unless Beijing revalues its yuan currency at a higher exchange rate to the dollar."

Bush-Hu Meeting Previewed. Bloomberg (3/22) reported spokesman Scott McClellan said Wednesday that Chinese President Hu Jintao will meet President Bush at the White House on April 20 "to discuss the fight against terrorism and halting the spread of nuclear weapons."

China's Competitiveness Said To Have Eroded. Hong Kong-based Li & Fung group, one of the world's largest trade sourcing companies says the competitiveness of China's manufacturing industries has eroded over the past year. The Financial Times (3/23, Mitchell) reports that the firm "said price rises crept back into the Sino-US and EU supply chains last year, after at least six years of often 'severe deflation.' William Fung, Li & Fung managing director, reported an average 2-3 per cent increase in the once unbeatable China price its US and European clients were willing to pay."

China Announces Plans To Raise Taxes. The Chinese government yesterday announced plans to increase existing taxes and impose new ones in an effort to rein in the use of energy and timber and the gap between rich and poor. The New York Times (3/23, Bradsher, 1.19M) reports, "New or higher taxes will fall on vehicles with engines larger than two liters, disposable wooden chopsticks, planks for wood floors, luxury watches, golf clubs, golf balls and certain oil products." China's finance ministry announced the higher taxes Tuesday night in a statement that "offered another sign that some senior Chinese officials may be having second thoughts about the rapid growth of privately owned family vehicles, whose sales rose to 3.1 million last year from just 640,000 in 2000."

The Washington Times (3/23, Spencer, 90K) calls the 5% tax on disposable wooden chopsticks a sign that China's "growing environmental consciousness has hit the heart of its culture." The Finance Ministry "said chopstick production used up China's forests at a rate of 70 million cubic feet a year, a waste that it wanted to discourage." The Times adds, "A 10 percent tax on golf balls and clubs, part of a wider assault on luxury items, might seem to be unconnected, but there is growing concern in Beijing that many municipal drives to attract business by building golf courses are sacrificing land, trees and water supplies for what remains a relatively tiny market." The five-year plan "is a major effort by the government to reorder China's priorities after 25 years of dramatic economic growth and spread some of the benefits to ordinary people."

Chinese President Offers Advice To Combat Corruption, Cynicism. The communist Party propaganda apparatus has been spreading Chinese President Hu Jintao's advice to "do good and avoid evil" all over China. The Washington Post (3/23, A16, Cody, 744K) reports, "Hu's fatherly advice, in the form of eight do's and don'ts, was issued two weeks ago as an antidote to the corruption and cynicism spreading across China, a result of the often raw capitalism that has emerged during 25 years of dramatic economic change. Although his aphorisms may sound simplistic to Western ears – 'Work hard, don't be lazy' and 'Be honest, not profit-mongering' -- Chinese analysts said they are a response to a deep-seated desire among people here for a moral compass to guide them through the unsettling transformation."

China, Russia Face Talks Over Gas Prices. Beijing and Moscow face tough talks over prices in the wake of this week's announcement of the construction of two pipelines to carry natural gas from Russia to China within five years. The Financial Times (3/23, McGregor, Buckley) reports, "Sergei Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, on Wednesday said Russia would sell the gas to China at the 'market price,' calculated according to the same formula linked to oil and diesel prices as for sales to Europe. But China has balked at signing long-term import gas contracts for the past three years as the price of the resource has risen along with that of oil, outstripping domestic rates which are kept artificially low."

Russia Wants Larger Role In China's Nuclear Industry. Meanwhile, Russia says it wants to play a greater role in china's nuclear power industry. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Oster, 2.11M) report that Lavrov said yesterday that China "welcomes increased Russian participation in its nuclear-power sector, which is undergoing one of its biggest-ever expansions and one of the biggest nuclear rollouts in the industry's history. China has said it plans to build 30 or more nuclear reactors during the next 15 years. Currently, it has nine reactors at two plants."

Canada To Import Russian Natural Gas To Sell To US. In an effort to capitalize on natural gas shortages, Canada is planning to import liquefied natural gas (LNG) from Russia to be exported the US. The Washington Times (3/23, Mihailescu, 90K) reports, "The Canadian government recently approved a $1.5 billion joint venture of Petro-Canada and Russian giant Gazprom to build a plant near St. Petersburg in Russia to liquefy the gas and load it into giant tanker ships. The tankers would be unloaded in Quebec and the liquid converted back into gas that could be pumped through existing pipeline networks to U.S. customers. … The entire project could cost as much as $2 billion."

Latest Mad Cow Case Won't Affect Beef Talks With Japan. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that Japanese Ambassador Ryozo Kato says the discovery this month of a third case of mad cow disease in the US "won't affect the trade negotiations over beef with Japan because the Alabama cow was born before the US changed its animal-feed rules." Kato "declined to give any timetable for Japan to reopen its market, once the biggest for US beef."

State Department Warns Americans About Traveling To Italy This Spring. The State Department yesterday warned Americans to take precautions when traveling in Italy this spring, saying next month's elections will likely bring demonstrations in parts of the country. The AP (3/23) reports, "The department said Americans should avoid areas where crowds are expected to gather, take common sense precautions and closely follow media reports. The US considers Italy to be under a heightened threat by al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists for its participation in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan."

ETA Terrorists Announce "Permanent Cease-Fire." The New York Times (3/23, McLean, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Basque separatist group ETA, which has killed more than 800 people and terrorized Spanish society for nearly 40 years, on Wednesday announced a permanent cease-fire, saying that it would turn its attention to achieving independence for the Basque region of Spain through politics." The Times calls a ceasefire agreement "the paramount objective of successive Spanish governments since the establishment of democracy here in 1977." In a press conference, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero "said it was important to treat the announcement with caution, echoing concerns of victims' groups, who urged politicians to remember what they described as ETA's history of deceit and unfulfilled promises."

The Financial Times (3/23, Crawford) notes, "ETA made no mention of surrendering or laying down arms. Mr Zapatero told parliament his government had greeted Eta's declaration with caution." The Times also reports, "The plight of the victims of terrorism, as well as ETA's demands for a political process culminating in a referendum on Basque independence, make peace talks particularly tricky for the Spanish government."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, A4, Johnson, 2.11M) says the announcement opens "the door to what could be a profound change for Spain, much as the 1998 Good Friday agreement ushered in an eventual peace process for Northern Ireland." The Journal notes, "In contrast, the separatist movement in the northeastern region of Catalonia has been more successful at prying powers away from Madrid over the past quarter-century because it never resorted to terrorism, as the ETA often did." The AP (3/23, Letona), AFP (3/23), Wall Street Journal (3/23, Johnson, 2.11M), Los Angeles Times (3/23, Wilkinson, 958K), Washington Post (3/23, A16, Rolfe, Moore, 744K) and Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Ford, 61K) also report the story.

US Charges Colombian Rebels With Cocaine Trafficking. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced yesterday that a federal grand jury has indicted 50 commanders of a Colombian Marxist rebel group, accusing them of running a cocaine trafficking cartel. The New York Times (3/23, Forero, 1.19M) reports, "The indictment accuses the group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States." The Times adds, "The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government."

The Washington Times (3/23, Seper, 90K) reports, "The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, 'strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation,' said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government." Gonzales added that FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking."

UN Reform Effort Could Crumble. The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the UN's effort at reform "risks crumbling into little more than a dashed hope. … Already, some countries see reform's principal promoter, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, as a lame duck: A new secretary-general will be elected later this year. A bigger impediment still is that even more countries harbor old suspicions about those pressing for reform - in particular the United States. These countries also feel scalded by so-far unsuccessful attempts to reform the powerful Security Council." The Monitor adds, "Hopes for the reforms were buoyed by last week's approval of a new human rights council. … But even the human rights reform, which is less bold than some powers including the US had advocated, suggests the difficult road ahead on other issues."

Muhammad Cartoons Spark Grass Roots Education Movement In Saudi Arabia. A diverse group of women, students, businessmen, lawyers and clerics in Saudi Arabia are working to educate non-Muslim co-workers and acquaintances about Islam and the prophet Muhammad. The Washington Post (3/23, A18, Ambah, 744K) reports that the grass roots movement has grown "across the kingdom since January, when anger over cartoons of Muhammad sparked riots in Europe and several Muslim countries." The activists' campaign "includes a continuing economic boycott of Denmark, where the cartoons were first published, and a project to produce television ads about the prophet for broadcast in Europe. College students are attempting to collect 1 million signatures to present to the Danish Embassy, and lawyers are studying ways to make insulting Islam and its prophet illegal."

Political Reform Tops Muslim Brotherhood's Agenda. Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, which at 88 people is the largest opposition bloc in Egpyt's parliament since the monarchy's overthrow in 1952, has put "political reform" and "fighting corruption" at the top of its agenda. The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Gauch, 61K) reports that "the spotlight is on the Muslim Brotherhood to see how this group adapts religion to their democratic ambitions. … Although the Brotherhood is still a minority in a parliament with overwhelming state party control, they are proving to be a strong, outspoken, and unified force, analysts say.'

Families Of Disappeared Provide Reminders Of Lebanese Civil War. The New York Times (3/23, Fattah, 1.19M) reports that "the families of more than 600 young men and women who disappeared during and after" Lebanon's civil war "have held a vigil in a park downtown for almost a year, demanding that the government investigate their cases. To many of them, the ceremony on Saturday was a signal that a door might be opening on one of the darkest chapters of the bloody civil war." The Times adds, "In a nation struggling to forget the war among its many religious groups, the Palestinians and regional powers, a war that claimed tens of thousands of lives from 1975 to 1990 and demolished half this city, the women are a reminder of how much remains unresolved."

Protesters Demand New Election In Belarus. The New York Times (3/23, Chivers, 1.19M) reports that since the rigged presidential election in Belarus on March 19, the country's capital "has seen a protest like none in 12 years of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's autocratic grip. For four consecutive days, protesters have defied warnings of arrest and bloodshed and stood in a corner of October Square to demand a new race. … The protesters see little chance of changes in government anytime soon."

German Chancellor Will Announce Domestic Agenda Soon. The New York Times (3/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) says German Chancellor Angela Merkel "has clearly made an extremely good impression in the four months since she took office." There is a "strong feeling" that her popularity is "because of her decision to advance very little in the way of a bold domestic agenda. That may be about to change. Three German states have elections on Sunday, after which Mrs. Merkel is expected to start her campaign to win major changes, tackling such chronic problems as high unemployment, economic stagnation and government deficits that exceed norms set for Germany's membership in the European Currency Union. That is when the political storm will stir."

UK Court Upholds School Ban On Muslim Gown. Britain's highest court rules yesterday that a secondary school was within its rights to bar a student from wearing a Muslim gown, known as a jilbab, instead of a regular school uniform. The New York Times (3/23, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "Overturning a lower court ruling in favor of the student, Shabina Begum, a five-judge panel in the House of Lords pointed out that the school, Denbigh High School in Luton, had already taken great care to make its uniform acceptable to its students, 79 percent of whom are Muslim."

Journalist Says World Should Act In Unison On Hamas. Gideon Lichfield, the Jerusalem correspondent for The Economist, writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) that even the "most moderate" Palestinian "will rally to defend their democratically elected government if they see countries that profess to love democracy trying to destabilize it. That will reduce domestic pressure on Hamas to pursue peace. And if aid from elsewhere meanwhile props up the Palestinian Authority, Hamas can carry on this way indefinitely, playing countries off against one another." Lichfield adds that "whatever the world does about Hamas, it needs to do it in unison."

WSJournal Says World Does Not Seem Serious About Ending Sudan Conflict. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) says that the US is "the only nation with the will and wallet to provide order in an otherwise Hobbesian world. However, that will and wallet are being stretched today in Iraq and elsewhere, and Mr. Bush is rightly wary of committing more American blood and treasure to a conflict in Sudan that the rest of the world doesn't seem serious about ending in any event. One lesson of Darfur is that there really are limits to American power, and in its absence the world's savages have freer reign."

TERRORISM NEWS:

FAA Official, FBI Agent Boost Prosecution Case At Moussaoui Trial. Former FAA security official Robert J. Cammaroto and former FBI Special Agent Aaron testified yesterday at the penalty phase of al Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui's trial, and both said that airline security and law enforcement measures could have been taken that may have thwarted the 9/11 attacks had Moussaoui told FBI agents what he knew about al Qaeda's plans. News reports credit their testimony with getting the prosecution's case for the death penalty back on track after last week's witness-coaching incident the mixed testimony from the FBI's Harry Samit and Michael Rolince.

Under the headline "Case For Moussaoui Execution Seems Bolstered by 2 Witnesses," The New York Times (3/23, Lewis, 1.19M) reports, "The detailed testimony of the two witnesses provided the prosecution's strongest presentation to date at the trial." Cammaroto said, "We could have taken several steps," and listed "among others the banning of all knives, shifting resources like air marshals to domestic flights, ordering physical 'pat-downs' of passengers and making metal detectors more sensitive." Zebley "testified that information discovered after the attacks could have provided important leads beforehand. He noted that Mr. Moussaoui had received payments for his flight training from the same person who had sent money to some of the hijackers."

The Washington Post (3/23, Markon, Dwyer, 744K) adds that Cammaroto's "testimony was the initial step in the government's effort to rebuild its case," although he "acknowledged on cross-examination that in August 2001, the FAA was aware of al-Qaeda threats to hijack airplanes but had not increased airport security in response." Former Arizona flight school manager Margaret Chevrette also testified about providing flight training to hijacker Hani Hanjour and "recalled how she had expressed alarm about her student to the Federal Aviation Administration," which "did little in response" to her report that he lacked adequate English-language skills.

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Serrano, 958K) reports, "Asked by Assistant U.S. Atty. David J. Novak how swiftly airport security officials would have reacted had Moussaoui revealed that the Sept. 11 hijackers planned to smuggle small knives aboard planes and then commandeer the cockpits, Cammaroto said: 'It could have been done fairly quickly. In a matter of hours.' But under cross-examination…Cammaroto conceded that in the late summer of 2001, the approach to airport security was far more relaxed than it is today."

Focusing on Chevette's testimony, the AP (3/23, Barakat) notes, "It was the second time this week jurors heard witnesses testify that people in positions of authority in the federal government responded either slowly, negatively — or not at all — to warnings about a possible terrorist attack."

Agence France-Presse (3/23) reports, "Prosecutors called both witnesses in a bid to prove that Moussaoui's should be executed because his 'lies' gave the September 11 suicide crews time to pull off their spectacular attacks, which killed nearly 3,000 people. … They showed Zebley a Statement of Facts, in which the Frenchman pleaded guilty last year to plotting with Al-Qaeda to fly planes into US buildings -- more than three years after he was accused of such a crime. … Just the fact that he was admitted Al-Qaeda member would have been enough to set of a nationwide search for accomplices, Zebley testified. … An admission that he was a trainee pilot would have sent agents to flight schools to track other would-be attackers and information on Al-Qaeda financiers could have helped them follow the money to those behind the plot."

Administration Seeks Dismissal Of Guantanamo Detainee Lawsuits. The Washington Post (3/23, A15, White, 744K) reports Bush Administration lawyers "argued yesterday that a new law forces the dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in federal courts on behalf of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, urging" the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia "to instead adopt a far more limited process that still would give the prisoners access to judicial review." The court will "decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 retroactively stripped the court of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus cases challenging detentions at the military prison in Cuba. Lawyers representing the detainees argued that the new law does not apply to pending cases, while the government has maintained that all cases essentially should be wiped away."

The AP (3/23, Locy) reports, "Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph seemed willing to accept the administration's view that the act forces dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in U.S. District Court here on behalf of over 300 detainees. … But no one on the panel appeared to agree with the administration's take on what would happen next if detainees sought to essentially transfer their challenges to the appeals court." The AP notes, "Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer, argued that judges would be limited to reviewing the sufficiency of the administrative hearings held by the military because the detainees - who are aliens held outside the United States - have no rights under the Constitution. … Sentelle was incredulous. He reminded Katsas of a 2004 Supreme Court decision that cleared the way for detainees to file court challenges to their detentions. … 'You are saying that every single one of their claims are going to fail,' Sentelle said. 'You are saying that all the Supreme Court did ... was give (detainees) a right to file a piece of paper that cannot possibly grant release.'"

Dismissed Juror Says US Hasn't Made Convincing Case In California Terror Trial. In what is widely-reported as a bad sign for federal prosecutors at the trial of Hamid Hayat – accused of attending a terror training camp in Pakistan – a juror dismissed yesterday told reporters, "I don't think at this point in time the government has made its case." In particular, Andrea Clabaugh felt that FBI agents "badgered" Hayat into confessing on the videotaped interrogation shown to jurors. Clabaugh was dismissed after she volunteered to the judge that she had inadvertently failed to reveal during jury selection that she had dated a California law enforcement officer.

The Los Angeles Times (3/22, Tempest, 958K) reports, "Clabaugh said she was troubled by the way FBI agents appeared to 'badger'" Hayat, adding "I felt that in some respects he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything." She also "said the agents appeared to be 'feeding names' to Hayat. 'I didn't see him volunteering anything,' Clabaugh said."

The Sacramento Bee (3/23, Walsh, 301K) adds that Clabaugh "said as she left the federal courthouse that, if she had to decide now, she would vote to acquit" Hayat. Addressing Hayat's conversations with FBI informant Naseem Khan about attending the terror camp, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid who wanted to impress an older man, but it doesn't mean those were things he would actually follow through on."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/23, Bulwa) notes Claubaugh said of the FBI interrogation and Hayat's confession, "In my notes, I recall writing down something about the agents feeding him names. It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything." Additionally, Clabaugh said Khan "was just doing the job he was hired to do," and added that he "did not either help or hurt the case."

The AP (3/23, Thompson) reports Clabaugh said, "They've shown that Hamid was interested in acting against America and those ideas and thoughts, but they haven't proven that he actually attended a camp, that he took weapons training and that he (intended) to come back here and do anything." She added that Khan's "questioning was meant to entrap" Hayat.

The Lodi News-Sentinel (3/23, Bohm) also reports the story, under the headline "Former Hayat Juror: Government Has Not Proved Its Case."

Case Raises Questions About Reliance On FBI Undercover Informants. The Washington Post (3/23, A3, Geis, 744K) reports that the trial of Hamid and Umer Hayat "is the latest in a string of prosecutions brought since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks under a law that criminalizes providing 'material support' to terrorists," which had yielded mixed success for federal prosecutors. "The Lodi case provides a rare, detailed look at how one FBI informant functioned and raises questions about the effectiveness of the government's strategy of infiltrating the community with an outsider. Defense lawyers say their clients' arrests were made in desperation because there wasn't any real terrorist activity to find in Lodi." The Post notes, "Naseem Khan's credibility suffered a blow last week when he maintained he had seen" Ayman al-Zawahiri and other terror suspects in Lodi.

Posada To Remain In Federal Detention. The Miami Herald (3/23, Corral, 323K) reports that ICE announced yesterday that "the U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, who has been detained in a federal immigration facility since May," and "is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98." However, "ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba." The AP (3/23, Anderson) and AFP (3/23) also report on the ICE ruling.

Judge Clears Posada As Witness At Florida Weapons Trial. The Miami Herald (3/23, Corral, Weaver, 323K) reports, "A U.S. district judge has authorized lawyers for Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, two friends of Posada who were arrested last year on federal weapons charges, to have Posada brought to South Florida by federal marshals in the next few weeks as a potential witness in the case. … Alvarez and Mitat's legal strategy seems to be partly focused on political arguments to help free the men," with defense attorneys planning to "argue that the FBI may have used Cuban intelligence to nab the two men. 'Sadly, the FBI and Castro's regime have a well-documented and regrettable history in this community,' the defense's motion seeking evidence states, noting that 'the FBI paid Cuban double agent, Juan Pablo Roque, over $6,720.42 for information regarding exile organizations' -- information that later led to the 1996 downing of the Brothers to the Rescue planes and the death of three Cuban-Americans and a Cuban exile."

Defense Department Mulls Formal Ban On Evidence From Torture. The New York Times (3/23, Shanker, 1.19M) reports Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said "the Defense Department is considering a formal rule prohibiting the introduction of evidence obtained through torture at military tribunals for terror suspects detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba." The "introduction of evidence gained through torture is not expressly prohibited, although military prosecutors have said that such evidence would not be permitted." The AP (3/23, Burns) also reports this story.

British Prosecutors Say Al Qaeda Suspect Sought Atomic Bomb. The New York Times (3/23, Lyall, 1.19M) reports British prosecutors said one of seven defendants "accused of having links to Al Qaeda and plotting to carry out bomb attacks in Britain" had "inquired about buying an atomic bomb from Russian mafia figures in Belgium." Prosecutor David Waters said "the defendant, Salahuddin Amin, 30, had been asked by a man he met at a mosque in Luton, his hometown, to contact a third man, Abu Annis, about a 'radioisotope bomb.'" Annis "told him that 'they had made contact with the Russian mafia in Belgium and from the mafia they were trying to buy this bomb,' Mr. Waters said. While Mr. Amin later told the police that he did not believe it was likely that 'you can go and pick an atomic bomb up and use it,' the prosecutor said the incident was 'an indication as to Amin's position in, and his usefulness to, the organization.'"

Ridicule Seen As Effective Tool To Dismantle Terrorists' Ideology. In a USA Today op-ed (3/23), Hoover Institution fellow Peter Schweizer says, "Is America taking terrorists too seriously? In the wake of continued threats, that might seem like a ridiculous question. But in terms of the psychology of the war on terrorism, it's a question that needs to be asked." In a "brilliant new white paper on public diplomacy, Michael Waller, the Walter and Leonore Annenberg chair in International Communication at The Institute of World Politics, makes a strong case for America's employing a new powerful weapon against the terrorists: ridicule." History "teaches that ridicule weakens the moral and political capital of our enemies."

Judge Holds Closed-Door Hearing In Passaro Case. The Raleigh (NC) News & Observer (3/23) reports, "A federal judge (in Raleigh, NC) held a closed-door hearing (on Wednesday) to decide what, if any, classified information David Passaro's defense lawyers can use at trial." The AP continues, "U.S. District Court Judge Terrence W. Boyle ordered the hearing closed from its start at 9 a.m. No media or members of the public were allowed into the courtroom. … Passaro's trial has been tentatively set to start next month." The AP adds, "Passaro, 39, a former Green Beret from Lillington, is charged with assault of Abdul Wali, a suspect in rocket attacks on a military outpost in Asadabad, Afghanistan. Passaro was part of a covert paramilitary team. Prosecutors say he beat Wali with a flashlight and punched and kicked him during an interrogation. Wali died during his third day in U.S. custody in June 2003. … Passaro was the first American charged in the aftermath of the prisoner-abuse scandals in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was also the first civilian charged under the USA Patriot Act, which extended the reach of stateside prosecutors to military bases overseas."

Political Groups Claim FBI, Police Surveillance Have "Increased Markedly." Under the headline "FBI, Police Spying Is Rising, Groups Allege," The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Marks, 61K) reports, "Political activists from New York to Colorado to California report that they believe police and FBI surveillance of their activities has increased markedly since…Congress approved the USA Patriot Act loosening some of the strictures on law enforcement," prompting the ACLU to file FOIA "requests for more than 150 groups and individuals in more than 20 states who believe their first amendment rights are being violated." The Monitor notes, "Local police and the FBI insist that none of their activities is aimed at chilling political speech."

Hale To Leave DHS In Early May. The Washington Post (3/23, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that Janet Hale, undersecretary for management at the Department of Homeland Security, "will resign in early May." Hale "has been planning to leave the department for the past year but stayed on at the request of Secretary Michael Chertoff to help with his review of departmental operations, officials said." Hale "has been at the center of one of the biggest changes in the civil service in more than 50 years -- the department's plan to overhaul employee compensation and pay according to occupation, geographic location and job performance."

French Citizen Arrested After Throwing Package Over White House Gate. A French citizen was charged with disorderly conduct yesterday after he threw a bumble of papers over a gate of the White House. The Washington Post (3/23, B3, Wilber, Cauvin, 744K) reports that the incident forced police "to call in the bomb squad, seal the area and close off Lafayette Square, authorities said. The bundle turned out to contain nothing dangerous, but it took about an hour before authorities issued an all-clear."

Army Corps, FEMA Say Louisiana Levees Will Be Ready For Hurricane Season. The Washington Times (3/23, Hudson, 90K) reports, "Federal officials are working around the clock to complete repairs to Louisiana's levee system in time for the looming hurricane season." Paul Johnston, spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers, said "half the work required" has been completed so far, but that "the other half can and will be finished in 10 weeks." R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, said they "are going to be ready," and that he's been meeting "three times a week with Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff as they reorganize the agency."

Last Of Children Reported Missing After Gulf Hurricanes Reunited With Family. Federal officials announced that all of the missing children displaced by Hurricane Katrina – over 5,000 – have been reunited with their families. However, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children acknowledges there may still be missing children, and other agencies are still searching for children for whom they have not yet accounted.

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 2, 2:20, Osunsami, 8.78M) reported, "4-year-old Cortez Stewart has given the National Center for Missing Children a big reason to celebrate. According to their records, she's the last of up to 5,000 children that went missing after Hurricane Katrina." But "there are still a number of missing Gulf Coast children. But the different agencies looking for them haven't been working together to keep the numbers straight. The Find Family National Call Center, keeping count in Louisiana, are still searching for 104 children. 25 of them are toddlers. 29 of the children are between 6 and 10. Most of the children are 11 to 15 years old. Today, for the first time, they contacted other agencies and traded notes, hoping to solve a few cases."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 10, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "A happy milestone to report tonight on the long road back from last year's devastating hurricane season: 5,192 children were reported missing after hurricanes Katrina and Rita. All but 12 were found alive and as of last week, all of them are back with their families. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children worked with the FBI, FEMA, the Red Cross and other agencies to bring the children and their parents back together."

The Washington Times/AP (3/23, Plaisance) reports Stewart, who "was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Texas last week," was "the last of 5,192 Gulf Coast children listed as missing or displaced after the storms struck more than six months ago. The effort to reunite those youngsters became the largest child-recovery effort in US history. The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children worked with the FBI, Federal Emergency Management Agency, U.S. Postal Service, Red Cross and other agencies to reunite children separated from their parents or guardians when Katrina hit Aug. 29 and Rita followed Sept. 24."

Absentee Ballots To Play Major Role In New Orleans Elections. NBC Nightly News(3/22, story 11, 2:35, Brown, 9.87M) reported that in New Orleans, "There will be elections exactly a month from now for Mayor, City Council and several other municipal offices. There are more than 20 candidates for Mayor alone, and today was the last day to register to vote in those elections. And tonight, many are wondering will their votes count." NBC (Reid) added, "About 60% of New Orleans' pre-Katrina population still lives outside the city, forcing candidates to campaign in Houston, Dallas, Memphis and Atlanta, where at a candidate forum last weekend, prospective voters complained about Louisiana's refusal to set up polling places in other states, requiring out-of-state evacuees, most of whom are black, to vote by absentee ballot." Political analyst Silas Lee "says a flood of absentee ballots could lead to a fiasco." Silas Lee, political analyst: "My biggest fear is that this is a repeat of Florida 2000. We will not have chads, but we will have the question of voter participation and ballots being counted." Reid: "But election officials say they're doing all they can, from looser absentee ballot rules to an aggressive voter education campaign in eight states."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Continues Defense Of Iraq War. For the fifth day in a row, President Bush yesterday defended his Administration's Iraq policy, this time before an audience of military families in Wheeling, West Virginia. Bush's comments on Iraq received extensive media coverage, but not as much as much as in previous days. For example, while the story was covered by all three networks ABC mentioned his appearance in a larger story about media coverage of the war, while CBS and NBC mentioned it in very brief segments. In addition, some major newspapers covered Bush's trip to Wheeling, but they chose to focus on other parts of his remarks there -- USA Today (3/23, 2.31M) concentrates on his comments about his proposed nuclear deal with India, and the Washington Post (3/23, A1, Constable, 744K) notes Bush's comments about the trial of a Christian man in Afghanistan as part of a larger story on that issue. Likewise, the local Wheeling News-Register (3/23, McCabe) highlights Bush's remarks about the coal industry.

Many media reports this morning focus more on the "strategy" behind Bush's defense of his Iraq policies than on his arguments in Wheeling. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Bash) reported, "If you're looking for headlines in today's event, you're not going to find any. And that is really the point. The point at this event and what we've been seeing over the past several days is for the President to just keep talking about Iraq, keep communicating in a way that many people, even the President's supporters, say he simply has not done." Fox News' Special Report (3/22, Cameron) run a similar report, noting Bush "took questions and held court for more than an hour. Aides believe that the more they hear the President the better. … Aides say they are quite pleased by the question and answer sessions. And they plan many more of them.'"

The AP (3/23, Loven) reports, "Whether he's before a friendly West Virginia audience, a Cleveland club proud of its interrogation skills or a White House news conference…Bush is drawing on his plainspoken manner in freewheeling venues to defend his Iraq strategy." Yesterday, "the president bantered with the locals, his shoulders bouncing up and down as they do when he's pleased with his own jokes. Then he brought down the house with his trademark I-won't-back-down pledge." The AP quotes Wayne Fields, "a specialist in presidential rhetoric at Washington University in St. Louis," saying about the President's push for his Iraq polices, "The problem is that clearly he's doing this because of the polls and that adds a level of desperation."

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Bush "spent another day trying to convince Americans that things are not as bad as they seem in Iraq." At the West Virginia event, Bush "heard this from the wife of a military journalist, who was just back from Iraq." Gayle Taylor, wife of military journalist: "It seems that our major media networks don't want to portray the good. They just want to focus…" Taylor's remarks were then drowned out by the cheers of the audience.

The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 7, 0:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported Bush "told an audience there that it is time for the Iraqi government to unify the country and for the Iraqi army to defend democracy." The New York Times (3/23, Bumiller, 1.19M) also focuses on that issue, in a story titled "Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly." Bush, notes the Times, "did not repeat his widely published remark from a news conference on Tuesday suggesting that American forces would be in Iraq at least until 2009. … White House officials said Mr. Bush's remark was not an open-ended comment. 'The question was, Will there be zero, when will there be zero -- or no American troops in Iraq,' Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One. Mr. Bush's response was that the decision would be made by 'future presidents and future governments of Iraq.'" NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 5, 0:30, Brown, 9.87M) reported Bush "said election year politics would have no impact on his decisions regarding how many US troops need to be in Iraq."

The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, McCloskey) reports Bush "said that while he has the duty of being commander-in-chief of US military forces, he also holds the responsibility of being 'educator-in-chief' and explaining to US citizens why he chose to send forces into Iraq." Said Bush, "'It doesn't matter whether you agree with my decision or not. … But all of us should agree with the fact that we have a remarkable country."

A number of print sources emphasize that the crowd was very supportive of Bush. The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, Townsend) reports, "Many people who attended President Bush's Wednesday appearance in Wheeling said they weren't sure what to expect from the speech and subsequent question-and-answer period, but several area residents said afterward that they were impressed with the chief executive's statements and responses." The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/23, O'Toole, 261K) says "West Virginians cheered as President Bush maintained that the war in Iraq and his assertive foreign policy were 'laying the foundation of peace for a generation to come.'" The Post-Gazette also calls Bush's arguments about Iraq "familiar but impassioned."

The Washington Times (3/23, Dinan, 90K) reports the audience "was favorable. A man with two sons in the military told the president, 'I thank God you're our commander in chief.'" That "drew a standing ovation from the crowd." The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Gerstenzang, 958K) calls the audience "overwhelmingly friendly," and says Bush "used colloquial, often blunt, language as he reduced his arguments for the war to their most basic. 'We're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins,' he vowed." The Times adds, "Unlike a similar speech and question-and-answer session two days earlier in Cleveland, where Bush faced polite but tough questions, he was bathed today in repeated rounds of applause. Audience members prefaced their questions with praise for his presidency." The President "responded by reaching out to the region's religious roots and saluting its contributions to the military."

The Wheeling Intelligencer (3/23, King) reports, "When the US president comes to a community for an official visit, local politicians show up to greet Air Force One — regardless of their political party." West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, a Democrat, "was among the first to shake…Bush's hand when he got off the plane Wednesday at the Ohio County Airport." Bush "acknowledged Manchin during his speech at the Capitol Music Hall. 'He's a good, decent man,' Bush said of Manchin."

Iraq Seen As Threatening Bush's Legacy. NBC last night also ran a story examining Iraq in the context of Bush's legacy. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 6, 2:20, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "George W. Bush has defined his Presidency by a war of his own choosing. His mission in the Middle East built on a doctrine of preemption has become the great gamble of his political capital." Critics "argue Mr. Bush had a vision with blinders. The war in Iraq was part of a larger struggle between good and evil, a war effort of biblical proportions says Kevin Phillips, the author of 'American Theocracy.'" But "three years later, reality in Iraq has cost the President even his most reliable support, as Mr. Bush's vision for democracy in that country now suffers from new fears of failure."

Reid Calls Bush "Dangerously Incompetent." The AP (3/23) reports, "Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called President Bush 'dangerously incompetent' on Wednesday and said the administration ought to be doing more to prevent increasing sectarian violence in Iraq. 'Where is (Secretary of State) Condoleezza Rice? Why isn't she over in the Middle East, as the chief diplomat of this country should be, trying to get the political forces to form a government over there?' Reid told The Associated Press." Reid "criticized Bush for a series of recent appearances in key political states in which the president defended his Iraq war policies. 'Why isn't he spending time with these leaders in the Middle East trying to get this government formed?' Reid said."

Cheney Rallies Soldiers, Families At Scott Air Force Base. The Collinsville Herald (3/22, Gerstenecker) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "is on a mission, and that assignment is to drum up support for America's war effort in Iraq. He did that Tuesday during an appearance at Scott Air Force Base." In remarks to an audience of 3,000 -- mostly military members and their family – Cheney "was articulate and wavered only slightly from his prepared, eight-page speech, which was interrupted 12 times by applause."

Bush Uncle Made $2.7 Million From Sale Of Military Contracting Firm. The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Roche, 958K) reports that as President Bush "embarks on a new effort to shore up public support for the war in Iraq, an uncle of the commander in chief is collecting $2.7 million in cash and stock from the recent sale of a company that profited from the war." An SEC filing "shows that William H.T. Bush collected just under $1.9 million in cash plus stock valued at more than $800,000 from the sale of Engineered Support Systems Inc. to DRS Technologies of New Jersey. The $1.7-billion deal closed Jan. 31. Both firms have extensive military contracts."

Insurgent Attack On Police Station Thwarted. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "The second, brazen attack in as many days on an Iraqi police station. 60 insurgents stormed the station. This time, the attack was thwarted by Iraqi and US forces." The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 6, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "In Iraq today, about 50 insurgents were captured after they attacked a police station. They struck a post southeast of Baghdad, killing four officers," but "the US and Iraqi troops and police reinforcements did move in and overwhelmed the attackers." The New York Times (3/23, Wong, 1.19M) also reports the story under the headline "Insurgents Shower Iraq Police Center With Mortar Shells," while USA Today/AP (3/23) and the Los Angeles Times (3/23, Boudreaux, 958K), among other sources, also run stories on the attack.

Shiite Pilgrims Killed. The Washington Post (3/23, A17, Anderson, 744K) mentions the police station incident in a story about "at least five Shiite Muslim pilgrims" who "were killed in Baghdad on Wednesday." Gunmen "fired on the pilgrims' vehicles as they were headed home from celebrating a major religious holiday. Their deaths were the latest in a four-week stretch of sectarian violence involving Shiite and Sunni Arabs."

Journalists Said To Face "Increasing" Threats To Safety As Well As Criticism. USA Today (3/23, Memmott, 2.31M) reports, "As they begin a fourth year covering the war in Iraq, journalists there face increasing threats to their safety and increasing criticism of their work." It "started as arguably the best-covered war in history: Hundreds of reporters traveled with the military as it invaded Iraq, and then hundreds more moved freely around the country as troops secured Baghdad. Today, it has become for some journalists the least-covered war. … To get to the news, they generally must either "embed" with U.S. or Iraqi forces, work the phones from their hotels or houses, send Iraqi staff to events or make carefully planned reporting trips protected by hired guards." Meanwhile, "high-profile critics are stepping up their complaints about the media's work." USA Today goes on to cite criticism from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and President Bush.

The Administration's claim that media coverage of negative developments in Iraq has drowned out progress made led ABC News to devote broadcast time or print to self-examination. ABC ran two segments examining its Iraq coverage, highlighting positive news stories it has reported and pointing out the dangers to journalists in the country. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 3, 2:05, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "That the violence makes it increasingly difficult for reporters to travel the country in safety to get out and see as much as they'd like. 86 journalists have been killed since the US was invaded by Iraq. Earlier this year, our colleagues Bob Woodruff and Doug Vogt were badly injured in an attack on their convoy. They had been reporting on the capability of the new Iraqi security forces. But it's also true that we cover all kinds of stories in Iraq. The last story Bob filed before that attack was about a Baghdad ice cream parlor, a business that was flourishing in a very rough neighborhood." The news is "sometimes good. It is sometimes bad. It is almost always complicated."

ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 4, 2:10, Tapper, 8.78M) reported on the development of Iraqi television comedies, noting "the lack of security in present-day Iraq means comedy can still quickly be overtaken by tragedy. While are cameras were rolling, the producer received terrible news. That's him grabbing the show's director and telling him that their boss, Amjad Hameed, just minutes before, had been assassinated." Within "moments, what had been a set full of fun and laughter was quickly replaced by fear."

Former CPA Officials Suggest "Switch" In Roles Between Jaafari, Talabani. Dan Senor and Roman Martinez, former advisers to the Bush administration who served in Iraq from April 2003 through June 2004, write in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) that "there is…a creative solution to the impasse" over the new Iraqi government: "Instead of sticking with Mr. Jaafari, the UIA and the other leading parties should consider a compromise that marks a clear break from the status quo. Mr. Jaafari could agree to become Iraq's new president, and Jalal Talabani, the current president and a Kurd, could become prime minister -- a switch." They add, "Such a deal would install an Iraqi leader genuinely capable of getting along with all ethnic and sectarian factions, allow Mr. Jaafari to save face by not losing out to a fellow Shiite, and show Sunni Arab politicians that their participation in last December's vote is paying political dividends."

Novak Says Corruption, Not Insurgency, Behind Iraq "Oil Crisis." Syndicated columnist Robert Novak writes in the Chicago Sun Times (3/23), "While the formal line in Washington and Baghdad blames insurgents for the oil crisis, US officials who are close to the situation gave me a totally different explanation. They blame corruption at every level, from the oil ministry on down, that is common to Iraq. … Everybody with any familiarity with this situation believes the only answer is that the new Iraqi government, still unformed three months after the election, must gain control over corruption."

Saddam's Foreign Minister Was Passing Information To CIA. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Blitzer) reported that "a key member of Saddam Hussein's regime was actually a secret source for information that was eventually passed on to the CIA. That man is Naji Sabri. He was Iraq's foreign minister at the time of the U.S.-led invasion. Sources tell CNN he supplied information to French intelligence that was then passed on to the United States before the U.S. invasion in 2003. The same sources say Sabri was actually paid about $100,000." The Washington Post (3/23, A17, Pincus, 744K) runs a similar report under the headline "Ex-Iraqi Official Unveiled As Spy." The Post says that "publicly Sabri was insisting that Iraq had no prohibited weapons of mass destruction. Privately, the sources said, he provided information that the Iraqi dictator had ambitions for a nuclear program but that it was not active, and that no biological weapons were being produced or stockpiled, although research was underway."

Army Dog Handler Gets Six-Month Sentence For Prisoner Abuse. The Washington Post (3/23, A15, White, 744K) reports, "Military jurors sentenced an Army dog handler to less than six months behind bars yesterday for using his Belgian shepherd to intimidate detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, one of the lightest sentences so far for a soldier implicated in the notorious abuse." Sgt. Michael J. Smith "was ordered to serve 179 days in confinement and to forfeit $2,250 in pay for convictions on five criminal counts, including maltreatment of detainees, dereliction of duty and an indecent act. Smith will also be reduced to the rank of private, E-1, and will receive a bad-conduct discharge at the end of his prison term, according to an Army spokeswoman at Fort Meade, where the court-martial ended yesterday." The jury "could have sent Smith to prison for as long as 8 1/2 years."

The New York Times (3/23, Schmitt, 1.19M) reports, "With the conviction on Tuesday of an Army dog handler, the military has now tried and found guilty another low-ranking soldier in connection with the pattern of abuses that first surfaced two years ago at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq." But "once again, an attempt by defense lawyers to point a finger of responsibility at higher-ranking officers failed in the latest case to convince a military jury that ultimate responsibility for the abuses lay farther up the chain of command." The Washington Times/AP (3/23, Dishneau) also reports the story.

In an editorial titled "The Joy Of Being Blameless," the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "About the only high-ranking officer whose career has suffered over Abu Ghraib is Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, who was the commander in Iraq at the time. General Sanchez should certainly take responsibility, but he was also a victim of administration blunders." Sanchez "was vaulted inappropriately from head of the First Armored Division to overall commander because Mr. Bush declared 'mission accomplished': the war's over. He was then denied the staff, soldiers and equipment he needed to deal with the insurgency that quickly broke out and produced thousands of prisoners." Bush "has refused to hold himself or any of his top political appointees accountable for those catastrophic errors. Indeed, he has promoted many of them. And this is not an isolated problem. It's just one example, among many, of how this president's men run no risk of being blamed for anything that happens, not matter how egregious."

Service To Country Reported As Top Reason For Iraq Volunteer Service. The Washington Post (3/23, A21, 744K) excerpts an article by Shawn Dorman, titled "Iraq Service and Beyond," from the March issue of the Foreign Service Journal. Asked "what motivated you to volunteer for Iraq service," the "most frequently stated response was, in various iterations, 'to serve my country.' Many spoke of a desire to serve where they are most needed. Some respondents mentioned an additional hope that Iraq service would be career-enhancing, while others pointed to the financial incentives."

Herbert Notes Study Estimating War's Cost At "Possibly More Than $2 Trillion." Columnist Bob Herbert writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M), "Bush's war in Iraq was never supposed to be particularly expensive. Administration types tossed out numbers like $50 billion and $60 billion. When Lawrence Lindsey, the president's chief economic adviser, said the war was likely to cost $100 billion to $200 billion, he was fired. Some in the White House tried to spread the fantasy that Iraqi oil revenues would pay for the war. … The president and his hot-for-war associates were as wrong about the money as they were about the weapons of mass destruction." He adds, "Now comes a study by Joseph Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize-winning economist at Columbia University, and a colleague, Linda Bilmes of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, that estimates the 'true costs' of the war at more than $1 trillion, and possibly more than $2 trillion." Bilmes "said that the $1 trillion we're spending on Iraq amounts to about $10,000 for every household in the US."

Bush, Rice Criticize Trial Of Afghan Christian Convert. The AP (3/22, Schweid) reports President Bush "called on Afghanistan on Wednesday to respect the religious freedom of an Afghan citizen on trial for his life for converting from Islam to Christianity." Assistant Secretary McCormack said Secretary Rice told Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, in a previously scheduled meeting, that "she was deeply troubled by the case and called the prosecution 'contrary to universal democratic values.'" Bush and Rice's remarks "toughened the U.S. stance in a controversy that has spread beyond Southeast Asia, evoking statements of concern, for instance, in Germany and Italy." The AP notes the US has been careful not to call publicly for an end to the trial or the prisoner's release.

The Washington Times (3/23, Dinan, 90K) also quotes Bush saying yesterday "he was 'deeply' troubled by the trial in Afghanistan." The US State Department "on Tuesday was more tepid, calling the case a matter for Afghan authorities. Yesterday, Mr. Bush took a much firmer stance. 'We have got influence in Afghanistan, and we are going to use it to remind them that there are universal values,' he said."

On its website, Time (3/23, Karon) reports, "When a Christian believer in a nation wholly dependent on US support faces trial and possibly execution simply for embracing the same faith as the President of the United States, you'd think that country would be read the riot act. Instead, Washington's response to the trial in Afghanistan of Abdul Rahman has been rather muted."

The Washington Post (3/23, A1, Constable, 744K) runs a 1,500-word front-page story calling the case "a clash of values" and reporting that it "has unleashed a blizzard of condemnation from the West this week and exposed a conflict in values between Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country, and the foreign countries that have helped defend and rebuild it in the four years since the fall of the Taliban."

The New York Times (3/23, Goodstein, 1.19M) runs a story titled "Allies Troubled By Afghan Threat To Christian Convert From Islam," reporting, "Officials from Germany, Italy and Canada, which all have troops serving in Afghanistan, have voiced their concerns to Mr. Karzai's government." The Italian foreign minister and deputy prime minister, Gianfranco Fini, "said Tuesday that he had received assurance that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, but he did not elaborate." The Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington, "called for Mr. Rahman's release, saying that the Koran supported religious freedom and that Islam was never compulsory."

In an editorial titled "Outrage In Afghanistan," the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "What's the point of the United States' propping up the government of Afghanistan if it's not even going to pretend to respect basic human rights? President Bush himself said it was 'deeply troubling' that an Afghan man is facing the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity. In fact, the case is more than deeply troubling; it's barbaric, and we were glad that Mr. Bush promised yesterday to press for religious freedom in Afghanistan." The Times adds, "And maybe Afghanistan should also return to stoning women to death for adultery? The United States, Britain and every other country helping the Afghan government should take a hard look at its legal institutions."

Afghan Foreign Minister Sacked. The AP (3/22, Shah) reported Abdullah Abdullah, "the man who has held Afghanistan's foreign minister post since the fall of the Taliban regime four years ago will be replaced in a Cabinet reshuffle." The new Cabinet will include 26 instead of 27 ministers, eighteen of whom are continuing in government. The AP said Abdullah "has had close ties with Washington" and will be replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, a presidential adviser on foreign affairs. "The move had been long anticipated because of an apparent falling out between Abdullah and Karzai over how the ministry was directing foreign affairs."

Yale Criticized For Admitting Former Taliban Official. In a Wall Street Journal column (3/23), John Fund says Yale University has "for three weeks…refused to make any comment or defense beyond a vague 144-word statement about its decision to admit Sayed Rahmatullah Hashemi -- a former ambassador-at-large of the murderous Afghan Taliban -- as a special student." Yale professor David Gelernter said, "The intelligentsia haven't told Yalies what to think yet, because even they haven't made up their minds." Gelernter "clearly has: He calls the Taliban 'an evil and macabre terrorist group. . . . The fact that Hashemi didn't do actual killing does not absolve him. Goebbels didn't shoot anyone either.'"

US Seeking To Build Anti-Terrorist Forces In Saharan Africa. ABC last night examined the US military's effort to build a terrorist-fighting capacity among the African nations bordering or encompassed by the Sahara Desert, which is feared to have the potential to become a terrorist haven. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 6, 2:30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported, "US officials worry the poorly-policed, mostly-Muslim region, could become the next Afghanistan, a place where terrorists can take root. So, working with nine African countries, the US has launched an ambitious counterterrorism program there." ABC (Karl) added, "Throughout the Sahara Desert, America's elite Special Forces are at work. Training alongside Algerian commandos. Working with paratroopers in Niger, the poorest Muslim country in the world. And flying with the Mali army in skies not far from Timbuktu. The Pentagon plans to spend $500 million over the next five years dispatching Special Forces units throughout the Sahara, training North African armies to combat terrorists." Terrorists "from this region have been found in the ranks of foreign fighters in Iraq and Afghanistan. But the soldiers we met here said they don't think there's much of a threat out here in the desert."

DOJ:

Kim Named Solicitor General For DC. The AP (3/23) reports, "Todd Kim has been appointed Solicitor General for the District of Columbia. … Mayor Anthony Williams announced Wednesdday that Kim will come over from the Justice Department on April third." The AP continues, "The solicitor general's office represents the District government in all appellate level court cases. Establishing the office is really a renaming of a branch of the D.C. Attorney General's office. … The measure is part of the mayor's continuing effort to reshape the District government to resemble state governments. The Office of Corporation Counsel was renamed the attorney general's office for the same reason in 2004."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron Treasurer Ties Lay, Skilling To Fraud Allegations. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, McWilliams, Davis) reports, "A high-ranking former Enron Corp. executive tied the company's former top executives, Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, to activities at the heart of the government's conspiracy and fraud allegations -- approving the improper use of reserves, misleading investors and hiding losses." The Journal continues, "Describing his meetings with Messrs. Lay and Skilling, former company treasurer Ben Glisan Jr.3 alleged that the defendants authorized the use of accounting reserves to pad earnings and investment vehicles to hide losses. They also ignored calls to write down billions of dollars of soured investments, he alleged. … When Mr. Skilling was reviewing a plan in a 2000 board meeting to use Enron stock to hedge investments, he replied that he wouldn't recommend the plan 'except that it allowed him to circumvent accounting rules,' alleged Mr. Glisan. Mr. Lay's reaction to the idea was 'to giggle...in delight,' he added."

The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "During a break in Glisan's testimony Wednesday afternoon, a visibly annoyed Lay told reporters, 'I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life.' Lay's wife, Linda, nodded her head and added, 'Unbelievable.'" The AP continues, "Glisan testified that Lay assigned him to feel out credit-rating agencies about how large some required accounting writedowns could be without jeopardizing Enron's rating. … 'That's backwards,' Glisan told jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Lay and Skilling. 'What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequences.' … Glisan said Lay and Skilling knew Enron, then a reputed powerhouse, was actually weak and faced multibillion-dollar losses and writedowns on poorly performing or overvalued assets."

The Houston Chronicle (3/23, FLOOD) reports that Glisan was the "last big gun the government is expected to call before it rests, possibly next week," and that his testimony "went to the heart of key defenses — that Lay and… Skilling didn't know about wrongdoing or massive financial problems at Enron and that the company fell because of a 'run on the bank' started by revelations of former CFO Andrew Fastow's secret thieving." The Chronicle adds, "An articulate and even-keeled Glisan testified that both Skilling and Lay knew a great deal about deep-seated financial woes at the company, signed off on improper deals and repeatedly misrepresented Enron's finances to the public. The defendants have said the company was in good shape and they didn't know about problems."

The New York Times (3/23, Barrionuevo) reports that Glisan "delivered stinging testimony on Wednesday that contradicted Mr. Lay's claims that he had been unaware of the company's crumbling financial picture and had not known about some of the illicit side deals involving top managers. … In a full day of questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay had lied to credit-rating agencies, employees and Wall Street analysts about the company's performance and need for more urgent action, even as he participated in internal discussions with managers about what to do about Enron's 'dire' financial situation. … Mr. Glisan offered the strongest testimony yet that there was a criminal conspiracy at Enron involving" Lay, Skilling and other top Enron managers "to manipulate earnings and mislead investors about mounting problems. … Mr. Glisan's appearance was considered critical because, like Mr. Fastow, his former boss, who testified earlier in the trial, Mr. Glisan was in the inner circle of top decision makers at Enron. … Mr. Glisan was also deeply involved in trying to rein in the mounting credit and liquidity crisis that enveloped the company in the four months before it collapsed into bankruptcy. . But unlike Mr. Fastow or any other major witness who has testified, Mr. Glisan could end up being the crucial witness in the trial. That is because Mr. Glisan, the only major Enron figure who has already been sentenced, is under no obligation to testify. He is unlikely to receive any consideration, like a shorter sentence, from the government in return for his testimony. He is on furlough from a minimum-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., while testifying."

Bloomberg (3/23, Calkins) reports, "Defense lawyers say prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and that the two executives were victims of unscrupulous subordinates, such as Glisan's former boss, ex-Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow. … Glisan is in the middle of serving a five-year sentence for securities fraud in a federal prison east of Houston. He's testifying for a second day on furlough under an immunity agreement with prosecutors. He admitted falsifying Enron's reported financial results to make the company look more successful than it was."

Former Enron Task Force Head Drops In On Trial. The AP (3/23, Hays) reports, "The man who brought the indictment against former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling visited his fraud and conspiracy trial Wednesday with a slew of law students in tow." The AP continues, "Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches a course in corporate crime at the University of Texas School of Law, brought his students to sit in on the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals. … 'I feel like this is a distant memory in my life,' Buell said, 'but it continues on. It gives you a sense of how epic these cases are. They just go on for years.'" The AP adds, "Buell was assigned to the task force at its inception in January 2002 and joined the university as a visiting professor after he stepped down in March 2004. He secured the government's indictment against Skilling a month before. … Skilling's co-defendant, Enron founder Kenneth Lay, was indicted in July 2004."

SEC Formalizes Accounting Probe Of Mills Corp. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Chittum) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a formal investigation of Mills Corp. after more than two months of informal inquiry into accounting problems at the shopping-mall real-estate investment trust." The Journal continues, "The investigation, disclosed by the company in a filing late yesterday, turns up the heat on Mills management and may further pressure the company's stock, which is off about 54% from its high in August." The Journal adds, "The Arlington, Va., REIT has made numerous missteps in the past 13 months. In that time, it has restated earnings twice, delayed three earnings reports, written off 10 projects and fired almost 10% of its work force. … Mills shares have plunged by about 21% since last Thursday on analyst downgrades and the disclosure that the company has uncovered five new areas of accounting problems, including ones that could have led to overstated earnings and revenue. The company is now reviewing about a dozen aspects of its books. … The Massachusetts attorney general and treasurer filed a motion Tuesday to become lead plaintiff in a class-action shareholder lawsuit against Mills, saying the state's pension fund has lost $5 million because of what it alleges was fraudulent activity by the company."

NEC Says Unit Employee Faked Deals, Inflated Revenue. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Kachi) reports, "NEC Corp. said an internal investigation has found that an employee at its NEC Engineering Ltd. unit fabricated business deals for years, inflating sales figures by 36.3 billion yen, or about $309.5 million, from the fiscal year ended March 2002." The Journal continues, "The maker of computers and network equipment said that the 50-year-old employee at unlisted NEC Engineering conducted multiple fraudulent transactions in which he created fake deals between NEC Engineering and its suppliers and customers starting in March 2002. The management-level employee created phony documents to enable the transactions, NEC said." The Journal adds, "The company discovered the fraud in December. It said it would file a criminal complaint against the employee, who allegedly embezzled money from the transactions. … The news comes at a time when NEC is suffering from a falloff in profit as its chip and mobile-phone operations struggle amid increased competition. It posted group net profit of 20.78 billion yen for the quarter ended Dec. 31, down 47% from a year earlier."

Former Refco Director Seeks Payment Of Legal Fees. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Rebello) reports, "Thomas H. Lee, who helped orchestrate Refco Inc.'s initial public offering of stock, says creditors of the commodity brokerage firm, now under bankruptcy protection, are 'improperly' trying to bar him from tapping Refco's insurance policies to pay his legal costs." The Journal continues, "Mr. Lee, who recently left the prominent private-equity firm named after him, Thomas H. Lee Partners, is petitioning the bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy to get insurance payments to cover the legal costs of 14 lawsuits related to Refco's collapse. … Mr. Lee was a Refco director, as were other employees at Thomas H. Lee, which helped bring Refco public. He and other directors, including those who didn't work for the private-equity firm, are fighting the lawsuits, which center on claims that they should have known about the problems that led to Refco's implosion." The Journal adds, "Mr. Lee said Refco directors submitted claims to the brokerage's insurer, U.S. Specialty Insurance Co., which sought court permission to pay those costs. Refco's creditors committee objected."

Banks, Brokerage Firms Cracking Down On Strip Club Meetings. USA Today (3/23, O'Donnell) reports, "Some women on Wall Street want to know how it can be fair — or legal — for their managers and male colleagues to exclude them when they fraternize at strip clubs, often with the women's clients. Strip club clientele is hardly limited to Wall Street. Adult entertainment is enjoyed by men — and some women — in most every industry in the USA, and it's a tax-deductible business expense allowed by the IRS." USA continues, "Investment banks and brokerage firms are taking the lead in cracking down on the practice. The National Association of Securities Dealers and the New York Stock Exchange both recently proposed rules that would force firms to adopt business entertainment policies that cap amounts and specify appropriate venues. The move is expected to rule out company-paid or work-related strip club jaunts at the more than 5,000 brokerage firms in the USA. … The stock exchange and the NASD acted in large part because of lawsuits brought by female employees. The women who have sued say strip clubs are emblematic of a larger problem on Wall Street: a macho culture that leaves them behind in all areas."

Freddie Mac To Replace CFO. Freddie Mac has announced that it will replace its chief financial officer Martin Baumann. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Hagerty, 2.11M) reports, "The move follows two embarrassing snags that have delayed the U.S. mortgage-finance company's effort to return to regular, timely reporting of results in the wake of a 2003 accounting scandal. In light of those snags, Mr. Baumann said in an interview, he and the company's top officers -- Chief Executive Richard Syron and Chief Operating Officer Eugene McQuade -- agreed that Freddie needed a finance chief with more expertise in upgrading the computer systems used to generate financial results."

CRIMINAL LAW:

CIA Says It Can't Comply With Libby Request For Documents. Fox News' Special Report (3/22, Hume) reported, "The CIA says it cannot comply with a court order to provide former Cheney chief of staff Scooter Libby with documents he says he needs for his defense in his upcoming perjury case because, says the CIA, doing so would jeopardize national security. On March 10, a judge ordered the CIA to produce partially censored copies of the President's Daily Intelligence Briefings which Libby says shows he was preoccupied with many other policy matters at the time he may have disclosed the identity of Valerie Plame. But the CIA says devoting resources to completing the task by the court imposed deadline would quote would detract from the ability to provide the most our senior leaders of our government with critical intelligence information. If the agency refuses to comply, the case could be dismissed."

Administration Won't Exercise Executive Privilege On PDBs. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that the Bush Administration isn't planning to cite executive privilege for the Presidential Daily Briefings sought by former vice presidential aide I. Lewis Libby. Federal prosecutors "said in a court filing that since the judge has limited the production of the daily intelligence briefings to redacted documents and topic overviews that would be viewed only by Libby and four of his attorneys in a sealed room, 'there is a reasonable prospect that the government could avoid a blanket assertion of privilege and instead be able to comply with the court's order.'"

Judge Says Ryan Jurors Having Difficulty Reaching Verdict. In a story distributed by Knight Ridder, The Chicago Tribune (3/23, O'Connor, Bush, 643K) reports, "The federal jury in former Illinois Gov. George Ryan's trial has hit a stumbling block in its deliberations, the judge disclosed on its seventh day of deliberations Wednesday. After holding two lengthy closed-door sessions with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said she planned to instruct jurors Thursday morning to continue on with their discussions." Pallmeyer told reporters "she had received two notes in the last two days from jurors 'that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict, or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations.'" The Chicago Sun-Times (3/23, Korecki) notes, "Pallmeyer on Wednesday twice met privately with lawyers in the case to discuss the matters. The second meeting stretched to 1-1/2 hours."

Prosecutors Play Incriminating FBI Wiretaps At Nevada Bribery Trial. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (3/22, Allen) reports, "Prosecutors played more FBI wiretaps Wednesday in the G-Sting political corruption case," which alleges former commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey took bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi through his lobbyist, Lance Malone. "For Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, some of those wiretaps may spell trouble. But Dario Herrera's defense team says they liked what they heard. In a July 2001 FBI wiretap, Galardi tells Malone "to give Mary Kincaid-Chauncey a message: 'Tell her I'm going to get her another five whenever she wants it.'"

Witness' Former Lawyer Corroborates Testimony Linking "Mafia Cops" To Mob. Newsday (3/23, DeStephano) reports, "The testimony of Burton Kaplan, a key government witness in the 'Mafia Cops' trial, was buttressed Wednesday by his former defense attorney, who said Kaplan admitted being the intermediary between the mob" and former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa. Attorney Judd Burstein "said that he was first told by his client about Kaplan's alleged dealings with the former cops when it was known that former acting Luchese boss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso became a government witness. … 'He said "this was a big problem for me; I was the go-between Casso and the cops on this killing and other matters,"' Burstein remembered Kaplan saying." The New York Times (3/23, Feuer, 1.19M) adds the trial "turned yesterday to what may have been its weirdest witness yet, or at least most professionally complicated" with testimony from Burstein, who "bolstered the witness's account that he once served as the liaison between the detectives…and their patron in the mob." Under the headline "Att'y Burns 'Mafia Cops'," The New York Daily News (3/23, Marzulli, 729K) notes, "Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler suggested Burstein came forward because he had read media reports last summer that the judge might toss the case on a legal technicality. Another government witness, Steven Corso, testified yesterday how Eppolito was so desperate to raise cash for his screenplay business he was willing to launder drug money and involve his son Anthony in a drug deal."

The New York Post (3/23, Haberman, 624K) reports Burstein testified that when Kaplan "picked up a copy of The Post on March 25, 1994, he got some exclusive news -- and instantly knew it was time to disappear. The drug-dealing mob associate was shaken after reading an exclusive report by Murray Weiss, which revealed that…Casso had hired two NYPD mob cops as hit men. Kaplan immediately told his lawyer about the report and feared he had to flee to China." The New York Sun (3/23, Capeci) also reports on Kaplan's and Burstein's testimony in its "Gang Land" column, under the headline "Devastating Testimony May Bury 'Mafia Cops'."

Prison Minister Backs Gotti Claim To Have Left Mob Life. The New York Post (3/22, Mangan, Smith, 624K) reported "corrections officer-turned-minister" Bobby Hargraves "is backing John 'Junior' Gotti's claim that he quit the Mafia in the late 1990s, saying Gotti repeatedly told him in jail – 'I'm not involved in that life, that life has been nothing but trouble for me.' .. Hargraves 'vividly' remembers up to five conversations with Gotti in which 'he said, "I'm no longer a part of that life anymore."' Gotti also avoided fellow Gambino crime family defendants in jail before pleading guilty in that case in 1999, and told Hargraves he was interested in moving his family to Canada, the ex-officer said."

Five Californians Arrested In Alleged $20 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme. The Los Angeles Times (3/22, Hong, 958K) reported, "Five Southern Californians were arrested Tuesday and charged with defrauding Medicare out of $20 million by recruiting patients for unnecessary medical treatment and then billing the agency for the services. An Altadena couple, two of their relatives and an associate are accused of 'beneficiary sharing' or 'patient rotating,' in which 'marketers' obtain data about Medicare beneficiaries and sell the information to clinics or diagnostic testing centers that then prepare fraudulent billings." The Pasadena Star News (3/22, Allen) added, "The FBI names Konstantin Grigoryan as leader of the group, which is said to have began its elaborate scheme in 1997. … The defendants further concealed their fraud by laundering their money 'into a maze of bank accounts of "management" and "consulting" companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account,' the affidavit said."

The AP (3/22) noted, "Grigoryan, his wife Mayya and their son-in-law Eduard Gershelis were charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, money laundering and making false statements. Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law Aleksandr Treynker and a fifth defendant, Haroutyun Gulderyan, also face similar charges."

Federal Officials To Announce Louisiana Health Care Fraud Indictment Today. The Lafayette Daily Advertiser (3/23, Gagnet) reports, "Federal authorities have scheduled a news conference Thursday in Lafayette to announce a 95-count indictment alleging health care fraud." In addition to US Attorney Donald Washington, "representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services also will be present."

Former NFL Kicker Indicted For Insurance Fraud. The San Jose Mercury News (3/23, Foo) reports, "Ray Wersching, the retired San Francisco 49ers kicker who booted field goals in two Super Bowl victories, was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of embezzling $8 million from an insurance company and tax evasion." The News continues, "Wersching, 55, the owner of Ray Wersching Insurance Agency in Redwood City, is accused of diverting premiums earmarked for Farmers Insurance from 1997 to 2000. He is also alleged to have evaded paying taxes on $3.6 million in corporate income from 1999 to 2000." The News adds, "Wersching has been served with a summons to appear Monday in U.S. District Court in San Francisco before Magistrate Judge Bernard Zimmerman, said U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay. … 'This action,' Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said in a statement, 'makes it clear that in California, no one -- whether an average citizen or a former football star -- will escape prosecution if they are suspected of insurance fraud.'" The News notes, "Wersching, an ex-University of California football star, faces five allegations -- embezzlement; permitting a felon convicted of dishonesty to participate in an insurance business; failing to file a corporate tax return; and two counts of tax evasion."

Supreme Court Rules Warrant Needed When Household Divided On Search. The Supreme Court yesterday ruled on a perplexing 4th Amendment issue, whether police need a search warrant when one member of a household extends an invitation to them to enter a property but another household member refuses. The court ruled, 5-3, with Justice Samuel Alito not participating, that police must have consent from both parties to search without a warrant. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 7, 2:00, P. Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The legal drama from Americus, Georgia sounds like an episode of 'Law and Order'. A couple that once lived in this house was in a rocky marriage. She called police and said her husband, Scott Randolph, used drugs. The police asked to come in. She said fine, he said no way. But the police went in anyhow, found evidence of cocaine and arrested him. Today, by a vote of five to three, the Supreme Court said the police had no right to enter. The decision said the normal rule allowing police without a warrant to conduct a search if they're invited in does not apply when another person at the door objects." Today's ruling "applies to homes, apartments, even college dorm rooms, but the person objecting must be at the door."

USA Today (3/23, Biskupic, 2.31M) reports the decision "drew a sharp dissent from Chief Justice John Roberts. He said the majority, led by the high court's more liberal justices, misapplied the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and set a rule based on 'random' circumstances." The ruling, written by Justice David Souter, "says that if police search a home after being invited in by one resident over the protest of another, the evidence that is seized cannot be used in court. The decision emphasized respect for privacy in the home." The New York Times (3/23, Greenhouse, 1.19M) says the case "drew back the curtain to reveal the strains behind the surface placidity and collegiality of the young Roberts court." The case "provoked…Roberts…to write his first dissenting opinion." The Times also reports that there was a "pointed, personal and acerbic tone" when "the justices expressed their disagreement over whether the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches was violated" in the case. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Bravin, 2.11M), Knight Ridder (3/23, Henderson), Washington Times (3/23, Taylor, 90K) the Washington Post (3/23, A1, Lane, 744K) and the Fulton County Daily Report (3/23, Palmer) also report on the ruling.

Maryland Prosecutor Seeks Death Penalty In Guard's Killing. The Baltimore Sun (3/23, Garland) reports, "Washington County's top prosecutor said Wednesday that he will seek the death penalty for a prison inmate who is accused of killing a correctional officer at a Hagerstown hospital." The Sun continues, "State's Attorney Charles P. Strong Jr. filed notice in Circuit Court that he will seek to have the inmate, Brandon Morris, put to death for the killing of Jeffery A. Wroten. … The death penalty applies because Morris, 20, 'committed the murder in furtherance of an escape' and because of other aggravating circumstances, the prosecutor wrote." The Sun adds, "Strong said he spoke with Wroten's family before making the decision because he wanted to make sure they understood that death penalty cases are often long, involved and intense. … Morris, of Baltimore, is accused of shooting Wroten in the face at Washington County Hospital on Jan. 26 as the officer lay on the floor, pleading for his life. The 44-year-old Wroten, who worked at Roxbury Correctional Institution, died the next day."

Treasury Department To Auction Items Received By Cunningham. The Treasury Department today will auction off items received by former Rep. Duke Cunningham as part of his bribery scheme. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Solomon, Sanders, 2.11M) reports, "Auction officials won't disclose what they expect Mr. Cunningham's items to fetch."

The Washington Post (3/23, C1, Booth, 744K) reports, "The Cunningham Collection includes a dozen Oriental or Persian carpets (some machine-made), a few knickknacks and the furniture, which includes armoires and nightstands as well as" a "lingerie cabinet (like a wardrobe, with drawers inside) and the French commode (commode not being a toilet or chamber pot, but a style of chest of drawers that sits on low legs)."

Montgomery County Police Union's Web Site Draws Heated Comments. The Washington Post (3/23, A1, Londoño) reports, "What's up with the cop in Silver Spring who's ratting out colleagues? That was the question raised by a police officer who started a thread on the online message board of the Montgomery County police union on July 15, 2004." The Post continues, "Within minutes, a flurry of responses began pouring in to the site, one of many online forums that have changed the way police gripe and gossip. … They called the African American officer in question a 'rat,' a racist and a lazy cop who needed to 'be put in her place.' Then her husband -- the department's former diversity training teacher, who was brought in after the agency came under scrutiny over allegations of racial profiling -- was dragged into the online onslaught." The Post adds, "The message board was designed as a forum where officers could trade tips, complaints and light banter. But several officers say it has become an outlet for personal attacks -- often laced with racist language, sexual harassment and disparaging remarks about police supervisors, county leaders, immigrants and residents. … Copies of the messages from the password-protected Web site provided to The Post provide a rare glimpse of some officers talking among themselves. The authenticity of the messages, posted from 2004 to this year, was verified by officers with access to the site."

Prosecutors Try To Reinstate Some Charges Against DeLay. CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Blitzer) reported, "In Texas, prosecutors are trying to bring back some of the charges against Congressman Tom DeLay that were dismissed last fall. They're asking an appeals court to restore one conspiracy charge against DeLay and part of another. DeLay still faces one money laundering charge in the campaign finance-related indictment against him. A ruling on the appeal isn't expected for at least another month. DeLay denies any wrongdoing." USA Today (3/23, Drinkard, 2.31M) reports DeLay's lawyer "had one primary wish Wednesday when he went before a Texas appeals court deliberating whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against his client: Whatever you decide, do it soon." The Washington Post (3/23, A4, Moreno, 744K) also reports on the hearing.

The AP (3/23, Castro) reports DeLay "spent the day campaigning in what many consider his most serious election challenge since voters sent him to Congress in 1984. The Republican faces Democratic former Rep. Nick Lampson in November." The Washington Times (3/23, Aynesworth, 90K) runs a similar story under the headline "DeLay Campaigns As Lawyers Battle."

Baltimore City Council President Decries Probe. The Baltimore Sun (3/23, Donovan) reports, "Baltimore City Council President Sheila Dixon broke her silence Wednesday over an investigation into her ties to two city contractors by saying the state probe is 'trying to destroy my character.'" An initial round of subpoenas from Maryland State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh "requested documents related to $600,000 of work awarded over the past six years -- most of the time without a contract -- to Dixon's former campaign chairman, Dale G. Clark, and his company, Ultimate Network Integration. A second batch of subpoenas…requested documents relating to Union Technologies, a company that employs the council president's sister, Janice Dixon, and has received city work from two major government contractors; Comcast, the city's cable television provider; and TeleCommunications Systems Inc., which manages the city's computer network." The probe began after The Sun reported last week "that Dixon might have breached the city's ethics law by not disclosing her sister's employment and by participating in public hearings and votes over the past two years that involved and benefited Utech."

Los Angeles Uses Injunctions To Curb Gangs. The Los Angeles Times (3/23, McGreevy, Banks) reports, "After more than a decade of successfully using restrictive court injunctions to battle dangerous street gangs, some Los Angeles officials now fear that key provisions have unfairly held back young people struggling to go straight." The Times continues, "Police Chief William J. Bratton said Wednesday that though he wants to expand the use of a tool that has proved effective in the city's fight against an estimated 39,000 hoodlums, he and City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo have agreed to first conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the injunction program. … 'We want to take a look at all of them, do a top-to-bottom review that will include making sure the appropriate people are [listed] in them, because some of these injunctions go back 13 years,' Bratton said." The Times adds, "City Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents a district plagued by some of the worst gang violence in the city, said the injunction program appears to be doing harm as well as good. … Hahn said that after she and Bratton attended a recent community meeting in Watts, she became concerned because no one has ever succeeded in getting removed from an injunction's official list of restricted gang members. … Young people covered by injunctions can have trouble getting jobs because the injunctions show up in employment background checks. Some have trouble getting to work or even school because they cannot ride in cars or buses if other gang members are present. … And they may be disqualified from participating in school sports if former associates play in the same league. … Critics say the injunctions sometimes target people who were never in a gang but had relatives or friends who were."

WPost Opposes Prosecution Of AIPAC Officials. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/23, A22, 744K) says the conviction of former AIPAC officials Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman, who are accused of conspiring to give national defense information to officials of the Israeli government, "would herald a dangerous aggrandizement of the government's power not merely to prosecute leaks but to force ordinary Americans to keep its secrets." The Post notes that "prosecutors have not accused either man of spying. Rather, the government has charged them under an old and vaguely worded law that prohibits people in possession of such information from disclosing it further." Prosecutors "have proceeded under a legal theory that must alarm anyone who values open debate."

Court Approves Equity Panel In Delphi Bankruptcy Case. Dow Jones (3/23) reports, "A federal court on Wednesday approved a request from a hedge fund seeking an official voice for equity holders in Delphi Corp.'s Chapter 11 case, departing from typical bankruptcy practice. … 'Clearly this company has extremely difficult problems to resolve,' and shareholders need a voice in that process, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain said." Dow Jones continues, "Appaloosa Management L.P., one of Delphi's largest shareholders with about 9% of its stock, has asked the auto parts maker to move ahead with a canceled shareholder meeting and wanted the court to appoint an official committee to represent stockholders in the case. Another money management firm that holds about 5% of Delphi's equity supported the motion. … Over a two-day trial, experts and attorneys for Delphi and Appaloosa argued widely differing positions about the company's prospects for reducing labor and retiree costs and how its securities would perform upon emergence from bankruptcy." Dow Jones notes, "Appaloosa attorney Thomas Lauria said he was happy Delphi's shareholders have a voice and said it seemed likely Appaloosa would fight for a seat on the committee when the US Trustee names its members. … Appaloosa has said any equity panel would closely monitor the case and be involved in negotiations or litigation involving the relationship between Delphi and its former parent General Motors Corp. … Appaloosa accumulated its Delphi stake after the company filed for bankruptcy protection and began its push for an official shareholder panel in November. The U.S. Trustee's Office - an arm of the Justice Department that normally appoints committees in bankruptcy case - was considering an equity committee request from Appaloosa but hadn't yet made a decision when the firm asked the court for a committee. The U.S. Trustee objected to Appaloosa's motion, as did the company's unsecured creditors committee."

GM, Delphi Offer Buyouts To Hourly Workers. General Motors and its major parts supplier, Delphi, yesterday offered 113,000 hourly workers a severance package ranging from $35,000-145,000. The companies' goal is to shed 30,000 hourly workers in order to reduce costs, and some analysts say the move will pay for itself by the second year, if not the first. The story is receiving extensive media coverage, including stories in most major newspapers. Last night all three networks led their newscasts with it. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, lead story, 2:55, Vargas, 8.78M) reported the strategy was a "bold move," a "drastic move to keep an ailing company afloat." ABC (Reynolds) added, "One industry analyst says it could mark the end of 20th century industrial America." Daniel Howes, business columnist, Detroit News: "Tens of thousands of UAW members of GM and Delphi are likely to retire or go away under this deal." The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 1, 3:10, Schieffer, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (3/22, lead story, 2:45, Brown, 9.87M) ran similar reports. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 2, 2:00, Brown, 9.87M) also reported on the potential impact of the buyout plan on GM workers and their communities.

Federal Judge Chastises LAPD For Failing To Comply With Reform Decree. The AP (3/23) reports, "A federal judge scolded city officials for failing to meet key provisions of a 2001 court consent decree to reform the Police Department." The AP continues, "The decree was the result of a settlement with the Justice Department and was designed to correct conditions that led to police corruption scandals involving officers beating and framing suspects and stealing evidence." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Gary A. Feess said city officials were trying to 'gut' a key provision and warned at a hearing Tuesday that he would likely extend the decree beyond its June 15 expiration date. … The judge chastised the LAPD for failing to implement a computer system required by the decree to serve as an early warning system by tracking officers' use of force, pursuits, collisions, citizen complaints and civil claims."

Navy Prayer Rule Draws Criticism. A new Navy rule encouraging chaplains to use only nonsectarian

language outside divine service is drawing criticism saying the regulation of prayer services is a violation of the chaplains' First Amendment Rights. The Washington Times (3/23, Pfeiffer, 90K) reports, "Under new rules signed by Secretary of the Navy Donald C. Winter, chaplains of all faiths in the Navy are asked to consider the views of their audience before invoking specific religious beliefs in prayer. 'I'm very disappointed with the secretary of the Navy,' said Navy chaplain Lt. Gordon James Klingenschmitt. 'He's doing the opposite of what President Bush wants.' Klingenschmitt "is urging Mr. Bush to sign an executive order to allow military chaplains to pray according to their individual faith tradition."

WPost Says States Should Discontinue Use Of Diebold Voting Machines. An editorial in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says, "Diebold, the electronic voting machine maker, suffered another sharp setback recently, when Maryland's House of Delegates voted 137-to-0 to drop its machines and switch to paper ballots. The vote came in the same week that Texas held elections marred by electronic voting troubles. Maryland's State Senate should join the House in voting to discontinue the use of the Diebold machines, and other states should follow Maryland's lead."

Three Samsung Executives Plead Guilty In Price-Fixing Probe. The New York Times (3/23, Flynn) reports, "Three executives of Samsung, the largest supplier of computer memory for consumer electronics, have agreed to plead guilty and serve prison sentences in the United States for their roles in a price-fixing conspiracy, federal prosecutors said on Wednesday." The Times continues, "The plea agreements are the latest development in the Justice Department's three-and-a-half-year investigation of the volatile market for dynamic random access memory chips, the most common type of computer memory products, used in personal computers, printers and electronic devices like cellphones and digital cameras."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Anderson) reports, "The Justice Department said it has charged four companies and 12 individuals so far in its investigation, which has led to fines totaling more than $731 million. … The three Samsung executives, who will serve their jail time in the U.S., are Sun Woo Lee, senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, an associate director in the U.S.; and Young Woo Lee, sales director in Germany." The Journal adds, "Samsung Electronics, of South Korea, is the world's largest maker of DRAM components and has previously pleaded guilty and agreed to $300 million in fines in the price-fixing conspiracy." The Journal notes, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, 'These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct.'"

The AP (3/23) reports, "Each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 fine, cooperate with federal authorities on the investigation and serve prison sentences ranging from seven to eight months for their role in a scheme to raise prices for dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. A federal judge in San Francisco must approve the deal."

Bloomberg (3/23, Rowley) reports, "Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of sales for DRAM chips, agreed to serve an eight-month prison term, and the other two will serve seven months, the government said. … 'True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms and not just when corporations pay criminal fines,' Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement." Bloomberg adds, "The government said leading victims of the conspiracy include computer makers such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Compaq Computer Corp., now owned by Hewlett- Packard. … All three Samsung executives agreed to plead guilty to price fixing, the Justice Department said. The charges filed against them in federal court in San Francisco say the defendants attended meetings with competitors to discuss setting prices for DRAM chips. They also exchanged sales information to help the participating companies monitor compliance with the cartel agreements, court documents said."

The San Francisco Chronicle (3/23, Pimentel) reports, "In a statement, Samsung said the company is 'strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior.' … According to the Justice Department, the Samsung executives took part in meetings and agreements to sell DRAM chips 'at certain levels' to manufacturers."

MarketWatch (3/23, Schroeder), IDG News Service (3/23, Gross), and Yonhap News (South Korea) (3/23, Dong-min) also report on the pleas.

FTC Could Resist Plavix Settlement. Dow Jones (3/23) reports, "The proposed settlement of patent-infringement litigation surrounding the blockbuster drug Plavix could run into regulatory resistance, but government enforcers might not have much muscle, legal experts and analysts say." Dow Jones continues, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. and Sanofi-Aventis said late Tuesday that they reached a settlement with Apotex Inc., a Toronto company that had sought to sell a generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner, before the expiration of a key patent. The settlement calls for Apotex to wait until 2011, under certain conditions, to begin selling generic Plavix through a license deal. Bristol- Myers and Sanofi also would make undisclosed payments to Apotex." Dow Jones adds, "The settlement is subject to antitrust review and clearance by the Federal Trade Commission. Some analysts and legal experts believe the FTC might try to challenge the deal because it calls for Apotex to wait as much as five years before selling generic Plavix, and Bristol-Myers and Sanofi have agreed to pay Apotex. … The companies said in a statement that the agreement wasn't an act of collusion to keep a generic drug off the market, but they acknowledged that there's 'significant risk' they would be unable to obtain the required antitrust clearance. … The FTC has taken a dim view of similar drug patent-infringement settlements in the past because it believed they could harm consumers by delaying the introduction of cheaper, generic alternatives to branded prescription drugs."

Dell To Purchase Alienware. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Lawton) reports, "Dell Inc. said it agreed to buy closely held Alienware Corp., a maker of high-end personal computers favored by gamers." The Journal continues, "Terms were not disclosed. But the deal is considered a significant strategy shift for Dell, which rarely makes acquisitions and has tended to focus more on machines purchased by businesses." The Journal adds, "While Dell has transformed the PC business by focusing on direct sales and streamlined manufacturing, Alienware has built a loyal following among computer users willing to pay a premium for powerful machines with sleek designs and odd colors such as 'cyborg green.' … The transaction also is being closely watched in the semiconductor industry. Dell, which has its own line of gaming PCs, exclusively uses chips from Intel. But Alienware also uses chips from rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc. … A Dell spokesman said Miami-based Alienware, which will be run as a separate subsidiary, can continue to do so. 'They will sell their own products, and they will continue to use AMD as part of that,' he said."

Microsoft Takes New Tack To Avoid EU Sanctions. The AP (3/23, Casert) reports, "Microsoft Corp. today offered 'free, unlimited technical support' to rivals interested in making their software work with the software giant's servers, saying it wanted to comply with a landmark EU antitrust ruling. … 'We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the (European) Commission's concerns,' Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said in a statement." The AP continues, "A spokesman for the EU's antitrust office said the Microsoft offer 'seems to be a constructive proposal,' but said the company needed to make more efforts to fully fall in line with the EU's 2004 ruling. … 'Microsoft will naturally be well placed to answer questions from licensees on specific points of the technical documents,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. … He insisted, however, that even two years after the ruling that forced Microsoft to share technical details with rivals, Microsoft's efforts remained insufficient."

The Financial Times (3/23, Buck) reports, "The latest concessions come in response to accusations by the Commission that Microsoft has failed to implement one of the key elements of its landmark ruling. … Brussels has told Microsoft that it has failed to provide complete and accurate inter-operability information about Windows to rival companies. It believes the information – which will be licensed in return for a fee – is needed so that other companies can develop server software that meshes with Windows-driven computers and servers."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Stern) reports, "An independent monitor in the regulatory case has found the documents provided by Microsoft needed a drastic overhaul to make them workable. The monitor, computer-science professor Neil Barrett, wrote a critical report about Microsoft's efforts to comply with the commission's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions. … Microsoft, which has accused Mr. Barrett of being uninformed and colluding with its rivals, also pledged yesterday to do additional work on technical documentation. But it said five European computer-science professors believe existing documentation already meets requirements."

EU To Confront France, Spain Over Energy Industry Protections. Bloomberg (3/23, Stearns) reports, "The European Union is set to confront France and Spain for protecting energy companies from foreign takeovers, raising the prospect of a clash among EU leaders at a meeting meant to revive a push for market integration." Bloomberg continues, "EU leaders meet this evening in Brussels for the first time since the French government arranged a merger between utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA to avert a possible bid for Suez by Italy's Enel SpA. The two-day summit also comes after the Spanish government imposed rules to hinder a takeover of power company Endesa SA by Germany's E.ON AG. … 'Member states are reluctant to accept the rules,' Loyola de Palacio, EU energy commissioner for five years until November 2004, said by telephone from Madrid two days ago. 'They are very proud when one of their companies goes abroad and makes a takeover but aren't very happy when somebody else makes a takeover in their country.'" Bloomberg adds, "National obstacles and monopolies in Europe's 250 billion-euro ($302 billion) electricity and natural-gas market threaten to boost bills for companies and consumers, curtail supply and undermine the economy. The fragmentation may also hinder efforts to prevent the 25-nation EU's dependency on energy imports from rising to 70 percent by 2030 from 50 percent now."

EU Ends Antitrust Dispute Over Soccer Broadcasts. The AP (3/23, Casert) reports, "The European Union closed a long-standing antitrust dispute with England's Premier League on Wednesday, forcing one the of richest leagues in the world to stop selling the rights to its live soccer matches exclusively to one TV channel. … 'The solution we have reached will benefit football fans while allowing the Premier League to maintain its timetable for the sale of its rights,' said EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes, after the EU executive finalized the deal between both sides." The AP continues, "Under the agreement, live TV rights will be sold in six balanced packages with no one bidder being allowed to buy them all. … Premier League Chief Executive Richard Scudamore said the decision was 'a good outcome for supporters, whether in the stadium or watching our broadcasts.' … He added the Premier League 'believes that the conditions are now in place to create maximum interest for our audiovisual rights and to take the world's most popular domestic football competition from strength to strength.'" The AP notes, "British Sky Broadcasting Group PLC - a pay channel owned by media mogul Rupert Murdoch - has held the exclusive rights to the richest broadcast contract in European sport for the past 13 years. The satellite broadcaster dominates Britain's pay-TV market with close to 8 million subscribers."

Bush Says Coal Reserves Key To Curing US "Addiction" To Foreign Oil. The Wheeling News-Register (3/23, McCabe) reports, "West Virginia's coal reserves could be one of the keys to curing the United States' 'addiction' and dependence on foreign oil, President Bush said Wednesday." During his remarks at the Capitol Music Hall in Wheeling, "underwritten by the Ogden Newspapers Inc. and other local sponsors and hosted by the Wheeling Area Chamber of Commerce, the president spoke of a brief meeting he had with Gov. Joe Manchin on the way downtown from the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport." During that meeting, "Manchin discussed coal liquefaction — a chemical process that turns coal into a fuel that can be used in vehicles -- as an alternative energy source for the nation." Said Bush, "First thing is, we've got a lot of coal, a 250-year supply of coal, which helps us on our electricity. And we're spending a lot of money on clean coal technology. The whole idea is to use taxpayers' money to develop a technology that will enable us to have zero-emission plants, which will help us achieve an environmental objective, as well as an energy independence objective."

Bush Administration To Release More Stringent Fuel Economy Rules. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 3, 2:15, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "The Bush Administration is ready to slap fuel economy requirements on the largest gas guzzlers. While the proposal would affect all jumbo sport utility vehicles and vans, GM, which makes the popular Chevy Suburban and the ultra-trendy Hummer H2, would be hardest hit." Sources "say the rule, still being reviewed by the White House, would require the giant SUVs to get more than 20 miles per gallon by 2011. Currently, the Chevy Suburban and the GMC Yukon average 15 and the Hummer only 13." To "get these monsters to 20 miles a gallon, car makers would have to spend millions on redesign. Sticker prices would likely jump by a thousand dollars or more. However, the improved mileage could save drivers more than a billion dollars a year in gasoline costs, but the heaviest pickup trucks would still be exempt from the new gas mileage requirements and that loophole rankles auto industry watchdogs."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 3, 0:40, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "The bottom line: A fleet-wide average of 24 miles per gallon for light trucks, minivans, and SUVs. That's an increase of 1.8 miles per gallon."

Senate Aide Says Passing Administration Pollution Rules Is Tall Order. John Shanahan, majority counsel for the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, told the National Coal Council yesterday that Congress would have a difficult time passing legislation this year to reinstate the Bush Administration anti-pollution regulations for coal burning power plants that were rejected by a federal appeals court last week. CQ (3/22, Evans) reported that Shanahan "said passing legislation to reinstate the administration's rules would be almost impossible in the Senate, where it takes 60 votes to break a filibuster. … The only possibility, he said, would be to attach language addressing the anti-pollution regulations to a larger, more important bill."

EPA Lists States With Worst Air Pollution, Cancer Risk. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 4, 0:15, Schieffer, 7.66M) reported, "Car and truck exhaust fumes are a main source of pollutants cited in a new study of air quality and cancer risk. The EPA report says that New York, California and Oregon have the most polluted air and the highest risk of related cancer. The cleanest air in the country: Wyoming, South Dakota and Montana."

WSJournal Blasts Court Ruling On Bush Clean Air Strategy. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) says that the DC Circuit Court of Appeals' decision last week to strike down "a major plank of the Bush Administration's clean air strategy" is "based on a bad reading of the law, and -- unless successfully challenged -- will lock the U.S. into an old-fashioned approach to regulation when better alternatives are available. … If the D.C. Circuit ruling stands, the Bush clean air strategy will lie in ruins, since it relies on a so-called 'cap-and-trade' pollution permit system to allow the market to figure out how best to achieve emission reductions." The Journal adds, "If the Bush Administration doesn't want to abandon its own policy, it has little choice but to fight back."

WPost Calls Decision "Common-Sense Ruling." An editorial in the Washington Post (3/23, A22, 744K) says, "One might hope that after its rebuke last week by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the Bush administration would reconsider its efforts to rewrite the rules governing power plant emissions. … Unfortunately, there is no particular reason to expect the administration to come to its senses in response. It is still trying to curtail enforcement against old coal-fired plants that fail to install new pollution-control technologies." The Post adds, "The court's common-sense ruling last week is a promising sign that its judges won't sit still for further efforts to ignore the law."

Wall Street Prepares For Bird Flu Pandemic. USA Today (3/23, Shell, 2.31M) reports, "Bird flu has yet to come even close to the USA's borders, but Wall Street analysts are already crafting advice on how investors can inoculate their portfolios if a pandemic breaks out." In response to growing fears, stock analysts have been "busy concocting what-if scenarios, handicapping winning and losing stock sectors, and educating clients in the science of bird flu." The newspaper says that "not since the SARS scare in Asia in spring 2003…has a health-related crisis put investors on edge."

Schools Told To Prepare For Bird Flu. The AP (3/23 Feller) reports, "The nation's schools, recognized incubators of respiratory diseases among children, are being told to plan for the possibility of an outbreak of bird flu. Federal health leaders say it is not alarmist or premature for schools to make preparations, such as finding ways to teach kids even if they've all been sent home." In North Carolina on Tuesday, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings "said schools must be aware that they may have to close their buildings—or that their schools may need to be used as makeshift hospitals, quarantine sites or vaccination centers."

Researchers Shed More Light On Bird Flu Spread Among Humans. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, A2, Regalado, 2.11M) reports, "Scientists have a new clue why the feared H5N1 strain of the avian-influenza virus hasn't spread easily among people." According to research published this week in the journal Science by teams in the US and the Netherlands, the virus "primarily infects cells deep in the human lung, possibly making it difficult for the germ to spread." In a separate study released yesterday by the journal Nature, a research group said that "to spread between humans, the virus would need to adapt in a way that enabled it to attach to a different type of molecule present in cells higher in the respiratory tract."

The Washington Post (3/23, A13, Brown, 744K) says the research "suggests that people need close and heavy exposure to the H5N1 virus for it to get into the lungs. But once it takes hold, it causes extensive damage." The New York Times (3/23, Wade, 1.19M) also reports on the findings.

China Agrees To Hand Over Bird Flu Samples. The Financial Times (3/23, Yeh) reports, "Chinese officials have promised to provide numerous bird flu virus samples to global health researchers, a rare move that will help accelerate research into the lethal disease," World Health Organization officials said Wednesday. The Times says "Beijing's compliance, if followed through, is a sign of more intimate cooperation with the global health community," and "reflects a change in attitude among Chinese government researchers, who at times have been reluctant to share samples for fear of not being recognized for any breakthrough findings published overseas."

Man Cleared In Theft Of Nevada Petroglyph Says He Wanted To Protect Art. The AP (3/23, Sonner) reports, "One of two men whose federal conviction for stealing American Indian artwork was overturned says the pair simply wanted to protect the ancient petroglyphs from encroaching development." The AP continues, "Carroll Mizell, who served 10 months in prison after being found guilty in June 2004 of stealing the rock art said 'we wanted to save the property. … My whole intent was to free these things so they wouldn't be destroyed,' Mizell told The Associated Press on Wednesday from Redmond, Ore. … 'We didn't do this because we wanted to put them on e-Bay,' he said." The AP adds, "The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that the Justice Department failed to prove the rock art taken from a national forest on the edge of Reno had a market value of more than $1,000, a requirement for a felony conviction of government theft. … Mizell and John Ligon of Reno admitted during their federal court trial in Reno that they took three boulders with etchings of an archer and bighorn sheep from the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest. But they insisted they didn't know it was illegal, partly because there were no signs marking the site. … Forest Service officials believe the petroglyphs are at least 1,000 years old. They were located within a few hundred yards of backyards in a neighborhood in northwest Reno where hundreds of new homes are scheduled to be built. … Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, said federal prosecutors are considering asking the appeals court to reconsider the case but they had no further comment."

New Hampshire Lawmakers Approve Eminent Domain Limits. The AP (3/23) reports, "New Hampshire lawmakers gave preliminary approval Wednesday to a constitutional amendment that would limit government's ability to seize private property." The AP continues, "The measure was prompted by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year that allowed New London, Conn., to take a group of older homes along the waterfront and turn them over to a developer who plans to build offices, a hotel and a convention center." The AP adds, "The state House and Senate voted overwhelmingly in favor of identical resolutions. For the measure to win approval, both chambers must pick one resolution and pass it. … Then the amendment would be put to a statewide vote, probably in November. Two-thirds approval would be needed for ratification. … The amendment would prohibit the taking of private property for use by private developers."

Virginia Lawmakers Criticized For Not Acting To Curb Eminent Domain. Jeremy Hopkins, counsel with Waldo & Lyle, P.C., a Virginia law firm that represents property owners in eminent domain cases, writes in the Washington Times (3/23), "The Supreme Court's infamous decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which allows the government to take property from one person simply to give it to another, caused most states to take action to prohibit such abuses. However, the General Assembly refuses to limit the power of eminent domain in Virginia. It ended its 2006 legislative session without passing legislation to eliminate the abuses in Kelo." Hopkins adds, "Virginians' own state agencies and local governments, as well as large private corporations that have the power of eminent domain, spare no expense in fighting to ensure that the General Assembly does not place any real restrictions on their power to take people's property. … Unless and until Virginians demand a constitutional amendment to place real restrictions on the General Assembly's power of eminent domain, no Virginian's home, farm or business will be secure."

Moore Says ESA Failing Property Owners. Stephen Moore writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) that the Endangered Species Act "tries to achieve the societal policy goal of saving species from extinction by imposing all of the costs on a hapless few. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo has sensibly proposed reforms that allow landowners to get fair compensation from the government if their land is depressed in value due to a wetlands or endangered species designation. That seems equitable: If society wants to preserve habitat for the common good, then the cost should be borne by all taxpayers, not individual landowners, who would no longer regard endangered species as an economic plague." Moore adds that the ESA "isn't just failing property owners but the very irreplaceable species it was designed to protect."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Justice Department Announces Major Drug Smuggling Indictment. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 10, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "The US Justice Department announced the biggest drug trafficking indictment in history today. It charges 50 leaders of a Colombian rebel group with shipping $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their attacks and with murder and kidnapping. Only three of the 50 are in custody."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 8, 0:45, Brown) reported it is "being described by the Justice Department as the biggest narcotics trafficking indictment in American history. It accuses 50 people in Colombia's largest guerilla group, known as FARC, of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries."

In a widely distributed story, the AP (3/23, Sherman) reports, "The United States charged 50 leaders of Colombia's largest guerrilla group with sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their fight at home, a federal indictment that depicts the rebels as major narco-terrorists. … The indictment made public Wednesday in U.S. District Court said the leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, ordered the killings of Colombian farmers who did not cooperate with the group, the kidnapping and killing of U.S. citizens and the downing of U.S. planes seeking to fumigate coca crops." The AP adds, "U.S. officials said the indictment strikes a blow against the group because it lays out the FARC's hierarchy and details of its operations. 'Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. … He acknowledged that 47 of those charged remain at large, probably in well-defended jungle strongholds that have so far proved beyond the reach of Colombian authorities."

The Los Angeles Times (3/23, Muskal) reports, "The U.S. will seek to extradite three of the defendants who are in custody in Colombia and offered rewards that total $75 million for information leading to the arrest of the others who are believed to be in areas controlled by the militia." The Times adds, "U.S. officials say FARC has sent about 60% of the cocaine imported into the U.S., then used the money to support its long-term insurgency against Colombia, now led by pro-U.S. President Alvaro Uribe. … 'This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine,' said Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales. 'Because of unprecedented cooperation between United States and Colombian authorities, we are closer than ever before to reaching our goal of bringing the leaders of this narco-terrorist group to justice in the United States.' … Among the leaders being sought are the seven figures who sit on the FARC Secretariat, the militia's ruling body, and 17 members of the estado mayor, or governing council, U.S. officials said at a news conference this morning in Washington."

The New York Times (3/23, Forero) reports that the indictment accuses FARC "of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States. … 'We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence,' Mr. Gonzales said. … The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government. Three are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition, American officials said."

In the "Nation/Politics" section, The Washington Times (3/23, Seper) reports Tandy said, "From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans. … Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Knight Ridder (3/23, Bachelet, Dudley) reports, "The indictment is likely to make it easier for the U.S. Congress to continue funding for Plan Colombia, a multibillion dollar effort to combat drug trafficking, and military aid for the conservative government of President Alvaro Uribe, one of the strongest U.S. allies in the region. … But analysts said it may not have much impact on an estimated 18,000-strong guerrilla force whose leaders are deeply entrenched in the far reaches of a country the size of France, flush with drug money and showing signs lately of recovering from a three-year-old military offensive." Knight Ridder notes that FARC "has long been known to collect payments from coca farmers and drug traffickers, as well as businessmen, cattle ranchers and shop owners, to finance its four-decades-old insurgency. … But the indictment unveiled by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington alleges that the FARC has taken its involvement in the drug trade significantly further in recent years, earning as much as $25 billion. … 'The FARC has evolved into the world's largest supplier of cocaine and cocaine paste,' a semi-processed product that must be refined into cocaine, the indictment alleges. … 'This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country,' Gonzales said."

Bloomberg (3/23, Arthur) reports, "The Justice Department calls FARC, the largest guerrilla group in Colombia, a 'narco-terrorist' group and views it as one of the 'highest priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking,' Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington." Bloomberg notes, "The U.S. State Department is offering rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the FARC leaders charged in the indictment. … 'This the beginning of the process,' Gonzales said when asked the chances of capturing the 47 at-large FARC members. … Gonzales didn't rule out the use of U.S. troops in the battle against FARC. … 'We consider all options, all effective options,' he said."

CNN.com (3/23, Frieden) reports, "Among other allegations, the indictment states that the charged FARC leaders set the price at which Colombian coca farmers could sell cocaine paste, a raw form of the drug that was transported to jungle laboratories and turned into the finished product. … Farmers who undercut the price or otherwise violated FARC's strict cocaine policies, which also dictated to which buyers the farmers could sell, were punished severely, according to the indictment. … 'Colombian farmers who violated FARC rules were allegedly shot, stabbed, or dismembered alive, and the bodies of murdered farmers were cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers,' according to a DEA news release.U.S. pushes for extradition"

Agence France-Presse (3/23), the Financial Times (3/23, Johnson), Voice of America (3/23, Malone), UPI (3/23), and the BBC (3/23) also report on the indictments.

Network TV Coverage. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 10, 0:15, Schieffer) reported, "The US Justice Department announced the biggest drug trafficking indictment in history today. It charges 50 leaders of a Colombian rebel group with shipping $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their attacks and with murder and kidnapping. Only three of the 50 are in custody."

NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 8, 0:45, Brown) reported, "Also in Washington today what is being described by the Justice Department as the biggest narcotics trafficking indictment in American history. It accuses 50 people in Colombia's largest guerilla group, known as FARC, of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries. This video shows government raids on some of the cocoa farms and jungle laboratories involved in the ring, which also allegedly kidnapped and killed American and Colombian citizens. Three of the ring leaders are in custody, but most of the others indicted today are fugitives."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (3/22, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "Along with the war on terror there's a war on narco terror, and a major US offensive. Fifty leaders of a Colombian rebel group claim narco terrorists are being charged in Washington with sending this country $25 billion worth of cocaine. The rebel group, called FARC, is a designated terror organization, and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says both countries will benefit by bringing it down. … Only three of the 50 indicted leaders are in custody."

DOJ_NMG_0020070

FOX News (3/22, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "The United States has indicted the leaders of the Armed Forces of Columbia or FARC with trafficking in cocaine. The U.S. says it will seek the extradition of the suspects already in custody.

MSNBC (3/22, 1:00 p.m.) reported, "Fifty [leaders] of a Colombian narco-terrorist group. The group known as FARC is accused of using money from drug sales to fund terrorist operations in Colombia. The attorney general says the group imported more than $25 billion worth of coke into the United States and other countries."

BBC World News (3/22, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The biggest drugs indictment of its kind in the US. Fifty Colombian rebels have been charged with importing devastating amounts of cocaine into the United States. The group is said to supply 50% of the world's cocaine and more than 60% of the cocaine that enters the US. The announcement was made by the US Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales. A federal indictment was unsealed today in Washington, D.C., charging 50 members of FARC's policy-making and operational leadership with importing more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries."

PBS Coverage. NewsHour with Jim Lehrer (3/22, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "The U.S. justice department announced the indictment today of 50 rebels in Colombia for cocaine trafficking. It said their group, known as FARC, supplies most of the cocaine for the world and the U.S. Attorney General Gonzales acknowledged nearly all the suspects are at large. But he said it's clear they're worried. … The indictment said FARC has kidnapped and killed Americans and shot down U.S. planes trying to eradicate coca plants. The attorney general would not say if the indictment clears the way for U.S. troops to go after the rebel leaders, but he did not rule it out."

Local TV Coverage. WTVJ-TV, Miami-Ft. Lauderdale, Florida (3/22, 12:00 p.m.) reported, "Attorney General Gonzalez says 50 members of the narco terrorist group have been charged with importing more than $25 billion of cocaine into the U.S. and other countries. That's more than 60% of the cocaine that comes into this country. Three of the top FARC leaders charged today are already in custody in Colombia. … The remaining 47 are at large, hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia, surrounded by heavily-armed guerrillas."

KNSD-TV, San Diego (3/22, 4:30 p.m.) reported, "The U.S. Justice Department has indicted 50 leaders of a Colombian terrorist group. Authorities say the group supplies half the world's cocaine. According to the indictment, the Revolutionary Armed Forces Of Colombia or FARC imported more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the U.S. and other [countries]. Authorities say the group also allegedly ordered the killings of farmers who refused to cooperate with them and kidnapped and killed U.S. citizens and others who got in their way."

KRIS-TV, Corpus Christi, Texas (3/22, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Authorities say they're responsible for supplying half the world's cocaine. According to the indictment, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or FARC imported more than 25-billion dollars worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said today's indictment is part of the U.S. push to pursue and prosecute drug dealers."

California Seeks To Get Medical Marijuana Lawsuit Dismissed. According to the AP (3/22), the state of California "has filed a motion seeking to dismiss a San Diego County lawsuit that challenges a decade-old law permitting in California the use of marijuana for medical purposes. The attorney general's office filed the court documents Tuesday. In them, the state contends county officials simply 'disliked' the law and that there was no legal reason for the court to consider the lawsuit."

San Diego's North County Times (3/22) reports, "The county of San Diego, in a move that angered local medical marijuana patients and marijuana advocacy groups, filed a lawsuit in December in federal court seeking to overturn the Compassionate Use Act, which allows the use of medicinal marijuana. The supervisors ---- who have collectively opposed the law since it was placed on the 1996 ballot ---- argue that it should be 'pre-empted' by federal law, which says that all marijuana use is illegal and that the drug has no medicinal value."

IMMIGRATION:

Clinton Says GOP Immigration Bill Would "Criminalize Good Samaritan," Jesus. The New York Times (3/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports, "Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton invoked the Bible yesterday to criticize a stringent border security measure that, among other things, would make it a federal crime to offer aid to illegal immigrants." The immigration bill to which she was referring was sponsored by Sen. Bill Frist. Said Clinton, "It is hard to believe that a Republican leadership that is constantly talking about values and about faith would put forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation. … It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself." The New York Post (3/23, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Clinton's comments, saying she "ratcheted up her talk about religion yesterday" and stated "a GOP-sponsored bill making it a felony to be in the United States illegally would have 'criminalized' Jesus."

Reid Says He Would Filibuster Frist Bill. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has proposed an immigration bill that would bypass the Judiciary Committee, which has been considering sweeping reforms, including a guest-worker program. The AP (3/23, Spagat) reports that Minority Leader Harry Reid "vowed Wednesday to do everything in his power, including filibuster, to thwart…Frist's proposed overhaul." Reid said immigration reform "must include heightened border enforcement, a 'guest worker' program and a 'path to citizenship' for the estimated 11 million people in the United States illegally." Frist's bill "sidesteps the question of temporary work permits." Reid said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/22), "America needs comprehensive immigration reform. I have spent the day down here with the people who are in the trenches, so to speak. They acknowledge that immigration is not one problem. It's not a guess-worker program only. It's not enforcement only. It's not only dealing with the 11 million people here who are undocumented. It's all of them. Now, we have to make sure that we deal with all of these."

Farmers Support "Carrots And Sticks" Approach To Immigration Reform. The New York Times (3/23, Porter, 1.19M) reports "the experience of farmers…underscores why most experts say that simply tightening the border with Mexico will not work." The Times adds, "To curb illegal immigration, they say, the government needs both carrots and sticks: legal work channels for future immigrants and the current population of workers unlawfully in the country along with a much more effective bar against hiring illegal labor."

Probe Finds Immigration Violations At Kentucky Restaurant. The Murray (KY) Ledger & Times (3/23, Taylor) reports, "An investigation last month into an indentured servitude complaint at Murray's Asian Buffet proved the allegation false, but five people were taken into custody for immigration violations." The L&T continues, "U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Gail Montenegro said interviews conducted Feb. 8 at the Murray restaurant revealed no indication of human trafficking of indentured servitude. The federal investigators were responding to a complaint that workers were being held against their will. … Following the investigation, five people were taken into custody for immigration violations. Montenegro said that included one Mexican juvenile female, three Mexican adult males and one Chinese female." The L&T adds, "Montenegro didn't have the individuals' names because the ICE agent who worked on the case was traveling. Even so, she said the agency doesn't usually release names until people have been deported or if their identity is in the public's interest for safety reasons."

TAX:

DOJ Sues North Carolina Tax Preparers. The Charlotte Observer (3/23, Drummond) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department today filed lawsuits to stop two area tax preparers from preparing returns." The Observer continues, "The government said Jerry Adams and Demetria Adams prepared more than 1,600 tax returns in 2004 and 2005 at First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby." The Observer adds, "In the suits filed in federal court in Charlotte, the government alleges the two understated wages and overstated credits for the past two years. The 'excessive refunds' cost the U.S. Treasury more than $3.8 million, the lawsuits claim. … The government wants the court to order the pair to turn over names, addresses and Social Security numbers of customers. … Since 2001, the Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax return preparers and promoters."

KPMG Revises Terms Of Tax-Shelter Settlement Payout. The New York Times (3/23, Browning) reports, "The accounting firm KPMG said yesterday that it had reached a revised settlement with tax shelter investors, but warned that the reduced agreement could still fall apart." The Times continues, "The previous $195 million deal, brokered last September through Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the prominent class-action law firm, collapsed in recent months when nearly one in four eligible investors chose not to take part, saying that it did not offer them enough compensation. … Under the complex terms of the revised settlement, some 60 investors who chose not to join can come back in. But investors who are currently in the deal can now elect not to participate."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Reilly) reports, "Accounting giant KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin LLP took a fresh stab at settling a class-action lawsuit related to the sale of questionable tax shelters. … The firms last month shelved a previous version of the settlement, which called for a $195 million payout to those who had bought the tax shelters, because too many people had opted out of the agreement." The Journal continues, "Under the new version of the settlement, filed yesterday in federal court in New Jersey, KPMG and Sidley Austin would pay no more than, but most likely far less than, the $195 million originally envisaged, as well as up to $30 million in legal fees. … KPMG, which sold the questionable tax shelters, will bear the brunt of this cost, while Chicago-based Sidley Austin, which gave legal advice on the shelters, will pay about 20%." The Journal adds, "The revised settlement terms would reduce the amount the firms will pay based on the number of plaintiffs who opt out. The amounts to be received by individuals won't necessarily decline because of this reduction. They would depend on the specific claims of each individual investor."

Consumer, Privacy Groups Criticize IRS Rules On Selling Taxpayer Data. Proposed IRS rules that would spell out how tax return preparers may legally sell financial information from their clients' returns are drawing fire from consumer groups and privacy advocates. The Washington Post (3/23, D1, Crenshaw, 744K) reports, "The proposal, issued in December, was billed by the IRS as improving privacy protections for taxpayers, detailing the steps for getting permission to use the information. But it has focused attention on a little-known fact: Although law forbids the unauthorized disclosure of taxpayer information, return-preparers have long been allowed to disclose it, even sell it, if they obtain their clients' permission." The rules "also specify what a preparer must do to get permission from a taxpayer to disclose return information, up to and including the entire return."

WSJournal Cites Revenue Data As Proof Of Tax Cuts' Success. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) notes "the latest Treasury figures on booming federal tax revenue." The Journal says the revenue data "are further proof of the success of the Bush tax cuts of 2003. The fastest way to stop this revenue windfall, and blow an even larger hole in the deficit, would be to fail to extend the 15% tax rate on capital gains and dividends through 2010, thus assuring a huge tax increase after 2008."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Seen As Fueling Speculation About Staff Changes. The New York Times (3/23, Nagourney, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports President Bush's "suggestion on Tuesday that he may add a new senior figure to his White House team raised questions about the future of" Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr. and Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, who have "increasingly been forced to fend off rebellious Congressional Republicans, complaints about the administration's competence and calls from within their party for an infusion of fresh thinking into the White House." Rove "told associates in recent days that he was confident he could resist calls to bring in new advisers." But Bush's "decision not to squelch speculation about such a move" did "nothing to restore diminished Republican confidence in a White House team that once promoted a reputation for efficiency, order and impeccable political instincts." Two GOP sources said "the names being suggested to the president included" HHS Secretary Michael O. Leavitt, former RNC Chairman Marc Racicot, former Commerce Secretary Donald L. Evans, former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie, and former Reps. Thomas G. Loeffler and Bill Paxon. The Times adds in an interview last week, Card "defended Mr. Rove and…took the blame for any problems." For his part, Rove "dismissed the notion that he was fatigued or had lost his touch." The Times adds Rove "has assured worried Republicans that the party will endure just minor losses in the midterm elections. Associates said Mr. Rove appeared increasingly certain that he would not be indicted for his role in the leaking of a C.I.A. operative's name."

AARP Launches Ad Campaign To Push Medicare Drug Plan. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that the AARP has launched a new ad campaign encouraging seniors to sign up for the Medicare drug benefit. According to the Journal, "The print ads, featuring vignettes and photos of seniors saving money with the new coverage, target low-income people eligible for extra federal subsidies of their medication costs. The ads will appear in publications for seniors and minorities in communities with high numbers of low-income seniors who haven't yet signed up for the drug benefit."

Medicare, Medicaid Recipients' Personal Data Said To Be At Risk. USA Today (3/23, Appleby, 2.31M) reports Federal investigators say "medical and financial information gathered on millions of Americans by Medicare, Medicaid and other government programs is vulnerable to thieves or pranksters because of inadequate computer security." The Government Accountability Office says "'significant weaknesses in information security controls' increase the risk from those who would 'inadvertently or deliberately disclose, modify or destroy' sensitive data." Sen. Charles Grassley says, "Instead of firewalls to safeguard sensitive data, we have Swiss cheese."

Nelson Threatens Hold On Kempthorne Nomination. CQ (3/22, Tollefson) reports Florida Sen. Bill Nelson "is threatening to hold up the nomination of Idaho Gov. Dirk Kempthorne as Interior secretary in an effort to protect his state from offshore drilling." Kempthorne's supporters "are confident that they have the votes to override such a move," and he is "all but certain to earn the requisite votes when the Energy and Natural Resources Committee takes up his nomination in late March or early April, but senators can raise the bar for confirmation to 60 votes by placing a hold on the confirmation process when it moves to the floor."

Bush Presides Over Second-Longest Veto-Free Period. USA Today (3/23, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports President Bush "today becomes the longest-sitting president since Thomas Jefferson not to exercise his veto, surpassing James Monroe." Today is Bush's "1,889th day in office, and no veto is in sight. As of Wednesday, Congress had sent him

1,091 bills. He signed them all." Some analysts "say Bush's failure to use his veto shows an unwillingness to confront fellow Republicans who control Congress."

In an analysis story, USA Today (3/23, Benedetto, 2.31M) reports For most of his presidency, Congress has been dominated by fellow Republicans." Colby College professor G. Calvin Mackenzie said, "Presidents generally do not want to draw a line between themselves and their party." USA adds Bush "and the Republican Congress saw eye to eye on a string of major legislation, including five tax cuts, a bankruptcy overhaul bill, an energy bill, a Medicare prescription-drug plan, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and a bipartisan resolution to go to war in Iraq. Bush's defeats have often come over items Congress never passed."

Ryan Promotes Line-Item Veto Legislation. In a USA Today op-ed (3/23), Rep. Paul Ryan explains his proposal to give the President a line-item veto, saying, "We propose beefing up the president's existing authority to ask Congress to rescind wasteful spending items. Today, the president can make such a request, but Congress can just ignore it." Under the "bipartisan legislation, the president can sign a spending bill but put a temporary hold on any wasteful provision and request that Congress rescind it. After two days, any member of Congress could introduce the rescission proposal and it would have to be voted on within 10 legislative days, guaranteeing fast-track consideration."

Competitive Sourcing Seen As Failing To Meet White House Hopes. The Washington Post (3/23, A21, Lee, 744K) reports President Bush "called" competitive sourcing "his top management priority when he took office in 2001, saying federal workers should compete with contractors for as many as 850,000 government jobs that are considered commercial, jobs as diverse as janitorial services and computer network design." But the program has "gone far less smoothly, and far more slowly, than the White House had hoped, with fewer than 50,000 jobs studied by the end of 2005. And federal workers have won the job competitions more than 80 percent of the time."

Bill Would Exempt DC From Hatch Act. DC officials have proposed legislation that would exempt the city from enforcement of the Hatch Act and govern itself on the matter. The Washington Times (3/23, Doolittle, 90K) reports, "D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, introduced the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, last week. Their bill would exempt the District from the Hatch Act, a 1939 anti-corruption law designed to prohibit federal workers from participating in political campaigns." Enactment of the bill "is contingent upon the D.C. Council passing a bill similar to the Hatch Act. Mrs. Norton said she expects her bill to easily pass both the House and the Senate."

Effectiveness Of US Arab-Language TV Station Considered. The CBS Evening News (3/22, story 8, 3:45, Andrews, 7.66M) reported on al Hurra, the Arab-language TV station run by the US government for $70 million per year. Based in Virginia, al Hurra "launched two years ago as an antidote to al Jazeera, the influential Arabic channel that often specializes in anti-American views. Al Hurra's mission is to present news from an American perspective and promote democracy. Is this station a success?" Shibley Telhami, University of Maryland: "No." Andrews: Telhami "has done surveys in the Arab world that rank al Hurra dead last in news popularity. Most Arabs watch al Jazeera he says precisely because they want to hear what's wrong with American policy. Telhami believes the al Hurra message is dead on arrival." But the "real measure of al Hurra is whether the station is earning the United States more understanding or even more sympathy in the Arab world. Is al Hurra doing anything to win hearts and minds? Al Hurra has its own surveys showing that over 20 million Arabs watch at some point every week, and that most of them -- 70% -- find al Hurra's news credible, an achievement says the news director earned the hard way."

Study Finds Most Americans View Muslims Favorably. A Pew study released yesterday finds that most Americans hold favorable views of Muslims, and nearly half say Islam does not encourage violence more than other religions. The Washington Times (3/23, Wetzstein, 90K) reports, that the study from the Pew forum on Religion and Public Life offers "hope that Muslims eventually will be accepted and integrated into American society as people of other faiths have been." However, the Times adds that "many Americans remain wary of Muslims and Islam."

NYTimes Says Campaign Finance Regulations Need Updating. An editorial in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) says the campaign finance reforms implemented after Watergate are "now badly in need of updating to keep pace with the big-money dynamics of private fund-raising, which has retightened its lock on politics. Don't expect much help from the current Congress, so clearly in thrall to special interests' campaign money."

OTHER NEWS:

Snow Predicts Wage Growth Will Accelerate. USA Today (3/23, Kirchhoff, 2.31M) reports, "Treasury Secretary John Snow predicted Wednesday that US wage growth would accelerate in coming months, as he tried to combat negative consumer attitudes about the economy and White House policies." In a meeting with reporters, Snow "said that as labor markets tighten -- with the unemployment rate falling to 4.8% in February from 6.3% in mid-2003 -- companies will boost compensation." USA Today adds, "Several measures of compensation, including hourly wage growth, have lagged behind inflation during much of the recovery from the 2001 recession. Average hourly wages rose 3.2% in 2005, while the consumer inflation rate was up 3.4%." There are "signs that wages are starting to pick up. The Labor Department said hourly wages for non-supervisory workers, about 80% of the workforce, rose 5 cents in February and 3.5% from February 2004."

The Washington Post (3/23, D3, Henderson, 744K) reports Snow also said "the income gap between rich and poor in the United States has shrunk in recent years. … The top 5 percent of Americans, ranked by income, earned 15.4 percent of the nation's after-tax income in 2003, down from 19 percent in 2000, Treasury figures show. The bottom 20 percent took home 2.5 percent of all U.S. after-tax income, up from 2.3 percent in 2000." But "much of the decline in inequality," adds the Post, "reflected the popping of the stock market bubble, which peaked in 2000, when executives pocketed fat bonuses and stockholders reaped huge profits from selling shares, according to economists inside and outside the Bush administration."

Stock Markets Rebound, Dow Reaches Highest Level In Almost Five Years. NBC Nightly News (3/22, story 4, 0:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today, stocks finished higher. The Dow was up nearly 82 points [to close at 11,317.43]. The NASDAQ gained just over 9 points on the day [to close at 2,303.35]." The New York Times (3/23, News, 1.19M) reports the Dow Jones industrial average "rose yesterday to its highest level in almost five years as the outlook for corporate earnings improved." Also, the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 7.81 points, or 0.6 percent, to 1,305.04. USA Today (3/23, 2.31M) and the Wall Street Journal (3/23, Patterson, 2.11M), among other newspapers, also report the stock numbers.

S&P 500's Poor Performance Said To Undermine Bush "Ownership Society" Vision. Bloomberg (3/23, Murray) reports President George W. Bush has "tried to sell Americans on an 'ownership society' that would create more wealth -- and more Republicans in the process. The stock market hasn't accommodated." The Standard & Poor's 500 Index, "the benchmark for American equities -- is down 2.8 percent since Bush took office five years and two months ago. That's the worst performance during the same stage of any two-term administration in the past half century except that of Richard M. Nixon."

Republicans Don't Want Stem Cell Research To Be Wedge Issue. Bloomberg (3/23, Roberts) reports supporters of stem cell research "present a quandary for Republicans, who are split over whether to allow federal funding for research on new stem cells from human embryos. Senate Democrats plan to force a debate on the issue in the coming months and use it in the campaign leading up to the November elections." Republicans "plan their own debate over bioethics in an effort to limit the damage from letting stem cells become 'a wedge issue that divides Republicans,' Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said in an interview."

Disabled Iraq Veteran Wins Democratic House Primary In Illinois. ABC World News Tonight (3/22, story 5, :30, Vargas, 8.78M) reported Tammy Duckworth, the Iraq veteran who lost her legs when her Blackhawk helicopter was hit by an RPG, won the Democratic primary for Illinois' 6th CD. Duckworth was "wooed by Democrats looking to get credibility on security issues." CNN's The Situation Room (3/22, Crowley) called Duckworth "the Polaris in a galaxy of Democratic hopes this election year, running in the once solidly Republican, now evolving, west suburbs of Chicago for a seat long held by Republican Henry Hyde." Duckworth "is a natural, a newcomer, young, female, an Iraqi war veteran who opposed the war and proudly served." The New York Times (3/23, Ruethling, 1.19M) reports "Duckworth's opponents in Tuesday's primary were critical of the amount of support and financing she received from outside the district."

The AP (3/23, Conrad) says Duckworth "is now leading the charge for the Fighting Democrats." In November, Duckworth "will face state Sen. Peter Roskam, a well-to-do lawyer and conservative from Wheaton who ran unopposed in the GOP primary. Roskam also drew support from Vice President Dick Cheney, who helped with a fundraiser that brought in an estimated $200,000." On its website, Time (3/23, Kerkenhoff) reports Republicans "are confident that Hyde's conservative legacy remains very much alive in the west suburban District. And they note that Roskam, while criticized as too far right for a district becoming more diverse, is a loyal Bush supporter running in a district that voted for him in 2004, even as the President handily lost the state as a whole." The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Paulson, 61K) also says that "despite Duckworth's high profile -- and backing from party leaders such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. John Kerry, and Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Richard Durbin -- taking the seat from the GOP will be tough, most analysts agree.

The Washington Post (3/23, A4, Lydersen, Goldfarb, 744K) reports, "Election officials here resumed counting ballots Wednesday after problems with new electronic voting machines around Cook County forced them to halt the count in a key local race in Tuesday's primary that also had voters casting ballots for governor and Congress. … The problems Tuesday night did not significantly affect tabulations for one of the nation's key congressional primaries." Illinois "has received more than $144 million in federal grants to comply with the Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed in 2002 in response to the controversy over the disputed election in South Florida in 2000."

Number Of Physicians Providing Charity Care Has Declined. A new study to be released today by the Center for Studying Health System Change, found that the proportion of American doctors providing charity care has declined over past decade. The Washington Post (3/23, A9, Connolly, 744K) reports, "In 2004-2005, 68 percent of doctors said they delivered some free or discounted care to low-income patients, down from the 76 percent recorded 10 years earlier" according to the study. The Post adds, "Overall, higher-paid specialists or doctors working in small private practices were more likely to provide charity care than internists, pediatricians or those employed by large managed-care companies, the survey found."

Duncan Says O'Malley Isn't Solving Baltimore Crime Problem. Maryland Democratic gubernatorial candidate Douglas M. Duncan writes in the Washington Post (3/23, A23, 744K) that "when it comes to crime, Baltimore is not healthy. … The mayor of Baltimore can't seem to crack the problem. He's on his fourth police commissioner, and the police department itself is dealing with a major scandal. The mayor openly spars with prosecutors when they need to be working together. And sadly, politics are being put ahead of people." Duncan adds, "Mayor Martin O'Malley repeatedly refers to a 40 percent decline in violent crime. Independent experts say it may be more like 23 percent. While campaigning in Montgomery County, O'Malley claimed it was 50 percent."

Brooks Says Many Republicans Believe Culture Matters Most. David Brooks writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M), "The setbacks in Iraq, the failure to limit the size of government and plummeting poll numbers have changed the way Republicans talk and govern. If you wanted to put these changes in a nutshell, you'd say the Republicans have gone from soaring Bushian universalism to nervous, dumbed-down Huntingtonism. … Today, many Republicans have lost patience with Bush's high-minded creedal statements. Like the Harvard political scientist Samuel Huntington, they have come to believe that culture matters most. … In short, Republicans seem to have gone from believing that culture is nothing, to believing that culture is everything — from idealism to fatalism in the blink of an eye."

INTERNATIONAL NEWS:

Rice Eyes Agreement On Iran Despite Roadblock. The AP (3/22, Sidoti) reported Secretary Rice "expressed confidence Wednesday that Russia and China would eventually resolve their differences with the United States and its European allies on how to pressure Iran to stop enriching uranium." A separate AP (3/22, Wadhams) piece said the slow pace of discussions this week "reflected just how much the United States and its European allies had failed to get Russia and China on board during a meeting of high-level diplomats in New York the night before. One council diplomat described that meeting as a setback for" US, UK and French" efforts to craft a tough council response to Iran, which the West believes is seeking nuclear weapons."

Another AP dispatch (3/23, Schweid) reports the Bush Administration "questioned on Wednesday the motives of Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq, but did not shut the door entirely." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "It is a matter of curious timing." He was "suggesting," adds the AP, that "Iran was trying to deflect international pressure from its nuclear programs now under critical discussion at the United Nations."

70% Of Americans Think Iran Building Nuclear Weapon. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) reports, "A large majority of Americans believe Iran is using its uranium research program to build a nuclear weapon, according to a recent Harris Interactive poll. About 85% of Americans say the US 'should be concerned' about Iran's nuclear research activities, according to the telephone survey of 2,435 U.S. adults." And "70% say they think Iran is using its research to build a nuclear weapon, the poll shows, while another 25% say they aren't sure."

More Commentary On Iraq. Nir Boms, vice president of the Center for Freedom in the Middle East, and Reza Bulorchi, executive director of the US Alliance for Democratic Iran, write in the Washington Times (3/23, 90K) that "the vast majority of Iranians are opposed to the theocratic regime's drive that has pushed their country to the verge of a military confrontation. An internal classified report prepared by a state-run polling center has reportedly concluded that only 31 percent of Iranians consider the nuclear program a 'national' project. The report adds that 86 percent of Iranians believe the nuclear energy is not worth entering a war."

Jim Hoagland writes in the Washington Post (3/23, A23, 744K), "Ask administration hard-liners about Iran's sudden acceptance of the US offer to talk about stability in Iraq and you hear this reaction: It's a booby trap. These hawks are right. Put the same question to moderates on the Bush team and this is the response: It's an opening in the confrontation and a necessary step toward an exit strategy for Iraq. The remarkable thing is that these doves are right, too." President Bush "must treat the Iranian decision to open discussions in Baghdad as trap and opportunity. It is both. The administration should pursue this small opening in the Iranian wall with discipline and attention to maintaining a united front with its European and Asian partners."

Bush, Rice, Burns Lobby For India Nuclear Pact. The AP (3/22, Schweid) reports President Bush made public comments Wednesday urging the US Congress "to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India — a deal that could be a tough sell to lawmakers." Bush "said India has proven itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator." Secretary Rice will testify before Congress in support of the pact, which requires Congressional approval to exempt New Delhi from nuclear trade restriction laws. Under Secretary Burns made supportive public comments, and Assistant Secretaries Rademaker and Boucher will promote the plan to the Nuclear Suppliers Group in Vienna.

Pentagon Plan Would Base "Star Wars" Interceptors In UK. The Financial Times (3/23, Dinmore) reports Pentagon plans call for placing "interceptor missiles… in the UK as part of the US 'Star Wars' missile defence system." The plans are "likely to attract more unwelcome attention for prime minister Tony Blair's government over the nature of the transatlantic relationship." Lt Gen Trey Obering, "head of the Missile Defense Agency, disclosed at a military conference in Washington this week that the US had formally selected Britain as possible site for the interceptors in Europe." But Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said on Wednesday that negotiations had not taken place on basing interceptors in the UK."

Bahamas Trip Seems To Have Achieved Most Of Rice's Goals. The New York Times (3/23, Brinkley, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice's two-day trip to the Bahamas "appeared to have cooled" regional leaders' "anger toward the United States but failed to persuade them to embrace the new government in Haiti." Rice had aimed "to persuade the other Caribbean nations to take forceful steps to help the new Haitian government stabilize the country and deal with its crushing problems. What she got was a commitment to readmit Haiti to the Caribbean Community of nations and a vague promise to help Haiti in the future." The Times says US relations with Caribbean nations "have been strained and embittered for two years" and "she and her aides said they realized that she had to come here to begin turning the situation around."

Senators' Promotion Of Trade, Freedom In Beijing Gets Mixed Reaction. The Washington Post (3/23, D1, Goodman, 744K) reports Senators Tom Coburn, Lindsey Graham and Charles Schumer "came to one of China's most prestigious universities on Wednesday, ostensibly to talk about trade. What they delivered was an expansive, almost evangelical campaign for American values -- one that received pushback from their audience of students and faculty." While touting trade, the senators, in what the Post calls "strikingly moral tones," said they will push Beijing "to liberalize not only its currency regime but also its political culture, using trade as a wedge for broader reform." The Post says this and other US efforts to achieve a free-floating yuan have "backfired in some quarters. Many here resent the specter of the world's lone superpower seemingly attempting to dictate how Beijing should manage its economy and the values that should govern Chinese society." The Post notes the high-level and opulent attention afforded the senators "attests to the gravity of the issue for China's leaders, who are cognizant of the angry mood in Washington." The New York Times (3/23, Kahn, 1.19M) makes a similar point in a story titled "China Tries To Charm Couple Of Senate Skeptics."

USA Today (3/23, Macleod, 2.31M) notes Graham and Schumer "are co-authors of a bill that proposes a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports into the United States unless Beijing revalues its yuan currency at a higher exchange rate to the dollar."

Bush-Hu Meeting Previewed. Bloomberg (3/22) reported spokesman Scott McClellan said Wednesday that Chinese President Hu Jintao will meet President Bush at the White House on April 20 "to discuss the fight against terrorism and halting the spread of nuclear weapons."

China's Competitiveness Said To Have Eroded. Hong Kong-based Li & Fung group, one of the world's largest trade sourcing companies says the competitiveness of China's manufacturing industries has eroded over the past year. The Financial Times (3/23, Mitchell) reports that the firm "said price rises crept back into the Sino-US and EU supply chains last year, after at least six years of often 'severe deflation.' William Fung, Li & Fung managing director, reported an average 2-3 per cent increase in the once unbeatable China price its US and European clients were willing to pay."

China Announces Plans To Raise Taxes. The Chinese government yesterday announced plans to increase existing taxes and impose new ones in an effort to rein in the use of energy and timber and the gap between rich and poor. The New York Times (3/23, Bradsher, 1.19M) reports, "New or higher taxes will fall on vehicles with engines larger than two liters, disposable wooden chopsticks, planks for wood floors, luxury watches, golf clubs, golf balls and certain oil products." China's finance ministry announced the higher taxes Tuesday night in a statement that "offered another sign that some senior Chinese officials may be having second thoughts about the rapid growth of privately owned family vehicles, whose sales rose to 3.1 million last year from just 640,000 in 2000."

The Washington Times (3/23, Spencer, 90K) calls the 5% tax on disposable wooden chopsticks a sign that China's

"growing environmental consciousness has hit the heart of its culture." The Finance Ministry "said chopstick production used up China's forests at a rate of 70 million cubic feet a year, a waste that it wanted to discourage." The Times adds, "A 10 percent tax on golf balls and clubs, part of a wider assault on luxury items, might seem to be unconnected, but there is growing concern in Beijing that many municipal drives to attract business by building golf courses are sacrificing land, trees and water supplies for what remains a relatively tiny market." The five-year plan "is a major effort by the government to reorder China's priorities after 25 years of dramatic economic growth and spread some of the benefits to ordinary people."

Chinese President Offers Advice To Combat Corruption, Cynicism. The communist Party propaganda apparatus has been spreading Chinese President Hu Jintao's advice to "do good and avoid evil" all over China. The Washington Post (3/23, A16, Cody, 744K) reports, "Hu's fatherly advice, in the form of eight do's and don'ts, was issued two weeks ago as an antidote to the corruption and cynicism spreading across China, a result of the often raw capitalism that has emerged during 25 years of dramatic economic change. Although his aphorisms may sound simplistic to Western ears – 'Work hard, don't be lazy' and 'Be honest, not profit-mongering' -- Chinese analysts said they are a response to a deep-seated desire among people here for a moral compass to guide them through the unsettling transformation."

China, Russia Face Talks Over Gas Prices. Beijing and Moscow face tough talks over prices in the wake of this week's announcement of the construction of two pipelines to carry natural gas from Russia to China within five years. The Financial Times (3/23, McGregor, Buckley) reports, "Sergei Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, on Wednesday said Russia would sell the gas to China at the 'market price,' calculated according to the same formula linked to oil and diesel prices as for sales to Europe. But China has balked at signing long-term import gas contracts for the past three years as the price of the resource has risen along with that of oil, outstripping domestic rates which are kept artificially low."

Russia Wants Larger Role In China's Nuclear Industry. Meanwhile, Russia says it wants to play a greater role in china's nuclear power industry. The Wall Street Journal (3/23, Oster, 2.11M) report that Lavrov said yesterday that China "welcomes increased Russian participation in its nuclear-power sector, which is undergoing one of its biggest-ever expansions and one of the biggest nuclear rollouts in the industry's history. China has said it plans to build 30 or more nuclear reactors during the next 15 years. Currently, it has nine reactors at two plants."

Canada To Import Russian Natural Gas To Sell To US. In an effort to capitalize on natural gas shortages, Canada is planning to import liquefied natural gas (LNG) from Russia to be exported the US. The Washington Times (3/23, Mihailescu, 90K) reports, "The Canadian government recently approved a $1.5 billion joint venture of Petro-Canada and Russian giant Gazprom to build a plant near St. Petersburg in Russia to liquefy the gas and load it into giant tanker ships. The tankers would be unloaded in Quebec and the liquid converted back into gas that could be pumped through existing pipeline networks to U.S. customers. … The entire project could cost as much as $2 billion."

Latest Mad Cow Case Won't Affect Beef Talks With Japan. In it "Washington Whispers" column on its web site, the Wall Street Journal (3/22, 2.11M) reported that Japanese Ambassador Ryozo Kato says the discovery this month of a third case of mad cow disease in the US "won't affect the trade negotiations over beef with Japan because the Alabama cow was born before the US changed its animal-feed rules." Kato "declined to give any timetable for Japan to reopen its market, once the biggest for US beef."

State Department Warns Americans About Traveling To Italy This Spring. The State Department yesterday warned Americans to take precautions when traveling in Italy this spring, saying next month's elections will likely bring demonstrations in parts of the country. The AP (3/23) reports, "The department said Americans should avoid areas where crowds are expected to gather, take common sense precautions and closely follow media reports. The US considers Italy to be under a heightened threat by al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists for its participation in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan."

ETA Terrorists Announce "Permanent Cease-Fire." The New York Times (3/23, McLean, 1.19M) reports, "The militant Basque separatist group ETA, which has killed more than 800 people and terrorized Spanish society for nearly 40 years, on Wednesday announced a permanent cease-fire, saying that it would turn its attention to achieving independence for the Basque region of Spain through politics." The Times calls a ceasefire agreement "the paramount objective of successive Spanish governments since the establishment of democracy here in 1977." In a press conference, Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero "said it was important to treat the announcement with caution, echoing concerns of victims' groups, who urged politicians to remember what they described as ETA's history of deceit and unfulfilled promises."

The Financial Times (3/23, Crawford) notes, "ETA made no mention of surrendering or laying down arms. Mr Zapatero told parliament his government had greeted Eta's declaration with caution." The Times also reports, "The plight of the victims of terrorism, as well as ETA's demands for a political process culminating in a referendum on Basque independence, make peace talks particularly tricky for the Spanish government."

The Wall Street Journal (3/23, A4, Johnson, 2.11M) says the announcement opens "the door to what could be a profound change for Spain, much as the 1998 Good Friday agreement ushered in an eventual peace process for Northern Ireland." The Journal notes, "In contrast, the separatist movement in the northeastern region of Catalonia has been more successful at prying powers away from Madrid over the past quarter-century because it never resorted to terrorism, as the ETA often did." The AP (3/23, Letona), AFP (3/23), Wall Street Journal (3/23, Johnson, 2.11M), Los Angeles Times (3/23, Wilkinson, 958K), Washington Post (3/23, A16, Rolfe, Moore, 744K) and Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Ford, 61K) also report the story.

US Charges Colombian Rebels With Cocaine Trafficking. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced yesterday that a federal grand jury has indicted 50 commanders of a Colombian Marxist rebel group, accusing them of running a cocaine trafficking cartel. The New York Times (3/23, Forero, 1.19M) reports, "The indictment accuses the group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States." The Times adds, "The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government."

The Washington Times (3/23, Seper, 90K) reports, "The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, 'strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation,' said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government." Gonzales added that FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking."

UN Reform Effort Could Crumble. The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, LaFranchi, 61K) reports that the UN's effort at reform "risks crumbling into little more than a dashed hope. … Already, some countries see reform's principal promoter, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, as a lame duck: A new secretary-general will be elected later this year. A bigger impediment still is that even more countries harbor old suspicions about those pressing for reform - in particular the United States. These countries also feel scalded by so-far unsuccessful attempts to reform the powerful Security Council." The Monitor adds, "Hopes for the reforms were buoyed by last week's approval of a new human rights council. … But even the human rights reform, which is less bold than some powers including the US had advocated, suggests the difficult road ahead on other issues."

Muhammad Cartoons Spark Grass Roots Education Movement In Saudi Arabia. A diverse group of women, students, businessmen, lawyers and clerics in Saudi Arabia are working to educate non-Muslim co-workers and acquaintances about Islam and the prophet Muhammad. The Washington Post (3/23, A18, Ambah, 744K) reports that the grass roots movement has grown "across the kingdom since January, when anger over cartoons of Muhammad sparked riots in Europe and several Muslim countries." The activists' campaign "includes a continuing economic boycott of Denmark, where the cartoons were first published, and a project to produce television ads about the prophet for broadcast in Europe. College students are attempting to collect 1 million signatures to present to the Danish Embassy, and lawyers are studying ways to make insulting Islam and its prophet illegal."

Political Reform Tops Muslim Brotherhood's Agenda. Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, which at 88 people is the largest opposition bloc in Egpyt's parliament since the monarchy's overthrow in 1952, has put "political reform" and "fighting corruption" at the top of its agenda. The Christian Science Monitor (3/23, Gauch, 61K) reports that "the spotlight is on the Muslim Brotherhood to see how this group adapts religion to their democratic ambitions. … Although the Brotherhood is still a minority in a parliament with overwhelming state party control, they are proving to be a strong, outspoken, and unified force, analysts say.'

Families Of Disappeared Provide Reminders Of Lebanese Civil War. The New York Times (3/23, Fattah, 1.19M) reports that "the families of more than 600 young men and women who disappeared during and after" Lebanon's civil war "have held a vigil in a park downtown for almost a year, demanding that the government investigate their cases. To many of them, the ceremony on Saturday was a signal that a door might be opening on one of the darkest chapters of the bloody civil war." The Times adds, "In a nation struggling to forget the war among its many religious groups, the Palestinians and regional powers, a war that claimed tens of thousands of lives from 1975 to 1990 and demolished half this city, the women are a reminder of how much remains unresolved."

Protesters Demand New Election In Belarus. The New York Times (3/23, Chivers, 1.19M) reports that since the rigged presidential election in Belarus on March 19, the country's capital "has seen a protest like none in 12 years of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's autocratic grip. For four consecutive days, protesters have defied warnings of arrest and bloodshed and stood in a corner of October Square to demand a new race. … The protesters see little chance of changes in government anytime soon."

German Chancellor Will Announce Domestic Agenda Soon. The New York Times (3/23, Bernstein, 1.19M) says German Chancellor Angela Merkel "has clearly made an extremely good impression in the four months since she took office." There is a "strong feeling" that her popularity is "because of her decision to advance very little in the way of a bold domestic agenda. That may be about to change. Three German states have elections on Sunday, after which Mrs. Merkel is expected to start her campaign to win major changes, tackling such chronic problems as high unemployment, economic stagnation and government deficits that exceed norms set for Germany's membership in the European Currency Union. That is when the political storm will stir."

UK Court Upholds School Ban On Muslim Gown. Britain's highest court rules yesterday that a secondary school was within its rights to bar a student from wearing a Muslim gown, known as a jilbab, instead of a regular school uniform. The New York Times (3/23, Lyall, 1.19M) reports, "Overturning a lower court ruling in favor of the student, Shabina Begum, a five-judge panel in the House of Lords pointed out that the school, Denbigh High School in Luton, had already taken great care to make its uniform acceptable to its students, 79 percent of whom are Muslim."

Journalist Says World Should Act In Unison On Hamas. Gideon Lichfield, the Jerusalem correspondent for The Economist, writes in the New York Times (3/23, 1.19M) that even the "most moderate" Palestinian "will rally to defend their democratically elected government if they see countries that profess to love democracy trying to destabilize it. That will reduce domestic pressure on Hamas to pursue peace. And if aid from elsewhere meanwhile props up the Palestinian Authority, Hamas can carry on this way indefinitely, playing countries off against one another." Lichfield adds that "whatever the world does about Hamas, it needs to do it in unison."

WSJournal Says World Does Not Seem Serious About Ending Sudan Conflict. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/23, 2.11M) says that the US is "the only nation with the will and wallet to provide order in an otherwise Hobbesian world. However, that will and wallet are being stretched today in Iraq and elsewhere, and Mr. Bush is rightly wary of committing more American blood and treasure to a conflict in Sudan that the rest of the world doesn't seem serious about ending in any event. One lesson of Darfur is that there really are limits to American power, and in its absence the world's savages have freer reign."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Case For Moussaoui Execution Seems Bolstered By 2 Witnesses (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 22 — The government's effort to have Zacarias Moussaoui executed for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, which has been troubled by serious problems over the last two weeks, appeared to have been bolstered significantly on Wednesday by the testimony of its final two witnesses.

A senior aviation security official at the time of the attacks in 2001 told the jury that several measures could have been put in place that might have foiled the plot if Mr. Moussaoui had disclosed what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans when he was arrested three weeks earlier.

The security official, Robert J. Cammaroto, was followed on the witness stand by Aaron Zebley, an F.B.I. agent at the time of the attacks, whose testimony made similar points about law enforcement.

The detailed testimony of the two witnesses provided the prosecution's strongest presentation to date at the trial, which is being held solely to determine whether Mr. Moussaoui, who has already pleaded guilty, should be executed or remain in jail for the rest of his life. The testimony from the two followed several days of disarray in which the government's case nearly fell apart.

Two F.B.I. officials who testified this week for the prosecution seemed mainly to help the defense by reinforcing the notion that the bureau had dragged its feet in following up leads from agents in the field that Mr. Moussaoui had valuable information about an imminent hijacking plot.

The trial was disrupted last week after the disclosure that a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration had improperly coached aviation security officials about how to testify. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema ruled that because of the actions of the lawyer, Carla J. Martin, the prosecution would be prohibited from calling those witnesses, a crippling blow to the government's case.

Judge Brinkema relented, however, and allowed prosecutors to try to find another, "untainted" aviation security witness to help make their argument. It was Mr. Cammaroto who appeared on the witness stand Wednesday afternoon as that substitute, and he briskly listed the steps the Federal Aviation Administration could have taken in the middle of August 2001 when Mr. Moussaoui was arrested on immigration charges in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner.

At the time, Mr. Cammaroto was the F.A.A.'s official in charge of issuing security directives to United States airlines in response to the latest intelligence reports.

Under questioning by David J. Novak, a prosecutor, Mr. Cammaroto listed a half-dozen ways that airport security could have been increased if he had learned what Mr. Moussaoui acknowledged in his guilty plea last April: that he was an Al Qaeda member and that the group had discussed flying planes into buildings by disabling crews using short-bladed knives that were allowed on planes at the time.

"We could have taken several steps," Mr. Cammaroto said, listing among others the banning of all knives, shifting resources like air marshals to domestic flights, ordering physical "pat-downs" of passengers and making metal detectors more sensitive.

Gerald T. Zerkin, a public defender representing Mr. Moussaoui, suggested in his cross-examination that such security measures could not have been adopted quickly. Mr. Cammaroto acknowledged that the hiring of new air marshals would have taken months. But he said many of the steps could have been put in place within hours, and he cited the foiling of a multiple-plane hijack plot in the Philippines in 1995 as an example.

Mr. Zebley, the former F.B.I. agent, who has not yet been cross-examined, testified that information discovered after the attacks could have provided important leads beforehand. He noted that Mr. Moussaoui had received payments for his flight training from the same person who had sent money to some of the hijackers. He said that had Mr. Moussaoui told investigators at the time of his arrest about his paymaster and his intentions to commit a terrorist act, it would have been easy to trace the other payments made by the same man.

The prosecutors contend that even though Mr. Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks, he is responsible because his lies allowed "his brothers to go forward." Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers, who are to begin making their case next week, have said in papers that the government should not be able to execute someone on the speculative theory that had he provided information, the attacks would not have occurred.

Prosecution Begins Rebuilding Moussaoui Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

If Zacarias Moussaoui had confessed that he was plotting with al-Qaeda to hijack an airplane, federal officials could have drastically boosted airport security in the days before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, an aviation security expert testified yesterday in federal court.

Robert Cammaroto, a Transportation Security Administration official, told jurors at Moussaoui's death penalty trial that the government has long issued urgent warnings to airlines when threats to aviation arise. The knowledge that Moussaoui had trained at an al-Qaeda camp and was conspiring to take over a plane, he said, could have triggered intensified screening of passengers and luggage.

Asked if the government could have scrambled to find the short-bladed knives used by the Sept. 11 hijackers, Cammaroto told prosecutors: "We most certainly could have. That would have been a simple procedure."

The testimony was the initial step in the government's effort to rebuild its case for executing the only person convicted in the United States in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Cammaroto was the first aviation security witness allowed to take the stand since a federal judge barred aviation witnesses and evidence because of misconduct by a government lawyer.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema issued her ruling last week after TSA lawyer Carla J. Martin violated a court order by sharing testimony and coaching witnesses. Brinkema modified the ruling on Friday, allowing the government to call witnesses not tainted by Martin's actions.

The testimony of Cammaroto, chief of commercial airports policy at TSA, is crucial to the government's key argument for Moussaoui's execution: that the Sept. 11 attacks could have been stopped if Moussaoui had not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001. Roughly half the government's case consists of aviation-related evidence.

Cammaroto, a former FAA official, acknowledged on cross-examination that in August 2001, the FAA was aware of al-Qaeda threats to hijack airplanes but had not increased airport security in response.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the hijackings. A federal jury is determining whether he will die.

The aviation testimony came on a day of swirling emotion in the trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. The former manager of an Arizona flight school that trained one of the hijackers recalled how she had expressed alarm about her student to the Federal Aviation Administration -- and then cried after the Sept. 11 attacks when she suspected that he had flown one of the airliners.

Margaret Chevrette said she helped train hijacker Hani Hanjour at Pan Am International Flight Academy in Mesa, Ariz., near Phoenix, from late December 2000 until March 2001. She said that Hanjour was a poor pilot who spoke limited English and that she "worried that he was going to hurt himself or hurt someone else because he didn't have the skills" to fly a large jet.

Chevrette recalled driving to work after learning of the planes flying into buildings on Sept. 11. Investigators soon concluded that Hanjour had piloted the plane that hit the Pentagon.

Something "snapped," Chevrette told jurors.

"I already knew in my heart that Hani was a part of it," Chevrette said. "I remember crying all the way to work, knowing that our company helped do this."

As Chevrette spoke, her voice hoarse and breaking at times, two family members of Sept. 11 victims cried softly in the third row of the courtroom. Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister, Danielle, was killed at the World Trade Center, said later: "I don't blame her. I don't think anyone did anything intentional."

Chevrette said that she reported her concerns to the FAA during Hanjour's training, but that the agency did little in response. She said an FAA official who oversaw her school suggested she get an English interpreter for Hanjour, contrary to the agency's own regulations.

An FAA spokesman declined to comment.

Witness Lists FAA Measures Available For A Pre-9/11 Tip (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

An agency official is the first to give aviation testimony after a federal attorney nearly derailed the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A week after their case nearly imploded amid allegations of witness tampering, federal prosecutors began introducing aviation testimony Wednesday in Zacarias Moussaoui's sentencing trial, hoping to prove that had he cooperated, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks could have been prevented.

Their first witness was Robert Cammaroto, chief of the Federal Aviation Administration's commercial airports policy division at the time of the attacks. He was allowed to testify on a limited basis after revelations last week that a Transportation Security Administration lawyer had improperly coached other federal aviation witnesses on their testimony.

Cammaroto listed security measures that could have been implemented had Moussaoui cooperated with the FBI after he was arrested in Minnesota for visa violations on Aug. 16, 2001.

For two hours, prosecutors methodically walked Cammaroto through his testimony. He told the court how the government could have responded to the Sept. 11 threat, and he offered new details on how the Federal Aviation Administration beefed up security when, in 1995, it was learned that Muslim extremists were plotting to blow up a dozen U.S. airliners over the Pacific Ocean.

Cammaroto spoke with authority and the experience of 25 years in the government security field — starting as an air traffic controller, moving on to become a federal air marshal and rising to a post as one of the FAA's top law enforcement officials.

Asked by Assistant U.S. Atty. David J. Novak how swiftly airport security officials would have reacted had Moussaoui revealed that the Sept. 11 hijackers planned to smuggle small knives aboard planes and then commandeer the cockpits, Cammaroto said:

"It could have been done fairly quickly. In a matter of hours."

But under cross-examination by defense lawyer Gerald T. Zerkin, Cammaroto conceded that in the late summer of 2001, the approach to airport security was far more relaxed than it is today.

Few people envisioned planes being hijacked on suicide missions, he said, and airport gate screening operations were less stringent. Passengers often were permitted to carry aboard such items as folding knives, bottles, screwdrivers and knitting needles.

Indeed, shown a security video of some of the Sept. 11 hijackers easily passing through checkpoints at Washington Dulles International Airport that morning, Cammaroto noted that only seven of the 19 had even been sent to a secondary screening, and none had been denied a seat.

"It seemed an act of desperation to blow yourself up" back then, Cammaroto said.

In the past, he said, hijackings mainly involved planes' diversion to Cuba or ransom demands. "We'd never had an incident where the bomber rode the bomb," he said.

The aviation testimony and evidence are central to the government's argument for executing Moussaoui. Prosecutors seek to convince the jury that Moussaoui knew enough about the Sept. 11 plot to help stop it.

But Moussaoui lied to the FBI and then refused to cooperate, sharply dividing the FBI about what to do with him.

The FBI never sought search warrants to open his belongings and learn more about why he was training on jumbo jet simulators in Minnesota.

The defense maintains that Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to being a Sept. 11 conspirator last April, was a lone operator and never had any direct role or knowledge that four planes were going to be boarded that day, three of which reached targets in New York and Virginia.

With Moussaoui's survival at stake, the government's case nearly fell apart last week when it was discovered that TSA senior attorney Carla J. Martin had improperly influenced seven TSA and FAA witnesses for the government. U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema sharply limited the government's aviation testimony and evidence to just one or two witnesses, making Cammaroto's testimony all the more crucial.

The judge has yet to call Martin into the courtroom to explain her conduct.

Cammaroto described half a dozen security steps the FAA could have taken to try to head off the attacks. He said more officers could have been posted immediately at airport checkpoints, and small knives and other potential weapons could have been confiscated at the gates.

He said planes could have been searched before boarding to make sure previous passengers had not hidden bombs or weapons in overhead baggage bins or in lavatories.

Cammaroto said flight crews could have been warned to keep cockpit doors secure, and new no-fly lists could have been posted to stop the 19 hijackers from boarding planes.

"We could have done much of this in the course of a couple of hours," he said.

He drew a parallel with the "Bojinka" plot, uncovered in 1995 in Manila, in which radical Islamists planned to hide liquid bombs on 12 U.S. planes and detonate them over the Pacific.

Just as they could have done to thwart the Sept. 11 conspiracy, Cammaroto said, officials alerted the airlines about the Bojinka conspiracy, stopped passengers from carrying open drink containers aboard, and sent bomb-sniffing dogs to the Philippines. More thorough pat-downs and other passenger searches also were initiated.

"As our intelligence improved, we were able to refine and refine and refine until we got closer to the mark," he said.

In the end, there were no attacks.

FAA Reportedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concern (AP-Y2)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 23, 2006

A manager at an Arizona flight school that trained one of the Sept. 11 pilot-hijackers testified at the Zacarias Moussaoui trial Wednesday that she called the Federal Aviation Administration with concerns over his qualifications for a pilot license, but her concerns were dismissed by an FAA official.

Margaret Chevrette, manager at the flight school, was testifying in the death-penalty trial of Moussaoui, who has confessed to being an al-Qaida terrorist.

It was the second time this week jurors heard witnesses testify that people in positions of authority in the federal government responded either slowly, negatively — or not at all — to warnings about a possible terrorist attack.

Chevrette said that the school's student, Hani Hanjour, lacked adequate English skills to gain his pilot's license. An FAA official responded to her concerns by suggesting that Hanjour could use an interpreter even though mastery of English is a requirement for a pilot.

Chevrette said that when the Sept. 11 attacks occurred, she knew Hanjour must have been involved.

"I remember crying all the way to work knowing our company helped to do this," she said.

Chevrette said that Hanjour's English was so bad that it took him eight hours to complete an oral exam that should've taken two hours.

Prosecutors in Moussaoui's trial were presenting testimony about the Sept. 11, 2001 pilot-hijackers' training in an apparent effort to show parallels between Moussaoui's flight training and that of other hijackers.

Two other pilot-hijackers from the Sept. 11 attacks abandoned a small airplane on a taxiway of Miami International Airport during their flight training, but their actions didn't attract serious scrutiny from federal officials, another witness said.

Daniel Pursell, a flight instructor at the school where hijackers Mohamed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi received commercial pilot training testified that instructors at the school breathed "a collective sigh of relief" when Atta and al-Shehhi completed their training and left the school.

Pursell said that the Dec. 26, 2000, incident at the Miami airport was one of several problems the school had with the pair.

Pursell said the tower chief at the airport called the Florida school to berate school officials after the plane was left on the runway. The FAA never questioned Atta and al-Shehhi, Pursell said.

During testimony Tuesday, a terrorism supervisor in FBI headquarters dismissed as "hunches and suppositions" a field agent's concerns about Moussaoui in the weeks before Sept. 11.

The supervisor, Michael Rolince, testified that he had not even read an Aug. 18, 2001, memo written by Minneapolis agent Harry Samit, who arrested Moussaoui and was convinced from the outset that Moussaoui was a terrorist with plans to hijack aircraft.

Rolince, who headed the FBI's International Terrorism Operations section, said he was briefed on Moussaoui only twice by a subordinate in hallway conversations lasting less than a minute.

Rolince concluded that the bureau had a long way to go in building a case against Moussaoui, even though Samit had laid out in a nearly 30-page memo his reasons for believing that the bureau had built a sufficient case to launch an all-out investigation and obtain a search warrant for Moussaoui's possessions.

DOJ_NMG_0020091

"What Agent Samit's hunches and suppositions were is one thing," Rolince said. "What we knew was clearly something else."

Samit's memo proved prescient. He correctly predicted two of the six specific charges to which Moussaoui pleaded guilty: plotting international terrorism and air piracy.

Moussaoui is the only person in this country charged in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. He pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack aircraft and other crimes, but he denies any role in Sept. 11. He says he was preparing for a possible future attack on the White House.

The sentencing trial now under way will determine Moussaoui's punishment: death or life in prison.

The FBI's actions in the time between Moussaoui's Aug. 16, 2001, arrest on immigration violations and Sept. 11, 2001, are key issues at Moussaoui's death-penalty trial. Prosecutors allege that if Moussaoui had revealed his plans for a terrorist attack, the FBI could have thwarted or at least minimized the attacks. To obtain a death penalty, prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions caused the death of at least one person on Sept. 11.

The defense argues that nothing Moussaoui said after his arrest would have made any difference to the FBI because its bureaucratic intransigence rendered it incapable of reacting swiftly to Moussaoui's arrest under any circumstances.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema limited the scope of Rolince's testimony after the defense objected that he was trying to describe what the FBI would have done if it had known about Moussaoui's terrorist ties.

The defense argued that speculative testimony based on a hypothetical confession by Moussaoui unfairly implied that Moussaoui had some obligation to confess.

Brinkema allowed some limited hypothetical questioning but advised the jury: "Juries cannot decide cases on speculation. ... Nobody knows what would have happened."

Moussaoui Could Have Sparked Anti-terror Blitz : US Officials (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

An aviation policy chief and an FBI terrorist hunter said the US government could have launched a pre-September 11 security blitz had Zacarias Moussaoui admitted Al-Qaeda planned to use airliners as missiles.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified in Moussaoui's death penalty trial that information from Moussaoui, arrested weeks before the world's deadliest terror strike in 2001, could have pinpointed Al-Qaeda financiers and alerted investigators terror cells were poised to strike.

Robert Cammarato, in charge of issuing government security directives to the airlines in 2001, said such data could prompted new security measures, sent air marshals from international to domestic flights and helped uncover the small knives used by September 11 hijackers.

Prosecutors called both witnesses in a bid to prove that Moussaoui's should be executed because his "lies" gave the September 11 suicide crews time to pull off their spectacular attacks, which killed nearly 3,000 people.

They showed Zebley a Statement of Facts, in which the Frenchman pleaded guilty last year to plotting with Al-Qaeda to fly planes into US buildings -- more than three years after he was accused of such a crime.

Just the fact that he was admitted Al-Qaeda member would have been enough to set of a nationwide search for accomplices, Zebley testified.

An admission that he was a trainee pilot would have sent agents to flight schools to track other would-be attackers and information on Al-Qaeda financiers could have helped them follow the money to those behind the plot.

"It was very specific information we could have run with," Zebley told the jury.

Cammarato, currently chief of commercial airports policy at the Transportation Safety Administration (TSA), said that in 2001, security experts believed hijackers were most likely to strike US airlines overseas, and there was no indication that "martyrdom operations" were in the offing.

"At that time we believed that a bombing situation would not involve a suicide aspect. There were no (scenarios) at the time, where the bomber rode the bomb," he said.

But information from Moussaoui could have alerted airport security staff to look for suicide pilots, and also to keep an eye out for small knives, later found in his belongings, which were also used on September 11.

Defence lawyers sought to blunt Cammarato's testimony by getting him to detail many changes in aviation security pre-and post-September 11, and cast doubt on prosecution claims a security overhaul could have quickly done.

Earlier, the manager of a US flight school told of the terrible moment she realised she helped to train Hani Hanjour, the September 11 hijacker who slammed a plane into the Pentagon.

"I knew in my heart that Hani was part of it," an emotional Peggy Chevrette said.

"On 9/11 my husband told me that a plane had gone into one of the Twin Towers, then before I left for work the second plane went in."

"On my way to work, the third plane had gone into the Pentagon. I just remembered crying all the way into work knowing that our company helped to do this."

Chevrette, manager of a Phoenix, Arizona flight school, said she phoned the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) three times to express concerns that Hanjour's English and piloting skills that were so bad she thought he would injure himself or others. But no action was taken, she said.

On one occasion, the jury heard, Mohammed Atta, ringleader of the September 11 hijackers, stranded a small single engine plane on a taxiway at the Miami International Airport -- forcing a large jet to take avoiding action.

Prosecutors appeared to be hoping to tie Moussaoui's own quest to learn to fly in 2001 in Oklahoma and Minnesota to the hijackers' training.

But the testimony may also help prosecutors, because it shows that the hijackers sometimes bizarre antics in the air, as they learned to fly in the United States, did not lead to government action.

Moussaoui has said he was not part of the September 11 plot but was to take part in a follow up wave of attacks on the White House.

If he escapes the death penalty, he will get life in prison, without parole.

Impact Of Detainee Act Debated In Court (WP)

By Josh White

Bush administration lawyers argued yesterday that a new law forces the dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in federal courts on behalf of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, urging a federal appellate court to instead adopt a far more limited process that still would give the prisoners access to judicial review.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit will decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 retroactively stripped the court of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus cases challenging detentions at the military prison in Cuba. Lawyers representing the detainees argued that the new law does not apply to pending cases, while the government has maintained that all cases essentially should be wiped away.

The Detainee Treatment Act was designed to pull what some senators believe are frivolous cases out of U.S. courts and instead grant detainees two other options: access to the federal appeals court to challenge the military determination that they are "enemy combatants" and the right to appeal verdicts reached in future military trials.

The three-judge appellate panel questioned government lawyers about the authority the court actually would have in its limited review role. Judge Judith W. Rogers asked whether the court would have the power to order a detainee's release if it found problems with a detainee's enemy combatant status as determined by a military Combatant Status Review Tribunal.

"Yes, subject to a few qualifications," said Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer. Katsas said the Defense Department would have the option of fixing any flawed process first. "If a CSRT determination is made, and that is that he is not an enemy combatant, that person is turned loose."

Judge A. Raymond Randolph likened the new court review process to a modification of habeas corpus rather than its abolition but said he sees no remedy for detainees in the new law. He said the new law appeared to shift habeas cases from the District Court to the Court of Appeals.

Thomas B. Wilner, who was arguing on behalf of the detainees, said he would not object if the cases were transferred from one court to another.

But he said he worries that the law is unclear and might restrict the court from truly examining the facts of a detainee's combatant status.

Currently, the military is holding 10 detainees at Guantanamo Bay who have been cleared for release, and federal courts have been powerless to order them freed. There are about 490 detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

In a related matter, the Uyghur American Association is planning to file a brief with the the Supreme Court today supporting the release of two countrymen who remain at Guantanamo Bay despite having been cleared of ties to terrorism by the U.S. military. A U.S. District Court judge recently found that there is nothing to support holding the two Chinese Muslims but said he has no authority to order their release.

Attorneys for the Uighurs have taken the unusual step of asking the Supreme Court to rule before the appellate court enters a judgment, arguing that their clients uniquely face indefinite detention even though they are innocent.

In a draft of the brief provided to The Washington Post, the UAA urges the court to allow the Uighur detainees to join the Uighur community in the Washington area, where they would live in a form of parole.

Uighurs have been battling Beijing for a separate homeland in China and face torture or execution if repatriated there, according to the U.S. government. But U.S. officials have been unwilling to release the Uighurs in the United States and have not been able to find another country to accept them.

Also yesterday, Pentagon officials said that they are considering issuing a written instruction to military commissions at Guantanamo Bay that would formally ban the use of evidence obtained from detainees by torture in upcoming trials.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said prosecutors have agreed not to use such evidence, but officials are developing language to put it in writing.

Court To Decide Future Of Detainees' Suits (AP)

By TONI LOCY, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Faced with hundreds of claims by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, a federal appeals court pressed the Bush administration on Wednesday to say how much power judges will have to determine the legality of the detentions.

The three-judge panel is being asked to decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act, signed by President Bush on Dec. 30, retroactively voids hundreds of lawsuits by abolishing a right to challenge detentions that has been part of U.S. legal principles since the nation's founding.

Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph seemed willing to accept the administration's view that the act forces dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in U.S. District Court here on behalf of over 300 detainees.

But no one on the panel appeared to agree with the administration's take on what would happen next if detainees sought to essentially transfer their challenges to the appeals court.

Under the act, detainees can file petitions challenging determinations by military tribunals that they are "enemy combatants" who can be held without charges indefinitely. Those appeals must be filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

For the three judges, the big issue was how much power they and their fellow appeals court judges will have to examine the detainees' claims.

Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer, argued that judges would be limited to reviewing the sufficiency of the administrative hearings held by the military because the detainees - who are aliens held outside the United States - have no rights under the Constitution.

Sentelle was incredulous. He reminded Katsas of a 2004 Supreme Court decision that cleared the way for detainees to file court challenges to their detentions.

"You are saying that every single one of their claims are going to fail," Sentelle said. "You are saying that all the Supreme Court did ... was give (detainees) a right to file a piece of paper that cannot possibly grant release."

Judge Judith W. Rogers pushed Katsas to tell her whether the appeals court could order a detainee's release if it found that the military's hearing was flawed.

When Katsas launched into a lengthy answer, Sentelle became impatient and told the lawyer to answer yes or no.

Sentelle said the panel wanted to know whether the act says "turn him loose," if the appellate court finds problems in the military's proceedings.

Katsas said, "The short answer is yes." But he qualified it, saying the Defense Department would have the power to hold an administrative hearing to correct any deficiencies found by the appeals court.

The administration has claimed it indefinitely can hold detainees, even those who are acquitted of war crimes.

Only 10 detainees have been charged with terrorism and war crimes. Nearly 500 detainees are held at the Guantanamo Bay prison, which opened in January 2002 to hold suspected al-Qaida and Taliban operatives.

Thomas B. Wilner, a lawyer for the detainees, said he would support the detainee act if it allowed the appeals court to conduct in-depth reviews of the circumstances of a detainee's capture and detention.

Stephen H. Oleskey, who also represents detainees, told the panel that the administration does not want judges to delve too deeply into whether evidence used to hold prisoners was obtained by torture.

Meantime, a Pentagon official said Wednesday the Defense Department is considering a written rule barring use of evidence obtained by torture at criminal trials by military commission.

Until now, Pentagon officials had considered a written rule unnecessary because military prosecutors had promised such evidence would not be used at trial.

The Detainee Treatment Act was a compromise reached among Sens. Carl Levin, D-Mich., Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to address criticism over the military's interrogations tactics and the lengthy detentions at Guantanamo.

Wilner said in court papers that Congress overstepped its authority and can bar legal challenges to detention only in cases of "rebellion" or "invasion."

"There is no rebellion or invasion," he wrote.

Ex-Juror Sees Flaws In Terror Plot Case (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A juror released today from duty in a federal terrorism trial said prosecutors have so far failed to prove the case against a 23-year-old Lodi man accused of attending a Pakistan training camp.

"I don't think at this point in time the government has made its case," said juror Andrea Clabaugh, 37, a Sacramento engineering company account manager.

The fact that the ex-juror remains unconvinced of guilt this late in the game is bad news for prosecutors, who expect to wrap up their case against Hamid Hayat and his father, Lodi ice cream vendor Umer Hayat, 48, early next week. The defense, which plans to present its own slate of expert witnesses, has yet to begin.

The younger Hayat is accused of attending a training camp in Pakistan's Northwest Frontier province in late 2003. Both men are accused of lying to federal agents about the camp.

Clabaugh said she was troubled by the way FBI agents appeared to "badger" defendant Hamid Hayat during a videotaped late-night interrogation last year at the end of which Hayat admitted attending a training camp in 2003.

"I felt that in some respects he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything," Clabaugh said. She said the agents appeared to be "feeding names" to Hayat.

"I didn't see him volunteering anything," Clabaugh said.

Clabaugh was dismissed shortly before noon today in a delayed ruling by U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. During the jury selection process, the juror failed to disclose that she once dated a Sacramento law enforcement officer. Calling it an oversight, she later volunteered the information and the judge decided to remove her from the panel.

Excused Juror Would Vote Innocent In Terror Case (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 23, 2006

A juror in the trial of Hamid Hayat on terror-related charges who was excused Wednesday said as she left the federal courthouse that, if she had to decide now, she would vote to acquit the Lodi man.

Andrea Clabaugh of Carmichael was excused after sitting as a member of the panel hearing the case against Hayat for nearly six weeks.

When the jury was chosen on Feb. 15, she forgot about dating a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy in 1995. Two weeks ago she recalled it and informed U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. and the attorneys. Defense lawyers wanted her replaced with an alternate at that time, but Burrell refused.

On Wednesday, after thinking about it for two weeks, the judge changed his mind.

"Beyond a reasonable doubt hasn't been proven at this point," Clabaugh, 39, said in a hallway interview with reporters.

The government is nearing the end of its case.

Prosecution of the 23-year-old Hayat is built primarily on a videotaped admission to FBI agents that he attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and initially lied about it when questioned by agents, and on secretly recorded conversations he had with Naseem Khan, an FBI informant.

"I felt like he was being badgered" by FBI agents, Clabaugh said of the confession. "I felt like he was giving them information because they refused to believe he didn't know anything. It seemed like he was fed names by the agents. It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything."

Regarding the conversations with Khan, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid who wanted to impress an older man, but it doesn't mean those were things he would actually follow through on."

She was referring to Hayat's statements to Khan that he wanted to attend a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and then fight jihad, or holy war, against the enemies of Islam. At the time of the 2003 conversations, Hayat was 20 and Khan was 29.

"As of this moment, the government has not proven its case to me," said Clabaugh, an account manager for a Sacramento structural engineering firm.

Excused Juror In Lodi Terror Case Skeptical About Alleged Confession (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 23, 2006

(03-22) 12:20 PST SACRAMENTO -- A juror excused today from the terrorism trial of a 23-year-old Lodi man said outside court that the government had not proved its point and expressed skepticism about an alleged confession that a prosecutor described as the "meat of the case."

"Beyond a reasonable doubt -- that hasn't been proven in my opinion," said Andrea Clabaugh, a 39-year-old Carmichael resident who works as an accounting manager at a structural engineering firm in Sacramento.

She said the judge in the federal trial had excused her after she disclosed that she had briefly dated a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy in 1995. Clabaugh had not made the disclosure during jury selection.

She was on the jury that will decide the fate of Hamid Hayat, who is accused of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in late 2003 in his family's homeland of Pakistan. He is also charged with initially lying to FBI agents about it.

Hayat's 48 year-old father is being tried in the same courtroom on charges of lying, but in front of a separate jury.

Clabaugh expressed reservations about a five-hour videotaped confession that Hayat gave FBI agents last June after returning from a two-year trip to Pakistan. Prosecutors have described it as a clear admission of guilt.

Defense attorneys say Hayat never went to a training camp but, when pressured by agents, lied in an attempt to be helpful.

"In my notes, I recall writing down something about the agents feeding him names," Clabaugh said. "It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything.

"During those interrogations, it looked like he was being badgered," she said. "It felt to me that in some respects he was giving them information because they didn't believe him when he said he didn't know anything. He had to tell them something."

Clabaugh said she had mixed feelings about the government's key witness, a 32-year-old informant named Naseem Khan who befriended Hayat in the summer of 2002 before secretly recording their conversations. At times, the conversations delved into anti-American sentiments.

Khan "was just doing the job he was hired to do," Clabaugh said.

However, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid (Hayat) who wanted to impress an older man. If he wanted to impress him, he'd have lots of opinions to share. It doesn't mean those are things that he would follow through on."

Clabaugh said Khan "did not either help or hurt the case."

As for Hayat, she said, he "doesn't look like someone I'd want to know."

"I've seen that this young man was interested in hurting possibly the U.S. or enemies of Islam," she said. "But I haven't seen anything to indicate he did anything they would have us believe he did."

Neither prosecutors nor defense attorneys would comment on Clabaugh's remarks.

Prosecutors have not completed presenting witnesses, and were in the midst of questioning an expert on Pakistani affairs when Clabaugh was dismissed. The defense has not yet presented its case.

Juror Leaves Terror Trial, Says Government Hasn't Proven Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 23, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A juror who was dismissed Wednesday from the federal terrorism trial of a father and son from Lodi said prosecutors have so far failed to prove that the younger man attended an al-Qaida training camp.

Andrea Clabaugh, 39, was dismissed after revealing that she once dated a law enforcement official. Outside court, she told reporters that prosecutors had succeeded in portraying 23-year-old Hamid Hayat as anti-American but not as a trained terrorist.

"They've shown that Hamid was interested in acting against America and those ideas and thoughts, but they haven't proven that he actually attended a camp, that he took weapons training and that he (intended) to come back here and do anything," said Clabaugh, who lives in the Sacramento suburb of Carmichael. "At this point in time, I do not think the government has proven its case."

Her comments come as the government nears the end of its case against Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver.

Both men are accused of lying to the FBI about the son's suspected attendance at a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003. Hamid Hayat also faces charges of providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp.

Prosecutors allege that he was awaiting orders to attack hospitals, banks and grocery stores after returning to the U.S. in May 2005. The Hayats were arrested in June and have pleaded not guilty. They are being tried at the same time but before separate juries.

Clabaugh, who sat on Hamid Hayat's jury, said she was removed because she dated a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy 11 years ago. She said she didn't recall that detail or consider it relevant during jury selection.

She told U.S. District Court Judge Garland Burrell Jr. about the relationship two weeks ago. He kept her on Hamid Hayat's jury but reconsidered and removed her Wednesday. She was immediately replaced with an alternate juror who has heard all the evidence.

Prosecutors and defense attorneys declined comment on the statements by Clabaugh, who said she does not know if other jurors share her views.

The government's case is built on confessions the Hayats gave separately during videotaped FBI interrogations and conversations Hamid Hayat had with an FBI informant who was secretly recording their discussions.

The Hayats' attorneys have argued that the confessions were made only after their clients were exhausted by hours of interrogation and were merely telling the agents what they thought they wanted to hear.

"I don't find the FBI interrogation damning. I felt like the FBI was leading," Clabaugh said. "Hamid was worn out and tired, and I could easily see where someone in that situation would tell them what they wanted to hear so they would be done."

She said the government's informant, a 32-year-old convenience store worker from Oregon named Naseem Khan, also asked Hamid Hayat leading questions. Those questions focused on jihad, the Arabic term for holy war, as well as anti-American Pakistani political parties.

Clabaugh said she believed the questioning was meant to entrap the younger Hayat.

"Naseem Khan seemed to be the one who brought up the relevant topics the majority of the time," Clabaugh said. "Hamid Hayat could have been trying to impress this older man who was interested in this topic. I didn't see any proof."

The FBI began focusing on the Pakistani community in Lodi, an agricultural center about 35 miles south of Sacramento, shortly after the September 2001 terrorist attacks.

Khan arrived in December 2001, shortly after being recruited by the government. He began attending the local mosque, told area Muslims he worked for a computer company and struck up a friendship with Hamid Hayat.

Two local Muslim clerics were later deported to Pakistan on immigration violations but were never charged criminally in the federal government's probe.

Among the evidence presented by prosecutors is a scrapbook kept by Hamid Hayat. The book was full of Pakistani newspaper and magazine articles praising Afghanistan's Taliban government and Osama bin Laden. Many of the articles also expressed anti-American sentiments.

But Clabaugh said keeping such a scrapbook didn't seem unusual for someone who spent half his life in Pakistan and whose grandfather is a well-known political and religious figure there. Hamid Hayat is a U.S. citizen and his father is a naturalized citizen.

"It doesn't mean he's guilty, in my opinion. It means he's interested," Clabaugh said.

She said she was disappointed to leave the jury after spending four weeks hearing testimony.

"I would have liked to have seen it through," she said.

Also Wednesday, prosecutors presented an expert on Pakistani extremist groups in an attempt to give jurors background about the country's politics and Muslim culture.

They intend to complete their case early next week by introducing satellite photographs of a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. Defense attorneys say the government has no hard evidence that the younger Hayat actually attended the camp.

Hamid Hayat is being tried on three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

His father faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to the FBI.

California Town Is Latest Site Of U.S. Terrorism Prosecution (WP)

Allegation of 'Material Support' Was Used in Other Cases

LODI, Calif. -- Naseem Khan blended right into the Pakistani community when he moved to this quiet farming area south of Sacramento. An immigrant who spoke Pashto and Urdu, he had lived there briefly once before, made friends easily and attended the local mosque.

Today, Khan's anonymity is long gone. The convenience store clerk-turned-FBI informant is the star prosecution witness in the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat, a father and son accused, respectively, of supporting terrorism and lying about it to the government.

Hamid Hayat, 23, faces charges of providing material support to terrorists for allegedly attending an al-Qaeda training camp in Pakistan, as well as for lying to investigators during an interrogation. In a joint trial, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice cream vendor, is accused of making false statements to the FBI to protect his son. Hamid Hayat faces as much as 39 years in prison; his father, 16.

The case is built on Khan's infiltration of Lodi's small Pakistani community from 2002 to 2005. Earlier this month, prosecutors put Khan, 32, on the stand, where he told jurors that Hamid Hayat had talked about attending a training camp. Jurors also saw videotapes of both defendants first denying and then admitting to investigators that Hamid Hayat had attended the camp.

But last week, Khan shocked observers of the trial by asserting that al-Qaeda's second-in-command had passed through Lodi in 1998 or 1999, raising doubts about his credibility that the defense has begun to exploit.

The Lodi case is the latest in a string of prosecutions brought since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks under a law that criminalizes providing "material support" to terrorists.

The government's success with the previously obscure statute has been mixed. It has won convictions in high-profile cases in Northern Virginia, in Lackawanna, N.Y., and in the New York City trial of radical lawyer Lynne Stewart. It has lost prosecutions in Detroit, Idaho and Tampa.

The Lodi case provides a rare, detailed look at how one FBI informant functioned and raises questions about the effectiveness of the government's strategy of infiltrating the community with an outsider.

Defense lawyers say their clients' arrests were made in desperation because there wasn't any real terrorist activity to find in Lodi. They contend that Hamid Hayat was given to grandiose exaggerations. At trial, they played hours of the videotaped FBI interrogation, which appears to show the two men, whose English was limited, agreeing with FBI agents instead of offering information.

"They were after big fish," Umer Hayat's attorney, Johnny L. Griffin III, said of investigators. "They couldn't get the big fish, and they had to get someone."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Ferris declined to comment.

The FBI paid Khan more than $200,000 to move to Lodi, a city of 56,000, according to court testimony. He took an apartment near the Lodi Muslim Mosque and befriended Hamid Hayat, a lean young man with a black goatee, imperfect English skills and few friends. Hayat had a sixth-grade education and followed Pakistani politics, including the movements of radicals, court testimony has shown.

Khan visited the Hayat home at least a dozen times and had lengthy phone conversations with Hamid Hayat, which he secretly recorded. Transcripts of those calls reveal that Khan talked with Hayat about girls, cricket and, over time, politics and terrorism. Khan feigned a radical streak and an interest in jihad.

In 2003, Hamid Hayat went to Pakistan but kept in touch with Khan. In transcripts of their phone calls, he told Khan that he planned to attend a militant training camp but sheepishly admitted he had not yet done so. Khan encouraged him, saying, "Be a man" and "You're wasting time."

"I was just making conversation with him," Khan told Hamid Hayat's lawyer at the trial this month. Under further questioning, Khan acknowledged that Hayat never told him he had attended the camp -- only that he would go in the future.

Under FBI interrogation, Hayat first denied, then acknowledged, that he had spent months at a training camp near Rawalpindi, Pakistan, that he said was run by al-Qaeda.

In June 2005, Hayat returned to the United States and was brought in for questioning. His father accompanied him, and both were arrested. They have been in jail ever since.

While Hamid Hayat was in Pakistan, Khan befriended two imams of the Lodi mosque, according to court testimony. They soon became suspicious and warned others to avoid him.

Several days after the Hayats were arrested, the two imams and one of their sons were detained on immigration violations. They were deported but not criminally charged.

One of the imams had been in conflict with another over the construction of a Muslim religious school. Some in Lodi suspect that political opponents reported the imams to the FBI.

Across the street from the Lodi mosque on a recent afternoon, children played basketball while men in traditional Pakistani dress watched over them or milled around the entrance to the mosque, a low-slung yellow building in a ramshackle neighborhood of single-family houses.

Taj Khan, a local activist and a 25-year resident of Lodi, said the investigation and prosecutions have wreaked havoc on the community. "People are scared. People are having nightmares, I'm being told," said Khan, who is not related to the FBI informant.

Taj Khan was part of a cross-cultural effort that sought to build bridges between Christians, Jews and Muslims in a town in which the Pakistani community dates to the 1930s. "This event has put a big lid on all that," he said. "This thing has set us back quite a few years."

Naseem Khan's credibility suffered a blow last week when he maintained he had seen al-Qaeda's second-ranking leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, at the mosque in 1998 or 1999 -- a statement that Brian Jenkins, an authority on terrorism at Rand Corp., calls "far-fetched."

FBI documents released last week show that Khan first made the assertion when agents approached him in 2001. At that time, Khan also told the FBI that he had seen Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, a suspect in a 1996 Saudi Arabia bombing, in Lodi, and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, a suspect in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, in Stockton, Calif., in 1999.

Terrorism experts believe that none of those suspects was in the United States at that time, though al-Zawahiri is known to have passed through the country on a fundraising trip in 1993.

The misstep for the prosecution shows one of the possible pitfalls of using confidential informants in terrorism cases, said Robert M. Chesney, a law professor at Wake Forest University in North Carolina.

"The FBI has been correctly critiqued for not having agents from these communities," he said. "Since they don't have them, they're going to informants . . . and with informants you often have credibility problems."

Chesney cautioned that "having an unexpected but clearly wrong thing being said doesn't help, but it's not dispositive, either." The videotaped confessions are still strong evidence, he said.

"I'm not a betting man, but if I was, I certainly wouldn't bet on the jury discounting confessions unless they've got some fairly specific facts that show their wills were overcome," he said.

Cuban Exile Militant Luis Posada Denied Release (MH)

By Oscar Corral

The Miami Herald, March 23, 2006

The U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, who has been detained in a federal immigration facility since May, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The government's decision was made public today, about a week shy of a 180-day deadline for deciding his custody status.

Posada, who is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98, was detained in Miami by federal authorities last May after sneaking into the United States.

"Following a routine custody review, as required by regulation, ICE has issued Mr. Posada an Interim Decision to Continue Detention," ICE said in a written statement. ``This letter advises Mr. Posada that his custody status has been reviewed, and it has been determined that he will not be released from the custody of ICE at this time. This interim decision is based on a review of Mr. Posada's case and consideration of the information Mr. Posada and his attorney submitted to ICE's reviewing officials."

Posada's lawyer, Eduardo Soto, told the Herald late last week that he planned to appeal -- through a writ of habeas corpus -- if the government decided not to free his client.

ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba.

"As appropriate, ICE will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries," the statement noted. ``ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States. While an immigration judge granted Mr. Posada deferral of removal to Cuba and Venezuela based on the Convention Against Torture (CAT), that does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

Cuban Militant To Stay In U.S. Custody (AP)

By CURT ANDERSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

A Cuban militant accused of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner will remain in U.S. immigration custody for the foreseeable future, but efforts to deport him to a country willing to accept him will continue, officials say.

Luis Posada Carriles was arrested in Miami in May after illegally entering the United States through Mexico. He is being held by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in El Paso, Texas.

ICE issued a statement saying that Posada will not be released from its custody "at this time" and that further review was needed to determine where he could be sent.

A federal immigration judge ruled last fall that Posada could not be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, citing the possibility he could be tortured.

That prohibition, according to the ICE statement, "does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

Posada's attorney in Miami, Eduardo Soto, said the agency's decision appears to be an attempt to keep Posada in custody indefinitely without just cause and that he plans to ask a federal court to free him.

"Obviously, this is going to come to a head very quickly here," Soto said. "They've got to show some likelihood that he is going to a third country or they have to release him."

His lawyers have said they want assurances that any third country would not then send him to Cuba or Venezuela.

Posada, a former CIA operative and a fervent foe of Cuban President Fidel Castro, is accused by Cuba and Venezuela of plotting the 1976 bombing while living in Venezuela. He has denied involvement in the bombing, which killed 73 people.

Posada escaped from a Venezuelan prison in 1985 while awaiting retrial on the airline bombing charges, and Venezuela has formally sought his extradition. He also has been linked to a series of 1997 bombings in Cuba, one of which killed an Italian tourist.

In 2004, Posada and three others were pardoned by Panama's president for their alleged roles in a plot to assassinate Castro during a conference in Panama in 2000. Some Cuban-Americans consider him a freedom fighter.

Meanwhile, a federal judge has ordered the U.S. Marshals Service to deliver Posada to Fort Lauderdale for the May trial of one of his close associates. Santiago Alvarez faces federal weapons charges involving a cache of machine guns, a grenade launcher, explosives and silencers.

US To Keep Cuban Airline Bombing Suspect In Custody (AFP-Y2)

The US authorities said that Luis Posada Carriles, who is wanted in Venezuela for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner, would remain in US custody even though he has been ordered expelled.

The United States refuses to send Posada Carriles, a radical opponent of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and a former CIA agent, to Cuba or Venezuela citing fears that he would be tortured.

But it has also failed to find another third country that would accept Posada Carriles, 78, who is currently detained at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) centre in El Paso, Texas.

"Following a routine custody review, as required by regulation, ICE has issued Mr. Posada an interim decision to continue detention," said an ICE statement.

"This letter advises Mr. Posada that his custody status has been reviewed and it has been determined that he will not be released from the custody of ICE at this time."

The agency said it "will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries.

"ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States."

A judge ruled in September that Posada Carriles could not be sent to Cuba or Venezuela, in a decision based on the International Convention on Torture which prohibits extraditions to countries where there is a pattern of torture or flagrant human rights abuses.

Cuban and Venezuelan authorities have accused the US government of harbouring a known terrorist.

Posada Carriles was detained in Venezuela in 1976 following the bombing of a Cubana airlines plane that left 73 people dead.

DOJ_NMG_0020101

In 1985 he fled a Venezuelan prison and turned up in El Salvador where he helped the US government ferry supplies to "Contra" rebels in Nicaragua.

He is accused of taking part in numerous plots to kill Castro, including one to assassinate the Cuban leader during an Ibero-American summit in Panama in 2000.

He was jailed for eight years in Panama but was pardoned last year and appeared to be laying low until reports began circulating that he had entered the United States.

In mid-April, he officially requested political asylum in the United States, putting the US government in an embarrassing situation because of his past activities.

Posada Won't Go Free; May Be Witness (MH)

By Oscar Corral And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 23, 2006

Enforcement statement

The U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, detained in a federal immigration facility in Texas since May, but he may be heading to South Florida anyway, according to court records.

A U.S. district judge has authorized lawyers for Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, two friends of Posada who were arrested last year on federal weapons charges, to have Posada brought to South Florida by federal marshals in the next few weeks as a potential witness in the case. Trial is set for May 8.

Posada "should be transported here sometime before the trial commences," said Arturo Hernandez, one of Alvarez's lawyers. ``As long as he is needed he will be here."

U.S. District Judge James Cohn signed the authorization for Posada's temporary transfer Friday. Posada is expected to help the defense lawyers' strategy to discredit a key government witness in the high-profile weapons case -- a witness they suspect of being an agent for communist Cuba who informed on the two defendants for the FBI.

The decision by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement not to free Posada from custody was made public Wednesday -- about a week shy of a 180-day deadline for deciding his custody status, said Posada lawyer Eduardo Soto.

Posada, who is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98, was detained in Miami by federal authorities last May after sneaking into the United States. Venezuela wants Posada extradited to face charges for the jetliner tragedy. U.S. officials have yet to respond to that request.

Last year, an immigration judge ruled that the U.S. government cannot hand over Posada to either Cuba or Venezuela because he could be tortured. That leaves ICE with the option of finding a third country that's willing to take in Posada, who once worked for the CIA.

TRYING AGAIN

Soto said he plans to file a demand for Posada's release in federal court in Miami ``within the next 72 hours."

Soto maintains that the government can only keep Posada detained if officials can show that he is a danger to society or is likely to flee -- both situations the lawyer says are not not plausible.

"The only person that has to fear Luis Posada Carriles is Fidel Castro," Soto said.

ICE spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez declined to comment when asked why Posada's release had been denied.

ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba. But Soto said that, to his knowledge, no third country has been identified as a potential destination for Posada.

"As appropriate, ICE will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries," ICE noted in its statement. ``ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States. While an immigration judge granted Mr. Posada deferral of removal to Cuba and Venezuela based on the Convention Against Torture (CAT), that does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

CUBAN AGENT WITNESS?

Meanwhile, new court filings in the case of Alvarez and Mitat show that the government informant who tipped the FBI to the weapons cache, Gilberto Abascal, is expected to be the central witness for federal prosecutors. Defense attorneys say Abascal was an agent for Cuban leader Fidel Castro, who called for Alvarez's arrest in a speech just two days before he was brought into custody last November.

In seeking potential evidence from the government, the defense lawyers claim ``the FBI has documents that show that Cuba possessed information about Alvarez well before his arrest.

"They show that Cuba had inside information through an unregistered agent [Abascal] about a declared enemy [Alvarez]," wrote Hernandez, one of Alvarez's attorneys. ``The defense is entitled to this evidence that proves that Abascal is Cuba's inside man and that his testimony cannot be trusted."

Indeed, a major part of the defense's strategy will be to discredit Abascal.

"He's not a person to be believed, and he will be completely discredited at trial," Mitat's attorney, Dennis Kainen, said of Abascal.

Soto said that Alvarez's lawyers consulted with him before asking Posada to testify. Soto said Posada may be able to benefit from coming to South Florida because it could make it easier for Soto to argue for a change of venue for Posada if he is already here.

Alvarez and Mitat's legal strategy seems to be partly focused on political arguments to help free the men, who are charged with having machine guns, grenade launchers and other illegal guns. Alvarez and Mitat's attorneys argue that the FBI may have used Cuban intelligence to nab the two men.

"Sadly, the FBI and Castro's regime have a well-documented and regrettable history in this community," the defense's motion seeking evidence states, noting that "the FBI paid Cuban double agent, Juan Pablo Roque, over $6,720.42 for information regarding exile organizations" -- information that later led to the 1996 downing of the Brothers to the Rescue planes and the death of three Cuban-Americans and a Cuban exile.

Barring Evidence From Torture Is Considered (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

WASHINGTON, March 22 — The Defense Department is considering a formal rule prohibiting the introduction of evidence obtained through torture at military tribunals for terror suspects detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, a Pentagon spokesman said Wednesday.

At present, the introduction of evidence gained through torture is not expressly prohibited, although military prosecutors have said that such evidence would not be permitted.

While Pentagon and military officials insist that the rules for detention of terror suspects at Guantánamo already bar torture, lawyers for some detainees have said that some of the more extreme interrogation measures are tantamount to torture.

"We have not, to this point, believed that a specific commission rule was necessary, and in fact to some degree would erroneously suggest that torture had actually occurred," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

At a morning meeting with reporters, Mr. Whitman said the Defense Department had decided to consider a "formal instruction" banning evidence gathered through torture, to "eliminate any doubt from people's minds."

Mr. Whitman said the department was honoring Article 15 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture.

The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday that the new rule would be released this week, although Mr. Whitman said no final decision had been made.

The Supreme Court has deferred action on the Bush administration's motion to dismiss a case challenging the constitutionality of the tribunals, officially called military commissions, that the government has established to try terror suspects now being held at the United States naval base at Guantánamo.

The justices agreed in November, over administration objections, to hear the case, and scheduled arguments for next week.

Defense Department May Formally Bar Use Of Evidence Derived From Torture Against Terror Suspects (AP)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Defense Department is considering issuing a written rule barring the use of any evidence obtained through torture in the military trials of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, a spokesman said Wednesday.

Bryan Whitman, a senior Pentagon spokesman, said that up to now it had been the Pentagon's view that a written rule was unnecessary because the military prosecutors had already declared that such evidence would not be permitted. He reiterated that Pentagon policy bans the use of torture, although critics and some Guantanamo Bay prisoners have asserted that some interrogation methods amount to torture.

Ten detainees at Guantanamo Bay face terrorism charges before U.S. military tribunals - the first since the aftermath of World War II. The tribunals, officially called commissions, were set up for prisoners captured by U.S. forces and their allies, mostly in Afghanistan in the months following the U.S. invasion in October 2001.

"We have not, to this point, believed that a specific commission rule was necessary, and in fact to some degree would erroneously suggest that torture had actually occurred," Whitman said. "That said, we are taking a look at whether or not issuing a formal instruction ... that bars prosecutors from using this type of evidence is necessary" in order to "eliminate any doubt from people's minds" that the U.N. Convention Against Torture applies to the Guantanamo cases.

Lawyers for some Guantanamo Bay detainees have claimed that the military tribunals are illegal because they could consider evidence gained through torture or other forms of inhumane treatment of suspects.

The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that the new Pentagon rule had already been approved, though not yet publicly released. Whitman said that a Pentagon officially had incorrectly told the newspaper this, but that in fact final approval had not yet been given. The Journal said the new rule was expected to be made public this week.

Briton Tried To Buy A-Bomb, Prosecution In Trial Contends (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

LONDON, March 22 — The prosecution in the trial of seven men accused of having links to Al Qaeda and plotting to carry out bomb attacks in Britain said on Wednesday that one of the men had inquired about buying an atomic bomb from Russian mafia figures in Belgium.

On Wednesday, the second day of the trial, a prosecution lawyer, David Waters, said the defendant, Salahuddin Amin, 30, had been asked by a man he met at a mosque in Luton, his hometown, to contact a third man, Abu Annis, about a "radioisotope bomb."

When Mr. Amin did so, Mr. Annis told him that "they had made contact with the Russian mafia in Belgium and from the mafia they were trying to buy this bomb," Mr. Waters said. While Mr. Amin later told the police that he did not believe it was likely that "you can go and pick an atomic bomb up and use it," the prosecutor said the incident was "an indication as to Amin's position in, and his usefulness to, the organization."

The defendants, all British and 18 to 33 years old, are accused of conspiring to cause an explosion "likely to endanger life" and of other crimes related to possession of materials for making bombs. The men were arrested before they could carry out any plans, and before bombs ripped through the London subway system in July 2005.

But Mr. Waters said on Wednesday in the continuation of his opening statement that the defendants already had "most of the necessary components in hand" to build a bomb, including about 1,300 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer and a smaller amount of aluminum powder, and that even having a nonspecific plan was evidence of guilt.

"It will hardly be in the public interest if the police had to wait for the explosion to take place and the deaths and damage to be caused before the perpetrators were guilty of a crime," he said.

The trial is expected to last several months. Six of the defendants — Omar Khyam, 24;, Waheed Mahmood, 33; Shujah-Ud-Din Mahmood, 18; Anthony Garcia, 27; Nabeel Hussain, 20; and Jawad Akbar, 22 — were arrested in police raids in March 2004, during which, the police said, the fertilizer was seized at a storage depot in West London. Mr. Amin was arrested in February 2005, when he arrived at Heathrow Airport on a flight from Islamabad, Pakistan. The men had been under surveillance, and their conversations had been monitored for months.

The prosecution contends that the men spoke admiringly of a bomb attack in Madrid in March 2004 and mused repeatedly about how and when to carry out similar attacks in Britain.

Mr. Waters said the men went to Pakistan for explosives training, disguising themselves as tourists. Back in Britain, he said, the defendants discussed potential targets, mentioning, for instance, the gas, water and electrical supplies, the Bluewater shopping center in Kent and a "big nightclub in central London."

The prosecutors say Mr. Akbar, is heard on one of the surveillance tapes saying that a nightclub would be a good target because "no one could put their hands up and say they are innocent — all those slags dancing around," using a slang term for loose women.

In the taped conversations cited by the prosecution, the defendants were sometimes unwittingly revelatory about themselves and their family lives. Mr. Akbar was taped speaking anxiously to his wife, fretting about two missing CD's marked with the word "Transco," the owner of the high-voltage electricity systems in England and Wales and the high-pressure gas system across Britain.

Mr. Mahmood, worked at the time for Morrison Utility Services, a contractor serving Transco in southeast England.

"You know what — if we get raided today, we're finished," Mr. Akbar is quoted by the prosecution as telling his wife. But then he refuses to tell her more. "The less you know, the better," he is quoted as saying. "Get your stuff and get into the kitchen."

An Effective Weapon Against Terrorists: Ridicule (USAT)

By Peter Schweizer

USA Today, March 23, 2006

Is America taking terrorists too seriously? In the wake of continued threats, that might seem like a ridiculous question. But in terms of the psychology of the war on terrorism, it's a question that needs to be asked.

In a brilliant new white paper on public diplomacy, Michael Waller, the Walter and Leonore Annenberg chair in International Communication at The Institute of World Politics, makes a strong case for America's employing a new powerful weapon against the terrorists: ridicule.

History teaches that ridicule weakens the moral and political capital of our enemies. Ronald Reagan employed it with great effect during the Cold War. We all remember the “evil empire” speech, but what about the jokes? Two guys were standing in line at the vodka store. They were there for half an hour, then an hour, then an hour and a half. “I'm sick of this,” one finally said. “I'm going over to the Kremlin to shoot (Mikhail) Gorbachev.” The man left and returned about an hour later. “Well, did you shoot him?” “Heck no,” he responded. “The line up there is a lot longer than this one.”

Many of Reagan's comments reached the underground press in the Soviet Union, no doubt encouraging dissenters against communism. Reagan understood that sowing fear in the West was a potent weapon for Moscow. By laughing at communism, the spell of fear was broken. It was the same during World War II. A cartoon of Donald Duck mocking Hitler and Mein Kampf no doubt was demeaning to the Fhrer.

Thus far, the Bush administration's approach to fighting terrorists has been to demonize them. “Their vision of the world is dark and dim,” President Bush said in January at Kansas State University. “They have got desires to spread a totalitarian empire.” During his March 11 radio address, he said: “The enemy we face has proved to be brutal and relentless.”

Certainly, their actions and goals warrant such treatment. But that alone is a tough strategy to maintain psychologically because it can be exhausting. As Waller writes: "Incessant, morbid portrayals of an individual, movement or mortal enemy might rally support for the American side, but they have a shelf-life that gets tired over time. Constant specters of unrelenting dangers risk sowing defeatism and chipping away at our own morale. Abroad, they risk making the U.S. look like a bully in some places and surrender the propaganda advantage to the other side."

By continuing to demonize our enemies, we elevate their political status in the eyes of those disaffected souls in the developing world who dislike the United States.

I'm not suggesting that Bush start cracking Osama bin Laden jokes. And we should not mock Islam. Reagan joked about communist leaders but never about the Russian people. What the Bush administration can do is mock the terrorists.

For example, we should note that these self-professed warriors hide while they pay impoverished young men and women to become human bombs. We should play up Osama's privileged background. We should highlight the terrorists' ridiculous failures. The reality is that much like Soviet officials, terrorists are full of grand illusions about themselves and their mission.

The war on terror has military, political and economic dimensions. But it also has a critical psychological component. The terrorists are not 10 feet tall. We should engage in a psychological war that brings these thugs down to size.

PATRIOT ACT:

Judge Orders Closed-door Session In Passaro Case (RN&O)

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, March 23, 2006

RALEIGH — A federal judge held a closed-door hearing today to decide what, if any, classified information David Passaro's defense lawyers can use at trial.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence W. Boyle ordered the hearing closed from its start at 9 a.m. No media or members of the public were allowed into the courtroom.

Passaro's trial has been tentatively set to start next month.

Passaro, 39, a former Green Beret from Lillington, is charged with assault of Abdul Wali, a suspect in rocket attacks on a military outpost in Asadabad, Afghanistan. Passaro was part of a covert paramilitary team. Prosecutors say he beat Wali with a flashlight and punched and kicked him during an interrogation. Wali died during his third day in U.S. custody in June 2003.

Passaro was the first American charged in the aftermath of the prisoner-abuse scandals in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was also the first civilian charged under the USA Patriot Act, which extended the reach of stateside prosecutors to military bases overseas.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, Police Spying Is Rising, Groups Allege (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK - Inside the Time's UP! office on Houston Street in Manhattan, pictures of people taking part in an environmental protest line an old refrigerator. In one, a man with short hair and a chiseled physique is talking on his cellphone. In another, a large man wields a video camera.

The people at Time's UP!, an environmental activist group, suspect these men are not protesters at all, but rather plainclothes police officers. "We say these people are spying, and they're definitely being assisted by the police if they're not police themselves," says Bill DiPaola, director of Time's UP!

Is that concern paranoia? Or is it skepticism in this post-9/11 era of increased surveillance?

Political activists from New York to Colorado to California report that they believe police and FBI surveillance of their activities has increased markedly since the terror attacks 4-1/2 years ago since Congress approved the USA Patriot Act loosening some of the strictures on law enforcement. They include environmental groups like Time's UP!, peace activists in Pittsburgh, and even a police union protesting for higher wages in New York City.

To try to find out if law officers are spying on them, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed Freedom of Information requests for more than 150 groups and individuals in more than 20 states who believe their first amendment rights are being violated.

Time's UP! is one of the groups that says the alleged surveillance is aimed at intimidating them. They acknowledge public events can be watched by anyone but they're concerned police have crossed the line into inappropriate spying to discourage people's from publicly criticizing government policies.

Local police and the FBI insist that none of their activities is aimed at chilling political speech. All investigations are conducted under strict guidelines put in place after abuses were documented during the Civil Rights and antiwar movements of the 1960s and 1970s. Before any investigation of a political group proceeds, law officers require reasonable suspicion or information that an individual or a group is involved in criminal or terrorist-related activities.

"Our only interest is in preventing, disrupting, and defeating terrorist-related operations or criminal activity - and that's through appropriate investigations that are conducted in accordance with attorney general guidelines," says Bill Carter, an FBI spokesman.

Throughout American history, and particularly during times of conflict, the balance between civil rights and national security has shifted toward the latter and later come under scrutiny. From World War II through the cold war to the sociopolitical upheaval of the 1960s, repeated civil rights violations occurred in the name of national security - from people being imprisoned and denied jobs for their political statements to the infiltration of political groups.

"We're nowhere near there now. Throughout the 20th century, we ... built better protections against intrusions on constitutional rights," says Alasdair Roberts, professor at the Maxwell School in Syracuse University in New York and author of "Blacked Out: Government Secrecy in the Information Age. "Nevertheless we can't take these gains for granted, and we have to take these issues of surveillance seriously."

The FBI says peace and environmental activists are confusing legitimate investigation of potential terrorist or criminal activity with free-speech violations. Peace activists say law enforcement is misusing the fear of terrorism to impede legitimate speech.

One recent case involves the Thomas Merton Center for Peace and Justice in Pittsburgh. It says FBI documents it obtained prove that they were being watched in an investigation of antiwar activities. A heavily redacted memo states that the center holds "daily leaflet distribution activities" and is "a left-wing organization advocating, among many political causes, pacifism."

"The memo may say it's an international terrorism matter at the top, but when you read the text and the subject it's clearly an investigation of antiwar activity," says Jim Kleissler, of the Merton Center. "They clearly tried to link terrorism to public dissent."

Mr. Carter says that the investigation was not of the organization, but of an individual. Once it was determined that individual was not involved with the Merton Center it ended, he says.

The number of Joint Terrorism Task Forces (JTTF), cooperative teams of local, state, and federal officers, jumped from fewer than 30 prior to the 2001 terrorist attack to more than 80 today. The Merton Center says it was investigated under a JTTF jurisdiction. Professor Roberts says these JTTFs have the greatest potential for constitutional violations because much of their activity is classified offering little opportunity for public accountability.

"It's difficult to appraise whether the activities are reasonable or not unless there's a certain amount of transparency," he says. "Sometimes you can't reveal law enforcement activity, but it's generally possible to get a general broad outline of what it is."

In New York, the activists at Time's Up! say the police are using surveillance to intimidate them. Their members are part of a monthly pro-environment bike ride around the city, where sometimes hundreds of people show up. The police want the group to get a parade permit. Time's UP! argues that it's a spontaneous gathering that takes place in 400 cities around the world. The courts have so far sided with the protesters. The police say they're simply trying to maintain order and that plainclothes police are vital to that goal.

Antiwar and anticorporate protesters have also filed suit against the NYPD, charging that plainclothes police behavior during the Republican National Convention in 2004 and at the World Economic Forum in 2002 was aggressive, intimidating, and designed to agitate the crowd. NYPD spokesman Paul Browne disagrees, saying the officers were there to maintain order.

"We don't want the chaos of an arrest spilling into the rest of the march," says Deputy Commissioner Browne, explaining that plainclothes officers mingle with the crowd. The goal is to allow them to identify and separate anarchists and others who may want the protest to turn violent from the lawful protesters.

The NYPD is also fending off a lawsuit from its own police officer's union. The Patrol Benevolent Association (PBA) says the NYPD sent Internal Affairs Bureau (IAB) investigators to take pictures of protesting officers during contract negotiations with the city.

"The concern is that they're trying to intimidate our members, the implication being that you could be disciplined for asserting your first amendment rights," says Michael Murray, a lawyer with the PBA.

The NYPD denies that and says the IAB officers were there to maintain order.

"If you're a cop and you're confronted with your union leader saying, 'Hey, step aside, we're the police,' that could put a cop in a difficult position," says Browne. "The IAB are there to ensure there's no misconduct by the police, they're the police that police the police."

Homeland Security's Management Undersecretary To Step Down (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

A top Homeland Security official who has worked for three years to meld 22 agencies into a Cabinet department will resign in early May.

Janet Hale , undersecretary for management at the Department of Homeland Security, has been planning to leave the department for the past year but stayed on at the request of Secretary Michael Chertoff to help with his review of departmental operations, officials said.

Chertoff, in announcing Hale's resignation yesterday, called her "a pioneer in the department." Hale said: "There are 180,000 dedicated men and women in this department who make the country safer every day. I am proud to have been part of that."

Hale has been at the center of one of the biggest changes in the civil service in more than 50 years -- the department's plan to overhaul employee compensation and pay according to occupation, geographic location and job performance. The plan also included new rules that would sharply curb union rights in the department.

The rules, which would limit topics that unions can bring to the negotiating table, prompted a federal lawsuit. The unions prevailed at U.S. District Court, and the department has appealed a judge's decision blocking a new labor-management system and tougher employee disciplinary procedures at the department.

When Hale arrived at the department in 2003, it did not have pencils or a Zip code. The management directorate, which now has almost 300 employees, began with five staff members. Today, 650 additional employees work on management and operations issues in the department.

In the past year, officials said, Hale's office has stood up a general ledger, which collects financial information each month from Department of Homeland Security bureaus, so the department can produce a consolidated financial statement. Hale's office also has overseen new procurement practices that have saved taxpayer dollars by avoiding unnecessary spending, officials said. The department also has pulled together many of its computer systems to improve information-sharing and business practices.

But the government's response to Hurricane Katrina reinforced perceptions that the department lacks solid leadership and continues to be snarled in bureaucratic red tape. Employee morale hit bottom in some surveys, apparently because of changes forced by the mega-merger.

Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), who has investigated the Katrina response as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, praised Hale for taking on "a historically difficult assignment." Hale "deserves the nation's thanks for helping to secure our homeland," Collins said.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), who chairs a House subcommittee that oversees department management issues, said Hale's resignation "simply adds to the challenges for a department already operating with far too many vacant senior positions."

Rogers said, "But I am also hopeful this helps highlight the pressing need for comprehensive legislation to strengthen the department's management and operations."

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said Hale "did express some willingness to listen to concerns of employees," but she urged Chertoff to take advantage of her departure to reassess plans for the department's new personnel system, known as MaxHR.

"It is high time they admit that MaxHR is not going anywhere good and is not going to be a success for the department," Kelley said.

Mark Roth , general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said Hale "had an open-door policy, but unfortunately, many of the problems we brought through that open door were never resolved, and in a larger sense, the problems in DHS . . . will certainly continue long after Ms. Hale's departure. We wish her well."Retirements

John M. Evans , director of operations, Office of the Undersecretary of Defense (Comptroller), retires Friday after 33 years of federal service. He has worked on the comptroller staff for 17 years and has been a member of the Senior Executive Service since 1995.

Joseph J. Matt III , an oceanographer for the Navy, retired March 3 after more than 32 years of federal service. He spent more than 21 years with the director of naval intelligence on the chief of naval operations staff, serving as manager of charting and oceanography.

Man Held In White House Scare (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber And Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

A French citizen was arrested on disorderly conduct charges yesterday after he threw a bundle of papers over a gate of the White House, forcing police to call in the bomb squad, seal the area and close off Lafayette Square, authorities said.

The bundle turned out to contain nothing dangerous, but it took about an hour before authorities issued an all-clear.

The incident marked the second time that Cyrille Y. Morotte, 36, had caused trouble at the White House, authorities said. Morotte was taken into custody and deported after throwing another item over the White House fence in June 2004, authorities said. It was not clear yesterday how Morotte got back into the United States.

He was being held last night and probably will appear at a hearing in D.C. Superior Court today.

The episode began about 11 a.m., just after President Bush left the South Lawn of the White House grounds by helicopter for an event in Wheeling, W.Va.

Authorities said that Morotte threw the bundle of papers and plastic, which was held together by rubber bands, over the fence near the busy northwest gate on Pennsylvania Avenue NW. He was quickly arrested by Secret Service officers, who summoned the bomb squad to examine the package.

Police then shut down that area of the White House. They hustled some television reporters and camera crews, who typically deliver their reports from regular positions near the northwest gate, into the White House press room.

Authorities also closed Pennsylvania Avenue NW and Lafayette Square to pedestrians. The area draws a great deal of pedestrian traffic, especially in spring, when many school groups make trips to Washington.

The bomb squad used a robot to examine the bundle and determined about noon that it did not pose a threat. Secret Service spokesman Tom Mazur said that "normal protocols" were followed.

"We would be remiss if we didn't take these situations seriously," Mazur said.

It was not known yesterday why Morotte tossed the package over the fence. Authorities said he threw a backpack or other object over the fence in 2004. He was not charged with a crime in that incident but was deported afterward, authorities said.

Federal immigration officials said they have placed a detainer on Morotte to ensure that he is turned over to them upon completion of any criminal proceedings. They said their investigation is continuing.

The White House has often attracted protesters and others who have tried to jump or throw objects over the fence. Mazur said the Secret Service did not have statistics on such incidents, adding that they were "not uncommon."

In November 2004, a Falls Church man who had been aiding the government in a terrorism investigation set himself on fire outside the northwest gate. A year later, a 48-year-old homeless man stabbed three tourists in Lafayette Square, causing minor injuries.

Crews Scramble To Fix Levees (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Federal officials are working around the clock to complete repairs to Louisiana's levee system in time for the looming hurricane season.

"We have a mandate to return the hurricane protection system to pre-Katrina levels by June 1," said Paul Johnston, spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers, noting that the completion date coincides with the beginning of hurricane season. "The folks out there are really working like crazy. We've got folks pounding steel 24 hours a day."

More than 250 Army Corps officials and 1,500 construction workers have completed half the work required since the storm hit more than six months ago, but Mr. Johnston said the other half can and will be finished in 10 weeks.

"We did more than one year's work in just six months, and there's a tremendous amount of work to do in a very short period of time," Mr. Johnston said.

Aided by dry weather but hampered by a lack of manpower, crews repaired nearly 100 miles of the 169-mile-long levee system, which is being built at higher levels in many areas to protect New Orleans from another devastating storm.

"We are going to be ready," said R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), where officials are working weekends in preparation.

Mr. Paulison, who replaced embattled director Michael D. Brown, said he meets three times a week with Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff as they reorganize the agency.

"We're picking through all of those lessons learned from Katrina, Rita and Wilma to get what worked and what didn't work to get it fixed quickly," Mr. Paulison said.

"Situational awareness," or eyes on the ground, is what worked for Wilma in Florida, where 300 FEMA officials were dispatched to the governor's homeland security office.

Mr. Chertoff told firefighters this week that the federal government will not override state and local officials and that department officials, including the Coast Guard and FEMA, will be coordinated locally this summer.

The most important first responders will be the people in the storm's path, Mr. Chertoff told the International Association of Fire Fighters legislative conference Monday in Washington.

People who choose to stay behind and weather the storm must have contingency plans and supplies to last 48 hours, Mr. Chertoff said.

"If people who are able-bodied and have the means don't take steps to sustain themselves in that first couple of days in an emergency ... then they are distracting responders and firefighters from helping those who simply don't have the ability to help themselves or don't have the means to help themselves," Mr. Chertoff said.

A system similar to that used by UPS is being put into place to track food, water and ice supplies in real time using Global Positioning System satellites, a lesson learned after Katrina. Mr. Paulison said officials previously had no way to contact drivers on the road to redirect supplies.

"Katrina was an overwhelming event, and the system was not set up to deal with a catastrophe of that size," Mr. Paulison said. "We have to be more nimble, more agile and less bureaucratic."

Last Child Reunited With Kin After Hurricanes (WT/AP)

By Stacey Plaisance, Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS -- When 4-year-old Cortez Stewart was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Texas last week, it brought a happy ending to a long journey that began with the devastation of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Cortez represented the last of 5,192 Gulf Coast children listed as missing or displaced after the storms struck more than six months ago. The effort to reunite those youngsters became the largest child-recovery effort in U.S. history.

The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children worked with the FBI, Federal Emergency Management Agency, U.S. Postal Service, Red Cross and other agencies to reunite children separated from their parents or guardians when Katrina hit Aug. 29 and Rita followed Sept. 24.

"I can't say that there aren't a few children that may have been missing and not reported to us, but we received more calls than anyone else did, and all our cases have been resolved," said Bob O'Brien, director of the center's missing children division.

In the months after Katrina, the agency received reports of 4,710 children missing or displaced in Louisiana, 339 in Mississippi and 39 in Alabama. In Louisiana, most of the reports were about children in the New Orleans area, where heavy flooding and frantic rescues separated families.

After Rita, another 28 children were reported missing or displaced in Louisiana; 76 were reported in Texas.

Of the more than 5,000 children from both storms, all but 12 were found alive. Most were found living with other relatives, family friends or other adults, Mr. O'Brien said.

Cortez, the final child, was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Houston on March 16. She hadn't seen her family since Katrina hit and was taken to a New Orleans hotel by her godmother.

The two were rescued by helicopter as floodwaters rose around the hotel, and they were eventually taken to Atlanta, Mr. O'Brien said. Meanwhile, Cortez's mother, Lisa Stewart, and her five other children were rescued by boat from their New Orleans home, taken to an interstate overpass and then to the Houston Astrodome, he said.

The family ended up in an apartment in Houston, not knowing whether Cortez and her godmother had made it out of New Orleans alive. Early efforts to reconnect the family were hampered by incorrect name spellings and other erroneous information, Mr. O'Brien said.

"Many agencies didn't have a good account of who they were helping," Mr. O'Brien said. "Moving them from shelter to shelter, by air, by bus, the transfers, people were separated. More than 411,000 were evacuated to more than 40 states, and it became very hard to track the movement."

The national center sent teams of volunteers to shelters in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas to take photos of evacuated children to post on the agency's Web site with information about the children to speed the reuniting effort.

The agency logged more than 34,000 phone calls starting in early September, when it established a missing persons hot line (888-544-5475) at the request of the U.S. Department of Justice. Of the missing children cases, 45 involved children who arrived at shelters with no parent or guardian. All of those cases were resolved by early October, Mr. O'Brien said.

Besides the missing children, more than 12,000 missing adults were reported to the agency's Katrina/Rita Missing Persons Hot Line and were referred to the National Center for Missing Adults. The FBI maintains a list of missing persons on its Web site (www.fbi.gov) that includes names and specific information about those who have yet to be found.

State authorities say roughly 1,900 people are still missing. It is suspected some may have washed to sea or remain buried by debris in New Orleans. Others have been found but haven't notified authorities, while some do not want to be found.

President Bush urged Congress on Wednesday to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India. Bush said India has proved itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator. “It's in our interest that India use nuclear power to power their economic growth because … there's a global connection between demand for fossil fuels elsewhere and price here,” Bush said in Wheeling, W.Va. In Washington, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also urged lawmakers to approve the deal.

Critics, including former senator Sam Nunn, a Georgia Democrat, are skeptical of the agreement, reached March 2 by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. It would require Congress to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. Among the concerns raised by Nunn, who played a leading role on military issues in Congress, was that the agreement would promote a regional arms race with China and Pakistan.

The Pentagon is considering issuing a written rule barring the use of any evidence obtained through torture in the military trials of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Whitman said that up to now it had been the Pentagon's view that a written rule was unnecessary because the military prosecutors had already declared that such evidence would not be permitted. He reiterated that Pentagon policy bans the use of torture. Ten detainees at the U.S. military prison face terrorism charges before tribunals. Lawyers for some Guantanamo Bay detainees have claimed that the military tribunals are illegal because they could consider evidence gained through torture or other forms of inhumane treatment of suspects.

The Bush administration questioned the motives of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq. “It is a matter of curious timing,” State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. He said Iran might be trying to deflect international attention away from its nuclear programs, now under review at the United Nations. McCormack said a channel for communication between the United States and Iran remains open, but no meetings have been scheduled.

Khamenei's statement on Tuesday was the first confirmation that he supports holding talks. He warned, however, that the United States must not try to “bully” Iran. President Bush months ago initiated a diplomatic effort to hold talks with Iran over its activities in Iraq. The administration has accused Iran of supplying insurgents with weapons.

For Afghans, Allies, A Clash Of Values (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The case of an Afghan man who could be prosecuted and even put to death for converting to Christianity has unleashed a blizzard of condemnation from the West this week and exposed a conflict in values between Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country, and the foreign countries that have helped defend and rebuild it in the four years since the fall of the Taliban.

The case of Abdul Rahman, a longtime Christian convert who lived in Germany for years and was arrested last month in Kabul, has also highlighted the volatile debate within Afghanistan over the proper role of Islam in Afghan law and public policy as the country struggles to develop a democracy.

Diplomats from several countries said yesterday that Rahman, 41, now seems unlikely to be tried or executed. Prosecutors in Kabul said he might be mentally unfit to stand trial, a sign that the government may be seeking to avoid confronting its Western allies without giving ground on Islamic law, under which conversion to another religion is punishable by death.

But the case, the first of its kind since the radical Islamic Taliban movement was toppled in 2001 by a U.S.-led military invasion, continued to draw protests from the governments of Italy, Germany, Canada and other NATO nations, at a time when NATO forces are beginning to replace tens of thousands of U.S. troops as the principal defenders of Afghanistan against Taliban and al-Qaeda insurgents.

It also put pressure on President Bush, who visited Kabul last month to show support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. A number of U.S. Christian and conservative groups demanded this week that Bush take action, and one organization accused him yesterday of propping up an Islamic fundamentalist regime in Kabul.

"This is an extremely sensitive issue here and an extremely serious issue back home," Abdullah, Afghanistan's foreign minister, said in an interview yesterday with Washington Post editors and reporters. "Every time we have a case, it is like an alarm. These contradictions will not go away with one or two cases."

Bush, on a visit to Wheeling, W.Va., said yesterday he was "deeply troubled" to learn of Rahman's possible prosecution. "That's not the universal application of the values that I talked about" while in Kabul, he said. He stopped short of calling for the case against Rahman to be dropped but said he would work with Karzai's government "to make sure that people are protected in their capacity to worship."

Bush's comments were tougher than those made previously by administration officials. On Tuesday, a State Department spokesman urged the Afghan government to "conduct any legal proceedings in a transparent and fair manner." R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, said that the Afghan constitution "affords freedom of religion to all Afghans" and that the U.S. government hoped for a "satisfactory result" of the case.

The initial low-key response apparently infuriated Christian conservative groups. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, complained in a letter to Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians? . . . Americans will not give their blood and treasure to prop up new Islamic fundamentalist regimes."

In another open letter to Bush, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom said it was "the obligation of our government" to take action in the case. The group warned that in Afghanistan, there is no legal guarantee of religious freedom and the judiciary is instructed to enforce Islamic principles. "The door is open for a harsh, unfair or even abusive interpretation of religious orthodoxy to be officially imposed," it said.

Bush, a Christian, often talks about God, faith and respect for all religions, especially in relation to the war on terrorism. The White House has often portrayed Karzai as an example of a Muslim leader and ally who is working to hunt down Islamic terrorists and build a democracy based on the rule of law and human rights.

But Afghanistan is also a deeply traditional and tribal society, where 99 percent of the 25 million inhabitants are Muslims and no Christians worship openly. It is a capital crime under Afghan Islamic law to convert to Christianity, and prosecutors and judges in Kabul initially said Rahman might be sentenced to death.

The country's 2004 constitution, which was heavily debated and rewritten by Afghan officials after it was crafted with help from U.N. advisers, is an ambiguous document that endorses international human rights conventions but also says that no law shall contravene the principles of Islam.

"This case goes right to the heart of the contradictions in the constitution. Is Afghanistan a democracy that respects human rights and international norms, or is it an Islamic country with an extremely conservative judiciary?" said Alex Their, a senior rule of law adviser at the U.S. Institute of Peace. "The issues being raised will have an important impact on Afghanistan's ability to become a stable democracy."

Although Rahman is the first Afghan charged with converting since the fall of the Taliban, Afghan courts have recently prosecuted or harshly criticized individuals for other alleged anti-Islamic acts, including a presidential candidate in 2004 who questioned the right of Muslim men to have multiple wives and a magazine editor last year who challenged the doctrine that conversion from Islam is a capital offense.

The Supreme Court's chief justice, an elderly cleric named Fazl Hadi Shinwari, has issued religious decrees against such individuals. Karzai, a moderate who in Afghanistan is widely viewed as having ceded the judiciary to Islamic conservatives, renominated Shinwari this week. Abdullah, who was not renamed to his post in a cabinet shuffle this week, said the Afghan judiciary was in serious need of reform.

So far, the government has not invoked the extreme punishments ordained by Islamic law, or sharia , such as cutting off thieves' hands and stoning adulterers, which were frequently carried out by the Taliban and drew international condemnation. But most Afghans view Islamic law as absolute once it is invoked. And despite their gratitude for U.S. military and economic support, many remain leery of Western values and associate Christianity with fornication and drunkenness.

Under sharia, a convert to Christianity "should be given time to think," said Abdul Aziz, a professor of Islamic law who spoke by telephone from Kabul. "What he has done may damage Islamic society, so he should change his mind." If he does not, sharia prescribes the punishment of death. "Then, even a judge cannot change it. It is like doing a coup against the government," Aziz said. Rahman's case was brought by a public security court, not a regular criminal one.

The case against Rahman is complicated by personal aspects. His conversion was denounced by his family in Kabul after he was involved in a lawsuit and child custody fight with his former wife, and he has been described as perennially jobless and mentally unbalanced. He converted in 1990 while working with a Christian aid group in Pakistan and then moved to Germany, returning only recently.

Comments made this week in Kabul by judges, prosecutors, neighbors and Rahman's relatives illustrated the strong emotional and religious feelings such a case can evoke. His father expressed shame and bewilderment at his conversion. Guards refused to let journalists visit him in a Kabul prison, and one said, "We will cut him into little pieces."

But yesterday, Rahman was briefly brought before the news media. According to a report by the BBC, he said: "I am not an infidel or a fugitive. I am a Christian. If they want to sentence me to death, I accept that."

Bush Touts Coal Use For Energy Independence (WHNR)

By John McCabe

Wheeling (WV) News-Register, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — West Virginia's coal reserves could be one of the keys to curing the United States' "addiction" and dependence on foreign oil, President Bush said Wednesday.

During his address at the Capitol Music Hall, underwritten by the Ogden Newspapers Inc. and other local sponsors and hosted by the Wheeling Area Chamber of Commerce, the president spoke of a brief meeting he had with Gov. Joe Manchin on the way downtown from the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport.

During that meeting with the president, Manchin discussed coal liquefaction — a chemical process that turns coal into a fuel that can be used in vehicles — as an alternative energy source for the nation.

"Joe talked to me about how we (could) use the natural resources of the state of West Virginia in such ways to become less dependent on oil," Bush said.

''First thing is, we've got a lot of coal, a 250-year supply of coal, which helps us on our electricity. And we're spending a lot of money on clean coal technology. The whole idea is to use taxpayers' money to develop a technology that will enable us to have zero-emission plants, which will help us achieve an environmental objective, as well as an energy independence objective," Bush said.

''Our natural resources would help make the country more independent" of foreign oil, Manchin said prior to Wednesday's event. If the state's coal reserves were liquefied, "we would have more liquid than Saudi Arabia."

Bush said with the global demand for oil increasing — which drives up the price at the pump — it is imperative that the country find alternative energy sources. As it stands now, "we get oil from parts of the world that don't like us ... which creates a national security issue. And, therefore, it is in our economic interest and national interest that we get off of our addiction to oil."

One of the alternative energy sources is nuclear power. The president endorsed its use as a "renewable source of energy that has ... zero greenhouse gas effect."

The use of batteries to power automobiles — particularly in the big cities, where the average commuter drives less than 40 miles per day — is another possibility in the near future.

"One of these days, I am told, that if we continue to stay focused in research, we're going to be able to have a pretty good-sized vehicle, plug it in, and drive 40 miles before you need to use any gasoline in your engine," Bush said. "That will ... reduce demand for gasoline, which reduces demand for crude oil.

"They've got what they call E85 that's 85 percent ethanol that's powering automobiles now. A whole new industry is beginning to grow. And the more we use alternative sources of energy, the less dependent we are on oil."

The president also praised Manchin for his forward-thinking on an issue of such national importance. "Joe is always thinking, and he's a practical fellow, which is sometimes not the case in government. But what he's saying is, can't we use our resources here, in a way, Mr. President, that helps you achieve a grand national objective, which is getting off Middle Eastern oil? And the answer is, yes, we can."

Bush Pulls Out The Stops To Save Ratings (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

AP2, March 22, 2006

Whether he's before a friendly West Virginia audience, a Cleveland club proud of its interrogation skills or a White House news conference, President Bush is drawing on his plainspoken manner in freewheeling venues to defend his Iraq strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0020114

Alternately serious and joking, charming and disarming in this war anniversary week, Bush is trying to counter election-year critics and reverse an approval ratings slide.

In Wheeling on Wednesday, the fifth day in a row Bush devoted his remarks to Iraq, the president bantered with the locals, his shoulders bouncing up and down as they do when he's pleased with his own jokes. Then he brought down the house with his trademark I-won't-back-down pledge.

"Let me put it to you this way: If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out," Bush said. More than 2,000 supporters — including many active-duty military and their families — leapt from their seats and filled the gilded Capitol Music Hall with wild applause.

"I cannot look mothers and dads in the eye, I can't ask this good Marine to go into harm's way if I didn't believe, one, we're going to succeed, and, two, it's necessary for the security of the United States," Bush said.

Beginning with a speech last Monday in Washington. and with more planned to come, the president wants to convince Americans not only that there is reason for optimism about Iraq's future but that the situation now is better than the daily reports of strife make it appear.

With national polls showing he has a tough hill to climb — and the upcoming midterm congressional elections making Republicans nervous — Bush laces his remarks with nods to both Americans' worries and the grim realities on the ground in Iraq. The insurgency remains strong, sectarian violence is spiraling and talks to form a unity government seem stalemated.

The president said at least a half-dozen times here that he understands the concern about Iraq.

"There was some awful violence. Some reprisals taking place. And I can understand people saying, `Man, it's all going to — you know, it's not working out,'" he said.

But, Bush added, standing in front of three large blue-and-yellow "Plan for Victory" posters: "The way I like to put it is, they looked into the abyss as to whether or not they want a civil war or not and chose not to. That's not to say we don't have more work to do, and we do."

The crowd in Wheeling needed little convincing. Another standing ovation was prompted by a woman who asked Bush what could be done to keep the press from ignoring progress in Iraq.

"Our major media don't want to portray the good," she said. "If the American people could see it, there would never be another negative word about this conflict."

Bush declined the opportunity to tell the media what to publish.

"You're asking me to say something in front of all the cameras here. Help over there, will you?" he joshed. "Just got to keep talking. Word of mouth."

In Cleveland on Monday, Bush did his talking at the City Club. The questions got tough at the forum known for taking on world leaders, ranging from Iraq to his warrantless wiretapping program to a new nuclear deal with India. But the exchanges allowed Bush to make his case for the war, and earned him a few laughs and several rounds of enthusiastic applause along the way.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked at one point as the Cleveland questioning went on in an appearance that eventually went over 90 minutes.

On Tuesday, Bush called a news conference with the Washington media. But he rejected the formal East Room in favor of going toe-to-toe with reporters in the cramped, casual White House briefing room that better suits his style. The president bantered with an outspoken critic, journalist Helen Thomas, saying he "semi-regretted" calling on her, and he teasingly accused other reporters of falling asleep during his speeches.

The sessions follow a December blitz by Bush that succeeded in arresting an earlier fall in his approval ratings. This time, White House advisers hope the speaking events, even when they draw the kind of difficult questions that have occasionally come Bush's way this week, will showcase a president comfortable with his message, his strategy and his facts.

"It's one of the best chances he has to be effective, to change away from the Pollyanna-ish characterizations of it being all good news," said Bruce Buchanan, a University of Texas political scientist who has long observed Bush.

However, Wayne Fields, a specialist in presidential rhetoric at Washington University in St. Louis, said, "The problem is that clearly he's doing this because of the polls and that adds a level of desperation."

Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

WHEELING, W.Va., March 22 — President Bush took his campaign to convince Americans that the United States is winning the war in Iraq to a former country music concert hall here on Wednesday and declared to applause, "If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out."

Mr. Bush also said he was continuing to press the Iraqis to form a unity government. Two Shiite parties won parliamentary elections in January, and the United States has been pressing them to include Sunnis in important cabinet positions.

"I spoke to our ambassador today, and General Casey, via videoconferencing, and we talked about the need to make it clear to the Iraqis: it's time, it's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people," Mr. Bush told the crowd. He was referring to Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq.

Mr. Bush did not repeat his widely published remark from a news conference on Tuesday suggesting that American forces would be in Iraq at least until 2009. On Wednesday, White House officials sought to play down the comment, saying Mr. Bush did not mean to imply that there would be 130,000 American troops in Iraq in 2009, as there are now.

White House officials said Mr. Bush's remark was not an open-ended comment. "The question was, Will there be zero, when will there be zero — or no American troops in Iraq," Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One.

Mr. Bush's response was that the decision would be made by "future presidents and future governments of Iraq."

In Wheeling, the latest stop in Mr. Bush's effort to persuade an increasingly doubtful public about his course in Iraq, the president spent an hour and 20 minutes with a hand-held microphone on the stage of the Capitol Music Hall, a home for country singers for more than 70 years, which was closed at the end of last month. The local Chamber of Commerce handed out about 2,000 tickets for the events, and about 250 military families were invited.

Mr. Bush took questions from the crowd, but they were a lot softer than the sharp queries he got on Monday from the City Club of Cleveland, a nonpartisan group. West Virginia voters supported Mr. Bush in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections.

One boy asked Mr. Bush if he liked living in the White House. Mr. Bush responded, yes, because he had a 45-second commute, the food was good, and the job was an honor.

He also said, alluding to the pressures and criticism of his tenure, that when "my buddies come up from Texas," they're "kind of looking at you like, man, are you O.K.?"

Mr. Bush said he told them yes.

"Educator-In-Chief" Speaks In Wheeling (WHINT)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — The Iraqi people ultimately must "determine their own fate," and "as they stand up, we'll stand down," President Bush told an audience in downtown Wheeling Wednesday.

A capacity crowd of more than 2,000 — including many military veterans and their families — turned out for Bush's town hall forum on the War on Terror at the Capitol Music Hall.

The event was sponsored by the Ogden Newspapers Inc., Valley National Gases Inc., Paull Associates Insurance/Real Estate, EPS Industries Inc., Wheeling Island Racetrack and Gaming Center and Beyond Marketing.

Bush said that while he has the duty of being commander-in-chief of U.S. military forces, he also holds the responsibility of being ''educator-in-chief'' and explaining to U.S. citizens why he chose to send forces into Iraq.

''It doesn't matter whether you agree with my decision or not,'' Bush said. ''But all of us should agree with the fact that we have a remarkable country.''

He added that 75 percent of West Virginia's National Guard has now seen military action, and he thanked the veterans and their families for their sacrifices.

Bush offered his explanation as to why these sacrifices are necessary.

''It's tough fighting, and it's tough fighting because we've got an enemy that's just cold-blooded,'' Bush said. ''They can't beat us militarily, but they can try to shake our will. They have said that it's just a matter of time, just a matter of time before the United States loses its nerve. I believe we're doing the right thing, and we're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins.

''It's the Iraqis' fight. Ultimately, the Iraqis are going to have to determine their future. They made their decision politically. They voted. And these troops that we're training are going to have to stand up and defend their democracy. We've got to work, by the way, in 2006 to make sure the police are trained as adequately as the military. It's their choice to make. I like to put it this way — as they stand up, we'll stand down.''

As for whether he will reduce troop levels in the Middle East, Bush said it was something he is considering.

''But I'm going to make up my mind based upon the advice of the United States military that's in Iraq,'' he said. ''I'll be making up my mind about the troop levels based upon recommendations of those who are on the ground.

''I'm going to make up my mind based upon achieving a victory — not based upon polls, focus groups or election-year politics.''

Bush next addressed the issue of pre-war intelligence and how he had believed Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and planned to use them.

''I know for a fact he had used weapons of mass destruction — he used them on his own people,'' Bush said of Hussein. ''Now, I thought he had weapons of mass destruction. Members of Congress thought he had weapons of mass destruction. The world thought he had weapons of mass destruction. That's why those nations voted in the Security Council'' to send troops into Iraq.

''Now I'm finding out what went wrong. One of the things you better make sure of when you're the president is that you're getting good intelligence. Obviously, the intelligence broke down. But (Hussein) had that capacity to make weapons of mass destruction. He had not only murdered his own people, but he had used weapons of mass destruction on his own people.''

It was also known that forces under Hussein were firing on U.S. aircraft, Bush said.

''This guy was a threat,'' he added. ''The way I viewed it was that it was Saddam Hussein's choice to disclose, disarm or face serious consequences. He made the choice, and then I was confronted with a choice. I made my choice. And the world is better off without Saddam Hussein in power.''

Bush also addressed the need for universal freedoms in the world, and he said he is upset that some countries aided by the U.S. continue to infringe upon human rights.

He spoke of a visit he made to Afghanistan and of meeting President Hamid Karzai.

"I like him ," Bush said of Karzai. "He's a good man. You can imagine what it's like to try to rebuild a country that had been occupied and then traumatized by the Taliban. They're coming around. They got elections. They had assembly elections. He, himself, was elected.

"We expect them to honor the universal principle of freedom," Bush added with reference to Afghanistan. "I'm troubled when I hear — deeply troubled — when I hear the fact that a person who has converted away from Islam may be held to account. That's not the universal application of the values that I talked about. I look forward to working with the government of that country to make sure that people are protected in their capacity to worship. "

Bush spoke directly to the crowd for about 45 minutes prior to taking questions from those in attendance.

He thanked John Anderson and Janis LaFont, employees of Valley National Gases, for a $100,000 check they presented him for the Katrina Relief Fund.

''I want to thank you all for doing this, and I want to thank the folks you work with for doing that,'' Bush said.

Many of the questions and comments for Bush were from those primarily supportive of the president and wishing to commend him.

One of the first questions came from West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, who asked Bush if the state's natural resources could better be put to use to help ease U.S. dependency on foreign oil. Manchin is a proponent of liquefying West Virginia's coal for use as gasoline. Bush quickly began to speak of nuclear energy and the use of ethanol.

A Wheeling Park student followed Manchin's question with one regarding nuclear energy and whether the U.S. is guilty of a double standard in supporting India's effort toward nuclear energy, but not Iran's attempts.

Iranians ''are hostile to the United States and hostile to allies,'' Bush answered. ''We've got to be very careful about not letting them develop a weapon. ... Iran with a nuclear weapon is a threat, and it's dangerous, and we must not let them have a weapon.''

A local military recruiter asked Bush what he might say to encourage someone to serve their country. He responded he would tell them it was a good way to learn skills prior to college, and he added that people can also serve their country by volunteering.

A Wheeling firefighter asked Bush if he planned to send ''an army of sociologists'' to the Middle East to help change the mindset there so that those of differing religions are accepted. Bush responded the U.S. would work with friendly governments there and reinforce the universal idea of freedom of religion.

A young boy asked Bush if he enjoyed living in the White House. Bush told him he had ''enjoyed every second'' living there. He said he ''has a 45-second commute'' to the office, and he noted ''the food is good.''

Bush added that he often invites his friends from Texas to visit.

''I tell them what an honor it is to do this job,'' he said. ''They often ask, what's the job description? I say, 'Making decisions.' And I make a lot.

''You may not agree with the decision. But at the very minimum, I want you to understand that I make my decisions based upon some principles I hold dear. In order to make decisions, you have to be enthusiastic about your job, you have to be optimistic about the future and you have to stand for something. You can't be a president trying to search for what you believe in the midst of all the noise in Washington.''

Crowd Praises Bush's Speech (WHINT)

By Adam Townsend

WHEELING — Many people who attended President Bush's Wednesday appearance in Wheeling said they weren't sure what to expect from the speech and subsequent question-and-answer period, but several area residents said afterward that they were impressed with the chief executive's statements and responses.

"I want to know if he has any plans for addressing the congressmen who so negatively portray the war in Iraq," said St. Clairsville nurse practitioner Janel Trovato-Vass. She had her question for the president carefully written on a Post-it note she held as she waited to enter Capitol Music Hall. The line — dotted with the white caps of Marines in dress uniforms and the square-patterned camouflage of the Air National Guard — stretched for a few blocks as Secret Service officials checked everyone with metal detectors.

"Nobody's perfect, and he can't fix everything," Trovato-Vass continued. "I've supported George (W.) Bush as a Republican myself. (The President's visit) is pretty big for Wheeling."

Close behind Trovato-Vass were the members of the Wheeling Park High School Teen Age Republicans — a newly formed chapter of the national group.

The six members were part of the group seated in bleachers behind the president while he spoke on stage, and all were giddy with excitement as they waited in the morning chill in downtown Wheeling.

"We all started (the chapter) just this year," said Christina Fortunato, mentioning that the group had some help in getting seats on the stage. "My mom, Kathy Fortunato, is chairman for the (Ohio County) Republican Party."

"We hope this'll be a learning experience for all of us," added club member Kelly Kresen.

The theater seats began to fill up slowly as attendees filtered through Secret Service checkpoints while bomb-sniffing dogs inspected television cameras. Throughout the speech, the audience burst into applause at various statements by the president, who joked with the audience and explained his justification for the war in Iraq. At the end of the speech, Bush took a number of questions from members of the crowd.

"I thought that it was a wonderful speech," said West Liberty professor Charles Davis as Bush descended from the stage to greet the audience members crowded around him. "This is my second time to see him. I don't always agree with him, but I support him and respect him."

Jolene Magle, one of the locals volunteering at the Capitol to help host the event, said the speech was everything she expected as a Bush supporter.

"He answered all the questions appropriately," she said. "We just love him. He's a faith-based man, and this is a faith-based community."

Indeed, one would have been hard pressed to find someone in the audience much less enthusiastic about the speech.

"George W. Bush is an amazing president because he stands firmly," said Wheeling Park senior and Student Council President Michael Bush. Michael Bush asked George W. Bush what his generation would be facing as its members assume the reins of power in the future.

"I asked him as 'one President Bush to another,'" Michael Bush said. "He got a kick out of that."

Supportive Crowd Hails Bush In W.Va. As President Defends Iraq Policy (PPG)

By James O'Toole

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va. -- West Virginians cheered as President Bush maintained that the war in Iraq and his assertive foreign policy were "laying the foundation of peace for a generation to come."

In the face of increasing public uneasiness over the war, Bush came to the Capitol Music Hall yesterday continuing a renewed effort this week to shore up support for his administration's policies.

With familiar but impassioned arguments, Mr. Bush defended his decision to go to war and argued that his foreign policy goal of spreading democracy would lead to victory in Iraq and a more peaceful future for the Middle East.

For the third day in a row, the president answered questions on the war, this time before a markedly more supportive audience than he faced Monday at the Cleveland City Club or Tuesday in the White House press room.

Poll after poll in recent weeks have recorded bleak approval ratings for his job performance in general and his conduct of the war in particular.

But such sentiments were not apparent in the historic theater where the West Virginia audience, dotted with military families and men and women in uniforms, offered repeated applause and friendly questions. Mr. Bush, with a handheld microphone, strolled back and forth on a stage festooned with banners that read: "Plan for Victory."

While acknowledging flaws in pre-war intelligence, Mr. Bush sparked applause in a community where a local Air National Guard unit is awaiting deployment to Iraq as he said, "I viewed it was ... Saddam Hussein's choice, to disclose, disarm, or face serious consequences. ... And I made my choice and the world is better off without Saddam Hussein in power."

Defending what he portrayed as the broader principles underlying his foreign policy, Mr. Bush said, "An interesting debate in the world is whether or not freedom is universal. ... People say, 'There's old Bush imposing his values.'

"See, I believe freedom is universal. I believe liberty is a universal thought. It's not an American thought, it is a universal thought," he continued, arguing that the spread of democracy would promote a more peaceful world.

Mr. Bush elicited another ovation as he said, "Look, I'm an optimistic guy. I believe we will succeed. If I didn't believe we would succeed, I would pull our troops out."

While most of the session concentrated on Iraq, Mr. Bush also defended his proposed nuclear accord with India, warned that he would not accept Iran's designs on building nuclear weapons, and vowed to renew his frustrated campaign to transform Social Security.

Responding to one of the few challenging questions from the crowd, Mr. Bush denied that he was guilty of a double standard in his approach to India and Iran on nuclear weapons. He argued that India was a transparent democracy while Iran was not.

"They're certainly not a democracy. They are sponsors of terrorism," Mr. Bush said of Iran. "They have joined the [International Atomics Energy Agency], and yet we caught them cheating. In other words, they weren't upholding the agreements, and they started to try to enrich uranium in order to develop a weapons program. India is heading to the IAEA; the Iranians are ignoring IAEA."

West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin put in a plug for the state's coal resources as he asked the president how the nation could use other fuels to promote energy independence.

"Joe is talking about spending research money on the gasification of coal, which then will lead to the [liquefaction]," Mr. Bush said. "And I believe we ought to attack this issue on all fronts, on a variety of fronts. I know we ought to use nuclear power. It is a renewable source of energy that has got zero greenhouse gas effect."

One questioner drew the crowd's loud endorsement with her complaint that the news media do not show enough of the good news of what is happening in Iraq.

"That's why I come out and speak. I spoke in Cleveland, gave a press conference yesterday -- spoke in Cleveland Monday," Mr. Bush said. "I'm going to continue doing what I'm doing to try to make sure people can hear ... why I make decisions, and as best as I can, explain why I'm optimistic we can succeed."

On his arrival at the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport, Mr. Bush tried to emphasize one positive outgrowth of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq as he presented a volunteer service award to Kristen Holloway of Mt. Lebanon for her work in founding Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit group that distributes clothing, DVDs, musical instruments and other goods to GIs serving overseas.

The president plans to return to the region tomorrow to appear at a private fund-raising event for U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum.

Bush Urges Iraqis To Form A Government (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va. -- President Bush yesterday said Iraqi politicians must get serious about forming a unity government and begin the job of running the country.

"It's time," Mr. Bush said. "It's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people."

Continuing his series of speeches on Iraq and the war on terror, Mr. Bush again praised Iraqis for stepping back from "the abyss" after the bombing of a Shi'ite mosque in Samarra last month.

But he told an audience of 2,000 at the Capitol Music Hall in Wheeling that just yesterday morning he instructed the U.S. ambassador to Iraq and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander there, to let the Iraqis know they now must step up.

A delegation of U.S. senators traveling in Iraq earlier this week also told interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to get to work on forming a government.

"There's been too much dawdling while Baghdad is burning," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. "They have got to decide if they want a nation. They cannot overly rely on us."

Iraqis went to the polls in December, though the results weren't certified until last month. Mr. Bush urged Iraqis to move quickly to form a unity government that would share power among the various factions.

"That's what the people want; otherwise, they wouldn't have gone to the polls, would they have?" he said.

It was the fifth consecutive day Mr. Bush has spoken on Iraq, beginning with his radio address Saturday and continuing with his statement on the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion Sunday, a war on terror speech Monday and a press conference Tuesday.

Although acknowledging that the U.S. made mistakes initially in its strategy for reconstruction and security, the president has not backed down from his decision to go to war nor his commitment to remain.

"I just got to tell you, I'm not weak and I'm not going to lose my nerve," he said. "I strongly believe that we're doing the right thing."

The White House said most of the tickets to the town hall-style event yesterday were distributed by the local chamber of commerce.

The audience was favorable. A man with two sons in the military told the president, "I thank God you're our commander in chief." That drew a standing ovation from the crowd.

Another audience member drew a standing ovation when she blasted the press for not showing positive images that her husband, who she said served 13 months as a military broadcaster in Tikrit, brought back with him.

"It seems that our major media networks don't want to portray the good," she said.

Mr. Bush said he respected a free press and that it is his job to talk about progress in Iraq.

"I'm going to continue doing what I'm doing to try to make sure people can hear why I make decisions, and as best as I can, explain why I'm optimistic we can succeed," he said.

Bush Continues To Press Case For Iraq War (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va — Before an overwhelmingly friendly audience in the rugged panhandle of West Virginia, President Bush said today he would pay no heed to "polls, focus groups or election year politics" in deciding how many troops to deploy in Iraq.

Speaking publicly on Iraq for the fifth consecutive day, the president used colloquial, often blunt, language as he reduced his arguments for the war to their most basic.

"We're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins," he vowed.

Unlike a similar speech and question-and-answer session two days earlier in Cleveland, where Bush faced polite but tough questions, he was bathed today in repeated rounds of applause. Audience members prefaced their questions with praise for his presidency.

The president responded by reaching out to the region's religious roots and saluting its contributions to the military.

The town-hall-style program, in an aging theater in this bedraggled steel town, was part of a series the White House constructed to carry the president's message — that he understands the doubts that Americans are increasingly showing about the campaign in Iraq as it enters its fourth year, but that the fight is necessary to rid the country of terrorists who would use it as a base to attack the United States.

At a White House news conference Tuesday, Bush said he recognized that the war was costing him political capital he could have used to win support for domestic programs. He also suggested that American troops would still be in Iraq when his second term ends on Jan. 20, 2009. Today, he repeated his mantra that his decisions about troop levels would be based on the advice of commanders on the ground.

"I'm going to make up my mind based upon achieving a victory, not based upon polls, focus groups or election year politics," the president said.

Polls show that roughly 30% of the public says they approve of the job Bush is doing, the lowest level since he took office five years ago.

The president reminded his audience that the debates over the direction of the war had not weakened support in Congress for the military or for the people fighting the war. He said debate over his anti-terrorist policy was "healthy for our country … so long as we don't send the wrong signals to our troops."

The president spoke to about 2,500 people, most of them invited by the local Chamber of Commerce, in the 78-year-old Capitol Music Hall. When the questions began, he was able to relax and enjoy the decorations of gilt, red brocade and velvet.

The first person to take the microphone said Bush had a tough job fighting terrorism; the second said, "I thank God that you're our commander in chief." The audience stood and shouted approval.

Only one questioner challenged his policies, asking why he supported nuclear energy development in India but was putting roadblocks in Iran's way. The president said India was a democracy following international protocol, and Iran was thwarting inspections and other efforts to make sure it did not develop a nuclear weapon.

Other questions were posed by, among others, a National Guard recruiting commander who sought Bush's encouragement for would-be recruits and a Republican campaign director who sought words of support for his campaign. The president praised military volunteers but also recommended other forms of service to the country; he sidestepped the direct appeal for campaign support.

Another questioner was a woman whose husband was at her side in an Army uniform, having just returned from a 13-month tour in Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown. She complained that national television had not shown the positive news about U.S. military accomplishments in Iraq.

The president encouraged her to keep spreading the word, by mouth and by the Internet. But he deflected her criticism of the news media, saying, "The minute we start trying to suppress our press, we look like the Taliban."

Politicos Turn Out For Bush (WHINT)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — When the U.S. president comes to a community for an official visit, local politicians show up to greet Air Force One — regardless of their political party.

West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, a Democrat, was among the first to shake Republican President George W. Bush's hand when he got off the plane Wednesday at the Ohio County Airport. Bush then proceeded to the Capitol Music Hall in downtown Wheeling for a town hall forum.

"I believe anytime a president comes to the state on an official visit it's important for the governor to welcome him," Manchin said.

That Bush came to Wheeling to discuss the War on Terror also was a factor, he added. Manchin had with him data showing that West Virginia presently has 495 troops serving in the Middle East, and that 4,700 Mountain State residents had seen active duty since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. This accounts for 75 percent of the state's National Guard troops, according to Manchin.

"My main goal in being here is to support the troops and see whether they will be able to return safely," Manchin said. "I also want to talk to the president about high gas prices."

Manchin had hoped to get some time with Bush during the visit to discuss the potential for liquefying West Virginia's coal and using it as a national energy source.

Bush acknowledged Manchin during his speech at the Capitol Music Hall.

"He's a good, decent man," Bush said of Manchin. "He showed his heart during the mine tragedies. He represented the best of West Virginia. He showed great compassion, great concern. He asked the nation to pray on behalf of the families. We still must continue to pray for those who lost their loved ones.

Manchin "is a problem-solver, see. He said, 'We're going to deal with this issue head on.' And I appreciate your working closely with the federal government to make sure that there are safety regulations that work, that the inspection process works so that the miners here in this important state are able to do their job and their families can be secure in them doing their job," Bush continued.

Also on the tarmac greeting Bush was U.S. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., who always has accompanied Bush during his visits to the state.

She said she is continuing to support his policies in Iraq.

"We need to continue and complete the mission," Capito said. "When the Iraqis are ready to defend themselves, we can withdraw."

She added that she and other members of Congress now are hearing more from constituents who want the war to end, and they are questioning whether it is a winnable effort.

"These are questions I am asking," Capito said. "Members of Congress are feeling the same anxieties their constituents are."

Delegate Chris Wakim, R-Ohio — also a candidate for the U.S. House against incumbent U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va. — admitted that Bush's appearance in Wheeling "didn't hurt" his campaign. Wakim also used his military background to defend Bush's decision to go to war.

"The president is here today to reinforce the idea that the war needs to be fought over there," Wakim said. "We need to take the terrorists off-base and keep them unbalanced.

"Attacking their supply lines and training facilities are fundamental principles of war," Wakim added. "If these can't be established, the enemy is off-guard."

Delegate Gil White, R-Ohio, said Bush's visit was positive for West Virginia.

"It is an honor for the chief executive to choose Wheeling as the venue for a discussion about the war," he said. "It's a showcase for West Virginia."

State Sen. Andy McKenzie, R-Ohio, added that Wheeling and West Virginia were getting exposure in the national media Wednesday morning.

"Regardless of your politics, the president's visiting is good exposure for a community," he said.

Accompanying McKenzie was his Senate colleague from Morgantown, Sen. Mike Oliverio, D-Monongalia. Oliverio said that while he is a Democrat, he had worked for the successful Supreme Court nomination of Justice Samuel Alito.

As such, the White House contacted him last week and asked him to attend Bush's speech.

In his speech, Bush told Oliverio he did a "great service to his country." He also mentioned that Oliverio had asked him not to hold it against him that he is a Democrat.

"Mike — first and foremost — we're all Americans," Bush told Oliverio.

Reid Criticizes President Bush As 'dangerously Incompetent' (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

The Associated Press, March 22, 2006

LAS VEGAS – Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called President Bush "dangerously incompetent" on Wednesday and said the administration ought to be doing more to prevent increasing sectarian violence in Iraq.

"Where is (Secretary of State) Condoleeza Rice? Why isn't she over in the Middle East, as the chief diplomat of this country should be, trying to get the political forces to form a government over there?" Reid told The Associated Press.

Reid said the U.S. was "failing three different ways in Iraq." Military efforts have lagged, the economy is crippled by decreased oil and electricity production, and attempts to form a representative government are behind schedule, he said.

Reid criticized Bush for a series of recent appearances in key political states in which the president defended his Iraq war policies.

"Why isn't he spending time with these leaders in the Middle East trying to get this government formed?" Reid said.

Reid described the conditions Iraq as "low-grade civil war."

"I don't know how you define civil war. We know they're killing an average of 50 Iraqis a day. At least it's a low-grade civil war, that's for sure," he said.

The Nevada senator's critical remarks about Bush came after a Las Vegas news conference on immigration reform. He was scheduled to appear later on the Mexico-California border to tout Democratic proposals for border security.

Reid also responded to comments the president made Tuesday when he said his successor in the White House would likely be responsible for deciding when U.S. troops leave Iraq.

"To me it shows how dangerously incompetent he is," Reid said. "'Stay the course, mission accomplished, bring 'em on,' the American people are sick of that. We need to change course in Iraq. ... I think the president burying his head in the sand is not going to do the trick."

Cheney Rallies Troops During Appearance At Scott Air Base (SLPD)

By Alan Lewis Gerstenecker, Collinsville Herald

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 22, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney is on a mission, and that assignment is to drum up support for America's war effort in Iraq.

He did that Tuesday during an appearance at Scott Air Force Base.

Addressing more than 3,000 in a flag-adorned and camouflage-draped Hangar One, Cheney spoke for nearly 40 minutes to the nearly exclusively military and military-family crowd.

DOJ_NMG_0020123

"In all of you, I see the best of America, and I admire your commitment to discipline, duty, and service above self," he said. "It's a privilege to be in your company, and I bring the respect and good wishes of our commander in chief, President George W. Bush."

The statement was followed by a prolonged applause.

Clearly, Cheney was in his realm. He was articulate and wavered only slightly from his prepared, eight-page speech, which was interrupted 12 times by applause.

In recent days, he had denied he would resign as public opinion polls revealed support of the Bush Administration had fallen to just 37 percent, and the third anniversary of the war in Iraq had come and gone without signs of an end in sight.

Cheney appeared resilient, showing no signs of the ailing heart that has dogged him.

The former defense secretary-turned-vice president even joked about his familiarity with Scott Air Force Base.

"I first became intimately familiar with the work of Scott Air Force Base in the early 1990s, when I served as secretary of defense – the old days when I had real power and influence," he mused to scattered laughter.

After briefly delving into humor, Cheney went right back to the seriousness of rallying the troops in support of the war in Iraq.

"Our strategy in Iraq is clear," Cheney said. "Our tactics will remain flexible, and we'll keep at the task until we finish the job. Progress has not come easily, but it has been steady, and we can be confident going forward.

"As the Iraqi forces gain strength and experience, and as the political process advances, we'll be able to decrease troop levels without losing our capacity to defeat the terrorists. And, as always, decisions about troop levels will be driven by the conditions on the ground and the judgment of our commanders – not by artificial timelines set by politicians in Washington, D.C.," Cheney said, drawing the longest and loudest applause of his presentation.

Cheney was strong, urging the troops to stay the course.

"Recently, there have been some prominent voices advocating a sudden withdrawal of our forces from Iraq. Some have suggested that this war is not winnable ….. and a few seem almost eager to conclude that the whole struggle is already lost. But they are wrong. The only way to lose this fight is to quit – and that is not an option," Cheney said to another round of applause.

The vice president said the country has a different mindset now than it had five years ago.

"Every American serving in this war can be absolutely certain that the people of our country do not support a policy of passivity, resignation, and defeatism in the face of terror," Cheney said.

"The United States will never go back to the false comforts of the world before Sept. 11, 2001. Terrorist attacks are not caused by the use of strength. They are invited by the perception of weakness.

"In the past, terrorists hit America, and we didn't hit back hard enough. They came to believe that if they killed enough Americans, they could change our policies. And they are now trying to intimidate us into a policy of withdrawal and retreat. But this nation has made a decision: We will engage these enemies – facing them far from home, so we do not have to face them on the streets of our own cities," Cheney said, bringing to mind the resolve of Winston Churchill's "We-will-never-surrender" speech during World War II.

Cheney then defended President George Bush's authority to monitor phone conversations, now an attack point of those who say the president is overstepping his authority.

"We are talking here about a wartime measure, limited in scope to surveillance associated with terrorists ..... and conducted in a way that safeguards the civil liberties of the American people," Cheney said.

"It's important to note that leaders of Congress have been briefed more than a dozen times on the President's authorization, and on activities conducted under it. In addition, the entire program is reconsidered and reauthorized by the President every 45 days. He has reauthorized it more than 30 times since September 11th – and he has indicated his intent to do so as long as our nation faces a continuing threat from al-Qaeda and related organizations," Cheney said.

Waiting for Cheney's arrival, Hangar One was festival-like.

The U.S. Air Force Band of Mid-America performed for two hours, while soldiers with gifted voices sang pop hits leading up to the vice president and Col. Raymond Rottman, commander of the 375th Airlift Wing, leading in the singing of the Air Force Song.

After his speech, Cheney performed a re-enlistment ceremony for nine soldiers and the enlistment of a 10th.

The soldiers are: Keith Moser, Dwayne Ledbetter, Morgan Dixon, Kholifa Kabia, Angela Grannis, Joseph Terrell, Rebecca Place, and Randall Lederman of the Air Force; Eric Ervin of the Marine Corps.; and new recruit Kyle McQuiston, who wore a suit to the ceremony.

"This is just great," said Rachael Whitlow, an Air Force Reservist and Civil Service worker at Scott. "I love our president, and I love my country. I'm here because I support the war. I understand others' rights to protest (the war). They have their opinion. I'm not against that. That's what freedom's all about."

"It was pretty good, and I liked his speech," said Givens, a junior, who was wearing his purple letter jacket. Givens stood out in the crowd in his school colors in a sea of green camouflage.

"I like the fact he supports the military. Coming from a military family, I think that's important. I don't know whether I'm going to join the military, although I'm considering it."

Givens' mother, Susan, said it was important for her son's to attend the event.

"This is as good as any school lesson," Susan Givens said. "I felt like it was important that he get excused to be here today."

Bush's Uncle Earned Millions In War Firm Sale (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

WASHINGTON — As President Bush embarks on a new effort to shore up public support for the war in Iraq, an uncle of the commander in chief is collecting $2.7 million in cash and stock from the recent sale of a company that profited from the war.

A report filed with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission shows that William H.T. Bush collected just under $1.9 million in cash plus stock valued at more than $800,000 from the sale of Engineered Support Systems Inc. to DRS Technologies of New Jersey.

The $1.7-billion deal closed Jan. 31. Both firms have extensive military contracts.

William Bush was a director of Engineered Support Systems. Recent SEC filings show he was paid cash and DRS stock in exchange for shares and options he obtained as a director.

Before DRS purchased it, Missouri-based ESSI experienced record growth as a result of expanded U.S. military contracts — many to supply U.S. efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The contracts, some awarded on a no-bid basis, include a $77-million deal to refit military vehicles with armor for use in Iraq.

Other ESSI products used in the war include radar and detection services, field medical stations and field electrical generator units.

SEC filings show that two federal investigations of ESSI are underway. One inquiry involves a stop order from the government on the field generators. The order was issued because the units didn't operate properly.

The generator contract was a major source of revenue. SEC files show that ESSI did not tell stockholders about the stop order until last June, about seven months after it was issued.

During the interim, several ESSI executives, including Bush's uncle, cashed in stock and stock options worth millions of dollars, the filings show.

According to one recent filing, the SEC and the U.S. attorney in St. Louis are investigating the delayed disclosure and other matters.

Unnamed members of the ESSI board and corporate officers have been subpoenaed in the inquiry, according to documents.

SEC filings show that William Bush, 67, exercised options on 8,348 shares of ESSI stock on Jan. 18, 2005, about two months after the stop order was issued and six months before it was disclosed. He collected about $450,000 in cash.

Bush, known as "Uncle Bucky" in the president's family, joined ESSI's board in 2000, several months before his nephew became president.

He heads a St. Louis investment firm and is the youngest brother of former President George H.W. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0020125

He declined to comment Wednesday. However, in an interview last year, he said he played no role in ESSI's winning federal contracts.

"I don't make any calls to the 202 [Washington, D.C.] area code," he said.

Patricia Williamson, a spokeswoman for DRS, would not comment on the status of the federal investigations.

The company has said it is cooperating in the probes, which also involve an ESSI insurance contract.

Insurgents Shower Iraq Police Center With Mortar Shells (NYT)

By Edward Wong

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 22 — Insurgents on Wednesday laid siege to the headquarters of a police paramilitary unit near the capital, lobbing a volley of mortar shells that killed at least one senior officer and wounded at least five, Interior Ministry officials said.

In the predawn attack, 14 mortar shells hit a government center in the Sunni-dominated town of Salman Pak, 12 miles southeast of Baghdad; the Third Public Order Brigade, which is overwhelmingly Shiite, had been using the center as a base. Among local Sunni Arabs, the brigade has a reputation for torture and abuse.

The members of the paramilitary unit fought back Wednesday, killing at least five insurgents, a commander in Baghdad said. By nightfall, the police were holding at least 76 people for questioning.

On Tuesday, more than 200 insurgents stormed a police station in the town of Muqdadiya, in Diyala Province, freeing more than 30 prisoners and leaving the building a smoldering wreck. At least 18 police officers died. The governor of Diyala said he was investigating the police chief and other officers in the area, to see whether they were accomplices.

That highly coordinated strike raised serious questions about the effectiveness of the Iraqi police forces, at a time when President Bush and American commanders are hailing the growing abilities of the police.

The unit in Salman Pak appeared to have done better in repulsing attackers, though a deputy battalion commander, identified as Col. Ahmad Salim Daher of the Second Battalion, was killed.

The police initially detained 146 people, all Iraqis, and then released 70 after testing them for traces of explosives, said Maj. Gen. Mehdi Sabih Hashem al-Garawi, the commander of the 7,700-member Public Order Forces, which has four brigades operating in Baghdad and the Salman Pak area.

Salman Pak lies in an insurgent-plagued farming region where scores of bodies have turned up. Last year, the Third Public Order Brigade began cracking down. American military advisers had pushed for the removal of a brigade commander who the Americans believed oversaw the abuse and torture of detainees.

The tough tactics brought some quiet to Salman Pak, though the Sunni-led insurgency kept carrying out occasional attacks.

On Wednesday afternoon, insurgents in Baghdad attacked busloads of Shiite pilgrims in two different parts of the city. In all, at least 2 pilgrims were killed and 46 wounded. Police officers rushed to the scenes and fought the insurgents, and at least two officers were killed and four wounded.

A senior Shiite cleric, Hazem al-Aaraji, said on the Iraqiya television network that militiamen from the Mahdi Army had been sent to save the pilgrims, but that American forces had stopped them.

The pilgrims were among millions who had gone over the weekend to the southern city of Karbala to honor the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad who was killed by an army in A.D. 680, sealing the Sunni-Shiite split.

In the port city of Basra, a concealed bomb exploded near a British military vehicle, killing an interpreter working for the British, officials said.

The border between Jordan and Iraq remained closed on Wednesday, as the two governments tried to deal with the scores of Palestinian refugees fleeing sectarian violence in Baghdad. The refugees were stopped by Jordanian border officials and stranded.

Yara Sharif, a spokeswoman for the Amman office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, said a team from the agency was visiting the Palestinians and was expected back in the capital on Thursday to deliver its assessment. She said the group of refugees number 89. The Jordanian spokesman, Nasser Judeh, had initially reported the number above 100.

The agency, Ms. Sharif said, fears that if the violence in Iraq worsens, more Palestinians will flee toward the borders. The agency estimates that 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq. Palestinians here fear retribution from vengeful Shiites because they are Sunni Arabs who were favored by Saddam Hussein.

Further details emerged Wednesday night about the fate of 34 Iraqi security workers who were abducted by uniformed men in central Baghdad on March 8. Sheik Muhsin Naif al-Faisal, one of the security company's owners and a former member of Parliament, said in a telephone interview from London that seven employees were released in recent days. He said he had no idea why his employees had been kidnapped, or who their captors were.

50 Gunmen Attempting To Overtake Prison Captured (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — One day after a successful raid and jailbreak, insurgents laid siege to another prison facility Wednesday. Police said U.S. troops and a special Iraqi unit overwhelmed the gunmen and captured 50 of them at the detention center south of Baghdad.

The pre-dawn attack came a day after 100 Sunni gunmen freed 33 prisoners and wrecked the jail, police station and courthouse in Muqdadiyah. The town is northeast of the capital, about an hour's drive from the Iranian border.

Sixty militants participated in Wednesday's assault, which aimed to free more jailed insurgent fighters, police said.

Meanwhile, the United States' top military commander said he had underestimated the extent of Iraqi reluctance to form a government and end sectarian bloodshed.

“I think that I certainly did not understand the depth of fear that was generated by the decades of Saddam's rule,” said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. “I think a lot of Iraqis have been in the wait-and-see mode longer than I thought they would.”

Pace said one solution was for the Iraqis to recruit more Sunnis into the army and for police forces to balance Shiite domination.

“A unit that has all (sects of) Iraqis embedded in it is better able to handle whatever kind of strife comes along,” Pace said.

The Bush administration views formation of a broad-based government as a first step in quelling violence and allowing the start of a withdrawal of American armed forces.

While the U.S. military has touted its progress in training the Iraqi army and police, a top expert on Iraq said the forces remained poorly matched against the insurgency and al-Qaeda.

“The police have almost no protected vehicles, few heavy weapons similar to those of insurgents, are often located in extremely vulnerable buildings and have weak communications. Corruption is a major issue,” Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic & International Studies, a Washington think tank, wrote this week.

Wednesday's attack on the prison in Madain, 15 miles southeast of Baghdad, began with insurgents firing 10 mortar rounds. They later stormed the facility, which is run by the Interior Ministry.

Four police officers — including the commander of the special unit — died in a two-hour gunbattle, which was subdued after American forces arrived. Among the 50 captured, police said, was one Syrian.

The U.S. military did not respond to a request for comment about its role in the counterattack.

Madain is at the northern tip of Iraq's Sunni-dominated “Triangle of Death,” a farming region that has been rife with sectarian violence — retaliatory kidnappings and killings in the conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

Police have discovered hundreds of corpses in the past four weeks, victims of religious militants conducting revenge killings. At least 21 bodies were found Wednesday, including those of 16 Shiite pilgrims discovered on a Baghdad highway, police said. Millions were returning home Wednesday at the conclusion of an important Shiite commemoration in the holy city of Karbala this week. Elsewhere:

Another Police Station Attacked (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

BAGHDAD — Heavily armed insurgents launched a frontal assault Wednesday on a police station near Baghdad, killing a battalion commander and three of his men in the second such large-scale operation in two days.

Meanwhile, separate rebel attacks on two vehicles in the capital killed 15 pilgrims returning from the southern city of Karbala — the deadliest incident of this week's annual mourning period observed by millions of Shiite Muslims.

The bloodshed demonstrated the continuing insurgent threat on multiple fronts. In the month since they blew up the Golden Mosque, a Shiite shrine in Samarra, Sunni Arab insurgents have been locked with Shiite militias in an escalating communal conflict that has led to the killing of hundreds of Iraqis of both sects, many of them unarmed and ambushed on the road or dragged from their homes in the night.

The bodies of 11 men were found Wednesday in various parts of Baghdad, some of them blindfolded and bearing signs of torture.

Insurgents also have staged daring attacks on Iraqi government and U.S. targets.

The latest was a predawn raid Wednesday by dozens of insurgents on the police facility in Madaen, 15 miles southeast of the capital. Their exact number was unclear because of the darkness. The city is at the northern tip of the so-called triangle of death, a mostly Sunni region rife with sectarian violence.

The Madaen attack was slightly smaller in scale than the dawn raid Tuesday on a judicial and police compound in Muqdadiya, 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, in which at least 17 policemen and guards were killed and 33 prisoners freed.

Emerging from a nearby palm grove, the attackers in Madaen fired 14 mortar rounds into the compound, which houses City Hall and a police battalion, triggering a two-hour shootout that lasted until daybreak, the Interior Ministry said.

The insurgents also fired grenade launchers and automatic rifles but failed to overrun the compound. In addition to the four police officers killed, five were wounded. There was no word on insurgent casualties.

Later in the day, police raided homes in the area and detained 76 men for questioning, the ministry said. One was identified as a Syrian who was carrying insurgent leaflets.

Iraqi police and soldiers have been stretched thin trying to guard the estimated 2 million black-clad pilgrims who walked to and from Karbala this week to mark the 40th and final day of the annual mourning period for Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Insurgents with machine guns fired into a bus taking pilgrims home Wednesday through Baghdad's Sunni-dominated Amiriya district. Fourteen people were killed and 18 wounded, police said. Two police officers died in a shootout with the assailants.

One pilgrim was killed and 22 were wounded in a later attack on a pickup truck in the capital's Adil neighborhood, police said.

At least five other Iraqis were reported killed Wednesday, including an interpreter for two British soldiers whose foot patrol was hit by a roadside bomb blast in the southern city of Basra. Both soldiers were wounded.

Make The President Prime Minister . . . (WSJ)

By Dan Senor And Roman Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Three months after Iraqis turned out in record numbers to vote, Iraq is still without a new government at the exact time it faces increasingly vicious sectarian violence. The core of the impasse is the selection of Iraq's next prime minister. The United Iraqi Alliance (UIA), the fractious coalition of religious Shiite parties that won the largest share of seats, is bitterly divided over its candidate. Last month, it renominated Ibrahim Jaafari, the incumbent prime minister. But the internal ballot was decided by a single vote, following a campaign which some claim was marred by threats of violence from the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

More importantly, a coalition of Kurdish, Sunni and secular-nationalist parties has united to oppose Mr. Jaafari's reappointment. Their threat to block his nomination carries real force, as Iraq's new constitution requires a two-thirds supermajority of parliament to approve the new government. Surprisingly, the UIA has offered only a tepid defense of its nominee, and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani has declined entreaties to intervene and unite the religious Shiites behind Mr. Jaafari.

There is, however, a creative solution to the impasse. Instead of sticking with Mr. Jaafari, the UIA and the other leading parties should consider a compromise that marks a clear break from the status quo. Mr. Jaafari could agree to become Iraq's new president, and Jalal Talabani, the current president and a Kurd, could become prime minister -- a switch. Such a deal would install an Iraqi leader genuinely capable of getting along with all ethnic and sectarian factions, allow Mr. Jaafari to save face by not losing out to a fellow Shiite, and show Sunni Arab politicians that their participation in last December's vote is paying political dividends.

Few doubt Mr. Talabani's capacity for leadership. Large and gregarious, with a dominant and energetic personality that belies his 72 years, he is widely regarded as Iraq's most talented retail politician. A lawyer who spent years fighting Saddam, he is a forceful advocate for moderation and democratic values. He is also among the handful of Iraqi leaders with the political stature to lead a true national-unity government. He could likely attract such disparate and talented figures as Ahmad Chalabi and former PM Ayad Allawi into his cabinet, in addition to technocrats from other political factions.

Objections to Mr. Talabani would center on ethnicity and religion, not ability. Ordinarily, Iraq's predominantly Arab population would think twice about elevating a Kurd to lead the government. But he could be the exception. In today's Iraq, intra-Arab (Shiite-Sunni) tensions have proven to be the most dangerous flashpoints, and Mr. Talabani is one of the few leaders who gets along with all groups. Indeed, in the recent Shiite-Sunni violence, he has played a key "shuttle diplomacy" role to lower tensions.

Elevating Mr. Talabani to Iraq's premiership would upend assumptions about religion as well. Since Iraq's liberation, conventional wisdom has had it that the premier must come from the long-suffering Shiite community. This was a logical starting point -- after all, the Shiites were marginalized under Saddam's dictatorship, despite making up roughly 60% of Iraq's population.But it no longer makes sense today. The political opposition to Mr. Jaafari's nomination is too strong to be ignored. One possible solution would be to replace him with another Shiite candidate from the UIA, such as Vice President Adil Abdel Mahdi. In sharp contrast to Mr. Jaafari, he is widely respected within leadership circles; he has close relations with the other political factions and is one of Iraq's most influential and effective backroom dealmakers.

But Mr. Mahdi is a member of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri), the chief rival to the Sadrists for political leadership of the Shiite community. He was also recently defeated by Mr. Jaafari in an internal UIA ballot. It is almost impossible to imagine that Mr. Jaafari -- whose self-regard is legendary -- would voluntarily step down in favor of his long-time rival. Mr. Mahdi could also be a difficult choice for Sunnis to accept, given Sciri's control over sectarian militias now accused of abusing human rights. Other candidates within the UIA simply lack the political heft to lead the Shiite coalition.

Yet a Talabani candidacy could allow each of the leading factions to claim a victory. Mr. Jaafari is well-suited to assume Iraq's presidency, a largely ceremonial role with little oversight of policy. He could give long and flowery public addresses, without the burden of responsibility for managing the day-to-day affairs. Mr. Mahdi, a close Talabani ally, could become deputy prime minister. His low-key, technocratic style would make him the ideal COO to Mr. Talabani's CEO.

By lowering the stakes in the UIA internal power struggle, a Kurdish PM could help promote political harmony within the Shiite community -- a key goal of its spiritual leader, Grand Ayatollah Sistani. The Shiite alliance would retain a majority of cabinet posts elsewhere in the government, in keeping with their share of the votes last December. Iraq's Sunni community would also welcome a Talabani-led government. Despite their longstanding fears of Kurdish separatism, Sunni leaders now see Shiite sectarianism as the greatest threat. Mr. Talabani's moderation would be viewed as a welcome development. Just as important, it would provide a clear deliverable for Sunni politicians to take to their voters, and would demonstrate the value of their decision to take part in last year's election.

The time has come for Iraq's leaders to break out of the ethnic and sectarian straitjacket constraining talks over the new government. By uniting around a Talabani-led coalition government, Iraqi leaders can move to address the pressing security challenges now facing their country. The clock is ticking.

No Headline. (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, March 23, 2006

While officials privately debate whether communitarian violence in Iraq constitutes a low-grade civil war, there is no disagreement about the oil crisis there, which has little to do with the insurgency. Gasoline and home heating fuel are scarce and expensive, thanks to runaway corruption. This problem's difficulty and importance will test the new Iraqi government once it is organized.

Industry sources privately cite corruption as the reason for recent decisions by Turkey and Saudi Arabia to halt gasoline exports to Iraq for nonpayment of bills. That exacerbates a worsening situation where Iraq, one of the world's great petroleum producers, has to truck in gasoline from Kuwait.

While the formal line in Washington and Baghdad blames insurgents for the oil crisis, U.S. officials who are close to the situation gave me a totally different explanation. They blame corruption at every level, from the oil ministry on down, that is common to Iraq. It cannot be controlled by the Americans but is the responsibility of the long-delayed Iraqi government. Thus, oil is a microcosm of the overall conundrum in Iraq, where there are no good options for the Bush administration in dealing with a culture where honesty and efficiency historically have been rare.

The exhilaration in the Bush administration that the Anglo-American attack in 2003 had preserved the oil-producing capacity is as illusory as claims of victory three years ago. The fuel shortages in oil-rich Iraq are profound and growing worse, with endless lines at gasoline stations. That drives up prices to the equivalent of $15 for a cylinder of home fuel -- too expensive for the average Iraqi.

The best explanation for this was given to me by a non-political U.S. civil servant, an "Arabist" with vast experience in the region. He has been ordered definitively to say nothing and write nothing about oil in Iraq or anything else to do with the country. He spoke to me only if I would not identify him, by name or organization.

My source blamed corruption on an unimaginable level. "There is no system for turning on the oil in Iraq," he told me. "Everyone there is taking their cut. Everybody takes a little." It is corruption from top to bottom. At a time of an acute shortage in Iraq, oil is being surreptitiously sent across the border for gain.

Such corruption is familiar there. The situation is endemic in the brief, tragic history of Iraq. Since the discovery of the country's liquid wealth, government officials have been dipping into the proceeds. This was true during the monarchy and the successor governments, including Saddam Hussein's. The addiction to corruption also contributed to the United Nations oil-for-food scandal.

The immediate crying need of Iraq's oil industry three years after the invasion is for substantial investment in improvements for infrastructure and technology. It was assumed that once the dictatorial regime was displaced, money from all over the world would pour into Iraq. But there is no inclination by risk capital to put any money in enterprises that are bleeding money to corrupt officials throughout the government.

Everybody with any familiarity with this situation believes the only answer is that the new Iraqi government, still unformed three months after the election, must gain control over corruption. One former U.S. official with experience in Iraq says: "We really have no levers left to pull, except hope that the government we're backing becomes powerful enough to take on the crooks."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, a frequent visitor to Iraq, is well aware of this dilemma. "The future of Iraq is in the hands of the Iraqis," he told me. Hagel is not yet ready to call for a unilateral military withdrawal from Iraq, realizing that the dreary conditions there -- including the oil crisis -- would get worse if the United States disconnected today. The pocketing of oil revenues by corrupt bureaucrats will hardly be improved by a quick American exit.

I erred in Monday's column when I wrote that President Bush was mistaken in saying the Hungarian National Day event he attended at the Capitol March 15 celebrated the 50th anniversary of Hungary's 1956 anti-Soviet rebellion. March 15 is actually the anniversary of the 1848 Hungarian Revolution, but the invitation to the president noted the Oct. 23, 1956, uprising.

Ex-Iraqi Official Unveiled As Spy (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's last foreign minister, Naji Sabri, was a paid spy for French intelligence, which later turned him over to the CIA to supply information about Iraq and its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs more than six months before the war began in March 2003, according to former senior intelligence officials.

Although some CIA officials met informally with Sabri, who traveled extensively outside Iraq, the French and the CIA used a third-country intermediary when attempting to get information from him about Hussein's inner circle and weapons programs, according to the retired officials who refused to be identified because the information is classified.

"It was never clear what he wanted," one former official familiar with the situation said of Sabri, "but we never paid him." Sabri's role in providing information to the United States was reported by NBC News on Tuesday.

Over the summer of 2002, Sabri, as foreign minister, negotiated the terms U.N. inspectors' return to Iraq, and in November 2002 he announced Hussein's acceptance of the proposal.

Publicly Sabri was insisting that Iraq had no prohibited weapons of mass destruction. Privately, the sources said, he provided information that the Iraqi dictator had ambitions for a nuclear program but that it was not active, and that no biological weapons were being produced or stockpiled, although research was underway.

When it came to chemical weapons, Sabri told his handler that some existed but they were not under military control, a former intelligence official familiar with the situation said. Another former official added: "He said he had been told Hussein had them dispersed among some of the loyal tribes."

At the time, the Bush administration was preparing for the coalition's invasion of Iraq and publicly insisting that Hussein had reconstituted nuclear programs and was concealing from United Nations inspectors both chemical and biological weapons in violation of Security Council resolutions. The White House, which was seeking a congressional resolution that would permit the use of force against Iraq, hoped Sabri would defect, the two former officials said.

"They wanted a big public defection, which would have been good for the policy," one official said. But Sabri comes from a prominent Iraqi family and defection was not an option, one of the former officials said.

The White House was far more interested in trying to get Sabri to defect than in the information he was providing on Iraq's weapons programs, in part because the intelligence community did not trust him, another former intelligence official said.

Sabri took office in fall 2001 after a major housecleaning of Hussein's foreign affairs team. A diplomat with an Iraqi Christian background, Sabri once taught English literature at Baghdad University and was director general of the information ministry during the Persian Gulf War. His brother was one of the Iraqi officials that Hussein had killed because of alleged disloyalty.

Sabri was described as "smart and smooth" by a U.N. official who dealt with him, and as "a type that appeals to Westerners." According to a former intelligence officer, Sabri went out of his way to spend time with Americans and others when he was a diplomatic official in Vienna.

In a speech in February 2004, then-CIA Director George J. Tenet referred to Sabri, although not by name, when he said the CIA had obtained information from "a source who had direct access to Saddam and his inner circle." Tenet said that source described Hussein as covertly seeking to get a nuclear weapon and having stockpiled chemical weapons while his scientists were only "dabbling" with biological weapons development with little success.

Army Dog Handler Gets Six Months In Prison (WP)

By Josh White

DOJ_NMG_0020131

Military jurors sentenced an Army dog handler to less than six months behind bars yesterday for using his Belgian shepherd to intimidate detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, one of the lightest sentences so far for a soldier implicated in the notorious abuse.

Sgt. Michael J. Smith, 24, was ordered to serve 179 days in confinement and to forfeit $2,250 in pay for convictions on five criminal counts, including maltreatment of detainees, dereliction of duty and an indecent act. Smith will also be reduced to the rank of private, E-1, and will receive a bad-conduct discharge at the end of his prison term, according to an Army spokeswoman at Fort Meade, where the court-martial ended yesterday. The jury could have sent Smith to prison for as long as 8 1/2 years.

The sentence was the lightest given to any of the four military police soldiers who have gone to trial, rather than entered guilty pleas, for abuse at Abu Ghraib. The jury of four officers and three senior noncommissioned officers decided Smith's use of his military working dog was out of bounds but not especially egregious, acquitting him on half of the original charges. Smith was also the first soldier to have had the benefit of a senior officer testifying, with Col. Thomas M. Pappas taking some responsibility for ordering the use of dogs in interrogations in late 2003 without clearly defining rules for the aggressive tactic.

Former corporal Charles A. Graner Jr. received the longest sentence, 10 years, for abuse at Abu Ghraib that included piling naked detainees into a pyramid, and former private first class Lynndie R. England was sentenced to three years in prison for her role. They were both denied the opportunity to call senior officials from the prison in their defense. Former specialist Sabrina D. Harman also received six months after being found guilty at trial.

Several others pleaded guilty to abuse, with former staff sergeant Ivan L. Frederick receiving the longest sentence among them, 8 1/2 years. Pappas took an administrative punishment, which included an $8,000 fine and relief from command of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade.

Smith's sentence is the second relatively short term handed down in recent months by a jury weighing abuse charges. In January, a military jury in Colorado convicted an interrogator of killing a detainee at a facility near the Syrian border while using an aggressive technique, but declined to sentence him to jail time after hearing testimony that superior officers had condoned the method.

In Smith's case, testimony reflected confusion at the prison about the use of dogs. Smith's dog, Marco, was shown in one of the well-publicized Abu Ghraib photographs, snarling just inches away from the face of a frightened detainee. Officers, including Pappas, acknowledged that the animals were brought in to help control prisoners, and others testified that the dogs were deterrents to detainee violence. Smith's defense attorneys said he was using the dog the way he was supposed to: allowing it to bark and snarl at detainees to scare them.

Prosecutors, however, said Smith was a "rogue" soldier who engaged in a contest with another dog handler to get detainees to soil themselves. They said last week that Smith never had authority to use his dog the way he did, and they likened him to a bad cop amusing himself at the expense of the detainees in his charge.

Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, another dog handler at the prison who was captured in a few pictures of alleged abuse, is scheduled to go to court-martial on similar charges in May. Among the charges Smith was acquitted of this week was abusing a detainee that Cardona is accused of mistreating in the same incident.

Harvey Volzer, a civilian lawyer who represents Cardona, said yesterday that he thinks top officials have pushed a policy of abuse for which front-line soldiers are taking the heat.

"I would like to see someone in command admit that they intended to end the war and gain Iraqi freedom more expeditiously by using the dogs to get better intelligence," Volzer said. "Instead, everyone from [President] Bush down is perfectly content to allow enlisted persons to be scapegoats for their actions."

Iraq Abuse Trial Is Again Limited To Lower Ranks (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

With the conviction on Tuesday of an Army dog handler, the military has now tried and found guilty another low-ranking soldier in connection with the pattern of abuses that first surfaced two years ago at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

But once again, an attempt by defense lawyers to point a finger of responsibility at higher-ranking officers failed in the latest case to convince a military jury that ultimate responsibility for the abuses lay farther up the chain of command.

Some military experts said one reason there had not been attempts to pursue charges up the military chain of command was that the military does not have anything tantamount to a district attorney's office, run by commanders with the authority to go after the cases.

"The real question is, who is the independent prosecutor who is liberated to pursue these cases," said Eugene Fidell, a specialist in military law. "There is no central prosecution office run by commanders. So you don't have a D.A. thinking, I'm going to follow this wherever it leads."

Among all the abuse cases that have reached military courts, the trial of the dog handler, Sgt. Michael J. Smith, had appeared to hold the greatest potential to assign accountability to high-ranking military and perhaps even civilian officials in Washington. Some military experts had thought the trial might finally explore the origins of the harsh interrogation techniques that were used at Abu Ghraib; at the Bagram detention center in Afghanistan; and at other sites where abuses occurred.

Sergeant Smith, who was convicted Tuesday for abusing detainees in Iraq with his black Belgian shepherd, had said he was merely following interrogation procedures approved by the chief intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, Col. Thomas M. Pappas. In turn, Colonel Pappas had said he had been following guidance from Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, commander of the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who in September 2003 visited Iraq to discuss ways to "set the conditions" for enhancing prison interrogations, as well as from superiors in Baghdad.

General Miller had been dispatched to Guantánamo Bay by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to improve the interrogation procedures and the quality of intelligence at the compound in Cuba.

But in Sergeant Smith's trial, General Miller was never called to testify. Colonel Pappas acknowledged that he had mistakenly authorized a one-time use of muzzled dogs to keep prisoners in order outside their cells, but he said that he had no idea that dog handlers were using unmuzzled dogs to terrorize detainees as part of the interrogation process. Colonel Pappas had previously been reprimanded and relieved of his command, but was permitted to testify under a grant of immunity.

Previous defendants who have tried and failed to win approval from military judges to summon high-ranking officers to explain their own role in abuse cases include Charles A. Graner Jr. and Lynndie R. England, two of the Army reservists who were convicted in 2005 for their misconduct at Abu Ghraib. In denying defense requests for testimony from witnesses including Mr. Rumsfeld and Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, formerly the top American commander in Iraq, an Army judge, Col. James Pohl, ruled that their actions did not have any direct bearing on the reservists' conduct.

In a telephone interview on Wednesday, Maj. Wayne Marotto, an Army spokesman, said that more than 600 accusations of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan since October 2001 had been investigated, and that 251 officers and enlisted soldiers had been punished in some way for misconduct related to prisoners. To date, the highest-ranking officer convicted in relation to the abuses is Capt. Shawn Martin of the Army, who was found guilty last March of kicking detainees and staging the mock execution of a prisoner. He was sentenced to 45 days in jail and fined $12,000.

Sergeant Smith had faced a maximum sentence of eight and a half years, but on Wednesday was sentenced to just under six months (179 days) in prison.

"A mere tap on the wrist for abusing prisoners gives the appearance that once again that the United States is not serious about its responsibility to discipline those convicted of human rights violations," Curt Goering, Amnesty International's senior deputy executive director for policy and programs, said in a statement.

Sergeant Smith will also be demoted to private, fined $2,250 and will be released from the Army with a bad-conduct discharge after serving his sentence.

Several generals and colonels have received career-ending reprimands and have been stripped of their commands, but there is no indication that other senior-level officers and civilian officials will ever be held accountable for the detainee abuses that took place in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The toughest official criticism Mr. Rumsfeld has faced was a relatively mild admonishment in August 2004 from a panel led by former Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, which faulted Mr. Rumsfeld for not exercising sufficient oversight.

But when Mr. Schlesinger was asked at the time if Mr. Rumsfeld or other high-ranking officials should resign in an ultimate act of accountability, he said that the secretary's "resignation would be a boon for all of America's enemies." President Bush later declined to accept Mr. Rumsfeld's two offers to resign.

Congress has largely retreated from any meaningful effort to hold senior officials accountable. Last year, Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who heads the Armed Services Committee, vowed to hold hearings on senior-level accountability. But Mr. Warner later backed off his promise, saying it would have to wait until judicial and nonjudicial proceedings were exhausted, a process that could take several more months.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has delayed General Miller's scheduled retirement, and Mr. Warner said in an interview on Tuesday that he would call both Colonel Pappas and General Miller to testify before the committee once all court proceedings that could involve them are complete.

Two other cases may yield new information. Army officials are still reviewing a possible criminal case against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, another former senior intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib.

The trial of a second dog handler, Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, is scheduled to begin on May 22, and it may offer another occasion for defense lawyers to try to direct blame at higher levels. Sergeant Cardona's lawyer, Harvey Volzer, said in a telephone interview on Wednesday that his defense would include information not revealed in Sergeant Smith's trial. Mr. Volzer said he would seek to have Mr. Rumsfeld, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of American forces in the Mideast, and General Sanchez all testify at Sergeant Cardona's trial.

Army Dog Handler Gets 6 Months For Iraq Abuse (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau, Associated Press

FORT MEADE, Md. -- An Army dog handler was sentenced yesterday to nearly six months in prison for tormenting Abu Ghraib prisoners with his snarling Belgian shepherd.

Sgt. Michael J. Smith, 24, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., was ordered to serve 179 days in prison and was reduced to the rank of private. He also will forfeit $750 per month of his pay for three months and receive a bad-conduct discharge after his release from prison.

Under military law, a prison sentence and a bad-conduct discharge requires Smith to forfeit all pay during his time in prison, despite the jury's sentence, said Lt. Col. Bobbi Davis, a military legal specialist.

Smith had faced up to 8½ years in prison after his conviction Tuesday on five of the 13 offenses with which he was charged.

The jury convicted Smith of conspiring with another dog handler to try to frighten detainees into soiling themselves and directing his dog to lick peanut butter off of other soldiers' bodies.

In closing arguments, prosecutors urged the panel of four officers and three senior noncommissioned officers to send Smith to prison for at least three years, followed by a bad-conduct discharge. Maj. Matthew Miller, a prosecution lawyer, said such a sentence would send a message that such actions will not be tolerated.

"Every soldier must understand that individual acts of misconduct have strategic implications," Maj. Miller said. "This is a global war on terror. It is a global battle for the hearts and minds of people all over the world."

But the defense said Smith should serve no jail time and instead be returned to his family and his unit. Capt. Scott Rolle, Smith's attorney, told the jury that while Smith made mistakes at Abu Ghraib, he also is "a hero," decorated for saving the lives of other U.S. soldiers during a mortar attack.

Smith appeared unrepentant about the abuse charges when he addressed the jury Tuesday, shortly after he was convicted.

"Soldiers are not supposed to be soft and cuddly," he said.

He said he wished he had gotten his orders in writing for self-protection because soldiers who do not "end up in a heap of trouble."

The relatively light sentence surprised Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice in the District, who said he thought Smith would get years, not months, of confinement.

"I think people around the world are going to be scratching their heads at that sentence," he said. "The conduct of which this soldier was convicted is highly offensive, and if this is all one gets, it's not impunity, but it's getting real close."

Nine other soldiers have been convicted of abusing prisoners at Abu Ghraib, in many cases by forcing them to assume painful positions and humiliate themselves sexually while being photographed. Former Cpl. Charles Graner Jr. received the longest sentence -- 10 years in prison. Lynndie England, 23, a reservist photographed giving a thumbs-up in front of naked prisoners, is serving three years behind bars.

The Joy Of Being Blameless (NYT)

The contrast could not have been more stark, nor the message more clear. On the day that a court-martial imposed justice on a 24-year-old Army sergeant for tormenting detainees at Abu Ghraib with his dog, President Bush said once again that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, whose benighted policies and managerial incompetence led to the prisoner abuse scandal, was doing a "fine job" and should stay at his post.

We've seen this sorry pattern for nearly two years now, since the Abu Ghraib horrors first shocked the world: President Bush has clung to the fiction that the abuse of prisoners was just the work of a few rotten apples, despite report after report after report demonstrating that it was organized and systematic, and flowed from policies written by top officials in his administration.

Just this week, Eric Schmitt and Carolyn Marshall provided a bloodcurdling account in the Times of how a Special Operations unit converted an Iraqi military base into a torture chamber, even using prisoners as paintball targets, in its frenzy to counter a widely predicted insurgency for which Mr. Rumsfeld had refused to prepare. In early 2004, an 18-year-old man suspected of selling cars to members of a terrorist network was arrested and beaten repeatedly. Another man said he had been forced to strip, punched in the spine until he fainted, put in front of an air-conditioner while cold water was poured on him and kicked in the stomach until he vomited. His crime? His father had worked for Saddam Hussein.

These accounts are tragically familiar. The names and dates change, but the basic pattern is the same, including the fact that this bestiality produced little or no useful intelligence. The Bush administration decided to go outside the law to deal with prisoners, and soldiers carried out that policy. Those who committed these atrocities deserve the punishment they are getting, but virtually all high-ranking soldiers have escaped unscathed. And not a single policy maker has been called to account.

Col. Thomas Pappas, the former intelligence chief at Abu Ghraib, testified at the dog handler's trial that the use of dogs had grown out of conversations he had had with military jailers from Guantánamo Bay led by Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller, who had been sent to Iraq to instruct soldiers there in the interrogation techniques refined at Gitmo under Mr. Rumsfeld's torture-is-legal policy. Colonel Pappas said General Miller had explained how to use the "Arab fear of dogs" to set up interrogations.

What of General Miller? He invoked his right against self-incrimination to avoid testifying, and Time magazine reported this week that he was exonerated by an Army whitewash. Apparently he was not responsible for the actions of soldiers operating under rules he put in place.

About the only high-ranking officer whose career has suffered over Abu Ghraib is Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, who was the commander in Iraq at the time. General Sanchez should certainly take responsibility, but he was also a victim of administration blunders.

General Sanchez was vaulted inappropriately from head of the First Armored Division to overall commander because Mr. Bush declared "mission accomplished": the war's over. He was then denied the staff, soldiers and equipment he needed to deal with the insurgency that quickly broke out and produced thousands of prisoners.

Mr. Bush has refused to hold himself or any of his top political appointees accountable for those catastrophic errors. Indeed, he has promoted many of them. And this is not an isolated problem. It's just one example, among many, of how this president's men run no risk of being blamed for anything that happens, not matter how egregious.

Almost 1,000 members of the U.S. Foreign Service have volunteered for duty in Iraq since 2003. The Foreign Service Journal, the magazine of the American Foreign Service Association, recently surveyed active-duty Foreign Service officers

(FSOs) about their tour there. Fifty-seven who replied served or currently serve in Iraq either at the embassy in Baghdad or elsewhere in the country. Here are some of their responses, as excerpted from an article in the March issue by Shawn Dorman, titled "Iraq Service and Beyond."

What motivated you to volunteer for Iraq service?

The most frequently stated response was, in various iterations, "to serve my country." Many spoke of a desire to serve where they are most needed. Some respondents mentioned an additional hope that Iraq service would be career-enhancing, while others pointed to the financial incentives.

How does the way you work in Iraq differ from the way you worked at other posts?

The three top ways working in Iraq differs from other places, according to the respondents, are: the level of danger, the extreme work hours and the non-integrated command structure between the embassy, the military and the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office.

Another factor raised by many survey respondents was the impact of having so many appointees and contractors at the mission, many of whom have never served in an embassy or overseas before.

One officer notes the difference by describing a trip to the Red Zone he had just taken the day before to meet with an Iraqi contact. (The Red Zone is all of Iraq outside the protected central-Baghdad area known unofficially as the Green Zone and officially as the International Zone.)

"I traveled to the meeting with three armored vehicles and 14 fully-armed contractors in assault gear as my personal security escort. I was met by six more of the same at the site who had secured the building before my arrival. As we entered Check Point One on our return to the International Zone, a car bomb detonated at Check Point Two, killing two and injuring many more. Timing is everything."

Many respondents commented on the "extreme" work hours. It is clear that the pace in Baghdad is frenetic and the flow of incoming taskings is relentless.

"The day begins at 8 a.m. or before, with meetings scheduled as late as 8 p.m.," explains an FSO serving in Baghdad. "People routinely work until 11 p.m., and there never seems to be a break. It creates a kind of Vegas casino atmosphere where you don't know if it's night or day outside because the activity level is constant. We have Friday 'off' but since Washington works on Friday, we need to be here then as well."

Are you able to do your job effectively, as one might expect at another post if you had the same portfolio? Can you see or talk to the people you need to? Can you communicate effectively with them (i.e., in Arabic, English)?

The most common response to the question about effectiveness was a conditional yes. The security situation is by far the most limiting factor. This includes both the difficulty of arranging meetings outside the Green Zone and the restrictions resulting from traveling to those meetings with armed guards.

"Extreme perseverance, determination and stubbornness are required to overcome the myriad of difficulties of performing diplomatic duties," writes an FSO serving in Baghdad. "However, often security restrictions keep us overly locked down and in a bubble, where we cannot accurately track or influence events."

Do security precautions limit your ability to do your job, and if so, how?

"It is not possible to leave the Green Zone without bodyguards," says an FSO serving in Baghdad, "and it is necessary to request them at least two days prior to any trip out. Many times security conditions will make it necessary to cancel or postpone a planned trip. The heavy security presence that accompanies us into the Red Zone also puts a damper on meetings. These security precautions are, however, absolutely necessary. This is a war zone and there are people out there who are actively trying to kill us. Anyone who doubts the need for the security precautions in place should be immediately removed from the mission."

"Security limits my ability to work," writes one officer serving in Baghdad. "Iraqis don't want me to visit their ministry with my personal security detail in town because that makes them a target. At the same time it is such a hassle to put in for and be approved for a Personal Security Detail and to coordinate the movement. There is very little flexibility, so no spontaneous action is ever possible."

Is housing adequate and sufficiently secure?

Housing security is described by respondents as a significant problem for Foreign Service personnel serving in Baghdad who are not with USAID. Without being specific (though respondents were very specific) about the security problems, suffice it to say that most respondents feel that the trailers -- informally referred to as "hooches" -- are unsafe.

"Not only is housing inadequate," writes an FSO serving in Baghdad, "[but] basic privacy is not respected. The housing contractor, KBR, regularly goes into private housing for inspections without notice. Three such recent 'inspections' to my hooch did not result in needed repairs. When there is indirect mortar or rocket fire (a fairly common occurrence), the announcement tells us to seek cover under our beds (eight-inch clearance) or under our flimsy desks. I certainly do not feel safe when the entire hooch shakes violently from a nearby hit (five occurrences during four months so far)."

Many positions in Iraq have been and continue to be filled by non-career appointees, contractors and detailees from outside the Foreign Service. What has been the impact of this?

Out of some 2,000-plus people working on the U.S. embassy compound in Baghdad, fewer than 200 are career Foreign Service. Of course, at many embassies, State and the other foreign affairs agencies are a minority compared to the other federal agencies represented, but there is no other embassy in the world that is host to so many non-Foreign Service employees, political appointees and contractors.

"Frankly, I think a lot of the political appointees were disasters," writes an officer who served in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities. "They seemed to be ideologues rather than diplomats. A lot of the contractors and other detailees I met seemed quite capable."

Do you believe that Iraq service has helped or not helped your career? How?

Service in Iraq may give a boost for employees when they come up for review for promotion, but no conclusion could be drawn from the input we received on this question. For many people it is too early to tell what Iraq service will do for their career.

George Bush's Trillion-Dollar War (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Call it the trillion-dollar war.

George W. Bush's war in Iraq was never supposed to be particularly expensive. Administration types tossed out numbers like $50 billion and $60 billion. When Lawrence Lindsey, the president's chief economic adviser, said the war was likely to cost $100 billion to $200 billion, he was fired.

Some in the White House tried to spread the fantasy that Iraqi oil revenues would pay for the war. Paul Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary and a fanatical hawk, told Congress that Iraq was "a country that can really finance its own reconstruction, and relatively soon."

The president and his hot-for-war associates were as wrong about the money as they were about the weapons of mass destruction.

Now comes a study by Joseph Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize-winning economist at Columbia University, and a colleague, Linda Bilmes of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, that estimates the "true costs" of the war at more than $1 trillion, and possibly more than $2 trillion.

"Even taking a conservative approach and assuming all U.S. troops return by 2010, we believe the true costs exceed a trillion dollars," the authors say.

The study was released earlier this year but has not gotten much publicity. The analysis by Professors Stiglitz and Bilmes goes beyond the immediate costs of combat operations to include other direct and indirect costs of the war that, in some cases, the government will have to shoulder for many years.

These costs, the study says, "include disability payments to veterans over the course of their lifetimes, the cost of replacing military equipment and munitions, which are being consumed at a faster-than-normal rate, the cost of medical treatment for returning Iraqi war veterans, particularly the more than 7,000 [service members] with brain, spinal, amputation and other serious injuries, and the cost of transporting returning troops back to their home bases."

The study also notes that Defense Department expenditures that were not directly appropriated for Iraq have grown by more than 5 percent since the war began. But a portion of that increase has been spent "on support for the war in Iraq, including significantly higher recruitment costs, such as nearly doubling the number of recruiters, paying recruitment bonuses of up to $40,000 for new enlistees and paying special bonuses and other benefits, up to $150,000 for current Special Forces troops that re-enlist."

"Another cost to the government," the study says, "is the interest on the money that it has borrowed to finance the war."

Among the things taken into account by the study are some of the difficult-to-quantify but very real costs inflicted by the war on the American economy and society, such as the effect of the war on oil prices, and the economic loss that results from the many thousands of Americans wounded and killed in the war.

The study does not address the substantial costs of the war borne by Iraq or by any other countries besides the United States.

In an interview, Mr. Stiglitz said that about $560 billion, which is a little more than half of the study's conservative estimate of the cost of the war, would have been enough to "fix" Social Security for the next 75 years. If one were thinking in terms of promoting democracy in the Middle East, he said, the money being spent on the war would have been enough to finance a "mega-mega-mega-Marshall Plan," which would have been "so much more" effective than the invasion of Iraq.

It's not easy to explain just how much money $1 trillion really is. Imagine a stack of bills worth $1 million that is roughly six inches high. (Think big denominations — a mix of $100 bills and $1,000 bills, mostly $1,000's.) If the six-inch stack were enlarged to the point where it was worth $1 billion, it would be as tall as the Washington Monument, about 500 feet. If it were worth $1 trillion, the stack would be 95 miles high.

Ms. Bilmes said that the $1 trillion we're spending on Iraq amounts to about $10,000 for every household in the U.S.

At his press conference on Tuesday, President Bush made it clear that whatever the cost, American forces would not be leaving Iraq soon. When asked whether a day would come when there were no U.S. forces in Iraq, he said that decision would be made by future presidents and future governments of Iraq.

The meter's running. We're at a trillion dollars, and counting.

Bush, Rice Express Concern For Afghan (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

President Bush called on Afghanistan on Wednesday to respect the religious freedom of an Afghan citizen on trial for his life for converting from Islam to Christianity.

"We expect them to honor the universal principle of freedom," Bush said in a statement in Wheeling, W.Va., preceding a speech on Iraq. "I'm troubled when I hear, deeply troubled when I hear, the fact that a person who converted away from Islam may be held to account."

While not demanding that the trial be stopped and the defendant released, Bush said he wanted to make sure that "people are protected in their capacity to worship."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice followed up with a meeting with Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, whose government is an ally of the United States in the war on terror.

She told him she was deeply troubled by the case and called the prosecution "contrary to universal democratic values," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Rice also told Abdullah that those values include freedom of religion, which the United States fought for in Afghanistan and elsewhere, McCormack said.

And she told the foreign minister that the case ran contrary to the Afghan constitution.

The statements by Bush and Rice toughened the U.S. stance in a controversy that has spread beyond Southeast Asia, evoking statements of concern, for instance, in Germany and Italy.

On Tuesday, administration officials expressed respect for Afghanistan's sovereignty while also registering their concern over the case.

DOJ_NMG_0020138

The case involves a 41-year-old Afghan man, Abdul Rahman, who converted from Islam and was arrested last month after his family accused him of becoming a Christian. The conversion is a crime under Afghanistan's Islamic laws.

Abdullah made no statement after his meeting with Rice, which was not listed on her public schedule.

Here for strategic talks, Abdullah said Tuesday he hoped "through our constitutional process there will be a satisfactory result." He did not say whether he thought the defendant would be found innocent.

On Wednesday, the Afghan embassy responded to expressions of concern with a statement saying the Kabul government "is fully aware of and pursuing the best way to resolve Mr. Rahman's case judicially."

"It's too early to draw a conclusion about the punishment," the statement said.

But it said Rahman's mental fitness was being evaluated by the judicial system and that results may end the proceedings.

Michael Cromartie, chair of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, said in a statement he had written to Bush to express concern about the trial and the threatened execution of Rahman.

Cromartie told the president that the prosecutor had called Rahman "a microbe (who) should be cut off and removed from the rest of Muslim society and should be killed."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations issued a statement calling for Rahman's release. "Religious decisions should be matters of personal choice, not a cause for state intervention," the Muslim civil liberties group said.

Afghan Trial Of Christian 'Troubles' Bush (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W. Va. -- President Bush yesterday said he was "deeply" troubled by the trial in Afghanistan of a Christian who could face execution for converting from Islam and vowed to pressure the Afghan government on the matter.

"It is deeply troubling that a country we helped liberate would hold a person to account because they chose a particular religion over another," Mr. Bush said.

Abdul Rahman could face the death penalty for rejecting Islam. He converted to Christianity 16 years ago while working for a Christian aid organization in Pakistan, but it just came to light recently during a custody battle over his two children.

While nations such as Italy and Germany lodged strong protests earlier this week against the trial, the U.S. State Department on Tuesday was more tepid, calling the case a matter for Afghan authorities.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush took a much firmer stance.

"We have got influence in Afghanistan, and we are going to use it to remind them that there are universal values," he said.

It appeared yesterday that Afghanistan was looking for a way out of the international furor over the matter. The Associated Press, reporting from Kabul, Afghanistan, quoted a prosecutor as saying Mr. Rahman may be mentally unfit for trial.

"We think he could be mad. He is not a normal person. He doesn't talk like a normal person," said the prosecutor, Sarinwal Zamari, while the AP also quoted a religious adviser to President Hamid Karzai as saying that Mr. Rahman will have an exam and that if he is deemed unfit, the case against him would be dropped.

Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah on Tuesday said that he understood American concerns but that the matterwas a legal one and the government "has nothing to do with it."

Prosecutors said the case against Mr. Rahman would be dropped if he converted back to Islam, but he has refused. The state-sponsored Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission has said Mr. Rahman violated Islamic law by converting to another religion and should be punished.

The trial has become a cause for Christians worldwide and for conservative groups in the United States, who demanded that the U.S. government intervene.

"Americans have not given their lives so that Christians can be put to death," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations, an American Muslim advocacy group, also joined the call for Mr. Rahman to be released.

"Islam advocates both freedom of religion and freedom of conscience," the group said.

DOJ_NMG_0020139

The trial could be a stumbling block for Mr. Bush, who is traveling across the U.S. arguing that freedom and democracy are universal values and modern civil societies can rise from formerly oppressed Middle Eastern nations.

He has talked about allowing nations to form democracies in their own style, and often points to Japan's development of a "Japanese-style democracy" after World War II as a model.

But an Afghanistan-style democracy that includes trials of Christian converts is unacceptable to Mr. Bush's supporters.

"How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians?" Mr. Perkins said.

Speaking in Wheeling at a town-hall-style event yesterday, Mr. Bush raised the issue himself, saying he was "deeply troubled."

But a firefighter in the audience challenged Mr. Bush to go further and reminded him that hundreds of firefighters died in the September 11 attacks by al Qaeda, whose leader, Osama bin Laden, was based in Afghanistan with the permission of the ruling Taliban.

"Do you have an army of sociologists to go over there and change that country, or are you hoping that in a couple decades that we can change the mind-set over there?" the firefighter asked.

"We can solve this problem by working closely with the government that we've got contacts with -- and will," Mr. Bush said. "We'll deal with this issue diplomatically and remind people that there is something as universal as being able to choose religion."

Being Christian In Afghanistan (TIME)

By Tony Karon

When a Christian believer in a nation wholly dependent on U.S. support faces trial and possibly execution simply for embracing the same faith as the President of the United States, you'd think that country would be read the riot act. Instead, Washington's response to the trial in Afghanistan of Abdul Rahman has been rather muted. President Bush said Wednesday he was deeply troubled by the case and said he expected Afghanistan to "honor the universal principle of freedom." Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nicholas Burns has urged the Afghan authorities to follow what he said was their own constitution's commitment to the principle of freedom of worship, but added that the U.S. was not going to get involved in the case. "This is a case that is not under the competence of the United States," he said. "It is under the competence of the Afghan authorities. We hope that the Afghan constitution is going to be upheld, and in our view, if it is upheld, he will be found to be innocent."

Perhaps, but there's hardly any certainty over that outcome — even in the new Afghanistan liberated from the rule of the Taliban, personal status issues are governed by Islamic Sharia law rather than a civil code. And it's not clear how a conflict between Sharia and the Afghan constitution's embrace of U.N. Human Rights conventions that guarantee freedom of worship would be resolved. The country's chief justice, Fazl Hadi Shinwari, has no secular legal education, and had previously been the head of a Council of Islamic Scholars. He is also a close associate of Abdul-Rabb al-Rassul Sayyaf, by a mujahedeen warlord-turned-legislator who once had close ties with Osama bin Laden.

Rahman, 41, who converted to Christianity 16 years ago, has been charged in a case arising out of a custody dispute. He may avoid conviction, however, not because of constitutional provisions for freedom of religion, but because both the judge and prosecutors have questioned his sanity and his fitness to stand trial. "We think he could be mad," prosecutor Sarinwal Zamari told the AP. "He does not talk like a normal person." Rahman earlier told the court, "They want to sentence me to death and I accept it, but I am not a deserter and not an infidel. I am a Christian, which means I believe in the Trinity."

The subdued response of the Bush Administration, and the neutral stance taken by President Hamid Karzai, who has stressed that the matter must be left to the courts, underscores the political sensitivity of the case. Even after the Taliban's ouster, much of Afghanistan's political life is dominated by conservative Islamists. And successive Afghan governments have come out strongly against proselytizing by Christian missionary groups — they're willing to accept aid, but are hostile to any attempt to secure converts. That may fly in the face of the principle of religious freedom, just as the furor over the Danish cartoons challenged the principle of freedom of speech, but there's little doubt that any appearance of Western powers seeking to defend the right of Christians to proselytize in Muslim lands would touch off a similar response in places such as Afghanistan and Pakistan, frontline allies in the war on terror. The Abdul Rahman case highlights the limits on the freedom the U.S. has brought to Afghanistan, and will raise the ire of the Evangelical Christian political base of the GOP. But Washington will also be aware that the current political order may be as good as it gets right now, in terms of an Afghan government allied with the West. And if the priority is saving Mr. Rahman's life and preserving his freedom, turning the case into a "clash of civilizations" battle of wills may not be the most effective strategy.

Allies Troubled By Afghan Threat To Christian Convert From Islam (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The case of an Afghan man who could face the death penalty in his country for converting to Christianity from Islam has prompted a swift international outcry. President Bush said yesterday that he was "deeply troubled," and leaders of three other nations with troops in Afghanistan also voiced objections.

The convert, Abdul Rahman, has been accused of apostasy and jailed, but not formally charged. In the United States this week, Christian talk shows and advocacy groups rallied their supporters, who flooded the White House and the Afghanistan Embassy with complaints.

The embassy released a statement yesterday saying that it was "too early" to draw conclusions, and that a judge was now "evaluating questions raised about the mental fitness of Mr. Rahman." The embassy said the results of that evaluation "may end the proceedings."

Mr. Rahman told a preliminary hearing in Afghanistan last week that he converted to Christianity about 15 years ago while working with a Christian aid group helping refugees. When he recently sought custody of his children from his parents, family members reported his conversion.

The prosecutor in the case called Mr. Rahman "a microbe" who "should be killed."

Although an American invasion overthrew the Taliban government four years ago, there are still judges who hold radical interpretations of Shariah, or Islamic law.

The case presents a challenge for President Hamid Karzai's government, which is dependent on foreign troops and foreign aid but insistent on the independence of its courts.

Mr. Bush, in a visit to Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday to rally support for the war in Iraq, said: "I'm troubled when I hear — deeply troubled when I hear that a person who has converted away from Islam may be held to account. That's not the universal application of the values that I talked about."

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, a bipartisan government group that works closely with the State Department, has previously warned that the Afghan Constitution does not adequately protect religious freedoms, said Tad Stahnke, the commission's deputy director for policy.

Officials from Germany, Italy and Canada, which all have troops serving in Afghanistan, have voiced their concerns to Mr. Karzai's government. The Italian foreign minister and deputy prime minister, Gianfranco Fini, said Tuesday that he had received assurance that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, but he did not elaborate.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington, called for Mr. Rahman's release, saying that the Koran supported religious freedom and that Islam was never compulsory. CAIR said its position was endorsed by the Fiqh Council of North America, a committee of Islamic legal scholars.

Karzai Shuffles Cabinet

By The New York Times

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 22 — President Hamid Karzai has proposing seven new names for his 25-member cabinet, officials said Wednesday.

Abdullah, Mr. Karzai's foreign minister for four years, was replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, Mr. Karzai's adviser on foreign affairs.

Outrage In Afghanistan (NYT)

What's the point of the United States' propping up the government of Afghanistan if it's not even going to pretend to respect basic human rights? President Bush himself said it was "deeply troubling" that an Afghan man is facing the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity.

In fact, the case is more than deeply troubling; it's barbaric, and we were glad that Mr. Bush promised yesterday to press for religious freedom in Afghanistan. The Afghan man, Abdul Rahman, was arrested two weeks ago. His parents reported him to the police for converting to Christianity 16 years earlier while working for a Christian aid organization in Peshawar, Pakistan. He was hauled before a judge, where he said he had no regrets. "If he doesn't revert back to Islam, he's going to receive the death penalty, according to the law," an Afghan Supreme Court judge told Agence France-Presse.

And maybe Afghanistan should also return to stoning women to death for adultery? The United States, Britain and every other country helping the Afghan government should take a hard look at its legal institutions. Muslim leaders would also do well to condemn this strongly; those who continue to hold the teachings of Islam hostage to intolerance do grievous harm to their religion.

There appears to be a move afoot to declare Mr. Rahman mentally incompetent as a way to avoid the mess. That would be a cheap trick because the law would remain on the books. Afghanistan is not the only American ally that enforces cruel religious laws. But this is a country that was liberated from the Taliban by American troops and whose tenuous peace is enforced by those troops. If Afghanistan wants to return to the Taliban days, it can do so without the help of the United States.

Afghan Foreign Minister To Be Replaced (AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

The man who has held Afghanistan's foreign minister post since the fall of the Taliban regime four years ago will be replaced in a Cabinet reshuffle, officials said Wednesday.

The changes are subject to parliament approval and will be presented to the body this week, said Khaleeq Ahmed, spokesman for President Hamid Karzai. The Cabinet is to be trimmed from 27 members to 26. Fourteen ministers have kept their jobs, four changed portfolios while eight are new faces, according to a list from Karzai's office.

Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, who has had close ties with Washington, will be replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, a presidential adviser on foreign affairs. The move had been long anticipated because of an apparent falling out between Abdullah and Karzai over how the ministry was directing foreign affairs, observers say.

A senior Afghan official said the change was intended to make the Foreign Ministry more active in promoting the country's interests and in hopes of improving relations with other nations. He spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

Afghanistan's relations with neighboring Pakistan have deteriorated significantly in recent months because of a dispute over the movement of militants back and forth across their long, largely unguarded border.

Ties with another neighbor, Iran, have also been strained because of Karzai canceling a trip there in late January, allegedly because of pressure from the United States.

The incoming interior minister, Zarar Ahmad Moqbil, has been acting interior minister since September. The incumbent minister for women's affairs, Masooda Jalal, will be replaced by Surya Rahim Subhrang, a women's rights activist.

Among the key ministers who will keep their jobs are Counternarcotics Minister Habibullah Qaderi, Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak and Economy Minister Amin Farhang.

Taliban Man At Yale (WSJ)

By John H. Fund

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Something is very wrong at our elite universities. Last month Larry Summers resigned as president of Harvard; today Libyan dictator Moammar Gadhafi will speak by video to a conference at Columbia University that his regime is cosponsoring. (Columbia won't answer questions about how much funding it got from Libya or what implied strings were attached.) Then there's Yale, which for three weeks has refused to make any comment or defense beyond a vague 144-word statement about its decision to admit Sayed Rahmatullah Hashemi -- a former ambassador-at-large of the murderous Afghan Taliban -- as a special student.

The three backers of the foundation that, along with Yale, is subsidizing Mr. Hashemi's tuition have told the Yale Daily News that they are withdrawing their support. But the university remains mute and paralyzed. "The intelligentsia haven't told Yalies what to think yet, because even they haven't made up their minds," says Yale professor David Gelernter. He clearly has: He calls the Taliban "an evil and macabre terrorist group. . . . The fact that Hashemi didn't do actual killing does not absolve him. Goebbels didn't shoot anyone either."

Universities are places where free inquiry, debate and information sharing are supposed to be guiding lights. In reality, the ivory towers too often now resemble dark castles, which raise their drawbridges at the first hint of criticism or scrutiny. Never has the moat separating elite universities from the rest of America been wider than in the case of Yale's Taliban Man.

In justifying its grant of a place to Mr. Hashemi, Yale has cited his approval by the State Department. And Yale's sole official statement says it hopes "his courses help him understand the broader context for the conflicts that led to the creation of the Taliban and to its fall. . . . Universities are places that must strive to increase understanding." That justification is unsettling to two women who will join voices at Yale tonight. Natalie Healy lost her Navy SEAL son Dan in Afghanistan last year when a Taliban rocket hit his helicopter. Ms. Healy, who notes that her son had four children of his own, is appalled at Yale's new student. "Lots of people could benefit from a Yale education, so why reward this man who was part of the group that killed Dan?" she told me. "I want to tell [Yale President] Richard Levin that his not allowing ROTC on campus is one thing, but welcoming a former member of the Taliban is deeply insulting to families who have children fighting them right now."

Ten days ago Ms. Healy met Malalai Joya, a member of Afghanistan's parliament, when she spoke near her home in Exeter, N.H. Tonight, Ms. Joya will speak at Yale on behalf of the Afghan Women's Mission. She is appalled that many people have forgotten the crimes of the Taliban, and was surprised to hear that Mr. Hashemi, who, like her, is 27 years old, is attending Yale. "He should apologize to my people and expose what he and others did under the Taliban," she told me. "He knew very well what criminal acts they committed; he was not too young to know. It would be better if he faced a court of justice than be a student at Yale University." * * *

Mr. Hashemi probably won't be attending Ms. Joya's lecture tonight. He has dodged reporters for three weeks, ever since his presence at Yale was revealed in a cover story in the New York Times Magazine. Some claim he has fully repented his Taliban past, but in his sole recent interview -- with the Times of London -- he acknowledged he'd done poorly in his class "Terrorism: Past, Present and Future," attributing that to his disgust with the textbooks: "They would say the Taliban were the same as al Qaeda." At the same time, Mr. Hashemi won't explain an essay he wrote late last year in which he called Israel "an American al Qaeda" aimed at the Arab world. When asked about the Taliban's public executions in Kabul's soccer stadium, he quipped: "There were also executions happening in Texas."

Given his record as a Taliban apologist, Mr. Hashemi has told friends he is stunned Yale didn't look more closely into his curriculum vitae. "I could have ended up in Guantanamo Bay," he told the New York Times. So how did he end up in the Ivy League? Questions start at the State Department's door. Sen. John Cornyn of Texas, chairman of the Judiciary Committee's border security panel, has asked the State Department and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to explain exactly how Mr. Hashemi got an F-1 student visa. Yale's decision tree is clearer. Richard Shaw, Yale's dean of undergraduate admissions until he took the same post at Stanford last year, told the New York Times that Yale had another foreigner of Mr. Hashemi's caliber apply but "we lost him to Harvard" and "I didn't want that to happen again." Mr. Shaw won't return phone calls now, but emails he's exchanged with others offer insights into his thinking.

The day after the New York Times profile appeared, Haym Benaroya, a professor at Rutgers, wrote to Mr. Shaw expressing disbelief that Mr. Hashemi, who has a fourth-grade education and a high school equivalency certificate, could be at Yale. Mr. Shaw replied that he indeed had "non-traditional roots [and] very little formal education but personal accomplishments that had significant impact." Mr. Benaroya was stupefied; did Mr. Shaw mean accomplishments that had a "positive impact, not terroristic and totalitarian impact"? Mr. Shaw responded: "Correct, and potential to make a positive difference in seeking ways towards peace and democracy. An education is a way toward understanding the complex nuances of world politics."

Back in the early 1990s, when he was dean of Yale College, Yale history professor Don Kagan warned about what he called the university's "mutual massage" between value-neutral professors and soft-minded students. He is even more critical now: "The range of debate on campus is more narrow than ever today, and the Taliban incident is a wake-up call that moral relativism is totally unexamined here. The ability of students to even think clearly about patriotism and values is being undermined by faculty members who believe that at heart every problem has a U.S. origin." Mr. Kagan isn't optimistic that Yale will respond to outside pressure. "They have a $15 billion endowment, and I know Yale's governing board is handpicked to lick the boots of the president," he told me. "The only way Yale officials can be embarrassed is if a major donor publicly declares he is no longer giving to them. Otherwise, they simply don't care what the outside world thinks."

But there may be one other source of worry for Yale. Mr. Hashemi told the New York Times that he will apply next month for sophomore status in Yale's full-degree program starting next fall. An admissions official told me Yale's plan all along was to do just that if his grades were acceptable. But next week, Yale will mail out 19,300 rejection letters to those who applied to be in its class of 2010. "I can't imagine it'll be easy for Yale to convince those it rejects that the Taliban student isn't taking a place they could have had," a former Yale administrator told me.

Former Yale president Benno Schmidt says admitting Mr. Hashemi is an exercise in "amorality and cynicism." He told me that "diversity simply cannot be allowed to trump all moral considerations."

It's not as if Yale can't muster moral indignation. Yale is divesting from Sudan, responding to pressure from student activists and labor unions. But when it comes to a former Taliban official, there is a desire to move on.

A case in point is Amy Aaland, executive director of Yale's Slifka Center for Jewish Life, where Mr. Hashemi takes his meals (Kosher complies with Islamic dietary laws). When I asked her if any of the revelations about his past disturb her, she noted that he was "very, very young" when he had been a Taliban official, and that "it's not like the Taliban attacked this country." I asked about the Taliban's decree in May 2001 that all non-Muslims -- chiefly Hindus -- had to wear yellow badges. The order, reminiscent of the Nazis, was met with global censure. A reporter then in Kabul recalls Mr. Hashemi had no trouble defending the decree as a protection for minorities against punishment by the religious police "until I pointed out it also required non-Muslims to move out of housing they shared with Muslims within three days; he didn't have a coherent response to that." Ms. Aaland absorbed all that I told her, and replied: "I don't expect learning to happen overnight." She still thought that "just living here, [Mr. Hashemi] can learn values and ideals from our society."

There is a line beyond which tolerance and political correctness become willful blindness. Eli Muller, a reporter for the Yale Daily News, was stunned back in 2000 when the lies of another Taliban spokesman who visited Yale "went nearly unchallenged." He concluded that the "moral overconfidence of Yale students makes them subject to manipulation by people who are genuinely evil." Today, you can say that about more than just some naïve students. You can add the administrators who abdicated their moral responsibility and admitted Mr. Hashemi.

WASHINGTON (AP) - Todd Kim has been appointed Solicitor General for the District of Columbia.

Mayor Anthony Williams announced Wednesdday that Kim will come over from the Justice Department on April third.

The solicitor general's office represents the District government in all appellate level court cases. Establishing the office is really a renaming of a branch of the D.C. Attorney General's office.

The measure is part of the mayor's continuing effort to reshape the District government to resemble state governments. The Office of Corporation Counsel was renamed the attorney general's office for the same reason in 2004.

Attorney General Robert Spagnoletti says it's critical that civil and criminal appeals be handled effectively.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Ex-Treasurer Ties Lay, Skilling To Charges (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON -- A high-ranking former Enron Corp. executive tied the company's former top executives, Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, to activities at the heart of the government's conspiracy and fraud allegations -- approving the improper use of reserves, misleading investors and hiding losses.

Describing his meetings with Messrs. Lay and Skilling, former company treasurer Ben Glisan Jr.3 alleged that the defendants authorized the use of accounting reserves to pad earnings and investment vehicles to hide losses. They also ignored calls to write down billions of dollars of soured investments, he alleged. (Excerpts from Glisan testimony4)

When Mr. Skilling was reviewing a plan in a 2000 board meeting to use Enron stock to hedge investments, he replied that he wouldn't recommend the plan "except that it allowed him to circumvent accounting rules," alleged Mr. Glisan. Mr. Lay's reaction to the idea was "to giggle...in delight," he added.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence. He is expected to be extensively challenged when defense attorneys begin questioning him Thursday morning.

Late Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified he was told by two Enron executives of verbal "side" agreements guaranteeing an investment fund controlled by Enron's then-chief financial officer would not lose money on transactions with Enron. He said that Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey told him that Mr. Skilling had reviewed the side deals.

Mr. Glisan said he took notes on several such verbal agreements while acting as a middleman between the executives who negotiated them: Mr. Causey and the chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow5. Government attorneys showed the jury copies of the notes as well as Mr. Glisan's calendar entries that mentioned the side deals. Mr. Glisan testified that those deals were improper because they weren't documented in official Enron contracts. The government has argued that the side deals invalidated the transactions, which were used to bolster Enron's finances.

The former treasurer also alleged that in the fall of 2001, Mr. Lay vetoed having Enron take any write-downs larger than $1 billion in its troubled telecommunications, retail energy and international-power operations. Mr. Lay feared that a larger write-down would trigger a credit-rating downgrade that would cripple its money-making trading business, Mr. Glisan said.

He also testified that Mr. Skilling had earlier in the year estimated that the value of several Enron businesses had declined by as much as $5 billion, but concluded the company's finances were too fragile to support a full write-down. Mr. Skilling resigned in August 2001 and Mr. Lay was told of the needed write-downs at management meetings that month, Mr. Glisan said.

At a September 2001 management meeting, presided over by Mr. Lay, executives discussed a litany of business woes, with one saying "he was glad he didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself," testified Mr. Glisan. Several executives proposed no longer using "structured finance" transactions to meet earnings targets, he said, but Mr. Lay replied that " 'we rely on these; they are imperative to hit our numbers and we're going to keep doing them.' "

As treasurer, Mr. Glisan helped raise equity and debt to finance the company's businesses. He testified that one of his jobs that fall was to "probe" the credit-rating agencies to see how much of a write-down Enron could take without losing its investment-grade credit rating.

After learning that the rating companies wouldn't tolerate greater than a $1 billion write-down, which the company subsequently announced for the third quarter of 2001, Mr. Lay agreed to personally call two rating agencies, Mr. Glisan said. Mr. Lay promised the ratings officials that Enron would be taking no further write-downs beyond the $1 billion, even though he had been told by company executives that further write-downs were unavoidable, Mr. Glisan said.

Glisan: Lay Worried About Enron Problems (AP)

By Kristen Hays

DOJ_NMG_0020145

HOUSTON -- Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay worried in 2001 that the company's mounting financial problems would jeopardize its credit rating and inquired about managing its accounting to avoid a downgrade, a former Enron treasurer testified Wednesday.

Testimony by former Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., which began late Tuesday and has outlined a series of what he said were public fabrications by Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling about the health of the company, struck a nerve with Lay.

During a break in Glisan's testimony Wednesday afternoon, a visibly annoyed Lay told reporters, "I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life." Lay's wife, Linda, nodded her head and added, "Unbelievable."

Glisan testified that Lay assigned him to feel out credit-rating agencies about how large some required accounting writedowns could be without jeopardizing Enron's rating.

"That's backwards," Glisan told jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Lay and Skilling. "What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequences."

Glisan said Lay and Skilling knew Enron, then a reputed powerhouse, was actually weak and faced multibillion-dollar losses and writedowns on poorly performing or overvalued assets.

Skilling abruptly resigned in mid-August 2001, Lay resumed as CEO, and those problems grew, Glisan said. The company tumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001.

Glisan also said Lay and Skilling misled Wall Street in 2001 about the nature of Enron's business, describing it as a "logistics" company rather than as an energy trader.

Glisan said "logistics" indicated Enron made money by delivering commodities and could sustain its growth. A trader is vulnerable to market volatility and therefore a more risky investment, which Glisan said could translate into a lower credit rating and stock price.

"Mr. Skilling said the market does not like trading companies, and it was important to articulate our strategy as being a logistics company and stay away from the term 'trading company' or 'traders,'" Glisan said, describing Skilling's instructions to top executives before Enron held an analyst conference in January 2001.

Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli was to begin Glisan's cross-examination on Thursday, followed by Bruce Collins, one of Lay's lawyers.

Glisan, a onetime protege of former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, is the last major government witness in its case against Lay and Skilling. The defense teams are expected to begin presentation next week of their evidence _ which they say will include testimony from Lay and Skilling. Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey said that of the two defendants, Skilling would likely take the stand first.

Glisan, in the eighth week of the trial, corroborated testimony from earlier government witnesses _ including Fastow _ who also said Lay and Skilling repeatedly lied to investors about Enron's financial strength. He often referred to notes he kept in 2001 of conversations and meetings.

The defendants claim there was no fraud at Enron and negative publicity coupled with diminished market confidence fueled the company's failure.

Glisan is halfway through a five-year prison sentence for creating fraudulent financial structures known as Raptors, which he said Enron used to house poor assets and investments and hide losses. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and was immediately incarcerated because he hadn't yet begun to cooperate with prosecutors.

Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling knew about the Raptors and how they were used.

"Ultimately how was Raptor used by Enron?" prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler asked.

"To help Enron avoid losses that it should have taken," Glisan replied.

Glisan described his presentation of the first of the Raptors to the finance committee of Enron's board in May 2000. Then-Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey explained that the structure had some "accounting risk," but outside auditors had approved it. Then he said Lay giggled.

"In what sense?" prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler asked.

"In delight," Glisan replied.

At that, Lay turned to his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, one of the lawyers at the defense table, and said, "I giggled?"

"Did they accept the number one risk of the deal, which was accounting scrutiny?" the prosecutor asked, referring to directors at the meeting, including Lay and Skilling.

"Yes," Glisan said.

Glisan was among Fastow subordinates who participated in one of the scams the ex-CFO ran to skim millions from Enron. The young treasurer invested $5,800 in a deal that brought him a $1 million return within weeks. He said Fastow framed the windfall as compensation for Glisan helping make Fastow look good, and Fastow assured him that Skilling had approved the deal. Glisan didn't talk to Skilling about it.

Fastow was pushed out of Enron in late October 2001, and Glisan told jurors he told Lay about his windfall from a Fastow scheme and offered to resign.

He said Lay told him "the worst thing I could do at the moment was resign," so he stayed _ but he was fired less than two weeks later.

Glisan said he regretted accepting the $1 million, but regretted other actions at Enron more.

"At the end of the day, all the other actions I and others took at Enron impacted investors far more greatly," he said.

Fastow pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy in January 2004 and agreed to serve the maximum 10-year term. He is to be sentenced in June.

Glisan also told jurors Wednesday that Lay wanted to prevent a credit downgrade because it would make it more expensive for Enron to borrow millions to support its trading operation and could force debt repayment when little cash was available. It also would alert Wall Street to looming financial problems.

Prosecutors contend Lay hid bad news from debt-rating agencies to maintain an investment-grade rating.

Glisan said his gentle inquiries with credit-rating agencies revealed that Enron could report a charge of up to $1 billion without prompting a downgrade.

In mid-October, the company announced that amount _ not the multibillion dollars in actual charges that executives had discussed internally _ when it released third-quarter 2001 earnings, with Lay telling analysts that all the financial cards were on the table and core businesses were strong.

But scrutiny increased from analysts and credit rating agencies as Enron's share price continued to drop and investors fled rather than accept the company's continued assurances.

"We were an economically weak and strained company that had systematically hidden that weakness for a long period of time," Glisan said.

Lay is facing seven charges, including improperly avoiding writedowns and lying to outside auditors. Skilling's 31 counts include misusing reserves and signing misleading letters to auditors vouching for Enron's financial statements.

Glisan Testimony Takes Aim At Ex-Enron Bosses (HC)

By MARY FLOOD

Houston Chronicle, March 23, 2006

Former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. spent today corroborating prior testimony against his former bosses, piling on new accusations and attacking their defenses to multiple conspiracy and fraud charges.

The last big gun the government is expected to call before it rests, possibly next week, Glisan clearly angered former Chairman Ken Lay at whom much of the day's testimony was directed.

"I've never heard so many lies in one day in my life," Lay said angrily as he and his wife Linda exited the courtroom during an afternoon break. "And you can quote me on that!"

Glisan's testimony went to the heart of key defenses — that Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling didn't know about wrongdoing or massive financial problems at Enron and that the company fell because of a "run on the bank" started by revelations of former CFO Andrew Fastow's secret thieving.

An articulate and even-keeled Glisan testified that both Skilling and Lay knew a great deal about deep-seated financial woes at the company, signed off on improper deals and repeatedly misrepresented Enron's finances to the public. The defendants have said the company was in good shape and they didn't know about problems.

Glisan also indicated that a "run on the bank" was imminent because the company had been touting failing businesses, hiding losses, keeping assets overvalued by billions and had excessive debt. He said analysts were beginning to catch on.

Things were so bad, the 40-year-old prison inmate told the jury, that at a management meeting in The Woodlands in September 2001, all Lay and others heard was a litany of woes from broadband and retail division losses to overvalued international assets to use of improper use of reserves.

"It was ugly," Glisan recalled. He said wholesale trading division executive John Lavorato stated "he was glad we didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself."

This was one of many meetings Glisan recounted in which he said Lay heard about all the bad news but later turned around and misrepresented the company's finances to analysts, investors, employees and even credit rating agencies

Glisan said Lay directed him, near the end of the third quarter of 2001, to gently approach credit rating agencies to see how many of the billions of dollars in over valued assets the company could admit to Wall Street without losing its investment grade credit rating. That credit rating allowed Enron to continue to voraciously borrow money and operate its energy trading business, which required trust in its ability to pay.

"That's backwards," Glisan said. "What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequence with rating agencies and investors."

Glisan said that when he learned $1 billion was about all Enron could write off "they asked me to get more," he said of Lay and another executive. "There was no way to do that."

He said the company did write off $1 billion in losses in that quarter in addition to taking a $1.2 billion equity hit, which he said was misrepresented to the public.

Glisan testified that Lay lied when he gave assurances to credit rating agencies that there were no more big write-downs the company might need to take.

Lay also knew better, Glisan said, when at the same time Lay told the public that the equity hit was because the Raptor financial hedging vehicles were being unwound. Glisan said Lay knew it was a far more potentially reputation-damaging accounting error that caused the loss.

Answering questions all day from prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler, Glisan said he designed the Raptor vehicles, that were run through his mentor Fastow's side company LJM and used to hedge some of Enron's investment. He said they were used "to help Enron avoid losses that it should have taken."

Glisan said he worked through the idea with Skilling and when they presented it to a finance committee meeting in May 2000 "Skilling said this was not a deal that he would recommend except for the fact that it allowed him to circumvent the accounting rules."

It was explained, Glisan said, that one of the risks of these deals was "accounting scrutiny." Glisan told Ruemmler that upon learning about the financial structures Lay "giggled."

"In what way?" Ruemmler asked.

"In delight," Glisan said.

Glisan's testimony touched on and corroborated testimony from many other witnesses, including Fastow. He knew of the "global galactic" agreement Fastow had with the chief accounting officer to commemorate illegal oral side deals, Glisan talked about how the reserves from trading profits were being improperly used to fill earnings holes and how Enron wanted to hide that it was really a trading company.

He said that in October 2001, around the time Fastow came under fire and was put on leave, he confessed to Lay in a private meeting that he had "invested" $5,800 in a Fastow scheme and got back about $1 million. Fastow stole that and $18 million more in a deal called Southampton. Glisan offered to resign.

"What did Mr. Lay say?" Ruemmler asked.

DOJ_NMG_0020148

"That I shouldn't. That he thought my participation was OK and that the worst thing I could do now was resign," Glisan recounted.

Glisan said he deeply regretted taking the $1 million, but regretted other actions at Enron more.

"At the end of the day, all the other actions I and others entered into at Enron impacted investors more greatly," he said. It was shortly after his confession to Lay that Glisan was fired from Enron in November 2001.

The Clear Lake man is midway through a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud for his work on the Raptors. He invoked his right against self-incrimination and was granted immunity against every crime but perjury by U.S. District Judge Sim Lake.

Glisan is currently on furlough to his home from his minimum security prison in Beaumont and has been here about six times to talk to the government. He agreed to help the government after he testified in the Enron Nigerian barge case. But he did so only after they agreed to get him into a minimum security facility and be sure he could get time-off credit for an alcohol rehabilitation program.

Jurors were reasonably attentive to Glisan, though the 12 jurors and four alternates seem to be dragging from their perky first six weeks or so. This is the eighth week of the trial.

The defense attorneys are sure to make much of Glisan's motive to get a shorter sentence in a less restrictive prison in return for helping the government. The cross-examination is scheduled to begin today.

A calmer Lay, on leaving the courthouse today told reporters: "The truth will start tomorrow. We'll be alright."

Jury Told Lay Lied On Enron (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON, March 22 — In seven weeks of court testimony, prosecutors landed only glancing blows against Kenneth L. Lay, a former chief executive of Enron who is on trial for criminal conspiracy and fraud. Mr. Lay's luck may have run out in Week 8.

Ben F. Glisan Jr., Enron's former treasurer, delivered stinging testimony on Wednesday that contradicted Mr. Lay's claims that he had been unaware of the company's crumbling financial picture and had not known about some of the illicit side deals involving top managers.

In a full day of questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay had lied to credit-rating agencies, employees and Wall Street analysts about the company's performance and need for more urgent action, even as he participated in internal discussions with managers about what to do about Enron's "dire" financial situation.

Mr. Glisan offered the strongest testimony yet that there was a criminal conspiracy at Enron involving Mr. Lay; Jeffrey K. Skilling, also a former Enron chief executive; and other top managers to manipulate earnings and mislead investors about mounting problems.

Mr. Glisan described one previously undisclosed meeting in which, he said, Mr. Lay had refused to accept his resignation when he admitted making a $1 million profit in a kickback scheme set up by a former chief financial officer, Andrew S. Fastow. Mr. Lay's response, Mr. Glisan testified, had been that his participation in the scheme, known as the Southampton deal, was "O.K." and that it would be the "worst" time for him to resign.

A few weeks later, Mr. Glisan was fired, along with another Enron employee who had participated in the scheme.

Mr. Glisan first took the stand late Tuesday in a much-anticipated appearance. Mr. Glisan, 40, is the government's last major witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, who are accused of conspiring to defraud Enron while enriching themselves.

Mr. Glisan's appearance was considered critical because, like Mr. Fastow, his former boss, who testified earlier in the trial, Mr. Glisan was in the inner circle of top decision makers at Enron.

Mr. Glisan was also deeply involved in trying to rein in the mounting credit and liquidity crisis that enveloped the company in the four months before it collapsed into bankruptcy.

But unlike Mr. Fastow or any other major witness who has testified, Mr. Glisan could end up being the crucial witness in the trial. That is because Mr. Glisan, the only major Enron figure who has already been sentenced, is under no obligation to testify.

He is unlikely to receive any consideration, like a shorter sentence, from the government in return for his testimony. He is on furlough from a minimum-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., while testifying.

He has served more than half of a five-year sentence. He pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit fraud through his work on the Raptors financing vehicles, which he admitted were used to burnish Enron's financial statements by hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of losses.

Mr. Glisan also provided strong testimony on Wednesday against Mr. Skilling. He said Mr. Fastow had told him that Mr. Skilling had signed off on "bear hug" side deals, guarantees that off-the-books partnerships would not lose money by investing in Enron assets — deals that helped Enron meet its earnings targets.

Mr. Glisan also said Mr. Fastow had discussed with him a three-page "Global Galactic" document that supposedly recorded the side deals with Mr. Skilling and others.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to one count of a 26-count indictment and is testifying under an immunity agreement. On Wednesday, he admitted other crimes, including participating in the Southampton partnership. He recounted how Mr. Fastow had turned Mr. Glisan's $5,826 investment into a $1 million profit in just two months. He said Mr. Fastow had assuaged his concerns about the propriety of the deal by saying it had been cleared with Mr. Skilling. Later, when the $1 million check was wired into his account, Mr. Glisan said, he knew the deal "did not make sense."

But Mr. Glisan did not do anything about it, choosing out of greed, he said, to stay silent and consider the payment as compensation for his work on the Raptors transactions, which Mr. Fastow had credited with helping burnish Mr. Fastow's reputation as chief financial officer.

Finally, after Mr. Fastow was forced to resign in large part because of his participation in off-the-books partnerships, Mr. Glisan was concerned enough, he said, to tell Mr. Lay about Southampton and offer to resign. "His response was I shouldn't, that my participation was O.K. and the worst thing I could do is resign."

But lawyers from outside the company continued to look into the deals, and by Nov. 7 Mr. Glisan had been forced to resign.

"I deeply regret" the Southampton deal, he said. But he said he regretted other actions more, actions that "affected Enron investors far more greatly."

Those included the Raptors transactions, which Mr. Glisan said he designed in 2000 to help Enron improve its reported earnings by hiding losses. Mr. Glisan said he fully described the Raptors to Mr. Skilling in two meetings in the spring of 2000. Mr. Skilling then took the idea to the board's finance committee for approval.

Mr. Glisan said he expressed his own reservations that the structures would not survive scrutiny by outside accountants. But, he said, Mr. Skilling said it was not a device he would normally recommend, "except that it would allow us to circumvent accounting rules."

Mr. Glisan said he had told the finance committee that the Raptors had "no economic value." But when Mr. Lay heard of their potential to help Enron meet its earnings, Mr. Glisan said, he giggled "in delight."

Also on Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified about the many problems facing Enron just as Mr. Skilling was resigning as chief executive in August 2001. By then, Mr. Glisan said, both Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay knew Enron's international assets contained $1 billion in embedded losses.

Mr. Glisan testified that after Mr. Skilling resigned, Mr. Lay and the new Enron president, Greg Whalley, asked Mr. Glisan to look into how large a write-off of the troubled assets the company could take without affecting its credit rating, critical to Enron's ability to continue to borrow and do business as an energy trader. Mr. Glisan came back with a $1 billion figure, he said.

"It was backward," he said. "We should have taken the charges we needed to take and deal with the consequences with our ratings agencies."

Then, on Sept. 6 and 7, managers met at a retreat just outside Houston. The retreat soon devolved into an agonizing discussion about Enron's deepening problems, including the overvalued international assets, about $1 billion in losses in the broadband unit and another $1 billion in losses in Azurix, a division that had unsuccessfully tried to push the company into the global water business.

A discussion among business unit managers became so depressing that one manager, John Lavorato, who headed the wholesale energy unit, sarcastically said that "he was glad he didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself," Mr. Glisan said.

"It was ugly," Mr. Glisan said. "We were struggling greatly."

The managers also debated the use of "aggressive accounting," Mr. Glisan said. Mr. Lavorato suggested that Enron was using it far too often and that its auditor, Arthur Andersen, "should not be the standard and would agree to anything," Mr. Glisan testified.

Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, grew upset, saying that he, not the accounting firm, was the standard, and that Mr. Lavorato's unit had benefited the most through use of "the most aggressive accounting at the company."

Mr. Lay, also at the retreat, defended the use of structured finance transactions like the LJM partnership and the Raptors, saying, "They are imperative for us to hit our numbers and we will continue to do them."

A month later, in October, Mr. Lay tried to assure employees at a large meeting that Enron would not rely on such transactions anymore, that "plain vanilla is just fine," statements that Mr. Glisan said were misleading.

Also that October, with credit rating agencies threatening to downgrade Enron's bonds, Mr. Lay personally assured Ronald Barone, an analyst at Standard & Poor's, that Enron would not write down any more assets beyond a planned $1 billion write-down. But Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay knew that several international assets, including power plants in India and Brazil, still needed to be written down soon.

Mr. Glisan said Mr. Lay had also lied to Mr. Barone about the nature of a $1.2 billion shareholder equity reduction. Mr. Lay had asked Mr. Glisan earlier how the charge should be characterized, and, on advice from Mr. Causey, Mr. Glisan said, they "constructed the story" to report the reduction as an unwinding of the Raptor transactions rather than the truth — that it was a result of an accounting error — to avoid scrutiny in the market.

"I understand, that makes perfect sense," Mr. Lay said, according to Mr. Glisan. "That's why I asked the question."

Lay Knew About Billions In Enron Losses, Witness Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Dunn Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay hid billions of dollars in losses from investors to avoid triggering a lower credit rating, an ex-treasurer testified at Lay's criminal trial.

Enron's assets were worth at least $3.5 billion less than their stated value by the summer of 2001, former Treasurer Benjamin F. Glisan Jr. testified. Lay attended many meetings at which the losses were discussed, Glisan told jurors today at the fraud trial of Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling in Houston.

``Ultimately, each of these problems were known at very senior levels, including the office of the chairman," said Glisan, 40. ``Many had grown over a long period of time."

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, are charged with orchestrating a fraud that led to Enron's collapse, and face at least 25 years in prison if convicted on charges that they conspired to deceive investors and enrich themselves by keeping Enron stock prices inflated.

Lay told employees, investors and credit-rating companies throughout the late summer of 2001 and into the autumn that Enron was strong and that money-losing projects remained viable, Glisan said. The Houston-based company went bankrupt in December 2001.

Defense lawyers say prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and that the two executives were victims of unscrupulous subordinates, such as Glisan's former boss, ex-Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow.

`Get More'

Glisan is in the middle of serving a five-year sentence for securities fraud in a federal prison east of Houston. He's testifying for a second day on furlough under an immunity agreement with prosecutors. He admitted falsifying Enron's reported financial results to make the company look more successful than it was.

Lay and former Chief Operating Officer Greg Whalley ordered Glisan in August 2001 to determine how big a loss the company could report without having its credit rating cut, Glisan said. When Glisan told them that Enron could report a $1 billion charge without suffering a rating cut, Lay and Whalley ``asked me to go get more," he testified.

``We had gently probed the rating agencies," Glisan said. ``You can't get on the phone and ask them how big a charge can we take without losing our rating."

Glisan said he and another employee, Tim Despain, tried to ``replicate" agency analysis and then present credit raters such as Moody's Corp. with a ``story." In Fall of 2001, ``we had to construct a story that would satisfy Moody's concerns" about the size of the risks the traders were taking.

The Dahbol Plant

Lay lied about problems with Enron's Dahbol power plant in India, Glisan told the jury. In early August 2001, he said, Lay had been told that at best the company would have to record a $500 million loss on the plant. A month later, Lay told employees, ``We still expect to recover most or all of the costs of Dahbol."

``Was that statement by Mr. Lay true?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn Ruemmler asked Glisan.

``No," Glisan said.

In October, Enron told credit-rating company Standard & Poor's Inc. that it was taking a charge of $1 billion. Shortly before the agency voted to retain Enron's BBB+ rating, Lay told S&P managing director Ronald Barone that no more charges were expected, Barone testified yesterday.

`Significantly Larger'

The losses were ``significantly larger," Glisan said today. Azurix Corp., Enron's water company, was overvalued by $1 billion and management wanted to ``liquidate" it, Glisan said. While Lay was telling the public Enron's Brazilian electric utility was ``a good asset," internally it was viewed as ``very bad," Glisan said, having declined in value ``somewhere in the neighborhood of $1 billion," Glisan said.

Enron Broadband Services, valued at about $1 billion, ``was no longer viable" and Lay knew it, Glisan testified. He said today he was sitting next to Lay during his phone call with S&P's Barone.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it sought bankruptcy protection, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing over the collapse of what was once the U.S.'s seventh-largest corporation claim accounting fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

Legal experts have partially blamed partnerships and hedging vehicles created by Fastow for Enron's meltdown. Skilling's and Lay's defense teams claim Fastow, who already has pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's demise, stole at least $25 million from the company in connection with partnership-related deals.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Former Prosecutor Drops In On Enron Trial (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) - The man who brought the indictment against former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling visited his fraud and conspiracy trial Wednesday with a slew of law students in tow.

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches a course in corporate crime at the University of Texas School of Law, brought his students to sit in on the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals.

"I feel like this is a distant memory in my life," Buell said, "but it continues on. It gives you a sense of how epic these cases are. They just go on for years."

Buell was assigned to the task force at its inception in January 2002 and joined the university as a visiting professor after he stepped down in March 2004. He secured the government's indictment against Skilling a month before.

Skilling's co-defendant, Enron founder Kenneth Lay, was indicted in July 2004.

"I miss the opportunity to try this case a little bit. It's the white-collar trial of the century," Buell said. "But it can completely capture your life. It's trial by ordeal, not just for the defendants."

Buell helped prosecute Arthur Andersen LLP in 2002 on an obstruction of justice charge for destroying tons of Enron-related documents in the fall of 2001 as regulators began investigating the energy company's finances. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned that conviction last year, citing vague jury instructions that allowed jurors to convict without finding criminal intent behind document destruction.

Buell and his students on Wednesday observed testimony from former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., who corroborated previous witnesses linking Lay and Skilling to a web of lies about Enron's health. Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and is halfway through a five-year prison term.

Matt Nickson, a third-year law student, said he was impressed with what he saw, but he had no predictions of the outcome.

"I don't like to judge. My tendency is not to want to condemn people," he said.

Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy. The government contends both lied repeatedly about Enron's financial strength when they allegedly knew the company was propped up by accounting tricks.

The two defendants counter that there was no fraud at Enron, they did nothing wrong, and negative publicity as well as diminished market confidence drove the company into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Mills Draws Formal SEC Probe Into Its Accounting Practices (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a formal investigation of Mills Corp. after more than two months of informal inquiry into accounting problems at the shopping-mall real-estate investment trust.

The investigation, disclosed by the company in a filing late yesterday, turns up the heat on Mills management and may further pressure the company's stock, which is off about 54% from its high in August.

Mills couldn't be reached for comment.

The Arlington, Va., REIT has made numerous missteps in the past 13 months. In that time, it has restated earnings twice, delayed three earnings reports, written off 10 projects and fired almost 10% of its work force.

Mills shares have plunged by about 21% since last Thursday on analyst downgrades and the disclosure that the company has uncovered five new areas of accounting problems, including ones that could have led to overstated earnings and revenue. The company is now reviewing about a dozen aspects of its books. Its shares fell 12 cents to $30.42 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The Massachusetts attorney general and treasurer filed a motion Tuesday to become lead plaintiff in a class-action shareholder lawsuit against Mills, saying the state's pension fund has lost $5 million because of what it alleges was fraudulent activity by the company.

A formal inquiry gives the SEC the power to subpoena company officials and documents.

"I would say up until now you could have argued that the accounting restatements and write-offs were perhaps sloppy management," said Greg Andrews, a REIT analyst at Green Street Advisors, a Newport Beach, Calif., real-estate research firm. "But with the news from a week ago and a formal SEC inquiry... the chance that there's a real fire here is much greater."

The company also said Friday, as expected, that it wouldn't be able to file its annual report in time to meet an SEC deadline and that it wasn't able to give any guidance on when the report might be forthcoming.

A cash crunch may be coming for the company, analysts have said. They estimate that Mills isn't earning enough money to cover its dividend and that it may have to cut it soon. It also needs financing to continue work on its development pipeline. It has faced a work stoppage on a project in Chicago because of contractor demands for prepayment.

NEC Says Employee At Unit Faked Deals, Inflated Revenue (WSJ)

By Hiroyuki Kachi

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

TOKYO -- NEC Corp. said an internal investigation has found that an employee at its NEC Engineering Ltd. unit fabricated business deals for years, inflating sales figures by 36.3 billion yen, or about $309.5 million, from the fiscal year ended March 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0020153

The maker of computers and network equipment said that the 50-year-old employee at unlisted NEC Engineering conducted multiple fraudulent transactions in which he created fake deals between NEC Engineering and its suppliers and customers starting in March 2002. The management-level employee created phony documents to enable the transactions, NEC said.

The company discovered the fraud in December. It said it would file a criminal complaint against the employee, who allegedly embezzled money from the transactions.

The news comes at a time when NEC is suffering from a falloff in profit as its chip and mobile-phone operations struggle amid increased competition. It posted group net profit of 20.78 billion yen for the quarter ended Dec. 31, down 47% from a year earlier.

Market participants, however, played down the impact of the inflated earnings, partly because the fake deals didn't involve the company on a wider scale.

A decline in NEC shares was short-lived. In trading on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, NEC shares closed up 1.9% at 740 yen yesterday after falling to an intraday low of 708 yen.

"It is regrettable that the company didn't provide details to the public soon" after the situation was discovered, wrote Hiroshi Yoshihara, an analyst at Merrill Lynch in Tokyo, in a report.

But because such fraud has only a slight impact on his outlook on NEC earnings, "We hope the false transactions will help accelerate reform steps," at NEC under the helm of its incoming president, Kaoru Yano, he said.

NEC said it has set aside provisions to cushion the negative impact for this fiscal year, ending in March, thus, "We don't expect a big impact," from the accounting fraud, said an NEC spokesman.

For this fiscal year alone, the amount of inflated sales at NEC Engineering is estimated at 13.3 billion yen, with an inflated operating profit of 3.4 billion yen.

From the fiscal year ended March 2002, the inflated operating profit at NEC Engineering was 9.3 billion yen. But the NEC spokesman said the company may revise its past earnings statements after discussions with accountants.

With about 2,500 workers, NEC Engineering is a system-solution provider in the NEC group. It reported sales of 82.5 billion yen for the fiscal year ended March 2005.

For the full fiscal year, NEC projects a group net profit of 60 billion yen, an operating profit of 100 billion yen and revenue of 4.93 trillion yen.

Refco Ex-Director Seeks Payment Of Legal Fees (WSJ)

By Joseph Rebello

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Thomas H. Lee, who helped orchestrate Refco Inc.'s initial public offering of stock, says creditors of the commodity brokerage firm, now under bankruptcy protection, are "improperly" trying to bar him from tapping Refco's insurance policies to pay his legal costs.

Mr. Lee, who recently left the prominent private-equity firm named after him, Thomas H. Lee Partners, is petitioning the bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy to get insurance payments to cover the legal costs of 14 lawsuits related to Refco's collapse.

Mr. Lee was a Refco director, as were other employees at Thomas H. Lee, which helped bring Refco public. He and other directors, including those who didn't work for the private-equity firm, are fighting the lawsuits, which center on claims that they should have known about the problems that led to Refco's implosion.

Mr. Lee said Refco directors submitted claims to the brokerage's insurer, U.S. Specialty Insurance Co., which sought court permission to pay those costs. Refco's creditors committee objected.

"There is no basis whatsoever to deny the respondents access to the insurance that was put in place for the exact purpose of recovering the respondents' defense costs," Mr. Lee said in papers filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan Monday.

Mr. Lee's firm, Thomas H. Lee Partners, bought a majority stake in Refco for more than $500 million in 2004 and took the company public in August of last year. Shortly after the IPO, however, Refco claimed that its then chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden more than $430 million in bad debt, and that sent the company into a fatal tailspin. Refco entered Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings last October and is in the process of winding down its operations. Mr. Bennett is now fighting criminal fraud charges.

Mr. Lee's old firm has had several dust-ups with Refco's creditors, who have sought to investigate the firm's role at Refco as it headed for collapse. Refco's creditors committee has contended in court papers that "there are substantial questions to be answered concerning the structure, cost and effects of the investment in Refco by Thomas H. Lee Partners in June of 2004, and Refco's IPO in August of 2005."

A hearing on the insurance payments is scheduled for today. In addition to that matter, Judge Robert D. Drain will also consider whether the portion of the case related to Refco's offshore business should continue to be heard under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code, which grants protection from creditors and time to reorganize the company, or instead be reclassified under Chapter 7 of the bankruptcy code, as requested by some of the brokerage's creditors. Chapter 7 would lead to liquidation of Refco's remaining assets.

Also today, Mr. Bennett is scheduled to appear in federal court, where lawyers will discuss discovery related to his criminal case and Judge Naomi Reice Buchwald may begin efforts to set a trial date.

Defense attorneys are expected to ask the judge to compel the government to reveal the exact focus of its case against Mr. Bennett. Federal prosecutors in New York produced more than 1.3 million pages of documents as part of their case.

Should Business Execs Meet At Strip Clubs? (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Wearing a scanty blue gown with rhinestone clasps, Nicolette Hart explains how she can make up to $2,500 a night with investment bankers and their clients in a Manhattan strip club's private rooms.

She writhes and rubs her nearly naked body against as many as seven men, doing “lap dances” for $400 an hour. (The room costs an additional $200 for the hour.) Hart, who once worked for a venture-capital firm, always asks what brought the men together. They often say they're having a meeting.

“I say, ‘You're having a business meeting in a strip club?' ” Hart says in an interview in the dressing room at Rick's Cabaret here.

It's not just strippers who have questions. Some women on Wall Street want to know how it can be fair — or legal — for their managers and male colleagues to exclude them when they fraternize at strip clubs, often with the women's clients. Strip club clientele is hardly limited to Wall Street. Adult entertainment is enjoyed by men — and some women — in most every industry in the USA, and it's a tax-deductible business expense allowed by the IRS.

Investment banks and brokerage firms are taking the lead in cracking down on the practice. The National Association of Securities Dealers and the New York Stock Exchange both recently proposed rules that would force firms to adopt business entertainment policies that cap amounts and specify appropriate venues. The move is expected to rule out company-paid or work-related strip club jaunts at the more than 5,000 brokerage firms in the USA.

The stock exchange and the NASD acted in large part because of lawsuits brought by female employees. The women who have sued say strip clubs are emblematic of a larger problem on Wall Street: a macho culture that leaves them behind in all areas.

“There are two levels of discrimination: the frat house environment in the office and the deeply embedded practices that are just starting to be uncovered, like the distribution of accounts, business leads and promotions,” says Hydie Sumner, a financial consultant who was awarded $2.2 million in 2004 after suing Merrill Lynch for gender discrimination. “When ‘business activities' involve the strip club, golf course or hunting ranches … discrimination is often perpetuated as those in power support and advance those with like minds and tastes.”

Ultimately, some believe, other industries will be affected. “This is going to have a trickle-down effect,” says Aliza Herzberg, a New York employment lawyer who represents many manufacturing and small-business clients. “Companies will try to make taking clients to strip clubs, which is very common, a thing of the past — just like the three-martini lunch.”

It was a Fidelity Investments trader's 2003 bachelor party, paid for by brokerage firms including Jeffries & Co., that prompted NASD to consider tightening its rules. The party allegedly included dwarf-tossing and paid female escorts, according to news accounts and investigators.

"We're not happy that (business entertaining) seems to have been an area where firms were not paying sufficient attention," says NASD Vice Chairman Mary Schapiro. "I thought sensitivity to issues like this would have been greater than it was."

NYSE Executive Vice President Grace Vogel says the goal is to ban entertainment that's inappropriate or excessive. Final versions of the rules, likely in weeks, must be approved by the Securities and Exchange Commission before taking effect. Brokerage firms that don't enact or enforce business entertainment policies could face actions ranging from censure to expulsion.

Many companies now have policies that restrict any behavior that excludes certain employees, even if they don't specifically mention strip clubs, Las Vegas employment lawyer Barry Kellman says.

"Financial services has taken the biggest hit (from lawsuits), but the more buttoned-up industries would have greater concern about this than, for example, the entertainment industry," Kellman says.

Earlier this month, Manhattan strip club Scores settled a lawsuit over a contested $241,000 bill racked up by the former CEO of St. Louis information technology company Savvis. Robert McCormick resigned amid an investigation into the bill, which was charged to his corporate American Express card. Several sexual harassment lawsuits have been filed in recent weeks by women who say male co-workers at the freight logistics company C.H. Robinson frequented strip clubs and openly discussed strippers in the office.

Attorney Rohit Sabharwal, a Rick's regular, says he often takes clients of his small law firm with him and such entertaining was common when he was at a large firm, too. "Nobody really objects," Sabharwal says. "I think it's a lot more civilized in the law profession. I don't think women have a problem succeeding in law firms."

But back on Wall Street, Vogel says the rulemakers had "uncanny timing":

•In the fall, Morgan Stanley fired three salesmen and a researcher who took clients to a strip club. The company instituted a no-strip-club policy in October 2002, two years before it paid $54 million to settle a sex discrimination lawsuit. The lawsuit was brought by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and a former institutional equities saleswoman who said she was excluded from client outings to strip clubs and other places.

•Six female employees filed a sex discrimination class-action complaint in federal district court against German investment bank Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein in January. Jyoti Ruta, a director in the institutional equities division here, says she was excluded from a trip to a strip club and from other client events.

•Last April, a jury found in Laura Zubulake's favor in a sex discrimination and retaliation lawsuit against UBS and awarded her $29 million. In October, the parties settled the lawsuit privately. Zubulake, a former director in international equities, alleged in the lawsuit that she was not considered for promotion, was removed from client responsibilities, was undermined professionally and was excluded from client outings. Trial testimony alleged she had been invited to a bottomless club by a manager. UBS says it has policies on business entertainment and "appropriate professional conduct."

Several financial companies say the proposed rules are too burdensome. John Goodwin of Albuquerque-based Goodwin Browning & Luna Securities, complained to NASD that it is "legislating morality."

But female plaintiffs and their lawyers say business entertaining can be as important as what goes on in the office. Attorney Piper Hoffman, who represented Morgan Stanley plaintiff Allison Schieffelin, says that on Wall Street, "Who you know can translate into how much business you bring into your company."

In her lawsuit, Schieffelin says she learned two clients were invited by male colleagues to attend a weekend in Las Vegas approved by their manager. When she asked why she wasn't included, she was told it was "because the men would be uncomfortable participating in sexually oriented entertainment with a woman colleague present, especially one who knew their wives," according to the lawsuit.

"It's not a question of morality," says attorney Wayne Outten, who also represented Schieffelin. "It's the disparity in opportunity for those who are excluded."

Ruta, who still works at Dresdner while she fights her sex discrimination lawsuit, is about to have her second child. She says her problems at the investment bank started when she returned the last time from maternity leave and found she had a new boss. She began being excluded from outings with clients, including to the strip club and wine tastings, and lost out on deals and promotions because of it.

"I've always conducted myself professionally and ethically," Ruta says. "The night when I was told to leave because the clients would like to go to a strip club was very, very upsetting."

Dresdner's attorneys recently filed a motion to expunge the strip club and other "scandalous allegations" because they don't relate to the core "pay and promotion" case. Ruta's lawyer, Douglas Wigdor, says, "When it comes to deciding bonuses, it's all discretionary, and the male supervisor is going to give the money to the guys he hangs out with."

Alden Cass, a Manhattan-based psychologist who works with financial executives, says strip clubs hold a special attraction on Wall Street. He attributes it to the business' highs and lows and tendency to tie people's identities to how much they earn. He says many of his male clients find strippers more understanding than their wives.

"When things are great at work, some of them do feel entitled to have things when they want them," Cass says. "The allure is, 'Someone is going to listen to me on my terms.' "

Rick's owner, Eric Langan, says that when people ask him whether a dancer's breasts or buttocks are more important, he answers that "her brain" and personality count more. Dancers who might not merit a second look outside on Sixth Avenue can earn as much as $200,000 a year by "really listening" to down-in-the-dumps bankers and stockbrokers. He says about a third of his business comes from Wall Street.

NASD's Schapiro says that when it comes to strip clubs, "One of the things that is powerful about the new rules is that they are going to force every firm to make the decision whether that's an appropriate place to do business."

Nicolette Hart worries the new rules could affect her business, because "a lot of guys do expense it" and "try to be big shots to impress their clients any way possible."

Mike Paul of the New York-based reputation management firm MGP & Associates PR, says strip clubs would be a hard habit for Wall Streeters to break. "The bottom line — and you won't get any company to say it — is that Wall Street and strip clubs are ingrained together and have been for a long time."

Langan doesn't think new rules will have a big effect: "They'll just break out personal credit cards. Most of them don't care about a $3,000 or a $5,000 bill at a club."

Ruta says that as long as managers aren't taking male employees and neither managers nor employees are treating clients, she doesn't care who goes to strip clubs.

"The real problem I have with it is that it is unprofessional and exclusionary," she says. "But whatever people want to do on their own free time is fine."

Freddie Mac Finance Chief To Resign (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Freddie Mac said it will replace its chief financial officer, Martin F. Baumann, just three months after offering him a $2 million retention bonus.

The move follows two embarrassing snags that have delayed the U.S. mortgage-finance company's effort to return to regular, timely reporting of results in the wake of a 2003 accounting scandal. In light of those snags, Mr. Baumann said in an interview, he and the company's top officers -- Chief Executive Richard Syron and Chief Operating Officer Eugene McQuade -- agreed that Freddie needed a finance chief with more expertise in upgrading the computer systems used to generate financial results.

Freddie launched a search for a successor to Mr. Baumann, who is 58 years old, and said Mr. McQuade would handle the finance-chief duties in the interim, effective immediately. As recently as December, the company was seeking to keep Mr. Baumann in golden handcuffs. Freddie agreed then to pay him $1 million in cash and another $1 million in stock if he remained in his post through the end of 2007. Yesterday Freddie said Mr. Baumann would still receive those payments, plus $540,000 of severance pay. He will remain an adviser at the company through May.

Mr. Baumann joined Freddie in April 2003, shortly after the company discovered accounting violations designed to smooth out earnings growth. He said he initially had a two-year contract, later extended for a year. "It feels like six years with the amount of work we got done," Mr. Baumann said.

Mr. Baumann has long complained that Freddie was saddled with antiquated computer systems for financial reporting. The company had nearly returned to a normal quarterly reporting schedule by last August. But then it found miscalculations of interest earned on mortgage-backed securities. As a result, Freddie announced in November that it would have to reduce its net income for last year's first half by $220 million.

Earlier this month, Freddie suffered a second glitch when it had to delay plans for reporting results for all of 2005 until May from March. The company said it needed more time to put into effect a new method for valuing assets and obligations related to its business of guaranteeing payments on home mortgages.

These setbacks led to "frank conversations" with Messrs. Syron and McQuade, Mr. Baumann said, and to the conclusion that the company needed a finance chief with more experience in updating creaky computer systems. Mr. Baumann said that his strongest suits are accounting policy and financial reporting and that he believes he has restored "integrity" to the company's accounting. David R. Palombi, Freddie's chief spokesman, said the company has "consistently said we need to get the job done right and done as quickly as practical....The change announced today is the best way to meet those objectives."

Mr. Baumann said he had no firm plans. "I'm ready to do something else," he said, perhaps involving charitable work or public service.

Freddie said Mr. Baumann's resignation isn't expected to affect the company's plan to release results for 2005 in May.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Washington Wire (WSJ.com)

Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2006

Question of Privilege

The Bush administration apparently isn't planning to cite executive privilege for the super-secret Presidential Daily Briefings sought by former vice presidential aide I. Lewis Libby.

In the past, the administration has come under fire for exerting executive privilege on a whole host of issues ranging from energy-industry meetings to the papers of Supreme Court nominees. But this time is different. Federal prosecutors said in a court filing that since the judge has limited the production of the daily intelligence briefings to redacted documents and topic overviews that would be viewed only by Libby and four of his attorneys in a sealed room, "there is a reasonable prospect that the government could avoid a blanket assertion of privilege and instead be able to comply with the court's order."

Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, has argued that he needs copies of the daily briefings to help prepare his defense against charges that he lied and obstructed justice in the investigation into whether a CIA agent's identity was purposely leaked to the media. Through his legal team, he contends that the documents, which list the high-profile, sensitive matters he dealt with daily, would help show that any misstatements were due to distraction, not lying.

Still, the filing and an accompanying CIA affidavit noted it would take the CIA, which prepared the daily intelligence briefings for the president, until mid-June to pull together redacted documents. It's unclear if the delay will affect the start of the trial, now set for early January. –Anne Marie Squeo

Jurors In Former Illinois Governor's Trial Struggle To Reach Verdict (KRT)

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO - The federal jury in former Illinois Gov. George Ryan's trial has hit a stumbling block in its deliberations, the judge disclosed on its seventh day of deliberations Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0020158

After holding two lengthy closed-door sessions with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said she planned to instruct jurors Thursday morning to continue on with their discussions.

In brief remarks to reporters, Pallmeyer said she had received two notes in the last two days from jurors "that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict, or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations."

The judge said she would keep the jurors' notes under seal because "they relate to some personal difficulties."

"And that's the reason that I think, for the integrity of the process and to encourage the jurors to be as open and hard working as they have been, I think the appropriate course here is to keep their communications to me, at least at this time, a private matter," she said.

Lawyers in the case are barred from commenting to reporters because of a gag order instituted by Pallmeyer in the final days of the marathon trial.

Ryan is on trial with Lawrence Warner, a lobbyist, on charges that the former governor steered millions of dollars in state contracts and leases to Warner and other friends in return for vacations, gifts and other benefits. Both deny wrongdoing.

The seriousness of the impasse was apparent when U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald and First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro waited for a lengthy period as lawyers in the case met privately in chambers with the judge for more than an hour.

Jurors had heard more than five months of testimony and argument, so the fact that deliberations had reached into a second week didn't strike courtroom observers as unusual.

But clearly the jury has reached some sort of impasse.

There have been few, if any, public signs of turmoil with jurors meeting in a back room out of public sight.

On Tuesday, a TV producer stationed outside Pallmeyer's courtroom overheard a juror tell other jurors as they boarded a public elevator that the name-calling had to stop.

Jurors have been seen in recent days walking up flights of stairs at the high-rise Dirksen U.S. Courthouse, but it wasn't clear if their purpose was solely to get some exercise or out of any frustration over the turn in the deliberations.

The first sign of trouble came in the late morning Wednesday when Pallmeyer summoned the lawyers to her chambers. The judge's staff had previously notified the news media when the jury had raised questions, but no word was issued before Wednesday's events.

Reporters who have been camped out in and around the courtroom during the deliberations realized something was up when lawyers in the case suddenly arrived at the courtroom and proceeded into the judge's chambers.

After about a 20-minute private meeting, Pallmeyer emerged into the courtroom and announced to reporters that she had received a note from jurors shortly before saying they were having "some difficulties" with their deliberations.

The judge said she and the lawyers would come up with "an appropriate response" to the jury's note.

It appeared that jurors may not have deliberated for about a 2 1/2-hour chunk of time after delivering the note to the judge.

By 3 p.m., prosecutors and lawyers for Ryan and Warner returned to Pallmeyer's chambers. The private meeting lasted almost an hour and a half.

While the meeting took place, jurors wrapped up deliberations for the day at their usual quitting time of about 4 p.m. and left the courthouse.

At the conclusion of her private meeting with the lawyers, Pallmeyer again stepped into the courtroom to make a short public announcement, revealing for the first time that there had in fact been two notes from jurors in the last two days about the difficulties in deliberations.

The judge said she and the lawyers had drafted a response to the jurors' concerns "that they need to keep on with their responsibilities."

Pallmeyer said she would make the response to jurors public after it was delivered to them when they resume deliberations at 9:30 a.m. Thursday.

The judge has sealed her closed-door discussions with the lawyers as well as the jurors' two most recent notes.

News 'Personal Difficulties' Grip Ryan Jury (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 23, 2006

The 12 jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate are having "personal difficulties" as they try to reach a verdict.

Jurors on Wednesday gave U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer a note telling her they're having problems -- apparently with one another -- as they deliberate.

In open court, Pallmeyer said she received "two notes from the jurors that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations."

She said she'll give them a note today explaining "they need to keep on with their responsibilities."

Rumors of hung jury

Pallmeyer on Wednesday twice met privately with lawyers in the case to discuss the matters. The second meeting stretched to 1-1/2 hours.

While rumors of a hung jury spread quickly through the courthouse, Pallmeyer wouldn't disclose specifics of their concerns, saying she would likely do so after a verdict is reached -- appearing confident that one would be reached.

On Wednesday, the seventh day of their deliberations, jurors at times were fractured into smaller groups, showing up in various places in the courthouse and appearing not to be deliberating much.

At one point well after a lunch break, four Ryan jurors took an elevator to a different courtroom floor than where deliberations are taking place. They walked to the end of the hallway on that floor and talked quietly among themselves. That same group was seen stepping in and out of the stairwell at various points during the day, and others, too, were seen coming and going.

Notes under seal for now

But at 4 p.m. when their talks ended for the day, all 12 panel members left at the same time and appeared to be getting along. They're due back this morning to continue deliberations.

Pallmeyer said she will keep the two notes under seal, unlike other jury questions that she has publicly released. She said she plans to unseal just about everything once a verdict is reached.

"They relate to some personal difficulties, and that's the reason that I think, for the integrity of the process and to encourage the jurors to be as open and hardworking as they have been, I think the appropriate course here is to keep their communications to me, at least at this time, a private matter," Pallmeyer said.

The jury, made up of six men and six women, is sifting through countless documents that came in during the nearly six-month trial. They are weighing a 22-count indictment of racketeering, false statements and tax evasion against Ryan, 72, and racketeering and extortion charges against his co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, 67.

Prosecutors played more FBI wiretaps Wednesday in the G-Sting political corruption case. They allege two county commissioners took bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi through his lobbyist to vote in favor of the Galardi's club. They are trying to establish a pattern of contact between Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone, and former commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

Federal prosecutors played portions of 67 wiretaps that were recorded as a result of the G-Sting investigation. For Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, some of those wiretaps may spell trouble. But Dario Herrera's defense team says they liked what they heard.

In a July 2001 FBI wiretap, Mike Galardi tells his lobbyist, Lance Malone, to give Mary Kincaid-Chauncey a message: "Tell her I'm going to get her another five whenever she wants it." Prosecutors say that mean $5,000. Days later, Kincaid-Chauncey left a message on Galardi's voice mail: "Thanks so much for all your help."

What was Kincaid-Chauncey thanking Galardi for? The former county commissioner said, "I don't remember, I can't remember what I said last week. I have no idea."

Dario Herrera's lawyers are pleased with what they heard from Wednesday's wiretap evidence. Phone call after phone call of Mike Galardi complaining to Lance Malone. Herrera refuses to help them in opening Galardi's strip club, Jaguars.

Jerry Bernstein, Herrera's attorney, said, "I think what you hear is a lot of frustration on the part of Michael Galardi and Lance Malone with the fact Dario Herrera is an honest public official. That's what you hear. Some of it is really, really bad stuff particularly when Erin Kenny gets herself cranked up."

Kenny, another former commissioner who admitted taking money from Galardi, was upset in July of 2001 that Herrera wouldn't help Galardi overcome licensing issues for Jaguars, and said in various wiretaps: "That prick. He is a son of a (expletive). I'm so pissed off at him right now, I'm going to (expletive) him in the worst way." And, "I will destroy him."

The wiretap evidence the G-Sting jury heard Wednesday is just the beginning. Over an 18-month period the FBI recorded 44,000 different conversations, which equals 4,000 hours of wiretaps.

The G-Sting trial resumes Thursday morning, Mar. 23 at 8:30. At that time the jury will hear more wiretaps.

Lawyer Supports Testimony Against 'Mob Cops' (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 23, 2006

The testimony of Burton Kaplan, a key government witness in the "Mafia Cops" trial, was buttressed Wednesday by his former defense attorney, who said Kaplan admitted being the intermediary between the mob and two cops.

Attorney Judd Burstein, who represented Kaplan until 1999, said that he was first told by his client about Kaplan's alleged dealings with the former cops when it was known that former acting Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso became a government witness.

Testifying as a prosecution witness in the racketeering trial of ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito, 57, and Stephen Caracappa, 64, Burstein said he called Kaplan in March 1994 immediately after learning through the legal grapevine that Casso was working for the government.

After the New York Post ran a story on March 25, 1994 about Casso claiming two unnamed cops carried out a murder for him, Burstein testified that Kaplan became very concerned.

"He said 'this was a big problem for me; I was the go-between Casso and the cops on this killing and other matters,'" Burstein remembered Kaplan saying.

Kaplan said he was going to leave New York City, something Burstein advised against. The Post article was about the murder of Gambino soldier Edward Lino on Nov. 6, 1992. The next day, March 26, 1994, the Daily News ran a similar story and ran a picture of Eppolito, Burstein told the jury.

Judge Jack Weinstein sustained a defense objection about the suggestion that Caracappa was mentioned in the story. However, Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, didn't object.

On cross examination by Cutler, Burstein indicated that he had only Kaplan's word to go on about his alleged role as an intermediary between Casso and the police.

Later, Stephen Corso, a corrupt accountant who is a federal witness, described how he talked with Eppolito about getting a small quantity of methamphetamine in late 2004. Prosecutors then played a video showing Eppolito's son Anthony and another man passing the drug to Corso for $900.

However, in another recording, Louis Eppolito is heard upbraiding Corso. "I got a panic call from my son and I'm very, very -- -- upset," said Eppolito. "So don't [contact] him or Guido anymore. No more."

Lawyer For Earlier Witness Testifies For Prosecution (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Thus far, the witnesses at the trial of two retired detectives accused of killing for the mob have included an old marijuana dealer, a murderous mob boss, a suntanned C.P.A. and a grieving Brooklyn mother whose son was mistakenly shot outside her house one Christmas Day.

Nonetheless, the federal trial in Brooklyn turned yesterday to what may have been its weirdest witness yet, or at least most professionally complicated: the former lawyer for a government witness. His attorney-client privilege waived, the lawyer bolstered the witness's account that he once served as the liaison between the detectives, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, and their patron in the mob.

The lawyer, Judd Burstein, talked like one — using phrases like "the sum and substance of my testimony" and trying to avoid what a prosecutor called "humongous lawyer answers" to his questions.

It was a strange sight to watch Mr. Burstein, who has practiced law for more than 20 years, answer questions on direct examination, then under cross-examination, put to him by other lawyers.

There were lawyers for the prosecution, lawyers for the defense, lawyers in the gallery, a lawyer on the bench — and then Mr. Burstein, a man whom prosecutors called to corroborate the testimony of Burton Kaplan, his former client, who is serving a 27-year term for marijuana sales.

Last week, Mr. Kaplan had told the jury that from 1986 to 1993, he acted as "the safety spot" between the two detectives and the No. 2 man in the Luchese crime family, Anthony Casso. Mr. Casso, sick with vengeance at a 1986 attempt on his life, paid the defendants, Mr. Kaplan said, to kill seven rivals on his behalf.

Mr. Burstein, engaged happily in civil practice these days, leaned comfortably in the witness chair as he told the jury that in 1994 Mr. Kaplan called him in a panic when a newspaper reported that Mr. Casso was cooperating with the authorities, a move that threatened everyone involved.

"He said there was an article in The New York Post about Anthony Casso having used two New York City cops to order killings," Mr. Burstein said, "and he said, 'This is a big problem for me — I was the go-between.' "

The afternoon saw one of those jarring juxtapositions that are frequent in the trial. Steven Corso, the suntanned C.P.A., reappeared and told how in February 2005 the defendants had agreed one night at dinner to help get drugs for some "Hollywood punks" who were coming to Las Vegas and who Mr. Eppolito, living in Nevada writing screenplays, wanted to impress.

Mr. Corso, as the defense has pointed out, is a tax cheat, thief and government witness who moved through Las Vegas, secretly recording strippers, gangsters and the two defendants as they talked about the "punks" that night.

"Two are famous," Mr. Corso said, according to a transcript. This was followed by an answer any struggling writer might have made: "How famous?" Mr. Eppolito asked.

Two days later, the lawman's son and a friend took an ounce of methamphetamine to Mr. Corso's office, where agents in a nearby room recorded them taking $900 for the drugs.

The transaction is important from a legal point of view because it lets the prosecution argue that the two detectives were engaged in a continuing conspiracy that stretched from murder in the 1980's to a drug deal just last year.

Two months earlier, Mr. Corso had recorded the detective in another scene of writerly angst. He asked Mr. Eppolito if he might take laundered money as an investment in his script, but the lawman cut him off.

"Did you finish reading that?" the anxious writer asked.

"I've been busy," Mr. Corso said.

Att'y Burns 'Mafia Cops' (NYDN)

Backs middleman claim

A topnotch defense attorney turned prosecution witness yesterday at the Mafia cops trial, backing up ex-client Burton Kaplan's claim he was the middleman between the mob and two allegedly crooked detectives.

In an unusual move, lawyer Judd Burstein went to prosecutors last year and suggested they ask Kaplan to waive his attorney-client privilege now that he was the government's chief witness in the Mafia cops case.

He agreed, paving the way for Burstein to corroborate Kaplan's testimony linking ex-cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa to numerous gangland killings when they were on the force.

The lawyer said he began representing Kaplan in 1985.

"It never even crossed my mind that he had a propensity toward violence," said Burstein, a noted defender who has handled mob, white-collar and big-money divorce cases.

Then after published reports in 1994 that Luchese crime family capo Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso was spilling his guts about two dirty cops on his payroll, Kaplan revealed a dark secret to his lawyer.

"He said, 'This is a big problem for me,'" Burstein said. "'I was the go-between for Casso and these two cops.'"

Kaplan adamantly refused to cooperate - even after he drew a 27-year sentence for drug trafficking - until 2004, when he thought Eppolito or Caracappa was going to rat him out.

Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler suggested Burstein came forward because he had read media reports last summer that the judge might toss the case on a legal technicality.

Another government witness, Steven Corso, testified yesterday how Eppolito was so desperate to raise cash for his screenplay business he was willing to launder drug money and involve his son Anthony in a drug deal.

Corso, a crooked accountant working undercover, wanted to buy designer drugs for some investors he claimed were coming to Las Vegas, where Eppolito and Caracappa had moved after retiring from the NYPD.

"Tony can handle that for you," Eppolito told Corso, who even recorded Eppolito in a hospital where the ex-cop was recovering from heart surgery.

Where the money was coming from was of no issue to Eppolito, according to recordings played yesterday.

"Do you care what [the investor] does for a living?" Corso asks Eppolito on one tape.

"If this is the biggest drug dealer in the United States, I don't give a f--k," Eppolito responds, adding, "If you said to me, 'Lou, I wanna introduce you to Jack Smith, he wants to invest in this film,' [and] he says '$75,000 comes in a f-----g shoebox,' that's fine with me, I don't care."

POST SCOOP SENT MOB RAT RUNNING (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 23, 2006

When Burton Kaplan picked up a copy of The Post on March 25, 1994, he got some exclusive news - and instantly knew it was time to disappear.

The drug-dealing mob associate was shaken after reading an exclusive report by Murray Weiss, which revealed that busted Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso had hired two NYPD mob cops as hit men.

Kaplan immediately told his lawyer about the report and feared he had to flee to China, testimony revealed at the racketeering trial of the two cops.

"He said there was an article in the New York Post about Anthony Casso having used two New York City cops to order killings," Kaplan's former attorney, Judd Burstein, testified yesterday. "[Kaplan] said, 'This is a big problem for me. I was the go-between.' "

Kaplan - the star witness in the gangland racketeering trial for former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa - testified last week that he relayed orders from Casso to the detectives, including requests for inside police information and murder contracts.

Kaplan said the two detectives even personally carried out a hit on Gambino crime family member Eddie Lino.

The stool pigeon also said that he eventually went on the lam in 1994 - fleeing not to China, but to Mexico and later Oregon and Las Vegas.

Last week, Kaplan said he paid the cops to kill Lino, because he had been involved in a failed hit on Casso.

But at the time, the gangster Casso was planning to testify that Gambino boss John Gotti personally asked him to carry out the hit on Lino, who had apparently become a liability because he was doing drugs.

Casso had never met the two cops. But Kaplan said last week that the boss figured out who they were from Eppolito's book, "Mafia Cop," in the early 1990s.

He saw a picture of the two former partners in the book and remembered spotting two men who looked like them years earlier, when the cops allegedly served as backup to another mobster during a kidnapping.

The government eventually determined that the volatile Casso was a lousy witness, and he never testified. Kaplan eventually came out of hiding, only to be busted for selling pot.

DOJ_NMG_0020163

Also yesterday, jurors heard a tape made in Las Vegas last year by wire-wearing informant Steven Corso, who had conversations with the rogue detectives.

During a dinner with Eppolito and Caracappa, the crooked accountant said he had some famous clients from Hollywood who wanted to invest in a movie the ex-cop hoped to produce - and that they wanted a bunch of drugs to party with.

"I got these guys," Corso said. "Two are famous. They're coming in this weekend . . . these are the guys that are gonna invest [in the film]. These guys, being young, like to party."

"Tony can take care of that for you," Eppolito said, referring to his son, Anthony. "My son can bring 'em to all the places, the top places [nightclubs.]"

"Well . . . they don't wanna go to the, the places," Corso said. "They want me to get 'em either ecstasy or speed."

Defense attorney Bruce Cutler asked Corso if the FBI put him up to bringing up drugs during the dinner in an effort to make the cops look bad.

"The FBI did not tell me to inject it, they told me to throw it out there and see what happens," Corso said.

Eppolito also said that he liked doing business better with Jews than Italians.

"There's no better way," he said. "The Jews say, you're Jewish, he's Jewish, he's Jewish, he's Jewish. There's four of us, that's a quarter each, we all get a quarter.

"[The way] Italians do it is, I want 65 cents, I'll give you a dime, I'll give him three cents, I'll give him seven, but I make sure I get the most."

JAILER REV. A MAN OF GOTTI (NYPOST)

By Dan Mangan And Kati Cornell Smith

EXCLUSIVE

A corrections officer-turned-minister is backing John "Junior" Gotti's claim that he quit the Mafia in the late 1990s, saying Gotti repeatedly told him in jail - "I'm not involved in that life, that life has been nothing but trouble for me."

"This is the truth, this is what he said," recalled Bobby Hargraves, 45, who was working in the Westchester County Jail in Valhalla in 1998 when Gotti was there awaiting a racketeering trial.

Hargraves "vividly" remembers up to five conversations with Gotti in which "he said, 'I'm no longer a part of that life anymore.' " Gotti also avoided fellow Gambino crime family defendants in jail before pleading guilty in that case in 1999, and told Hargraves he was interested in moving his family to Canada, the ex-officer said.

Hargraves, who retired last summer after 22 years as a corrections officer to become full-time pastor of a Poughkeepsie church, shared his account with The Post yesterday.

His story was welcomed by Gotti's lawyers, who argue that the son of "Dapper Don" John Gotti is not guilty of pending racketeering charges because he left the mob before July 1999. That would mean the five-year statute of limitations on those charges would have expired by the time he was indicted in 2004.

"I think the guy could be a very valuable witness," said Gotti's lawyer, Charles Carnesi, adding that his client remembers being counseled by Hargraves on religious matters. "I'm definitely interested in speaking with him."

A jury earlier this month hung, reportedly 8-4, in favor of Gotti's acquittal, after hearing testimony from lawyer Ron Kuby and a Gambino crime family associate that Junior told them in 1998 that he was leaving the Mafia. Prosecutors plan to retry Gotti on the charges - including the 1992 kidnapping of Kuby's radio co-host, Curtis Sliwa.

Hargraves did not testify at the last trial or at a prior one that also ended in a hung jury. But he likely will be called to the witness stand at a third trial.

"[Gotti] said, 'I want you to know I never killed anyone, I'm very active in my church, I give to my church,' " recalled Hargraves, who said Gotti bears a tattoo of Christ wearing a crown of thorns.

Officials Accuse 5 Of Bilking Medicare (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

An Altadena couple, relatives and an associate submitted fraudulent bills to the agency, federal authorities say.

Five Southern Californians were arrested Tuesday and charged with defrauding Medicare out of $20 million by recruiting patients for unnecessary medical treatment and then billing the agency for the services.

An Altadena couple, two of their relatives and an associate are accused of "beneficiary sharing" or "patient rotating," in which "marketers" obtain data about Medicare beneficiaries and sell the information to clinics or diagnostic testing centers that then prepare fraudulent billings.

The group, led by Konstantin Mikhaylovich Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena, allegedly conducted the fraudulent activity through 12 Los Angeles-area medical providers they controlled since 1997.

The providers purportedly conducted diagnostic examinations, such as ultrasound and blood tests, and then billed Medicare for patients' visits between 2000 and 2005 — regardless of whether medical services were received, authorities said.

The ring would fabricate test results to ensure that the patients' files could withstand an audit by Medicare, according to a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday.

The U.S. attorney's office charged Grigoryan; his wife, Mayya Leonidovna Grigoryan, 54; Eduard Gershelis, 34, of Los Angeles, the couple's son-in-law; Aleksandr Treynker, 48, of Canoga Park, Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law; and Haroutyun Gulderyan, 36, of Tujunga with conspiracy, healthcare fraud, Medicare kickbacks, making false statements to a Medicare provider and money laundering.

The complaint alleges that Medicare was forced to pay out at least $20 million in fraudulent claims. Much of the money was deposited into bank accounts for "management" and "consulting" companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account.

The Grigoryans and Gershelis are being held without bail, authorities said. Treynker will be allowed to remain on home detention after posting a $150,000 bond. Gulderyan's bail hearing was postponed until Thursday.

Anthony Solis, an attorney for Konstantin Grigoryan, said Tuesday he did not yet have sufficient information to comment on the charges.

5 Charged In Massive Fraud Case (PASASN)

Altadena man suspected head of Medicare scheme

ALTADENA - An Altadena couple and three associates were arrested Tuesday morning on federal charges of bilking Medicare of more than $20 million through a "massive and well-organized conspiracy," authorities said.

Ukrainian immigrants Konstantin Mikhaylovich Grigoryan, 56, and his wife, Mayya Leonidovna Grigoryan, 54, own a home in the 700 block of Millard Canyon Road in Altadena, according to an FBI affidavit in support of their arrest.

The defendants allegedly operated a dozen Los Angeles-area clinics and diagnostic-testing facilities that claimed to be run by physicians but actually existed to defraud Medicare, the FBI said.

The Medicare beneficiaries were brought to the fraudulent healthcare providers by "cappers," marketers who sold the patients' information for fraudulent billing or were paid a kickback for bringing patients to the facilities, authorities said. The patients were bused to facilities including H.G. Diagnostics, at 720 N. Lake Ave., Suite 4, in Pasadena, from all over Los Angeles County, and sometimes from as far away as San Diego or San Jose, authorities said.

Once the patients arrived, the Medicare providers billed their Medicare numbers on the dates of their visit, and other dates, regardless of whether services were provided, the affidavit said. When no services were rendered, the conspirators would fabricate tests so the files could withstand an audit, the FBI said.

The 12 Medicare providers also shared the patients' Medicare numbers, in what the FBI called a "patient sharing" or "patient rotating" scheme. For example, the affidavit says 10 providers billed Medicare for the same 11 beneficiaries. Between 2000 and 2005, the scheme netted at least $20 million, the FBI said.

The other three defendants are Eduard Gershelis, 34, of Los Angeles, who is also the Grigoryans' son-in-law; Aleksandr Treynker, 48, of Canoga Park, who is Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law; and Haroutyun Gulderyan, 36, of Tujunga.

The defendants are charged with conspiracy, healthcare

fraud, Medicare kickbacks, false statements as to a Medicare Part B provider and money laundering.

The FBI names Konstantin Grigoryan as leader of the group, which is said to have began its elaborate scheme in 1997. The defendants allegedly masked their common ownership and control of the medical providers, in violation of Medicare regulations. The defendants further concealed their fraud by laundering their money "into a maze of bank accounts of `management' and `consulting' companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account," the affidavit said.

Konstantin Grigoryan has a past conviction in state court for two counts of receiving illegal payments in 2001, the affidavit said. He was charged then with arranging kickbacks in exchange for referring patients, and as part of a plea agreement received three years' probation. He was also barred from participation in state or federal healthcare programs.

Gershelis, Gulderyan and Treynker all have previous convictions in state court for the same crime, court records show.

The FBI says the money trail further implicates the defendants. A review of bank records shows large checks - often totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars - flowing from the 12 Medicare providers to four companies held in the names of the defendants, the affidavit said.

The case is the result of an ongoing investigation by the FBI, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Inspector General and IRS-Criminal Investigation Division.

The San Jose Mercury News, March 23, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Five people were arrested Tuesday on charges they bilked more than $20 million in Medicare payments for tests that were unnecessary or never performed.

Federal prosecutors said Konstantin Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena oversaw the fraud scheme from 1997 to 2005. He and four others are accused of recruiting Medicare beneficiaries and taking them to a dozen doctor's offices and medical laboratories in Los Angeles, prosecutors said.

The offices then submitted bogus claims for diagnostic tests, ultrasound exams and other services, according to a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday. The Medicare beneficiaries were paid for the use of their Medicare numbers, and the fraud ring fabricated test results to fool Medicare auditors.

The complaint also alleged that most of the money that Medicare paid out for the fraudulent claims between 2000 and 2005 was deposited into bank accounts for fake management and consulting companies.

Grigoryan, his wife Mayya and their son-in-law Eduard Gershelis were charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, money laundering and making false statements.

Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law Aleksandr Treynker and a fifth defendant, Haroutyun Gulderyan, also face similar charges.

All five made their initial court appearances Tuesday afternoon. The Grigoryans and Gershelis were ordered held without bond. Treynker was ordered released on $150,000 bond. Gulderyan's bond hearing was postponed to Thursday.

Attorneys for Konstantin Grigoryan and Gulderyan had no immediate comment on the charges. Lawyers for their co-defendants could not be reached.

A call to assistant U.S. attorney Bruce Searby, who is prosecuting the case, was not immediately returned.

Indictments Connected To Health Care Fraud Expected Thursday (LAFDA)

Lafayette Daily Advertiser, March 23, 2006

Federal authorities have scheduled a news conference Thursday in Lafayette to announce a 95-count indictment alleging health care fraud.

Few other details were available this afternoon; U.S. Attorney Donald Washington was in court, and his office staff could not comment. Clerk of Court employees said as of 4 p.m., there were no indictments handed down from the grand jury this week.

The news conference is scheduled for 10 a.m. Thursday in the federal courthouse on Lafayette Street.

Representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services also will be present.

Former 49ers Kicker Indicted For $8M Insurance Fraud (MERCN)

By Rodney Foo

The San Jose Mercury News, March 23, 2006

Ray Wersching, the retired San Francisco 49ers kicker who booted field goals in two Super Bowl victories, was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of embezzling $8 million from an insurance company and tax evasion.

Wersching, 55, the owner of Ray Wersching Insurance Agency in Redwood City, is accused of diverting premiums earmarked for Farmers Insurance from 1997 to 2000. He is also alleged to have evaded paying taxes on $3.6 million in corporate income from 1999 to 2000.

Wersching has been served with a summons to appear Monday in U.S. District Court in San Francisco before Magistrate Judge Bernard Zimmerman, said U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay.

``This action," Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said in a statement, ``makes it clear that in California, no one -- whether an average citizen or a former football star -- will escape prosecution if they are suspected of insurance fraud."

Wersching, an ex-University of California football star, faces five allegations -- embezzlement; permitting a felon convicted of dishonesty to participate in an insurance business; failing to file a corporate tax return; and two counts of tax evasion.

The penalties carry a range of prison sentences from one to 10 years, and fines of $250,000 plus restitution.

The Mercury News was unable to reach Wersching for comment.

The indictment ends a five-year investigation conducted by the state justice department, the FBI, the California Department of Insurance, and the Internal Revenue Service.

Authorities allege Wersching diverted money from premiums to be paid to Farmers into his own company's account.

Wersching had opened the insurance agency in February 1995, and a month later hired Mary Ann Locke, also known as Mary Ann Diaz, giving her a 50 percent stake in the firm.

In March 2001, Farmer's ended its affiliation with Wersching. Locke left the company two months later.

Locke had been convicted of forgery in 1992, Macaulay said.

Last year, Locke was arraigned in federal court on insurance fraud, wire fraud and money laundering, related to the embezzlement scheme. She used the money to pay Nevada casinos for gambling debts, state insurance department officials said.

Wersching's troubles stand in stark contrast to his accomplishments on the gridiron.

He played 15 years in the NFL -- four of them with the San Diego Chargers -- before retiring from the 49ers after the 1987 season. He was a member of the 1981 and 1984 championship teams. He still holds the record for most career field goals in Super Bowls, five. Wersching trails only legendary 49er wide receiver Jerry Rice as the team's leading scorer.

The accusations stunned those who knew Wersching.

``There was never a more respected guy on the team," said Dr. Harry Edwards, a staff consultant with the 49ers for the past 20 years. ``He was a guy they leaned on in tight games to get it done and nine times out of 10, he got it done.

``From what I know of him, I could not begin to fathom what could possibly have brought him to this situation. I hope that whatever is the reality of it, that he gets through this thing."

John McVay, who served as 49ers general manager when Wersching was with the team, said, ``This is a good man and he has been for a lot of years. Knowing him, this just doesn't add up. Maybe somebody else did something and dumped it all in his lap. The Ray Wersching I know wouldn't do that kind of stuff."

FBI agent LaRae Quy said the investigation is continuing.

``We're still looking to see who might be involved and to what extent," she said.

Court: No Police Search If One Resident Says 'yes,' Other 'no' (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that police may not enter a home to conduct a search if one resi-dent gives permission but the other says no.

The 5-3 decision in a Georgia drug case that involved a feuding husband and wife drew a sharp dissent from Chief Justice John Roberts. He said the majority, led by the high court's more liberal justices, misapplied the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and set a rule based on "random" circumstances.

The ruling, written by Justice David Souter, says that if police search a home after being invited in by one resident over the protest of another, the evidence that is seized cannot be used in court. The decision emphasized respect for privacy in the home.

The ruling ensures that a straw coated with what police said appeared to be cocaine that was found in a bedroom at the home of Scott Fitz Randolph cannot be used in any prosecution of him. During a domestic dispute, Randolph's wife, Janet, had called police to their house in Americus. After telling the officer that her husband used drugs, she led the officer to the straw. Scott Randolph had refused an officer's request to allow a search.

Souter referred to social custom and property law that gives spouses and co-tenants equal claim on who enters a person's property. He said no guest would enter at one occupant's invitation if another occupant told the guest to stay out — and police, absent a search warrant, should not either.

"There is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another," Souter wrote, "whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders."

The ruling was narrowly crafted to affect only situations in which the objecting tenant is present and there is no evidence of abuse or other circumstances that would justify an immediate entry by police.

However, the decision reverses a pattern among lower U.S. courts that had favored police if one resident allowed the search over the objections of another.

Wednesday's decision affirmed a ruling by the Georgia Supreme Court that favored Scott Randolph. The ruling had blocked his trial on cocaine possession charges from going forward.

Souter was joined by the court's three other more liberal justices, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, and by Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative at the court's ideological center. Dissenting with Roberts were fellow conservatives Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. New Justice Samuel Alito was not on the court when the case was argued, so he did not take part in the ruling.

In his dissent, Roberts said people who share a home have a reduced expectation of privacy and assume the risk that another resident might agree to a search by police. He said the ruling could endanger spouses who are abused and want police to come in a home, but do not make clear to police that a threat exists.

Thomas dissented separately, saying the action at the Randolph house should not be considered a police search because the wife led the officer to the evidence.

Thomas Goldstein, who represented Randolph, praised the decision as an affirmation of the Fourth Amendment's privacy protection. Russ Willard, spokesman for the Georgia attorney general's office, called the ruling a "roadblock" to law enforcement and said it could diminish officers' ability to investigate domestic disputes.

Roberts Dissent Reveals Strain Beneath Court's Placid Surface (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 — A Supreme Court decision on Wednesday in an uncelebrated criminal case did more than resolve a dispute over whether the police can search a home without a warrant when one occupant gives consent but another objects.

More than any other case so far, the decision, which answered that question in the negative by a vote of 5 to 3, drew back the curtain to reveal the strains behind the surface placidity and collegiality of the young Roberts court.

It was not only that this case, out of 32 decided since the term began in October, provoked Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. to write his first dissenting opinion. He had cast two earlier dissenting votes, and had to write a dissenting opinion eventually.

And although there has been much commentary on the court's unusually high proportion of unanimous opinions, 22 so far compared with only 27 in all of the last term, few people expected that rate to continue as the court disposed of its easiest cases and moved into the heart of the term.

Rather, what was striking about the decision in Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067, was the pointed, personal and acerbic tone in which the justices expressed their disagreement over whether the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches was violated when the police in Americus, Ga., arriving at a house to investigate a domestic dispute, accepted the wife's invitation to look for evidence of her husband's cocaine use.

The dueling opinions themselves were relatively straightforward; as has often been the case in the court's recent past, although not so far this term, the justices revealed their real feelings in the footnotes.

Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter said the search was unreasonable, given the vocal objection of the husband, Scott Randolph. True, Justice Souter said, the court had long permitted one party to give consent to a search of shared premises under what is known as the "co-occupant consent rule." But he said that rule should be limited to the context in which it was first applied, the absence of the person who later objected.

The presence of the objecting person changed everything, Justice Souter said, noting that it defied "widely shared social expectations" for someone to come to the door of a dwelling and to cross the threshold at one occupant's invitation if another objected.

"Without some very good reason, no sensible person would go inside under those conditions," he said.

"We have, after all, lived our whole national history with an understanding of the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle," Justice Souter said. "Disputed permission is thus no match for this central value of the Fourth Amendment."

Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the majority opinion, as did Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who explained himself in a concurring opinion notable for its ambivalent tone. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote, as he was not a member of the court when the case was argued.

The dissenters, in addition to Chief Justice Roberts, were Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. In his opinion, the chief justice took aim at the majority's description of social custom, as well as its reliance on that description to reshape "a great deal of established Fourth Amendment law."

Every lower federal court to have considered the issue, as well as most state courts, had concluded that one party's consent was sufficient. The Georgia Supreme Court, in its 2004 decision that the justices affirmed, was in the minority, ruling in this case that the evidence of Mr. Randolph's cocaine use was inadmissible.

"The fact is that a wide variety of differing social situations can readily be imagined, giving rise to quite different social expectations," Chief Justice Roberts said. For example, he continued, "a guest who came to celebrate an occupant's birthday, or one who had traveled some distance for a particular reason, might not readily turn away simply because of a roommate's objection."

Noting that "the possible scenarios are limitless," he said, "Such shifting expectations are not a promising foundation on which to ground a constitutional rule, particularly because the majority has no support for its basic assumption — that an invited guest encountering two disagreeing co-occupants would flee — beyond a hunch about how people would typically act in an atypical situation."

The majority missed the point, the chief justice said; the fact is that someone choosing to share space has also, already, chosen to share privacy.

"Our common social expectations may well be that the other person will not, in turn, share what we have shared with them with another — including the police," he said, "but that is the risk we take in sharing."

That was the analysis, and then came the footnotes.

Justice Souter, usually mild-mannered to a fault, said in Footnote 4 that "in the dissent's view, the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over." By invoking a "false equation" between inviting the police into the home and reporting a secret, he said, the chief justice "suggests a deliberate intent to devalue the importance of the privacy of a dwelling place."

Chief Justice Roberts responded in turn. The majority had mischaracterized his position on privacy and "seems a bit overwrought," he said in a footnote.

In a concluding paragraph of his dissent, he said: "The majority reminds us, in high tones, that a man's home is his castle, but even under the majority's rule, it is not his castle if he happens to be absent, asleep in the keep or otherwise engaged when the constable arrives at the gate. Then it is his co-owner's castle."

Justice Souter also attacked as a "red herring" a warning by Chief Justice Roberts that the rule the court was adopting would hamper the ability of the police to protect victims of domestic violence.

Justice Souter said the law was clear on the right of the police, despite any objection, to enter a home to protect a crime victim. But that issue "has nothing to do with the question in this case," he said.

The discussion by Chief Justice Roberts of the implications for domestic violence cases might have been an effort to win, or a failed effort to hold, the vote of Justice Breyer.

When the case was argued on Nov. 8, Justice Breyer raised the issue of domestic abuse. Addressing Mr. Randolph's lawyer, Thomas C. Goldstein, he said, "I haven't seen anything on your side that wouldn't prevent many cases of domestic spousal abuse from being investigated." He added, "Quite frankly, it bothers me a lot."

In his concurring opinion on Wednesday, Justice Breyer noted that in this case, the police were searching "solely for evidence," and domestic abuse was not at issue. While he pronounced himself satisfied by "the case-specific nature of the court's holding," he said the outcome might well be different in the context of domestic abuse, in which police entry even over one spouse's objection could be reasonable.

This case was the oldest undecided case on the court's docket, and it is likely that Justice Breyer's vote was in play until the final stages. One indication was Chief Justice Roberts's reference in his opinion to Justice Breyer's having joined "what becomes the majority opinion," an odd present-tense locution suggesting that the outcome had once been otherwise.

The case also produced dueling opinions by Justice Stevens, concurring, and Justice Scalia, in dissent, over how a true believer in interpreting the Constitution in light of the framers' original understanding would have resolved the issue. There was a tone more of banter than anger to this exchange between the old adversaries, as if after some months of forced and unaccustomed unanimity, they were now free once again to acknowledge their differences.

Supreme Court Strengthens Protection Against Searches (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Strengthening Fourth Amendment protections against warrantless searches, the Supreme Court ruled that police can't enter a house over a resident's objection simply because a second occupant invites them in.

Chief Justice John Roberts led the three dissenters, reflecting his longstanding deference to police.

The opinions recalled debates that have marked the court since the 1950s, when, under Chief Justice Earl Warren, it began imposing rules to deter police misconduct. Justice Samuel Alito sat out because the case was argued before his confirmation, but he has written elsewhere of his disagreement with Warren Court criminal-procedure cases.

The ruling by Justice David Souter was grounded in those doctrines, which have limited warrantless searches when a third party, such as a landlord or hotel clerk, has let police into an absent tenant's quarters. "We have, after all, lived our whole national history with an understanding of 'the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle,'" Justice Souter wrote, citing a 1958 opinion by his predecessor, Justice William Brennan.

Yesterday's case originated with a 2001 marital dispute in Americus, Ga. Janet Randolph told police that her husband, Scott, used cocaine and that the house held "drug evidence." Mr. Randolph refused when an officer asked permission to search the premises. The officer turned to Mrs. Randolph, who led him to Mr. Randolph's bedroom, where the officer found a drinking straw with cocaine residue.

The Georgia Supreme Court ruled the search violated the Fourth Amendment, which bars "unreasonable searches and seizures" of "persons, houses, papers and effects." The state appealed.

Although the Constitution generally provides that police obtain a warrant before conducting a search, there are "reasonable" exceptions, such as to prevent imminent harm or if the party consents.

"The constant element...is the great significance given to widely shared social expectations," Justice Souter wrote. "There is no common understanding that one co-tenant" can "prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders." Few visitors would enter a house at "one occupant's invitation...when a fellow tenant stood there saying, 'stay out.'" That distinguished the case from a 1974 Supreme Court decision allowing one tenant to let police search while a co-tenant wasn't home. People who share housing "understand that any one of them may admit visitors, with the consequence that a guest obnoxious to one may nevertheless be admitted in his absence by another," he wrote.

Chief Justice Roberts's dissent said "the court creates constitutional law by surmising what is typical when a social guest encounters an entirely atypical situation." Many "social conventions may shape expectations about how we act when another shares with us what is otherwise private," he wrote. But "if an individual shares information, papers, or places with another, he assumes the risk that the other person will in turn share access to that information or those papers or places with the government."

Supreme Court Puts Constraints On House Searches With Co-tenants (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Recognizing that a man's home is, indeed, his castle, the Supreme Court said Wednesday that police can't search a house without a warrant if one occupant invites them in but another objects to their presence.

Writing for a sharply divided court, Justice David Souter said the ruling's logic was drawn from common social courtesies. The vote in the case was 5-3; Justice Samuel Alito, who wasn't on the court when the case was argued, didn't vote.

"There is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders," Souter wrote. Under the Fourth Amendment, which protects against unreasonable searches, police who come knocking without a warrant can't bypass consent any more easily than a salesman or other guest could, he said. Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer joined Souter in the majority.

The ruling could have wide-ranging implications for authorities, who regularly confront the question of how and when someone has sufficiently waived his or her privacy rights to justify a search.

The ruling also inspired the first written dissent from Chief Justice John G. Roberts.

Roberts accused the court of falsely reading a social assumption into the Constitution - "that an invited guest who arrives at the door of a shared residence, and is greeted by a disagreeable co-occupant shouting `stay out,' would simply go away."

Roberts said that different social situations could produce different outcomes.

"Such shifting expectations are not a promising foundation on which to ground a constitutional rule," Roberts wrote. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas also dissented.

Roberts also disagreed with another of the court's assumptions: that a person who chooses to live with someone else has the same expectations of privacy as a person who chooses to live alone.

"Even in our most private relationships, our observable actions and possessions are private at the discretion of those around us," Roberts wrote. Someone who lives with others "assume the risk that those who have access to and control over his shared property might consent to a search."

The case arose from a domestic dispute involving spouses Scott and Janet Randolph in Americus, Ga. When police showed to resolve things, Janet Randolph told them that her husband had drugs in their home and agreed to let the officers inside to look for evidence.

Scott Randolph objected, but the police went ahead on Janet Randolph's word; she led them to drug paraphernalia in the couple's bedroom.

Scott Randolph later tried to have the evidence tossed out because he said the search was illegal. A lower court agreed with him and the justices were asked to decide the matter finally.

DOJ_NMG_0020171

The court had never directly confronted the issue of two people, both present at a home, giving different answers to a request for a search.

Souter noted that the court has long decided whether warrantless searches are "reasonable" by looking to the expectations that people would have in normal social situations.

The court also has ruled before that if only one occupant is present when police ask to search, that person's consent is sufficient, even if other occupants who weren't present later object to the search.

In the Randolph case, however, Souter said the social expectations were clear.

"A caller standing at the door of shared premises would have no confidence that one occupant's invitation was a sufficiently good reason to enter when a fellow tenant stood there saying, `Stay out,'" Souter wrote. "Without some very good reason, no sensible person would go inside under those conditions."

Souter made clear, though, that the court was drawing a fine line: A co-occupant's objection is relevant only if the person is at the door, voicing his or her wishes to the police. Someone who's not on the premises, or even asleep in a bedroom, "loses out," Souter said.

That thinking was the focus of Roberts' dissent.

"That the rule is so random in its application confirms that it bears no real relation to the privacy protected by the Fourth Amendment," Roberts wrote. "What the majority's rule protects is not so much privacy as the good luck of a co-owner who just happens to be present at the door when the police arrive."

Roberts also said that the court's ruling would have undesirable effects on victims of domestic violence.

"The majority's rule apparently forbids police from entering to assist with a domestic dispute if the abuser whose behavior prompted the request for police assistance objects," he said, echoing concerns that Breyer had raised during oral arguments.

Breyer, however, sided with the court majority and wrote separately to address the questions about domestic violence.

Breyer said police responding to instances of domestic abuse are often dealing with "emergency" situations in which normal search rules wouldn't apply.

Other justices also weighed in.

Stevens wrote a concurrence using the case to point out what he saw as a flaw in Scalia's preferred method of resolving cases, which is to divine the "original" meaning of constitutional provisions.

The Randolph case, Stevens said, could be resolved only by looking at "evolving" social standards. Only in modern times have women been recognized as equal partners in households, Stevens said. When the Fourth Amendment was written, "only the consent of the husband would matter" because women had lesser rights.

Scalia wrote to respond specifically to Stevens' charge. What had changed, he noted, were laws governing property rights, not the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.

Stevens had confused the "original import of the Fourth Amendment with the background sources of law to which the Amendment, on its original meaning, referred."

Thomas also dissented, saying the circumstances in Randolph's case weren't a search at all, but an instance of a spouse of a suspected criminal leading police to potential evidence and as such were beyond the reach of the Fourth Amendment's protection against illegal searches.

Divided Justices Reject Searches If Consent Is Split (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

A split Supreme Court yesterday ruled that Georgia police acted unconstitutionally when they searched a home without a warrant after one occupant agreed to the search but another refused.

The court ruled 5-3 that warrantless searches may be allowed under the Fourth Amendment if a home's occupant gives consent -- but not when a second occupant "is present at the scene and expressly refuses to consent."

DOJ_NMG_0020172

Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Steven G. Breyer and David H. Souter formed the majority. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., in his first written dissent since being confirmed five months ago, disagreed, saying the ruling will damage investigations of domestic violence.

"The cost of affording such random protection is great, as demonstrated by the recurring cases in which abused spouses seek to authorize police entry into a home they share with a nonconsenting abuser," the new chief said.

Justice Antonin Scalia joined the dissent, and he and Justice Clarence Thomas wrote dissents of their own. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained because the case was argued before he was confirmed.

The varied opinions marked the first major high court split since the confirmation of Chief Justice Roberts. Calling the new chief's concern a "red herring," the majority asserted the case had "no bearing on the capacity of the police to protect domestic victims."

"No question has been raised, or reasonably could be, about the authority of the police to enter a dwelling to protect a resident from domestic violence," Justice Souter wrote for the majority.

"It would be silly to suggest that the police would commit a tort by entering ... to determine whether violence (or the threat of violence) has just occurred or is about to (or soon will) occur, however much a spouse or other co-tenant objected."

The case involved a 2001 search of Janet and Scott Randolph's home. Mrs. Randolph had called police to complain that after a domestic dispute, her husband had taken their son away. When police arrived, she said Mr. Randolph was a cocaine user.

Mr. Randolph returned while police were still there, and Mrs. Randolph repeated her complaints about her husband's drug use and said there was evidence of it in the house.

Mr. Randolph denied this, saying that, in fact, it was Mrs. Randolph with the drug problem. When police asked whether they could look around without a warrant, Mr. Randolph "unequivocally refused," according to court papers. Mrs. Randolph, however, consented, leading an officer to a room where he found "a section of a drinking straw with a powdery residue he suspected was cocaine."

Mr. Randolph was indicted on charges of possession of cocaine. A state trial court denied his motion to suppress the evidence as products of a warrantless search unauthorized by consent. But the Georgia Court of Appeals and the Georgia Supreme Court reversed the denial, ruling in favor of Mr. Randolph that a warrantless search is invalid if an occupant refuses it, regardless of whether a second occupant gives consent.

High Court Trims Police Power To Search Homes (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The Supreme Court narrowed police search powers yesterday, ruling that officers must have a warrant to look for evidence in a couple's home unless both partners present agree to let them in.

The 5 to 3 decision sparked a sharp exchange among the justices. The majority portrayed the decision as striking a blow for privacy rights and gender equality; dissenters said it could undermine police efforts against domestic violence, the victims of which are often women.

The ruling upholds a 2004 decision of the Georgia Supreme Court but still makes a significant change in the law nationwide, because most other lower federal and state courts had previously said that police could search with the consent of one of two adults living together.

Now, officers must first ask a judicial officer for a warrant in such cases. Quarrels between husbands and wives, or boyfriends and girlfriends, keep police busy around the country; in the District, almost half of the 39,000 violent crime calls officers answered in 2000 involved alleged domestic violence.

Justice David H. Souter's majority opinion said that the consent of one partner is not enough, because of "widely shared social expectations" that adults living together each have veto power over who can come into their shared living space. That makes a warrantless search based on only one partner's consent "unreasonable" and, therefore, unconstitutional.

"[T]here is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders," Souter wrote.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., writing his first dissent since joining the court in October, said the ruling's "cost" would be "great," especially in domestic dispute situations.

Roberts wrote that the ruling made no sense, given that the court had previously said it is constitutional for police to enter a house with the permission of one partner when the other is asleep or absent. Those rulings were unchanged by yesterday's decision.

Just by agreeing to live with someone else, a co-tenant has surrendered a good deal of the privacy that the Constitution's Fourth Amendment was designed to protect, Roberts noted.

"The majority's rule apparently forbids police from entering to assist with a domestic dispute if the abuser whose behavior prompted the request for police assistance objects," he wrote.

But Souter called that argument a "red herring," saying that the police would still have legal authority to enter homes where one partner was truly in danger.

"[T]his case has no bearing on the capacity of the police to protect domestic victims," Souter wrote. "No question has been raised, or reasonably could be, about the authority of the police to enter a dwelling to protect a resident from domestic violence; so long as they have good reason to believe such a threat exists."

Souter said Roberts was guilty of declaring that "the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over."

Souter's opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

Breyer backed Souter with a separate opinion noting that his decisive fifth vote was cast on the understanding that Souter's analysis applies to cases such as this one, Georgia v. Randolph , No. 04-1607, in which the police were searching for evidence of a crime, rather than intervening in a violent dispute.

"[T]oday's decision will not adversely affect ordinary law enforcement practices," Breyer wrote.

The case arose out of a 2001 quarrel over child custody at the home of Janet and Scott Randolph in Americus, Ga. When officers arrived, she told them where they could find his cocaine. An officer asked Scott Randolph for permission to search the house. He refused, but Janet Randolph said yes -- and led them to a straw covered in cocaine crystals. Scott Randolph was arrested and indicted on charges of cocaine possession.

Georgia's Supreme Court ultimately ruled that the evidence should be suppressed because it was gathered without a warrant.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas also dissented. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote because he was not yet on the court in November, when the case was argued.

The main battle between Souter and Roberts was accompanied by a skirmish between Stevens and Scalia, who used the case as an opportunity to make points in the court's long-running dispute over Scalia's view that the Constitution should be interpreted in light of the Framers' original intent.

In a brief concurring opinion, Stevens noted that the court's ruling was based on the concept that neither a husband nor a wife is "master" of the house in the eyes of the law. But at the time the Bill of Rights was drafted, he wrote, only a husband's consent or objection would have been taken into account.

Thus, he wrote, "this case illustrates why even the most dedicated adherent to an approach . . . that places primary reliance on a search for original understanding would recognize the relevance of changes in our society."

Scalia fired back at "Justice Stevens' 'attempted critique' of originalism,' " arguing that the court's ruling would probably not benefit women.

"Given the usual patterns of domestic violence," he noted, "how often can police be expected to encounter the situation in which a man urges them to enter the home while a woman simultaneously demands they stay out?"

In Case Involving Disbarred Attorney, High Court Draws 'Fine Line' On Police Searches (LAW)

By Alyson M. Palmer, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County Daily Report, March 23, 2006

A man's home is still his castle, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled Wednesday, declaring a Georgia woman couldn't give away her husband's Fourth Amendment rights.

In a 5-3 decision that backed up a previous ruling by the Georgia Supreme Court, the U.S. high court said that one household occupant's permission for police to enter the home does not give law enforcement an exception to the warrant requirement if another occupant stands in the doorway and protests that entry.

The decision has broad implications for police searches across the nation and prompted the first dissent written by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who warned his colleagues may have made it difficult for abused spouses to obtain police assistance.

A disbarred Americus, Ga., attorney was at the center of the case. After police were called to his home when he and his wife quarreled, both accused each other of using illegal drugs. When police asked if they could search the home, Scott Fitz Randolph said no while his wife said yes. Police then searched the home and found what appeared to be cocaine. In the subsequent criminal case, Randolph moved to suppress the evidence.

Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter said "the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle" dictated the court's ruling in Randolph's favor. Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer joined the majority.

"Since the co-tenant wishing to open the door to a third party has no recognized authority in law or social practice to prevail over a present and objecting co-tenant," wrote Souter, "his disputed invitation, without more, gives a police officer no better claim to reasonableness in entering than the officer would have in the absence of any consent at all." Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067.

Acknowledging it was "drawing a fine line," the majority said, on the other hand, if the "potential objector" to the search is "nearby" but is "not invited to take part in the threshold colloquy," then the co-tenant's permission to search provides police a way around the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.

Roberts, joined by Justice Antonin Scalia, criticized that "fine line" as giving "protection on a random and happenstance basis, protecting, for example, a co-occupant who happens to be at the front door when the other occupant consents to a search, but not one napping or watching television in the next room."

Justice Clarence Thomas penned his own dissent.

Souter suggested police still could enter a home over an occupant's objection in an emergency situation "so long as they have good reason to believe such a threat exists." The case decided Wednesday involved a domestic dispute, but the spouse invited police in to search for drugs, not to protect her.

In July 2001, Americus police responded to a call about a disturbance between Randolph and his estranged wife at the Americus house where Randolph lived. Randolph had worked as a criminal defense lawyer but was disbarred in 2001 for mishandling a bankruptcy case.

With the couple accusing each other of drug use, police asked to search the home and got consent from the wife, but not Randolph. Police then found what appeared to be cocaine. After he was indicted by Sumter County on cocaine possession, Randolph unsuccessfully moved the trial court to suppress the evidence police took from the house.

Represented by Wilbur T. Gamble of Collier & Gamble of Dawson in the Georgia courts, Randolph appealed to the Georgia Supreme Court.

In a 4-3 decision issued in 2004 and written by Justice Robert Benham, the state high court agreed with Randolph that the trial court should have granted the motion to suppress.

"The Georgia Supreme Court got it exactly right, and that is, when you're at home, you have rights in your house," said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court veteran with the Washington firm of Goldstein & Howe who successfully argued the case for Randolph at the U.S. Supreme Court.

"At the same time, if you're away, your roommates or your spouse can let the police in, but when you're home, it's your castle."

The state of Georgia thought otherwise and appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, arguing that when people live together, they have a reduced expectation of privacy.

Georgia, represented by Senior Assistant Attorney General Paula K. Smith at oral argument, received backing from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Russ Willard, a spokesperson for Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker, lambasted the decision. "Today's decision throws yet another poorly defined roadblock in front of law enforcement trying to carry out their responsibilities and, as the dissent points out, hamstrings police in their ability to intervene in domestic violence situations where a spouse is sufficiently in fear to have summoned police in the first instance."

The Supreme Court's lineup showed Roberts "is a very solid law and order vote," with Kennedy "in the position of swing vote," said Goldstein.

"I don't think [Roberts'] position was a surprise," said Pamela S. Karlan, a professor and associate dean at Stanford Law School who worked on Randolph's Supreme Court brief, along with Atlanta attorney Donald F. Samuel of Garland, Samuel & Loeb. She added the appointment of Roberts likely did not change the outcome, given that former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was "not generally solicitous" of Fourth Amendment claims.

Samuel A. Alito Jr., did not participate in the decision; he did not take the bench until after the court heard arguments in November.

Death Penalty Sought In Guard's Killing (BSUN)

By Greg Garland

The Baltimore Sun, March 23, 2006

Washington County's top prosecutor said Wednesday that he will seek the death penalty for a prison inmate who is accused of killing a correctional officer at a Hagerstown hospital.

State's Attorney Charles P. Strong Jr. filed notice in Circuit Court that he will seek to have the inmate, Brandon Morris, put to death for the killing of Jeffery A. Wroten.

The death penalty applies because Morris, 20, "committed the murder in furtherance of an escape" and because of other aggravating circumstances, the prosecutor wrote.

Strong said he spoke with Wroten's family before making the decision because he wanted to make sure they understood that death penalty cases are often long, involved and intense.

"If successful at the trial level, these cases can involve many, many years of appeals and other challenges," Strong said. He said his decision "is consistent with the evidence and with the support of the family."

Morris, of Baltimore, is accused of shooting Wroten in the face at Washington County Hospital on Jan. 26 as the officer lay on the floor, pleading for his life. The 44-year-old Wroten, who worked at Roxbury Correctional Institution, died the next day.

Morris was being treated at the hospital for what authorities have said they believe was a self-inflicted injury -- a sewing needle jammed into his abdomen. Wroten had been assigned to guard him.

Attorney Michael R. Morrissette, the public defender who represents Morris, declined to comment Wednesday on Strong's decision. "The Office of the Public Defender would prefer to do its talking in the courtroom," he said.

In Maryland, both sides in a death penalty case have an automatic right to have a case tried in a different venue from where the crime occurred -- a right the defense is expected to exercise in the high-profile Morris case.

According to court papers Strong filed this week, authorities have not been able to determine how Morris got free of his restraints, enabling him to knock Wroten to the floor and take his weapon from him.

Under state prison policies, inmates under guard are supposed to be shackled to hospital beds. However, restraints are sometimes removed for an inmate to use the bathroom or when a doctor orders removal for medical reasons.

A nurse responding to the noise of the scuffle arrived to find Morris crouched on top of Wroten, and saw the inmate fire the gun in Wroten's face at close range, according to court papers.

Authorities have said Morris fled the hospital in a taxi he allegedly commandeered at gunpoint. He was captured less than an hour later.

Antiques Obtained Through A Bribery Are Put On Block (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

A defense contractor seeking to bribe California Congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham shelled out $12,000 in November 2001 for a cache of antiques, including four armoires, a leaded-glass cabinet and a massive buffet, all of which were delivered to Mr. Cunningham's home.

Today, those items and dozens more of Mr. Cunningham's ill-gotten furnishings will be up for grabs when some of the scandal's spoils hit the auction block.

The auction, handled by the Treasury Department, is part of the government's criminal proceedings against Mr. Cunningham, a Republican from San Diego, who was sentenced this month to eight years in prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in cars, homes, furnishings and other bribes in exchange for steering Pentagon contracts to two defense contractors. As part of the plea deal, Mr. Cunningham forfeited many items he received from several "co-conspirators," who government officials say lavished money and gifts on the former congressman.

Today, Mr. Cunningham's collection of antique furniture and Oriental rugs is in a warehouse south of Compton, Calif., where they will be auctioned today. The sale includes three antique commodes, including two from the 1800s, two silver candelabras and oak hutches, one with multicolored glass doors adorned with carved lion heads and brass rings. Also on the block are eight Oriental rugs, along with three antique oak doors with multicolored glass panels. Buyers can bid for Mr. Cunningham's bed, a cherry-wood Stickley sleigh bed that prosecutors say was bought, along with a brown leather sofa, for $6,632.

Auction officials won't disclose what they expect Mr. Cunningham's items to fetch; any money raised will go to the U.S. Treasury Asset forfeiture fund. "People pay top dollar to dealers and unfortunately a lot of the stuff doesn't have as strong a resale value," says Victor Wiener, an independent appraiser with Wiener Wolf Associates in New York. On top of that, Mr. Wiener says, Mr. Cunningham's items aren't that impressive.

"If one is taking payment of objects in lieu of cash you better be sure you're getting a real bargain as opposed to paying too much," he says. Given what Mr. Cunningham received, Mr. Wiener says, "I would have taken the cash."

Poetic Justice: These Bribes Are Going, Going, Gone (WP)

By William Booth

RANCHO DOMINGUEZ, Calif. -- Behold! The disgraced congressman's silver-plated, five-light candelabrum with matching "bobbishes" (that would be Lot No. 61) out on the auction block in this cavernous and cold warehouse east of the Port of Los Angeles.

See! His most intimate household items set out for crass inspection and actual touching by the viewing public, like some kind of garage sale of infamy -- the 1920s lingerie cabinet with the scratched drawers, the 19th-century Louis-Phillipe commode with the cracked (but professionally restored) black marble top, the red-and-blue wool Oriental rug . . . with a stain in the center. The stuff is all just there, plop, sharing space with other criminally gotten gains, seized from or forfeited by his fellow felons, the cigarette smugglers, software pirates, credit card frauds and drug traffickers.

Is it sad or is it justly delicious? For today all will be sold to the highest bidder -- the physical evidence of the corruption incarnate that earlier this month sent former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- the eight-term, 64-year-old, blustery conservative Republican lawmaker -- from the better suburbs of San Diego to eight years and four months in federal prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

Alas, the "Duke-Stir" (as his boat-bribe at the Capital Yacht Club was named) will blubber for mercy while on camera no more -- or at least not for seven years and a month (the 85 percent federal minimum for time to be served). History will judge the man and his crimes. On Tuesday, Jean Marc Garcell was judging Cunningham's taste in carpets.

"I've got my eye on Number 63," Garcell says, planning to return Thursday to wave his paddle and bid. He is coy about how much he thinks the red, blue and ivory rug will fetch, because the commercial pilot doesn't want to tip his hand, but he concedes it may garner $10,000 or more. "It's Iranian, 200 knots, and," Garcell lowers his voice, "handmade. And that's huuuuge."

Question: Does notoriety increase the value of an antique? Meaning, is a greater price placed upon a leaded glass Tiffany-style lamp because it was once owned by a congressman who got defense contractors to pay for his daughter's graduation party and actually jotted down a "bribe menu" on his own House of Representatives stationery ($18 million in government defense contracts in exchange for $50,000, for example) -- a crime that prosecutors described in their sentencing filing as a "malversation . . . unprecedented in the long history of Congress" (wow) -- or does it make the stuff worth less, because it's creepy?

"It is possible some would be interested in the items for their, mmm, historical interest," says Angie Ortanez, a criminal investigator and press officer with the Internal Revenue Service, which along with the FBI ran Cunningham to ground and will split the proceeds of the seized-property auction.

Potential buyer Garcell is not moved one way or the other by the previous owner. "But yes, to some of my good Democratic friends, I'll tell them," he says. A kind of party favor.

"A wild card." That's how Britney Sheehan of EG&G Technical Services, which runs the auction, describes the provenance issue regarding the Duke loot. Sheehan cannot reveal what the minimum bids must be for any item, nor what she and her appraisers think the stuff is worth, because such information may smack of inside trading, collusion and bid-rigging (and there's been quite enough of that, thank you very much).

The Cunninghamanalia (Lots 61 through 95) is against one warehouse wall, but his criminal proceeds are surrounded by a crazy quilt of other goods nabbed at the ports by Customs or seized by other federal law-enforcement agents. So there are black lace bras beside engine blocks. A wood carving of the Last Supper. A box of plastic pretzels. Cases of single-malt scotch. Lots of flip-flops. Baggies filled with cultured black pearls from Tahiti. Cartons of off-brand cigarettes (Bronco Ultra Lights). And a silver Ferrari.

Drug dealer, huh?

"Actually, a software pirate," Sheehan says.

The Cunningham Collection includes a dozen Oriental or Persian carpets (some machine-made), a few knickknacks and the furniture, which includes armoires and nightstands as well as the aforementioned lingerie cabinet (like a wardrobe, with drawers inside) and the French commode (commode not being a toilet or chamber pot, but a style of chest of drawers that sits on low legs).

How to put this?

The congressman's tastes were eclectic and a little ostentatious. The man drove a Rolls (a bribe). His furnishings have a similar plea for attention: They shout "antique," even when they are reproductions.

A former Navy fighter pilot he may have been (he named one of his bribe-laundering companies Top Gun Enterprises); his personal style veered toward large, dark, wood Frenchy pieces, with lots of marble and mirror and stained glass, and a certain amount of decorative flourish. In a previous Washington Post article, the reporters described Cunningham's taste as "surprisingly delicate." We might amend that as "surprisingly fussy."

"I'd call it ornate," Sheehan says.

We stood to admire his 32-foot-long Oriental runner. Thirty-two feet is one long runner. "And you don't see any of the creases that would indicate it was used on a stairway," Sheehan says. So we're talking long hallways. (Was the man was just begging to be caught?) Also, a hodgepodge of periods are represented. "You've got your French provincial and art deco and modern and some things that look like Americana," Sheehan says. Naturally, you'd have to see it all together at his mansion (bought with bribe money) down in Rancho Santa Fe to see if the artwork and throw pillows brought it all together.

Among those inspecting Cunningham's forfeitures were several citizens who were not aware that they once belonged to a former congressman, and when reminded about the scandal, still it didn't ring a bell.

Janice Sherwood was accompanying her husband, who "loves government seizures," and she said the Cunningham collection made her mad ("the country's at war") but did not completely surprise, along the lines of "they're all crooks." Would she like to bid? Nope, not her style. "I like brighter colors, lighter woods," Sherwood says.

Officers' Site Sinks Into Outlet For Attacks (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

What's up with the cop in Silver Spring who's ratting out colleagues? That was the question raised by a police officer who started a thread on the online message board of the Montgomery County police union on July 15, 2004.

Within minutes, a flurry of responses began pouring in to the site, one of many online forums that have changed the way police gripe and gossip.

They called the African American officer in question a "rat," a racist and a lazy cop who needed to "be put in her place." Then her husband -- the department's former diversity training teacher, who was brought in after the agency came under scrutiny over allegations of racial profiling -- was dragged into the online onslaught.

"Let him jump out and scream profiling at me on a traffic stop," a writer identified only as "Irish Cop 4 Life" wrote. "The only profile he's going to see is mine driving him into the pavement by his racist skull!!!"

The message board was designed as a forum where officers could trade tips, complaints and light banter. But several officers say it has become an outlet for personal attacks -- often laced with racist language, sexual harassment and disparaging remarks about police supervisors, county leaders, immigrants and residents.

Copies of the messages from the password-protected Web site provided to The Post provide a rare glimpse of some officers talking among themselves. The authenticity of the messages, posted from 2004 to this year, was verified by officers with access to the site.

The officer attacked in July 2004 was Cpl. Sonia Pruitt, identified on the site not only by her name but also her professional particulars: badge No. 1134, Silver Spring station, central business district. She said the attack stemmed from a misunderstanding of an innocuous episode involving an officer she believed did not follow proper procedure during an arrest.

The threat about her husband would have been jarring in any context, Pruitt said. But coming from one of her colleagues -- only Montgomery County police officers have access to the forum -- it was downright bloodcurdling.

"Who's to say a guy with a gun wouldn't hurt my husband on a traffic stop?" she asked.

Officers concerned about what they describe as a spate of increasingly odious exchanges say union leaders and police supervisors have largely ignored their complaints. The union president said the site is deliberately uncensored, but he said he discourages its use as an outlet for personal attacks, harassment and racist language.

Police Chief J. Thomas Manger said he has known for some time that some officers were unhappy with the message boards, but he said he was unaware of the nature of the offensive threads until a reporter read him a sample.

"I'm very disappointed to know that we have a handful of employees that would write some of the things that are written in this forum," Manger said. "I know it does not reflect 99 percent of our employees. I will not tolerate any unlawful or improper conduct by any police department employee in the course of their duties."

Five officers interviewed for this story said they think the uncivil messages are the work of a loud minority and do not reflect the values of most officers. But they say the messages offer a disturbing look into the minds of some of their colleagues, and they say they worry that the postings might influence rookies.

"If you treat your brothers and sisters like this," said Detective Terry Ridgley, president of the department's black officers association, "how can we expect you to treat members of the community with respect?"

The county's immigrants, a segment of the population whose trust the police department has worked hard to gain, have frequently been the target of offensive messages.

A January thread that started with a message about a sign at a district station turned into a rant about the county's changing demographics. One officer identified only as "4D" -- the Wheaton district station -- wrote: "Half of the district NO HABLA!!!! COMPRENDE??" Another poster using the pseudonym "SE HABLA AWE SCREW IT, HANDS UP PACO" responded later in the thread, which had "lg'nant" as a subject line: "HALF, TRY 90 PERCENT . . . BEANERS GO HOME."

A February thread started by an officer looking for "a good painter that would be cheap" led to messages about the Minutemen, an anti-illegal immigration group that recently started scouting day laborer sites in the county.

"Casa de Maryland should be done away with, as should any safehaven for illegals," one writer, identified only as "." offered, referring to a group that assists immigrants in the county. "In 20 years you'll have 150 channels of Telemundo, and you'll be paying for English-language channels -- and you'll be at the day laborer center, waiting for a pick-up."

Another poster, who said he was a Hispanic officer, shot back: "This is the trash I have to deal [with] in this department everyday and it's getting really old. Cut it off. Next time when you call a signal 13" -- code for an officer in distress -- "or help for translation look around and see who's backing you up. Be safe."

Non-Hispanic immigrants have also been trounced on the site. In August 2004, officers criticized a group of African immigrants who protested after a Montgomery officer fatally shot Peter Ayompeuh Njang, 25, a Cameroonian immigrant, on Aug. 12 in Silver Spring.

"What I'd like to know is how many of the protesters are illegals, and how many will be arriving to the demonstration in unregistered, uninsured vehicles with someone else's credit card," one officer identified as "Status Quo" wrote.

Race and demographics are not the only volatile subjects on the boards. There have been sexually explicit postings. One depicted a fictional incident involving a female police commander in SWAT gear demanding sex from a female job applicant. Another posted under the name of a sergeant described how he masturbated while driving.

Message boards frequented by law enforcement officials have proliferated rapidly in recent years, said Chip DeBlock, a detective with the Tampa Police Department who started http://www.leoaffairs.com , a site that hosts more than 150 message boards for law enforcement communities, which he said gets more than 4 million hits per month.

DeBlock said the forums allow officers from different states to swap tips, discuss procedures and speak frankly to management -- frequently emboldened by anonymity.

Keeping the exchanges civil on the leoaffairs.com boards has required the help of 150 volunteer moderators.

In recent years, officers in Baltimore, New York and Detroit have been fired or suspended for running Web sites with online message boards that got out of hand, according to news accounts of those cases. In 2002, 24 District police officers were suspended after an investigation into the use of squad car computers to send offensive or threatening e-mail.

Montgomery officers say the union has declined to require posters to identity themselves on the message boards, a simple step they say would tame the content.

Walter Bader, president of the county's Fraternal Order of Police lodge, said some of the egregious messages could be the work of nonunion members who may have hacked into the site to undermine the union.

"We don't censor it, we don't actively monitor it," Bader said. "It's free speech, it's 2006, it's technology. I don't agree with some of what I see on there. I don't think people should slander each other. But we're in a free country. We should embrace free speech."

Montgomery officers say the command staff has known about the forum for several months but has not publicly denounced the destructive content. Although the department has no oversight over the board, officers said, commanders could easily restrict access to it from work computers.

"I'm ashamed of my department if they allow this to go on," said Eric Mason, a detective with the department's major crimes unit.

DeLay Attorney Wants Court's Decision Quickly (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

DOJ_NMG_0020180

Rep. Tom DeLay's lawyer had one primary wish Wednesday when he went before a Texas appeals court deliberating whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against his client: Whatever you decide, do it soon.

"It is important to us to get this over with as quickly as possible," Dick DeGuerin, the attorney, said in an interview. He represents the former House majority leader in a case alleging that DeLay raised corporate money and funneled it illegally to Republican state legislative candidates in 2002.

Wednesday's arguments focused on a narrow legal point: whether the conspiracy statute applied to state election law in 2002, when DeLay and political consultants close to him worked to help Republicans take control of the state House. DeLay has said he has done nothing wrong.

Judge Pat Priest ruled last fall that the conspiracy law didn't apply until 2003 after the Legislature acted to clarify the statute. He dismissed the conspiracy charge and let stand related money-laundering charges. Prosecutors argued Wednesday that the conspiracy law had always been applicable and that the Legislature acted only to make that clearer.

A ruling isn't likely before next month. If the prosecutors lose, they could appeal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the state's highest court for criminal cases, further delaying final disposition of the indictment.

DeGuerin said he hopes for a summer trial that will clear the issue away before DeLay faces the voters. Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, he contended, wants "to stall long enough to have him under indictment in November." Earle, a Democrat, has denied he has partisan motives.

The damage from the indictment is already significant. DeLay gave up his House leadership post in January and endured a challenge in his own party's primary election this month.

The legal proceedings are a reminder of the minefield that DeLay faces until Election Day, the make-or-break moment in his 28-year life in politics.

There's not only the money-laundering case brought by Earle. Perhaps more serious for DeLay is a spreading corruption investigation of Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whom DeLay once described as "one of my closest and dearest friends."

That investigation has brought a guilty plea from Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay press secretary, who is cooperating with prosecutors as they pursue other indictments.

Whether that evidence leads to direct charges against DeLay may not be known for months. That uncertainty complicates his re-election campaign, says Earl Black, a political scientist at Rice University in Houston.

"It's going to be an ongoing up-and-down situation for as far ahead as the eye can see," Black says. "None of it is good for DeLay."

"No one knows when this is going to end," says Richard Cullen, the lawyer representing DeLay in the Abramoff matter. "DeLay is confident that when it ends, the prosecutors will conclude that he's done nothing wrong."

The redrawn map of Texas congressional districts that DeLay engineered in 2003 has added to his own jeopardy even as it is helping his Republican colleagues in the House of Representatives. His suburban Houston district remains distinctly Republican, although less so than before the remapping. The change has been magnified by a migration of Asians, blacks and Hispanics into the district.

A CNN/USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in DeLay's district in December found signs of trouble. Among registered voters, 36% said they would vote for DeLay, 49% for an unspecified Democrat.

Fifty-two percent said they had an unfavorable view of their congressman. Asked about the legal charges against him, 55% said they are "definitely" or "probably" true.

For DeLay's Democratic opponent in November, former representative Nick Lampson, the race is as much payback as comeback. Lampson of Beaumont lost his old seat as a result of DeLay's new map.

The race has gained national interest, and both sides will draw financial support from outside Texas, possibly eclipsing the $10 million record for spending in a House race set in California in 2000.

"It will be a slugfest," Black says, and "a referendum on DeLay."

DeLay wasn't anywhere near the Austin courtroom Wednesday. He was in his district, campaigning.

Lawyer For DeLay Urges Ruling Soon (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

AUSTIN, March 22 -- The arguments before the state 3rd Court of Appeals on Wednesday were about whether a felony charge of conspiracy to violate the Texas Election Code should be reinstated against former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). But the underlying issue was politics.

In a thinly veiled reference to DeLay's bid for reelection this year while under indictment on state money-laundering and conspiracy charges, the congressman's attorney asked the three-judge panel to rule quickly.

"Justice delayed is justice denied in this case," Houston lawyer Dick DeGuerin said in his opening remarks. "I ask you treat this case with dispatch and render decision forthwith."

DeGuerin later told reporters the criminal case against DeLay has clearly affected not only his reign as majority leader but also his quest to win a 12th term to Congress this year. DeLay was forced to step down from his leadership post upon being indicted in September on charges stemming from the 2002 election cycle.

With a trial looming sometime in 2006, Republicans permanently replaced DeLay last month by electing Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio as majority leader.

Earlier this month, DeLay faced an unusually large field of opponents in the Republican primary in his suburban Houston district. Although he handily won the four-way race, he faces a much tougher general election. He did not attend Wednesday's hearing but spent the day in his district.

"He's going to have an extremely well-funded opponent in November," DeGuerin said, predicting a large infusion of money into the campaign of DeLay's Democratic opponent, former representative Nick Lampson.

"I think we're going to see the outside money come into this race. It will make 2002 and 2003 pale by comparison," DeGuerin said. "The November elections are coming up. That's very important."

The case before the 3rd Court of Appeals was brought by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who is attempting to reinstate against DeLay a felony charge of conspiracy to violate the state election code. The charge was dismissed in December by Senior District Court Judge Pat Priest, who concluded the election-code allegation was not covered by Texas's conspiracy law until 2003, a year after Earle said the violation occurred.

Priest left standing charges of money laundering. Both indictments stem from allegations that DeLay and two political associates funneled $190,000 in illegal corporate donations to Republican candidates for the Texas House of Representatives in 2002. Those contributions helped Republicans gain control of the state legislature. In 2003, at DeLay's behest, the legislature approved a congressional redistricting plan that sent more Republicans from Texas to Congress in the 2004 election.

The arguments Wednesday, presented by Assistant District Attorney Rick Reed and rebutted by DeGuerin, focused on technical legal questions -- an exchange that DeGuerin joked afterward was as exciting as "watching paint dry."

Addressing reporters, Earle said he believes both sides had had an opportunity to more fully explain their positions. "I will say that to violate the election laws of Texas is a crime . . . and we will await the court's decision," he said.

It was unclear when the appeals court will rule. Priest is awaiting resolution of the appeal until proceeding with DeLay's trial on the money-laundering charge. Also before the trial starts, Priest will have to decide several motions by DeLay's lawyer, including a request to move the trial to DeLay's home town of Sugar Land.

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charges Reinstated (AP-Y2)

By April Castro

AP2, March 22, 2006

Prosecutors argued before a Texas appeals court Wednesday that some of the criminal charges against Rep. Tom Delay (news, bio, voting record) should be reinstated.

A lower court judge dismissed a conspiracy charge against DeLay in December, agreeing with defense arguments that a conspiracy law did not cover election code violations when the alleged offense was committed.

But prosecutors said Wednesday that Texas' prohibition on using corporate money in political campaigns is a felony and should be subject to the state's criminal conspiracy law.

The three-judge panel of the Texas 3rd Court of Appeals was not expected to rule for at least a month.

DeLay, who is trying to win re-election to Congress while under indictment, did not attend the hearing, where attorneys mostly focused on technical legal questions.

He spent the day campaigning in what many consider his most serious election challenge since voters sent him to Congress in 1984. The Republican faces Democratic former Rep. Nick Lampson in November.

"I let the lawyers worry about that stuff," he said while entering a country club to deliver a five-minute speech to the Rotary Club of Sugar Land. "I'm here focused on my district and focused on the election."

DeLay is accused of funneling illegal corporate donations to Republican candidates for the Texas House. The Republicans went on to win control of the Legislature in 2002 and pushed through a DeLay-engineered redistricting plan that helped Texas send more Republicans to Congress in 2004.

Because of the dispute, no trial date has been set.

DeLay Campaigns As Lawyers Battle (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

DALLAS -- U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay campaigned in his southwest Houston area district yesterday while his attorneys battled for him before an Austin appeals court.

"I let the lawyers worry about that stuff," he said to reporters as he entered a Sugar Land Rotary Club meeting, where he made a brief campaign speech.

Meanwhile in Austin, Dick DeGuerin, Mr. DeLay's lead attorney, argued that two state conspiracy charges against his client should not be reinstated -- charges that were dropped by state District Judge Pat Priest several weeks ago.

Those charges were part of wide-ranging indictments surrounding Mr. DeLay's role in using corporate funds to help Republicans win control of the Texas Legislature in 2002 and then win several congressional races two years afterward.

Judge Priest ruled that one indictment dealing with purported election-code conspiracy was improper because the conspiracy part of the code was not operative at the time of the reputed infractions. The judge also dropped part of another conspiracy count, but left intact other money-laundering charges and one for conspiracy to launder money.

Mr. DeGuerin argued that contributions from corporations and other sources were kept in separate accounts and -- despite the fact that the exact amount of the $190,000 in question was sent to Washington, then back to Republican candidates in Texas -- the money was never intended to be a trade-off for support of the Texas candidates.

In a brief filed earlier, Mr. DeGuerin accused the state of appealing Judge Priest's decision "to avoid trial and the embarrassment of an acquittal in this politically motivated prosecution."

Mr. DeLay, attempting to win his House seat a 12th time in Texas' 22nd District, faces former congressman Nick Lampson, a well-financed Democrat, in November. He has campaigned harder in this election than ever before -- partly because of the uncertainty surrounding his legal problems.

"I'm focused on my district and focused on the election," he said, but added: "It's been almost 120 days that this frivolous appeal has been before the 3rd Circuit Court. I would hope that they would come to a speedy resolution on a matter that, I think, would take a first-year law student an hour to make a ruling on."

Much of the presentation yesterday dealt with technicalities of the state election code. The state's offering yesterday was handled by Travis County Assistant District Attorney Richard Reed.

The appeals court is expected to make a decision within a month.

Judge Priest has left Mr. DeLay's trial date in limbo until this appeal process has straightened out the eventual charges.

Dixon Sees Organized Effort To Discredit Her (BSUN)

By Doug Donovan

The Baltimore Sun, March 23, 2006

Baltimore City Council President Sheila Dixon broke her silence Wednesday over an investigation into her ties to two city contractors by saying the state probe is "trying to destroy my character."

Since state prosecutors began their investigation 10 days ago, Dixon and her staff had said only "no comment" but had pledged to cooperate with Maryland State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh's investigators.

But after the city's Board of Estimates met Wednesday, Dixon directly responded to reporters' questions.

"In my heart, I did nothing intentional in any of this," she said. "This has legs on it that's trying to destroy my character. I would never do anything to the citizens of Baltimore, as hard as I work."

A few minutes later, as she walked out of the meeting room in City Hall, she said, "My character is being discredited." Asked whether she thinks there is an organized effort to discredit her character, she said, "Yes, I do."

Dixon declined a request to elaborate on her comments shortly after the meeting.

Bobbie Walton, executive director of Common Cause Maryland, a public interest watchdog group, said she was disappointed with Dixon's comments.

"I wonder who she thinks is out to get her," Walton said. "It's hard to take responsibility for your own behavior sometimes. And it's much easier to think that 'they' are out to get you."

It might be difficult for public officials to abide by the rules that govern their positions, Walton said, but "you still have to do it."

City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler has confirmed that prosecutors have issued grand jury subpoenas for documents from six city agencies: the Board of Estimates, the City Council, the Office of Council Services, the Minority and Women's Business Opportunity Office, Mayor Martin O'Malley's Office of Minority Business Development and the mayor's Finance Department.

Officials with at least three companies that have done work for the city or have tried to win government contracts -- Comcast, Early Morning Software of Baltimore and Snell Enterprises of Columbia -- have confirmed that they have received subpoenas. A fourth company, Sysnet of America in Prince George's County, is scheduled to meet with prosecutors.

The first round of subpoenas, delivered at the start of last week, requested documents related to $600,000 of work awarded over the past six years -- most of the time without a contract -- to Dixon's former campaign chairman, Dale G. Clark, and his company, Ultimate Network Integration.

A second batch of subpoenas, delivered at the end of last week, requested documents relating to Union Technologies, a company that employs the council president's sister, Janice Dixon, and has received city work from two major government contractors; Comcast, the city's cable television provider; and TeleCommunications Systems Inc., which manages the city's computer network.

A TCS spokesman said the Annapolis company had not received a subpoena. The president of Utech has not returned phone calls. Its registered agent, attorney Claude Edward Hitchcock, has declined to comment.

Clark has said that he has not received a subpoena.

The investigations began after recent articles in The Sun detailed questions about city work awarded to Clark's company and Union Technologies.

Last month, The Sun reported that Dixon might have breached the city's ethics law by not disclosing her sister's employment and by participating in public hearings and votes over the past two years that involved and benefited Utech.

After The Sun's article about Dixon's connections to Utech, the city stripped the company of its official minority certification, which had qualified it to be hired by companies seeking to meet Baltimore's minority subcontracting goals.

Utech lost the certification because the business opportunity office found that its downtown office was nothing more than a telephone and a mailbox. The head of the office said he would review whether Utech performed work under its TCS contract with the city.

The Sun also reported that Clark's company, which has the same address as Union Technologies, signed a contract with Dixon in February 2000 to manage the council's computer system. The Board of Estimates, which Dixon chairs and O'Malley controls, approved the one-year deal a month later.

When the contract expired in March 2001, Clark did not obtain another one for five years while the city continued to make payments to him totaling $500,000. O'Malley's finance officials have not been able to determine why or how Clark was paid without a contract.

City procurement rules require that the Board of Estimates approve all contracts of more than $5,000.

Clark continued to get paid for the work after the city awarded a contract to another company in May 2005. He left the council president's office Feb. 28, just before The Sun published a report detailing the arrangement.

Dixon disciplined two staff members over the Clark matter, and her spokesman called the situation a "major oversight."

"She probably did the right thing to discipline her staff members," Walton said. "But you have to take responsibility for your own behavior too."

On Paper, Leaving A Gang Is Difficult (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Sandy Banks, Times Staff Writers

L.A. uses injunctions to fight thugs, but those who go straight find it's hard to get off the list.

After more than a decade of successfully using restrictive court injunctions to battle dangerous street gangs, some Los Angeles officials now fear that key provisions have unfairly held back young people struggling to go straight.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said Wednesday that though he wants to expand the use of a tool that has proved effective in the city's fight against an estimated 39,000 hoodlums, he and City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo have agreed to first conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the injunction program.

"We want to take a look at all of them, do a top-to-bottom review that will include making sure the appropriate people are [listed] in them, because some of these injunctions go back 13 years," Bratton said.

City Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents a district plagued by some of the worst gang violence in the city, said the injunction program appears to be doing harm as well as good.

Hahn said that after she and Bratton attended a recent community meeting in Watts, she became concerned because no one has ever succeeded in getting removed from an injunction's official list of restricted gang members.

Young people covered by injunctions can have trouble getting jobs because the injunctions show up in employment background checks. Some have trouble getting to work or even school because they cannot ride in cars or buses if other gang members are present.

And they may be disqualified from participating in school sports if former associates play in the same league.

Critics say the injunctions sometimes target people who were never in a gang but had relatives or friends who were.

Bratton "heard loud and clear from the community that there is a gray area of young people who had one foot in, but have really tried to turn their lives around, are going to school, have jobs and are looking for a second chance," Hahn said. "But the fact that their names are on the list makes it problematic to do that."

On Wednesday, Hahn sent a letter to Bratton, Delgadillo and Police Commission President John W. Mack, asking that they meet with her April 11 to discuss the evaluation.

Her call for changes in the injunctions was seen by some as ironic given that her brother, former Mayor and longtime City Atty. James K. Hahn, pioneered the use of gang injunctions.

The use of injunctions has made Los Angeles a model for anti-gang efforts. Mayors from across the country are coming to Los Angeles next week to hear about the program at a summit sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The injunctions typically identify gang members and prohibit them from associating in public or loitering in certain neighborhoods. And they allow for enhanced penalties for members who trespass, gamble, violate curfew, commit vandalism or break other laws.

Members may not possess weapons, spray-paint cans used in graffiti or open containers of alcohol.

They also are enjoined from being near anyone selling or possessing drugs, which may be difficult if drug dealers operate in front of their homes, civil rights attorneys say.

Community leaders, including Silvia Beltran of the gang-intervention program Homies Unidos, say there are many examples of people being improperly included in injunctions.

Beltran said she knows one young man who graduated from Cal State Los Angeles and was working on a master's degree at USC when he was charged with violating an old injunction.

The man won dismissal of the charge in criminal court, and might sue the city to get his name off the list.

"He denies that he was an active gang member," Beltran said. "But he grew up in the neighborhood, and it's easy to be included."

Over the years, about 2,000 to 3,000 people have been served with gang injunctions and therefore are subject to restrictions, said Assistant City Atty. Marty Vranicar. He said about 350 gang members have been prosecuted for violating injunctions, and many have been sent to jail.

If police suspect someone is a gang member not listed in the original injunction, the city can still serve them and add their name to a list kept by the LAPD's gang enforcement unit.

Mark Harvis, a deputy public defender who has handled many gang cases, said that part of the city's policy is fundamentally unfair because the person served with an injunction often does not know why he is being included. Harvis said there also is no process for appealing the inclusion.

Delgadillo firmly defended the current standard for getting out of a gang injunction, although he also said Wednesday that he is open to refining the program. "Gangs are an epidemic in the city of Los Angeles" Delgadillo said, adding that injunctions "do have an effect."

Bratton said he believes that gang injunctions are one reason violent crime is down 6.4% so far this year in Los Angeles.

The city has 26 civil gang injunctions covering 36 gangs, and more are imminent, said Contessa Mankiewicz, a spokeswoman for the city attorney.

Since the first injunction was obtained in 1993 against the Blythe Street gang in Van Nuys, gangs occupying more than 60 square miles of territory in the city of Los Angeles — 13% of its total area — have been made subject to civil injunctions.

In many injunctions, a number of gang members are identified by name in the court papers, but the injunction also includes dozens of "John Does" to be named later.

Once the permanent injunction is issued, officers can identify gang associates and include their names in a database that makes them subject to the injunction's restrictions.

Injunctions rely, at least in part, on the state's Cal/Gang database, a computerized list of people considered to be gang members based on criteria that include identification by informants, gang tattoos, style of dress, arrest record and associations.

That database has been criticized by law enforcement officials and civil rights activists for being outdated and overly broad.

"We found people in that database whose information came from 20-year-old [confidential] gang cards," said civil rights attorney Connie Rice. "Middle-class citizens who own homes, work, have children, haven't been involved in gangs for years and years and years…. The problem is, there's no exit ramp. You can get on, but you can't get off."

Civil rights attorney Carol Sobel, who has challenged a gang injunction in court, said it appears some people have been added to the database just because they were stopped and interviewed by the police for being near known gang members.

City officials say injunctions contain escape avenues for gang members who are no longer active.

Most are like the injunction against the Grape Street Crips, which allows those identified to ask to be excluded if they publicly renounce their gang membership and sign a sworn statement that they have not associated with other gang members for at least three years and not had run-ins with the law in that same period.

The alleged gang member must also have been employed or attended school and made consistent progress, both for at least 18 months before the renunciation.

Bratton acknowledged that if a former gang member lives in a housing project populated by gang members, he might find it impossible to escape being seen in their company.

The review will also look at the requirement for people to publicly renounce their gang membership, Bratton said, adding there may be an alternative.

"That is the biggest hurdle I have heard people talk about," Bratton said. "Is there a potential danger in doing that? That's an element of the review."

(INFOBOX BELOW)

At a glance

Q: How many gang members are in Los Angeles?

DOJ_NMG_0020186

A: About 39,000, according to the city attorney's office. Gang members commit about 7,000 crimes a year, including about 300 murders.

Q: How many gangs have been cited by injunctions?

A: Thirty-six gangs have been named in 26 injunctions.

Q: How do injunctions work?

A: If gang members are known to be causing trouble, the city can ask a judge to declare them a criminal street gang and a public nuisance. Much like restraining orders, the civil court rulings impose various restrictions. Violators can be fined $1,000 or jailed for up to six months.

Q: What conduct is typically prohibited?

A: Members must obey all laws and avoid using drugs and alcohol. They cannot publicly associate, block parking, intimidate people, carry illegal weapons or vandalism tools, loiter, act as lookouts or so-called "hooks," trespass, gamble, obstruct traffic, violate curfew or approach vehicles.

Dangerous Prosecution (WP)

THE UNITED STATES has never had an Official Secrets Act -- a law that would forbid anyone, even a private citizen, from disclosing information the government wants to keep under wraps. But if the Justice Department has its way in the prosecution of two former officials of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), it will effectively have created one -- without even going to Congress for a change in the law. The case against Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman is heading toward trial. Their conviction would herald a dangerous aggrandizement of the government's power not merely to prosecute leaks but to force ordinary Americans to keep its secrets.

Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman are accused of conspiring to give national defense information to people not authorized to receive it -- including officials of the Israeli government, a Post reporter and other officials at AIPAC. Despite the suggestive tenor of the indictment, prosecutors have not accused either man of spying. Rather, the government has charged them under an old and vaguely worded law that prohibits people in possession of such information from disclosing it further.

The reach of this law, which dates from the World War I era, has never been clear. By its terms, it would seem to require every person to protect the government's secrets -- a principle hardly in keeping with the American system of robust public debate. While it is reasonable for the government to demand that its employees and contractors protect the information it entrusts to them, it's not okay to criminalize discussions among people who do not work, directly or indirectly, for the government. Traditionally, the government has treaded carefully with this law, using it sparingly even against government employees.

The AIPAC case marks a dangerous break with that tradition. We do not defend the alleged actions of Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, whom AIPAC fired. According to the indictment, they received classified information from Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin and passed it to the Israeli Embassy. The indictment alleges similar behavior in the past. But the government isn't even trying to prove spying charges. Instead, prosecutors have proceeded under a legal theory that must alarm anyone who values open debate.

Under the government's reading of the law, there is no reason why newspaper reporters who publish classified information could not face charges. Nor, indeed, would anything protect activists who brought secrets to members of Congress. Under the government's theory, in fact, countless conversations and publications that take place every day are criminal acts. The government makes this point explicitly in its briefs: While acknowledging that a prosecution of "an actual member of the press for publishing classified information" would "raise legitimate and serious issues," it says that "[there] plainly is no exemption in the statutes for the press, let alone lobbyists like the defendants." You don't have to anticipate an immediate raft of prosecutions of such people to appreciate the danger of a precedent that would permit it.

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- A federal court on Wednesday approved a request from a hedge fund seeking an official voice for equity holders in Delphi Corp.'s (DPH) (DPHIQ) Chapter 11 case, departing from typical bankruptcy practice.

"Clearly this company has extremely difficult problems to resolve," and shareholders need a voice in that process, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain said.

Appaloosa Management L.P., one of Delphi's largest shareholders with about 9% of its stock, has asked the auto parts maker to move ahead with a canceled shareholder meeting and wanted the court to appoint an official committee to represent stockholders in the case. Another money management firm that holds about 5% of Delphi's equity supported the motion.

Over a two-day trial, experts and attorneys for Delphi and Appaloosa argued widely differing positions about the company's prospects for reducing labor and retiree costs and how its securities would perform upon emergence from bankruptcy.

"I respect (the judge's) determination," Delphi lawyer Jack Butler said. "The judge wanted to provide for limited equity representation in a very complex situation."

Appaloosa attorney Thomas Lauria said he was happy Delphi's shareholders have a voice and said it seemed likely Appaloosa would fight for a seat on the committee when the US Trustee names its members.

During the trial, Appaloosa said Delphi's financial situation isn't as dire as management makes it out to be and there will be money left over for existing stockholders after Delphi pays off its secured and unsecured creditors. An expert hired by the investment fund, headed by David Tepper, projects Delphi will have 2006 EBITDA of $100 million and an equity value of up to $6 billion, once it cuts labor and retiree costs through its reorganization.

Delphi, for its part, argued it is "hopelessly insolvent" - with $6 billion more in liabilities than assets - so an equity committee isn't warranted because its stock will be worthless. The company filed for Chapter 11 in October 2005. Its January monthly operating report filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan listed assets of $13.8 billion and liabilities of $20.2 billion.

Under the Bankruptcy Code, equity holders are last in line to receive a payout and can't receive any recovery unless all other creditors in the case are paid in full, so naming an official committee solely to represent equity is considered unusual. Official committees in Chapter 11 cases have their legal fees paid by the debtor company, so they regularly face opposition from creditors.

During the contentious hearing, Judge Drain said he wasn't pleased by some of Appaloosa's legal tactics, particularly efforts to suppress the testimony of two of Delphi's expert witnesses and complaints about not receiving company data to which Drain determined they weren't entitled. He said Appaloosa's conduct during the litigation gave him "very serious pause," over appointing an equity committee.

Delphi's Butler wouldn't comment on whether the company would oppose Appaloosa's appointment to the panel.

Appaloosa has said any equity panel would closely monitor the case and be involved in negotiations or litigation involving the relationship between Delphi and its former parent General Motors Corp. (GM) (GM).

Appaloosa accumulated its Delphi stake after the company filed for bankruptcy protection and began its push for an official shareholder panel in November. The U.S. Trustee's Office - an arm of the Justice Department that normally appoints committees in bankruptcy case - was considering an equity committee request from Appaloosa but hadn't yet made a decision when the firm asked the court for a committee. The U.S. Trustee objected to Appaloosa's motion, as did the company's unsecured creditors committee.

Judge Drain said the equity panel can't immediately hire investment bankers and accountants. Drain wants to limit costs and doesn't want arguments over valuation of the company until after it works out its union issues.

Shares of GM were higher earlier Wednesday, while Delphi stock was down substantially, after the announcement of a three-part deal among GM, Delphi and the United Auto Workers union that provides for early retirement buyouts for thousands of workers. The plan would offer 13,000 Delphi workers payouts of up to $35,000 each for retiring early, for which GM has agreed to cover the bill. The pact could save the companies billions in labor costs - after the up-front payouts to early retirees - through workforce reductions.

However, a broader labor agreement is still lacking at Delphi so a strike by union workers is still possible when Delphi seeks to have its labor agreements rejected through the bankruptcy case - which it says it will do by the end of the month without a new collective bargaining agreement in place.

A hearing on the partial labor deal is scheduled for April 7, according to an attorney.

Judge Scolds LAPD For Decree 'failure' (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- A federal judge scolded city officials for failing to meet key provisions of a 2001 court consent decree to reform the Police Department.

The decree was the result of a settlement with the Justice Department and was designed to correct conditions that led to police corruption scandals involving officers beating and framing suspects and stealing evidence.

U.S. District Judge Gary A. Feess said city officials were trying to "gut" a key provision and warned at a hearing Tuesday that he would likely extend the decree beyond its June 15 expiration date.

The judge chastised the LAPD for failing to implement a computer system required by the decree to serve as an early warning system by tracking officers' use of force, pursuits, collisions, citizen complaints and civil claims.

"There is no way the consent decree can expire given the failure," Feess said.

Gerald L. Chaleff, the LAPD's civilian manager of the consent decree, said at least 122 of 146 provisions for which the Police Department is solely responsible have been "substantially complied with."

Navy Rule On Prayer Ignites A Debate (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

A new Navy policy that encourages chaplains to use only "nonsectarian" language outside of divine services has prompted criticism that regulating prayer services violates the chaplains' First Amendment rights.

Under new rules signed by Secretary of the Navy Donald C. Winter, chaplains of all faiths in the Navy are asked to consider the views of their audience before invoking specific religious beliefs in prayer.

"I'm very disappointed with the secretary of the Navy," said Navy chaplain Lt. Gordon James Klingenschmitt. "He's doing the opposite of what President Bush wants."

Navy spokesman Lt. William Marks says Lt. Klingenschmitt has exaggerated the policy's reach.

"The only thing we ask is that chaplains be inclusive of the people in their audience," Lt. Marks said.

"We've never said they can't invoke Jesus in their prayers. You aren't going to get into trouble for that."

Lt. Klingenschmitt is urging Mr. Bush to sign an executive order to allow military chaplains to pray according to their individual faith tradition. He said that if the president decides not to sign such an order, he might sue the Navy.

The Navy policy appears to be similar to that of the Air Force, which reads, "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence may be appropriate for military ceremonies."

The rule change completes an evolution of the Navy's official policy toward religious language.

In 1998, former Chief of Navy Chaplains Byron Holderby submitted a "memo of suggestion" that chaplains who wish to use sectarian language withdraw from events such as evening prayer services aboard Navy ships.

On Feb. 21, Mr. Winter quietly signed the regulation making the suggestion official Navy policy.

DOJ_NMG_0020189

The complaint was sent to Senate Armed Services Committee members Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, and James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican. Lt. Klingenschmitt, a New York native, says Mrs. Clinton has already written a letter to the Navy on his behalf.

Reps. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, and Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, received copies of the complaint as well.

"We have been working on Chaplain Klingenschmitt's behalf since last May," Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt said. "The congressman is not satisfied so far with what the Navy has come back with."

Mr. Reynolds is the chaplain's congressman.

Mr. Jones, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, told The Washington Times this week that his office has been working with the office of panel Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, to try to rectify the situation.

"Mr. Hunter wants to help us with this issue," Mr. Jones said.

He also said aides are working on language, which he hopes Mr. Hunter will present to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in an effort to resolve the problem administratively.

Mr. Jones said he won't give up on the issue.

"We're talking about the First Amendment rights of all chaplains."

In summer 2004, an optional worship service performed by Lt. Klingenschmitt, described as a "Christian memorial service," on the USS Anzio reportedly offended a minority of those in attendance.

"There are 350 men on my ship. Fifty attended the service -- including wives and family, about 80 total," Lt. Klingenschmitt said.

After complaints from some in attendance, Lt. Klingenschmitt received a "poor fitness" mark on his permanent record which he is fighting to have removed.

"They did a survey of the ship afterwards, and 84 percent of the crew said they believe the chaplain cares for all denominations," Lt. Klingenschmitt said. "Even though some people complained, I figured I had an 84 percent approval rating."

Common Sense In Maryland (NYT)

Diebold, the electronic voting machine maker, suffered another sharp setback recently, when Maryland's House of Delegates voted 137-to-0 to drop its machines and switch to paper ballots. The vote came in the same week that Texas held elections marred by electronic voting troubles. Maryland's State Senate should join the House in voting to discontinue the use of the Diebold machines, and other states should follow Maryland's lead.

Maryland was one of the first states to embrace Diebold. But Maryland voters and elected officials have grown increasingly disenchanted as evidence has mounted that the machines cannot be trusted. In 2004, security experts from RABA Technologies told the state legislature that they had been able to hack into the machines in a way that would make it possible to steal an election. Senator Barbara Mikulski, a Democrat, informed the State Board of Elections in 2004 that voters had complained to her that machines had mysteriously omitted the Senate race.

The Maryland House's bill calls for replacing the Diebold machines with optical scanning machines for this fall's elections. Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr., once a Diebold supporter, has said he'll sign the bill if the State Senate agrees. Optical scanning machines would be a vast improvement. Voters using them fill out paper ballots, which are scanned electronically. Those ballots are a permanent record that can (and should) be used to double-check the machine results. Although time is short, Maryland should be able to get optical scanning machines operating by the fall. Even though the Board of Elections has been resisting the proposal, that should not stop the General Assembly and the governor from fighting for machines that voters will trust.

The Maryland House voted days after Texas held an election with the sort of disturbing electronic voting glitches that have by now become common. In Tarrant County, as many as 100,000 extra votes appeared on the machines — election officials insisted that they knew which ones to eliminate to make the results correct. In a hotly contested Congressional race in another part of the state, results were delayed by programming errors in the machines used in two crucial counties.

Many states have passed laws requiring paper records for electronic voting. What is happening in Maryland is important, because not a single member of the House stood behind the once popular Diebold machines. It is just the latest indication that common sense is starting to prevail in the battle over electronic voting.

ANTITRUST:

3 To Plead Guilty In Samsung Price-Fixing Case (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

SAN FRANCISCO, March 22 — Three executives of Samsung, the largest supplier of computer memory for consumer electronics, have agreed to plead guilty and serve prison sentences in the United States for their roles in a price-fixing conspiracy, federal prosecutors said on Wednesday.

The plea agreements are the latest development in the Justice Department's three-and-a-half-year investigation of the volatile market for dynamic random access memory chips, the most common type of computer memory products, used in personal computers, printers and electronic devices like cellphones and digital cameras.

Samsung of South Korea, along with its rivals — Infineon Technologies of Germany, Elpida of Japan and Hynix Semiconductor of South Korea — were accused of conspiring to fix DRAM prices from April 1999 to June 2002.

The Samsung executives are the third group of individuals to agree to prison terms; their sentences are similar to those of four Hynix executives announced this month.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM Sales, agreed to serve eight months; Yeongho Kang, associate director, DRAM marketing in Samsung's United States subsidiary, will serve seven months; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's subsidiary in Germany, agreed to serve seven months. Like the Hynix executives, each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 fine.

In November 2005, Samsung agreed to a $300 million fine related to the investigation. With the latest settlement, 4 companies and 12 individuals have been charged, with fines totaling more than $731 million.

The latest developments illustrate the growing emphasis the Justice Department is placing on prison sentences as a deterrent in antitrust cases.

"These pleas should send a clear message," the attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, said in a statement, "that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The Justice Department had named six American companies that were harmed by the price fixing, all of them large customers of DRAM chips: Dell, Compaq Computer, Hewlett-Packard, Apple Computer, I.B.M. and Gateway.

Hynix, the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, agreed to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005. In October 2004, Infineon agreed to a $160 million fine. In January, Elpida agreed to a fine of $84 million.

In December 2004, four Infineon executives pleaded guilty to price fixing and served jail terms ranging from four to six months. Each executive also paid a $250,000 fine.

Three Executives From Samsung To Serve Jail Time (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three Samsung Electronics Co. executives pleaded guilty and agreed to jail time over their role in an international conspiracy to fix prices for dynamic-random-access-memory components, the U.S. Department of Justice said.

The Justice Department said it has charged four companies and 12 individuals so far in its investigation, which has led to fines totaling more than $731 million.

DOJ_NMG_0020191

Samsung Electronics, of South Korea, is the world's largest maker of DRAM components and has previously pleaded guilty and agreed to $300 million in fines in the price-fixing conspiracy.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

Each Samsung executive also has agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and to cooperate in the antitrust division's investigation of the DRAM industry.

According to a one-count felony charge filed in federal court in San Francisco, at various times from April 1, 1999, to June 15, 2002, the three Samsung employees conspired with employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAMs sold to certain computer and server manufacturers in the U.S.

The Justice Department said the conspiracy directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc.

In addition to Samsung, other companies charged with price-fixing in the DRAM investigation include South Korea's Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Japanese manufacturer Elpida Memory Inc. and Germany's Infineon Technologies AG.

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Three executives from South Korea's Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. agreed to plead guilty and serve jail time for participating in a conspiracy to fix the price of computer memory chips, the U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday.

Each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 (â‚¬207,142) fine, cooperate with federal authorities on the investigation and serve prison sentences ranging from seven to eight months for their role in a scheme to raise prices for dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. A federal judge in San Francisco must approve the deal.

"These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement.

So far, the long-running Justice Department investigation has resulted to more than $731 million (â‚¬606 million) in fines and charges against 12 individuals and four companies, including, Samsung, Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

The Korean Samsung executives who agreed to the guilty pleas are Sun Woo Lee, senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for the company's German subsidiary.

Samsung, the world's largest maker of DRAM chips, said in a statement Wednesday that the company was "strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Prosecutors say the global conspiracy drove up the price of DRAM chips, which are the most commonly used product for storing and retrieving information in computers and electronic devices.

Companies such as Dell Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc. had to raise PC prices or reduce the amount of memory installed on their systems to compensate for the higher costs.

Three Samsung Executives To Admit Price-Fixing Roles (Update3) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- Three executives of Samsung Electronics Co., which was fined $300 million for fixing the price of electronic chips used in cellular phones and computers, agreed to serve prison time for their roles in the global conspiracy, the U.S. Justice Department said.

The executives of South Korea-based Samsung, the world's largest maker of memory chips, will plead guilty to participating in a scheme that included four other makers of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips, said the department in Washington.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of sales for DRAM chips, agreed to serve an eight-month prison term, and the other two will serve seven months, the government said. Each executive also agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and cooperate with the investigation.

``True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement.

The investigation has resulted in the convictions of two other companies besides Samsung and an agreement by a third to plead guilty, the Justice Department said. So far, the investigation has netted $731 million in criminal fines.

In all, 12 individuals have been charged. A fifth company, Micron Technology Inc., wasn't prosecuted for its participation in the cartel in return for alerting prosecutors to the scheme.

Leading Victims

The government said leading victims of the conspiracy include computer makers such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Compaq Computer Corp., now owned by Hewlett- Packard.

U.S. sales of DRAM chips totaled $7.7 billion, the Justice Department said. The chips are also used to make digital music players, video game consoles, printers and telecommunications equipment.

All three Samsung executives agreed to plead guilty to price fixing, the Justice Department said. The charges filed against them in federal court in San Francisco say the defendants attended meetings with competitors to discuss setting prices for DRAM chips. They also exchanged sales information to help the participating companies monitor compliance with the cartel agreements, court documents said.

The two executives who agreed to serve seven-month prison terms are Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. unit, and Young Woo Lee, its sales director in Europe.

Active Investigation

``These are the first executives of Samsung to plead guilty to fixing prices in what is still an active investigation," Thomas O. Barnett, the Justice Department's antitrust chief, said in a statement. ``We will continue our efforts to bring to justice other domestic and foreign-based executives who were involved with fixing DRAM prices."

On March 15, four executives of Hynix Semiconductor Inc., which was fined $185 million, were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to eight months and fined $250,000 each.

Four executives of Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, which was fined $160 million, pleaded guilty in December 2004 and served prison terms of four to six months.

Alfred Censullo, a regional sales manager for Micron, pleaded guilty to obstructing the government's investigation and was sentenced to six months of home detention.

Another DRAM chipmaker, Japan-based Elpida Memory Inc., agreed in January to plead guilty to participating in the conspiracy and pay an $84 million fine.

In a statement, Samsung's U.S. unit, Samsung Semiconductor Inc., said the company ``is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior."

Samsung Execs To Serve Jail Time In Chip Price-fixing (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 23, 2006

Three Samsung Electronics executives will serve up to eight months in jail for their roles in a worldwide memory chip price-fixing conspiracy, the U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday.

The executives agreed to plead guilty to taking part in a scam to manipulate prices on dynamic random access memory chips, or DRAM, sold to computer makers such as Hewlett-Packard, IBM and Apple from 1999 to 2002.

The Korean manufacturer had earlier agreed to plead guilty to federal charges and pay a $300 million fine, the second largest criminal antitrust penalty in U.S. history.

DOJ_NMG_0020193

Sentenced to 7 months in prison were Yeongho Kang, associate director for DRAM marketing, for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales, will serve 8 months.

Each executive will also pay $250,000 fine and agreed to cooperate with the Justice Department's antitrust division in its ongoing probe of the DRAM industry.

In a statement, Samsung said the company is "strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior."

"True deterrence cocurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fees," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

According to the Justice Department, the Samsung executives took part in meetings and agreements to sell DRAM chips "at certain levels" to manufacturers.

DRAM chips are used in personal computers, laptops, workstations, servers, digital cameras and mobile phones.

The pleas and sentences must still be approved by the U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

The DRAM price-fixing case has led to charges filed against four companies, including Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Infineon, and fines up more than $731 million.

The investigation, which was led by the San Francisco office of the Justice Department's antitrust division, has also led to charges filed against 12 individuals, including the Samsung executives, the Justice Department said.

Samsung Executives Plead Guilty To Chip Price-fixing (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, March 23, 2006

Three more caught in U.S. chip price-fixing probe

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Three Samsung Electronics executives pleaded guilty to fixing the price of microchips, becoming the latest individuals to be caught in a U.S. probe, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

The announcement regarding South Korea's Samsung (SSNGY: news) brings the total number of charges in the government's ongoing investigation into price-fixing and microchips to four companies and 12 individuals.

The three executives will serve jail time in the U.S. for their roles in a global conspiracy to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips between April 1999 and June 2002. They'll also each pay a $250,000 fine.

On March 1, the Justice Department said four executives at Korea-based Hynix Semiconductor Inc. (HXSCF: news) pleaded guilty and agreed to jail time for their roles in the conspiracy.

The government has collected more than $731 million in fines related to the probe.

The individuals named Wednesday by the Justice Department are Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's subsidiary in Germany.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the jail sentences should deter future conspiracies.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Gonzales said in a statement.

The Samsung executives also agreed to assist the Justice Department in the ongoing investigation.

Samsung Execs Plead Guilty To DRAM Price Fixing (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, March 23, 2006

The three Samsung executives conspired with other DRAM makers to fix prices, which affected sales to several U.S. computer makers, it was charged

Three executives from Samsung Electronics, the largest manufacturer of DRAM (dynamic random access memory), have agreed to plead guilty and serve jail time for participating in a worldwide conspiracy to fix DRAM prices, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Wednesday.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales, agreed to a sentence of eight months in U.S. prison. Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM Marketing, for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary, and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary, both agreed to serve seven months, the DOJ said.

The three also agreed to each pay a $250,000 fine and cooperate with the DOJ's ongoing DRAM investigation. The South Korean executives each face one felony count for violating the U.S. Sherman Antitrust Act.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The pleas and sentences are subject to the approval by the U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, and is used in PCs, laptops, servers, printers, hard disk drives, mobile phones, digital cameras, game consoles, and other devices. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, the DOJ said.

Between April 1999 and June 2002, the three Samsung executives conspired with employees of other DRAM makers to fix prices, according to the charges filed Wednesday. The conspiracy affected sales to several U.S. computer makers, including Dell (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., IBM (Profile, Products, Articles) Corp., and Apple Computer (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc.

Including Wednesday's charges, the DOJ has charged four companies and 12 individuals and assessed fines of more than $731 million in a wide-ranging DRAM price-fixing investigation. The fines add up to the second largest total ever collected by the DOJ in a single price-fixing investigation.

The first charges in the investigation came in December 2003, and earlier this month, four executives from Hynix Semiconductor (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc. agreed to plead guilty.

Samsung was ordered in November 2005 to pay a $300 million criminal fine. Hynix, the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, was ordered in May 2005 to pay $185 million. Elpida Memory of Japan agreed in January to pay $84 million. And Infineon of Germany agreed in October 2004 to pay $160 million.

Samsung Executives To Serve Jail In U.S. For DRAM Price-fixing (YONHAP)

By Lee Dong-min

Yonhap News (South Korea), March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 (Yonhap) -- Three South Korean executives of Samsung Electronics agreed Wednesday to serve jail time in the United States after pleading guilty to fixing DRAM prices, the U.S. Justice Department said.

The three men will serve between seven and eight months and pay US$250,000 in fines, the department said. They have agreed to cooperate in the department antitrust division's investigation of the DRAM industry, it said.

The Samsung officials are the second group of South Korean industry executives to be jailed for price fixing. Earlier this month, four executives of Hynix pleaded guilty to the same charges and agreed to jail time in the U.S. Their sentences are between five and eight months.

Samsung is the world's largest producer of DRAM, or dynamic random access memory, a computer component providing high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information. Hynix is the second largest.

Samsung Electronics pleaded guilty to price-fixing and was fined $300 million in November last year. Its employees were not protected by the plea.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said about the Samsung case.

"These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The three Samsung officials were identified as Lee Sun-woo, the company's senior manager of DRAM sales, to serve eight months; Kang Yeong-ho, associate director of DRAM marketing, seven months; and Lee Young-woo, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary, seven months.

Their charges including communications with competitors to set DRAM prices sold to certain customers and exchanging information on DRAM sales to monitor and enforce adherence to agreed-upon prices.

The department's antitrust division has been leading the investigation, still ongoing, that to date has led to charges against four companies, 12 individuals and fines totaling more than $731 million.

"At various times during the period from April 1, 1999, to June 15, 2002, these three Samsung employees conspired with unnamed employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAM sold to certain computer and server manufacturers in the United States," the department said.

The collusion directly affected sales to U.S. computer firms such as Dell, Compaq , IBM, Apple Computer, and Hewlett-Packard, it said.

Plavix Settlement Could Run Into FTC Resistance (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

The proposed settlement of patent-infringement litigation surrounding the blockbuster drug Plavix could run into regulatory resistance, but government enforcers might not have much muscle, legal experts and analysts say.

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. (BMY) (BMY) and Sanofi-Aventis (SNY) (SNY) said late Tuesday that they reached a settlement with Apotex Inc., a Toronto company that had sought to sell a generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner, before the expiration of a key patent. The settlement calls for Apotex to wait until 2011, under certain conditions, to begin selling generic Plavix through a license deal. Bristol- Myers and Sanofi also would make undisclosed payments to Apotex.

The settlement is subject to antitrust review and clearance by the Federal Trade Commission. Some analysts and legal experts believe the FTC might try to challenge the deal because it calls for Apotex to wait as much as five years before selling generic Plavix, and Bristol-Myers and Sanofi have agreed to pay Apotex.

The companies said in a statement that the agreement wasn't an act of collusion to keep a generic drug off the market, but they acknowledged that there's "significant risk" they would be unable to obtain the required antitrust clearance. A Bristol-Myers spokeswoman declined to provide further details, and Sanofi officials couldn't be reached for this story.

Despite the regulatory concerns, investors appeared confident the deal would get the necessary approvals, lifting Bristol-Myers shares 12% to $25.63 and Sanofi's American Depositary Shares 9.3% to $47.76.

FTC Review

The FTC has taken a dim view of similar drug patent-infringement settlements in the past because it believed they could harm consumers by delaying the introduction of cheaper, generic alternatives to branded prescription drugs.

"If there were ever a deal the FTC would appear set to challenge, we believe this seems to be it," CIBC World Markets analyst Elliot Wilbur wrote in a research note Wednesday. CIBC doesn't cover Bristol-Myers or Sanofi and didn't provide any financial disclosures for them.

But the FTC hasn't been so successful in blocking such deals. Last year, for instance, a federal appeals court in Atlanta dismissed FTC charges that Schering-Plough Corp. (SGP) (SGP) illegally delayed the introduction of a generic version of its K-Dur 20 potassium supplement in its settlement of patent litigation with generic challengers.

The federal court ruled that a payment by a brand-name pharmaceutical company to a generic competitor cannot be the sole basis for a violation of antitrust law.

The FTC has a policy of not commenting on whether it will investigate settlements, agency spokesman Mitchell Katz said Wednesday.

A provision of a 2003 federal law requires drug companies to provide advance notice to the FTC of proposed settlements of patent disputes. The requirement is designed to give the FTC a chance to review them and raise any objections it might have, either in court or through an administrative action. But the law doesn't require the FTC to formally approve such settlements.

Still, the FTC has obtained settlements in some of its investigations into branded-generic patent agreements. For instance, it probed an agreement between Abbott Laboratories (ABT) (ABT) and generic drug maker Geneva Pharmaceuticals Inc. regarding Geneva's plan to launch a generic version of Hytrin, a treatment for enlarged prostate symptoms. In 2000, Abbott agreed in a settlement with the FTC not to enter into similar deals in the future without notifying the FTC or getting court approval.

On the other hand, the FTC hasn't objected to some deals, including one last year settling a patent dispute between Wyeth (WYE) and Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd. (TEVA) (TEVA) over Wyeth's (WYE) Effexor antidepressant.

"This area of the law is still somewhat unsettled," said Arthur Lerner, an antitrust attorney with Crowell & Moring in Washington who previously worked for the FTC. "Obviously a lot of these cases turn on specific facts. And there may be certain facts about [the Plavix] case that make it different from the Schering-Plough (SGP) case."

Possible Red Flag

One attorney who represents generic drug companies suggested the Plavix settlement could raise a red flag.

"Apotex is willing to wait about five years," said Steve Sklar, an attorney with Leydig, Voit & Mayer in Chicago. "They must be getting something for it, and something they think is enough to make them happy." Sklar's firm represents Watson Pharmaceuticals Inc. (WPI) (WPI) in a separate patent dispute over Plavix. The case is pending.

Apotex argued that a key patent for Plavix, which was issued in 1989, was invalid because its claims were covered by a prior Sanofi patent, issued in 1985 and expired in 2003. Apotex also argued the 1989 patent was unenforceable because Sanofi misled the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office when seeking the patent.

Bristol-Myers and Sanofi say the active ingredient in Plavix - clopidogrel bisulfate - wasn't covered by the 1985 patent, and they deny misleading the patent office.

Bear Stearns analyst John Boris views potential FTC scrutiny as a "substantial hurdle." Boris noted that the Wyeth-Teva deal that escaped FTC action last year didn't involve a "discrete" payment by Wyeth (WYE), and a generic Effexor is being allowed on the market two to seven years earlier than key patents for Effexor expire.

Boris noted that Bristol-Myers and Sanofi are making payments to Apotex, and the deal appears to allow generic Plavix on the market only eight months earlier than patent expiration. Boris doesn't own Bristol-Myers shares; his firm has received non-investment-banking compensation from the company in the past 12 months.

Friedman Billings Ramsey analyst David Moskowitz, however, thinks the settlement will meet the "pro-consumer and pro-competitive tests" because generic Plavix would be launched earlier than patent expiration, and other generic companies can continue to challenge the Plavix patent, preserving competition. Moskowitz doesn't own Bristol-Myers shares; his firm hasn't provided investment-banking services to the company recently.

Bristol-Myers and Sanofi said in a press release they have approached Dr. Reddy's Laboratories (RDY) (RDY) about a possible settlement of its generic challenge to Plavix.

In a question-and-answer section on Sanofi's Web site, the companies tried to address some of the concerns that might be raised in an FTC review. In addition to saying Apotex wasn't a case of collusion, they noted that the Toronto company will be allowed to enter the market before the patent expires.

The companies said the reserves they expect to establish during the first quarter for payments to Apotex aren't expected to be material. Additional reserves may be recorded in the future.

Dell Agrees To Buy Alienware (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Dell Inc. said it agreed to buy closely held Alienware Corp., a maker of high-end personal computers favored by gamers.

Terms were not disclosed. But the deal is considered a significant strategy shift for Dell, which rarely makes acquisitions and has tended to focus more on machines purchased by businesses.

While Dell has transformed the PC business by focusing on direct sales and streamlined manufacturing, Alienware has built a loyal following among computer users willing to pay a premium for powerful machines with sleek designs and odd colors such as "cyborg green."

The transaction also is being closely watched in the semiconductor industry. Dell, which has its own line of gaming PCs, exclusively uses chips from Intel. But Alienware also uses chips from rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

A Dell spokesman said Miami-based Alienware, which will be run as a separate subsidiary, can continue to do so. "They will sell their own products, and they will continue to use AMD as part of that," he said.

Roger Kay, an analyst with Endpoint Technologies Associates Inc., estimates that Alienware is on track to post revenues this year of about $220 million, and is No. 1 among companies focused solely on the profitable gaming niche. But other companies in the market, including VoodooPC and Falcoln Northwest, are also believed to be growing quickly.

Rahul Sood, VoodooPC's president and chief of technology, predicted the Dell-Alienware deal in an online posting earlier this month. He said the transaction "will bring more awareness to the PC gaming industry, and it will certainly open new doors with new customers for us. I think it's a pretty tremendous thing."

In recent years Dell, Gateway Inc. and other big players have targeted the lucrative market for videogaming PCs. Dell revamped its XPS line in 2001 to feature high-powered, high-priced computers to better compete with companies like Alienware and VoodooPC. On Wednesday, Dell unveiled the latest in this line, with a price tag at nearly $10,000.

Dell said it is taking orders on the XPS 600 Renegade. The machine, first unveiled at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas in January, has four Nvidia Corp. graphic processor units on a single card and can be equipped with dual hard drives, features that allow it to render more complex graphics.

The XPS is part of the niche category of "gaming PCs" that include souped up graphics capabilities and usually carry much higher price tags than traditional PCs. For example, with the Renegade, "instead of using traditional weapons, gamers can pull down the roof on their enemies, crushing them in a pile of collapsing debris," explained Dell in a press release.

The XPS 600 -- which Dell said is available in "limited quantities" -- is painted with a flame design and will include a 30-inch widescreen high-resolution LCD monitor for $9,930. Customers can add special "discrete physics" controllers to the XPS 400 and XPS 600 for $1,239 and $2,039, respectively. Customers can order the machine through Dell's Web site.

Alienware's least expensive laptops and desktops start at around $700, but the top-of-the-line, liquid-cooled ALX models can approach $10,000 when fully tricked out with dual-core processors, hard drives that can store up to a terabyte of data, and state-of-the-art graphics cards. An average Alienware PC costs about $3,000 to $4,000, hundreds of dollars more than similarly configured machines from mainstream manufacturers.

Microsoft Offers Unlimited Tech Support For Rivals Interested In Windows Software (AP)

By Raf Casert

AP, March 23, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - (AP) -- Microsoft Corp. today offered "free, unlimited technical support" to rivals interested in making their software work with the software giant's servers, saying it wanted to comply with a landmark EU antitrust ruling.

"We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the (European) Commission's concerns," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said in a statement.

A spokesman for the EU's antitrust office said the Microsoft offer "seems to be a constructive proposal," but said the company needed to make more efforts to fully fall in line with the EU's 2004 ruling.

"Microsoft will naturally be well placed to answer questions from licensees on specific points of the technical documents," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

He insisted, however, that even two years after the ruling that forced Microsoft to share technical details with rivals, Microsoft's efforts remained insufficient.

The EU levied a record $603 million fine against Microsoft in March 2004. It also ordered the company to share code with rivals and to offer a version of Windows without the Media Player software.

DOJ_NMG_0020198

Microsoft is appealing the ruling, and the case will be heard in late April by the European Court of First Instance, the EU's second-highest court.

Microsoft Takes New Action On EU Sanctions (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Microsoft has made a fresh attempt to escape antitrust fines of up to €2m ($2.4m) a day, telling the European Commission on Wednesday that it will take further steps to comply with the regulator's March 2004 competition ruling.

Microsoft said it would offer rival companies "unlimited, free technical assistance" to help them develop products that work smoothly with the group's ubiquitous Windows operating system. It would even send its software experts to other companies' offices to help them in the process, Microsoft added.

The latest concessions come in response to accusations by the Commission that Microsoft has failed to implement one of the key elements of its landmark ruling.

Brussels has told Microsoft that it has failed to provide complete and accurate inter-operability information about Windows to rival companies. It believes the information – which will be licensed in return for a fee – is needed so that other companies can develop server software that meshes with Windows-driven computers and servers.

The Commission on Wednesday reacted cautiously to Microsoft's latest move, welcoming the initiative while stressing that the group had so far failed to draw up complete and accurate documentation. "At first sight it seems to be a constructive proposal. However, technical support is only helpful once the documentation has reached certain quality standards," a spokesman said.

Both the Commission and Microsoft's industry rivals have said the documentation supplied so far is highly inadequate and would not allow companies to develop inter-operable products. They accuse the group of dragging its feet, and point out that it is more than two years since the Commission made its ruling.

Microsoft maintains that the quality of its technical documentation already ex-ceeds industry standards, but that it is willing to go even further to meet the Commission's concerns.

Wednesday's moves expanded on Microsoft's earlier offer of 500 hours of free technical assistance, and reflects the group's belief that any shortcomings in its documentation can best be resolved through direct contacts between software engineers.

In addition, Microsoft said it had submitted a workplan to Professor Neil Barrett, the Commission's technical adviser in the case, outlining improvements to the actual documentation. These include better navigation and more illustrations.

Microsoft's move comes just one week before a two-day internal Commission hearing on the case.

Microsoft Makes A New Offer To EU (WSJ)

By Gabriella Stern

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. said it will make "unlimited" technical support available to rival companies trying to write software to mesh with its products, as part of its efforts to reach agreement with the European Union's antitrust regulators.

In 2004, the European Commission ordered Microsoft to make its Windows protocols available to rival software makers. Since then, the commission has accused Microsoft, Redmond, Wash., of failing to comply with the antitrust ruling. The company faces €100 million ($121 million) or more in new fines from the European body, the European Union's executive arm, and has been engaged in a public-relations battle leading up to a pivotal court hearing in the case.

"We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the Commission's concerns," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said. Yesterday's offer upped the company's previous one of 500 hours of technical support.

European Commission antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd said the commission hadn't received details of the new proposal and said it seemed "constructive." Mr. Todd added that any technical documentation Microsoft makes widely available to competitors "is only helpful once the documentation has reached a certain quality standard."

So far, Mr. Todd said, the commission feels Microsoft's documentation hasn't met the requirements the commission laid out in 2004.

An independent monitor in the regulatory case has found the documents provided by Microsoft needed a drastic overhaul to make them workable. The monitor, computer-science professor Neil Barrett, wrote a critical report about Microsoft's efforts to comply with the commission's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions.

Microsoft, which has accused Mr. Barrett of being uninformed and colluding with its rivals, also pledged yesterday to do additional work on technical documentation. But it said five European computer-science professors believe existing documentation already meets requirements.

EU Set For Summit Clash Over Protectionism In Energy Industry (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Stearns

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- The European Union is set to confront France and Spain for protecting energy companies from foreign takeovers, raising the prospect of a clash among EU leaders at a meeting meant to revive a push for market integration.

EU leaders meet this evening in Brussels for the first time since the French government arranged a merger between utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA to avert a possible bid for Suez by Italy's Enel SpA. The two-day summit also comes after the Spanish government imposed rules to hinder a takeover of power company Endesa SA by Germany's E.ON AG.

``Member states are reluctant to accept the rules," Loyola de Palacio, EU energy commissioner for five years until November 2004, said by telephone from Madrid two days ago. ``They are very proud when one of their companies goes abroad and makes a takeover but aren't very happy when somebody else makes a takeover in their country."

National obstacles and monopolies in Europe's 250 billion-euro ($302 billion) electricity and natural-gas market threaten to boost bills for companies and consumers, curtail supply and undermine the economy. The fragmentation may also hinder efforts to prevent the 25-nation EU's dependency on energy imports from rising to 70 percent by 2030 from 50 percent now.

Jose Barroso, the president of the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, is fighting to enforce existing free-market rules and win more powers. In a March 8 package of proposals to be discussed at this evening's summit dinner, he called for a common energy regulator, the right to manage emergency oil and gas stocks and the authority to negotiate an energy accord with Russia, supplier of a quarter of Europe's gas.

European Dimension

``The commission is right to be proposing a new European dimension of energy policy," Katinka Barysch, chief economist at the London-based Centre for European Reform, said by phone two weeks ago. ``The European angle is secondary for member states like France, which is sad. It will take time to make progress."

The grip of Europe's national governments on energy policy persists after they ceded powers in areas such as antitrust, trade and interest rates. Like defense, governments treat energy as a strategic issue where EU-wide cooperation is limited and national discretionary power isn't.

Seeking to crack this bastion of national sovereignty, Barroso says common action is more urgent than ever. He cites European economic growth that has trailed the U.S. pace most of the past decade, energy-price rises over the past two years and a disruption of Russian gas supplies in January.

Choice of Suppliers

Barroso's more immediate task is to prevent protectionism from undermining a hard-fought agreement by EU lawmakers in 2003 to give electricity and gas customers a choice of suppliers. This legislation, due to take full effect next year, is inciting cross-border takeovers and political resistance to them.

``We can't build barriers against each other," Barroso told a March 21 press conference in Brussels. ``It's absurd. Economic nationalism was never a solution and is even less so today."

The commission is probing whether the governments of French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero violated the EU's single-market rules.

DOJ_NMG_0020200

In addition to vetting mergers, the commission has the power to file lawsuits against governments at the European Court of Justice. EU Internal-Market Commissioner Charlie McCreevy said two days ago the commission would ``soon'' start legal action against Spain for favoring Barcelona-based Gas Natural SDG SA over E.ON in the fight for Endesa.

`Unprecedented Assault'

Graham Watson, leader of the pro-business Liberal group in the European Parliament, says the commission faces an ``unprecedented assault on the internal market'' by national governments.

``The commission is going to be tested in this climate,'' Watson told the Strasbourg, France-based EU assembly on March 15. ``The commission must hold firm.''

Barroso's bid for more commission control of national energy stocks revives a plan that De Palacio failed to push through and is already facing resistance from member states. So too is his plan for a single regulator.

National energy ministers opposed the proposal for a European watchdog at a March 14 meeting, saying member states need to keep control and focus on aligning national regulatory systems.

Disunity over energy within the EU threatens to undermine Barroso's plans outside the region. He wants an EU-Russia energy agreement that would give European companies access to the Russian market, boosting investment and capacity there.

OAO Gazprom, the world's biggest gas producer, is the monopoly operator of Russia's gas network and also has a monopoly on exports. Russian President Vladimir Putin has defended Gazprom's role and he stood firm at a March 17 meeting with Barroso in Moscow.

``We certainly don't agree on everything,'' said Barroso. ``On access to networks within Russia, President Putin feels that, for the time being at least, that cannot be guaranteed.''

EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said Europe lost leverage to open Russia's energy market to European companies by endorsing the country's accession to the World Trade Organization in 2004 without gaining concessions in this area.

``There was a case at the time of the WTO negotiation to incorporate energy into this,'' Mandelson told reporters in Brussels two days ago. ``With hindsight, it might have been preferable to do so.''

EU Closes Dispute With Premier League (AP)

By RAF CASERT, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

The European Union closed a long-standing antitrust dispute with England's Premier League on Wednesday, forcing one the of richest leagues in the world to stop selling the rights to its live soccer matches exclusively to one TV channel.

"The solution we have reached will benefit football fans while allowing the Premier League to maintain its timetable for the sale of its rights," said EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes, after the EU executive finalized the deal between both sides.

Under the agreement, live TV rights will be sold in six balanced packages with no one bidder being allowed to buy them all.

Premier League Chief Executive Richard Scudamore said the decision was "a good outcome for supporters, whether in the stadium or watching our broadcasts."

He added the Premier League "believes that the conditions are now in place to create maximum interest for our audiovisual rights and to take the world's most popular domestic football competition from strength to strength."

British Sky Broadcasting Group PLC - a pay channel owned by media mogul Rupert Murdoch - has held the exclusive rights to the richest broadcast contract in European sport for the past 13 years. The satellite broadcaster dominates Britain's pay-TV market with close to 8 million subscribers.

Kroes's office said the new commitments made until the end of the 2012-2013 season "will increase the availability of media rights, and improve the prospect of competition in providing services to consumers."

Packages will be sold to the highest standalone bidder for each package.

The agreement will allow the Premier League to prepare its bidding process for rights as of 2007. It will be monitored by a trustee named by the Commission.

"The Commission could impose a fine amounting to 10 percent of FA Premier League's total worldwide turnover if it breaks its commitments," the statement from Kroes's office said.

BSkyB's nearest rival, cable operator NTL Inc., has already said the deal does not go far enough to deliver a level playing field and said the EU head office had ignored the "pubs and clubs" market which it said needed a critical mass of at least half of all matches to be economically viable.

Irish sports channel Setanta has also said it is interested in bidding. The deal also opens up rights for mobile phone broadcasts to more bidders.

The League's 20 clubs were worried that renegotiating the contract would cause big losses and drive some of them toward bankruptcy. Even Britain's wealthiest club - Manchester United - draws about a third of its income from broadcast rights.

In 2003, the Premier League awarded a 1.024 billion pound ($1.7 billion) exclusive deal to BSkyB from 2004 to 2007.

The EU complained that there was too little soccer left for free TV but it agreed to BSkyB's keeping its monopoly until 2007 on the condition that the 2007-2010 contract would offer substantial packages to a second bidder.

ENVIRONMENT:

Clean Air Craziness (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Last Friday the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals struck down a major plank of the Bush Administration's clean air strategy. The ruling is being cheered by Democrats and some self-styled environmentalists. But it's based on a bad reading of the law, and -- unless successfully challenged -- will lock the U.S. into an old-fashioned approach to regulation when better alternatives are available.

At issue is how to interpret a set of 1970s-era rules known as New Source Review (NSR). As the name itself suggests, the rules were intended to compel new power plants and refineries to install the latest in pollution-control technology. No less an authority than former Carter Energy Secretary Jim Schlesinger attests to this understanding, as do about 20 years of interpretive practice by the Environmental Protection Agency.

But in the late 1990s the Clinton Administration unilaterally decided it didn't like the fact that many older facilities had been "grandfathered" (its word), and decided that even routine maintenance like replacing a steam duct created "new" pollution sources, thereby triggering expensive NSR requirements. Among the utilities hauled into court were the government's own Tennessee Valley Authority and Detroit Edison -- the latter for installing more efficient (i.e., less polluting) turbines.

The Bush Administration understood the problems with the EPA's shifting stance, and in 2003 it issued new rules clarifying what constitutes "routine maintenance" and what triggers NSR. But in a sadly typical case of policy dissonance, it declined to rein in EPA and Justice Department bureaucrats who were still pursuing lawsuits under the Clinton-era interpretation.

That schizophrenic behavior has been having consequences in court. Last year Alabama-based federal Judge Virginia Hopkins threw out the bureaucrats' case against Alabama Power Co. in a ruling that upheld the Bush 2003 interpretation of NSR. She also chided the government for "the anomaly of utilities, like APC, being prosecuted for conduct that, if engaged in now, would not be prosecuted. Put another way, this action is a sport, which is not exactly what one would expect to find in a national regulatory enforcement program."

What happened last week was simply that another court decided to read this "anomaly" another way. The D.C. Circuit declared that the "plain language" of the Clean Air Act requires that all modifications and maintenance activities be seen as triggering NSR requirements. But that judgment implies 20 years of NSR misinterpretation before Clinton. The conclusion isn't entirely surprising, however, since in attempting to preserve the viability of the Clinton-era enforcement cases, the Bush Administration did not argue for the 2003 NSR clarification as forcefully as it could.

If the D.C. Circuit ruling stands, the Bush clean air strategy will lie in ruins, since it relies on a so-called "cap-and-trade" pollution permit system to allow the market to figure out how best to achieve emission reductions. Requiring every power plant making a repair to install the most expensive pollution-control technology would gut the incentive for such trading.

If the Bush Administration doesn't want to abandon its own policy, it has little choice but to fight back. For starters it should go ahead and issue the final piece of the NSR reform it's been working on, the so-called Emission Increase Rule. And if the Administration wants to win on appeal, the smart move would be to drop its internal policy contradictions and finally kill the Clinton-era NSR lawsuits, which can't be justified under the rules it will be trying to defend.

New Source Rebuke (WP)

ONE MIGHT HOPE that after its rebuke last week by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the Bush administration would reconsider its efforts to rewrite the rules governing power plant emissions. The three-judge panel included two of the court's more liberal judges and one of President Bush's most controversial recent conservative appointees, Janice Rogers Brown.

The panel threw out the Environmental Protection Agency's rule on what is called New Source Review as flatly at odds with the Clean Air Act. Unfortunately, there is no particular reason to expect the administration to come to its senses in response. It is still trying to curtail enforcement against old coal-fired plants that fail to install new pollution-control technologies.

Legally, New Source Review does not pose a hard question. The clean-air law, the relevant part of which was passed in 1977, did not require every plant to immediately retrofit with pollution-control technologies. But it did require that plants install new pollution-fighting equipment when they made "any physical change" that increased pollution output. This law went largely unenforced until the Clinton administration, which filed a number of actions against companies that had not complied. On taking office, the Bush administration -- while not dropping the lawsuits -- tried a different approach: rewriting the rules.

Under the new rule, which has been blocked by the court since its release in 2003, "any physical change" does not really mean any physical change, only a change that exceeds 20 percent of the replacement value of the plant or changes its basic design somehow. Anything short of that gets excluded as "routine maintenance." The court, quite rightly, was having none of it. "Only in a Humpty Dumpty world," wrote Judge Judith W. Rogers, could the government ignore Congress's use of a word such as "any." In other words, the Clean Air Act, including the provisions the administration doesn't like, means what it says.

Yet the administration may not have finished trying to read this law out of existence -- or, at least, into a more timid existence. It is still trying to redefine the other essential feature of a plant modification that triggers New Source Review: that the modification "increases" the amount of pollution the plant emits. Again, this seems like a straightforward matter. It increases it if the amount after the change exceeds the amount before it, right? Wrong -- at least according to the administration, which wants to define "increase" in terms of the emissions a plant is potentially capable of spewing rather than the actual amount of spewing it does. The D.C. Circuit -- the court whose interpretations bind the agency -- already rejected this interpretation in another case last year, making the proposed EPA policy seem simply lawless. The court's common-sense ruling last week is a promising sign that its judges won't sit still for further efforts to ignore the law.

Wall Street Lays Plans In Case Bird Flu Strikes (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Bird flu has yet to come even close to the USA's borders, but Wall Street analysts are already crafting advice on how investors can inoculate their portfolios if a pandemic breaks out.

Not since the SARS scare in Asia in spring 2003 — when Hong Kong stocks plunged 10% in six weeks before rebounding after the virus stopped spreading — has a health-related crisis put investors on edge.

Wall Street, which makes its living betting on what the future may look like, has been busy concocting what-if scenarios, handicapping winning and losing stock sectors, and educating clients in the science of bird flu. Recent ink devoted to the H5N1 virus:

•Special report. Citigroup recently sent clients a comprehensive 46-page report on bird flu that includes a brief history of the virus, risk factors and stock picks. The report was compiled by stock strategists, economists, government policy experts, epidemiologists and currency analysts from Europe, Japan, Australia and the USA.

•Stocks to watch. TrendMacro, an investment strategy firm that caters to big institutional investors, created an Avian Flu Index in October that now consists of 17 health care stocks that develop vaccines, anti-virals and other products likely to be in great demand if the avian flu scare morphs from a mere threat to deadly killer.

•First of a series. David Kotok, chief investment officer at Cumberland Advisors, on Friday released the first in a series of reports that will focus on the financial risks and psychological impact on investors.

"We thought it was important to get ahead of the curve on something that's going to become of increasing concern to the capital markets as the disease spreads," says Paul Heldman, senior health policy analyst at Citigroup.

Avian flu primarily affects poultry but on rare occasions can infect humans, says the World Health Organization. More than 100 people have died from the virus since 2003, WHO says.

Earlier this week, U.S. government officials said migrating birds infected with avian flu may reach the USA within months. The virus has already spread across Europe, Asia and Africa.

The fear is that H5N1 will adapt into a strain that can be transmitted from human to human. If a fully contagious virus emerges, its global spread is considered inevitable because people will lack immunity to the virus, WHO says. Given inadequate supplies of medicines to fight the virus, large numbers of deaths could occur. So could massive economic and social disruptions.

That's why Wall Street has added bird flu to its list of market negatives that include terrorism, protectionism, rising interest rates and Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"Why should investors care about the risk of a pandemic? Because the risk of a planetwide outbreak is very real. It's happened before," says Donald Luskin, chief investment officer at TrendMacro.

The 20th century had three influenza pandemics:

The Spanish Flu in 1918 killed an estimated 50 million people, WHO says. The Dow Jones industrial average suffered a maximum loss of 11.1% in the peak death period, according to data compiled by Ned Davis Research (NDR).

The Asian Flu in 1957 and the Hong Kong Flu in 1968 resulted in estimated deaths of 2 million and 1 million, respectively, says WHO. The Dow fell almost 14% in 1957 and nearly 9% in 1968, NDR says.

How stocks do this time depends on what plays out:

•Best-case scenario. Markets will cheer if the virus never becomes transmissible from human to human. In that case, Luskin says, investors can make money investing in companies that make vaccines and testing therapies.

Examples, he says, include Gilead Sciences, the inventor of the anti-viral drug Tamiflu, which is being stockpiled by governments around the globe; Hemispherx Biopharma, which is seeking final approval for its anti-viral drug Ampligen; and Sinovac Biotech, a Chinese vaccine maker.

•SARS-like scenario. A mild pandemic that is contained could add up to a buying opportunity, says Citigroup's Heldman. Many of the stocks likely to decline from flu-related panic selling, such as airlines (Continental), hotels (Hilton) and shopping malls (Simon Property) would likely enjoy rebounds.

•Worst-case scenario. That's if a full pandemic hits, the economy shuts down, people die. Airlines, hotels and other businesses that involve travel or crowds will fall sharply. Citigroup says shares of drug companies, vaccine makers, and hospital and health care stocks (Tenet, Community Hospitals) will rise. Home entertainment providers, such as Blockbuster, should fare well. So, too, could safe investments such as Treasury bonds and cash.

But, "The losers will come under severe pressure," says Heldman. Adds Luskin: "It will be like Hurricane Katrina on a global scale."

Woody Dorsey, behavioral market strategist at Market Semiotics, says the fact that the virus can spread quickly and cause widespread havoc means it is likely to be more damaging to the economy and financial markets than a terrorist attack or severe hurricane.

"We're moving into a 'bio-era' where computer viruses, physical viruses and fear move around the world quickly," he says. "It's the downside of globalization."

Schools Told To Prepare For Bird Flu (WP)

By Ben Feller

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's schools, recognized incubators of respiratory diseases among children, are being told to plan for the possibility of an outbreak of bird flu.

Federal health leaders say it is not alarmist or premature for schools to make preparations, such as finding ways to teach kids even if they've all been sent home.

School boards and superintendents have gotten used to emergency planning for student violence, terrorism or severe weather. Pandemic preparation, though, is a new one.

They have a lot to think over, top government officials said Tuesday.

Who coordinates decisions on closing schools or quarantining kids? If classes shut down for weeks, how will a district keep kids from falling behind? Who will keep the payroll running, or ease the fear of parents, or provide food to children who count on school meals?

"Those are the kinds of issues that I don't think people have spent a lot of time talking about yet," said Stephen Bounds, director of legal and policy services for the Maryland Association of School Boards.

"But if New Orleans and Katrina taught us nothing else, it taught us you need to be thinking about things ahead of time _ and preparing for the worst," Bounds said.

The urgency is about bird flu, the name for the deadly H5N1 strain of the avian flu.

It remains primarily a contagious bird disease. Typically spread from direct contact with contaminated birds, it has infected more than 170 people and killed roughly 100. None of those cases occurred in the United States, but officials say bird flu is likely to arrive this year in birds.

As outbreaks have hit Africa, Asia and Europe, officials have launched campaigns to educate the public. To help stop the spread of the disease, farmers have killed tens of millions of chickens and turkeys.

Experts fear the virus could change into a form that passes easily among people.

In North Carolina on Tuesday, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings joined Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt to encourage schools to prepare. Spellings said schools must be aware that they may have to close their buildings _ or that their schools may need to be used as makeshift hospitals, quarantine sites or vaccination centers.

The government has created checklists on preparation and response steps, specialized for preschools, grade schools, high schools and colleges. The dominant theme is the need for coordination among local, state and federal officials.

Some of the advice is common sense, like urging students to wash their hands and cover their mouths when they cough or sneeze to keep infection from spreading. Other steps would take schools considerable time to figure out, such as legal and communication issues.

"I don't think that the issue of bird flu has resonated yet," said Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, which represents many of the country's teachers.

Weaver praised the federal government for providing guidance that can be plugged into a school district's crisis plan. But the sudden urgency on bird flu, he said, should not steal attention from the daily struggles schools face, like trying to keep their classrooms safe.

Children age 5 to 18 tend to be the biggest spreaders of flu viruses in the community, experts say. Schools may be ordered to close to prevent spreading the disease.

In Massachusetts, school administrators are considering using an automated phone bank to announce homework assignments and update parents. Another plan would use the Internet for communication between students and their teachers.

But those plans are limited, and many places have had budget cuts in technology, said Tom Scott, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents. "I don't think we're anywhere near having a systemic way of approaching this," he said.

Any school closing may not be for only a day or two. A shutdown would probably have to last a month or longer to be effective, said flu specialist Ira Longini, a faculty member at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center and a professor at the University of Washington in Seattle.

"The school itself plays a big role," said Longini. "It's just a massive mixing ground for respiratory illness."

At the college level, the American Council on Education, a higher education umbrella group, has alerted thousands of college presidents about the need to prepare for bird flu.

Federal health leaders have advised each college to establish a pandemic response team and plan for outbreak scenarios that could close or quarantine their campuses.

A Clue Is Found On Why Bird Flu Is Slow To Spread Among Humans (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Scientists have a new clue why the feared H5N1 strain of the avian-influenza virus hasn't spread easily among people.

According to research published this week by teams in the U.S. and the Netherlands, the bird virus primarily infects cells deep in the human lung, possibly making it difficult for the germ to spread.

The H5N1 avian-flu virus was first detected in Hong Kong in 1997, and has since claimed millions of birds and more than 100 human lives.

PREVENTING A PANDEMIC

1 • Nations Contradict WHO Secrecy Rationale2

• See an FAQ on avian flu3, an interactive global map4 and track the latest developments in the Avian Flu News Tracker5.

• Plus, see complete coverage6.

The virus has continued to spread across the globe and has been detected in birds in both Europe and Africa, although not yet in the U.S.

Humans have very limited immunity to such avian viruses, and health authorities say that if the bird-flu virus begins to spread between people, it could spark a global outbreak of deadly respiratory disease.

That hasn't happened, and the new findings may help explain why.

Using tissues from human cadavers, researchers at the Erasmus Medical Center in Rotterdam studied which cells the bird virus would become attached to. According to Thijs Kuiken, a veterinary pathologist who directed the research, H5N1 attached to cells deep in the lung, but not cells in the throat, where human-flu viruses multiply. The study appears in the journal Science.

Dr. Kuiken called the finding a possible explanation for why the avian virus doesn't jump easily between people. "It must reach the lower respiratory tract to replicate, and it's harder to spread by coughing and sneezing," he said.

Other doctors questioned that conclusion, saying that patients with such infections were likely to cough more heavily. "I don't think it directly affects the transmissibility just because it's in the lower respiratory tract," said Nikki Shindo, an influenza expert at the World Health Organization who has studied human cases, most recently in Turkey.

Dr. Shindo said that if the virus has to reach deep into the lung before causing an infection, that could make it harder to catch.

In a separate study released yesterday by the journal Nature, a research group headed by Yoshihiro Kawaoka of the University of Wisconsin-Madison reached similar conclusions after analyzing the specific molecules on human cells to which influenza viruses attach.

They found that molecules preferred by H5N1 are expressed mostly by cells deep in the lung. To spread between humans, the virus would need to adapt in a way that enabled it to attach to a different type of molecule present in cells higher in the respiratory tract.

"This restriction may contribute to the inefficient human-to-human transmission of H5N1 viruses seen to date," Dr. Kawaoka wrote in his report.

Researchers Shed More Light On Bird Flu (WP)

By David Brown

DOJ_NMG_0020206

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Two research teams have independently discovered explanations for the chief features of the H5N1 bird flu virus -- its difficulty infecting humans, and the deadly effects when it does.

Unlike influenza viruses that are passed easily between people, H5N1 has a hard time attaching to cells in the nose, throat and upper airways. But it readily attaches to cells deep in the lungs.

This suggests that people need close and heavy exposure to the H5N1 virus for it to get into the lungs. But once it takes hold, it causes extensive damage to the machinery of respiration -- the cells and air spaces where oxygen is exchanged for carbon dioxide.

That scenario mimics the clinical experience of many of the 184 human cases of bird flu that have been officially recorded since late 2003. More than half have been fatal.

"This is information that we need to know -- fundamental and exciting," said Robert G. Webster, a leading flu virologist at St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis. He was not a member of either of the research groups, one of which published its results in yesterday's issue of the journal Nature, and the other online in Science.

Influenza infection occurs through a series of steps, with a key early one involving hemagglutinin, a protein that coats the virus's outer envelope. That protein attaches to sugar molecules that lie on the surface of many cells.

Virologists have known for years that human flu viruses attach through a sugar "linkage" designated alpha 2,6. The vast family of avian flu viruses favors a linkage with a different shape, designated alpha 2,3.

A research team led by Kyoko Shinya at the University of Wisconsin and the University of Tokyo looked at what cells in the human respiratory tract contain which linkage. They found that alpha 2,6 -- the receptor for human flu -- predominated in the nose and down the airways to the microscopic passageways that lead to the air sacs, or alveoli. At that point, cells with the alpha 2,3 linkage -- the receptor for bird viruses -- become common. Human viruses attached to the upper airways, while avian viruses attached to cells deep in the lungs.

The Japanese researchers, who published their findings in Nature, also tested an H5N1 virus taken from a person who died of bird flu in Hong Kong in 2003. That microbe's hemagglutinin recognized both the human and bird linkages, and it attached to cells from nose to lung. Most H5N1 samples isolated from people do not generally follow that pattern. The ability to bind to alpha 2,6 human receptors is one of several features that would have to become dominant for the H5N1 virus to become easily transmitted from human to human.

In the other paper, Thijs Kuiken and colleagues at Erasmus Medical Center in the Netherlands exposed H5N1 to blocks of tissue taken from all along the respiratory tree. They found the bird virus attached predominantly to cells at the entrance to the air sacs and in them, as well as to immune-system cells called alveolar macrophages that patrol the area.

This same pattern was seen in cats and ferrets. (Ferrets have traditionally been considered the species whose flu infections most closely mimic those of humans.) In mice, however, the pattern was reversed. H5N1 attached best to cells in the windpipe, not the lung -- suggesting mice are not the best animal model for research on this strain.

In many of the fatal H5N1 infections, people's lungs were filled with fluid, the result of an out-of-control inflammatory reaction. Kuiken speculated that bird flu's affinity for macrophages -- which can release inflammatory chemicals -- may be part of the reason.

Studies Suggest Avian Flu Pandemic Isn't Imminent (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Two groups of researchers, in Japan and in Holland, say they have discovered why the avian flu virus is rarely if ever transmitted from one person to another.

The reason, the researchers propose, is that the cells bearing the type of receptor the avian virus is known to favor are clustered in the deepest branches of the human respiratory tract, keeping it from spreading by coughs and sneezes. Human flu viruses typically infect cells in the upper respiratory tract.

The avian virus would need to accumulate many mutations in its genetic material before it could become a pandemic strain, said Yoshihiro Kawaoka, a virologist at the University of Tokyo and the University of Wisconsin.

According to a University of Wisconsin news release approved by Dr. Kawaoka, "The finding suggests that scientists and public health agencies worldwide may have more time to prepare for an eventual pandemic."

Dr. Kawaoka's finding is published in today's issue of Nature, and a similar finding, by Thijs Kuiken and colleagues at the Erasmus Medical Center in Rotterdam, appears in this week's Science.

Flu experts already knew that people who contract the current avian flu virus, a type known as A(H5N1) or H5 for short, are infected in the lower lung.

Paul A. Offit, a virologist at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, said the new reports helped explain why the H5 virus, though it can infect people, does not easily spread from one person to another.

Virologists agree that a flu pandemic will happen sooner or later as one of the 16 types of flu virus in the animal world, probably one that infects birds, will manage to switch hosts, and grow and spread in humans. But they differ over whether H5 is the likeliest candidate to make such a switch. Previous pandemics have been caused only by H1- (the 1918 pandemic), H2- (the 1957 Asian flu) or H3-type viruses (the Hong Kong flu of 1968).

The H5 strain of avian flu has so far failed to develop a pandemic form. Some virologists fear it may need only better transmissibility. The new findings suggest that the virus could acquire such a property by switching its preference from the cell receptor found in the lower lung, known as alpha 2-3, to the receptor found on cells in the upper airways, known as alpha 2-6.

A team of scientists at the Scripps Research Institute reported in Science last week that only a couple of mutations might be needed to enable the H5 virus to make this switch to the alpha 2-6 receptor. This is the about same number of mutations made by the H1, H2 and H3 viruses when they adapted to infect people. Since viruses mutate fast, a two-mutation step is not such a big hurdle.

Because the H5 virus has killed about half of the 187 people it has infected, "a lot of its genes are already optimized for virulence," said James C. Paulson, a member of the Scripps team. For H5 to become pandemic, "the key gene that needs to be mutated is the HA gene," he said, referring to the hemagglutinin gene that makes the protein probe used by the virus to latch onto a cell's receptor sites.

Though H5 may seem only a couple of steps from transmissibility among people, many virologists believe mutations in several other genes would be necessary as well, even though those changes are not yet well understood.

Viruses find it difficult to switch hosts, and though they may quite often cause outbreaks in just a few individuals, "viruses that produce a self-sustaining chain of transmission in the new host appear rare," Dr. Kawaoka writes in the current Annual Review of Microbiology. "Most of these transfers are dead ends," he said.

The H5 virus has been present in the human population since the late 1950's, said Dr. Offit of Children's Hospital, but has never acquired the full set of mutations needed to set off a pandemic. Such epidemiological evidence "should make us feel safe that there's a substantial barrier," he said, noting the small number of people who have been infected.

Dr. Offit said it was a good thing to worry about the next flu pandemic, given that about three can be expected every century. "What's not good is to try to sell the public on their fear of pandemic flu being this particular bird flu, since if it's not, crying wolf will lose you credibility," he said.

Peter Palese, a virologist at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, said he did not believe the H5 virus could infect people except when they were exposed to large doses, for example, by sleeping in the same room as chickens. "I feel strongly that H5 has been around in humans for a long time and never caused a pandemic, suggesting that this is not the virus which is likely to be the next pandemic," he said.

But like Dr. Offit, Dr. Palese said he fully supported plans for better preparations for the next flu pandemic, whatever its source. "People have to understand we are not really prepared should it come," he said.

China Agrees To Hand Over Bird Flu Samples (FT)

By Andrew Yeh In Beijing

DOJ_NMG_0020208

Chinese officials have promised to provide numerous bird flu virus samples to global health researchers, a rare move that will help accelerate research into the lethal disease, World Health Organisation officials said on Wednesday.

For several months, Beijing has been willing to share genetic sequencing information with international health officials but provided only a few live virus samples. But WHO representatives said the Chinese government had pledged to share more animal and human viruses with greater frequency.

Beijing's compliance, if followed through, is a sign of more intimate cooperation with the global health community.

The move reflects a change in attitude among Chinese government researchers, who at times have been reluctant to share samples for fear of not being recognised for any breakthrough findings published overseas.

The WHO expects to receive shipments of up to 20 samples of wild birds and poultry infected by the H5N1 virus within a few weeks, according to Julie Hall, a Beijing-based infectious disease expert with the organisation.

Shigeru Omi, WHO's western Pacific director, said greater exchange of H5N1 information was crucial since the disease is "very changeable".

Western health authorities argue that the swapping of bird flu virus samples is imperative as long as pandemic risks exist, and improves the chances of developing a prototype vaccine.

The disease has killed 103 people worldwide since 2003, according to the WHO. Even as most cases have come from contact with birds, many fear the virus may mutate into a form that can spread with greater efficiency.

Since 2004, with bird flu spreading more quickly in Asia, Beijing has provided only a handful of animal virus samples to the WHO.

The new samples being promised are expected to be analysed at advanced laboratories around the world, and will likely be injected into mice and ferrets, to study the antibodies those animals produce.

The WHO is at the same time seeking to get new human virus samples from the health ministry in China, which has reported 15 human cases to date. China's Centre for Disease Control and Prevention provided the WHO with two human virus strains at the end of last year.

Chinese researchers have similarly requested reciprocal sharing of viruses from other countries and global organisations. After the Sars outbreak in 2003, Beijing has been determined to improve its scientific research innovation.

"China has the high capacity to do much of the work themselves," said Dr Hall, who noted that China's earlier resistance to sharing viruses is now "behind us".

Man Cleared Of Nevada Petroglyph Theft Says 'my Life Was Trashed' (AP)

By SCOTT SONNER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 23, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - One of two men whose federal conviction for stealing American Indian artwork was overturned says the pair simply wanted to protect the ancient petroglyphs from encroaching development.

Carroll Mizell, who served 10 months in prison after being found guilty in June 2004 of stealing the rock art said "we wanted to save the property.

"My whole intent was to free these things so they wouldn't be destroyed," Mizell told The Associated Press on Wednesday from Redmond, Ore.

"We didn't do this because we wanted to put them on e-Bay," he said.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that the Justice Department failed to prove the rock art taken from a national forest on the edge of Reno had a market value of more than $1,000, a requirement for a felony conviction of government theft.

Mizell and John Ligon of Reno admitted during their federal court trial in Reno that they took three boulders with etchings of an archer and bighorn sheep from the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest. But they insisted they didn't know it was illegal, partly because there were no signs marking the site.

Forest Service officials believe the petroglyphs are at least 1,000 years old. They were located within a few hundred yards of backyards in a neighborhood in northwest Reno where hundreds of new homes are scheduled to be built.

Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, said federal prosecutors are considering asking the appeals court to reconsider the case but they had no further comment.

Mizell said he did not feel vindicated by the ruling.

"This is crazy what I've been through and now they say, `Oh, we made a mistake?'" said Mizell, an artist who lived in Van Nuys, Calif., and Reno, but now works as a glass blower in Oregon.

"My name was trashed in the community. I was made out to be a thief, man - like I'm a rock thief, I attacked the Indian culture. It was as if we might as well just gone and dug up some graves the way they treated us," he said.

"I've done 10 months in prison. I've seen two shrinks who have me on two types of meds to cope with it."

The men were arrested after a neighbor saw a news account of the theft and notified police that the boulders - one weighing 300 pounds - were being used as landscaping in Ligon's front yard.

"John said, `Let's put them there.' I said we needed to give them to an Indian museum and I made some calls to do that," he said.

David Houston, Mizell's lawyer, made the same argument during the trial.

"There are times people will take artifacts knowingly to sell on the black market. ... loot or raid or rob a site of antiquities for the purpose of knowingly taking artifacts to their home or to a secret place where they and they alone can view it. This is not that kind of case," Houston told the jury.

Mizell wanted to "protect these rocks. ... to avoid having the developers literally chew them up and spit them out," he said.

In their ruling, the 9th Circuit judges said prosecutors could not use evidence of the archaeological value of the petroglyphs to prove a government theft charge that hinged on a "market value" of more than $1,000.

A Forest Service archaeologist testified at the trial that the petroglyphs had an archaeological value of about $8,000, and William Dancing Feather, cultural resources coordinator for the Washoe Tribe, said the tribe considered the petroglyphs a priceless treasure.

N.H. Lawmakers Approve Limits On Eminent Domain (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

New Hampshire lawmakers gave preliminary approval Wednesday to a constitutional amendment that would limit government's ability to seize private property.

The measure was prompted by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year that allowed New London, Conn., to take a group of older homes along the waterfront and turn them over to a developer who plans to build offices, a hotel and a convention center.

The state House and Senate voted overwhelmingly in favor of identical resolutions. For the measure to win approval, both chambers must pick one resolution and pass it.

Then the amendment would be put to a statewide vote, probably in November. Two-thirds approval would be needed for ratification.

The amendment would prohibit the taking of private property for use by private developers.

After the high court's eminent domain ruling, activists tried to seize Supreme Court Justice David Souter's 200-year-old New Hampshire farmhouse in retaliation for voting with the majority.

Earlier this month, voters in the town of Weare decided to leave Souter's house alone and instead urged the Legislature to take action.

Special Interests Vs. Virginia Taxpayers (WT)

By Jeremy Hopkins

Just as the fox cannot be trusted to protect the hen house, the Virginia General Assembly once again proved it cannot be trusted to protect Virginians' private property.

The Supreme Court's infamous decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which allows the government to take property from one person simply to give it to another, caused most states to take action to prohibit such abuses. However, the General Assembly refuses to limit the power of eminent domain in Virginia. It ended its 2006 legislative session without passing legislation to eliminate the abuses in Kelo.

The General Assembly's refusal to protect Virginia property owners is even more troublesome given Virginia's track record. The abuses in Kelo are not new to Virginians. In 2003, the Virginia Supreme Court allowed the City of Hampton to take Frank and Dora Ottofaro's property and give 82 percent of the Ottofaros' property to a private developer. In 2005, the Norfolk Redevelopment and Housing Authority attempted to take a small-business owner's property to build a parking lot for the Coca-Cola company, which owned the adjacent property.

The most egregious abuse occurred in Halifax County, where the County Board of Supervisors took one man's property solely to construct a paved driveway for the man's neighbor. In that case, a politically connected family asked the board to take its neighbor's property to construct a paved driveway to serve the family's property. The family then cut the board a check for the purchase price of the neighbor's property.

The driveway, which adds great value to the family's property, serves only the family and its visitors. The driveway extends 4/10 of a mile and dead-ends into the family's property. The Halifax County Circuit Court ruled that Virginia law does not prohibit such takings.

Not only has the General Assembly refused to correct such abuses, it also continues to carelessly dispense the power of eminent domain to countless entities, both public and private. Most representatives cannot name a fraction of the entities that can take Virginians' homes, farms and businesses. The General Assembly has even given mosquito-control commissions the power to take Virginians' property. The result of the General Assembly's delegations of power is that Virginians' homes, farms, and businesses are now subject to the whim of unelected and unaccountable bureaucrats and corporate officials who wield immense power over the property of individual Virginians.

The only thing more disturbing than the number of entities able to take Virginians' property is the amount of power the General Assembly has given many of these same entities. The Virginia Code allows housing authorities to take one man's home simply because his neighbor's property is "blighted." In other words, if your neighbor fails to maintain his home, the housing authority can take your home. The absurdity of such laws is amplified by city charters such as Norfolk's, which allows the city to take property "for any purposes of the city." The charter even allows the city to sell or transfer property it takes to any person it desires, without restriction.

Why does the General Assembly refuse to protect property owners? The answer is simple: politics. While property owners are busy working to pay their taxes and provide for their families, a strong condemning authority lobby has seized Virginia representatives. Unlike the average citizen, condemning authorities have ample time and resources to employ lobbyists, bureaucrats and other officials dedicated to mustering the support of Virginia representatives.

Virginians' own state agencies and local governments, as well as large private corporations that have the power of eminent domain, spare no expense in fighting to ensure that the General Assembly does not place any real restrictions on their power to take people's property. It is ironic that the government often spends the very tax dollars collected from property owners themselves to lobby against the owners. In essence, Virginia property owners involuntarily fund the denial of their own property rights.

In addition to its strong and politically connected lobby, condemning authorities give thousands of dollars in campaign contributions to Virginia representatives. Aside from straightforward contributions, many of the representatives are lawyers who either personally or through their law firms rake in thousands of dollars representing condemning authorities.

Many of the lawmakers with this apparent conflict of interest hold key positions on the committees affecting any potential eminent-domain reform.

These representatives often kill any legitimate eminent-domain reform bills or render such bills meaningless before the bills ever leave committee and get to the floor of their respective houses.

With this said, the division over eminent domain reform is not Republican vs. Democrat. The only division is the takers vs. the taken from. In other words, the division is special interests vs. grass-roots, the politically connected vs. the politically disconnected, or the government (to include private corporations with the governmental power of eminent domain) vs. the people. Unfortunately for Virginians, the General Assembly -- whose own actions and careless delegations of power created the abuses in Virginia -- continues to side with the takers.

Unless and until Virginians demand a constitutional amendment to place real restrictions on the General Assembly's power of eminent domain, no Virginian's home, farm or business will be secure.

Jeremy Hopkins is of counsel with Waldo & Lyle, P.C., a Virginia law firm that represents property owners in eminent domain cases.

Of Mice And Men (WSJ)

By Stephen Moore

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

DENVER -- Here in Colorado, the hottest political issue of the day may not be the war in Iraq or the out-of-control federal budget, but rather the plight of a tiny mouse. Back in 1998, a frisky eight-inch rodent known as the Preble's meadow jumping mouse gained protective status under the 1973 Endangered Species Act (ESA). What has Coloradans hot under the collar is that some 31,000 acres of local government and privately owned land in the state and stretching into Wyoming -- an area larger than the District of Columbia -- was essentially quarantined from all development so as not to disrupt the mouse's natural habitat. Even the Fish and Wildlife Service concedes that the cost to these land owners could reach $183 million.

What we have here is arguably the most contentious dispute over the economic impact of the ESA since the famous early-'90s clash between the timber industry and the environmentalist lobby over the "endangered" listing of the spotted owl in the Northwest. That dispute eventually forced the closure of nearly 200 mills and the loss of thousands of jobs. Last week the war over the fate of the Preble's mouse escalated when a coalition of enraged homeowners, developers and farmers petitioned the Department of the Interior to have the mouse immediately delisted as "endangered" because of reliance on faulty data.

The property-rights coalition would seem to have a fairly persuasive case based on the latest research on the mouse. It turns out that not only is the mouse not endangered, it isn't even a unique species.

The man who is almost singlehandedly responsible for exposing the truth about the Preble's mouse is Rob Roy Ramey, a biologist and lifelong conservationist, who used to serve as a curator at the Denver Museum of Nature and Science. Mr. Ramey's research -- published last year in the peer-reviewed journal Animal Conservation -- concluded that the Preble's mouse "is not a valid subspecies based on physical features and genetics." The scientist who conducted the original research classifying Preble's as unique now agrees with Mr. Ramey's assessment. Even scientists who defend extending the mouse's "endangered" status admit that it is 99.5% genetically similar to other strains of mice.

Nor is the mouse on the road to extinction. "The more people look for these mice, the more they find. Every time scientists do a new count, we find more of the Preble's mouse," Mr. Ramey says. It's now been found inhabiting twice as many distinct areas as once thought. These are mice, after all, and the one thing rodents are proficient at is breeding. The full species of the meadow jumping mouse, far from being rare, can be found over half the land area of North America.

"The federal government has effectively shut off tens of millions of dollars of economic development," complains coalition spokesman Kent Holsinger, "based on saving a species that we now know doesn't even exist." But green groups and Department of Interior bureaucrats, who regard the ESA as a sacred pact -- the modern-day equivalent of Noah's Ark, as former Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt called it -- pledge to fight any change in status.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Ramey has been accused of being "dishonest," a "whore for industry" and a "shill for the Bush administration." Under intense political pressure from environmental activists, he was removed from his curator's job at the museum. "I've been nearly stampeded by a herd of agitated elephants in Africa and suspended from some of the highest cliffs in North America, but nothing prepared me for the viciousness of the attacks from the environmentalist lobby," he tells me.

Meanwhile, the Preble's mouse continues to impose huge costs on local communities. One water district in Colorado was recently required to build two tunnels for the mice under a man-made pond to spare the critters the inconvenience of having to scurry around it. Regulators asked local officials if it would be feasible to grow grass in the tunnels for the mice, which was only slightly less absurd than padding the mouse thoroughfares with red carpet. The extra cost to the water project to make it mouse-friendly? More than $1 million. The Fish and Wildlife Service also has the authority to assess penalties on property owners if they even inadvertently spoil mouse habitat. Owners can even be fined if their cats do what cats do: chase and apprehend mice.

A comprehensive 2003 survey found that more than one in four land owners impacted by the Preble's mouse regulation "admitted to actively degrading habitat following the species listing in 1998." This is often precisely what happens in these situations: Because most of 1,500 or so species that have been listed as threatened since 1972 are anything but, people have no respect for the designation and attempt to force the species away from their land. They call it "shoot 'em, shovel 'em and shut up." For truly endangered species, the ESA is a disaster.

Many individuals have been so strong-armed by federal bureaucrats that they have come to believe -- with good reason -- that the original and widely supported intent of the ESA has been subverted into a back-door means to slam the brakes on economic development. "It's a cost-free way for the government and the greens to impose land-use control on property owners," says R.J. Smith, an ESA expert at the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

Therein lies the crux of the problem. The law tries to achieve the societal policy goal of saving species from extinction by imposing all of the costs on a hapless few. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo has sensibly proposed reforms that allow landowners to get fair compensation from the government if their land is depressed in value due to a wetlands or endangered species designation. That seems equitable: If society wants to preserve habitat for the common good, then the cost should be borne by all taxpayers, not individual landowners, who would no longer regard endangered species as an economic plague.

If anything good can come out of the Preble's mouse fiasco in Colorado, it will be that it has awakened Congress to the reality that the ESA isn't just failing property owners but the very irreplaceable species it was designed to protect.

U.S. Indicts Colombia Guerrilla Leaders (AP)

By Mark Sherman

WASHINGTON - The United States charged 50 leaders of Colombia's largest guerrilla group with sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their fight at home, a federal indictment that depicts the rebels as major narco-terrorists.

The indictment made public Wednesday in U.S. District Court said the leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, ordered the killings of Colombian farmers who did not cooperate with the group, the kidnapping and killing of U.S. citizens and the downing of U.S. planes seeking to fumigate coca crops.

U.S. officials said the indictment strikes a blow against the group because it lays out the FARC's hierarchy and details of its operations. "Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

He acknowledged that 47 of those charged remain at large, probably in well-defended jungle strongholds that have so far proved beyond the reach of Colombian authorities.

The FARC supplies more than half the world's cocaine and 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States, the indictment said. "The FARC's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in America's neighborhoods," said the head of the Drug Enforcement Administration, Karen Tandy.

Washington-based experts on Colombia said the actual numbers probably are lower, but are significant. Right-wing paramilitary groups also are heavily involved in the cocaine trade, the experts and the indictment said.

The FARC uses proceeds from the cocaine trade to purchase weapons in its four-decade fight to overthrow the Colombian government, the indictment said. A grand jury returned the indictment on March 1; it remained under seal until Wednesday.

The U.S. and the European Union have designated the FARC a terrorist organization.

Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's closest ally in South America, has waged an aggressive fight against the FARC and stepped up efforts to eradicate his country's coca crop. Uribe faces re-election in May and has been leading in the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0020213

The U.S. has spent more than $3 billion since 2000 to reduce Colombia's coca crop and the flow of cocaine to this country. The results have been lackluster, said John Walsh, senior analyst at the Washington Office on Latin America, a think tank.

The indictment is intended to show that U.S.-Colombian cooperation is "successfully getting at the drug-trafficking industry and attacking drug financing," Walsh said.

Phillip McLean, a former American diplomat who now is at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said he expects the charges will influence the debate in Colombia between those who view the FARC as a traditional guerrilla group with a political agenda and those who see it as a criminal organization.

"This indictment clearly puts the weight on the side of those who say these guys are bandits," said McLean, who served in Colombia in the 1980s and recently returned from a trip there.

The State Department said it would pay up to $75 million in rewards for information leading to the arrest of 24 FARC leaders named in the indictment.

Three others charged in the drug conspiracy are in custody in Colombia and U.S. officials said they would seek to have them extradited. They are: Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, authorities said.

More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, officials said. Two accused FARC leaders already are awaiting trial in Washington on narcotics charges.

The FARC is holding more than 60 hostages, including three U.S. defense contractors kidnapped in February 2003, when their small plane crashed in the jungles of southern Colombia during an anti-narcotics mission.

U.S. Indicts 50 Colombians For Cocaine Trafficking (LAT)

By Michael Muskal, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

The United States has indicted 50 top leaders of the leading leftist militia in Colombia on drug charges of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine abroad.

In a one-count indictment unsealed this morning, a federal grand jury has charged 50 leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, known by its Spanish initials as FARC. The U.S. will seek to extradite three of the defendants who are in custody in Colombia and offered rewards that total $75 million for information leading to the arrest of the others who are believed to be in areas controlled by the militia.

U.S. officials say FARC has sent about 60% of the cocaine imported into the U.S., then used the money to support its long-term insurgency against Colombia, now led by pro-U.S. President Alvaro Uribe.

"This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine," said Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales. "Because of unprecedented cooperation between United States and Colombian authorities, we are closer than ever before to reaching our goal of bringing the leaders of this narco-terrorist group to justice in the United States."

Among the leaders being sought are the seven figures who sit on the FARC Secretariat, the militia's ruling body, and 17 members of the estado mayor, or governing council, U.S. officials said at a news conference this morning in Washington.

"The Department of State's Narcotics Rewards Program has successfully targeted the Cali, Medellin and Norte del Valle cartels in Colombia, bringing many of their top leaders to justice," said Anne Patterson, assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement. "The FARC, responsible for much of the cocaine trafficked to the United States, is now in our sights."

Formed in the mid-1960s, FARC is Latin America's oldest leftist insurgency, with perhaps as many as 17,000 fighters. It has engaged in tactics from kidnappings to battles with Colombia troops.

FARC's ties to drug-running have long been established. Colombia has received about $4 billion in U.S. aid to fight FARC since 2000. On Dec. 31, 2004, Simon Trinidad, the highest-ranking FARC leader ever captured, was extradited to the United States on drug charges.

DOJ_NMG_0020214

Uribe is credited with improving security in Colombia, where the number of kidnappings and massacres are down. He was able to push through a constitutional amendment abolishing a one-term limit on presidents so that he can run again in May.

The indictment outlines FARC's efforts to collect millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and use the money to purchase weapons.

"The defendants also allegedly ordered FARC members to kidnap and murder U.S. citizens to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the FARC's cocaine-trafficking activities," the Justice Department said.

The indictment also alleged that FARC leaders "authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes, and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law enforcement officers who were conducting the investigation into the FARC's narcotics activities."

Gonzales said the three in custody are Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," Erminso Cuevas Cabrera, who uses the name "Mincho," and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, whose pseudonyms include "Gentil Alvis Patino" and "Chiguiro."

If convicted the defendants could face a minimum of 10 years in prison.

U.S. Indicts 50 Leaders Of Colombian Rebels In Cocaine Trafficking (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BOGOTÁ, Colombia, March 22 — A federal grand jury in Washington has indicted 50 commanders of Colombia's largest Marxist rebel group, accusing them of running an extensive cocaine trafficking cartel that protects its operations through widespread killings and intimidation, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Wednesday.

The indictment accuses the group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States.

"We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence," Mr. Gonzales said.

The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government. Three are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition, American officials said.

The indictment says rebel commanders ordered their fighters to shoot down crop dusters and to kidnap and kill American citizens, in an effort to dissuade policy makers in Washington from continuing to sponsor a fumigation campaign against the coca plant, from whose leaves cocaine is made.

Some charges in the document may be hard to prove, like those linking commanders to drug operations years ago when the rebel group was believed to be far less involved in the cocaine trade.

But high-ranking Colombian government officials interviewed in Bogotá on Wednesday welcomed the indictment, saying it demonstrated the Bush administration's long-term commitment to Mr. Uribe, the United States' closest ally in Latin America.

"We see this as a recognition of the clear relationship between terrorism and narcotrafficking," said Defense Minister Camilo Ospina. "This shows that a big decision has been made to carry out the final battle against narcotrafficking and terrorism."

The indictment came just days after a coalition of pro-government parties took control of Colombia's 268-member Congress, a decisive political victory for Mr. Uribe. The victory strengthens his chances of winning re-election in May and gives him the political leverage to follow through with his agenda, including aggressively fighting the rebel group with Colombia's Washington-backed army.

With billions of dollars in backing from the United States, Colombia has sprayed much of its drug-crop acreage and carried out army offensives against the rebels. The chief of the national police, Jorge Daniel Castro, said Wednesday in an interview that the group was "in a defensive position" as a result of the military offensives and the fumigation. "We're seeing that they don't have the capacity that they had before," he said.

But the group continues to control wide swaths of territory and has been increasingly active in neighboring Ecuador and Venezuela, where it operates camps for its fighters and traffics cocaine. The group also continues to attack civilians; last month, rebel commandos burst into a meeting in the town of Rivera, southwest of Bogotá, and gunned down nine council members.

Cynthia Arnson, a Colombia expert who is director of the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, noted that it remained difficult to gauge whether the group had suffered big setbacks or had voluntarily withdrawn into the jungle. "This indictment," she said, "could be the beginning of an enormous political and diplomatic offensive to capitalize on whatever military momentum has been achieved."

Mr. Gonzales did not elaborate on what American officials would do to go after individual commanders but said that there were "effective options" and "they all remain on the table." The State Department said it would provide rewards of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrests of members of the rebel group's governing seven-member secretariat.

The leader of the group is Pedro Antonio Marín — better known by his nom de guerre, Manuel Marulanda — a former chicken farmer who first took up arms in the 1950's during Colombia's internecine political conflict of that era. He later helped found the rebel group, turning a peasant army into the richest, best-equipped Marxist insurgency in Latin America.

The indictment offers a look at how the group went from leveling taxes on farmers who grew coca to operating clandestine airstrips and helping to build an international cocaine distribution network. It also details the brutality used by the group to enforce its dominance of the drug trade. It says commanders ordered the killing of farmworkers who did not comply with the group's rules, in some cases dismembering them or filling their corpses with rocks and sinking them in rivers.

Colombian Rebels Face Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

Fifty leaders of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) have been named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine, half the world's illicit supply, in the largest U.S. drug-trafficking case.

"From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans," said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) chief Karen P. Tandy. "Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Mrs. Tandy said the indictment "addresses and decimates the entire leadership of the FARC."

The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, "strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government.

FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Mr. Gonzales said. "For years, this group has controlled the production and distribution of massive amounts of cocaine that ends up in America's communities. Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice."

Three of the charged FARC leaders -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. will seek their extradition to face trial in the United States. More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, and two accused FARC leaders are awaiting trial in Washington.

Andres Pastrana, Colombia's ambassador to the U.S., said the indictment was based on evidence gathered by American officials who worked "in very close collaboration with Colombian authorities."

"Colombia is one of the main victims of the global war on drugs. Thousands of innocent citizens, journalists, judges, politicians, soldiers and police officers have given their lives to this cause," said Mr. Pastrana, a former Colombian president who was kidnapped by the Medellin drug cartel during his 1988 race for Bogota mayor and later rescued by police. "Colombia has been and remains deeply committed to defeating the drug trade."

FARC has about 17,000 members and controls wide areas of the country, so rounding up the other 47 indicted leaders will be a difficult task. The State Department announced rewards yesterday of $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the leaders still at large, all members of FARC's governing council.

In addition to half the world's supply of cocaine, FARC was responsible for more than 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States every year, Mrs. Tandy said, adding that the organization controlled every aspect of its production and distribution, even setting the prices paid to Colombian farmers for coca paste, the raw material used to produce cocaine.

According to the indictment, the FARC leaders used terrorism and violence to further their cocaine-trafficking activities, ordering the deaths of Colombian farmers who sold coca paste to non-FARC buyers. It said the farmers who violated FARC rules were shot, stabbed or dismembered alive, their bodies cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers.

The indictment also said the FARC leaders also ordered the kidnap and killing of Americans to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the organization's cocaine-trafficking activities. It also said the FARC leaders authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law-enforcement officers conducting investigations into FARC's narcotics activities.

Three U.S. contractors are among 60 hostages being held by FARC.

The indictment said:

•Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," was a member of the FARC's leadership council and commander of its 24th Front unit. He is accused of directing the purchase of cocaine paste and transmitting billions of Colombian pesos in cocaine profits to FARC officials, and the indictment said he ordered the slayings of eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive.

•Cuevas Cabrera, who also was called "Mincho," was a FARC associate who managed cocaine laboratories for the organization's 14th Front unit, where he supervised the production and distribution of hundreds of thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He has been in custody since 2004.

•Martinez Vega, also known as "Chiguiro," was a FARC associate who provided large quantities of arms and ammunition to the organization in exchange for thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He was arrested on drug charges in Venezuela and turned over to Colombian authorities in early 2005.

U.S. Indicts Leaders Of Colombian Guerrillas On Trafficking Charges (KRT)

By Pablo Bachelet And Steven Dudley

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia - In an unprecedented legal move, the U.S. government Wednesday indicted the entire top leadership and 43 other commanders of Colombia's FARC guerrillas on charges of running a $25 billion drug trafficking network responsible for 60 percent of the cocaine on U.S. streets.

Accused in the indictment were Pedro Antonio Marin, aka Manuel ``Sureshot" Marulanda, legendary leader of Latin America's largest and oldest leftist guerrilla organization, and all six other members of its ruling secretariat.

The indictment is likely to make it easier for the U.S. Congress to continue funding for Plan Colombia, a multibillion dollar effort to combat drug trafficking, and military aid for the conservative government of President Alvaro Uribe, one of the strongest U.S. allies in the region.

But analysts said it may not have much impact on an estimated 18,000-strong guerrilla force whose leaders are deeply entrenched in the far reaches of a country the size of France, flush with drug money and showing signs lately of recovering from a three-year-old military offensive.

If captured, however, the FARC leaders would face possible extradition to the United States to be tried on charges that could keep them in prison in the U.S. for decades.

The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, has long been known to collect payments from coca farmers and drug traffickers, as well as businessmen, cattle ranchers and shop owners, to finance its four-decades-old insurgency.

But the indictment unveiled by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington alleges that the FARC has taken its involvement in the drug trade significantly further in recent years, earning as much as $25 billion.

``The FARC has evolved into the world's largest supplier of cocaine and cocaine paste," a semi-processed product that must be refined into cocaine, the indictment alleges.

``This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," Gonzales said.

The indictment seemed to signal a major shift in the United States' view of the guerrillas. While previous statements by U.S. officials linked specific FARC members to drug trafficking, the new charges implicate the entire FARC command structure in an organized cartel and is the first to mention Marulanda and his fellow top commanders as the masterminds.

In addition to the secretariat members, the indictment names 20 members of the FARC's military ``high command" and numerous lower-ranking commanders. In all, 50 people were indicted, including Pedro Aldana, who is believed to have died some time back. Only three are already jailed in Colombia. Two other FARC members not mentioned in the indictment have already been extradited to face drug and other charges in Washington.

U.S. officials said they would offer up to $5 million for information leading to the capture of the higher ranking rebels and $2.5 million for 17 others.

Andres Pastrana, former president of Colombia and now its ambassador in Washington, said his country would work with U.S. and other officials ``to bring justice to individuals and groups who are proven to be involved in drug trafficking."

The State Department includes the FARC in its list of terrorist organizations because of some of its tactics, but Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said drug trafficking was its economic lifeline.

``Make no mistake; they're not just ordinary drug traffickers," Tandy said. ``To call them that would be something akin to calling Al Capone a tax cheat."

The 42-page indictment includes a description of the FARC's makeup, command structure and a detailed history of its alleged involvement in the cocaine trade.

It states that FARC developed in the 1990s into a ``broker" between coca farmers and cocaine distributors. Eventually, it declared itself the sole buyer of semi-processed coca paste and developed its own distribution network. Farmers and buyers who did not follow FARC orders were sometimes executed, including some who were ``dismembered alive."

The sweeping allegations make no mention of the FARC's claims to be fighting to spread education, wealth and health to the one half of Colombia's 45 million people that lives below the poverty line, referring to it solely as a drug trafficking network.

But not all analysts agree with the U.S. assessment of its massive role in drug trafficking.

While the FARC is undoubtedly heavily involved in drug trafficking, including distribution networks through countries like Venezuela and Mexico, criminal cartels still control the vast majority of drug routes leading into the United States and Europe, analysts said.

``This seems more like the work of Uribe lobbyists than that of an investigation," said Ricardo Vargas, head of the Colombian drug think-tank Andean Action and a longtime FARC-watcher.

Analysts also speculated that Washington and Bogota may be trying to use the threat of extradition to coerce a peace settlement with the FARC, something they did successfully with right-wing paramilitary groups. Several paramilitary leaders indicted for drug trafficking in the United States face extradition if they do not comply with a peace accord now under negotiation with the Uribe government.

But the powerful FARC, which has been fighting the government for the past 42 years, may not heel to such pressures.

``We should not be confused, that because extradition worked with the paramilitaries, it will work with the FARC," said Sergio Jaramillo, director of the think tank Ideas For Peace. ``It's a double-edged sword. If one is not careful, one may end up making a peace agreement in Colombia impossible."

Colombian Rebels Charged In U.S. With Cocaine Trade (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Bill Arthur

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- A federal grand jury indicted 50 members of a Colombian rebel group on charges of importing more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the U.S. and other countries, the Justice Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0020218

Three of the 50 members of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, known as FARC, are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. is seeking their extradition, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. The others are ``at large, hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia surrounded by heavily armed FARC loyalists," he said.

The Justice Department calls FARC, the largest guerrilla group in Colombia, a ``narco-terrorist" group and views it as one of the ``highest priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington.

FARC engages in kidnapping, murder and other crimes, including threats against U.S. agents, to continue its hold on cocaine traffic, the Justice Department said.

According to the indictment handed up March 1 and unsealed today, the group supplies more than half of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the U.S. Today's case is ``the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history," Gonzales said.

The U.S. State Department is offering rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the FARC leaders charged in the indictment.

``This the beginning of the process," Gonzales said when asked the chances of capturing the 47 at-large FARC members. ``That's all I can say about that."

Gonzales didn't rule out the use of U.S. troops in the battle against FARC.

``We consider all options, all effective options,' he said. ``They all remain on the table."

U.S. Indicts 50 Colombians It Calls 'narcoterrorists' (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, March 23, 2006

FARC rebels accused of exporting $25 billion worth of cocaine

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Fifty leaders of the Colombian rebel group FARC, described as "narcoterrorists" by U.S. authorities, have been indicted in Washington for allegedly exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine to the U.S. and other countries, Justice Department officials announced Wednesday.

Among other allegations, the indictment states that the charged FARC leaders set the price at which Colombian coca farmers could sell cocaine paste, a raw form of the drug that was transported to jungle laboratories and turned into the finished product.

Farmers who undercut the price or otherwise violated FARC's strict cocaine policies, which also dictated to which buyers the farmers could sell, were punished severely, according to the indictment.

"Colombian farmers who violated FARC rules were allegedly shot, stabbed, or dismembered alive, and the bodies of murdered farmers were cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers," according to a DEA news release.U.S. pushes for extradition

Three of the FARC leaders already are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition to face drug-trafficking charges, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Justice Department news conference in Washington.

They have been identified as Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, all of whom were arrested more than a year ago by Colombian or Venezuelan authorities.

Rodriguez Mendieta and Cuevas Cabrera are charged with overseeing the distribution of thousands of kilograms of cocaine and cocaine paste, while Martinez Vega is charged with trading arms for cocaine, said a Justice Department news release.

"Rodriguez Mendieta is also alleged to have ordered the murder of at least eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive, and to have plotted to retaliate against United States law enforcement officers who were conducting the narcotics-trafficking investigation that led to the charges announced today," according to the news release.

To date, about 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face drug-trafficking and other criminal charges.

FARC -- the Spanish acronym for Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- is responsible for supplying more than half of the world's illicit cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, authorities said.

"This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine," Gonzales said in a written statement. He said that Wednesday's announcement represented "the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history."

Expressing confidence that the indictment will mark "the beginning of the end" for the FARC drug-trafficking operation, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said, "This is the FARC's worst fear, facing American justice."

In addition to the one-count indictment, State Department officials Wednesday announced rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of dozens of FARC leaders, including 24 of the 47 remaining indicted fugitives.U.S.: FARC a terror group

The FARC has been a high-level target of U.S. law enforcement officials in recent years, as its role in cocaine trafficking, extortions and kidnappings has escalated.

The DEA estimates the organization includes at least 12,000 armed combatants and an unknown number of supporters, mostly in rural Colombia. The group is largely funded by Americans, who pay $25 billion a year for 2,500 tons of Colombian cocaine, Tandy said.

"The FARC's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in American neighborhoods," Tandy said in a written statement. "To put that in perspective, that's approximately $3 billion more than the annual budget of the Department of Justice."

In Colombia, the FARC is second only to oil companies in terms of annual revenue, she said.

The leftist rebel group was formed in the 1960s and has been engaged in a long struggle to overthrow the U.S.-backed government in Bogota. The United States considers FARC a terrorist organization.

In addition to the 50 leaders whose indictments were announced Wednesday, another Colombian rebel leader known as Simon Trinidad is scheduled to go on trial in June in Washington. Extradited to the United States in 2004, he is charged in connection with the murder and kidnapping of U.S. citizens whose plane went down in FARC-controlled territory of Colombia.

Three U.S. citizens aboard that plane survived and have been in FARC custody for more than three years. The DEA said that since 1980, the FARC has kidnapped more than 100 individuals and murdered 13 U.S. citizens, including three U.S. missionaries who were executed in 1999.

Nayibe Rojas Valderama, a leading female FARC leader known in Colombia as Sonia, is also awaiting trial on drug-trafficking charges in Washington.

Agence France-Presse, March 23, 2006

The US government charged 50 leaders of Colombia's main left-wing rebel group with smuggling "devastating amounts" of cocaine into the United States and reaping billions of dollars from global trafficking.

"This is the largest narcotics trafficking indictment ever filed in US history and fuels our hope to reduce narco violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters here in announcing the charges.

The charges said the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) is behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine trafficked into the United States.

Gonzales said the US government will seek the immediate extradition of three of the charged FARC leaders who are currently in custody in Colombia.

He said the remaining 47 are at large, "hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia," and he announced a reward program for information leading to their capture.

"This indictment is a product of unprecedented cooperation between our nations," Gonzales said, praising the work of Colombian law enforcement agents as well as officials from the US Drug Enforcement Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and US immigration and customs agents.

"The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," he said.

Gonzales said that in addition to importing more than 25 billion dollars' worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries, the FARC has also shot, stabbed or dismembered alive farmers who did not comply with the group, and kidnapped and murdered Colombian and US nationals.

The group is also accused of shooting down fumigation planes.

50 Farc Leaders On Cocaine Charges (FT)

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Fifty leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (Farc), the Colombian rebel group, have been indicted on charges of importing$25bn worth of cocaine into the US since 1985, theUS Department of Justice announced yesterday.

"This is the largest drug trafficking indictment in US history," said Alberto Gonzales, US attorney-general.

Three of the leaders named by the federal grand jury in Washington are in custody in Colombia and await extradition to theUS.

The one-count indictment offers more than $75min rewards for information that leads to the capture of the remaining top members of the organisation. Jenny Johnson, Washington

US Indicts Colombian Rebel Leaders (VOA)

Voice of America, March 23, 2006

The United States is charging 50 members of Colombia's largest rebel group with using the proceeds from the sale of $25 billion worth of cocaine to finance their anti-government operations at home.

Alberto Gonzales speaks to media about indictment against FARC members, March 22, 2006 The indictment targets 50 members of Colombia's main leftist rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC.

The FARC has been fighting the Colombian government for more than 40 years and has been branded a terrorist group by the United States and the European Union.

The indictment was made public in a federal court in Washington and announced at a news conference by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," Gonzales said.

According to the indictment, the FARC provides more than half of the world's cocaine and is responsible for 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States.

U.S. officials allege that the group uses the proceeds from $25 billion worth of drug sales around the world to buy weapons in its fight against the Colombian government.

"We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence. For instance, the indictment alleges that farmers who did not comply with FARC rules were shot, stabbed and even dismembered alive," Gonzales said.

Gonzales says three FARC members are in custody in Colombia and that the United States will seek their extradition. He says the other 47 remain at large, probably in FARC jungle strongholds inside Colombia. E-mail This Article

50 Indicted In Alleged Cocaine Operation (WT/UPI)

Fifty leaders of a Colombian rebel group have been indicted for allegedly exporting $25 billion worth of cocaine to the United States and other countries.

The U.S. Justice Department announcement of the indictments in Washington, D.C., labeled the suspects as "narcoterrorists," CNN reported Wednesday.

Three of those charged were already in custody in Colombia, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, and the United States will seek their extradition to face drug trafficking charges.

The three suspects in custody -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- were arrested more than a year ago, CNN said.

Justice Department officials said Wednesday that FARC -- the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- is responsible for supplying more than half of the world's illicit cocaine, and more than 60 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States.

U.S. State Department officials announced rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of dozens of FARC leaders, including 24 of the 47 remaining fugitives named in the indictment.

US Charges Colombia Rebel Leaders (BBC)

BBC, March 23, 2006

Only three of the 50 indicted are in custody in the US Fifty leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group, Farc, have been charged in the US with exporting $25bn (£14bn) of cocaine around the world.

The indictment in Washington includes Farc founder Pedro Antonio Marin - who is not one of three members of the group being held in custody in the US.

The US regards the Farc as a terrorist group, and says it uses cocaine money to buy weapons for its insurgency.

The Farc has been fighting Colombia's government for more than four decades.

Rewards

The BBC's Jeremy McDermott in Colombia says the indictment is part of a campaign by the US and Colombian governments to paint Farc (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) as nothing more than a drugs trafficking cartel and terrorist organisation.

But the Farc, our correspondent says, present themselves as an insurgent movement fighting against what they call the puppet and fascist regime of President Alvaro Uribe.

The indictment alleges the Farc leaders ordered the kidnapping and killing of US citizens and the killing of Colombian farmers who resisted the group.

It says the Farc supplies more than half the world's cocaine.

Drug Enforcement Agency chief Karen Tandy said: "The Farc's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in America's neighbourhoods."

The US state department has put up $75m in rewards for information leading to the capture of 24 of the named Farc leaders.

Hundreds of Colombians have previously been extradited to the US to face charges.

Our correspondent says the US announcement will only harden rebel animosity towards the US and towards Mr Uribe, whom the rebels accuse of taking orders from the White House.

State Seeks Dismissal Of San Diego's Medical Marijuana Suit (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (AP) --The state has filed a motion seeking to dismiss a San Diego County lawsuit that challenges a decade-old law permitting in California the use of marijuana for medical purposes.

The attorney general's office filed the court documents Tuesday. In them, the state contends county officials simply "disliked" the law and that there was no legal reason for the court to consider the lawsuit.

In December, county supervisors sued the state of California and its director of health services in federal court, saying federal law that prohibits marijuana use trumps the state law.

California approved the use of marijuana for medical purposes with the passage of Proposition 215, which won 55 percent of votes cast in 1996.

San Diego is the only California county that has ignored a state requirement that counties issue identification cards to registered medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards.

County attorneys switched the lawsuit from federal to state court last month to avoid bringing the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in recent rulings sided with medical marijuana supporters.

State Asks Court To Toss SD County Medical Marijuana Suit (NCT)

By By: GIG CONAUGHTON, Staff Writer

North County Times, March 23, 2006

NORTH COUNTY ---- State officials formally asked judges to throw out San Diego County's precedent-setting lawsuit seeking to overturn California's 10-year-old medical marijuana law, saying that the only controversy over the law was in the minds of county supervisors.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office argued in motions filed Tuesday in Superior Court that San Diego County supervisors simply "disliked" California's voter-approved "Compassionate Use Act," and that there was no legal reason for the courts to entertain their lawsuit.

Nathan Barankin, spokesman for Lockyer, said that the state's position was essentially that the county's lawsuit was simply a request for the courts to rule on the legality of California's law, and involved no actual parties in dispute.

"Because courts can only hear cases that involve real factual disputes between opposing parties, and because there is no actual dispute here, such a request for an advisory opinion requires dismissal of the charges," Barankin said.

He said the courts could rule on the state's motion in May.

The county of San Diego, in a move that angered local medical marijuana patients and marijuana advocacy groups, filed a lawsuit in December in federal court seeking to overturn the Compassionate Use Act, which allows the use of medicinal marijuana.

The supervisors ---- who have collectively opposed the law since it was placed on the 1996 ballot ---- argue that it should be "pre-empted" by federal law, which says that all marijuana use is illegal and that the drug has no medicinal value.

San Diego County lawyers abruptly switched the lawsuit from federal to state court in February, as a tactical move in the hopes of avoiding the U.S. Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which has been more friendly to marijuana supporters than to opponents in recent rulings.

County officials have been waiting for the state's response ever since, but did not return calls Tuesday.

However, county Counsel John Sansone said Monday that he would not be surprised if the state asked for a "demurrer," a motion to throw out the county's lawsuit.

San Diego County officials and marijuana advocacy groups say the lawsuit is precedent-setting because it marks the first time a county has sued to overturn any of the medical marijuana laws approved by voters in 11 states.

Barankin, meanwhile, said Tuesday that the attorney general's office also filed a motion Tuesday asking the courts to throw out San Bernardino County's medical marijuana challenge.

San Bernardino supervisors, in a show of support for San Diego County, filed their own lawsuit shortly after San Diego County's action.

San Diego County's board has largely ignored California's medical marijuana law since it was passed in 1996, and was actually chastised by its own grand jury in 2005 for doing "nothing" to help implement the law.

However, late last year, the state ordered counties to create an identification card and registration program to help medical marijuana patients ---- and law enforcement officials ---- by clearly identifying who could use the drug legally under state law.

But, by a 3-2 vote, with Supervisors Greg Cox and Ron Roberts opposed, the board voted in December to defy the state's orders.

Shortly after that, the board voted 4-0, with Roberts absent, to actually sue to try to overturn the Compassionate Use Act itself, and named the state Department of Health Services and department Director Sandra Shewry as defendants.

But the state's motion Tuesday argued that the county artificially created an issue for the courts to review the Compassionate Use Act.

"San Diego's political leadership cannot create a ripe controversy by threatening to disobey the law," the motion stated.

Clinton Cites Bible To Attack Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton invoked the Bible yesterday to criticize a stringent border security measure that, among other things, would make it a federal crime to offer aid to illegal immigrants.

"It is hard to believe that a Republican leadership that is constantly talking about values and about faith would put forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation," she said of the measure, which was passed by the House of Representatives in December and mirrored a companion Senate bill introduced last week by Senator Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican and the majority leader.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she said. "We need to sound the alarm about what is being done in the Congress."

Mrs. Clinton, who is running for re-election this year and is leading in polls for the Democratic presidential nomination, spoke at a news conference in Manhattan with more than 30 immigrant leaders after meeting with them privately.

The meeting took place in an atmosphere of mounting urgency, as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops called on its flock to oppose the measure, and tens of thousands of immigrants around the country stepped up a series of protest rallies in anticipation of a Senate vote on competing immigration bills next week.

Mr. Frist's bill, like the House measure, would make it a crime to be in the United States without proper papers and would add guards and fencing along the Mexican border, and speed deportation.

Some versions, including one proposed by Senator Arlen Spector of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, would expand the definition of alien smuggling to include help to illegal immigrants already here.

Mr. Frist has set a Monday deadline for the Senate Judiciary Committee to complete its own, broader version of immigration legislation, which could include "a path to earned citizenship" for illegal residents who qualify, and a guest worker program for foreigners, as well as new enforcement provisions. But even if a committee bill emerges in time, unless a majority of the committee's Republicans vote for it, he has vowed that he will not let it reach the Senate floor. Instead, Mr. Frist, who is also considered a 2008 presidential contender, said he would seek a vote on his bill, without debate.

Mrs. Clinton had been criticized by some immigrant activists for saying little about the issue until March 8, and then speaking at an Irish-only rally, rather than at a forum more representative of immigrants. But yesterday all seemed forgiven.

Three elected officials, all Democrats — Representatives José E. Serrano and Nydia Velásquez, and City Council member John C. Liu — shared the lectern to denounce the criminal penalties in the Congressional proposals.

Mrs. Clinton said she and New York's other senator, Charles E. Schumer, were trying to build momentum toward a bipartisan bill that would include a legalization provision that many Republicans would support in defiance of Mr. Frist. But any form of legalization is anathema to supporters of the House measure, co-sponsored by two Republican representatives, Peter King of Long Island, and F. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin.

Mrs. Clinton said, "We want the outcome to be that they're on the wrong side of politics as well as on the wrong side of history and American values."

Mr. King has accused church leaders of "committing the sin of hypocrisy" in their campaign to sway Congress and Catholic voters, and of giving illegal immigrants an incentive to cross the border.

Asked about the political price that could be paid by politicians who defy the groundswell of anger in border areas where illegal immigration has meant mounting costs for health care, education and law enforcement, Mrs. Clinton shot back that not only border areas were affected, but also many communities in New York, especially on Long Island and in Westchester County.

"I have a lot of sympathy," she said, emphasizing her support for an overhaul that includes federal assistance to local communities, as well as better enforcement. "That's why we need comprehensive immigration reform. Taking a harsh position is not going to solve the problem."

GOP WOULD HAVE BOOTED JESUS: HILL (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman

DOJ_NMG_0020224

The New York Post, March 23, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton ratcheted up her talk about religion yesterday - saying a GOP-sponsored bill making it a felony to be in the United States illegally would have "criminalized" Jesus.

Clinton, who's considered the Democratic front-runner for the 2008 White House race, made the comments at a hastily scheduled news conference about the House-passed bill aimed at illegal immigrants.

Clinton blasted Republican leadership, which "is constantly talking about values and about faith [but put] forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation."

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scriptures," she added.

"Because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

The House bill passed last December.

Clinton said, "Many of us think it's a political bill" - but didn't back any of the competing Senate versions.

"We want the outcome to be that [backers of the House bill are] on the wrong side of the politics, as well as the wrong side of history and American values," she said.

She added that she would support a bill that includes stronger border controls.

She also called for employers who exploit illegal immigrants to face penalties.

In addition, she wants to set up a system to allow illegal immigrants currently living in this country to earn their citizenship.

Reid Threatens Filibuster As Immigration Showdown Looms (AP)

By Ellito Spagat

The AP, March 22, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- As the Senate prepares to tackle the most sweeping immigration reforms in years, a top Democrat vowed Wednesday to do everything in his power, including filibuster, to thwart Majority Leader Bill Frist's proposed overhaul.

Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he would "use every procedural means at my disposal" to prevent Frist from bypassing the Judiciary Committee. Frist, R-Tenn., has made clear the Senate will take up his proposal next week if the 18-member committee fails to complete a broader bill.

"If Leader Frist brings a bill to the floor that does not have the approval of the Judiciary Committee, it will not get out of the Senate," Reid told reporters at the San Ysidro border crossing, a few steps from Tijuana, Mexico.

Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Frist, did not immediately respond to a call Wednesday evening.

Reid said the overhaul must include heightened border enforcement, a "guest worker" program and a "path to citizenship" for the estimated 11 million people in the United States illegally. He called legislation by Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and John McCain, R-Ariz., a "good place to start."

President Bush, in a State of the Union address two years ago, urged Congress to create a worker program under which participants could gain legal status for a specific time and then be required to return home. It would not provide an automatic path to citizenship.

Frist, who has presidential ambitions for 2008, unveiled a bill last week that sidesteps the question of temporary work permits. It would tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas.

The House passed a bill in December that makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to be in the United States, imposes new penalties on employers who hire them and erects fencing along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border. It has no temporary worker program.

Amid the looming showdown, Reid met Wednesday with hotel workers at the Mandalay Bay Resort & Casino in Las Vegas in an effort to highlight contributions that immigrants make to the economy. He flew to San Diego for a helicopter tour and briefing by Border Patrol officials.

He planned to visit the longest cross-border tunnel discovered along the U.S.-Mexico border -- a 2,400-foot secret passage that linked warehouses in San Diego and Tijuana. Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana inside the tunnel in January.

DOJ_NMG_0020225

Reid also was scheduled to meet with California business, labor, religious and local government leaders to discuss immigration.

Who Will Work The Farms? (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

KINSTON, N.C. — In the plainspoken manner common to her fellow farmers, Faylene Whitaker has a message for members of Congress struggling to overhaul the nation's immigration law.

"We would rather use legal workers," said Ms. Whitaker, who grows tobacco, tomatoes and other crops on the 500-acre farm she and her husband own in the Piedmont region of North Carolina. But "if we don't get a reasonable guest worker program we are going to hire illegals."

Ms. Whitaker knows what she is talking about. Indeed, she is one of the few farmers in the United States to employ legal immigrant guest workers. Others are not exactly lining up to join the program.

The experience of farmers like Ms. Whitaker underscores why most experts say that simply tightening the border with Mexico will not work.

To curb illegal immigration, they say, the government needs both carrots and sticks: legal work channels for future immigrants and the current population of workers unlawfully in the country along with a much more effective bar against hiring illegal labor.

"The punch line is, guest workers are going to cost you more money," said Phil Martin, professor of agricultural and resource economics at the University of California, Davis. For a guest worker program to work, he added, "the prerequisite is you have to have illegal immigration under control."

When immigration rules were last overhauled in 1986 — legalizing more than three million unlawful immigrants and supposedly banning the employment of illegal workers in the future — Congress allowed for a vast seasonal guest worker plan. It was intended to ensure that farmers could continue to get the cheaper foreign labor they wanted, but in a legally acceptable way.

It has not worked out. Despite expectations that growers would flock to the guest worker program, named H-2A, it never took off: fewer than 25,000 farm workers came to the United States on temporary guest worker visas in 2004, the last year with figures available.

It is not as if growers do not need the foreign labor: according to farmers' own estimates, about 70 percent of the 1.2 million hired workers tilling fields and picking crops are illegal immigrants.

What went wrong? Despite the ostensible sanctions against businesses that hire illegal workers, few employers were ever punished. So rather than go through the more complex process of importing temporary workers legally, most chose the cheaper and generally risk-free route of hiring illegal migrants who presented themselves with forged papers.

Congress is once again debating how to cut off illegal immigration but this time it has to deal with as many as 11 million unlawful immigrants in the United States.

Some lawmakers are talking about erecting a high wall along the entire 2,000-mile border separating the United States from Mexico. Others are pushing to declare all immigrants here illegally felons who would never be allowed to take up legal residence in the United States.

But as long as the government looks the other way while employers are allowed to fill their demands for cheap labor from a deep pool of foreigners desperate to find work, hundreds of thousands more are expected to manage one way or another to cross the border illegally every year in search of jobs.

"If there is a need for workers, they will find a way in, if you don't have a method for satisfying the legitimate needs of American employers," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican from Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which has been trying to hammer out a new immigration bill to present to the full Senate as early as next Monday.

But this time, Mr. Specter added, any new law must contain tougher sanctions against an employer who "knowingly hires someone that is not here legally."

DOJ_NMG_0020226

Like most employers of cheap labor, North Carolina's growers say they need immigrant workers to stay afloat. "We need a guest worker program because somebody's got to work," said Kendall Hill, who grows tobacco, sweet potatoes and other crops on 4,000 acres here in Kinston.

He gazes across the flat dirt of his farm toward the sheds that will house up to 120 immigrant H-2A workers at the peak of the sweet potato harvest in September. "If not for Mexican workers," he adds, "this country would be in chaos."

As for illegal immigrants, many say that they would welcome a plan that allowed them to work legally in the United States and return to their families in Mexico every year.

Arturo Martínez Mendoza, an illegal immigrant harvesting mustard for $1.25 a box on a farm near Faison, said he had even tried to get into the program. "It was full," he said, "so I came in as a wetback."

José Aharón Rivera Medrano, an H-2A worker from Mexico's northern state of Durango, has worked on Mr. Hill's farm 10 months each year for the last 11 years. He is happy about the higher wages of $500 to $600 a week he receives under the guest worker program than if he were working illegally, but the most important thing, he said, "is that you don't risk your life crossing the border."

According to Leticia Zavala, southern organizing director for the union known as the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, there is a waiting list of 17,000 Mexican workers who have come to North Carolina in the past and would like to return.

But the guest worker program has failed to bridge the gap between the farmers and the workers. Farmers complain that the program is simply too expensive. It sets a floor for pay — a regional average of the wages in several farm occupations — that will rise this year to $8.51 an hour from $8.24 in 2005. Farmers must also house the workers and pay workers' compensation.

Moreover, after a lawsuit spearheaded by the union against North Carolina growers, a state court ordered farmers to pay all recruitment costs, including the H-2A visa, recruiters' fees and round-trip transportation from home — adding up to some $900 a worker.

"I've been 10 years on the program but I'm reaching the point of diminishing returns," said Sam Crews, who employs six guest workers on his North Carolina tobacco farm near the border with Virginia.

The guest worker plan has some advantages for growers: legal workers are more dependable than illegal ones, they say. And it relieves them of any lingering fears that their harvest might be in jeopardy if immigration authorities conduct raids that disrupt the supply of illegal workers.

Yet growers have so many other complaints about the program that many are simply dropping out. To be entitled to use guest workers, they must certify to the Labor Department that they cannot find American workers for the job, a process that they say is overly onerous.

And once non-H-2A immigrant workers are brought out of the shadows, farmers who employ legal guest workers often find themselves being sued over working conditions by immigrants' rights groups and other foes of the program.

Bruce Goldstein, executive director of the Farm Workers Justice Fund in Washington, which has brought lawsuits against farmers, says there are good reasons for such lawsuits.

"Farmers under the H-2A program are being sued when they violate the law," Mr. Goldstein said. "They frequently violate the law. And employers have tremendous bargaining power over workers who are too fearful to challenge unfair or illegal conduct."

For many farmers, then, illegal immigrants simply provide a cheaper alternative that involves far less bother than the guest worker program. North Carolina farmers can harvest their crops paying $6 to $6.50 an hour — no workers comp, no recruitment fees — to "green card" workers or "otherwise documented" workers. Those are euphemisms for immigrants unlawfully in the United States, who typically show up with a fake green card to get a job.

"Workers provide us with ID and Social Security cards to keep me in compliance and keep them in compliance, but I have no clue of their provenance," said one Wilson County tobacco, cotton and sweet potato farmer who spoke only on condition of anonymity to avoid exposing his work force to scrutiny from the authorities.

Farmers in North Carolina still employ more legal guest workers than in any other state, but their numbers are dwindling. At their peak in 2000, over 1,000 farmers in the growers' association employed 10,000 guest workers. This year, about 500 farmers are left, and they will import only about 5,000 workers.

Some of those missing farmers were driven out by increased competition in the global tobacco market. Others have simply switched to illegal immigrant workers. And if things do not change, many farmers say, the system may well disappear altogether.

"When the H-2A program prices itself out, I'm not growing anything else," said Lee Whicker, who employs a dozen guest workers on his tobacco farm near Fayetteville. "I'm done with it."

Investigation Finds Violations Of U.S. Immigration Laws (MURRAYLT)

By KRISTIN TAYLOR, Staff Writer

Murray (KY) Ledger & Times, March 23, 2006

An investigation last month into an indentured servitude complaint at Murray's Asian Buffet proved the allegation false, but five people were taken into custody for immigration violations.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Gail Montenegro said interviews conducted Feb. 8 at the Murray restaurant revealed no indication of human trafficking of indentured servitude. The federal investigators were responding to a complaint that workers were being held against their will.

A manager at Asian Buffet was not available for comment before press time today.

Following the investigation, five people were taken into custody for immigration violations. Montenegro said that included one Mexican juvenile female, three Mexican adult males and one Chinese female.

Montenegro didn't have the individuals' names because the ICE agent who worked on the case was traveling. Even so, she said the agency doesn't usually release names until people have been deported or if their identity is in the public's interest for safety reasons.

&#8220I don't know what happened to them," she said in a telephone interview from her Chicago office. &#8220They were probably served with some paperwork and had or have a hearing before a judge."

IRS Sues Local Tax Preparers (CO)

By Mike Drummond

The Charlotte Observer, March 23, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department today filed lawsuits to stop two area tax preparers from preparing returns.

The government said Jerry Adams and Demetria Adams prepared more than 1,600 tax returns in 2004 and 2005 at First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby.

In the suits filed in federal court in Charlotte, the government alleges the two understated wages and overstated credits for the past two years. The "excessive refunds" cost the U.S. Treasury more than $3.8 million, the lawsuits claim.

The government wants the court to order the pair to turn over names, addresses and Social Security numbers of customers.

Today's action comes within weeks of the April 17 tax filing deadline, and is part of the government's crackdown on "corrupt tax preparers." Since 2001, the Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax return preparers and promoters.

KPMG Revises Settlement On Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The accounting firm KPMG said yesterday that it had reached a revised settlement with tax shelter investors, but warned that the reduced agreement could still fall apart.

DOJ_NMG_0020228

The previous $195 million deal, brokered last September through Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the prominent class-action law firm, collapsed in recent months when nearly one in four eligible investors chose not to take part, saying that it did not offer them enough compensation.

Under the complex terms of the revised settlement, some 60 investors who chose not to join can come back in. But investors who are currently in the deal can now elect not to participate.

KPMG did not place any numbers on the revised proposal. But given the number of opt-outs in the original deal, the final amount available is unlikely to exceed $155 million, and may drop to $125 million or lower, according to lawyers who read its proposed terms.

"There's going to be drastic reduction in the amount of money that is ultimately paid out," said Michael J. Avenatti, a lawyer in Santa Monica, Calif., who represents wealthy investors who opposed the original deal. Mr. Avenatti, who also represents an informal group of lawyers who oppose the deal, declined to say whether he would advise clients to participate in the new deal.

Lawyers for KPMG filed papers yesterday in the United States District Court in Newark, asking a federal judge to set a hearing in late May to approve the revised deal.

The reduced settlement is a setback for Milberg Weiss. The law firm had stood to earn $30 million from the original settlement, but will now reduce its fee by 25 percent of the value of the claims by opt-outs.

KPMG is struggling to put its tax shelter woes behind it as aggrieved investors in the shelters are now seeking in separate compensation greater than what the settlement offers. In August, the firm reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement with federal prosecutors over certain questionable shelters.

The civil class-action settlement is intended to return to investors the fees that they paid both to KPMG and to the law firm of Sidley Austin Brown & Wood for four shelters known as Flip, Opis, Blips and SOS. The law firm, which provided legal opinions blessing the shelters as legitimate — when they were not, in the eyes of the Internal Revenue Service — will still pay about 20 percent of the final settlement's costs.

Under the new deal's complicated formula, the original $195 million will be reduced by 65 percent of the total claims from investors who choose not to participate. KPMG will determine the size of those claims.

A KPMG spokesman said yesterday that "this amended stipulation allows us to continue pursuing a fair and reasonable settlement of this matter."

But Edmundo O. Ramirez, a lawyer in McAllen, Tex., said yesterday that "the very complicated formula is going to put a lot of lawyers off." Mr. Ramirez has negotiated sizable private settlements in recent years with KPMG on behalf of former investors in tax shelters.

The 60 or so opt-outs in the original settlement typically have claims far higher than the average $750,000 available to each investor under the terms of the old settlement. Mr. Avenatti said that some former clients had paid tens of millions of dollars to KPMG and Sidley Austin Brown & Wood for shelters that did not pass muster with the I.R.S. and that the new deal was not going to significantly change the amount of money they could recuperate.

Outside Audit KPMG Revises Terms Of Payout In Big Tax-Shelter Settlement (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Accounting giant KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin LLP took a fresh stab at settling a class-action lawsuit related to the sale of questionable tax shelters.

The firms last month shelved a previous version of the settlement, which called for a $195 million payout to those who had bought the tax shelters, because too many people had opted out of the agreement.

Under the new version of the settlement, filed yesterday in federal court in New Jersey, KPMG and Sidley Austin would pay no more than, but most likely far less than, the $195 million originally envisaged, as well as up to $30 million in legal fees.

KPMG, which sold the questionable tax shelters, will bear the brunt of this cost, while Chicago-based Sidley Austin, which gave legal advice on the shelters, will pay about 20%.

The revised settlement terms would reduce the amount the firms will pay based on the number of plaintiffs who opt out. The amounts to be received by individuals won't necessarily decline because of this reduction. They would depend on the specific claims of each individual investor.

In a statement, a KPMG spokesman said, "The amendment of the original settlement allows us to continue pursuing a fair and reasonable settlement of this matter."

Melvin Weiss, senior and founding partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is lead counsel for the class-action plaintiffs, said that individuals who think they can get a better deal on their own can "go try. I think quite frankly that this is a very fair settlement from a lot of angles."

A spokeswoman for Sidley Austin declined to comment on the case.

If the new agreement successfully revives the proposed settlement, it could be another important step by a major accounting firm to put behind it troubles stemming from the go-go days of the late 1990s. The Big Four firms -- PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Deloitte & Touche LLP, KPMG and Ernst & Young LLP -- have spent millions to make amends for misdeeds from this period.

In KPMG's case, the price of putting the past behind it has been particularly high. The revised tax-shelter settlement follows a deferred-prosecution agreement the firm entered into last year with the Justice Department that called for KPMG to pay $465 million. Plus, the firm still faces damage claims from tax-shelter clients who opted out of the settlement and plan to pursue their cases individually.

Still, the potential settlement would bring closure to most of the tax-shelter issues KPMG faces and allow the firm to start moving beyond that chapter in its history.

The ultimate amount to be paid by KPMG and Sidley Austin under the new settlement agreement will be based on a formula that fluctuates depending on the number of tax-shelter buyers who agree to take part. Of the 284 who originally joined the class-action suit, 61 had opted out of the previous settlement, claiming it didn't pay enough.

The new settlement addresses some technical objections raised by some of those who opted out, but doesn't increase the amount on offer. That means some investors are likely to continue opting out.

"The proposed amount to be paid is entirely insufficient," said Michael Avenatti, a lawyer at Greene Broillet & Wheeler LLP who represents two investors who earlier opted out of the proposed settlement and who won't rejoin the agreement. Mr. Avenatti said his clients disagreed with the settlement because KPMG could expect to pay much more if it tried cases individually.

The attorney estimated that, under the proposed new payment formula, KPMG and Sidley Austin could shell out between $130 million to $150 million. He estimates the legal fees alone for trying the cases individually would amount to $500 million, and any punitive damages would cost the accounting and law firm more.

KPMG declined to comment on the projected payout.

In addition to possibly lowering the amount KPMG and Sidley Austin will pay, attorneys for the class-action plaintiffs could also receive less than the $30 million fee set aside under the original agreement.

Sale Of Data By Tax Preparers Draws Protests (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Consumer groups and privacy advocates are attacking proposed Internal Revenue Service rules that would spell out how tax-return preparers may legally sell financial information and other data from their clients' returns.

It has long been a principle of tax administration that no unauthorized person can get such information and that this assurance encourages taxpayers to file honest and complete returns. That notion is still a "fundamental underpinning" of IRS practice, Commissioner Mark W. Everson said yesterday in an interview.

The proposal, issued in December, was billed by the IRS as improving privacy protections for taxpayers, detailing the steps for getting permission to use the information. But it has focused attention on a little-known fact: Although law forbids the unauthorized disclosure of taxpayer information, return-preparers have long been allowed to disclose it, even sell it, if they obtain their clients' permission. Once the information goes out the door, taxpayers have little control over what happens to it.

The problem, said Evan Hendricks, publisher of the Privacy Times newsletter and other publications on privacy, is that "information about you is valuable in general, and the more detailed . . . it is, the more valuable it is."

"The real danger here is that there's going to be lot of incentive" for preparers to obtain the permission surreptitiously, such as by spreading a lot of papers in front of clients and asking them to sign them all, Hendricks said.

Jean Ann Fox of the Consumer Federation of America said that under the new rules, taxpayers could be duped into releasing their information and run the "risk of having that information in a database somewhere." That is "dangerous," she said, and "essentially turns tax-return information into a commodity for the highest bidder."

The IRS said in proposing the new rules that it was updating regulations dating from the 1970s that had not contemplated electronic transmission and other business practices, including the "offshoring" of some tax-preparation work by some firms.

"Our concern was [preparers] were interpreting the regulations in a way to say [clients] don't need to know that their returns are being prepared in India; it's all by the same firm," Everson said. "There's no doubt in my mind taxpayers are entitled to know if their return is being prepared overseas."

The rules also specify what a preparer must do to get permission from a taxpayer to disclose return information, up to and including the entire return. Specific language is required when a preparer requests permission and also in the form given to the taxpayer to sign.

There is also language for obtaining the taxpayer's permission to use the information within the preparer's company or group of related companies. And there is a procedure for obtaining a taxpayer's "signature" electronically.

The IRS proposal says that a preparer, for example, might ask permission to disclose that a client contributed to an IRA or that he would be getting a refund. Such information could be sold to a bank.

Several large tax-preparation companies have told the IRS that they oppose the new rules because they would make it too difficult for them to obtain permission to sell clients' information.

As the government's priorities have shifted to national security and revenue collection, there is more debate over how strict privacy rules should be.

The IRS recently awarded the first contracts to private debt collectors, a strategy authorized by Congress to increase collection of unpaid taxes. The debt collectors are barred from having tax information beyond what is owed, but critics say they worry about other information leaking out and possible abuse by collectors.

Everson said the private collectors "extend the reach" of the IRS and are subject to the same privacy rules as agency employees.

He said calls for increased access to IRS data in areas such as immigration enforcement or federal procurement should be debated carefully. While there might be public-policy benefits in one area, there might also be "a damaging impact" on tax collections, he said.

Last week, Everson himself "teed up" the issue of the different ways corporations report income to the IRS and financial regulators.

"We have two systems that are in conflict with each other -- book accounting and tax return preparation. Book accounting seeks to maximize earnings to drive up share value; tax return preparation seeks to drive down earnings, reduce taxes and maximize cash flow," he said.

"Clearly, tax compliance would be helped by great transparency," such as disclosure of corporate returns or parts of them , "but there are very real public-policy interests [in] continuing privacy. It comes down to weighting various factors," Everson said.

Beltway Windfall (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The next time some Washington potentate moans about the budget deficit, tell him not to blame the taxpayers. They're already doing their part to reduce it, as the latest Treasury figures on booming federal tax revenue show.

In the first five months of Fiscal 2006, through February, overall revenue continued to surge, growing at an overall rate of 10.3%, or an $81 billion increase from the year ago period, to $871 billion. That builds on the astonishing 15% , or $274 billion, revenue increase for all of 2005, which various fiscal wisemen assured us would fall off dramatically. Apparently not.

This year's double-digit increase is roughly triple the rate of inflation, reflecting strong gains in business profits and individual wages and bonuses -- both signs of a vibrant underlying economy. Corporate income taxes are up 30% so far this year, while individual income tax payments have climbed by 10.3% through February.

The bad news continues to be federal spending, with overall government outlays up 7.6%, or $76 billion, to $1.09 trillion. Defense spending is up 7.5%, but Medicare is growing at a 10.4% pace, which promises only to increase as the prescription drug benefit kicks in. As ever, the elephant in the budget is entitlement spending on seniors.

Economist Michael Darda points out that overall spending has risen at a 6.6% annual pace since 2001, or more than double the 3.1% average rate of increase between 1993 and 2000. If spending in this decade had merely stayed at the 1990s's pace, the budget would already be in surplus by $143 billion, according to Mr. Darda's calculations. Some of this increase has been in defense, which was necessary after the rapid declines in security spending during the Clinton years. But the failure of GOP fiscal governance has been in spending on both guns and butter.

As for taxes, the revenue data are further proof of the success of the Bush tax cuts of 2003. The fastest way to stop this revenue windfall, and blow an even larger hole in the deficit, would be to fail to extend the 15% tax rate on capital gains and dividends through 2010, thus assuring a huge tax increase after 2008. The fear of such a tax hike is already weighing on investors and stock-market valuations. So what are GOP House-Senate tax conferees waiting for?

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Are Late Innings The Time For A Relief Pitcher? (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 — President Bush's suggestion on Tuesday that he may add a new senior figure to his White House team raised questions about the future of two of his closest and most powerful aides, Andrew H. Card Jr. and Karl Rove, as they struggle to put Mr. Bush's White House back on course.

Mr. Rove, his senior strategist, and Mr. Card, his chief of staff, have increasingly been forced to fend off rebellious Congressional Republicans, complaints about the administration's competence and calls from within their party for an infusion of fresh thinking into the White House.

Mr. Rove told associates in recent days that he was confident he could resist calls to bring in new advisers. Still, Mr. Bush's decision not to squelch speculation about such a move — "Well, I'm not going to announce it right now," he said Tuesday at his news conference, with Mr. Rove watching — did nothing to restore diminished Republican confidence in a White House team that once promoted a reputation for efficiency, order and impeccable political instincts.

Two Republicans close to the White House who insisted on anonymity to discuss advice they give to Mr. Bush's inner circle said the names being suggested to the president included Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services; Marc Racicot, former chairman of the Republican National Committee; Donald L. Evans, a former commerce secretary; and Ed Gillespie, a former chairman of the Republican Party who shepherded Mr. Bush's two Supreme Court nominations through the Senate.

The list also includes two former members of Congress with ties to Mr. Bush, Thomas G. Loeffler of Texas and Bill Paxon of New York.

It is not clear what role a new appointee would take on, or whether Mr. Bush, known for his loyalty, would be able to make a change without diminishing the standing of Mr. Card and Mr. Rove. Nor is it certain that Mr. Bush will even make a change.

Although Mr. Card is the focus of much of the criticism about the White House's performance, much of the talk here has focused on Mr. Rove, who has long been seen as the pre-eminent strategist of his generation and who for more than a year has been deputy chief of staff for policy.

"He's losing strategic power," James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at the School of Public Affairs at American University, said of Mr. Rove. "It's just decaying, and the decay rate is very fast at this point. Lame-duck presidencies that have people who have been there for many years have many problems."

Republicans outside the White House said Wednesday that they had pushed Mr. Bush not to replace Mr. Rove, but rather to bring in someone at the same level or above, perhaps as minister without portfolio. One Republican said Mr. Bush should view it as replacing a top-notch pitcher struggling in the later innings of a baseball game, rather than as a vote of no-confidence in a friend.

Mr. Card said Mr. Rove, technically at least beneath him in rank, though perhaps not in influence, was an essential staff member.

"He is smart, efficient, diligent, competent and relevant," Mr. Card said.

He defended Mr. Rove and, in an interview last week, took the blame for any problems.

"I take responsibility for everything that has not happened well," Mr. Card said. "I am the staffer responsible for the staff. When people are frustrated, they should be frustrated at me. It's my job."

In a brief interview, Mr. Rove dismissed the notion that he was fatigued or had lost his touch.

"We're all energized," Mr. Rove said. "Whether we're on our game or not — I'm an idiot one day and a genius the next — that's the way it is. You can't pay attention to that."

The developments reflect a sharp change in Mr. Rove's standing in particular, 16 months after he guided Mr. Bush to re-election and was rewarded with more authority.

Mr. Bush's approval ratings are at record lows. Republicans in Congress are refusing to take direction from this White House on a host of issues, while candidates for office have in a few cases avoided appearances with the president.

Mr. Rove's hopes of achieving a permanent Republican majority in Congress, long a defining goal, have given way to holding working House and Senate majorities.

With some notable exceptions, in particular, the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court nominees, the White House has suffered a series of defeats in Congress.

"An ingredient that's missing right now in the White House is that sense of urgency, that passion, that intensity," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota. "When you've had horses there that you've been riding for a long time, you kind of need to change them once in a while."

Rich Bond, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, said that without the focus of a campaign, the White House had lost its edge.

"I can't imagine the Dubai ports deal occurring in the mindset of the re-election," Mr. Bond said. "I can't imagine the Cheney hunting incident being handled in the same way in the mindset of the re-election."

By most accounts inside and outside the administration, Mr. Rove is relentlessly cheerful, presenting himself as an optimistic face in a gloomy White House. One person who met Mr. Rove said he attributed Mr. Bush's problems more to external events, in particular Hurricane Katrina and Iraq, than to anything the White House did wrong.

Mr. Rove has assured worried Republicans that the party will endure just minor losses in the midterm elections. Associates said Mr. Rove appeared increasingly certain that he would not be indicted for his role in the leaking of a C.I.A. operative's name.

"I am just amazed at his ability to multitask and stay on top of his game," Mr. Card said. "I certainly haven't seen any distraction over the past four or five months."

Mr. Rove is operating as impishly as ever. At a party at the British Embassy when Mr. Bush and Mr. Card were on their way to India, Mr. Rove was asked by a group of guests how things were going.

"Everybody's away, so I'm running the country," Mr. Rove replied, playing off his caricature as an all-powerful behind-the-scenes puppet master.

It is a role that White House officials argue has always been exaggerated. Many Republicans now say that just as Mr. Rove should not be excessively credited with the successes of the first term, he should not be overly blamed for its failures in the second.

Security Of Medicare Info Questioned (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

DOJ_NMG_0020233

Medical and financial information gathered on millions of Americans by Medicare, Medicaid and other government programs is vulnerable to thieves or pranksters because of inadequate computer security, federal investigators say.

"Significant weaknesses in information security controls" increase the risk from those who would "inadvertently or deliberately disclose, modify or destroy" sensitive data, the U.S. Government Accountability Office says.

The soon-to-be-released GAO review focuses on the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), whose agencies use computer systems to pay more than a billion Medicare claims worth more than $290 billion each year, track medical research at the National Institutes of Health and manage Food and Drug Administration programs.

"Instead of firewalls to safeguard sensitive data, we have Swiss cheese," says Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which requested the report. Grassley's office says Medicare keeps a variety of information on beneficiaries, including Social Security numbers, addresses, birth dates and medical conditions.

In a written response in the report, HHS officials said investigators do "not provide an accurate or complete appraisal" of its security programs and fail to note a 2005 effort that resulted in a reduction of 57% in reportable deficiencies.

"The frequent use of the word 'significant' to describe control weaknesses … evokes a negative connotation that is not reflective of the progress or current state of HHS' information security program," the department said.

The review comes as the federal government is pushing computer technology as key to improving medical quality and slowing costs. In fiscal 2005, HHS will spend nearly $5 billion on information technology, the report says, much of it to help process Medicare payments to doctors and hospitals.

Investigators for the GAO reviewed management and audit reports from 2004 and 2005 that outline security practices at 13 HHS divisions and found:

•Anti-virus software not installed or up to date.

•Lack of adequate control over computer passwords.

•Employees and contractors serving without background checks.

•Inadequate physical controls to prevent spying or theft, such as non-working surveillance cameras and unrestricted access to a data center.

"Fundamentally, it's an organization that is behind in making security part of its regular operations," says Alan Paller, who has seen the report but was not involved in writing it. Paller is research director at security firm the SANS Institute in Bethesda, Md. "It's very dangerous for health care data."

1,889 Days And No Vetoes: Bush Gaining On Jefferson (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush today becomes the longest-sitting president since Thomas Jefferson not to exercise his veto, surpassing James Monroe.

Monroe was in office 1,888 days before he vetoed his first bill on May 4, 1822, a measure to impose a toll on the first federal highway. Jefferson never exercised his veto during two terms in 1801-09.

Today is Bush's 1,889th day in office, and no veto is in sight. As of Wednesday, Congress had sent him 1,091 bills. He signed them all.

Bush came close to a veto last month when Congress threatened to block a deal to turn over operations at ports in six states to a company owned by the Arab emirate of Dubai. He threatened a veto, but he avoided a showdown when the Dubai company decided to sell that part of its business to American interests.

"After that, we're not likely to hear a veto threat from him that much again," says G. Calvin Mackenzie, government professor at Maine's Colby College.

Some analysts say Bush's failure to use his veto shows an unwillingness to confront fellow Republicans who control Congress. "He doesn't want to fight battles unnecessarily and create a distance between himself and his party," says Mark Rozell, a George Mason University political scientist who has studied presidential vetoes.

DOJ_NMG_0020234

Others say Bush's avoidance of the veto is a sign of strength. “Bush and his party are so close on most issues that there's no need to veto,” Mackenzie says.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., scoffs at that: “This is a rubber-stamp Congress. Why would he veto anything?”

Still others say it is a matter of Bush's management style. “He's a CEO kind of guy. He gives his orders, delegates the negotiating to others and is willing to live with the outcome,” says Robert McClure, a political scientist at Syracuse University's Maxwell School.

Bush has used veto threats to shape bills more to his liking. For example, the House wanted $370 billion for last year's highway bill; the Senate, $318 billion. Bush drew the line at $256 billion, then compromised at $286.4 billion, more than he wanted but far below the House and Senate levels.

Bush said Tuesday that the veto threat has helped him reduce the rate of domestic spending: “One reason why I haven't vetoed any appropriation bills is because they met the benchmarks we've set.”

Congress Friendly, So Who Needs Veto? (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has not vetoed a single bill while he has been in office. But then, why would he? For most of his presidency, Congress has been dominated by fellow Republicans.

“Presidents generally do not want to draw a line between themselves and their party,” says G. Calvin Mackenzie, professor of government at Colby College.

That didn't stop many of Bush's predecessors, though, especially Democrats, who had hundreds of veto fights with Democratic-led congresses.

Jimmy Carter vetoed bills from a Democratic Congress 31 times, Lyndon Johnson 30 times, John Kennedy 21 times. Harry Truman, who had a Democratic Congress for six of his nearly eight years in office, vetoed 250 bills. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who had a Democratic Congress for all of his more than 12 years in office, issued a record 635 vetoes, and only nine of them were overriden.

Reasons varied. Carter quarreled with fellow Democrats over issues such as military spending and an oil-import fee. FDR frequently fought over the proper allocation of power between Congress and the president. “There was a flurry of legislative activity in the Roosevelt years, and there were many factions in the Democratic Party which seldom spoke with one voice. So there was a lot of disagreement,” says Mark Rozell, a George Mason University political scientist.

Other than Bush, the only postwar Republican president to have a Republican-controlled Congress was Dwight Eisenhower, and then only for two years, in 1953-54. He vetoed 29 bills in that time.

Bill Clinton was more similar to Bush in how he handled a Congress of his own party. Clinton had a Democratic Congress his first two years in office, and he never vetoed a bill in that time. After Republicans took control in 1995, however, he issued 37 vetoes.

Bush and the Republican Congress saw eye to eye on a string of major legislation, including five tax cuts, a bankruptcy overhaul bill, an energy bill, a Medicare prescription-drug plan, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and a bipartisan resolution to go to war in Iraq.

Bush's defeats have often come over items Congress never passed. Examples include Bush's proposal to overhaul Social Security and to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling.

On spending bills where Bush and congressional Republicans disagreed, the differences were usually worked out, or narrowed enough that Bush chose not to use his veto. “Congress has lived within the spending limits that the president has called for,” White House press secretary Scott McClellan says.

For now, analysts say, there doesn't appear to be anything looming that would provoke Bush to change his no-veto habit — except the possibility that Democrats could grab control of the House or the Senate in this fall's elections.

If that happens, says Fred McClure, legislative director for Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, “he will have to do a lot of heavy lifting. He may have to use the veto threat a lot more, and he may have to exercise his veto for the first time.”

Line-item Veto Can Cut Pork (USAT)

By Paul Ryan

USA Today, March 23, 2006

U.S. taxpayers deserve to have Congress justify how it spends their money. This is the simple idea behind giving the president a modified, constitutional version of the line-item veto.

By shining the light of day on budgeting in Washington and holding members of Congress accountable for spending they insert into legislation, we can reduce wasteful pork-barrel spending.

To do this, we propose beefing up the president's existing authority to ask Congress to rescind wasteful spending items. Today, the president can make such a request, but Congress can just ignore it. During Ronald Reagan's presidency, for example, Congress failed to act on more than $25 billion in rescission requests by the administration.

Under our bipartisan legislation, the president can sign a spending bill but put a temporary hold on any wasteful provision and request that Congress rescind it. After two days, any member of Congress could introduce the rescission proposal and it would have to be voted on within 10 legislative days, guaranteeing fast-track consideration.

Unlike the line-item veto the Supreme Court struck down in 1998, this keeps the lawmaking power in Congress, where it belongs. For spending to be rescinded, it must pass both the House of Representatives and Senate by a simple majority, then be signed into law by the president. This upholds the process envisioned by the Founding Fathers.

We do not pretend that this step alone would balance the budget, but it would be an important component of a broader drive to restore fiscal discipline to Washington and rein in unnecessary pork-barrel spending.

If a member of Congress has included legitimate spending in a bill, it should be defensible on its merits, apart from the larger legislation to which it is attached. If a “bridge to nowhere” or other pork project can't be justified, then it deserves to be removed.

In any responsible business, employees who charge expenses to the company must be able to justify these expenditures. Members of Congress are the people's employees, and we should be held to the same standard.

Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., is prime sponsor of the House line-item veto legislation.

Competitive Sourcing (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Remember competitive sourcing? That's President Bush's initiative to examine whether jobs done by federal employees could be performed more efficiently by private contractors.

Bush called it his top management priority when he took office in 2001, saying federal workers should compete with contractors for as many as 850,000 government jobs that are considered commercial, jobs as diverse as janitorial services and computer network design.

It has gone far less smoothly, and far more slowly, than the White House had hoped, with fewer than 50,000 jobs studied by the end of 2005. And federal workers have won the job competitions more than 80 percent of the time.

Even so, many federal employees still quake at the prospect of their jobs moving to the private sector. The latest example came yesterday at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where about 70 people protested plans to contract out the jobs of 350 workers, including carpenters, electricians and security employees.

The workers and their union, the American Federation of Government Employees, say their winning bid was unfairly tossed out; that the job competition, announced during the Clinton administration, took longer than regulations allow; and that the Army, in breaking the deadlines, spent money not authorized by Congress.

"We're going to continue fighting this legislatively," said John Threlkeld, an AFGE lobbyist.

Management agreed yesterday to put off a decision for several months. Even if the workers save their jobs, their worries won't end. The historic hospital in Northwest Washington is scheduled to be shut down in 2011 as part of the federal base-closing process.

Bills Eye Substitute For Federal Hatch Act (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

District officials have proposed legislation to Congress and the D.C. Council that would exempt the city from federal enforcement of the Hatch Act and allow it to govern itself in that matter.

The bills, which regulate the way city government employees can participate in local politics, are another step toward District statehood, officials say.

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, introduced the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, last week. Their bill would exempt the District from the Hatch Act, a 1939 anti-corruption law designed to prohibit federal workers from participating in political campaigns.

Mrs. Norton said her bill offers a win-win arrangement for federal and District governments.

"It gives D.C. a long-awaited home-rule victory without the Congress losing anything," she said. "It's very difficult to see an argument against it, frankly."

Mrs. Norton, the District's nonvoting member of Congress, said that under current law the federal government is forced to oversee and prosecute Hatch Act violations within the District.

"In this case, you free one of the offices of the federal government up from overseeing a local jurisdiction," she said.

Enactment of Mrs. Norton's bill is contingent upon the D.C. Council passing a bill similar to the Hatch Act. Mrs. Norton said she expects her bill to easily pass both the House and the Senate.

In response to Mrs. Norton, D.C. Council Chairman Linda W. Cropp, a Democrat who is running for mayor, introduced an employee political activity bill that would give the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics and the office of the D.C. Attorney General oversight of District violations.

"The whole point of this is more self-government," said Charlotte Brookings-Hudson, general counsel for the D.C. Council, who authored the bill. "If we want to have this law we can impose it on ourselves. We are no longer an agency of the federal government. They gave us limited home rule and they kept certain things, but now that we can show that we can govern ourselves we should do so."

Currently, the Office of Special Counsel (OSC) is the only government entity that oversees and prosecutes federal Hatch Act cases in the District.

All U.S. states, including Maryland and Virginia, have their own versions of the Hatch Act but are also subject to oversight by the federal government.

The OSC currently has 103 cases pending. Forty-one of those involve federal officials and 62 involve state and local officials. It was not clear how many of those cases are from the District.

Mrs. Cropp's bill is similar to the federal Hatch Act, and includes rules against District employees using official authority to interfere with an election and a ban against soliciting and receiving funds for a political organization or candidate while on government property.

It also bans employees from giving out lists of names or addresses of District employees to fundraisers.

It does not, however, ban employees from receiving funds while off government property or ban employees from giving out lists of names or addresses for government contractors to fundraisers.

"The purpose of this is to impose a local law on this area that protects our employees from being forced to engage in political activities," said Charlotte Brookings-Hudson, general counsel for the D.C. Council. "It's local legislation to protect the rights of employees, not contractors."

Since D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams took office in 1999, there have been a number of complaints to the D.C. Office of Campaign Financing and the OSC regarding the use of the executive office for political activities.

The most recent was a 2004 complaint against Mr. Williams' Chief of Staff Kelvin J. Robinson. That complaint said in 2002, Mr. Robinson asked D.C. employees to volunteer to work on the mayor's re-election campaign. Mr. Robinson resigned to take a private sector job several days before that complaint was filed.

DOJ_NMG_0020237

Mr. Williams said he supports Mrs. Cropp and Mrs. Norton's bills because they further the cause of home rule in the District. He said that any history of government corruption in the District should not block the city from governing itself.

Other cities and states who have also experienced government corruption in the past, such as Chicago or New York, are allowed to govern themselves, he said.

"The Hatch Act currently treats us as an agency of the federal government," he said. "We are not, whether ... someone may want us to be, we are not. And we fiercely resist being seen as an agency of the federal government and we should be given the same latitude and autonomy with our local affairs as any other city in the country."

Americans View Muslims Favorably (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Most Americans hold favorable views of American Muslims, and almost half say Islam doesn't encourage violence more than other religions, according to a study released yesterday at an international interfaith conference.

These findings offer hope that Muslims eventually will be accepted and integrated into American society as people of other faiths have been, said Luis Lugo, director of the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, which conducted the study.

However, many Americans remain wary of Muslims and Islam, Mr. Lugo said. More personal friendships and education should improve chances for interreligious relations.

Nearly all of yesterday's conference speakers decried terrorism by "extremists" and "radicals."

The Pew findings were presented at the International Conference on Faith and Service in Washington, which featured conciliatory messages from leaders of Christian, Jewish and Muslim faiths; Indonesian scholar and special envoy Alwi Shihab; and Karen Hughes, the State Department's undersecretary for public diplomacy.

Catholics and Jews were once objects of "widespread and often institutionalized discrimination" in America, Mr. Lugo said. But by 2005, three-quarters of Americans viewed these religions favorably.

Such findings "strongly suggest that the United States has the capacity to overcome historical religious divisions and prejudices," he said.

The findings also showed that 60 percent of Americans think recent terrorist attacks represent a conflict with "a small radical group," not "the people of Islam."

Mrs. Hughes also spoke yesterday about the Afghan man who is facing death for converting to Christianity.

"This case clearly violates the universal freedom held dear by democratic people throughout the world, and we believe it violates the Afghan Constitution, which guarantees the right of an individual to freedom of religion," she said. "We are deeply concerned and have expressed those concerns to the Afghan government."

Islamic doctrine says there "shall be no compulsion in religion" and says people of all faiths should be allowed to practice their religion unmolested, said Imam Feisal Abdul Rauf, head of the American Society for Muslim Advancement. "It is a travesty of Islamic law and Islamic thought" that these principles are violated today.

The Candidates' Money Race (NYT)

As a cash-flow marathon, the 2008 presidential race is already under way, with fund-raising trumping innovative ideas and political experts predicting the death of public financing. This is a little-noticed American tragedy, as politics slips back toward the Watergate era. That was when the scandal of easy-money corruption prompted Congress to create the historic option of public election subsidies.

That worthy reform is now badly in need of updating to keep pace with the big-money dynamics of private fund-raising, which has retightened its lock on politics. Don't expect much help from the current Congress, so clearly in thrall to special interests' campaign money. In the last presidential contest, President Bush and Senator John Kerry set furious records for private fund-raising — netting more than $250 million each — for the campaign primaries. Intent on dominating the political landscape, they rejected the public alternative, which would have limited spending to a mere $44 million each. But they both took the subsidies for the general election, each accepting a $74 million spending limit.

Even that path is now threatened as political consultants sense a billion-dollar duel looming for the next election. The cost of running for the White House inflates with each ballot, and campaign strategists estimate that the entry stakes for the 2008 race could approach $100 million, just to be taken seriously. No wonder aspirants are already trolling California, Texas and other wholesale donor precincts as hungrily as the retail voter tableaus of Iowa and New Hampshire.

Treasury Secretary Expects Wage Growth To Increase (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary John Snow predicted Wednesday that U.S. wage growth would accelerate in coming months, as he tried to combat negative consumer attitudes about the economy and White House policies.

In a meeting with reporters, Snow said that as labor markets tighten — with the unemployment rate falling to 4.8% in February from 6.3% in mid-2003 — companies will boost compensation.

"Can (average Americans) expect to have more money in their pockets going forward? I think the answer is unequivocally, 'yes,' " Snow said.

Several measures of compensation, including hourly wage growth, have lagged behind inflation during much of the recovery from the 2001 recession. Average hourly wages rose 3.2% in 2005, while the consumer inflation rate was up 3.4%.

There are signs that wages are starting to pick up. The Labor Department said hourly wages for non-supervisory workers, about 80% of the workforce, rose 5 cents in February and 3.5% from February 2004.

"There's only very, very early sort of indications of" rising wage growth, says Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight. "There is still a fair amount of slack in the labor market."

Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com adds that while hourly wages show some gains, higher-paid workers are pulling up the average. Wages for lower-income earners still trail inflation.

Snow's comments came as recent polls show Americans are pessimistic about President Bush's economic policies. A survey by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press earlier this month found 34% of the public approved of Bush's handling of the economy, while 57% disapproved.

In addition to the short-term wage picture, economists including former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan are concerned about a decades-long trend of rising U.S. income inequality. Snow said improved education was needed to address the issue in the long term.

On related issues, Snow said the White House would "engage" with Congress if lawmakers wanted to raise the minimum wage, at $5.15 an hour since 1997. While Snow expressed concern a higher minimum wage could have an impact on hiring, economic literature on the topic is mixed.

Snow said he did not think Americans had taken on too much debt to finance consumption, calling the data benign.

Zandi disagrees. "The folks in the bottom half of the distribution of wealth, the debt level is high, and it's going to become onerous as interest rates rise."

Income Gap Narrower By Treasury's Measure (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The income gap between rich and poor in the United States has shrunk in recent years, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said yesterday, addressing an issue frequently raised by critics of President Bush's economic policies this election year.

"There has been a decline in the inequality" from a high point in 2000 through 2003, the most recent year for which figures are available, Snow said during a meeting with reporters yesterday, referring to Treasury data based on tax returns.

The top 5 percent of Americans, ranked by income, earned 15.4 percent of the nation's after-tax income in 2003, down from 19 percent in 2000, Treasury figures show. The bottom 20 percent took home 2.5 percent of all U.S. after-tax income, up from 2.3 percent in 2000.

But much of the decline in inequality during that period reflected the popping of the stock market bubble, which peaked in 2000, when executives pocketed fat bonuses and stockholders reaped huge profits from selling shares, according to economists inside and outside the Bush administration. The fall in stock prices during those years disproportionately affected high-income households and helped compress the distribution of income.

The Treasury data, which include profit from the sale of stocks and other capital gains, also show that the gap was still larger in 2003 than in 1990, when the top 5 percent of earners took home 12.9 percent of the nation's income.

And census data, which do not include capital gains, show that income inequality grew from 2000 to 2003 and increased again in 2004, continuing a quarter-century trend.

Administration critics said the income figures in 2000 were an anomaly, reflecting the overheated stock market. "If you look at it over a longer period, the trend toward rising income inequality has continued unabated," said Leonard E. Burman, a former Clinton administration Treasury official who is a senior fellow at the Urban Institute.

President Bush's tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 made income inequality "a lot worse," Burman said.

President Bush's approval rating has been falling, making Republicans nervous about the congressional elections this year. A Washington Post-ABC News Poll conducted this month found that 51 percent of respondents disapproved of how Bush is handling the economy, and 62 percent said he does not understand "the problems of people like" themselves.

Snow attributed those poll numbers to a lag between recent improvements in the economy and people's perceptions of that strength, overlaid by anxieties about the war on terrorism, high gasoline prices and unease about the implications of globalization for U.S. workers.

The economy has grown at a robust pace for the past two years, consumer spending is rising and businesses are hiring, he said, calling those indicators "the poll that counts."

Snow acknowledged that the income gap has grown over recent decades.

Family income inequality declined from 1946 through 1969, census data show. Inequality increased slowly from 1970 through 1979 and "has increased somewhat faster since then," wrote Frank Levy, an economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in an analysis posted on the Census Bureau's Web site.

In 2000, the median household income for the top 20 percent of earners was 14 times the comparable figure for the bottom 20 percent, census figures show. By 2003, the top group earned 14.7 times more; by 2004; it earned 14.8 times more. All the census figures are adjusted for inflation. The median is the midpoint, at which half of all families earn more and half earn less.

Snow also asserted that the economic recovery from the 2001 recession is "a little better" than the rebound from the 1990-91 recession. He pointed to Treasury data showing that median household income had declined each year from a peak in 2000 through 2004, the most recent year for which figures are available. He noted that the drop was shallower than a similar slide during the four years after income peaked in 1989.

But census data also show that median household income declined for three consecutive years after the 2001 recession ended; income declined for just two years after the earlier recession and was rising by the third, noted Lee Price, research director of the Economic Policy Institute.

"Things are still not improving for average people," Price said, noting that the income figures are adjusted for inflation, which has flared in recent years as energy prices have risen. "Because inflation picked up, people in the middle are not getting ahead."

Dow Up 81, Hitting Highest Level In Nearly Five Years (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

By Bloomberg News

DOJ_NMG_0020240

The Dow Jones industrial average rose yesterday to its highest level in almost five years as the outlook for corporate earnings improved.

Auto stocks gained after General Motors' announcement of a plan to reduce labor costs through employee buyouts. Bristol-Myers Squibb surged after reaching a settlement to delay a generic version of its biggest-selling drug. Morgan Stanley rose as its profit beat analysts' estimates.

Lower oil prices also helped stocks bounce back from the decline shares posted earlier in the week amid concern that the Federal Reserve would keep raising interest rates to curb inflation.

The Dow average gained 81.96 points, or 0.7 percent, to 11,317.43, the highest since May 2001. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 7.81 points, or 0.6 percent, to 1,305.04.

Technology stocks trailed the advance as a delay in the next version of Microsoft's Windows program led to the stock's biggest decline since July. The Nasdaq composite index, which gets 42 percent of its value from computer-related shares, gained 9.12 points, or 0.4 percent, to 2,303.35.

The market slid earlier this week as a speech by the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, and a report on producer prices rekindled interest rate concern. The central bank meets Tuesday to decide whether to raise a benchmark rate a 15th consecutive time.

Stock indexes rebounded yesterday as investors chose to focus on the improving outlook for the auto and drug industries.

G.M., the world's largest automaker, offered a one-time buyout to factory employees and reached an agreement with its biggest parts supplier, Delphi, to entice thousands more workers to retire. The deal with the United Automobile Workers reduces the chances of G.M.'s being sent into bankruptcy by a strike at Delphi.

G.M. shares added only a penny, to $22.01, but shares of other companies involved in autos showed bigger gains. Lear, the largest supplier of auto-interior parts, rose 87 cents, to $18.18. Johnson Controls, the largest automotive-seat maker, rose 59 cents to $77.44. And Ford Motor gained 10 cents, to $8.15.

Bristol-Myers surged $2.41, or 11 percent, to $25.24, for the largest gain in the S.&P. 500. Bristol and Sanofi-Aventis reached a settlement with Apotex that keeps a generic version of the blood thinner Plavix off the market until 2011. Sanofi-Aventis American depository receipts gained $4.20, to $47.88. The Amex pharmaceutical index had its biggest jump since Jan. 3, climbing 2 percent.

Morgan Stanley gained $1.53, to $61.94, after it said fiscal first-quarter net income rose 17 percent on revenue from buying and selling stocks and fixed-income securities. Per-share profit was $1.54 in the three months ended Feb. 28, exceeding the highest analyst estimate in a survey by Thomson Financial.

Microsoft fell 59 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $27.15, for the worst performance in the Dow average, after the company announced that the Vista version of Windows would be delayed.

Apple Computer, which makes computers that run on a different operating system, fell 14 cents, to $61.67.

Nike, the largest athletic-shoe maker, added $1.87, to $86.82. The company said fiscal third-quarter net income rose 19 percent as the new Air Max 360 sneaker helped increase United States sales. Profit for the quarter that ended Feb. 28 was $1.24 a share, exceeding the $1.10 average estimate of analysts surveyed by Thomson.

About 11 stocks rose for every 4 that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Almost 1.49 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 9.8 percent fewer than the three-month average.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose 5/32, to 9814/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, was 4.70 percent, down from 4.72 percent on Tuesday.

After Slump, Dow Hits Nearly 5-year High (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks snapped a two-day slump Wednesday amid growing confidence rising earnings will outweigh increasing interest rates.

DOJ_NMG_0020241

The Dow Jones industrial average gained 81.96 points to 11,317.43, highest since May 21, 2001, putting it up 5.6% this year. The Dow is on pace for a better than 24% gain this year.

Boosted by advertising, steel and footwear stocks, the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 7.81 points to 1305.04. The index is up 4.5% this year.

And despite the unexpected delay of Microsoft's next version of the Windows operating system until January, the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index gained 9.12 points to 2303.35. The Nasdaq is up 4.4% this year. Shares of Microsoft, though, fell 59 cents to $27.15.

Automakers and parts suppliers were strong following General Motors' announcement of a plan to reduce labor costs through employee buyouts (stories, 1A, 1B). Company-specific news also helped boost Bristol-Myers Squibb, Morgan Stanley and FedEx.

Lower oil prices also helped stocks recover after falling earlier in the week amid concern that the Federal Reserve will keep raising short-term interest rates to curb inflation.

"We have felt all along profits would come in better than expected" in 2006, says Keith Wirtz, chief investment officer at Fifth Third Asset Management.

And despite the strong rise in stock values this year, some think there's still upside. "Stocks are not expensive," says Doug Sandler, chief equity strategist at Wachovia Securities. "There's no reason to believe we can't go higher. I don't see inflation as a threat at all."

Morgan Stanley rose $1.53 to $61.94. The investment bank said quarterly net income rose 17%, exceeding the highest analyst estimate in a survey by Thomson Financial.

•FedEx rose $1.22 to $114.44. The No. 2 U.S. package-shipping company said fiscal third-quarter profit rose 35%, more than analysts expected, as strong demand enabled FedEx to raise prices.

•Juniper Networks lost 37 cents to $18.99. Banc of America Securities analyst Tim Long said the No. 2 maker of equipment that directs Internet traffic may "struggle" to gain market share required to meet estimates this year.

Stocks Rise As Rates Decline (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The interest-rate tap dance on Wall Street continued Wednesday, leaving stocks higher and rates lower.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 81.96 points to 11317.43, the first time it closed above 11300 since May 2001. The Dow is now about 20 points shy of a six-year high, a level it neared by 10 points in a strong rally in the final hour of trading.

Basic materials companies such as Caterpillar and financials such as J.P. Morgan Chase, which tend to benefit from low rates and economic growth, helped lead the rally. Shares of General Motors jumped earlier on reports that its auto-parts supplier Delphi has reached an agreement1 with the United Auto Workers union and GM on an early retirement plan for employees. But it moved lower at the end of the day.

Rising rates knocked stocks lower earlier this week, amid concerns over a speech given by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke on bond yields. A report showing a bigger-than-expected increase in core wholesale prices also led to concerns that the Fed would have to push rates higher than most hope to keep inflation in check.

Wednesday, though, yields declined as bonds rallied on continued debate among investors about the meaning of Mr. Bernanke's speech. The rally Wednesday provided a sense that bond yields are contained, at least for now.

Stocks are up "because the bond market is rallying, and there's confidence that earnings are going to continue to grow," said Kent Engelke, capital markets strategist Anderson & Strudwick. "If rates are contained and we have solid economic growth, we're going to see pretty good earnings" in the rest of 2006, he said. Fears that earnings growth will wane sharply in the latter half of the year have led to skepticism that stocks will continue to climb.

Technology stocks were weak after Microsoft said it would delay the release2 of its new Windows Vista operating system for consumers until January 2007. Microsoft fell 2.5%. While the Nasdaq Composite Index spent most of the morning in negative territory, it clawed higher toward the end of regular trading, rising 9.12 points to 2303.35.

Computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard and Gateway had been banking on a rush of holiday sales as computer users snapped up new machines tricked out with Vista's bells and whistles. Microsoft plans to release the Vista operating system to large business customers in November.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 7.81 to 1305.04. Light, sweet crude-oil fell 57 cents to $61.77 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange despite a report by the Energy Department that crude-oil inventories declined by 1.3 million barrels last week, when analysts were expecting a 2.8 million barrel increase.

Meanwhile, Biogen Idec shares were flat after it said the Food and Drug Administration will extend its review of its key multiple sclerosis drug Tysabri by up to 90 days, a setback for the company which wanted to reintroduce the drug to the U.S. market in June. Shares of its Irish partner Elan slipped 3.7%.

Shares of Bristol-Myers Squibb and Sanofi-Aventis rallied after the companies said they had reached a settlement for Canadian drug maker Apotex to delay9 its generic version of blood-thinning drug, Plavix, until 2011. Bristol-Myers' shares rose 11%, and Sanofi gained 9%.

In major market action:

Stocks rose10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 2,272 stocks rose and 1,031 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,779 rose and 1,187 declined.

Bonds advanced11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury gained 4/32 point, or $1.25 cents for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.705%. The 30-year bond added 10/32 to yield 4.75%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.12 It traded at 117.07 yen, down from 117.30 yen late Tuesday, while the euro fell to $1.2074 from $1.2087.

Stock Performance Undercuts Bush's Vision Of Ownership Society (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush has tried to sell Americans on an ``ownership society'' that would create more wealth -- and more Republicans in the process. The stock market hasn't accommodated.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index -- the benchmark for American equities -- is down 2.8 percent since Bush took office five years and two months ago. That's the worst performance during the same stage of any two-term administration in the past half century except that of Richard M. Nixon.

The market's performance is undermining a central goal of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's chief political adviser. Borrowing from Margaret Thatcher's privatization push in the U.K. in the 1980s, Rove's theory is that if more Americans make their own financial decisions and the last vestiges of a welfare state are dismantled, a culture of ownership will spring up. The ranks of Republican voters, the idea goes, will swell along with it.

``The ownership society looked very attractive on paper,'' said Jacob Hacker, a political science professor at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. ``But once you flesh out the changes, people become very concerned because they are already fearful that their economic security is slipping away,''

Those fears are playing out as campaigns are getting underway for the November congressional elections.

``I don't see many Republicans stressing it, emphasizing it or raising it during the campaign,'' said U.S. Representative Peter King, a Republican from New York. While younger voters may be more willing to accept risk, ``the older you get, the harder it is to fully accept this shift.''

Outside Threats

Some of the insecurity stems from the quarterly statements that many Americans are getting for their 401(k) retirement funds and other accounts. Stocks are stammering at the same time government statistics on jobs, productivity and gross domestic product are showing economic strength and continued growth.

DOJ_NMG_0020243

Since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, exuberance about the economy has been overtaken by gnawing unease about the future, according to Robert Solow, 1987 winner of the Nobel Prize for economics and professor emeritus at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge.

``Investors are worried that something is going to blow up tomorrow -- they just think it's a crazy world," Solow said.

Harvard economist Robert Barro points to a ``lingering geopolitical risk and this sense in the financial markets that there is this probability of something really terrible happening related to international terrorism."

Performance Factors

Anxiety about terrorism and the war isn't the only reason stocks have struggled to keep pace. Companies still are shedding excess plants and equipment built up during the boom years of the 1990s. At the same time, low inflation and the globalization of markets means companies can't raise prices at will.

The S&P 500 index during the past half-century has risen on average 8.1 percent a year. The index rose 3 percent last year, when Federal Reserve figures show corporate profits reached a record of about $1.3 trillion. In 1999, a year the S&P 500 rose 20 percent, corporate profits were $806 billion.

By comparison with other two-term administrations of the past half-century, the index grew 153.6 percent at this point during the presidency of Bill Clinton, 79.7 percent for Ronald Reagan, 61.9 percent under Dwight D. Eisenhower and 45.4 percent during the Kennedy-Johnson administration. At the same stage in Nixon's presidency the S&P dropped 4.1 percent.

Risk Concerns

Concern about market risks meant Bush last year had to backpedal from a centerpiece of his ownership campaign -- adding private investment accounts to the Social Security system. His other plans, such as having individuals use tax-free accounts to pay for medical costs, may face a similar fate as the Republican congressional majority shies away from programs that shift more decisions and risks to consumers who've demonstrated they want neither.

``Republicans don't want to go anywhere near the ownership society" in an election year, said Hacker, author of the book ``The Great Risk Shift," which is scheduled for publication in August. ``You're going to see very little attention to these larger themes."

Last year, the ownership society was the centerpiece of Bush's domestic agenda. He crisscrossed the country, getting applause for his oft-repeated desire to see ``ownership spread throughout all our society."

This year, Bush didn't utter the word ownership in his Jan. 31 State of the Union. In speeches around the country he has have downplayed themes of personal responsibility and expanding the ``investor class." Instead, he focuses on maintaining the ``competitiveness" of the American economy, providing consumers with more ``transparency" on health-care costs and reaking a U.S. ``addiction" to oil.

Timing

The idea of giving individuals a greater stake in the economy ``is broadly appealing, but it works best when the market is clearly performing well and rising," said James Lucier, senior analyst with Prudential Equity Group LLC in Washington.

Not all is bleak on the ownership front. As Bush frequently points out in speeches, the home ownership rate rose to a record of 69.2 percent under his administration, from 67.5 percent when he took office. The value of mortgages stood at $8.66 trillion at the end of 2005, from $5.22 trillion in 2001, Federal Reserve figures show, while individual stock holdings have fallen to $6.08 trillion, down from $6.72 trillion 2001.

Stocks may continue to remain short of previous highs. The consensus forecast of 15 equity strategists surveyed by Bloomberg News in early March is for an S&P 500 index to finish the year at 1,353, which would be an 8.4 percent gain for the year. That's still below the high of 1,383 during Bush's tenure reached on Jan. 31, 2001 -- about a month before the economy slipped into recession.

Stocks would be 10 percent to 15 percent higher without the geopolitical risks that stem from the Bush administration's foreign policies, said Allen Sinai, chief global economist at Decision Economics Inc. He predicts the S&P 500 index -- whose 3 percent rise last year when ranked globally bested only China, Malaysia and Venezuela's stock markets -- will rise to as high as 1,375 this year, from yesterday's close of 1,305.

``In the midst of a very nice business expansion, there is a kind of pall in the attitudes of Americans about how this administration is performing," Sinai said.

Republican Split On Stem Cells Creates `Wedge' Issue (Update1) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- In 2002, when he was an 18-year-old freshman at the U.S. Air Force Academy, Jeff McCaffrey was paralyzed from the waist down in a car accident. A Catholic and opponent of abortion, McCaffrey is now an ardent campaigner for research using stem cells from human embryos.

``I have no moral qualms," said McCaffrey. ``It is simply cells," he said in a telephone interview. ``Scientists can make those stem cells that are blank turn into spinal cells and heal my injury."

People such as McCaffrey present a quandary for Republicans, who are split over whether to allow federal funding for research on new stem cells from human embryos. Senate Democrats plan to force a debate on the issue in the coming months and use it in the campaign leading up to the November elections.

Republicans plan their own debate over bioethics in an effort to limit the damage from letting stem cells become ``a wedge issue that divides Republicans," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said in an interview.

Republicans in the past often have benefited from such ``wedge issues" -- subjects that divide Democrats' constituencies, such as gun control, abortion and gay marriage. Stem-cell research may be one of the first wedge issues that hurts Republicans more because of President George W. Bush's stand against it; polls show a majority of the public disagrees with him.

Bush's Ban

Bush has prohibited federal funding for any research using material from newly created human embryos since 2001. While Frist has promised to bring a measure before the Senate to overturn Bush's ban, a plan to begin debate this month has been stalled.

Scientists inject embryonic cells with genetic material, creating regenerative tissue that in theory could be implanted in patients to cure diseases from Parkinson's to juvenile diabetes. The Republican Party's evangelical Christian base is opposed to the research because human embryos are destroyed in the process.

``We have great qualms about the moral nature of this practice," said Carrie Gordon Earle, a bioethics analyst at Focus on the Family, a Christian advocacy group. The Colorado Springs, Colorado-based organization opposes the potential use of human embryos for research.

Brownback's Effort

Kansas Republican Senator Sam Brownback is pushing for a week-long debate in the Senate on bioethics in which opponents of such stem-cell research can promote legislation to block it. Brownback said he thinks he has the 51 votes needed to pass such a measure.

``These are the ones you just have to state a truth and stand by it," he said. ``It's human life. And I mean, that has to be stood up for."

Frist said his goal ``is to be able to consider a range of bills and amendments" during any bioethics debate.

A number of Senate Republicans, including Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Orrin Hatch of Utah, have joined forces with Democrats including Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Tom Harkin of Iowa to push the overturn of Bush's ban.

``Some Republicans are on the wrong side of the issue, obviously," Harkin said. ``There may be some more that are just holding back, but when push comes to shove they will vote with us."

Patient groups such as the Parkinson's Action Network and the Coalition for Advancement of Medical Research, both based in Washington, recently began mobilizing members to push for a Senate vote.

Basic Research

DOJ_NMG_0020245

At issue in the debate is how much funding the U.S. puts into basic research into stem cells. Under Bush's 2007 budget, the National Institutes of Health would spend $605 million on stem-cell research, of which almost 95 percent would go to work in adult stem cells and animal stem cells.

Only $38 million would be directed to research using some of the 21 existing-stem cell lines available under Bush's 2001 executive order. Scientists say those lines have been corrupted by mouse cultures and are therefore useless for potential human therapies.

``As a result, very little research using human embryonic cells is going on here in the U.S.," said William Neaves, director of the Stowers Institute for Medical Research in Kansas City, which was endowed with $2 billion by Jim Stowers, founder of the American Century Cos. mutual funds.

`Falling Far Behind'

The U.S. is ``at significant risk of falling far behind" other nations such as Great Britain, Israel and Singapore, Neaves said.

In a poll by the Gallup Organization conducted August 5-7, 56 percent of the 1,004 people surveyed supported research on newly created stem cells from human embryos. Even people who ``take conservative positions on social issues, when they are faced with a choice between traditional values and advancement of medical research, generally opt for the latter," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Washington-based Pew Research Center.

Some states are taking action to fund research on their own. California passed a ballot measure to pump $3 billion into stem- cell research over 10 years. Wisconsin, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts and Maryland have all passed laws supporting and funding embryonic stem-cell research.

In Missouri, a group funded by Stowers is pushing a ballot measure that would legalize research using stem cells from human embryos, Neaves said. Focus on the Family's Earle said Christian groups will use television, radio and mail in an effort to defeat the measure in November.

Talent's Switch

Jim Talent, the Republican senator from the state who is running for re-election this year, last month abandoned his support for legislation that would ban embryonic stem-cell research, including cloning. He now backs research into producing stem cells without cloning or destroying human embryos.

McCaffrey has left the Air Force Academy and is now at the University of Missouri, where he's forming a student group to support stem-cell research.

``I want to use stem cells to save lives and better lives," he said. ``I believe we have a moral obligation to find cures. It is the greater good."

Iraq War Veteran Wins Congressional Primary (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO, March 22 — L. Tammy Duckworth, a retired Army major who lost her legs in Iraq and has the backing of some of the Democratic Party's national leaders, declared victory on Wednesday in a close Congressional primary in suburban Chicago, setting up a carefully watched race for the seat of Representative Henry J. Hyde, a Republican who is retiring after 32 years.

Problems with Chicago's and Cook County's new voting system — installed to solve problems with the old punch-card method — also left a hard-fought county race up in the air for nearly a day after the polls closed. Finally, late Wednesday afternoon, Forrest Claypool conceded his challenge to the incumbent Cook County Board president, John H. Stroger Jr.

In the gubernatorial primary, Illinois Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka narrowly edged a conservative rival to clinch the Republican nomination and earn a chance to challenge Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich in November.

"My service to this country and my service in Iraq are a testament to my patriotism and my dedication," Ms. Duckworth said in a telephone interview on Wednesday. "I am so gratified that there is such tremendous energy in this district, that people feel there is a viable alternative for the first time in 32 years."

Ms. Duckworth, 38, lost her legs when a rocket-propelled grenade hit the helicopter she was piloting in Iraq in November 2004. She announced her candidacy in December after she was released from rehabilitation and active duty.

"Three months ago, nobody knew who I was," said Ms. Duckworth, who has received widespread support from leading Democrats like Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Kerry of Massachusetts, and vows to focus on education, health care and jobs. "It has been a whirlwind."

Ms. Duckworth's opponents in Tuesday's primary were critical of the amount of support and financing she received from outside the district. Ms. Duckworth will face State Senator Peter J. Roskam in November. Mr. Roskam also has national support, from Republican Party leaders, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who visited Illinois last week to raise money for him.

In the Cook County Board race, Mr. Claypool, who was running against Mr. Stroger as a reformer looking to end patronage in county government, told his supporters on Wednesday at campaign headquarters, "You brought us so close to victory against the old Democratic machine."

He added, "We were challenging virtually all the power brokers in Cook County and Chicago, but we ran a real grass-roots campaign."

Mr. Stroger, 76, remains hospitalized in serious but stable condition after suffering a stroke last week.

Mr. Claypool's concession came while election officials were manually counting ballots after problems with a new voting system left 13 percent of the votes uncounted.

In unofficial returns, Mr. Stroger was leading Mr. Claypool by more than 21,000 votes, 52 percent to 48 percent. Mr. Claypool said it was obvious that the remaining ballots, many of which were cast in predominately African-American precincts where Mr. Stroger has strong support, would not change the balance.

"We strongly believe that we have won," Bruce Washington, Mr. Stroger's campaign manager, said at a news conference on Wednesday afternoon. "We're just going through the process here of counting the remaining ballots."

The ballot problem comes two years after more than 5,000 provisional ballots cast in a primary election here were disqualified, mainly because of technical errors.

Ex-Army Pilot Gets Ill. House Nomination (AP)

By Dennis Conrad

The Associated Press, March 22, 2006

Tammy Duckworth, a former Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in a grenade attack in Iraq, is now leading the charge for the Fighting Democrats.

Duckworth narrowly won the Democratic nomination for Congress in a primary race Tuesday for the House seat held by Republican Rep. Henry Hyde (news, bio, voting record), who is retiring after 32 years. She is the best-known of the Iraq war veterans who want to go to Capitol Hill this year.

"My experience in Iraq made me realize, and during the recovery, that I could have died," said Duckworth, who was wounded in 2004 and now gets around by using either a wheelchair or metal prosthetic limbs and a cane. "And I just had to do more with my life."

About 10 veterans of the current fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan are candidates for Congress, all but one of them a Democrat. The Fighting Democrats, as they are being called, contend their battlefield experience will allow them to criticize the war without being written off as naive and weak on defense.

Duckworth, a 38-year-old major in the Illinois Army National Guard, has strong backing from big-name national Democrats, some of whom recruited her to run in the traditionally Republican district in Chicago's suburbs.

On the campaign trail, she has portrayed U.S. involvement in Iraq as a mistake. She has faulted U.S. intelligence and accused American politicians of making poor decisions.

But she has nothing but praise for the U.S. fighting men and women in Iraq and Afghanistan, and has cautioned against quick withdrawal.

"I just thought that we never should have invaded Iraq. We should have gone after Osama bin Laden and our enemies in Afghanistan who attacked us on our soil here in the United States," she said in suburban Downers Grove on Wednesday after edging out businesswoman Christine Cegelis for the nomination.

At the same time, Duckworth, who is married to a captain in the Illinois National Guard, said: "I was proud to serve. I'd do it tomorrow. I'm still in the Army National Guard. If my unit were deployed, I would go again. I think it is important to do your duty."

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, said he would be surprised if Duckworth won in November. But "she serves a function for Democrats even if she loses," by helping the Democrats compete with the Republicans on the issue of national security.

Similarly, Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, said that most of the veterans seeking House seats this cycle are "running in places where they're sacrificial lambs."

In November, Duckworth will face state Sen. Peter Roskam, a well-to-do lawyer and conservative from Wheaton who ran unopposed in the GOP primary. Roskam also drew support from Vice President Dick Cheney, who helped with a fundraiser that brought in an estimated $200,000.

"How much is this going to be a national election? Clearly, the Republicans will hope it's not. `All politics is local will be their mantra,'" Hess said.

For her part, Duckworth has tried to talk about more than just the war.

"I think we need to stop giving money to oil companies at a time we are cutting funding for education," she said. "We need to stop giving tax cuts to the very wealthiest Americans."

She does acknowledge what some critics say privately: That she would not have become a candidate had it not been for her catastrophic injury.

Had she not been wounded, she said, she would have started a nonprofit agency or gone back to her job at Rotary International's world headquarters in Evanston, where she was a staff supervisor and was working at the same time on a doctorate on Southeast Asia's economies and public health.

An Iraq Veteran Begins Her Journey To Congress (TIME)

By Eric Ferkenhoff

Time, March 22, 2006

Ever since veteran Republican representative Henry Hyde announced last year that he would not be seeking another term in Congress, Democrats have viewed his suburban Chicago district as one of the key battlegrounds in their effort to take back the House in 2006. Almost immediately party heavyweights like Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi started lending their support and helping raise loads of cash for one of the nation's most closely watched races. And with the Iraq War increasingly seen as a winning issue for the Dems, they recruited wounded Iraq War veteran Tammy Duckworth to run for the seat.

On Tuesday, their strategy began to pay off. Duckworth, a 38-year-old former major with the Illinois National Guard who lost both legs during a grenade attack on her helicopter, appeared to have eked out a primary victory over her challenger, tech entrepreneur and two-time candidate Christine Cegelis, by garnering 44% of the vote to Cegelis's 40%. Duckworth will now face a high-stakes fall race against conservative state Sen. Peter Roskam, who himself has had big names like Vice President Dick Cheney helping him amass a war chest topping $1 million.

For his three decades in Congress Hyde, who brought clout and many political goodies to his District, had been an unbeatable incumbent. So when he decided to end his storied career on Capitol Hill, Dems viewed it as an especially promising opening. And with a greater mix of young people and minorities, especially Hispanics, moving to the area, Dems believe the district is trending in their favor.

Republicans are confident that Hyde's conservative legacy remains very much alive in the west suburban District. And they note that Roskam, while criticized as too far right for a district becoming more diverse, is a loyal Bush supporter running in a district that voted for him in 2004, even as the President handily lost the state as a whole.

Duckworth is one of several veterans of the war in Iraq to enter the political fray this election, and some have questioned whether Democrats—namely Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois representative who is thought to have personally recruited Duckworth-were exploiting a veteran wracked with emotional and physical scars. Duckworth dismisses such talk, as well as the notion that the race is about national issues like the war. "I've been under much more stress when people's lives are on the line," she said."This I can handle."

That may be, but whether she can actually deliver the district to the Democrats will depend on how well she can translate her combat experience into political know-how. "My service gives me an insight that other candidates won't have, and my injuries give me a platform," she said. "But that's all it is, a platform. If there was no substance to me—[issues] like education, the health care, the jobs—I'd fall off that platform very quickly."

Iraq War Veteran Wins Her First Political Battle (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO - Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth edged out opponents in the Democratic primary Tuesday, setting up an intriguing congressional contest. The upbeat vet - who didn't begin her campaign until mid-December - will face Republican Peter Roskam in November in a bid to replace retiring Rep. Henry Hyde (R), who has represented Illinois's Sixth District since 1975.

Ms. Duckworth is the most visible of seven Democratic Iraq war vets running for Congress this year. Her candidacy has attracted much national attention due to her compelling personal story - she lost both legs and partial use of one arm when her helicopter was shot down in November 2004 - and the district in which she's running. Located in Chicago's western suburbs, the Sixth District has long been overwhelmingly Republican but is changing, and Democrats are now eyeing it.

George W. Bush won the district with just 53 percent of the vote in 2000 and 2004, and in the last House contest Democrat Christine Cegelis took an impressive 44 percent of the vote against Mr. Hyde.

Despite Duckworth's high profile - and backing from party leaders such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. John Kerry, and Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Richard Durbin - taking the seat from the GOP will be tough, most analysts agree.

"The thing she'll have going for her is the publicity, and it appears she can raise the requisite amount of money from national sources," says Dick Simpson, a political scientist at the University of Illinois in Chicago and a former Chicago alderman. But in a district that is still largely Republican, he says, Duckworth will have to win over both the Democrats who backed her primary opponents as well as independents and some Republicans. Among GOP voters, "she'll be helped most by her status as a veteran," he says.

Duckworth barely bested Ms. Cegelis on Tuesday, winning by a margin of less than 4 percent. She was criticized during the campaign as being a candidate recruited by outside politicians who lives three miles outside the district and who lacks grass-roots support.

But Duckworth's backers see the victory and her impressive fundraising as signs that she can wage a tough campaign. Even in traditionally GOP districts, "someone who's an Iraq war veteran or a military veteran will make them stop and listen," says Mike Lyon, director of the Band of Brothers political action committee, which is working on behalf of 57 war veterans running for Congress as Democrats.

Machine Woes Slow Vote-Counting In Illinois (WP)

By Kari Lydersen And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO, March 22 -- Election officials here resumed counting ballots Wednesday after problems with new electronic voting machines around Cook County forced them to halt the count in a key local race in Tuesday's primary that also had voters casting ballots for governor and Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0020249

The election was one of the first major tests of how well states and localities, seeking to comply with new federal law, have replaced outdated voting machines with modern, more accurate technology that is more accessible to disabled people.

The problems Tuesday night did not significantly affect tabulations for one of the nation's key congressional primaries. Late tallies showed that Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth narrowly won the Democratic nomination for Illinois's 6th District, where Republican Rep. Henry J. Hyde is retiring. But results for an important local race, the Democratic nomination for the Cook County Board president, were delayed until Wednesday.

Illinois has received more than $144 million in federal grants to comply with the Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed in 2002 in response to the controversy over the disputed election in South Florida in 2000. Some of that grant went to pay for a $50 million new system of optical-scan and touch-screen machines in Cook County, manufactured by Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif.

"It didn't work as well as we would have liked, but it did work," said Chicago Board of Election Commissioners spokesman Tom Leach.

Election reform advocates have been raising concerns for months about the security and implementation of new voting technology. But some officials said Wednesday that the technology generally worked well and the problems that occurred here were not surprising, given the thousands of poll workers who had to learn the new system, one of the most complex in the nation.

Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the federal Election Assistance Commission who was in Chicago to observe the election, characterized the problems as "growing pains." He said that as states hold primaries in coming months, "there will be complicating issues with new equipment, but we'll work through them," with the goal of having the kinks worked out by the November general elections.

The biggest hurdle Tuesday appeared to be that poll workers at 365 of the more than 3,000 sites had trouble electronically transmitting final tabulations to the main elections office downtown. Officials stopped counting and ordered elections judges to bring ballots and memory cartridges to the office.

The judges started to arrive at 1 p.m. Wednesday. About 40 judges there received lengthy instructions on tabulating and, if necessary, recounting the ballots.

Cheryl Kawa, a veteran Democratic election judge, said: "It's reminding me of the day of the chads. It's overwhelming."

She wasn't disappointed in election officials or the system, though. "They're all human; they're doing the best they can."

Despite the problems, Leach was confident that all votes would be counted, and he pledged to get to the bottom of the problem. "We'll go back to every one of those 365 precincts and find out: Was it human error or was it mechanical error?" he said. "Not one voter was sent away, and not one voter was disenfranchised."

Proportion Of Doctors Giving Charity Care Declines (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The proportion of U.S. physicians providing charity care has steadily declined over the past decade, even as the number of Americans without health insurance has risen significantly, a new study finds, suggesting that government health programs and clinics will face increased demand.

In 2004-2005, 68 percent of doctors said they delivered some free or discounted care to low-income patients, down from the 76 percent recorded 10 years earlier, according to a national survey being released today by the Center for Studying Health System Change. The center, a nonpartisan research group funded primarily by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, noted that the number of uninsured people climbed to 45.5 million in 2004.

"One of the striking things about this is that the decrease is pretty much across the board," said lead author Peter J. Cunningham. Charity care declined regardless "of specialty, type of practice, size of practice or part of the country."

Overall, higher-paid specialists or doctors working in small private practices were more likely to provide charity care than internists, pediatricians or those employed by large managed-care companies, the survey found.

Nearly 80 percent of surgeons reported providing free care, largely because they spend more time in hospitals, which are required by law to treat indigent patients. Pediatricians, on the other hand, probably saw less demand for charity care because higher percentages of children receive care through government programs. Although the number of physicians providing charity care has remained stable, the proportion has fallen because there are many more doctors practicing medicine.

Less charity care in the doctor's office means more demands on hospital emergency rooms and more patients who simply go without care, said Cunningham, who oversaw the survey of 6,600 physicians. In a related study, the center found that a declining number of uninsured Americans received routine medical care. In 2003, 46 percent of people without health insurance had a regular doctor, down from 52 percent in 1996.

Busy schedules, reduced reimbursement rates and high medical-school debt appear to be contributing to the problem.

"Physicians are still committed to charity care," said J. Edward Hill, president of the American Medical Association. "Time pressures for physicians have increased enormously, and there have been income drops."

At a time when insurers are clamping down on reimbursements, most young doctors carry an average medical-school debt of $119,000, he said. And although charity care has dipped, Hill, a family physician from Mississippi, stressed that "nearly 70 percent" of doctors still offer some.

Until recently, the nonprofit Family and Child Services Inc. of Washington relied on a network of volunteer doctors to provide free checkups to needy children heading to summer camp. But now, "that service just isn't available," said Charlotte L. McConnell, the group's executive director.

Time pressures and fear of lawsuits are the two most common reasons doctors give McConnell. "My sense is they have to do a certain volume to cover their expanding costs, especially in D.C. to cover [malpractice] insurance," she said.

In Texas, President Bush's home state, "volunteer charity care is nonexistent," said Sherry L. Hill, chief executive of the Community Health Centers of South Central Texas Inc. "It is the rare physician that will donate a day or an afternoon or morning."

Last year, 7,000 patients made 25,000 visits to the centers' clinics, more than triple the number served in 1999, she said. The clients, 70 percent of whom are uninsured, all work -- as farmers, ranchers, domestic help or gas station attendants.

At a dinner meeting with local doctors, Hill, who is not related to the AMA president, asked if anyone would volunteer to be a substitute when the center's staff physicians went on vacation. "I didn't get a taker in the group," she said.

The real problem, said the AMA's Hill, is the steadily rising number of people with little or no health insurance.

"The solution is fair coverage for all," he said. "We've got to wake up in this country and decide we're going to solve that problem."

Since taking office, Bush has added or expanded 865 federally funded community health centers, serving about 14.6 million patients this year, said Bill Hall, a spokesman for the Department of Health and Human Services.

"They've been expanding, but they are not universally available across the country," and most of the community health centers offer limited services, Cunningham said.

Who Will Make Baltimore Safe? (WP)

By Douglas M. Duncan

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Too often in Maryland politics we see jurisdictional squabbling and turf battles. We see fights between the Washington suburbs and the Baltimore region, or the Eastern Shore and Western Maryland. Such squabbles are not productive; in fact, they are roadblocks to progress. But one thing is clear: All residents of Maryland have a stake in our state's largest city. We cannot have a healthy Maryland until we have a healthy Baltimore. And when it comes to crime, Baltimore is not healthy.

In 2003 Baltimore was the second-most dangerous big city in America. Today it remains so. Per capita homicide rates have actually increased since 2000. Baltimore is six times as deadly as New York and three times as deadly as Los Angeles. In 2004 only three major cities reported increases in homicides: Detroit, St. Louis and Baltimore. While other cities have had historic declines in homicides and violent crime, Baltimore has not had similar success. And while there has been progress in the Inner Harbor, far too many neighborhoods are still racked with crime.

The mayor of Baltimore can't seem to crack the problem. He's on his fourth police commissioner, and the police department itself is dealing with a major scandal. The mayor openly spars with prosecutors when they need to be working together. And sadly, politics are being put ahead of people. The Baltimore Sun recently reported that the crime numbers being kept by the city may not be accurate. A WBAL-TV series in Baltimore revealed dramatic instances of crimes not being reported. Solid, sound information is the bedrock of crime fighting and prevention.

But instead of solutions, we're seeing political posturing. Mayor Martin O'Malley repeatedly refers to a 40 percent decline in violent crime. Independent experts say it may be more like 23 percent. While campaigning in Montgomery County, O'Malley claimed it was 50 percent. He labels calls for independent audits as political stunts. But somehow O'Malley's 1999 audit of crime -- conducted by consultants he hired -- is considered by the mayor to be above reproach. Some, however, question whether it was used to overstate the reduction in crime.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. is calling for an audit -- but only of five jurisdictions, which gives the appearance of politicization in an election year. While this is a step in the right direction, a statewide audit is the only way to get an accurate assessment of crime in Maryland.

Who's thinking about the people of Baltimore?

Given all the recent reports that have come out about the suspect crime numbers, several members of the General Assembly have introduced a bill for a comprehensive, independent audit of crime across the state, not just in five jurisdictions. I urge swift passage of this bill. The first step in solving a problem is assessing the problem.

I recently stood with Baltimore's top prosecutor and other leaders and released a comprehensive plan to reduce crime across the state. It calls for 1,000 more police officers on the streets, but that's just a start. It calls for more drug treatment and the expansion of currently successful drug courts. It calls for better pre-release services and expanding Operation Restart, which helps put people's lives back on track when they get out of jail. There are new laws to crack down on gangs and combat sexual predators. And, perhaps most important, the plan would commit resources to community crime task forces. These task forces would bring together law enforcement, community groups and other agencies in Maryland to target efforts in high-crime areas. Sometimes a housing agency can shut down a crack house faster than the police can. Or the health department can shut down a restaurant that is also a front for crime faster than the courts. By pooling community knowledge and efforts, we can improve communities faster.

It's a blueprint for the first step in achieving a healthy Baltimore, and a healthy Maryland.

Some have said I am engaged in "Baltimore bashing." They need to ask themselves who is doing the real disservice to the good people of Baltimore: those who talk honestly and openly about the problems and lay out strategies to solve them, or those who engage in constant political posturing and continue to describe rosy scenarios while people still live in fear?

I believe education is the long-term solution to reducing crime and improving the quality of life in Maryland. But families cannot be asked to wait for safer neighborhoods. Children deserve safe streets today.

The writer is Montgomery County executive and a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor of Maryland.

A Vision, Bruised And Dented (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The big question in Democratic circles is, Who can win? The big question in Republican circles is, What do we believe? The setbacks in Iraq, the failure to limit the size of government and plummeting poll numbers have changed the way Republicans talk and govern.

If you wanted to put these changes in a nutshell, you'd say the Republicans have gone from soaring Bushian universalism to nervous, dumbed-down Huntingtonism.

Just over a year ago, Republicans were thrilling to the lofty sentiments of President Bush's second inaugural: that freedom is God's gift to humanity, that people everywhere hunger for liberty. To explain his efforts to democratize the Middle East, Bush hit all the high notes of the American creed, while not dwelling much on the intricacies and stubbornness of foreign cultures.

Today, many Republicans have lost patience with Bush's high-minded creedal statements. Like the Harvard political scientist Samuel Huntington, they have come to believe that culture matters most. Lofty notions about universal liberty splinter on the shoals of Arab customs. Heartfelt convictions about reducing the size of government disintegrate inside the culture of Washington. Many Republicans have lost faith in efforts to transform patterns of behavior, and come to believe that we shouldn't exaggerate how much we can change.

In the realm of foreign affairs, we have seen the rise of what Richard Lowry of National Review calls the " 'To Hell With Them' Hawks." These, Lowry writes, "are conservatives who are comfortable using force abroad, but have little patience for a deep entanglement with the Muslim world, which they consider unredeemable, or at least not worth the strenuous effort of trying to redeem." They look at car bombs and cartoon riots and wonder whether Islam is really a religion of peace. They look at the mayhem in the Middle East and just want to withdraw. After all, in his book "The Clash of Civilizations," Huntington didn't want to change the Muslim world — he just called for less contact with it.

In the field of immigration, Republican sentiment seems to be shifting away from the idea that the United States is a universal nation, where immigrants come from across the world to work, rise and join in the pursuit of happiness. Now Republican rhetoric emphasizes how alien immigrant culture is; how slowly the Mexicans assimilate, if at all; how much disorder and strain their presence creates.

There is a chance that in the next few weeks, the G.O.P. will walk off a cliff on the subject of immigration. In the desperate effort to win back their base, Republican senators may follow Bill Frist and embrace a draconian enforcement-only immigration bill (which will lose them Florida and the Southwest for a generation).

Finally, there is the issue of domestic poverty. Hurricane Katrina rekindled a brief resurgence of compassionate conservatism, at least for President Bush. But Republicans in Congress were having none of it. They appropriated the money they had to, but they had no confidence that the federal government could do anything effective to transform the culture of poverty: the out-of-wedlock births, the family breakdowns and so on.

In short, Republicans seem to have gone from believing that culture is nothing, to believing that culture is everything — from idealism to fatalism in the blink of an eye.

Recently, I've spilled a lot of ink stressing the importance of culture as we think about poverty, development and foreign affairs. But it's dismaying to see so many Republicans veer overboard into a vulgarized version of Huntingtonist cultural determinism.

European conservatives from Edmund Burke to Michael Oakeshott usefully remind us of the power of culture and tradition. But American conservatives — from Hamilton to Reagan — have never taken that path precisely because they believe in the power of the American creed, precisely because they have an Enlightenment faith in the power of reason to change minds.

Whether in Iraq or the barrio, history is not a prison. Culture shapes people, but cultures are changeable.

Fortunately, there is a great Republican leader who understood the balance between culture and creed: Abraham Lincoln. In this spring of Republican discontent, his approach and governing method will make a good subject for a future column.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS:

Rice Optimistic About Iran Diplomacy (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, March 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed confidence Wednesday that Russia and China would eventually resolve their differences with the United States and its European allies on how to pressure Iran to stop enriching uranium.

"Sometimes diplomacy takes a little bit of time, but we're working very hard on that," Rice told reporters during a visit here.

The top U.S. diplomat said she is not worried about a delay in efforts at the United Nations to write a statement addressing Iran's disputed nuclear program. Russia and China's opposition to a tough statement stalled talks with high-level diplomats this week at the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0020253

The intention all along, Rice said, was to come up with a vehicle to allow the international community "to speak strongly to Iran that it has no other course but to return to negotiations, suspend its programs and agree to a civil nuclear arrangement" that would alleviate possible risks of weaponization.

"We will come up with a vehicle, I am quite certain of that," she said. "We have work still to do. This is the natural course of diplomacy. If it takes a little longer, I'm not really concerned about that."

The United States, Britain and France have failed to get Russia and China to agree that the U.N. Security Council should approve a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency, that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment efforts.

The process can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons. The United States and its European allies contend that Iran seeks the ability to make bombs. Iran insists its nuclear program is peaceful and is intended only for civilian energy production.

Russia and China strongly oppose language backed by the U.S. and Europeans that would call for a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA's demands. Russia and China want Iran to have more time and want the IAEA to keep the lead in pressuring Iran.

Rice spoke while in the Bahamas to meet with 14 foreign ministers and the secretary general of the Caribbean Community and Common Market, a regional trade bloc known as Caricom.

On the agenda were discussions of how the United States could work with the Caribbean countries to urge democratic change, enhance economies, strengthen security and improve disaster preparedness.

The brief Caribbean trip also was intended to alleviate friction between the Bush administration and Caribbean leaders over the ouster of former Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 2004.

"This is part of her effort to get this relationship back where it should be," said Tom Shannon, assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere. "I think we're just about there."

Caribbean leaders have accused the United States of being an accomplice in Aristide's toppling. He fled Haiti amid a bloody rebellion and his supporters contend the United States forced him from office. The Bush administration says he left voluntarily.

U.S. troops were sent to Haiti after Aristide's departure and remained there until U.N. peacekeepers were deployed. By the end of 2006, the United States will have provided $500 million in aid to Haiti over three years.

Caricom suspended Haiti's membership shortly after Aristide fled, refusing to recognize an interim government the group called unconstitutional.

Recently, the group has said Haiti will be allowed to rejoin if recent presidential and parliamentary elections are deemed free and fair.

Rice was urging the group to fully restore its relationship with Haiti and help stabilize the country as its new government tries to overcome two decades of democratic failure and widespread political violence.

U.S. officials say the group not only pulled away from Haiti over the past two years but also separated itself from international efforts to strengthen the Western Hemisphere's poorest country.

Aside from a previous visit to Haiti, the trip was Rice's first to the Caribbean as the top U.S. diplomat and the Bush administration considered it the next step toward a solid policy agenda between Caribbean countries and the United States.

Previously, Rice met with the Caribbean foreign ministers in June in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., and again in September at the United Nations.

Nations Seek To Break Deadlock Over Iran (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, March 22, 2006

U.N. Security Council members sought to break a deadlock over Iran's suspect nuclear program Wednesday after Britain and France could not get Russia and China to agree on how to pressure Tehran to stop enriching uranium, diplomats said.

DOJ_NMG_0020254

Nonetheless, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she was confident that the council could come to an agreement.

"We will come up with a vehicle, I am quite certain of that," Rice said during a trip to the Bahamas. "We have work still to do. This is the natural course of diplomacy. If it takes a little longer, I'm not really concerned about that."

As Rice spoke, the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — convened at the U.S. mission to the U.N. but reported no new progress in formulating a council statement.

The lack of progress, which followed a decision to scrap full council discussions Tuesday, reflected just how much the United States and its European allies had failed to get Russia and China on board during a meeting of high-level diplomats in New York the night before.

One council diplomat described that meeting as a setback for British, French and American efforts to craft a tough council response to Iran, which the West believes is seeking nuclear weapons. Russia and China are firm in their belief that any Security Council action should be mild.

"We're trying to get back on track from where we were before last night's meetings," the diplomat said on condition of anonymity because the talks were confidential. "The Russians and the Chinese came in guns ablazing."

President Bush stressed that Iran should never be allowed to have a nuclear weapon, and said that diplomacy continued.

"We're dealing with this issue diplomatically by having the Germans and the French and the British send a clear message to the Iranians, with our strong backing, that you will not have the capacity to make a weapon, to know how to make a weapon," Bush told an audience in Wheeling, W. Va.

"Iran with a nuclear weapon is a threat and it's dangerous, and we must not let them have a weapon."

The United States and its European allies want the Security Council to approve a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

Iran insists its program is for generating electricity.

Diplomats said the Russians and Chinese have not budged from their opposition to tough language seeking a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA demands. Moscow and Beijing have said that is not enough time, with China suggesting 30-45 days.

Russia and China also want the IAEA to keep the main role in cajoling Iran on uranium enrichment. They have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

Monday's meeting had been intended to discuss broad strategy and a first council response. Britain, for example, has proposed offering Iran a package of unspecified incentives as a way of getting Russia and China to agree to the threat of tougher council measures later on.

But the sides made little headway, emerging only to express concern that Iran had not yet met IAEA demands.

The lack of any significant movement after 10 days could lead the Western nations to abandon the presidential statement, which requires the consensus of all 15 council members, in favor of a resolution, a council diplomat said on condition of anonymity because the issue had not been raised with members yet.

That would put Russia and China in the position of having to approve, abstain or veto action against Iran.

Negotiations between Iran and France, Germany and Britain, acting on behalf of the European Union, collapsed in August after Tehran rejected an incentives package offered in return for a permanent end to uranium enrichment.

Its subsequent moves to develop full-blown enrichment capabilities led the IAEA's 35-nation board to ask for Security Council involvement earlier this year.

White House Questions Iran's OK On Talks (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020255

The Bush administration questioned on Wednesday the motives of Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq, but did not shut the door entirely.

"It is a matter of curious timing," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, suggesting Iran was trying to deflect international pressure from its nuclear programs now under criticial discussion at the United Nations.

While a "channel" for communication between the United States and Iran remains open, he said, no meetings have been scheduled.

Khamenei's statement on Tuesday was the first confirmation that he supports having talks. He also warned the United States must not try to "bully" Iran.

President Bush months ago initiated a diplomatic effort to hold talks with Iran over its activities in Iraq. The administration considers Iran meddlesome and accuses it of supporting insurgent militia with weapons.

When Iran last week signaled its willingess to talk, however, Bush's national security adviser, Steven J. Hadley, dismissed the overture as a play designed to divert pressure and attention from nuclear programs the United States and its European allies charge are designed to develop nuclear weapons.

In similar reaction on Wednesday, McCormack said: "I find it very interesting that the Iranian regime has chosen this particular time to seek to communicate with the United States government through this channel of communication, where this channel of communication has been open for some time."

The spokesman went on: "We think it has more to do with Iran's desire to decrease the pressure on the regime and to divert attention from the ongoing discussions about the topic of Iran's nuclear program that we're watching unfold up in New York.

"We think it has more to do with that and less to do with an actual desire to communicate with the United States government on issues concerning Iraq."

Most Americans Believe Iran Is Building A Nuclear Weapon (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

A large majority of Americans believe Iran is using its uranium research program to build a nuclear weapon, according to a recent Harris Interactive poll.

About 85% of Americans say the U.S. "should be concerned" about Iran's nuclear research activities, according to the telephone survey of 2,435 U.S. adults. And 70% say they think Iran is using its research to build a nuclear weapon, the poll shows, while another 25% say they aren't sure.

The U.S. and its European allies are currently seeking a statement from the U.N. Security Council1 to reiterate demands by the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

But the poll shows Americans are mostly divided on whether the U.S. should have the backing of the U.N. in working to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons.

Nearly half of U.S. adults, or 47%, say the U.S. "should only act with support from the United Nations," while 38% say the U.S. "can act alone, but it would be better to have support from the United Nations."

Only 8% say the U.S. would be "perfectly justified to act alone."

Here are full results of the poll: "Recently Iran said it was going to restart its nuclear technology research. Do you think this should be a concern for the U.S. or not?"

Base: All adults * * * "Do you believe that Iran is using this research to try and build a nuclear weapon?"

Base: All adults * * * "In working to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons, to what extent should the U.S. act alone, without support from the United Nations?"

Base: All adults

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., March 8-14, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,435 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of =/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Iranians In Fear Of Fear (WT)

By Nir Boms And Reza Bulorchi

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Following two decades of Tehran's lies and three years of international wishful thinking, Iran's nuclear case was finally brought to the hands of the U.N. Security Council. In the meantime the mullahcracy in Tehran has been gearing itself for another phase of international standoff.

On the same day Tehran declared "the Russian proposal is no longer on our agenda." the Sunday Telegraph reported that Iran has built a secret underground emergency command center in north Tehran as "they prepare for a confrontation with the West over their illicit nuclear program."

Hojatol-Islam Mohsen Gharavian, a disciple of the ultraconservative Ayatollah Mesbah Yazdi, was reported in February to have approved the use of atomic weapons against the "enemies of Islam." Meanwhile, the theocratic regime's shrinking loyal base is mobilized for staged rallies in front of European embassies and nuclear facilities to give an appearance of national legitimacy.

The mullahs' nuclear drive has no doubt enraged Iranians -- but for reasons far different from what the mullahs may admit.

For years, the mullahs have proven to be the biggest enemy of Iranians. The regime carried out summary executions of thousands of political prisoners in what is known as the 1988 massacre that followed a fatwa by Ayatollah Khomeini. Even pregnant prisoners were not spared. Last year, Mohammad Abbaspour, a member of the social committee of Iranian parliament, said "Today 90 percent of people are under the poverty line". The foreign debt has reached almost 30 percent of Iran's GDP. Thousands of Iranians have sold their kidneys to make the ends meet. Some families have even traded their young daughters to human traffickers. Iran's massive flux of rising oil income has only helped to finance a gigantic multi-faceted WMD program and a growing infrastructure of terror around the Middle East.

Indeed, the vast majority of Iranians are opposed to the theocratic regime's drive that has pushed their country to the verge of a military confrontation. An internal classified report prepared by a state-run polling center has reportedly concluded that only 31 percent of Iranians consider the nuclear program a "national' project. The report adds that 86 percent of Iranians believe the nuclear energy is not worth entering a war.

More importantly, however, Iranians have paid the highest price to derail the mullahs' nuclear weapons program. While satellite imagery and inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) contributed to getting a sense of the extent of Iran's nuclear drive, it was the Iranian opposition that played the key role in exposing the mullahs' nuclear secrets. The National Council of Resistance of Iran, the major opposition coalition, revealed in August 2002 that Tehran was building two new secret nuclear facilities in the cities of Arak and Natanz. In February 2003, Iran admitted to the existence of two sites, a development that set in motion the IAEA resolution to report Iran to the U.N. Security Council.

It has become increasingly difficult for the mullahs to cast their atomic drive as an "Iranian" program while the Iranian opposition is at the center of the campaign against it. And to hit back at the opposition, mullahs chose their usual route. Several days before the IAEA meeting, prison officials announced that if the nuclear case were ever referred to the Security Council, they would unleash their wrath on political prisoners.

And that threat became a chilling reality just a day after the IAEA vote. Hojjat Zamani, 31, a political prisoner and a member of MEK (an affiliate of the opposition coalition), was snatched from his cell by prison guards and hanged at dawn on Feb. 7, according to Amnesty International. More prisoners are feared to be facing a similar fate.

The Zamini case shows that Iran's drive for nuclear weapons is the flip side of its campaign of suppression at home. This year alone, more than 30 individuals have been executed -- many in public -- or sentenced to death. The daring strike of Tehran transit workers was brutally crushed, as was the peaceful but defiant stand of several thousands Sufi Muslims last week. Meanwhile, Elham Afroten, a 20-year-old female journalist, is reported incarcerated since Jan. 23 and badly mistreated for allegedly placing a satirical article comparing Ayatollah Khomeini to the AIDS virus.

Iran's theocracy will do anything to instill fear; which is why it will do everything to get the nukes. And when it succeeds, one can easily imagine what would a regime that cares so little about its own citizens may do to the citizens of the "infidel" world. For the sake of the world and for the sake of the Iranian people -- the mullahs must not be given that nuclear choice.

Nir Boms is the vice president of the Center for Freedom in the Middle East. Reza Bulorchi is the executive director of the U.S. Alliance for Democratic Iran.

Opening With A Trap Door (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Ask administration hard-liners about Iran's sudden acceptance of the U.S. offer to talk about stability in Iraq and you hear this reaction: It's a booby trap. These hawks are right.

Put the same question to moderates on the Bush team and this is the response: It's an opening in the confrontation and a necessary step toward an exit strategy for Iraq. The remarkable thing is that these doves are right, too.

President Bush must treat the Iranian decision to open discussions in Baghdad as trap and opportunity. It is both. The administration should pursue this small opening in the Iranian wall with discipline and attention to maintaining a united front with its European and Asian partners. They are Iran's immediate targets.

The Iranians will certainly suggest to Europe, Japan and India that the United States is dealing behind its allies' backs to protect its interests in Iraq. The Iranians are masters at playing on others' divisions, often by inviting them to exploit simulated divisions on the Iranian side. Thus the endless arguments over Iran's "moderates."

The Bush team must make the Baghdad talks one insulated part of a coordinated three-pronged approach to Iran. Contacts with Iran must be managed as hard-nosed diplomacy that will go to the brink -- but not be carried over it by bluster and inflexibility.

The White House rightly insists that the Baghdad talks be limited to practical steps for defusing the crisis in Iraq. Discussion in Baghdad of Iran's nuclear ambitions, now under scrutiny in the U.N. Security Council, or other broad topics would undermine the allied unity that has brought the complaint against Iran this far.

The State Department hopes to get a declaration from the Security Council in about two weeks that ostensibly gives the Iranians a final chance to suspend their nuclear enrichment program and return to negotiations with the European Union and Russia.

The statement is in fact a necessary step toward new U.N. negotiations over a resolution imposing sanctions on Iran. "The Europeans need to show their publics that they have jumped through all the hoops" before threatening sanctions, a U.S. official says. Washington is cooperating in this approach.

To reduce the danger that Iran will use the Baghdad talks as a divisive ploy, the United States should now join -- and lead -- the negotiating effort over enrichment. After the move to talk to Iran in Baghdad, the Bush administration cannot remain a silent, outside partner at the top rung of the negotiating ladder. And U.S. direct involvement provides the only hope of getting the Iranians back to the table.

The threat of sanctions has already triggered a counterthreat from Iran to use oil as a weapon. Washington must lead in establishing a credible international emergency energy-sharing program to confront that bad-case scenario. "We have to say to the Iranians together that we will endure a cold winter or two but they will be harmed even more by an oil boycott," says a senior European politician who has studied Iranian negotiating behavior extensively.

U.S. officials recognize that U.N. action might not be sufficient or even forthcoming. They now speak of a "diplomatic coalition of the willing" to pursue sanctions and other measures against Iran if the U.N. effort falters. But that coalition must be forged through diplomatic leadership and the sharing of the negotiating burden.

Such sharing can be reinforced in a third layer of contacts in this policy of engaging Iran, with intense skepticism. The United States should support efforts by the U.N. special representative to Iraq, Ashraf Jehangir Qazi, to establish a contact group of regional states that would meet regularly -- in Baghdad.

Regional "meetings outside Baghdad don't work at this stage," Qazi told U.S. officials he visited this week in Washington in a refreshing burst of candor. Having senior diplomats from Egypt, Syria, Jordan and other Persian Gulf countries -- including Iran -- wrestle concretely with Iraq's daily problems could usefully supplement the U.S.-Iranian talks.

The experts say that Iran is six to nine months away from mastering the centrifuge process of enrichment, the key step in a 5- to 10-year process of building a nuclear bomb. Talking to the Iranians at three interlocking levels is the best way to determine whether there is any realistic hope of deflecting them from enrichment or deterring them if they get the bomb -- and what happens if the answer to both is no.

Bush must reshape Ronald Reagan's attitude toward Mikhail Gorbachev: Don't trust, do verify at every step of the way. First, there must be something to verify.

Bush Presses For India Nuclear Pact (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

President Bush urged Congress on Wednesday to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India — a deal that could be a tough sell to lawmakers.

Bush said India has proven itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator.

"It's in our interest that India use nuclear power to power their economic growth because ... there's a global connection between demand for fossil fuels elsewhere and price here," Bush said in Wheeling, W.Va., where he gave remarks centered on Iraq and the war on terror.

In Washington, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also urged lawmakers to approve the deal. "India can be trusted," he said.

Critics, including former Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., are skeptical of the agreement reached March 2 by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh of India.

It requires Congress to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries, such as India, that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections.

Among concerns raised by Nunn, who played a leading role on military issues in Congress, were that the agreement would promote a regional arms race with China and Pakistan and make it more difficult for the United States to win support for sanctions against such countries as Iran and North Korea.

Burns said "we take his views very seriously." But, Burns said at a news conference, "we're far better off" having India submit to supervision under the agreement than having the country isolated.

He added that "India is a country that does not proliferate."

"We are going to make a convincing case," Burns said.

Legislation to implement the plan was introduced last week. Burns said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would testify in support of the measure.

Also, two assistant secretaries of state, Richard Boucher and Stephen Rademaker, were sent to Vienna to promote the plan with the Nuclear Suppliers Group, an assembly of 35 nations that export nuclear technology.

"India is accepting international verification," he said. "India is accepting international inspection. Who can argue with that?"

DOJ_NMG_0020259

He said the agreement reflects "the emergence of a new global partnership between India and the United States."

Burns said it should cause no problem with Pakistan, traditionally a rival of India, and that the United States maintains good, although different, relations with Pakistan.

Pakistan on Tuesday successfully test-fired a cruise missile that can carry a nuclear warhead and hit targets within a 310-mile range, the army said.

Both Pakistan and India are nuclear-capable nations.

UK Chosen As Possible 'Star Wars' Site (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Interceptor missiles could be placed in the UK as part of the US "Star Wars" missile defence system, according to plans revealed by the Pentagon.

The moves are likely to attract more unwelcome attention for prime minister Tony Blair's government over the nature of the transatlantic relationship.

Lt Gen Trey Obering, head of the Missile Defense Agency, disclosed at a military conference in Washington this week that the US had formally selected Britain as possible site for the interceptors in Europe.

However, Bryan Whitman, Pentagon spokesman, said on Wednesday that negotiations had not taken place on basing interceptors in the UK. "[There has been] no planning, no approach, no request, and no invitation."

Poland and the Czech Republic were already known as candidates, while Hungary has apparently been dropped. The Bush administration wanted to make a single choice soon, analysts said.

The ballistic missile defence system, which involves putting interceptors in Europe by 2010, is intended to protect the US from missile attack with land, sea, air and space-based assets.

The programme has cost $90bn since 1985 and the Pentagon plans to spend another $58bn in the next six years, according to a recent congressional report, which also highlighted test failures and criticised cost overruns and lack of transparency.

Britain already plays a crucial role in the defence of the US through the early-warning radar system at the Fylingdales base in northern England. The two sides signed a memorandum of understanding on ballistic missile defence in 2003.

Rumours of secret deals to place interceptors in the UK have been around for some time. In October 2004, Geoff Hoon, then UK defence secretary, told parliament any such decision would "be open to scrutiny and debate in the normal way" but that specific parliamentary approval would not be required.

Lt Gen Obering said the mission was to develop an "integrated layered" system that would also protect US allies.

The UK would be the "third site" for interceptors after Fort Greely in Alaska and Vandenberg Air Force Base in California.

Placing interceptors in the UK would raise the risk of Britain itself coming under attack, warns the British American Security Information Council (Basic), an independent defence watchdog.

Ian Davis, executive director of Basic, said it was inconceivable that the US would have announced the UK as a possible location without having discussed the issue with London. He thought eastern Europe was a more likely choice.

There was no immediate comment from UK officials.

Rice Reduces Caribbean Ire, But Falls Short On Aid To Haiti (NYT)

By Joel Brinkley

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

NASSAU, the Bahamas, March 22 — After two days of meetings with Caribbean leaders, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice appeared to have cooled some of their anger toward the United States but failed to persuade them to embrace the new government in Haiti, United States officials said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0020260

One goal of her visit here was to persuade the other Caribbean nations to take forceful steps to help the new Haitian government stabilize the country and deal with its crushing problems. What she got was a commitment to readmit Haiti to the Caribbean Community of nations and a vague promise to help Haiti in the future.

"Where do we go in the future?" asked Fred Mitchell, the Bahamian foreign minister and chairman of the Caribbean Community. "We remain engaged" with Haiti "and will continue to review the matter."

Relations between the United States and the Caribbean Community, known as Caricom, have been strained and embittered for two years, in part because of opposition here to the war in Iraq but also because of the role of the United States in Haiti. Many Caribbean leaders contend that the United States forced President Jean-Bertrand Aristide from power in 2004.

Before this visit, Ms. Rice met twice with groups of Caribbean foreign ministers, once during an Organization of American States meeting last spring and again at the United Nations in September, but she and her aides said they realized that she had to come here to begin turning the situation around. "We intend not just to continue our relationship but to deepen and broaden" it, she said Wednesday at a news conference with Mr. Mitchell. Several of the Caribbean foreign ministers listened in the front row as she spoke.

A joint statement said Ms. Rice "agreed to strengthen cooperation with a view to enhancing Caricom-U.S. relations." While language like that is common in such statements, United States officials said they were encouraged by the reception the Caribbean leaders gave Ms. Rice.

One said, "We are now on the same page." There was no indication, however, that the Caribbean leaders had softened their position on the war in Iraq.

The United States officials were less pleased with commitments by Caricom countries to help Haiti.

"I didn't hear them," a senior administration official said.

At the news conference, Ms. Rice reminded the Caribbean leaders that "we all have a tremendous stake in the development of a democratic Haiti that can be self-supporting."

If Haiti falls into chaos once again, she added, "that can have an effect on this region and, in fact, an effect on the United States."

René Préval, who was elected president on Feb. 7, is to form a government this spring.

Schooling China In The American Way (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

BEIJING, March 22 -- Three United States senators came to one of China's most prestigious universities on Wednesday, ostensibly to talk about trade. What they delivered was an expansive, almost evangelical campaign for American values -- one that received pushback from their audience of students and faculty.

The senators talked about an unfair advantage they say Chinese exporters enjoy over American firms because of the low-value currency. They implored China to adopt the norms of global trade. In strikingly moral tones, they pledged Washington's resolve to pressure China to liberalize not only its currency regime but also its political culture, using trade as a wedge for broader reform.

Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) told the Tsinghua University audience that his model of leadership is "a man by the name of Jesus." He later quoted Martin Luther King Jr. as he urged China to do "the right thing" on trade policy.

Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) told the students that, post-9/11, Americans are committed to taking on whatever battles seem imperative -- China's cheap currency, along with al-Qaeda.

"In my country, we're very arrogant, and I admit to it," Graham said. "You have to understand that Americans have for 200 years fought and died not just for our freedom, but for other people's freedoms."

Charles E. Schumer, the New York Democrat who has led the drive to force China to raise the value of its currency, the yuan, said economic reform leads toward a free society. "I believe it is inevitable that China will have much more freedom," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0020261

But when the time came for questions, the reaction from students and faculty -- though polite and reserved -- revealed how the American campaign for a free-floating Chinese currency has backfired in some quarters. Many here resent the specter of the world's lone superpower seemingly attempting to dictate how Beijing should manage its economy and the values that should govern Chinese society.

A 21-year-old architecture student who gave his name as Albert rejected the idea that the civil liberties the senators suggested have universal appeal.

"Have you ever thought that it is probably the freedom of speech that you guys promote that finally resulted in this terrorist attack," he said, calling 9/11 an act of "revenge" for American offenses against Islam. "In China, we have promoted the harmony that would have prevented this kind of attack."

Schumer leapt from his chair. "I don't think you understand the concept of freedom of speech," he said. "It is our American understanding that freedom leads to stability."

Economist Li Daokui, a member of Tsinghua's faculty, told the senators that he lived in the United States for more than 15 years and "loves the country." But he warned them that the senators' pressure for change was provoking a defensive response from those who might otherwise be friendly to reform.

"Democracy, personal liberties and freedom of speech: These are ideals," Li said. "My worry is that if some people press things too quickly, you will undermine the whole process."

He questioned whether a revaluing of China's currency would create any jobs in the United States.

A man in a blue suit demanded to know how many U.S. senators -- now moving toward a vote on a trade bill that could have great consequences here -- have ever visited his country. "Many Americans are not very well informed of the real situation in China," he said.

Schumer, Graham and Coburn are in China for five days for what they say is an examination of the forces at play before they decide whether to proceed with a vote on the bill at the end of the month. With China's President Hu Jintao scheduled to visit the United States in April and a U.S. Treasury Department report in the works that could brand China a currency manipulator, the Schumer-Graham bill has become a key front in an increasingly tense trade relationship between the countries. It would apply 27.5 percent tariffs to all Chinese-made goods if China does not substantially revalue the currency.

The bill has gained momentum as China's trade surplus with the United States has grown, swelling to $200 billion last year. But many economists assert that even a significant revaluation would do little to alter the trade balance, noting that many of the goods China exports, such as clothing and furniture, have not been made in large quantities in the United States for years. Others called the trip political posturing.

But the reception the senators are receiving attests to the gravity of the issue for China's leaders, who are cognizant of the angry mood in Washington. The senators dined Wednesday night with Zhou Xiaochuan, the governor of the People's Bank of China. They were to meet Thursday with Vice Premier Wu Yi.

The senators said they were here to discuss not only the currency but also China's failure to crack down on routine theft of intellectual property (from pirated Hollywood movies to counterfeit pharmaceuticals), as well as barriers to foreign investment here. The currency issue "has become a metaphor for the whole trade relationship," Schumer said.

China has been emphasizing the difficulties it faces in freeing its currencies, particularly the risk that it could slow economic growth. That message has already gained some sympathy from the U.S. visitors.

"I've learned that you've got 700 million people who need employment, that the interior of your country is not developed," Graham told the students. "I've learned in coming here that for you to change your system very quickly would be very hard for your country. I understand that better now."

Schumer and Graham said they were very impressed by assertions by Chinese officials that they have come to see a free-floating currency as being in their own interest, though they will need to move gradually. "We walk away from this meeting seeing that they are not mouthing it," Schumer said. "They believe."

The senators will also walk away with an appreciation for the pageantry that China uses to great effect in winning over visitors -- even those who come with unpleasant business. On Tuesday night, after an official dinner in the Great Hall of the People, the senators buzzed over the experience.

"It was the most awesome room," Graham said.

"It wasn't your typical Chinese food," added Schumer. "It was amazing stuff, not your usual stuff. And they went easy on us. No sea slugs. No jellyfish."

But if China's culinary achievements left a favorable impression, Schumer was less impressed by the political culture. On Wednesday, as he spoke at the university, he asked for a show of hands from those believing that "freedom is the eventual right path for China to be on." Perhaps a dozen of the 50 or so people in the room tentatively raised hands.

How many disagreed? Five hands went up. How many people were unsure? No one raised a hand, leaving a silent majority expressing no sentiment at all.

"It's still a very controlled society," Schumer said as he boarded the bus that would take him past countless new skyscrapers and on to the five-star St. Regis Hotel. "They've got a ways to go."

China Tries To Charm Couple Of Senate Skeptics (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BEIJING, March 22 — Global Times, a tabloid newspaper in China's capital, usually offers its readers a rich diet of nationalist propaganda on subjects like Japanese war crimes and American hegemony.

So it is telling that it devoted its front page on Tuesday to respectful, even admiring, coverage of the China visit of two United States senators, Charles E. Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who have attacked Beijing for "illegal currency manipulation," "mercantilism" and "failure to play by the rules."

The senators, the paper said, "have sent a positive signal by coming to China to see for themselves."

"It is not like earlier times when members of Congress relied on hearsay or their own imagination when they criticized China," the article said.

With a banquet in the Great Hall of the People, a roster of top-level meetings and fawning attention in the state-run press, China wants to win over Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham.

The reason seems clear: At a time of rising economic nationalism in the United States, highlighted by the rejection of the Dubai ports deal, the Beijing leadership fears that a bill drafted by the senators to impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese exports to the United States has a chance to become law. That would upend economic relations between the world's richest nation and its fastest-growing rival.

The bill would impose the tariffs unless Beijing substantially revalued its currency, the yuan, which critics say the government keeps artificially low. It has met firm opposition from some business leaders and economists, who say they fear a trade war, but it garnered 67 votes in a nonbinding tally in the Senate recently and may come up for a formal vote as soon as March 31.

"They know it's for real," Mr. Schumer said before a private dinner with China's central bank governor on Wednesday evening. "Believe me, the people who are seeing us wouldn't be seeing us if they didn't think it's for real."

The bill and the senators' high-level reception are among the signs that Chinese-American economic relations have become fraught with tensions that trade experts and members of Congress say are the most politically volatile since the fight over China's entry to the World Trade Organization in the late 1990's.

The Bush administration has warned China that its big trade surplus with the United States and industrial-scale violations of American trademarks and copyrights threaten the nations' fast-growing trade ties.

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, who will visit China next week, said that unless steps were taken to address American complaints soon, "the administration and the American people may be forced to reassess our bilateral relationship."

Members of Congress have raised the alarm about China's threat to United States manufacturers and workers many times before. But Bush administration officials say the potential for a sustained protest has grown in tandem with China's rising economic power.

China's trade surplus with the United States hit $201 billion last year, a record for any trading partner and an increase of 24 percent from 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0020263

Beijing has controlled its currency within a narrow band around 8 yuan to the dollar, a level that critics say gives it an artificial trade advantage. Despite American pressure, China has allowed its currency to appreciate just 3 percent since it broke a formal, fixed peg to the dollar last July.

China is defending itself against the onslaught, but gingerly. Prime Minister Wen Jiabao, meeting a group of foreign business leaders this week, urged them to convey the message that "it is unfair for the U.S. to scapegoat China for its own structural problems," according to people who attended the meeting.

But Mr. Wen and other top leaders are also trying to improve the atmosphere before President Hu Jintao's first official visit to the United States, scheduled for mid-April. They have promised to tighten enforcement of intellectual property rights and to move steadily toward a more market-driven exchange rate for the yuan, also called the renminbi.

One test of whether Beijing can tame protectionist pressures will be the five-day trip by Mr. Schumer, a Democrat, and Mr. Graham, a Republican, which ends Saturday. The two were joined by Senator Tom Coburn, an Oklahoma Republican, who supports their tariff bill.

The senators declined to say if they had heard anything during their trip to change their minds about the bill. But Mr. Graham said he was "very impressed" with a presentation by a senior economic planner on Wednesday. Mr. Schumer said he had picked up signals "that they are taking the currency where it needs to go, though I'm not sure if they will get there fast enough."

Neither senator has much experience in economic diplomacy. They are lawyers who were not widely noted for their focus on trade, currencies or China before introducing the tariff bill.

Mr. Schumer says his trip to Beijing, Shanghai and Hong Kong is not only the first time he has visited China, but also the first time he has taken an official trip abroad in his 25 years in Congress.

"I'm a homebody," he said. "But somebody has the right to ask, How can you do this if you don't come to China? So we came to China."

Beijing's reaction to their request was cool at first, they said. Mr. Graham joked that of China's 1.3 billion people, "All of them were out of town the week of our visit." Their visas did not come through until shortly before they planned to travel.

But then China laid out a red carpet. They were treated to a banquet in the Hong Kong Room of the Great Hall of the People, the sprawling Stalinist-style meeting hall in Tiananmen Square. They were served dishes that Mr. Schumer, who says his favorite Washington restaurant is Hunan Dynasty on Capitol Hill, pronounced "extraordinary, just extraordinary."

Though they did not get time with Mr. Hu or Mr. Wen, the list of top officials who agreed to meet them is expansive, especially for visitors who do not meet the Chinese leadership's preference for "old friends," or people who have proved sensitive to the Communist Party's interests.

Li Zhaoxing, the foreign minister; Wu Yi, a vice premier and the chief economic troubleshooter; Zhou Xiaochuan, the central bank governor; and Bo Xilai, the commerce minister, are among those on their schedule.

The general sentiment in Beijing is that the threat of the Schumer-Graham tariff can still be headed off. A high tariff would result in "unaccountable losses" to the American economy, because consumers and businesses depend on cheap Chinese imports, said Liu Baocheng, of the Sino-U.S. School of International Management at the University of International Business and Economics in Beijing.

But after the collapse of the Dubai deal, which Mr. Schumer helped bring about, and the failure last summer of a major Chinese energy company's bid to take over the American oil company Unocal, China has grown fearful of surging economic nationalism in the United States.

Mr. Liu said the decision to play host to Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham took a page from China's courtship of Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker. "He was once an advocate of the China threat, but a visit to China turned him into an opponent of that theory," Mr. Liu told The Beijing Morning News.

Much of what the senators were told by government leaders appears to be a recitation of themes — China's mounting internal social problems, its desire to move toward a fully convertible currency, its plans to stimulate domestic consumption — that officials have repeated many times in recent months. But Mr. Schumer said: "They're not just mouthing it. They really believe it."

On Wednesday they got a presentation on currency reform from Zhu Zhixin, a top official of the National Development and Reform Commission, a central planning body.

Mr. Schumer said he had pressed Mr. Zhu to address the imbalances between the United States, which is thought to consume beyond its means, and China, which is thought to consume too little relative to its rising wealth. The official pulled out a page from China's newly enacted 11th five-year plan that made the same point.

"It was a golden moment for us," Mr. Schumer said. "He said this was the right way to go. They just had to figure out how to get there."

Senators In China For Talks On Currency Exchange Rate (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, March 23, 2006

BEIJING — The co-authors of a Senate bill to punish Chinese currency manipulation say they are learning plenty on a fact-finding mission to China, but still seek more progress toward a fairer exchange rate.

"This is a defining moment for Sino-U.S. relations," warned Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., in Beijing on Wednesday. "If we can't solve the currency problem, we'll take a giant step backward."

The stakes are huge. China's trade surplus with the USA passed $200 billion last year. That imbalance costs American jobs and is driven by a deliberately undervalued currency, argue Graham and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

The two senators are co-authors of a bill that proposes a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports into the United States unless Beijing revalues its yuan currency at a higher exchange rate to the dollar.

The yuan, formally known as the renminbi, or "people's currency," currently trades at 8.03 to the dollar, a figure some U.S. critics, including Graham and Schumer, believe is below its real value if it were allowed to float freely on global currency markets.

Chairman Mao Zedong still stares out from most Chinese banknotes, though last week, government advisers in Beijing proposed replacing him with Deng Xiaoping, the reformer who ripped up the Maoist textbook and began the economic reforms that have transformed the Chinese economy.

The Chinese have recovered their capitalist instincts so sharply that, "in competition, you'll beat the socks off us," Graham said to an elite group of MBA students at Beijing's prestigious Tsinghua University. "But let's make sure we play by the same rules."

Change to the currency rate "is not a panacea" for the trade imbalance, Schumer said at the same forum, "but we expect a basic fairness … that will make the global system work."

The congressional delegation, which also includes Sen. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., is in the Chinese capital to see how China works and inform its leaders about rising U.S. anger about what the U.S. sees as unfair trade practices.

"China's cultural wealth, history, intellect, family values and work ethic — nothing can stop China," Coburn said. "We are here to avert a problem, not create one."

The meeting with students Wednesday allowed a more relaxed setting to exchange views with China's future business leaders.

"How many of the 67 senators (who passed a preliminary vote on the tariff bill last year) have been to China?" asked Liu Weiping, an MBA student and CEO of an environmental website. "China has a good reputation and does abide by international principles."

Following further meetings with Chinese government officials, the senators will announce whether they will press ahead with the vote on the tariff bill when they return to Washington. The trip concludes with stops in booming Shanghai and Hong Kong.

China's Hu, Bush To Meet On Terrorism, Nuclear Issues April 20 (BLOOM)

By Cassie M. Chew

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 -- Chinese President Hu Jintao and U.S. President George W. Bush will discuss the fight against terrorism and halting the spread of nuclear weapons when they meet April 20 in Washington, a Bush spokesman said.

DOJ_NMG_0020265

The two leaders will discuss areas of mutual interest and will seek ``to make progress in resolving outstanding differences,'' spokesman Scott McClellan told reporters traveling with the president today to Wheeling, West Virginia.

Hu originally was scheduled to meet with Bush in the U.S. last year. That visit was postponed after Hurricane Katrina devastated the U.S. Gulf Coast.

Democrats and Republicans in Congress are putting pressure on the president to address the trade imbalance between the two nations, which reached a record $201.6 billion last year.

Senators Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, and Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, are in Beijing to talk with Chinese officials about trade and the valuation of China's currency. The two lawmakers are threatening to introduce legislation that would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese imports unless the Chinese government loosens its fixed exchange rate and allows its currency to rise.

Graham said at a news conference in Beijing earlier today that he is ``increasingly hopeful'' that China will move toward a market-based currency.

China on July 21 reset the value of the yuan, a denomination of China's currency, the renminbi, at 8.11 to the dollar, a 2.1 percent appreciation from the pegged level where it had been held since 1995, and linked its value to a basket of currencies including the euro and yen.

China's Competitiveness 'on The Decline' (FT)

By Tom Mitchell

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

The competitiveness of China's manufacturing industries has suffered serious erosion over the past year, according to one of the world's largest trade sourcing companies.

Hong Kong-based Li & Fung group, which manages a $7.1bn a year trading business, said price rises crept back into the Sino-US and EU supply chains last year, after at least six years of often "severe deflation".

William Fung, Li & Fung managing director, reported an average 2-3 per cent increase in the once unbeatable China price its US and European clients were willing to pay. He pointed to a "double-digit" rise in Chinese labour costs, the revaluation of the renminbi and higher oil and energy costs for the shift.

"China's costs are all going up," Mr Fung said. "It is no longer the most cost-effective country in the region...Anything [sourced] from China has a higher inflation component than from other places around the world."

Beneficiaries of China's rising prices have included textile and garment manufacturers in India, Bangladesh and Cambodia, which were expected to lose orders to China after the quota regime governing textile production expired in January 2005.

They were saved, however, by a combination of anti-surge "safeguards" imposed by the US and EU on selected Chinese textile exports in the second half of last year, as well as rising cost pressures in China. "[The safeguards] stopped China in its tracks in terms of textiles," Mr Fung said.

"In Bangladesh factories are so overbooked – it's like China used to be," added Bruce Rockowitz, the president of Li & Fung's trading arm, who oversees sourcing operations on four continents.

The inflationary pressure extends to all product categories sourced by Li & Fung, ranging from fashion accessories and furnishings to sporting and travel goods.

Li & Fung, which used to buy 90 per cent of its non-apparel products from China, has seen 25 per cent of this "hardgoods" business migrate to cheaper locations in south and southeast Asia. It sells about 70 per cent of its sourced goods in the US, and another 20 per cent in Europe.

At its results briefing on Wednesday, Li & Fung reported an 18 per cent increase in group turnover to HK$55.6bn ($7.1bn), with net profit up 20 per cent to HK$1.79bn.

The company also recorded a rare up-tick in its "total margin", which represents the difference between what it pays China-based factories and what it charges overseas retailers. The margin rose to 10.7 per cent from 9.6 per cent.

China Raises Taxes To Curb Use Of Energy And Timber (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0020266

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

HONG KONG, Thursday, March 23 — The Chinese government announced plans on Wednesday to increase existing taxes and impose new ones on April 1 for everything from gas-guzzling vehicles to chopsticks in a move to rein in rising use of energy and timber and the widening gap between rich and poor.

New or higher taxes will fall on vehicles with engines larger than two liters, disposable wooden chopsticks, planks for wood floors, luxury watches, golf clubs, golf balls and certain oil products.

China's finance ministry disclosed the higher taxes Tuesday night in a statement that was reported Wednesday morning by the official New China News Agency. The statement offered another sign that some senior Chinese officials may be having second thoughts about the rapid growth of privately owned family vehicles, whose sales rose to 3.1 million last year from just 640,000 in 2000.

"In recent years, car ownership in China has grown rapidly and fuel consumption has risen considerably, and this highlights the conflict between supply and demand of oil resources," the statement said. "At the same time, pollution caused by motor cars has become the main source of pollution in big and medium-size cities."

The finance ministry is imposing a 5 percent tax on chopsticks and floor planks, citing a need to conserve timber. Environmentalists around the world have been warning that China's voracious demand for wood was contributing to the clear-cutting of many forests, especially in Southeast Asia.

The production of disposable wooden chopsticks consumes two million cubic meters (70.6 million cubic feet) of timber each year, the ministry said. Plastic chopsticks, which can be washed and reused, will not be subject to the new tax.

A new tax of 10 percent on yachts, golf clubs and golf balls, and a 20 percent tax on luxury watches, is squarely aimed at China's emerging elite of wealthy industrialists and well-connected Communist officials.

China's yacht market is still in its infancy, as military restrictions on ocean traffic and commercial restrictions on river traffic have limited yachts to lakes — although a few entrepreneurs have been able to get around the rules to cruise on the Yangtze River near Shanghai.

Chinese officials have periodically assailed golf, especially when villages and farms are demolished with little compensation to make way for new golf courses.

The biggest commercial effect of the new taxes is likely to fall on sport utility vehicles and luxury sedans. China is reducing its tax on vehicles with engines of 1 to 1.5 liters to 3 percent from 5 percent, while leaving the rate unchanged for slightly more powerful engines. The tax rate will rise to 20 percent, from 8 percent now, for vehicles with engines larger than four liters.

The taxes are likely to affect foreign automakers, especially American manufacturers, more than Chinese companies, which tend to make models with smaller engines.

The big question for automakers is how much of the tax to pass on to consumers, since the tax is collected from the manufacturers. With a week and a half remaining until the new tax takes effect, marketing executives scrambled on Wednesday to assess the impact and no automaker immediately raised prices.

"We are doing the calculations and assessing the impact, and on the other hand watching the actions of our competitors," said Kenneth Hsu, a spokesman for the China operations of Ford Motor, which sell everything from compact cars with 1.6-liter engines to Lincoln Navigator full-size S.U.V.'s with 5.4-liter engines.

Trevor Hale, a DaimlerChrysler spokesman, said the company offered fuel-efficient engines; many Mercedes sedans sold in China have considerably smaller engines than models sold in the United States.

Chinese officials considered and rejected a tax system based on gas mileage instead of engine displacement. That approach would have benefited foreign automakers who possess better technology that permits them to squeeze more power out of the same size engine than purely Chinese manufacturers can.

General Motors China welcomed the new taxes on Thursday but voiced a reservation: "While we believe the new measure will be more environmentally friendly and help lower energy consumption in China, we think it would be more reasonable to base the tax rate on the actual fuel consumption of a vehicle instead of the size of its engine displacement, which is a widely accepted practice worldwide."

Yale Zhang, an analyst in the Shanghai office of CSM Worldwide, a big automotive consulting firm based in the Detroit suburbs, said that Chinese automakers had growing influence in policy debates and that the new rules might lead to a proliferation of vehicles with engines a hundredth of a liter below the thresholds for higher taxes.

Chinese regulators have already imposed stringent fuel-economy regulations that take effect for all vehicles sold after July 1, and have said that they are considering a separate gas-guzzler tax for models that do not comply. The finance ministry's statement on the tax increases on April 1 made no mention of such a gas-guzzler tax, however, and finance ministry officials could not be reached for elaboration.

The finance ministry also announced a modest new tax of a penny (0.1 yuan) a liter for aviation fuel and 2 cents (0.2 yuan) a liter for naptha, solvents and lubricants, but said it would not collect the new aviation fuel tax for now and would collec t only 30 percent of the new tax on naptha, solvents and lubricants.

Applying taxes on oil products but not collecting them while prices are high could set a precedent for how China handles taxes on gasoline and diesel. Chinese officials have said repeatedly that they would like to raise fuel taxes to encourage conservation, but do not want to act while world oil prices are close to record levels.

On April 1, China will also lower its tax on motorcycles with engines under 250 cubic centimeters to 3 percent from 10 percent, while leaving the tax unchanged at 10 percent for motorcycles with larger engines.

Western manufacturers like Harley-Davidson are trying to break into the Chinese market with powerful bikes, while Chinese manufacturers like Lifan mainly produce less powerful models.

China Can't See Forest For The Chopsticks (WT)

By Richard Spencer, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

BEIJING -- China's growing environmental consciousness has hit the heart of its culture, with the government yesterday announcing a 5 percent tax on disposable wooden chopsticks.

The Finance Ministry said chopstick production used up China's forests at a rate of 70 million cubic fe et a year, a waste that it wanted to discourage.

Chopsticks were not the only targets of the regulations, an early fruit of the government's new five-year plan, which stresses energy conservation, efficient use of resources and an end to the environmental despoliation that has accompanied its rapid growth.

Wooden floor panels, another high consumer of wood, and even yachts, of which there are few in China, also will fall under the consumption tax.

A 10 percent tax on golf balls and clubs, part of a wider assault on luxury items, might seem to be unconnected, but there is growing concern in Beijing that many municipal drives to attract business by building golf courses are sacrificing land, tree s and water supplies for what remains a relatively tiny market.

The five-year plan is a major effort by the government to reorder China's priorities after 25 years of dramatic economic growth and spread some of the benefits to ordinary people.

The tax on chopsticks is slated to take effect April 1.

China sells 10 billion boxes of wooden chopsticks a year domestically and exports about 6 billion boxes annually, the China Daily newspaper said.

In an effort to curb the use of bigger cars, automobiles with 2.2-liter engines and larger will be hit with a 9 percent to 20 percent tax, up from the current 8 percent.

Taxes on cars with smaller engines would remain at 3 percent to 5 percent to encourage their use.

Oil-based products also will be taxed to reduce energy use. The tax on solvents and lubricants will be about 2.5 cents per liter, or about 10 cents per gallon.

Companies, however, will have to pay only 30 percent of the tax on the oil products to reduce the impact on industry.

Eight-Step Program For What Ails China (WP)

By Edward Cody

DOJ_NMG_0020268

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

BEIJING -- On bus-stop billboards, newspaper front pages and television news broadcasts, in school classrooms, factory study groups and student counseling sessions, at forums and meetings all across China, the Communist Party propaganda apparatus has been spreading the word from President Hu Jintao: Do good and avoid evil.

Hu's fatherly advice, in the form of eight do's and don'ts, was issued two weeks ago as an antidote to the corruption and cynicism spreading across China, a result of the often raw capitalism that has emerged during 25 years of dramatic economic change. Although his aphorisms may sound simplistic to Western ears -- "Work hard, don't be lazy" and "Be honest, not profit-mongering" -- Chinese analysts said they are a response to a deep-seated desire among people here for a moral compass to guide them through the unsettling transformation.

"There is a feeling that things have been going wrong," said Kang Xiaoguang, a social sciences researcher at the Chinese Academy of Science. "So when I hear him say that, I say, 'Good. It should have been said a long time ago.' "

Many Chinese would agree. The Communist Party's traditional values of egalitarianism and service to the poor have largely faded away, they complain, in favor of a get-rich ideology that blurs the distinction between officials and entrepreneurs. The strait-laced morals of Mao Zedong's time, they note, have relaxed to the point that bribes are part of doing business and prostitution is practiced openly. In addition, the party's reputation for corrupt land seizures has contributed heavily to often violent peasant unrest, making the need to re-burnish the government's legitimacy more urgent.

Since taking over as party leader and president three years ago, Hu has been reaching for the right formula. Under his orders, the party has been engaged in an 18-month retraining program to fire up its 70 million members. Hu has declared that the country must pursue "scientific development," taking environmental and social concerns into account as the economy grows. And he repeatedly has urged China's 1.3 billion people to create a "harmonious society," in which competing interest groups, such as farmers and businessmen, settle differences without conflict.

"It is a step-by-step program," Kang said. "I think he has a blueprint in his heart."

Some party analysts have suggested Hu's preaching is not enough, that the country should slow the pace of economic reforms and reemphasize the benefits that came with socialism, such as health care and guaranteed employment. Hu and his premier, Wen Jiabao, have resisted the calls, which some analysts say have more to do with jockeying for position than genuine policy disagreements. But the two leaders have clearly indicated they believe headlong economic growth should be tempered by greater concern for the people left behind, particularly farmers.

Having risen through the ranks in the Communist Youth League, with its Boy Scout-like code, Hu, 63, seems to have turned naturally toward a campaign appealing for cleaner living as part of the answer to corruption and cynicism. In a speech last year to cadres training at the Central Party School, he suggested that the solution lies in renewing traditional Marxist thought, revisiting the best of Mao Zedong's policies and reviving ancient Chinese culture, including Confucianism. Of the three, Kang said, Hu looks to Chinese culture as the most likely to provide moral values.

So when he sat down with a group of delegates to the National People's Congress on March 4, Hu harked back to a long Chinese tradition that stipulates leaders are supposed to urge moral conduct on their followers. "Love the motherland, do not harm it," he said. "Be disciplined and law-abiding, not chaotic and lawless."

In all, he recited eight such rules, which he called "the eight glories and the eight shames." The official New China News Agency called them "a perfect amalgamation of traditional Chinese values and modern virtues." The People's Political Consultative Conference, the other house in China's bicameral legislature, passed a resolution saying, "Let it be a paragon and common practice of the times."

The official People's Daily newspaper quickly filled with statements from Communist Party cadres describing Hu's ideas as marvelous and saying they were starting programs to teach the eight do's and don'ts through schools, workplace meetings and popular performances.

"The characteristics of the economic and social development of our country in this period made it necessary to set out the socialist view on glories and shames," the People's Daily said in a front-page editorial Saturday. "The dramatic changes in society, rapid economic development and culture clashes have had an effect on people's ideology, living style and value system.

The facts prove that without a healthy social conduct and good moral standards the overall national strength will not grow and the people will not be able to stand among other peoples of the world proudly no matter how developed the economy is."

The official China Central Television, playing its part, broadcast daily reports on Hu's meaning and how enthusiastically his ideas were being welcomed across the country. Outdoor advertising also made them available for viewing across the capital; a poster version was printed as well, distributed gratis for those who wanted to see the do's and don'ts on their walls.

Students at Beijing's Fang Cao Di Elementary School were visited by senior officials -- the children called them "Hu Jintao leaders" -- who had them memorize all eight aphorisms. Ren Tanyong, head of the Propaganda Department in Changsha, the Hunan provincial capital, announced that he was setting up a special program so the city's youth would get the message. Several professors and school administrators were quoted as saying Hu's eight lessons were just the thing for China's spoiled young generation.

But Huang Weiting, deputy editor of the party's Seeking Truth magazine, said party officials should be looking at themselves as well. "It's a cadre problem," he said in an interview.

"Eight glories and eight shames are not only a requirement for youth, but also for every citizen," he wrote this week in the party's Discipline Inspection newspaper. "Especially party members and cadres should take the lead."

Despite the noise generated by party propaganda organs, some Chinese questioned whether Hu's preaching would ever reach officials in the small towns and villages where disenchantment with the party is strongest. "It won't even get to provincial capitals," said Kang, the social scientist.

Even in Beijing, a group of recent graduates from prestigious Peking University, all of whom work in government-connected jobs, said they had not heard of the eight aphorisms after more than a week of the campaign. And in Inner Mongolia's distant Tongliao City, Bai Lianhua, a 46-year-old homemaker, said in a telephone conversation that she had no idea what they were.

"I guess it's the same kind of thing as the harmonious society, right?" she said.

Moscow And Beijing Face Tough Talks On Gas Prices (FT)

By Richard McGregor And Neil Buckley

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Beijing and Moscow face difficult negotiations over prices to realise this week's high-profile announcement of the construction of two pipelines to carry natural gas from Russia to energy-hungry China within five years.

The deal, signed on Tuesday, formed the centrepiece of the state visit by Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to Beijing, designed to cement strategic energy co-operation between the two countries.

Sergei Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, on Wednesday said Russia would sell the gas to China at the "market price", calculated according to the same formula linked to oil and diesel prices as for sales to Europe.

But China has balked at signing long-term import gas contracts for the past three years as the price of the resource has risen along with that of oil, outstripping domestic rates which are kept artificially low.

China's failure to import more gas has left a number of newly built gas-fired turbines idle, as power producers have turned to plentiful and cheap coal.

"Coal is going to be the predominantly competing fuel, and this raises the issue of how much gas is going to get used in China," said John Harris, in the Beijing office of Cera, the energy consultancy.

But the cost of pipeline gas should be cheaper than that of liquefied natural gas, where price rises have been highest, leaving industry executives confident a deal can be struck. "The pipeline gas will be competitive," said Victor Vekselberg, the director of gas at TNK-BP, whose field will provide the resource for one of the pipelines.

Despite Chinese frustrations over the difficulty of securing concrete energy deals with Russia, the summit between Mr Putin and Hu Jintao, China's president, their fifth meeting in the last 12 months, has strengthened bilateral ties.

Two-way trade, dominated by Russian sales of arms, oil and logs and Chinese exports of manufactured goods, is rising rapidly and is being complemented by closer political ties.

Mr Putin said Russia wanted to promote co-operation in civil aviation, machinery manufacturing and anti-terrorism, as well as learning from China about how to operate free-trade zones.

DOJ_NMG_0020270

But Mr Putin made no firm commitment about one of the projects most sought by China, the construction of an oil pipeline to the Chinese city of Daqing.

"If the project could be implemented, which I have no doubt about, it will help improve [Russia's] oil supply to China," Mr Putin said.

The signing of a number of agreements during the visit by the president and a large business delegation was "encouraging", said Bobo Lo, the head of the Russia and Eurasia programme at Chatham House in London.

"But there is a world of difference between signing agreements and actually proceeding with them," he said.

Russia-based analysts also warned that Beijing and Moscow had signed apparently ambitious energy agreements before, with limited results. They added that, since the texts of this week's agreements had not been published, it was difficult to gauge the level of commitment of each side.

Stephen O'Sullivan, head of research at Deutsche UFG in Moscow, said several factors might prevent or delay the bringing of reserves from both west and east Siberia to China. He said the cost of constructing the pipelines could be burdensome, especially if China drove a hard bargain on gas prices.

Russia has concerns about becoming too dependent on its former cold war rival in Asia. But the agreements could still foreshadow what Dmitry Trenin, a foreign policy specialist at the Carnegie Moscow Centre think-tank, believes will be a much closer relationship between the two countries.

The Kremlin, says Mr Trenin, is growing weary of western criticisms of Russia's clampdown on democracy. China, on the other hand, is unlikely to complain about Mr Putin's authoritarian tendencies.

Moscow Courts Beijing Over Nuclear Power (WSJ)

By Shai Oster

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

BEIJING -- Russia said it wants to play a greater role in developing China's fast-growing nuclear-power industry, in another sign of closer energy cooperation between the two countries.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said yesterday that China welcomes increased Russian participation in its nuclear-power sector, which is undergoing one of its biggest-ever expansions and one of the biggest nuclear rollouts in the industry's history. China has said it plans to build 30 or more nuclear reactors during the next 15 years. Currently, it has nine reactors at two plants.

Mr. Lavrov's comments to reporters came on the final day of a two-day summit between Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao. On Tuesday, Russia pledged to sharply increase oil and gas exports to China.

Chinese officials couldn't be reached for comment on Mr. Lavrov's remarks, but Russian officials point to participation by Russia's AtomStroyExport -- which operates under the umbrella of Russia's atomic-energy agency -- in the first round of bidding to build four reactors in China valued at $1 billion to $2 billion each. The other two companies short-listed are Westinghouse Electric Co. and France's state-owned Areva. Overall, deals to build China's nuclear plants are potentially worth tens of billions of dollars.

China has decided to dramatically increase the number of its nuclear-power plants as it seeks to reduce its dependence on Middle East oil and diversify its energy sources to sate the demands of its rapidly expanding economy. The country has plenty of its own, cheap coal, but Chinese leaders worry that using high-polluting coal to fire its power plants is coming at too great a cost to the environment. Increasingly, they see nuclear power as a cleaner alternative.

Sergei Kiriyenko, head of Russia's atomic-energy agency, accompanied President Putin on his trip to China. He made a stop at China's newest nuclear-power plant, the Tianwan station, which is north of Shanghai and built jointly with the Russians.

The Russian visit comes just as the country's competitors to build the four Chinese reactors -- which will be located in the eastern province of Zhejiang and the southern province of Guangdong -- appear to have hit snags. China was originally expected to decide on the winning bid in December, but negotiations have dragged on.

Industry observers and analysts say the Chinese government is unhappy about the sale of Westinghouse to Japan-based Toshiba Corp. in February. Relations between China and Japan have grown increasingly tense, and the Chinese are reluctant to have sensitive technology controlled by the Japanese, the observers say. Westinghouse has said it expects a decision from Chinese officials soon.

France's Areva, meanwhile, is resisting Chinese demands to transfer more of its technology, they say. Last week, French Finance Minister Thierry Breton said Areva is still in the race.

Russia's expression of interest in helping build up China's nuclear-power industry comes a day after President Putin said Russia plans to construct two pipelines to bring natural gas to China and another pipeline to bring oil.

China, one of the world's fastest-growing energy consumers, has for years sought more direct supplies from its northern neighbor, which is the world's largest gas producer and second-largest oil producer. But the bulk of Russia's export channels face westward, and Moscow has been slow to turn toward Asian markets. China currently gets no gas and only a small fraction of its oil supplies from Russia.

Tuesday's deals represent a big step forward in Beijing's efforts to secure more energy supplies from Russia, but some questions remain. Some analysts said they doubt Russia has enough oil to supply both China and Japan. China's pipeline would be built as part of a longer pipeline bound for Russia's Pacific coast, from where Moscow could supply Japan.

And Russia and China have yet to reach any agreement over the price for any gas sales. Russian officials say Beijing will pay the same prices as Europe is charged. But those prices are much higher than China can stomach, analysts say. High international prices have recently forced China to delay other plans to import natural gas. Executives working on the deal also point out that major technical challenges lie ahead in building the pipelines, which would eventually carry about half as much gas as Russia currently supplies Europe.

"This agreement is a significant milestone. But the question remains, where do we go next?" asks Alastair Ferguson, deputy executive director of OAO TNK-BP Holding, BP PLC's Russian joint venture.

Ottawa To Buy Russian Natural Gas, Sell It To U.S. (WT)

By Andrea R. Mihailescu

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Canada is planning to capitalize on shortages of natural gas, exacerbated by last year's hurricanes, by importing vast quantities of liquefied natural gas (LNG) from Russia to be exported to the United States.

The Canadian government recently approved a $1.5 billion joint venture of Petro-Canada and Russian giant Gazprom to build a plant near St. Petersburg in Russia to liquefy the gas and load it into giant tanker ships.

The tankers would be unloaded in Quebec and the liquid converted back into gas that could be pumped through existing pipeline networks to U.S. customers.

"LNG is going to be a big part of the future of the gas market in North America," said Ron Brenneman, president and chief executive officer of Petro-Canada.

"As this project moves forward, we will be in an excellent position to import long-term gas supply, not only from Russia but from other parts of the world as well. We see this agreement as an important part of our overall growth strategy," he said.

The entire project could cost as much as $2 billion.

The United States, a growing natural-gas consumer, saw a decline in production in 2005 by about 4 percent, in large part because of the major disruptions to infrastructure in the Gulf of Mexico from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, according to the U.S. Energy Information Administration (EIA).

The United States looks to secure long-term supplies, but it lacks facilities to import the liquid and convert it back into gas.

"Russia may have questions on the timing and availability of U.S. East Coast regasification facilities to handle imports, and the Canadians have expressed an interest in building a regasification facility in the Northeast that would serve New England markets," said Frank A. Verrastro, senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

Unlike oil, which is a globally traded commodity shipped by tanker from producers thousands of miles away to consumers, natural gas has traditionally been a continental market, with suppliers and consumers linked by pipelines crisscrossing North America.

Liquefied natural gas is cooled to minus 300 degrees Fahrenheit to condense it into a liquid state, making it more cost efficient to transport over long distances.

As the third-largest producer after Russia and the United States, Canada exported about 3.5 trillion cubic feet of gas to the United States in 2003.

This accounted for nearly all of Canada's natural-gas exports, but represented just 16 percent of U.S. natural-gas consumption, according to the EIA.

The two companies reached a deal during talks between Alexei Miller, chief executive officer of Gazprom, and Mr. Brenneman of Calgary's Petro-Canada, said Sergei Kupriyanov, Gazprom's spokesman.

For several years now, Gazprom has been looking for a partner to construct an LNG plant in the Baltic port of Ust-Luga in the St. Petersburg region.

But Gazprom will need to secure supplies for its St. Petersburg LNG plant before this project can materialize successfully. The company is exploring a couple suppliers.

Industry analysts fear that Petro-Canada faces several hurdles before it can import natural gas into Canada. It faces regulatory obstacles at its Gros-Cacouna regasification facility in Quebec and long-term supplies need to be secured for the deal to be profitable.

The Baltic plant, which is expected to have an annual processing capacity of between 5 million and 7 million tons, could become operational as early as 2010.

State Dept. Warns Americans Visiting Italy (AP)

AP, March 22, 2006

The State Department warned Americans on Wednesday to take precautions this spring when traveling in Italy, saying next month's parliamentary elections are likely to bring demonstrations in parts of the country.

"Demonstrations may be large, but even peaceful demonstrations have the potential to escalate into violence," the announcement said.

The department said Americans should avoid areas where crowds are expected to gather, take common sense precautions and closely follow media reports.

The U.S. considers Italy to be under a heightened threat by al-Qaida and other Islamic extremists for its participation in wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Basque Fighters Set A Cease-Fire After Four Decades (NYT)

By Renwick McLean

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

SEVILLE, Spain, March 22 — The militant Basque separatist group ETA, which has killed more than 800 people and terrorized Spanish society for nearly 40 years, on Wednesday announced a permanent cease-fire, saying that it would turn its attention to achieving independence for the Basque region of Spain through politics.

A permanent cease-fire, which the group said would take effect on Friday, has been the paramount objective of successive Spanish governments since the establishment of democracy here in 1977.

"This could be the beginning of the end," Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero said in a rare appearance before reporters in Madrid.

But Mr. Zapatero also said it was important to treat the announcement with caution, echoing concerns of victims' groups, who urged politicians to remember what they described as ETA's history of deceit and unfulfilled promises.

"This government will tackle this new situation with prudence, with calm," he said, "fully aware that after so many years of suffering, we have a tough, long, difficult road ahead of us."

The government is expected to begin preparing for negotiations with ETA, which Mr. Zapatero promised in May to open if the group agreed to renounce violence permanently.

The negotiations are expected to focus on Basque demands for more autonomy and on persuading ETA to hand over its weapons and disband. Mr. Zapatero would not say on Wednesday when the talks would begin.

DOJ_NMG_0020273

ETA, whose acronym stands for Basque Homeland and Liberty in the Basque language, has called cease-fires before, but never in such categorical terms, explicitly describing the move as permanent.

The group made the announcement in a statement sent to Radio Euskadi, a Basque radio station, on Wednesday morning. Three ETA members later appeared on Basque public television, their heads covered with white veils and black berets, to read the statement to the public.

"The objective of our decision is to advance the democratic process," the statement says. "Overcoming the conflict is possible, here and now. That is the desire and the will of ETA."

Juan Avilés, director of the Institute for the Investigation of National Security, a research and teaching organization in Madrid, said the announcement represented a victory for Mr. Zapatero, who he said had taken a big political risk in declaring that he was willing to negotiate with ETA if it agreed to give up violence.

"But the big question is what did the government offer to get this," he said in a telephone interview. "There surely were contacts of some kind between the government and ETA beforehand."

The government has said repeatedly that it has not made contact with ETA to negotiate a cease-fire.

ETA's statement on Wednesday included a call for all of its members to abandon violence, but Spanish government officials said they could not rule out the possibility that splinter groups might ignore the cease-fire.

But they said that was unlikely, citing the structured and hierarchical nature of ETA. "That is not a serious source of concern right now," said an official in the prime minister's offices who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the cease-fire. "The conditions are favorable enough that the possibility of further violence is not being seriously contemplated."

ETA was founded in 1959 with the goal of establishing an independent Basque state encompassing sections of northern Spain and southern France.

After one of its members fatally shot a Civil Guard officer in 1968, the group made attacks that, over the years, killed 817 people, including nearly 350 civilians, according to figures from the Interior Ministry. The attacks have included assassinations of politicians, car bombs placed outside police stations and indiscriminate bombings in parks and shopping centers.

ETA's last fatal attack was in May 2003, and the organization is widely considered to be weaker now than at any point in its history. Scores of arrests over the past two years have thinned its leadership ranks and led some investigators to contend that ETA no longer has the capacity to carry out large attacks.

Investigators had been saying for more than a year that the main question was when ETA would renounce violence, not if.

Speculation that a cease-fire was near grew in recent months, fueled by statements by Spanish officials, in public and private, hinting that a cease-fire was imminent.

Nevertheless, ETA continued to bomb businesses, parks and other public spaces, including three attacks this month, as part of what investigators call an extortion campaign to persuade companies and business executives to give the group money. These bombings, usually preceded by a warning by telephone to local authorities or newspapers, appeared intended to avoid serious injuries.

The group's embrace of violence, investigators said, might also have wavered after the train bombings in Madrid on March 11, 2004. The public outrage after those attacks, which killed 191 people and are thought to have been carried out by Islamic militants, possibly convinced ETA that terrorism was not politically profitable, these investigators say.

Spanish PM Welcomes Eta Ceasefire (FT)

By Leslie Crawford

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero, the Spanish prime minister, on Wednesday heralded the start of a “long and difficult peace process”, after Eta, the violent separatist group, declared a permanent ceasefire in its 38-year war for an independent Basque state.

Eta said the ceasefire would begin on Friday. “The aim of this decision is to drive a democratic process in the Basque country…in which our rights as a people are recognised,” the outlawed group said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0020274

Eta made no mention of surrendering or laying down arms. Mr Zapatero told parliament his government had greeted Eta's declaration with caution.

"After so many years of horror and terror, any peace process will be long and difficult," he said.

"We are all duty-bound to take part and I hope I can count on all political parties in this matter. Where before we were united in the shock of horror, I hope we will now be united in hope."

Eta has killed 812 people in the course of its long, low-intensity guerrilla war. Many more Basques have lived for years with Eta death threats, while businessmen have suffered extortion in the guise of "revolutionary taxes".

The plight of the victims of terrorism, as well as Eta's demands for a political process culminating in a referendum on Basque independence, make peace talks particularly tricky for the Spanish government.

Mr Zapatero, who last month heralded "the beginning of the end of Eta", said he would take his time before deciding whether Eta's statement offered sufficient guarantees to launch peace talks.

In May last year, parliament voted to authorise negotiations should Eta declare an unconditional and permanent end to violence.

While some Socialist leaders interpreted Eta's statement as a farewell to arms, the opposition Popular party, which opposes peace talks with Eta, remained unconvinced.

Mariano Rajoy, Popular party leader, warned the government not to be fooled by a mere "pause in Eta's criminal activities".

Mr Rajoy was Spain's interior minister when Eta declared "an indefinite ceasefire" in 1998. At the time, Mr Rajoy denounced the truce as a trap – a breathing space to allow Eta to regroup and rearm.

Eta resumed killing14 months later after tentative contacts between the Popular party government and Eta collapsed.

Nevertheless, Eta's announcement was greeted with optimism in the Basque country.

"The fact that Eta has announced a permanent ceasefire is good news," said Joseba Arregi, a former member of the Basque regional government and a target of Eta death threats. "I see it as a sign of Eta's weakness: that as a fighting force , it is spent. In a very large measure, peace has already arrived."

In spite of a recent spate of minor bomb attacks, Eta has not killed anyone since May 2003. Close cooperation between Spanish and French security forces, and the infiltration of Eta by Spanish undercover agents, paralysed the separatist group and led to more than 400 arrests in the past three years.

With most of Eta's senior cadres now in jail, the separatist group had come to be regarded as an irritant, rather than as a serious security threat.

Basque Group Declares Cease-Fire With Spain (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

MADRID -- The Basque terrorist group ETA declared a permanent cease-fire, opening the door to what could be a profound change for Spain, much as the 1998 Good Friday agreement ushered in an eventual peace process for Northern Ireland.

For decades, Madrid has struggled to contain separatist aspirations in the Basque Country. Last year, the Spanish Parliament rejected a Basque plan to create a semi-independent state; the region already enjoys more self-rule than almost any other part of Europe.

In contrast, the separatist movement in the northeastern region of Catalonia has been more successful at prying powers away from Madrid over the past quarter-century because it never resorted to terrorism, as the ETA often did. Just this week, after nearly a year of heated negotiations with the national government, Catalonia inked a regional governing charter that gives it an array of new powers.

The Spanish government has promised in the past to enter talks on the political future of the Basque Country if the ETA were to renounce violence. Prime Minister José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero's readiness to negotiate greater autonomy for rebellious regions, including Catalonia and the Basque Country, may have encouraged ETA to lay down its arms, political analysts say.

While welcoming the cease-fire, Gustavo de Aristegui, a Basque Popular Party deputy in Parliament and former Interior Ministry official, said he wanted to know "what concessions the government may have made" to persuade the ETA to declare the truce. In the past, Mr. Zapatero said the government would consider a range of concessions, including partial amnesties for ETA prisoners. Yesterday, government officials said there had been no formal contacts with ETA.

Mr. Zapatero said yesterday he would take his time to decide how to proceed. He said the government has received the ETA's announcement with "caution and prudence" and called the cease-fire "the beginning of the end" to ETA violence.

Still, Mariano Rajoy, leader of Spain's center-right Popular Party, the main opposition party, said ETA's announcement "is a pause, not a disavowal, of violence."

The ETA's declaration, delivered in a filmed statement by three of its operatives, was the group's first-ever promise to permanently lay down arms, after two short cease-fires in the past two decades. ETA said the cease-fire was intended to promote "a democratic process" for the greater Basque Country, which includes a swath of southwestern France as well as other parts of Spain.

During its 45-year campaign for Basque independence, the ETA killed more than 800 people, extorted business owners, silenced debate and dominated small-town politics. But its influence and popular support declined sharply after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on New York and Washington sparked global outrage. The March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid, which the conservative government initially blamed on the ETA, further eroded support for its armed struggle. The group's last deadly attack took place almost three years ago.

Spain's problems with Basque terrorism have drawn frequent parallels with the Irish Republican Army's 30-year campaign to drive the British out of Northern Ireland, a conflict that cost more than 3,000 lives.

Yesterday, Spanish Defense Minister José Bono invoked the Irish peace process that began with the IRA's announcement of a complete cease-fire in 1994, but which was undermined by mutual mistrust, further violent attacks and the IRA's refusal to fully disarm.

Last year -- 12 years after the first cease-fire -- the IRA declared its war over and destroyed weapons in earnest, although splinter groups -- and deep distrust between the province's Catholics and Protestants -- remain.

Basque ETA Announces Permanent Cease-Fire (AP)

By Alberto Letona

AP, March 22, 2006

The Basque militant group ETA ended a decades-long campaign of terror, announcing a permanent cease-fire Wednesday that closes the door on one of Western Europe's last armed separatist movements.

In a videotaped statement, three shrouded ETA members said they were laying down their weapons to promote democracy in the northern Spanish region. The news prompted jubilation across Spain, where ordinary citizens say they can hardly believe the end has come for a group blamed for more than 800 deaths and $15.5 billion in damage since the 1960s.

Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero, who has made granting more rule to Spain's regions a key goal, expressed caution and hope at ETA's statement. He was evasive when asked if he would start negotiating with ETA under an offer he made last year, contingent on the group renouncing violence.

"Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult," he told parliament. Zapatero said that until now, Spain's political parties had been joined in pain over ETA violence. "Now I trust we will be joined in hope."

The cease-fire was seen as a huge victory for Zapatero, but his critics maintained a hard line, saying they would fight to ensure the government does not give too much away.

"One cannot pay a political price for peace. If we were to do so, terrorism would have won," said Mariano Rajoy, leader of the conservative opposition Popular Party.

ETA, established in the late 1960s, campaigned to carve out an independent Basque homeland in northern Spain and southwest France.

The video showed three people seated at a table in front of an ETA flag, their faces covered by beige masks and all wearing Basque berets. The figure in the middle, a woman, read the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0020276

ETA "has decided to declare a permanent cease-fire as of March 24, 2006," the statement said. "The aim of (the cease-fire) is to promote a democratic process in the Basque country and to build a new framework in which our rights as a people will be recognized."

The statement was sent to several Basque media outlets, including the radical Basque newspaper Gara. The newspaper said Wednesday it also was in possession of another, complementary ETA statement, but would not publish it or comment on it until Thursday.

The announcement set off quiet celebrations around the country.

"It's the news we were waiting for many years. It's the best news I have received lately," said Jose Felix Urbano, 52, an administrative worker in Vitoria, capital of the Basque region. "I hope that from here on I can live in a normal country."

Barbara Durkhop, the widow of ETA victim Enrique Casas, killed in 1984, said she was hopeful but nervous.

"The first thing I thought was that now there will be no more deaths," she told Spanish television station Quatro. "This could pave the way, once and for all, to the peace process that we have waited for so long."

In Madrid, there was shock, and a bit of caution.

"It's amazing! I hope to God it's true," said Sandra Dorada, a 29-year-old postal worker. "But they (ETA) have said this before and it wasn't true."

The Bush administration's initial reaction was positive. "Any decisive steps taken by ETA to give up violence should be welcomed," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Speculation about an end to ETA's armed campaign has been building for months, despite a recent wave of small-scale bombings.

The prime minister has offered to hold talks with Basque separatist leaders once ETA agreed to lay down its arms, and parliament backed the move in a resolution passed in May.

Asked Wednesday if ETA's announcement meant the government can now open talks with ETA, Zapatero said: "I will take my time to study the parliamentary resolution. It is essential for proceeding safely."

ETA has announced cease-fires in the past but never one it has called permanent.

Many Spaniards believed that after the March 11, 2004, terrorist attacks in Madrid, carried out by Islamic extremists, ETA had effectively been stymied. The idea is that popular revulsion over terrorism made more deadly violence politically unthinkable.

Over the years, ETA has mostly targeted security force members, although in the 1990s it increasingly began to kill politicians. In 1995, in one of its most audacious plots, it tried to assassinate Jose Maria Aznar, then an opposition leader who would go on to become prime minister. Nobody was seriously injured.

ETA stands for Euskadi Ta Azkatasuna, Basque Homeland and Freedom.

Basque Separatists Announce Ceasefire, Ending Bloody Struggle (AFP)

AFP, March 22, 2006

The armed Basque separatist group ETA announced a permanent ceasefire to meet the Spanish government's key condition for peace talks, nearly four decades after starting an armed conflict that has killed more than 800 people

In a statement on Basque television read out by one of three hooded figures against a backdrop of ETA symbols, the movement said its ceasefire would take effect from Friday.

Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero welcomed the step and said Spaniards were now "united by hope," while warning that "a long road lies ahead" to cement lasting peace.

"We will react with prudence to reach the end of this historic drama," he added.

ETA's long struggle for an independent Basque homeland, which has cost untold billions of euros in economic damage to the region, was one of Western Europe's last armed internal conflicts, and was often compared to the decades of sectarian unrest in Northern Ireland.

"The aim of this decision is to launch a democratic process in the Basque country," ETA said in its broadcast.

"At the end of this process, Basque citizens will be able to have a voice and the power to decide their future," it went on.

"An end to the conflict is possible today and now. This is the hope and desire of ETA."

DOJ_NMG_0020277

ETA is blamed for more than 800 deaths in its campaign to create an independent state covering Spain's northern Basque region and parts of southwestern France.

Spain's first deputy prime minister Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega said the Socialist government hoped the ceasefire meant the "beginning of the end" of violence.

"This is good news for all Spaniards," she added, promising the government would "work with all political forces" to achieve peace, while also advising prudence.

Basque regional leader Juan Jose Ibarretxe spoke of an "historic day" and added he was putting out feelers, including to ETA's banned political mouthpiece Batasuna, for roundtable talks on the next stage of the region's development.

"The moment has arrived for Basque society to build its future in peace," Ibarretxe added.

But the main conservative opposition Popular Party was trenchant in its response, while some victims' associations were also sceptical.

Former Spanish prime minister Jose Maria Aznar slammed the government for having what he termed a "defeatist vision" of dealing with terrorists who wanted to bring down democracy, but he did not mention the ceasefire itself.

Previous ceasefires and truces lasted no more than months, and Aznar's successor as PP leader, Mariano Rajoy, said that as ETA had not announced it was disbanding its statement was "not a renunciation of criminal activity."

Francisco Jose Alcaraz, chairman of the conservative Association of Victims of Terrorism (AVT), warned of the possibility of a "trap".

"The ceasefire is not definitive -- ETA placed conditions in its statement such as self-determination through an electoral consultation or referendum," Alcaraz said.

Anti-terrorist judge Baltasar Garzon told Cadena Ser radio he believed that "the government has an obligation to explore all necessary and legal means of achieving peace."

Although ETA's last fatal attack was in May 2003, it has continued to wage low-level violence with car bombs, attacks on public buildings and extortion of businesses.

The organisation has been severely weakened by heightened cooperation between French and Spanish police which resulted in a recent wave of arrests.

Analysts also say the new climate after the March 11, 2004, train bombings in Madrid also helped swing attitudes against violence.

Spain's then conservative government initially blamed ETA for that carnage, which killed 191 people, before evidence emerged that Islamic extremists were responsible.

The parallel with Northern Ireland has long been held up as an example for the Basque region to follow.

There, the Irish Republican Army, which had been fighting against British rule, declared a ceasefire in 1997 that led directly to the Good Friday peace accords the following year which set up a power-sharing government.

The IRA has since renounced violence for good.

Gerry Adams, leader of Sinn Fein, the IRA's political wing, who has often engaged with Basque leaders in recent years, welcomed ETA's move.

"ETA's announcement provides all sides to the conflict with an opportunity of historic proportions," he said in a statement.

Basque Separatist Group Ends Four-Decade War With Spain (LAT)

By Tracy Wilkinson

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

MADRID — The Basque separatist group ETA declared a "permanent" cease-fire Wednesday and pledged to step away from decades of violence, a major breakthrough that could end one of Europe's last armed conflicts.

The announcement came at a time of military and political weakness for the militant organization that for nearly 40 years has fought for independence from Spain and claimed hundreds of lives in bombings and sabotage.

DOJ_NMG_0020278

It follows a fierce crackdown under the previous Spanish government and a period of rumored negotiation, officially denied, with the current one. ETA has also seen its support fade amid public outrage over deadly bombings in Madrid two years ago by Islamic radicals.

"This is very good news for all Spaniards," Vice President Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega said as reports of the truce swept the country. Urging "prudence," she added, "We very much hope this is the beginning of the end."

Reactions cleaved along political lines in this bitterly polarized country. The Socialist government of Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero responded with cautious elation, but the conservative opposition noted that the Basque group's move fell short of surrender and claimed that it was nothing more than a ruse.

Ordinary Spaniards were full of tentative hope.

ETA declared the cease-fire, effective Friday, through a videotaped statement released about midday and broadcast on Basque and Spanish television. Unlike two previous cease-fires that collapsed after several months of negotiations, this declaration uses the term "permanent" and sets no conditions.

In the announcement, three members of the guerrilla group, wearing white masks and the black berets typical of the Basque Country, sat at a table with a cloth bearing the words Euskal Herria, or the Basque homeland, and the group's coat of arms. Behind them hung a banner with the ETA insignia of a snake twisted around an ax. The statement was read, unusually, by a woman, who sat in the middle.

The group said its purpose was to "drive the democratic process" in the Basque Country that ensures "the development of all political options."

"ETA has shown its desire and will that the process now begun should reach a conclusion and thus achieve true democracy in the Basque Country, overcoming long years of violence and constructing a peace based on justice," the statement said.

A referendum in 1979 established the Basque Autonomous Community on the Bay of Biscay near the French border, comprising the provinces of Alava, Vizcaya and Guipuzcoa. It has its own police force, education and healthcare system.

Basques, who number about 2.2 million in Spain, are descendants of what may be one of the oldest ethnic groups in Europe. Polls indicate that about half favor a more independent state more loosely associated with Spain. Many who advocate statehood, however, do not support ETA's violent ways.

ETA — an acronym for Euskadi Ta Askatasuna, or Basque Homeland and Freedom in the Basque language — declared cease-fires in 1989 and 1998, but negotiations that followed collapsed.

But this announcement may have a different outcome, analysts say, because of the arrest and imprisonment of senior ETA leaders, the capture of a major arsenal and the banning of its political wing. Polls have shown a widening weariness of violence in the Basque Country and growing rejection of bloodshed.

"There can never be a total guarantee, but what's clear is that [the cease-fire] is a solid base for a peace process," said Gorka Espiau Idoiaga, director of Elkarri, a Basque organization in the city of Bilbao that promotes dialogue. "They are showing a will to disappear and end the violence. It is extraordinary."

Espiau, a senior fellow at the Washington-based U.S. Institute of Peace, noted that the wording of the communique released Wednesday emulated the language of the landmark 1994 statement by the Irish Republican Army.

In addition, it was the first time the Basque separatists had used the word "permanent" in a truce pledge.

ETA, a secretive organization that was founded during the dictatorship of Gen. Francisco Franco, has killed more than 800 people in attacks since 1968, including police officers, mayors and politicians. Hundreds more, among them journalists, justices and intellectuals, have been threatened.

The last ETA attack to cause a death was in May 2003, although more than 100 people have been injured in bombings since. The group had resorted to an intense campaign of blackmail and extorted a fortune from businessmen, bankers and even premier chefs who feared attacks on their property.

Any negotiations with ETA would include numerous difficult issues, such as the disarming of its cadres and the fate of its members held in Spanish prisons.

"Any peace process, after so many years of horror and terror, will be long and difficult," Zapatero, the prime minister, said during a special session of parliament Wednesday afternoon.

He called for unity among all political parties and repeatedly used the words "calm," "caution" and "prudence," language aimed at deflecting critics who suggest he has been too soft on independence-minded factions.

Mariano Rajoy, leader of the main opposition Popular Party, attacked ETA's declaration, noting that it did not renounce all criminal activity or ask for forgiveness from its many victims. Without such gestures, entering into talks with ETA would amount to rewarding terrorism, he said.

At parliament, lawmakers gathered around TV screens to watch the 1 p.m. broadcast of the ETA statement.

In San Sebastian, a major seaside Basque city and scene of much violence, the mayor and city hall officials toasted with the local version of champagne: "For peace and those who are absent." National TV broke into regular programming to provide nonstop coverage, including recapitulations of the years of bloodshed. Gara, a Basque newspaper, published a special edition.

In Madrid, the word on seemingly everyone's lips was Ojalá — "Let's hope."

Juan Jose Ibarretxe, the president of the Basque territory, called the ETA declaration historic.

"ETA has finally listened to Basque society, which demands an end to all criminal activity," said Ibarretxe, a nationalist who advocates separation from Spain through peaceful means.

Families of ETA victims greeted the news with mixed emotion.

"I've got this knot in my stomach that tells me it might not be true, but my first thoughts are maybe, finally, there will be no more dead," Barbara Durkhop, the widow of a Socialist official shot dead in 1984, told Spanish television.

The government that preceded Zapatero's was especially harsh on the separatists. Former Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, who early in his career survived an ETA assassination attempt, sent police troops against ETA, outlawed politicians sympathetic to the group, closed its newspaper and deliberately dispersed its jailed members to prisons far from families and support groups.

Aznar maintained that a military crackdown alone would end nationalistic violence, and he succeeded in persuading the Bush administration to officially label ETA a terrorist organization.

With surveillance equipment provided by the CIA, as well as new cooperation with France, Aznar's crackdown succeeded in crippling ETA.

Basque Separatists Declare A 'Permanent Cease-Fire' (WP)

By Pamela Rolfe And Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

MADRID, March 22 -- The Basque paramilitary group ETA on Wednesday announced a "permanent cease-fire," signaling a possible end to one of Europe's longest-running armed conflicts, four decades of bombings and assassinations aimed at creating an independent Basque homeland on the border of Spain and France.

In a video delivered to a Basque television station, a woman clad in combat fatigues, white face mask and black beret said that ETA was ready to shift from violence to "a democratic process in which our rights as people will be recognized." Flanked by two people in identical masks and dress, the woman said the cease-fire would begin Friday.

"Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult," Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told the Spanish parliament in an address carried live on national and international television.

Victims of ETA's violence expressed skepticism that the group would adhere to a cease-fire, noting it had broken past truces. "With the perspective of a memory of 45 years of murders interspersed with announced truces and cease-fires, it's clear that ETA is trying to trick us again," said Daniel Portero, who heads an ETA victims' organization. His father, a regional attorney general, was assassinated by the group in 2002.

For centuries, the scenic mountainous region straddling the borders of northern Spain and southern France has been home to the Basque people, who have a distinct language and culture. Since ancient times they have struggled to preserve their independence.

The ETA name is an abbreviation of Basque language words meaning Basque Homeland and Freedom. The group was founded in the late 1950s as a student movement opposed to the dictatorship of Gen. Francisco Franco. In the 1960s, it switched to increasingly violent tactics.

Under current Spanish law, the Spanish Basque region already has broad autonomy. But the small, secretive ETA has demanded nothing less than full independence.

Rumors of an imminent ETA cease-fire had surfaced in recent weeks. It had been widely reported in Spanish political and media circles that intermediaries for the government and ETA had been conducting secret negotiations to set the stage for the announcement.

"ETA has shown its desire and will that the process now begun should achieve true democracy in the Basque country, overcoming long years of violence and constructing a peace based on justice," the ETA statement said. "Here and now, it is possible to overcome the conflict."

What set this cease-fire announcement apart from those in the past was the use of the term "permanent cease-fire" for the first time.

After the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, the United States and European Union labeled ETA a terrorist organization. The Spanish government, then led by Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, along with neighboring France, launched a major crackdown on ETA leaders and their financing networks, weakening the organization.

Some political observers said ETA's traditional base of support eroded after the March 11, 2004, Madrid train bombings, which killed 191 people. Though investigators concluded that Islamic radicals carried out the attacks, they so horrified the nation that some ETA sympathizers turned against the group because of its use of similar tactics.

ETA has kept up sporadic waves of bombings, including several in the past three weeks. But no one has been killed in an attack since 2003, in part because the group has frequently telephoned warnings and occasionally has written "Danger, Bomb" on explosive devices, according to Spanish news reports.

Previous Spanish governments resisted any efforts to launch a peace process. But the Socialist prime minister, Zapatero, who won election in 2004, has been more open to talks and to allowing more regional autonomy. He has supported, for instance, a measure that would allow the northeastern region of Catalonia greater independence. His supporters say similar legislation for the Basque country could give the separatists a peaceful alternative to violence.

Last year, the Spanish parliament voted to allow talks with ETA if the group agreed to renounce violence and disarm. Wednesday's announcement did not mention laying down arms.

"This announcement was expected and is welcome, but be careful with the wording," said Antonio Elorza, who has studied ETA as a professor of political science at Madrid's Complutense University. " 'Permanent' is not definitive. . . . The congress gave the government permission to negotiate with ETA as long as the goal was disarmament. That is not what this statement says."

Mariano Rajoy, president of the opposition Popular Party, largely dismissed the announcement in comments to parliament Wednesday afternoon.

"This cease-fire now is a pause, not a renouncing of criminal activity," he said. "It means a reaffirmation of a will to continue existing. They don't regret anything and they don't ask forgiveness of the victims of terrorism."

In a rare news conference, the banned Batasuna party -- accused by previous governments of being the political wing of ETA -- urged the Spanish and French governments to "open a new political stage." Pernando Barrena, a leader of the organization, described the cease-fire as "a great opportunity."

Reactions on the streets of Spain were both hopeful and skeptical.

"It's a great thing," said Olatz Herrera, 20, a Basque studying in Madrid. "I hope the government negotiates with them. It's a key opportunity. You have to try everything to end the violence."

"It would be wonderful," said Mari Angeles Gomez, 54. "I hope it's true. But you can't trust ETA."

Basque Separatists Call Cease-fire (CSM)

By Peter Ford

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

PARIS - The Basque separatist group ETA's declaration Wednesday of a permanent cease-fire offers the prospect of an end to one of Europe's longest running civil conflicts, and a new constitutional future for Spain that could reshape the country's political map.

But the group's videotaped statement, aired on Spanish TV, marks only the first step toward resolving Madrid's thorniest challenge.

"The government's position is one of caution and prudence," Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero told parliament, responding to ETA's announcement. "Any peace process after so many years of horror and terror will be long and difficult."

The statement from ETA, which has been fighting for 40 years for an independent Basque state, explained the cease-fire - which goes into effect Friday - as a bid to "promote a democratic process in the Basque country ... in which our rights as a people will be recognized." The government, it warned "must recognize the results of this democratic process with no type of limitation."

Politicians had been speculating for weeks that the armed group, which has killed more than 800 people, was about to announce an end to its violent struggle. The government had repeatedly refused to open talks with ETA until it renounced the use of force.

Deputy Prime Minister Maria Teresa Fernandez de la Vega told the Senate Wednesday that the authorities would "work with all political forces" to bring peace to the Basque country, in Spain's Northeast. She said she hoped the cease-fire marked "the beginning of the end" of ETA, which stands for "Basque Homeland and Freedom" in the Basque language.

ETA has demanded that the Spanish government recognize the Basque country's right to declare independence, if a referendum in the region backs such a decision. Though Mr. Zapatero has ruled out such a move, his government has shown more tolerance of regional separatists than previous administrations.

On Tuesday, the Spanish parliament approved a new relationship between the central government and Catalonia, recognizing it as "a nation." Some observers suggested that the vote encouraged ETA to hope for a similar, or better, deal if it renounces violence. Last year, parliament authorized the government to hold talks with ETA, which is listed as a terrorist organization by the European Union and the United States, on the condition the group laid down its arms.

"If I was in ETA I would be optimistic" about the outcome of expected negotiations, says Florentino Portero, an analyst at the Strategic Studies Group, a think tank in Madrid. "Zapatero is a new generation of politician with a radically new way of conceiving of the state" as a confederation of sovereign regions.

DOJ_NMG_0020282

On the streets of the Basque city of Bilbao, some citizens welcomed the news of the cease-fire. "I am very happy this has happened," says Inaki Muniain, a hotel receptionist, by phone. "This gives us hope that things will get better and that ETA will disappear or end up as a political party."

Echoing that optimism, Juan Avilés, expert in terrorism and security at the Universidad Nacional a Distancia "It's good news. It could really be the end of ETA's terrorism. You always have to be cautious when talking about terrorists, but I believe that this declaration could be the end of the nightmare that we've lived for almost 40 years."

Others were more cautious. "I don't believe it at all," scoffs Nestor Diez Seisdedos, a quality-control inspector at an electrical appliance factory in Barakaldo, also reached by phone. "It will last a while but it certainly isn't permanent."

Some analysts shared that skepticism. "ETA will maintain the peace as long as they consider it opportune," says Rafael Badarji, a security analyst with the conservative Foundation for Analysis and Social Studies in Madrid. "When it stops serving their aims they will pick up their weapons again."

Mr. Badarji says that ETA declared a cease-fire because "It believes ... its objectives will be better served politically than through force." After the Al Qaeda attack in Madrid on March 11, 2004, political violence such as ETA had used for decades appeared counterproductive. ETA has not launched any fatal attacks since 2003.

The Spanish police, supported by their French colleagues in the Basque regions across the French border, have also enjoyed considerable success in recent years. They have arrested over 750 ETA members, including top leader Mikel Antza, since 2000.

Wednesday's ETA video, showing three people sitting at a table in front of the ETA flag, their faces covered by masks and all wearing Basque berets, made no mention of any weapons handover. Nor did it offer to end the ETA practice of raising "revolutionary taxes" from Basque businessmen who have long complained of extortion.

The statement demanded that the Spanish and French governments "set aside repression," seen as a bid to persuade them to stop hunting ETA members.

One of the trickiest issues in any negotiations that the government opens with ETA will be the fate of the group's prisoners. ETA is expected to follow the example of other rebel military organizations from Northern Ireland to South Africa in demanding freedom for jailed comrades.

Such a move would doubtless be fiercely resisted by relatives of ETA's hundreds of victims, and by the conservative opposition People's Party. Party leader Mariano Rajoy accused Zapatero of "betraying the dead" when the Prime Minister first offered in 2005 to enter talks with ETA if it laid down its arms.

• Lisa Abend in Madrid and Asel Llana contributed to this article. ETA basics

• What is ETA?

ETA stands for Euskadi ta Askatasuna, which means "Basque Homeland and Freedom." The group's aim is to establish an independent state for the Basque people, who have lived along the Spanish-French border since the Stone Age.

• When was the group formed?

ETA was formed in 1959 in response to Spanish dictator General Franco's suppression of Basque language and culture. When Franco died in 1975, the Basque Country was granted semi-autonomy. ETA wanted full independence.

• Whom does it target?

In its 40-year history, ETA has killed more than 800 people. Most of its attacks have been bombings or shootings, mainly targeting Spanish government institutions and personnel. The group is labeled as a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union.

• Has it tried political means?

It has a political wing, Batasuna, but the Spanish government banned Batasuna in 2003. Since that year, ETA has not carried out any deadly attacks. It was originally blamed for the 2004 Madrid bombings, but Al Qaeda was found to be responsible.

Colombian Rebels Face Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0020283

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Fifty leaders of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) have been named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine, half the world's illicit supply, in the largest U.S. drug-trafficking case.

"From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans," said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) chief Karen P. Tandy. "Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Mrs. Tandy said the indictment "addresses and decimates the entire leadership of the FARC."

The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, "strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government.

FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Mr. Gonzales said. "For years, this group has controlled the production and distribution of massive amounts of cocaine that ends up in America's communities. Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice."

Three of the charged FARC leaders -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. will seek their extradition to face trial in the United States. More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, and two accused FARC leaders are awaiting trial in Washington.

Andres Pastrana, Colombia's ambassador to the U.S., said the indictment was based on evidence gathered by American officials who worked "in very close collaboration with Colombian authorities."

"Colombia is one of the main victims of the global war on drugs. Thousands of innocent citizens, journalists, judges, politicians, soldiers and police officers have given their lives to this cause," said Mr. Pastrana, a former Colombian president who was kidnapped by the Medellin drug cartel during his 1988 race for Bogota mayor and later rescued by police. "Colombia has been and remains deeply committed to defeating the drug trade."

FARC has about 17,000 members and controls wide areas of the country, so rounding up the other 47 indicted leaders will be a difficult task. The State Department announced rewards yesterday of $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the leaders still at large, all members of FARC's governing council.

In addition to half the world's supply of cocaine, FARC was responsible for more than 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States every year, Mrs. Tandy said, adding that the organization controlled every aspect of its production and distribution, even setting the prices paid to Colombian farmers for coca paste, the raw material used to produce cocaine.

According to the indictment, the FARC leaders used terrorism and violence to further their cocaine-trafficking activities, ordering the deaths of Colombian farmers who sold coca paste to non-FARC buyers. It said the farmers who violated FARC rules were shot, stabbed or dismembered alive, their bodies cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers.

The indictment also said the FARC leaders also ordered the kidnap and killing of Americans to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the organization's cocaine-trafficking activities. It also said the FARC leaders authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law-enforcement officers conducting investigations into FARC's narcotics activities.

Three U.S. contractors are among 60 hostages being held by FARC.

The indictment said:

•Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," was a member of the FARC's leadership council and commander of its 24th Front unit. He is accused of directing the purchase of cocaine paste and transmitting billions of Colombian pesos in cocaine profits to FARC officials, and the indictment said he ordered the slayings of eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive.

DOJ_NMG_0020284

•Cuevas Cabrera, who also was called "Mincho," was a FARC associate who managed cocaine laboratories for the organization's 14th Front unit, where he supervised the production and distribution of hundreds of thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He has been in custody since 2004.

•Martinez Vega, also known as "Chiguiro," was a FARC associate who provided large quantities of arms and ammunition to the organization in exchange for thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He was arrested on drug charges in Venezuela and turned over to Colombian authorities in early 2005.

Why UN Reform Effort Could Fizzle (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. - This was to be a year of reform of the United Nations. But what some global leaders have called "the opportunity of a generation" - to better match the preeminent global institution with the challenges of the 21st century - risks crumbling into little more than a dashed hope.

Despite President Bush's challenge to the UN to be "relevant," and even after the weaknesses exposed by the oil-for-food scandal, old tugs of war are slowing momentum at a crucial moment in the UN's calendar.

Already, some countries see reform's principal promoter, Secretary-General Kofi Annan, as a lame duck: A new secretary-general will be elected later this year. A bigger impediment still is that even more countries harbor old suspicions about those pressing for reform - in particular the United States. These countries also feel scalded by so-far unsuccessful attempts to reform the powerful Security Council.

"The reforms on the table really get to the meat of the matter, which is changing an institution envisioned for the post-World War II period to work in a very changed world," says Edward Luck, a UN expert at Columbia University in New York. "The challenge now is that after so much attention to expanding the Security Council, this package sounds like leftovers - when it's really the meat and potatoes of reform."

Hopes for the reforms were buoyed by last week's approval of a new human rights council. It replaces the discredited human rights commission - a change world leaders had demanded last fall. General Assembly President Jan Eliasson says that getting the human rights issue done opens the way to focusing on the big management questions.

But even the human rights reform, which is less bold than some powers including the US had advocated, suggests the difficult road ahead on other issues - especially those that the power-jealous General Assembly of 191 countries considers power grabs by dominant members.

South Africa, for example, is already warning of efforts to bypass the Assembly with reforms that would concentrate more power in the secretariat and Security Council, where developed countries dominate. South Africa leads the "Group of 77" developing countries that holds particular sway in the General Assembly. Proposals focus on management

When Mr. Annan unveiled his overhaul package to the General Assembly earlier this month, he outlined 23 initiatives in six areas that he said focus on urgent management reforms.

Under leadership reform, for example, Annan calls for the job of deputy secretary-general to be expanded and elevated to become something like the general manager of the secretariat. Since the oil-for-food scandal, which cast a black cloud over his management skills, Annan has often noted that the "SG" is expected to be both the world's top diplomat and manager of its largest international institution, an almost superhuman task.

Other proposed reforms include:

• Improving and tightening UN procurement of goods and services.

• Making staff mobility a prerequisite for employment and a condition of promotion.

• Relocating and outsourcing some costly services, such as translation.

• Streamlining the budgetary process and expanding the secretary-general's authority to redeploy posts and funds.

What Annan's recommendations do not include is creation of the post of chief financial officer. That was a key recommendation of the independent inquiry committee, headed by former Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker, that investigated where the oil-for-food program set up for Iraq went wrong. Annan says the need for such a post is "obviated" by other financial oversight reforms he proposes.

Still, Annan's package received at least initial encouraging words from the US. And that is good, reform proponents say, because a UN transformation needs strong support from the world's only superpower.

"This set of reforms identifies the big difference between the UN today and [upon its founding] in 1945, because now it's at least as much a doer as it is a convener" of forums and conferences, says Lee Feinstein, an expert on the UN at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

Annan notes that the UN has evolved from an organization mainly holding conferences in New York to one focusing on development and health. Moreover, its $10 billion budget goes overwhelmingly to support more than 80,000 peacekeepers currently deployed around the globe. "This reform could strengthen some of these 'doing' activities," Mr. Feinstein adds, "but the truth is that a lot depends on the US and how much it puts into getting this done." Ambivalence toward the US

Yet many countries are ambivalent about the American role in the institution, especially after the US was perceived to bully its way into a war with Iraq that the UN did not want.

"The context for this debate is the huge asymmetry in power in the world between the US and the rest, and it has the potential to bring everything to a standstill," says Mr. Luck of Columbia. "It's a situation that leaves the US between a rock and a hard place," he adds, "because the world wants the US involved but also accuses it of trying to dominate the UN if it is too supportive or changes are too radical."

Suspicions of the US are not limited to developing countries. Kenneth Roth, executive director of Human Rights Watch, says a lack of US engagement in the reform process leads to speculation that some US officials "want to produce a UN failure to demonstrate that the UN can't reform - and thus should be abandoned."

Islamic Activism Sweeps Saudi Arabia (WP)

By Faiza Saleh Ambah

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

JIDDAH, Saudi Arabia -- More than a dozen women in black cloaks, some with colorful head scarves, others with only their eyes visible through slits in black veils, filed into the dining room after sunset prayers. They sat around a long table set up with paper, pencils and thermoses of Arabic coffee, across from a small group of men, including that evening's guest, Sadeg al-Malki.

The women -- homemakers, physicians and college students -- had sought out Malki, a consultant at the Islamic Education Foundation, because they wanted help on a project they were embarking on: how to talk to non-Muslim co-workers and acquaintances about Islam and the prophet Muhammad.

The women, who have since taken several mini-courses with Malki on discussing their religion with non-Muslims, are part of a loosely knit grass-roots movement that has sprung up across the kingdom since January, when anger over cartoons of Muhammad sparked riots in Europe and several Muslim countries. The movement is made up of a diverse cross section of women, students, businessmen, lawyers and clerics, all campaigning under the banner of Nusrat al-Rasool, or Victory for the Prophet.

The activists' campaign includes a continuing economic boycott of Denmark, where the cartoons were first published, and a project to produce television ads about the prophet for broadcast in Europe. College students are attempting to collect 1 million signatures to present to the Danish Embassy, and lawyers are studying ways to make insulting Islam and its prophet illegal. A number of businessmen have launched competitions with prize money of more than $50,000 for the best essays on Muhammad. This month, several clerics and heads of local committees will travel to neighboring Kuwait and Bahrain to brainstorm with Islamic activists there.

Though in its early stages, the grass-roots movement is a demonstration of how, in this region, activism within a religious context is capable of motivating and energizing a wide swath of society in a way that politics cannot. It is also a study of the ways in which deeply felt religious disputes, when not handled by governments, cut their own path, pushing people to take matters into their hands.

Muhammad Kawther, a young activist who heads Youth Together for an Islamic Renaissance, believes the cartoon controversy was a godsend for his group. The activists were just starting out, putting together their first project -- CDs urging young people to perform their five daily prayers -- when anger over the cartoons erupted. Dropping everything else, they decided on a campaign to collect 1 million signatures in support of the prophet.

Inexperienced and a little apprehensive at first, they approached several malls for permission to set up booths there. Sensing the public mood, mall owners not only agreed but gave them free access and advertising. They also allowed them to bring in chanters to sing the praises of the prophet, the first open public performances in this conservative country.

Three weeks into the campaign, Together had gathered 70,000 signatures, dozens of new supporters and, most valuable of all, a ton of practical experience.

"I learned how to deal with the public, with people of different ages and from different social levels," said Rayan al-Khilewi, who emceed the group's children's competition on facts about the prophet. "I learned how to deal with the media, and I actually did a live television feed."

Khilewi, a 20-year-old marketing student and taekwondo aficionado, had been strolling the mall with his family when he heard something he'd never heard at a shopping center before: Islamic songs being broadcast through a loudspeaker. Drawn by the a cappella chants, Khilewi, a religious Muslim, hurriedly followed the tune, which led him to the group's booth. He joined on the spot.

"For years I had been looking for a way to be active, to do something meaningful, and this was the first time I had found it," he said. "I have Denmark to thank for that."

Many who have become involved in activism since the cartoon crisis have echoed Khilewi's sentiment, saying the cartoons have shown them how much they love the prophet and forced them to do something about it.

Malki, the Islamic Education Authority consultant and also co-founder of the Faith in Diversity Institute, based in Owings Mills, Md., says the cartoons have created a new kind of activism. "People don't just want to talk, they want to do something," Malki said. "No state can stop, or think to stop, this activism. It's widespread, it's strong, and because of the love people feel for the prophet, it's also very emotional."

The two-hour lecture Malki gave in a noisy dining room packed mainly with women was winding down when he told the group he wanted to read them something from the Bible. He picked up his leather-bound King James version, well-thumbed with yellow bits of paper sticking out, leafed through it and started to read from the Book of Isaiah: "And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned."

There was stunned silence in the room, a palpable astonishment as the listeners understood the passage to foreshadow Muhammad, who was illiterate before he became a prophet. A few whispered, "God is great," and several young men and women wiped tears from their eyes.

Sulaiman al-Buthi, a Riyadh-based spokesman for the International Committee for the Defense of the Final Prophet, says this religious but peaceful activism could put an end to violence and drive groups like al-Qaeda out of business. Analysts have long said that a lack of democracy and civic institutions in the Middle East is part of the appeal of extremist groups, which offer one of the only options for disaffected youth.

But Buthi said he was "very optimistic about this movement, this cartoon intifada. It has given people opportunities to take matters into their own hands and do something positive for their religion. It's generating a very potent feeling, and it's capable of destroying the pull and influence of groups like al-Qaeda."

On the other hand, lawyer and writer Bassem Alem says he believes that the cartoons were only a trigger within the context of an already burgeoning region-wide Islamic resurgence. People "look around and they see Islamists winning in Egypt and Palestine and Morocco," he said, referring to elections in those places. "They feel empowered, and this is just one more manifestation of that."

Alem says that people took matters into their own hands because their governments were not doing enough to assuage their anger. He also contends these ad hoc committees will supplant Western-style civic institutions. "The methodologies for setting up civic institutions here failed because they were a Western model," he said. "These indigenous movements will take root because they are based on our beliefs and real needs."

Kawther, back at his father's office, which serves as Together's headquarters, was more reflective. "Islam has gone through many phases, up and down," said the stocky young man with a dark patch on his forehead that comes from regular prayers. "For it to be strong again, for a new Islamic renaissance, the youth have to be involved, and that's why we're doing this."

At the Seirafi mega-mall, where Together had set up signing booths and several computers and helped passersby send more than 5,000 e-mails to Denmark, two 12-year-old boys were handing out brochures that explained the campaign and urged people to follow the example of the prophet by becoming more devout. One of the group's members, law student Abdul-Ilah Bawazir, picked up the microphone to address the hundreds of shoppers, men to one side, veiled women to the other, who had stopped to watch that evening's performance of the Heraa group of Islamic chanters.

"We are all here for one reason," he said to the crowd. "To show solidarity with the prophet. Now that you've enjoyed the show, please take a minute and sign your name in support of the finest of messengers, prophet Muhammad. We want the world to know how much we love our prophet and how much we're willing to sacrifice for him."

Egypt's Opposition Targets Reforms (CSM)

By Sarah Gauch

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

CAIRO - During heated parliamentary debates last week on the government's annual policy statement, Hussein Ibrahim, a parliamentarian for the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood party, lashed out with an impassioned plea for reform.

"It does not bode well for political life, especially when it comes to advancing freedom of expression, of movement, and freedom to join parties," he said.

He continued to castigate the government's human rights record, pointing to international reports that detail "horror stories about torture in police stations, cases in which prisoners have disappeared from jails and innocent citizens have been forced to admit to crimes they didn't commit."

Mr. Ibrahim is deputy head of an 88-person bloc of Muslim Brotherhood members elected to parliament in elections last November. The largest opposition bloc in this 454-seat parliament since the monarchy's 1952 overthrow, the Brotherhood has put political reform and fighting government corruption on the top of their agenda.

With fundamentalist Islamic movements across the Middle East gaining political influence, including the Iraqi Shiites, Lebanese Hizbullah, and Palestinian Hamas, the spotlight is on the Muslim Brotherhood to see how this group adapts religion to their democratic ambitions.

As an outlawed group, the Brotherhood ran as independents in last fall's elections, campaigning under the slogan "Islam is the Solution." But the Brotherhood's parliamentary activities seem to have gotten under the government's skin in recent weeks. Police have arrested about two dozen members in what the Brotherhood and analysts say is an effort to remind this group who is boss, despite its large parliamentary bloc.

The arrests are also part of a general government backtracking on political reforms. Last year's parliamentary elections were marred by widespread violence, largely instigated by police and government supporters. The government also recently postponed local council elections for two years, to avoid another Muslim Brotherhood election victory, many believe.

Although the Brotherhood is still a minority in a parliament with overwhelming state party control, they are proving to be a strong, outspoken, and unified force, analysts say.

"Already they are making a difference in parliament," says Diaa Rashwan, senior researcher at the Al Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies. "For the first time in years, the [ruling] National Democratic Party is feeling that it is not alone and that there's this dedicated, unified 20-percent bloc in the opposition."

Since the Brotherhood's surprise victory, many have questioned what role this group would play and what difference it could make in a parliament with an overwhelming ruling party majority. Observers also wondered to what extent the Brotherhood's Islamic agenda, which calls for strict application of Islamic law, would take a back seat to more recent calls for political reform.

So far, the speeches and activities of Brotherhood parliamentarians emphasize political reform. Their agenda includes demands widely backed by democratic activists: changing legislation that allows journalists to face prison sentences for libel, granting independence to Egypt's judges, and canceling a 25-year-old emergency law that forbids gatherings of more than five people.

"We need economic reform and development, in education and health, but we can't realize this until we have political reform," says Mohamed el-Katatny, the head of the Muslim Brotherhood's parliamentary bloc. The government, meanwhile, emphasizes economic reform with slower-paced political reform.

Not everyone, however, is convinced of the Brotherhood's commitment to democratic change.

"There is a problem of trust when they speak about democracy," says Mahmoud Abaza, chairman of the opposition Wafd's parliamentary bloc. "For 15 years their credo was application of Islamic law. Just in the last two to three years they joined the demand for democracy."

Muslim Brotherhood members, however, argue that Islam encompasses political change. "There is no contradiction between political reform and Islam," says Brotherhood MP Ibrahim. "Human rights come from Islam. Fighting corruption comes from Islam. All these issues stem from Islam."

Some government officials and analysts also complain that the Brotherhood lacks a concrete political program. "The Muslim Brotherhood did not come up with a position on privatization or subsidies or education or health, on any of the major challenges facing this country, compared to this government, which is committed to a program," said Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif, speaking to a group of businesspeople in Cairo last Monday.

The Muslim Brotherhood may have its critics, but still the group has come a long way since its beginnings in 1928, eventually giving rise to dozens of extremist Islamic groups, including Hamas and Al Qaeda. In 1954, the Brotherhood was banned after a string of violent attacks,

The ruling National Democratic Party (NDP), however, still maintains a two-thirds majority, giving it alone the right to pass legislation and change the Constitution. Nevertheless, the Brotherhood, together with the also outspoken secular opposition with 12 seats, can still use the parliament as a forum for their opinions.

In any case the Brotherhood says these arrests merely empower them. "We are used to being arrested," says MP Hassan Hamdy Aly. "This won't stop us. It just makes us stronger."

Where Even Grisly News Can Offer A Kind Of Comfort (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, March 19 — As a military band played a dirge, the coffins that flowed out of Beirut's central military hospital on Saturday morning put some lingering questions to rest, but raised many others.

Inside them lay the skeletons of Lebanon's civil war: the remains of men who had disappeared, only to be uncovered last November in a mass grave on the grounds of the Defense Ministry headquarters, a discovery that confirmed persistent rumors.

The bodies, identified by DNA tests, were handed over to the men's families on Saturday, concluding a wrenching 15-year search for their whereabouts.

For a handful of women like Saide Khawand, Audett Salem and Samia Abdullah, the ceremony was a bittersweet victory, but still not an end to their own search.

They and others like them, the families of more than 600 young men and women who disappeared during and after the war, have held a vigil in a park downtown for almost a year, demanding that the government investigate their cases. To many of them, the ceremony on Saturday was a signal that a door might be opening on one of the darkest chapters of the bloody civil war.

"This was just the tip of the iceberg," said Ghazi Aad, an organizer and director for Support of Lebanese in Detention and Exile, a group known as Solide that is leading the campaign to publicize the issue. "We have documented several mass graves in Lebanon."

In a nation struggling to forget the war among its many religious groups, the Palestinians and regional powers, a war that claimed tens of thousands of lives from 1975 to 1990 and demolished half this city, the women are a reminder of how much remains unresolved.

DOJ_NMG_0020289

Last April, shortly before Syria withdrew its soldiers from Lebanon under international pressure, the women pitched a tent in Jibran Khalil Jibran Park near the United Nations offices here, hoping to remind Lebanese and the international community of their plight. These unlikely activists now sit daily in the tent, which is outfitted with beds, a television and a refrigerator, and take turns camping overnight. On any given day, they can be seen playing bridge, preparing meals and finding consolation.

"We've been asking and chasing and kissing hands, but got nothing," Mrs. Khawand said. She has been searching for her brother since he was taken by Syrian security agents in 1992. "We are just asking them to bring him to us, in any condition, just bring him to us."

Most of them are homemakers, many from middle-class families, and represent a cross section of Lebanon's many sects.

Mrs. Khawand last saw her brother, a member of the mostly Maronite Christian Phalangist Party, as he left his house, when he was surrounded by men she believed were Syrian security guards. Mrs. Salem lost both her son, Richard, and daughter, Christine, as they were coming back from the Hamra shopping district one day in 1985; she believes they were kidnapped in an attempt to force the family out of its Beirut apartment. Ms. Abdullah has continued the search for her brother Emad, a member of the Palestine Liberation Organization, who was taken hostage on the way back from a wedding in 1984.

Hope comes in ways small and large for these women, whose faces only hint at the years of pain and despair. Every now and then, they may receive word from released detainees who have seen their relatives in prison.

In 2003, Ms. Abdullah received what she believes was a letter from her brother, written with a matchstick, telling her he was sick. And over the years, some of the women say, they have been able to squeeze details out of officials who would occasionally confirm whether their relatives were alive, but that was all.

The subject of prisoners is a touchy one in a country where some politicians who now speak of democracy were warlords decades ago, with militias that kidnapped people for money or political gain. Many of the prisoners ended up in Syrian custody, the women contend, while others landed in makeshift militia prisons and were never seen again.

"We have thousands of Lebanese who disappeared during the war, many of them at the hands of the militias, and today many of their warlords are in government," said Mr. Aad, the organizer at Solide. "So they don't want to discuss the issue. They have swept the dirt under the rug, but it's still there. And that's why this is something of a Pandora's box."

Of the 10 bodies buried on Saturday, seven were Lebanese Army soldiers led by Gen. Michel Aoun, who fought the last battle of the civil war in 1990 against the Syrian forces that controlled the country until last year. Another 10 bodies found in the mass grave have yet to be identified. Many parents of missing soldiers have given samples for DNA checks in recent weeks, but only reluctantly, possibly fearing what they might learn.

In December, authorities uncovered another mass grave on the grounds of the former Syrian security headquarters in Anjar, where some 28 bodies were found but have yet to be identified. Mr. Aad believes there are numerous other burial sites scattered around the country, left by either Syrian forces, Lebanese militias or Palestinian fighters.

Acting Interior Minister Ahmad Fatfat said the ceremonial burial of the exhumed bodies was "an important signal to the Lebanese people" and "underscores a desire for reconciliation." He added that DNA tests were continuing and that efforts were under way to uncover other such graves. "When the truth comes out, it's far better than denying the reality."

But as the mothers stood in the front row of the funeral procession on Saturday, some seemed to grapple with the likelihood that their own children might be dead too.

"They gave their children the dignity they deserved," Ms. Abdullah said. "And now we want the same for ours."

In 50-Yard Square In Belarus, A Country Within (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 22 — By midnight, as the temperature dropped ever lower and morning twilight was still five hours off, the core of Belarus's public opposition assumed its shape in the darkness.

It was about 300 people, arms interlocked and forming a small, dense square, stomping on the frozen ground under a police cadre's contemptuous gaze. Behind them, inside their human box, another group of demonstrators held their banned flags overhead, a thicket of banners over 20 small tents. At any moment, the demonstrators said, they expected the police to rush forward, beat them with clubs and drag them off to the detention cells. And then their protest would end in blood.

All of them said they were ready. "They may attack and beat us and inflict great trauma," said Stepan Svidersky, 18, a student. "But we have already achieved a result: We have shown our country that we are not afraid to stand against arbitrary rule."

Since a rigged presidential election on March 19, the capital of Belarus has seen a protest like none in 12 years of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko's autocratic grip. For four consecutive days, protesters have defied warnings of arrest and bloodshed and stood in a corner of October Square to demand a new race.

Their numbers rise to several thousand each evening, as they form a rally and impromptu dance party on the edge of an ice rink, and then dwindle, hour by hour, until midnight, when this core stands through the night, in two lines, to hold the place for the next day.

It is a frigid, risky vigil, given the Belarussian weather and the government's history of reflexive brutality against those who dare to stand and call for better lives than Mr. Lukashenko's island of Soviet nostalgia and corruption has been able, or willing, to provide.

Mostly they are young men in their 20's. A few look too young to shave. But since Tuesday night, when the opposition's leaders began to disagree about how best to proceed in their effort to unseat a president they do not recognize, this all-night core has become an independent force in a quixotic struggle.

Their influence emerged when one of Mr. Lukashenko's two principal challengers, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, urged the protesters to disband Tuesday night and save themselves before the police crackdown.

"There is no sense in keeping them on the square," Mr. Kazulin said. "We should think about our children, protect them, and not keep them in front of us."

The protesters refused to go. And they rejected the label of "children," applied to them by Mr. Kazulin, as well as by Mr. Lukashenko, as they crowded together in the plummeting cold. They formed their two lines, one facing out of the camp, to warn of any advance by the police, the other facing inward, to keep an eye on the behavior of the demonstrators, ensuring that no provocateurs had slipped inside.

After midnight, they occupied a portion of Belarus, a country of 10 million people the size of Kansas, that was no larger than a 50-yard square.

It was a country within. They danced on its cold stone. They handed out tea. They said they would not give it up.

"We consider this camp to be the only means to defend our position," Vitaly Korotysh, 22, one of the coordinators of the rally, said at 3:30 a.m. "If necessary it will stand for years. And if they break it up, I think on the next day the people will be back."

It is too soon to know whether this is foolishness or resolve.

But their position has been supported by Aleksandr Milinkevich, the second-place finisher in the election, with 6 percent of the vote, far behind the incumbent's 82.6 percent, which the protesters see as a cynical fraud.

Mr. Milinkevich has said he will be with the demonstrators until the end, whatever shape events may take. It all could end with a dwindling of interest, he said, or in state violence. But inevitably, he said, the feelings here will grow.

"We live in a country of total fear, and very few people are brave enough to come out like this," he said, standing in front of the ranks at 4 a.m., as the temperature dropped to 10 degrees. "This action destroys fear inside the country because it tells people it is possible to fight for your own destiny."

The protesters see little chance of changes in government anytime soon. To the extent that this is a revolution, Mr. Milinkevich often says, it is a revolution not on the streets but in the mind.

In many ways the students are following in the footsteps of the people's movement that overturned a rigged presidential vote in Ukraine in 2004. How widely the feeling is spreading is unclear, but they have left their camp and posted rallying cries on the Internet. They have sent text messages by mobile phones to their friends. And they venture away a few hours a day — risking arrest when alone or in small groups away from the foreign photographers and news crews here — urging others to join them.

They hope for a large rally on Saturday, a day of celebration of a short-lived Republic of Belarus in 1918 that the government does not recognize and that Mr. Lukashenko despises. Since this year's celebration happens to fall on a Saturday, potential opposition supporters will not be at work.

But their efforts have been squelched so far by the arrests of protesters leaving the square and by state television coverage that has portrayed them as homosexual, drunk and, in the words of one riot police commander, "pathetic."

But ultimately, Mr. Milinkevich said, a message exists here that cannot be missed by Mr. Lukashenko and his security apparatus, which retains the name K.G.B. "We are not cattle anymore," he said.

That sentiment was repeatedly expressed in the darkness, as demonstrators made clear it was not merely the election they protested, but the entire form of government Mr. Lukashenko has built.

They attacked the government's arbitrary detentions and its smothering of political and economic freedoms, including the freedoms of assembly and speech. And they condemned the paired inefficiency and corruption that they said were at the center of the administration. Although some Western countries, including the United States, have aided opposition groups here with training, financing and political support, the demonstrators on the square speak of an organic anger, fueled by the injustice and inequities within Belarus.

"Those who have a higher education understand that Lukashenko is a commodity profiteer," said Maxim Grechkoyedov, 25, an engineer who said that the government accepted natural gas from Moscow at below-market prices, part of Russia's subsidy of the Belarussian state, and then sold a portion at market prices, keeping the difference for the president and the elite.

Mr. Grechkoyedov said the protesters were here because they were part of Belarus's "lost generation," those who have attended universities since the Soviet Union's disintegration, and have languished in low-paying jobs and under repression for their adult lives.

Many have had enough, he said; Europe is not supposed to be like this.

An opposition has been born. It is small, but one sign of its early resolve is that almost everyone who stands until dawn not only gives his or her last name for publication, but also insists that it be written down, knowing then that the authorities will see who they are.

"I am tired of the lies," said Aleksandr Zhukov, 21, a student. "I am no longer afraid."

He stood in the darkness, shifting his weight from one cold foot to the other, waiting for whatever comes next.

German Leader Nears The End Of Her Political Honeymoon (NYT)

By Richard Bernstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BERLIN, March 22 — Call her the emerging star of European politics, but also ask: Will Germany let it last?

With personal approval ratings of about 75 percent at home and expressions of admiration from places as far apart as Washington and Moscow, Chancellor Angela Merkel has clearly made an extremely good impression in the four months since she took office.

Her ratings are especially impressive given that she ran such a lackluster campaign last year that she almost lost a national election she had been expected to win by a large margin. This inauspicious beginning forced her into a coalition with the Social Democrats, the main left-of-center rival of her Christian Democrats.

But Mrs. Merkel, the first woman to serve as chancellor, has used her first months to project an image of good sense and quiet competence, and the mood in Germany is probably better than it has been in several years. Consumer confidence is up, and the conspicuous gloom that afflicted the last months of Ms. Merkel's predecessor, Gerhard Schröder, has been lifting.

Yet there is a strong feeling that Mrs. Merkel's popularity is not so much because she is showing strength and determination as Germany's leader, but rather because of her decision to advance very little in the way of a bold domestic agenda. That may be about to change.

Three German states have elections on Sunday, after which Mrs. Merkel is expected to start her campaign to win major changes, tackling such chronic problems as high unemployment, economic stagnation and government deficits that exceed norms set for Germany's membership in the European Currency Union. That is when the political storm will stir.

"She has done a good job insofar as she hasn't made any mistakes," said Uwe Andersen, a political science professor at Ruhr University in Bochum. "But we'll have to see how she does on the really big reforms after the state elections before we can judge if she is doing well in a positive sense, rather than just not making mistakes."

DOJ_NMG_0020292

So far Mrs. Merkel seems to have chosen to make her mark as a sort of super foreign minister, not as a domestic policy chieftain — and in Germany, the foreign minister has always been popular.

"Merkel still acts as if other people are responsible for the country's problems," the weekly magazine Der Spiegel wrote a few days ago. "She still hasn't started to govern," the magazine continued, echoing an opinion widely voiced here.

Reinhard Schlinkert, the chairman of the Institute for Market and Policy Research, citing poll numbers from late February, said, "About two-thirds of Germans say she won't be able to manage unemployment, and two-thirds say she won't manage the country's financial problems. It's a very insecure situation.

"Everybody hopes that the new coalition will do better for Germany, but the people have heard so many times that things will change that now they're sitting back and waiting for results."

Governing in a coalition with her formal rivals, the Social Democrats, is far from what Mrs. Merkel wanted when she campaigned for office last year. But the existence of the coalition and the paramount goal of keeping it strong and stable has protected her, at least in these early stages, from Germany's normal political squabbling.

For one thing, Mrs. Merkel herself, bound by the compromise formulas of her coalition, could not have pressed a maximalist program for change even if she had wanted to. At the same time the Social Democrats, who would lose major parts of their labor union constituency if they supported maximalist changes, have been reluctant to criticize her, lest political infighting weaken the coalition.

All that has given Mrs. Merkel a strong start, one that contrasts with the weakness of her counterparts in other European capitals.

The French are in an uproar, and President Jacques Chirac, in office for 11 years, is seen as a lame duck. The Italians' buccaneering prime minister, Silvio Berlusconi, after five stormy years, is behind in the polls two and a half weeks before national elections. In Britain, Prime Minister Tony Blair has been beset by a long series of political battles and demands for him to cede his office to his colleague and rival in the Labor Party, Gordon Brown.

Ahead of the state elections on Sunday, polls indicate that Mrs. Merkel's Christian Democrats will win two of them. In the third state, Rhineland-Palatinate, Mrs. Merkel is probably hoping to lose to Social Democrats, so they will not be tempted to rebel against their role in the national coalition.

To start addressing perennial German economic problems, Mrs. Merkel will have to turn away from her concentration on foreign policy. In her first months in office, she spent a lot of time announcing herself to foreign partners, visiting Warsaw, Washington, Paris, London, Jerusalem and Moscow.

In addition, only a few weeks after she took office, she played a central role in breaking an acrimonious stalemate over the budget of the European Union, which enhanced her standing at home as a figure to be contended with on the European scene.

As the former Social Democratic Defense Minister Peter Struck said, referring to Mrs. Merkel's return from diplomatic triumph to face domestic reality, "The red carpet time for Mrs. Merkel is over."

Britain Upholds School Ban On A Muslim Gown (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

LONDON, March 22 — Britain's highest court ruled Wednesday that a secondary school was within its rights to bar a female student from wearing a jilbab, a loose, ankle-length gown, instead of the regular school uniform.

Overturning a lower court ruling in favor of the student, Shabina Begum, a five-judge panel in the House of Lords pointed out that the school, Denbigh High School in Luton, had already taken great care to make its uniform acceptable to its students, 79 percent of whom are Muslim.

"The school was entitled to consider that the rules about uniform were necessary for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others," one of the judges, Lord Hoffmann, said in his written opinion.

The issue of what sort of religious dress, if any, is appropriate in state-run schools has become increasingly divisive in Europe, where the wishes of Muslim populations are often at odds with the rules set down by secular governments. In France, the hijab, the head scarf worn by many Muslim girls and women, and other "conspicuous" religious symbols are banned from schools.

In 2005, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that a university in Turkey was within its rights to ban head scarves, saying that it was justified in avoiding giving preference to any one religion.

By such standards, the British policy is comparatively liberal. Girls at Denbigh, for instance, have a wide choice of uniform — a skirt, pants or the shalwar kameez, a flowing pants-and-tunic combination considered acceptable by many Muslims — and they can also wear head scarves. Three nearby schools allow students to wear the jilbab.

But Denbigh, a coeducational school with 1,000 students, had argued that permitting Ms. Begum, now 17, to wear the jilbab could prove divisive, possibly leading to arguments among students about whether it represented a more devout adherence to Islam. In addition, the school said, the jilbab is too constricting and would pose safety risks.

Tahir Alam, the education spokesman for the Muslim Council of Britain, a lobbying group, told Bloomberg News that the safety argument was "an excuse, really."

"You have to ask yourself," he said, "how many people have fallen over and died because they tripped on their jilbab."

In their unanimous ruling, the judges said Denbigh had "taken immense pains to devise a uniform policy that respected Muslim beliefs," laying down rules that "were as far from being mindless as uniform rules could ever be" and that were apparently "acceptable to mainstream Muslim opinion."

Ms. Begum sued the school in 2002 after it insisted that she wear the required uniform, which, she told the BBC on Wednesday, she believed "did not satisfy Islamic clothing." Represented by Cherie Booth, a human rights lawyer and the wife of Prime Minister Tony Blair, she argued that the school had denied her the right to practice her religion.

Speaking of the jilbab, which covers the entire body except for the hands and face, she told the BBC, "I feel that it is an obligation upon Muslim women to wear this, although there are other opinions."

Ms. Begum said she was "saddened and disappointed" by the ruling. "I still don't see why I was told to go home from school when I was just practicing my religion," she said.

As a result of Denbigh's policy, Ms. Begum spent two years out of school. She now attends another school where the jilbab is permitted.

A spokesman for the Department of Education said it welcomed the ruling as reinforcement of its view that schools should be allowed to set their own uniform policies.

Cuba On The West Bank (NYT)

By Gideon Lichfield

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Jerusalem

FOR two months, the world has dithered over how to get a Palestinian authority run by Hamas to recognize Israel and renounce violence, and over how much aid and official contact to maintain until it does. The diplomats' refrain was that once Hamas appointed a cabinet, things would be clearer.

Last weekend, Hamas did name a cabinet. But knowing who has which job has not made things clearer, nor will the Israeli election on March 28. The dispute runs too deep.

American and European bans on aiding or communicating with terrorist organizations, if followed strictly, can stop a lot of money from reaching the Palestinians. But there are creative ways around such restrictions. You can relabel some budget support and development assistance "essential humanitarian aid," send it through third parties like the United Nations or World Bank, or pay it directly to contractors and service providers.

In conversations with officials from various countries, two positions, crudely speaking, emerge. The first, predictably more common among American and Israeli policy makers, says that outside powers should strangle Hamas so that it either moderates or dies. The other, which finds more favor with Europeans, says to keep as much aid flowing as possible, perhaps with incentives for good behavior and sanctions for bad.

DOJ_NMG_0020294

Sound familiar? It should. The same debate has been raging for decades about another small, impoverished and controversial place: Cuba. The United States doggedly insists that Fidel Castro's repressive regime must be boycotted to make it collapse. Europeans and Canadians prefer encouraging gradual change through "constructive engagement."

The result is that an unrepentant Mr. Castro is enjoying his 48th year in power, using the American boycott as a political prop and the rest of the world as an economic prop. Talk to Cubans and two things soon become clear: the main reason any of them support Mr. Castro is for his heroic stand against the Yanqui bully, and the main reason Cubans don't starve is that tourists and foreign joint-venture businesses pump money into the economy.

Something similar could happen with Hamas. A poll out this week found that 75 percent of Palestinians want Hamas to "engage Israel in peace negotiations." But even the most moderate will rally to defend their democratically elected government if they see countries that profess to love democracy trying to destabilize it. That will reduce domestic pressure on Hamas to pursue peace. And if aid from elsewhere meanwhile props up the Palestinian Authority, Hamas can carry on this way indefinitely, playing countries off against one another.

Is either approach to Hamas the right one? The first looks like a very long shot. Even if all the financial taps were closed, Hamas's popular support might drain away only slowly, and probably toward even more radical extremists, turning Palestinian areas into something more like Iraq. And because Hamas can call on the Muslim world for help, closing all the taps is well-nigh impossible. Any boycott will therefore probably lead to a Cuba-like situation.

An argument for keeping the aid going is that only a stable and strong authority can impose order on the fractious Palestinian clans and militant groups, and such order is essential to fulfilling the Palestinian side of any peace deal. Hamas has given more hints of its willingness to moderate its positions in the past month than Mr. Castro usually gives in a decade. Last week, Ismail Haniya, the authority's prime minister-designate, said that Hamas could hold talks on a Palestinian state confined to the pre-1967 borders if Israel first committed to those borders.

That, however, is not enough of a guarantee for Israel. If Hamas in fact harbors long-term plans to destroy the Jewish state, as some fear, then such statements are ploys to give it time to build up its strength. In that case, unrestricted foreign aid will make it more dangerous.

There is only way to find out whether and how Hamas can change. Outside powers should design a policy that combines carrots and sticks, offering both Hamas and Israel incentives to move gradually in the right direction, but preserving some safeguards in case they fail to do so.

That is easy to say and extremely hard to do. But the main point is that whatever the world does about Hamas, it needs to do it in unison — or face indefinite deadlock, as with Cuba.

Hobbes In Sudan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

At places like Davos and Harvard, the world's sages rarely stop fretting about the dangers of a too powerful America. Well, if you want to know what the world looks like without U.S. leadership, Exhibit A is Darfur in Sudan.

Today's leading authority on Darfur is the political philosopher Thomas Hobbes, who prophesied a world "nasty, brutish and short." At least 200,000 civilians have been killed in the past three years and two million more have become refugees. The source of the problem is the Arab rulers in Khartoum, who have pursued an ethnic cleansing campaign against black Muslims in western Sudan. They've equipped the Janjaweed Arab tribesmen to do the dirty work, and that militia is now attacking civilians across the border in Chad, creating 20,000 more refugees.

To his credit, Kofi Annan started shouting about the problem two years ago, and former Secretary of State Colin Powell labeled it "genocide" not long after that. The U.N.'s mighty peace-making machinery then started to roll and . . . nothing. The Chinese (who have close commercial ties to Khartoum) and Russians have blocked any serious intervention. Arab members of the Security Council have also opposed any attempt to single out Khartoum.

The Arab League -- so quick to denounce Danish cartoons -- has also stymied any global intervention to stop the murder of their fellow Muslims. Here's League Secretary General Amr Musa earlier this month: "In Sudan, there is a problem related to Darfur. We will listen to the Sudanese state minister to explain to us the developments in the issue of Darfur . . ." The League plans to hold its meeting next week -- in Khartoum.

The African Union has at least sent 7,000 troops to the region, but they are under-funded and under-equipped to enforce a truce that Sudan blatantly flouts. But the African failure is also political. In January the Union held its own summit in Khartoum, and next year it plans to award Sudan its presidency. The rule seems to be never to say a discouraging word about other African leaders, no matter how murderous.

As for Europe, France would be ideal to lead an intervention force. The French have military bases in neighboring Chad and could establish a no-fly zone to stop Janjaweed bombing. However, Paris is already occupied with another intervention in the Ivory Coast, and with its own business interests in Sudan isn't volunteering in any case.

Amid this global abdication, Mr. Annan finally decided last month to call in the American cavalry. He visited the White House and, with media fanfare, all but begged President Bush to do something. Despite U.S. obligations in Afghanistan, Iraq and many other places, Mr. Bush responded by proposing an expanded U.N. peacekeeping force under "NATO stewardship."

But Sudan President Omar al-Beshir quickly played to type and withdrew support for a U.N. force. He also threatened that "Darfur will become the graveyard for the United Nations and foreign intervention." And rather than stand up to such threats, U.N. envoy to Sudan Jan Pronk has wilted. He's now talking up intelligence about al Qaeda terrorists in Khartoum who could retaliate against U.N. peacekeepers. And he's warning against any NATO intervention without Security Council approval -- as if that would be forthcoming. All of this is a repeat of the same feckless U.N. pattern we've seen in Bosnia, Kosovo and Iraq.

So that leaves . . . guess who? The cowboy President, the American unilateralists, the Yankee imperialists -- or, to put it another way, the only nation with the will and wallet to provide order in an otherwise Hobbesian world. However, that will and wallet are being stretched today in Iraq and elsewhere, and Mr. Bush is rightly wary of committing more American blood and treasure to a conflict in Sudan that the rest of the world doesn't seem serious about ending in any event. One lesson of Darfur is that there really are limits to American power, and in its absence the world's savages have freer reign.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Case For Moussaoui Execution Seems Bolstered By 2 Witnesses (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va., March 22 — The government's effort to have Zacarias Moussaoui executed for the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, which has been troubled by serious problems over the last two weeks, appeared to have been bolstered significantly on Wednesday by the testimony of its final two witnesses.

A senior aviation security official at the time of the attacks in 2001 told the jury that several measures could have been put in place that might have foiled the plot if Mr. Moussaoui had disclosed what he knew about Al Qaeda's plans when he was arrested three weeks earlier.

The security official, Robert J. Cammaroto, was followed on the witness stand by Aaron Zebley, an F.B.I. agent at the time of the attacks, whose testimony made similar points about law enforcement.

The detailed testimony of the two witnesses provided the prosecution's strongest presentation to date at the trial, which is being held solely to determine whether Mr. Moussaoui, who has already pleaded guilty, should be executed or remain in jail for the rest of his life. The testimony from the two followed several days of disarray in which the government's case nearly fell apart.

Two F.B.I. officials who testified this week for the prosecution seemed mainly to help the defense by reinforcing the notion that the bureau had dragged its feet in following up leads from agents in the field that Mr. Moussaoui had valuable information about an imminent hijacking plot.

The trial was disrupted last week after the disclosure that a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration had improperly coached aviation security officials about how to testify. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema ruled that because of the actions of the lawyer, Carla J. Martin, the prosecution would be prohibited from calling those witnesses, a crippling blow to the government's case.

Judge Brinkema relented, however, and allowed prosecutors to try to find another, "untainted" aviation security witness to help make their argument. It was Mr. Cammaroto who appeared on the witness stand Wednesday afternoon as that substitute, and he briskly listed the steps the Federal Aviation Administration could have taken in the middle of August 2001 when Mr. Moussaoui was arrested on immigration charges in Minnesota, where he was learning to fly a jetliner.

At the time, Mr. Cammaroto was the F.A.A.'s official in charge of issuing security directives to United States airlines in response to the latest intelligence reports.

Under questioning by David J. Novak, a prosecutor, Mr. Cammaroto listed a half-dozen ways that airport security could have been increased if he had learned what Mr. Moussaoui acknowledged in his guilty plea last April: that he was an Al Qaeda member and that the group had discussed flying planes into buildings by disabling crews using short-bladed knives that were allowed on planes at the time.

"We could have taken several steps," Mr. Cammaroto said, listing among others the banning of all knives, shifting resources like air marshals to domestic flights, ordering physical "pat-downs" of passengers and making metal detectors more sensitive.

Gerald T. Zerkin, a public defender representing Mr. Moussaoui, suggested in his cross-examination that such security measures could not have been adopted quickly. Mr. Cammaroto acknowledged that the hiring of new air marshals would have taken months. But he said many of the steps could have been put in place within hours, and he cited the foiling of a multiple-plane hijack plot in the Philippines in 1995 as an example.

Mr. Zebley, the former F.B.I. agent, who has not yet been cross-examined, testified that information discovered after the attacks could have provided important leads beforehand. He noted that Mr. Moussaoui had received payments for his flight training from the same person who had sent money to some of the hijackers. He said that had Mr. Moussaoui told investigators at the time of his arrest about his paymaster and his intentions to commit a terrorist act, it would have been easy to trace the other payments made by the same man.

The prosecutors contend that even though Mr. Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks, he is responsible because his lies allowed "his brothers to go forward." Mr. Moussaoui's lawyers, who are to begin making their case next week, have said in papers that the government should not be able to execute someone on the speculative theory that had he provided information, the attacks would not have occurred.

Prosecution Begins Rebuilding Moussaoui Case (WP)

By Jerry Markon And Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

If Zacarias Moussaoui had confessed that he was plotting with al-Qaeda to hijack an airplane, federal officials could have drastically boosted airport security in the days before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, an aviation security expert testified yesterday in federal court.

Robert Cammaroto, a Transportation Security Administration official, told jurors at Moussaoui's death penalty trial that the government has long issued urgent warnings to airlines when threats to aviation arise. The knowledge that Moussaoui had trained at an al-Qaeda camp and was conspiring to take over a plane, he said, could have triggered intensified screening of passengers and luggage.

Asked if the government could have scrambled to find the short-bladed knives used by the Sept. 11 hijackers, Cammaroto told prosecutors: "We most certainly could have. That would have been a simple procedure."

The testimony was the initial step in the government's effort to rebuild its case for executing the only person convicted in the United States in the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Cammaroto was the first aviation security witness allowed to take the stand since a federal judge barred aviation witnesses and evidence because of misconduct by a government lawyer.

U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema issued her ruling last week after TSA lawyer Carla J. Martin violated a court order by sharing testimony and coaching witnesses. Brinkema modified the ruling on Friday, allowing the government to call witnesses not tainted by Martin's actions.

The testimony of Cammaroto, chief of commercial airports policy at TSA, is crucial to the government's key argument for Moussaoui's execution: that the Sept. 11 attacks could have been stopped if Moussaoui had not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001. Roughly half the government's case consists of aviation-related evidence.

Cammaroto, a former FAA official, acknowledged on cross-examination that in August 2001, the FAA was aware of al-Qaeda threats to hijack airplanes but had not increased airport security in response.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda in the hijackings. A federal jury is determining whether he will die.

The aviation testimony came on a day of swirling emotion in the trial at U.S. District Court in Alexandria. The former manager of an Arizona flight school that trained one of the hijackers recalled how she had expressed alarm about her student to the Federal Aviation Administration -- and then cried after the Sept. 11 attacks when she suspected that he had flown one of the airliners.

Margaret Chevrette said she helped train hijacker Hani Hanjour at Pan Am International Flight Academy in Mesa, Ariz., near Phoenix, from late December 2000 until March 2001. She said that Hanjour was a poor pilot who spoke limited English and that she "worried that he was going to hurt himself or hurt someone else because he didn't have the skills" to fly a large jet.

Chevrette recalled driving to work after learning of the planes flying into buildings on Sept. 11. Investigators soon concluded that Hanjour had piloted the plane that hit the Pentagon.

Something "snapped," Chevrette told jurors.

"I already knew in my heart that Hani was a part of it," Chevrette said. "I remember crying all the way to work, knowing that our company helped do this."

As Chevrette spoke, her voice hoarse and breaking at times, two family members of Sept. 11 victims cried softly in the third row of the courtroom. Eleni Kousoulis, whose sister, Danielle, was killed at the World Trade Center, said later: "I don't blame her. I don't think anyone did anything intentional."

Chevrette said that she reported her concerns to the FAA during Hanjour's training, but that the agency did little in response. She said an FAA official who oversaw her school suggested she get an English interpreter for Hanjour, contrary to the agency's own regulations.

An FAA spokesman declined to comment.

Witness Lists FAA Measures Available For A Pre-9/11 Tip (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

An agency official is the first to give aviation testimony after a federal attorney nearly derailed the sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui.

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A week after their case nearly imploded amid allegations of witness tampering, federal prosecutors began introducing aviation testimony Wednesday in Zacarias Moussaoui's sentencing trial, hoping to prove that had he cooperated, the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks could have been prevented.

Their first witness was Robert Cammaroto, chief of the Federal Aviation Administration's commercial airports policy division at the time of the attacks. He was allowed to testify on a limited basis after revelations last week that a Transportation Security Administration lawyer had improperly coached other federal aviation witnesses on their testimony.

Cammaroto listed security measures that could have been implemented had Moussaoui cooperated with the FBI after he was arrested in Minnesota for visa violations on Aug. 16, 2001.

For two hours, prosecutors methodically walked Cammaroto through his testimony. He told the court how the government could have responded to the Sept. 11 threat, and he offered new details on how the Federal Aviation Administration beefed up security when, in 1995, it was learned that Muslim extremists were plotting to blow up a dozen U.S. airliners over the Pacific Ocean.

Cammaroto spoke with authority and the experience of 25 years in the government security field — starting as an air traffic controller, moving on to become a federal air marshal and rising to a post as one of the FAA's top law enforcement officials.

Asked by Assistant U.S. Atty. David J. Novak how swiftly airport security officials would have reacted had Moussaoui revealed that the Sept. 11 hijackers planned to smuggle small knives aboard planes and then commandeer the cockpits, Cammaroto said:

"It could have been done fairly quickly. In a matter of hours."

But under cross-examination by defense lawyer Gerald T. Zerkin, Cammaroto conceded that in the late summer of 2001, the approach to airport security was far more relaxed than it is today.

Few people envisioned planes being hijacked on suicide missions, he said, and airport gate screening operations were less stringent. Passengers often were permitted to carry aboard such items as folding knives, bottles, screwdrivers and knitting needles.

Indeed, shown a security video of some of the Sept. 11 hijackers easily passing through checkpoints at Washington Dulles International Airport that morning, Cammaroto noted that only seven of the 19 had even been sent to a secondary screening, and none had been denied a seat.

"It seemed an act of desperation to blow yourself up" back then, Cammaroto said.

In the past, he said, hijackings mainly involved planes' diversion to Cuba or ransom demands. "We'd never had an incident where the bomber rode the bomb," he said.

The aviation testimony and evidence are central to the government's argument for executing Moussaoui. Prosecutors seek to convince the jury that Moussaoui knew enough about the Sept. 11 plot to help stop it.

But Moussaoui lied to the FBI and then refused to cooperate, sharply dividing the FBI about what to do with him.

The FBI never sought search warrants to open his belongings and learn more about why he was training on jumbo jet simulators in Minnesota.

The defense maintains that Moussaoui, who pleaded guilty to being a Sept. 11 conspirator last April, was a lone operator and never had any direct role or knowledge that four planes were going to be boarded that day, three of which reached targets in New York and Virginia.

With Moussaoui's survival at stake, the government's case nearly fell apart last week when it was discovered that TSA senior attorney Carla J. Martin had improperly influenced seven TSA and FAA witnesses for the government. U.S. District Judge Leonie M. Brinkema sharply limited the government's aviation testimony and evidence to just one or two witnesses, making Cammaroto's testimony all the more crucial.

The judge has yet to call Martin into the courtroom to explain her conduct.

Cammaroto described half a dozen security steps the FAA could have taken to try to head off the attacks. He said more officers could have been posted immediately at airport checkpoints, and small knives and other potential weapons could have been confiscated at the gates.

He said planes could have been searched before boarding to make sure previous passengers had not hidden bombs or weapons in overhead baggage bins or in lavatories.

Cammaroto said flight crews could have been warned to keep cockpit doors secure, and new no-fly lists could have been posted to stop the 19 hijackers from boarding planes.

"We could have done much of this in the course of a couple of hours," he said.

He drew a parallel with the "Bojinka" plot, uncovered in 1995 in Manila, in which radical Islamists planned to hide liquid bombs on 12 U.S. planes and detonate them over the Pacific.

Just as they could have done to thwart the Sept. 11 conspiracy, Cammaroto said, officials alerted the airlines about the Bojinka conspiracy, stopped passengers from carrying open drink containers aboard, and sent bomb-sniffing dogs to the Philippines. More thorough pat-downs and other passenger searches also were initiated.

"As our intelligence improved, we were able to refine and refine and refine until we got closer to the mark," he said.

In the end, there were no attacks.

FAA Reportedly Dismissed Moussaoui Concern (AP-Y2)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP2, March 23, 2006

A manager at an Arizona flight school that trained one of the Sept. 11 pilot-hijackers testified at the Zacarias Moussaoui trial Wednesday that she called the Federal Aviation Administration with concerns over his qualifications for a pilot license, but her concerns were dismissed by an FAA official.

Margaret Chevrette, manager at the flight school, was testifying in the death-penalty trial of Moussaoui, who has confessed to being an al-Qaida terrorist.

It was the second time this week jurors heard witnesses testify that people in positions of authority in the federal government responded either slowly, negatively — or not at all — to warnings about a possible terrorist attack.

Chevrette said that the school's student, Hani Hanjour, lacked adequate English skills to gain his pilot's license. An FAA official responded to her concerns by suggesting that Hanjour could use an interpreter even though mastery of English is a requirement for a pilot.

Chevrette said that when the Sept. 11 attacks occurred, she knew Hanjour must have been involved.

"I remember crying all the way to work knowing our company helped to do this," she said.

Chevrette said that Hanjour's English was so bad that it took him eight hours to complete an oral exam that should've taken two hours.

Prosecutors in Moussaoui's trial were presenting testimony about the Sept. 11, 2001 pilot-hijackers' training in an apparent effort to show parallels between Moussaoui's flight training and that of other hijackers.

Two other pilot-hijackers from the Sept. 11 attacks abandoned a small airplane on a taxiway of Miami International Airport during their flight training, but their actions didn't attract serious scrutiny from federal officials, another witness said.

Daniel Pursell, a flight instructor at the school where hijackers Mohamed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi received commercial pilot training testified that instructors at the school breathed "a collective sigh of relief" when Atta and al-Shehhi completed their training and left the school.

Pursell said that the Dec. 26, 2000, incident at the Miami airport was one of several problems the school had with the pair.

Pursell said the tower chief at the airport called the Florida school to berate school officials after the plane was left on the runway. The FAA never questioned Atta and al-Shehhi, Pursell said.

During testimony Tuesday, a terrorism supervisor in FBI headquarters dismissed as "hunches and suppositions" a field agent's concerns about Moussaoui in the weeks before Sept. 11.

The supervisor, Michael Rolince, testified that he had not even read an Aug. 18, 2001, memo written by Minneapolis agent Harry Samit, who arrested Moussaoui and was convinced from the outset that Moussaoui was a terrorist with plans to hijack aircraft.

Rolince, who headed the FBI's International Terrorism Operations section, said he was briefed on Moussaoui only twice by a subordinate in hallway conversations lasting less than a minute.

Rolince concluded that the bureau had a long way to go in building a case against Moussaoui, even though Samit had laid out in a nearly 30-page memo his reasons for believing that the bureau had built a sufficient case to launch an all-out investigation and obtain a search warrant for Moussaoui's possessions.

"What Agent Samit's hunches and suppositions were is one thing," Rolince said. "What we knew was clearly something else."

Samit's memo proved prescient. He correctly predicted two of the six specific charges to which Moussaoui pleaded guilty: plotting international terrorism and air piracy.

Moussaoui is the only person in this country charged in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. He pleaded guilty to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack aircraft and other crimes, but he denies any role in Sept. 11. He says he was preparing for a possible future attack on the White House.

The sentencing trial now under way will determine Moussaoui's punishment: death or life in prison.

The FBI's actions in the time between Moussaoui's Aug. 16, 2001, arrest on immigration violations and Sept. 11, 2001, are key issues at Moussaoui's death-penalty trial. Prosecutors allege that if Moussaoui had revealed his plans for a terrorist attack, the FBI could have thwarted or at least minimized the attacks. To obtain a death penalty, prosecutors must prove that Moussaoui's actions caused the death of at least one person on Sept. 11.

The defense argues that nothing Moussaoui said after his arrest would have made any difference to the FBI because its bureaucratic intransigence rendered it incapable of reacting swiftly to Moussaoui's arrest under any circumstances.

U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema limited the scope of Rolince's testimony after the defense objected that he was trying to describe what the FBI would have done if it had known about Moussaoui's terrorist ties.

The defense argued that speculative testimony based on a hypothetical confession by Moussaoui unfairly implied that Moussaoui had some obligation to confess.

Brinkema allowed some limited hypothetical questioning but advised the jury: "Juries cannot decide cases on speculation. ... Nobody knows what would have happened."

Moussaoui Could Have Sparked Anti-terror Blitz : US Officials (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

An aviation policy chief and an FBI terrorist hunter said the US government could have launched a pre-September 11 security blitz had Zacarias Moussaoui admitted Al-Qaeda planned to use airliners as missiles.

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley testified in Moussaoui's death penalty trial that information from Moussaoui, arrested weeks before the world's deadliest terror strike in 2001, could have pinpointed Al-Qaeda financiers and alerted investigators terror cells were poised to strike.

Robert Cammarato, in charge of issuing government security directives to the airlines in 2001, said such data could prompted new security measures, sent air marshals from international to domestic flights and helped uncover the small knives used by September 11 hijackers.

Prosecutors called both witnesses in a bid to prove that Moussaoui's should be executed because his "lies" gave the September 11 suicide crews time to pull off their spectacular attacks, which killed nearly 3,000 people.

They showed Zebley a Statement of Facts, in which the Frenchman pleaded guilty last year to plotting with Al-Qaeda to fly planes into US buildings -- more than three years after he was accused of such a crime.

Just the fact that he was admitted Al-Qaeda member would have been enough to set of a nationwide search for accomplices, Zebley testified.

An admission that he was a trainee pilot would have sent agents to flight schools to track other would-be attackers and information on Al-Qaeda financiers could have helped them follow the money to those behind the plot.

"It was very specific information we could have run with," Zebley told the jury.

Cammarato, currently chief of commercial airports policy at the Transportation Safety Administration (TSA), said that in 2001, security experts believed hijackers were most likely to strike US airlines overseas, and there was no indication that "martyrdom operations" were in the offing.

"At that time we believed that a bombing situation would not involve a suicide aspect. There were no (scenarios) at the time, where the bomber rode the bomb," he said.

But information from Moussaoui could have alerted airport security staff to look for suicide pilots, and also to keep an eye out for small knives, later found in his belongings, which were also used on September 11.

Defence lawyers sought to blunt Cammarato's testimony by getting him to detail many changes in aviation security pre-and post-September 11, and cast doubt on prosecution claims a security overhaul could have quickly done.

Earlier, the manager of a US flight school told of the terrible moment she realised she helped to train Hani Hanjour, the September 11 hijacker who slammed a plane into the Pentagon.

"I knew in my heart that Hani was part of it," an emotional Peggy Chevrette said.

"On 9/11 my husband told me that a plane had gone into one of the Twin Towers, then before I left for work the second plane went in."

"On my way to work, the third plane had gone into the Pentagon. I just remembered crying all the way into work knowing that our company helped to do this."

Chevrette, manager of a Phoenix, Arizona flight school, said she phoned the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) three times to express concerns that Hanjour's English and piloting skills that were so bad she thought he would injure himself or others. But no action was taken, she said.

On one occasion, the jury heard, Mohammed Atta, ringleader of the September 11 hijackers, stranded a small single engine plane on a taxiway at the Miami International Airport -- forcing a large jet to take avoiding action.

Prosecutors appeared to be hoping to tie Moussaoui's own quest to learn to fly in 2001 in Oklahoma and Minnesota to the hijackers' training.

But the testimony may also help prosecutors, because it shows that the hijackers sometimes bizarre antics in the air, as they learned to fly in the United States, did not lead to government action.

Moussaoui has said he was not part of the September 11 plot but was to take part in a follow up wave of attacks on the White House.

If he escapes the death penalty, he will get life in prison, without parole.

Bush administration lawyers argued yesterday that a new law forces the dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in federal courts on behalf of detainees held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, urging a federal appellate court to instead adopt a far more limited process that still would give the prisoners access to judicial review.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit will decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 retroactively stripped the court of jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus cases challenging detentions at the military prison in Cuba. Lawyers representing the detainees argued that the new law does not apply to pending cases, while the government has maintained that all cases essentially should be wiped away.

The Detainee Treatment Act was designed to pull what some senators believe are frivolous cases out of U.S. courts and instead grant detainees two other options: access to the federal appeals court to challenge the military determination that they are "enemy combatants" and the right to appeal verdicts reached in future military trials.

The three-judge appellate panel questioned government lawyers about the authority the court actually would have in its limited review role. Judge Judith W. Rogers asked whether the court would have the power to order a detainee's release if it found problems with a detainee's enemy combatant status as determined by a military Combatant Status Review Tribunal.

"Yes, subject to a few qualifications," said Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer. Katsas said the Defense Department would have the option of fixing any flawed process first. "If a CSRT determination is made, and that is that he is not an enemy combatant, that person is turned loose."

Judge A. Raymond Randolph likened the new court review process to a modification of habeas corpus rather than its abolition but said he sees no remedy for detainees in the new law. He said the new law appeared to shift habeas cases from the District Court to the Court of Appeals.

Thomas B. Wilner, who was arguing on behalf of the detainees, said he would not object if the cases were transferred from one court to another.

But he said he worries that the law is unclear and might restrict the court from truly examining the facts of a detainee's combatant status.

Currently, the military is holding 10 detainees at Guantanamo Bay who have been cleared for release, and federal courts have been powerless to order them freed. There are about 490 detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

In a related matter, the Uyghur American Association is planning to file a brief with the the Supreme Court today supporting the release of two countrymen who remain at Guantanamo Bay despite having been cleared of ties to terrorism by the U.S. military. A U.S. District Court judge recently found that there is nothing to support holding the two Chinese Muslims but said he has no authority to order their release.

Attorneys for the Uighurs have taken the unusual step of asking the Supreme Court to rule before the appellate court enters a judgment, arguing that their clients uniquely face indefinite detention even though they are innocent.

In a draft of the brief provided to The Washington Post, the UAA urges the court to allow the Uighur detainees to join the Uighur community in the Washington area, where they would live in a form of parole.

Uighurs have been battling Beijing for a separate homeland in China and face torture or execution if repatriated there, according to the U.S. government. But U.S. officials have been unwilling to release the Uighurs in the United States and have not been able to find another country to accept them.

Also yesterday, Pentagon officials said that they are considering issuing a written instruction to military commissions at Guantanamo Bay that would formally ban the use of evidence obtained from detainees by torture in upcoming trials.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, said prosecutors have agreed not to use such evidence, but officials are developing language to put it in writing.

Court To Decide Future Of Detainees' Suits (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Faced with hundreds of claims by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, a federal appeals court pressed the Bush administration on Wednesday to say how much power judges will have to determine the legality of the detentions.

The three-judge panel is being asked to decide whether the Detainee Treatment Act, signed by President Bush on Dec. 30, retroactively voids hundreds of lawsuits by abolishing a right to challenge detentions that has been part of U.S. legal principles since the nation's founding.

Judges David B. Sentelle and A. Raymond Randolph seemed willing to accept the administration's view that the act forces dismissal of more than 200 lawsuits filed in U.S. District Court here on behalf of over 300 detainees.

But no one on the panel appeared to agree with the administration's take on what would happen next if detainees sought to essentially transfer their challenges to the appeals court.

Under the act, detainees can file petitions challenging determinations by military tribunals that they are "enemy combatants" who can be held without charges indefinitely. Those appeals must be filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit.

For the three judges, the big issue was how much power they and their fellow appeals court judges will have to examine the detainees' claims.

Gregory G. Katsas, a Justice Department lawyer, argued that judges would be limited to reviewing the sufficiency of the administrative hearings held by the military because the detainees - who are aliens held outside the United States - have no rights under the Constitution.

Sentelle was incredulous. He reminded Katsas of a 2004 Supreme Court decision that cleared the way for detainees to file court challenges to their detentions.

"You are saying that every single one of their claims are going to fail," Sentelle said. "You are saying that all the Supreme Court did ... was give (detainees) a right to file a piece of paper that cannot possibly grant release."

Judge Judith W. Rogers pushed Katsas to tell her whether the appeals court could order a detainee's release if it found that the military's hearing was flawed.

When Katsas launched into a lengthy answer, Sentelle became impatient and told the lawyer to answer yes or no.

Sentelle said the panel wanted to know whether the act says "turn him loose," if the appellate court finds problems in the military's proceedings.

Katsas said, "The short answer is yes." But he qualified it, saying the Defense Department would have the power to hold an administrative hearing to correct any deficiencies found by the appeals court.

The administration has claimed it indefinitely can hold detainees, even those who are acquitted of war crimes.

Only 10 detainees have been charged with terrorism and war crimes. Nearly 500 detainees are held at the Guantanamo Bay prison, which opened in January 2002 to hold suspected al-Qaida and Taliban operatives.

Thomas B. Wilner, a lawyer for the detainees, said he would support the detainee act if it allowed the appeals court to conduct in-depth reviews of the circumstances of a detainee's capture and detention.

Stephen H. Oleskey, who also represents detainees, told the panel that the administration does not want judges to delve too deeply into whether evidence used to hold prisoners was obtained by torture.

Meantime, a Pentagon official said Wednesday the Defense Department is considering a written rule barring use of evidence obtained by torture at criminal trials by military commission.

Until now, Pentagon officials had considered a written rule unnecessary because military prosecutors had promised such evidence would not be used at trial.

The Detainee Treatment Act was a compromise reached among Sens. Carl Levin, D-Mich., Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., to address criticism over the military's interrogations tactics and the lengthy detentions at Guantanamo.

Wilner said in court papers that Congress overstepped its authority and can bar legal challenges to detention only in cases of "rebellion" or "invasion."

"There is no rebellion or invasion," he wrote.

Ex-Juror Sees Flaws In Terror Plot Case (LAT)

By Rone Tempest

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

SACRAMENTO — A juror released today from duty in a federal terrorism trial said prosecutors have so far failed to prove the case against a 23-year-old Lodi man accused of attending a Pakistan training camp.

DOJ_NMG_0020306

"I don't think at this point in time the government has made its case," said juror Andrea Clabaugh, 37, a Sacramento engineering company account manager.

The fact that the ex-juror remains unconvinced of guilt this late in the game is bad news for prosecutors, who expect to wrap up their case against Hamid Hayat and his father, Lodi ice cream vendor Umer Hayat, 48, early next week. The defense, which plans to present its own slate of expert witnesses, has yet to begin.

The younger Hayat is accused of attending a training camp in Pakistan's Northwest Frontier province in late 2003. Both men are accused of lying to federal agents about the camp.

Clabaugh said she was troubled by the way FBI agents appeared to "badger" defendant Hamid Hayat during a videotaped late-night interrogation last year at the end of which Hayat admitted attending a training camp in 2003.

"I felt that in some respects he was giving the information because they refused to believe that he didn't know anything," Clabaugh said. She said the agents appeared to be "feeding names" to Hayat.

"I didn't see him volunteering anything," Clabaugh said.

Clabaugh was dismissed shortly before noon today in a delayed ruling by U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. During the jury selection process, the juror failed to disclose that she once dated a Sacramento law enforcement officer. Calling it an oversight, she later volunteered the information and the judge decided to remove her from the panel.

Excused Juror Would Vote Innocent In Terror Case (SACBEE)

By Denny Walsh, Bee Staff Writer

The Sacramento Bee, March 23, 2006

A juror in the trial of Hamid Hayat on terror-related charges who was excused Wednesday said as she left the federal courthouse that, if she had to decide now, she would vote to acquit the Lodi man.

Andrea Clabaugh of Carmichael was excused after sitting as a member of the panel hearing the case against Hayat for nearly six weeks.

When the jury was chosen on Feb. 15, she forgot about dating a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy in 1995. Two weeks ago she recalled it and informed U.S. District Judge Garland E. Burrell Jr. and the attorneys. Defense lawyers wanted her replaced with an alternate at that time, but Burrell refused.

On Wednesday, after thinking about it for two weeks, the judge changed his mind.

"Beyond a reasonable doubt hasn't been proven at this point," Clabaugh, 39, said in a hallway interview with reporters.

The government is nearing the end of its case.

Prosecution of the 23-year-old Hayat is built primarily on a videotaped admission to FBI agents that he attended a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and initially lied about it when questioned by agents, and on secretly recorded conversations he had with Naseem Khan, an FBI informant.

"I felt like he was being badgered" by FBI agents, Clabaugh said of the confession. "I felt like he was giving them information because they refused to believe he didn't know anything. It seemed like he was fed names by the agents. It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything."

Regarding the conversations with Khan, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid who wanted to impress an older man, but it doesn't mean those were things he would actually follow through on."

She was referring to Hayat's statements to Khan that he wanted to attend a terrorist training camp in Pakistan and then fight jihad, or holy war, against the enemies of Islam. At the time of the 2003 conversations, Hayat was 20 and Khan was 29.

"As of this moment, the government has not proven its case to me," said Clabaugh, an account manager for a Sacramento structural engineering firm.

Excused Juror In Lodi Terror Case Skeptical About Alleged Confession (SFC)

By Demian Bulwa, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 23, 2006

(03-22) 12:20 PST SACRAMENTO -- A juror excused today from the terrorism trial of a 23-year-old Lodi man said outside court that the government had not proved its point and expressed skepticism about an alleged confession that a prosecutor described as the "meat of the case."

"Beyond a reasonable doubt -- that hasn't been proven in my opinion," said Andrea Clabaugh, a 39-year-old Carmichael resident who works as an accounting manager at a structural engineering firm in Sacramento.

She said the judge in the federal trial had excused her after she disclosed that she had briefly dated a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy in 1995. Clabaugh had not made the disclosure during jury selection.

She was on the jury that will decide the fate of Hamid Hayat, who is accused of supporting terrorism by attending a training camp in late 2003 in his family's homeland of Pakistan. He is also charged with initially lying to FBI agents about it.

Hayat's 48 year-old father is being tried in the same courtroom on charges of lying, but in front of a separate jury.

Clabaugh expressed reservations about a five-hour videotaped confession that Hayat gave FBI agents last June after returning from a two-year trip to Pakistan. Prosecutors have described it as a clear admission of guilt.

Defense attorneys say Hayat never went to a training camp but, when pressured by agents, lied in an attempt to be helpful.

"In my notes, I recall writing down something about the agents feeding him names," Clabaugh said. "It didn't seem like Hamid actually volunteered anything.

"During those interrogations, it looked like he was being badgered," she said. "It felt to me that in some respects he was giving them information because they didn't believe him when he said he didn't know anything. He had to tell them something."

Clabaugh said she had mixed feelings about the government's key witness, a 32-year-old informant named Naseem Khan who befriended Hayat in the summer of 2002 before secretly recording their conversations. At times, the conversations delved into anti-American sentiments.

Khan "was just doing the job he was hired to do," Clabaugh said.

However, she said, "I got a picture of a young kid (Hayat) who wanted to impress an older man. If he wanted to impress him, he'd have lots of opinions to share. It doesn't mean those are things that he would follow through on."

Clabaugh said Khan "did not either help or hurt the case."

As for Hayat, she said, he "doesn't look like someone I'd want to know."

"I've seen that this young man was interested in hurting possibly the U.S. or enemies of Islam," she said. "But I haven't seen anything to indicate he did anything they would have us believe he did."

Neither prosecutors nor defense attorneys would comment on Clabaugh's remarks.

Prosecutors have not completed presenting witnesses, and were in the midst of questioning an expert on Pakistani affairs when Clabaugh was dismissed. The defense has not yet presented its case.

Juror Leaves Terror Trial, Says Government Hasn't Proven Case (AP)

By Don Thompson

AP, March 23, 2006

SACRAMENTO - A juror who was dismissed Wednesday from the federal terrorism trial of a father and son from Lodi said prosecutors have so far failed to prove that the younger man attended an al-Qaida training camp.

Andrea Clabaugh, 39, was dismissed after revealing that she once dated a law enforcement official. Outside court, she told reporters that prosecutors had succeeded in portraying 23-year-old Hamid Hayat as anti-American but not as a trained terrorist.

"They've shown that Hamid was interested in acting against America and those ideas and thoughts, but they haven't proven that he actually attended a camp, that he took weapons training and that he (intended) to come back here and do anything," said Clabaugh, who lives in the Sacramento suburb of Carmichael. "At this point in time, I do not think the government has proven its case."

Her comments come as the government nears the end of its case against Hayat and his father, Umer Hayat, a 48-year-old ice cream truck driver.

Both men are accused of lying to the FBI about the son's suspected attendance at a terrorist training camp in Pakistan in 2003. Hamid Hayat also faces charges of providing material support to terrorists by attending the camp.

Prosecutors allege that he was awaiting orders to attack hospitals, banks and grocery stores after returning to the U.S. in May 2005. The Hayats were arrested in June and have pleaded not guilty. They are being tried at the same time but before separate juries.

Clabaugh, who sat on Hamid Hayat's jury, said she was removed because she dated a Sacramento County sheriff's deputy 11 years ago. She said she didn't recall that detail or consider it relevant during jury selection.

She told U.S. District Court Judge Garland Burrell Jr. about the relationship two weeks ago. He kept her on Hamid Hayat's jury but reconsidered and removed her Wednesday. She was immediately replaced with an alternate juror who has heard all the evidence.

Prosecutors and defense attorneys declined comment on the statements by Clabaugh, who said she does not know if other jurors share her views.

The government's case is built on confessions the Hayats gave separately during videotaped FBI interrogations and conversations Hamid Hayat had with an FBI informant who was secretly recording their discussions.

The Hayats' attorneys have argued that the confessions were made only after their clients were exhausted by hours of interrogation and were merely telling the agents what they thought they wanted to hear.

"I don't find the FBI interrogation damning. I felt like the FBI was leading," Clabaugh said. "Hamid was worn out and tired, and I could easily see where someone in that situation would tell them what they wanted to hear so they would be done."

She said the government's informant, a 32-year-old convenience store worker from Oregon named Naseem Khan, also asked Hamid Hayat leading questions. Those questions focused on jihad, the Arabic term for holy war, as well as anti-American Pakistani political parties.

Clabaugh said she believed the questioning was meant to entrap the younger Hayat.

"Naseem Khan seemed to be the one who brought up the relevant topics the majority of the time," Clabaugh said. "Hamid Hayat could have been trying to impress this older man who was interested in this topic. I didn't see any proof."

The FBI began focusing on the Pakistani community in Lodi, an agricultural center about 35 miles south of Sacramento, shortly after the September 2001 terrorist attacks.

Khan arrived in December 2001, shortly after being recruited by the government. He began attending the local mosque, told area Muslims he worked for a computer company and struck up a friendship with Hamid Hayat.

Two local Muslim clerics were later deported to Pakistan on immigration violations but were never charged criminally in the federal government's probe.

Among the evidence presented by prosecutors is a scrapbook kept by Hamid Hayat. The book was full of Pakistani newspaper and magazine articles praising Afghanistan's Taliban government and Osama bin Laden. Many of the articles also expressed anti-American sentiments.

But Clabaugh said keeping such a scrapbook didn't seem unusual for someone who spent half his life in Pakistan and whose grandfather is a well-known political and religious figure there. Hamid Hayat is a U.S. citizen and his father is a naturalized citizen.

"It doesn't mean he's guilty, in my opinion. It means he's interested," Clabaugh said.

She said she was disappointed to leave the jury after spending four weeks hearing testimony.

"I would have liked to have seen it through," she said.

Also Wednesday, prosecutors presented an expert on Pakistani extremist groups in an attempt to give jurors background about the country's politics and Muslim culture.

They intend to complete their case early next week by introducing satellite photographs of a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. Defense attorneys say the government has no hard evidence that the younger Hayat actually attended the camp.

Hamid Hayat is being tried on three counts of lying to the FBI and separate charges of providing material support to terrorists. He faces up to 39 years in prison if convicted on all counts.

His father faces up to 16 years in prison if convicted of two counts of making false statements to the FBI.

California Town Is Latest Site Of U.S. Terrorism Prosecution (WP)

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Allegation of 'Material Support' Was Used in Other Cases

LODI, Calif. -- Naseem Khan blended right into the Pakistani community when he moved to this quiet farming area south of Sacramento. An immigrant who spoke Pashto and Urdu, he had lived there briefly once before, made friends easily and attended the local mosque.

Today, Khan's anonymity is long gone. The convenience store clerk-turned-FBI informant is the star prosecution witness in the trial of Umer and Hamid Hayat, a father and son accused, respectively, of supporting terrorism and lying about it to the government.

Hamid Hayat, 23, faces charges of providing material support to terrorists for allegedly attending an al-Qaeda training camp in Pakistan, as well as for lying to investigators during an interrogation. In a joint trial, Umer Hayat, 48, an ice cream vendor, is accused of making false statements to the FBI to protect his son. Hamid Hayat faces as much as 39 years in prison; his father, 16.

The case is built on Khan's infiltration of Lodi's small Pakistani community from 2002 to 2005. Earlier this month, prosecutors put Khan, 32, on the stand, where he told jurors that Hamid Hayat had talked about attending a training camp. Jurors also saw videotapes of both defendants first denying and then admitting to investigators that Hamid Hayat had attended the camp.

But last week, Khan shocked observers of the trial by asserting that al-Qaeda's second-in-command had passed through Lodi in 1998 or 1999, raising doubts about his credibility that the defense has begun to exploit.

The Lodi case is the latest in a string of prosecutions brought since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks under a law that criminalizes providing "material support" to terrorists.

The government's success with the previously obscure statute has been mixed. It has won convictions in high-profile cases in Northern Virginia, in Lackawanna, N.Y., and in the New York City trial of radical lawyer Lynne Stewart. It has lost prosecutions in Detroit, Idaho and Tampa.

The Lodi case provides a rare, detailed look at how one FBI informant functioned and raises questions about the effectiveness of the government's strategy of infiltrating the community with an outsider.

Defense lawyers say their clients' arrests were made in desperation because there wasn't any real terrorist activity to find in Lodi. They contend that Hamid Hayat was given to grandiose exaggerations. At trial, they played hours of the videotaped FBI interrogation, which appears to show the two men, whose English was limited, agreeing with FBI agents instead of offering information.

"They were after big fish," Umer Hayat's attorney, Johnny L. Griffin III, said of investigators. "They couldn't get the big fish, and they had to get someone."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Ferris declined to comment.

The FBI paid Khan more than $200,000 to move to Lodi, a city of 56,000, according to court testimony. He took an apartment near the Lodi Muslim Mosque and befriended Hamid Hayat, a lean young man with a black goatee, imperfect English skills and few friends. Hayat had a sixth-grade education and followed Pakistani politics, including the movements of radicals, court testimony has shown.

Khan visited the Hayat home at least a dozen times and had lengthy phone conversations with Hamid Hayat, which he secretly recorded. Transcripts of those calls reveal that Khan talked with Hayat about girls, cricket and, over time, politics and terrorism. Khan feigned a radical streak and an interest in jihad.

In 2003, Hamid Hayat went to Pakistan but kept in touch with Khan. In transcripts of their phone calls, he told Khan that he planned to attend a militant training camp but sheepishly admitted he had not yet done so. Khan encouraged him, saying, "Be a man" and "You're wasting time."

"I was just making conversation with him," Khan told Hamid Hayat's lawyer at the trial this month. Under further questioning, Khan acknowledged that Hayat never told him he had attended the camp -- only that he would go in the future.

Under FBI interrogation, Hayat first denied, then acknowledged, that he had spent months at a training camp near Rawalpindi, Pakistan, that he said was run by al-Qaeda.

In June 2005, Hayat returned to the United States and was brought in for questioning. His father accompanied him, and both were arrested. They have been in jail ever since.

While Hamid Hayat was in Pakistan, Khan befriended two imams of the Lodi mosque, according to court testimony. They soon became suspicious and warned others to avoid him.

Several days after the Hayats were arrested, the two imams and one of their sons were detained on immigration violations. They were deported but not criminally charged.

One of the imams had been in conflict with another over the construction of a Muslim religious school. Some in Lodi suspect that political opponents reported the imams to the FBI.

Across the street from the Lodi mosque on a recent afternoon, children played basketball while men in traditional Pakistani dress watched over them or milled around the entrance to the mosque, a low-slung yellow building in a ramshackle neighborhood of single-family houses.

Taj Khan, a local activist and a 25-year resident of Lodi, said the investigation and prosecutions have wreaked havoc on the community. "People are scared. People are having nightmares, I'm being told," said Khan, who is not related to the FBI informant.

Taj Khan was part of a cross-cultural effort that sought to build bridges between Christians, Jews and Muslims in a town in which the Pakistani community dates to the 1930s. "This event has put a big lid on all that," he said. "This thing has set us back quite a few years."

Naseem Khan's credibility suffered a blow last week when he maintained he had seen al-Qaeda's second-ranking leader, Ayman al-Zawahiri, at the mosque in 1998 or 1999 -- a statement that Brian Jenkins, an authority on terrorism at Rand Corp., calls "far-fetched."

FBI documents released last week show that Khan first made the assertion when agents approached him in 2001. At that time, Khan also told the FBI that he had seen Abdelkarim Hussein Mohamed al-Nasser, a suspect in a 1996 Saudi Arabia bombing, in Lodi, and Ahmed Mohammed Hamed Ali, a suspect in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, in Stockton, Calif., in 1999.

Terrorism experts believe that none of those suspects was in the United States at that time, though al-Zawahiri is known to have passed through the country on a fundraising trip in 1993.

DOJ_NMG_0020310

The misstep for the prosecution shows one of the possible pitfalls of using confidential informants in terrorism cases, said Robert M. Chesney, a law professor at Wake Forest University in North Carolina.

"The FBI has been correctly critiqued for not having agents from these communities," he said. "Since they don't have them, they're going to informants . . . and with informants you often have credibility problems."

Chesney cautioned that "having an unexpected but clearly wrong thing being said doesn't help, but it's not dispositive, either." The videotaped confessions are still strong evidence, he said.

"I'm not a betting man, but if I was, I certainly wouldn't bet on the jury discounting confessions unless they've got some fairly specific facts that show their wills were overcome," he said.

Cuban Exile Militant Luis Posada Denied Release (MH)

By Oscar Corral

The Miami Herald, March 23, 2006

The U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, who has been detained in a federal immigration facility since May, according to U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The government's decision was made public today, about a week shy of a 180-day deadline for deciding his custody status.

Posada, who is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98, was detained in Miami by federal authorities last May after sneaking into the United States.

"Following a routine custody review, as required by regulation, ICE has issued Mr. Posada an Interim Decision to Continue Detention," ICE said in a written statement. ``This letter advises Mr. Posada that his custody status has been reviewed, and it has been determined that he will not be released from the custody of ICE at this time. This interim decision is based on a review of Mr. Posada's case and consideration of the information Mr. Posada and his attorney submitted to ICE's reviewing officials."

Posada's lawyer, Eduardo Soto, told the Herald late last week that he planned to appeal -- through a writ of habeas corpus -- if the government decided not to free his client.

ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba.

"As appropriate, ICE will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries," the statement noted. ``ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States. While an immigration judge granted Mr. Posada deferral of removal to Cuba and Venezuela based on the Convention Against Torture (CAT), that does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

Cuban Militant To Stay In U.S. Custody (AP)

By CURT ANDERSON, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

A Cuban militant accused of masterminding the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner will remain in U.S. immigration custody for the foreseeable future, but efforts to deport him to a country willing to accept him will continue, officials say.

Luis Posada Carriles was arrested in Miami in May after illegally entering the United States through Mexico. He is being held by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in El Paso, Texas.

ICE issued a statement saying that Posada will not be released from its custody "at this time" and that further review was needed to determine where he could be sent.

A federal immigration judge ruled last fall that Posada could not be deported to Cuba or Venezuela, citing the possibility he could be tortured.

That prohibition, according to the ICE statement, "does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

Posada's attorney in Miami, Eduardo Soto, said the agency's decision appears to be an attempt to keep Posada in custody indefinitely without just cause and that he plans to ask a federal court to free him.

"Obviously, this is going to come to a head very quickly here," Soto said. "They've got to show some likelihood that he is going to a third country or they have to release him."

His lawyers have said they want assurances that any third country would not then send him to Cuba or Venezuela.

Posada, a former CIA operative and a fervent foe of Cuban President Fidel Castro, is accused by Cuba and Venezuela of plotting the 1976 bombing while living in Venezuela. He has denied involvement in the bombing, which killed 73 people.

DOJ_NMG_0020311

Posada escaped from a Venezuelan prison in 1985 while awaiting retrial on the airline bombing charges, and Venezuela has formally sought his extradition. He also has been linked to a series of 1997 bombings in Cuba, one of which killed an Italian tourist.

In 2004, Posada and three others were pardoned by Panama's president for their alleged roles in a plot to assassinate Castro during a conference in Panama in 2000. Some Cuban-Americans consider him a freedom fighter.

Meanwhile, a federal judge has ordered the U.S. Marshals Service to deliver Posada to Fort Lauderdale for the May trial of one of his close associates. Santiago Alvarez faces federal weapons charges involving a cache of machine guns, a grenade launcher, explosives and silencers.

US To Keep Cuban Airline Bombing Suspect In Custody (AFP-Y2)

AFP, March 23, 2006

The US authorities said that Luis Posada Carriles, who is wanted in Venezuela for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner, would remain in US custody even though he has been ordered expelled.

The United States refuses to send Posada Carriles, a radical opponent of Cuban leader Fidel Castro and a former CIA agent, to Cuba or Venezuela citing fears that he would be tortured.

But it has also failed to find another third country that would accept Posada Carriles, 78, who is currently detained at an Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) centre in El Paso, Texas.

"Following a routine custody review, as required by regulation, ICE has issued Mr. Posada an interim decision to continue detention," said an ICE statement.

"This letter advises Mr. Posada that his custody status has been reviewed and it has been determined that he will not be released from the custody of ICE at this time."

The agency said it "will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries.

"ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States."

A judge ruled in September that Posada Carriles could not be sent to Cuba or Venezuela, in a decision based on the International Convention on Torture which prohibits extraditions to countries where there is a pattern of torture or flagrant human rights abuses.

Cuban and Venezuelan authorities have accused the US government of harbouring a known terrorist.

Posada Carriles was detained in Venezuela in 1976 following the bombing of a Cubana airlines plane that left 73 people dead.

Recently declassified US documents show that Posada Carriles worked for the CIA at least from 1965 until June 1976.

In 1985 he fled a Venezuelan prison and turned up in El Salvador where he helped the US government ferry supplies to "Contra" rebels in Nicaragua.

He is accused of taking part in numerous plots to kill Castro, including one to assassinate the Cuban leader during an Ibero-American summit in Panama in 2000.

He was jailed for eight years in Panama but was pardoned last year and appeared to be laying low until reports began circulating that he had entered the United States.

In mid-April, he officially requested political asylum in the United States, putting the US government in an embarrassing situation because of his past activities.

Posada Won't Go Free; May Be Witness (MH)

By Oscar Corral And Jay Weaver

The Miami Herald, March 23, 2006

Enforcement statement

The U.S. government will not free Cuban exile militant Luis Posada Carriles, detained in a federal immigration facility in Texas since May, but he may be heading to South Florida anyway, according to court records.

A U.S. district judge has authorized lawyers for Santiago Alvarez and Osvaldo Mitat, two friends of Posada who were arrested last year on federal weapons charges, to have Posada brought to South Florida by federal marshals in the next few weeks as a potential witness in the case. Trial is set for May 8.

Posada "should be transported here sometime before the trial commences," said Arturo Hernandez, one of Alvarez's lawyers. ``As long as he is needed he will be here."

DOJ_NMG_0020312

U.S. District Judge James Cohn signed the authorization for Posada's temporary transfer Friday. Posada is expected to help the defense lawyers' strategy to discredit a key government witness in the high-profile weapons case -- a witness they suspect of being an agent for communist Cuba who informed on the two defendants for the FBI.

The decision by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement not to free Posada from custody was made public Wednesday -- about a week shy of a 180-day deadline for deciding his custody status, said Posada lawyer Eduardo Soto.

Posada, who is wanted by both the Cuban and Venezuelan governments for the 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner and a string of hotel bombings in Havana in 1997-98, was detained in Miami by federal authorities last May after sneaking into the United States. Venezuela wants Posada extradited to face charges for the jetliner tragedy. U.S. officials have yet to respond to that request.

Last year, an immigration judge ruled that the U.S. government cannot hand over Posada to either Cuba or Venezuela because he could be tortured. That leaves ICE with the option of finding a third country that's willing to take in Posada, who once worked for the CIA.

TRYING AGAIN

Soto said he plans to file a demand for Posada's release in federal court in Miami ``within the next 72 hours."

Soto maintains that the government can only keep Posada detained if officials can show that he is a danger to society or is likely to flee -- both situations the lawyer says are not not plausible.

"The only person that has to fear Luis Posada Carriles is Fidel Castro," Soto said.

ICE spokeswoman Barbara Gonzalez declined to comment when asked why Posada's release had been denied.

ICE left open the possibility that Posada could be freed at a later date and reiterated its intention to try to deport him to a country that is not Venezuela or Cuba. But Soto said that, to his knowledge, no third country has been identified as a potential destination for Posada.

"As appropriate, ICE will continue to review Mr. Posada's custody in light of any additional information that he may submit, collateral developments, and efforts to remove him to other countries," ICE noted in its statement. ``ICE continues to move forward to carry out Mr. Posada's removal from the United States. While an immigration judge granted Mr. Posada deferral of removal to Cuba and Venezuela based on the Convention Against Torture (CAT), that does not impede ICE from removing Mr. Posada to a third country."

CUBAN AGENT WITNESS?

Meanwhile, new court filings in the case of Alvarez and Mitat show that the government informant who tipped the FBI to the weapons cache, Gilberto Abascal, is expected to be the central witness for federal prosecutors. Defense attorneys say Abascal was an agent for Cuban leader Fidel Castro, who called for Alvarez's arrest in a speech just two days before he was brought into custody last November.

In seeking potential evidence from the government, the defense lawyers claim ``the FBI has documents that show that Cuba possessed information about Alvarez well before his arrest.

"They show that Cuba had inside information through an unregistered agent [Abascal] about a declared enemy [Alvarez]," wrote Hernandez, one of Alvarez's attorneys. ``The defense is entitled to this evidence that proves that Abascal is Cuba's inside man and that his testimony cannot be trusted."

Indeed, a major part of the defense's strategy will be to discredit Abascal.

"He's not a person to be believed, and he will be completely discredited at trial," Mitat's attorney, Dennis Kainen, said of Abascal.

Soto said that Alvarez's lawyers consulted with him before asking Posada to testify. Soto said Posada may be able to benefit from coming to South Florida because it could make it easier for Soto to argue for a change of venue for Posada if he is already here.

Alvarez and Mitat's legal strategy seems to be partly focused on political arguments to help free the men, who are charged with having machine guns, grenade launchers and other illegal guns. Alvarez and Mitat's attorneys argue that the FBI may have used Cuban intelligence to nab the two men.

"Sadly, the FBI and Castro's regime have a well-documented and regrettable history in this community," the defense's motion seeking evidence states, noting that "the FBI paid Cuban double agent, Juan Pablo Roque, over $6,720.42 for information regarding exile organizations" -- information that later led to the 1996 downing of the Brothers to the Rescue planes and the death of three Cuban-Americans and a Cuban exile.

Barring Evidence From Torture Is Considered (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 — The Defense Department is considering a formal rule prohibiting the introduction of evidence obtained through torture at military tribunals for terror suspects detained at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, a Pentagon spokesman said Wednesday.

At present, the introduction of evidence gained through torture is not expressly prohibited, although military prosecutors have said that such evidence would not be permitted.

While Pentagon and military officials insist that the rules for detention of terror suspects at Guantánamo already bar torture, lawyers for some detainees have said that some of the more extreme interrogation measures are tantamount to torture.

"We have not, to this point, believed that a specific commission rule was necessary, and in fact to some degree would erroneously suggest that torture had actually occurred," said Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman.

At a morning meeting with reporters, Mr. Whitman said the Defense Department had decided to consider a "formal instruction" banning evidence gathered through torture, to "eliminate any doubt from people's minds."

Mr. Whitman said the department was honoring Article 15 of the United Nations Convention Against Torture.

The Wall Street Journal reported on Wednesday that the new rule would be released this week, although Mr. Whitman said no final decision had been made.

The Supreme Court has deferred action on the Bush administration's motion to dismiss a case challenging the constitutionality of the tribunals, officially called military commissions, that the government has established to try terror suspects now being held at the United States naval base at Guantánamo.

The justices agreed in November, over administration objections, to hear the case, and scheduled arguments for next week.

Defense Department May Formally Bar Use Of Evidence Derived From Torture Against Terror Suspects (AP)

By Robert Burns, Ap Military Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The Defense Department is considering issuing a written rule barring the use of any evidence obtained through torture in the military trials of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, a spokesman said Wednesday.

Bryan Whitman, a senior Pentagon spokesman, said that up to now it had been the Pentagon's view that a written rule was unnecessary because the military prosecutors had already declared that such evidence would not be permitted. He reiterated that Pentagon policy bans the use of torture, although critics and some Guantanamo Bay prisoners have asserted that some interrogation methods amount to torture.

Ten detainees at Guantanamo Bay face terrorism charges before U.S. military tribunals - the first since the aftermath of World War II. The tribunals, officially called commissions, were set up for prisoners captured by U.S. forces and their allies, mostly in Afghanistan in the months following the U.S. invasion in October 2001.

"We have not, to this point, believed that a specific commission rule was necessary, and in fact to some degree would erroneously suggest that torture had actually occurred," Whitman said. "That said, we are taking a look at whether or not issuing a formal instruction ... that bars prosecutors from using this type of evidence is necessary" in order to "eliminate any doubt from people's minds" that the U.N. Convention Against Torture applies to the Guantanamo cases.

Lawyers for some Guantanamo Bay detainees have claimed that the military tribunals are illegal because they could consider evidence gained through torture or other forms of inhumane treatment of suspects.

The Wall Street Journal reported Wednesday that the new Pentagon rule had already been approved, though not yet publicly released. Whitman said that a Pentagon officially had incorrectly told the newspaper this, but that in fact final approval had not yet been given. The Journal said the new rule was expected to be made public this week.

Briton Tried To Buy A-Bomb, Prosecution In Trial Contends (NYT)

By Sarah Lyall

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

LONDON, March 22 — The prosecution in the trial of seven men accused of having links to Al Qaeda and plotting to carry out bomb attacks in Britain said on Wednesday that one of the men had inquired about buying an atomic bomb from Russian mafia figures in Belgium.

DOJ_NMG_0020314

On Wednesday, the second day of the trial, a prosecution lawyer, David Waters, said the defendant, Salahuddin Amin, 30, had been asked by a man he met at a mosque in Luton, his hometown, to contact a third man, Abu Annis, about a "radioisotope bomb."

When Mr. Amin did so, Mr. Annis told him that "they had made contact with the Russian mafia in Belgium and from the mafia they were trying to buy this bomb," Mr. Waters said. While Mr. Amin later told the police that he did not believe it was likely that "you can go and pick an atomic bomb up and use it," the prosecutor said the incident was "an indication as to Amin's position in, and his usefulness to, the organization."

The defendants, all British and 18 to 33 years old, are accused of conspiring to cause an explosion "likely to endanger life" and of other crimes related to possession of materials for making bombs. The men were arrested before they could carry out any plans, and before bombs ripped through the London subway system in July 2005.

But Mr. Waters said on Wednesday in the continuation of his opening statement that the defendants already had "most of the necessary components in hand" to build a bomb, including about 1,300 pounds of ammonium nitrate fertilizer and a smaller amount of aluminum powder, and that even having a nonspecific plan was evidence of guilt.

"It will hardly be in the public interest if the police had to wait for the explosion to take place and the deaths and damage to be caused before the perpetrators were guilty of a crime," he said.

The trial is expected to last several months. Six of the defendants — Omar Khyam, 24;, Waheed Mahmood, 33; Shujah-Ud-Din Mahmood, 18; Anthony Garcia, 27; Nabeel Hussain, 20; and Jawad Akbar, 22 — were arrested in police raids in March 2004, during which, the police said, the fertilizer was seized at a storage depot in West London. Mr. Amin was arrested in February 2005, when he arrived at Heathrow Airport on a flight from Islamabad, Pakistan. The men had been under surveillance, and their conversations had been monitored for months.

The prosecution contends that the men spoke admiringly of a bomb attack in Madrid in March 2004 and mused repeatedly about how and when to carry out similar attacks in Britain.

Mr. Waters said the men went to Pakistan for explosives training, disguising themselves as tourists. Back in Britain, he said, the defendants discussed potential targets, mentioning, for instance, the gas, water and electrical supplies, the Bluewater shopping center in Kent and a "big nightclub in central London."

The prosecutors say Mr. Akbar, is heard on one of the surveillance tapes saying that a nightclub would be a good target because "no one could put their hands up and say they are innocent — all those slags dancing around," using a slang term for loose women.

In the taped conversations cited by the prosecution, the defendants were sometimes unwittingly revelatory about themselves and their family lives. Mr. Akbar was taped speaking anxiously to his wife, fretting about two missing CD's marked with the word "Transco," the owner of the high-voltage electricity systems in England and Wales and the high-pressure gas system across Britain.

Mr. Mahmood, worked at the time for Morrison Utility Services, a contractor serving Transco in southeast England.

"You know what — if we get raided today, we're finished," Mr. Akbar is quoted by the prosecution as telling his wife. But then he refuses to tell her more. "The less you know, the better," he is quoted as saying. "Get your stuff and get into the kitchen."

An Effective Weapon Against Terrorists: Ridicule (USAT)

By Peter Schweizer

USA Today, March 23, 2006

Is America taking terrorists too seriously? In the wake of continued threats, that might seem like a ridiculous question. But in terms of the psychology of the war on terrorism, it's a question that needs to be asked.

In a brilliant new white paper on public diplomacy, Michael Waller, the Walter and Leonore Annenberg chair in International Communication at The Institute of World Politics, makes a strong case for America's employing a new powerful weapon against the terrorists: ridicule.

“Ridicule raises morale at home. Ridicule strips the enemy/adversary of his mystique and prestige. Ridicule erodes the enemy's claim to justice. Ridicule eliminates the enemy's image of invincibility. Directed properly at an enemy, ridicule can be a fate worse than death,” writes Waller.

History teaches that ridicule weakens the moral and political capital of our enemies. Ronald Reagan employed it with great effect during the Cold War. We all remember the “evil empire” speech, but what about the jokes? Two guys were standing in line at the vodka store. They were there for half an hour, then an hour, then an hour and a half. “I'm sick of this,” one finally said. “I'm going over to the Kremlin to shoot (Mikhail) Gorbachev.” The man left and returned about an hour later. “Well, did you shoot him?” “Heck no,” he responded. “The line up there is a lot longer than this one.”

Many of Reagan's comments reached the underground press in the Soviet Union, no doubt encouraging dissenters against communism. Reagan understood that sowing fear in the West was a potent weapon for Moscow. By laughing at communism, the spell of fear was broken. It was the same during World War II. A cartoon of Donald Duck mocking Hitler and Mein Kampf no doubt was demeaning to the Fhrer.

Thus far, the Bush administration's approach to fighting terrorists has been to demonize them. “Their vision of the world is dark and dim,” President Bush said in January at Kansas State University. “They have got desires to spread a totalitarian empire.” During his March 11 radio address, he said: “The enemy we face has proved to be brutal and relentless.”

Certainly, their actions and goals warrant such treatment. But that alone is a tough strategy to maintain psychologically because it can be exhausting. As Waller writes: “Incessant, morbid portrayals of an individual, movement or mortal enemy might rally support for the American side, but they have a shelf-life that gets tired over time. Constant specters of unrelenting dangers risk sowing defeatism and chipping away at our own morale. Abroad, they risk making the U.S. look like a bully in some places and surrender the propaganda advantage to the other side.”

By continuing to demonize our enemies, we elevate their political status in the eyes of those disaffected souls in the developing world who dislike the United States.

I'm not suggesting that Bush start cracking Osama bin Laden jokes. And we should not mock Islam. Reagan joked about communist leaders but never about the Russian people. What the Bush administration can do is mock the terrorists.

For example, we should note that these self-professed warriors hide while they pay impoverished young men and women to become human bombs. We should play up Osama's privileged background. We should highlight the terrorists' ridiculous failures. The reality is that much like Soviet officials, terrorists are full of grand illusions about themselves and their mission.

The war on terror has military, political and economic dimensions. But it also has a critical psychological component. The terrorists are not 10 feet tall. We should engage in a psychological war that brings these thugs down to size.

Judge Orders Closed-door Session In Passaro Case (RN&O)

Raleigh (NC) News & Observer, March 23, 2006

RALEIGH — A federal judge held a closed-door hearing today to decide what, if any, classified information David Passaro’s defense lawyers can use at trial.

U.S. District Court Judge Terrence W. Boyle ordered the hearing closed from its start at 9 a.m. No media or members of the public were allowed into the courtroom.

Passaro’s trial has been tentatively set to start next month.

Passaro, 39, a former Green Beret from Lillington, is charged with assault of Abdul Wali, a suspect in rocket attacks on a military outpost in Asadabad, Afghanistan. Passaro was part of a covert paramilitary team. Prosecutors say he beat Wali with a flashlight and punched and kicked him during an interrogation. Wali died during his third day in U.S. custody in June 2003.

Passaro was the first American charged in the aftermath of the prisoner-abuse scandals in Iraq and Afghanistan. He was also the first civilian charged under the USA Patriot Act, which extended the reach of stateside prosecutors to military bases overseas.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI, Police Spying Is Rising, Groups Allege (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK - Inside the Time's UP! office on Houston Street in Manhattan, pictures of people taking part in an environmental protest line an old refrigerator. In one, a man with short hair and a chiseled physique is talking on his cellphone. In another, a large man wields a video camera.

The people at Time's UP!, an environmental activist group, suspect these men are not protesters at all, but rather plainclothes police officers. "We say these people are spying, and they're definitely being assisted by the police if they're not police themselves," says Bill DiPaola, director of Time's UP!

Is that concern paranoia? Or is it skepticism in this post-9/11 era of increased surveillance?

Political activists from New York to Colorado to California report that they believe police and FBI surveillance of their activities has increased markedly since the terror attacks 4-1/2 years ago since Congress approved the USA Patriot Act loosening some of the strictures on law enforcement. They include environmental groups like Time's UP!, peace activists in Pittsburgh, and even a police union protesting for higher wages in New York City.

To try to find out if law officers are spying on them, the American Civil Liberties Union has filed Freedom of Information requests for more than 150 groups and individuals in more than 20 states who believe their first amendment rights are being violated.

Time's UP! is one of the groups that says the alleged surveillance is aimed at intimidating them. They acknowledge public events can be watched by anyone but they're concerned police have crossed the line into inappropriate spying to discourage people's from publicly criticizing government policies.

Local police and the FBI insist that none of their activities is aimed at chilling political speech. All investigations are conducted under strict guidelines put in place after abuses were documented during the Civil Rights and antiwar movements of the 1960s and 1970s. Before any investigation of a political group proceeds, law officers require reasonable suspicion or information that an individual or a group is involved in criminal or terrorist-related activities.

"Our only interest is in preventing, disrupting, and defeating terrorist-related operations or criminal activity - and that's through appropriate investigations that are conducted in accordance with attorney general guidelines," says Bill Carter, an FBI spokesman.

Throughout American history, and particularly during times of conflict, the balance between civil rights and national security has shifted toward the latter and later come under scrutiny. From World War II through the cold war to the sociopolitical upheaval of the 1960s, repeated civil rights violations occurred in the name of national security - from people being imprisoned and denied jobs for their political statements to the infiltration of political groups.

"We're nowhere near there now. Throughout the 20th century, we ... built better protections against intrusions on constitutional rights," says Alasdair Roberts, professor at the Maxwell School in Syracuse University in New York and author of "Blacked Out: Government Secrecy in the Information Age. "Nevertheless we can't take these gains for granted, and we have to take these issues of surveillance seriously."

The FBI says peace and environmental activists are confusing legitimate investigation of potential terrorist or criminal activity with free-speech violations. Peace activists say law enforcement is misusing the fear of terrorism to impede legitimate speech.

One recent case involves the Thomas Merton Center for Peace and Justice in Pittsburgh. It says FBI documents it obtained prove that they were being watched in an investigation of antiwar activities. A heavily redacted memo states that the center holds "daily leaflet distribution activities" and is "a left-wing organization advocating, among many political causes, pacifism."

"The memo may say it's an international terrorism matter at the top, but when you read the text and the subject it's clearly an investigation of antiwar activity," says Jim Kleissler, of the Merton Center. "They clearly tried to link terrorism to public dissent."

Mr. Carter says that the investigation was not of the organization, but of an individual. Once it was determined that individual was not involved with the Merton Center it ended, he says.

The number of Joint Terrorism Task Forces (JTTF), cooperative teams of local, state, and federal officers, jumped from fewer than 30 prior to the 2001 terrorist attack to more than 80 today. The Merton Center says it was investigated under a JTTF jurisdiction. Professor Roberts says these JTTFs have the greatest potential for constitutional violations because much of their activity is classified offering little opportunity for public accountability.

"It's difficult to appraise whether the activities are reasonable or not unless there's a certain amount of transparency," he says. "Sometimes you can't reveal law enforcement activity, but it's generally possible to get a general broad outline of what it is."

In New York, the activists at Time's Up! say the police are using surveillance to intimidate them. Their members are part of a monthly pro-environment bike ride around the city, where sometimes hundreds of people show up. The police want the group to get a parade permit. Time's UP! argues that it's a spontaneous gathering that takes place in 400 cities around the world. The courts have so far sided with the protesters. The police say they're simply trying to maintain order and that plainclothes police are vital to that goal.

Antiwar and anticorporate protesters have also filed suit against the NYPD, charging that plainclothes police behavior during the Republican National Convention in 2004 and at the World Economic Forum in 2002 was aggressive, intimidating, and designed to agitate the crowd. NYPD spokesman Paul Browne disagrees, saying the officers were there to maintain order.

"We don't want the chaos of an arrest spilling into the rest of the march," says Deputy Commissioner Browne, explaining that plainclothes officers mingle with the crowd. The goal is to allow them to identify and separate anarchists and others who may want the protest to turn violent from the lawful protesters.

The NYPD is also fending off a lawsuit from its own police officer's union. The Patrol Benevolent Association (PBA) says the NYPD sent Internal Affairs Bureau (IAB) investigators to take pictures of protesting officers during contract negotiations with the city.

"The concern is that they're trying to intimidate our members, the implication being that you could be disciplined for asserting your first amendment rights," says Michael Murray, a lawyer with the PBA.

The NYPD denies that and says the IAB officers were there to maintain order.

"If you're a cop and you're confronted with your union leader saying, 'Hey, step aside, we're the police,' that could put a cop in a difficult position," says Browne. "The IAB are there to ensure there's no misconduct by the police, they're the police that police the police."

Homeland Security's Management Undersecretary To Step Down (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

A top Homeland Security official who has worked for three years to meld 22 agencies into a Cabinet department will resign in early May.

Janet Hale , undersecretary for management at the Department of Homeland Security, has been planning to leave the department for the past year but stayed on at the request of Secretary Michael Chertoff to help with his review of departmental operations, officials said.

Chertoff, in announcing Hale's resignation yesterday, called her "a pioneer in the department." Hale said: "There are 180,000 dedicated men and women in this department who make the country safer every day. I am proud to have been part of that."

Hale has been at the center of one of the biggest changes in the civil service in more than 50 years -- the department's plan to overhaul employee compensation and pay according to occupation, geographic location and job performance. The plan also included new rules that would sharply curb union rights in the department.

The rules, which would limit topics that unions can bring to the negotiating table, prompted a federal lawsuit. The unions prevailed at U.S. District Court, and the department has appealed a judge's decision blocking a new labor-management system and tougher employee disciplinary procedures at the department.

When Hale arrived at the department in 2003, it did not have pencils or a Zip code. The management directorate, which now has almost 300 employees, began with five staff members. Today, 650 additional employees work on management and operations issues in the department.

In the past year, officials said, Hale's office has stood up a general ledger, which collects financial information each month from Department of Homeland Security bureaus, so the department can produce a consolidated financial statement. Hale's office also has overseen new procurement practices that have saved taxpayer dollars by avoiding unnecessary spending, officials said. The department also has pulled together many of its computer systems to improve information-sharing and business practices.

But the government's response to Hurricane Katrina reinforced perceptions that the department lacks solid leadership and continues to be snarled in bureaucratic red tape. Employee morale hit bottom in some surveys, apparently because of changes forced by the mega-merger.

Sen. Susan M. Collins (R-Maine), who has investigated the Katrina response as chairman of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee, praised Hale for taking on "a historically difficult assignment." Hale "deserves the nation's thanks for helping to secure our homeland," Collins said.

Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), who chairs a House subcommittee that oversees department management issues, said Hale's resignation "simply adds to the challenges for a department already operating with far too many vacant senior positions."

Rogers said, "But I am also hopeful this helps highlight the pressing need for comprehensive legislation to strengthen the department's management and operations."

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, said Hale "did express some willingness to listen to concerns of employees," but she urged Chertoff to take advantage of her departure to reassess plans for the department's new personnel system, known as MaxHR.

"It is high time they admit that MaxHR is not going anywhere good and is not going to be a success for the department," Kelley said.

DOJ_NMG_0020318

Mark Roth , general counsel for the American Federation of Government Employees, said Hale "had an open-door policy, but unfortunately, many of the problems we brought through that open door were never resolved, and in a larger sense, the problems in DHS . . . will certainly continue long after Ms. Hale's departure. We wish her well."Retirements

John M. Evans , director of operations, Office of the Undersecretary of Defense (Comptroller), retires Friday after 33 years of federal service. He has worked on the comptroller staff for 17 years and has been a member of the Senior Executive Service since 1995.

Joseph J. Matt III , an oceanographer for the Navy, retired March 3 after more than 32 years of federal service. He spent more than 21 years with the director of naval intelligence on the chief of naval operations staff, serving as manager of charting and oceanography.

Man Held In White House Scare (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber And Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

A French citizen was arrested on disorderly conduct charges yesterday after he threw a bundle of papers over a gate of the White House, forcing police to call in the bomb squad, seal the area and close off Lafayette Square, authorities said.

The bundle turned out to contain nothing dangerous, but it took about an hour before authorities issued an all-clear.

The incident marked the second time that Cyrille Y. Morotte, 36, had caused trouble at the White House, authorities said. Morotte was taken into custody and deported after throwing another item over the White House fence in June 2004, authorities said. It was not clear yesterday how Morotte got back into the United States.

He was being held last night and probably will appear at a hearing in D.C. Superior Court today.

The episode began about 11 a.m., just after President Bush left the South Lawn of the White House grounds by helicopter for an event in Wheeling, W.Va.

Authorities said that Morotte threw the bundle of papers and plastic, which was held together by rubber bands, over the fence near the busy northwest gate on Pennsylvania Avenue NW. He was quickly arrested by Secret Service officers, who summoned the bomb squad to examine the package.

Police then shut down that area of the White House. They hustled some television reporters and camera crews, who typically deliver their reports from regular positions near the northwest gate, into the White House press room.

Authorities also closed Pennsylvania Avenue NW and Lafayette Square to pedestrians. The area draws a great deal of pedestrian traffic, especially in spring, when many school groups make trips to Washington.

The bomb squad used a robot to examine the bundle and determined about noon that it did not pose a threat. Secret Service spokesman Tom Mazur said that "normal protocols" were followed.

"We would be remiss if we didn't take these situations seriously," Mazur said.

It was not known yesterday why Morotte tossed the package over the fence. Authorities said he threw a backpack or other object over the fence in 2004. He was not charged with a crime in that incident but was deported afterward, authorities said.

Federal immigration officials said they have placed a detainer on Morotte to ensure that he is turned over to them upon completion of any criminal proceedings. They said their investigation is continuing.

The White House has often attracted protesters and others who have tried to jump or throw objects over the fence. Mazur said the Secret Service did not have statistics on such incidents, adding that they were "not uncommon."

In November 2004, a Falls Church man who had been aiding the government in a terrorism investigation set himself on fire outside the northwest gate. A year later, a 48-year-old homeless man stabbed three tourists in Lafayette Square, causing minor injuries.

Crews Scramble To Fix Levees (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Federal officials are working around the clock to complete repairs to Louisiana's levee system in time for the looming hurricane season.

"We have a mandate to return the hurricane protection system to pre-Katrina levels by June 1," said Paul Johnston, spokesman for the Army Corps of Engineers, noting that the completion date coincides with the beginning of hurricane season. "The folks out there are really working like crazy. We've got folks pounding steel 24 hours a day."

More than 250 Army Corps officials and 1,500 construction workers have completed half the work required since the storm hit more than six months ago, but Mr. Johnston said the other half can and will be finished in 10 weeks.

"We did more than one year's work in just six months, and there's a tremendous amount of work to do in a very short period of time," Mr. Johnston said.

Aided by dry weather but hampered by a lack of manpower, crews repaired nearly 100 miles of the 169-mile-long levee system, which is being built at higher levels in many areas to protect New Orleans from another devastating storm.

"We are going to be ready," said R. David Paulison, acting director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), where officials are working weekends in preparation.

Mr. Paulison, who replaced embattled director Michael D. Brown, said he meets three times a week with Homeland Secretary Michael Chertoff as they reorganize the agency.

"We're picking through all of those lessons learned from Katrina, Rita and Wilma to get what worked and what didn't work to get it fixed quickly," Mr. Paulison said.

"Situational awareness," or eyes on the ground, is what worked for Wilma in Florida, where 300 FEMA officials were dispatched to the governor's homeland security office.

Mr. Chertoff told firefighters this week that the federal government will not override state and local officials and that department officials, including the Coast Guard and FEMA, will be coordinated locally this summer.

The most important first responders will be the people in the storm's path, Mr. Chertoff told the International Association of Fire Fighters legislative conference Monday in Washington.

People who choose to stay behind and weather the storm must have contingency plans and supplies to last 48 hours, Mr. Chertoff said.

"If people who are able-bodied and have the means don't take steps to sustain themselves in that first couple of days in an emergency ... then they are distracting responders and firefighters from helping those who simply don't have the ability to help themselves or don't have the means to help themselves," Mr. Chertoff said.

A system similar to that used by UPS is being put into place to track food, water and ice supplies in real time using Global Positioning System satellites, a lesson learned after Katrina. Mr. Paulison said officials previously had no way to contact drivers on the road to redirect supplies.

"Katrina was an overwhelming event, and the system was not set up to deal with a catastrophe of that size," Mr. Paulison said. "We have to be more nimble, more agile and less bureaucratic."

Last Child Reunited With Kin After Hurricanes (WT/AP)

By Stacey Plaisance, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- When 4-year-old Cortez Stewart was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Texas last week, it brought a happy ending to a long journey that began with the devastation of Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Cortez represented the last of 5,192 Gulf Coast children listed as missing or displaced after the storms struck more than six months ago. The effort to reunite those youngsters became the largest child-recovery effort in U.S. history.

The National Center for Missing & Exploited Children worked with the FBI, Federal Emergency Management Agency, U.S. Postal Service, Red Cross and other agencies to reunite children separated from their parents or guardians when Katrina hit Aug. 29 and Rita followed Sept. 24.

"I can't say that there aren't a few children that may have been missing and not reported to us, but we received more calls than anyone else did, and all our cases have been resolved," said Bob O'Brien, director of the center's missing children division.

In the months after Katrina, the agency received reports of 4,710 children missing or displaced in Louisiana, 339 in Mississippi and 39 in Alabama. In Louisiana, most of the reports were about children in the New Orleans area, where heavy flooding and frantic rescues separated families.

After Rita, another 28 children were reported missing or displaced in Louisiana; 76 were reported in Texas.

Of the more than 5,000 children from both storms, all but 12 were found alive. Most were found living with other relatives, family friends or other adults, Mr. O'Brien said.

Cortez, the final child, was reunited with her mother and five siblings in Houston on March 16. She hadn't seen her family since Katrina hit and was taken to a New Orleans hotel by her godmother.

The two were rescued by helicopter as floodwaters rose around the hotel, and they were eventually taken to Atlanta, Mr. O'Brien said. Meanwhile, Cortez's mother, Lisa Stewart, and her five other children were rescued by boat from their New Orleans home, taken to an interstate overpass and then to the Houston Astrodome, he said.

The family ended up in an apartment in Houston, not knowing whether Cortez and her godmother had made it out of New Orleans alive. Early efforts to reconnect the family were hampered by incorrect name spellings and other erroneous information, Mr. O'Brien said.

"Many agencies didn't have a good account of who they were helping," Mr. O'Brien said. "Moving them from shelter to shelter, by air, by bus, the transfers, people were separated. More than 411,000 were evacuated to more than 40 states, and it became very hard to track the movement."

The national center sent teams of volunteers to shelters in Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Texas to take photos of evacuated children to post on the agency's Web site with information about the children to speed the reuniting effort.

The agency logged more than 34,000 phone calls starting in early September, when it established a missing persons hot line (888-544-5475) at the request of the U.S. Department of Justice. Of the missing children cases, 45 involved children who arrived at shelters with no parent or guardian. All of those cases were resolved by early October, Mr. O'Brien said.

Besides the missing children, more than 12,000 missing adults were reported to the agency's Katrina/Rita Missing Persons Hot Line and were referred to the National Center for Missing Adults. The FBI maintains a list of missing persons on its Web site (www.fbi.gov) that includes names and specific information about those who have yet to be found.

State authorities say roughly 1,900 people are still missing. It is suspected some may have washed to sea or remain buried by debris in New Orleans. Others have been found but haven't notified authorities, while some do not want to be found.

WAR NEWS:

President Urges Congress To OK Nuclear Pact With India (USA Today)

USA Today, March 23, 2006

President Bush urged Congress on Wednesday to approve a landmark plan to share nuclear technology with India. Bush said India has proved itself over 30 years to be a non-proliferator. “It's in our interest that India use nuclear power to power their economic growth because … there's a global connection between demand for fossil fuels elsewhere and price here,” Bush said in Wheeling, W.Va. In Washington, Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns also urged lawmakers to approve the deal.

Critics, including former senator Sam Nunn, a Georgia Democrat, are skeptical of the agreement, reached March 2 by Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh. It would require Congress to exempt India from U.S. laws that restrict trade with countries that have not submitted to full nuclear inspections. Among the concerns raised by Nunn, who played a leading role on military issues in Congress, was that the agreement would promote a regional arms race with China and Pakistan.

The Pentagon is considering issuing a written rule barring the use of any evidence obtained through torture in the military trials of suspected terrorists at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said. Whitman said that up to now it had been the Pentagon's view that a written rule was unnecessary because the military prosecutors had already declared that such evidence would not be permitted. He reiterated that Pentagon policy bans the use of torture. Ten detainees at the U.S. military prison face terrorism charges before tribunals. Lawyers for some Guantanamo Bay detainees have claimed that the military tribunals are illegal because they could consider evidence gained through torture or other forms of inhumane treatment of suspects.

The Bush administration questioned the motives of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq. “It is a matter of curious timing,” State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. He said Iran might be trying to deflect international attention away from its nuclear programs, now under review at the United Nations. McCormack said a channel for communication between the United States and Iran remains open, but no meetings have been scheduled.

Khamenei's statement on Tuesday was the first confirmation that he supports holding talks. He warned, however, that the United States must not try to “bully” Iran. President Bush months ago initiated a diplomatic effort to hold talks with Iran over its activities in Iraq. The administration has accused Iran of supplying insurgents with weapons.

For Afghans, Allies, A Clash Of Values (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The case of an Afghan man who could be prosecuted and even put to death for converting to Christianity has unleashed a blizzard of condemnation from the West this week and exposed a conflict in values between Afghanistan, a conservative Muslim country, and the foreign countries that have helped defend and rebuild it in the four years since the fall of the Taliban.

The case of Abdul Rahman, a longtime Christian convert who lived in Germany for years and was arrested last month in Kabul, has also highlighted the volatile debate within Afghanistan over the proper role of Islam in Afghan law and public policy as the country struggles to develop a democracy.

Diplomats from several countries said yesterday that Rahman, 41, now seems unlikely to be tried or executed. Prosecutors in Kabul said he might be mentally unfit to stand trial, a sign that the government may be seeking to avoid confronting its Western allies without giving ground on Islamic law, under which conversion to another religion is punishable by death.

But the case, the first of its kind since the radical Islamic Taliban movement was toppled in 2001 by a U.S.-led military invasion, continued to draw protests from the governments of Italy, Germany, Canada and other NATO nations, at a time when NATO forces are beginning to replace tens of thousands of U.S. troops as the principal defenders of Afghanistan against Taliban and al-Qaeda insurgents.

It also put pressure on President Bush, who visited Kabul last month to show support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. A number of U.S. Christian and conservative groups demanded this week that Bush take action, and one organization accused him yesterday of propping up an Islamic fundamentalist regime in Kabul.

"This is an extremely sensitive issue here and an extremely serious issue back home," Abdullah, Afghanistan's foreign minister, said in an interview yesterday with Washington Post editors and reporters. "Every time we have a case, it is like an alarm. These contradictions will not go away with one or two cases."

Bush, on a visit to Wheeling, W.Va., said yesterday he was "deeply troubled" to learn of Rahman's possible prosecution. "That's not the universal application of the values that I talked about" while in Kabul, he said. He stopped short of calling for the case against Rahman to be dropped but said he would work with Karzai's government "to make sure that people are protected in their capacity to worship."

Bush's comments were tougher than those made previously by administration officials. On Tuesday, a State Department spokesman urged the Afghan government to "conduct any legal proceedings in a transparent and fair manner." R. Nicholas Burns, the undersecretary of state for political affairs, said that the Afghan constitution "affords freedom of religion to all Afghans" and that the U.S. government hoped for a "satisfactory result" of the case.

The initial low-key response apparently infuriated Christian conservative groups. Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council, complained in a letter to Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians? . . . Americans will not give their blood and treasure to prop up new Islamic fundamentalist regimes."

In another open letter to Bush, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom said it was "the obligation of our government" to take action in the case. The group warned that in Afghanistan, there is no legal guarantee of religious freedom and the judiciary is instructed to enforce Islamic principles. "The door is open for a harsh, unfair or even abusive interpretation of religious orthodoxy to be officially imposed," it said.

Bush, a Christian, often talks about God, faith and respect for all religions, especially in relation to the war on terrorism. The White House has often portrayed Karzai as an example of a Muslim leader and ally who is working to hunt down Islamic terrorists and build a democracy based on the rule of law and human rights.

But Afghanistan is also a deeply traditional and tribal society, where 99 percent of the 25 million inhabitants are Muslims and no Christians worship openly. It is a capital crime under Afghan Islamic law to convert to Christianity, and prosecutors and judges in Kabul initially said Rahman might be sentenced to death.

The country's 2004 constitution, which was heavily debated and rewritten by Afghan officials after it was crafted with help from U.N. advisers, is an ambiguous document that endorses international human rights conventions but also says that no law shall contravene the principles of Islam.

"This case goes right to the heart of the contradictions in the constitution. Is Afghanistan a democracy that respects human rights and international norms, or is it an Islamic country with an extremely conservative judiciary?" said Alex Their, a senior rule of law adviser at the U.S. Institute of Peace. "The issues being raised will have an important impact on Afghanistan's ability to become a stable democracy."

Although Rahman is the first Afghan charged with converting since the fall of the Taliban, Afghan courts have recently prosecuted or harshly criticized individuals for other alleged anti-Islamic acts, including a presidential candidate in 2004 who questioned the right of Muslim men to have multiple wives and a magazine editor last year who challenged the doctrine that conversion from Islam is a capital offense.

The Supreme Court's chief justice, an elderly cleric named Fazl Hadi Shinwari, has issued religious decrees against such individuals. Karzai, a moderate who in Afghanistan is widely viewed as having ceded the judiciary to Islamic conservatives, renominated Shinwari this week. Abdullah, who was not renamed to his post in a cabinet shuffle this week, said the Afghan judiciary was in serious need of reform.

So far, the government has not invoked the extreme punishments ordained by Islamic law, or sharia , such as cutting off thieves' hands and stoning adulterers, which were frequently carried out by the Taliban and drew international condemnation.

But most Afghans view Islamic law as absolute once it is invoked. And despite their gratitude for U.S. military and economic support, many remain leery of Western values and associate Christianity with fornication and drunkenness.

Under sharia, a convert to Christianity "should be given time to think," said Abdul Aziz, a professor of Islamic law who spoke by telephone from Kabul. "What he has done may damage Islamic society, so he should change his mind." If he does not, sharia prescribes the punishment of death. "Then, even a judge cannot change it. It is like doing a coup against the government," Aziz said. Rahman's case was brought by a public security court, not a regular criminal one.

The case against Rahman is complicated by personal aspects. His conversion was denounced by his family in Kabul after he was involved in a lawsuit and child custody fight with his former wife, and he has been described as perennially jobless and mentally unbalanced. He converted in 1990 while working with a Christian aid group in Pakistan and then moved to Germany, returning only recently.

Comments made this week in Kabul by judges, prosecutors, neighbors and Rahman's relatives illustrated the strong emotional and religious feelings such a case can evoke. His father expressed shame and bewilderment at his conversion. Guards refused to let journalists visit him in a Kabul prison, and one said, "We will cut him into little pieces."

But yesterday, Rahman was briefly brought before the news media. According to a report by the BBC, he said: "I am not an infidel or a fugitive. I am a Christian. If they want to sentence me to death, I accept that."

Bush Touts Coal Use For Energy Independence (WHNR)

By John McCabe

Wheeling (WV) News-Register, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — West Virginia's coal reserves could be one of the keys to curing the United States' "addiction" and dependence on foreign oil, President Bush said Wednesday.

During his address at the Capitol Music Hall, underwritten by the Ogden Newspapers Inc. and other local sponsors and hosted by the Wheeling Area Chamber of Commerce, the president spoke of a brief meeting he had with Gov. Joe Manchin on the way downtown from the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport.

During that meeting with the president, Manchin discussed coal liquefaction — a chemical process that turns coal into a fuel that can be used in vehicles — as an alternative energy source for the nation.

"Joe talked to me about how we (could) use the natural resources of the state of West Virginia in such ways to become less dependent on oil," Bush said.

''First thing is, we've got a lot of coal, a 250-year supply of coal, which helps us on our electricity. And we're spending a lot of money on clean coal technology. The whole idea is to use taxpayers' money to develop a technology that will enable us to have zero-emission plants, which will help us achieve an environmental objective, as well as an energy independence objective," Bush said.

''Our natural resources would help make the country more independent" of foreign oil, Manchin said prior to Wednesday's event. If the state's coal reserves were liquefied, "we would have more liquid than Saudi Arabia."

Bush said with the global demand for oil increasing — which drives up the price at the pump — it is imperative that the country find alternative energy sources. As it stands now, "we get oil from parts of the world that don't like us ... which creates a national security issue. And, therefore, it is in our economic interest and national interest that we get off of our addiction to oil."

One of the alternative energy sources is nuclear power. The president endorsed its use as a "renewable source of energy that has ... zero greenhouse gas effect."

The use of batteries to power automobiles — particularly in the big cities, where the average commuter drives less than 40 miles per day — is another possibility in the near future.

"One of these days, I am told, that if we continue to stay focused in research, we're going to be able to have a pretty good-sized vehicle, plug it in, and drive 40 miles before you need to use any gasoline in your engine," Bush said. "That will ... reduce demand for gasoline, which reduces demand for crude oil.

"They've got what they call E85 that's 85 percent ethanol that's powering automobiles now. A whole new industry is beginning to grow. And the more we use alternative sources of energy, the less dependent we are on oil."

The president also praised Manchin for his forward-thinking on an issue of such national importance. "Joe is always thinking, and he's a practical fellow, which is sometimes not the case in government. But what he's saying is, can't we use our resources here, in a way, Mr. President, that helps you achieve a grand national objective, which is getting off Middle Eastern oil? And the answer is, yes, we can."

Bush Pulls Out The Stops To Save Ratings (AP-Y2)

By Jennifer Loven

DOJ_NMG_0020323

AP2, March 22, 2006

Whether he's before a friendly West Virginia audience, a Cleveland club proud of its interrogation skills or a White House news conference, President Bush is drawing on his plainspoken manner in freewheeling venues to defend his Iraq strategy.

Alternately serious and joking, charming and disarming in this war anniversary week, Bush is trying to counter election-year critics and reverse an approval ratings slide.

In Wheeling on Wednesday, the fifth day in a row Bush devoted his remarks to Iraq, the president bantered with the locals, his shoulders bouncing up and down as they do when he's pleased with his own jokes. Then he brought down the house with his trademark I-won't-back-down pledge.

"Let me put it to you this way: If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out," Bush said. More than 2,000 supporters — including many active-duty military and their families — leapt from their seats and filled the gilded Capitol Music Hall with wild applause.

"I cannot look mothers and dads in the eye, I can't ask this good Marine to go into harm's way if I didn't believe, one, we're going to succeed, and, two, it's necessary for the security of the United States," Bush said.

Beginning with a speech last Monday in Washington. and with more planned to come, the president wants to convince Americans not only that there is reason for optimism about Iraq's future but that the situation now is better than the daily reports of strife make it appear.

With national polls showing he has a tough hill to climb — and the upcoming midterm congressional elections making Republicans nervous — Bush laces his remarks with nods to both Americans' worries and the grim realities on the ground in Iraq. The insurgency remains strong, sectarian violence is spiraling and talks to form a unity government seem stalemated.

The president said at least a half-dozen times here that he understands the concern about Iraq.

"There was some awful violence. Some reprisals taking place. And I can understand people saying, `Man, it's all going to — you know, it's not working out,'" he said.

But, Bush added, standing in front of three large blue-and-yellow "Plan for Victory" posters: "The way I like to put it is, they looked into the abyss as to whether or not they want a civil war or not and chose not to. That's not to say we don't have more work to do, and we do."

The crowd in Wheeling needed little convincing. Another standing ovation was prompted by a woman who asked Bush what could be done to keep the press from ignoring progress in Iraq.

"Our major media don't want to portray the good," she said. "If the American people could see it, there would never be another negative word about this conflict."

Bush declined the opportunity to tell the media what to publish.

"You're asking me to say something in front of all the cameras here. Help over there, will you?" he joshed. "Just got to keep talking. Word of mouth."

In Cleveland on Monday, Bush did his talking at the City Club. The questions got tough at the forum known for taking on world leaders, ranging from Iraq to his warrantless wiretapping program to a new nuclear deal with India. But the exchanges allowed Bush to make his case for the war, and earned him a few laughs and several rounds of enthusiastic applause along the way.

"Anybody work here in this town?" Bush joked at one point as the Cleveland questioning went on in an appearance that eventually went over 90 minutes.

On Tuesday, Bush called a news conference with the Washington media. But he rejected the formal East Room in favor of going toe-to-toe with reporters in the cramped, casual White House briefing room that better suits his style. The president bantered with an outspoken critic, journalist Helen Thomas, saying he "semi-regretted" calling on her, and he teasingly accused other reporters of falling asleep during his speeches.

The sessions follow a December blitz by Bush that succeeded in arresting an earlier fall in his approval ratings. This time, White House advisers hope the speaking events, even when they draw the kind of difficult questions that have occasionally come Bush's way this week, will showcase a president comfortable with his message, his strategy and his facts.

"It's one of the best chances he has to be effective, to change away from the Pollyanna-ish characterizations of it being all good news," said Bruce Buchanan, a University of Texas political scientist who has long observed Bush.

However, Wayne Fields, a specialist in presidential rhetoric at Washington University in St. Louis, said, "The problem is that clearly he's doing this because of the polls and that adds a level of desperation."

Bush Pressing The Iraqis To Build A Governing Coalition Quickly (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020324

WHEELING, W.Va., March 22 — President Bush took his campaign to convince Americans that the United States is winning the war in Iraq to a former country music concert hall here on Wednesday and declared to applause, "If I didn't think we'd succeed, I'd pull our troops out."

Mr. Bush also said he was continuing to press the Iraqis to form a unity government. Two Shiite parties won parliamentary elections in January, and the United States has been pressing them to include Sunnis in important cabinet positions.

"I spoke to our ambassador today, and General Casey, via videoconferencing, and we talked about the need to make it clear to the Iraqis: it's time, it's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people," Mr. Bush told the crowd. He was referring to Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the senior American commander in Iraq.

Mr. Bush did not repeat his widely published remark from a news conference on Tuesday suggesting that American forces would be in Iraq at least until 2009. On Wednesday, White House officials sought to play down the comment, saying Mr. Bush did not mean to imply that there would be 130,000 American troops in Iraq in 2009, as there are now.

White House officials said Mr. Bush's remark was not an open-ended comment. "The question was, Will there be zero, when will there be zero — or no American troops in Iraq," Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary, told reporters on Air Force One.

Mr. Bush's response was that the decision would be made by "future presidents and future governments of Iraq."

In Wheeling, the latest stop in Mr. Bush's effort to persuade an increasingly doubtful public about his course in Iraq, the president spent an hour and 20 minutes with a hand-held microphone on the stage of the Capitol Music Hall, a home for country singers for more than 70 years, which was closed at the end of last month. The local Chamber of Commerce handed out about 2,000 tickets for the events, and about 250 military families were invited.

Mr. Bush took questions from the crowd, but they were a lot softer than the sharp queries he got on Monday from the City Club of Cleveland, a nonpartisan group. West Virginia voters supported Mr. Bush in the 2000 and 2004 presidential elections.

One boy asked Mr. Bush if he liked living in the White House. Mr. Bush responded, yes, because he had a 45-second commute, the food was good, and the job was an honor.

He also said, alluding to the pressures and criticism of his tenure, that when "my buddies come up from Texas," they're "kind of looking at you like, man, are you O.K.?"

Mr. Bush said he told them yes.

"Educator-In-Chief" Speaks In Wheeling (WHINT)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — The Iraqi people ultimately must "determine their own fate," and "as they stand up, we'll stand down," President Bush told an audience in downtown Wheeling Wednesday.

A capacity crowd of more than 2,000 — including many military veterans and their families — turned out for Bush's town hall forum on the War on Terror at the Capitol Music Hall.

The event was sponsored by the Ogden Newspapers Inc., Valley National Gases Inc., Paull Associates Insurance/Real Estate, EPS Industries Inc., Wheeling Island Racetrack and Gaming Center and Beyond Marketing.

Bush said that while he has the duty of being commander-in-chief of U.S. military forces, he also holds the responsibility of being "educator-in-chief" and explaining to U.S. citizens why he chose to send forces into Iraq.

"It doesn't matter whether you agree with my decision or not," Bush said. "But all of us should agree with the fact that we have a remarkable country."

He added that 75 percent of West Virginia's National Guard has now seen military action, and he thanked the veterans and their families for their sacrifices.

Bush offered his explanation as to why these sacrifices are necessary.

"It's tough fighting, and it's tough fighting because we've got an enemy that's just cold-blooded," Bush said. "They can't beat us militarily, but they can try to shake our will. They have said that it's just a matter of time, just a matter of time before the United States loses its nerve. I believe we're doing the right thing, and we're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins.

"It's the Iraqis' fight. Ultimately, the Iraqis are going to have to determine their future. They made their decision politically. They voted. And these troops that we're training are going to have to stand up and defend their democracy. We've got to work, by the way, in 2006 to make sure the police are trained as adequately as the military. It's their choice to make. I like to put it this way — as they stand up, we'll stand down."

As for whether he will reduce troop levels in the Middle East, Bush said it was something he is considering.

DOJ_NMG_0020325

‘‘But I’m going to make up my mind based upon the advice of the United States military that’s in Iraq,’’ he said. ‘‘I’ll be making up my mind about the troop levels based upon recommendations of those who are on the ground.

‘‘I’m going to make up my mind based upon achieving a victory — not based upon polls, focus groups or election-year politics.’’

Bush next addressed the issue of pre-war intelligence and how he had believed Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction in Iraq and planned to use them.

‘‘I know for a fact he had used weapons of mass destruction — he used them on his own people,’’ Bush said of Hussein. ‘‘Now, I thought he had weapons of mass destruction. Members of Congress thought he had weapons of mass destruction. The world thought he had weapons of mass destruction. That’s why those nations voted in the Security Council’’ to send troops into Iraq.

‘‘Now I’m finding out what went wrong. One of the things you better make sure of when you’re the president is that you’re getting good intelligence. Obviously, the intelligence broke down. But (Hussein) had that capacity to make weapons of mass destruction. He had not only murdered his own people, but he had used weapons of mass destruction on his own people.’’

It was also known that forces under Hussein were firing on U.S. aircraft, Bush said.

‘‘This guy was a threat,’’ he added. ‘‘The way I viewed it was that it was Saddam Hussein’s choice to disclose, disarm or face serious consequences. He made the choice, and then I was confronted with a choice. I made my choice. And the world is better off without Saddam Hussein in power.’’

Bush also addressed the need for universal freedoms in the world, and he said he is upset that some countries aided by the U.S. continue to infringe upon human rights.

He spoke of a visit he made to Afghanistan and of meeting President Hamid Karzai.

“I like him ,” Bush said of Karzai. “He’s a good man. You can imagine what it’s like to try to rebuild a country that had been occupied and then traumatized by the Taliban. They’re coming around. They got elections. They had assembly elections. He, himself, was elected.

“We expect them to honor the universal principle of freedom,” Bush added with reference to Afghanistan. “I’m troubled when I hear — deeply troubled — when I hear the fact that a person who has converted away from Islam may be held to account. That’s not the universal application of the values that I talked about. I look forward to working with the government of that country to make sure that people are protected in their capacity to worship. “

Bush spoke directly to the crowd for about 45 minutes prior to taking questions from those in attendance.

He thanked John Anderson and Janis LaFont, employees of Valley National Gases, for a $100,000 check they presented him for the Katrina Relief Fund.

‘‘I want to thank you all for doing this, and I want to thank the folks you work with for doing that,’’ Bush said.

Many of the questions and comments for Bush were from those primarily supportive of the president and wishing to commend him.

One of the first questions came from West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, who asked Bush if the state’s natural resources could better be put to use to help ease U.S. dependency on foreign oil. Manchin is a proponent of liquefying West Virginia’s coal for use as gasoline. Bush quickly began to speak of nuclear energy and the use of ethanol.

A Wheeling Park student followed Manchin’s question with one regarding nuclear energy and whether the U.S. is guilty of a double standard in supporting India’s effort toward nuclear energy, but not Iran’s attempts.

Iranians ‘‘are hostile to the United States and hostile to allies,’’ Bush answered. ‘‘We’ve got to be very careful about not letting them develop a weapon. ... Iran with a nuclear weapon is a threat, and it’s dangerous, and we must not let them have a weapon.’’

A local military recruiter asked Bush what he might say to encourage someone to serve their country. He responded he would tell them it was a good way to learn skills prior to college, and he added that people can also serve their country by volunteering.

A Wheeling firefighter asked Bush if he planned to send ‘‘an army of sociologists’’ to the Middle East to help change the mindset there so that those of differing religions are accepted. Bush responded the U.S. would work with friendly governments there and reinforce the universal idea of freedom of religion.

A young boy asked Bush if he enjoyed living in the White House. Bush told him he had ‘‘enjoyed every second’’ living there. He said he ‘‘has a 45-second commute’’ to the office, and he noted ‘‘the food is good.’’

Bush added that he often invites his friends from Texas to visit.

‘‘I tell them what an honor it is to do this job,’’ he said. ‘‘They often ask, what’s the job description? I say, ’Making decisions.’ And I make a lot.

DOJ_NMG_0020326

"You may not agree with the decision. But at the very minimum, I want you to understand that I make my decisions based upon some principles I hold dear. In order to make decisions, you have to be enthusiastic about your job, you have to be optimistic about the future and you have to stand for something. You can't be a president trying to search for what you believe in the midst of all the noise in Washington."

Crowd Praises Bush's Speech (WHINT)

By Adam Townsend

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — Many people who attended President Bush's Wednesday appearance in Wheeling said they weren't sure what to expect from the speech and subsequent question-and-answer period, but several area residents said afterward that they were impressed with the chief executive's statements and responses.

"I want to know if he has any plans for addressing the congressmen who so negatively portray the war in Iraq," said St. Clairsville nurse practitioner Janel Trovato-Vass. She had her question for the president carefully written on a Post-it note she held as she waited to enter Capitol Music Hall. The line — dotted with the white caps of Marines in dress uniforms and the square-patterned camouflage of the Air National Guard — stretched for a few blocks as Secret Service officials checked everyone with metal detectors.

"Nobody's perfect, and he can't fix everything," Trovato-Vass continued. "I've supported George (W.) Bush as a Republican myself. (The President's visit) is pretty big for Wheeling."

Close behind Trovato-Vass were the members of the Wheeling Park High School Teen Age Republicans — a newly formed chapter of the national group.

The six members were part of the group seated in bleachers behind the president while he spoke on stage, and all were giddy with excitement as they waited in the morning chill in downtown Wheeling.

"We all started (the chapter) just this year," said Christina Fortunato, mentioning that the group had some help in getting seats on the stage. "My mom, Kathy Fortunato, is chairman for the (Ohio County) Republican Party."

"We hope this'll be a learning experience for all of us," added club member Kelly Kresen.

The theater seats began to fill up slowly as attendees filtered through Secret Service checkpoints while bomb-sniffing dogs inspected television cameras. Throughout the speech, the audience burst into applause at various statements by the president, who joked with the audience and explained his justification for the war in Iraq. At the end of the speech, Bush took a number of questions from members of the crowd.

"I thought that it was a wonderful speech," said West Liberty professor Charles Davis as Bush descended from the stage to greet the audience members crowded around him. "This is my second time to see him. I don't always agree with him, but I support him and respect him."

Jolene Magle, one of the locals volunteering at the Capitol to help host the event, said the speech was everything she expected as a Bush supporter.

"He answered all the questions appropriately," she said. "We just love him. He's a faith-based man, and this is a faith-based community."

Indeed, one would have been hard pressed to find someone in the audience much less enthusiastic about the speech.

"George W. Bush is an amazing president because he stands firmly," said Wheeling Park senior and Student Council President Michael Bush. Michael Bush asked George W. Bush what his generation would be facing as its members assume the reins of power in the future.

"I asked him as 'one President Bush to another,'" Michael Bush said. "He got a kick out of that."

Supportive Crowd Hails Bush In W.Va. As President Defends Iraq Policy (PPG)

By James O'Toole

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va. -- West Virginians cheered as President Bush maintained that the war in Iraq and his assertive foreign policy were "laying the foundation of peace for a generation to come."

In the face of increasing public uneasiness over the war, Bush came to the Capitol Music Hall yesterday continuing a renewed effort this week to shore up support for his administration's policies.

With familiar but impassioned arguments, Mr. Bush defended his decision to go to war and argued that his foreign policy goal of spreading democracy would lead to victory in Iraq and a more peaceful future for the Middle East.

For the third day in a row, the president answered questions on the war, this time before a markedly more supportive audience than he faced Monday at the Cleveland City Club or Tuesday in the White House press room.

DOJ_NMG_0020327

Poll after poll in recent weeks have recorded bleak approval ratings for his job performance in general and his conduct of the war in particular.

But such sentiments were not apparent in the historic theater where the West Virginia audience, dotted with military families and men and women in uniforms, offered repeated applause and friendly questions. Mr. Bush, with a handheld microphone, strolled back and forth on a stage festooned with banners that read: "Plan for Victory."

While acknowledging flaws in pre-war intelligence, Mr. Bush sparked applause in a community where a local Air National Guard unit is awaiting deployment to Iraq as he said, "I viewed it was ... Saddam Hussein's choice, to disclose, disarm, or face serious consequences. ... And I made my choice and the world is better off without Saddam Hussein in power."

Defending what he portrayed as the broader principles underlying his foreign policy, Mr. Bush said, "An interesting debate in the world is whether or not freedom is universal. ... People say, 'There's old Bush imposing his values.'

"See, I believe freedom is universal. I believe liberty is a universal thought. It's not an American thought, it is a universal thought," he continued, arguing that the spread of democracy would promote a more peaceful world.

Mr. Bush elicited another ovation as he said, "Look, I'm an optimistic guy. I believe we will succeed. If I didn't believe we would succeed, I would pull our troops out."

While most of the session concentrated on Iraq, Mr. Bush also defended his proposed nuclear accord with India, warned that he would not accept Iran's designs on building nuclear weapons, and vowed to renew his frustrated campaign to transform Social Security.

Responding to one of the few challenging questions from the crowd, Mr. Bush denied that he was guilty of a double standard in his approach to India and Iran on nuclear weapons. He argued that India was a transparent democracy while Iran was not.

"They're certainly not a democracy. They are sponsors of terrorism," Mr. Bush said of Iran. "They have joined the [International Atomics Energy Agency], and yet we caught them cheating. In other words, they weren't upholding the agreements, and they started to try to enrich uranium in order to develop a weapons program. India is heading to the IAEA; the Iranians are ignoring IAEA."

West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin put in a plug for the state's coal resources as he asked the president how the nation could use other fuels to promote energy independence.

"Joe is talking about spending research money on the gasification of coal, which then will lead to the [liquefaction]," Mr. Bush said. "And I believe we ought to attack this issue on all fronts, on a variety of fronts. I know we ought to use nuclear power. It is a renewable source of energy that has got zero greenhouse gas effect."

One questioner drew the crowd's loud endorsement with her complaint that the news media do not show enough of the good news of what is happening in Iraq.

"That's why I come out and speak. I spoke in Cleveland, gave a press conference yesterday -- spoke in Cleveland Monday," Mr. Bush said. "I'm going to continue doing what I'm doing to try to make sure people can hear ... why I make decisions, and as best as I can, explain why I'm optimistic we can succeed."

On his arrival at the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport, Mr. Bush tried to emphasize one positive outgrowth of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq as he presented a volunteer service award to Kristen Holloway of Mt. Lebanon for her work in founding Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit group that distributes clothing, DVDs, musical instruments and other goods to GIs serving overseas.

The president plans to return to the region tomorrow to appear at a private fund-raising event for U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum.

Bush Urges Iraqis To Form A Government (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va. -- President Bush yesterday said Iraqi politicians must get serious about forming a unity government and begin the job of running the country.

"It's time," Mr. Bush said. "It's time to get a government in place that can start leading this nation and listening to the will of the people."

Continuing his series of speeches on Iraq and the war on terror, Mr. Bush again praised Iraqis for stepping back from "the abyss" after the bombing of a Shi'ite mosque in Samarra last month.

But he told an audience of 2,000 at the Capitol Music Hall in Wheeling that just yesterday morning he instructed the U.S. ambassador to Iraq and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top U.S. commander there, to let the Iraqis know they now must step up.

A delegation of U.S. senators traveling in Iraq earlier this week also told interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari to get to work on forming a government.

DOJ_NMG_0020328

"There's been too much dawdling while Baghdad is burning," said Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat. "They have got to decide if they want a nation. They cannot overly rely on us."

Iraqis went to the polls in December, though the results weren't certified until last month. Mr. Bush urged Iraqis to move quickly to form a unity government that would share power among the various factions.

"That's what the people want; otherwise, they wouldn't have gone to the polls, would they have?" he said.

It was the fifth consecutive day Mr. Bush has spoken on Iraq, beginning with his radio address Saturday and continuing with his statement on the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion Sunday, a war on terror speech Monday and a press conference Tuesday.

Although acknowledging that the U.S. made mistakes initially in its strategy for reconstruction and security, the president has not backed down from his decision to go to war nor his commitment to remain.

"I just got to tell you, I'm not weak and I'm not going to lose my nerve," he said. "I strongly believe that we're doing the right thing."

The White House said most of the tickets to the town hall-style event yesterday were distributed by the local chamber of commerce.

The audience was favorable. A man with two sons in the military told the president, "I thank God you're our commander in chief." That drew a standing ovation from the crowd.

Another audience member drew a standing ovation when she blasted the press for not showing positive images that her husband, who she said served 13 months as a military broadcaster in Tikrit, brought back with him.

"It seems that our major media networks don't want to portray the good," she said.

Mr. Bush said he respected a free press and that it is his job to talk about progress in Iraq.

"I'm going to continue doing what I'm doing to try to make sure people can hear why I make decisions, and as best as I can, explain why I'm optimistic we can succeed," he said.

Bush Continues To Press Case For Iraq War (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W.Va — Before an overwhelmingly friendly audience in the rugged panhandle of West Virginia, President Bush said today he would pay no heed to "polls, focus groups or election year politics" in deciding how many troops to deploy in Iraq.

Speaking publicly on Iraq for the fifth consecutive day, the president used colloquial, often blunt, language as he reduced his arguments for the war to their most basic.

"We're not going to retreat in the face of thugs and assassins," he vowed.

Unlike a similar speech and question-and-answer session two days earlier in Cleveland, where Bush faced polite but tough questions, he was bathed today in repeated rounds of applause. Audience members prefaced their questions with praise for his presidency.

The president responded by reaching out to the region's religious roots and saluting its contributions to the military.

The town-hall-style program, in an aging theater in this bedraggled steel town, was part of a series the White House constructed to carry the president's message — that he understands the doubts that Americans are increasingly showing about the campaign in Iraq as it enters its fourth year, but that the fight is necessary to rid the country of terrorists who would use it as a base to attack the United States.

At a White House news conference Tuesday, Bush said he recognized that the war was costing him political capital he could have used to win support for domestic programs. He also suggested that American troops would still be in Iraq when his second term ends on Jan. 20, 2009. Today, he repeated his mantra that his decisions about troop levels would be based on the advice of commanders on the ground.

"I'm going to make up my mind based upon achieving a victory, not based upon polls, focus groups or election year politics," the president said.

Polls show that roughly 30% of the public says they approve of the job Bush is doing, the lowest level since he took office five years ago.

The president reminded his audience that the debates over the direction of the war had not weakened support in Congress for the military or for the people fighting the war. He said debate over his anti-terrorist policy was "healthy for our country … so long as we don't send the wrong signals to our troops."

The president spoke to about 2,500 people, most of them invited by the local Chamber of Commerce, in the 78-year-old Capitol Music Hall. When the questions began, he was able to relax and enjoy the decorations of gilt, red brocade and velvet.

DOJ_NMG_0020329

The first person to take the microphone said Bush had a tough job fighting terrorism; the second said, "I thank God that you're our commander in chief." The audience stood and shouted approval.

Only one questioner challenged his policies, asking why he supported nuclear energy development in India but was putting roadblocks in Iran's way. The president said India was a democracy following international protocol, and Iran was thwarting inspections and other efforts to make sure it did not develop a nuclear weapon.

Other questions were posed by, among others, a National Guard recruiting commander who sought Bush's encouragement for would-be recruits and a Republican campaign director who sought words of support for his campaign. The president praised military volunteers but also recommended other forms of service to the country; he sidestepped the direct appeal for campaign support.

Another questioner was a woman whose husband was at her side in an Army uniform, having just returned from a 13-month tour in Tikrit, Saddam Hussein's hometown. She complained that national television had not shown the positive news about U.S. military accomplishments in Iraq.

The president encouraged her to keep spreading the word, by mouth and by the Internet. But he deflected her criticism of the news media, saying, "The minute we start trying to suppress our press, we look like the Taliban."

Politicos Turn Out For Bush (WHINT)

By Joselyn King

Wheeling (WV) Intelligencer, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — When the U.S. president comes to a community for an official visit, local politicians show up to greet Air Force One — regardless of their political party.

West Virginia Gov. Joe Manchin, a Democrat, was among the first to shake Republican President George W. Bush's hand when he got off the plane Wednesday at the Ohio County Airport. Bush then proceeded to the Capitol Music Hall in downtown Wheeling for a town hall forum.

"I believe anytime a president comes to the state on an official visit it's important for the governor to welcome him," Manchin said.

That Bush came to Wheeling to discuss the War on Terror also was a factor, he added. Manchin had with him data showing that West Virginia presently has 495 troops serving in the Middle East, and that 4,700 Mountain State residents had seen active duty since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. This accounts for 75 percent of the state's National Guard troops, according to Manchin.

"My main goal in being here is to support the troops and see whether they will be able to return safely," Manchin said. "I also want to talk to the president about high gas prices."

Manchin had hoped to get some time with Bush during the visit to discuss the potential for liquefying West Virginia's coal and using it as a national energy source.

Bush acknowledged Manchin during his speech at the Capitol Music Hall.

"He's a good, decent man," Bush said of Manchin. "He showed his heart during the mine tragedies. He represented the best of West Virginia. He showed great compassion, great concern. He asked the nation to pray on behalf of the families. We still must continue to pray for those who lost their loved ones.

Manchin "is a problem-solver, see. He said, 'We're going to deal with this issue head on.' And I appreciate your working closely with the federal government to make sure that there are safety regulations that work, that the inspection process works so that the miners here in this important state are able to do their job and their families can be secure in them doing their job," Bush continued.

Also on the tarmac greeting Bush was U.S. Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., who always has accompanied Bush during his visits to the state.

She said she is continuing to support his policies in Iraq.

"We need to continue and complete the mission," Capito said. "When the Iraqis are ready to defend themselves, we can withdraw."

She added that she and other members of Congress now are hearing more from constituents who want the war to end, and they are questioning whether it is a winnable effort.

"These are questions I am asking," Capito said. "Members of Congress are feeling the same anxieties their constituents are."

Delegate Chris Wakim, R-Ohio — also a candidate for the U.S. House against incumbent U.S. Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va. — admitted that Bush's appearance in Wheeling "didn't hurt" his campaign. Wakim also used his military background to defend Bush's decision to go to war.

DOJ_NMG_0020330

"The president is here today to reinforce the idea that the war needs to be fought over there," Wakim said. "We need to take the terrorists off-base and keep them unbalanced.

"Attacking their supply lines and training facilities are fundamental principles of war," Wakim added. "If these can't be established, the enemy is off-guard."

Delegate Gil White, R-Ohio, said Bush's visit was positive for West Virginia.

"It is an honor for the chief executive to choose Wheeling as the venue for a discussion about the war," he said. "It's a showcase for West Virginia."

State Sen. Andy McKenzie, R-Ohio, added that Wheeling and West Virginia were getting exposure in the national media Wednesday morning.

"Regardless of your politics, the president's visiting is good exposure for a community," he said.

Accompanying McKenzie was his Senate colleague from Morgantown, Sen. Mike Oliverio, D-Monongalia. Oliverio said that while he is a Democrat, he had worked for the successful Supreme Court nomination of Justice Samuel Alito.

As such, the White House contacted him last week and asked him to attend Bush's speech.

In his speech, Bush told Oliverio he did a "great service to his country." He also mentioned that Oliverio had asked him not to hold it against him that he is a Democrat.

"Mike — first and foremost — we're all Americans," Bush told Oliverio.

Reid Criticizes President Bush As 'dangerously Incompetent' (AP)

By Kathleen Hennessey

The Associated Press, March 22, 2006

LAS VEGAS – Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called President Bush "dangerously incompetent" on Wednesday and said the administration ought to be doing more to prevent increasing sectarian violence in Iraq.

"Where is (Secretary of State) Condoleeza Rice? Why isn't she over in the Middle East, as the chief diplomat of this country should be, trying to get the political forces to form a government over there?" Reid told The Associated Press.

Reid said the U.S. was "failing three different ways in Iraq." Military efforts have lagged, the economy is crippled by decreased oil and electricity production, and attempts to form a representative government are behind schedule, he said.

Reid criticized Bush for a series of recent appearances in key political states in which the president defended his Iraq war policies.

"Why isn't he spending time with these leaders in the Middle East trying to get this government formed?" Reid said.

Reid described the conditions Iraq as "low-grade civil war."

"I don't know how you define civil war. We know they're killing an average of 50 Iraqis a day. At least it's a low-grade civil war, that's for sure," he said.

The Nevada senator's critical remarks about Bush came after a Las Vegas news conference on immigration reform. He was scheduled to appear later on the Mexico-California border to tout Democratic proposals for border security.

Reid also responded to comments the president made Tuesday when he said his successor in the White House would likely be responsible for deciding when U.S. troops leave Iraq.

"To me it shows how dangerously incompetent he is," Reid said. "'Stay the course, mission accomplished, bring 'em on,' the American people are sick of that. We need to change course in Iraq. ... I think the president burying his head in the sand is not going to do the trick."

Cheney Rallies Troops During Appearance At Scott Air Base (SLPD)

By Alan Lewis Gerstenecker, Collinsville Herald

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 22, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney is on a mission, and that assignment is to drum up support for America's war effort in Iraq.

He did that Tuesday during an appearance at Scott Air Force Base.

Addressing more than 3,000 in a flag-adorned and camouflage-draped Hangar One, Cheney spoke for nearly 40 minutes to the nearly exclusively military and military-family crowd.

"In all of you, I see the best of America, and I admire your commitment to discipline, duty, and service above self," he said. "It's a privilege to be in your company, and I bring the respect and good wishes of our commander in chief, President George W. Bush."

The statement was followed by a prolonged applause.

Clearly, Cheney was in his realm. He was articulate and wavered only slightly from his prepared, eight-page speech, which was interrupted 12 times by applause.

DOJ_NMG_0020331

In recent days, he had denied he would resign as public opinion polls revealed support of the Bush Administration had fallen to just 37 percent, and the third anniversary of the war in Iraq had come and gone without signs of an end in sight.

Cheney appeared resilient, showing no signs of the ailing heart that has dogged him.

The former defense secretary-turned-vice president even joked about his familiarity with Scott Air Force Base.

"I first became intimately familiar with the work of Scott Air Force Base in the early 1990s, when I served as secretary of defense – the old days when I had real power and influence," he mused to scattered laughter.

After briefly delving into humor, Cheney went right back to the seriousness of rallying the troops in support of the war in Iraq.

"Our strategy in Iraq is clear," Cheney said. "Our tactics will remain flexible, and we'll keep at the task until we finish the job. Progress has not come easily, but it has been steady, and we can be confident going forward.

"As the Iraqi forces gain strength and experience, and as the political process advances, we'll be able to decrease troop levels without losing our capacity to defeat the terrorists. And, as always, decisions about troop levels will be driven by the conditions on the ground and the judgment of our commanders – not by artificial timelines set by politicians in Washington, D.C.," Cheney said, drawing the longest and loudest applause of his presentation.

Cheney was strong, urging the troops to stay the course.

"Recently, there have been some prominent voices advocating a sudden withdrawal of our forces from Iraq. Some have suggested that this war is not winnable ….. and a few seem almost eager to conclude that the whole struggle is already lost. But they are wrong. The only way to lose this fight is to quit – and that is not an option," Cheney said to another round of applause.

The vice president said the country has a different mindset now than it had five years ago.

"Every American serving in this war can be absolutely certain that the people of our country do not support a policy of passivity, resignation, and defeatism in the face of terror," Cheney said.

"The United States will never go back to the false comforts of the world before Sept. 11, 2001. Terrorist attacks are not caused by the use of strength. They are invited by the perception of weakness.

"In the past, terrorists hit America, and we didn't hit back hard enough. They came to believe that if they killed enough Americans, they could change our policies. And they are now trying to intimidate us into a policy of withdrawal and retreat. But this nation has made a decision: We will engage these enemies – facing them far from home, so we do not have to face them on the streets of our own cities," Cheney said, bringing to mind the resolve of Winston Churchill's "We-will-never-surrender" speech during World War II.

Cheney then defended President George Bush's authority to monitor phone conversations, now an attack point of those who say the president is overstepping his authority.

"We are talking here about a wartime measure, limited in scope to surveillance associated with terrorists ..… and conducted in a way that safeguards the civil liberties of the American people," Cheney said.

"It's important to note that leaders of Congress have been briefed more than a dozen times on the President's authorization, and on activities conducted under it. In addition, the entire program is reconsidered and reauthorized by the President every 45 days. He has reauthorized it more than 30 times since September 11th – and he has indicated his intent to do so as long as our nation faces a continuing threat from al-Qaeda and related organizations," Cheney said.

Waiting for Cheney's arrival, Hangar One was festival-like.

The U.S. Air Force Band of Mid-America performed for two hours, while soldiers with gifted voices sang pop hits leading up to the vice president and Col. Raymond Rottman, commander of the 375th Airlift Wing, leading in the singing of the Air Force Song.

After his speech, Cheney performed a re-enlistment ceremony for nine soldiers and the enlistment of a 10th.

The soldiers are: Keith Moser, Dwayne Ledbetter, Morgan Dixon, Kholifa Kabia, Angela Grannis, Joseph Terrell, Rebecca Place, and Randall Lederman of the Air Force; Eric Ervin of the Marine Corps.; and new recruit Kyle McQuiston, who wore a suit to the ceremony.

"This is just great," said Rachael Whitlow, an Air Force Reservist and Civil Service worker at Scott. "I love our president, and I love my country. I'm here because I support the war. I understand others' rights to protest (the war). They have their opinion. I'm not against that. That's what freedom's all about."

Mascoutah High School student Chris Givens attended the event with his father, Senior Master Sgt. Bill Givens.

"It was pretty good, and I liked his speech," said Givens, a junior, who was wearing his purple letter jacket. Givens stood out in the crowd in his school colors in a sea of green camouflage.

"I like the fact he supports the military. Coming from a military family, I think that's important. I don't know whether I'm going to join the military, although I'm considering it."

Givens' mother, Susan, said it was important for her son's to attend the event.

"This is as good as any school lesson," Susan Givens said. "I felt like it was important that he get excused to be here today."

Bush's Uncle Earned Millions In War Firm Sale (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr.

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — As President Bush embarks on a new effort to shore up public support for the war in Iraq, an uncle of the commander in chief is collecting $2.7 million in cash and stock from the recent sale of a company that profited from the war.

A report filed with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission shows that William H.T. Bush collected just under $1.9 million in cash plus stock valued at more than $800,000 from the sale of Engineered Support Systems Inc. to DRS Technologies of New Jersey.

The $1.7-billion deal closed Jan. 31. Both firms have extensive military contracts.

William Bush was a director of Engineered Support Systems. Recent SEC filings show he was paid cash and DRS stock in exchange for shares and options he obtained as a director.

Before DRS purchased it, Missouri-based ESSI experienced record growth as a result of expanded U.S. military contracts — many to supply U.S. efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The contracts, some awarded on a no-bid basis, include a $77-million deal to refit military vehicles with armor for use in Iraq.

Other ESSI products used in the war include radar and detection services, field medical stations and field electrical generator units.

SEC filings show that two federal investigations of ESSI are underway. One inquiry involves a stop order from the government on the field generators. The order was issued because the units didn't operate properly.

The generator contract was a major source of revenue. SEC files show that ESSI did not tell stockholders about the stop order until last June, about seven months after it was issued.

During the interim, several ESSI executives, including Bush's uncle, cashed in stock and stock options worth millions of dollars, the filings show.

According to one recent filing, the SEC and the U.S. attorney in St. Louis are investigating the delayed disclosure and other matters.

Unnamed members of the ESSI board and corporate officers have been subpoenaed in the inquiry, according to documents.

SEC filings show that William Bush, 67, exercised options on 8,348 shares of ESSI stock on Jan. 18, 2005, about two months after the stop order was issued and six months before it was disclosed. He collected about $450,000 in cash.

Bush, known as "Uncle Bucky" in the president's family, joined ESSI's board in 2000, several months before his nephew became president.

He heads a St. Louis investment firm and is the youngest brother of former President George H.W. Bush.

He declined to comment Wednesday. However, in an interview last year, he said he played no role in ESSI's winning federal contracts.

"I don't make any calls to the 202 [Washington, D.C.] area code," he said.

Patricia Williamson, a spokeswoman for DRS, would not comment on the status of the federal investigations.

The company has said it is cooperating in the probes, which also involve an ESSI insurance contract.

Insurgents Shower Iraq Police Center With Mortar Shells (NYT)

By Edward Wong

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 22 — Insurgents on Wednesday laid siege to the headquarters of a police paramilitary unit near the capital, lobbing a volley of mortar shells that killed at least one senior officer and wounded at least five, Interior Ministry officials said.

In the predawn attack, 14 mortar shells hit a government center in the Sunni-dominated town of Salman Pak, 12 miles southeast of Baghdad; the Third Public Order Brigade, which is overwhelmingly Shiite, had been using the center as a base. Among local Sunni Arabs, the brigade has a reputation for torture and abuse.

The members of the paramilitary unit fought back Wednesday, killing at least five insurgents, a commander in Baghdad said. By nightfall, the police were holding at least 76 people for questioning.

DOJ_NMG_0020333

On Tuesday, more than 200 insurgents stormed a police station in the town of Muqdadiya, in Diyala Province, freeing more than 30 prisoners and leaving the building a smoldering wreck. At least 18 police officers died. The governor of Diyala said he was investigating the police chief and other officers in the area, to see whether they were accomplices.

That highly coordinated strike raised serious questions about the effectiveness of the Iraqi police forces, at a time when President Bush and American commanders are hailing the growing abilities of the police.

The unit in Salman Pak appeared to have done better in repulsing attackers, though a deputy battalion commander, identified as Col. Ahmad Salim Daher of the Second Battalion, was killed.

The police initially detained 146 people, all Iraqis, and then released 70 after testing them for traces of explosives, said Maj. Gen. Mehdi Sabih Hashem al-Garawi, the commander of the 7,700-member Public Order Forces, which has four brigades operating in Baghdad and the Salman Pak area.

Salman Pak lies in an insurgent-plagued farming region where scores of bodies have turned up. Last year, the Third Public Order Brigade began cracking down. American military advisers had pushed for the removal of a brigade commander who the Americans believed oversaw the abuse and torture of detainees.

The tough tactics brought some quiet to Salman Pak, though the Sunni-led insurgency kept carrying out occasional attacks.

On Wednesday afternoon, insurgents in Baghdad attacked busloads of Shiite pilgrims in two different parts of the city. In all, at least 2 pilgrims were killed and 46 wounded. Police officers rushed to the scenes and fought the insurgents, and at least two officers were killed and four wounded.

A senior Shiite cleric, Hazem al-Aaraji, said on the Iraqiya television network that militiamen from the Mahdi Army had been sent to save the pilgrims, but that American forces had stopped them.

The pilgrims were among millions who had gone over the weekend to the southern city of Karbala to honor the death of Imam Hussein, the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad who was killed by an army in A.D. 680, sealing the Sunni-Shiite split.

In the port city of Basra, a concealed bomb exploded near a British military vehicle, killing an interpreter working for the British, officials said.

The border between Jordan and Iraq remained closed on Wednesday, as the two governments tried to deal with the scores of Palestinian refugees fleeing sectarian violence in Baghdad. The refugees were stopped by Jordanian border officials and stranded.

Yara Sharif, a spokeswoman for the Amman office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, said a team from the agency was visiting the Palestinians and was expected back in the capital on Thursday to deliver its assessment. She said the group of refugees number 89. The Jordanian spokesman, Nasser Judeh, had initially reported the number above 100.

The agency, Ms. Sharif said, fears that if the violence in Iraq worsens, more Palestinians will flee toward the borders. The agency estimates that 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq. Palestinians here fear retribution from vengeful Shiites because they are Sunni Arabs who were favored by Saddam Hussein.

Further details emerged Wednesday night about the fate of 34 Iraqi security workers who were abducted by uniformed men in central Baghdad on March 8. Sheik Muhsin Naif al-Faisal, one of the security company's owners and a former member of Parliament, said in a telephone interview from London that seven employees were released in recent days. He said he had no idea why his employees had been kidnapped, or who their captors were.

50 Gunmen Attempting To Overtake Prison Captured (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, March 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — One day after a successful raid and jailbreak, insurgents laid siege to another prison facility Wednesday. Police said U.S. troops and a special Iraqi unit overwhelmed the gunmen and captured 50 of them at the detention center south of Baghdad.

The pre-dawn attack came a day after 100 Sunni gunmen freed 33 prisoners and wrecked the jail, police station and courthouse in Muqdadiyah. The town is northeast of the capital, about an hour's drive from the Iranian border.

Sixty militants participated in Wednesday's assault, which aimed to free more jailed insurgent fighters, police said.

Meanwhile, the United States' top military commander said he had underestimated the extent of Iraqi reluctance to form a government and end sectarian bloodshed.

“I think that I certainly did not understand the depth of fear that was generated by the decades of Saddam's rule,” said Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. “I think a lot of Iraqis have been in the wait-and-see mode longer than I thought they would.”

DOJ_NMG_0020334

Pace said one solution was for the Iraqis to recruit more Sunnis into the army and for police forces to balance Shiite domination.

"A unit that has all (sects of) Iraqis embedded in it is better able to handle whatever kind of strife comes along," Pace said.

The Bush administration views formation of a broad-based government as a first step in quelling violence and allowing the start of a withdrawal of American armed forces.

While the U.S. military has touted its progress in training the Iraqi army and police, a top expert on Iraq said the forces remained poorly matched against the insurgency and al-Qaeda.

"The police have almost no protected vehicles, few heavy weapons similar to those of insurgents, are often located in extremely vulnerable buildings and have weak communications. Corruption is a major issue," Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic & International Studies, a Washington think tank, wrote this week.

Wednesday's attack on the prison in Madain, 15 miles southeast of Baghdad, began with insurgents firing 10 mortar rounds. They later stormed the facility, which is run by the Interior Ministry.

Four police officers — including the commander of the special unit — died in a two-hour gunbattle, which was subdued after American forces arrived. Among the 50 captured, police said, was one Syrian.

The U.S. military did not respond to a request for comment about its role in the counterattack.

Madain is at the northern tip of Iraq's Sunni-dominated "Triangle of Death," a farming region that has been rife with sectarian violence — retaliatory kidnappings and killings in the conflict between Sunnis and Shiites.

Police have discovered hundreds of corpses in the past four weeks, victims of religious militants conducting revenge killings. At least 21 bodies were found Wednesday, including those of 16 Shiite pilgrims discovered on a Baghdad highway, police said. Millions were returning home Wednesday at the conclusion of an important Shiite commemoration in the holy city of Karbala this week. Elsewhere:

·In the northern town of Beiji, a mortar fell on a government facility that Deputy Prime Minister Ahmad Chalabi was visiting Wednesday, an aide told the Associated Press. Chalabi was not harmed and later returned to Baghdad, the aide said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information.

Another Police Station Attacked (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — Heavily armed insurgents launched a frontal assault Wednesday on a police station near Baghdad, killing a battalion commander and three of his men in the second such large-scale operation in two days.

Meanwhile, separate rebel attacks on two vehicles in the capital killed 15 pilgrims returning from the southern city of Karbala — the deadliest incident of this week's annual mourning period observed by millions of Shiite Muslims.

The bloodshed demonstrated the continuing insurgent threat on multiple fronts. In the month since they blew up the Golden Mosque, a Shiite shrine in Samarra, Sunni Arab insurgents have been locked with Shiite militias in an escalating communal conflict that has led to the killing of hundreds of Iraqis of both sects, many of them unarmed and ambushed on the road or dragged from their homes in the night.

The bodies of 11 men were found Wednesday in various parts of Baghdad, some of them blindfolded and bearing signs of torture.

Insurgents also have staged daring attacks on Iraqi government and U.S. targets.

The latest was a predawn raid Wednesday by dozens of insurgents on the police facility in Madaen, 15 miles southeast of the capital. Their exact number was unclear because of the darkness. The city is at the northern tip of the so-called triangle of death, a mostly Sunni region rife with sectarian violence.

The Madaen attack was slightly smaller in scale than the dawn raid Tuesday on a judicial and police compound in Muqdadiya, 60 miles northeast of Baghdad, in which at least 17 policemen and guards were killed and 33 prisoners freed.

Emerging from a nearby palm grove, the attackers in Madaen fired 14 mortar rounds into the compound, which houses City Hall and a police battalion, triggering a two-hour shootout that lasted until daybreak, the Interior Ministry said.

The insurgents also fired grenade launchers and automatic rifles but failed to overrun the compound. In addition to the four police officers killed, five were wounded. There was no word on insurgent casualties.

Later in the day, police raided homes in the area and detained 76 men for questioning, the ministry said. One was identified as a Syrian who was carrying insurgent leaflets.

Iraqi police and soldiers have been stretched thin trying to guard the estimated 2 million black-clad pilgrims who walked to and from Karbala this week to mark the 40th and final day of the annual mourning period for Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

Insurgents with machine guns fired into a bus taking pilgrims home Wednesday through Baghdad's Sunni-dominated Amiriya district. Fourteen people were killed and 18 wounded, police said. Two police officers died in a shootout with the assailants.

One pilgrim was killed and 22 were wounded in a later attack on a pickup truck in the capital's Adil neighborhood, police said.

At least five other Iraqis were reported killed Wednesday, including an interpreter for two British soldiers whose foot patrol was hit by a roadside bomb blast in the southern city of Basra. Both soldiers were wounded.

Make The President Prime Minister . . . (WSJ)

By Dan Senor And Roman Martinez

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Three months after Iraqis turned out in record numbers to vote, Iraq is still without a new government at the exact time it faces increasingly vicious sectarian violence. The core of the impasse is the selection of Iraq's next prime minister. The United Iraqi Alliance (UIA), the fractious coalition of religious Shiite parties that won the largest share of seats, is bitterly divided over its candidate. Last month, it renominated Ibrahim Jaafari, the incumbent prime minister. But the internal ballot was decided by a single vote, following a campaign which some claim was marred by threats of violence from the radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

More importantly, a coalition of Kurdish, Sunni and secular-nationalist parties has united to oppose Mr. Jaafari's reappointment. Their threat to block his nomination carries real force, as Iraq's new constitution requires a two-thirds supermajority of parliament to approve the new government. Surprisingly, the UIA has offered only a tepid defense of its nominee, and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani has declined entreaties to intervene and unite the religious Shiites behind Mr. Jaafari.

There is, however, a creative solution to the impasse. Instead of sticking with Mr. Jaafari, the UIA and the other leading parties should consider a compromise that marks a clear break from the status quo. Mr. Jaafari could agree to become Iraq's new president, and Jalal Talabani, the current president and a Kurd, could become prime minister -- a switch. Such a deal would install an Iraqi leader genuinely capable of getting along with all ethnic and sectarian factions, allow Mr. Jaafari to save face by not losing out to a fellow Shiite, and show Sunni Arab politicians that their participation in last December's vote is paying political dividends.

Few doubt Mr. Talabani's capacity for leadership. Large and gregarious, with a dominant and energetic personality that belies his 72 years, he is widely regarded as Iraq's most talented retail politician. A lawyer who spent years fighting Saddam, he is a forceful advocate for moderation and democratic values. He is also among the handful of Iraqi leaders with the political stature to lead a true national-unity government. He could likely attract such disparate and talented figures as Ahmad Chalabi and former PM Ayad Allawi into his cabinet, in addition to technocrats from other political factions.

Objections to Mr. Talabani would center on ethnicity and religion, not ability. Ordinarily, Iraq's predominantly Arab population would think twice about elevating a Kurd to lead the government. But he could be the exception. In today's Iraq, intra-Arab (Shiite-Sunni) tensions have proven to be the most dangerous flashpoints, and Mr. Talabani is one of the few leaders who gets along with all groups. Indeed, in the recent Shiite-Sunni violence, he has played a key "shuttle diplomacy" role to lower tensions.

Elevating Mr. Talabani to Iraq's premiership would upend assumptions about religion as well. Since Iraq's liberation, conventional wisdom has had it that the premier must come from the long-suffering Shiite community. This was a logical starting point -- after all, the Shiites were marginalized under Saddam's dictatorship, despite making up roughly 60% of Iraq's population.But it no longer makes sense today. The political opposition to Mr. Jaafari's nomination is too strong to be ignored. One possible solution would be to replace him with another Shiite candidate from the UIA, such as Vice President Adil Abdel Mahdi. In sharp contrast to Mr. Jaafari, he is widely respected within leadership circles; he has close relations with the other political factions and is one of Iraq's most influential and effective backroom dealmakers.

But Mr. Mahdi is a member of the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (Sciri), the chief rival to the Sadrists for political leadership of the Shiite community. He was also recently defeated by Mr. Jaafari in an internal UIA ballot. It is almost impossible to imagine that Mr. Jaafari -- whose self-regard is legendary -- would voluntarily step down in favor of his long-time rival. Mr. Mahdi could also be a difficult choice for Sunnis to accept, given Sciri's control over sectarian militias now accused of abusing human rights. Other candidates within the UIA simply lack the political heft to lead the Shiite coalition.

Yet a Talabani candidacy could allow each of the leading factions to claim a victory. Mr. Jaafari is well-suited to assume Iraq's presidency, a largely ceremonial role with little oversight of policy. He could give long and flowery public addresses, without the burden of responsibility for managing the day-to-day affairs. Mr. Mahdi, a close Talabani ally, could become deputy prime minister. His low-key, technocratic style would make him the ideal COO to Mr. Talabani's CEO.

By lowering the stakes in the UIA internal power struggle, a Kurdish PM could help promote political harmony within the Shiite community -- a key goal of its spiritual leader, Grand Ayatollah Sistani. The Shiite alliance would retain a majority of cabinet posts elsewhere in the government, in keeping with their share of the votes last December. Iraq's Sunni community would also welcome a Talabani-led government. Despite their longstanding fears of Kurdish separatism, Sunni leaders now see Shiite sectarianism as the greatest threat. Mr. Talabani's moderation would be viewed as a welcome development. Just as important, it would provide a clear deliverable for Sunni politicians to take to their voters, and would demonstrate the value of their decision to take part in last year's election.

The time has come for Iraq's leaders to break out of the ethnic and sectarian straitjacket constraining talks over the new government. By uniting around a Talabani-led coalition government, Iraqi leaders can move to address the pressing security challenges now facing their country. The clock is ticking.

Chicago Sun-Times, March 23, 2006

While officials privately debate whether communitarian violence in Iraq constitutes a low-grade civil war, there is no disagreement about the oil crisis there, which has little to do with the insurgency. Gasoline and home heating fuel are scarce and expensive, thanks to runaway corruption. This problem's difficulty and importance will test the new Iraqi government once it is organized.

Industry sources privately cite corruption as the reason for recent decisions by Turkey and Saudi Arabia to halt gasoline exports to Iraq for nonpayment of bills. That exacerbates a worsening situation where Iraq, one of the world's great petroleum producers, has to truck in gasoline from Kuwait.

While the formal line in Washington and Baghdad blames insurgents for the oil crisis, U.S. officials who are close to the situation gave me a totally different explanation. They blame corruption at every level, from the oil ministry on down, that is common to Iraq. It cannot be controlled by the Americans but is the responsibility of the long-delayed Iraqi government. Thus, oil is a microcosm of the overall conundrum in Iraq, where there are no good options for the Bush administration in dealing with a culture where honesty and efficiency historically have been rare.

The exhilaration in the Bush administration that the Anglo-American attack in 2003 had preserved the oil-producing capacity is as illusory as claims of victory three years ago. The fuel shortages in oil-rich Iraq are profound and growing worse, with endless lines at gasoline stations. That drives up prices to the equivalent of $15 for a cylinder of home fuel -- too expensive for the average Iraqi.

The best explanation for this was given to me by a non-political U.S. civil servant, an "Arabist" with vast experience in the region. He has been ordered definitively to say nothing and write nothing about oil in Iraq or anything else to do with the country. He spoke to me only if I would not identify him, by name or organization.

My source blamed corruption on an unimaginable level. "There is no system for turning on the oil in Iraq," he told me. "Everyone there is taking their cut. Everybody takes a little." It is corruption from top to bottom. At a time of an acute shortage in Iraq, oil is being surreptitiously sent across the border for gain.

Such corruption is familiar there. The situation is endemic in the brief, tragic history of Iraq. Since the discovery of the country's liquid wealth, government officials have been dipping into the proceeds. This was true during the monarchy and the successor governments, including Saddam Hussein's. The addiction to corruption also contributed to the United Nations oil-for-food scandal.

The immediate crying need of Iraq's oil industry three years after the invasion is for substantial investment in improvements for infrastructure and technology. It was assumed that once the dictatorial regime was displaced, money from all over the world would pour into Iraq. But there is no inclination by risk capital to put any money in enterprises that are bleeding money to corrupt officials throughout the government.

Everybody with any familiarity with this situation believes the only answer is that the new Iraqi government, still unformed three months after the election, must gain control over corruption. One former U.S. official with experience in Iraq says: "We really have no levers left to pull, except hope that the government we're backing becomes powerful enough to take on the crooks."

Sen. Chuck Hagel, a frequent visitor to Iraq, is well aware of this dilemma. "The future of Iraq is in the hands of the Iraqis," he told me. Hagel is not yet ready to call for a unilateral military withdrawal from Iraq, realizing that the dreary conditions there -- including the oil crisis -- would get worse if the United States disconnected today. The pocketing of oil revenues by corrupt bureaucrats will hardly be improved by a quick American exit.

I erred in Monday's column when I wrote that President Bush was mistaken in saying the Hungarian National Day event he attended at the Capitol March 15 celebrated the 50th anniversary of Hungary's 1956 anti-Soviet rebellion. March 15 is actually the anniversary of the 1848 Hungarian Revolution, but the invitation to the president noted the Oct. 23, 1956, uprising.

Ex-Iraqi Official Unveiled As Spy (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's last foreign minister, Naji Sabri, was a paid spy for French intelligence, which later turned him over to the CIA to supply information about Iraq and its chemical, biological and nuclear weapons programs more than six months before the war began in March 2003, according to former senior intelligence officials.

Although some CIA officials met informally with Sabri, who traveled extensively outside Iraq, the French and the CIA used a third-country intermediary when attempting to get information from him about Hussein's inner circle and weapons programs, according to the retired officials who refused to be identified because the information is classified.

"It was never clear what he wanted," one former official familiar with the situation said of Sabri, "but we never paid him." Sabri's role in providing information to the United States was reported by NBC News on Tuesday.

Over the summer of 2002, Sabri, as foreign minister, negotiated the terms U.N. inspectors' return to Iraq, and in November 2002 he announced Hussein's acceptance of the proposal.

Publicly Sabri was insisting that Iraq had no prohibited weapons of mass destruction. Privately, the sources said, he provided information that the Iraqi dictator had ambitions for a nuclear program but that it was not active, and that no biological weapons were being produced or stockpiled, although research was underway.

When it came to chemical weapons, Sabri told his handler that some existed but they were not under military control, a former intelligence official familiar with the situation said. Another former official added: "He said he had been told Hussein had them dispersed among some of the loyal tribes."

At the time, the Bush administration was preparing for the coalition's invasion of Iraq and publicly insisting that Hussein had reconstituted nuclear programs and was concealing from United Nations inspectors both chemical and biological weapons in violation of Security Council resolutions. The White House, which was seeking a congressional resolution that would permit the use of force against Iraq, hoped Sabri would defect, the two former officials said.

"They wanted a big public defection, which would have been good for the policy," one official said. But Sabri comes from a prominent Iraqi family and defection was not an option, one of the former officials said.

The White House was far more interested in trying to get Sabri to defect than in the information he was providing on Iraq's weapons programs, in part because the intelligence community did not trust him, another former intelligence official said.

Sabri took office in fall 2001 after a major housecleaning of Hussein's foreign affairs team. A diplomat with an Iraqi Christian background, Sabri once taught English literature at Baghdad University and was director general of the information ministry during the Persian Gulf War. His brother was one of the Iraqi officials that Hussein had killed because of alleged disloyalty.

Sabri was described as "smart and smooth" by a U.N. official who dealt with him, and as "a type that appeals to Westerners." According to a former intelligence officer, Sabri went out of his way to spend time with Americans and others when he was a diplomatic official in Vienna.

In a speech in February 2004, then-CIA Director George J. Tenet referred to Sabri, although not by name, when he said the CIA had obtained information from "a source who had direct access to Saddam and his inner circle." Tenet said that source described Hussein as covertly seeking to get a nuclear weapon and having stockpiled chemical weapons while his scientists were only "dabbling" with biological weapons development with little success.

Army Dog Handler Gets Six Months In Prison (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Military jurors sentenced an Army dog handler to less than six months behind bars yesterday for using his Belgian shepherd to intimidate detainees at the Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, one of the lightest sentences so far for a soldier implicated in the notorious abuse.

Sgt. Michael J. Smith, 24, was ordered to serve 179 days in confinement and to forfeit $2,250 in pay for convictions on five criminal counts, including maltreatment of detainees, dereliction of duty and an indecent act. Smith will also be reduced to the rank of private, E-1, and will receive a bad-conduct discharge at the end of his prison term, according to an Army spokeswoman at Fort Meade, where the court-martial ended yesterday. The jury could have sent Smith to prison for as long as 8 1/2 years.

The sentence was the lightest given to any of the four military police soldiers who have gone to trial, rather than entered guilty pleas, for abuse at Abu Ghraib. The jury of four officers and three senior noncommissioned officers decided Smith's use of his military working dog was out of bounds but not especially egregious, acquitting him on half of the original charges. Smith was also the first soldier to have had the benefit of a senior officer testifying, with Col. Thomas M. Pappas taking some responsibility for ordering the use of dogs in interrogations in late 2003 without clearly defining rules for the aggressive tactic.

Former corporal Charles A. Graner Jr. received the longest sentence, 10 years, for abuse at Abu Ghraib that included piling naked detainees into a pyramid, and former private first class Lynndie R. England was sentenced to three years in prison for her role. They were both denied the opportunity to call senior officials from the prison in their defense. Former specialist Sabrina D. Harman also received six months after being found guilty at trial.

Several others pleaded guilty to abuse, with former staff sergeant Ivan L. Frederick receiving the longest sentence among them, 8 1/2 years. Pappas took an administrative punishment, which included an $8,000 fine and relief from command of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade.

Smith's sentence is the second relatively short term handed down in recent months by a jury weighing abuse charges. In January, a military jury in Colorado convicted an interrogator of killing a detainee at a facility near the Syrian border while using an aggressive technique, but declined to sentence him to jail time after hearing testimony that superior officers had condoned the method.

In Smith's case, testimony reflected confusion at the prison about the use of dogs. Smith's dog, Marco, was shown in one of the well-publicized Abu Ghraib photographs, snarling just inches away from the face of a frightened detainee. Officers, including Pappas, acknowledged that the animals were brought in to help control prisoners, and others testified that the dogs were deterrents to detainee violence. Smith's defense attorneys said he was using the dog the way he was supposed to: allowing it to bark and snarl at detainees to scare them.

Prosecutors, however, said Smith was a "rogue" soldier who engaged in a contest with another dog handler to get detainees to soil themselves. They said last week that Smith never had authority to use his dog the way he did, and they likened him to a bad cop amusing himself at the expense of the detainees in his charge.

Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, another dog handler at the prison who was captured in a few pictures of alleged abuse, is scheduled to go to court-martial on similar charges in May. Among the charges Smith was acquitted of this week was abusing a detainee that Cardona is accused of mistreating in the same incident.

Harvey Volzer, a civilian lawyer who represents Cardona, said yesterday that he thinks top officials have pushed a policy of abuse for which front-line soldiers are taking the heat.

"I would like to see someone in command admit that they intended to end the war and gain Iraqi freedom more expeditiously by using the dogs to get better intelligence," Volzer said. "Instead, everyone from [President] Bush down is perfectly content to allow enlisted persons to be scapegoats for their actions."

Iraq Abuse Trial Is Again Limited To Lower Ranks (NYT)

By Eric Schmitt

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

With the conviction on Tuesday of an Army dog handler, the military has now tried and found guilty another low-ranking soldier in connection with the pattern of abuses that first surfaced two years ago at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

But once again, an attempt by defense lawyers to point a finger of responsibility at higher-ranking officers failed in the latest case to convince a military jury that ultimate responsibility for the abuses lay farther up the chain of command.

Some military experts said one reason there had not been attempts to pursue charges up the military chain of command was that the military does not have anything tantamount to a district attorney's office, run by commanders with the authority to go after the cases.

"The real question is, who is the independent prosecutor who is liberated to pursue these cases," said Eugene Fidell, a specialist in military law. "There is no central prosecution office run by commanders. So you don't have a D.A. thinking, I'm going to follow this wherever it leads."

Among all the abuse cases that have reached military courts, the trial of the dog handler, Sgt. Michael J. Smith, had appeared to hold the greatest potential to assign accountability to high-ranking military and perhaps even civilian officials in Washington. Some military experts had thought the trial might finally explore the origins of the harsh interrogation techniques that were used at Abu Ghraib; at the Bagram detention center in Afghanistan; and at other sites where abuses occurred.

Sergeant Smith, who was convicted Tuesday for abusing detainees in Iraq with his black Belgian shepherd, had said he was merely following interrogation procedures approved by the chief intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib, Col. Thomas M. Pappas. In turn, Colonel Pappas had said he had been following guidance from Maj. Gen. Geoffrey D. Miller, commander of the military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who in September 2003 visited Iraq to discuss ways to "set the conditions" for enhancing prison interrogations, as well as from superiors in Baghdad.

General Miller had been dispatched to Guantánamo Bay by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and the Joint Chiefs of Staff to improve the interrogation procedures and the quality of intelligence at the compound in Cuba.

But in Sergeant Smith's trial, General Miller was never called to testify. Colonel Pappas acknowledged that he had mistakenly authorized a one-time use of muzzled dogs to keep prisoners in order outside their cells, but he said that he had no idea that dog handlers were using unmuzzled dogs to terrorize detainees as part of the interrogation process. Colonel Pappas had previously been reprimanded and relieved of his command, but was permitted to testify under a grant of immunity.

Previous defendants who have tried and failed to win approval from military judges to summon high-ranking officers to explain their own role in abuse cases include Charles A. Graner Jr. and Lynndie R. England, two of the Army reservists who were convicted in 2005 for their misconduct at Abu Ghraib. In denying defense requests for testimony from witnesses including Mr. Rumsfeld and Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, formerly the top American commander in Iraq, an Army judge, Col. James Pohl, ruled that their actions did not have any direct bearing on the reservists' conduct.

In a telephone interview on Wednesday, Maj. Wayne Marotto, an Army spokesman, said that more than 600 accusations of detainee abuse in Iraq and Afghanistan since October 2001 had been investigated, and that 251 officers and enlisted soldiers had been punished in some way for misconduct related to prisoners. To date, the highest-ranking officer convicted in relation to the abuses is Capt. Shawn Martin of the Army, who was found guilty last March of kicking detainees and staging the mock execution of a prisoner. He was sentenced to 45 days in jail and fined $12,000.

Sergeant Smith had faced a maximum sentence of eight and a half years, but on Wednesday was sentenced to just under six months (179 days) in prison.

"A mere tap on the wrist for abusing prisoners gives the appearance that once again that the United States is not serious about its responsibility to discipline those convicted of human rights violations," Curt Goering, Amnesty International's senior deputy executive director for policy and programs, said in a statement.

Sergeant Smith will also be demoted to private, fined $2,250 and will be released from the Army with a bad-conduct discharge after serving his sentence.

Several generals and colonels have received career-ending reprimands and have been stripped of their commands, but there is no indication that other senior-level officers and civilian officials will ever be held accountable for the detainee abuses that took place in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The toughest official criticism Mr. Rumsfeld has faced was a relatively mild admonishment in August 2004 from a panel led by former Defense Secretary James R. Schlesinger, which faulted Mr. Rumsfeld for not exercising sufficient oversight.

But when Mr. Schlesinger was asked at the time if Mr. Rumsfeld or other high-ranking officials should resign in an ultimate act of accountability, he said that the secretary's "resignation would be a boon for all of America's enemies." President Bush later declined to accept Mr. Rumsfeld's two offers to resign.

Congress has largely retreated from any meaningful effort to hold senior officials accountable. Last year, Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who heads the Armed Services Committee, vowed to hold hearings on senior-level accountability. But Mr. Warner later backed off his promise, saying it would have to wait until judicial and nonjudicial proceedings were exhausted, a process that could take several more months.

The Senate Armed Services Committee has delayed General Miller's scheduled retirement, and Mr. Warner said in an interview on Tuesday that he would call both Colonel Pappas and General Miller to testify before the committee once all court proceedings that could involve them are complete.

Two other cases may yield new information. Army officials are still reviewing a possible criminal case against Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, another former senior intelligence officer at Abu Ghraib.

The trial of a second dog handler, Sgt. Santos A. Cardona, is scheduled to begin on May 22, and it may offer another occasion for defense lawyers to try to direct blame at higher levels. Sergeant Cardona's lawyer, Harvey Volzer, said in a telephone interview on Wednesday that his defense would include information not revealed in Sergeant Smith's trial. Mr. Volzer said he would seek to have Mr. Rumsfeld, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the commander of American forces in the Mideast, and General Sanchez all testify at Sergeant Cardona's trial.

Army Dog Handler Gets 6 Months For Iraq Abuse (WT/AP)

By David Dishneau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

FORT MEADE, Md. -- An Army dog handler was sentenced yesterday to nearly six months in prison for tormenting Abu Ghraib prisoners with his snarling Belgian shepherd.

Sgt. Michael J. Smith, 24, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., was ordered to serve 179 days in prison and was reduced to the rank of private. He also will forfeit $750 per month of his pay for three months and receive a bad-conduct discharge after his release from prison.

Under military law, a prison sentence and a bad-conduct discharge requires Smith to forfeit all pay during his time in prison, despite the jury's sentence, said Lt. Col. Bobbi Davis, a military legal specialist.

Smith had faced up to 8½ years in prison after his conviction Tuesday on five of the 13 offenses with which he was charged.

The jury convicted Smith of conspiring with another dog handler to try to frighten detainees into soiling themselves and directing his dog to lick peanut butter off of other soldiers' bodies.

In closing arguments, prosecutors urged the panel of four officers and three senior noncommissioned officers to send Smith to prison for at least three years, followed by a bad-conduct discharge. Maj. Matthew Miller, a prosecution lawyer, said such a sentence would send a message that such actions will not be tolerated.

"Every soldier must understand that individual acts of misconduct have strategic implications," Maj. Miller said. "This is a global war on terror. It is a global battle for the hearts and minds of people all over the world."

But the defense said Smith should serve no jail time and instead be returned to his family and his unit. Capt. Scott Rolle, Smith's attorney, told the jury that while Smith made mistakes at Abu Ghraib, he also is "a hero," decorated for saving the lives of other U.S. soldiers during a mortar attack.

Smith appeared unrepentant about the abuse charges when he addressed the jury Tuesday, shortly after he was convicted.

"Soldiers are not supposed to be soft and cuddly," he said.

He said he wished he had gotten his orders in writing for self-protection because soldiers who do not "end up in a heap of trouble."

The relatively light sentence surprised Eugene R. Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice in the District, who said he thought Smith would get years, not months, of confinement.

"I think people around the world are going to be scratching their heads at that sentence," he said. "The conduct of which this soldier was convicted is highly offensive, and if this is all one gets, it's not impunity, but it's getting real close."

Nine other soldiers have been convicted of abusing prisoners at Abu Ghraib, in many cases by forcing them to assume painful positions and humiliate themselves sexually while being photographed. Former Cpl. Charles Graner Jr. received the longest sentence -- 10 years in prison. Lynndie England, 23, a reservist photographed giving a thumbs-up in front of naked prisoners, is serving three years behind bars.

The Joy Of Being Blameless (NYT)

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The contrast could not have been more stark, nor the message more clear. On the day that a court-martial imposed justice on a 24-year-old Army sergeant for tormenting detainees at Abu Ghraib with his dog, President Bush said once again that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, whose benighted policies and managerial incompetence led to the prisoner abuse scandal, was doing a "fine job" and should stay at his post.

We've seen this sorry pattern for nearly two years now, since the Abu Ghraib horrors first shocked the world: President Bush has clung to the fiction that the abuse of prisoners was just the work of a few rotten apples, despite report after report after report demonstrating that it was organized and systematic, and flowed from policies written by top officials in his administration.

Just this week, Eric Schmitt and Carolyn Marshall provided a bloodcurdling account in the Times of how a Special Operations unit converted an Iraqi military base into a torture chamber, even using prisoners as paintball targets, in its frenzy to counter a widely predicted insurgency for which Mr. Rumsfeld had refused to prepare. In early 2004, an 18-year-old man suspected of selling cars to members of a terrorist network was arrested and beaten repeatedly. Another man said he had been forced to strip, punched in the spine until he fainted, put in front of an air-conditioner while cold water was poured on him and kicked in the stomach until he vomited. His crime? His father had worked for Saddam Hussein.

These accounts are tragically familiar. The names and dates change, but the basic pattern is the same, including the fact that this bestiality produced little or no useful intelligence. The Bush administration decided to go outside the law to deal with prisoners, and soldiers carried out that policy. Those who committed these atrocities deserve the punishment they are getting, but virtually all high-ranking soldiers have escaped unscathed. And not a single policy maker has been called to account.

Col. Thomas Pappas, the former intelligence chief at Abu Ghraib, testified at the dog handler's trial that the use of dogs had grown out of conversations he had had with military jailers from Guantánamo Bay led by Maj. Gen. Geoffrey Miller, who had been sent to Iraq to instruct soldiers there in the interrogation techniques refined at Gitmo under Mr. Rumsfeld's torture-is-legal policy. Colonel Pappas said General Miller had explained how to use the "Arab fear of dogs" to set up interrogations.

What of General Miller? He invoked his right against self-incrimination to avoid testifying, and Time magazine reported this week that he was exonerated by an Army whitewash. Apparently he was not responsible for the actions of soldiers operating under rules he put in place.

About the only high-ranking officer whose career has suffered over Abu Ghraib is Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, who was the commander in Iraq at the time. General Sanchez should certainly take responsibility, but he was also a victim of administration blunders.

General Sanchez was vaulted inappropriately from head of the First Armored Division to overall commander because Mr. Bush declared "mission accomplished": the war's over. He was then denied the staff, soldiers and equipment he needed to deal with the insurgency that quickly broke out and produced thousands of prisoners.

Mr. Bush has refused to hold himself or any of his top political appointees accountable for those catastrophic errors. Indeed, he has promoted many of them. And this is not an isolated problem. It's just one example, among many, of how this president's men run no risk of being blamed for anything that happens, not matter how egregious.

Desire To 'Serve My Country' Cited By Volunteers For Duty In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Almost 1,000 members of the U.S. Foreign Service have volunteered for duty in Iraq since 2003. The Foreign Service Journal, the magazine of the American Foreign Service Association, recently surveyed active-duty Foreign Service officers (FSOs) about their tour there. Fifty-seven who replied served or currently serve in Iraq either at the embassy in Baghdad or elsewhere in the country. Here are some of their responses, as excerpted from an article in the March issue by Shawn Dorman, titled "Iraq Service and Beyond."

What motivated you to volunteer for Iraq service?

The most frequently stated response was, in various iterations, "to serve my country." Many spoke of a desire to serve where they are most needed. Some respondents mentioned an additional hope that Iraq service would be career-enhancing, while others pointed to the financial incentives.

How does the way you work in Iraq differ from the way you worked at other posts?

The three top ways working in Iraq differs from other places, according to the respondents, are: the level of danger, the extreme work hours and the non-integrated command structure between the embassy, the military and the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office.

Another factor raised by many survey respondents was the impact of having so many appointees and contractors at the mission, many of whom have never served in an embassy or overseas before.

One officer notes the difference by describing a trip to the Red Zone he had just taken the day before to meet with an Iraqi contact. (The Red Zone is all of Iraq outside the protected central-Baghdad area known unofficially as the Green Zone and officially as the International Zone.)

"I traveled to the meeting with three armored vehicles and 14 fully-armed contractors in assault gear as my personal security escort. I was met by six more of the same at the site who had secured the building before my arrival. As we entered Check Point One on our return to the International Zone, a car bomb detonated at Check Point Two, killing two and injuring many more. Timing is everything."

Many respondents commented on the "extreme" work hours. It is clear that the pace in Baghdad is frenetic and the flow of incoming taskings is relentless.

"The day begins at 8 a.m. or before, with meetings scheduled as late as 8 p.m.," explains an FSO serving in Baghdad. "People routinely work until 11 p.m., and there never seems to be a break. It creates a kind of Vegas casino atmosphere where you don't know if it's night or day outside because the activity level is constant. We have Friday 'off' but since Washington works on Friday, we need to be here then as well."

Are you able to do your job effectively, as one might expect at another post if you had the same portfolio? Can you see or talk to the people you need to? Can you communicate effectively with them (i.e., in Arabic, English)?

The most common response to the question about effectiveness was a conditional yes. The security situation is by far the most limiting factor. This includes both the difficulty of arranging meetings outside the Green Zone and the restrictions resulting from traveling to those meetings with armed guards.

DOJ_NMG_0020342

"Extreme perseverance, determination and stubbornness are required to overcome the myriad of difficulties of performing diplomatic duties," writes an FSO serving in Baghdad. "However, often security restrictions keep us overly locked down and in a bubble, where we cannot accurately track or influence events."

Do security precautions limit your ability to do your job, and if so, how?

"It is not possible to leave the Green Zone without bodyguards," says an FSO serving in Baghdad, "and it is necessary to request them at least two days prior to any trip out. Many times security conditions will make it necessary to cancel or postpone a planned trip. The heavy security presence that accompanies us into the Red Zone also puts a damper on meetings. These security precautions are, however, absolutely necessary. This is a war zone and there are people out there who are actively trying to kill us. Anyone who doubts the need for the security precautions in place should be immediately removed from the mission."

"Security limits my ability to work," writes one officer serving in Baghdad. "Iraqis don't want me to visit their ministry with my personal security detail in town because that makes them a target. At the same time it is such a hassle to put in for and be approved for a Personal Security Detail and to coordinate the movement. There is very little flexibility, so no spontaneous action is ever possible."

Is housing adequate and sufficiently secure?

Housing security is described by respondents as a significant problem for Foreign Service personnel serving in Baghdad who are not with USAID. Without being specific (though respondents were very specific) about the security problems, suffice it to say that most respondents feel that the trailers -- informally referred to as "hooches" -- are unsafe.

"Not only is housing inadequate," writes an FSO serving in Baghdad, "[but] basic privacy is not respected. The housing contractor, KBR, regularly goes into private housing for inspections without notice. Three such recent 'inspections' to my hooch did not result in needed repairs. When there is indirect mortar or rocket fire (a fairly common occurrence), the announcement tells us to seek cover under our beds (eight-inch clearance) or under our flimsy desks. I certainly do not feel safe when the entire hooch shakes violently from a nearby hit (five occurrences during four months so far)."

Many positions in Iraq have been and continue to be filled by non-career appointees, contractors and detailees from outside the Foreign Service. What has been the impact of this?

Out of some 2,000-plus people working on the U.S. embassy compound in Baghdad, fewer than 200 are career Foreign Service. Of course, at many embassies, State and the other foreign affairs agencies are a minority compared to the other federal agencies represented, but there is no other embassy in the world that is host to so many non-Foreign Service employees, political appointees and contractors.

"Frankly, I think a lot of the political appointees were disasters," writes an officer who served in Baghdad and other Iraqi cities. "They seemed to be ideologues rather than diplomats. A lot of the contractors and other detailees I met seemed quite capable."

Do you believe that Iraq service has helped or not helped your career? How?

Service in Iraq may give a boost for employees when they come up for review for promotion, but no conclusion could be drawn from the input we received on this question. For many people it is too early to tell what Iraq service will do for their career.

George Bush's Trillion-Dollar War (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Call it the trillion-dollar war.

George W. Bush's war in Iraq was never supposed to be particularly expensive. Administration types tossed out numbers like $50 billion and $60 billion. When Lawrence Lindsey, the president's chief economic adviser, said the war was likely to cost $100 billion to $200 billion, he was fired.

Some in the White House tried to spread the fantasy that Iraqi oil revenues would pay for the war. Paul Wolfowitz, the former deputy defense secretary and a fanatical hawk, told Congress that Iraq was "a country that can really finance its own reconstruction, and relatively soon."

The president and his hot-for-war associates were as wrong about the money as they were about the weapons of mass destruction.

Now comes a study by Joseph Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize-winning economist at Columbia University, and a colleague, Linda Bilmes of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, that estimates the "true costs" of the war at more than $1 trillion, and possibly more than $2 trillion.

"Even taking a conservative approach and assuming all U.S. troops return by 2010, we believe the true costs exceed a trillion dollars," the authors say.

DOJ_NMG_0020343

The study was released earlier this year but has not gotten much publicity. The analysis by Professors Stiglitz and Bilmes goes beyond the immediate costs of combat operations to include other direct and indirect costs of the war that, in some cases, the government will have to shoulder for many years.

These costs, the study says, "include disability payments to veterans over the course of their lifetimes, the cost of replacing military equipment and munitions, which are being consumed at a faster-than-normal rate, the cost of medical treatment for returning Iraqi war veterans, particularly the more than 7,000 [service members] with brain, spinal, amputation and other serious injuries, and the cost of transporting returning troops back to their home bases."

The study also notes that Defense Department expenditures that were not directly appropriated for Iraq have grown by more than 5 percent since the war began. But a portion of that increase has been spent "on support for the war in Iraq, including significantly higher recruitment costs, such as nearly doubling the number of recruiters, paying recruitment bonuses of up to $40,000 for new enlistees and paying special bonuses and other benefits, up to $150,000 for current Special Forces troops that re-enlist."

"Another cost to the government," the study says, "is the interest on the money that it has borrowed to finance the war."

Among the things taken into account by the study are some of the difficult-to-quantify but very real costs inflicted by the war on the American economy and society, such as the effect of the war on oil prices, and the economic loss that results from the many thousands of Americans wounded and killed in the war.

The study does not address the substantial costs of the war borne by Iraq or by any other countries besides the United States.

In an interview, Mr. Stiglitz said that about $560 billion, which is a little more than half of the study's conservative estimate of the cost of the war, would have been enough to "fix" Social Security for the next 75 years. If one were thinking in terms of promoting democracy in the Middle East, he said, the money being spent on the war would have been enough to finance a "mega-mega-mega-Marshall Plan," which would have been "so much more" effective than the invasion of Iraq.

It's not easy to explain just how much money $1 trillion really is. Imagine a stack of bills worth $1 million that is roughly six inches high. (Think big denominations — a mix of $100 bills and $1,000 bills, mostly $1,000's.) If the six-inch stack were enlarged to the point where it was worth $1 billion, it would be as tall as the Washington Monument, about 500 feet. If it were worth $1 trillion, the stack would be 95 miles high.

Ms. Bilmes said that the $1 trillion we're spending on Iraq amounts to about $10,000 for every household in the U.S.

At his press conference on Tuesday, President Bush made it clear that whatever the cost, American forces would not be leaving Iraq soon. When asked whether a day would come when there were no U.S. forces in Iraq, he said that decision would be made by future presidents and future governments of Iraq.

The meter's running. We're at a trillion dollars, and counting.

Bush, Rice Express Concern For Afghan (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

President Bush called on Afghanistan on Wednesday to respect the religious freedom of an Afghan citizen on trial for his life for converting from Islam to Christianity.

"We expect them to honor the universal principle of freedom," Bush said in a statement in Wheeling, W.Va., preceding a speech on Iraq. "I'm troubled when I hear, deeply troubled when I hear, the fact that a person who converted away from Islam may be held to account."

While not demanding that the trial be stopped and the defendant released, Bush said he wanted to make sure that "people are protected in their capacity to worship."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice followed up with a meeting with Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, whose government is an ally of the United States in the war on terror.

She told him she was deeply troubled by the case and called the prosecution "contrary to universal democratic values," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Rice also told Abdullah that those values include freedom of religion, which the United States fought for in Afghanistan and elsewhere, McCormack said.

And she told the foreign minister that the case ran contrary to the Afghan constitution.

The statements by Bush and Rice toughened the U.S. stance in a controversy that has spread beyond Southeast Asia, evoking statements of concern, for instance, in Germany and Italy.

On Tuesday, administration officials expressed respect for Afghanistan's sovereignty while also registering their concern over the case.

DOJ_NMG_0020344

The case involves a 41-year-old Afghan man, Abdul Rahman, who converted from Islam and was arrested last month after his family accused him of becoming a Christian. The conversion is a crime under Afghanistan's Islamic laws.

Abdullah made no statement after his meeting with Rice, which was not listed on her public schedule.

Here for strategic talks, Abdullah said Tuesday he hoped "through our constitutional process there will be a satisfactory result." He did not say whether he thought the defendant would be found innocent.

On Wednesday, the Afghan embassy responded to expressions of concern with a statement saying the Kabul government "is fully aware of and pursuing the best way to resolve Mr. Rahman's case judicially."

"It's too early to draw a conclusion about the punishment," the statement said.

But it said Rahman's mental fitness was being evaluated by the judicial system and that results may end the proceedings.

Michael Cromartie, chair of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, said in a statement he had written to Bush to express concern about the trial and the threatened execution of Rahman.

Cromartie told the president that the prosecutor had called Rahman "a microbe (who) should be cut off and removed from the rest of Muslim society and should be killed."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations issued a statement calling for Rahman's release. "Religious decisions should be matters of personal choice, not a cause for state intervention," the Muslim civil liberties group said.

Afghan Trial Of Christian 'Troubles' Bush (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

WHEELING, W. Va. -- President Bush yesterday said he was "deeply" troubled by the trial in Afghanistan of a Christian who could face execution for converting from Islam and vowed to pressure the Afghan government on the matter.

"It is deeply troubling that a country we helped liberate would hold a person to account because they chose a particular religion over another," Mr. Bush said.

Abdul Rahman could face the death penalty for rejecting Islam. He converted to Christianity 16 years ago while working for a Christian aid organization in Pakistan, but it just came to light recently during a custody battle over his two children.

While nations such as Italy and Germany lodged strong protests earlier this week against the trial, the U.S. State Department on Tuesday was more tepid, calling the case a matter for Afghan authorities.

Yesterday, Mr. Bush took a much firmer stance.

"We have got influence in Afghanistan, and we are going to use it to remind them that there are universal values," he said.

It appeared yesterday that Afghanistan was looking for a way out of the international furor over the matter. The Associated Press, reporting from Kabul, Afghanistan, quoted a prosecutor as saying Mr. Rahman may be mentally unfit for trial.

"We think he could be mad. He is not a normal person. He doesn't talk like a normal person," said the prosecutor, Sarinwal Zamari, while the AP also quoted a religious adviser to President Hamid Karzai as saying that Mr. Rahman will have an exam and that if he is deemed unfit, the case against him would be dropped.

Afghan Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah on Tuesday said that he understood American concerns but that the matterwas a legal one and the government "has nothing to do with it."

Prosecutors said the case against Mr. Rahman would be dropped if he converted back to Islam, but he has refused. The state-sponsored Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission has said Mr. Rahman violated Islamic law by converting to another religion and should be punished.

The trial has become a cause for Christians worldwide and for conservative groups in the United States, who demanded that the U.S. government intervene.

"Americans have not given their lives so that Christians can be put to death," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations, an American Muslim advocacy group, also joined the call for Mr. Rahman to be released.

"Islam advocates both freedom of religion and freedom of conscience," the group said.

The trial could be a stumbling block for Mr. Bush, who is traveling across the U.S. arguing that freedom and democracy are universal values and modern civil societies can rise from formerly oppressed Middle Eastern nations.

He has talked about allowing nations to form democracies in their own style, and often points to Japan's development of a "Japanese-style democracy" after World War II as a model.

But an Afghanistan-style democracy that includes trials of Christian converts is unacceptable to Mr. Bush's supporters.

"How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians?" Mr. Perkins said.

DOJ_NMG_0020345

Speaking in Wheeling at a town-hall-style event yesterday, Mr. Bush raised the issue himself, saying he was "deeply troubled."

But a firefighter in the audience challenged Mr. Bush to go further and reminded him that hundreds of firefighters died in the September 11 attacks by al Qaeda, whose leader, Osama bin Laden, was based in Afghanistan with the permission of the ruling Taliban.

"Do you have an army of sociologists to go over there and change that country, or are you hoping that in a couple decades that we can change the mind-set over there?" the firefighter asked.

"We can solve this problem by working closely with the government that we've got contacts with -- and will," Mr. Bush said. "We'll deal with this issue diplomatically and remind people that there is something as universal as being able to choose religion."

Being Christian In Afghanistan (TIME)

By Tony Karon

Time, March 22, 2006

When a Christian believer in a nation wholly dependent on U.S. support faces trial and possibly execution simply for embracing the same faith as the President of the United States, you'd think that country would be read the riot act. Instead, Washington's response to the trial in Afghanistan of Abdul Rahman has been rather muted. President Bush said Wednesday he was deeply troubled by the case and said he expected Afghanistan to "honor the universal principle of freedom." Undersecretary of State for Political Affairs Nicholas Burns has urged the Afghan authorities to follow what he said was their own constitution's commitment to the principle of freedom of worship, but added that the U.S. was not going to get involved in the case. "This is a case that is not under the competence of the United States," he said. "It is under the competence of the Afghan authorities. We hope that the Afghan constitution is going to be upheld, and in our view, if it is upheld, he will be found to be innocent."

Perhaps, but there's hardly any certainty over that outcome — even in the new Afghanistan liberated from the rule of the Taliban, personal status issues are governed by Islamic Sharia law rather than a civil code. And it's not clear how a conflict between Sharia and the Afghan constitution's embrace of U.N. Human Rights conventions that guarantee freedom of worship would be resolved. The country's chief justice, Fazl Hadi Shinwari, has no secular legal education, and had previously been the head of a Council of Islamic Scholars. He is also a close associate of Abdul-Rabb al-Rassul Sayyaf, by a mujahedeen warlord-turned-legislator who once had close ties with Osama bin Laden.

Rahman, 41, who converted to Christianity 16 years ago, has been charged in a case arising out of a custody dispute. He may avoid conviction, however, not because of constitutional provisions for freedom of religion, but because both the judge and prosecutors have questioned his sanity and his fitness to stand trial. "We think he could be mad," prosecutor Sarinwal Zamari told the AP. "He does not talk like a normal person." Rahman earlier told the court, "They want to sentence me to death and I accept it, but I am not a deserter and not an infidel. I am a Christian, which means I believe in the Trinity."

The subdued response of the Bush Administration, and the neutral stance taken by President Hamid Karzai, who has stressed that the matter must be left to the courts, underscores the political sensitivity of the case. Even after the Taliban's ouster, much of Afghanistan's political life is dominated by conservative Islamists. And successive Afghan governments have come out strongly against proselytizing by Christian missionary groups — they're willing to accept aid, but are hostile to any attempt to secure converts. That may fly in the face of the principle of religious freedom, just as the furor over the Danish cartoons challenged the principle of freedom of speech, but there's little doubt that any appearance of Western powers seeking to defend the right of Christians to proselytize in Muslim lands would touch off a similar response in places such as Afghanistan and Pakistan, frontline allies in the war on terror. The Abdul Rahman case highlights the limits on the freedom the U.S. has brought to Afghanistan, and will raise the ire of the Evangelical Christian political base of the GOP. But Washington will also be aware that the current political order may be as good as it gets right now, in terms of an Afghan government allied with the West. And if the priority is saving Mr. Rahman's life and preserving his freedom, turning the case into a "clash of civilizations" battle of wills may not be the most effective strategy.

Allies Troubled By Afghan Threat To Christian Convert From Islam (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The case of an Afghan man who could face the death penalty in his country for converting to Christianity from Islam has prompted a swift international outcry. President Bush said yesterday that he was "deeply troubled," and leaders of three other nations with troops in Afghanistan also voiced objections.

DOJ_NMG_0020346

The convert, Abdul Rahman, has been accused of apostasy and jailed, but not formally charged. In the United States this week, Christian talk shows and advocacy groups rallied their supporters, who flooded the White House and the Afghanistan Embassy with complaints.

The embassy released a statement yesterday saying that it was "too early" to draw conclusions, and that a judge was now "evaluating questions raised about the mental fitness of Mr. Rahman." The embassy said the results of that evaluation "may end the proceedings."

Mr. Rahman told a preliminary hearing in Afghanistan last week that he converted to Christianity about 15 years ago while working with a Christian aid group helping refugees. When he recently sought custody of his children from his parents, family members reported his conversion.

The prosecutor in the case called Mr. Rahman "a microbe" who "should be killed."

Although an American invasion overthrew the Taliban government four years ago, there are still judges who hold radical interpretations of Shariah, or Islamic law.

The case presents a challenge for President Hamid Karzai's government, which is dependent on foreign troops and foreign aid but insistent on the independence of its courts.

Mr. Bush, in a visit to Wheeling, W.Va., yesterday to rally support for the war in Iraq, said: "I'm troubled when I hear — deeply troubled when I hear that a person who has converted away from Islam may be held to account. That's not the universal application of the values that I talked about."

The United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, a bipartisan government group that works closely with the State Department, has previously warned that the Afghan Constitution does not adequately protect religious freedoms, said Tad Stahnke, the commission's deputy director for policy.

Officials from Germany, Italy and Canada, which all have troops serving in Afghanistan, have voiced their concerns to Mr. Karzai's government. The Italian foreign minister and deputy prime minister, Gianfranco Fini, said Tuesday that he had received assurance that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, but he did not elaborate.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations, based in Washington, called for Mr. Rahman's release, saying that the Koran supported religious freedom and that Islam was never compulsory. CAIR said its position was endorsed by the Fiqh Council of North America, a committee of Islamic legal scholars.

Karzai Shuffles Cabinet

By The New York Times

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 22 — President Hamid Karzai has proposing seven new names for his 25-member cabinet, officials said Wednesday.

Abdullah, Mr. Karzai's foreign minister for four years, was replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, Mr. Karzai's adviser on foreign affairs.

Outrage In Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

What's the point of the United States' propping up the government of Afghanistan if it's not even going to pretend to respect basic human rights? President Bush himself said it was "deeply troubling" that an Afghan man is facing the death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity.

In fact, the case is more than deeply troubling; it's barbaric, and we were glad that Mr. Bush promised yesterday to press for religious freedom in Afghanistan. The Afghan man, Abdul Rahman, was arrested two weeks ago. His parents reported him to the police for converting to Christianity 16 years earlier while working for a Christian aid organization in Peshawar, Pakistan. He was hauled before a judge, where he said he had no regrets. "If he doesn't revert back to Islam, he's going to receive the death penalty, according to the law," an Afghan Supreme Court judge told Agence France-Presse.

And maybe Afghanistan should also return to stoning women to death for adultery? The United States, Britain and every other country helping the Afghan government should take a hard look at its legal institutions. Muslim leaders would also do well to condemn this strongly; those who continue to hold the teachings of Islam hostage to intolerance do grievous harm to their religion.

There appears to be a move afoot to declare Mr. Rahman mentally incompetent as a way to avoid the mess. That would be a cheap trick because the law would remain on the books. Afghanistan is not the only American ally that enforces cruel religious laws. But this is a country that was liberated from the Taliban by American troops and whose tenuous peace is enforced by those troops. If Afghanistan wants to return to the Taliban days, it can do so without the help of the United States.

Afghan Foreign Minister To Be Replaced (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0020347

By Amir Shah, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

The man who has held Afghanistan's foreign minister post since the fall of the Taliban regime four years ago will be replaced in a Cabinet reshuffle, officials said Wednesday.

The changes are subject to parliament approval and will be presented to the body this week, said Khaleeq Ahmed, spokesman for President Hamid Karzai. The Cabinet is to be trimmed from 27 members to 26. Fourteen ministers have kept their jobs, four changed portfolios while eight are new faces, according to a list from Karzai's office.

Foreign Minister Abdullah Abdullah, who has had close ties with Washington, will be replaced by Rangeen Dadfar Spanta, a presidential adviser on foreign affairs. The move had been long anticipated because of an apparent falling out between Abdullah and Karzai over how the ministry was directing foreign affairs, observers say.

A senior Afghan official said the change was intended to make the Foreign Ministry more active in promoting the country's interests and in hopes of improving relations with other nations. He spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter.

Afghanistan's relations with neighboring Pakistan have deteriorated significantly in recent months because of a dispute over the movement of militants back and forth across their long, largely unguarded border.

Ties with another neighbor, Iran, have also been strained because of Karzai canceling a trip there in late January, allegedly because of pressure from the United States.

The incoming interior minister, Zarar Ahmad Moqbil, has been acting interior minister since September. The incumbent minister for women's affairs, Masooda Jalal, will be replaced by Surya Rahim Subhrang, a women's rights activist.

Among the key ministers who will keep their jobs are Counternarcotics Minister Habibullah Qaderi, Defense Minister Abdul Rahim Wardak and Economy Minister Amin Farhang.

Taliban Man At Yale (WSJ)

By John H. Fund

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Something is very wrong at our elite universities. Last month Larry Summers resigned as president of Harvard; today Libyan dictator Moammar Gadhafi will speak by video to a conference at Columbia University that his regime is cosponsoring. (Columbia won't answer questions about how much funding it got from Libya or what implied strings were attached.) Then there's Yale, which for three weeks has refused to make any comment or defense beyond a vague 144-word statement about its decision to admit Sayed Rahmatullah Hashemi -- a former ambassador-at-large of the murderous Afghan Taliban -- as a special student.

The three backers of the foundation that, along with Yale, is subsidizing Mr. Hashemi's tuition have told the Yale Daily News that they are withdrawing their support. But the university remains mute and paralyzed. "The intelligentsia haven't told Yalies what to think yet, because even they haven't made up their minds," says Yale professor David Gelernter. He clearly has: He calls the Taliban "an evil and macabre terrorist group. . . . The fact that Hashemi didn't do actual killing does not absolve him. Goebbels didn't shoot anyone either."

Universities are places where free inquiry, debate and information sharing are supposed to be guiding lights. In reality, the ivory towers too often now resemble dark castles, which raise their drawbridges at the first hint of criticism or scrutiny. Never has the moat separating elite universities from the rest of America been wider than in the case of Yale's Taliban Man.

In justifying its grant of a place to Mr. Hashemi, Yale has cited his approval by the State Department. And Yale's sole official statement says it hopes "his courses help him understand the broader context for the conflicts that led to the creation of the Taliban and to its fall. . . . Universities are places that must strive to increase understanding." That justification is unsettling to two women who will join voices at Yale tonight. Natalie Healy lost her Navy SEAL son Dan in Afghanistan last year when a Taliban rocket hit his helicopter. Ms. Healy, who notes that her son had four children of his own, is appalled at Yale's new student. "Lots of people could benefit from a Yale education, so why reward this man who was part of the group that killed Dan?" she told me. "I want to tell [Yale President] Richard Levin that his not allowing ROTC on campus is one thing, but welcoming a former member of the Taliban is deeply insulting to families who have children fighting them right now."

Ten days ago Ms. Healy met Malalai Joya, a member of Afghanistan's parliament, when she spoke near her home in Exeter, N.H. Tonight, Ms. Joya will speak at Yale on behalf of the Afghan Women's Mission. She is appalled that many people have forgotten the crimes of the Taliban, and was surprised to hear that Mr. Hashemi, who, like her, is 27 years old, is attending Yale. "He should apologize to my people and expose what he and others did under the Taliban," she told me. "He knew very well what criminal acts they committed; he was not too young to know. It would be better if he faced a court of justice than be a student at Yale University." * * *

Mr. Hashemi probably won't be attending Ms. Joya's lecture tonight. He has dodged reporters for three weeks, ever since his presence at Yale was revealed in a cover story in the New York Times Magazine. Some claim he has fully repented his Taliban past, but in his sole recent interview -- with the Times of London -- he acknowledged he'd done poorly in his class "Terrorism: Past, Present and Future," attributing that to his disgust with the textbooks: "They would say the Taliban were the same as al Qaeda." At the same time, Mr. Hashemi won't explain an essay he wrote late last year in which he called Israel "an American al Qaeda" aimed at the Arab world. When asked about the Taliban's public executions in Kabul's soccer stadium, he quipped: "There were also executions happening in Texas."

Given his record as a Taliban apologist, Mr. Hashemi has told friends he is stunned Yale didn't look more closely into his curriculum vitae. "I could have ended up in Guantanamo Bay," he told the New York Times. So how did he end up in the Ivy League? Questions start at the State Department's door. Sen. John Cornyn of Texas, chairman of the Judiciary Committee's border security panel, has asked the State Department and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to explain exactly how Mr. Hashemi got an F-1 student visa. Yale's decision tree is clearer. Richard Shaw, Yale's dean of undergraduate admissions until he took the same post at Stanford last year, told the New York Times that Yale had another foreigner of Mr. Hashemi's caliber apply but "we lost him to Harvard" and "I didn't want that to happen again." Mr. Shaw won't return phone calls now, but emails he's exchanged with others offer insights into his thinking.

The day after the New York Times profile appeared, Haym Benaroya, a professor at Rutgers, wrote to Mr. Shaw expressing disbelief that Mr. Hashemi, who has a fourth-grade education and a high school equivalency certificate, could be at Yale. Mr. Shaw replied that he indeed had "non-traditional roots [and] very little formal education but personal accomplishments that had significant impact." Mr. Benaroya was stupefied; did Mr. Shaw mean accomplishments that had a "positive impact, not terroristic and totalitarian impact"? Mr. Shaw responded: "Correct, and potential to make a positive difference in seeking ways towards peace and democracy. An education is a way toward understanding the complex nuances of world politics."

Back in the early 1990s, when he was dean of Yale College, Yale history professor Don Kagan warned about what he called the university's "mutual massage" between value-neutral professors and soft-minded students. He is even more critical now: "The range of debate on campus is more narrow than ever today, and the Taliban incident is a wake-up call that moral relativism is totally unexamined here. The ability of students to even think clearly about patriotism and values is being undermined by faculty members who believe that at heart every problem has a U.S. origin." Mr. Kagan isn't optimistic that Yale will respond to outside pressure. "They have a $15 billion endowment, and I know Yale's governing board is handpicked to lick the boots of the president," he told me. "The only way Yale officials can be embarrassed is if a major donor publicly declares he is no longer giving to them. Otherwise, they simply don't care what the outside world thinks."

But there may be one other source of worry for Yale. Mr. Hashemi told the New York Times that he will apply next month for sophomore status in Yale's full-degree program starting next fall. An admissions official told me Yale's plan all along was to do just that if his grades were acceptable. But next week, Yale will mail out 19,300 rejection letters to those who applied to be in its class of 2010. "I can't imagine it'll be easy for Yale to convince those it rejects that the Taliban student isn't taking a place they could have had," a former Yale administrator told me.

Former Yale president Benno Schmidt says admitting Mr. Hashemi is an exercise in "amorality and cynicism." He told me that "diversity simply cannot be allowed to trump all moral considerations."

It's not as if Yale can't muster moral indignation. Yale is divesting from Sudan, responding to pressure from student activists and labor unions. But when it comes to a former Taliban official, there is a desire to move on.

A case in point is Amy Aaland, executive director of Yale's Slifka Center for Jewish Life, where Mr. Hashemi takes his meals (Kosher complies with Islamic dietary laws). When I asked her if any of the revelations about his past disturb her, she noted that he was "very, very young" when he had been a Taliban official, and that "it's not like the Taliban attacked this country." I asked about the Taliban's decree in May 2001 that all non-Muslims -- chiefly Hindus -- had to wear yellow badges. The order, reminiscent of the Nazis, was met with global censure. A reporter then in Kabul recalls Mr. Hashemi had no trouble defending the decree as a protection for minorities against punishment by the religious police "until I pointed out it also required non-Muslims to move out of housing they shared with Muslims within three days; he didn't have a coherent response to that." Ms. Aaland absorbed all that I told her, and replied: "I don't expect learning to happen overnight." She still thought that "just living here, [Mr. Hashemi] can learn values and ideals from our society."

There is a line beyond which tolerance and political correctness become willful blindness. Eli Muller, a reporter for the Yale Daily News, was stunned back in 2000 when the lies of another Taliban spokesman who visited Yale "went nearly unchallenged." He concluded that the "moral overconfidence of Yale students makes them subject to manipulation by people who are genuinely evil." Today, you can say that about more than just some naïve students. You can add the administrators who abdicated their moral responsibility and admitted Mr. Hashemi.

D.C. Gets A Solicitor General (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Todd Kim has been appointed Solicitor General for the District of Columbia.

Mayor Anthony Williams announced Wednesdday that Kim will come over from the Justice Department on April third.

The solicitor general's office represents the District government in all appellate level court cases. Establishing the office is really a renaming of a branch of the D.C. Attorney General's office.

The measure is part of the mayor's continuing effort to reshape the District government to resemble state governments. The Office of Corporation Counsel was renamed the attorney general's office for the same reason in 2004.

Attorney General Robert Spagnoletti says it's critical that civil and criminal appeals be handled effectively.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron Ex-Treasurer Ties Lay, Skilling To Charges (WSJ)

By Gary McWilliams And Ann Davis

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON -- A high-ranking former Enron Corp. executive tied the company's former top executives, Kenneth Lay1 and Jeffrey Skilling2, to activities at the heart of the government's conspiracy and fraud allegations -- approving the improper use of reserves, misleading investors and hiding losses.

Describing his meetings with Messrs. Lay and Skilling, former company treasurer Ben Glisan Jr.3 alleged that the defendants authorized the use of accounting reserves to pad earnings and investment vehicles to hide losses. They also ignored calls to write down billions of dollars of soured investments, he alleged. (Excerpts from Glisan testimony4)

When Mr. Skilling was reviewing a plan in a 2000 board meeting to use Enron stock to hedge investments, he replied that he wouldn't recommend the plan "except that it allowed him to circumvent accounting rules," alleged Mr. Glisan. Mr. Lay's reaction to the idea was "to giggle...in delight," he added.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud and is serving a five-year prison sentence. He is expected to be extensively challenged when defense attorneys begin questioning him Thursday morning.

Late Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified he was told by two Enron executives of verbal "side" agreements guaranteeing an investment fund controlled by Enron's then-chief financial officer would not lose money on transactions with Enron. He said that Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey told him that Mr. Skilling had reviewed the side deals.

Mr. Glisan said he took notes on several such verbal agreements while acting as a middleman between the executives who negotiated them: Mr. Causey and the chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow5. Government attorneys showed the jury copies of the notes as well as Mr. Glisan's calendar entries that mentioned the side deals. Mr. Glisan testified that those deals were improper because they weren't documented in official Enron contracts. The government has argued that the side deals invalidated the transactions, which were used to bolster Enron's finances.

The former treasurer also alleged that in the fall of 2001, Mr. Lay vetoed having Enron take any write-downs larger than $1 billion in its troubled telecommunications, retail energy and international-power operations. Mr. Lay feared that a larger write-down would trigger a credit-rating downgrade that would cripple its money-making trading business, Mr. Glisan said.

He also testified that Mr. Skilling had earlier in the year estimated that the value of several Enron businesses had declined by as much as $5 billion, but concluded the company's finances were too fragile to support a full write-down. Mr. Skilling resigned in August 2001 and Mr. Lay was told of the needed write-downs at management meetings that month, Mr. Glisan said.

At a September 2001 management meeting, presided over by Mr. Lay, executives discussed a litany of business woes, with one saying "he was glad he didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself," testified Mr. Glisan. Several executives proposed no longer using "structured finance" transactions to meet earnings targets, he said, but Mr. Lay replied that " 'we rely on these; they are imperative to hit our numbers and we're going to keep doing them.' "

As treasurer, Mr. Glisan helped raise equity and debt to finance the company's businesses. He testified that one of his jobs that fall was to "probe" the credit-rating agencies to see how much of a write-down Enron could take without losing its investment-grade credit rating.

After learning that the rating companies wouldn't tolerate greater than a $1 billion write-down, which the company subsequently announced for the third quarter of 2001, Mr. Lay agreed to personally call two rating agencies, Mr. Glisan said. Mr.

Lay promised the ratings officials that Enron would be taking no further write-downs beyond the $1 billion, even though he had been told by company executives that further write-downs were unavoidable, Mr. Glisan said.

Glisan: Lay Worried About Enron Problems (AP)

By Kristen Hays

AP, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON -- Enron Corp. founder Kenneth Lay worried in 2001 that the company's mounting financial problems would jeopardize its credit rating and inquired about managing its accounting to avoid a downgrade, a former Enron treasurer testified Wednesday.

Testimony by former Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., which began late Tuesday and has outlined a series of what he said were public fabrications by Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling about the health of the company, struck a nerve with Lay.

During a break in Glisan's testimony Wednesday afternoon, a visibly annoyed Lay told reporters, "I've never heard so many lies in one day in my whole life." Lay's wife, Linda, nodded her head and added, "Unbelievable."

Glisan testified that Lay assigned him to feel out credit-rating agencies about how large some required accounting writedowns could be without jeopardizing Enron's rating.

"That's backwards," Glisan told jurors in the fraud and conspiracy trial of Lay and Skilling. "What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequences."

Glisan said Lay and Skilling knew Enron, then a reputed powerhouse, was actually weak and faced multibillion-dollar losses and writedowns on poorly performing or overvalued assets.

Skilling abruptly resigned in mid-August 2001, Lay resumed as CEO, and those problems grew, Glisan said. The company tumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001.

Glisan also said Lay and Skilling misled Wall Street in 2001 about the nature of Enron's business, describing it as a "logistics" company rather than as an energy trader.

Glisan said "logistics" indicated Enron made money by delivering commodities and could sustain its growth. A trader is vulnerable to market volatility and therefore a more risky investment, which Glisan said could translate into a lower credit rating and stock price.

"Mr. Skilling said the market does not like trading companies, and it was important to articulate our strategy as being a logistics company and stay away from the term 'trading company' or 'traders,'" Glisan said, describing Skilling's instructions to top executives before Enron held an analyst conference in January 2001.

Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli was to begin Glisan's cross-examination on Thursday, followed by Bruce Collins, one of Lay's lawyers.

Glisan, a onetime protege of former Enron Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow, is the last major government witness in its case against Lay and Skilling. The defense teams are expected to begin presentation next week of their evidence _ which they say will include testimony from Lay and Skilling. Lay lawyer Michael Ramsey said that of the two defendants, Skilling would likely take the stand first.

Glisan, in the eighth week of the trial, corroborated testimony from earlier government witnesses _ including Fastow _ who also said Lay and Skilling repeatedly lied to investors about Enron's financial strength. He often referred to notes he kept in 2001 of conversations and meetings.

The defendants claim there was no fraud at Enron and negative publicity coupled with diminished market confidence fueled the company's failure.

Glisan is halfway through a five-year prison sentence for creating fraudulent financial structures known as Raptors, which he said Enron used to house poor assets and investments and hide losses. He pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and was immediately incarcerated because he hadn't yet begun to cooperate with prosecutors.

Prosecutors contend Lay and Skilling knew about the Raptors and how they were used.

"Ultimately how was Raptor used by Enron?" prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler asked.

"To help Enron avoid losses that it should have taken," Glisan replied.

Glisan described his presentation of the first of the Raptors to the finance committee of Enron's board in May 2000. Then-Chief Accounting Officer Richard Causey explained that the structure had some "accounting risk," but outside auditors had approved it. Then he said Lay giggled.

"In what sense?" prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler asked.

"In delight," Glisan replied.

At that, Lay turned to his daughter, Elizabeth Vittor, one of the lawyers at the defense table, and said, "I giggled?"

"Did they accept the number one risk of the deal, which was accounting scrutiny?" the prosecutor asked, referring to directors at the meeting, including Lay and Skilling.

"Yes," Glisan said.

Glisan was among Fastow subordinates who participated in one of the scams the ex-CFO ran to skim millions from Enron. The young treasurer invested $5,800 in a deal that brought him a $1 million return within weeks. He said Fastow framed the windfall as compensation for Glisan helping make Fastow look good, and Fastow assured him that Skilling had approved the deal. Glisan didn't talk to Skilling about it.

Fastow was pushed out of Enron in late October 2001, and Glisan told jurors he told Lay about his windfall from a Fastow scheme and offered to resign.

He said Lay told him "the worst thing I could do at the moment was resign," so he stayed _ but he was fired less than two weeks later.

Glisan said he regretted accepting the $1 million, but regretted other actions at Enron more.

"At the end of the day, all the other actions I and others took at Enron impacted investors far more greatly," he said.

Fastow pleaded guilty to two counts of conspiracy in January 2004 and agreed to serve the maximum 10-year term. He is to be sentenced in June.

Glisan also told jurors Wednesday that Lay wanted to prevent a credit downgrade because it would make it more expensive for Enron to borrow millions to support its trading operation and could force debt repayment when little cash was available. It also would alert Wall Street to looming financial problems.

Prosecutors contend Lay hid bad news from debt-rating agencies to maintain an investment-grade rating.

Glisan said his gentle inquiries with credit-rating agencies revealed that Enron could report a charge of up to $1 billion without prompting a downgrade.

In mid-October, the company announced that amount _ not the multibillion dollars in actual charges that executives had discussed internally _ when it released third-quarter 2001 earnings, with Lay telling analysts that all the financial cards were on the table and core businesses were strong.

But scrutiny increased from analysts and credit rating agencies as Enron's share price continued to drop and investors fled rather than accept the company's continued assurances.

"We were an economically weak and strained company that had systematically hidden that weakness for a long period of time," Glisan said.

Lay is facing seven charges, including improperly avoiding writedowns and lying to outside auditors. Skilling's 31 counts include misusing reserves and signing misleading letters to auditors vouching for Enron's financial statements.

Glisan Testimony Takes Aim At Ex-Enron Bosses (HC)

By MARY FLOOD

Houston Chronicle, March 23, 2006

Former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr. spent today corroborating prior testimony against his former bosses, piling on new accusations and attacking their defenses to multiple conspiracy and fraud charges.

The last big gun the government is expected to call before it rests, possibly next week, Glisan clearly angered former Chairman Ken Lay at whom much of the day's testimony was directed.

"I've never heard so many lies in one day in my life," Lay said angrily as he and his wife Linda exited the courtroom during an afternoon break. "And you can quote me on that!"

Glisan's testimony went to the heart of key defenses — that Lay and former CEO Jeff Skilling didn't know about wrongdoing or massive financial problems at Enron and that the company fell because of a "run on the bank" started by revelations of former CFO Andrew Fastow's secret thieving.

An articulate and even-keeled Glisan testified that both Skilling and Lay knew a great deal about deep-seated financial woes at the company, signed off on improper deals and repeatedly misrepresented Enron's finances to the public. The defendants have said the company was in good shape and they didn't know about problems.

Glisan also indicated that a "run on the bank" was imminent because the company had been touting failing businesses, hiding losses, keeping assets overvalued by billions and had excessive debt. He said analysts were beginning to catch on.

Things were so bad, the 40-year-old prison inmate told the jury, that at a management meeting in The Woodlands in September 2001, all Lay and others heard was a litany of woes from broadband and retail division losses to overvalued international assets to use of improper use of reserves.

"It was ugly," Glisan recalled. He said wholesale trading division executive John Lavorato stated "he was glad we didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself."

This was one of many meetings Glisan recounted in which he said Lay heard about all the bad news but later turned around and misrepresented the company's finances to analysts, investors, employees and even credit rating agencies

Glisan said Lay directed him, near the end of the third quarter of 2001, to gently approach credit rating agencies to see how many of the billions of dollars in over valued assets the company could admit to Wall Street without losing its investment grade credit rating. That credit rating allowed Enron to continue to voraciously borrow money and operate its energy trading business, which required trust in its ability to pay.

"That's backwards," Glisan said. "What should occur is we should take the charges that we needed to take and then deal with the consequence with rating agencies and investors."

Glisan said that when he learned $1 billion was about all Enron could write off "they asked me to get more," he said of Lay and another executive. "There was no way to do that."

He said the company did write off $1 billion in losses in that quarter in addition to taking a $1.2 billion equity hit, which he said was misrepresented to the public.

Glisan testified that Lay lied when he gave assurances to credit rating agencies that there were no more big write-downs the company might need to take.

Lay also knew better, Glisan said, when at the same time Lay told the public that the equity hit was because the Raptor financial hedging vehicles were being unwound. Glisan said Lay knew it was a far more potentially reputation-damaging accounting error that caused the loss.

Answering questions all day from prosecutor Kathryn Ruemmler, Glisan said he designed the Raptor vehicles, that were run through his mentor Fastow's side company LJM and used to hedge some of Enron's investment. He said they were used "to help Enron avoid losses that it should have taken."

Glisan said he worked through the idea with Skilling and when they presented it to a finance committee meeting in May 2000 "Skilling said this was not a deal that he would recommend except for the fact that it allowed him to circumvent the accounting rules."

It was explained, Glisan said, that one of the risks of these deals was "accounting scrutiny." Glisan told Ruemmler that upon learning about the financial structures Lay "giggled."

"In what way?" Ruemmler asked.

"In delight," Glisan said.

Glisan's testimony touched on and corroborated testimony from many other witnesses, including Fastow. He knew of the "global galactic" agreement Fastow had with the chief accounting officer to commemorate illegal oral side deals, Glisan talked about how the reserves from trading profits were being improperly used to fill earnings holes and how Enron wanted to hide that it was really a trading company.

He said that in October 2001, around the time Fastow came under fire and was put on leave, he confessed to Lay in a private meeting that he had "invested" $5,800 in a Fastow scheme and got back about $1 million. Fastow stole that and $18 million more in a deal called Southampton. Glisan offered to resign.

"What did Mr. Lay say?" Ruemmler asked.

"That I shouldn't. That he thought my participation was OK and that the worst thing I could do now was resign," Glisan recounted.

Glisan said he deeply regretted taking the $1 million, but regretted other actions at Enron more.

"At the end of the day, all the other actions I and others entered into at Enron impacted investors more greatly," he said. It was shortly after his confession to Lay that Glisan was fired from Enron in November 2001.

The Clear Lake man is midway through a five-year prison sentence after pleading guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit wire and securities fraud for his work on the Raptors. He invoked his right against self-incrimination and was granted immunity against every crime but perjury by U.S. District Judge Sim Lake.

Glisan is currently on furlough to his home from his minimum security prison in Beaumont and has been here about six times to talk to the government. He agreed to help the government after he testified in the Enron Nigerian barge case. But he did so only after they agreed to get him into a minimum security facility and be sure he could get time-off credit for an alcohol rehabilitation program.

Jurors were reasonably attentive to Glisan, though the 12 jurors and four alternates seem to be dragging from their perky first six weeks or so. This is the eighth week of the trial.

The defense attorneys are sure to make much of Glisan's motive to get a shorter sentence in a less restrictive prison in return for helping the government. The cross-examination is scheduled to begin today.

A calmer Lay, on leaving the courthouse today told reporters: "The truth will start tomorrow. We'll be alright."

Jury Told Lay Lied On Enron (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON, March 22 — In seven weeks of court testimony, prosecutors landed only glancing blows against Kenneth L. Lay, a former chief executive of Enron who is on trial for criminal conspiracy and fraud. Mr. Lay's luck may have run out in Week 8.

Ben F. Glisan Jr., Enron's former treasurer, delivered stinging testimony on Wednesday that contradicted Mr. Lay's claims that he had been unaware of the company's crumbling financial picture and had not known about some of the illicit side deals involving top managers.

In a full day of questioning by prosecutors, Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay had lied to credit-rating agencies, employees and Wall Street analysts about the company's performance and need for more urgent action, even as he participated in internal discussions with managers about what to do about Enron's "dire" financial situation.

Mr. Glisan offered the strongest testimony yet that there was a criminal conspiracy at Enron involving Mr. Lay; Jeffrey K. Skilling, also a former Enron chief executive; and other top managers to manipulate earnings and mislead investors about mounting problems.

Mr. Glisan described one previously undisclosed meeting in which, he said, Mr. Lay had refused to accept his resignation when he admitted making a $1 million profit in a kickback scheme set up by a former chief financial officer, Andrew S. Fastow. Mr. Lay's response, Mr. Glisan testified, had been that his participation in the scheme, known as the Southampton deal, was "O.K." and that it would be the "worst" time for him to resign.

A few weeks later, Mr. Glisan was fired, along with another Enron employee who had participated in the scheme.

Mr. Glisan first took the stand late Tuesday in a much-anticipated appearance. Mr. Glisan, 40, is the government's last major witness in the trial of Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay, who are accused of conspiring to defraud Enron while enriching themselves.

Mr. Glisan's appearance was considered critical because, like Mr. Fastow, his former boss, who testified earlier in the trial, Mr. Glisan was in the inner circle of top decision makers at Enron.

Mr. Glisan was also deeply involved in trying to rein in the mounting credit and liquidity crisis that enveloped the company in the four months before it collapsed into bankruptcy.

But unlike Mr. Fastow or any other major witness who has testified, Mr. Glisan could end up being the crucial witness in the trial. That is because Mr. Glisan, the only major Enron figure who has already been sentenced, is under no obligation to testify. He is unlikely to receive any consideration, like a shorter sentence, from the government in return for his testimony. He is on furlough from a minimum-security prison in Beaumont, Tex., while testifying.

He has served more than half of a five-year sentence. He pleaded guilty to conspiring to commit fraud through his work on the Raptors financing vehicles, which he admitted were used to burnish Enron's financial statements by hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of losses.

Mr. Glisan also provided strong testimony on Wednesday against Mr. Skilling. He said Mr. Fastow had told him that Mr. Skilling had signed off on "bear hug" side deals, guarantees that off-the-books partnerships would not lose money by investing in Enron assets — deals that helped Enron meet its earnings targets.

Mr. Glisan also said Mr. Fastow had discussed with him a three-page "Global Galactic" document that supposedly recorded the side deals with Mr. Skilling and others.

Mr. Glisan pleaded guilty to one count of a 26-count indictment and is testifying under an immunity agreement. On Wednesday, he admitted other crimes, including participating in the Southampton partnership. He recounted how Mr. Fastow had turned Mr. Glisan's $5,826 investment into a $1 million profit in just two months. He said Mr. Fastow had assuaged his concerns about the propriety of the deal by saying it had been cleared with Mr. Skilling. Later, when the $1 million check was wired into his account, Mr. Glisan said, he knew the deal "did not make sense."

But Mr. Glisan did not do anything about it, choosing out of greed, he said, to stay silent and consider the payment as compensation for his work on the Raptors transactions, which Mr. Fastow had credited with helping burnish Mr. Fastow's reputation as chief financial officer.

Finally, after Mr. Fastow was forced to resign in large part because of his participation in off-the-books partnerships, Mr. Glisan was concerned enough, he said, to tell Mr. Lay about Southampton and offer to resign. "His response was I shouldn't, that my participation was O.K. and the worst thing I could do is resign."

But lawyers from outside the company continued to look into the deals, and by Nov. 7 Mr. Glisan had been forced to resign.

"I deeply regret" the Southampton deal, he said. But he said he regretted other actions more, actions that "affected Enron investors far more greatly."

Those included the Raptors transactions, which Mr. Glisan said he designed in 2000 to help Enron improve its reported earnings by hiding losses. Mr. Glisan said he fully described the Raptors to Mr. Skilling in two meetings in the spring of 2000. Mr. Skilling then took the idea to the board's finance committee for approval.

Mr. Glisan said he expressed his own reservations that the structures would not survive scrutiny by outside accountants. But, he said, Mr. Skilling said it was not a device he would normally recommend, "except that it would allow us to circumvent accounting rules."

Mr. Glisan said he had told the finance committee that the Raptors had "no economic value." But when Mr. Lay heard of their potential to help Enron meet its earnings, Mr. Glisan said, he giggled "in delight."

Also on Wednesday, Mr. Glisan testified about the many problems facing Enron just as Mr. Skilling was resigning as chief executive in August 2001. By then, Mr. Glisan said, both Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay knew Enron's international assets contained $1 billion in embedded losses.

Mr. Glisan testified that after Mr. Skilling resigned, Mr. Lay and the new Enron president, Greg Whalley, asked Mr. Glisan to look into how large a write-off of the troubled assets the company could take without affecting its credit rating, critical to Enron's ability to continue to borrow and do business as an energy trader. Mr. Glisan came back with a $1 billion figure, he said.

"It was backward," he said. "We should have taken the charges we needed to take and deal with the consequences with our ratings agencies."

Then, on Sept. 6 and 7, managers met at a retreat just outside Houston. The retreat soon devolved into an agonizing discussion about Enron's deepening problems, including the overvalued international assets, about $1 billion in losses in the broadband unit and another $1 billion in losses in Azurix, a division that had unsuccessfully tried to push the company into the global water business.

A discussion among business unit managers became so depressing that one manager, John Lavorato, who headed the wholesale energy unit, sarcastically said that "he was glad he didn't have a gun or he would shoot himself," Mr. Glisan said.

"It was ugly," Mr. Glisan said. "We were struggling greatly."

The managers also debated the use of "aggressive accounting," Mr. Glisan said. Mr. Lavorato suggested that Enron was using it far too often and that its auditor, Arthur Andersen, "should not be the standard and would agree to anything," Mr. Glisan testified.

Richard A. Causey, the chief accounting officer, grew upset, saying that he, not the accounting firm, was the standard, and that Mr. Lavorato's unit had benefited the most through use of "the most aggressive accounting at the company."

Mr. Lay, also at the retreat, defended the use of structured finance transactions like the LJM partnership and the Raptors, saying, "They are imperative for us to hit our numbers and we will continue to do them."

A month later, in October, Mr. Lay tried to assure employees at a large meeting that Enron would not rely on such transactions anymore, that "plain vanilla is just fine," statements that Mr. Glisan said were misleading.

Also that October, with credit rating agencies threatening to downgrade Enron's bonds, Mr. Lay personally assured Ronald Barone, an analyst at Standard & Poor's, that Enron would not write down any more assets beyond a planned $1 billion write-down. But Mr. Glisan said that Mr. Lay knew that several international assets, including power plants in India and Brazil, still needed to be written down soon.

Mr. Glisan said Mr. Lay had also lied to Mr. Barone about the nature of a $1.2 billion shareholder equity reduction. Mr. Lay had asked Mr. Glisan earlier how the charge should be characterized, and, on advice from Mr. Causey, Mr. Glisan said, they "constructed the story" to report the reduction as an unwinding of the Raptor transactions rather than the truth— that it was a result of an accounting error — to avoid scrutiny in the market.

"I understand, that makes perfect sense," Mr. Lay said, according to Mr. Glisan. "That's why I asked the question."

Lay Knew About Billions In Enron Losses, Witness Says (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Andrew Dunn Laurel Brubaker Calkins

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- Former Enron Corp. Chairman Kenneth Lay hid billions of dollars in losses from investors to avoid triggering a lower credit rating, an ex-treasurer testified at Lay's criminal trial.

Enron's assets were worth at least $3.5 billion less than their stated value by the summer of 2001, former Treasurer Benjamin F. Glisan Jr. testified. Lay attended many meetings at which the losses were discussed, Glisan told jurors today at the fraud trial of Lay and former Chief Executive Officer Jeffrey Skilling in Houston.

``Ultimately, each of these problems were known at very senior levels, including the office of the chairman," said Glisan, 40. ``Many had grown over a long period of time."

Lay, 63, and Skilling, 52, are charged with orchestrating a fraud that led to Enron's collapse, and face at least 25 years in prison if convicted on charges that they conspired to deceive investors and enrich themselves by keeping Enron stock prices inflated.

Lay told employees, investors and credit-rating companies throughout the late summer of 2001 and into the autumn that Enron was strong and that money-losing projects remained viable, Glisan said. The Houston-based company went bankrupt in December 2001.

Defense lawyers say prosecutors are seeking to criminalize normal business practices and that the two executives were victims of unscrupulous subordinates, such as Glisan's former boss, ex-Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow.

`Get More'

Glisan is in the middle of serving a five-year sentence for securities fraud in a federal prison east of Houston. He's testifying for a second day on furlough under an immunity agreement with prosecutors. He admitted falsifying Enron's reported financial results to make the company look more successful than it was.

Lay and former Chief Operating Officer Greg Whalley ordered Glisan in August 2001 to determine how big a loss the company could report without having its credit rating cut, Glisan said. When Glisan told them that Enron could report a $1 billion charge without suffering a rating cut, Lay and Whalley ``asked me to go get more," he testified.

``We had gently probed the rating agencies," Glisan said. ``You can't get on the phone and ask them how big a charge can we take without losing our rating."

Glisan said he and another employee, Tim Despain, tried to ``replicate" agency analysis and then present credit raters such as Moody's Corp. with a ``story." In Fall of 2001, ``we had to construct a story that would satisfy Moody's concerns" about the size of the risks the traders were taking.

The Dahbol Plant

Lay lied about problems with Enron's Dahbol power plant in India, Glisan told the jury. In early August 2001, he said, Lay had been told that at best the company would have to record a $500 million loss on the plant. A month later, Lay told employees, ``We still expect to recover most or all of the costs of Dahbol."

``Was that statement by Mr. Lay true?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Kathryn Ruemmler asked Glisan.

``No," Glisan said.

In October, Enron told credit-rating company Standard & Poor's Inc. that it was taking a charge of $1 billion. Shortly before the agency voted to retain Enron's BBB+ rating, Lay told S&P managing director Ronald Barone that no more charges were expected, Barone testified yesterday.

`Significantly Larger'

The losses were ``significantly larger," Glisan said today. Azurix Corp., Enron's water company, was overvalued by $1 billion and management wanted to ``liquidate" it, Glisan said. While Lay was telling the public Enron's Brazilian electric utility was ``a good asset," internally it was viewed as ``very bad," Glisan said, having declined in value ``somewhere in the neighborhood of $1 billion," Glisan said.

Enron Broadband Services, valued at about $1 billion, ``was no longer viable" and Lay knew it, Glisan testified. He said today he was sitting next to Lay during his phone call with S&P's Barone.

Enron had more than $68 billion in market value before it sought bankruptcy protection, wiping out thousands of jobs and at least $1 billion in retirement funds almost overnight. Investors suing over the collapse of what was once the U.S.'s seventh-largest corporation claim accounting fraud led to at least $25 billion in losses.

Legal experts have partially blamed partnerships and hedging vehicles created by Fastow for Enron's meltdown. Skilling's and Lay's defense teams claim Fastow, who already has pleaded guilty to fraud charges stemming from Enron's demise, stole at least $25 million from the company in connection with partnership-related deals.

The case is U.S. v. Skilling, 04-cr-25, U.S. District Court, Southern District of Texas (Houston).

Former Prosecutor Drops In On Enron Trial (AP)

By KRISTEN HAYS, AP Business Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

HOUSTON (AP) - The man who brought the indictment against former Enron Corp. Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling visited his fraud and conspiracy trial Wednesday with a slew of law students in tow.

DOJ_NMG_0020356

Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches a course in corporate crime at the University of Texas School of Law, brought his students to sit in on the biggest fraud case to emerge from the recent era of corporate scandals.

"I feel like this is a distant memory in my life," Buell said, "but it continues on. It gives you a sense of how epic these cases are. They just go on for years."

Buell was assigned to the task force at its inception in January 2002 and joined the university as a visiting professor after he stepped down in March 2004. He secured the government's indictment against Skilling a month before.

Skilling's co-defendant, Enron founder Kenneth Lay, was indicted in July 2004.

"I miss the opportunity to try this case a little bit. It's the white-collar trial of the century," Buell said. "But it can completely capture your life. It's trial by ordeal, not just for the defendants."

Buell helped prosecute Arthur Andersen LLP in 2002 on an obstruction of justice charge for destroying tons of Enron-related documents in the fall of 2001 as regulators began investigating the energy company's finances. The U.S. Supreme Court overturned that conviction last year, citing vague jury instructions that allowed jurors to convict without finding criminal intent behind document destruction.

Buell and his students on Wednesday observed testimony from former Enron Treasurer Ben Glisan Jr., who corroborated previous witnesses linking Lay and Skilling to a web of lies about Enron's health. Glisan pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003 and is halfway through a five-year prison term.

Matt Nickson, a third-year law student, said he was impressed with what he saw, but he had no predictions of the outcome.

"I don't like to judge. My tendency is not to want to condemn people," he said.

Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors, while Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy. The government contends both lied repeatedly about Enron's financial strength when they allegedly knew the company was propped up by accounting tricks.

The two defendants counter that there was no fraud at Enron, they did nothing wrong, and negative publicity as well as diminished market confidence drove the company into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

Mills Draws Formal SEC Probe Into Its Accounting Practices (WSJ)

By Ryan Chittum

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission has begun a formal investigation of Mills Corp. after more than two months of informal inquiry into accounting problems at the shopping-mall real-estate investment trust.

The investigation, disclosed by the company in a filing late yesterday, turns up the heat on Mills management and may further pressure the company's stock, which is off about 54% from its high in August.

Mills couldn't be reached for comment.

The Arlington, Va., REIT has made numerous missteps in the past 13 months. In that time, it has restated earnings twice, delayed three earnings reports, written off 10 projects and fired almost 10% of its work force.

Mills shares have plunged by about 21% since last Thursday on analyst downgrades and the disclosure that the company has uncovered five new areas of accounting problems, including ones that could have led to overstated earnings and revenue. The company is now reviewing about a dozen aspects of its books. Its shares fell 12 cents to $30.42 as of 4 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

The Massachusetts attorney general and treasurer filed a motion Tuesday to become lead plaintiff in a class-action shareholder lawsuit against Mills, saying the state's pension fund has lost $5 million because of what it alleges was fraudulent activity by the company.

A formal inquiry gives the SEC the power to subpoena company officials and documents.

"I would say up until now you could have argued that the accounting restatements and write-offs were perhaps sloppy management," said Greg Andrews, a REIT analyst at Green Street Advisors, a Newport Beach, Calif., real-estate research firm. "But with the news from a week ago and a formal SEC inquiry... the chance that there's a real fire here is much greater."

The company also said Friday, as expected, that it wouldn't be able to file its annual report in time to meet an SEC deadline and that it wasn't able to give any guidance on when the report might be forthcoming.

A cash crunch may be coming for the company, analysts have said. They estimate that Mills isn't earning enough money to cover its dividend and that it may have to cut it soon. It also needs financing to continue work on its development pipeline. It has faced a work stoppage on a project in Chicago because of contractor demands for prepayment.

NEC Says Employee At Unit Faked Deals, Inflated Revenue (WSJ)

By Hiroyuki Kachi

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

TOKYO -- NEC Corp. said an internal investigation has found that an employee at its NEC Engineering Ltd. unit fabricated business deals for years, inflating sales figures by 36.3 billion yen, or about $309.5 million, from the fiscal year ended March 2002.

The maker of computers and network equipment said that the 50-year-old employee at unlisted NEC Engineering conducted multiple fraudulent transactions in which he created fake deals between NEC Engineering and its suppliers and customers starting in March 2002. The management-level employee created phony documents to enable the transactions, NEC said.

The company discovered the fraud in December. It said it would file a criminal complaint against the employee, who allegedly embezzled money from the transactions.

The news comes at a time when NEC is suffering from a falloff in profit as its chip and mobile-phone operations struggle amid increased competition. It posted group net profit of 20.78 billion yen for the quarter ended Dec. 31, down 47% from a year earlier.

Market participants, however, played down the impact of the inflated earnings, partly because the fake deals didn't involve the company on a wider scale.

A decline in NEC shares was short-lived. In trading on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, NEC shares closed up 1.9% at 740 yen yesterday after falling to an intraday low of 708 yen.

"It is regrettable that the company didn't provide details to the public soon" after the situation was discovered, wrote Hiroshi Yoshihara, an analyst at Merrill Lynch in Tokyo, in a report.

But because such fraud has only a slight impact on his outlook on NEC earnings, "We hope the false transactions will help accelerate reform steps," at NEC under the helm of its incoming president, Kaoru Yano, he said.

NEC said it has set aside provisions to cushion the negative impact for this fiscal year, ending in March, thus, "We don't expect a big impact," from the accounting fraud, said an NEC spokesman.

For this fiscal year alone, the amount of inflated sales at NEC Engineering is estimated at 13.3 billion yen, with an inflated operating profit of 3.4 billion yen.

From the fiscal year ended March 2002, the inflated operating profit at NEC Engineering was 9.3 billion yen. But the NEC spokesman said the company may revise its past earnings statements after discussions with accountants.

With about 2,500 workers, NEC Engineering is a system-solution provider in the NEC group. It reported sales of 82.5 billion yen for the fiscal year ended March 2005.

For the full fiscal year, NEC projects a group net profit of 60 billion yen, an operating profit of 100 billion yen and revenue of 4.93 trillion yen.

Refco Ex-Director Seeks Payment Of Legal Fees (WSJ)

By Joseph Rebello

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Thomas H. Lee, who helped orchestrate Refco Inc.'s initial public offering of stock, says creditors of the commodity brokerage firm, now under bankruptcy protection, are "improperly" trying to bar him from tapping Refco's insurance policies to pay his legal costs.

Mr. Lee, who recently left the prominent private-equity firm named after him, Thomas H. Lee Partners, is petitioning the bankruptcy judge overseeing Refco's bankruptcy to get insurance payments to cover the legal costs of 14 lawsuits related to Refco's collapse.

Mr. Lee was a Refco director, as were other employees at Thomas H. Lee, which helped bring Refco public. He and other directors, including those who didn't work for the private-equity firm, are fighting the lawsuits, which center on claims that they should have known about the problems that led to Refco's implosion.

Mr. Lee said Refco directors submitted claims to the brokerage's insurer, U.S. Specialty Insurance Co., which sought court permission to pay those costs. Refco's creditors committee objected.

"There is no basis whatsoever to deny the respondents access to the insurance that was put in place for the exact purpose of recovering the respondents' defense costs," Mr. Lee said in papers filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan Monday.

Mr. Lee's firm, Thomas H. Lee Partners, bought a majority stake in Refco for more than $500 million in 2004 and took the company public in August of last year. Shortly after the IPO, however, Refco claimed that its then chief executive, Phillip Bennett, had hidden more than $430 million in bad debt, and that sent the company into a fatal tailspin. Refco entered Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings last October and is in the process of winding down its operations. Mr. Bennett is now fighting criminal fraud charges.

Mr. Lee's old firm has had several dust-ups with Refco's creditors, who have sought to investigate the firm's role at Refco as it headed for collapse. Refco's creditors committee has contended in court papers that "there are substantial questions to be answered concerning the structure, cost and effects of the investment in Refco by Thomas H. Lee Partners in June of 2004, and Refco's IPO in August of 2005."

A hearing on the insurance payments is scheduled for today. In addition to that matter, Judge Robert D. Drain will also consider whether the portion of the case related to Refco's offshore business should continue to be heard under Chapter 11 of the federal bankruptcy code, which grants protection from creditors and time to reorganize the company, or instead be reclassified under Chapter 7 of the bankruptcy code, as requested by some of the brokerage's creditors. Chapter 7 would lead to liquidation of Refco's remaining assets.

Also today, Mr. Bennett is scheduled to appear in federal court, where lawyers will discuss discovery related to his criminal case and Judge Naomi Reice Buchwald may begin efforts to set a trial date.

Defense attorneys are expected to ask the judge to compel the government to reveal the exact focus of its case against Mr. Bennett. Federal prosecutors in New York produced more than 1.3 million pages of documents as part of their case.

Should Business Execs Meet At Strip Clubs? (USAT)

By Jayne O'Donnell

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Wearing a scanty blue gown with rhinestone clasps, Nicolette Hart explains how she can make up to $2,500 a night with investment bankers and their clients in a Manhattan strip club's private rooms.

She writhes and rubs her nearly naked body against as many as seven men, doing “lap dances” for $400 an hour. (The room costs an additional $200 for the hour.) Hart, who once worked for a venture-capital firm, always asks what brought the men together. They often say they're having a meeting.

“I say, ‘You're having a business meeting in a strip club?' ” Hart says in an interview in the dressing room at Rick's Cabaret here.

It's not just strippers who have questions. Some women on Wall Street want to know how it can be fair — or legal — for their managers and male colleagues to exclude them when they fraternize at strip clubs, often with the women's clients. Strip club clientele is hardly limited to Wall Street. Adult entertainment is enjoyed by men — and some women — in most every industry in the USA, and it's a tax-deductible business expense allowed by the IRS.

Investment banks and brokerage firms are taking the lead in cracking down on the practice. The National Association of Securities Dealers and the New York Stock Exchange both recently proposed rules that would force firms to adopt business entertainment policies that cap amounts and specify appropriate venues. The move is expected to rule out company-paid or work-related strip club jaunts at the more than 5,000 brokerage firms in the USA.

The stock exchange and the NASD acted in large part because of lawsuits brought by female employees. The women who have sued say strip clubs are emblematic of a larger problem on Wall Street: a macho culture that leaves them behind in all areas.

“There are two levels of discrimination: the frat house environment in the office and the deeply embedded practices that are just starting to be uncovered, like the distribution of accounts, business leads and promotions,” says Hydie Sumner, a financial consultant who was awarded $2.2 million in 2004 after suing Merrill Lynch for gender discrimination. “When ‘business activities' involve the strip club, golf course or hunting ranches … discrimination is often perpetuated as those in power support and advance those with like minds and tastes.”

Ultimately, some believe, other industries will be affected. “This is going to have a trickle-down effect,” says Aliza Herzberg, a New York employment lawyer who represents many manufacturing and small-business clients. “Companies will try to make taking clients to strip clubs, which is very common, a thing of the past — just like the three-martini lunch.”

It was a Fidelity Investments trader's 2003 bachelor party, paid for by brokerage firms including Jeffries & Co., that prompted NASD to consider tightening its rules. The party allegedly included dwarf-tossing and paid female escorts, according to news accounts and investigators.

“We're not happy that (business entertaining) seems to have been an area where firms were not paying sufficient attention,” says NASD Vice Chairman Mary Schapiro. “I thought sensitivity to issues like this would have been greater than it was.”

DOJ_NMG_0020359

NYSE Executive Vice President Grace Vogel says the goal is to ban entertainment that's inappropriate or excessive. Final versions of the rules, likely in weeks, must be approved by the Securities and Exchange Commission before taking effect. Brokerage firms that don't enact or enforce business entertainment policies could face actions ranging from censure to expulsion.

Many companies now have policies that restrict any behavior that excludes certain employees, even if they don't specifically mention strip clubs, Las Vegas employment lawyer Barry Kellman says.

"Financial services has taken the biggest hit (from lawsuits), but the more buttoned-up industries would have greater concern about this than, for example, the entertainment industry," Kellman says.

Earlier this month, Manhattan strip club Scores settled a lawsuit over a contested $241,000 bill racked up by the former CEO of St. Louis information technology company Savvis. Robert McCormick resigned amid an investigation into the bill, which was charged to his corporate American Express card. Several sexual harassment lawsuits have been filed in recent weeks by women who say male co-workers at the freight logistics company C.H. Robinson frequented strip clubs and openly discussed strippers in the office.

Attorney Rohit Sabharwal, a Rick's regular, says he often takes clients of his small law firm with him and such entertaining was common when he was at a large firm, too. "Nobody really objects," Sabharwal says. "I think it's a lot more civilized in the law profession. I don't think women have a problem succeeding in law firms."

But back on Wall Street, Vogel says the rulemakers had "uncanny timing":

·In the fall, Morgan Stanley fired three salesmen and a researcher who took clients to a strip club. The company instituted a no-strip-club policy in October 2002, two years before it paid $54 million to settle a sex discrimination lawsuit. The lawsuit was brought by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and a former institutional equities saleswoman who said she was excluded from client outings to strip clubs and other places.

·Six female employees filed a sex discrimination class-action complaint in federal district court against German investment bank Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein in January. Jyoti Ruta, a director in the institutional equities division here, says she was excluded from a trip to a strip club and from other client events.

·Last April, a jury found in Laura Zubulake's favor in a sex discrimination and retaliation lawsuit against UBS and awarded her $29 million. In October, the parties settled the lawsuit privately. Zubulake, a former director in international equities, alleged in the lawsuit that she was not considered for promotion, was removed from client responsibilities, was undermined professionally and was excluded from client outings. Trial testimony alleged she had been invited to a bottomless club by a manager. UBS says it has policies on business entertainment and "appropriate professional conduct."

Several financial companies say the proposed rules are too burdensome. John Goodwin of Albuquerque-based Goodwin Browning & Luna Securities, complained to NASD that it is "legislating morality."

But female plaintiffs and their lawyers say business entertaining can be as important as what goes on in the office. Attorney Piper Hoffman, who represented Morgan Stanley plaintiff Allison Schieffelin, says that on Wall Street, "Who you know can translate into how much business you bring into your company."

In her lawsuit, Schieffelin says she learned two clients were invited by male colleagues to attend a weekend in Las Vegas approved by their manager. When she asked why she wasn't included, she was told it was "because the men would be uncomfortable participating in sexually oriented entertainment with a woman colleague present, especially one who knew their wives," according to the lawsuit.

"It's not a question of morality," says attorney Wayne Outten, who also represented Schieffelin. "It's the disparity in opportunity for those who are excluded."

Ruta, who still works at Dresdner while she fights her sex discrimination lawsuit, is about to have her second child. She says her problems at the investment bank started when she returned the last time from maternity leave and found she had a new boss. She began being excluded from outings with clients, including to the strip club and wine tastings, and lost out on deals and promotions because of it.

"I've always conducted myself professionally and ethically," Ruta says. "The night when I was told to leave because the clients would like to go to a strip club was very, very upsetting."

Dresdner's attorneys recently filed a motion to expunge the strip club and other "scandalous allegations" because they don't relate to the core "pay and promotion" case. Ruta's lawyer, Douglas Wigdor, says, "When it comes to deciding bonuses, it's all discretionary, and the male supervisor is going to give the money to the guys he hangs out with."

Alden Cass, a Manhattan-based psychologist who works with financial executives, says strip clubs hold a special attraction on Wall Street. He attributes it to the business' highs and lows and tendency to tie people's identities to how much they earn. He says many of his male clients find strippers more understanding than their wives.

"When things are great at work, some of them do feel entitled to have things when they want them," Cass says. "The allure is, 'Someone is going to listen to me on my terms.' "

Rick's owner, Eric Langan, says that when people ask him whether a dancer's breasts or buttocks are more important, he answers that “her brain” and personality count more. Dancers who might not merit a second look outside on Sixth Avenue can earn as much as $200,000 a year by “really listening” to down-in-the-dumps bankers and stockbrokers. He says about a third of his business comes from Wall Street.

NASD's Schapiro says that when it comes to strip clubs, “One of the things that is powerful about the new rules is that they are going to force every firm to make the decision whether that's an appropriate place to do business.”

Nicolette Hart worries the new rules could affect her business, because “a lot of guys do expense it” and “try to be big shots to impress their clients any way possible.”

Mike Paul of the New York-based reputation management firm MGP & Associates PR, says strip clubs would be a hard habit for Wall Streeters to break. “The bottom line — and you won't get any company to say it — is that Wall Street and strip clubs are ingrained together and have been for a long time.”

Langan doesn't think new rules will have a big effect: “They'll just break out personal credit cards. Most of them don't care about a $3,000 or a $5,000 bill at a club.”

Ruta says that as long as managers aren't taking male employees and neither managers nor employees are treating clients, she doesn't care who goes to strip clubs.

“The real problem I have with it is that it is unprofessional and exclusionary,” she says. “But whatever people want to do on their own free time is fine.”

Freddie Mac Finance Chief To Resign (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Freddie Mac said it will replace its chief financial officer, Martin F. Baumann, just three months after offering him a $2 million retention bonus.

The move follows two embarrassing snags that have delayed the U.S. mortgage-finance company's effort to return to regular, timely reporting of results in the wake of a 2003 accounting scandal. In light of those snags, Mr. Baumann said in an interview, he and the company's top officers -- Chief Executive Richard Syron and Chief Operating Officer Eugene McQuade -- agreed that Freddie needed a finance chief with more expertise in upgrading the computer systems used to generate financial results.

Freddie launched a search for a successor to Mr. Baumann, who is 58 years old, and said Mr. McQuade would handle the finance-chief duties in the interim, effective immediately. As recently as December, the company was seeking to keep Mr. Baumann in golden handcuffs. Freddie agreed then to pay him $1 million in cash and another $1 million in stock if he remained in his post through the end of 2007. Yesterday Freddie said Mr. Baumann would still receive those payments, plus $540,000 of severance pay. He will remain an adviser at the company through May.

Mr. Baumann joined Freddie in April 2003, shortly after the company discovered accounting violations designed to smooth out earnings growth. He said he initially had a two-year contract, later extended for a year. "It feels like six years with the amount of work we got done," Mr. Baumann said.

Mr. Baumann has long complained that Freddie was saddled with antiquated computer systems for financial reporting. The company had nearly returned to a normal quarterly reporting schedule by last August. But then it found miscalculations of interest earned on mortgage-backed securities. As a result, Freddie announced in November that it would have to reduce its net income for last year's first half by $220 million.

Earlier this month, Freddie suffered a second glitch when it had to delay plans for reporting results for all of 2005 until May from March. The company said it needed more time to put into effect a new method for valuing assets and obligations related to its business of guaranteeing payments on home mortgages.

These setbacks led to "frank conversations" with Messrs. Syron and McQuade, Mr. Baumann said, and to the conclusion that the company needed a finance chief with more experience in updating creaky computer systems. Mr. Baumann said that his strongest suits are accounting policy and financial reporting and that he believes he has restored "integrity" to the company's accounting. David R. Palombi, Freddie's chief spokesman, said the company has "consistently said we need to get the job done right and done as quickly as practical....The change announced today is the best way to meet those objectives."

Mr. Baumann said he had no firm plans. "I'm ready to do something else," he said, perhaps involving charitable work or public service.

Freddie said Mr. Baumann's resignation isn't expected to affect the company's plan to release results for 2005 in May.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Washington Wire (WSJ.com)

Wall Street Journal, March 22, 2006

Question of Privilege

The Bush administration apparently isn't planning to cite executive privilege for the super-secret Presidential Daily Briefings sought by former vice presidential aide I. Lewis Libby.

In the past, the administration has come under fire for exerting executive privilege on a whole host of issues ranging from energy-industry meetings to the papers of Supreme Court nominees. But this time is different. Federal prosecutors said in a court filing that since the judge has limited the production of the daily intelligence briefings to redacted documents and topic overviews that would be viewed only by Libby and four of his attorneys in a sealed room, "there is a reasonable prospect that the government could avoid a blanket assertion of privilege and instead be able to comply with the court's order."

Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, has argued that he needs copies of the daily briefings to help prepare his defense against charges that he lied and obstructed justice in the investigation into whether a CIA agent's identity was purposely leaked to the media. Through his legal team, he contends that the documents, which list the high-profile, sensitive matters he dealt with daily, would help show that any misstatements were due to distraction, not lying.

Still, the filing and an accompanying CIA affidavit noted it would take the CIA, which prepared the daily intelligence briefings for the president, until mid-June to pull together redacted documents. It's unclear if the delay will affect the start of the trial, now set for early January. –Anne Marie Squeo

By Matt O'connor And Rudolph Bush

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO - The federal jury in former Illinois Gov. George Ryan's trial has hit a stumbling block in its deliberations, the judge disclosed on its seventh day of deliberations Wednesday.

After holding two lengthy closed-door sessions with lawyers in the case, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer said she planned to instruct jurors Thursday morning to continue on with their discussions.

In brief remarks to reporters, Pallmeyer said she had received two notes in the last two days from jurors "that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict, or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations."

The judge said she would keep the jurors' notes under seal because "they relate to some personal difficulties."

"And that's the reason that I think, for the integrity of the process and to encourage the jurors to be as open and hard working as they have been, I think the appropriate course here is to keep their communications to me, at least at this time, a private matter," she said.

Lawyers in the case are barred from commenting to reporters because of a gag order instituted by Pallmeyer in the final days of the marathon trial.

Ryan is on trial with Lawrence Warner, a lobbyist, on charges that the former governor steered millions of dollars in state contracts and leases to Warner and other friends in return for vacations, gifts and other benefits. Both deny wrongdoing.

The seriousness of the impasse was apparent when U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald and First Assistant U.S. Attorney Gary Shapiro waited for a lengthy period as lawyers in the case met privately in chambers with the judge for more than an hour.

Jurors had heard more than five months of testimony and argument, so the fact that deliberations had reached into a second week didn't strike courtroom observers as unusual.

But clearly the jury has reached some sort of impasse.

There have been few, if any, public signs of turmoil with jurors meeting in a back room out of public sight.

On Tuesday, a TV producer stationed outside Pallmeyer's courtroom overheard a juror tell other jurors as they boarded a public elevator that the name-calling had to stop.

Jurors have been seen in recent days walking up flights of stairs at the high-rise Dirksen U.S. Courthouse, but it wasn't clear if their purpose was solely to get some exercise or out of any frustration over the turn in the deliberations.

The first sign of trouble came in the late morning Wednesday when Pallmeyer summoned the lawyers to her chambers. The judge's staff had previously notified the news media when the jury had raised questions, but no word was issued before Wednesday's events.

Reporters who have been camped out in and around the courtroom during the deliberations realized something was up when lawyers in the case suddenly arrived at the courtroom and proceeded into the judge's chambers.

After about a 20-minute private meeting, Pallmeyer emerged into the courtroom and announced to reporters that she had received a note from jurors shortly before saying they were having "some difficulties" with their deliberations.

The judge said she and the lawyers would come up with "an appropriate response" to the jury's note.

It appeared that jurors may not have deliberated for about a 2 1/2-hour chunk of time after delivering the note to the judge.

By 3 p.m., prosecutors and lawyers for Ryan and Warner returned to Pallmeyer's chambers. The private meeting lasted almost an hour and a half.

While the meeting took place, jurors wrapped up deliberations for the day at their usual quitting time of about 4 p.m. and left the courthouse.

At the conclusion of her private meeting with the lawyers, Pallmeyer again stepped into the courtroom to make a short public announcement, revealing for the first time that there had in fact been two notes from jurors in the last two days about the difficulties in deliberations.

The judge said she and the lawyers had drafted a response to the jurors' concerns "that they need to keep on with their responsibilities."

Pallmeyer said she would make the response to jurors public after it was delivered to them when they resume deliberations at 9:30 a.m. Thursday.

The judge has sealed her closed-door discussions with the lawyers as well as the jurors' two most recent notes.

News 'Personal Difficulties' Grip Ryan Jury (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, Federal Courts Reporter

Chicago Sun-Times, March 23, 2006

The 12 jurors deciding former Gov. George Ryan's fate are having "personal difficulties" as they try to reach a verdict.

Jurors on Wednesday gave U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer a note telling her they're having problems -- apparently with one another -- as they deliberate.

In open court, Pallmeyer said she received "two notes from the jurors that disclose their difficulties reaching a verdict or at least difficulties in the context of their deliberations."

She said she'll give them a note today explaining "they need to keep on with their responsibilities."

Rumors of hung jury

Pallmeyer on Wednesday twice met privately with lawyers in the case to discuss the matters. The second meeting stretched to 1-1/2 hours.

While rumors of a hung jury spread quickly through the courthouse, Pallmeyer wouldn't disclose specifics of their concerns, saying she would likely do so after a verdict is reached -- appearing confident that one would be reached.

On Wednesday, the seventh day of their deliberations, jurors at times were fractured into smaller groups, showing up in various places in the courthouse and appearing not to be deliberating much.

At one point well after a lunch break, four Ryan jurors took an elevator to a different courtroom floor than where deliberations are taking place. They walked to the end of the hallway on that floor and talked quietly among themselves. That same group was seen stepping in and out of the stairwell at various points during the day, and others, too, were seen coming and going.

Notes under seal for now

But at 4 p.m. when their talks ended for the day, all 12 panel members left at the same time and appeared to be getting along. They're due back this morning to continue deliberations.

Pallmeyer said she will keep the two notes under seal, unlike other jury questions that she has publicly released. She said she plans to unseal just about everything once a verdict is reached.

"They relate to some personal difficulties, and that's the reason that I think, for the integrity of the process and to encourage the jurors to be as open and hardworking as they have been, I think the appropriate course here is to keep their communications to me, at least at this time, a private matter," Pallmeyer said.

The jury, made up of six men and six women, is sifting through countless documents that came in during the nearly six-month trial. They are weighing a 22-count indictment of racketeering, false statements and tax evasion against Ryan, 72, and racketeering and extortion charges against his co-defendant, Lawrence Warner, 67.

G-Sting Wiretaps May Spell Trouble For Kincaid-Chauncey (KLAS-TV)

KLAS-TV, March 23, 2006

Prosecutors played more FBI wiretaps Wednesday in the G-Sting political corruption case. They allege two county commissioners took bribes from strip club owner Mike Galardi through his lobbyist to vote in favor of the Galardi's club. They are trying to establish a pattern of contact between Galardi's lobbyist, Lance Malone, and former commissioners Dario Herrera and Mary Kincaid-Chauncey.

Federal prosecutors played portions of 67 wiretaps that were recorded as a result of the G-Sting investigation. For Mary Kincaid-Chauncey, some of those wiretaps may spell trouble. But Dario Herrera's defense team says they liked what they heard.

In a July 2001 FBI wiretap, Mike Galardi tells his lobbyist, Lance Malone, to give Mary Kincaid-Chauncey a message: "Tell her I'm going to get her another five whenever she wants it." Prosecutors say that mean $5,000. Days later, Kincaid-Chauncey left a message on Galardi's voice mail: "Thanks so much for all your help."

What was Kincaid-Chauncey thanking Galardi for? The former county commissioner said, "I don't remember, I can't remember what I said last week. I have no idea."

Dario Herrera's lawyers are pleased with what they heard from Wednesday's wiretap evidence. Phone call after phone call of Mike Galardi complaining to Lance Malone. Herrera refuses to help them in opening Galardi's strip club, Jaguars.

Jerry Bernstein, Herrera's attorney, said, "I think what you hear is a lot of frustration on the part of Michael Galardi and Lance Malone with the fact Dario Herrera is an honest public official. That's what you hear. Some of it is really, really bad stuff particularly when Erin Kenny gets herself cranked up."

Kenny, another former commissioner who admitted taking money from Galardi, was upset in July of 2001 that Herrera wouldn't help Galardi overcome licensing issues for Jaguars, and said in various wiretaps: "That prick. He is a son of a (expletive). I'm so pissed off at him right now, I'm going to (expletive) him in the worst way." And, "I will destroy him."

The wiretap evidence the G-Sting jury heard Wednesday is just the beginning. Over an 18-month period the FBI recorded 44,000 different conversations, which equals 4,000 hours of wiretaps.

The G-Sting trial resumes Thursday morning, Mar. 23 at 8:30. At that time the jury will hear more wiretaps.

Lawyer Supports Testimony Against 'Mob Cops' (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 23, 2006

The testimony of Burton Kaplan, a key government witness in the "Mafia Cops" trial, was buttressed Wednesday by his former defense attorney, who said Kaplan admitted being the intermediary between the mob and two cops.

Attorney Judd Burstein, who represented Kaplan until 1999, said that he was first told by his client about Kaplan's alleged dealings with the former cops when it was known that former acting Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso became a government witness.

Testifying as a prosecution witness in the racketeering trial of ex-NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito, 57, and Stephen Caracappa, 64, Burstein said he called Kaplan in March 1994 immediately after learning through the legal grapevine that Casso was working for the government.

After the New York Post ran a story on March 25, 1994 about Casso claiming two unnamed cops carried out a murder for him, Burstein testified that Kaplan became very concerned.

"He said 'this was a big problem for me; I was the go-between Casso and the cops on this killing and other matters,'" Burstein remembered Kaplan saying.

Kaplan said he was going to leave New York City, something Burstein advised against. The Post article was about the murder of Gambino soldier Edward Lino on Nov. 6, 1992. The next day, March 26, 1994, the Daily News ran a similar story and ran a picture of Eppolito, Burstein told the jury.

Judge Jack Weinstein sustained a defense objection about the suggestion that Caracappa was mentioned in the story. However, Eppolito's lawyer, Bruce Cutler, didn't object.

On cross examination by Cutler, Burstein indicated that he had only Kaplan's word to go on about his alleged role as an intermediary between Casso and the police.

Later, Stephen Corso, a corrupt accountant who is a federal witness, described how he talked with Eppolito about getting a small quantity of methamphetamine in late 2004. Prosecutors then played a video showing Eppolito's son Anthony and another man passing the drug to Corso for $900.

However, in another recording, Louis Eppolito is heard upbraiding Corso. "I got a panic call from my son and I'm very, very -- -- upset," said Eppolito. "So don't [contact] him or Guido anymore. No more."

Lawyer For Earlier Witness Testifies For Prosecution (NYT)

Thus far, the witnesses at the trial of two retired detectives accused of killing for the mob have included an old marijuana dealer, a murderous mob boss, a suntanned C.P.A. and a grieving Brooklyn mother whose son was mistakenly shot outside her house one Christmas Day.

Nonetheless, the federal trial in Brooklyn turned yesterday to what may have been its weirdest witness yet, or at least most professionally complicated: the former lawyer for a government witness. His attorney-client privilege waived, the lawyer bolstered the witness's account that he once served as the liaison between the detectives, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, and their patron in the mob.

The lawyer, Judd Burstein, talked like one — using phrases like "the sum and substance of my testimony" and trying to avoid what a prosecutor called "humongous lawyer answers" to his questions.

It was a strange sight to watch Mr. Burstein, who has practiced law for more than 20 years, answer questions on direct examination, then under cross-examination, put to him by other lawyers.

There were lawyers for the prosecution, lawyers for the defense, lawyers in the gallery, a lawyer on the bench — and then Mr. Burstein, a man whom prosecutors called to corroborate the testimony of Burton Kaplan, his former client, who is serving a 27-year term for marijuana sales.

Last week, Mr. Kaplan had told the jury that from 1986 to 1993, he acted as "the safety spot" between the two detectives and the No. 2 man in the Luchese crime family, Anthony Casso. Mr. Casso, sick with vengeance at a 1986 attempt on his life, paid the defendants, Mr. Kaplan said, to kill seven rivals on his behalf.

Mr. Burstein, engaged happily in civil practice these days, leaned comfortably in the witness chair as he told the jury that in 1994 Mr. Kaplan called him in a panic when a newspaper reported that Mr. Casso was cooperating with the authorities, a move that threatened everyone involved.

"He said there was an article in The New York Post about Anthony Casso having used two New York City cops to order killings," Mr. Burstein said, "and he said, 'This is a big problem for me — I was the go-between.' "

The afternoon saw one of those jarring juxtapositions that are frequent in the trial. Steven Corso, the suntanned C.P.A., reappeared and told how in February 2005 the defendants had agreed one night at dinner to help get drugs for some "Hollywood punks" who were coming to Las Vegas and who Mr. Eppolito, living in Nevada writing screenplays, wanted to impress.

Mr. Corso, as the defense has pointed out, is a tax cheat, thief and government witness who moved through Las Vegas, secretly recording strippers, gangsters and the two defendants as they talked about the "punks" that night.

"Two are famous," Mr. Corso said, according to a transcript. This was followed by an answer any struggling writer might have made: "How famous?" Mr. Eppolito asked.

Two days later, the lawman's son and a friend took an ounce of methamphetamine to Mr. Corso's office, where agents in a nearby room recorded them taking $900 for the drugs.

The transaction is important from a legal point of view because it lets the prosecution argue that the two detectives were engaged in a continuing conspiracy that stretched from murder in the 1980's to a drug deal just last year.

Two months earlier, Mr. Corso had recorded the detective in another scene of writerly angst. He asked Mr. Eppolito if he might take laundered money as an investment in his script, but the lawman cut him off.

"Did you finish reading that?" the anxious writer asked.

"I've been busy," Mr. Corso said.

Att'y Burns 'Mafia Cops' (NYDN)

Backs middleman claim

A topnotch defense attorney turned prosecution witness yesterday at the Mafia cops trial, backing up ex-client Burton Kaplan's claim he was the middleman between the mob and two allegedly crooked detectives.

In an unusual move, lawyer Judd Burstein went to prosecutors last year and suggested they ask Kaplan to waive his attorney-client privilege now that he was the government's chief witness in the Mafia cops case.

He agreed, paving the way for Burstein to corroborate Kaplan's testimony linking ex-cops Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa to numerous gangland killings when they were on the force.

The lawyer said he began representing Kaplan in 1985.

"It never even crossed my mind that he had a propensity toward violence," said Burstein, a noted defender who has handled mob, white-collar and big-money divorce cases.

Then after published reports in 1994 that Luchese crime family capo Anthony (Gaspipe) Casso was spilling his guts about two dirty cops on his payroll, Kaplan revealed a dark secret to his lawyer.

"He said, 'This is a big problem for me,'" Burstein said. "'I was the go-between for Casso and these two cops.'"

Kaplan adamantly refused to cooperate - even after he drew a 27-year sentence for drug trafficking - until 2004, when he thought Eppolito or Caracappa was going to rat him out.

Eppolito lawyer Bruce Cutler suggested Burstein came forward because he had read media reports last summer that the judge might toss the case on a legal technicality.

Another government witness, Steven Corso, testified yesterday how Eppolito was so desperate to raise cash for his screenplay business he was willing to launder drug money and involve his son Anthony in a drug deal.

Corso, a crooked accountant working undercover, wanted to buy designer drugs for some investors he claimed were coming to Las Vegas, where Eppolito and Caracappa had moved after retiring from the NYPD.

"Tony can handle that for you," Eppolito told Corso, who even recorded Eppolito in a hospital where the ex-cop was recovering from heart surgery.

Where the money was coming from was of no issue to Eppolito, according to recordings played yesterday.

"Do you care what [the investor] does for a living?" Corso asks Eppolito on one tape.

"If this is the biggest drug dealer in the United States, I don't give a f--k," Eppolito responds, adding, "If you said to me, 'Lou, I wanna introduce you to Jack Smith, he wants to invest in this film,' [and] he says '$75,000 comes in a f-----g shoebox,' that's fine with me, I don't care."

POST SCOOP SENT MOB RAT RUNNING (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 23, 2006

When Burton Kaplan picked up a copy of The Post on March 25, 1994, he got some exclusive news - and instantly knew it was time to disappear.

The drug-dealing mob associate was shaken after reading an exclusive report by Murray Weiss, which revealed that busted Luchese boss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso had hired two NYPD mob cops as hit men.

Kaplan immediately told his lawyer about the report and feared he had to flee to China, testimony revealed at the racketeering trial of the two cops.

"He said there was an article in the New York Post about Anthony Casso having used two New York City cops to order killings," Kaplan's former attorney, Judd Burstein, testified yesterday. "[Kaplan] said, 'This is a big problem for me. I was the go-between.' "

Kaplan - the star witness in the gangland racketeering trial for former NYPD detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa - testified last week that he relayed orders from Casso to the detectives, including requests for inside police information and murder contracts.

Kaplan said the two detectives even personally carried out a hit on Gambino crime family member Eddie Lino.

The stool pigeon also said that he eventually went on the lam in 1994 - fleeing not to China, but to Mexico and later Oregon and Las Vegas.

Last week, Kaplan said he paid the cops to kill Lino, because he had been involved in a failed hit on Casso.

But at the time, the gangster Casso was planning to testify that Gambino boss John Gotti personally asked him to carry out the hit on Lino, who had apparently become a liability because he was doing drugs.

Casso had never met the two cops. But Kaplan said last week that the boss figured out who they were from Eppolito's book, "Mafia Cop," in the early 1990s.

He saw a picture of the two former partners in the book and remembered spotting two men who looked like them years earlier, when the cops allegedly served as backup to another mobster during a kidnapping.

The government eventually determined that the volatile Casso was a lousy witness, and he never testified. Kaplan eventually came out of hiding, only to be busted for selling pot.

Also yesterday, jurors heard a tape made in Las Vegas last year by wire-wearing informant Steven Corso, who had conversations with the rogue detectives.

During a dinner with Eppolito and Caracappa, the crooked accountant said he had some famous clients from Hollywood who wanted to invest in a movie the ex-cop hoped to produce - and that they wanted a bunch of drugs to party with.

"I got these guys," Corso said. "Two are famous. They're coming in this weekend . . . these are the guys that are gonna invest [in the film]. These guys, being young, like to party."

"Tony can take care of that for you," Eppolito said, referring to his son, Anthony. "My son can bring 'em to all the places, the top places [nightclubs.]"

"Well . . . they don't wanna go to the, the places," Corso said. "They want me to get 'em either ecstasy or speed."

Defense attorney Bruce Cutler asked Corso if the FBI put him up to bringing up drugs during the dinner in an effort to make the cops look bad.

"The FBI did not tell me to inject it, they told me to throw it out there and see what happens," Corso said.

Eppolito also said that he liked doing business better with Jews than Italians.

"There's no better way," he said. "The Jews say, you're Jewish, he's Jewish, he's Jewish, he's Jewish. There's four of us, that's a quarter each, we all get a quarter.

"[The way] Italians do it is, I want 65 cents, I'll give you a dime, I'll give him three cents, I'll give him seven, but I make sure I get the most."

JAILER REV. A MAN OF GOTTI (NYPOST)

By Dan Mangan And Kati Cornell Smith

The New York Post, March 23, 2006

EXCLUSIVE

A corrections officer-turned-minister is backing John "Junior" Gotti's claim that he quit the Mafia in the late 1990s, saying Gotti repeatedly told him in jail - "I'm not involved in that life, that life has been nothing but trouble for me."

"This is the truth, this is what he said," recalled Bobby Hargraves, 45, who was working in the Westchester County Jail in Valhalla in 1998 when Gotti was there awaiting a racketeering trial.

Hargraves "vividly" remembers up to five conversations with Gotti in which "he said, 'I'm no longer a part of that life anymore.' " Gotti also avoided fellow Gambino crime family defendants in jail before pleading guilty in that case in 1999, and told Hargraves he was interested in moving his family to Canada, the ex-officer said.

Hargraves, who retired last summer after 22 years as a corrections officer to become full-time pastor of a Poughkeepsie church, shared his account with The Post yesterday.

His story was welcomed by Gotti's lawyers, who argue that the son of "Dapper Don" John Gotti is not guilty of pending racketeering charges because he left the mob before July 1999. That would mean the five-year statute of limitations on those charges would have expired by the time he was indicted in 2004.

"I think the guy could be a very valuable witness," said Gotti's lawyer, Charles Carnesi, adding that his client remembers being counseled by Hargraves on religious matters. "I'm definitely interested in speaking with him."

A jury earlier this month hung, reportedly 8-4, in favor of Gotti's acquittal, after hearing testimony from lawyer Ron Kuby and a Gambino crime family associate that Junior told them in 1998 that he was leaving the Mafia. Prosecutors plan to retry Gotti on the charges - including the 1992 kidnapping of Kuby's radio co-host, Curtis Sliwa.

Hargraves did not testify at the last trial or at a prior one that also ended in a hung jury. But he likely will be called to the witness stand at a third trial.

"[Gotti] said, 'I want you to know I never killed anyone, I'm very active in my church, I give to my church,' " recalled Hargraves, who said Gotti bears a tattoo of Christ wearing a crown of thorns.

Officials Accuse 5 Of Bilking Medicare (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

An Altadena couple, relatives and an associate submitted fraudulent bills to the agency, federal authorities say.

Five Southern Californians were arrested Tuesday and charged with defrauding Medicare out of $20 million by recruiting patients for unnecessary medical treatment and then billing the agency for the services.

An Altadena couple, two of their relatives and an associate are accused of "beneficiary sharing" or "patient rotating," in which "marketers" obtain data about Medicare beneficiaries and sell the information to clinics or diagnostic testing centers that then prepare fraudulent billings.

The group, led by Konstantin Mikhaylovich Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena, allegedly conducted the fraudulent activity through 12 Los Angeles-area medical providers they controlled since 1997.

The providers purportedly conducted diagnostic examinations, such as ultrasound and blood tests, and then billed Medicare for patients' visits between 2000 and 2005 — regardless of whether medical services were received, authorities said.

The ring would fabricate test results to ensure that the patients' files could withstand an audit by Medicare, according to a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday.

The U.S. attorney's office charged Grigoryan; his wife, Mayya Leonidovna Grigoryan, 54; Eduard Gershelis, 34, of Los Angeles, the couple's son-in-law; Aleksandr Treynker, 48, of Canoga Park, Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law; and Haroutyun Gulderyan, 36, of Tujunga with conspiracy, healthcare fraud, Medicare kickbacks, making false statements to a Medicare provider and money laundering.

The complaint alleges that Medicare was forced to pay out at least $20 million in fraudulent claims. Much of the money was deposited into bank accounts for "management" and "consulting" companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account.

The Grigoryans and Gershelis are being held without bail, authorities said. Treynker will be allowed to remain on home detention after posting a $150,000 bond. Gulderyan's bail hearing was postponed until Thursday.

Anthony Solis, an attorney for Konstantin Grigoryan, said Tuesday he did not yet have sufficient information to comment on the charges.

5 Charged In Massive Fraud Case (PASASN)

Altadena man suspected head of Medicare scheme

ALTADENA - An Altadena couple and three associates were arrested Tuesday morning on federal charges of bilking Medicare of more than $20 million through a "massive and well-organized conspiracy," authorities said.

Ukrainian immigrants Konstantin Mikhaylovich Grigoryan, 56, and his wife, Mayya Leonidovna Grigoryan, 54, own a home in the 700 block of Millard Canyon Road in Altadena, according to an FBI affidavit in support of their arrest.

The defendants allegedly operated a dozen Los Angeles-area clinics and diagnostic-testing facilities that claimed to be run by physicians but actually existed to defraud Medicare, the FBI said.

The Medicare beneficiaries were brought to the fraudulent healthcare providers by "cappers," marketers who sold the patients' information for fraudulent billing or were paid a kickback for bringing patients to the facilities, authorities said. The patients were bused to facilities including H.G. Diagnostics, at 720 N. Lake Ave., Suite 4, in Pasadena, from all over Los Angeles County, and sometimes from as far away as San Diego or San Jose, authorities said.

Once the patients arrived, the Medicare providers billed their Medicare numbers on the dates of their visit, and other dates, regardless of whether services were provided, the affidavit said. When no services were rendered, the conspirators would fabricate tests so the files could withstand an audit, the FBI said.

The 12 Medicare providers also shared the patients' Medicare numbers, in what the FBI called a "patient sharing" or "patient rotating" scheme. For example, the affidavit says 10 providers billed Medicare for the same 11 beneficiaries. Between 2000 and 2005, the scheme netted at least $20 million, the FBI said.

The other three defendants are Eduard Gershelis, 34, of Los Angeles, who is also the Grigoryans' son-in-law; Aleksandr Treynker, 48, of Canoga Park, who is Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law; and Haroutyun Gulderyan, 36, of Tujunga.

The defendants are charged with conspiracy, healthcare

fraud, Medicare kickbacks, false statements as to a Medicare Part B provider and money laundering.

The FBI names Konstantin Grigoryan as leader of the group, which is said to have began its elaborate scheme in 1997. The defendants allegedly masked their common ownership and control of the medical providers, in violation of Medicare regulations. The defendants further concealed their fraud by laundering their money "into a maze of bank accounts of `management' and `consulting' companies, including a Panamanian shell corporation with a Swiss account," the affidavit said.

Konstantin Grigoryan has a past conviction in state court for two counts of receiving illegal payments in 2001, the affidavit said. He was charged then with arranging kickbacks in exchange for referring patients, and as part of a plea agreement received three years' probation. He was also barred from participation in state or federal healthcare programs.

Gershelis, Gulderyan and Treynker all have previous convictions in state court for the same crime, court records show.

The FBI says the money trail further implicates the defendants. A review of bank records shows large checks - often totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars - flowing from the 12 Medicare providers to four companies held in the names of the defendants, the affidavit said.

The case is the result of an ongoing investigation by the FBI, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of the Inspector General and IRS-Criminal Investigation Division.

Five People Arrested In $20 Million Medicare Fraud Scheme (MERCN)

The San Jose Mercury News, March 23, 2006

LOS ANGELES - Five people were arrested Tuesday on charges they bilked more than $20 million in Medicare payments for tests that were unnecessary or never performed.

Federal prosecutors said Konstantin Grigoryan, 56, of Altadena oversaw the fraud scheme from 1997 to 2005. He and four others are accused of recruiting Medicare beneficiaries and taking them to a dozen doctor's offices and medical laboratories in Los Angeles, prosecutors said.

The offices then submitted bogus claims for diagnostic tests, ultrasound exams and other services, according to a criminal complaint unsealed Tuesday. The Medicare beneficiaries were paid for the use of their Medicare numbers, and the fraud ring fabricated test results to fool Medicare auditors.

The complaint also alleged that most of the money that Medicare paid out for the fraudulent claims between 2000 and 2005 was deposited into bank accounts for fake management and consulting companies.

Grigoryan, his wife Mayya and their son-in-law Eduard Gershelis were charged with conspiracy, health care fraud, Medicare kickbacks, money laundering and making false statements.

Mayya Grigoryan's brother-in-law Aleksandr Treynker and a fifth defendant, Haroutyun Gulderyan, also face similar charges.

All five made their initial court appearances Tuesday afternoon. The Grigoryans and Gershelis were ordered held without bond. Treynker was ordered released on $150,000 bond. Gulderyan's bond hearing was postponed to Thursday.

Attorneys for Konstantin Grigoryan and Gulderyan had no immediate comment on the charges. Lawyers for their co-defendants could not be reached.

A call to assistant U.S. attorney Bruce Searby, who is prosecuting the case, was not immediately returned.

Indictments Connected To Health Care Fraud Expected Thursday (LAFDA)

Lafayette Daily Advertiser, March 23, 2006

Federal authorities have scheduled a news conference Thursday in Lafayette to announce a 95-count indictment alleging health care fraud.

Few other details were available this afternoon; U.S. Attorney Donald Washington was in court, and his office staff could not comment. Clerk of Court employees said as of 4 p.m., there were no indictments handed down from the grand jury this week.

The news conference is scheduled for 10 a.m. Thursday in the federal courthouse on Lafayette Street.

Representatives from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services also will be present.

Former 49ers Kicker Indicted For $8M Insurance Fraud (MERCN)

By Rodney Foo

The San Jose Mercury News, March 23, 2006

Ray Wersching, the retired San Francisco 49ers kicker who booted field goals in two Super Bowl victories, was indicted Wednesday on federal charges of embezzling $8 million from an insurance company and tax evasion.

Wersching, 55, the owner of Ray Wersching Insurance Agency in Redwood City, is accused of diverting premiums earmarked for Farmers Insurance from 1997 to 2000. He is also alleged to have evaded paying taxes on $3.6 million in corporate income from 1999 to 2000.

Wersching has been served with a summons to appear Monday in U.S. District Court in San Francisco before Magistrate Judge Bernard Zimmerman, said U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Luke Macaulay.

``This action," Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi said in a statement, ``makes it clear that in California, no one -- whether an average citizen or a former football star -- will escape prosecution if they are suspected of insurance fraud."

Wersching, an ex-University of California football star, faces five allegations -- embezzlement; permitting a felon convicted of dishonesty to participate in an insurance business; failing to file a corporate tax return; and two counts of tax evasion.

The penalties carry a range of prison sentences from one to 10 years, and fines of $250,000 plus restitution.

The Mercury News was unable to reach Wersching for comment.

The indictment ends a five-year investigation conducted by the state justice department, the FBI, the California Department of Insurance, and the Internal Revenue Service.

Authorities allege Wersching diverted money from premiums to be paid to Farmers into his own company's account.

Wersching had opened the insurance agency in February 1995, and a month later hired Mary Ann Locke, also known as Mary Ann Diaz, giving her a 50 percent stake in the firm.

In March 2001, Farmer's ended its affiliation with Wersching. Locke left the company two months later.

Locke had been convicted of forgery in 1992, Macaulay said.

Last year, Locke was arraigned in federal court on insurance fraud, wire fraud and money laundering, related to the embezzlement scheme. She used the money to pay Nevada casinos for gambling debts, state insurance department officials said.

Wersching's troubles stand in stark contrast to his accomplishments on the gridiron.

He played 15 years in the NFL -- four of them with the San Diego Chargers -- before retiring from the 49ers after the 1987 season. He was a member of the 1981 and 1984 championship teams. He still holds the record for most career field goals in Super Bowls, five. Wersching trails only legendary 49er wide receiver Jerry Rice as the team's leading scorer.

The accusations stunned those who knew Wersching.

``There was never a more respected guy on the team," said Dr. Harry Edwards, a staff consultant with the 49ers for the past 20 years. ``He was a guy they leaned on in tight games to get it done and nine times out of 10, he got it done.

``From what I know of him, I could not begin to fathom what could possibly have brought him to this situation. I hope that whatever is the reality of it, that he gets through this thing."

John McVay, who served as 49ers general manager when Wersching was with the team, said, ``This is a good man and he has been for a lot of years. Knowing him, this just doesn't add up. Maybe somebody else did something and dumped it all in his lap. The Ray Wersching I know wouldn't do that kind of stuff."

FBI agent LaRae Quy said the investigation is continuing.

``We're still looking to see who might be involved and to what extent," she said.

Court: No Police Search If One Resident Says 'yes,' Other 'no' (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — A divided Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that police may not enter a hometo conduct a search if one resi-dent gives permission but theother says no.

The 5-3 decision in a Georgia drug case that involved a feuding husband and wife drew a sharp dissent from Chief Justice John Roberts. He said the majority, led by the high court's more liberal justices, misapplied the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and set a rule based on "random" circumstances.

The ruling, written by Justice David Souter, says that if police search a home after being invited in byone resident over the protest ofanother, the evidence that is seized cannot be used in court. Thedecision emphasized respect for privacy in the home.

The ruling ensures that a straw coated with what police said appeared to be cocaine that was found in a bedroom at the home of Scott Fitz Randolph cannot be used in any prosecution of him. During a domestic dispute, Randolph's wife, Janet, had called police to their house in Americus. After telling the officer that her husband used drugs, she led the officer to the straw. Scott Randolph had refused an officer's request to allow a search.

Souter referred to social custom and property law that gives spouses and co-tenants equal claim on who enters a person's property. He said no guest would enter at one occupant's invitation if another occupant told the guest to stay out — and police, absent a search warrant, should not either.

"There is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another," Souter wrote, "whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders."

The ruling was narrowly crafted to affect only situations in which the objecting tenant is present and there isno evidence of abuseor other circumstances that would justify an immediate entry by police.

However, the decision reverses a pattern among lower U.S. courts that had favored police if one resident allowed the search over the objections of another.

Wednesday's decision affirmed a ruling by the Georgia Supreme Court that favored Scott Randolph. The ruling had blocked his trial on cocaine possession charges from going forward.

Souter was joined by the court's three other more liberal justices, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer, and by Justice Anthony Kennedy, a moderate conservative at the court's ideological center. Dissenting with Roberts were fellow conservatives Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. New Justice Samuel Alito was not on the court when the case was argued, so he did not take part in the ruling.

In his dissent, Roberts said people who share a home have a reduced expectation of privacy and assume the risk that another resident might agree to a search by police. He said the ruling could endanger spouses who are abused and want police to come in a home, but do not make clear to police that a threat exists.

Thomas dissented separately, saying the action at the Randolph house should not be considered a police search because the wife led the officer to the evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0020370

Thomas Goldstein, who represented Randolph, praised the decision as an affirmation of the Fourth Amendment's privacy protection. Russ Willard, spokesman for the Georgia attorney general's office, called the ruling a “roadblock” to law enforcement and said it could diminish officers' ability to investigate domestic disputes.

Roberts Dissent Reveals Strain Beneath Court's Placid Surface (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 — A Supreme Court decision on Wednesday in an uncelebrated criminal case did more than resolve a dispute over whether the police can search a home without a warrant when one occupant gives consent but another objects.

More than any other case so far, the decision, which answered that question in the negative by a vote of 5 to 3, drew back the curtain to reveal the strains behind the surface placidity and collegiality of the young Roberts court.

It was not only that this case, out of 32 decided since the term began in October, provoked Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. to write his first dissenting opinion. He had cast two earlier dissenting votes, and had to write a dissenting opinion eventually. And although there has been much commentary on the court's unusually high proportion of unanimous opinions, 22 so far compared with only 27 in all of the last term, few people expected that rate to continue as the court disposed of its easiest cases and moved into the heart of the term.

Rather, what was striking about the decision in Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067, was the pointed, personal and acerbic tone in which the justices expressed their disagreement over whether the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches was violated when the police in Americus, Ga., arriving at a house to investigate a domestic dispute, accepted the wife's invitation to look for evidence of her husband's cocaine use.

The dueling opinions themselves were relatively straightforward; as has often been the case in the court's recent past, although not so far this term, the justices revealed their real feelings in the footnotes.

Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter said the search was unreasonable, given the vocal objection of the husband, Scott Randolph. True, Justice Souter said, the court had long permitted one party to give consent to a search of shared premises under what is known as the "co-occupant consent rule." But he said that rule should be limited to the context in which it was first applied, the absence of the person who later objected.

The presence of the objecting person changed everything, Justice Souter said, noting that it defied "widely shared social expectations" for someone to come to the door of a dwelling and to cross the threshold at one occupant's invitation if another objected.

"Without some very good reason, no sensible person would go inside under those conditions," he said.

"We have, after all, lived our whole national history with an understanding of the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle," Justice Souter said. "Disputed permission is thus no match for this central value of the Fourth Amendment."

Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy and Ruth Bader Ginsburg joined the majority opinion, as did Justice Stephen G. Breyer, who explained himself in a concurring opinion notable for its ambivalent tone. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote, as he was not a member of the court when the case was argued.

The dissenters, in addition to Chief Justice Roberts, were Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. In his opinion, the chief justice took aim at the majority's description of social custom, as well as its reliance on that description to reshape "a great deal of established Fourth Amendment law."

Every lower federal court to have considered the issue, as well as most state courts, had concluded that one party's consent was sufficient. The Georgia Supreme Court, in its 2004 decision that the justices affirmed, was in the minority, ruling in this case that the evidence of Mr. Randolph's cocaine use was inadmissible.

"The fact is that a wide variety of differing social situations can readily be imagined, giving rise to quite different social expectations," Chief Justice Roberts said. For example, he continued, "a guest who came to celebrate an occupant's birthday, or one who had traveled some distance for a particular reason, might not readily turn away simply because of a roommate's objection."

Noting that "the possible scenarios are limitless," he said, "Such shifting expectations are not a promising foundation on which to ground a constitutional rule, particularly because the majority has no support for its basic assumption — that an invited guest encountering two disagreeing co-occupants would flee — beyond a hunch about how people would typically act in an atypical situation."

The majority missed the point, the chief justice said; the fact is that someone choosing to share space has also, already, chosen to share privacy.

DOJ_NMG_0020371

"Our common social expectations may well be that the other person will not, in turn, share what we have shared with them with another — including the police," he said, "but that is the risk we take in sharing."

That was the analysis, and then came the footnotes.

Justice Souter, usually mild-mannered to a fault, said in Footnote 4 that "in the dissent's view, the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over." By invoking a "false equation" between inviting the police into the home and reporting a secret, he said, the chief justice "suggests a deliberate intent to devalue the importance of the privacy of a dwelling place."

Chief Justice Roberts responded in turn. The majority had mischaracterized his position on privacy and "seems a bit overwrought," he said in a footnote.

In a concluding paragraph of his dissent, he said: "The majority reminds us, in high tones, that a man's home is his castle, but even under the majority's rule, it is not his castle if he happens to be absent, asleep in the keep or otherwise engaged when the constable arrives at the gate. Then it is his co-owner's castle."

Justice Souter also attacked as a "red herring" a warning by Chief Justice Roberts that the rule the court was adopting would hamper the ability of the police to protect victims of domestic violence.

Justice Souter said the law was clear on the right of the police, despite any objection, to enter a home to protect a crime victim. But that issue "has nothing to do with the question in this case," he said.

The discussion by Chief Justice Roberts of the implications for domestic violence cases might have been an effort to win, or a failed effort to hold, the vote of Justice Breyer.

When the case was argued on Nov. 8, Justice Breyer raised the issue of domestic abuse. Addressing Mr. Randolph's lawyer, Thomas C. Goldstein, he said, "I haven't seen anything on your side that wouldn't prevent many cases of domestic spousal abuse from being investigated." He added, "Quite frankly, it bothers me a lot."

In his concurring opinion on Wednesday, Justice Breyer noted that in this case, the police were searching "solely for evidence," and domestic abuse was not at issue. While he pronounced himself satisfied by "the case-specific nature of the court's holding," he said the outcome might well be different in the context of domestic abuse, in which police entry even over one spouse's objection could be reasonable.

This case was the oldest undecided case on the court's docket, and it is likely that Justice Breyer's vote was in play until the final stages. One indication was Chief Justice Roberts's reference in his opinion to Justice Breyer's having joined "what becomes the majority opinion," an odd present-tense locution suggesting that the outcome had once been otherwise.

The case also produced dueling opinions by Justice Stevens, concurring, and Justice Scalia, in dissent, over how a true believer in interpreting the Constitution in light of the framers' original understanding would have resolved the issue. There was a tone more of banter than anger to this exchange between the old adversaries, as if after some months of forced and unaccustomed unanimity, they were now free once again to acknowledge their differences.

Supreme Court Strengthens Protection Against Searches (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Strengthening Fourth Amendment protections against warrantless searches, the Supreme Court ruled that police can't enter a house over a resident's objection simply because a second occupant invites them in.

Chief Justice John Roberts led the three dissenters, reflecting his longstanding deference to police.

The opinions recalled debates that have marked the court since the 1950s, when, under Chief Justice Earl Warren, it began imposing rules to deter police misconduct. Justice Samuel Alito sat out because the case was argued before his confirmation, but he has written elsewhere of his disagreement with Warren Court criminal-procedure cases.

The ruling by Justice David Souter was grounded in those doctrines, which have limited warrantless searches when a third party, such as a landlord or hotel clerk, has let police into an absent tenant's quarters. "We have, after all, lived our whole national history with an understanding of 'the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle,'" Justice Souter wrote, citing a 1958 opinion by his predecessor, Justice William Brennan.

Yesterday's case originated with a 2001 marital dispute in Americus, Ga. Janet Randolph told police that her husband, Scott, used cocaine and that the house held "drug evidence." Mr. Randolph refused when an officer asked permission to search the premises. The officer turned to Mrs. Randolph, who led him to Mr. Randolph's bedroom, where the officer found a drinking straw with cocaine residue.

The Georgia Supreme Court ruled the search violated the Fourth Amendment, which bars "unreasonable searches and seizures" of "persons, houses, papers and effects." The state appealed.

Although the Constitution generally provides that police obtain a warrant before conducting a search, there are "reasonable" exceptions, such as to prevent imminent harm or if the party consents.

"The constant element...is the great significance given to widely shared social expectations," Justice Souter wrote. "There is no common understanding that one co-tenant" can "prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders." Few visitors would enter a house at "one occupant's invitation...when a fellow tenant stood there saying, 'stay out.'" That distinguished the case from a 1974 Supreme Court decision allowing one tenant to let police search while a co-tenant wasn't home. People who share housing "understand that any one of them may admit visitors, with the consequence that a guest obnoxious to one may nevertheless be admitted in his absence by another," he wrote.

Chief Justice Roberts's dissent said "the court creates constitutional law by surmising what is typical when a social guest encounters an entirely atypical situation." Many "social conventions may shape expectations about how we act when another shares with us what is otherwise private," he wrote. But "if an individual shares information, papers, or places with another, he assumes the risk that the other person will in turn share access to that information or those papers or places with the government."

Supreme Court Puts Constraints On House Searches With Co-tenants (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Recognizing that a man's home is, indeed, his castle, the Supreme Court said Wednesday that police can't search a house without a warrant if one occupant invites them in but another objects to their presence.

Writing for a sharply divided court, Justice David Souter said the ruling's logic was drawn from common social courtesies. The vote in the case was 5-3; Justice Samuel Alito, who wasn't on the court when the case was argued, didn't vote.

"There is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders," Souter wrote. Under the Fourth Amendment, which protects against unreasonable searches, police who come knocking without a warrant can't bypass consent any more easily than a salesman or other guest could, he said. Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer joined Souter in the majority.

The ruling could have wide-ranging implications for authorities, who regularly confront the question of how and when someone has sufficiently waived his or her privacy rights to justify a search.

The ruling also inspired the first written dissent from Chief Justice John G. Roberts.

Roberts accused the court of falsely reading a social assumption into the Constitution - "that an invited guest who arrives at the door of a shared residence, and is greeted by a disagreeable co-occupant shouting `stay out,' would simply go away."

Roberts said that different social situations could produce different outcomes.

"Such shifting expectations are not a promising foundation on which to ground a constitutional rule," Roberts wrote. Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas also dissented.

Roberts also disagreed with another of the court's assumptions: that a person who chooses to live with someone else has the same expectations of privacy as a person who chooses to live alone.

"Even in our most private relationships, our observable actions and possessions are private at the discretion of those around us," Roberts wrote. Someone who lives with others "assume the risk that those who have access to and control over his shared property might consent to a search."

The case arose from a domestic dispute involving spouses Scott and Janet Randolph in Americus, Ga. When police showed to resolve things, Janet Randolph told them that her husband had drugs in their home and agreed to let the officers inside to look for evidence.

Scott Randolph objected, but the police went ahead on Janet Randolph's word; she led them to drug paraphernalia in the couple's bedroom.

Scott Randolph later tried to have the evidence tossed out because he said the search was illegal. A lower court agreed with him and the justices were asked to decide the matter finally.

The court had never directly confronted the issue of two people, both present at a home, giving different answers to a request for a search.

Souter noted that the court has long decided whether warrantless searches are "reasonable" by looking to the expectations that people would have in normal social situations.

The court also has ruled before that if only one occupant is present when police ask to search, that person's consent is sufficient, even if other occupants who weren't present later object to the search.

In the Randolph case, however, Souter said the social expectations were clear.

"A caller standing at the door of shared premises would have no confidence that one occupant's invitation was a sufficiently good reason to enter when a fellow tenant stood there saying, `Stay out,'" Souter wrote. "Without some very good reason, no sensible person would go inside under those conditions."

Souter made clear, though, that the court was drawing a fine line: A co-occupant's objection is relevant only if the person is at the door, voicing his or her wishes to the police. Someone who's not on the premises, or even asleep in a bedroom, "loses out," Souter said.

That thinking was the focus of Roberts' dissent.

"That the rule is so random in its application confirms that it bears no real relation to the privacy protected by the Fourth Amendment," Roberts wrote. "What the majority's rule protects is not so much privacy as the good luck of a co-owner who just happens to be present at the door when the police arrive."

Roberts also said that the court's ruling would have undesirable effects on victims of domestic violence.

"The majority's rule apparently forbids police from entering to assist with a domestic dispute if the abuser whose behavior prompted the request for police assistance objects," he said, echoing concerns that Breyer had raised during oral arguments.

Breyer, however, sided with the court majority and wrote separately to address the questions about domestic violence.

Breyer said police responding to instances of domestic abuse are often dealing with "emergency" situations in which normal search rules wouldn't apply.

Other justices also weighed in.

Stevens wrote a concurrence using the case to point out what he saw as a flaw in Scalia's preferred method of resolving cases, which is to divine the "original" meaning of constitutional provisions.

The Randolph case, Stevens said, could be resolved only by looking at "evolving" social standards. Only in modern times have women been recognized as equal partners in households, Stevens said. When the Fourth Amendment was written, "only the consent of the husband would matter" because women had lesser rights.

Scalia wrote to respond specifically to Stevens' charge. What had changed, he noted, were laws governing property rights, not the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.

Stevens had confused the "original import of the Fourth Amendment with the background sources of law to which the Amendment, on its original meaning, referred."

Thomas also dissented, saying the circumstances in Randolph's case weren't a search at all, but an instance of a spouse of a suspected criminal leading police to potential evidence and as such were beyond the reach of the Fourth Amendment's protection against illegal searches.

Divided Justices Reject Searches If Consent Is Split (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

A split Supreme Court yesterday ruled that Georgia police acted unconstitutionally when they searched a home without a warrant after one occupant agreed to the search but another refused.

The court ruled 5-3 that warrantless searches may be allowed under the Fourth Amendment if a home's occupant gives consent -- but not when a second occupant "is present at the scene and expressly refuses to consent."

Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Steven G. Breyer and David H. Souter formed the majority. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., in his first written dissent since being confirmed five months ago, disagreed, saying the ruling will damage investigations of domestic violence.

"The cost of affording such random protection is great, as demonstrated by the recurring cases in which abused spouses seek to authorize police entry into a home they share with a nonconsenting abuser," the new chief said.

Justice Antonin Scalia joined the dissent, and he and Justice Clarence Thomas wrote dissents of their own. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. abstained because the case was argued before he was confirmed.

The varied opinions marked the first major high court split since the confirmation of Chief Justice Roberts. Calling the new chief's concern a "red herring," the majority asserted the case had "no bearing on the capacity of the police to protect domestic victims."

"No question has been raised, or reasonably could be, about the authority of the police to enter a dwelling to protect a resident from domestic violence," Justice Souter wrote for the majority.

"It would be silly to suggest that the police would commit a tort by entering ... to determine whether violence (or the threat of violence) has just occurred or is about to (or soon will) occur, however much a spouse or other co-tenant objected."

DOJ_NMG_0020374

The case involved a 2001 search of Janet and Scott Randolph's home. Mrs. Randolph had called police to complain that after a domestic dispute, her husband had taken their son away. When police arrived, she said Mr. Randolph was a cocaine user.

Mr. Randolph returned while police were still there, and Mrs. Randolph repeated her complaints about her husband's drug use and said there was evidence of it in the house.

Mr. Randolph denied this, saying that, in fact, it was Mrs. Randolph with the drug problem. When police asked whether they could look around without a warrant, Mr. Randolph "unequivocally refused," according to court papers. Mrs. Randolph, however, consented, leading an officer to a room where he found "a section of a drinking straw with a powdery residue he suspected was cocaine."

Mr. Randolph was indicted on charges of possession of cocaine. A state trial court denied his motion to suppress the evidence as products of a warrantless search unauthorized by consent. But the Georgia Court of Appeals and the Georgia Supreme Court reversed the denial, ruling in favor of Mr. Randolph that a warrantless search is invalid if an occupant refuses it, regardless of whether a second occupant gives consent.

High Court Trims Police Power To Search Homes (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The Supreme Court narrowed police search powers yesterday, ruling that officers must have a warrant to look for evidence in a couple's home unless both partners present agree to let them in.

The 5 to 3 decision sparked a sharp exchange among the justices. The majority portrayed the decision as striking a blow for privacy rights and gender equality; dissenters said it could undermine police efforts against domestic violence, the victims of which are often women.

The ruling upholds a 2004 decision of the Georgia Supreme Court but still makes a significant change in the law nationwide, because most other lower federal and state courts had previously said that police could search with the consent of one of two adults living together.

Now, officers must first ask a judicial officer for a warrant in such cases. Quarrels between husbands and wives, or boyfriends and girlfriends, keep police busy around the country; in the District, almost half of the 39,000 violent crime calls officers answered in 2000 involved alleged domestic violence.

Justice David H. Souter's majority opinion said that the consent of one partner is not enough, because of "widely shared social expectations" that adults living together each have veto power over who can come into their shared living space. That makes a warrantless search based on only one partner's consent "unreasonable" and, therefore, unconstitutional.

"[T]here is no common understanding that one co-tenant generally has a right or authority to prevail over the express wishes of another, whether the issue is the color of the curtains or invitations to outsiders," Souter wrote.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., writing his first dissent since joining the court in October, said the ruling's "cost" would be "great," especially in domestic dispute situations.

Roberts wrote that the ruling made no sense, given that the court had previously said it is constitutional for police to enter a house with the permission of one partner when the other is asleep or absent. Those rulings were unchanged by yesterday's decision.

Just by agreeing to live with someone else, a co-tenant has surrendered a good deal of the privacy that the Constitution's Fourth Amendment was designed to protect, Roberts noted.

"The majority's rule apparently forbids police from entering to assist with a domestic dispute if the abuser whose behavior prompted the request for police assistance objects," he wrote.

But Souter called that argument a "red herring," saying that the police would still have legal authority to enter homes where one partner was truly in danger.

"[T]his case has no bearing on the capacity of the police to protect domestic victims," Souter wrote. "No question has been raised, or reasonably could be, about the authority of the police to enter a dwelling to protect a resident from domestic violence; so long as they have good reason to believe such a threat exists."

Souter said Roberts was guilty of declaring that "the centuries of special protection for the privacy of the home are over."

Souter's opinion was joined by Justices John Paul Stevens, Anthony M. Kennedy, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer.

Breyer backed Souter with a separate opinion noting that his decisive fifth vote was cast on the understanding that Souter's analysis applies to cases such as this one, Georgia v. Randolph , No. 04-1607, in which the police were searching for evidence of a crime, rather than intervening in a violent dispute.

DOJ_NMG_0020375

"[T]oday's decision will not adversely affect ordinary law enforcement practices," Breyer wrote.

The case arose out of a 2001 quarrel over child custody at the home of Janet and Scott Randolph in Americus, Ga. When officers arrived, she told them where they could find his cocaine. An officer asked Scott Randolph for permission to search the house. He refused, but Janet Randolph said yes -- and led them to a straw covered in cocaine crystals. Scott Randolph was arrested and indicted on charges of cocaine possession.

Georgia's Supreme Court ultimately ruled that the evidence should be suppressed because it was gathered without a warrant.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas also dissented. Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. did not vote because he was not yet on the court in November, when the case was argued.

The main battle between Souter and Roberts was accompanied by a skirmish between Stevens and Scalia, who used the case as an opportunity to make points in the court's long-running dispute over Scalia's view that the Constitution should be interpreted in light of the Framers' original intent.

In a brief concurring opinion, Stevens noted that the court's ruling was based on the concept that neither a husband nor a wife is "master" of the house in the eyes of the law. But at the time the Bill of Rights was drafted, he wrote, only a husband's consent or objection would have been taken into account.

Thus, he wrote, "this case illustrates why even the most dedicated adherent to an approach . . . that places primary reliance on a search for original understanding would recognize the relevance of changes in our society."

Scalia fired back at "Justice Stevens' 'attempted critique' of originalism,' " arguing that the court's ruling would probably not benefit women.

"Given the usual patterns of domestic violence," he noted, "how often can police be expected to encounter the situation in which a man urges them to enter the home while a woman simultaneously demands they stay out?"

In Case Involving Disbarred Attorney, High Court Draws 'Fine Line' On Police Searches (LAW)

By Alyson M. Palmer, Fulton County Daily Report

Fulton County Daily Report, March 23, 2006

A man's home is still his castle, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled Wednesday, declaring a Georgia woman couldn't give away her husband's Fourth Amendment rights.

In a 5-3 decision that backed up a previous ruling by the Georgia Supreme Court, the U.S. high court said that one household occupant's permission for police to enter the home does not give law enforcement an exception to the warrant requirement if another occupant stands in the doorway and protests that entry.

The decision has broad implications for police searches across the nation and prompted the first dissent written by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who warned his colleagues may have made it difficult for abused spouses to obtain police assistance.

A disbarred Americus, Ga., attorney was at the center of the case. After police were called to his home when he and his wife quarreled, both accused each other of using illegal drugs. When police asked if they could search the home, Scott Fitz Randolph said no while his wife said yes. Police then searched the home and found what appeared to be cocaine. In the subsequent criminal case, Randolph moved to suppress the evidence.

Writing for the majority, Justice David H. Souter said "the ancient adage that a man's home is his castle" dictated the court's ruling in Randolph's favor. Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen G. Breyer joined the majority.

"Since the co-tenant wishing to open the door to a third party has no recognized authority in law or social practice to prevail over a present and objecting co-tenant," wrote Souter, "his disputed invitation, without more, gives a police officer no better claim to reasonableness in entering than the officer would have in the absence of any consent at all." Georgia v. Randolph, No. 04-1067.

Acknowledging it was "drawing a fine line," the majority said, on the other hand, if the "potential objector" to the search is "nearby" but is "not invited to take part in the threshold colloquy," then the co-tenant's permission to search provides police a way around the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.

Roberts, joined by Justice Antonin Scalia, criticized that "fine line" as giving "protection on a random and happenstance basis, protecting, for example, a co-occupant who happens to be at the front door when the other occupant consents to a search, but not one napping or watching television in the next room."

Justice Clarence Thomas penned his own dissent.

Souter suggested police still could enter a home over an occupant's objection in an emergency situation "so long as they have good reason to believe such a threat exists." The case decided Wednesday involved a domestic dispute, but the spouse invited police in to search for drugs, not to protect her.

In July 2001, Americus police responded to a call about a disturbance between Randolph and his estranged wife at the Americus house where Randolph lived. Randolph had worked as a criminal defense lawyer but was disbarred in 2001 for mishandling a bankruptcy case.

With the couple accusing each other of drug use, police asked to search the home and got consent from the wife, but not Randolph. Police then found what appeared to be cocaine. After he was indicted by Sumter County on cocaine possession, Randolph unsuccessfully moved the trial court to suppress the evidence police took from the house.

Represented by Wilbur T. Gamble of Collier & Gamble of Dawson in the Georgia courts, Randolph appealed to the Georgia Supreme Court.

In a 4-3 decision issued in 2004 and written by Justice Robert Benham, the state high court agreed with Randolph that the trial court should have granted the motion to suppress.

"The Georgia Supreme Court got it exactly right, and that is, when you're at home, you have rights in your house," said Thomas C. Goldstein, a Supreme Court veteran with the Washington firm of Goldstein & Howe who successfully argued the case for Randolph at the U.S. Supreme Court.

"At the same time, if you're away, your roommates or your spouse can let the police in, but when you're home, it's your castle."

The state of Georgia thought otherwise and appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, arguing that when people live together, they have a reduced expectation of privacy.

Georgia, represented by Senior Assistant Attorney General Paula K. Smith at oral argument, received backing from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Russ Willard, a spokesperson for Georgia Attorney General Thurbert Baker, lambasted the decision. "Today's decision throws yet another poorly defined roadblock in front of law enforcement trying to carry out their responsibilities and, as the dissent points out, hamstrings police in their ability to intervene in domestic violence situations where a spouse is sufficiently in fear to have summoned police in the first instance."

The Supreme Court's lineup showed Roberts "is a very solid law and order vote," with Kennedy "in the position of swing vote," said Goldstein.

"I don't think [Roberts'] position was a surprise," said Pamela S. Karlan, a professor and associate dean at Stanford Law School who worked on Randolph's Supreme Court brief, along with Atlanta attorney Donald F. Samuel of Garland, Samuel & Loeb. She added the appointment of Roberts likely did not change the outcome, given that former Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was "not generally solicitous" of Fourth Amendment claims.

Samuel A. Alito Jr., did not participate in the decision; he did not take the bench until after the court heard arguments in November.

Jeffrey A. Lamken, of Baker Botts in Washington, who filed an amicus brief for the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers supporting Randolph's argument, cautioned against drawing too many inferences from how the justices split, calling Fourth Amendment cases "unpredictable animals."

Death Penalty Sought In Guard's Killing (BSUN)

By Greg Garland

The Baltimore Sun, March 23, 2006

Washington County's top prosecutor said Wednesday that he will seek the death penalty for a prison inmate who is accused of killing a correctional officer at a Hagerstown hospital.

State's Attorney Charles P. Strong Jr. filed notice in Circuit Court that he will seek to have the inmate, Brandon Morris, put to death for the killing of Jeffery A. Wroten.

The death penalty applies because Morris, 20, "committed the murder in furtherance of an escape" and because of other aggravating circumstances, the prosecutor wrote.

Strong said he spoke with Wroten's family before making the decision because he wanted to make sure they understood that death penalty cases are often long, involved and intense.

"If successful at the trial level, these cases can involve many, many years of appeals and other challenges," Strong said. He said his decision "is consistent with the evidence and with the support of the family."

Morris, of Baltimore, is accused of shooting Wroten in the face at Washington County Hospital on Jan. 26 as the officer lay on the floor, pleading for his life. The 44-year-old Wroten, who worked at Roxbury Correctional Institution, died the next day.

DOJ_NMG_0020377

Morris was being treated at the hospital for what authorities have said they believe was a self-inflicted injury -- a sewing needle jammed into his abdomen. Wroten had been assigned to guard him.

Attorney Michael R. Morrissette, the public defender who represents Morris, declined to comment Wednesday on Strong's decision. "The Office of the Public Defender would prefer to do its talking in the courtroom," he said.

In Maryland, both sides in a death penalty case have an automatic right to have a case tried in a different venue from where the crime occurred -- a right the defense is expected to exercise in the high-profile Morris case.

According to court papers Strong filed this week, authorities have not been able to determine how Morris got free of his restraints, enabling him to knock Wroten to the floor and take his weapon from him.

Under state prison policies, inmates under guard are supposed to be shackled to hospital beds. However, restraints are sometimes removed for an inmate to use the bathroom or when a doctor orders removal for medical reasons.

A nurse responding to the noise of the scuffle arrived to find Morris crouched on top of Wroten, and saw the inmate fire the gun in Wroten's face at close range, according to court papers.

Authorities have said Morris fled the hospital in a taxi he allegedly commandeered at gunpoint. He was captured less than an hour later.

Antiques Obtained Through A Bribery Are Put On Block (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon And Peter Sanders

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

A defense contractor seeking to bribe California Congressman Randall "Duke" Cunningham shelled out $12,000 in November 2001 for a cache of antiques, including four armoires, a leaded-glass cabinet and a massive buffet, all of which were delivered to Mr. Cunningham's home.

Today, those items and dozens more of Mr. Cunningham's ill-gotten furnishings will be up for grabs when some of the scandal's spoils hit the auction block.

The auction, handled by the Treasury Department, is part of the government's criminal proceedings against Mr. Cunningham, a Republican from San Diego, who was sentenced this month to eight years in prison after pleading guilty to accepting more than $2.4 million in cars, homes, furnishings and other bribes in exchange for steering Pentagon contracts to two defense contractors. As part of the plea deal, Mr. Cunningham forfeited many items he received from several "co-conspirators," who government officials say lavished money and gifts on the former congressman.

Today, Mr. Cunningham's collection of antique furniture and Oriental rugs is in a warehouse south of Compton, Calif., where they will be auctioned today. The sale includes three antique commodes, including two from the 1800s, two silver candelabras and oak hutches, one with multicolored glass doors adorned with carved lion heads and brass rings. Also on the block are eight Oriental rugs, along with three antique oak doors with multicolored glass panels. Buyers can bid for Mr. Cunningham's bed, a cherry-wood Stickley sleigh bed that prosecutors say was bought, along with a brown leather sofa, for $6,632.

Auction officials won't disclose what they expect Mr. Cunningham's items to fetch; any money raised will go to the U.S. Treasury Asset forfeiture fund. "People pay top dollar to dealers and unfortunately a lot of the stuff doesn't have as strong a resale value," says Victor Wiener, an independent appraiser with Wiener Wolf Associates in New York. On top of that, Mr. Wiener says, Mr. Cunningham's items aren't that impressive.

"If one is taking payment of objects in lieu of cash you better be sure you're getting a real bargain as opposed to paying too much," he says. Given what Mr. Cunningham received, Mr. Wiener says, "I would have taken the cash."

Poetic Justice: These Bribes Are Going, Going, Gone (WP)

By William Booth

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

RANCHO DOMINGUEZ, Calif. -- Behold! The disgraced congressman's silver-plated, five-light candelabrum with matching "bobbishes" (that would be Lot No. 61) out on the auction block in this cavernous and cold warehouse east of the Port of Los Angeles.

See! His most intimate household items set out for crass inspection and actual touching by the viewing public, like some kind of garage sale of infamy -- the 1920s lingerie cabinet with the scratched drawers, the 19th-century Louis-Phillipe commode with the cracked (but professionally restored) black marble top, the red-and-blue wool Oriental rug . . . with a stain in the center. The stuff is all just there, plop, sharing space with other criminally gotten gains, seized from or forfeited by his fellow felons, the cigarette smugglers, software pirates, credit card frauds and drug traffickers.

Is it sad or is it justly delicious? For today all will be sold to the highest bidder -- the physical evidence of the corruption incarnate that earlier this month sent former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham -- the eight-term, 64-year-old, blustery conservative Republican lawmaker -- from the better suburbs of San Diego to eight years and four months in federal prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors and evading more than $1 million in taxes.

Alas, the "Duke-Stir" (as his boat-bribe at the Capital Yacht Club was named) will blubber for mercy while on camera no more -- or at least not for seven years and a month (the 85 percent federal minimum for time to be served). History will judge the man and his crimes. On Tuesday, Jean Marc Garcell was judging Cunningham's taste in carpets.

"I've got my eye on Number 63," Garcell says, planning to return Thursday to wave his paddle and bid. He is coy about how much he thinks the red, blue and ivory rug will fetch, because the commercial pilot doesn't want to tip his hand, but he concedes it may garner $10,000 or more. "It's Iranian, 200 knots, and," Garcell lowers his voice, "handmade. And that's huuuuge."

Question: Does notoriety increase the value of an antique? Meaning, is a greater price placed upon a leaded glass Tiffany-style lamp because it was once owned by a congressman who got defense contractors to pay for his daughter's graduation party and actually jotted down a "bribe menu" on his own House of Representatives stationery ($18 million in government defense contracts in exchange for $50,000, for example) -- a crime that prosecutors described in their sentencing filing as a "malversation . . . unprecedented in the long history of Congress" (wow) -- or does it make the stuff worth less, because it's creepy?

"It is possible some would be interested in the items for their, mmm, historical interest," says Angie Ortanez, a criminal investigator and press officer with the Internal Revenue Service, which along with the FBI ran Cunningham to ground and will split the proceeds of the seized-property auction.

Potential buyer Garcell is not moved one way or the other by the previous owner. "But yes, to some of my good Democratic friends, I'll tell them," he says. A kind of party favor.

"A wild card." That's how Britney Sheehan of EG&G Technical Services, which runs the auction, describes the provenance issue regarding the Duke loot. Sheehan cannot reveal what the minimum bids must be for any item, nor what she and her appraisers think the stuff is worth, because such information may smack of inside trading, collusion and bid-rigging (and there's been quite enough of that, thank you very much).

The Cunninghamanalia (Lots 61 through 95) is against one warehouse wall, but his criminal proceeds are surrounded by a crazy quilt of other goods nabbed at the ports by Customs or seized by other federal law-enforcement agents. So there are black lace bras beside engine blocks. A wood carving of the Last Supper. A box of plastic pretzels. Cases of single-malt scotch. Lots of flip-flops. Baggies filled with cultured black pearls from Tahiti. Cartons of off-brand cigarettes (Bronco Ultra Lights). And a silver Ferrari.

Drug dealer, huh?

"Actually, a software pirate," Sheehan says.

The Cunningham Collection includes a dozen Oriental or Persian carpets (some machine-made), a few knickknacks and the furniture, which includes armoires and nightstands as well as the aforementioned lingerie cabinet (like a wardrobe, with drawers inside) and the French commode (commode not being a toilet or chamber pot, but a style of chest of drawers that sits on low legs).

How to put this?

The congressman's tastes were eclectic and a little ostentatious. The man drove a Rolls (a bribe). His furnishings have a similar plea for attention: They shout "antique," even when they are reproductions.

A former Navy fighter pilot he may have been (he named one of his bribe-laundering companies Top Gun Enterprises); his personal style veered toward large, dark, wood Frenchy pieces, with lots of marble and mirror and stained glass, and a certain amount of decorative flourish. In a previous Washington Post article, the reporters described Cunningham's taste as "surprisingly delicate." We might amend that as "surprisingly fussy."

"I'd call it ornate," Sheehan says.

We stood to admire his 32-foot-long Oriental runner. Thirty-two feet is one long runner. "And you don't see any of the creases that would indicate it was used on a stairway," Sheehan says. So we're talking long hallways. (Was the man was just begging to be caught?) Also, a hodgepodge of periods are represented. "You've got your French provincial and art deco and modern and some things that look like Americana," Sheehan says. Naturally, you'd have to see it all together at his mansion (bought with bribe money) down in Rancho Santa Fe to see if the artwork and throw pillows brought it all together.

Among those inspecting Cunningham's forfeitures were several citizens who were not aware that they once belonged to a former congressman, and when reminded about the scandal, still it didn't ring a bell.

DOJ_NMG_0020379

Janice Sherwood was accompanying her husband, who "loves government seizures," and she said the Cunningham collection made her mad ("the country's at war") but did not completely surprise, along the lines of "they're all crooks." Would she like to bid? Nope, not her style. "I like brighter colors, lighter woods," Sherwood says.

Officers' Site Sinks Into Outlet For Attacks (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

What's up with the cop in Silver Spring who's ratting out colleagues? That was the question raised by a police officer who started a thread on the online message board of the Montgomery County police union on July 15, 2004.

Within minutes, a flurry of responses began pouring in to the site, one of many online forums that have changed the way police gripe and gossip.

They called the African American officer in question a "rat," a racist and a lazy cop who needed to "be put in her place." Then her husband -- the department's former diversity training teacher, who was brought in after the agency came under scrutiny over allegations of racial profiling -- was dragged into the online onslaught.

"Let him jump out and scream profiling at me on a traffic stop," a writer identified only as "Irish Cop 4 Life" wrote. "The only profile he's going to see is mine driving him into the pavement by his racist skull!!!"

The message board was designed as a forum where officers could trade tips, complaints and light banter. But several officers say it has become an outlet for personal attacks -- often laced with racist language, sexual harassment and disparaging remarks about police supervisors, county leaders, immigrants and residents.

Copies of the messages from the password-protected Web site provided to The Post provide a rare glimpse of some officers talking among themselves. The authenticity of the messages, posted from 2004 to this year, was verified by officers with access to the site.

The officer attacked in July 2004 was Cpl. Sonia Pruitt, identified on the site not only by her name but also her professional particulars: badge No. 1134, Silver Spring station, central business district. She said the attack stemmed from a misunderstanding of an innocuous episode involving an officer she believed did not follow proper procedure during an arrest.

The threat about her husband would have been jarring in any context, Pruitt said. But coming from one of her colleagues -- only Montgomery County police officers have access to the forum -- it was downright bloodcurdling.

"Who's to say a guy with a gun wouldn't hurt my husband on a traffic stop?" she asked.

Officers concerned about what they describe as a spate of increasingly odious exchanges say union leaders and police supervisors have largely ignored their complaints. The union president said the site is deliberately uncensored, but he said he discourages its use as an outlet for personal attacks, harassment and racist language.

Police Chief J. Thomas Manger said he has known for some time that some officers were unhappy with the message boards, but he said he was unaware of the nature of the offensive threads until a reporter read him a sample.

"I'm very disappointed to know that we have a handful of employees that would write some of the things that are written in this forum," Manger said. "I know it does not reflect 99 percent of our employees. I will not tolerate any unlawful or improper conduct by any police department employee in the course of their duties."

Five officers interviewed for this story said they think the uncivil messages are the work of a loud minority and do not reflect the values of most officers. But they say the messages offer a disturbing look into the minds of some of their colleagues, and they say they worry that the postings might influence rookies.

"If you treat your brothers and sisters like this," said Detective Terry Ridgley, president of the department's black officers association, "how can we expect you to treat members of the community with respect?"

The county's immigrants, a segment of the population whose trust the police department has worked hard to gain, have frequently been the target of offensive messages.

A January thread that started with a message about a sign at a district station turned into a rant about the county's changing demographics. One officer identified only as "4D" -- the Wheaton district station -- wrote: "Half of the district NO HABLA!!!! COMPRENDE??" Another poster using the pseudonym "SE HABLA AWE SCREW IT, HANDS UP PACO" responded later in the thread, which had "Ig'nant" as a subject line: "HALF, TRY 90 PERCENT . . . BEANERS GO HOME."

A February thread started by an officer looking for "a good painter that would be cheap" led to messages about the Minutemen, an anti-illegal immigration group that recently started scouting day laborer sites in the county.

"Casa de Maryland should be done away with, as should any safehaven for illegals," one writer, identified only as "." offered, referring to a group that assists immigrants in the county. "In 20 years you'll have 150 channels of Telemundo, and you'll be paying for English-language channels -- and you'll be at the day laborer center, waiting for a pick-up."

DOJ_NMG_0020380

Another poster, who said he was a Hispanic officer, shot back: "This is the trash I have to deal [with] in this department everyday and it's getting really old. Cut it off. Next time when you call a signal 13" -- code for an officer in distress -- "or help for translation look around and see who's backing you up. Be safe."

Non-Hispanic immigrants have also been trounced on the site. In August 2004, officers criticized a group of African immigrants who protested after a Montgomery officer fatally shot Peter Ayompeuh Njang, 25, a Cameroonian immigrant, on Aug. 12 in Silver Spring.

"What I'd like to know is how many of the protesters are illegals, and how many will be arriving to the demonstration in unregistered, uninsured vehicles with someone else's credit card," one officer identified as "Status Quo" wrote.

Race and demographics are not the only volatile subjects on the boards. There have been sexually explicit postings. One depicted a fictional incident involving a female police commander in SWAT gear demanding sex from a female job applicant. Another posted under the name of a sergeant described how he masturbated while driving.

Message boards frequented by law enforcement officials have proliferated rapidly in recent years, said Chip DeBlock, a detective with the Tampa Police Department who started http://www.leoaffairs.com , a site that hosts more than 150 message boards for law enforcement communities, which he said gets more than 4 million hits per month.

DeBlock said the forums allow officers from different states to swap tips, discuss procedures and speak frankly to management -- frequently emboldened by anonymity.

Keeping the exchanges civil on the leoaffairs.com boards has required the help of 150 volunteer moderators.

In recent years, officers in Baltimore, New York and Detroit have been fired or suspended for running Web sites with online message boards that got out of hand, according to news accounts of those cases. In 2002, 24 District police officers were suspended after an investigation into the use of squad car computers to send offensive or threatening e-mail.

Montgomery officers say the union has declined to require posters to identity themselves on the message boards, a simple step they say would tame the content.

Walter Bader, president of the county's Fraternal Order of Police lodge, said some of the egregious messages could be the work of nonunion members who may have hacked into the site to undermine the union.

"We don't censor it, we don't actively monitor it," Bader said. "It's free speech, it's 2006, it's technology. I don't agree with some of what I see on there. I don't think people should slander each other. But we're in a free country. We should embrace free speech."

Montgomery officers say the command staff has known about the forum for several months but has not publicly denounced the destructive content. Although the department has no oversight over the board, officers said, commanders could easily restrict access to it from work computers.

"I'm ashamed of my department if they allow this to go on," said Eric Mason, a detective with the department's major crimes unit.

DeLay Attorney Wants Court's Decision Quickly (USAT)

By Jim Drinkard

USA Today, March 23, 2006

Rep. Tom DeLay's lawyer had one primary wish Wednesday when he went before a Texas appeals court deliberating whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against his client: Whatever you decide, do it soon.

“It is important to us to get this over with as quickly as possible,” Dick DeGuerin, the attorney, said in an interview. He represents the former House majority leader in a case alleging that DeLay raised corporate money and funneled it illegally to Republican state legislative candidates in 2002.

Wednesday's arguments focused on a narrow legal point: whether the conspiracy statute applied to state election law in 2002, when DeLay and political consultants close to him worked to help Republicans take control of the state House. DeLay has said he has done nothing wrong.

Judge Pat Priest ruled last fall that the conspiracy law didn't apply until 2003 after the Legislature acted to clarify the statute. He dismissed the conspiracy charge and let stand related money-laundering charges. Prosecutors argued Wednesday that the conspiracy law had always been applicable and that the Legislature acted only to make that clearer.

A ruling isn't likely before next month. If the prosecutors lose, they could appeal to the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals, the state's highest court for criminal cases, further delaying final disposition of the indictment.

DeGuerin said he hopes for a summer trial that will clear the issue away before DeLay faces the voters. Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, he contended, wants “to stall long enough to have him under indictment in November.” Earle, a Democrat, has denied he has partisan motives.

DOJ_NMG_0020381

The damage from the indictment is already significant. DeLay gave up his House leadership post in January and endured a challenge in his own party's primary election this month.

The legal proceedings are a reminder of the minefield that DeLay faces until Election Day, the make-or-break moment in his 28-year life in politics.

There's not only the money-laundering case brought by Earle. Perhaps more serious for DeLay is a spreading corruption investigation of Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff, whom DeLay once described as “one of my closest and dearest friends.”

That investigation has brought a guilty plea from Michael Scanlon, a former DeLay press secretary, who is cooperating with prosecutors as they pursue other indictments.

Whether that evidence leads to direct charges against DeLay may not be known for months. That uncertainty complicates his re-election campaign, says Earl Black, a political scientist at Rice University in Houston.

“It's going to be an ongoing up-and-down situation for as far ahead as the eye can see,” Black says. “None of it is good for DeLay.”

“No one knows when this is going to end,” says Richard Cullen, the lawyer representing DeLay in the Abramoff matter. “DeLay is confident that when it ends, the prosecutors will conclude that he's done nothing wrong.”

The redrawn map of Texas congressional districts that DeLay engineered in 2003 has added to his own jeopardy even as it is helping his Republican colleagues in the House of Representatives. His suburban Houston district remains distinctly Republican, although less so than before the remapping. The change has been magnified by a migration of Asians, blacks and Hispanics into the district.

A CNN/USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in DeLay's district in December found signs of trouble. Among registered voters, 36% said they would vote for DeLay, 49% for an unspecified Democrat.

Fifty-two percent said they had an unfavorable view of their congressman. Asked about the legal charges against him, 55% said they are “definitely” or “probably” true.

For DeLay's Democratic opponent in November, former representative Nick Lampson, the race is as much payback as comeback. Lampson of Beaumont lost his old seat as a result of DeLay's new map.

The race has gained national interest, and both sides will draw financial support from outside Texas, possibly eclipsing the $10 million record for spending in a House race set in California in 2000.

“It will be a slugfest,” Black says, and “a referendum on DeLay.”

DeLay wasn't anywhere near the Austin courtroom Wednesday. He was in his district, campaigning.

Lawyer For DeLay Urges Ruling Soon (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

AUSTIN, March 22 -- The arguments before the state 3rd Court of Appeals on Wednesday were about whether a felony charge of conspiracy to violate the Texas Election Code should be reinstated against former House majority leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). But the underlying issue was politics.

In a thinly veiled reference to DeLay's bid for reelection this year while under indictment on state money-laundering and conspiracy charges, the congressman's attorney asked the three-judge panel to rule quickly.

"Justice delayed is justice denied in this case," Houston lawyer Dick DeGuerin said in his opening remarks. "I ask you treat this case with dispatch and render decision forthwith."

DeGuerin later told reporters the criminal case against DeLay has clearly affected not only his reign as majority leader but also his quest to win a 12th term to Congress this year. DeLay was forced to step down from his leadership post upon being indicted in September on charges stemming from the 2002 election cycle.

With a trial looming sometime in 2006, Republicans permanently replaced DeLay last month by electing Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio as majority leader.

Earlier this month, DeLay faced an unusually large field of opponents in the Republican primary in his suburban Houston district. Although he handily won the four-way race, he faces a much tougher general election. He did not attend Wednesday's hearing but spent the day in his district.

"He's going to have an extremely well-funded opponent in November," DeGuerin said, predicting a large infusion of money into the campaign of DeLay's Democratic opponent, former representative Nick Lampson.

"I think we're going to see the outside money come into this race. It will make 2002 and 2003 pale by comparison," DeGuerin said. "The November elections are coming up. That's very important."

The case before the 3rd Court of Appeals was brought by Travis County District Attorney Ronnie Earle, who is attempting to reinstate against DeLay a felony charge of conspiracy to violate the state election code. The charge was dismissed in December by Senior District Court Judge Pat Priest, who concluded the election-code allegation was not covered by Texas's conspiracy law until 2003, a year after Earle said the violation occurred.

Priest left standing charges of money laundering. Both indictments stem from allegations that DeLay and two political associates funneled $190,000 in illegal corporate donations to Republican candidates for the Texas House of Representatives in 2002. Those contributions helped Republicans gain control of the state legislature. In 2003, at DeLay's behest, the legislature approved a congressional redistricting plan that sent more Republicans from Texas to Congress in the 2004 election.

The arguments Wednesday, presented by Assistant District Attorney Rick Reed and rebutted by DeGuerin, focused on technical legal questions -- an exchange that DeGuerin joked afterward was as exciting as "watching paint dry."

Addressing reporters, Earle said he believes both sides had had an opportunity to more fully explain their positions. "I will say that to violate the election laws of Texas is a crime . . . and we will await the court's decision," he said.

It was unclear when the appeals court will rule. Priest is awaiting resolution of the appeal until proceeding with DeLay's trial on the money-laundering charge. Also before the trial starts, Priest will have to decide several motions by DeLay's lawyer, including a request to move the trial to DeLay's home town of Sugar Land.

Prosecutors Want DeLay Charges Reinstated (AP-Y2)

By April Castro

AP2, March 22, 2006

Prosecutors argued before a Texas appeals court Wednesday that some of the criminal charges against Rep. Tom Delay (news, bio, voting record) should be reinstated.

A lower court judge dismissed a conspiracy charge against DeLay in December, agreeing with defense arguments that a conspiracy law did not cover election code violations when the alleged offense was committed.

But prosecutors said Wednesday that Texas' prohibition on using corporate money in political campaigns is a felony and should be subject to the state's criminal conspiracy law.

The three-judge panel of the Texas 3rd Court of Appeals was not expected to rule for at least a month.

DeLay, who is trying to win re-election to Congress while under indictment, did not attend the hearing, where attorneys mostly focused on technical legal questions.

He spent the day campaigning in what many consider his most serious election challenge since voters sent him to Congress in 1984. The Republican faces Democratic former Rep. Nick Lampson in November.

"I let the lawyers worry about that stuff," he said while entering a country club to deliver a five-minute speech to the Rotary Club of Sugar Land. "I'm here focused on my district and focused on the election."

DeLay is accused of funneling illegal corporate donations to Republican candidates for the Texas House. The Republicans went on to win control of the Legislature in 2002 and pushed through a DeLay-engineered redistricting plan that helped Texas send more Republicans to Congress in 2004.

Because of the dispute, no trial date has been set.

DeLay Campaigns As Lawyers Battle (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

DALLAS -- U.S. Rep. Tom DeLay campaigned in his southwest Houston area district yesterday while his attorneys battled for him before an Austin appeals court.

"I let the lawyers worry about that stuff," he said to reporters as he entered a Sugar Land Rotary Club meeting, where he made a brief campaign speech.

Meanwhile in Austin, Dick DeGuerin, Mr. DeLay's lead attorney, argued that two state conspiracy charges against his client should not be reinstated -- charges that were dropped by state District Judge Pat Priest several weeks ago.

Those charges were part of wide-ranging indictments surrounding Mr. DeLay's role in using corporate funds to help Republicans win control of the Texas Legislature in 2002 and then win several congressional races two years afterward.

Judge Priest ruled that one indictment dealing with purported election-code conspiracy was improper because the conspiracy part of the code was not operative at the time of the reputed infractions. The judge also dropped part of another conspiracy count, but left intact other money-laundering charges and one for conspiracy to launder money.

Mr. DeGuerin argued that contributions from corporations and other sources were kept in separate accounts and -- despite the fact that the exact amount of the $190,000 in question was sent to Washington, then back to Republican candidates in Texas -- the money was never intended to be a trade-off for support of the Texas candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0020383

In a brief filed earlier, Mr. DeGuerin accused the state of appealing Judge Priest's decision "to avoid trial and the embarrassment of an acquittal in this politically motivated prosecution."

Mr. DeLay, attempting to win his House seat a 12th time in Texas' 22nd District, faces former congressman Nick Lampson, a well-financed Democrat, in November. He has campaigned harder in this election than ever before -- partly because of the uncertainty surrounding his legal problems.

"I'm focused on my district and focused on the election," he said, but added: "It's been almost 120 days that this frivolous appeal has been before the 3rd Circuit Court. I would hope that they would come to a speedy resolution on a matter that, I think, would take a first-year law student an hour to make a ruling on."

Much of the presentation yesterday dealt with technicalities of the state election code. The state's offering yesterday was handled by Travis County Assistant District Attorney Richard Reed.

The appeals court is expected to make a decision within a month.

Judge Priest has left Mr. DeLay's trial date in limbo until this appeal process has straightened out the eventual charges.

Dixon Sees Organized Effort To Discredit Her (BSUN)

By Doug Donovan

The Baltimore Sun, March 23, 2006

Baltimore City Council President Sheila Dixon broke her silence Wednesday over an investigation into her ties to two city contractors by saying the state probe is "trying to destroy my character."

Since state prosecutors began their investigation 10 days ago, Dixon and her staff had said only "no comment" but had pledged to cooperate with Maryland State Prosecutor Robert A. Rohrbaugh's investigators.

But after the city's Board of Estimates met Wednesday, Dixon directly responded to reporters' questions.

"In my heart, I did nothing intentional in any of this," she said. "This has legs on it that's trying to destroy my character. I would never do anything to the citizens of Baltimore, as hard as I work."

A few minutes later, as she walked out of the meeting room in City Hall, she said, "My character is being discredited." Asked whether she thinks there is an organized effort to discredit her character, she said, "Yes, I do."

Dixon declined a request to elaborate on her comments shortly after the meeting.

Bobbie Walton, executive director of Common Cause Maryland, a public interest watchdog group, said she was disappointed with Dixon's comments.

"I wonder who she thinks is out to get her," Walton said. "It's hard to take responsibility for your own behavior sometimes. And it's much easier to think that 'they' are out to get you."

It might be difficult for public officials to abide by the rules that govern their positions, Walton said, but "you still have to do it."

City Solicitor Ralph S. Tyler has confirmed that prosecutors have issued grand jury subpoenas for documents from six city agencies: the Board of Estimates, the City Council, the Office of Council Services, the Minority and Women's Business Opportunity Office, Mayor Martin O'Malley's Office of Minority Business Development and the mayor's Finance Department.

Officials with at least three companies that have done work for the city or have tried to win government contracts -- Comcast, Early Morning Software of Baltimore and Snell Enterprises of Columbia -- have confirmed that they have received subpoenas. A fourth company, Sysnet of Ameri ca in Prince George's County, is scheduled to meet with prosecutors.

The first round of subpoenas, delivered at the start of last week, requested documents related to $600,000 of work awarded over the past six years -- most of the time without a contract -- to Dixon's former campaign chairman, Dale G. Clark, and his company, Ultimate Network Integration.

A second batch of subpoenas, delivered at the end of last week, requested documents relating to Union Technologies, a company that employs the council president's sister, Janice Dixon, and has received city work from two major government contractors; Comcast, the city's cable television provider; and TeleCommunications Systems Inc., which man ages the city's computer network.

A TCS spokesman said the Annapolis company had not received a subpoena. The president of Utech has not returned phone calls. Its registered agent, attorney Claude Edward Hitchcock, has declined to comment.

Clark has said that he has not received a subpoena.

The investigations began after recent articles in The Sun detailed questions about city work awarded to Clark's company and Union Technologies.

Last month, The Sun reported that Dixon might have breached the city's ethics law by not disclosing her sister's employment and by participating in public hearings and votes over the past two years that involved and benefited Utech.

DOJ_NMG_0020384

After The Sun's article about Dixon's connections to Utech, the city stripped the company of its official minority certification, which had qualified it to be hired by companies seeking to meet Baltimore's minority subcontracting goals.

Utech lost the certification because the business opportunity office found that its downtown office was nothing more than a telephone and a mailbox. The head of the office said he would review whether Utech performed work under its TCS contract with the city.

The Sun also reported that Clark's company, which has the same address as Union Technologies, signed a contract with Dixon

in February 2000 to manage the council's computer system. The Board of Estimates, which Dixon chairs and O'Malley controls, approved the one-year deal a month later.

When the contract expired in March 2001, Clark did not obtain another one for five years while the city continued to make payments to him totaling $500,000. O'Malley's finance officials have not been able to determine why or how Clark was paid without a contract.

City procurement rules require that the Board of Estimates approve all contracts of more than $5,000.

Clark continued to get paid for the work after the city awarded a contract to another company in May 2005. He left the council president's office Feb. 28, just before The Sun published a report detailing the arrangement.

Dixon disciplined two staff members over the Clark matter, and her spokesman called the situation a "major oversight."

"She probably did the right thing to discipline her staff members," Walton said. "But you have to take responsibility for your own behavior too."

On Paper, Leaving A Gang Is Difficult (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Sandy Banks, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

L.A. uses injunctions to fight thugs, but those who go straight find it's hard to get off the list.

After more than a decade of successfully using restrictive court injunctions to battle dangerous street gangs, some Los Angeles officials now fear that key provisions have unfairly held back young people struggling to go straight.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said Wednesday that though he wants to expand the use of a tool that has proved effective in the city's fight against an estimated 39,000 hoodlums, he and City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo have agreed to first conduct a comprehensive evaluation of the injunction program.

"We want to take a look at all of them, do a top-to-bottom review that will include making sure the appropriate people are [listed] in them, because some of these injunctions go back 13 years," Bratton said.

City Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who represents a district plagued by some of the worst gang violence in the city, said the injunction program appears to be doing harm as well as good.

Hahn said that after she and Bratton attended a recent community meeting in Watts, she became concerned because no one has ever succeeded in getting removed from an injunction's official list of restricted gang members.

Young people covered by injunctions can have trouble getting jobs because the injunctions show up in employment background checks. Some have trouble getting to work or even school because they cannot ride in cars or buses if other gang members are present.

And they may be disqualified from participating in school sports if former associates play in the same league.

Critics say the injunctions sometimes target people who were never in a gang but had relatives or friends who were.

Bratton "heard loud and clear from the community that there is a gray area of young people who had one foot in, but have really tried to turn their lives around, are going to school, have jobs and are looking for a second chance," Hahn said. "But the fact that their names are on the list makes it problematic to do that."

On Wednesday, Hahn sent a letter to Bratton, Delgadillo and Police Commission President John W. Mack, asking that they meet with her April 11 to discuss the evaluation.

Her call for changes in the injunctions was seen by some as ironic given that her brother, former Mayor and longtime City Atty. James K. Hahn, pioneered the use of gang injunctions.

The use of injunctions has made Los Angeles a model for anti-gang efforts. Mayors from across the country are coming to Los Angeles next week to hear about the program at a summit sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The injunctions typically identify gang members and prohibit them from associating in public or loitering in certain neighborhoods. And they allow for enhanced penalties for members who trespass, gamble, violate curfew, commit vandalism or break other laws.

Members may not possess weapons, spray-paint cans used in graffiti or open containers of alcohol.

DOJ_NMG_0020385

They also are enjoined from being near anyone selling or possessing drugs, which may be difficult if drug dealers operate in front of their homes, civil rights attorneys say.

Community leaders, including Silvia Beltran of the gang-intervention program Homies Unidos, say there are many examples of people being improperly included in injunctions.

Beltran said she knows one young man who graduated from Cal State Los Angeles and was working on a master's degree at USC when he was charged with violating an old injunction.

The man won dismissal of the charge in criminal court, and might sue the city to get his name off the list.

"He denies that he was an active gang member," Beltran said. "But he grew up in the neighborhood, and it's easy to be included."

Over the years, about 2,000 to 3,000 people have been served with gang injunctions and therefore are subject to restrictions, said Assistant City Atty. Marty Vranicar. He said about 350 gang members have been prosecuted for violating injunctions, and many have been sent to jail.

If police suspect someone is a gang member not listed in the original injunction, the city can still serve them and add their name to a list kept by the LAPD's gang enforcement unit.

Mark Harvis, a deputy public defender who has handled many gang cases, said that part of the city's policy is fundamentally unfair because the person served with an injunction often does not know why he is being included. Harvis said there also is no process for appealing the inclusion.

Delgadillo firmly defended the current standard for getting out of a gang injunction, although he also said Wednesday that he is open to refining the program. "Gangs are an epidemic in the city of Los Angeles" Delgadillo said, adding that injunctions "do have an effect."

Bratton said he believes that gang injunctions are one reason violent crime is down 6.4% so far this year in Los Angeles.

The city has 26 civil gang injunctions covering 36 gangs, and more are imminent, said Contessa Mankiewicz, a spokeswoman for the city attorney.

Since the first injunction was obtained in 1993 against the Blythe Street gang in Van Nuys, gangs occupying more than 60 square miles of territory in the city of Los Angeles — 13% of its total area — have been made subject to civil injunctions.

In many injunctions, a number of gang members are identified by name in the court papers, but the injunction also includes dozens of "John Does" to be named later.

Once the permanent injunction is issued, officers can identify gang associates and include their names in a database that makes them subject to the injunction's restrictions.

Injunctions rely, at least in part, on the state's Cal/Gang database, a computerized list of people considered to be gang members based on criteria that include identification by informants, gang tattoos, style of dress, arrest record and associations.

That database has been criticized by law enforcement officials and civil rights activists for being outdated and overly broad.

"We found people in that database whose information came from 20-year-old [confidential] gang cards," said civil rights attorney Connie Rice. "Middle-class citizens who own homes, work, have children, haven't been involved in gangs for years and years and years…. The problem is, there's no exit ramp. You can get on, but you can't get off."

Civil rights attorney Carol Sobel, who has challenged a gang injunction in court, said it appears some people have been added to the database just because they were stopped and interviewed by the police for being near known gang members.

City officials say injunctions contain escape avenues for gang members who are no longer active.

Most are like the injunction against the Grape Street Crips, which allows those identified to ask to be excluded if they publicly renounce their gang membership and sign a sworn statement that they have not associated with other gang members for at least three years and not had run-ins with the law in that same period.

The alleged gang member must also have been employed or attended school and made consistent progress, both for at least 18 months before the renunciation.

Bratton acknowledged that if a former gang member lives in a housing project populated by gang members, he might find it impossible to escape being seen in their company.

The review will also look at the requirement for people to publicly renounce their gang membership, Bratton said, adding there may be an alternative.

"That is the biggest hurdle I have heard people talk about," Bratton said. "Is there a potential danger in doing that? That's an element of the review."

(INFOBOX BELOW)

At a glance

Q: How many gang members are in Los Angeles?

DOJ_NMG_0020386

A: About 39,000, according to the city attorney's office. Gang members commit about 7,000 crimes a year, including about 300 murders.

Q: How many gangs have been cited by injunctions?

A: Thirty-six gangs have been named in 26 injunctions.

Q: How do injunctions work?

A: If gang members are known to be causing trouble, the city can ask a judge to declare them a criminal street gang and a public nuisance. Much like restraining orders, the civil court rulings impose various restrictions. Violators can be fined $1,000 or jailed for up to six months.

Q: What conduct is typically prohibited?

A: Members must obey all laws and avoid using drugs and alcohol. They cannot publicly associate, block parking, intimidate people, carry illegal weapons or vandalism tools, loiter, act as lookouts or so-called "hooks," trespass, gamble, obstruct traffic, violate curfew or approach vehicles.

Dangerous Prosecution (WP)

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

THE UNITED STATES has never had an Official Secrets Act -- a law that would forbid anyone, even a private citizen, from disclosing information the government wants to keep under wraps. But if the Justice Department has its way in the prosecution of two former officials of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), it will effectively have created one -- without even going to Congress for a change in the law. The case against Steven J. Rosen and Keith Weissman is heading toward trial. Their conviction would herald a dangerous aggrandizement of the government's power not merely to prosecute leaks but to force ordinary Americans to keep its secrets.

Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman are accused of conspiring to give national defense information to people not authorized to receive it -- including officials of the Israeli government, a Post reporter and other officials at AIPAC. Despite the suggestive tenor of the indictment, prosecutors have not accused either man of spying. Rather, the government has charged them under an old and vaguely worded law that prohibits people in possession of such information from disclosing it further.

The reach of this law, which dates from the World War I era, has never been clear. By its terms, it would seem to require every person to protect the government's secrets -- a principle hardly in keeping with the American system of robust public debate. While it is reasonable for the government to demand that its employees and contractors protect the information it entrusts to them, it's not okay to criminalize discussions among people who do not work, directly or indirectly, for the government. Traditionally, the government has treaded carefully with this law, using it sparingly even against government employees.

The AIPAC case marks a dangerous break with that tradition. We do not defend the alleged actions of Mr. Rosen and Mr. Weissman, whom AIPAC fired. According to the indictment, they received classified information from Pentagon analyst Lawrence A. Franklin and passed it to the Israeli Embassy. The indictment alleges similar behavior in the past. But the government isn't even trying to prove spying charges. Instead, prosecutors have proceeded under a legal theory that must alarm anyone who values open debate.

Under the government's reading of the law, there is no reason why newspaper reporters who publish classified information could not face charges. Nor, indeed, would anything protect activists who brought secrets to members of Congress. Under the government's theory, in fact, countless conversations and publications that take place every day are criminal acts. The government makes this point explicitly in its briefs: While acknowledging that a prosecution of "an actual member of the press for publishing classified information" would "raise legitimate and serious issues," it says that "[there] plainly is no exemption in the statutes for the press, let alone lobbyists like the defendants." You don't have to anticipate an immediate raft of prosecutions of such people to appreciate the danger of a precedent that would permit it.

CIVIL LAW:

Court Agrees To Appoint Equity Panel In Delphi Ch.11 Case (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK -(Dow Jones)- A federal court on Wednesday approved a request from a hedge fund seeking an official voice for equity holders in Delphi Corp.'s (DPH) (DPHIQ) Chapter 11 case, departing from typical bankruptcy practice.

"Clearly this company has extremely difficult problems to resolve," and shareholders need a voice in that process, U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain said.

Appaloosa Management L.P., one of Delphi's largest shareholders with about 9% of its stock, has asked the auto parts maker to move ahead with a canceled shareholder meeting and wanted the court to appoint an official committee to represent stockholders in the case. Another money management firm that holds about 5% of Delphi's equity supported the motion.

Over a two-day trial, experts and attorneys for Delphi and Appaloosa argued widely differing positions about the company's prospects for reducing labor and retiree costs and how its securities would perform upon emergence from bankruptcy.

"I respect (the judge's) determination," Delphi lawyer Jack Butler said. "The judge wanted to provide for limited equity representation in a very complex situation."

Appaloosa attorney Thomas Lauria said he was happy Delphi's shareholders have a voice and said it seemed likely Appaloosa would fight for a seat on the committee when the US Trustee names its members.

During the trial, Appaloosa said Delphi's financial situation isn't as dire as management makes it out to be and there will be money left over for existing stockholders after Delphi pays off its secured and unsecured creditors. An expert hired by the investment fund, headed by David Tepper, projects Delphi will have 2006 EBITDA of $100 million and an equity value of up to $6 billion, once it cuts labor and retiree costs through its reorganization.

Delphi, for its part, argued it is "hopelessly insolvent" - with $6 billion more in liabilities than assets - so an equity committee isn't warranted because its stock will be worthless. The company filed for Chapter 11 in October 2005. Its January monthly operating report filed with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan listed assets of $13.8 billion and liabilities of $20.2 billion.

Under the Bankruptcy Code, equity holders are last in line to receive a payout and can't receive any recovery unless all other creditors in the case are paid in full, so naming an official committee solely to represent equity is considered unusual. Official committees in Chapter 11 cases have their legal fees paid by the debtor company, so they regularly face opposition from creditors.

During the contentious hearing, Judge Drain said he wasn't pleased by some of Appaloosa's legal tactics, particularly efforts to suppress the testimony of two of Delphi's expert witnesses and complaints about not receiving company data to which Drain determined they weren't entitled. He said Appaloosa's conduct during the litigation gave him "very serious pause," over appointing an equity committee.

Delphi's Butler wouldn't comment on whether the company would oppose Appaloosa's appointment to the panel.

Appaloosa has said any equity panel would closely monitor the case and be involved in negotiations or litigation involving the relationship between Delphi and its former parent General Motors Corp. (GM) (GM).

Appaloosa accumulated its Delphi stake after the company filed for bankruptcy protection and began its push for an official shareholder panel in November. The U.S. Trustee's Office - an arm of the Justice Department that normally appoints committees in bankruptcy case - was considering an equity committee request from Appaloosa but hadn't yet made a decision when the firm asked the court for a committee. The U.S. Trustee objected to Appaloosa's motion, as did the company's unsecured creditors committee.

Judge Drain said the equity panel can't immediately hire investment bankers and accountants. Drain wants to limit costs and doesn't want arguments over valuation of the company until after it works out its union issues.

Shares of GM were higher earlier Wednesday, while Delphi stock was down substantially, after the announcement of a three-part deal among GM, Delphi and the United Auto Workers union that provides for early retirement buyouts for thousands of workers. The plan would offer 13,000 Delphi workers payouts of up to $35,000 each for retiring early, for which GM has agreed to cover the bill. The pact could save the companies billions in labor costs - after the up-front payouts to early retirees - through workforce reductions.

However, a broader labor agreement is still lacking at Delphi so a strike by union workers is still possible when Delphi seeks to have its labor agreements rejected through the bankruptcy case - which it says it will do by the end of the month without a new collective bargaining agreement in place.

A hearing on the partial labor deal is scheduled for April 7, according to an attorney.

Judge Scolds LAPD For Decree 'failure' (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) -- A federal judge scolded city officials for failing to meet key provisions of a 2001 court consent decree to reform the Police Department.

DOJ_NMG_0020388

The decree was the result of a settlement with the Justice Department and was designed to correct conditions that led to police corruption scandals involving officers beating and framing suspects and stealing evidence.

U.S. District Judge Gary A. Feess said city officials were trying to "gut" a key provision and warned at a hearing Tuesday that he would likely extend the decree beyond its June 15 expiration date.

The judge chastised the LAPD for failing to implement a computer system required by the decree to serve as an early warning system by tracking officers' use of force, pursuits, collisions, citizen complaints and civil claims.

"There is no way the consent decree can expire given the failure," Feess said.

Gerald L. Chaleff, the LAPD's civilian manager of the consent decree, said at least 122 of 146 provisions for which the Police Department is solely responsible have been "substantially complied with."

Navy Rule On Prayer Ignites A Debate (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

A new Navy policy that encourages chaplains to use only "nonsectarian" language outside of divine services has prompted criticism that regulating prayer services violates the chaplains' First Amendment rights.

Under new rules signed by Secretary of the Navy Donald C. Winter, chaplains of all faiths in the Navy are asked to consider the views of their audience before invoking specific religious beliefs in prayer.

"I'm very disappointed with the secretary of the Navy," said Navy chaplain Lt. Gordon James Klingenschmitt. "He's doing the opposite of what President Bush wants."

Navy spokesman Lt. William Marks says Lt. Klingenschmitt has exaggerated the policy's reach.

"The only thing we ask is that chaplains be inclusive of the people in their audience," Lt. Marks said.

"We've never said they can't invoke Jesus in their prayers. You aren't going to get into trouble for that."

Lt. Klingenschmitt is urging Mr. Bush to sign an executive order to allow military chaplains to pray according to their individual faith tradition. He said that if the president decides not to sign such an order, he might sue the Navy.

The Navy policy appears to be similar to that of the Air Force, which reads, "nondenominational, inclusive prayer or a moment of silence may be appropriate for military ceremonies."

The rule change completes an evolution of the Navy's official policy toward religious language.

In 1998, former Chief of Navy Chaplains Byron Holderby submitted a "memo of suggestion" that chaplains who wish to use sectarian language withdraw from events such as evening prayer services aboard Navy ships.

On Feb. 21, Mr. Winter quietly signed the regulation making the suggestion official Navy policy.

Yesterday, Lt. Klingenschmitt filed a "formal whistleblower complaint" against Mr. Winter and Chief of Navy Chaplains Rear Adm. Louis V. Iasiello.

The complaint was sent to Senate Armed Services Committee members Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, and James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican. Lt. Klingenschmitt, a New York native, says Mrs. Clinton has already written a letter to the Navy on his behalf.

Reps. Thomas M. Reynolds, New York Republican, and Walter B. Jones, North Carolina Republican, received copies of the complaint as well.

"We have been working on Chaplain Klingenschmitt's behalf since last May," Reynolds spokesman L.D. Platt said. "The congressman is not satisfied so far with what the Navy has come back with."

Mr. Reynolds is the chaplain's congressman.

Mr. Jones, a member of the House Armed Services Committee, told The Washington Times this week that his office has been working with the office of panel Chairman Duncan Hunter, California Republican, to try to rectify the situation.

"Mr. Hunter wants to help us with this issue," Mr. Jones said.

He also said aides are working on language, which he hopes Mr. Hunter will present to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld in an effort to resolve the problem administratively.

Mr. Jones said he won't give up on the issue.

"We're talking about the First Amendment rights of all chaplains."

In summer 2004, an optional worship service performed by Lt. Klingenschmitt, described as a "Christian memorial service," on the USS Anzio reportedly offended a minority of those in attendance.

"There are 350 men on my ship. Fifty attended the service -- including wives and family, about 80 total," Lt. Klingenschmitt said.

After complaints from some in attendance, Lt. Klingenschmitt received a "poor fitness" mark on his permanent record which he is fighting to have removed.

"They did a survey of the ship afterwards, and 84 percent of the crew said they believe the chaplain cares for all denominations," Lt. Klingenschmitt said. "Even though some people complained, I figured I had an 84 percent approval rating."

Common Sense In Maryland (NYT)

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Diebold, the electronic voting machine maker, suffered another sharp setback recently, when Maryland's House of Delegates voted 137-to-0 to drop its machines and switch to paper ballots. The vote came in the same week that Texas held elections marred by electronic voting troubles. Maryland's State Senate should join the House in voting to discontinue the use of the Diebold machines, and other states should follow Maryland's lead.

Maryland was one of the first states to embrace Diebold. But Maryland voters and elected officials have grown increasingly disenchanted as evidence has mounted that the machines cannot be trusted. In 2004, security experts from RABA Technologies told the state legislature that they had been able to hack into the machines in a way that would make it possible to steal an election. Senator Barbara Mikulski, a Democrat, informed the State Board of Elections in 2004 that voters had complained to her that machines had mysteriously omitted the Senate race.

The Maryland House's bill calls for replacing the Diebold machines with optical scanning machines for this fall's elections. Gov. Robert Ehrlich Jr., once a Diebold supporter, has said he'll sign the bill if the State Senate agrees. Optical scanning machines would be a vast improvement. Voters using them fill out paper ballots, which are scanned electronically. Those ballots are a permanent record that can (and should) be used to double-check the machine results. Although time is short, Maryland should be able to get optical scanning machines operating by the fall. Even though the Board of Elections has been resisting the proposal, that should not stop the General Assembly and the governor from fighting for machines that voters will trust.

The Maryland House voted days after Texas held an election with the sort of disturbing electronic voting glitches that have by now become common. In Tarrant County, as many as 100,000 extra votes appeared on the machines — election officials insisted that they knew which ones to eliminate to make the results correct. In a hotly contested Congressional race in another part of the state, results were delayed by programming errors in the machines used in two crucial counties.

Many states have passed laws requiring paper records for electronic voting. What is happening in Maryland is important, because not a single member of the House stood behind the once popular Diebold machines. It is just the latest indication that common sense is starting to prevail in the battle over electronic voting.

ANTITRUST:

3 To Plead Guilty In Samsung Price-Fixing Case (NYT)

By Laurie J. Flynn

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, March 22 — Three executives of Samsung, the largest supplier of computer memory for consumer electronics, have agreed to plead guilty and serve prison sentences in the United States for their roles in a price-fixing conspiracy, federal prosecutors said on Wednesday.

The plea agreements are the latest development in the Justice Department's three-and-a-half-year investigation of the volatile market for dynamic random access memory chips, the most common type of computer memory products, used in personal computers, printers and electronic devices like cellphones and digital cameras.

Samsung of South Korea, along with its rivals — Infineon Technologies of Germany, Elpida of Japan and Hynix Semiconductor of South Korea — were accused of conspiring to fix DRAM prices from April 1999 to June 2002.

The Samsung executives are the third group of individuals to agree to prison terms; their sentences are similar to those of four Hynix executives announced this month.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM Sales, agreed to serve eight months; Yeongho Kang, associate director, DRAM marketing in Samsung's United States subsidiary, will serve seven months; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's subsidiary in Germany, agreed to serve seven months. Like the Hynix executives, each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 fine.

In November 2005, Samsung agreed to a $300 million fine related to the investigation. With the latest settlement, 4 companies and 12 individuals have been charged, with fines totaling more than $731 million.

The latest developments illustrate the growing emphasis the Justice Department is placing on prison sentences as a deterrent in antitrust cases.

DOJ_NMG_0020390

"These pleas should send a clear message," the attorney general, Alberto R. Gonzales, said in a statement, "that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The Justice Department had named six American companies that were harmed by the price fixing, all of them large customers of DRAM chips: Dell, Compaq Computer, Hewlett-Packard, Apple Computer, I.B.M. and Gateway.

Hynix, the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, agreed to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005. In October 2004, Infineon agreed to a $160 million fine. In January, Elpida agreed to a fine of $84 million.

In December 2004, four Infineon executives pleaded guilty to price fixing and served jail terms ranging from four to six months. Each executive also paid a $250,000 fine.

Three Executives From Samsung To Serve Jail Time (WSJ)

By Mark H. Anderson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three Samsung Electronics Co. executives pleaded guilty and agreed to jail time over their role in an international conspiracy to fix prices for dynamic-random-access-memory components, the U.S. Department of Justice said.

The Justice Department said it has charged four companies and 12 individuals so far in its investigation, which has led to fines totaling more than $731 million.

The three Samsung executives, who will serve their jail time in the U.S., are Sun Woo Lee, senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, an associate director in the U.S.; and Young Woo Lee, sales director in Germany.

Samsung Electronics, of South Korea, is the world's largest maker of DRAM components and has previously pleaded guilty and agreed to $300 million in fines in the price-fixing conspiracy.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

Each Samsung executive also has agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and to cooperate in the antitrust division's investigation of the DRAM industry.

According to a one-count felony charge filed in federal court in San Francisco, at various times from April 1, 1999, to June 15, 2002, the three Samsung employees conspired with employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAMs sold to certain computer and server manufacturers in the U.S.

The Justice Department said the conspiracy directly affected sales to U.S. computer makers Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Compaq Computer Corp., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc.

In addition to Samsung, other companies charged with price-fixing in the DRAM investigation include South Korea's Hynix Semiconductor Inc., Japanese manufacturer Elpida Memory Inc. and Germany's Infineon Technologies AG.

Three Samsung Executives Plead Guilty For Role In Chip Price-fixing Scheme (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Three executives from South Korea's Samsung Electronics Co. Ltd. agreed to plead guilty and serve jail time for participating in a conspiracy to fix the price of computer memory chips, the U.S. Justice Department said Wednesday.

Each executive agreed to pay a $250,000 (â‚¬207,142) fine, cooperate with federal authorities on the investigation and serve prison sentences ranging from seven to eight months for their role in a scheme to raise prices for dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, from 1999 to 2002. A federal judge in San Francisco must approve the deal.

"These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement.

So far, the long-running Justice Department investigation has resulted to more than $731 million (â‚¬606 million) in fines and charges against 12 individuals and four companies, including, Samsung, Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

The Korean Samsung executives who agreed to the guilty pleas are Sun Woo Lee, senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for the company's German subsidiary.

Samsung, the world's largest maker of DRAM chips, said in a statement Wednesday that the company was "strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior."

Prosecutors say the global conspiracy drove up the price of DRAM chips, which are the most commonly used product for storing and retrieving information in computers and electronic devices.

Companies such as Dell Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc., International Business Machines Corp. and Gateway Inc. had to raise PC prices or reduce the amount of memory installed on their systems to compensate for the higher costs.

Three Samsung Executives To Admit Price-Fixing Roles (Update3) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- Three executives of Samsung Electronics Co., which was fined $300 million for fixing the price of electronic chips used in cellular phones and computers, agreed to serve prison time for their roles in the global conspiracy, the U.S. Justice Department said.

The executives of South Korea-based Samsung, the world's largest maker of memory chips, will plead guilty to participating in a scheme that included four other makers of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips, said the department in Washington.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of sales for DRAM chips, agreed to serve an eight-month prison term, and the other two will serve seven months, the government said. Each executive also agreed to pay a $250,000 fine and cooperate with the investigation.

``True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said in a statement.

The investigation has resulted in the convictions of two other companies besides Samsung and an agreement by a third to plead guilty, the Justice Department said. So far, the investigation has netted $731 million in criminal fines.

In all, 12 individuals have been charged. A fifth company, Micron Technology Inc., wasn't prosecuted for its participation in the cartel in return for alerting prosecutors to the scheme.

Leading Victims

The government said leading victims of the conspiracy include computer makers such as Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., International Business Machines Corp., Apple Computer Inc., Gateway Inc. and Compaq Computer Corp., now owned by Hewlett- Packard.

U.S. sales of DRAM chips totaled $7.7 billion, the Justice Department said. The chips are also used to make digital music players, video game consoles, printers and telecommunications equipment.

All three Samsung executives agreed to plead guilty to price fixing, the Justice Department said. The charges filed against them in federal court in San Francisco say the defendants attended meetings with competitors to discuss setting prices for DRAM chips. They also exchanged sales information to help the participating companies monitor compliance with the cartel agreements, court documents said.

The two executives who agreed to serve seven-month prison terms are Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. unit, and Young Woo Lee, its sales director in Europe.

Active Investigation

``These are the first executives of Samsung to plead guilty to fixing prices in what is still an active investigation," Thomas O. Barnett, the Justice Department's antitrust chief, said in a statement. ``We will continue our efforts to bring to justice other domestic and foreign-based executives who were involved with fixing DRAM prices."

On March 15, four executives of Hynix Semiconductor Inc., which was fined $185 million, were sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to eight months and fined $250,000 each.

Four executives of Germany's Infineon Technologies AG, which was fined $160 million, pleaded guilty in December 2004 and served prison terms of four to six months.

Alfred Censullo, a regional sales manager for Micron, pleaded guilty to obstructing the government's investigation and was sentenced to six months of home detention.

Another DRAM chipmaker, Japan-based Elpida Memory Inc., agreed in January to plead guilty to participating in the conspiracy and pay an $84 million fine.

In a statement, Samsung's U.S. unit, Samsung Semiconductor Inc., said the company ``is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior."

Samsung Execs To Serve Jail Time In Chip Price-fixing (SFC)

By Benjamin Pimentel, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 23, 2006

Three Samsung Electronics executives will serve up to eight months in jail for their roles in a worldwide memory chip price-fixing conspiracy, the U.S. Department of Justice said Wednesday.

The executives agreed to plead guilty to taking part in a scam to manipulate prices on dynamic random access memory chips, or DRAM, sold to computer makers such as Hewlett-Packard, IBM and Apple from 1999 to 2002.

The Korean manufacturer had earlier agreed to plead guilty to federal charges and pay a $300 million fine, the second largest criminal antitrust penalty in U.S. history.

Sentenced to 7 months in prison were Yeongho Kang, associate director for DRAM marketing, for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales, will serve 8 months.

Each executive will also pay $250,000 fine and agreed to cooperate with the Justice Department's antitrust division in its ongoing probe of the DRAM industry.

In a statement, Samsung said the company is "strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anti-competitive behavior."

"True deterrence cocurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fees," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

According to the Justice Department, the Samsung executives took part in meetings and agreements to sell DRAM chips "at certain levels" to manufacturers.

DRAM chips are used in personal computers, laptops, workstations, servers, digital cameras and mobile phones.

The pleas and sentences must still be approved by the U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

The DRAM price-fixing case has led to charges filed against four companies, including Hynix Semiconductor Inc. and Infineon, and fines up more than $731 million.

The investigation, which was led by the San Francisco office of the Justice Department's antitrust division, has also led to charges filed against 12 individuals, including the Samsung executives, the Justice Department said.

Samsung Executives Plead Guilty To Chip Price-fixing (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder, MarketWatch

MarketWatch, March 23, 2006

Three more caught in U.S. chip price-fixing probe

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Three Samsung Electronics executives pleaded guilty to fixing the price of microchips, becoming the latest individuals to be caught in a U.S. probe, the Justice Department said Wednesday.

The announcement regarding South Korea's Samsung (SSNGY: news) brings the total number of charges in the government's ongoing investigation into price-fixing and microchips to four companies and 12 individuals.

The three executives will serve jail time in the U.S. for their roles in a global conspiracy to fix the prices of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, chips between April 1999 and June 2002. They'll also each pay a $250,000 fine.

On March 1, the Justice Department said four executives at Korea-based Hynix Semiconductor Inc. (HXSCF: news) pleaded guilty and agreed to jail time for their roles in the conspiracy.

The government has collected more than $731 million in fines related to the probe.

The individuals named Wednesday by the Justice Department are Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales; Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM marketing for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary; and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's subsidiary in Germany.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the jail sentences should deter future conspiracies.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Gonzales said in a statement.

The Samsung executives also agreed to assist the Justice Department in the ongoing investigation.

Samsung Execs Plead Guilty To DRAM Price Fixing (IDG)

By Grant Gross, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, March 23, 2006

The three Samsung executives conspired with other DRAM makers to fix prices, which affected sales to several U.S. computer makers, it was charged

Three executives from Samsung Electronics, the largest manufacturer of DRAM (dynamic random access memory), have agreed to plead guilty and serve jail time for participating in a worldwide conspiracy to fix DRAM prices, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Wednesday.

Sun Woo Lee, Samsung's senior manager of DRAM sales, agreed to a sentence of eight months in U.S. prison. Yeongho Kang, associate director of DRAM Marketing, for Samsung's U.S. subsidiary, and Young Woo Lee, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary, both agreed to serve seven months, the DOJ said.

The three also agreed to each pay a $250,000 fine and cooperate with the DOJ's ongoing DRAM investigation. The South Korean executives each face one felony count for violating the U.S. Sherman Antitrust Act.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in a statement. "These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The pleas and sentences are subject to the approval by the U.S. District Court in San Francisco.

DRAM is the most commonly used semiconductor memory product, and is used in PCs, laptops, servers, printers, hard disk drives, mobile phones, digital cameras, game consoles, and other devices. There were about $7.7 billion in DRAM sales in the U.S. in 2004, the DOJ said.

Between April 1999 and June 2002, the three Samsung executives conspired with employees of other DRAM makers to fix prices, according to the charges filed Wednesday. The conspiracy affected sales to several U.S. computer makers, including Dell (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., IBM (Profile, Products, Articles) Corp., and Apple Computer (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc.

Including Wednesday's charges, the DOJ has charged four companies and 12 individuals and assessed fines of more than $731 million in a wide-ranging DRAM price-fixing investigation. The fines add up to the second largest total ever collected by the DOJ in a single price-fixing investigation.

The first charges in the investigation came in December 2003, and earlier this month, four executives from Hynix Semiconductor (Profile, Products, Articles) Inc. agreed to plead guilty.

Samsung was ordered in November 2005 to pay a $300 million criminal fine. Hynix, the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, was ordered in May 2005 to pay $185 million. Elpida Memory of Japan agreed in January to pay $84 million. And Infineon of Germany agreed in October 2004 to pay $160 million.

Samsung Executives To Serve Jail In U.S. For DRAM Price-fixing (YONHAP)

By Lee Dong-min

Yonhap News (South Korea), March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 (Yonhap) -- Three South Korean executives of Samsung Electronics agreed Wednesday to serve jail time in the United States after pleading guilty to fixing DRAM prices, the U.S. Justice Department said.

The three men will serve between seven and eight months and pay US$250,000 in fines, the department said. They have agreed to cooperate in the department antitrust division's investigation of the DRAM industry, it said.

The Samsung officials are the second group of South Korean industry executives to be jailed for price fixing. Earlier this month, four executives of Hynix pleaded guilty to the same charges and agreed to jail time in the U.S. Their sentences are between five and eight months.

Samsung is the world's largest producer of DRAM, or dynamic random access memory, a computer component providing high-speed storage and retrieval of electronic information. Hynix is the second largest.

Samsung Electronics pleaded guilty to price-fixing and was fined $300 million in November last year. Its employees were not protected by the plea.

"True deterrence occurs when guilty individuals serve jail terms, and not just when corporations pay criminal fines," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said about the Samsung case.

"These pleas should send a clear message that we will hold accountable all conspirators, whether domestic or foreign, that harm American consumers through their illegal conduct."

The three Samsung officials were identified as Lee Sun-woo, the company's senior manager of DRAM sales, to serve eight months; Kang Yeong-ho, associate director of DRAM marketing, seven months; and Lee Young-woo, sales director for Samsung's German subsidiary, seven months.

Their charges including communications with competitors to set DRAM prices sold to certain customers and exchanging information on DRAM sales to monitor and enforce adherence to agreed-upon prices.

The department's antitrust division has been leading the investigation, still ongoing, that to date has led to charges against four companies, 12 individuals and fines totaling more than $731 million.

"At various times during the period from April 1, 1999, to June 15, 2002, these three Samsung employees conspired with unnamed employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAM sold to certain computer and server manufacturers in the United States," the department said.

The collusion directly affected sales to U.S. computer firms such as Dell, Compaq , IBM, Apple Computer, and Hewlett-Packard, it said.

Plavix Settlement Could Run Into FTC Resistance (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

The proposed settlement of patent-infringement litigation surrounding the blockbuster drug Plavix could run into regulatory resistance, but government enforcers might not have much muscle, legal experts and analysts say.

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. (BMY) (BMY) and Sanofi-Aventis (SNY) (SNY) said late Tuesday that they reached a settlement with Apotex Inc., a Toronto company that had sought to sell a generic version of Plavix, a blood thinner, before the expiration of a key patent. The settlement calls for Apotex to wait until 2011, under certain conditions, to begin selling generic Plavix through a license deal. Bristol- Myers and Sanofi also would make undisclosed payments to Apotex.

The settlement is subject to antitrust review and clearance by the Federal Trade Commission. Some analysts and legal experts believe the FTC might try to challenge the deal because it calls for Apotex to wait as much as five years before selling generic Plavix, and Bristol-Myers and Sanofi have agreed to pay Apotex.

The companies said in a statement that the agreement wasn't an act of collusion to keep a generic drug off the market, but they acknowledged that there's "significant risk" they would be unable to obtain the required antitrust clearance. A Bristol-Myers spokeswoman declined to provide further details, and Sanofi officials couldn't be reached for this story.

Despite the regulatory concerns, investors appeared confident the deal would get the necessary approvals, lifting Bristol-Myers shares 12% to $25.63 and Sanofi's American Depositary Shares 9.3% to $47.76.

FTC Review

The FTC has taken a dim view of similar drug patent-infringement settlements in the past because it believed they could harm consumers by delaying the introduction of cheaper, generic alternatives to branded prescription drugs.

"If there were ever a deal the FTC would appear set to challenge, we believe this seems to be it," CIBC World Markets analyst Elliot Wilbur wrote in a research note Wednesday. CIBC doesn't cover Bristol-Myers or Sanofi and didn't provide any financial disclosures for them.

But the FTC hasn't been so successful in blocking such deals. Last year, for instance, a federal appeals court in Atlanta dismissed FTC charges that Schering-Plough Corp. (SGP) (SGP) illegally delayed the introduction of a generic version of its K-Dur 20 potassium supplement in its settlement of patent litigation with generic challengers.

The federal court ruled that a payment by a brand-name pharmaceutical company to a generic competitor cannot be the sole basis for a violation of antitrust law.

The FTC has a policy of not commenting on whether it will investigate settlements, agency spokesman Mitchell Katz said Wednesday.

A provision of a 2003 federal law requires drug companies to provide advance notice to the FTC of proposed settlements of patent disputes. The requirement is designed to give the FTC a chance to review them and raise any objections it might have, either in court or through an administrative action. But the law doesn't require the FTC to formally approve such settlements.

Still, the FTC has obtained settlements in some of its investigations into branded-generic patent agreements. For instance, it probed an agreement between Abbott Laboratories (ABT) (ABT) and generic drug maker Geneva Pharmaceuticals Inc. regarding Geneva's plan to launch a generic version of Hytrin, a treatment for enlarged prostate symptoms. In 2000, Abbott agreed in a settlement with the FTC not to enter into similar deals in the future without notifying the FTC or getting court approval.

On the other hand, the FTC hasn't objected to some deals, including one last year settling a patent dispute between Wyeth (WYE) and Teva Pharmaceutical Industries Ltd. (TEVA) (TEVA) over Wyeth's (WYE) Effexor antidepressant.

"This area of the law is still somewhat unsettled," said Arthur Lerner, an antitrust attorney with Crowell & Moring in Washington who previously worked for the FTC. "Obviously a lot of these cases turn on specific facts. And there may be certain facts about [the Plavix] case that make it different from the Schering-Plough (SGP) case."

Possible Red Flag

One attorney who represents generic drug companies suggested the Plavix settlement could raise a red flag.

"Apotex is willing to wait about five years," said Steve Sklar, an attorney with Leydig, Voit & Mayer in Chicago. "They must be getting something for it, and something they think is enough to make them happy." Sklar's firm represents Watson Pharmaceuticals Inc. (WPI) (WPI) in a separate patent dispute over Plavix. The case is pending.

Apotex argued that a key patent for Plavix, which was issued in 1989, was invalid because its claims were covered by a prior Sanofi patent, issued in 1985 and expired in 2003. Apotex also argued the 1989 patent was unenforceable because Sanofi misled the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office when seeking the patent.

Bristol-Myers and Sanofi say the active ingredient in Plavix - clopidogrel bisulfate - wasn't covered by the 1985 patent, and they deny misleading the patent office.

Bear Stearns analyst John Boris views potential FTC scrutiny as a "substantial hurdle." Boris noted that the Wyeth-Teva deal that escaped FTC action last year didn't involve a "discrete" payment by Wyeth (WYE), and a generic Effexor is being allowed on the market two to seven years earlier than key patents for Effexor expire.

Boris noted that Bristol-Myers and Sanofi are making payments to Apotex, and the deal appears to allow generic Plavix on the market only eight months earlier than patent expiration. Boris doesn't own Bristol-Myers shares; his firm has received non-investment-banking compensation from the company in the past 12 months.

Friedman Billings Ramsey analyst David Moskowitz, however, thinks the settlement will meet the "pro-consumer and pro-competitive tests" because generic Plavix would be launched earlier than patent expiration, and other generic companies can continue to challenge the Plavix patent, preserving competition. Moskowitz doesn't own Bristol-Myers shares; his firm hasn't provided investment-banking services to the company recently.

Bristol-Myers and Sanofi said in a press release they have approached Dr. Reddy's Laboratories (RDY) (RDY) about a possible settlement of its generic challenge to Plavix.

In a question-and-answer section on Sanofi's Web site, the companies tried to address some of the concerns that might be raised in an FTC review. In addition to saying Apotex wasn't a case of collusion, they noted that the Toronto company will be allowed to enter the market before the patent expires.

The companies said the reserves they expect to establish during the first quarter for payments to Apotex aren't expected to be material. Additional reserves may be recorded in the future.

Dell Agrees To Buy Alienware (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Dell Inc. said it agreed to buy closely held Alienware Corp., a maker of high-end personal computers favored by gamers.

Terms were not disclosed. But the deal is considered a significant strategy shift for Dell, which rarely makes acquisitions and has tended to focus more on machines purchased by businesses.

While Dell has transformed the PC business by focusing on direct sales and streamlined manufacturing, Alienware has built a loyal following among computer users willing to pay a premium for powerful machines with sleek designs and odd colors such as "cyborg green."

The transaction also is being closely watched in the semiconductor industry. Dell, which has its own line of gaming PCs, exclusively uses chips from Intel. But Alienware also uses chips from rival Advanced Micro Devices Inc.

A Dell spokesman said Miami-based Alienware, which will be run as a separate subsidiary, can continue to do so. "They will sell their own products, and they will continue to use AMD as part of that," he said.

Roger Kay, an analyst with Endpoint Technologies Associates Inc., estimates that Alienware is on track to post revenues this year of about $220 million, and is No. 1 among companies focused solely on the profitable gaming niche. But other companies in the market, including VoodooPC and Falcoln Northwest, are also believed to be growing quickly.

Rahul Sood, VoodooPC's president and chief of technology, predicted the Dell-Alienware deal in an online posting earlier this month. He said the transaction "will bring more awareness to the PC gaming industry, and it will certainly open new doors with new customers for us. I think it's a pretty tremendous thing."

In recent years Dell, Gateway Inc. and other big players have targeted the lucrative market for videogaming PCs. Dell revamped its XPS line in 2001 to feature high-powered, high-priced computers to better compete with companies like Alienware and VoodooPC. On Wednesday, Dell unveiled the latest in this line, with a price tag at nearly $10,000.

Dell said it is taking orders on the XPS 600 Renegade. The machine, first unveiled at the Consumer Electronics Show in Las Vegas in January, has four Nvidia Corp. graphic processor units on a single card and can be equipped with dual hard drives, features that allow it to render more complex graphics.

The XPS is part of the niche category of "gaming PCs" that include souped up graphics capabilities and usually carry much higher price tags than traditional PCs. For example, with the Renegade, "instead of using traditional weapons, gamers can pull down the roof on their enemies, crushing them in a pile of collapsing debris," explained Dell in a press release.

DOJ_NMG_0020396

The XPS 600 -- which Dell said is available in "limited quantities" -- is painted with a flame design and will include a 30-inch widescreen high-resolution LCD monitor for $9,930. Customers can add special "discrete physics" controllers to the XPS 400 and XPS 600 for $1,239 and $2,039, respectively. Customers can order the machine through Dell's Web site.

Alienware's least expensive laptops and desktops start at around $700, but the top-of-the-line, liquid-cooled ALX models can approach $10,000 when fully tricked out with dual-core processors, hard drives that can store up to a terabyte of data, and state-of-the-art graphics cards. An average Alienware PC costs about $3,000 to $4,000, hundreds of dollars more than similarly configured machines from mainstream manufacturers.

Microsoft Offers Unlimited Tech Support For Rivals Interested In Windows Software (AP)

By Raf Casert

AP, March 23, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium - (AP) -- Microsoft Corp. today offered "free, unlimited technical support" to rivals interested in making their software work with the software giant's servers, saying it wanted to comply with a landmark EU antitrust ruling.

"We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the (European) Commission's concerns," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said in a statement.

A spokesman for the EU's antitrust office said the Microsoft offer "seems to be a constructive proposal," but said the company needed to make more efforts to fully fall in line with the EU's 2004 ruling.

"Microsoft will naturally be well placed to answer questions from licensees on specific points of the technical documents," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said.

He insisted, however, that even two years after the ruling that forced Microsoft to share technical details with rivals, Microsoft's efforts remained insufficient.

The EU levied a record $603 million fine against Microsoft in March 2004. It also ordered the company to share code with rivals and to offer a version of Windows without the Media Player software.

Microsoft is appealing the ruling, and the case will be heard in late April by the European Court of First Instance, the EU's second-highest court.

Microsoft Takes New Action On EU Sanctions (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Microsoft has made a fresh attempt to escape antitrust fines of up to €2m ($2.4m) a day, telling the European Commission on Wednesday that it will take further steps to comply with the regulator's March 2004 competition ruling.

Microsoft said it would offer rival companies "unlimited, free technical assistance" to help them develop products that work smoothly with the group's ubiquitous Windows operating system. It would even send its software experts to other companies' offices to help them in the process, Microsoft added.

The latest concessions come in response to accusations by the Commission that Microsoft has failed to implement one of the key elements of its landmark ruling.

Brussels has told Microsoft that it has failed to provide complete and accurate inter-operability information about Windows to rival companies. It believes the information – which will be licensed in return for a fee – is needed so that other companies can develop server software that meshes with Windows-driven computers and servers.

The Commission on Wednesday reacted cautiously to Microsoft's latest move, welcoming the initiative while stressing that the group had so far failed to draw up complete and accurate documentation. "At first sight it seems to be a constructive proposal. However, technical support is only helpful once the documentation has reached certain quality standards," a spokesman said.

Both the Commission and Microsoft's industry rivals have said the documentation supplied so far is highly inadequate and would not allow companies to develop inter-operable products. They accuse the group of dragging its feet, and point out that it is more than two years since the Commission made its ruling.

Microsoft maintains that the quality of its technical documentation already ex-ceeds industry standards, but that it is willing to go even further to meet the Commission's concerns.

Wednesday's moves expanded on Microsoft's earlier offer of 500 hours of free technical assistance, and reflects the group's belief that any shortcomings in its documentation can best be resolved through direct contacts between software engineers.

In addition, Microsoft said it had submitted a workplan to Professor Neil Barrett, the Commission's technical adviser in the case, outlining improvements to the actual documentation. These include better navigation and more illustrations.

Microsoft's move comes just one week before a two-day internal Commission hearing on the case.

Microsoft Makes A New Offer To EU (WSJ)

By Gabriella Stern

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Microsoft Corp. said it will make "unlimited" technical support available to rival companies trying to write software to mesh with its products, as part of its efforts to reach agreement with the European Union's antitrust regulators.

In 2004, the European Commission ordered Microsoft to make its Windows protocols available to rival software makers. Since then, the commission has accused Microsoft, Redmond, Wash., of failing to comply with the antitrust ruling. The company faces €100 million ($121 million) or more in new fines from the European body, the European Union's executive arm, and has been engaged in a public-relations battle leading up to a pivotal court hearing in the case.

"We are committed to doing everything in our power to address the Commission's concerns," Microsoft General Counsel Brad Smith said. Yesterday's offer upped the company's previous one of 500 hours of technical support.

European Commission antitrust spokesman Jonathan Todd said the commission hadn't received details of the new proposal and said it seemed "constructive." Mr. Todd added that any technical documentation Microsoft makes widely available to competitors "is only helpful once the documentation has reached a certain quality standard."

So far, Mr. Todd said, the commission feels Microsoft's documentation hasn't met the requirements the commission laid out in 2004.

An independent monitor in the regulatory case has found the documents provided by Microsoft needed a drastic overhaul to make them workable. The monitor, computer-science professor Neil Barrett, wrote a critical report about Microsoft's efforts to comply with the commission's ruling, saying he and a colleague had been unable to use Microsoft's instructions.

Microsoft, which has accused Mr. Barrett of being uninformed and colluding with its rivals, also pledged yesterday to do additional work on technical documentation. But it said five European computer-science professors believe existing documentation already meets requirements.

EU Set For Summit Clash Over Protectionism In Energy Industry (BLOOM)

By Jonathan Stearns

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- The European Union is set to confront France and Spain for protecting energy companies from foreign takeovers, raising the prospect of a clash among EU leaders at a meeting meant to revive a push for market integration.

EU leaders meet this evening in Brussels for the first time since the French government arranged a merger between utilities Suez SA and Gaz de France SA to avert a possible bid for Suez by Italy's Enel SpA. The two-day summit also comes after the Spanish government imposed rules to hinder a takeover of power company Endesa SA by Germany's E.ON AG.

``Member states are reluctant to accept the rules," Loyola de Palacio, EU energy commissioner for five years until November 2004, said by telephone from Madrid two days ago. ``They are very proud when one of their companies goes abroad and makes a takeover but aren't very happy when somebody else makes a takeover in their country."

National obstacles and monopolies in Europe's 250 billion-euro ($302 billion) electricity and natural-gas market threaten to boost bills for companies and consumers, curtail supply and undermine the economy. The fragmentation may also hinder efforts to prevent the 25-nation EU's dependency on energy imports from rising to 70 percent by 2030 from 50 percent now.

Jose Barroso, the president of the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, is fighting to enforce existing free-market rules and win more powers. In a March 8 package of proposals to be discussed at this evening's summit dinner, he called for a common energy regulator, the right to manage emergency oil and gas stocks and the authority to negotiate an energy accord with Russia, supplier of a quarter of Europe's gas.

European Dimension

``The commission is right to be proposing a new European dimension of energy policy," Katinka Barysch, chief economist at the London-based Centre for European Reform, said by phone two weeks ago. ``The European angle is secondary for member states like France, which is sad. It will take time to make progress."

The grip of Europe's national governments on energy policy persists after they ceded powers in areas such as antitrust, trade and interest rates. Like defense, governments treat energy as a strategic issue where EU-wide cooperation is limited and national discretionary power isn't.

Seeking to crack this bastion of national sovereignty, Barroso says common action is more urgent than ever. He cites European economic growth that has trailed the U.S. pace most of the past decade, energy-price rises over the past two years and a disruption of Russian gas supplies in January.

DOJ_NMG_0020398

Choice of Suppliers

Barroso's more immediate task is to prevent protectionism from undermining a hard-fought agreement by EU lawmakers in 2003 to give electricity and gas customers a choice of suppliers. This legislation, due to take full effect next year, is inciting cross-border takeovers and political resistance to them.

``We can't build barriers against each other,'' Barroso told a March 21 press conference in Brussels. ``It's absurd. Economic nationalism was never a solution and is even less so today.''

The commission is probing whether the governments of French Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin and Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero violated the EU's single-market rules.

In addition to vetting mergers, the commission has the power to file lawsuits against governments at the European Court of Justice. EU Internal-Market Commissioner Charlie McCreevy said two days ago the commission would ``soon'' start legal action against Spain for favoring Barcelona-based Gas Natural SDG SA over E.ON in the fight for Endesa.

`Unprecedented Assault'

Graham Watson, leader of the pro-business Liberal group in the European Parliament, says the commission faces an ``unprecedented assault on the internal market'' by national governments.

``The commission is going to be tested in this climate,'' Watson told the Strasbourg, France-based EU assembly on March 15. ``The commission must hold firm.''

Barroso's bid for more commission control of national energy stocks revives a plan that De Palacio failed to push through and is already facing resistance from member states. So too is his plan for a single regulator.

National energy ministers opposed the proposal for a European watchdog at a March 14 meeting, saying member states need to keep control and focus on aligning national regulatory systems.

Disunity over energy within the EU threatens to undermine Barroso's plans outside the region. He wants an EU-Russia energy agreement that would give European companies access to the Russian market, boosting investment and capacity there.

OAO Gazprom, the world's biggest gas producer, is the monopoly operator of Russia's gas network and also has a monopoly on exports. Russian President Vladimir Putin has defended Gazprom's role and he stood firm at a March 17 meeting with Barroso in Moscow.

``We certainly don't agree on everything,'' said Barroso. ``On access to networks within Russia, President Putin feels that, for the time being at least, that cannot be guaranteed.''

EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said Europe lost leverage to open Russia's energy market to European companies by endorsing the country's accession to the World Trade Organization in 2004 without gaining concessions in this area.

``There was a case at the time of the WTO negotiation to incorporate energy into this,'' Mandelson told reporters in Brussels two days ago. ``With hindsight, it might have been preferable to do so.''

EU Closes Dispute With Premier League (AP)

By RAF CASERT, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 23, 2006

The European Union closed a long-standing antitrust dispute with England's Premier League on Wednesday, forcing one the of richest leagues in the world to stop selling the rights to its live soccer matches exclusively to one TV channel.

"The solution we have reached will benefit football fans while allowing the Premier League to maintain its timetable for the sale of its rights," said EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes, after the EU executive finalized the deal between both sides.

Under the agreement, live TV rights will be sold in six balanced packages with no one bidder being allowed to buy them all.

Premier League Chief Executive Richard Scudamore said the decision was "a good outcome for supporters, whether in the stadium or watching our broadcasts."

He added the Premier League "believes that the conditions are now in place to create maximum interest for our audiovisual rights and to take the world's most popular domestic football competition from strength to strength."

British Sky Broadcasting Group PLC - a pay channel owned by media mogul Rupert Murdoch - has held the exclusive rights to the richest broadcast contract in European sport for the past 13 years. The satellite broadcaster dominates Britain's pay-TV market with close to 8 million subscribers.

Kroes's office said the new commitments made until the end of the 2012-2013 season "will increase the availability of media rights, and improve the prospect of competition in providing services to consumers."

Packages will be sold to the highest standalone bidder for each package.

The agreement will allow the Premier League to prepare its bidding process for rights as of 2007. It will be monitored by a trustee named by the Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0020399

"The Commission could impose a fine amounting to 10 percent of FA Premier League's total worldwide turnover if it breaks its commitments," the statement from Kroes's office said.

BSkyB's nearest rival, cable operator NTL Inc., has already said the deal does not go far enough to deliver a level playing field and said the EU head office had ignored the "pubs and clubs" market which it said needed a critical mass of at least half of all matches to be economically viable.

Irish sports channel Setanta has also said it is interested in bidding. The deal also opens up rights for mobile phone broadcasts to more bidders.

The League's 20 clubs were worried that renegotiating the contract would cause big losses and drive some of them toward bankruptcy. Even Britain's wealthiest club - Manchester United - draws about a third of its income from broadcast rights.

In 2003, the Premier League awarded a 1.024 billion pound ($1.7 billion) exclusive deal to BSkyB from 2004 to 2007.

The EU complained that there was too little soccer left for free TV but it agreed to BSkyB's keeping its monopoly until 2007 on the condition that the 2007-2010 contract would offer substantial packages to a second bidder.

ENVIRONMENT:

Clean Air Craziness (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Last Friday the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals struck down a major plank of the Bush Administration's clean air strategy. The ruling is being cheered by Democrats and some self-styled environmentalists. But it's based on a bad reading of the law, and -- unless successfully challenged -- will lock the U.S. into an old-fashioned approach to regulation when better alternatives are available.

At issue is how to interpret a set of 1970s-era rules known as New Source Review (NSR). As the name itself suggests, the rules were intended to compel new power plants and refineries to install the latest in pollution-control technology. No less an authority than former Carter Energy Secretary Jim Schlesinger attests to this understanding, as do about 20 years of interpretive practice by the Environmental Protection Agency.

But in the late 1990s the Clinton Administration unilaterally decided it didn't like the fact that many older facilities had been "grandfathered" (its word), and decided that even routine maintenance like replacing a steam duct created "new" pollution sources, thereby triggering expensive NSR requirements. Among the utilities hauled into court were the government's own Tennessee Valley Authority and Detroit Edison -- the latter for installing more efficient (i.e., less polluting) turbines.

The Bush Administration understood the problems with the EPA's shifting stance, and in 2003 it issued new rules clarifying what constitutes "routine maintenance" and what triggers NSR. But in a sadly typical case of policy dissonance, it declined to rein in EPA and Justice Department bureaucrats who were still pursuing lawsuits under the Clinton-era interpretation.

That schizophrenic behavior has been having consequences in court. Last year Alabama-based federal Judge Virginia Hopkins threw out the bureaucrats' case against Alabama Power Co. in a ruling that upheld the Bush 2003 interpretation of NSR. She also chided the government for "the anomaly of utilities, like APC, being prosecuted for conduct that, if engaged in now, would not be prosecuted. Put another way, this action is a sport, which is not exactly what one would expect to find in a national regulatory enforcement program."

What happened last week was simply that another court decided to read this "anomaly" another way. The D.C. Circuit declared that the "plain language" of the Clean Air Act requires that all modifications and maintenance activities be seen as triggering NSR requirements. But that judgment implies 20 years of NSR misinterpretation before Clinton. The conclusion isn't entirely surprising, however, since in attempting to preserve the viability of the Clinton-era enforcement cases, the Bush Administration did not argue for the 2003 NSR clarification as forcefully as it could.

If the D.C. Circuit ruling stands, the Bush clean air strategy will lie in ruins, since it relies on a so-called "cap-and-trade" pollution permit system to allow the market to figure out how best to achieve emission reductions. Requiring every power plant making a repair to install the most expensive pollution-control technology would gut the incentive for such trading.

If the Bush Administration doesn't want to abandon its own policy, it has little choice but to fight back. For starters it should go ahead and issue the final piece of the NSR reform it's been working on, the so-called Emission Increase Rule. And if the Administration wants to win on appeal, the smart move would be to drop its internal policy contradictions and finally kill the Clinton-era NSR lawsuits, which can't be justified under the rules it will be trying to defend.

New Source Rebuke (WP)

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0020400

ONE MIGHT HOPE that after its rebuke last week by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, the Bush administration would reconsider its efforts to rewrite the rules governing power plant emissions. The three-judge panel included two of the court's more liberal judges and one of President Bush's most controversial recent conservative appointees, Janice Rogers Brown.

The panel threw out the Environmental Protection Agency's rule on what is called New Source Review as flatly at odds with the Clean Air Act. Unfortunately, there is no particular reason to expect the administration to come to its senses in response. It is still trying to curtail enforcement against old coal-fired plants that fail to install new pollution-control technologies.

Legally, New Source Review does not pose a hard question. The clean-air law, the relevant part of which was passed in 1977, did not require every plant to immediately retrofit with pollution-control technologies. But it did require that plants install new pollution-fighting equipment when they made "any physical change" that increased pollution output. This law went largely unenforced until the Clinton administration, which filed a number of actions against companies that had not complied. On taking office, the Bush administration -- while not dropping the lawsuits -- tried a different approach: rewriting the rules.

Under the new rule, which has been blocked by the court since its release in 2003, "any physical change" does not really mean any physical change, only a change that exceeds 20 percent of the replacement value of the plant or changes its basic design somehow. Anything short of that gets excluded as "routine maintenance." The court, quite rightly, was having none of it. "Only in a Humpty Dumpty world," wrote Judge Judith W. Rogers, could the government ignore Congress's use of a word such as "any." In other words, the Clean Air Act, including the provisions the administration doesn't like, means what it says.

Yet the administration may not have finished trying to read this law out of existence -- or, at least, into a more timid existence. It is still trying to redefine the other essential feature of a plant modification that triggers New Source Review: that the modification "increases" the amount of pollution the plant emits. Again, this seems like a straightforward matter. It increases it if the amount after the change exceeds the amount before it, right? Wrong -- at least according to the administration, which wants to define "increase" in terms of the emissions a plant is potentially capable of spewing rather than the actual amount of spewing it does. The D.C. Circuit -- the court whose interpretations bind the agency -- already rejected this interpretation in another case last year, making the proposed EPA policy seem simply lawless. The court's common-sense ruling last week is a promising sign that its judges won't sit still for further efforts to ignore the law.

Wall Street Lays Plans In Case Bird Flu Strikes (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Bird flu has yet to come even close to the USA's borders, but Wall Street analysts are already crafting advice on how investors can inoculate their portfolios if a pandemic breaks out.

Not since the SARS scare in Asia in spring 2003 — when Hong Kong stocks plunged 10% in six weeks before rebounding after the virus stopped spreading — has a health-related crisis put investors on edge.

Wall Street, which makes its living betting on what the future may look like, has been busy concocting what-if scenarios, handicapping winning and losing stock sectors, and educating clients in the science of bird flu. Recent ink devoted to the H5N1 virus:

·Special report. Citigroup recently sent clients a comprehensive 46-page report on bird flu that includes a brief history of the virus, risk factors and stock picks. The report was compiled by stock strategists, economists, government policy experts, epidemiologists and currency analysts from Europe, Japan, Australia and the USA.

·Stocks to watch. TrendMacro, an investment strategy firm that caters to big institutional investors, created an Avian Flu Index in October that now consists of 17 health care stocks that develop vaccines, anti-virals and other products likely to be in great demand if the avian flu scare morphs from a mere threat to deadly killer.

·First of a series. David Kotok, chief investment officer at Cumberland Advisors, on Friday released the first in a series of reports that will focus on the financial risks and psychological impact on investors.

“We thought it was important to get ahead of the curve on something that's going to become of increasing concern to the capital markets as the disease spreads,” says Paul Heldman, senior health policy analyst at Citigroup.

Avian flu primarily affects poultry but on rare occasions can infect humans, says the World Health Organization. More than 100 people have died from the virus since 2003, WHO says.

Earlier this week, U.S. government officials said migrating birds infected with avian flu may reach the USA within months. The virus has already spread across Europe, Asia and Africa.

The fear is that H5N1 will adapt into a strain that can be transmitted from human to human. If a fully contagious virus emerges, its global spread is considered inevitable because people will lack immunity to the virus, WHO says. Given inadequate supplies of medicines to fight the virus, large numbers of deaths could occur. So could massive economic and social disruptions.

DOJ_NMG_0020401

That's why Wall Street has added bird flu to its list of market negatives that include terrorism, protectionism, rising interest rates and Iran's nuclear ambitions.

“Why should investors care about the risk of a pandemic? Because the risk of a planetwide outbreak is very real. It's happened before,” says Donald Luskin, chief investment officer at TrendMacro.

The 20th century had three influenza pandemics:

The Spanish Flu in 1918 killed an estimated 50 million people, WHO says. The Dow Jones industrial average suffered a maximum loss of 11.1% in the peak death period, according to data compiled by Ned Davis Research (NDR).

The Asian Flu in 1957 and the Hong Kong Flu in 1968 resulted in estimated deaths of 2 million and 1 million, respectively, says WHO. The Dow fell almost 14% in 1957 and nearly 9% in 1968, NDR says.

How stocks do this time depends on what plays out:

·Best-case scenario. Markets will cheer if the virus never becomes transmissible from human to human. In that case, Luskin says, investors can make money investing in companies that make vaccines and testing therapies.

Examples, he says, include Gilead Sciences, the inventor of the anti-viral drug Tamiflu, which is being stockpiled by governments around the globe; Hemispherx Biopharma, which is seeking final approval for its anti-viral drug Ampligen; and Sinovac Biotech, a Chinese vaccine maker.

·SARS-like scenario. A mild pandemic that is contained could add up to a buying opportunity, says Citigroup's Heldman. Many of the stocks likely to decline from flu-related panic selling, such as airlines (Continental), hotels (Hilton) and shopping malls (Simon Property) would likely enjoy rebounds.

·Worst-case scenario. That's if a full pandemic hits, the economy shuts down, people die. Airlines, hotels and other businesses that involve travel or crowds will fall sharply. Citigroup says shares of drug companies, vaccine makers, and hospital and health care stocks (Tenet, Community Hospitals) will rise. Home entertainment providers, such as Blockbuster, should fare well. So, too, could safe investments such as Treasury bonds and cash.

But, “The losers will come under severe pressure,” says Heldman. Adds Luskin: “It will be like Hurricane Katrina on a global scale.”

Woody Dorsey, behavioral market strategist at Market Semiotics, says the fact that the virus can spread quickly and cause widespread havoc means it is likely to be more damaging to the economy and financial markets than a terrorist attack or severe hurricane.

“We're moving into a ‘bio-era' where computer viruses, physical viruses and fear move around the world quickly,” he says. “It's the downside of globalization.”

Schools Told To Prepare For Bird Flu (WP)

By Ben Feller

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The nation's schools, recognized incubators of respiratory diseases among children, are being told to plan for the possibility of an outbreak of bird flu.

Federal health leaders say it is not alarmist or premature for schools to make preparations, such as finding ways to teach kids even if they've all been sent home.

School boards and superintendents have gotten used to emergency planning for student violence, terrorism or severe weather. Pandemic preparation, though, is a new one.

They have a lot to think over, top government officials said Tuesday.

Who coordinates decisions on closing schools or quarantining kids? If classes shut down for weeks, how will a district keep kids from falling behind? Who will keep the payroll running, or ease the fear of parents, or provide food to children who count on school meals?

"Those are the kinds of issues that I don't think people have spent a lot of time talking about yet," said Stephen Bounds, director of legal and policy services for the Maryland Association of School Boards.

"But if New Orleans and Katrina taught us nothing else, it taught us you need to be thinking about things ahead of time _ and preparing for the worst," Bounds said.

The urgency is about bird flu, the name for the deadly H5N1 strain of the avian flu.

It remains primarily a contagious bird disease. Typically spread from direct contact with contaminated birds, it has infected more than 170 people and killed roughly 100. None of those cases occurred in the United States, but officials say bird flu is likely to arrive this year in birds.

As outbreaks have hit Africa, Asia and Europe, officials have launched campaigns to educate the public. To help stop the spread of the disease, farmers have killed tens of millions of chickens and turkeys.

Experts fear the virus could change into a form that passes easily among people.

In North Carolina on Tuesday, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings joined Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt to encourage schools to prepare. Spellings said schools must be aware that they may have to close their buildings _ or that their schools may need to be used as makeshift hospitals, quarantine sites or vaccination centers.

The government has created checklists on preparation and response steps, specialized for preschools, grade schools, high schools and colleges. The dominant theme is the need for coordination among local, state and federal officials.

Some of the advice is common sense, like urging students to wash their hands and cover their mouths when they cough or sneeze to keep infection from spreading. Other steps would take schools considerable time to figure out, such as legal and communication issues.

"I don't think that the issue of bird flu has resonated yet," said Reg Weaver, president of the National Education Association, which represents many of the country's teachers.

Weaver praised the federal government for providing guidance that can be plugged into a school district's crisis plan. But the sudden urgency on bird flu, he said, should not steal attention from the daily struggles schools face, like trying to keep their classrooms safe.

Children age 5 to 18 tend to be the biggest spreaders of flu viruses in the community, experts say. Schools may be ordered to close to prevent spreading the disease.

In Massachusetts, school administrators are considering using an automated phone bank to announce homework assignments and update parents. Another plan would use the Internet for communication between students and their teachers.

But those plans are limited, and many places have had budget cuts in technology, said Tom Scott, executive director of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents. "I don't think we're anywhere near having a systemic way of approaching this," he said.

Any school closing may not be for only a day or two. A shutdown would probably have to last a month or longer to be effective, said flu specialist Ira Longini, a faculty member at the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center and a professor at the University of Washington in Seattle.

"The school itself plays a big role," said Longini. "It's just a massive mixing ground for respiratory illness."

At the college level, the American Council on Education, a higher education umbrella group, has alerted thousands of college presidents about the need to prepare for bird flu.

Federal health leaders have advised each college to establish a pandemic response team and plan for outbreak scenarios that could close or quarantine their campuses.

A Clue Is Found On Why Bird Flu Is Slow To Spread Among Humans (WSJ)

By Antonio Regalado

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Scientists have a new clue why the feared H5N1 strain of the avian-influenza virus hasn't spread easily among people.

According to research published this week by teams in the U.S. and the Netherlands, the bird virus primarily infects cells deep in the human lung, possibly making it difficult for the germ to spread.

The H5N1 avian-flu virus was first detected in Hong Kong in 1997, and has since claimed millions of birds and more than 100 human lives.

PREVENTING A PANDEMIC

1 · Nations Contradict WHO Secrecy Rationale2

· See an FAQ on avian flu3, an interactive global map4 and track the latest developments in the Avian Flu News Tracker5.

· Plus, see complete coverage6.

The virus has continued to spread across the globe and has been detected in birds in both Europe and Africa, although not yet in the U.S.

Humans have very limited immunity to such avian viruses, and health authorities say that if the bird-flu virus begins to spread between people, it could spark a global outbreak of deadly respiratory disease.

That hasn't happened, and the new findings may help explain why.

Using tissues from human cadavers, researchers at the Erasmus Medical Center in Rotterdam studied which cells the bird virus would become attached to. According to Thijs Kuiken, a veterinary pathologist who directed the research, H5N1 attached to cells deep in the lung, but not cells in the throat, where human-flu viruses multiply. The study appears in the journal Science.

DOJ_NMG_0020403

Dr. Kuiken called the finding a possible explanation for why the avian virus doesn't jump easily between people. "It must reach the lower respiratory tract to replicate, and it's harder to spread by coughing and sneezing," he said.

Other doctors questioned that conclusion, saying that patients with such infections were likely to cough more heavily. "I don't think it directly affects the transmissibility just because it's in the lower respiratory tract," said Nikki Shindo, an influenza expert at the World Health Organization who has studied human cases, most recently in Turkey.

Dr. Shindo said that if the virus has to reach deep into the lung before causing an infection, that could make it harder to catch.

In a separate study released yesterday by the journal Nature, a research group headed by Yoshihiro Kawaoka of the University of Wisconsin-Madison reached similar conclusions after analyzing the specific molecules on human cells to which influenza viruses attach.

They found that molecules preferred by H5N1 are expressed mostly by cells deep in the lung. To spread between humans, the virus would need to adapt in a way that enabled it to attach to a different type of molecule present in cells higher in the respiratory tract.

"This restriction may contribute to the inefficient human-to-human transmission of H5N1 viruses seen to date," Dr. Kawaoka wrote in his report.

Researchers Shed More Light On Bird Flu (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Two research teams have independently discovered explanations for the chief features of the H5N1 bird flu virus -- its difficulty infecting humans, and the deadly effects when it does.

Unlike influenza viruses that are passed easily between people, H5N1 has a hard time attaching to cells in the nose, throat and upper airways. But it readily attaches to cells deep in the lungs.

This suggests that people need close and heavy exposure to the H5N1 virus for it to get into the lungs. But once it takes hold, it causes extensive damage to the machinery of respiration -- the cells and air spaces where oxygen is exchanged for carbon dioxide.

That scenario mimics the clinical experience of many of the 184 human cases of bird flu that have been officially recorded since late 2003. More than half have been fatal.

"This is information that we need to know -- fundamental and exciting," said Robert G. Webster, a leading flu virologist at St. Jude Children's Research Hospital in Memphis. He was not a member of either of the research groups, one of which published its results in yesterday's issue of the journal Nature, and the other online in Science.

Influenza infection occurs through a series of steps, with a key early one involving hemagglutinin, a protein that coats the virus's outer envelope. That protein attaches to sugar molecules that lie on the surface of many cells.

Virologists have known for years that human flu viruses attach through a sugar "linkage" designated alpha 2,6. The vast family of avian flu viruses favors a linkage with a different shape, designated alpha 2,3.

A research team led by Kyoko Shinya at the University of Wisconsin and the University of Tokyo looked at what cells in the human respiratory tract contain which linkage. They found that alpha 2,6 -- the receptor for human flu -- predominated in the nose and down the airways to the microscopic passageways that lead to the air sacs, or alveoli. At that point, cells with the alpha 2,3 linkage -- the receptor for bird viruses -- become common. Human viruses attached to the upper airways, while avian viruses attached to cells deep in the lungs.

The Japanese researchers, who published their findings in Nature, also tested an H5N1 virus taken from a person who died of bird flu in Hong Kong in 2003. That microbe's hemagglutinin recognized both the human and bird linkages, and it attached to cells from nose to lung. Most H5N1 samples isolated from people do not generally follow that pattern. The ability to bind to alpha 2,6 human receptors is one of several features that would have to become dominant for the H5N1 virus to become easily transmitted from human to human.

In the other paper, Thijs Kuiken and colleagues at Erasmus Medical Center in the Netherlands exposed H5N1 to blocks of tissue taken from all along the respiratory tree. They found the bird virus attached predominantly to cells at the entrance to the air sacs and in them, as well as to immune-system cells called alveolar macrophages that patrol the area.

This same pattern was seen in cats and ferrets. (Ferrets have traditionally been considered the species whose flu infections most closely mimic those of humans.) In mice, however, the pattern was reversed. H5N1 attached best to cells in the windpipe, not the lung -- suggesting mice are not the best animal model for research on this strain.

DOJ_NMG_0020404

In many of the fatal H5N1 infections, people's lungs were filled with fluid, the result of an out-of-control inflammatory reaction. Kuiken speculated that bird flu's affinity for macrophages -- which can release inflammatory chemicals -- may be part of the reason.

Studies Suggest Avian Flu Pandemic Isn't Imminent (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Two groups of researchers, in Japan and in Holland, say they have discovered why the avian flu virus is rarely if ever transmitted from one person to another.

The reason, the researchers propose, is that the cells bearing the type of receptor the avian virus is known to favor are clustered in the deepest branches of the human respiratory tract, keeping it from spreading by coughs and sneezes. Human flu viruses typically infect cells in the upper respiratory tract.

The avian virus would need to accumulate many mutations in its genetic material before it could become a pandemic strain, said Yoshihiro Kawaoka, a virologist at the University of Tokyo and the University of Wisconsin.

According to a University of Wisconsin news release approved by Dr. Kawaoka, "The finding suggests that scientists and public health agencies worldwide may have more time to prepare for an eventual pandemic."

Dr. Kawaoka's finding is published in today's issue of Nature, and a similar finding, by Thijs Kuiken and colleagues at the Erasmus Medical Center in Rotterdam, appears in this week's Science.

Flu experts already knew that people who contract the current avian flu virus, a type known as A(H5N1) or H5 for short, are infected in the lower lung.

Paul A. Offit, a virologist at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, said the new reports helped explain why the H5 virus, though it can infect people, does not easily spread from one person to another.

Virologists agree that a flu pandemic will happen sooner or later as one of the 16 types of flu virus in the animal world, probably one that infects birds, will manage to switch hosts, and grow and spread in humans. But they differ over whether H5 is the likeliest candidate to make such a switch. Previous pandemics have been caused only by H1- (the 1918 pandemic), H2- (the 1957 Asian flu) or H3-type viruses (the Hong Kong flu of 1968).

The H5 strain of avian flu has so far failed to develop a pandemic form. Some virologists fear it may need only better transmissibility. The new findings suggest that the virus could acquire such a property by switching its preference from the cell receptor found in the lower lung, known as alpha 2-3, to the receptor found on cells in the upper airways, known as alpha 2-6.

A team of scientists at the Scripps Research Institute reported in Science last week that only a couple of mutations might be needed to enable the H5 virus to make this switch to the alpha 2-6 receptor. This is the about same number of mutations made by the H1, H2 and H3 viruses when they adapted to infect people. Since viruses mutate fast, a two-mutation step is not such a big hurdle.

Because the H5 virus has killed about half of the 187 people it has infected, "a lot of its genes are already optimized for virulence," said James C. Paulson, a member of the Scripps team. For H5 to become pandemic, "the key gene that needs to be mutated is the HA gene," he said, referring to the hemagglutinin gene that makes the protein probe used by the virus to latch onto a cell's receptor sites.

Though H5 may seem only a couple of steps from transmissibility among people, many virologists believe mutations in several other genes would be necessary as well, even though those changes are not yet well understood.

Viruses find it difficult to switch hosts, and though they may quite often cause outbreaks in just a few individuals, "viruses that produce a self-sustaining chain of transmission in the new host appear rare," Dr. Kawaoka writes in the current Annual Review of Microbiology. "Most of these transfers are dead ends," he said.

The H5 virus has been present in the human population since the late 1950's, said Dr. Offit of Children's Hospital, but has never acquired the full set of mutations needed to set off a pandemic. Such epidemiological evidence "should make us feel safe that there's a substantial barrier," he said, noting the small number of people who have been infected.

Dr. Offit said it was a good thing to worry about the next flu pandemic, given that about three can be expected every century. "What's not good is to try to sell the public on their fear of pandemic flu being this particular bird flu, since if it's not, crying wolf will lose you credibility," he said.

Peter Palese, a virologist at the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, said he did not believe the H5 virus could infect people except when they were exposed to large doses, for example, by sleeping in the same room as chickens. "I feel strongly that H5 has been around in humans for a long time and never caused a pandemic, suggesting that this is not the virus which is likely to be the next pandemic," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0020405

But like Dr. Offit, Dr. Palese said he fully supported plans for better preparations for the next flu pandemic, whatever its source. "People have to understand we are not really prepared should it come," he said.

China Agrees To Hand Over Bird Flu Samples (FT)

By Andrew Yeh In Beijing

Financial Times, March 23, 2006

Chinese officials have promised to provide numerous bird flu virus samples to global health researchers, a rare move that will help accelerate research into the lethal disease, World Health Organisation officials said on Wednesday.

For several months, Beijing has been willing to share genetic sequencing information with international health officials but provided only a few live virus samples. But WHO representatives said the Chinese government had pledged to share more animal and human viruses with greater frequency.

Beijing's compliance, if followed through, is a sign of more intimate cooperation with the global health community.

The move reflects a change in attitude among Chinese government researchers, who at times have been reluctant to share samples for fear of not being recognised for any breakthrough findings published overseas.

The WHO expects to receive shipments of up to 20 samples of wild birds and poultry infected by the H5N1 virus within a few weeks, according to Julie Hall, a Beijing-based infectious disease expert with the organisation.

Shigeru Omi, WHO's western Pacific director, said greater exchange of H5N1 information was crucial since the disease is "very changeable".

Western health authorities argue that the swapping of bird flu virus samples is imperative as long as pandemic risks exist, and improves the chances of developing a prototype vaccine.

The disease has killed 103 people worldwide since 2003, according to the WHO. Even as most cases have come from contact with birds, many fear the virus may mutate into a form that can spread with greater efficiency.

Since 2004, with bird flu spreading more quickly in Asia, Beijing has provided only a handful of animal virus samples to the WHO.

The new samples being promised are expected to be analysed at advanced laboratories around the world, and will likely be injected into mice and ferrets, to study the antibodies those animals produce.

The WHO is at the same time seeking to get new human virus samples from the health ministry in China, which has reported 15 human cases to date. China's Centre for Disease Control and Prevention provided the WHO with two human virus strains at the end of last year.

Chinese researchers have similarly requested reciprocal sharing of viruses from other countries and global organisations. After the Sars outbreak in 2003, Beijing has been determined to improve its scientific research innovation.

"China has the high capacity to do much of the work themselves," said Dr Hall, who noted that China's earlier resistance to sharing viruses is now "behind us".

Man Cleared Of Nevada Petroglyph Theft Says 'my Life Was Trashed' (AP)

By SCOTT SONNER, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, March 23, 2006

RENO, Nev. (AP) - One of two men whose federal conviction for stealing American Indian artwork was overturned says the pair simply wanted to protect the ancient petroglyphs from encroaching development.

Carroll Mizell, who served 10 months in prison after being found guilty in June 2004 of stealing the rock art said "we wanted to save the property.

"My whole intent was to free these things so they wouldn't be destroyed," Mizell told The Associated Press on Wednesday from Redmond, Ore.

"We didn't do this because we wanted to put them on e-Bay," he said.

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Tuesday that the Justice Department failed to prove the rock art taken from a national forest on the edge of Reno had a market value of more than $1,000, a requirement for a felony conviction of government theft.

Mizell and John Ligon of Reno admitted during their federal court trial in Reno that they took three boulders with etchings of an archer and bighorn sheep from the Humboldt-Toiyabe National Forest. But they insisted they didn't know it was illegal, partly because there were no signs marking the site.

Forest Service officials believe the petroglyphs are at least 1,000 years old. They were located within a few hundred yards of backyards in a neighborhood in northwest Reno where hundreds of new homes are scheduled to be built.

DOJ_NMG_0020406

Natalie Collins, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Las Vegas, said federal prosecutors are considering asking the appeals court to reconsider the case but they had no further comment.

Mizell said he did not feel vindicated by the ruling.

"This is crazy what I've been through and now they say, `Oh, we made a mistake?'" said Mizell, an artist who lived in Van Nuys, Calif., and Reno, but now works as a glass blower in Oregon.

"My name was trashed in the community. I was made out to be a thief, man - like I'm a rock thief, I attacked the Indian culture. It was as if we might as well just gone and dug up some graves the way they treated us," he said.

"I've done 10 months in prison. I've seen two shrinks who have me on two types of meds to cope with it."

The men were arrested after a neighbor saw a news account of the theft and notified police that the boulders - one weighing 300 pounds - were being used as landscaping in Ligon's front yard.

"John said, `Let's put them there.' I said we needed to give them to an Indian museum and I made some calls to do that," he said.

David Houston, Mizell's lawyer, made the same argument during the trial.

"There are times people will take artifacts knowingly to sell on the black market. ... loot or raid or rob a site of antiquities for the purpose of knowingly taking artifacts to their home or to a secret place where they and they alone can view it. This is not that kind of case," Houston told the jury.

Mizell wanted to "protect these rocks. ... to avoid having the developers literally chew them up and spit them out," he said.

In their ruling, the 9th Circuit judges said prosecutors could not use evidence of the archaeological value of the petroglyphs to prove a government theft charge that hinged on a "market value" of more than $1,000.

A Forest Service archaeologist testified at the trial that the petroglyphs had an archaeological value of about $8,000, and William Dancing Feather, cultural resources coordinator for the Washoe Tribe, said the tribe considered the petroglyphs a priceless treasure.

N.H. Lawmakers Approve Limits On Eminent Domain (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

New Hampshire lawmakers gave preliminary approval Wednesday to a constitutional amendment that would limit government's ability to seize private property.

The measure was prompted by a U.S. Supreme Court ruling last year that allowed New London, Conn., to take a group of older homes along the waterfront and turn them over to a developer who plans to build offices, a hotel and a convention center.

The state House and Senate voted overwhelmingly in favor of identical resolutions. For the measure to win approval, both chambers must pick one resolution and pass it.

Then the amendment would be put to a statewide vote, probably in November. Two-thirds approval would be needed for ratification.

The amendment would prohibit the taking of private property for use by private developers.

After the high court's eminent domain ruling, activists tried to seize Supreme Court Justice David Souter's 200-year-old New Hampshire farmhouse in retaliation for voting with the majority.

Earlier this month, voters in the town of Weare decided to leave Souter's house alone and instead urged the Legislature to take action.

Special Interests Vs. Virginia Taxpayers (WT)

By Jeremy Hopkins

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Just as the fox cannot be trusted to protect the hen house, the Virginia General Assembly once again proved it cannot be trusted to protect Virginians' private property.

The Supreme Court's infamous decision in Kelo v. City of New London, which allows the government to take property from one person simply to give it to another, caused most states to take action to prohibit such abuses. However, the General Assembly refuses to limit the power of eminent domain in Virginia. It ended its 2006 legislative session without passing legislation to eliminate the abuses in Kelo.

The General Assembly's refusal to protect Virginia property owners is even more troublesome given Virginia's track record. The abuses in Kelo are not new to Virginians. In 2003, the Virginia Supreme Court allowed the City of Hampton to take Frank and Dora Ottofaro's property and give 82 percent of the Ottofaros' property to a private developer. In 2005, the Norfolk

Redevelopment and Housing Authority attempted to take a small-business owner's property to build a parking lot for the Coca-Cola company, which owned the adjacent property.

The most egregious abuse occurred in Halifax County, where the County Board of Supervisors took one man's property solely to construct a paved driveway for the man's neighbor. In that case, a politically connected family asked the board to take its neighbor's property to construct a paved driveway to serve the family's property. The family then cut the board a check for the purchase price of the neighbor's property.

The driveway, which adds great value to the family's property, serves only the family and its visitors. The driveway extends 4/10 of a mile and dead-ends into the family's property. The Halifax County Circuit Court ruled that Virginia law does not prohibit such takings.

Not only has the General Assembly refused to correct such abuses, it also continues to carelessly dispense the power of eminent domain to countless entities, both public and private. Most representatives cannot name a fraction of the entities that can take Virginians' homes, farms and businesses. The General Assembly has even given mosquito-control commissions the power to take Virginians' property. The result of the General Assembly's delegations of power is that Virginians' homes, farms, and businesses are now subject to the whim of unelected and unaccountable bureaucrats and corporate officials who wield immense power over the property of individual Virginians.

The only thing more disturbing than the number of entities able to take Virginians' property is the amount of power the General Assembly has given many of these same entities. The Virginia Code allows housing authorities to take one man's home simply because his neighbor's property is "blighted." In other words, if your neighbor fails to maintain his home, the housing authority can take your home. The absurdity of such laws is amplified by city charters such as Norfolk's, which allows the city to take property "for any purposes of the city." The charter even allows the city to sell or transfer property it takes to any person it desires, without restriction.

Why does the General Assembly refuse to protect property owners? The answer is simple: politics. While property owners are busy working to pay their taxes and provide for their families, a strong condemning authority lobby has seized Virginia representatives. Unlike the average citizen, condemning authorities have ample time and resources to employ lobbyists, bureaucrats and other officials dedicated to mustering the support of Virginia representatives.

Virginians' own state agencies and local governments, as well as large private corporations that have the power of eminent domain, spare no expense in fighting to ensure that the General Assembly does not place any real restrictions on their power to take people's property. It is ironic that the government often spends the very tax dollars collected from property owners themselves to lobby against the owners. In essence, Virginia property owners involuntarily fund the denial of their own property rights.

In addition to its strong and politically connected lobby, condemning authorities give thousands of dollars in campaign contributions to Virginia representatives. Aside from straightforward contributions, many of the representatives are lawyers who either personally or through their law firms rake in thousands of dollars representing condemning authorities.

Many of the lawmakers with this apparent conflict of interest hold key positions on the committees affecting any potential eminent-domain reform.

These representatives often kill any legitimate eminent-domain reform bills or render such bills meaningless before the bills ever leave committee and get to the floor of their respective houses.

With this said, the division over eminent domain reform is not Republican vs. Democrat. The only division is the takers vs. the taken from. In other words, the division is special interests vs. grass-roots, the politically connected vs. the politically disconnected, or the government (to include private corporations with the governmental power of eminent domain) vs. the people. Unfortunately for Virginians, the General Assembly -- whose own actions and careless delegations of power created the abuses in Virginia -- continues to side with the takers.

Unless and until Virginians demand a constitutional amendment to place real restrictions on the General Assembly's power of eminent domain, no Virginian's home, farm or business will be secure.

Jeremy Hopkins is of counsel with Waldo & Lyle, P.C., a Virginia law firm that represents property owners in eminent domain cases.

Back in 1998, a frisky eight-inch rodent known as the Preble's meadow jumping mouse gained protective status under the 1973 Endangered Species Act (ESA). What has Coloradans hot under the collar is that some 31,000 acres of local government and privately owned land in the state and stretching into Wyoming -- an area larger than the District of Columbia -- was essentially quarantined from all development so as not to disrupt the mouse's natural habitat. Even the Fish and Wildlife Service concedes that the cost to these land owners could reach $183 million.

What we have here is arguably the most contentious dispute over the economic impact of the ESA since the famous early-'90s clash between the timber industry and the environmentalist lobby over the "endangered" listing of the spotted owl in the Northwest. That dispute eventually forced the closure of nearly 200 mills and the loss of thousands of jobs. Last week the war over the fate of the Preble's mouse escalated when a coalition of enraged homeowners, developers and farmers petitioned the Department of the Interior to have the mouse immediately delisted as "endangered" because of reliance on faulty data.

The property-rights coalition would seem to have a fairly persuasive case based on the latest research on the mouse. It turns out that not only is the mouse not endangered, it isn't even a unique species.

The man who is almost singlehandedly responsible for exposing the truth about the Preble's mouse is Rob Roy Ramey, a biologist and lifelong conservationist, who used to serve as a curator at the Denver Museum of Nature and Science. Mr. Ramey's research -- published last year in the peer-reviewed journal Animal Conservation -- concluded that the Preble's mouse "is not a valid subspecies based on physical features and genetics." The scientist who conducted the original research classifying Preble's as unique now agrees with Mr. Ramey's assessment. Even scientists who defend extending the mouse's "endangered" status admit that it is 99.5% genetically similar to other strains of mice.

Nor is the mouse on the road to extinction. "The more people look for these mice, the more they find. Every time scientists do a new count, we find more of the Preble's mouse," Mr. Ramey says. It's now been found inhabiting twice as many distinct areas as once thought. These are mice, after all, and the one thing rodents are proficient at is breeding. The full species of the meadow jumping mouse, far from being rare, can be found over half the land area of North America.

"The federal government has effectively shut off tens of millions of dollars of economic development," complains coalition spokesman Kent Holsinger, "based on saving a species that we now know doesn't even exist." But green groups and Department of Interior bureaucrats, who regard the ESA as a sacred pact -- the modern-day equivalent of Noah's Ark, as former Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt called it -- pledge to fight any change in status.

Not surprisingly, Mr. Ramey has been accused of being "dishonest," a "whore for industry" and a "shill for the Bush administration." Under intense political pressure from environmental activists, he was removed from his curator's job at the museum. "I've been nearly stampeded by a herd of agitated elephants in Africa and suspended from some of the highest cliffs in North America, but nothing prepared me for the viciousness of the attacks from the environmentalist lobby," he tells me.

Meanwhile, the Preble's mouse continues to impose huge costs on local communities. One water district in Colorado was recently required to build two tunnels for the mice under a man-made pond to spare the critters the inconvenience of having to scurry around it. Regulators asked local officials if it would be feasible to grow grass in the tunnels for the mice, which was only slightly less absurd than padding the mouse thoroughfares with red carpet. The extra cost to the water project to make it mouse-friendly? More than $1 million. The Fish and Wildlife Service also has the authority to assess penalties on property owners if they even inadvertently spoil mouse habitat. Owners can even be fined if their cats do what cats do: chase and apprehend mice.

A comprehensive 2003 survey found that more than one in four land owners impacted by the Preble's mouse regulation "admitted to actively degrading habitat following the species listing in 1998." This is often precisely what happens in these situations: Because most of 1,500 or so species that have been listed as threatened since 1972 are anything but, people have no respect for the designation and attempt to force the species away from their land. They call it "shoot 'em, shovel 'em and shut up." For truly endangered species, the ESA is a disaster.

Many individuals have been so strong-armed by federal bureaucrats that they have come to believe -- with good reason -- that the original and widely supported intent of the ESA has been subverted into a back-door means to slam the brakes on economic development. "It's a cost-free way for the government and the greens to impose land-use control on property owners," says R.J. Smith, an ESA expert at the Competitive Enterprise Institute.

Therein lies the crux of the problem. The law tries to achieve the societal policy goal of saving species from extinction by imposing all of the costs on a hapless few. House Resources Committee Chairman Richard Pombo has sensibly proposed reforms that allow landowners to get fair compensation from the government if their land is depressed in value due to a wetlands or endangered species designation. That seems equitable: If society wants to preserve habitat for the common good, then the cost should be borne by all taxpayers, not individual landowners, who would no longer regard endangered species as an economic plague.

If anything good can come out of the Preble's mouse fiasco in Colorado, it will be that it has awakened Congress to the reality that the ESA isn't just failing property owners but the very irreplaceable species it was designed to protect.

U.S. Indicts Colombia Guerrilla Leaders (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - The United States charged 50 leaders of Colombia's largest guerrilla group with sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine around the world to finance their fight at home, a federal indictment that depicts the rebels as major narco-terrorists.

The indictment made public Wednesday in U.S. District Court said the leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, ordered the killings of Colombian farmers who did not cooperate with the group, the kidnapping and killing of U.S. citizens and the downing of U.S. planes seeking to fumigate coca crops.

U.S. officials said the indictment strikes a blow against the group because it lays out the FARC's hierarchy and details of its operations. "Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said.

He acknowledged that 47 of those charged remain at large, probably in well-defended jungle strongholds that have so far proved beyond the reach of Colombian authorities.

The FARC supplies more than half the world's cocaine and 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States, the indictment said. "The FARC's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in America's neighborhoods," said the head of the Drug Enforcement Administration, Karen Tandy.

Washington-based experts on Colombia said the actual numbers probably are lower, but are significant. Right-wing paramilitary groups also are heavily involved in the cocaine trade, the experts and the indictment said.

The FARC uses proceeds from the cocaine trade to purchase weapons in its four-decade fight to overthrow the Colombian government, the indictment said. A grand jury returned the indictment on March 1; it remained under seal until Wednesday.

The U.S. and the European Union have designated the FARC a terrorist organization.

Colombia President Alvaro Uribe, Washington's closest ally in South America, has waged an aggressive fight against the FARC and stepped up efforts to eradicate his country's coca crop. Uribe faces re-election in May and has been leading in the polls.

The U.S. has spent more than $3 billion since 2000 to reduce Colombia's coca crop and the flow of cocaine to this country. The results have been lackluster, said John Walsh, senior analyst at the Washington Office on Latin America, a think tank.

The indictment is intended to show that U.S.-Colombian cooperation is "successfully getting at the drug-trafficking industry and attacking drug financing," Walsh said.

Phillip McLean, a former American diplomat who now is at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said he expects the charges will influence the debate in Colombia between those who view the FARC as a traditional guerrilla group with a political agenda and those who see it as a criminal organization.

"This indictment clearly puts the weight on the side of those who say these guys are bandits," said McLean, who served in Colombia in the 1980s and recently returned from a trip there.

The State Department said it would pay up to $75 million in rewards for information leading to the arrest of 24 FARC leaders named in the indictment.

Three others charged in the drug conspiracy are in custody in Colombia and U.S. officials said they would seek to have them extradited. They are: Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, authorities said.

More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, officials said. Two accused FARC leaders already are awaiting trial in Washington on narcotics charges.

The FARC is holding more than 60 hostages, including three U.S. defense contractors kidnapped in February 2003, when their small plane crashed in the jungles of southern Colombia during an anti-narcotics mission.

U.S. Indicts 50 Colombians For Cocaine Trafficking (LAT)

By Michael Muskal, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 23, 2006

The United States has indicted 50 top leaders of the leading leftist militia in Colombia on drug charges of sending more than $25 billion worth of cocaine abroad.

In a one-count indictment unsealed this morning, a federal grand jury has charged 50 leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, known by its Spanish initials as FARC. The U.S. will seek to extradite three of the defendants who are in custody in Colombia and offered rewards that total $75 million for information leading to the arrest of the others who are believed to be in areas controlled by the militia.

U.S. officials say FARC has sent about 60% of the cocaine imported into the U.S., then used the money to support its long-term insurgency against Colombia, now led by pro-U.S. President Alvaro Uribe.

"This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine," said Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales. "Because of unprecedented cooperation between United States and Colombian authorities, we are closer than ever before to reaching our goal of bringing the leaders of this narco-terrorist group to justice in the United States."

Among the leaders being sought are the seven figures who sit on the FARC Secretariat, the militia's ruling body, and 17 members of the estado mayor, or governing council, U.S. officials said at a news conference this morning in Washington.

"The Department of State's Narcotics Rewards Program has successfully targeted the Cali, Medellin and Norte del Valle cartels in Colombia, bringing many of their top leaders to justice," said Anne Patterson, assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics and Law Enforcement. "The FARC, responsible for much of the cocaine trafficked to the United States, is now in our sights."

Formed in the mid-1960s, FARC is Latin America's oldest leftist insurgency, with perhaps as many as 17,000 fighters. It has engaged in tactics from kidnappings to battles with Colombia troops.

FARC's ties to drug-running have long been established. Colombia has received about $4 billion in U.S. aid to fight FARC since 2000. On Dec. 31, 2004, Simon Trinidad, the highest-ranking FARC leader ever captured, was extradited to the United States on drug charges.

Uribe is credited with improving security in Colombia, where the number of kidnappings and massacres are down. He was able to push through a constitutional amendment abolishing a one-term limit on presidents so that he can run again in May.

The indictment outlines FARC's efforts to collect millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and use the money to purchase weapons.

"The defendants also allegedly ordered FARC members to kidnap and murder U.S. citizens to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the FARC's cocaine-trafficking activities," the Justice Department said.

The indictment also alleged that FARC leaders "authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes, and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law enforcement officers who were conducting the investigation into the FARC's narcotics activities."

Gonzales said the three in custody are Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," Erminso Cuevas Cabrera, who uses the name "Mincho," and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, whose pseudonyms include "Gentil Alvis Patino" and "Chiguiro."

If convicted the defendants could face a minimum of 10 years in prison.

U.S. Indicts 50 Leaders Of Colombian Rebels In Cocaine Trafficking (NYT)

By Juan Forero

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

BOGOTÁ, Colombia, March 22 — A federal grand jury in Washington has indicted 50 commanders of Colombia's largest Marxist rebel group, accusing them of running an extensive cocaine trafficking cartel that protects its operations through widespread killings and intimidation, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales announced Wednesday.

The indictment accuses the group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, of being behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine exported to the United States.

"We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence," Mr. Gonzales said.

The practical impact is unclear, since 47 of the 50 commanders remain free in this vast country, leading thousands of fighters in the group's relentless effort to topple President Álvaro Uribe's government. Three are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition, American officials said.

The indictment says rebel commanders ordered their fighters to shoot down crop dusters and to kidnap and kill American citizens, in an effort to dissuade policy makers in Washington from continuing to sponsor a fumigation campaign against the coca plant, from whose leaves cocaine is made.

Some charges in the document may be hard to prove, like those linking commanders to drug operations years ago when the rebel group was believed to be far less involved in the cocaine trade.

But high-ranking Colombian government officials interviewed in Bogotá on Wednesday welcomed the indictment, saying it demonstrated the Bush administration's long-term commitment to Mr. Uribe, the United States' closest ally in Latin America.

"We see this as a recognition of the clear relationship between terrorism and narcotrafficking," said Defense Minister Camilo Ospina. "This shows that a big decision has been made to carry out the final battle against narcotrafficking and terrorism."

The indictment came just days after a coalition of pro-government parties took control of Colombia's 268-member Congress, a decisive political victory for Mr. Uribe. The victory strengthens his chances of winning re-election in May and gives him the political leverage to follow through with his agenda, including aggressively fighting the rebel group with Colombia's Washington-backed army.

With billions of dollars in backing from the United States, Colombia has sprayed much of its drug-crop acreage and carried out army offensives against the rebels. The chief of the national police, Jorge Daniel Castro, said Wednesday in an interview that the group was "in a defensive position" as a result of the military offensives and the fumigation. "We're seeing that they don't have the capacity that they had before," he said.

But the group continues to control wide swaths of territory and has been increasingly active in neighboring Ecuador and Venezuela, where it operates camps for its fighters and traffics cocaine. The group also continues to attack civilians; last month, rebel commandos burst into a meeting in the town of Rivera, southwest of Bogotá, and gunned down nine council members.

Cynthia Arnson, a Colombia expert who is director of the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, noted that it remained difficult to gauge whether the group had suffered big setbacks or had voluntarily withdrawn into the jungle. "This indictment," she said, "could be the beginning of an enormous political and diplomatic offensive to capitalize on whatever military momentum has been achieved."

Mr. Gonzales did not elaborate on what American officials would do to go after individual commanders but said that there were "effective options" and "they all remain on the table." The State Department said it would provide rewards of up to $5 million for information leading to the arrests of members of the rebel group's governing seven-member secretariat.

The leader of the group is Pedro Antonio Marín — better known by his nom de guerre, Manuel Marulanda — a former chicken farmer who first took up arms in the 1950's during Colombia's internecine political conflict of that era. He later helped found the rebel group, turning a peasant army into the richest, best-equipped Marxist insurgency in Latin America.

The indictment offers a look at how the group went from leveling taxes on farmers who grew coca to operating clandestine airstrips and helping to build an international cocaine distribution network. It also details the brutality used by the group to enforce its dominance of the drug trade. It says commanders ordered the killing of farmworkers who did not comply with the group's rules, in some cases dismembering them or filling their corpses with rocks and sinking them in rivers.

Colombian Rebels Face Drug Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Fifty leaders of the leftist Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) have been named in a federal grand jury indictment on charges of exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine, half the world's illicit supply, in the largest U.S. drug-trafficking case.

"From their jungle hideaway, the FARC uses the drug trade to bankroll terrorism in Colombia, finance attacks on innocent citizens and poison Americans," said U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) chief Karen P. Tandy. "Today's indictment challenges that lawlessness, and the FARC leadership should prepare to face the justice that they have long denied to so many."

Mrs. Tandy said the indictment "addresses and decimates the entire leadership of the FARC."

The one-count indictment, handed up March 1 in U.S. District Court in Washington and unsealed yesterday, "strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation," said Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, adding that the terrorist-designated organization collected millions of dollars in cocaine proceeds and used the money to purchase weapons for its 42-year-long war against the Colombian government.

FARC "is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Mr. Gonzales said. "For years, this group has controlled the production and distribution of massive amounts of cocaine that ends up in America's communities. Members of the FARC do not want to face American justice."

Three of the charged FARC leaders -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. will seek their extradition to face trial in the United States. More than 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face criminal charges, and two accused FARC leaders are awaiting trial in Washington.

Andres Pastrana, Colombia's ambassador to the U.S., said the indictment was based on evidence gathered by American officials who worked "in very close collaboration with Colombian authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0020412

"Colombia is one of the main victims of the global war on drugs. Thousands of innocent citizens, journalists, judges, politicians, soldiers and police officers have given their lives to this cause," said Mr. Pastrana, a former Colombian president who was kidnapped by the Medellin drug cartel during his 1988 race for Bogota mayor and later rescued by police. "Colombia has been and remains deeply committed to defeating the drug trade."

FARC has about 17,000 members and controls wide areas of the country, so rounding up the other 47 indicted leaders will be a difficult task. The State Department announced rewards yesterday of $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the leaders still at large, all members of FARC's governing council.

In addition to half the world's supply of cocaine, FARC was responsible for more than 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States every year, Mrs. Tandy said, adding that the organization controlled every aspect of its production and distribution, even setting the prices paid to Colombian farmers for coca paste, the raw material used to produce cocaine.

According to the indictment, the FARC leaders used terrorism and violence to further their cocaine-trafficking activities, ordering the deaths of Colombian farmers who sold coca paste to non-FARC buyers. It said the farmers who violated FARC rules were shot, stabbed or dismembered alive, their bodies cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers.

The indictment also said the FARC leaders also ordered the kidnap and killing of Americans to discourage the U.S. government from disrupting the organization's cocaine-trafficking activities. It also said the FARC leaders authorized their members to shoot down U.S. fumigation planes and plotted to retaliate against U.S. law-enforcement officers conducting investigations into FARC's narcotics activities.

Three U.S. contractors are among 60 hostages being held by FARC.

The indictment said:

·Rodriguez Mendieta, also known as "Ivan Vargas," was a member of the FARC's leadership council and commander of its 24th Front unit. He is accused of directing the purchase of cocaine paste and transmitting billions of Colombian pesos in cocaine profits to FARC officials, and the indictment said he ordered the slayings of eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive.

·Cuevas Cabrera, who also was called "Mincho," was a FARC associate who managed cocaine laboratories for the organization's 14th Front unit, where he supervised the production and distribution of hundreds of thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He has been in custody since 2004.

·Martinez Vega, also known as "Chiguiro," was a FARC associate who provided large quantities of arms and ammunition to the organization in exchange for thousands of kilograms of cocaine. He was arrested on drug charges in Venezuela and turned over to Colombian authorities in early 2005.

U.S. Indicts Leaders Of Colombian Guerrillas On Trafficking Charges (KRT)

By Pablo Bachelet And Steven Dudley

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia - In an unprecedented legal move, the U.S. government Wednesday indicted the entire top leadership and 43 other commanders of Colombia's FARC guerrillas on charges of running a $25 billion drug trafficking network responsible for 60 percent of the cocaine on U.S. streets.

Accused in the indictment were Pedro Antonio Marin, aka Manuel ``Sureshot'' Marulanda, legendary leader of Latin America's largest and oldest leftist guerrilla organization, and all six other members of its ruling secretariat.

The indictment is likely to make it easier for the U.S. Congress to continue funding for Plan Colombia, a multibillion dollar effort to combat drug trafficking, and military aid for the conservative government of President Alvaro Uribe, one of the strongest U.S. allies in the region.

But analysts said it may not have much impact on an estimated 18,000-strong guerrilla force whose leaders are deeply entrenched in the far reaches of a country the size of France, flush with drug money and showing signs lately of recovering from a three-year-old military offensive.

If captured, however, the FARC leaders would face possible extradition to the United States to be tried on charges that could keep them in prison in the U.S. for decades.

The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, has long been known to collect payments from coca farmers and drug traffickers, as well as businessmen, cattle ranchers and shop owners, to finance its four-decades-old insurgency.

But the indictment unveiled by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales at a news conference in Washington alleges that the FARC has taken its involvement in the drug trade significantly further in recent years, earning as much as $25 billion.

``The FARC has evolved into the world's largest supplier of cocaine and cocaine paste,'' a semi-processed product that must be refined into cocaine, the indictment alleges.

``This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," Gonzales said.

The indictment seemed to signal a major shift in the United States' view of the guerrillas. While previous statements by U.S. officials linked specific FARC members to drug trafficking, the new charges implicate the entire FARC command structure in an organized cartel and is the first to mention Marulanda and his fellow top commanders as the masterminds.

In addition to the secretariat members, the indictment names 20 members of the FARC's military ``high command" and numerous lower-ranking commanders. In all, 50 people were indicted, including Pedro Aldana, who is believed to have died some time back. Only three are already jailed in Colombia. Two other FARC members not mentioned in the indictment have already been extradited to face drug and other charges in Washington.

U.S. officials said they would offer up to $5 million for information leading to the capture of the higher ranking rebels and $2.5 million for 17 others.

Andres Pastrana, former president of Colombia and now its ambassador in Washington, said his country would work with U.S. and other officials ``to bring justice to individuals and groups who are proven to be involved in drug trafficking."

The State Department includes the FARC in its list of terrorist organizations because of some of its tactics, but Drug Enforcement Administration chief Karen Tandy said drug trafficking was its economic lifeline.

``Make no mistake; they're not just ordinary drug traffickers," Tandy said. ``To call them that would be something akin to calling Al Capone a tax cheat."

The 42-page indictment includes a description of the FARC's makeup, command structure and a detailed history of its alleged involvement in the cocaine trade.

It states that FARC developed in the 1990s into a ``broker" between coca farmers and cocaine distributors. Eventually, it declared itself the sole buyer of semi-processed coca paste and developed its own distribution network. Farmers and buyers who did not follow FARC orders were sometimes executed, including some who were ``dismembered alive."

The sweeping allegations make no mention of the FARC's claims to be fighting to spread education, wealth and health to the one half of Colombia's 45 million people that lives below the poverty line, referring to it solely as a drug trafficking network.

But not all analysts agree with the U.S. assessment of its massive role in drug trafficking.

While the FARC is undoubtedly heavily involved in drug trafficking, including distribution networks through countries like Venezuela and Mexico, criminal cartels still control the vast majority of drug routes leading into the United States and Europe, analysts said.

``This seems more like the work of Uribe lobbyists than that of an investigation," said Ricardo Vargas, head of the Colombian drug think-tank Andean Action and a longtime FARC-watcher.

Analysts also speculated that Washington and Bogota may be trying to use the threat of extradition to coerce a peace settlement with the FARC, something they did successfully with right-wing paramilitary groups. Several paramilitary leaders indicted for drug trafficking in the United States face extradition if they do not comply with a peace accord now under negotiation with the Uribe government.

But the powerful FARC, which has been fighting the government for the past 42 years, may not heel to such pressures.

``We should not be confused, that because extradition worked with the paramilitaries, it will work with the FARC," said Sergio Jaramillo, director of the think tank Ideas For Peace. ``It's a double-edged sword. If one is not careful, one may end up making a peace agreement in Colombia impossible."

Colombian Rebels Charged In U.S. With Cocaine Trade (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Bill Arthur

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- A federal grand jury indicted 50 members of a Colombian rebel group on charges of importing more than $25 billion worth of cocaine into the U.S. and other countries, the Justice Department said.

Three of the 50 members of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, known as FARC, are in custody in Colombia, and the U.S. is seeking their extradition, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said. The others are ``at large, hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia surrounded by heavily armed FARC loyalists," he said.

The Justice Department calls FARC, the largest guerrilla group in Colombia, a ``narco-terrorist" group and views it as one of the ``highest priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," Gonzales said at a news conference in Washington.

FARC engages in kidnapping, murder and other crimes, including threats against U.S. agents, to continue its hold on cocaine traffic, the Justice Department said.

DOJ_NMG_0020414

According to the indictment handed up March 1 and unsealed today, the group supplies more than half of the world's cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine that enters the U.S. Today's case is ``the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history," Gonzales said.

The U.S. State Department is offering rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of 24 of the FARC leaders charged in the indictment.

``This the beginning of the process," Gonzales said when asked the chances of capturing the 47 at-large FARC members. ``That's all I can say about that."

Gonzales didn't rule out the use of U.S. troops in the battle against FARC.

``We consider all options, all effective options,' he said. ``They all remain on the table."

U.S. Indicts 50 Colombians It Calls 'narcoterrorists' (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, March 23, 2006

FARC rebels accused of exporting $25 billion worth of cocaine

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Fifty leaders of the Colombian rebel group FARC, described as "narcoterrorists" by U.S. authorities, have been indicted in Washington for allegedly exporting more than $25 billion worth of cocaine to the U.S. and other countries, Justice Department officials announced Wednesday.

Among other allegations, the indictment states that the charged FARC leaders set the price at which Colombian coca farmers could sell cocaine paste, a raw form of the drug that was transported to jungle laboratories and turned into the finished product.

Farmers who undercut the price or otherwise violated FARC's strict cocaine policies, which also dictated to which buyers the farmers could sell, were punished severely, according to the indictment.

"Colombian farmers who violated FARC rules were allegedly shot, stabbed, or dismembered alive, and the bodies of murdered farmers were cut open, filled with rocks and sunk in nearby rivers," according to a DEA news release.U.S. pushes for extradition

Three of the FARC leaders already are in Colombian custody, and the United States will seek their extradition to face drug-trafficking charges, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at a Justice Department news conference in Washington.

They have been identified as Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega, all of whom were arrested more than a year ago by Colombian or Venezuelan authorities.

Rodriguez Mendieta and Cuevas Cabrera are charged with overseeing the distribution of thousands of kilograms of cocaine and cocaine paste, while Martinez Vega is charged with trading arms for cocaine, said a Justice Department news release.

"Rodriguez Mendieta is also alleged to have ordered the murder of at least eight farmers, including several whom he personally dismembered alive, and to have plotted to retaliate against United States law enforcement officers who were conducting the narcotics-trafficking investigation that led to the charges announced today," according to the news release.

To date, about 400 Colombians have been extradited to the United States to face drug-trafficking and other criminal charges.

FARC -- the Spanish acronym for Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- is responsible for supplying more than half of the world's illicit cocaine and more than 60 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States, authorities said.

"This indictment strikes at the very heart of the FARC narcotics operation that has flooded our communities with cocaine," Gonzales said in a written statement. He said that Wednesday's announcement represented "the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history."

Expressing confidence that the indictment will mark "the beginning of the end" for the FARC drug-trafficking operation, DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said, "This is the FARC's worst fear, facing American justice."

In addition to the one-count indictment, State Department officials Wednesday announced rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of dozens of FARC leaders, including 24 of the 47 remaining indicted fugitives.U.S.: FARC a terror group

The FARC has been a high-level target of U.S. law enforcement officials in recent years, as its role in cocaine trafficking, extortions and kidnappings has escalated.

The DEA estimates the organization includes at least 12,000 armed combatants and an unknown number of supporters, mostly in rural Colombia. The group is largely funded by Americans, who pay $25 billion a year for 2,500 tons of Colombian cocaine, Tandy said.

DOJ_NMG_0020415

"The FARC's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in American neighborhoods," Tandy said in a written statement. "To put that in perspective, that's approximately $3 billion more than the annual budget of the Department of Justice."

In Colombia, the FARC is second only to oil companies in terms of annual revenue, she said.

The leftist rebel group was formed in the 1960s and has been engaged in a long struggle to overthrow the U.S.-backed government in Bogota. The United States considers FARC a terrorist organization.

In addition to the 50 leaders whose indictments were announced Wednesday, another Colombian rebel leader known as Simon Trinidad is scheduled to go on trial in June in Washington. Extradited to the United States in 2004, he is charged in connection with the murder and kidnapping of U.S. citizens whose plane went down in FARC-controlled territory of Colombia.

Three U.S. citizens aboard that plane survived and have been in FARC custody for more than three years. The DEA said that since 1980, the FARC has kidnapped more than 100 individuals and murdered 13 U.S. citizens, including three U.S. missionaries who were executed in 1999.

Nayibe Rojas Valderama, a leading female FARC leader known in Colombia as Sonia, is also awaiting trial on drug-trafficking charges in Washington.

US Charges Colombian Rebel Leaders Over Global Cocaine Trade (AFP-Y2)

Agence France-Presse, March 23, 2006

The US government charged 50 leaders of Colombia's main left-wing rebel group with smuggling "devastating amounts" of cocaine into the United States and reaping billions of dollars from global trafficking.

"This is the largest narcotics trafficking indictment ever filed in US history and fuels our hope to reduce narco violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told reporters here in announcing the charges.

The charges said the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) is behind 50 percent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine trafficked into the United States.

Gonzales said the US government will seek the immediate extradition of three of the charged FARC leaders who are currently in custody in Colombia.

He said the remaining 47 are at large, "hiding in the remote reaches of Colombia," and he announced a reward program for information leading to their capture.

"This indictment is a product of unprecedented cooperation between our nations," Gonzales said, praising the work of Colombian law enforcement agents as well as officials from the US Drug Enforcement Administration, the Internal Revenue Service and US immigration and customs agents.

"The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, is one of the Justice Department's highest-priority targets in our fight against illegal drug trafficking," he said.

Gonzales said that in addition to importing more than 25 billion dollars' worth of cocaine into the United States and other countries, the FARC has also shot, stabbed or dismembered alive farmers who did not comply with the group, and kidnapped and murdered Colombian and US nationals.

The group is also accused of shooting down fumigation planes.

50 Farc Leaders On Cocaine Charges (FT)

Fifty leaders of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (Farc), the Colombian rebel group, have been indicted on charges of importing$25bn worth of cocaine into the US since 1985, theUS Department of Justice announced yesterday.

"This is the largest drug trafficking indictment in US history," said Alberto Gonzales, US attorney-general.

Three of the leaders named by the federal grand jury in Washington are in custody in Colombia and await extradition to theUS.

The one-count indictment offers more than $75min rewards for information that leads to the capture of the remaining top members of the organisation. Jenny Johnson, Washington

Alberto Gonzales speaks to media about indictment against FARC members, March 22, 2006 The indictment targets 50 members of Colombia's main leftist rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC.

The FARC has been fighting the Colombian government for more than 40 years and has been branded a terrorist group by the United States and the European Union.

The indictment was made public in a federal court in Washington and announced at a news conference by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"This is the largest narcotics-trafficking indictment ever filed in U.S. history and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country," Gonzales said.

According to the indictment, the FARC provides more than half of the world's cocaine and is responsible for 60 percent of the drug that enters the United States.

U.S. officials allege that the group uses the proceeds from $25 billion worth of drug sales around the world to buy weapons in its fight against the Colombian government.

"We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence. For instance, the indictment alleges that farmers who did not comply with FARC rules were shot, stabbed and even dismembered alive," Gonzales said.

Gonzales says three FARC members are in custody in Colombia and that the United States will seek their extradition. He says the other 47 remain at large, probably in FARC jungle strongholds inside Colombia. E-mail This Article

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Fifty leaders of a Colombian rebel group have been indicted for allegedly exporting $25 billion worth of cocaine to the United States and other countries.

The U.S. Justice Department announcement of the indictments in Washington, D.C., labeled the suspects as "narcoterrorists," CNN reported Wednesday.

Three of those charged were already in custody in Colombia, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said, and the United States will seek their extradition to face drug trafficking charges.

The three suspects in custody -- Jorge Enrique Rodriguez Mendieta, Erminso Cuevas Cabrera and Juan Jose Martinez Vega -- were arrested more than a year ago, CNN said.

Justice Department officials said Wednesday that FARC -- the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia -- is responsible for supplying more than half of the world's illicit cocaine, and more than 60 percent of the cocaine smuggled into the United States.

U.S. State Department officials announced rewards totaling more than $75 million for information leading to the capture of dozens of FARC leaders, including 24 of the 47 remaining fugitives named in the indictment.

US Charges Colombia Rebel Leaders (BBC)

BBC, March 23, 2006

Only three of the 50 indicted are in custody in the US Fifty leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group, Farc, have been charged in the US with exporting $25bn (£14bn) of cocaine around the world.

The indictment in Washington includes Farc founder Pedro Antonio Marin - who is not one of three members of the group being held in custody in the US.

The US regards the Farc as a terrorist group, and says it uses cocaine money to buy weapons for its insurgency.

The Farc has been fighting Colombia's government for more than four decades.

Rewards

The BBC's Jeremy McDermott in Colombia says the indictment is part of a campaign by the US and Colombian governments to paint Farc (Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia) as nothing more than a drugs trafficking cartel and terrorist organisation.

But the Farc, our correspondent says, present themselves as an insurgent movement fighting against what they call the puppet and fascist regime of President Alvaro Uribe.

The indictment alleges the Farc leaders ordered the kidnapping and killing of US citizens and the killing of Colombian farmers who resisted the group.

It says the Farc supplies more than half the world's cocaine.

Drug Enforcement Agency chief Karen Tandy said: "The Farc's fingerprint is on most of the cocaine sold in America's neighbourhoods."

DOJ_NMG_0020417

The US state department has put up $75m in rewards for information leading to the capture of 24 of the named Farc leaders.

Hundreds of Colombians have previously been extradited to the US to face charges.

Our correspondent says the US announcement will only harden rebel animosity towards the US and towards Mr Uribe, whom the rebels accuse of taking orders from the White House.

State Seeks Dismissal Of San Diego's Medical Marijuana Suit (AP)

AP, March 23, 2006

SAN DIEGO, (AP) --The state has filed a motion seeking to dismiss a San Diego County lawsuit that challenges a decade-old law permitting in California the use of marijuana for medical purposes.

The attorney general's office filed the court documents Tuesday. In them, the state contends county officials simply "disliked" the law and that there was no legal reason for the court to consider the lawsuit.

In December, county supervisors sued the state of California and its director of health services in federal court, saying federal law that prohibits marijuana use trumps the state law.

California approved the use of marijuana for medical purposes with the passage of Proposition 215, which won 55 percent of votes cast in 1996.

San Diego is the only California county that has ignored a state requirement that counties issue identification cards to registered medical marijuana users and maintain a registry of people who apply for the cards.

County attorneys switched the lawsuit from federal to state court last month to avoid bringing the case to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which in recent rulings sided with medical marijuana supporters.

State Asks Court To Toss SD County Medical Marijuana Suit (NCT)

By By: GIG CONAUGHTON, Staff Writer

North County Times, March 23, 2006

NORTH COUNTY ---- State officials formally asked judges to throw out San Diego County's precedent-setting lawsuit seeking to overturn California's 10-year-old medical marijuana law, saying that the only controversy over the law was in the minds of county supervisors.

State Attorney General Bill Lockyer's office argued in motions filed Tuesday in Superior Court that San Diego County supervisors simply "disliked" California's voter-approved "Compassionate Use Act," and that there was no legal reason for the courts to entertain their lawsuit.

Nathan Barankin, spokesman for Lockyer, said that the state's position was essentially that the county's lawsuit was simply a request for the courts to rule on the legality of California's law, and involved no actual parties in dispute.

"Because courts can only hear cases that involve real factual disputes between opposing parties, and because there is no actual dispute here, such a request for an advisory opinion requires dismissal of the charges," Barankin said.

He said the courts could rule on the state's motion in May.

The county of San Diego, in a move that angered local medical marijuana patients and marijuana advocacy groups, filed a lawsuit in December in federal court seeking to overturn the Compassionate Use Act, which allows the use of medicinal marijuana.

The supervisors ---- who have collectively opposed the law since it was placed on the 1996 ballot ---- argue that it should be "pre-empted" by federal law, which says that all marijuana use is illegal and that the drug has no medicinal value.

San Diego County lawyers abruptly switched the lawsuit from federal to state court in February, as a tactical move in the hopes of avoiding the U.S. Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which has been more friendly to marijuana supporters than to opponents in recent rulings.

County officials have been waiting for the state's response ever since, but did not return calls Tuesday.

However, county Counsel John Sansone said Monday that he would not be surprised if the state asked for a "demurrer," a motion to throw out the county's lawsuit.

San Diego County officials and marijuana advocacy groups say the lawsuit is precedent-setting because it marks the first time a county has sued to overturn any of the medical marijuana laws approved by voters in 11 states.

Barankin, meanwhile, said Tuesday that the attorney general's office also filed a motion Tuesday asking the courts to throw out San Bernardino County's medical marijuana challenge.

San Bernardino supervisors, in a show of support for San Diego County, filed their own lawsuit shortly after San Diego County's action.

DOJ_NMG_0020418

San Diego County's board has largely ignored California's medical marijuana law since it was passed in 1996, and was actually chastised by its own grand jury in 2005 for doing "nothing" to help implement the law.

However, late last year, the state ordered counties to create an identification card and registration program to help medical marijuana patients ---- and law enforcement officials ---- by clearly identifying who could use the drug legally under state law.

But, by a 3-2 vote, with Supervisors Greg Cox and Ron Roberts opposed, the board voted in December to defy the state's orders.

Shortly after that, the board voted 4-0, with Roberts absent, to actually sue to try to overturn the Compassionate Use Act itself, and named the state Department of Health Services and department Director Sandra Shewry as defendants.

But the state's motion Tuesday argued that the county artificially created an issue for the courts to review the Compassionate Use Act.

"San Diego's political leadership cannot create a ripe controversy by threatening to disobey the law," the motion stated.

IMMIGRATION:

Clinton Cites Bible To Attack Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton invoked the Bible yesterday to criticize a stringent border security measure that, among other things, would make it a federal crime to offer aid to illegal immigrants.

"It is hard to believe that a Republican leadership that is constantly talking about values and about faith would put forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation," she said of the measure, which was passed by the House of Representatives in December and mirrored a companion Senate bill introduced last week by Senator Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican and the majority leader.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she said. "We need to sound the alarm about what is being done in the Congress."

Mrs. Clinton, who is running for re-election this year and is leading in polls for the Democratic presidential nomination, spoke at a news conference in Manhattan with more than 30 immigrant leaders after meeting with them privately.

The meeting took place in an atmosphere of mounting urgency, as the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops called on its flock to oppose the measure, and tens of thousands of immigrants around the country stepped up a series of protest rallies in anticipation of a Senate vote on competing immigration bills next week.

Mr. Frist's bill, like the House measure, would make it a crime to be in the United States without proper papers and would add guards and fencing along the Mexican border, and speed deportation.

Some versions, including one proposed by Senator Arlen Spector of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, would expand the definition of alien smuggling to include help to illegal immigrants already here.

Mr. Frist has set a Monday deadline for the Senate Judiciary Committee to complete its own, broader version of immigration legislation, which could include "a path to earned citizenship" for illegal residents who qualify, and a guest worker program for foreigners, as well as new enforcement provisions. But even if a committee bill emerges in time, unless a majority of the committee's Republicans vote for it, he has vowed that he will not let it reach the Senate floor. Instead, Mr. Frist, who is also considered a 2008 presidential contender, said he would seek a vote on his bill, without debate.

Mrs. Clinton had been criticized by some immigrant activists for saying little about the issue until March 8, and then speaking at an Irish-only rally, rather than at a forum more representative of immigrants. But yesterday all seemed forgiven.

Three elected officials, all Democrats — Representatives José E. Serrano and Nydia Velásquez, and City Council member John C. Liu — shared the lectern to denounce the criminal penalties in the Congressional proposals.

Mrs. Clinton said she and New York's other senator, Charles E. Schumer, were trying to build momentum toward a bipartisan bill that would include a legalization provision that many Republicans would support in defiance of Mr. Frist. But any form of legalization is anathema to supporters of the House measure, co-sponsored by two Republican representatives, Peter King of Long Island, and F. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin.

Mrs. Clinton said, "We want the outcome to be that they're on the wrong side of politics as well as on the wrong side of history and American values."

Mr. King has accused church leaders of "committing the sin of hypocrisy" in their campaign to sway Congress and Catholic voters, and of giving illegal immigrants an incentive to cross the border.

DOJ_NMG_0020419

Asked about the political price that could be paid by politicians who defy the groundswell of anger in border areas where illegal immigration has meant mounting costs for health care, education and law enforcement, Mrs. Clinton shot back that not only border areas were affected, but also many communities in New York, especially on Long Island and in Westchester County.

"I have a lot of sympathy," she said, emphasizing her support for an overhaul that includes federal assistance to local communities, as well as better enforcement. "That's why we need comprehensive immigration reform. Taking a harsh position is not going to solve the problem."

GOP WOULD HAVE BOOTED JESUS: HILL (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman

The New York Post, March 23, 2006

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton ratcheted up her talk about religion yesterday - saying a GOP-sponsored bill making it a felony to be in the United States illegally would have "criminalized" Jesus.

Clinton, who's considered the Democratic front-runner for the 2008 White House race, made the comments at a hastily scheduled news conference about the House-passed bill aimed at illegal immigrants.

Clinton blasted Republican leadership, which "is constantly talking about values and about faith [but put] forth such a mean-spirited piece of legislation."

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scriptures," she added.

"Because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

The House bill passed last December.

Clinton said, "Many of us think it's a political bill" - but didn't back any of the competing Senate versions.

"We want the outcome to be that [backers of the House bill are] on the wrong side of the politics, as well as the wrong side of history and American values," she said.

She added that she would support a bill that includes stronger border controls.

She also called for employers who exploit illegal immigrants to face penalties.

In addition, she wants to set up a system to allow illegal immigrants currently living in this country to earn their citizenship.

Reid Threatens Filibuster As Immigration Showdown Looms (AP)

By Ellito Spagat

The AP, March 22, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- As the Senate prepares to tackle the most sweeping immigration reforms in years, a top Democrat vowed Wednesday to do everything in his power, including filibuster, to thwart Majority Leader Bill Frist's proposed overhaul.

Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said he would "use every procedural means at my disposal" to prevent Frist from bypassing the Judiciary Committee. Frist, R-Tenn., has made clear the Senate will take up his proposal next week if the 18-member committee fails to complete a broader bill.

"If Leader Frist brings a bill to the floor that does not have the approval of the Judiciary Committee, it will not get out of the Senate," Reid told reporters at the San Ysidro border crossing, a few steps from Tijuana, Mexico.

Bob Stevenson, a spokesman for Frist, did not immediately respond to a call Wednesday evening.

Reid said the overhaul must include heightened border enforcement, a "guest worker" program and a "path to citizenship" for the estimated 11 million people in the United States illegally. He called legislation by Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and John McCain, R-Ariz., a "good place to start."

President Bush, in a State of the Union address two years ago, urged Congress to create a worker program under which participants could gain legal status for a specific time and then be required to return home. It would not provide an automatic path to citizenship.

Frist, who has presidential ambitions for 2008, unveiled a bill last week that sidesteps the question of temporary work permits. It would tighten borders, punish employers who hire illegal immigrants and provide more visas.

The House passed a bill in December that makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to be in the United States, imposes new penalties on employers who hire them and erects fencing along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border. It has no temporary worker program.

Amid the looming showdown, Reid met Wednesday with hotel workers at the Mandalay Bay Resort & Casino in Las Vegas in an effort to highlight contributions that immigrants make to the economy. He flew to San Diego for a helicopter tour and briefing by Border Patrol officials.

DOJ_NMG_0020420

He planned to visit the longest cross-border tunnel discovered along the U.S.-Mexico border -- a 2,400-foot secret passage that linked warehouses in San Diego and Tijuana. Authorities said they discovered more than two tons of marijuana inside the tunnel in January.

Reid also was scheduled to meet with California business, labor, religious and local government leaders to discuss immigration.

Who Will Work The Farms? (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

KINSTON, N.C. — In the plainspoken manner common to her fellow farmers, Faylene Whitaker has a message for members of Congress struggling to overhaul the nation's immigration law.

"We would rather use legal workers," said Ms. Whitaker, who grows tobacco, tomatoes and other crops on the 500-acre farm she and her husband own in the Piedmont region of North Carolina. But "if we don't get a reasonable guest worker program we are going to hire illegals."

Ms. Whitaker knows what she is talking about. Indeed, she is one of the few farmers in the United States to employ legal immigrant guest workers. Others are not exactly lining up to join the program.

The experience of farmers like Ms. Whitaker underscores why most experts say that simply tightening the border with Mexico will not work.

To curb illegal immigration, they say, the government needs both carrots and sticks: legal work channels for future immigrants and the current population of workers unlawfully in the country along with a much more effective bar against hiring illegal labor.

"The punch line is, guest workers are going to cost you more money," said Phil Martin, professor of agricultural and resource economics at the University of California, Davis. For a guest worker program to work, he added, "the prerequisite is you have to have illegal immigration under control."

When immigration rules were last overhauled in 1986 — legalizing more than three million unlawful immigrants and supposedly banning the employment of illegal workers in the future — Congress allowed for a vast seasonal guest worker plan. It was intended to ensure that farmers could continue to get the cheaper foreign labor they wanted, but in a legally acceptable way.

It has not worked out. Despite expectations that growers would flock to the guest worker program, named H-2A, it never took off: fewer than 25,000 farm workers came to the United States on temporary guest worker visas in 2004, the last year with figures available.

It is not as if growers do not need the foreign labor: according to farmers' own estimates, about 70 percent of the 1.2 million hired workers tilling fields and picking crops are illegal immigrants.

What went wrong? Despite the ostensible sanctions against businesses that hire illegal workers, few employers were ever punished. So rather than go through the more complex process of importing temporary workers legally, most chose the cheaper and generally risk-free route of hiring illegal migrants who presented themselves with forged papers.

Congress is once again debating how to cut off illegal immigration but this time it has to deal with as many as 11 million unlawful immigrants in the United States.

Some lawmakers are talking about erecting a high wall along the entire 2,000-mile border separating the United States from Mexico. Others are pushing to declare all immigrants here illegally felons who would never be allowed to take up legal residence in the United States.

But as long as the government looks the other way while employers are allowed to fill their demands for cheap labor from a deep pool of foreigners desperate to find work, hundreds of thousands more are expected to manage one way or another to cross the border illegally every year in search of jobs.

"If there is a need for workers, they will find a way in, if you don't have a method for satisfying the legitimate needs of American employers," said Senator Arlen Specter, Republican from Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which has been trying to hammer out a new immigration bill to present to the full Senate as early as next Monday.

But this time, Mr. Specter added, any new law must contain tougher sanctions against an employer who "knowingly hires someone that is not here legally."

Like most employers of cheap labor, North Carolina's growers say they need immigrant workers to stay afloat. "We need a guest worker program because somebody's got to work," said Kendall Hill, who grows tobacco, sweet potatoes and other crops on 4,000 acres here in Kinston.

He gazes across the flat dirt of his farm toward the sheds that will house up to 120 immigrant H-2A workers at the peak of the sweet potato harvest in September. "If not for Mexican workers," he adds, "this country would be in chaos."

DOJ_NMG_0020421

As for illegal immigrants, many say that they would welcome a plan that allowed them to work legally in the United States and return to their families in Mexico every year.

Arturo Martínez Mendoza, an illegal immigrant harvesting mustard for $1.25 a box on a farm near Faison, said he had even tried to get into the program. "It was full," he said, "so I came in as a wetback."

José Aharón Rivera Medrano, an H-2A worker from Mexico's northern state of Durango, has worked on Mr. Hill's farm 10 months each year for the last 11 years. He is happy about the higher wages of $500 to $600 a week he receives under the guest worker program than if he were working illegally, but the most important thing, he said, "is that you don't risk your life crossing the border."

According to Leticia Zavala, southern organizing director for the union known as the Farm Labor Organizing Committee, there is a waiting list of 17,000 Mexican workers who have come to North Carolina in the past and would like to return.

But the guest worker program has failed to bridge the gap between the farmers and the workers. Farmers complain that the program is simply too expensive. It sets a floor for pay — a regional average of the wages in several farm occupations — that will rise this year to $8.51 an hour from $8.24 in 2005. Farmers must also house the workers and pay workers' compensation.

Moreover, after a lawsuit spearheaded by the union against North Carolina growers, a state court ordered farmers to pay all recruitment costs, including the H-2A visa, recruiters' fees and round-trip transportation from home — adding up to some $900 a worker.

"I've been 10 years on the program but I'm reaching the point of diminishing returns," said Sam Crews, who employs six guest workers on his North Carolina tobacco farm near the border with Virginia.

The guest worker plan has some advantages for growers: legal workers are more dependable than illegal ones, they say. And it relieves them of any lingering fears that their harvest might be in jeopardy if immigration authorities conduct raids that disrupt the supply of illegal workers.

Yet growers have so many other complaints about the program that many are simply dropping out. To be entitled to use guest workers, they must certify to the Labor Department that they cannot find American workers for the job, a process that they say is overly onerous.

And once non-H-2A immigrant workers are brought out of the shadows, farmers who employ legal guest workers often find themselves being sued over working conditions by immigrants' rights groups and other foes of the program.

Bruce Goldstein, executive director of the Farm Workers Justice Fund in Washington, which has brought lawsuits against farmers, says there are good reasons for such lawsuits.

"Farmers under the H-2A program are being sued when they violate the law," Mr. Goldstein said. "They frequently violate the law. And employers have tremendous bargaining power over workers who are too fearful to challenge unfair or illegal conduct."

For many farmers, then, illegal immigrants simply provide a cheaper alternative that involves far less bother than the guest worker program. North Carolina farmers can harvest their crops paying $6 to $6.50 an hour — no workers comp, no recruitment fees — to "green card" workers or "otherwise documented" workers. Those are euphemisms for immigrants unlawfully in the United States, who typically show up with a fake green card to get a job.

"Workers provide us with ID and Social Security cards to keep me in compliance and keep them in compliance, but I have no clue of their provenance," said one Wilson County tobacco, cotton and sweet potato farmer who spoke only on condition of anonymity to avoid exposing his work force to scrutiny from the authorities.

Farmers in North Carolina still employ more legal guest workers than in any other state, but their numbers are dwindling. At their peak in 2000, over 1,000 farmers in the growers' association employed 10,000 guest workers. This year, about 500 farmers are left, and they will import only about 5,000 workers.

Some of those missing farmers were driven out by increased competition in the global tobacco market. Others have simply switched to illegal immigrant workers. And if things do not change, many farmers say, the system may well disappear altogether.

"When the H-2A program prices itself out, I'm not growing anything else," said Lee Whicker, who employs a dozen guest workers on his tobacco farm near Fayetteville. "I'm done with it."

Investigation Finds Violations Of U.S. Immigration Laws (MURRAYLT)

By KRISTIN TAYLOR, Staff Writer

Murray (KY) Ledger & Times, March 23, 2006

An investigation last month into an indentured servitude complaint at Murray's Asian Buffet proved the allegation false, but five people were taken into custody for immigration violations.

DOJ_NMG_0020422

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokeswoman Gail Montenegro said interviews conducted Feb. 8 at the Murray restaurant revealed no indication of human trafficking of indentured servitude. The federal investigators were responding to a complaint that workers were being held against their will.

A manager at Asian Buffet was not available for comment before press time today.

Following the investigation, five people were taken into custody for immigration violations. Montenegro said that included one Mexican juvenile female, three Mexican adult males and one Chinese female.

Montenegro didn't have the individuals' names because the ICE agent who worked on the case was traveling. Even so, she said the agency doesn't usually release names until people have been deported or if their identity is in the public's interest for safety reasons.

&#8220I don't know what happened to them," she said in a telephone interview from her Chicago office. &#8220They were probably served with some paperwork and had or have a hearing before a judge."

TAX:

IRS Sues Local Tax Preparers (CO)

By Mike Drummond

The Charlotte Observer, March 23, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department today filed lawsuits to stop two area tax preparers from preparing returns.

The government said Jerry Adams and Demetria Adams prepared more than 1,600 tax returns in 2004 and 2005 at First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby.

In the suits filed in federal court in Charlotte, the government alleges the two understated wages and overstated credits for the past two years. The "excessive refunds" cost the U.S. Treasury more than $3.8 million, the lawsuits claim.

The government wants the court to order the pair to turn over names, addresses and Social Security numbers of customers.

Today's action comes within weeks of the April 17 tax filing deadline, and is part of the government's crackdown on "corrupt tax preparers." Since 2001, the Justice Department has sought and obtained injunctions against more than 160 tax return preparers and promoters.

KPMG Revises Settlement On Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The accounting firm KPMG said yesterday that it had reached a revised settlement with tax shelter investors, but warned that the reduced agreement could still fall apart.

The previous $195 million deal, brokered last September through Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the prominent class-action law firm, collapsed in recent months when nearly one in four eligible investors chose not to take part, saying that it did not offer them enough compensation.

Under the complex terms of the revised settlement, some 60 investors who chose not to join can come back in. But investors who are currently in the deal can now elect not to participate.

KPMG did not place any numbers on the revised proposal. But given the number of opt-outs in the original deal, the final amount available is unlikely to exceed $155 million, and may drop to $125 million or lower, according to lawyers who read its proposed terms.

"There's going to be drastic reduction in the amount of money that is ultimately paid out," said Michael J. Avenatti, a lawyer in Santa Monica, Calif., who represents wealthy investors who opposed the original deal. Mr. Avenatti, who also represents an informal group of lawyers who oppose the deal, declined to say whether he would advise clients to participate in the new deal.

Lawyers for KPMG filed papers yesterday in the United States District Court in Newark, asking a federal judge to set a hearing in late May to approve the revised deal.

The reduced settlement is a setback for Milberg Weiss. The law firm had stood to earn $30 million from the original settlement, but will now reduce its fee by 25 percent of the value of the claims by opt-outs.

KPMG is struggling to put its tax shelter woes behind it as aggrieved investors in the shelters are now seeking in separate compensation greater than what the settlement offers. In August, the firm reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement with federal prosecutors over certain questionable shelters.

DOJ_NMG_0020423

The civil class-action settlement is intended to return to investors the fees that they paid both to KPMG and to the law firm of Sidley Austin Brown & Wood for four shelters known as Flip, Opis, Blips and SOS. The law firm, which provided legal opinions blessing the shelters as legitimate — when they were not, in the eyes of the Internal Revenue Service — will still pay about 20 percent of the final settlement's costs.

Under the new deal's complicated formula, the original $195 million will be reduced by 65 percent of the total claims from investors who choose not to participate. KPMG will determine the size of those claims.

A KPMG spokesman said yesterday that "this amended stipulation allows us to continue pursuing a fair and reasonable settlement of this matter."

But Edmundo O. Ramirez, a lawyer in McAllen, Tex., said yesterday that "the very complicated formula is going to put a lot of lawyers off." Mr. Ramirez has negotiated sizable private settlements in recent years with KPMG on behalf of former investors in tax shelters.

The 60 or so opt-outs in the original settlement typically have claims far higher than the average $750,000 available to each investor under the terms of the old settlement. Mr. Avenatti said that some former clients had paid tens of millions of dollars to KPMG and Sidley Austin Brown & Wood for shelters that did not pass muster with the I.R.S. and that the new deal was not going to significantly change the amount of money they could recuperate.

Outside Audit KPMG Revises Terms Of Payout In Big Tax-Shelter Settlement (WSJ)

By David Reilly

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

Accounting giant KPMG LLP and law firm Sidley Austin LLP took a fresh stab at settling a class-action lawsuit related to the sale of questionable tax shelters.

The firms last month shelved a previous version of the settlement, which called for a $195 million payout to those who had bought the tax shelters, because too many people had opted out of the agreement.

Under the new version of the settlement, filed yesterday in federal court in New Jersey, KPMG and Sidley Austin would pay no more than, but most likely far less than, the $195 million originally envisaged, as well as up to $30 million in legal fees.

KPMG, which sold the questionable tax shelters, will bear the brunt of this cost, while Chicago-based Sidley Austin, which gave legal advice on the shelters, will pay about 20%.

The revised settlement terms would reduce the amount the firms will pay based on the number of plaintiffs who opt out. The amounts to be received by individuals won't necessarily decline because of this reduction. They would depend on the specific claims of each individual investor.

In a statement, a KPMG spokesman said, "The amendment of the original settlement allows us to continue pursuing a fair and reasonable settlement of this matter."

Melvin Weiss, senior and founding partner at Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is lead counsel for the class-action plaintiffs, said that individuals who think they can get a better deal on their own can "go try. I think quite frankly that this is a very fair settlement from a lot of angles."

A spokeswoman for Sidley Austin declined to comment on the case.

If the new agreement successfully revives the proposed settlement, it could be another important step by a major accounting firm to put behind it troubles stemming from the go-go days of the late 1990s. The Big Four firms -- PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP, Deloitte & Touche LLP, KPMG and Ernst & Young LLP -- have spent millions to make amends for misdeeds from this period.

In KPMG's case, the price of putting the past behind it has been particularly high. The revised tax-shelter settlement follows a deferred-prosecution agreement the firm entered into last year with the Justice Department that called for KPMG to pay $465 million. Plus, the firm still faces damage claims from tax-shelter clients who opted out of the settlement and plan to pursue their cases individually.

Still, the potential settlement would bring closure to most of the tax-shelter issues KPMG faces and allow the firm to start moving beyond that chapter in its history.

The ultimate amount to be paid by KPMG and Sidley Austin under the new settlement agreement will be based on a formula that fluctuates depending on the number of tax-shelter buyers who agree to take part. Of the 284 who originally joined the class-action suit, 61 had opted out of the previous settlement, claiming it didn't pay enough.

The new settlement addresses some technical objections raised by some of those who opted out, but doesn't increase the amount on offer. That means some investors are likely to continue opting out.

"The proposed amount to be paid is entirely insufficient," said Michael Avenatti, a lawyer at Greene Broillet & Wheeler LLP who represents two investors who earlier opted out of the proposed settlement and who won't rejoin the agreement. Mr. Avenatti said his clients disagreed with the settlement because KPMG could expect to pay much more if it tried cases individually.

The attorney estimated that, under the proposed new payment formula, KPMG and Sidley Austin could shell out between $130 million to $150 million. He estimates the legal fees alone for trying the cases individually would amount to $500 million, and any punitive damages would cost the accounting and law firm more.

KPMG declined to comment on the projected payout.

In addition to possibly lowering the amount KPMG and Sidley Austin will pay, attorneys for the class-action plaintiffs could also receive less than the $30 million fee set aside under the original agreement.

Sale Of Data By Tax Preparers Draws Protests (WP)

By Albert B. Crenshaw

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Consumer groups and privacy advocates are attacking proposed Internal Revenue Service rules that would spell out how tax-return preparers may legally sell financial information and other data from their clients' returns.

It has long been a principle of tax administration that no unauthorized person can get such information and that this assurance encourages taxpayers to file honest and complete returns. That notion is still a "fundamental underpinning" of IRS practice, Commissioner Mark W. Everson said yesterday in an interview.

The proposal, issued in December, was billed by the IRS as improving privacy protections for taxpayers, detailing the steps for getting permission to use the information. But it has focused attention on a little-known fact: Although law forbids the unauthorized disclosure of taxpayer information, return-preparers have long been allowed to disclose it, even sell it, if they obtain their clients' permission. Once the information goes out the door, taxpayers have little control over what happens to it.

The problem, said Evan Hendricks, publisher of the Privacy Times newsletter and other publications on privacy, is that "information about you is valuable in general, and the more detailed . . . it is, the more valuable it is."

"The real danger here is that there's going to be lot of incentive" for preparers to obtain the permission surreptitiously, such as by spreading a lot of papers in front of clients and asking them to sign them all, Hendricks said.

Jean Ann Fox of the Consumer Federation of America said that under the new rules, taxpayers could be duped into releasing their information and run the "risk of having that information in a database somewhere." That is "dangerous," she said, and "essentially turns tax-return information into a commodity for the highest bidder."

The IRS said in proposing the new rules that it was updating regulations dating from the 1970s that had not contemplated electronic transmission and other business practices, including the "offshoring" of some tax-preparation work by some firms.

"Our concern was [preparers] were interpreting the regulations in a way to say [clients] don't need to know that their returns are being prepared in India; it's all by the same firm," Everson said. "There's no doubt in my mind taxpayers are entitled to know if their return is being prepared overseas."

The rules also specify what a preparer must do to get permission from a taxpayer to disclose return information, up to and including the entire return. Specific language is required when a preparer requests permission and also in the form given to the taxpayer to sign.

There is also language for obtaining the taxpayer's permission to use the information within the preparer's company or group of related companies. And there is a procedure for obtaining a taxpayer's "signature" electronically.

The IRS proposal says that a preparer, for example, might ask permission to disclose that a client contributed to an IRA or that he would be getting a refund. Such information could be sold to a bank.

Several large tax-preparation companies have told the IRS that they oppose the new rules because they would make it too difficult for them to obtain permission to sell clients' information.

As the government's priorities have shifted to national security and revenue collection, there is more debate over how strict privacy rules should be.

The IRS recently awarded the first contracts to private debt collectors, a strategy authorized by Congress to increase collection of unpaid taxes. The debt collectors are barred from having tax information beyond what is owed, but critics say they worry about other information leaking out and possible abuse by collectors.

Everson said the private collectors "extend the reach" of the IRS and are subject to the same privacy rules as agency employees.

He said calls for increased access to IRS data in areas such as immigration enforcement or federal procurement should be debated carefully. While there might be public-policy benefits in one area, there might also be "a damaging impact" on tax collections, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0020425

Last week, Everson himself "teed up" the issue of the different ways corporations report income to the IRS and financial regulators.

"We have two systems that are in conflict with each other -- book accounting and tax return preparation. Book accounting seeks to maximize earnings to drive up share value; tax return preparation seeks to drive down earnings, reduce taxes and maximize cash flow," he said.

"Clearly, tax compliance would be helped by great transparency," such as disclosure of corporate returns or parts of them, "but there are very real public-policy interests [in] continuing privacy. It comes down to weighting various factors," Everson said.

Beltway Windfall (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The next time some Washington potentate moans about the budget deficit, tell him not to blame the taxpayers. They're already doing their part to reduce it, as the latest Treasury figures on booming federal tax revenue show.

In the first five months of Fiscal 2006, through February, overall revenue continued to surge, growing at an overall rate of 10.3%, or an $81 billion increase from the year ago period, to $871 billion. That builds on the astonishing 15%, or $274 billion, revenue increase for all of 2005, which various fiscal wisemen assured us would fall off dramatically. Apparently not.

This year's double-digit increase is roughly triple the rate of inflation, reflecting strong gains in business profits and individual wages and bonuses -- both signs of a vibrant underlying economy. Corporate income taxes are up 30% so far this year, while individual income tax payments have climbed by 10.3% through February.

The bad news continues to be federal spending, with overall government outlays up 7.6%, or $76 billion, to $1.09 trillion. Defense spending is up 7.5%, but Medicare is growing at a 10.4% pace, which promises only to increase as the prescription drug benefit kicks in. As ever, the elephant in the budget is entitlement spending on seniors.

Economist Michael Darda points out that overall spending has risen at a 6.6% annual pace since 2001, or more than double the 3.1% average rate of increase between 1993 and 2000. If spending in this decade had merely stayed at the 1990s's pace, the budget would already be in surplus by $143 billion, according to Mr. Darda's calculations. Some of this increase has been in defense, which was necessary after the rapid declines in security spending during the Clinton years. But the failure of GOP fiscal governance has been in spending on both guns and butter.

As for taxes, the revenue data are further proof of the success of the Bush tax cuts of 2003. The fastest way to stop this revenue windfall, and blow an even larger hole in the deficit, would be to fail to extend the 15% tax rate on capital gains and dividends through 2010, thus assuring a huge tax increase after 2008. The fear of such a tax hike is already weighing on investors and stock-market valuations. So what are GOP House-Senate tax conferees waiting for?

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Are Late Innings The Time For A Relief Pitcher? (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 22 — President Bush's suggestion on Tuesday that he may add a new senior figure to his White House team raised questions about the future of two of his closest and most powerful aides, Andrew H. Card Jr. and Karl Rove, as they struggle to put Mr. Bush's White House back on course.

Mr. Rove, his senior strategist, and Mr. Card, his chief of staff, have increasingly been forced to fend off rebellious Congressional Republicans, complaints about the administration's competence and calls from within their party for an infusion of fresh thinking into the White House.

Mr. Rove told associates in recent days that he was confident he could resist calls to bring in new advisers. Still, Mr. Bush's decision not to squelch speculation about such a move — "Well, I'm not going to announce it right now," he said Tuesday at his news conference, with Mr. Rove watching — did nothing to restore diminished Republican confidence in a White House team that once promoted a reputation for efficiency, order and impeccable political instincts.

Two Republicans close to the White House who insisted on anonymity to discuss advice they give to Mr. Bush's inner circle said the names being suggested to the president included Michael O. Leavitt, secretary of health and human services; Marc Racicot, former chairman of the Republican National Committee; Donald L. Evans, a former commerce secretary; and Ed Gillespie, a former chairman of the Republican Party who shepherded Mr. Bush's two Supreme Court nominations through the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0020426

The list also includes two former members of Congress with ties to Mr. Bush, Thomas G. Loeffler of Texas and Bill Paxon of New York.

It is not clear what role a new appointee would take on, or whether Mr. Bush, known for his loyalty, would be able to make a change without diminishing the standing of Mr. Card and Mr. Rove. Nor is it certain that Mr. Bush will even make a change.

Although Mr. Card is the focus of much of the criticism about the White House's performance, much of the talk here has focused on Mr. Rove, who has long been seen as the pre-eminent strategist of his generation and who for more than a year has been deputy chief of staff for policy.

"He's losing strategic power," James A. Thurber, director of the Center for Congressional and Presidential Studies at the School of Public Affairs at American University, said of Mr. Rove. "It's just decaying, and the decay rate is very fast at this point. Lame-duck presidencies that have people who have been there for many years have many problems."

Republicans outside the White House said Wednesday that they had pushed Mr. Bush not to replace Mr. Rove, but rather to bring in someone at the same level or above, perhaps as minister without portfolio. One Republican said Mr. Bush should view it as replacing a top-notch pitcher struggling in the later innings of a baseball game, rather than as a vote of no-confidence in a friend.

Mr. Card said Mr. Rove, technically at least beneath him in rank, though perhaps not in influence, was an essential staff member.

"He is smart, efficient, diligent, competent and relevant," Mr. Card said.

He defended Mr. Rove and, in an interview last week, took the blame for any problems.

"I take responsibility for everything that has not happened well," Mr. Card said. "I am the staffer responsible for the staff. When people are frustrated, they should be frustrated at me. It's my job."

In a brief interview, Mr. Rove dismissed the notion that he was fatigued or had lost his touch.

"We're all energized," Mr. Rove said. "Whether we're on our game or not — I'm an idiot one day and a genius the next — that's the way it is. You can't pay attention to that."

The developments reflect a sharp change in Mr. Rove's standing in particular, 16 months after he guided Mr. Bush to re-election and was rewarded with more authority.

Mr. Bush's approval ratings are at record lows. Republicans in Congress are refusing to take direction from this White House on a host of issues, while candidates for office have in a few cases avoided appearances with the president.

Mr. Rove's hopes of achieving a permanent Republican majority in Congress, long a defining goal, have given way to holding working House and Senate majorities.

With some notable exceptions, in particular, the confirmation of two conservative Supreme Court nominees, the White House has suffered a series of defeats in Congress.

"An ingredient that's missing right now in the White House is that sense of urgency, that passion, that intensity," said Senator John Thune, Republican of South Dakota. "When you've had horses there that you've been riding for a long time, you kind of need to change them once in a while."

Rich Bond, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, said that without the focus of a campaign, the White House had lost its edge.

"I can't imagine the Dubai ports deal occurring in the mindset of the re-election," Mr. Bond said. "I can't imagine the Cheney hunting incident being handled in the same way in the mindset of the re-election."

By most accounts inside and outside the administration, Mr. Rove is relentlessly cheerful, presenting himself as an optimistic face in a gloomy White House. One person who met Mr. Rove said he attributed Mr. Bush's problems more to external events, in particular Hurricane Katrina and Iraq, than to anything the White House did wrong.

Mr. Rove has assured worried Republicans that the party will endure just minor losses in the midterm elections. Associates said Mr. Rove appeared increasingly certain that he would not be indicted for his role in the leaking of a C.I.A. operative's name.

"I am just amazed at his ability to multitask and stay on top of his game," Mr. Card said. "I certainly haven't seen any distraction over the past four or five months."

Mr. Rove is operating as impishly as ever. At a party at the British Embassy when Mr. Bush and Mr. Card were on their way to India, Mr. Rove was asked by a group of guests how things were going.

"Everybody's away, so I'm running the country," Mr. Rove replied, playing off his caricature as an all-powerful behind-the-scenes puppet master.

It is a role that White House officials argue has always been exaggerated. Many Republicans now say that just as Mr. Rove should not be excessively credited with the successes of the first term, he should not be overly blamed for its failures in the second.

Security Of Medicare Info Questioned (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, March 23, 2006

Medical and financial information gathered on millions of Americans by Medicare, Medicaid and other government programs is vulnerable to thieves or pranksters because of inadequate computer security, federal investigators say.

"Significant weaknesses in information security controls" increase the risk from those who would "inadvertently or deliberately disclose, modify or destroy" sensitive data, the U.S. Government Accountability Office says.

The soon-to-be-released GAO review focuses on the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS), whose agencies use computer systems to pay more than a billion Medicare claims worth more than $290 billion each year, track medical research at the National Institutes of Health and manage Food and Drug Administration programs.

"Instead of firewalls to safeguard sensitive data, we have Swiss cheese," says Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which requested the report. Grassley's office says Medicare keeps a variety of information on beneficiaries, including Social Security numbers, addresses, birth dates and medical conditions.

In a written response in the report, HHS officials said investigators do "not provide an accurate or complete appraisal" of its security programs and fail to note a 2005 effort that resulted in a reduction of 57% in reportable deficiencies.

"The frequent use of the word 'significant' to describe control weaknesses … evokes a negative connotation that is not reflective of the progress or current state of HHS' information security program," the department said.

The review comes as the federal government is pushing computer technology as key to improving medical quality and slowing costs. In fiscal 2005, HHS will spend nearly $5 billion on information technology, the report says, much of it to help process Medicare payments to doctors and hospitals.

Investigators for the GAO reviewed management and audit reports from 2004 and 2005 that outline security practices at 13 HHS divisions and found:

·Anti-virus software not installed or up to date.

·Lack of adequate control over computer passwords.

·Employees and contractors serving without background checks.

·Inadequate physical controls to prevent spying or theft, such as non-working surveillance cameras and unrestricted access to a data center.

"Fundamentally, it's an organization that is behind in making security part of its regular operations," says Alan Paller, who has seen the report but was not involved in writing it. Paller is research director at security firm the SANS Institute in Bethesda, Md. "It's very dangerous for health care data."

1,889 Days And No Vetoes: Bush Gaining On Jefferson (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush today becomes the longest-sitting president since Thomas Jefferson not to exercise his veto, surpassing James Monroe.

Monroe was in office 1,888 days before he vetoed his first bill on May 4, 1822, a measure to impose a toll on the first federal highway. Jefferson never exercised his veto during two terms in 1801-09.

Today is Bush's 1,889th day in office, and no veto is in sight. As of Wednesday, Congress had sent him 1,091 bills. He signed them all.

Bush came close to a veto last month when Congress threatened to block a deal to turn over operations at ports in six states to a company owned by the Arab emirate of Dubai. He threatened a veto, but he avoided a showdown when the Dubai company decided to sell that part of its business to American interests.

"After that, we're not likely to hear a veto threat from him that much again," says G. Calvin Mackenzie, government professor at Maine's Colby College.

Some analysts say Bush's failure to use his veto shows an unwillingness to confront fellow Republicans who control Congress. "He doesn't want to fight battles unnecessarily and create a distance between himself and his party," says Mark Rozell, a George Mason University political scientist who has studied presidential vetoes.

Others say Bush's avoidance of the veto is a sign of strength. "Bush and his party are so close on most issues that there's no need to veto," Mackenzie says.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., scoffs at that: "This is a rubber-stamp Congress. Why would he veto anything?"

DOJ_NMG_0020428

Still others say it is a matter of Bush's management style. “He's a CEO kind of guy. He gives his orders, delegates the negotiating to others and is willing to live with the outcome,” says Robert McClure, a political scientist at Syracuse University's Maxwell School.

Bush has used veto threats to shape bills more to his liking. For example, the House wanted $370 billion for last year's highway bill; the Senate, $318 billion. Bush drew the line at $256 billion, then compromised at $286.4 billion, more than he wanted but far below the House and Senate levels.

Bush said Tuesday that the veto threat has helped him reduce the rate of domestic spending: “One reason why I haven't vetoed any appropriation bills is because they met the benchmarks we've set.”

Congress Friendly, So Who Needs Veto? (USAT)

By Richard Benedetto

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush has not vetoed a single bill while he has been in office. But then, why would he? For most of his presidency, Congress has been dominated by fellow Republicans.

“Presidents generally do not want to draw a line between themselves and their party,” says G. Calvin Mackenzie, professor of government at Colby College.

That didn't stop many of Bush's predecessors, though, especially Democrats, who had hundreds of veto fights with Democratic-led congresses.

Jimmy Carter vetoed bills from a Democratic Congress 31 times, Lyndon Johnson 30 times, John Kennedy 21 times. Harry Truman, who had a Democratic Congress for six of his nearly eight years in office, vetoed 250 bills. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who had a Democratic Congress for all of his more than 12 years in office, issued a record 635 vetoes, and only nine of them were overriden.

Reasons varied. Carter quarreled with fellow Democrats over issues such as military spending and an oil- import fee. FDR frequently fought over the proper allocation of power between Congress and the president. “There was a flurry of legislative activity in the Roosevelt years, and there were many factions in the Democratic Party which seldom spoke with one voice. So there was a lot of disagreement,” says Mark Rozell, a George Mason University political scientist.

Other than Bush, the only postwar Republican president to have a Republican-controlled Congress was Dwight Eisenhower, and then only for two years, in 1953-54. He vetoed 29 bills in that time.

Bill Clinton was more similar to Bush in how he handled a Congress of his own party. Clinton had a Democratic Congress his first two years in office, and he never vetoed a bill in that time. After Republicans took control in 1995, however, he issued 37 vetoes.

Bush and the Republican Congress saw eye to eye on a string of major legislation, including five tax cuts, a bankruptcy overhaul bill, an energy bill, a Medicare prescription-drug plan, renewal of the USA Patriot Act and a bipartisan resolution to go to war in Iraq.

Bush's defeats have often come over items Congress never passed. Examples include Bush's proposal to overhaul Social Security and to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to oil and gas drilling.

On spending bills where Bush and congressional Republicans disagreed, the differences were usually worked out, or narrowed enough that Bush chose not to use his veto. “Congress has lived within the spending limits that the president has called for,” White House press secretary Scott McClellan says.

For now, analysts say, there doesn't appear to be anything looming that would provoke Bush to change his no-veto habit — except the possibility that Democrats could grab control of the House or the Senate in this fall's elections.

If that happens, says Fred McClure, legislative director for Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, “he will have to do a lot of heavy lifting. He may have to use the veto threat a lot more, and he may have to exercise his veto for the first time.”

Line-item Veto Can Cut Pork (USAT)

By Paul Ryan

USA Today, March 23, 2006

U.S. taxpayers deserve to have Congress justify how it spends their money. This is the simple idea behind giving the president a modified, constitutional version of the line-item veto.

By shining the light of day on budgeting in Washington and holding members of Congress accountable for spending they insert into legislation, we can reduce wasteful pork-barrel spending.

DOJ_NMG_0020429

To do this, we propose beefing up the president's existing authority to ask Congress to rescind wasteful spending items. Today, the president can make such a request, but Congress can just ignore it. During Ronald Reagan's presidency, for example, Congress failed to act on more than $25 billion in rescission requests by the administration.

Under our bipartisan legislation, the president can sign a spending bill but put a temporary hold on any wasteful provision and request that Congress rescind it. After two days, any member of Congress could introduce the rescission proposal and it would have to be voted on within 10 legislative days, guaranteeing fast-track consideration.

Unlike the line-item veto the Supreme Court struck down in 1998, this keeps the lawmaking power in Congress, where it belongs. For spending to be rescinded, it must pass both the House of Representatives and Senate by a simple majority, then be signed into law by the president. This upholds the process envisioned by the Founding Fathers.

We do not pretend that this step alone would balance the budget, but it would be an important component of a broader drive to restore fiscal discipline to Washington and rein in unnecessary pork-barrel spending.

If a member of Congress has included legitimate spending in a bill, it should be defensible on its merits, apart from the larger legislation to which it is attached. If a “bridge to nowhere” or other pork project can't be justified, then it deserves to be removed.

In any responsible business, employees who charge expenses to the company must be able to justify these expenditures. Members of Congress are the people's employees, and we should be held to the same standard.

Rep. Paul Ryan, R-Wis., is prime sponsor of the House line-item veto legislation.

Competitive Sourcing (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Remember competitive sourcing? That's President Bush's initiative to examine whether jobs done by federal employees could be performed more efficiently by private contractors.

Bush called it his top management priority when he took office in 2001, saying federal workers should compete with contractors for as many as 850,000 government jobs that are considered commercial, jobs as diverse as janitorial services and computer network design.

It has gone far less smoothly, and far more slowly, than the White House had hoped, with fewer than 50,000 jobs studied by the end of 2005. And federal workers have won the job competitions more than 80 percent of the time.

Even so, many federal employees still quake at the prospect of their jobs moving to the private sector. The latest example came yesterday at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, where about 70 people protested plans to contract out the jobs of 350 workers, including carpenters, electricians and security employees.

The workers and their union, the American Federation of Government Employees, say their winning bid was unfairly tossed out; that the job competition, announced during the Clinton administration, took longer than regulations allow; and that the Army, in breaking the deadlines, spent money not authorized by Congress.

"We're going to continue fighting this legislatively," said John Threlkeld, an AFGE lobbyist.

Management agreed yesterday to put off a decision for several months. Even if the workers save their jobs, their worries won't end. The historic hospital in Northwest Washington is scheduled to be shut down in 2011 as part of the federal base-closing process.

Bills Eye Substitute For Federal Hatch Act (WT)

By Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

District officials have proposed legislation to Congress and the D.C. Council that would exempt the city from federal enforcement of the Hatch Act and allow it to govern itself in that matter.

The bills, which regulate the way city government employees can participate in local politics, are another step toward District statehood, officials say.

D.C. Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat, introduced the bill with Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, last week. Their bill would exempt the District from the Hatch Act, a 1939 anti-corruption law designed to prohibit federal workers from participating in political campaigns.

Mrs. Norton said her bill offers a win-win arrangement for federal and District governments.

"It gives D.C. a long-awaited home-rule victory without the Congress losing anything," she said. "It's very difficult to see an argument against it, frankly."

DOJ_NMG_0020430

Mrs. Norton, the District's nonvoting member of Congress, said that under current law the federal government is forced to oversee and prosecute Hatch Act violations within the District.

"In this case, you free one of the offices of the federal government up from overseeing a local jurisdiction," she said.

Enactment of Mrs. Norton's bill is contingent upon the D.C. Council passing a bill similar to the Hatch Act. Mrs. Norton said she expects her bill to easily pass both the House and the Senate.

In response to Mrs. Norton, D.C. Council Chairman Linda W. Cropp, a Democrat who is running for mayor, introduced an employee political activity bill that would give the D.C. Board of Elections and Ethics and the office of the D.C. Attorney General oversight of District violations.

"The whole point of this is more self-government," said Charlotte Brookings-Hudson, general counsel for the D.C. Council, who authored the bill. "If we want to have this law we can impose it on ourselves. We are no longer an agency of the federal government. They gave us limited home rule and they kept certain things, but now that we can show that we can govern ourselves we should do so."

Currently, the Office of Special Counsel (OSC) is the only government entity that oversees and prosecutes federal Hatch Act cases in the District.

All U.S. states, including Maryland and Virginia, have their own versions of the Hatch Act but are also subject to oversight by the federal government.

The OSC currently has 103 cases pending. Forty-one of those involve federal officials and 62 involve state and local officials. It was not clear how many of those cases are from the District.

Mrs. Cropp's bill is similar to the federal Hatch Act, and includes rules against District employees using official authority to interfere with an election and a ban against soliciting and receiving funds for a political organization or candidate while on government property.

It also bans employees from giving out lists of names or addresses of District employees to fundraisers.

It does not, however, ban employees from receiving funds while off government property or ban employees from giving out lists of names or addresses for government contractors to fundraisers.

"The purpose of this is to impose a local law on this area that protects our employees from being forced to engage in political activities," said Charlotte Brookings-Hudson, general counsel for the D.C. Council. "It's local legislation to protect the rights of employees, not contractors."

Since D.C. Mayor Anthony A. Williams took office in 1999, there have been a number of complaints to the D.C. Office of Campaign Financing and the OSC regarding the use of the executive office for political activities.

The most recent was a 2004 complaint against Mr. Williams' Chief of Staff Kelvin J. Robinson. That complaint said in 2002, Mr. Robinson asked D.C. employees to volunteer to work on the mayor's re-election campaign. Mr. Robinson resigned to take a private sector job several days before that complaint was filed.

Mr. Williams said he supports Mrs. Cropp and Mrs. Norton's bills because they further the cause of home rule in the District. He said that any history of government corruption in the District should not block the city from governing itself.

Other cities and states who have also experienced government corruption in the past, such as Chicago or New York, are allowed to govern themselves, he said.

"The Hatch Act currently treats us as an agency of the federal government," he said. "We are not, whether ... someone may want us to be, we are not. And we fiercely resist being seen as an agency of the federal government and we should be given the same latitude and autonomy with our local affairs as any other city in the country."

Americans View Muslims Favorably (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Most Americans hold favorable views of American Muslims, and almost half say Islam doesn't encourage violence more than other religions, according to a study released yesterday at an international interfaith conference.

These findings offer hope that Muslims eventually will be accepted and integrated into American society as people of other faiths have been, said Luis Lugo, director of the Pew Forum on Religion and Public Life, which conducted the study.

However, many Americans remain wary of Muslims and Islam, Mr. Lugo said. More personal friendships and education should improve chances for interreligious relations.

Nearly all of yesterday's conference speakers decried terrorism by "extremists" and "radicals."

The Pew findings were presented at the International Conference on Faith and Service in Washington, which featured conciliatory messages from leaders of Christian, Jewish and Muslim faiths; Indonesian scholar and special envoy Alwi Shihab; and Karen Hughes, the State Department's undersecretary for public diplomacy.

Catholics and Jews were once objects of "widespread and often institutionalized discrimination" in America, Mr. Lugo said. But by 2005, three-quarters of Americans viewed these religions favorably.

Such findings "strongly suggest that the United States has the capacity to overcome historical religious divisions and prejudices," he said.

The findings also showed that 60 percent of Americans think recent terrorist attacks represent a conflict with "a small radical group," not "the people of Islam."

Mrs. Hughes also spoke yesterday about the Afghan man who is facing death for converting to Christianity.

"This case clearly violates the universal freedom held dear by democratic people throughout the world, and we believe it violates the Afghan Constitution, which guarantees the right of an individual to freedom of religion," she said. "We are deeply concerned and have expressed those concerns to the Afghan government."

Islamic doctrine says there "shall be no compulsion in religion" and says people of all faiths should be allowed to practice their religion unmolested, said Imam Feisal Abdul Rauf, head of the American Society for Muslim Advancement. "It is a travesty of Islamic law and Islamic thought" that these principles are violated today.

The Candidates' Money Race (NYT)

As a cash-flow marathon, the 2008 presidential race is already under way, with fund-raising trumping innovative ideas and political experts predicting the death of public financing. This is a little-noticed American tragedy, as politics slips back toward the Watergate era. That was when the scandal of easy-money corruption prompted Congress to create the historic option of public election subsidies.

That worthy reform is now badly in need of updating to keep pace with the big-money dynamics of private fund-raising, which has retightened its lock on politics. Don't expect much help from the current Congress, so clearly in thrall to special interests' campaign money. In the last presidential contest, President Bush and Senator John Kerry set furious records for private fund-raising — netting more than $250 million each — for the campaign primaries. Intent on dominating the political landscape, they rejected the public alternative, which would have limited spending to a mere $44 million each. But they both took the subsidies for the general election, each accepting a $74 million spending limit.

Even that path is now threatened as political consultants sense a billion-dollar duel looming for the next election. The cost of running for the White House inflates with each ballot, and campaign strategists estimate that the entry stakes for the 2008 race could approach $100 million, just to be taken seriously. No wonder aspirants are already trolling California, Texas and other wholesale donor precincts as hungrily as the retail voter tableaus of Iowa and New Hampshire.

Treasury Secretary Expects Wage Growth To Increase (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Treasury Secretary John Snow predicted Wednesday that U.S. wage growth would accelerate in coming months, as he tried to combat negative consumer attitudes about the economy and White House policies.

In a meeting with reporters, Snow said that as labor markets tighten — with the unemployment rate falling to 4.8% in February from 6.3% in mid-2003 — companies will boost compensation.

“Can (average Americans) expect to have more money in their pockets going forward? I think the answer is unequivocally, ‘yes,' ” Snow said.

Several measures of compensation, including hourly wage growth, have lagged behind inflation during much of the recovery from the 2001 recession. Average hourly wages rose 3.2% in 2005, while the consumer inflation rate was up 3.4%.

There are signs that wages are starting to pick up. The Labor Department said hourly wages for non-supervisory workers, about 80% of the workforce, rose 5 cents in February and 3.5% from February 2004.

“There's only very, very early sort of indications of” rising wage growth, says Nariman Behravesh of Global Insight. “There is still a fair amount of slack in the labor market.”

Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com adds that while hourly wages show some gains, higher-paid workers are pulling up the average. Wages for lower-income earners still trail inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0020432

Snow's comments came as recent polls show Americans are pessimistic about President Bush's economic policies. A survey by the Pew Research Center for the People & the Press earlier this month found 34% of the public approved of Bush's handling of the economy, while 57% disapproved.

In addition to the short-term wage picture, economists including former Fed chairman Alan Greenspan are concerned about a decades-long trend of rising U.S. income inequality. Snow said improved education was needed to address the issue in the long term.

On related issues, Snow said the White House would "engage" with Congress if lawmakers wanted to raise the minimum wage, at $5.15 an hour since 1997. While Snow expressed concern a higher minimum wage could have an impact on hiring, economic literature on the topic is mixed.

Snow said he did not think Americans had taken on too much debt to finance consumption, calling the data benign.

Zandi disagrees. "The folks in the bottom half of the distribution of wealth, the debt level is high, and it's going to become onerous as interest rates rise."

Income Gap Narrower By Treasury's Measure (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The income gap between rich and poor in the United States has shrunk in recent years, Treasury Secretary John W. Snow said yesterday, addressing an issue frequently raised by critics of President Bush's economic policies this election year.

"There has been a decline in the inequality" from a high point in 2000 through 2003, the most recent year for which figures are available, Snow said during a meeting with reporters yesterday, referring to Treasury data based on tax returns.

The top 5 percent of Americans, ranked by income, earned 15.4 percent of the nation's after-tax income in 2003, down from 19 percent in 2000, Treasury figures show. The bottom 20 percent took home 2.5 percent of all U.S. after-tax income, up from 2.3 percent in 2000.

But much of the decline in inequality during that period reflected the popping of the stock market bubble, which peaked in 2000, when executives pocketed fat bonuses and stockholders reaped huge profits from selling shares, according to economists inside and outside the Bush administration. The fall in stock prices during those years disproportionately affected high-income households and helped compress the distribution of income.

The Treasury data, which include profit from the sale of stocks and other capital gains, also show that the gap was still larger in 2003 than in 1990, when the top 5 percent of earners took home 12.9 percent of the nation's income.

And census data, which do not include capital gains, show that income inequality grew from 2000 to 2003 and increased again in 2004, continuing a quarter-century trend.

Administration critics said the income figures in 2000 were an anomaly, reflecting the overheated stock market. "If you look at it over a longer period, the trend toward rising income inequality has continued unabated," said Leonard E. Burman, a former Clinton administration Treasury official who is a senior fellow at the Urban Institute.

President Bush's tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 made income inequality "a lot worse," Burman said.

President Bush's approval rating has been falling, making Republicans nervous about the congressional elections this year. A Washington Post-ABC News Poll conducted this month found that 51 percent of respondents disapproved of how Bush is handling the economy, and 62 percent said he does not understand "the problems of people like" themselves.

Snow attributed those poll numbers to a lag between recent improvements in the economy and people's perceptions of that strength, overlaid by anxieties about the war on terrorism, high gasoline prices and unease about the implications of globalization for U.S. workers.

The economy has grown at a robust pace for the past two years, consumer spending is rising and businesses are hiring, he said, calling those indicators "the poll that counts."

Snow acknowledged that the income gap has grown over recent decades.

Family income inequality declined from 1946 through 1969, census data show. Inequality increased slowly from 1970 through 1979 and "has increased somewhat faster since then," wrote Frank Levy, an economics professor at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in an analysis posted on the Census Bureau's Web site.

In 2000, the median household income for the top 20 percent of earners was 14 times the comparable figure for the bottom 20 percent, census figures show. By 2003, the top group earned 14.7 times more; by 2004; it earned 14.8 times more. All the census figures are adjusted for inflation. The median is the midpoint, at which half of all families earn more and half earn less.

Snow also asserted that the economic recovery from the 2001 recession is "a little better" than the rebound from the 1990-91 recession. He pointed to Treasury data showing that median household income had declined each year from a peak in 2000 through 2004, the most recent year for which figures are available. He noted that the drop was shallower than a similar slide during the four years after income peaked in 1989.

But census data also show that median household income declined for three consecutive years after the 2001 recession ended; income declined for just two years after the earlier recession and was rising by the third, noted Lee Price, research director of the Economic Policy Institute.

"Things are still not improving for average people," Price said, noting that the income figures are adjusted for inflation, which has flared in recent years as energy prices have risen. "Because inflation picked up, people in the middle are not getting ahead."

Dow Up 81, Hitting Highest Level In Nearly Five Years (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

By Bloomberg News

The Dow Jones industrial average rose yesterday to its highest level in almost five years as the outlook for corporate earnings improved.

Auto stocks gained after General Motors' announcement of a plan to reduce labor costs through employee buyouts. Bristol-Myers Squibb surged after reaching a settlement to delay a generic version of its biggest-selling drug. Morgan Stanley rose as its profit beat analysts' estimates.

Lower oil prices also helped stocks bounce back from the decline shares posted earlier in the week amid concern that the Federal Reserve would keep raising interest rates to curb inflation.

The Dow average gained 81.96 points, or 0.7 percent, to 11,317.43, the highest since May 2001. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index added 7.81 points, or 0.6 percent, to 1,305.04.

Technology stocks trailed the advance as a delay in the next version of Microsoft's Windows program led to the stock's biggest decline since July. The Nasdaq composite index, which gets 42 percent of its value from computer-related shares, gained 9.12 points, or 0.4 percent, to 2,303.35.

The market slid earlier this week as a speech by the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, and a report on producer prices rekindled interest rate concern. The central bank meets Tuesday to decide whether to raise a benchmark rate a 15th consecutive time.

Stock indexes rebounded yesterday as investors chose to focus on the improving outlook for the auto and drug industries.

G.M., the world's largest automaker, offered a one-time buyout to factory employees and reached an agreement with its biggest parts supplier, Delphi, to entice thousands more workers to retire. The deal with the United Automobile Workers reduces the chances of G.M.'s being sent into bankruptcy by a strike at Delphi.

G.M. shares added only a penny, to $22.01, but shares of other companies involved in autos showed bigger gains. Lear, the largest supplier of auto-interior parts, rose 87 cents, to $18.18. Johnson Controls, the largest automotive-seat maker, rose 59 cents to $77.44. And Ford Motor gained 10 cents, to $8.15.

Bristol-Myers surged $2.41, or 11 percent, to $25.24, for the largest gain in the S.&P. 500. Bristol and Sanofi-Aventis reached a settlement with Apotex that keeps a generic version of the blood thinner Plavix off the market until 2011. Sanofi-Aventis American depository receipts gained $4.20, to $47.88. The Amex pharmaceutical index had its biggest jump since Jan. 3, climbing 2 percent.

Morgan Stanley gained $1.53, to $61.94, after it said fiscal first-quarter net income rose 17 percent on revenue from buying and selling stocks and fixed-income securities. Per-share profit was $1.54 in the three months ended Feb. 28, exceeding the highest analyst estimate in a survey by Thomson Financial.

Microsoft fell 59 cents, or 2.1 percent, to $27.15, for the worst performance in the Dow average, after the company announced that the Vista version of Windows would be delayed.

Apple Computer, which makes computers that run on a different operating system, fell 14 cents, to $61.67.

Nike, the largest athletic-shoe maker, added $1.87, to $86.82. The company said fiscal third-quarter net income rose 19 percent as the new Air Max 360 sneaker helped increase United States sales. Profit for the quarter that ended Feb. 28 was $1.24 a share, exceeding the $1.10 average estimate of analysts surveyed by Thomson.

About 11 stocks rose for every 4 that fell on the New York Stock Exchange. Almost 1.49 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 9.8 percent fewer than the three-month average.

The price of the benchmark 10-year Treasury note rose 5/32, to 9814/32. The yield, which moves in the opposite direction from the price, was 4.70 percent, down from 4.72 percent on Tuesday.

After Slump, Dow Hits Nearly 5-year High (USAT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

USA Today, March 23, 2006

NEW YORK — Stocks snapped a two-day slump Wednesday amid growing confidence rising earnings will outweigh increasing interest rates.

The Dow Jones industrial average gained 81.96 points to 11,317.43, highest since May 21, 2001, putting it up 5.6% this year. The Dow is on pace for a better than 24% gain this year.

Boosted by advertising, steel and footwear stocks, the Standard & Poor's 500 index added 7.81 points to 1305.04. The index is up 4.5% this year.

And despite the unexpected delay of Microsoft's next version of the Windows operating system until January, the tech-heavy Nasdaq composite index gained 9.12 points to 2303.35. The Nasdaq is up 4.4% this year. Shares of Microsoft, though, fell 59 cents to $27.15.

Automakers and parts suppliers were strong following General Motors' announcement of a plan to reduce labor costs through employee buyouts (stories, 1A, 1B). Company-specific news also helped boost Bristol-Myers Squibb, Morgan Stanley and FedEx.

Lower oil prices also helped stocks recover after falling earlier in the week amid concern that the Federal Reserve will keep raising short-term interest rates to curb inflation.

"We have felt all along profits would come in better than expected" in 2006, says Keith Wirtz, chief investment officer at Fifth Third Asset Management.

And despite the strong rise in stock values this year, some think there's still upside. "Stocks are not expensive," says Doug Sandler, chief equity strategist at Wachovia Securities. "There's no reason to believe we can't go higher. I don't see inflation as a threat at all."

Morgan Stanley rose $1.53 to $61.94. The investment bank said quarterly net income rose 17%, exceeding the highest analyst estimate in a survey by Thomson Financial.

·Bristol-Myers gained $2.41 to $25.24 after it and Sanofi-Aventis reached a settlement with Apotex that keeps a generic version of their blood thinner off the market until 2011. The blood thinner, Plavix, is Bristol-Myers' biggest-selling drug.

·FedEx rose $1.22 to $114.44. The No. 2 U.S. package-shipping company said fiscal third-quarter profit rose 35%, more than analysts expected, as strong demand enabled FedEx to raise prices.

·Juniper Networks lost 37 cents to $18.99. Banc of America Securities analyst Tim Long said the No. 2 maker of equipment that directs Internet traffic may "struggle" to gain market share required to meet estimates this year.

Stocks Rise As Rates Decline (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

The interest-rate tap dance on Wall Street continued Wednesday, leaving stocks higher and rates lower.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average gained 81.96 points to 11317.43, the first time it closed above 11300 since May 2001. The Dow is now about 20 points shy of a six-year high, a level it neared by 10 points in a strong rally in the final hour of trading.

Basic materials companies such as Caterpillar and financials such as J.P. Morgan Chase, which tend to benefit from low rates and economic growth, helped lead the rally. Shares of General Motors jumped earlier on reports that its auto-parts supplier Delphi has reached an agreement1 with the United Auto Workers union and GM on an early retirement plan for employees. But it moved lower at the end of the day.

Rising rates knocked stocks lower earlier this week, amid concerns over a speech given by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke on bond yields. A report showing a bigger-than-expected increase in core wholesale prices also led to concerns that the Fed would have to push rates higher than most hope to keep inflation in check.

Wednesday, though, yields declined as bonds rallied on continued debate among investors about the meaning of Mr. Bernanke's speech. The rally Wednesday provided a sense that bond yields are contained, at least for now.

Stocks are up "because the bond market is rallying, and there's confidence that earnings are going to continue to grow," said Kent Engelke, capital markets strategist Anderson & Strudwick. "If rates are contained and we have solid economic growth, we're going to see pretty good earnings" in the rest of 2006, he said. Fears that earnings growth will wane sharply in the latter half of the year have led to skepticism that stocks will continue to climb.

DOJ_NMG_0020435

Technology stocks were weak after Microsoft said it would delay the release2 of its new Windows Vista operating system for consumers until January 2007. Microsoft fell 2.5%. While the Nasdaq Composite Index spent most of the morning in negative territory, it clawed higher toward the end of regular trading, rising 9.12 points to 2303.35.

Computer makers such as Dell, Hewlett-Packard and Gateway had been banking on a rush of holiday sales as computer users snapped up new machines tricked out with Vista's bells and whistles. Microsoft plans to release the Vista operating system to large business customers in November.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 7.81 to 1305.04. Light, sweet crude-oil fell 57 cents to $61.77 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange despite a report by the Energy Department that crude-oil inventories declined by 1.3 million barrels last week, when analysts were expecting a 2.8 million barrel increase.

Meanwhile, Biogen Idec shares were flat after it said the Food and Drug Administration will extend its review of its key multiple sclerosis drug Tysabri by up to 90 days, a setback for the company which wanted to reintroduce the drug to the U.S. market in June. Shares of its Irish partner Elan slipped 3.7%.

Shares of Bristol-Myers Squibb and Sanofi-Aventis rallied after the companies said they had reached a settlement for Canadian drug maker Apotex to delay9 its generic version of blood-thinning drug, Plavix, until 2011. Bristol-Myers' shares rose 11%, and Sanofi gained 9%.

In major market action:

Stocks rose10. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 2,272 stocks rose and 1,031 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 1.7 billion shares traded, 1,779 rose and 1,187 declined.

Bonds advanced11. The benchmark 10-year Treasury gained 4/32 point, or $1.25 cents for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.705%. The 30-year bond added 10/32 to yield 4.75%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar was mixed.12 It traded at 117.07 yen, down from 117.30 yen late Tuesday, while the euro fell to $1.2074 from $1.2087.

Stock Performance Undercuts Bush's Vision Of Ownership Society (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush has tried to sell Americans on an ``ownership society'' that would create more wealth -- and more Republicans in the process. The stock market hasn't accommodated.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index -- the benchmark for American equities -- is down 2.8 percent since Bush took office five years and two months ago. That's the worst performance during the same stage of any two-term administration in the past half century except that of Richard M. Nixon.

The market's performance is undermining a central goal of White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove, Bush's chief political adviser. Borrowing from Margaret Thatcher's privatization push in the U.K. in the 1980s, Rove's theory is that if more Americans make their own financial decisions and the last vestiges of a welfare state are dismantled, a culture of ownership will spring up. The ranks of Republican voters, the idea goes, will swell along with it.

``The ownership society looked very attractive on paper,'' said Jacob Hacker, a political science professor at Yale University in New Haven, Connecticut. ``But once you flesh out the changes, people become very concerned because they are already fearful that their economic security is slipping away,''

Those fears are playing out as campaigns are getting underway for the November congressional elections.

``I don't see many Republicans stressing it, emphasizing it or raising it during the campaign,'' said U.S. Representative Peter King, a Republican from New York. While younger voters may be more willing to accept risk, ``the older you get, the harder it is to fully accept this shift.''

Outside Threats

Some of the insecurity stems from the quarterly statements that many Americans are getting for their 401(k) retirement funds and other accounts. Stocks are stammering at the same time government statistics on jobs, productivity and gross domestic product are showing economic strength and continued growth.

Since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and the war in Iraq, exuberance about the economy has been overtaken by gnawing unease about the future, according to Robert Solow, 1987 winner of the Nobel Prize for economics and professor emeritus at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge.

``Investors are worried that something is going to blow up tomorrow -- they just think it's a crazy world,'' Solow said.

Harvard economist Robert Barro points to a ``lingering geopolitical risk and this sense in the financial markets that there is this probability of something really terrible happening related to international terrorism.''

Performance Factors

DOJ_NMG_0020436

Anxiety about terrorism and the war isn't the only reason stocks have struggled to keep pace. Companies still are shedding excess plants and equipment built up during the boom years of the 1990s. At the same time, low inflation and the globalization of markets means companies can't raise prices at will.

The S&P 500 index during the past half-century has risen on average 8.1 percent a year. The index rose 3 percent last year, when Federal Reserve figures show corporate profits reached a record of about $1.3 trillion. In 1999, a year the S&P 500 rose 20 percent, corporate profits were $806 billion.

By comparison with other two-term administrations of the past half-century, the index grew 153.6 percent at this point during the presidency of Bill Clinton, 79.7 percent for Ronald Reagan, 61.9 percent under Dwight D. Eisenhower and 45.4 percent during the Kennedy-Johnson administration. At the same stage in Nixon's presidency the S&P dropped 4.1 percent.

Risk Concerns

Concern about market risks meant Bush last year had to backpedal from a centerpiece of his ownership campaign -- adding private investment accounts to the Social Security system. His other plans, such as having individuals use tax-free accounts to pay for medical costs, may face a similar fate as the Republican congressional majority shies away from programs that shift more decisions and risks to consumers who've demonstrated they want neither.

``Republicans don't want to go anywhere near the ownership society'' in an election year, said Hacker, author of the book ``The Great Risk Shift,'' which is scheduled for publication in August. ``You're going to see very little attention to these larger themes.''

Last year, the ownership society was the centerpiece of Bush's domestic agenda. He crisscrossed the country, getting applause for his oft-repeated desire to see ``ownership spread throughout all our society.''

This year, Bush didn't utter the word ownership in his Jan. 31 State of the Union. In speeches around the country he has have downplayed themes of personal responsibility and expanding the ``investor class.'' Instead, he focuses on maintaining the ``competitiveness'' of the American economy, providing consumers with more ``transparency'' on health-care costs and reaking a U.S. ``addiction'' to oil.

Timing

The idea of giving individuals a greater stake in the economy ``is broadly appealing, but it works best when the market is clearly performing well and rising,'' said James Lucier, senior analyst with Prudential Equity Group LLC in Washington.

Not all is bleak on the ownership front. As Bush frequently points out in speeches, the home ownership rate rose to a record of 69.2 percent under his administration, from 67.5 percent when he took office. The value of mortgages stood at $8.66 trillion at the end of 2005, from $5.22 trillion in 2001, Federal Reserve figures show, while individual stock holdings have fallen to $6.08 trillion, down from $6.72 trillion 2001.

Stocks may continue to remain short of previous highs. The consensus forecast of 15 equity strategists surveyed by Bloomberg News in early March is for an S&P 500 index to finish the year at 1,353, which would be an 8.4 percent gain for the year. That's still below the high of 1,383 during Bush's tenure reached on Jan. 31, 2001 -- about a month before the economy slipped into recession.

Stocks would be 10 percent to 15 percent higher without the geopolitical risks that stem from the Bush administration's foreign policies, said Allen Sinai, chief global economist at Decision Economics Inc. He predicts the S&P 500 index -- whose 3 percent rise last year when ranked globally bested only China, Malaysia and Venezuela's stock markets -- will rise to as high as 1,375 this year, from yesterday's close of 1,305.

``In the midst of a very nice business expansion, there is a kind of pall in the attitudes of Americans about how this administration is performing,'' Sinai said.

Republican Split On Stem Cells Creates `Wedge' Issue (Update1) (BLOOM)

By William Roberts

Bloomberg, March 23, 2006

March 22 (Bloomberg) -- In 2002, when he was an 18-year-old freshman at the U.S. Air Force Academy, Jeff McCaffrey was paralyzed from the waist down in a car accident. A Catholic and opponent of abortion, McCaffrey is now an ardent campaigner for research using stem cells from human embryos.

``I have no moral qualms,'' said McCaffrey. ``It is simply cells,'' he said in a telephone interview. ``Scientists can make those stem cells that are blank turn into spinal cells and heal my injury.''

People such as McCaffrey present a quandary for Republicans, who are split over whether to allow federal funding for research on new stem cells from human embryos. Senate Democrats plan to force a debate on the issue in the coming months and use it in the campaign leading up to the November elections.

DOJ_NMG_0020437

Republicans plan their own debate over bioethics in an effort to limit the damage from letting stem cells become ``a wedge issue that divides Republicans," Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist said in an interview.

Republicans in the past often have benefited from such ``wedge issues" -- subjects that divide Democrats' constituencies, such as gun control, abortion and gay marriage. Stem-cell research may be one of the first wedge issues that hurts Republicans more because of President George W. Bush's stand against it; polls show a majority of the public disagrees with him.

``Stem-cell research could define '06 Senate races," to the advantage of Democrats, said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Bush's Ban

Bush has prohibited federal funding for any research using material from newly created human embryos since 2001. While Frist has promised to bring a measure before the Senate to overturn Bush's ban, a plan to begin debate this month has been stalled.

Scientists inject embryonic cells with genetic material, creating regenerative tissue that in theory could be implanted in patients to cure diseases from Parkinson's to juvenile diabetes. The Republican Party's evangelical Christian base is opposed to the research because human embryos are destroyed in the process.

``We have great qualms about the moral nature of this practice," said Carrie Gordon Earle, a bioethics analyst at Focus on the Family, a Christian advocacy group. The Colorado Springs, Colorado-based organization opposes the potential use of human embryos for research.

``You are destroying human entities," Earle said.

Brownback's Effort

Kansas Republican Senator Sam Brownback is pushing for a week-long debate in the Senate on bioethics in which opponents of such stem-cell research can promote legislation to block it. Brownback said he thinks he has the 51 votes needed to pass such a measure.

``These are the ones you just have to state a truth and stand by it," he said. ``It's human life. And I mean, that has to be stood up for."

Frist said his goal ``is to be able to consider a range of bills and amendments" during any bioethics debate.

A number of Senate Republicans, including Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Orrin Hatch of Utah, have joined forces with Democrats including Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Tom Harkin of Iowa to push the overturn of Bush's ban.

``Some Republicans are on the wrong side of the issue, obviously," Harkin said. ``There may be some more that are just holding back, but when push comes to shove they will vote with us."

Patient groups such as the Parkinson's Action Network and the Coalition for Advancement of Medical Research, both based in Washington, recently began mobilizing members to push for a Senate vote.

Basic Research

At issue in the debate is how much funding the U.S. puts into basic research into stem cells. Under Bush's 2007 budget, the National Institutes of Health would spend $605 million on stem-cell research, of which almost 95 percent would go to work in adult stem cells and animal stem cells.

Only $38 million would be directed to research using some of the 21 existing-stem cell lines available under Bush's 2001 executive order. Scientists say those lines have been corrupted by mouse cultures and are therefore useless for potential human therapies.

``As a result, very little research using human embryonic cells is going on here in the U.S.," said William Neaves, director of the Stowers Institute for Medical Research in Kansas City, which was endowed with $2 billion by Jim Stowers, founder of the American Century Cos. mutual funds.

`Falling Far Behind'

The U.S. is ``at significant risk of falling far behind" other nations such as Great Britain, Israel and Singapore, Neaves said.

In a poll by the Gallup Organization conducted August 5-7, 56 percent of the 1,004 people surveyed supported research on newly created stem cells from human embryos. Even people who ``take conservative positions on social issues, when they are faced with a choice between traditional values and advancement of medical research, generally opt for the latter," said Andrew Kohut, director of the Washington-based Pew Research Center.

Some states are taking action to fund research on their own. California passed a ballot measure to pump $3 billion into stem- cell research over 10 years. Wisconsin, Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts and Maryland have all passed laws supporting and funding embryonic stem-cell research.

In Missouri, a group funded by Stowers is pushing a ballot measure that would legalize research using stem cells from human embryos, Neaves said. Focus on the Family's Earle said Christian groups will use television, radio and mail in an effort to defeat the measure in November.

DOJ_NMG_0020438

``A `no' vote is a whole lot easier to get, especially on a controversial issue." Earle said.

Talent's Switch

Jim Talent, the Republican senator from the state who is running for re-election this year, last month abandoned his support for legislation that would ban embryonic stem-cell research, including cloning. He now backs research into producing stem cells without cloning or destroying human embryos.

McCaffrey has left the Air Force Academy and is now at the University of Missouri, where he's forming a student group to support stem-cell research.

``I want to use stem cells to save lives and better lives," he said. ``I believe we have a moral obligation to find cures. It is the greater good."

Iraq War Veteran Wins Congressional Primary (NYT)

By Gretchen Ruethling

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO, March 22 — L. Tammy Duckworth, a retired Army major who lost her legs in Iraq and has the backing of some of the Democratic Party's national leaders, declared victory on Wednesday in a close Congressional primary in suburban Chicago, setting up a carefully watched race for the seat of Representative Henry J. Hyde, a Republican who is retiring after 32 years.

Problems with Chicago's and Cook County's new voting system — installed to solve problems with the old punch-card method — also left a hard-fought county race up in the air for nearly a day after the polls closed. Finally, late Wednesday afternoon, Forrest Claypool conceded his challenge to the incumbent Cook County Board president, John H. Stroger Jr.

In the gubernatorial primary, Illinois Treasurer Judy Baar Topinka narrowly edged a conservative rival to clinch the Republican nomination and earn a chance to challenge Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich in November.

In the Sixth District Congressional primary, unofficial results showed Ms. Duckworth winning 44 percent of the vote, with her main opponent, Christine Cegelis, winning 40 percent. A third candidate, Lindy Scott, took 16 percent.

"My service to this country and my service in Iraq are a testament to my patriotism and my dedication," Ms. Duckworth said in a telephone interview on Wednesday. "I am so gratified that there is such tremendous energy in this district, that people feel there is a viable alternative for the first time in 32 years."

Ms. Duckworth, 38, lost her legs when a rocket-propelled grenade hit the helicopter she was piloting in Iraq in November 2004. She announced her candidacy in December after she was released from rehabilitation and active duty.

"Three months ago, nobody knew who I was," said Ms. Duckworth, who has received widespread support from leading Democrats like Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and John Kerry of Massachusetts, and vows to focus on education, health care and jobs. "It has been a whirlwind."

Ms. Duckworth's opponents in Tuesday's primary were critical of the amount of support and financing she received from outside the district. Ms. Duckworth will face State Senator Peter J. Roskam in November. Mr. Roskam also has national support, from Republican Party leaders, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who visited Illinois last week to raise money for him.

In the Cook County Board race, Mr. Claypool, who was running against Mr. Stroger as a reformer looking to end patronage in county government, told his supporters on Wednesday at campaign headquarters, "You brought us so close to victory against the old Democratic machine."

He added, "We were challenging virtually all the power brokers in Cook County and Chicago, but we ran a real grass-roots campaign."

Mr. Stroger, 76, remains hospitalized in serious but stable condition after suffering a stroke last week.

Mr. Claypool's concession came while election officials were manually counting ballots after problems with a new voting system left 13 percent of the votes uncounted.

In unofficial returns, Mr. Stroger was leading Mr. Claypool by more than 21,000 votes, 52 percent to 48 percent. Mr. Claypool said it was obvious that the remaining ballots, many of which were cast in predominately African-American precincts where Mr. Stroger has strong support, would not change the balance.

"We strongly believe that we have won," Bruce Washington, Mr. Stroger's campaign manager, said at a news conference on Wednesday afternoon. "We're just going through the process here of counting the remaining ballots."

The ballot problem comes two years after more than 5,000 provisional ballots cast in a primary election here were disqualified, mainly because of technical errors.

Ex-Army Pilot Gets Ill. House Nomination (AP)

By Dennis Conrad

The Associated Press, March 22, 2006

Tammy Duckworth, a former Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in a grenade attack in Iraq, is now leading the charge for the Fighting Democrats.

Duckworth narrowly won the Democratic nomination for Congress in a primary race Tuesday for the House seat held by Republican Rep. Henry Hyde (news, bio, voting record), who is retiring after 32 years. She is the best-known of the Iraq war veterans who want to go to Capitol Hill this year.

"My experience in Iraq made me realize, and during the recovery, that I could have died," said Duckworth, who was wounded in 2004 and now gets around by using either a wheelchair or metal prosthetic limbs and a cane. "And I just had to do more with my life."

About 10 veterans of the current fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan are candidates for Congress, all but one of them a Democrat. The Fighting Democrats, as they are being called, contend their battlefield experience will allow them to criticize the war without being written off as naive and weak on defense.

Duckworth, a 38-year-old major in the Illinois Army National Guard, has strong backing from big-name national Democrats, some of whom recruited her to run in the traditionally Republican district in Chicago's suburbs.

On the campaign trail, she has portrayed U.S. involvement in Iraq as a mistake. She has faulted U.S. intelligence and accused American politicians of making poor decisions.

But she has nothing but praise for the U.S. fighting men and women in Iraq and Afghanistan, and has cautioned against quick withdrawal.

"I just thought that we never should have invaded Iraq. We should have gone after Osama bin Laden and our enemies in Afghanistan who attacked us on our soil here in the United States," she said in suburban Downers Grove on Wednesday after edging out businesswoman Christine Cegelis for the nomination.

At the same time, Duckworth, who is married to a captain in the Illinois National Guard, said: "I was proud to serve. I'd do it tomorrow. I'm still in the Army National Guard. If my unit were deployed, I would go again. I think it is important to do your duty."

Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia, said he would be surprised if Duckworth won in November. But "she serves a function for Democrats even if she loses," by helping the Democrats compete with the Republicans on the issue of national security.

Similarly, Stephen Hess, a professor of media and public affairs at The George Washington University, said that most of the veterans seeking House seats this cycle are "running in places where they're sacrificial lambs."

In November, Duckworth will face state Sen. Peter Roskam, a well-to-do lawyer and conservative from Wheaton who ran unopposed in the GOP primary. Roskam also drew support from Vice President Dick Cheney, who helped with a fundraiser that brought in an estimated $200,000.

"How much is this going to be a national election? Clearly, the Republicans will hope it's not. `All politics is local will be their mantra,'" Hess said.

For her part, Duckworth has tried to talk about more than just the war.

"I think we need to stop giving money to oil companies at a time we are cutting funding for education," she said. "We need to stop giving tax cuts to the very wealthiest Americans."

She does acknowledge what some critics say privately: That she would not have become a candidate had it not been for her catastrophic injury.

Had she not been wounded, she said, she would have started a nonprofit agency or gone back to her job at Rotary International's world headquarters in Evanston, where she was a staff supervisor and was working at the same time on a doctorate on Southeast Asia's economies and public health.

An Iraq Veteran Begins Her Journey To Congress (TIME)

By Eric Ferkenhoff

Time, March 22, 2006

Ever since veteran Republican representative Henry Hyde announced last year that he would not be seeking another term in Congress, Democrats have viewed his suburban Chicago district as one of the key battlegrounds in their effort to take back the House in 2006. Almost immediately party heavyweights like Senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York and House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi started lending their support and helping raise loads of cash for one of the nation's most closely watched races. And with the Iraq War increasingly seen as a winning issue for the Dems, they recruited wounded Iraq War veteran Tammy Duckworth to run for the seat.

On Tuesday, their strategy began to pay off. Duckworth, a 38-year-old former major with the Illinois National Guard who lost both legs during a grenade attack on her helicopter, appeared to have eked out a primary victory over her challenger, tech entrepreneur and two-time candidate Christine Cegelis, by garnering 44% of the vote to Cegelis's 40%. Duckworth will now face a high-stakes fall race against conservative state Sen. Peter Roskam, who himself has had big names like Vice President Dick Cheney helping him amass a war chest topping $1 million.

For his three decades in Congress Hyde, who brought clout and many political goodies to his District, had been an unbeatable incumbent. So when he decided to end his storied career on Capitol Hill, Dems viewed it as an especially promising opening. And with a greater mix of young people and minorities, especially Hispanics, moving to the area, Dems believe the district is trending in their favor.

Republicans are confident that Hyde's conservative legacy remains very much alive in the west suburban District. And they note that Roskam, while criticized as too far right for a district becoming more diverse, is a loyal Bush supporter running in a district that voted for him in 2004, even as the President handily lost the state as a whole.

Duckworth is one of several veterans of the war in Iraq to enter the political fray this election, and some have questioned whether Democrats—namely Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois representative who is thought to have personally recruited Duckworth-were exploiting a veteran wracked with emotional and physical scars. Duckworth dismisses such talk, as well as the notion that the race is about national issues like the war. "I've been under much more stress when people's lives are on the line," she said."This I can handle."

That may be, but whether she can actually deliver the district to the Democrats will depend on how well she can translate her combat experience into political know-how. "My service gives me an insight that other candidates won't have, and my injuries give me a platform," she said. "But that's all it is, a platform. If there was no substance to me—[issues] like education, the health care, the jobs—I'd fall off that platform very quickly."

Iraq War Veteran Wins Her First Political Battle (CSM)

By Amanda Paulson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO - Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth edged out opponents in the Democratic primary Tuesday, setting up an intriguing congressional contest. The upbeat vet - who didn't begin her campaign until mid-December - will face Republican Peter Roskam in November in a bid to replace retiring Rep. Henry Hyde (R), who has represented Illinois's Sixth District since 1975.

Ms. Duckworth is the most visible of seven Democratic Iraq war vets running for Congress this year. Her candidacy has attracted much national attention due to her compelling personal story - she lost both legs and partial use of one arm when her helicopter was shot down in November 2004 - and the district in which she's running. Located in Chicago's western suburbs, the Sixth District has long been overwhelmingly Republican but is changing, and Democrats are now eyeing it.

George W. Bush won the district with just 53 percent of the vote in 2000 and 2004, and in the last House contest Democrat Christine Cegelis took an impressive 44 percent of the vote against Mr. Hyde.

Despite Duckworth's high profile - and backing from party leaders such as Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, Sen. John Kerry, and Illinois Sens. Barack Obama and Richard Durbin - taking the seat from the GOP will be tough, most analysts agree.

"The thing she'll have going for her is the publicity, and it appears she can raise the requisite amount of money from national sources," says Dick Simpson, a political scientist at the University of Illinois in Chicago and a former Chicago alderman. But in a district that is still largely Republican, he says, Duckworth will have to win over both the Democrats who backed her primary opponents as well as independents and some Republicans. Among GOP voters, "she'll be helped most by her status as a veteran," he says.

Duckworth barely bested Ms. Cegelis on Tuesday, winning by a margin of less than 4 percent. She was criticized during the campaign as being a candidate recruited by outside politicians who lives three miles outside the district and who lacks grass-roots support.

But Duckworth's backers see the victory and her impressive fundraising as signs that she can wage a tough campaign. Even in traditionally GOP districts, "someone who's an Iraq war veteran or a military veteran will make them stop and listen," says Mike Lyon, director of the Band of Brothers political action committee, which is working on behalf of 57 war veterans running for Congress as Democrats.

Machine Woes Slow Vote-Counting In Illinois (WP)

By Kari Lydersen And Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

CHICAGO, March 22 -- Election officials here resumed counting ballots Wednesday after problems with new electronic voting machines around Cook County forced them to halt the count in a key local race in Tuesday's primary that also had voters casting ballots for governor and Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0020441

The election was one of the first major tests of how well states and localities, seeking to comply with new federal law, have replaced outdated voting machines with modern, more accurate technology that is more accessible to disabled people.

The problems Tuesday night did not significantly affect tabulations for one of the nation's key congressional primaries. Late tallies showed that Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth narrowly won the Democratic nomination for Illinois's 6th District, where Republican Rep. Henry J. Hyde is retiring. But results for an important local race, the Democratic nomination for the Cook County Board president, were delayed until Wednesday.

Illinois has received more than $144 million in federal grants to comply with the Help America Vote Act, which Congress passed in 2002 in response to the controversy over the disputed election in South Florida in 2000. Some of that grant went to pay for a $50 million new system of optical-scan and touch-screen machines in Cook County, manufactured by Sequoia Voting Systems of Oakland, Calif.

"It didn't work as well as we would have liked, but it did work," said Chicago Board of Election Commissioners spokesman Tom Leach.

Election reform advocates have been raising concerns for months about the security and implementation of new voting technology. But some officials said Wednesday that the technology generally worked well and the problems that occurred here were not surprising, given the thousands of poll workers who had to learn the new system, one of the most complex in the nation.

Paul S. DeGregorio, chairman of the federal Election Assistance Commission who was in Chicago to observe the election, characterized the problems as "growing pains." He said that as states hold primaries in coming months, "there will be complicating issues with new equipment, but we'll work through them," with the goal of having the kinks worked out by the November general elections.

The biggest hurdle Tuesday appeared to be that poll workers at 365 of the more than 3,000 sites had trouble electronically transmitting final tabulations to the main elections office downtown. Officials stopped counting and ordered elections judges to bring ballots and memory cartridges to the office.

The judges started to arrive at 1 p.m. Wednesday. About 40 judges there received lengthy instructions on tabulating and, if necessary, recounting the ballots.

Cheryl Kawa, a veteran Democratic election judge, said: "It's reminding me of the day of the chads. It's overwhelming."

She wasn't disappointed in election officials or the system, though. "They're all human; they're doing the best they can."

Despite the problems, Leach was confident that all votes would be counted, and he pledged to get to the bottom of the problem. "We'll go back to every one of those 365 precincts and find out: Was it human error or was it mechanical error?" he said. "Not one voter was sent away, and not one voter was disenfranchised."

Proportion Of Doctors Giving Charity Care Declines (WP)

By Ceci Connolly

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

The proportion of U.S. physicians providing charity care has steadily declined over the past decade, even as the number of Americans without health insurance has risen significantly, a new study finds, suggesting that government health programs and clinics will face increased demand.

In 2004-2005, 68 percent of doctors said they delivered some free or discounted care to low-income patients, down from the 76 percent recorded 10 years earlier, according to a national survey being released today by the Center for Studying Health System Change. The center, a nonpartisan research group funded primarily by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation, noted that the number of uninsured people climbed to 45.5 million in 2004.

"One of the striking things about this is that the decrease is pretty much across the board," said lead author Peter J. Cunningham. Charity care declined regardless "of specialty, type of practice, size of practice or part of the country."

Overall, higher-paid specialists or doctors working in small private practices were more likely to provide charity care than internists, pediatricians or those employed by large managed-care companies, the survey found.

Nearly 80 percent of surgeons reported providing free care, largely because they spend more time in hospitals, which are required by law to treat indigent patients. Pediatricians, on the other hand, probably saw less demand for charity care because higher percentages of children receive care through government programs. Although the number of physicians providing charity care has remained stable, the proportion has fallen because there are many more doctors practicing medicine.

Less charity care in the doctor's office means more demands on hospital emergency rooms and more patients who simply go without care, said Cunningham, who oversaw the survey of 6,600 physicians. In a related study, the center found that a declining number of uninsured Americans received routine medical care. In 2003, 46 percent of people without health insurance had a regular doctor, down from 52 percent in 1996.

Busy schedules, reduced reimbursement rates and high medical-school debt appear to be contributing to the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0020442

"Physicians are still committed to charity care," said J. Edward Hill, president of the American Medical Association. "Time pressures for physicians have increased enormously, and there have been income drops."

At a time when insurers are clamping down on reimbursements, most young doctors carry an average medical-school debt of $119,000, he said. And although charity care has dipped, Hill, a family physician from Mississippi, stressed that "nearly 70 percent" of doctors still offer some.

Until recently, the nonprofit Family and Child Services Inc. of Washington relied on a network of volunteer doctors to provide free checkups to needy children heading to summer camp. But now, "that service just isn't available," said Charlotte L. McConnell, the group's executive director.

Time pressures and fear of lawsuits are the two most common reasons doctors give McConnell. "My sense is they have to do a certain volume to cover their expanding costs, especially in D.C. to cover [malpractice] insurance," she said.

In Texas, President Bush's home state, "volunteer charity care is nonexistent," said Sherry L. Hill, chief executive of the Community Health Centers of South Central Texas Inc. "It is the rare physician that will donate a day or an afternoon or morning."

Last year, 7,000 patients made 25,000 visits to the centers' clinics, more than triple the number served in 1999, she said. The clients, 70 percent of whom are uninsured, all work -- as farmers, ranchers, domestic help or gas station attendants.

At a dinner meeting with local doctors, Hill, who is not related to the AMA president, asked if anyone would volunteer to be a substitute when the center's staff physicians went on vacation. "I didn't get a taker in the group," she said.

The real problem, said the AMA's Hill, is the steadily rising number of people with little or no health insurance.

"The solution is fair coverage for all," he said. "We've got to wake up in this country and decide we're going to solve that problem."

Since taking office, Bush has added or expanded 865 federally funded community health centers, serving about 14.6 million patients this year, said Bill Hall, a spokesman for the Department of Health and Human Services.

"They've been expanding, but they are not universally available across the country," and most of the community health centers offer limited services, Cunningham said.

Who Will Make Baltimore Safe? (WP)

By Douglas M. Duncan

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Too often in Maryland politics we see jurisdictional squabbling and turf battles. We see fights between the Washington suburbs and the Baltimore region, or the Eastern Shore and Western Maryland. Such squabbles are not productive; in fact, they are roadblocks to progress. But one thing is clear: All residents of Maryland have a stake in our state's largest city. We cannot have a healthy Maryland until we have a healthy Baltimore. And when it comes to crime, Baltimore is not healthy.

In 2003 Baltimore was the second-most dangerous big city in America. Today it remains so. Per capita homicide rates have actually increased since 2000. Baltimore is six times as deadly as New York and three times as deadly as Los Angeles. In 2004 only three major cities reported increases in homicides: Detroit, St. Louis and Baltimore. While other cities have had historic declines in homicides and violent crime, Baltimore has not had similar success. And while there has been progress in the Inner Harbor, far too many neighborhoods are still racked with crime.

The mayor of Baltimore can't seem to crack the problem. He's on his fourth police commissioner, and the police department itself is dealing with a major scandal. The mayor openly spars with prosecutors when they need to be working together. And sadly, politics are being put ahead of people. The Baltimore Sun recently reported that the crime numbers being kept by the city may not be accurate. A WBAL-TV series in Baltimore revealed dramatic instances of crimes not being reported. Solid, sound information is the bedrock of crime fighting and prevention.

But instead of solutions, we're seeing political posturing. Mayor Martin O'Malley repeatedly refers to a 40 percent decline in violent crime. Independent experts say it may be more like 23 percent. While campaigning in Montgomery County, O'Malley claimed it was 50 percent. He labels calls for independent audits as political stunts. But somehow O'Malley's 1999 audit of crime -- conducted by consultants he hired -- is considered by the mayor to be above reproach. Some, however, question whether it was used to overstate the reduction in crime.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. is calling for an audit -- but only of five jurisdictions, which gives the appearance of politicization in an election year. While this is a step in the right direction, a statewide audit is the only way to get an accurate assessment of crime in Maryland.

Who's thinking about the people of Baltimore?

Given all the recent reports that have come out about the suspect crime numbers, several members of the General Assembly have introduced a bill for a comprehensive, independent audit of crime across the state, not just in five jurisdictions. I urge swift passage of this bill. The first step in solving a problem is assessing the problem.

I recently stood with Baltimore's top prosecutor and other leaders and released a comprehensive plan to reduce crime across the state. It calls for 1,000 more police officers on the streets, but that's just a start. It calls for more drug treatment and the expansion of currently successful drug courts. It calls for better pre-release services and expanding Operation Restart, which helps put people's lives back on track when they get out of jail. There are new laws to crack down on gangs and combat sexual predators. And, perhaps most important, the plan would commit resources to community crime task forces. These task forces would bring together law enforcement, community groups and other agencies in Maryland to target efforts in high-crime areas. Sometimes a housing agency can shut down a crack house faster than the police can. Or the health department can shut down a restaurant that is also a front for crime faster than the courts. By pooling community knowledge and efforts, we can improve communities faster.

It's a blueprint for the first step in achieving a healthy Baltimore, and a healthy Maryland.

Some have said I am engaged in "Baltimore bashing." They need to ask themselves who is doing the real disservice to the good people of Baltimore: those who talk honestly and openly about the problems and lay out strategies to solve them, or those who engage in constant political posturing and continue to describe rosy scenarios while people still live in fear?

I believe education is the long-term solution to reducing crime and improving the quality of life in Maryland. But families cannot be asked to wait for safer neighborhoods. Children deserve safe streets today.

The writer is Montgomery County executive and a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor of Maryland.

A Vision, Bruised And Dented (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, March 23, 2006

The big question in Democratic circles is, Who can win? The big question in Republican circles is, What do we believe? The setbacks in Iraq, the failure to limit the size of government and plummeting poll numbers have changed the way Republicans talk and govern.

If you wanted to put these changes in a nutshell, you'd say the Republicans have gone from soaring Bushian universalism to nervous, dumbed-down Huntingtonism.

Just over a year ago, Republicans were thrilling to the lofty sentiments of President Bush's second inaugural: that freedom is God's gift to humanity, that people everywhere hunger for liberty. To explain his efforts to democratize the Middle East, Bush hit all the high notes of the American creed, while not dwelling much on the intricacies and stubbornness of foreign cultures.

Today, many Republicans have lost patience with Bush's high-minded creedal statements. Like the Harvard political scientist Samuel Huntington, they have come to believe that culture matters most. Lofty notions about universal liberty splinter on the shoals of Arab customs. Heartfelt convictions about reducing the size of government disintegrate inside the culture of Washington. Many Republicans have lost faith in efforts to transform patterns of behavior, and come to believe that we shouldn't exaggerate how much we can change.

In the realm of foreign affairs, we have seen the rise of what Richard Lowry of National Review calls the " 'To Hell With Them' Hawks." These, Lowry writes, "are conservatives who are comfortable using force abroad, but have little patience for a deep entanglement with the Muslim world, which they consider unredeemable, or at least not worth the strenuous effort of trying to redeem." They look at car bombs and cartoon riots and wonder whether Islam is really a religion of peace. They look at the mayhem in the Middle East and just want to withdraw. After all, in his book "The Clash of Civilizations," Huntington didn't want to change the Muslim world — he just called for less contact with it.

In the field of immigration, Republican sentiment seems to be shifting away from the idea that the United States is a universal nation, where immigrants come from across the world to work, rise and join in the pursuit of happiness. Now Republican rhetoric emphasizes how alien immigrant culture is; how slowly the Mexicans assimilate, if at all; how much disorder and strain their presence creates.

There is a chance that in the next few weeks, the G.O.P. will walk off a cliff on the subject of immigration. In the desperate effort to win back their base, Republican senators may follow Bill Frist and embrace a draconian enforcement-only immigration bill (which will lose them Florida and the Southwest for a generation).

Finally, there is the issue of domestic poverty. Hurricane Katrina rekindled a brief resurgence of compassionate conservatism, at least for President Bush. But Republicans in Congress were having none of it. They appropriated the money they had to, but they had no confidence that the federal government could do anything effective to transform the culture of poverty: the out-of-wedlock births, the family breakdowns and so on.

In short, Republicans seem to have gone from believing that culture is nothing, to believing that culture is everything — from idealism to fatalism in the blink of an eye.

Recently, I've spilled a lot of ink stressing the importance of culture as we think about poverty, development and foreign affairs. But it's dismaying to see so many Republicans veer overboard into a vulgarized version of Huntingtonist cultural determinism.

European conservatives from Edmund Burke to Michael Oakeshott usefully remind us of the power of culture and tradition. But American conservatives — from Hamilton to Reagan — have never taken that path precisely because they believe in the power of the American creed, precisely because they have an Enlightenment faith in the power of reason to change minds.

Whether in Iraq or the barrio, history is not a prison. Culture shapes people, but cultures are changeable.

Fortunately, there is a great Republican leader who understood the balance between culture and creed: Abraham Lincoln. In this spring of Republican discontent, his approach and governing method will make a good subject for a future column.

INTERNATIONAL NEWS:

Rice Optimistic About Iran Diplomacy (AP)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, March 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed confidence Wednesday that Russia and China would eventually resolve their differences with the United States and its European allies on how to pressure Iran to stop enriching uranium.

"Sometimes diplomacy takes a little bit of time, but we're working very hard on that," Rice told reporters during a visit here.

The top U.S. diplomat said she is not worried about a delay in efforts at the United Nations to write a statement addressing Iran's disputed nuclear program. Russia and China's opposition to a tough statement stalled talks with high-level diplomats this week at the United Nations.

The intention all along, Rice said, was to come up with a vehicle to allow the international community "to speak strongly to Iran that it has no other course but to return to negotiations, suspend its programs and agree to a civil nuclear arrangement" that would alleviate possible risks of weaponization.

"We will come up with a vehicle, I am quite certain of that," she said. "We have work still to do. This is the natural course of diplomacy. If it takes a little longer, I'm not really concerned about that."

The United States, Britain and France have failed to get Russia and China to agree that the U.N. Security Council should approve a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog organization, the International Atomic Energy Agency, that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment efforts.

The process can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons. The United States and its European allies contend that Iran seeks the ability to make bombs. Iran insists its nuclear program is peaceful and is intended only for civilian energy production.

Russia and China strongly oppose language backed by the U.S. and Europeans that would call for a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA's demands. Russia and China want Iran to have more time and want the IAEA to keep the lead in pressuring Iran.

Rice spoke while in the Bahamas to meet with 14 foreign ministers and the secretary general of the Caribbean Community and Common Market, a regional trade bloc known as Caricom.

On the agenda were discussions of how the United States could work with the Caribbean countries to urge democratic change, enhance economies, strengthen security and improve disaster preparedness.

The brief Caribbean trip also was intended to alleviate friction between the Bush administration and Caribbean leaders over the ouster of former Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 2004.

"This is part of her effort to get this relationship back where it should be," said Tom Shannon, assistant secretary of state for the Western Hemisphere. "I think we're just about there."

Caribbean leaders have accused the United States of being an accomplice in Aristide's toppling. He fled Haiti amid a bloody rebellion and his supporters contend the United States forced him from office. The Bush administration says he left voluntarily.

DOJ_NMG_0020445

U.S. troops were sent to Haiti after Aristide's departure and remained there until U.N. peacekeepers were deployed. By the end of 2006, the United States will have provided $500 million in aid to Haiti over three years.

Caricom suspended Haiti's membership shortly after Aristide fled, refusing to recognize an interim government the group called unconstitutional.

Recently, the group has said Haiti will be allowed to rejoin if recent presidential and parliamentary elections are deemed free and fair.

Rice was urging the group to fully restore its relationship with Haiti and help stabilize the country as its new government tries to overcome two decades of democratic failure and widespread political violence.

U.S. officials say the group not only pulled away from Haiti over the past two years but also separated itself from international efforts to strengthen the Western Hemisphere's poorest country.

Aside from a previous visit to Haiti, the trip was Rice's first to the Caribbean as the top U.S. diplomat and the Bush administration considered it the next step toward a solid policy agenda between Caribbean countries and the United States.

Previously, Rice met with the Caribbean foreign ministers in June in Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., and again in September at the United Nations.

Nations Seek To Break Deadlock Over Iran (AP)

By Nick Wadhams

AP, March 22, 2006

U.N. Security Council members sought to break a deadlock over Iran's suspect nuclear program Wednesday after Britain and France could not get Russia and China to agree on how to pressure Tehran to stop enriching uranium, diplomats said.

Nonetheless, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she was confident that the council could come to an agreement.

"We will come up with a vehicle, I am quite certain of that," Rice said during a trip to the Bahamas. "We have work still to do. This is the natural course of diplomacy. If it takes a little longer, I'm not really concerned about that."

As Rice spoke, the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — convened at the U.S. mission to the U.N. but reported no new progress in formulating a council statement.

The lack of progress, which followed a decision to scrap full council discussions Tuesday, reflected just how much the United States and its European allies had failed to get Russia and China on board during a meeting of high-level diplomats in New York the night before.

One council diplomat described that meeting as a setback for British, French and American efforts to craft a tough council response to Iran, which the West believes is seeking nuclear weapons. Russia and China are firm in their belief that any Security Council action should be mild.

"We're trying to get back on track from where we were before last night's meetings," the diplomat said on condition of anonymity because the talks were confidential. "The Russians and the Chinese came in guns ablazing."

President Bush stressed that Iran should never be allowed to have a nuclear weapon, and said that diplomacy continued.

"We're dealing with this issue diplomatically by having the Germans and the French and the British send a clear message to the Iranians, with our strong backing, that you will not have the capacity to make a weapon, to know how to make a weapon," Bush told an audience in Wheeling, W. Va.

"Iran with a nuclear weapon is a threat and it's dangerous, and we must not let them have a weapon."

The United States and its European allies want the Security Council to approve a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

Iran insists its program is for generating electricity.

Diplomats said the Russians and Chinese have not budged from their opposition to tough language seeking a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA demands. Moscow and Beijing have said that is not enough time, with China suggesting 30-45 days.

Russia and China also want the IAEA to keep the main role in cajoling Iran on uranium enrichment. They have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

Monday's meeting had been intended to discuss broad strategy and a first council response. Britain, for example, has proposed offering Iran a package of unspecified incentives as a way of getting Russia and China to agree to the threat of tougher council measures later on.

But the sides made little headway, emerging only to express concern that Iran had not yet met IAEA demands.

The lack of any significant movement after 10 days could lead the Western nations to abandon the presidential statement, which requires the consensus of all 15 council members, in favor of a resolution, a council diplomat said on condition of anonymity because the issue had not been raised with members yet.

That would put Russia and China in the position of having to approve, abstain or veto action against Iran.

Negotiations between Iran and France, Germany and Britain, acting on behalf of the European Union, collapsed in August after Tehran rejected an incentives package offered in return for a permanent end to uranium enrichment.

Its subsequent moves to develop full-blown enrichment capabilities led the IAEA's 35-nation board to ask for Security Council involvement earlier this year.

White House Questions Iran's OK On Talks (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, March 22, 2006

The Bush administration questioned on Wednesday the motives of Iran's Supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei in approving U.S.-proposed talks on Iraq, but did not shut the door entirely.

"It is a matter of curious timing," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, suggesting Iran was trying to deflect international pressure from its nuclear programs now under criticial discussion at the United Nations.

While a "channel" for communication between the United States and Iran remains open, he said, no meetings have been scheduled.

Khamenei's statement on Tuesday was the first confirmation that he supports having talks. He also warned the United States must not try to "bully" Iran.

President Bush months ago initiated a diplomatic effort to hold talks with Iran over its activities in Iraq. The administration considers Iran meddlesome and accuses it of supporting insurgent militia with weapons.

When Iran last week signaled its willingess to talk, however, Bush's national security adviser, Steven J. Hadley, dismissed the overture as a play designed to divert pressure and attention from nuclear programs the United States and its European allies charge are designed to develop nuclear weapons.

In similar reaction on Wednesday, McCormack said: "I find it very interesting that the Iranian regime has chosen this particular time to seek to communicate with the United States government through this channel of communication, where this channel of communication has been open for some time."

The spokesman went on: "We think it has more to do with Iran's desire to decrease the pressure on the regime and to divert attention from the ongoing discussions about the topic of Iran's nuclear program that we're watching unfold up in New York.

"We think it has more to do with that and less to do with an actual desire to communicate with the United States government on issues concerning Iraq."

Most Americans Believe Iran Is Building A Nuclear Weapon (WSJ)

By The Wall Street Journal Online

The Wall Street Journal, March 23, 2006

A large majority of Americans believe Iran is using its uranium research program to build a nuclear weapon, according to a recent Harris Interactive poll.

About 85% of Americans say the U.S. "should be concerned" about Iran's nuclear research activities, according to the telephone survey of 2,435 U.S. adults. And 70% say they think Iran is using its research to build a nuclear weapon, the poll shows, while another 25% say they aren't sure.

The U.S. and its European allies are currently seeking a statement from the U.N. Security Council1 to reiterate demands by the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

But the poll shows Americans are mostly divided on whether the U.S. should have the backing of the U.N. in working to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons.

Nearly half of U.S. adults, or 47%, say the U.S. "should only act with support from the United Nations," while 38% say the U.S. "can act alone, but it would be better to have support from the United Nations."

Only 8% say the U.S. would be "perfectly justified to act alone."

Here are full results of the poll: "Recently Iran said it was going to restart its nuclear technology research. Do you think this should be a concern for the U.S. or not?"

Base: All adults * * * "Do you believe that Iran is using this research to try and build a nuclear weapon?"

Base: All adults * * * "In working to prevent Iran from building nuclear weapons, to what extent should the U.S. act alone, without support from the United Nations?"

Base: All adults

Methodology:

Harris Interactive conducted this online survey in the U.S., March 8-14, 2006, among a nationwide cross section of 2,435 adults. Figures for age, gender, race/ethnicity, education, income and region were weighted where necessary to align with population proportions. Propensity score weighting was also used to adjust for respondents' propensity to be online. In theory, with probability samples of this size, one can say with 95% certainty that the overall results have a sampling error of =/- 3 percentage points of what they would be if the entire U.S. adult population had been polled with complete accuracy. This online sample is not a probability sample.

Iranians In Fear Of Fear (WT)

By Nir Boms And Reza Bulorchi

The Washington Times, March 23, 2006

Following two decades of Tehran's lies and three years of international wishful thinking, Iran's nuclear case was finally brought to the hands of the U.N. Security Council. In the meantime the mullahcracy in Tehran has been gearing itself for another phase of international standoff.

On the same day Tehran declared "the Russian proposal is no longer on our agenda." the Sunday Telegraph reported that Iran has built a secret underground emergency command center in north Tehran as "they prepare for a confrontation with the West over their illicit nuclear program."

Hojatol-Islam Mohsen Gharavian, a disciple of the ultraconservative Ayatollah Mesbah Yazdi, was reported in February to have approved the use of atomic weapons against the "enemies of Islam." Meanwhile, the theocratic regime's shrinking loyal base is mobilized for staged rallies in front of European embassies and nuclear facilities to give an appearance of national legitimacy.

The mullahs' nuclear drive has no doubt enraged Iranians -- but for reasons far different from what the mullahs may admit.

For years, the mullahs have proven to be the biggest enemy of Iranians. The regime carried out summary executions of thousands of political prisoners in what is known as the 1988 massacre that followed a fatwa by Ayatollah Khomeini. Even pregnant prisoners were not spared. Last year, Mohammad Abbaspour, a member of the social committee of Iranian parliament, said "Today 90 percent of people are under the poverty line". The foreign debt has reached almost 30 percent of Iran's GDP. Thousands of Iranians have sold their kidneys to make the ends meet. Some families have even traded their young daughters to human traffickers. Iran's massive flux of rising oil income has only helped to finance a gigantic multi-faceted WMD program and a growing infrastructure of terror around the Middle East.
