The damage to Mr. Zenga's credibility was lasting, but the lawsuit continued. On Feb. 1, it was Mr. Zenga's turn to take testimony from Mr. Grey. Over three arduous days of questioning, Mr. Dovel challenged Mr. Grey on his own credentials as a movie producer, got him to acknowledge that he rarely investigated the backgrounds of those with whom he did business, and confronted him with an internal e-mail message in which Mr. Grey had appeared to acknowledge Mr. Zenga's partnership with Mr. Grey's company.

The deposition, which Mr. Grey's lawyers called "a calculated effort to bully" him, ended late on Feb. 5. The next day, prosecutors say, Mr. Pellicano had a police source illegally run background checks on Mr. Zenga and his brother, and on Feb. 13, had an accomplice at the phone company obtain information about Mr. Zenga.

Prosecutors say Mr. Pellicano also ran background checks on others in the Zenga case, including Mr. Dovel. They have not said when the wiretapping of Mr. Zenga's phone began, but Mr. Dovel was given notes, typewritten by Mr. Pellicano, of conversations beginning Feb. 14, 2001.

That day, Ms. Codikow, also represented by Mr. Dovel, was questioned under oath by Charles N. Shephard, a partner at Greenberg Glusker, who repeatedly asked where Hanover Square had done its banking. She said she had no idea. Minutes before her testimony was over, Mr. Shephard asked about another screenwriting competition called the Independent Filmmakers Program. She denied knowledge of it, then claimed she had only been one of its judges.

Mr. Dovel recalled that Ms. Codikow — who did not respond to a telephone message seeking comment — told him immediately afterward that she had lied, and had actually run the latter contest. Mr. Dovel said he urged her to tell the truth, but she refused. That night, Mr. Dovel said, he told Mr. Zenga of Ms. Codikow's admission, and how he would have to drop her as a client if she did not change her testimony.

Mr. Dovel then read aloud from Mr. Pellicano's summary of that conversation: "Bo does not trust Stacy and Greg may have to attack Stacy and if so, he can't represent her."

The rupture between Mr. Dovel and Ms. Codikow, discovered here by Mr. Pellicano, would soon come back to haunt Mr. Zenga.

Mr. Dovel said he and Mr. Zenga also discussed the questions about Hanover Square's bank account. The two men wondered aloud what bank records might show, Mr. Dovel said, and Mr. Zenga volunteered to begin the arduous process of getting old records from his bank.

As Mr. Zenga called his bank and said what he was looking for, Mr. Dovel said, Mr. Pellicano was monitoring his progress, as described in the investigator's summaries.

Mr. Dovel's partner, Julien A. Adams, asserted that through his eavesdropping, Mr. Pellicano had hit upon the key to tracking down the account. "If you sent out a subpoena through normal means, you wouldn't know how to ask for it," he said. "Because it was an old bank that had been bought by a new bank, at a branch that didn't exist anymore."

On Feb. 20, Mr. Grey's lawyers revealed that they had learned all they needed about Mr. Zenga's old account at the defunct branch of a bank that had since changed hands.

Also on Feb. 20, Mr. Dovel informed Ms. Codikow that he could no longer represent her. Six weeks later, Ms. Codikow, with a new lawyer, testified that Mr. Zenga was involved in the contest and that she lied about it only because he had pressured her to and she was afraid of him.

"When Pellicano came in, suddenly it was like a bomb exploded," Mr. Dovel said. "It was like they had access to everything. They were flipping witnesses. If they could take Stacy Codikow, a friend of Bo's, and next thing you know, she's openly lying — what else is he going to be able to accomplish?"

Pentagon Orders Investigation Of Cunningham's MZM Earmark (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Undersecretary of Defense Stephen A. Cambone has ordered an internal study of how funding earmarked in a bill by then-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) led to contracts for MZM Inc. to do work for the Pentagon's newest intelligence agency, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, a Defense Department spokesman said.

Cunningham pleaded guilty last November to tax evasion and taking bribes from contractors, including the former president of MZM, Mitchell J. Wade. Wade pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and to making illegal campaign contributions to Cunningham and other legislators.

In documents filed in Cunningham's case, prosecutors said that in fiscal 2003 legislation, the congressman, who was a member of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, set aside, or earmarked, $6.3 million for work to be done "to benefit" the Counterintelligence Field Activity (CIFA), created in 2002. Federal prosecutors have been looking into whether Pentagon personnel committed crimes in awarding CIFA contracts to MZM.

Cmdr. Greg Hicks, a Pentagon spokesman, confirmed yesterday that Cambone has ordered an internal inquiry. Hicks said he was "unable to comment on MZM contracts or related matters since they are the subject of ongoing investigations by the appropriate organizations in the department and the U.S. government."

Hicks added that Cambone's request to CIFA focused on the undersecretary's "desire to understand the temporal relationship between the congressional earmark and contract actions taken by the department."

Court documents show that in at least one case Wade drafted the language of an earmark that Cunningham submitted, which later led to a contract for MZM. Wade also hired the son of the Defense Department official who had authority over a contract later given MZM, the documents show.

Meanwhile, new information continues to emerge about MZM and its activities.

In 2004, three MZM employees served as staff consultants to the presidential commission investigating prewar Iraq intelligence, which was run by federal Judge Laurence H. Silberman and former senator Charles S. Robb (D-Va.). One of the three was retired Lt. Gen. James C. King, who then was a senior vice president of MZM for national security. King, who before joining MZM had been director of the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, played a consultant's role in the establishment of CIFA in 2002 before MZM received its first contracts from that agency.

The Silberman-Robb commission report in 2005 recommended that CIFA play a bigger role in the government's counterterrorism activities. In an interview, Silberman said King was not involved in the commission's recommendation that CIFA get more work. "That recommendation was not from King," Silberman said. And the other two MZM employees on the commission staff worked on FBI matters, not Pentagon issues, Silberman said.

Last year, MZM was purchased by the investment firm Veritas Capital, which changed its name to Athena Innovative Solutions Inc., with King as president. A spokesman for Athena said this month that neither King nor the company will comment on MZM or matters under investigation. The fact that MZM employees had worked with the commission has been written about on War and Piece and other Web logs.

Part Of Ex-Congressman's Ruined Life On Auction Block (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

RANCHO DOMINGUEZ, Calif., March 23 — In a final indignity after a stunning fall, pieces of the ruined life of former Representative Randy Cunningham were auctioned off in a government warehouse here on Thursday morning.

A pair of candlesticks, a dozen Oriental rugs, three mirrored armoires, a marble-topped commode and a cedar-lined lingerie cabinet, 35 items in all, went under the auctioneer's gavel. They brought the government $94,625, about two-thirds of the $150,000 that the military contractors who gave the items to Mr. Cunningham as bribes reportedly paid for them.

The items were lined up against the back wall of the chilly warehouse, forlorn and out of place. They had been intended to furnish the California mansion in Rancho Santa Fe, north of San Diego, that Mr. Cunningham's co-conspirators helped him buy in exchange for lucrative Pentagon contracts.

Mr. Cunningham, 64, a Republican who is known as Duke, forfeited the house and furnishings as part of the plea deal he struck with the government in November. He still owes the government $1.85 million — the estimated value of the cash bribes he received — and another $1.8 million in back taxes and penalties.

He also owes the United States the next eight years and four months of his life in federal prison, the harshest sentence ever meted out to a current or former member of Congress. He is at the low-security Federal Correctional Institution in Butner, N.C., for medical evaluation and permanent assignment to a federal prison cell.

It was a woeful end to the sordid tale of a former Navy fighter ace and "Top Gun" instructor who sold his office, his reputation and his honor for a house, a boat, a Rolls-Royce and the items on the auction block on Thursday. Mr. Cunningham disposed of the car and the boat before the government charged him.

Tino and Tatia Metzger, a husband-and-wife team of real estate agents from Temecula, Calif., came to the auction to bid on a 2001 Mercedes-Benz S500 seized by the government in a case unrelated to Mr. Cunningham's. They did not know until they arrived that the notorious congressman's extorted furnishings were also to be sold. The Metzgers bought the lingerie cabinet (said to date from the 1920's) for $2,300 and a king-size cherry wood sleigh bed for $1,750.

Mr. Metzger said he hoped the criminal provenance of the lingerie cabinet brings it added value, or at least cachet as a conversation piece. "Maybe I can resell it on eBay for twice what we paid," he said. "The bed we just liked, and we're going to keep it."

The proceeds of the auction will go to the Internal Revenue Service's criminal investigation division and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, two of the agencies that investigated Mr. Cunningham's crimes.

Britney Sheehan, a spokeswoman for EG&G Technical Services, which conducted the auction, said the company could not vouch for the authenticity or the condition of any of the Cunningham loot on sale. The auction catalog notes that a number of the pieces of furniture have missing handles, cracked marble tops, loose molding and other damage. Some of the rugs are stained.

The auction was held in a warehouse complex in Rancho Dominguez, about 20 miles south of downtown Los Angeles.

A number of pieces sold for less than the government had hoped to get for them, although reserve prices were not published in advance. Some pieces may have fetched more than they were worth, according to some participants.

For example, Emilio Viscomi of Dana Point, Calif., the most aggressive of the bidders, paid $10,000 for a blue-bordered 10-by-13-foot rug described in the catalog as a handmade antique from Iran.

But David Javaheri, a rug dealer at the auction, said the rug was a modern Chinese machine-made piece. "In Iran, a rug dealer would kiss your hand if you paid him $300 and then pay to ship it to you," Mr. Javaheri said. Another rug merchant, Avner Kadosh, said it was not such a bad piece and was worth maybe $3,000. "I buy and sell these things all the time," he said.

Turnout for the auction was relatively strong, Ms. Sheehan said, with more than 500 bidders registered by the 9 a.m. start. She said they were drawn not by the allure or quality of Mr. Cunningham's possessions, but by the 20 cars, the cases of Scotch, the bags of cultured pearls, the gold-crusted Rolex watch and the cartons of contraband cigarettes taken from tax cheats, drug dealers and import-export racketeers.

Prosecutors described Mr. Cunningham's crimes as "a numbing betrayal on an epic scale." His principal co-conspirator in the case, Mitchell Wade, a military contractor, pleaded guilty in federal court to a number of charges, including paying Mr. Cunningham $1 million in bribes.

Phillip L. B. Halpern, an assistant United States attorney who helped prosecute Mr. Cunningham, said the auction was one way the government was trying to collect his debt to society.

"We're trying to ensure that the U.S. taxpayer doesn't have to suffer a loss because of the congressman's crimes," Mr. Halpern said. "The government is attempting to disgorge all of the congressman's ill-gotten gains."

Underwhelming Turnout For Ill-Gotten Booty (LAT)

By Kelly-anne Suarez And Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

Randy "Duke" Cunningham has commanded public attention for the last year as he fell from a position of power in Congress to disgrace and federal prison after he admitted taking $2.4 million in bribes.

The fascination appears to be over.

The much-ballyhooed Internal Revenue Service auction of the contents of Cunningham's San Diego County home — acquired largely as the wages of corruption — drew little response this morning, despite heavy advance publicity.

Few among the hundreds of people who showed up at the regular IRS auction at a cavernous warehouse in Rancho Dominguez were aware that the infamous politician's belongings were available. But by the end of the auction this afternoon, all 34 pieces from Cunningham's home had sold, for a total of $94,625.

Among the assets Cunningham forfeited were antique sideboards and French armoires.

The first to go was a Gorham pair of silver candelabras, which sold for $2,000. The buyer declined to comment.

The top Cunningham item was a large oriental rug that went for $10,000. The least expensive were three rattan panels that fetched a total of $225.

A chest of drawers for lingerie brought $2,300, a lamp $850, a nightstand $650, and an armoire $2,750.

Robert Ro of Fullerton said he was not aware that Cunningham's furniture was on sale. He said he came for rugs, but might bid on some of the Cunningham household goods.

"I think he got a better deal when he got those bribes," Ro said. "But hopefully I can get as good, if not better, here."

Billy and Christy Abney came from Bakersfield with their 1-year-old son looking for a car. They were not aware of the Cunningham items, but Christy quickly focused on the former congressman's rugs.

"I have a bad feeling we might be walking away with one of these rugs instead of the car we came for," Billy lamented.

There was lively interest in some of the other items up for auction, such as the diamond-encrusted Rolex and Cartier wristwatches, the 3,988 heating pads, and 156 bottles of Glenfiddich scotch that were not part of the Cunningham loot.

There was a silver Mercedes-Benz up for bid (alas, the Ferrari Modena has been withdrawn).

The IRS splits the proceeds among the agencies that investigated the cases that led to the forfeitures.

This morning, so many media reporters were present that one auction aficionado said the prices were affected.

James Garofalo of Montebello, who described himself as a regular auction-goer, said he came for a brown leather couch from the Cunningham booty.

Garofalo said he had hoped to pay $300, but with all the hype, he was afraid the price would mushroom to more than $3,000.

"Don't the press have anything better to do with their time?" Garofalo groused.

Man Convicted In Gang Slaying In Annandale In 2002 (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

An Asian gang member who shot and killed a rival gang member in 2002, then fled to Canada for more than two years, was convicted yesterday of first-degree murder by a Fairfax County jury.

The jury then recommended that Henh Ngo, 22, of Springfield be sentenced to 26 years in prison -- 23 years for murder and three years for using a gun during a felony. Fairfax Circuit Court Judge Jane Marum Roush will sentence Ngo on May 25. Under Virginia law, she may not increase but could decrease the jury's recommended sentence.

Prosecutors told the jury that members of a gang called Asian Young and Dangerous, or AYD, jumped and pummeled two members of the gang Asian Dragon Family, or ADF, at Springfield Mall in mid-December 2002. One of the victims in that case was Ngo, then 19 years old and well-known in the gang community as "Phi Lu," or "Fat Guy," witnesses testified.

The Springfield Mall incident set the stage for a fatal confrontation outside the Happi Billiards & Cafe in Annandale on Dec. 27, 2002. Three members of AYD emerged from the pool hall about 10 p.m., two of them testified this week, and were eyed by members of ADF. The AYD members walked to their car and started to leave.

But the driver, Ngoc Quy Doan Nguyen, 21, stopped the car when he realized he'd left his glasses in the pool hall. While he darted inside, a man walked over and knocked on the car windows, trying to get the two passengers -- Phuc Nguyen and Hoan Le -- to speak to him. They ignored him, they testified.

Ngoc Nguyen then returned to the car. His friends said they watched as Henh Ngo walked around to the driver, asked if he were a member of AYD and fired one shot into Ngoc Nguyen's head. They said Ngo then fired two shots through the front windshield, missing them both, before fleeing.

The two young witnesses acknowledged that their first call was not to 911 but to another member of AYD, "Tiny." After calling police, they then notified another gang member while they waited for the police to arrive. Initially, one officer testified, Phuc Nguyen said he did not know who shot Ngoc Nguyen. The two are not related.

But once away from the crime scene, Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney John R. Murphy pointed out, both Phuc Nguyen and Le identified the shooter as Ngo, and both picked him out of photo lineups.

"They've always said 'Phi Lu' did it," Murphy told the jury, saying that they knew Ngo from previous encounters. "These two witnesses witnessed a horrible crime. They saw a young friend of theirs executed for revenge."

Ngo did not testify in his defense. He was arrested near Toronto in February 2005 by Canadian police, who said they were investigating him as a suspected drug dealer.

One of Ngo's attorneys, Peter D. Greenspun, said the actions of the two witnesses made it seem that they didn't really know who had killed their friend.

"You don't wait" to call police, Greenspun argued. "You don't call Tiny, you don't call Tony. You call 911 and you say, 'My friend was shot and it was Phi Lu. It was Phi Lu.' That's common sense."

The jury deliberated for about 5 1/2 hours before reaching its verdict.

Developer Corruption Probe Deepens (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

DOJ_NMG_0020903

The financial officer for one of the District's most prominent development companies has been indicted on conspiracy and federal tax-evasion charges.

The charges against John E. Brownell, chief financial officer for Douglas Development Corp., come months after federal authorities indicted company President Douglas Jemal and two other executives amid an investigation into corruption in the city's Office of Property Management.

Mr. Brownell's attorney, Barry Coburn, said yesterday his client disputes the indictment, which was filed Tuesday.

"We are very disappointed that the U.S. Attorney's Office has seen fit to indict Mr. Brownell, and we look forward to the opportunity to vindicate him at trial," he said.

The 18-page indictment states Mr. Brownell received "secret payments" from the company president and another individual at the company, identified only as "Conspirator A." Mr. Jemal is the company president.

Prosecutors said Mr. Brownell failed to file federal income-tax returns from 1994 to 1998 and that he evaded paying income taxes from 1998 to 2003.

According to the indictment, Mr. Brownell understated his income from Douglas Development, reporting standard wages and earnings but failing to report tens of thousands of dollars in income each year.

A U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman said yesterday the conspiracy and tax-evasion charges against Mr. Brownell each carry a maximum of five years in prison.

In October, Mr. Jemal, his son, Norman, and Douglas Development leasing official Blake Esherick pleaded not guilty to charges they gave a D.C. official $25,000 and gifts for favorable leasing deals with the city.

Michael Lorusso, former deputy in the D.C. Office of Property Management, pleaded guilty last year to bribery charges and has been cooperating with prosecutors.

Prosecutors said the bribes included $1,000 for two pairs of cowboy boots, hotel stays in Las Vegas and private box tickets to Washington Wizards and Washington Capitals games.

In exchange, Mr. Lorusso helped arrange for the District to lease properties from Douglas Development, officials said.

Douglas and Norman Jemal each face 40 years in prison, and Mr. Esherick faces 45 years if convicted, prosecutors have said.

Douglas Jemal said that he, his son and Mr. Esherick dispute the charges and look forward to going to trial.

Cardinals In Baltimore, D.C. Lobby Against Sex Abuse Bills (WP)

By Caryle Murphy

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Roman Catholic Church officials are putting a full-court press on Maryland legislators to reject bills that would extend the time allowed for victims of childhood sex abuse to file lawsuits against abusers and their employers.

Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of the Washington archdiocese and Cardinal William H. Keeler of the Baltimore archdiocese have gotten involved, expressing opposition to the bills to House Judiciary Committee members directly or through intermediaries. The archdioceses also have hired a prominent Annapolis lobbying firm, Schwartz & Metz, to supplement the efforts of the Maryland Catholic Conference, their regular lobbying arm.

"Almost everyone on the committee has acknowledged to me that the church has called them or called their ministers about the bill, and they are meeting with every member of the committee, including me," said Del. Pauline H. Menes (D-Prince George's), the bills' principal sponsor.

Del. Carol S. Petzold (D-Montgomery) described the church's lobbying as "just short of frantic. It appears to be a very high priority with them."

Some lawmakers also reported that Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan had conveyed to them the church's concerns.

Susan Gibbs, spokeswoman for the Washington archdiocese, said that the church's lobbying was not unusual and that "we are doing the same kinds of things we do with any bill" that affects the church.

Under Maryland law, lawsuits by childhood abuse victims can be filed until the victim is 25. The two bills would significantly ease that restriction. One would let victims file suit until they are 42; the other would open a two-year window during which victims of any age could sue.

Supporters say the bills are needed because victims typically do not report the abuse until they are in their thirties or forties. Church officials say it would be hard for defendants to present an adequate defense decades after an alleged incident, and they note that Maryland has no time limit on criminal charges against a child abuser.

Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), a co-sponsor of the bills, said he was contacted by a local rabbi who had received a call from Keeler about the legislation and was relaying the cardinal's concerns. Rosenberg said the rabbi, whom he declined to name, reported that the cardinal was upset that Jewish lawmakers were sponsoring the bills. Rosenberg and Menes are Jewish.

"To make a point of the religion of the sponsor of a bill . . . was beneath contempt," Rosenberg said he told the rabbi.

Keeler is in Rome, and his spokesman said Wednesday and yesterday that he could not be reached for comment.

Del. Luiz R.S. Simmons (D-Montgomery) said Duncan, who is running for governor, telephoned him recently to say that McCarrick was "very concerned about the bills."

Duncan spokesman David Weaver said that McCarrick had spoken about the legislation with Duncan, who is Catholic, but that the cardinal "did not ask Doug to make calls on his behalf."

Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley, also a candidate for governor, said that church officials "have made me aware of their concerns about this issue" but that neither he nor city officials have become involved.

Committee member Anthony G. Brown (D-Prince George's), who is Catholic, said he and his wife were invited by McCarrick to "a social call" at the cardinal's residence a couple of weeks ago. They discussed several matters, including the bills extending the statue of limitations, said Brown, who is O'Malley's running mate.

CIVIL LAW:

Two Groups Say School Districts Violated U.S. Law (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Two national groups promoting education reform have filed complaints against two California public-school systems, charging that they are violating federal law by not telling parents of children in failing schools about transfer options.

The joint complaints of the Alliance for School Choice and the Coalition on Urban Renewal and Education were filed yesterday against the Los Angeles Unified School District -- California's largest -- and the Compton Unified School District. Several families with children in failing schools in those districts joined in the complaints.

The groups say the districts are not complying with terms of the No Child Left Behind Act in that they are forcing many students to remain in low-performing schools for years and are not notifying parents that the federal law gives them the right to transfer their children to better-performing public schools.

Noting that the law calls for a cutoff of federal Title 1 education funds for school districts that do not provide students the opportunity to attend effective alternative schools, the organizations sent correspondence to U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings Wednesday, asking that she impose sanctions for noncompliance on both districts.

"The only possible sanction would be a cutoff of Title 1 funds, and that would be a very significant sanction," said Clint Bolick, president and general counsel of the Alliance for School Choice.

The groups concede that the problems that the students and parents are facing in the Los Angeles and Compton school systems are "the tip of a national iceberg."

Mr. Bolick cited a 2004 Government Accountability Office (GAO) report that found that more than 3 million children nationwide were eligible for public-school transfers under education law. But the report found that only about 30,000 students, or 1 percent, were transferred, he said. The law states that children are eligible for transfer to better schools after being in a failing school for two years.

What's more, Mr. Bolick said, the GAO report found that more than 1,000 schools nationwide "have failed for at least six years." Failure is measured by a school's inability to meet the academic standards of the state it is in.

Repeated attempts yesterday to reach Los Angeles and Compton school officials for comment were unsuccessful.

The Alliance for School Choice acknowledges, "In virtually every large urban school district, the number of children eligible for transfers to better-performing public schools exceeds the seats available in such schools."

"As a consequence, even though lack of capacity is no defense, many school districts evade their obligations, thus far with no consequences," as sanctions for noncompliance with the transfer provisions of the No Child Left Behind law "go unused," the group added.

Spellings Test (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0020905

The No Child Left Behind Act has taken its lumps from the education establishment, which loathes its testing and transparency measures. But the latest criticism of the law is more surprising, because it's coming from conservatives who are questioning the Bush Administration's commitment to enforcing its own law.

This week the Alliance for School Choice filed complaints against school districts in Los Angeles and Compton, California, where school officials have neglected to notify parents of their rights under NCLB. These districts have also failed to make transfer options available to kids in underperforming schools.

Under the 2001 law, schools that repeatedly fail to make "adequate yearly progress" as measured by state standards are required to give students the option to attend better schools within the district. To be sure, the California districts singled out in the filing aren't the only ones skirting the law. Similar violations have been reported in Baltimore, Chicago, Detroit, New York and elsewhere. A Government Accountability Office report from 2004 found that some three million children in 5,300 schools nationwide were eligible for choice under NCLB, but only about 1% were exercising the option.

Still, Los Angeles and Compton are among the worst cases of noncompliance, according to the Alliance, which filed the administrative actions with the school districts on behalf of several parents with children stuck in failing schools. In the 2003-04 school year less than two-tenths of one percent of eligible students in the Los Angeles Unified School District exercised their rights and actually transferred schools. In Compton, no students have received transfers.

"That only two out of every thousand families with children in failing schools would seek a better school for their children," says the complaint, "betrays the utter inadequacy of [the L.A. school district's] notification and explanation regarding school choice rights."

The complaint further alleges that these pitifully low transfer numbers are by design. While NCLB specifies when and how parents must be notified of their options, the school districts have deliberately dragged their feet and gone out of their way to confuse and discourage families. Tactics include, among other things, burying transfer notices in other material sent to homes; giving parents a very narrow time-frame -- say, a week -- in which to make up their mind; and forcing transfers to take place in the middle of a school year. This kind of obstructionism fits the pattern of public school officials around the country who are resisting every challenge to their control of school enrollments, curriculum and especially budgets.

The reason school districts have been able to get away with this behavior is that no one is holding their feet to the fire. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings has chosen to hand out exemptions or look the other way instead of enforcing the law. This benign neglect hurts most the very students that NCLB was designed to help. The GAO report found that 80% of children in failing schools were minority and 62% were low-income.

If the districts reject the Alliance complaints, they can be appealed to the state and then federal government. But Secretary Spellings needn't wait for that process and could take action against these recalcitrant districts and impose sanctions if necessary. Under the law, she has the authority to terminate federal funding and compel compliance but so far has been unwilling to use it.

Large urban school districts like the one in Los Angeles respond that the number of students eligible for transfer far exceeds the number of seats available in better schools within the district. But that's not an excuse for noncompliance; that's a reason to let students attend schools outside their public district, including charter schools and private schools.

School districts have little incentive to initiate these reforms on their own, especially when federal enforcement is an empty threat. And if the Bush Administration isn't going to use its funding leverage to ensure that all children have a shot at a decent education, then No Child Left Behind has become yet another illusory reform.

Youth Commission Asks Justice Department For Help (BROWNHER)

By ELIZABETH PIERSON, The Brownsville Herald

Brownsville (TX) Herald, March 24, 2006

AUSTIN — The Texas Youth Commission has asked the U.S. Department of Justice for help in assess-ing the way it reports and investigates abuse against youth in state juvenile prisons.

If TYC does not turn the tide of abuse, the state may face legal action, an American Civil Liberties Un-ion representative told a Texas House committee on Wednesday.

Dwight Harris, executive director of TYC, asked the Justice Department on Thursday for help, after a months-long investigation by Rio Grande Valley Freedom Newspapers about the seven-year trend of increasing abuse against youth.

Findings published in The Brownsville Herald on Sunday showed that by 2005, three of every 100 youth in the TYC were being abused physically, a seven-fold increase from 1999. Injuries by youth against officers increased 70 percent in five years.

Joy Anderson, chief of staff for TYC, said the request to the federal government was not spurred by any single event.

"It wasn't anything in particular," she said. "We just want to make sure that everything is being looked at. We think the more eyes, the more expertise that can look at the issues that are facing us, the better."

In simultaneous hearings on Wednesday, the House committees on juvenile justice and corrections heard from agency officials who said turnover and training problems are contributing to the abuse.

They also heard from juvenile correctional officers, who said agency policies give inmates the upper hand in the high-security facilities, and from parents of incarcerated youth, who said their children have been abused in the agency.

Many employees came from San Saba, the high-security facility in rural Central Texas where there was a 250 percent increase in injuries to staff members because of youth aggression from 2004 to 2005, worker's compensation records show. Youth abuse rates increased, too.

Juvenile Justice Chairman Rep. Harold Dutton, D-Houston, and many who testified cited findings of the Valley Freedom investigation when addressing the committee.

State Rep. Joaquin Castro, D-San Antonio, said he was particularly struck by findings that youth were taken out of view of security cameras before they were abused and that "minor infractions," such as a youth making a face, prompted an attack from an officer.

"I envision possibly a big bill coming out of this next session," Castro said after the hearing.

Many of the cases of abuse are similar to those that spurred by a years-long lawsuit against the TYC in the 1970s and dictated its current structure, said Lisa Graybill, legal director for ACLU of Texas.

It is too soon to say whether the state will face legal action, but the Legislature can prevent the possibil-ity by increasing staffing ratios and taking other actions to prevent abuse, she said.

"We're worried that, despite the good intentions of staff at TYC, the increase in the number of substan-tiated reports may indicate over time the kind of conditions that provoke that litigation," she said.

Harris' request to the DOJ went to its Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. He ex-pects to hear a response within a month, he said.

Judge Orders Federal Monitor To Fix Violations At Golden Grove (STS)

By Mat Probasco

St Thomas (VI) Source, March 24, 2006

March 23, 2006 -- A U.S. district judge found the V.I. government in contempt Thursday and ordered a federal monitor to fix "constitutional violations" at the Golden Grove prison in St. Croix.

Judge George W. Cannon Jr. said the Virgin Islands was in violation of a 1986 order to resolve unconstitutional medical, sanitation and safety conditions at the prison, where an inmate Tuesday was stabbed to death and five others were injured in a brawl.

In his 32-page order, Cannon wrote, "the court concludes that there are continuing and ongoing constitutional violations of the rights of individuals held at Golden Grove Adult Correctional Facility and Detention Center, and (the) defendants are in contempt of the court's orders."

Attorneys for the U.S. Justice Department asked Cannon to appoint the federal monitor, called a special master, to resolve lingering problems at the prison, calling conditions there "deplorable."

V.I. Attorney General Kerry Drue argued that the prison was improving and a special master was not needed.

Drue demoted then-Corrections Director Joseph Ponteen after he testified to myriad problems at the prison and described it as a "nightmare." Ponteen said he needed more money and 100 extra guards to improve conditions at the 600-inmate facility.

Neither Drue nor the U.S. Justice Department could be immediately reached for comment on Cannon's ruling.

The special master will report any violations at the prison to the court, where a judge may issue an order to fix them, Cannon said.

The U.S. and territorial governments have 20 days to submit names of five special master candidates. Cannon said they cannot be V.I. government employees.

Only a U.S. district judge can fire the special master, Cannon said.

A judge can dissolve the position if he or she thinks the territory is in compliance with the 1986 agreement and is capable of running the prison itself again.

"Substantial compliance means (the) defendants ... have consistently complied with this order ... and will continue to operate Golden Grove pursuant to this order ...," Cannon said.

He ordered the V.I. government to deposit $100,000 with the court to cover the special master's fees and expenses.

In a separate case, a federal judge in St. Thomas has twice found the V.I. government in contempt for failing to improve prison conditions as mandated by a settlement with the American Civil Liberties Union 11 years ago.

Those violations include imprisoning people found not guilty by reason of insanity or unfit to stand trial at Golden Grove or the Criminal Justice Complex in Charlotte Amalie.

Judge Won't Revive Colo. Title IX Lawsuit (AP)

By P. SOLOMON BANDA

AP, March 24, 2006

DENVER -- A federal judge rejected a request to revive the lawsuit at the heart of the University of Colorado recruiting scandal, saying Thursday that two women who claimed they were sexually assaulted by athletes had not proven their claim against the school was valid.

Attorneys for the women immediately promised an appeal.

The women have argued that the school violated federal Title IX gender equity law by fostering an atmosphere that led to their alleged assaults at a 2001 off-campus party. Police investigated but no sexual assault charges were filed.

U.S. District Judge Robert Blackburn tossed out the lawsuit a year ago, and said Thursday the women had not changed his mind after arguing there was new evidence showing coaches and trainers were aware of similar problems before the alleged assaults.

"There is much about the incidents evidenced in the record of this case that cries out for justice," the judge wrote. "There is no doubt that some of the harassment, abuse and assaults reflected in the record are shameful at best and criminal at worst.

"A cry for justice, however, does not mean that Title IX should be expanded to provide justice simply because the cry for justice has not been answered otherwise."

The women, Blackburn said, had not shown that Title IX would provide them "with the justice they seek."

The recruiting scandal dominated headlines in Colorado and beyond for months. Gov. Bill Owens at one point appointed the attorney general to lead a grand jury investigation, which resulted in an indictment against a former football recruiting aide for soliciting a prostitute and misusing a school cell phone.

A separate probe, backed by the CU Board of Regents, concluded that drugs, alcohol and sex were used to entice blue chip recruits to the Boulder campus but said none of the activity was knowingly sanctioned by university officials.

The school responded by overhauling oversight of the athletic department and putting some of the most stringent policies in place for any football recruiting program. The fallout included the resignation of university President Elizabeth Hoffman and the departure of athletic director Dick Tharp. Football coach Gary Barnett stepped down last fall.

Pat O'Rourke, an attorney for the university, said the school expected the decision.

"The university is very pleased with Judge Blackburn's ruling holding that the university is committed to a safe and non-discriminatory environment for all its students and faculty," he said.

Attorneys for the women said they would appeal.

"We agree with the court in its conclusion that this is a case that cries out for justice, and we disagree with the court that the evidence that has developed over the past several years should not provide relief to the plaintiffs," attorneys Seth Benezra and Kim Hult said.

Reporting Incidents Of Sex Harassment Gains More Respect (WP)

By Ray Rivera

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Midshipmen who report sexual harassment at the U.S. Naval Academy are increasingly viewed with respect by other midshipmen, and more students believe the campus provides a positive environment for women, a new survey shows.

Academy officials say the responses represent big leaps forward in how male and female students view academy culture. The results also come as reports of sexual assault at the academy have been increasing, in part because of an effort to encourage victims to report incidents, officials say.

About 3,000 midshipmen -- most of the sophomore, junior and senior classes -- responded to the academy's annual quality of life and values survey in October. Asked whether midshipmen at the Annapolis college who report sexual harassment are respected, resented or neither, 65 percent of women said "respected." Just 5 percent said "resented."

Two years ago, 66 percent of women checked "resented" to the same question.

Fifty-six percent of men also said "respected." It was the first time in at least the last five surveys, the only data available yesterday, in which the majority of both sexes answered positively.

Asked whether the Naval Academy provides a positive environment for women, 62 percent of men and 44 percent of women said they agreed, also higher percentages for both than in any of the last five surveys. Twenty percent of women and 12 percent of men disagreed. The rest marked "neither."

Academy officials say they are encouraged by the results but that more work needs to be done. Government studies have repeatedly criticized the school's culture as being hostile to women since it began accepting them in 1976.

Those issues were recently cast in the spotlight again in two court cases. In the first, Lt. Bryan D. Black, an academy instructor, is facing a special court-martial on suspicion of using sexually offensive language in front of male and female midshipmen.

The second case involves Lamar S. Owens Jr., last season's starting quarterback, who is accused of raping a female midshipman in her dorm room in January. Neither case has gone to trial.

No Charges In Shooting Of Unarmed Man (WP)

By Tom Jackman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The Fairfax County police officer who shot an unarmed man to death in January will not be charged with a crime, the county's chief prosecutor announced yesterday, and the man's family angrily responded by claiming that a civilian in the same situation would have been arrested.

From the start, Fairfax police declared that the killing of Salvatore J. Culosi, 37, was an accident and that the SWAT officer who fired had done so unintentionally. Fairfax Commonwealth's Attorney Robert F. Horan Jr. said that when a person fires a gun without malice and unintentionally kills someone, "they do not commit a crime."

"I feel for the family of the victim in this case," Horan said. "You have to. But I also feel for the police officer. This is a good police officer. Fine record, almost 17 years. He's as shattered by this as any good police officer should be."

The officer is Deval V. Bullock, 40, a longtime member of Fairfax's SWAT team, numerous sources familiar with the case said. Bullock declined to comment when contacted earlier this week.

"My son is lying in a cemetery," said Anita Culosi, the victim's mother. "His whole life was ahead of him. That man pulled a trigger and shot my son dead. I can't handle that. It's just pathetic that they don't find something wrong with what they did to my boy."

Bernard DiMuro, the Culosi family's attorney, said: "A pointed gun with a finger on the trigger is not an accident. There is no doubt that had the shooter not been a police officer, he would have been charged criminally, and a jury would have decided the issue." He said Horan could have charged the officer with second-degree murder or manslaughter.

The Culosis also questioned whether the police could fairly investigate themselves and whether Horan had received a complete investigation. The family sent a letter to the Fairfax Board of Supervisors asking it to review the case, and to review police policies on the use of force and the use of SWAT teams as well.

Police spokeswoman Mary Ann Jennings said police are continuing to review their policies on the use of force and also on the use of SWAT teams in serving search warrants. Horan said he thought the use of SWAT teams by Fairfax police was appropriate.

Police had been investigating whether Culosi, an optometrist with offices in Manassas and Warrenton, was a sports bookmaker. An undercover officer had been placing bets with Culosi for nearly four months and arrived outside Culosi's townhouse in the Fair Lakes area on Jan. 24 to collect $1,500 in winnings, Horan said.

Culosi was standing next to the officer's car, on the passenger side, when the officer gave the sign for two SWAT officers to move in. They headed toward the car, one to arrest Culosi and one to protect the undercover officer, Horan said.

One officer pulled up in a car behind the undercover officer's. "As the officer came out, he was bringing his weapon up," Horan said. "In the course of bringing his weapon up, it discharged. He has no real explanation how."

Horan said the officer shouted the word "police" at Culosi. "Right after "police,' " Horan said, "it went pow."

Horan said the officer was aware that he should not have had a finger on the trigger and that he should not have had his .45-caliber H&K handgun pointed at anyone. "As he says, you keep your finger straight," Horan said. "He felt his finger was straight . . . but obviously his finger is not straight up. His finger has to be on the trigger."

Horan said the officer's gun was tested and was not at fault. He said the gun had a standard trigger pull and was modified only to add a flashlight on the barrel, but the flashlight was not in use.

Horan's decision not to pursue criminal charges does not affect any civil lawsuit the family might file, and DiMuro said one is likely.

The officer, originally placed on leave with pay, returned to work in an administrative job a couple of days after the shooting, Jennings said. Police said they will resume an internal investigation of the officer; they were prevented from interviewing him while the criminal probe was pending.

Horan said the accident "could have been based on the number of hours the officer was awake that day." He said the officer had started working at 5 a.m., overseeing a managed deer hunt in the Great Falls area aimed at thinning the deer population. Horan said the officer went home at noon that day, then returned to work at 8 p.m. Culosi was shot at 9:35 p.m.

Culosi's family members said they were launching a Web site, http://www.justiceforsal.com , to provide friends and the public with information about the case. "We are not going to sit by and allow this to happen to another citizen of Fairfax County," said Salvatore J. Culosi, the victim's father. "Our family will never understand this. And we will never be the same."

Battles Escalate Over Gay Marriage (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Gay rights advocates are pushing to legalize same-sex marriage with an unprecedented wave of lawsuits in state courts, while those seeking to ban such unions are gaining ground in state legislatures.

The contrasting strategies reflect how judges have begun to show a willingness to expand the rights of same-sex couples at a time when many state lawmakers — and most Americans — are cool to the idea.

Several key developments are likely soon. The top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey have heard arguments brought by gay men and lesbians. Either court could open the door to a second state joining Massachusetts in allowing same-sex marriages.

Other lawsuits backed by the ACLU, Lambda Legal and other gay rights groups are wending their way through courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York. The groups want courts to declare that same-sex couples have a right to marry based on state constitutional protections for equality and due process of law. The groups also hope to win legal precedents that could influence the U.S. Supreme Court to endorse a constitutional right to same-sex unions nationwide.

Meanwhile, the Alliance for Marriage and other groups against same-sex marriage hope to win legislative ballot initiatives this year in Alabama, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. The measures would amend state constitutions to ban same-sex marriages.

Nineteen states have such bans. Most have been adopted since November 2003, when Massachusetts' highest state court said same-sex couples have a right to marry under state law. Massachusetts then became the first state to give marriage licenses to gay and lesbian couples.

The legislative moves against gay marriages aren't limited to the states. In June, the U.S. Senate is scheduled to begin debating a measure intended to lead to a U.S. constitutional amendment banning such marriages. The proposals in legislatures and in Congress partly reflect public-opinion polls, which for five years have indicated that about 60% of Americans oppose legalizing same-sex marriage.

The ACLU and others supporting same-sex marriages hope to turn public opinion by casting the ability to marry one's chosen partner as a basic right. They also are trying to tie their campaign with the efforts against bans on interracial marriage four decades ago.

A few judges, including Manhattan Judge Doris Ling-Cohan, have made such a link in backing same-sex marriages. Her ruling was reversed in December, however, by an appeals court that said the state has “a strong interest in fostering heterosexual marriage.”

Wave Of Lawsuits Targets Bans On Same-sex Marriage (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

WASHINGTON — Heather McDonnell and Carol Snyder of White Plains, N.Y., have been a couple for 16 years.

When Snyder was in the hospital for breast cancer surgery early in their relationship, McDonnell wanted to be at her side, just as a spouse would. And so McDonnell was — but only after she was first challenged by a nurse who did not think of her as family.

The episode, and others like it, prompted McDonnell, 52, an administrator at Sarah Lawrence College, and Snyder, a 61-year-old special education teacher, to join several other gay and lesbian couples in lawsuits challenging policies against same-sex marriages.

“There is nothing more universal in this country as saying you're married,” McDonnell says. “When you are at your most vulnerable … you need something like that.”

The lawsuits, sponsored by the American Civil Liberties Union and gay rights groups such as Lambda Legal, utilize carefully selected plaintiffs and locales. They argue that particular state constitutions contain a right to same-sex marriage.

The lawsuits were inspired largely by a 2003 ruling by Massachusetts' highest court that led to that state being the first to legalize such unions. David Buckel of Lambda Legal says the lawsuits are focused on states where public attitudes toward same-sex unions seem particularly friendly and where amending the state constitution to counter any ruling for same-sex marriage would be difficult.

Such lawsuits are awaiting rulings by the top state courts in Washington state and New Jersey. Similar lawsuits are making their way through state courts in California, Connecticut, Iowa, Maryland and New York. The lawsuits generally claim that the states' constitutions allow gay couples to marry on the same terms as heterosexuals.

The state-by-state approach is somewhat similar to the strategy gay rights groups used in recent years in a successful fight against laws that made sex between people of the same sex a crime.

However, before the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated such laws in 2003, many legislatures were lifting their bans on sodomy.

Gay marriage does not have that kind of legislative momentum. Nineteen states amended their constitutions to ban such marriages in recent years, and similar ballot initiatives will be before voters this year in seven other states.

Gay-marriage advocates are trying to link their effort with a 1967 U.S. Supreme Court ruling that rejected state bans on interracial marriages. A few state court judges have accepted that comparison.

"It was only less than 40 years ago that the U.S. Supreme Court held that anti-miscegenation statutes … violate the Constitution because they infringed on the freedom to marry a person of one's choice," Manhattan Judge Doris Ling-Cohan wrote last year. "Similarly, this court must so hold in the context of same-sex marriages."

Some courts that have rejected same-sex marriage have said the comparison to racial discrimination is inapt. In December, when a state appeals court in New York overruled Ling-Cohan's decision, it said the U.S. Supreme Court's ruling on interracial marriage arose from the "fundamental right to be free from racial discrimination" — and that there was no similar fundamental right to same-sex marriage.

That sentiment is in line with arguments made by groups that oppose such marriages. "The laws that once limited one's marriage partner on the basis of race were designed to build walls and keep blacks and whites apart," says Peter Sprigg of the Family Research Council. "But preserving the traditional definition of marriage brings men and women together."

Overall, the gay rights groups' strategy seeks to win state court rulings that could help change public attitudes and help prompt the U.S. Supreme Court to guarantee a right to gay marriage.

It's unclear how the court, under new Chief Justice John Roberts and with new Justice Samuel Alito, will view gay rights cases.

Critics of same-sex marriage, cite elected legislatures' moves against same-sex marriage while casting the current lawsuits as an attempt to make an end run around the will of the people.

"It's a race between these lawsuits and the (state constitutional) amendments" against same-sex marriage, says Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage. Daniels' group is backing the state initiatives against same-sex marriage as well as a measure in the U.S. Senate that calls for a constitutional ban on such unions.

William Hohengarten, a Washington, D.C., lawyer who was part of the team that argued successfully against anti-sodomy laws at the Supreme Court in 2003, says winning cases in state courts is key for groups backing same-sex marriage. "It's important to have a number of states where same-sex marriage becomes a way of life … to help change public attitudes."

American Muslims Are Gaining A Foothold In Politics (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

TEANECK, N.J. — The mayor of nearby Prospect Park is a 30-year-old high school business teacher with a young son. He was a volunteer firefighter at 18 and has been active in his community ever since. But when he sought the mayor's office last fall, voters received anonymous fliers calling him a "betrayer" tied to the 9/11 terrorists.

Why? Because he is a Syrian-born Muslim named Mohamed Khairullah.

"I was worried for my family," Khairullah says. "Any crazy person could have just driven by and done something. But we just had faith and went on doing what we had to do." The result: He got the job, open because the previous mayor had moved away, and now is running to keep it.

The 9/11 attacks have had a curious double-edged impact on the political emergence of American Muslims. They are up against more stereotyping and backlash, which they perceived recently in the furor over a Dubai company's thwarted plan to take over some port operations in several U.S. cities.

At the same time, the 9/11 attacks jolted Muslims into realizing that they needed to make themselves known to their neighbors and heard by their government. They are voting, running for office and getting more involved in civic and political life at every level, from PTAs and school boards to town councils and state legislatures. At least two — Texas Republicans Amir Omar and Ahmad Hassan — are running for U.S. Congress.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), which promotes Muslim political activity, has opened 23 of its 31 U.S. chapters since 9/11. In the 2004 election, two studies found, one in five Muslim voters were first-time voters.

"There was a silver lining. We became more public," says Aref Assaf, president of the New Jersey-based American Arab Forum.

This large-scale entry of Muslims into public life is not only testing the courage of Muslim candidates and the tolerance of voters. It's also prompting politicians to take notice of a community that has growing clout and is open to appeals from both parties.

American Muslims are hard to count. Many immigrants have Muslim names, but African-American Muslims often don't. For example, one of the highest-ranking Muslim officials in the country is North Carolina state Sen. Larry Shaw.

Based on tallies of mosque membership and Muslim names, several national organizations estimate there are 4.5 million to 6 million American Muslims. Most live in a dozen big states, giving them the potential to make a difference in tight races. Aslam Abdullah, editor of the weekly Muslim Observer newspaper, says there are about 15 close races for Congress in districts where Muslims are concentrated and could cast decisive votes.

Mosques, numbering more than 1,200 across the country, are "the grass-roots center of our political empowerment," Assaf says. They hold voter-registration drives and policy discussions. They invite candidates to speak, offering access to large crowds at Friday prayers.

Up to a third of American Muslims are African-Americans who vote mostly for Democrats. The rest come from Pakistan, India, Afghanistan, the Middle East and Africa. Many lived in dictatorships or theocracies and did not participate in politics in their homelands. "It is definitely a new idea," says Mohamed El Filali, outreach director of the Islamic Center of Passaic County in Paterson.

The immigrants are in tune with Republican conservatism on issues such as abortion, gay rights and religion, say analysts such as Georgetown University professor Zahid Bukhari. But they agree with Democrats on civil liberties and government social programs.

At this point, Muslims aren't firmly allied with either party. Bush won backing from Muslim leaders in 2000, before 9/11, and outperformed Democrat Al Gore among Muslim voters, polls and studies found. Four years later, dismayed by the Iraq invasion and what they saw as civil liberties abuses under the USA Patriot Act, the leaders endorsed Democrat John Kerry, and he won a majority of Muslim voters.

Sherine El-Abd, 60, an Egyptian immigrant and prominent Republican who lives in Clifton, N.J., personally tried to persuade a number of Muslims to switch back to Bush. It was, she admits, an uphill battle: "There were more that didn't go."

Analysts say the shift is likely to be temporary. "I wouldn't call it a realignment," CAIR research director Mohamed Nimer says. "What we've seen is just a one-time deal."

Muslims are comparable to Hispanics, a much larger swing voter group, in their diversity and their compatibility with positions of both parties. Analysts say they're also similar to Hispanics in that they are young and likely to wield increasing influence.

Mohamed Elibiary, president of the Freedom and Justice Foundation in Dallas, a statewide Muslim advocacy group, cites a 2002 Cornell University finding that 60% of the U.S. Muslim population is 30 or younger: "You have this huge bulge that over the next 10 years is going to mature politically" and be far more active.

His foundation gave that process a jump-start after 9/11. In June 2002, the group held a candidate forum at Texas Stadium, where the Dallas Cowboys play. It drew 7,000 Muslims and registered 2,000 new voters. "It was a reaction to … feeling like their loyalty to their country was being questioned," Elibiary says. "What could they do? Get politically engaged to prove how mainstream they are."

The ultimate form of involvement is running for office, and by that measure, Muslims are still recovering from 9/11. According to Hazem Kira of the California Civil Rights Alliance, in 2000 there was an "all-time high" of 700 candidates across the country. That plummeted to 70 in 2002 and rose to about 100 in 2004.

There are no statistics yet for 2006. Bukhari, co-director of a project called Muslims in the American Public Square, says grass-roots activity is pushing the trend upward. "Muslims are becoming more involved at the county and state level," he says. He says there are three Democrats running for county council and the state legislature in Montgomery County, Md., in suburban Washington, and "that never happened before."

Muslim immigrants who become candidates tend to be observant but not orthodox, and many have U.S. educations. “They are more Americanized,” Assaf says.

Of this year's candidates, at least one — Khairullah — is divorced. At least one is a woman: Democrat Ferial Masry, a teacher making her second run for the California State Assembly from suburban Los Angeles. In Saudi Arabia, where she was born, women cannot vote.

Like Masry, whose district leans Republican, Muslims often run as underdogs. The Dallas Morning News endorsed Omar, son of Iranian and Palestinian immigrants, over two rivals in his GOP congressional primary. If he wins a runoff April 11, he'll face a popular Democratic incumbent in a Democratic district.

Khairullah, a Democrat, was in his second term on the Prospect Park Borough Council when the mayor moved away. The flier that said Khairullah should not be living in “our clean town,” that contended he would “poison our thoughts” about America, did not stop his four fellow council members from picking him for the mayoral slot.

“They were disgusted by the letter,” Khairullah says. “I've been living in the community the longest out of all the council members. The entire community knows me.”

In the months before the 2000 election, Muslim leaders were worried about a law allowing the government to use secret evidence in immigration hearings. Leaders were ignored when they approached Gore, says Boston activist Tahir Ali, but Bush was accessible.

In the second presidential debate, Bush criticized the Secret Evidence Act as a form of racial profiling and said he supported repealing it “to make sure that Arab-Americans are treated with respect.”

El-Abd, watching at home, says she cried with happiness when she heard Bush acknowledge her community. Ali, author of a book on the Muslim vote, says “we had to go with him” because he seemed responsive to Muslim concerns.

The euphoria of having helped elect a winner quickly dissipated as Bush invaded Iraq and expanded the government's investigative powers under the Patriot Act. Some Muslims refused to get a library card or register to vote, scared of “anything that will put them on a list (that) is retrievable” by the FBI, says Abdul Waheed, 59, a Pakistani immigrant running for Teaneck City Council.

Others were more angry than fearful. Assaf says he was “a lifelong Republican” who voted for Bush in 2000. Now he accuses Bush of a “post-9/11 frenzied attack on Islam” and “purely anti-Arab, anti-Islam” policies.

Ali is also having buyer's remorse, mostly over a war many Muslims tried to avert with calls to contain or oust Saddam Hussein in ways that wouldn't be so hard on ordinary Iraqis. “I go to a lot of communities, (and) people say, ‘You are the reason we voted for Bush, and look at what happened,' ” Ali says. “I'm feeling ashamed.”

Elibiary stuck with Bush in 2004, mostly because he was lukewarm on Kerry. But he says Bush “is about as popular in the Muslim community as he is in the African-American community. Single digits.”

That remains true even as Muslims say Bush was right to defend a Dubai-controlled company's plan to take over some U.S. port operations. “The Arabs are coming, the Arabs are coming,” says Paterson councilman Aslon Goow, 47, a Syrian-American, mocking the uproar that killed the deal.

A self-described independent, Goow voted for Bush in 2000 and Kerry in 2004. When he ran for re-election to City Council in 2004, he said rumors spread that “because I was a Muslim, I was a terrorist.” He says that may be why he won with fewer votes than the first time.

Waheed, the Teaneck council hopeful, was doing business in a building across from the World Trade Center on 9/11. He saw bodies falling from the towers and escaped in a cab driven by a Sikh.

He'd had the same clients for decades; they knew he was Pakistani. A lot were friendly after 9/11, he says, but “there were a few customers who were not. You can sense certain things. Discomfort.” He sighs. “Islam is the most misunderstood religion, and Muslims are the most misunderstood people.”

Waheed says he is a Democrat, but “on certain issues, I have been in bed with the Republicans.” Collecting signatures for the May 9 town council election outside a supermarket, he talks to voters about education, business development, preserving green space. In his baseball cap, holding his clipboard, he could be any candidate anywhere.

“I am running because I am very conscious of the issues of the town,” he explains. “I am not running because I want to represent Muslims.”

Change In `undue Burden' Standard Could Shift Abortion Law (KRT)

By Stephen Henderson

Knight Ridder, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - The latest high-profile battle in the abortion wars may prove to be a sideshow to a monumental shift in abortion law that could take place this fall.

South Dakota legislators enacted a sweeping ban on abortion last month that will retest the strength of Roe v. Wade, the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision that overturned all state laws banning or restricting abortion. Other states are threatening to follow suit as anti-abortion activists flex what they think is new muscle: two new Supreme Court justices who are thought to be less sympathetic to abortion rights.

Legal experts say the courts almost certainly will strike down South Dakota's ban in short order. But this fall, when the Supreme Court considers the federal ban on late-term abortions, the justices could make it easier for state legislators to pass stringent restrictions on abortion without much fear that the courts might overturn them.

The high court could force those who challenge abortion restrictions to prove that restrictive laws prevent a significant number of women from getting abortions. Currently, the courts bar restrictions if it's plausible that they could impose burdens on women seeking abortions.

Such a ruling would validate many abortion laws that can't now survive court scrutiny, and in some states it would render abortion all but inaccessible to many women.

All this could happen without the court even touching on the core debate over abortion rights.

"Abortion restrictions could be revolutionarily increased without in any way overturning Roe v. Wade," said David Garrow, a professor at Cambridge University whose book on abortion, "Liberty and Sexuality," is considered one of the definitive accounts of how modern abortion law developed. "South Dakota is kindergarten simplistic by comparison, something the courts will just dispose of easily, and no one will be affected. This other issue would have real impact on women's ability to get abortions in states where the legislature doesn't want them to."

Jay Sekulow, the chief counsel to the American Center for Law and Justice in Washington, said the court seems primed to make a change, especially on matters as controversial as late-term abortions. His organization is representing several congressmen who want to preserve the late-term abortion ban. If the court changes the way abortion laws can be challenged, he said, "Increasingly, you'd see that legitimate restrictions would be enforced. It wouldn't be an all-or-nothing proposition."

The shift could happen if the justices endorse the thinking in a lower-court opinion in a partial-birth abortion case, which contains a little-noticed argument that the "undue burden" standard that the Supreme Court has imposed on all abortion laws has gotten out of control.

Now, the courts can strike down newly passed state abortion laws if a challenger can show that any part of the new law could place an "undue burden" on a substantial number of women.

Take, for example, a law that includes a requirement that teens get parental consent before getting abortions. A challenger can get the whole law struck down by arguing that it would make it too difficult for a small number of teens - such as those who are abused or estranged from their parents - to get abortions.

This interpretation of the "undue burden" standard has made it easier for proponents of abortion rights to get the courts to invalidate scores of abortion laws without having to prove they were unconstitutional.

The nation's other laws generally must be challenged according to far more exacting standards that essentially require challengers to show that there's no possibility that the law could be constitutional.

The different standard for abortion laws has long been controversial at the Supreme Court, in lower courts and in legislatures.

Erwin Chemerinsky, a law professor and constitutional expert at Duke University, said the court had good reason to treat abortion laws differently.

Think of a teenager who's pregnant and hemorrhaging, or a pregnant woman in an abusive relationship, he said. "Should they have to go to court to prove they face an undue burden from regulations that require consent?" Chemerinsky asked. "The court is particularly concerned about small numbers of women being affected. They weren't concerned about proving the exact number to get a law enjoined."

A lower-court opinion in a late-term abortion case, however, has opened the door for the high court to reconsider its position.

Chief Judge John M. Walker Jr. of the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals in New York addressed the different standards applied to abortion laws and explained why he thinks they should be changed.

"I can think of no other field of law that has been subject to such sweeping constitutionalization as the field of abortion," Walker wrote. The high court's decisions, he said, have made legislators "all but foreclosed from setting policy regulating the practice; instead, federal courts must give their constitutional blessing to nearly every increment of social regulation that touches upon abortion."

Abortion laws are struck down "based upon a speculative showing" that they might be unconstitutional, Walker said, and the justices have given unclear directions to lower courts in several abortion cases. He invited the high court to reconsider the matter.

That invitation may appeal to the high court's newest members, Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito. Both are believed to be personally opposed to abortion, and both penned memos while working in the Reagan Justice Department urging legal strategies to curb abortions.

But both also have strong records as judges who respect established court precedents, and both suggested at their confirmation hearings that their votes would pose no immediate threat to established abortion laws.

Walker's opinion, however, offers a lawyerly, nonideological approach that could produce a fundamental change in abortion law without directly confronting established rulings. Indeed, Walker's misgivings about how the current scheme weakens legislators echo language that Roberts and Alito used in their Reagan-era memos.

Walker's opinion also may appeal to Justice Anthony Kennedy, who decried the different standards for abortion laws in a 2000 opinion on a Nebraska ban on late-term abortions.

Kennedy has voted to preserve core abortion rights but also has backed a broad array of state restrictions, including the Nebraska ban.

He lost that case because Justice Sandra Day O'Connor provided the winning vote to the opposite side. With O'Connor gone, Kennedy becomes the swing vote on the issue, and he could be attracted to a solution like Walker's, which retreats from the status quo without attacking core abortion rights.

Such a move also would dovetail nicely with a high court decision earlier this term that instructed a lower court to reconsider how to handle a challenge to a New Hampshire abortion restriction. The lower court had struck down the entire law using the lower standards that have applied to abortion laws.

"We had Kennedy on our side then, and I assume we have him now, but it's true that they have to find a way to get there, and this might be that way," said Sekulow of the American Center for Law and Justice. He'll file a brief urging the Supreme Court to uphold the federal late-term abortion ban, and he said that Walker's opinion could influence his efforts.

"That's one of the arguments we're looking closely at," he said.

Chief In Md. Urges Close Of Internet Police Forum (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Montgomery County Police Chief J. Thomas Manger called on the department's union yesterday to take down an online message board that some police officers have used as a forum for disparaging, and sometimes racist, remarks about colleagues, supervisors, immigrants and other members of the community.

The union said it would not shut down the board, saying that it serves a legitimate purpose and that doing so would curtail officers' right to free speech.

The offensive messages were roundly condemned by county officials and community leaders.

"Let me be very clear. There is no place in our police department . . . for racism, bigotry and hatred," County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) said. "As public servants, we not only take an oath to uphold the law, but we have a moral obligation to guarantee that the law is applied equally and fairly to everyone in our community."

Duncan said that if the union doesn't disable the message board, access to the site will be restricted from county workplaces.

Some of the messages, copies of which were published in The Washington Post yesterday, refer to Latino immigrants as "beaners." Others make sexual references to female officers and disparage some officers as "racists."

Margo Pave, an attorney for the Montgomery County Fraternal Order of Police, defended the message board and criticized the county's request that it be shut down.

"Certainly, if he wishes to approach us to talk about this, we can," she said, referring to Manger. "I don't think the proper channel for this discussion is through the press. They have our phone number. They can call."

Pave said the excerpts provided to The Post do not reflect the "bread and butter" of the discussions on the board, which she said has given officers, emboldened by anonymity, an opportunity to challenge their leaders and departmental policy.

"We neither censor or endorse what is on there," she said. She criticized the county's threat to block access to the site from county computers, saying that if Duncan "has that dim an opinion of free speech, I guess that's where he stands."

Manger did not respond to an interview request yesterday.

In a brief e-mail, he said yesterday's Post article misled readers because it "did not make it clear, whatsoever, that this is a private chat room, owned and operated by a private business. The reaction from the community demonstrated that they are left with the impression that the Police Dept. is the responsible organization."

Several community leaders and officers said yesterday that although they understand the department has no direct control over the board and its content, the command staff has largely ignored concerns about the messages.

Detective Terry Ridgley, president of the black officers association, said he met with Manger to bring the issue to his attention several months ago. He said Manger was attentive and seemed concerned but didn't ask to see the messages.

Portions of the messages from the password-protected forum -- which may be accessed only by union members -- were turned over to police internal affairs investigators in at least two instances, said Lt. Eric Burnett, a police spokesman. He said he could not disclose the outcome of those cases.

"I heard from a lot of officers who are happy that this finally came out," Ridgley said. He stressed that he doesn't think the offensive messages reflect the values and professionalism of the majority of officers. Many of them feel the vitriolic content has harmed morale and strained trust among officers, Ridgley said.

County Council member Phil Andrews (D-Gaithersburg-Rockville), who heads the council's public safety panel, called on the union to "begin policing themselves. Otherwise the despicable comments will tarnish the reputation of an excellent department."

Black and Latino leaders said they will schedule meetings with Manger to discuss the message board because they say he is responsible for the conduct of the county's officers.

"I'm flabbergasted," said Del. Ana Sol Gutierrez (D-Montgomery). "If there is one agency where Montgomery County cannot tolerate one iota of racism and xenophobia, it is our police department. Chief Manger must take immediate action to remove any police officer who hides behind the anonymity of the Internet to attack the immigrants, the minorities and women they are hired to protect."

Henry Hailstock, president of the Montgomery chapter of the NAACP, said he has met with at least 15 officers who approached him with concerns about some of the board's content. He said he holds Manger primarily responsible for what he described as a lackluster internal response to officers' concerns.

"He is the leader," Hailstock said. "There are some things management can do to let officers responsible for this know that it is not going to be tolerated and that if they're found doing this, they are going to be disciplined."

Kim Propeak, a spokeswoman for Casa of Maryland Inc., a group that has worked with the department to build trust between officers and the county's immigrants, said she is disheartened.

"I read that story, and I thought: We've just been set back 20 years," Propeak said. "I was outraged. I couldn't finish eating breakfast."

Hennessee, A Woman-Led Fund, Is Hit With Pregnancy-Bias Suit (WSJ)

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

NEW YORK -- E. Lee Hennessee became one of the most prominent women in the hedge-fund business, building a booming firm counseling rich clients. But how woman-friendly is her firm?

The question was raised by a former employee in a lawsuit filed Wednesday in New York state court against Ms. Hennessee; her husband, Charles Gradante; and their firm, Hennessee Group LLC.

Leeana Piscopo, a 29-year-old former senior vice president, claims that she was fired in January after revealing she was pregnant. The father: Hennessee's public-relations manager, Alex Smith-Ryland, who is also 29.

The lawsuit was the latest of many pregnancy-related cases against employers. The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, along with state and local agencies, last year received 4,449 complaints from employees complaining of bias after pregnancy -- a jump of 31% from 1992. Last year, EEOC reaped $11.6 million in rewards in pregnancy-related cases. One reason, says the agency: Women are increasingly attempting to juggle career and family at the same time that companies are increasing workloads.

Ms. Piscopo, who joined Hennessee seven years ago, shortly after graduating from Manhattan College, says she told Mr. Gradante in early December that she was pregnant. He asked to see a doctor's note and changed her flexible schedule, according to Ms. Piscopo, who was the chief rules-compliance officer.

Mr. Gradante calls the charge "ridiculous" and said the company "bent over backward" to accommodate Ms. Piscopo.

"Lee Hennessee has been a role model for women on Wall Street," said Louis Pechman, an attorney for Hennessee Group. "The suggestion that she or Charles Gradante discriminated against Leeana is ridiculous. In fact, the evidence will show that she was treated very well during their seven-year relationship."

Ms. Piscopo claims that Ms. Hennessee screamed that one of the prospective parents had to leave the firm. Ms. Piscopo says she volunteered, because Mr. Smith-Ryland, an Australian citizen, could be deported if he lost his job.

Ms. Piscopo earned $100,000 a year, plus an annual bonus of 1.5% of the company's equity. Last year, that bonus would have been $22,000, but she says she didn't get it. Ms. Piscopo's attorney, Saul Zabell, says they are seeking "hundreds of thousands" in damages.

Court Nixes Stolt-Nielsen Injunction (AP)

Trading of Stolt-Nielsen Halted After Appeals Court Undoes Injunction Against Indictment

NEW YORK (AP) -- Trading of Stolt-Nielsen SA's shares was halted Thursday, after a federal appeals court reversed a lower court injunction blocking the Department of Justice from indicting the chemical transportation company and its officials for alleged antitrust violations.

The injunction stopping the Department of Justice from prosecuting Stolt-Nielsen -- a company that cooperated with the government in criminal antitrust prosecutions in the international carrier industry -- was issued by a District Court judge in January 2005.

That injunction came after a decision by the Department of Justice to kick Stolt-Nielsen out of the government's Corporate Leniency Program for allegedly continuing illegal anticompetitive activity longer than it admitted.

The two-judge panel of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals said that the District Court did not have the authority to enforce an amnesty agreement before an indictment. The appeals court remanded the case back to the lower court and did not address the merits of the company's amnesty defense.

Stolt-Nielsen said it plans to file a petition for a rehearing.

Before being halted in afternoon trading, shares were down 86 cents, or 2.6 percent, to $32.40 on the Nasdaq. After trading resumed, shares were down $1.80 or 5.4 percent at $31.46. The stock has traded between $29.92 and $41.50 over the past year.

Bayer Joins Race To Build German Drug Titan (WSJ)

By Jeanne Whalen And Jason Singer and mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Bayer AG's friendly bid for fellow German drug maker Schering AG, which tops a hostile bid by Merck KGaA, is aimed at creating a pharmaceutical giant capable of competing with U.S. and European rivals, which have eclipsed Germany's once-mighty drug industry.

Schering said its executive board backed Bayer's offer, valued at €16.34 billion ($19.73 billion), making it unlikely another bidder will emerge. If approved by Schering's shareholders, the two companies plan to combine their prescription-drug businesses into a new firm called Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals with anticipated sales of more than €9 billion a year and headquarters in Berlin. (See Schering statement.)

Bayer said it plans to cut 6,000 jobs, or 10% of the work force of the combined operations. "Bayer Healthcare and Schering have a combined work force of around 60,000 people," Bayer Chief Executive Werner Wenning told a telephone press conference Friday. "During the restructuring, of the combined businesses, there will be job cuts of around 6,000 employees in the upcoming years," he added.

Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals' revenue would exceed that of Schering-Plough Corp. of the U.S., which is unrelated to the German Schering. Bayer also has a large over-the-counter drug business and, including Schering's prescription drug operations, Bayer would become one of the world's biggest drug makers.

"We are convinced that merging the two companies will create a health-care heavyweight of international standing," Bayer's Mr. Wenning said in a statement late Thursday. "It is also the best way of reasserting the importance of Germany as a pharmaceutical industry base."

A successful bid from Bayer would leave Germany's Merck in a difficult position. The company had been hoping to bulk up its business to better compete in the global marketplace. Jon Baumhauer, a 62-year-old member of the Merck family and its chief representative, told journalists on the sidelines of a recent Merck news conference that Schering has always been Merck's "dream target" for expansion.

Bayer's offer of €86 a share, a 12% premium to Merck's, combined with "several other important commitments, is a good offer," said Hubertus Erlen, chairman of Schering's executive board. In Frankfurt Thursday, Schering's shares closed at €84.97, after rising 2.4% on speculation about a Bayer bid. Bayer's shares rose almost 3% to €34.75. In early trading Friday, Schering surged 4.7% to €89.00, while Bayer was up 1% at €35.10 on the Frankfurt exchange. Merck, meanwhile, was down just over 2% at €78.83.

"After intensive discussion, the management board has come to the assessment that, in view of this offer, it is probably impossible for Schering to maintain its independence," Mr. Erlen said. He said the combination would "together form an even more internationally competitive company."

Germany was one of the birthplaces of the drug industry. Bayer, the inventor of tablet aspirin, traces its roots back to 1863 and Berlin-based Schering says it was founded in 1851. But both Merck and Schering lost their U.S. operations after the two World Wars, leading to the formation of Merck of the U.S. and Schering-Plough.

Germany remains home to several midsize drug companies. But the country's stature has diminished in recent decades as consolidation has created a handful of drug giants in the U.S., United Kingdom, Switzerland and France.

Bayer had total sales of €27.4 billion last year and net profit of €1.6 billion. Schering's sales last year rose 7% to €5.3 billion, while net profit rose 23% to €619 million.

Merck's hostile bid for its German rival, made last week, has enabled Bayer to play a white-knight role. Schering's board last week rejected Merck's bid of €77 a share, or €14.6 billion, as too low. Merck couldn't be reached for comment.

Bayer first approached Schering shortly after Merck made its March 13 offer, Klaus Kuhn, Bayer's chief financial officer, said in a telephone interview. Schering management would take a big role in running the combined pharmaceuticals division, giving them more clout -- and more jobs -- than would have been the case if Merck had acquired Schering, people familiar with the matter said. Still, if the deal goes through, Mr. Kuhn said he expects job cuts of around 6,000 people, or 10% of the combined firm's work force.

Bayer said it expects to achieve cost savings of €700 million annually after three years, 40% more than the annual €500 million Merck projected to save annually by 2009. But Bayer added that the savings will be damped by a €1 billion charge to cover restructuring costs.

Bayer of Leverkusen, Germany, is a big seller of over-the-counter medicines, including Aleve, Bayer aspirin and Alka-Seltzer. Its prescription-drug business is smaller, including Baypress for high blood pressure, Nexavar for renal-cell cancer and the anti-infectives Avalox and Cipro. Buying Schering would bolster Bayer's prescription-drug business, giving it access to contraceptives and a big-selling multiple-sclerosis drug.

Bayer's reputation and profit took a big hit in 2001 when the company was forced to recall its cholesterol drug Baycol after the drug was linked to dozens of deaths in the U.S. Bayer subsequently fought a costly legal battle with U.S. consumers.

Soon after the Baycol debacle the company undertook an extensive restructuring, splitting off part of its chemicals and plastics business and focusing operations on health care; pesticides and seeds; and material science, which includes polyurethanes.

Schering Gets Bid From Bayer (NYT)

By Mark Landler

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

In a bid that could help partly restore Germany's historic prominence in the pharmaceutical industry, the drug and chemical giant Bayer yesterday announced a nearly $20 billion offer for its smaller rival, Schering, topping a $17.9 billion offer by Merck of Germany.

Bayer, a 143-year-old company best known as the inventor of aspirin, said it would pay 86 euros ($103) a share in cash for Schering, which last week rebuffed an offer of 77 euros ($92) a share by Merck. Schering and Merck are German companies not related to the American drug giants Schering-Plough and Merck & Company.

Schering, based in Berlin, said it would recommend the offer to its shareholders, an indication that Bayer was likely to complete the takeover unless Merck raised its bid or yet another suitor entered the fray. An executive close to Merck said it would assess the offer before deciding how to respond.

For Bayer, the deal is a striking return to its roots. Bayer has struggled in drugs since the recall of its anticholesterol treatment Baycol over safety concerns in 2001, and it tried fruitlessly a few years ago to find a partner for its troubled pharmaceutical business.

Although health care products now account for less than 40 percent of Bayer's annual revenues, which were about $30.5 billion last year, the Schering acquisition could make health care the largest part of Bayer, with projected sales of $18 billion a year.

Bayer's biggest business now is producing polyurethane, polycarbonates and other manufacturing materials, which accounted for about $13 billion in sales last year.

"We have for some time believed that Schering was the ideal partner for moving into specialty pharmaceuticals," Arthur Higgins, the chief executive of Bayer's health care division, said in a telephone interview. "We have two excellent German companies coming together."

Shares of Bayer rose 1.4 percent in Frankfurt yesterday, after rumors of an offer swirled through the market. That suggested that investors would welcome the combination, which would create the world's 12th- largest pharmaceutical company, and a top 10 producer of specialty drugs.

Schering is the world leader in oral contraceptives and also specializes in cancer drugs, while Bayer has recently focused its pharmaceutical research on cancer and cardiovascular drugs.

In New York, where news of the deal began circulating in midafternoon, Schering's American depository receipts rose nearly 7 percent, to close at $107.20. But Bayer's A.D.R.'s, while ending regular trading up 1.4 percent, to close at $41.69, fell nearly 3 percent in the after-hours market, as investors had time to digest the agreement's details.

Germany's fragmented drug industry is viewed as ripe for consolidation, having missed out on the wave of mergers that created global goliaths like GlaxoSmithKline, Sanofi-Aventis and Pfizer. Bayer, though Germany's largest pharmaceutical company, ranks only 16th globally.

Analysts had predicted a rival bid for Schering after Merck's unsolicited offer last week put the company into play. But few focused on Bayer, speculating instead about the Swiss drug giant Novartis.

Even now, some analysts question the logic of combining a drug specialist like Schering, with Bayer, a conglomerate that sells products as diverse as Alka-Seltzer and One-a-Day vitamins and agricultural chemicals.

"The only overlap they have is in oncology," said Andreas Burckhardt, a drug industry analyst at WestLB. "To justify such a higher bid, they're going to have to make more people redundant than Merck," he said, referring to job cuts.

Bayer said the merger could result in about 6,000 jobs being eliminated, roughly 10 percent of the combined work force. The company, which is based in the Rhine River town of Leverkusen, estimates it will reap 700 million euros ($837 million) in annual savings from the merger by 2009. Among the areas in which a Bayer-Schering combination would be valuable, Mr. Higgins said, was in the marketing of cancer drugs. Bayer recently introduced a kidney cancer drug in Britain, and expected to receive approval to sell it in the United States later this year. Schering has an established sales force for its portfolio of cancer drugs, which Bayer could exploit.

Bayer said it would finance the offer with existing cash and a line of bank credit. It would refinance that with equity, bonds and proceeds from the sale of two chemical units. The bid values Schering at 2.8 times sales and 11.6 times projected 2006 operating income.

"These are reasonable numbers for a pharma transaction," said Klaus Kühn, the chief financial officer of Bayer. "From a financial point of view, it makes sense."

Bayer has been overhauling itself more or less continually over the last several years. In 2004, it bought the over-the-counter drug business of Roche, signaling its intent to focus on health care. Last year, it spun off most of its chemicals business in a new publicly listed company, Lanxess.

To make this deal palatable to Schering employees and local politicians, Bayer said it would base its pharmaceutical division in Berlin, Schering's hometown. But Bayer will maintain its corporate headquarters in Leverkusen.

In a statement issued late yesterday, the chairman of Schering, Hubertus Erlen, said: "Both business are complementary and follow the same strategy. Together they will be even more competitive."

In an interview on Monday, however, Mr. Erlen had disputed the argument that Schering, as a specialty drug company with its own global sales force, would benefit by merging with a competitor.

"There are pharma markets where size and muscle is decisive," he said, "but this is different. This is going to highly specialized doctors. It is not a question of marketing muscle. It is a question of being the expert in that field."

Schering may also face hard questions from its employees, who rallied against the Merck bid on Tuesday. They said they favored staying independent, citing the prospect of job cuts as a danger in a takeover.

Bayer In $20bn Agreed Bid For Schering (FT)

By Lina Saigol And Gerrit Weismann

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Bayer, the German pharmaceuticals and chemicals company, on Thursday night made an agreed €16.3bn all cash bid for Schering, thwarting a rival hostile offer of €14.6bn from Merck.

The deal would cement Bayer's dominant position as the most powerful German drugs company, but would leave family-controlled Merck and Altana struggling with weak product pipelines.

The maker of aspirin is understood to have approached Schering with a friendly "white knight" bid just days after Merck made its hostile bid, according to people close to the situation.

Merck launched a €77-a-share unsolicited offer for Schering on March 14, which valued its Berlin-based rival at €14.6bn. Shares in Schering rose 2.37 per cent to €84.97 on Thursday. Bayer's bid is for €86 a share.

Schering immediately rejected the bid as too low and hired Morgan Stanley and Dresdner Kleinwort Wasserstein to advise it on other alternatives. Merck is being advised by Deutsche Bank and Goldman Sachs.

The Bayer/Schering deal will not preclude Merck from returning with a higher offer. Although Merck has not ruled out sweetening its terms, Wilhelm Simson, chairman of Merck's supervisory board, has said the company would first wait to see if other bidders came forward.

Merck had planned to finance its bid through a combination of bank debt, cash, a rights issue, and a €1bn investment from the Merck family and has said it is committed to maintaining its investment-grade rating.

Schering is the world's largest maker of birth-control pills. It derives around 16 per cent of its sales from Betaseron, a multiple sclerosis treatment and also makes substances introduced into the body to make organs visible on X-rays.

However, both Bayer and Merck would be particularly interested in Schering's oncology business, which has treatments for breast, prostate and colorectal cancer at different stages. That division accounted for €197m in 2005.

Bayer, which, invented aspirin more than 100 years ago, is headed by Werner Wenning, chief executive. During the past 18 months, it has bought the over-the-counter drugs unit of Roche, the Swiss drugs company, and spun off the bulk of its chemicals operations as a new listed entity called Lanxess.

The group has also placed its hopes in bringing to market new home-made patented drugs, with US regulators giving a potential blockbuster anti-cancer drug the green light late last year.

Bayer rose 2.96 per cent to €34.75. Merck fell 2.85 per cent to €80.49. Schering, Bayer and Merck all declined to comment.

UPDATE: Bayer Launches White Knight Bid For Schering (DOW)

By Steve McGrath and Gangolf Schrimpff, Of DOW JONES NEWSWIRES

Dow Jones, March 23, 2006

LONDON -(Dow Jones)- German pharmaceutical and chemicals company Bayer AG (BAY) (BAY) Thursday confirmed it will make a EUR16.3 billion bid for rival Schering AG (SHR)(SHR), trumping a rival EUR14.6 billion bid by Merck KGaA (MRK.XE).

In a statement, Leverkusen-based Bayer said it would offer EUR86 a share in cash for Schering (SHR), topping Merck's (MRK) EUR77-a-share offer.

In a separate statement, Schering (SHR) said its board would recommend Bayer's offer. Schering (SHR) had rejected Merck's (MRK) approach, saying it didn't reflect its true value.

Schering's (SHR) shares rose more than 2% to EUR84.97 Thursday on speculation about a Bayer bid.

Earlier, the Wall Street Journal had reported, quoting people familiar with the matter, that Bayer would make a white-knight bid for Schering (SHR). Bayer has had an interest in Schering (SHR) for years, but Berlin-based Schering (SHR) had been unwilling to sell itself, the paper quoted the people as saying.

Merck's (MRK) bid for Schering (SHR) was aimed at creating a German drug company of a scale that could compete with global rivals such as Pfizer Inc. (PFE) (PFE) of the U.S. and GlaxoSmithKline PLC (GSK) (GSK) of the U.K. A combination of Bayer and Schering (SHR) would create an even bigger company by sales.

The Wall Street Journal had said Bayer's bid may be made jointly with Siemens AG (SI) (SI), which is interested in Schering's (SHR) imaging business. However, there was no mention of this in Bayer's statement.

In its statement, Bayer said Schering's (SHR) business would be merged with its own health-care division to create a new listed unit, Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals, headquartered in Berlin. The takeover would boost Bayer's total annual sales to more than EUR15 billion and boost earnings, while Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals would have sales of more than EUR9 billion. The new unit's earnings before interest, tax, depreciation and amortization margin is targeted at 25%, up from 23% at Bayer's current Healthcare unit.

"The proposed takeover of Schering (SHR) is in line with our strategic objective to further grow our health-care business, especially in the area of pharmaceutical specialty products," Bayer Chief Executive Werner Wenning said in the statement.

Merck (MRK) was unavailable to comment late Thursday.

Bayer said it is targeting annual synergies of EUR700 million by the third year after completion of the deal. However, the deal will also result in one- time acquisition costs of EUR1 billion.

"In the mid term, the new company is expected to grow at least as fast as the market. Over the same period, we anticipate an average double-digit growth rate for underlying EBITDA," Bayer Healthcare Chairman Arthur Higgins said about Bayer-Schering Pharmaceuticals.

Wenning said the company would be a leader in gynecology, multiple sclerosis, hematology and contrast agents treatments.

Bayer said the deal would be funded through liquidity of around EUR3 billion and a credit line provided by Credit Suisse and Citigroup, which would later be refinanced through bank loans and debt. The planned equity capital measures will total EUR4 billion, it added. Further financing would be raised through the sale of plastics units H.C. Starck and Wolff Walsrode units.

Bayer said its offer has a minimum acceptance rate of 75% of Schering's (SHR)capital stock. It expects the deal to complete in the second quarter and to clear antitrust regulators without any problems.

Prior to Bayer's statement, analysts had expressed reservations about a possible Bayer bid for Schering (SHR). Landesbank Baden-Wuerttemberg's Ulle Woerner had said a takeover wouldn't fit Bayer's strategy, while another analyst, who requested anonymity, said there are few overlapping portfolios and therefore no major visible synergies. The unnamed analyst had noted a deal would strengthen Bayer's oncology operations.

Bayer is being advised by Credit Suisse and Greenhill in its bid for Schering (SHR).

Hazardous Waste Firms' Merger To Move Ahead (Salt Lake Tribune)

By Judy Fahys

Salt Lake Tribune, March 24, 2006

Antitrust review: The $396M deal involving EnergySolutions and Duratek does not cause federal antitrust objections

The U.S. Justice Department has decided there are no further antitrust issues to consider in the merger of Salt Lake City-based EnergySolutions with Duratek Inc.

Maryland-based Duratek said Thurs- day that a month-long waiting period mandated by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act of 1976 - an antitrust regulation that automatically triggers a 30-day review whenever an investor seeks to acquire either a 15 percent stake, or a stake valued at more than $15 million, in a particular security - ended this week without any indication the Justice Department wants more time to review the merger, which will create the nation's largest full-service nuclear waste company.

However, the $396 million deal, announced Feb. 7, is still months from being complete. Publicly traded Duratek needs shareholder approval, and a vote has not been scheduled yet, said Diane R. Brown, who leads the company's investor relations.

In addition, EnergySolutions, formerly called Envirocare of Utah, must complete the bureaucratic process of transferring Duratek's licenses and permits with other states and the federal government into its name. With the merger, EnergySolutions will have more than 2,000 employees and operations in more than 40 states and England.

It will operate the only two low-level radioactive waste facilities available for regulated waste from more than 30 states.

In Utah, EnergySolutions already has done the necessary paperwork, said Dane Finerfrock, director of the state Division of Radiation Control. "All of the licenses and permits EnergySolutions has with the department have already changed over," he said.

The company operates a mile-square radioactive and hazardous waste landfill about 80 miles west of Salt Lake City. A request to the state to double the site's size is pending and faces a lawsuit.

Meanwhile, EnergySolutions has amended its current license to switch equipment planned for the new acreage to the existing site. Another proposed change is to increase the amount of waste that can go into the disposal pits. Under its current license, EnergySolutions can stack waste about 44 feet above ground.

The mounds would be 75 feet off the ground if the amendment is approved, allowing the company to expand its Utah disposal capacity by growing up instead of out.

EU Regulators OK Time Warner-CBS Venture (AP)

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - BRUSSELS, Belgium-European Union antitrust regulators cleared the Warner Bros. network's 50-50 joint venture with CBS Corp.'s UPN television network on Thursday, saying there were no competition concerns on the plan for the European market.

The two networks will combine to form a new broadcast network called CW. They decided to join forces after struggling in the U.S. ratings.

The venture was fast-tracked for approval by the EU, meaning it saw no significant antitrust problems and received no complaints from rivals.

The EU has to approve mergers and acquisitions between companies with joint global revenue of more than 5 billion euros ($6 billion) a year or if at least two of the companies involved have more than 250 million euros ($300 million) revenue in Europe.

The UPN and WB networks faced tough competition from U.S. network rivals such as Walt Disney Co.'s ABC and General Electric Co.'s NBC. Time Warner Inc. is the parent of Warner Bros.

CHICAGO -(Dow Jones)- Medtronic Inc.'s (MDT) (MDT) recent purchase of the rights to certain patents covering stent medical devices could inject the company into the acquisition saga involving rivals Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX), Guidant Corp. (GDT) (GDT) and Abbott Laboratories Inc. (ABT).

That's because Medtronic (MDT) believes a key Guidant (GDT) stent product infringes on those patents, and Guidant's (GDT) product plays a key role in the company's coming acquisition by Boston Scientific (BSX) and Abbott. Medtronic (MDT) and a Citigroup analyst made a case Thursday for the patents' validity.

There is argument, though, about whether the latest patent claims bear watching or simply mix with the chaff in the competitive $5 billion to $6 billion stent business. The sector sees frequent litigation as companies jockey for position, and other analysts who weighed in Thursday suggested the latest Medtronic (MDT) suit is more of the same.

"I just see this as a lot of competitive wrangling that's just not going to affect the market place for a very long time," said Phillip Nalbone, an analyst with RBC Capital Markets. He doesn't own shares of any of the companies in question, and his firm doesn't have banking relationships with the companies.

At issue are stents, tiny tubes that prop open arteries, and Medtronic's (MDT)purchase in February of patent rights for bare-metal stents from a private Canadian company called Evysio. Medtronic (MDT) the same month filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California claiming, among other things, that Guidant's (GDT) "Vision" stent violated the patents.

Vision is the underpinning for Guidant's (GDT) "Xience" drug-coated stent, which Boston Scientific (BSX) and Abbott plan to jointly sell, and is targeted for introduction in Europe this year. But, according to Citigroup analyst Matthew Dodds, Evysio has already made progress in ongoing litigation against the Vision stent in France, which suggests strength for the Medtronic (MDT)/Evysio case.

Any disruption for Vision could disrupt Xience, and, according to Dodds, Medtronic's (MDT) deep pockets are likely to carry the fight to other countries. A successful fight in Ireland where Vision is manufactured, for example, could put the Xience European launch at risk, Dodds said.

Medtronic (MDT) declined comment on where the case might go next. Scott Ward, president of Medtronic Vascular, said in an interview that Evysio's success to date in France "gives us some confidence" in the strength of its case.

Stent Battle

Dodds suggested in an early Thursday research note that Abbott was overpaying for Guidant's (GDT) cardiovascular business, given the potential for Xience delays, and that Abbott's willingness to overpay might show a lack of optimism in its own stent product. Dodds doesn't own shares of the companies in question.

Abbott closed down 22 cents at $43.88 Thursday, and traded as low as $43.16 early in Thursday's session. The medical device and pharmaceutical company refuted Dodds' suggestions in a statement.

"Abbott has a broad intellectual property portfolio and we are confident we will have freedom to operate in the drug-eluting stent market," spokesman Jonathon Hamilton said, relaying the statement. "In addition, we are working closely with regulatory agencies on our acquisition of Guidant's (GDT) vascular business, and we're confident that Abbott will enjoy the full benefits of the acquisition."

Boston is buying Guidant (GDT) for about $27 billion, or $80 a share for Guidant (GDT)holders. Abbott will play a major roll by buying Guidant's (GDT) vascular intervention and endovascular business for $4.1 billion, and by loaning Boston Scientific (BSX) $ 900 million and buying $1.4 billion in Boston Scientific (BSX) common stock.

Boston Scientific (BSX) wants to close the Guidant (GDT) deal in the first week of April, but said late Thursday the close could be delayed as late as April 13 by a European antitrust review.

Some analysts suggested Medtronic's (MDT) patent moves are really an effort to create bargaining chips to benefit its own stent project. Medtronic (MDT) is marketing a drug-coated stent internationally called Endeavor, and hopes to bring it to the U.S. in 2007. The catch for the company is that it doesn't have access to " rapid exchange," a key delivery system that's now the favored way to install stents.

If Medtronic (MDT) can create a strong case against Guidant's (GDT) product, it can later agree to drop that case in return for access to rapid exchange, said RBC's Nalbone and Larry Biegelsen, an analyst with Prudential Equity Group LLC. "They will seek to use it as a negotiating tool," Nalbone said.

Medtronic's (MDT) Ward declined comment on that assertion and the company's negotiating strategy. He said Medtronic (MDT) always prefers "negotiated settlements", and that it seeks a level playing field in the stent market.

J&J In The Fray

Dodds on Thursday also raised an issue, which he's raised before, concerning Johnson & Johnson's (JNJ) (JNJ) potential to disrupt the closing of the Boston Scientific (BSX)/Guidant (GDT) deal. J&J holds patents for the family of drugs used on the Guidant (GDT) and Abbott stents. The healthcare conglomerate's patents will likely be "strongly considered" by the Federal Trade Commission, "which is likely to make Boston's plan to close the Guidant (GDT) deal by April 3 unrealistic," Dodds said.

A J&J spokesman declined comment on whether the company, which had planned to buy Guidant (GDT) before Boston Scientific (BSX) won a bidding war, is seeking to disrupt the deal. Boston Scientific (BSX) spokesman Paul Donovan said the company doesn't see an impact from either patent issue.

"We have reviewed the intellectual property issues and are comfortable proceeding with the transaction," he said, relaying a company statement.

Boston Scientific (BSX) closed unchanged at $23.47 Thursday. Guidant (GDT) closed down 10 cents at $78.66.

Guidant (GDT) officials didn't comment on the patent issues.

Boston Scientific Makes Antitrust Commitments To EC (DOW)

Dow Jones, March 24, 2006

Boston Scientific Corp. (BSX) (BSX) said late Thursday it has made certain commitments to the European Commission as part of its antitrust review of Boston Scientific's (BSX) acquisition of Guidant Corp (GDT) (GDT).

The details of the commitments are confidential, Boston Scientific (BSX) said, but are not material to the deal and will become public when the EC completes its review and announces its decision.

The commitments extend the normal five-week EC review period to up to seven weeks, meaning that the review will finish no later than April 13.

Boston Scientific (BSX) said its goal is still to close the deal during the first week of April.

Talks For Lucent May Signal End For 90's Symbol (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Ken Belson

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Lucent Technologies, the phone equipment maker that became a symbol of last decade's boom-and-bust cycle in telecommunications, is in negotiations to be acquired by Alcatel of France for about $12.6 billion, people close to the discussions said last night.

The two companies confirmed the talks last night in a statement, saying they were "engaged in discussions about a potential merger of equals."

After several years of mergers on a huge scale among telephone companies — local, long-distance and wireless — a deal for Lucent would be the first big step toward a shakeout among the companies that make the equipment for the phone service providers.

The prospect of a big trans-Atlantic deal comes at a time when foreign takeovers have been political flashpoints in both Washington and Paris. A Dubai company's acquisition of some United States port terminals created an uproar in Congress, while the French government has sought to thwart cross-border takeovers in energy and pharmaceuticals.

People involved in the talks said the negotiations had advanced in the last week, but cautioned that they could still fall apart. These people said the disclosure of the talks could delay or derail any such deal.

The companies said last night that they would have "no further comment until an agreement is reached or the discussions are terminated."

The talks come nearly five years after the two companies called off what would have been a $22.8 billion merger. That aborted deal had been constructed as a merger of equals but fell apart after the companies could not agree on how much control Alcatel would have.

For Lucent, based in Murray Hill, N.J., a sale would be the last chapter in an extraordinary story of struggle. In 2002, the company was on the brink of collapse, but survived by eliminating thousands of jobs and cutting billions in debt.

Yet as Lucent has returned to profitability, the telecommunications landscape in the United States has radically changed. Lucent has lost many of its largest customers as the regional Bell phone companies gobbled up rivals, steeply reduced investment in their older copper-line networks and spent more on fiber optic equipment that has fallen in price.

Consolidation among the phone companies — this month's $67 billion deal between AT&T and BellSouth being the most recent — has raised expectations that at least some of the equipment makers that serve them will also merge.

Lucent and, to a lesser degree, Nortel Networks in Canada, have been considered the most likely takeover targets because of their depressed stock prices and lukewarm business prospects.

The outlook seemed worse in 2001, when Alcatel and Lucent discussed a merger. The two companies were then roughly equal in size, but were struggling as the collapse in spending on telecommunications equipment dragged down their earnings and stock prices. But Alcatel has emerged as the much stronger company, with a market value of nearly $20 billion.

To Alcatel, Lucent's most valuable asset would be its C.D.M.A. wireless technology used by Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel, two of the largest cellphone companies in the United States. Though only about a third of mobile phone subscribers worldwide rely on this technology, Verizon and Sprint have spent heavily to upgrade their networks to provide more next-generation data services.

Lucent's wireless business would complement Alcatel's leadership in broadband equipment, fiber optic networks and Internet television, all of which are growing quickly. Lucent's leading position in the American market would also dovetail with Alcatel's strength in Europe.

Though Alcatel would be eager to obtain Lucent's customers and leading position in the C.D.M.A. market, it could also risk inheriting some of the company's problems. Growth overseas has been uneven. For instance, Lucent sales in the last three months of 2005 fell more than 15 percent, in part because of weaker demand in China.

Lucent's roots go back to the age of the telegraph. It was the equipment-making arm of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, and included the research and development unit Bell Laboratories, an intellectual powerhouse. In 1996, AT&T spun off Lucent in a $3 billion initial public offering. The stock quickly became a Wall Street favorite, rising to more than $63 a share and surpassing AT&T in market value by 1998.

In 2000, the company was caught wrong-footed by a sudden slowdown in demand for communications equipment and reported a series of disappointing quarterly results. Its chairman and chief executive was ousted, and the Securities and Exchange Commission began an inquiry into its accounting practices. The shares — which made up the nest eggs of thousands of Lucent employees — slid to a low of 58 cents in 2002.

Patricia F. Russo was named chief executive that year, and pulled the company back from the brink of collapse. In 2004, Lucent settled the S.E.C. investigation, agreeing to pay $25 million. But the recovery has been anything but robust; Lucent's shares closed yesterday at $2.82.

Alcatel has half its sales in Europe, but has been making a push in Asia and North America. Its chief operating officer and president, Michael Quigley, is an English-born Australian. He is expected to succeed Serge Tchuruk as chief executive when Mr. Tchuruk steps down in May.

Lucent, Alcatel Are Far Along In Merger Talks (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman, Sara Silver And Almar Latour

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel SA said they were in advanced talks on a merger that would create a trans-Atlantic equipment supplier with a market value of $33 billion in the rapidly consolidating telecommunications industry.

A linkup between the two, anticipated since a deal attempt failed five years ago, could help both realize substantial cost savings and likely would kick off a new round of consolidation among the already-pressured companies that supply equipment to phone companies.

Lucent Technologies Chief Executive Patricia Russo would be the chief executive of the combined company, people familiar with the matter said. And the two firms would have equal representation of a new board of directors, these people add.

Given the cultural and logistical challenges, moreover, a merger could prove to be among the more complicated recent couplings in the industry. With protectionist sentiment growing in both the U.S. and Europe, a merger could prove a critical test of cross-border cooperation for the French and U.S. governments.

In a joint statement late yesterday, the companies said: "We can confirm that Lucent and Alcatel are engaged in discussion about a merger of equals that is intended to be priced at market. There can be no assurances that any agreement will be reached or that a transaction will be consummated. We will have no further comment until an agreement is reached or the discussions are terminated."

Many details were unclear, including just how the two companies might pull off a "merger of equals" when they have such divergent valuations. Lucent has a market value of $12.6 billion, while Alcatel's market capitalization is $20.2 billion. The disparity suggests a deal may be structured as an acquisition of Lucent by Alcatel.

Consolidation pressure has been growing in the equipment business amid a wave of telecom deals and the emergence of more-efficient technologies. That has limited the amount of money that big phone companies have to spend on equipment. The result has been too many equipment makers chasing a limited amount of business.

The industry's biggest suppliers -- which include such companies as Nokia Corp. and Motorola Inc. -- compete for contracts in nearly every corner of the globe, from Latin America to China. But their primacy in some markets is waning as suppliers from China flood into the developing world offering cut-rate equipment.

At the same time, the technology of transmitting phone calls, Internet data and TV signals often is regarded as a national resource to be protected from foreign meddling, and a Lucent-Alcatel deal could draw close scrutiny.

Lucent's telecom switches, for instance, are in phone hubs around the U.S. -- and are subject to routine wiretapping and monitoring of law enforcement. It also runs Bell Labs, a decades-old institution descended from the old AT&T Corp. that is the force behind some of the most innovative U.S. research into communications.

By merging with Lucent, Alcatel would greatly expand its presence in the U.S. market. Alcatel already is the world's leading seller of "digital subscriber line," or DSL, equipment, which U.S. phone companies have been buying to expand their broadband businesses. Lucent would give it a major share of the U.S. wireless-equipment market as well. Lucent is a leading maker of the technology used by several major carriers including Verizon Wireless, a joint venture between Vodafone Group PLC and Verizon Communications Inc., and Sprint Nextel Corp.

Telecom has seen a massive wave of consolidation during the past two years, with the announced value of U.S. deals alone exceeding $200 billion. Most recently, AT&T Inc. announced plans to buy BellSouth Corp. for $67 billion. Other transactions have included Verizon's acquisition of MCI Inc., and the earlier purchase of AT&T by SBC Communications Inc., which took the AT&T name.

The backdrop is a flood of new technologies and new competitors that have driven down the prices of traditional phone services while introducing a host of new services that are dramatically changing the way consumers and businesses communicate. While phone service over the Internet is taking off, for instance, the cable industry is making a big grab for the traditional residential landline business of telephone companies like Verizon and AT&T. In turn, phone companies are starting to offer television service over upgraded networks.

The changes are creating opportunities for some equipment makers. But they also pose challenges because improved efficiency enables carriers to replace huge switches and other pieces of equipment with computers and software.

There already has been some merger-and-acquisition activity in the equipment business. In October, Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson of Sweden agreed to acquire Marconi Corp., of London. In February, Cisco Systems Inc. completed an acquisition of Scientific-Atlanta, giving it a major beachhead in the cable TV, video-on-demand and emerging Internet television businesses. Motorola has plans to spend up to $1 billion to buy small companies.

Lucent, of Murray Hill, N.J., and Alcatel have come close to merging before. In the spring of 2001, they were on the verge of a $23.5 billion deal, hammered out among executives in a 16th-century castle outside of Paris. But Lucent, which had initiated the conversations, ultimately backed out because its management felt the deal was turning into a takeover rather than a merger of equals.

Shortly after the 2001 merger's collapse, Serge Tchuruk, Alcatel's chairman and chief executive, said the company's goal of becoming a bigger player in the U.S. market remained "absolutely essential." Alcatel has acquired a number of smaller U.S. data-networking players, but an acquisition of Lucent would be by far its largest deal here.

Of late, Alcatel's financial performance has been stronger than that of Lucent. In 2005, Alcatel posted sales of 13.1 billion ($15.8 billion), up from 12.2 billion in 2004, and net income of 930 million, compared with 576 million in 2004. After suffering with other equipment manufacturers from the telecom meltdown, it has been making a steady comeback thanks in part to streamlining, job reductions and asset sales. Mr. Tchuruk also has been trying to broaden the company's client base beyond the telecom industry.

Lucent's Ms. Russo also has been credited with a turnaround after the turmoil of the telecom bust, producing two years of stable growth partly by expanding in emerging markets. But most of the profit Lucent generated actually came from credits in its overfunded pension plans, not from operations. In its first fiscal quarter in 2006, the company booked a net loss of $104 million and a 12% decline in sales. Company officials said an anticipated increase in demand from telecom carriers didn't materialize at the end of last year.

Christian Group Exodus Backs Off Infringement Case Against Blog Parody (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

SAN FRANCISCO — A Christian group that promotes heterosexuality Thursday quietly dropped its beef against a blogger who poked fun at it.

Exodus International initially claimed the altered image of one of its billboards by Justin Watt infringed its copyright. But Exodus is no longer pursuing the matter after Watt stopped using its “watermark” logo, Exodus President Alan Chambers said.

Watt, operator of the Justinsomnia blog, says he exercised free speech when he parodied the Exodus billboard, which says, “Gay? Unhappy? www.exodus.to.” Wyatt re-created the billboard on his site so it read, “Straight? Unhappy? www.gay.com.”

(Exodus uses “.to” as its domain suffix because “.com” was not available.)

Watt, 26, a Web developer in Northern California who enlisted the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union and high-powered law firm Fenwick & West, has posted his blog for four years. He posted the parody Sept. 19 because he found Exodus' message “offensive.” A lawyer representing Exodus sent Watt a cease-and-desist letter on March 2.

The dust-up has made Watt a cause célbre among bloggers. More than 40 other websites now carry the spoof.

Had the dispute escalated, it would have extended the debate over fair use of copyrighted material beyond print and electronic media and to blogs, says copyright attorney Tom Zellerbach.

Companies frequently ask websites to remove images and text out of concern they infringe copyrighted material. But high-profile cases involving bloggers have been rare, Zellerbach and other lawyers say.

The incident gained attention because Watt understood his rights and contacted an attorney, said ACLU lawyer Ann Brick, who represented him. “We don't know how often people get cease-and-desist letters and pull material without knowing their rights,” she said.

“Just as the First Amendment allows Exodus to post its billboard, it gives Justin the right to post a parody,” Brick said.

Private Equity Firm To Bid On 12 Newspapers (WP)

By Steven Levingston

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The Yucaipa Cos., a Los Angeles-based private equity investment firm, plans to bid Tuesday for the 12 Knight Ridder Inc. newspapers put up for sale by McClatchy Co.

Yucaipa would not say how much it intends to offer for the papers, including the Philadelphia Inquirer, the San Jose Mercury News and the Akron Beacon Journal.

The papers became available after McClatchy last week bought the Knight Ridder chain of 32 papers and announced it would divest itself of 12 dailies in what it said were slower-growth markets.

Robert Hall, a Yucaipa adviser and former publisher of the Inquirer and Philadelphia Daily News, said the firm would make its bid Tuesday, when preliminary offers are due. He added that, if successful, the private fund would take a long-term approach to its investment, freeing the papers from having to meet the pressures of Wall Street.

"Philosophically, Yucaipa has been a worker-friendly fund, a patient investor that will allow for a lesser return than maybe another investor looking for a five-year flip," Hall said. "It would give the papers the opportunity to reinvent themselves to grow in their markets."

Other bidders are possible. Analysts expect Gannett Co., the nation's largest newspaper publisher, to submit offers for at least some of the dailies. Gannett would not comment on its plans but its top executives, speaking in New York yesterday, indicated the company was studying the situation.

Gannett's president and chief executive, Craig A. Dubow, said in a presentation to a New York gathering of media analysts that the company had taken a hard look at the possibility of bidding for the entire Knight Ridder chain but decided to step back. "The others coming to market, we're going to take a look at those," he said, referring to the 12 papers for sale.

But because of its large number of holdings, Gannett's purchasing plans are complicated by regulatory issues. The company, which owns 91 daily papers and 21 television stations, could be constrained in eight or nine of the 12 markets where the papers are for sale. "There are lots of regulatory issues and no easy solutions," said Douglas H. McCorkindale, Gannett's chairman.

Lauren Rich Fine, an analyst at Merrill Lynch & Co., said in a recent report that she believed Gannett would not be interested in the larger papers in Philadelphia and San Jose but "would add selectively to its holdings at the right price."

Another potential bidder, MediaNews Group Inc., a private Denver-based newspaper chain, had no comment.

Yucaipa, headed by billionaire Ron Burkle, was founded in 1986 and has been involved in more than $30 billion in mergers and acquisitions. Former president Bill Clinton is a senior adviser to the firm.

The fund, which has been in discussions with the Newspaper Guild-CWA, a union that represents employees at most of the 12 papers, said it would encourage employees to take an investment stake in the company that would own the papers under its plan.

"Yucaipa will be the principal owners, and employee ownership is a key part going forward," Hall said. "Clearly, that's the intent."

Populism And Electric Bills (WP)

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

IT'S HARD TO SAY who has been more reckless in Maryland's current tumult over residential electricity bills -- the lawmakers who froze rates six years ago while blithely believing all would end well in the long term or the utility that thought once the rate freeze expired, it could suddenly hoist prices by $734 a year for an average household without triggering political pandemonium. Add to that a passel of politicians competing with each other to sound more populist than thou, plus state utility regulators who give every appearance of being in cahoots with the utilities themselves, and there you have it: hypocrisy wrapped in wishful thinking inside a scandal.

The original sin was not the idea of deregulating Maryland's electric power industry but how the legislation was crafted in 1999. Eager to escape any responsibility for the consequences of their sensible vote to deregulate, the lawmakers locked in prices at 1993 levels -- minus 6.5 percent. That was unwise; world energy prices subsequently soared. But that was not all: The law allowed for the rates charged by the biggest of Maryland's electric utilities, Baltimore Gas and Electric Co., to be unfrozen this summer, right in the middle of an election year.

Some 1.2 million households -- in Baltimore as well as a surrounding chunk of central Maryland, including some in Montgomery County (read: a large portion of Maryland's electorate) -- would get hit by that $734 annual hike, a 72 percent increase. Having ignored the approaching tidal wave, Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) suddenly took notice and announced, "Seventy-two percent will not stand." Democrats and Republicans in the legislature, including many who helped devise the poorly conceived legislation in the first place, shouted, "Hear, hear!"

The utility is correct, of course, that rates must rise to reflect the world energy market. It is also right that it is legally entitled to raise those rates commensurate with costs. But utilities also understand very well that they operate in a political environment. Faced with the nearly unanimous wrath of the Maryland General Assembly, as well as threats to roll back deregulation or block a planned merger with a Florida utility, BGE and its parent, Constellation Energy Group, are trying to come to terms with lawmakers.

Presumably they will strike a deal that defers the pain of higher prices by phasing in the increases over time and perhaps extending the caps for a year or two. Fortunately for all involved, the utility is fairly awash in extra cash these days, and that may help to seal a deal. But this time around, both the utility and the lawmakers should level with the public by explaining that sharply higher electric bills -- even if they exact their pain gradually rather than all at once -- are a fact of life for the near term. To pretend otherwise is to ignore the market, and reality.

Utah Refinery Charged With Violating Environmental Laws (AP)

By Debbie Hummel

AP, March 24, 2006

SALT LAKE CITY - A Pennsylvania-based metals refinery and two of its managers have been indicted on federal charges of polluting water and conspiring to violate environmental laws, the U.S. Department of Justice said Thursday.

Johnson Matthey Inc. and John David McKelvie, director of gold and silver operations for North America and Europe and former general manager at the West Valley City plant, and Paul Card Greaves, former plant manager, were indicted by a federal grand jury Wednesday night.

They are accused of violating environmental laws by concealing high levels of the chemical element selenium found in waste water from the metals refinery, according to court documents.

Johnson Matthey, based in Wayne, Pa., has a gold and silver refining plant in West Valley City, a suburb of Salt Lake City.

The company is accused of releasing larger amounts of selenium than it was allowed by permit into sewers. The indictment alleges that the company exceeded its monthly limit on selenium discharges 12 times between January 2000 and May 2002.

The waste water from the refinery is processed by a treatment plant that empties water into the Jordan River and the Great Salt Lake, which are part of a shorebird reserve where millions of migratory birds stop each year.

Selenium separated from gold and silver during the refining process. It is known to accumulate in living organisms and can harm people and cause reproductive problems in waterfowl, according to the indictment.

"The defendants are charged with not only illegally discharging contaminated waste water, but also engaging in a concerted effort to cover it up," Granta Y. Nakayama, an assistant administrator for the Environmental Protection Agency, said in a statement.

The indictment alleges that the company did several things to conceal higher pollutant levels including:

_Stopping the discharge of waste water when inspectors from the water treatment plant came to take water samples; submitting water to laboratories for testing and then only giving those with low selenium levels to the water treatment plant; and diluting waste water with fresh water from a hose to comply with its permit.

Attorneys for Johnson Matthey released a statement saying the company has cooperated fully in the government's investigation.

"Johnson Matthey has taken this matter and now takes these charges very seriously," Robert M. Talley, a company executive, said in a statement. "Johnson Matthey is proud of its standing as a leading global environmentally oriented company. It is important to bear in mind these charges are merely allegations."

The case is being prosecuted in U.S. District Court here by the Justice Department's environmental crime section.

Johnson Matthey and Greaves are charged with 12 counts each and McKelvie with 11 counts of discharging pollutants in excess of permit limits, court papers said.

McKelvie also is charged with seven counts of concealing high selenium levels by performing selective sampling. Johnson Matthey and Greaves are charged with 10 counts each of concealment and three counts each of rendering inaccurate a monitoring method by shutting off the waste water flow and diluting the water, court papers said.

Each of the counts carries a penalty of up to five years in prison and fines of $250,000 for individual defendants and $500,000 for corporate defendants.

Johnson Matthey has operations in 34 countries and employs about 7,400 people.

Nev. Files New Federal Suit In Yucca Fight (AP)

By Ken Ritter, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

(AP) - LAS VEGAS-Nevada sued the federal government Wednesday, accusing it of withholding documents that show the planned Yucca Mountain nuclear dump cannot safely hold the nation's radioactive waste.

The complaint, filed in Reno, is the fourth federal lawsuit the state has pending against the plan to bury 77,000 tons of nuclear waste in the Nevada desert, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

The case seeks the release of a draft application prepared by contractors seeking a Nuclear Regulatory Commission license to open the dump.

"The federal government is required by law to share its important Yucca information with the host state, and we are entitled to such information under the Freedom of Information Act as well," Nevada Attorney General George Chanos said in a statement.

An Energy Department spokesman in Washington said the agency has made public on the Internet millions of pages about the project, but was under no legal obligation to release the draft application.

Spokesman Craig Stevens said in an e-mail that the application would be made public once it is formally submitted to the NRC.

"This department and this administration remain committed to the licensing, construction, and operation of Yucca Mountain as the nation's permanent geologic repository for spent nuclear fuel," Stevens said. "This lawsuit will not deter us."

Bob Loux, chief of Nevada's Agency for Nuclear Projects, said the state believes the document will show the dump cannot meet radiation safety standards set by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The state's three-page complaint lists steps Nevada has taken to secure the draft application, including requests by Gov. Kenny Guinn to the secretary of energy and President Bush; subpoenas from Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev.; litigation before the NRC licensing hearing board; a Freedom of Information Act request; and Energy Department administrative appeals.

All those requests were rebuffed, Chanos said.

"What are they trying to hide?" he said. "If the repository is safe, you'd think they'd be anxious to prove it."

The Energy Department had planned to open Yucca Mountain by 2010. But it missed a self-imposed deadline to apply for a license by the end of 2004, and licensing hearings are expected to take several years.

The process has been stalled by budget shortages, political opposition, a controversy over whether scientists falsified data and by a court-ordered rewrite of EPA radiation standards.

GAO: Quality Assurance Issues Dog Yucca (AP-Y2)

By Erica Werner
AP2, March 23, 2006

Progress toward opening the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste dump is still hindered by questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work, a year after allegations of fraud emerged, congressional investigators said Thursday.

The Energy Department's reorganization of the project has yet to put the problems to rest and may create new issues, said a report by the Government Accountability Office.

That could delay the Energy Department from applying to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for a license to open the dump 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, the report said. It's not likely that the dump, approved by Congress in 2002 to store 77,000 tons of the nation's most radioactive nuclear waste, could open before 2012.

"After more than 20 years of project work, DOE is again faced with substantial quality assurance and other challenges to submit a fully defensible license application to NRC," said the report, requested by Rep. Jon Porter (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., who was releasing it Thursday at a press conference in Las Vegas.

Among the problems cited by the GAO was high turnover of project managers. Nine of 17 key management positions have turned over since 2001, the GAO said, and the director of quality assurance was among them.

The report also said that despite substantial time and money spent resolving quality assurance issues, the Energy Department has not developed effective management tools to detect and solve problems. The report recommended strengthening quality guidelines and analysis of problems.

Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said in a statement that the agency had either fixed these issues already, or was working on them.

"This department remains committed to following our obligation under the law to license, construct and operate Yucca Mountain as the nation's permanent repository for spent nuclear fuel," Stevens said.

Last October, DOE announced a "new path forward" to improve Yucca Mountain by, among other things, redesigning waste storage containers to minimize handling of nuclear waste and designating an outside national lab to oversee scientific work. The report said it is too soon to determine whether this new effort has resolved quality assurance issues enough to move toward submitting a license application.

The Energy Department's inspector general is still conducting a criminal investigation into alleged document falsification by U.S. Geological Survey employees between 1998 and 2000. DOE is also still reviewing 14 million e-mails to see if they raise quality assurance concerns, and redoing the scientific work by the USGS hydrologists involved, who were studying the movement of water through the proposed dump site.

Over 50,000 tons of nuclear waste destined for the dump is now waiting at 72 sites around the country, mostly at commercial power plants.

EPA To Relax Diesel Regulations To Encourage Fuel-Efficiency (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler
The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Environmental Protection Agency is relaxing certain emission standards for diesel cars in an effort to get more of these fuel-efficient -- but still relatively dirty -- vehicles on the road.

The EPA said that over time, the new standards will be better for the environment because auto makers that opt for the exemption will be required to engineer their cars to stay clean longer. Diesel manufacturers praised the move, calling it a narrow exception that will give a boost to a promising technology.

"It's another option that allows another design on the market, thus increasing the amount of diesels eligible to be in the United States," said EPA spokesman John Millett.

But environmentalists complain that the change allows diesel cars, which produce more pollution than gasoline-powered cars, to spew more smog-causing nitrogen oxide, at least at the beginning. They also argued that the rule change sets a bad precedent by allowing cars that use one particular technology to meet different standards.

Diesel cars are considered promising by policy makers concerned about U.S. dependence on oil because they get significantly better mileage than their gasoline counterparts.

Manufacturers have struggled to develop the emissions-control technology comparable to that long used for gasoline-powered vehicles, a problem made tougher by the high levels of sulfur in diesel fuel. Beginning with the 2007 model year, the EPA will require auto makers to meet tougher emission standards for all vehicles, including diesel-powered ones.

But yesterday, the EPA said it would make it easier for light-duty diesel vehicles, which include cars as well as sport-utility vehicles, to pass its emissions tests for model years 2007 to 2009.

Meatpacker Sues Feds Over Mad Cow Test (AP-Y2)

By Libby Quaid

AP2, March 23, 2006

A Kansas meatpacker sued the government on Thursday for refusing to let the company test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters.

Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says it has Japanese customers who want comprehensive testing. The Agriculture Department threatened criminal prosecution if Creekstone did the tests, according to the company's lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"We're not in any way saying that U.S. beef isn't safe; we believe it's the safest beef supply in the world, but that's not the issue," chief executive John Stewart said at a news conference.

"We're talking about consumers, and consumers want the product tested," Stewart said.

Testing for mad cow disease in the United States is controlled by the department, which tests about 1 percent of the 35 million cattle, or about 350,000, that are slaughtered each year. The department is planning to reduce that level of testing.

Stewart said he was surprised at the plan to scale back testing. "Given the concerns internationally, I'm not so sure that's the right thing to do."

Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests.

Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef.

Larger meatpackers worry that insistence from Japanese buyers would force them to do testing and that a suspect result might scare consumers away from eating beef.

It would cost about $20 per animal to do the tests, adding about 10 cents per pound to the cost of meat, according to Stewart.

Japan tests nearly all its cattle for mad cow disease. While individual companies there may want more testing in the U.S., Japan's government is not asking the U.S. to do the same.

For now, Japan has halted American beef shipments because inspectors in January found cuts of U.S. veal containing backbone, which is banned in Japan even though it's eaten in the U.S.

Japan had only recently lifted a ban on American beef imposed after the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003. Until then, Japan was the top foreign buyer of American beef, accounting for around $1.4 billion in sales in 2003.

Creekstone cut production and laid off about 150 employees at its Arkansas City, Kan., plant because of the ban.

Stewart said Creekstone's customers understand the limitations of the tests. He added that he expects Japan to reopen its market regardless of whether Creekstone is allowed to test its cattle.

The medical name for mad cow disease, a brain-wasting ailment, is bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In Humans, eating meat products contaminated with BSE is linked to more than 150 deaths worldwide, mostly in Britain, from a deadly human nerve disorder, variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease.

There have been three cases of mad cow disease in the U.S. The first, in December 2003 in Washington state, was in a cow that had been imported from Canada. The second, last June, was in a Texas-born cow. The third was confirmed last week in an Alabama cow.

Japan has had two dozen cases of BSE.

D'Amato And Weld Locked In G.O.P. Feud (NYT)

By Sewell Chan And Sam Roberts

For the last few months, William F. Weld's bid to become governor of New York has had a sharp thorn in its side: the outspoken opposition of the onetime kingmaker of state Republican politics, former Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato, who has said that Mr. Weld is "without any real experience" in New York.

Yesterday, Mr. Weld struck back in force, telling how their feud dated at least to a 1996 encounter in which Mr. D'Amato gave him $750,000 in donations for his Senate campaign that year against John Kerry of Massachusetts. The donations, according to Mr. Weld, came with an expletive-laced warning: that Mr. Weld distance himself from Robert S. Mueller III, who as a Justice Department official oversaw a federal fraud investigation of Mr. D'Amato's brother, Armand, in the early 1990's.

"If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I'm going to get every expletive dollar of this back out of your hide," Mr. Weld, a former Massachusetts governor, quoted Mr. D'Amato as saying. Mr. Mueller, a friend of Mr. Weld's, has been the director of the F.B.I. since 2001.

Mr. D'Amato yesterday vigorously denied that the encounter had taken place and said he had not even met Mr. Weld until recently, at a Feb. 23 fund-raiser for Representative Vito J. Fossella. But newspaper articles indicate that Mr. D'Amato introduced Mr. Weld at a 1996 Republican fund-raiser in Washington.

The clash exposed in the most bare-knuckled form the searing divisions that have afflicted state Republicans as they seek to find credible candidates to run for governor and to challenge Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in November.

Mr. D'Amato, who in 1994 helped shepherd a little-known George E. Pataki to the governor's mansion, has been openly praising the presumed Democratic front-runner for governor, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, and yesterday he attacked Mr. Weld's stewardship of Decker College, a financially troubled Kentucky school that is the subject of a federal investigation.

"If he couldn't run Decker College — they had a multimillion-dollar criminal enterprise of swindling these poor kids trying to get an education — and if he didn't know that was taking place — I'm not suggesting he was part of the cabal — then why didn't he?" Mr. D'Amato said. "Does that recommend him to be governor?"A federal investigation about student loan fraud at Decker College, a bankrupt trade school, is continuing.

Mr. D'Amato added, "I don't intend to endorse Eliot Spitzer, but I will say, if asked, he's done a magnificent job as attorney general, better than any I have ever seen," he said.

The matter brought to the forefront once again an episode that haunted the Senate career of Mr. D'Amato, who served from 1981 to 1999: the investigation that resulted in the May 1993 mail fraud conviction of Armand P. D'Amato, the senator's brother, in connection with $120,500 he received from a military contractor to lobby the senator. The conviction was thrown out by an appellate court the following year.

During a breakfast yesterday organized by Crain's New York Business, Mr. Weld, who from 1986 to 1988 was an assistant attorney general in the Justice Department, said that in Washington in 1996, he visited Mr. D'Amato, who was the chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which raises money for Republican Senate candidates. "Through clenched teeth, he handed me a check for $750,000," Mr. Weld said of Mr. D'Amato.

Mr. Weld's challenge to Mr. Kerry was one of the most hotly contested Senate races that year. Mr. Weld said yesterday that after Mr. D'Amato handed him the check with the warning about Mr. Mueller (he did not specify which expletives Mr. D'Amato used), he began the following exchange:

"Well, why is that, Senator?"

"He investigated my brother, Armand, and prosecuted him."

"Well, but when was that, Senator? I'm not familiar with that."

"Well, it was whatever year it was — 1990-something."

"Well, actually, I left the Justice Department in March of 1988 and, sir — "

"It doesn't matter. He's your guy."

Denying any impropriety in taking the donation, Mr. Weld said he did not interpret it to mean that he would in any way distance himself from Mr. Mueller, to whom he has been close since at least 1982, when Mr. Weld, then the United States attorney in Boston, recruited Mr. Mueller to work for him. Mr. Weld said he came forward with the account yesterday because he remembered it when he was asked about it by a television reporter.

In response to Mr. Weld's account, Mr. D'Amato yesterday called Mr. Weld "a stranger to the truth" and adamantly denied that such an encounter ever occurred. "The conversation never took place," Mr. D'Amato said in a telephone interview. "This is an entire fictional, preposterous story. Not only did I never give Bill Weld a check in any amount, the N.R.S.C. is prohibited from writing a check for more than $17,500 to any individual candidate."

Mr. D'Amato said he did remember taking a phone call in 1996 from Mr. Weld, seeking the campaign committee's support. Craig Engle, who was the committee's general counsel from 1995 to 2000, said yesterday that he, too, could recall only a phone call and not a meeting. He said that under varying state rules, the committee was permitted to pay a campaign's bills and that over time the amounts in the Massachusetts race might have added up to $750,000.

Mr. D'Amato earlier urged Mr. Mueller to recuse himself from the Decker College investigation because of his ties to Mr. Weld, and Mr. Mueller agreed to do so on Jan. 24, "to avoid even the appearance of a conflict" of interest, according to a spokesman for the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Mr. D'Amato suggested that his dislike for Mr. Weld preceded the investigation of his brother and dated from 1988, when Mr. Weld and five other officials resigned to distance themselves from Attorney General Edwin Meese III, who was under investigation. "Weld is a duplicitous guy who stabbed Ed Meese in the back," Mr. D'Amato said.

Mr. Weld said yesterday that the investigations had been "taking their toll on the department." Mr. Meese did not respond to messages left at his office in Washington and his home in McLean, Va.

The feud is the latest embarrassment for a state party that has already seen the implosion of Jeanine F. Pirro's bid to topple Senator Clinton and open Republican challenges to the leadership of Governor Pataki, who is not running for a fourth term.

The dispute with Mr. D'Amato overshadowed Mr. Weld's speech, in which he unfavorably compared the leading Democratic candidate for governor, Mr. Spitzer, to Michael S. Dukakis, Mr. Weld's predecessor in Massachusetts. "Removing the burdens of taxation and removing the cost of doing business empowers our economy and leads to good-paying jobs," he said, adding that Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Dukakis put their "faith in government."

Mr. Spitzer's campaign spokeswoman, Christine L. Anderson, replied, "When the governor of Massachusetts finally gets around to doing his homework, he'll see that the problems we face require real solutions rather than stale political rhetoric."

D'Amato Threatened Me, Sez Weld (NYDN)

By DAVID SALTONSTALL, DAILY NEWS CITY HALL BUREAU CHIEF

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

The odd feud between fellow Republicans Alfonse D'Amato and William Weld reignited yesterday, with Weld alleging D'Amato once aimed an expletive-laden threat at him during his 1996 Senate run in Massachusetts.

Weld, who is now running for governor of New York, told a business forum yesterday that D'Amato threatened to take $750,000 "out of [Weld's] hide" in 1996 if Weld took money from Weld pal Robert Mueller, now the head of the FBI.

At the time, D'Amato headed the national Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee, and Mueller was the federal prosecutor who helped convict D'Amato's brother, Armand, on mail fraud charges - a conviction the courts later overturned.

"Let me tell you something," Weld quoted D'Amato as saying. "If I ever see that expletive Mueller at an expletive fund-raiser, I am going to get every expletive dollar of this [$750,000 campaign check] back out of your hide."

The comment drew a blistering response yesterday from D'Amato, who called Weld's version of events a "vicious, preposterous story."

"He must be rather desperate," D'Amato said. "When you make up stories about people, it is not very nice."

D'Amato said he never met face-to-face with Weld in 1996 and that it would have been illegal under campaign finance laws for him to give Weld a single check for $750,000.

Weld's comments came after a speech before the Crain's New York Business Breakfast Forum in which the former Massachusetts governor cast himself as a tax-cutting fiscal conservative.

Weld On D'Amato: There's Bad Blood (NSDY)

By James T. Madore, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 24, 2006

Hopeful for GOP nod for governor divulges a 10-year-old conflict since trial of former senator's brother

William Weld, the leading Republican candidate for governor, acknowledged yesterday that "bad blood" exists between him and former Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, who remains a GOP power broker.

In his most detailed comments on the subject so far, Weld recounted an alleged, expletive-laced conversation 10 years ago in which D'Amato accused Weld of backing the federal prosecutor who investigated D'Amato's brother, Armand.

Armand D'Amato, a prominent lawyer, was convicted in 1993 of mail fraud in connection with money that he received for lobbying the senator on behalf of a military contractor. An appeals court a year later overturned the conviction. The prosecutor was a Weld protege, Robert Mueller, now director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

Weld said yesterday that he left the Justice Department's criminal division in 1988, years before Armand D'Amato's prosecution. But Alfonse D'Amato threatened in 1996 to take back $750,000 from the Senate GOP fund given to Weld's failed bid to replace Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), if Mueller was involved in the campaign, according to Weld.

"There is bad blood there," he said at a business breakfast in Manhattan.

Alfonse D'Amato denied the conversation ever took place. "This entire story is fictitious and preposterous. I never gave Bill Weld a check for that amount," D'Amato said, adding that campaign finance rules at the time barred check sums in excess of $17,500 per candidate.

D'Amato has repeatedly criticized Weld's political aspirations in New York State and praised the Democratic front-runner for governor, state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

Weld, in turn, likened Spitzer to former Massachusetts governor Michael Dukakis, also a Democrat. Both men believe more government and higher taxes will fuel economic growth, Weld said. "New York doesn't need more spending; it needs to control spending," said the man who succeeded Dukakis in 1991 and remained the Bay State's leader until mid-1997.

"Clearly, the[former] governor of Massachusetts has a lot of homework to do on the problems facing our state," Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson responded. "When he finally gets around to it, he'll see that the problems we face require real solutions rather than stale political rhetoric."

Weld ended his speech by borrowing slogans from two Democrats, Nassau County Executive Thomas Suozzi and former New York Gov. Alfred E. Smith.

"To coin a phrase, which I think you heard two weeks ago, I know I can do it because I did it," Weld said, modifying a line from Suozzi's stump speech for governor. Suozzi spoke to the group on March 8.

Weld said, "And I would very much like the opportunity to be the happy warrior" - a stock phrase from Smith's successful campaigns in the early 20th century.

Despite efforts to portray the gubernatorial contest as between himself and Spitzer, Weld faced questions about his lack of money and popularity, even within Republican ranks. He refused to discuss the Conservative Party's embrace of rival John Faso, a lobbyist; no GOP candidate has won statewide office recently without receiving the Conservatives' endorsement.

Weld also revealed he is reluctant to campaign with President George W. Bush. "I think that might cause a distraction between the state and national issues," Weld said.

WELD'S 'D' WORD FOR ELIOT: DUKAKIS (NYPOST)

By Maggie Haberman

The New York Post, March 24, 2006

Republican gubernatorial hopeful William Weld lashed out at front-runner Eliot Spitzer yesterday, tagging him as a modern-day Mike Dukakis who likes big govern ment.

"Like my predecessor in Massachusetts, Gov. Michael Dukakis, [Democrat Spitzer] puts his faith in govern ment," Weld, the former Massachusetts governor who wants to face Spitzer in November, told a Crain's breakfast forum. "Mr. Spitzer con tinues to propose com plex government schemes."

Dukakis lost the 1988 presidential election to George H.W. Bush in a landslide and didn't seek another gubernatorial term in 1990.

Spitzer campaign spokeswoman Christine Anderson said Weld "has a lot of homework to do on the problems facing our state."

Weld also ratcheted up his war of words with former Sen. Al D'Amato, who's had a strained relationship with Weld over his supposed role in a federal probe into D'Amato's brother years ago.

Current FBI Director Robert Mueller, a Weld friend and former colleague, also supposedly was involved in the probe.

Weld told the crowd that in 1996, when he was in Massachusetts running for U.S. Senate, his campaign was given $750,000 from the National Republican Senatorial Committee that D'Amato headed.

But, he claimed, D'Amato added in expletive-laden terms that if he ever saw Mueller at a Weld fund-raiser, "I am going to get every dollar of this back out of your hide [because] he's your guy."

D'Amato yesterday called Weld a liar. "I never met Bill Weld until Feb. 23" this year, at a fund-raiser at Mayor Bloomberg's house, he said.

Anti-meth Grants Sometimes Miss Mark (AP)

By MARK SHERMAN, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Some states with significant methamphetamine problems have not received their share of federal money because the bulk of a grant program was steered by lawmakers to favored projects in their districts, the Justice Department inspector general said Thursday.

Web Extras Justice Department inspector general

More than $179 million in anti-meth money administered by the department - 84 percent of the grant funds - has been earmarked, as the practice is known, by members of Congress for programs in their states and districts, Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said.

"As a result of the significant use of congressional earmarks in this program, funding is not always directed to the areas of the country with the most significant meth problem," Fine said report examining the grant program from 1998 to 2005.

The Bush administration has proposed ending most meth-related earmarks in the budget for 2007. Lawmakers have indicated they are unlikely to go along.

One example cited by Fine: Missouri ranked second, behind California, in seizing 11,859 meth labs between 1998 and 2004. But it was tenth in grants received with $3.7 million.

Texas and Illinois were 10th and 11th in the number of labs seized, but 23rd and 25th, respectively, in money from the meth initiative.

Meanwhile, the Sioux City, Iowa, police department was given $10 million for a training program that Fine said was not focused on meth or any drug. Instead, "classes focused on enhancing general law enforcement skills, such as interviewing and self-defense," he said.

In Vermont, the State Police used more than half of their $2.4 million grant for a task force to combat heroin. In Hawaii, where police seized 76 meth labs over seven years, a nonprofit group used $8.4 million in money targeted at meth for a variety of anti-drug programs.

Fine also faulted Justice's Office of Community Oriented Policing Services, or COPS, for its oversight of the program. The audit said there was a lack of coordination between officials in the COPS office, weaknesses in the database used to manage and track grants and insufficient and inconsistent monitoring of recipients of the money.

In a response to the audit, COPS director Carl Peed said Fine's staff took an overly rigid view of the grant program's standards for awarding money. But Peed agreed that his office needed to improve its monitoring.

"The COPS office rightfully looks to the individual grantee to identify what its most pressing needs are," Peed said.

US Indicts FARC Over £14bn Cocaine Cartel (SCO)

By JEREMY MCDERMOTT
Scotsman, March 24, 2006

THE United States has declared judicial war on Colombian rebels, issuing indictments for 50 guerrilla leaders, accusing them of running the world's biggest drug cartel and shipping £14 billion worth of cocaine.

In an unprecedented legal action Alberto Gonzales, the US Attorney General, listed 50 members of the Revolutionary Armed forces of Colombia (FARC) that would be requested for extradition to face drugs trafficking charges.

"This is the largest narcotics trafficking indictment ever filed in US history, and fuels our hope to reduce narco-violence in Colombia and stem the tide of illegal drugs entering our country. We believe these men are responsible for not only manufacturing and exporting devastating amounts of cocaine, but enforcing their criminal regime with violence," Mr Gonzales said.

The indictment accuses the FARC of exporting 50 per cent of the world's cocaine trade and 60 percent of the cocaine arriving in the US, so far totalling 2,750 tons, which the Attorney General valued at £14 billion. Only three of those listed by the Attorney General are in custody, the remainder are still directing rebel units in the 40 percent of Colombia where the FARC hold sway. Rewards for the capture of the 47 FARC leaders still at large, totalling more than £42 million, were also offered by US authorities.

The Colombian government was elated at the news, which will not only ensure that US aid, currently running at some £400 million a year continues, but that any FARC commanders captured can be shipped directly northwards, avoiding further strains on the shaky Colombian justice system and trembling prison service.

"We see this as recognition of the clear relationship between terrorism and narcotrafficking," said Camilo Ospina, the Colobian defence minister. "This shows that a big decision has been made to carry out the final battle against narcotrafficking and terrorism."

Whilst the US has been deeply involved in Colombia's four-decade civil conflict for many years, matters became personal in February 2003 when the FARC shot down a US intelligence plane with four Americans and a Colombian on board. The Colombian and a wounded American were shot at the crash site and the three remaining US citizens dragged into guerrilla captivity. The rebels have said they will not be released until hundreds of FARC prisoners held in both Colombian and US jails, are freed.

Whilst nobody doubts that the FARC are deeply involved in drugs trafficking, there has been surprise at the extent of the US indictment, and the fact that right-wing paramilitaries, who are in a peace process with the government but are believed to be far more involved in drugs, do not receive a mention. Many observers see political rather than legal pressures behind the FARC indictment, something US authorities deny.

"Make no mistake; they're not just ordinary drug traffickers," said Karen Tandy, the head of the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA). "To call them that would be something akin to calling Al Capone a tax cheat."

Many believe the US indictment will simply harden guerrilla resolve. "It is a total closing off of the possibility of negotiations with the FARC," said Ricardo Vargas of Andean Action, a Bogota-based think tank. "It will deepen the war."

Indictments Won't Faze FARC (AP)

BOGOTA (AP) _ The U.S. government's loudly trumpted drug indictments against 50 top leaders of Colombia's largest rebel group aren't likely to faze the insurgents – and analysts said Thursday they could even make it harder for Colombia to reach peace.

The head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, Karen Tandy stood beside U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Wednesday to announce the indictments and a combined USUS$77.5 million in reward money.

"Today is the beginning of the end for the FARC,'' Tandy said.

But the 17,000-strong FARC – the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia _ already has been branded a ``terrorist organization'' by both the U.S. State Department and the European Union.

Its leaders already are wanted at home and abroad on dozens of charges including kidnapping, drug trafficking and homicide. Only three of the 50 newly indicted are in Colombian custody, and they are minor figures

And many analysts think its a blunder to overplay the FARC's involvement in the drug trade, at least if officials hope to lure the group into resuming peace talks.

"It is a mistake to treat the FARC like a drug cartel because it ignores the fact that the principle goal of the FARC is not to make money from drug-trafficking but to take political power through violence,'' said Alfredo Rangel, a respected Colombian military analyst.

The FARC has always denied its involvement in drug-trafficking, saying it merely taxes coca-growers as a means to finance its war on the Colombian state.

Seven From Shelbyville Charged In Drug Bust (STG)

By Brian Mosely

Shelbyville Times-Gazette, March 23, 2006

TULLAHOMA--Federal authorities charged a total of 32 people, including seven from Shelbyville, with drug trafficking offenses in what is described as a major illicit organization with tentacles stretching from Mexico to Memphis to southern Middle Tennessee.

Two 47 count indictments were returned by a federal grand jury in Chattanooga on March 14, according to James R. "Russ" Dedrick, acting United States Attorney of the Eastern District of Tennessee.

Those from Shelbyville facing charges are Joel Fernandez-Vargas, 37; Jose Vargas, 55; Ramiro Onofre, 26; Francisco Javier Fernandez, 29; Timothy Harris, 46; Oscar Alejandro Melgoza, 27; and Shannon Prosser, age 28.

All were charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from June 2005 through March 2006.

If convicted, the defendants face a mandatory minimum of 10 years to life on the conspiracy charge. Those charged with distribution face a sentence up to 20 years.

Fernandez-Vargas is charged with distribution of cocaine on two occasions and distributing methamphetamine once, Jose Vargas and Prosser are each charged with distributing cocaine on one occasion, and all of those charged are accused of using a telephone to facilitate the distribution of controlled substances.

The maximum punishment for the offenses involving the telephone is up to four years in jail on each count.

The other indictment involved 18 people primarily from Tullahoma who were also charged with conspiring to distribute five kilograms or more of cocaine and 100 kilograms or more of marijuana from December 2003 through March 2006.

Those arrested on Tuesday are scheduled to appear in United States District Court in Chattanooga today before Magistrate Judge William B. Carter.

Dedrick said he was proud of the cooperation between local, state and federal law enforcement to bring about the successful operation, including the Bedford County Sheriff's Department and the Shelbyville Police Department, who provided support.

The investigation has been ongoing for three years and picked up steam over the last few months, identifying multiple individuals and organizations involved in trafficking drugs in this area, with additional indictments promised. Over 100 officers were involved in the operation.

Dedrick indicated that there were other law enforcement operations ongoing that were rounding up suspects related to this alleged ring on Wednesday.

Authorities seized about 4 pounds of cocaine and 200 pounds of pot, multiple guns, cash in addition to items seized in other parts of the country.

Primary agencies involved in the ongoing investigation include the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), Appalachian High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area (AHIDTA) Southeast Tennessee Task Force, (comprised of members of the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department, Chattanooga Police Department, Tennessee Bureau of Investigations, Tennessee Alcohol Beverage Commission) Tullahoma Police Department, Moore County Sheriff Department and the 17th Judicial District Task Force.

Also involved were a number of Tennessee sheriff and police departments as well as law enforcement from Dalton, Ga., the Tennessee National Guard, the Federal Bureau of Investigations (FBI), Department of Homeland Security, Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms (ATF) and the Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Feds Seize Drug Suspect's Lottery Loot (CAP)

By Lawrence Buser

Commercial Appeal, March 24, 2006

Rayford Andre Pratcher may have waited too long to spend his $66,666 lottery winnings.

Federal authorities who went through a Northeast Memphis apartment last August looking for drugs came up with the check in his name and now argue he must give it up.

Advertisement

"The defendant, One Tennessee Lottery Check #1031779, is traceable to drug proceeds and subject to forfeiture," Asst. U.S. Atty. Christopher Cotten said in papers filed this week in federal court.

Pratcher, 32, has a long history of drug offenses and has pending charges involving possession with intent to sell cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and Ecstasy.

On Aug. 28 at a gas station on South Perkins, police arrested a man named Jon Oliver, 26, whose front pockets they said were bulging with marijuana and methamphetamines.

When more drugs were found in his black Ford Explorer, Drug Enforcement Administration agents were brought in and the man agreed to a search of his apartment on Vintage Drive near I-40 and Germantown Parkway.

Agents found 56 grams of marijuana, cocaine and methamphetamine residue and the lottery check -- which was in a safe.

It was made payable to Pratcher, and Oliver told authorities he was storing it for him since Pratcher has no address and "jumps from hotel to hotel," court documents say.

He told agents Pratcher was the guy who had gotten out of the Explorer just before Oliver's arrest earlier that day.

Tennessee Lottery officials said Pratcher was issued the five-figure check Aug. 24 after he won an instant game called Emerald Green.

Pratcher's drug case goes before U.S. Dist. Court Judge Samuel Mays today.

No date has been set for the lottery-loot showdown.

Renewed Bid For Medical Marijuana Back In Court (AP)

By DAVID KRAVETS, Associated Press

AP, March 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed.

This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue.

The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right to life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain.

It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 mostly Western states authorizing medical marijuana.

"A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering," said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case.

The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

"She'd probably be dead without marijuana," said her doctor, Frank Lucido, who has recommended marijuana for some 3,000 patients. "Nothing else works."

The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

"There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court.

Voters in 1996 made California the first state to authorize patients to use marijuana with a doctor's recommendation. Ten other states have since followed suit, but the federal government says there is no medical value to the drug.

In 2001, the Supreme Court ruled that Raich's supplier, the Oakland Cannabis Buyer's Cooperative, could not lawfully dispense marijuana despite California voters approving its medical use.

Two years later, in a small victory for medical marijuana backers, the high court let stand a 9th Circuit decision saying doctors have a First Amendment right to discuss or recommend the drug to patients without the threat of federal sanctions.

But last June, the Supreme Court ruled the federal government could prosecute medical marijuana users and their suppliers.

In some states, federal agents have been sporadically arresting users and raiding so-called pot clubs that dole out the drug to patients.

Still, a footnote by Justice Clarence Thomas in his 2001 ruling left the legal questions surrounding medical marijuana unsettled and helped open the door to Monday's 9th Circuit hearing.

Thomas wrote that important underlying constitutional questions remain unresolved, such as Congress' ability to interfere with states experimenting with their own laws and whether Americans have a fundamental right to marijuana as a vehicle to stay alive and ease pain.

The justices answered the first part of that footnote in June, ruling in another case brought by Raich that patients living in states with medical marijuana laws could be prosecuted because Congress has classified marijuana as an illegal controlled substance.

That prompted Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., to propose legislation that would have blocked the Justice Department from prosecuting medical marijuana users in states where it is legal. The House balked at the measure 264-161. A Hinchey spokesman said the congressman will resurrect the proposal this summer.

Raich is back before the 9th Circuit, one step short of the Supreme Court, in a bid to settle the second part of Thomas' footnote.

Her lawyer, Barnett, is arguing the Constitution guarantees the gravely ill a right to available medication to keep them alive and relieve torturous pain.

Even if it is successful, the case would be unlikely to stop the raids on pot clubs or protect most users and suppliers. Raich herself was arrested last week for disorderly conduct after she demonstrated outside the Oakland federal courthouse over a recent raid on a medical marijuana dispensary.

Regardless of the outcome of her case, she said she will continue using marijuana to treat her symptoms, and will keep fighting to do so without the threat or fear of federal prosecution. She expects her case to go to the Supreme Court no matter the outcome.

"I am going to keep doing this until they stop me because this is not a medical cannabis case but a right to life case," she said. "The federal government can say who can live and who can die if I lose in the Supreme Court."

The case is Raich v. Gonzales, 03-15481.

Medical Pot Rules Get City Approval (SMCT)

By Todd R. Brown

San Mateo County (CA) Times, March 23, 2006

South City will ban clubs but allow collectives to grow plants

SOUTH SAN FRANCISCO — To some, it is a recreational intoxicant with milder health side effects than alcohol. To others, it is a moral scourge that Americans should "just say no" to. To still others, it is medicine, and the City Council on Wednesday night approved the first Peninsula measure on marijuana that regulates where it can be grown and how people can get it for medicinal use.

On a unanimous vote, the council decided to amend the city code on the cultivation of medical marijuana. The new rules outlaw storefront pot clubs but allow patients to collectively grow cannabis at least 500 feet from residential areas. The measure defines a caregiver who can provide marijuana to a patient as someone "who has consistently assumed responsibility for the housing, health or safety of that patient," not necessarily a physician. And it limits the number of patients per caregiver to 10.

"Without this, we have no control," said Councilwoman Karyl Matsumoto. "We're doing preventive (work) versus firefighting."

Police Sgt. Alan Normandy spearheaded the idea for the new rules last year after Tariq Alazraie, who runs the cannabis club Mason Street in San Francisco, proposed opening a club across the street from City Hall. In response, the council imposed a moratorium on cannabis clubs that was to expire in May of this year.

"We're putting the compassion back in the Compassionate Use Act by requiring that the caregiver actually care for the patient rather than just being a distributor of a substance," Normandy said earlier Wednesday, adding that Alazraie was helpful in sharing with him how Mason Street works.

The act, approved by 58 percent of California voters as Proposition 215 in 1996, allows doctors to prescribe marijuana to patients and lets caregivers administer the drug without fear of criminal prosecution. It specifies that patients can possess six mature cannabis plants, 12 immature plants and 8 ounces of dried marijuana, but leaves regulation of how to dispense it up to local governments.

The county works with the state through the Medical Marijuana Program, approved by voters as SB 420 in 2004, to provide patients and caregivers with I.D. cards to avoid arrest for drug possession or trafficking.

Chief Deputy District Attorney Steve Wagstaffe said he initially was wary of South City's plan when he thought it would legalize cannabis clubs that state law does not allow. The District Attorney's Office is set to prosecute Belmont resident Robert Simmons April 24 for allegedly running a pot club out of his home.

But Wagstaffe said because California voters support medical marijuana, his office wholly supports people organizing privately to grow the drug.

"We think it's something that the law does provide for," he said. "If South City's ordinance can fit within the law, we're supportive of it."

Federal law still outlaws any possession or use of marijuana, and the Drug Enforcement Agency maintains that illicit traffickers hide behind the California law. The DEA occasionally raids Bay Area pot clubs.

"We're required to comply with state law, not federal law," Normandy said, adding that South City's law is there to prevent pot clubs from taking advantage of the rules while making sure sick and dying patients get the pain relief they need. "It's certainly not designed to be an onerous thing. It keeps the honest people honest."

The Ongoing Battle to Legalize Medical Marijuana

At first glance, it would appear as if there is nothing that could get in the way of Jesse, an intimidating, 6-foot-plus, longhaired Nassau County man one could easily picture on a Harley or using a jackhammer. But since the 41-year-old salesman was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis (MS) in 1999, he has been injecting himself with some powerful drugs to slow the degeneration the incurable disease causes. The pain and side effects of those drugs can wear him down, so, to ease the discomfort while leading an otherwise normal family life with his wife and two kids, he smokes marijuana.

Jesse, who asked that we not use his real name, knows that he is breaking the law, but his doctors have endorsed the practice, and the results are irrefutable—so he takes the risk.

“For some of us, the answer seems so simple,” Jesse says from behind light-blue tinted sunglasses. “Over the years it has cured what ails me.”

He’s not alone. There are an estimated 2,500 diagnosed AIDS patients in Nassau and Suffolk counties, according to the Long Island Association for AIDS Care. There are about 7,000 MS patients for the region, according to the Long Island chapter of the National Multiple Sclerosis Society. Cancer statistics are difficult to track, but about 1 in 3 women and about 1 in 2 men will be diagnosed with cancer before reaching age 85, according to Hewlett-based 1 in 9: The Long Island Breast Cancer Action Coalition.

Many patients suffering from these diseases, other conditions, or the side effects of their treatments, have touted marijuana's medicinal benefits. Medical marijuana speakeasies have surfaced in cities across the country—although sometimes they clash with authorities.

More than 75 percent of New York voters support legalizing weed to help the seriously ill, provided it's under the supervision of a physician who prescribes it, according to a study conducted last year by the Siena Research Institute at Siena College in Loudonville, N.Y. Statewide organizations, such as the New York State Nurses Association, Hospice and Palliative Care Association of New York State and the New York State Association of County Health Officials, have publicly stated their support for a medical marijuana law. Even local groups like 1 in 9 hope for a day when patients in need can toke up.

"If this is something that will ease their pain, then I'm all for it," says Geri Barish, president of 1 in 9. "We need to come out of the dark ages. If there are things out there that can help, we need to be able to take advantage of them."

Two bills currently before the New York State Legislature address the issue. But the ease of lumping the medical marijuana movement in with those who want Dutch-style legalization—in the Netherlands, adult possession and purchase of small amounts of marijuana is allowed—makes the issue difficult for politicians. The Assembly has been fighting over medical marijuana bills for eight years now, without passing a single one. But stories like Jesse's are hard to ignore, and even prostate cancer survivor and Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno (R-Brunswick) said last year he would allow the legislation to come before the Senate. Then again, he hasn't pushed it through. In the Senate, the bill has languished.

A marijuana dispensary for prescription pot users in CaliforniaCurrently 11 states allow marijuana for medical use: Alaska, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Maine, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington. Arizona, which has a similar law, has no set program in place to administer marijuana that is prescribed. But last summer, the Supreme Court ruled that the federal right to prosecute marijuana users—even medicinal users in states that permit such use—trumps the states' right to help terminally ill constituents. The clash between federal and states' rights flared up again March 14, when federal agents raided the home of a 53-year-old California man and seized his small marijuana farm. Reports of excessive force prompted small protests in front of federal buildings in 20 cities in 11 Western states, and in Washington, according to the medical marijuana advocacy group Safe Access Now.

The issue is tough to get a consensus on federally. A proposal in the House of Representatives has failed to pass for five years in row. The Hinchey-Rohrabacher Amendment, named for Congressman Maurice Hinchey (D-Kingston), would prohibit the Department of Justice from prosecuting patients who use medical marijuana.

"The federal government should not intrude upon, let alone prosecute, patients who are using the substance in compliance with state law," Hinchey said in a statement.

Smoking in the Bathroom

In the 1980s, when the government first started taking seriously the idea of using pot to help patients, the National Institute on Drug Abuse provided marijuana to the New York State Department of Health for a study. One of the researchers, Dr. Vincent Vinciguerra, is now chief of medical oncology at North Shore University Hospital. His 1988 pilot study found that 78 percent of 56 patients who smoked the state-sponsored marijuana demonstrated control of chemotherapy-induced nausea and appetite loss.

"It gave them the munchies, and they were actually eating better," Vinciguerra says. One patient that Vinciguerra has been seeing for about four years recently opted for cannabis, after all the other anti-nausea medications were no longer effective. This is a scenario Vinciguerra witnesses with a small percentage of the 80 to 90 patients he sees weekly.

"Most don't need it," he says, "but when it's helpful, it would be nice to be able to provide it."

Dr. Vincent Vinciguerra found proof that medical marijuana works.The silver-haired physician, who has closely followed the progression of relevant legislation, is confounded by his lack of access to this tool, saying, "we owe it to the patients" to be able to provide medical marijuana. "You would think that since the study had positive results that people would right away pick up on it and try to make it available to their patients," he says. "It was an important finding."

But he also acknowledges the deeply rooted fears about the social implications. Vinciguerra notes with a laugh that during the study, the only place to have the patients smoke their medicine was in a hospital bathroom, where the odors wafting under the door made visitors wonder what the doctors were up to.

Ironically, Jesse, who says that Rebif, his MS medicine, feels like "battery acid" in his veins, worries what would happen if the government did regulate the steady supply of marijuana he's found for himself.

"It's easy enough to get it as it is," Jesse says, adding that politicians would just create more red tape for him than it's worth.

Buzzkill

The issue of whether marijuana should be legalized for medicinal purposes is, according to some groups, being exploited by pro-pot organizations as a means of getting cannabis legalized. “I am not saying ‘no’ to cannabis medicine,” says Steven Steiner, president of Dads and Mad Moms Against Drug Dealers (DAMMADD). “I want to see safe cannabis medicine.”

Steiner, who spends his time lobbying for strict drug laws and lecturing young people about the dangers of drugs, is a polarizing personality in the war on drugs. The organization was formed after Steiner’s son, Stevie, died from an overdose of OxyContin, a powerful pain medication the 19- year-old had obtained illegally. Steiner subsequently obtained funding for DAMMADD from major pharmaceutical companies, including Purdue Pharma, the makers of OxyContin.

Steiner’s biggest problem with the movement to legalize medicinal marijuana is groups such as the Drug Policy Alliance (DPA), which calls itself the leading organization in the United States promoting alternatives to the war on drugs. Steiner says that groups like the DPA unfairly use the possible benefits of medical pot to get the drug legalized.

“These groups just want to make it OK to smoke marijuana, so they use people that are sick and use marijuana to make their case,” says Steiner. “But they go dark when other alternatives are proposed.”

One of the issues Steiner raises, should marijuana be legalized, is quality control. “Who is going to grow this marijuana? Who is responsible?” says Steiner, pointing to the death of well-known medical marijuana advocate Jane Weirick, who died in 2005, possibly from an allergic reaction to a pesticide she used while growing her pot.

“I smoked pot and drank when I was a teenager. So did my friends and brothers,” says Steiner. “I am a hypocrite. But, we all learn as we get older. If my parents were privy to what I am privy to, maybe it would have made a difference.”

To Steiner, the fact that the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and other governmental agencies have not given the green light to medical marijuana is a telltale sign that smoking pot if you are ill is just not a good idea. “Put it this way,” he says, “if you ould smoke pot and cure cancer, it would have been approved by now.”

Rolling Legislation

Finding government-sponsored marijuana isn’t impossible, it’s just a zigzag road. For Assemb. Richard Gottfried (D-Manhattan), this is one of his main issues. His proposal to legalize marijuana for medical purposes drew assemblymen as sponsors, including Thomas Alfano (R-Franklin Square), Bob Sweeny (D-Lindenhurst) and Harvey Weisenberg (D-Long Beach).

After the Supreme Court ruled last June that the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) was within its rights to seize marijuana plants grown for medical use in California, there was a chilling effect on states dabbling with prescription pot. Gottfried is now redrafting his legislation.

New York State Sen. Vincent Liebell (R-Brewster), who sponsored what he calls a “very, very limited and closely controlled” medical marijuana bill in the Senate last year, is waiting to see how Rhode Island—the first state to pass a medical marijuana law since the Supreme Court ruling in June—handles the issue. Liebell feels it’s up to Congress to take the lead now.

“Our amendment helps ensure that the humane approach is taken to help people relieve severe pain,” Hinchey says. “Medical marijuana users are not criminals, but rather they are patients who are suffering from chronic pain or nausea and have exhausted all other medicines to treat their condition.” There was a small glimmer of hope for Hinchey shortly following the Supreme Court decision last year, even though the bill didn’t pass. The final count was 161 for and 264 against, which is so far the closest the proposal has come to passage, but still only 10 votes more than two years ago. “Progress on Capitol Hill is often incremental, and we’ll continue to push for this amendment each year until it passes,” he says.

Some experts fault political shortsightedness. “People don’t want to pass this because they don’t want to appear soft on crime,” says Ruth Liebesman, legal aid director for the New York State chapter of the National Organization for the Reformation of Marijuana Laws (NORML) and a privately practicing criminal defense attorney. She points out that doctors can prescribe variations of cocaine and heroin, describing the inconsistency as “intellectual dishonesty.”

So, until any further action is taken on these proposals, medicinal users are forced to maintain a low profile.

Pot Prohibition

As in the bootlegging days of Al Capone, when alcohol was illegal because of prohibition, clashes between DEA agents and medical marijuana advocates have created a culture of speakeasies. In New York City, there are patients who organize and meet to share their medicine, but finding them isn’t easy, unless you’re a card-carrying member.

For the past decade, Dana Beal, an advocate with Cures Not Wars, which helps organize the annual Marijuana March early each May, has been providing ID cards to suffering patients who are helped by marijuana. The cards aren’t sanctioned by any government agency, but are intended to help prevent patients from staying overnight in jail if they’re caught with marijuana. The cards give police an option to issue an appearance ticket rather than make an arrest, Beal says.

He adds that “there are patients and they organize themselves and they meet, but we don’t want them to end up like the paraplegic in California,” referring to a DEA raid in 2002 on a woman paralyzed from the waist down.

While Beal's organization works on the front lines of the medical marijuana issue, the group's stance that marijuana should be fully decriminalized—for recreational as well as medicinal use—is where the line is drawn between groups like theirs and NORML. For this legislation, the advocates maintain it is purely medical marijuana they seek, with organizers from the Marijuana Policy Project (MPP), who support repealing penalties for marijuana possession, but limit their argument for the survival of the bill.

Local MMP lobbyist Vince Marone described significant political progress last year in New York State. He says that there are discussions to reintroduce the legislation, after the budget is passed on April 1 and policy issues can once again be debated. It is not an impossibility: New Jersey has similar pending legislation and Connecticut has come close to passing a bill. although persistence seems key. As of 2004, 13 states had laws allowing therapeutic research programs with federal cooperation, and 10 states, including New York, have symbolic laws, which would allow patients to possess prescription pot if federal law were ever to be changed, according to MMP.

But despite all of the progress, none of the users will be free of the paranoia that they will be charged as common criminals for simply trying to feel better.

New Program Aims To Reduce Gun Crimes (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, March 23, 2006

Maryland U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein announced yesterday the start of a joint federal-local initiative designed to crack down on gun crimes in Prince George's County, where the vast majority of last year's record number of homicides were committed with firearms.

At a news conference at the U.S. District Courthouse in Greenbelt, Rosenstein said that under the program -- Prince George's EXILE -- federal and Prince George's law enforcement officials will collaborate more closely to identify and investigate violent offenders who use firearms, to crack down on illegal gun traffickers and to use the threat of tough federal sentencing laws to pressure defendants to plead guilty to gun crimes in state court.

Similar programs are in place or have been used in other cites, including Baltimore and Richmond.

"We have too many criminals walking the streets with guns," said Rosenstein, flanked by more than a dozen local and federal law enforcement officials. "Our goal is not just to prosecute gun crimes. Our goal is to deter violent crime."

To underscore what Rosenstein called an unprecedented level of cooperation in the local initiative between federal and local authorities, the federal prosecutor was joined at the news conference by Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey, Police Chief Melvin C. High and representatives from the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, the Drug Enforcement Administration, the office of Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), the state Division of Parole and Probation and other agencies.

Ivey said 85 percent of the 173 homicides committed in Prince George's last year involved firearms. High said county police confiscated 1,427 firearms last year and are on pace to match that this year.

The threat of longer federal prison terms for gun offenses will be a key part of the initiative, Rosenstein said.

Federal prosecutors will provide Prince George's prosecutors with a letter informing defendants in gun crimes that they could face federal prosecution for weapons violations. The goal of such letters is to persuade defendants to plead guilty to firearms offenses in state court, where they could be sentenced to five years in prison.

Penalties for such offenses are stiffer in the federal system. Depending on the number of previous felony convictions, a defendant could be sentenced to life in prison for illegal possession of a firearm, Rosenstein said.

There is no parole in the federal system.

Rosenstein also said Prince George's offenders who are released from state prison after serving their sentences or being paroled will be handed brochures informing them that they face severe consequences if they are caught with an illegal firearm.

The initiative went into effect this month, Rosenstein said. He said it was too early to measure the results.

Officials Puzzled By Increase In Youths With Weapons (LVS)

By David Kihara, Las Vegas Sun

Las Vegas Sun, March 24, 2006

Juvenile justice officials can't seem to explain a recent spike in juveniles arrested on gun-related charges.

In February there were 779 minors charged with gun-related offenses, up from 442 in February 2005, according to the county statistics.

But there's no reason for the 76 percent increase - there hasn't been a corresponding rise in anything that would provide a clear answer.

"There is no set pattern - it's across the board," said District Judge William Voy, who handles juvenile cases. "You get kids in gangs, and then you get kids with no gang affiliations whatsoever. It almost seems to be some fascination with guns."

The numbers have taken juvenile justice officials by surprise. They've seen minors arrested for shooting off guns in the air to impress their friends, carrying guns to school to show off or for protection, stealing guns and using guns in burglaries or robberies.

Darnell Couthen, spokesman for the Clark County School District police, said that the minors who are arrested for a gun-related offense span all socio-economic backgrounds and areas, from Cheyenne to Green Valley High School.

"It's kids being stupid," Couthen said. "They act like they're tough."

The Clark County School District also saw an increase in the number of guns officers confiscated. During the 2003-04 school year, the district confiscated 84 guns, up from 72 the year before.

Metro Police referred calls on juveniles possessing guns to the county's Juvenile Justice Services.

Some communities have created programs to curb juvenile gun offenses with alternative sentencing programs. In Birmingham, Ala., for example, a special "gun court" was created in 1995 that sent kids to a boot camp instead of behind bars and required parents to attend a workshop to educate them on the dangers of guns.

Gun-related juvenile offenses declined 38.7 percent in Birmingham after the program began, according to the Justice Department.

Although Clark County authorities can refer youths inappropriately firing off rifles on, say, BLM land to take classes on gun safety, there are no "gun court" programs for urban youths caught with a pistol in their school locker. They are arrested.

"The kids who have weapons in the community - we want to have an appropriate response," said Fritz Reese, assistant director of the Juvenile Justice Services Department. "We want them to know it's not OK to carry them around in the community." David Kihara can be reached at 259-2330 or at davidk@lasvegassun.com.

Police Arrest Man Sought Since Jan. 19 On Drug And Weapons Charges (LEXHL)

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), March 24, 2006

Authorities arrested this morning a 20-year-old Lexington man who escaped from police in January after they allegedly discovered drugs and weapons in a car he was driving.

Lexington police and U.S. marshals surrounded Tiquan Anderson's home on Radcliffe Road, off Russell Cave Road, in hopes of capturing the alleged drug dealer, a news release from the U.S. Marshals Service said. Authorities said they arrested Anderson without incident as he left his home through a back door.

He is charged with trafficking in a controlled substance, and fleeing and evading police, the release said.

Authorities said they have been searching for Anderson since Jan. 19, when he was stopped by a Kentucky Vehicle Enforcement officer on a ramp connecting Interstate 75 and Winchester Road. After the officer discovered "a large amount" of weapons and drugs -- including a fully loaded AK-47 machine gun, cocaine and marijuana -- Anderson took off running, the release said.

He left behind two of his buddies, who were arrested, the release said. They were not identified.

"We are delighted to have Anderson in custody," said John Schickel, U.S. marshal for the Eastern District of Kentucky. "He has a long criminal history and is a dangerous person. Any time you can get someone like that off the street, we feel good."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Is Facing A Difficult Path On Immigration (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 23 — In the days before the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, immigration policy was going to be President Bush's signature issue. It was central to his thinking as the former governor of a border state, key to his relationship with President Vicente Fox of Mexico and essential in attracting new Hispanic voters to the Republican Party.

Five years later, Mr. Bush has at last realized some momentum on immigration policy, but it is probably not the activity he once anticipated.

He has lost control of his own party on the issue, as many Republicans object to his call for a temporary guest-worker program, insisting instead that the focus be on shutting down the flow of illegal immigrants from Mexico. It is not clear how much help he will get from Democrats in an election year.

The issue will come to the floor of the Senate next week, and the debate is shaping up as a free-for-all that will touch on economics, race and national identity.

At the end of next week, Mr. Bush is scheduled to meet with Mr. Fox in Cancún, Mexico. Immigration is likely to be a source of tension in their talks.

In short, Mr. Bush is facing another test of his remaining powers as president.

On Thursday, he called for calm in a White House meeting with groups pressing for changes in American immigration laws.

"I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," the president said.

He added, in a warning to members of Congress, that "the debate must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

The discussion has intensified as Mr. Bush finds himself caught between two of his most important constituencies: business owners and managers on the one hand, conservatives on the other.

Philosophically, the president, whose own sensibility on the issue was shaped by his experience as governor of Texas, says he is committed to a program that meets the needs of business: the creation of a pool of legal foreign workers for industries that have come to rely on low-wage labor.

Mr. Bush also brings to the debate a stated belief that the country benefits from the immigration of hardworking people and their dreams of becoming Americans. He often talks about the United States as a land of immigrants, and on Monday in Cleveland he said that "my only advice for the Congress and for people in the debate is, understand what made America."

But politically, Mr. Bush must satisfy his most conservative supporters. Many of them view illegal immigration as a strain on schools, the health care system and the economy, and some have warned that in their opinion the nation's cultural identity could be washed away by a flood of low-income Spanish-speaking workers.

For now, Mr. Bush is trying to navigate the storm with a proposal that tries to satisfy both groups: a toughened border enforcement plan coupled with a temporary guest-worker program that would allow some of the estimated 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States to register for legal status and remain here for as long as six years.

"Our government must enforce our borders; we've got plans in place to do so," Mr. Bush said on Thursday. "But part of enforcing our borders is to have a guest-worker program that encourages people to register their presence so that we know who they are, and says to them, if you're doing a job an American won't do, you're welcome here for a period of time to do that job."

Pollsters say the issue is still fluid among voters, although they expect public opinion to solidify during the coming debate in Congress and as Mr. Bush promotes his plan.

"He's got a very strong position with the bully pulpit," said David Winston, a Republican pollster, "but the dynamic of the issue at this point is that there is consensus around border security, but people have not come to a similar consensus about what to do with the 11 million in the country."

Two years ago, a New York Times/CBS News poll found that two-thirds of those surveyed said immigrants who had entered the country illegally should not be allowed to stay and work in the United States for three years, the initial period of stay in Mr. Bush's proposed guest-worker program. There was also little enthusiasm for any increase in immigration, with a plurality saying immigration should be decreased.

The poll was conducted shortly after Mr. Bush made his first major speech on his immigration plan.

"Many of you here today are Americans by choice, and you have followed in the paths of millions," Mr. Bush told a cheering, chanting crowd packed with Hispanic leaders in the East Room of the White House in January 2004. Every generation of immigrants, he added, "has reaffirmed the wisdom of remaining open to the talents and dreams of the world."

But critics said that Mr. Bush's guest-worker program did not go far enough, and that there was deportation, not a green card, at the end of the process. At the same time, his words angered many conservative Republicans, who said the plan amounted to amnesty.

Mr. Bush dropped his immigration proposals as too risky for his 2004 re-election campaign, but took them up again in 2005. By then, in an effort to calm conservatives, he had switched his tactics, emphasizing the national-security part of the plan.

"We're going to get control of our borders," he vowed in the East Room of the White House in October 2005 as he signed a $32 billion domestic security bill that had big increases for the Border Patrol.

This year, Mr. Bush has continued to push the issue and is closely watching what happens on Capitol Hill.

The House has passed an immigration bill that includes border security, not a guest-worker program. The action is now in the Senate, where it will resume next week.

There are a rash of competing immigration proposals on both sides, including one from Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and another from Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts. The majority leader, Senator Bill

Frist of Tennessee, has threatened to offer his own border-security-only bill if the Senate cannot come up with legislation on its own.

Immigration Debate Is Shaped By '08 Election (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

President Bush's effort to secure lawful employment opportunities for illegal immigrants is evolving into an early battle of the 2008 presidential campaign, as his would-be White House successors jockey for position ahead of next week's immigration showdown in the Senate.

Bush called on Congress yesterday to tone down the increasingly sharp and divisive rhetoric over immigration, as he renewed his push for a guest-worker plan that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to continue working in the United States. But Bush's political sway is already weakened by public unease about the war in Iraq and by Republican divisions.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), whom Bush helped elect as party leader, is threatening to bring a new immigration bill to the Senate floor early next week. It would tighten control of the nation's borders without creating the guest-worker program the president wants.

Meanwhile, Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), a rival of Frist's for the Republican nomination, is promoting Bush's call for tougher border security and the guest-worker program as he embraces the president to shore up his standing with Republican leaders. In the House, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) is garnering support for a long-shot presidential bid with his fierce anti-immigration rhetoric.

And after weeks of sitting on the sidelines, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) jumped into the immigration debate Wednesday. She declared that Republican efforts to criminalize undocumented workers and their support networks "would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

Presidential politics "makes it that much more difficult, of course," said Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), a strong Bush ally on the issue. "You would hope three years out that we could tamp that out and focus on the policy questions at stake, but maybe that's not possible."

For Republican presidential candidates, immigration offers up a difficult choice: Appeal to conservatives eager to clamp down on illegal immigration who could buoy your position in the primaries, or take a moderate stand to win independents and the growing Latino vote, which could be vital to winning the general election.

"The short-term politics of this are pretty clear. The long-term politics are pretty clear. And they're both at odds," said Mike Buttry, a spokesman for Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.), another potential GOP presidential candidate.

Senators had hoped to avoid such acrimony when the Judiciary Committee began drafting its immigration bill early this month. Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) had vowed to write a bipartisan proposal that would bridge conservative demands for much tougher border enforcement with calls from both parties for a guest-worker program to meet the demand for unskilled labor and to address the 12 million illegal immigrants living in the United States.

But after progress slowed, Frist short-circuited the process. He announced that the Senate will take up border security and immigration enforcement measures on Tuesday -- without a guest-worker component -- if Specter cannot produce a bill by Monday.

Frist has not ruled out a guest-worker program. But conservatives' grumbling about the president's program found a Senate voice yesterday when Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) announced that he will not accept such a program until "we have proven without a doubt that our borders are sealed and secure."

At the same time, Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) promised this week to filibuster Frist's enforcement-only bill.

"If the majority leader is . . . going to bring his own bill to the floor, dealing with only one of the problems we have with immigration, then I will use every procedural means at my disposal to stop that," Reid said on CNN.

The fight next week will test Republican unity on an issue with social, political and national security implications. Adding to the tumult will be House Republican leaders, who muscled through an immigration enforcement bill in December and plan a series of events in the coming days to trumpet border security.

The debate will also serve as a test of Bush's ability to sway an increasingly restive Republican Congress on an issue he has championed since his first term. In recent months, under pressure from GOP lawmakers, Bush has retreated from focusing mostly on the guest-worker program to giving equal billing to border security.

"But part of enforcing our borders is to have a guest-worker program that encourages people to register their presence so that we know who they are, and says to them, 'If you're doing a job an American won't do, you're welcome here for a period of time to do that job,' " Bush said after meeting with groups involved in the immigration fight.

The leading bills all seek to bolster border enforcement with more police on the frontier and more technology tracking illegal crossings. But a bill co-sponsored by McCain and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) breaks with Specter's proposal by offering an easier road to citizenship for illegal immigrants already in the country.

Specter also goes further to exact punishment on illegal immigrants who seek to obtain a guest-worker permit, and his measure could punish those who help illegal immigrants, even church groups that offer shelter. Frist has taken the border security and immigration enforcement provisions from Specter's bill, while leaving behind his guest-worker program.

Guest-worker proposals would allow businesses to offer special work visas to illegal immigrants already in the country if they can show that U.S. workers will not take the positions. The visas would last for up to six years under the leading Senate proposals, but senators are divided over whether workers would have to return to their home countries for a year before qualifying for a renewal.

White House aides said Bush remains deeply committed to the guest-worker program, despite resistance from conservatives, and is certain it will help expand the party's support in Florida and in the Southwest, which is emerging as a key battleground in national elections.

Former congressman Timothy J. Roemer (D-Ind.) said the debate over welfare reform in the 1990s should serve as the model for compromise on immigration today.

"The middle of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party have a responsibility to tackle and solve this issue," he said.

Kolbe said it is increasingly unlikely Congress will reach an agreement that could make it to the president's desk.

"I don't think this fire is easily extinguished," he said. "Rarely have I seen an issue that divides people so clearly, with so little possibility of seeking a middle ground."

W Chides Hil, Saying Be Nice On Immig Bill (NYDN)

By Kenneth R. Bazinet And Michael McAuliff

New York Daily News, March 24, 2006

President Bush took an apparent swipe at Sen. Hillary Clinton yesterday as he called for a civil debate over a controversial immigration reform bill.

The President's comments came a day after Clinton (D-N.Y.) said GOP immigration reform would make a criminal out of "Jesus himself."

"When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way," Bush said after meeting with business and religious advocates on the issue yesterday.

"It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another," he said.

A White House official said the President was well aware of Clinton's biblical broadside when he spoke, but Team Bush didn't want to single her out and give her the spotlight.

Later in the day, White House spokesman Scott McClellan said: "I don't think he was trying to single anybody out. I think what he was trying to say is that he recognizes there are a lot of strong feelings on this issue, but that we need to find a way to move forward by working together."

Clinton's spokesman said her remarks have been civil.

A number of competing bills are floating around on Capitol Hill, and the Senate is set to begin the bruising political debate next week over the biggest proposed overhaul of immigration laws in two decades.

Clinton took particular aim at a measure sponsored by Reps. Pete King (R-L.I.) and James Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that currently would brand undocumented immigrants as felons, although the lawmakers insist that charge will only be a misdemeanor in the final law.

Among the louder critics of the GOP proposals has been the Catholic Church, with Roger Cardinal Mahony of Los Angeles vowing his diocese wouldn't obey any laws that criminalize illegal aliens or the social service providers who help them. Brooklyn Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio has made similar comments.

King, a Catholic, slammed his own church yesterday as "un-Christian" for baselessly scaring the clergy and immigrants with doomsday scenarios.

"The Catholic Church is being totally fraudulent on this. If Cardinal Mahony spent as much time turning over information on pedophile priests as telling priests to violate the law on this, California would be a lot better than it is today," he told the Daily News Editorial Board.

"They're being totally un-Christian because they're talking about this being an evil bill, a meanspirited bill, that we're doing all this as subterfuge to lock them up," he said. "Now, we could lock them up for other reasons - with what they did with pedophilia and what they did to abuse kids in Catholic schools, we could have locked them up years ago."

Bush Seeks 'Civil' Immigration Debate (WT)

By Charles Hurt And Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Even as President Bush called for a "civil" debate on immigration yesterday, a confrontation was brewing on Capitol Hill with some Republicans saying Mr. Bush must stop demonizing them and Democrats vowing to fight the Senate majority leader's bill.

"When we conduct this debate it must be done in a civil way," Mr. Bush said after meeting with groups that support legalizing illegal aliens. "It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

The president's spokesman said Mr. Bush wasn't singling out any group or person. But Rep. J.D. Hayworth, a top voice calling for better enforcement, said while he took Mr. Bush at his word, civility is a "two-way street" and the White House must stop attacking Republicans who disagree with it.

"If I had any advice for my friends at the White House, I think it would be to really reconsider posturing every disagreement as some sort of new political [or] psychological malady," Mr. Hayworth said.

He pointed to when Republican leaders said conservative opponents to Supreme Court nominee Harriet Miers were sexist, labeled opponents of the Dubai ports deal as Islamophobes and called members of the Minuteman Project that guarded the southern border "vigilantes."

Meanwhile, the Senate debate is turning pointed, with Republicans warning Senate Democrats that they will pay a political price if they block efforts to pass immigration legislation this year.

"It's discouraging that before the debate has even begun in the full Senate, the Democrat leadership is threatening to filibuster any legislation that doesn't include amnesty," said Sen. John Cornyn, Texas Republican who has offered immigration legislation. "This is not the way to improve our national security and keep Americans safe."

Earlier this week, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid stood near the U.S.-Mexico border and threatened to "use every procedural means at my disposal" -- including a filibuster -- to thwart the border security legislation Majority Leader Bill Frist plans to begin debating Monday.

Mr. Reid said he's opposed to the bill because Mr. Frist is introducing it directly to the full Senate, bypassing the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"What we're bringing to the floor is a border security bill to secure the borders and protect people," Frist spokesman Bob Stevenson said. "To suggest that he would filibuster such a measure only weakens our position at a time when we're fighting a war on terror. It just fits into the Democrat strategy of delay and obstruct."

Also this week, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton promised to block any legislation that would make being in the U.S. illegally a felony, rather than the current civil offense. Such a move would be "mean-spirited," she said, and not in keeping with Republicans' professed belief in religious values.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scriptures, because this bill would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she told a crowd in New York on Wednesday.

Mr. Frist's Securing America's Borders Act, which he introduced late last week, would criminalize illegals, fund hundreds more border agents and build limited fencing. Though the bill does not include a guest-worker program, Mr. Frist has said he expects one to eventually be included through amendments on the floor.

Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary Committee will continue wrangling over guest-worker proposals but few Senate observers are optimistic that they will agree on one.

Mr. Bush has called for a bill that includes both enforcement and a guest-worker program, though he has said new workers would be temporary and current illegal aliens would not get "automatic citizenship."

In his meeting with the lobby groups yesterday, Mr. Bush did not stake out a new position or clarify what "automatic citizenship" means, according to participants. But they said the president made it clear he will continue to highlight the issue and expects to play a major role when the House and Senate go to conference on immigration legislation.

After the meeting he made his plea for a measured debate.

"I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," he said.

Groups on both sides of the debate said they interpreted the remarks as aimed at those who want better enforcement and oppose a guest-worker plan.

"Sadly, if he's talking to people who want to enforce immigration laws he's talking to the majority of Americans," said Rikki Horton, government relations associate at the Federation for American Immigration Reform.

DOJ_NMG_0020947

Mr. Hayworth, at home while Congress is on recess, said what he sees at town-hall meetings in his Arizona district isn't "anger directed at a person or an ethnic group," but rather frustration at the federal government's failure to control the border and enforce the law.

Bush Calls For Civil Debate On Immigration Proposals (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Thursday urged all sides in the immigration debate to tone down their rhetoric and engage in civil, respectful discussion as Congress nears action on an issue that has sharply divided the nation and the Republican Party.

The Senate is expected next week to consider legislative proposals to overhaul the nation's immigration laws, and key provisions — particularly those that would permit foreigners to work temporarily in the United States — have become the focus of disagreement on Capitol Hill, on conservative talk shows and at political meetings.

The vitriol on immigration far exceeds the language surrounding other significant but less emotional policy controversies, including changes in tax laws and the prescription drug benefit that has been added to Medicare.

"It's important that we have a serious debate, one that discusses the issues. But I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions," Bush said after meeting with supporters of his immigration proposal.

"When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

The issue is politically sensitive for Bush and his fellow Republicans.

Increasing the Republican share of the Latino vote has been a key objective for Bush's chief political advisor, Karl Rove, as part of his strategy to solidify GOP control of the presidency and Congress.

Through the 2004 election, it appeared that Bush and Rove were succeeding.

In that contest, Bush picked up 45% of the Latino vote, according to Los Angeles Times exit polls, a gain of 7 percentage points from 2000. But a harsh debate over immigration could erase GOP gains among Latinos, give the party an anti-immigrant cast and prompt a backlash.

Perhaps the loudest congressional voice in the campaign to restrict immigration has been that of Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.).

Reflecting the divisions within their party over immigration, Tancredo and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas — who on nearly all other issues wins strong support from conservatives — have taken opposite positions on allowing undocumented workers to remain in the United States while pursuing legalization of their status. Tancredo opposes it; Brownback favors it.

Asked about the president's request for civility, Tancredo's spokesman, Will Adams, offered no apology for his boss' views.

The congressman, Adams said, has "devoted his political career to immigration because he thinks it's essential to our national security and our economic security, and to who we are as Americans. Occasionally, the debate does get uncivil, but this is a product of it being so important."

But even the president's request that participants in the debate control their language drew finger-pointing.

Adams quoted his boss as saying: "With respect to the call to cool it down, Hillary Clinton said yesterday that the House bill would criminalize Jesus, so I assume the president is referring to her."

In a brief news conference Wednesday, Clinton (D-N.Y.) said that a bill the House approved in December "would literally criminalize not only every nondocumented immigrant in our country but every person who helped, assisted, reached out [or] otherwise responded in a humanitarian way to the needs of immigrants.

"It is certainly not in keeping with my understanding of the Scripture, because this bill would literally criminalize the good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself," she said.

Her spokesman, Philippe Reines, said of the president's request Thursday: "Since Sen. Clinton has always discussed this important issue in a serious, civil and dignified manner, we assume that his admonition was directed elsewhere."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan offered no hints to suggest at whom the president was pointing — but there is no shortage of potential targets.

Anti-immigration activist Juan Mann, whose calls for stronger law enforcement appear on The Immigration Blog website, has written that Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, "has been dutifully peddling the Bush administration's ongoing promotion of the Big Lie that a 'guest worker program' is not an illegal-alien amnesty."

Chris Simcox, president of the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps, said Thursday in a news release that "America's national security is being held hostage by Democrat Party leaders who have placed the interests of millions of lawbreakers before secure borders and the expressed will of the American people. Our southern border is a virtual war zone."

The House version of immigration legislation focuses solely on border security and enforcement and does not address the guest worker program Bush favors.

It includes a provision that would bar health-care workers, educators and others to provide assistance to undocumented workers.

At a conference at the Capitol on Thursday, Anna Burger, chairwoman of Change to Win, a coalition that favors increased rights for immigrant workers, described the House measure as "an evil bill. It criminalizes children, all of us, those who are immigrants and those who help immigrants."

The Senate is scheduled to begin debating broader immigration legislation Monday. Republicans are deeply divided over whether the overhaul should address enforcement issues first, or whether to take a comprehensive approach and include a guest worker program and a way to deal with the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants living and working in the United States.

One Step Forward (WP)

"BREAKTHROUGH" is a word that should always be used with extreme care, at least when discussing immigration reform. Nevertheless, it may be warranted: The Senate Judiciary Committee, which had been bogged down for several weeks trying to produce an immigration bill, appears to have reached a consensus. The deal doesn't solve all of the problems, but it does at least try to solve the most difficult: the fate of the estimated 12 million people who live in this country illegally.

In its essence, the compromise -- patterned on a proposal by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) -- allows undocumented workers living here to apply for residency permits, on the condition that they prove they are employed and pay a hefty fine for breaking the law. They would then go to the back of the green card line -- behind those applying legally -- and wait for citizenship. President Bush has always said he would endorse such a solution as long as it doesn't look like an "amnesty" that rewards lawbreakers. During a news conference this week, he seemed to say that the Senate solution might be precisely that: "People who have been here need to get in line, like everybody else," he confirmed.

This is, of course, a very fragile sort of agreement. It hasn't been voted on, or even properly written down. It doesn't get to the issue of what to do about temporary workers who want to come here in the future, and it doesn't solve the border control issues either. Amazingly, some in the Senate and the House are still pushing to build a wall along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border, a project that -- aside from its unpleasant symbolism -- would cost billions of dollars (a 14-mile wall near San Diego cost $70 million alone), would deal with only part of the problem (40 percent of the undocumented are thought to have arrived in other ways), and would not prevent people from using tunnels and ladders to get across, as they do now.

Even more worrying are the complicated politics of making any immigration deal stick. Already, the immigration debate has become a forum for 2008 campaign jockeying, as possible presidential contender Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) tries to distance himself from possible presidential contender Mr. McCain, largely by sounding a much harder line on enforcement. Since the House doesn't seem to be in a mood to talk about anything but enforcement either, that bodes ill for anyone who wants a realistic solution to the problem of the undocumented. Still, a breakthrough is a breakthrough, however fragile, and the senators on the Judiciary Committee, led by Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), are to be commended for reaching it.

Thousands March For Immigrants (MJS)

By Mark Johnson And Linda Spice

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 24, 2006

In one of Milwaukee's largest demonstrations in recent years, a mile-long swath of peaceful protesters marched into the city's downtown Thursday chanting, "¡Sí, se puede!" ("Yes, we can!"), carrying Mexican and American flags and signs condemning what they called "anti-immigrant" legislation.

Hundreds of students took the day off school; businesses around southeastern Wisconsin closed; and thousands of workers left their jobs in support of the event billed as "A Day Without Latinos."

Although march organizers put the crowd at 30,000, Milwaukee police estimated that there were between 10,000 and 15,000 marchers, said spokeswoman Anne E. Schwartz. She said there were no arrests.

The march, which culminated in a 90-minute rally in Zeidler Park, followed a similar event two weeks ago in Chicago that drew a crowd of up to 100,000 people.

"This is a historic day," declared Christine Neumann-Ortiz, executive director of Voces de la Frontera, an organization devoted to immigrant and worker rights issues.

"We have people from all walks of life. We have teachers. We have doctors. We have professionals. And, best of all, children. We wanted to recognize the workers who left their jobs today. There has been a strong show of solidarity," she said.

The event underscored both the growing political muscle of Latinos, America's fastest-growing minority, and the divisiveness of immigration issues in the post-9-11era.

One of the targets of Thursday's protest was a sweeping federal bill sponsored by U.S. Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that would keep illegal immigrants in jail until they are processed for deportation, increase penalties for improper entry into the United States, and provide mandatory minimum sentences for illegal immigrants convicted of re-entering the U.S.

Several of the speakers Thursday singled out Sensenbrenner for criticism, including Sheila Cochran of the Milwaukee County Labor Council, who called the bill "wrong-spirited, wrongheaded and just plain wrong."

Xavier Marquez, president of the Racine group Students United for Immigrant Rights, called Sensenbrenner's bill "racist and divisive."

In a statement released later in the day, Sensenbrenner said, "The illegal alien rally held in Milwaukee today was an impressive show of force. But I do not believe that illegal aliens should receive legal government documents such as driver's licenses."

He said many people "have tried to confuse the difference between legal and illegal immigration," and added that putting illegal immigrants on a path toward citizenship "would be a slap in the face to all those who have followed the law and have come to America legally."

As the marchers were gathering, the Milwaukee Common Council voted 11-1 to oppose Sensenbrenner's bill. Instead, they called on Congress to approve an immigration reform bill that would help illegal immigrants attain legal status, expand temporary work visas and tighten border security.

The House passed Sensenbrenner's bill. Both that measure and competing legislation sponsored by U.S. Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Ted Kennedy (D-Mass.) are awaiting Senate action.

Two Wisconsin measures also drew the ire of speakers at the rally, including a law signed two weeks ago by Gov. Jim Doyle that forces applicants for state driver's licenses to present proof of legal residency. The second measure, if approved and signed by the governor, would deny undocumented immigrants access to school lunches for their children, public medical services and public defenders in court.

A community coalition

The march and rally stitched together a coalition of political leaders, including Mayor Tom Barrett, U.S. Rep. Gwen Moore (D-Wis.) and state Rep. Pedro Colón (D-Milwaukee), as well as labor unions, business groups and religious leaders.

"I am a third-generation Mexican-American. I am not an undocumented immigrant, but I strongly support my undocumented immigrant brothers and sisters in their struggle for justice and their equal rights," said Marquez, the leader of Students United for Immigrant Rights.

"On the Statue of Liberty it says, 'Give me your tired, your hungry, your poor yearning for liberty,' and that's why we're here," said Michael Rosen, president of the local union representing teachers at Milwaukee Area Technical College.

He vowed, "We will not allow George Bush, we will not allow Congressman Sensenbrenner to pit one part of the working class against another part of the working class."

Milwaukee School Board member Jennifer Morales called on all members of the school community "to oppose any law that makes criminals of children." She encouraged school employees to continue to provide services children need, such as food, health care and education.

The march and rally drew many families.

Angel Silva, 13, missed classes at Bruce Guadalupe Middle School to attend the rally with his family, saying, "We're only students. We're not terrorists. We want to get our education and go on to be a good person and live our life well."

His younger brother, Marc Anthony DeLeon, 9, said he opposes the bill "that any immigrant children they can't have lunch at the schools. And we don't think that's right."

The boys' mother, Magdalena DeLeon, 33, of Milwaukee, is a fifth-generation Mexican-American whose family originally immigrated from Jalisco, Mexico. She said she discussed with her children the U.S. Constitution and Declaration of Independence.

"The United States of America was built and established for the freedom of people," she said. "We have to be united as one, liberty and justice for all mankind."

The signs the marchers carried drew heavily on emotion and appealed to values enshrined in the Declaration of Independence and the inscription on the Statue of Liberty.

DOJ_NMG_0020950

A large cloth banner said, "Open the doors to citizenship. Immigration is an American experience." A sign showed a photograph of a child wearing a red graduation cap and gown, with the caption, "I'm not a criminal." Another sign said, "You let us fight and die for the country, but we're still not called American."

Several of the speakers were children, including Samantha Pastrana, who led the crowd in the Pledge of Allegiance.

TAX:

Oregon's Coffers Bulge But Services Suffer (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Earlier this month, Oregon Gov. Ted Kulongoski got some good news: The state's coffers were bulging with almost $700 million in unanticipated tax revenue.

But like a dieter in a pastry shop, Mr. Kulongoski can only dream about what he'd do with the extra cash. Under a one-of-a-kind Oregon law, the money must be refunded to individual taxpayers and corporations instead of going to the state.

As a result, residents and companies that do business in Oregon will receive refunds or credits, even as the state struggles to fill a $172 million funding gap for its human-services division and a $57 million shortfall for public schools in Portland, where as many as 14 schools might be shuttered.

The situation is roiling Oregon, prompting cries from labor unions, school officials and many residents to end the tax "kicker" for corporations -- and posing a challenge for Mr. Kulongoski, a Democrat up for re-election in November. Mr. Kulongoski, whose approval rating hovers at around 38%, faces a primary challenge from two Democrats, both of whom have called for an end to the corporate kicker. In a pair of setbacks, a large labor union endorsed one of his opponents, and the Oregon Education Association declined to back a candidate in the May primary.

The governor also says that the corporate kicker no longer makes sense for Oregon, and that the money should be redirected to the state to help pay for things like education and health care. He has been lobbying business to go along with the move, but faces opposition from state legislators, particularly Republicans who control the House, as well as from some business interests opposed to the idea.

"The dilemma for us is that we should be using those resources to rebuild what we lost in 2001-2003," when the state's revenue fell 20% below projections, Mr. Kulongoski said in an interview. "I wish we could call a timeout on both the corporate and individual kicker ... and give us the chance to rebuild what we've lost."

Like many states, Oregon is dealing with economic extremes, veering between a comfortable surplus and a dearth of cash while being required to balance its budget. States are coming off their worst fiscal crisis in decades, in which they slashed spending and borrowed money, and are seeing surpluses aided by the stronger economy.

Oregon is not the only state wrestling with a spending limit. Last year, Colorado voters agreed to temporarily suspend the state's spending cap after they were persuaded it was artificially depressing the state's economy. The Colorado Taxpayer Bill of Rights was more severe than Oregon's, because its cap on state spending allows for only inflation and population growth.

Oregon's situation has arisen from a spurt in corporate profits and an influx of jobs. The state, which has no sales tax, gets more than 90% of its general fund revenue from individual and corporate income taxes.

But the state's fiscal situation is complicated by the fact that voters have sought to limit spending. In 1979, Oregon voters approved a law stipulating that if the state's general-fund revenue exceeded budget estimates by 2% or more, the excess had to go back to taxpayers. The idea was to curb state spending by keeping excess money from falling into the hands of politicians. In 2000, the state's constitution was amended to include the kicker. Overall spending in the state has increased about 17% in the past five years, including more money for education and human services.

Because Oregon operates on a two-year budget, tax-revenue estimates can vary widely from the amount ultimately collected. When the current 2005-2007 budget was being prepared, Oregon -- like most states -- was coming off a severe economic downturn, leading to overly conservative revenue estimates. As a result, 2005-2007 revenues appear to be well ahead of estimates, fueled by higher corporate profits and more jobs in the state. The state estimates that $205 million in tax credits will go to corporations, while $450 million in refunds will go to individuals, and the amounts could grow before the end of fiscal 2007.

The situation was reversed in the 2001-2003 budget period, when collections fell below estimates, forcing the state to cut programs, including education. To help cover the shortfall, the state imposed a cigarette tax, tapped an education stability fund and borrowed money to help balance the budget.

"The kicker is just insane tax policy," says state Senate Majority Leader Kate Brown, a Democrat. "I know it hurts us at a national level in terms of our bond rating and in terms of being able to fund programs to stability."

Still, legislators aren't eager to tackle the issue during an election year. Mr. Kulongoski says he wants the Legislature to refer the issue to voters on the November ballot, but the Legislature isn't scheduled to meet again until January 2007. While members may hold a special session in May to address the health and education funding shortfalls, Republicans have indicated no interest in discussing the corporate kicker. Many Republicans in the state have taken a no-tax pledge and see rescinding the kicker as a de facto tax increase on business.

At the same time, business isn't united on the issue. While some business groups say they would agree to end the kicker, they don't agree on how the state should use the money. Some want it placed in a rainy-day fund, some want a simultaneous cut in capital-gains taxes, and others want the individual kicker abolished as part of any plan.

Jim Schweinhart, fiscal-policy lobbyist for Associated Oregon Industries, said the business community isn't interested in just handing the kicker back to the state's general fund. "The primary reason the kicker was voted on and put in the constitution was that it's a way to control spending," said Mr. Schweinhart, whose group represents mainly small businesses. "One of the problems we have here in Oregon is that in the '90s, the politicians took the money we got in the good times and spent, spent, spent."

J.L. Wilson, director of the National Federation of Independent Business-Oregon, said there is "no impetus from the business community to deal with this in a special session, and I think the Senate and House leadership respects that."

That could pose problems for Mr. Kulongoski's re-election campaign. "I think the governor is going to be forced to make this an issue," says Sen. Brown. Mr. Kulongoski said he would end the kicker "if I were king and I could just stop something right now." But he's limited in what he can do, and said he wants to work with the business community to make sure any repeal of the kicker is done correctly and enjoys broad support.

"I think that the business community understands why they should invest more in education, but there is a debate within the business community about what they should do with the money," he said. "My view is that in a global economy that's driven by technology, and where change and innovation is the order of the day, if you don't invest in education and skills training, you're going to be a second-rate state."

The Spitzer Savings Plan (WSJ)

New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has been struggling to counter the public perception that he has a "temperament" problem. If his recent treatment of H&R Block is anything to go by, he needs a few more anger management sessions.

Mr. Spitzer blew a gasket last Friday after Block CEO Mark Ernst had the temerity to deny, in an op-ed in this newspaper, the AG's charges that his company had fraudulently sold retirement savings plans. His Lord High Executioner threatened Block with "vast fines" for refusing to roll over. And he further warned that he might now find it more difficult to keep H&R Block "alive and viable" (read: corporate indictment), and promised to "dig deeper" into its affairs.

So rather than let a jury evaluate his charges, Mr. Spitzer is once again threatening to use his power to ruin a company before it even steps into a courtroom. Not that his accusations appear to have much to do with the law in any event. It has escaped no one that this is tax season, and, lo, Mr. Spitzer's target happens to be the nation's largest tax preparation firm. H&R Block has had a string of bad news -- including miscalculating its own state income taxes -- and may have seemed vulnerable to a hit-and-run settlement. Mr. Spitzer was clearly eager for such a painless victory, offering to settle for less than $30 million before filing his $250 million suit.

Block is resolutely defending its Express IRAs, and on the public record so far rightly so. Nearly 600,000 Block customers have used this product, which encourages low-income individuals to divert a portion of their tax refunds into Individual Retirement Accounts. Because Express IRAs have a minimum deposit requirement ($300) far below that of most competitors, and because the money is put into safe (albeit low-interest bearing) money market accounts, Mr. Spitzer claims most users are paying more in fees than they receive in interest and have thus been defrauded.

That must be news to the many Democrats and liberal think tanks plumping for precisely such accounts. As academic studies have long shown, savings tend to rise with income. Only about one in eight Americans in the bottom 20% of income levels have retirement accounts. Many don't work for companies that offer retirement plans, while the idea of making regular contributions can be daunting to households that survive paycheck to paycheck.

One popular response has been to let workers funnel tax refunds directly into private retirement accounts. Low- and moderate-income families receive large tax refunds (in 2001, they saw checks totaling some $78 billion, or $1,500 per family), and many of them view refunds as "extra" money to be put aside. Supporters include the Brookings Institution, the Pew Charitable Trusts, and House Democrats Rahm Emanuel and Jim Cooper -- who have sponsored legislation to require the IRS to set up direct-deposit procedures. Does Mr. Spitzer plan to subpoena all of them?

It was against this background that Block introduced its Express IRA in 2001. The company also hoped to exploit another Congressional initiative -- this one part of the Bush tax cuts -- called the Saver's Tax Credit. Anyone who earns up to $50,000 a year, pays taxes and contributes to a retirement plan gets a "match" from the government of up to 50%. Block has helped nearly half of its Express IRA clients claim this savings subsidy.

The company says its average Express IRA customer earns just $30,000 a year, 42% had previously never opened a savings account, and 20% lacked even a checking account. Yet even after Block's fees, 78% of accounts opened between 2001 and 2005 have had positive net tax savings and interest earnings. Express IRA accounts have accumulated some $360 million. They have also inspired more thrift. Roughly 23% of clients who made an initial refund contribution have since recontributed -- often at a higher amount. Some 40,000 clients are depositing an average of about $50 a month. And some 27,000 have accumulated enough to graduate to a brokerage account.

None of these facts made it into the Spitzer complaint, which cherrypicks data to paint a one-sided picture. While H&R Block has been selling its Express IRA for four years, Mr. Spitzer focused on accounts opened in 2002. That year marked the beginning of the nationwide Express IRA program -- before some clients could build up balances -- and was a time of very low interest rates. It was also the year before the Saver's Tax Credit kicked in, which has sent some $50 million in additional tax benefits to Express IRA users.

Thus Mr. Spitzer was able to claim that 79% of Express IRA customers had lost money. To reach this figure the AG also had to include clients who initially contributed a low amount and soon withdrew their money -- incurring a substantial federal tax penalty. In our book this is called consumer choice, and was to be expected given that many users were new savers under financial pressure. As for Block's fees, they remain among the lowest for IRA operators, which explains why the company says it is still losing money on this product.

All of this might be difficult to grasp for Mr. Spitzer, who can afford to invest in hedge funds to finance his comfortable lifestyle and retirement. But his detachment from the struggles of working people is no excuse for launching a political attack on a law-abiding company, the main benefit of which would be to foreclose a promising avenue for low-income savers.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Medicare Drug Plan Enrollment Tops 27M (USAT)

About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1, the program's chief said Thursday. An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through a former employer. Those employers are getting a tax subsidy to continue providing the coverage. About 43 million people are eligible for the benefit.

Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said the total is expected to continue rising until the May 15 enrollment deadline. People who sign up after that date will probably have to pay higher premiums. Some members of Congress have proposed extending the deadline.

President Bush signed legislation that ends Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization. The measure frees Ukraine from a 1974 law that links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states.

The deal will “strengthen our ties with our good friend Ukraine and create new economic opportunities for our two countries,” Bush said at a White House ceremony. He said the United States supports Ukraine's goal of joining the 148-nation WTO this year and will help it resolve issues standing in the way of its entry. Removal of the U.S. trade restrictions was a necessary step to gain entry. “Ukraine is committed to economic freedom, democratic progress and open trade,” Bush said.

Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko called the legislation “evidence of strategic partnership between the countries.” U.S. exports to Ukraine, including poultry and agriculture machinery, totaled $531.7 million in 2005. Imports from Ukraine, including steel and coke, totaled $1.1 billion.

Progress toward opening the Yucca Mountain nuclear waste dump in Nevada has been hindered by questions about the quality of scientific and engineering work, congressional investigators said. The Energy Department's reorganization of the project has not eliminated the problems and may create new issues, a report by the Government Accountability Office said.

The site, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, was approved by Congress in 2002 to store 77,000 tons of the nation's most radioactive nuclear waste. It's not likely to open before 2012. Energy Department spokesman Craig Stevens said the agency either has fixed the problems raised by the report or is working on them.

Feds Say 1.9M More Sign For Drug Benefit (AP-Y2)

By Kevin Freking

About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1. The number should keep rising, the program's chief says.

An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through their former employer. Those employers are getting a tax subsidy to continue providing the coverage.

About 43 million people are eligible for the benefit.

"Since January, we've seen a steady, increasing rate of enrollment, and we expect to continue seeing that until May 15," Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said Thursday.

That is the deadline for enrolling. People who sign up later probably will have to pay higher premiums; many members of Congress have proposed extending the deadline past May 15.

Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt gave no indication that he agreed with that idea. Indeed, he said people should not wait until just before the deadline to enroll.

"We're reaching out to seniors to suggest there will be a surge at the end. Human nature tells you that," Leavitt said. "What that means is we'll likely see a lot of people trying to sign up at the same time. They can avoid that rush by signing up now."

The latest enrollment figures were released as polling showed that older people have mixed views about the program.

About 44 percent of those surveyed approve of the new benefit. About 41 percent disapprove and 15 percent are undecided, according to The Pew Research Center for the People and the Press. The margin of error was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

While political supporters of the benefit can take solace in that more people like the benefit than dislike it, the numbers represent a dwindling of support since December.

It would appear that many of the people who were undecided before the benefit kicked in now have a negative view of the program. In the December survey, 45 percent approved, 34 percent disapproved and 21 percent were undecided.

Groups urging an overhaul of the program said Thursday that thousands of elderly and disabled people are continuing to call hot lines to complain. The organizations, part of a group called the Americans United Coalition, said the public will support politicians who promise major changes to the program.

Defending the program as it is now "looks to be a losing political proposition in 2006," Democratic pollster Guy Molyneux said.

Young people are most supportive of the program, according to the Pew Research Center's survey. Among those age 18 to 29, about 64 percent approve and 22 percent disapprove.

The least supportive are people 50 to 65; some 40 percent approved and 44 percent disapproved.

McClellan said polling from other groups also shows that a majority of older people who do sign up are glad they did.

The elderly and disabled are eligible to enroll in a private drug plan or in a managed care plan, called Medicare Advantage, that will cover a portion of their drug costs. The government has estimated that the average participant will save about $1,100; the amount of savings varies depending upon a beneficiary's drug needs, income and the type of plan that they choose.

The updated enrollment figures failed to change the political debate about the program in Congress.

"While House Republicans are encouraging seniors to sign up for a program that would lower their drug cost, I'm disappointed that the Democrat leadership would demagogue the program and have seniors pay higher prescription drug prices," said House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Democratic Sen. Jay Rockefeller of West Virginia said the Bush administration's effort "to equate numbers with success means that they are overlooking the crises of individuals still struggling to get the prescription drugs they need at an affordable price."

Medicare Nears Its Enrollee Goal For Drug Benefit (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

WASHINGTON -- Nearly two million people signed up for Medicare's new drug coverage in the past month, bringing the total number of people who have enrolled individually to 7.2 million. In all, more than 27 million Medicare beneficiaries now have drug coverage.

But more than 40 million people are eligible for the drug coverage, and many of those who have yet to sign up are in a low-income bracket and would qualify for generous federal subsidies. Government officials said they are making an aggressive final push to get people to sign up by the May 15 deadline. Those who sign up afterward must pay higher premiums.

President Bush has defended the prescription-drug benefit as good for seniors and taxpayers, even if it has had start-up problems. To draw national attention to the enrollment effort, Mr. Bush and top health officials are expected to visit several cities. The administration is "well on the way" to reaching its stated goal of 28 million to 30 million enrollees, said Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt.

Meanwhile, congressional Democrats released a report illustrating problems beneficiaries sometimes face when trying to obtain certain medications under the plans. In a survey of the plans available in Rep. Henry Waxman's California district, Democratic staff from the House Committee on Government Reform found that most plans require patients to get prior authorization or try other medications before getting coverage for some commonly prescribed drugs.

It also found that many drug-plan representatives didn't give accurate or full descriptions of the restrictions. It is "nearly impossible for seniors to learn" the terms of plan restrictions "until after they have subscribed and been denied drug access," the report said.

The issue is particularly significant this month, when many people who have been able to get medications without restriction under 90-day transition policies now must switch drugs or get the plan's approval for their current medications.

Mark McClellan, head of the agency that runs Medicare, said many of the restrictions highlighted in the report are common methods used by private-sector insurers to steer customers to medications for which they have negotiated a better price. He said his agency hasn't yet received a large number of complaints about plans failing to provide information about prior authorization and other restrictions, but it would "act promptly" if that happens.

Part B To Cost Wealthy More (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Starting next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay a greater share of the cost of their doctor visits because of a provision in the 2003 Medicare prescription drug legislation.

"It's a change from traditional social insurance, there's no question about that," said Robert Moffitt, a health care policy analyst at the Heritage Foundation.

Medicare Part B covers outpatient services such as doctor visits, physical therapy and X-rays. All seniors who choose the coverage pay 25 percent of their monthly Part B premium, with the government picking up the remaining 75 percent. The seniors' monthly portion was $78.20 last year and rose to $88.50 this year.

Beginning next year, wealthier seniors will have to pay an increasingly higher percent of their Part B premium costs. Singles with annual incomes of $80,000 to $100,000 and couples with annual incomes of $160,000 to $200,000 will have to pick up 28 percent of the monthly premium cost. That share will rise to 35 percent by 2009. Singles with annual incomes more than $200,000 and couples with annual incomes more than $400,000 will pay 43 percent of the cost next year and 80 percent in 2009.

Supporters of the change say it is a matter of economics: Rising health care costs and retirements of baby boomers will strain the Medicare and Social Security systems, and it doesn't make sense for the government to pay the tab of the wealthy.

"The financial pressures facing Medicare are so severe that we cannot afford to treat everyone the same," Mr. Moffitt said.

The government now picks up the same tab for a retired librarian and billionaire developer Donald Trump, and there is simply "no way we can do that anymore," he said.

Some seniors groups oppose the change.

"Now that it has been legitimized, Medicare means-testing thresholds could be lowered by future Congresses, affecting a growing number of beneficiaries," said the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association.

"It would significantly alter a founding principle of the program -- equality in Medicare benefits," said Sharon Benton, executive director of the Retired Enlisted Association's Senior Citizens League. "[It] opens the door for more means testing and much higher premium costs for retirees in the future."

Brookings Institution economist Gary Burtless said it will be difficult for the government to calculate seniors' annual incomes and that American workers pay taxes into Medicare based on how much they earn. Discovering upon retirement that they must pay a greater share for their doctor visits "may seem to a lot of people as sort of a double whammy," he said.

Mr. Burtless noted that a backlash of anger forced Congress to repeal a program created during the Reagan administration that provided catastrophic health coverage for seniors but applied means testing for wealthier Americans.

Part B means testing originally was to be phased in over five years, but Congress approved a budget-trimming bill late last year that expedited the plan.

Democrats Say Bush Violated Constitution (AP-Y2)

AP2, March 23, 2006

House Democrats want President Bush to say whether he knew of what they call a "fundamental constitutional problem" with the $39 billion deficit reduction package he signed last month.

A letter to Bush, signed by House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Rep. Henry Waxman (news, bio, voting record) of California and released Thursday, is the latest challenge to a bill that was passed in slightly different forms by the House and Senate before it was sent to Bush.

"A bill is not law unless the same version is passed by both the House and the Senate and signed by the president," top Democrats wrote to Bush. He signed it on Feb. 8.

The Senate version of the bill said Medicare can pay to rent some types of medical equipment for 13 months, as intended by congressional negotiators. A clerk erroneously wrote down 36 months before the bill was sent back to the House for a final vote, and that's what the House approved Feb. 1.

By the time the bill was shipped to Bush, the number was back to 13 months as passed by the Senate.

Recognizing the problem, the Senate passed a resolution hours after Bush signed the bill confirming that the measure transmitted to the president was "deemed the true enrollment reflecting the intention of the Congress." The White House considers the matter settled.

Others do not. A liberal watchdog group, Public Citizen, filed a lawsuit Tuesday asking a federal court to throw the budget bill out. A Republican activist also has sued in federal court in Alabama.

Minimum Wage Emerges As Election Issue (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

MINIMUM WAGE EMERGES as election-year flashpoint.

Treasury Secretary Snow's remarks on income inequality fuel debate. "We'll engage with" advocates of an increase, he says, while cautioning against pricing some workers out of labor market. The wage remains $5.15 an hour, a level set in 1997; relative to average wages, it's at its lowest point since 1949.

Commerce Secretary Gutierrez also signals openness to an increase if Congress pursues the issue "thoughtfully...and not emotionally." With Bush and Republicans politically weakened, Democratic Sen. Kennedy plans push for floor vote this spring on an increase to $7.25.

TEAM BUSH SCRAMBLES to revive domestic agenda.

President's acknowledgment of political capital spent on war reflects slipping prospects on other fronts. Senate Finance Chairman Grassley predicts uphill fight for even scaled-down version of expanded health savings accounts.

A senior Bush adviser sees delay -- pushing House-Senate conference until after midterm elections -- as best chance for winning immigrant guest-worker program. Both chambers have sidetracked Bush's proposed Medicare savings; extension of dividend and capital-gains tax cuts remains in doubt. Moderate Republicans, complains Heritage Foundation's Michael Franc, are "completely untethered" from party leaders.

REPUBLICANS MANEUVER to dodge political potholes.

Senate candidates DeWine of Ohio, Kennedy of Minnesota and Steele of Maryland avoid appearances with Bush. A top Republican legislator in Montana launches Senate bid, raising pressure on troubled incumbent Burns to retire.

"Most observers still believe the Senate will stay in GOP hands," says online exchange Intrade.com, but "traders may be ready to jump ship." Senate Democrats' campaign arm amasses twice the campaign cash of Republicans, but faces incumbents in six of seven most competitive races. On Web site FancyFord.com, Republicans mock Democrats' Tennessee candidate as an elitist playboy.

In New Jersey Monday, House Democrats begin push to split Republican base by touting stem-cell research.

Nominee For Appeals Court Withdraws (WP/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Henry W. Saad, one of President Bush's appeals court nominees blocked by Senate Democrats, withdrew his name from consideration, a presidential aide said yesterday.

Democrats have accused Saad, a Michigan appeals court judge, of being hostile to employment-discrimination claims and lawsuits by consumers.

"Judge Saad asked to have his nomination withdrawn, and we intend to honor that request," Bush spokeswoman Erin Healy said.

Saad's nomination to the Cincinnati-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 6th Circuit was submitted to the Senate in January 2003, and he was renominated last year. His nomination was one of 10 blocked by Democrats, who used the filibuster, which allows unlimited debate, to prevent a Senate vote.

He was not included in a bipartisan agreement by 14 senators last year to avert a Senate showdown over the use of filibusters to block judicial nominees. The agreement allowed three of the 10 nominees to go to a vote.

Saad was rated "well qualified" by a "substantial" majority of the American Bar Association's committee that rates judicial nominees. Under Senate rules, Saad's nomination cannot be withdrawn until Congress returns Monday from its recess.

Bush Arrives, Defends Iraq War (IWNR)

The Intelligencer & Wheeling (WV) News-Regist, March 23, 2006

WHEELING — President George W. Bush's first official act upon touching down at the Wheeling-Ohio County Airport just before noon today was to present the President's Volunteer Service Award to Kristen Holloway of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The President and his entourage of Secret Service, White House staff and media, then traveled by motorcade south on W.Va. 2 into downtown Wheeling, where at press time President Bush was entering a town hall meeting on the the War on Terror.

Holloway is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation.

To thank them for making a difference in the lives of others, President Bush has met with more than 480 individuals around the country, like Holloway, since March 2002.

Holloway is the founder and president of Operation Troop Appreciation, a non-profit organization dedicated to supporting deployed troops fighting the War on Terrorism in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait, and Africa.

Since its inception in 2004, OTA has reached more than 10,000 troops with care packages tailored to meet each unit's specific requests.

Through fund-raising and in-kind donations, OTA volunteers have collected and sent DVDs, phone cards and sports equipment. All care packages also include a letter of thanks to each soldier in the unit.

In 2005, OTA received a request for musical instruments from the 463d Engineer Combat Battalion from Wheeling.

DOJ_NMG_0020957

Operation Troop Appreciation sent 12 instruments, including acoustic guitars, a keyboard and drums that were used by troops at the Morale, Welfare and Recreation tent and chapel services at Camp Anaconda in Iraq.

In his January 2002 State of the Union Address, President Bush called on all Americans to make a difference in their communities through volunteer service.

He created USA Freedom Corps, an Office of the White House, to strengthen and expand volunteer service.

Americans are responding to the President's Call to Service. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, more than 65.4 million Americans volunteered in 2005. Go to www.volunteer.gov or call (877) 872-2677 to find an existing volunteer service opportunity in your area or to find more information about service programs, including national service programs such as the Peace Corps, AmeriCorps, Senior Corps, and Citizen Corps. USA Freedom Corps is also highlighting youth volunteer service. Visit www.volunteerkids.gov for games and ideas designed to show how America's youth are making a difference.

The President's Volunteer Service Award was created at the President's direction by the President's Council on Service and Civic Participation. The Award is available to youth ages 14 and under who have completed 50 or more hours of volunteer service; to individuals 15 and older who have completed 100 or more hours; and to families or groups who have completed 200 or more hours. For more information about the Award, please visit www.presidentialserviceawards.gov.

Pension Chief Tells Bush He's Resigning (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

WASHINGTON — The head of the federal agency that insures the private pensions of 44 million Americans said Thursday he would step down on May 31, forcing the White House to find a new leader amid a rash of pension plan insolvencies.

Bradley Belt, executive director of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for the past two years, announced his resignation in a letter to President Bush. He did not indicate what he planned to do after leaving the agency, and PBGC staff said they could not elaborate.

"This past two years has been a particularly tumultuous period for the PBGC, which has had to confront unprecedented operational, financial and policy challenges," Belt wrote.

The PBGC is funded through insurance premiums levied on companies that sponsor traditional pension plans, not by tax revenue.

As industries such as steel, retailing and airlines have tumbled into bankruptcy or been unable to meet pension obligations, the PBGC has had to take over their plans.

Defined-benefit pension plans are now underfunded by more than $400 billion. Congress is debating bills to restructure pension financing, including imposing higher premiums on companies that offer defined-benefit plans.

The bills would also shore up the PBGC. But the bills include controversial provisions, such as proposals to give airlines more time to increase funding their pension plans.

In a speech this month to the National Association of Business Economists, Belt warned that pension accounting rules allowed companies to defer or ignore costs too long, leading to problems.

Referring to current pension rules, Belt said it was as though "we have followed Alice down the White Rabbit's hole into a looking-glass world that is disconnected from economic reality."

The PBGC has only limited authority, given that it does not set pension pricing or accounting rules. Douglas Elliott, president of the Center on Federal Financial Institutions, which analyzes pension and other programs, says within those confines Belt was "an excellent administrator."

Pension Agency's Director Resigns (WSJ)

By Miichael Schroeder

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Amid continuing turmoil in the traditional retirement-benefit system, the director of the federal agency that insures company pensions announced plans to step down.

The unexpected announcement came as members of a House-Senate conference committee continue efforts to iron out differences on a pension overhaul bill. So many significant issues remain that the committee may not complete the final legislation by the April 7 deadline set by its chairman, Sen. Mike Enzi, a Wyoming Republican.

In a letter to President Bush, Bradley Belt said he would leave the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. at the end of May to pursue other opportunities. "The last two years have been a particularly tumultuous period for the PBGC, which has had to confront unprecedented operational, financial, and policy challenges," Mr. Belt said. (See the letter.)

Mr. Belt, a former senior staff member at the Senate Banking Committee and the Securities and Exchange Commission, has been at odds with administration officials on the PBGC's board over his desire to take a larger role in the pension debate, according to people with knowledge of the situation. The board includes the secretaries of Treasury, Commerce and Labor, who have been taking the lead in pressing the administration's pension proposals.

Mr. Belt is expected to be in demand for jobs in the private sector because of his two-year tenure during major upheaval in the pension system. While his departure may coincide with the completion of the pension bill, it still comes at a time when the administration may have difficulty recruiting a candidate to lead the agency.

With a growing number of steel, airline and automotive companies recently dumping their underfunded pension plans on the PBGC as part of the bankruptcy-court process, the agency's deficit ballooned to $22.8 billion last year. The PBGC's finances come from premiums paid by insured companies and assets it acquires from companies that terminate their pension plans. The agency doesn't use taxpayer funds.

In an attempt to head off a taxpayer bailout of the agency, the administration and Congress have pushed legislation that would shore up the PBGC's finances and require companies to fully fund their pension obligations.

The measures have numerous key provisions that conferees are having a difficult time reconciling in a final bill. One particular sticking point is whether to require companies that have junk-rated bonds to accelerate contributions into underfunded pensions.

Critics argue that this provision, and others, would cause more companies to freeze their traditional defined-benefit pension plans, in which participants are paid set amounts each month based on compensation and years of service, and replace them with defined-contribution plans such as 401(k) savings accounts..

Backlash Over New Pensions Legislation (FT)

By Norma Cohen

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Employers will be able to slash their contributions to underfunded pension schemes by tens of billions of dollars over the next five years under proposed legislation before Congress that was expected to have the opposite effect.

The legislation was proposed by the White House last year to lessen the risk of a taxpayer bailout of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, a federal safety net for pension schemes.

According to an analysis prepared this week by the Joint Committee on Taxation, which does bipartisan technical work on legislation for Congress, The Pension Security and Transparency Act of 2005 would bring at least $10bn in additional tax revenue as employers reduce pension contributions on which they would have been eligible for tax relief.

Assuming an average corporate tax rate of 35 per cent, the data suggest a temporary but significant drop in employer payments into pension schemes over the next few years.

The analysis shows tax revenues will rise by $10.2bn under the House version of the bill, and by $12bn under the Senate's, between 2006-11 as a result of the weakened contribution requirements. Funding of pension schemes would reach a low ebb in 2008 under both versions, while tax relief for increased contributions would not begin to rise until 2011.

The PBGC saw its deficit widen to $22bn at the end of its last fiscal year. According to the Center on Federal Financial Institutions, a private think-tank, current and future losses caused by the underfunded schemes of insolvent employers could lead to a bailout of around $92bn in today's money.

Separately, Bradley Belt, executive director of the PBGC, announced on Thursday he intends to step down at the end of May "to pursue other opportunities". A spokesman for the PBGC declined to comment on Mr Belt's departure beyond the resignation letter.

In a speech two weeks ago, Mr Belt called for both congressional bills to be strengthened and warned that if "the end-product...is a bill that fails to improve on the current law, the president's senior advisers have said they will recommend a veto".

Both bills fall far short of the goals set out for legislation proposed last year by the White House, which had formally threatened a veto unless certain measures in either bill are altered.

Of particular note are provisions in the Senate version of the bill which allow the airline industry up to 20 years to fully fund its pension deficits and also give it much wider leeway in the assumptions it uses to determine whether or not company schemes are fully funded. According to Coffi, many of the congressman who passed the House bill did so on the understanding that special relief for the troubled airlines industry would be included in the final version that emerges from the Conference Committee.

So far, the PBGC has sustained losses of about $10bn arising from the pension schemes at US Airways and United Airways. Delta and Northwest Airlines, currently in bankruptcy, will add a further $11.2bn.

Coffi has said that offering relief to airlines is likely to spark pleas for similar relief from other hard-pressed industries. The PBGC has estimated that the entire US auto manufacturing industry - including tyre and rubber companies and auto parts suppliers - has has aggregate liabilities of $55bn to $60bn.

Meanwhile, other provisions have also strayed far from administration proposals aimed at limiting losses on the PBGC. In particular, both significantly ease the financing requirements for employers with the weakest credit ratings, the category of employer most likely to present a claim for pension benefits to the PBGC.

Suggested Changes To Pay Rules Raise Concerns About Fairness, Conflict Of Interest (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The president's chief adviser on the civil service has been presented with options on how to address pay inequities faced by some inspectors general, and efforts also are underway to rethink the pay rules for administrative law judges.

Linda M. Springer , director of the Office of Personnel Management, said she expects to be sorting out compensation proposals for both groups in coming weeks. At issue is a Bush administration principle that job performance should be a factor in setting pay for government employees and whether that principle can be applied to IGs and ALJs without damaging or weakening their independence.

Revamping pay practices for both groups will probably require congressional approval, Springer said. "We've got to make sure we consider all the options carefully," she said, because any change "has got to stand up to the scrutiny that is given to a legislative proposal."

Pay has become a concern for inspectors general, particularly those who came to their jobs from the career civil service, because of a recent law that increased Senior Executive Service pay scales. The fiscal 2004 law also made SES annual pay raises dependent on performance evaluations and eliminated an annual, geographic-based adjustment.

The suggestion that salaries for inspectors general could hinge on a performance evaluation from their agency heads has raised issues of fairness and possible conflicts of interest, Springer said. IGs investigate their agencies for waste, fraud and mismanagement and report their findings to Congress. IG jobs are supposed to be viewed as independent and above partisan politics.

Inspectors general who came into their jobs from the career civil service and IGs who are presidential appointees but not career SES members are paid $143,000. In many cases, they supervise SES staffers who are eligible to earn salaries of up to $165,200. (There are 57 IGs whose jobs are established in law, and there are more than 6,000 career SES members.)

Salary levels were not adjusted for administrative law judges in the 2004 law, and their pay is capped at $152,000, including geographic-based adjustments. At the end of last year, congressional aides estimated that more than 1,000 of the 1,400 ALJs had hit the pay cap.

House members, such as Reps. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and Jon Porter (R-Nev.), have expressed interest in raising ALJ pay scale to foster recruitment and retention of judges and to relieve "pay compression."

The Bush administration has suggested that a new ALJ pay system include a method for measuring judges' job performance, but Springer said current law prohibits evaluations of ALJ performance. Administrative law judges hear disputes that involve decisions made by their agencies and seek to avoid creating perceptions that external pressures can sway their rulings.

Given the obstacles to making performance a key element in IG and ALJ pay decisions, Springer said, OPM will be open to alternatives that allow salaries to keep pace with adjustments provided to the SES.

Gregory H. Friedman , inspector general at the Energy Department, has worked with other IGs and has presented OPM with options for changing IG pay practices, Springer said. A meeting will be held soon with Friedman and officials at the Office of Management and Budget to discuss the options, she said. "Everyone agrees there is a problem and wants a solution," she added.

Springer said she had met with representatives for administrative law judges and had asked them to "come up with some options that will address the problem. When they do, we will have a meeting with them, and see where it will take us."Talk Shows

Bob Leins , a tax expert at the National Institute of Transition Planning, will be the guest on "Fedtalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://www.federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

David Wyld , professor of management at Southeastern Louisiana University; Paul Brinkley , deputy undersecretary of defense for business transformation; and Alan Estevez , assistant deputy undersecretary of defense for supply chain integration, will discuss radio frequency identification technology on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

From Her Lips To His Ear (WP)

By Sally Quinn

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Dear Laura,

It's time for you to act. Nancy Reagan did it. You can, too.

Things are falling apart. They always do in the second term. And when they do, there's only one person who can change things: the wife. You are the only one who can tell him the truth. You are smart, astute; you're not afraid of him and you love him.

I see you're going on Larry King tonight, and that's a good way to show your support and share your popularity. But your real work is behind the scenes.

The president's poll numbers have tanked. They are among the lowest of any president in history at this point in his term. So think back to Ronald Reagan's second term. He was mired in Iran-contra, his staff was exhausted, and their reaction to criticism was to dig in. Nancy managed to clean house, bring the White House back in touch with the outside world and, in doing so, allowed Reagan to clear his head, end the Cold War and "tear down that wall, Mr. Gorbachev." His polls skyrocketed, from a low of 42 to 68 percent when he left office.

Because of the nature of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, Hillary Clinton was unable to carry off the same trick. But you are perfectly positioned.

The biggest problem your husband has now is that so many top Republicans have turned against him. Without the support of his own party, it's pretty much impossible for him to run the country. After the way they went after him over the Dubai ports deal, you can imagine what they are saying about him privately.

Incompetent, unrealistic and insincere were a few of the words circulating at a private dinner recently. Referring to the president's refusal to seek advice on anything -- the war, the economy, foreign policy -- one of the most prominent Republicans in Washington called the situation so dire that he feared "the country would fall apart with another three years of this."

"They don't listen to anybody," said another prominent Republican who was close to the first President Bush.

To a person, every Republican and Democrat I talked to compared your husband to his father. W didn't come out on the winning end. "A real gent," "gracious," "responsive," "inclusive," "conciliatory" were words used to describe the senior Bush. Democrats told how he always returned their phone calls, sometimes at 2 a.m.

Now even Dad's former friends and advisers can't get through. "All of his father's old boys are out in the wilderness together," lamented one of them.

Here are some of the things you can do, collected from half a dozen senior Republicans:

· Form an alliance with Karl Rove. Senior Republicans say he's interested in change. He takes the long view, and midterm elections are around the corner.

· Convince the president that polls do matter. As former White House counselor David Gergen (the only person who would go on the record) put it: "Without the support of the people, you can't make the tough call on Iran or Iraq or any tough calls." And during an election year, members of Congress listen to their constituents.

· Tell him to throw out the Kool-Aid. "The White House is not a cult," said one high-ranking former White House staffer. "Everybody vibrates in harmony over there," complained another.

· Stress the importance of new blood. Nancy persuaded the president to get rid of Donald Regan and bring in Howard Baker, Frank Carlucci and Ken Duberstein. This doesn't have to be seen as a vote of no confidence in the staff as much as a reprieve. Chief of Staff Andy Card is one of the most well-liked people in Washington. But he has been on an inhuman schedule for five years, and he reportedly covets the job of Treasury secretary. "He is a wonderful, decent, nice guy, but you need an SOB in that job now," said one Republican who served in the Reagan administration.

"You don't need a kibitzer," said another. "You need somebody with credibility, integrity, someone known on the Hill and in the press with management capability."

· Tell George to listen to his Cabinet officers. Except for those in State and Defense, they are chopped liver, out of the loop, no seat at the table, John Snow in particular. Why have a secretary of the Treasury if you're not going to listen to him?

· Because the war is going so badly, a number of Republicans think it's time for Donald Rumsfeld to go. Even those who like him say that as the architect of the war, he is not the one to turn it around. Some suggest a conservative-leaning Democrat like Sam Nunn or Joe Lieberman would be a smart move. Whether it's the secretary of defense or some other job, perhaps you could persuade the president to bring in a Democrat. "That would give you protection against Democratic attacks and restore bipartisan spirit," said Gergen.

· And remind your husband to pay some attention to Congress. Republicans on the Hill feel excluded from the decision-making process. "Listen to Democrats, too," said a Republican. "They don't have horns."

Last week, Howard Baker suggested bringing in former senator Fred Thompson as a liaison to Congress, but many felt that wouldn't make a difference because it wasn't getting rid of anybody. "Anybody who really knows this crowd wouldn't take the job," said one former White House adviser.

· Tell him to take responsibility for his actions. In his news conference Tuesday, he gave different explanations for the war in Iraq, but never mentioned WMD. Even if he still believes invading Iraq was the right thing, he could still acknowledge that one of the reasons his administration gave at the time was wrong. That would go a long way toward clearing the air.

With three years to go in this presidency, something has to change. You've always been there when he needed you. You got him to stop drinking. You campaigned hard for him at the end of the first campaign. Your own poll numbers are off the charts. You need to persuade him to make changes, and to do it in a way that the people believe he means it.

Remember, it's your legacy, too.

Cheney's Needs On The Road: What, No NPR? (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 23 — Vice President Dick Cheney may be a rock star only to his most ardent Republican supporters, but he has on-the-road demands just like the Rolling Stones. Still, Mr. Cheney appears easier to please than Mick Jagger or Keith Richards.

At least that was the evidence from "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements," the heading of a document posted Thursday on the Smoking Gun Web site and confirmed as authentic by Mr. Cheney's office.

The document listed 13 requirements. Among them were these: All televisions sets in Mr. Cheney's hotel suite should be tuned to Fox News, all lights should be on, and the thermostat set at 68 degrees. Mr. Cheney should have a queen- or king-size bed, a desk with a chair, a private bathroom, a container for ice, a microwave oven and a coffee pot, with decaf brewed before arrival.

The vice president should also have four cans of caffeine-free Diet Sprite and four to six bottles of water. He must have the hotel restaurant menu, with a copy faxed ahead to his advance office. If his wife is with him, she should have two bottles of sparkling water, either Calistoga or Perrier.

For his reading material, Mr. Cheney should have The New York Times, USA Today, The Wall Street Journal and the local newspaper.

"The vice president maintains an active schedule, which requires regular travel throughout the United States and at times involves a hotel stay," said Jenny Mayfield, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney. "Our advance office provides guidelines for our volunteers in the field. This is just a routine little check list."

The downtime requirements said nothing about exercise equipment, but aides to Mr. Cheney have been spotted on his travels loading and unloading a stationary bicycle from Air Force Two.

Cheney's Creature Comforts

Like any big rock star, Dick Cheney needs a soothing environment after a long day on the road. Now we know just what he likes waiting in his hotel room.

The "Vice Presidential Downtime Requirements" published yesterday on the Smoking Gun is a list of the veep's home-away-from-home comforts provided to hotels by Cheney's advance team. (The Web site obtained a copy from a hotel employee.) No over-the-top demands, just a few specific requests:

· A queen- or king-size bed, desk and chair, and private bathroom.

· All lights turned on and the temperature set at a chilly 68 degrees.

· All televisions tuned to Fox News.

· A fresh pot of decaf, four cans of Caffeine-Free Diet Sprite, four to six bottles of water, and (if Lynne Cheney is traveling with her husband) two bottles of Calistoga or Perrier sparkling water.

· A microwave and hotel restaurant menu.

DOJ_NMG_0020962

· The New York Times, USA Today, Wall Street Journal, a local paper and (yes!) The Washington Post. (The papers were a handwritten addition, so we don't know who put them on the list.)

· And, if the hotel wants to leave a gift in the suite, the bills should be unmarked . . . kidding! Seriously, though, the advance team needs to know about any hotel gift for the vice president.

Cheney's office confirmed that . . . well, he stays in hotels. "The vice president maintains an active schedule which requires regular travel throughout the United States and, at times, involves a hotel stay," said spokeswoman Jennifer Mayfield.Star Rises, and Al Falls Down

Can't put a price tag on infamy? Sure you can -- $94,625! That was the haul from yesterday's Los Angeles auction of disgraced ex-representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham's forfeited collection of furniture, rugs and other knickknacks he got as bribes from defense contractors. Some 1,300 gawkers turned out, more than 700 of whom registered to bid. The highest price, $10,000, was fetched by an Iranian "Mahi" design rug; the lowest, $225, went to a ratty-looking rattan screen, reports our colleague William Booth. In between were a leather couch ($2,100), a 32-foot Oriental carpet runner ($4,750) and a French Provincial armoire ($7,100). Proceeds go to the FBI and the IRS's criminal investigation branch.

Republican Fatigue Could Hurt The Party's Chances In November (TSSC/KRT)

By Steven Thomma And James Kuhnhenn, Knight Ridder

The State (SC), March 23, 2006

GOLDEN, Colo. - Brian Wareing has been a Republican all his life. But ask him how his party has done running the federal government and his complaints pile up: Immigration. Spending. Trade. He's had enough.

He won't vote for a Democrat in November's congressional elections. But he might vote for a third-party candidate - or he might not vote at all. "At this point, I couldn't vote for the Republican," the house painter from this Denver suburb said, with regret.

Across the country this spring, many Republicans alternate between anger and ambivalence five years after their party seized power over the federal government and seven months before a pivotal election for control of Congress.

If enough disgruntled Republicans sit out the midterm elections - when voter turnout typically is low and victory goes to the party whose base is most passionate - Republican incumbents could lose in close contests such as the one in Golden.

Democrats need to gain only 15 of 435 seats to take control of the U.S. House of Representatives, and six of the 33 that are up this year to take the 100-member Senate. And if they win either house of Congress, President Bush will become the lamest of lame ducks for his final two years in power.

National trends suggest that's possible. Solid majorities of adults disapprove of Bush, the war in Iraq, the leadership of Congress and the direction of the country, according to a series of polls. Increasingly, the national mood seems to mirror 1994, when voters turned sour on President Clinton, rejected Democratic lawmakers and installed a Republican majority in Congress for the first time in 40 years.

Since Bush's second term started, his approval rating has dropped 16 percentage points among Republicans, 23 points among supporters of the Iraq war and 24 points among those who voted for him in 2004, according to a recent Pew Research Center survey.

The one shred of good news for the Republican Party now: Not many House and Senate contests appear all that competitive yet. Disillusionment with Bush and Iraq don't yet trump voters' local concerns in many states. And the threat of a Democratic Congress still could rally the Republican base.

But it's clear from dozens of interviews in key battlegrounds that Republican voters today lack the passion they brought to the 2002 midterm elections. And that gives Democrats an opportunity.

At a recent breakfast in Golden, one Republican after another put voices behind those numbers, complaining about Washington policies from the war in Iraq and the failure to stop illegal immigration to runaway federal spending. The cumulative effect led several to question whether they or like-minded party loyalists would vote next fall.

"I've been a Republican since I started voting," said John Burdan, a retired Air Force officer from Jefferson County, outside Denver. "Things are going terrible. I won't vote for a Democrat. But I might not vote for the Republican."

"Doesn't Bush know that Republicans are watching?" asked Jefferson County Commissioner Jim Congrove. "We're setting ourselves up for big defeats."

Golden is in Colorado's 7th Congressional District, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is stepping aside to run for governor. When he won the open seat four years ago, it was the closest race in the country. Today Republican Rick O'Donnell faces the same evenly divided district, but with a much more hostile Republican base.

"The frustration I hear is that we have a Republican president and a Republican Congress, how come we can't reduce spending and how come we don't have secure borders," O'Donnell said.

He reminds them of Republican successes, such as the appointment of two Supreme Court justices. Still, he said, "so many Republicans at the base are frustrated. ... I'm spending more time on it than I otherwise would have. The troops are a little depressed."

"There's some fatigue among the average Republican," Denver Republican consultant Katy Atkinson said. "They're tired of it all. They're tired of scandals. They're tired of the White House. They're ready for change."

Said independent Denver pollster Floyd Ciruli: "The party is in trouble here. For their turnout machine to work, it has to have a popular president with key issues. I don't think they have that now."

For all that, Democratic efforts to make the elections a national referendum on Bush and the Republican Congress haven't taken hold. Local issues and personalities still dominate in most parts of the country. In some places, such as Connecticut, that helps Republicans. In others, such as Ohio, it hurts them.

Almost everywhere, it's easy to find Republicans who once were inspired by Bush and the Republican Congress and now seem dispirited.

In Florida, for example, a lukewarm attitude is pervasive in the Palm Beach district where Republican Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., a 13-term veteran, faces a tough re-election.

"There are a lot of problems out there," said Republican David Boyer, a hotel employee from Hollywood, Fla. "Can a Republican do it? I doubt it. Can a Democrat do it? I doubt it. Who's to know who's right?"

In Connecticut, some Republicans fear that their party could be hurt by growing opposition to Bush and the Iraq war.

"We've seen some apathy in the Republican ranks," said John Crooks, a Republican alderman from Norwich. "It tends to slow down the Republican turnout."

"If the president is doing really well, I'll do better; if he's not doing really well, I'll do worse," said Rep. Christopher Shays, a nine-term incumbent Republican.

Shays worries that the mood might be similar to 1994, when voters felt they had to send a "wakeup call" to Clinton. "We're on the same path right now," he said.

Yet Connecticut Republicans such as Shays and Rep. Rob Simmons benefit from local issues, such as their success at keeping Groton's submarine base open, the popularity of Republican Gov. M. Jodi Rell, and the lawmakers' reputations for independence from the party's national leadership.

"I don't really understand George Bush," said Anthony Savas, a Republican and tugboat operator out of Norwalk, Conn., who opposes the Iraq war.

What about Shays? "He's not 100 percent Republican," Savas said. "He uses common sense in making his own decisions."

Outside Philadelphia, Republican voters are split over Bush, the war and how they'll vote next fall. They live in a district in which Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach is looking for a third term after two 51-49 percent wins, and a state in which polls show Republican Sen. Rick Santorum trailing in his race for re-election.

"We have hurt ourselves greatly," said Warren Moser, a retired executive from Chester County who opposes the Iraq war. "But this is one Republican who is still behind the president."

For Ken Enochs, a real estate broker from Norristown, Pa., anger over the war fuels his defection from the Republican Party. "It's about what is right," he said. "That goes across party lines."

In Ohio, anger at scandal-plagued Republican Gov. Bob Taft outweighs feelings about Bush or the national party.

"Taft has hurt Republicans," said Brian Kane, an optometrist and the president of the Painesville Rotary Club.

"He's really blown it," agreed Lou Falk, a retiree from Painesville, east of Cleveland. "There's been all kinds of scandals. It's going to have a ripple effect."

Just below the surface, many Ohio Republicans are as down on Sen. Mike DeWine, a Republican facing re-election, as Republican voters elsewhere are on Bush.

"I'm kind of neutral on both DeWine and (Republican Sen. George) Voinovich," said Richard Kretschman, an insurance agent from Concord Township, east of Cleveland. "He doesn't seem to stand out in my mind. I don't have anything negative to say about him. I just don't feel very positive."

Ethics Reform Stalling In Congress (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - Prospects for robust ethics reform in the 109th Congress are dimming, even as the criminal probes that prompted it are intensifying.

It's a political calculation that could cost lawmakers in this fall's elections, if they misread the degree to which voters care about bribery inside the Beltway.

As recently as January, lobby reform bills were top priorities in both the House and Senate, but now are encountering strong resistance. In the Senate, Republican leaders pulled the lobby bill off the floor over an unrelated amendment on the Dubai ports deal. In the House, GOP leaders are split over how aggressively to restrict lawmaker travel paid for by private entities.

"Some members are pulling the blanket over their heads and hoping the storm will pass. For others, there is also a genuine belief that if you just jump in a spasm of reaction, you could do some things detrimental to a good deliberative process," says Norman Ornstein, a senior fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

When the last big ethics scandal broke on Capitol Hill in 1992, voter anger helped retire or defeat 77 incumbents with overdrafts on the House bank - and gave insurgent Republicans momentum to win control of the House in 1994.

For many members, kiting checks had been a perk of the job, like cheap haircuts or the franking privilege that allows them to send mail for free through the postal system. To the public, it was a signal that lawmakers didn't play by the rules they required of everyone else.

The stakes in the current corruption scandal run even deeper. At issue is whether lawmakers can be bought: exchanging favors for cash, luxury golf outings, a skybox seat at sporting events, or free meals.

Last week, a federal judge in Florida delayed sentencing former lobbyist Jack Abramoff until June, to give federal prosecutors more time with him to investigate corruption on Capitol Hill.

Mr. Abramoff's plea agreement cited only one lawmaker, Rep. Bob Ney (R) of Ohio - and not by name - as involved in corruption. But others with links to Abramoff are also paying a political price. This week, Sen. Conrad Burns (R) of Montana drew a strong GOP primary challenger, who cited Mr. Burns's ties to Abramoff as a reason for getting into the race. It fuels speculation that Burns will soon announce his retirement.

In another high-profile case, a Texas appeals court heard arguments this week on whether to reinstate a conspiracy charge against Rep. Tom DeLay (R), who resigned as House majority leader after indictment last September on campaign money laundering charges. Mr. DeLay, too, has drawn the strongest reelection challenge of his career. And Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R) of California was recently sentenced to eight years in prison for bribery.

Despite the headlines, reform proposals face an uphill battle in both the House and Senate. In February, the House took a first step by revoking floor and gym privileges for former members who are lobbyists. A pending GOP leadership draft imposes stricter lobbyist disclosure requirements. It also requires committee reports to identify the sponsors of earmarks - a move that makes it harder for lawmakers like former Representative Cunningham to slip favors for, say, defense contractors into spending bills.

But GOP leaders are at odds over proposed limits on privately funded travel. While Speaker Dennis Hastert favored a ban on all privately funded travel, the new majority leader, Rep. John Boehner of Ohio, and many GOP backbenchers opposed it. A draft GOP proposal would suspend such travel until January 2007.

"A lot of members have reacted negatively to the discussion draft, because it's going to result in a hard-to-defend status quo for the next seven months," says Michael Franc, vice president for governmental affairs at the Heritage Foundation. "At the same time, it's going to ban privately funded travel hosted by educational entities - the kind of educationally oriented travel that the average voter thinks is appropriate."

On the Senate side, there's support for more frequent lobbyist disclosure - including, for the first time, electronic disclosure. But many are chafing at blanket travel restrictions.

"Seventy percent of our cities and villages can be accessed only by air - and that very infrequently. Why should taxpayers pay when there is a corporate plane going with an empty seat - as long as it's disclosed," says Sen. Ted Stevens (R) of Alaska.

The key to whatever is passed will be enforcement, public-interest groups say. "In the end, what is going to be judged is whether there is enforcement of the laws. The key is disclosure and transparency," says Larry Noble, outgoing director of the Center for Responsive Politics.

Espionage Law's Merits Tied Into Ex-Lobbyists' Case (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

The federal judge presiding over the prosecution of two former lobbyists has focused attention on the imprecise nature of the law they are charged with breaking, the 1917 Espionage Act that restricts the dissemination of national defense information that could harm U.S. interests.

DOJ_NMG_0020965

In January, U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis III raised the possibility that the law may not be sensibly written, as he sentenced a former Defense Department employee, Lawrence A. Franklin, to 12 years in prison for giving classified information to the two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC.

Despite the law's possible shortcomings, Ellis said in an unusual statement from the bench, it is up to Congress, not the court, to decide if the statute needs to be changed.

"The law says what it says," Ellis said. "The merits of the law really are committed to Congress. If it's not sensible, it ought to be changed. But they're . . . the body that changes it, not the judiciary."

Today, attorneys for the former lobbyists, Steve Rosen and Keith Weissman, will argue for dismissal of the indictment based in part on the claim that the Espionage Act was meant to cover spying, not the possession of leaked classified information, particularly leaked information possessed and transmitted by people who are not government employees. As stated in their Jan. 19 motion, attorneys say what Rosen and Weissman are charged with "is what members of the media, members of the Washington policy community, lobbyists and members of congressional staffs do perhaps hundreds of times every day."

The Espionage Act makes it illegal for an unauthorized person to have "unlawful possession" of "information relating to the national defense." As written, it does not require that such information be classified. To break the law, the people involved must also believe the information "could be used to the injury of the United States and to the advantage of any foreign nation." It also makes it illegal for people with such "unlawful possession" to communicate such information if they have "reason to believe" it could injure the United States or aid another country.

In response to the Rosen-Weissman motion, the Justice Department attorneys said in their motion that the defendants have doctorates and "would know that foreign officials, journalists and other persons with no current affiliation with the United States government would not be entitled to receive information related to our national defense."

Last August, in announcing the indictment, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, then the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia, said there was "a clear line in the law," and "those not authorized to receive classified information must resist the temptation to acquire it, no matter what their motivation may be."

The AIPAC case, which represents the first time nongovernment employees have been prosecuted under the 89-year-old Espionage Act for receiving leaks from a government official, has drawn increasing attention from First Amendment advocates and others concerned that it represents a sharp break from Justice Department practices.

At Franklin's sentencing, Ellis said any debate over the statute and "whether it's a sensible law" was "irrelevant" to Franklin's situation because he had clearly violated it. "That doesn't mean we shouldn't debate whether the law is a good law or not, as a people," he said, adding, "It doesn't mean that Congress shouldn't consider it. It's not for the court to say."

Happy Doomsday To You! (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

Washington was about one horseman short of an apocalypse yesterday.

It began with a breakfast meeting in a Senate office building where, over fruit salad and bagels, government and academic experts discussed the coming avian flu pandemic. "Currently it has a fatality rate of 56 percent," reported Nancy Cox, flu expert with the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. "An increasing number of countries have reported human cases. The severe cases are really quite severe."

Pointing to slides of some nasty chest X-rays, she added: "Death from this particular pathogen is not a pleasant death."

Next: the mid-morning news conference on mad cow disease at the National Press Club. There, a beef producer explained why he is suing the government for not letting him test his cattle for bovine spongiform encephalopathy, an "invariably fatal, progressive, incurable, neurodegenerative disease" that can be transmitted to people. The feds say the testing is unnecessary, but the rancher, John Stewart, warned that "BSE is not understood enough today to really come to scientific conclusions."

For those who still had an appetite, there was a luncheon meeting of the National Economists Club at the Chinatown Garden restaurant on H Street, where Congressional Budget Office economist Bob Shackleton was explaining the "high-end" global-warming projections, which have Earth's temperature growing by five degrees Celsius -- nine degrees Fahrenheit -- this century.

"That five degrees centigrade is the equivalent of the change that happened since the end of the last glaciation 18,000 years ago to now," he told the economists as they munched on fortune cookies and orange wedges. "Eighteen thousand years ago, there was a mile of ice over New York City and you could walk 100 miles out into the ocean and still be on land."

Have a nice doomsday? Possibly. When President Bush went to Cleveland on Monday, a questioner asked him about a claim "that members of your administration have reached out to prophetic Christians who see the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism as signs of the apocalypse. Do you believe this, that the war in Iraq and the rise of terrorism are signs of the apocalypse?"

"I haven't really thought of it that way," the president said. "The first I've heard of that, by the way."

But maybe not the last, if yesterday's collection of end-of-days warnings was any indication.

On the fourth floor of the Russell Building on Capitol Hill, public health experts were so perplexed by the bird flu that they had trouble setting up the presentation. The start was delayed for about 15 minutes as organizers debated where best to place the lectern (Q: "Where do you suggest?" A: "Where do you suggest?").

Once underway, the experts, assembled by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, displayed a number of slides, some frightening (675,000 Americans dead from the 1918 flu), some technical ("vestigial esterase E region"), and some merely drawings of ducks, geese, pigs, horses and seals. But the message was, as pathologist Jeffrey Taubenberger of the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology put it, "we really don't understand a lot."

"If we take everything we know about influenza virology now, take everything I know about influenza virology now, and formulate a model of the next pandemic, it would look like this," Taubenberger said as he displayed a large question mark on the screen.

In fact, Taubenberger had evidence that the bird flu might have some difficulty mutating to a human form. But that did not entirely satisfy David Nabarro, the U.N. coordinator for influenza. "It's a very virulent and horrible virus," he said. "It has also moved into 20 countries during the last six weeks and I just checked the reports this morning: Overnight we have reports of it moving into the Gaza Strip and also moving into settlements in the West Bank."

Nabarro spoke of "mounting concern" across the world. "We are very vulnerable," he warned. "Most of us, I think, feel that it's best to be preparing to hunker down."

At the press club, John Stewart of Creekstone Farms Premium Beef was all done hunkering. Explaining his lawsuit against the Agriculture Department, he said the government wasn't testing enough animals for mad cow disease, so he wanted to do it himself. Stewart, just in from Kansas, said he was "surprised" USDA had cut back on testing. Sounding much like the influenza scientists, he said there are "question marks today about the science of this matter," and, besides, "consumers want the beef tested."

It was time for lunch in Chinatown. The CBO's Shackleton stood at a microphone stand in the middle of a room decorated by plastic and cardboard trinkets, as if delivering a toast to the economists assembled at banquet tables. There, the economist said something the Bush administration can't bring itself to say: "The problem of climate change stems mainly from the use of fossil fuels by human beings."

Shackleton said the likely temperature increase this century would be between one and five degrees Celsius, and the average rise in sea levels one to three feet. There is, he continued, "also the possibility of relatively abrupt shifts where the climate system could experience a dramatic shift."

The good news: We "won't be alive when most of the effectsoccur," he said.

The bad news: We all will have succumbed to bird flu and mad cow disease.

Letter To The Secretary (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Dear John Snow, secretary of the Treasury:

I'm glad that you've started talking about income inequality, which in recent years has reached levels not seen since before World War II. But if you want to be credible on the subject, you need to make some changes in your approach.

First, you shouldn't claim, as you seemed to earlier this week, that there's anything meaningful about the decline in some measures of inequality between 2000 and 2003. Every economist realizes that, as The Washington Post put it, "much of the decline in inequality during that period reflected the popping of the stock market bubble," which led to a large but temporary fall in the incomes of the richest Americans.

We don't have detailed data for more recent years yet, but the available indicators suggest that after 2003, incomes at the top and the overall level of inequality came roaring back. That surge in inequality explains why, despite your best efforts to talk up the economic numbers, most Americans are unhappy with the Bush economy.

I find it helpful to illustrate what's going on with a hypothetical example: say 10 middle-class guys are sitting in a bar. Then the richest guy leaves, and Bill Gates walks in.

Because the richest guy in the bar is now much richer than before, the average income in the bar soars. But the income of the nine men who aren't Bill Gates hasn't increased, and no amount of repeating "But average income is up!" will convince them that they're better off.

Now think about what happened in 2004 (the figures for 2005 aren't in yet, but it was almost certainly more of the same). The economy grew reasonably fast in 2004, but most families saw little if any improvement in their financial situation.

Instead, a small fraction of the population got much, much richer. For example, Forbes tells us that the compensation of chief executives at the 500 largest corporations rose 54 percent in 2004. In effect, Bill Gates walked into the bar. Average income rose, but only because of rising incomes at the top.

Speaking of executive compensation, Mr. Snow, it hurts your credibility when you say, as you did in a recent interview, that soaring pay for top executives reflects their productivity and that we should "trust the marketplace." Executive pay isn't set in the marketplace; it's set by boards that the executives themselves appoint. And executives' pay often bears little relationship to their performance.

You yourself, as you must know, are often cited as an example. When you were appointed to your present job, Forbes pointed out that the performance of the company you had run, CSX, was "middling at best." Nonetheless, you were "by far the highest-paid chief in the industry."

And the business careers of other prominent members of the administration, including the president and vice president, seem to demonstrate the truth of the adage that it's not what you know, it's who you know. So my advice on the question of executive pay is: don't go there.

Finally, you should stop denying that the Bush tax cuts favor the wealthy. I know that administration number-crunchers have produced calculations purporting to show that the tax cuts were tilted toward the middle class. But using the right measure — the effect of the tax cuts on after-tax income — the bias toward the haves and have-mores is unmistakable.

According to the nonpartisan Tax Policy Center, once the Bush tax cuts are fully phased in, they will raise the after-tax income of middle-income families by 2.3 percent. But they will raise the after-tax income of people like yourself, with incomes of more than $1 million, by 7.3 percent.

And those calculations don't take into account the indirect effects of tax cuts. If the tax cuts are made permanent, they'll eventually have to be offset by large spending cuts. In practical terms, that means cuts where the money is: in Social Security and Medicare benefits. Since middle-income Americans will feel the brunt of these cuts, yet received a relatively small tax break, they'll end up worse off. But the wealthy will be left considerably wealthier.

Of course, my suggestions about how to improve your credibility would force you to stop repeating administration talking points. But you're the secretary of the Treasury. Your job is to make economic policy, not to spout propaganda. Oh, wait.

Analyzing A Downfall (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

I have to admit that when Claude Allen was arrested a couple of weeks ago for allegedly stealing merchandise from discount stores, my first reaction was pure schadenfreude. Until his resignation last month for the standard Washington non-reason -- to spend more time with his family -- Allen had been the highest-ranking African American on the White House staff, the president's top domestic policy adviser. I think it was "Saturday Night Live" that first came out with the obvious joke: Who knew that George W. Bush had a domestic policy adviser?

Would it be fair to cheer Allen's downfall just because he held a highly visible post in an administration that is reviled by most African Americans? No, but there's more: He made his name in black conservative circles by serving as a top aide to Jesse Helms, the old buzzard from North Carolina. I can't say anything else about Helms that's suitable for a family newspaper, so I'll just quote my colleague David S. Broder, who once called him "the last prominent unabashed white racist politician in this country."

Helms, you will recall, railed against a federal holiday for the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. at a time when even old Strom Thurmond had gone over to the other side. Allen later said that was a "difficult" period in his association with Helms, but apparently not too difficult.

As if that weren't enough, during a bitter 1984 campaign Allen was caught spreading smarmy innuendo about Helms's opponent, Gov. James Hunt Jr., whispering to a reporter that Hunt was vulnerable because of links "with the queers."

So, yes, when Allen was arrested on felony theft charges, my first reaction was smug satisfaction. But then I told myself: Don't hate. The proper reaction is pity, on every level.

Police allege that on several occasions, Allen did the following: He went into a Target store near his home in the Maryland suburbs and bought some merchandise, then went to another Target, loaded a Target shopping bag with identical items and used the receipt from the first store to "return" the items for a refund -- in effect, getting a bunch of stuff for nothing.

The most expensive item Allen is alleged to have stolen is a $525 Bose home theater system; mostly, he's charged with taking cheap items such as a $60 jacket and a $25 pair of pants. Police say they have documented 25 instances of theft, and while the total value of the merchandise adds up to more than $5,000 -- and makes the alleged thefts a felony -- we're still talking small potatoes.

If what the police say is true, this graduate of Duke University Law School wasn't much of a criminal mastermind. Hadn't he ever heard of inventory control, or wondered what those ubiquitous bar codes are for? And why would a man who met several times a week with the president of the United States, and who earned $161,000 a year, risk everything to steal an $88 radio?

It sounds like a cry for help, and I have no idea what went so wrong in Allen's life. But I can imagine some of the strains and contradictions he had to live with.

I have respect for principled black conservatives -- I think they're wrong about many things, but I respect their right to be wrong. It's a fact of life, though, that they are isolated from the larger African American community by their political views. At times it must be very lonely.

And since black conservatives with credentials like Claude Allen's are relatively rare, they are in great demand and tend to rise fast. They have to balance their genuine political beliefs against the fact that the Jesse Helmses of the world love to have them around as window dressing so they can say, "Look, I'm not racist; here's this black person on my staff."

You could rationalize working for someone like Helms by telling yourself that you could do more good for the African American community from the inside, next to the seat of power, than from the outside. You could tell yourself you were advancing the interests of black people, even if most black people disagreed. You could ignore racism or pretend it was something else. You could tell yourself that you were making compromises and sacrifices for the greater good.

Finally, you could arrive at the White House, with a big job and regular access to the president. But it might be a White House where all the big decisions were made by just a few people, and you weren't one of them.

Then what?

Existing-home Sales Take Surprising Jump (USAT)

By Noelle Knox

Sales of existing homes rose an unexpected 5.2% last month, ending a five-month losing streak, as buyers took advantage of warm weather and kicked off the spring home-shopping season early, the National Association of Realtors said Thursday.

March, typically a strong month, is also looking good in many regions, boosting the case for a soft landing rather than a sudden plunge, in the hottest real estate markets. Early tallies from a dozen major cities across the country signal a buoyant March, though still below the levels of a year ago.

“There may be more demand out there than people who crunched the numbers had expected,” said John Karevoll of DataQuick, who analyzed the sales reported so far this month for USA TODAY.

Even in Southern California, where doomsayers have predicted the market will tank, home sales remain healthy.

“What I'm seeing from the trenches is March is looking normal: Inventory has leveled off, and sales are steady,” says Phil Romero, CEO of Century 21 Award-Superstars, which has offices in that region. “There are real negotiations on both sides, concessions by both parties.”

Nevertheless, economists expect home sales to fall for the year overall, ending a five-year feeding frenzy for housing.

“It's a nice rebound, but we have to discount some of this because of the warm weather, particularly in the Northeast,” said David Lereah, the NAR's chief economist. “We may give a little of this back in the next month or two.”

Lereah has lowered his sales forecast for the year to a 5.7% drop because mortgage rates are rising faster than expected.

In February, buyers had to pay an average of 6.25% on a conventional 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage, up from 6.15% in January, according to Freddie Mac.

Home sales last month hit a seasonally adjusted annual pace of 6.91 million, down from January's upwardly revised rate of 6.57 million. The sales were red-hot in the Northeast, rising about 19%. In the Midwest, sales jumped 11%, followed by the West with a 5% increase. Only the South saw sales decline, falling nearly 3%.

“It was a little stronger than expected,” said Nick Buss of PNC Bank.

The Commerce Department will release February's new-home sales today, and Buss said, “Given what we just saw out of existing-home sales, I wouldn't be surprised to see new-home sales slightly higher than January.”

Nationwide, the median home price — half cost more, half less — was $209,000, up nearly 11% from February 2005. The condo market recovered from a dismal January, up about 9%. The median price: $214,300, up nearly 4% from last year.

Defying Trend, An Upturn In Home Sales (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Sales of existing homes unexpectedly surged in February after falling for five months in a row, the National Association of Realtors reported yesterday, reflecting a lift related to unseasonably warm weather and signaling that the housing market is healthier than some experts had suggested.

Sales climbed 5.2 percent last month, to an annual pace of 6.91 million homes, after falling 8.9 percent in the previous five months. The nationwide median price — the point at which half the homes sold for more and half for less — climbed 10.6 percent from a year earlier, to $209,000.

The number of homes for sale, however, continued to climb, rising by 5.2 percent, to 3.03 million, which at the current pace of sales amounts to a 5.3-month supply of homes.

Analysts, who had expected sales to fall to a pace of 6.5 million, cautioned that the increase could not yet be considered a turning point. Several other real estate gauges, including mortgage applications, interest rates and pending home sales, have indicated that sales are slowing.

An unusually warm January appears to have played some role in the sharp increase in sales. Warmer weather allows more people to venture out, and sellers often use the opportunity to hold open houses. The association counts homes as sold at the closing, which typically happens one to two months after contracts are signed.

Sales jumped 19.2 percent in the Northeast, the biggest monthly increase ever recorded for the region, and 11.1 percent in the Midwest, the largest increase since 1992. Sales in the West climbed a more modest 5.1 percent, and they fell 2.5 percent in the South.

Some analysts say the surge in February could mean home sales will be softer later this spring. Since August, sales of existing homes have fallen 4.2 percent. Mortgage applications for home purchases have fallen by about 16 percent in the last 12 months, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association of America.

Home prices were higher than last year in all regions but were rising at a slower pace than they were last year, especially compared with the peak spring and summer months, when it was not unusual to see increases of 13 percent to 15 percent nationally.

Agents and analysts report that prices have dropped in some hot markets, and that appeared to be attracting some buyers who had been wary of local housing bubbles.

"Before, we had lots of people who were looking, but they said they weren't going to buy because they said prices were going to go down," said Chobee Hoy, an agent in Brookline, Mass., near Boston. "And now we find ourselves in a very healthy market where people are not only looking at properties but making offers."

Others say they expect sales to remain strong in the coming months. "It was quiet, but the last few weeks have been brisk," said Bob Moulton, a mortgage broker on Long Island.

Sales of condominiums and co-ops, which fell more than single-family home sales in the last few months, were up 8.8 percent in February, while sales of single-family homes were up 4.7 percent.

Separately, the Labor Department reported that claims for unemployment insurance fell by 11,000, to 302,000, for the week that ended March 18. The number of outstanding claims for the week that ended on March 11, however, rose by 38,000, to 2.5 million. That was down by 7.5 percent from the comparable week a year earlier.

Home Sales Jump By 5.2%, Helped By Warm Weather (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Sales of previously occupied homes jumped in February, but economists suspect that the data were distorted by unusually warm weather in some parts of the country.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes -- including single-family houses, townhouses, condominiums and cooperatives -- increased 5.2% to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 6.91 million units in February. That is up from an upwardly revised pace of 6.57 million units in January. Sales of existing homes account for about 85% of the residential market.

David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist, said warm weather in January prompted home buyers to shop in a month of normally scant sales. The Realtors' figures count home sales based on closings; many home sales that closed in February, were initiated in January. "Spring selling season started a little earlier because of the warm weather," Mr. Lereah said, "but I expect the numbers to come down a bit in the next few months."

Existing-home sales rose 19.2% in the Northeast and 11.1% in the Midwest -- areas where weather was unseasonably warm. Sales were up 5.1% in the West and declined 2.5% in the South.

Mortgage applications, an indicator of future home purchases, declined sharply last week, according to the Mortgage Bankers Association. The group's seasonally adjusted index of loan applications for home purchases stood at 393.6 in the week ended March 17, down 26% from the peak in June 2005.

At the same time, inventories of homes on the market continued to rise. The Realtors said there were 3.03 million existing homes available for sale at the end of February, up 5.2% from January. At the current sales pace, it would take 5.3 months to sell all homes available for sale. The last time inventories exceeded 5.1 months of sales was April 2003, when they reached 5.12 months of sales.

According to the Realtors' report, the national median price of an existing home for all housing types was $209,000 in February, up 10.6% from $189,000 a year earlier.

The reason for the sharp year-to-year median-price increase isn't clear. In some cases, it could reflect a changing mix of homes being sold. As mortgage rates rise, some lower-income home buyers may be priced out of the market, lifting average prices. According to Freddie Mac, the average rate on a 30-year conventional fixed-rate mortgage was 6.25% in February, up from 6.15% in January and 5.63% in February 2005.

Some economists note that because Realtors data look at year-to-year price comparisons, it is too early to see more recent price changes.

Separately, the Labor Department said the number of U.S. workers filing first-time applications for unemployment benefits declined 11,000 to 302,000 for the week ended March 18. The previous week's revised figure was 313,000. The four-week moving average was 303,500, an increase of 6,000 from the previous week's revised average of 297,500.

Black Gold Puts Blue Chips In Red (WSJ)

By Scott Patterson

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Stocks ran up against a familiar foe Thursday: higher interest rates and oil prices.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average slid 47.14 points to 11270.29. The Dow Jones Transportation Average, which has been knocking against all-time highs, shed 2% amid a spike in oil prices. Airline stocks such as AMR, parent of American Airlines, and railroad companies such as Norfolk Southern led the decliners.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slid 3.37 to 1301.67 and the Nasdaq Composite Index fell by 3.20 to 2300.15.

Light, sweet crude surged $2.14 to $63.91 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange after oil traders continued to respond to a Wednesday report by the Energy Department that crude inventories declined last week.

Other factors likely driving energy prices higher were concerns about demand as the summer driving season nears and worries about supply disruptions from the threat of hurricane season, which starts in June.

Treasury bonds declined, sending yields higher, after a report by the National Association of Realtors showed existing-home sales in February rose by 5.2% to an annual rate of 6.91 million, higher than the 6.5-million pace expected.

The report boosted housing stocks, but the strong data raised concerns on Wall Street that the Federal Reserve may keep boosting short-term rates higher than most investors hope. The Philadelphia Housing Sector Index gained 2.1%.

Analysts said investors are becoming increasingly sensitive to interest rates as next week's meeting by the Fed draws closer. The Federal Open Market Committee meets on Monday and Tuesday and will issue the first decision on rates under new Fed chairman, Ben Bernanke.

"The uncertainty level is high ahead of Tuesday's FOMC meeting, so people are prone to more skittishness than normal," said Michael Panzner, head of sales trading at Rabo Securities USA.

Policy makers are widely expected to push up rates by a quarter percentage point to 4.75%, and investors will pay close attention to the accompanying statement for hints about plans for future monetary policy. Most market participants expect the Fed to boost rates one more time to 5% at their next meeting in May, then stop. But with the strong housing data, and the potential for other reports indicating a solid underpinning to the U.S. economy, investors remain uncertain about the potential for even more increases to rates.

"People are just confused, especially with the Fed meeting coming up next week," said Kenneth Tower, chief market strategist at CyberTrader. "The question about how much we have to worry about inflation and how much the Fed has to worry about inflation is the push-pull in the market today."

In another economic report, the Labor Department said that workers filing for unemployment claims fell 11,000 last week, more than expected. The four-week average of jobless claims rose above 300,000 for the first time in 10 weeks, indicating some softness in the labor market.

Meanwhile, shares of Adobe Systems fell nearly 1% after it issued a quarterly financial forecast after the bell yesterday that, at the low end, fell short of analysts' estimates. Shares of Yahoo climbed 3.5% after UBS upgraded the on-line search engine to "buy" from "neutral," citing valuation, the strength of branded advertising and potential to monetize searches.

In major market action:

Stocks declined. On the New York Stock Exchange, where 1.5 billion shares traded, 1,608 stocks rose and 1,681 fell. On the Nasdaq Stock Market, where 2 billion shares traded, 1,607 rose and 1,408 declined.

Bonds fell. The benchmark 10-year Treasury slid 9/32 point, or $2.81 for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.741%. The 30-year bond lost 14/32 to yield 4.753%. Yields move inversely to prices.

The dollar advanced. It traded at 117.94 yen, up from 116.90 yen late Wednesday, while the euro fell to $1.1973 from $1.2075.

Shares Slide As Price Of Oil Feeds Fears Of Higher Rates (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

Stocks fell yesterday after oil prices jumped and an increase in home sales added to concern that the Federal Reserve might keep lifting interest rates. The Dow Jones industrial average had its biggest loss in about three weeks.

Transportation shares tumbled amid crude oil's biggest advance this month and a lower profit forecast at YRC Worldwide, one of the largest American truckers.

The Dow fell 47.14 points, or 0.4 percent, to 11,270.29, retreating from the highest level since May 2001. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 3.37 points, or 0.3 percent, to 1,301.67. The Nasdaq composite index slid 3.20 points, or 0.1 percent, to 2,300.15.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note was 4.73 percent, up from 4.70 percent. The price, which moves in the opposite direction, fell 9/32, to 98 5/32.

Remarks by the Fed chairman, Ben S. Bernanke, and a report on producer prices have increased speculation this week that the Fed will keep raising rates. Yesterday's data reinforced that concern.

The National Association of Realtors said sales of existing homes in February rose 5.2 percent, to an annual rate of 6.91 million. New-home sales figures are due today.

A separate report showed that first-time claims for unemployment benefits had dropped for the first time in four weeks, further suggesting economic strength.

Fed policy makers meet next week and may increase rates for a 15th consecutive time. The Fed's benchmark lending rate stands at 4.5 percent.

Crude oil for May delivery surged $2.14, or 3.5 percent, to $63.91 a barrel, its biggest gain this month. The Energy Department said Wednesday that inventories fell unexpectedly.

YRC Worldwide, which changed its name this year from the Yellow Roadway Corporation, plunged $6.73, or 15 percent, to $38.56. The company expects first-quarter profit of 65 cents to 70 cents a share, down from its January forecast of $1 to $1.05, because of a drop in orders from retailers and price competition.

Ryder System, the truck-leasing company, lost $1.35, to $44.56. Norfolk Southern, the railroad, slipped $1.84, to $52.89.

Carnival fell $2.54, or 5.1 percent, to $47.49, for one of the biggest retreats in the S.& P. 500. Carnival, the cruise operator, said first-quarter profit dropped 19 percent and it cut its annual forecast because of higher fuel costs.

KB Home rose $3.23, or 5 percent, to $67.82 for one of the biggest gains in the S.& P. 500. The company said fiscal first-quarter profit was $2.02 a share. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial had expected $1.96 for the quarter, which ended in February. KB Home also said orders fell 12 percent as rising mortgage rates cooled demand.

Jabil Circuit rose $4.51, or 12 percent, to $42.75. The company forecast profit this quarter of 43 cents a share on sales of as much as $2.6 billion.

Yahoo and Level 3 Communications rallied after analyst upgrades. Yahoo gained $1.08, to $31.83. Level 3 surged 57 cents, to $4.01.

Adobe Systems, the maker of graphic-design software, fell 29 cents, to $36.33. The company said sales in the fiscal second quarter would be $640 million to $670 million.

The forecast from Adobe followed Microsoft's announcement this week that it would delay the new version of its Windows software program. Microsoft lost 30 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.85.

Bernanke Says Dollar Risk From Less Capital Not `Worrisome' (BLOOM)

By Scott Lanman

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 23 (Bloomberg) -- Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke said a possible decline in the dollar because of less foreign investment wouldn't have a ``worrisome'' effect on the U.S. economy.

Bernanke said it isn't clear that faster economic growth in emerging markets would cause investors to shift capital to those countries and away from the U.S. Should that happen, ``it might be associated with a decline in the value of the dollar and a narrowing of the U.S. trade deficit,'' Bernanke wrote in a March 21 letter to Representative Harold Ford Jr., a Tennessee Democrat, which was released today.

Neither of those events, though, ``would be likely to threaten U.S. growth or boost inflation and interest rates to a worrisome extent.''

Overseas investors increased their holdings of U.S. stocks, bonds and other securities by a record $868 billion last year, which was equal to almost 7 percent of the economy, according to the Treasury Department. A decade ago, foreign investment in U.S. securities was a net $133 billion, or 1.8 percent of gross domestic product.

``Regardless of the future evolution of the dollar, the trade deficit, and the global economy, the Federal Reserve will continue to focus its policies on maintaining stable prices and maximum sustainable employment in the United States,'' Bernanke wrote.

The letter is one of a series of responses to lawmakers who requested additional comments from Bernanke after he testified before House and Senate committees Feb. 15-16. Bernanke, a former economics professor, succeeded Alan Greenspan as central bank chief on Feb. 1.

Consumer Loans

In another part of his response to Ford, Bernanke acknowledged that the series of increases in the Fed's benchmark interest rate haven't necessarily made it tougher for consumers and companies to get loans.

``The available evidence suggests that credit standards and a number of non-price lending terms for both households and businesses have eased,'' Bernanke wrote.

Bernanke told another lawmaker this week, Democratic Representative Brad Sherman of California, that the trade deficit needn't cause a ``precipitous decline'' in the dollar's value, though the ``possibility of a future disruptive correction of the U.S. trade deficit cannot be ruled out.''

All Rise, Rock And Roll (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

They look like a bunch of mobsters.

They wear dark suits and darker sunglasses, have nicknames like Trash Can and Top Dog and brag about how they fought the law (and the law won).

The thing is: They are the law.

Stoic stewards of the Constitution by day in D.C. Superior Court, they are by night (or weekend, or whenever they feel the urge) Deaf Dog and the Indictments -- a guitar-heavy group of seven music-loving judges, anchored by the lone civilian among them, a ponytailed shrink on drums.

They aren't picky about where they play. All they ask for is a little space and a little bit of love.

The love might take some work tonight, when the band is to perform at the Fraternal Order of Police lodge -- in front of a crowd of cops, prosecutors and defense lawyers.

But it was in plentiful supply last weekend, when the band played its first show in months -- at the Armed Forces Retirement Home.

Strutting onto the stage Saturday afternoon in Blues Brothers-black, Dawgg (aka Judge William Jackson) and the rest of the Indictments had more space than they needed -- 100 or so people were spread out in an auditorium built for lots more.

"Let the good times roll," Dawgg announced, launching into the classic from B.B. King, as Dennis "Red Dog" Doyle on lead guitar let out a howl of approval.

It was to be a trip back to the 1950s and '60s, with the music of Wilson Pickett, Ben E. King and, of course, The King himself.

Unsure what to make of their guests, more than a few of the retirement home's residents sat toward the back, as if they were at a Sunday service they feared might go on too long. Dancing in the aisles they were not, but with each song, the restlessness seemed to fade just a little bit.

Even a few fellow judges turned out, eager to see how the band had progressed since its debut last spring during a talent show at the judges' annual retreat.

No one had expected that gag gig in Cumberland, Md., to be the beginning of anything. But then something clicked. Russ "Top Dog" Canan, who had started it all, sent out an e-mail. Did anyone want to keep playing?

All they had were a couple of songs and a curious name, hatched in an early rehearsal, when a few of the musicians thought they had found a real fan -- Canan's German shepherd, Chapin, who was never put off by the racket that chased everyone else away. Canan had to break it to his brethren that Chapin was deaf. But he didn't doubt her devotion, and so was born the name, Deaf Dog and the Indictments.

Maybe it was the pangs of middle and not-so-middle age sounding a call to their inner youth. Or perhaps they wanted a break from all the pain and conflict they see in court: the murder cases Canan tried as a judge in criminal court, the dysfunctional lives that Jackson saw as head of the domestic violence courts or just the indignity of having a deranged defendant hurl a trash can into your head, as happened to John Campbell when he was assigned to a criminal court.

Whatever it was, the band lived to play again, starting at D.C. Superior Court, where it was the surprise entertainment for the employee awards ceremony last fall. It was a home crowd, to be sure, but even so, before long, the judges had hundreds of court employees clapping their hands and tapping their feet -- and asking themselves, "Who are these guys?"

Canan, now in civil court, was on rhythm guitar. So was John "Cartwheel" McCabe, who hears abuse and neglect cases. Doyle, who hears child support claims, was joined on lead guitar by Bill "Blue Dog" Nooter, who hears abuse and neglect cases.

Jackson, who dabbled in song as a college student, was lead vocalist for most of the band's set, pitching in with harmonica and tambourine when he was not singing. "Trash Can" Campbell, who sits in family court as well, was on bass guitar. Frank "Professor" Burgess, who hears probate and tax cases, was behind the keyboard.

And Marc Feldman, aka "Houndog," the ponytailed psychologist, was on drums. An old friend of Canan's from their days in a garage band two decades ago, Feldman was the drummer the group realized it would need if it was going to make a go of this thing.

Very much the producer, Feldman has made his home the band's clubhouse, and on a recent Sunday night the ground floor was a swarm of amplifiers, electrical cords and half-empty pizza boxes.

The beat of Van Morrison's "Brown Eyed Girl" drifted onto the quiet Northwest Washington street. "We knew we had arrived when one of the neighbors complained," joked Jackson, the front man whose fellow band members say has the soul of Otis Redding and the shtick of Jackie Mason.

For the judges, it's about fun. They can't play for money, or even for charity. So they play just to play, wherever they are welcome. The Washington Home, a nursing facility, was one stop on the tour. Children's Hospital was another.

"We all do outreach," Canan said, and that sense of civic obligation is part of it, he said. "And part of it is it's just fun, playing for folks, sharing the music."

Like the night a few months ago when they took the stage at the Grog and Tankard, the Glover Park tavern that is a regular stop for many up-and-coming bands.

For people who have such busy day jobs, they were surprisingly good, said Colin Hoss, the Grog's booking agent. "They had the entire crowd dancing," he said.

But those busy day jobs have a way of slowing down runaway success, and the band took a break for a few months. Emerging from their hiatus, Deaf Dog and the Indictments turned up at the Armed Forces Retirement Home to headline the home's spring break party.

There was Feldman roaring through Elvis's "Blue Suede Shoes," Jackson soulfully rendering Wilson Pickett's "Mustang Sally" and so on through a 12-song set.

James Hart, a 77-year-old retired Air Force administrator, had heard about a bunch of judges claiming they were going to play the blues and some rock-and-roll, and was decidedly skeptical. "I said, 'I got to see this,' " he said.

But by the end, the band had won Hart over.

"They're entertainers," Hart said after telling the judges the same thing. "I told them they can quit their day jobs and go on the road."

Women Wage Key Campaigns For Democrats (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

NARBERTH, Pa. — If the Democrats have their way, the 2006 Congressional elections will be the revenge of the mommy party.

Democratic women are running major campaigns in nearly half of the two dozen most competitive House races where their party hopes to pick up enough Republican seats to regain control of the House. Democratic strategists are betting that the voters' unrest and hunger for change — reflected consistently in public opinion polls — create the perfect conditions for their party's female candidates this year.

"In an environment where people are disgusted with politics in general, who represents clean and change?" asks Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Women."

Republicans, who have prospered in recent elections by running as the guardians of national security and clearly hope to do so again, dismiss this theory. But it will ultimately be tested in places like this Philadelphia suburb, where Lois Murphy, a 43-year-old lawyer and Democratic activist, lost a Congressional campaign in 2004 by just two percentage points.

This time, as she challenges the same Republican incumbent, Representative Jim Gerlach, Ms. Murphy said in an interview in her campaign headquarters in Narberth, she senses an electorate that is "really, really" ready for change, tired of the ethics scandals, and convinced "that their government has been letting them down."

On whether her sex is a particular asset this year, Ms. Murphy replied, "I leave that to the political experts, which I am not."

But Ms. Murphy said that her agenda — ethics reform, fiscal responsibility, affordable health care, more sensitivity to the environment — was connecting with moderates in both political parties.

In another high-profile race, an open seat in Illinois's Sixth District in the Chicago suburbs, L. Tammy Duckworth, a former Army helicopter pilot who lost both legs in Iraq, locked up the Democratic nomination in a narrow primary victory on Tuesday — over another woman.

"It's about change on so many levels," said Ms. Duckworth of her campaign, which she said would focus heavily on the need to improve and expand health care. "If being a woman underscores that, makes it clear that I'm going to be an effective agent of change, that's great."

By the time it is over, this midterm election may offer some hints on the kind of climate that awaits Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York if she runs for president in 2008. At a time when voters have grown accustomed to women as secretary of state, House minority leader, governor (there are currently eight) and the like, this year's campaign could provide insight into the power of gender stereotypes that have been charted by scholars and political experts over many years.

In the 435-seat House of Representatives, there are 67 women, 43 of them Democrats, 24 Republicans.

The seats for which Democratic women are running this year are among the 24 held by Republicans that are classified by the Cook Political Report, an independent analyst, as either "tossups" or "lean Republican" — a key measure of competitiveness. That is a fluid list this early in the campaign; many candidates have yet to make it through their primaries, and many races are still in a state of flux.

But Amy Walter, who tracks House races for Cook, said, "If you look at the top Republican targets this year, the success of Democratic women candidates will be very important in determining the number of Democratic pickups."

A net shift of 15 seats to Democrats from Republicans would turn over control of the House.

For all the enthusiasm on the Democratic side, experts say this will not be another 1992-style "year of the woman," the breakthrough year when the number of women in the House and Senate jumped by more than half. There simply are not enough competitive or open seats to make that kind of change likely.

But the Center for American Women and Politics, at Rutgers, says early data suggests an increase in the number of women running for open seats this year, fueled by the Democrats, although several of these women still face contested primaries. It is far easier for challengers to win an open seat than to oust an incumbent.

"It's not about how many women are running," said Ellen Malcolm, the president of Emily's List, the Democratic women's fund-raising organization. "It's about how many women are running where they have real opportunities to win."

Moreover, Democratic strategists hope to frame these midterm races as a classic change-versus-status-quo election — which, they say, makes women, running as outsiders against a "culture of corruption," the perfect messengers.

Celinda Lake, a Democratic pollster working for three female House candidates this year, said, "If you want to communicate change, honesty, cleaning up Washington, not the same old good old boys in Washington, women are very good at communicating that."

Officials at the Democratic campaign committee said that along with Emily's List and other women's groups, they had made a point of encouraging and recruiting women as candidates this year.

"This didn't just happen," Mr. Emanuel said.

Republicans profess to be unworried about the new wave of female candidates for what is often described, sometimes disparagingly, as the "mommy party." (Supposedly, in the shorthand of political positioning, Democrats are more concerned with nurturing, caring and domestic policy, while the Republicans care more about security.)

"I'm as worried about Rahm Emanuel's women as I am about Rahm Emanuel's vets," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, referring dismissively to another group of candidates Democrats have focused on this year.

Mr. Forti argued that "in our strategy every race is local, based on local issues," and he added, "It doesn't matter whether the candidate is man, woman, green, purple, orange, red, whatever."

That approach is echoed by Mark Campbell, political director of the Gerlach campaign in Pennsylvania, who said of his race, "It will be a competitive campaign, and Jim Gerlach will ultimately win because his position on important issues more closely reflects the voters of the Sixth District than Ms. Murphy's."

As for her sex, Mr. Campbell said, "I think anyone who would vote for Lois Murphy because she's a woman would vote for her just because she's the Democrat running."

In recent weeks, the Gerlach and the Murphy campaigns have been pushing competing ethics plans and trading accusations over who is truly committed to the cause.

Linda DiVall, a longtime Republican pollster who has worked for many female candidates, also notes that sex stereotypes cut both ways among voters. For example, female candidates are often seen as vulnerable on national security, Ms. DiVall said, which could be a problem in a post-Sept. 11 world. Ms. Lake, the Democratic pollster, said the sex advantages (like honesty) and disadvantages (competence on foreign policy) have grown more marginal.

"They're not as new as they used to be," Ms. Lake said of women in politics.

Republicans have some high-profile women running for Congress this year, notably Martha Rainville, who stepped aside as adjutant general of the Vermont National Guard to seek her state's lone House seat.

But this year's candidates are disproportionately Democrats, part of a longstanding trend, said Kathleen Dolan, political scientist and author of "Voting for Women: How the Public Evaluates Women Candidates."

Among the most closely watched Democratic women this year are Diane Farrell, challenging Representative Christopher Shays in Connecticut; Gabrielle Giffords and Patty Weiss, vying for the Democratic nomination for an open seat representing the Tucson area; Patricia Madrid, the New Mexico attorney general challenging Representative Heather A. Wilson; Ms. Duckworth, the Iraqi war veteran, seeking the open seat outside Chicago; Francine Busby, running for the California seat left vacant by the bribery conviction of former Representative Randy Cunningham, and Ms. Murphy, challenging Mr. Gerlach in Pennsylvania.

Emily's List, which essentially recommends female candidates who support abortion rights to its 100,000 members, reports a much heavier roster of House races than it carried two years ago. Getting recommended by Emily's List, whose members were responsible for $10 million in donations in 2004, is a major help to a campaign, candidates say.

Swann, Rendell Running Even In Pennsylvania Race (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

Democratic Gov. Edward G. Rendell of Pennsylvania, once considered a shoo-in for a second term, is running dead even against Republican and former Pittsburgh Steelers standout Lynn Swann, according to recent polls.

Mr. Rendell, one of his party's few big state governors, was expected to have little trouble winning another four years in office, until the charismatic Football Hall of Fame wide receiver and ABC Sports commentator entered the contest in January, sweeping his rivals from the race for the GOP nomination and making the former Philadelphia mayor and national Democratic chairman look suddenly vulnerable.

An independent statewide survey last week by Atlanta-based Strategic Vision found the governor and Mr. Swann running neck and neck, drawing 44 percent each, with 10 percent undecided and 2 percent supporting others. Should Mr. Swann win, he would be the first black governor in the state's history.

"What you have in Swann is a celebrity, like Arnold Schwarzenegger had out in California, who doesn't come across as a typical politician. That's helping him quite a bit. People want to like him and he comes across as very likeable," said David E. Johnson, Strategic Vision's pollster.

Mr. Swann exudes the kind of nonpolitical, outsider persona that an increasingly unhappy electorate seems to be looking for, Mr. Johnson said yesterday.

Mr. Rendell has seen his voter-approval scores fall below 50 percent, after his disastrous signing of a legislator pay-raise bill last year that triggered protests from voters and was later rescinded.

No Pennsylvania governor since World War II has been denied a second term, and Mr. Rendell is an effective campaigner who has amassed a $12.5 million war chest, compared with Mr. Swann's $1.2 million. Elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg still gives Mr. Rendell the "narrow advantage for now," but last week, he told his monthly newsletter subscribers that the governor is "more vulnerable."

"No other gubernatorial candidate in the country received the worldwide recognition that Lynn Swann did when his former team, the Pittsburgh Steelers, won the Super Bowl" after Mr. Swann walked out on the field in the pre-game ceremony, Mr. Rothenberg said.

Two big questions about Mr. Swann are how he will perform as a first-time candidate and how much of the heavily Democratic black vote he can draw away from Mr. Rendell.

"Every politician has to motivate his base to win, and Swann's base is the black vote. You can't beat Rendell without breaking into the numbers in Philadelphia and the suburbs, and the obvious way to do that is to take the black vote," said Clay Richards, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll.

Mr. Swann is forming a campaign team that includes political adviser Mark Holman, former chief of staff to Republican Gov. Tom Ridge, and communications strategist Leonardo Alcivar, who worked for former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani.

Mr. Swann is running on the issue of tax cuts, particularly property taxes that have become a dominant issue in Pennsylvania, but has not laid out his full agenda.

Researchers Look At Prayer And Healing (WP)

By Rob Stein

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

At the Fairfax Community Church in Virginia, the faithful regularly pray for ailing strangers. Same goes at the Adas Israel synagogue in Washington and the Islamic Center of Maryland in Gaithersburg.

In churches, mosques, ashrams, "healing rooms," prayer groups and homes nationwide, millions of Americans offer prayers daily to heal themselves, family, friends, co-workers and even people found through the Internet. Fueled by the upsurge in religious expression in the United States, prayer is the most common complement to mainstream medicine, far outpacing acupuncture, herbs, vitamins and other alternative remedies.

"Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Buddhism -- every religion believes in prayer for healing," said Paul Parker, a professor of theology and religion at Elmhurst College outside Chicago. "Some call it prayer, some call it cleansing the mind. The words or posture may vary. But in times of illness, all religions look towards their source of authority."

The outpouring of spiritual healing has inspired a small group of researchers to attempt to use the tools of modern science to test the power of prayer to cure others. The results have been mixed and highly controversial. Skeptics say the work is a deeply flawed and misguided waste of money that irresponsibly attempts to validate the supernatural with science. And some believers say it is pointless to try to divine the workings of God with experiments devised by mortals.

Proponents, however, maintain the research is valuable, given the large numbers of people who believe in the power of prayer to influence health. Surveys have found that perhaps half of Americans regularly pray for their own health, and at least a quarter have others pray for them.

"It's one of the most prevalent forms of healing. Open-minded scientists have a responsibility to look into this," said Marilyn J. Schlitz of the California Pacific Medical Center in San Francisco.

The contentious enterprise is at something of a crossroads. Two new studies are about to report no benefit of having people pray for the sick, the only study underway is nearing completion, and the largest, best-designed project is being published in two weeks. Its eagerly awaited findings could sound the death knell for the field, breathe new life into such efforts, or create new debate.

"I will guarantee you that study will have a very interesting impact on a lot of people's thinking," said Mitchell W. Krucoff of Duke University, who wrote an editorial that will accompany the closely guarded findings in the American Heart Journal. "But how you interpret the results will probably depend on your point of view."

Many studies done over the years indicate that the devout tend to be healthier. But the reasons remain far from clear. Healthy people may be more likely to join churches. The pious may lead more wholesome lifestyles. Churches, synagogues and mosques may help people take better care of themselves. The quiet meditation and incantations of praying, or the comfort of being prayed for, appears to lower blood pressure, reduce stress hormones, slow the heart rate and have other potentially beneficial effects.

But the most controversial research focuses on "intercessory" or "distant" prayer, which involves people trying to heal others through their intentions, thoughts or prayers, sometimes without the recipients knowing it. The federal government has spent $2.2 million in the past five years on studies of distant healing, which have also drawn support from private foundations.

San Francisco cardiologist Randolph Byrd, for example, conducted an experiment in which he asked born-again Christians to pray for 192 people hospitalized for heart problems, comparing them with 201 not targeted for prayer. No one knew which group they were in. He reported in 1988 that those who were prayed for needed fewer drugs and less help breathing.

William S. Harris of St. Luke's Hospital in Kansas City, Mo., and colleagues published similar results in 1999 from a study involving nearly 1,000 heart patients, about half of whom were prayed for without their knowledge.

But these and other studies have been called deeply flawed. They were, for example, analyzed in the most favorable way possible, looking at so many outcomes that the positive findings could easily have been the result of chance, critics say.

"It's called the sharpshooter's fallacy," said Richard Sloan, a behavioral researcher at Columbia University. "The sharpshooter empties the gun into the side of a barn and then draws the bull's-eye. In science, you have to predict in advance what effect you may have."

Other studies have been even more contentious, such as a 2001 project involving fertility patients that became mired in accusations of fraud.

"I would like to see us stop wasting precious research dollars putting religious practices to the test of science," Sloan said. "It's a waste of money, and it trivializes the religious experience."

Even some advocates of incorporating more prayer and spirituality into medicine agree.

"I don't see how you could quantify prayer -- either the results of it or the substance of it," said the Rev. Raymond J. Lawrence of New York-Presbyterian Hospital/Columbia University Medical Center. "God is beyond the reach of science. It's absurd to think you could use it to examine God's play."

Perhaps most important, many scientists say, is that there is no rational explanation for how this kind of prayer might work.

"There's nothing we know about the physical universe that could account for how the prayers of someone in Washington, D.C., could influence the health of a group of people in Iowa -- nothing whatsoever," Sloan said.

But supporters say that much about medicine remains murky or is explained only over time. They say, for example, that it was relatively recently that scientists figured out how aspirin works, although it has been in use for centuries.

"Yesterday's science fiction often becomes tomorrow's science," said John A. Astin of the California Pacific Medical Center.

Proponents often cite a phenomenon from quantum physics, in which distant particles can affect each other's behavior in mysterious ways.

"When quantum physics was emerging, Einstein wrote about spooky interactions between particles at a distance," Krucoff said. "That's at least one very theoretical model that might support notions of distant prayer or distant healing."

Krucoff, a cardiologist, published a study last summer involving 748 heart patients at nine hospitals. That study failed overall to show any benefit. But Krucoff said he did find tantalizing hints that warrant follow-up: A subset of patients who had a second group of people praying that the prayers of the first group would be answered may have done better.

That underscores one of the many difficulties that critics and advocates say makes studying prayer problematic: There is no way to quantify the "dose," and no way to know whether people outside the study may be praying for its subjects, diluting the effects.

Two smaller, more recently completed studies illustrate yet another problem. Each involved about 150 patients with brain tumors or AIDS. Only some were targeted by "distant healing" and only some knew they were the recipients. But in addition to traditional prayers, many of the dozens of "healers" used other approaches, such as visualizing patients and sending a "healing intention" or "energy" or "light." Both studies, which will be published later this year, did not show any effect. But neither of the researchers who led them is advocating giving up, saying their studies may have been doomed by including too many healing variations.

The only ongoing study is also testing whether a spectrum of healers can help -- in this case, women who are recovering from reconstructive surgery after breast cancer. Doctors are inserting tiny tubes under the skin of about 90 women to measure the growth of collagen, which is necessary for healing, to see if those targeted by healers accumulate more than those who do not. The study will end this spring.

Krucoff and others say it is also important to study prayer as an adjunct -- not a replacement -- to standard medical care, to make sure it is safe.

"Human physiology is a very delicate equilibrium. When you throw energy you don't understand into this, it would be naive to think you could only do good," he said.

In the hope of shedding light on that and other questions, researchers are awaiting the results of the study led by Herbert Benson of Harvard University, which involved about 1,800 heart-bypass patients at six centers who were divided into three groups. Only some of them knew whether they were receiving prayer.

"What that study finds will help tell us which way to go -- whether there are intriguing findings or the book ought to be closed on this topic," said Harold Koenig of Duke University.

But researchers on both sides, as well as those who believe in prayer, say the results of that and other studies are unlikely to change many minds.

"I don't think it will alter my beliefs one way or the other," said Trish Lankowski, who started a healing room at Immanuel's Church in Silver Spring this past Sunday night. "I believe in the power of prayer wholeheartedly. I know it works."

Poor America (WSJ)

By Douglas Besharov

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Each year the Census Bureau calculates the nation's poverty rate, based on the number of people with incomes below the official poverty line, about $20,000 for a family of four in 2004. Since last year's poverty rate of 12.7% was essentially equal to the 1968 rate of 12.8%, it seems that little progress has been made. But many analysts -- on the right and the left -- have pointed out that, by many other measures, poor people's physical and material well-being is considerably better now than in the late '60s. How else to explain why so many poor now have color TV (93%) and air conditioning (50%), and own their own homes (46%)?

While many have proposed revising the official poverty measure, getting agreement is about as likely as Bush carrying Manhattan. The poverty line or its multiple is the basis of eligibility for dozens of government antipoverty programs, involving the distributions of hundreds of billions of dollars. Change it -- up or down -- and hundreds of thousands of people gain or lose benefits.

That's what makes a new data series by the Census Bureau, "The Effects of Government Taxes and Transfers on Income and Poverty: 2004," so significant. Developed after nine months of meetings between outside experts and senior government officials from the Census Bureau and other federal agencies, it allows us to get a better view of the resources available to low-income Americans.

First, the series gets a better fix on "market income" poverty -- poverty before taxes and means-tested transfers like cash welfare. (Although the Census Bureau counts it separately, Social Security, like pensions, is included as market income since it is "earned" during one's working years.) Now we can use the correct inflation adjustment, count the income of cohabitors and coresidents, and include the implicit income of home ownership. (The last mostly affects the elderly.) Finally, adding in government estimates of unreported income results in a market income poverty rate of about 7.9%, not the official rate of 12.7%. Second, as suggested by the name of the new data series, government transfer programs also reduce financial need. Taking into account welfare payments, food stamps and housing assistance (noncash benefits are presently not counted) results in a poverty rate of about 5.1% -- and even this excludes the value of Medicaid for the poor, roughly $2,000 per person.

Even with these calculations, about 15 million people are below the poverty line and millions more just above it. But the broader point must not be lost: Millions of low-income Americans are living better lives than they did before. Period.

Mr. Besharov is the Jacobs scholar in social welfare studies at the American Enterprise Institute.

Speak Softly And Carry A Smaller Stick (NYT)

By Andrew Kohut

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

WE shouldn't allow isolationism and protectionism to overwhelm us," said President Bush in his press conference on Tuesday, building on the concerns that he expressed in his State of the Union address about Americans turning inward.

Recent opinion surveys affirm that isolationist sentiment has increased in recent years. Notably, a survey by my center and the Council on Foreign Relations last fall reported that the percentage of the public who said that the United States should "mind its own business internationally and let other countries get along the best they can on their own" rose to levels seen during the mid-1970's, following the Vietnam War, and in the 1990's after the cold war ended. And a companion poll of opinion leaders found that they, too, had become less supportive of the United States playing a world leadership role.

But while these trends represent significant shifts in attitudes, it would be a mistake to conclude that this country is becoming isolationist. There is no sign that most Americans want the United States to turn its back on the world or that anti-foreign sentiment in this country is rising. Discontent with Mr. Bush's policies, notably on Iraq, has led to widespread public frustration. And while it has also created more isolationists, they remain a minority.

The number of Pew respondents agreeing that the United States should mind its own business and let other countries get along as best they can climbed to 42 percent last year from 34 percent in 2004. Agreement with this statement has been roughly this high only twice in the last four decades: in 1976 and in 1995. Now as then, however, most Americans continue to disagree with this sentiment. And huge majorities, including many who express some isolationist sentiments, believe that the United States should consider the views of its allies in making foreign policy, and they acknowledge America's leadership role in the world given its power.

Polls also find no rise in broad-based anti-foreign sentiment. Americans, in fact, rate most countries more favorably than people in other countries rate the United States. For example, a February Gallup survey showed 54 percent of the public holding a favorable view of France and 79 percent a favorable opinion of Germany. In contrast, just 41 percent of the Germans and 43 percent of the French expressed favorable views of the United States in last year's Pew Global Attitudes Survey.

Further, there is no sign of increased alarm about rivals to the United States. Americans are less inclined now than in the past to view China as an adversary, and few express worries about its rising economic might. In addition, Americans favor a stronger European Union and closer relations with Europe. Fully 66 percent of Americans think the United States and Western European partnership on security and diplomatic matters should remain as close it has been the past. But only 26 percent of the French, 39 percent of the German and 42 percent of the British respondents felt the same way in our survey.

Even right after the uproar over the bid by a Dubai-based company to take over facilities in American ports, Americans continue to welcome foreign investment and are much less worried about foreign ownership of American companies than they were at the end of the 1980's. The rejection of the Dubai ports deal appears to reflect not xenophobia but a deep concern about Arab terrorism. While a narrow majority of respondents (53 percent) to a Pew survey last week expressed a negative view of foreign investors owning American companies, 70 percent did so in 1989, when high-profile acquisitions of American businesses by Japanese companies provoked widespread concern.

Moreover, by a 53 percent to 36 percent margin, Americans view foreign companies investing in the United States as a good thing. And more generally, two-thirds of Americans (66 percent) believe free trade is good for the United States. This view is largely unchanged since 2000, even though public concern about the outsourcing of American jobs has risen sharply.

All this shows that America's current mood is less a rejection of the rest of the world than it is a deep concern about terrorism and a growing wariness about America's own assertive foreign policy. In particular, there is little potential support for the use of force against Iran. And more generally, the American experience in Iraq has reduced support for pre-emptive wars. The belief that it is justifiable to use military force against countries that threaten us but have not attacked us fell from 67 percent in May 2003, when the war in Iraq seemed a success, to just 52 percent last fall.

Unfortunately, the uptick in isolationism has the potential for dangerous political consequences. In an election year, politicians in both parties (each of which has significant isolationist minorities) may feel mistakenly compelled to play to strong sentiments that do not reflect the beliefs of the majority, urging the United States to pull back on its global commitments, move away from free trade and close its borders. More dangerously in this age of terrorism, the president may well need to pursue policies that are assertive, if not costly. If he does, and even with the best of intentions, he may not find the requisite support.

Rice Won't Tolerate Stall Tactics On Iran (AP-Y2)

By Anne Gearan

AP2, March 23, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice issued a veiled warning Thursday to holdouts in a diplomatic impasse at the United Nations over Iran's disputed nuclear program.

"There can't be any stalling," Rice said in response to a question about U.S. efforts to get Russia and China to sign on to a strongly worded rebuke to Tehran.

Russia and China have refused to back a U.N. Security Council statement proposed by Britain, France and the United States demanding Iran suspend uranium enrichment.

Talks among the permanent members of the Security Council have bogged down over the statement, which traditional Iranian allies or trade partners see as a prelude to sanctions they do not support.

Rice planned to call her Russian counterpart Friday to try to break the deadlock.

The Security Council statement was intended to be an opening move in what could be lengthy talks at the powerful U.N. body over how to stop Iran from building a nuclear bomb.

The statement was also meant to be an easier pill to swallow for Russia and China than would another option: A tough Security Council resolution.

A presidential statement requires consensus from the body's 15 members. A resolution would be put to an up-or-down vote, meaning Russia and China would have to approve, abstain or veto action against Iran.

Rice indicated that the United States will not wait long before taking another tack.

"The international community has got to act," Rice said following a first meeting with the new Greek foreign minister, Theodora Bakoyannis.

"People are looking to the international community to show that this can, indeed, be dealt with diplomatically," Rice said. "We are committed to a diplomatic solution, but it has to be dealt with."

Russian deputy U.N. Ambassador Konstantin Dolgov said Russia was still under the assumption that the council was working toward a presidential statement, not a resolution.

"We are continuing negotiations in good faith and we hope that all our partners are doing likewise," Dolgov told The Associated Press.

The Iran nuclear file moved to the Security Council this month, with the support of veto-wielding members Russia and China. That was seen as a diplomatic victory for the United States, which had long sought to place Iran before the U.N. body for possible punishment.

Moscow and Beijing now insist the U.N. nuclear watchdog in Vienna, the International Atomic Energy Agency, play the lead role in clearing up suspicions over Iran's intentions.

"We think there is still an opportunity to get a compromise but a compromise that would send the right signal — endorse the IAEA, and help in the negotiation process which is going on and should go on," Dolgov said.

Iran says it is developing nuclear technology only to produce electricity, but the United States and its allies accuse the clerical regime of using civilian nuclear power as a cover to develop weapons.

"There is an erosion of confidence in Iran on this point, because they lied to the IAEA for 18 years," Rice said, referring to nuclear research and development activities that Iran kept hidden.

Russia and China have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

Iran Closer To Producing Nuclear Weapons Fuel, U.S. Officials Worry (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay And Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. officials are concerned that Iran may be closer than they previously believed to mastering the process for producing fuel for a nuclear weapon.

Their unease stems from a recent briefing at which U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency experts reported that Iran was close to operating a test network of 164 machines, called centrifuges, that spin uranium hexafluoride gas into enriched uranium, U.S. officials and a foreign diplomat said.

Depending on its duration, the process produces low enriched uranium for power plants and highly enriched uranium for nuclear weapons.

The report came amid a deadlock in two-week-old talks among the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China - the U.N. Security Council permanent members - on how to deal with Iran's nuclear program.

The IAEA and several European nations disputed the Bush administration's charges about Iraq's nuclear weapons program, but there's wider international agreement about Iran's nuclear efforts.

Should Iran quickly overcome the numerous technical obstacles to operating the test network, known as a cascade, it could accelerate the installation of an industrial-scale plant and begin producing highly enriched uranium much sooner than currently forecast, the U.S. officials and the diplomat said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they weren't authorized to discuss the issue.

Based on the IAEA data, U.S. experts have concluded that "Iran could be as little as two to three years away from having nuclear weapons, with all the necessary caveats and assumptions and extrapolations about them overcoming technical hurdles," said one U.S. official. "Admittedly, those are significant assumptions."

Publicly, the Bush administration estimates that 2011 is the soonest that Iran could produce a nuclear weapon.

"They are moving much quicker than everyone thought," said the diplomat, who didn't offer an estimate on how soon Iran might be able to produce highly enriched uranium.

He said there was evidence that Iran has moved large containers of uranium hexafluoride gas to Natanz, the main enrichment research site in central Iran, from a facility in Isfahan in preparation for starting the test network.

"I think it's fair to say that there's growing concern about what the Iranians may be up to," said a U.S. defense official.

David Albright, a former IAEA inspector who closely follows the issue, said he was skeptical that Iran could produce 25 kilograms (55 pounds) of highly enriched uranium - the quantity required for a warhead - by sometime in 2008.

Albright, the director of the independent Institute for Science and International Security, said his "worst-case scenario" was 2009, due to Iran's lack of experience in operating large numbers of centrifuges, the complexities involved and the potential for numerous problems.

Iran insists that its enrichment program is intended to make fuel for power plants, not for nuclear weapons, but it admits concealing the project for 18 years from IAEA inspectors.

Moreover, Tehran has failed to reveal to the IAEA all aspects of its program, including purchases of weapons-related nuclear know-how from a Pakistani-led smuggling ring that supplied the North Korean and Libyan weapons programs. Ayhan Evrensel, an IAEA spokesman, declined to comment for this article.

A diplomat close to the IAEA confirmed that by the end of last week, Iranian engineers had assembled all 164 centrifuges of the test cascade at Natanz as they'd planned to do. They still had to finish connecting all of the machines and then would need time to conduct tests of the piping and seals, this diplomat said by telephone from Vienna, Austria.

However, the diplomat, who asked to remain anonymous because of the sensitivity of the issue, said the development conformed to the agency's timeline and that IAEA experts didn't view it with alarm.

DOJ_NMG_0020981

Britain and France, backed by the United States, have proposed a statement in the Security Council demanding that Iran suspend all uranium enrichment work and setting a 30-day deadline for an IAEA report on Tehran's compliance.

Russia and China, which have major financial stakes in oil-rich Iran, opposed the proposal, contending that it paved the way for the Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran.

The crisis erupted in January when Iran ended a more than two-year suspension of enrichment work in defiance of international objections. The IAEA board of governors voted in February to refer the matter to the Security Council after the agency found that it couldn't confirm the peaceful nature of the program.

According to information Tehran provided to the IAEA, Iranian engineers first fed uranium hexafluoride gas into single centrifuges, followed by cascades of 10 and 20 machines.

It has informed the IAEA that it plans to begin installing the first 3,000 centrifuges of a 50,000-machine industrial-scale plant in underground halls at Natanz in the last quarter of this year.

One U.S. official said that if Iranian engineers successfully operate the 164-machine cascade as quickly as they did the smaller assemblies, they could move up the installation of the first centrifuges of the underground plant to within the next "few months."

If all went smoothly, he continued, those machines could begin operating in 2007 and produce enough highly enriched uranium for one nuclear warhead within about one year.

"The anxiety level has risen significantly," he said. "Iran is closer that we thought they were to mastering the operation of a centrifuge cascade."

Envoy Accuses Iran Of Duplicity On Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer And Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 23 -- Iran is publicly professing its support for Iraq's stalemated political process while its military and intelligence services back outlawed militias and insurgent groups, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad said Thursday.

Iranian agents train and arm Shiite Muslim militias such as the Mahdi Army, linked to one of Iraq's most powerful clerics, Khalilzad said, and also work closely with Sunni Arab-led insurgent forces including Ansar al-Sunna, blamed for dozens of deadly attacks on Iraqi and American soldiers and Shiite civilians.

"Our judgment is that training and supplying, direct or indirect, takes place, and that there is also provision of financial resources to people, to militias, and that there is presence of people associated with Revolutionary Guard and with MOIS," the Afghan-born Khalilzad said, referring to Iran's main military force and its Ministry of Intelligence and Security.

Khalilzad's comments, made in an interview in his spacious office in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, came as the United States and Iran -- two feuding foreign powers with dominant roles in Iraqi affairs -- have expressed willingness to hold talks aimed at stabilizing the beleaguered country. Iran, which borders Iraq to the east and whose theocratic government retains close ties with Iraq's Shiite political leaders, has repeatedly denied American accusations that it is a force for instability in Iraq. Instead, it has blamed the United States for the unrest.

The calls for dialogue over Iraq coincided with deliberations by the U.N. Security Council, of which the United States is a permanent member, over possible actions against Iran for its controversial nuclear program. Asked if any discussions had begun, Khalilzad said, "There is nothing new on that."

Khalilzad's remarks also coincided with stalled negotiations over the formation of Iraq's next government. Sunni Arab parties, pushing for more prominent ministerial posts from the Shiite religious parties that hold the largest share of the seats in parliament, have accused Iran of complicity in recent attacks on Sunnis by Shiite militias that have pushed the country toward civil war.

"The militias haven't been focused on decisively yet. . . . That will be tough," Khalilzad said. "More Iraqis in Baghdad are dying -- if you look at the recent period of two, three weeks -- from the militia attacks than from the terrorist car bombings."

Khalilzad expressed particular concern over Iran's ties to the Mahdi Army, an armed group loyal to the outspoken Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr that the ambassador said was responsible for many of the recent killings, despite Sadr's public pleas for calm.

Sadr, who was charged by the former U.S. occupation authority with involvement in the killing of a rival religious leader soon after the U.S. invasion three years ago, has recently plunged into politics after waging two armed uprisings against U.S. forces in 2004.

But Khalilzad said the United States has had no face-to-face contact with the cleric, in his early thirties, whose followers hold more than 30 seats in the new parliament. "No, I don't talk to him, because we don't meet with Moqtada Sadr, but I have sent him messages publicly. . . . We engage him whatever way we can," said Khalilzad, who added that he and other embassy officials did meet with Sadr's political allies. "I think that our people advise me against it because there is an indictment against him."

An aide to Sadr, one of the most outspoken critics of the U.S. military presence in Iraq, said Thursday that the cleric would not meet with American officials until foreign troops are withdrawn from Iraq.

With negotiations to form a government deadlocked three months after the Dec. 15 legislative elections and Iraqis growing increasingly impatient, Khalilzad said he was stressing to Iraqi leaders that new authority is needed to quell instability.

"I am the one who's saying, 'The country is bleeding, you need to move,' " he said, adding that recent sessions with political leaders from various sides have brought at least one encouraging sign: The groups are now more willing to directly address each other's concerns without using Americans as intermediaries.

"I have been reduced -- and I am not complaining -- to an observer, which is a good thing," he said, dismissing the widely held belief that he is still the driving force for unity, cajoling rival groups to negotiate. "I think now I say that they are really politically moving toward a self-reliance."

Still, he said, a deep gulf remains between the country's Shiite and Sunni factions.

"Sunnis are concerned about having a say in the decision-making, while the Shia concern is that having a say in the decision-making should not obviate the results of the elections and should not create a situation in which decisions are so difficult to make that nothing happens because everyone needs to speak to everyone before anything is done," he said.

Sunnis and others have called on Shiites to reconsider their choice -- backed by Sadr -- of the transitional prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jafari, to lead the new government. They also want the Shiites to ensure that the country's security ministries are not put in the hands of politicians tied to militias. The Shiite bloc has so far resisted both demands.

Asked if Shiites, who fell short of winning a parliamentary majority, would ever be willing to share enough power to allow a unified government to be formed, Khalilzad pointed to constitutional provisions that require a two-thirds vote for many of the functions of government to be carried out.

The Shiites "have no alternative" but to compromise, he said.

Israeli Acting PM Cautions Hard-Liners (AP)

By Josef Federman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert sent his strongest signal yet that hard-line parties won't be welcome in the next government if his party wins next week's election, saying in an interview published Thursday that coalition partners must be on board with his plan to withdraw from most of the West Bank.

Olmert, whose Kadima Party is expected to cruise to victory Tuesday, wants to draw Israel's final borders by 2010 — with or without a deal with the Palestinians. While holding a wide lead in opinion polls, Kadima is expected to still need help from smaller parties to form a majority coalition in the 120-seat parliament.

Olmert says he would prefer to reach a peace settlement with the Palestinians but is ready to take unilateral action if this is impossible. Hard-line opponents say the go-it-alone approach, which would involve uprooting dozens of Jewish settlements in the West Bank, amounts to a surrender to Palestinian violence.

"I want to emphasize, so that no one doubts it: I intend to implement this plan. Anyone who is not interested in seeing this plan implemented will not be in my coalition. I do not intend to compromise on the details of the plan. This is the plan and there is no other," Olmert told the Yediot Ahronot daily in an interview.

The comments gave an indication how Olmert's government would look if he wins the election. It appears increasingly likely that he will join forces with the dovish Labor and Meretz parties, while leaving the hawkish parties, including Likud, in the opposition.

Olmert also appeared to be sending a tough message to Avigdor Lieberman, leader of an increasingly powerful Russian immigrant party. Lieberman, a hard-line Jewish settler, has not ruled out joining an Olmert-led government but said he would not agree to further unilateral pullbacks.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, fed up with hard-line rebels in Likud, left the party last fall to form Kadima. Olmert quickly followed and was thrust into the party leadership when Sharon suffered a massive stroke in January.

Olmert's plan follows the unilateral approach devised by Sharon, who led Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer. With peacemaking frozen after several years of fighting, Sharon said pulling out of Gaza boosted security and helped guarantee a Jewish majority in areas under Israeli control.

The chances of renewing peace talks appear even more remote following the Islamic militant Hamas' victory in Palestinian legislative elections in January. Hamas, which has carried out dozens of suicide bombings in Israel, has refused international calls to renounce violence and recognize the Jewish state.

Veteran politician Shimon Peres, who is running as a Kadima candidate, said Thursday the party would prefer to reach a negotiated settlement with the Palestinians, although Hamas isn't a partner for peace. "Unilateralism is not our ideology or our first priority," Peres told reporters.

Under Olmert's plan, Israel's West Bank separation barrier would serve as the basis for a future border with the Palestinians. The plan would increase West Bank Jewish settlements on the Israeli side of the barrier, and uproot tens of thousands of Israeli settlers living on the eastern side.

The plan falls well short of Palestinian visions for a future state encompassing all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip with east Jerusalem as the capital.

In a further sign of Olmert's plans, a party official Thursday disclosed details about Kadima's vision for Jerusalem, treading on ground that was taboo for decades — dividing the city in a peace agreement.

Otniel Schneller, a candidate for parliament, said Kadima is prepared to hand over Palestinian villages that have been incorporated into the city.

"If and when a Palestinian entity is established, with Jerusalem as its capital, it will be based on these villages," he said.

The pronouncement had added weight because of its source. Schneller is a former head of the council of West Bank and Gaza settlements, a body that hotly opposes any territorial compromise. Schneller stressed that Israel will not relinquish control of the Old City, home to Jewish, Muslim and Christian holy sites.

Israel captured east Jerusalem, along with the West Bank and Gaza Strip, in the 1967 Mideast war. It annexed the Arab neighborhoods and declaring the entire city its capital. The city's fate has been one of the greatest obstacles to a peace deal.

In violence Thursday, the Israeli army killed two Islamic Jihad militants in Gaza as they were planting a bomb along the fence between Israel and the Gaza Strip, the army and Palestinian security officials said.

Late Showing Puts Labour In Running For Finance Post (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Before a single ballot is cast in next week's Israeli election, politicians and analysts are already speculating on who will secure the finance portfolio in the coalition bargaining that will inevitably follow Tuesday's vote.

At stake is the stewardship of a high-growth economy that has spectacularly pulled itself out of recession since the last election in January 2003 but has so far failed to meet the needs of Israel's growing army of poor.

If, as expected, Ehud Olmert's centrist Kadima party secures the largest number of seats in the 120-member Knesset, the acting prime minister has declared his intention to keep the treasury for one of his own.

However, a strong second place for Labour, enjoying a late spurt in opinion polls in the closing days of the campaign, could put pressure on Mr Olmert to surrender the treasury to Amir Peretz, its leader.

Handing the finance portfolio to the former trade union boss, who put welfare and social issues at the top of his programme, might initially rattle markets that are looking for a continuation of the fiscal reform agenda initiated by Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Likud leader is bearing the brunt of a popular backlash against the negative effects of welfare cuts and other measures that he took as finance minister and he has failed to lift the former ruling party out of its poor third place in the polls.

However, analysts believe that, even under Mr Peretz, economic policy would stay fundamentally on its present course.

"Everybody understands the importance of maintaining growth," says Yaakov Fisher of Israel's I-Biz consultancy. "That is a lesson that Netanyahu taught, however much people might dislike him."

Under Mr Netanyahu, GDP grew by close to 4 per cent for eight consecutive quarters and the trend continued after he resigned from the cabinet last summer in protest against the Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. The Israeli economy ended 2005 with the third highest growth rate among members and associate members of the OECD.

Inflation is low, interest rates are steady and even Israel's high unemployment rates have fallen, while levels of participation in the labour force have risen.

Some sectors of society have nevertheless lost out in the overall recovery. Welfare cuts have particularly hurt low-income ultra-Orthodox, Arab and new immigrant communities.

A report published last year by the National Insurance Institute indicated that poverty rates had grown during Mr Netanyahu's tenure to include one in five Israelis, while the Central Bureau of Statistics reported that the gap between rich and poor had widened.

"The problem an incoming finance minister faces is how to deal with these social problems while maintaining growth," says Mr Fisher. "The trickle-down approach that Netanyahu promoted isn't the right one and even he is backing away from it."

While all the main parties support a strong free-market economy, Labour's policy centres on boosting the minimum wage to the equivalent of around $1,000 (€830, £570) a month. The party says the minimum wage pledge is a red line Mr Peretz would not be prepared to cross.

Mr Olmert has been at the helm of the finance ministry since Mr Netanyahu quit. It was the portfolio he wanted when Ariel Sharon, prime minister, lured him back into national politics in 2003.

If he were obliged to surrender one of the senior cabinet posts to a coalition partner, he might opt to drop Shaul Mofaz, Kadima's defence minister, rather than sacrifice the treasury. A likely nominee would be Kadima's Meir Sheetrit, who briefly served as finance minister in 1999.

Mr Netanyahu has so far ruled out joining a coalition led by Mr Olmert, which means there is little prospect of him returning to a post in which he received market approval for the spending cuts and fiscal reforms credited with lifting Israel out of recession.

If the outcome of coalition bargaining meant the ministry going to Labour, Mr Peretz could take the post himself or nominate Avishai Braverman, a former World Bank economist whose entry into politics near the top of the party's electoral list has helped to temper its socialist image.

North Korea Might Be Exporting Fake $100 Bills (WP)

By Gordon Fairclough

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

SHANGHAI -- China's central bank warned its lenders about an influx of high-quality counterfeit American $100 bills -- which the United States alleges are made by North Korea -- as the spread of the forgeries moves toward the center of a standoff between Washington and Pyongyang.

Governments around Asia are stepping up surveillance for the bogus currency, which law-enforcement officials have dubbed supernotes because they are so difficult to distinguish from genuine money.

The fake $100 bills have turned up in the United States, Philippines, Taiwan and elsewhere over the past two years. In January, supernotes were seized from a Chinese American in Hong Kong, according to U.S. officials.

The People's Bank of China said the supernotes "have flowed into our country from overseas" and urged lenders to be on the lookout for efforts to place counterfeit bills into circulation. The letter was sent this month to all commercial banks as well as its own branches.

North Korea, which shares a long border with China, may earn as much as $15 million to $25 million a year from counterfeiting, according to an advance copy of a report to be released Friday by the U.S. Congressional Research Service, which also says at least $45 million in supernotes has have been detected in circulation. That figure would represent a small proportion of the total amount of U.S. currency circulating in the world. But, U.S. officials say, any amount of counterfeiting can undermine confidence in the dollar.

Frustrated by the lack of progress in negotiations aimed at persuading North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons and faced with a lack of international support for economic sanctions against the country, Washington increasingly is turning to law-enforcement actions to deal with Pyongyang.

The focus now is stanching the flow of fake currency and cracking down on other alleged illegal North Korean activities, often by going after the Chinese and Taiwanese organized-crime groups that, U.S. officials say, have become the conduits for Pyongyang's illicit products.

"This is state-sponsored criminal activity, and Washington's policy response is morphing," said Raphael Perl, one of the authors of the Congressional Research Service report. "The administration is moving towards taking on North Korea with laws and prosecutors."

The report, prepared for members of Congress and their staffs, raises the possibility of U.S. legal action against North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. But going after Kim remains unlikely, as the United States continues to pursue diplomatic efforts to curb North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Such a move would face opposition from U.S. ally South Korea, as well as China, both of which fear destabilizing North Korea.

But the United States is going after others linked to North Korea's alleged illegal activities. Seizures of supernotes have grown as the result of better cooperation between U.S. law-enforcement officials and their counterparts in other countries, U.S. officials say.

In September, the U.S. Treasury Department designated a bank in the Chinese enclave of Macau as an institution of "primary money laundering concern," saying that it had helped North Korea launder money from illicit activities and place counterfeit money in circulation. The United States has proposed cutting off the bank, Banco Delta Asia, from contacts with the

U.S. financial system, which has encouraged other lenders to sever ties with North Korea to avoid unwanted scrutiny from U.S. regulators. Banco Delta Asia has denied involvement in any illicit activities.

U.S. prosecutors also are moving to seize money in a Hong Kong bank account they say is linked to the sale of supernotes, as well as counterfeit cigarettes made in North Korea. The account is linked to the case of three men of Chinese descent who pleaded guilty in 2004 to conspiring to smuggle fake currency and cigarettes into the United States.

This week, the U.S. Secret Service said that about $15,000 in supernotes had passed through the Philippines last year, brought into the country by Chinese and Taiwanese nationals. A Secret Service official declined to identify the source of the notes, other than to say that they were from a country "the United States cannot go into."

North Korea Bristles At U.S.-South Drills (AP)

By Kwang-tae Kim

AP, March 23, 2006

North Korea warned Thursday it will react to upcoming joint U.S-South Korean joint military exercises with an unspecified "strong measure of self-defense," condemning the drill as saber-rattling for a pre-emptive nuclear attack on the North.

"Now that the U.S. intention to stifle the DPRK has become very clear, the DPRK will react to it with a strong measure for self-defense," a spokesman for the North's Foreign Ministry said in statement carried by the North's official Korean Central News Agency.

DPRK is a commonly used acronym for the North's official name, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

The weeklong exercises — dubbed RSOI and Foal Eagle — are scheduled to begin Saturday with 20,000 American troops, along with the aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln, and an undisclosed number of South Korean soldiers.

The communist state has long claimed the U.S. is bent on invading the country, condemning the annual military drill as a "rehearsal" for an attack. The U.S. and South Korea characterize them as purely defensive.

"The U.S. decision to let carrier Abraham Lincoln and its task flotilla participate in the exercises goes to clearly indicate what reckless and dangerous phase the U.S. moves for a pre-emptive attack have reached," the spokesman said.

The spokesman also warned that U.S. sanctions against the North will not make Pyongyang change its stance. He didn't elaborate but the comment appeared to refer to the stalled talks on his country's nuclear weapons program.

The communist country has refused to resume the six-nation nuclear disarmament talks since November, demanding that Washington lift financial restrictions imposed on a Macau bank and North Korean companies for alleged complicity in counterfeiting and money laundering.

Earlier this month, U.S. and North Korean officials met in New York over the U.S. restrictions, but failed to produce any breakthrough. Washington says the financial actions are separate from the nuclear talks.

The North has said that the resumption of the six-party talks and resolution of the nuclear issue depends entirely on the U.S. attitude.

The talks — which involve the two Koreas, the U.S., Japan, China and Russia — produced a breakthrough accord in September when the North agreed to abandon its nuclear programs in exchange for aid and security assurances. But follow-up negotiations have stalled over the North's anger at U.S. sanctions.

Earlier this week, North Korea suggested it had the ability to launch a pre-emptive attack on the United States and said it had built atomic weapons to counter the U.S. nuclear threat.

The spokesman said the U.S.-South Korea drills would also adversely affect inter-Korean relations.

North Korea has put off high-level talks with the South that had been planned in Pyongyang the same week as the March 25-31 exercises.

U.S. Retaining Wartime Command On S. Korea (AP-Y2)

By William C. Mann

AP2, March 23, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Thursday the United States must retain wartime command of South Korea's military until that country's forces are strong enough to maintain stability on the Korean Peninsula.

South Korea's president has said he hopes an agreement to turn over wartime command can be negotiated this year. The effect of any change would be felt only if war should return to the peninsula.

In a Pentagon news briefing, Rumsfeld said South Korea has brought up the idea, and "everyone agrees that 55 years after the war, it's reasonable that the South Korean forces would increasingly take on more and more responsibility."

Asked whether he thought the change in command structure could start this year, Rumsfeld replied: "No, no, I don't at all."

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has been talking since January about negotiating a way for homegrown officers to recover wartime command of South Korea's military. He specified in a speech to cadets at the Korea Military Academy this month that he hoped the turnover would come this year.

An American general assumed command of South Korean forces in 1950, when the South Korean forces were subsumed into a U.S.-commanded U.N. force to repel invading North Koreans. A cease-fire in 1953 ended the fighting but not the state of war between North and South Korea. The South's military stayed under American command, although South Korean officers were given command during peacetime in 1994.

"The South Korean government has raised the question as to when might it be appropriate to transfer responsibility to the Korean command, and that is something that gets discussed," Rumsfeld said Thursday.

He said no time has been set for the turnover, but South Korean forces already are taking increasing responsibilities. "They're doing that," he said, "and as they continue to take on more and more responsibility, the United States will be able to reduce its troops."

He said he had not heard that Roh had suggested a 2006 agreement on a turnover, which he said will not happen.

His impression from conversations with Korean officials and cables he has read, Rumsfeld said, "is that they want the subject raised — which we do, too; we think that's just fine — and then we'd set about a path to see that the South Korean military evolves into a position where it would be appropriate for them to have that control."

The vital consideration is not to inject instability into the peninsula, Rumsfeld said. Before the Koreans can assume the responsibility, he said, they must "make investments and increase their capabilities."

Adm. Edmund P. Giambastiani Jr., vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the U.S. commander in South Korea, Gen. Burwell Bell, is working to carry out the command status to achieve the goals Rumsfeld has set.

The 38th parallel on the Korean Peninsula, the cease-fire line that serves as a border between the communist-led North Korea and capitalist South Korea, has been described as the most militarized border in the world.

Until recently the United States had close to 40,000 troops in the South. That number is down to 29,500 now and is scheduled to decline to 25,000 by 2008.

Senators Optimistic On China Currency, But 'jury Still Out' (USAT)

By Calum Macleod

USA Today, March 24, 2006

BEIJING — The U.S. senators pushing a bill to punish Chinese currency policies said Thursday they were more optimistic Beijing will revalue the yuan. But they refused to rule out pushing for a vote after they return to Washington to impose tariffs on all Chinese imports into the USA.

"The jury is still out," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said here. "We still need some concrete signs of movement."

After three days of talks with Chinese officials, he said "there is a real possibility the Chinese government and people see it in their interest to let the yuan float." However, he got no firm indication of when the currency would be allowed to fluctuate on global markets. "The clock is ticking on this currency issue," said Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., and co-author of the bill to put a 27.5% tariff on Chinese imports. "It must be a win-win, but the status quo is unacceptable."

Graham and Schumer say China's undervalued currency means cheaper exports fuel a Sino-U.S. trade deficit that surpassed $200 billion in 2005. That figure represents "the largest trade imbalance in the history of man," according to Craig Allen, minister-counselor for commercial affairs at the U.S. Embassy in Beijing.

Currency and trade will be key issues during talks next month between President Bush, whose administration opposes the Graham-Schumer bill, and Chinese President Hu Jintao, who makes his first U.S. visit as Chinese leader in mid-April, the White House announced Wednesday.

Dramatic change in the value of the yuan is unlikely, according to Chinese analysts. On Thursday, China's central bank issued a statement promising to keep the exchange rate basically stable, while pushing forward plans toward future flexibility.

"China's conditions are not ready (to allow the yuan to float)," says professor Li Yushi, deputy director of the Chinese Academy of International Trade and Economic Co-operation, under China's Ministry of Commerce. "Maybe in eight or 10 years' time. … There will only be gradual change before then."

Exporters such as Yue Chi-hong in Dongguan, southern China's manufacturing powerhouse, are watching developments in Washington closely.

"The 27.5% tariff they propose would be a big blow for our business," says Yue, senior merchandiser for the Future Company of Hong Kong, which annually sells 1.5 million pairs of shoes, worth $30 million, to the USA, including to Wal-Mart and Payless stores.

"Some 40% (to) 50% of shoes sold in America are made in China," Yue said. "The American consumer benefits from our low labor costs and skilled workers."

After stops in Shanghai and Hong Kong this weekend, the senators promised to consult with other senators and officials in Washington before deciding on the future of their bill.

U.S. Senators Offer Hope To China On Tariffs (WSJ)

By Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

BEIJING -- A pair of U.S. senators pushing sweeping tariffs aimed at Chinese imports said they are more optimistic about U.S.-China trade relations after a trip to China's capital. But the lawmakers stopped short of a commitment to put off a vote on their legislation, scheduled for next week.

Yesterday's comments from Sens. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, and Lindsey Graham, a South Carolina Republican, could ease concerns about the tariff bill, which some U.S. economists and business leaders have warned could seriously damage trade relations between the U.S. and China. The bill, scheduled for a vote March 31, would impose a 27.5% tariff on all Chinese imports within two years of passage if Beijing fails to sharply revalue its currency, which the lawmakers contend is kept artificially low.

"We are more optimistic that this can be worked out than we were in the past. But whether it will be, we're not certain yet," Mr. Schumer told reporters after three days of meetings with senior Chinese officials, including the central-bank chief and the commerce minister.

The senators said they will confer with colleagues and continue to talk with Chinese leaders by phone before deciding whether to move ahead with the vote.

The senators, along with other U.S. politicians, have argued that Beijing manipulates its currency to keep it undervalued by an estimated 15% to 40%, making Chinese exports artificially inexpensive and enlarging a U.S. trade deficit with China that ballooned to $201.63 billion last year, according to U.S. data. They first proposed their tariff legislation more than two years ago and have put off votes on it several times. Supporters of the bill contend it would pass the Senate and House with a strong enough majority to override any possible veto threat from the White House.

China's government has long said it intends to move toward a more-flexible exchange-rate system, but that the transition needs to be gradual. Last July, under heavy U.S. pressure, Beijing raised the yuan's value by 2.1% against the dollar and unpegged its exchange rate from the U.S. currency. The currency has appreciated by only about 1% more since then, including a slight surge in the days before Messrs. Schumer and Graham arrived.

Several U.S. business leaders have in recent days come out strongly against the legislation, saying it would be bad for U.S. companies and poison relations between the world's first- and fourth-largest economies. On Wednesday, Caterpillar Inc. Chief Executive Jim Owens issued a statement calling on legislators to reject tariff proposals. "Personally, I can think of no faster path to a world-wide recession than for the twin engines of the global economy -- the United States and China -- to turn against one another," he said.

Yesterday, James A. Baker III, a former U.S. secretary at the Treasury and State Department, said it would be advantageous for the yuan to adjust, but not "subject to threats from one of China's major trading partners." Protectionist legislation and sentiment are "a very serious thing today as far as the United States is concerned," Mr. Baker, now a partner in the law firm of Baker Botts, told a gathering of businesspeople in Hong Kong. "And I worry about it." (See related article1.)

This week's trip was the first time Messrs. Schumer and Graham visited mainland China, and both said they learned a great deal. Mr. Schumer said he was convinced Chinese leaders want to boost consumption in China, which has a savings rate many economists say is too high.

Mr. Graham said he was struck by the magnitude of China's problems -- for example, unemployment -- and how those issues weigh against sharp changes in currency policy. "I am more sensitive now than I was before to how hard it will be to move toward a floating currency," Mr. Graham said. But, he added, "I am more committed than ever to make sure that occurs," to ensure "harmony" in U.S.-China relations.

Senators Hopeful Of Compromise On Yuan (WP)

By Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

BEIJING, March 23 -- Two U.S. senators pressing legislation aimed at forcing China to substantially raise the value of its currency said Thursday that three days of meetings with high-level Chinese officials had left them hopeful that a compromise can be struck to avert trade conflict.

"We're feeling better," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), standing alongside Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) at an evening news conference. "We are more optimistic than we were when we came here. We have seen that the Chinese government and the Chinese people actually have a convergence with the American people on currency."

Despite those sentiments, neither senator was willing to postpone a looming vote on their bill, which would impose 27.5 percent tariffs on all Chinese exports to the United States unless China significantly raises the value of its currency, the yuan. Manufacturers in the United States blame an artificially cheap yuan for undercutting the prices of their products on world markets. The bill has gained the support of 67 senators. A formal vote could come as soon as March 31.

"We still need some concrete signs of movement," Schumer said, asserting that China must demonstrate its intent to allow the currency to float with the market "within a discrete and reasonable period of time." He refused to spell out which actions China must take to delay a vote, adding that his ultimate aim was not the passage of the bill but rather a solution negotiated by the Bush administration and the Chinese government.

Still, the senators' positive comments, coming after months of often-bellicose rhetoric, underscored how Chinese officials have at least partially won over their two primary critics in the U.S. Congress.

Tuesday, both senators said they came to Beijing to register the depth of U.S. anger toward China over unfair trading practices. "The currency issue is a defining moment in U.S.-China relations," Graham said.

Both senators pinpointed as a breakthrough assurances from Chinese officials that they intend to eventually allow their money to float freely as part of their continuing transition from communism to capitalism. Chinese officials have made such pledges for two years, while maintaining that it will happen gradually and on their own timetable.

Graham said he had been moved by testaments from Chinese officials that allowing the yuan to float could harm coastal factories, a crucial source of employment at a time of growing rural strife. "I think I'm more patient," Graham said. "It will take us longer than I thought."

The high-profile reception the senators enjoyed highlights Beijing's adjustment to the realities in Washington, where trade frictions with China have blossomed into a significant political issue along with the bilateral trade balance -- more than $200 billion in China's favor at the end of last year.

China has bristled at charges that it is to blame for unemployment in the United States, asserting that it has been unfairly cast as a scapegoat.

After raising the value of the yuan against the dollar by 2 percent last July, Chinese officials have asserted that "currency stability" is now a primary goal, knocking down suggestions that another increase is in the works. Economists say the yuan is undervalued by 15 to 40 percent.

Analysts said China's welcome reflected a calculation that the bill could stir up anti-Chinese sentiments in the United States while threatening Chinese exports.

"The Chinese government certainly felt pressure from the American side," said Shen Dingli, an international relations expert at Fudan University in Shanghai. "China fears that if punitive tariffs are really imposed or the yuan is substantially revalued to its legitimate market value, then numerous exporters and manufacturers in China would go bankrupt and lay off workers."

Others said China's leaders effectively defanged its congressional critics for little more than the price of saying over the banquet table what they have already said in public. They added that China does not really fear the bill because it would hurt Americans as well as Chinese by jacking up the price of consumer goods on U.S. shelves and perhaps triggering recession.

"Both the Congress and the Bush administration are putting on a performance to please their constituents," said Mei Xinyu, a researcher at the Chinese Ministry of Commerce in Beijing. "Behind the tough stance and the pressure, China is cognizant of the fact that the United States has to pay a price in the worst outcome."

On China Visit, US Senators Tone Down Tariff Talk (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, March 24, 2006

BEIJING - They came. They saw. But rather than conquer - they began a "process of careful rumination."

With a deadline looming on one of the US Senate's most drastic tariff proposals ever on China, the authors of the legislation, Charles Schumer (D) of New York and Lindsay Graham (R) of South Carolina, paid a visit to Beijing to talk tough and be aggressive. Until Thursday, when their attitudes seemed to change, they were going head to head with Chinese leaders in a bold bid to change China's currency rate, which they say is undervalued between 15 to 40 percent.

The bill is one of a series of moves in Washington to address the mounting trade deficit with China ahead of President Hu Jintao's visit to the White House April 20. Yet it appears that Senators Schumer and Graham, whose bill would levy a whopping 27.5 percent tariff on Chinese goods, may have blinked after three days of high-level briefings.

"I'm more optimistic that things can be worked out ... than when I came," Schumer said in a press briefing here. "It's been an eye-opening visit," he said, noting that reform in China appears to be both more complex, and further developed, than he realized. "We believe that there is a very real possibility that the Chinese government and the Chinese people see it in their interest to let the currency float ... but the jury is still out."

The two senators agreed that a Chinese offer to change the currency evaluation three percent was far short of their expectations. But the assurances they heard - and the deeper and broader picture of Chinese realities they had painted for them - were causing them to temporize about how hard to push for the upcoming March 31 bill.

That legislation, reflecting frustration on Capitol Hill with an estimated $204 billion trade imbalance with China, is strongly supported by 67 senators. The unlikely pairing of the Northern liberal and Southern conservative typifies sentiment in the Senate on China trade, and the two senators say they have the votes to override what would certainly be a White House veto.

For Chinese officials, the visit by Schumer, Graham, and Sen. Tom Coburn (R) of Oklahoma was itself seen as a small victory, and a chance to educate the American lawmakers on Chinese policies and problems through face-to-face meetings with Wu Yi, the vice premier, and Bo Xilai, the commerce minister.

Chinese economists point out that tens of thousands of small- and medium-sized businesses operate on a 2 percent or less margin, and to massive reevaluate the currency could create economic and social instability. The same argument was made by Mr. Hu to President Bush when the two met last September.

Schumer and Graham said their interlocutors made a convincing case that China is moving gradually toward a floating currency, but top leaders agree that it is in China's long-term interest to adopt an international standard, and that the new 11th five-year plan adopted this month begins to make structural changes to accommodate floating currency.

Graham pointed out that he and Schumer are "not exactly political soulmates," and used their unlikely pairing to illustrate for the Chinese how serious the trade imbalance and currency evaluation question is in the US. "The status quo is not adequate.... If China is doing a better job, fine," said Graham. "But we need real and concrete evidence ... the clock is ticking."

Under the Schumer-Graham proposal, the actual tariff regime would not begin for at least two years, and the senators acknowledged that the 24-month time period was designed to "get something moving" before such strong measures kicked in.

Critics of the drastic tariff measures both in China and in the US say it has arisen too quickly and that its punitive measures are too harsh.

Schumer pointed out that the tariff bill has been under consideration for three years, and that charges it came overnight are incorrect.

"China and America are joined at the hip ... the US is the biggest market, and China is the largest exporter," Schumer said, adding that relations between the two can be positive. "But people are often reluctant to change ... on both sides, so we are creating an incentive to improve."

China Harvesting Inmates' Organs, Journalist Says (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

A Chinese journalist has uncovered a secret detention center in northern China that is being used by a hospital to harvest human organs for sale to domestic and international buyers.

Jin Zhong, a pseudonym for the journalist who fled China recently, also said in an interview that a failed Chinese intelligence operation led to the 2004 death of a Japanese diplomat who committed suicide rather than give up secrets.

On the prisoner abuse, Mr. Jin said he first learned of the harvesting operation between October and December and that the prisoners used were members of the outlawed Falun Gong religious group.

"This is murder, and murder sponsored by a state," said Mr. Jin, who in the past has been a contributor to a Japanese news agency. "It must be stopped."

Mr. Jin said he came across the underground detention center while researching the Chinese government's response to the Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS).

A Chinese official was the first person to reveal that secret medical work was being done at the Liaoning Provincial Thrombosis Hospital of Integrated Chinese and Western Medicine, in Sujiatun, a suburb of Shenyang, the major city in northeastern China, he said.

Mr. Jin then said he found out that a large underground prison was built beneath the hospital and that members of the outlawed Falun Gong religious group were being held there. As many as 6,000 people are thought to be held prisoner at the underground facility, he said.

The hospital is harvesting the organs of the prisoners, including kidneys, livers, and eye parts, he said. The organs are then sold to people, from both China and abroad, who need medical organ transplants.

One source for Mr. Jin was the wife of a hospital doctor who was involved in the organ harvesting. The doctor suffered psychological problems as a result of the gruesome medical work and disclosed the secret activity. The Chinese woman also has fled to the United States.

Several other hospital workers also revealed details about the prisoner organ harvesting.

Mr. Jin said he had to hide his true identity after being threatened by Chinese government agents. He was arrested twice for his reporting and recently fled to the United States, where he hopes to seek political asylum.

Mr. Jin said bodies of the prisoners were burned in the boiler room of the hospital and that boiler room workers had taken jewelry and watches from the dead and sold them. He said he has provided information about the organ harvesting to U.S. government officials, including members of Congress.

A Chinese Embassy spokesman could not be reached for comment.

Regarding the Japanese diplomat, Mr. Jin said he first learned of the intelligence operation in December. Japan's government protested the Chinese intelligence operation, which Beijing dismissed as a groundless accusation.

China Adds To Uncertainty Over Jailed Times Aide (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

BEIJING, March 23 — The United States on Thursday continued to press China about the status of a jailed researcher for The New York Times, but the uncertainty about his fate deepened as a Chinese government spokesman appeared to cast doubt on whether he would soon be released.

The case against Zhao Yan, 44, a Chinese researcher in the Beijing bureau of The Times, was withdrawn last Friday by a court order. His lawyer said the withdrawal of the charges against him — one count of fraud, another of disclosing state secrets to The Times — meant that Mr. Zhao would soon be released, possibly on an equivalent of bail.

But the Chinese authorities have since remained silent about the status of Mr. Zhao, and he is still behind bars. Asked on Thursday afternoon about the case, the Foreign Ministry spokesman, Qin Gang, criticized foreign news organizations for making "irresponsible statements," and he then offered a cryptic response.

"You ask if Zhao Yan will soon be released," Mr. Qin said during a regular news briefing for foreign reporters. "From what I have learned, the actual situation is not like what you are talking about."

Pressed for specifics, Mr. Qin refused to elaborate and also declined to identify the source of his information. "I think my information channel will be more authoritative than yours," he said.

The suggestive but vague comments underscored the confusion surrounding a case that has brought international criticism of China. Mr. Zhao has spent 18 months in prison without a hearing. His arrest is directly linked to a Sept. 7, 2004, article in The Times that disclosed an unexpected offer by former President Jiang Zemin to resign his final leadership post as chief of the military.

The article prompted a high-level government investigation to determine who had leaked the information about Mr. Jiang's offer.

Mr. Zhao has denied the charges, and The Times has also denied that he leaked any state secrets to the newspaper.

During the past week, American officials have met with their Chinese counterparts to try to clarify the status of his legal case and to press for his release. On Thursday, the State Department issued a new statement on the case, calling on China to release Mr. Zhao.

"We have repeatedly stated that we believe that Mr. Zhao should be released on the lack of merit of the case against him," the State Department said. "We urge China to honor its constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression."

Mo Shaoping, Mr. Zhao's lawyer, said he filed a second motion with Beijing prosecutors this week asking that his client be freed immediately. Mr. Mo repeated that the decision by prosecutors to withdraw the case meant that Mr. Zhao should be released. He said that prosecutors must introduce new charges based on new evidence if they intended to prosecute him in the future.

Some foreign and Chinese legal experts agree that the rationale used by prosecutors to withdraw the case was unusual. Prosecutors asked for the withdrawal to provide more time to investigate the lesser fraud charge. Such an explanation is usually given when prosecutors want to delay, not withdraw, a case. But legal experts say this unorthodox wording could have been an intentional way to drop the case without prosecutors or state security agents admitting error. It also could potentially allow for Mr. Zhao to be released, but on a restricted basis, akin to bail.

On Thursday, prosecutors in Beijing told family members of Mr. Zhao that they were awaiting instructions from higher officials. Zhao Kun, an older sister of Mr. Zhao, visited the prosecutors' office on Wednesday and Thursday but was denied an audience with the authorities overseeing the case.

Ms. Zhao said she asked to meet with the chief prosecutor on Saturday, a day when the office schedules meetings between prosecutors and the public. But she said she was told that she would not be eligible for a meeting because the case against her brother had been withdrawn.

Another official in the office told Ms. Zhao that local prosecutors were not authorized to give her any information about the case.

A Chinese Journalist In Jail (NYT)

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

As China moves ahead steadily in the global marketplace, its ultimate success will depend not just on its buying power. Among other things, China must have a free press and a judicial system based on the rule of law rather than political power. One highly public test of both will be whether the Chinese authorities release Zhao Yan, who has been in jail for nearly 18 months on specious charges that he revealed state secrets to The New York Times.

Last week, the authorities appeared to withdraw the charges against Mr. Zhao, who is a researcher for the Times staff in China. But instead of releasing him quickly, as should have been the case, the Chinese government has been sending distressingly mixed signals about the status of Mr. Zhao. And he remains languishing in a Beijing jail.

Mr. Zhao, 44, is a seasoned journalist who was well known for covering rural issues before he joined the Times bureau in April 2004. He was arrested shortly after The Times published an article in September of that year predicting, correctly, that the former president, Jiang Zemin, would retire from his last official post.

The release of such information should not be a reason to jail any journalist anywhere, of course. But in any case, Mr. Zhao has denied that he gave the story to his colleagues, and Times editors have repeatedly assured the Chinese authorities that Mr. Zhao was not a source for the information about Mr. Jiang's retirement.

Mr. Zhao is not the only journalist unjustly jailed in China, and it is fair to say that our concern is heightened by his association with The Times. But his arrest shows how China can too easily use the courts to silence any journalist who crosses some unseen line of behavior and offends some unnamed person in power. It is an example of the government's need for a scapegoat when coverage about high officials or the Communist Party does not turn out as the leadership would have scripted it.

The United States authorities have taken up Mr. Zhao's cause. Most recently, the United States Embassy in Bejing issued a statement reiterating that he was wrongly arrested and indicted.

By now, it should be clear to the Chinese authorities that American leaders and the international news media are not going to forget this case. Mr. Zhao's plight should remain on the agenda for President Hu Jintao's first official visit to Washington next month. A better outcome would be for China to follow up on the withdrawal of the charges against Mr. Zhao and releasing him immediately.

Japan Suspends Loans To China On Strained Ties (FT)

By David Pilling In Tokyo

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Japan has suspended decisions on new yen loans to China, blaming its increasingly strained ties with its biggest trading partner and former wartime adversary.

The move, although largely symbolic, marks a fresh low in relations between Asia's two biggest powers, which have been dogged by disputes over territory and natural resources.

Ties have worsened in recent years because of annual visits by Junichiro Koizumi, Japan's prime minister, to Tokyo's Yasukuni shrine, where 14 war criminals are honoured alongside millions of war dead.

Shinzo Abe, chief cabinet secretary, said on Thursday that Tokyo would "put off making a decision on yen loans for this fiscal year to China...because of various situations surrounding Sino-Japanese relations".

However, Mr Abe, the frontrunner to succeed Mr Koizumi as prime minister in September, said the freeze signalled a delay, not a suspension, and that yen loans would continue with the aim of securing "future-oriented Sino-Japanese relations".

Japan announced last year that it was winding down aid to China from 2008, the year of the Beijing Olympics. However, this is the first time that a reduction or freeze in loans has been explicitly linked with politics.

Previously, Tokyo had argued that China no longer needed aid because of its growing economic might – an explanation that succeeded in muting Chinese protests.

Both India and Indonesia get more Japanese aid. Mr Abe is considered a hardliner on China because of his insistence on visiting the Yasukuni shrine and support for revising Japan's pacifist constitution.

Qin Gang, a spokesman for China's foreign ministry, said at a regular briefing in Beijing that the two countries were facing "a complicated situation and severe hardship in our relations".

He conceded that Japanese soft loans to China, which total more than ¥3,000bn ($25.7bn €21.2bn), had been beneficial. Much Chinese infrastructure in the thriving coastal cities has been built with Japanese money.

However, Mr Qin said the loans had also helped Japanese companies, a reference to Japan's practice of tying aid to work undertaken by domestic contractors.

"Such an agreement is mutually beneficial," he said. "It is not charity given by one country to another."

Many Japanese officials say privately that soft loans to China have not been properly recognised by the Chinese authorities. Japan's low-interest loans to China were ¥86bn in 2004, less than half the peak figure reached in 2000.

Meanwhile, Tsuneo Watanabe, chairman of the mass-circulation Yomiuri newspaper, said on Thursday that Japanese leaders had still not apologised properly for wartime atrocities.

Coming from one of Japan's most conservative newspapers, the statement is a reprimand to figures such as Mr Koizumi and Mr Abe for allowing relations with China to deteriorate so far.

"The great blame attaches to Japan for having been involved in a war of invasion," Mr Watanabe said. "It is incumbent on Japan to apologise, and it is unfortunate that our apologies in the past have been half-hearted."

Mr Watanabe said his newspaper could not support Mr Abe as the next prime minister unless he renounced "market fundamentalism", blamed for widening social divisions, and stopped visiting the Yasukuni shrine.

Japan Cuts Off Loans To China; Relations Chill (WT/AP)

By Kana Inagaki, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

TOKYO -- Japan said yesterday it was freezing its loans to China through the end of this month because of worsening relations between the two nations, which increasingly have become economic rivals.

Criticism is mounting in Japan that China's booming economy no longer needs the handouts. The two also are squabbling over natural resources and the bitter legacy of World War II.

Chief Cabinet Secretary Shinzo Abe said Japan won't give any more of the loans to China during the current fiscal year, which ends next Friday. He said the government may release the loans again next month if the situation improves.

"We have decided to waive a plan to provide loans for fiscal 2005, considering the current situation surrounding the Japan-China relations," Mr. Abe said. "We will monitor future development in Japan-China relations while continuing discussion [on the loans] within the government."

China reacted coolly to news of the suspended loans, appealing for dialogue.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang said the two countries are facing "a complicated situation, and we have severe hardship in our relations."

"We should have exchanges and consultations over the differences and problems, and properly resolve those issues," he said at a briefing. "On Japan's credit to China, we think this issue should also be resolved in line with this principle."

Ties between Japan and China have deteriorated in the past year as the two feud over maritime gas deposits near disputed islands in the East China Sea, interpretations of World War II history and other issues.

The United States has expressed concern about the growing tensions between the two Asian powers and urged them to find common ground and overcome their differences for the sake of stability in the region.

"We have encouraged good relations between China and Japan, and even though there are difficulties in that relationship, China and Japan also share a lot of interest and, indeed, a lot of trade and commerce and a lot of economic relations," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said last Friday during a visit to Australia.

China reportedly proposed joint exploration of separate gas deposits, but Japan said it had no intention of jointly developing gas fields near the islands -- called Diaoyu by China and Senkaku by Japan.

Japan-Taiwan Ties Blossom As Regional Rivalry Grows (WP)

By Anthony Faiola

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

TAIPEI, Taiwan -- Early rising seniors have gathered for years to exercise among the yellow lotus blossoms and fuchsia rhododendrons of Chiang Kai-shek Memorial Park, the sprawling gardens in this island's capital. Now local residents stretch their limbs in slow-moving tai chi routines amid a landscape distinctly altered by the addition of 450 cherry trees, a national symbol of Japan.

The trees, set in a park commemorating a leader who fought Japan during World War II, are among the first of more than 10,000 that Japanese and Taiwanese groups intend to plant across Taiwan. They are seen as emblems of the newly blooming relationship between the Pacific neighbors -- a tie that only underscores the competition for regional influence between Japan and China, East Asia's two major powers.

With Japan seeking to shed a half-century of pacifism and reassert itself in world affairs, and China acquiring vastly larger economic and military might, relations between the two are as tense as they have been at any time since World War II.

Nowhere is their contest more visible than here in Taiwan, which China regards as a renegade province that must be reunified with the mainland, by force if necessary. In recent months, Japan has made a series of unprecedented overtures toward Taiwan, which was a Japanese colony from 1895 to 1945. In Tokyo, leading politicians are increasingly adopting the view that Japan must come to the island's aid in the event of Chinese aggression.

Many analysts say they believe Japan's evolving interest in Taiwan could tilt the regional balance of power. The United States, which has diplomatic relations with mainland China, is nonetheless sworn by the Taiwan Relations Act of 1979 to defend the island territory if it is attacked.

"The peace and stability of the Taiwan Strait and security of the Asian Pacific region are the common concerns for not only Taiwan, but also Japan and the United States," Taiwanese President Chen Shui-bian said during an interview last week. Therefore, he said, "Japan has a requirement and an obligation to come to the defense of Taiwan."

Like many countries, Japan severed diplomatic ties with Taiwan in the 1970s in deference to Beijing's "one-China" policy. But lately, Japan has been less particular about its rule of maintaining a careful distance. Twice in the past two months, Japan's foreign minister, Taro Aso, has angered China by publicly referring to Taiwan as "a country." Last year, the Tokyo government dropped visa requirements for visitors from Taiwan. And Japanese and U.S. leaders have for the first time jointly declared protection of the Taiwan Strait a "common strategic objective."

In a less public gesture, Yoichi Nagano, formerly a general in the Japanese Ground Self-Defense Force, the army, is serving as the first military attaché at Tokyo's de facto embassy in Taipei, the Interchange Association. In an interview, Nagano said he conducts meetings with Taiwanese government and military figures and sends regular dispatches to Tokyo.

In 2004, a group of Japanese legislators formed a committee on Taiwanese security. This May, Tokyo is set to allow former president Lee Teng-hui, the Japanese-educated champion of Taiwanese democracy, to visit Japan for the second time in 18 months. So-called Track 2 meetings between Japanese and Taiwanese politicians, academics and retired military officials have intensified, according to officials in Taiwan and Japan.

These moves coincide with the rise to power in Japan of a new crop of hawks in the long- ruling Liberal Democratic Party headed by Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. During his five years in office, Koizumi has pushed aside rivals in the LDP who had long stressed the importance of maintaining a respectful distance from Taiwan.

The shift also comes as China's military buildup is causing growing concern in Japan. The Beijing government boosted military spending by 15 percent this year. Tensions were particularly heightened after riots broke out across China last year against Japan's bid for a permanent seat on the U.N. Security Council and the publication in Japan of textbooks allegedly whitewashing the country's militarist past.

The Japanese view a potential Chinese takeover of Taiwan gravely. Such a move would give Beijing a perch for its missiles a mere 66 miles from Japanese territory while helping China to control the shipping lanes that carry the bulk of Middle East oil coming to Japan.

Japan has countered with uncharacteristic assertiveness. In November 2004, Japanese warships chased a Chinese submarine that had entered Japanese waters near Taiwan in what was widely seen as a test of Japan's resolve in defending the strategically sensitive zone.

Koizumi's government is also investing millions of dollars in a joint missile defense system with the United States. Some analysts say Taiwan could eventually become part of the system, turning it into a three-way defense against Chinese missiles.

Japan's pacifist constitution limits the country's ability to deploy its military abroad. But political leaders in both Japan and Taiwan are embracing a broad interpretation of a 1999 law allowing Japan to respond to threats in nearby waters. This, they say, could provide a legal basis for Japan to join the United States in responding to Chinese aggression.

Most of these leaders agree that Japan would be able to contribute rear-guard refueling, transportation and medical services and perhaps conduct search-and-rescue missions inside Taiwan. If Japanese ships or personnel providing such assistance were attacked, "it would mean war," said Tokuichiro Tamazawa, a leading LDP lawmaker long involved in the Taiwan issue.

Tadashi Ikeda, chief representative of the Interchange Association, Japan's unofficial embassy in Taipei, said Tokyo remained strongly in favor of a peaceful solution to the Taiwan issue. But, he added, "there has always been a question of what Japan would do" in the event of Chinese aggression. "Now the Taiwanese can say that both the U.S. and Japan are on their side."

U.S. officials have cautiously welcomed the more assertive Japanese stance. But they have also expressed concern that too sudden a shift could embolden Chen, Taiwan's president, to take steps toward formal independence that could ignite a cross-strait conflict.

China's relations with Japan have nose-dived since Koizumi took office and promptly began paying annual visits to Tokyo's Yasukuni Shrine, which honors Japan's 2.5 million military dead, including World War II criminals. Japan and China have also become embroiled in disputes over territorial claims and oil and gas drilling rights in the East China Sea.

Chen said in the interview last week that relations between Japan and Taiwan were at their closest since the two countries' 1972 diplomatic break. Chen said he hoped it would lead to a three-way "quasi-military alliance" among the United States, Japan and Taiwan.

In contrast with the Chinese and Koreans both North and South, many Taiwanese view the years of Japanese colonial rule in sympathetic terms. Older Taiwanese often delight in speaking Japanese, the official language of their youth. Imperial-era structures, including the elegant Presidential Office Building that was once the seat of the Japanese governor, have been painstakingly preserved and declared national treasures.

Japan and Taiwan are exchanging a record 2.3 million tourists each year, and Japan remains Taiwan's largest trading partner. Large Japanese department stores and fast-food chains dominate the Taipei cityscape.

"The Japanese built universities, roads and other infrastructure. They educated us, they turned us into a more modern society," said Hwang Kuan-hu, a national policy adviser to Chen. "We welcome Japan becoming more involved again with Taiwan."

Not everyone in Taiwan shares that sentiment, particularly members of the opposition Nationalist Party, which favors closer ties with China. Earlier this year, the party took offense when Japanese and Taiwanese groups jointly erected a monument in a Taipei suburb honoring thousands of aboriginal Taiwanese who died fighting for the Japanese Imperial Army in Southeast Asia. A few weeks later, most of the monument was ordered dismantled by local Nationalist Party officials.

Ma Ying-jeou, the Nationalist Party chief who opinion polls indicate is the favorite to win Taiwan's 2008 presidential election, described the incident as a good example of the emotions that could be unleashed if the embrace of Japan goes too far.

Taiwanese who revel in the Japanese colonial years "are still brainwashed," Ma said. "It was not a just war, and Taiwan could have done better" without the citizens who now recall that period with fondness.

Beijing's Aggression (WT)

By Jaushieh Joseph Wu

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

During his visit to Japan in November 2005, President George W. Bush said that by embracing freedom at all levels, Taiwan has delivered prosperity to its people and created a free and democratic society. For Taiwanese who lived through the four decades of authoritarianism and martial law under the Chinese Nationalist Party (KMT), Mr. Bush's words were no less an official recognition of what Taiwan has fought hard to achieve over the past few decades.

We, the Taiwanese people, understand and appreciate that the U.S. government has contributed significantly to our democratization. As Taiwan has now democratized, some in Washington have shifted their attention to other authoritarian battlegrounds. We've recently seen some of these defenders of liberty challenge giant American enterprises that are helping the Chinese regime. The Taiwanese people applauded this act, just as we cheered Mr. Bush's speech in Japan.

While some writers and other advocates of freedom continue to struggle on inside China, Taiwan is quietly helping by working hard to poke small holes in the "Great Firewall" with the hope that very soon information can freely flow to the Chinese people. Taiwan's own experience tells us that as long as there is outside support, freedom fighters will continue their battle from within against that seemingly invincible enemy, state control. The Taiwanese people stand firm together with members of Congress and these Chinese champions of liberty both in word and in deed.

Ironically, Taiwan, just like any other young democracy, still bears some trappings of the authoritarian dictatorship of the past. The national anthem of Taiwan is that of the KMT, and the emblem of the national flag is the KMT emblem. In addition, corporations such as China Airlines, China Ship Building, China Petroleum, and China Steel are actually Taiwan's state-owned corporations, not China's.

For any other newly democratized country, the issues mentioned above could be easily remedied. Unfortunately for Taiwan, these issues persist because China consistently threatens Taiwan with force when these issues are publicly discussed. But just like in any other democracy, these issues will not be ignored and will be open to public deliberation. Taiwan's government understands the sensitivity of these issues and has handled them with prudence, despite public opinion strongly being in favor of the continuation of political reform. Taiwan is deeply committed to maintaining peace and stability in the region.

In Taiwan today, there is a clear sense of insecurity despite pride in her democratic achievements. China is becoming increasingly more influential internationally and cleverly uses its power to marginalize and suffocate Taiwan. Taiwan cries out for help from time to time, but the results have been extremely disappointing. While Taiwan desires a free trade agreement with the U.S. to counter China's attempt to marginalize Taiwan economically, it has not materialized. While Taiwan worries about China's aggression, its defense budget continues to stall in the legislature. While the world is vulnerable to the spread of avian flu, the World Health Organization still excludes Taiwan.

Almost a year ago, China passed the Anti-Secession Law, which claimed Taiwan to be a part of China and legalized the use of non-peaceful means against Taiwan to enforce that claim. On the advice of the U.S. government, Taiwan offered a muted response to prevent conflict from erupting in the Taiwan Strait. But China's military threat increases, its attempts to suffocate Taiwan internationally grow stronger, and Taiwan becomes increasingly divided and internally weakened in facing China. Regrettably, none of what Taiwan needs to feel secure has been forthcoming.

China again threatened Taiwan when President Chen Shui-bian recently suggested ceasing the function of the National Unification Council (NUC) and its guidelines both remnants of the past regime. The NUC and its guidelines specify that the only course open to a democratic Taiwan is unification with authoritarian China, which goes against a fundamental and guiding democratic principle that the people have the right to determine their own destiny. Ceasing the NUC and the NUG is fully in line with democratic principles.

The Taiwanese government understands the United States' very legitimate concern over whether President Chen's actions constitute a unilateral change of the status quo. The status quo in the Taiwan Strait is that the two sides, China and Taiwan, are fully separate entities, neither having jurisdiction over the other, best exemplified by the democratization of Taiwan, which occurred without regard to what the state of affairs was across the strait. Taiwan fully supports U.S. policy because it is against Taiwan's interests to change what is indeed reality.

President Bush's comments late last year were an encouragement to Taiwan. Taiwan is now refining its democracy, the better to be a beacon for democracy activists in China to follow, and in this endeavor Taiwan deserves U.S. support.

U.S. Freezes Lebanese Media's Assets (AP-Y2)

By Jeannine Aversa

AP2, March 23, 2006

The Bush administration moved Thursday to freeze the assets of several Lebanese media outlets, alleging that they helped raised money and recruits for Hezbollah's terrorist network.

The Treasury Department's action is against al Manar, a satellite TV operator, al Nour Radio and their parent company, the Lebanese Media Group.

Any assets found in the United States belonging to these three outlets will be frozen and Americans are forbidden from doing business with them.

The department alleges that al Manar and al Nour Radio are the "media arms" of Hezbollah, a Lebanon-based group that the United States has designated as a terrorist organization.

"Al Manar and al Nour have supported fundraising and recruitment efforts by Hezbollah," the department said in a release. "Al Manar raised funds for Hezbollah through advertisements broadcast on the network and an accompanying website that requested donations for the terrorist organization."

Hezbollah leader Sheik Hassan Nasrallah also allegedly used al Manar and al Nour Radio to publicize an invitation for Lebanese citizens to volunteer for Hezbollah military training, the department said.

"Any entity maintained by a terrorist group — whether masquerading as a charity, a business or a media outlet — is as culpable as the terrorist group itself," said Stuart Levey, the Treasury Department's under secretary for terrorism and financial intelligence.

Al Manar also has provided support to other terrorist groups, including the Palestinian Islamic Jihad and al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, the department alleged.

The department said Nasrallah, along with Hezbollah's executive council, managed and oversaw the budgets of al Manar and al Nour. Moreover, prominent Hezbollah members have been major shareholders in the Lebanese Media Group, the department alleged.

Venezuela, U.S. Reach Airline Agreement (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 24, 2006

The United States and Venezuela have reached a temporary agreement that will avoid a proposed ban on flights by most U.S. airlines to the South American country, the U.S. ambassador said.

William Brownfield said Thursday that officials from both countries agreed to have the U.S. Federal Aviation Administration work with Venezuelan officials to improve local safety standards.

Venezuelan authorities want the FAA to end safety restrictions that prevent Venezuelan airlines from flying to the United States and had warned that they would decide on March 30 whether to ban U.S. flights.

"I think our two governments have resolved, at least for the moment, the civil aviation problem. We have reached an agreement, the FAA is sending a technical team here to Venezuela," Brownfield told Venezuela's Globovision television channel.

The proposed ban would have prohibited all flights by Houston-based Continental Airlines Inc. and Atlanta-based Delta Air Lines Inc. It would have restricted some by AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, the largest U.S. carrier.

Brownfield had warned last week that Venezuelan flights to the United States would be banned if Venezuela prohibited flights by U.S. airlines.

In 1995, the FAA lowered Venezuela's carriers to category 2, forcing Venezuelan airlines to fly planes rented from U.S. companies or from airlines operating out of category 1 countries, such as neighboring Colombia.

The FAA also said Venezuela must tighten its airline safety procedures and downgraded its civil aviation authority, restricting flights because Venezuela allegedly didn't meet international safety standards.

Despite the restrictions, two Venezuelan lines still serve the United States using rented planes, Aeropostal and Santa Barbara.

Venezuela insists it has long since corrected any safety problems and recently invited FAA officials to inspect its airlines.

Officials at Venezuela's National Aviation Institute could not be immediately reached for comment regarding Brownfield's announcement.

American and Venezuela aviation officials met during an airline security conference in Montreal this week for talks aimed at avoiding the ban.

Assad Kotaite, head of the U.N. International Civil Aviation Organization, said a U.S. mission would visit Caracas early next month to maintain dialogue and assess Venezuela's progress since its last audit.

Thursday's announcement comes amid tense relations between Caracas and Washington.

A U.S. Advisory About Travel In Italy Becomes A Political Issue (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

ROME, March 23 — An American travel advisory on possible dangers in Italy ballooned on Thursday into an issue in the close national election campaign here, with opposition politicians suggesting that the advisory could be used as ammunition against them.

Silvio Berlusconi, the center-right prime minister who is battling to remain in office, immediately seized on the advisory, saying that the "security concerns" addressed in it were caused by demonstrators aligned with the center-left opposition.

"I have the right and the duty to underline the danger of the political left that wishes to bring party leaders to Parliament who want to snuff out our opinions by using violence," Mr. Berlusconi said in Rome.

The travel advisory, issued by the State Department on its Web site this week, warned Americans to avoid large crowds, mentioning specifically a violent demonstration on March 11 in Milan carried out by anti-globalization activists.

The advisory, not as serious as a more formal travel warning, also spoke of "the continuing threat of terrorist attacks" in Italy, and mentioned Al Qaeda specifically.

Romano Prodi, Mr. Berlusconi's main opponent, who is supported by several leftist parties, was concerned enough by the implication that leftist demonstrators constituted a threat that he called the American ambassador, Ronald Spogli, for an explanation on Thursday.

"He explained to me that it is standard practice, but I remain very surprised," Mr. Prodi said on Italian radio on Thursday, referring to Mr. Spogli. "Because a move like this, with the elections so close, can bring with it a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that."

Ben Duffy, a spokesman for the American Embassy, said that while such advisories were not common in Western Europe, Washington had issued 70 such advisories in the past year. A similar one was issued earlier this year as a result of widespread rioting on the outskirts of Paris.

Mr. Duffy said there was no intention for the embassy to become involved in Italian politics. The election is next month.

"We anticipated this as an issue," he said. "In Italy everything is about the campaign, and in fact this is done by the consular affairs bureau, an independent channel without regard to the political impact."

Belarus Protest Dispersed As Police Arrest Hundreds (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, Friday, March 24 — Belarussian riot police officers arrested hundreds of antigovernment demonstrators early Friday morning in the central square of Minsk, ending five days of protests with a swift police action.

The police arrived on six large trucks just after 3 a.m., wearing black riot helmets and masks, and surrounded the small encampment in October Square.

The demonstrators, who had been protesting a rigged presidential election last Sunday, stood their ground while the officers dismounted and jogged into place in lines, cutting off any chance of escape.

For a few minutes, as the police awaited the final command, the demonstrators' loudspeaker worked, and one of their leaders ordered the protesters to sit down and hold hands before the police moved in.

They chanted, shouting "The police are with the people!" and "Truth! Truth! Truth!" but offered no resistance visible to journalists, who were ordered by the police to stand about 50 yards away.

The demonstrators were easily outmatched. The police carried away the first few protesters and loaded them onto trucks, and in a few minutes the remainder of the demonstrators, who appeared to be at least 300 strong, left in orderly columns and boarded waiting buses and trucks.

Some raised their fists in defiance as they boarded. The operation was over in less than 25 minutes.

The police sweep came a day after the government of President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko confirmed his overwhelming victory for a third term in office, with the election commission saying his final tally was 83 percent of the vote.

International observers have said the vote was neither free nor fair. The United States has condemned both Mr. Lukashenko and the election and called for a new vote, saying the campaign was conducted by a dictator in a climate of fear.

Mr. Lukashenko's main challenger, Aleksandr Milinkevich, was not in the camp as the police advanced. He denounced the action after visiting the detention center where the demonstrators were taken.

"This authoritarian government has once again shown its beastly face," he said in a telephone interview. "It has never been able to maintain a dialogue with the society. It knows only the language of violence and lies, and this is why its power is bankrupt."

He said he had no reports of beatings or injuries during the arrests, but added, "I do not know what is going on in the jail."

Another candidate, Aleksandr Kazulin, appeared at the square after the last demonstrators were taken away and cleaning crews were sifting through the broken remains of the camp.

He criticized the government's decision to end the peaceful act of civil disobedience, the likes of which had never been seen in Mr. Lukashenko's 12 years of autocratic rule.

Mr. Kazulin confronted a police official at the scene, Deputy Interior Minister Viktor Filistovich, and scolded him for resorting to police action. He then walked away, visibly angry.

"It is a disgrace," he said. "They did this mop-up in a cowardly way, at night."

The small encampment had been a potent attraction in a police state that has never tolerated dissent. Hundreds of protesters had stood all week in the wintry cold, singing songs and defying threats of violence and arrest.

And each evening they had been joined for several hours by other citizens, sometimes numbering in the low thousands.

The demonstrators had made it clear that they did not expect to unseat Mr. Lukashenko, whose presidency they regard as illegitimate, but hoped to inspire others to stand up for their rights in a country often called the last dictatorship in Europe.

Mr. Milinkevich had also said that what had been happening in Belarus was not merely a challenge to an election, but the start of an opposition movement that could eventually bring civil society and human rights to a country that operates like a Soviet anachronism.

The demonstrators had planned a larger rally in the square for Saturday, but with much of their core group now in police custody, the prospects were uncertain.

It was also not clear, however, whether other opposition members were away from the square and eluded capture, just as it was not clear whether the police were rounding them up in the darkness.

At least 200 opposition members had already been arrested during the week, seized as they left the square and tried to reach their homes.

Mr. Milinkevich, who officially received 6.1 percent of the vote, said the protest on Saturday would still be held.

Lukashenko Foes In Minsk Encampment Bid to Rally Support

MINSK, Belarus -- Police in riot gear stormed a tent camp in this capital city early Friday morning, detaining oppositionists in a central square protesting President Alexander Lukashenko's victory in an election they say was rigged.

The arrests came after a half dozen police buses and 75 helmeted riot police with clubs pulled up to Oktyabrskaya Square about 3 a.m.

The police stood around for a few minutes and then barged into the tent camp. They wrestled about 40 to 50 of the demonstrators, who were resisting, into buses. The rest of the approximately 200 people were taken into custody without apparent resistance. By the end of the 10-15 minute operation, all of the protesters had been taken away.

The response by police to remove the ragtag symbol of opposition further highlights the obstacles faced by the region's pro-democracy groups, despite the success of such efforts in Ukraine and Georgia. Thousands of people had been converging on the square throughout the week, but, numbed by the cold, the number of protesters had been dwindling to a ragged ring of a few dozen by the morning.

Western television had been broadcasting the evening crowds. But here in Belarus, footage beamed to millions of homes by state-run television showed the desolate early morning, when the few protesters who had been braving the frosty night meandered near tents amid piles of garbage and beer bottles.

Oppositionists who have lived for 12 years under the authoritarian rule of Mr. Lukashenko are used to rough treatment from the state-controlled media, which had also lately labeled many of the opposition social and sexual deviants on the payroll of Western governments.

But the poor turnout of the defenders, who each night locked their arms and faced riot police, prompted a split in the country's opposition. Some had said the creation of the encampment was a tactical mistake that threatened to discredit their cause, and they wanted the tents dismantled.

They instead saw the nightly meetings held on the square as a better symbol for their movement, and had pinned hopes on a significant protester turnout tomorrow, a national holiday that is a traditional gathering time for opponents of Mr. Lukashenko.

Prior to the raid, Alexander Kozulin, a presidential candidate in the elections held Sunday, had publicly called for the tent city to be abandoned, saying it was an easy target for police. Mr. Kozulin said it was inhumane to ask youths -- the protesters were mostly college-age students -- to remain on their round-the-clock vigil in subfreezing temperatures.

Alexander Milinkevich, another presidential candidate who is considered the leader of the Belarussian opposition, had also said he would have preferred that the demonstrators go home, but he would support them as long as they wanted to stay. "This will end only with the decision of the youths themselves," he said.

Mr. Milinkevich had been making the rounds at the settlement each night, shaking hands with its defenders. Yesterday, before the police action, he said that although the demonstrations had been comparatively small and hadn't succeeded in achieving protesters' demands for new elections, they represented a big step forward. "Nobody had expected what has happened here," he told tent-camp residents.

At the crux of the debate, the oppositionists said, was whether Belarus's opposition was mature enough to mount a movement like the one that occurred in neighboring Ukraine, in which a tent city on Independence Square in Kiev was a nucleus for demonstrations that reversed rigged presidential elections in 2004.

In Ukraine, the opposition received sustenance from business leaders, and the Kiev city government helped put up portable toilets for the campers.

In Minsk, campers were besieged by riot troops, who searched the bags of anyone heading toward the camp and often arrested those who tried to leave. Yesterday, a United Nations envoy called for the release of protesters. Police had closed down a makeshift latrine concealed under a tent pitched over a manhole cover.

More devastating, however, was that the encampment became an easy target for influential Belarussian government television. In Ukraine, oppositionists had their own television station, which elevated protesters and their leaders to hero status.

In Minsk, state-television coverage homed in on the tent city in its more desolate moments. What's more, television accused protesters of staying out all night because they are on the payrolls of Western governments. Much of the state-run information campaign against the opposition focused on the U.S., which has said it won't recognize the election results.

Prior to the police action, Oleg Manaev, head of an independent think tank in Minsk and a supporter of the opposition, said that at least a third of Belarussians have no access to media outside the government channels. "In smaller towns and villages, these reports are very much believed," he said.

Mr. Manaev said the blitzkrieg of bad publicity was probably one reason why the turnout for the demonstrations hadn't been enough to prompt hope for immediate change. While he supported the tent encampment, he had also hoped the opposition would come up with longer-term goals.

Police Break Up Belarus Protest (WT/AP)

By Jim Heintz, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

MINSK, Belarus -- Police stormed the opposition tent camp in the Belarusian capital of Minsk early today, detaining scores of demonstrators who had spent a fourth night in a central square to protest President Alexander Lukashenko's victory in a disputed election.

The arrests came after a half dozen large police buses and 75 helmeted riot police with clubs pulled up to Oktyabrskaya Square in central Minsk about 3 a.m.

The police stood around for a few minutes and then barged into the tent camp filled with protesters.

An Associated Press reporter on the scene said they wrestled about 40 to 50 of the demonstrators, who were resisting, into buses. The rest of the 200 demonstrators were taken into custody without apparent resistance.

By the end of the 10- to 15-minute operation, all of the protesters had been taken away. All that remained were their tents -- kicked down during the raid -- their gear and garbage.

Police had been detaining opposition supporters and would-be protesters away from the square, but today's arrests marked the first time they had tried to forcefully eject the demonstrators en masse.

Their action followed opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich's warning yesterday that increased persecution would only strengthen protests against the authoritarian government.

This week's protests over the official figures giving a landslide win to Mr. Lukashenko have consistently attracted thousands nightly -- and more than 10,000 at the first one Sunday -- an exceptional number in the tightly controlled former Soviet nation, which has a history of swift, violent police dispersal of small rallies. A core of about 200 has held the square overnight.

But the numbers have been far too small to pose a real threat to the hard-line Belarusian leader's rule.

That has raised increasing questions about what the opposition movement's strategy is, or even if it has one. A rally called for tomorrow -- the anniversary of the declaration of the first independent Belarusian state, and a traditional day for opposition rallies -- is likely to be key in determining how much support the opposition has.

"March 25 will be an important day. ... On that day, we will make known the long-term plans of the opposition," Mr. Milinkevich said.

Later, speaking to a nighttime crowd of about 3,000, he said, "The 25th will be a day of freedom for thousands and thousands of Belarusians. History has shown that the Belarusian fight for freedom has not gone unnoticed. We have come out into the square."

U.S. Ends Trade Restrictions On Ukraine (AP-Y2)

President Bush signed a law Thursday that ended Cold War-era trade restrictions on Ukraine, opening the way for the former Soviet republic to join the World Trade Organization.

The measure frees Ukraine from a 1974 measure called the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, which links trade benefits to the emigration and human rights policies of former or current communist states.

The new law is "going to strengthen our ties with our good friend Ukraine and create new economic opportunities for our two countries," Bush said at a White House ceremony attended by members of Congress who sponsored the legislation.

He said the bill would open new markets for American products and help Ukraine develop its economy and raise the living standards of its people.

Bush said the United States supports Ukraine's goal of joining the 148-nation WTO this year and will help it resolve issues standing in the way of its entry. Removal of the U.S. trade restrictions was a necessary step to gain entry.

"Ukraine is committed to economic freedom, democratic progress and open trade," he said.

Since 1993, the United States has annually granted Ukraine normal trade relations on a temporary basis.

Ukraine President Viktor Yushchenko, whose pro-Western government was elected in January, has welcomed the U.S. legislation, saying "consistent U.S. steps in support of Ukraine on the way of reform are evidence of strategic partnership between the countries."

U.S. exports to Ukraine, including poultry and agriculture machinery, totaled $531.7 million in 2005. Imports from Ukraine, including steel and coke used in making steel, totaled $1.1 billion.

Sen. Richard Lugar (news, bio, voting record), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Ukraine has demonstrated a commitment to greater freedom and free market principles.

On Sunday, Ukraine's voters will be choosing from 45 parties to fill the single-chamber parliament. Some 7,605 candidates are running.

Yushchenko's job is not at stake, but those of his prime minister and Cabinet are, as new constitutional reforms come into effect that give Parliament more powers in shaping the government.

The pro-Western path adopted by Yushchenko could be slowed if pro-Russian Viktor Yanukovych makes a comeback Sunday, with goals such as membership in NATO by 2008 dropping off the screen in favor of closer ties with Moscow.

Yanukovych's political future had been written off after he was accused of trying to steal Ukraine's 2004 presidential election.

Infighting May Return Power To Soviet-era Party (WT)

By Natalia A. Feduschak

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

KIEV -- Political allies who stood side by side during Ukraine's 2004 "Orange Revolution" are waging war against each other in such a divisive campaign that the Soviet-style apparatchiks they had ousted are poised for a comeback in elections this weekend.

Opinion polls show that the party of Viktor Yanukovych, who won the presidency in an election in 2004 only to lose to Viktor Yushchenko in a court-ordered second vote, will win about a third of the seats Sunday, becoming the biggest single bloc in Ukraine's 450-seat parliament.

The so-called "Orange coalition," which includes followers of Mr. Yushchenko and those of former Prime Minister Yulia Tymoshenko, has ruptured so badly that its ability to forge a postelection alliance is in doubt.

"We can say that Ukraine's post-Soviet era has decidedly ended with these elections," said Myron Wasylyk, an American who has advised politicians and businessmen in Ukraine for more than a decade. "This is the beginning of the democratic era."

The vote is the first under constitutional changes adopted earlier this year that reduce presidential powers at the expense of a prime minister, to be elected in parliament.

Forty-four parties are vying for a presence in the legislature. The latest polls show the combined strength of the feuding Yushchenko and Tymoshenko parties at slightly less than that of the Yanukovych party.

Mr. Yushchenko and Mrs. Tymoshenko have been at odds since the president fired her as prime minister in the summer.

Mr. Yushchenko said the dismissal was prompted by infighting that followed the peaceful revolution that ushered in 2005.

The feud between former allies has helped Mr. Yanukovych, who has kept a low profile since his defeat in 2004 and has hired a U.S. public relations firm to advise his campaign. Still, Mr. Yanukovych is not trusted in many regions of Ukraine.

Many politicians and analysts say the forces of the Orange Revolution are fated to work together, even if they can't get along.

Foreign Minister Boris Tarasyuk told the Brookings Institution in Washington earlier this month, "We are confident that the pro-democracy forces will gain a clear majority."

"Despite the fragmentation between the pro-democracy political parties, their combined approval rating has even slightly grown. There should be no doubts that the pro-democracy parties are capable of bridging their differences and restoring the Orange coalition," he said.

Mr. Yushchenko's popularity has fallen since his inauguration last year. Supporters have accused him of weak leadership, mismanagement and failure to investigate crimes by former government officials, widely promised during the presidential campaign.

Still, during his tenure, Ukraine's relationship with the West has improved markedly.

Both the United States and the European Union granted Ukraine market-economy status, important steps in the country's bid to become a member of the World Trade Organization.

As the elections approach, Kiev is awash in the colors of the various parties running not only in parliamentary, but also regional and municipal elections on the same day.

About 3,500 election observers from Europe and the United States have arrived in Ukraine. Thus far, a high-ranking Western observer told journalists, the main problems in the elections have been technical and not political.

Ethnic And Cultural Divisions Haunt Ukraine Before Vote (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

SIMFEROPOL, Ukraine — There are few obstacles to speaking Russian here in Crimea since, after all, practically everyone speaks it at home, at school, at work.

Still there are those who complain that the language is under assault, that the courts issue rulings in Ukrainian, that Russian classics are now taught in schools as "foreign" literature, that a repressive government in the capital, Kiev, is bent on imposing a nationalistic identity on a place that was part of Russia until Nikita S. Khrushchev decreed otherwise in 1954 (and, to some here, should be again).

"Whatever we receive from Kiev is all in Ukrainian!" Yevgeny G. Bubnov, a member of Crimea's regional Parliament, complained in an interview as he explained why he sponsored a proposal to hold a referendum on whether to elevate Russian to official status in a country where, constitutionally, Ukrainian is the language of the land.

The federal government fiercely opposed Mr. Bubnov's proposal and ultimately rejected it. But the constitutional clash it threatened to create highlighted the stark ethnic and cultural divisions that continue to haunt Ukraine with the approach of the March 26 parliamentary elections — the first since the Orange Revolution a little more than a year ago.

The referendum even raised questions about the status of Crimea itself — a lush peninsula of seaside resorts, vineyards and a largely Russian populace, whose political, economic and cultural affiliations are closer to Moscow than to Kiev.

And that, its critics say, was exactly the point.

"It is playing with the sentiments of the population that is still nostalgic for Soviet times, those who reacted painfully to the breakup of the Soviet Union," said Vladimir B. Shklar, the Crimean leader of Our Ukraine, the political party of the country's president, Viktor A. Yushchenko. The parliamentary elections are the first electoral test of Mr. Yushchenko's policies since he took office in January 2005, after mass protests against a fraudulent presidential election. According to the polls, at least, he is faring badly, with his bloc trailing the party led by the man he defeated, Viktor F. Yanukovich.

As in the presidential race, the main issues revolve around Russia, namely Ukraine's relations to Russia, its larger neighbor. Nowhere are those issues more charged than in Crimea, home not only to a majority of ethnic Russians but also to Russia's Black Sea Fleet, a source of tensions for nearly a decade.

As the election campaign began in earnest in January, a group of young people gathered with shovels on the isthmus that connects Crimea to the mainland to dig a symbolic trench. Few openly call for separatism, which is a federal crime, but several smaller parties and blocs are running on platforms calling for closer cooperation with Russia and even reunification.

One party based in Crimea even calls itself the Party of Putin's Politics. Its billboards show President Vladimir V. Putin's steely eyes fixed on the rugged Crimean landscape, promising a united future.

Mikhail Y. Pushia stood on a square the other day in Sevastopol, the deep-water port city on Crimea's southern bulge, campaigning for Natalia M. Vitrenko, the leader of a fiercely anti-American and anti-European bloc of parties that advocate a new union among the Slavic nations of Russia, Belarus and Ukraine.

With a union, he said, "all the problems would be solved."

The problems between Russia and Ukraine, of course, are considerable, largely because the ties that once united them are now a source of tension.

A New Year's dispute over the price of Russian natural gas, on which Ukraine is heavily dependent, prompted Russia to shut down supplies briefly, infuriating many Ukrainians.

Mr. Yushchenko's deal with Mr. Putin to end the crisis — with a complicated pricing system and a murky trading company — proved equally unpopular, however. Mr. Yanukovich argues that he could have negotiated lower prices because of his friendly relations with Russia.

In the wake of the gas dispute, Ukraine responded with threats to charge higher rent for the base in Sevastopol that houses the Black Sea Fleet's dozens of ships and 14,000 sailors under a lease set to expire in 2017. Russia now pays roughly $98 million a year; some Ukrainian officials have suggested that billions would be more appropriate.

In January, Ukraine occupied one of the fleet's lighthouses in Yalta, saying Russia was using it illegally, provoking a war of words and a new round of negotiations to defuse the confrontation. When student protesters began demonstrating at eight other lighthouses, the fleet bolstered security around them.

Russia's defense minister, Sergei B. Ivanov, warned that revising the terms of the lease would reopen a separate treaty that fixed the borders, which is what many here say they would like to see happen.

"This is a Russian city," said Aleksandr N. Mironov, an ethnic Russian who settled in Sevastopol after serving in the Soviet border troops.

Mr. Yanukovich's Party of Regions does not openly endorse such sentiments, but he has promised to make Russian a second official language and to improve economic and political relations with Russia, which have been strained since Mr. Yushchenko took office.

Mr. Yushchenko's supporters say that the language issue and the tensions over the naval base have been exaggerated with the intent to divide Ukrainians and ethnic Russians, who account for roughly two-thirds of Crimea's nearly two million people, as well as large majorities in the eastern Ukraine regions of Donetsk and Lugansk. Another predominately Russian city, Kharkiv, voted on March 6 to adopt Russian as a second official language in municipal affairs.

Khrushchev's decision to cede Crimea to Ukraine mattered little during Soviet times, but immensely after the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991 and internal administrative borders became international boundaries. It was not until 1997 that Russia and Ukraine reached agreement on how to divide the fleet and to accept the current borders.

Despite impassioned oratory on each side, the prospects of an open conflict appear slight. But Mr. Yushchenko's supporters warn that Russia continues to interfere in Ukrainian politics on the hope that a friendlier government led by Mr. Yanukovich as a newly empowered prime minister could result in better terms for the fleet and for the Russians living here.

"This is not going to be solved until after the election," a Russian naval officer in Sevastopol said in an interview, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on what has become a diplomatic matter.

Petro O. Poroshenko, a tycoon closely allied with Mr. Yushchenko, complained recently that proponents of the language referendum were trying to turn Crimea into a client state of Russia.

"Look what happened in Abkhazia with Russian support," Mr. Poroshenko said, referring to the Black Sea region in Georgia that became a separatist enclave with Russian help after a bloody war in the early 1990's. "The land is almost as beautiful as the Crimea, and they have hundreds of thousands of refugees. There is no development."

Although the language issue has been defused for now, it has resonated deeply in Crimea, hardening support for Mr. Yanukovich, who won 81 percent of the vote here in the repeated second round of the disputed 2004 presidential race, and fanning resentments against Kiev.

The election, warned Vasily A. Kiselyov, the acting chairman of Crimea's Parliament and a Yanukovich stalwart, could lead to a new wave of large street protests, even tent camps, only this time against Mr. Yushchenko's government.

De Villepin Agrees To Talks With Unions (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Dominique de Villepin invited trade unions to talks over his unpopular employment law on Thursday “with no strings attached”, a move cautiously accepted by five unions and widely interpreted as a climbdown by the embattled French premier.

The appeal came as Mr de Villepin faced accusations that his refusal to consider changing the law had provoked an unnecessary crisis, with critics suspecting he had allowed his presidential ambitions to override his political judgment.

The meeting could happen on Friday. But the offer for it came only after a long and reportedly heated meeting with President Jacques Chirac, fuelling rumours that the prime minister was ordered to back down.

The new law, which allows companies to fire people aged under 26 in the first two years of their contract without reason, has sparked widespread protests by students and workers which erupted into violence in central Paris yesterday.

Students condemn the “first job” contract, saying it would make them “the Kleenex generation”, used and then discarded.

More rallies and strikes are planned for Tuesday.

Unions want the law withdrawn. François Chérèque, leader of the moderate CFDT union, said: “If the prime minister does not respond positively to our demand to withdraw the first job contract, we will end the conversation.”

Critics suspect Mr de Villepin has fallen into the same trap as his hero Napoleon Bonaparte, ousted after leading France to military defeat at Waterloo.

Analysts, opposition Socialists and members of his own centre-right UMP party said he had tried to push reform too far, too fast, in pursuit of his personal ambitions.

"President Chirac has told him to back down as he was leading the country to the wall," said Dominique Moisi, a senior adviser at France's Institute for International Relations. "He tried to convince himself he could be France's Margaret Thatcher, but forgot he was only the number two."

Nicolas Sarkozy, the interior minister and Mr de Villepin's main centre-right rival for next year's presidential election, has distanced himself from the premier, suggesting he should have held more talks and sought a "more equitable" law.

Unions Agree To Meet French Leader (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 24, 2006

PARIS, March 23 - France's most powerful labor union federations agreed Thursday to meet Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin on Friday to discuss the country's hotly contested new employment law, even as fires burned in Paris after another demonstration against the law.

Hundreds of thousands of students marched in protest against the new law in cities and towns across France, frequently clashing with the police. In Paris, demonstrators threw chunks of concrete at police officers, while three cars and a shoe store went up in flames in the city's exclusive Seventh Arrondissement. The police fired tear gas and scuffled with demonstrators in Rennes in the northwest and Marseille in the south after protests that drew thousands of marchers in those cities.

By late in the day, riot police forces began using paint guns to shoot vandalism suspects with red or green dye in order to identify them later. Several hundred people were reported arrested.

Mr. de Villepin wrote to French labor union federations early Thursday, appealing for talks on the new law, which the unions have opposed and want rescinded. The law, which the government says was meant to spur hiring, would allow employers to dismiss workers under 26 without cause during their first two years on the job. The law is currently under review by France's Constitutional Council. If approved by the council, it would go into effect next month.

François Bayrou, leader of the small Union for French Democracy, a center-right opposition party, said Mr. de Villepin must remain open to withdrawing the law. "The time has come, if we want to avoid mounting dangers and risks, to make this gesture," Mr. Bayrou said on France's Europe-1 radio.

France's five major union federations had earlier refused to talk to the government as long as the law remained on the books. In a statement released Thursday afternoon they said that in responding to Mr. de Villepin's latest appeal they repeated their demand that he rescind the law. They called a meeting Friday, before the meeting with Mr. de Villepin, of all organizations involved in fighting the new law and repeated their call for strikes and demonstrations next Tuesday.

Protest Turns Violent In Heart Of Paris (WP)

By Molly Moore

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

PARIS, March 23 -- It was just the scene the French government had been dreading: burning cars seven blocks from the Eiffel Tower, shop windows smashed along one of the capital's toniest streets, and columns of helmeted riot police advancing across the greensward of a prominent tourist venue.

Antoil Ethuin, 48, stood outside the shattered windows of his Bike n' Roll rental shop Thursday, stunned by the destruction of the worst violence in two weeks of student protests in Paris and other French cities.

"My country is broken," said Ethuin, gazing at the smoldering automobile carcasses a few yards away and the carpet of glass shards, broken dishes and computer pieces covering the sidewalk in the heart of one of the city's most affluent neighborhoods. "I never imagined I would ever see this in Paris."

Thursday's violence came at the end of a demonstration by tens of thousands of high school and college students protesting a new job law. The unrest intensified a political crisis that now threatens to unravel President Jacques Chirac's government -- much the way previous French governments have been felled by strikes and street protests when they attempted even modest reforms of the country's costly welfare state.

Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin -- author of the contentious law that would make it easier for companies to both hire and fire young workers -- has scheduled an emergency meeting with the country's most influential labor unions Friday in an effort to defuse the crisis.

The demonstrations have underscored the widening divide between the French government and its people at a time when France is losing both economic and political clout on the global stage. Street protests and general strikes, often occurring in the spring, have long been an accepted political ritual in France, and they now have become a symbol of the country's inability to reform a stagnant economy hobbled by inflexible labor laws, high taxes and a corpulent welfare system.

It is a crisis also facing other countries across Europe as governments of the left and the right have similarly attempted to alter their costly systems of generous health, unemployment and welfare benefits; most, like that of former German chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, have failed in the face of widespread resistance to change.

On Thursday afternoon, as a crowd of as many as 140,000 young people and others prepared to end their march in the large park fronting the gold-domed Hotel des Invalides housing Napoleon's tomb, gangs of hooded and masked youths darted out of side streets, setting cars ablaze, flipping others upside down, breaking store windows and throwing rocks and stones at police and firefighters, according to witnesses.

Riot police broke up the groups of rampaging youths with tear gas as acrid, black smoke filled narrow streets and billowed above the city skyline.

Police said 60 people were injured in the clashes, including 27 police officers, and 141 people were arrested.

The shellshocked owner of the Shanghai Restaurant overlooking the Esplanade des Invalides stood outside the jagged glass of his doorway, dejected and slump-shouldered. Broken dishes and pots of white and purple flowers littered the street. Inside, splintered chairs and table settings covered the restaurant floor.

Nearly a dozen stores, restaurants and apartment buildings were attacked and damaged. Firefighters struggled to extinguish the flames of three burned-out cars. Four other vehicles had been overturned or severely battered.

In the park across the street, hundreds of riot police clad in black uniforms and carrying shields advanced toward groups of suspected troublemakers against the backdrop of the Hotel des Invalides, the low-slung Foreign Ministry building and the golden statues standing sentry at the Invalides Bridge traversing the Seine River.

The attacks at the corner of Rue Saint Dominique and Rue Fabert, just a short walk from the Eiffel Tower in Paris's affluent and touristy 7th arrondissement, followed a pattern that has emerged in the last few days of marches.

While the demonstrations have been orderly and peaceful, groups of 200 to 300 youths who police say do not appear to be participating in the organized marches have appeared suddenly during concluding rallies, taunting police and creating havoc.

Police have speculated that the gangs may be from the poor suburban areas that erupted in riots last fall. In those disturbances, youths across France -- many of them immigrants or French-born children of immigrants -- burned thousands of cars and hundreds of public buildings and private businesses to protest government indifference to the joblessness and lack of social services in their communities. Little of that violence spilled over into Paris or other urban centers.

Both the suburban riots and the ongoing student demonstrations have been devastating to Chirac's government and could destroy the presidential aspirations of his party's two leading candidates -- Villepin and his rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy.

Sarkozy was blamed for fueling last fall's riots with derogatory and inflammatory comments directed at youths in the suburban housing projects.

Villepin attempted to capitalize on Sarkozy's political misfortunes by pushing a law he said was intended to give companies greater incentive to hire young people. Now, many members of Villepin's party are distancing themselves from the prime minister. French newspapers on Thursday began reporting leaks from anonymous government officials that Chirac is threatening to fire Villepin if he does not resolve the crisis quickly.

The law, scheduled to take effect in April, would allow employers to fire workers under age 26 without cause during their first two years on the job.

Under existing law, it is impossible to fire even the most incompetent workers without huge financial liabilities for companies. College students, other young people and unions say the new law discriminates against the young by denying them the job security that older workers have.

Even as Ethuin, the bike rental shop owner, surveyed the damage along his block Thursday afternoon, he couldn't bring himself to criticize the young people whose demonstration brought the violence to his doorstep.

"They have no jobs," he said. "It's not their fault."

Moscow Presses For WTO Status (WT)

By John Zarocostas

The Washington Times, March 24, 2006

GENEVA -- Russia is pressing to wrap up a 13-year bid to join the World Trade Organization before it hosts the Group of Eight summit this summer, subject to a series of U.S. commercial demands, senior diplomats and trade officials say.

The talks can certainly "close before the G-8 summit," said Robert Vastine, president of the influential U.S. Coalition of Service Industries, a Washington-based umbrella group that represents major services corporations.

But he indicated the ball is squarely in President Vladimir Putin's court.

"I see no sign of the U.S. letting down on its demands and I hope they remain firm," said Mr. Vastine, a former senior Treasury official.

One dispute involves financial services, especially insurance, with Washington insisting that foreign-controlled firms be allowed to establish branches in Russia.

Russia's push to enter the WTO follows a furious dispute with Washington this winter over natural gas supplies -- a row that for a brief period threatened to derail the WTO effort as well.

Russia cut off natural gas supplies to Ukraine, prompting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to accuse Russia of using its energy resources as a political weapon and suggest that Russia was not fit to lead the G-8.

"When you say you want to be ... responsible actor in the international economy, then you play by its rules," Miss Rice said at the time.

Russia's action plunged much of Western Europe into a mid-winter panic: The pipelines extend through Ukraine and gas supplies suddenly plummeted for much of the continent.

Russia quickly backed down, turned the gas back on and settled its differences with Ukraine.

With the entry of China into the WTO in December 2001, and Saudi Arabia last year, Russia is the only major global economic power outside the agency that oversees most world trade in goods and services worth over $11 trillion a year.

Russia's deputy trade minister and chief WTO negotiator, Maxim Medvedkov, is holding talks all this week in Geneva with Dorothy Dwoskin, assistant U.S. trade representative and chief U.S. negotiator.

In the gas dispute, Russia denied U.S. charges that its actions were politically motivated. In negotiations over joining the WTO, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov turned the tables by accusing Washington of holding up talks for political reasons.

Mr. Vastine dismissed Mr. Lavrov's assertion in a telephone interview yesterday.

"That's just not true," he said, noting that the United States has a solid track record of isolating commercial agreements from political considerations.

Even in the aftermath of the September 11 terrorist attacks, Mr. Vastine said, Washington has managed to keep commercial dealings separate from broader political and strategic issues.

According to diplomatic sources close to the Kremlin, the Russians were rattled by the expedited economic and political treatment given recently by the Bush administration to neighboring Ukraine, which is also a candidate to join the 149-member WTO, and is expected to join ahead of Moscow.

The new ambassador from Ukraine is becoming a frequent visitor to the White House, where yesterday he was present as President Bush signed a landmark trade bill lifting Cold War sanctions on the former Soviet republic.

Russia is still subject to those same restrictions, under a law widely known as Jackson-Vanik, meaning it requires a presidential waiver to obtain normal tariff rates.

Issues holding back a U.S.-Russia deal to join the WTO include lack of progress related to intellectual property protection, demands for better market access for certain U.S. agricultural products and civil aircraft, branching rights for U.S. insurance companies and Russian agricultural subsidies.

A senior Russian official said the Kremlin has agreed to increase the maximum stake foreigners can have in the country's banking sector from 12.5 percent up to 50 percent,

Similarly for insurance the maximum stake foreigners can have in the sector, he said, would be increased from 25 percent to 50 percent.

To secure WTO entry, Russia has agreed to bring its average industrial tariffs down to single digits and to lower other trade and investment barriers to many sectors of its economy.

Russia is to host the G-8 summit in St. Petersburg in July. Besides Russia, the group includes the United States, Britain, Canada, France, Germany, Japan and Italy.

EU Ministers Consider Immigrant 'contracts' (FT)

By Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

The six largest countries in the European Union are considering having immigrants sign a 'contract' that would require they learn the language of their adopted country and accept its social norms – or risk being expelled.

The so-called integration contract is still to be discussed with the other 19 EU member states. Nicolas Sarkozy, French interior minister, proposed it during a meeting of ministers from the 'G6' countries – Germany, Britain, France, Poland, Spain and Italy -- in Heiligendamm, a luxury resort on Germany's Baltic coast. His idea is based on draft procedures already being debated in France.

The ministers also agreed to form joint anti-terror police and forensic teams that could be dispatched within hours to locations in EU member states where a terrorist attack has occurred.

The contract proposal comes amid controversy in several EU member states over the appropriate steps to ensure foreigners accept local customs and speak the language.

In Holland, hopeful immigrants are being shown a film that includes images of a topless woman on a beach, two men kissing in a park, and ghettos as part of an entrance test covering the language and culture of Holland. And in Germany, two regional states have in recent months proposed starkly different tests to be completed by foreigners wishing to become German citizens.

Wolfgang Schäuble, German interior minister, said agreement was needed on differing forms of integration procedures – ranging from initial immigration to tests for full citizenship – but stressed that this was "a pressing challenge for the whole of the EU that must be addressed".

Spain's interior minister Jose Antonio Alsonso Suarez used the meeting to call on the EU to redraw its strategy towards illegal immigrants, from Africa in particular. He said EU institutions and funds were still geared largely to dealing with migrants from north Africa, while in reality thousands were now coming from other regions, especially in west Africa.

Charles Clarke, British interior minister, told the Financial Times he supported the move towards an integration contract, initially by asking experts from the G6 to review comparable procedures used in member states. He acknowledged that such an agreement could be used as a check that "new immigrants live up to the values of our society", with expulsions a possible consequence if they do not. Previous G6 proposals on migration and anti-terror issues have been endorsed by the entire EU.

On anti-terror measures, Mr Clarke said the joint teams "were unlikely to have a permanent base, but would be networked to respond quickly to an attack". He said that while Britain, for instance, could draw on institutional ties to other police forces after the terror attacks in London last year, other countries did not have such links, so quick response teams "could be very useful".

Tensions Rise As Chirac Walks Out On EU Forum (FT)

By George Parker And Chris Smyth

Financial Times, March 24, 2006

Jacques Chirac, French president, Thursday night stormed out of a European Union summit after a French industrialist began addressing leaders of the bloc in English.

Mr Chirac and two senior French ministers walked out in protest at the decision of Ernest-Antoine Seillière, head of the Unice employers organisation, to make a plea for economic reform in what he called "the language of business".

Mr Chirac's boycott re-flected the tensions surrounding the two-day economic summit, which comes against a backdrop of French street protests over labour market reform and claims that Paris is engaged in protectionism of its energy market. The French president was not in the room to hear Mr Seillière urging leaders to "resist national protectionism in order to avoid a negative domino effect".

He returned after Mr Seillière had finished speaking. Angela Merkel, Germany's chancellor, on Thursday issued a thinly veiled warning to France and Spain to open their energy markets, as the dispute over protectionism overshadowed the start of the summit.

Ms Merkel said Europe needed continent-wide industrial champions, and that attempts by member states to ringfence their national energy companies made nonsense of the EU's single market. "We can only have an internal market when electricity flows freely and when we accept European champions and don't just think nationally," she said at the start of the meeting.

Ms Merkel's intervention came as the EU's 25 heads of government gathered for their first summit since the row over protectionism in the energy sector erupted earlier this month. She is among those continental leaders who believe a European energy policy is impossible unless member states agree to create a single electricity and gas market with cross-border grids and in-dustrial takeovers. She is annoyed with Spain, which is opposing a takeover of Endesa, the Spanish utility, by Eon of Germany.

Meanwhile Silvio Berlusconi, Italy's prime minister, has accused France of trying to block a takeover by Enel, the Italian utility, of Suez, its Franco-Belgian rival. Paris intervened by merging the state-owned Gaz de France with Suez. Mr Berlusconi said he would not create a row over the issue at the summit and that the matter now rested with the European Commission.

Wolfgang Schüssel, Austria's chancellor and the summit host, said the word "protectionism" did not come up at last night's summit dinner, and the endorsement of an EU energy policy represented an historic de-bate.

Leaders agreed to set up a "strategic energy review", an "energy efficiency action plan" and a "renewable energy road map", but there were disagreements on some of the more contentious aspects of the strategy.

The proposed energy policy, although supported in principle by member states, is already under strain.

Some capitals oppose a new European energy regulator to promote cross-border energy trading. Some also have doubts about the development of an EU emergency gas reserve. The economic summit comes at a time of concern in some European countries about globalisation.

The proposed French changes on Thursday won the backing of Joaquín Almunia, EU monetary affairs commissioner, who said the measure would help to reduce youth unemployment. “The new contract will help young French people get their first job and prove their worth,” he said.

Will Peru Choose Another Path? (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

Peruvian labor lawyer Isaac Humala's call, last Friday, for the release of the jailed leader of the Shining Path might be interpreted, in another time and place, as a cheesy publicity stunt by an aged communist.

After all, the 75-year-old Humala would seem to have long ago lost his revolutionary struggle in Peru, where the Shining Path's Maoist terrorism in the 1980s claimed the lives of so many indigenous peasants.

But Mr. Humala is no ordinary communist has-been. He is the father of Ollanta Humala, the candidate now leading in the presidential race that will be decided by voters in two weeks. The son immediately distanced himself from his father's rhetoric, but in the light of the candidate's own extremism, the country's history of left-wing military rule and the current Shining Path resurgence, Papa Humala's plea on behalf of a terrorist leader was disquieting.

Markets recognized the danger Monday after Peruvian opinion pollster Apoyo announced that Ollanta is now likely to place first on April 9 and is in a statistical dead heat with center-right candidate Lourdes Flores in a hypothetical second-round runoff between the two. The "Humala effect" sent the Lima Stock Exchange index down almost 4% and sparked a sell-off in the Peruvian sol as well. This is not the first time in recent months that markets have signaled panic about Ollanta. An earlier Humala surge provoked more than a 6% pullback in Lima's equity market in December.

The reason investors are spooked is simple: The former army officer's economic platform, though void of specifics, is openly hostile toward the private sector. In an interview last month published in Spain's ABC newspaper Ollanta described the aim of his nationalism as an effort to reclaim the country from its "neo-colonial" status. "Our natural resources" he said, "are committed to foreign capital and they do not yield any profit for us."

His avowed intent to stick it to the private-sector -- with an emphasis on mineral and natural gas rights -- frightens investors. More troubling is the threat of a return to what effectively would be a left-wing military government in one of South America's fastest growing economies. Peru suffered that fate over a quarter-century ago, with disastrous results.

Ollanta didn't burst onto the Peruvian political scene only recently. The former lieutenant colonel has been agitating for power for years and even attempted a coup d'etat against Alberto Fujimori in 2000. We reported on him as a looming menace in June 2003, in a piece titled "Some Peruvians Fear a Return of Comandante Rule."

At that time, we cited observations by Enrique Ghersi, a Lima attorney and co-author of the global best-selling political treatise titled "The Other Path," about Ollanta's political career: "Notwithstanding that he took up arms in the last days of Fujimori, [he] has just been 'rewarded' with the post of military attaché in France. Huge blunder. Three of the last military dictators had the same job. After which they returned to Peru to lead a coup: Oscar R. Benavides, Luis M. Sanchez Cerro and Juan Velasco Alvarado. If history is not mistaken, Ollanta Humala perhaps could be next."

Mr. Ghersi noted that since the coup d'etat is no longer in vogue, the aspiring caudillo would be more likely to follow the example of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez, who also engaged in a failed coup attempt, did time briefly in jail and emerged a popular hero. As if to fulfill the Ghersi prophecy, the Chávez-wannabe has already announced that, should he win, he will call for a rewriting of the constitution, a tactic Chávez used to tighten his grip on power.

In his interview with ABC, Ollanta confirmed his admiration for the Venezuelan. "We are both military men, we have risen up against a corrupt regime and we have both suffered imprisonment. I acknowledge that his government is nationalist and patriotic. In that sense, I see that he is on the right track."

This view of the world didn't come about accidentally. Though he is a well-to-do middle-class Limeño, Papa Isaac founded an ethno-nationalist movement whose goal it is to conduct a popular indigenous revolution. It was to this end, presumably, that he enrolled two of his young sons in the Peruvian military school. Ollanta's brother Antauro, a former army major, is now serving time for a 2005 attack on a police station in which four police officers were killed.

Ollanta's popularity, Mr. Ghersi noted in 2003, suggests that Peru may be following a Latin American trend toward "neomilitarism" with a "pronounced populist accent and a generous dose of communist infiltration." He wrote, "Fundamentally it represents the popular discontent that exists against democratic politics in Latin America."

The discontent is understandable. While it is true that the economy grew by 4% to 5% annually from 2002 to 2004 and an estimated 5.5% in 2005, a decade of such returns might be needed to convince voters that their lives are changing.

It is also true that booming mineral and farm prices tend to show up in the pockets of northern Peruvians. Mr. Ghersi noted to me in a phone interview on Monday that the more populated south has not participated as much in the country's economic growth. Moreover, Peruvian public education is controlled by a far-left teachers union that holds private ownership and profits to be almost criminal. With more than half the voters under the age of 25, the poll numbers are not surprising.

With the Shining Path now reportedly beginning to dominate the lucrative coca growing business among the indigenous population -- an important constituency for Ollanta, as it is for Bolivia's Evo Morales -- there is cause for grave concerns about regional stability.

There is still a chance that Ollanta will lose. And even if he wins, he will not have a bonanza as large as the one Chávez derives from high oil prices. But what is nearly certain, if he makes it to the presidency, is that his tenure will increase property-rights insecurity and damage Peru's recent growth spurt. There can be no doubt that Peruvians face a crucial choice next month and that another Latin country is in danger of succumbing to yet another bout of corporatist authoritarianism.

Democracy Isn't 'Western' (WSJ)

By Amartya Sen

The Wall Street Journal, March 24, 2006

"The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars, but in ourselves, that we are underlings." Culture too, like our stars, is often blamed for our failures. Attempts to build a better world capsize, it is alleged, in the high sea of cultural resistance. The determinism of culture is increasingly used in contemporary global discussions to generate pessimism about the feasibility of a democratic state, or of a flourishing economy, or of a tolerant society, wherever these conditions do not already obtain.

Indeed, cultural stereotyping can have great effectiveness in fixing our way of thinking. When there is an accidental correlation between cultural prejudice and social observation (no matter how casual), a theory is born, and it may refuse to die even after the chance correlation has vanished without trace. For example, labored jokes against the Irish, which have had such currency in England, had the superficial appearance of fitting well with the depressing predicament of the Irish economy when it was doing quite badly. But when the Irish economy started growing astonishingly rapidly, for many years faster than any other European economy, the cultural stereotyping and its allegedly profound economic and social relevance were not junked as sheer rubbish. Theories have lives of their own, quite defiantly of the phenomenal world that can be actually observed.

Many have observed that in the '60s South Korea and Ghana had similar income per head, whereas within 30 years the former grew to be 15 times richer than the latter. This comparative history is immensely important to study and causally analyze, but the temptation to put much of the blame on Ghanaian or African culture (as is done by as astute an observer as Samuel Huntington) calls for some resistance. Mr. Huntington closes his contrast with a spectacular formula: "South Koreans valued thrift, investment, hard work, education, organization and discipline. Ghanaians had different values. In short, cultures count." Ghanaians, and perhaps many other Africans, seem doomed to stagnate, according to this analysis.

In fact, that cultural story is extremely deceptive. There were many important differences, other than any differences in cultural predispositions, between Ghana and Korea in the 1960s. First, the class structures in the two countries were quite different, with a very much bigger -- and proactive -- role of business classes in Korea. Second, the politics were very different, too, with the government in South Korea eager to play a prime-moving role in initiating societal reform and economic development in a way that was not true in Ghana. Third, the close relationship between the Korean economy and Japan, on the one hand, and the U.S., on the other, made a big difference, at least in the early stages of Korean economic expansion.

Fourth -- and perhaps most important -- by the 1960s South Korea had acquired a much higher literacy rate and a much more expanded school system than Ghana had. Korean massive progress in school education had been largely brought about in the post-World War II period, mainly through resolute public policy, and it could not be seen just as a reflection of cultural difference. This is not to suggest that cultural factors are irrelevant to the process of development, but they do not work in isolation from social, political and economic influences. Nor are they immutable.

The temptation of founding economic pessimism on cultural resistance is matched by the evident enchantment, even more common today, of basing political pessimism, particularly about democracy, on alleged cultural impossibilities. While it is easy enough to understand the widespread -- and increasing -- doubts about armed intervention allegedly aimed at jump-starting democracy in Iraq through largely foreign and military planning, it would be quite a leap from there to become skeptical of the general possibility of the emergence of democracy in any country that is currently nondemocratic. It is worth remembering that democracy has developed well enough in many countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and in the case of some, such as South Africa, even foreign assistance to local democratic movements (for example through economic boycott) has positively helped.

When it is asked whether Western countries can "impose" democracy on the non-Western world, even the language reflects a confusion centering on the idea of "imposition," since it implies a proprietary belief that democracy "belongs" to the West, taking it to be a quintessentially "Western" idea which has originated and flourished exclusively in the West. This is a thoroughly misleading way of understanding the history and the contemporary prospects of democracy.

Democracy, to use the old Millian phrase, is "government by discussion," and voting is only one part of a broader picture (an understanding that has, alas, received little recognition in post-intervention Iraq in the attempt to get straight to polling without the development of broad public reasoning and an independent civil society). There can be no doubt at all that the modern concepts of democracy and of public reasoning have been very deeply influenced by European and American analyses and experiences over the last few centuries (including the contributions of such theorists of democracy as Marquis de Condorcet, Jefferson, Madison and Tocqueville). But to extrapolate backward from these comparatively recent experiences to construct a quintessential and long-run dichotomy between the West and non-West would be deeply misleading. There is a long history of public reasoning across the world, and while it has gone through ups and downs everywhere, the sharp priority of liberal tolerance that has emerged in the West over the past three centuries reflects how social evolution can strengthen and consolidate one tendency to the exclusion -- or near exclusion -- of other tendencies.

The belief in the allegedly "Western" nature of democracy is often linked to the early practice of voting and elections in Greece, especially in Athens. Democracy involves more than balloting, but even in the history of voting there would be a classificatory arbitrariness in defining civilizations in largely racial terms. In this way of looking at civilizational categories, no great difficulty is seen in considering the descendants of, say, Goths and Visigoths as proper inheritors of the Greek tradition ("they are all Europeans," we are told). But there is reluctance in taking note of the Greek intellectual links with other civilizations to the east or south of Greece, despite the greater interest that the Greeks themselves showed in talking to Iranians, or Indians, or Egyptians (rather than in chatting up the Ostrogoths).

Since traditions of public reasoning can be found in nearly all countries, modern democracy can build on the dialogic part of the common human inheritance. In his autobiography, Nelson Mandela describes how influenced he was, as a boy, by seeing the democratic nature of the proceedings of the meetings that were held in his home town: "Everyone who wanted to speak did so. It was democracy in its purest form. There may have been a hierarchy of importance among the speakers, but everyone was heard, chief and subject, warrior and medicine man, shopkeeper and farmer, landowner and laborer." Mr. Mandela could combine his modern ideas about democracy with emphasizing the supportive part of the native tradition, in a way that Gandhi had done in India, and that is the way cultures adapt and develop to respond to modernity. Mr. Mandela's quest for democracy and freedom did not emerge from any Western "imposition."

Similarly, the history of Muslims includes a variety of traditions, not all of which are just religious or "Islamic" in any obvious sense. The work of Arab and Iranian mathematicians, from the eighth century onward reflects a largely nonreligious tradition. Depending on politics, which varied between one Muslim ruler and another, there is also quite a history of tolerance and of public discussion, on which the pursuit of a modern democracy can draw. For example, the emperor Saladin, who fought valiantly for Islam in the Crusades in the 12th century, could offer, without any contradiction, an honored place in his Egyptian royal court to Maimonides, as that distinguished Jewish philosopher fled an intolerant Europe. When, at the turn of the 16th century, the heretic Giordano Bruno was burned at the stake in Campo dei Fiori in Rome, the Great Mughal emperor Akbar (who was born a Muslim and died a Muslim) had just finished, in Agra, his large project of legally codifying minority rights, including religious freedom for all, along with championing regular discussions between followers of Islam, Hinduism, Jainism, Judaism, Zoroastrianism and other beliefs (including atheism).

Cultural dynamics does not have to build something from absolutely nothing, nor need the future be rigidly tied to majoritarian beliefs today or the power of the contemporary orthodoxy. To see Iranian dissidents who want a fully democratic Iran not as Iranian advocates but as "ambassadors of Western values" would be to add insult to injury, aside from neglecting parts of Iranian history (including the practice of democracy in Susa or Shushan in southwest Iran 2,000 years ago). The diversity of the human past and the freedoms of the contemporary world give us much more choice than cultural determinists acknowledge. This is particularly important to emphasize since the illusion of cultural destiny can extract a heavy price in the continued impoverishment of human lives and liberties.

Mr. Sen, the 1998 Nobel laureate in economics, is the author of "Identity and Violence: The Illusion of Destiny," published next week by Norton.

Genocide's Neighbors (WP)

The Washington Post, March 24, 2006

AMONTH AGO President Bush called for doubling the peacekeeping force in the Sudanese region of Darfur and expanding the role of NATO countries in bolstering it. Since then, the case for intervention has only grown stronger: There have been fresh reports of death-squad attacks on civilians in Darfur and of violence spilling into neighboring Chad. But the odds of deploying a serious peace force have receded, despite the president's words. The reason is that Sudan's government, the chief sponsor of Sudan's genocide, has threatened violent resistance to a muscular deployment. And Sudan's bluster carries more weight than Mr. Bush's statements.

How can a weak African government get the better of a U.S. president? By persuading fellow governments to believe, or pretend to believe, that replacing the existing African Union troops in Darfur with a larger United Nations peace force would amount to a neocolonialist infringement of Sudanese sovereignty. Needless to say, this is absurd: The United Nations is not an imperialist front. The peacekeepers' purpose would be to save African lives. And the United Nations already has peacekeepers deployed in southern Sudan with the consent of the northern government. But the Sudanese nonetheless persuaded North African members of the African Union, notably Libya, Ethiopia and Egypt, to oppose a beefed-up U.N. force. Sudan's chief negotiator at the desultory Darfur peace talks accused African governments that supported a U.N. deployment of wanting to create "masters in the West and slaves in Africa."

It's a sobering reflection on rich countries' reputation that this sort of clash-of-civilizations broadside can work; it's outrageous that Egypt, a major recipient of U.S. foreign assistance, should lend a sympathetic ear to it. But Sudan's poisonous rhetoric persuaded the African Union to go back on previous indications that it would embrace an early transfer of responsibility from its own peacekeepers. The Africans now say that the earliest possible transfer of authority to the United Nations would be in September.

So Mr. Bush's call for a more serious deployment has been buried for the moment. No peacekeeping force is going to be strong enough to shoot its way into Darfur to establish peace; it will require some form of assent from Sudan's government. The way to get that assent is to put diplomatic pressure on Sudan, above all by achieving a consensus within the African Union in favor of a U.N. deployment. Now that there is no such consensus, the Sudanese feel free to threaten to turn Sudan into a "graveyard" for foreign fighters, and to underline the message by harassing foreign aid workers in Darfur. In the absence of effective peacekeepers, a senior U.N. official recently predicted "massively increased mortality."

Even if a U.N. deployment is off the table until this fall, the United States and its allies have other options. They can press for the enlargement of the existing African Union force and support it with better equipment and logistics. They can enforce a no-fly zone in Darfur, preventing Sudanese government helicopters from supporting ground attacks by the Janjaweed death squads. And they can demand that neighboring countries such as Libya and Egypt support these actions. Don't these Muslim countries care about the genocidal slaughter of Muslims?

President Bush Calls For A Civil, Responsible Debate On Comprehensive Immigration Reform. "'It's important that we have a serious debate, one that discusses the issues. <http://www.latimes.com/news/printedition/asection/la-na-immig24mar24,1, 3757711.story?coll=la-news-a_section> But I urge members of Congress and I urge people who like to comment on this issue to make sure the rhetoric is in accord with our traditions,' Bush said after meeting with supporters of his immigration proposal. 'When we conduct this debate, it must be done in a civil way. It must be done in a way that brings dignity to the process. It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another.'" 7.2 Million People Sign Up For Medicare Prescription Drug Benefit Since Beginning Of The Year. "About 1.9 million elderly and disabled people signed up for the new Medicare drug benefit over the past month, meaning 7.2 million have taken steps to enroll since the program began Jan. 1 <http://news.yahoo.com/s/ap/20060323/ap_on_go_ca_st_pe/drugs_enrollment& printer=1;_ylt=AsVQ0TTeNYE41eeMCzoo8lCWwvIE;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN 0bWE> . The number should keep rising, the program's chief says. An additional 20 million people have been enrolled automatically because they participate in other government programs, such as Medicaid, or because they have drug coverage through their former employer. ...
'Since January, we've seen a steady, increasing rate of enrollment, and we expect to continue seeing that until May 15,' Mark McClellan, administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, said Thursday." Existing-Home Sales Beat Expectations. "Sales of existing homes unexpectedly surged <http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/24/business/24econ.html?pagewanted=print > in February after falling for five months in a row, the National Association of Realtors reported yesterday, reflecting a lift related to unseasonably warm weather and signaling that the housing market is healthier than some experts had suggested. Sales climbed 5.2 percent last month, to an annual pace of 6.91 million homes, after falling 8.9 percent in the previous five months. The nationwide median price - the point at which half the homes sold for more and half for less - climbed 10.6 percent from a year earlier, to $209,000." (Vikas Bajaj, "Defying Trend, An Upturn In Home Sales," The New York Times, 3/24/06)

Acting Director R. David Paulison Says FEMA Is Preparing For Hurricane Season. "'The major lesson we learned is that FEMA was not ready to handle a catastrophe the size of Katrina, and we now know we have to be ready to respond to a major catastrophe such as an earthquake or terrorist attack, to evacuate hundreds of thousands or millions of people and be able to feed them, house them, and take care of them.

Speaking To The Press, Secretary Rumsfeld Discusses Political Progress In Iraq. "Since Iraqis cast ballots in those elections to pave the way for forming a new government, Iraqi leaders have been unable to finish the job. U.S. leaders have urged them to create a government distributing power among the rival Shi'ites, Sunnis and Kurds. 'A good government, a competent government, a government that's seen as inclusive and seen as governing from the center, that gets about the task of serving the Iraqi people ... Mystery document in wiretap suit sent to Seattle for safekeeping

By TIM FOUGHT The Associated Press

PORTLAND, Ore. (AP) — A secret document in an Oregon lawsuit challenging President Bush's domestic wiretapping program will be held in a secure facility in Seattle while the judge and lawyers try to figure out how to keep it under wraps in Portland.

U.S. District Judge Garr King decided this week that the document couldn't be held securely in a federal courthouse in Portland, and shouldn't be held at the local office of the FBI, a defendant in the case.

In a telephone conference that offered few clues about the document, King said it would go to a secure facility at the U.S. attorney's office in Seattle, but he hoped it eventually could be edited and held in Oregon as the suit progresses.

A government lawyer said, however, the document would be so black with redactions that it couldn't be understood.

A transcript of the telephone conference was made available to The Associated Press by Steven Goldberg, a civil rights attorney who filed the lawsuit last February.

The lawsuit alleges that the National Security Agency illegally wiretapped electronic communications between a local chapter of the Al-Haramain Islamic Foundation and Wendell Belew and Asim Ghafoor, both attorneys in Washington, D.C.

It contends the NSA did not follow procedures required by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA, and failed to obtain a court order authorizing electronic surveillance of the charity and its attorneys. Lawyers for the plaintiffs have said they can't spell out the facts that support their suit because those details are classified.

The conference over the document arose because the FBI office is the only place in Portland that has a facility that meets specifications for what the government calls "sensitive compartmented information," according to the telephone conference transcript.

Such secure rooms, called SCIFs, often are used in trials dealing with classified information. They are overseen by court security officers who monitor lawyers reviewing documents. Lawyers generally aren't allowed to copy anything or take notes out.

Goldberg said it would be inappropriate for the FBI to have custody because "we're dealing with a document that may involve criminal behavior by that defendant."

Anthony Coppolino of the U.S. Justice Department said the document wouldn't be altered if the FBI had it and said King could have it in a closed envelope, perhaps signing the seal to guard against unauthorized opening.

The judge, however, said the FBI wouldn't be a suitable custodian.

"I'm not indicating there would be any problem with them, but they are a defendant so I don't think it's appropriate that they have custody of it," King said.

But the judge also decided against the idea of constructing a special secure facility for the case after Coppolino said "these facilities cost thousands, if not millions, and take months and months to create."

King expressed hope that he and others could consult with security experts and "the originator" of the document "to see if something less secure would be satisfactory."

Coppolino told King that editing the document wouldn't be possible "without redactions of the document to the point where the content wouldn't be — would not be understandable."

In a separate development, The Oregonian newspaper reported Thursday that it had filed suit last week seeking documents in the case.

"If the government is committing crimes against its citizens, the public is entitled to know the nature of the crimes," said the newspaper's attorney, Charles Hinkle.

Arar seeks probe of secret U.S. flights

COLIN FREEZE

Maher Arar has told European legislators that he wants Canadian politicians to be more like them and probe secret U.S. flights that whisk terrorism suspects away to harsh prison conditions.

"I can only hope that the Canadian government will follow your example and look into the question of whether the CIA flights that flew over or stopped in Canada carried persons who were victims of serious human-rights violations," Mr. Arar told a European Parliament committee in Brussels yesterday.

The Parliament assembled a committee this year to probe concerns that U.S. agencies are perpetrating human-rights abuses abroad. Europeans are particularly troubled by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and its covert practice of "extraordinary rendition," which involves U.S. agents snatching terrorism suspects and flying them to other countries for harsh, even torturous, interrogation sessions.

In his first trip abroad since he returned to Canada three years ago, Mr. Arar told the committee he was victimized by the CIA.

"I am a victim of extraordinary rendition," the 36-year-old Ottawa resident said, describing how he was suddenly arrested in a New York airport before being sent to a tiny, squalid cell in Syria where he was detained for 10 months.

Canadians know well Mr. Arar's account of being falsely labelled an al-Qaeda terrorist and being beaten with electric cables until he made false confessions.

Because Europe is less familiar with the case, Mr. Arar's address to the committee was very similar to the televised statement he read shortly after returning to Canada from Syria in 2003. "I am not a terrorist. I am not a member of al-Qaeda and I do not know anyone who belongs to this group," he repeated yesterday.

However, Mr. Arar did elaborate on some elements of his ordeal that would be of interest to Europeans. For example, he said the "small, luxurious jet" that took him from the United States briefly stopped in Italy before continuing on to the Middle East.

He also said that while jailed in Syria, he met a German national also believed to be a victim of U.S. rendition.

Syrian-born Mohammed Hayden Zammar, accused of being part of the same Hamburg al-Qaeda cell the 2001 hijackers came from, was detained in Morocco and sent to Syria shortly after the al-Qaeda strike against U.S. targets on Sept. 11, 2001.

Concerns have been raised lately in Europe about German complicity in his abduction, interrogation and continued detention.

Secret flight refuelled in Italy, Arar tells EU

BRUSSELS, BELGIUM -- Maher Arar told an investigative committee of the European Parliament yesterday that he was kidnapped in New York and deported by U.S. authorities via Rome and Jordan to Syria, where he was tortured for 10 months.

Arar, an Ottawa engineer who holds dual Syrian-Canadian citizenship, was travelling on a Canadian passport when he was grabbed at a New York airport in September 2002 on his way home to Canada from vacation in Tunisia. He said he was sent to Syria for interrogation on suspicion of being a member of al-Qaida, an allegation he denied.

"I am a victim of extraordinary rendition," Arar told the EU committee. "I am not a terrorist, I don't know anyone from al-Qaida. I have never been to Afghanistan."

Arar testified to an EU parliamentary committee investigating whether CIA agents shipped prisoners through European airports to secret detention centres.

The Italian connection was of particular interest to the committee, which is investigating whether Europe's human rights treaties were violated in the alleged extra-ordinary renditions by the U.S.

Clandestine detention centres and secret flights via Europe to countries where suspects could face torture would breach the continent's human rights conventions.

Arar told the EU committee FBI agents took his passport, chained his wrists and ankles and asked him to voluntarily to go to Syria. He refused and after several days of being interrogated in New York, he said he was driven to New Jersey and put on a private jet that stopped in Rome before landing in Amman, Jordan.

"I overheard them saying they belonged to a special removal unit," he said.

Arar said he could see on the in-flight screen showing the flight's trajectory that it landed in Rome, adding he overheard officials saying the plane's next stop would be Athens, Greece. He said the plane refuelled in Rome and a tall person in a civilian suit guarded it on the tarmac.

In Syria, Arar said, he was detained in a small cell with no light and was beaten and tortured.

Arar's testimony followed that of a Kuwaiti-born German who said he was kidnapped in Macedonia and flown to Afghanistan for torture.

The EU assembly is trying to get first-hand testimony from people who say they were kidnapped by U.S. agents.

Macedonian minister refuses to collaborate in CIA Probe

By Aleander Balzan
EUOBSERVER / BRUSSELS - The Macedonian interior minister Ljubomir Mihailovski has refused to meet EU lawmakers investigating CIA activities in Europe.

"I have just learnt, to my regret, that the Macedonian Minister of the Interior, Ljubomir Mihailovski, does not want to meet the delegation of the European Parliament's temporary committee," said socialist MEP Claudio Fava in a statement.

Claudio Fava is the rapporteur of the European Parliament committee created in January to investigate alledged CIA activities in Europe.

A group of EU lawmakers were planning to visit Macedonia in April, after a German citizen of Lebanese origin claimed that he was arrested by CIA agents in Macedonia.

On 13 March, Khaled el Masri gave his testimony during a sitting of the temporary committee on the alleged activities in European countries by the CIA.

Khaled El- Masri said that he was arrested by CIA agents in Macedonia in December 2003, flown to Afghanistan and held there for months.

Following five months of alleged torture he was than declared innocent and released in Albania.

In the European Parliament, members from the main conservative group challenged his allegations and insisted that he had no proof while liberal deputies accused the conservatives of trying to undermine the work of the committee.

"To find the truth about this case and about other likely cases of 'extraordinary rendition' is both political and moral obligation for our committee or for any European country," added Mr Fava.

Allegations of illegal CIA activities in Europe were first voiced in November last year, after a Washington Post report said that the CIA used camps in Eastern European countries to interrogate terrorist suspects.

Later on, the NGO, Human Rights Watch, reconfirmed the allegations, adding that interrogation methods amounting to torture could have been used.

Washington has neither confirmed nor denied the allegations over secret prisons in Europe but has denied using or condoning torture.

Puerto Rico sues federal agencies for hindering probe into FBI raids

By LAURA N. PEREZ SANCHEZ

Associated Press Writer

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico_Puerto Rico's Justice Department sued\l "l" U.S\l "l". federal authorities on Thursday for allegedly obstructing an investigation into the death of Filiberto Ojeda Rios, a militant independence activist who died in a September shootout with the FBI.

The suit names FBI Director Robert Mueller III, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and the directors of their departments' respective offices in Puerto Rico.

The department also alleged that FBI agents used pepper spray on journalists while they covered a raid on a separatist group in February.

"The FBI's position to refuse to provide the names of the agents and the other officials in question constitutes an impermissible interference," with the bilateral pact governing Puerto Rico's status, said Roberto Sanchez Ramos, chief of Puerto Rico's Justice Department.

Sanchez had asked for a congressional investigation into the two raids.

Many people in the U.S. Caribbean territory have criticized the FBI after the slaying of Ojeda at a farmhouse in southeastern Puerto Rico. He was wanted for the 1983 robbery of a Wells Fargo armored truck depot in West Hartford, Connecticut.

The FBI said Ojeda shot at agents first, but his widow said the FBI fired the first rounds.

In the February raid, agents searched five homes and a business to thwart what the agency said was a "domestic terrorist attack" planned by militants favoring independence for Puerto Rico.

Meatpacker sues over mad cow testing

By Libby Quaid

AP Food and Farm Writer

A Kansas meatpacker sued the government Thursday for refusing to let the company test for mad cow disease in every animal it slaughters.

Creekstone Farms Premium Beef says it has Japanese customers who want comprehensive testing. The Agriculture Department threatened criminal prosecution if Creekstone did the tests, according to the company's lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court in Washington.

"We're not in any way saying that U.S. beef isn't safe; we believe it's the safest beef supply in the world, but that's not the issue," chief executive John Stewart said at a news conference.

"We're talking about consumers, and consumers want the product tested," Stewart said.

Testing for mad cow disease in the United States is controlled by the department, which tests about 1 percent of the 35 million cattle, or about 350,000, that are slaughtered each year. The department is planning to reduce that level of testing.

Stewart said he was surprised at the plan to scale back testing. "Given the concerns internationally, I'm not so sure that's the right thing to do."

Private companies certified by the department make screening tests used to detect mad cow disease. The department says it has sole authority over the sale and use of the tests.

Department officials say they oppose 100 percent testing because it does not ensure food safety. The disease is difficult to detect in younger animals, which are the source of most beef.

Larger meatpackers worry that insistence from Japanese buyers would force them to do testing and that a suspect result might scare consumers away from eating beef.

It would cost about $20 per animal to do the tests, adding about 10 cents per pound to the cost of meat, according to Stewart.

Japan tests nearly all its cattle for mad cow disease. While individual companies there may want more testing in the U.S., Japan's government is not asking the U.S. to do the same.

For now, Japan has halted American beef shipments because inspectors in January found cuts of U.S. veal containing backbone, which is banned in Japan even though it's eaten in the U.S.

Japan had only recently lifted a ban on American beef imposed after the first U.S. case of mad cow disease in 2003. Until then, Japan was the top foreign buyer of American beef, accounting for around $1.4 billion in sales in 2003.

Creekstone cut production and laid off about 150 employees at its Arkansas City, Kan., plant because of the ban.

Stewart said Creekstone's customers understand the limitations of the tests. He added that he expects Japan to reopen its market regardless of whether Creekstone is allowed to test its cattle.

The medical name for mad cow disease, a brain-wasting ailment, is bovine spongiform encephalopathy, or BSE. In Humans, eating meat products contaminated with BSE is linked to more than 150 deaths worldwide, mostly in Britain, from a deadly human nerve disorder, variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease.

There have been three cases of mad cow disease in the U.S. The first, in December 2003 in Washington state, was in a cow that had been imported from Canada. The second, last June, was in a Texas-born cow. The third was confirmed last week in an Alabama cow.

Japan has had two dozen cases of BSE.

CORPORATE CRIME REPORTER

March 23, 2006

Grayson: Political Fix in on Prosecution of Custer Battles – Fried Frank Motion to Dismiss – $2 Million

Scott Custer and Mike Battles are now the poster boys of Iraq fraud.

Earlier this month, a federal jury in Alexandria, Virginia hit the two and their defense contracting firm – Custer Battles – with a $10 million verdict for ripping off the federal government on Iraq contracts.

The case was filed under the False Claims Act by Robert J. Isakson and William D. "Pete" Baldwin, two whistleblowers who used to work for Custer Battles.

Isakson and Baldwin were represented by Alan Grayson.

Back in February 2004, when the case was filed, Custer Battles hired corporate America's favorite False Claims Act defense attorney – Fried Frank's Jack Boese – to defend the case.

Grayson now says that Boese and Fried Frank delivered a motion to dismiss the False Claims Act complaint – and charged Custer Battles $2 million.

How does he know this?

"Scott Custer told us at a settlement conference that Mr. Boese charged $2 million for a motion to dismiss," Grayson said. "Custer wouldn't pay it. And Boese decided to leave the case."

Boese was replaced by Custer's University of Vermont buddy Robert Rhoad – now a partner in the D.C. office of Porter Wright Morris & Arthur.

Did the $2 million fee strike Grayson as high?

"Yes," Grayson said. "It strikes me as very high. I don't believe we have ever charged that much for an entire case, start to finish."

We asked Boese about the fee and he sent us an e-mail: "We do not comment on client matters."

Rhoad said that motions to dismiss are still pending.

If Judge T.S. Ellis III denies the motions, then Custer Battles intends to appeal to the Fourth Circuit.

As for Grayon's claim that Boese billed $2 million and that this led to a change of defense attorney, Rhoad said "Mr. Grayson is wrong."

"His comments regarding the reasons for the change in counsel are completely inaccurate," Rhoad said. "There were a host of timing and tactical considerations, which led Mr. Custer to believe that there would be a better fit with my firm."

"I was at the settlement and didn't hear Custer say anything like that," Rhoad said. "I do not believe that Mr. Custer ever said it. Mr. Custer thought Fried Frank was great up to the pre-trial stage. He felt the fit was better with our firm."

"I have no idea what he was billed," Rhoad said. "I don't believe that he was billed $2 million for a motion to dismiss. Fried Frank represented them for at least eight months. I'm almost 100 percent certain that Mr. Custer did not make that representation, although legal costs came into play."

Custer Battles was the only one of dozens of False Claims Act cases alleging fraud on Iraq contracts to go public.

The rest are under seal.

The cases reflect what Senator Byron Dorgan (D-ND) has called “an orgy of greed.”

The evidence in the Custer Battles case was damning.

Brigadier General Hugh Tant, was in charge of the Iraqi Currency Exchange contract – or ICE contract.

Grayson says that under that contract, Custer Battles was to provide trucks and living quarters for people doing that work.

Grayson said that Tant testified that Custer Battles delivered 36 trucks to transport currency – 34 of which did not work.

“Some of them actually had to be towed into the motor pool,” Grayson said. “The brakes on the trucks didn't work. The trucks broke down on the road with over $10 million inside of them, making some very juicy terrorist targets inside of them, as you can imagine.”

General Tant testified that when confronted with this evidence, Mike Battles is said to have responded: "You asked for trucks and we complied with our contract, and it is immaterial whether the trucks were operational."

Grayson said that also damning was a memo written by Custer Battles corporate integrity office Peter Miskovich who concluded that Custer Battles own documents were “prima facie evidence of a course of conduct consistent with criminal activity and intent."

Grayson wants a criminal prosecution of the Custer Battles defendants.

He says that federal agents assigned to the case want a criminal prosecution.

He says the Defense Department wants a criminal prosecution.

He says that the assistant U.S. Attorney assigned to the case – Richard Sponseller in Alexandria – told Grayson that “the case was being declined by the government because a decision had been made downtown, as he put it – downtown could be the Justice Department, the White House – he didn't specify – a decision had been made downtown that cheating the Coalition Provisional Authority was not the same as cheating the U.S. government.”
“We took away from the conversation that the White House had decided to get rid of the case because it was a case involving Coalition Provisional Authority contracts,” Grayson said.

Did Sponseller say it was a political decision?

“He did not say it was a political decision,” Grayson said. “But it was clear from the course of the conversation that it was not a legal decision.”

Grayson believes a political fix is in.

“Mike Battles ran for Congress in 2002,” Grayson said. “His first and one of his largest single campaign contributors was Haley Barbour, the head of the Republican Party. Another large contributor was Fred Malek, from Nixon enemies list fame and who was George Bush's campaign manager.. . .The idea that there is no political element in this decision not to prosecute Mike Battles is silly.”

Has anybody in the government ever told you the political fix was in?

“No,” Grayson said. “But as Sherlock Holmes said – when you have eliminated the impossible, whatever remains must be true. There is no other explanation here.”

Hospital Operator Subpoenaed: Possible healthcare fraud probed by feds

Marc B. Geller

The Monitor, McAllen, Texas

Mar. 24--McALLEN -- The company that runs several hospitals in the Rio Grande Valley was subpoenaed in connection with a Medicaid and Medicare\l "l" fraud\l "l" investigation.

Universal Health Services Inc. publicly disclosed the Nov. 21 subpoena for the first time in an annual report it filed last week with the federal Securities and Exchange Commission.

The subpoena came from the Office of the Inspector General of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services and included the company's South Texas Health System subsidiary. The health system operations include McAllen Medical Center, McAllen Heart Hospital and Edinburg Regional Medical Center.

"The Civil Division of the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston, Texas has indicated that the subpoena is part of an investigation under the False\l "l" Claims\l "l" Act\l "l"," the company said.

Dan McLean, CEO of South Texas Health System, said he has received no indication that UHS or South Texas Health System are targets of the investigation and denied any wrongdoing.

"We've asked the question whether we're a target and so on and have been told no," he said, adding that authorities have not given any clues as to who or what the target might be. "They play these things pretty close to the vest while they do their investigations."

UHS disclosed in its report that federal authorities are investigating compliance with the Medicare and Medicaid rules, as well as regulations relating to the employment of physicians and the solicitation of patient referrals from physicians during the period from Jan. 1, 1999, to the date of the subpoena.

The False\l "l" Claims\l "l" Act\l "l" provides for liability for triple damages and a penalty from $5,500 to $11,000 per claim for anyone who knowingly submits a false or fraudulent claim to the United States.

The Health and Human Services Department's Office of the Inspector General and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston declined to comment on the ongoing investigation.

McLean said the health system continues to cooperate with the probe.

He said the original request was for "anything that had to do with physician recruitment and physician contracting," including medical directorships.

McLean added the investigation has had no impact on patient care, customer service or facility operations.

"We haven't changed one thing we were doing," he said. "In these kinds of things I guess no news is good news."

Parent company UHS, one of the largest for-profit hospital operators in the United States, affirmed in the annual report that it is cooperating in the investigation and providing documents responsive to the subpoena.

"Because the law in this area is complex and constantly evolving, governmental investigation or litigation may result in interpretations that are inconsistent with industry practices, including ours," the company said.

UHS described the matter in its report as being "at an early stage" and said that it was unable to assess any potential financial exposure.

"Our substantial Medicare, Medicaid and other governmental billings may result in heightened scrutiny of our operations. It is possible that governmental entities could initiate additional investigations or litigation in the future and that such matters could result in significant penalties as well as adverse publicity," the company said.

"It is also possible that our executives and managers could be included in governmental investigations or litigation or named as defendants in private litigation."

UHS said in the report that government action has increased with respect to investigations and allegations concerning possible violations of fraud, abuse and false claims laws and regulations by health care providers.

"Providers that are found to have violated these laws and regulations may be excluded from participating in government healthcare programs, subjected to fines or penalties or required to repay amounts received from government for previously billed patient services," the company said.

Shares of UHS closed Thursday on the New York Stock Exchange at $49.12, which compares to a 52-week low of $44.50 and a 52-week high of $63.74.

GRASSLEY: CMS SHOULD ENSURE STATE CLAIMS LAWS ALLOW QUI\l "l" TAM\l "l" CASES

A battle over how to interpret Medicaid fraud language in the Deficit Reduction Act (DRA) is percolating, with Senate Finance Committee chair Chuck Grassleys (R-IA) asking CMS and the Department of Justice (DOJ) to ensure that states passing false\l "l" claims\l "l" acts\l "l" (FCAs) designed to reap greater state recoveries from fraud-related settlements "do not undermine" the ability of whistleblowers to file lawsuits and collect the proceeds. But state lawmakers who are drafting FCAs say that the DRA is unclear on this issue and CMS should allow states to collect the extra recoveries unless the agency issues additional guidance or courts set precedent.

The newly enacted DRA provides an incentive for states to pass their own Medicaid FCAs by increasing states' shares of recoveries from false claims suits. But Grassley is concerned that some states may be cutting off the ability of whistleblowers to instigate such suits by excluding so-called qui\l "l" tam\l "l" language from their FCAs. Qui\l "l" tam\l "l" refers to language in the federal FCA that allows whistleblowers to bring lawsuits on behalf of the government and share in the recoveries.

Grassley, in his letter to CMS and DOJ, says "some states" drafting Medicaid FCAs are using language that deviates from "the requirements" outlined in the DRA, especially a provision that requires states wanting to receive extra recoveries to include language in their FCAs that is "at least as effective in rewarding and facilitating qui\l "l" tam\l "l" actions for false or fraudulent claims" as those described in the federal FCA.

For states to claim the extra recoveries, their FCAs must at the least contain a qui\l "l" tam\l "l" mechanism for whistleblowers, facilitate a system for whistleblowers to file suit on behalf of the government, and reward a qui\l "l" tam\l "l" whistleblower with a portion of the recoveries, Grassley contends.

Grassley is "aware" that there are concerns about the wording of FCAs drafts in New York state, which NY Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has called out of compliance with DRA language, a Grassley spokesperson said. However, Grassley's letter is "not a direct reply" to any particular state FCA proposal, she added. Instead, Grassley wants to "make sure that all states have fair notice as to the requirements so as to comply and receive the increased state share of recoveries."

The DRA specifically decreases the federal medical assistance percentage, on which the federal government's share of FCA-related recoveries is based, by 10 points for states that have passed FCAs, leaving more for states involved in these settlements -- a potential financial windfall for states that could be in the millions. States currently receive cuts of between 25 and 50 percent of such recoveries, depending on the state.

Currently, 16 states have passed Medicaid FCAs, while three -- Kansas, Missouri and New York -- are working on legislation, according to watchdog group Taxpayers Against Fraud (TAF).

According to TAF, 80 percent of FCA-related lawsuits are currently brought by whistleblowers -- partly because government agencies are understaffed and unable to investigate all leads.

In New York state, a Senate FCA draft currently debated as part of the state's fiscal year 2006 budget conference has no qui\l "l" tam\l "l" provision at all, while the Assembly version amends federal qui\l "l" tam\l "l" language in a way that would allow the attorney general to decline whistleblower cases and courts to reduce whistleblower rewards.

Another suggestion on the table, according to a source close to the issue, is to require whistleblowers to try to have companies correct their fraud before a qui\l "l" tam\l "l" lawsuit can be filed.

New York state lawmakers are confident that, unless CMS clears up what they say is ambiguous language in the DRA, the agency will have to grant the state extra recoveries from FCA-related settlements if FCA language passes with the state budget next week.

A source with a key New York state senator said that the proposed New York language makes sense because it prevents frivolous lawsuits that clog the courts and settlements where a whistleblower who was involved in fraudulent activities that were investigated shares in the recoveries. Also, the staffer noted, the New York state senate has traditionally opposed the creation of private "rights of action."

Sponsors of the New York legislation, which would also create an Office of Medicaid Inspector General, increase civil and criminal penalties for people committing Medicaid fraud, and give local governments and district attorneys additional powers to go after potential fraud, estimate that it would save New York's $46 billion Medicaid program -- the largest in the nation -- $2.3 billion annually.

"It's a judgment call by CMS on whether states' FCAs are 'at least as effective' as the federal FCA," the source close to the issue said. "That's not something you can measure quantitatively. States must be allowed some leeway."

Dismissal of suit against FBI upheld

The US Court of Appeals for the First Circuit yesterday upheld the dismissal of a $120 million lawsuit that had been brought against the FBI by a couple who were forced in 1984 to sell their liquor store to notorious gangster and longtime FBI informant James "Whitey" Bulger.

The court agreed with a district court judge who tossed out the suit last year after finding that Stephen Rakes and his former wife, Julie Dammers, waited too long to file their suit. The appeals court found that Rakes and Dammers didn't file a claim until May 11, 2001, even though they had known for more than two years about the FBI's relationship with Bulger.

The Morning Update

Today, President Bush will attend a naturalization ceremony and watch as a group of immigrants become new citizens of the United States. The President will also discuss his vision for comprehensive immigration reform that secures America's borders, improves enforcement of immigration laws, and upholds our values.

From Today's Morning Headlines

In Weekly Radio Address, President Bush Calls For Comprehensive Immigration Reform. "With the Senate poised for an emotional debate on immigration law this week, President Bush called Saturday for an immigration policy that embraces some foreign workers while increasing security at the nation's borders. 'America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society. We can do both at the same time, <http://www.latimes.com/news/nationworld/nation/la-na-bush26mar26,1,2342
445,print.story?coll=la-headlines-nation> ' Bush said in his weekly radio address, which he devoted to a subject that has divided his party and the nation. The president repeated his call for a guest-worker program that would 'create a legal way to match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill jobs that Americans will not do.'" (Faye Fiore, "U.S. Can Be 'Welcoming,' 'Lawful,'" Los Angeles Times, 3/26/06)

Seniors Benefiting From The Medicare Prescription Drug Program. "Those who have signed up say the total cost of all their drugs under Medicare is often less than the amount they were paying for just one prescription in the past.
<http://www.nytimes.com/2006/03/26/national/26medicare.html?_r=1&pagewan
ted=print&oref=slogin> Mary N. Hooser, 89, of Sapulpa, Okla., takes eight medications for heart disease, ulcers, depression and early signs of Alzheimer's disease. Her children had been chipping in to cover the cost, $476 a month, including $155 for the Alzheimer's drug. Under Medicare, the cost for all her drugs is less than $100 a month. 'This is a tremendous help to my mother and me,' said Mrs. Hooser's 73-year-old daughter, Mary L. Ward." (Robert Pear, "For Some Who Solve Puzzle, Medicare Drug Plan Pays Off," The New York Times, 3/26/06)

Durable Goods Orders Increase By Largest Amount In Three Months.
"Orders to U.S. factories for big-ticket manufactured goods rose in February by the largest amount in three months <http://abcnews.go.com/Business/print?id=1763663> , propelled by soaring demand for civilian aircraft. The Commerce Department reported that durable goods orders increased by 2.6 percent last month, double the gain that economists had been expecting. The strength was concentrated in a huge 52.5 percent increase in orders for commercial aircraft, which reflected a rebound after a 70.1 percent drop in January aircraft orders." (Martin Crutsinger, "Orders For Manufactured Goods Rise In Feb.," The Associated Press, 3/24/06)

Secretary Rice Discusses Political Progress In Iraq. SEC. RICE: "What the Iraqis are also doing, though, is that they are developing a program by which this national government will actually govern. They are developing rules and institutions that they will use to govern, and they are looking at what jobs will be held by whom. So this is a complicated process that is likely to push them very much further forward once it is completed than just having people identified as prime minister and defense minister and so forth. ... Now, everybody is putting considerable pressure on the Iraqis to get this done and to get it done quickly, but we do have to understand what's really going on here.

They're not just dividing up jobs. They really are developing a program by which they will govern, and they are creating the institutions by which they will govern." (Fox News' "Fox News Sunday," 3/26/06)

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley Discusses The Mission In Iraq.
HADLEY: "It's clear that the bombing and destruction of the Golden Mosque in Samarra was an enormous shock to the Iraqis. And I think they looked into the abyss of a degeneration into sectarian violence. And the interesting thing it to watch what was the response of the Iraqis to that. After about 24, 48 hours, all the principal ministers of the government and of the various religious communities came out and basically said, we don't want to go to civil war. ... Secondly, the Iraqi security forces, the army and the police, did a pretty good job.
They were out front trying to contain the violence. They did not break up along sectarian lines. They held together." (CBS' "Face The Nation," 3/26/06)

USA Today Profiles Efforts To Build Local Democratic Institutions In Iraq. "Iraqis are trying, after decades of authoritarian rule, to learn fundamentals of democracy and take control of rebuilding efforts and governance now largely handled by the United States. Empowering Iraqis to decide which streets get paved and which power plants are rebuilt increasingly is seen as vital to stabilizing the country. 'It builds confidence in government and drives a wedge between Iraqi people and terrorists and insurgents,' <http://www.usatoday.com/printedition/news/20060327/a_iraqcouncils27.art .htm> says Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, which has overseen the $21 billion, U.S.-financed rebuilding of Iraq's infrastructure." (Thomas Frank, "Basics Of Democracy Include Frustration," USA Today, 3/27/06)

In China, Secretary Gutierrez Addresses The Need To Enforce Intellectual Property Rights. "China is the biggest loser from intellectual property violations and needs to stamp out piracy to build global corporate champions, U.S. Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said on Monday.
<http://news.yahoo.com/s/nm/20060327/bs_nm/trade_china_usa_dc&printer=1;
_ylt=AkqIOc64XWgfPHVPjccsODGb.HQA;_ylu=X3oDMTA3MXN1bHE0BHNlYwN0bWE>
Gutierrez was speaking in the southwestern city of Chongqing at the start of a visit to China to prepare for high-level U.S.-Chinese meetings in Washington next month. In a speech to students and businessmen, Gutierrez said widespread counterfeiting was not only harming U.S. companies but also posing a threat to China's own long-term development. 'Ironically, it is China that is most affected by violations of intellectual property rights,' he said." (Jason Subler, "China Is Biggest Loser From Copyright Piracy - U.S." Reuters, 3/27/06)

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Counter-Terrorism Surveillance Has Extended To Antiwar, Activist Groups. Under the headline "FBI Keeps Watch on Activists," The Los Angeles Times (3/27, A1, Riccardi, 958K) reports, "The FBI, while waging a highly publicized war against terrorism, has spent resources gathering information on antiwar and environmental protesters and on activists who feed vegetarian meals to the homeless," according to FBI documents obtained by the ACLU and released over recent months. But citing "the recent arrest of environmental activists accused of firebombing an unfinished ski resort in Vail," FBI spokesman Bill Carter said, "It's one thing to express an idea or such, but when you commit acts of violence in support of that activity, that's where our interest comes in." Still, ACLU of Colorado legal director Mark Silverstein said, "It certainly seems they're casting a net much more widely than would be necessary to thwart something like the blowing up of the Oklahoma City federal building."

NYTimes Says White House Should Press FBI On IT Upgrade. Under the headline "Keystone Komputers," a New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorial criticizes the FBI effort to update its computer system, noting, "After 9/11, the bureau started an urgent and very expensive program to fix the problem. But now we discover…that the search for high-tech sleuthing could take four more years and a half-billion dollars. … Most alarming of all, the inspector general concluded that even if the F.B.I. finally came up with a workable model, there would be no guarantee that it would solve the most crucial issue — agents' inability to share information with the myriad of other government departments involved in the detection of terrorism. Surely the White House should be prodding the bureau to do better."

Supreme Court Review Of Hamdan Case Raises Historic Questions. The New York Times (3/27, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports that the Supreme Court decision to review the lawsuit by Osama bin Laden's former driver, Salim Ahmed Hamdan – which challenges the plan to try him by military commission – "appeared to mark a resumption of a struggle for supremacy between the court and the White House," but "no one foresaw…that the case...would present the Supreme Court with an additional and perhaps even greater challenge. In the face of a measure that Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in late December to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over cases brought by detainees" at Guantánamo, "the court must decide whether it retains the right to proceed with this case at all. For a court that has been highly protective of its own prerogatives, but at the same time notably attentive to the often arcane limits on federal court jurisdiction, the question is one of great delicacy, infused with historical resonance."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Richey, 61K) also reports that the Hamdan case "has the potential to become one of the most important US Supreme Court decisions of this generation. It will test the scope of presidential power in the war on terror. It may clarify how detained Al Qaeda suspects are treated by the US. More broadly, it challenges the justices to further define the balance of power among the three branches of government during times of national emergency." The Washington Times (3/27, Taylor, 90K) notes, "The dispute will be the first major case involving presidential war powers since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined the court. Supreme Court scholars generally agree the legal future of the war on terrorism hinges on the case, which presents the high court with the chance to rule on the power of the executive branch to try terror suspects outside the bounds of U.S. courts."

Scalia Reportedly Said Detainees Have No Right To Civil Court Trial. USA Today (3/27, 6A, 2.31M) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the idea that detainees at Guantanamo Bay…have constitutional rights and called European concerns over the issue hypocritical, Newsweek magazine reported Sunday. 'War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts,' Scalia purportedly said in a private appearance March 8 at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland." Center for Constitutional Rights president Michael Ratner said, "If he's made up his mind on a particular issue, he shouldn't be sitting" in the Hamdan case, although "Scalia did not refer specifically to that case, Newsweek said." The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A3) notes, "The comments came just weeks before the justices are to take up an appeal from a detainee at Guantanamo Bay. The court will hear arguments tomorrow on…Hamdan's assertion that President Bush overstepped his constitutional authority in ordering a military trial for the former driver of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden."

Human Rights Group Wants Scalia To Recuse Himself From Hamdan Case. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that the Supreme Court this week will hear a case concerning whether the Bush Administration can try Gitmo detainees in special military tribunals in which the accused have limited rights. Newsweek notes that Justice Antonin Scalia "has already spoken his mind about some of the issues in the matter," dismissing "the idea that the detainees have rights under the U.S. Constitution or international conventions." The human rights group the Center for Constitutional Rights has filed a brief in behalf of the Gitmo detainees seeking Scalia's recusal from the case. Other experts "said it was a closer call. Scalia didn't refer directly to this week's case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, though issues at stake hinge in part on whether the detainees deserve legal protections that make the military tribunals unfair."

WPost Says Pentagon "Bungled" Creation Of Tribunals. The Washington Post (3/27, 744K) editorializes, "The Supreme Court hears arguments tomorrow in perhaps the most important case of the term -- a case that, had the Bush administration acted responsibly at any time in the past 4 1/2 years, would not even be in court." The Post adds, "The administration was right that some alternative form of military trial for accused terrorists captured abroad was essential," but "the military sought to design a new system from scratch," and "it has bungled. … Whatever the court decides on the law, the administration needs to fix this stillborn system."

Analysts Say US Witnesses Made Uncertain Case Against Moussaoui. Under the headline "Uncertainty Clouds Last Days Of Moussaoui's Sentencing Trial," USA Today (3/27, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Without Harry Samit, confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui might never have been arrested," but "by the time Samit left the witness stand…his testimony about repeated and unsuccessful efforts to alert superiors of Moussaoui's potential danger may prove more beneficial to the terrorist than the government. Prosecutors rested their case…but many of the government's witnesses have made it clear how difficult it may be for the government to prevail in the landmark terrorism case, legal analysts said." University of Maryland law professor Michael Greenberger observed, "It's not at all clear that had Moussaoui told them everything, the FBI would have been able to do anything."

Senate Panel Schedules Hearing On Feingold Censure Resolution. Roll Call (3/27, Brotherton) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for Friday on Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure the President for his National Security Agency domestic surveillance program, "setting up the possibility of a floor showdown." A Republican aide "indicated…that the focus of the hearing, scheduled for March 31, will be to provide a forum for debate over the merits of the proposed censure measure." Republican leaders are "eager to get Democrats on the record on the issue of censuring Bush, believing that such a vote would seriously undercut Democrats' ability to convince the electorate that they are strong on protecting America from terrorist threats."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Hong Kong Firm Defends Bid For US Port Security Contract. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/27) reports Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. "defended its plans to help scan US-bound cargo for terror threats at a port in the Bahamas where no U.S. customs agents are present." The company "added that it isn't feasible or practical for U.S. officials to work in ports across the globe. The best option for the U.S. is to rely on trusted agents using sophisticated inspection equipment to scan shipments at ports abroad, said John Meredith, group managing director for Hutchison Port Holdings, Hutchison's maritime subsidiary and the world's largest ports company."

Senate To Consider Reforms Of Foreign Investment Review Process. The Washington Times (3/27, Waterman, 90K) reports "the issue of foreign -- and especially Gulf-Arab -- ownership of U.S. critical infrastructure" will be "front and center" in the Senate. Several "competing bills in both chambers of Congress aim to reform the process by which the federal government assesses the national security implications of foreign takeovers of U.S. companies or assets." In the "wake of the derailment of the Dubai ports takeover, lawmakers' concerns threaten another acquisition by the tiny oil-rich emirate." Dubai International Capital, "an investment company owned by the emirate's ruling al-Maktoum family, signed a deal last year to acquire a privately held British aerospace company called Doncasters Group Ltd."

Experts Concerned About Security At Nuclear Research Reactors. USA Today (3/27, Diamond, 2.31M) reports that according to Linton Brooks, director of the National Nuclear Security Administration, "One-third of the world's 130 civilian nuclear research reactors lack security upgrades needed to prevent theft of materials that terrorists could use to build an atomic bomb." He told USA Today that "most of these reactors use highly enriched uranium, the easiest fuel used to make atomic bombs." Former senator Sam Nunn, who helped create the 1991 US plan to secure nuclear materials, said world "research reactor security efforts are 'at about 3' on a 1-to-10 scale with 10 being safest."

Security Lacking At Rail Depots Holding Toxic Chemicals. The New York Times (3/27, Kocieniewski, 1.19M) reports that security at the Oak Island rail depot in Newark, New Jersey "is so lax that a reporter and photographer recently spent 10 minutes driving along a rail bed beside cars holding toxic chemicals without being challenged, or even approached, by railroad employees." The Time notes Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff's announcement Tuesday of new chemical plant security proposals, but adds that "the public could be left vulnerable by the railways running in and out of many of them." Meanwhile, Chertoff's speech "made only passing reference to the risks of transporting the deadly cargo, and there is no indication that the department will require the kind of changes in equipment and procedures that security experts say will reduce the risk of a terrorist attack or catastrophic accident."

NYC Runs Drill Involving Chemical Explosion On Freight Train. The New York Times (3/27, Chan, 1.19M) reports New York City ran a four-hour simulation yesterday involving the explosion of a bomb filled with arsenic trichloride "on a freight train moving through a Queens railyard — just when a commuter train carrying weekend passengers was traveling in the other direction." The exercise, funded by $700,000 from the federal Department of Homeland Security, was "named Trifecta because it emphasized three activities: search and rescue, victim identification and handling of the dead. Despite the grim nature of the exercise — the casualties would have included 74 injured — the commissioner of emergency management, Joseph F. Bruno, said it demonstrated the effectiveness of the Citywide Incident Management System, a protocol that governs how various city agencies are to interact during a major emergency."

TSA To Begin Screening At NYC Heliport Today. USA Today (3/27, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "A new helicopter service begins whisking passengers from Wall Street to New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport today," marking "the first time the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has done screening at a heliport since the agency took over airport security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks." Federal screeners and explosive-detection equipment will be sent "to the Lower Manhattan heliport so passengers and their bags can be checked before being delivered to the airport," which Rep. Bennie Thompson calls "a serious misuse of federal monies." However, TSA official Douglas Hofsass said the move is necessary to avoid passengers and their bags "flying through the city's airspace unchecked."

New York Notifies 24 Families About Release Of 911 Call Recordings. The AP (3/27, Butler) reports New York City has "sent out letters to 24 families of people killed in the Sept. 11 attacks advising them that partial transcripts and recordings of 911 calls made by the victims soon will be released to the public because of a court order." The letters "advised only family members whose dead relatives could be identified from the calls recorded by police and fire department operators." The "imminent release of the records was ordered by a judge in a case brought by The New York Times and nine family members of victims under the state's Freedom of Information law seeking fire department records." But the letters "took some Sept. 11 family members by surprise, a family advocate said."

WAR NEWS:

Report Says Russian Ambassador Was Spying For Saddam. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that a new Pentagon report says that before the US invasion Iraq in 2003, the Russian ambassador in Baghdad "gave the Iraqi regime significant intelligence about CENTCOM's war plans." Newsweek adds, "If true, the account could complicate U.S.-Russian relations, which are already strained over Iran's nuclear program and other issues." Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service "issued a statement calling the accusation 'baseless.'" Newsweek also notes that if the Russians were giving Saddam intel, "it wasn't very good. The report says that Ambassador Vladimir Titorenko told Saddam the U.S. attack out of Kuwait was a diversion -- it wasn't -- and that the invasion wouldn't occur until mid-April, after the Fourth Infantry Division was in place in Turkey, according to the documents. That, too, was false."

Rice Says US Will Probe Possible Prewar Collusion Between Russia, Iraq. The New York Times (3/27, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "said Sunday that the United States would seek clarification from Russia of an American military report that it had helped pass information to Iraq before the 2003 invasion, but she declined to make any specific allegations about Russian involvement." Rice was quoted saying the US will "look very carefully" at documents and other evidence of Moscow-Baghdad collusion. The AP (3/26, Daniel) summarized Rice's comments on several talk shows, and reported Senator Edward Kennedy "said if the report is found to be true, the administration should reassess its relationship with Russia and reconsider President Bush's participation in a July summit meeting in St. Petersburg, Russia." The Washington Post (3/27, A12, 744K) runs a similar AP story.

The Financial Times (3/27, Daniel) reports "a US military study released by the Pentagon alleges that the Russian ambassador in Iraq provided information collected from inside the American Central Command in Doha to Saddam Hussein." The documents, from March and April 2003, "included forecasts of planned troop numbers and US tactics to focus on Baghdad, rather than to target Iraqi cities during the invasion, the study alleges." USA Today (3/27, reports, 2.31M) notes "the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service has dismissed the allegation."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert), Rice said, "I certainly think there is a lot to this report, but we really haven't had a chance to look at the documents in detail, intend to do that and then to raise it with the Russian government. I would hope the Russian government would take it seriously. … I really do think that the Russians have generally done what they said they would do. They said they were going to oppose the Iraq war and they did. And they told us that from the very beginning. … I don't want to jump to the conclusion that this was something that was ordered out of the Kremlin." Rice replied similarly on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) and CNN's late Edition (3/26, Blitzer) when asked about the reports of leaked invasion plans.

Appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger) National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said, "We know there's a document. We know that got into the hands of the Iraqis. We know that it dealt with war plans that we had. And for that reason, we take very seriously. … There are a lot of things we don't know. We don't know how they got it out of Centcom. We don't know whether what the ambassador did was authorized or not. So there are further questions that we need to raise, but it's a serious matter and we'll be talking to the Russians about it."

Sen. Pat Roberts, on CNN's Late Edition (3/26, Blitzer), said, "I'm not surprised by this. You know, we're going to have a briefing on the intelligence committee, so we'll get to the bottom of it. The Russians have already answered and said, absolutely not, this was not directed by, you know, President Putin or by Moscow. The supposition is that this was a local individual working with Iraq at that particular time."

Sen. Carl Levin, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) said, "Things like that happen with intelligence by various countries. … Anything is possible in the area of intelligence. I would not jump to any conclusion one way or the other without a much deeper investigation. But if, in fact, they did it, it, number one, wouldn't surprise me, but it would be very disgusting if they did."

US Presence In Iraq Seen As Most Important Question Facing Bush Successor. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Barnes) reports that until last week, President Bush had "avoided voicing" the reality that the US' mission in Iraq will not be completed during his administration. US News adds, "What is far from obvious, though, is the composition of that force. The American presence could look much as it does today, with the bulk of the forces being combat brigades. Or it could be that much of the infantry will be gone and that teams of advisers and trainers will make up the majority of a far smaller force." US News also notes that there will be "no getting around the reality that the U.S. presence in Iraq probably will be one of the most important questions facing Bush's successor."

Hadley Rejects Suggestion US Ought To Boycott G-8 Meeting In Russia. Asked on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger) to comment on Sen. Ted Kennedy's suggestion that the US boycott the G-8 meeting in Russia this summer, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said, "It's going to be interesting this year, because the attention of the international community is going to be focused on St. Petersburg this summer, and one of the questions they're going to raise is what about democracy in Russia? And we think this is actually a good thing. It's going to challenge Russia. It's going to challenge President Putin to make clear and answer some of the concerns that the international has raised. This is not the Soviet Union. And one of the things you have to think about is, if you want to encourage democracy in Russia, do you want to kick Russia out of all these institutions that are trying to enshrine these values that we would like to. … I think at this point we think there's a lot of value in going forward with the G-8." The Washington Times (3/27, Hudson, 90K) also notes Hadley's comments this morning.

Rice Says Iraqi Factions Making Progress Toward Unity Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on CNN's Late Edition (3/26, Blitzer) to describe the progress the Iraqis are making toward s the formation of a "government of national unity," Rice answered, "The Iraqis are working on a government of national unity. They're doing it, to be totally -- more slowly than we would hope. And we've pressed that they need to expedite because of the potential for a political vacuum. But if you look at what they're doing, they are not, as I've sometimes read, dividing the spoils of who's going to get what job. They are very involved in trying to deal with some of the most sensitive and existential issues for the new Iraq as they begin to put together a program by which the national government, the government of national unity, would actually govern."

Levin Urges Bush To Apply Further Pressure On Iraqi Parties. Sen. Carl Levin, was asked on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) for his assessment of the political situation in Iraq, Levin responded, "That there's a gridlock and that the Iraqi leaders are going to count on us to protect them, and we should make it very clear to them that we're only going to continue to be there if they work out a political compromise, and that's the message they've not received. … . Senator Collins, Jack Reed of Rhode Island and I asked the president to make it clear to the Iraqis that our continued presence in Iraq is dependent upon the Iraqis working out a broad-based political agreement."

US To Train Local Iraqi Officials. USA Today (3/27, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "Efforts to build local governments across Iraq started in 2003 when the U.S.-led occupying authority appointed community leaders to dozens of local district councils." Baghdad "has 15 councils: nine inside the city of 5 million and six on the outskirts. Each has a couple dozen unpaid members." Yesterday, US Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad "announced the creation of a US-led team to teach the Baghdad provincial council how to solicit bids for a project, accept the best offer and manage a contract. Other US-led teams have been operating in three Iraqi provinces since November. Each province is expected to have its own team by this summer, Speckhard said."

US, Iraqi Forces Clashed With Al Sadr's Shiite Militia. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Boudreaux, 958K), "At least 17 Iraqis were killed Sunday night when US and Iraqi special forces stormed a mosque and clashed with Shiite Muslim militiamen, police officials said, further inflaming the country as its leaders struggled to form a new government and stem sectarian violence." The Times adds "an Iraqi police official said the dead were Shiite worshipers at the Mustafa mosque in northeast Baghdad." The incident "is politically explosive because the mosque is a stronghold of followers of the radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Iranian-backed movement has a powerful bloc in parliament and a large sectarian militia."

ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 2, 1:40, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Radical Shiite Muslims say the men killed…were unarmed funeral mourners, who died during an unprovoked raid on a mosque by US and Iraqi forces. However, a coalition press release says US and Iraqi forces did conduct a raid tonight, but no mosques were entered or damaged. The military says 16 insurgents were killed, part of a terrorist cell responsible for conducting attacks and kidnapping Iraqi civilians. Whoever's right, this incident appears to pit the US military against the Shiite militia controlled by the fiery cleric, Muqtada al Sadr."

The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Shishkin, 2.11M) reports "the Shiite political scene is dominated by two rival forces: the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq and a movement led by radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. As the Shiites consolidated control over key levers of national power in the past year, the conflict between Sciri and the Sadr movement has grown." Tensions within the Shiite camp "show that Iraq's problems go beyond classification by sect and ethnicity." USA Today (3/27, reports, 2.31M) and the New York Times (3/27, Gettleman, 1.19M) also report on the violence.

Car Bomb Kills 15 Outside Mosul Police Recruiting Center. CNN (3/27) reports on its web site, "At least 15 people were killed outside a police recruitment center in northern Iraq Monday, when a suicide car bomber detonated, a base employee told CNN. The casualties are believed to be recruits and officers." The attack took place "at Kifak Base, which is located between Tal Afar and Mosul."

Corpses Of 30 Beheaded Iraqis Found Near Baqubah. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 3, 0:10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "One other grim note from Iraq -- 30 beheaded corpses were found today in a village near Baqubah. Authorities have no information yet on the identities of the victims or who is responsible for their deaths."

Doctor Admits To Killing At Least 35 Police Officers. The Washington Post (3/27, A12, Anderson, 744K) reports, "A doctor has admitted killing at least 35 Iraqi police officers and army soldiers by giving them lethal injections, reopening their wounds or engaging in other deadly acts while they were being treated at a hospital in the northern city of Kirkuk, according to Kurdish security sources and Kurdish television." Kurdish television "broadcast on Sunday what it said was the doctor's taped confession, in which he told police that he sympathized with the radical Sunni Arab insurgent group Ansar al-Sunna."

Author Lays Out Tactics To Eliminate Insurgency While Protecting Civilians. Author A. C. Grayling writes in the New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) that "one question that a watchful press should be asking of the American-led forces in Iraq is how carefully, and how successfully, they are applying the 'doctrine of distinction' laid down in the laws of war, which requires that combatants be distinguished from noncombatants so that the latter can be protected." Grayling says "the solution is not to abandon the doctrine of distinction but to apply it with a vengeance." One strategy would involve "physically moving a civilian population from troubled areas into camps," depriving "insurgents of cover and support." Another tactic "would be to cordon off the most toxic part of the Sunni Triangle, letting nobody in or out except under stringent controls at the perimeter, across which only food and medicine could move. "

More Commentary. Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in today's Washington Post (3/27, A15, 744K), "Administration officials have been right in recent weeks to argue that there is no large-scale civil war underway in Iraq. As long as the Iraqi political leadership remains generally united in trying to calm the situation, and as long as sectarian violence remains more sporadic than strategic (with no systematic ethnic cleansing, for example), true civil war remains a threat rather than a reality." He adds that "preventing a civil war is primarily a political task," but "if the political process continues to falter and the risk of civil war looms larger, we will also need a military plan for quelling it."

Rumsfeld's Ten Objectives For Iraq Victory Have Been Met. The Washington Post (3/27, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "On April 9, 2003, three weeks after the invasion of Iraq, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld clearly set out the 10 objectives to be achieved 'before victory can be declared.'" The Post lists Rumsfeld's ten objectives, including the capture of Saddam Hussein, securing the northern oil fields, locating Baath Party members, records and weapons caches, and notes that all have been met.

Rice Says "Significant Drawdown" Of US Troops In Iraq "Probable" This Year. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert) to comment on President Bush's statement that US troops will remain in Iraq for at least the next few years, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "The President was asked this question in a particular way, and he answered that some American troops may well be there for the next president. But I would just point to what the president has said continually, which is that American forces are going to come down commensurate with the need as Iraqi forces stand up. And they are indeed standing up. General Casey has talked about a significant reduction of American forces over the next year. And that significant reduction is because Iraqi forces are taking and holding territory now, because during this most recent uptick of sectarian violence, the Iraqi army behaved very, very well. So Iraqi forces are getting better. American forces are ceding territory, and it's entirely probable we will see a significant drawdown of American forces over the next year." Appearing on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) Rice also said "it is entirely likely that there will be draw downs of American forces over this next year."

Commenting on Rice assessment of US troop levels in Iraq, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger), said, "The point that Secretary Rice was making and the point that the president has made is that we anticipate we will be able to draw down, but this is a decision that's going to be made on the basis of the recommendation of the commanders in the field, based on the abilities of the Iraqis to take responsibility for security and for the political process to move forward."

Republican Lawmakers Join Call For House Debate On Iraq. Roll Call (3/27, Ben Pershing) reports, "A bipartisan group of lawmakers began a new effort last week to attract support for the idea of holding a lengthy House floor debate on Iraq policy." On Wednesday, Republican Reps. Walter Jones Jr., Ron Paul and Wayne Gilchrest "joined Democratic Reps. Neil Abercrombie (Hawaii), Ike Skelton (Mo.) and Marty Meehan (Mass.) in co-signing a 'Dear Colleague' letter calling for "an open and honest debate on the future of US policy in Iraq." The six signatories "encouraged their colleagues to sign a discharge petition for H.Res. 543, a rule that would allow floor consideration of a resolution introduced by Abercrombie in 2005 requiring President Bush 'to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal' of American troops from Iraq."

"Deepening And Hardening" Opposition To Iraq War Seen Around US. The New York Times (3/27, Kirkpatrick, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports from Albuquerque, NM, that President Bush "is pressing ahead with an intensified effort to shore up support for the war, but an increasingly skeptical and pessimistic public is putting pressure on Congress about the wisdom behind it, testing the political support for the White House's determination to remain in Iraq." The results "have been on display over the past week as members of Congress returned home and heard first-hand what public opinion polls have been indicating." The Times adds, "Interviews with voters, elected officials and candidates around the country suggest a deepening and hardening opposition to the war. Historians and analysts said this might mark a turning point in public perception."

Kurtz Says Media Coverage Of Iraq Carries Echoes Of Vietnam. Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (3/27, C1, 744K), "In increasingly aggressive questions to President Bush and Vice President Cheney, in a growing focus on the death toll in Iraq, in downbeat assessments on the invasion's third anniversary, many journalists now reflect the view that the war has gone horribly wrong. … What is undeniable is that the tone of much of the coverage matches the public-opinion polls showing that a majority of the country has turned against the conflict." The Post adds, "The journalists certainly don't see themselves as antiwar. But the way they frame many stories about Iraq sliding toward civil war carries echoes of Vietnam, when the media coverage turned sharply critical as the country soured on that jungle war."

New Study, Released Documents Suggest Saddam Had Links To Terrorists. The Weekly Standard (4/3, Hayes) reports Rep. John Murtha recently gave voice to what is now "the conventional wisdom on Iraq and terrorism," that there is no connection, but "it is wrong." A new study "from the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Virginia, paints quite a different picture. According to captured documents cited in the study and first reported in THE WEEKLY STANDARD in January, the former Iraqi regime was training non-Iraqi Arabs in terrorist techniques." The "emerging picture suggests that the U.S. intelligence community underestimated Saddam Hussein's interest in terrorism."

Laurie Mylroie, an adjunct fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M), "After substantial prodding -- including from this paper -- the US government has finally begun to release its captured Iraqi documents and is posting them at the Web site of the Army's Foreign Military Studies Office. This material will take considerable time to absorb and analyze, but it may yet contribute significantly to our understanding of the nature of the threat Saddam Hussein posed. Most dramatically, an Iraqi intelligence report, apparently written in early 1997, describes Iraqi efforts to establish ties with various elements in the Saudi opposition, including Osama bin Ladin. … One of Iraq's few allies, Sudan served as an intermediary between Baghdad and bin Ladin, as well as other Islamic radicals. On Feb. 19, 1995, an Iraqi intelligence agent met with bin Ladin in Khartoum." Bin Ladin "asked for two things: to carry out joint operations against foreign forces in Saudi Arabia and to broadcast the speeches of a radical Saudi cleric. Iraq agreed to the latter, but apparently not the former. … Many more documents are to be released in the coming months. Quite possibly, they will vindicate the decision to undertake the Iraq war; help maintain public support for fighting it; and radically change our understanding of Saddam's role in international terrorism."

Chris Carney, who is running in Pennsylvania's 10th CD, "served as a counterterrorism analyst for the Bush administration. For some Democrats, it's as if Richard Clarke decided to run for Congress." But Carney's Democratic "supporters, both in the 10th District and across the country, are apparently unaware of one very odd fact about his candidacy: Carney supported and helped propagate one of the war's most dubious premises--that Saddam Hussein was working closely with Al Qaeda. And these supporters are probably unaware of an even odder fact: Despite seeking an end to the war, Carney still believes it." But "that's more detail than most Democrats want. What's important to them is that Carney now largely considers the war a mistake."

UK Memorandum Said To Show Bush Set On War. The New York Times (3/27, Van Natta, 1.19M) reports a newly disclosed memorandum that summarized a January 31, 2003 between President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair shows that "behind closed doors," President Bush "was certain that war was inevitable. During a private two-hour meeting in the Oval Office," Bush "made clear" to Prime Minister Blair "that he was determined to invade Iraq without the second resolution" from the UN Security Council "or even if international arms inspectors failed to find unconventional weapons." The "confidential memo about the meeting" was "written by Mr. Blair's top foreign policy adviser" and was circulated among British Prime Minister Tony Blair's senior aides. David Manning, Blair's chief foreign policy adviser at the time, wrote, "'The start date for the military campaign was now penciled in for 10 March,'…paraphrasing the president. 'This was when the bombing would begin.'"

US Soldiers In Iraq Not Using Extra Body Armor. The Washington Times/AP (3/27), "Extra body armor -- the lack of which caused a political storm in the United States -- has flooded in to Iraq, but many Marines here promptly stuck it in lockers or under bunks. Too heavy and cumbersome, many say." Marines "already carry loads as heavy as 70 pounds when they patrol the dangerous streets in towns and villages in restive Anbar province. The new armor plates, although only about 5 pounds per set, are not worth carrying for the additional safety they are said to provide, some say."

Afghan Christian Convert Released. The Afghan court considering the case of Christian convert Abdul Rahman over the weekend threw out the case that had been brought against him for his conversion. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, lead story, 2:00, Peters, 8.78M) reported, "Muslim clerics have threatened to kill him if he walks free. The presiding judge today said major legal gaps in the prosecution's case needed to be filled in before the trial could proceed, constitutional technicalities that will remove the case from the courtroom and the spotlight and take some of the political pressure off Afghan President Hamid Karzai." Many "expect Rahman will now be quickly and quietly shuttled off to another country."

The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Zaman, Chu, 958K) reports, "The charges of apostasy against Abdur Rahman were being dropped for lack of evidence, said Abdul Wakil Omari, a spokesman for the Afghan Supreme Court." The New York Times (3/27, Munadi, 1.19M) says the move "will delay, if not scuttle" the investigation. The Times adds, "Court officials said the mental health of the defendant, Abdul Rahman, 41, would be evaluated. Although prosecutors vowed to continue the case, a finding of mental illness by public health authorities could thwart their effort." USA Today and the Washington Times run the same AP story (3/27, Cooney), which says "the court's decision could touch off protests across Afghanistan," according to Faiez Mohammed, "a Sunni Muslim leader in the northern city of Kunduz." The Washington Post (3/27, A10, Cooney, 744K) and Christian Science Monitor (3/27, 61K) run similar reports.

Ingenuity Of Battlefield Doctors Leading To Medical Advances. USA Today (3/27, 1A, Zoroya, 2.31M) runs a story on war doctors this morning. USA Today reports that "to save lives on the battlefield, medical innovations are born in days rather than in years, military and civilian doctors say. And as with wars past, the new ways of treating the injured and sick in Iraq and Afghanistan…could have benefits beyond the battlefield." Some innovations "result from government-sponsored research. Others come from the ingenuity of battlefield doctors who seek new ways to use existing medicines, or try untested technology when all else fails."

Bush Urged To Decouple War On Terror, Push For Democracy. Francis Fukuyama, a professor at Johns Hopkins, and Adam Garfinkle editor of the American Interest, urge in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, Fukuyama, Garfinkle, 2.11M) the separation of "the struggle against radical Islamism from promoting democracy in the Middle East." They propose "focusing on the first struggle, and dramatically changing our tone and tactics on the democracy promotion front, at least for now." They add, "The essential problem with the administration's approach is that it conflates two issues that are separate. The first has to do with violent, antimodern radical Islamism (on display both in the reaction to the Danish cartoons and in the mosque bombing in Samarra); the second concerns the dysfunctionality of political and social institutions in much of the Arab world."

Federal Prosecutor Spends Year Helping Rebuild Iraqi Judicial System. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/27, Louwagie) runs a profile of Cliff Wardlaw, a federal prosecutor who spent nearly a year helping to rebuild the Iraqi judicial system. The Tribune reports that Wardlaw "spent most of 2004 in Iraq after volunteering to help revamp the country's justice system. He trained judges, checked courthouse security, examined prison conditions and worked to steer the Iraqi judiciary to an independent body, one separate from the country's political leadership. … Since his return, his life has been suffused with the memories. And he is driven by the desire to go back." The Tribune adds, "Inside his office in the Minneapolis courthouse, where he works as a federal prosecutor, he e-mails his Iraqi friends regularly. … When the Justice Department put out an e-mail seeking volunteers in 2003, Wardlaw replied immediately. He says he was one of only three people in the country to answer. … He knew what he was getting into. He'd grown up the son of a Marine. … Wardlaw says he was one of about 5,200 civilians working to reconstruct the country, not including Defense Department contractors. He and his colleagues working with the justice system -- some American, some Iraqi -- took care to protect Iraqis who seemed destined to lead the government. … He helped make a difference, he thinks, but he acknowledges the country has a long way to go. He's adamant that U.S. troops should stay there until the job is finished. And he wants to be there with them."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

His Name Often Invoked, Causey Stays On Sidelines Of Enron Trial. The AP (3/26, Hays) reports, "Enron Corp.'s former chief accounting officer was bound for trial alongside company founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling until he cut a plea deal just weeks before jurors were chosen." The AP continues, "Richard Causey might have been expected to testify but has remained on the sidelines ever since. Legal experts say he might be more effective as a potential witness than one who actually takes the stand -- although jurors may be curious about the man whose name they've heard again and again." The AP adds, "Causey won't testify before the government rests its primary case in the fraud and conspiracy trial this week. But prosecutors can hold him in reserve to testify as a rebuttal witness after the defense teams present their case -- which will feature testimony from Lay and Skilling. … 'Causey's role in the case may turn out to be more to cast a shadow than to testify,' said Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches at the University of Texas School of Law. … 'A single provable lie on something significant could alone convict a testifying defendant in a case like this. And since only the government knows what Causey can and can't say, he acts as a major deterrent against either defendant fabricating specific claims about events, meetings, what they were not told, and the like,' he said."

Corporate Counsel Underlings Increasingly Focus Of Federal Prosecutions. Corporate Counsel (3/27, Reisinger) reports, "Until recently, federal prosecutors have almost always gone after the general counsel when they've charged an in-house lawyer with corporate fraud. But for the second time in the past six months, the government has skipped the GC and indicted a lower-ranking company lawyer for alleged wrongdoing." CC continues, "In February prosecutors charged Robert Graham, the former assistant GC and senior VP of General Re Corp., with securities fraud for his role in a sham deal with American International Group Inc. Based in Stamford, Conn., Gen Re is a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., the holding company for most of Warren Buffett's investments. New York-based AIG is the world's largest insurer. … Two other former Gen Re execs and a former AIG official were charged along with Graham. All four defendants have pled not guilty; at press time their case was scheduled to go to trial on May 22. The Securities and Exchange Commission has also brought a civil action against several Gen Re execs, including Graham, for their role in the deal with AIG. Timothy McCaffrey, who was Gen Re's GC at the time of the alleged fraud, says that he is not a target of the government's probe. (McCaffrey left the company last June.)" CC adds, "According to SEC documents and court papers filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, Gen Re and AIG concocted their deal in October 2000. An AIG executive allegedly proposed that his company would "prefund" Gen Re with $500 million, which Gen Re would then use to pay insurance premiums to AIG. The SEC says the deal, which would allow AIG to report $500 million in false reserves, was suggested by AIG's chairman. Maurice 'Hank' Greenberg, who was chairman of AIG until last spring, has denied all wrongdoing."

Market Timing Lawsuit Shows Merrill Lynch Ignored Internal Watchdogs. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, A1, Craig, Lauricella) reports in a lengthy front page story on Merrill Lynch & Co.'s decision to fire two traders and a colleague in a mutual fund market timing scandal. But last December, "a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel ruled that Merrill defamed the brokers and ordered it to pay them almost $15 million" and their lawyers "say the three were scapegoats." Merrill has "appealed the defamation ruling to a New York state court," a move that "has unsealed a trove of documents offering a rare glimpse of a Wall Street firm pursuing a tempting profit opportunity over the objections of internal watchdogs. On repeated occasions some Merrill employees voiced concern that the three brokers were doing something wrong and took steps to stop them. Yet their immediate bosses often pushed back, allowing the trading to continue."

GM Seeking To Correct Accounting Errors. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Hawkins) reports General Motors Corp. is "working to rectify last-minute accounting mistakes and could file its annual report with the Securities and Exchange Commission within days," but "still must deal with SEC probes related to several other accounting matters." GM management has "spent more than a week gathering details on the chain of events that led to a last-minute discovery of accounting errors in the financial statements of ResCap, GMAC's residential-mortgage unit, which caused GM to miss its 10-K filing deadline March 16."

SEC Subpoenas Gradient In Market ManipulationProbe. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Scannell) reports the Securities and Exchange Commission, "investigating possible market manipulation, requested documents about communications that Gradient Analytics Inc. had with journalists and others." The SCE sought "phone records, emails and other materials Gradient had exchanged with several hedge-fund advisers and journalists." The new subpoena "appears to let the SEC seek information about Gradient's contacts with journalists without seeking the information directly from the journalists themselves."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Seeks Extradition Of Former IRA Chief For Counterfeiting. The Financial Times (3/27, Washington) reports, "The US is to seek the extradition of Sean Garland, president of the Irish Workers party, who has been indicted in the US on charges of trafficking North Korean-counterfeited $100 bills in Europe, Russia and former Soviet states." The Times continues, "Mr Garland, 72, the former chief of staff of the official IRA, was arrested in Belfast last year on a US warrant after a 16-year investigation. … The fake dollar bills - known as 'supernotes' because of their high quality - started to appear around the world in 1989. But after being released on bail, Mr Garland fled to the Republic of Ireland to escape extradition. … A State Department official told the Financial Times that Washington planned to formally ask Ireland to extradite Mr Garland, although the official declined to comment on the timing." The Times notes, "The US attorney accuses him of operating a 'years-long scheme to obtain, transport, sell, and pass as genuine, highly deceptive counterfeit $100 [bills]'"

Memory Expert May Be Key Part Of Libby Defense. The New Republic (4/3, Zengerle) reports I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, has hired Harvard psychology professor Daniel Schacter to assist with his defense. Schacter "refused to discuss Libby's case or his involvement in it," but he "agreed to talk about his work in more general terms, and, as he spoke, it wasn't difficult to discern how he might be able to help Dick Cheney's former chief of staff beat back obstruction of justice, perjury, and false statement charges--and stay out of the slammer."

Attorney Sentenced For Forging Federal Judge's Order. The New York Law Journal (3/27, Perrotta) reports, "Perry S. Reich, the Long Island, N.Y., attorney who stands convicted of forging a federal magistrate judge's order and lying to the government, was sentenced Friday to 27 months in prison after a judge described his plight as 'disquieting' and unlike any case he had ever seen." The Journal continues, "Reich, 57, was a respected attorney whose conviction stunned many in the legal community who knew him from his days as a clerk at the Appellate Division, 2nd Department, and at the Court of Appeals, and later as an appellate specialist with a varied practice." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors had recommended a sentence of between 63 and 78 months, or 6 1/2 years, while the Probation Department suggested between 27 and 31 months. … Reich's appellate attorneys, Benjamin Brafman and Mark M. Baker of Brafman & Associates, asked for a period of probation with no incarceration. … Brafman and Baker, who were hired by Reich after his conviction, argued that Reich might be a pathological liar who truly believes he did not forge the order and fax it to an adversary, as a psychiatrist had suggested following an evaluation. They also stressed the many letters of support he received, his unblemished record and his reputation among others in the profession. Numerous friends and members of the legal community attended Reich's sentencing to offer their support. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Busa argued that claims about Reich's mental state were undermined by the fact that he had changed his story several times. She said he engaged in significant planning in an attempt to obstruct the judicial process."

FBI Finds No Seagal Link In Pellcano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Krikorian, Rohrlich, Verrier) reports, "Federal officials investigating infamous Hollywood detective Anthony Pellicano have found no convincing evidence that actor Steven Seagal was involved in depositing a dead fish on a reporter's windshield in June 2002 and now believe Pellicano had some other motivation for staging the mob-style threat." The Times continues, "While prosecutors have yet to explain what that impetus was, their current lack of interest in Seagal fundamentally alters the original plot line of this Hollywood cliffhanger and raises this question: If not the movie star, then who was Pellicano working for?" The Times adds, "The original premise was that Seagal had hired Pellicano to threaten Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch and scare her off a story about the actor's problems with organized crime. … The FBI initially subscribed to that theory because Alexander Proctor, the former convict that Pellicano allegedly hired to put a dead fish with a rose in its mouth and a note that said 'Stop' on the smashed windshield of Busch's car, claimed he was working for Pellicano on Seagal's behalf. … Seagal's lawyers have denied since the fall of 2002 that the actor had anything to do with the threat, but federal authorities have never publicly exonerated him or explained why they eventually came to disbelieve Proctor. … 'As we looked into it, there was very little to corroborate' Proctor's claim, said a source close to the investigation. 'There was a lot to suggest that Seagal was not involved.' … Indeed, the 110-count federal indictment accusing Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in Los Angeles alleges that the private eye started spying on Busch well before Seagal was even on her radar."

"Mafia Cops" To Pursue Different Defense Strategies. The New York Daily News (3/25, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "They were alleged partners in crime, but the so-called Mafia cops may go their own way at their trial. Louis Eppolito doesn't plan to call a single witness in his defense; partner Stephen Caracappa may take the stand, their lawyers said" Friday. "Federal prosecutors…appear confident that their case is going extremely well, largely due to the devastating testimony of chief witness Burton Kaplan," and "the government plans to rest its case Wednesday without calling mob turncoat Peter Chiodo, who has apparently been dropped from the witness list." The New York Post (3/25, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Eppolito lawyer Bettina Schein's decision to call no witnesses and notes, "That means closing arguments in the trial could be heard as early as April 3."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/26, McShane) reports on last week's testimony under the headline "'Mafia Cops' Trial Has Lots Of Theatrics," and notes, "The courtroom histrionics occasionally threaten to overshadow one of the most serious prosecutions in city history: a pair of top-echelon NYPD detectives accused of using their prized gold shields to kill eight people at the behest of a brutal mob underboss, Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso."

Trial Testimony Echoes Eppolito Book. The New York Times (3/27, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Beneath the murders, the mobsters, the gamblers, the strippers, the tax cheats, diamond smugglers, thieves, hoods, cops, cons, corpses, crooks and marijuana dealers, there is — at the core — a book." Eppolito's autobiography, Mafia Cops, "contains the germ of the government's dispute with its author — his claim that he broke with the mobsters in his past. It contains the seeds of his defense — that he is not a killer but a writer, a man who 'makes things up, creates,' as his lawyer said. … Rich in anecdote and salty dialogue, it seeks to portray its author as a conflicted but ultimately dedicated Kings County lawman. As such, it reflects the comparatively minor role that has been played so far by Mr. Caracappa, who…always gets second billing."

Former Bonanno Capo Testifies Basciano Committed Murders. The New York Post (3/25, Haberman, 624K) reports, "A one-time protege of Vincent 'Vinny Gorgeous' Basciano's" on Friday "fingered the former acting boss of the Bonanno crime family as a shotgun-wielding killer. Bonanno capo-turned-canary Dominick Cicale testified about two murders he committed with his former mentor -- and one he prevented. … Basciano shook his head in disgust at the sight of his former charge on the witness stand. Cicale also testified about how Basciano brought him along over the years, helping him become a 'made' member of the crime family, and teaching him tricks of the trade."

FBI Arrests Reputed Russian Mobsters In Alleged Murder Plot. The AP (3/25, Butler) reports, "Two reputed Russian mobsters were arrested Friday after hitmen they tried to hire to kill twin brothers went to Ukrainian police with secretly recorded conversations about the murder plot, federal prosecutors said. Monya Elson and Leonid Roytman were arraigned on murder-for-hire charges Friday in Brooklyn federal court. Both pleaded not guilty. 'This is a case of two Russian mobsters who personify ruthlessness and cold-blooded greed,' FBI Assistant Director Mark Mershon said in a statement."

FBI Arrests USC Lecturer For Alleged Real Estate Investment Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Tran, 958K) reports, "A USC lecturer who teaches at the university's business school was arrested Friday by FBI agents for allegedly bilking investors — many of them his students — out of more than $1.5 million and spending much of the money on show horses." Barry Howard Landreth was arrested at his home "on charges of wire fraud. … FBI agents said that Landreth told investors that their investments in Nevada and Illinois commercial properties and land would yield a 190% return. … The students persuaded their parents and others to invest in what they were told were commercial development projects in Las Vegas and Chicago, said FBI Special Agent Brad Howard." The AP (3/26) adds, "FBI agents also seized assets Landreth allegedly acquired with his victim's funds, including a luxury car and several show horses." The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (326, 51K) notes, "Landreth left Myrtle Beach under scrutiny in January 2005 after nine months of work on the Pavilion plan with the Myrtle Beach Downtown Redevelopment Corp. and Pavilion owner Burroughs & Chapin Co. Inc. Questions about his credentials surfaced after he failed to come up with money he promised in a side deal."

Red Cross To Give Authorities Results Of Katrina Fraud Probe. USA Today (3/27, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "The American Red Cross plans this week to turn over the results of its investigation into allegations of fraud and waste in its Hurricane Katrina relief efforts to authorities for possible criminal prosecution. Carrie Martin, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross, said Sunday that three volunteers had been dismissed as a result of the charity's investigation." Meanwhile, "Sen. Chuck Grassley…issued a statement saying he would meet with the charity's leaders this week to discuss its plans for reform," adding that they "did not take internal complaints of fraud and misuse of funds seriously enough until he drew attention to them."

Criminal Charges Unlikely In Tillman Friendly Fire Probe. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that while the Army is proceeding with its criminal investigation into the friendly-fore death of former NFL player Pat Tillman, it is "unlikely the soldiers who shot him will be held criminally negligent. … The difficulty of distinguishing between reasonable and negligent behavior in the chaos of battle, and a fear of making soldiers trigger-shy."

2000 was true-crime story that had 'soon to be a major motion picture' practically written all over it. The tragedy had a young victim, a manhunt for the kidnapper and a ring of middle-class 20-somethings who sold marijuana in the San Fernando Valley." Alpha Dog, "a $13 million movie with a cast including Justin Timberlake, Bruce Willis and Sharon Stone, is based on the slaying in Santa Barbara, Calif." The film is "now entangled in the criminal case against a defendant with a name that no screenwriter would dare make up: Jesse James Hollywood."

Cities Facing Shortage Of Police Officers. Police departments nationwide are experiencing shortages of officers and are offering signing bonuses and other incentives to lure new officers on to the force. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/27, A1, Pomfret, 744K) reports that "more than 80 percent of the nation's 17,000 law enforcement agencies, big and small, have vacancies that many can't fill, police officials estimate. … Police officials and researchers say a confluence of demographic changes and social trends have precipitated the shortage. The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have siphoned off public-service-minded people to the military. Hundreds of law enforcement officers have handed in their badges to take higher-paying positions in the booming homeland security industry."

CIVIL LAW:

Court May Consider Constitutionality Of Budget Reconciliation Act. A federal court may consider the constitutionality of the budget reconciliation act this May when it considers an ongoing dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals. Roll Call (3/27, Yachnin) reports that federal attorneys representing HHS cite the law, which passed the House and Senate in slightly different versions in their appeal of a ruling issued earlier this year by the U.S. District Court on a 2004 lawsuit. The suit "Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson, centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated. The hospitals sought and won an increase in payments worth up to $100 million. But now, HHS, along with its Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, is seeking to overturn the decision based on a provision in the budget reduction act that had been drafted in an attempt to clarify the policy that sparked the original dispute."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Filed 383 Lawsuits Last Year. The Washington Post (3/27, A13, Lee, 744K) reports that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "filed 383 lawsuits against alleged offenders last year, garnering $107.7 million for victims through litigation. The agency, which marked its 40th anniversary last summer, helped obtain $271.6 million for victims without going to trial, often through settlements or mediation. … Discrimination charges declined slightly last year, falling 5 percent from the 79,432 filed in 2004. The numbers have fluctuated over the last decade but have never approached the 91,189 charges filed in 1994."

New Orleans Voters Scattered Across Country As Mayoral Election Nears. Newsweek (4/3, Campo-Flores) reports on the New Orleans mayoral race, noting that with "only one third of New Orleanians back in the city and the remainder scattered across the country, the electorate is more elusive than ever. The two dozen candidates -- led by [Mayor Ray] Nagin, [Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch] Landrieu and businessman Ron Forman -- are struggling with questionable polling data and out-of-date voter lists. They're hunting for supporters in cities like Houston and Memphis with large concentrations of evacuees. And they're doing it all on a harried schedule, with less than a month left until the April 22 election (with a likely runoff scheduled for May 20)."

Georgia Lawmakers May Approve Bible As Classroom Textbook. The Georgia legislature appears poised to pass a measure requiring the state Department of Education to put in place a curriculum to teach the history and literature of the Bible. Under the law, schools would use the book as a textbook in the classroom, establishing electives on both the New and Old Testaments. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Jonsson, 61K) reports that the measure "has overwhelmingly passed both chambers, but needs a final vote on a minor House change. The vote is expected as early as Monday. If it passes, the state's Department of Education has a year to establish Bible elective courses in the curriculum."

WPost Critical Of Montgomery County Police Response To Racist Online Postings. The Washington Post (3/27, A14) says in an editorial that "for months, apparently, at least some of the police brass in Montgomery County have known either specifically or generally about racist, sexist and immigrant-bashing comments on an online message board used exclusively by county police." It was "only after The Post exposed the tenor of some of the online blather that the county police chief, J. Thomas Manger, took the trouble to read the uncouth postings. Now he says he is shocked, and he demands the message board be shut down by the Fraternal Order of Police, the police union, which runs the forum. So far, the FOP has refused." Police are "paid to enforce the law, not stand as unblemished exemplars of politically correct speech. But intolerant, hateful officers are unlikely to be effective, and they may actually subvert the department's overall mission."

WPost Criticizes Air Force Guidelines On Religious Expression. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/27, A14, 744K) says, "The Air Force got it right when it issued a carefully calibrated set of guidelines on religious expression last August. … Unfortunately, facing a barrage of complaints from evangelical Christian groups and pressure from members of Congress, the Air Force backed down. It has issued a revised set of rules that pose the potential for inappropriate religious pressure on cadets and service members. This pushes the balance in the wrong direction, especially in light of disturbing reports from the Air Force Academy about religious intolerance and inappropriate proselytizing. … It's unfortunate that the Air Force, having struck the balance so well last year, was bullied into this unwise retreat."

Lucent, Alcatel Again In Merger Talks. USA Today (3/27, Cauley) reports Lucent and Alcatel "confirmed late last week that they are in merger talks, marking their second attempt in five years to combine. Consolidation elsewhere in the telecom industry is a key driver." Equipment makers "such as Alcatel and Lucent are slowly being overshadowed by their far bigger customers. To maintain clout at the negotiating table, equipment makers need to get bigger fast."

3rd Circuit Rules Amnesty Pact No Bar To Federal Indictment. The Legal Intelligencer (3/27, Duffy) reports, "A federal judge has no power to enjoin prosecutors from filing an indictment on the grounds that doing so would violate an existing amnesty agreement, the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled, because the equitable powers of the court do not exist when there is 'an adequate and complete remedy at law.'" The Intelligencer continues, "In its 27-page opinion in Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group v. United States, the appellate court held that since the amnesty agreement may be raised as a defense after indictment, the lower court had exceeded its powers in enjoining the prosecution." The Intelligencer adds, "The decision reverses a January 2005 ruling by U.S. District Judge Timothy J. Savage that prohibited the Justice Department from filing an antitrust indictment against a Norwegian shipping company and one of its top executives. … Savage found that Stolt-Nielsen had entered into an amnesty program with the Justice Department and had provided information about a price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy that led to guilty pleas from two of its co-conspirators and more than $62 million in fines." The Intelligencer notes, "Because the company had fulfilled its obligations under an immunity agreement, Savage concluded it was entitled to an injunction that barred the filing of an indictment. … Prosecutors argued that SNTG misled the government by claiming that its participation in the antitrust conspiracy had ceased in March 2002. … But Savage found the amnesty agreement explicitly immunized SNTG and its executives from prosecution for activity prior to Jan. 15, 2003. And because the government had drafted the agreement, Savage said, it "cannot depend upon a tacit understanding of what it contends was meant during negotiations but was not memorialized in the integrated agreement.""

Patrick Rejects Toll's Takeover Bid. Bloomberg (3/27) reports, "Patrick Corp., Australia's biggest port cargo handler, rejected Toll Holdings Ltd.'s increased A$5.5 billion ($3.9 billion) takeover bid as 'flawed and unacceptable.' … 'Patrick shareholders remain better off without Toll,' Sydney-based Patrick said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. Melbourne-based Toll, the nation's biggest road and rail freighter, last week raised its offer after overcoming antitrust opposition to the deal." Bloomberg continues, "Toll Chief Executive Officer Paul Little bid for Patrick seven months ago, seeking control of the movement of goods across Australia from shipment to delivery. Patrick CEO Chris Corrigan is pursuing his own trucking acquisitions to compete with Toll for a land-freight business to add to Patrick's ports, saying Patrick offers better growth as a standalone company. … 'Patrick has far superior businesses and significantly greater growth prospects relative to Toll,' Corrigan said in the statement today."

SCOTUS To Hear Patent Case Against eBay. The New York Times (3/27, Hafner) reports, "The United States Supreme Court will hear arguments on Wednesday in a protracted, closely watched patent case that pits a small company called MercExchange against eBay, the online auction and marketplace." The Times continues, "While the grounds in the case appear narrow — the court will reconsider the rules under which courts grant injunctions against a company found to be infringing another's patent — it has attracted enormous attention because of the public rancor between the two companies, the supporters enlisted by both sides and the growing issue of how large technology companies deal with the constant threat of patent challenges." The Times adds, "The patent in question surrounds the 'Buy It Now' feature that eBay uses to allow processing of transactions for the Web site's fixed-price purchasing option. … The Supreme Court will decide whether a federal appeals court was correct in reversing a district court's decision to deny an injunction against eBay's use of the feature. In doing so, it will reconsider a precedent from 1908, which suggested that injunctions were always an appropriate remedy for patent infringement. … Supporting briefs from third parties, including some unlikely ones, have piled up for each side. A pharmaceutical industry trade group filed a brief in support of MercExchange, as did General Electric, Proctor & Gamble, the University of California, a group of venture capitalists and the United States government. All argued in favor of injunctions against those who infringe patents. … A brief filed jointly by Oracle, Microsoft and Intel in support of eBay argued that the injunction rule 'has transformed patents into a powerful tool for litigation abuse' and 'stifles innovation.' EBay has also hired Juleanna Glover Weiss of the Ashcroft Group, a lobbying firm in Washington founded by John Ashcroft, the former United States attorney general, to help with communications efforts related to the case and patent issues in general."

Apple Computers Meets Apple Corps In London Courtroom. The New York Times (3/27, Healey) reports, "Apple Computer will meet the Beatles' Apple Corps in court this week in London, where a judge will determine whether Apple Computer's iTunes online music service violates a 1991 agreement between the two companies that, the Beatles' Apple claims, blocked the computer maker from selling music." The Times continues, "Apple Corps, which represents the Beatles' business interests and markets their post-1968 recordings on disc, wants the computer firm to stop using the Apple trademark to sell recordings online, along with unspecified damages. Apple, the maker of Macs and iPods, said the 1991 agreement permitted using the Apple name to sell online data transfers, which are what downloaded songs amount to." The Times adds, "The judge hearing the case, Justice Edward Mann, is an iPod user, but neither side has asked him to recuse himself." The Times notes, "This is the third time the two companies have sparred. Apple Corps first sued Apple Computer in 1980 over the use of its name; a modest settlement was accompanied by an agreement that stipulated that Apple Computer, then a Silicon Valley start-up, would stay out of the music business. In 1989, after newer hardware and software made it easier to use Macintosh computers to synthesize sound, the Beatles' company sued again, resulting in a $26.5 million settlement in 1991 that left Macs able to edit and play back sound files but not create music. After the iTunes music store and software were introduced in April 2003, the record company filed suit a third time."

Shrewd Lobbying, Litigation Resulted In Big Incentives For Oil Industry. The New York Times (3/27, Andrews, 1.19M) reports on how a "supposedly cost-free incentive" to encourage oil and gas companies to drill in the Gulf of Mexico became "a multibillion-dollar break to an industry making record profits." According to the Times, "It is an account of legislators who passed a law riddled with ambiguities; of crucial errors by midlevel bureaucrats under President Bill Clinton; of $2 billion in inducements from the Bush administration, which was intent on promoting energy production; and of Republican lawmakers who wanted to do even more. At each turn, through shrewd lobbying and litigation, oil and gas companies ended up with bigger incentives than before." The Times notes that until last month, when the Bush Administration "confirmed that it expected the government to waive about $7 billion in royalties over the next five years," hardy anyone "noticed — or even knew — the real costs. They were obscured in part by the long gap between the time incentives are offered and when new offshore wells start producing. But lawmakers shrouded the costs with rosy projections. And administration officials consistently declined to tally up the money they were forfeiting."

"Big Oil" Turning Its Attention To Extra-Heavy Crude. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, Gold, 2.11M) reports, 'A Florida-size section of sandy soil beneath the boreal forest in this sparsely populated area of Northern Canada is loaded with bottom-of-the-barrel petroleum. These deposits were once dismissed as 'unconventional' oil that couldn't be recovered economically. But now, thanks to rising global oil prices and improved technology, most oil-industry experts count oil sands as recoverable reserves. That recalculation has vaulted Venezuela and Canada to first and third in global reserves rankings, although Venezuela's holdings in extra-heavy crude are a rough guess." The Journal adds, "The surging interest in Canadian oil sands is stark evidence that the world isn't about to run out of oil. Instead, it is running low on readily accessible light, sweet crude -- oil that flows like water, has few impurities and can be easily turned into gasoline. As the good stuff gets scarce, Big Oil is turning its attention and pouring money into extra-heavy crude, such as the giant deposits near Fort McMurray and another similar one in Venezuela."

Norton Creates Sporting Conservation Council. The Washington Times (3/27, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Interior Secretary Gale Norton "has just impaneled a new Sporting Conservation Council, which for the first time will advise Uncle Sam on the interests and concerns of the hunting community, including gaining more access to federal lands. … The chosen council of advisers include, among others, Safari Club International Vice President Merle Shepard, who will represent big-game hunting organizations, and Jeff Crane, president of the Congressional Sportsmen's Foundation, who will speak for wildlife conservation organizations; to Peter J. Dart, president of the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation, and John Tomke, chairman of the Board of Ducks Unlimited, Inc., who will represent game-bird hunting organizations."

Bush Climate Change Proposals Said To Lack "Teeth." Time's (4/3) cover package examines the issue of global warming, noting that President Bush, who is "hardly a favorite of greens, now acknowledges climate change and boasts of the steps he is taking to fight it. Most of those steps, however, involve research and voluntary emissions controls, not exactly the laws with teeth scientists are calling for." Time's cover package also examines the cycles of climate destruction, and lists the species that are being pushed "to the brink of extinction" by global warming, the impact of global warming on human health, steps individuals can take to reduce emissions, activists who are working to reduce the effects of global warming and the role emissions from India and China are playing in the problem.

85% Believe Global Warming Is "Probably Happening." ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 6, 3:10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "A major new poll conducted by ABC, 'Time magazine, and Stanford University" shows "a vast majority of Americans, 85%, now believe global warming is probably happening and that it will become a serious problem in the future." ABC (Blakemore) added, "56% in our poll believe the world's temperatures have been rising in the past three years. 70% think the world's weather patterns more unstable. Half say they've experienced the same in the last three years where they live." What is "surprising in our poll, while half of Americans say they're now experiencing warming, 64% still mistakenly think that there's a lot of disagreement among scientists about whether global warming is happening." Prof. Jon Krosnick, Stanford University: "This poll shows us that those Americans who believe the scientific community is united in thinking that global warming is real and a problem are the most supportive of government action to solve the problem."

Energy Industry Said To Have Muddied Waters In Global Warming Debate. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 7, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "The vast majority of scientists have determined global warming to be a real threat. So, why has it taken so long to convince Americans? Pulitzer prize-winning journalist, Ross Gelbspan, blames a 15-year misinformation campaign by the oil and coal industries." Ross Gelbspan, Environmental Journalist: "The point of this campaign was not necessarily to persuade the public that global warming isn't happening. It was to persuade the public that there is this state of confusion." Morrell: "This 1998 memo by the American Petroleum Institute says, 'Victory will be achieved when…average citizens (recognize) uncertainties in climate science.' To redefine global warming as theory, not fact, the industry funded research by friendly scientists, such as Pat Michaels. The industry's influence even extends into the White House, where up until a few months ago, a former oil industry lobbyist was one of the President's top advisers, editing scientific reports to make global warming seem less threatening."

Investors Showing Interest In Ethanol. The New York Times (3/27, Alster, 1.19M) reports the entrepreneurs and investors have begun to embrace ethanol which "now accounts for 3 percent of the American automotive fuel market. Most cars in the United States can already handle fuel that is up to 10 percent ethanol, and as many as five million are so-called flex-fuel vehicles that can use a fuel called E85, which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline. The current excitement over ethanol derives from research that has cut the cost of converting nonfood plant matter like grasses and wood chips into alcohol."

Mueller Addresses Houston Crime, Terrorism Forum. KPRC-TV Houston (3/24, 10:05 p.m.) reported, "The director of the FBI was in town today talking about Houston safety and security. Gang violence, human smuggling and port security were just some of the big issues Robert Mueller talked about," and "he says the key to fighting the growing crime in Houston is by sharing intelligence and creating task forces." KRIV-TV Houston (3/24, 9:47 p.m.) noted that "Mueller made a stop in Houston today, but it wasn't for investigative work. He spoke to the Houston Forum on Globalization of Crime and Terror." KHOU-TV Houston (3/24, McShan) reports, "The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston." FBI director Robert Mueller said of the bureau's role, "We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both (HPD Chief Harold Hurtt) and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now." KHOU adds that "both cities are cracking down on gangs, and no one wants them to call their city home."

KHOU-TV Houston (3/26, Edwards) reports on the proliferation of New Orleans gang graffiti, noting, "Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston" and "authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston." But it is "a battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police. 'For us to be effective, we have to work together,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said. 'We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans.'"

Mueller Praises New Orleans Agents, Says Headquarters Will Reopen In June. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/24, Chapple, 257K) reports, "The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish. … Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said." Mueller added, "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here. Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding." Before his meeting with Mueller, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens "praised the FBI," saying, "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about. They were there for us when we needed them."

WDSU-TV New Orleans (3/24, 6:11 p.m.) reported, "Since Hurricane Katrina damaged the FBI's building in Lakefront, the bureau has been using rented space at the Covington Country Club on the north shore. Agency Director Robert Mueller says that despite relocating, agents and staff were able to salvage evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm." WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/24, 5:01 p.m.) noted that "Mueller visited the temporary office yesterday."

Administration Testing Wastewater For Signs Of Cocaine Use. The Washington Post (3/27, B1, Turque, 744K) reports that as part of a pilot program, the Bush Administration, in an effort to broaden the government's knowledge of illegal drug use is analyzing "wastewater from communities throughout the Potomac River Basin for the urinary byproducts of cocaine." The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy 'said it is not seeking to single out specific localities. It also is premature, officials said, to conclude that levels of metabolized cocaine in sewage offer a more accurate index of consumption than traditional survey research. But David Murray, special assistant to national drug czar John P. Walters, said wastewater testing, which has been tried in Europe, 'certainly has that potential.'"

Federal Investigators Accused Of "Running Roughshod" Over California Marijuana Laws. The Scripps Howard News Service (3/25, Lee) reports federal agents who "converged on several of what they called 'marijuana candy factories' around Oakland this month seized hundreds of sodas and candies laced with marijuana in what they said was the largest bust of its kind on the West Coast. … Angry medical-marijuana patients said investigators are blowing smoke and that the raids are just the latest proof that federal investigators are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use."

Eight Arrested In New Jersey Heroin Ring Investigation. The North Bergen Reporter (3/26) reports Hoboken New Jersey police have "arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring. According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration. The individuals arrested were allegedly part of a major organization that supplied heroin throughout the Hudson County area."

Man Accused Of Plotting Murder In Vermont Drug Case. The AP (3/25) reports from Burlington, Vermont, that a man is "facing up to life in prison if convicted of charges he tried to hire a man to kill a witness against him in a drug case. Richard E. Moses Jr., 38, appeared in federal court Friday a day after he allegedly met with an undercover officer from the Drug Enforcement Administration who had told Moses he could arrange the killing of the witness."

The Rutland (VT) Herald (3/25) writes, "According to an affidavit, after Moses expressed an interest in having the witness killed, a federal Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent from another state contacted him to determine how serious he was. In several recorded phone conversations in January, February and March, Moses allegedly negotiated the murder of the witness with the agent, who posed as someone who could arrange a murder."

Kentucky Company Agrees Not To Sell Chemicals Used To Make Meth. The AP (3/27) reports that as part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, the owner of a chemical company in Louisville "has agreed not to sell chemicals used to make methamphetamine and to report suspicious purchases. The company _ Antec Inc. _ also would be subject under the plea agreement to inspections by the Drug Enforcement Administration and it would be required to keep detailed records of all poison sales, including how the buyer intends to use it. The company's president… signed the agreement with federal prosecutors this month, admitting that Antec committed a misdemeanor violation of the Clean Water Act in 2002."

The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (3/26) reports, "The federal Drug Enforcement Administration has investigated Antec because its chemicals have been found during raids of methamphetamine labs. The company is the target of a civil lawsuit over its online sale of poison to a Maryland teenager who used it to kill a classmate in 2003. Environmental officials have alleged that Antec violated state regulations and the federal Clean Water Act."

SC Man Gets Life Sentence In Cocaine Case. The Charleston (SC) Post Courier (3/24) reports a federal judge "sentenced a North Charleston man to life in prison without parole Wednesday for his role in a major drug-dealing operation responsible for bringing 33 pounds of cocaine worth at least $375,000 into the area." Authorities "said Damon Brightman, 28, was a leader of a gang that distributed crack and powder cocaine to dealers in the Murray Hill community and…in North Charleston. Some deals were arranged at a small barbershop Brightman owned."

Kentucky Man Flees While Awaiting Sentencing For Marijuana Distribution. The AP (3/25) reports from Louisville, Kentucky, that the case of an inmate who "was temporarily released in late January to be tested as a potential kidney donor for his teenage son and is now accused of fleeing with his girlfriend to Mexico instead" has drawn national attention. The AP says Fox's "America's Most Wanted" has featured the case of Byron Perkins. He

"had been awaiting sentencing for marijuana distribution and unlawful transport of firearms."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Weighs In On Immigration Debate As Senate Prepares To Take Up Issue. President Bush today will call for immigration law reforms at a swearing-in ceremony for new citizens. Bush will also meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox, who is expected to make the case for a more open immigration process. Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary Committee is making a last-ditch effort to reach consensus on a bill that includes a guest worker proposal. Media coverage of the immigration debate continues to stress that the issue is dividing Republicans between those who support a guest worker program and those who advocate only stricter enforcement.

The story was reported by ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 11, 0:30, Snow, 8.78M) – which was the only network newscast last night (CBS and NBC were preempted by sporting events). ABC's brief report noted the developments: "Tomorrow, a Senate committee begins what should be a fractious debate on immigrants. And on Wednesday, President Bush travels to Cancun for a meeting with the Mexican president. Immigration is sure to be a hot topic."

The story was widely covered by print and wire services this morning, with stories covering the gamut of developments and issues expected to be raised in the debate. USA Today (3/27, Kiely, Jackson, 2.31M) reports President Bush "planned to make an appeal today for controversial changes in immigration law at a swearing-in ceremony for new citizens" after "a weekend of protests that drew hundreds of thousands of immigrants and advocates." The weekend's "protests focused on a bill the House of Representatives approved in December" that is focused on enhancing enforcement of immigration laws. More than "500,000 people turned out Saturday in Los Angeles to protest the House bill, police said. Similar protests drew an estimated 50,000 in Denver, 20,000 in Phoenix and 4,000 in Charlotte on Saturday and nearly 3,000 in Columbus, Ohio, on Sunday."

The Washington Times (3/27, Hurt, 90K) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "takes up the contentious issue of immigration reform today no closer to an agreement on a guest-worker program." The bill "to be considered by the full Senate today will be the one introduced last week by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who has long set today as the deadline for taking up the issue. His legislation deals only with securing the border and raising the penalties for being in the U.S. illegally." Frist has "said, however, that he will include a guest-worker program in his bill if a majority of the 10 Republicans on the committee agree on one. Private negotiations among members and their staffs continued through last week's recess, but staffers say no consensus has been reached, suggesting that a compromise is highly unlikely." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "said yesterday that he is confident that his committee will produce a bill today."

The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Gaouette, 958K) reports the Senate "will determine whether flaws in that system should be addressed solely with tough new criminal laws and stringent enforcement measures -- such as those found in a bill, passed by the House late last year, that triggered demonstrations Saturday from Chicago to Los Angeles. Or they may choose to include programs that give employers access to a future flow of workers, as President Bush has urged, and allow illegal immigrants to gain legal status." Their choices "will provide a barometer of Bush's waning influence over a Republican Party increasingly on edge about midterm elections. Their debate is likely to not only color the meeting between Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, in Cancun, Mexico, later this week, but also to lay bare the fractures that the issue creates within the GOP on social, economic and security grounds."

The AP (3/27, Pickler) reports the US "is struggling to decide the fate of as many as 12 million people living in the country illegally. The Senate takes up the emotional debate on the heels of weekend rallies that drew hundreds of thousands of people protesting attempts to toughen laws against immigrants." Demonstrations "are planned near the Capitol, including a prayer service with immigration advocates and clergy who plan to wear handcuffs to demonstrate the criminalization of immigration violations."

The Washington Post (3/27, A1, Williams, 744K) reports in a front page story that Congress faces a dilemma "as it attempts an immigration overhaul. Businesses say it is hard to persuade Americans to perform the unskilled jobs that immigrants easily fill. Significantly higher wages might work, but that increase would be passed on to unhappy consumers, forcing Americans to give up under-$10 manicures and $15-per-hour paint and lawn jobs." Yet "against a backdrop of heightened scrutiny of those who cross U.S. borders and the estimated 12 million migrants already here illegally, most everyone agrees that the current immigration system warrants a severe makeover."

CQ Weekly (3/27, Sandler) reports that by "forcing the Senate to debate immigration this week, Republican leaders have highlighted rather than hidden the stark differences between them. On one side are pro-business Republicans, who say the nation's economy depends on immigrant labor. On the other stand the cultural or social conservatives, who say illegal immigrants steal American jobs, threaten security and erode the nation's predominant culture." The "backlash against Bush's plan from within his own party was only to be expected, experts on the issue say. Many conservatives consider it little more than amnesty for the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country, the kind of policy over which they had spent years criticizing President Bill Clinton and other Democrats." The Senate debate "will revolve largely around the views and political ambitions of a handful of senators who are looking at a broader context: Either their party's prospects or their own; the future of the nation's economy or its cultural identity; the costs of illegal immigration or the costs to immigrants themselves."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Chaddock, 61K) reports "one of the most pervasive costs of a broken immigration system, acknowledged by all sides, is the cost of deception." Bringing "honesty to the system without deporting millions and jeopardizing major sectors of the US economy is the tough task before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as its 18 members struggle toward consensus on a new strategy for immigration reform." For employers "who hire illegals, that means not looking too closely at documents. Only three employers were fined for hiring illegals in 2004, down from 417 in 1999, according to a report by the Government Accountability Office in August 2005." But if "employers examine someone's documents too closely, they can be pursued by the Justice Department for employment related discrimination."

U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Marek) reports that the Senate is expected immigration reform this week. The House "passed a mostly punitive measure in December," and "refused to even consider proposals that would allow employers to hire temporary guest workers, an idea that's been championed by President Bush." Senate Republicans "are fiercely divided on the temporary-worker issue, and those with presidential ambitions crop up on both sides of the debate." US News adds, "Expect some gonzo antics on the floor. Already on the agenda: tough proposals to fence off the whole Southwest border and deny citizenship to babies born to illegal immigrants and a liberal amendment to grant in-state tuition to college students who aren't U.S. citizens."

McCain, Specter Seek Compromise. Newsweek (4/3, Bailey) reports that Senate Republicans, "led by John McCain and Arlen Specter, have been working to come up with a compromise that would include border security, a guest-worker program and a way for illegal immigrants to 'earn' citizenship. But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a presidential contender with one eye on the anti-immigration vote -- and the other one on outflanking McCain -- has threatened to put forward his own get-tough plan this week if the senators fail to come through."

Frist's Presidential Prospects May Hinge On Immigration Debate. Time (4/3, Bacon) reports in its 'Notebook" column that wile First "has left open the possibility of backing a bill that includes a guest-worker provision, he's determined to get stronger border enforcement passed, which will please conservative voters who will pick the G.O.P. nominee in 2008." Time adds that if Frist "can succeed in passing an immigration bill -- especially his own -- he may regain some of the luster he lost last year. If he can't, he may return home to Tennessee as the ineffectual G.O.P. leader who lost his touch -- and his presidential prospects."

Unexpectedly Large Pro-Immigrant Protests Held In Several Cities. The New York Times (3/27, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports that the Senate takes up immigration reform "against a backdrop of thousands of demonstrators, including clergy members wearing handcuffs and immigrant leaders in T-shirts that declare, 'We Are America.' But if events of recent days hold true, they will be facing much more than that." Rallies in "support of immigrants around the country have attracted crowds that have astonished even their organizers. More than a half-million demonstrators marched in Los Angeles on Saturday, as many as 300,000 in Chicago on March 10, and — in between — tens of thousands in Denver, Phoenix, Milwaukee and elsewhere." One of the "most powerful institutions behind the wave of public protests has been the Roman Catholic Church, lending organizational muscle to a spreading network of grass-roots coalitions."

The AP (3/27, Prengaman) reports the LA protest was "one of the largest demonstrations for any cause in recent U.S. history. More than 500,000 protesters — demanding that Congress abandon attempts to make illegal immigration a felony and to build more walls along the border — surprised police who estimated the crowd size using aerial photographs and other techniques, police Cmdr. Louis Gray Jr. said."

GOP Divisions Said To Give Democrats Cover To Conceal Their Own. Roll Call (3/27, Stanton) reports, "Internal GOP divisions over how to address the status of an estimated 11 million illegal workers residing in the United States have provided a rare bit of political cover for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), sparing him and his oft-divided Democratic Caucus from a public airing of its own internal grievances and disputes over the hot-button issue." Like Republicans, Democrats "are divided — although much less bitterly than the GOP — over the guest worker plan. In one corner are lawmakers such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) who favor a program that would allow law-abiding, employed illegal workers to remain in the U.S. for a set period of time. In the other corner stand lawmakers such as Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who would prefer a much narrower guest worker program." But "unlike Republican divisions, the Democratic disputes have largely avoided the front pages, thanks to what GOP aides argue is political posturing by presidential hopefuls Frist and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who have staked out opposite positions on the issue."

Specter Denies That His Immigration Bill Amounts To "Amnesty." Sen. Arlen Specter was asked on ABC's This Week (3/26, Stephanopoulos) to respond to critics of his immigration bill who refer to it as an offer of amnesty. Specter responded, "It's not amnesty…because these undocumented aliens are going to have to pay a fine. They're going to have to work for six years to be on the citizenship path. They're going to have to go through a criminal background check. They're not going to go ahead of people who have been waiting in line for citizenship. … If we do not have some realistic proposal to give them an opportunity to work lawfully and ultimately to obtain citizenship, then they're going to be fugitives, and we need to know who they are and where they are. And if they have criminal records, we need to send them back to their country of origin."

Tancredo Contends Specter Is Promoting Amnesty. Rep. Tom Tancredo, also on ABC's This Week (3/26, Stephanopoulos), replied to Specter, saying, "Let me tell you, it is an amnesty. The crime they have committed is coming into this country without our permission. The penalty that is supposed to be applied to that, under the law that we have today, is deportation."

Tancredo Seen As "Angriest Voice" Against Illegal Immigration. Newsweek (4/3, Bailey) reports that Rep. Tom Tancredo has "positioned himself as the loudest, angriest voice against the estimated 11 million illegal aliens now living in the United States. … If Republican presidential candidates don't put the problem atop the agenda in 2008, he says he'll run himself, just to force the front runners to talk about it. Not that he thinks he'd win the White House."

Kennedy Praises Bush, McCain. Sen. Ted Kennedy, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger), said, "We're facing a national security challenge on our borders on immigration, so we have to get immigration policy correct. … In the time that I've been in the United States Senate, I've never seen a coalition come together like it has in trying to find a common-sense approach on immigration. We have the leaders of -- the faith-based leaders in our community. We have leaders in our business community and leaders in our labor community. They understand that we cannot solve the problem of illegal immigration just by law enforcement alone. … I think President Bush understands it. I think John McCain understands it."

Frist Said To Be Exploiting Anti-Immigration Sentiment Among Conservatives. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace), said Senate majority leader Bill Frist "who hasn't had a terribly successful pre- presidential campaign so far…wants to be the representative now of the enforcement-only, close-the-border, no-help-for-those-who-are-here-illegally Republicans. And there is a lot of support for that, or appears to be. … Frist playing to that base. McCain is strongly identified with a more liberal approach, very much like Bush's, and I think it will be a huge issue in the 2008 Republican primary. McCain and Giuliani probably will be the only candidates who are willing to take on this sort of apparent populist upsurge of concern."

Kondracke Says Bush Let Immigration "Get Out Of Hand." In his Roll Call (3/27), Morton Kondracke says President Bush "finally re-entered the immigration debate last week to appeal for civility and compassion. He's way late. The debate is already bitter and divisive, especially within the Republican Party, and it's only getting worse." It's Bush "who allowed the situation to get out of hand. Since before he became president, the former border-state governor has favored a moderate, comprehensive approach to immigration — a combination of enhanced border security and internal enforcement measures, plus work permits for new entrants and for those presently working illegally. But Bush failed to push this approach, initially because of post-9/11 security concerns and then because he decided to spend his post-re-election political capital on Social Security."

Immigration Reform Seen As Potential Loser For GOP Candidates. The Wall Street Journal's Paul Gigot, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace), said, "I think the question is whether the Republicans in the Senate can save the House Republicans from their worst instincts. I mean, the House Republicans convinced themselves that being restrictionist in immigration is good politics. I'm not so sure it is. … There are other factions in the party base, including the business community, as Juan said, but also religious conservatives who are worried about, in their Good Samaritan role, being harassed, and then Hispanics."

Latin American Leaders Considering Way To Oppose US Border Wall Plans. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Harman, 61K) reports that as Mexican President Vicente Fox "prepares to meet Thursday with President Bush and Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, in Cancún, the proposed 700-mile, $2.2 billion barrier is a major point of contention - not just for the US and Mexico, but for the US and the whole region." Regional leaders – "whose countries in 2004 received some $45 billion sent home from immigrants in the US - have met three times recently to discuss how best to oppose it." Other issues also "in proposed US immigration reform legislation…irk regional leaders and caused hundreds of thousands of people to protest in multiple US cities over the past few days."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/27, Douglas, 423K) reports Bush and Fox "plan to meet in the Yucatan resort as part of a trilateral summit with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. While Bush has economic issues to address with Harper, U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting." Given the "political climate across the United States, it is doubtful Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year."

Brown-Waite Says Senate Bill Should Include Condemnation Of Rape. The Washington Times (3/27, Seper, 90K) reports Republican Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite said the Senate immigration bill "should include a condemnation of rapes by alien smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border and encourage 'in the strongest possible terms' the Mexican government to prevent such crimes." Rep. Brown-Waite's "amendment to a House immigration-enforcement bill calling for Congress to condemn the rapes was passed," and it "called on Congress to condemn the rapes by smugglers along the border and urged the Mexican government to work with U.S. Customs and Border Protection to take immediate action to prevent such crimes."

Krugman Criticizes House GOP, Bush Immigration Proposals. In his New York Times column (3/27), Paul Krugman says, "Realistically, we'll need to reduce the inflow of low-skill immigrants. Mainly that means better controls on illegal immigration. But the harsh anti-immigration legislation passed by the House, which has led to huge protests — legislation that would, among other things, make it a criminal act to provide an illegal immigrant with medical care — is simply immoral. Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's plan for a 'guest worker' program is clearly designed by and for corporate interests, who'd love to have a low-wage work force that couldn't vote. Not only is it deeply un-American; it does nothing to reduce the adverse effect of immigration on wages."

WSJournal Backs Reform Of H-1B Visa Process. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) says while "globalization has increased the competition for international talent, U.S. businesses are frustrated by processing delays, long backlogs and especially the failure of Congress to increase the annual limits on visas for skilled immigrants." Under Sen. Arlen Specter's "proposal, the annual cap on H-1B guest worker visas for immigrants in specialty fields like science and engineering would rise to 115,000 from 65,000. Moreover, the new cap would not be fixed but would fluctuate automatically in response to demand for these visas. We don't think any cap is necessary. But if a Republican Congress feels it must impose one, the least it can do is let market forces have some say in the matter."

NYTimes Says Bush Will Have To Engage To Keep Immigration Reform On Track. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the pro-immigration demonstrations "have been timed to a climactic showdown for immigration reform in the capital." Senate staffs were "racing over the weekend to nail down compromises before today's deadline. Anti-immigrant forces, meanwhile, stand ready to try to torpedo anything other than a strictly get-tough approach. That would be an awful outcome for immigrant advocates and for President Bush, who has long argued for comprehensive reform and tried, with limited success, to steer his party away from the one-note harshness of the wall-building crowd." But with "looming elections and Republican presidential jockeying casting a distorting fuzz over the debate, it may be too late for Mr. Bush's hands-off approach. If the president really wants a sensible reform bill to reach his desk, he will have to do more than stand on the sidelines, urging everyone to have good manners."

TAX:

Bush To Intensify Push For Permanent Tax Cuts. U.S. News and World Report (4/3) reports in its "White House Week" column, "President Bush, moving to give permanent status to his hallmark tax cuts, is planning to step up his push for the issue in hopes that the House and Senate will grant his wish this year." Bush feels the tax cuts are "a good campaign issue, and a personal 'legacy issue' as well."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Proposals Would Require Lawmakers To Reveal Contacts With Lobbyists. The Washington Post (3/27, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports on efforts to reform the congressional earmark process. According to the Post, "Proposals pending before the House and Senate would force lawmakers to reveal their contacts with lobbyists and disclose their involvement in winning federal spending provisions or earmarks for constituents or special interests. If such disclosures become mandatory, some in Congress hope past practices will shrivel in the light of day. If not, they hope to win passage of provisions that would allow improperly secured earmarks to be struck from bills on the House or Senate floor. The Senate will take up earmark-reform proposals as early as today, when it turns its attention to a broad package of lobbying and ethics rule changes.'

Novak Says Bush Should Heed DeMint's Suggestion On Curbing Earmarks. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/27) writes that ten U.S. senators recently met with President Bush "at the White House to hear him make the case for a line-item veto." But South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint (R) "had a better idea for the president: Why not instruct your department heads to ignore the earmarks Congress adds to your budget?" Novak notes, "A March 6 report by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service (CRS) said more than 95 percent of all earmarks were not written into law but were merely contained in the reports of congressional committees and legislative managers. 'Earmarks that appear in committee reports and the statements of managers do not legally bind agencies,' said the report." Bush "did not respond to DeMint at the meeting, and that signifies opposition to the idea." Bush "might well measure the benefits of bold action. If they are required to submit earmarks for floor action by the Senate and House, the lawmakers' ability to overspend would be diminished. From a political standpoint, DeMint is giving the president the opportunity for a dramatic gesture showing that he really cares about spending. By all appearances, Bush won't take it."

Placing 527 Regulation Into Lobbying Reform Bill Called "Politics As Usual." Richard L. Hasen, who specializes in election law at Loyola Law School, writes in Roll Call (3/27) that "proposed legislation in the House would treat 527s as political committees, thereby limiting 527 contributions from individuals to $5,000 per year, with a total yearly cap of $37,500 on any individual's giving to all such groups as well as other non-party political committees." Hasen adds that "regardless of whether 527 regulation is good policy, it makes no sense to put the 527 regulation into a lobbying reform bill." Placing "a 527 measure into a lobbying bill is sure to get the bill enmeshed in partisan controversy. And cynics believe that's the point: Either the bill passes and the Republicans enjoy a double advantage (having taken care of "lobbying reform" while also hobbling a tool that has helped Democrats), or they can blame Democrats for being obstructionist over lobbying reform. … Regulating 527s in the guise of lobbying reform is just more politics as usual in Washington."

E-Mail Reveals Democratic Plans To Unveil National Security Strategy. Roll Call (3/27, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Democrats "were handed a bummer Friday when an e-mail plotting a news conference to unveil their national security strategy fell into enemy hands. Republicans were tickled when they intercepted a missive written by Democratic operative Stephanie Cutter seeking law enforcement involvement in the Democrats' covertly planned national security event set for Wednesday. … Cutter, who recently left Capitol Hill to form the Cutter Media Group, was looking to gather '20 or so' law enforcement officers on stage at Union Station for the event, where Congressional Democratic leaders plan for the first time to formally unveil a strategic presentation on how the party, if it regains control of Congress, would protect the United States against terrorism and other national security threats. … According to Cutter's e-mail, Democratic leaders will use Wednesday's event to commit to making implementation of the 9/11 commission's recommendations 'our first act when Democrats regain control of the Senate and/or House.'"

GAO Report Says Sensitive HHS Data Is At Risk. A GAO report has found "significant weaknesses" in the information security at the Department of Health and Human Services and its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. According to the Washington Times (3/27, Fagan, 90K) reports that "key health, financial, scientific and personal information" is not "being adequately protected from fraud and abuse, a government report has found." According to the report, HHS has "put at risk the confidentiality, integrity and availability of their sensitive information." The Times reports, "Among the specific deficiencies: access to data was not always restricted when it should have been; anti-virus software wasn't always installed or updated; network protection was inadequate in some areas; and encryption wasn't used when sending certain sensitive information."

Non-English Speaking Seniors Have Trouble Enrolling In Medicare Drug Plans. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Lin, 958K) reports that as the May 15 deadline for enrollment in the Medicare prescription program nears, immigrants with little or nor English skills are "swamping clinics, community centers and pharmacies, unable to read the litany of Medicare-related mailings and or even ask questions about their new plans. … Complaints about language barriers have arisen across the country, but the issue is particularly acute in California, where the primary language of one in five residents -- and about the same fraction of low-income seniors -- is not English, said Jeanne Finberg, a California-based attorney for the National Senior Citizens Law Center." Medicare officials "said last week that they have been doing outreach at many senior centers, including those that serve non-English-speakers. In addition, they have helped fund nonprofit groups that offer toll-free call lines catering to those who speak Spanish, Chinese, Vietnamese and Korean."

Towey Addresses Springfield Diocesan Conference. The Chicopee/Holyoke (MA) Republican (3/26, McAuliffe) reported Jim Towey, "director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives since February 2002, was a keynote speaker yesterday at 'Grow In Holiness,' the fourth annual Springfield Diocesan Catholic Men's Conference." Towey "spoke for about 45 minutes, spending much of his time reflecting on the late Mother Teresa, for whom he had worked for a dozen years." The conference "was begun to challenge Catholic men to make a deeper commitment to their faith, and Towey said the experience could be transforming." Towey "may be a White House employee, but he attended the conference on his own time." Towey said, "This is Jim Towey, private citizen, who happens to work at the White House."

First Lady Has Replaced Her Entire "High Command" After Five Years. The New York Times (3/27, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that First Lady Laura Bush "has replaced her entire high command after five years in charge of the East Wing." The First Lady "is now on her second chief of staff, Anita McBride. She is on her second projects and policy director, Sonya Medina. She is on her third press secretary, Susan Whitson. She is on her second social secretary, Lea Berman. On the residence staff, she is on her second executive chef, Cristeta Comerford. Not least, she is on a search for her third pastry chef."

Card Says Bush Is Applying Management Style Learned In Business School. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Walsh) reports that President Bush's "CEO presidency has fallen on hard times." The past year has seen two "management disasters" that "undermined public faith in his competence: his administration's weak response to Hurricane Katrina, which erased his image as a strong leader, and its botched effort at persuading Congress to accept a deal authorizing a Dubai-owned company to operate six U.S. seaports." White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card "refused to 'point fingers' but said Bush is correcting what went wrong and the administration will do better in the future." Card "and other Bush confidants say the chief executive is applying the hands-off style he learned at Harvard Business School," and also "the methods that worked for him as an oilman, as managing partner of the Texas Rangers baseball team, and, later, as governor of Texas." A separate story in U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Clark) reports that management gurus and business executives say Bush's leadership style "has been shaped by his 1975 Harvard M.B.A." However, some "worry that Bush may not be applying some of B-school's most important lessons and may be suffering instead from all-too-typical M.B.A. flaws, such as overconfidence."

Bush Said To Be Distant From Staff, Lawmakers. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Walsh) reports that "aside from his inner circle, Bush is said to be distant from the rest of his staff, jeopardizing morale. Just as important, many members of Congress complain that they don't get their phone calls returned or their ideas considered in the West Wing. Bush, they say, doesn't reach out to them as other chief executives have done." Card "argues that Bush consults privately with more nongovernment friends and civic leaders than outsiders realize."

Bush To Throw Out First Pitch At Reds' Home Opener On April 3. The Cincinnati Enquirer (3/25, Wilkinson, 205K) reported that President Bush "will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday. Bush will take the mound shortly before the 2:10 p.m. start of the Reds' game against the Chicago Cubs on April 3." Bob Castellini, "the Reds' new chief executive officer, has been a Bush supporter, raising more than $100,000 for the president's 2004 re-election campaign. Last month, Castellini was among those who greeted the president at a private home in Indian Hill, where Bush attended a $1.1 million fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine."

GSA Publishes Guidelines For "Alternative Work Arrangements." The Washington Post (3/27, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that "alternative workplace arrangements," are the "future of federal work." The General Services Administration "recently published a bulletin in the Federal Register reminding federal agencies that laws from 1996, 2000 and 2002 encourage alternatives to the office cubicle. … The GSA bulletin offers agencies a helpful guide to the do's and don'ts of alternative work arrangements. It makes clear that agencies can provide new or surplus equipment to telecommuters 'as long as it is clear that the equipment continues to belong to the government.' In addition, the bulletin says, agencies may pay to install telephone lines and necessary equipment, and pay monthly charges, 'in any private residence of an employee who has been authorized to work at home.'"

Gutierrez To Visit Tokyo This Week. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez this week will help Ralph Lauren open his new store in Tokyo. US News adds, "The visit is more than just an administration bid to promote U.S. investment overseas. Turns out the two share a hardscrabble past: Both are the sons of immigrants who started small -- Gutierrez selling cereal out of his car and Lauren selling ties at Brooks Brothers."

WSJournal Says Senate Should Confirm Judges Before Summer Recess. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) says "it's past time Senate Republicans got back to work confirming appeals-court judges. They won't have 55 seats forever. Or perhaps even after November 7. Judges are a key issue for the GOP's base, who could stay home on Election Day rather than turn out for Republicans who shilly-shally about confirming President Bush's nominees. There are 17 vacancies on the appeals bench, including nine pending nominations. They deserve to be filled as soon as possible before the summer recess. … The advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution gives the Senate the duty to vet all federal judicial nominees. Now it's time for the remaining nominees to have the up-or-down floor votes they deserve."

Economist Sees "Minefield Of Risks" Facing US Economy. Allen Sinai, president of Decision Economics, says the US economy is in good shape this year, but believes the long term picture is much more murky. USA Today (3/27, Hagenbaugh, Hansen, 2.31M) reports that Sinai, who was "the most accurate forecaster of the 45 economists surveyed each quarter last year by USA TODAY," says that in the near term, the US economy "is 'in an entrenched and very solid expansion.' But looking to the future, there is a 'minefield of risks' that threatens the economy, Sinai says. He names the budget deficit, rising health care costs, pension problems and the war in Iraq, to name a few. He's also concerned lawmakers in Washington, facing an electorate that has become increasingly concerned about the growing influence of China on the world stage, will start a confrontation with the Asian nation."

Fed Expected To Approve 15th Consecutive Rate Hike. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke today

will convene his first meeting of the Fed's policymakers. The New York Times (3/27, Uchitelle, 1.19M) says the two-day session "is all but certain to end tomorrow afternoon with another quarter-point rise in short-term interest rates, the 15th consecutive increase. That will bring the critical rate the Fed controls to 4.75 percent, up from 1 percent in June 2004, when Mr. Greenspan started the process of steadily increasing borrowing costs. Many analysts expect Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues to raise the rate yet again in May, by another quarter of a point."

Party Strategists Say GOP Would Lose House Control If Election Were Held Today. Time (4/3, Tumulty, Allen) reports that Republican incumbents "are having a hard time figuring out how close they want to be to the White House. … The midterm contests in a President's second term are almost always treacherous, but this time around, Republicans thought it would be different. … In recent weeks, a startling realization has begun to take hold: if the elections were held today, top strategists of both parties say privately, the Republicans would probably lose the 15 seats they need to keep control of the House of Representatives and could come within a seat or two of losing the Senate as well."

Republicans Seek To Paint Democratic Veterans As Single-Issue Candidates. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Gilgoff) reports that Democrats hope that military veterans running for Congress in the midterm elections "will help neutralize the GOP's national security advantage and immunize the party against charges that its Iraq criticisms are unpatriotic." But, the Iraq and Afghanistan vets "are all political newcomers, most facing well-financed incumbents." US News adds, "The biggest challenge for the Democratic war vets may be developing credibility beyond national security. … Republicans are determined to paint Democratic vets as single-issue candidates who are clueless on pocketbook issues."

Bush Approval Rating At 39% In Time Poll. Time (4/3, Tumulty, Allen) reports, "In a TIME poll conducted last week, Bush's job approval rating was mired at 39%; 3 in 5 Americans said the country is headed in the wrong direction, and when those surveyed were given the choice between a generic Republican and a generic Democrat for Congress, the nameless Democrat won, 50% to 41%. The signs suggest an anti-Republican wave is building, says nonpartisan electoral handicapper Stuart Rothenberg." NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds "said the picture is more promising race by race than it is nationally. He told TIME only 36 to 40 races will be in play, meaning Democrats would have to keep all their competitive seats and knock off three-quarters of the Republicans."

Social Conservatives Warn GOP To Be More Aggressive On Values Issues. Social conservative groups have warned Republicans that if they want to see a strong turnout of its conservative base this November, the party must be more aggressive on values issues such as marriage, religious freedom and abortion. The Washington Times (3/27, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Leading conservative activists have been sounding off lately, frustrated that since 2004, when their voters turned out in force to help President Bush win re-election, the Republican Party has backed off the values issues."

Roll Call (3/27, Stanton) reports, "Leaders from more than 40 of the nation's most powerful conservative Christian organizations are gathering in Washington, D.C., this week to put GOP Congressional leaders on notice that they will actively look to keep 'values voters' away from the polls if lawmakers don't make good on commitments to move a 'Christ-centered' legislative agenda." Organizers of this week's conference say they are concerned by a "growing attack on Christian values by liberal lawmakers, Hollywood and the judiciary. Conservatives are gathering today and Tuesday with a handful of their House and Senate allies, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), and Reps. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) and Louie Gohmert (R-Texas). In addition to discussing the status of the "culture war," participants in the conference will map out a legislative agenda, which organizers say will serve as a litmus test for whether their network of conservative activists and clergy will back incumbents in this fall's elections."

Author Says Conference Title Is Overblown. Author Tom Krattenmaker writes in USA Today (3/27, 2.31M) that the conference, called "The War on Christians and the Values Voters in 2006," boasts "a lineup of some of the biggest stars of the so-called Christian right — Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, onetime presidential candidate Gary Bauer and Eagle Forum leader Phyllis Schlafly. The chief organizer is Rick Scarborough, leader of Vision America, a group that describes its purpose as reversing America's moral decline by getting more Bible-believing Christians to participate in the political process. …

Isn't this more than a bit overblown? And in a time when the country is caught up in a real war with religious overtones, shouldn't the word 'war' be tossed around a little less recklessly? … Christians in America are hardly being thrown to the lions. In many ways, the political and social values of conservative Christians are carrying the day. We are in the second term of the most faith-friendly, explicitly Christian presidency in many a decade."

Bush Reaction To Afghan Christian's Trial Said To Have Nothing To Do With Religious Right. Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (3/27) that he was shocked at questions over what President Bush had to do to respond to the possible execution of an Afghan Muslim who had converted to Christianity in order to "satisfy" his base. Rothenberg notes, "I know some journalists are obsessed with the political influence of the religious right, but the idea that the president's response would, to a considerable extent, be crafted to pacify evangelical Republicans is ridiculous." Rothenberg adds, "I suppose it is possible that if an execution takes place, some Americans who have been supporting the war might start to question whether the administration's entire Iraq-Afghanistan policy is right. But that view wouldn't be limited to Christians, and it's not even certain that the execution would change existing views on the president's policies. … Some things involve simple truths that don't require over-interpretation. Like the question of whether it's OK to execute someone because of his or her religious beliefs."

Maryland Democrats Videotape Steele Campaign Stops. Maryland Democrats are videotaping Republican Senate candidate Lt. Gov. Michael Steele's campaign stops and making note of his fundraisers with Bush Administration officials. The Washington Times (3/27, Ward, 90K) reports, "Derek Walker, executive director of the state's Democratic Party, said videotaping is a typical campaign tactic and that party members are 'learning as much as we can' about Mr. Steele. … Mr. Steele, well-aware of Democrats' presence, began a recent campaign stop by talking about his 'following.' 'I know that a lot of people are watching this race very closely, especially the Democrats,' Mr. Steele said."

DCCC To Target Stem Cell Research Opponents. DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel heads to New Jersey today for the first of seven events aimed at highlighting GOP House candidates' opposition to stem cell research. Roll Call (3/27, Kornacki) reports, "At Newark Liberty Airport, Emanuel will join Linda Stender, a 12-year veteran of the New Jersey state Assembly who is challenging three-term Rep. Mike Ferguson (R) in the nearby 7th district. … Emanuel and Stender will criticize the stem-cell research position of Ferguson, who is anti-abortion. Democrats say his opposition to such research puts him at odds with his moderate, suburban constituency. … Emanuel will not appear at the other six events on tap for the week, which will be held in districts generally considered a notch or two more competitive than New Jersey's 7th."

Suit Charges Kerry With Conspiracy, Defamation. Sen. John Kerry set up a legal defense fund last month to fight a civil suit charging him with conspiracy and defamation. The New York Times (3/27, Ivry, 1.19M) reports, "The suit accuses Mr. Kerry and an aide of campaigning to stop the Sinclair Broadcasting Group from showing 'Stolen Honor' and of trying to injure [journalist Carlton] Sherwood's business and reputation." Sherwood called the suit "an effort to make Mr. Kerry answer for having 'defamed and excoriated hundreds of thousands of men, some of them killed in action, just for his own political future.'"

Clinton Strategy Called "Strikingly Similar" To Bush's In 1998. The New York Times (3/27, Kornblut, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that while there is a great deal of speculation about Sen. Hillary Clinton's plans for a possible 2008 presidential bid, the Senator "appears not to have lost sight of 2006 -- judging not only by her painstaking attention to local details during her public appearances, but also by a schedule that frequently takes her to Republican areas across the state." Clinton "appears to be treating her re-election bid as, among other things, a chance to prove her viability in tough parts of the New York, with Democrats and associates saying that she is aiming both to run up a big margin of victory statewide and to exceed expectations in Republican strongholds." The Times adds, "The strategy is strikingly similar to the one used by George W. Bush in 1998, when he ran up the score among Hispanics and moderates in Texas during his re-election campaign as governor, allowing him to promote the results as proof of his broad electoral appeal."

Clinton Amasses "Army" Of Campaign Aides. The New York Post (3/27, Bishop, 624K) reports that although New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) has yet to say if she'll run for president in '08, "she's already drafted a presidential-size army of campaign staffers that dwarfs John McCain's outfit and those of everyone else in the field. Clinton has assembled a Titanic-size troop of 37 staffers and a legion of pricey consultants on the rolls of her HillPAC political-action committee and her Friends of Hillary re-election campaign -- operatives that come on top of the three dozen aides in her Senate office. 'I understand New York is a large state, but this is extraordinary. This operation is built for one thing and one thing only: She's running for president,' said a senior Dem operative."

Book Questions Viability Of Retraining Laid Off Workers. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) excepts the book "The Disposable American: Layoffs and Their Consequences," by Louis Uchitelle, an economics writer for The New York Times. Knopf will publish the book on Tuesday. The book notes, "Saying that the country should solve the skills shortage through education and training became part of nearly every politician's stump speech, an innocuous way to address the politics of unemployment without strengthening either the bargaining leverage of workers or the federal government's role in bolstering labor markets. But training for what? The reality, as the aircraft mechanics discovered, is painfully different from the reigning wisdom. Rather than having a shortage of skills, millions of American workers have more skills than their jobs require." The process of retraining workers "was like a funnel: wide at one end, where all the laid-off workers go in, and narrow at the other, where a limited number gradually emerge into retraining and, if they are lucky, new jobs at decent pay."

Rice Says US, Russia Working On UNSC Agreement On Iran. The AFP (3/26) reported Secretary Rice said "US and Russian diplomats were meeting in a new bid to end the impasse over a UN response to Iran's controversial nuclear program." She "acknowledged during a round of Sunday television talk shows that differences persisted over the language of a UN Security Council statement seeking to keep Iran from pursuing sensitive nuclear work." Rice "said she spoke Friday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and they agreed to have their negotiators work through the weekend in an attempt to hammer out language acceptable to both."

Asked on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) if the US is "prepared to step up the pressure on Moscow…at a time when the Iranians are defying the world's will," Rice said, "The Iranians are defying the world's will, and the international community needs to speak and speak with one voice. We and the Russians and the Europeans and others have the same view. … That is that Iran needs to suspend its enrichment activities and return to negotiation. Nobody believes that Iran should have enrichment and reprocessing capability on its territory, because that is easily transferable or easily convertible into the technology to make a weapon. And so we have agreement on what Iran must do."

Rice was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert) if it is the policy of the US government that Iran "will not be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon." Secretary Rice replied, "Iran cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon. That is the view of the international community, not just the United States. … If they wish to be a part of the international community, they have no choice but to give up ambitions that could lead to the technologies that would lead to a nuclear weapon. If the international community stays really solid here, Iran cannot stand the kind of isolation from the international community that, for instance, North Korea, endures almost by choice. We really do have a chance to solve this diplomatically."

Hadley Dismisses Iranian Overture On Nuclear Issue. Time (4/3, McGeary) reports on efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program. Time says the joint diplomatic offensive "hasn't produced much in the way of results. … The U.S. and Europe have persuaded Russia and China to join them in reporting Iran's failure to cooperate with international demands to the U.N. Security Council, but both countries oppose punitive action such as economic sanctions." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "plans to visit Berlin, Paris and Britain this week in an effort to hammer out a statement that can win unanimous backing in the Security Council. Meanwhile, Tehran has sped up research work on the uranium enrichment that lies at the heart of the dispute." Time adds, "Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, told TIME that the regime may be open to compromise on the nuclear issue. … National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley dismisses Iran's overture as 'simply a device by the Iranians to divert pressure that they are feeling in New York.'"

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president, Iranian politics has shifted so sharply to the right that some traditional conservatives are warning of the dangers of radicalism. With reformists sidelined and Ahmadinejad setting a strident new tone on the global stage, figures from the extreme right of Iran's political spectrum are defining the terms of political debate in the country." The "tension highlights significant divisions within Iran's conservative camp, often viewed from outside the country as a turbaned monolith."

State Department Seeks Applicants To Promote Democracy In Iran. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post (3/27, A13, 744K) excerpts the State Department's "Iran Democracy Program Announcement," which said, "The Office of the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI) announces an open competition for grant applications that support democratic governance and reform in Iran. This represents a new MEPI funding initiative, and submissions must outline activities linked to reform and demonstrate how the proposed approach would achieve sustainable impact in Iran. … MEPI seeks to strengthen the community of Iranian reformers at the local and national levels and support reformers with demonstrated commitment as they work to build broader alliances with new stakeholder groups around issues of core democratic values. MEPI supports programs that link reformers within and across national boundaries and use local organizational capacity to leverage opportunities to advance reform."

Olmert Pledges To Consult US On Separation Plan. The AP (3/26, Lavie) reports, "Two days before a crucial election, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to consult the United States and Europe about his plan to pull out of much of the West Bank, remove settlements and set his country's borders within four years." The AP said Olmert's separation plan "has breathed life into an election campaign that has been sleepy despite earthquakes in Israeli politics." A separate AP (3/26, Plushnick-Masti) piece noted "a lackluster campaign that aroused little emotion," and said "a low turnout could cause the most damage to Olmert's centrist Kadima Party, which is the clear front-runner, analysts said." Continuing its coverage of Israeli politics, the AP (3/26, Nessman) said the Labor Party "faces a flight of the very European voters who are its base," and noted the "ethnic demon" of promoting a candidate – Amir Peretz – who is of Middle Eastern or Sephardis decent. The New York Times (3/27, Erlanger, 1.19M) runs a 1,200-word feature on Olmert, "long on the outskirts of power," whose "extraordinary ideological journey" has culminated in the "extraordinary turn" of events that have put him on the cusp of winning his own mandate.

Russian Immigrant Voters Could Play Key Role In Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Prusher, 61K) reports, "The victor in Tuesday's nationwide parliamentary vote is widely expected to be the Kadima (Forward) Party, representing the legacy of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. But the real cliffhanger is how well vote-getters like Avigdor Lieberman will fare." He "speaks in the mother tongue of most of his supporters: Russian. About 1 in 4 voters in this coastal city is a new immigrant from the former Soviet Union. This polyglot of newcomers, known as 'Russim,' now make up at least 15 percent of the electorate, compromising one of the most influential voting blocs." The Washington Times (3/27, Mitnick, 90K) runs a similar report.

Hamas Cabinet Nominee Says He Will Seek Economic Treaty With Israel. The Washington Times (3/27, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Hamas' nominee for Palestinian finance minister, Omar Abdel Razeq, said yesterday that he hopes to negotiate a new economic treaty with Israel, even though he supports the Islamic militant party's refusal to recognize the Jewish state for peace talks." The Times adds, "The desire to embrace Israel in what would amount to a major treaty indicates how Hamas politicians and the ministerial nominees have resigned themselves to a de facto acknowledgement of Israel to improve the daily lives of their constituents."

Dealing With Hamas Poses Dilemma For US, EU. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, King Jr., Champion, 2.11M) reports, "With Hamas likely to form a new government by the end of this week, the US and Europe must decide how to interact with a transformed Palestinian Authority." The US, Europe and Israel "say they will do nothing directly to prop up a Hamas government that refuses to recognize Israel or renounce violence. Yet they also worry that cutting off Western aid -- totaling roughly $1.3 billion last year, or about one-third of the territories' economy -- would sow chaos and political convulsions, with dire consequences for the region." US officials "see their looming face-off with Hamas as a template for dealing with other militant Islamist governments that may come to power through elections elsewhere in the region. … Even basic questions, such as how to sustain humanitarian help while cutting off direct aid, are hard to tackle."

Afghan Christian's Case Likely To Reverberate With US Religious Right. Time (4/3) reports in its "Notebook" column, "When news trickled out of Kabul late last month that a former aid worker named Abdul Rahman, 41, was on trial for converting to Christianity, the U.S. government responded with dismay -- but not much else. … Religious leaders in the U.S. assailed the White House, with activists like Jay Sekulow…bombarding Karl Rove's evangelical liaison with e-mail." Time adds that "the right-wing furor over the Rahman case is likely to reverberate. To many Americans, the fact that Christian converts face prosecution in a country 'liberated' by the U.S. in 2002 has bolstered the perception that the divide between Islam and the West is growing."

Schumer, Graham At Odds Over Progress On Chinese Currency. The New York Times (3/27, Bradsher, 1.19M) reports, "After a weeklong trip to China, two senators who have been pushing Chinese leaders to devalue their nation's currency say they do not agree on how much progress China is making. The split indicates that they are less likely to press for a Senate vote on their trade bill this week." Sens. Charles E. Schumer and Lindsey Graham "have introduced legislation that would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on all American imports from China in two years." The senators "both said in an interview here Saturday that they remained committed to advancing the legislation unless China stopped intervening in currency markets and allowed the yuan to move higher against the dollar." But "they also said that Senator Schumer had been more impressed than Senator Graham by promises from Chinese officials to liberalize their currency policies." Asked "whether the newest development from the trip was the emergence of some differences between the two men," Schumer replied, "That would be fair."

The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "The good news is that Senators Lindsey Graham and Charles Schumer have started to inch away from their misguided attempt to club China for its currency policies. At the end of a fact-finding trip last week, Mr. Schumer told reporters he was no longer sure he would push for a vote to impose tariffs on Chinese imports into the United States. 'The jury is out,' he said." The Administration, adds the Times, "has done a fair job so far in its tap dance around America's relationship with the world's fastest-growing economy. Now is not the time to slide back into election-year shortsightedness."

Yushchenko Allies Finish "Humiliating" Third In Parliamentary Elections. The Financial Times (3/27, Wagstyl, Donetsk) reports Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko "looked set for a humiliating defeat" by "both Yulia Tymoshenko, his former ally in the Orange Revolution, and Viktor Yanukovich, his opponent in the disputed 2004 presidential election." The Times says the loss "will complicate efforts to form a coalition, creating fresh political uncertainty as the country struggles to come to terms with the Orange Revolution's aftermath." While Yanukovich finished first, the Times says, "in a shock result, Ms Tymoshenko beat Mr Yushchenko into third place." The Times predicted that Yuschenko and Tymoshenko "could probably command enough seats for a parliamentary majority. But it is unclear whether they will be able to swallow their personal and political differences." The Wall Street Journal (3/27, A3, Chazan, 2.11M) says the results show "plummeting support for the country's Western-oriented president," who "may now be forced into a coalition with his erstwhile enemy, Viktor Yanukovych." His third-place finish "would mark a humiliating defeat for Mr. Yushchenko" and "a setback for pro-European forces in Ukraine," which is part of "the regional tug of war for influence between Russia and the West." The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M), Washington Post (3/27, A10, Finn, 744K) and Washington Times (3/27, Feduschak, 90K), among other newspapers, also report on the election results.

Belarus Opposition Leader Seized By Police. In the latest effort by President Aleksandr Lukashenko to crush the protest movement, the New York Times (3/27, Chivers, 1.19M) reports opposition leader Aleksandr Kazulin "was seized Saturday when riot police officers with batons attacked a column of peaceful protesters who were marching to a prison where opposition members had been jailed." The Austrian EU Presidency "said in a statement on Sunday that the Union 'is appalled by the violence used against demonstrators' and called for the release of Mr. Kazulin and the other protesters." In a pessimistic piece entitled "Belarus Divided, Doubtful After Clashes," the AP (3/26, Gutterman) said, "Many Belarusians now are confronting an array of unanswered questions: It is unclear how much support the opposition really has, how much dissent authorities will tolerate or what effect a stream of denunciations from the West will have."

Blair Said To Have Handover Date In Mind. The Financial Times (3/27, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair has admitted for the first time that he has decided when he will resign as prime minister. However, he is not yet revealing the date." The Times says Blair wants to ensure that National Health Service reforms are implemented and an orderly transfer to Gordon Brown is laid out before stepping aside.

Alleged Sale Of Lordships Taints Blair's Government. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Rice-Oxley, 61K) reports, "Will a million pounds make you a 'Sir' or a 'Lord' in Britain today? That's what British police are investigating, following complaints that Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour party rewarded four big financial backers with the promise of seats in the House of Lords, the unelected upper house of parliament that wields considerable influence." The "murky controversy has intensified pressure on Blair to step down and revived a debate about how politics should be funded here." A recent poll "showed 56 percent of voters believed the loans-for-lordships allegations were true, and almost three-quarters agree that Blair's government is now as tainted by sleaze as that of his predecessor, John Major."

Bush Administration Seen As Contributing To Blair Decline. The Weekly Standard (4/3, Baker) reports the "gathering consensus now asserts" that British Prime Minister Tony Blair "will not, in spite of his own ambition and energy, reach the full decade in office he had hoped for." The Bush Administration "will have played a substantial part in Blair's demise. The Iraq war, of course, has undermined the prime minister; but the Bush administration seems oddly committed to making life even more difficult for him." Britain is "in a state of angry ferment about the way its defense contracts have been handled by the Americans. A decision by the Pentagon to cut a British company out of the procurement contracts for the new Joint Strike Fighter has outraged public opinion and led even this most Atlanticist of governments to think seriously about striking out in a new direction with European partners, rather than be more closely integrated with U.S. defense systems. Quite how a beleaguered administration can still find room to alienate one of its few allies in the world is perhaps only for Donald Rumsfeld to explain. But the damage done to Blair's claim that his support for the United States has produced tangible benefits for the United Kingdom is incalculable."

Berlusconi Trails Challenger. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Kahn, 2.11M) reports, "Just two weeks before national elections, Italy's conservative Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi trails challenger Romano Prodi by three to six percentage points, according to polls -- a gap that analysts say will be difficult to close." Friday "marked the last day in which opinion polls could be published under Italian election rules before the April 9-10 voting. A poll conducted by GfK Eurisko, published in left-leaning Rome daily La Repubblica, had Mr. Prodi's center-left coalition taking 51.7% of the vote in the lower house of Parliament, compared with 46.6% for Mr. Berlusconi's alliance of center-right parties. The margin was tighter in the Senate, with the left gaining 51.4% of the vote compared with 47.1% for the right, according to GfK Eurisko."

Pressure Growing On Australia To Dismantle Wheat Export Monopoly. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Barta, 2.11M) reports, "Pressure is mounting on Australia to dismantle its powerful wheat-export monopoly amid allegations that it paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime to win lucrative wheat contracts in Iraq." Australia "ranks as the world's second-biggest exporter of wheat, behind the US, according to US Department of Agriculture statistics, and is a major competitor for US and European farmers overseas."

Persian Gulf Stock Markets Dropping. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Karmin, El-Rashidi, 2.11M) reports, "The Persian Gulf's highflying stock markets, suffering their first serious correction after years of gains, are raising concerns that a speculative bubble may burst and hurt emerging markets more broadly. Fueled by cash from high oil prices," stock markets in Dubai, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi and "elsewhere in the Gulf have tripled or more in value in the past three years." But "in recent weeks, these stocks have suffered double-digit losses, with Saudi Arabia, the region's biggest stock market, shedding about a third of its value since late February." The declines "underscore the risks of emerging-market investing."

"Backlash" Against Privatizations Mounting In Latin America. The Washington Post (3/27, A10, Reel, 744K) reports from Argentina that a "backlash against the private sector has been building for several years in many pockets" of Latin America, and "in some cases, such as Bolivia and Mexico, it has been actively promoted by grass-roots leaders in tandem with their demands for limiting the influence of foreign interests. … In the past year, protests against the privatization of other sectors, including electricity and energy, have broken out in Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala and Mexico. Last week, several thousand demonstrators marched through Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, to demand the government improve water services without privatizing them."

Islamic Militias, Warlords Continue Fight For Control Of Somalia. The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A11) reports, "Radical Islamic militiamen and rivals buried their dead Sunday and brought in more fighters during a lull after four days of combat on the outskirts of Mogadishu, witnesses said. So far, at least 93 people have died and nearly 200 have been wounded in the violence." A "prominent moderate Islamic scholar appealed to the warring sides not to restart the fighting, which ranks among the deadliest in recent years in the nominal capital of this Horn of Africa country." Somalia "has been without a working government for 15 years. The recent battles involve a militia supporting hard-line Islamic clerics who are trying to expand their influence and fighters loyal to businessmen and Somali warlords who have formed an alliance to oppose the religious movement."

International Court Urges Nigeria To Arrest Former Liberian Leader. The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A11) reports, "The international war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone urged Nigeria on Sunday to immediately arrest Charles Taylor, Liberia's exiled former president, because of fears the former president might flee to avoid trial for crimes against humanity." Nigeria "said Saturday it was ready to hand over Taylor, sending a warning to other warmongers on the continent."

US Urged To Take Lead In Rebuilding Liberia. Ambassador Andrew Young, who served at the United Nations, and Peter V. Emerson, director of the Southern Africa Enterprise Development Fund, write in the Washington Times (3/27, 90K) that "rebuilding Liberia is not only a moral obligation; it is, make no mistake, imperative to US national security. Liberia's ties to America are frequently underplayed here, but those very ties define its position in Africa." A "resurgent Liberia will anchor West Africa, serving as a beacon for emerging democratic movements." The Bush Administration "made a promise to Africa and must now follow through on that commitment to growth by unveiling a Marshall-style infrastructural recovery plan."

Play Depicts Life In North Korean Prison Camp. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 13, 2:30, Litke, 8.78M) reported on a "ground-shaking new musical in South Korea, part 'Miss Saigon,' part 'Les Misérables' and part 'The Producers,' a tale of a prison camp where starvation, torture and execution are a way of life and death. And this production doesn't shy away from any of it. For the writer/director, it's all very personal, a northern defector whose entire family was executed after he fled. He says South Koreans, today, have little knowledge of, or interest in, the atrocities in the North. So, he hopes to reach them, through the most popular forms of entertainment here -- music and soap operas that tug at the heart strings." But "many here in South Korea are not amused. Government officials tried to stop the play from ever being staged. There were death threats against some members of the production and all because it is too harsh on the communist North. Goodwill and reconciliation is now official government policy between the Koreas."

Airbus Conducts Successful Evacuation Drill On A380. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 5, 0:20, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "In Hamburg, Germany today, Airbus held an evacuation drill onboard the world's largest passenger jet. Officials are calling the simulated exercise, a 'great success,' despite 33 people being hurt. The company said they were able to get 873 people off the plane in only 90 seconds, with half the doors blocked."

NYTimes Criticizes French Protesters. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "For the second time in four months, French streets are filled with riot police, tear gas and rampaging youths. But the similarity is deceptive. Back in November, it was the sons of North African immigrants in their dreary suburbs exploding in frustration at the lack of jobs, prospects or programs. It was hard not to feel sympathy with their cause, along with outrage at their response." This time, "privileged university students have been protesting what they see as an assault on the job security that they consider their birthright. But the labor reform to which they are so opposed is much needed and was proposed by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin as a partial answer to those who rioted in the suburbs." Students "should stop focusing on their privileges and heed President Jacques Chirac's call for a creative dialogue about how they can help resolve the real problem facing their generation."

WSJournal Takes On Chirac. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) criticizes French President Jacques Chirac. Says the Journal, "It is hard to think of anyone who has done more than this president to marginalize France and the French language -- all in the name of defending them."

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Counter-Terrorism Surveillance Has Extended To Antiwar, Activist Groups. Under the headline "FBI Keeps Watch on Activists," The Los Angeles Times (3/27, A1, Riccardi, 958K) reports, "The FBI, while waging a highly publicized war against terrorism, has spent resources gathering information on antiwar and environmental protesters and on activists who feed vegetarian meals to the homeless," according to FBI documents obtained by the ACLU and released over recent months. But citing "the recent arrest of environmental activists accused of firebombing an unfinished ski resort in Vail," FBI spokesman Bill Carter said, "It's one thing to express an idea or such, but when you commit acts of violence in support of that activity, that's where our interest comes in." Still, ACLU of Colorado legal director Mark Silverstein said, "It certainly seems they're casting a net much more widely than would be necessary to thwart something like the blowing up of the Oklahoma City federal building."

NYTimes Says White House Should Press FBI On IT Upgrade. Under the headline "Keystone Komputers," a New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorial criticizes the FBI effort to update its computer system, noting, "After 9/11, the bureau started an urgent and very expensive program to fix the problem. But now we discover…that the search for high-tech sleuthing could take four more years and a half-billion dollars. … Most alarming of all, the inspector general concluded that even if the F.B.I. finally came up with a workable model, there would be no guarantee that it would solve the most crucial issue — agents' inability to share information with the myriad of other government departments involved in the detection of terrorism. Surely the White House should be prodding the bureau to do better."

Supreme Court Review Of Hamdan Case Raises Historic Questions. The New York Times (3/27, Greenhouse, 1.19M) reports that the Supreme Court decision to review the lawsuit by Osama bin Laden's former driver, Salim Ahmed Hamdan – which challenges the plan to try him by military commission – "appeared to mark a resumption of a struggle for supremacy between the court and the White House," but "no one foresaw…that the case...would present the Supreme Court with an additional and perhaps even greater challenge. In the face of a measure that Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in late December to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over cases brought by detainees" at Guantánamo, "the court must decide whether it retains the right to proceed with this case at all. For a court that has been highly protective of its own prerogatives, but at the same time notably attentive to the often arcane limits on federal court jurisdiction, the question is one of great delicacy, infused with historical resonance."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Richey, 61K) also reports that the Hamdan case "has the potential to become one of the most important US Supreme Court decisions of this generation. It will test the scope of presidential power in the war on terror. It may clarify how detained Al Qaeda suspects are treated by the US. More broadly, it challenges the justices to further define the balance of power among the three branches of government during times of national emergency." The Washington Times (3/27, Taylor, 90K) notes, "The dispute will be the first major case involving presidential war powers since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined the court. Supreme Court scholars generally agree the legal future of the war on terrorism hinges on the case, which presents the high court with the chance to rule on the power of the executive branch to try terror suspects outside the bounds of U.S. courts."

Scalia Reportedly Said Detainees Have No Right To Civil Court Trial. USA Today (3/27, 6A, 2.31M) reports, "Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the idea that detainees at Guantanamo Bay…have constitutional rights and called European concerns over the issue hypocritical, Newsweek magazine reported Sunday. 'War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts,' Scalia purportedly said in a private appearance March 8 at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland." Center for Constitutional Rights president Michael Ratner said, "If he's made up his mind on a particular issue, he shouldn't be sitting" in the Hamdan case, although "Scalia did not refer specifically to that case, Newsweek said." The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A3) notes, "The comments came just weeks before the justices are to take up an appeal from a detainee at Guantanamo Bay. The court will hear arguments tomorrow on…Hamdan's assertion that President Bush overstepped his constitutional authority in ordering a military trial for the former driver of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden."

Human Rights Group Wants Scalia To Recuse Himself From Hamdan Case. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that the Supreme Court this week will hear a case concerning whether the Bush Administration can try Gitmo detainees in special military tribunals in which the accused have limited rights. Newsweek notes that Justice Antonin Scalia "has already spoken his mind about some of the issues in the matter," dismissing "the idea that the detainees have rights under the U.S. Constitution or international conventions." The human rights group the Center for Constitutional Rights has filed a brief in behalf of the Gitmo detainees seeking Scalia's recusal from the case. Other experts "said it was a closer call. Scalia didn't refer directly to this week's case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, though issues at stake hinge in part on whether the detainees deserve legal protections that make the military tribunals unfair."

WPost Says Pentagon "Bungled" Creation Of Tribunals. The Washington Post (3/27, 744K) editorializes, "The Supreme Court hears arguments tomorrow in perhaps the most important case of the term -- a case that, had the Bush administration acted responsibly at any time in the past 4 1/2 years, would not even be in court." The Post adds, "The administration was right that some alternative form of military trial for accused terrorists captured abroad was essential," but "the military sought to design a new system from scratch," and "it has bungled. … Whatever the court decides on the law, the administration needs to fix this stillborn system."

Analysts Say US Witnesses Made Uncertain Case Against Moussaoui. Under the headline "Uncertainty Clouds Last Days Of Moussaoui's Sentencing Trial," USA Today (3/27, Johnson, 2.31M) reports, "Without Harry Samit, confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui might never have been arrested," but "by the time Samit left the witness stand…his testimony about repeated and unsuccessful efforts to alert superiors of Moussaoui's potential danger may prove more beneficial to the terrorist than the government. Prosecutors rested their case…but many of the government's witnesses have made it clear how difficult it may be for the government to prevail in the landmark terrorism case, legal analysts said." University of Maryland law professor Michael Greenberger observed, "It's not at all clear that had Moussaoui told them everything, the FBI would have been able to do anything."

Senate Panel Schedules Hearing On Feingold Censure Resolution. Roll Call (3/27, Brotherton) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for Friday on Sen. Russell Feingold's resolution to censure the President for his National Security Agency domestic surveillance program, "setting up the possibility of a floor showdown." A Republican aide "indicated…that the focus of the hearing, scheduled for March 31, will be to provide a forum for debate over the merits of the proposed censure measure." Republican leaders are "eager to get Democrats on the record on the issue of censuring Bush, believing that such a vote would seriously undercut Democrats' ability to convince the electorate that they are strong on protecting America from terrorist threats."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Hong Kong Firm Defends Bid For US Port Security Contract. The Wall Street Journal/AP (3/27) reports Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. "defended its plans to help scan US-bound cargo for terror threats at a port in the Bahamas where no U.S. customs agents are present." The company "added that it isn't feasible or practical for U.S. officials to work in ports across the globe. The best option for the U.S. is to rely on trusted agents using sophisticated inspection equipment to scan shipments at ports abroad, said John Meredith, group managing director for Hutchison Port Holdings, Hutchison's maritime subsidiary and the world's largest ports company."

Senate To Consider Reforms Of Foreign Investment Review Process. The Washington Times (3/27, Waterman, 90K) reports "the issue of foreign -- and especially Gulf-Arab -- ownership of U.S. critical infrastructure" will be "front and center" in the Senate. Several "competing bills in both chambers of Congress aim to reform the process by which the federal government assesses the national security implications of foreign takeovers of U.S. companies or assets." In the "wake of the derailment of the Dubai ports takeover, lawmakers' concerns threaten another acquisition by the tiny oil-rich emirate." Dubai International Capital, "an investment company owned by the emirate's ruling al-Maktoum family, signed a deal last year to acquire a privately held British aerospace company called Doncasters Group Ltd."

Experts Concerned About Security At Nuclear Research Reactors. USA Today (3/27, Diamond, 2.31M) reports that according to Linton Brooks, director of the National Nuclear Security Administration, "One-third of the world's 130 civilian nuclear research reactors lack security upgrades needed to prevent theft of materials that terrorists could use to build an atomic bomb." He told USA Today that "most of these reactors use highly enriched uranium, the easiest fuel used to make atomic bombs." Former senator Sam Nunn, who helped create the 1991 US plan to secure nuclear materials, said world "research reactor security efforts are 'at about 3' on a 1-to-10 scale with 10 being safest."

Security Lacking At Rail Depots Holding Toxic Chemicals. The New York Times (3/27, Kocieniewski, 1.19M) reports that security at the Oak Island rail depot in Newark, New Jersey "is so lax that a reporter and photographer recently spent 10 minutes driving along a rail bed beside cars holding toxic chemicals without being challenged, or even approached, by railroad employees." The Time notes Homeland Security Secretary Michael

Chertoff's announcement Tuesday of new chemical plant security proposals, but adds that "the public could be left vulnerable by the railways running in and out of many of them." Meanwhile, Chertoff's speech "made only passing reference to the risks of transporting the deadly cargo, and there is no indication that the department will require the kind of changes in equipment and procedures that security experts say will reduce the risk of a terrorist attack or catastrophic accident."

NYC Runs Drill Involving Chemical Explosion On Freight Train. The New York Times (3/27, Chan, 1.19M) reports New York City ran a four-hour simulation yesterday involving the explosion of a bomb filled with arsenic trichloride "on a freight train moving through a Queens railyard — just when a commuter train carrying weekend passengers was traveling in the other direction." The exercise, funded by $700,000 from the federal Department of Homeland Security, was "named Trifecta because it emphasized three activities: search and rescue, victim identification and handling of the dead. Despite the grim nature of the exercise — the casualties would have included 74 injured — the commissioner of emergency management, Joseph F. Bruno, said it demonstrated the effectiveness of the Citywide Incident Management System, a protocol that governs how various city agencies are to interact during a major emergency."

TSA To Begin Screening At NYC Heliport Today. USA Today (3/27, Hall, 2.31M) reports, "A new helicopter service begins whisking passengers from Wall Street to New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport today," marking "the first time the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has done screening at a heliport since the agency took over airport security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks." Federal screeners and explosive-detection equipment will be sent "to the Lower Manhattan heliport so passengers and their bags can be checked before being delivered to the airport," which Rep. Bennie Thompson calls "a serious misuse of federal monies." However, TSA official Douglas Hofsass said the move is necessary to avoid passengers and their bags "flying through the city's airspace unchecked."

New York Notifies 24 Families About Release Of 911 Call Recordings. The AP (3/27, Butler) reports New York City has "sent out letters to 24 families of people killed in the Sept. 11 attacks advising them that partial transcripts and recordings of 911 calls made by the victims soon will be released to the public because of a court order." The letters "advised only family members whose dead relatives could be identified from the calls recorded by police and fire department operators." The "imminent release of the records was ordered by a judge in a case brought by The New York Times and nine family members of victims under the state's Freedom of Information law seeking fire department records." But the letters "took some Sept. 11 family members by surprise, a family advocate said."

WAR NEWS:

Report Says Russian Ambassador Was Spying For Saddam. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that a new Pentagon report says that before the US invasion Iraq in 2003, the Russian ambassador in Baghdad "gave the Iraqi regime significant intelligence about CENTCOM's war plans." Newsweek adds, "If true, the account could complicate U.S.-Russian relations, which are already strained over Iran's nuclear program and other issues." Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service "issued a statement calling the accusation 'baseless.'" Newsweek also notes that if the Russians were giving Saddam intel, "it wasn't very good. The report says that Ambassador Vladimir Titorenko told Saddam the U.S. attack out of Kuwait was a diversion -- it wasn't -- and that the invasion wouldn't occur until mid-April, after the Fourth Infantry Division was in place in Turkey, according to the documents. That, too, was false."

Rice Says US Will Probe Possible Prewar Collusion Between Russia, Iraq. The New York Times (3/27, Weisman, 1.19M) reports Secretary Rice "said Sunday that the United States would seek clarification from Russia of an American military report that it had helped pass information to Iraq before the 2003 invasion, but she declined to make any specific allegations about Russian involvement." Rice was quoted saying the US will "look very carefully" at documents and other evidence of Moscow-Baghdad collusion. The AP (3/26, Daniel) summarized Rice's comments on several talk shows, and reported Senator Edward Kennedy "said if the report is found to be true, the administration should reassess its relationship with Russia and reconsider President Bush's participation in a July summit meeting in St. Petersburg, Russia." The Washington Post (3/27, A12, 744K) runs a similar AP story.

The Financial Times (3/27, Daniel) reports "a US military study released by the Pentagon alleges that the Russian ambassador in Iraq provided information collected from inside the American Central Command in Doha to Saddam Hussein." The documents, from March and April 2003, "included forecasts of planned troop numbers and US tactics to focus on Baghdad, rather than to target Iraqi cities during the invasion, the study alleges." USA Today (3/27, reports, 2.31M) notes "the Russian Foreign Intelligence Service has dismissed the allegation."

On NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert), Rice said, "I certainly think there is a lot to this report, but we really haven't had a chance to look at the documents in detail, intend to do that and then to raise it with the Russian government. I would hope the Russian government would take it seriously. … I really do think that the Russians have generally done what they said they would do. They said they were going to oppose the Iraq war and they did. And they told us that from the very beginning. … I don't want to jump to the conclusion that this was something that was ordered out of the Kremlin." Rice replied similarly on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) and CNN's late Edition (3/26, Blitzer) when asked about the reports of leaked invasion plans.

Appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger) National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said, "We know there's a document. We know that got into the hands of the Iraqis. We know that it dealt with war plans that we had. And for that reason, we take very seriously. … There are a lot of things we don't know. We don't know how they got it out of Centcom. We don't know whether what the ambassador did was authorized or not. So there are further questions that we need to raise, but it's a serious matter and we'll be talking to the Russians about it."

Sen. Pat Roberts, on CNN's Late Edition (3/26, Blitzer), said, "I'm not surprised by this. You know, we're going to have a briefing on the intelligence committee, so we'll get to the bottom of it. The Russians have already answered and said, absolutely not, this was not directed by, you know, President Putin or by Moscow. The supposition is that this was a local individual working with Iraq at that particular time."

Sen. Carl Levin, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) said, "Things like that happen with intelligence by various countries. … Anything is possible in the area of intelligence. I would not jump to any conclusion one way or the other without a much deeper investigation. But if, in fact, they did it, it, number one, wouldn't surprise me, but it would be very disgusting if they did."

US Presence In Iraq Seen As Most Important Question Facing Bush Successor. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Barnes) reports that until last week, President Bush had "avoided voicing" the reality that the US' mission in Iraq will not be completed during his administration. US News adds, "What is far from obvious, though, is the composition of that force. The American presence could look much as it does today, with the bulk of the forces being combat brigades. Or it could be that much of the infantry will be gone and that teams of advisers and trainers will make up the majority of a far smaller force." US News also notes that there will be "no getting around the reality that the U.S. presence in Iraq probably will be one of the most important questions facing Bush's successor."

Hadley Rejects Suggestion US Ought To Boycott G-8 Meeting In Russia. Asked on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger) to comment on Sen. Ted Kennedy's suggestion that the US boycott the G-8 meeting in Russia this summer, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley said, "It's going to be interesting this year, because the attention of the international community is going to be focused on St. Petersburg this summer, and one of the questions they're going to raise is what about democracy in Russia? And we think this is actually a good thing. It's going to challenge Russia. It's going to challenge President Putin to make clear and answer some of the concerns that the international has raised. This is not the Soviet Union. And one of the things you have to think about is, if you want to encourage democracy in Russia, do you want to kick Russia out of all these institutions that are trying to enshrine these values that we would like to. … I think at this point we think there's a lot of value in going forward with the G-8." The Washington Times (3/27, Hudson, 90K) also notes Hadley's comments this morning.

Rice Says Iraqi Factions Making Progress Toward Unity Government. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was asked on CNN's Late Edition (3/26, Blitzer) to describe the progress the Iraqis are making toward s the formation of a "government of national unity," Rice answered, "The Iraqis are working on a government of national unity. They're doing it, to be totally -- more slowly than we would hope. And we've pressed that they need to expedite because of the potential for a political vacuum. But if you look at what they're doing, they are not, as I've sometimes read, dividing the spoils of who's going to get what job. They are very involved in trying to deal with some of the most sensitive and existential issues for the new Iraq as they begin to put together a program by which the national government, the government of national unity, would actually govern."

Levin Urges Bush To Apply Further Pressure On Iraqi Parties. Sen. Carl Levin, was asked on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) for his assessment of the political situation in Iraq, Levin responded, "That there's a gridlock and that the Iraqi leaders are going to count on us to protect them, and we should make it very clear to them that we're only going to continue to be there if they work out a political compromise, and that's the message they've not received. … . Senator Collins, Jack Reed of Rhode Island and I asked the president to make it clear to the Iraqis that our continued presence in Iraq is dependent upon the Iraqis working out a broad-based political agreement."

US To Train Local Iraqi Officials. USA Today (3/27, Frank, 2.31M) reports, "Efforts to build local governments across Iraq started in 2003 when the U.S.-led occupying authority appointed community leaders to dozens of local district councils." Baghdad "has 15 councils: nine inside the city of 5 million and six on the outskirts. Each has a couple dozen unpaid members." Yesterday, US Ambassador

Zalmay Khalilzad "announced the creation of a US-led team to teach the Baghdad provincial council how to solicit bids for a project, accept the best offer and manage a contract. Other US-led teams have been operating in three Iraqi provinces since November. Each province is expected to have its own team by this summer, Speckhard said."

US, Iraqi Forces Clashed With Al Sadr's Shiite Militia. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Boudreaux, 958K), "At least 17 Iraqis were killed Sunday night when US and Iraqi special forces stormed a mosque and clashed with Shiite Muslim militiamen, police officials said, further inflaming the country as its leaders struggled to form a new government and stem sectarian violence." The Times adds "an Iraqi police official said the dead were Shiite worshipers at the Mustafa mosque in northeast Baghdad." The incident "is politically explosive because the mosque is a stronghold of followers of the radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Iranian-backed movement has a powerful bloc in parliament and a large sectarian militia."

ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 2, 1:40, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "Radical Shiite Muslims say the men killed…were unarmed funeral mourners, who died during an unprovoked raid on a mosque by US and Iraqi forces. However, a coalition press release says US and Iraqi forces did conduct a raid tonight, but no mosques were entered or damaged. The military says 16 insurgents were killed, part of a terrorist cell responsible for conducting attacks and kidnapping Iraqi civilians. Whoever's right, this incident appears to pit the US military against the Shiite militia controlled by the fiery cleric, Muqtada al Sadr."

The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Shishkin, 2.11M) reports "the Shiite political scene is dominated by two rival forces: the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq and a movement led by radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. As the Shiites consolidated control over key levers of national power in the past year, the conflict between Sciri and the Sadr movement has grown." Tensions within the Shiite camp "show that Iraq's problems go beyond classification by sect and ethnicity." USA Today (3/27, reports, 2.31M) and the New York Times (3/27, Gettleman, 1.19M) also report on the violence.

Car Bomb Kills 15 Outside Mosul Police Recruiting Center. CNN (3/27) reports on its web site, "At least 15 people were killed outside a police recruitment center in northern Iraq Monday, when a suicide car bomber detonated, a base employee told CNN. The casualties are believed to be recruits and officers." The attack took place "at Kifak Base, which is located between Tal Afar and Mosul."

Corpses Of 30 Beheaded Iraqis Found Near Baqubah. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 3, 0:10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "One other grim note from Iraq -- 30 beheaded corpses were found today in a village near Baqubah. Authorities have no information yet on the identities of the victims or who is responsible for their deaths."

Doctor Admits To Killing At Least 35 Police Officers. The Washington Post (3/27, A12, Anderson, 744K) reports, "A doctor has admitted killing at least 35 Iraqi police officers and army soldiers by giving them lethal injections, reopening their wounds or engaging in other deadly acts while they were being treated at a hospital in the northern city of Kirkuk, according to Kurdish security sources and Kurdish television." Kurdish television "broadcast on Sunday what it said was the doctor's taped confession, in which he told police that he sympathized with the radical Sunni Arab insurgent group Ansar al-Sunna."

Author Lays Out Tactics To Eliminate Insurgency While Protecting Civilians. Author A. C. Grayling writes in the New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) that "one question that a watchful press should be asking of the American-led forces in Iraq is how carefully, and how successfully, they are applying the 'doctrine of distinction' laid down in the laws of war, which requires that combatants be distinguished from noncombatants so that the latter can be protected." Grayling says "the solution is not to abandon the doctrine of distinction but to apply it with a vengeance." One strategy would involve "physically moving a civilian population from troubled areas into camps," depriving "insurgents of cover and support." Another tactic "would be to cordon off the most toxic part of the Sunni Triangle, letting nobody in or out except under stringent controls at the perimeter, across which only food and medicine could move. "

More Commentary. Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, writes in today's Washington Post (3/27, A15, 744K), "Administration officials have been right in recent weeks to argue that there is no large-scale civil war underway in Iraq. As long as the Iraqi political leadership remains generally united in trying to calm the situation, and as long as sectarian violence remains more sporadic than strategic (with no systematic ethnic cleansing, for example), true civil war remains a threat rather than a reality." He adds that "preventing a civil war is primarily a political task," but "if the political process continues to falter and the risk of civil war looms larger, we will also need a military plan for quelling it."

Rumsfeld's Ten Objectives For Iraq Victory Have Been Met. The Washington Post (3/27, A13, Kamen, 744K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "On April 9, 2003, three weeks after the invasion of Iraq, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld clearly set out the 10 objectives to be achieved 'before victory can be declared.'" The Post lists Rumsfeld's ten objectives, including the capture of Saddam Hussein, securing the northern oil fields, locating Baath Party members, records and weapons caches, and notes that all have been met.

Rice Says "Significant Drawdown" Of US Troops In Iraq "Probable" This Year. Asked on NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert) to comment on President Bush's statement that US troops will remain in Iraq for at least the next few years, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "The President was asked this question in a particular way, and he answered that some American troops may well be there for the next president. But I would just point to what the president has said continually, which is that American forces are going to come down commensurate with the need as Iraqi forces stand up. And they are indeed standing up. General Casey has talked about a significant reduction of American forces over the next year. And that significant reduction is because Iraqi forces are taking and holding territory now, because during this most recent uptick of sectarian violence, the Iraqi army behaved very, very well. So Iraqi forces are getting better. American forces are ceding territory, and it's entirely probable we will see a significant drawdown of American forces over the next year." Appearing on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) Rice also said "it is entirely likely that there will be draw downs of American forces over this next year."

Commenting on Rice assessment of US troop levels in Iraq, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger), said, "The point that Secretary Rice was making and the point that the president has made is that we anticipate we will be able to draw down, but this is a decision that's going to be made on the basis of the recommendation of the commanders in the field, based on the abilities of the Iraqis to take responsibility for security and for the political process to move forward."

Republican Lawmakers Join Call For House Debate On Iraq. Roll Call (3/27, Ben Pershing) reports, "A bipartisan group of lawmakers began a new effort last week to attract support for the idea of holding a lengthy House floor debate on Iraq policy." On Wednesday, Republican Reps. Walter Jones Jr., Ron Paul and Wayne Gilchrest "joined Democratic Reps. Neil Abercrombie (Hawaii), Ike Skelton (Mo.) and Marty Meehan (Mass.) in co-signing a 'Dear Colleague' letter calling for "an open and honest debate on the future of US policy in Iraq." The six signatories "encouraged their colleagues to sign a discharge petition for H.Res. 543, a rule that would allow floor consideration of a resolution introduced by Abercrombie in 2005 requiring President Bush 'to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal' of American troops from Iraq."

"Deepening And Hardening" Opposition To Iraq War Seen Around US. The New York Times (3/27, Kirkpatrick, Nagourney, 1.19M) reports from Albuquerque, NM, that President Bush "is pressing ahead with an intensified effort to shore up support for the war, but an increasingly skeptical and pessimistic public is putting pressure on Congress about the wisdom behind it, testing the political support for the White House's determination to remain in Iraq." The results "have been on display over the past week as members of Congress returned home and heard first-hand what public opinion polls have been indicating." The Times adds, "Interviews with voters, elected officials and candidates around the country suggest a deepening and hardening opposition to the war. Historians and analysts said this might mark a turning point in public perception."

Kurtz Says Media Coverage Of Iraq Carries Echoes Of Vietnam. Howard Kurtz writes in his "Media Notes" column in the Washington Post (3/27, C1, 744K), "In increasingly aggressive questions to President Bush and Vice President Cheney, in a growing focus on the death toll in Iraq, in downbeat assessments on the invasion's third anniversary, many journalists now reflect the view that the war has gone horribly wrong. … What is undeniable is that the tone of much of the coverage matches the public-opinion polls showing that a majority of the country has turned against the conflict." The Post adds, "The journalists certainly don't see themselves as antiwar. But the way they frame many stories about Iraq sliding toward civil war carries echoes of Vietnam, when the media coverage turned sharply critical as the country soured on that jungle war."

New Study, Released Documents Suggest Saddam Had Links To Terrorists. The Weekly Standard (4/3, Hayes) reports Rep. John Murtha recently gave voice to what is now "the conventional wisdom on Iraq and terrorism," that there is no connection, but "it is wrong." A new study "from the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Virginia, paints quite a different picture. According to captured documents cited in the study and first reported in THE WEEKLY STANDARD in January, the former Iraqi regime was training non-Iraqi Arabs in terrorist techniques." The "emerging picture suggests that the U.S. intelligence community underestimated Saddam Hussein's interest in terrorism."

Laurie Mylroie, an adjunct fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M), "After substantial prodding -- including from this paper -- the US government has finally begun to release its captured Iraqi documents and is posting them at the Web site of the Army's Foreign Military Studies Office. This material will take considerable time to absorb and analyze, but it may yet contribute significantly to our understanding of the nature of the threat Saddam Hussein posed. Most dramatically, an Iraqi intelligence report, apparently written in early 1997, describes Iraqi efforts to establish ties with various elements in the Saudi opposition, including Osama bin Ladin. … One of Iraq's few allies, Sudan served as an intermediary between Baghdad and bin Ladin, as well as other Islamic radicals. On Feb. 19, 1995, an Iraqi intelligence agent met with bin Ladin in Khartoum." Bin Ladin "asked for two things: to carry out joint operations against foreign forces in Saudi Arabia and to broadcast the speeches of a radical Saudi cleric. Iraq agreed to the latter, but apparently not the former. … Many more documents are to be released in the coming months. Quite possibly, they will vindicate the decision to undertake the Iraq war; help maintain public support for fighting it; and radically change our understanding of Saddam's role in international terrorism."

Democratic House Candidate Believes Saddam Worked With Al Qaeda. The New Republic (4/3, Ackerman) reports Democratic congressional candidate Chris Carney, who is running in Pennsylvania's 10th CD, "served as a counterterrorism analyst for the Bush administration. For some Democrats, it's as if Richard Clarke decided to run for Congress." But Carney's Democratic "supporters, both in the 10th District and across the country, are apparently unaware of one very odd fact about his candidacy: Carney supported and helped propagate one of the war's most dubious premises--that Saddam Hussein was working closely with Al Qaeda. And these supporters are probably unaware of an even odder fact: Despite seeking an end to the war, Carney still believes it." But "that's more detail than most Democrats want. What's important to them is that Carney now largely considers the war a mistake."

UK Memorandum Said To Show Bush Set On War. The New York Times (3/27, Van Natta, 1.19M) reports a newly disclosed memorandum that summarized a January 31, 2003 between President Bush and Prime Minister Tony Blair shows that "behind closed doors," President Bush "was certain that war was inevitable. During a private two-hour meeting in the Oval Office," Bush "made clear" to Prime Minister Blair "that he was determined to invade Iraq without the second resolution" from the UN Security Council "or even if international arms inspectors failed to find unconventional weapons." The "confidential memo about the meeting" was "written by Mr. Blair's top foreign policy adviser" and was circulated among British Prime Minister Tony Blair's senior aides. David Manning, Blair's chief foreign policy adviser at the time, wrote, "'The start date for the military campaign was now penciled in for 10 March,'…paraphrasing the president. 'This was when the bombing would begin.'"

US Soldiers In Iraq Not Using Extra Body Armor. The Washington Times/AP (3/27), "Extra body armor -- the lack of which caused a political storm in the United States -- has flooded in to Iraq, but many Marines here promptly stuck it in lockers or under bunks. Too heavy and cumbersome, many say." Marines "already carry loads as heavy as 70 pounds when they patrol the dangerous streets in towns and villages in restive Anbar province. The new armor plates, although only about 5 pounds per set, are not worth carrying for the additional safety they are said to provide, some say."

Afghan Christian Convert Released. The Afghan court considering the case of Christian convert Abdul Rahman over the weekend threw out the case that had been brought against him for his conversion. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, lead story, 2:00, Peters, 8.78M) reported, "Muslim clerics have threatened to kill him if he walks free. The presiding judge today said major legal gaps in the prosecution's case needed to be filled in before the trial could proceed, constitutional technicalities that will remove the case from the courtroom and the spotlight and take some of the political pressure off Afghan President Hamid Karzai." Many "expect Rahman will now be quickly and quietly shuttled off to another country."

The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Zaman, Chu, 958K) reports, "The charges of apostasy against Abdur Rahman were being dropped for lack of evidence, said Abdul Wakil Omari, a spokesman for the Afghan Supreme Court." The New York Times (3/27, Munadi, 1.19M) says the move "will delay, if not scuttle" the investigation. The Times adds, "Court officials said the mental health of the defendant, Abdul Rahman, 41, would be evaluated. Although prosecutors vowed to continue the case, a finding of mental illness by public health authorities could thwart their effort." USA Today and the Washington Times run the same AP story (3/27, Cooney), which says "the court's decision could touch off protests across Afghanistan," according to Faiez Mohammed, "a Sunni Muslim leader in the northern city of Kunduz." The Washington Post (3/27, A10, Cooney, 744K) and Christian Science Monitor (3/27, 61K) run similar reports.

Ingenuity Of Battlefield Doctors Leading To Medical Advances. USA Today (3/27, 1A, Zoroya, 2.31M) runs a story on war doctors this morning. USA Today reports that "to save lives on the battlefield, medical innovations are born in days rather than in years, military and civilian doctors say. And as with wars past, the new ways of treating the injured and sick in Iraq and Afghanistan…could have benefits beyond the battlefield." Some innovations "result from government-sponsored research. Others come from the ingenuity of battlefield doctors who seek new ways to use existing medicines, or try untested technology when all else fails."

Bush Urged To Decouple War On Terror, Push For Democracy. Francis Fukuyama, a professor at Johns Hopkins, and Adam Garfinkle editor of the American Interest, urge in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, Fukuyama, Garfinkle, 2.11M) the separation of "the struggle against radical Islamism from promoting democracy in the Middle East." They propose "focusing on the first struggle, and dramatically changing our tone and tactics on the democracy promotion front, at least for now." They add, "The essential problem with the administration's approach is that it conflates two issues that are separate. The first has to do with violent, antimodern radical Islamism (on display both in the reaction to the Danish cartoons and in the mosque bombing in Samarra); the second concerns the dysfunctionality of political and social institutions in much of the Arab world."

DOJ_NMG_0021091

DOJ:

Federal Prosecutor Spends Year Helping Rebuild Iraqi Judicial System. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/27, Louwagie) runs a profile of Cliff Wardlaw, a federal prosecutor who spent nearly a year helping to rebuild the Iraqi judicial system. The Tribune reports that Wardlaw "spent most of 2004 in Iraq after volunteering to help revamp the country's justice system. He trained judges, checked courthouse security, examined prison conditions and worked to steer the Iraqi judiciary to an independent body, one separate from the country's political leadership. … Since his return, his life has been suffused with the memories. And he is driven by the desire to go back." The Tribune adds, "Inside his office in the Minneapolis courthouse, where he works as a federal prosecutor, he e-mails his Iraqi friends regularly. … When the Justice Department put out an e-mail seeking volunteers in 2003, Wardlaw replied immediately. He says he was one of only three people in the country to answer. … He knew what he was getting into. He'd grown up the son of a Marine. … Wardlaw says he was one of about 5,200 civilians working to reconstruct the country, not including Defense Department contractors. He and his colleagues working with the justice system -- some American, some Iraqi -- took care to protect Iraqis who seemed destined to lead the government. … He helped make a difference, he thinks, but he acknowledges the country has a long way to go. He's adamant that U.S. troops should stay there until the job is finished. And he wants to be there with them."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

His Name Often Invoked, Causey Stays On Sidelines Of Enron Trial. The AP (3/26, Hays) reports, "Enron Corp.'s former chief accounting officer was bound for trial alongside company founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling until he cut a plea deal just weeks before jurors were chosen." The AP continues, "Richard Causey might have been expected to testify but has remained on the sidelines ever since. Legal experts say he might be more effective as a potential witness than one who actually takes the stand -- although jurors may be curious about the man whose name they've heard again and again." The AP adds, "Causey won't testify before the government rests its primary case in the fraud and conspiracy trial this week. But prosecutors can hold him in reserve to testify as a rebuttal witness after the defense teams present their case -- which will feature testimony from Lay and Skilling. … 'Causey's role in the case may turn out to be more to cast a shadow than to testify,' said Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches at the University of Texas School of Law. … 'A single provable lie on something significant could alone convict a testifying defendant in a case like this. And since only the government knows what Causey can and can't say, he acts as a major deterrent against either defendant fabricating specific claims about events, meetings, what they were not told, and the like,' he said."

Corporate Counsel Underlings Increasingly Focus Of Federal Prosecutions. Corporate Counsel (3/27, Reisinger) reports, "Until recently, federal prosecutors have almost always gone after the general counsel when they've charged an in-house lawyer with corporate fraud. But for the second time in the past six months, the government has skipped the GC and indicted a lower-ranking company lawyer for alleged wrongdoing." CC continues, "In February prosecutors charged Robert Graham, the former assistant GC and senior VP of General Re Corp., with securities fraud for his role in a sham deal with American International Group Inc. Based in Stamford, Conn., Gen Re is a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., the holding company for most of Warren Buffett's investments. New York-based AIG is the world's largest insurer. … Two other former Gen Re execs and a former AIG official were charged along with Graham. All four defendants have pled not guilty; at press time their case was scheduled to go to trial on May 22. The Securities and Exchange Commission has also brought a civil action against several Gen Re execs, including Graham, for their role in the deal with AIG. Timothy McCaffrey, who was Gen Re's GC at the time of the alleged fraud, says that he is not a target of the government's probe. (McCaffrey left the company last June.)" CC adds, "According to SEC documents and court papers filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, Gen Re and AIG concocted their deal in October 2000. An AIG executive allegedly proposed that his company would "prefund" Gen Re with $500 million, which Gen Re would then use to pay insurance premiums to AIG. The SEC says the deal, which would allow AIG to report $500 million in false reserves, was suggested by AIG's chairman. Maurice

Market Timing Lawsuit Shows Merrill Lynch Ignored Internal Watchdogs. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, A1, Craig, Lauricella) reports in a lengthy front page story on Merrill Lynch & Co.'s decision to fire two traders and a colleague in a mutual fund market timing scandal. But last December, "a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel ruled that Merrill defamed the brokers and ordered it to pay them almost $15 million" and their lawyers "say the three were scapegoats." Merrill has "appealed the defamation ruling to a New York state court," a move that "has unsealed a trove of documents offering a rare glimpse of a Wall Street firm pursuing a tempting profit opportunity over the objections of internal watchdogs. On repeated occasions some Merrill employees voiced concern that the three brokers were doing something wrong and took steps to stop them. Yet their immediate bosses often pushed back, allowing the trading to continue."

GM Seeking To Correct Accounting Errors. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Hawkins) reports General Motors Corp. is "working to rectify last-minute accounting mistakes and could file its annual report with the Securities and Exchange Commission within days," but "still must deal with SEC probes related to several other accounting matters." GM management has "spent more than a week gathering details on the chain of events that led to a last-minute discovery of accounting errors in the financial statements of ResCap, GMAC's residential-mortgage unit, which caused GM to miss its 10-K filing deadline March 16."

SEC Subpoenas Gradient In Market ManipulationProbe. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Scannell) reports the Securities and Exchange Commission, "investigating possible market manipulation, requested documents about communications that Gradient Analytics Inc. had with journalists and others." The SCE sought "phone records, emails and other materials Gradient had exchanged with several hedge-fund advisers and journalists." The new subpoena "appears to let the SEC seek information about Gradient's contacts with journalists without seeking the information directly from the journalists themselves."

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Seeks Extradition Of Former IRA Chief For Counterfeiting. The Financial Times (3/27, Washington) reports, "The US is to seek the extradition of Sean Garland, president of the Irish Workers party, who has been indicted in the US on charges of trafficking North Korean-counterfeited $100 bills in Europe, Russia and former Soviet states." The Times continues, "Mr Garland, 72, the former chief of staff of the official IRA, was arrested in Belfast last year on a US warrant after a 16-year investigation. … The fake dollar bills - known as 'supernotes' because of their high quality - started to appear around the world in 1989. But after being released on bail, Mr Garland fled to the Republic of Ireland to escape extradition. … A State Department official told the Financial Times that Washington planned to formally ask Ireland to extradite Mr Garland, although the official declined to comment on the timing." The Times notes, "The US attorney accuses him of operating a 'years-long scheme to obtain, transport, sell, and pass as genuine, highly deceptive counterfeit $100 [bills]'"

Memory Expert May Be Key Part Of Libby Defense. The New Republic (4/3, Zengerle) reports I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, has hired Harvard psychology professor Daniel Schacter to assist with his defense. Schacter "refused to discuss Libby's case or his involvement in it," but he "agreed to talk about his work in more general terms, and, as he spoke, it wasn't difficult to discern how he might be able to help Dick Cheney's former chief of staff beat back obstruction of justice, perjury, and false statement charges--and stay out of the slammer."

Attorney Sentenced For Forging Federal Judge's Order. The New York Law Journal (3/27, Perrotta) reports, "Perry S. Reich, the Long Island, N.Y., attorney who stands convicted of forging a federal magistrate judge's order and lying to the government, was sentenced Friday to 27 months in prison after a judge described his plight as 'disquieting' and unlike any case he had ever seen." The Journal continues, "Reich, 57, was a respected attorney whose conviction stunned many in the legal community who knew him from his days as a clerk at the Appellate Division, 2nd Department, and at the Court of Appeals, and later as an appellate specialist with a varied practice." The Journal adds, "Prosecutors had recommended a sentence of between 63 and 78 months, or 6 1/2 years, while the Probation Department suggested between 27 and 31 months. … Reich's appellate attorneys, Benjamin Brafman and Mark M. Baker of Brafman & Associates, asked for a period of probation with no incarceration. … Brafman and Baker, who were hired by Reich after his conviction, argued that Reich might be a pathological liar who truly believes he did not forge the order and fax it to an adversary, as a psychiatrist had suggested following an evaluation. They also stressed the many letters of support he received, his unblemished record and his reputation among others in the profession. Numerous friends and members of the legal community attended Reich's sentencing to offer their support. … Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Busa argued that claims about Reich's mental state were undermined by the fact that he had changed his story several times. She said he engaged in significant planning in an attempt to obstruct the judicial process."

FBI Finds No Seagal Link In Pellcano Probe. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Krikorian, Rohrlich, Verrier) reports, "Federal officials investigating infamous Hollywood detective Anthony Pellicano have found no convincing evidence that actor Steven Seagal was involved in depositing a dead fish on a reporter's windshield in June 2002 and now believe Pellicano had some other motivation for staging the mob-style threat." The Times continues, "While prosecutors have yet to explain what that impetus was, their current lack of interest in Seagal fundamentally alters the original plot line of this Hollywood cliffhanger and raises this question: If not the movie star, then who was Pellicano working for?" The Times adds, "The original premise was that Seagal had hired Pellicano to threaten Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch and scare her off a story about the actor's problems with organized crime. … The FBI initially subscribed to that theory because Alexander Proctor, the former convict that Pellicano allegedly hired to put a dead fish with a rose in its mouth and a note that said 'Stop' on the smashed windshield of Busch's car, claimed he was working for Pellicano on Seagal's behalf. … Seagal's lawyers have denied since the fall of 2002 that the actor had anything to do with the threat, but federal authorities have never publicly exonerated him or explained why they eventually came to disbelieve Proctor. … 'As we looked into it, there was very little to corroborate' Proctor's claim, said a source close to the investigation. 'There was a lot to suggest that Seagal was not involved.' … Indeed, the 110-count federal indictment accusing Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in Los Angeles alleges that the private eye started spying on Busch well before Seagal was even on her radar."

"Mafia Cops" To Pursue Different Defense Strategies. The New York Daily News (3/25, Marzulli, 729K) reports, "They were alleged partners in crime, but the so-called Mafia cops may go their own way at their trial. Louis Eppolito doesn't plan to call a single witness in his defense; partner Stephen Caracappa may take the stand, their lawyers said" Friday. "Federal prosecutors…appear confident that their case is going extremely well, largely due to the devastating testimony of chief witness Burton Kaplan," and "the government plans to rest its case Wednesday without calling mob turncoat Peter Chiodo, who has apparently been dropped from the witness list." The New York Post (3/25, Haberman, 624K) also reports on Eppolito lawyer Bettina Schein's decision to call no witnesses and notes, "That means closing arguments in the trial could be heard as early as April 3."

Meanwhile, the AP (3/26, McShane) reports on last week's testimony under the headline "'Mafia Cops' Trial Has Lots Of Theatrics," and notes, "The courtroom histrionics occasionally threaten to overshadow one of the most serious prosecutions in city history: a pair of top-echelon NYPD detectives accused of using their prized gold shields to kill eight people at the behest of a brutal mob underboss, Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso."

Trial Testimony Echoes Eppolito Book. The New York Times (3/27, Feuer, 1.19M) reports, "Beneath the murders, the mobsters, the gamblers, the strippers, the tax cheats, diamond smugglers, thieves, hoods, cops, cons, corpses, crooks and marijuana dealers, there is — at the core — a book." Eppolito's autobiography, Mafia Cops, "contains the germ of the government's dispute with its author — his claim that he broke with the mobsters in his past. It contains the seeds of his defense — that he is not a killer but a writer, a man who 'makes things up, creates,' as his lawyer said. … Rich in anecdote and salty dialogue, it seeks to portray its author as a conflicted but ultimately dedicated Kings County lawman. As such, it reflects the comparatively minor role that has been played so far by Mr. Caracappa, who…always gets second billing."

Former Bonanno Capo Testifies Basciano Committed Murders. The New York Post (3/25, Haberman, 624K) reports, "A one-time protege of Vincent 'Vinny Gorgeous' Basciano's" on Friday "fingered the former acting boss of the Bonanno crime family as a shotgun-wielding killer. Bonanno capo-turned-canary Dominick Cicale testified about two murders he committed with his former mentor -- and one he prevented. … Basciano shook his head in disgust at the sight of his former charge on the witness stand. Cicale also testified about how Basciano brought him along over the years, helping him become a 'made' member of the crime family, and teaching him tricks of the trade."

FBI Arrests Reputed Russian Mobsters In Alleged Murder Plot. The AP (3/25, Butler) reports, "Two reputed Russian mobsters were arrested Friday after hitmen they tried to hire to kill twin brothers went to Ukrainian police with secretly recorded conversations about the murder plot, federal prosecutors said. Monya Elson and Leonid Roytman were arraigned on murder-for-hire charges Friday in Brooklyn federal court. Both pleaded not guilty. 'This is a case of two Russian mobsters who personify ruthlessness and cold-blooded greed,' FBI Assistant Director Mark Mershon said in a statement."

FBI Arrests USC Lecturer For Alleged Real Estate Investment Fraud. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Tran, 958K) reports, "A USC lecturer who teaches at the university's business school was arrested Friday by FBI agents for allegedly bilking investors — many of them his students — out of more than $1.5 million and spending much of the money on show horses." Barry Howard Landreth was arrested at his home "on charges of wire fraud. … FBI agents said that Landreth told investors that their investments in Nevada and Illinois commercial properties and land would yield a 190% return. … The students persuaded their parents and others to invest in what they were told were commercial development projects in Las Vegas and Chicago, said FBI Special Agent Brad Howard." The AP (3/26) adds, "FBI agents also seized assets Landreth allegedly acquired with his victim's funds, including a luxury car and several show horses." The Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News (326, 51K) notes, "Landreth left Myrtle Beach under scrutiny in January 2005 after nine months of work on the Pavilion plan with the Myrtle Beach Downtown Redevelopment Corp. and Pavilion owner Burroughs & Chapin Co. Inc. Questions about his credentials surfaced after he failed to come up with money he promised in a side deal."

Red Cross To Give Authorities Results Of Katrina Fraud Probe. USA Today (3/27, Brook, 2.31M) reports, "The American Red Cross plans this week to turn over the results of its investigation into allegations of fraud and waste in its Hurricane Katrina relief efforts to authorities for possible criminal prosecution. Carrie Martin, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross, said Sunday that three volunteers had been dismissed as a result of the charity's investigation." Meanwhile, "Sen. Chuck Grassley…issued a statement saying he would meet with the charity's leaders this week to discuss its plans for reform," adding that they "did not take internal complaints of fraud and misuse of funds seriously enough until he drew attention to them."

Criminal Charges Unlikely In Tillman Friendly Fire Probe. Newsweek (4/3) reports in its "Periscope" column that while the Army is proceeding with its criminal investigation into the friendly-fore death of former NFL player Pat Tillman, it is "unlikely the soldiers who shot him will be held criminally negligent. … The difficulty of distinguishing between reasonable and negligent behavior in the chaos of battle, and a fear of making soldiers trigger-shy."

Movie Entangled In California Kidnap-Murder Case. USA Today (3/27, Kasindorf) reports the "kidnapping and murder of 15-year-old Nick Markowitz in 2000 was true-crime story that had 'soon to be a major motion picture' practically written all over it. The tragedy had a young victim, a manhunt for the kidnapper and a ring of middle-class 20-somethings who sold marijuana in the San Fernando Valley." Alpha Dog, "a $13 million movie with a cast including Justin Timberlake, Bruce Willis and Sharon Stone, is based on the slaying in Santa Barbara, Calif." The film is "now entangled in the criminal case against a defendant with a name that no screenwriter would dare make up: Jesse James Hollywood."

Cities Facing Shortage Of Police Officers. Police departments nationwide are experiencing shortages of officers and are offering signing bonuses and other incentives to lure new officers on to the force. A front page story in the Washington Post (3/27, A1, Pomfret, 744K) reports that "more than 80 percent of the nation's 17,000 law enforcement agencies, big and small, have vacancies that many can't fill, police officials estimate. … Police officials and researchers say a confluence of demographic changes and social trends have precipitated the shortage. The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have siphoned off public-service-minded people to the military. Hundreds of law enforcement officers have handed in their badges to take higher-paying positions in the booming homeland security industry."

Court May Consider Constitutionality Of Budget Reconciliation Act. A federal court may consider the constitutionality of the budget reconciliation act this May when it considers an ongoing dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals. Roll Call (3/27, Yachnin) reports that federal attorneys representing HHS cite the law, which passed the House and Senate in slightly different versions in their appeal of a ruling issued earlier this year by the U.S. District Court on a 2004 lawsuit. The suit "Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson, centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated. The hospitals sought and won an increase in payments worth up to $100 million. But now, HHS, along with its Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, is seeking to overturn the decision based on a provision in the budget reduction act that had been drafted in an attempt to clarify the policy that sparked the original dispute."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EEOC Filed 383 Lawsuits Last Year. The Washington Post (3/27, A13, Lee, 744K) reports that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission "filed 383 lawsuits against alleged offenders last year, garnering $107.7 million for victims through litigation. The agency, which marked its 40th anniversary last summer, helped obtain $271.6 million for victims without going to trial, often through settlements or mediation. … Discrimination charges declined slightly last year, falling 5 percent from the 79,432 filed in 2004. The numbers have fluctuated over the last decade but have never approached the 91,189 charges filed in 1994."

New Orleans Voters Scattered Across Country As Mayoral Election Nears. Newsweek (4/3, Campo-Flores) reports on the New Orleans mayoral race, noting that with "only one third of New Orleanians back in the city and the remainder scattered across the country, the electorate is more elusive than ever. The two dozen candidates -- led by [Mayor Ray] Nagin, [Louisiana Lt. Gov. Mitch] Landrieu and businessman Ron Forman -- are struggling with questionable polling data and out-of-date voter lists. They're hunting for supporters in cities like Houston and Memphis with large concentrations of evacuees. And they're doing it all on a harried schedule, with less than a month left until the April 22 election (with a likely runoff scheduled for May 20)."

Georgia Lawmakers May Approve Bible As Classroom Textbook. The Georgia legislature appears poised to pass a measure requiring the state Department of Education to put in place a curriculum to teach the history and literature of the Bible. Under the law, schools would use the book as a textbook in the classroom, establishing electives on both the New and Old Testaments. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Jonsson, 61K) reports that the measure "has overwhelmingly passed both chambers, but needs a final vote on a minor House change. The vote is expected as early as Monday. If it passes, the state's Department of Education has a year to establish Bible elective courses in the curriculum."

WPost Critical Of Montgomery County Police Response To Racist Online Postings. The Washington Post (3/27, A14) says in an editorial that "for months, apparently, at least some of the police brass in Montgomery County have known either specifically or generally about racist, sexist and immigrant-bashing comments on an online message board used exclusively by county police." It was "only after The Post exposed the tenor of some of the online blather that the county police chief, J. Thomas Manger, took the trouble to read the uncouth postings. Now he says he is shocked, and he demands the message board be shut down by the Fraternal Order of Police, the police union, which runs the forum. So far, the FOP has refused." Police are "paid to enforce the law, not stand as unblemished exemplars of politically correct speech. But intolerant, hateful officers are unlikely to be effective, and they may actually subvert the department's overall mission."

WPost Criticizes Air Force Guidelines On Religious Expression. An editorial in the Washington Post (3/27, A14, 744K) says, "The Air Force got it right when it issued a carefully calibrated set of guidelines on religious expression last August. … Unfortunately, facing a barrage of complaints from evangelical Christian groups and pressure from members of Congress, the Air Force backed down. It has issued a revised set of rules that pose the potential for inappropriate religious pressure on cadets and service members. This pushes the balance in the wrong direction, especially in light of disturbing reports from the Air Force Academy about religious intolerance and inappropriate proselytizing. … It's unfortunate that the Air Force, having struck the balance so well last year, was bullied into this unwise retreat."

Lucent, Alcatel Again In Merger Talks. USA Today (3/27, Cauley) reports Lucent and Alcatel "confirmed late last week that they are in merger talks, marking their second attempt in five years to combine. Consolidation elsewhere in the telecom industry is a key driver." Equipment makers "such as Alcatel and Lucent are slowly being overshadowed by their far bigger customers. To maintain clout at the negotiating table, equipment makers need to get bigger fast."

3rd Circuit Rules Amnesty Pact No Bar To Federal Indictment. The Legal Intelligencer (3/27, Duffy) reports, "A federal judge has no power to enjoin prosecutors from filing an indictment on the grounds that doing so would violate an existing amnesty agreement, the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled, because the equitable powers of the court do not exist when there is 'an adequate and complete remedy at law.'" The Intelligencer continues, "In its 27-page opinion in Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group v. United States, the appellate court held that since the amnesty agreement may be raised as a defense after indictment, the lower court had exceeded its powers in enjoining the prosecution." The Intelligencer adds, "The decision reverses a January 2005 ruling by U.S. District Judge Timothy J. Savage that prohibited the Justice Department from filing an antitrust indictment against a Norwegian shipping company and one of its top executives. … Savage found that Stolt-Nielsen had entered into an amnesty program with the Justice Department and had provided information about a price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy that led to guilty pleas from two of its co-conspirators and more than $62 million in fines." The Intelligencer notes, "Because the company had fulfilled its obligations under an immunity agreement, Savage concluded it was entitled to an injunction that barred the filing of an indictment. … Prosecutors argued that SNTG misled the government by claiming that its participation in the antitrust conspiracy had ceased in March 2002. … But Savage found the amnesty agreement explicitly immunized SNTG and its executives from prosecution for activity prior to Jan. 15, 2003. And because the government had drafted the agreement, Savage said, it "cannot depend upon a tacit understanding of what it contends was meant during negotiations but was not memorialized in the integrated agreement.""

Patrick Rejects Toll's Takeover Bid. Bloomberg (3/27) reports, "Patrick Corp., Australia's biggest port cargo handler, rejected Toll Holdings Ltd.'s increased A$5.5 billion ($3.9 billion) takeover bid as 'flawed and unacceptable.' … 'Patrick shareholders remain better off without Toll,' Sydney-based Patrick said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. Melbourne-based Toll, the nation's biggest road and rail freighter, last week raised its offer after overcoming antitrust opposition to the deal." Bloomberg continues, "Toll Chief Executive Officer Paul Little bid for Patrick seven months ago, seeking control of the movement of goods across Australia from shipment to delivery. Patrick CEO Chris Corrigan is pursuing his own trucking acquisitions to compete with Toll for a land-freight business to add to Patrick's ports, saying Patrick offers better growth as a standalone company. … 'Patrick has far superior businesses and significantly greater growth prospects relative to Toll,' Corrigan said in the statement today."

SCOTUS To Hear Patent Case Against eBay. The New York Times (3/27, Hafner) reports, "The United States Supreme Court will hear arguments on Wednesday in a protracted, closely watched patent case that pits a small company called MercExchange against eBay, the online auction and marketplace." The Times continues, "While the grounds in the case appear narrow — the court will reconsider the rules under which courts grant injunctions against a company found to be infringing another's patent — it has attracted enormous attention because of the public rancor between the two companies, the supporters enlisted by both sides and the growing issue of how large technology companies deal with the constant threat of patent challenges." The Times adds, "The patent in question surrounds the 'Buy It Now' feature that eBay uses to allow processing of transactions for the Web site's fixed-price purchasing option. … The Supreme Court will decide whether a federal appeals court was correct in reversing a district court's decision to deny an injunction against eBay's use of the feature. In doing so, it will reconsider a precedent from 1908, which suggested that injunctions were always an appropriate remedy for patent infringement. … Supporting briefs from third parties, including some unlikely ones, have piled up for each side. A pharmaceutical industry trade group filed a brief in support of MercExchange, as did General Electric, Proctor & Gamble, the University of California, a group of venture capitalists and the United States government. All argued in favor of injunctions against those who infringe patents. … A brief filed jointly by Oracle, Microsoft and Intel in support of eBay argued that the injunction rule 'has transformed patents into a powerful tool for litigation abuse' and 'stifles innovation.' EBay has also hired Juleanna Glover Weiss of the Ashcroft Group, a lobbying firm in Washington founded by John Ashcroft, the former United States attorney general, to help with communications efforts related to the case and patent issues in general."

Apple Computers Meets Apple Corps In London Courtroom. The New York Times (3/27, Healey) reports, "Apple Computer will meet the Beatles' Apple Corps in court this week in London, where a judge will determine whether Apple Computer's iTunes online music service violates a 1991 agreement between the two companies that, the Beatles' Apple claims, blocked the computer maker from selling music." The Times continues, "Apple Corps, which represents the Beatles' business interests and markets their post-1968 recordings on disc, wants the computer firm to stop using the Apple trademark to sell recordings online, along with unspecified damages. Apple, the maker of Macs and iPods, said the 1991 agreement permitted using the Apple name to sell online data transfers, which are what downloaded songs amount to." The Times adds, "The judge hearing the case, Justice Edward Mann, is an iPod user, but neither side has asked him to recuse himself." The Times notes, "This is the third time the two companies have sparred. Apple Corps first sued Apple Computer in 1980 over the use of its name; a modest settlement was accompanied by an agreement that stipulated that Apple Computer, then a Silicon Valley start-up, would stay out of the music business. In 1989, after newer hardware and software made it easier to use Macintosh computers to synthesize sound, the Beatles' company sued again, resulting in a $26.5 million settlement in 1991 that left Macs able to edit and play back sound files but not create music. After the iTunes music store and software were introduced in April 2003, the record company filed suit a third time."

Shrewd Lobbying, Litigation Resulted In Big Incentives For Oil Industry. The New York Times (3/27, Andrews, 1.19M) reports on how a "supposedly cost-free incentive" to encourage oil and gas companies to drill in the Gulf of Mexico became "a multibillion-dollar break to an industry making record profits." According to the Times, "It is an account of legislators who passed a law riddled with ambiguities; of crucial errors by midlevel bureaucrats under President Bill Clinton; of $2 billion in inducements from the Bush administration, which was intent on promoting energy production; and of Republican lawmakers who wanted to do even more. At each turn, through shrewd lobbying and litigation, oil and gas companies ended up with bigger incentives than before." The Times notes that until last month, when the Bush Administration "confirmed that it expected the government to waive about $7 billion in royalties over the next five years," hardy anyone "noticed — or even knew — the real costs. They were obscured in part by the long gap between the time incentives are offered and when new offshore wells start producing. But lawmakers shrouded the costs with rosy projections. And administration officials consistently declined to tally up the money they were forfeiting."

"Big Oil" Turning Its Attention To Extra-Heavy Crude. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, Gold, 2.11M) reports, 'A Florida-size section of sandy soil beneath the boreal forest in this sparsely populated area of Northern Canada is loaded with bottom-of-the-barrel petroleum. These deposits were once dismissed as 'unconventional' oil that couldn't be recovered economically. But now, thanks to rising global oil prices and improved technology, most oil-industry experts count oil sands as recoverable reserves. That recalculation has vaulted Venezuela and Canada to first and third in global reserves rankings, although Venezuela's holdings in extra-heavy crude are a rough guess." The Journal adds, "The surging interest in Canadian oil sands is stark evidence that the world isn't about to run out of oil. Instead, it is running low on readily accessible light, sweet crude -- oil that flows like water, has few impurities and can be easily turned into gasoline. As the good stuff gets scarce, Big Oil is turning its attention and pouring money into extra-heavy crude, such as the giant deposits near Fort McMurray and another similar one in Venezuela."

Norton Creates Sporting Conservation Council.

The Washington Times (3/27, McCaslin, 90K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that Interior Secretary Gale Norton "has just impaneled a new Sporting Conservation Council, which for the first time will advise Uncle Sam on the interests and concerns of the hunting community, including gaining more access to federal lands. … The chosen council of advisers include, among others, Safari Club International Vice President Merle Shepard, who will represent big-game hunting organizations, and Jeff Crane, president of the Congressional Sportsmen's Foundation, who will speak for wildlife conservation organizations; to Peter J. Dart, president of the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation, and John Tomke, chairman of the Board of Ducks Unlimited, Inc., who will represent game-bird hunting organizations."

Bush Climate Change Proposals Said To Lack "Teeth."

Time's (4/3) cover package examines the issue of global warming, noting that President Bush, who is "hardly a favorite of greens, now acknowledges climate change and boasts of the steps he is taking to fight it. Most of those steps, however, involve research and voluntary emissions controls, not exactly the laws with teeth scientists are calling for." Time's cover package also examines the cycles of climate destruction, and lists the species that are being pushed "to the brink of extinction" by global warming, the impact of global warming on human health, steps individuals can take to reduce emissions, activists who are working to reduce the effects of global warming and the role emissions from India and China are playing in the problem.

85% Believe Global Warming Is "Probably Happening." ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 6, 3:10, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "A major new poll conducted by ABC, 'Time magazine, and Stanford University" shows "a vast majority of Americans, 85%, now believe global warming is probably happening and that it will become a serious problem in the future." ABC (Blakemore) added, "56% in our poll believe the world's temperatures have been rising in the past three years. 70% think the world's weather patterns more unstable. Half say they've experienced the same in the last three years where they live." What is "surprising in our poll, while half of Americans say they're now experiencing warming, 64% still mistakenly think that there's a lot of disagreement among scientists about whether global warming is happening." Prof. Jon Krosnick, Stanford University: "This poll shows us that those Americans who believe the scientific community is united in thinking that global warming is real and a problem are the most supportive of government action to solve the problem."

Energy Industry Said To Have Muddied Waters In Global Warming Debate. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 7, 2:00, Morrell, 8.78M) reported, "The vast majority of scientists have determined global warming to be a real threat. So, why has it taken so long to convince Americans? Pulitzer prize-winning journalist, Ross Gelbspan, blames a 15-year misinformation campaign by the oil and coal industries." Ross Gelbspan, Environmental Journalist: "The point of this campaign was not necessarily to persuade the public that global warming isn't happening. It was to persuade the public that there is this state of confusion." Morrell: "This 1998 memo by the American Petroleum Institute says, 'Victory will be achieved when…average citizens (recognize) uncertainties in climate science.' To redefine global warming as theory, not fact, the industry funded research by friendly scientists, such as Pat Michaels. The industry's influence even extends into the White House, where up until a few months ago, a former oil industry lobbyist was one of the President's top advisers, editing scientific reports to make global warming seem less threatening."

Investors Showing Interest In Ethanol. The New York Times (3/27, Alster, 1.19M) reports the entrepreneurs and investors have begun to embrace ethanol which "now accounts for 3 percent of the American automotive fuel market. Most cars in the United States can already handle fuel that is up to 10 percent ethanol, and as many as five million are so-called flex-fuel vehicles that can use a fuel called E85, which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline. The current excitement over ethanol derives from research that has cut the cost of converting nonfood plant matter like grasses and wood chips into alcohol."

Mueller Addresses Houston Crime, Terrorism Forum. KPRC-TV Houston (3/24, 10:05 p.m.) reported, "The director of the FBI was in town today talking about Houston safety and security. Gang violence, human smuggling and port security were just some of the big issues Robert Mueller talked about," and "he says the key to fighting the growing crime in Houston is by sharing intelligence and creating task forces." KRIV-TV Houston (3/24, 9:47 p.m.) noted that "Mueller made a stop in Houston today, but it wasn't for investigative work. He spoke to the Houston Forum on Globalization of Crime and Terror." KHOU-TV Houston (3/24, McShan) reports, "The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston." FBI director Robert Mueller said of the bureau's role, "We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both (HPD Chief Harold Hurtt) and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now." KHOU adds that "both cities are cracking down on gangs, and no one wants them to call their city home."

KHOU-TV Houston (3/26, Edwards) reports on the proliferation of New Orleans gang graffiti, noting, "Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston" and "authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston." But it is "a battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police. 'For us to be effective, we have to work together,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said. 'We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans.'"

Mueller Praises New Orleans Agents, Says Headquarters Will Reopen In June. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/24, Chapple, 257K) reports, "The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish. … Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said." Mueller added, "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here. Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding." Before his meeting with Mueller, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens "praised the FBI," saying, "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about. They were there for us when we needed them."

WDSU-TV New Orleans (3/24, 6:11 p.m.) reported, "Since Hurricane Katrina damaged the FBI's building in Lakefront, the bureau has been using rented space at the Covington Country Club on the north shore. Agency Director Robert Mueller says that despite relocating, agents and staff were able to salvage evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm." WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/24, 5:01 p.m.) noted that "Mueller visited the temporary office yesterday."

Administration Testing Wastewater For Signs Of Cocaine Use. The Washington Post (3/27, B1, Turque, 744K) reports that as part of a pilot program, the Bush Administration, in an effort to broaden the government's knowledge of illegal drug use is analyzing "wastewater from communities throughout the Potomac River Basin for the urinary byproducts of cocaine." The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy 'said it is not seeking to single out specific localities. It also is premature, officials said, to conclude that levels of metabolized cocaine in sewage offer a more accurate index of consumption than traditional survey research. But David Murray, special assistant to national drug czar John P. Walters, said wastewater testing, which has been tried in Europe, 'certainly has that potential.'"

Federal Investigators Accused Of "Running Roughshod" Over California Marijuana Laws. The Scripps Howard News Service (3/25, Lee) reports federal agents who "converged on several of what they called 'marijuana candy factories' around Oakland this month seized hundreds of sodas and candies laced with marijuana in what they said was the largest bust of its kind on the West Coast. … Angry medical-marijuana patients said investigators are blowing smoke and that the raids are just the latest proof that federal investigators are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use."

Eight Arrested In New Jersey Heroin Ring Investigation. The North Bergen Reporter (3/26) reports Hoboken New Jersey police have "arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring. According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration. The individuals arrested were allegedly part of a major organization that supplied heroin throughout the Hudson County area."

Man Accused Of Plotting Murder In Vermont Drug Case. The AP (3/25) reports from Burlington, Vermont, that a man is "facing up to life in prison if convicted of charges he tried to hire a man to kill a witness against him in a drug case. Richard E. Moses Jr., 38, appeared in federal court Friday a day after he allegedly met with an undercover officer from the Drug Enforcement Administration who had told Moses he could arrange the killing of the witness."

The Rutland (VT) Herald (3/25) writes, "According to an affidavit, after Moses expressed an interest in having the witness killed, a federal Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent from another state contacted him to determine how serious he was. In several recorded phone conversations in January, February and March, Moses allegedly negotiated the murder of the witness with the agent, who posed as someone who could arrange a murder."

Kentucky Company Agrees Not To Sell Chemicals Used To Make Meth. The AP (3/27) reports that as part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, the owner of a chemical company in Louisville "has agreed not to sell chemicals used to make methamphetamine and to report suspicious purchases. The company _ Antec Inc. _ also would be subject under the plea agreement to inspections by the Drug Enforcement Administration and it would be required to keep detailed records of all poison sales, including how the buyer intends to use it. The company's president… signed the agreement with federal prosecutors this month, admitting that Antec committed a misdemeanor violation of the Clean Water Act in 2002."

The Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal (3/26) reports, "The federal Drug Enforcement Administration has investigated Antec because its chemicals have been found during raids of methamphetamine labs. The company is the target of a civil lawsuit over its online sale of poison to a Maryland teenager who used it to kill a classmate in 2003. Environmental officials have alleged that Antec violated state regulations and the federal Clean Water Act."

SC Man Gets Life Sentence In Cocaine Case. The Charleston (SC) Post Courier (3/24) reports a federal judge "sentenced a North Charleston man to life in prison without parole Wednesday for his role in a major drug-dealing operation responsible for bringing 33 pounds of cocaine worth at least $375,000 into the area." Authorities "said Damon Brightman, 28, was a leader of a gang that distributed crack and powder cocaine to dealers in the Murray Hill community and…in North Charleston. Some deals were arranged at a small barbershop Brightman owned."

Kentucky Man Flees While Awaiting Sentencing For Marijuana Distribution. The AP (3/25) reports from Louisville, Kentucky, that the case of an inmate who "was temporarily released in late January to be tested as a potential kidney donor for his teenage son and is now accused of fleeing with his girlfriend to Mexico instead" has drawn national attention. The AP says Fox's "America's Most Wanted" has featured the case of Byron Perkins. He "had been awaiting sentencing for marijuana distribution and unlawful transport of firearms."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Weighs In On Immigration Debate As Senate Prepares To Take Up Issue. President Bush today will call for immigration law reforms at a swearing-in ceremony for new citizens. Bush will also meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox, who is expected to make the case for a more open immigration process. Meanwhile, the Senate Judiciary Committee is making a last-ditch effort to reach consensus on a bill that includes a guest worker proposal. Media coverage of the immigration debate continues to stress that the issue is dividing Republicans between those who support a guest worker program and those who advocate only stricter enforcement.

The story was reported by ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 11, 0:30, Snow, 8.78M) – which was the only network newscast last night (CBS and NBC were preempted by sporting events). ABC's brief report noted the developments: "Tomorrow, a Senate committee begins what should be a fractious debate on immigrants. And on Wednesday, President Bush travels to Cancun for a meeting with the Mexican president. Immigration is sure to be a hot topic."

The story was widely covered by print and wire services this morning, with stories covering the gamut of developments and issues expected to be raised in the debate. USA Today (3/27, Kiely, Jackson, 2.31M) reports

President Bush "planned to make an appeal today for controversial changes in immigration law at a swearing-in ceremony for new citizens" after "a weekend of protests that drew hundreds of thousands of immigrants and advocates." The weekend's "protests focused on a bill the House of Representatives approved in December" that is focused on enhancing enforcement of immigration laws. More than "500,000 people turned out Saturday in Los Angeles to protest the House bill, police said. Similar protests drew an estimated 50,000 in Denver, 20,000 in Phoenix and 4,000 in Charlotte on Saturday and nearly 3,000 in Columbus, Ohio, on Sunday."

The Washington Times (3/27, Hurt, 90K) reports the Senate Judiciary Committee "takes up the contentious issue of immigration reform today no closer to an agreement on a guest-worker program." The bill "to be considered by the full Senate today will be the one introduced last week by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who has long set today as the deadline for taking up the issue. His legislation deals only with securing the border and raising the penalties for being in the U.S. illegally." Frist has "said, however, that he will include a guest-worker program in his bill if a majority of the 10 Republicans on the committee agree on one. Private negotiations among members and their staffs continued through last week's recess, but staffers say no consensus has been reached, suggesting that a compromise is highly unlikely." Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter "said yesterday that he is confident that his committee will produce a bill today."

The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Gaouette, 958K) reports the Senate "will determine whether flaws in that system should be addressed solely with tough new criminal laws and stringent enforcement measures -- such as those found in a bill, passed by the House late last year, that triggered demonstrations Saturday from Chicago to Los Angeles. Or they may choose to include programs that give employers access to a future flow of workers, as President Bush has urged, and allow illegal immigrants to gain legal status." Their choices "will provide a barometer of Bush's waning influence over a Republican Party increasingly on edge about midterm elections. Their debate is likely to not only color the meeting between Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, in Cancun, Mexico, later this week, but also to lay bare the fractures that the issue creates within the GOP on social, economic and security grounds."

The AP (3/27, Pickler) reports the US "is struggling to decide the fate of as many as 12 million people living in the country illegally. The Senate takes up the emotional debate on the heels of weekend rallies that drew hundreds of thousands of people protesting attempts to toughen laws against immigrants." Demonstrations "are planned near the Capitol, including a prayer service with immigration advocates and clergy who plan to wear handcuffs to demonstrate the criminalization of immigration violations."

The Washington Post (3/27, A1, Williams, 744K) reports in a front page story that Congress faces a dilemma "as it attempts an immigration overhaul. Businesses say it is hard to persuade Americans to perform the unskilled jobs that immigrants easily fill. Significantly higher wages might work, but that increase would be passed on to unhappy consumers, forcing Americans to give up under-$10 manicures and $15-per-hour paint and lawn jobs." Yet "against a backdrop of heightened scrutiny of those who cross U.S. borders and the estimated 12 million migrants already here illegally, most everyone agrees that the current immigration system warrants a severe makeover."

CQ Weekly (3/27, Sandler) reports that by "forcing the Senate to debate immigration this week, Republican leaders have highlighted rather than hidden the stark differences between them. On one side are pro-business Republicans, who say the nation's economy depends on immigrant labor. On the other stand the cultural or social conservatives, who say illegal immigrants steal American jobs, threaten security and erode the nation's predominant culture." The "backlash against Bush's plan from within his own party was only to be expected, experts on the issue say. Many conservatives consider it little more than amnesty for the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country, the kind of policy over which they had spent years criticizing President Bill Clinton and other Democrats." The Senate debate "will revolve largely around the views and political ambitions of a handful of senators who are looking at a broader context: Either their party's prospects or their own; the future of the nation's economy or its cultural identity; the costs of illegal immigration or the costs to immigrants themselves."

The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Chaddock, 61K) reports "one of the most pervasive costs of a broken immigration system, acknowledged by all sides, is the cost of deception." Bringing "honesty to the system without deporting millions and jeopardizing major sectors of the US economy is the tough task before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as its 18 members struggle toward consensus on a new strategy for immigration reform." For employers "who hire illegals, that means not looking too closely at documents. Only three employers were fined for hiring illegals in 2004, down from 417 in 1999, according to a report by the Government Accountability Office in August 2005." But if "employers examine someone's documents too closely, they can be pursued by the Justice Department for employment related discrimination."

U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Marek) reports that the Senate is expected immigration reform this week. The House "passed a mostly punitive measure in December," and "refused to even consider proposals that would allow employers to hire temporary guest workers, an idea that's been championed by President Bush." Senate Republicans "are fiercely divided on the temporary-worker issue, and those with presidential ambitions crop up on both sides of the debate." US News adds, "Expect some gonzo antics on the floor. Already on the agenda: tough proposals to fence off the whole Southwest border and deny citizenship to babies born to illegal immigrants and a liberal amendment to grant in-state tuition to college students who aren't U.S. citizens."

McCain, Specter Seek Compromise. Newsweek (4/3, Bailey) reports that Senate Republicans, "led by John McCain and Arlen Specter, have been working to come up with a compromise that would include border security, a guest-worker program and a way for illegal immigrants to 'earn' citizenship. But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a presidential contender with one eye on the anti-immigration vote -- and the other one on outflanking McCain -- has threatened to put forward his own get-tough plan this week if the senators fail to come through."

Frist's Presidential Prospects May Hinge On Immigration Debate. Time (4/3, Bacon) reports in its 'Notebook" column that wile First "has left open the possibility of backing a bill that includes a guest-worker provision, he's determined to get stronger border enforcement passed, which will please conservative voters who will pick the G.O.P. nominee in 2008." Time adds that if Frist "can succeed in passing an immigration bill -- especially his own -- he may regain some of the luster he lost last year. If he can't, he may return home to Tennessee as the ineffectual G.O.P. leader who lost his touch -- and his presidential prospects."

Unexpectedly Large Pro-Immigrant Protests Held In Several Cities. The New York Times (3/27, Bernstein, 1.19M) reports that the Senate takes up immigration reform "against a backdrop of thousands of demonstrators, including clergy members wearing handcuffs and immigrant leaders in T-shirts that declare, 'We Are America.' But if events of recent days hold true, they will be facing much more than that." Rallies in "support of immigrants around the country have attracted crowds that have astonished even their organizers. More than a half-million demonstrators marched in Los Angeles on Saturday, as many as 300,000 in Chicago on March 10, and — in between — tens of thousands in Denver, Phoenix, Milwaukee and elsewhere." One of the "most powerful institutions behind the wave of public protests has been the Roman Catholic Church, lending organizational muscle to a spreading network of grass-roots coalitions."

The AP (3/27, Prengaman) reports the LA protest was "one of the largest demonstrations for any cause in recent U.S. history. More than 500,000 protesters — demanding that Congress abandon attempts to make illegal immigration a felony and to build more walls along the border — surprised police who estimated the crowd size using aerial photographs and other techniques, police Cmdr. Louis Gray Jr. said."

GOP Divisions Said To Give Democrats Cover To Conceal Their Own. Roll Call (3/27, Stanton) reports, "Internal GOP divisions over how to address the status of an estimated 11 million illegal workers residing in the United States have provided a rare bit of political cover for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), sparing him and his oft-divided Democratic Caucus from a public airing of its own internal grievances and disputes over the hot-button issue." Like Republicans, Democrats "are divided — although much less bitterly than the GOP — over the guest worker plan. In one corner are lawmakers such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) who favor a program that would allow law-abiding, employed illegal workers to remain in the U.S. for a set period of time. In the other corner stand lawmakers such as Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who would prefer a much narrower guest worker program." But "unlike Republican divisions, the Democratic disputes have largely avoided the front pages, thanks to what GOP aides argue is political posturing by presidential hopefuls Frist and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who have staked out opposite positions on the issue."

Specter Denies That His Immigration Bill Amounts To "Amnesty." Sen. Arlen Specter was asked on ABC's This Week (3/26, Stephanopoulos) to respond to critics of his immigration bill who refer to it as an offer of amnesty. Specter responded, "It's not amnesty…because these undocumented aliens are going to have to pay a fine. They're going to have to work for six years to be on the citizenship path. They're going to have to go through a criminal background check. They're not going to go ahead of people who have been waiting in line for citizenship. … If we do not have some realistic proposal to give them an opportunity to work lawfully and ultimately to obtain citizenship, then they're going to be fugitives, and we need to know who they are and where they are. And if they have criminal records, we need to send them back to their country of origin."

Tancredo Contends Specter Is Promoting Amnesty. Rep. Tom Tancredo, also on ABC's This Week (3/26, Stephanopoulos), replied to Specter, saying, "Let me tell you, it is an amnesty. The crime they have committed is coming into this country without our permission. The penalty that is supposed to be applied to that, under the law that we have today, is deportation."

Tancredo Seen As "Angriest Voice" Against Illegal Immigration. Newsweek (4/3, Bailey) reports that Rep. Tom Tancredo has "positioned himself as the loudest, angriest voice against the estimated 11 million illegal aliens now living in the United States. … If Republican presidential candidates don't put the problem atop the agenda in 2008, he says he'll run himself, just to force the front runners to talk about it. Not that he thinks he'd win the White House."

Kennedy Praises Bush, McCain. Sen. Ted Kennedy, appearing on CBS's Face the Nation (3/26, Borger), said, "We're facing a national security challenge on our borders on immigration, so we have to get immigration policy correct. … In the time that I've been in the United States Senate, I've never seen a coalition come together like it has in trying to find a common-sense approach on immigration. We have the leaders of -- the faith-based leaders in our community. We have leaders in our business community and leaders in our labor community. They understand that we cannot solve the problem of illegal immigration just by law enforcement alone. … I think President Bush understands it. I think John McCain understands it."

Frist Said To Be Exploiting Anti-Immigration Sentiment Among Conservatives. The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace), said Senate majority leader Bill Frist "who hasn't had a terribly successful pre- presidential campaign so far…wants to be the representative now of the enforcement-only, close-the-border, no-help-for-those-who-are-here-illegally Republicans. And there is a lot of support for that, or appears to be. … Frist playing to that base. McCain is strongly identified with a more liberal approach, very much like Bush's, and I think it will be a huge issue in the 2008 Republican primary. McCain and Giuliani probably will be the only candidates who are willing to take on this sort of apparent populist upsurge of concern."

Kondracke Says Bush Let Immigration "Get Out Of Hand." In his Roll Call (3/27), Morton Kondracke says President Bush "finally re-entered the immigration debate last week to appeal for civility and compassion. He's way late. The debate is already bitter and divisive, especially within the Republican Party, and it's only getting worse." It's Bush "who allowed the situation to get out of hand. Since before he became president, the former border-state governor has favored a moderate, comprehensive approach to immigration — a combination of enhanced border security and internal enforcement measures, plus work permits for new entrants and for those presently working illegally. But Bush failed to push this approach, initially because of post-9/11 security concerns and then because he decided to spend his post-re-election political capital on Social Security."

Immigration Reform Seen As Potential Loser For GOP Candidates. The Wall Street Journal's Paul Gigot, on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace), said, "I think the question is whether the Republicans in the Senate can save the House Republicans from their worst instincts. I mean, the House Republicans convinced themselves that being restrictionist in immigration is good politics. I'm not so sure it is. … There are other factions in the party base, including the business community, as Juan said, but also religious conservatives who are worried about, in their Good Samaritan role, being harassed, and then Hispanics."

Latin American Leaders Considering Way To Oppose US Border Wall Plans. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Harman, 61K) reports that as Mexican President Vicente Fox "prepares to meet Thursday with President Bush and Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, in Cancún, the proposed 700-mile, $2.2 billion barrier is a major point of contention - not just for the US and Mexico, but for the US and the whole region." Regional leaders – "whose countries in 2004 received some $45 billion sent home from immigrants in the US - have met three times recently to discuss how best to oppose it." Other issues also "in proposed US immigration reform legislation…irk regional leaders and caused hundreds of thousands of people to protest in multiple US cities over the past few days."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (3/27, Douglas, 423K) reports Bush and Fox "plan to meet in the Yucatan resort as part of a trilateral summit with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. While Bush has economic issues to address with Harper, U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting." Given the "political climate across the United States, it is doubtful Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year."

Brown-Waite Says Senate Bill Should Include Condemnation Of Rape. The Washington Times (3/27, Seper, 90K) reports Republican Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite said the Senate immigration bill "should include a condemnation of rapes by alien smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border and encourage 'in the strongest possible terms' the Mexican government to prevent such crimes." Rep. Brown-Waite's "amendment to a House immigration-enforcement bill calling for Congress to condemn the rapes was passed," and it "called on Congress to condemn the rapes by smugglers along the border and urged the Mexican government to work with U.S. Customs and Border Protection to take immediate action to prevent such crimes."

Krugman Criticizes House GOP, Bush Immigration Proposals. In his New York Times column (3/27), Paul Krugman says, "Realistically, we'll need to reduce the inflow of low-skill immigrants. Mainly that means better controls on illegal immigration. But the harsh anti-immigration legislation passed by the House, which has led to huge protests — legislation that would, among other things, make it a criminal act to provide an illegal immigrant with medical care — is simply immoral. Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's plan for a 'guest worker' program is clearly designed by and for corporate interests, who'd love to have a low-wage work force that couldn't vote. Not only is it deeply un-American; it does nothing to reduce the adverse effect of immigration on wages."

WSJournal Backs Reform Of H-1B Visa Process. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) says while "globalization has increased the competition for international talent, U.S. businesses are frustrated by processing delays, long backlogs and especially the failure of Congress to increase the annual limits on visas for skilled immigrants." Under Sen. Arlen Specter's "proposal, the annual cap on H-1B guest worker visas for immigrants in specialty fields like science and engineering would rise to 115,000 from 65,000. Moreover, the new cap would not be fixed but would fluctuate automatically in response to demand for these visas. We don't think any cap is necessary. But if a Republican Congress feels it must impose one, the least it can do is let market forces have some say in the matter."

NYTimes Says Bush Will Have To Engage To Keep Immigration Reform On Track. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) says in an editorial that the pro-immigration demonstrations "have been timed to a climactic showdown for immigration reform in the capital." Senate staffs were "racing over the weekend to nail down compromises before today's deadline. Anti-immigrant forces, meanwhile, stand ready to try to torpedo anything other than a strictly get-tough approach. That would be an awful outcome for immigrant advocates and for President Bush, who has long argued for comprehensive reform and tried, with limited success, to steer his party away from the one-note harshness of the wall-building crowd." But with "looming elections and Republican presidential jockeying casting a distorting fuzz over the debate, it may be too late for Mr. Bush's hands-off approach. If the president really wants a sensible reform bill to reach his desk, he will have to do more than stand on the sidelines, urging everyone to have good manners."

TAX:

Bush To Intensify Push For Permanent Tax Cuts. U.S. News and World Report (4/3) reports in its "White House Week" column, "President Bush, moving to give permanent status to his hallmark tax cuts, is planning to step up his push for the issue in hopes that the House and Senate will grant his wish this year." Bush feels the tax cuts are "a good campaign issue, and a personal 'legacy issue' as well."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Proposals Would Require Lawmakers To Reveal Contacts With Lobbyists. The Washington Post (3/27, A4, Weisman, 744K) reports on efforts to reform the congressional earmark process. According to the Post, "Proposals pending before the House and Senate would force lawmakers to reveal their contacts with lobbyists and disclose their involvement in winning federal spending provisions or earmarks for constituents or special interests. If such disclosures become mandatory, some in Congress hope past practices will shrivel in the light of day. If not, they hope to win passage of provisions that would allow improperly secured earmarks to be struck from bills on the House or Senate floor. The Senate will take up earmark-reform proposals as early as today, when it turns its attention to a broad package of lobbying and ethics rule changes.'

Novak Says Bush Should Heed DeMint's Suggestion On Curbing Earmarks. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/27) writes that ten U.S. senators recently met with President Bush "at the White House to hear him make the case for a line-item veto." But South Carolina Sen. Jim DeMint (R) "had a better idea for the president: Why not instruct your department heads to ignore the earmarks Congress adds to your budget?" Novak notes, "A March 6 report by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service (CRS) said more than 95 percent of all earmarks were not written into law but were merely contained in the reports of congressional committees and legislative managers. 'Earmarks that appear in committee reports and the statements of managers do not legally bind agencies,' said the report." Bush "did not respond to DeMint at the meeting, and that signifies opposition to the idea." Bush "might well measure the benefits of bold action. If they are required to submit earmarks for floor action by the Senate and House, the lawmakers' ability to overspend would be diminished. From a political standpoint, DeMint is giving the president the opportunity for a dramatic gesture showing that he really cares about spending. By all appearances, Bush won't take it."

Placing 527 Regulation Into Lobbying Reform Bill Called "Politics As Usual." Richard L. Hasen, who specializes in election law at Loyola Law School, writes in Roll Call (3/27) that "proposed legislation in the House would treat 527s as political committees, thereby limiting 527 contributions from individuals to $5,000 per year, with a total yearly cap of $37,500 on any individual's giving to all such groups as well as other non-party political committees." Hasen adds that "regardless of whether 527 regulation is good policy, it makes no sense to put the 527 regulation into a lobbying reform bill." Placing "a 527 measure into a lobbying bill is sure to get the bill enmeshed in partisan controversy. And cynics believe that's the point: Either the bill passes and the Republicans enjoy a double advantage (having taken care of "lobbying reform" while also hobbling a tool that has helped Democrats), or they can blame Democrats for being obstructionist over lobbying reform. … Regulating 527s in the guise of lobbying reform is just more politics as usual in Washington."

E-Mail Reveals Democratic Plans To Unveil National Security Strategy. Roll Call (3/27, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column that Democrats "were handed a bummer Friday when an e-mail plotting a news conference to unveil their national security strategy fell into enemy hands. Republicans were tickled when they intercepted a missive written by Democratic operative Stephanie Cutter seeking law enforcement involvement in the Democrats' covertly planned national security event set for Wednesday. … Cutter, who recently left Capitol Hill to form the Cutter Media Group, was looking to gather '20 or so' law enforcement officers on stage at Union Station for the event, where Congressional Democratic leaders plan for the first time to formally unveil a strategic presentation on how the party, if it regains control of Congress, would protect the United States against terrorism and other national security threats. … According to Cutter's e-mail, Democratic leaders will use Wednesday's event to commit to making implementation of the 9/11 commission's recommendations 'our first act when Democrats regain control of the Senate and/or House.'"

GAO Report Says Sensitive HHS Data Is At Risk. A GAO report has found "significant weaknesses" in the information security at the Department of Health and Human Services and its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. According to the Washington Times (3/27, Fagan, 90K) reports that "key health, financial, scientific and personal information" is not "being adequately protected from fraud and abuse, a government report has found." According to the report, HHS has "put at risk the confidentiality, integrity and availability of their sensitive information." The Times reports, "Among the specific deficiencies: access to data was not always restricted when it should have been; anti-virus software wasn't always installed or updated; network protection was inadequate in some areas; and encryption wasn't used when sending certain sensitive information."

Non-English Speaking Seniors Have Trouble Enrolling In Medicare Drug Plans. The Los Angeles Times (3/27, Lin, 958K) reports that as the May 15 deadline for enrollment in the Medicare prescription program nears, immigrants with little or nor English skills are "swamping clinics, community centers and pharmacies, unable to read the litany of Medicare-related mailings and or even ask questions about their new plans. … Complaints about language barriers have arisen across the country, but the issue is particularly acute in California, where the primary language of one in five residents -- and about the same fraction of low-income seniors -- is not English, said Jeanne Finberg, a California-based attorney for the National Senior Citizens Law Center." Medicare officials "said last week that they have been doing outreach at many senior centers, including those that serve non-English-speakers. In addition, they have helped fund nonprofit groups that offer toll-free call lines catering to those who speak Spanish, Chinese, Vietnamese and Korean."

Towey Addresses Springfield Diocesan Conference. The Chicopee/Holyoke (MA) Republican (3/26, McAuliffe) reported Jim Towey, "director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives since February 2002, was a keynote speaker yesterday at 'Grow In Holiness,' the fourth annual Springfield Diocesan Catholic Men's Conference." Towey "spoke for about 45 minutes, spending much of his time reflecting on the late Mother Teresa, for whom he had worked for a dozen years." The conference "was begun to challenge Catholic men to make a deeper commitment to their faith, and Towey said the experience could be transforming." Towey "may be a White House employee, but he attended the conference on his own time." Towey said, "This is Jim Towey, private citizen, who happens to work at the White House."

First Lady Has Replaced Her Entire "High Command" After Five Years. The New York Times (3/27, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports in its "White House Letter" column that First Lady Laura Bush "has replaced her entire high command after five years in charge of the East Wing." The First Lady "is now on her second chief of staff, Anita McBride. She is on her second projects and policy director, Sonya Medina. She is on her third press secretary, Susan Whitson. She is on her second social secretary, Lea Berman. On the residence staff, she is on her second executive chef, Cristeta Comerford. Not least, she is on a search for her third pastry chef."

Card Says Bush Is Applying Management Style Learned In Business School. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Walsh) reports that President Bush's "CEO presidency has fallen on hard times." The past year has seen two "management disasters" that "undermined public faith in his competence: his administration's weak response to Hurricane Katrina, which erased his image as a strong leader, and its botched effort at persuading Congress to accept a deal authorizing a Dubai-owned company to operate six U.S. seaports." White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card "refused to 'point fingers' but said Bush is correcting what went wrong and the administration will do better in the future." Card "and other Bush confidants say the chief executive is applying the hands-off style he learned at Harvard Business School," and also "the methods that worked for him as an oilman, as managing partner of the Texas Rangers baseball team, and, later, as governor of Texas." A separate story in U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Clark) reports that management gurus and business executives say Bush's leadership style "has been shaped by his 1975 Harvard

M.B.A." However, some "worry that Bush may not be applying some of B-school's most important lessons and may be suffering instead from all-too-typical M.B.A. flaws, such as overconfidence."

Bush Said To Be Distant From Staff, Lawmakers. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Walsh) reports that "aside from his inner circle, Bush is said to be distant from the rest of his staff, jeopardizing morale. Just as important, many members of Congress complain that they don't get their phone calls returned or their ideas considered in the West Wing. Bush, they say, doesn't reach out to them as other chief executives have done." Card "argues that Bush consults privately with more nongovernment friends and civic leaders than outsiders realize."

Bush To Throw Out First Pitch At Reds' Home Opener On April 3. The Cincinnati Enquirer (3/25, Wilkinson, 205K) reported that President Bush "will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday. Bush will take the mound shortly before the 2:10 p.m. start of the Reds' game against the Chicago Cubs on April 3." Bob Castellini, "the Reds' new chief executive officer, has been a Bush supporter, raising more than $100,000 for the president's 2004 re-election campaign. Last month, Castellini was among those who greeted the president at a private home in Indian Hill, where Bush attended a $1.1 million fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine."

GSA Publishes Guidelines For "Alternative Work Arrangements." The Washington Post (3/27, D4, Barr, 744K) reports in its "Federal Diary" column that "alternative workplace arrangements," are the "future of federal work." The General Services Administration "recently published a bulletin in the Federal Register reminding federal agencies that laws from 1996, 2000 and 2002 encourage alternatives to the office cubicle. … The GSA bulletin offers agencies a helpful guide to the do's and don'ts of alternative work arrangements. It makes clear that agencies can provide new or surplus equipment to telecommuters 'as long as it is clear that the equipment continues to belong to the government.' In addition, the bulletin says, agencies may pay to install telephone lines and necessary equipment, and pay monthly charges, 'in any private residence of an employee who has been authorized to work at home.'"

Gutierrez To Visit Tokyo This Week. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Bedard) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez this week will help Ralph Lauren open his new store in Tokyo. US News adds, "The visit is more than just an administration bid to promote U.S. investment overseas. Turns out the two share a hardscrabble past: Both are the sons of immigrants who started small -- Gutierrez selling cereal out of his car and Lauren selling ties at Brooks Brothers."

WSJournal Says Senate Should Confirm Judges Before Summer Recess. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) says "it's past time Senate Republicans got back to work confirming appeals-court judges. They won't have 55 seats forever. Or perhaps even after November 7. Judges are a key issue for the GOP's base, who could stay home on Election Day rather than turn out for Republicans who shilly-shally about confirming President Bush's nominees. There are 17 vacancies on the appeals bench, including nine pending nominations. They deserve to be filled as soon as possible before the summer recess. … The advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution gives the Senate the duty to vet all federal judicial nominees. Now it's time for the remaining nominees to have the up-or-down floor votes they deserve."

Economist Sees "Minefield Of Risks" Facing US Economy. Allen Sinai, president of Decision Economics, says the US economy is in good shape this year, but believes the long term picture is much more murky. USA Today (3/27, Hagenbaugh, Hansen, 2.31M) reports that Sinai, who was "the most accurate forecaster of the 45 economists surveyed each quarter last year by USA TODAY," says that in the near term, the US economy "is 'in an entrenched and very solid expansion.' But looking to the future, there is a 'minefield of risks' that threatens the economy, Sinai says. He names the budget deficit, rising health care costs, pension problems and the war in Iraq, to name a few. He's also concerned lawmakers in Washington, facing an electorate that has become increasingly concerned about the growing influence of China on the world stage, will start a confrontation with the Asian nation."

Fed Expected To Approve 15th Consecutive Rate Hike. New Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke today will convene his first meeting of the Fed's policymakers. The New York Times (3/27, Uchitelle, 1.19M) says the two-day session "is all but certain to end tomorrow afternoon with another quarter-point rise in short-term interest rates, the 15th consecutive increase. That will bring the critical rate the Fed controls to 4.75 percent, up from 1 percent in June 2004, when Mr. Greenspan started the process of steadily increasing borrowing costs. Many analysts expect Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues to raise the rate yet again in May, by another quarter of a point."

Party Strategists Say GOP Would Lose House Control If Election Were Held Today. Time (4/3, Tumulty, Allen) reports that Republican incumbents "are having a hard time figuring out how close they want to be to the White House. … The midterm contests in a President's second term are almost always treacherous, but this time around, Republicans thought it would be different. … In recent weeks, a startling realization has begun to take hold: if the elections were held today, top strategists of both parties say privately, the Republicans would probably lose the 15 seats they need to keep control of the House of Representatives and could come within a seat or two of losing the Senate as well."

Republicans Seek To Paint Democratic Veterans As Single-Issue Candidates. U.S. News and World Report (4/3, Gilgoff) reports that Democrats hope that military veterans running for Congress in the midterm elections "will help neutralize the GOP's national security advantage and immunize the party against charges that its Iraq criticisms are unpatriotic." But, the Iraq and Afghanistan vets "are all political newcomers, most facing well-financed incumbents." US News adds, "The biggest challenge for the Democratic war vets may be developing credibility beyond national security. … Republicans are determined to paint Democratic vets as single-issue candidates who are clueless on pocketbook issues."

Bush Approval Rating At 39% In Time Poll. Time (4/3, Tumulty, Allen) reports, "In a TIME poll conducted last week, Bush's job approval rating was mired at 39%; 3 in 5 Americans said the country is headed in the wrong direction, and when those surveyed were given the choice between a generic Republican and a generic Democrat for Congress, the nameless Democrat won, 50% to 41%. The signs suggest an anti-Republican wave is building, says nonpartisan electoral handicapper Stuart Rothenberg." NRCC Chairman Tom Reynolds "said the picture is more promising race by race than it is nationally. He told TIME only 36 to 40 races will be in play, meaning Democrats would have to keep all their competitive seats and knock off three-quarters of the Republicans."

Social Conservatives Warn GOP To Be More Aggressive On Values Issues. Social conservative groups have warned Republicans that if they want to see a strong turnout of its conservative base this November, the party must be more aggressive on values issues such as marriage, religious freedom and abortion. The Washington Times (3/27, Fagan, 90K) reports, "Leading conservative activists have been sounding off lately, frustrated that since 2004, when their voters turned out in force to help President Bush win re-election, the Republican Party has backed off the values issues."

Roll Call (3/27, Stanton) reports, "Leaders from more than 40 of the nation's most powerful conservative Christian organizations are gathering in Washington, D.C., this week to put GOP Congressional leaders on notice that they will actively look to keep 'values voters' away from the polls if lawmakers don't make good on commitments to move a 'Christ-centered' legislative agenda." Organizers of this week's conference say they are concerned by a "growing attack on Christian values by liberal lawmakers, Hollywood and the judiciary. Conservatives are gathering today and Tuesday with a handful of their House and Senate allies, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), and Reps. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) and Louie Gohmert (R-Texas). In addition to discussing the status of the "culture war," participants in the conference will map out a legislative agenda, which organizers say will serve as a litmus test for whether their network of conservative activists and clergy will back incumbents in this fall's elections."

Author Says Conference Title Is Overblown. Author Tom Krattenmaker writes in USA Today (3/27, 2.31M) that the conference, called "The War on Christians and the Values Voters in 2006," boasts "a lineup of some of the biggest stars of the so-called Christian right — Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, onetime presidential candidate Gary Bauer and Eagle Forum leader Phyllis Schlafly. The chief organizer is Rick Scarborough, leader of Vision America, a group that describes its purpose as reversing America's moral decline by getting more Bible-believing Christians to participate in the political process. … Isn't this more than a bit overblown? And in a time when the country is caught up in a real war with religious overtones, shouldn't the word 'war' be tossed around a little less recklessly? … Christians in America are hardly being thrown to the lions. In many ways, the political and social values of conservative Christians are carrying the day. We are in the second term of the most faith-friendly, explicitly Christian presidency in many a decade."

Bush Reaction To Afghan Christian's Trial Said To Have Nothing To Do With Religious Right. Stuart Rothenberg writes in Roll Call (3/27) that he was shocked at questions over what President Bush had to do to respond to the possible execution of an Afghan Muslim who had converted to Christianity in order to "satisfy" his base. Rothenberg notes, "I know some journalists are obsessed with the political influence of the religious right, but the idea that the president's response would, to a considerable extent, be crafted to pacify evangelical Republicans is ridiculous." Rothenberg adds, "I suppose it is possible that if an execution takes place, some Americans who have been supporting the war might start to question whether the administration's entire Iraq-Afghanistan policy is right. But that view wouldn't be limited to Christians, and it's not even certain that the execution would change existing views on the president's policies. … Some things involve simple truths that don't require over-interpretation. Like the question of whether it's OK to execute someone because of his or her religious beliefs."

Maryland Democrats Videotape Steele Campaign Stops. Maryland Democrats are videotaping Republican Senate candidate Lt. Gov. Michael Steele's campaign stops and making note of his fundraisers with Bush Administration officials. The Washington Times (3/27, Ward, 90K) reports, "Derek Walker, executive director of the state's Democratic Party, said videotaping is a typical campaign tactic and that party members are 'learning as much as we can' about Mr. Steele. … Mr. Steele, well-aware of Democrats' presence, began a recent campaign stop by talking about his 'following.' 'I know that a lot of people are watching this race very closely, especially the Democrats,' Mr. Steele said."

DCCC To Target Stem Cell Research Opponents. DCCC Chairman Rahm Emanuel heads to New Jersey today for the first of seven events aimed at highlighting GOP House candidates' opposition to stem cell research. Roll Call (3/27, Kornacki) reports, "At Newark Liberty Airport, Emanuel will join Linda Stender, a 12-year veteran of the New Jersey state Assembly who is challenging three-term Rep. Mike Ferguson (R) in the nearby 7th district. … Emanuel and Stender will criticize the stem-cell research position of Ferguson, who is anti-abortion. Democrats say his opposition to such research puts him at odds with his moderate, suburban constituency. … Emanuel will not appear at the other six events on tap for the week, which will be held in districts generally considered a notch or two more competitive than New Jersey's 7th."

Suit Charges Kerry With Conspiracy, Defamation. Sen. John Kerry set up a legal defense fund last month to fight a civil suit charging him with conspiracy and defamation. The New York Times (3/27, Ivry, 1.19M) reports, "The suit accuses Mr. Kerry and an aide of campaigning to stop the Sinclair Broadcasting Group from showing 'Stolen Honor' and of trying to injure [journalist Carlton] Sherwood's business and reputation." Sherwood called the suit "an effort to make Mr. Kerry answer for having 'defamed and excoriated hundreds of thousands of men, some of them killed in action, just for his own political future.'"

Clinton Strategy Called "Strikingly Similar" To Bush's In 1998. The New York Times (3/27, Kornblut, Hernandez, 1.19M) reports that while there is a great deal of speculation about Sen. Hillary Clinton's plans for a possible 2008 presidential bid, the Senator "appears not to have lost sight of 2006 -- judging not only by her painstaking attention to local details during her public appearances, but also by a schedule that frequently takes her to Republican areas across the state." Clinton "appears to be treating her re-election bid as, among other things, a chance to prove her viability in tough parts of the New York, with Democrats and associates saying that she is aiming both to run up a big margin of victory statewide and to exceed expectations in Republican strongholds." The Times adds, "The strategy is strikingly similar to the one used by George W. Bush in 1998, when he ran up the score among Hispanics and moderates in Texas during his re-election campaign as governor, allowing him to promote the results as proof of his broad electoral appeal."

Clinton Amasses "Army" Of Campaign Aides. The New York Post (3/27, Bishop, 624K) reports that although New York Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) has yet to say if she'll run for president in '08, "she's already drafted a presidential-size army of campaign staffers that dwarfs John McCain's outfit and those of everyone else in the field. Clinton has assembled a Titanic-size troop of 37 staffers and a legion of pricey consultants on the rolls of her HillPAC political-action committee and her Friends of Hillary re-election campaign -- operatives that come on top of the three dozen aides in her Senate office. 'I understand New York is a large state, but this is extraordinary. This operation is built for one thing and one thing only: She's running for president,' said a senior Dem operative."

Book Questions Viability Of Retraining Laid Off Workers. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) excepts the book "The Disposable American: Layoffs and Their Consequences," by Louis Uchitelle, an economics writer for The New York Times. Knopf will publish the book on Tuesday. The book notes, "Saying that the country should solve the skills shortage through education and training became part of nearly every politician's stump speech, an innocuous way to address the politics of unemployment without strengthening either the bargaining leverage of workers or the federal government's role in bolstering labor markets. But training for what? The reality, as the aircraft mechanics discovered, is painfully different from the reigning wisdom. Rather than having a shortage of skills, millions of American workers have more skills than their jobs require." The process of retraining workers "was like a funnel: wide at one end, where all the laid-off workers go in, and narrow at the other, where a limited number gradually emerge into retraining and, if they are lucky, new jobs at decent pay."

Rice Says US, Russia Working On UNSC Agreement On Iran. The AFP (3/26) reported Secretary

Rice said "US and Russian diplomats were meeting in a new bid to end the impasse over a UN response to Iran's controversial nuclear program." She "acknowledged during a round of Sunday television talk shows that differences persisted over the language of a UN Security Council statement seeking to keep Iran from pursuing sensitive nuclear work." Rice "said she spoke Friday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and they agreed to have their negotiators work through the weekend in an attempt to hammer out language acceptable to both."

Asked on Fox News Sunday (3/26, Wallace) if the US is "prepared to step up the pressure on Moscow…at a time when the Iranians are defying the world's will," Rice said, "The Iranians are defying the world's will, and the international community needs to speak and speak with one voice. We and the Russians and the Europeans and others have the same view. … That is that Iran needs to suspend its enrichment activities and return to negotiation. Nobody believes that Iran should have enrichment and reprocessing capability on its territory, because that is easily transferable or easily convertible into the technology to make a weapon. And so we have agreement on what Iran must do."

Rice was asked on NBC's Meet the Press (3/26, Russert) if it is the policy of the US government that Iran "will not be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon." Secretary Rice replied, "Iran cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear weapon. That is the view of the international community, not just the United States. … If they wish to be a part of the international community, they have no choice but to give up ambitions that could lead to the technologies that would lead to a nuclear weapon. If the international community stays really solid here, Iran cannot stand the kind of isolation from the international community that, for instance, North Korea, endures almost by choice. We really do have a chance to solve this diplomatically."

Hadley Dismisses Iranian Overture On Nuclear Issue. Time (4/3, McGeary) reports on efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program. Time says the joint diplomatic offensive "hasn't produced much in the way of results. … The U.S. and Europe have persuaded Russia and China to join them in reporting Iran's failure to cooperate with international demands to the U.N. Security Council, but both countries oppose punitive action such as economic sanctions." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "plans to visit Berlin, Paris and Britain this week in an effort to hammer out a statement that can win unanimous backing in the Security Council. Meanwhile, Tehran has sped up research work on the uranium enrichment that lies at the heart of the dispute." Time adds, "Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, told TIME that the regime may be open to compromise on the nuclear issue. … National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley dismisses Iran's overture as 'simply a device by the Iranians to divert pressure that they are feeling in New York.'"

Some Iranian Conservatives Worry About "Extreme Right." The Washington Post (3/27, A11, Vick, 744K) reports, "Nine months after the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president, Iranian politics has shifted so sharply to the right that some traditional conservatives are warning of the dangers of radicalism. With reformists sidelined and Ahmadinejad setting a strident new tone on the global stage, figures from the extreme right of Iran's political spectrum are defining the terms of political debate in the country." The "tension highlights significant divisions within Iran's conservative camp, often viewed from outside the country as a turbaned monolith."

State Department Seeks Applicants To Promote Democracy In Iran. In its "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post (3/27, A13, 744K) excerpts the State Department's "Iran Democracy Program Announcement," which said, "The Office of the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI) announces an open competition for grant applications that support democratic governance and reform in Iran. This represents a new MEPI funding initiative, and submissions must outline activities linked to reform and demonstrate how the proposed approach would achieve sustainable impact in Iran. … MEPI seeks to strengthen the community of Iranian reformers at the local and national levels and support reformers with demonstrated commitment as they work to build broader alliances with new stakeholder groups around issues of core democratic values. MEPI supports programs that link reformers within and across national boundaries and use local organizational capacity to leverage opportunities to advance reform."

Olmert Pledges To Consult US On Separation Plan. The AP (3/26, Lavie) reports, "Two days before a crucial election, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to consult the United States and Europe about his plan to pull out of much of the West Bank, remove settlements and set his country's borders within four years." The AP said Olmert's separation plan "has breathed life into an election campaign that has been sleepy despite earthquakes in Israeli politics." A separate AP (3/26, Plushnick-Masti) piece noted "a lackluster campaign that aroused little emotion," and said "a low turnout could cause the most damage to Olmert's centrist Kadima Party, which is the clear front-runner, analysts said." Continuing its coverage of Israeli politics, the AP (3/26, Nessman) said the Labor Party "faces a flight of the very European voters who are its base," and noted the "ethnic demon" of promoting a candidate – Amir Peretz – who is of Middle Eastern or Sephardis decent. The New York Times (3/27, Erlanger, 1.19M) runs a 1,200-word feature on Olmert, "long on the outskirts of power," whose "extraordinary ideological journey" has culminated in the "extraordinary turn" of events that have put him on the cusp of winning his own mandate.

Russian Immigrant Voters Could Play Key Role In Elections. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Prusher, 61K) reports, "The victor in Tuesday's nationwide parliamentary vote is widely expected to be the Kadima (Forward) Party, representing the legacy of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. But the real cliffhanger is how well vote-getters like Avigdor Lieberman will fare." He "speaks in the mother tongue of most of his supporters: Russian. About 1 in 4 voters in this coastal city is a new immigrant from the former Soviet Union. This polyglot of newcomers, known as 'Russim,' now make up at least 15 percent of the electorate, compromising one of the most influential voting blocs." The Washington Times (3/27, Mitnick, 90K) runs a similar report.

Hamas Cabinet Nominee Says He Will Seek Economic Treaty With Israel. The Washington Times (3/27, Mitnick, 90K) reports, "Hamas' nominee for Palestinian finance minister, Omar Abdel Razeq, said yesterday that he hopes to negotiate a new economic treaty with Israel, even though he supports the Islamic militant party's refusal to recognize the Jewish state for peace talks." The Times adds, "The desire to embrace Israel in what would amount to a major treaty indicates how Hamas politicians and the ministerial nominees have resigned themselves to a de facto acknowledgement of Israel to improve the daily lives of their constituents."

Dealing With Hamas Poses Dilemma For US, EU. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, King Jr., Champion, 2.11M) reports, "With Hamas likely to form a new government by the end of this week, the US and Europe must decide how to interact with a transformed Palestinian Authority." The US, Europe and Israel "say they will do nothing directly to prop up a Hamas government that refuses to recognize Israel or renounce violence. Yet they also worry that cutting off Western aid -- totaling roughly $1.3 billion last year, or about one-third of the territories' economy -- would sow chaos and political convulsions, with dire consequences for the region." US officials "see their looming face-off with Hamas as a template for dealing with other militant Islamist governments that may come to power through elections elsewhere in the region. … Even basic questions, such as how to sustain humanitarian help while cutting off direct aid, are hard to tackle."

Afghan Christian's Case Likely To Reverberate With US Religious Right. Time (4/3) reports in its "Notebook" column, "When news trickled out of Kabul late last month that a former aid worker named Abdul Rahman, 41, was on trial for converting to Christianity, the U.S. government responded with dismay -- but not much else. … Religious leaders in the U.S. assailed the White House, with activists like Jay Sekulow…bombarding Karl Rove's evangelical liaison with e-mail." Time adds that "the right-wing furor over the Rahman case is likely to reverberate. To many Americans, the fact that Christian converts face prosecution in a country 'liberated' by the U.S. in 2002 has bolstered the perception that the divide between Islam and the West is growing."

Schumer, Graham At Odds Over Progress On Chinese Currency. The New York Times (3/27, Bradsher, 1.19M) reports, "After a weeklong trip to China, two senators who have been pushing Chinese leaders to devalue their nation's currency say they do not agree on how much progress China is making. The split indicates that they are less likely to press for a Senate vote on their trade bill this week." Sens. Charles E. Schumer and Lindsey Graham "have introduced legislation that would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on all American imports from China in two years." The senators "both said in an interview here Saturday that they remained committed to advancing the legislation unless China stopped intervening in currency markets and allowed the yuan to move higher against the dollar." But "they also said that Senator Schumer had been more impressed than Senator Graham by promises from Chinese officials to liberalize their currency policies." Asked "whether the newest development from the trip was the emergence of some differences between the two men," Schumer replied, "That would be fair."

The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "The good news is that Senators Lindsey Graham and Charles Schumer have started to inch away from their misguided attempt to club China for its currency policies. At the end of a fact-finding trip last week, Mr. Schumer told reporters he was no longer sure he would push for a vote to impose tariffs on Chinese imports into the United States. 'The jury is out,' he said." The Administration, adds the Times, "has done a fair job so far in its tap dance around America's relationship with the world's fastest-growing economy. Now is not the time to slide back into election-year shortsightedness."

Yushchenko Allies Finish "Humiliating" Third In Parliamentary Elections. The Financial Times (3/27, Wagstyl, Donetsk) reports Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko "looked set for a humiliating defeat" by "both Yulia Tymoshenko, his former ally in the Orange Revolution, and Viktor Yanukovich, his opponent in the disputed 2004 presidential election." The Times says the loss "will complicate efforts to form a coalition, creating fresh political uncertainty as the country struggles to come to terms with the Orange Revolution's aftermath." While Yanukovich finished first, the Times says, "in a shock result, Ms Tymoshenko beat Mr Yushchenko into third place." The Times predicted that Yuschenko and Tymoshenko "could probably command enough seats for a parliamentary majority. But it is unclear whether they will be able to swallow their personal and political differences." The Wall Street Journal (3/27, A3, Chazan, 2.11M) says the results show "plummeting support for the country's Western-oriented president," who "may now be forced into a coalition with his erstwhile enemy, Viktor Yanukovych." His third-place finish "would mark a humiliating defeat for Mr. Yushchenko" and "a setback for pro-European forces in Ukraine," which is part of "the regional tug of war for influence between Russia and the West." The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M), Washington Post (3/27, A10, Finn, 744K) and Washington Times (3/27, Feduschak, 90K), among other newspapers, also report on the election results.

Belarus Opposition Leader Seized By Police. In the latest effort by President Aleksandr Lukashenko to crush the protest movement, the New York Times (3/27, Chivers, 1.19M) reports opposition leader Aleksandr Kazulin "was seized Saturday when riot police officers with batons attacked a column of peaceful protesters who were marching to a prison where opposition members had been jailed." The Austrian EU Presidency "said in a statement on Sunday that the Union 'is appalled by the violence used against demonstrators' and called for the release of Mr. Kazulin and the other protesters." In a pessimistic piece entitled "Belarus Divided, Doubtful After Clashes," the AP (3/26, Gutterman) said, "Many Belarusians now are confronting an array of unanswered questions: It is unclear how much support the opposition really has, how much dissent authorities will tolerate or what effect a stream of denunciations from the West will have."

Blair Said To Have Handover Date In Mind. The Financial Times (3/27, Blitz) reports, "Tony Blair has admitted for the first time that he has decided when he will resign as prime minister. However, he is not yet revealing the date." The Times says Blair wants to ensure that National Health Service reforms are implemented and an orderly transfer to Gordon Brown is laid out before stepping aside.

Alleged Sale Of Lordships Taints Blair's Government. The Christian Science Monitor (3/27, Rice-Oxley, 61K) reports, "Will a million pounds make you a 'Sir' or a 'Lord' in Britain today? That's what British police are investigating, following complaints that Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour party rewarded four big financial backers with the promise of seats in the House of Lords, the unelected upper house of parliament that wields considerable influence." The "murky controversy has intensified pressure on Blair to step down and revived a debate about how politics should be funded here." A recent poll "showed 56 percent of voters believed the loans-for-lordships allegations were true, and almost three-quarters agree that Blair's government is now as tainted by sleaze as that of his predecessor, John Major."

Bush Administration Seen As Contributing To Blair Decline. The Weekly Standard (4/3, Baker) reports the "gathering consensus now asserts" that British Prime Minister Tony Blair "will not, in spite of his own ambition and energy, reach the full decade in office he had hoped for." The Bush Administration "will have played a substantial part in Blair's demise. The Iraq war, of course, has undermined the prime minister; but the Bush administration seems oddly committed to making life even more difficult for him." Britain is "in a state of angry ferment about the way its defense contracts have been handled by the Americans. A decision by the Pentagon to cut a British company out of the procurement contracts for the new Joint Strike Fighter has outraged public opinion and led even this most Atlanticist of governments to think seriously about striking out in a new direction with European partners, rather than be more closely integrated with U.S. defense systems. Quite how a beleaguered administration can still find room to alienate one of its few allies in the world is perhaps only for Donald Rumsfeld to explain. But the damage done to Blair's claim that his support for the United States has produced tangible benefits for the United Kingdom is incalculable."

Berlusconi Trails Challenger. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Kahn, 2.11M) reports, "Just two weeks before national elections, Italy's conservative Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi trails challenger Romano Prodi by three to six percentage points, according to polls -- a gap that analysts say will be difficult to close." Friday "marked the last day in which opinion polls could be published under Italian election rules before the April 9-10 voting. A poll conducted by GfK Eurisko, published in left-leaning Rome daily La Repubblica, had Mr. Prodi's center-left coalition taking 51.7% of the vote in the lower house of Parliament, compared with 46.6% for Mr. Berlusconi's alliance of center-right parties. The margin was tighter in the Senate, with the left gaining 51.4% of the vote compared with 47.1% for the right, according to GfK Eurisko."

Pressure Growing On Australia To Dismantle Wheat Export Monopoly. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Barta, 2.11M) reports, "Pressure is mounting on Australia to dismantle its powerful wheat-export monopoly amid allegations that it paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime to win lucrative wheat contracts in Iraq." Australia "ranks as the world's second-biggest exporter of wheat, behind the US, according to US Department of Agriculture statistics, and is a major competitor for US and European farmers overseas."

Persian Gulf Stock Markets Dropping. The Wall Street Journal (3/27, Karmin, El-Rashidi, 2.11M) reports, "The Persian Gulf's highflying stock markets, suffering their first serious correction after years of gains, are raising concerns that a speculative bubble may burst and hurt emerging markets more broadly. Fueled by cash from high oil prices," stock markets in Dubai, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi and "elsewhere in the Gulf have tripled or more in value in the past three years." But "in recent weeks, these stocks have suffered double-digit losses, with Saudi Arabia, the region's biggest stock market, shedding about a third of its value since late February." The declines "underscore the risks of emerging-market investing."

"Backlash" Against Privatizations Mounting In Latin America. The Washington Post (3/27, A10, Reel, 744K) reports from Argentina that a "backlash against the private sector has been building for several years in many pockets" of Latin America, and "in some cases, such as Bolivia and Mexico, it has been actively promoted by grass-roots leaders in tandem with their demands for limiting the influence of foreign interests. … In the past year, protests against the privatization of other sectors, including electricity and energy, have broken out in Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala and Mexico. Last week, several thousand demonstrators marched through Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, to demand the government improve water services without privatizing them."

Islamic Militias, Warlords Continue Fight For Control Of Somalia. The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A11) reports, "Radical Islamic militiamen and rivals buried their dead Sunday and brought in more fighters during a lull after four days of combat on the outskirts of Mogadishu, witnesses said. So far, at least 93 people have died and nearly 200 have been wounded in the violence." A "prominent moderate Islamic scholar appealed to the warring sides not to restart the fighting, which ranks among the deadliest in recent years in the nominal capital of this Horn of Africa country." Somalia "has been without a working government for 15 years. The recent battles involve a militia supporting hard-line Islamic clerics who are trying to expand their influence and fighters loyal to businessmen and Somali warlords who have formed an alliance to oppose the religious movement."

International Court Urges Nigeria To Arrest Former Liberian Leader. The Washington Post/AP (3/27, A11) reports, "The international war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone urged Nigeria on Sunday to immediately arrest Charles Taylor, Liberia's exiled former president, because of fears the former president might flee to avoid trial for crimes against humanity." Nigeria "said Saturday it was ready to hand over Taylor, sending a warning to other warmongers on the continent."

US Urged To Take Lead In Rebuilding Liberia. Ambassador Andrew Young, who served at the United Nations, and Peter V. Emerson, director of the Southern Africa Enterprise Development Fund, write in the Washington Times (3/27, 90K) that "rebuilding Liberia is not only a moral obligation; it is, make no mistake, imperative to US national security. Liberia's ties to America are frequently underplayed here, but those very ties define its position in Africa." A "resurgent Liberia will anchor West Africa, serving as a beacon for emerging democratic movements." The Bush Administration "made a promise to Africa and must now follow through on that commitment to growth by unveiling a Marshall-style infrastructural recovery plan."

Play Depicts Life In North Korean Prison Camp. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 13, 2:30, Litke, 8.78M) reported on a "ground-shaking new musical in South Korea, part 'Miss Saigon,' part 'Les Misérables' and part 'The Producers,' a tale of a prison camp where starvation, torture and execution are a way of life and death. And this production doesn't shy away from any of it. For the writer/director, it's all very personal, a northern defector whose entire family was executed after he fled. He says South Koreans, today, have little knowledge of, or interest in, the atrocities in the North. So, he hopes to reach them, through the most popular forms of entertainment here -- music and soap operas that tug at the heart strings." But "many here in South Korea are not amused. Government officials tried to stop the play from ever being staged. There were death threats against some members of the production and all because it is too harsh on the communist North. Goodwill and reconciliation is now official government policy between the Koreas."

Airbus Conducts Successful Evacuation Drill On A380. ABC World News Tonight (3/26, story 5, 0:20, Snow, 8.78M) reported, "In Hamburg, Germany today, Airbus held an evacuation drill onboard the world's largest passenger jet. Officials are calling the simulated exercise, a 'great success,' despite 33 people being hurt. The company said they were able to get 873 people off the plane in only 90 seconds, with half the doors blocked."

NYTimes Criticizes French Protesters. The New York Times (3/27, 1.19M) editorializes, "For the second time in four months, French streets are filled with riot police, tear gas and rampaging youths. But the similarity is deceptive. Back in November, it was the sons of North African immigrants in their dreary suburbs exploding in frustration at the lack of jobs, prospects or programs. It was hard not to feel sympathy with their cause, along with outrage at their response." This time, "privileged university students have been protesting what they see as an assault on the job security that they consider their birthright. But the labor reform to which they are so opposed is much needed and was proposed by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin as a partial answer to those who rioted in the suburbs." Students "should stop focusing on their privileges and heed President Jacques Chirac's call for a creative dialogue about how they can help resolve the real problem facing their generation."

WSJournal Takes On Chirac. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (3/27, 2.11M) criticizes French President Jacques Chirac. Says the Journal, "It is hard to think of anyone who has done more than this president to marginalize France and the French language -- all in the name of defending them."

TERRORISM NEWS:

FBI Keeps Watch On Activists (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

DENVER — The FBI, while waging a highly publicized war against terrorism, has spent resources gathering information on antiwar and environmental protesters and on activists who feed vegetarian meals to the homeless, the agency's internal memos show.

For years, the FBI's definition of terrorism has included violence against property, such as the window-smashing during the 1999 Seattle protests against the World Trade Organization. That definition has led FBI investigations to online discussion boards, organizing meetings and demonstrations of a wide range of activist groups. Officials say that international terrorists pose the greatest threat to the nation but that they cannot ignore crimes committed by some activists.

"It's one thing to express an idea or such, but when you commit acts of violence in support of that activity, that's where our interest comes in," said FBI spokesman Bill Carter in Washington.

He stressed that the agency targeted individuals who committed crimes and did not single out groups for ideological reasons. He cited the recent arrest of environmental activists accused of firebombing an unfinished ski resort in Vail. "People can get hurt," Carter said. "Businesses can be ruined."

The FBI's encounters with activists are described in hundreds of pages of documents obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union under the Freedom of Information Act after agents visited several activists before the 2004 political conventions. Details have steadily trickled out over the last year, but newly released documents provide a fuller view of some FBI probes.

"Any definition of terrorism that would include someone throwing a bottle or rock through a window during an antiwar demonstration is dangerously overbroad," ACLU staff attorney Ben Wizner said. "The FBI will have its hands full pursuing antiwar groups instead of truly dangerous organizations."

ACLU attorneys say most violence during demonstrations is minor and is better handled by local police than federal counterterrorism agents. They say the FBI, which spied on antiwar and civil rights leaders during the 1960s, appears to be investigating activists solely for opposing the government.

"They don't know where Osama bin Laden is, but they're spending money watching people like me," said environmental activist Kirsten Atkins. Her license plate number showed up in an FBI terrorism file after she attended a protest against the lumber industry in Colorado Springs in 2002.

ACLU attorneys acknowledge that the FBI memos are heavily redacted and contain incomplete portraits of some cases. Still, the attorneys say, the documents show that the FBI has monitored groups that were not suspected of any crime.

"It certainly seems they're casting a net much more widely than would be necessary to thwart something like the blowing up of the Oklahoma City federal building," said Mark Silverstein, legal director of the ACLU of Colorado.

FBI officials respond that there is nothing improper about agents attending a meeting or demonstration.

"We have to be able to go out and look at things; we have to be able to conduct an investigation," said William J. Crowley, a spokesman for the FBI in Pittsburgh. His field office filed a report — released by the ACLU this month — in which an agent described photographing Pittsburgh activists who were handing out fliers for a war protest. The report mentioned no potential violence or crimes.

Crowley said his office had been looking for a certain person in that case and had closed the file when it realized the suspect was not among those handing out the leaflets.

The murky connection that the federal government makes between some left-wing activist groups and terrorism was illustrated in a Justice Department presentation to a college law class this month.

An FBI counterterrorism official showed the class, at the University of Texas in Austin, 35 slides listing militia, neo-Nazi and Islamist groups. Senior Special Agent Charles Rasner said one slide, labeled "Anarchism," was a federal analyst's list of groups that people intent on terrorism might associate with.

The list included Food Not Bombs, which mainly serves vegetarian food to homeless people, and — with a question mark next to it — Indymedia, a collective that publishes what it calls radical journalism online. Both groups are among the numerous organizations affiliated with anarchists and anti-globalization protests, where there has been some violence.

Elizabeth Wagoner said she was one of the few students who objected to the groups' inclusion on the list. "My friends do Indymedia," she said. "My friends aren't terrorists."

Rasner said that he'd never heard of the two groups before and didn't mean to condemn them. But he added that it made sense to worry about violent people emerging from anarchist networks — "Any group can have somebody that goes south."

Denver, where the ACLU fought a lengthy court battle with local police over its spying on political groups, has the most extensive records of encounters between the FBI and activists. Documents obtained by the ACLU there revealed how agents monitored the lumber industry demonstration, an antiwar march and an anarchist group that activists say was never formed.

In June 2002, environmental activists protested the annual meeting of the North American Wholesale Lumber Assn. in Colorado Springs. An FBI memo justified opening an inquiry into the protest because an activist training camp was to be held on "nonviolent methods of forest defense … security culture, street theater and banner making."

About 30 to 40 people attended the protest; three were arrested for trespassing while hanging a political banner. Colorado Springs police faxed the FBI a three-page list of demonstrators' license plate numbers.

In a recent interview, Denver FBI spokeswoman Monique R. Kelso first said the training camp and protest would not have been enough to merit an anti-terrorism inquiry. But later she said that she wasn't familiar with the details of the case and that the FBI opened cases when there was possible criminal activity.

The FBI's Denver office also monitored a February 2003 antiwar demonstration in Colorado Springs. A bureau memo said that activists planned to block streets and an Air Force base entrance, and that a more "radical" faction had announced online that it would meet near the demonstration but break away for unspecified purposes. The memo said an agent would watch the breakaway group and report to local police and FBI agents monitoring the march.

FBI officials say there was additional information, which they cannot disclose, that justified a terrorism investigation of that protest. They stress that they have to be aggressive in investigating terrorism in the post-Sept. 11 world.

"There's a lot of responsibility on the FBI," said Joe Airey, head of the FBI's Joint Terrorism Task Force in Denver. "We have a real obligation to make sure there are no additional terrorist acts on this soil."

Denver-area activists said that since the surveillance documents became public, there had been a subtle chill, with some people avoiding protests for fear of ending up in an FBI file. Some activists think the FBI has been watching their groups to intimidate them.

"We've kind of gathered up our skirts and pulled in," said Sarah Bardwell, who works for the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group. Along with some activist roommates, she has also volunteered for Food Not Bombs.

"In our house, we don't talk about politics anymore," Bardwell said. "There's been a toning down of everything we do."

That change came after six FBI agents and Denver police officers visited her house in July 2004.

Months earlier, the FBI had obtained a flier advertising a meeting near Bardwell's house to form a chapter of Anarchist Black Cross. That movement has two wings; one, according to the FBI, has been associated with "some of the most violent left-wing groups of the past 40 years."

The organizer of the meeting, Dawn Rewolinski, said the prospective chapter would have been part of the movement's other wing, which writes letters to prisoners. The chapter was never established, Rewolinski said. "All we did is eat some cookies and talk about various prisoners and realize we didn't have enough money for a P.O. box."

Nonetheless, FBI investigators believed a Denver chapter had been launched. They discovered that Anarchist Black Cross was affiliated with Food Not Bombs, and authorities ended up on Bardwell's doorstep, asking about the anarchists' plans for protests at the upcoming Democratic and Republican national conventions.

Kelso, the FBI spokeswoman, said there were documents that could not be released to the ACLU that showed good reasons for the government's concern. She dismissed the idea that agents were spying on activists for political reasons.

"We don't have enough agents," Kelso said, "to go out there to monitor and surveil innocent people."

It may sound incredible to anyone who's ever used the Internet, but the Federal Bureau of Investigation has struggled unsuccessfully for 10 years to come up with a workable computer system. The idea is to allow agents to quickly share discoveries and analyze information in ongoing investigations. The problem surfaced most grimly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks when it emerged that the F.B.I.'s 1980's-era technology could not cross-reference words — like, say, "flight" and "schools" — for any agent who might have had advance suspicions about the suicide attackers' preparations.

After 9/11, the bureau started an urgent and very expensive program to fix the problem. But now we discover, equally grimly, that the search for high-tech sleuthing could take four more years and a half-billion dollars. The first effort, called the Virtual Case File, was a complete failure and was ignominiously closed at a cost of $170 million. The next effort was called Sentinel, but it is already stirring doubts from the Justice Department's inspector general. Among other worrisome signs is the bureau's borrowing of $29 million from its counterterrorism budget to bolster the push for computer overhaul. Any large enterprise can suffer technological shortcomings, but the bureau stands out for having a third of the project's 76 oversight slots vacant as of January, and a director on loan from the Central Intelligence Agency.

Most alarming of all, the inspector general concluded that even if the F.B.I. finally came up with a workable model, there would be no guarantee that it would solve the most crucial issue — agents' inability to share information with the myriad of other government departments involved in the detection of terrorism.

Surely the White House should be prodding the bureau to do better.

Detainee Case Will Pose Delicate Question For Court (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 26 — The Supreme Court's announcement four months ago that it would rule on the validity of the military commission by which the Bush administration wants to try Osama bin Laden's former driver, on charges of conspiracy to commit terrorism, appeared to mark a resumption of a struggle for supremacy between the court and the White House.

That struggle initially played out in three cases on terrorism and civil liberties in June 2004. In accepting the new case, as in the previous ones, the justices rejected the administration's argument that the court should simply stay out and let the president conduct his fight against terrorism unconstrained by judicial oversight.

But no one foresaw back in November that the case of the driver, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, to be argued on Tuesday, would present the Supreme Court with an additional and perhaps even greater challenge.

In the face of a measure that Congress passed and President Bush signed into law in late December to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction over cases brought by detainees at the United States naval base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, where Mr. Hamdan has been held since 2002, the court must decide whether it retains the right to proceed with this case at all.

For a court that has been highly protective of its own prerogatives, but at the same time notably attentive to the often arcane limits on federal court jurisdiction, the question is one of great delicacy, infused with historical resonance. Not since the immediate aftermath of the Civil War, in a case that arose from the power struggles of the Reconstruction era, has the Supreme Court permitted Congress to divest it of jurisdiction over a case it has already agreed to decide.

In that case, Ex Parte McCardle, the court had already heard four days of argument in an appeal brought by a rabble-rousing Mississippi newspaper editor who had been taken into custody and charged by the military government with fomenting insurrection.

Fearful that a Supreme Court ruling in favor of the editor, William H. McCardle, could result in invalidating military control of the former Confederate states, Congress enacted a law over President Andrew Johnson's veto to deprive the court of jurisdiction.

The court then dismissed the appeal, rejecting the argument by McCardle's lawyer that it was permitting Congress to usurp the judicial function.

In the new case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, No. 05-184, the Bush administration filed a motion with the court in early January, days after the Detainee Treatment Act was signed into law, urging immediate dismissal of Mr. Hamdan's appeal.

"It is well settled that statutes that remove jurisdiction apply to pending cases and ordinarily should be given immediate effect," the administration, citing the McCardle case, said in the brief accompanying its motion.

More than a month later, on Feb. 21, the court declined to act on the motion, announcing instead that it would take up the jurisdictional question as part of the argument on the merits of the case. It added 30 minutes to Tuesday's argument, originally scheduled for one hour, for that purpose.

The McCardle case has been seen by many modern legal scholars as problematic, a regrettable expression of judicial weakness. Mr. Hamdan's lawyers cite it as well, but for a different proposition. While Congress spoke clearly in the court-stripping amendment at issue in the McCardle case, their brief tells the court, the Detainee Treatment Act is ambiguous on its application to pending, as opposed to future, cases. The court should interpret the act as not applying to the Hamdan case to avoid the "grave constitutional questions" that would otherwise arise, they say.

A group of law professors who filed a brief on this point on Mr. Hamdan's behalf warn the court that to give up jurisdiction would be to yield to "an unconstitutional interference with access to courts and an attack on the fundamental structure of the Constitution."

The argument rests in part on the observation that according to the language of the Detainee Treatment Act, Guantánamo detainees who are tried by a military commission will have only a circumscribed right to a subsequent appeal in federal court, in which they could not raise the basic challenge to the commission's operation that Mr. Hamdan is presenting in his Supreme Court case. So if the justices cannot decide his case, or cases brought by some 150 of the other 500 Guantánamo detainees now pending in the lower courts, fundamental questions about this alternative system of justice will go unresolved.

There may be a separate obstacle in the Supreme Court's way. Only eight justices are participating in the case, raising the prospect of a 4-to-4 tie. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. is recused because he was a member of the three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that upheld the government's position in the Hamdan case last July, four days before Mr. Bush nominated him to the Supreme Court.

A tie vote in the Supreme Court ordinarily simply affirms the lower court decision, without issuing an opinion or setting a precedent. But in this case, there is no lower court opinion on the jurisdictional question, since there was no Detainee Treatment Act when the appeals court ruled last July.

It would require a majority, five of the eight votes, to grant the government's motion to dismiss the case, but the matter might not be as straightforward as that. Even if the government had not filed its motion, the court would still be obliged to assure itself that it has jurisdiction to proceed, in this as in any other case. Whether a tie favors jurisdiction or dismissal appears to be an open question of Supreme Court procedure.

Military commissions are not new; they were first used by Gen. Winfield Scott during the war with Mexico in the 1840's. But there have been none since the World War II era. If the court addresses the merits of the Hamdan case, it must decide whether Mr. Bush's military order of Nov. 13, 2001, establishing military commissions to try noncitizens for "acts of international terrorism," had proper authorization.

The administration argues that there were "multiple authorizations": from the Congressional resolution known as the Authorization for the Use of Military Force, adopted days after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001; from the Uniform Code of Military Justice, which refers to military commissions and authorizes the president to prescribe rules for their operation; and from the president's inherent powers as commander in chief.

In addition, the administration argues that the Detainee Treatment Act itself ratified the establishment of military commissions when it circumscribed judicial review of their operations.

Mr. Hamdan's military and civilian lawyers, as well as the dozens of organizations and individuals supporting his appeal as "friends of the court," argue to the contrary that no Congressional enactment or inherent power authorized the president to set up what they call a "jerrybuilt tribunal" that falls short of the procedural protections offered by American military law and required by the Geneva Conventions.

In addition, they argue, conspiracy, with which Mr. Hamdan has been charged, is not a war crime and is therefore not subject to trial by military commission.

The administration argues that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to the conflict with Al Qaeda and that their protections cannot, in any event, be invoked by individual detainees. These assertions have provoked a flood of counterarguments from international law specialists, former senior diplomats and federal judges, and human rights organizations.

At Court, A Terror Case Rife With Tough Issues (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

The case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver in Afghanistan, has the potential to become one of the most important US Supreme Court decisions of this generation.

It will test the scope of presidential power in the war on terror. It may clarify how detained Al Qaeda suspects are treated by the US. More broadly, it challenges the justices to further define the balance of power among the three branches of government during times of national emergency.

But before the high court takes up those weighty issues of constitutional law, it must decide a more basic question: whether it has jurisdiction to hear the case. If the justices decide the case is not yet ripe for their review, Mr. Hamdan's appeal ends there, at least for the time being.

That is the unusual posture surrounding the Hamdan case on the eve of oral arguments Tuesday - litigation so multilayered that the high court has taken the unusual step of allotting 90 minutes for oral arguments, a half hour more than usual.

The Bush administration, in its court brief, says Hamdan's appeal is "fatally premature." The Detainee Treatment Act, signed into law Dec. 30, 2005, bars federal judges and justices from hearing any appeals by Guantánamo detainees before a verdict is rendered by a military commission in their war-crimes cases, argues US Solicitor General Paul Clement.

The Hamdan case will signal how the Supreme Court views its role in the war on terror, say critics of the military-commission process. "Given the triumphalist orientation of this administration and the passivity of Congress, anything that gives us a better feel for how energetic the courts will be as a counterweight is critical," says Eugene Fidell, president of the National Institute of Military Justice.

Hamdan is being held in open-ended detention at the US terror prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. In 2004, he was set to stand trial for allegedly conspiring with top Al Qaeda leaders to commit acts of terrorism, charges he denies. Shortly before his trial was to start, a federal judge in Washington ruled that the military- commission process violates both US law and the Geneva Conventions.

That decision was reversed by a federal appeals court panel. In November, the Supreme Court agreed to take up the case, examining whether military commissions at Guantánamo had been properly authorized by Congress or were otherwise authorized by the inherent powers of the president as commander in chief of the armed forces.

In addition, the court agreed to examine whether a federal judge can force the US government to apply the 1949 Geneva Conventions - international accords that define prisoners of war and how they are to be treated - to Guantánamo detainees.

The Bush administration maintains that detained Al Qaeda suspects don't qualify for the Geneva protections. Hamdan's lawyers say their client and others at Guantánamo are covered.

Under normal circumstances, those two questions would set the stage for constitutional fireworks. But the Hamdan case features extra twists.

Less than two months after the high court agreed to hear Hamdan's appeal, Congress approved the Detainee Treatment Act, which bars detainees from filing pretrial challenges in federal court. The law is aimed at heading off a flood of federal lawsuits by Guantánamo detainees.

The big question is whether that law applies to Hamdan. The US says Hamdan's pretrial appeal must be dismissed, and that he can file an appeal later if he is convicted by a military commission.

Hamdan's lawyers say the Detainee Treatment Act doesn't apply to their client. They say Congress was aware of the Hamdan case when it passed the law - and that it amended the bill to avoid undermining the pending Supreme Court case. "The 'plain' language of the enacted law is most fairly read as not applying to this case, or at the very least is ambiguous," wrote Hamdan lawyer Neal Katyal in a brief.

Mr. Katyal says under the government's reading the Detainee Treatment Act may preclude Hamdan from ever raising a constitutional challenge to the military- commission process.

"Hamdan's claims turn on federal statutes, treaties, and constitutional provisions about presidential authority - questions within this court's, not a commission's, expertise," Katyal says. If the government's view is embraced by the high court, he adds, Hamdan may be deprived of his day in court both now and forever.

Those who support the Bush administration's position argue that Hamdan will have his day in court. Under the Detainee Treatment Act, he can appeal the decision of his military commission to a special court made up of three federal judges from the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals. "The DTA is quite clear that this special appeal to this specially composed court of the D.C. Circuit is the only judicial review," says Andrew McBride, a Washington lawyer who filed an amicus brief on behalf of former attorneys general and retired military officers supporting Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

At its core, Hamdan's case is a test of the military-commission process. Hamdan's lawyers say such commissions are unlawful because they fail to provide the same level of fair procedures and protections as US and international law.

Solicitor General Clement counters that President Bush has ample authority to subject captured enemy combatants to trial by military commission both through congressional authorizations and his inherent commander-in-chief powers. Passage of the Detainee Treatment Act, he adds, is Congress's endorsement of Mr. Bush's decision to convene military commissions at Guantánamo.

The Hamdan case will be the first big terrorism-related case to come before the Supreme Court since the death of Chief Justice William Rehnquist and the retirement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. "They were really in the forefront of establishing the Supreme Court as a defender of its own power," says Deborah Pearlstein, a lawyer at Human Rights First who has worked on briefs supporting Hamdan's case. "So it's a pretty significant test," she says, even though the new chief justice, John Roberts, has recused himself because he ruled on it as a judge on the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals.

Justices To Weigh War-crimes Commission (WT)

By Guy Taylor

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

The Supreme Court will hear oral arguments this week in a case that questions the legality of the special war-crimes commission created to try terror suspects being held at U.S. Naval Base Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

On Wednesday, the justices will weigh a challenge brought by Salim Ahmed Hamdan, 34, a native of Yemen who once worked as a driver for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan. The dispute will be the first major case involving presidential war powers since Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. joined the court.

Supreme Court scholars generally agree the legal future of the war on terrorism hinges on the case, which presents the high court with the chance to rule on the power of the executive branch to try terror suspects outside the bounds of U.S. courts.

Lawyers representing Hamdan, one of nine men at Guantanamo charged with war crimes, will argue President Bush lacked authority to create the commission two years ago, and that its design violates the rights of war prisoners under the 1949 Geneva Convention.

The administration will argue that since al Qaeda is not a traditional army, men such as Hamdan who are associated with it are not POWs, but "enemy combatants," and thus not protected by the Geneva Conventions.

It also will argue that Mr. Bush, as commander in chief, has constitutional authority to create such commissions -- an authority bolstered by Congress' passage of the broad Authorization for Use of Military Force shortly after September 11.

DOJ_NMG_0021125

Scott Sillman, a professor at Duke University Law School, contends that "many of the cases which the administration is using to justify its policies regarding the detention and trial of enemy combatants in the war on terrorism were decided after World War II, which was a decidedly different context."

"Hamdan gives the court the opportunity to define this war on terrorism, to give us a more current view of the constitutional authority of the president in this new type of war and the tools available to him in fighting it," Mr. Sillman said.

Jeffrey F. Addicott, director of the Center for Terrorism Law in San Antonio, said the case will turn on whether the justices agree with the Bush administration's definition of war in the aftermath of September 11.

"If you accept the premise that we are in a state of war with the al Qaeda network and their supporters, then the use of military commissions is entirely appropriate," he said. "If the court does not accept that premise, then they will reject the use of military commissions; therefore, requiring the administration to use the tool kit of domestic criminal law" to try al Qaeda suspects.

Mr. Addicott, who advised the Pentagon in its formation of legal charges against men in the war-crimes commission, advocates allowing the special court to go forward because its rules for evidence are more relaxed than in U.S. federal courts -- allowing swifter justice in complicated terrorism cases.

Under the design of the commission, military prosecutors may build their cases against Guantanamo detainees with classified evidence concealed from the detainees.

"The Moussaoui case is a good example," Mr. Addicott said. "He should have been tried in a military commission. He's a self-avowed member of al Qaeda and a non-U.S. citizen. The allegations are that he plotted with the 9/11 hijackers.

"Even with a guilty plea, this thing's been dragging out over three years. It's ridiculous."

Report: Scalia Rejects Jury Trials For Captives (USAT)

USA Today, March 27, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia dismissed the idea that detainees at Guantanomo Bay, Cuba, have constitutional rights and called European concerns over the issue hypocritical, Newsweek magazine reported Sunday.

“War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts,” Scalia purportedly said in a private appearance March 8 at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland.

Newsweek said it had reviewed a recording of the talk. The authenticity of the tape could not be independently confirmed.

Scalia reportedly was asked whether detainees at the U.S. naval base at Guantanamo Bay have protections under international conventions. “If he was captured by my army on a battlefield, that is where he belongs,” he replied, according to Newsweek. “I had a son on that battlefield, and they were shooting at my son, and I'm not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean it's crazy.” Scalia's son Matthew served with the Army in Iraq.

The Supreme Court hears a case this week in which Guantanamo detainee Salim Ahmed Hamdan, accused of being Osama bin Laden's bodyguard and driver, is challenging President Bush's authority to try prisoners before military tribunals. Court officials were not immediately available for comment.

“If he's made up his mind on a particular issue, he shouldn't be sitting” in the case, said Michael Ratner, president of the Center for Constitutional Rights. Scalia did not refer specifically to that case, Newsweek said.

Erma Ora James Byrd, wife of Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., died Saturday at the couple's home in McLean, Va., according to Byrd's spokesman, Tom Gavin. She was 88. She had been married to the senator for nearly 69 years.

Organizers of the National Cherry Blossom Festival in Washington are trying to make the annual celebration more welcoming for guests from Japan, the country that donated the trees.

About 40 Japanese speakers have signed up as translators to answer questions and give directions to an increasing number of Japanese tourists, said Bill Line, a National Park Service spokesman. The reasons vary, from an improving travel climate to an increasing number of festival exhibits that focus on Japan. This year's festival includes events such as a kimono exhibit and a retrospective of Japanese filmmaker Mikio Naruse.

Most of the 3,700 trees lining the Tidal Basin are descendants of those presented to the city of Washington by Tokyo's mayor in 1912 to mark 60 years of friendly U.S.-Japanese relations.

DOJ_NMG_0021126

More than 700,000 people visit Washington each year during the festival. It began Saturday and runs through April 9. The pink and white petals have begun popping out on some trees and are likely to be at their peak starting today.

No Legal Rights For Enemy Combatants, Scalia Says (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia reportedly told an overseas audience this month that the Constitution does not protect foreigners held at the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

He also told the audience at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland that he was "astounded" by the "hypocritical" reaction in Europe to the prison, this week's issue of Newsweek magazine reported.

The comments came just weeks before the justices are to take up an appeal from a detainee at Guantanamo Bay. The court will hear arguments tomorrow on Salim Ahmed Hamdan's assertion that President Bush overstepped his constitutional authority in ordering a military trial for the former driver of al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. Hamdan has been held at the prison for nearly four years.

Two years ago, the Supreme Court ruled that the detainees could use U.S. courts to challenge their detention. Scalia disagreed with that ruling, and in the recent speech repeated his beliefs that enemy combatants have no legal rights.

"War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts," Newsweek quoted Scalia as saying. "Give me a break."

Scalia's dissent in the Rasul v. Bush case in 2004 said: "The consequence of this holding, as applied to aliens outside the country, is breathtaking. It permits an alien captured in a foreign theater of active combat to bring a petition against the secretary of defense. . . . Each detainee (at Guantanamo) undoubtedly has complaints -- real or contrived -- about those terms and circumstances. . . . From this point forward, federal courts will entertain petitions from these prisoners, and others like them around the world, challenging actions and events far away, and forcing the courts to oversee one aspect of the executive's conduct of a foreign war."

Newsweek said Scalia was challenged by an audience member in Switzerland about whether Guantanamo Bay detainees have protection under the Geneva or human rights conventions.

Scalia replied: "If he was captured by my army on a battlefield, that is where he belongs. I had a son on that battlefield and they were shooting at my son, and I'm not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean it's crazy," Newsweek reported.

Scalia's son Matthew served in Iraq.

Supreme Court: Detainees' Rights—Scalia Speaks His Mind (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, March 27, 2006

The Supreme Court this week will hear arguments in a big case: whether to allow the Bush administration to try Guantánamo detainees in special military tribunals with limited rights for the accused. But Justice Antonin Scalia has already spoken his mind about some of the issues in the matter. During an unpublicized March 8 talk at the University of Freiburg in Switzerland, Scalia dismissed the idea that the detainees have rights under the U.S. Constitution or international conventions, adding he was "astounded" at the "hypocritical" reaction in Europe to Gitmo. "War is war, and it has never been the case that when you captured a combatant you have to give them a jury trial in your civil courts," he says on a tape of the talk reviewed by NEWSWEEK. "Give me a break." Challenged by one audience member about whether the Gitmo detainees don't have protections under the Geneva or human-rights conventions, Scalia shot back: "If he was captured by my army on a battlefield, that is where he belongs. I had a son on that battlefield and they were shooting at my son and I'm not about to give this man who was captured in a war a full jury trial. I mean it's crazy." Scalia was apparently referring to his son Matthew, who served with the U.S. Army in Iraq. Scalia did say, though, that he was concerned "there may be no end to this war."

The comments provoked "quite an uproar," said Samantha Besson, a member of the Freiburg law faculty who had invited Scalia to give his talk, which was mostly about his "originalist" interpretation of the Constitution. This isn't the first time Scalia has commented on matters before the court: two years ago he recused himself from a Pledge of Allegiance case after making public comments about the matter. "This is clearly grounds for recusal," said Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights, a human-rights group that has filed a brief in behalf of the Gitmo detainees. "I can't recall an instance where I've heard a judge speak so openly about a case that's in front of him—without hearing the arguments." Other experts said it was a closer call. Scalia didn't refer directly to this week's case, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, though issues at stake hinge in part on whether the detainees deserve legal protections that make the military tribunals unfair. "As these things mount, a legitimate question could be asked about whether he is compromising the credibility of the court," said Stephen Gillers, a legal-ethics expert. A Scalia recusal (it's entirely up to him) would create problems; Chief Justice John Roberts has already done so in Hamdan because he ruled on it as an appellate judge. A Supreme Court spokeswoman said Scalia has no comment.

Sins Of Commissions (WP)

THE SUPREME COURT hears arguments tomorrow in perhaps the most important case of the term -- a case that, had the Bush administration acted responsibly at any time in the past 4 1/2 years, would not even be in court.

The case is a challenge to the military commissions the administration has set up at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, to try war-crimes suspects. It poses a bewildering array of difficult legal questions: Are the commissions legal? What procedural rights must they guarantee to comply with statutes, treaties and the Constitution? After a congressional move to strip the courts of jurisdiction over litigation from Guantanamo, does the court even have the power to hear this case? But these questions confront the justices only because of the administration's insistence on pursuing a strategy that has failed in all respects.

The administration dramatically announced after Sept. 11 that it planned to revive a form of military trial not used since the World War II era. The idea was to achieve swift justice unencumbered by the niceties of trial in American federal courts. After all, as the case of Zacarias Moussaoui has since vividly illustrated, trials of al-Qaeda figures can test the capacity of the American civilian justice system. The administration was right that some alternative form of military trial for accused terrorists captured abroad was essential.

The military could have turned to a proven method by which it conducts trials every day: the general court-martial. Had the administration gone to Congress and adjusted the court-martial for the task at hand, it would have benefited from a system in which military lawyers are already adept. It also would have received the blessing of the legislature for whatever deviations from the usual rules might have been necessary.

Instead, the military sought to design a new system from scratch. In doing so, it has bungled. The commission rules have shifted constantly. A legal cloud has hung over its entire process. It has risked genuine unfairness. It has undermined the prestige of American justice. And, ironically, it has moved at a glacier's pace, having successfully tried not a single person to date -- thereby defeating its entire purpose. Even if the administration prevails at the high court this time, the problems will not go away. The system is a disaster, and it needs revamping.

More than four years after Sept. 11, it is intolerable that America has no viable mechanism for trying al-Qaeda operatives. The masterminds of the attacks, Ramzi Binalshibh and Khalid Sheik Mohammed, are in U.S. custody, yet justice for them is not even on the radar screen. If American troops catch Osama bin Laden or Ayman al-Zawahiri tomorrow, the government has no means of bringing them to justice. Whatever the court decides on the law, the administration needs to fix this stillborn system.

Uncertainty Clouds Last Days Of Moussaoui's Sentencing Trial (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson, Usa Today

USA Today, March 27, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Without Harry Samit, confessed al-Qaeda conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui might never have been arrested three weeks before 9/11.

It was no surprise that the government made the plain-spoken FBI agent a prominent witness in its case for the execution of the only man charged in connection with the 2001 attacks.

But by the time Samit left the witness stand here last week, his testimony about repeated and unsuccessful efforts to alert superiors of Moussaoui's potential danger may prove more beneficial to the terrorist than the government.

Prosecutors rested their case last week in the sentencing trial, but many of the government's witnesses have made it clear how difficult it may be for the government to prevail in the landmark terrorism case, legal analysts said.

"It's not at all clear that had Moussaoui told them everything, the FBI would have been able to do anything," says Michael Greenberger, a University of Maryland law professor who specializes in matters of homeland security. "The only thing that can save the government now is Moussaoui," who has vowed to testify. The 37-year-old French citizen could take the witness stand as early as today. (Related story: Analysis: Moussaoui could harm own case)

"The jury could look at him and view him as a scary figure who continues to pose a danger," says University of Notre Dame law professor Jimmy Gurule, a former federal prosecutor.

The government set a high standard in its opening statement by promising to show a federal court jury that if Moussaoui had not lied to investigators after his arrest three weeks before Sept. 11, federal law enforcement and aviation authorities would have scrambled to prevent the attacks.

The case was nearly lost when a government lawyer assisting the prosecution was found to have leaked prohibited court transcripts in an attempt to influence the testimony of government witnesses.

Even without Moussaoui's silence and the chaos created by Carla Martin, a Transportation Security Administration lawyer, the government has been unable to shield the jury from facts established long ago in investigations by a joint congressional committee and a national commission: that the CIA and FBI possessed strong evidence of a possible aviation plot well before 9/11. (Related links: Order quashing Martin subpoena | Case history)

The material included Samit's prescient 25-page warning to FBI headquarters that Moussaoui was part of a larger hijacking plot in which attackers would use small knives to incapacitate air crews.

"This is a tough lift for the government," Gurule says. "There is no evidence that he actually acted as a perpetrator (in Sept. 11). This case is very tenuous. There are a lot of 'buts' and 'ifs.' "

Former FBI agent Aaron Zebley, the government's final witness, made one of the strongest arguments by suggesting that 11 of the 19 suicide hijackers could have been identified before Sept. 11 if Moussaoui had provided investigators with information about the source of his money. The government later learned that the same source funneled thousands of dollars to many of the hijackers.

Under questioning by the defense, however, Zebley acknowledged there was no way to guarantee the plot would have been averted even if Moussaoui had been truthful.

This week, the defense will hammer at the same themes offered by its first witness Thursday. In his testimony, former FBI agent Eric Rigler recounted sharp criticisms of how the CIA and FBI handled intelligence before 9/11 about a plot against the United States.

The criticisms, which were also outlined in a 2004 Justice Department report of the agencies before 9/11, faulted the U.S. intelligence community for failing to share and act on important information about two hijackers before the 2001 terrorist attacks.

Censure To Get Day In Judiciary (RC)

By Elizabeth Brotherton

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Setting up the possibility of a floor showdown on the resolution submitted by Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) to censure President Bush over his domestic wiretapping program, the Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing on the matter for the end of this week.

A Republican aide indicated Friday that the focus of the hearing, scheduled for March 31, will be to provide a forum for debate over the merits of the proposed censure measure.

The decision to hold a hearing on the politically supercharged measure could put the Senate on course for a full-blown battle on this issue. Republican leaders are eager to get Democrats on the record on the issue of censuring Bush, believing that such a vote would seriously undercut Democrats' ability to convince the electorate that they are strong on protecting America from terrorist threats.

DOJ_NMG_0021129

Democrats, who in large part have tried to distance themselves from the issue fearing a political backlash, have sought to have the measure addressed in committee before any vote on the issue takes place. Only a handful of Democratic Senators have gotten behind Feingold's effort, and the discussion has split party leaders reluctant to discuss the issue from liberal activists in the party base who want to take a more aggressive stance against Bush. Some Democrats also have privately grumbled that Feingold is using the censure proposal to fuel his own presidential ambitions and be seen as a chief Bush antagonist.

When Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) tried to force a vote on the censure motion when it was introduced by Feingold on March 13, Democrats blocked the move, arguing it needed to be fully vetted by Judiciary before being voted on.

The aide indicated that Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), who has criticized the Bush spy program but has also labeled the proposed censure as excessive, is interested in engaging in a back-and-forth with Feingold on the issue.

In the initial furor over the Wisconsin Senator's introduction of the censure proposal, Specter asked Feingold to return to the floor for debate immediately after he introduced the measure. When Feingold failed to do so, Specter chided his proposal as "over the top" and "unsupported by any rationale."

Senators were largely unavailable for comment Friday.

Feingold, who was traveling in Iraq with Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John Thune (R-S.D.), could not be reached to discuss the planned hearing Friday, according to a spokesman.

The hearing, labeled "An Examination of the Call to Censure the President," is scheduled for 9:30 a.m. Friday in Room 226 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Hutchison Defends U.S. Ports Role (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

HONG KONG -- Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. defended its plans to help scan U.S.-bound cargo for terror threats at a port in the Bahamas where no U.S. customs agents are present.

The flagship company of Asia's wealthiest businessman, Li Ka-shing, added that it isn't feasible or practical for U.S. officials to work in ports across the globe.

The best option for the U.S. is to rely on trusted agents using sophisticated inspection equipment to scan shipments at ports abroad, said John Meredith, group managing director for Hutchison Port Holdings, Hutchison's maritime subsidiary and the world's largest ports company.

The Hong Kong company is in the final stages of being awarded a no-bid, US$6 million contract from the U.S. government to help run a sophisticated radiation detector at the Freeport Container Terminal in the Bahamas, just 105 kilometers from the American shoreline.

Some U.S. lawmakers and security experts have expressed concerns about the deal because U.S. customs agents wouldn't be working at the port to supervise the equipment, designed to detect smuggled radioactive materials.

But Mr. Meredith said his firm has elaborate security checks, including the filming of inspectors checking the containers.

Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, toured Hutchison's port in Hong Kong Saturday and said he was impressed with the equipment and how it was operated.

"The technology is there and we've seen it first hand," Mr. Schumer said. "It is impressive and it does the job. They have a program where every container can be inspected for nuclear weapons, can be scanned."

Mr. Schumer, who raised early questions about the Bahamas contract, said he doesn't oppose awarding the contract to a foreign company. But he believes U.S. customs agents should be stationed at the Bahamas port.

Mr. Meredith also said the U.S. cannot afford to post its own customs agents in ports all over the world. Even if the U.S. agents were abroad, they wouldn't have jurisdiction and would be restricted by local laws, he said.

However, U.S. customs inspectors already work at 43 foreign ports helping to inspect and scan cargo containers with the permission of foreign governments under a U.S. port-security program known as the "container security initiative." Some of the 43 ports are operated by Hutchison, and each of these ports has radiation scanners.

Reforms Target Foreign-buyout Review Process (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

Senators return from a weeklong recess today, with the issue of foreign -- and especially Gulf-Arab -- ownership of U.S. critical infrastructure front and center.

Several competing bills in both chambers of Congress aim to reform the process by which the federal government assesses the national security implications of foreign takeovers of U.S. companies or assets.

And, in the wake of the derailment of the Dubai ports takeover, lawmakers' concerns threaten another acquisition by the tiny oil-rich emirate.

Dubai International Capital, an investment company owned by the emirate's ruling al-Maktoum family, signed a deal last year to acquire a privately held British aerospace company called Doncasters Group Ltd.

The company owns nine plants in the United States and makes parts for U.S. tanks and military planes, including for the Joint Strike Fighter -- currently at the center of a trans-Atlantic row about contracts and technology sharing.

After senators questioned officials about the Doncasters deal earlier this month, the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States (CFIUS), which is responsible for assessing such takeovers, announced that it was launching a special 45-day national security review of the purchase.

The attention led Dubai International Capital to announce last week it was postponing the $1.2 billion takeover for two months while the review proceeded.

During the furor over the DP World acquisition, administration officials attempted to satisfy critics with an agreement to conduct the same kind of review in that case. Several congressmen continue to think the assessment process is inadequate.

"This process is a flawed process that's being conducted behind closed doors," said Rep. John Barrow, Georgia Democrat, whose district includes one of the Doncasters plants.

Under current law, because of concerns about the huge financial implications of information about blocked or potentially blocked takeovers being leaked, investment committee investigations are kept confidential.

After criticism over a foiled Chinese effort to buy a U.S. oil company last year, the administration agreed to provide Congress with more information about blocked deals. The investment committee has received over 1,500 notifications of foreign acquisitions, but only one has ever been blocked -- in 1990.

Mr. Barrow and Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and ranking member of the House Homeland Security Committee, are pushing a bill requiring that the investment committee notify Congress about pending foreign investments it is looking at and calling on the president to make the homeland security secretary, rather than the secretary of the Treasury, the chairman of the review panel. Another bill, from Rep. Duncan Hunter, the California Republican who chairs the Armed Services Committee, would effectively outlaw foreign ownership of any infrastructure listed as critical to national security by the Department of Defense and put the Pentagon rather than the Treasury or Homeland Security departments in charge of the review.

Official Warns Of Unsecured Nuclear Reactors (USAT)

By John Diamond

USA Today, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — One-third of the world's 130 civilian nuclear research reactors lack security upgrades needed to prevent theft of materials that terrorists could use to build an atomic bomb, the chief U.S. nuclear proliferation official says.

In an interview with USA TODAY, Linton Brooks, director of the National Nuclear Security Administration, said most of these reactors use highly enriched uranium, the easiest fuel used to make atomic bombs.

"Fresh" highly enriched uranium — the supply not yet used in reactors — is hard to detect and safe enough to handle with bare hands.

Security was at the heart of the recent furor over a deal that would have turned over terminal management at U.S. ports in six states to a company owned by the Arab emirate of Dubai. Unsecured nuclear fuel, not who manages port terminals, poses the biggest risk for a nuclear weapon entering the USA, said Brooks and former senator Sam Nunn, D-Ga.

The U.S. government won't say specifically where the unsecured reactors are. All reactors in the USA, Russia and Eastern Europe have adequate security, according to the National Nuclear Security Administration and Holly Harrington of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

That's an improvement over 10 years ago when many Soviet bloc research reactors were particularly vulnerable to theft. Eight reactors not in those countries are slated to receive improved perimeter fencing, surveillance cameras and material storage.

That leaves 47 reactors with inadequate or questionable security in China, Ghana, Jamaica, Pakistan and Uzbekistan, according to an International Atomic Energy Agency list. There are also research reactors in countries hostile toward the United States, including Iran and North Korea. The IAEA, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, says 38 countries have reactors that use highly enriched uranium.

Brooks said security has improved at former Soviet bloc research reactors with U.S. funds of about $1 billion a year. The upgrades were driven by concerns that the sites lacked the security of military bases.

These reactors, often found at universities or hospitals, contain about 18 tons of highly enriched uranium, according to a 2004 Harvard University study. That is enough for 400 to 800 nuclear weapons.

The world's research reactor security efforts are "at about 3" on a 1-to-10 scale with 10 being safest, said Nunn, who helped create the 1991 U.S. plan to secure nuclear materials.

Despite 9/11 Effect, Railyards Are Still Vulnerable (NYT)

By David Kocieniewski

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

NEWARK — Two signs just inside the entrance of the Oak Island rail depot here hint at dangers inside. "Our Employees' Safety Is in Your Hands." one reads. "You Are Accountable for Your Safety," reads another.

Beyond those two placards, however, there are few visible signs that security is a high priority at the railyard, just three miles from downtown Newark and seven miles from Manhattan, where 90-ton tanker cars full of deadly chemical gases are routinely stored and shipped.

Gates to the depot are unlocked and unguarded, allowing unimpeded access to tracks where cars loaded with deadly chlorine, ammonia or oleum gases are stored.

Along the track bed, many switching devices are unlocked, so unauthorized passers-by could redirect, and possibly derail, a train by simply pulling a lever. Security is so lax that a reporter and photographer recently spent 10 minutes driving along a rail bed beside cars holding toxic chemicals without being challenged, or even approached, by railroad employees.

In the years since the 9/11 attacks, public concern about a potential terrorist strike at one of the nation's chemical plants has caused federal and local officials to inch toward tighter safeguards at manufacturing and processing plants. On Tuesday, in a speech before the American Chemistry Council, Michael Chertoff, secretary of homeland security, said he would ask Congress to adopt a series of chemical plant security measures that have largely been endorsed by the industry.

Even if the chemical plants are secure, the public could be left vulnerable by the railways running in and out of many of them. The railways transport more than 1.7 million shipments of hazardous materials every year, including 100,000 tank cars filled with toxic gases like chlorine and anhydrous ammonia.

According to a recent study by the Navy, an accident or terrorist attack involving a single car of chlorine near a densely populated area could kill as many as 100,000 people.

In New Jersey, where so many chemical factories and refineries are crowded near major population centers, including a stretch near Newark Liberty International Airport that has been called "the most dangerous two miles in America," the difficulty of managing that potentially deadly cargo is particularly complex.

Since 9/11, railroads have spent millions to install fences and security cameras and add additional officers around the state, but industry officials concede that their facilities are far too large to be completely sealed. Leaders of railroad workers' unions say it is not uncommon for tanker cars to be left unattended for days, and that security along the rails is frighteningly inadequate. And the sight of graffiti-covered tank cars filled with deadly gases is a reminder of the holes in the security system.

State and local officials say they are limited in what they can do to regulate the thousands of tank cars of deadly gases hauled around New Jersey each year. In other cities and states, proposals to reroute dangerous chemicals away from major population centers, most notably in Washington, D.C., have faced fierce opposition and legal challenges from both the railroads and local communities where the chemicals would be rerouted. The courts have also upheld the railroads' assertion that only the federal government can regulate rail traffic.

The Homeland Security Department has been reluctant to tighten regulations regarding the transportation of deadly chemicals by rail. In his speech last week, Mr. Chertoff made only passing reference to the risks of transporting the deadly cargo, and there is no indication that the department will require the kind of changes in equipment and procedures that security experts say will reduce the risk of a terrorist attack or catastrophic accident.

"Chemical transport is clearly the greatest vulnerability in the country today, and for some reason — and I'm not sure what it is — the federal government has not acted," said Richard A. Falkenrath, President Bush's former deputy homeland security adviser. "There's no legislation necessary, the government already has the authority to require stronger containers, reroute shipments, and allow the kind of tracking that would allow local police agencies to know what they have to contend with in their communities. But to date it hasn't been done."

The risks involved in moving toxic rail cargo are a particular concern in New Jersey. Last fall, it became the first state to enact regulations intended to deter terror attacks on chemical plants by requiring companies to explore the feasibility of switching to safer technologies.

Because many of the railyards in New Jersey are near petroleum storage tanks, natural-gas depots, or propane tanks, the effect of an attack on a rail car is likely to be magnified, said Paul DeMatteis, a security analyst at Global Security Risk Management, a corporate security company.

When Gov. Jon S. Corzine was still in the United States Senate, he helped write federal legislation to tighten safety standards for both chemical plants and the railroads that supply them.

Since being sworn in as governor two months ago, Mr. Corzine has earmarked $20 million to strengthen security around New Jersey's critical highways, rail links and bridges against possible terror attacks, and vowed to strengthen safeguards at railway chemical depots and plants around the state.

The vulnerability of the rail lines has even undercut some of New Jersey officials' progress in making chemical plants safer. Last fall, owners of the Keene Chemical plant in Kearney agreed to reduce their stockpiles of chlorine by keeping no more than one tanker car of chlorine on the premises at a time. That policy means that tanker cars that were once stored in the moderately guarded chemical plant will spend more time waiting on less secure railway sidings.

"It's this shell game," said Rick Engler, director of the New Jersey Work Environment Council, a union group that has lobbied for an assortment of restrictions on toxic chemicals. "But shifting around the problem doesn't solve the problem."

Railroad officials say their self-imposed security measures have provided a web of security far more effective and sophisticated than that in virtually any other industry. Peggy Wilhide, spokeswoman for the Association of American Railroads, said that major rail carriers have spent more than $200 million since 9/11 on security measures, including fences and motion detectors, training, high-tech scanning devices, and tracking to monitor the shipment of some dangerous cargo.

After two accidental derailments in 2004 and 2005 caused toxic chemical releases that killed 12 people and injured hundreds, the railroads have also been considering a requirement that chemical companies replace their aging tankers with a newer, more highly reinforced generation of cars, Ms. Wilhide said.

Ms. Wilhide said that the industry opposed the plan to reroute shipments because it would actually increase the chance of an accident by forcing trains to haul the tankers full of toxic chemicals for longer distances, over older, less well-maintained rails.

Homeland Security Department officials have praised the rail carriers' cooperation, saying the railroads have moved responsibly to bolster the security of their facilities and to give law enforcement officials the information needed to develop a real-time tracking system for the most dangerous toxic rail cars. Homeland Security officials are also working with the railroads and the federal Department of Transportation to devise buffer zone protection plans to provide security near the most perilous rail sites.

But the Homeland Security Department has not embraced calls to reroute trains carrying toxics or require that chemical companies update their fleet of tank cars.

Brian Doyle, a Homeland Security Department spokesman, said it wanted to complete a thorough assessment of the system before imposing any restrictions on the railways. "It's one thing to just throw money at something and say it is fixed," he said. "But you want to do it right." In his speech on Tuesday, Mr. Chertoff said the department supported the one policy that local communities, environmental advocates and the railroads all agree on — that chemical plants and manufacturers should be urged to adopt processes that reduce, or eliminate, the need for toxic chemicals like chlorine and ammonia.

But the department will not require any shift to safer technology, Mr. Chertoff said, and the chemical security bill he is now advocating is likely to prevent states from adopting any such requirement.

In Spotswood, N.J., about 17 miles northeast of Princeton, many residents were startled to learn in the months after 9/11 that their community was home to a plant that had enough chlorine on hand kill as many as 960,000 people if an accident or terrorist attack caused it to be released and carried on the wind. Local officials worked with the company, Schweitzer-Mauduit, which makes cigarette papers, to tighten its security procedures and adopt more sophisticated plans for evacuation, detection and cleanup.

Bill Foust, a spokesman for the company, said switching to new technology that would eliminate the need for chlorine would be too expensive.

Barry H. Zagnit, mayor of Spotswood, said that despite the continuing risks, he could understand why company officials did not feel the investment was warranted.

"You have a mill that's our largest employer, our largest taxpayer," he said. "It's essential to the economy of the borough. "We certainly would never want to see Schweitzer move the plant," he said. "That would have a devastating effect on the borough, where people are already saddled with high property taxes."

A similar political struggle has been simmering in Paulsboro in South Jersey, where the Valero refinery has enough toxic hydrofluoric acid on hand at one time to create an airborne plume 19 miles long that could affect as many as three million people, according to a study by the Work Environmental Council based on federal Environmental Protection Agency data.

The company has spent more than $5 million on bolstering security since 9/11, according to its spokeswoman, and has several systems designed to dissipate toxic gases in the event of a discharge. But Valero officials have resisted demands that they move to a process that would not use hydrofluoric acid, saying that it would be unworkable.

Steven M. Sweeney, the state senator whose district includes the Valero plant and at least three others that use large amounts of toxic gases, said that unless the state and federal governments intercede, little will be done to make communities like his safer.

"In Fieldsboro, there are a few trains a week that roll through town, 125 cars long; at least 80 of them are the kind of toxic chemicals that could cause a catastrophe, just devastate a community," he said. "Anyone who feels safe is living in a dream world."

A Dry Run For Handling A Disaster In The City Railyards (NYT)

By Sewell Chan

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021134

How would New York City respond if a bomb filled with arsenic trichloride, a highly toxic liquid compound, were to explode on a freight train moving through a Queens railyard — just when a commuter train carrying weekend passengers was traveling in the other direction?

Emergency workers would rush in, try to determine what threat was involved and begin decontaminating the dozens of wounded. A temporary morgue would be set up to receive the dead — estimated at 28, including two of the rescuers. That nightmarish situation was the basis for a four-hour simulation yesterday involving 1,500 police officers, firefighters and other emergency workers and tested the city's ability to respond to a chemical emergency, though not necessarily a terrorist attack.

The Office of Emergency Management planned the field exercise, named Trifecta because it emphasized three activities: search and rescue, victim identification and handling of the dead.

Despite the grim nature of the exercise — the casualties would have included 74 injured — the commissioner of emergency management, Joseph F. Bruno, said it demonstrated the effectiveness of the Citywide Incident Management System, a protocol that governs how various city agencies are to interact during a major emergency.

"I'm happy and I'm actually a little surprised that it worked as well as it did," Mr. Bruno said at an afternoon news conference, after most of the exercise had been completed.

A critical element of the response plan gives the Police Department overall command of the city's emergency agencies in most major disasters, at least until the possibility of terrorism has been ruled out. The Fire Department had sought control of several types of situations, including those that involve hazardous materials.

The plan, which took effect under an executive order signed last April by Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, was prepared after a lengthy examination of poor coordination and communication among city agencies, particularly the Police and Fire Departments, during the terrorist attack of Sept. 11, 2001.

Yesterday was the first major field test of that agreement. Police commanders set up a "unified command," which provided for top officials from the police, fire, health, environmental protection and other departments to make joint decisions. "It's a matter of respecting their core competencies," Mr. Bruno said.

Although police and fire officials clashed during the formation of the plan, leaders from both sides said yesterday that it was effective.

"I think CIMS is clearly the way to go, and I believe it's been accepted by all the agencies," Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said. Frank P. Cruthers, first deputy commissioner at the Fire Department, said the test was "a very realistic exercise" and added, "The level of cooperation was terrific."

The exercise, financed by $700,000 from the federal Department of Homeland Security, began with a mock explosion at 10 a.m. in the railyard at Maspeth, Queens, an industrial neighborhood dominated by factories and warehouses. The New York & Atlantic Railway provided the freight train for the exercise, while the Metropolitan Transportation Authority supplied a Long Island Rail Road passenger train.

Several federal and state agencies participated, as did nonprofit groups including the American Red Cross and the Salvation Army.

The Fire Department was the first to respond after the simulated explosion, followed by the Police and Environmental Protection Departments. "When you look at this incident, it seemed at first to move very slowly in the beginning," Mr. Bruno said afterward. "That's just the way it has to. We do not know if there are other explosive devices here. We do not know the nature of the chemical." Once the various officials evaluated the danger, he said, they made "good, crisp decisions."

Mr. Bruno said the exercise proceeded with only a few glitches. At one point, he said, a centralized operations post had to be separated from the command post because "there was too much confusion."

Since 9/11, the city has had other drills involving the premise of a terrorist attack, including one at Shea Stadium in March 2004 and another at the Bowling Green subway station, in Lower Manhattan, in May 2004.

Shortcut Included In Copter Trips To JFK (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021135

A new helicopter service begins whisking passengers from Wall Street to New York's John F. Kennedy International Airport today — and passengers will get to skip airport security lines.

That's because the federal government is sending airport screeners and explosive-detection equipment to the Lower Manhattan heliport so passengers and their bags can be checked before being delivered to the airport.

It marks the first time the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) has done screening at a heliport since the agency took over airport security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

U.S. Helicopter Corp. chief executive Jerry Murphy says the eight-minute rides, which cost $159 each way, will appeal mainly to business travelers who don't want to waste up to two hours in a car or cab fighting New York traffic.

Murphy said his helicopters, the first to offer airport service in more than 20 years, also will fly to LaGuardia and Newark airports by the end of 2006. The company expects to carry 150,000 passengers in its first year.

"This will be a faster, more reliable system to get from New York City to the airports," he said.

Some critics are questioning whether the TSA should be helping a business that primarily caters to wealthy corporate clients and the rich and famous.

"The idea that federal dollars are going to be spent in order to make life easier for plutocrats strikes me as wrong," says Bill Scannell, a privacy rights activist and frequent critic of the TSA.

Rep. Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., the top Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, said that using "an already strained screening system so that wealthy executives don't have to stand in line for screening at airports is a serious misuse of federal monies."

Helicopter service to JFK was offered in the mid-1960s and in 1977 from the roof of the then-Pan Am Building. The service was shut down after a freak accident in which a helicopter tipped over with its blades spinning. Four people on the roof were killed, and one person on the ground was hit and killed by a broken blade. Other heliport service continued through the mid-1980s.

Murphy's company now has a deal with American Airlines, but he said he expects to sign up other carriers soon.

If the latest Manhattan experiment works, the company may expand to 10 more cities, including Washington, D.C.

TSA spokeswoman Ann Davis says the agency has budgeted $560,000 for the first year of the heliport service. That will pay for eight screeners at the Wall Street heliport and more at another New York City site set to open later this year. "We gave this careful consideration," she said.

Douglas Hofsass, the TSA official responsible for security at the new heliport, cited another factor in TSA's decision: the safety of New York City's airspace. If passengers and their bags aren't screened at the heliport, he said, they'll be flying through the city's airspace unchecked.

Letters Prep 9/11 Families On Transcripts (AP-Y2)

By Desmond Butler

AP2, March 26, 2006

The city has sent out letters to 24 families of people killed in the Sept. 11 attacks advising them that partial transcripts and recordings of 911 calls made by the victims soon will be released to the public because of a court order.

The letters, sent by express mail on Friday, advised only family members whose dead relatives could be identified from the calls recorded by police and fire department operators.

The imminent release of the records was ordered by a judge in a case brought by The New York Times and nine family members of victims under the state's Freedom of Information law seeking fire department records.

The lawsuit asked that the complete records of the 911 calls be released, but the judge ordered that the victims' sides of the conversations with the operators be redacted unless specifically released by the nearest kin. The city has decided to release calls taken by police department operators on the same basis.

The family members can receive CDs with the unedited calls if they want them.

The letters took some Sept. 11 family members by surprise, a family advocate said.

DOJ_NMG_0021136

"Some family members didn't even know their loved ones had made a 911 call," said William Doyle, whose son was killed in the 2001 attack on the World Trade Center but was not one of those recorded. "Why did they have to wait so long to inform them? To send a cold form letter overnight express without advance warning is crass."

According to the city's law department, officials waited until a complete record of all the identifiable calls was ready before releasing any information.

"Based on previous experience, we felt it was most appropriate to release all the information together rather than in a piecemeal, lingering fashion that might give families false hopes or ongoing pain," law department spokeswoman Kate O'Brien Ahlers said Sunday.

The 24 letters, which Ahlers said were personalized, were meant to go out only after e-mails to groups representing the families explaining the release. But, because of a miscommunication, the e-mails did not go out as planned, said Jonathan Greenspun, commissioner of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Community Assistance Unit.

"We sincerely regret the delay," he said in a statement.

The city said the transcripts and recordings likely would be released Thursday or Friday. It didn't say how many there are.

In August, the city released 12,000 pages of oral histories and more than 15 hours of fire department radio transmissions.

WAR NEWS:

Spying: Saddam's Bad Intel (NSWK)

By Michael Hirsh, Mark Hosenball and John Barry

Newsweek, March 27, 2006

Saddam Hussein thought that Russia and France would prevent President George W. Bush from invading Iraq and ousting him, according to a new report by the U.S. Joint Forces Command based on captured Iraqi documents. Was Saddam's confidence fed by the knowledge that he was getting inside dope from a Russian spy? The new Pentagon report concludes that before the U.S. invasion in March 2003, the Russian ambassador in Baghdad gave the Iraqi regime significant intelligence about CENTCOM's war plans.

If true, the account could complicate U.S.-Russian relations, which are already strained over Iran's nuclear program and other issues. On Saturday, Russia's Foreign Intelligence Service issued a statement calling the accusation "baseless." Previously, the office of the U.S. National Intelligence director, John Negroponte, cautioned that "the U.S. government has made no determination regarding the authenticity" of Saddam-era documents released earlier by the American government.

If the Russians were giving Saddam intel, it wasn't very good. The report says that Ambassador Vladimir Titorenko told Saddam the U.S. attack out of Kuwait was a diversion—it wasn't—and that the invasion wouldn't occur until mid-April, after the Fourth Infantry Division was in place in Turkey, according to the documents. That, too, was false. It is known that CENTCOM had undertaken a disinformation campaign before the war; that may have been the source of the bad intelligence.

Rice To Ask Russia About Report That It Gave Iraq Data (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 26 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday that the United States would seek clarification from Russia of an American military report that it had helped pass information to Iraq before the 2003 invasion, but she declined to make any specific allegations about Russian involvement.

"I don't have any reason to doubt or confirm the report at this point," Ms. Rice said on "Fox News Sunday." "I do think we have to look at the documents and look very carefully."

She added that the administration would "take very seriously any suggestion that a foreign government may have passed information to the Iraqis" before the invasion and that "we will raise it with the Russian government." She said she hoped that "the Russian government would take seriously any such charges."

A military report released Friday said that captured Iraqi documents described a Russian spy operation aimed at the United States Central Command and that information on American war plans and troop movements was passed to Iraq through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

On Saturday, Russian foreign intelligence services denied that American military secrets had been passed to Iraq.

On "Fox News Sunday" and on the NBC program "Meet the Press" Ms. Rice said it would be too early to jump to the conclusion that if information had been passed on to Saddam Hussein's government, it was done at the direction of the leadership in Moscow.

The military study said that some information Iraq had obtained from Russian sources was false, raising the possibility that it might have been part of a deliberate American effort to fool or demoralize Iraqi leaders. Ms. Rice said she did not know if any leaked information might have been part of a "disinformation" campaign.

"I don't want to jump out ahead and start making accusations about what the Russians may or may not have known," she said.

U.S. To Probe Russia On Iraq Intel Report (AP)

AP, March 27, 2006

The Bush administration will ask Russia about a report that Moscow turned over information on American troop movements and other military plans to Saddam Hussein during the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday.

"Any implication that there were those from a foreign government who may have been passing information to the Iraqis prior to the invasion would be, of course, very worrying," Rice said on CNN's "Late Edition."

"I would think the Russians would want to take that very seriously as well," she said.

A leading Senate Democrat said if the report is found to be true, the administration should reassess its relationship with Russia and reconsider President Bush's participation in a July summit meeting in St. Petersburg, Russia, of the world's economic powers.

Rice declined to speculate on whether Russia's actions, as detailed in a Pentagon report based on captured Iraqi documents, resulted in casualties among U.S. troops or what Russian President Vladimir Putin knew about any possible Russian involvement.

"We will certainly raise it with the Russian government. We want to take a real hard look at the documents and then raise it with the Russian government," Rice said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The Russian Foreign Intelligence Service has dismissed the allegation that Moscow provided information to Saddam, whose government was toppled in the invasion.

"I think we need an entirely new assessment of our relationships with Russia, should this be true," Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., told CBS' "Face the Nation." He questioned whether Bush should attend the Group of Eight meeting in the summer. "Clearly, we're not going to have business as usual," Kennedy said.

The top Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee said "anything is possible in the area of intelligence." Sen. Carl Levin (news, bio, voting record) of Michigan said if the report proved true, "it would be obviously plenty discouraging as well as disgusting" and the U.S. should find ways to let the Russians know "that kind of conduct is not going to be acceptable to us."

A Pentagon report released last week said that two captured Iraqi documents indicate that Russia obtained information from sources "inside the American Central Command" in Qatar. Russia passed battlefield intelligence to Saddam through the former Russian ambassador in Baghdad, Vladimir Titorenko, according to the Pentagon report.

"I will tell you that we take very seriously any suggestion that a foreign government may have passed information to the Iraqis prior to the American invasion that might have put our troops in danger," Rice told "Fox News Sunday."

"I do think we owe it to everyone to take a hard look at the reports and to really understand what's there."

Rice, who was Bush's national security adviser at the time of the invasion, said she knew nothing of these reports back then.

DOJ_NMG_0021138

"I would not jump to the conclusion that this — if, indeed, the reports are true — that it had to be Moscow-directed," Rice said.

Calls to the Russian Foreign Minister on Sunday went unanswered. A statement posted on the ministry's Web site noted that Rice and the foreign minister, Sergey Lavrov, spoke by telephone Friday about Iran and "a series of international problems," but did not mention the newly released Pentagon report.

U.S. To Ask Moscow If It Leaked Plans To Iraq (WP/AP)

US To Quiz Russia Over 'strategy Leaks' To Saddam (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, March 27, 2006

The Bush administration would ask Russia about a report that it shared information about US military strategy with Saddam Hussein in the lead-up to the invasion of Iraq, Condoleeza Rice, secretary of state, said on Sunday.

A US military study released by the Pentagon alleges that the Russian ambassador in Iraq provided information collected from inside the American Central Command in Doha to Saddam Hussein.

The documents, from March and April 2003, included forecasts of planned troop numbers and US tactics to focus on Baghdad, rather than to target Iraqi cities during the invasion, the study alleges.

Stephen Hadley, national security adviser, speaking on CBS's Face the Nation, said: "There are further questions that we need to raise, but it's a serious matter and we'll be talking to the Russians about it," while Ms Rice pledged on NBC that she would "take a real hard look at the documents and then raise it with the Russian government".

Mr Hadley said the documents passed to Mr Hussein "dealt with war plans that we had. And for that reason, we take [this] very seriously. Any time a country provides information to an enemy that would potentially put people at risk, we take that very seriously. We will be raising it with the Russians.

"There are a lot of things we don't know. We don't know how they got it out of Centcom. We don't know whether what the ambassador did was authorised or not."

The allegations added to congressional concern about the direction of Russia.

DOJ_NMG_0021139

Senator Edward Kennedy said on Sunday he could not think of anything "on the president's desk or on the National Security Council desk more important. And I think we need an entirely new assessment of our relationships with Russia, should this be true".

Mr Kennedy also called for the US to reconsider whether to attend the Group of Eight economic summit in St Petersburg in July. Mr Hadley did not endorse a boycott of the summit.

President George W. Bush in his first term hailed his strong personal relationship with Vladimir Putin, noting that he had looked the president in the eye and "seen his soul". In the 2002 National Security Strategy document Russia was praised for being "in the midst of a hopeful transition, reaching for its democratic future".

However,in the latest NSS document this month, Russia was accused of backsliding on democracy.

U.S. To Ask Russia About Whether It Helped Saddam (USAT)

By From wire reports

USA Today, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration will ask Russia about a report that Moscow gave Saddam Hussein information on American troop movements during the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday.

"Any implication that there were those from a foreign government who may have been passing information to the Iraqis prior to the invasion would be, of course, very worrying," Rice said on CNN's Late Edition. "I would think the Russians would want to take that very seriously as well."

Rice declined to speculate on whether Russia's actions, detailed in a Pentagon report based on captured Iraqi documents, resulted in U.S. casualties or what Russian President Vladimir Putin knew about any Russian involvement. "We will certainly raise it with the Russian government," Rice told NBC's Meet the Press.

The Russian Foreign Intelligence Service has dismissed the allegation that Moscow provided information to Saddam in 2003.

A Pentagon report released last week said two Iraqi documents indicate Russia obtained information from sources "inside the American Central Command" in Qatar. According to the documents, Russia passed battlefield intelligence to Saddam through Vladimir Titorenko, the Russian ambassador in Baghdad, the report said.

Also:

•On Meet the Press, Rice said it is "probable that we will see a significant drawdown of American forces over the next year" in Iraq. She added, "It's all dependent on events on the ground."

•She told Late Edition the United States is pushing Iraq's leaders to form a unity government. Negotiations on the new government are in their third month. "The only reason that people are pressing them to get it done more quickly is that there is a violent insurgency that might try to take advantage of the period of time in which there isn't a government," she said.

Putting More Time On The Iraq Clock (USNEWS)

By Julian E. Barnes

U.S. News and World Report, March 27, 2006

George Bush has acknowledged the elephant in the Oval Office: Iraq will not be wrapped up on his watch. It will be up to "future presidents and future governments of Iraq," Bush said last week, to determine when American troops will make their final exit. Until now, that is a reality Bush himself avoided voicing. But observers of the war have long realized that, barring an unlikely act by the next Congress demanding immediate withdrawal, the American mission in Iraq will continue after the current president has left the White House.

What is far from obvious, though, is the composition of that force. The American presence could look much as it does today, with the bulk of the forces being combat brigades. Or it could be that much of the infantry will be gone and that teams of advisers and trainers will make up the majority of a far smaller force.

Shrinkage. The drawdown of the American military has already begun. U.S. forces surged to a temporary high of 160,000 for last December's Iraqi elections, but commanders said they hoped to reduce the American footprint to about 130,000 by the end of March. Military leaders have drafted a plan--although officers insist it is a "goal," not a plan--to continue to shrink the force in Iraq during the course of this year to below 100,000.

The civil sectarian strife that has surged while Shiite, Sunni, and Kurdish politicians have wrangled over the creation of a unity government has prompted speculation that the drawdown would be derailed. In recent weeks, Gen. George Casey, the top American commander in Iraq, brought some of the reserve "quick reaction force" stationed in Kuwait to Baghdad, where they will remain until a new government is seated. But military officials say such temporary reinforcements will not change the long-term outlook. "Reducing the force will continue," says an officer. "That has not been impacted by this hiccup of sectarian violence."

More than a year ago, the primary mission of the American forces in Iraq shifted from fighting the insurgency to training the Iraqis to fight. The strategy may be starting to pay off--117 Americans died in January and February, compared with 152 in November and December. The decrease could be a result of insurgents shifting to Iraqi targets, as well as improving American training and tactics. But, as one officer points out, it is also a sign that more Iraqi forces are handling the messy duty of patrols and raids.

At the urging of Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, once a leading opponent of peacekeeping operations, the military is establishing a new institute, the Joint Center for International Security Force Assistance, to study how to best train foreign militaries. Figuring out when American units should ramp down their assistance and hand over responsibility to Iraqi units is one of the big questions for the center. "There have been a lot of peacekeeping operations that have gone on [indefinitely]," says Col. Steven Mains, the center's deputy director. "I don't want to paint a bleak picture that we will always be there [in Iraq], but how to do the disengagement is a difficult issue."

Leaving. Mains says the goal in Iraq may be to work toward a situation like that in South America, where the United States periodically sends small groups of advisers to help train military units. But troop-intensive peacekeeping obligations are notoriously difficult to shake. President Bush entered office opposed to open-ended peacekeeping missions and pledging to bring troops home from Bosnia and Kosovo. Six years later, a small American force remains in the Balkans.

The 2000 debate over the Balkans will very likely pale in comparison with the debate over Iraq in the 2008 presidential election. The shape of that discussion will, of course, depend on the ground situation. Still, there will be no getting around the reality that the U.S. presence in Iraq probably will be one of the most important questions facing Bush's successor.

Russian Leak Report Won't Keep U.S. From G-8 (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

The U.S. is unlikely to boycott the Group of Eight summit in St. Petersburg based on a report showing information-sharing between Iraq and Russia, but officials are demanding to know whether a Russian ambassador was authorized to leak military actions to Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein before the U.S.-led invasion in 2003.

Even if the Pentagon report released last week is true, the economic summit hosted by Russia is too important to neglect, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said yesterday.

"It's going to be interesting this year because the attention of the international community is going to be focused on St. Petersburg this summer, and one of the questions they're going to raise is what about democracy in Russia?" Mr. Hadley told CBS' "Face the Nation."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice noted that Moscow sided against the U.S. on the invasion of Iraq, but said the Bush administration wants to know Russia's full role.

"Any implication that there were those from a foreign government who may have been passing information to the Iraqis prior to the invasion would be, of course, very worrying," Miss Rice said on CNN's "Late Edition." "I would think the Russians would want to take that very seriously as well."

Moscow has denied any involvement in the matter.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, suggested the boycott earlier on "Late Edition." He said the United States needs to reassess its relationship with the former Soviet Union.

DOJ_NMG_0021141

He said the matter is of "enormous importance and consequence" because any such action by Russia would have endangered American lives.

"I think you'd have to rethink whether we're going to the G-8 conference. Clearly, we're not going to have business as usual," Mr. Kennedy said.

The Pentagon says a Russian mole at the U.S. military Command in Doha, Qatar, gave secret information about troop movements and operations to the Iraqi government.

The Senate returns today from a 10-day recess, and the Select Committee on Intelligence has asked for a Pentagon briefing.

"We'll get to the bottom of it," said Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican and intelligence committee chairman.

He said the report is no surprise.

"We had the oil-for-food situation, and then Russia depending on the oil from Iraq, so I'm not too terribly surprised. I would be surprised if that connection went all the way to Moscow, and that was some direct planning by [Russian President Vladimir] Putin," Mr. Roberts said. "I am not surprised, however, by Russian spying. I don't want to cause a major flap here, but that's what they do."

Mr. Roberts pointed out that Saddam ignored the reported advice from the spy.

"Saddam Hussein just didn't get it in regards to the invasion whether we would be successful or not," he said. "He's an egomaniac."

Basics Of Democracy Include Frustration (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Nearly three years ago, Salam Hanoon was among those leading the effort to bring democracy to the Iraqi capital. He helped create one of the first municipal councils to represent thousands of people in his Baghdad neighborhood. But last week, Hanoon realized the agonizing inefficiency of his creation.

As his colleagues on the Karrada District Advisory Council lamented the dilapidated local streets, sewers and electrical service, Hanoon silently stood up, gathered his papers and went out for a break.

“It is useless to be here,” Hanoon said, dragging on a cigarette moments later on a patio outside the district council office. “It's a waste of time when everyone talks about their problems. Everybody already knows the problems.”

As Iraqi and U.S.-led coalition troops struggle to contain a deadly insurgency, a little-noticed battle is unfolding in meeting rooms across the country. Iraqis are trying, after decades of authoritarian rule, to learn fundamentals of democracy and take control of rebuilding efforts and governance now largely handled by the United States.

Empowering Iraqis to decide which streets get paved and which power plants are rebuilt increasingly is seen as vital to stabilizing the country. “It builds confidence in government and drives a wedge between Iraqi people and terrorists and insurgents,” says Daniel Speckhard, director of the Iraq Reconstruction Management Office, which has overseen the $21 billion, U.S.-financed rebuilding of Iraq's infrastructure. “Most Iraqis think government is not responsive to them.”

Hanoon said he wanted to change that when he began forming a district advisory council in the mostly Shiite Muslim, middle-class Karrada neighborhood two weeks after Saddam Hussein's regime fell. Despite his occasional frustrations, Hanoon said, the council has been able to get U.S. money to build new neighborhood health clinics and water-treatment plants, and he recently fixed 46 broken water pipes.

Mohammed al-Rubeiy, the council chairman, said the council's first vote in September 2003 was to seek money to repair 165 neighborhood schools “so people would see some change.”

Efforts to build local governments across Iraq started in 2003 when the U.S.-led occupying authority appointed community leaders to dozens of local district councils. Baghdad has 15 councils: nine inside the city of 5 million and six on the outskirts. Each has a couple dozen unpaid members.

The councils have no legislative, financial or administrative authority. They were formed to assess neighborhood needs and seek funding from U.S. agencies, private organizations and, more recently, the Iraqi government. “We formulated this form of government because there was no government," said Master Sgt. Robert Young, who leads an Army civil-affairs team teaching Baghdad's councils basics of governance, such as the need to print a meeting agenda.

District councils existed under Saddam, but members were picked by the ruling Baath Party "to keep an eye on people and what they do," said Hussain al-Bahraini, Baghdad's deputy mayor.

Early last year, Iraqis elected councils for each of the country's 18 provinces. Those provincial councils, which get advice from the district councils, are at the heart of U.S. efforts to put Iraqis in charge of rebuilding.

Sunday, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad announced the creation of a U.S.-led team to teach the Baghdad provincial council how to solicit bids for a project, accept the best offer and manage a contract.

Other U.S.-led teams have been operating in three Iraqi provinces since November. Each province is expected to have its own team by this summer, Speckhard said.

It's part of an accelerated effort to put Iraqis in charge of reconstruction and replace Saddam's corrupt national government. The shift from centralized to decentralized government "is one of the most important transitions facing Iraq," Khalilzad said Sunday.

The transition is painstaking. At the Karrada District Advisory Council office, a former palace belonging to Saddam's daughter Hala, a sign reading "Please No Gifts" near the entrance suggests a new anti-bribery ethos. Inside the meeting room, council members ranted for an hour about the dangerous streets and the need for help from the national government, but no one suggested taking any action. "That's not the Iraqi way," said Young, the Army adviser. "They just discuss it."

Some councils struggle for legitimacy. In Sadr City, a Shiite neighborhood controlled by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, the district council "is in an uphill fight because of (al-Sadr's) Mahdi militia and the authority they have over the people," Young said.

Despite this, Oliver Moss, a U.S. Embassy political officer who works with Baghdad's district councils, said he has seen new signs of hope. The Baghdad provincial council has no Sunni members because Sunnis boycotted the January 2005 elections. The council initially ignored Sunni neighborhoods when they suggested projects, forcing Moss to point out that they are supposed to represent all of Baghdad.

Now, Moss said, the council is seeking funding for Sunni neighborhoods. "They're just learning democracy," he said.

Iraqi Police Say U.S.-Led Raid Kills At Least 17 At Shiite Mosque (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — At least 17 Iraqis were killed Sunday night when U.S. and Iraqi special forces stormed a mosque and clashed with Shiite Muslim militiamen, police officials said, further inflaming the country as its leaders struggled to form a new government and stem sectarian violence.

An Iraqi police official said the dead were Shiite worshipers at the Mustafa mosque in northeast Baghdad. State-owned Al Iraqiya television showed more than a dozen male corpses, at least one of them elderly, laid out in what appeared to be a prayer room as a grieving man in white robes stepped among them on a blood-smeared concrete floor.

The incident is politically explosive because the mosque is a stronghold of followers of the radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada Sadr, whose Iranian-backed movement has a powerful bloc in parliament and a large sectarian militia. Sunday's clash was the most serious between that militia and U.S. forces since Sadr led two anti-American uprisings in 2004.

In increasingly insistent language, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has been pressing Iraq's leaders to disband such militias, which he blames for much of the sectarian killing here since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in the mostly Sunni Arab city of Samarra.

Dozens of people are found dead each day in a shadowy campaign of executions.

On Sunday, police and medical officials in Baqubah got a tip that the bodies of 30 beheaded men had been found earlier in the day beside a highway between Baqubah and Baghdad. Iraqi army troops were waiting for U.S. military support before going into the insurgent-infested area to retrieve them.

If Iraqi accounts of the assault on the mosque are confirmed, it could undermine the U.S. effort to disband the militias and centralize control of security issues.

The early evening raid on the mosque, in the Ur district, came as security in and around Baghdad appeared to be deteriorating rapidly.

Witnesses told of helicopters buzzing overhead and heavily armed Humvees sealing off the streets around the mosque, which also serves as a headquarters for Sadr's militia. Soldiers tried to enter, setting off an hourlong gun battle that lasted past dark.

U.S. military officials, responding to inquiries about the incident, issued a report saying 16 insurgents had been killed in a raid about the same time by American and Iraqi forces in Adhamiya, a Sunni district. The statement said "no mosques were entered or damaged during the operation."

The two districts are about three miles apart, and the officials did not return telephone calls to clarify whether their report referred to a different operation.

Because an overnight curfew took effect before news of the clashes broke, it was impossible to travel to the area to reconcile the two accounts.

In a statement read on television, Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari said he was "deeply concerned" by the killings, and had elicited a promise from Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq, to investigate them.

"We call upon the sons of our people to be aware of what is being plotted against the country," Jafari said. "We hope that they will have patience until the conclusion of the ongoing, immediate investigations."

Reaction from Sadr's followers was strident.

"I think we are going to have a firm stance against the American forces because of this crime," said Salam Maliki, a Sadr follower who is the interim government's minister of transport.

He blamed the raid on Khalilzad's vocal campaign against the militias.

The American operation also drew condemnation across Iraq's sectarian divide.

Saleh Mutlak, a leading Sunni politician, said: "We are trying to dissolve the militias and stop the bloodshed. This act by American troops will pull us into civil war."

One witness to the raid, shown speaking on state television, said the incident unfolded during funeral services at the mosque for a man killed three days earlier in an attack by Sunni-led insurgents.

Jawad Maliki, an official of the prime minister's Islamic Dawa Party, told the TV station that U.S. and Iraqi forces chased a wanted suspect to the mosque.

Hazim Araji, a Sadr representative in Baghdad, said people inside the mosque heard that American troops were outside before the shooting started. He said the Sadr movement contacted officials in the Iraqi government to ask what was happening.

"They told us we have to calm down the worshipers because they are not the targets," Araji said in a telephone interview. "We were told that the worshipers should stay inside."

The details of what happened next are unclear. There were varying accounts of what kind of weapons the troops used and whether they entered the mosque. One policeman, in an unofficial account, said the mosque appeared to have been hit by rockets and that part of it caught fire.

Abdul-Hadi Darraji, another Sadr representative, said the movement's office inside the mosque was damaged by flames.

Capt. Khattab Omer, a police official, said 17 people he described as worshipers were killed and four others were injured. Other accounts put the death toll as high as 22.

Residents of the neighborhood, contacted by telephone, said they could hear gunfire and ambulances. Black-clad gunmen of Sadr's Al Mahdi militia poured into the streets, they said.

The operation described by the U.S. command appeared to differ markedly. It was aimed, U.S. officials said, at the Sunni-led insurgency rather than a Shiite mosque. In scant detail, the U.S. command's statement described a joint U.S.-Iraqi raid on a "terrorist cell" that left 16 insurgents dead, one Iraqi soldier wounded, 15 men under arrest and a cache of bomb-making material seized.

The storming of the mosque came a few hours after at least one mortar round fell about 50 yards from Sadr's home in the southern holy city of Najaf, wounding a guard and a child.

DOJ_NMG_0021144

Sadr blamed the shelling on U.S.-led forces. "Either they overlook these attacks or they do it themselves," he said in a written statement. "I urge my brothers not to be trapped by the Westerners' plots."

The young cleric's rising stature as a political player has alarmed U.S. officials hoping to wind down the American presence and leave behind a stable government.

U.S. and Iraqi officials worry that Sadr's movement, with its arsenal of weapons and radical ideology, poses a threat to any central authority and inspires other political movements to take up arms.

Prodded by Khalilzad, the five main political factions in the parliament elected Dec. 15 have been trying to form a unity government with a strong national army and police force.

They have made progress over the last week, but Sunday's talks hit a snag over a proposal that would allow the next prime minister, again expected to be a Shiite, to oversee the security forces. Sunni negotiators objected, charging that the current Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry is infiltrated by militias that have carried out extrajudicial killings of hundreds of unarmed Sunnis in recent months.

President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, canceled a trip to this week's Arab League summit in Sudan to avoid any delay in the negotiations, which he has been leading.

Sunday brought more violence. In addition to the 30 bodies discovered near the highway, police said 13 corpses were found in other parts of the country and 10 other Iraqis were killed. They included a 13-year-old boy hit by a bomb blast as he walked to school in the southern city of Basra.

Arkan Bawi, a police major accused of heading a death squad in Baqubah, was summoned to Interior Ministry headquarters in Baghdad and placed under arrest. It was unclear what prompted the rare instance of an official investigation into such charges.

The accused man was identified as a brother of the police chief in Diyala province.

Internal Tensions Test Shiites' Sway Within Iraq (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Last year, a Shiite militia in southern Iraq staged protests and threatened to attack police precincts in a failed effort to oust a provincial police chief loyal to a rival Shiite group. A few months later, the two factions clashed over a more important office -- that of Iraq's prime minister.

The Shiite political scene is dominated by two rival forces: the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq and a movement led by radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. As the Shiites consolidated control over key levers of national power in the past year, the conflict between Sciri and the Sadr movement has grown from a series of local skirmishes in the south to a struggle for greater influence over the whole country.

While sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Arabs continues, tensions within the Shiite camp show that Iraq's problems go beyond classification by sect and ethnicity. They include fissures within the country's largest community -- the Shiites who make up about 60% of the population and dominate the oil-rich south of the country along with large sections of the Iraqi capital. The rivalry between Sciri and the Sadr movement inspires fear and hope among Iraq's Sunni Arab and Kurdish groups at a time when the country is paralyzed by delays in forming a more inclusive government.

On one hand, the intra-Shia conflict is worrisome because both factions field militias that have clashed in the past and could again if their leaders fail to preserve the unity of the Shiite parliamentary coalition called the United Iraqi Alliance. "If tomorrow you have a fight between Sciri and Sadr, it could be very dangerous for all of Iraq," says Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of Parliament.

On the other hand, these fissures could provide an opening for Sunni political groups seeking to weaken the alliance's dominance (it holds 130 of 275 parliamentary seats). "The situation would be worse if [Sciri and the Sadr movement] were in a complete agreement," says Saleh Mutlaq, head of the National Dialogue Front, one of the two main Sunni blocs in the national assembly.

The rivalry between Mr. Sadr's movement and Sciri has a long history. Before the ouster of Saddam Hussein, the supreme council and its militia, the Badr Brigade, operated from Iran. Mr. Sadr and his followers stayed in Iraq and continue to criticize Sciri for fleeing the country. Mr. Sadr, whose influential father was assassinated during Mr. Hussein's rule and has fashioned himself as an Iraqi nationalist, launched two uprisings against the U.S. forces and has even made overtures to hard-line Sunni groups. Yesterday, a mortar round landed close to the cleric's home in the holy city of Najaf, wounding a guard. Mr. Sadr's power base rests largely on poor, disaffected Shiite youths, who make up a bulk of his militia, the Mehdi Army, and live in places like Sadr City, a sprawling Baghdad slum.

The supreme council, led by Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, generally draws on a more settled constituency and is believed to hold more sway in regional governments in the south. The council's militia, the Badr brigade, has blended with parts of Iraq's interior ministry headed by a Badr loyalist. Since the overthrow of Mr. Hussein, the Sadr movement and Sciri have wrestled over control of Iraq's south, which holds not only vast oil deposits but also sacred Shiite shrines. They have installed loyalists in police departments and government offices, and have sometimes taken their disputes to the streets. "Without any doubt, the militias give them more importance," says Ayad Jamaluddin, a Shiite member of a secular parliamentary bloc led by former Prime Minister Iyad Allawi.

Factions within Iraq's ethnic and sectarian communities have demonstrated ample potential to quarrel among themselves. In the 1990s, for instance, the two main Kurdish groups fought for control of the autonomous region and then divided it into two parts.

For now, Sciri and the Sadr movement forged a tactical alliance to give their coalition more influence in national politics and to preserve Shiite unity in the face of a Sunni insurgency that often targets Shiites. Their militias have been accused of staging reprisal attacks against Sunnis. In public, the two political groups are playing down their disagreements. "There's no problem between Sciri and the Sadr movement; there are different opinions, but this is normal," says Hadi al-Ameri, a member of Sciri's political council. Nasir al-Sayidi, a politician from the Sadr movement, acknowledges there are tensions between the two groups that "sometimes make things unstable within the coalition," though he stresses the alliance unity isn't in danger.

Sciri and the Sadr movement remain at odds over key points of policy. Mr. Hakim champions the cause of southern federalism, which could give the region the same autonomy enjoyed by the Kurds in the north. Mr. Sadr says federalism would shatter Iraqi unity, a position that places him close to the Sunnis who fear a federal Iraq would leave them even more marginalized. Analysts say the Sadr movement has another reason for opposing federalism: control over southern Iraq is likely to go to Sciri at this stage.

These and other tensions came to the surface earlier this year when the Shiite alliance in the national assembly split over who should be Iraq's next prime minister. "The entire Shia coalition was really more a marriage of convenience," says a Western official in Baghdad.

As the largest parliamentary bloc, the alliance had the right to name its candidate, who would need to be confirmed by a two-thirds majority in Parliament. With backing from Sadr deputies, Ibrahim Jaafari, the current prime minister, narrowly beat Adel Abdul Mahdi, a favored Sciri candidate. Major Sunni and Kurdish blocs soon mounted a campaign to block the nomination of Mr. Jaafari, whom they view as inefficient and sometime hostile to their interests.

The flap put Sciri officials in a quandary. They were embarrassed that their candidate had lost to the one favored by the Sadr movement. Openly opposing Mr. Jaafari would risk splitting the Shiite alliance in Parliament and weakening its strength vis-a-vis the other blocs.

The stalemate over the new prime minister and the cabinet continues, with more meetings planned for this week. One idea under discussion is to ask the Shiite alliance to name several candidates for the top post along with Mr. Jaafari, and then have the full Parliament vote on each one.

U.S.: Iraqi Forces Kill At Least 16 Linked To Al-Sadr (USAT)

By From wire reports

USA Today, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021146

BAGHDAD — Iraqi forces killed at least 16 insurgents and arrested 15 others Sunday in a raid on a terrorist cell with ties to a radical Shiite cleric, the U.S. military said.

An aide to the cleric accused the soldiers of killing unarmed civilians.

U.S. Central Command said the Iraqi special operations forces were fired on as they entered a building used by men loyal to Muqtada al-Sadr, a cleric with Iranian backing who has clashed with coalition troops before.

"Iraqi special forces conducted a twilight raid … to disrupt a terrorist cell responsible for conducting attacks on Iraqi security and coalition forces and kidnapping Iraqi citizens," a statement from Central Command said.

U.S. forces backed the raid in the neighborhood of Aadhamiya, according to the statement. Iraqi soldiers found some bombmaking equipment and weapons.

Accounts of the raid varied. Police Lt. Hassan Hmoud said the shooting started when U.S. forces came under fire from an unknown source in the direction of a mosque and the Islamic Dawa Party-Iraq Organization office.

Hmoud put the death toll at 22. He said some of the casualties were at the Dawa Party office near the mosque.

Abdul-Zahra al-Suaidi, head of al-Sadr's office in Baghdad, accused U.S. forces and Iraqi soldiers of opening fire at the al-Moustafa mosque in an unprovoked attack on unarmed civilians. The mosque is frequented by al-Sadr's followers.

Shiite legislator and Dawa Party spokesman Khudayer al-Khuzai said the attack happened at a building near the mosque where party members were holding a "cultural meeting."

"They have nothing to do with the acts of violence," he said.

U.S. military spokesman Lt. Col. Barry Johnson said the building in which the raid occurred was not a political office.

"The building was not a party headquarters but a community meeting room, and there was substantial intelligence on this building showing that that was not, in fact, what it was used for," he said.

Iraq Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari telephoned Iraqi military leaders and U.S. commander Gen. George Casey to "discuss the situation," spokesman Abdul Rezzaq Al-Kadhimim said.

Also Sunday, the bodies of 30 people, many beheaded, were found on a road north of Baghdad.

Shiite Fighters Clash With G.I.'s And Iraqi Forces (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 26 — American and Iraqi government forces clashed with Shiite militiamen in Baghdad on Sunday night in the most serious confrontation in months, and Iraqi security officials said 17 people had been killed in a mosque, including its 80-year-old imam.

The American military, clearly worried about exacerbating a combustible situation that many Iraqis are already describing as civil war, denied that American forces had entered the mosque. But it said in a statement that 16 insurgents had been killed and 15 captured in a nearby combat operation against a terrorist cell.

The differing versions of what happened seemed to raise a broader question about who is in control of Iraq's security at a time when Iraqi politicians still have not formed a unified government, sectarian tensions are higher than ever and mutilated bodies keep surfacing on the streets. On Sunday, Iraqi authorities found 10 bodies in Baghdad and said they were investigating a report that 30 men were beheaded near Baquba.

American officials are now saying that Shiite militias are the No. 1 problem in Iraq, more dangerous than the Sunni-led insurgents who for nearly the past three years have been branded the gravest security threat.

Shiite militias have been accused of running death squads that kidnap and brutalize Sunni men, and on Sunday the American militay said the cell its forces raided had kidnapped Iraq civilians.

But the deadly clash could reopen an old wound. The Iraqis who were killed had apparently worked for Moktada al-Sadr, a young radical Shiite cleric with ties to Iran who has led several bloody rebellions against American forces.

Mr. Sadr has recently become much more politically aggressive and he is considered a pivotal force in the maneuvering over the delayed formation of a new government.

DOJ_NMG_0021147

Earlier on Sunday, a mortar shell nearly hit Mr. Sadr's home in the southern holy city of Najaf. Immediately he accused the Americans of trying to kill him.

American officials have been more overt in the past week than ever in blaming Mr. Sadr's militia for a wave of sectarian bloodshed that seems to have no end.

On Sunday night, American and Iraqi Army forces surrounded a mosque in northeast Baghdad used by Mr. Sadr's troops as a headquarters, Iraqi officials said. Helicopters buzzed overhead as a fleet of heavily armed Humvees sealed off the exits, witnesses said, and when soldiers tried to enter the mosque, shooting erupted, and a heavy-caliber gun battle raged for the next hour.

The Interior Ministry said 17 people had been killed, including the mosque's 80-year-old imam and other civilians.

Sheik Yousif al-Nasiri, an aide to Mr. Sadr, said that 25 people had been killed and that American troops had shot the mosque guards and then burst inside and killed civilians.

American officials provided few details about the raid on Sunday night.

A short news release said that Iraqi Special Forces soldiers, advised by American Special Forces personnel, conducted a raid to "disrupt a terrorist cell" and that "no mosques were entered or damaged during this operation."

The release also said no American soldiers had been hurt in the raid, and one prisoner being held by the gunman had been freed.

Lt. Col. Jonathan Withington, an Army spokesman, said he could not comment on any reports of civilian casualties, including the imam.

Iraqi television showed what appeared to be a prayer room filled with more than a dozen bodies. Several looked well beyond military age. Some had identification cards on their chests, with jagged bullet holes drilled through the plastic.

Just one day earlier, Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, urged Iraqi leaders to crack down on militias.

"More Iraqis are dying from the militia violence than from the terrorists," he said. "The militias need to be under control."

But few expect the Shiite prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, to do anything soon.

He is embroiled in negotiations over who will serve in the next government, and despite continuous American prodding, little progress has been made. To a large extent, Mr. Jaafari needs the support of Shiite militia members in Parliament to keep his job.

Both Shiites and Sunnis have militias. But the Shiite militias are much bigger, much better organized and, most critically, much better connected to the Iraqi security forces.

Shiites make up a majority in Iraq, and two rounds of elections have tightened their grip on power, including over the police and commando forces.

Tensions between Shiites and Sunnis have been steadily building, but an attack on a Shiite shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22 unleashed a new level of sectarian fury.

Shiite mobs rampaged through Baghdad, burning Sunni mosques and killing Sunni civilians. Some Sunnis fought back, but there was an imbalance in the killing, and many people said Mr. Sadr's men were responsible for much of the mayhem.

The situation eventually calmed, at least on the surface. Then the bodies starting turning up. The Interior Ministry says the bodies of at least 200 men, many handcuffed and tortured, have been found. Others put the number much higher.

The widespread suspicion is that Shiite militias are running death squads and focusing on Sunni Arab civilians in a wave of sectarian revenge.

Witnesses have said that they have seen Shiite militiamen and officers in the Shiite-controlled police force abduct Sunni men, often in daylight and in public. Their bodies surface days later, many tortured — eyes gouged, toes cut, faces splashed with acid. Few, if any, cases are investigated.

The growing belief is that Shiite militias are trying to get even for the Shiite civilians who have been killed by the thousands and have borne the burnt of terrorist attacks in Iraq. Sunni terrorists are thought to be responsible, and now it seems that Sunni civilians are paying the price.

"It's hard sometimes to sort out who's killing who," said Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, an American military spokesman. "But there's no doubt there's a significant Shiite impact on all this."

DOJ_NMG_0021148

Mr. Sadr has complicated the picture in two ways. His militia, called the Mahdi Army, has shown an almost messianic zeal to fight American forces, including a long and costly battle in Najaf in the summer of 2004.

Now, his militia is being blamed at least in part for the new problem, the death squads.

Mr. Sadr's top aides deny any connection to the killings, but lower-level Mahdi Army commanders have boasted of vigilante justice.

Two weeks ago, Mahdi Army militiamen hanged four men, whom they called terrorists, from lampposts in Baghdad.

Mr. Sadr has been quick to lash out at the Americans, whom he calls occupiers. After the mortar attack near his home on Sunday, he said in a statement that American forces " either overlook these attacks or they do it themselves."

The mortar wounded a child and a guard.

Other mortar attacks and bombings across Iraq killed at least three people, including two children.

The most gruesome report of violence for the day came from officials in Baquba, who said Sunday evening that 30 men had been beheaded and dumped near a highway.

Interior Ministry officials said a driver had discovered the bodies heaped in a pile next to the highway that links Baghdad to Baquba, a volatile city northeast of Baghdad that has been racked by sectarian and insurgent violence.

Iraqi Army troops waited for American support before venturing into the insurgent-controlled area to retrieve them.

"It's too dangerous for us to go in there alone," said Tassin Tawfik, an Iraqi Army commander.

Later, Baquba officials said they were unable to find the bodies, but would continue the search at daybreak.

In Baghdad, Iraqi officials said that American forces raided a small, secret jail and found several foreign prisoners, possibly people suspected of being terrorists. The soldiers detained the jail guards, though it is not clear for how long, and American officials did not provide any information about the incident. The Associated Press quoted Interior Ministry officials as saying that the prison was legitimate and that the detainees had not been abused.

American-led forces have been turning over more and more security responsibility to the Iraqis, but there are still substantial doubts that Iraqi forces are up to the job. American commanders have sent more troops into Baghdad in the past few weeks and increased their patrols.

Also on Sunday, a Kurdish writer was sentenced to a year and a half in jail for criticizing Kurdish leaders. The writer, Kamal Sayid Qadir, who also uses the name Kamal Karim, had published stories on a Kurdish Web site accusing one of the most powerful men in Kurdistan, Masoud Barzani, of corruption.

Mr. Qadir was originally sentenced to 30 years for defaming Mr. Barzani, but he was retried. A judge on Sunday said he was giving him a lenient sentence because Mr. Qadir was a college professor.

Suicide Car Bomber Kills At Least 15 People Outside Base In Northern Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD (CNN) -- At least 15 people were killed outside a police recruitment center in northern Iraq Monday, when a suicide car bomber detonated, a base employee told CNN. The casualties are believed to be recruits and officers.

According to the employee, the attack took place around 11:15 a.m. (3:15 a.m. ET) at Kifak Base, which is located between Tal Afar and Mosul.

Police recruits line up outside the base to apply for jobs. (posted 5 a.m.)

27 bodies found in the Baghdad area

BAGHDAD (CNN) -- Police found nine bodies in a southwestern Baghdad's Bayya neighborhood Monday morning, an Iraqi police official told CNN.

According to the official, all had been strangled and showed signs of torture -- some had ropes around their necks.

Late Sunday, Iraqi police found 18 bodies along a road near Tall al-Sakher, a mostly Shiite town northeast of Baghdad, a Baghdad Emergency police official said. Tall al-Sakher is surrounded by number of Sunni towns.

According to the official, eyewitness said gunmen driving in three vehicles attacked a group of young men.

Just before midday Monday, a bomb exploded inside minibus in Sadr City section of the Iraqi capital, killing two people in the vehicle, emergency police said. Three other people were wounded in the explosion.

Two people were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded in eastern Baghdad's Zayuna neighborhood Monday morning, police said.

Three people were wounded when a mortar round landed in central Baghdad. The attack took place in the Karrada neighborhood.

In western Baghdad, four people were wounded when a roadside bomb hit an Iraqi police patrol in Khahtan Square. (posted 4:20 a.m.)

Bomb explodes at al-Sadr office in Baquba

BAGHDAD (CNN) -- A bomb exploded inside the Baquba office of radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr late Monday morning, wounding three people, police said.

Al-Sadr has offices for his organizations -- both political and militia -- at locations throughout Iraq.

Baquba is about 35 miles (60 km) north of Baghdad. (posted 4:15 a.m.)

5 children injured in a mine blast in Pakistan

ISLAMABAD (CNN) -- Five children were injured -- two critically -- when their van hit a land mine in Dera Ismail Khan as they were en route to school Monday morning, police said.

Dera Ismail Khan is located near the South Waziristan tribal region, where, according to military officials, Islamic militants are hiding. The fighters have been blamed for attacks on security forces.

No group has claimed responsibility for the blast. (posted 4:15 a.m.)

Defense case takes center stage in 9/11 trial

ALEXANDRIA, VA (CNN) -- Jurors could find out as early as Monday whether Zacarias Moussaoui, the only person put on trial in the United States for the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, will testify in his own defense.

Moussaoui, 37, a French citizen of Moroccan heritage who rarely speaks to his court-appointed defense team, announced to them in court last week that he would take the stand "whether you want it or not."

Moussaoui's previous pronouncements in open court have cursed America and praised terrorist leader Osama bin Laden.

The only question before the jury is whether or not Moussaoui deserves the death penalty. (posted 1:35 a.m.)

Nigerian militants release 3 Western oil workers

LAGOS, Nigeria (CNN) -- Three Western oil workers taken captive last month by militants in Nigeria's oil-rich Delta state were released Monday, a government spokesman told CNN.

According to Abel Oshevire, Americans Cody Oswald and Russell Spell and Briton John Hudspith were the final three hostages released by a group opposed to foreign oil investors.

"They have been handed over to Shell officials and embassy personnel in Warri," Oshevire said. "They are well." The other six hostages were released on March 1, after all abducted on Feb. 18. (Posted 11:20 p.m.)

Bomb defused at headquarters of Thai opposition party

BANGKOK, Thailand (CNN) -- A police bomb squad defused an explosive device Monday at the headquarters of the opposition Democrat Party, a party spokesman said.

According to Ongard Klampaiboom, the tissue-sized box contain enough TNT to take down the several story office building and had been placed directly below the office of party leader Abhisit Vejjajiva. Abhisit left the building at 10 a.m., Ongard said, about 10 minutes before the bomb was set to go off.

Thai political parties are currently campaigning for parliamentary elections in April. Faced with extensive protests, embattled Prime Minister Thaksin Shinawatra called a snap vote in early March and promised to step down if his party won less than 50 percent of the vote. (Posted 11:05 p.m.)

Moderate earthquake hits southern Japan

TOKYO (CNN) -- A moderate earthquake jolted southern Japan late Monday morning, but there were no immediate reports of damage or injuries, authorities there said.

The magnitude 5.5 earthquake struck about 11:50 a.m. (9:50 p.m. Sunday ET) off the southern island of Kyushu, about 800 km (500 miles) west-southwest of Tokyo, the Japan Meteorological Agency reported. The U.S. Geological Survey reported the quake's magnitude as a 5.3.

The temblor was centered about 50 km beneath the ocean floor, and no tsunami warnings were issued. (Posted 10:40 p.m.)

Smaller protests as Senate immigration debate nears

LOS ANGELES (CNN) -- Protests against a proposed crackdown on illegal immigrants brought demonstrators to the streets of Los Angeles again Sunday, but in much smaller numbers than Saturday's massive rally.

The Senate is expected to take up the issue this week, with at least four different proposals rattling around the Capitol. But the most controversial is a measure that passed the House of Representatives in December that would fence off 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexican border and make crossing the border illegally a felony.

About 2,000 members of the largely Latino United Farm Workers rallied against that bill Sunday in Los Angeles before a commemorative Mass for the union's founder, Cesar Chavez. But the attendance was a far cry from the estimated half a million people who turned out for a Saturday protest.

The House bill, pushed by Wisconsin Republican congressman James Sensenbrenner, passed the House on a 239-182 vote in December. But it does not include two provisions that are supported by many other Republicans, including President Bush -- a guest worker program and a method that would allow the nearly 12 million workers now in the United States illegally to earn legal status. ^Airbus superjumbo passes big test

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The world's largest passenger aircraft passed a major hurdle toward certification Sunday, when 873 people successfully evacuated in the 90 seconds aviation rules require.

The drill required "passengers" on the double-decker Airbus A380 to slide to the ground from a height of 26 feet. Company officials said one man broke his leg and 33 people suffered minor injuries during the evacuation test in Hamburg, Germany.

Aviation requirements mandate that all passengers of aircraft be able to evacuate in 90 seconds using only half the plane's exits. In this case, the volunteer "passengers'" exited in darkness, and taped by infrared cameras. (Posted 8:25 p.m.)

Clashes around Baghdad mosque kill 20

BAGHDAD (CNN) -- Clashes around a major Shiite mosque on the northern edge of Baghdad's Sadr City left 20 dead Sunday amid differing accounts about who was involved in the fighting.

Police said 20 members of the Mehdi Army militia, loyal to radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, were killed. Sources inside Sadr's office -- which is inside the mosque -- also said militia members were killed in the raid, which took place at dusk. But Iraqi police and sources in Sadr's office said the U.S. military was battling the militia, while the U.S. military said its troops acted "in an advisory capacity only" as Iraqi troops led the operation.

Meanwhile, Iraqi television showed a room containing dead, bloodied bodies wearing identification tags that say "Dawa Islamic Party," the Shiite party of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. (Posted 5:45 p.m.)

Criminal probe opened in Milwaukee boys' disappearance

(CNN) -- The search for two Milwaukee boys reported missing last week has become a criminal investigation, police said Sunday, but did not say why.

Quadrevion Henning, 12, and his friend Purvis Parker, 11, were last reported seen March 19 as they headed off to play ball at a park near their homes in north-central Milwaukee. Police spokeswoman Anne Schwartz said there was no evidence a crime had been committed, but investigators have determined "an increased possibility" that a crime taken place.

"Canvassing by the task force as well as leads and tips have led us to that conclusion," Schwartz told reporters. "As this is a criminal investigation, that will limit the amount of information that you all are going to be receiving." (Posted 5:45 p.m.)

Survey: Gas up nearly 15 cents per gallon in past 2 weeks

(CNN) -- Gas prices shot up nearly 15 cents over the past two weeks to a national average of $2.50 per gallon of self-serve regular, according to a survey released Sunday.

"Higher crude-oil prices and higher costs from this year's new regulations affecting gasoline recipes are the two main drivers of the price surge," said Trilby Lundberg, publisher of the Lundberg Survey, which compared prices at about 7,000 gas stations on March 24 and March 10.

Prices have risen about 37 cents since Dec. 2, when they bottomed out at $2.13 per gallon. Lundberg predicted more price increases later in the spring, "when our big driving season kicks in." (Posted 3:29 p.m.)

New York to release recordings of 911 dispatchers on 9/11

NEW YORK (CNN) -- The city of New York this week will release CDs of 911 dispatchers responding to about 130 calls from inside the World Trade Center towers on Sept. 11, 2001, a city official familiar with the issue told CNN Sunday.

The CDs, which will include only the dispatchers' side of the conversations, will also contain some calls made from outside the towers, the official said. The recordings will include both fire and police dispatchers.

The official said that the city has positively identified 28 individuals who made 911 calls on that day. Only one survived the attacks.

The families of 24 of the victims can request copies of the CD recordings with their loved ones' voices unredacted. In the other three cases, the official said, the city could not locate the families.

The release of the redacted CDs follows a three-year court battled led by The New York Times and joined by the families of nine firefighters. That battle finally ended a year ago. The court decision left it up to next-of-kin to decide if the callers' voices in the recordings will be made public. (Posted 2:17 p.m.)

Belarus opposition leader arrested during election demonstration

MINSK, Belarus (CNN) -- A Belarussian opposition leader has been charged with hooliganism and taken away from the capital Minsk, his daughter told CNN Sunday.

Belarussian authorities arrested Alexander Kozulin and the press secretary of another leader Saturday during a demonstration over the nation's recent election, rally organizers said.

The arrests came on a day of more clashes between police and protesters, some of whom chanted "Freedom!" and accused the government of fascism. Police sprayed tear gas, after which some protesters were seen falling over.

Julia Kozulin told CNN that authorities told her that her father was charged with hooliganism and sent to a jail about 45 km from Minsk, but she has been unable to speak with him.

The European Union presidency, meanwhile, condemned the violence used to quell the demonstrations and expressed "serious concern" about the arrests, calling for Kozulin's "immediate release." (Posted 12:21 p.m.)

Rice: Convert's threatened execution doesn't mean anti-democratic rule

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice denied Sunday that the threatened execution of an Afghan man for converting to Christianity highlights a lack of true democracy in a nation the Bush administration points to as as a democratic success.

In an interview with CNN's "Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer," Rice rejected suggestions that Islamic law in Afghanistan and Iraq -- two nations the administration argues are signs Bush foreign policy is working -- could prevent free societies from taking hold.

"These are evolutionary democracies, they're democracies in transition," she said, adding that the United States should be "humble" because of its own history of denying freedoms to its citizens.

"Let me remind everyone: in my lifetime we were trying to get to a place where the vote was assured... for American blacks in the South," she said. (Posted 11:30 a.m.)

Police killed, bodies found in Iraq

BAGHDAD (CNN) -- The following violent incidents in Iraq were reported Sunday:

-- 30 bodies were found along a road n southern Baquba, the Iraqi Army said. All were beheaded. Baquba is about 30 miles (48km) north of Baghdad.

-- A body was found in southern Baghdad near the Dora neighborhood. The person appeared to have been executed, police said.

-- Two police were wounded when a roadside bomb hit their patrol in eastern Baghdad, police said.

-- Two police in the town of Wajihiya, north of Baghdad, were killed and three guards of the mayor were wounded, police said. Gunmen attacked the police station, killing the police; the mayor's guards were wounded when an roadside bomb exploded as they were en route to the police station.

-- Two bodies were found in the city of Khalis, also north of Baghdad. Police said these bodies were also found bound and shot in the head, execution-style. (Posted 10:57 a.m.)

Afghan Christian convert may be released

KABUL (CNN) -- An Afghan man threatened with execution because he converted from Islam to Christianity is expected to be released from custody at the end of the day, a Western diplomat and Afghan officials close to President Hamid Karzai told CNN Sunday.

But other sources in the Afghan judiciary said that the case against Abdul Rahman had been thrown out on technical grounds and sent back to prosecutors to gather more evidence. Those same sources said Rahman may not be released.

Western nations, which have supported the new Afghan government monetarily, have been leaning on the government to free Rahman, and a government source familiar with his case said on Friday he would be released in the coming days.

The Afghan Cabinet met on the matter Saturday, but results of that meeting were unknown. (Posted 9:14 a.m.)

Death toll in China mine flooding rises to 23

BEIJING (CNN) -- The death toll from a Chinese coal mine flood last week has risen to 23, the country's state-run Xinhua news agency reported Saturday, with five people still missing.

The flooding took place on March 18 in Linxin County in north China's Shanxi Province. Rescue work was continuing, Xinhua said, but rescuers said it would take at least another two days before a search for the five missing people can be launched because water and silt remained in the mine shaft.

The flooding occurred as 58 miners were working underground at the Fanjiashan Coal Mine. Thirty managed to escape. A local government official told Xinhua relatives of those killed will receive 200,000 yuan, or about $24,600, in compensation. The cause of the flooding was under investigation. (Posted 11:12 p.m.)

Iraqi Doctor Says He Killed Patients (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, March 26 -- A doctor has admitted killing at least 35 Iraqi police officers and army soldiers by giving them lethal injections, reopening their wounds or engaging in other deadly acts while they were being treated at a hospital in the northern city of Kirkuk, according to Kurdish security sources and Kurdish television.

Kurdish television broadcast on Sunday what it said was the doctor's taped confession, in which he told police that he sympathized with the radical Sunni Arab insurgent group Ansar al-Sunna. He said that the group paid him to kill the men and that he did it because "I hate the Americans and what they've done to Iraq."

"I injected more than 35 policemen and soldiers, including officers and some who were slightly injured," the doctor, identified by a Kurdish security official as Luay Omar Taie, said in the taped statement. "I used to stop the breathing machines or cut the electricity in the operations room or reopen the wounds."

A senior official with the police intelligence agency of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK), who declined to be quoted by name, confirmed the details of the case, which was first reported by the Independent newspaper in London. The circumstances of the alleged confession, including whether it might have been coerced, could not be verified.

Taie was arrested following the detention of members of a criminal gang with links to Ansar al-Sunna. The gang is responsible for kidnapping more than 150 people and executing 18 of them, the PUK intelligence official said. Arrests of insurgents soon followed.

During interrogations, the insurgents identified Taie as a doctor who had treated them. The organization selected Taie because he was young and wanted money, the official said.

In the statement aired on Kurdish television, the doctor said he was paid up to $100 for each act he committed. He asserted responsibility for killing the assistant police chief in Kirkuk, Gen. Ajman Abdullah, with a fatal injection and said he also killed the general's brother, a soldier who was admitted to the hospital after being wounded by a roadside bomb.

The doctor said he helped a wounded insurgent escape from the hospital. The intelligence official said Taie also advised insurgents on how to forge documents to claim that U.S. forces had shot their members, so that they could be treated at a hospital in Mosul, about 100 miles away.

Drying Out The Insurgency (NYT)

By A. C. Grayling

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

London

AS we saw in the recent offensive by American and Iraqi forces against insurgents near Samarra, the term "air assault" has taken on a new meaning in military parlance. It now indicates taking troops into action by helicopter, rather than the widespread and often indiscriminately destructive firing of missiles or dropping of bombs from aircraft.

Still, anti-insurgent operations often take place in urban areas, whose residents are as much at risk from ground weapons as they would be from bombers at high altitude. Thus one question that a watchful press should be asking of the American-led forces in Iraq is how carefully, and how successfully, they are applying the "doctrine of distinction" laid down in the laws of war, which requires that combatants be distinguished from noncombatants so that the latter can be protected.

The doctrine was devised by the military powers and international groups over the last half-decade in response to the systematic bombing of civilians in World War II. The principals of that strategy, which was then called "area bombing," were of course the British and American air forces, who between them killed a million civilians by carpet-bombing German and Japanese cities.

It took decades after the war before the deliberate aerial bombing of civilians was designated a war crime. Part of the reason for this slow response was, understandably, that the atrocities committed by the Axis powers were so vast that they overshadowed everything else, and people on the Allied side comforted themselves with the belief that defeating Nazism justified all the means used.

But as memories of the war faded, the stark immorality of deliberately massacring civilians could no longer be denied. In 1977 a protocol requiring militaries to distinguish between civilians and combatants was added to the Geneva Conventions. Britain is among the signatories; the United States has never ratified it. Still, America is careful to state that its forces always try to avoid "collateral damage."

But protecting civilians is hard to do when fighting an insurgency like Iraq's, in which combatants hide behind and take support from the civilian population. The very nature of insurgency seems to offer an irresolvable problem: the horrific example of World War II area bombing unarguably shows that the doctrine of distinction must be observed, yet the insurgents cynically use it as a shield.

Paradoxically, the solution is not to abandon the doctrine of distinction but to apply it with a vengeance. To see how, simply look at the considerable experience Britain acquired in policing a restive empire which, at its height, included a third of the world's population. The British learned the hard way, making some bitter mistakes en route. But the lesson was clear: drain the pond in which the insurgents swim.

In its most literal application, this strategy involved physically moving a civilian population from troubled areas into camps, which deprived insurgents of cover and support. It exacted a shamefully high cost the first time it was tried, in the Boer War, when many of the women and children gathered into "concentration camps" died of disease.

By the 1950's, however, with the communist insurgency in Malaya and the Mau Mau uprising in Kenya, British forces learned to do the same thing better. The camps into which the civilian population was "drained" were usually comfortable villages with good amenities and became an element of the hearts-and-minds aspect of the campaigns.

Of course, separating the civilians from the fighters ran in tandem with unrelenting military pressure on the latter, until the insurgents' circumstances became precarious enough for them to accept a political solution.

In Malaya the strategy involved moving half a million people from insurgent areas. Whether a similar approach is viable for Iraq's Sunni Triangle is a question best left to military experts; but the idea behind it — making life better for those who otherwise would give support to insurgents — is clearly one route to ending the insurgency.

A different tactic based on the British experience would be to cordon off the most toxic part of the Sunni Triangle, letting nobody in or out except under stringent controls at the perimeter, across which only food and medicine could move.

This is what the British did in Nairobi and other urban areas of Kenya in the 50's; the security forces screened everyone and everything coming in or out. The advantages were that supplies of weapons and fighters were choked in both directions, and the population inside the quarantine zone had to work out a better destiny for itself than perpetual war. The disadvantages of such a quarantine are that it might backfire by fueling resentments and that it involves a manpower-intensive effort of perimeter policing.

In the end, British colonial solutions to insurgency tended to involve aspects of both strategies. Once combatants and noncombatants had been separated, the civilians had to be kept quarantined from the fighters so that the contrasting methods of dealing with both — seduction of the latter, coercion of the former — could proceed effectively. But the aim was always realistic: Britain recognized that an insurgency cannot be defeated, only damped down and eventually ended through a political settlement.

This hard truth has to guide efforts in Iraq, the sooner the better. And in the meantime, the more effectively the doctrine of distinction is upheld — that is, the fewer civilian casualties suffered — the quicker that reconciliation will come and the more effective it will be.

How To Stop A Civil War (WP)

By Michael O'Hanlon

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

Administration officials have been right in recent weeks to argue that there is no large-scale civil war underway in Iraq. As long as the Iraqi political leadership remains generally united in trying to calm the situation, and as long as sectarian violence remains more sporadic than strategic (with no systematic ethnic cleansing, for example), true civil war remains a threat rather than a reality. But as President Bush himself recognized in his March 13 speech on Iraq, whoever attacked the Golden Mosque in Samarra on Feb. 22 was trying to spark a civil war. Yesterday's gruesome events, including the discovery of 30 beheaded bodies near Baqubah, heavy fighting in parts of Baghdad and the firing of fatal mortar rounds at Moqtada al-Sadr's compound in Najaf, suggest that such attempts will likely continue.

Of course, preventing a civil war is primarily a political task. In this light, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has been right to push Iraqis to form a coalition government. He might also encourage them to start thinking about what policies such a government would pursue. For example, in debating whether Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari should retain his post, Iraqis might think a bit less about the past year and instead ask Jafari about his plans for the future: for sharing oil revenue among provinces, rehabilitating lower-level Baathists to reenter the society, integrating security forces and creating jobs.

But if the political process continues to falter and the risk of civil war looms larger, we will also need a military plan for quelling it. Much of the American debate has been asking how to handle an all-out conflict in which Iraq has already fractured and violence is rampant. But the more important question is how to quell violence in the early stages, before such a scenario develops fully. And this is not the typical debate over how fast and soon we can draw down U.S. troops in Iraq; rather, it is a debate about what they do while they are there.

On this point, initial indications are that American thinking is on the wrong track. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld has stated that U.S. forces would not become heavily involved in any civil strife, leaving it instead to Iraqis to sort out the problem. This approach, which mirrors the relatively passive approach U.S. troops took to the reprisal violence after the Feb. 22 bombing, has an understandable appeal. But it is akin to our decision to stand aside and allow wanton looting after Saddam Hussein fell in April 2003, and it could have comparably disastrous consequences.

If civil war begins in Iraq, it will probably consist of increasingly active vigilante justice -- as well as random, pointless acts of violent rage -- by Iraq's powerful militias. They will attack defenseless mosques, homes of important figures from other ethnic and religious groups, and defenseless citizens. They will begin to perpetrate ethnic cleansing with cold, premeditated purpose. As time goes on, hearing about similar behavior by other militias from other sectarian groups, they will also be motivated by a desire for vengeance -- not just for Hussein's atrocities of yesteryear but for what happened last week and last night. And they will seek to protect their own unarmed families and friends by stepping up ethnic cleansing in neighborhoods where they live, to preclude the possibility of further attacks against their own kin.

These are the typical dynamics of civil conflicts, as analyzed by scholars such as John Mueller, Barry Posen, Steve Stedman and Chaim Kaufmann. Civil wars with a heavy ethnic dimension do not typically begin as full-blown conflicts but rather develop an internal dynamic in which hate, rage and fear increasingly influence the actions of a growing number of people.

In such a situation, stemming violence early is critical. Checkpoints need to be manned, curfews enforced, vigilantes arrested or shot, mosques and schools and hospitals protected.

Yes, Iraqi forces can do many of these things and should. And, yes, many of them will. But Iraqi security forces are at present politically untested. Most units are dominated by one group or another. If the country begins to descend toward civil war, the temptation of many will be to take sides in the sectarian strife rather than stop it.

The foreign coalition can do a great deal to discourage this. By deploying with Iraqi police and army troops on the streets, it can provide enough manpower to do the labor-intensive work required to restore order as anarchy begins to spread. It can help give Iraqi security forces the backbone they need to hang together and do their job for the country rather than fight for their Kurdish or Shiite or Sunni Arab interests. It can act as a glue, helping to hold them together by working with them and providing an example worthy of emulation.

In his statements about letting Iraqis handle their own civil strife, perhaps Rumsfeld was trying to drive home to Iraqis the message that they should not count on the distant American superpower to bail them out if civil war begins. This message is grounded in a sound logic; Iraqis do need to step up to the plate and solve more of their own problems. But as a full indication of what our military plans would be for any incipient civil war, it is not the right strategy. Now is the time to reassess.

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

P resident Bush 's comment last week that U.S. troops would be in Iraq three more years provoked some consternation. Bush had always said the troops would be there until "the job is done and not a day longer," but few assumed that the troops would remain through his presidency.

Actually, Bush is being way too pessimistic. On April 9, 2003, three weeks after the invasion of Iraq, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld clearly set out the 10 objectives to be achieved "before victory can be declared."

· "Baghdad is in the process of being liberated" and the Hussein regime must be run out of there and other cities, he said. Check -- been run out of just about everywhere at least once.

· "We still must capture [or] account for . . . Saddam Hussein and his sons and the senior Iraqi leadership." Check.

· "We still must find and ensure the safe return of prisoners of war . . . in this war as well as any still held from the last Gulf War." Check -- save for one missing soldier.

· "We still must secure the northern oil fields." Check -- although the pipelines keep getting hit.

· "We still need to find and secure Iraq's weapons of mass destruction facilities. . . ." Check -- they are tightly secured.

· ". . . and secure Iraq's borders so we can prevent the flow of weapons of mass destruction materials and senior regime officials out of the country." Check -- no outward flow.

· "We need to locate Iraqi scientists with knowledge of these programs." Check.

DOJ_NMG_0021156

· "We must also capture or kill the terrorists still operating in Iraq and prevent them from gaining access to weapons of mass destruction." Check -- at least for those there in '03 and none are getting access to that WMD.

· "We must locate Baath Party members, records and weapons caches," records of elite intelligence and military units and regime millions outside the country. Check.

· "And we must begin the process of working with free Iraqis . . . and those returning home from exile, to establish an Iraqi interim authority and help to pave the way for a new Iraqi government." Check -- done that several times now.Chavez on the Lookout for Immigrants

President Bush also pushed last week for his guest worker proposal to allow millions of illegal immigrants to continue working in this country.

There was a fine photo of Bush meeting Thursday with friendly groups about the issue. And there, sitting at Bush's right hand, was none other than Linda Chavez, who heads something called the Center for Equal Opportunity.

Chavez, Loop Fans may recall, was Bush's first nominee to be secretary of labor in 2001. Her nomination was scuttled when it was discovered she hadn't been forthcoming to them about her interesting relationship with an illegal immigrant living in her home who was doing generally unpaid housework for her.

She probably knows as much as anyone about working guests.Maybe They Should've Called Rent-a-Cop

Mark the date! The Democratic leadership will be at Union Station on Wednesday at 1 p.m. to announce its "national security policy."

Top Senate Democrat Harry M. Reid (Nev.) will be there, as will House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.), lots of other congressional types, and governors and mayors.

But there's a need for uniformed folks because "they symbolize safety, competence, and security to average Americans," former longtime Senate aide and now private consultant Stephanie Cutter said in an e-mail Friday to Andrea Mournighan of the National Association of Police Organizations.

"We would like . . . as many law enforcement officers as possible to attend and stand on stage," Cutter said. "Would it be possible to have 20 or so. . . . ?"

"We are committing to make implementation of the 9-11 [commission] recommendations our first act when Democrats regain control of the Senate and/or House," Cutter wrote.

But mum's the word. "We're trying to keep our roll-out a close hold for now, so press doesn't pick up on it. The element of surprise is everything these days!"

GOPers Join Call For Iraq Debate (RC)

By Ben Pershing

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

A bipartisan group of lawmakers began a new effort last week to attract support for the idea of holding a lengthy House floor debate on Iraq policy.

On Wednesday, Republican Reps. Walter Jones Jr. (N.C.), Ron Paul (Texas) and Wayne Gilchrest (Md.) joined Democratic Reps. Neil Abercrombie (Hawaii), Ike Skelton (Mo.) and Marty Meehan (Mass.) in co-signing a “Dear Colleague” letter calling for “an open and honest debate on the future of U.S. policy in Iraq.”

The six signatories encouraged their colleagues to sign a discharge petition for H.Res. 543, a rule that would allow floor consideration of a resolution introduced by Abercrombie in 2005 requiring President Bush “to develop and implement a plan for the withdrawal” of American troops from Iraq.

Supporters of the discharge petition argue that the House has not had an adequate recent debate on Iraq, even as casualties there have escalated and President Bush has declined to specify when U.S. troops will pull out.

DOJ_NMG_0021157

But House Republican leaders dispute the notion that the chamber has not given Members a chance to debate the issue.

"We did that when we chose to go to war and again this fall," said Ron Bonjean, spokesman for Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), referring to the House's November vote on a resolution calling for an immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"We believe in fighting to win the war on terror overseas rather than having them strike here at home as they did on Sept. 11, [2001]," Bonjean added.

But Jones, one of the House's few outspoken GOP critics of the war, strongly disagreed with the idea that the chamber has given the Iraq issue enough debate time and argued that November's debate was designed solely to humiliate Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.).

"It was not an honest debate on the issue," Jones said, calling the short consideration of the bill an effort to "embarrass a patriot."

"I'm frustrated with my own party, I'll be honest with you," Jones added, saying that he respects Hastert but that he believes his own leadership is out of touch on the Iraq issue.

"I don't know what polls the Republican leadership's looking at, but the ones I've seen aren't very encouraging," he said.

As of March 15, the discharge petition had 72 signatures, all of them from Democrats, including House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). (Two Democrats, Reps. Patrick Kennedy (R.I.) and Leonard Boswell (Iowa), signed the petition but withdrew their signatures in December.)

Jones said that he, Paul and Gilchrest plan to sign the petition on April 5, when they will go to the floor with the three Democrats and issue a call for a broader debate.

If passed, H. Res. 543 would allow up to 17 hours of debate on Abercrombie's Iraq resolution, evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats.

Jones said he does not support an immediate withdrawal of troops and hopes backers of the Bush administration's policy will participate in the debate.

"We want people who support being in iraq to be part of the debate," Jones said. "We want to have more than just 30 minutes on each side."

In An Election Year, A Shift In Public Opinion On The War (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick And Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE, March 25 — Neil Mondragon watched with approval at an auto repair shop recently as Representative Heather A. Wilson, a New Mexico Republican visiting her district, dropped into the pit and drained the oil from a car.

Afterward, Mr. Mondragon recalled how he had backed Ms. Wilson, a supporter of the Iraq war, in her race for Congress two years ago. He, too, supported the war.

But now, Mr. Mondragon said, it is time to bring the troops home. And he is leaning toward voting for Ms. Wilson's opponent, Patricia Madrid, who has called for pulling the troops out of Iraq by the end of the year.

"The way I see the situation is, we have done what we had to," said Mr. Mondragon, 27, whose brother fought in the war and returned with post-traumatic stress disorder. "I don't see the point of having so many guys over there right now. We can't just stay there and baby-sit forever."

Mr. Mondragon is far from alone in reassessing his view of the war that has come to define George W. Bush's presidency.

Mr. Bush is pressing ahead with an intensified effort to shore up support for the war, but an increasingly skeptical and pessimistic public is putting pressure on Congress about the wisdom behind it, testing the political support for the White House's determination to remain in Iraq.

The results have been on display over the past week as members of Congress returned home and heard first-hand what public opinion polls have been indicating.

"We have been there now for three years, and we have suffered more losses than I think most people thought we would see," Representative Steve Chabot, an Ohio Republican from a relatively conservative district near Cincinnati, said in an interview on Friday. "You may have the president or others now who say we always knew this would be a long slog, but I think most people did not expect it to be as hard as it has been."

In Connecticut, Representative Christopher Shays, a Republican who is one of the Democrats' top targets this year in the midterm elections, has distanced himself from the White House even as he has emphasized his support for the war, saying the administration has made "huge mistakes" by allowing looting, disbanding the Iraqi army and failing to have enough troops on the ground

Senator Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican who is also facing a tough re-election challenge, said that "people are not optimistic about what they see."

Even Representative Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida Republican who has made her support for the war a centerpiece of her campaign, said the public seemed "to be losing patience" with the war.

Interviews with voters, elected officials and candidates around the country suggest a deepening and hardening opposition to the war. Historians and analysts said this might mark a turning point in public perception.

"I'm less optimistic because I see the fatalities every day," said Angela Kirby, 32, a lawyer from St. Louis who initially supported the war. "And the longer it goes on, the less optimistic I am."

Here in New Mexico, Dollie Shoun, 67, said she had gone from being an ardent supporter of the war and the president to a fierce critic of both.

"There has been too many deaths, and it is time for them to come back home," Ms. Shoun said. Speaking of Mr. Bush, she added: "I was very much for him, but I don't trust him at this point in time."

Polls have found that support for the war and expectations about its outcome have reached their lowest level since the invasion. A Pew Research Center poll this week found that 66 percent of respondents said the United States was losing ground in preventing a civil war in Iraq, a jump of 18 percent since January.

The Pew poll also found that 49 percent now believed that the United States would succeed in Iraq, compared with 60 percent last July. A CBS News poll completed two weeks ago found that a majority (54 percent) believed Iraq would never become a stable democracy.

Richard B. Wirthlin, who was the pollster for President Ronald Reagan, says he sees the beginning of a decisive turn in public opinion against the war. "It is hard for me to imagine any set of circumstances that would lead to an enhancement of the public support that we have seen," he said. "It is more likely to go down, and the question is how far and how fast."

Even more problematic for the administration, pollsters have found, is that Americans who have soured on the war include many independent voters and some self-described Republicans.

William Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard, argued that views on the war remained fluid and that the White House could still rally support for the effort if Americans "are convinced we can win."

A perception of progress on the ground could help turn public opinion back toward Mr. Bush's way, some analysts said. As it is, a significant number of Americans, including a majority of Republicans, want Mr. Bush to continue the war.

"Bush is right in being optimistic," said Susan Knapp, 64, a Florida Republican. "I listened to the news this morning and there are people who think he's out of touch with reality, but in fact I think he knows better than most of us about what is going on, and he does know the situation."

And in interviews, some respondents said they agreed with Mr. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney that journalists were exaggerating the bad news. "I have quite a few friends who have served over there and they come back with a different story than the media portrays," said Jerry Brown, a Republican in Fairfield County, Conn.

For Mr. Bush today, as it was for Presidents Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard M. Nixon decades ago, the question is how long can he continue fighting an unpopular war without it crippling his presidency by eroding trust in his judgment and credibility.

"Once the public loses confidence in a president's leadership at a time of war, once they don't trust him anymore, once his credibility is sharply diminished, how does he get it back?" said Robert Dallek, a historian who has written biographies of Johnson and Nixon.

The anxiety about the war could be seen in contested districts around the country. In recent weeks, Representative Wilson of New Mexico has been sharply critical of the administration on issues like domestic surveillance and its public projections about the war. Ms. Wilson said she worried that public opinion could turn decisively against the war in Iraq as it did during the Vietnam War. "Wasn't it Kissinger who said the acid test of foreign policy is public support?" she said.

In Connecticut, Diane Farrell, a Democrat challenging Mr. Shays, said she had consistently run into voters who drew comparisons between Iraq and Vietnam.

"People are throwing up their hands between the civil unrest, the number of deaths and the cost to taxpayers," Ms. Farrell said. "People feel worn out by the war, and they don't see an end. "

At the Capitol recently, Senator John W. Warner, a Virginia Republican who was the secretary of the Navy during part of the Vietnam War, was introduced to a visiting Iraqi. Mr. Warner proceeded to lecture her about the need for Iraqis to form a new government, and fast.

"The American people have a mind of their own," he told her, recalling how he watched during the Vietnam War as public opinion turned against the conflict — and inevitably Congress followed. In a later conversation, Mr. Warner said that such a moment had not been reached yet, but he warned that he sensed a "certain degree of impatience" in the country and around the world.

On Iraq, Pointed Questions With An Edge (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

Have the media declared war on the war?

In increasingly aggressive questions to President Bush and Vice President Cheney, in a growing focus on the death toll in Iraq, in downbeat assessments on the invasion's third anniversary, many journalists now reflect the view that the war has gone horribly wrong.

Perhaps this simply reflects the stark reality of the suicide bombings, roadside explosions and mosque attacks that have come to dominate the reporting from Iraq. Or perhaps, as Cheney put it on "Face the Nation," journalists provide a distorted "perception" of Iraq "because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad."

What is undeniable is that the tone of much of the coverage matches the public-opinion polls showing that a majority of the country has turned against the conflict.

"One thing that would explain it is there's even more bad news from Iraq and other places -- Afghanistan, Iran, North Korea," says Ken Auletta, media writer for the New Yorker. "But even that doesn't fully explain the harshness of the reportage. With two-thirds of the public not approving of Bush's performance, it becomes open season on him. And when conservatives start attacking him, reporters are given more cover."

But Newsweek columnist Jonathan Alter says journalists were never cheerleaders for the war. "You can find tough-minded stories in a lot of newspapers and magazines going back three years," he says. "It does a disservice to hardworking reporters, in some cases risking their lives, to make it seem like in one week they go from pro-war to antiwar."

The journalists certainly don't see themselves as antiwar. But the way they frame many stories about Iraq sliding toward civil war carries echoes of Vietnam, when the media coverage turned sharply critical as the country soured on that jungle war.

Consider the questions asked at Bush's news conference last week.

ABC's Jessica Yellin: "Are you willing to sacrifice American lives to keep Iraqis from killing one another?"

CNN's Kathleen Koch: "Do you believe [Defense Secretary Donald] Rumsfeld should resign?"

USA Today's David Jackson: "Are you concerned that the Iraq experience is going to embolden authoritarian regimes in the Middle East and make it tougher to get democracy there?"

Bob Deans of Cox News: "Is there a point at which having the American forces in Iraq becomes more a part of the problem than a part of the solution?"

The Washington Post's Jim VandeHei: Polls show "a growing number of Americans are questioning the trustworthiness of you and this White House. Does that concern you?"

Hearst columnist Helen Thomas: "Your decision to invade Iraq has caused the deaths of thousands of Americans and Iraqis, wounds of Americans and Iraqis for a lifetime. Every reason given, publicly at least, has turned out not to be true."

DOJ_NMG_0021160

In his CBS interview with Cheney, Bob Schieffer said: "Let me ask you about this charge of incompetence, because we hear that not just about Iraq, but we hear it more -- and being raised sometimes by members of your own party on a variety of issues -- the bumbling after Katrina, the Harriet Miers nomination, the failure to see the political implications of the Dubai Ports deal."

When the networks did their three-year anniversary pieces, reciting the mounting death toll, the picture that emerged was bleak. NBC's Richard Engel in Baghdad: "Since the U.S. invasion, there has not been a single day without mortar fire, car bombings or IED attacks."

ABC's Dan Harris in Baghdad: "The situation for many here has worsened. Since the war, millions of Iraqis no longer have drinkable water. In Baghdad, there's electricity for fewer than eight hours a day, compared to 18 before. And in a country with so much oil, today there are unfathomably long gas lines."

But ABC anchor Elizabeth Vargas reminded viewers that before her co-anchor, Bob Woodruff, was injured by a roadside bomb in late January, he did a story on a thriving Baghdad ice cream shop, and that her December trip to Iraq included a piece on a ballet school.

Laura Ingraham, the conservative radio talk show host who recently spent eight days in Iraq, says some soldiers complained to her that their views, which were mixed, aren't being reflected by the media.

"It's not about painting a rosy picture," she says. "It's not about putting all good news out there. It's about there being some context. It's not just explosions every day, and that is primarily what is seen, in snapshots and flashes. And that does over time cement the public's view that this is irretrievably a disaster and the whole nation is in flames."

When news organizations focus overwhelmingly on insurgent attacks, Ingraham says, "it begins to look like you're invested in America's defeat."

That sounds like political overstatement. But if journalists seem far more aggressive these days, it may be because their performance contrasts sharply with the period after the Sept. 11 attacks and in the run-up to the war, when news organizations have conceded they did an inadequate job examining the administration's WMD claims.

"We were attacked," Auletta says. "We are citizens. We felt as vulnerable as our leaders in Washington. Bush and the government got more of a free pass."

The record shows that administration charges that reporters in Iraq are ignoring signs of progress are not true, although most journalists say the dangerous conditions make it difficult to talk to ordinary Iraqis. But sometimes the unrelenting violence has a way of intruding on the news agenda.

While in Baghdad, ABC's Jake Tapper was working on a light feature about an Iraqi station's sitcom. While his cameras were rolling, word came that the manager of the entertainment division had been assassinated. That, of course, became the story.Scalp Hunter

It has been one of the capital's minor mysteries: Who would set up a Web site for the avowed purpose of getting NBC to fire David Gregory?

The person behind FireDavidGregory.com is Ian Schwartz, an 18-year-old college student in Baltimore.

Schwartz's political leanings can be divined from his other Web site, Expose the Left, which runs headlines such as: "AP Writes Yet Another Anti-War Story," "Al Franken Continues Tirade Against Cheney" and "Liberal Lie: Dick Durbins [sic] Claims He Supports Our Troops."

Schwartz says in an interview that "I generally have a distaste for the mainstream media." Asked why he singled out Gregory, Schwartz cites the White House correspondent's overly aggressive questioning over the Dick Cheney hunting accident and an appearance with Don Imus in which the radio host joked that Gregory must be drunk (later soberly denied by Gregory).

"I know it's his job to get answers," Schwartz says, but his online petition -- which he says was signed by 3,200 people -- was a way of "telling him to cool it. I'm just glad it got coverage."

"I didn't take it very seriously," Gregory says of the site, but he sees it as a sign of a broader phenomenon:

"What concerns me is that it's increasingly true that people are viewing the news and political coverage through their own ideological lens. It's wrong to mistake aggressive reporting for political bias. It's a mistake to ascribe motives to people who cover the White House day in and day out. People watch me in a briefing and draw a conclusion based on that. They won't even wait to see what I report."Trust but Verify

Five days after acknowledging that it had misidentified a former Abu Ghraib prisoner as the hooded man on a box captured in an infamous photo, the New York Times ran a correction last week of its profile of Donna Fenton, a self-described Hurricane Katrina victim from Biloxi, Miss. After police charged Fenton with fraud and grand larceny, saying she had never lived in Biloxi, the paper said it "did not conduct adequate interviews or public record checks to verify Ms. Fenton's account."

Camp Saddam (WKLYSTD)

By Stephen F. Hayes

Weekly Standard, March 27, 2006

REPRESENTATIVE John Murtha, a Democrat from Pennsylvania, appeared on NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday, March 19, to evaluate the war in Iraq on its third anniversary. Murtha, a decorated veteran and longtime hawk, has become a leading spokesman for his party on the war. And on the show, he spoke of what "probably worries me the most" about the U.S. effort in Iraq. The war, said Murtha, is a diversion from the global war on terror.

"There was no terrorism in Iraq before we went there," said Murtha. "None. There was no connection with al Qaeda, there was no connection with, with terrorism in Iraq itself." This is now the conventional wisdom on Iraq and terrorism. It is wrong.

A new study from the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk, Virginia, paints quite a different picture. According to captured documents cited in the study and first reported in THE WEEKLY STANDARD in January, the former Iraqi regime was training non-Iraqi Arabs in terrorist techniques.

Beginning in 1994, the Fedayeen Saddam opened its own paramilitary training camps for volunteers, graduating more than 7,200 "good men racing full with courage and enthusiasm" in the first year. Beginning in 1998, these camps began hosting "Arab volunteers from Egypt, Palestine, Jordan, 'the Gulf,' and Syria." It is not clear from available evidence where all of these non-Iraqi volunteers who were "sacrificing for the cause" went to ply their newfound skills. Before the summer of 2002, most volunteers went home upon the completion of training. But these camps were humming with frenzied activity in the months immediately prior to the war. As late as January 2003, the volunteers participated in a special training event called the "Heroes Attack." This training event was designed in part to prepare regional Fedayeen Saddam commands to "obstruct the enemy from achieving his goal and to support keeping peace and stability in the province."

Some of this training came under the auspices of the Iraqi Intelligence Service's "Division 27," which, according to the study, "supplied the Fedayeen Saddam with silencers, equipment for booby-trapping vehicles, [and] special training on the use of certain explosive timers. The only apparent use for all of this Division 27 equipment was to conduct commando or terrorist operations."

The publication of the Joint Forces Command study, called the "Iraqi Perspectives Project," coincides with the release by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence of several hundred documents captured in postwar Iraq. There are many more to come. Some of the documents used to complete the study have been made public as part of the ODNI effort; others have not.

It is early, but the emerging picture suggests that the U.S. intelligence community underestimated Saddam Hussein's interest in terrorism. One U.S. intelligence official, identified only as an "IC analyst" in the Senate Select Intelligence Committee report on Iraq, summarized the intelligence community's view on Iraq and terrorism with disarming candor: "I don't think we were really focused on the CT [counterterrorism] side, because we weren't concerned about the IIS [Iraqi Intelligence Service] going out and proactively conducting terrorist attacks. It wasn't until we realized that there was the possibility of going to war that we had to get a handle on that."

A report produced by the Senate Select Intelligence Committee, signed by all members of the Intelligence Committee, Democrats and Republicans, offered this withering assessment of the intelligence community's work on Iraq and terrorism:

The Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) did not have a focused human intelligence (HUMINT) collection strategy targeting Iraq's links to terrorism until 2002. The CIA had no [redacted] sources on the ground in Iraq reporting specifically on terrorism.

It wasn't just Iraq. "The CIA had no [redacted] credible reporting on the leadership of either the Iraqi regime or al Qaeda, which would have enabled it to better define a cooperative relationship, if any did in fact exist."

One document posted on the Internet by the government last week, after it was excerpted in the most recent issue of THE WEEKLY STANDARD, sheds additional light on the relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda. The internal Iraqi Intelligence memo was written at some point after January 1997 and described the efforts by the IIS to strengthen its relationships with four Saudi opposition groups. One of those groups was the "Reform and Advice Committee," run by Osama bin Laden. The New York Times reported that a Pentagon task force that studied the document concluded that it "appeared authentic." Last week, the investigative unit of ABC News summarized the document in a report.

A newly released prewar Iraqi document indicates that an official representative of Saddam Hussein's government met with Osama bin Laden in Sudan on February 19, 1995, after receiving approval from Saddam Hussein. Bin Laden asked that Iraq broadcast the lectures of Suleiman al Ouda, a radical Saudi preacher, and suggested "carrying out joint operations against foreign forces" in Saudi Arabia. According to the document, Saddam's presidency was informed of the details of the meeting on March 4, 1995, and Saddam agreed to dedicate a program for them on the radio. The document states that further "development of the relationship and cooperation between the two parties to be left according to what's open [in the future] based on dialogue and agreement on other ways of cooperation." The Sudanese were informed about the agreement to dedicate the program on the radio.

The report then states that "Saudi opposition figure" bin Laden had to leave Sudan in July 1996 after it was accused of harboring terrorists. It says information indicated he was in Afghanistan. "The relationship with him is still through the Sudanese. We're currently working on activating this relationship through a new channel in light of his current location," it states.

The summary was followed by an "Editor's Note" assessing the contents and meaning of the document.

This document is handwritten and has no official seal. Although contacts between bin Laden and the Iraqis have been reported in the 9/11 Commission report and elsewhere (e.g., the 9/11 report states "Bin Laden himself met with a senior Iraqi intelligence officer in Khartoum in late 1994 or early 1995) this document indicates the contacts were approved personally by Saddam Hussein.

It also indicates the discussions were substantive, in particular that bin Laden was proposing an operational relationship, and that the Iraqis were, at a minimum, interested in exploring a potential relationship and prepared to show good faith by broadcasting the speeches of al Ouda, the radical cleric who was also a bin Laden mentor.

The document does not establish that the two parties did in fact enter into an operational relationship. Given that the document claims bin Laden was proposing to the Iraqis that they conduct "joint operations against foreign forces" in Saudi Arabia, it is worth noting that eight months after the meeting--on November 13, 1995--terrorists attacked Saudi National Guard Headquarters in Riyadh, killing 5 U.S. military advisers. The militants later confessed on Saudi TV to having been trained by Osama bin Laden.

John Murtha's claim--that there was no connection "with terrorism in Iraq itself"--might come as a surprise to the 2nd Battalion, 23rd Marines. In early April 2003, they found a ten-acre terrorist training camp ten miles outside of Baghdad. In an interview at the time with an embedded reporter from Stars & Stripes, Captain Aaron Robertson said: "We believe this is a training camp where Iraqis trained forces for the Palestine Liberation Front. This is what we would refer to as a sensitive site. This is clearly a terrorist training camp, the type Iraq claimed did not exist."

Reporter Mark Oliva described the camp in detail:

About a dozen reinforced concrete buildings line the front edge with a large parade field, concrete and steel obstacle course and even a shooting range within its confines. The camp has many modern amenities, including running and heated water, a large kitchen and electricity. Some buildings had ceiling fans and central air conditioning.

Said Captain Robertson: "It's much more sophisticated than those training camps we found in Afghanistan. It has a permanent obstacle course, which rivals anything our Marines have back at Camp Pendleton."

The Marines recovered training manuals in Arabic and English, along with rosters of Palestinians trained there. Last week, the Office of the Director of National Intelligence released an Iraqi "intelligence-coded" memo that included lists of "Palestinians trained in Iraq." In fact, Saddam Hussein boasted of his support for Palestinian terrorists and provided the families of Palestinian "martyrs" rewards of $25,000. Another captured document details those payments.

DOJ_NMG_0021163

Among the documents released last week was a translation of a three-page Iraqi Intelligence memo regarding a wave of attacks to be conducted by the Saddam Fedayeen. The Office of the Director of National Intelligence website states that it cannot verify the authenticity of the posted documents, but the document appears to be similar to one described in the "Iraqi Perspectives Study." The undated document was apparently prepared in response to orders given on May 5, 1999.

According to those orders, the Fedayeen Saddam was "to start planning from now on to perform special operations (assassinations/bombings) for the centers and the traitor symbols in the fields of (London/Iran/self-ruled areas) and for coordination with the Intelligence service to secure deliveries, accommodations, and target guidance." The execution of the plan would take place in several steps. After the IIS selected 50 "fedayeen martyrs," they were to receive training at an IIS school. Those who passed the tests would be assigned targets. "The first ten will work in the European field (London). The second ten will be working in the Iranian field. The third will be working in the self-ruled field."

How many of these attacks were executed, if any? And who, exactly, were the non-Iraqi Arabs trained in Iraq beginning in 1998? Did some of them return to Iraq before the war? Are we fighting them still?

That is a distinct possibility. In an interview last month, David Dunford, a career foreign service officer who served as the chief U.S. government liaison to the post-Saddam Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Baghdad, described a document his team found in the abandoned ministry building. It was "a list of jihadists, for want of a better word, coming into Iraq from Saudi Arabia before the war," he said, unprompted. "That suggested to me that Saddam was planning the insurgency before the war."

One key element in shaping the conventional wisdom on Iraq and terrorism was the 9/11 Commission Report, which found that Iraq and al Qaeda had no "collaborative operational relationship." But the day that report was released, Commissioner John Lehman offered this prophetic warning in an interview with THE WEEKLY STANDARD: "There may well be--and probably will be--additional intelligence coming in from interrogations and from analysis of captured records and so forth which will fill out the intelligence picture. This is not phrased as, nor meant to be, the definitive word on Iraqi Intelligence activities."

The "Iraqi Perspectives Project" has provided a look at Iraqi support for terrorism through its analysis of captured documents. The interrogation of the military commander of Salman Pak, a terrorist training camp outside of Baghdad, is said to add to this picture. And then there is the provocative "Summary of Evidence" on an Iraqi detainee at Guantanamo. Based in part on an interrogation of the detainee, it was produced by the U.S. government and released last year.

1. From 1987 to 1989, the detainee served as an infantryman in the Iraqi Army and received training on the mortar and rocket propelled grenades.

2. A Taliban recruiter in Baghdad convinced the detainee to travel to Afghanistan to join the Taliban in 1994.

3. The detainee admitted he was a member of the Taliban.

4. The detainee pledged allegiance to the supreme leader of the Taliban to help them take over all of Afghanistan.

5. The Taliban issued the detainee a Kalashnikov rifle in November 2000.

6. The detainee worked in a Taliban ammo and arms storage arsenal in Mazar-E-Sharif organizing weapons and ammunition.

7. The detainee willingly associated with al Qaeda members.

8. The detainee was a member of al Qaeda.

9. An assistant to Usama Bin Ladin paid the detainee on three separate occasions between 1995 and 1997.

10. The detainee stayed at the al Farouq camp in Darwanta, Afghanistan, where he received 1,000 Rupees to continue his travels.

11. From 1997 to 1998, the detainee acted as a trusted agent for Usama Bin Ladin, executing three separate reconnaissance missions for the al Qaeda leader in Oman, Iraq, and Afghanistan.

12. In August 1998, the detainee traveled to Pakistan with a member of Iraqi Intelligence for the purpose of blowing up the Pakistan, United States and British embassies with chemical mortars.

13. Detainee was arrested by Pakistani authorities in Khudzar, Pakistan, in July 2002.

The Paper Trail (WSJ)

By Laurie Mylroie

DOJ_NMG_0021164

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

After substantial prodding -- including from this paper -- the U.S. government has finally begun to release its captured Iraqi documents and is posting them at the Web site of the Army's Foreign Military Studies Office. This material will take considerable time to absorb and analyze, but it may yet contribute significantly to our understanding of the nature of the threat Saddam Hussein posed.

Most dramatically, an Iraqi intelligence report, apparently written in early 1997, describes Iraqi efforts to establish ties with various elements in the Saudi opposition, including Osama bin Ladin. Until 1996, the Saudi renegade was based in Sudan, then ruled by Hassan Turabi's National Islamic Front. One of Iraq's few allies, Sudan served as an intermediary between Baghdad and bin Ladin, as well as other Islamic radicals. On Feb. 19, 1995, an Iraqi intelligence agent met with bin Ladin in Khartoum. Bin Ladin asked for two things: to carry out joint operations against foreign forces in Saudi Arabia and to broadcast the speeches of a radical Saudi cleric. Iraq agreed to the latter, but apparently not the former, at least as far as the author of this report knew. Notably, the report also states, "we are working at the present time to activate this relationship through new channels."

This one report hints at the extensive international presence that the Iraqi Intelligence Service (IIS) maintained. Iraq's ambassadors to Sudan and Yemen were intelligence agents, suggesting that those two countries were major centers of IIS activity. The report also mentions IIS stations in Islamabad, New Delhi and New York.

Another newly released document bears the name of Abu Musab al Zarqawi. It is a flyer from the "Committee for Arab Liaison with the Islamic Emirate" (i.e., Afghanistan) for recruiting volunteers in Iraq to fight in Afghanistan. It explains that the "Arab brothers" who wish to go there should send a written proposal "so that we can know him and his needs." Zarqawi is among six people listed as individuals to contact.

How close were relations between Iraq and the Taliban, a regime officially recognized by only three countries? The answer is necessary for understanding the nature of any ties Iraq may have had with al Qaeda or other Afghan-based Islamic groups. Hopefully, other documents will emerge to shed light on this question.

The formal cease-fire to the 1991 Gulf War required Iraq to recognize Kuwait and release the Kuwaiti hostages it had seized. Iraq did neither. On March 4, 2003, with war looming, Saddam's son, Qusay, ordered 448 Kuwaiti prisoners taken to sites the United States would likely attack. Nothing of their fate has been reported, and they may well have died. Iraq formally recognized Kuwait in 1994, but the official stationery of the Fedayeen Saddam in 2001 shows a map of Iraq that includes the state.

Other documents from this database were leaked some time ago. Perhaps because their provenance was not understood, these 30 pages did not receive the attention they merited. Particularly notable is an order issued by Saddam on Jan. 18, 1993: "hunt Americans on Arab territory, particularly in Somalia."

Most of these documents deal with terrorism and date from January to May 1993. They suggest that in early 1993, Saddam began to move actively to revive terrorist programs that had been established three years before, following Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. Responding to a request from Saddam, Iraqi intelligence produced a six-page report, listing the names and nationalities of 100 Arab "martyrs" whom it had trained in the fall of 1990.

Another report explains that the IIS had reached an agreement with the deputy head of Sudan's ruling National Islamic Front "to use the Islamic Arab elements that had been fighting in Afghanistan and now have no place to go and who are physically present in Sudan, Somalia and Egypt." The IIS also agreed with Khartoum to renew its relationship with Egyptian Islamic Jihad -- headed by Ayman al Zawahiri, familiar as al Qaeda's most prominent contemporary spokesman.

Still another report describes Iraq's earlier agreement with Islamic Jihad, concluded on Dec. 24, 1990, as the start of the Gulf war loomed. Iraq was to provide training, financing and supplies to the organization "to execute martyr operations" against the members of the U.S.-led coalition, of which Egypt was a key Arab member. However, as this document explains, those operations stopped immediately after the cease-fire.

In 1993, Iraq was cautious about backing Egyptian terrorists, more so than the Sudanese. When Khartoum informed Baghdad that it was sending an Islamic Jihad leader, who had been based in Afghanistan and then lived in Sudan, to Iraq on a Sudanese plane carrying meat (this exemption from the general ban on flights to Iraq was granted by the U.N. Security Council), the IIS asked that the visit be postponed. Sudan insisted, and the IIS approved on condition the visit be kept secret. Subsequently, the IIS recommended that assistance to the Egyptian group be limited to financial support.

Two documents relate to Iraq's proscribed WMD programs. One is a table, providing details of a Sept. 6, 2000, contract for the production of "the malignant pustule" -- the Pentagon official who leaked these documents believed it referred to anthrax -- along with earlier contracts for sterilization and decontamination equipment. Another table describes an Aug. 21, 2000, contract for the production of mustard gas and earlier contracts for protective equipment. Small amounts of material are mentioned: three ampules of "the malignant pustule" (an ampule is a small, sealed glass vial) and five kilograms of mustard gas. These contracts could have represented test runs, or, as a former U.N. weapons inspector suggested to me, the material could have been intended for terrorism.

Many more documents are to be released in the coming months. Quite possibly, they will vindicate the decision to undertake the Iraq war; help maintain public support for fighting it; and radically change our understanding of Saddam's role in international terrorism.

A Doug Feith Democrat? (NEWREP)

By Spencer Ackerman

New Republic, March 27, 2006

John Kerry's military record may have done him little good in the 2004 election, but that hasn't stopped Democratic congressional candidates who have worn the uniform from becoming the political phenom of this election season. All told, there are over 50 Democratic veterans running for Congress in November. But, even for liberals who treat every one of the so-called Fighting Dems as a conquering hero, Chris Carney's candidacy is something of a coup. He's nowhere near as high-profile as such candidates as the now-flamed-out Paul Hackett of Ohio or the much-praised Tammy Duckworth of Illinois; in fact, he hasn't served in Iraq. But he has a much more provocative bullet point on his resumé: From 2002 to 2004, Carney served as a counterterrorism analyst for the Bush administration.

For some Democrats, it's as if Richard Clarke decided to run for Congress. Last month, Markos Moulitsas Zúniga of the liberal überblog Daily Kos expressed his excitement that "someone who was in the boardroom helping plan and execute the nation's counterterrorism efforts would decide to 1) run for office, and 2) run as a Democrat," and he treated Carney to a fawning interview on Air America. Enthusiasm for Carney has spread beyond the blogosphere. After visiting a Carney rally in this rural and heavily Republican Pennsylvania district--where the naval reservist is challenging four-term incumbent Don Sherwood--Time's Joe Klein wrote that he could be "Karl Rove's worst nightmare."

Indeed, armed with his counterterrorism experience, Carney might have strong enough national security bona fides to safely navigate Pennsylvania's conservative 10th District, where the president took 60 percent of the vote in 2004--and where a sign just outside Honesdale warns either you support the troops and their mission or you support the terrorists. For the 50 or so seasoned Democrats who gathered at Ann Bursis's house here in Wayne County on Saturday afternoon, Carney is practically a godsend. Mostly middle-aged or retired, Bursis's friends and neighbors can barely remember the last time they had a promising candidate. And they're hungry for someone to take on President Bush. When Carney calls for bringing troops home from Iraq, his audience listens raptly. The president, Carney says to applause, has "been telling untruths about Iraq" while Republicans on Capitol Hill--especially Sherwood--abet him. "That's why you need guys like me in Congress."

But Carney's Democratic supporters, both in the 10th District and across the country, are apparently unaware of one very odd fact about his candidacy: Carney supported and helped propagate one of the war's most dubious premises--that Saddam Hussein was working closely with Al Qaeda. And these supporters are probably unaware of an even odder fact: Despite seeking an end to the war, Carney still believes it.

Carney is a middle-aged Susquehanna County resident with an inviting and easygoing demeanor. In 2001, he was a political science professor at Penn State's Scranton campus and an intelligence officer in the Navy Reserve. After the September 11 attacks, he was mobilized for the invasion of Afghanistan. But, in early February 2002, he was "called upstairs" to the Pentagon, where he and a Defense Intelligence Agency analyst named Christina Shelton were detailed to the office of then-Undersecretary of Defense Douglas Feith. Their assignment: to scrutinize the CIA's assessment of Iraq's connection to Al Qaeda.

The CIA maintained that, while there had been furtive contacts between Al Qaeda terrorists and Iraqi intelligence for years, the relationship hardly constituted an alliance. Feith, a longtime supporter of ousting Saddam, wasn't so sure. Carney says he was never instructed to find evidence of a relationship. But, he adds, "Remember the time frame--9/11 was fresh in everyone's minds. I'm not trying to apologize for the administration, Feith, or anyone else, but there was a lot of concern that we weren't going to get caught out again" by another attack. So Carney and Shelton put together a briefing, based largely on data that the majority of the intelligence community considered dubious or trivial, asserting a significant link between Saddam and bin Laden.

Carney's briefing made its way through the Pentagon and CIA, and, ultimately, it was shown to Stephen Hadley, then the deputy national security adviser. A key section was titled "Fundamental Problems with How Intelligence Community is Assessing Information." While Carney denies that his briefing suggested that policymakers ignore CIA skepticism, it clearly reinforced the feeling among senior administration officials that the CIA was hopelessly dovish. And, in the fall of 2002, they made numerous public statements that far outpaced the intelligence community's assessment of Iraq-Al Qaeda ties: Donald Rumsfeld called evidence of the connection "bulletproof," and Bush said, "You can't distinguish between Al Qaeda and Saddam when you talk about the war on terror."

Even Carney, who still maintains there was a connection, thinks the administration and its allies went too far. "Not 'bulletproof,' certainly," he says of the evidence. "Look, the way the analysis was going was on a sliding scale--from absolutely no relationship on one extreme to cooperative operational relationship on the other. What we saw was in the middle." Later, he elaborates, "There was some relationship of opportunity there. We know there was some high-level contact. What we don't know is what, if anything, evolved from those contacts."

His position, however, is no longer tenable: The 9/11 Commission concluded that "we have seen no evidence that these or the earlier contacts ever developed into a collaborative operational relationship." (Carney thinks the commissioners "underplayed" the connection--hopefully, he adds vaguely, not due to "political pressures.") But Carney remains unrepentant. "I don't think I have any more responsibility for the war than any other analyst," he says.

But that's more detail than most Democrats want. What's important to them is that Carney now largely considers the war a mistake. "In the long run, I'm not sure we've benefited tremendously from it, and it may have created greater animosity than we otherwise would have, from things like Abu Ghraib and other missteps the military and the administration made," he admits. "Those things don't help alleviate the terrorist problem." As a result, a major aspect of Carney's platform is his call to withdraw a U.S. battalion for every Iraqi battalion that completes training and is certified as combat-ready.

Besides, for hyperpartisan Democrats like Moulitsas, only one thing really matters: A Republican candidate is vulnerable. Indeed, Sherwood has suffered significant ethical lapses that have left a bad taste in the mouths of voters--namely, a five-year affair with a woman half his age, who once called the police to claim Sherwood was abusing her. (Sherwood contends the incident in question was the result of an overly aggressive backrub.) By the time the case was settled out of court last fall, Sherwood's poll numbers had fallen, creating an opportunity for Carney. That may not be a solid enough foundation to win the race. But, compared with the Iraq-Al Qaeda connection, it's practically bulletproof.

Bush Was Set On Path To War, Memo By British Adviser Says (NYT)

By Don Van Natta Jr.

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

LONDON — In the weeks before the United States-led invasion of Iraq, as the United States and Britain pressed for a second United Nations resolution condemning Iraq, President Bush's public ultimatum to Saddam Hussein was blunt: Disarm or face war.

But behind closed doors, the president was certain that war was inevitable. During a private two-hour meeting in the Oval Office on Jan. 31, 2003, he made clear to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain that he was determined to invade Iraq without the second resolution, or even if international arms inspectors failed to find unconventional weapons, said a confidential memo about the meeting written by Mr. Blair's top foreign policy adviser and reviewed by The New York Times.

"Our diplomatic strategy had to be arranged around the military planning," David Manning, Mr. Blair's chief foreign policy adviser at the time, wrote in the memo that summarized the discussion between Mr. Bush, Mr. Blair and six of their top aides.

"The start date for the military campaign was now penciled in for 10 March," Mr. Manning wrote, paraphrasing the president. "This was when the bombing would begin."

The timetable came at an important diplomatic moment. Five days after the Bush-Blair meeting, Secretary of State Colin L. Powell was scheduled to appear before the United Nations to present the American evidence that Iraq posed a threat to world security by hiding unconventional weapons.

Although the United States and Britain aggressively sought a second United Nations resolution against Iraq — which they failed to obtain — the president said repeatedly that he did not believe he needed it for an invasion.

Stamped "extremely sensitive," the five-page memorandum, which was circulated among a handful of Mr. Blair's most senior aides, had not been made public. Several highlights were first published in January in the book "Lawless World," which was written by a British lawyer and international law professor, Philippe Sands. In early February, Channel 4 in London first broadcast several excerpts from the memo.

Since then, The New York Times has reviewed the five-page memo in its entirety. While the president's sentiments about invading Iraq were known at the time, the previously unreported material offers an unfiltered view of two leaders on the brink of war, yet supremely confident.

The memo indicates the two leaders envisioned a quick victory and a transition to a new Iraqi government that would be complicated, but manageable. Mr. Bush predicted that it was "unlikely there would be internecine warfare between the different religious and ethnic groups." Mr. Blair agreed with that assessment.

The memo also shows that the president and the prime minister acknowledged that no unconventional weapons had been found inside Iraq. Faced with the possibility of not finding any before the planned invasion, Mr. Bush talked about several ways to provoke a confrontation, including a proposal to paint a United States surveillance plane in the colors of the United Nations in hopes of drawing fire, or assassinating Mr. Hussein.

Those proposals were first reported last month in the British press, but the memo does not make clear whether they reflected Mr. Bush's extemporaneous suggestions, or were elements of the government's plan.

Consistent Remarks

Two senior British officials confirmed the authenticity of the memo, but declined to talk further about it, citing Britain's Official Secrets Act, which made it illegal to divulge classified information. But one of them said, "In all of this discussion during the run-up to the Iraq war, it is obvious that viewing a snapshot at a certain point in time gives only a partial view of the decision-making process."

On Sunday, Frederick Jones, the spokesman for the National Security Council, said the president's public comments were consistent with his private remarks made to Mr. Blair. "While the use of force was a last option, we recognized that it might be necessary and were planning accordingly," Mr. Jones said.

"The public record at the time, including numerous statements by the President, makes clear that the administration was continuing to pursue a diplomatic solution into 2003," he said. "Saddam Hussein was given every opportunity to comply, but he chose continued defiance, even after being given one final opportunity to comply or face serious consequences. Our public and private comments are fully consistent."

The January 2003 memo is the latest in a series of secret memos produced by top aides to Mr. Blair that summarize private discussions between the president and the prime minister. Another group of British memos, including the so-called Downing Street memo written in July 2002, showed that some senior British officials had been concerned that the United States was determined to invade Iraq, and that the "intelligence and facts were being fixed around the policy" by the Bush administration to fit its desire to go to war.

DOJ_NMG_0021168

The latest memo is striking in its characterization of frank, almost casual, conversation by Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair about the most serious subjects. At one point, the leaders swapped ideas for a postwar Iraqi government. "As for the future government of Iraq, people would find it very odd if we handed it over to another dictator," the prime minister is quoted as saying.

"Bush agreed," Mr. Manning wrote. This exchange, like most of the quotations in this article, have not been previously reported.

Mr. Bush was accompanied at the meeting by Condoleezza Rice, who was then the national security adviser; Dan Fried, a senior aide to Ms. Rice; and Andrew H. Card Jr., the White House chief of staff. Along with Mr. Manning, Mr. Blair was joined by two other senior aides: Jonathan Powell, his chief of staff, and Matthew Rycroft, a foreign policy aide and the author of the Downing Street memo.

By late January 2003, United Nations inspectors had spent six weeks in Iraq hunting for weapons under the auspices of Security Council Resolution 1441, which authorized "serious consequences" if Iraq voluntarily failed to disarm. Led by Hans Blix, the inspectors had reported little cooperation from Mr. Hussein, and no success finding any unconventional weapons.

At their meeting, Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair candidly expressed their doubts that chemical, biological or nuclear weapons would be found in Iraq in the coming weeks, the memo said. The president spoke as if an invasion was unavoidable. The two leaders discussed a timetable for the war, details of the military campaign and plans for the aftermath of the war.

Discussing Provocation

Without much elaboration, the memo also says the president raised three possible ways of provoking a confrontation. Since they were first reported last month, neither the White House nor the British government has discussed them.

"The U.S. was thinking of flying U2 reconnaissance aircraft with fighter cover over Iraq, painted in U.N. colours," the memo says, attributing the idea to Mr. Bush. "If Saddam fired on them, he would be in breach."

It also described the president as saying, "The U.S. might be able to bring out a defector who could give a public presentation about Saddam's W.M.D," referring to weapons of mass destruction.

A brief clause in the memo refers to a third possibility, mentioned by Mr. Bush, a proposal to assassinate Saddam Hussein. The memo does not indicate how Mr. Blair responded to the idea.

Mr. Sands first reported the proposals in his book, although he did not use any direct quotations from the memo. He is a professor of international law at University College of London and the founding member of the Matrix law office in London, where the prime minister's wife, Cherie Blair, is a partner.

Mr. Jones, the National Security Council spokesman, declined to discuss the proposals, saying, "We are not going to get into discussing private discussions of the two leaders."

At several points during the meeting between Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair, there was palpable tension over finding a legitimate legal trigger for going to war that would be acceptable to other nations, the memo said. The prime minister was quoted as saying it was essential for both countries to lobby for a second United Nations resolution against Iraq, because it would serve as "an insurance policy against the unexpected."

The memo said Mr. Blair told Mr. Bush, "If anything went wrong with the military campaign, or if Saddam increased the stakes by burning the oil wells, killing children or fomenting internal divisions within Iraq, a second resolution would give us international cover, especially with the Arabs."

Running Out of Time

Mr. Bush agreed that the two countries should attempt to get a second resolution, but he added that time was running out. "The U.S. would put its full weight behind efforts to get another resolution and would twist arms and even threaten," Mr. Bush was paraphrased in the memo as saying.

The document added, "But he had to say that if we ultimately failed, military action would follow anyway."

The leaders agreed that three weeks remained to obtain a second United Nations Security Council resolution before military commanders would need to begin preparing for an invasion.

Summarizing statements by the president, the memo says: "The air campaign would probably last four days, during which some 1,500 targets would be hit. Great care would be taken to avoid hitting innocent civilians. Bush thought the impact of the air onslaught would ensure the early collapse of Saddam's regime. Given this military timetable, we needed to go for a second resolution as soon as possible. This probably meant after Blix's next report to the Security Council in mid-February."

Mr. Blair was described as responding that both countries would make clear that a second resolution amounted to "Saddam's final opportunity." The memo described Mr. Blair as saying: "We had been very patient. Now we should be saying that the crisis must be resolved in weeks, not months."

It reported: "Bush agreed. He commented that he was not itching to go to war, but we could not allow Saddam to go on playing with us. At some point, probably when we had passed the second resolutions — assuming we did — we should warn Saddam that he had a week to leave. We should notify the media too. We would then have a clear field if Saddam refused to go."

Mr. Bush devoted much of the meeting to outlining the military strategy. The president, the memo says, said the planned air campaign "would destroy Saddam's command and control quickly." It also said that he expected Iraq's army to "fold very quickly." He also is reported as telling the prime minister that the Republican Guard would be "decimated by the bombing."

Despite his optimism, Mr. Bush said he was aware that "there were uncertainties and risks," the memo says, and it goes on, "As far as destroying the oil wells were concerned, the U.S. was well equipped to repair them quickly, although this would be easier in the south of Iraq than in the north."

The two men briefly discussed plans for a post-Hussein Iraqi government. "The prime minister asked about aftermath planning," the memo says. "Condi Rice said that a great deal of work was now in hand.

Referring to the Defense Department, it said: "A planning cell in D.O.D. was looking at all aspects and would deploy to Iraq to direct operations as soon as the military action was over. Bush said that a great deal of detailed planning had been done on supplying the Iraqi people with food and medicine."

Planning for After the War

The leaders then looked beyond the war, imagining the transition from Mr. Hussein's rule to a new government. Immediately after the war, a military occupation would be put in place for an unknown period of time, the president was described as saying. He spoke of the "dilemma of managing the transition to the civil administration," the memo says.

The document concludes with Mr. Manning still holding out a last-minute hope of inspectors finding weapons in Iraq, or even Mr. Hussein voluntarily leaving Iraq. But Mr. Manning wrote that he was concerned this could not be accomplished by Mr. Bush's timeline for war.

"This makes the timing very tight," he wrote. "We therefore need to stay closely alongside Blix, do all we can to help the inspectors make a significant find, and work hard on the other members of the Security Council to accept the noncooperation case so that we can secure the minimum nine votes when we need them, probably the end of February."

At a White House news conference following the closed-door session, Mr. Bush and Mr. Blair said "the crisis" had to be resolved in a timely manner. "Saddam Hussein is not disarming," the president told reporters. "He is a danger to the world. He must disarm. And that's why I have constantly said — and the prime minister has constantly said — this issue will come to a head in a matter of weeks, not months."

Despite intense lobbying by the United States and Britain, a second United Nations resolution was not obtained. The American-led military coalition invaded Iraq on March 19, 2003, nine days after the target date set by the president on that late January day at the White House.

New Body Armor Shelved In Iraq (WT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

HUSAYBAH, Iraq (AP) -- Extra body armor -- the lack of which caused a political storm in the United States -- has flooded in to Iraq, but many Marines here promptly stuck it in lockers or under bunks. Too heavy and cumbersome, many say.

Marines already carry loads as heavy as 70 pounds when they patrol the dangerous streets in towns and villages in restive Anbar province. The new armor plates, although only about 5 pounds per set, are not worth carrying for the additional safety they are said to provide, some say.

DOJ_NMG_0021170

"We have to climb over walls and go through windows," said Sgt. Justin Shank. "I understand the more armor, the safer you are. But it makes you slower. People don't understand that this is combat, and people are going to die."

Staff Sgt. Thomas Bain shared concerns about the extra pounds.

"Before you know it, they're going to get us injured because we're hauling too much weight and don't have enough mobility to maneuver in a fight from house to house," said Staff Sgt. Bain, who is assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 6th Marine Regiment. "I think we're starting to go overboard on the armor."

Since the insurgency erupted in Iraq, the Pentagon has been criticized for supplying insufficient armor for Humvees and too few bulletproof vests. In one remarkable incident, soldiers publicly confronted Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld about the problem on live television.

Hometown groups across the United States have since raised money to send extra armor to troops, and the Pentagon, under congressional pressure, launched a program in October to reimburse troops who had purchased armor with their own money.

Soldiers and their parents spent hundreds, sometimes thousands, of dollars on armor until the Pentagon began issuing the new protective gear.

In Staff Sgt. Bain's platoon of about 35 men, Marines said only three or four wore the plates after commanders distributed them last month and told them that use was optional.

Top military officials, including Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey, acknowledge the concerns over weight and mobility but have urged that the new gear be mandatory.

"That's going to add weight, of course," Mr. Harvey said. "You've read where certain soldiers aren't happy about that. But we think it's in their best interest to do this."

Marines have shown a special aversion to the new plates because they tend to patrol on foot, sometimes conducting two patrols each day that last several hours. They feel the extra weight.

In Euphrates River cities from Ramadi and Romanna, lance corporals to captains have complained about the added weight and lack of mobility. But some commanders have refused to listen. In the former insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, for example, commanders require use of the plates.

Last year, a study by the Armed Forces Medical Examiner said dozens of Marines killed by wounds to the torso might have survived had the larger plates been in use.

"I'm sure people who ... lost kidneys would have loved to have had them on," said 2nd Lt. William Oren, who wears the plates. "More armor isn't the answer to all our problems. But I'll recommend them because it's more protection."

Some Marines have chosen to wear the plates, particularly those in more vulnerable jobs, such as Humvee turret gunners. But many think the politics of the issue eventually will make the plates mandatory.

"The reason they issued [the plates], I think, is to make people back home feel better," said Lance Cpl. Philip Tootle. "I'm not wishing they wouldn't have issued them. I'm just wishing that they wouldn't make them mandatory."

Afghan Case Dropped But Not Closed (LAT)

Court dismisses charges against a Christian convert whose trial caused outrage. He reportedly will be examined in a hospital.

KABUL, Afghanistan — After days of international outcry, an Afghan court has dismissed the case against a man threatened with being put to death for having converted from Islam to Christianity, a court official said Sunday.

The charges of apostasy against Abdur Rahman, a 41-year-old medical aid worker, were being dropped for lack of evidence, said Abdul Wakil Omari, a spokesman for the Afghan Supreme Court.

"It has been sent back to prosecutors," Omari said of the case. He said questions had also been raised about Rahman's mental fitness and whether he held foreign citizenship, which could place him outside the jurisdiction of the Afghan courts. On the radio today, Omari said Rahman would be sent to a hospital for examination. Local media had reported that Rahman, who lived outside Afghanistan for a number of years, might be released and expelled from the country soon.

Rahman's trial had galvanized foreign governments and international activists, who called on Afghanistan to respect religious freedom. On Thursday, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Afghan President Hamid Karzai and urged him "in the strongest terms" to secure Rahman's release. Rice also brought up Rahman's case in meetings with Afghanistan's foreign minister last week. President Bush has described himself as "deeply troubled" by the trial.

The Vatican, European human rights groups and several other governments also have urged that Rahman be released.

Sharia, or Islamic law, considers converts to be apostates, and calls for the death penalty unless they return to Islam. During a civil child custody case, it was disclosed that Rahman had converted to Christianity 16 years ago.

Omari, the court spokesman, cited two factors for the case's dismissal: signs that Rahman might be mentally disturbed and the possibility that he had become a German citizen.

"Rahman's daughter and uncle gave evidence that Abdur Rahman is mentally ill," Omari said. "The prosecutors said that when they asked him questions, he was sometimes speaking to himself and muttering, and when they asked, 'What are you saying,' he said, 'I am speaking with God.' So the prosecutors have to provide more evidence to bring the case back to the court."

In addition, Omari said, "we don't know whether he has German citizenship or not. If he does, we cannot prosecute him in Afghanistan."

If Rahman is released and the case is ended, "it will be a very good thing," Stephen J. Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, said in an interview on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The case has put pressure on both Bush and Karzai.

Conservative Christians, who form a significant part of Bush's political base, have pressed the administration to win freedom for Rahman and sought to turn the case into a test of the merits of Bush's policies overseas.

On Sunday, the Family Research Council, a prominent conservative group based in Washington, issued a statement noting the reports that Rahman would be released and calling on Bush to "secure a clear understanding of religious freedom" from Karzai's government.

Abdur Rahman's "imprisonment has revealed a major fault in our foreign policy. If we can't secure the most basic of human rights, Americans will increasingly question whether we should continue the expenditure of lives and resources in these countries," the statement said.

Rice, in a television interview broadcast Sunday, sought to rebut the idea that Rahman's case had shown U.S. intervention in Afghanistan to be futile. "This is a country that has come an enormous way in four years," she said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I am, I hate to say, 51 years old, but it's in my lifetime that black Americans were guaranteed the right to vote. Who are we to be so, so insistent that people must do this overnight?" she said. "We're working with the Afghan government. They're moving in a democratic fashion. It's going to be hard."

For Karzai, releasing Rahman could intensify criticism that the Afghan leader and his government are puppets of the U.S. The case has been seen here as a test of Afghanistan's independence from foreign, especially American, interference.

Afghanistan's constitution simultaneously embraces religious liberty and Sharia. Although federal law allows for freedom of religion, it is silent on the specific question of conversion and whether that ought to be a matter for Islamic law to decide. But even moderate Muslim clerics, as well as members of Rahman's own family, have said that death is the only fair and logical punishment for him.

In media accounts, Rahman has said that he converted to Christianity in Pakistan, where he worked with a Christian aid organization. He reportedly spent time in Iran, Russia and Germany before returning to his native land three years ago.

Described in local newspaper profiles as a divorced father and a shiftless man with a history of mental imbalance, Rahman apparently walked into a police station last month to file a domestic complaint and declared that he was a Christian. That triggered the case against him.

In an interview published Sunday in the Italian newspaper La Repubblica, Rahman said he was at peace and prepared to die for his beliefs.

DOJ_NMG_0021172

"I have full awareness of what I have chosen. If I must die, I will die," Rahman said in response to questions that the Rome-based newspaper passed to him through a human rights worker.

Rahman's trial laid bare the tension surrounding the role of religion in society here after the fall of the Taliban and its hard-line policies. Islam continues to dominate daily life, and on many social matters, such as the drinking of alcohol, its teachings remain the rule.

Many Afghans say that Rahman must pay the ultimate price for his renunciation of Islam, and have vowed to kill him themselves if he is released. Such high passions at home thrust the Afghan government into a difficult position, forced to weigh domestic pressures against the outrage of Western countries that have poured billions of dollars into rebuilding this war-torn nation.

There were signs last week, however, that Karzai's government was seeking a way out. On Thursday, after a telephone conversation with Karzai, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper said the Afghan leader had assured him a solution would be "worked out quickly."

Special correspondent Zaman reported from Kabul and staff writer Chu from New Delhi.

Mental Health Evaluation May Derail Case Against Afghan Convert To Christianity (NYT)

By Sultan M. Munadi

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 26 — The case of an Afghan man facing the death penalty for converting to Christianity was returned to prosecutors on Sunday because of "investigative gaps," a move that will delay, if not scuttle, an investigation that has created an international uproar.

Court officials said the mental health of the defendant, Abdul Rahman, 41, would be evaluated. Although prosecutors vowed to continue the case, a finding of mental illness by public health authorities could thwart their effort.

The case has become a flash point in the Afghan government's attempt to balance democratic freedoms with Islamic religious law, both of which are enshrined in the new Constitution. The Bush administration has pressed President Hamid Karzai to resolve the case, but Mr. Karzai has resisted, citing separation of executive and judicial powers.

The court said two of Mr. Rahman's relatives, a daughter and a cousin, had told the court that Mr. Rahman had mental problems, according to Abdul Wakil Omari, a spokesman for the Supreme Court.

"Also, during his preliminary court hearing, he had said that he was hearing strange voices and that he was not feeling well spiritually," Mr. Omari said.

But the prosecutor, Abdul Wasei, said he doubted the claim. "I did not see any kind of mental problem in this case," he said. He said that Mr. Rahman, when asked about his mental health, insisted that it was fine.

"I am O.K., you can prosecute me, I can answer your questions," Mr. Wasei said Mr. Rahman told him.

If a hospital examination bears that out, Mr. Wasei said, he expects to have the case back before the court in a week.

But if Mr. Rahman is found to be mentally ill, Mr. Wasei conceded in an interview, "that's another thing and of course things will change."

Mr. Wasei dismissed as inaccurate press reports that Mr. Rahman was about to be released. "When his mental examination is finished, maybe he will be released," he said. "But I don't see any possibility of his being released before that."

The court also raised questions about Mr. Rahman's nationality. Mr. Rahman had lived abroad, in Germany, Greece and Belgium. If he acquired dual nationality, the status of his case could change, said Mr. Omari, the Supreme Court official.

The case began as a domestic dispute, when Mr. Rahman's family opposed his attempt to regain custody of his two daughters. In the course of the investigation, family members told the authorities that Mr. Rahman had converted to Christianity 15 years ago.

Afghanistan's 2004 Constitution grants citizens religious freedom, but also declares Islam the supreme law. Although the criminal code does not specifically forbid converting from Islam to Christianity, Islamic law considers it apostasy, a sin punishable by death, according to conservative clerics and the prosecution in this case.

President Bush, who had been accused by Christian conservatives of being too slow respond to the case, called for Afghan officials last week to "honor the universal principle of freedom."

But Saturday, after President Karzai met with his advisers on religious affairs, an adviser reaffirmed Mr. Karzai's intention to leave the case to the courts.

"Our Constitution says that the judiciary power is independent, and the president has signed the Constitution," said the adviser, Moulavi Balooch. "We cannot intervene in this case, and it is up to the judges and the court what to do with it."

A finding of mental incompetence, followed by Mr. Rahman's leaving the country, had been floated by moderate Afghan officials as a possible compromise.

Case Against Afghan Christian Tossed (USAT/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, The Associated Press

USA Today, March 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — A court on Sunday dismissed the case against an Afghan man facing a possible death penalty for converting from Islam to Christianity, Supreme Court spokesman Abdul WakilOmeri said.

The court's decision could touch off protests across Afghanistan, warned Faiez Mohammed, a Sunni Muslim leader in the northern city of Kunduz. A provision in Afghanistan's Islamic-based laws calls for the execution of Muslims who abandon the faith. “There will be big protests across Afghanistan,” Mohammed said. “This has shamed Afghanistan in the eyes of other Muslim countries.”

Abdul Rahman, 41, became a Christian in the 1990s while working for an aid group in Pakistan. He was arrested in Afghanistan last month after police discovered him with a Bible.

The case set off an outcry in the United States and other nations that helped oust the Taliban regime in late 2001 and provide aid and military support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. President Bush and his counterparts in Germany and Canada have insisted Afghanistan protect personal beliefs.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday on CNN's Late Edition that the U.S. government had stressed to Karzai that religious freedom is a vital element of democracy.

“We're going to stand firm for the principle that religious freedom and freedom of religious conscience need to be upheld, and we are hoping for a favorable resolution in this case,” Rice said.

Rahman was moved to Kabul's high-security Policharki Prison on Friday after inmates at a jail in central Kabul threatened him, said Policharki's warden, Gen. Shahmir Amirpur. Officials on Sunday gave the Associated Press a tour of Policharki, which houses about 2,000 inmates, including about 350 Taliban and al-Qaeda militants.

Amirpur said Rahman had been asking guards for a Bible, but they had none to give him. “He looks very calm. But he keeps saying he is hearing voices,” Amirpur said.

Rahman was in solitary confinement next to a senior prison guard's office. AP was shown the cell but was barred from communicating with him.

Amirpur vouched for the prisoner's safety. “We are watching him constantly. This is a very sensitive case, so he needs high security.”

Omeri, the Supreme Court spokesman, said the case was dismissed because of “problems with the prosecutors' evidence.” He said several of Rahman's relatives testified he is mentally unstable.

Afghan Man Saved From Execution (WT/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A court yesterday dismissed the case against an Afghan man facing execution for converting from Islam to Christianity, officials said, paving the way for his release.

The move eased pressure from the West, but raised the issue of protecting Abdul Rahman after his release, as Islamic clerics have called for him to be killed.

DOJ_NMG_0021174

One official said freedom might come as soon as today for Mr. Rahman, who became a Christian in the 1990s while working for an aid group in neighboring Pakistan.

Muslim extremists, who have demanded death for Mr. Rahman as an apostate for rejecting Islam, warned the decision would touch off protests across the country. Some clerics previously vowed to incite Afghans to kill Mr. Rahman if he was let go.

Mr. Rahman was moved to Kabul's notorious high-security Policharki prison Friday after inmates at a jail in central Kabul threatened him, according to Policharki's warden, Gen. Shahmir Amirpur.

Gen. Amirpur said Mr. Rahman had been asking guards for a Bible, but they had none to give him. "He looks very calm. But he keeps saying he is hearing voices," Gen. Amirpur said.

Mr. Rahman was in solitary confinement in a tiny concrete cell next to a senior prison guard's office. A reporter who toured the prison was shown the cell door, but was barred from speaking or otherwise communicating with him.

A senior guard said inmates and many guards had not been told of Mr. Rahman's identity because of fears they might attack him.

But Gen. Amirpur vouched for the prisoner's safety. "We are watching him constantly. This is a very sensitive case so he needs high security."

The case set off an outcry in the United States and other nations that helped oust the hard-line Taliban regime in late 2001 and provide aid and military support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. President Bush and others insisted Afghanistan protect personal beliefs.

A Supreme Court spokesman, Abdul Wakil Omeri, said the case had been dismissed because of "problems with the prosecutors' evidence." He said several of Mr. Rahman's relatives testified he is mentally unstable and prosecutors have to "decide if he is mentally fit to stand trial."

Another Afghan official involved with the case said the court ruled there was insufficient evidence and returned the case to prosecutors for further investigation. But he said Mr. Rahman would be released in the meantime.

"The court dismissed today the case against Abdul Rahman for a lack of information and a lot of legal gaps in the case," the official said.

"The decision about his release will be taken possibly tomorrow," the official added. "They don't have to keep him in jail while the attorney general is looking into the case."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who said she had not received official confirmation from Afghan authorities, told Fox News the announcement was "a very good step forward."

She said on CNN's "Late Edition" that the U.S. government had stressed to Mr. Karzai that religious freedom is a vital element of democracy.

"We're going to stand firm for the principle that religious freedom and freedom of religious conscience need to be upheld, and we are hoping for a favorable resolution in this case," Miss Rice said.

The uproar left Mr. Karzai in an awkward position. While trying to address concerns of foreign supporters, he also has sought not to alienate Islamic hard-liners, who wield considerable influence in Afghanistan.

The court's decision was sure to anger at least some of the clerics who have strongly demanded that authorities enforce a provision in the country's Islamic-based laws calling for the execution of Muslims who abandon the faith.

"There will be big protests across Afghanistan," said Faiez Mohammed, a Sunni Muslim leader in the northern city of Kunduz. "This has shamed Afghanistan in the eyes of other Muslim countries."

A Western diplomat, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, said it wasn't clear whether the 41-year-old Mr. Rahman would be able to stay in Afghanistan or would have to move abroad.

Afghan Convert's Case Dismissed (WP)

By Daniel Cooney

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 26 -- A court on Sunday dismissed the case against an Afghan man facing possible execution for converting from Islam to Christianity, officials said, paving the way for his release.

DOJ_NMG_0021175

Abdul Rahman, who became a Christian in the 1990s while working for an aid group in neighboring Pakistan, might be freed as soon as Monday, an official said.

Muslim extremists had demanded death for Rahman, branding him an apostate for rejecting Islam, and warned Sunday that the court decision would touch off protests across this religiously conservative country. Some clerics had previously vowed to incite Afghans to kill Rahman if he was released.

Rahman was moved on Friday to the notorious, high-security Policharki Prison outside the capital after inmates at a jail in central Kabul threatened him, according to Gen. Shahmir Amirpur, the warden.

Authorities have barred journalists from seeing Rahman. Policharki houses some 2,000 inmates, including about 350 Taliban and al-Qaeda militants.

Amirpur said Rahman had been asking guards for a Bible but they had none to give him.

"He looks very calm. But he keeps saying he is hearing voices," Amirpur said.

A senior guard said inmates and many guards had not been told of Rahman's identity because of fears they might attack him. Rahman was in solitary confinement in a tiny concrete cell next to a senior prison guard's office.

Amirpur vouched for the prisoner's safety. "We are watching him constantly," he said. "This is a very sensitive case, so he needs high security."

Rahman's prosecution set off an outcry in the United States and other nations that helped oust the hard-line Taliban regime in late 2001 and provide aid and military support for Afghan President Hamid Karzai. President Bush and others insisted that Afghanistan should act to protect personal beliefs.

A Supreme Court spokesman, Abdul Wakil Omeri, said the case had been dismissed because of "problems with the prosecutors' evidence." He said several of Rahman's relatives testified that he was mentally unstable and prosecutors would have to decide if he was mentally fit to stand trial.

Another Afghan official closely involved with the case said the court ruled that there was insufficient evidence and returned the case to prosecutors for further investigation. But he said Rahman would be released in the meantime.

"The court dismissed today the case against Abdul Rahman for a lack of information and a lot of legal gaps in the case," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly on the case.

"The decision about his release will be taken possibly tomorrow," the official added. "They don't have to keep him in jail while the attorney general is looking into the case."

The court's decision was sure to anger at least some of the clerics who have demanded that authorities enforce a provision in the country's Islamic-based laws calling for the execution of Muslims who abandon the faith.

"There will be big protests across Afghanistan," said Faiez Mohammed, a Sunni Muslim leader in the northern city of Kunduz. "This has shamed Afghanistan in the eyes of other Muslim countries."

A Western diplomat, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said it wasn't clear whether the 41-year-old Rahman would be able to stay in Afghanistan or have to move abroad.

Rahman was being prosecuted for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan. He was arrested last month after police discovered him with a Bible.

In an interview published in an Italian newspaper on Sunday, Rahman said his family, including his former wife and two teenage daughters, had reported him to authorities.

He stressed that he was fully aware of his choice to convert.

"If I must die, I will die," Rahman told the Rome daily La Repubblica, which did not interview him directly but channeled questions through a human rights worker who visited him in prison.

Rahman said he chose to become a Christian "in small steps" after leaving Afghanistan around 1990. He moved to Peshawar, Pakistan, then Germany, and tried to get a visa in Belgium.

Conversion A Thorny Issue In Muslim World (CSM)

By Rachel Morarjee and Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021176

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN; AND CAIRO - Under pressure from the US, the Vatican, and other Western leaders, Afghanistan's fledgling democracy Sunday sidestepped a politically charged case in which prosecutors had sought the death penalty for a Muslim man who converted to Christianity.

Rather than pass judgment on Abdul Rahman, an Afghan who converted while living abroad 16 years ago, the court declared him mentally unfit for trial Sunday. "He is a sick person," said Mohammed Eshaq Aloko, Afghanistan's deputy attorney general. Afghan officials said Mr. Rahman would be transferred to a hospital for psychiatric evaluation.

The case has not only thrown a spotlight on the laws and practices of an Afghan government that the United States helped to install but is a reminder of the limits - sometimes severely enforced - placed on religious freedoms by many countries in the Muslim world.

While state executions for apostasy are rarely carried out, laws allowing them remain on the books in not only Afghanistan but in Saudi Arabia, Iran, and Sudan.

More generally, while countries like Egypt and Pakistan guarantee religious freedoms in their constitutions, they limit religious speech and local police frequently lean on people to recant if they seek to convert.

In recent years, religious tension between Muslims and Christians has soared in many countries, and states like Egypt and Pakistan frequently find themselves caught between extremists on both sides.

Last year for instance, Egyptian Christians and Muslims clashed over a girl the Christians claimed had been forced to convert to Islam. The Muslim side said the girl was a willing convert, and had married a Muslim.

In Pakistan, while apostasy cases are rare, vigilante attacks against alleged apostates and others thought to offend Islam are common. "There's not been a single case of apostasy in Pakistan in the last 10 to 15 years, at least not one that has attracted a lot of attention," says Najam Sethi, editor of the liberal Lahore-based newspaper, Daily Times.

But as much of the Muslim world, including Pakistan, takes a more negative view of America and its wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, there has been greater popular pressure on religious freedoms, with courts and governments usually reluctant to intervene.

In Pakistani villages, Muslims who convert to Christianity are occasionally killed by their own family members, to protect the family's honor. In major cities, Islamic militant groups have launched attacks against Christian churches for their supposed sympathy for America. In Alexandria, Egypt, last October, three rioters died as they sought to attack a church for distributing DVDs of a play deemed offensive to Islam.

This context is what has made Rahman's case so difficult for the secular- leaning and pro-US Afghan President Hamid Karzai.

"Afghanistan is in the eye of the storm, in terms of anti-Western feeling," say Mr. Sethi. "If the Supreme Court [had] upheld its decision, and then passed the buck on to Mr. Karzai to say, 'OK, it's up to you, you have the power of clemency,' then that puts Karzai in a bad spot as far as Islamists are concerned."

Sunday's pronouncement of Rahman by prosecutors and the judge as unfit would now seem to spare President Karzai this embarrassing quandary.

Ansarullah Mawlavezada, the judge who had been set to try Rahman's case, as well as other court officials, say that the case came to court after the family reported him for being a Christian. A lawsuit had been filed in a child-custody dispute, and his ex-wife alleged that he beat one of his two daughters while she was reading the Koran.

Rahman has said that he converted to Christianity when he was working for an aid agency in Pakistan 16 years ago.

Afghanistan is a deeply conservative country where 99 percent of the population is Muslim and an estimated 10,000 Christians can practice only in secret. Out on the street, many ordinary Afghans chimed in with the mullahs calling out at Friday prayers for Abdul Rahman to be put to death.

"The order of God is execution for this person and no one can change it. This person has denied God and the Koran and he should be punished in a way that will stop other Muslims from converting," said Sayed Saber, a 32-year-old in Kabul.

President George Bush, who called the case "deeply troubling," phoned Karzai last week to press for Rahman's release. Simultaneously, mujahideen who had been funded by the US in their fight against the Soviet Union, mobilized supporters across the country to press for execution. Karzai was caught in the middle. "It is a question of a tightrope for Karzai," said Paul Fishstein, the director of the Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit in Kabul.

The issue of religious freedoms is one in which, as in Afghanistan, modern laws are clashing with ancient traditions. Rahman's case illustrates a glaring contradiction between Afghanistan's constitution, which upholds the right to freedom of religion on one hand but enshrines the supremacy of sharia law on the other.

Most mainstream schools of Islamic jurisprudence call for converts to be executed. Though the Koran promises only hellfire for apostates and also says "there should be no compunction in religion," Islamic jurists have typically argued that execution is mandated, citing stories of comments made by the prophet Muhammad.

"The prophet Muhammad said that anyone who rejects Islam for another religion should be executed," said Mr. Mawlavezada, the judge.

Though some liberal Islamic scholars disagree, pointing out that no such rule exists in the Koran, they have been largely silenced in Afghanistan. Last year, Afghan writer Ali Mohaqeq Nasab spent almost three months in jail last autumn for an article questioning the traditional call for execution.

What happens next for Rahman is uncertain, though it appears likely that the government will find a way to sweep the case under the rug.

Officials said they're likely to allow him to go abroad for medical treatment.

"If his family can afford to send him overseas for medical treatment then of course we would give him a passport," says Mr. Aloko, the deputy attorney general. In that case, he would be free to seek asylum elsewhere and avoid a return to his homeland and its legal system.

Lifesaving Knowledge, Innovation Emerge From War's Deadly Violence (USAT)

By Gregg Zoroya

USA Today, March 27, 2006

AD DULUIYAH, Iraq — Even with 10 milligrams of morphine, Army Sgt. Robert Mundo lay in agony after a sniper's bullet pierced his thigh and blasted through his groin.

Mundo gripped the hand of another GI as medic Bridgett Joseph surveyed the bloody damage. Then Joseph reached into her bag for a bandage no other war has seen.

Made with an extract from shrimp cells, the HemCon bandage creates a tight bond that stopped the bleeding almost instantly. Seconds later, Mundo, 24 — a widower from Colorado Springs and the father of two young girls — was airlifted to the Air Force Theater Hospital in Balad, 10 miles away. He got there in five minutes.

New ways of healing are as much a product of war as are new ways of killing. To save lives on the battlefield, medical innovations are born in days rather than in years, military and civilian doctors say. And as with wars past, the new ways of treating the injured and sick in Iraq and Afghanistan — soldiers such as Mundo — could have benefits beyond the battlefield.

Civilian emergency care experts such as Thomas Judge say medical technicians in the USA are beginning to use the HemCon bandage and new battlefield tourniquets to treat trauma patients. A portable heart-lung machine developed in Germany and not yet approved for use by U.S. doctors is helping wounded soldiers breathe. It is small — not much larger than a laptop computer — and connects to blood vessels in the groin to filter out poisonous carbon dioxide while filtering in oxygen. Military doctors in Balad also are using an expensive clotting drug, licensed for use on hemophiliacs, to help stem massive hemorrhaging in troops torn apart by roadside bombs.

Not all advances come easily. Civilian doctors complain that the military sometimes fails to share information on the success of a new drug or technology. Military doctors disagree over the effectiveness of some new products. The Army, for instance, favors the HemCon bandage even though Navy and Marine doctors question whether it works as well as a cheaper bandage developed by the Navy.

Some innovations, such as the HemCon, result from government-sponsored research. Others come from the ingenuity of battlefield doctors who seek new ways to use existing medicines, or try untested technology when all else fails.

"The military has to try things that nobody has tried before," said Judge, immediate past president of the Association of Air Medical Services, an air ambulance trade group. "Some of the greatest advancements of medicine only come about from war."

When Mundo arrived at Balad at 11:45 a.m. on March 5, a rickshaw-like gurney carried him from the helipad into the controlled chaos of the Air Force Theater Hospital emergency room. Nurses, medical technicians and doctors — some of them with 9mm pistols slung from shoulder holsters — swarmed over each patient wheeled inside. (They're under orders to carry weapons, even during surgery.)

As patients arrive, doctors and nurses poke, prod and inspect; they cut away clothing, shout out blood pressure readings, insert oxygen tubes and wheel up portable X-ray machines. Helicopter medics, helmets under their arms, squeeze into the scrum to recite how each soldier fell on the battlefield.

Bloody linens and body fluids collect on the floor. The clatter of arriving or departing helicopters, beating against the hospital tents, muffles conversation.

"You got kids?" Air Force Lt. Col. Jay Bishoff, a urologist, asked Mundo. "I have kids," Mundo answered apprehensively. "But if I get home, I may want more."

"Well," Bishoff replied, "you'll be able to have a lot more."

About 20 minutes after entering the ER, Mundo was wheeled into one of three operating rooms. There, Bishoff began knitting the soldier back together. "We'll rebuild everything," Bishoff said through his surgical mask. "We're going to reconstruct it. Save it."

The Air Force hospital in Balad is one of the two largest military hospitals in Iraq. The other is an Army facility in Baghdad. The 300 staff members at Balad treat about 9,000 patients a year: Americans, coalition troops, Iraqis, even captured insurgents. The caseload rivals any major trauma center in the USA, said Air Force Col. Tyler Putnam, chief of intensive care.

Its 37,000 square feet lie under a series of tents, and surgeons here are particularly proud of the hospital's simple design. Combat casualties pass from emergency room to CT scan and into surgery.

"It's this 100 yards from the ER doors to the operating room. It's just a straight shot. There are no corners, no turns — you just go straight down the hallway," said Air Force Lt. Col. Jeffrey Bailey, 49, of St. Louis, the chief of trauma here.

Because a major airbase sits within the Balad installation, almost all sick and wounded Americans from across Iraq flow through the hospital on their way home.

American casualties here fall into two categories. Those with mild ailments — kidney stones, for example — are treated and recuperate here, then return to their units.

The severely wounded undergo surgery, then are quickly placed aboard aircraft for flights to the Army's Landstuhl Regional Medical Center in Germany. Mundo would join this river of casualties soon.

After Mundo underwent almost two hours of surgery, his battalion and company commanders and other soldiers visited to wish him well. They joked about his bravely "taking one for the team." A Purple Heart and a Combat Infantryman Badge were pinned to his pillow.

Bishoff, 44, of San Antonio, said it was the 16th groin injury he has repaired since arriving in Iraq more than a month ago.

"Every time I do it, I get better, I get faster, I learn more," he said. "In prior wars, he would have likely lost both of his testicles."

Doctors have learned about the extent of damage caused by high-velocity bullets and bomb blasts. They have taught themselves how to better identify dead tissue and reconnect what can be saved.

The lessons from treating complex battle wounds can form the basis for seminars and published papers to educate doctors at home.

Almost every war has given rise to medical achievements. After yellow fever killed soldiers during the Spanish-American War, military doctors were the first to prove that mosquitoes carried the disease. Among those doctors: Maj. Walter Reed, namesake of the famous Army hospital in Washington, D.C.

Large-scale blood transfusions began during World War I. And medical evacuations by helicopter originated during the Korean War and became common in Vietnam.

DOJ_NMG_0021179

Today, the Pentagon is asking civilian researchers to develop dehydrated blood products that can be stored up to two years; a portable battlefield device that stops internal bleeding with ultrasound; a non-addictive painkiller as powerful as morphine, and prosthetics that respond to brain waves.

"Many, if not all, of these will have civilian uses," said Brett Giroir, a deputy director at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency, which does research and development for the Pentagon.

Even more important, doctors say, are further advances in trauma care, the long-term process of saving, healing and rehabilitating the wounded and injured. Traumatic injuries remain the No. 1 killer of Americans under age 45. The speed and efficiency of trauma care, improved upon recently by civilian medicine, are being pushed even further in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Things come from civilian medicine, and then we take it into the cauldron of the war and focus it, test it and evaluate it, and then use it many, many, many more time than the civilians have. And then whatever spits out in the end is better," said Army Col. John Holcomb, commander of the U.S. Army Institute of Surgical Research.

At the Balad hospital, Air Force Maj. Paul "Chip" Gleason, 35, of Springboro, Ohio, heads orthopedic surgery. Advances in body armor protect the abdomen and upper chest of soldiers. But the legs, arms, faces and lower abdomens remain vulnerable to bullets and explosions. Orthopedic surgeons stay busy. In surgery, Gleason uses a small digital camera to record images for future lessons. A key task is recognizing and removing dying tissue eviscerated by bullets or shrapnel. Dead tissue can cause infection.

Because of endless opportunities to examine torn flesh, "I've noticed a steady progression in my ability to judge what's viable, what's living and what's been too damaged," Gleason said.

Back in the USA, experts such as Andrew Pollak, an associate professor of orthopedics at the University of Maryland School of Medicine, said the knowledge gained in Iraq will prove priceless.

"If you see these injuries in numbers of one and two, you never gain any experience," Pollak said. "When you do a high volume … you can teach people what works and what didn't work."

Air Force Lt. Col. David Powers, 42, of Louisville, is a facial surgeon at Balad. He already has helped publish a guide based on his experience treating the wounded. One lesson: Hold off on surgery until three-dimensional models of the face can help guide doctors on what lies beneath the damage.

From the moment the sniper shot Mundo in a market in Ad Duluiyah, his world changed rapidly. After the five-minute helicopter ride to Balad and almost two hours in surgery, he was recuperating.

By 5 a.m. the next day, he was strapped to a litter and loaded onto a C-17 aircraft headed for Germany.

The Air Force's system of using specially configured aircraft to move thousands of casualties from war zones almost daily is another crucial innovation. The technology didn't exist during Vietnam, the last war in which large numbers of casualties were routinely evacuated to the USA. In those days, doctors typically waited up to six weeks for patients to become stable enough to complete the trip home, said Dale Smith, a professor of medical history at the Uniformed Services University of the Health Sciences in Bethesda, Md.

Now, because of new treatment methods and technology on the aircraft, the most critically injured patients can make the trip in a few days. "They've really thought about this very carefully, no wasted moments, no wasted movements," Judge said of the military. "It's very, very focused."

He and others say the long-distance air evacuation process — with its speed and flying care centers — would prove invaluable should a terrorist attack or natural disaster overwhelm local medical facilities, as happened with Hurricane Katrina last year. After Katrina, hundreds of patients from flooded hospitals were moved to other cities by Air Force medical crews. The White House investigation into the hurricane recommended that disaster response plans better integrate military air evacuations.

Rather than try to re-create in Iraq or Afghanistan sophisticated hospitals such as Landstuhl, the military has built smaller field hospitals where patients are treated and stabilized. Doctors in Iraq now leave many wounds open and vacuum-sealed with plastic. That also was not possible in Vietnam. "Now the sickest of sick patients can get on that airplane," said Air Force Maj. Timothy Woods, a general surgeon at Landstuhl.

On a recent C-17 medical evacuation flight from Balad to Landstuhl, 32 patients rested comfortably, many of them in litters stacked three high on aluminum racks. Among them: burn patients; an amputee; soldiers with broken bones, a shoulder sprain and back injuries; one with a blood disorder; two psychiatric cases; and a servicemember stricken with lung cancer. Two in critical condition were hooked to ventilators.

Like flight attendants, the nurses, medical technicians and doctors circulated throughout the plane, offering water, oxygen and medication to relieve the pain. They also kept a close eye on monitors.

"The civilians are always amazed at how we do this," said Air Force Reserve Maj. Ken Winslow, 49, a flight nurse from Issaquah, Wash.

About 65 hours after he was shot — and after a stop in Germany — Mundo arrived at Andrews Air Force Base near Washington. From there, he headed to Walter Reed.

"It was great because I didn't really feel like I needed to be that far away from home. I wanted to get here to Walter Reed and start doing my rehab," he said.

Within eight days of his return, Mundo had been reunited with his daughters, JoLyne, 3, and Shania, 1, and flew home to Colorado. The two girls had lost their mother, Rachel, to lupus in November, just days before their father shipped out for Iraq. In his absence, Mundo's sister-in-law, Jessie Mundo, cared for them.

The children were thrilled to see him and curious about his wound.

"I didn't want to tell them about the sniper or anything," Mundo said. "As far as they know, it was just a nice little doctor's shot."

A Better Idea (WSJ)

By Francis Fukuyama And Adam Garfinkle

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

As an editorial on this page recently asked: "Anyone out there have a better idea" than the Bush administration's policy of high-profile democracy promotion in the Arab and Muslim worlds as a means to fight terrorism? Well, yes, there is one. That better idea consists of separating the struggle against radical Islamism from promoting democracy in the Middle East, focusing on the first struggle, and dramatically changing our tone and tactics on the democracy promotion front, at least for now.

The essential problem with the administration's approach is that it conflates two issues that are separate. The first has to do with violent, antimodern radical Islamism (on display both in the reaction to the Danish cartoons and in the mosque bombing in Samarra); the second concerns the dysfunctionality of political and social institutions in much of the Arab world.

It is, of course, the administration's thesis that the latter condition causes the former. It is also its contention that U.S. Cold War policies of support for Arab "friendly tyrants" are mainly to blame for Arab authoritarianism. Thus did the president say in November 2003 -- since repeated several times by Condoleezza Rice -- that we sacrificed freedom for stability in the Middle East for 60 years, and got neither. It follows from this view that if the U.S. stops supporting authoritarian regimes and instead does all it prudently can to bring about democratic ones, our terrorist problem will be dramatically reduced if not altogether solved.

Authoritarian political cultures do function as enablers of radical Islamism, but the essential cause of the latter -- today as before, in dozens of historical cases concerning violent millenarian movements -- is the difficulty that some societies and individuals have in coming to terms with social change. That is why rapid modernization is likely to produce more short-term radicalism, not less. Muslims in democratic Europe are as much a part of this problem as those in the Middle East. This is not a trivial point; it is a central one that directly challenges a key tenet of the administration's view.

What the administration sees as one problem ought to be seen as two. Radical Islamism needs to be dealt with separately from democracy promotion. This involves doing everything we can to ensure the political success of the governments in Afghanistan and Iraq. It also involves killing, capturing or otherwise neutralizing hard-core terrorists in many parts of the world, and keeping dangerous materials out of their hands, in what will look less like a war than like police and intelligence operations.

But the threat above all lies on the level of ideas. Just as it proved possible to stigmatize and eventually eliminate slavery from mainstream global norms without having first to wait for the mass advent of liberal democracy, it should be possible to effectively stigmatize jihadi terrorism without having first to midwife democracies from Morocco to Bangladesh. The United States and its Western allies should be helping genuine, traditional and pious Muslims to reassert their dominance over a beautiful and capacious religious civilization in the face of a well-financed assault by extremist thugs. (This, of course, is not a new idea, but we have barely begun to take its implementation seriously.) We should also be vigorously supporting the Danes and genuine European liberals when they are attacked by illiberal and violent Islamists.

Promoting liberal and democratic institutions in the Middle East should be decoupled from this fight, since it is a much more long-term project -- and a project in need of significant redesign. The Bush administration has not admitted to itself the degree to which it has been knocked off its own timetable by the chaotic situation in Iraq. Its Broader Middle East and North Africa initiative to promote democracy in the Middle East through high-profile rhetorical support for democracy and funding for local democratic organizations was originally conceived as a way of capitalizing on the momentum gained from a successful Iraqi transition to democracy. But there is no such momentum right now, only backlash. Many would-be democratic opponents of regimes in places like Syria or Iran now say they'd prefer the status quo to the situation the Iraqis are in. This does not paint a rosy picture for the Bush administration's new initiative to promote democratic regime change in Iran; it will be hard to find any takers for the $75 million in new funding for this purpose.

To put it mildly, the Iraq war has not increased the prestige of the U.S. and American ideas like liberal democracy in the Middle East. The U.S. does not have abundant moral authority for promoting the rule of law, since the first thing people in the region associate with America today is prisoner abuse at Guantanamo, Bagram and Abu Ghraib. Many Americans have explained these events to themselves by saying that the abuse was an aberration that has been hyped by enemies of the U.S., and that in any event such things just happen during wartime. Perhaps; but the fact remains that Guantanamo is still open, and nobody except for a couple of lowly enlisted soldiers have been prosecuted for prisoner abuse by the Bush administration. Fair or not, American insistence on rule of law and human rights looks simply hypocritical.

The Bush administration has indeed opened up new space for debate and political participation in the Arab and Muslim worlds. But recent elections in Iran, Egypt, Palestine, and Iraq have either brought to power or increased the prestige of profoundly illiberal groups like Hamas and the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood; even our putative friends in the Shiite alliance that did well in last December's Iraqi elections have been busy institutionalizing an intolerant Islamist order in the parts of Iraq they control.

Administration principals speak of creating public space for dissent and debate lest it all be driven into the mosque, with the risk that this "might" bring illiberal groups into power. The tide of public opinion today is not running in favor of pro-Western secular liberals, however, but rather the Islamists. In many Arab countries this means that premature democratic elections will most definitely and predictably bring the mosque into the public square while driving out all other forms of expression. The tolerant are making democratic way for the intolerant, who in turn are very likely to block the possibility of any reverse flow of authority. How such dynamics promote liberal democracy in the longer run is hard to see. More likely, U.S. policies that foster pro-Islamist outcomes will delay political liberalization, help the wrong parties in the great debates ongoing in Muslim societies and, quite possibly therefore, make our terrorist problem worse.

We need to change tactics in the way we go about supporting Middle Eastern democracy. The administration's highly visible embrace of democracy promotion as a component of its national security strategy (as outlined in last week's official document on the subject), and its telegraphing ahead of time of intentions to bring about regime change in places like Iran, only hurt the cause of real democrats in the region. The effort to push countries toward early national elections, given the rising Islamist tide today, will invariably force us into the appearance of further hypocrisy when they produce results we don't like. There are many other democratic institutions we can help foster, such as local elections or non-extremist civil society groups. Moves afoot in Congress to channel democracy support through the State Department are well-intentioned but counterproductive: The last thing that democracy activists need right now is more American fingerprints on outside funding. Private foundations and groups with some distance from the administration like the NED or private NGOs will have better luck disbursing money than U.S. agencies. There are many quiet ways we can and should support democratic groups in the region, by working, for example, with other countries that have recently undergone democratic transitions that may have greater credibility than Washington.

In a weird twist, despite its emphasis on democracy in Iraq, the administration would have let funding for long-term democracy promotion through groups like the National Democratic Institute and the International Republican Institute lapse but for a last minute congressional earmark. We are pushing too hard in the wrong places, and not hard enough in the one place where it matters most.

We should not even think about wanting to roll back recent election results; rather, the emphasis should be on pressuring newly empowered groups to govern responsibly. Islamist parties in Egypt and Palestine have gained popularity in large measure not because of their foreign policy views, but because of their stress on domestic social welfare issues like education, health, and jobs, and their stand against corruption. Fine, let them deliver; and if they don't or turn out to be corrupt themselves, they will face vulnerabilities of their own not far down the road.

Democracy promotion should remain an integral part of American foreign policy, but it should not be seen as a principal means of fighting terrorism. We should stigmatize and fight radical Islamism as if the social and political dysfunction of the Arab world did not exist, and we should shrewdly, quietly, patiently and with as many allies as possible promote the amelioration of that dysfunction as if the terrorist problem did not exist. It is when we mix these two issues together that we muddle our understanding of both, with the result that we neither defeat terrorism nor promote democracy but rather the reverse.

Still There In Spirit, And Ready To Return (MINNST)

By Pam Louwagie, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 27, 2006

An attorney who spent nearly a year in Iraq helping to rebuild its judicial system says he'd go back in a heartbeat to rejoin "the biggest thing happening in the world."

Every morning, Cliff Wardlaw wakes up to his personal war display. A wooden rack near his bed holds the desert-beige vest he wore in Iraq, his knives and flashlights still tucked inside the pockets. Draped over the vest are two large checked scarves Wardlaw wrapped around his face when the sharp desert sand flew like tiny bullets toward his skin.

Seeing it there, in his St. Paul apartment, helps him relive his year in Iraq. And it is a reminder that he's ready to return if duty calls him again.

Wardlaw, an attorney, spent most of 2004 in Iraq after volunteering to help revamp the country's justice system. He trained judges, checked courthouse security, examined prison conditions and worked to steer the Iraqi judiciary to an independent body, one separate from the country's political leadership.

Since his return, his life has been suffused with the memories. And he is driven by the desire to go back.

Inside his office in the Minneapolis courthouse, where he works as a federal prosecutor, he e-mails his Iraqi friends regularly. Padding across the beige carpet of his apartment in the evenings, he wears his fleece jacket, embroidered with "U.S. Embassy, Baghdad, Iraq." Often, he carries a folding desert-camouflaged knife in a rear pocket, just as he did over there.

When he hears on the news about a car bombing in Iraq, he checks a framed map hanging in his apartment hall. Yep, he was there. Yep, he remembers that part of town.

His adult daughters roll their eyes. It's dangerous there. They think their 46-year-old dad is going through a midlife crisis, and they wonder why he doesn't just buy a sports car.

He knows that people question his reasons for wanting to return. They fear for his safety, cringe at the thought of him immersing himself in war.

But the truth is, he can't wait.

When the Justice Department put out an e-mail seeking volunteers in 2003, Wardlaw replied immediately. He says he was one of only three people in the country to answer.

He knew what he was getting into. He'd grown up the son of a Marine. On the playground, kids quizzed each other about the difference between models of the F-4 Phantom and other military aircraft. In school, they listened to casualty reports from Vietnam on Fridays.

He tried to become a Marine Corps officer in college, but he got lost on a compass course and he liked to sleep in. He learned he was a man more apt to analyze and question than follow orders.

So he went to law school and got his military fix vicariously through the books on his shelves.

Remnants of torture

The scent of burning garbage and backed-up sewers enveloped Wardlaw in Baghdad. The beige landscape of the city was deserted at night; curfews kept people huddled inside. Many buildings were dark shells. Bombs had ripped holes in their walls and exploded their floors into chunks of broken concrete.

Wardlaw winced at the evidence of Saddam Hussein's regime. He'd read about the horrors in Iraq, but seeing the evidence was different.

His work took him to elaborate palaces with fountains, swimming pools and marble floors. But in some palaces, the dark basements held prison cells with hooks dangling from the ceiling. Iraqi judges told him the hooks had been used for torture, to hang people by their arms.

He made friends with an eloquent and educated Iraqi judge who had puzzling dark brown scars across his face. The scars, Wardlaw learned, came from acid, dripped onto the man's skin as punishment for refusing to issue death warrants during Saddam's regime.

A Kurdish woman cried as she told him about her brother and her brother's family disappearing. Nieces, nephews, all gone.

"I did not meet one Iraqi who told me that it was a mistake to remove [Hussein] from power," Wardlaw said.

That gave him comfort -- and resolve -- that what he was doing was important, he said.

At night, he slept in a trailer in the protected Green Zone outside one of Saddam's palaces. For safety, he curled up on the floor between two beds and used body armor for a blanket.

Arabic chants calling Muslims to prayer at a nearby mosque woke him in the morning. He had no trouble getting up. He looked forward to each day's mission.

Some days, he toured building sites with architects and security experts who were designing new courthouses. Other days, he reviewed files of detainees to see who was best prosecuted in Iraq, who should be kept and who should be released. He helped track down soldiers to serve as witnesses in court. He helped teach judges about international human-rights rules. He helped the military decide which evidence could be turned over to Iraqi courts when insurgents killed an American citizen. Many days, he zipped up body armor, packed his guns and strapped on a helmet for trips to outlying courthouses.

Leaving the Green Zone meant danger.

He rode in military convoys that varied their routes and drove fast -- sometimes onto sidewalks -- to avoid becoming targets. They dodged manhole covers, worried that bombs were hidden underneath. They kept guns pointed out the windows.

Six times, he saw car bombs explode, the crack so piercing that his ears hurt for days.

Wardlaw says he was one of about 5,200 civilians working to reconstruct the country, not including Defense Department contractors. He and his colleagues working with the justice system -- some American, some Iraqi -- took care to protect Iraqis who seemed destined to lead the government. He took a special liking to senior Judge Qais Hashim Shameri. Qais was efficient and energetic and young, respected by the other judges, Wardlaw said. If there were problems getting a panel of trial judges to sit at a scheduled time, Judge Qais would make sure it got done.

Shortly before Wardlaw left the country, Qais was killed in an ambush.

"To lose a guy like that," Wardlaw said, his voice quieting. "That was one of the lowest days."

Tragedies like that made Wardlaw marvel at the courage of the Iraqi people, how they kept going to work every day, going to the markets, navigating around heavy fighting, living their lives.

He felt proud to be helping. And lucky to be witnessing history. Everything he has done since, he said, has seemed mundane. Less significant.

Inside the white walls of his Minneapolis office, his eyes widen when he talks about it: "This is the biggest thing happening in the world."

It was why he turned a three-month commitment into 11 months. But eventually he had to come home.

Can't leave it behind

For a while after he got back to Minnesota, it was his instinct to look for snipers. He'd scan rooftops on his way to lunch. He'd duck when he heard loud noises. A year later, he's no longer as skittish, but he still can't leave Iraq behind.

DOJ_NMG_0021184

He'll work long days preparing for a murder trial, but still manage to watch Saddam's trial with rapt attention. He has been in the building where Saddam sits in a defendant's cage. He knows some of the judges.

He helped make a difference, he thinks, but he acknowledges the country has a long way to go. He's adamant that U.S. troops should stay there until the job is finished. And he wants to be there with them.

In the middle of his kitchen sits a footlocker stuffed with desert fatigues and supplies. The boots inside are still caked with Iraqi mud. The foot locker has been in his apartment for a year.

He shrugs. He just hasn't taken it to storage yet, he says.

But his daughters know better.

"I think it's more wishful thinking," said Meredith, 20.

At night, the military display by his bed is sometimes the last thing he sees before closing his eyes.

Every once in a while, he goes through the pockets of the vest. Sand still falls from the folds of the scarves. Iraqi sand.

"I have all my stuff packed," he says. "Someone could call me, and in an hour I could go home and be ready to go."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Causey Stays On Sidelines In Enron Trial (AP)

By Kristen Hays, AP Business Writer

AP, March 26, 2006

Richard Causey's Name Keeps Coming Up at Enron Trial, but Ex-Accounting Chief Hasn't Testified

HOUSTON (AP) -- Enron Corp.'s former chief accounting officer was bound for trial alongside company founder Kenneth Lay and former CEO Jeffrey Skilling until he cut a plea deal just weeks before jurors were chosen.

Richard Causey might have been expected to testify but has remained on the sidelines ever since. Legal experts say he might be more effective as a potential witness than one who actually takes the stand -- although jurors may be curious about the man whose name they've heard again and again.

Causey won't testify before the government rests its primary case in the fraud and conspiracy trial this week. But prosecutors can hold him in reserve to testify as a rebuttal witness after the defense teams present their case -- which will feature testimony from Lay and Skilling.

"Causey's role in the case may turn out to be more to cast a shadow than to testify," said Sam Buell, a former prosecutor with the Justice Department's Enron Task Force who now teaches at the University of Texas School of Law.

"A single provable lie on something significant could alone convict a testifying defendant in a case like this. And since only the government knows what Causey can and can't say, he acts as a major deterrent against either defendant fabricating specific claims about events, meetings, what they were not told, and the like," he said.

"This could go either way, but if I were wagering I'd bet we won't see him in the end."

Jacob Frenkel, another former federal prosecutor, said rebuttal testimony from Causey won't be necessary if prosecutors remain confident of the strength of their case once the defense finishes presenting evidence and testimony.

"If the government does not use him, then he becomes the Grand Decoy," Frenkel said. "The uncertainty for the defense of the value of Causey absolutely is a factor bearing on the defense case and the defense anticipation of the government's rebuttal case."

In late December, Causey became the last of 16-ex-Enron executives to plead guilty to crimes. For nearly two years before that, he was headed for trial with Lay and Skilling and part of their unified defense. His 11th-hour plea came less than a month before the trial was originally slated to begin.

Causey had faced more than 30 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and money laundering. He agreed as part of his plea to serve seven years in prison, though prosecutors can recommend cutting that to five years if they are satisfied with his cooperation. He is to be sentenced in August.

So far, that cooperation hasn't included trial testimony. But Causey's leap to the cooperator camp enabled the government to streamline its case and eliminate copious arcane accounting testimony that would have been necessary to try to prove Causey's guilt.

Causey had been considered a strong potential witness, given his position, knowledge of accounting and proximity to Lay and Skilling. He occupied one of four corner offices on the 50th floor of Enron's former downtown Houston headquarters, with Lay, Skilling and former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow ensconced in the other three.

Throughout the trial, the defense teams have repeatedly challenged prosecution witnesses on whether they have accounting expertise to challenge legitimacy of various financial structures and transactions they say helped Enron manipulate earnings and hide losses.

The 19 witnesses who have testified so far include eight ex-Enron executives who pleaded guilty to crimes long before Causey, ranging from his former peer, Fastow, to the company treasurer, investor relations chief and heads of troubled divisions. Several lower level accounting executives and a pair of former Arthur Andersen LLP accountants have testified as well.

"A watered-down version of what the government's most persuasive witnesses have already said can only dilute the case, even if limited to rebuttal," Buell said of a possible Causey appearance.

The former treasurer and final cooperator to testify in the government's primary case, Ben Glisan Jr., is slated to return to the witness stand Monday for further cross-examination.

Lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli referred to Glisan as the government's "closer," as he corroborated much of the earlier testimony. All told, each was intended to bolster -- bit by bit -- the government's contention that Lay and Skilling lied to investors by painting a rosy picture of Enron's health in 2001 when they knew the company faced massive losses, multibillion-dollar writedowns on overvalued assets, and other serious troubles that had been hidden by accounting tricks.

Glisan is testifying on furlough from prison, where he has been since he pleaded guilty to conspiracy in September 2003. He admitted to creating financial structures that he said Enron used to warehouse poor assets and hide losses.

The two defendants counter that there was no fraud at Enron, they did nothing wrong, and negative publicity coupled with diminished market confidence shoved the company into bankruptcy protection in December 2001.

After testimony ended for the week, Petrocelli dismissed the government's case as too general and opinion-oriented. "When you break it down and get the facts, you get a different picture. We've been getting to the facts."

Once Glisan is finished testifying, prosecutors expect to call three to four more less high-profile witnesses and then rest their case by midweek. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake aims to give the defense teams a day or two off to prepare for their case, and said Thursday the trial would likely resume April 3.

Skilling faces 31 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Lay faces seven counts of fraud and conspiracy. Both sold millions in Enron stock before the company failed, but only Skilling faces allegations of improper stock sales.

Not The GC? You're Still A Target (CORPCOUN)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, March 27, 2006

Government prosecutions may skip the GC but involve other corporate counsel

Until recently, federal prosecutors have almost always gone after the general counsel when they've charged an in-house lawyer with corporate fraud. But for the second time in the past six months, the government has skipped the GC and indicted a lower-ranking company lawyer for alleged wrongdoing.

In February prosecutors charged Robert Graham, the former assistant GC and senior VP of General Re Corp., with securities fraud for his role in a sham deal with American International Group Inc. Based in Stamford, Conn., Gen Re is a subsidiary of Berkshire Hathaway Inc., the holding company for most of Warren Buffett's investments. New York-based AIG is the world's largest insurer.

Two other former Gen Re execs and a former AIG official were charged along with Graham. All four defendants have pled not guilty; at press time their case was scheduled to go to trial on May 22. The Securities and Exchange Commission has also brought a civil action against several Gen Re execs, including Graham, for their role in the deal with AIG. Timothy McCaffrey, who was Gen Re's GC at the time of the alleged fraud, says that he is not a target of the government's probe. (McCaffrey left the company last June.)

Alan Vinegrad, Graham's defense attorney, says his client expects to be vindicated in court. "Rob Graham is an attorney of the highest integrity who always acted in good faith and within the bounds of the law," says Vinegrad, a partner at Covington & Burling.

According to SEC documents and court papers filed by the U.S. Department of Justice, Gen Re and AIG concocted their deal in October 2000. An AIG executive allegedly proposed that his company would "prefund" Gen Re with $500 million, which Gen Re would then use to pay insurance premiums to AIG. The SEC says the deal, which would allow AIG to report $500 million in false reserves, was suggested by AIG's chairman. Maurice "Hank" Greenberg, who was chairman of AIG until last spring, has denied all wrongdoing.

Prosecutors and the SEC say that Graham was involved in conference calls discussing the sham deal, in drafting the contract and its secret side agreements, and in creating a paper trail to make it look like Gen Re proposed the transaction. The government also claims that Graham knew the deal was improper, but thought AIG would be the one who could get into trouble. In a March 2001 phone conversation with another Gen Re exec, Graham allegedly said, "I'm pretty comfortable that our own skirts are clean, but that they, ah, they [AIG] have issues."

Last spring AIG admitted that the deal with Gen Re was wrong and restated its financial reports to the SEC for the previous five years. In February, AIG agreed to pay $1.6 billion to settle state and federal investigations into its alleged accounting improprieties.

The charges against Graham follow the unrelated indictment last October of Steven Gremminger, an associate general counsel at KPMG who allegedly took part in a tax fraud and cover-up [Corporate Counsel, "Gimme Shelter," December 2005]. That investigation led to a deferred prosecution agreement between KPMG and the Justice Department. Gremminger's criminal case is pending.

Seth Levine, a former federal prosecutor and now a partner in the New York office of Foley & Lardner, says the increased number of indictments of both GCs and their deputies stems from the government's heightened scrutiny of in-house lawyers. According to Levine, "There is an increasing willingness to consider whether the conduct of an attorney goes beyond legal advice and constitutes facilitation of criminal activity in the corporate context, and if it does, to bring charges." Levine adds that in the government's eyes, it doesn't matter whether the GC or an associate is the facilitator.

Costly Commissions How Merrill, Defying Warnings, Let 3 Brokers Ignite A Scandal (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig And Tom Lauricella

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

In May 2003, Merrill Lynch & Co. invited two star brokers to the firm's "Circle of Champions" celebration in San Francisco. They enjoyed an Olivia Newton-John concert and took a private plane to the Pebble Beach golf course, where they rubbed shoulders with a top boss who had recently written to them, "Congratulations on a great first year."

Five months later, the pair and a colleague were fired. Merrill announced it had discovered the three brokers were secretly helping a client make quick in-and-out trades in mutual funds, grabbing easy profits while shortchanging long-term investors.

But last December, a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel ruled that Merrill defamed the brokers and ordered it to pay them almost $15 million. Far from being a secret at Merrill, "everybody knew what these guys were doing," said Daniel Boland, their former branch manager, in testimony to New Jersey state regulators. Their lawyers, David Wechsler and Leonard Pack, say the three were scapegoats. Mr. Wechsler says Merrill wanted to "deflect responsibility and placate regulators."

Merrill has appealed the defamation ruling to a New York state court. Spokesman Mark Herr denies that Merrill scapegoated the three and says they "went to great lengths to conceal" their activities. But he says "local managers should have moved faster" to end their trades.

The appeal has unsealed a trove of documents offering a rare glimpse of a Wall Street firm pursuing a tempting profit opportunity over the objections of internal watchdogs. On repeated occasions some Merrill employees voiced concern that the three brokers were doing something wrong and took steps to stop them. Yet their immediate bosses often pushed back, allowing the trading to continue.

The events at Merrill were part of the big mutual-fund scandal pursued by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. He found that many mutual funds allowed favored clients to conduct the short-term trading, often in violation of their own policies. Regulators imposed penalties totaling $4.25 billion on a host of hedge funds and large mutual-fund firms, including Janus Capital Group and Banc of America Capital Management. (See related article1.)

While mutual funds got much of the attention, some brokerage firms such as Merrill that carried out the trades also were punished. Aside from the defamation judgment, Merrill paid $13.5 million to state regulators for its role in the three brokers' activities.

What happened at Merrill emerges through previously confidential documents, testimony by Merrill executives during the NYSE arbitration and regulators' investigations, and interviews with the brokers and others.

Merrill's trading trio had its roots in a handshake deal between two brokers at a Paramus, N.J., branch of Paine Webber (now part of UBS AG): Christopher Chung, now 37 years old, and William Savino, 50.

Both came from prosperous suburbs -- Mr. Savino in New Jersey, Mr. Chung near Philadelphia -- and started on the ground floor at big brokerage firms. As a rookie Dean Witter broker in Ridgewood, N.J., Mr. Savino recalls in an interview walking the streets with his business card and talking to small-business owners about money-market accounts. Mr. Chung, who had considered following both his parents into a career as a doctor, instead got his broker's license in 1992. He built a business focusing on selling municipal bonds to individuals with a few million dollars in assets. By 2000 the two were at UBS.

At a dinner in Manhattan that year, Mr. Chung met Steve Markovitz, a trader for the hedge fund Millennium Partners LP. A few weeks later, Mr. Markovitz called to offer some trading business, Mr. Chung recalls in an interview. (Through his lawyer, Mr. Markovitz declined to comment. He pleaded guilty to illegal trading not involving Merrill and awaits sentencing.)

In February 2001, as Messrs. Chung and Savino putted golf balls in their office, Mr. Chung invited his colleague to help out on the Millennium account. They shook hands on a 50-50 split of the business.

Mr. Markovitz's trading was straightforward "market timing," according to regulators. Such trading takes advantage of the fact that mutual-fund share prices are set just once a day, usually at 4 p.m. New York time. The price is supposed to reflect the value of the underlying assets held by the mutual fund. But in the case of foreign stocks, the value may be out of date since European and Asian markets close hours before 4 p.m. in New York.

This creates an opening for "market timing." If good news happens during U.S. trading hours, investors can snap up a mutual fund with undervalued foreign stocks, then dump it a day later after the prices are reset and predictably go up. A similar strategy works for mutual funds containing bonds and lightly traded small-company U.S. stocks whose prices may be slow to reflect market developments.

The tactic doesn't necessarily violate securities laws, but many mutual funds have banned or restricted it because the profits earned by the market timers are taken out of the accounts of long-term investors.

Messrs. Chung and Savino had to look for funds where they could set up large accounts for Mr. Markovitz. The legwork got so burdensome that the two brokers brought in a third partner, Kevin Brunnock, 38, and gave him 10% of the business. The three say they did nothing wrong and deny that their trading damaged other mutual-fund shareholders.

Mr. Savino says he had been used to heading home around 5 p.m. But he and Mr. Chung now dedicated most of their time to Millennium and found themselves staying each day until 8 or 9 p.m. as they kept track of positions at scores of mutual funds. Ultimately the three would carry out 13,000 trades for Millennium while at UBS. Messrs. Savino and Chung each made about $2 million in 2001, ranking among the firm's top 10 retail brokers.

The trading angered many mutual funds. Eight fund families -- including OppenheimerFunds and Goldman Sachs -- told UBS they "would not tolerate additional excessive trading or market timing" by the brokers, New Jersey regulators said in a later enforcement action against the three. The brokers blamed such complaints on mistakes by the funds or inadvertent violations when fund policies changed.

In August 2001, the brokers say Mr. Markovitz suggested they move to Merrill, which did other services for Millennium. Two months later, Mr. Savino called the manager of Merrill's branch in Fort Lee, N.J., asking if he wanted to hire a team that generated $10 million in revenue annually. "I actually thought it was a prank," the branch manager, Mr. Boland, later testified to regulators.

The brokers told him they had a "diversified" business with more than 900 clients. "They never mentioned market timing," Mr. Boland testified. The brokers concede they never used those words but say they disclosed to Merrill that their business involved frequent mutual-fund trading.

Merrill managers wooed them. Curtis Brown, an area manager who supervised the Fort Lee branch, invited the three to his expansive suburban home. Then they were squired by limousine to a Merrill office near Princeton, N.J., with its own hotel and pub where the men enjoyed cigars. The next day they met in Manhattan with James Gorman, then Merrill's head of all U.S. brokers.

Though impressed, Mr. Gorman asked in an email how the brokers could bring in so much revenue relative to the size of the assets they managed. Mr. Brown told Mr. Gorman in an email that the three had a "key client" but didn't mention that the client -- Mr. Markovitz -- was carrying out hundreds of commission-generating trades a week. Mr. Brown testified he didn't know that at the time.

In early December, Messrs. Chung and Savino spoke by phone with William Rittling, who then oversaw Merrill's relationships with mutual funds. Mr. Rittling testified to New Jersey regulators that the brokers' trading sounded like market timing. He said he warned that Merrill "prohibits market timing." The brokers deny hearing that. Afterward, Mr. Rittling fretted in an email to Mr. Brown that there would be "issues once fund groups see what they are doing," but he said "we will try to help" the brokers.

Merrill gave the trio of brokers a contract entitling them together to $10.5 million over seven years, not including commissions, based mostly on their meeting performance targets. Before they started, Merrill opened about 20 accounts for Millennium, most with names that didn't include the word Millennium and with different tax identification numbers. Regulators say the hedge fund had the accounts set up that way to make it harder for mutual funds to block improper trading. The brokers deny knowing that was Millennium's intent.

On Jan. 4, 2002, Messrs. Chung, Brunnock and Savino quit UBS, packed their cars with files and drove 20 minutes to their new office. Around that time, UBS had decided to prohibit brokers from engaging in market timing; the trio says the departure wasn't related to that move by UBS. Merrill made sure to keep its stars happy. It gave them prime office space and let them customize it with mahogany furniture and their own espresso machine. Messrs. Chung and Savino shared an L-shaped office. Inside Merrill, the group became known as CBS.

Within weeks, the brokers were executing short-term trades at mutual-fund companies that had complained about their trading at UBS, regulators say. The funds were complaining again. In February 2002, a Merrill compliance officer emailed Mr. Brown and eight others, citing "significant market timing" and asking that they make sure "this activity ceases immediately."

Instead, Mr. Brown's boss, regional manager Andrew Williams, asked a compliance officer "whether an exception could be made," Mr. Williams later testified. Over dinner in Weehawken, N.J., the brokers, Millennium's Mr. Markovitz, Messrs. Williams and Brown and a compliance officer met to discuss the trading.

The brokers made an argument at the dinner that they would frequently repeat and their bosses, Messrs. Williams and Brown, would adopt: The trading was acceptable when mutual funds allowed it. They described the complaints as rare cases in which a fund suddenly changed its rules or a fund official didn't know about an agreement.

In some cases they even had written contracts and letters from the funds to back up their claims. In one letter, a Dreyfus Funds official told Merrill that Dreyfus "is aware of the type of mutual fund business that the CBS group transacts and we are happy with [it]." (Dreyfus has a policy against market timing. A spokeswoman says the fund believed the Merrill brokers would comply with it.) An official of another fund emailed Mr. Chung, "I really want to apologize for being unaware of the business you've been doing for us."

Also, in some instances mutual funds agreed to the short-term trading only if Merrill agreed to direct some of its clients' longer-term assets their way. Mr. Brown testified that he and his boss, Mr. Williams, themselves tried to facilitate one proposed deal. Similar deals later became a major focus of Mr. Spitzer's probe. When Mr. Brown testified before New Jersey regulators, one questioner likened such arrangements to bribery. "I just didn't see it that way," Mr. Brown replied.

Meanwhile, Merrill's rules banned trading in mutual funds "with the intention of capturing short-term profits" -- regardless of whether the mutual fund said it was acceptable. The three brokers signed statements saying they reviewed this and other rules.

The three brokers' first three months at Merrill were a whirlwind of trading. Messrs. Savino and Chung were listed as Merrill's second- and third-biggest revenue generators among brokers nationwide for February. Mr. Brown's four-branch area soon was the top commission earner in the nation.

After thousands of trades, the complaints reached Dan Sontag, one of the top brokerage executives at Merrill. In late April, an email was issued to the three brokers and their bosses: "Per Dan Sontag and Compliance, the CBS group must cease any and all market timing."

When Mr. Brown appeared before New Jersey regulators later, he testified that he considered the email "an order." But he added, "I didn't view this as a closed issue." The brokers testified that Mr. Brown told them to "lay low," so they scaled back but didn't stop short-term trading.

For the next month, Mr. Brown and his boss in New Jersey, Mr. Williams, lobbied to let their stars do their thing. "I need your help," Mr. Brown pleaded in an email to Mr. Sontag, reporting that Millennium had withdrawn $170 million. Mr. Sontag replied, "I have always felt that the recruits should have been briefed on what they could and could not do."

Mr. Williams, the regional manager, emailed Mr. Sontag that Merrill could lose $3 billion in business -- a reference to the total relationship Millennium had with the brokerage firm. "Simply put," Mr. Williams wrote, "the rewards outweigh the risks." Mr. Sontag testified that he didn't alter his position.

The three brokers became "extremely frustrated," as they said in a June 4 memo to Mr. Brown. The memo noted that the three had "a 45-minute conversation with Bill Rittling prior to our joining Merrill about the very topic" of high-frequency mutual trading and they "did not hear any discourse toward the negative."

In late summer Mr. Brown went to Fort Lee to explain to the brokers how they "could still engage in short term trading for Millennium without violating Merrill Lynch's policy," New Jersey regulators said in a complaint against the brokers. Mr. Brown's idea, which he described in testimony to regulators, relied on a distinction between two ways of holding shares in a mutual fund. One is to hold the shares as part of an account at a brokerage firm like Merrill. The other is to hold the shares directly at the mutual fund.

Millennium switched its shares to a direct account, while designating Merrill to handle buying and selling in that account. It continued to have the three Merrill brokers call in trades and they received commissions for doing so. Regulators say the new arrangement had one big advantage: It could deflect mutual funds' complaints because Merrill was no longer an official holder of the fund shares.

In testimony, Mr. Brown denied that he designed the arrangement to keep the gravy train rolling while diverting complaints. He said he intended for the brokers to stop trading Millennium's mutual-fund holdings once they were transferred out of Merrill accounts. He said he "verbally reprimanded" the brokers in November 2002 when he found out they were still trading for Millennium. The brokers say they don't recall getting a reprimand at that time. Merrill "took no additional steps to enhance its monitoring" of the brokers, the New York Stock Exchange said in a later report on the matter.

Working mostly on Millennium business, the brokers generated more than $7 million in revenue for Merrill in 2002. Mr. Gorman, the head of all brokers, sent a note congratulating the three. Even as Merrill's profits were being pinched by the bear market in stocks, Mr. Brown's four branches generated $93 million, 10% more than 2001. His total pay jumped 13%, to $872,000, and he was soon promoted to a post in San Francisco. The bonus of his boss, Mr. Williams, jumped 26%, to $1.4 million.

Skirmishes over the trading continued in early 2003. In February, a mutual fund rejected a trade, triggering a discussion between Messrs. Brown and Savino. Mr. Brown testified he ordered the brokers to keep Millennium trades at "arm's length" from Merrill, which meant they had to stop calling in trades for the hedge fund. The brokers said that didn't happen until late April amid new questions about their trading, when Mr. Brown wrote "NO calls" in a memo.

Merrill said it began an internal review of the CBS group that spring. In late May -- shortly after Messrs. Chung and Savino enjoyed their "Circle of Champions" junket to San Francisco -- compliance officials and Messrs. Williams and Brown confronted the brokers with a potentially serious violation of securities rules. The officials played recordings of CBS group assistants identifying themselves months earlier as Millennium employees when calling funds with trades. The assistants said they had misspoken in a rush to place trades, and Merrill took no disciplinary action, according to testimony. But at the same meeting, Mr. Williams told the brokers that fund shares bought for Millennium had to be held for at least a year.

On Aug. 6, Merrill put its timing restriction in writing. The holding period was shortened to 13 weeks, but the trio's market-timing career was effectively over.

On Sept. 3, 2003, Mr. Spitzer announced his office's investigation of the mutual-fund industry, including market-timing issues. The three brokers thought they weren't in danger and were scouting for new business to do at Merrill. But in mid-September, Mr. Sontag, the Merrill executive who oversaw hundreds of branches, decided to fire the men because Merrill faced "reputational risk," he later testified.

On Oct. 2, while Mr. Chung vacationed in Seoul, South Korea, Messrs. Brunnock and Savino watched Mr. Markovitz on CNBC outside of state court in Manhattan, where he pleaded guilty to a felony. Mr. Markovitz admitted to illegally trading funds at the 4 p.m. price after that hour had passed -- something like betting on a horse race after the race is over. Unlike market timing, this is always against the rules. The brokers were shaken that a man they had dealt with so closely was likely headed for prison.

The next day, the trio's new area manager summoned Messrs. Brunnock and Savino to her office in Paramus, as Mr. Chung listened in on the phone from Korea. Reading from notes, she told them they were being fired "for cause" because they violated company rules, they recall. She ordered them to turn over their office keys and leave immediately without cleaning their desks.

By then, the trio had placed 9,274 trades for Millennium, regulators said. The NYSE said Millennium's business resulted in $12.5 million in revenue for Merrill and $60 million in profits for the hedge fund.

"Our review has revealed certain instances of market timing," Merrill announced. Mr. Herr, the Merrill spokesman, told the New York Post, "We had no knowledge they had a market-timing past." He told other media they "concealed" their conduct.

Punishments ensued, some harsher than others. Mr. Brown had to return some of his 2003 compensation but still made $929,000 for the year, more than in 2002. He and Mr. Williams still work for Merrill Lynch. Millennium and its top executives agreed to pay $180 million to settle civil fraud charges related to market timing. UBS paid a $54 million fine for supporting market timing by the three brokers and several others.

Messrs. Chung, Brunnock and Savino filed a claim with the NYSE -- the first arbiter when brokerage employees have a dispute with their employer -- accusing Merrill of wrongfully firing them for cause and defaming them.

The arbitration panel's award, announced with little explanation late last year, included $1.6 million for terminating the brokers' contracts without cause, $576,036 for legal fees; and $12.5 million for defamation and lost wages. The panel also ordered Merrill to amend its regulatory filings to state that the firings were "not for cause." The firm did that on Jan. 26, 2006, when it also paid the brokers the $1.6 million, plus interest.

Though courts rarely overturn arbitration awards, Merrill is appealing the defamation finding, arguing that it is based mainly on statements in regulatory filings that are protected from such claims by New York law. Merrill also opposes paying the brokers' legal fees.

The three brokers worked for a small Manhattan firm for a time, but they were unable to attract business and quit. Their New Jersey brokerage licenses were revoked in March 2005, a decision they are fighting. They are unemployed.

GM Races To Correct Errors For Report To SEC (WSJ)

By Lee Hawkins Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

DETROIT -- General Motors Corp. is working to rectify last-minute accounting mistakes and could file its annual report with the Securities and Exchange Commission within days, people familiar with the process say. But the auto maker still must deal with SEC probes related to several other accounting matters.

Separately, GM is continuing talks with potential suitors over the possible sale of a controlling stake in General Motors Acceptance Corp., the company's auto-financing, mortgage and insurance unit, which could generate as much as $13 billion in proceeds for GM. A decision on GMAC could come within days. GM's board was expected to meet early this week to review the situation, people familiar with the company have said.

GM management has spent more than a week gathering details on the chain of events that led to a last-minute discovery of accounting errors in the financial statements of ResCap, GMAC's residential-mortgage unit, which caused GM to miss its 10-K filing deadline March 16.

GM and its chairman and chief executive, Rick Wagoner, are under pressure to fix the errors and offer a new statement by Friday, since missing that deadline could put GM at risk of violating covenants related to $32 billion in bonds.

"The priority right now is to complete the review and correct the financial statements so that we can file them," said GM spokeswoman Toni Simonetti. She added, "At the same time, we want to understand why this came to light at the 11th hour."

It doesn't appear that the ResCap blunder has threatened the GMAC talks. Still, the delayed 10-K and a list of other accounting errors GM has disclosed recently -- including errors unrelated to ResCap that increased its 2005 loss by $2 billion -- could rattle Wall Street's confidence in the integrity and accuracy of GM's financial reports.

"Right now, investor confidence has eroded because of fundamental problems in the business, but this is now about management credibility and integrity, and that's not good," said GM bondholder Dan Genter, chief investment officer of RNC Genter, a Los Angeles investment-management firm. Some corporate-governance experts say the auto maker should hire an independent forensic accountant to examine its books. GM declined to comment on whether its board has done so.

GM March 16 disclosed and corrected a series of accounting mistakes that will force the auto maker to restate its earnings from 2000 to the first quarter of 2005. Among other things, GM said it must restate earnings figures for 2000 through 2004 as a result of "erroneously" booking payments and credits it received from suppliers -- an issue the SEC has been examining. No one has been charged with any wrongdoing in connection with the investigation, and GM has said it is cooperating.

The ResCap mistakes were discovered after GM's auditors refused to sign off on ResCap's financial statements. People familiar with the situation say that since then, GM's probe has shown that ResCap mistakenly classified proceeds from the sale of mortgage loans. ResCap affiliate GMAC-RFC, which has been securitizing loans for years, was holding mortgage loans and classifying them as "cash flows from investing activities." Then, in a climate of low interest rates and heavy mortgage activity, the company started selling loans aggressively, but -- contrary to requirements of accounting rules -- didn't reclassify them as "cash flows from operations," these people said.

These people said ResCap's board was surprised March 16, just hours before GM was to make the filing, to find that ResCap had improperly classified the cash flows on loan sales as far as several years back. By then, Mr. Wagoner and Fritz Henderson, GM's vice chairman and chief financial officer, had reviewed the financials of GM and its subsidiaries and were prepared to certify them.

But GM's outside auditor, PricewaterhouseCoopers, refused to sign off on the documents. The board of GM and the audit committee of ResCap were notified, and both groups held phone-in meetings that day. Mr. Wagoner, in Asia at the time, participated in the call. He then canceled a speech he was to deliver March 20 before a group of business and government leaders from around the world. The group was also scheduled to meet with Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao.

ResCap's chief financial officer, Davee Olson, declined to be interviewed through a ResCap spokeswoman. Accounting experts and analysts expect GM's correction of the failure to reclassify could affect ResCap's cash flow from operations. That could also affect GM's consolidated cash flow from operations, which combines the numbers from GM's financing and automotive operations.

Any change wouldn't help GM or GMAC in the eyes of investors, experts said. Edward Katz, an associate professor of accounting at Pennsylvania State University, said investors often evaluate finance firms on the basis of their net income, not cash flows. Analysts don't generally use GM's consolidated numbers to assess the company's performance, so the mistake isn't likely to affect analysts' views of GM either, said Himanshu Patel, an analyst with J.P. Morgan.

SEC Subpoenas Research Firm (WSJ)

By Kara Scannell

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Securities and Exchange Commission, investigating possible market manipulation, requested documents about communications that Gradient Analytics Inc. had with journalists and others.

The SEC's San Francisco office sent a subpoena dated March 10 to Gradient, a Scottsdale, Ariz., securities research firm. The agency requested phone records, emails and other materials Gradient had exchanged with several hedge-fund advisers and journalists.

The SEC's action follows a round of subpoenas in which agency staff subpoenaed several journalists about their contacts with Gradient and others. That effort drew an outcry from journalists and an admonition from SEC Chairman Christopher Cox to the agency's staff. The new subpoena appears to let the SEC seek information about Gradient's contacts with journalists without seeking the information directly from the journalists themselves.

Gradient received a subpoena from the SEC several weeks ago, in addition to the one this month. Subpoenas, some dated Feb. 7, were sent to TheStreet.com and its founder James Cramer, as well as two journalists who work for Dow Jones & Co., publisher of The Wall Street Journal. The subpoenas to the journalists asked about their communications with a number of organizations, including Gradient, about Overstock.com Inc., an online discount retailer. Overstock.com has accused hedge funds of using the news media to drive down the price of its shares. The news organizations said they wouldn't comply with the request for documents.

After news of the journalists' subpoenas became public last month, Mr. Cox on Feb. 27 publicly criticized his staff for taking such a step against journalists without alerting him, his fellow commissioners, the agency's general counsel or its public-affairs office.

In late February Mr. Cox said subpoenaing reporters is an "extraordinary step" and put the subpoenas "on hold." He said the SEC and financial media have a symbiotic relationship in disclosing information to the public that he didn't want to chill.

He didn't say, however, that the agency wouldn't pursue other avenues to find out information. The SEC has opened a civil investigation into possible market manipulation of some small-capitalization stocks.

A spokeswoman for Gradient, which has denied wrongdoing, said yesterday, "We don't comment on any communications that we have with regulators except to say that we cooperate fully when asked for any information."

Lawyers familiar with the SEC said it is rare for the commission to subpoena journalists. The SEC, which can issue subpoenas independently of other federal authorities, such as the Justice Department, doesn't have an internal policy on how its enforcement staff can request information from journalists but says it will develop one.

The Justice Department, in its U.S. attorney's manual, says a prosecutor can obtain a subpoena for a member of the media without prior approval from the attorney general only when the action is necessary to "avoid the loss of life or the compromise of a security interest." Justice Department officials say reporters are subpoenaed only as a last course of action, after every other effort to obtain information needed for an investigation is exhausted.

"In general terms, our practice is consistent with the notion that we try to get information other than through a journalist because we are respectful of the journalist's privilege," said Linda Chatman Thomsen, chief of the SEC's enforcement staff. "It's important to remember that the privilege only pertains to the journalist, not the person on the other end of the conversation, who may be a securities-law violator."

While the SEC subpoena to other sources may comply with the Justice Department's guidelines, some lawyers say it may not fit exactly with the spirit of protecting a journalist's communications if a source knows he or she may have to turn over information about those conversations. While journalists can assert a journalistic privilege to avoid having to turn over information, a source lacks such a privilege.

Lawyers say the Justice Department routinely receives requests to subpoena journalists or debt-rating services that maintain the same protections. It's unclear how often those subpoenas are granted. Lawyers say they often don't learn the extent of the government's effort to get the information through other means unless a journalist fights a subpoena in court.

In some states where there are partial shield laws to protect journalists, lawyers said, details of the government's efforts often come out in court.

For example, in the criminal investigation into the possible illegal disclosure of a Central Intelligence Agency agent's identity, reporters were subpoenaed last, even after the president and vice president provided testimony.

In that case, a judge ruled that reporters had to testify or be held in contempt of court. Judith Miller, a New York Times reporter at the time, served several months in jail for refusing to identify her source, before testifying.

In a civil investigation, journalists may have more protections to argue they don't have to turn over documents.

CRIMINAL LAW:

US Pursues Former IRA Chief Over Forged Dollars (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopuloin Washington

Financial Times, March 27, 2006

The US is to seek the extradition of Sean Garland, president of the Irish Workers party, who has been indicted in the US on charges of trafficking North Korean-counterfeited $100 bills in Europe, Russia and former Soviet states.

Mr Garland, 72, the former chief of staff of the official IRA, was arrested in Belfast last year on a US warrant after a 16-year investigation.

The fake dollar bills - known as "supernotes" because of their high quality - started to appear around the world in 1989. But after being released on bail, Mr Garland fled to the Republic of Ireland to escape extradition.

A State Department official told the Financial Times that Washington planned to formally ask Ireland to extradite Mr Garland, although the official declined to comment on the timing. The US attorney for Washington DC and Justice Department declined to comment.

A spokesman for the Workers party declined to make Mr Garland available for comment, but directed inquiries to a website, (www.seangarland.org), which says: "He has been a militant and committed political activist all his life. He has never been involved in any type of criminal activity. For most of his life he has sought political change through democratic means."

The US attorney accuses him of operating a "years-long scheme to obtain, transport, sell, and pass as genuine, highly deceptive counterfeit $100 [bills]".

According to the indictment, Mr Garland (also known as "the Man with the Hat") and six co-defendants conspired to launder the fake notes between 1997 and 2000, allegedly trafficking them in a number of countries, including Ireland, the UK, Russia, Belarus, Poland, Denmark, the Czech Republic and Germany.

Speaking outside the White House during a visit to Washington on St Patrick's Day, Bertie Ahern, the Irish prime minister, said he had not discussed the case with George W. Bush, US president. Mr Ahern added that he would not become involved in the case, saying it was a matter for the Irish courts.

"We follow international obligations in cases, but it's the courts that make decisions," Mr Ahern said.

Brain Drain

In Unknown White Male--a new documentary about Doug Bruce, a 35-year-old man who woke up one morning on the New York City subway with no idea who or where he was--a Harvard psychology professor named Daniel Schacter plays a supporting but crucial role. He serves as the film's memory expert and, in between scenes of Bruce being reintroduced to his family and friends, Schacter appears on-screen to explain that Bruce likely suffers from an extremely rare condition known as retrograde amnesia. Unknown White Male has been greeted with rumors that Bruce is faking his memory loss and that the film is a hoax. But most reviewers have given both the man and the film the benefit of the doubt (Roger Ebert: "Unknown White Male is either (a) factual and authentic, or (b) the most convincing mockumentary ever made"). That, in no small part, is thanks to Schacter's persuasive performance. His authoritative tone and his ability to explain the vagaries of memory in impressively clinical terms, not to mention his Harvard affiliation, lend weight to Bruce's seemingly implausible tale. Now, on the heels of his big-screen debut, Schacter is preparing to vouch for the memory difficulties of another, albeit better known, white male. In January, Scooter Libby hired the Harvard psychology professor to help with his Plamegate defense.

On a recent afternoon, Schacter, a balding man with deep-set eyes and a furrowed brow, sat in his office on the eighth floor of a building just north of Harvard Yard. His bookshelves were lined with titles like The Handbook of Memory Disorders and

Neuropsychology of Memory; hanging from the walls were reproductions of memory-themed paintings by prominent artists, including Magritte and Dali. It was as if the memory expert had sought to create an environment in which, were he ever to forget that he is a memory expert, he would be instantly reminded of that identity. Schacter refused to discuss Libby's case or his involvement in it. "I really should not comment on anything to do with that," he said. But he agreed to talk about his work in more general terms, and, as he spoke, it wasn't difficult to discern how he might be able to help Dick Cheney's former chief of staff beat back obstruction of justice, perjury, and false statement charges--and stay out of the slammer.

According to Schacter, there are "seven sins of memory" (which is also the title of his most recent book), or seven common ways in which people's memories can malfunction. And, while Schacter himself wouldn't say so, it seems that at least three of those sins could serve as an innocent explanation--an alibi, if you will--for why Libby told a grand jury and FBI agents that he first learned of Valerie Plame's employment with the CIA from reporters. In fact, it appears that Libby conveyed that information to reporters after learning of Plame's CIA status from other government officials.

One such sin is "transience," which, as Schacter explained, is the forgetting that occurs with the passage of time. He pointed to a study by a Danish psychologist who, moments after learning of Swedish Prime Minister Olof Palme's assassination, recorded that he had heard the news on his radio while eating breakfast by himself. Several months later, when the psychologist tried to recall for the study how he learned of Palme's assassination, he was already misremembering certain details--reporting, for instance, that he had been with his wife when the news came over the radio. "All these things," Schacter said, "are modulated to some degree by time." Seeing as how Libby didn't speak to the FBI and the grand jury until months after his conversations with reporters, the sin of transience could be invoked to argue that he simply misremembered the details of how he learned of Plame's CIA status.

A second memory sin that might be useful to Libby's legal defense is one Schacter dubbed "absent-mindedness," which typically occurs when a person is doing too many things at once--or is focused on one particular thing and is therefore paying insufficient attention to form accurate memories. A person not remembering where he placed his car keys while he was preoccupied with thinking about a problem at work is one example of absent-mindedness. But Schacter ticked off other, more extreme examples, including a study--"done right here on the eighth floor"--in which participants were shown a film of a circle of people passing a basketball. While watching the film, the participants were supposed to keep track of the number of times the ball changed hands. In the middle of the scene, a person in a gorilla suit suddenly walks through the circle beating his chest. The remarkable thing is that only half of the study participants noticed the gorilla. "That study," Schacter said, "shows when attention is sharply focused, it's surprising what can occur outside the focus of attention and apparently not register."

Which is a point Libby's lawyers made, in so many words, in a recent court filing. "Mr. Libby was immersed throughout the relevant period in urgent and sensitive matters, some literally matters of life and death," they argued. "[I]n the constant rush of more pressing matters, any errors he made in his FBI interviews or grand jury testimony, months after the conversations, were the result of confusion, mistake or faulty memory, rather than a willful intent to deceive." Or, to put it another way, Libby was so focused on national security issues and terrorism that he didn't even notice--or failed to remember the exact details of how he learned about--the chest-beating gorilla Joe Wilson and his wife.

The third sin that could serve as Libby's get-out-of-jail-free card is the one Schacter called "misattribution"--remembering aspects of an experience correctly but attributing those aspects to the wrong source. For instance, if a person reads an interesting article in The New York Times but then, in recalling that article for friends, tells them that it ran in The Washington Post, that would be a case of "source misattribution." This, of course, is essentially what Patrick Fitzgerald has accused Libby of committing. Fitzgerald just has another name for it: perjury. But Schacter struck a less accusatory posture, explaining that the real victim of source misattribution is the misattributor himself, since he's often quite convinced that he's telling the truth. "I think, in general, [source misattribution] can be pernicious because you have the possibility for high-confidence errors, because the person's memory is right about some aspect of the event," Schacter said. "It's not uncommon for source misattributions to result in high-confidence, inaccurate memories."

Schacter noted that high-confidence, inaccurate memories are hardly unusual in the political realm. A couple of years ago, he wrote a New York Times op-ed trying to puzzle out why Richard Clarke and Condoleezza Rice had such different recollections of the Bush administration's response to terrorism issues. And then there was the he-said, she-said dispute between Clarence

Thomas and Anita Hill. The most famous instance of an inaccurate memory in politics, Schacter said, was that of Richard Nixon's White House Counsel John Dean, who, like Libby, was asked to recall conversations for an investigation into political wrongdoing. Dean provided such detailed recollections of his Oval Office conversations with Nixon and other officials that he came to be known as the "human tape recorder." But, when actual tapes of those conversations surfaced, it turned out that Dean's memory wasn't so accurate. He remembered the gist of the conversations, but not the details. "Sometimes he didn't even remember the gist accurately," Schacter noted. These were likely innocent mistakes, he continued, the sort anyone might make when performing the difficult task of trying to recall past events. But then Schacter remembered an alternative interpretation. "Of course," he said, "there's always going to be the question, in a case like that, as to whether some of it is intentional."

Convicted Of Forging Judge's Order, Attorney Is Given 27-Month Sentence (LAW)

By Tom Perrotta, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, March 27, 2006

Perry S. Reich, the Long Island, N.Y., attorney who stands convicted of forging a federal magistrate judge's order and lying to the government, was sentenced Friday to 27 months in prison after a judge described his plight as "disquieting" and unlike any case he had ever seen.

Reich, 57, was a respected attorney whose conviction stunned many in the legal community who knew him from his days as a clerk at the Appellate Division, 2nd Department, and at the Court of Appeals, and later as an appellate specialist with a varied practice.

Eastern District Judge Nicholas G. Garaufis likened Reich's story to a Greek tragedy.

"I don't know why he did what he did -- I don't know if he knows why he did what he did," Judge Garaufis said. "I'm not sure that any rational lawyer would ever do anything like this. It defies logic."

Reich spoke briefly, expressing regret and asking the judge to consider that he had been a "good and honest lawyer" for 30 years.

"I'm standing here today with my career destroyed, my life in shambles," he said.

Prosecutors had recommended a sentence of between 63 and 78 months, or 6 1/2 years, while the Probation Department suggested between 27 and 31 months.

Reich's appellate attorneys, Benjamin Brafman and Mark M. Baker of Brafman & Associates, asked for a period of probation with no incarceration.

Brafman and Baker, who were hired by Reich after his conviction, argued that Reich might be a pathological liar who truly believes he did not forge the order and fax it to an adversary, as a psychiatrist had suggested following an evaluation. They also stressed the many letters of support he received, his unblemished record and his reputation among others in the profession. Numerous friends and members of the legal community attended Reich's sentencing to offer their support.

Brafman admitted, however, that his argument was a difficult one to make. He said he initially was reluctant to take Reich as a client because he knew that without "divine judicial intervention," Reich would be looking at a substantial jail sentence.

"I'm not completely convinced that Mr. Reich is in his right mind," Brafman said. No lawyer, he said, could think "that if you did something this stupid, this outrageous, that it would not be discovered shortly thereafter."

'ABSOLUTELY OFFENSIVE'

Assistant U.S. Attorney Amy Busa argued that claims about Reich's mental state were undermined by the fact that he had changed his story several times. She said he engaged in significant planning in an attempt to obstruct the judicial process.

"If the defendant truly believed his lie, he would be telling the same story every time," she said. She added: "It's absolutely offensive what the defendant did to the judiciary."

Reich continues to deny that he faxed to an adversary a fake order purportedly rendered by Magistrate Judge Roanne L. Mann, who was handling civil litigation between a brokerage firm, Ryan Beck & Co., and two former clients.

In the fake order, Magistrate Judge Mann reversed one of her previous rulings and recused herself from the litigation. Reich was involved in similar litigation with the brokerage, which had purchased the assets of another brokerage that Reich blamed for mismanaging his life's savings of $2 million. Prosecutors allege that Reich intended to discredit the brokerage and compel it to settle his case.

The evidence at trial showed that a phone call was made from Reich's home, via a pre-paid calling card, on June 17, 2003, to the fax machine of Joel Davidson, who represented Ryan Beck. Upon receiving the fake order, which was favorable to him, Davidson sent it to other attorneys associated with the firm. When Mann alerted the parties that the order was a fake, Davidson initially was suspected of forging it.

'THERE'S NO JOKE ABOUT IT'

Evidence soon pointed to Reich, though he denied any involvement to federal investigators when they came to his home. During a subsequent meeting with investigators and federal prosecutors, Reich was given the chance to admit that he faxed the order as a joke, according to testimony at his trial. If he did, his fate would have been left in the hands of the grievance committee.

Reich would not admit his role -- a fact that Judge Garaufis on Friday described as the most telling aspect of the case.

"There's no joke about it," the judge said. "I believe Mr. Reich thought he could get away with it."

Reich's attorneys asked that Reich be incarcerated at a minimum security prison in Otisville, about 70 miles northwest of New York City. Garaufis agreed to make that request.

Reich will remain free until he is scheduled to surrender on June 15. He declined to comment after the hearing ended.

Peter N. Katz, a former Assistant U.S. Attorney in the Eastern District who is now a federal prosecutor in New Jersey, also appeared for the government.

Plot Line Shifts In Pellicano Inquiry (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Ted Rohrlich, And Richard Verrier, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

FBI finds no evidence that actor Steven Seagal hired the detective to intimidate a reporter.

Federal officials investigating infamous Hollywood detective Anthony Pellicano have found no convincing evidence that actor Steven Seagal was involved in depositing a dead fish on a reporter's windshield in June 2002 and now believe Pellicano had some other motivation for staging the mob-style threat.

While prosecutors have yet to explain what that impetus was, their current lack of interest in Seagal fundamentally alters the original plot line of this Hollywood cliffhanger and raises this question: If not the movie star, then who was Pellicano working for?

The original premise was that Seagal had hired Pellicano to threaten Los Angeles Times reporter Anita Busch and scare her off a story about the actor's problems with organized crime.

The FBI initially subscribed to that theory because Alexander Proctor, the former convict that Pellicano allegedly hired to put a dead fish with a rose in its mouth and a note that said "Stop" on the smashed windshield of Busch's car, claimed he was working for Pellicano on Seagal's behalf.

Seagal's lawyers have denied since the fall of 2002 that the actor had anything to do with the threat, but federal authorities have never publicly exonerated him or explained why they eventually came to disbelieve Proctor.

"As we looked into it, there was very little to corroborate" Proctor's claim, said a source close to the investigation. "There was a lot to suggest that Seagal was not involved."

Indeed, the 110-count federal indictment accusing Pellicano and six others of conspiring to blackmail and intimidate dozens of celebrities, business executives and others in Los Angeles alleges that the private eye started spying on Busch well before Seagal was even on her radar.

Pellicano allegedly began prying into Busch's life nine days after she and her reporting partner, Bernard Weinraub, wrapped up a series of damaging articles in the New York Times about former super agent Michael Ovitz — and more than two weeks before she began working on the Seagal story for the Los Angeles Times.

On May 16, 2002, Pellicano allegedly asked his contact in the Los Angeles Police Department, Sgt. Mark Arneson — also now indicted — to troll for information on Busch and Weinraub in law enforcement databases. Pellicano also is accused of paying telephone company technician Rayford Earl Turner to obtain confidential information that later enabled the private eye to tap Busch's phone. She no longer works for The Times.

As the racketeering investigation has widened, a big unknown is the extent to which Pellicano acted at the behest of high-powered lawyers or their clients — or on his own in a bid to impress them.

But for whatever reasons they may have been targeted, several others with Busch on the list of Pellicano's purported victims also had some unpleasant history with Ovitz.

On the same day Pellicano allegedly requested Busch's information, he turned to Arneson for data on James Casey, who had sued Ovitz's Artists Management Group two months earlier to collect $450,000 he alleged he was owed for referring an athlete to the firm.

Six days before that, Pellicano had asked Arneson for information on Arthur Bernier, a former Artists Management executive who sued Ovitz in April 2002 for wrongful termination, alleging he was owed about $200,000.

And almost a year earlier, Pellicano allegedly went after two other Ovitz adversaries, talent agents Bryan Lourd and Kevin Huvane, ordering their names run through the law enforcement databases as well.

Both were former proteges of Ovitz at Creative Artists Agency, which he co-founded. They became his competitors when Ovitz started Artists Management Group after a brief but tumultuous stint as president of the Walt Disney Co. in the mid-1990s.

Federal officials would not say if they regard Ovitz, who has testified before a grand jury in the case, as anything other than a witness.

Through his lawyer, Ovitz acknowledged that a law firm working on behalf of Artists Management on the Casey and Bernier matters, Gorry Meyer & Rudd, retained Pellicano in early May 2002.

But Ovitz denies any knowledge of the alleged wiretapping or illegal background checks detailed in the indictment, his lawyer said.

"At no time did Mr. Ovitz or anyone on his behalf ever direct or instruct Mr. Pellicano, or anyone, to engage in improper or illegal means to carry out the legitimate tasks for which he was engaged," said James Ellis, Ovitz's personal attorney. "Nor was Mr. Ovitz aware of any improper or illegal activities undertaken by Mr. Pellicano at any time."

Ellis said that Ovitz has been told by federal authorities that some of his "conversations were recorded by Anthony as well." Ellis said it was unclear whether Ovitz was talking to Pellicano or other people in the recorded conservations.

Ellis said Ovitz was unaware of, and did not authorize, Pellicano to conduct "any type of background check" on Lourd or Huvane in 2001.

Ellis also said prosecutors have assured Ovitz — once known as the most powerful man in Hollywood — that "he is considered a witness in this matter," and nothing more.

"Mr. Ovitz was interviewed over two years ago by the authorities and answered all of their questions. He also testified under oath in front of the grand jury and again answered the questions that were posed to him," Ellis said. "There simply has never been any indication that the authorities believe that Mr. Ovitz was complicit in any criminal or improper acts. Any implication otherwise is just wrong."

Seagal's lawyers, in denying that the actor had anything to do with the fish incident, said that their client, if anything, was one of Pellicano's victims.

Court records indicate that, rather than working for Seagal at the time Busch was threatened, Pellicano was actually working against him on behalf of Gorry Meyer & Rudd, the same firm that had hired Pellicano for help in Artist Management's disputes with Casey and Bernier. Gorry Meyer alleged it was owed $260,000 in legal fees by Seagal.

In defending Seagal in the fee dispute, the law firm of Lavely & Singer accused Gorry Meyer of hiring Pellicano to intimidate Seagal.

The law firm did so, Lavely & Singer contended in court papers, even though one of its partners, Christopher Rudd, was "aware of the substantial hatred" between the actor and Pellicano and "knew that simply hiring Mr. Pellicano to attempt to collect the disputed fees would constitute a threat."

But while finding evidence that Pellicano had been hired as a private investigator, the judge in the case found no proof that he did anything to threaten or intimidate Seagal, court records show.

A year earlier, Pellicano surfaced in another dispute in which Gorry Meyer was engaged — this one involving Ovitz's company.

In an unusual role for a private investigator who bragged of sometimes settling disputes with a baseball bat, Pellicano acted as a negotiator for Gorry Meyer in Ovitz's trademark dispute.

At the time, his Artists Management Group was locked in a legal battle with a firm with the same initials, Advantage Marketing Group, a Texas-based company whose clients have included former Dallas Cowboys star running back Emmitt Smith.

Ovitz's company sued in federal court over the right to use the AMG name. In a counterclaim, Advantage contended it had actively used the name since 1985 and intended to keep it. One of its executives accused Artists Management of attempting to "steamroll us because we're a small agency."

After having read about the lawsuit, Ellis said, "Mr. Pellicano noted that he had a good relationship with certain parties involved and suggested that he might be able to settle the matter. He and other mutual acquaintances were authorized by counsel to give it a try. It is not unusual, especially in the entertainment industry, to enlist the participation of such interme diaries in an effort to resolve business disagreements."

In June 2002, Pellicano contacted a Washington, D.C.-based attorney for Advantage Marketing, Carla Calcagno, and told her he was authorized to help settle the dispute, according to two sources familiar with the matter.

Calcagno declined to comment.

But the sources said she was wary of Pellicano because of his reputation as a Hollywood tough guy and refused to deal with him in crafting the settlement.

Neither this case, nor Ovitz's name, appear in the indictment, which notes that Pellicano sometimes took it upon himself to initiate his spying, in a bid to strengthen his reputation with "lucrative clients, including entertainment celebrities and executives, attorneys and law firms."

One high-profile entertainment lawyer who has done work for Ovitz's firm, Bertram Fields, has acknowledged being a subject of the FBI investigation. Many of the counts in the indictment pertain to Pellicano's alleged wiretapping and illegal background checks of adversaries of Fields' clients.

As in the trademark case, Fields also has used the pugnacious private eye in an unusual capacity.

Los Angeles attorney Barry Rothman said in an interview that Fields once referred him to Pellicano to handle negotiations in a case of alleged child molestation. That happened in 1993, when Rothman represented the father of a boy allegedly molested by singer Michael Jackson, a Fields client, who also was represented by Ovitz's Creative Artists Agency.

When he contacted Fields to discuss the allegations, Rothman said, the entertainment attorney directed him to Pellicano.

"He just told me that's the way it's going to be," Rothman recalled. "He said, 'If you're gonna talk to anybody, you're gonna talk to Anthony Pellicano, not me. You have to speak to him — only. With a capital O.' "

'Mafia Cops' To Break Ranks (NYDN)

By John Marzulli

New York Daily News, March 25, 2006

They were alleged partners in crime, but the so-called Mafia cops may go their own way at their trial.

Louis Eppolito doesn't plan to call a single witness in his defense; partner Stephen Caracappa may take the stand, their lawyers said yesterday.

"The government has absolutely not proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt," said lawyer Bettina Schein, who represents Eppolito.

Federal prosecutors, on the other hand, appear confident that their case is going extremely well, largely due to the devastating testimony of chief witness Burton Kaplan, the alleged go-between for the Luchese crime family and the former NYPD detectives in numerous gangland killings.

The government plans to rest its case Wednesday without calling mob turncoat Peter Chiodo, who has apparently been dropped from the witness list.

Caracappa's lawyer Edward Hayes said no decision had been reached on his client testifying, which is always fraught with risk.

"I think the big issue is Kaplan - if the jury believes him we have a problem, if they don't, we're okay," Hayes said. "Our expected defense would be Steve is a very talented detective with no motive and had no opportunity to do a lot of these things."

'MOB' COP'S GAMBLE (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 27, 2006

For accused mob cop Louis Eppolito, it seems the best defense is no defense at all.

Lawyers for the former detective accused of moonlighting as a hit man said yesterday that neither Eppolito, nor any other witness, would take the stand in his defense - a move likely to bring his high-profile racketeering trial to a speedy close.

In a hearing in Brooklyn federal court, defense attorney Bettina Schein told Judge Jack Weinstein that the most the defense would do to respond to the prosecution's case against her client was file paperwork next week.

"The government has absolutely not proven its case beyond a reasonable doubt," Schein told The Post after the hearing.

That means closing arguments in the trial could be heard as early as April 3, since prosecutors said they would rest on Wednesday. The trial had been expected to drag out as long as six weeks.

Co-defendant Stephen Caracappa's legal team said they had not decided whether to put him on the stand, nor if they would call any witnesses.

Prosecutors say Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were involved in eight murders between 1986 and 1990 while on both the NYPD payroll and that of Luchese crime family underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

But the feds' case may hinge on whether the jury believes the five-year statute of limitations on the racketeering charges has expired - the very same sticking point that prevented a jury from convicting John "Junior" Gotti earlier this month.

It has long been accepted that Eppolito and Caracappa retired to Las Vegas in the early 1990s.

But they were arrested a year ago as prosecutors argued that the murders were part of an ongoing conspiracy that lasted through a 2005 drug deal with FBI informant Steven Corso.

Corso - a former accountant who started working with the government after he was caught embezzling $5.4 million - testified earlier this week that he had secretly recorded meetings with Eppolito about financing for a movie project, which turned into a drug deal.

Defense attorneys argue that the prosecution has not shown a continuing racketeering operation from the 1990s and therefore the five-year statute of limitations has expired on the alleged crimes.

Eppolito and Caracappa face life in prison if convicted. The trial continues Monday.

'Mafia Cops' Trial Has Lots Of Theatrics (KCS)

By Larry Mcshane

The Kansas City Star, March 27, 2006

NEW YORK - Louie Eppolito had a story to tell. And, more importantly, one to sell.

The decorated ex-New York police detective, who also happened to be the son of a mobster, was living in Las Vegas and trying to peddle doomed screenplays with titles like "Murder In Youngstown." Eppolito was looking for an investor in his latest project - and he was unconcerned about the source of the cash.

"If you said to me, `Lou, I wanna introduce you to Jack Smith, he wants to invest in this film,' (and) he says, `$75,000 comes in a (expletive) shoe box,' that's fine with me," Eppolito said during a surreptitiously taped conversation with a federal informant. "I don't care. I've had people give me money before."

It sounds like movie dialogue, maybe something out of "Get Shorty." No surprise - the trial of so-called "Mafia Cops" Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, heading into its third week, has featured plenty of theatrics.

The courtroom histrionics occasionally threaten to overshadow one of the most serious prosecutions in city history: a pair of top-echelon NYPD detectives accused of using their prized gold shields to kill eight people at the behest of a brutal mob underboss, Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso.

Prosecutors allege that Eppolito, 57, and Caracappa, 64, were partners in crime from 1979 to last year, when they were arrested in Las Vegas. They remain free on $5 million bail.

The first day of testimony was punctuated with a screaming match between turncoat mobster Alphonse "Little Al" D'Arco and defense attorney Bruce Cutler, who made his reputation defending the late Gambino family boss John Gotti.

"I don't know what the hell you're talking about," snapped the grandfatherly D'Arco, 73, his Brooklyn accent unaltered by 15 years in witness protection. "You're not making any sense to me."

Cutler, his deep voice rising, tried to ask another question: "Wouldn't you agree with me ..."

"I wouldn't agree with you on anything!" shouted D'Arco, who was threatened with contempt by U.S. District Judge Jack B. Weinstein. That was before the one-time Luchese boss ripped into Cutler as a loudmouth and a cheapskate.

The judge showed little more tolerance for Cutler, cutting off his cross-examination for shouting at D'Arco.

The defendants themselves are a mismatched pair: the portly Eppolito, whose reputation was made as a street cop, comes to court in an ill-fitting sports coat. Caracappa - so thin he was known among fellow cops as "The Stick" - is fastidious in appearance, right down to his neatly trimmed mustache.

The prosecution has already called its key witness, confessed drug dealer Burton Kaplan, who spent four days testifying about the two detectives' brutal work on behalf of Luchese underboss Casso. Kaplan implicated the pair in a dozen homicides.

Cross-examination of another prosecution witness, crooked accountant Steven Corso, focused on his theft of $5.3 million from an ex-employer to finance a life of what he called "girlfriends, jewelry and going out."

It was Corso who recorded the conversations with Eppolito about film financing. The ex-detective, playing up his mob pedigree, sprinkled the conversation with mob names like "Jimmy the Buffalo" and the late crime boss Joe Bonanno.

There was one witness whose testimony tugged on heartstrings while going to the heart of the case: Pauline Pipitone, describing how her youngest son, 26-year-old Nicholas Guido, had come home for Christmas dinner in 1986.

It was Guido's misfortune to share his name with a mobster involved in a botched hit on Casso. When the underboss wanted revenge, prosecutors said, he turned to the two detectives - who provided an address for the wrong Nicholas Guido.

The innocent man was showing off his new car when he was shot by mob hit men. Pipitone was inside washing dishes.

"I ran over to the car," she testified. "He was sitting up at the wheel. I went to touch his hand, and he must have just died. His fingertips were cold."

In Ex-Detective's Trial, His Book Provides A Bizarre Plot Outline (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

Beneath the murders, the mobsters, the gamblers, the strippers, the tax cheats, diamond smugglers, thieves, hoods, cops, cons, corpses, crooks and marijuana dealers, there is — at the core — a book.

It is the 251-page memoir "Mafia Cop," and it sits at the center of the most macabre and bizarre racketeering trial to unfold in years. Its author, Louis J. Eppolito, a retired New York detective, is the chief defendant in the case, a transcontinental drama in which he stands accused, along with his former partner, Stephen Caracappa, of committing drug crimes in Las Vegas after taking part in at least eight Brooklyn murders for the mob.

Rarely since 1912, when Lt. Charles Becker was tried for the killing of a two-bit gambler named Beansie Rosenthal, have there been such shocking allegations against New York City police officers. And yet despite the grisly charges ("eight bodies," as the police would say), the current case has delved into the absurd.

Last April, a month after Mr. Eppolito, 57, and Mr. Caracappa, 64, were arrested in Las Vegas (at a restaurant where Jerry Lewis often celebrates his birthday), Variety was already reporting that three film studios were vying for the rights to "Mafia Cop." And that did not include what Variety called the "fictional drama" that Irwin Winkler (producer of "Rocky") and Nicholas Pileggi (screenwriter of "Goodfellas") were doing on their own.

Once the trial began, the chief witness in its Brooklyn phase was revealed to be an old, arthritic marijuana dealer with a talent for "diversionary driving" and subsidiary interests in African diamonds and stolen leisure suits. The chief witness in the trial's

Las Vegas phase was a disgraced, pomaded C.P.A. with a taste for gambling and bruschetta. He moved through the city surreptitiously recording members of its underworld — a sort of Studs Terkel of Las Vegas crime.

Both men testified that Mr. Eppolito gave them signed copies of "Mafia Cop," which has been mentioned at the trial almost every day. It contains the germ of the government's dispute with its author — his claim that he broke with the mobsters in his past. It contains the seeds of his defense — that he is not a killer but a writer, a man who "makes things up, creates," as his lawyer said.

The book, co-written with Bob Drury, is the autobiographical account of Mr. Eppolito's journey through the Police Department as the son of a gangster aligned with Brooklyn's Gambino crime family. Rich in anecdote and salty dialogue, it seeks to portray its author as a conflicted but ultimately dedicated Kings County lawman.

As such, it reflects the comparatively minor role that has been played so far by Mr. Caracappa, who, like pepper, always gets second billing. It has even lent its title to the tabloids, which inevitably refer in headlines to the "Mafia Cops" case.

In Chapter 13, Mr. Eppolito tells of being a cadet at the Police Academy, where an instructor in his homicide class has just hung up "a chart full of mug shots signifying the Gambino crime family tree."

A classmate, he relates, says: " 'Look, Lou, this guy has the same last name as you.' His mouth dropped open when I told him that he was pointing to my old man."

It was passages like this that led Library Journal, in its review of "Mafia Cop" (Simon & Schuster, 1992), to proclaim that the book "bristled with street language," though if Mr. Eppolito's writing bears a whiff of Old World Brooklyn, his trial, on the fourth floor of the federal court in Brooklyn Heights, contains the full range of the borough's underworld sights and smells.

The events discussed at trial are exceptionally convoluted, but include murders on the grass berm of the Belt Parkway, diamond dealers buried under seven feet of concrete and kidnapped mobsters kicking in the trunks of unmarked cars.

Beneath the facts, however, lies an urban universe of glottal accents and working-class grammar that may be getting as old as the marijuana dealer, Burton Kaplan, 72, who, in testimony, said that he should have "stood" in school.

This milieu — south of Eastern Parkway — was captured by Bruce Cutler, Mr. Eppolito's lawyer, a self-described "anachronism" who engaged in a verbal smoker with a gangland boss and witness who accused him from the stand of wearing "long collars" in the old style and of never picking up the tab when he dined with his "crew" of Mafiosi.

It was captured by Pauline Pipitone, the mother of an innocent man shot to death one Christmas Day, who testified to reaching out for her dead boy's hand and finding that his "fingertips were cold."

It was captured by Betty Hydell, a white-haired housewife and mother of a mobster, who told the jury how she "made the block" in her car, Ma Barker-style, when a pair of officers, resembling the two defendants, drove past her home.

But perhaps it was captured best of all by Mr. Kaplan, who after learning that his patron in the mob had "gone bad" and decided to work with the authorities, climbed from the bath, packed a bag, kissed his wife and, at the age of 61, went "on the lam," moving from San Diego, to Mexico, to Oregon and, finally, to Las Vegas, where, like Jerry Lewis, Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa had moved when they retired.

There, they had the bad luck to befriend the disgraced accountant, Steven Corso, who was paying penance to the government — for having stolen $5.4 million from his clients — by systematically recording more than 1,200 hours with various mobsters and exotic dancers, using what he called his "device."

He recorded the defendants, too, at their homes and at lavish three-hour dinners at restaurants like Il Mulino in the Forum Shops at Caesars Palace. In February 2005, he said, he caught them agreeing to arrange a drug deal for some "Hollywood punks" who were coming to town and whom Mr. Eppolito — by then, writing scripts in his garage — wanted to impress.

The detective had always had a touch of the poet. Twelve years after "Mafia Cop" was consigned to the remainder bin, he was scouring the West for money to produce a script he had written, "Murder in Youngstown" — or as he referred to it, on Mr. Corso's tapes: "Youngstown."

The tapes in fact portray him as a classic Hollywood type: the unsuccessful writer who talks a good game. They are filled with semi-knowledgeable references to "second-unit directing" and monologues about why Jews are better at making movies than Italians. They have also been used by the defense to suggest that Mr. Eppolito was, in Mr. Cutler's words, "no gangster, no associate, no wannabe," but "a retired detective who turned his back on that life and knows how to write."

Beyond the struggling-writer defense, Mr. Cutler — who apparently has never met an insult, or a synonym, he didn't like — has reviled the witnesses as "reprobates," "lowlifes," "louts" and cowards who "wet their pants." Edward Hayes, Mr. Caracappa's lawyer, has also sought to impeach their credibility, though at a much less fevered pitch.

The dark horse in the trial is the statute of limitations, which Federal District Judge Jack B. Weinstein said on Thursday was "coming to a head." It is five years in a conspiracy case, which means the jury will have to decide if the two defendants were engaged in a single continuing enterprise that stretched from murder in the 1980's to a drug deal just last year.

Meanwhile, "Mafia Cop" has been reissued by Pocket Star with a cover line that reads, "The book by the ex-N.Y.P.D. detective whose recent arrest for multiple counts of murder made national headlines."

Not that Mr. Eppolito cares.

"I don't get residuals," he said on Thursday. "I don't get anything from that book."

CANARY 'SING'LES OUT VICIOUS VINNY GORGEOUS (NYPOST)

By Zach Haberman

The New York Post, March 27, 2006

A one-time protege of Vincent "Vinny Gorgeous" Basciano's yesterday fingered the former acting boss of the Bonanno crime family as a shotgun-wielding killer.

Bonanno capo-turned-canary Dominick Cicale testified about two murders he committed with his former mentor - and one he prevented.

The hulking Cicale, 39, said he and Basciano were the two gunmen who murdered Frank Santoro as he walked his Doberman pinscher in the Throgs Neck section of The Bronx in February 2001.

"I was one of the shooters," Cicale said during testimony in Brooklyn federal court, noting that he carried a six-shooter while Basciano was toting a "pistol grip shotgun."

When asked why the man he described as a "junkie" was murdered, Cicale said, "Frank Santoro was supposedly looking to kidnap one of Vinny Basciano's sons."

He explained in grisly detail how he and Basciano, 46, jumped out of an idling car and started blasting bullets at him.

"I said, 'Excuse me,' and as he turned around, I started firing shots at his head, and Vinny started firing also."

Basciano continued to unleash his wrath on Santoro, even after his body hit the ground, Cicale said.

Basciano shook his head in disgust at the sight of his former charge on the witness stand.

Cicale also testified about how Basciano brought him along over the years, helping him become a "made" member of the crime family, and teaching him tricks of the trade such as how to avoid being followed in a car and advice on what to listen to while driving.

"I should listen to 1010 [WINS] and news channels because music dulls the senses," Cicale said he was instructed.

Reputed Russian Mobsters Arrested On Murder-for-hire Charges (NSDY/AP)

By Desmond Butler, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, March 27, 2006

NEW YORK -- Two reputed Russian mobsters were arrested Friday after hitmen they tried to hire to kill twin brothers went to Ukrainian police with secretly recorded conversations about the murder plot, federal prosecutors said.

Monya Elson and Leonid Roytman were arraigned on murder-for-hire charges Friday in Brooklyn federal court. Both pleaded not guilty.

"This is a case of two Russian mobsters who personify ruthlessness and cold-blooded greed," FBI Assistant Director Mark Mershon said in a statement.

Authorities charge that Elson sent Roytman to Kiev in early 2005 to arrange for the murder of Slava and Alex Konstantinovsky, twin brothers known in Ukraine as the "brothers Karamazov."

Investigators believe Elson has been a target of several murder attempts and that the Konstantinovsky brothers may have previously tried to kill him, according to the FBI's application for an arrest warrant. They also think Elson wanted to take over the brothers' businesses, including a major Ukrainian bank, the document said.

Authorities charge that Roytman, who once worked as a head of security for the Konstantinovskys, offered the hitmen $100,000 and a percentage of his former employers' businesses for the job and discussed how the brothers could be killed.

The hitmen recorded the conversation as insurance in case Roytman and Elson came after them, the FBI said. They eventually went to the police after Elson became upset that the job had not been done quickly.

Ukrainian authorities then began an elaborate undercover investigation with the FBI and the New York Police Department.

After Elson set a deadline early this month for the hitmen to kill one of the brothers, police had the hitmen report to Elson that they had killed Slava Konstantinovsky, the warrant application said.

"Elson said 'good' and asked if it was '100 percent taken care of,'" the document said, citing the recordings.

Meanwhile, Ukrainian authorities had Slava Konstantinovsky taken to a safe location and arranged for his brother to report him missing, giving Elson the impression that the murder had taken place, the FBI said.

When Elson arranged to make a payment to the men, he was instructed to pay an associate in New York named "Gena." Authorities then secretly videotaped Elson giving $30,000 in cash to an undercover NYPD agent posing as the associate. They also recorded Elson confirming with one of the turncoat hitmen that the payment had been made, the FBI said.

If convicted, Elson and Roytman could face 10-year prison terms and fines. Elson was previously convicted in federal court of racketeering and was on supervised release when he was arrested. He was also convicted of narcotics trafficking in Israel in 1982.

An attorney for Elson, Donna Newman, declined comment. A message left for Roytman's attorney Friday evening was not immediately returned.

USC Teacher Charged In Real Estate Investment Scam (LAT)

By Mai Tran, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

He bilked students, others of $1.5 million for show horses and personal items, FBI says.

A USC lecturer who teaches at the university's business school was arrested Friday by FBI agents for allegedly bilking investors — many of them his students — out of more than $1.5 million and spending much of the money on show horses.

Barry Howard Landreth, 36, was arrested at the two-story home he rents in Orange County's gated Coto de Caza community on charges of wire fraud. Authorities said that he lured investors into a real estate investment scheme, promising them huge returns.

Landreth has been a part-time lecturer in real estate finance and development at USC's School of Policy, Planning and Development and the college's Marshall School of Business. Landreth, who graduated from USC in 2001 with a master's degree in real estate development, has been placed on administrative leave, said James Grant, a USC spokesman.

FBI agents said that Landreth told investors that their investments in Nevada and Illinois commercial properties and land would yield a 190% return.

Landreth deposited $718,000 of their money into his personal bank account, officials said. He used much of the remainder of the funds for personal expenses, prosecutors said, including $500,000 to buy and care for show jumping horses, a $73,000 Cadillac Escalade and $52,000 for brokerage accounts in his and his wife's names.

On Friday, Landreth appeared in federal court in Santa Ana. U.S. Magistrate Judge Robert N. Block ordered Landreth held at the Santa Ana City Jail and set bail at $500,000. A preliminary hearing was scheduled for April 7.

Landreth is the founder, president and chief executive officer of Webster Realty Investors Inc., a company started in 1995 that bills itself as a diversified real estate investment and development company with projects nationwide, according to the FBI.

In a 28-page affidavit, investigators said Landreth hired students to work as project managers at his company and paid them $100,000 a year to raise money to fund the "projects." The students persuaded their parents and others to invest in what they were told were commercial development projects in Las Vegas and Chicago, said FBI Special Agent Brad Howard.

Authorities said suspicions grew when investors did not get their returns, monthly investment statements failed to arrive and — in at least two cases — students were not paid. The FBI said that those two students, who invested $215,000 and worked for Landreth for nearly a year, discovered that the properties were owned by someone else. When they knocked on Landreth's door and asked for their money back, Landreth gave them excuses, the affidavit said.

Landreth allegedly drew up fake sales agreements and documents showing that he bought or owned the projects, Howard said. Landreth, he said, did not buy or own any of them. Landreth's attorney, James D. Riddet of Santa Ana, declined to comment, saying that he had not reviewed the evidence.

According to public records, Landreth was also under suspicion in 2004 in South Carolina after Myrtle Beach officials chose him to revitalize the Pavilion Amusement Park.

Landreth and his wife, Treena Gillespie, an assistant professor at Cal State Fullerton and president of her own consulting company, conducted focus groups with residents and business owners in South Carolina.

She faces no charges.

In January 2005, Landreth withdrew from the project amid questions about his background and finances, said Mark Kruea, a Myrtle Beach spokesman. Landreth denied a city-appointed committee's requests for his references and additional financial information, Kruea said.

Brochures Landreth distributed in South Carolina stated his company was worth billions, and, back in California, investors were told that it was worth $3 billion. Howard said the company had barely $200 in its bank account.

Times staff writer E. Scott Reckard contributed to this report.

Former Pavilion Developer Arrested (TSSC)

The State (SC), March 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A part-time business lecturer at the University of Southern California, who briefly worked on a plan for redeveloping the Pavilion Amusement Park in Myrtle Beach, S.C., was arrested Friday for allegedly running a Ponzi scheme that authorities say bilked at least $1.5 million from real estate investors.

Barry Landreth, 36, was taken into custody at his home in the gated community of Coto de Caza in Orange County. He was jailed Friday on $500,000 bond, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller. A preliminary hearing was set for April 7.

FBI agents also seized assets Landreth allegedly acquired with his victim's funds, including a luxury car and several show horses.

In January 2005, Landreth quit working on a plan to redevelop the Pavilion Amusement Park into a year-round attraction after questions were raised about his credentials and his firm's financial stability.

The company that owns the Pavilion recently said the park will close at the end of this season.

The part-time lecturer in real estate finance and development at the University of Southern California's graduate schools, allegedly told his victims he purchased land in Las Vegas and Chicago and that reselling the properties would bring returns of 190 percent within 30 to 45 days, FBI special agent Brad Howard stated in a criminal complaint.

Landreth and the business he operated from his home did not own the properties, the complaint said.

Authorities said Landreth's business was actually a Ponzi scheme, in which any money paid to investors comes from money put in by other investors. They said many of those who invested were business students who also worked briefly for Landreth but did not earn the salaries they were promised.

Instead of investing his clients' money, authorities said, Landreth deposited it into his personal account, spending $500,000 of it to buy show jumping horses.

Only a few persistent investors were ever paid, according to the complaint.

Federal authorities said they began investigating last fall after receiving complaints from victims.

Landreth, who was teaching a course at the university's Marshall School of Business, was placed on administrative leave following news of his arrest, said university spokesman James Grant.

Landreth received a master's degree in real estate development in 2001 and was "an occasional part-time lecturer" at the business school and the University of Southern California School of Policy, Planning, and Development, according to Grant.

FBI Arrests Former Pavilion Developer (MBSN)

Myrtle Beach (SC) Sun News, March 27, 2006

A California developer once involved with The Myrtle Beach Pavilion Amusement Park redevelopment project has been arrested in connection with an alleged Ponzi scheme in California that authorities say bilked at least $1.5 million from real estate investors, including some of his students at the University of Southern California.

Barry Landreth, 36, was taken into custody Friday at his home in the gated community of Coto de Caza in Orange County. He was jailed on $500,000 bond, said FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller. A preliminary hearing was set for April 7.

Landreth allegedly promised investors returns of 190 percent, then spent their money on show horses and a luxury car, according to the criminal complaint.

Landreth left Myrtle Beach under scrutiny in January 2005 after nine months of work on the Pavilion plan with the Myrtle Beach Downtown Redevelopment Corp. and Pavilion owner Burroughs & Chapin Co. Inc. Questions about his credentials surfaced after he failed to come up with money he promised in a side deal.

Landreth, a part-time lecturer in real estate finance and development at the University of Southern California's graduate schools, allegedly told his victims he purchased land in Las Vegas and Chicago and that reselling the properties would bring returns of 190 percent within 30 to 45 days, FBI Special Agent Brad Howard stated in a criminal complaint.

Landreth and the business he operated from his home did not own the properties, the complaint said.

Authorities said Landreth's business was actually a Ponzi scheme, in which any money paid to investors comes from money put in by other investors. They said many of those who invested were University of Southern California business students who also worked briefly for Landreth but did not earn the salaries they were promised.

Instead of investing his clients' money, authorities said, Landreth deposited it into his personal account, spending $500,000 of it to buy show jumping horses.

Only a few persistent investors were ever paid, according to the complaint.

In Myrtle Beach, locals started questioning Landreth's financials and qualifications in December 2004 after he didn't come up with money he promised to build a time share resort with John Reyelt, the DRC's vice chairman. Landreth resigned from the Pavilion project after he couldn't provide requested documents about his business.

FBI agents in California seized assets Landreth allegedly acquired with investors' funds, including a luxury car and several show horses. During his presentation to Myrtle Beach's DRC in May 2004, Landreth talked about his horses, including pictures of them among slides for the Pavilion redevelopment.

Federal authorities said they began investigating Landreth in California last fall after receiving complaints from victims.

Landreth, who was teaching a course at the University of Southern California Marshall School of Business, was placed on administrative leave after news of his arrest, university spokesman James Grant said.

Red Cross To Release Results Of Fraud Inquiry (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, March 27, 2006

The American Red Cross plans this week to turn over the results of its investigation into allegations of fraud and waste in its Hurricane Katrina relief efforts to authorities for possible criminal prosecution.

Carrie Martin, a spokeswoman for the Red Cross, said Sunday that three volunteers had been dismissed as a result of the charity's investigation.

“The allegations have to do with issues of fraud, waste and abuse,” Martin said. She said she did not have details but most of the allegations involved relief work in Louisiana. The names of those dismissed were not being released, she said.

“Unfortunately, after a disaster, somebody tries to make a buck,” she said.

The Red Cross has received enough donations and pledges to cover the more than $2 billion cost of its hurricane relief in 2005, according to the charity. More than 225,000 disaster-relief workers, 95% of them volunteers, participated in relief efforts in response to Hurricane Katrina. The storm, which hit the Gulf Coast on Aug. 29, killed at least 1,300 people and destroyed or damaged 300,000 homes.

DOJ_NMG_0021206

Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, which has jurisdiction over tax-exempt organizations such as the Red Cross, issued a statement saying he would meet with the charity's leaders this week to discuss its plans for reform. The Red Cross is chartered by the federal government to respond to disasters.

The Red Cross, Grassley said in his statement, did not take internal complaints of fraud and misuse of funds seriously enough until he drew attention to them. He has led a congressional investigation into the charity's response to Katrina. He said the Red Cross had problems tracking resources, supplies, and volunteers after Hurricane Katrina.

Grassley was traveling Sunday and could not be reached for comment, said his spokeswoman, Beth Pellett Levine.

Martin said the Red Cross is determined to root out corruption and has recovered $2 million in assistance that was illegally received. "Nobody takes these allegations more seriously," she said.

The results of the Red Cross investigation will be released publicly, Martin said.

Friendly Fire: It's Hard To Make A Case (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron

Newsweek, March 27, 2006

The Army is forging ahead with its criminal investigation into the friendly-fire death of former NFL player Pat Tillman, but it's unlikely the soldiers who shot him will be held criminally negligent. The Army launched the probe earlier this month under pressure from Tillman's parents, who believe investigators whitewashed three previous inquiries (seven soldiers received administrative punishment ranging from pay cuts to loss of rank).

Col. Joseph Curtin, an Army spokesman, said the panel was checking if the Army Rangers who shot Tillman while fighting Afghan militants in April 2004 should face a full-blown trial. The negligence charge is almost never brought in fratricide cases. "It's extremely rare and usually it doesn't stick," says Ivan Oerlich, who wrote a 1992 study on friendly-fire incidents in Gulf War I. Why so few prosecutions? The difficulty of distinguishing between reasonable and negligent behavior in the chaos of battle, and a fear of making soldiers trigger-shy. Still, a separate panel investigating whether soldiers mounted a cover-up by burning Tillman's uniform and body armor could spawn other criminal charges.

Murder Case Is Like A Movie, And That May Be A Problem (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, March 27, 2006

LOS ANGELES — The kidnapping and murder of 15-year-old Nick Markowitz in 2000 was true-crime story that had "soon to be a major motion picture" practically written all over it. The tragedy had a young victim, a manhunt for the kidnapper and a ring of middle-class 20-somethings who sold marijuana in the San Fernando Valley.

Alpha Dog, a $13 million movie with a cast including Justin Timberlake, Bruce Willis and Sharon Stone, is based on the slaying in Santa Barbara, Calif. It's ready for release. But the film is now entangled in the criminal case against a defendant with a name that no screenwriter would dare make up: Jesse James Hollywood.

Hollywood, 26, has petitioned the California Supreme Court to remove the Santa Barbara County district attorney's office from the case for "unprecedented misconduct" in giving non-public case files to filmmaker Nick Cassavetes. Defense lawyer James Blatt says he'll ask another court to block New Line Cinema from releasing the "inflammatory" movie until after Hollywood's death-penalty trial later this year.

The studio had scheduled the opening for April but now says it will choose a date this spring "to be determined." Alpha Dog got mixed reviews at the Sundance Film Festival in Park City, Utah, in January.

Hollywood was indicted for allegedly being the leader of a drug gang and orchestrating Markowitz's killing. He fled after the murder and became at age 20 one of the youngest people to be pictured on the FBI's website as a wanted fugitive.

The 5-foot-4, tough-talking Hollywood was a "cult hero" to Valley kids, says Michael Mehas, associate producer of Alpha Dog. "It's that rebel, anti-authority image," Mehas says.

Hollywood was a fugitive for 4½ years until he was captured in Brazil in March 2005. He has pleaded innocent.

"Having him get caught has been a mixed blessing," Mehas says. "It turned the spotlight on the case, but it enmeshed the film in the real-life story."

DOJ_NMG_0021207

Ron Zonen, the chief deputy district attorney in Santa Barbara County, says Hollywood and others kidnapped Markowitz to pressure his older half brother to pay a $1,200 drug debt. After Hollywood's lawyer told him that kidnapping for extortion carries a life sentence, Hollywood ordered the abducted boy killed, Zonen says.

By 2003, Zonen had won convictions of four young men linked with Hollywood. The accused triggerman, Ryan Hoyt, is on death row and is appealing his conviction. TV's America's Most Wanted and other shows failed to produce any good tips to find Hollywood. His trail had gone cold in Canada, Zonen says.

Then director-screenwriter Cassavetes asked Zonen to cooperate on a movie "that was going to be accurate and use original names," the prosecutor says. "He said it was going to reach an international audience. That was the appeal."

Zonen says he knew that Cassavetes' parents were actress Gena Rowlands and the late director-actor John Cassavetes. "I felt he had the Hollywood pedigree — that's Hollywood with a small 'h' — to make it fly," says Zonen, who was a prosecutor in Michael Jackson's child-molestation trial last year. Jackson was acquitted.

Mehas says Zonen gave the filmmakers his notebook from the four previous prosecutions in the Markowitz case, in addition to police and probation reports, a psychological report on Hoyt and crime photos.

The film follows Zonen's theory of the crime, but Cassavetes was unable to keep a promise to the prosecutor: All names were changed on advice from lawyers for the producers. Hollywood became Johnny Truelove, played by Emile Hirsch.

Cassavetes had finished filming Alpha Dog when Hollywood was captured in Brazil. When Hollywood was booked in Santa Barbara, Cassavetes said the film would need revising. He had Johnny Truelove captured in Bolivia.

The expense of shooting new scenes was just the start of trouble for the filmmakers. New Line Cinema screened Alpha Dog at a preview last summer. Blatt, Hollywood's lawyer, says he attended. He then filed motions with Santa Barbara County Superior Court Judge Brian Hill, asserting the film endangers Hollywood's right to a fair trial.

"Names are changed, but they advertised it as a true story and everyone's going to know it's the Jesse James Hollywood story," Blatt says in an interview. Cassavetes was summoned to court to answer questions about the film at a hearing in August. Hill ordered Mehas to turn over his notes for a book he has written on the case.

Hill and an appeals court rejected Blatt's move to kick Zonen and his office off the case. On March 3, Blatt complained to the California Supreme Court that Zonen acted improperly in helping Cassavetes portray Hollywood's character in an "inflammatory manner." In a court filing, Zonen said "there was no misconduct in assisting Nick Cassavetes in making a movie that would reasonably assist law enforcement in apprehending a fugitive."

Blatt says Zonen's ties to the movie create a conflict of interest — a bias that prevents Hollywood from receiving "evenhanded prosecution." Zonen received no money, but "future profit may be implied," Blatt says. Zonen denies any conflict of interest. The court will decide by May 2 whether to take action.

Blatt acknowledges that there's no precedent for removing prosecutors for helping filmmakers and says he'll have "an uphill battle" to delay the film's release. He says prospective jurors can be dismissed if seeing the film leaves them with an unshakeable opinion that Hollywood is guilty.

Zonen says few prospective jurors are likely to see the youth-oriented Alpha Dog. "There's a heavy dosage of rap music and drugs and booze and yelling and swearing," he says. "It's not the kind of movie the 40-plus are going to flock to. And anyone who has seen this movie will simply be excused — all three of them."

Police Finding It Hard To Fill Jobs (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

LONG BEACH, Calif. -- Police departments around the country are contending with a shortage of officers and trying to lure new applicants with signing bonuses, eased standards, house down payments and extra vacation time.

From this seaside Southern California city to Washington's suburbs, more than 80 percent of the nation's 17,000 law enforcement agencies, big and small, have vacancies that many can't fill, police officials estimate.

"I was just at a conference of police chiefs," said William Bratton, the chief of police in Los Angeles, which has 720 openings. "It was all everybody was talking about."

DOJ_NMG_0021208

Police officials and researchers say a confluence of demographic changes and social trends have precipitated the shortage. The wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have siphoned off public-service-minded people to the military. Hundreds of law enforcement officers have handed in their badges to take higher-paying positions in the booming homeland security industry.

And each year an increasingly large number of baby-boomer officers, hired in the 1970s, retires. The labor pool in the next generation is smaller, further cutting the number of prospective applicants.

The younger generation is better educated than its predecessor, so a career in policing, where the average starting salary is $32,000, is not as attractive as it was before.

Prince William, Fairfax and Loudoun counties all have recently instituted programs -- signing bonuses, bounties for county employees recommending successful candidates, and pay increases -- designed to keep their police departments intact.

In the District, officials said they have noticed increased competition for applicants but are not facing a shortage. But Prince George's County began a $1 million advertising campaign last summer touting police work as exciting and challenging in the hope of boosting its chronically understaffed ranks. The force is 60 officers short of its authorized complement of 1,420 officers.

Elsewhere, departments have dropped their zero-tolerance policy on drug use and past gang association, eased restrictions on applicants with bad credit ratings, and tweaked physical requirements to make room for more female candidates or smaller male candidates, police officials said. Departments also offer crash courses in reading and remedial English for the written parts of the entrance exam, and provide strength and agility coaches for the physical part -- all of which have raised concerns about how qualified some of the new personnel will be.

"We no longer say if you've smoked marijuana five times, you can't be in the LAPD," said Cmdr. Kenneth Garner, who runs recruitment for the Los Angeles Police Department. "If we did that, I'd be sitting in this office by myself. But we really take a hard look at honesty."

In the past, some recruitment drives have resulted in questionable hiring. In 1989 and 1990, the D.C. Metropolitan Police Department, seeking to quell a crime wave, mistakenly hired numerous gang members and people with substantial criminal histories and drug and credit problems. Some were later implicated in questionable police shootings.

Experts said that while they hope the inherently conservative nature of law enforcement agencies will protect against a slew of bad hires, there is a concern that with a smaller pool of applicants, less-qualified people are becoming police officers.

"That is clearly a concern, and police chiefs are very uneasy about that possibility," said Hubert Williams, president of the Police Foundation, a law enforcement advocacy group. "The question is, do we keep our radio cars empty or hire people who a few years ago we wouldn't have hired? It is very problematic."

Williams said that some departments are hiring applicants with criminal records. "A few years ago, an arrest record was a deal breaker," he said. "Now departments are asking whether someone is salvageable."

To fill the void, police recruiters are fanning out across the country. When layoffs were announced in the automotive industry in Detroit, recruiters flocked there to try to sign up furloughed assembly-line workers. Police recruiters comb the beaches of Florida, California and Texas during spring break and conduct ad campaigns -- on billboards, in newspapers, on radio and TV -- at a level unprecedented in the history of U.S. policing.

Police officials say the shortage of police officers has hit law enforcement agencies west of the Mississippi particularly hard because they historically have carried smaller staffs. For example, New York City has twice as many people as Los Angeles but nearly four times as many police -- about 37,000, compared with L.A.'s 9,600 -- and last week announced plans to hire 800 more.

In Texas, the need for law enforcement officers is so great that Dallas, Austin and Houston are in the midst of a bidding war to hire veteran officers, with Houston recently upping its bonus to $7,000.

The Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Department, one of the country's more aggressive recruiters, recently drew the line on tattoos, branding and body piercing -- but left some wiggle room. If the body art can be covered by a long-sleeved shirt and pants, then applications are still welcome.

To find new recruits, the San Diego County Sheriff's Department has offered a $500 bounty to county employees who find applicants who become deputies. The sheriff's department, like many agencies, used to frown on transfers from other departments, but now such lateral hires are given a signing bonus of $5,000.

DOJ_NMG_0021209

Mike Farrell was lured over to the San Diego County Sheriff's Department from the San Diego city police force in December. The six-year police veteran got $5,000 to sign, better hours, the chance to clock more overtime and the promise of a fatter pension when he retires. The San Diego city government is tottering toward bankruptcy, so law enforcement recruiters from around the country, including Honolulu and Phoenix (which is sweetening its offer with a down payment on a house), have been picking over its force. Of Farrell's original squad of six on the city police force, he said, only two remain.

"When I first started applying, there were 100 applicants as qualified as I was," said Farrell, 33. "Now they are having a hard time finding 25 to 30 people like that."

In past decades, police departments were hampered by budget cuts. But now, even when there is adequate funding, cities can't find enough cops. In 2004, voters in Oakland approved a $9 million tax increase to hire 63 additional officers to increase the ranks of that police department to 802. Today the city is nowhere close to meeting its recruitment goal because there are not enough suitable applicants.

"People are not as equipped or as inclined to be police officers as in the past," said Barbara Raymond, who has researched the police shortage for Rand Corp. "There's more drug use, there's a more sedentary lifestyle. People are more in debt and overweight."

"What you are really talking about is a major national shortage in a variety of sectors -- teachers, firefighters, nurses and police officers," said Williams, the Police Foundation president. "Corporate America can move across the world to find people to work in its factories. But there are some things that you can't outsource." And unlike the nursing industry, which has attracted thousands of overseas applicants to the United States, most, if not all, police departments require candidates to be U.S. citizens.

Policing also has changed, Raymond noted in her report for Rand. The job is far from the adrenaline-packed hook 'em and book 'em, car chase stereotype of the past. As cities around the nation become more culturally diverse and police departments embrace community policing tactics, officers are often pushed to deal with the root causes of crime, becoming more social worker than cop.

The events of Sept. 11, 2001, have put new stresses on police work. In Long Beach, for example, the terrorist attacks prompted the department of 1,000 officers to create its first counterterrorism unit and a special port unit. To do it, Long Beach reduced foot patrols, cut staffing in the narcotics division and switched most officers from two-person to one-person patrol cars.

There are concerns, said Elaine Deck, a researcher at the International Association of Chiefs of Police, that staffing changes and shortages could affect public safety and the well-being of law enforcement officers. The LAPD, for example, is too short-staffed to investigate complaints against its officers, so that many complaints from 2005 may not result in punishment until this year.

"When you have single officers in vehicles, a lack of backup, slower response time, cuts in prevention programs and fewer school resource officers, things obviously could be affected," Deck said. Also, with fewer recruits entering the system and a large number of veterans exiting, officers' street knowledge -- critical to effective law enforcement -- is evaporating. It used to take 10 years to make sergeant. Now in many bigger departments, people are getting promotions after only two.

CIVIL LAW:

Tenn. Hospital Case Could Test Budget Act (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

The constitutionality of the budget reconciliation act — which passed in slightly different versions by the House and Senate before being signed by the president — could face its first test in federal court as early as May, the result of an ongoing dispute over Medicare payments to a group of Tennessee hospitals.

Citing the recently enacted law, formally known as the Deficit Reduction Act of 2005, federal attorneys representing the Department of Health and Human Services have appealed a ruling issued earlier this year by the U.S. District Court on a 2004 lawsuit.

DOJ_NMG_0021210

The lawsuit, Cookeville Regional Medical Center v. Thompson, centers on a disagreement over how certain Medicare payments should be calculated.

The hospitals sought and won an increase in payments worth up to $100 million.

But now, HHS, along with its Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, is seeking to overturn the decision based on a provision in the budget reduction act that had been drafted in an attempt to to clarify the policy that sparked the original dispute.

"A recent Act of Congress makes it crystal clear ... that the Court's reasoned opinion was incorrect, as was its judgment in favor of plaintiffs," states the HHS appeal, filed Feb. 13.

In their response, attorneys for the hospitals assert that that the law is not only inapplicable to the case, but that it also fails to meet constitutional standards.

"We have argued that the Deficit Reduction Act does not apply to our litigation at all," said Murray Klein, an attorney with the law firm Reed Smith, which is representing the hospitals.

In addition, Klein argues that the act, signed into law in February, fails to meet the Constitution's bicameral clause, because the House and Senate did not pass identical versions of the legislation.

Although both chambers voted in favor of the act in December 2005, a technical error inserted by a Senate clerk resulted in differing bills. The mistake impacts the duration of Medicare payments for medical equipment, including hospital beds and wheelchairs.

"Because the Act cannot survive judicial scrutiny under this Constitutional analysis, the Act is constitutionally deficient, and the Amendment contained therein is invalid and unenforceable," the hospitals' March 17 response states.

While least two other lawsuits filed in recent weeks seek to challenge the Deficit Reduction Act directly, Klein said the Cookeville lawsuit could produce the first ruling on the law's validity.

Although the case is not "fast-tracked," Klein noted that the lawsuit is in an active stage. Federal attorneys are scheduled to file a final response in early April, and a federal judge could rule on the appeal as early as May.

The other, unrelated cases are unlikely to reach a courtroom before that time.

"This may actually accelerate a decision from the Court of Appeals," Klein said. "It's not a $100 million case for Tennessee — it's the magnitude of the Deficit Reduction Act."

While Klein said he believes the government's appeal should fail because the law is not applicable to the lawsuit — he called it "a stretch, in my view ... to take the Deficit Reduction Act and apply it to a piece of litigation they're trying to get reversed" — he acknowledged that it is still likely that the validity of the act could be addressed.

"They can't win without the judge ruling on the constitutionally," Klein said.

Should the court rule in favor of the government, however, Klein said he would likely revisit the issue in an appeal.

"Not only do I appeal, but I probably go right to the Supreme Court with this," Klein said. "We might try to see if the Supreme Court would take it right away."

Still, Klein noted that it remains possible for the court to issue a decision in the case without determining whether the DRA, signed into law in February, is constitutional.

"If we're right that it doesn't apply, you never get to the constitutional issue," he said.

Even in that scenario, however, the government could elect to appeal such a ruling, and the issue could once again be raised in court.

The U.S. Attorney's Office, which does not discuss ongoing cases, declined to comment for this article. According to court documents, the government has until April 7 to respond to the hospitals' opposition statement.

In the meantime, it remains unclear whether Tennessee's 11-member Congressional delegation, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R), will support the hospitals' defense, including its argument that the DRA fails to meet constitutional standards.

Earlier this month the bipartisan delegation issued identical letters to both Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt lambasting the appeal, and requesting an explanation of the decision.

According to the March 10 letter, lawmakers included the Medicare provision at the behest of Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services, which runs the programs, in an attempt to clarify the policy that had sparked the lawsuit.

"It was our understanding that this provision would not be used to appeal decided cases, we request further explanation of what we believe to be a serious miscommunication by CMS," the letter states.

In an interview Friday, Rep. Marsha Blackburn (R-Tenn.) added: "The understanding was it would not apply to the Cookeville case."

"Those assurance were given to Sen. Frist, and thereby to the delegation, and the understanding was it would not affect those cases," she said.

But while Blackburn said she supports Klein's contention that DRA does not apply to the Cookeville case, she said she believes the law is constitutional.

"I would disagree with them on that premise," she said, adding: "I support the work they're doing on behalf of Cookeville Hospital."

A Frist spokeswoman did not return a request for comment for this article. However, it appears unlikely that Frist would back any contention that the law is unconstitutional.

The Senate sought to rectify the issue in February by passing a resolution under unanimous consent that was intended to clarify the legislation.

The resolution, authored by Frist, stated that the deficit reconciliation bill "is deemed the true enrollment of the bill reflecting the intent of the Congress in enacting the bill into law."

Rep. Bart Gordon (D-Tenn.), whose district includes Cookeville, was unavailable for comment Friday, but a spokeswoman reiterated his support for the hospitals involved in the suit.

"Congressman Gordon supports the hospitals' effort to be paid for services they have provided," said Gordon spokeswoman Julie Eubank. "The courts have already ruled that HHS has underpaid them. HHS now should pay the hospitals appropriately and stop trying to weasel out of this responsibility."

An HHS spokeswoman did not return a telephone call Friday.

Separately from the Cookeville case, at least two other lawsuits have been filed that aim to directly challenge the law's constitutionality.

An Alabama-based elder-law attorney filed a lawsuit against the legislation in early February in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Alabama.

According to court documents, attorney Jim Zeigler must report by March 30 on his efforts to serve notice of the lawsuit to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

"I expect dozens of lawsuits against the DRA, because its constitutional flaw is clear and obvious," Zeigler said in a statement last week. "Millions of citizens and thousands of businesses are adversely affected by the DRA.

"There has been no one yet who has argued that it is okay for the Senate to pass one version of a bill and House another, then to have the president sign the senate version. This is constitutional law 101 — the same bill must pass both houses and be signed by the president. Otherwise the bill is not law. Case over," he added.

In addition, the government watchdog group Public Citizen filed a lawsuit in federal court last Tuesday seeking to nullify law.

While Public Citizen does not represent the manufacturers of any medical equipment affected by the change or any of the users, the group believes it still has legal standing to bring the lawsuit.

The organization's complaint focuses on an increase in federal district court filing fees scheduled to go into effect next month. Stating that the House and Senate approved differing versions of the legislation, the complaint asks for the law to be declared "unconstitutional" and seeks an injunction against the filing fee increase.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Job Police Or Not, The EEOC Is Busy With Discrimination (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021212

So they say -- some of them, anyway -- that discrimination is not a problem in America anymore? Don't tell that to the tens of thousands of people who filed complaints last year with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

In 75,428 filings at EEOC field offices across the country, people described unfair and illegal treatment in private sector workplaces on the basis of race, sex, age, disability, religion and other factors.

Nearly 63 percent of all complaints alleged discrimination based on race or sex, or that the person filing the complaint had been retaliated against for speaking out against such behavior. Charges of sexual harassment were included in those complaints.

The EEOC, the federal agency in charge of enforcing federal civil rights laws, filed 383 lawsuits against alleged offenders last year, garnering $107.7 million for victims through litigation. The agency, which marked its 40th anniversary last summer, helped obtain $271.6 million for victims without going to trial, often through settlements or mediation.

"Litigation is a last resort," said David Grinberg, an EEOC spokesman.

Discrimination charges declined slightly last year, falling 5 percent from the 79,432 filed in 2004. The numbers have fluctuated over the last decade but have never approached the 91,189 charges filed in 1994.

Cari M. Dominguez, the commission's chairwoman, attributed the recent three-year skid, in part, to more aggressive efforts to promote voluntary compliance by providing training about the laws to employers.

"It is clear that the commission can no longer serve solely as the 'job police,' " Dominguez said in a written statement. "We are striving to build partnerships to prevent discrimination, while taking on more high-impact cases that can lead to positive workplace changes for a broad swath of the workforce."

Still, discriminatory behavior abounds. Consider some EEOC cases this month:

· On March 10, a U.S. District Court jury in Tallahassee ordered Associated Security Enforcement Inc. to pay $1.34 million for sexual harassment of four female employees by one of the security company's owners. The owner groped women's breasts, asked for sex in exchange for money, made frequent requests for oral sex and invited women to stay with him overnight, the EEOC said.

· Also on March 10, a U.S. district judge in Chicago approved a consent decree that requires Cracker Barrel restaurants to pay $2 million to 51 current and former employees of three of the chain's restaurants in Illinois. Several female employees testified that they had been victims of unwelcome sexual comments and touching from managers and other employees. Black workers said they had been required to wait on black customers when white employees refused to serve them, had been assigned to work in smoking sections and had been the targets of racially charged language such as "spear-chucking porch monkey."

· On March 16, the former Melrose New York hotel and its Philadelphia-based management company, Berwind Property Group Ltd., agreed to pay $800,000 to settle discrimination claims by Hispanic employees. The hotel had been charged with creating a hostile work environment by requiring employees to speak only English at all times, including during their breaks; with improperly firing Hispanic employees; and with retaliating against employees who complained about the disc rimination.

· On March 2, a U.S. District Court jury in Baltimore ordered FedEx Kinko's to pay $108,000 for failing to accommodate a deaf employee with sign language interpreters, a violation of the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990. Ronald Lockhart, the employee, worked as a package handler for the company in Baltimore.

Absentee City, U.S.A. (NSWK)

By Arian Campo-flores

Newsweek, March 27, 2006

Fasten your seat belts if you hope to keep up with the contenders in New Orleans's mayoral race. One recent Saturday, candidate Mitch Landrieu woke up at 6 a.m. to fly 200 miles north to Alexandria, La., where he greeted Katrina evacuees. From there, he jetted another 500 miles east to Atlanta, where he joined six of his opponents, including Mayor Ray Nagin, at a gathering of some 75 displaced residents. Then he hopped on a plane back to the Big Easy, where that night he worked the crowd at a Hornets basketball game. "You've got to figure out where your votes are and go get them," said Landrieu, Louisiana's lieutenant governor.

Good luck. With only one third of New Orleanians back in the city and the remainder scattered across the country, the electorate is more elusive than ever. The two dozen candidates—led by Nagin, Landrieu and businessman Ron Forman—are struggling with questionable polling data and out-of-date voter lists. They're hunting for supporters in cities like Houston and Memphis with large concentrations of evacuees. And they're doing it all on a harried schedule, with less than a month left until the April 22 election (with a likely runoff scheduled for May 20). "It's a totally different ball game," says Nagin consultant Jim Carvin.

To track down voters, candidates are trolling for any data they can get their hands on. Greg Rigamer, who has advised numerous Louisiana campaigns in the past, suggests a start: take the voter-registration file and cull those who live in habitable areas and have likely returned. Then turn to the U.S. Postal Service, which he says has information on 129,000 registered voters—out of 297,000 overall in Orleans Parish—who have filed change-of-address forms. And there's the list of voters—6,000 so far—who have requested absentee ballots.

Reaching such voters hasn't been easy, though. In New Orleans, mail and phone service remain spotty. And beyond the city limits, many evacuees continue to change residences. It would be prohibitively expensive to buy ads in every market where the scattered population has settled. Nagin—who's intensely courting African-American voters—has opted to run ads on inexpensive black radio stations throughout the South, including Mobile, Ala., and Jackson, Miss. On the other hand, Forman—relying on data suggesting that most likely voters remain in the New Orleans metropolitan area—has chosen to pour money into local TV ads.

Voters themselves face their own challenge: how to cast ballots. For those living outside New Orleans, the state has loosened requirements for absentee voting and set up satellite polling stations in 10 Louisiana parishes for early voting. Come Election Day, a host of monitors will be guarding against potential malfeasance. "Everybody who has a right to vote should have an opportunity to vote," says Landrieu. If only he can find them in time.

Georgia May OK Bible As Textbook (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

ATLANTA - Decatur High School student Kurt Hughes wouldn't call himself religious. He's never even read the Bible.

But he wouldn't mind taking a class on the holy text if it were offered at his high school in Decatur, Ga. After all, "You look at 'The Old Man and the Sea,' 'King Arthur' and even 'The Matrix,' all have biblical allusions," the junior says. "It'd be useful to know exactly what's in it."

The Georgia legislature seems poised to endorse just such a course. Though students in many states enroll in classes related to the Bible, Georgia would become the first to require its Department of Education to put in place a curriculum to teach the history and literature of the Bible. Schools would use the book itself as the classroom textbook. Specifically the bill would establish electives on both the New and Old Testaments.

It has overwhelmingly passed both chambers, but needs a final vote on a minor House change. The vote is expected as early as Monday. If it passes, the state's Department of Education has a year to establish Bible elective courses in the curriculum.

In the late 1700s, Congress thought enough of the Bible as a textbook that it printed 40,000 copies. But the bold effort here in Georgia to use the Bible in today's secular curricula may be about presenting it as a moral code rather than a foundation to better understand the biblical allusions in literature, critics say.

"Behind this is the tension around the country about how to go about doing a Bible elective, and a lot is at stake," says Charles Haynes, director of the First Amendment Center in Arlington, Va.

The Bible is already being used as a course study in as many as 1,000 American high schools, according to the National Council on Bible Curriculum in Public Schools in Greensboro, N.C. The US Supreme Court allows it as long as it's presented objectively, and not taught as fact. But the Georgia legislature's unprecedented decision to wade into what is usually a school district initiative has created concerns.

For example, the bill's use of terms such as Old and New Testament reflect a Protestant bias, some critics say. After all, Catholics and Jews have different interpretations and names for the tome. "To pick one is to suggest that is the right Bible, which is a school district making a faith statement," says Judith Schaeffer, a lawyer for People For the American Way, which works to maintain the separation of church and state.

Others worry that this trend - Alabama and Missouri are also considering statewide Bible study classes - is part of the broader culture war over the role of religion in civic life, and seeks to satisfy social conservatives rather than enlighten students.

"This is a political issue as much as it is a religious issue," says Frances Paterson, a professor at Valdosta State University who specializes in religion and public education. "I would guess that [its sponsors] hope that nobody is going to police this, and when people step over the line, it's going to be ignored, either because nobody's aware of it or they'd be intimidated into not objecting."

Its sponsors insist the bill aims to help students gain broader understanding about the underpinnings of Western culture, from Michelangelo to Hemingway.

"The biggest misconception is that this teaches the Bible when, in fact, it uses the Bible as the primary text to teach a course in history and literature influenced by the Bible," says a spokesman for Sen. Tommie Williams (R), the bill's sponsor.

The Bible was the most quoted source for the Founding Fathers, Bible scholars say.

The "New England Primer," with its heavy reliance on scriptural texts to teach reading and comprehension, instructed all presidents until James Garfield, according to Kenyn Cureton, of the Southern Baptist Convention, who studies early textbooks in US history.

"It's amazing that we have jettisoned the Bible from the classroom when it is the foundation of the Republic," says Dr. Cureton, a spokesman for the Convention with headquarters in Nashville, Tenn.

Many parents, however, may object to using the Bible as a textbook since doing so may expose their children to the book's various interpretations and criticism, some say.

"A great many people in Georgia are conservative Protestants who take the Bible literally, and that's going to be a problem if you have an academic study of the Bible...." says Dr. Paterson.

A Thin Blue Line Of Prejudice (WP)

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

FOR MONTHS, apparently, at least some of the police brass in Montgomery County have known either specifically or generally about racist, sexist and immigrant-bashing comments on an online message board used exclusively by county police. And for months, apparently, their response -- or rather, their non-response -- has been modeled after Sgt. Schultz, the immortal bumbler of TV's "Hogan's Heroes": "I know nothing! I see nothing! NOTHING!"

As reported by The Post's Ernesto Londoño, the online forum has become a free-for-all for boorish, intolerant and malicious rantings. On this site, Hispanic immigrants have been disparaged as "beaners," an African American policewoman was termed a "ghetto officer" and a black diversity trainer was threatened with violent injury. If the county's police officers get this agitated while at their computer keyboards, residents may wonder how they react when dealing with minorities and immigrants in the flesh.

It was only after The Post exposed the tenor of some of the online blather that the county police chief, J. Thomas Manger, took the trouble to read the uncouth postings. Now he says he is shocked, and he demands the message board be shut down by the Fraternal Order of Police, the police union, which runs the forum. So far, the FOP has refused.

We're sure that police supervisors are right when they say the loudmouths who sound off on the message board are a loutish minority, unrepresentative of a county force that is generally professional, competent and courteous. In any large organization -- there are 1,100-odd police officers on the payroll in Montgomery -- the actions of a few can tarnish the reputation of the many. And let's face it: Police are paid to enforce the law, not stand as unblemished exemplars of politically correct speech.

But intolerant, hateful officers are unlikely to be effective, and they may actually subvert the department's overall mission. The more police are seen as bigots, the less cooperation they are likely to get from immigrants and minorities. In a county as diverse as Montgomery, where minorities will soon make up half the population, that's a recipe for disaster.

The police department is within its rights to forbid officers from posting on the message board while they're on the job. But the underlying problem is not the forum; it is the attitudes of those who are posting. Silencing trash-talking officers won't make them suddenly sensitive.

Still, neither Chief Manger nor the police union should stand pat. The chief needs to address the problems exposed by the message board, whether by intensified training, discipline or vigilance. Then there's the union, which in the name of free speech refuses to censor the online forum it controls or forbid anonymous postings. Can one therefore assume that the union is unfazed by the evidence of racism, sexism and nativism in its midst? Is the union willing to tolerate obnoxious remarks -- and attitudes -- that tarnish its own reputation and that of the thousands of officers it represents? If not, some self-policing may be in order.

The Air Force's Retreat (WP)

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

THE AIR FORCE got it right when it issued a carefully calibrated set of guidelines on religious expression last August. The proposed new rules protected the ability of service members to practice their religion and emphasized the importance of tolerating and accommodating religious beliefs. But -- taking note of the unique setting of the military, where issues of rank and discipline come into play -- the guidelines also guarded against behavior that could make cadets at the Air Force Academy or service members feel compelled to engage in religious activities or disadvantaged if they declined.

Unfortunately, facing a barrage of complaints from evangelical Christian groups and pressure from members of Congress, the Air Force backed down. It has issued a revised set of rules that pose the potential for inappropriate religious pressure on cadets and service members. This pushes the balance in the wrong direction, especially in light of disturbing reports from the Air Force Academy about religious intolerance and inappropriate proselytizing.

One troubling issue in the revised guidelines concerns the ability of superior officers to proselytize or otherwise promote their faith. The original guidelines emphasized that "individuals need to be sensitive to the potential that personal expressions may appear to be official expressions," adding, "the more senior the individual, the more likely that personal expressions may be perceived to be official statements."

The new guidelines move away from this common-sense approach and emphasize superior officers' rights over the dangers of coercion. For example, the guidelines say, "Nothing in this guidance should be understood to limit the substance of voluntary discussions of religion . . . where it is reasonably clear that the discussions are personal, not official, and they can be reasonably free of the potential for, or appearance of, coercion." But reasonably clear to whom? What looks uncoercive to an officer can look awfully official to a cadet.

The original guidelines said that prayer should not be a routine part of official military life, "such as staff meetings, office meetings, classes or officially sanctioned activities such as sports events or practice sessions."

However, they said, "Consistent with long-standing military tradition, a brief non-sectarian prayer may be included in non-routine military ceremonies or events of special importance."

The new guidelines are softer on this issue as well, saying that public prayer "should not usually be a part of routine official business." Although they do not go as far as evangelical groups had wanted in explicitly permitting chaplains to pray "in Jesus's name," they state that chaplains "will not be required to participate in religious activities, including public prayer, inconsistent with their faiths" -- a statement that opens the door to sectarian prayer. It's unfortunate that the Air Force, having struck the balance so well last year, was bullied into this unwise retreat.

ANTITRUST:

Lucent, Alcatel Consider Second Attempt To Merge (USAT)

By Leslie Cauley

USA Today, March 27, 2006

NEW YORK — Leverage.

DOJ_NMG_0021216

In a word, that's why telecom equipment makers Lucent and Alcatel are considering marriage. The companies confirmed late last week that they are in merger talks, marking their second attempt in five years to combine.

Consolidation elsewhere in the telecom industry is a key driver.

In the past decade, the seven regional Bells have dropped to three. Of the big three long-distance carriers, only one — Sprint — is still independent. SBC bought AT&T and named the new company AT&T. Verizon bought MCI.

The story is much the same in the U.S. wireless industry. The No. 1 and No. 2 players — Cingular and Verizon Wireless — are owned by AT&T and Verizon.

AT&T recently announced plans to buy BellSouth, which owns 40% of Cingular. Once that $67 billion deal closes, AT&T will own all of Cingular.

Equipment makers such as Alcatel and Lucent are slowly being overshadowed by their far bigger customers. To maintain clout at the negotiating table, equipment makers need to get bigger fast.

"The bigger the (telecom) carriers become, the power shifts more to the customer," says Ping Zhao, a senior telecom analyst at CreditSights.

AT&T is the USA's biggest telecom with more than $100 billion in annual revenue. Verizon is No. 2, with about $90 billion in annual revenue.

Lucent, which for decades was owned by AT&T, pulled in $9 billion last year. Alcatel, based in France, had revenue of about $16 billion.

When Alcatel tried to buy Lucent before, the deal fell apart amid disagreements about control. Alcatel wanted management control and to fill key positions with its own people; Lucent objected.

Lucent's value has fallen sharply since then. Its shares closed at $3.06 Friday, up 24 cents, or 8.5%.

What hasn't changed is Lucent's closeness with the U.S. telecom industry because of its roots in the old Bell System.

That might be the biggest draw for Alcatel, says George Calhoun, a professor of business and technology at the Stevens Institute of Technology. "They've been trying for 20 years to penetrate the U.S. market, and they really haven't done that."

3rd Circuit: Amnesty Agreement No Bar To Filing Of Federal Indictment (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, March 27, 2006

A federal judge has no power to enjoin prosecutors from filing an indictment on the grounds that doing so would violate an existing amnesty agreement, the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled, because the equitable powers of the court do not exist when there is "an adequate and complete remedy at law."

In its 27-page opinion in Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group v. United States, the appellate court held that since the amnesty agreement may be raised as a defense after indictment, the lower court had exceeded its powers in enjoining the prosecution.

The decision reverses a January 2005 ruling by U.S. District Judge Timothy J. Savage that prohibited the Justice Department from filing an antitrust indictment against a Norwegian shipping company and one of its top executives.

Savage found that Stolt-Nielsen had entered into an amnesty program with the Justice Department and had provided information about a price-fixing and bid-rigging conspiracy that led to guilty pleas from two of its co-conspirators and more than $62 million in fines.

Because the company had fulfilled its obligations under an immunity agreement, Savage concluded it was entitled to an injunction that barred the filing of an indictment.

Prosecutors argued that SNTG misled the government by claiming that its participation in the antitrust conspiracy had ceased in March 2002.

But Savage found the amnesty agreement explicitly immunized SNTG and its executives from prosecution for activity prior to Jan. 15, 2003. And because the government had drafted the agreement, Savage said, it "cannot depend upon a tacit understanding of what it contends was meant during negotiations but was not memorialized in the integrated agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0021217

Savage concluded that the only way to protect the due process rights of SNTG and one of its executives was to decide -- prior to the filing of any indictment -- whether the government was entitled to void the immunity agreement.

Now the 3rd Circuit has ruled that Savage's decision violated the separation of powers doctrine, and that he had no power to issue such an injunction because SNTG has an adequate remedy at law since it may raise the amnesty agreement as a defense after it is indicted.

"Separation-of-power concerns ... counsel against using the extraordinary remedy of enjoining the government from filing the indictments," 3rd Circuit Judge Thomas L. Ambro wrote.

Ambro's opinion was joined by visiting Judge Jane A. Restani of the U.S. Court of International Trade. Former 3rd Circuit Judge Samuel A. Alito Jr. was also on the original three-judge panel when the case was argued in September 2005, but he did not participate in the decision due to his elevation to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In his opening paragraph, Ambro said the appeal presented "a significant constitutional question of first impression in this circuit: whether federal courts have authority, consistent with the separation of powers, to enjoin the executive branch from filing an indictment."

Although federal courts have such authority "in narrow circumstances," Ambro found that "this is not such a case."

According to court papers, SNTG admitted to participating in an international conspiracy to allocate customers, rig bids and fix prices on parcel tanker affreightment contracts for the shipment of specialty liquids to and from the United States and elsewhere.

On the basis of information provided by SNTG, the government filed criminal charges and secured guilty pleas from its two co-conspirators -- Norwegian-based Odfjell Seachem and Jo Tankers B.V., which is based in the Netherlands.

Odfjell Seachem agreed to pay a $42.5 million fine and Jo Tankers agreed to pay a $19.5 million fine. Guilty pleas were also entered by two Odjell executives and three Jo Tankers executives. All five were sentenced to prison terms in the range of three to four months and paid fines totaling more than $600,000.

Savage found that SNTG's immunity agreement stemmed from its participation in the Justice Department's "corporate leniency program," under which the government entices companies to report their involvement in ongoing antitrust conspiracies and to cooperate in the investigation and prosecution of co-conspirators.

Under the program, the reporting companies and their officers, directors and employees are granted immunity from criminal prosecution. But only the first company to come forward gets the protection. Later applicants and co-conspirators are subject to prosecution and the cost of defending against criminal charges.

After SNTG entered into an agreement with the DOJ in January 2003, it turned over incriminating documents and produced two employees who explained how customer lists were exchanged among the conspirators, according to court papers.

But in April 2003, the Justice Department suspended SNTG's participation in the amnesty program on the grounds that SNTG allegedly did not withdraw from the conspiracy in March 2002, as it had claimed, but had continued its illegal activity into the second half of 2002.

In June 2003, SNTG executive Richard Wingfield was arrested and charged with participating in the conspiracy to allocate customers, fixing prices and rigging bids between March 2001 and October 2002.

Under threat of indictment, SNTG filed suit in February 2004, seeking enforcement of its rights under the agreement. Soon after, Wingfield, too, filed suit seeking to enforce his own rights under the amnesty agreement.

In March 2004, the Justice Department formally revoked SNTG's conditional leniency and notified the company that it intended to seek an indictment. SNTG responded by asking Savage to issue a preliminary injunction barring the government from seeking an indictment, and prosecutors agreed to put the prosecution on hold until Savage had issued a ruling.

SNTG's lawyers argued it was entitled to a ruling before it was forced to challenge an indictment and suffer the consequences of one.

Savage agreed, saying SNTG "is entitled to a decision before the government pursues a prosecution because if an indictment were later determined to have been wrongfully secured, it would be too late to prevent the irreparable consequences."

DOJ_NMG_0021218

Now the 3rd Circuit has ruled that while courts have the power to enjoin indictments, that power is limited to instances where the prosecution itself would chill free speech or violate a constitutional right such as the Double Jeopardy Clause.

"Simply being indicted and forced to stand trial is not generally an injury for constitutional purposes but is rather one of the painful obligations of citizenship," Ambro wrote.

Ambro quoted the 1923 U.S. Supreme Court decision in Terrace v. Thompson, which held that "a suit in equity does not lie where there is a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law."

Applying that ruling, Ambro found that "here, Stolt-Nielsen and Wingfield have a practical and efficient -- and indeed complete -- legal remedy available to them, i.e., access to a federal forum post-indictment in which they may assert the [immunity] agreement as a defense."

Attorney John J. Powers III of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division argued the appeal for the government.

Attorney Christopher M. Curran of White & Case in Washington, D.C., argued the appeal for SNTG, and attorney Allen D. Black of Fine Kaplan & Black in Philadelphia argued on behalf of Wingfield.

Patrick Rejects Toll's Increased A$5.5 Billion Offer (Update1) (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, March 27, 2006

March 27 (Bloomberg) -- Patrick Corp., Australia's biggest port cargo handler, rejected Toll Holdings Ltd.'s increased A$5.5 billion ($3.9 billion) takeover bid as ``flawed and unacceptable."

``Patrick shareholders remain better off without Toll," Sydney-based Patrick said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today. Melbourne-based Toll, the nation's biggest road and rail freighter, last week raised its offer after overcoming antitrust opposition to the deal.

Toll Chief Executive Officer Paul Little bid for Patrick seven months ago, seeking control of the movement of goods across Australia from shipment to delivery. Patrick CEO Chris Corrigan is pursuing his own trucking acquisitions to compete with Toll for a land-freight business to add to Patrick's ports, saying Patrick offers better growth as a standalone company.

``Patrick has far superior businesses and significantly greater growth prospects relative to Toll," Corrigan said in the statement today.

Toll last week offered 0.4 of its own stock and A$1.90 cash for each Patrick share. That will be increased by 20 cents a share if it has acceptances for 90 percent of Patrick by the time the bid closes April 28. Toll will pay a further 10 cents a share if Patrick hasn't exercised its option to buy closely held FCL Interstate Transport Services Pty. by the time it has a 50.1 percent stake.

Justices Will Hear Patent Case Against EBay (NYT)

By Katie Hafner

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

The United States Supreme Court will hear arguments on Wednesday in a protracted, closely watched patent case that pits a small company called MercExchange against eBay, the online auction and marketplace.

While the grounds in the case appear narrow — the court will reconsider the rules under which courts grant injunctions against a company found to be infringing another's patent — it has attracted enormous attention because of the public rancor between the two companies, the supporters enlisted by both sides and the growing issue of how large technology companies deal with the constant threat of patent challenges.

The patent in question surrounds the "Buy It Now" feature that eBay uses to allow processing of transactions for the Web site's fixed-price purchasing option.

The Supreme Court will decide whether a federal appeals court was correct in reversing a district court's decision to deny an injunction against eBay's use of the feature. In doing so, it will reconsider a precedent from 1908, which suggested that injunctions were always an appropriate remedy for patent infringement.

DOJ_NMG_0021219

Supporting briefs from third parties, including some unlikely ones, have piled up for each side. A pharmaceutical industry trade group filed a brief in support of MercExchange, as did General Electric, Proctor & Gamble, the University of California, a group of venture capitalists and the United States government. All argued in favor of injunctions against those who infringe patents.

A brief filed jointly by Oracle, Microsoft and Intel in support of eBay argued that the injunction rule "has transformed patents into a powerful tool for litigation abuse" and "stifles innovation." EBay has also hired Juleanna Glover Weiss of the Ashcroft Group, a lobbying firm in Washington founded by John Ashcroft, the former United States attorney general, to help with communications efforts related to the case and patent issues in general.

The case began in 2001, when MercExchange sued eBay, accusing it of willfully infringing three electronic commerce patents held by Thomas Woolston, an engineer from Great Falls, Va., and the founder of MercExchange, which he calls a network engineering firm. One of Mr. Woolston's patents was a feature to sell fixed-price goods online, and it included an automatic payment system.

In 2003, a federal court jury in Virginia, where MercExchange is based, found that eBay was violating two of the three patents, including the Buy It Now patent, and the court eventually ordered eBay to pay $25 million in damages.

But the judge presiding over the case refused to issue an injunction that would have barred eBay from continuing to use the patented methods in its Web operations.

The Supreme Court agreed to hear the case after the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, a specialized court in Washington that hears all appeals in patent cases, overturned the lower court's decision and ruled that MercExchange was entitled to an injunction.

The appeals court said that injunctions were the "general rule" in patent infringement cases, and should be withheld only in such "rare instances" as "the need to use an invention to protect public health."

At issue before the Supreme Court on Wednesday is whether the federal circuit court's ruling correctly interpreted federal patent law, which authorizes judges to grant injunctions but does not require them to do so.

The case has attracted an unusual amount of public attention in part because of recent attempts by large corporations to change patent law to lessen the threat posed by so-called nonpracticing patent holders.

"Large companies like Microsoft and Intel get hit by weekly patent infringement suits, the majority from smaller entities who may not be practicing the inventions," said Dennis Crouch, a patent attorney in Chicago who has been following the MercExchange case closely. "The big guns behind eBay are trying to weaken the power of a patent and lessen the ability of a patent holder to obtain an injunction."

In his decision to withhold the injunction, the district court judge noted that MercExchange "exists solely to license its patents or sue to enforce its patents, and not to develop or commercialize them."

Yet in a telephone interview, Mr. Woolston said that MercExchange had indeed put its patents to commercial use. "Come to MercExchange.com and buy a plasma TV," said Mr. Woolston. "We are practicing our inventions."

The eBay case is similar to a recent patent case again Research In Motion., the maker of the BlackBerry wireless device. Had an injunction been enforced in the BlackBerry case, it might have caused a shutdown of the system. Instead, in a last-minute settlement, R.I.M., a Canadian company, agreed to pay $612.5 million to NTP, a patent holding company based in Arlington, Va.

Yet, if an injunction is ordered in the eBay case, the day-to-day workings of eBay are not likely to be affected, said Hani Durzy, a spokesman for eBay. Mr. Durzy added that immediately after the verdict in 2003, the company made changes to the Buy It Now feature.

Use of the feature has grown over the years. In the fourth quarter of 2005, it accounted for about a third of the $12 billion in transactions on eBay.

For A 3rd Time, Two Apples Meet In Court (NYT)

By Matthew Healey

Apple Computer will meet the Beatles' Apple Corps in court this week in London, where a judge will determine whether Apple Computer's iTunes online music service violates a 1991 agreement between the two companies that, the Beatles' Apple claims, blocked the computer maker from selling music.

Apple Corps, which represents the Beatles' business interests and markets their post-1968 recordings on disc, wants the computer firm to stop using the Apple trademark to sell recordings online, along with unspecified damages. Apple, the maker of Macs and iPods, said the 1991 agreement permitted using the Apple name to sell online data transfers, which are what downloaded songs amount to.

The judge hearing the case, Justice Edward Mann, is an iPod user, but neither side has asked him to recuse himself.

This is the third time the two companies have sparred. Apple Corps first sued Apple Computer in 1980 over the use of its name; a modest settlement was accompanied by an agreement that stipulated that Apple Computer, then a Silicon Valley start-up, would stay out of the music business. In 1989, after newer hardware and software made it easier to use Macintosh computers to synthesize sound, the Beatles' company sued again, resulting in a $26.5 million settlement in 1991 that left Macs able to edit and play back sound files but not create music. After the iTunes music store and software were introduced in April 2003, the record company filed suit a third time.

The Beatles set up Apple Corps in 1968, partly as a tax shelter. These days the firm, led by Neil Aspinall, a longtime Beatles confidant, functions as record label, merchandiser and general defender of the Beatles' business rights. Apple Records has reissued original Beatles recordings on CD, as well as the mid-1990's Beatles singles "Free as a Bird" and "Real Love" and a DVD of George Harrison's 1971 Concert for Bangladesh.

While Apple Records has made no effort to sell or license music online and none of the Beatles' recordings are yet available for legal download anywhere, Apple Computer announced on Feb. 23 that it had sold a billion songs through iTunes.

Steven P. Jobs, the chief of Apple Computer, has made no secret of his love for the Beatles' music, but all sides have so far denied rumors of a potential settlement that would allow iTunes to begin selling the Beatles' songs online.

Vague Law And Hard Lobbying Add Up To Billions For Big Oil (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 26 — It was after midnight and every lawmaker in the committee room wanted to go home, but there was still time to sweeten a deal encouraging oil and gas companies to drill in the Gulf of Mexico.

"There is no cost," declared Representative Joe L. Barton, a Texas Republican who was presiding over Congressional negotiations on the sprawling energy bill last July. An obscure provision on new drilling incentives was "so noncontroversial," he added, that senior House and Senate negotiators had not even discussed it.

Mr. Barton's claim had a long history. For more than a decade, lawmakers and administration officials, both Republicans and Democrats, have promised there would be no cost to taxpayers for a program allowing companies to avoid paying the government royalties on oil and gas produced in publicly owned waters in the Gulf.

But last month, the Bush administration confirmed that it expected the government to waive about $7 billion in royalties over the next five years, even though the industry incentive was expressly conceived of for times when energy prices were low. And that number could quadruple to more than $28 billion if a lawsuit filed last week challenging one of the program's remaining restrictions proves successful.

"The big lie about this whole program is that it doesn't cost anything," said Representative Edward J. Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat who tried to block its expansion last July. "Taxpayers are being asked to provide huge subsidies to oil companies to produce oil — it's like subsidizing a fish to swim."

How did a supposedly cost-free incentive become a multibillion-dollar break to an industry making record profits?

The answer is a familiar Washington story of special-interest politics at work: the people who pay the closest attention and make the fewest mistakes are those with the most profit at stake.

DOJ_NMG_0021221

It is an account of legislators who passed a law riddled with ambiguities; of crucial errors by midlevel bureaucrats under President Bill Clinton; of $2 billion in inducements from the Bush administration, which was intent on promoting energy production; and of Republican lawmakers who wanted to do even more. At each turn, through shrewd lobbying and litigation, oil and gas companies ended up with bigger incentives than before.

Until last month, hardy anyone noticed — or even knew — the real costs. They were obscured in part by the long gap between the time incentives are offered and when new offshore wells start producing. But lawmakers shrouded the costs with rosy projections. And administration officials consistently declined to tally up the money they were forfeiting.

Most industry executives say that the royalty relief spurred drilling and exploration when prices were relatively low. But the industry is divided about whether it is appropriate to continue the incentives with prices at current levels. Michael Coney, a lawyer for Shell Oil, said, "Under the current environment, we don't need royalty relief."

The program's original architect said he was surprised by what had happened. "The one thing I can tell you is that this is not what we intended," said J. Bennett Johnston, a former Democratic senator from Louisiana who had pushed for the original incentives that Congress passed in 1995.

Mr. Johnston conceded that he was confused by his own law. "I got out the language a few days ago," he said in a recent interview. "I had it out just long enough to know that it's got a lot of very obscure language."

A Subsidy of Disputed Need

Things looked bleak for oil and gas companies in 1995, especially for those along the Gulf Coast.

Energy prices had been so low for so long that investment had dried up. With crude oil selling for about $16 a barrel, scores of wildcatters and small exploration companies had gone out of business. Few companies had any stomach for drilling in water thousands of feet deep, and industry leaders like Exxon and Royal Dutch Shell were increasingly focused on opportunities abroad.

"At the time, the Gulf of Mexico was like the Dead Sea," recalled John Northington, then an Energy Department policy adviser and now an industry lobbyist.

Senator Johnston, convinced that the Gulf's vast reservoirs and Louisiana's oil-based economy were being neglected, had argued for years that Congress should offer incentives for deep-water drilling and exploration.

"Failure to invest in the Gulf of Mexico is a lost opportunity for the U.S.," Mr. Johnston pleaded in a letter to other lawmakers. "Those dollars will not move into other domestic development, they will move to Asia, South America, the Middle East or the former Soviet Union."

Working closely with industry executives, he wrote legislation that would allow a company drilling in deep water to escape the standard 12 percent royalty on up to 87.5 million barrels of oil or its equivalent in natural gas. The coastal waters are mostly owned by the federal government, which leases tens of millions of acres in exchange for upfront fees and a share of sales, or royalties.

Mr. Johnston and other supporters argued that the incentives would actually generate money for the government by increasing production and prompting companies to bid higher prices for new leases.

"The provision will result in a minimum net benefit to the Treasury of $200 million by the year 2000," Mr. Johnston declared in November 1995, denouncing what he called "outrageous allegations" that the plan was a giveaway.

He won support from oil-state Democrats, Republicans and the Clinton administration. Hazel O'Leary, the energy secretary at the time, said the assistance would reduce American dependence on foreign oil and "enhance national security."

Representative Robert Livingston of Louisiana, then a rising Republican leader, declared that the inducements would "create thousands of jobs" and "reduce the deficit."

Many budget experts agree that the rosy estimates were misleading. The reason, they say, is that it often takes seven years before a new offshore field begins producing. As a result, almost all the costs of royalty relief would occur outside of Congress's five-year budget timeframe.

Opponents protested that the cost estimates were wrong, that the incentives amounted to corporate welfare and that companies did not need government incentives to invest.

DOJ_NMG_0021222

"They are going to the Gulf of Mexico because that's where the oil is," said Representative George Miller, Democrat of California, during a House debate. "What we do here is not going to change that. We are just going to decide whether or not we are going to give away the taxpayers' dollars to a lot of oil companies that do not need it."

Industry executives and lobbyists fanned out across Capitol Hill to shore up support for the program, visiting 150 lawmakers in October 1995. The effort succeeded. A month later, Congress passed Mr. Johnston's bill.

A Missing Escape Clause

To hear lawmakers today, they never intended to waive royalties when energy prices were high.

The 1995 law, according to Republicans and Democrats alike, was supposed to include an escape clause: in any year when average spot prices for oil or gas climbed above certain threshold levels, companies would pay full royalties instead.

"Royalty relief is an effective tool for two things: keeping investment in America during times of super-low prices, and spurring American energy production when massive capital and technological risks would otherwise preclude it," said Representative Richard W. Pombo, Republican of California and chairman of the House Resources Committee. "Absent those criteria, I do not believe any relief should be granted."

But in what administration officials said appeared to have been a mistake, Clinton administration managers omitted the crucial escape clause in all offshore leases signed in 1998 and 1999.

At the time, with oil prices still below $20 a barrel, the mistake seemed harmless. But energy prices have been above the cutoff points since 2002, and Interior Department officials estimate that about one-sixth of production in the Gulf of Mexico is still exempt from royalties.

Walter Cruickshank, a senior official in both the Clinton and Bush administrations, told lawmakers last month that officials writing the lease contracts thought the price thresholds were spelled out in the new regulations, which were completed in 1998. But officials writing the regulations left those details out, preferring to set the precise rules at each new lease sale.

"It seems to have been a massive screw-up," said Mr. Northington, who was then in the Energy Department. No one noticed the error for two years, and no one informed Congress about it until last month.

Five years later, the costs of that lapse were compounded. A group of oil companies, led by Shell, defeated the Bush administration in court. The decision more than doubled the amount of oil and gas that companies could produce without paying royalties.

The case began as a relatively obscure dispute. Shell paid $3.8 million in 1997 for a Gulf lease and soon drilled a successful well. But the Interior Department denied the company royalty relief, saying that Shell had drilled into an older field already producing oil and gas. The decision hinged on undersea geography and the court's interpretation of language in the 1995 law.

A typical field, or geological reservoir, often encompasses two or three separately leased tracts of ocean floor. Interior Department officials insisted that the maximum amount of royalty-free oil and gas was based on each field. Shell and its partners argued that limit applied only to each lease.

Perhaps shrewdly, the oil companies sued the Bush administration in Louisiana, where federal courts previously had sided with the industry in spats with the government.

The fight was not even close. In January 2003, a federal district judge declared that the Interior Department's rules violated the 1995 law. If the department "disagrees with Congress's policy choices," Judge James T. Trimble Jr. wrote, "then such arguments are best addressed to Congress."

What might have been a $2 billion mistake in the Clinton administration suddenly ballooned into a $5 billion headache under Mr. Bush.

But even as the Bush administration was losing in court, it was offering new incentives for the energy industry.

Mr. Bush placed a top priority on expanding oil and gas production as soon as he took office in 2001. Vice President Dick Cheney's task force on energy, warning of a deepening shortfall in domestic energy production, urged the government to "explore opportunities for royalty reduction" and to open areas like the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge to drilling.

DOJ_NMG_0021223

Gale A. Norton, who stepped down this month as interior secretary, moved quickly to speed up approvals of new drilling permits. Starting in 2001, she offered royalty incentives to shallow-water producers who drilled more than 15,000 feet below the sea bottom.

In January 2004, Ms. Norton made the incentives far more generous by raising the threshold prices. Her decision meant that deep-gas drillers were able to escape royalties in 2005, when prices spiked to record levels, and would probably escape them this year as well.

She also offered to sweeten less-generous contracts the drillers had signed before the regulation was approved.

"These incentives will help ensure we have a reliable supply of natural gas in the future," Ms. Norton proclaimed, predicting that American consumers would save "an estimated $570 million a year" in lower fuel prices.

Ms. Norton's decision was influenced by the industry. The Interior Department had originally proposed a cut-off price for royalty exemptions of $5 per million British thermal units, or B.T.U.'s, of gas. But the Independent Petroleum Association of America, which represents smaller producers, argued that the new incentive would have little value because natural gas prices were already above $5. Ms. Norton set the threshold at $9.34.

Based on administration assumptions about future production and prices, that change could cost the government about $1.9 billion in lost royalties.

"There is no cost rationale," said Shirley J. Neff, an economist at Columbia University and Senator Johnston's top legislative aide in drafting the 1995 royalty law. "It is astounding to me that the administration would so blatantly cave in to the industry's demands." Incentives Keep Growing

Last April, President Bush himself expressed skepticism about giving new incentives to oil and gas drillers. "With oil at $50 a barrel," Mr. Bush remarked, "I don't think energy companies need taxpayer-funded incentives to explore."

But on Aug. 8, Mr. Bush signed a sweeping energy bill that contained $2.6 billion in new tax breaks for oil and gas drillers and a modest expansion of the 10-year-old "royalty relief" program. For the most part, the law locked in incentives that the Interior Department was already offering for another five years. But it included some embellishments, like an extra break on royalties for companies drilling in the deepest waters.

Lee Fuller, vice president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, said smaller companies wanted to prevent future administrations from cutting back on incentives. "Having a clear, stable royalty policy was of value to independent producers," he said.

And energy companies, whose executives had long contributed campaign funds to Republican candidates, pushed to block any amendments aimed at diluting the benefits.

The push to lock in the royalty inducements came primarily from House Republicans. The only real opposition came from a handful of House Democrats, in a showdown about 1 a.m. on July 25, according to a transcript of the session.

"It is indefensible to be keeping these companies on the government dole when oil and gas prices are so high," charged Representative Markey of Massachusetts, who proposed to strip the royalty provisions. "We might as well be giving tax breaks to Donald Trump and Warren Buffett."

Mr. Barton, the Texas Republican, brushed aside the objections. He reassured lawmakers that the new provisions would not cost taxpayers anything.

When Mr. Markey proposed a more modest change — having Congress prohibit incentives if crude oil prices rose above $40 a barrel — Republicans quickly voted him down again.

"The only reason they waited until after midnight to bring up these issues is that they couldn't stand up in the light of day," Mr. Markey said in a recent interview. "They all expected me to give up because it was so late and I didn't have the votes. But if nothing else, I wanted to get these things on the record."

A Royalty-Free Future?

It is still not clear how much impact the reduced royalties had in encouraging deep-water drilling. While activity in the Gulf has increased since 1995, prices for oil and gas have more than quadrupled over the same period, providing a powerful motivation, experts say.

"It's hard to make a case for royalty relief, especially at these high prices," said Jack Overstreet, owner of an independent oil exploration company in Texas. "But the oil industry is like the farm lobby and will have its hand out at every opportunity."

The size of the subsidies will soar far higher if oil companies win their newest court battle.

In a lawsuit filed March 17, Kerr-McGee Exploration and Production argued that Congress never authorized the government to set price cut-offs for incentives on leases awarded from 1996 through 2000. If the company wins, the Interior Department recently estimated, about three-quarters of oil and gas produced in the Gulf of Mexico will be royalty-free for the next five years.

Mr. Markey and other Democrats recently introduced legislation that would pressure companies to pay full royalties when energy prices are high, regardless of what their leases allow.

But Republican lawmakers and the Bush administration have signaled their opposition.

"These are binding contracts that the government signed with companies," Ms. Norton recently remarked. "I don't think we can change them just because we don't like them."

New Reserves As Prices Surge, Oil Giants Turn Sludge Into Gold (WSJ)

By Russell Gold

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

FORT MCMURRAY, Alberta -- In February, engineers from French oil giant Total SA fired up colossal drum boilers to generate steam that will be pumped to a depth of 300 feet under the frozen ground here. If all goes well, by May, the steam will marinate a tar-like mix of oil and sand until the crude begins to flow.

Nearby, Total will go after the oil-soaked sands closer to the surface, scraping away an ancient forest of spruce and poplars and shoveling the black soil into two-story dump trucks. Fully loaded, the trucks weigh as much as a Boeing 747. Total will then use industrial versions of giant washing machines to remove the oil, generating enough liquid waste to create vast toxic lakes.

Heavy-duty oil-extraction projects like these are turning Fort McMurray into the first great oil boom town of the 21st century. A Florida-size section of sandy soil beneath the boreal forest in this sparsely populated area of Northern Canada is loaded with bottom-of-the-barrel petroleum.

These deposits were once dismissed as "unconventional" oil that couldn't be recovered economically. But now, thanks to rising global oil prices and improved technology, most oil-industry experts count oil sands as recoverable reserves. That recalculation has vaulted Venezuela and Canada to first and third in global reserves rankings, although Venezuela's holdings in extra-heavy crude are a rough guess. Saudi Arabia is No. 2. Not including the oil sands, Canada would fall to No. 22. Led by Total, nearly every major Western oil company as well as their Chinese and Indian brethren are gearing up to go after the deposits here. In all, they plan to spend more than $70 billion in the next decade unlocking the oil from the sand.

The surging interest in Canadian oil sands is stark evidence that the world isn't about to run out of oil. Instead, it is running low on readily accessible light, sweet crude -- oil that flows like water, has few impurities and can be easily turned into gasoline. As the good stuff gets scarce, Big Oil is turning its attention and pouring money into extra-heavy crude, such as the giant deposits near Fort McMurray and another similar one in Venezuela.

But heavy oil has big economic and environmental drawbacks. It costs more to produce and takes more energy to turn into gasoline than traditional light oil. Recovering and processing Fort McMurray's heavy crude releases up to three times as much greenhouse gas as producing conventional crude. And upgrading it into refined products, such as gasoline or diesel, will require a gigantic investment to retool global refineries.

"The light crude undiscovered today is getting scarcer and scarcer," says Jean-Luc Guiziou, president of Total's Canadian operations. "We have to accept the reality of geoscience, which is that the next generation of oil resources will be heavier."

Total is making the biggest bet on heavy crude of any of the half-dozen international Western oil giants. Nearly one-fifth of its commercial reserves are in heavy-oil belts, according to oil consultant Wood Mackenzie, a larger portion than any of its Western rivals. Its stockpile of heavy-oil reserves is second only to that of Exxon Mobil Corp., a company that is more than twice as large. Total has spent years developing the complex technology needed to extract oil from tar sands in the frigid environment of Northern Canada. So much heat is required to separate the oil from the tar that Total briefly floated the idea of building a nuclear-power plant there.

The rush into the oil sands also has turned a longstanding belief about fossil fuels and the environment on its head. For years, environmentalists have argued that higher gasoline prices would be good for the Earth because paying more at the pump would promote conservation. Instead, higher energy prices have unleashed a bevy of heavy-oil projects that will increase emissions of carbon dioxide, suspected of causing global warming.

"As oil prices have gone up, you get this increased desire to get out onto the new frontiers of oil," says Marlo Raynolds, executive director of the Calgary-based Pembina Institute, an energy and environment think tank. "We're now getting into the dirtiest sources of oil anywhere." To be sure, rising energy prices have spawned more interest in renewable fuel sources, but those investments pale in comparison to what's going on here.

Canada, which exports more oil to the U.S. than any other country, already is having trouble meeting its pledge to cut CO2 emissions largely because of its mushrooming heavy-oil production. By 2015, Canada's Fort McMurray region, population 61,000, is expected to emit more greenhouse gases than Denmark, a country of 5.4 million people.

Canada's northern forest contains at least 174 billion barrels of recoverable heavy oil, equivalent to five years' supply for the planet, according to the Alberta Energy and Utilities Board. Venezuela has perhaps even more in the Orinoco River delta. By comparison, Saudi Arabia has about 260 billion barrels of more traditional crude, or 8½ years' global supply, according to the Energy Information Administration, the statistical arm of the federal Department of Energy. Heavy oil also is being produced in the Middle East, the Caspian Sea, Brazil and even in California's San Joaquin Valley.

In northern Alberta, the oil-sands boom is remaking the landscape. The mining operations have clear-cut thousands of acres of trees and dug 200-foot-deep pits. The region is dotted with large man-made lakes filled with leftover waste from the mining operations. To chase off migratory birds, propane cannons go off at random intervals and scarecrows stand guard on floating barrels.

Alberta's energy minister, Greg Melchin, says oil-sands development creates a minimal environmental disturbance that is outweighed by the opportunities and jobs created. "It's worth it. There is a cost to it, but the benefits are substantially greater," he said.

Environmental groups are increasingly critical of the government's reluctance to regulate the oil sands. "The pace of development is outstripping our ability to manage the environmental issue," says Mr. Raynolds of the Pembina Institute. "Our unwritten energy policy is dig it up and sell it as fast as possible."

The remarkable properties of Fort McMurray's oil sands have been known for centuries. Native tribes mixed the tar-like substance with tree sap to waterproof their canoes. In the 1960s, companies now known as Suncor Energy Inc. and Syncrude Canada Ltd., a consortium of oil companies, opened oil-sands mines in the area. Both operations stumbled through periods of low oil prices but are now rapidly expanding.

When oil was trading at $12 a barrel in the late 1990s, Big Oil had little interest in oil sands. But surging energy prices have made heavy-oil investments significantly more attractive. It costs about $25 a barrel to produce crude from Canada's oil sands, an acceptable cost when oil is trading for $60 a barrel. By comparison, it can cost as little as about $5 a barrel to produce crude in the Middle East and $15 in the deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

For Paris-based Total, the world's fifth-largest publicly traded energy company by market capitalization, the oil sands play to its strengths. Total had its roots as a refiner rather than an exploration and production company. Oil sands were easy to find but hard to process.

Total's first foray into heavy oil was in Venezuela's Orinoco belt. In 1997, the company's giant $4.2 billion Sincor project there began producing market-grade crude. Sincor, which Total owns with Norway's Statoil ASA and Petróleos de Venezuela SA, now produces 180,000 barrels of oil a day.

The same year, Total opened an office in Calgary to determine if a similar investment was warranted near Fort McMurray. It was soon clear to Total engineers brought in from Sincor that Canadian oil sands were more technically difficult than Venezuela's heavy-oil belt. The key difference: The heavy oil in Venezuela was quite warm and flowed easily, albeit slowly, while in Canada the oil-sand mixture had the look and consistency of tar-like Play-Doh. But Canada was attractive because it offered a haven from politically unstable oil hotspots.

In November 1999, Total teamed up with the financially struggling Gulf Canada Resources Ltd. on a promising project called Surmont. Gulf Canada was later acquired by Conoco Inc. and is now part of Houston-based ConocoPhillips.

For Total, sorting out the mechanics of producing this heaviest of oils fell on the shoulders of Mr. Guiziou, a French earth scientist who had worked his way into management from his first assignment studying the geology of Argentina. In 2001, when he was being considered for the Canadian job, he flew into Fort McMurray to see what the oil sands were about. Having worked in the industry for years, he was accustomed to the look and feel of oil fields. But when he visited Syncrude's mine, where giant cranes scooped up the oil-soaked earth in buckets capable of carrying 100 tons, he was flabbergasted. "It was another world," the 44-year-old Mr. Guiziou says.

In some places near Fort McMurray, the oil sands are close to the surface and can be mined. But at Surmont, located southeast of Fort McMurray, the oil sands are 1,200 feet underground, far too deep for a mining operation. The partners in the venture needed to find a way to get the oil.

The solution was steam. In 1978, Roger Butler, an engineer with Imperial Oil Ltd., an independent company majority-owned by Exxon Mobil, hit on the idea of drilling two wells that start off vertically, then slowly bend until they are horizontal and located one on top of the other. The top well would pump steam into the reservoir while the other pumped oil out.

Surmont was to be Total's and Conoco's first venture with the technology, so in late 1997 they started small with a 1,000-barrel-a-day pilot. They pumped steam down a pipe laced with millions of tiny slits, each no wider than the thickness of a piece of paper. The initial results were encouraging but expanding into a full-scale project took several more years.

One pressing issue: Several companies, including Paramount Resources Ltd., were producing natural gas from a shallow underground zone above the oil sands. Total and its partner convinced an Alberta regulatory body that the gas project threatened the much larger oil deposit. The theory was that if the gas were allowed to be pumped out, the steam chamber would lose pressure and Surmont would have to be scrapped. In a landmark ruling, an Alberta regulatory body ordered 146 gas wells shut off in 2000.

In December 2003, Total and ConocoPhillips decided to build the first phase of Surmont. The steaming is slated to begin later this year, with production expected to grow to 27,000 barrels a day next year. Future expansions could bring it to 200,000 barrels a day -- a good-size oil field but not the biggest in the area.

At Surmont, Total was merely an investor with ConocoPhillips and its predecessor companies operating the project. Last year, the French company went from being an investor to a full-fledged participant in the oil-sands boom.

In September, it bought Deer Creek Energy Ltd. for $1.6 billion, acquiring its only significant asset: a giant oil-sands project called Joslyn north of Fort McMurray. Once fully developed, Joslyn is expected to yield 200,000 barrels a day for decades. Total plans to produce oil from Joslyn by both mining and by shooting steam underground.

Becoming an operator, Mr. Guiziou needed to confront environmental problems as Total expanded its heavy-oil holdings in Canada. Mining oil sands generates enormous volumes of liquid waste that are stored in toxic lakes that have concentrations of naturally occurring naphthenic acid, an odorless liquid used to help paint dry quickly. The prospect of cleaning up these lakes is "daunting," the Canadian National Energy Board, a federal regulatory body, noted in a 2004 report. "There is currently no demonstrated means to reclaim fluid fine tailings," it said.

Since the lakes are likely to be around for years to come, Mr. Guiziou is working on a plan that will result in smaller lakes. He hopes to install a new technology at Joslyn that will suck out water and leave a smaller volume of waste laced with metals before it is dumped in the lakes. But he said the technology "needs to be proved at the industrial scale." Total expects to conduct a test later this year at a neighboring facility.

Total is also trying to figure out ways to curb greenhouse-gas emissions at its Fort McMurray facilities by using pure oxygen instead of air in its combustion engines. The company is running a pilot project in Lacq, France, to capture carbon dioxide in exhaust flues more effectively. If the technology proves workable, it could be used in Fort McMurray as well.

Despite the environmental concerns, there is a strong economic incentive for Alberta's free-market-oriented government to let oil-sands development gallop ahead. Alberta added nearly 26,000 jobs in resource extraction in the past two years. That 25% jump helped drive the province's unemployment rate down to 3.1%, a 30-year low, according to the government. For the first time, every Albertan received a 400 Canadian-dollar ($340) check from the government earlier this year from an unexpected fiscal surplus.

Total and other oil companies are continuing to announce new oil-sand projects and shovel money into the region. Earlier this month, Chevron Corp. said it planned to spend "billions" to turn 75,000 acres into a 100,000-barrel-a day field. And last week, Royal Dutch Shell PLC said it had spent nearly $400 million to lease 219,000 acres west of Fort McMurray, shattering records for public-land leases.

In February, Total moved quickly to file the regulatory permit for Joslyn to move to the front of a growing queue of projects. With all the development, everything is in short supply, including steel, energy to power the projects, fresh water and skilled construction workers.

Some projects could end up being delayed for years. "It's like you've got one door frame and the Three Stooges trying to get through at the same time," said Tom Ebbern, executive managing director of Tristone Capital, a Calgary-based investment adviser. "Without a doubt, we can become the next Saudi Arabia but it will take 10 years longer than the market thinks."

Poison aside

Taking a night off from serving up Washington dirt, best-selling (unauthorized) biographer Kitty Kelley on Saturday served up risotto with black truffles and langoustine and capellacci stuffed with sweet lemon polenta -- prepared by chef Fabrizio Aielli at Teatro Goldoni.

Cause for celebration was her physician-husband Dr. Jonathan Zucker's 65th birthday party, attended by 60 guests and family.

No word on Mrs. Kelley's next victim, but past books by the one-time press aide to the late Sen. Eugene McCarthy have run the gamut, from her 1978 debut "Jackie Oh!" about the life of Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis; unauthorized biographies of Frank Sinatra and Nancy Reagan; "The Royals," which sapped the moats of the British royal family; and finally "The Family: The Real Story of the Bush Dynasty," published in September 2004 and loaded with outrageous accusations about President and Mrs. Bush, among others in the family.

Pigs and people

Who would have thought that political pundit Tucker Carlson would earn accolades from People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA), while very attractive "Desperate Housewife" Eva Longoria and fellow bombshell actress Catherine Deneuve are coming under fire for their positions on hunting and sporting fur.

"I still go [hunting] to this day. I can handle a gun," ContactMusic.com reported. Miss Longoria explained that she's been hunting game since she was a child. "I could skin a deer, I could skin a pig, I can pluck a quail. You name it, I've done it."

Meanwhile, Miss Deneuve is getting hissed by the animal rights activists for informing the London Daily Telegraph that she has "never worn fake fur and never will."

As for the bow-tied Mr. Carlson, who professes his opinions nightly on MSNBC, PETA is praising him for "condemning the use of dogs in suicide bombing missions, [the TV host] calling it 'completely disgusting.'"

Shoot and survive

DOJ_NMG_0021228

While we're on the subject of hunting, Interior Secretary Gale A. Norton has just impaneled a new Sporting Conservation Council, which for the first time will advise Uncle Sam on the interests and concerns of the hunting community, including gaining more access to federal lands.

In that regard, the secretary envisions the council helping to preserve wildlife while enjoying the sport of hunting at the same time.

"Dating back to Teddy Roosevelt, hunters have been the pillar of conservation in America, doing more than anyone to conserve wildlife and its habitat," she points out. "This new advisory council will provide a formal mechanism for the department to benefit from the expertise of sportsmen and women ... as we develop federal policies."

The chosen council of advisers include, among others, Safari Club International Vice President Merle Shepard, who will represent big-game hunting organizations, and Jeff Crane, president of the Congressional Sportsmen's Foundation, who will speak for wildlife conservation organizations; to Peter J. Dart, president of the Rocky Mountain Elk Foundation, and John Tomke, chairman of the Board of Ducks Unlimited, Inc., who will represent game-bird hunting organizations.

Honest George

Washington will play host to the national premiere of "Fields of Freedom," a new digital film that supposedly transports audiences directly to the Battle of Gettysburg "with all its sound and fury," where they will witness "the ferocity of the battle and the anguish of its aftermath." Former President George Bush was chosen by the film's creators to narrate the Gettysburg Address.

The film is based on the newly discovered diaries of two soldiers fighting for the North and South, both recording their thoughts as they prepare for the bloody onslaught. After the April 5 premiere at the National Archives, the film will be a regular feature at new state-of-the-art big-screen theaters at the Gettysburg National Military Park in Pennsylvania.

Polar Ice Caps Are Melting Faster Than Ever... More And More Land Is Being Devastated By Drought... Rising Waters Are Drowning Low-Lying Communities... By Any Measure, Earth Is At ... The Tipping Point (TIME)

By Jeffrey Kluger

Time, March 26, 2006

No one can say exactly what it looks like when a planet takes ill, but it probably looks a lot like Earth. Never mind what you've heard about global warming as a slow-motion emergency that would take decades to play out. Suddenly and unexpectedly, the crisis is upon us.

It certainly looked that way last week as the atmospheric bomb that was Cyclone Larry--a Category 5 storm with wind bursts that reached 180 m.p.h.--exploded through northeastern Australia. It certainly looked that way last year as curtains of fire and dust turned the skies of Indonesia orange, thanks to drought-fueled blazes sweeping the island nation. It certainly looks that way as sections of ice the size of small states calve from the disintegrating Arctic and Antarctic. And it certainly looks that way as the sodden wreckage of New Orleans continues to molder, while the waters of the Atlantic gather themselves for a new hurricane season just two months away. Disasters have always been with us and surely always will be. But when they hit this hard and come this fast--when the emergency becomes commonplace--something has gone grievously wrong. That something is global warming.

The image of Earth as organism--famously dubbed Gaia by environmentalist James Lovelock-- has probably been overworked, but that's not to say the planet can't behave like a living thing, and these days, it's a living thing fighting a fever. From heat waves to storms to floods to fires to massive glacial melts, the global climate seems to be crashing around us. Scientists have been calling this shot for decades. This is precisely what they have been warning would happen if we continued pumping greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, trapping the heat that flows in from the sun and raising global temperatures.

Environmentalists and lawmakers spent years shouting at one another about whether the grim forecasts were true, but in the past five years or so, the serious debate has quietly ended. Global warming, even most skeptics have concluded, is the real deal, and human activity has been causing it. If there was any consolation, it was that the glacial pace of nature would give us decades or even centuries to sort out the problem.

But glaciers, it turns out, can move with surprising speed, and so can nature. What few people reckoned on was that global climate systems are booby-trapped with tipping points and feedback loops, thresholds past which the slow creep of environmental decay gives way to sudden and self-perpetuating collapse. Pump enough CO2 into the sky, and that last part per million of greenhouse gas behaves like the 212th degree Fahrenheit that turns a pot of hot water into a plume of billowing steam. Melt enough Greenland ice, and you reach the point at which you're not simply dripping meltwater into the sea but dumping whole glaciers. By one recent measure, several Greenland ice sheets have doubled their rate of slide, and just last week the journal Science published a study suggesting that by the end of the century, the world could be locked in to an eventual rise in sea levels of as much as 20 ft. Nature, it seems, has finally got a bellyful of us.

"Things are happening a lot faster than anyone predicted," says Bill Chameides, chief scientist for the advocacy group Environmental Defense and a former professor of atmospheric chemistry. "The last 12 months have been alarming." Adds Ruth Curry of the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution in Massachusetts: "The ripple through the scientific community is palpable."

And it's not just scientists who are taking notice. Even as nature crosses its tipping points, the public seems to have reached its own. For years, popular skepticism about climatological science stood in the way of addressing the problem, but the naysayers--many of whom were on the payroll of energy companies--have become an increasingly marginalized breed. In a new TIME/ ABC News/ Stanford University poll, 85% of respondents agree that global warming probably is happening. Moreover, most respondents say they want some action taken. Of those polled, 87% believe the government should either encourage or require lowering of power-plant emissions, and 85% think something should be done to get cars to use less gasoline. Even Evangelical Christians, once one of the most reliable columns in the conservative base, are demanding action, most notably in February, when 86 Christian leaders formed the Evangelical Climate Initiative, demanding that Congress regulate greenhouse gases.

A collection of new global-warming books is hitting the shelves in response to that awakening interest, followed closely by TV and theatrical documentaries. The most notable of them is An Inconvenient Truth, due out in May, a profile of former Vice President Al Gore and his climate-change work, which is generating a lot of prerelease buzz over an unlikely topic and an equally unlikely star. For all its lack of Hollywood flash, the film compensates by conveying both the hard science of global warming and Gore's particular passion.

Such public stirrings are at last getting the attention of politicians and business leaders, who may not always respond to science but have a keen nose for where votes and profits lie. State and local lawmakers have started taking action to curb emissions, and major corporations are doing the same. Wal-Mart has begun installing wind turbines on its stores to generate electricity and is talking about putting solar reflectors over its parking lots. HSBC, the world's second largest bank, has pledged to neutralize its carbon output by investing in wind farms and other green projects. Even President Bush, hardly a favorite of greens, now acknowledges climate change and boasts of the steps he is taking to fight it. Most of those steps, however, involve research and voluntary emissions controls, not exactly the laws with teeth scientists are calling for.

Is it too late to reverse the changes global warming has wrought? That's still not clear. Reducing our emissions output year to year is hard enough. Getting it low enough so that the atmosphere can heal is a multigenerational commitment. "Ecosystems are usually able to maintain themselves," says Terry Chapin, a biologist and professor of ecology at the University of Alaska, Fairbanks. "But eventually they get pushed to the limit of tolerance."

CO2 AND THE POLES

As a tiny component of our atmosphere, carbon dioxide helped warm Earth to comfort levels we are all used to. But too much of it does an awful lot of damage. The gas represents just a few hundred parts per million (p.p.m.) in the overall air blanket, but they're powerful parts because they allow sunlight to stream in but prevent much of the heat from radiating back out. During the last ice age, the atmosphere's CO2 concentration was just 180 p.p.m., putting Earth into a deep freeze. After the glaciers retreated but before the dawn of the modern era, the total had risen to a comfortable 280 p.p.m. In just the past century and a half, we have pushed the level to 381 p.p.m., and we're feeling the effects. Of the 20 hottest years on record, 19 occurred in the 1980s or later. According to NASA scientists, 2005 was one of the hottest years in more than a century.

It's at the North and South poles that those steambath conditions are felt particularly acutely, with glaciers and ice caps crumbling to slush. Once the thaw begins, a number of mechanisms kick in to keep it going. Greenland is a vivid example. Late last year, glaciologist Eric Rignot of the Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, Calif., and Pannir Kanagaratnam, a research assistant professor at the University of Kansas, analyzed data from Canadian and European satellites and found that Greenland ice is not just melting but doing so more than twice as fast, with 53 cu. mi. draining away into the sea last year alone, compared with 22 cu. mi. in 1996. A cubic mile of water is about five times the amount Los Angeles uses in a year.

Dumping that much water into the ocean is a very dangerous thing. Icebergs don't raise sea levels when they melt because they're floating, which means they have displaced all the water they're ever going to. But ice on land, like Greenland's, is a different matter. Pour that into oceans that are already rising (because warm water expands), and you deluge shorelines. By some estimates, the entire Greenland ice sheet would be enough to raise global sea levels 23 ft., swallowing up large parts of coastal Florida and most of Bangladesh. The Antarctic holds enough ice to raise sea levels more than 215 ft.

FEEDBACK LOOPS

One of the reasons the loss of the planet's ice cover is accelerating is that as the poles' bright white surface shrinks, it changes the relationship of Earth and the sun. Polar ice is so reflective that 90% of the sunlight that strikes it simply bounces back into space, taking much of its energy with it. Ocean water does just the opposite, absorbing 90% of the energy it receives. The more energy it retains, the warmer it gets, with the result that each mile of ice that melts vanishes faster than the mile that preceded it.

That is what scientists call a feedback loop, and it's a nasty one, since once you uncap the Arctic Ocean, you unleash another beast: the comparatively warm layer of water about 600 ft. deep that circulates in and out of the Atlantic. "Remove the ice," says Woods Hole's Curry, "and the water starts talking to the atmosphere, releasing its heat. This is not a good thing."

A similar feedback loop is melting permafrost, usually defined as land that has been continuously frozen for two years or more. There's a lot of earthly real estate that qualifies, and much of it has been frozen much longer than two years--since the end of the last ice age, or at least 8,000 years ago. Sealed inside that cryonic time capsule are layers of partially decayed organic matter, rich in carbon. In high-altitude regions of Alaska, Canada and Siberia, the soil is warming and decomposing, releasing gases that will turn into methane and CO2. That, in turn, could lead to more warming and permafrost thaw, says research scientist David Lawrence of the National Center for Atmospheric Research (NCAR) in Boulder, Colo. And how much carbon is socked away in Arctic soils? Lawrence puts the figure at 200 gigatons to 800 gigatons. The total human carbon output is only 7 gigatons a year.

One result of all that is warmer oceans, and a result of warmer oceans can be, paradoxically, colder continents within a hotter globe. Ocean currents running between warm and cold regions serve as natural thermoregulators, distributing heat from the equator toward the poles. The Gulf Stream, carrying warmth up from the tropics, is what keeps Europe's climate relatively mild. Whenever Europe is cut off from the Gulf Stream, temperatures plummet. At the end of the last ice age, the warm current was temporarily blocked, and temperatures in Europe fell as much as 10°F, locking the continent in glaciers.

What usually keeps the Gulf Stream running is that warm water is lighter than cold water, so it floats on the surface. As it reaches Europe and releases its heat, the current grows denser and sinks, flowing back to the south and crossing under the northbound Gulf Stream until it reaches the tropics and starts to warm again. The cycle works splendidly, provided the water remains salty enough. But if it becomes diluted by freshwater, the salt concentration drops, and the water gets lighter, idling on top and stalling the current. Last December, researchers associated with Britain's National Oceanography Center reported that one component of the system that drives the Gulf Stream has slowed about 30% since 1957. It's the increased release of Arctic and Greenland meltwater that appears to be causing the problem, introducing a gush of freshwater that's overwhelming the natural cycle. In a global-warming world, it's unlikely that any amount of cooling that resulted from this would be sufficient to support glaciers, but it could make things awfully uncomfortable.

"The big worry is that the whole climate of Europe will change," says Adrian Luckman, senior lecturer in geography at the University of Wales, Swansea. "We in the U.K. are on the same latitude as Alaska. The reason we can live here is the Gulf Stream."

DROUGHT

As fast as global warming is transforming the oceans and the ice caps, it's having an even more immediate effect on land. People, animals and plants living in dry, mountainous regions like the western U.S. make it through summer thanks to snowpack that collects on peaks all winter and slowly melts off in warm months. Lately the early arrival of spring and the unusually blistering summers have caused the snowpack to melt too early, so that by the time it's needed, it's largely gone. Climatologist Philip Mote of the University of Washington has compared decades of snowpack levels in Washington, Oregon and California and found that they are a fraction of what they were in the 1940s, and some snowpacks have vanished entirely.

Global warming is tipping other regions of the world into drought in different ways. Higher temperatures bake moisture out of soil faster, causing dry regions that live at the margins to cross the line into full-blown crisis. Meanwhile, El Niño events--the warm pooling of Pacific waters that periodically drives worldwide climate patterns and has been occurring more frequently in global-warming years--further inhibit precipitation in dry areas of Africa and East Asia. According to a recent study by NCAR, the percentage of Earth's surface suffering drought has more than doubled since the 1970s.

FLORA AND FAUNA

Hot, dry land can be murder on flora and fauna, and both are taking a bad hit. Wildfires in such regions as Indonesia, the western U.S. and even inland Alaska have been increasing as timberlands and forest floors grow more parched. The blazes create a feedback loop of their own, pouring more carbon into the atmosphere and reducing the number of trees, which inhale CO2 and release oxygen.

Those forests that don't succumb to fire die in other, slower ways. Connie Millar, a paleoecologist for the U.S. Forest Service, studies the history of vegetation in the Sierra Nevada. Over the past 100 years, she has found, the forests have shifted their tree lines as much as 100 ft. upslope, trying to escape the heat and drought of the lowlands. Such slow-motion evacuation may seem like a sensible strategy, but when you're on a mountain, you can go only so far before you run out of room. "Sometimes we say the trees are going to heaven because they're walking off the mountaintops," Millar says.

Across North America, warming-related changes are mowing down other flora too. Manzanita bushes in the West are dying back; some prickly pear cacti have lost their signature green and are instead a sickly pink; pine beetles in western Canada and the U.S. are chewing their way through tens of millions of acres of forest, thanks to warmer winters. The beetles may even breach the once insurmountable Rocky Mountain divide, opening up a path into the rich timbering lands of the American Southeast.

With habitats crashing, animals that live there are succumbing too. Environmental groups can tick off scores of species that have been determined to be at risk as a result of global warming. Last year, researchers in Costa Rica announced that two-thirds of 110 species of colorful harlequin frogs have vanished in the past 30 years, with the severity of each season's die-off following in lockstep with the severity of that year's warming.

In Alaska, salmon populations are at risk as melting permafrost pours mud into rivers, burying the gravel the fish need for spawning. Small animals such as bushy-tailed wood rats, alpine chipmunks and piñon mice are being chased upslope by rising temperatures, following the path of the fleeing trees. And with sea ice vanishing, polar bears--prodigious swimmers but not inexhaustible ones--are starting to turn up drowned. "There will be no polar ice by 2060," says Larry Schweiger, president of the National Wildlife Federation. "Somewhere along that path, the polar bear drops out."

WHAT ABOUT US?

It is fitting, perhaps, that as the species causing all the problems, we're suffering the destruction of our habitat too, and we have experienced that loss in terrible ways. Ocean waters have warmed by a full degree Fahrenheit since 1970, and warmer water is like rocket fuel for typhoons and hurricanes. Two studies last year found that in the past 35 years the number of Category 4 and 5 hurricanes worldwide has doubled while the wind speed and duration of all hurricanes has jumped 50%. Since atmospheric heat is not choosy about the water it warms, tropical storms could start turning up in some decidedly nontropical places. "There's a school of thought that sea surface temperatures are warming up toward Canada," says Greg Holland, senior scientist for NCAR in Boulder. "If so, you're likely to get tropical cyclones there, but we honestly don't know."

WHAT WE CAN DO

So much for environmental collapse happening in so many places at once has at last awakened much of the world, particularly the 141 nations that have ratified the Kyoto treaty to reduce emissions--an imperfect accord, to be sure, but an accord all the same. The U.S., however, which is home to less than 5% of Earth's population but produces 25% of CO2 emissions, remains intransigent. Many environmentalists declared the Bush Administration hopeless from the start, and while that may have been premature, it's undeniable that the White House's environmental record--from the abandonment of Kyoto to the President's broken campaign pledge to control carbon output to the relaxation of emission standards--has been dismal. George W. Bush's recent rhetorical nods to America's oil addiction and his praise of such alternative fuel sources as switchgrass have yet to be followed by real initiatives.

The anger surrounding all that exploded recently when NASA researcher Jim Hansen, director of the Goddard Institute for Space Studies and a longtime leader in climate-change research, complained that he had been harassed by White House appointees as he tried to sound the global-warming alarm. "The way democracy is supposed to work, the presumption is that the public is well informed," he told TIME. "They're trying to deny the science." Up against such resistance, many environmental groups have resolved simply to wait out this Administration and hope for something better in 2009.

The Republican-dominated Congress has not been much more encouraging. Senators John McCain and Joe Lieberman have twice been unable to get through the Senate even mild measures to limit carbon. Senators Pete Domenici and Jeff Bingaman, both of New Mexico and both ranking members of the chamber's Energy Committee, have made global warming a high-profile matter. A white paper issued in February will be the subject of an investigatory Senate conference next week. A House delegation recently traveled to Antarctica, Australia and New Zealand to visit researchers studying climate change. "Of the 10 of us, only three were believers," says Representative Sherwood Boehlert of New York. "Every one of the others said this opened their eyes."

Boehlert himself has long fought the environmental fight, but if the best that can be said for most lawmakers is that they are finally recognizing the global-warming problem, there's reason to wonder whether they will have the courage to reverse it. Increasingly, state and local governments are filling the void. The mayors of more than 200 cities have signed the U.S. Mayors Climate Protection Agreement, pledging, among other things, that they will meet the Kyoto goal of reducing greenhouse-gas emissions in their cities to 1990 levels by 2012. Nine eastern states have established the Regional Greenhouse Gas Initiative for the purpose of developing a cap-and-trade program that would set ceilings on industrial emissions and allow companies that overperform to sell pollution credits to those that underperform -- the same smart, incentive-based strategy that got sulfur dioxide under control and reduced acid rain. And California passed the nation's toughest automobile- emissions law last summer.

"There are a whole series of things that demonstrate that people want to act and want their government to act," says Fred Krupp, president of Environmental Defense. Krupp and others believe that we should probably accept that it's too late to prevent CO2 concentrations from climbing to 450 p.p.m. (or 70 p.p.m. higher than where they are now). From there, however, we should be able to stabilize them and start to dial them back down.

That goal should be attainable. Curbing global warming may be an order of magnitude harder than, say, eradicating smallpox or putting a man on the moon. But is it moral not to try? We did not so much march toward the environmental precipice as drunkenly reel there, snapping at the scientific scolds who told us we had a problem.

The scolds, however, knew what they were talking about. In a solar system crowded with sister worlds that either emerged stillborn like Mercury and Venus or died in infancy like Mars, we're finally coming to appreciate the knife-blade margins within which life can thrive. For more than a century we've been monkeying with those margins. It's long past time we set them right.

Vicious Cycles (TIME)

The debate over whether Earth is warming up is over. Now we're learning that climate disruptions feed off one another in accelerating spirals of destruction. Scientists fear we may be approaching the point of no return THE GREENHOUSE EFFECT Without the greenhouse effect, life on Earth would not be possible. Energy from the sun is absorbed by the planet and radiated back out as heat. Atmospheric gases like carbon dioxide trap that heat and keep it from leaking into space. That's what keeps us warm at night.

But as humans pour ever increasing amounts of greenhouse gases into the atmosphere, more of the sun's heat gets trapped, and the planet gets a fever BURNING FOSSIL FUELS RELEASES CARBON FUELING THE FIRE The amount of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere is climbing fast. Most of it comes from burning fuels for energy--gasoline in cars or coal for electricity, for example. The U.S., with less than 5% of the world's population, produces one-quarter of all greenhouse gases BURNING FORESTS REDUCES OXYGEN AND INCREASES DROUGHT SPREADING THE PAIN Deforestation, through clear-cutting or burning, sows havoc far beyond the affected area. The fires release still more carbon into the atmosphere, fewer plants survive to convert CO2 into oxygen, and scorched soil absorbs more heat and retains less water, increasing droughts •Plants take in CO2 •Fires release carbon •Less carbon absorbed •Soil dries out RISING TEMPERATURES MELT POLAR ICE AND PERMAFROST THAWING OUT The North Pole may be seasonally ice free by 2050. Melting permafrost will release vast amounts of trapped carbon into the air LESS ICE MEANS MORE HEAT WHICH MEANS LESS ICE SPEEDING UP Ice reflects nearly all the sun's energy that hits it. As the planet's ice melts, more of that energy is absorbed by Earth--which further raises the temperature. That, in turn, makes the remaining ice melt quicker •20% reflected by vegetation and dark soil •10% reflected by ocean water •90% reflected by ice MELTING ICE RAISES SEA LEVELS INUNDATING LOW COASTAL AREAS WASHING ASHORE The ice at the North Pole is floating, so as it melts, the sea level won't change much. But the massive ice sheets over Antarctica and Greenland are another story. If both melted completely, sea levels could rise nearly 220 ft. (72 m). That's a worst-case scenario. But the melting is accelerating, and sea levels are projected to rise gradually, threatening low-lying communities Sources: Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, Third Assessment Report; NOAA; NASA; National Snow and Ice Data Center; Carbon Dioxide Information Analysis Center; National Center for Atmospheric Research; U.S. Global Change Research Program; Goddard Institute for Space Studies

QUIVER TREE This striking giant aloe was given its name by the San people of southern Africa, who use the tree's hollow branches as quivers for their arrows. Scientists have discovered that quiver trees are starting to die off in parts of their traditional range. The species might be in the early stages of moving southward, trying to escape rising temperatures closer to the equator.

PINON MOUSE This tiny resident of the southwestern U.S. has long eked out its living in juniper woodlands, but in California it is heading for higher, cooler altitudes in the High Sierra conifer forests. The mouse is one of several small mammals in the region that have moved their homes 1,000 to 3,000 ft. higher in elevation over the past century.

RED-BREASTED GOOSE Twenty-six bird species, including this goose, which breeds in the Arctic, are listed by the World Conservation Union as threatened by global warming. Half are seabirds whose food supplies are diminished because of climate changes. The rest are terrestrial species, including several whose coastal habitats are at risk because of rising sea levels.

AFRICAN ELEPHANT Global warming might not only shrink the elephant's range within Africa but may also wreak havoc with the animal's love life. The relative abundance--or scarcity--of food affects the social hierarchy of the herd, which in turn can determine which animals get to breed.

BUTTERFLIES Researchers have documented shifts in the ranges of many butterflies. One study looked at 35 species of nonmigratory butterflies whose ranges extended from northern Africa to northern Europe. The scientists found that two-thirds of the species had shifted their home ranges northward by 20 to 150 miles. In the U.S., researchers have closely tracked the movements of the butterfly known as Edith's checkerspot (at right, middle). Though butterflies might be sturdier than they look, scientists believe many species will not survive the impact of climate change.

KING PROTEA It is the national flower of South Africa, just one among the many spectacular members of the large family of flowering plants named after Proteus, a Greek god capable of changing his shape at will. Scientists fear that more than a third of all Proteaceae species could disappear by 2050.

MISTLETOE The limber pine dwarf mistletoe is proliferating throughout western forests in North America, thanks to heat and drought-weakened trees that act as perfect hosts for this botanical parasite. It's not unlike what happens in your body, says researcher Connie Millar of the U.S. Forest Service: "When your system is stressed, you're more vulnerable to all kinds of things that want to get you."

FROGS Amphibians have been hopping, swimming and crawling about the planet for 350 million years. But their future is hardly assured. A global assessment of the state of this entire class of vertebrates found that nearly one-third of the 5,743 known species are in serious trouble. Climate change may well be the culprit in most cases, either directly or indirectly. The home habitat of the golden toad (at right, bottom) in Costa Rica moved up the mountain until "home" disappeared entirely. More than two-thirds of the 110 species of colorful harlequin frogs in Central and South America, two shown above, have also disappeared. Scientists believe that what killed many of the harlequins and what threatens a great many other amphibian species is a disease caused by the fungus Batrachochytrium dendrobatidis. Climate change seems to be making frogs more vulnerable to infection by the fungus.

What troubles scientists especially is that if we are only in the early stages of warming, all these lost and endangered animals might be just the first of many to go. One study estimates that more than a million species worldwide could be driven to extinction by the year 2050.

How It Affects Your Health (TIME)

By Christine Gorman

Time, March 26, 2006

It's a fair bet that global warming is going to lead to a rise in human sickness and death. But what form they will take is difficult to say. We can be pretty sure that as average temperatures climb, there will be more frequent and longer heat waves of the sort that contributed to the death of at least 20,000 Europeans in August 2003. Other predictions are more tenuous. For example, rising temperatures could--if rainfall and other conditions are right--result in larger mosquito populations at higher elevations in the tropics, which could in turn contribute to the spread of malaria, dengue and other insect-borne infections. Early indications are not encouraging. The World Health Organization (WHO) believes that even the modest increases in average temperature that have occurred since the 1970s have begun to take a toll. Climate change is responsible for at least 150,000 extra deaths a year--a figure that will double by 2030, according to WHO's conservative estimate. As with so many public-health issues, a disproportionate part of the burden appears to be falling on the poorest of the poor. That doesn't mean, however, that the comparatively wealthy--who account for more than their share of greenhouse-gas emissions--will escape harm.

A look at three key factors affected by warming offers a hint of things to come.

AIR We're used to thinking of industrial and traffic pollution as having a detrimental effect on air quality. But all other things being equal, rising temperature by itself increases the amount of ground-level ozone, a major constituent of smog. So many studies have linked higher ozone levels to death rates from heart and lung ailments that many cities issue smog alerts to warn those at risk to stay indoors. You can expect more and longer alerts.

It gets worse. Higher levels of carbon dioxide favor the growth of ragweed and other pollen producers over other plants, according to Dr. Paul Epstein at Harvard's Center for Health and the Global Environment. In addition, ragweed churns out more pollen as CO2 levels rise. Scientists have tied local spikes in asthma and allergy attacks to increases in molds and emissions from diesel engines. Apparently, the molds attach themselves to diesel particles, which deliver them more efficiently deep into the lungs. Add a plentiful helping of dust storms (from, for instance, the desertification of Mongolia or northern Africa) and a rise in drought-driven brushfires, and you have a made- to-order recipe for increasing respiratory distress worldwide.

WATER Residents of the U.S. Gulf Coast don't have to be reminded that water can be a killer. You can usually evacuate people ahead of a major storm, but you can't evacuate infrastructure. "Thirteen of the 20 largest cities in the world happen to be located at sea level," says Dr. Cindy Parker of the Johns Hopkins School of Public Health in Baltimore, Md. That means that where people are most at risk from floods, so are hospitals and water-treatment plants. As we have seen in New Orleans, the health effects of losing those facilities persist long after the water has receded.

Another predicted consequence of global warming is heavier downpours, leading to more floods. The immediate hazard is drowning, but the larger issue is water quality. To take just one example, more than 700 U.S. cities--most of them older communities in the Northeast, Northwest and Great Lakes area--have sewer systems that regularly overflow into water supplies during heavy rainstorms, mixing dirty and clean water and sometimes requiring mandatory boiling to make contaminated tap water safe. A heavy rainfall preceded the majority of waterborne-disease outbreaks in the U.S. over the past 60 years, says Dr. Jonathan Patz of the University of Wisconsin at Madison.

Ocean-water patterns also play a role in human health. Mercedes Pascual and her colleagues at the University of Michigan have been poring over more than a century's worth of data on cholera outbreaks in Bangladesh and tying them to detailed temperature reports of the surface waters of the Pacific Ocean. True, Bangladesh isn't anywhere near the Pacific, but the researchers are using the temperature data as an indication of a larger weather pattern called the El NiÃ±o/ Southern Oscillation, or ENSO. What they have found is that the severity of an epidemic is linked to water temperature--but only in years of higher-than-normal temperatures on the ocean's surface. More alarming: as the ENSO pattern has become more pronounced since the 1970s, the association with cholera has become even stronger.

INSECTS The news here is not all bad. Ticks, for example, may not be able to survive hotter temperatures in the southwestern U.S. And global warming is unlikely to have much of an effect on malaria, as long as you focus on lowland areas (because those regions already have so many mosquitoes). That picture may change, however, as you move upward in elevation. Malaria has seen a dramatic upswing since the 1970s in highland cities like Nairobi (around 5,500 ft. above sea level). How much of that can be tied to temperature increases--as opposed to population movement, lapses in mosquito control or the spread of drug-resistant parasites--is a matter of debate. But because each year there are at least 300 million cases accounting for more than 1 million deaths, even a small uptick in the spread or severity of malaria could be devastating.

The tricky thing about all those predictions is that you can't point to any outbreak or any individual's death and say, "This occurred because of climate change." But we know that good public health relies on a long list of factors--the availability of doctors and nurses, effective medicines, clean water, proper sanitation--and that even today, millions of people die every year of what should be preventable diseases. With global warming, you can expect the death toll to be even higher.

THE ROCK BAND CAPITALIST TOOLS FOR CUTTING CO2

When Coldplay cut A Rush of Blood to the Head, the rock band didn't want the album's production and distribution to add to the greenhouse gases flowing into the atmosphere. So, working with a small British firm, the CarbonNeutral Co., the group bought 10,000 mango trees for villagers in Karnataka, India. Since plants breathe in carbon dioxide as they grow, Coldplay figures the mango trees will eventually neutralize all the CO2 released in the making and selling of its CDs.

It's a sweet deal all around. Coldplay gets to do right by the environment; the impoverished Indian villagers not only get the mangoes but will also earn money from the CO2 locked in the trees when the gas is sold on a surging new market--one that trades carbon saved for carbon burned.

Capitalism is nothing if not adaptive, and its champions have responded to global warming with a market-based solution that provides polluters with a profit incentive to mend their ways. It's called cap and trade, and it is the mechanism behind the so-called carbon markets spawned by the Kyoto Protocol. Firms in developed countries that pump out more CO2 than they are allowed under limits imposed by Kyoto are required by the protocol to offset that pollution by buying credits on the carbon market. Those that cut CO2 emissions below their allowance or help polluters in developing nations clean up their act get to sell the credits--as do groups that cut greenhouse gases by, among other things, planting trees.

Since January 2005, carbon markets in the European Union have traded at least 500 million tons of CO2. Because the Bush Administration dropped out of Kyoto, the U.S. doesn't participate in this booming global trade. But state governments are starting to set up regional carbon markets based on caps they establish under their own authority. In December, seven Northeastern states led by New York agreed to cut power-plant emissions via cap and trade, beginning in 2009.

For now, U.S. firms that want to trade emissions must join the Chicago Climate Exchange, a voluntary but legally binding bourse whose members, according to founder Richard Sandor, account for 8% of the greenhouse emissions from stationary sources in the U.S. "If we were a country," he says, "we'd be roughly the size of Britain." Members of the Chicago exchange, including Ford Motor Co. and DuPont, have pledged to cut their emissions 4% by the end of this year from the levels they averaged from 1998 to 2000. They have already taken tens of millions of tons of greenhouse gases out of play, which sounds impressive until it's compared with the 6 billion--ton plume of CO2 spewed into the atmosphere by the U.S. each year.

Meanwhile, the opportunities to offset emissions are growing. Conservation International, for instance, helped Mitsubishi and Pearl Jam funnel their offsetting funds into rain-forest protection in Madagascar. And Coldplay did more than enough to offset its last album, X&Y, by protecting forests in Mexico and Ecuador. Internet ventures with names like TerraPass, myclimate and Drive Neutral enable commuters and air travelers to calculate their emissions and neutralize the damage. Some even aim to turn a profit.

How do the consumer offsets work? Take the nonprofit Carbonfund.org It sells absolution for personal and commercial emissions at a cut rate of $5.50 per ton of CO2. (A full year of carbon neutralization typically costs $99.) Carbonfund allows buyers to choose where their money winds up--in alternative energy, forest conservation or energy efficiency. Co-founder Eric Carlson says Carbonfund has offset about 40,000 tons of CO2 so far. That's not much. But its ultimate aim, he says, is to channel what support it gets into driving down the cost of clean energy--and, along the way, increase awareness of climate change. "There is an educational value in these things," says Judi Greenwald of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change. "People realize that what they do can make a difference." So, apparently, do rock stars. --By Unmesh Kher

SWEDEN CLEANER AIR OVER SCANDINAVIA

Like the U.S., Sweden is addicted to oil. Unlike the U.S., it has a plan to kick the habit--and a deadline. By 2020, says Mona Sahlin, Minister for Sustainable Development, the country will no longer be dependent on fossil fuels. "By then," she declares, "no home will need oil for heating, no motorist will be obliged to use petrol [gasoline] as the sole option available."

Can Sweden do it? Probably. Back in 1970, before the first Middle East energy crisis, Sweden got 77% of its energy from oil. By 2003, even though industrial production had risen dramatically, that figure had dropped to 34%. Part of the country's impressive record comes courtesy of its abundant resources. "We have access to large amounts of hydropower," admits Sahlin, "large amounts of biomass and good conditions for increased use of wind power."

But that's not the only reason Sweden was rated the world's second greenest nation (just behind New Zealand) in a study issued at this year's World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. Sweden's leaders have passed laws that would be unthinkable for a U.S. politician--taxes on fuel and CO2 emissions to induce car owners to trade in their gas guzzlers for hybrids, for example, and tax exemptions for home owners who switch from oil heating to renewable energy. Indeed, whereas Americans are likely to complain about higher taxes or infringements on their rights, most Swedes seem to embrace the idea of helping save the planet.

Take, for example, Sweden's nationwide rush to convert cars from gasoline to fuels like ethanol and biogas fermented from plant waste. Stations that sell alternative fuels are springing up all over the country, and fully 13% of new autos sold in February, the most recent month for which numbers are available, can run on ultra-low-emission substances.

What Americans might appreciate is the way local governments are encouraged to come up with their own strategies for meeting the national goals. For example, in Helsingborg, a coastal city of 120,000, buses run on biogas made from garbage and other organic waste from households and nearby farms. It's part of a program that dates from 2000, when city officials decided they would get 20% of municipal vehicles running on renewable fuel by 2010. By 2004, they had reached 23%. "We have upped our target so that 50% of the city's cars, vans and trucks should use renewable fuel by 2010--and we will meet that target," says Ulla Ingers, Helsingborg's assistant director of environment.

Similar programs are under way across the country. In the northern town of Aapua, a wind farm opened just last month, thanks to local residents who began lobbying town officials five years ago; it should supply 40% of Aapua's electricity. The old university city of Lund gets 30% of its heat from a geothermal plant. And Fjaras, in the southwest, just opened a solar-powered health center. Some of these are small efforts, to be sure, but when an entire nation embraces a pledge to wean itself from oil, there's no reason it can't be done. --By Michael D. Lemonick. THE MAYORS SAVING ONE CITY AT A TIME

Seattle mayor Greg Nickels has news for President George W. Bush: global warming is also "local" warming. So for Nickels and his constituents, climate change is about the Cascade Mountains, where the city gets its water and hydropower and where the snowpack has shrunk by half over the past 50 years. It's about the effect of Puget Sound's warmer waters on wild-salmon runs. It's about hotter summers cooking up more smog. It's about a rise in sea level that could flood Seattle's port. "The stakes are high--globally and locally," he says. "We need to act."

So in February 2005, when the Kyoto Protocol took effect in 141 countries but not the U.S., Nickels launched the U.S. Mayors' Climate Protection Agreement. So far, 218 mayors in 39 states, representing nearly 44 million Americans, have signed on to its 12-step program for their own cities to meet or beat Kyoto's original target for the U.S.--cutting greenhouse-gas emissions to 7% below 1990 levels over the next six years. Some cities got a head start. Portland, Ore., which zeroed in on global warming beginning in 1993, has already slashed emissions by 13% per capita, partly by building light rail and 730 miles of regional bikeways. In Austin, Texas, the city-owned utility was able to cancel construction of a 500-MW coal-fired power plant--planned to power 50,000 homes--thanks in part to an intensive green building program that offers energy-efficiency audits to all residents and businesses, retrofits schools and installs insulation and shade screens to reduce sunlight in low-income housing. "We're frustrated by the lack of national leadership," says Mayor Will Wynn, an early backer of the Nickels initiative. "This is about the future of the planet."

Other cities are crafting their own solutions. St. Paul, Minn., which has had to forgo Winter Carnival ice sculptures and on-ice softball tournaments in recent years because of rising temperatures, is using a biomass-fired power plant for both heat and electricity. Keene, N.H., is harnessing methane and other gases at its landfill to run a generator that powers its recycling center. Salt Lake City, Utah, has converted 1,630 traffic stops to energy-efficient light-emitting diode signals--which alone will save more than 500 tons of CO2 pollution each year and cost the city $53,000 less than conventional bulbs. "The idea is to solve global warming one city at a time," says Glen Brand, an energy specialist for the Sierra Club, which has launched a "cool cities" website.

But though mayors prefer to downplay the costs of fighting global warming, there seems to be truth to the Bush Administration's contention that meeting the Kyoto targets involves pain--not just gain. And in Seattle, where population growth is projected to push up regional greenhouse gases by 38% in the next 15 years, ratcheting down to 1990 levels would require slashing emissions by 683,000 tons--the equivalent of taking some 148,000 cars off the road. To do that may require such unpopular measures as highway tolls and increased parking taxes. But in the absence of federal controls, Nickels says, he's ready and willing: "If it's not going to happen from the top down, let's make it happen from the bottom up." --By Margot Roosevelt

THE RETAILER THE GREENING OF WAL-MART

All around the world, shoppers flock to Wal-Mart to buy everything from socks to sofa beds. In McKinney, Texas, they come for another reason: to see the wind turbine. Rising 120 ft. above the ground, it's the tallest structure in town and supplies 5% of the store's electricity. It's not the only thing that makes this Wal-Mart a green giant. There are photovoltaic shingles on the roof, exterior walls coated with heat-reflective paint and a high-tech system that automatically dims or raises the lights depending on whether it's sunny or overcast. Brent Allen, who manages the experimental store, says customers tell him all the time that "they drove out of their way to shop at this Wal-Mart." Which makes you wonder: If folks drive farther than they have to, aren't they burning extra gasoline in their pickups and SUVS? And isn't that offsetting the store's energy savings?

The laws of unintended consequences can be cruel for companies trying to do the right thing. The laws of economics suggest that Wal-Mart is so big, with 5,200 stores worldwide, that it influences everything from the price of lumber to the size of the container your laundry detergent comes in. And if this retailing giant throws its weight behind environmental responsibility, the impact could be profound: less air pollution at factories in China, mass-market sales of organic products, cereal boxes that aren't half filled with air. "One little change in product packaging could save 1,500 trees," says Wal-Mart CEO Lee Scott. "If everybody saves 1,500 trees or 50 barrels of oil, at the end of the day you have made a huge difference."

Scott wants Wal-Mart to do its part too. He has promised to cut greenhouse-gas emissions at existing stores 20% over the next few years and pledged to construct new stores that are 25% to 30% more efficient. He wants Wal-Mart's fleet of more than 7,000 trucks to get twice as many miles per gallon by 2015. Factories that show Wal-Mart they're cutting air pollution--even those in China--will get preferential treatment in the supply chain. Wal-Mart says it's working with consumer-product manufacturers to trim their packaging and will reward those that do so with prime real estate on the shelves. Scott has pledged to enlist Wal-Mart's army of lobbyists to push for pro-environmental policy changes in Washington, including incentives for utilities to cut greenhouse gases.

Cynics might call it a "greenwash," a bid to deflect attention from Wal-Mart's controversial labor and health-insurance practices. But it's not just window dressing, because Wal-Mart sees profit in going green. "We are not being altruistic," says Scott. "This is a business philosophy, not a social philosophy." Some top environmentalists seem convinced he's serious, including Amory Lovins, head of the Rocky Mountain Institute, who is a paid adviser. "We don't go where we don't think there's a genuine interest in change," says Lovins.

There's no question that soaring energy costs are fueling Wal-Mart's conservation drive. The company now insists that truckers shut off their engines when stopping for a break, yielding estimated savings of $25 million a year. By doubling the gas mileage of the fleet through better aerodynamics and lower-friction tires, Wal-Mart expects to pocket $310 million a year. One of the biggest items on its energy bill is lighting. Instead of going with the cheapest bulbs, the company is experimenting with costlier LED strips for refrigeration units that last longer and use less energy. Scott also wants to sell more organically grown food and cotton clothing, partly because it's good for the planet, partly because he believes he can get prices down and boost sales to low- income customers.

Like Bill Gates, who started his charitable foundation shortly after Microsoft's antitrust trial, Scott happens to be burnishing Wal-Mart's image at a time when his company's reputation is under siege. He acknowledges that he launched the plan partly to shield Wal-Mart from bad press about its contribution to global warming. "By doing what we're doing today you avoid the headline risks that are going to come for people who did not do anything," he says. "At some point businesses will be held accountable for the actions they take." Meanwhile, should Wal-Mart succeed at shrinking its environmental footprint and lowering prices for green products, both the planet and the company will profit. Sam Walton would have liked that. --By Daren Fonda. Reported by Steve Barnes/Bentonville, Rita Healy/Denver and Adam Pitluk/ McKinney

THE UTILITY ASKING TO BE TAXED AND REGULATED

Jim Rogers runs a power company that spews 62 million tons of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere each year. That's a lot of greenhouse gas. But you won't find him on the hit list of environmental crusaders. The CEO of Cinergy, a utility with nine coal-fired plants in Indiana, Ohio and Kentucky, Rogers is an outspoken advocate of regulating carbon and imposing a price on emissions. His position makes him a renegade within his industry, which officially opposes any regulatory scheme that would force power companies to cut carbon emissions. It makes Rogers more likely to be invited to Sierra Club headquarters than to the White House, given that President Bush hasn't called for anything more stringent than voluntary cuts in greenhouse gases.

What is Rogers thinking? For one thing, he's personally worried about global warming and believes that the scientific debate about what causes it has long been settled. He thinks that the U.S. will be forced to regulate carbon--as most other industrialized countries have done--within the next five years, if not sooner. And as the CEO of a publicly traded company, he has to make decisions that will affect shareholders decades in the future. Power plants have life spans of 50 years, and if carbon is taxed, the fuel calculus of those plants changes radically. "We're very dependent on coal," says Rogers, "and if you're going to have earnings growth that's sustainable over a long period of time, you [need] certainty on the carbon issue."

With the approval last month by Cinergy's board of a merger with Duke Energy, Rogers is poised to run one of America's largest utilities, and he aims to lead by example. In recent years, Cinergy has spent $1 billion to increase its use of cleaner-burning natural gas, including $200 million to convert a coal-fired plant, and Rogers has cut Cinergy's reliance on coal from 87% of its fuel to 73%. He has pledged to reduce Cinergy's CO2 emissions 5% below 2000 levels by 2012, and he is investing in projects to sequester carbon in forests. Rogers is evaluating coal- gasification technology for a plant in Indiana, which could dramatically cut carbon emissions from burning coal, still the least expensive and most abundant fossil fuel in the U.S.

Even if he succeeds, Cinergy's environmental record will be far from perfect. A $1.4 billion settlement with the Environmental Protection Agency over alleged violations of the Clean Air Act fell apart when Cinergy backed away from the deal. The original suit is slowly working its way through the courts. And Cinergy supports Bush's efforts to roll back provisions of the Clean Air Act that govern utilities.

But with global warming, Rogers vows to keep the heat on his colleagues in the energy industry and on Washington politicians. "My greatest fear is that we don't deal with the problem now," he says, "and we wake up one day and don't have enough time."

THE POWER BROKER REWARDING GOOD BEHAVIOR

Fred Krupp wants to do something about the carbon dioxide that spews from tailpipes and smokestacks. But why is the president of Environmental Defense looking for solutions in tropical rain forests and Kansas cornfields? Because forests and fields pull greenhouse gases from the air. So Krupp, 52, went to Brazil to urge protection of the Amazon basin and to Kansas to promote no-till farming. Plowing fields releases CO2; if farmers plant seeds without tilling, three-quarters of a metric ton of carbon per acre could be stored every year.

What's in it for Brazilians and Kansans? Environmental Defense is lobbying Congress to approve a system that would mandate reductions in emissions and allow the sale of permits to release specified amounts of carbon. Companies having trouble cutting emissions could buy allowances from firms that have unused permits. Or they could pay farmers to store carbon and developing nations to preserve forests. The idea comes from a concept developed by Environmental Defense when Krupp helped draft the 1990 Clean Air Act. It set up a trading system to control sulfur dioxide. Krupp believes similar financial incentives could slow global warming. "Once you put a value on carbon reductions," he says, "you make winners out of innovators. You offer a pot of gold." --By Charles Alexander

THE ENERGY ENGINEER Clean Power For China

Like just about every ambitious engineering student at China'sÂ Tsinghua University in the early 1980s, Li Zheng had his heart set on the high-tech, high-profile electronics field--up until the day he bombed on an electronics exam. But his uncharacteristic classroom stumble led Li to a field that could play an even larger role in China's future: energy production. "I think the choice was a very fortunate one in the end," says Li, who studied thermal engineering and in 2000 became a full professor at Tsinghua--China's M.I.T.--at the remarkably young age of 35. "Energy is incredibly important for a growing society like China."

But energy means carbon, and China's booming economy puts it on a path to become the world's No. 1 greenhouse-gas emitter as early as 2020. Li knows that China needs clean energy as badly as the developed world needs China to clean up, which is why he joined the Tsinghua-BP Clean Energy Research and Education Center as director when it opened in July 2003. The center's most promising project is a new technology called polygeneration, by which coal is converted into a cleaner gaseous fuel that can both generate electricity and be processed into a petroleum substitute. Polygeneration could cut the carbon emissions China generates by burning its copious coal reserves and reduce its dependence on oil imports. While his team continues to refine the technology--it's still more expensive than direct coal combustion--Li is lobbying the government to construct a $600 million demonstration plant, and he's optimistic he will see it built. "China is motivated to develop this technology," Li says. And the rest of the world is hoping it does. --By Bryan Walsh/Hong Kong

THE SNOW MAN OF ASPEN KEEPING WINTER COOL

If the 1998 fires set in Vail, Colo., by protesters from Earth Liberation Front were an environmental wake-up call for the ski industry, Auden Schendler, 35, is a triple shot of espresso. Hired the next year by Aspen Skiing Co. (ASC), he has become the most visible of a crop of experts charged with cleaning up the industry's act. Between keeping the lodges toasty and draining the creeks for snowmaking, downhill-skiing companies in the late 1990s were major consumers of natural resources. And ASC, which now operates four mountains, two hotels and 12 restaurants in the Aspen-Snowmass area, was one of the biggest. Its snowmaking operations alone consume some 160 million gallons of water a year.

Schendler set about changing that. ASC had already invested $10.5 million in efficient snowmaking equipment that saved more than 6 million gallons of water in one year. At Schendler's urging, it became the first ski company to issue a climate-change policy, with a public commitment to cutting greenhouse gases that has led to a 75% reduction in emissions. ASC was the first to use biodiesel fuel in snowcats, issue sustainability reports and develop a green building policy.

A graduate of Bowdoin College, Schendler insulated trailers for the poor before joining Amory Lovins' famed Rocky Mountain Institute. He found a kindred spirit in ASC president and CEO Pat O'Donnell, although the road to environmental enlightenment at ASC hasn't always been smooth. It took four years to persuade the company to retrofit a parking garage with fluorescent light fixtures, a move Schendler calculates rid the atmosphere of 300,000 lbs. of CO2 annually.

A prolific writer and major supporter of the Keep Winter Cool campaign, a partnership between the ski industry and the Natural Resources Defense Council, Schendler feels he has helped change the culture of skiing, at least at ASC. "We've turned this place into a lab for addressing climate change," he says. "Aspen is a lever that can change the world." --By Rita Healy/Denver

THE POLLUTION FIGHTERS Delhi Without Diesel

Melting ice caps didn't figure into the fightÂ Sunita Narain and Bhure Lal led to build the world's cleanest public-transport network. They had more pressing concerns. "New Delhi was choking to death," says Narain, 43, director of India's Center for Science and Environment. "Air pollution was taking one life per hour." Adds Lal, 63, then a senior government administrator: "The capital was one of the most polluted on earth. At the end of the day, your collar was black, and you had soot all over your face. Millions had bronchitis and asthma."

In the mid-1990s, Narain filed a lawsuit to force Delhi's buses, taxis and rickshaws to convert to cleaner-burning compressed natural gas (CNG). In July 1998, the Supreme Court ruled largely in her favor and adopted many of her proposals. It ordered a ban on leaded fuel, conversion of all diesel-powered buses to CNG and the scrapping of old diesel taxis and rickshaws. But busmakers and oil companies--supported by government ministers--objected loudly. So the court formed a committee, led by Lal and Narain, to enforce its judgment.

The unlikely duo immediately ran into roadblocks. Bus companies took vehicles off the road, stranding angry commuters. Mile-long queues of rickshaws formed at the handful of gas stations with CNG pumps. Oil companies trotted out scientists who claimed that CNG was just as polluting as diesel. But Narain and Lal fought back. By December 2002, the last diesel bus had left Delhi, and 10,000 taxis, 12,000 buses and 80,000 rickshaws were powered by CNG.

Although air pollution in Delhi has stabilized, the fight for clean air is far from won. Some 400 to 600 new private cars roll onto the city's streets every day. Narain and Lal don't claim to have slowed global warming. But their efforts have attracted requests for advice from as far away as Kenya and Indonesia. "Delhi leapfrogged," Narain says with a grin. "People noticed." --By Alex Perry/New Delhi

THE EVANGELICAL ACTIVIST PREACHING FOR THE PLANET

The Rev. Jim Ball agrees with President George W. Bush's positions on abstinence, stem-cell research, traditional marriage and the rights of an unborn child. But the Administration's environmental policies strike him as morally wrongheaded, and he's not afraid to say so. He led the 2002 "What Would Jesus Drive?" campaign against gas-guzzling cars and was one of the organizers of the Evangelical Climate Initiative in February, when 86 evangelical Christian leaders called on Congress to regulate carbon-dioxide emissions.

Ball, 44, practices what he preaches (he drives an energy-efficient Toyota Prius) and he came to his environmental beliefs honestly: through Scripture and concern for the living and the unborn. Fearing that millions of lives could be lost in global-warming-related disasters, he began studying environmentalism at Drew University in 1994 and emerged three years later with a Ph.D. in theological ethics. He became executive director of the Evangelical Environmental Network in 2000.

Activist ministers like Ball and Richard Cizik of the National Association of Evangelicals represent a significant political liability for the Bush Administration and its allies in Congress--a sign that their energy policies have put them on a collision course with a core constituency. Pay attention to our message, Ball argues, because climate change is not a left-wing, tree-hugging issue. "It's a people problem. It's about loving your neighbor."

The Impact Of Asia's Giants (TIME)

By Bryan Wlash

Time, March 26, 2006

If everyone lived like the average Chinese or Indian, you wouldn't be reading about global warming. On a per capita basis, China and India emit far less greenhouse gas than energy-efficient Japan, environmentally scrupulous Sweden--and especially the gas-guzzling U.S. (The average American is responsible for 20 times as much CO_2 emission annually as the average Indian.) There's only one problem: 2.4 billion people live in China and India, a great many of whom aspire to an American-style energy-intensive life. And thanks to the breakneck growth of the two countries' economies, they just might get there--with potentially disastrous results for the world's climate.

The International Energy Agency (IEA) forecasts that the increase in greenhouse-gas emissions from 2000 to 2030 from China alone will nearly equal the increase from the entire industrialized world. India, though behind its Asian rival, could see greenhouse-gas emissions that rise 70% by 2025, according to the World Resources Institute. But the nearly double-digit growth rates that are responsible for those nightmare projections also present an environmental opportunity. "Anything you want to do about clean energy is easier to do from the outset," says David Moskowitz, an energy consultant who has advised Chinese officials. "Every time they add a power plant or factory, they can add one cleaner and better than before." If China and India can muster the will and resources to leapfrog the West's energy-heavy development path, dangerous climate change might be averted. "China and India have to demonstrate to other countries that it is possible to develop in a sustainable way," says Yang Fuqiang, vice president of the Energy Foundation in Beijing. "We can't fail."

The Kyoto accord on climate change did nothing to slow growth in China and India because as developing countries they are not required under the protocol to make cuts in carbon emissions--and that is not likely to change after the agreement expires in 2012. Both countries are desperate for energy to fuel the economic expansion that is pulling their citizens out of poverty, and despite bold investments in renewables, much of that energy will have to come from coal, the only traditional energy source they have in abundance. Barbara Finamore, director of the Natural Resources Defense Council's China Clean Energy Program, estimates that China's total electricity demand will increase by 2,600 gigawatts by 2050, which is the equivalent of adding four 300-megawatt power plants every week for the next 45 years. India's energy consumption rose 208% from 1980 to 2001, even faster than China's, but nearly half the population still lacks regular access to electricity--a fact the government is working to change. "They'll do what they can, but overall emissions are likely to rise much higher than they are now," says Jonathan Sinton, China analyst for the IEA.

Environmentalism inevitably takes a backseat to development in China and India, but even among many green advocates there, climate change is seen as a less pressing problem than air and water pollution. There is also a widespread feeling that the developed world, which grew rich while freely spewing carbon, should take most of the responsibility for climate change. "Our issue is that, first and foremost, the U.S. needs to reduce its emissions," says Sunita Narain, director of the Center for Science and Environment in New Delhi. "It is unacceptable and immoral that the U.S. doesn't take the lead on climate change." The Bush Administration, in turn, has rejected Kyoto partly because developing countries were exempt from emissions cuts.

The standoff between the U.S. and the Asian giants has stymied international climate-change efforts for years, but that is beginning to change--and some of the push is coming from Beijing. For most of the recent Montreal climate conference, the U.S. resisted any serious discussion of what should be done after Kyoto expires. But several major developing countries, including China as a quiet but present force, supported further talks and helped break down U.S. opposition. "At the moment, China seems more interested in engaging on this issue internationally than the U.S. does," says Elliot Diringer, director of international strategies for the Pew Center on Global Climate Change.

That's because China and India increasingly see climate-change policy as a way to address some of their immediate problems--such as energy shortages and local environmental ills--while getting the international community to help foot the bill. Thanks to poorly run plants and antiquated power grids, China and India are extremely energy inefficient. China uses three times as much energy as the U.S. to produce $1 of economic output. But that means there is a lot of room for improvement, and saving energy by cutting waste is less expensive than building new coal plants. It also reduces dependence on foreign energy and comes carbon and pollutant free. "Efficiency really is the sweet spot," says Dan Dudek, a chief economist at Environmental Defense. Beijing agrees: the government aims to reduce energy intensity--the amount of energy used relative to the size of the economy--20% by 2010.

Making ambitious pledges is easy--that is what five-year plans are for--but finding the will and the funds to make them stick is trickier. One source of funding is the Clean Development Mechanism, a part of the Kyoto Protocol that allows developed countries to sponsor greenhouse-cutting projects in developing countries in exchange for carbon credits that can be used for meeting emissions targets. Those projects don't require any technological breakthroughs. A 2003 study by the consulting firm CRA International found that if China and India invested fully in technology already in use in the U.S., the total carbon savings by 2012 would be comparable to what could be achieved if every country under the Kyoto Protocol actually met its targets.

But that window of opportunity is closing rapidly. Every step forward that these countries take today (such as China's move to make its auto-emission regulations stricter than the U.S.'s) risks being swamped by growth tomorrow (for example, China could have 140 million cars on the road by 2020). What China and India really need to ensure green development is what the world needs: a broadly accepted post-Kyoto pact that is strict enough to make it economically worthwhile to eliminate carbon emissions. Though actual cuts are off the table for now, Beijing and New Delhi seem willing to discuss softer targets, such as lowering carbon intensity. But they feel that Washington must take the lead. "It is possible for these countries to achieve the growth they deserve without wrecking the climate," says Diringer. "They just can't do it on their own. It has to go through the U.S."

Maybe we can begin by living a bit more like the average Chinese or Indian--before they start living like us.

On The Ethanol Bandwagon, Big Names And Big Risks (NYT)

By Norm Alster

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

VINOD KHOSLA was a founder of Sun Microsystems and then, as a partner at Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, the Silicon Valley venture capital firm, he helped a host of technology companies get off the ground.

These days, Mr. Khosla, 51, is still investing in technology, but much of it has nothing to do with the world of network computing in which he made his name. He is particularly excited about new ways of producing ethanol — the plant-derived fuel that, he says, could rapidly displace gasoline. "I am convinced we can replace a majority of petroleum used for cars and light trucks with ethanol within 25 years," he said. He has already invested "tens of millions of dollars," he said, in private companies that are developing methods to produce ethanol using plant sources other than corn.

Mr. Khosla isn't the only big-name entrepreneur to embrace ethanol. Sir Richard Branson, chairman of the Virgin Group, plans to invest $300 million to $400 million to produce and market ethanol made from corn and other sources, said Will Whitehorn, a director of the company. Virgin expects to announce soon the site of its first production facility, probably in the eastern United States, with a second one likely to follow in the West, Mr. Whitehorn said.

Bill Gates has also made a move into the ethanol market. Cascade Investment, Mr. Gates's private investment firm, has declared its intention to buy $84 million in newly issued preferred convertible securities in Pacific Ethanol, according to William Langley, its chief financial officer. The company, which is based in Fresno, Calif., and is publicly traded, says it hopes to become the leader in the production and distribution of ethanol in the Western states.

Ethanol derived from corn now accounts for 3 percent of the American automotive fuel market. Most cars in the United States can already handle fuel that is up to 10 percent ethanol, and as many as five million are so-called flex-fuel vehicles that can use a fuel called E85, which is 85 percent ethanol and 15 percent gasoline.

The current excitement over ethanol derives from research that has cut the cost of converting nonfood plant matter like grasses and wood chips into alcohol. Mr. Khosla says he believes that such ethanol, called cellulosic ethanol, will eventually be cheaper to produce than both gasoline and corn-derived ethanol.

Can investors whose pockets are not as deep jump into the ethanol market? Yes, but they are taking a big risk. Picking long-term winners among the companies that make ethanol — or, for that matter, develop other alternative energy technologies — is a very uncertain business. The few public companies that focus on ethanol are typically unprofitable. Pacific Ethanol, for example, has not yet had a profitable quarter and will not until at least the fourth quarter, when its first plant is scheduled to begin production, Mr. Langley said.

Few mutual funds focus on alternative energy companies. "We are not going to start a dedicated alternative energy fund, period," said Wenhua Zhang, a technology analyst at T. Rowe Price. The company is avoiding the sector "for the same reason we didn't start an Internet fund in 2000: a dedicated very narrow sector fund with a single focus typically has a much higher risk."

Some publicly traded companies with operations linked to ethanol include Novozymes and Danisco, both based in Denmark, and Diversa of San Diego; all three have said they have made major gains in reducing the cost of the enzymes needed to produce ethanol from cellulose. Bigger, more diversified companies like Archer Daniels Midland and Monsanto have ethanol operations, too, though ethanol is but one of many businesses for these giants.

Two mutual funds that focus on alternative energy include some ethanol companies among their holdings. The New Alternatives fund holds shares of Abengoa and Acciona Energía, two Spanish companies investing in ethanol production. Another option is the PowerShares WilderHill Clean Energy Portfolio, an exchange-traded fund that tracks a basket of 40 alternative energy companies. Robert Wilder, who created the index on which the fund is based, said that it currently includes just two companies with significant ethanol interests: Pacific Ethanol and MGP Ingredients, an ethanol producer in Atchison, Kan.

Mr. Wilder said he expects to add other companies involved with ethanol. "It's very elegant," he said. "We can take an agricultural waste product we currently pay to get rid of and convert it into fuel."

But many ethanol companies are privately held, making them inaccessible to most investors. And there is certainly room for skepticism about ethanol's future. After all, corn ethanol has been around for years, and even with a current spike in demand , the industry commands only a 3 percent share of the market. Mr. Khosla counters that soaring energy prices have made corn-based ethanol more competitive, while research advances in breaking down cellulose into simple sugars have cut the cost of making ethanol from other sources.

"Ethanol is cheaper to produce, unsubsidized, than gasoline today," he said. "As these technologies ramp up, they will be cheaper — unsubsidized — than gasoline even if petroleum drops to $35 a barrel."

Brazil has proved that ethanol can be made competitively from sugar, said Daniel M. Kammen, a professor in the energy and resources group at the University of California, Berkeley. He estimates the cost of producing ethanol from sugar — including raw materials and processing — at $6 to $7 per gigajoule (a unit of energy) versus $14 a gigajoule for gasoline. In Brazil, roughly 70 percent of new vehicles are equipped to handle ethanol, and the country has been able to curb its dependence on foreign oil and turn ethanol into a growing export industry.

But cellulosic ethanol, the kind produced from nonfood plant matter, has some advantages over food-based ethanol. Because cellulosic ethanol is derived from plant waste, wood chips or wild grasses like miscanthus and switchgrass, it would not require costly cultivation; that would mean savings on labor, pesticides, fertilizers and irrigation.

And it is superior to corn-derived ethanol in reducing greenhouse gas emissions, Professor Kammen said. He expects cellulosic ethanol to catch on quickly. "I think you can really see ethanol comprising 25 to 30 percent of gasoline consumption within 10 years," he said.

FOR that to happen, automakers would need to build more flex-fuel cars. The cost of adding this capability to new cars has been estimated at roughly $100 a vehicle. And ethanol would need to be much more readily available at gas stations. Mr. Khosla has been lobbying in Washington for government help in both areas.

Smaller investors may be advised to just sit back and study developing opportunities. "This is an area where investors have to be patient and build up slowly," Mr. Khosla said.

But he said the potential payoff justifies his own aggressive bets. And ethanol's success, he said, would mean that more energy spending would flow to rural America. "You get a fuel that's cheaper and greener than gasoline," he said. "It gives us energy security."

The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston.

11 News talked with Houston's police chief about the gang crackdown and how officers are using the information.

In New Orleans, police say some gang members that evacuated their city are now beginning to come back.

"I think what we have seen is a few bad guys have reoccupied the city," said New Orleans police chief Warren Riley.

Apparently they are coming back to redefine their territories.

"The people we suspect of this are some folks that were in Houston a while back. I think Houston's obviously on them," said Riley.

After a slow start. Houston, specifically HPD, is onto them because vital communication between the two cities is finally taking place.

FBI director Robert Mueller says the federal agency played a big role in making that happen.

"We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both Harold and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now," said Mueller.

It's been well documented that after the storm, homicides here shot up more than 25 percent.

Chief Harold Hurtt said his department is getting a handle on it by targeting the hot spots and getting much-needed information on the criminals that came here from our neighboring state.

"I think we are doing a good job of sharing intelligence now because they are getting access to databases in Louisiana which we didn't have in the beginning. And we have identified a lot of people as you know, locally here in the media. We have done some roundups of some individuals from New Orleans that was involved in gang activity, as well as drugs, and we are going to stay on top of that," said Hurtt.

In New Orleans the chief says they're trying to stay on top of it too.

"Advise citizens that we're on it, let the gang members know that we're on it and to do all we can to discourage them from re-occupying or coming back to the city," said Riley.

In other words, both cities are cracking down on gangs and no one wants them to call their city home.

At a fund-raiser for the Mademoiselles of Madison High School, washing cars was the easy part.

But the group said they wish keeping buildings graffiti-free in the neighborhood was just as simple.

Houston is no stranger to gangs or how members mark their territory.

But when strange symbols and signs started showing up, Precinct 7 deputies took notice.

“It wasn’t very long after their arrival,” Sgt. Ray Hughes said. “They made themselves very known pretty quickly.”

Sgt. Ray Hughes said the new graffiti is from New Orleans gangs.

Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston, adding to an already crowded canvas.

“It’s very hard. I gotta tell you — we’re swamped,” Sgt. Hughes said. ”We try really hard to keep up with it but we can’t.”

In New Orleans, they aren’t called gangs. They are known as members of rival housing projects. But authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston.

A war that includes graffiti and violent crime.

A battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police.

“For us to be effective, we have to work together,” FBI Director Robert Mueller said. “We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans.”

A crackdown that puts gangs on alert, authorities on patrol and a clear sign that neither side is backing down.

FBI Planning To Return To N.O. By Early June (NOTP)

By Charlie Chapple, St. Tammany Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 25, 2006

Director tours temporary site

The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish.

"We expect to be back sometime in late May or early June," Mueller said after meeting with agents and other law enforcement officials at the FBI's temporary field office and compound at Covington Country Club.

After the FBI's Lakefront headquarters were heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, the agency rented the country club's clubhouse and turned the facility into a fenced and secured compound for agents and staff members.

Mueller, a former U.S. attorney and prosecutor who has led the agency since August 2001, said he has made several trips to the New Orleans area since the hurricane, but Thursday was his first visit to the temporary office.

Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said.

During his two-hour visit to the temporary office, Mueller also met with several state and local law enforcement officers, including State Police Superintendent Henry Whitehorn, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens and representatives from the New Orleans Police Department, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's Office.

Mueller said his visit had a dual purpose. "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here," Mueller said. "Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding."

The FBI head said he also wanted to thank state and local law enforcement officers for continuing the relationship they've built with the agency since Katrina and to "assure them we are ready for the next hurricane down the line."

As he waited to talk with Mueller, Stephens praised the FBI. "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about," he said. "They were there for us when we needed them."

Six men accused of being members of a gang led by Balkan immigrants that seized control of illegal gambling in old-time Mafia strongholds were convicted of racketeering yesterday in federal court.

Prosecutors charged that the organization, which they said was sometimes called the Corporation, had used strong-arm tactics to set up illegal gambling clubs in Astoria and Bayside, Queens, and in the Bronx, pushing aside the Luchese and Gambino crime family.

Gang leaders at one point sought to show their muscle by insisting on being seated at the old table of the late John J. Gotti, the don of the Gambino crime family, at Rao's restaurant in East Harlem, the prosecutors said.

After a three-month trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan, Alex Rudaj, who is from Montenegro and who prosecutors said was the ringleader of the Albanian organized crime group, and five other defendants were found guilty of multiple counts of racketeering, illegal gambling and extortion.

Mr. Rudaj and another defendant, Nardino Colotti, were acquitted of the most serious charge in the trial, the attempted murder of Gaetano Peduto, then an associate of the Bonnano crime family, during a Bronx car chase in 1993.

Mr. Rudaj's lawyer, James Kousouros, said that defeating the attempted murder charge was "huge" for the defense, because that charge carries a mandatory life sentence.

The jury also found the defendants not guilty of another serious charge of violence, a pistol-whipping attack in August 2001 on a gang rival.

But the guilty verdicts showed that the jury was amply persuaded that Mr. Rudaj, 38, and his associates were part of a criminal organization that spread its illegal gambling operation, often with threats of force, from Astoria to Westchester County. The assistant United States attorneys who prosecuted the case, Jennifer G. Rodgers, Timothy Treanor and Benjamin Gruenstein, said that Mr. Rudaj's group collected at least $4 million a year from a network of 50 video gambling machines. The machines are not illegal, prosecutors said, but collecting gambling proceeds from them is.

"They used force and intimidation as their primary business tactic," Ms. Rodgers said in her closing arguments on Dec. 19.

"They took and they tried to take territory by violence, force and threat of violence," she said.

Ms. Rodgers described an instance in which she said Mr. Rudaj had beaten an extortion victim to a "bloody pulp" and then complained that the victim's blood had spattered all over his off-white pants.

DOJ_NMG_0021246

Mr. Kousouros never denied during the trial that Mr. Rudaj had engaged in gambling. "A lot of it," Mr. Kousouros said. But he argued that his client was not part of a violent organized crime group.

The other defendants were Nikola Dedaj, Prenka Ivezaj, Ljusa Nuculovic and Angelo DiPietro.

The jurors found that the gang, which prosecutors said was formed in 1993, engaged in loan sharking, and extorted bars and social clubs to force in their illegal gambling operations. The defendants face seven years to life. Mr. Kousouros said he planned an appeal for Mr. Rudaj on the extortion charges. </NYT_TEXT>

Sewage Tested For Signs Of Cocaine (WP)

By Bill Turque

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

If government studies are a reliable guide, about 25,000 residents of Fairfax County -- 2.5 percent of its population -- have used cocaine in the past year. The same data from the National Survey on Drug Use and Health suggest that about 9,000 have partaken within the past 30 days.

Those estimates, based on personal and computer-assisted interviews, rely almost completely on the candor of the respondents. The Bush administration, hoping to someday broaden the government's knowledge of illegal drug use, is probing the mysteries of Fairfax's sewage for a clearer picture.

Earlier this month, the county agreed to participate in a White House pilot program to analyze wastewater from communities throughout the Potomac River Basin for the urinary byproducts of cocaine.

"It's a very strange request," Board of Supervisors Chairman Gerald E. Connolly (D) said of the White House program. "We're ready to do anything and everything we can do to eliminate illicit drug use. But I'd want to know a lot more about what this will actually lead to."

The White House Office of National Drug Control Policy said it is not seeking to single out specific localities. It also is premature, officials said, to conclude that levels of metabolized cocaine in sewage offer a more accurate index of consumption than traditional survey research.

But David Murray, special assistant to national drug czar John P. Walters, said wastewater testing, which has been tried in Europe, "certainly has that potential."

"We think it will be very, very useful," Murray said.

County workers collected five days' worth of water samples between March 13 and March 17 at the pollution control plant in Lorton, according to a March 20 memo from County Executive Anthony H. Griffin to the Board of Supervisors.

The plant, which processes about 67 million gallons of sewage a day, takes in commercial and residential waste from about half the county, including Fairfax City, Vienna and Fort Belvoir.

The samples, which totaled about 500 milliliters, were shipped to the Armed Forces Institute of Pathology in Rockville, where they will be analyzed for traces of benzoylecgonine, the main urinary metabolite byproduct of cocaine.

Murray said many other utilities in the region were cooperating but declined to name any. A spokeswoman for the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commission, which provides water and sewer service in Montgomery and Prince George's counties, said she did not know whether the agency was participating in the study.

Griffin's memo to the board was not released to the public until the day after the Fairfax sampling was completed. He did not return a call for comment.

Critics of the administration's drug policies said the effort seemed harmless enough but also wondered what it would add up to.

"It can't hurt to check," said Bill Piper, director of national affairs for the Drug Policy Alliance, a nonprofit group committed to ending the federal government's war on drugs. "I'm skeptical that it can be a useful gauge for policy analysis."

The wastewater research had its genesis in Europe. Last year, scientists of the Mario Negri Institute for Pharmacological Research in Milan tested the waters of the Po River in northern Italy, to surprising results. According to the Times of London, they concluded that the Po carried the equivalent of about four kilograms of cocaine and estimated that the 1.4 million young adults living in the Po River Basin were consuming about 40,000 doses a day, more than twice the existing national estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0021247

To confirm the findings, the researchers studied wastewater from smaller cities in other regions of the country, including Sardinia. After allowing for the difference between water from the Po and undiluted sewage, they said that the results were similar.

Bitter Fight Over Sweet Pot Treats (SHNS)

By Henry K. Lee

Scripps Howard News Service, March 25, 2006

They had colorful labels and names such as Trippy, Stoney Rancher, Toka-Cola, Pot Tart and Budtella.

To federal drug agents, they were dangerous marijuana-laced concoctions that could fall into the hands of children. But to sick patients who rely on cannabis to ease their symptoms, they were just tasty ways to get their medicine - and legal under California law.

Federal agents who converged on several of what they called "marijuana candy factories" around Oakland this month seized hundreds of sodas and candies laced with marijuana in what they said was the largest bust of its kind on the West Coast.

Authorities say the drug is illegal no matter what form it takes, especially marijuana candy products that mimic mainstream candies and are attractive to youths.

But angry medical-marijuana patients said investigators are blowing smoke and that the raids are just the latest proof that federal investigators are running roughshod over local and state laws that allow for medicinal cannabis use.

In 1996, California voters approved Proposition 215, which allows the use of marijuana for medical purposes with a doctor's recommendation. Despite the law, authorities - from the California Highway Patrol to the Drug Enforcement Administration - have pounced on local marijuana-growing operations in the Bay Area, including locations in San Francisco and Sonoma County in December.

The candy-factory raids are the latest crackdown.

"I think the government is once again trying to create terror through our community," said Angel Raich, 40, of Oakland, who uses the drug to treat pain, nausea and seizures associated with a brain tumor and a wasting syndrome. "I do know for a fact that medical-cannabis candy and those kinds of products are in the dispensaries, and patients do use them."

Rick Steeb, 55, of San Jose, who uses marijuana to treat the pain from glaucoma, said he's "never seen (the candy) outside the dispensaries. It's not like they were being sold in convenience stores."

But Special Agent Casey McEnry, spokeswoman for the DEA, the agency that conducted the raids, said marijuana "is a violation of federal law in this form and in the smoked form. Even though there may be claims that these weren't meant for kids, the packaging may suggest otherwise."

27,800 Bags Of Heroin; Eight Arrests (NBR)

By Tom Jennemann

North Bergen Reporter, March 26, 2006

Hudson County Prosecutor Edward DeFazio and the Hoboken Police Department have arrested eight Hudson County residents for running a major heroin ring.

According to Prosecutor Edward DeFazio, the arrests were the result of a six-month investigation by the Hudson County Prosecutor's Office Municipal Task Force, Hoboken Police Department, and the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The individuals arrested were allegedly part of a major organization that supplied heroin throughout the Hudson County area. Detectives also seized a number of high-end customized luxury vehicles with secret compartments allegedly used by members of this organization to hide and transport the heroin.

According to DeFazio, detectives executed search warrants at various locations in Hudson County, including 406 3rd St., Union City, and 4525 Kennedy Blvd., North Bergen. Detectives also searched several vehicles.

The searches resulted in the recovery of 22,000 bags of heroin from "a sophisticated hidden compartment" in a Ford Explorer.

DOJ_NMG_0021248

DeFazio added that police also recovered four loaded semi-automatic handguns and 5,000 bags of heroin from a hidden compartment in a Lincoln Navigator. The guns recovered were two Highpoint .9mm handguns, one .45 caliber Ruger, and one .40 caliber Glock, which was reported stolen.

Also, 811 bags of heroin were recovered from the Lumina. A bulletproof vest was found in the Range Rover. DeFazio said police seized a total of more than 27,800 bags of heroin with a street value of over $250,000.

Detectives believe the organization was trafficking 15,000 to 20,000 bags of heroin per week.

DeFazio said that those arrested "represented high- and mid-level distributors, suppliers and supervisory level participants. As such, they face potential state prison sentences ranging from a minimum of five years to a maximum of life imprisonment in the case of those charged with leader crimes."

DeFazio said that the U.S. Attorney's office of New York will prosecute the case because they believe it might lead to a large source of heroin in New York City. He also said that he expects more arrests in this case and that several of those arrests will be local.

Arrested individuals

The following is a list of individuals who were arrested and their respective charges and bails: · Jose "Nutty" Gonzalez, 24, of Union City. He was charged as leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (2 counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million. · Rory Praylow, 27, of Hoboken. He was charged as leader of a of Narcotics Trafficking Network; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

· Manuel "Murder" Suarez, 30, of Jersey City. He was charged as a "Leader of Narcotics Trafficking Network"; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin (two counts); Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property (two counts); Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; Certain Person not to have a Weapon; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million.

· Philip Anthony "Spud" Pasquale, 21, of Hoboken. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 500 feet of a public park; and Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. His bail was set at $500,000.

· Jason "Jay" Santos, 24, of Jersey City. He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $1 million. · Alexander Gonzalez, 20, of Jersey City, He was charged with Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin; Possession with Intent to Distribute Heroin while within 1,000 feet of school property; Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more; Unlawful Possession of a Handgun; and Possession of a Firearm during a CDS Offense. His bail was set at $100,000.

· Mary J. Gama, 26, of Union City was charged with Conspiracy to Distribute Heroin in an aggregate quantity of five ounces or more. Her bail was set at $100,000.

· Darryl L. Oliver, 34, of Hoboken was charged with Possession of Marijuana. His bail was set at $5,000.

Strafford Man Charged With Trying To Arrange Murder (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. --A Strafford man is facing up to life in prison if convicted of charges he tried to hire a man to kill a witness against him in a drug case.

Richard E. Moses Jr., 38, appeared in federal court Friday a day after he allegedly met with an undercover officer from the Drug Enforcement Administration who had told Moses he could arrange the killing of the witness.

Moses was arrested in Brattleboro after providing the agent with $3,500 and a photograph of the intended victim, prosecutors said.

Moses was charged in December with cocaine trafficking. He was released on a variety of conditions.

Court records say Moses began plotting to murder the witness, whose identity has not been revealed, since shortly after his release.

Federal agents recorded several phone conversations in January, February and March in which Moses allegedly tried to arrange the murder.

Strafford Man Nabbed In Murder-for-hire Plot (RHE)

Rutland (VT) Herald, March 25, 2006

A Strafford man was arrested Thursday in an alleged murder-for-hire plot after allegedly providing an undercover federal agent in Brattleboro with $3,500 and a photograph of his intended victim.

Richard E. Moses Jr., 38, made an initial appearance Friday in U.S. District Court in Burlington to face federal charges of using interstate facilities with the intent that a murder be committed in exchange for payment, and attempting to procure the killing of a person with the intent to prevent that person's testimony.

Moses was denied bail and ordered jailed pending a bail hearing next week. If convicted of the charges, Moses faces up to life in prison.

Moses was indicted in December 2005 by a federal grand jury in Vermont on charges of conspiracy to distribute more than 5 kilograms of cocaine and possessing a semi-automatic handgun during drug trafficking.

Moses was arraigned on those charges on Dec. 8, 2005, and released on conditions.

According to court records filed Friday in federal court, Moses has been plotting to murder a witness in the case since his release.

According to an affidavit, after Moses expressed an interest in having the witness killed, a federal Drug Enforcement Administration undercover agent from another state contacted him to determine how serious he was.

In several recorded phone conversations in January, February and March, Moses allegedly negotiated the murder of the witness with the agent, who posed as someone who could arrange a murder.

Moses agreed to pay $7,000, half before and half after the witness was killed, and provided detailed information about the victim, including his street address and birth date, court records stated.

Moses was arrested Thursday after meeting with the agent in the Price Chopper parking lot on Canal Street in Brattleboro and paying him the $3,500 and identifying a photograph of the intended victim, according to court records.

Feds Limit Sales Of Louisville Chemical Company (AP)

AP, March 27, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky. -- As part of a plea agreement with federal prosecutors over a violation of the Clean Water Act, the owner of a chemical company in Louisville has agreed not to sell chemicals used to make methamphetamine and to report suspicious purchases.

The company _ Antec Inc. _ also would be subject under the plea agreement to inspections by the Drug Enforcement Administration and it would be required to keep detailed records of all poison sales, including how the buyer intends to use it.

The company's president, William Oesterritter Sr., signed the agreement with federal prosecutors this month, admitting that Antec committed a misdemeanor violation of the Clean Water Act in 2002. The plea must still be approved by a judge.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Ream said the agreement is unusual, but that the DEA wanted restrictions on the company's sale of meth ingredients.

Chemicals sold by Antec, such as red phosphorous and iodine crystals, have been found frequently during meth lab raids, said Tony King, head of the DEA's Louisville office.

Oesterritter Sr., 63, is the company's semiretired majority owner, and his son, William Oesterritter Jr., 31, is a vice president who oversees its operation.

Each said in interviews that they did not know the company's chemicals were being bought for illegal purposes.

"If somebody walks in and buys a legal product and goes and uses it for illegal purposes, I can't do anything about that," Oesterritter Jr. said.

His father was convicted 20 years ago on a federal drug-conspiracy charge related to chemical sales by another company he was involved with.

"If it wasn't illegal for us to buy it, we figured it wasn't illegal for us to sell it," Oesterritter Sr. said.

He said Antec is a small company with about $300,000 a year in sales and five employees. Although the company ships worldwide and sells large volumes of chemicals, he said its niche market is among school labs.

"We're just happy to make a living," he said.

Oesterritter Jr. said the company hasn't sold red phosphorous or other ingredients banned under the plea agreement since the government began requiring a license for such sales.

The provision about poison sales was added because of allegations made in a Maryland lawsuit, Ream said. The suit stems from the 2003 poisoning death of Benjamin Vassiliev. The killer, Ryan Furlough, then 17, purchased potassium cyanide over the Internet from Antec. Furlough was convicted in 2004 and sentenced to life in prison.

Benjamin's parents, Walter Vassiliev and Karen Dale Barrett, are seeking $2 million from Antec in the lawsuit. They allege that the company was irresponsible in selling the drug to Furlough and failed to keep records of the sale, as required by Kentucky law. The lawsuit also names as defendants Furlough's mother and a psychiatrist who had treated him for depression.

Chemical Company Investigated (LCJ)

Louisville (KY) Courier-Journal, March 27, 2006

DEA gets limits put on its sales

A small chemical and lab-supply company tucked away on a dead-end street south of downtown Louisville boasts on its Web site that it sells chemicals "in any amount, in any grade, from a gram to a barge load," to industries, schools and individuals.

That willingness to sell has left the company, Antec Inc., with a brew of legal troubles:

The federal Drug Enforcement Administration has investigated Antec because its chemicals have been found during raids of methamphetamine labs.

The company is the target of a civil lawsuit over its online sale of poison to a Maryland teenager who used it to kill a classmate in 2003.

Environmental officials have alleged that Antec violated state regulations and the federal Clean Water Act.

The company's president, William Oesterritter Sr., signed a plea agreement with federal prosecutors this month, admitting that Antec committed a misdemeanor violation of the Clean Water Act in 2002.

Under the agreement, the company will pay a $30,000 fine to settle state environmental violations, and it will face an additional $100,000 fine if it doesn't meet other terms of the agreement -- most of which have little to do with Antec's environmental record.

For example, the agreement prohibits Antec from selling key chemicals used to make meth. It also requires the company to report to the DEA all suspicious chemical orders, such as sales to nonbusiness addresses and customers who pay in cash. Antec will also be subject to inspections by the DEA.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Ream acknowledged that the agreement, which must be approved by a federal judge, is unusual, but he said the DEA wanted restrictions on the company's sale of meth ingredients.

For at least 15 years, chemicals sold by Antec, especially red phosphorous and iodine crystals, have been found frequently during raids of meth labs around the country, said Tony King, head of the DEA's Louisville office.

Antec, which the DEA has investigated off and on since the early 1990s, sold the chemicals online and to walk-in customers, King said.

He added that meth makers drove from as far away as Missouri to the office and concrete warehouse at 721 Bergman St. in Shelby Park where the company has operated since it was founded 35 years ago.

Oesterritter Sr., 63, is the company's semiretired majority owner, and his son, William Oesterritter Jr., 31, is a vice president who oversees its operation. Each said in interviews that they did not know the company's chemicals were being bought for illegal purposes.

"If somebody walks in and buys a legal product and goes and uses it for illegal purposes, I can't do anything about that," Oesterritter Jr. said.

His father was convicted 20 years ago on a federal drug-conspiracy charge related to chemical sales by another company he was involved with. "If it wasn't illegal for us to buy it, we figured it wasn't illegal for us to sell it," Oesterritter Sr. said.

He said Antec is a small company with about $300,000 a year in sales and five employees.

Although the company ships worldwide and sells large volumes of chemicals to companies including UPS, he said its niche market is among schools labs and students doing projects.

"We're just happy to make a living," he said. "That's all we want to do."

Oesterritter Jr. said the company hasn't sold red phosphorous or other ingredients banned under the plea agreement for several years, since the government began requiring a license for such sales.

King said Antec is prohibited from holding a license to sell regulated substances because of Oesterritter Sr.'s federal drug-related felony conviction.

But King also said that iodine crystals sold by Antec were found in late 2004 in a meth lab in Fairdale. "A lot of cooks gave us statements" that they bought their chemicals at Antec, he said, adding that agents found printed directions to Antec at some meth labs. Online chemical sales

As part of its plea agreement, Antec also will be required to keep detailed records of all poison sales, including how the buyer intends to use it.

Ream said he included that provision because of allegations made in the Maryland lawsuit, which stems from the 2003 poisoning death of Benjamin Vassiliev in a Baltimore suburb.

The killer, Ryan Furlough, then 17, purchased the poison -- potassium cyanide -- over the Internet from Antec. Furlough was convicted in 2004 and sentenced to life in prison.

Benjamin's parents, Walter Vassiliev and Karen Dale Barrett, are seeking $2 million from Antec in the lawsuit, which they filed in December.

They allege that the company was irresponsible in selling the drug to Furlough and failed to keep records of the sale, as required by Kentucky law.

The lawsuit also names as defendants Furlough's mother and a psychiatrist who had treated him for depression.

In an interview, Vassiliev said he believes states should ban the sale of poisons to minors.

Kentucky law prohibits poisons from being sold to children under age 15 without the consent of a parent or guardian. It also requires that sellers keep a detailed log of sales from the previous two years, including the reason for the purchase, said Scott Porter, an assistant Kentucky attorney general.

"They can't deliver it without satisfying themselves it would be used for a legitimate purpose," Porter said.

But violations of the law are misdemeanors, carrying a fine of up to $100, he said, and charges can be brought only within a year of an offense.

Oesterritter Jr. said he didn't know how old Furlough was when he sold him cyanide poisoning and copper nitrate, but he assumed Furlough was going to use the chemicals in electroplating.

He said he made a note of the sale but did not keep a formal record. He added that there are many legitimate uses for potassium cyanide and that it's often purchased by jewelers.

He said he's in the process of hiring a lawyer to represent the company in the lawsuit. The Clean Water Act charges were brought against Antec in 2002, after a former employee, Joel Rector, was arrested away from the company's offices for selling red phosphorous to an uncover agent.

DOJ_NMG_0021252

Rector pleaded guilty in 2004 to three charges relating to the sale and distribution of chemicals for meth-making purposes and received three years of probation. Antec's facilities searched

After the arrest, the DEA searched Antec's facilities and called in federal and state environmental agencies. King said they were summoned because he had previously seen leaking drums and waste at Antec.

In addition to the federal violation, the state cited Antec for improper storage of hazardous waste and a lack of permits, according to Chuck Wolfe, a spokesman for the Kentucky Cabinet for Environmental and Public Protection.

The company's site "never posed an environmental emergency," Wolfe said, and now meets state requirements.

Oesterritter Jr. said Antec had spent up to $50,000 to clean up its site in the past two years.

EPA officials declined to comment on details of the agency's charge, pending a judge's approval of Antec's guilty plea. A hearing is scheduled on Wednesday.

Cocaine Dealer Gets Life (CHASPC)

Charleston Post Courier, March 27, 2006

A federal judge sentenced a North Charleston man to life in prison without parole Wednesday for his role in a major drug-dealing operation responsible for bringing 33 pounds of cocaine worth at least $375,000 into the area.

Damon Brightman, 28, was a leader of a gang that distributed crack and powder cocaine to dealers in the Murray Hill community and along Bennett Yard Road in North Charleston. Some deals were arranged at a small barbershop Brightman owned on Bonds Avenue, authorities said.

He and Donald Vanderhorst, 34, were convicted in May of conspiring to distribute the drugs. Vanderhorst was sentenced last week to 20 years in prison and 10 years' supervised release. U.S. District Judge Sol Blatt Jr. imposed both sentences.

Both men have prior records for drug distribution, a factor considered in their sentencing, Assistant U.S. Attorney Charlie Bourne said.

Evidence introduced at their seven-day trial indicated that Brightman and Vanderhorst were responsible for dealing more than 15 kilograms, or 33 pounds, of cocaine in the North Charleston area, Bourne said.

The wholesale value of the cocaine was about $25,000 per kilo, said William Driggers, a Summerville police officer assigned to the Drug Enforcement Administration task force in Charleston. Once the cocaine was broken down for sale on the street, the value could double or triple, he said.

Prosecutors introduced evidence from a court-ordered federal wiretap that established drug deals involving the men, authorities said.

Brightman tried to persuade the jury that the recordings were more harmless than investigators claimed. He argued that the ounces he was referring to on the tapes had to do with seasonings for a crab boil recipe, not crack, Driggers said.

"The jury rejected that argument," Bourne said.

The men were part of a tight-knit group of friends who grew up in the area, went to school together and played sports together before moving into the world of drugs. Thirteen other members of the group were convicted earlier. They moved cocaine into North Charleston from the late 1990s until 2002.

Anger After Man Uses Son's Plight To Flee (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

LOUISVILLE, Ky., March 25 (AP) — The case of an inmate who was temporarily released in late January to be tested as a potential kidney donor for his teenage son and is now accused of fleeing with his girlfriend to Mexico instead has prompted outrage on both sides of the border.

The inmate, Byron Perkins, 37, was released on a $10,000 bond from jail, where he had been awaiting sentencing for marijuana distribution and unlawful transport of firearms. He never showed up for medical tests. His son, 16-year-old Destin Perkins, requires dialysis twice a week.

The case has drawn national news attention, and the Fox program "America's Most Wanted" has featured the case.

"It's just amazing how much interest we've had in the story, and of course it's because of the little boy," said Rich Knighten, chief deputy United States marshal for Kentucky's western district.

Fugitives outside the United States are normally harder to catch, but Mr. Knighten said the case had generated interest in Mexico. "They're as much bothered by this character as we are," he said.

The couple was last seen near Puerto Vallarta, Mexico.

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Pushes Immigration Agenda As Issue Heats Up (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And David Jackson

USA Today, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — President Bush planned to make an appeal today for controversial changes in immigration law at a swearing-in ceremony for new citizens. His speech will come after a weekend of protests that drew hundreds of thousands of immigrants and advocates.

The Senate is set to begin debate Tuesday on the first comprehensive rewrite of U.S. immigration laws in a decade.

"We're facing a difficult situation, because we have approximately 11 million undocumented aliens here and we've got to find some way to deal with them," Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., said Sunday on ABC's This Week.

Tackling that problem has been one of Bush's priorities since his first term, but it poses a political challenge or him: He must balance the demands of conservative Republicans who want a crackdown on illegal immigration, business leaders who say the nation needs more immigrant workers and Republican Party operatives, such as national Chairman Ken Mehlman, who have been wooing the Hispanic vote.

The president expressed concern last week about the political fallout. "This could be a fractious debate."

The weekend's protests focused on a bill the House of Representatives approved in December. It would make illegal immigration a felony, toughen penalties on those who employ or assist illegal immigrants and extend a fence along parts of the U.S.-Mexican border. The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops and some other religious organizations oppose the bill. Among their concerns: the possibility that relief workers could be prosecuted for providing food, shelter or other assistance to illegal immigrants.

It's unclear whether the Senate, where Republicans are split, will take the same approach. Any differences between House and Senate measures would have to be worked out in a conference.

More than 500,000 people turned out Saturday in Los Angeles to protest the House bill, police said. Similar protests drew an estimated 50,000 in Denver, 20,000 in Phoenix and 4,000 in Charlotte on Saturday and nearly 3,000 in Columbus, Ohio, on Sunday.

"Enough is enough of the xenophobic movement," said Los Angeles marcher Norman Martinez, 63, who immigrated from Honduras as a child. He said immigrants "built this country."

Bush, who pushed for changes in immigration law in his weekend radio address, is at odds with some in his party, including House Judiciary Chairman F. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., who wrote the House bill.

Bush says he supports the hiring of more border agents and the use of technology, such as infrared cameras and unmanned aerial vehicles, to catch people sneaking into the country. He also wants an expanded guest-worker program to fill jobs Americans won't take and favors allowing immigrants who are now here illegally to apply for the program.

Rep. Tom Tancredo, a Colorado Republican who also appeared on ABC's This Week, argued that the president's plan would send "a horrible message" by rewarding lawbreakers.

Many senators support the guest-worker approach. Specter, Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., all included versions of it in immigration bills they're offering.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., a possible presidential candidate, introduced a bill that focuses on enforcement and does not include a guest-worker program.

Panel Still Split On Guest Workers (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

The Senate Judiciary Committee takes up the contentious issue of immigration reform today no closer to an agreement on a guest-worker program.

The debate begins in an uncertain election year and in the wake of protests Saturday in Los Angeles, where marchers numbered in the hundreds of thousands. Senate offices say they are handling as many constituent calls as they have for just about any issue -- whether they represent states along the border or deep within the nation.

The bill to be considered by the full Senate today will be the one introduced last week by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who has long set today as the deadline for taking up the issue. His legislation deals only with securing the border and raising the penalties for being in the U.S. illegally.

Mr. Frist has said, however, that he will include a guest-worker program in his bill if a majority of the 10 Republicans on the committee agree on one. Private negotiations among members and their staffs continued through last week's recess, but staffers say no consensus has been reached, suggesting that a compromise is highly unlikely.

Committee Chairman Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, said yesterday that he is confident that his committee will produce a bill today. Two weeks ago, he said he hoped some agreement could be reached on a guest-worker program proposed by Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, which would allow illegals to apply for citizenship after paying fines and undergoing various background checks.

Provisions of that bill dealing with future immigrants is likely to be approved in the committee today, but the thornier provisions dealing with the almost 11 million illegals already here is far less likely.

Most Republicans on the committee have said they are opposed to the McCain-Kennedy bill, saying that it is an amnesty under another name.

Sen. John Cornyn, the Texas Republican who favors a guest-worker program, said Friday that he would vote against any proposal, such as McCain-Kennedy, that doesn't make illegal aliens return home before applying for U.S. citizenship.

"I will vote against any immigration reform proposal that contains the guest-worker provisions in the McCain-Kennedy bill," he said. "In my view, their proposal rewards illegal immigrants and will be considered an amnesty by Americans. It will encourage further disrespect for our laws and will undercut our efforts to shore up homeland security."

Mr. Kennedy said yesterday that his program is not amnesty.

"They pay a penalty," he said on CBS' "Face the Nation." "They have to pay their taxes. They have to demonstrate they're working. They have to learn English. And they go to the end of the line."

Although Mr. Kennedy did not answer a question about whether he would support a filibuster of an immigration bill that didn't include a guest-worker program, he said that "it's better that we not pass a bad bill just to pass a bill."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said last week that he would urge a filibuster of any immigration bill -- such as the one Mr. Frist will take up today -- that bypasses the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Even if the Senate finally does agree on some sort of guest-worker bill, final legislation will have to be worked out with House Republicans who are emphatically opposed to any guest-worker program until the issue of border security is resolved.

"It is an amnesty," Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican, said yesterday on ABC's "This Week." "The crime they have committed is coming into this country without our permission. The penalty that is supposed to be applied to that, under the law that we have today, is deportation. ... And what it does is send a horrible message."

Senate Joining The Fray Over Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — After massive nationwide street protests this weekend, the Senate is set to begin debate, for the first time in a decade, on the emotionally charged subject of immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0021255

The Senate's deliberations, scheduled to start Tuesday and extend over the next two weeks, could reshape a national immigration system that is widely perceived as failing the foreigners who want to enter the United States, citizens who expect it to prevent illegal border crossings and employers who look to it for workers to fill jobs that many Americans refuse to do.

The senators will determine whether flaws in that system should be addressed solely with tough new criminal laws and stringent enforcement measures — such as those found in a bill, passed by the House late last year, that triggered demonstrations Saturday from Chicago to Los Angeles.

Or they may choose to include programs that give employers access to a future flow of workers, as President Bush has urged, and allow illegal immigrants to gain legal status.

Their choices will provide a barometer of Bush's waning influence over a Republican Party increasingly on edge about midterm elections. Their debate is likely to not only color the meeting between Bush and Mexican President Vicente Fox, in Cancun, Mexico, later this week, but also to lay bare the fractures that the issue creates within the GOP on social, economic and security grounds.

The issue pits two of the party's core constituencies against each other, with social conservatives insisting on tough enforcement and the need to protect American culture and the business lobby calling for a reliable source of labor.

Even as immigration has divided the GOP, it has also allowed several of the party's 2008 presidential hopefuls to position themselves for campaigning in the months to come.

Whatever legislation emerges from the Senate would have to be reconciled with the House bill before it could reach the president's desk to become law, but the divisions are so deep that many wonder whether immigration reform will get that far.

"The challenge isn't so much what happens in the Senate, it's in that conference committee with the House," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), co-sponsor of a leading bill with Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), said in an interview Sunday.

"The risk that's out there is that the Senate's version is so vastly different than what the House will accept, or they feel we're not serious about security issues, that it won't get to the president's desk," Cornyn said.

"Or, in what would be a worst case for employers, we have enhanced border security and employer verification, but no way for them to get workers."

The Judiciary Committee, which oversees immigration matters, is working under a March 27 deadline imposed by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Though it looked close to a compromise 10 days ago, the committee goes into its final meeting today struggling to bridge a core breach over whether illegal immigrants should be able to earn citizenship.

"I think we're going to run out of time," said Cornyn, who sits on the committee.

The committee's chairman, Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), predicted Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that the committee would complete its task. "We're going to get the bill out tomorrow," he said. "We may have to work very, very late into the night, but we will."

Specter backs comprehensive legislation that includes enforcement measures, a guest-worker plan and a provision allowing the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already here to remain legally.

But if no consensus is reached on the Judiciary Committee proposal, the Senate will instead debate an enforcement-only bill introduced by Frist.

Senators who back a guest-worker plan or legal status for illegal immigrants will have to bring those measures to the Senate floor as amendments to Frist's bill, a process that will be considerably more chaotic and argumentative than committee debate.

Frist, who is seen as a likely White House contender in 2008, assembled a get-tough bill that includes both a border fence and provisions that make being in the United States illegally — or knowingly providing services or assistance to undocumented immigrants — a felony.

But it ignores Bush's call for a guest-worker program. As a result, Frist would have to contend with a threat from Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to block any legislation that does not include such a plan.

Because many Republicans and Democrats are under pressure from business interests that want access to labor, particularly in the agriculture, service and construction industries, it might be hard for Frist to garner the 60 votes he would need to prevent a filibuster of his bill.

DOJ_NMG_0021256

Perhaps aware of that, he said earlier this month that he expected a guest-worker program to be part of the Senate's final legislation, but he emphasized that he was against an amnesty provision.

Another senator with presidential ambitions, John McCain (R-Ariz.), co-authored a bill with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that is backed by business, church and immigrant groups and provides guest-workers and illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

That issue of citizenship will be a lightning rod in Senate debate. Cornyn and Kyl are among those who balk at any proposal for amnesty. Their bill includes a guest-worker program without a path to legalization and requires those here illegally to leave the U.S. within five years. Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho) has introduced a bill that would make it easier to agricultural workers to stay in the country.

Bush, who has shifted his rhetoric to embrace the concerns of law-and-order Republicans, ruled out citizenship for guest workers in his Saturday radio address, saying that "amnesty would be unfair" and "would encourage waves of illegal immigration."

He will speak on immigration again today at a naturalization ceremony for new citizens, as the Judiciary Committee meets in a final attempt to find middle ground and the Senate prepares to begin debate.

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Behind the debate

The House has already passed legislation aimed largely at securing the nation's borders. But in the Senate, many Democrats and some Republicans believe that a border crackdown should be paired with a mechanism that would allow more foreigners to enter the country legally to work.

Schedule

Today the Senate Judiciary Committee is to begin its final day of talks on legislation that it will bring to the full Senate. On Tuesday, the full Senate is expected to begin debate.

Issues

• Guest workers: Some senators, as well as President Bush, say efforts to stop workers from crossing the border illegally will not succeed unless the nation creates a legal way for a workers to enter the country. Opponents say a guest-worker plan would only draw more illegal workers here.

• Amnesty: Some senators are adamantly opposed to any program that would give legal status to workers who are here illegally, calling that a form of amnesty for lawbreakers. Others insist the nation should bring undocumented workers out of the shadows, using the legal status as an incentive.

• Criminalization: Both the Senate Judiciary Committee bill and a measure from Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) would make being an illegal immigrant a criminal offense. Democratic senators have tried unsuccessfully to have that measure removed from the Judiciary Committee bill. If the debate moves to the Senate, it is likely to become emotional.

Players

• President Bush: He has spent years pushing Congress to adopt a guest-worker plan, a top priority for businesses that rely on immigrant labor. At the end of this week he meets with Mexican President Vicente Fox. Immigration is likely to be a tense subject.

• Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.): He is chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, whose immigration bill may form the basis for Senate debate. He backs a guest-worker program and a plan to allow many of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants already in the U.S. to stay, though without gaining citizenship.

• Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.): The Senate majority leader has proposed his legislation that focuses on border security and does not include a guest-worker plan. Frist's measure was seen by some as an effort to distinguish himself from a potential rival for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who backs a guest-worker program.

• Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.): He wrote a bill with McCain including a guest-worker program that leads to legal status, as well as a program offering illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.

• Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas): With Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), he has written legislation that has tough enforcement measures along with a guest-worker program. It requires illegal immigrants to leave the country within five years.

Immigration Debate Heating Up In Senate (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

The AP, March 27, 2006

Founded by immigrants and praised as a haven for the oppressed, the United States now is struggling to decide the fate of as many as 12 million people living in the country illegally.

The Senate takes up the emotional debate on the heels of weekend rallies that drew hundreds of thousands of people protesting attempts to toughen laws against immigrants. Among the ideas that President Bush and members of Congress are considering:

_Erecting a fence on the Mexico border to deter illegal immigration.

_Treating people who sneak across the border as felons to be deported.

_Allowing foreigners to stay in the country legally as custodians, dish washers, construction workers and other low-paid employees.

_Allowing those working in the U.S. a path to citizenship.

_Requiring them to get in line behind everyone else back in their home countries who want to become Americans.

On Monday, the Senate Judiciary Committee takes up the issue and Bush headlines a naturalization ceremony for 30 new citizens at Constitution Hall. Demonstrations are planned near the Capitol, including a prayer service with immigration advocates and clergy who plan to wear handcuffs to demonstrate the criminalization of immigration violations.

Bush is going to Mexico this week for a meeting with the leaders of Mexico and Canada. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday it's important that Mexico "recognize the importance of defense of the borders and of American laws."

Protests raged across the country over the weekend, led by more than 500,000 people who marched through downtown Los Angeles on Saturday in one of the largest demonstrations for any cause in recent U.S. history. Marchers also took to the streets in Phoenix, Milwaukee, Dallas and Columbus, Ohio.

The president, working hand-in-hand with the business community that relies on cheap labor, is pressuring Congress to allow immigrants to stay in the country legally if they take a job that Americans are unwilling to do.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., also supports the idea and has vowed that his committee will advance a bill to the full Senate on Monday, even if they have to work "very, very late into the night."

"If they're prepared to work to become American citizens in the long line traditionally of immigrants who have helped make this country, we can have both a nation of laws and a welcoming nation of workers who do some very, very important jobs for our economy," Specter said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has said that whether or not a bill gets out of the Judiciary Committee, he is opening two weeks of debate on the issue Tuesday. He has offered a plan that would tighten borders, add Border Patrol agents and punish employers who hire illegal immigrants because he says the most important concern is improving national security in an age of terrorism. His bill sidesteps the question of temporary work permits, but he has said he's open to the idea.

Democrats have said they will do everything they can to block Frist's bill. Sen. Edward Kennedy (news, bio, voting record), D-Mass., said Sunday that legislation creating tougher enforcement does not do enough.

"We have spent $20 billion on chains and fences and border guards and dogs in the southern border over the last 10 years," Kennedy said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. "And it doesn't work. What we need is a comprehensive approach. I think President Bush understands it."

Where Kennedy and Bush differ is on the question of what to do with foreigners who are already living and working in the United States. Kennedy and Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., have a bill that would allow those immigrants to apply for citizenship once they pay taxes and a fine and learn English.

Critics like Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., say that would give amnesty to people who have broken the law by entering the country without permission.

"It's a slap in the face to every single person who has done it the right way, and to everybody who's waiting out there to do it the right way," Tancredo said. "It's bad policy. And it's also, I think, for the Republican Party especially, bad policy."

Bush wants to give foreign workers a guest permit to stay for a specific amount of time to do a job, without a path to citizenship. Sens. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Jon Kyl, R-Ariz., propose to let employed illegal immigrants stay for five years but then leave, pay fines and apply to re-enter the country.

If the Senate can agree on the bill, the work won't be over to get legislation to Bush's desk to become a law. The House passed a bill last year that increases penalties for illegal immigration activities, requires employers to verify the legal status of their employees and provides $2.2 billion for a 700-mile fence across the border. But it did not address the guest worker issue.

Help Wanted As Immigration Faces Overhaul (WP)

By S. Mitra Kalita And Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

Year after year, Professional Grounds Inc. runs a help-wanted ad to find landscapers and groundskeepers. Starting wage: $7.74 per hour.

In a good year, three people call. Most years, no one does.

So the Springfield company relies on imported labor -- seasonal guest workers allowed to immigrate under the federal guest-worker program -- to keep itself running. For 10 months this year, 23 men from Mexico and Central America will spend their days mulching and mowing, seeding and sodding for Professional Grounds.

Occasionally, company President Bill Trimmer asks himself: If I doubled wages, would native-born Americans apply? He thinks he knows the answer.

"I don't think it's a wage situation. It's the type of work and the nature of the work. It's hard, backbreaking work," said Trimmer, who started the company 31 years ago. "I think we're a more affluent society now. They expect more. Everybody expects more. . . . I have contracts, and they want an affordable price, too."

Here lies the dilemma facing Congress as it attempts an immigration overhaul. Businesses say it is hard to persuade Americans to perform the unskilled jobs that immigrants easily fill. Significantly higher wages might work, but that increase would be passed on to unhappy consumers, forcing Americans to give up under-$10 manicures and $15-per-hour paint and lawn jobs.

Yet against a backdrop of heightened scrutiny of those who cross U.S. borders and the estimated 12 million migrants already here illegally, most everyone agrees that the current immigration system warrants a severe makeover.

A recent study by the Pew Hispanic Center estimated that unauthorized immigrants make up nearly 5 percent of the labor force. In the Washington region, they make up nearly 10 percent of the 3.1 million-strong workforce, providing mainly unskilled labor.

The federal government has a work visa -- known as H-2B -- that aims to help unskilled migrants enter the country legally. But the government issues only about 66,000 new H-2B visas each year. The guest workers, who generally take jobs in businesses such as restaurants, amusement parks, cleaning companies and landscaping firms, are allowed to stay for 10 months.

The immigration measure passed by the House last year would allow the guest-worker program to lapse. Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee resumes debating legislation proposed by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.). It would create a new guest-worker program that would allow foreigners to enter the United States for three years, with the possibility of renewal for another three years.

Both House and Senate plans place on employers the onus for verifying the legal status of workers with the creation of a national database of Social Security or work identification numbers. Besides requiring enforcement, the proposals would impose criminal penalties on employers who hire someone not authorized to work in the United States.

Under current law, companies must review two forms of government-issued identification to verify that a job applicant is a legal resident. Beyond keeping copies of IDs on file, many businesses say they do little more than take workers at their word. While some readily dismiss illegal workers, they don't necessarily report them and their whereabouts to the federal government.

Businesses say they already patrol job applications to sift out counterfeit documents. At least four out of 10 applicants for jobs at Harry's Essential Grille in Vienna present work documents that look like frauds, such as Social Security cards that feel too thin, said Jason Steward, manager of the restaurant.

"You have a gut feeling," Steward said. The company he works for, Essential Restaurant Holdings LLC, has hired 200 people since opening its two Northern Virginia restaurants 2 1/2 years ago. About half of its workers are immigrants. He does not object to checking a Social Security number in a national database. But he worries about being the first line of defense for the company. If he messes up, Essential Restaurants could be fined or face criminal penalties under some of the proposals before Congress.

Brett McMahon, vice president of Bethesda-based Miller & Long Concrete Construction Co., one of the biggest concrete contractors in the country, with $300 million in annual revenue, said his concern is that the legislation would essentially turn his company into "an enforcer of who's legal and who's not." McMahon said, "It's nowhere near that simple to check."

In the past 15 years, the Labor Department has audited McMahon's company five times looking for illegal workers -- each time finding none, McMahon said. He added that the House bill threatens to bring his business to a "screeching halt" because there is no provision for a guest-worker program or for dealing with the undocumented immigrants already working.

But advocates of tighter borders say hiring foreigners should be difficult, not just for security but to limit competition between less-skilled immigrants and Americans.

"Employers in many of these sectors have gotten themselves into a Catch-22 situation where if they do not look the other way and hire illegal workers, they will not be competitive with other businesses," said Jack Martin, a spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, an advocacy group governed by business leaders and activists favoring national immigration limits.

"The wages and working conditions where there are large numbers of illegal workers have been driven down to the point where those jobs are not as attractive to American workers," Martin said.

According to the Pew Hispanic Center data, undocumented workers tend to be clustered in service and construction jobs and make up more than half of the region's janitorial and landscape workers. Forty-three percent of the region's construction workers are illegally in the United States or have only temporary work authorization, the data show.

Wages for landscaping and groundskeeping workers in the Washington area have risen slightly in recent years, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, from an average of $9.61 per hour in 1999 to $10.51 in 2004. Professional Grounds' Trimmer said most employees, including guest workers, earn $9 to $11 per hour.

Construction wages in the Washington area have risen from an average of $15.86 in 1999 to $17.19 in 2004, according to the bureau. McMahon estimated that construction wages these days are even higher -- roughly $20 an hour, plus health care.

"People think construction is about hiring day laborers in a Lowe's parking lot and throwing them in a pickup and paying them $2 an hour," McMahon said.

The company has roughly 60 projects underway, including offices, hotels and condominiums, and employs about 2,800 workers in the Washington area -- three-fourths of them immigrants.

"Every time I put up a crane, they are the guys who show up," McMahon said.

At Professional Grounds' Springfield office, Trimmer said the guest-worker program insulates him from having to deal with forged documents. Trimmer started using the H-2B program about five years ago to fill the void left by high school and college students who preferred air-conditioned summer internships over the work he could offer.

The guest workers arrive in February or March and pay $40 a week for housing subsidized by the company. A van picks up and drops off those who can't drive; workers who have driver's licenses pay $3 per day for the use of a company car. Workers pay income, Social Security and Medicare taxes.

One of his workers, Abelardo Flores, said he likes returning to his wife and three children in Mexico after making money for 10 months. Two other workers, Luciano Arango and Marcos Ochoa, said they would like to permanently live in the United States someday. All said they had worked for the company last year. Trimmer cited investments he makes in the guest workers, from English classes to housing, as proof that he views them as more than cheap labor.

Once, Trimmer confessed, he did hire an illegal worker: a Nicaraguan man named Victor Parrales on a tourist visa.

DOJ_NMG_0021260

Next week will mark Parrales's 22nd year with the company; Professional Grounds sponsored his green card, and he eventually became a citizen. Parrales now owns a house in Alexandria and boasts the title of vice president.

A piece of paper taped to Parrales's office door advertises that Professional Grounds needs more workers. In fact, the company says it will pay workers who bring forward qualified candidates a $1,000 referral fee.

Paradoxes Of Immigration Hit US Senate (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - How does the United States count the cost of at least 11 million immigrants living and often working outside the law?

For business groups - now urging a path to citizenship or other legal status for such workers - it's the lower cost of a head of lettuce, new home construction, or a restaurant tab, because these people will do the work that Americans won't.

For local officials across the country - no longer just those near a border - it's the strain illegals pose to schools, hospital emergency rooms, law enforcement, and other social services, driving municipal budgets deep into the red.

For illegal immigrants and their supporters - rallying by the hundreds of thousands around the country in the run-up to this debate - the issue is freedom from fear.

But one of the most pervasive costs of a broken immigration system, acknowledged by all sides, is the cost of deception.

"Today's immigration policy is almost founded on lies," says Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies. "It presupposes lying by almost everyone involved."

Bringing honesty to the system without deporting millions and jeopardizing major sectors of the US economy is the tough task before the Senate Judiciary Committee, as its 18 members struggle toward consensus on a new strategy for immigration reform.

Senate majority leader Bill Frist has set Tuesday to begin debate on the topic. That means the Judiciary panel has one last day - Monday - to work out a comprehensive plan, including a new guest worker program and a path to citizenship for those already working illegally. If it fails, Senator Frist will introduce his own plan Tuesday, which, like the House bill, aims only to gain control of US borders.

Pro-immigration demonstrators, meanwhile, are expected to rally at the Capitol Tuesday, following a 500,000-strong rally for illegal-immigrant rights in Los Angeles, and other protests in Denver, Phoenix, Milwaukee, Chicago, Philadelphia, and Tucson, Ariz. Organizers say they'll march in 30 more cities before the Senate vote next month.

Last year, the immigration debate on Capitol Hill was overshadowed by the Minutemen - an armed civilian posse out to stop illegal border crossings. But the prospect of congressional crackdown on illegal immigrants, including the enforcement of penalties against employers who hire them, is drawing record numbers of immigrants into the streets, with a powerful coalition of business, church, and union groups behind them. Their message: These are good people who work hard, pay taxes, and should not be treated as felons.

"Polls show that people do recognize the value of immigration, including illegal," says Peter Schuck, a professor at Yale Law School in New Haven, Conn. "On the other hand, it is a violation of law, and people have just found strategies to live with it."

For employers who hire illegals, that means not looking too closely at documents. Only three employers were fined for hiring illegals in 2004, down from 417 in 1999, according to a report by the Government Accountability Office in August 2005.

"It's a dysfunctional system that breeds disrespect for the law," says John Gay, senior vice president of government affairs and public policy at the National Restaurant Association and a co-chair for the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition.

"Many employers see this as a game: If they ask people to provide proper documents, they leave." Restaurants that knowingly violate the law, he adds, gain an unfair advantage.

Not only is there a disincentive because there is no enforcement of the law, but if employers examine someone's documents too closely, they can be pursued by the Justice Department for employment related discrimination.

DOJ_NMG_0021261

"We are digging ourselves into a hole by turning a blind eye to illegality," says Jared Bernstein, director of the Living Standards Program at the Economic Policy Institute. "All kinds of unintentional consequences surface when you do that, including paving the wayfor armed vigilantees on the border."

One of the most toxic issues in the debate is whether the flood of immigrants, especially the 500,000 undocumented workers who enter the country each year, are driving down prospects for low-skilled Americans. A new report by the Center for Immigration Studies finds that states with the largest increase in immigrants also saw larger declines in natives working.

"This isn't just some parlor game for economists: Low-skill native workers are hurt by flooding the market with immigrants," says Mr. Krikorian.

Another point of deception in the system is the limited enforcement the nation's immigration laws. "We don't allow state police making traffic stops to ask about a driver's legal status," says Sen. Jeff Sessions (R) of Alabama, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "What does that tell you about how serious we are about enforcing our immigration laws?"

Last week, business owners in Costa Mesa, Calif., called on the City Council to suspend a new policy that allows police to enforce federal immigration laws, which they say are hurting business. Nearly every state has proposals pending to address illegal immigration.

"This is a justice issue: You can't have 11 million people being vulnerable and exploited," said Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, in a conference call after Chicago demonstrations last week.

"There is a politicization of this issue in the immigrant community in a way that has not happened in the past," he added.

An Immigration Brawl (USNEWS)

By Angie C. Marek

U.S. News and World Report, March 27, 2006

Immigration seems to have a struck a nerve in Americans of all stripes. Frustration on the right has fueled the rapid growth of the Minutemen, vigilantes who want to help close America's porous borders. Liberals are exercised, too. Thousands of people have recently gathered in Chicago, Washington, and Los Angeles to protest proposals they say could make it a crime to give a cup of soup to a wayward illegal immigrant. On April 10, activists hope to shutter restaurants and convenience stores by encouraging some of America's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants to play hooky from work. But that may all look tame compared with what's expected in the Senate this week, when immigration reform proposals go to the floor for debate in a midterm-election year. "It's an exciting time," says Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute. "But it's going to be one hell of a food fight."

And it will have higher stakes than the average cafeteria brawl. The House passed a mostly punitive measure in December; it would throw up 700 miles of steel fencing along the 2,000-mile Southwest border, allow state and local officials to detain immigrants without visas, and make it a felony--instead of a civil penalty--to be caught on U.S. soil with an expired visa or no visa at all. "This was a message to the Senate that we'd better stay tough on enforcement," says Texas Republican Sen. John Cornyn--and perhaps a symbolic statement to angry constituents. The House refused to even consider proposals that would allow employers to hire temporary guest workers, an idea that's been championed by President Bush. "The assumption from many of the bill's supporters," says Frank Sharry of the National Immigration Forum, an immigrant-rights group, "was that the Senate would do right by us."

Fragile. But will it? Republicans in the Senate are fiercely divided on the temporary-worker issue, and those with presidential ambitions crop up on both sides of the debate. Sen. Bill Frist has already introduced a brawny enforcement bill that omits any mention of guest workers. Moderate Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, meanwhile, hopes he can hold together a fragile coalition in the Judiciary Committee long enough to pass a bill that would allow thousands of future guest workers and most of the illegal immigrants already here to become citizens, while creating more robust workplace immigration enforcement. Large parts of his measure drew inspiration from a proposal crafted by Sen. John McCain; if Specter succeeds, then his bill, not Frist's, will be the starting point for debate in the full Senate.

Expect some gonzo antics on the floor. Already on the agenda: tough proposals to fence off the whole Southwest border and deny citizenship to babies born to illegal immigrants and a liberal amendment to grant in-state tuition to college students who aren't U.S. citizens. Republicans will be skittishly eyeing religious leaders who have been critical of the House bill. In a recent editorial, Roman Catholic Cardinal Roger Mahony, head of the Archdiocese of Los Angeles, wrote that "Christ instructs us to clothe the naked, feed the poor, and welcome the stranger." But in an election year, it's clear that not everyone in the Senate agrees.

A Border War (NSWK)

By Holly Bailey, Newsweek

Newsweek, March 27, 2006

Tom Tancredo is pulling the immigration debate to the right—and away from Bush.

The lights were on, the cameras were rolling, but the special guest star was nowhere to be found. Last Friday afternoon, 55 men and women from 30 countries sat in a Denver conference room, clutching small American flags as they waited to be sworn in as U.S. citizens. The 12:15 starting time had come and gone, and some people were getting impatient. "For heaven's sake," one woman said, sighing. "What is the holdup?" A few minutes later, they had the answer. Tom Tancredo, the Republican congressman, was coming to welcome the new citizens. He was hard to miss when he breezed in, 25 minutes late, dressed in a dark suit and an American-flag necktie. Even so, few in the room recognized him until one man whispered, "He's the guy who sits on the border chasing illegals."

Tancredo may not be a household name yet, but he's doing everything he can to change that. As the House and Senate debate the nation's immigration and border-security laws, the four-term Coloradan has positioned himself as the loudest, angriest voice against the estimated 11 million illegal aliens now living in the United States. They are "a scourge that threatens the very future of our nation," he says. He laments "the cult of multiculturalism," and worries about America's becoming a "Tower of Babel." If Republican presidential candidates don't put the problem atop the agenda in 2008, he says he'll run himself, just to force the front runners to talk about it. Not that he thinks he'd win the White House. He declares himself "too fat, too short and too bald" to be president. If the Republicans lose the election because he's too tough on the issue, he says, "So be it."

Not so long ago, Tancredo was regarded as little more than a noisy pest on Capitol Hill. His colleagues shook their heads at his tireless demands for crackdowns on American employers who hire illegals and his idea for a 700-mile-long fence along the Mexican border. But in recent months, some of those same Republicans have come to realize that, while Tancredo may be a crank, he is a crank with a large and passionate following. Anti-immigration sentiment has always simmered, and it flares up about once a decade—the last time it hit this level was 1996, when California Gov. Pete Wilson made it the centerpiece of his failed presidential campaign. Tancredo was one of the first politicians to tap into the latest surge of anger. In states with large numbers of undocumented workers, voters complain that poor illegals are overwhelming public schools, clogging hospital emergency rooms and bankrupting welfare budgets. And they worry that inadequate border security makes it easy for would-be terrorists to sneak into the country. Tancredo's colleagues are listening. When he arrived in Washington, he started the Immigration Reform Caucus. The group attracted just 16 members. Today, there are 91.

Tancredo's anti-immigration campaign is also brazenly, almost gleefully, taking aim at George W. Bush and Karl Rove. The president had once hoped the immigration debate would center on his proposed guest-worker program, which would allow illegals—who fill millions of unskilled, low-wage jobs—to stay in the country for a set period of time. This was Bush the pragmatist, the former border-state governor who wanted to acknowledge the importance of immigrant labor to construction, fruit farming and other chunks of the U.S. economy. "He doesn't think it's morally right that a group that has been critical to the strength of the economy is operating in the shadows," says a senior Bush aide who, following policy, spoke anonymously. Meanwhile, Rove pushed the pure political benefits of the plan: immigrant-friendly policies would help the party reach out to the fast-growing Latino vote.

Instead, the immigration debate has split the GOP, with many Republicans in the House and Senate, worried about alienating voters, openly opposing the president. In December, the House tossed aside the worker program and passed a bill that features tougher security at the Mexican border—including Tancredo's cherished fence—and crackdowns on illegals who are already here. "You can't ignore him," says a GOP leadership aide who wouldn't be named because he wanted to keep his job. "The administration doesn't want to hear this, but a lot of Americans think he's right."

DOJ_NMG_0021263

In the Senate, Republicans, led by John McCain and Arlen Specter, have been working to come up with a compromise that would include border security, a guest-worker program and a way for illegal immigrants to "earn" citizenship. But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a presidential contender with one eye on the anti-immigration vote—and the other one on outflanking McCain—has threatened to put forward his own get-tough plan this week if the senators fail to come through.

It's not just Republicans elbowing for attention. Last week Sen. Hillary Clinton whacked the GOP with the Bible, implying anti-immigration proposals were not only hardhearted, but un-Christian. The bill, she said, "would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself."

Bush, forced to step up his own security rhetoric in response to the feud, is still hoping for a compromise. At an immigration meeting at the White House last week, the president said that "the debate must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another." But Florida Sen. Mel Martinez, a former Bush cabinet member who sides with the president on the issue, fears that's exactly what is happening. "Republicans have made significant gains [among Latinos]," he says, "and we're risking all of that by allowing ourselves to be positioned as anti-immigrant ... We are at great peril."

Tancredo believes there's greater danger in doing nothing. All he wants, he says, is to see the law enforced. "I don't like it when people call me a racist or xenophobe," he says. "In my heart, I know that I'm not." A 60-year-old grandson of an Italian immigrant, he grew up in a working-class family. He ran for Congress on a whim in 1998, and won by pushing immigration reform. He says he became passionate about the issue back in the 1970s, when he was a Denver junior-high-school teacher. At the time, Colorado had just passed a bilingual-education bill. He says students with Latino-sounding names were put into Spanish-language classes, even if they spoke English only. "It was ridiculous, and a total waste of time and money."

He's remained unapologetic about his views. In 2002, The Denver Post ran a human-interest story about a high-school honors student who couldn't get college financial aid because he was in the United States illegally. Tancredo tried to have the boy and his family deported. (He was unsuccessful.)

Back at the immigration ceremony, Tancredo thanked the new citizens for coming to the United States "the right way," and urged them to "cast aside loyalties to your old countries and walk with us." One lucky person walked away with more than a citizenship certificate. When he heard that a young woman from Mexico had waited more than a year for her paperwork to clear, Tancredo approached her. He apologized that he was out of the lapel pins he usually hands out. Instead, he gave her a more personal gift: his American-flag necktie. "Gracias," she said.

Frist Finds His Cause (TIME)

By Perry bacon Jr.

Time, March 26, 2006

At the start of 2005, Bill Frist seemed to have the political Midas touch. A successful surgeon, the Tennessee Republican had blossomed in his second career, rising from his election to the U.S. Senate in 1994 to the post of majority leader in 2002. But last year, while Frist tried to both manage an unwieldy Senate and prepare for a 2008 presidential run, he often sounded off-balance--as when he inserted himself into the Terri Schiavo controversy, boldly but mistakenly arguing that her doctors misdiagnosed her vegetative state.

Frist will again find himself at the center of an emotional issue this week as the Senate debates illegal-immigration policy, and his performance could show whether he has regained his political footing. His party is divided: some G.O.P.ers simply want tougher border enforcement, while others, including President Bush, want temporary work permits for illegal immigrants. In December, the House sided with the hard-liners, passing a bill with no such guest-worker program and with provisions that would make it a federal crime to offer assistance to illegal immigrants. New York Senator Hillary Clinton, a possible 2008 contender on the other side of the aisle, slammed the bill, saying it "would literally criminalize the Good Samaritan and probably even Jesus himself." In rallies from Milwaukee, Wis., to Los Angeles, thousands of people marched last week to protest the proposed crackdown on illegal immigrants.

So with whom has Frist sided? None of the above. To the annoyance of some G.O.P. colleagues, who were crafting their own bill, Frist put out his plan, which would increase penalties for people in the U.S. illegally and add funding for guarding the border but not give work permits to illegal immigrants already here. While he has left open the possibility of backing a bill that includes a guest-worker provision, he's determined to get stronger border enforcement passed, which will please conservative voters who will pick the G.O.P. nominee in 2008. David Winston, a veteran G.O.P. pollster, says that Frist--who plans to retire from the Senate after this year--"is clearly laying out this marker." If he can succeed in passing an immigration bill--especially his own--he may regain some of the luster he lost last year. If he can't, he may return home to Tennessee as the ineffectual G.O.P. leader who lost his touch--and his presidential prospects.

Groundswell Of Protests Back Illegal Immigrants (NYT)

By Nina Bernstein

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

When members of the Senate Judiciary Committee meet today to wrestle with the fate of more than 11 million illegal immigrants living in the United States, they can expect to do so against a backdrop of thousands of demonstrators, including clergy members wearing handcuffs and immigrant leaders in T-shirts that declare, "We Are America."

But if events of recent days hold true, they will be facing much more than that.

Rallies in support of immigrants around the country have attracted crowds that have astonished even their organizers. More than a half-million demonstrators marched in Los Angeles on Saturday, as many as 300,000 in Chicago on March 10, and — in between — tens of thousands in Denver, Phoenix, Milwaukee and elsewhere.

One of the most powerful institutions behind the wave of public protests has been the Roman Catholic Church, lending organizational muscle to a spreading network of grass-roots coalitions. In recent weeks, the church has unleashed an army of priests and parishioners to push for the legalization of the nation's illegal immigrants, sending thousands of postcards to members of Congress and thousands of parishioners into the streets.

The demonstrations embody a surging constituency demanding that illegal immigrants be given a path to citizenship rather than be punished with prison terms. It is being pressed as never before by immigrants who were long thought too fearful of deportation to risk so public a display.

"It's unbelievable," said Partha Banerjee, director of the New Jersey Immigration Policy Network, who was in Washington yesterday to help plan more nationwide protests on April 10. "People are joining in so spontaneously, it's almost like the immigrants have risen. I would call it a civil rights movement reborn in this country."

What has galvanized demonstrators, especially Mexicans and other Latin Americans who predominate among illegal immigrants, is proposed legislation — already passed by the House of Representatives — that would make it a felony to be in the United States without proper papers, and a federal crime to aid illegal immigrants.

But the proposed measure also shows the clout of another growing force that elected officials have to reckon with: a groundswell of anger against illegal immigration that is especially potent in border states and swing-voting suburbs where the numbers and social costs of illegal immigrants are most acutely felt.

"It's an entirely predictable example of the law of unintended consequences," said Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights, who helped organize the Chicago rally and who said he was shocked by the size of the turnout. "The Republican party made a decision to use illegal immigration as the wedge issue of 2006, and the Mexican community was profoundly offended."

Until the wave of immigration rallies, the campaign by groups demanding stringent enforcement legislation seemed to have the upper hand in Washington. The Judiciary Committee was deluged by faxes and e-mail messages from organizations like NumbersUSA, which calls for a reduction in immigration, and claims 237,000 activists nationwide, and the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which has long opposed any form of amnesty, including a guest-worker program advocated by President Bush.

Dan Stein, president of the federation, acknowledged the unexpected outpouring of protesters, but tried to play down its political significance. "These are a lot of people who don't vote, can't vote and certainly aren't voting Republican if they do vote," he said.

But others, noting that foreign-born Latinos voted for President Bush in 2004 at a 40 percent greater rate than Latinos born in the United States, said that by pursuing the proposed legislation, Republican leaders might have squandered the party's inroads with an emerging bloc of voters and pushed them into the Democratic camp.

The Pew Hispanic Center estimates that of more than 11 million illegal immigrants, 78 percent are from Mexico or other Latin American countries. Many have children and other relatives who are United States citizens. Under the House measure, family members of illegal immigrants — as well as clergy members, social workers and lawyers — would risk up to five years in prison if they helped an illegal immigrant remain in the United States.

"Imagine turning more than 11 million people into criminals, and anyone who helps them," said Angela Sanbrano, executive director of the Central American Resource Center of Los Angeles, one of the organizers of Saturday's rally there. "It's outrageous. We needed to send a strong and clear message to Congress and to President Bush that the immigrant community will not allow the criminalization of our people — and it needed to be very strong because of the anti-immigrant environment that we are experiencing in Congress."

Like many advocates for immigrants, Ms. Sanbrano said the protesters would prefer that Congress passed no immigration legislation rather than criminalizing those who are here without documents or creating a guest-worker program that would require millions to go home.

In a telephone briefing sponsored last week by the National Immigration Forum, the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez Jr., president of the National Hispanic Association of Evangelicals, warned that elected officials would pay a price for being on the wrong side of the legislative battle.

"We are talking to the politicians telling them that the Hispanic community will not forget," he said. "I know there are pure hearts that want to protect our border and protect our country, but at the same time the Hispanic community cannot deny the fact that many have taken advantage of an important and legitimate issue in order to manifest their racist and discriminatory spirit against the Hispanic community."

Seventy of the nation's 197 Catholic dioceses have formally committed to the immigration campaign since the United States Catholic Conference of Bishops began the effort last year, and church officials are recruiting the rest.

Meanwhile, priests and deacons have been working side by side with immigrant communities and local immigrant activist groups.

Leo Anchondo, who directs the immigrant campaign for the bishops' conference, said that he was not surprised by the size of the protests because immigration advocacy groups had been working hard to build a powerful campaign. "We hadn't seen efforts to organize these communities before," Mr. Anchondo said. "It's certainly a testament to the fact that people are very scared of what seems to be driving this anti-immigrant legislation, to the point that they are coming out to make sure they speak and are heard."

Last night in downtown Los Angeles, Fabricio Fierros, 18, the American-born son of mushroom-pickers who came to the United States illegally from Mexico, joined about 5,000 Mexican farmworkers gathered for a Mass celebrating the birthday of Cesar Chavez.

"It's not fair to workers here to just kick them out without giving them a legal way to be here," Mr. Fierros said, "To be treated as criminals after all the work they did isn't fair."

Size Of L.A. March Surprises Authorities (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

The AP, March 27, 2006

Thousands of immigration advocates marched through downtown Los Angeles in one of the largest demonstrations for any cause in recent U.S. history.

More than 500,000 protesters — demanding that Congress abandon attempts to make illegal immigration a felony and to build more walls along the border — surprised police who estimated the crowd size using aerial photographs and other techniques, police Cmdr. Louis Gray Jr. said.

DOJ_NMG_0021266

Wearing white T-shirts to symbolize peace, the demonstrators chanted "Mexico!" "USA!" and "Si se puede," an old Mexican-American civil rights shout that means "Yes, we can."

In Denver, more than 50,000 people protested downtown Saturday, according to police who had expected only a few thousand. Phoenix was similarly surprised Friday when an estimated 20,000 people gathered for one of the biggest demonstrations in city history, and more than 10,000 marched in Milwaukee on Thursday.

"We construct your schools. We cook your food," rapper Jorge Ruiz said after performing at a Dallas rally that drew 1,500. "We are the motor of this nation, but people don't see us. Blacks and whites, they had their revolution. They had their Martin Luther King. Now it is time for us."

Many protesters said lawmakers were unfairly targeting immigrants who provide a major labor pool for America's economy.

"Enough is enough of the xenophobic movement," said Norman Martinez, 63, who immigrated from Honduras as a child and marched in Los Angeles. "They are picking on the weakest link in society, which has built this country."

The U.S. House of Representatives has passed legislation that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants, require churches to check the legal status of people they help, and erect fences along one-third of the U.S.-Mexican border.

The Senate is to begin debating the proposals on Tuesday.

President Bush on Saturday called for legislation that does not force America to choose between being a welcoming society and a lawful one.

"America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws," Bush said in his weekly radio address, discussing an issue that had driven a wedge into his own party.

Bush sides with business leaders who want to let some of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants stay in the country and work for a set period of time. Others, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, say national security concerns should drive immigration reform.

But many protesters rejected claims the national security claim, noting that the legislation would hurt Hispanics the most.

"When did you ever see a Mexican blow up the World Trade Center? Who do you think built the World Trade Center?" said David Gonzalez, 22, who marched in Los Angeles with a sign that read, "I'm in my homeland.'"

Between 5,000 and 7,000 people gathered Saturday in Charlotte, carrying signs with slogans such as "Am I Not a Human Being?" In Sacramento, more than 4,000 people protested immigration legislation at an annual march honoring the late farm labor leader Cesar Chavez.

The demonstrations are expected to culminate April 10 in a "National Day of Action" organized by labor, immigration, civil rights and religious groups.

Immigration Gives Democrats Cover (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Internal GOP divisions over how to address the status of an estimated 11 million illegal workers residing in the United States have provided a rare bit of political cover for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), sparing him and his oft-divided Democratic Caucus from a public airing of its own internal grievances and disputes over the hot-button issue.

Although the Senate Judiciary Committee was expected to continue efforts to craft a committee-level compromise on guest worker provisions by press time Friday, leadership aides said those talks were not progressing well and they were preparing for a two-week floor debate.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has scheduled a cloture vote for Tuesday on his border-security plan, which does not include guest worker provisions, and he has warned the Judiciary Committee that it has until the end of the day Monday to reach a deal on its more comprehensive measure.

Like Republicans, Democrats are divided — although much less bitterly than the GOP — over the guest worker plan. In one corner are lawmakers such as Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) who favor a program that would allow law-abiding, employed illegal workers to remain in the U.S. for a set period of time. In the other corner stand lawmakers such as Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who would prefer a much narrower guest worker program.

But unlike Republican divisions, the Democratic disputes have largely avoided the front pages, thanks to what GOP aides argue is political posturing by presidential hopefuls Frist and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who have staked out opposite positions on the issue.

Although Reid has not explicitly asked his Caucus members to keep out of the immigration fight, Democratic aides acknowledged that the focus on GOP infighting has allowed Reid to go on offense more aggressively.

For instance, Reid last week warned that he would filibuster any effort to move immigration legislation that does not come from the Judiciary Committee. In a set of internal talking points circulated Friday, Reid also laid out a broad outline of his Caucus' stand on immigration.

While rejecting a full amnesty or "free pass," in his words, Reid argued for a system under which undocumented workers could apply for permanent residency only after working for several years, paying a stiff penalty, undergoing a rigorous security check, learning American civics and English, paying taxes and "waiting at the end of the line," according to a copy off the memo.

But Reid sidestepped the issue of whether "waiting at the end of the line" should entail requiring aliens to return to their home countries before applying for the guest worker visa, which is a key point of contention for the GOP.

Meanwhile, on the House side, Republicans plan to use this week's focus on immigration to cast the spotlight on their chamber's efforts to grapple with the issue.

House GOP leaders originally had dubbed this "Education Week," featuring a series of education measures that were scheduled to hit the floor. But with the Senate and White House concentrating on immigration, House Republicans altered their plans and now plan to hold immigration-related media events this week.

On Dec. 16, the House passed an immigration measure sponsored by House Judiciary Chairman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-Wis.) that focused only on border security and enforcement. The bill did not address the guest worker issue, and GOP leaders did not even allow a vote on a nonbinding amendment that would have expressed support for the idea of a guest worker program.

The House will now wait to see what the Senate does on that issue. Despite their decision to avoid the guest worker issue last year, Republican leaders in the House would prefer — as does the Bush administration — to reach some sort of guest worker compromise.

"We're reminding our conservative base that we want to tighten our borders ... but at the same time we want to make sure our business community has enough workers and that we are not alienating Hispanics," said a House GOP leadership aide.

Bush Must Devote Political Capital To Immigration Fix (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

President Bush finally re-entered the immigration debate last week to appeal for civility and compassion. He's way late. The debate is already bitter and divisive, especially within the Republican Party, and it's only getting worse.

More than 200 House Republicans are on record as favoring a draconian border security measure that would make it a felony simply to be in the United States illegally, or to offer assistance — even a meal, a ride or counseling — to an illegal immigrant.

Presidential aspirant and current Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has introduced a measure only slightly less punitive, making it a misdemeanor to be in the U.S. illegally, but a felony to be caught a second time.

It's not clear whether Frist has put the measure forward to appeal to the xenophobe-populist portion of the GOP's right wing, to goad the Senate Judiciary Committee into producing a more comprehensive bill, or both.

Meanwhile, immigrant-rights groups are staging huge protests — 30,000 people in Washington, D.C., 100,000 in Chicago. Roman Catholic bishops have denounced the legislation. And leading Democrats are vowing to filibuster the Frist measure if he brings it to the floor Tuesday. A Frist aide said, "Go for it!"

DOJ_NMG_0021268

It's Bush who allowed the situation to get out of hand. Since before he became president, the former border-state governor has favored a moderate, comprehensive approach to immigration — a combination of enhanced border security and internal enforcement measures, plus work permits for new entrants and for those presently working illegally.

But Bush failed to push this approach, initially because of post-9/11 security concerns and then because he decided to spend his post-re-election political capital on Social Security.

Now, his party is split between fellow moderates — led by presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) — and restrictionists led by another presidential aspirant, Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.). The restrictionist ascendancy threatens to destroy all of Bush's efforts to woo Hispanic voters into the GOP.

What's more, if the restrictionists prevail, the nation will be treated to the spectacle of mass roundups of illegal immigrants, by local police as well as federal agents. These deportations will split families and produce tales of arbitrary interrogations of Hispanics or Hispanic-looking persons all around the country.

If ever a situation cried out for reason, bipartisanship, compassion and presidential leadership, it's this one. Frist, too, could play a key role by forcing a sound compromise.

The most sensible proposal to me is the comprehensive bill sponsored by Sens. McCain and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), which involves enhanced border security, tighter controls on employment of illegal immigrants, a worker permit program and a system that allows many of the 12 million illegals now in the country to earn their way toward citizenship.

A useful add-on to the comprehensive approach will be introduced this week by Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.) to speed up the process of moving legal green-card holders toward citizenship by offering them scholarships worth $500 to learn English and by shortening the qualification time for citizenship from five years to four for those who are fluent.

I would add an (admittedly expensive) proviso for the federal government to give "impact assistance" to states and localities whose schools and health facilities are burdened by illegal immigrants. Controlling the borders is a federal responsibility and, if it's not being handled well, the federal government should pay.

There's no question that restrictionists have it right that U.S. borders are scandalously porous, with up to 10,000 persons crossing each day, or 3 million a year.

Building a 700-mile wall along the Mexican border, as provided in the House bill, would be a terrible symbol for a country proud of the Statue of Liberty, but the goal of U.S. policy should be the equivalent — sealing the border to illegal entry as much as possible.

In fact, that's embodied in the McCain-Kennedy bill, administration proposals and draft legislation introduced by Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) — by increases in personnel and technology for Customs and Border Protection, and by expansion of detention facilities for holding illegal entrants.

It's also valid for the government to crack down on employment of illegal immigrants. Indeed, most of the legislation does so by creating a tamper-proof ID system and increasing penalties for knowingly hiring illegals.

The sticking point between the sides is what to do about the estimated 12 million people currently living illegally in the U.S. Restrictionists want to make their lives such hell that they leave — and, in the process, discourage others from following their example.

They regard any measure that lets illegals stay as "blanket amnesty." But the McCain-Kennedy approach is "earned legalization" whereby illegals would have to have a record of employment, pay $2,000 in fines, learn English, pay taxes, have a clean record and wait in line behind all who have applied to enter the country legally.

McCain, Kennedy and their allies argue that by giving illegals, and new entrants, work permits, the government will know who is entering the U.S. and can concentrate its limited law-enforcement resources on chasing down criminal illegal immigrants, including drug smugglers and potential terrorists, not low-wage hotel or restaurant workers.

Sens. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), Frist and Specter want to make workers leave the U.S. when their work permit expires. The White House also calls permits "temporary."

But Bush's allies at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the industries that disproportionately employ immigrants — agriculture, home-building, hospitality — say they'd lose the training costs they'd just put into the workers. They favor "earned citizenship."

Restrictionists claim that illegals — and work permits — depress wages for U.S. workers. But it's worth noting that the AFL-CIO is one of the groups behind "earned legalization."

Polls suggest that the public is massively confused and ambivalent about immigration. A Quinnipiac University survey last month found that 54 percent of voters want to make it harder for illegal immigrants to work in the U.S. legally. But a Time magazine poll showed that 76 percent favor earned legalization.

This is a moment for presidential leadership. Bush has limited political capital left, but social peace is a cause worth spending it on.

Latin Leaders Balk At US 'Wall' (CSM)

By Danna Harman

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

NOGALES, MEXICO - Some envision a wall. Others, a fence - or even a "virtual" fence of cameras, lighting, and sensors along the US-Mexican border. Whatever form it will take, the US is discussing, planning, and, in some places, already building it - much to the fury and frustration of neighbors south of the border.

As Mexican President Vicente Fox prepares to meet Thursday with President Bush and Canada's new prime minister, Stephen Harper, in Cancún, the proposed 700-mile, $2.2 billion barrier is a major point of contention - not just for the US and Mexico, but for the US and the whole region.

Regional leaders - whose countries in 2004 received some $45 billion sent home from immigrants in the US - have met three times recently to discuss how best to oppose it.

"At a moment when relations between the US and Latin America are at their lowest point since the end of the cold war, this fence proposal is viewed as a terrible affront," says Michael Shifter, vice president of the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington think tank.

"It is hard to imagine any other symbol that more strongly reinforces the image of the "ugly American" and is more sharply at odds with the "good neighbor" concept."

It's not just the barrier, but other issues as well in proposed US immigration reform legislation that irk regional leaders and caused hundreds of thousands of people to protest in multiple US cities over the past few days.

The US Congress passed a tough immigration bill in December that would make it a felony for illegal immigrants to be in the US, impose new penalties on employers who hire them, and erect a fence along one-third of the border's total length.

At present, just over 80 miles of federally enforced barriers and fencing are erected at strategic points on the border, mainly in Texas and California.

This week, the Senate will debate a comprehensive bill that is expected to include guest-worker provisions and avenues for legal residency, while at the same time beefing up border security. So far, a draft of the bill calls only for expanding and reinforcing fencing in Arizona - the border state with the most illegal immigration traffic - and adding 200 miles of vehicle barriers there, but more extensive fencing elsewhere is still under discussion.

"No country that is proud of itself should build walls," Fox told reporters when he last met Bush one year ago, and a month after the House began talks on approving a fence. "[I]t doesn't make any sense."

Since then, as the debate has continued in the US over what kind of fence is needed and where, Fox has called the proposal everything from "stupid" and "discriminatory" to "shameful," and heralded illegal migrants as "heroes" who will in any event find ways to cross the border.

Last year 1.2 million illegal immigrants were apprehended by the border patrol as they tried to cross into the US, and it is frequently estimated that close to the same number make it. Last year was also a record year for deaths. In 2005, 473 would-be immigrants died en route, many victims of thirst, heatstroke, exhaustion, or exposure when they tried to cross less carefully guarded desert areas.

Currently, 11.5 million to 12 million illegal immigrants live in the US, according to estimates in a report released this month by the Pew Hispanic Center. Of these, an estimated 6.2 million, or 56 percent, are Mexicans. Another 2.5 million, or 22 percent of the total, come from other Latin American countries.

DOJ_NMG_0021270

The money these people send home is vital to the region's economy. In 2005, legal and illegal immigrants from Latin America and the Caribbean sent home $45 billion in remittances, double the total of a decade earlier, according to the Social Outlook 2005 report by the Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean (ECLAC), a UN regional body. Mexican workers alone sent home a record $17 billion.

So while Fox might be the regional leader most concerned with, and vocal about, US immigration policy - he is far from the only one.

Spearheaded by Mexico, and galvanized by the fence proposals, foreign ministers and other top officials from Belize, Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Panama as well as Colombia, Ecuador, and the Dominican Republic met March 15 in Guatemala and vowed to coordinate their lobbying efforts against the US bill if it should pass in the Senate.

Guatemalan Vice President Eduardo Stein, in turn, called the bill "an affront to Latin America by a government that claims to be our partner, but which apparently only wants our money and our merchandise, and that sees our people as an epidemic."

This was the third time representatives from these 11 countries have gathered to discuss the US bill. In early January, they convened in Mexico City and put out a joint statement saying that "incomplete measures that only involve the stiffening of immigration policies do not represent an integral solution for dealing with the challenges posed by the phenomenon of migration."

In February, the group met again in Cartegena, Colombia, and devised a plan to identify key US senators to reach out to on the issue. Both the Mexican parliament and the five- nation Central American Parliament have condemned the proposed fence and are calling on the Senate to throw it out.

"Our message is that we are your neighbors, we are your friends. This is a common challenge," Carlos de Icaza, Mexico's ambassador to the US, told reporters in Washington last week. "And we are part of the solution, not only part of the problem."

Border Security Is Focus Of Bush, Fox (PHI)

By William Douglas

The Philadelphia Inquirer, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox in Cancun on Thursday to discuss immigration reform, even as the Senate debates whether to give legal status to the millions of illegal immigrants already in the United States.

Bush and Fox plan to meet in the Yucatan resort as part of a trilateral summit with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. While Bush has economic issues to address with Harper, U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting.

"The immigration debate is a vital debate for our country," Bush said Thursday, after a White House meeting on the issue with agricultural and faith-based leaders. "It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another." He reiterated those points Saturday in his weekly radio address.

Given the political climate across the United States, it is doubtful Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year. Bush is weakened by low approval ratings, and opposition to illegal immigration has become a red-hot issue in many states where lawmakers face voters in November. Moreover, several potential 2008 presidential candidates are weighing in from opposing sides, lessening the chance for compromise.

Bush's reach is limited

"There's nothing that Bush can promise credibly to the Mexicans," said George Grayson, a professor at Virginia's College of William and Mary who specializes in U.S.-Mexico relations. "He's had a rough couple of months, and the Republicans sought to separate themselves from him in the Dubai Ports deal. They have a chance to do it again with immigration."

That isn't stopping Bush from promoting his plan to overhaul immigration law. He highlights his call for a guest-worker program, which would allow illegal immigrants and foreign workers to apply for temporary legal status to accept U.S. jobs. After a maximum of six years, they would have to go back to their home countries and would not be placed on track for permanent residency.

Bowing to rising resentment of illegal immigrants across the heartland, Bush also has stressed tighter security along the U.S.-Mexican border and called for illegal immigrants registering for his guest-worker program to pay fines.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.), a potential 2008 presidential candidate, is staking out a harder stance. The Senate on Tuesday will begin two weeks of debate on immigration, and Frist is sponsoring a bill that would toughen border security without offering a guest-worker program.

His proposal mirrors an enforcement-only bill that the House passed Dec. 16. Lawmakers opposing the guest-worker plan say giving illegal immigrants the opportunity to work and live here legally would reward bad behavior.

Kennedy-McCain measure

Today, the Senate Judiciary Committee will take up a bill by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D., Mass.) and John McCain (R., Ariz.), another likely 2008 candidate, that would let illegal immigrants hold temporary work visas for up to six years after they pay $1,000 fines and pass background checks. Illegal immigrants could apply for permanent residence and eventual citizenship under the measure.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) is trying to broker a compromise that includes guest-worker and enforcement provisions.

Most experts think Bush faces an uphill fight to win congressional approval of any terms granting legal status to illegal immigrants, which opponents denounce as amnesty for lawbreakers.

"Whatever political capital he thought he had last year is spent and, like the rest of the federal government, is in deficit," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposes legal status for illegal immigrants. "Amnesty, on a visceral level, most Americans object to."

Mexican officials are under a growing sense of urgency after watching the issue heat up among their northern neighbors. Fox is in his last year in office and would like immigration reform to be part of his legacy, Grayson said.

"Fox leaves office and has precious little to show," Grayson said. "He's hoping to pull a rabbit out of his hat."

Condemnation Of Border Rapes Pushed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

Immigration legislation before the Senate this week should include a condemnation of rapes by alien smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border and encourage "in the strongest possible terms" the Mexican government to prevent such crimes, a Florida congresswoman said.

"These women and young girls are being raped all along the southern border, and the sight of women's undergarments hanging from border fences as trophies is appalling," said Republican Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite. "They are entrusting their futures to these smugglers, or coyotes, to bring them across the border, but instead of gaining freedom, they're being raped and exploited.

"And it seems the Mexican government is doing nothing about it," said Mrs. Brown-Waite, whose amendment to a House immigration-enforcement bill calling for Congress to condemn the rapes was passed. "Congress cannot and should not tolerate this behavior," she added.

The amendment to the House-passed Border Protection, Antiterrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act of 2005 called on Congress to condemn the rapes by smugglers along the border and urged the Mexican government to work with U.S. Customs and Border Protection to take immediate action to prevent such crimes.

"Although these women are seeking entry into the United States illegally, this unmerciful crime is one of many problems occurring along our borders," Mrs. Brown-Waite said. "By declaring condemnation of this wrongdoing and encouraging action by both parties, we are reaffirming the fact that the lawlessness along our borders must be eliminated."

The Senate begins debate this week on comprehensive immigration reform, including some form of guest-worker legislation that has been proposed in several competing bills. The House passed its immigration bill in December.

DOJ_NMG_0021272

Mrs. Brown-Waite, who described lawlessness along the U.S.-Mexico border as unprecedented, said numerous newspaper articles have told of Minuteman volunteers being haunted by the cries of women being raped and abused, "who, when they first heard the cries, actually thought they were coyotes wailing in the desert."

She said that there have been stories of mattresses tucked in caves and that the crimes sometimes involve girls as young as 9 and 10.

In a telephone interview from her home in Florida, Mrs. Brown-Waite said that the U.S. government has waited "far too long" to respond to the problem and that she was "delighted" when the House approved the amendment. She said the Senate "hopefully will do the same."

"We all understand that the best mechanism for preventing these rapes is to encourage legal citizenship and to stop people from crossing our borders illegally and, therefore, putting themselves in harm's way," she said.

"But by including my amendment in the underlying legislation, the House sent a loud and clear message of its dedication to improving all aspects of border security."

North Of The Border (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

"Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free," wrote Emma Lazarus, in a poem that still puts a lump in my throat. I'm proud of America's immigrant history, and grateful that the door was open when my grandparents fled Russia.

In other words, I'm instinctively, emotionally pro-immigration. But a review of serious, nonpartisan research reveals some uncomfortable facts about the economics of modern immigration, and immigration from Mexico in particular. If people like me are going to respond effectively to anti-immigrant demagogues, we have to acknowledge those facts.

First, the net benefits to the U.S. economy from immigration, aside from the large gains to the immigrants themselves, are small. Realistic estimates suggest that immigration since 1980 has raised the total income of native-born Americans by no more than a fraction of 1 percent.

Second, while immigration may have raised overall income slightly, many of the worst-off native-born Americans are hurt by immigration — especially immigration from Mexico. Because Mexican immigrants have much less education than the average U.S. worker, they increase the supply of less-skilled labor, driving down the wages of the worst-paid Americans. The most authoritative recent study of this effect, by George Borjas and Lawrence Katz of Harvard, estimates that U.S. high school dropouts would earn as much as 8 percent more if it weren't for Mexican immigration.

That's why it's intellectually dishonest to say, as President Bush does, that immigrants do "jobs that Americans will not do." The willingness of Americans to do a job depends on how much that job pays — and the reason some jobs pay too little to attract native-born Americans is competition from poorly paid immigrants.

Finally, modern America is a welfare state, even if our social safety net has more holes in it than it should — and low-skill immigrants threaten to unravel that safety net.

Basic decency requires that we provide immigrants, once they're here, with essential health care, education for their children, and more. As the Swiss writer Max Frisch wrote about his own country's experience with immigration, "We wanted a labor force, but human beings came." Unfortunately, low-skill immigrants don't pay enough taxes to cover the cost of the benefits they receive.

Worse yet, immigration penalizes governments that act humanely. Immigrants are a much more serious fiscal problem in California than in Texas, which treats the poor and unlucky harshly, regardless of where they were born.

We shouldn't exaggerate these problems. Mexican immigration, says the Borjas-Katz study, has played only a "modest role" in growing U.S. inequality. And the political threat that low-skill immigration poses to the welfare state is more serious than the fiscal threat: the disastrous Medicare drug bill alone does far more to undermine the finances of our social insurance system than the whole burden of dealing with illegal immigrants.

But modest problems are still real problems, and immigration is becoming a major political issue. What are we going to do about it?

Realistically, we'll need to reduce the inflow of low-skill immigrants. Mainly that means better controls on illegal immigration. But the harsh anti-immigration legislation passed by the House, which has led to huge protests — legislation that would, among other things, make it a criminal act to provide an illegal immigrant with medical care — is simply immoral.

Meanwhile, Mr. Bush's plan for a "guest worker" program is clearly designed by and for corporate interests, who'd love to have a low-wage work force that couldn't vote. Not only is it deeply un-American; it does nothing to reduce the adverse effect of immigration on wages. And because guest workers would face the prospect of deportation after a few years, they would have no incentive to become integrated into our society.

What about a guest-worker program that includes a clearer route to citizenship? I'd still be careful. Whatever the bill's intentions, it could all too easily end up having the same effect as the Bush plan in practice — that is, it could create a permanent underclass of disenfranchised workers.

We need to do something about immigration, and soon. But I'd rather see Congress fail to agree on anything this year than have it rush into ill-considered legislation that betrays our moral and democratic principles.

The Other Immigrants (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

Lost in the heated debate about the future of millions of illegal laborers in the U.S. is that our system for admitting foreign-born professionals is also in tatters.

While globalization has increased the competition for international talent, U.S. businesses are frustrated by processing delays, long backlogs and especially the failure of Congress to increase the annual limits on visas for skilled immigrants. The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to resume its mark-up of Arlen Specter's immigration bill today. And the good news is that it contains long-overdue provisions for hiring more of the foreign professionals who help keep our economy competitive.

Under Mr. Specter's proposal, the annual cap on H-1B guest worker visas for immigrants in specialty fields like science and engineering would rise to 115,000 from 65,000. Moreover, the new cap would not be fixed but would fluctuate automatically in response to demand for these visas. We don't think any cap is necessary. But if a Republican Congress feels it must impose one, the least it can do is let market forces have some say in the matter.

Another important reform addresses foreign students who want to work here after graduating from U.S. colleges and universities. It doesn't make a lot of sense in today's global marketplace to educate the best and brightest and then send them away to England or India or China to start businesses and develop new technologies for U.S. competitors. But that's exactly what current U.S. policy encourages by limiting the employment prospects of foreign students who would rather stay here.

Mr. Specter would let more foreign students become permanent residents by obtaining an advanced degree in math, engineering, technology or the physical sciences and then finding work in their field. It's unfortunate that the U.S. isn't producing more home-grown talent in these areas, and the fault there lies with our K-12 educators and their political backers who tolerate poor performance. The reality today is that the U.S. ranks sixth world-wide in the number of people graduating with bachelor's degrees in engineering. Jobs will leave the U.S. and our economy will suffer if bad policy limits industry's access to intellectual capital.

Anti-immigration groups and protectionists want to dismiss these market forces, arguing that U.S. employers seek foreign nationals only because they'll work for less money. But it's illegal to pay these high-skill immigrants less than the prevailing wage. And employers are required to document their adherence to the law.

According to a new study by the National Foundation for American Policy, our broken system for admitting foreign professionals also contributes to outsourcing. Since 1996 the 65,000 annual cap on H-1B visas has been reached in most years, sometimes only weeks into the new year. This leaves employers with the choice of waiting until the next fiscal year to hire workers in the U.S. or hiring people outside the country.

"Many companies concede," says the report, "that the uncertainty created by Congress' inability to provide a reliable mechanism to hire skilled professionals has encouraged placing more human resources outside the United States to avoid being subject to legislative winds." Last week computer maker Dell Inc. announced that it hopes to double its workforce in India to 20,000 within three years. There's another such announcement by some company nearly every day.

This weekend's big-city immigration demonstrations focused on the debate over the estimated 11 million illegals already in the country. But the U.S. labor market has also long been a magnet for highly skilled and educated foreigners, many of whom attend school in America at some time in their lives. In a world where these brains have more options than ever in Asia and Europe, we drive them away at our economic peril.

A Civil Debate (NYT)

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

Something powerful pulled more than half a million people onto the streets of Los Angeles on Saturday, turning 26 downtown blocks into a pulsing sea of white T-shirts and American flags. A veteran police commander said that in 38 years he had never seen a march so huge. Its target was a harsh immigration bill passed by the House that would erect a wall on our Southern border and turn 12 million illegal immigrants — and any who give them aid — into a nation of felons.

The demonstrations have been timed to a climactic showdown for immigration reform in the capital. Today the Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled debate and a vote on a bill offered by its chairman, Arlen Specter. Unlike the House bill, it seeks comprehensive overhaul of immigration laws — not just tighter borders and stricter enforcement, but also a sensible path to legal status for illegal workers already here and others who want to come.

Mr. Specter and his colleagues are working under intense pressure, since the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist, has threatened to put forward a hard-line enforcement bill if the committee fails to complete its work today. Senate staffs were racing over the weekend to nail down compromises before today's deadline. Anti-immigrant forces, meanwhile, stand ready to try to torpedo anything other than a strictly get-tough approach.

That would be an awful outcome for immigrant advocates and for President Bush, who has long argued for comprehensive reform and tried, with limited success, to steer his party away from the one-note harshness of the wall-building crowd. Last week he urged Congress to have a civil, respectful discussion about the issue. But with looming elections and Republican presidential jockeying casting a distorting fuzz over the debate, it may be too late for Mr. Bush's hands-off approach. If the president really wants a sensible reform bill to reach his desk, he will have to do more than stand on the sidelines, urging everyone to have good manners.

The marchers recognize — as much of the nation seems not to — the urgency of comprehensive immigration reform to the nation's future. Their indignation is mixed with pride in their work and hunger for fair treatment. Their protests have been a model of peaceful dissent and a blow against the mental straitjacket that defines immigration reform as entirely a problem of policing. Mr. Bush should make his case with equal force.

White House Week (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, April 3, 2006

Want to Rally Conservatives? Try Attacking Big Media

To crank up his sagging job-approval ratings, President Bush is trying to rally the conservative base. And one way to do this is to attack the mainstream media, which is scorned by conservatives for being too liberal and anti-GOP. The plan is to get the base's dander up and, it is hoped, increase turnout in November's midterm elections. Republican strategists say the White House has only just begun its antimedia campaign. Bush's pitch: The media won't give him credit for strengthening the economy with tax cuts and won't shut up over lapses like the botched handling of the Dubai ports deal. Most of all, Bush argues that things are going far better in Iraq than media reporting indicates. Bush hit that theme particularly hard in his news conference this week, and administration officials say it will be a standard part of his speeches for the foreseeable future.

Seeing Gain, and No Pain, in Tax Cuts

DOJ_NMG_0021275

President Bush, moving to give permanent status to his hallmark tax cuts, is planning to step up his push for the issue in hopes that the House and Senate will grant his wish this year. Advisers say that Bush believes he has to take this on himself because House and Senate leaders aren't in agreement on the package, which he feels is a good campaign issue, and a personal "legacy issue" as well. Bush strategists had thought congressional leaders would take control of the issue, but that hasn't happened, frustrating the president. To sell it again, the strategists say that first Bush will have to talk up the economy and convince Congress that the tax cuts won't hurt the nation's economic picture.

Low in the Polls, but Big With the Bucks

Vice President Dick Cheney's overall job-approval ratings may be ankle high, but he remains popular with hard-liners and is raising real money for GOP candidates. Much of this is going unnoticed, because the veep doesn't always announce where he's going and he makes it hard for reporters to travel with him. So far this year, Cheney has attended 11 events from Arizona to New Jersey that raised $1.6 million, according to the GOP. (Fundraiser in chief President Bush has attended six events that raised $12.5 million; he was expected to raise $1 million at a tony event for Sen. Rick Santorum on March 24.) Still, the local candidates are not unaware of Cheney's unpopularity, especially with swing voters. In New Jersey, the veep helped raise $400,000 for GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr.--but Kean showed up at the event 15 minutes after Cheney departed. Kean said he got stuck in traffic.

Light at the Tunnel's End or a Mirage?

White House officials are now claiming that the tide is about to change for the better in Iraq. "It's inside of a month," one adviser says. Officials say Iraq appears to be moving quickly to establish a government that would be the first step in stabilizing the war-torn country. But before President Bush can declare "mission accomplished," his team says three things must happen: First, Iraq has to settle on a new prime minister and a president. Second, Iraq must establish a "semi-stable parliament." And finally, the Iraqi security force must gain autonomy. "That's our marker," says one aide.

White House Moment 2:03 p.m., March 22, Wheeling, W.Va.

A group of locals waits inside the display window of Kaufman's of Downtown Wheeling to get a glimpse of President Bush riding by in his motorcade. The president visited their city to talk about the war on terrorism and answer people's questions. One boy asked, "Do you like living in the White House?"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Proposals Call For Disclosure Of Ties To Lobbyists (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

In October 2001, executives from a small start-up with a promising technology approached their congressman, Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), for help getting Pentagon notice. Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, was intrigued, but he said Logical Images Inc. needed professional help. He recommended a few lobbying firms, including Martin Fisher Thompson and Associates.

Within weeks the firm was hired, and this year the lobbying bore fruit: Logical Images secured $1.5 million in the 2006 defense spending bill to help the Army buy the company's computer-aided medical diagnostic system. The transaction bore fruit for Reynolds, too. Four months after his referral, Martin Fisher's money started flowing -- $6,000 to Reynolds and the NRCC.

These mutually beneficial transactions are legal under House ethics rules. As long as there is no explicit quid pro quo, lawmakers can channel clients to lobbyists, who help secure home-district pet projects, or "earmarks," and in turn, those lobbyists can send part of their fees back in the form of campaign contributions. But in the wake of the corruption scandals of former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) and former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, congressional reformers want to shine a light on dealings that have even a whiff of impropriety.

"Anyone receiving federal funding should have to disclose what their lobbying expenses are," said Sen. John E. Sununu (R-N.H.), a co-sponsor of the toughest proposed crackdown on earmarking. "I understand people hire lobbyists. Lobbyists can be helpful in clarifying the complexities in legislation. But we should not hesitate from disclosing those kinds of contacts."

Proposals pending before the House and Senate would force lawmakers to reveal their contacts with lobbyists and disclose their involvement in winning federal spending provisions or earmarks for constituents or special interests. If such disclosures become mandatory, some in Congress hope past practices will shrivel in the light of day. If not, they hope to win passage of provisions that would allow improperly secured earmarks to be struck from bills on the House or Senate floor. The Senate will take up earmark-reform proposals as early as today, when it turns its attention to a broad package of lobbying and ethics rule changes.

"As the amount of earmarking increases, the amount contributed to campaigns increases. The lawmaker is getting a cut of the money he helped generate," said Scott Lilly, a former chief Democratic aide on the House Appropriations Committee and now a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress.

Lawmakers say they have done nothing wrong, legally or ethically. L.D. Platt, a spokesman for Reynolds, called it "absolutely ridiculous and ludicrous" to suggest lobbyist campaign contributions stemmed from the congressman's referrals. "Last time I checked, it's legal for lobbyists to give money to members of Congress," he said.

Home-district pet projects and other earmarks were once the intimate domain of lawmakers and their constituents, so much so that in 1989, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) zeroed out funding for a West Virginia University building project when he learned the school had hired a lobbyist to secure the money. But an analysis by The Washington Post and the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense found numerous links among earmarks, the lawmakers who championed them and the lobbyists who pushed them. Taxpayers for Common Sense found dozens of such links on this year's defense bill alone.

Lobbyists muscled their way into the process as pork-barrel earmarking was exploding, promising to make sure their clients' requests rose to the top of the pile. The Congressional Research Service counted 3,023 earmarks worth $19.5 billion in 1996 spending bills. By this year, the number had climbed to 12,852, valued at $64 billion. The number of clients registered with Congress on budget and appropriations matters has more than doubled since 1998, from 1,665 to 3,759 in 2004, according to the Center for Public Integrity.

Lobbyists play such a central role in the appropriations process that many constituents believe they have no choice but to retain one if they hope to obtain funding for their project or organization.

"If we could have done it through Tom Reynolds alone, we would have," said Cynthia Fay, Logical Images' spokeswoman. But, she added, "a congressman trusts a lobbyist. He knows him personally. [The lobbyist] serves as a conduit."

Last year, Missouri-based Students in Free Enterprise hired Gregg Hartley, a former chief of staff to House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), to help diversify its funding base, said Michelle West, the group's spokeswoman. Students in Free Enterprise paid Hartley $80,000 for the first six months of the year, according to lobbying records, and quickly secured $750,000 to expand its Springfield headquarters, and another $250,000 through the State Department to continue an international student exchange program.

In an interview, Blunt said he recommended that the group hire a lobbyist after they asked, but he said he did not recommend Hartley. He did not have to. The leaders of Students in Free Enterprise knew Hartley as well as they knew him, Blunt said.

"You never know what to advise people when they ask," Blunt said. "Members think, 'I'm the member. I'll help my constituents when I can.' But on the other hand, if they're thinking, 'I can't keep track of everything,' that's true, too."

"I remember them asking me what I thought," he continued. "I told them I wouldn't say not to bring a new player on the field if you think you can afford it."

AEA Technology Engineering Services Inc., a Pittsburgh firm with 55 employees, won four earmarks worth $5 million in the 2006 energy and water appropriations bill. Its lobbyist, Zel E. Lipsen, has contributed $3,500 to Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), chairman of the House energy and water development appropriations subcommittee, since 2003, and $1,500 to Rep. Peter Visclosky (Ind.), the panel's ranking Democrat, since 2001.

Advanced Acoustic Concepts Inc., a small Navy contractor, received at least $1.5 million in this year's defense appropriation, after winning the backing of Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.), the ranking Democrat on the House defense appropriations subcommittee. PMA Group, the company's lobbying firm since 1998, has given Murtha $29,000, making it the lawmaker's third most generous patron, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

DOJ_NMG_0021277

On Jan. 21, 2005, Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), Reynolds's counterpart at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, boasted of winning more than $2 million in federal funding for the Chicago Public Schools. Four days later, Chicago Public Schools' lobbying firm, Holland & Knight LLP, contributed $5,000 to the DCCC, the first of three donations last year totaling $15,000.

Emanuel said he had never recommended Holland & Knight to the school system and was not aware that the firm or its lobbyists had contributed to the DCCC. Peter Cunningham, a spokesman for the Chicago Public Schools, said the system hired the lobby shop on the recommendation of a former Chicago city official who worked at the firm.

In years past, Grand Rapids, Mich.-based Falcon Waterfree Technologies would have gone straight to its congressman, Rep. Vernon Ehlers (R-Mich.), when it ran into a wall trying to sell its water-free urinals to the Navy. Instead, last year, it hired a go-between, American Defense International Inc., for what company executives viewed as a nominal $40,000. ADI lobbyists advised the firm to go to Ehlers anyway, who then secured a $1 million earmark. Ehlers spokesman Jon Brandt said the congressman was happy to help, but James Krug, the company's president and chief executive, still views the contract as money well spent. "In a complicated Washington environment, it seemed prudent to hire an expert," he said.

Other lobbyists' clients agreed. "I don't know what has led us to this point as a country," said West of Students in Free Enterprise, "but you definitely seem to need a lobbyist these days."

Bush Cool To Idea To Cut Spending (CHIST)

By Robert Novak

Chicago Sun-Times, March 27, 2006

Before they left town for the St. Patrick's Day recess, 10 U.S. senators gathered around President Bush at the White House to hear him make the case for a line-item veto. But Sen. Jim DeMint, a freshman Republican from South Carolina, had a better idea for Bush: Why not instruct your department heads to ignore the earmarks Congress adds to your budget?

DeMint was not encouraging Bush to take the law into his own hands and defy statutes passed by Congress. A March 6 report by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service said more than 95 percent of all earmarks were not written into law but were merely contained in the reports of congressional committees and legislative managers. "Earmarks that appear in committee reports and the statements of managers do not legally bind agencies," said the report.

The president did not respond to DeMint at the meeting, and that signifies opposition to the idea. Administration officials have flinched from any such confrontation with Congress. But this exercise of executive power by a president who has yet to use his veto would go a long way toward controlling runaway federal spending. In contrast to a dubious quest for a line-item veto, Bush with a brief order could change the climate of spending on Capitol Hill.

Bush has explained that he has not vetoed any spending bills because they generally follow his overall limits even though individual earmarks are unacceptably high. Accordingly, the president has dusted off the line-item veto, which would enable him to kill individual categories of spending, though the Supreme Court in 1998 declared a line-item veto unconstitutional because it cut Congress out of the legislative process. Even if the new version clears its formidable legislative hurdles and actually passes, it would require positive congressional assent to each veto, which might make the whole process unworkable.

A practical alternative was suggested by DeMint on Feb. 16, when Vice Adm. Conrad C. Lautenbacher, administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, testified before the Senate Commerce Committee. DeMint asserted that NOAA and other federal agencies are under no obligation to fund earmarks stuck in congressional reports in the dark of night on Capitol Hill. "I agree that it's not legally required," Lautenbacher replied, "but it is in fact a practice that has been in place for many, many years."

For many, many years, the executive branch has submitted a modest NOAA budget. It is a sham, however, because the budget is annually expanded by congressional earmarks, which this year total 2,600 and exceed $2 billion. Apart from the additional expense, this process ties up the NOAA staff to try to harmonize its budget with what was imposed on them by the lawmakers. Lautenbacher, who has said he does not want this money, has told Congress this is "a very hard budget to execute." Like most department heads, he has made clear he does not want the earmarked money.

Two days after the CRS reported that 95 percent of the earmarks are not binding, five senators -- Republicans John McCain, Tom Coburn and DeMint and Democrats Evan Bayh and Russ Feingold -- wrote the president. On March 9, they urged Bush not to fund the earmarks. "I hope the president does not hesitate to use the power that is already at his disposal," said Coburn.

The informal reaction by the Bush team has been negative. "This would be seen by Congress as sticking them right in the face," one skeptical Cabinet member told one of the five senators. Administration officials talk about "retaliation" by committee chairmen. However, with Republicans disconnecting themselves from an unpopular president and Democrats seeking to make his life miserable, it is difficult to see how the legislative branch could be any more hostile.

Bush might well measure the benefits of bold action. If they are required to submit earmarks for floor action by the Senate and House, the lawmakers' ability to overspend would be diminished. From a political standpoint, DeMint is giving the president the opportunity for a dramatic gesture showing that he really cares about spending. By all appearances, Bush won't take it.

527 Reform May Be Needed, But Not In Lobby Bills (RC)

By Richard Hasen

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Following the recent lobbying scandals involving Jack Abramoff and former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R-Calif.), Congressional Republicans saw a need to enact some form of lobbying reform to keep from hurting the party's chances in the 2006 midterm elections. But as these scandals fade from the headlines, many Republicans appear to be looking for a way to pass "lobbying reform" that appears to be about cleaning up government corruption but really is intended to give Republicans an advantage over Democrats in the next election. The public shouldn't fall for it.

Both House Republicans and Republican presidential hopeful and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) have sought to tie lobbying reform legislation to a regulation of 527 organizations. Because these groups act without coordination with parties and campaigns, and because they don't engage in certain election-related speech, current law allows them to accept unlimited contributions from individuals. The proposed legislation in the House would treat 527s as political committees, thereby limiting 527 contributions from individuals to $5,000 per year, with a total yearly cap of $37,500 on any individual's giving to all such groups as well as other non-party political committees.

Regulating 527s in this manner may or may not make good sense. After all, there is something disquieting about individuals being able to bankroll these independent outfits in hope of influencing the outcome of elections. But there's a good constitutional argument that this regulation may violate the First Amendment rights of these groups and their contributors, because regulation of independent spending may not be justified to prevent corruption of candidates for federal office.

Still, regardless of whether 527 regulation is good policy, it makes no sense to put the 527 regulation into a lobbying reform bill. Democrats, rather than Republicans, have taken the most advantage of these groups, in part because Republican Party committees and candidates have been more effective at raising contributions than their Democratic counterparts have, especially now that the GOP controls essentially all the levers of power in Washington, D.C. It was the $23 million that liberal financier George Soros poured into pro-Democratic 527s during the 2004 election that got Republicans interested in regulating the 527s in the first place.

But placing a 527 measure into a lobbying bill is sure to get the bill enmeshed in partisan controversy. And cynics believe that's the point: Either the bill passes and the Republicans enjoy a double advantage (having taken care of "lobbying reform" while also hobbling a tool that has helped Democrats), or they can blame Democrats for being obstructionist over lobbying reform.

More importantly, 527 reform has absolutely nothing to do with the kinds of scandals that led to the Abramoff or Cunningham deals. Abramoff and Cunningham were involved in the buying or selling of influence within Washington to the highest bidder. Their conduct was barred by current law, and the way to deal with such problems is better enforcement of existing law — current lobbying rules are notoriously underenforced — combined with increased disclosure so that illegal bribery can more easily be detected.

There isn't a 527 in sight of these scandals. Nor are 527s implicated in the larger concerns over how lobbying works in Washington. The public is concerned about lobbyists getting too much access to elected officials, and thus enjoying an unfair advantage in making their case for paying clients.

The way to deal with this concern over unfair access is not to clamp down on 527s. Instead, we should ask why Members of Congress and their staff give such access to lobbyists. Typically, the answer is that the lobbyist can provide something that the Member of Congress wants — access to a private jet, a cushy trip to an exotic location or a bundle of campaign contributions.

To deal with this problem, there needs to be heightened regulation of trips and a limit on the ability of lobbyists to raise and bundle contributions for Members of Congress. Regulating 527s in the guise of lobbying reform is just more politics as usual in Washington.

You Can Lead A Horse To Water (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Well, they almost got their act together. Thrilled to finally be using the word "agenda" in the same breath as "Democratic Party" and buoyed by a crumbling presidency and a corruption-plagued GOP party, Democrats were handed a bummer Friday when an e-mail plotting a news conference to unveil their national security strategy fell into enemy hands.

Republicans were tickled when they intercepted a missive written by Democratic operative Stephanie Cutter seeking law enforcement involvement in the Democrats' covertly planned national security event set for Wednesday.

"We're trying to keep our roll-out a close hold for right now, so press doesn't pick up on it," Cutter wrote in the first paragraph of an e-mail to someone in law enforcement named Andrea. "The element of surprise is everything these days!"

She went on to describe what Democrats would like to convey at their news conference — "as many law enforcement officers as possible to attend and stand on stage. They symbolize safety, competence and security to average Americans. That's extremely important right now, given the record of the current Administration."

Cutter, who recently left Capitol Hill to form the Cutter Media Group, was looking to gather "20 or so" law enforcement officers on stage at Union Station for the event, where Congressional Democratic leaders plan for the first time to formally unveil a strategic presentation on how the party, if it regains control of Congress, would protect the United States against terrorism and other national security threats. Or just call it "How Democrats hope to steal the Republicans' ace in the hole."

According to Cutter's e-mail, Democratic leaders will use Wednesday's event to commit to making implementation of the 9/11 commission's recommendations "our first act when Democrats regain control of the Senate and/or House."

One Senate GOP leadership aide laughed off the Democrats' idea of adopting the 9/11 recommendations. "We've already done all but two or three of the 9/11 [commission] recommendations," the aide said, noting that one of the yet-to-be-adopted recommendations involves doling out federal homeland security aid using a "risk-based" formula.

When the Senate voted last year to implement that very recommendation, "24 Democrats voted against it," the aide said.

But more than finding out about the substance of whatever Democrats have planned, Republicans were just happy that they had a hand in spoiling the surprise. "The Democrats' failure to keep 'the element of surprise' regarding their event is 'dangerously incompetent,'" joked one political GOP aide, in a conspicuous reference to Sen. Debbie Stabenow's (D-Mich.) decision to stand on the Senate floor next to a gigantic sign reading "DANGEROUSLY INCOMPETENT."

Democrats had hoped to keep their national security news conference a secret from their cunning adversaries until today or Tuesday. But Jim Manley, spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), shrugged off the notion of the GOP raining on the Democratic parade, saying, "I'm not sure what advance notice on one event is going to do to help Republicans when they have to defend five years worth of incompetent policies."

As for that e-mail falling into the wrong hands, Manley sighed, "This is the way that this town works. It's an unfortunate mistake."

Speaking of mistakes, Democrats made another one Friday evening when they finally sent out their media advisory for Wednesday's event. House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) office sent the advisory to the press with several e-mails attached at the bottom between Reid's office and Cutter, including one debating the difference between "real security" and "comprehensive real security."

"Draft advisory...wrote it light to leave as little fodder as possible," Reid aide Will Edgar wrote on the first version.

Nope, no fodder here.

Shelby Foot Update. The spokeswoman for Sen. Richard Shelby (R-Ala.) wants us to know that the Senator reports he's "feeling great and getting back to 100 percent" after falling and tearing ligaments in his leg.

HOH reported last week that Shelby was spotted wearing a shoe cast, hobbling out of the Senate Hart Office Building just before recess and hailing a cab all by his wounded lonesome.

A Democratic aide who spotted Shelby had suggested that his staff wasn't taking good care of their wounded boss. But Shelby's spokeswoman, Katie Boyd, who had not gotten her messages in a timely enough manner to respond initially, called Friday to say her boss is a very self-sufficient man. He isn't the high-maintenance type, even when he's hurt.

"The Senator has always been independent, he doesn't need a staffer to hail a cab for him," Boyd said.

Shelby messed up his leg several weeks ago when he was walking down the sidewalk — Boyd wasn't sure exactly where — and stepped into a hole. The good news is, his air cast is off, and he won't need surgery to repair the ligaments.

War Between The Parties. A big-time Civil War buff, Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.) has a print by the eminent Civil War artist Mort Kuntsler hanging in his office. It portrays the Gettysburg battle of Little Round Top, with Col. Josh Chamberlain giving the command "charge" against superior forces.

When visitors come to his office and discussion turns to struggles and uphill battles, one of Israel's little things (we all have our little things) is to point to the painting and say, "My motto in Congress is 'Charge!'"

But recently, according to spokesman Ryan Rudominer, while meeting with a group, Israel changed his tune a bit, saying: "Actually, with an $8 trillion debt, I need to find a new motto."

Sensitive HHS Data Said 'At Risk' (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

Key health, financial, scientific and personal information collected and used by the government for federal programs such as Medicare and Medicaid isn't being adequately protected from fraud and abuse, a government report has found.

The report, highlighted last week by the Government Accountability Office, discovered "significant weaknesses" in the information security at the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) and its Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS). The report said HHS "put at risk the confidentiality, integrity and availability of their sensitive information."

Part of the problem cited in the report, which was completed last month, is that HHS hasn't fully implemented its information security system.

Among the specific deficiencies: access to data was not always restricted when it should have been; anti-virus software wasn't always installed or updated; network protection was inadequate in some areas; and encryption wasn't used when sending certain sensitive information.

There were physical-security problems, too, including broken security cameras in key facilities; 440 persons being granted unrestricted access to a data center even though their jobs didn't require it; and one HHS contractor using a private vehicle and an unlocked box to transport roughly 25,000 Medicare checks over a one-year period.

The GAO investigation was done at the request of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican.

HHS runs about 300 programs, including ones that cover health research, disease prevention, food and drug safety, assistance for preschool programs, child abuse and domestic-violence prevention, substance-abuse prevention and health care coverage -- for the elderly and disabled in Medicare and the low-income in Medicaid.

Medicare and Medicaid offer care to about one in every four Americans.

"Now we're learning that their medical, personal and financial information is vulnerable to fraud and abuse," Mr. Grassley said Thursday after seeing the report.

DOJ_NMG_0021281

"Instead of firewalls to safeguard sensitive data, we have Swiss cheese," he said. Mr. Grassley said the agencies "have to once and for all implement their data-protection programs and put the security back into information security."

HHS defended itself in an official memo that says the GAO report "does not provide an accurate or complete appraisal" of the agency's information-protection efforts. The HHS document, attached to the GAO report, argued that HHS has "layering of safeguards" to protect its information, and says it began a successful departmentwide effort in 2005 to fix weaknesses and deficiencies.

Drug Plan Doesn't Speak Their Language (LAT)

By Rong-gong Lin li

The Los Angeles Times, March 27, 2006

More than a month had gone by, and 81-year-old Lee Sun Hua still didn't have his medication.

In January, a pharmacist had refused to give the Koreatown resident his drugs, erroneously telling Lee he needed his new Medicare drug prescription card. He waited for weeks, and even had a volunteer at a Koreatown nonprofit agency call to request it. But it never came.

Bothered by a chronic stomach ailment, Lee called his Medicare drug plan provider, Blue Cross, two weeks ago to inquire again.

"I don't speak English," he said, reading from a tip sheet prepared by the nonprofit, which spelled out the pronunciation of English phrases using Korean syllables. "Korean, please."

"We don't have any Korean speakers here," came the blunt response, as Lee recalled the conversation. "Does anyone over there speak English?"

If native English speakers are having trouble grasping the new Medicare prescription drug plan, many immigrants with little or no English ability are far worse off. As the May 15 deadline for picking a plan approaches, elderly immigrants are swamping clinics, community centers and pharmacies, unable to read the litany of Medicare-related mailings and or even ask questions about their new plans.

"It's driving them nuts!" said Victor Law, owner of Alpha Pharmacy in Alhambra, who has spent countless hours helping many Chinese-speaking seniors. "Oftentimes they have a whole bunch of letters in their hand and we have to review them and explain to them what is going on."

Some seniors who have lived and worked in the United States for years resent feeling excluded from a national program. The problem appears to be not just Medicare, the government health program for the elderly and the disabled, but many of the private plans that contract with it to provide services.

"Medicare Part D is run by the taxes that I paid by working hard when I was younger," Lee said through a translator. The retired facilities manager for a Korean-language school, who has lived in the United States for 20 years, added: "I had a hope that the United States would deal with my case appropriately because I have paid my taxes appropriately."

Although millions of beneficiaries have obtained prescriptions with no trouble, the program got off to a stumbling start in January after several hundred thousand patients ran into billing problems at the pharmacy counter. In many cases, pharmacists could not determine whether a person was covered. In others, patients were charged too much.

Complaints about language barriers have arisen across the country, but the issue is particularly acute in California, where the primary language of one in five residents — and about the same fraction of low-income seniors — is not English, said Jeanne Finberg, a California-based attorney for the National Senior Citizens Law Center.

"The federal government has really failed this population," Finberg said. "How outrageous is it that so many of the Medicare beneficiaries are unable to understand any part of this program?"

Medicare officials said last week that they have been doing outreach at many senior centers, including those that serve non-English-speakers. In addition, they have helped fund nonprofit groups that offer toll-free call lines catering to those who speak Spanish, Chinese, Vietnamese and Korean.

"We have room for improvement," said Anne Avery, health insurance specialist for Medicare. "We are just starting a lot more to find out what vehicles we can use to reach out to these people."

Companies providing drug prescription plans under Medicare must accommodate non-English-speaking callers, said Peter Ashkenaz, a Medicare spokesman. And when calling Medicare directly, a beneficiary can request a translator through the toll-free line, (800) MEDICARE (633-4227).

But the request generally needs to be made in English — which stops some immigrants cold. Except for an option to press two for Spanish, callers must listen to an English menu of options — with no hint of how to reach a Korean or other language operator. There's nothing to suggest that interpreters are available.

Law, the Alhambra pharmacist, said he was baffled by why Medicare didn't directly set up language-specific phone lines.

If that had been done, non-English-speaking beneficiaries "wouldn't be so frustrated," he said. For now, "they don't even know where to go for help."

One day last week, several elderly women walked into the nonprofit Korean Resource Center in Los Angeles' Koreatown, each intent on getting help with her Medicare drug benefit.

Most had simple questions. Amy Chin, 73, a retired dry-cleaning shop owner, wanted to confirm with her plan how much her medication would cost. The Koreatown resident was unable to do this on her own. "I tried," she said in Korean. "I waited a long time, but I can't do it."

The resource center's goal is not to simply provide interpretation services, said health-access director Shannon Lee, but to help seniors learn to manage their drug plans independently.

With a reporter and Korean center staffer listening in, Chin again called up her plan, Humana, hoping to reach an interpreter. She reviewed the advice provided to her in writing by the center: Continue pressing zero until you get to a live person. Then say, "Korean, please."

Chin waited 15 minutes, hung up, called back and waited half an hour more before an interpreter came on the line, and that was only after the center volunteer intervened to make the request again.

Kyong Lee's call was much shorter. The 65-year-old Downey resident, who wanted to get her drug prescription card number, reached a Unicare representative within minutes.

"We cannot help you," the representative said, loudly and slowly. "Sadly, we do not have an interpreter's line .... Thank you for calling Unicare."

Though the Korean center helped Lee to finally get answers to her questions, she was livid. "My heart was beating out of my chest out of frustration," she said in Korean. "I felt closed off. I felt disabled."

She later signed up for a prescription drug plan through another company that offers better access to interpreters.

A spokesman for WellPoint, the parent company of Unicare and Blue Cross, said the company's policy is to promptly provide interpreters when they are requested.

"That's not the way it's supposed to work," said Robert Alaniz, a Thousand Oaks-based vice president of corporate communications, after hearing about the experiences of Lee Sun Hua and Kyong Lee.

He said supervisors at call centers were reminded Friday of the policy, after The Times inquired.

Alaniz said his company has interpreters for several languages on hand, and for other languages, operators can call on a live interpretation service.

"We'd like to apologize," Alaniz said. "We're going to do anything we can to shore up those capabilities so people who do not speak English do not have to go through that experience again."

The experience is typical of many plans, said the Korean center's Shannon Lee.

Sometimes the operators "get fed up and say, can you at least speak a little English?" Lee said. "They don't want to go through the hassle of finding a translator."

Sometimes even interpreters have difficulty translating Medicare concepts if they're unfamiliar with the program, said David Lipschutz, an attorney at California Health Advocates.

For now, nonprofit groups such as the Korean Resource Center are trying to fill the gap.

But some of the center's Korean-speaking seniors remain wary of Medicare and its plan providers.

In Korean, Chin said: "It doesn't seem it's possible for me to call Medicare and the insurance company at home, by myself."

The Republican (MA), March 26, 2006

SPRINGFIELD - Among his duties, Jim Towey is an adviser to President Bush.

But as he told an audience of about 400 men yesterday in the auditorium at Cathedral High School, he begins his workday communicating with a more powerful being.

"When I get in my office, my first appointment is with the Lord to pray," Towey said.

Towey, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives since February 2002, was a keynote speaker yesterday at "Grow In Holiness," the fourth annual Springfield Diocesan Catholic Men's Conference. Towey spoke for about 45 minutes, spending much of his time reflecting on the late Mother Teresa, for whom he had worked for a dozen years.

Towey said the diminutive nun, who became known worldwide for helping the poor and the ill, was a person of prayer. Recalling a phrase used by Mother Teresa, Towey told the audience: "If you guys are too busy to pray, you're too busy."

Towey, 49, a lawyer who used to work on Capitol Hill, also said that prayer provides important instruction for life.

"Prayer teaches us that we can't go it alone," he said.

Towey met Mother Teresa in 1985, when he was working as legal counsel and legislative director for former U.S. Sen. Mark Hatfield. He said he had a letter of introduction from the senator when he went to meet the Nobel Peace Prize winner in Calcutta, India, and he was almost immediately put to work helping a man suffering from contagious scabies.

Towey was not prepared for such a reception, but the experience was life changing. He later spent a year working in one of Mother Teresa's missions in Mexico. He also spent a year volunteering at an AIDS house in Washington, D.C., where he met his wife, Mary.

Mother Teresa was beatified by Pope John Paul II in 2003 and may gain sainthood one day. Towey said she was a woman devoted to the mother of Jesus.

"I think Mother Teresa is the most Mary-like person since Mary," he said.

As for himself, Towey made it clear he is simply mortal. "Believe me," he said, "I'm a sinner."

The conference was begun to challenge Catholic men to make a deeper commitment to their faith, and Towey said the experience could be transforming.

"This day could be a day of change in your life. It really could," he said.

Towey may be a White House employee, but he attended the conference on his own time.

"This is Jim Towey, private citizen, who happens to work at the White House," he said before he addressed the audience.

The Most Rev. Timothy A. McDonnell, bishop of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Springfield, was unable to attend the conference. McDonnell was in Rome, where Boston Archbishop Sean O'Malley was installed as a cardinal.

All Quiet In The West Wing, But More Change In The East (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON

Well, at least one part of the White House is heeding calls for new blood. Not only is the pastry chef quitting this week, but a close look at the first lady's office also shows that she has replaced her entire high command after five years in charge of the East Wing.

Laura Bush is now on her second chief of staff, Anita McBride. She is on her second projects and policy director, Sonya Medina. She is on her third press secretary, Susan Whitson. She is on her second social secretary, Lea Berman.

On the residence staff, she is on her second executive chef, Cristeta Comerford. Not least, she is on a search for her third pastry chef now that Thaddeus R. DuBois has made Mrs. Bush his last strawberry-rhubarb fool, the dessert at last week's White House dinner celebrating Ben Franklin.

Ms. Whitson, who has been Mrs. Bush's press secretary for a little more than a year, attributed the changes in the 20-person staff to natural turnover, not disarray or misery. "I think there were a lot of different circumstances," Ms. Whitson said.

As is typical, many of the changes occurred at the end of the first term, when people retired or left to make more money in corporate America.

But it is also true that Mrs. Bush fired her first chef, Walter Scheib III, who said he had failed to satisfy the first lady's "stylistic requirements." It is also true that Mrs. Bush's first social secretary, Cathy Fenton, branded the East Wing environment as "volatile" after she left the White House.

As for Mr. DuBois, he said he was leaving his $120,000 post in the tiny White House kitchen to make confections of mass consumption at his old job, the Borgata casino and hotel in Atlantic City. As executive pastry chef of the billion-dollar, 11-restaurant resort, Mr. DuBois said he would earn almost double his current salary, which is already more than that of many pastry chefs at the finest New York restaurants. (For that matter, Mr. DuBois currently makes only $40,000 less than the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley.)

Mr. DuBois, who secured the White House job after making a warm peach and raspberry croustade and a baseball player of spun sugar for the president at a tryout dinner, has not talked publicly of any unusual drama surrounding his exit. But in an interview with The New York Times this month he displayed a certain sensitivity to Roland Mesnier, the previous pastry chef known for his masterpieces (he never made the same dessert twice) who was at the White House for 25 years.

"Roland's name always comes up in stories about me, and it's always negative to me and positive to Roland," Mr. DuBois said.

In the meantime, Mrs. Bush's approval ratings are at record highs (82 percent of Americans approve of the job she is doing as first lady, according to a recent CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll) while her husband's are at record lows.

Mr. Bush, as every Republican kibitzer in the capital knows, has so far resisted his own party's advice to shake up his staff, even as he has not ruled out bringing in a Washington sage to soothe a Congress that feels disrespected and ignored.

This is not to say that changing the West Wing guard would make Mr. Bush's poll numbers match those of his wife, or that the East and West Wings are comparable. Mrs. Bush's staff handles goodwill trips overseas and Easter egg rolls, not Iraq and Iran, and operates with far less scrutiny than that given to her husband's top aides.

Still, Republicans said that Mrs. Bush's changes were a lesson in the need for reinforcements.

"The first lady's staff works harder," said Sheila Tate, Nancy Reagan's first press secretary. "They have no support, so they have to do everything themselves. It really isn't unusual to have burnout in the East Wing."

Mrs. Bush's staff, others said, was more typical. "What you're seeing in the East Wing is normal turnover, and what you're seeing in the West Wing is abnormal," said David R. Gergen, a professor of public service at the John F. Kennedy School of Government and a veteran of the Nixon, Ford and Reagan White Houses who President Bill Clinton brought into the West Wing as an experienced Washington player in 1993. "It's an aberration to have a team stay as long as this one has."

All the calls for new blood, Mr. Gergen said, are most likely making the stubborn Mr. Bush dig in under the pressure. "A man never benefits from going to a psychiatrist if the only reason he's there is because of his wife," Mr. Gergen said. "You have to want to change from within."

While Mrs. Bush hinted in an interview with Larry King broadcast on CNN last week that she had weighed in with the president on staff changes, too, she said nothing about any specific advice. She also said nothing about Mr. DuBois.

Not so Christopher Buckley, who wrote the book "Thank You for Smoking," now a movie, as well as "No Way to Treat a Lady," a satiric novel about a first lady unjustly accused and tried for killing her husband.

"The fact that the pastry chef is leaving will send an important signal not only to the Congress but to Al Qaeda and indeed the entire world community that Mr. Bush means business," Mr. Buckley said.

Falling Stock (USNEWS)

By Kenneth T. Walsh

U.S. News and World Report, April 3, 2006

As he toured the seemingly endless rows of houses flattened by Hurricane Katrina in Gautier, Miss., something caught President Bush's eye. He leaned down and picked up from the debris what turned out to be a wedding photograph of a young couple and their family. "This is what it's all about," Bush told an aide. "So many emotions and history got lost here." Yet Bush said the picture gave him a sense that, somehow, life would go on, and things would eventually get back to normal. "You can't be president and always be down," Bush observed later.

That kind of optimism is part of Bush's character. It's also part of the larger code of the chief executive officer by which he governs. "He is an M.B.A. president," says Carolyn Thompson, coauthor of The Leadership Genius of George W. Bush. "He is doing a bunch of things that he would do if he ran Chrysler or Joe's Pizza." He sets the goals. He surrounds himself with loyalists. He delegates large amounts of responsibility. He is disciplined in working toward his objectives and in explaining them to the public.

Yet Bush's CEO presidency has fallen on hard times. Over the past year, he has endured two management disasters that undermined public faith in his competence: his administration's weak response to Hurricane Katrina, which erased his image as a strong leader, and its botched effort at persuading Congress to accept a deal authorizing a Dubai-owned company to operate six U.S. seaports. In these cases, he seems to have delegated too much authority, lost track of what was happening, and failed to ask the right questions. White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card refused to "point fingers" but said Bush is correcting what went wrong and the administration will do better in the future.

The war with Iraq provides another example of how his CEO style has gone off track. After Bush decided to invade, he ordered Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and the Pentagon to carry out the mission as they saw fit. Critics fault Bush for blindly following the recommendations of Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney and not sending enough troops to Iraq at the outset of the war, and then underestimating the strength of the anti-American insurgency. "It's a classic problem of a CEO adopting a preconceived plan and failing to modify it to deal with reality," says a former White House adviser to Bush's father, George H. W. Bush.

Staying the course. More than 60 percent of Americans now say the country is headed in the wrong direction, according to the latest NBC News/ Wall Street Journal poll, and 58 percent disapprove of Bush's job performance. He has begun an aggressive PR campaign to boost support for the war, which is the biggest drag on his presidency, and is considering adding a veteran Washington insider to bolster his staff.

Despite the problems, Bush is hanging tough. "I have not seen a change in the president's leadership style and the management tools he uses," Card told U.S. News. Card and other Bush confidants say the chief executive is applying the hands-off style he learned at Harvard Business School, where he earned a master's degree in business administration in 1975, and also the methods that worked for him as an oilman, as managing partner of the Texas Rangers baseball team, and, later, as governor of Texas.

In A Charge to Keep, his autobiography, Bush defined his governing philosophy. "I put a lot of faith and trust in my staff," he wrote. "I look for people who are smart and loyal and who share my conservative philosophy. My job is to set the agenda ... and then delegate much of the process to them. The final decision often rests with me, but their judgment has a big influence." He also admitted, "I am loyal to my friends, so it is sometimes hard to say no."

Friends. Perhaps that's the problem. "Personal loyalty plays an enormous role in this administration," Rutgers political scientist Ross Baker told U.S. News. "One of the things a CEO has to do is make tough personnel decisions. He hasn't made any of them." Baker says Bush, more than most presidents, is "dependent on personal friends and confidants . ... It's almost tribal."

Bush isn't the first president to adopt the pyramidal CEO style. Dwight Eisenhower combined the chain-of-command system he learned as a career soldier with the hierarchies prized by business executives whom he respected. Ike has been derided for delegating too much power, but some historians, including Princeton's Fred Greenstein, say the unassuming Eisenhower was more involved in day-to-day operations than he let on in public. Greenstein called it the "hidden-hand presidency."

Ronald Reagan was also known for delegating and allowed a handful of powerful aides to manage his government for two terms. He had a more clearly defined conservative philosophy than Bush does, developed over years in public life, and it was thus relatively easy for his advisers to devise policy in keeping with the vision. Reagan was also more adept at explaining his views to the country. But Reagan's hands-off approach produced the Iran-contra arms-for-hostages scandal that almost destroyed his presidency--a lesson in the perils of disengagement.

By contrast, Democratic presidents such as Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton have tended to adopt a less hierarchical style of management. Since they believed in a larger government role in society, they tended to take more personal interest in the details of policy.

Mind guards. Each style carries with it potential pitfalls. "The problem with the CEO style of management," says a Republican who advises the White House, "is there has to be delegation, and it's easy to let it slip too far." Critics say the small group of senior aides who've been given lots of authority may be trying to do too much. These officials--Card, counselor Dan Bartlett, Deputy Chief of Staff and political strategist Karl Rove, Deputy Chief of Staff Joe Hagin--"are also President Bush's personal assistants and spend a great deal of time tending to him ... so the management is weak," says the adviser. Political scientist Baker says these aides seem to be "mind guards" for the president, rather than policymakers, administrators, or thinkers.

And aside from his inner circle, Bush is said to be distant from the rest of his staff, jeopardizing morale. Just as important, many members of Congress complain that they don't get their phone calls returned or their ideas considered in the West Wing. Bush, they say, doesn't reach out to them as other chief executives have done. He rarely invites them over for dinner, to watch a movie, or to attend a reception or party. These are small gestures, but such social interactions lubricate the governmental machinery. In any case, Card argues that Bush consults privately with more nongovernment friends and civic leaders than outsiders realize.

When fellow Republicans complain that Bush is aloof and that the White House staff needs to listen more, the president and his aides respond that things are just fine. "They think raising money for Republican candidates is enough," says a prominent Bush ally who has recently turned critical of the West Wing. "Their attitude is, 'Quit your bitching. We raised $1 million for you.' They won't admit their mistakes or their problems." This kind of hubris rankles even Bush's friends. But there was no course at Harvard Business School in how to make nice with Washington politicians, and no tradition in the Texas oilfields of swallowing one's pride.

Grading The M.B.A. President (USNEWS)

By Kim Clark

U.S. News and World Report, March 27, 2006

Whether they love him or hate him, management gurus and business executives agree on one thing about President Bush: His leadership style has been shaped by his 1975 Harvard M.B.A.

Bush's rigorous scheduling and message discipline, hands-off management style, and reliance on loyal longtime associates are all characteristics of B-schoolers. And many of the first M.B.A. president's management techniques represent a welcome change from those of, for example, his punctuality-challenged predecessor, who was trained as an attorney. But some business leaders worry that Bush may not be applying some of B-school's most important lessons and may be suffering instead from all-too-typical M.B.A. flaws, such as overconfidence.

"He seems to pride himself on M.B.A. characteristics, like delegating to his key people and saying he holds them accountable for results," says Roger Enrico, who does not have an M.B.A. but served as CEO of PepsiCo in the late 1990s and is now chairman of DreamWorks Animation. But Enrico, a big Republican contributor in 2000, says that the continuing worsening of the U.S. trade and budget deficits and the violence in Iraq have made him worry that Bush isn't holding his aides sufficiently accountable. If his own subordinates delivered such disappointing results, Enrico says, he would do some firing: "It is time to change the team."

Execution. Others say that while Bush is masterful at creating and selling his vision, he seems to struggle with execution. Jeffrey Sonnenfeld, founder of the Yale School of Management's Chief Executive Leadership Institute, says that when he taught at the Harvard Business School in the 1980s, 50 percent of every exam's grade was determined by the student's implementation plan. Sonnenfeld, a Democrat, says he would give Bush "an F for contingency planning."

And Jeffrey Pfeffer, a Stanford management professor, says the mistakes he sees Bush making "are extremely typical of those being made in corporate America." Pfeffer, also a Democrat, says Bush, who maintains an unwavering commitment to military action in Iraq, reminds him of other corporate leaders whose faith in their own abilities and theories blinded them to legitimate criticism. "Look back at Enron," says Pfeffer of the energy trading company once led by Jeffrey Skilling, who received his Harvard M.B.A. four years after Bush." They said the people who were criticizing them didn't understand" their complex accounting. Bush, he says, reminds him of business school graduates who too often try to "BS their way through" instead of "facing hard facts and continually trying to learn and adjust."

Bush Accepts Reds' Pitch (CINE)

By Howard Wilkinson

The Cincinnati Enquirer, March 25, 2006

President Bush will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday.

Bush will take the mound shortly before the 2:10 p.m. start of the Reds' game against the Chicago Cubs on April 3.

"The president looks forward to throwing out the first pitch," White House spokesman Blair Jones said.

Bob Castellini, the Reds' new chief executive officer, has been a Bush supporter, raising more than $100,000 for the president's 2004 re-election campaign.

Last month, Castellini was among those who greeted the president at a private home in Indian Hill, where Bush attended a $1.1 million fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine.

DeWine, a Reds season-ticket holder since the early days of Riverfront Stadium, will be in his seat on the mezzanine level for Opening Day.

President Bush won't be the first of his family to throw out a first pitch on Opening Day. Three years ago, at the inaugural game of Great American Ball Park, his father, former President George H.W. Bush, did the honors.

Having a president in the ball park will mean extra security, and if it is anything like the 2004 Opening Day, when Vice President Dick Cheney tossed out the ball, fans can expect some delays getting to their seats.

When Cheney came to Opening Day, fans with tickets in the lower terrace level, from first base to third base, had to pass through metal detectors to get to their seats, in addition to the usual bag check outside the ballpark's turnstiles.

The extra security meant that some got to their seats after the real "first pitch" of the game.

President Nixon came to Cincinnati in July, 1970, Riverfront Stadium's inaugural season, to throw out the first pitch at the All-Star Game.

Last year, President Bush threw out the ceremonial first pitch in Washington, D.C., for the first home game of the Washington Nationals.

Pondering Alternatives To The Central Office (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

Hot desking. Hoteling. Virtual office.

Welcome to the future of federal work -- "alternative workplace arrangements," or AWA, in the government's jargon.

When it comes to AWA, most of the attention is focused on telecommuting, which allows federal employees to work at least one day a week from home or from a regional telework center.

By most accounts, the government can do more to promote telecommuting and cut down on traffic congestion and auto pollution in the Washington region. Overall, only 7.7 percent of the federal workforce telecommutes. But the participation rate jumps to 19 percent when measured by the number of jobs that agencies have declared suitable for telecommuting.

Despite "slow and steady incremental improvement in telework participation" since 2000, "19 percent is not good enough, based on all the information we have," said Stanley F. Kaczmarczyk, a deputy associate administrator at the General Services Administration.

GSA, which oversees federal telework policies with the Office of Personnel Management, recently published a bulletin in the Federal Register reminding federal agencies that laws from 1996, 2000 and 2002 encourage alternatives to the office cubicle.

"It seemed natural to me that this is the time for GSA to publish guidelines on AWA," Kaczmarczyk said.

DOJ_NMG_0021288

Two years ago, the Bush administration adopted a goal of disposing of $9 billion in unneeded property by 2009. The idea was to create some pressure on agencies to get rid of office space they no longer can justify, in part because maintenance and operations costs continue to rise.

Congress in 1996 approved legislation that directed agencies planning to buy or lease office space or other facilities to first check to see if alternative arrangements could meet their work requirements. Starting in 2000, Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.) focused on federal telecommuting and used his chairmanship of a House Appropriations subcommittee to spur agencies to expand telework opportunities.

Under GSA's definition, AWA includes telecommuting, hoteling, hot desking, virtual offices and "other distributed workplace arrangements," according to the bulletin.

Hot desking, also known as free address or touchdown workstations, usually involves employees who work in one or more places and claim a desk in the office on a first-come, first-served basis.

Hoteling requires employees to make a reservation in advance for the day they will need a desk in the office.

The virtual office typically involves employees who collaborate and carry out work activities via a computer network. They can be electronic co-workers even though some may be at home, in a satellite office, at a hotel or at an airport.

Such work arrangements suggest that large organizations can save money on office space and equipment if they do not require every employee to be in the building every day. The approach requires a more flexible management system, and previous studies have shown that federal managers resist telecommuting because of worries they might not be able to handle surges in workload or cover their hours of operation with a dispersed staff.

The GSA bulletin offers agencies a helpful guide to the do's and don'ts of alternative work arrangements. It makes clear that agencies can provide new or surplus equipment to telecommuters "as long as it is clear that the equipment continues to belong to the government."

In addition, the bulletin says, agencies may pay to install telephone lines and necessary equipment, and pay monthly charges, "in any private residence of an employee who has been authorized to work at home."

Kaczmarczyk said a study on the costs of technology involved in telecommuting is underway and should be finished later this year.New Job Corps Director

Esther R. Johnson , a Labor Department executive, has been named national director of the Office of Job Corps. She becomes the first African American woman to head the Job Corps in the program's 41-year history, the department said.

Starting today, the Job Corps will be a part of the office of the Labor Department secretary, as required by a fiscal 2006 appropriations law, the department said. The Job Corps, with 122 centers across the country, serves more than 650,000 disadvantaged young people each year.

Prior to her appointment, Johnson served as administrator for the Office of Performance and Technology in the Employment and Training Administration at Labor. She joined the department in 1990 as an unemployment insurance specialist.Retirement

Kay Frances Dolan , deputy chief human capital officer at the Homeland Security Department, will retire March 31 after 35 years of federal service.

Dolan has been with the department since its formation in 2003 and played a key role in designing its new personnel system, MaxHR. She also served as a top personnel expert at the Treasury Department, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Office of Personnel Management. She received a presidential distinguished rank award in 2004.

D.C. Style: Brooks Brothers Cowboy

It doesn't take much to start a heated debate in Washington, but a tussle over the proper combo of pants and cowboy boots? Giddyap. It started weeks ago when we ran into South Dakota Sen. John Thune, tall and handsome in his black boots and cuffed suit pants. Very urban cowboy. But are cuffs right with boots? Sure, he says. Thune's not alone. Texas Sen. John Cornyn likes cuffed pinstripe trousers with his handmade boots. Fellow Texan Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison even wears boots sometimes. But she defers judgment on the fashion issue. "As far as with suits, that is above my pay grade!" At the White House, President Bush and his Texas staff like to swagger in their roper boots, sometimes with cuffed pants. "West Wing Texans," confides a Bushie, can "go both ways--cuffs or no cuffs--with their boots."

But others say them's fighting words. Virginia Sen. George Allen heads that posse. He wore boots as a boy and has worn them in politics ever since a consultant told him to switch to wingtips in the only campaign he lost. Why no cuffs? "They catch all sort of junk, like grass and burrs," he tells us. To find out who's right, we turn to Brooks Brothers Fashion Director Glen Hoffs. "A cuffed trouser is truly a traditional statement, and anyone who is wearing a cowboy boot in lieu of a dress shoe is definitely breaking with tradition," he says. "My recommendation would be no cuff on a trouser that's being worn with a boot."

He Takes a Licking, Keeps on Ticking

We have proof that White House Chief of Staff Andy Card isn't tired, despite what the critics say about his six years at the president's side. Turns out he wants to be at his desk so bad that he'll play injured. Card often mountain bikes with President Bush. It normally goes well, but on March 11 he crashed. "I'm OK," he chirped, hopping right back on his ride. He even went biking the next day with the prez. But by Tuesday, March 14, he felt a little pain in his left arm; a visit to the doctor revealed a bruised left wrist and a fractured elbow. Of course, he went right back to work--but only after his left arm was put in a splint.

Tony the Tiger in Khakis and Polo

Would Tony the Tiger wear pink? We'll find out this week when Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, former head of Kellogg's, helps preppy fashion giant Ralph Lauren open his new store in Tokyo. We're told that Gutierrez will show up wearing a Polo tie, but we don't know the color. The visit is more than just an administration bid to promote U.S. investment overseas. Turns out the two share a hardscrabble past: Both are the sons of immigrants who started small--Gutierrez selling cereal out of his car and Lauren selling ties at Brooks Brothers. "It's Tony the Tiger meets Mr. Polo," says a Commerce insider.

When Younger Is Not Always Better

There's one place where young people aren't being heralded as the saviors of tomorrow: the CIA. Seems almost half of the agency's analysts have less than three years of experience, and the youth bulge is especially acute in the Near East and South Asia divisions. "In an area where Nebuchadnezzar is recent history," frets John Kringen, head of the Directorate of Intelligence, "this is not a good thing." Kringen rarely speaks out, so that makes his comments to an audience of former intelligence officials especially bleak. But there are no easy answers. With the agency on a hiring binge to overcome a Clinton-era hiring freeze, Kringen says it will take five to seven years--"maybe 10"--to correct the shortcomings.

One Newt--and Nation--Under God

God rules! says Newt Gingrich, and he's written a new book to spell out what he means. Titled The Creator's Gifts: Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness, the former House speaker's book makes the case that the Bill of Rights and Constitution came from God. What's more, he wants people to recognize that everything they hold dear comes from a higher power. "The good things of life are from God," explains Gingrich's publisher, Mark Gilroy of Integrity House. The book by the potential 2008 GOP presidential candidate is out this summer and includes an unusual insert: a guide to God in Washington buildings like the Supreme Court.

Canada's More Than Molson, Eh?

He had heard all the weird stories before, but when then Canadian Ambassador Frank McKenna was whipsawed during a C-SPAN appearance by an Arkansas woman who read a litany of misconceptions about the neighbors up north, he went into action. "Do Canadians have a way to respond to this?" he asked press aide Bernard Etzinger in the car back to the embassy. "We should." Prompted by his C-SPAN experience, the embassy recently created Connect2Canada, a website where ex-pats in the United States tell stories that dispel the myths and poke fun at some Americanisms, like the beer. It's just one part of a broader effort to expose America to the serious side of Canada. The embassy is also placing ads in the Washington Metro system that highlight the nation's military involvement in Iraq.

teaches a course that suggests alternatives to guns and bombs, like psychological warfare and public relations. During a recent visit, we learned that Schmitt has his students test strategies on the Red Coats' move against Sam Adams and John Hancock, an act that helped spark the Revolutionary War. His question: "Could Sam Adams and John Hancock have been discredited by nonmilitary actions? Could they have looked at nonkinetic ways to address the Colonies' grievances? "Think about it: Instead of a refreshing Sam Adams, a tepid Boddingtons might be our favorite microbrew.

Judicial Review (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

Everyone deserves a break, even the U.S. Senate. But enough already. It's been two months since Samuel Alito was confirmed to the Supreme Court and it's past time Senate Republicans got back to work confirming appeals-court judges. They won't have 55 seats forever.

Or perhaps even after November 7. Judges are a key issue for the GOP's base, who could stay home on Election Day rather than turn out for Republicans who shilly-shally about confirming President Bush's nominees. There are 17 vacancies on the appeals bench, including nine pending nominations. They deserve to be filled as soon as possible before the summer recess.

An excellent place to start would be to finally vote on Terrence Boyle, whom Mr. Bush has named to the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Boyle was in Mr. Bush's original group of appeals-court nominees on May 9, 2001, after having failed to get a vote when he was nominated a decade earlier by the President's father. Judge Boyle, who has served on the federal bench for 22 years, had a hearing more than a year ago and was voted out of the Judiciary Committee in June. His plight is similar to that of William Myers, whose confirmation hearing for the Ninth Circuit also took place more than a year ago.

Majority Leader Bill Frist's delay in scheduling the Boyle and Myers votes is understandable -- up to a point. Neither was part of the no-filibuster deal struck last spring by the bipartisan gang of 14 that paved the way for the confirmations of contentious candidates Janice Rogers Brown, Priscilla Owen and William Pryor. Next the Senate became occupied with the nominations of John Roberts and Justice Alito.

Neither nominee is controversial enough to trigger the no-filibuster deal's "extraordinary circumstances" exemption. Judge Boyle's biggest liability is that he once worked for conservative ex-Senator Jesse Helms. Mr. Myers is opposed by Democrats who don't like Mr. Bush's environmental policies, which Mr. Myers implemented as an Interior Department lawyer. But he's popular with Republicans from Western states, not least for his quip that the federal government's domination of Western land is akin to "the tyrannical actions of King George." Both nominees would probably be confirmed by bipartisan majorities.

There are also seven appeals-court nominees awaiting action in the Judiciary Committee, including two -- Brett Kavanaugh and William Haynes -- whose nominations have been languishing for years. Mr. Haynes's chances are iffy since, as general counsel of the Pentagon, he has had run-ins with Republicans John McCain and Lindsey Graham. A third, Judge Henry Saad, withdrew his nomination last week under Senate pressure.

But that's all the more reason to move on Mr. Kavanaugh, who is currently White House staff secretary but whose previous incarnation as an aide to then-Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr left him radioactive for at least one unidentified Democratic Senator. In January, this secret Senator (could she have a husband named Bill?) blocked the Senate from exercising the routine courtesy of carrying over Mr. Kavanaugh's nomination, which had technically expired at the end of last year.

Mr. Bush promptly re-nominated him, for the third time. Mr. Kavanaugh was first nominated to the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals in July of 2003 and later in February of 2005, but again failed to get a vote. He had a hearing in April of 2004, and we hope Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter will resist Democratic demands for a new one.

Of the remaining five nominees awaiting action in Judiciary, Randy Smith is taking fire from Dianne Feinstein. Judge Smith's sin is to hail from Idaho, and the California Democrat says the Ninth Circuit seat rightfully belongs to a Californian even though the man he would succeed is also from Idaho. Meanwhile, there are three other vacancies on the Ninth Circuit; all are deemed judicial emergencies.

We guess we should be happy that no one is talking about filibusters these days. This time last year, the fight over the Democrats' unprecedented use of the judicial filibuster was coming to a head and Republicans were threatening to change

Senate rules to prohibit its use. The single biggest accomplishment of the Senate last year was breaking the filibusters to c onfirm a string of highly qualified candidates for the appeals courts and then going on to confirm two Supreme Court nominees.

The advice-and-consent clause of the Constitution gives the Senate the duty to vet all federal judicial nominees. Now it's time for the remaining nominees to have the up-or-down floor votes they deserve.

Economic Prognosticator Sees 'minefield Of Risks' Ahead (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, March 27, 2006

Allen Sinai, president of Decision Economics, says the U.S. economy is in good shape this year. But when he looks at the longer-term outlook, the picture is much more murky.

"Americans are troubled about the long run," Sinai says. "I can feel good about the year. … But I, too, remain uneasy about the longer run."

Sinai is worth listening to. He was the most accurate forecaster of the 45 economists surveyed each quarter last year by USA TODAY. Sinai, 66, also came in first place when USA TODAY first honored the top forecaster three years ago.

In the near term, Sinai says the U.S. economy is "in an entrenched and very solid expansion."

But looking to the future, there is a "minefield of risks" that threatens the economy, Sinai says. He names the budget deficit, rising health care costs, pension problems and the war in Iraq, to name a few.

He's also concerned lawmakers in Washington, facing an electorate that has become increasingly concerned about the growing influence of China on the world stage, will start a confrontation with the Asian nation.

That could lead to a trade war that will hurt the U.S. economy, which has become dependent on Chinese imports and on China as an outpost of U.S. manufacturing. Such a battle could hurt the stock market, he says.

The global economy is undergoing a "seismic shift of unprecedented proportions," with more economic power shifting to Asia, particularly China and India, he says.

Such an adjustment may make the dollar and other U.S. investments less attractive.

"The outlook for the dollar looks bleak," he says.

Sinai has a bachelor's degree from the University of Michigan and a doctorate from Northwestern University.

This is the third year USA TODAY has paired with the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta to recognize the most accurate forecaster. Only one person, Briefing.com chief economist Timothy Rogers, has been in the top 10 all three years.

Get Ready For No. 15 In A Series At The Fed (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

When Alan Greenspan became chairman of the Federal Reserve more than 18 years ago, his first action upon taking the black leather seat at the head of the Fed's huge oak conference table was to raise interest rates. Now it is Ben S. Bernanke's turn.

Today, Mr. Bernanke will convene his first meeting of the Fed's policy makers, joining the other Fed governors and the presidents of the Fed's regional banks in a two-day session that is all but certain to end tomorrow afternoon with another quarter-point rise in short-term interest rates, the 15th consecutive increase.

That will bring the critical rate the Fed controls to 4.75 percent, up from 1 percent in June 2004, when Mr. Greenspan started the process of steadily increasing borrowing costs. Many analysts expect Mr. Bernanke and his colleagues to raise the rate yet again in May, by another quarter of a point.

"They all really want to project a sense of continuity with Greenspan," said Tom Schlesinger, executive director of the Financial Markets Center, "and they are going to err on the side of cautiousness if that is what it takes to do this."

DOJ_NMG_0021292

That caution is now ingrained. Starting with Paul A. Volcker in the late 1970's, new Fed chairmen have come into office determined to establish their credibility as inflation fighters. But today, there are few signs that Fed officials are acutely worried about an outburst of inflation.

High oil costs have not translated into upward pressure on wages and prices. A weakening housing market provides another measure of restraint. But the biggest change since 1987, when Mr. Greenspan took over as chairman, is the increasingly global supply of labor and merchandise. This supply helps to alleviate shortages in this country, and in doing so dampens inflation.

Fed officials recognize the shift. "The growing capacity of foreign countries to supply goods and services to the U.S. market has impacted the structure of wages and the bargaining power of workers," Janet L. Yellen, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, said in a recent speech.

But so far Ms. Yellen, like most others at the central bank, remains reluctant to translate this recognition into a new policy approach. "There are good reasons to doubt that such factors are sufficient to sever the usual link between labor market slack and wage and price pressures," she added.

Indeed, some Wall Street forecasters are already warning that the present 4.8 percent unemployment rate effectively constitutes full employment, giving workers here — despite all the low-wage foreigners who are eagerly producing goods for Americans — leverage to bargain for higher wages. According to this view, companies will raise prices to cover the higher labor cost and a wage-price spiral may ensue.

"Inflation pressures are slowly building," Jason Rotenberg, a senior investment associate at Bridgewater Associates, said in a newsletter last week, citing as one reason labor markets that "go from being roughly balanced to tight."

Although Mr. Bernanke is doubtful that labor markets are all that tight, he certainly speaks out on the importance of keeping inflationary expectations firmly in check, just as Mr. Greenspan did.

This is the view that the expectation of rising inflation must be squelched, mainly by raising interest rates to dampen the economy and prevent excessive consumer demand even before inflation begins to accelerate. If the Fed fails to act in a decisive fashion, the argument goes, consumers might rush out to buy in anticipation of higher prices, and these buying sprees would then become an inflationary force.

Suppressing inflationary expectations was much in vogue in the 1980's, and the practice sometimes resulted in recession. But buying sprees could result in spot shortages of American workers and in the capacity of factories within the United States to keep up with demand.

In the last couple of years, however, the Fed's policy makers have begun to debate how much consideration they should give, in setting interest rates, to international forces that might push in the other direction. Leading the charge for a more global perspective in the Fed's deliberations is Richard W. Fischer, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

Mr. Fischer openly contests the view that a low unemployment rate in America risks, by itself, pushing up wages and then prices — not when there are so many people in low-wage countries to help supply the United States with inexpensive goods and services. But he acknowledges that his position is still controversial.

"I think it is inevitable that my colleagues will incorporate global factors in monetary deliberations," Mr. Fischer said in an interview last week. "But serious economists like to have data to back-test and verify, and the data is so bloody new."

Ms. Yellen, in her speech, listed several reasons why she and her colleagues remained reluctant to throw out the old linkage, which had inflationary pressures developing when domestic demand rose. Sure, there are plenty of imports, she said, but they contribute to a growing current-account deficit that will eventually push down the value of the dollar. When that happens, the dollar prices of imports can rise, contributing, in sum, to inflation.

Then, too, foreign and domestic labor are not always interchangeable. All sorts of labor-intensive services, from haircuts to heart transplants, must be performed by workers located within the United States. "Indeed, only 10 percent of American workers are in manufacturing, which is arguably the sector most exposed to foreign competition," Ms. Yellen said.

Still, since the late 1990's, a falling unemployment rate no longer seems to result in predictably higher wages and higher prices. Mr. Greenspan contended that a rising productivity rate was increasing labor's output. Shortages, as a result, were less likely to develop, he argued, and that took pressure off the Fed to raise rates and thus dampen inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0021293

What Mr. Greenspan saw primarily as increased productivity was, in Mr. Fischer's view, at least in part, the rising supply of labor and services from other countries. "We at the Dallas Fed," Mr. Fischer said, "have been encouraged by the board of governors to continue our research into the impact of globalization on the American economy and on monetary policy."

For now, though, the Fed is likely to continue on its present course, lifting rates once or twice more and then pausing.

Even minimizing the importance of global supply, Mr. Bernanke has said he does not expect inflation to accelerate. It is moderate now, he told Congress last month, and is likely to remain so through 2007, even falling a little below this year's 2 percent average when volatile food and energy prices are stripped out of personal consumption expenditures, the inflation measure the policymakers watch most closely.

"I am comfortable," the new chairman testified, "with these projections."

Republicans On The Run (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty And Mike Allen

Time, April 3, 2006

Considering that Vice President Dick Cheney had come a long way to help Florida Congressman Ric Keller raise $250,000 last week, the reception he got in the Sunshine State could have been a bit warmer. After extolling Cheney as "one of the most effective Vice Presidents in the history of the U.S.," Keller launched into all the times he had recently opposed the Bush Administration, including the deal to allow a Dubai company to manage operations at several U.S. ports. And then Keller went right for the punch line: "'Don't be too hasty,'" he claimed the Vice President had pleaded with him. "'Let's go hunting. We'll talk about it.'"

As the campaign season kicks into gear, Republican incumbents are having a hard time figuring out how close they want to be to the White House. Voters have plenty to take out on Republican candidates this year--ethics scandals, the G.O.P.'S failure to curb spending, the government's inept response to Hurricane Katrina, a confusing new prescription-drug program for seniors and, more than anything else, an unpopular President who is fighting an unpopular war. Iraq could make a vulnerability of the Republicans' greatest asset, the security issue.

The midterm contests in a President's second term are almost always treacherous, but this time around, Republicans thought it would be different. The 2006 elections, coming on top of their gains in 2002 and 2004, would make history and perhaps even cement a G.O.P. majority in Congress for a generation. George W. Bush's credibility on national security and the states' aggressive gerrymandering, they believed, had turned the vast majority of districts into fortresses for incumbents. But that's not turning out to be the case. In recent weeks, a startling realization has begun to take hold: if the elections were held today, top strategists of both parties say privately, the Republicans would probably lose the 15 seats they need to keep control of the House of Representatives and could come within a seat or two of losing the Senate as well. Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich, who masterminded the 1994 elections that brought Republicans to power on promises of revolutionizing the way Washington is run, told TIME that his party has so bungled the job of governing that the best campaign slogan for Democrats today could be boiled down to just two words: "Had enough?"

Iraq is driving nearly all the big indicators the wrong way for Republicans. In a TIME poll conducted last week, Bush's job approval rating was mired at 39%; 3 in 5 Americans said the country is headed in the wrong direction, and when those surveyed were given the choice between a generic Republican and a generic Democrat for Congress, the nameless Democrat won, 50% to 41%. The signs suggest an anti-Republican wave is building, says nonpartisan electoral handicapper Stuart Rothenberg, whose Rothenberg Political Report is closely followed in Washington. "The only question is how high, how big, how much force it will have. I think it will be considerable."

The danger signs for Republicans show up across the electoral map but nowhere more clearly than in the swing state of Pennsylvania, where the hottest Senate race in the country is being fought and where Republican strategists say as many as five G.O.P. congressional seats are in play, out of a total 19. The President is still beloved by the state's Republican faithful, as evidenced by the fact that 500 of them showed up to see him at a $1,000-a-plate private fund raiser for Senator Rick Santorum last week in Sewickley Heights, a suburb of Pittsburgh. Santorum posed for photos with the President at the airport and leaned into a smiling handshake with political guru Karl Rove. But it was telling that Santorum, who is trailing state treasurer Bob Casey by 10 points in the latest polls, scheduled no public appearances with Bush. When Cheney flew to Newark, N.J., earlier in the week to raise nearly $400,000 that state senator Tom Kean Jr. badly needs in his bid for the U.S. Senate, the candidate didn't show up until 15 minutes after the Vice President's motorcade had left. Kean blamed the state's notorious traffic for his tardiness. Local papers confirmed that there hadn't been much congestion at the time.

On the fund-raising front, Democrats have been surprisingly competitive with the Republicans. In a rare feat for the party, the Democratic senatorial campaign committee has outraised its Republican counterpart. Last year "our bottom-line goal was not to lose any seats," says Charles Schumer, the New York Senator who heads the committee. "Now, if things fall in line, we might even pick up the Senate." Republicans could even lose the Tennessee seat of retiring majority leader Bill Frist to Representative Harold Ford, a Democrat.

Few strategists in either party think a Democratic takeover of the Senate is likely, but many agree that the party's playing offense rather than defense is a remarkable turnaround, given that Democrats have more incumbents (18) fighting to keep their seats than Republicans do (15). But the G.O.P. failed to recruit strong challengers for the North Dakota, Nebraska and Florida seats that had been considered their best opportunities. "There was a chance for us to get damn close to [a filibuster-proof] 60 votes," says G.O.P. activist Grover Norquist. "We gave away three sure things."

If there's any good news for Republicans, it's that the elections are still seven months off. There is time in which any number of possible events--the capture of Osama bin Laden, for instance, or positive developments out of Iraq--could sweeten the nation's mood. Gingrich says Republicans badly need accomplishments to tell voters about. "The country actually expects the majority to implement," he says. "They hire you to govern, not just to tell them why you are right."

Representative Tom Reynolds of New York, chairman of the G.O.P. House campaign committee, said the picture is more promising race by race than it is nationally. He told TIME only 36 to 40 races will be in play, meaning Democrats would have to keep all their competitive seats and knock off three-quarters of the Republicans. "We have more money, and their only message is slash and burn," Reynolds said.

Republicans can take some comfort in the fact that one general rule about politics remains true, even in this difficult year: as mad as voters are at Washington in general, they are still pretty happy with the individual people who represent them. In the TIME poll, 63% of respondents said they approved of the job their local lawmaker was doing. That's one reason Republican strategists say they plan to battle the national tide by localizing individual races. Localizing suggests drawing voters' attention to the issues that most affect them at home. But in practice, to political operatives it means putting an opponent through the shredder. Republicans plan to go after Democratic challengers with every bit of ammunition they can find, from old tax liens to long-ago votes to raise local taxes.

Democrats say, Bring it on. "If they want to have a negative campaign not about the issues, they will be met on the campaign field," says Illinois Representative Rahm Emanuel, the former Clinton White House aide who heads the Democrats' campaign committee for House races. Theirs has been a shifting line of attack. January's mantra about the G.O.P.'s "culture of corruption" became February's lament about the "rubber-stamp Congress." The latest slogan they are hurling against the Republicans is "dangerously incompetent." (That, however, can be a tricky visual, as Michigan Senator Debbie Stabenow discovered when she stood next to a placard with those two words and gave a speech two weeks ago on the Senate floor.)

The most appealing argument the Democrats are offering may be their candidates, who were recruited more for how they fit the districts in which they are running than for how they match the party's national ideology. In Pennsylvania, which has an active bloc of Catholic voters, Casey is an opponent of abortion rights. That same position cost his father, then the Governor, a speaking spot at the 1992 Democratic Convention. For what could be two close races against female Republican incumbents--Heather Wilson in New Mexico and Deborah Pryce in Ohio--Emanuel found women challengers. Former NFL quarterback Heath Schuler has added star power to the race in a North Carolina district. Incumbent Charles Taylor is on the defense there with claims that an electronic glitch prevented him from casting his vote against the Central American Free Trade Agreement, which Bush had sought but is unpopular among Taylor's constituents, who believe it will cost the state jobs.

The most obvious line of defense for Republican candidates is to point out their differences with the President, as the party-wide revolt over the ports deal amply demonstrated. In the face of the Democrats' "rubber stamp" charges, G.O.P. lawmakers are distancing themselves on other issues as well. In Kentucky, Representative Anne Northup, generally a staunch Bush backer, notes that she strongly supports reimporting cheaper drugs from Canada. In Missouri, Senator Jim Talent emphasizes his successful push for an amendment to last year's energy bill that requires 7.5 billion gallons of renewable energy to be in the nation's fuel pipeline by 2012. Boasts Talent adviser Lloyd Smith: "He took on the Bush Administration and the oil companies."

But party leaders are warning privately against taking that strategy too far. "If Diet Coke criticizes Coke, people buy Pepsi, not Diet Coke," said Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. In an internal Republican Party memo provided to TIME, Jan van Lohuizen, a longtime Bush pollster, warns candidates tempted to distance themselves that "President Bush drives our image and will do so until we have real national front-runners for the '08 nomination. If he drops, we all drop." Another Republican strategist describes the problem for G.O.P. candidates this way: "Adding weight to the anchor doesn't help them."

Meanwhile, although there is no doubt that Americans are unhappy with the Republicans who run the country, Democratic strategists acknowledge that they have yet to sell voters on their party. In the TIME poll, approval for congressional Democrats is no higher (39%) than for Republicans, and 56% of voters said they don't believe the Democrats offer a clear set of alternative policies. Democratic activists and fund raisers are putting pressure on their leaders to come up with a program to tout as an option different from the Republican agenda, the way Gingrich and G.O.P. candidates did in 1994 with their 10-point Contract with America. Few voters were aware of the particulars of the Contract, but it helped give coherence and a positive tilt to the party message. Emanuel points out that the Republicans did not unveil their 1994 Contract until September of that year and says the Democrats are leery of doing anything right now that may draw attention away from the Republicans' problems. Still, he promises, "we will have, and properly so, in late spring and early summer a rollout [that tells voters], You give us the car, and we'll drive it."

Indeed, the party's House leaders and committee chairs have begun making plans for their first moves if they take power, Democratic sources told TIME. Those sources said one of the first steps that a newly installed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi would take would be to introduce legislation making college tuition more affordable for middle-class families, perhaps through tax credits and lower interest rates on student loans. Democrats would move immediately to tighten port security, seeking to have 100% of incoming container cargo inspected. A Democratic official briefed on the plans said the party would quickly push a bill designed to inhibit future lobbying scandals. The sources said Democrats would push for changes to the troubled Medicare prescription-drug plan, giving more control to Medicare and less to private providers and striking the provision that prevents the government from negotiating prices with pharmaceutical companies.

Administration officials say they fear that losing even one house of Congress would mean subpoenas and investigations--a taste of the medicine House Republicans gave Bill Clinton. "Everything will grind to a halt," one said. That prediction could be a scare tactic designed to get out the G.O.P. vote. But Democrats say that if they are victorious in November, they plan to force Bush to be more accountable, and they intend to dig through records of contracts in Iraq, for homeland security and for the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Democratic Representative Henry Waxman of California, one of the most dogged critics of the Administration, would be in line to chair the House Government Reform Committee and could write witness lists instead of open letters to the West Wing. "Some of these ranking members have had 10 years to think about what they would do," a Democratic official said. If Republicans can't change the course of things soon, the Democrats may have their chance. [The Following Descriptive Text Appears Within A Diagram] TIME Poll WILL BUSH BRING DOWN THE HOUSE? Those Democratic Veterans (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, March 27, 2006

There's no doubt why Tammy Duckworth is running for Congress: While serving as a National Guard reservist in Iraq, she decided that "our policymakers haven't lived up to the sacrifice of our troops." And Duckworth, who won the Democratic primary for Illinois's Sixth District last week, ought to know: She lost both legs when her helicopter was shot down. She believes the Iraq war was a mistake but opposes immediate U.S. withdrawal. Even so, she insists the primary victory had more to do with her healthcare plan than her status as a veteran critical of the war. "Being a vet gives you a platform, so that people will listen," she says. "And that's all it gives you."

For Duckworth and seven other veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan running as Democrats for the House of Representatives--along with nearly 50 other vets--the 2006 midterms will test how strong that platform is. Many Democrats hope the candidates will help neutralize the GOP's national security advantage and immunize the party against charges that its Iraq criticisms are unpatriotic. "They bring an unimpeachable view on issues of war and peace," says Sen. John Kerry, who has raised money for vet candidates. But the gambit faces serious challenges. The Iraq and Afghanistan vets are all political newcomers, most facing well-financed incumbents. And the Democratic Party may find it difficult to appear both tough on terrorism and more critical on Iraq.

Among the vets running, Duckworth is a standout. A natural campaigner, she was recruited by Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Rahm Emanuel, who serves a neighboring district. She raised more than half a million dollars for her primary run. And the retirement of 16-term Republican Rep. Henry Hyde and changing district demographics make her race one of the most competitive in the nation this year.

Organic. But the DCCC asserts that the slate of veterans does not reflect a concerted attempt to run such candidates. "This was as organic a movement as there is in politics," says a top party source. In fact, some vets have been surprised by their lukewarm reception from the party. "The likelihood that the Democratic Party is going to put resources into these races is almost nil," says Mike Lyon, whose Band of Brothers PAC raises money for Democratic vets.

The Democratic Party may have reason to be skeptical. So far, most war vet candidates haven't shown much fundraising muscle of their own. In Kentucky, Iraq vet Andrew Horne, a lawyer, has raised less than $150,000 and faces Republican incumbent Anne Northup, who boasts a $1 million-plus war chest. In Pennsylvania, Patrick Murphy, an Iraq vet and former West Point professor, has raised more than $250,000, but the Republican incumbent, Michael Fitzpatrick, has raised five times as much. And both veteran challengers must first survive primaries. "These candidates have caused a national media sensation," says Amy Walter, an analyst at the Cook Political Report. "But the reality on the ground is totally different."

In Ohio, the Democrats' campaign to press Iraq vet Paul Hackett to drop out of a Senate race last month in favor of a better-financed candidate showed how such candidacies could backfire. "The Democratic Party is still led by a post-Vietnam mentality," says Hackett. "There's still a certain amount of prejudice and resentment against the military there."

The biggest challenge for the Democratic war vets may be developing credibility beyond national security. The Iraq and Afghanistan vets were motivated to run by disillusionment over Iraq, but most are using military experience as a framework for branching out. "The front line in national security is not Iraq," says Joe Sestak, a former Navy vice admiral who is challenging Pennsylvania Rep. Curt Weldon. "It's about healthcare security, education security, and economic security."

Republicans are determined to paint Democratic vets as single-issue candidates who are clueless on pocketbook issues. National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Ed Patru says 38 vets (including at least two who fought in Iraq) are mounting challenges as Republicans in 2006, "but we're not broadcasting that because we don't have a credibility gap on national security." The Democratic vets, says Patru, "are adopting the surrender message of the Democratic establishment."

That's certainly debatable. But the Democratic vets do risk further muddying the party's message. "Democrats are trying to have it both ways," says pollster John Zogby, "saying they're tough on national security and running veterans disgruntled about the war." Kerry tried to walk that line as a presidential candidate two years ago. It didn't work then. And it's no small challenge now.

Conservative Groups Warn GOP (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

Social-conservative groups have warned Republicans that their voters feel unappreciated and frustrated with Congress and that the party must get more aggressive on such values issues as marriage, human cloning, religious freedom and abortion if they want a decent turnout from the conservative base in November.

"That message has definitely been conveyed," said Jim Backlin, vice president for legislative affairs at the Christian Coalition.

The House and Senate are expected to vote this year on a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union of a man and a woman, and Mr. Backlin said a recent meeting with Republican leaders leaves him confident that the Senate also will vote for the first time on a few key pro-life bills.

Leading conservative activists have been sounding off lately, frustrated that since 2004, when their voters turned out in force to help President Bush win re-election, the Republican Party has backed off the values issues. A constitutional amendment against homosexual "marriage" failed in 2004 to get the required two-thirds majority in both houses.

"I've said it before, and I'll say it again: Let's address values issues," wrote conservative activist Gary Bauer last week in a memo to friends and supporters, noting that 19 states have amended their state constitutions to protect marriage with an average approval vote of 70 percent, yet many lawmakers still shy away.

"What I don't get is, why there is so much reticence on the part of our public servants to defend normal marriage beyond an obligatory press release or applause line in a stump speech?" he said.

A Family Research Council poll released last week found that 63 percent of social-conservative voters think Congress has not acted on a pro-family agenda on such issues as marriage, abortion and broadcast decency.

"In the Republican Party in general, when it comes to Christian conservatives, we don't exist except during election years," said Tom McClusky, acting vice president for government affairs at the FRC.

"The efforts of social conservatives get forgotten in the Republican Party too easily," Mr. Backlin said. "It's up to pro-family groups to remind the leaders of the Republican Party that we are the major constituency ... and they can't take us for granted."

Focus on the Family and similar groups will hold a "Values Voters Summit" in September in Washington to re-engage disillusioned members and build strategy for the coming elections.

Much of the conservative anger is directed at the Senate, the activists said. Mr. Backlin said that out of 400 Senate votes in 2005, only one was even moderately important to his group. Mr. McClusky said that three years after the Janet Jackson Super Bowl "wardrobe malfunction" halftime incident, the Senate has yet to act on TV decency.

He also noted that House Republican leaders angered conservatives last year by letting their chamber vote on a bipartisan bill to expand embryonic stem-cell research. In compensation, conservative groups were promised another House vote to ban human cloning, but "we haven't seen anything like that."

Still, after meeting with Republican leaders recently, conservative activists are cautiously optimistic for the rest of the year.

On tap for action in the Senate, Republican aides confirmed, is an anti-flag-burning amendment and a House-passed bill making it a federal crime to skirt a state parental-notification law by taking a minor to another state to obtain an abortion without her parents' involvement. The House will probably vote for the first time on a relatively new bill requiring doctors to inform women seeking abortions that the procedure will cause pain to the unborn child, said a House Republican aide.

There's also talk in the Senate about taking action against what some conservatives see as a judicial attack on the Pledge of Allegiance because of the phrase "under God," one Senate Republican aide said. The House passed such a measure in 2004.

"Just those three alone -- marriage, abortion and religious freedom ... that would be really exciting to our grass roots, and it'd probably ensure that the Republicans keep the House and Senate," Mr. Backlin said.

Values Conference Aims To Press GOP (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Leaders from more than 40 of the nation's most powerful conservative Christian organizations are gathering in Washington, D.C., this week to put GOP Congressional leaders on notice that they will actively look to keep "values voters" away from the polls if lawmakers don't make good on commitments to move a "Christ-centered" legislative agenda.

Concerned by what organizers of this week's "War on Christians and the Values Voters in 2006" conference say is a growing attack on Christian values by liberal lawmakers, Hollywood and the judiciary. Conservatives are gathering today and Tuesday with a handful of their House and Senate allies, including former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas), Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), and Reps. Todd Akin (R-Mo.) and Louie Gohmert (R-Texas). In addition to discussing the status of the "culture war," participants in the conference will map out a legislative agenda, which organizers say will serve as a litmus test for whether their network of conservative activists and clergy will back incumbents in this fall's elections.

After years of strong support for politicians espousing conservative values, Christian voters have become increasingly concerned that "maybe our greatest victory in 2004 could be lost in one year," said the Rev. Rick Scarborough, conference organizer, a longtime friend and ally of DeLay and head of VisionAmerica.

Scarborough and a handful of leading conservatives, including Phyllis Schlafly of Concerned Women for America, Alan Keyes, Lou Sheldon of the Traditional Values Coalition, Paul Weyrich of the Free Congress Foundation, Janet Folger of Faith2Action and Manuel Miranda of the Third Branch Conference, have launched ValuesVoter.org, an advocacy group organized as a 501(c)(4) group in order to lobby Congress on the group's "Contract with Congress." According to Scarborough, the group has drafted a list of 10 "grievances" with Congress and the courts, which it expects lawmakers to address this year. According to the group's Web site, legislative items on the list include a constitutional amendment barring gay marriage, school voucher legislation, curbs on abortion and new controls on judges, among others.

Scarborough also said he met with leaders in the House and Senate earlier this month to discuss the group's agenda and that he had received assurances from them that these issues will be addressed in the coming months. "I'm fully trusting that we'll be hearing more and more" from Congress on social and judicial issues this year, Scarborough said. A Senate leadership aide could not comment on the meetings and House leadership aides could not be reached for comment at press time.

Scarborough warned that Christian conservatives will look to punish lawmakers if they do not engage more fully in the culture war. Scarborough said members of ValuesVoter.org were discussing the creation of a new political action committee, while other organizations in the network had committed to using their own influence with Christian voters in the upcoming midterms. For instance, Scarborough said he expects to use his network of "Patriot Pastors" during this year's elections to educate voters about lawmakers' commitment to the conservative agenda, warning, "we're going to hold these Congressman accountable ... if you're not going to give us what we ask for, we're not going to give you our vote."

A 'War' On Christians? No. (USAT)

By Tom Krattenmaker

USA Today, March 27, 2006

This past holiday season brought us the "War on Christmas."

DOJ_NMG_0021299

Now, if we are to believe the promotions for an event starting today in the nation's capital, something bigger and darker is afoot in America: "The War on Christians."

Such is the title of a conference that boasts a lineup of some of the biggest stars of the so-called Christian right — Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, onetime presidential candidate Gary Bauer and Eagle Forum leader Phyllis Schlafly.

The chief organizer is Rick Scarborough, leader of Vision America, a group that describes its purpose as reversing America's moral decline by getting more Bible-believing Christians to participate in the political process.

"Christians are under a constant, relentless attack — from Hollywood, the news media, activist organizations, and the cultural elite," warned a Web page promoting the "War on Christians and the Values Voter" event, in language typical of the prevailing zeitgeist.

Isn't this more than a bit overblown? And in a time when the country is caught up in a real war with religious overtones, shouldn't the word "war" be tossed around a little less recklessly?

'A kernel of truth'

Certainly, liberals and secularists must concede a kernel of truth to the religious conservatives' charges. To the eyes of conservative Christians, much appears to have changed for the worse in American society in recent decades.

There are stricter limits on explicitly Christian expression in schools and other public settings. There is growing public acceptance of homosexuality and out-of-wedlock births, while television and movies seem awash with sex, nudity and profanity.

And if the claims of Christian persecution sound shrill, so do those of secular Americans who sometimes equate the political activity of religious conservatives with a crusade to replace our Constitution-based government with a hard-edged theocracy.

Still, the rhetoric of persecution from Scarborough and his fellows rings false. A war on Christians?

It sounds more like an exaggerated scare tactic aimed at grabbing attention, rallying the troops and sowing deeper division between the opposing sides in the ongoing debate over the proper role of religion in the public square.

Worse, it trivializes the true persecution of Christians in the early history of the church and the real abuse unleashed on Christians today in some corners of the world.

Christians in America are hardly being thrown to the lions. In many ways, the political and social values of conservative Christians are carrying the day. We are in the second term of the most faith-friendly, explicitly Christian presidency in many a decade.

Not only has President Bush talked a good game with evangelicals, but his administration has backed it with dollars for faith-based initiatives and abstinence-education programs.

Hollywood is producing more Christian-friendly movies while Christian news media, Christian music, Christian novels and other forms of Christian pop culture continue making their strong mark on society.

Nevertheless, the rhetoric of persecution and oppression seems irresistible to many. Nowhere was the theme of Christian oppression more vividly on display, and combatively expressed, than at Justice Sunday III, held Jan. 8 at a predominantly African-American congregation in north Philadelphia on the eve of the Senate hearings on Supreme Court nominee Samuel Alito.

Joining host minister Herbert Lusk at the altar of Greater Exodus Baptist Church were four of the leading figures of the Christian right — Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council, James Dobson of Focus on the Family, Liberty University Chancellor Jerry Falwell and Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

Also in the lineup of speakers was a woman with the weightiest of surnames — Alveda King, niece of Martin Luther King Jr.

The event, televised nationally on Christian networks, was advertised as a rally against the "tyranny" of a supposedly activist and anti-Christian judiciary. But it wasn't long before Lusk and the other speakers were railing against a wider litany of assaults on people of faith: abortion, gay unions, restrictions on public religious expression — full-scale oppression of the church.

King led the congregation in a rendition of one of the most powerful songs of the civil rights movement, We Shall Overcome, with Perkins and Dobson standing up to lend their voices to the rousing conclusion.

DOJ_NMG_0021300

"We are facing, like we never have before, this hostility against the people of God," roared Lusk, a former running back for the Philadelphia Eagles and the leader of a church whose community outreach work has received more than $1 million in federal funding from President Bush's faith-based initiatives program.

"Don't fool with the church, because the church has buried many a critic, and all the critics that we have not buried, we're making funeral arrangements for them!"

What real war looks like

Sadly, real religious war is being fought, causing real burials. We have war, or something very close to it, between the Shiites and Sunnis in Iraq. And — at least as it's perceived by those waging it — there is the religious war of the Iraqi insurgents who invoke jihad in their deadly attacks on American soldiers and their fellow Iraqis.

While religious conservatives gather in Washington today, another terrifying prospect looms over our country and world that makes the claims of Scarborough and his co-religionists appear especially trivial.

We could be headed toward an international showdown over the nuclear program of the theocratic Islamic government in Iran. John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, has spoken recently of the need for the United States to use "all the tools at our disposal" to eliminate the threat.

Imagine some of the possibilities should diplomacy fail: U.S. forces facing a religiously motivated enemy as they move in to take out the nuclear installations (or government) in the event airstrikes prove insufficient; American interests in the Middle East and elsewhere threatened by retaliatory attacks.

Worse yet, imagine a nuclear weapon in the hands of a militant Muslim government with a contempt for Israel and its staunch "infidel" supporter, the United States. Given the crusader overtones of U.S. foreign policy since 9/11, these scenarios could take on the appearance of a real war on Christians. May they never come to pass.

So, for our domestic debates, let's find a more appropriate, more sober vocabulary. Many words might describe what's going on between conservative Christians and their political opponents today. "War"? That's not one of them.

Not Everything Bush Does Is About The Christian Right (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

This is a true story. The names have been changed to protect the — well, just because I'd rather not name names.

The other day I received a telephone call from a producer at a television network. The caller inquired about whether I might be available to do an interview for a story scheduled to air later in the day. I often do interviews, so the call wasn't all that unusual.

What was unusual, however, was the story that precipitated the call — or rather the angle that the piece was taking.

The story involved the possible execution of an Afghan Muslim who had converted to Christianity. As far as I know, that story made all of the network news shows that evening, and it was the lead on at least two broadcasts.

I didn't know anything about the subject, and I said so. But the producer persisted, saying the angle they were hoping I could comment on was what President Bush had to do to respond to the possible execution to "satisfy" Christian conservatives.

Frankly, I was shocked at the question, since the underlying premise was that the president of the United States would respond to the possible execution primarily in the context of domestic political pressures.

I guess the people working on the story had visions of the president, Karl Rove and a couple of other White House staffers sitting around talking about what the president had to say to make Pat Robertson, James Dobson or Gary Bauer happy.

I know that people in Washington, D.C., assume that politics pervades everything, and that politicians don't make a move without calculating the political costs. But in this case, I argued, that assumption simply was wrong.

"Are you suggesting," I asked rhetorically, "that the president — or any normal American — would react differently if someone were being executed because he or she had converted to Judaism or to Islam?" Why else bring the Christian right into the story?

I know some journalists are obsessed with the political influence of the religious right, but the idea that the president's response would, to a considerable extent, be crafted to pacify evangelical Republicans is ridiculous.

When I told that to the caller and added that I was not interested in being interviewed because of the premise of the piece, I heard silence, followed by a polite thank you.

I'll admit that I wondered how the final piece would look, and I hoped the "Christian right" angle would never make it to air, since it seemed very unlikely to me that the White House would see the issue as how to "deal with" the Christian right.

But it did air and included an interview with Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council, apparently questioning American policy in Afghanistan.

The story ultimately included a nationally known political science professor commenting that the incident was a "nightmare" for the president since it "takes his base and divides it."

The first thing I did was pick up my jaw from the floor. Then I shook my head in disbelief.

How exactly, I wondered, did the possible execution of a Christian convert in Afghanistan "divide" Bush's base? Was I supposed to believe that there are Republicans who favor the execution and others who don't?

Or, did the analyst mean that Christians want the president to act tough toward the Afghans, but non-Christian supporters of Bush don't care or oppose a tough line?

Or am I supposed to assume that the "execution" of a Christian convert in Afghanistan would somehow turn Christians — and only Christians — in the United States against the war, if hundreds of deaths and kidnappings hadn't done so already?

I suppose it is possible that if an execution takes place, some Americans who have been supporting the war might start to question whether the administration's entire Iraq-Afghanistan policy is right.

But that view wouldn't be limited to Christians, and it's not even certain that the execution would change existing views on the president's policies. If there is an execution, will Perkins call for the U.S. to leave Afghanistan immediately? Don't hold your breath.

The entire incident from my phone conversation to the final version of the unfortunate piece drove home a key point: Even in Washington, not everything is a partisan or ideological issue, and not everything the president does or says involves political or electoral concerns. Even more to the point, not all presidential decisions are based on the political clout of the Christian right.

Some things involve simple truths that don't require over-interpretation. Like the question of whether it's OK to execute someone because of his or her religious beliefs.

'Scared' Rivals Watch Steele (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

Maryland Democrats are keeping close tabs on the top Republican candidate in the state's U.S. Senate race, by videotaping Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele's campaign stops and noting his fundraisers with Bush administration officials.

"God bless them," Mr. Steele said. "They're so scared, and I love them for that."

Derek Walker, executive director of the state's Democratic Party, said videotaping is a typical campaign tactic and that party members are "learning as much as we can" about Mr. Steele.

"We certainly take Michael Steele seriously," Mr. Walker said. "And we take George Bush and Karl Rove's threats of bringing $20 million [in campaign money] into Maryland seriously."

Mr. Steele, well-aware of Democrats' presence, began a recent campaign stop by talking about his "following."

"I know that a lot of people are watching this race very closely, especially the Democrats," Mr. Steele said.

He spoke directly to a woman in the back of the room who held a small video camera.

"Nice to see you again," Mr. Steele said. "Doing well? What's your name because I think I'm going to be seeing you a lot. Was it Jennifer?"

"Yes," said the woman, who later said she was with the Maryland Democratic Party.

"Give my best to your team," Mr. Steele responded.

National Democrats also are keeping a close eye on Mr. Steele, who is campaigning to be the first black Maryland Republican in the U.S. Senate. The Democratic Party has a long-standing black voting bloc.

Two Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee staffers illegally obtained Mr. Steele's credit report last year. Both resigned, and one pleaded guilty Friday to a misdemeanor in exchange for a lighter sentence.

The Democrats' top candidate is Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, a 10-term Baltimore congressman.

A Rasmussen Reports survey shows Mr. Cardin with 49 percent of the vote and Mr. Steele with 35 percent in a head-to-head contest to succeed retiring Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, a Democrat who has served five terms.

Last week, Mr. Walker sent out an e-mail that called attention to an April 7 fundraiser for Mr. Steele that Vice President Dick Cheney is expected to attend.

The e-mail quoted Maryland Democratic Party Chairman Terry Lierman saying Mr. Steele should be sent a map "to make sure he gets there. He won't want to miss what Dick Cheney has to say about how Steele can help advance the Bush/Cheney agenda."

Mr. Steele has held fundraisers with President Bush and presidential adviser Karl Rove.

Democrats are trying to link Mr. Steele with Mr. Bush's low approval ratings and to the federal government's slow response to Hurricane Katrina, which they say shows Republicans' indifference to blacks.

Mr. Steele acknowledges the administration's shortcomings but says he has not been in a position to do anything. However, he has vowed to "take the lead on this issue" if elected.

The Cardin campaign sent out a detailed account of Mr. Steele's fundraisers this month, including one with White House Chief of Staff Andrew H. Card Jr.

Mr. Cardin faces a primary challenge from Kweisi Mfume, former chairman of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Mr. Cardin has more cash than Mr. Mfume, but three other candidates, including Bethesda businessman Josh Rales, are building war chests and could play a factor.

DCCC To Target Critics Of Stem-Cell Research (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, March 27, 2006

Rep. Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, will be in New Jersey today for the first of seven events designed to highlight opposition by Republican House candidates to stem-cell research.

At Newark Liberty Airport, Emanuel will join Linda Stender, a 12-year veteran of the New Jersey state Assembly who is challenging three-term Rep. Mike Ferguson (R) in the nearby 7th district. Stender recently said that the first act of a Democrat-controlled House in 2007 should be to impeach President Bush.

Emanuel and Stender will criticize the stem-cell research position of Ferguson, who is anti-abortion. Democrats say his opposition to such research puts him at odds with his moderate, suburban constituency.

The two Democrats will also unveil a Web ad — a cheaper, if less effective, alternative to running commercials on the pricey New York City airwaves that blanket the 7th district.

In 2004, the DCCC recruited a former Marine, Steve Brozak, to challenge Ferguson. But the committee ultimately decided not to invest in the race, earning it a public rebuke from Brozak, who lost by a double-digit margin.

Emanuel will not appear at the other six events on tap for the week, which will be held in districts generally considered a notch or two more competitive than New Jersey's 7th.

The GOP candidates being targeted in the DCCC offensive include freshman Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick (Pa.) and Dave Reichert (Wash.). The GOP hopefuls being targeted include Rick O'Donnell in Colorado's open-seat 7th district, quite possibly the top House race in the country this year; John Gard, the National Republican Congressional Committee's preferred candidate to replace Mark Green (R) in Wisconsin's 8th district; embattled incumbent Rep. Richard Pombo in California's 11th district; and Peter Roskam, a state Senator who will face Democrat Tammy Duckworth in the 6th district of Illinois.

Democrats promise that the stem-cell message will eventually be rolled out in a wide range of other districts as well.

Kerry And Producer Do Battle For Honor (at Least The Word) (NYT)

By Sara Ivry

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

When Senator John F. Kerry set up a legal defense fund last month to fight a civil suit charging him with conspiracy and defamation, he called it the "Fund for Truth and Honor." The name seems to tweak the title of "Stolen Honor: Wounds That Never Heal," a 2004 documentary that criticized Mr. Kerry for his activities in the early 1970's in Vietnam Veterans Against the War.

Carlton Sherwood, the journalist and Marine veteran who produced the film, and the Vietnam Veterans Legacy Foundation filed the lawsuit in October in federal court in Philadelphia. The suit accuses Mr. Kerry and an aide of campaigning to stop the Sinclair Broadcasting Group from showing "Stolen Honor" and of trying to injure Mr. Sherwood's business and reputation.

"If there's one lesson we learned from 2004, it's how much the right wing is willing to spend to attack John Kerry's honor," said David Wade, a spokesman for Mr. Kerry. "We want to set up some mechanism so that if this gets very expensive, you have some means of fighting back."

Mr. Sherwood said this fight was nonpartisan. "This is a personal thing. It has nothing at all to do with his politics," he said. He called it an effort to make Mr. Kerry answer for having "defamed and excoriated hundreds of thousands of men, some of them killed in action, just for his own political future."

As for the name of the fund, with its riff on the title of the film, Mr. Sherwood said, "it's simply mocking."

"When we say it," he added, "we're deadly serious."

Mr. Wade, who noted that no donations had yet been solicited for the fund, defended its name.

"The truth is on our side, and John Kerry served honorably and spoke out against the war honorably," he said. "There is nothing honorable or truthful about what Carlton Sherwood did in 2004. His propaganda is dishonorable lies, and we're going to beat it with truth."

Clinton Keeps Focus On '06, And That Could Be A Strategy For '08 (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

MELVILLE, N.Y., March 23 — Taking the stage in a ballroom here to address a group of Realtors on Thursday, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton faced a familiar battery of comments and questions about her future.

The host introduced her as a "formidable presidential candidate." An audience member asked whether her husband, the former president, would wash the windows upon their return to the White House. "He's never done them in any of our other houses," Mrs. Clinton said, sending a ripple of laughter through the crowd.

The notion that Mrs. Clinton might be courting once-wary voters in Suffolk County as part of her 2006 re-election race went unacknowledged. In fact, her Senate race has become something of an afterthought these days, with the Republican Party failing to mount much opposition and national attention focused on Mrs. Clinton's potential to capture the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

But Mrs. Clinton herself appears not to have lost sight of 2006 — judging not only by her painstaking attention to local details during her public appearances, but also by a schedule that frequently takes her to Republican areas across the state.

On the contrary, the senator appears to be treating her re-election bid as, among other things, a chance to prove her viability in tough parts of the New York, with Democrats and associates saying that she is aiming both to run up a big margin of victory statewide and to exceed expectations in Republican strongholds.

Rather than traveling to New Hampshire or Iowa as have the other likely presidential contenders — she has not visited New Hampshire in roughly a decade — Mrs. Clinton spends significant amounts of time in areas of New York that have historically been enemy territory for a Democrat. Many of her recent stops — in the Niagara Falls, Rochester and Syracuse regions — are, on the surface, even more difficult political territory for her than Suffolk County, which she lost, 56 percent to 41 percent, in 2000.

The strategy is strikingly similar to the one used by George W. Bush in 1998, when he ran up the score among Hispanics and moderates in Texas during his re-election campaign as governor, allowing him to promote the results as proof of his broad electoral appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0021304

Still, even if it proves successful, the approach has its limitations. New York Republicans, by and large, are less conservative than their counterparts in the South and West, especially on social issues like abortion.

In some ways, her re-election race is all about risk. If she fails to run up a substantial margin of victory, her opponents in both parties are sure to cite her performance as evidence that she has too much ideological and personal baggage to win a nationwide race.

But it is also true that Mrs. Clinton has strengthened her standing in parts of the state in which she was viewed skeptically at best in 2000, and that showing her own party that she can temper her image as a liberal can only help her in 2008.

"They're going to try to write a story about her success here coming out of 2006, to try and answer some of the questions people have raised" about her ability to reach past liberal Democrats and build an appeal nationally, said David Axelrod, a Democratic media strategist.

Should Mrs. Clinton achieve her goals in the Senate race, Mr. Axelrod said, "They're going to say she can do the same thing across the country, to their advantage."

Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist who has worked on several presidential campaigns, said the "starting gun" on the presidential race would formally go off the Wednesday after this year's midterm elections.

"The question is, where does Hillary Clinton want to be that Wednesday?" Mr. Lehane said. "The first thing she wants is to have an impressive victory, including in parts of the state, such as upstate, that will be indicative of her ability to attract moderate, independent and even Republican support."

And so it was that Mrs. Clinton found herself in a dual role at the Hilton hotel here on Thursday — as both a celebrity, rushed by a throng of supporters seeking her autograph, and as a policy wonk with a firm command of issues important to the constituents she most wants to woo.

In her remarks to the Long Island Board of Realtors, she repeatedly addressed the kind of core suburban issues that typically matter to middle-class Republicans: issues like traffic congestion, economic tax incentives for suburban areas and maintaining the mortgage interest rate deduction.

After an initial standing ovation subsided, Mrs. Clinton told the group that she had made it a priority to determine "what we need to do to revitalize suburbia, because, after all, suburbia started on Long Island."

"Some of our suburbs are old now themselves, and they need some help, so what we've tried to do is pay attention," she said, specifically citing Long Island, Westchester and suburbs upstate as the objects of her attention.

Polling data strongly suggests that Mrs. Clinton has managed to pick up what would have once seemed like unlikely support across the state, and not simply because she is running without formidable opposition. In January, about 31 percent of registered Republicans said they approved of her, up from 18 percent in early 2001, according to polls conducted by Quinnipiac University.

Upstate, her approval rating jumped to 56 percent from 36 percent, while in the suburbs of New York City, it grew to 55 percent from 28 percent.

There is even greater anecdotal evidence that the junior senator has overcome some initial concern among Republicans. Timothy J. Regan, the senior vice president for government affairs at Corning, the upstate glassware company, said that after some "rough sledding" right after the 2000 race — when only a limited number of Republicans in his area voted for her — she had become "incredibly popular," by securing appropriations and other funding for the community and by responding to questions and complaints.

Her ability to help mostly Republican and upstate areas "has surprised everybody," Mr. Regan said.

Potentially, Mrs. Clinton could use solid gains in those communities to argue that she is viable in the outlying suburbs that have tipped the balance in the last two presidential elections — and among white, middle-class voters in places like Ohio and West Virginia.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers would not publicly discuss what, if anything, the 2006 election might mean for any national run. "She is single-mindedly focused on this '06 race right now," said Terry McAuliffe, the former chairman of the Democratic National Committee and a close friend of the Clintons'.

DOJ_NMG_0021305

At the same time, Mrs. Clinton could get herself into trouble if she and her strategists publicly set a bar for how well she should perform in 2006. Indeed, aides to Mrs. Clinton are reluctant even to predict how much of the overall vote she will win. Last time, she reached 55 percent; most Democrats believe she will do much better this fall.

"No smart strategist is going to set a bar seven months before an election," said Paul Begala, a political adviser to former President Clinton. "Governor Bush and Karl Rove did not go around in March of 1998 saying that they were going to significantly increase their performance among Hispanics."

Nonetheless, Mr. Bush, in his 1998 race for re-election as governor of Texas, did specifically set out to outperform himself and other Republicans in order to demonstrate his electoral strength.

In the end, Mr. Bush won 47 percent of the state's Hispanic vote. That was unprecedented for a Republican, and a performance that "helped brand him, in a way, as a different kind of Republican, one that could go get votes among constituencies that hadn't been traditionally Republican," said Matthew Dowd, a strategist for Mr. Bush.

Similarly, Mr. Dowd said, Mrs. Clinton is "going to need to win upstate in smaller communities that may have even voted against her last time, to show she's got their votes now."

Hillary's 'Troop' Buildup (NYPOST)

By Ian Bishop

The New York Post, March 27, 2006

WASHINGTON - Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton won't say if she's running for the White House - but she's already drafted a presidential-size army of campaign staffers that dwarfs John McCain's outfit and those of everyone else in the field.

Clinton has assembled a Titanic-size troop of 37 staffers and a legion of pricey consultants on the rolls of her HillPAC political-action committee and her Friends of Hillary re-election campaign - operatives that come on top of the three dozen aides in her Senate office.

"I understand New York is a large state, but this is extraordinary. This operation is built for one thing and one thing only: She's running for president," said a senior Dem operative.

Twenty Clinton campaign staffers are paid by both HillPAC and Friends of Hillary, including her Senate chief of staff, Tamera Luzzatto, according to federal records. Six more campaign staffers are paid exclusively by Friends of Hillary, and another three receive a paycheck just from HillPAC.

In all, Clinton doles out nearly $100,000 a month on staff payroll, and devotes even more to a dozen seasoned consultants who handle media strategy, speechwriting, market research, direct mail and fund-raising. The payoff has been a $17 million war chest - the biggest in the Senate.

"Considering the successful work that is being carried out by the FOH and HillPAC staff, including our extensive outreach to low-dollar donors, we think it's an appropriate number at this time," campaign spokeswoman Ann Lewis told The Post.

But insiders say her army is overkill in her re-election race against former Yonkers Mayor John Spencer and former Reagan-era Pentagon official Kathleen "KT" McFarland - both way back in the polls.

Clinton's political machine is so massive that it's more than four times as big as 2008 GOP front-runner McCain, who relies on five staffers and a half-dozen consulting firms spread between his campaign and his Straight Talk America PAC.

And while Clinton this year has hoarded her HillPAC money to build her staff - making just one donation to the Oregon Democratic Party - other presidential wannabes, both Democrats and Republicans, have spread their campaign cash to build up a grass-roots network in key primary states.

Retraining Laid-Off Workers, But For What? (NYT)

By Louis Uchitelle

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

Layoffs have disrupted the lives of millions of Americans over the last 25 years. The cure that these displaced workers are offered — retraining and more education — is heralded as a sure path to new and better-paying careers. But often that policy prescription does not work, as this book excerpt explains. It is adapted from "The Disposable American: Layoffs and Their Consequences" by Louis Uchitelle, an economics writer for The New York Times. Knopf will publish the book on Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0021306

JO GOODRUM, a thin, energetic woman older than her audience of aircraft mechanics — old enough, perhaps, to be their mother — got their attention with a single, unexpected sentence, which she inserted early in her presentation. Her husband, she said, had been laid off six times since the late 1980's. And yet here she was, standing before them, in one piece, cheerful, apparently O.K., giving survival instructions to the mechanics, who would be laid off themselves in 10 days.

They were, in nearly every case, family men in their 30's and 40's who had worked for United Airlines since the mid-1990's. Summoned by their union, they had gathered in the carpeted conference room at the Days Inn next to Indianapolis International Airport, not far from United's giant maintenance center, a building so big that 12 airliners could be overhauled in it simultaneously. That no longer happened. Most of the repair bays were empty. The airline was cutting back operations, and the 60 mechanics at the meeting were in the fourth group to be let go.

Confrontation had brought on the layoffs. Influenced by militants in their union local, Hoosier Air Transport Lodge 2294 of the International Association of Machinists, the 2,000 mechanics at the center had engaged in a work slowdown for many months, and then a refusal to work overtime. But rather than give ground, United responded by outsourcing, sending planes to nonunion contractors elsewhere in the country.

That scared the mechanics. They quieted down and, in effect, authorized the leaders of Lodge 2294 to make peace. Their hope was that if they cooperated, United would ease up on the layoffs and revive operations at, arguably, one of the most efficient, high-tech maintenance centers in the world. In this state of mind, the union was helping to usher the 60 laid-off mechanics quietly away. It had rented the conference room on this cold January evening in 2003 to introduce the men to what amounted to a boot camp for recycling laid-off workers back into new, usually lower-paying lines of work.

SIMILAR federally subsidized boot camps, organized by state and local governments, often in league with unions, have proliferated in the United States since the 1980's, and now many cities have them. Unable to stop layoffs, government has taken on the task of refitting discarded workers for "alternate careers." In deciding as a nation to try to rejuvenate them as workers, we put in place a system, however unrealistic, that implicitly acknowledged layoffs as a legitimate practice.

The presumption — promoted by economists, educators, business executives and nearly all of the nation's political leaders, Democrats and Republicans alike — holds that in America's vibrant and flexible economy there is work, at good pay, for the educated and skilled. The unemployed need only to get themselves educated and skilled and the work will materialize. Education and training create the jobs, according to this way of thinking. Or, put another way, an appropriate job at decent pay materializes for every trained or educated worker.

If the workers were already trained, as the mechanics certainly were, then what they needed was additional training and counseling as a transition into well-paying, unfilled jobs in other industries. If the transition failed to function as advertised, well, the accepted wisdom suggested that it was the fault of the workers themselves. Their failure to land good jobs was due to personality defects or a resistance to acquiring new skills or a reluctance to move where the good jobs were.

That was the myth. It evaporated in practice for the aircraft mechanics, whose hourly pay ranged up to $31. Not enough job openings exist at $31 an hour — or at $16 an hour, for that matter — to meet the demand for them. Jobs don't just materialize at cost-conscious companies to absorb all the qualified people who want them.

You cannot be an engineer or an accountant without a degree; in that sense, education and training certainly do count. Furthermore, in the competition for the jobs that exist, the educated and trained have an edge. That advantage shows up regularly in wage comparisons. But you cannot earn an engineer's or an accountant's typical pay if companies are not hiring engineers and accountants, or are hiring relatively few and can control the wage, chipping away at it.

For the mechanics at the Days Inn, the retraining process would begin in a few days with workshops in résumé writing and interviewing skills, personality evaluations and job counseling — and, for a lucky few, tuition grants to go back to school. The mechanics were being "counseled out" of their well-paying trade, as some of them wryly put it, and Mrs. Goodrum was the lead-off speaker in this endeavor.

She presented herself as one of them. Her husband's wage slid from $25 an hour in his heyday as a factory worker in the 1980's to $10 an hour in his latest job in a watch store. To supplement that falling income, she had taken part-time work as an "education presenter" for the Consumer Credit Counseling Service of Central Indiana.

In this capacity, it was her task to explain how easy it would be for the departing mechanics — separated from salaries of $55,000 a year and up — to sink deeply into debt. The glimpse that she offered of her husband's downfall suggested that she had learned these lessons herself.

Distinguish, she said, between needs and wants. Rent, food, insurance premiums — those are needs. Cable television is a want; cancel it. Day care can be a want or a need. It's a need for parents with jobs, but a want for the soon-to-be-laid-off mechanics who would now have more time to watch their children themselves.

In the blue-collar world, aircraft mechanics are at the top, and these were painful economies for them. They are the highly skilled people who repair and overhaul the nation's airliners. Each mechanic in the room had completed two years of collegelike schooling to qualify for the exacting task of dismantling and rebuilding airliners every five years, the work carried out at the maintenance center. Several compared their role proudly to that of a pilot, claiming as much credit as the pilots for the safety of air travel.

Now they were falling out of this high-level world, in most cases for good. They were unlikely to match or come close in their next jobs to the level of pay that would soon cease. They would be newcomers again in the work force. They must learn how to get a foot in the door, the speakers that evening unceremoniously told them. Their careers were gone, and the grief at this loss must be absorbed in order to move on.

Recognizing their vulnerability, Mrs. Goodrum spoke to the mechanics in the simplified, encouraging language that a skilled teacher uses to instruct children who are just learning to read, or that a speech therapist adopts to guide stroke victims struggling to speak again. Did the mechanics realize, she said, that credit card companies and mortgage lenders give special consideration to laid-off workers? She held up a "sample letter to a creditor" in which the writer announces his layoff, says he expects to be working again in three months and proposes to reduce his payments in the meantime. "It is very important that you negotiate now," she said, "and not when you are 60 days behind on a debt."

When Mrs. Goodrum had finished outlining in step-by-step detail the various survival strategies, Ben Nunnally, then 44 and the president of Lodge 2294, rose and without moving from behind the head table inserted into the proceedings some impromptu advice of his own, exercising his authority one last time as their union leader. While he had the mechanics in one room, Mr. Nunnally said, he wanted to caution them about the unemployment checks they would soon be getting. If they did not file promptly on Jan. 25, their last day, they could waste two weeks in collecting the first check.

Even if the unemployment pay arrived on time, it would be little enough: $336 a week for 26 weeks, way below the nearly $1,100 a week or so that the mechanics had been earning at United. Mr. Nunnally, however, made no mention of either amount. "We have no choice but to offer as little conflict as possible with United and hope that will avoid more layoffs," he said afterward.

It was a wasted hope. Three months later, in April 2003, United abruptly laid off the 1,100 remaining mechanics, including Mr. Nunnally. On May 4, it said it would abandon the maintenance center completely. Outsourcing had won, hands down, and although Mr. Nunnally stayed on as the president of the much-diminished union local, he, too, applied for unemployment pay.

Mr. Nunnally had experienced the center's glory days. He joined United in 1989 as a 30-year-old mechanic in San Francisco and transferred to Indianapolis in 1994, drawn by the lower cost of living and the recently opened center. The mechanics in Indiana worked mostly on Boeing 737's, but as United expanded the operation — opening more repair bays, hiring more mechanics and extending the legs of the L-shaped building until each was nearly a half-mile long — they also overhauled other so-called narrow-body aircraft, including Airbus 319's and 320's and the larger Boeing 757's.

With morale high in the 1990's and the mechanics willing to work hard, they put airliners through their periodic overhauls in record time. The stem-to-stern refurbishing of a 737 normally required 22 days at other maintenance centers. The mechanics at Indianapolis cut that to 11 days for a 737 going through its first heavy maintenance and to less than 20 days for older planes. "We had overhaul bays that kind of competed in a friendly way to see who could do the best," said Frederick L. Mohr, general manager of the Indianapolis center from 1997 until 2002.

The rapid turnaround meant an infusion of passenger revenue from the additional days that the plane was in service, helping to justify the mechanics' pay of $26 an hour in the late 1990's.

Capitalizing on the growing productivity, United itself got into outsourcing as a means of keeping the giant center busy during slack periods in its own operations. America West was sending 737's and 757's to Indianapolis for heavy maintenance, and by the spring of 1999 the work force had grown to 2,400 mechanics from fewer than 250 when Mr. Nunnally arrived in 1994. The fast turnarounds and reliable work justified the relatively high fees that United charged, and America West shifted maintenance to Indianapolis from a private, less expensive contractor in Portland, Ore., whose mechanics earned less.

It was outsourcing in reverse, an American victory in the global competition. "We had people visiting us from Europe to see what we were doing," Mr. Mohr said.

What these visitors saw as they approached the maintenance center was a strikingly futuristic light gray structure, trimmed jauntily in blue, that had risen in the rolling, grassy fields on the far side of the runways, opposite the terminal. The soaring entrance hall, designed to suggest a giant airliner cabin without seats, reflected the efficiencies that were built into nearly every aspect of the building. The mechanics came and went through this hall, where before or after a shift or during a meal break, they took care of nonproductive chores: banking at a credit union, visiting a personnel office, shopping at a small store.

On the eve of the closing, only Hangar 1A was active. A 737 was parked there, its interior gutted. It was the last airliner United would recondition in Indianapolis, and David Doucey, the maintenance center's operations manager, said matter-of-factly that although the mechanics had already received their layoff notices, they would finish the job seven or eight days faster than any other center could.

Parts from the dismantled interior were spread out on an unpainted wooden floor, a mezzanine that fit snugly around the plane just below the wings and stretched out 200 feet on either side. The servicing of many components removed from the cabin and cockpit took place there, eliminating the time required to send them to workshops elsewhere — the practice at other centers.

The time-saving features were numerous, and Mr. Doucey pointed them out. Hydraulic devices erect scaffolding around the plane in an hour, rather than the four hours required elsewhere. Parts are ordered by computer and delivered on an automated miniature railroad, rather than by hand or on bicycles as in other shops. A controlled climate permits mechanics to use fiberglass or graphite composites to patch a plane's outer skin without having to send the sections to special shops.

What drove away America West was the labor trouble that erupted over the Fourth of July weekend in 1999 and then mushroomed into a prolonged slowdown. In retrospect, that weekend was the turning point, the moment when the remarkable efficiencies that had been achieved at Indianapolis began to unwind, and labor-management tensions that had been accumulating suddenly asserted themselves.

IN an earlier era, the two sides would have tried to settle their differences through negotiation and would probably have succeeded. There was really no other alternative. The outsourcing of maintenance did not exist before the 1980's; airlines did their own maintenance. But now layoffs and outsourcing had become an easy and acceptable option. Everywhere in America, the barriers to layoffs came down one after another starting in the late 1970's, and by the turn of the century there was acquiescence.

The incident that started United down the road to outsourcing and layoffs seemed so minor. During the trusting years, the foremen had relaxed the restrictions on the number of mechanics who could take vacation days at the same time. For that Independence Day weekend, more than 100 mechanics had been granted time off — 10 times the prescribed number.

Mr. Mohr, the general manager, was himself on vacation in the days leading up to the weekend, and he called the office to remind his lieutenants to be careful about allowing too many mechanics to be away. Somehow that became a wholesale, last-minute cancellation of vacation time, outraging the mechanics. "To this day, they get upset when they talk about what happened that weekend," Mr. Doucey said.

The uproar over vacations stirred up other resentments — how United had gotten tough about sick days, how it had scaled back flexible hours, how it had substituted an 8-hour shift for a 10-hour one that allowed three- and four-day weekends, which the mechanics preferred.

"Once the vacation thing happened, that ignited a lot of small fires," Mr. Nunnally said. The militants in his local fanned those fires, arguing that the mechanics, because of their unique skills, were special people, essential to airline safety, and that United should be forced to recognize their value.

Mr. Mohr resisted this logic. "Anything we had to do to respond to the business environment was seized upon by the mechanics as something negative," he said. Mr. Nunnally, who was then chairman of the lodge's grievance committee, was caught between management and his members, his leadership challenged by the militants, who numbered nearly 300 mechanics. "I said to Mohr, 'I have to have some wins, too; I can't be beaten in every grievance and do nothing,' " Mr. Nunnally said. "I practically begged him to cooperate, and he could not do that."

BY the fall of 1999, the mechanics were engaged in a slowdown. That is not difficult when airline safety is at issue. If an inspector, drawn from the ranks of the mechanics, finds fault with a newly refurbished wing flap assembly or some other repair, he writes up a ticket reporting the flaw or a potential malfunction; even if there isn't a problem, time has to be spent to investigate the issue to the satisfaction of the Federal Aviation Administration.

As the mechanics had intended, turnaround time inched up, soon reaching 15 days and eventually more than 20 days for a 737. America West stopped sending planes to Indianapolis, as the mechanics had hoped. To regain the lost business, they expected United to restore some of the lost perquisites and thus win back the mechanics' cooperation. Jobs would be preserved, and on the mechanics' terms. That did not happen, and as the slowdown dragged on, work backed up on United's own airliners. For the first time, planes were parked on the tarmac outside the center, out of service — and not generating revenue — while awaiting overhaul.

Then, in July 2000, the mechanics slowed work even more by voting to withhold overtime, to protest what the militants viewed as management's recalcitrance in negotiating a new contract to replace one that had just expired. Mr. Nunnally, as grievance chairman, had spoken against withholding overtime, and worked it himself, in defiance of his militant members, but his point of view did not prevail.

Soon after, the outsourcing began. United diverted work from Indianapolis to private contractors in Alabama and North Carolina, contractors who employed nonunion mechanics — in most cases, at lower wages and with fewer benefits. "The outsourcing was a business decision," Mr. Mohr said. "The cycle time had gotten to the point that if we did not outsource, we would have aircraft continuously parked, waiting for maintenance."

When United and the union finally signed a new contract in March 2002 — 20 months after the old one expired — and the mechanics in Lodge 2294 lifted their ban on overtime, United continued to outsource maintenance, gradually shrinking the operation in Indianapolis. Under the new agreement, the mechanics' combined wages and benefits rose to more than $60 an hour, an increase of roughly $20. While that was the first increase in five years, the new total was double the labor cost of nonunion contractors. It was too big a spread for the mechanics in Indianapolis to overcome — unless they could return to the record turnarounds achieved in the late 1990's. But the old efficiency did not reappear.

Even if it had, the outsourcing would not have stopped, and for a reason quite apart from labor costs. United would not submit again to the leverage over maintenance operations that the mechanics in Indianapolis had exercised. Outsourcing had become too easy an alternative, and the airline crisis that followed the terrorist attacks of September 2001 only encouraged the practice.

What had started as an escape from a unionized, often militant work force took on a second function. The outsourcing of heavy maintenance became a means for the airlines to cut costs, and nearly every major airline gradually moved that way. In an earlier era, before layoffs and outsourcing were acceptable options, United might have weathered the crisis by taking in work from other airlines, as it had once done with America West. But layoffs and outsourcing were now standard practice, and rather than pursue economies of scale, United sought heavy maintenance at the lowest immediate cost. As work shifted away from Indianapolis, the layoffs multiplied.

The 60 mechanics gathered at the Days Inn that January evening were in the fourth wave to lose their jobs, bringing the total to 1,200. The recycling of former mechanics into new lines of work was now in full swing, and Mr. Nunnally, when he had finished speaking about the importance of filing promptly for unemployment benefits, introduced Tori E. Bucko. She turned out to be the main speaker, the chief of the boot camp that the mechanics were being encouraged to enter.

Given her responsibilities, Ms. Bucko was surprisingly young — only 30. But as the manager of a federally subsidized program for processing laid-off airline workers in Indianapolis, she would soon play a more important role in the lives of many of the mechanics than Mr. Nunnally or the union they were leaving behind.

The program that Ms. Bucko directed was sponsored by the Indianapolis Private Industry Council, a coalition of companies, unions, government agencies and civic groups. Virtually all of the funding comes from Washington, which sends less than $7 billion a year to the states to recycle laid-off workers back into jobs. In Indiana's case, the state distributes its share of the federal money to 16 regional work-force investment boards. The Indianapolis Private Industry Council is one of these boards, and the council in turn paid a private, nonprofit company, Goodwill Industries of Central Indiana, to do the actual work.

Goodwill employed Ms. Bucko as the manager in charge of the recycling program for laid-off airline workers in Marion County, whose boundaries encompass the city of Indianapolis. Goodwill also recycled men and women laid off in other industries in Marion County, recruiting them as they signed up for unemployment benefits at state-run offices. But in the winter of 2003, outcast airline employees, two-thirds of them United's mechanics, were still getting special attention in what was called the AIR Project, the short name for Airline Industry Re-careerment Project, a title that suggests just how awkward and difficult recycling is.

Ms. Bucko's task, in this initial presentation at the Days Inn, was to encourage the 60 mechanics to take the next step. There would be no help for them if they failed to show up at the AIR Project's center, in an industrial park not far from the airport. There, they would be asked to fill out a detailed enrollment application and submit to a series of workshops and evaluations.

What Ms. Bucko did not mention was the pressure on her employer, Goodwill Industries, and on herself, to meet the employment goals specified in the federal grant — to get most of the mechanics re-employed at 90 percent of their previous wage. Meeting this goal was a condition for getting more federal money once the initial grant expired. In the end, Goodwill managed to put together enough money to string out the AIR Project for nearly four years. But the employment goals were not met. They could not be met; they were too optimistic, mythically optimistic.

Ms. Bucko knew that as she struggled to meet the standard. So did Carolyn Brown, vice president of the Indianapolis Private Industry Council, the agency that picked Goodwill Industries to run the project. "When large numbers of people are laid off, there just isn't any occupational cluster that is waiting out there to receive them," Ms. Brown said.

Job training, as a result, became a channeling process, channeling the unemployed into the unfilled jobs that do exist, with a veneer of training along the way. Yet job training is central to employment policy. It has been since 1982, when Congress passed the Job Training Partnership Act at the urging of President Ronald Reagan. President Bill Clinton took job training even further, making it available to higher-income workers — including the aircraft mechanics in Indianapolis.

Saying that the country should solve the skills shortage through education and training became part of nearly every politician's stump speech, an innocuous way to address the politics of unemployment without strengthening either the bargaining leverage of workers or the federal government's role in bolstering labor markets.

But training for what? The reality, as the aircraft mechanics discovered, is painfully different from the reigning wisdom. Rather than having a shortage of skills, millions of American workers have more skills than their jobs require. That is particularly true of college-educated people, who make up 30 percent of the population today, up from 10 percent in the 1960's. They often find themselves working in sales or as office administrators, or taking jobs in hotels and restaurants, or becoming carpenters, flight attendants and word processors.

The number of jobs that require a bachelor's degree has indeed been growing, but more slowly than the number of graduates, according to the Labor Department, and that trend is likely to continue through this decade. "The average college graduate is doing very well," said Lawrence F. Katz, a labor economist at Harvard. "But on the margin, college graduates appear to be more vulnerable than in the past."

The Labor Department's Bureau of Labor Statistics offers a rough estimate of the imbalance in the demand for jobs as opposed to the supply. Each month since December 2000, it has surveyed the number of job vacancies across the country and compared it with the number of unemployed job seekers. On average, there were 2.6 job seekers for every job opening over the first 41 months of the survey. That ratio would have been even higher, according to the bureau, if the calculation had included the millions of people who stopped looking for work because they did not believe that they could get decent jobs.

So the demand for jobs is considerably greater than the supply, and the supply is not what the reigning theory says it is. Most of the unfilled jobs pay low wages and require relatively little skill, often less than the jobholder has. From the spring of 2003 to the spring of 2004, for example, more than 55 percent of the hiring was at wages of $13.25 an hour or less: hotel and restaurant workers, health care employees, temporary replacements and the like.

That trend is likely to continue. Seven of the 10 occupations expected to grow the fastest from 2002 through 2012, according to the Labor Department, pay less than $13.25 an hour, on average: retail salesclerks, customer service representatives, food service workers, cashiers, janitors, nurse's aides and hospital orderlies.

The $13.25 threshold is important. More than 45 percent of the nation's workers, whatever their skills, earned less than $13.25 an hour in 2004, or $27,600 a year for a full-time worker. That is roughly the income that a family of four must have in many parts of the country to maintain a standard of living minimally above the poverty level. Surely lack of skill and education does not hold down the wages of nearly half the work force.

Something quite different seems to be true: the oversupply of skilled workers is driving people into jobs beneath their skills and driving down the pay of jobs equal to their skills. Both happened to the aircraft mechanics laid off by United.

Ms. Bucko's results in recycling workers into new jobs were as good as any in the country. Hers was a showcase program, better financed than most, and in the aircraft mechanics she had skilled people who urgently wanted to get back to their previous income levels. By the spring of 2004, however, out of more than 800 mechanics from United who had gone through her program or were still going through it, only 185 were working again.

Despite their skill, 33 of those 185, or 18 percent, were earning less than $13.25 an hour working in warehouses, on construction jobs, in restaurants or in retailing. Some were "throwing boxes," as the mechanics put it, for FedEx, which paid them only $10 an hour at its shipping center in Indianapolis. They took the work, which entailed loading and unloading air freight packages, for two reasons: FedEx offered them company-paid health insurance, which some of the mechanics desperately wanted, and they saw in the job a gamble worth the hardship, given the glum alternatives.

After a year on the payroll they would qualify as insiders to bid for an aircraft mechanic's slot at FedEx, when one came open. Although the company is nonunion, it paid its mechanics $25 an hour or more in Indianapolis, roughly comparable to what the mechanics had earned at United.

Earning the old level of pay again was rare. Of the 185 mechanics back at work in the spring of 2004, most earned $14 to $20 an hour as heating and air-conditioning repairmen, auto mechanics, computer maintenance workers, freight train conductors (CSX happened to be hiring) or cross-country tractor-trailer drivers, having graduated from a two-week driver-training course offered by Ms. Bucko's people.

THE relatively high number of mechanics who became truck drivers angered Mr. Nunnally, the union leader, who now made a living washing windows, which he did in partnership with another former mechanic. "Here's a guy who fixed planes and now he is encouraged to be a truck driver, and at first he is offended that they would even suggest that he become a professional truck driver," Mr. Nunnally said. "But from the point of view of the people in Tori Bucko's operation, who have seen guys with families run out of severance pay and unemployment benefits, from their point of view, it is: 'How do you get these guys back into the job market as quickly as possible?' "

Ms. Bucko put it more succinctly. They see a commercial driver's license as a "quick fix," she said. " 'Send me to two weeks' truck driving school,' they say. 'I'll get my C.D.L. I'll hit the road.' And many have done that," she added.

Only 15 of the re-employed mechanics had regained their United wage level or exceeded it, and 8 of those 15 did so by becoming aircraft mechanics again. Several of the mechanics, stifling reluctance and resentment, had left Indianapolis to work for the companies that United and other airlines were using to do heavy aircraft maintenance. They were mostly younger mechanics with relatively little seniority when United laid them off and were still low on the wage scale, earning $19 or $20 an hour, which is what the outsourcing contractors also paid them. For the contractors, however, $19 or $20 an hour was top pay.

The wage loss from layoffs is now a pattern that shows up not only in individual cases, like that of the United mechanics, but in national surveys as well. Two years after a layoff, two-thirds of the victims say they are working again, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Of those two-thirds, only 40 percent, on average, make as much as they had in their old jobs, a less drastic result than that for the aircraft mechanics, but the same general breakdown.

The rest are making less, often much less. Out of 100 laid-off workers, then, 27 make their old salary again, or more — and 73 make less, or are not working at all. That downward pull contributes to the wage stagnation that has persisted for most of the work force, with only occasional relief, since the 1970's.

Ms. Bucko's presentation to the 60 mechanics gathered at the Days Inn was a crucial first step in the process of funneling the mechanics back into jobs, and she went at it bluntly, encouraging them to sign up but also dousing them with a demeaning reality. They must start from scratch in their search for a job, she told them, and she offered workshops in résumé writing and in how to behave in job interviews.

When searching for work in other fields, the mechanics will find themselves taking entry-level tests that more and more employers require of job applicants. In preparation for those tests, her center offered training in algebra — mainly fractions and decimals — and in spelling. Mistakes in these basic skills can mean rejection for a job, she explained.

The mechanics listened in utter silence as she canceled out their past. "We will do career assessment, to bring out the skills that you have, not just skill in the work you think you want, but skills you don't realize you have," she explained. "If you are a coach on your son's or daughter's team, that is a transferable skill."

Discouraged by such talk, some of the mechanics did not show up at the AIR Project center to enroll in Ms. Bucko's boot camp, and those that did found themselves facing more obstacles as Ms. Bucko and her team tried to winnow out all but the most motivated — those most determined to complete the training programs. Ms. Bucko said there was no choice. The federal funds for training fell far short of the demand. The only way to stretch the money was to put up obstacles. Even then, most of the people who did complete the program could not find jobs at anywhere near their old pay.

The process was like a funnel: wide at one end, where all the laid-off workers go in, and narrow at the other, where a limited number gradually emerge into retraining and, if they are lucky, new jobs at decent pay. Mark A. Crouch, a professor of labor studies at Indiana University, used another analogy to describe the recycling of laid-off workers. He called it a "burial program."

US, Russians Meeting To End Deadlock On Iran (AFP)

AFP, March 27, 2006

US and Russian diplomats were meeting in a new bid to end the impasse over a UN response to Iran's controversial nuclear program, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice acknowledged during a round of Sunday television talk shows that differences persisted over the language of a UN Security Council statement seeking to keep Iran from pursuing sensitive nuclear work.

She said she spoke Friday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and they agreed to have their negotiators work through the weekend in an attempt to hammer out language acceptable to both.

"I think they're going to meet later today, to try and resolve these differences, because we do need to speak and speak with one voice," the chief US diplomat told the Fox News Sunday program.

"But we shouldn't delay," she later told CNN's "Late Edition," adding that "we do need a presidential statement that makes clear to the Iranians what is clear to everyone."

No word was available on the progress of efforts to thrash out a Security Council presidential statement on Iran's uranium-enrichment activities that Washington suspects are aimed at building a nuclear bomb.

Russia and China, two of the council's five veto-wielding permanent members, have balked at even threatening sanctions against Iran for a nuclear program that Tehran insists is for strictly peaceful purposes.

The United States has been pushing for a tough approach, backed by France and Britain -- which are also permanent members of the Security Council -- and Germany.

Rice told NBC television that once agreement was reached on a UN statement, the United States might seek a ministerial meeting of the council's permanent members plus Germany "to talk about charting a course forward."

Will This Man Get The Bomb? (TIME)

By Johanna McGeary

Time, March 26, 2006

Let's start with a simple proposition: no one wants Iran to have the Bomb. The country doesn't actually possess nukes yet, but much of the world suspects that it is hell-bent on building them under the cover of its nuclear-energy program--and the loose-cannon bluster of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad only reinforces that conviction. That's why diplomats and nuclear watchdogs in the U.S., Europe and other parts of the world have spent so much time trying to stop Iran's nuclear program in its tracks.

So far, however, the joint diplomatic offensive hasn't produced much in the way of results. The Bush Administration's National Security Strategy, issued this month, names Iran the most challenging "single country" to U.S. interests, leaving open the possibility of pre-emptive strikes against Iran's nuclear program. The U.S. and Europe have persuaded Russia and China to join them in reporting Iran's failure to cooperate with international demands to the U.N. Security Council, but both countries oppose punitive action such as economic sanctions. The U.S. spent last week pushing the five permanent members of the Security Council to sign on to a British-drafted statement urging Iran to open its books and lab doors to intrusive international inspections. But the plan met resistance from Russia, which wants to avoid Security Council involvement altogether. "It's a fundamental problem," says a senior U.S. official. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov but made little headway. She plans to visit Berlin, Paris and Britain this week in an effort to hammer out a statement that can win unanimous backing in the Security Council. Meanwhile, Tehran has sped up research work on the uranium enrichment that lies at the heart of the dispute. Diplomats who have been briefed on Iran's program by international inspectors say the country has developed the ability to enrich uranium, the first step on the pathway to the Bomb. "They're progressing much faster than we thought they would," says a knowledgeable U.S. official. "They seem to know what they're doing."

There lies the deadlock. The U.S. and Iran have shown a faint willingness to lower the temperature, by agreeing to hold talks over Iranian interference in Iraq. But it's unclear whether Tehran hopes to use the talks over Iraq as a way to open the subject of nukes--or to distract the West's attention from it. Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, told TIME that the regime may be open to compromise on the nuclear issue. "If there is a proposal that the rights of Iran can be secured to some extent for the present time and the other rights through negotiations, we are open to that." Yet the Bush Administration doesn't expect the Iraq discussions will lead to a breakthrough on the nuclear front. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley dismisses Iran's overture as "simply a device by the Iranians to divert pressure that they are feeling in New York."

The willingness of the U.S. and Europe to make a deal has always been compromised by Iran's unpredictability. At this point, there are few outside Tehran who consider its behavior anything but destabilizing, if not sinister. The West is operating on the assumption that the Iranians are trying to develop the technology and expertise required for building a bomb as rapidly as possible--and that given the regime's support for terrorism, its stated desire to destroy Israel and the prospect of a new arms race in the Middle East, the world can't afford to let them succeed. Yet there is still nothing close to unanimity on what that means in practice. History has already shown how difficult it is to curb the nuclear ambitions of a state that is determined to get the Bomb. Witness the examples of India, Pakistan and North Korea, all of which have openly defied international strictures against acquiring nuclear weapons. With so much bluster on all sides, here is a breakdown of the issues at the heart of Iran's showdown with the West--and what is at stake for the world in the outcome.

What Does Iran Want?

THAT DEPENDS ON WHOM YOU ASK. WHAT IS clear is that Iran has pursued a nuclear program for decades, ever since the U.S. first fed the Shah's appetite for reactors. Experts generally believe that Tehran has coveted the Bomb as well. Under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, signed by Iran in 1968, the country is legally entitled to build reactors and make enriched uranium fuel as a source of energy, as long as it abides by treaty rules and allows the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to monitor what it is doing. Iran has consistently denied that it intends to scale up fuel-grade enriched uranium into the purer weapons-grade component of a bomb. Iranians say they have the same rights as other countries to technology and are just looking out for their long-term energy future.

The trouble is, almost no one believes that's all Iran is after. Iran had concealed clandestine efforts to make enriched uranium from IAEA inspectors for two decades, until its secret lab at Natanz was exposed by an exile opposition group in 2002. Iran eventually owned up to the deception, telling the IAEA that since the West had denied Iran reactors for decades, it had to go underground to become self-sufficient in fuel. The revelations led the IAEA to put seals on Iran's test centrifuges while Britain, France and Germany tried to negotiate guarantees that Iran's nuclear program could never be shifted to weapons production--an effort that the U.S. backed after initial hesitation. But those talks collapsed in January when Iran refused to abandon its insistence that it retain the rights to proceed with enrichment. The Iranians broke the seals on their most sensitive equipment and vowed to press ahead. According to diplomats and U.S. officials, experts from the IAEA have reported that Iran is on the verge of assembling and operating a 164-centrifuge cascade, machinery that has peaceful applications but can also eventually be used to make fuel for a bomb.

To this day, Iranian officials assert that their uranium-enrichment activities are purely for energy or research purposes rather than military ones. "There's no place for nuclear weapons in our national security doctrine," Larijani told TIME. He points out that Supreme Leader Ayatullah Ali Khamenei has issued a fatwa forbidding the use of nuclear weapons. But such claims were undermined again in January when the IAEA reported an administrative link between a uranium-conversion program known as Green Salt and efforts to weaponize missiles that, for the first time, appeared to show an attempt to harness the nuclear program for military purposes.

Is Iran Close To Getting the Bomb?

NOT NECESSARILY. UNDERPINNING THE current air of crisis is uncertainty about how soon Iran could manage bomb production. Western intelligence on the intentions and capabilities of nuclear aspirants is notoriously unreliable. Thus far, the IAEA says, Iran has the knowledge but not the capacity to make weapons. Some experts say that if Iran's enrichment facilities became fully operational, they could churn out enough material to construct two bombs a year. John Negroponte, Director of National Intelligence, said recently that "Iran, if it continues on its current path, will likely have the capability to produce a nuclear weapon within the next decade." What is already worrisome is that once Iran has the fissile material to make a bomb, it would have ready ways to threaten to use it. In 2004 Iran unveiled the Shahab-3 missile, with a range long enough to reach Israel and southern Europe. At the military parade in which it was first shown, one of the missiles carried the scrawl WIPE ISRAEL OFF THE MAP!

For years Iran alternately hid its activities and negotiated with the West over their scope. Over the past three years, both sides have focused on rebuilding confidence rather than provoking confrontation, but those overtures have lately all but vanished amid Iran's increasingly provocative behavior.

Why Is Iran Picking a Fight?

MANY IRANIANS POINT TO THE POLITICAL ambitions of Ahmadinejad. The hard-line President who just squeezed past more experienced candidates to take office has seized on the nuclear issue to cement his claim to power, according to some top government advisers. He can bypass the ruling clerics by appealing to the street, framing the right to nuclear energy as a populist cause and the centerpiece of his campaign to restore revolutionary ideals--and solidify his base in the military and revolutionary apparatus. That requires a return to the 1980s atmosphere of siege, rallying Iranians by whipping up animosity toward a common enemy, the West. To a generation forged in the heat of revolution and war, diplomacy is akin to slow surrender. "He's using the nuclear issue," says a Tehran political science professor, "to send a message to the Iranian people that he's tough, capable of standing up for Iran and fundamentally different from his soft predecessors."

Ahmadinejad's confrontational approach is reportedly causing consternation within Iran's clerical establishment, especially at the Supreme National Security Council, in which ultimately the decisions on the nuclear issue are made. In a recent TIME interview in Tehran, Larijani extended an olive branch of sorts to the Bush Administration, saying Iran could agree to direct talks with Washington on nuclear and other issues. "You have differences of views with us. Having differences of view does not mean animosity," he said. "We have no problems negotiating ... provided that Mr. Bush does not harangue us." The U.S. has ruled out direct nuclear talks.

Despite such conciliatory rhetoric from some Iranian officials, it is likely that many of the mullahs still dream of a robust nuclear program--if Iran had the capacity to make a bomb, it would get the respect it deserves. That conforms with Iran's self-image as a nation whose glorious past and potential greatness are undermined by implacable enemies such as the U.S. According to experts inside and outside the country, the regime sees bargaining over its nuclear rights as a way to recast the strategic balance in the region in Iran's favor, to gain stature and recognition of the Islamic Republic as a powerful geopolitical player. A history of invasions has left Iran wary of its neighbors, especially now that it is encircled by countries that possess atom bombs--Russia, Pakistan and India as well as Israel. Now that U.S. troops occupy two next-door states, Iran's leaders see the nuclear card as a way to buy security guarantees for the country and survival for the regime. It wants Washington to stop pushing "regime change" and accept the existence of an Iranian Islamic Republic. But even as Iranian officials deny that they plan to build a bomb, they point out that once North Korea tested a nuclear device, Western threats against Pyongyang ceased.

One reason Iran is acting up may be that its leaders see this as a moment when the game of brinkmanship is tilted in its favor. The country is in a nationalist mood; for the man in the street, more concerned with economic issues, the appeal is simple: If other countries can have nuclear power and atom bombs, why can't we? High oil prices and an overstretched U.S. military combine to lessen the West's capacity to react. So too, Iran's leaders think, does Iran's influence with the Shi'ite majority in Iraq and the newly elected Hamas leaders in the Palestinian territories. Getting loud and ugly about Israel earns Iran credibility and support in the Muslim world. And the regime may have decided that thumbing its nose at the nonproliferation treaty and at IAEA inspections is worth the international disapprobation, gambling that its extensive commercial ties with Russia and China will insulate it from punitive Security Council measures.

What Iran seems to be playing for, above all, is time. The longer it can string out the diplomatic process, the further it can proceed down the road toward completing the fuel cycle. It is possible that Iran may even agree to suspend uranium enrichment at some point in the near future, knowing that it has already created new facts on the ground. If the regime were then to change its mind again, says Mark Fitzpatrick, a longtime veteran of the U.S. State Department who is now at London's International Institute for Strategic Studies, "it would resume from a new starting point, with uranium conversion up and running and the enrichment process under way."

What Are the U.S.'s Options?

MISTRUST OF IRAN'S INTENTIONS HAS soured the Bush Administration and the Europeans on any deal that would allow Tehran to retain enrichment capacities. U.S. attitudes have hardened in response to Ahmadinejad, and Washington seems to have little interest in any grand bargain that would offer the theocratic regime security guarantees. Thus diplomacy for the moment is centered on the U.N. But even if Iran fails to accept demands that it submit to involuntary inspections, the challenge of reaching consensus on sanctions with real teeth could take months, if it can be achieved at all. The search is already on for selective embargoes that might stand a chance of passage. "It's not going to be oil for food," says a Bush Administration official. "I don't have a clue as to what they are, but fine minds are working on trying to sort out what could get support." Still, Washington's allies know that it's tough to design economic restrictions that will hurt the regime without hurting the Iranian people and realize how effectively Iran's leaders could use blunderbuss penalties to unify the nation behind them.

The bleak outlook for diplomacy fuels speculation that the U.S. and Israel might use military force to destroy Iran's nuclear facilities. While the military option is "never off the table," officials in both capitals say contingency plans for an air strike "are not under active consideration as an option now." Most experts say only that the U.S. has the air power and long-range fueling capability to carry out the multiple attacks that would be required to inflict serious damage on Iran's nuclear facilities--but they acknowledge that the U.S. military already has its hands full in Iraq and Afghanistan. Although some in the Middle East fear that Israel might attempt to repeat its 1981 solo raid on Iraq's incipient nuclear bomb, a senior Israeli intelligence officer says, "We won't act alone. Why should we? It's a global problem."

The costs of a military strike would well outweigh the benefits. That would be no simple raid but a major military operation taking several weeks, akin to the opening onslaught on Iraq in 2003. Not just the nuclear sites but Iran's air defenses and retaliatory machinery as well would have to be destroyed. The collateral damage in Iranian casualties from the attacks or radioactive fallout could be severe, as could the political backlash against moderates and opponents of the existing regime. And then, how much would Iran's nuclear ambitions be set back? "You can't bomb know-how," says IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei. A U.S. analyst guesses "at best, two to four years." And, he adds, "while we went to war, Iran would not sit idle. It would strike back at a time and place of its own choosing"--including sponsoring attacks on U.S. and British troops in Iraq and perhaps even terrorist strikes inside the U.S. and Europe.

Is there a way out? The most encouraging fact about the standoff is that neither side has much to gain from precipitating a military confrontation. At the same time, it is unlikely that the major differences over Iran's nuclear intentions can be resolved in a way that is wholly satisfying to both Iran and the West. The most realistic hope for Washington and its allies may lie in using diplomatic measures to delay Tehran's nuclear development long enough to allow for the emergence of a more moderate Iranian leadership that could be persuaded to abandon its nuclear dreams. But if those efforts fail, this U.S. President, or the next one, may confront a sobering choice: live with the reality of a nuclear Iran, or take the risk of attacking it. All of which leads to another, simple proposition: get ready for the world to become a more dangerous place.

In Iran, Even Some On Right Warning Against Extremes (WP)

By Karl Vick

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

TEHRAN -- Nine months after the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president, Iranian politics has shifted so sharply to the right that some traditional conservatives are warning of the dangers of radicalism.

With reformists sidelined and Ahmadinejad setting a strident new tone on the global stage, figures from the extreme right of Iran's political spectrum are defining the terms of political debate in the country. In remarks that set off a domestic firestorm, a senior cleric close to the new president suggested in January that Iranian voters were largely irrelevant because the government requires only the approval of God.

The remarks by Ayatollah Taqi Mesbah, and similar comments by an aide, were roundly criticized, even on the editorial page of Kayhan, a traditional showcase for hard-line thinking. Iranian political insiders said the flap offered a window on intense infighting at the highest reaches of Iran's theocracy just as world attention is focused on the government's determination to proceed with a nuclear program that skeptics call a cover for atomic weapons.

"Ayatollah Mesbah is an extremist," said one Iranian official close to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the soft-spoken cleric who has been Iran's supreme leader since the death of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in 1989.

"Ayatollah Khomeini warned the people lots of times not to allow these people, the Shia Talibans, to come to power in Iran and have space," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, noting that Khamenei has judged it prudent to accommodate even extremists within the system and accord them respect. "Ayatollahs Khomeini and Khamenei feel these people can do a lot of damage. They can damage Iran. They can damage Islam. They are like the Taliban. They are like al-Qaeda. They say they know what Allah expects from us -- that we should do what he wants from us without paying attention to the consequences.

"And it's a very dangerous belief."

The tension highlights significant divisions within Iran's conservative camp, often viewed from outside the country as a turbaned monolith. In reality, 27 years after the 1979 revolution that brought Shiite clerics to power, Iranian politics is a nuanced landscape defined largely by the lessons taken from the previous quarter-century.

Traditional conservatives describe themselves as firm but flexible. While remaining committed to the precept that clerics should hold ultimate authority, they were chastened in the 1990s when reformists -- determined to lessen the intrusion of the state into private lives and show greater tolerance for dissent -- won landslide electoral victories.

Other conservatives, who proudly call themselves fundamentalists, argue that reformists were hollowing out the Islamic Republic from within. Equating dissent with treason, they demanded a hard-line defense of the revolution's tenets, including strident opposition to the United States and Israel.

In recent years, the two camps united at election time, making common cause against reformists. But after the votes were counted, moderate conservatives were left unsatisfied.

"There was a problem in our structure, our conservative political structure," said Amir Mohebian, a leader in a conservative faction that absorbed some reformist inclinations, including cautious engagement with the West. "We start very well, but the result was not under our control."

Mohebian said the outcomes of 2003 elections for local councils, the 2004 contest for parliament, "and now the presidency," were "not our result." Each succeeding contest tightened the right's grip.

One reason was the hard-line orientation of the Guardian Council, a screening panel that barred reformist candidates, producing a ballot skewed to the right.

That amplified another factor: turnout. The Basij civilian militia, and in last June's presidential contest the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, showed up most reliably at the polls, doing their duty as the core constituency Khamenei set out to create after succeeding Khomeini.

DOJ_NMG_0021317

"The Basij is mainly a creation of Mr. Khamenei," said one Iranian analyst, who declined to be quoted by name. "They spent a huge amount of money to reinforce these military groups. Basiji people and even the Revolutionary Guard people are really an artificial social class, like an artificial island."

Ahmadinejad spent most of his career in both groups, and he wrote huge increases for each into his first budget as president. He commanded a Revolutionary Guard engineering unit during the 1980s war with Iraq, the defining experience for many hard-liners holding fast to the slogans of a then-young revolution, and he was a leader in the Basij.

"He's a true believer in the revolutionary values, which we believe in, too," said Mohammad Ali Tai, 61, as he squatted on a curb at Tehran University, where Friday prayers are held in the capital. Usually, a few thousand people attend. Most are veterans like Tai, who returned home to lives that failed to improve materially while the governing elites grew wealthy.

"I am a barber myself. I talk to many people," Tai said. "They are only tolerating this hardship because they believe in Islam. Some people who were in charge did not believe in these values, and this inequality is because of them."

Each week, Tai attends a Basij meeting, and well as a gathering of his hayat , a community group that mounts celebrations for religious holidays. When Ahmadinejad was mayor of Tehran, he provided the groups with rice at discount prices.

"Everything we do is actually a matter of keeping alive the revolutionary spirit," said Tai, who said he voted in the previous two presidential contests for Mohammad Khatami, a reformist. "But this time the Basij told us: Only vote for Ahmadinejad, and don't vote for anybody else."

If such groups were key to Ahmadinejad's electoral success, the cocooning cycle of their meetings -- offering mutual reinforcement and fealty to a shared vision -- provides insight into the staying power of his rigid outlook. Friends say he held to it stubbornly when others adjusted their views to the post-revolution realities that spawned Iran's reform movement.

"He always thought that was a deviation from the true path of the revolution," said Nasser Hadian-Jazy, who has known Ahmadinejad since grade school. "Equality, justice, humility, being simple, supporting Muslims, opposing global arrogance -- he was never ashamed of these principles. Never."

Hadian-Jazy, himself a revolutionary who evolved into a reformist, said he marveled at seeing his old friend wearing a checkered headdress around his shoulders on a university campus in 1998, a deeply unfashionable gesture at the height of the reform movement. "His sense of overconfidence, to me, that's not a positive point. But that's the way he is," said Hadian-Jazy, now a political scientist at Tehran University. "He's naive. The black and white area of his mind is a lot bigger than the gray area."

Insiders say these are the qualities that keep Iran's hard-liners in the extremes.

"Because of their religious beliefs, these people are inflexible," said a former senior official in Khatami's government, who declined to be identified further. "Although their number might be few, the certainty of their belief lets them resist a larger population. The supporters of civil society and reformists are less hard, less ready to be damaged because of their belief."

"Whenever someone is fixed in his thinking, we call them hard-liners," said Mehdi Karrubi, a moderate cleric who lost narrowly to Ahmadinejad in the first round of last year's presidential balloting. "A group of people just come together. They talk to each other and say: This is what the society thinks!"

Mesbah, the cleric whose speech touched off the current conflict in the conservative camp, is praised even by critics for his intellect. He leads a well-funded seminary in the holy city of Qom and has forged a reputation for steeling the resolve of Iran's harshest conservatives, famously declaring: "If someone tells you he has a new interpretation of Islam, sock him in the mouth!"

A cartoonist dubbed him "Ayatollah Crocodile" for encouraging suppression of the press. One follower, now Ahmadinejad's intelligence minister, once bit a journalist on the shoulder. Another, now Ahmadinejad's interior minister, oversaw the execution of thousands of prisoners in the late 1980s.

Many of Mesbah's former students hold places in the Revolutionary Guard's ideological and political section. The cleric encourages students to study in Canada and the United States, which critics say does little to soften their views. Most eventually return to Qom.

Mesbah's followers have now set their sights, Hadian-Jazy said, on gaining control of the panel of clerics that is empowered to name Iran's supreme leader -- an open-ended appointment that has been assumed to run a lifetime. Called the Assembly of Experts, the 86-member body will be elected in nationwide balloting set for October.

Mesbah is expected to field a slate of graduates from his seminary, and in the preelection positioning now underway, some see preparations for a kind of coup. But the boldness hard-liners have shown since Ahmadinejad's surprise win -- on a populist platform that emphasized quality of life -- has unsettled many here.

"I believe the traditional right wing is worried," said Saeed Laylaz, an analyst who served in the first reformist administration of Khatami. "Until now they used each other as a horse to ride from one place to the other, and each thought the other was the rider."

Ahmadinejad's triumph, he said, clarified the driving force.

"When you create radicals, they don't stop when you want them to," Laylaz said. "The leader can order when they leave the barracks, but they decide when to go back. This is the dangerous position of the supreme leader and the right wing right now."

Putting The Money And Ideas Behind Nation-Building (WP)

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

The Bush administration says it is not pursuing "regime change" in Iran. But it is promoting democracy in the Islamic Republic. This is excerpted from the "Iran Democracy Program Announcement," as posted by the State Department, seeking applicants to help with the project.

Funding Opportunity Description: The Office of the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI) announces an open competition for grant applications that support democratic governance and reform in Iran.

This represents a new MEPI funding initiative, and submissions must outline activities linked to reform and demonstrate how the proposed approach would achieve sustainable impact in Iran. . . . MEPI has particular interest in supporting programs that are innovative and that meet needs and opportunities not already addressed by current donor funding.

Accordingly, this request seeks projects to broaden and deepen within Iran the means and modes of publicly expressed and responsible citizen views on reform in all its aspects. The range of possible themes and issues includes, but is not limited to:

· freedom of association;

· the right of citizens to access independent sources of information;

· the right to advocate responsibly on important issues and debate ideas freely with other citizens and local, regional, and national government representatives without fear of retribution, including through democratically organized and legal political parties;

· the right to participate in local and national governance processes;

· the right to transparent and effective government services, including regular public accountability for monies spent;

· the right to speedy, fair, and transparent access to courts of law to settle civil, commercial, and criminal matters;

· the right to participate as candidates and supporters in transparently organized, free, fair and competitive democratic elections.

MEPI seeks to strengthen the community of Iranian reformers at the local and national levels and support reformers with demonstrated commitment as they work to build broader alliances with new stakeholder groups around issues of core democratic values.

MEPI supports programs that link reformers within and across national boundaries and use local organizational capacity to leverage opportunities to advance reform.

Israel Pledges Consultations Over Pullout (AP)

By Mark Lavie, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 27, 2006

Two days before a crucial election, acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to consult the United States and Europe about his plan to pull out of much of the West Bank, remove settlements and set his country's borders within four years.

Olmert's Kadima party is ahead in the polls, and his two main opponents devoted the end of their campaigns to criticizing him and his plan, after declaring the vote a referendum on the future of Israel's presence in the West Bank, captured from Jordan in the 1967 Mideast War.

No official campaigning is allowed Monday, the day before the election. Israeli soldiers along the Lebanon border began voting Sunday, the military said.

A poll for Channel 10 TV and the Haaretz daily released Sunday showed Kadima winning 36 seats of the 120 in the parliament, the hawkish Likud 14 and the moderate Labor 18. Pollster Camil Fuchs said the survey questioned 800 voters with a margin of error of less than 3 percentage points. He said 22 percent remained undecided. In all, 31 parties are competing.

Olmert's plan has breathed life into an election campaign that has been sleepy despite earthquakes in Israeli politics — the exit of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who was felled by a stroke on Jan. 4 shortly after he founded Kadima and is still in a coma.

Olmert, who took over Kadima from Sharon, proposes completing a barrier between Israel and the West Bank that has been under construction for more than four years, incorporating main settlement blocs on the "Israeli" side and moving settlers outside the barrier into the blocs.

Olmert said he would try to build consensus around the plan in the fractious Israeli public. Settlers, hawkish supporters and most Orthodox Jews opposed Sharon's unilateral pullout from Gaza last summer, forcing Sharon to reshuffle his Cabinet, leave Likud and create Kadima.

Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu told Israel Radio "these borders that our political rivals are proposing will not be defensible."

The U.S. and Europe have opposed Israeli settlements in the West Bank and have called for borders to be fixed through negotiations, not unilateral action.

Olmert told Israel radio he is hopeful he can gain support for his position.

"I have a basis to believe that there is great openness in the United States and in other places to listen to these positions and also to seriously discuss them," Olmert said

Labor leader Amir Peretz on Sunday criticized Kadima, though the two parties are seen most likely to serve together in a coalition government.

Kadima "gave legitimacy to all the most negative trends that can occur in a democracy," Peretz said, pointing to the candidates' history of cronyism and charges of corruption.

On Sunday, Israeli official Shlomo Dror said Israel's liaison officers in the West Bank will stop dealing with the Palestinian Authority after the Hamas Cabinet takes office, switching their focus to international organizations.

Israel has already suspended transfer of taxes and customs it collects for the Palestinians, and Western donors are considering cuts in vital international aid once Hamas takes office.

Olmert has said he would give Hamas, which swept Jan. 25 Palestinian legislative elections, some time to show whether it would accept basic demands put by Israel and the Western world: recognizing Israel, endorsing interim peace accords and renouncing violence after a history of dispatching suicide bombers into Israel.

Olmert Wants U.S. Backing Before Pullouts (AP)

By Ramit Plushnick-masti, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 27, 2006

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Sunday he planned to get U.S. backing before pushing forward with his plan to withdraw from much of the West Bank, maintain control of major settlement blocs and draw Israel's final borders by 2010.

Meanwhile, candidates made a last-ditch effort to win over voters amid fears of an unprecedented low turnout in Tuesday's election. The three top candidates gave interviews to Israel Radio, trying to clarify their differences and launching final, fierce attacks on their rivals.

Fearing that Palestinian militants could launch a terror attack in the tense days before the vote, Israel's security forces declared a high state of alert beginning Sunday, putting extra forces on the streets and keeping a tight closure on the West Bank.

Meanwhile, soldiers scheduled for duty on Tuesday began voting Sunday.

Following a lackluster campaign that aroused little emotion, pollsters are predicting a voter turnout of around 60 percent, the lowest in Israel's history. In a sign of voter apathy, the blocs of campaign ads broadcast on television over the past three weeks were watched by an average of 14.4 percent of Israelis, their lowest ratings ever, Israel Radio reported.

DOJ_NMG_0021320

A low turnout could cause the most damage to Olmert's centrist Kadima Party, which is the clear front-runner, analysts said. Speaking before the weekly Cabinet meeting Sunday, Olmert called on Israelis to go to the polls.

"There is no greater or more significant way to exercise your right as a citizen then that which allows you to decide through a vote the fate of the country and the character of the state's government," Olmert said. "Therefore I tell all the citizens of the state of Israel: Go vote."

A dovish institute took out a full-page ad in the Israeli daily Haaretz on Sunday, warning that low turnout could bring the hawkish Likud leader, former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, to power.

Amnon Dankner, editor of the Israeli daily Maariv, wrote a lengthy appeal to Israelis: "Get out and vote and ... you will know that you took part in determining your fate with serious and mature deliberation, and did not enshroud yourself with shame and catastrophe because you were spoiled and foolish."

Sunday was the last full day of campaigning before the vote. Political parties are barred from campaigning 24 hours before the election.

In his interview with Israel Radio, Olmert expanded on his plan to determine Israel's final borders, if necessary through unilateral West Bank pullouts.

"I spoke about negotiations with the United States and the international community and I spoke about final borders that the entire international community will support, including the United States," he said. "I have a basis to believe that there is great openness in the United States, and in other places, to listen to these arguments and also to seriously discuss them."

The Palestinians oppose Olmert's plan, saying Israel has no right to retain any settlements and final borders can only be decided through negotiations.

Amir Peretz, head of the dovish Labor Party, which is expected to finish a distant second in the polls, used his last day of campaigning to attack Nobel Peace laureate Shimon Peres, the longtime Labor leader who defected to Kadima after losing a party primary to Peretz.

Pollsters predict that Netanyahu will come in third, a serious blow to the Likud Party that has dominated Israeli politics for most of the past three decades. Netanyahu attacked Olmert and Peretz, but also defended the economic moves he is being lambasted for taking when he served as finance minister under Sharon.

Assuming that Olmert — who replaced Ariel Sharon after the prime minister suffered a massive stroke Jan. 4 — will be the next prime minister, Israel Radio commentators pushed him to talk about the makeup of his government and how he would divvy up Cabinet positions.

Olmert refused to comment on positions, but said only parties that accept his plan to pullout of isolated West Bank settlements could join his government.

Israeli Labor Struggles With Core Voters (AP)

By Ravi Nessman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 27, 2006

When Amir Peretz took over Israel's Labor Party late last year, he was hailed as a savior who could bring working-class Middle Eastern Jews into the foundering movement of an aging European-descended elite.

But as Labor prepares for Israel's election Tuesday, it faces a flight of the very European voters who are its base.

Labor defectors say they left because they think Peretz is inexperienced and secretly a hard-core socialist, and believe the new, centrist Kadima Party has the best chance to break the stalemate with the Palestinians.

But party veterans insist a key reason is what the Israeli media call "the ethnic demon" — the divide between European-descended Ashkenazis and Middle Eastern Sephardis, and a widespread aversion to a Sephardi becoming prime minister.

They point to Israelis' preoccupation with Peretz's humble beginnings in the Israeli backwater of Sderot, his lack of a college degree and his shaky English.

"It's difficult for them to accept that someone from Morocco will become prime minister," said Gidon Ben Yisrael, a party veteran and parliamentary candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0021321

While Peretz has pulled many new Sephardic voters into the party, nearly 40 percent of Israelis who voted Labor in the last election have left, pollster Rafi Smith said. Traditionally Labor pulled three times more votes from Ashkenazis than from Sephardis; now the numbers are roughly equal, he said.

The result is that instead of showing a boost from Peretz's rise, Labor is attracting about the same national support as in the last election — some 20 seats in Israel's 120-member parliament.

Peretz is undaunted. Traveling around the country, the former union leader stumps for a higher minimum wage, increased education funding and guaranteed pensions for the elderly.

At the same time, Labor has phoned more than 70,000 retirees who failed to renew their party membership after Peretz took over.

Peretz, 54, says their defection surprised him. "I was sure that the veteran party members would be happy that I got them new voters," he said in an interview with The Associated Press on his campaign bus after a round of handshaking and bear hugs with voters in a Jerusalem shopping district.

Ashkenazi Jews have always been the dominant force in Labor, while Sephardis gravitated toward the hard-line Likud, believing that Labor policies had consigned them to the social fringes.

Peretz, who was born in Morocco and moved to Israel with his family when he was 4, says it was an electoral distortion for blue-collar Sephardis to vote for a fiscally conservative party while affluent Ashkenazis voted Labor.

In November, Peretz stunned Labor and its core supporters in the tony suburbs of Tel Aviv by defeating their veteran leader, Polish-born Shimon Peres, in the party primary.

It was an upset that produced some unpleasant moments. Peres' brother, Gigi, called Peretz a "foreign body" in the party and said he and his supporters "came over from North Africa, took over and shot them (Labor activists) in the back."

Shimon Peres' aides disavowed the remark and Gigi Peres apologized, but weeks later, the defeated candidate bolted Labor for Kadima, bringing thousands of Labor veterans with him.

One of those was Rafi Lehavi, 57 and active in Labor for 30 years. "I couldn't support Amir Peretz as the future prime minister. Maybe in the future, maybe with more training in the government," he said.

"I didn't leave because of his origin," he said. "I don't believe in him as a leader."

Peretz, the former mayor of Sderot, has been in parliament for nearly two decades and headed the Histadrut trade union federation for 10 years but has never held a Cabinet post.

Ben Yisrael noted that Labor's previous candidate had no national political experience either, but that did not drive people away from the party.

Many of the traditional barriers for Sephardic advancement have fallen in recent years, and both the president and the defense minister are Middle Easterners. But those positions are not directly elected and many Israelis — especially traditional Labor supporters — are not ready for a Sephardi prime minister, Israeli analysts said.

"It's not easy to break the taboo," political analyst Yoel Marcus wrote in the Haaretz daily.

Long On Outskirts Of Power, Olmert Looks To Lead Israel (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 27 — As a young boy, growing up with parents who were members of the Irgun, a militant Zionist group that fought the Arabs and the British, Ehud Olmert used to play at being David Ben-Gurion, the first leader of Israel.

Mr. Olmert became Israel's youngest member of Parliament at 28. But his career was derailed by the meteoric rise in his Likud Party of the articulate Benjamin Netanyahu, who became prime minister in 1996, and Mr. Olmert tied himself as chief aide to his last mentor, Ariel Sharon.

With Mr. Sharon silent and comatose after a severe stroke on Jan. 4, Mr. Olmert, now 60, stands at the cusp of his life's ambition — to become prime minister himself in Tuesday's election at the head of a new centrist party, Kadima, that he fashioned together with Mr. Sharon.

It has been an extraordinary turn for a man better known as a wheeler-dealer and a cigar-smoking lawyer close to big business than for his charisma or courage on the battlefield. And it has been an extraordinary ideological journey — from the far right, where he said he believed that Israel should control both sides of the Jordan River and where he voted against the 1978 Camp David peace accord, to the center, where he now says Israel must cede most of the occupied West Bank and even parts of Jerusalem to preserve itself as a democratic Jewish state.

Never very popular with the Israeli public, Mr. Olmert worked behind the scenes to help shape Mr. Sharon's policies — to act unilaterally in the supposed absence of a Palestinian "partner," to pull out of Gaza, to build the separation barrier between Israelis and Palestinians, to form Kadima. Now, through happenstance, Mr. Olmert is Mr. Sharon's heir apparent. Kadima was built around Mr. Sharon. But Mr. Olmert has steered the new party through a difficult period of doubt, enforcing a collective discipline on a group that ranges from the center-left to the moderate right. He has repressed his own tendency toward sarcasm and limited his public appearances, even to support his beloved Betar Jerusalem soccer team. He has chosen the popular foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, as his deputy.

And he has given an explicit promise of another unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, which Nahum Barnea, the senior columnist for Yediot Aharonot, calls "the most specific plan any serious candidate for prime minister has ever issued before an election."

Mr. Olmert has made the election into a referendum on another pullout against political advice that the plan would take Kadima too far to the left.

But if the opinion polls are mostly correct, Kadima will win more than twice as many seats as the remnants of Likud, which Mr. Netanyahu now leads, and Mr. Olmert will at last be a leader on his own. But if Kadima's numbers continue to deteriorate, as they have since Mr. Sharon's stroke, Mr. Olmert may be the prime minister of a less stable coalition, harder to control. "Sharon didn't have to say anything about the future to get elected," Mr. Barnea said. "But for most voters, Olmert is a nonentity. He had to become more specific.

"Now you can't accuse him of misleading the public," he added, "but "he had to fill the vacuum of not being Sharon."

Eyal Arad, a close adviser to Mr. Sharon and Kadima, said: "They don't have the same credibility. Sharon could say, 'Trust me.' With Olmert, people say, 'We're willing to trust you, but tell us please, what is it we should trust you with?' "

A skit on the Israeli news-satire show, "It's a Wonderful Country," captured Mr. Olmert's problem. A chocolate advertisement shows an Israeli tourist in an Indian market, where everyone bows down to him. He suddenly realizes that they are bowing to the cow on his candy bar. The spoof shows Mr. Olmert in an Israeli market, first puzzled, then gratified by all the deference. Then someone whispers to him that everyone is bowing to the picture he's carrying of Mr. Sharon.

The prospect of a Prime Minister Olmert produces little passion, which goes some way, along with Mr. Sharon's illness, to explain why the campaign has been quiet. In one way, it can be seen as a testimony to Israel's political maturity. But it also hints at collective fatigue, and to lingering doubts about Mr. Olmert's capacity for disinterested leadership.

"Ehud Olmert is a very skillful politician, intelligent and cool-headed," said Ari Shavit, a writer for the newspaper Haaretz. "But he is also the embodiment of this new class of rich Israeli barons, to whom he's very close.

"I assume it's all kosher," Mr. Shavit added, "but it's something we've never seen before in this country."

Mr. Olmert began his career campaigning against corruption. But in part because of his law practice, in part because he is a political insider in a system that runs on money, and in part because of his jobs as mayor of Jerusalem and minister of Trade and Industry, he has developed a reputation for borderline dealings, although he has been cleared in every investigation.

In an opinion poll published Friday in the newspaper Maariv, Israelis were asked what they liked about Mr. Olmert. More than 30 percent liked nothing. Nearly 29 percent valued his courage to state his position, and 19 percent his "wisdom and cleverness," while less than 15 percent valued his experience. When asked what disturbed them most about him, more than 35 percent said that "he is indebted to wealthy people." Nearly 19 percent said that he was corrupt; nearly 16 percent that he was arrogant. An additional 7.5 percent said, "all of the above."

The right wing has attacked Mr. Olmert as a "leftist" for his stand for disengagement. But his family's reputation also plays into it: his wife, Aliza, an artist, is politically to the left, and of his four children, one daughter volunteers for "Machsom Watch," which monitors checkpoints, and his two sons live abroad, one in New York and one in Paris. One of them, as a conscientious objector, did not serve in the army.

Personally, "Ehud basically is very liberal," said Mr. Barnea, who knows the family. But politically his family is more liberal, and Mr. Barnea said, "He never expected his family to support him politically."

Mr. Olmert's plan for the West Bank, with an aim of unilaterally defining Israel's final borders, has been dismissed by the Palestinians as a recipe for further bloodshed. The United States is unlikely to support it except as a temporary measure.

With more than 65,000 Israeli settlers living beyond the separation barrier, which already takes in at least 8 percent of the West Bank, plus most of East Jerusalem, a pullback even to the barrier would produce an agonizing drama, with the possibility of violent protests. Even then, more than 175,000 Israelis, and 200,000 more in East Jerusalem, would still be living in areas beyond Israel's 1967 boundaries, areas Mr. Olmert says he intends Israel to keep.

On Sunday, the last legal day for campaigning, Mr. Olmert did not appear in public. Instead, he spoke to Israel Radio, saying Israel needed a debate "to define for ourselves our red lines" before discussions with the United States over borders.

But Mr. Olmert's aim is clear, and in this he is following Mr. Sharon completely. The goal, he said, is to "preserve Israel as a Jewish state with a stable Jewish majority while separating from the Palestinians."

Israeli Right Nips At Kadima (CSM)

By Ilene R. Prusher

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

HAIFA, ISRAEL - The victor in Tuesday's nationwide parliamentary vote is widely expected to be the Kadima (Forward) Party, representing the legacy of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. But the real cliffhanger is how well vote-getters like Avigdor Lieberman will fare.

Hefty, direct, and assertive, Mr. Lieberman addressed a standing-room only crowd at the municipal theater here recently - a mark of popularity in an election season that many seem to find as appetizing as day-old falafel.

Part of that enthusiasm comes from the fact that he speaks in the mother tongue of most of his supporters: Russian. About 1 in 4 voters in this coastal city is a new immigrant from the former Soviet Union. This polyglot of newcomers, known as "Russim," now make up at least 15 percent of the electorate, compromising one of the most influential voting blocs.

So far, he and his nationalist party Yisrael Beiteinu (Israel Is Our Home) look likely to garner a significant enough chunk of the vote to make him an attractive coalition partner for Kadima, led by Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Lieberman has been the season's most avid headline grabber. And if he joins the coalition-to-be, he expects Kadima's platform to bend toward his own. "I think our plan is better than Kadima's," he says. "I cannot understand what could be achieved from Kadima's plan."

By Kadima's plan, he means Mr. Olmert's proposal to carry out an additional set of unilateral withdrawals from occupied land - this time, in the West Bank. Olmert says he would annex major settlement blocks, evacuate many others, and declare Israel's part to end the conflict done, using the controversial security barrier as the de facto demarcation line between Israelis and Palestinians.

While that will not likely be deemed acceptable by any of the other parties involved, Lieberman's plan lurches into more problematic territory.

He says he would transfer to Palestinian control a swath of territory in the Galilee region that is heavily populated with Israel's Arab citizens, and will in turn annex large areas of Jewish settlement in the West Bank, such as Ariel or Maale Adumim. The subtext is that Lieberman views the nearly 20 percent of Israelis who are Arab as Israel's primary threat.

In Lieberman's plan, any Arabs who wants to remain in Israel will have to move out of the high-concentration areas surrounding the northern city of Umm el-Fahm to another part of the country. He also proposes that they be required to sign a pledge of allegiance to the state by the age of 16, accepting its Zionist principles.

Left-leaning politicians say they're not sure Lieberman's proposals are even legal. More vocal critics regularly call him racist and fascist.

DOJ_NMG_0021324

But his views have won solid support among Russian voters. About 35 percent of the Israeli electorate born in the former USSR is expected to vote for him. By comparison, Kadima is expected to get 30 percent of the Russian vote, while the Likud party looks likely to win just 14 percent.

"In my eyes he's the most appropriate politician to be prime minister. His platform really matches my views," says Ksenia Kravitz, a university student who immigrated here from the Urkraine.

Another supporter spells out a common theme: A desire to line up behind a strong personality. "We want a real leader," says Igor Gurevich, who moved here as the Soviet Union began to crumble in 1989.

In the past, he voted for a Russian immigrant group that has since merged itself into the Likud party. But the longer the immigrants are here, the less they want to vote for any party that is explicitly ethnic. "I don't want to be in a Russian party," Mr. Gurevich says. "I want an Israeli party, and Lieberman is building that."

Russian immigrants who came to Israel after 1989 have a tendency to vote right-wing - anything that smacks of socialism brings back memories of Red Square.

Their most pressing problems remain socioeconomic; many educated people were unable to find work in their fields after moving here. Others complain of discrimination and stigmatization at the hands of Israeli officials. On the whole, most are secular, and constantly face problems with personal issues such as marriage and burial, as the Israeli Rabbinate doesn't recognize many of the newcomers as Jewish by religious law. Civil marriages, for example, are not allowed, and many Russian immigrants demand that their leaders fight for this issue.

The negative experience means that Russian voters here are less interested in the party than the personality - one of many reasons Lieberman has attracted so much support.

"Russians really vote for the person, not the party," says Lazar Kaplun, who, as the head of Kadima's Russian headquarters in Haifa, is trying to convince voters to switch over. "We try to explain to them that Kadima's the ruling party and that it's the only one that can bring us to a new reality, while these others will just come and go."

But his challenge, he readily admits, sitting and strategizing with other activists in the final days of the campaign, is that no other party has a figure who is viewed as equally charismatic.

Beyond Lieberman, several other right-wing parties look likely to draw away support from Kadima.

The Likud party, which has been Israel's most powerful rightist party since the 1970s, is predicted to come in a distant third. But many voters who have told pollsters in the past that they were undecided have turned up as 11th-hour Likud voters, and the party knows it, judging from one of its simple slogans: "Come Home."

Hagay Lober, from the West Bank settlement of Beit El, says that he's usually voted for the National Religious Party (NRP), long a bulwark of the settlement movement. Now, however, many settlers are disillusioned by the party's failure to impede Sharon's disengagement plan last year.

"People trusted them a lot before the last election," says Mr. Lober, who is a rabbi and a director of a religious theater troupe. The pullout from the Gaza Strip has left many former settlers jobless and without permanent homes, he notes, and some people are so dismayed they don't want to vote at all.

"It's caused a disengagement from the army and the state. It's a huge crisis for the whole country," he says. He says he might vote Likud "so I can push Olmert to partner with the right."

Even further along the spectrum is politician Baruch Marzel, who has roots in the outlawed Kach Movement founded by the late Rabbi Meir Kahane. His party was banned from running for Knesset on the grounds that it was blatantly racist, something Mr. Marzel - an American-born settler - has managed to avoid.

In the settlement of Ofra, near the Amona outpost that was violently dismantled, Russian immigrants Chaim and Tanya Briskin sat on a bench recently and watched the youngest of their 11 children play. Their 18-year-old son is under house arrest for being involved in the clashes - during which 220 people, most of them young protesters, were injured. Gabriel, 11, says he and his friends are carving bats to fend off the next attempt by the army.

"We're voting Lieberman," says Mr. Briskin, an electrician. "We voted for other right-wing parties in the past, like Likud, and they went in a completely different direction from what we expected - to the left."

Russian Voters To Play Key Role (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

TEL AVIV -- They've been Israel's most critical swing voters in elections going back to the early 1990s. Now, on the eve of tomorrow's vote, the country's 1 million Russian immigrants are again poised to determine the balance of power in the next parliament.

Hawks on security and mostly secular, Russian immigrants are expected to cast ballots in higher numbers than other Israelis. Pollsters say they could determine 15 percent of the seats in the parliament.

They are thought to be wavering between acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima party and Yisrael Beiteinu, a party dominated by Russian immigrants whose leader has advocated ceding control over Israeli Arab towns near the border of the West Bank in return for keeping Jewish settlements.

Although the immigrants were once solidly behind Kadima because of its leader, Ariel Sharon, it is not clear whether they will remain loyal to the comatose prime minister's political party now that it has passed to the leadership of Mr. Olmert.

That will determine to a large part whether the acting prime minister's party will dominate the next government or be forced to share power with a strong coalition partner.

"Sharon had a mythic hold on the Russian vote. He created a heroic aura with the help of Russian politicians on the right," said Arik Elman, a former media adviser to the Yisrael B'Aliya party, the Russian party that was founded by refusenik Natan Sharansky and is now defunct.

"After Sharon passed, it has opened a hole in the political firmament of the Russian voter."

That firmament leads to Avigdor Lieberman, a former aide to Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu who resigned from the Likud Party in 1999 to establish the right-wing immigrant party Yisrael Beiteinu, or "Israel is our home."

Mr. Lieberman has been the surprise of the campaign, with polls showing his party positioned to double its strength from the current six seats. That would be enough to make him a pivotal broker in postelection coalition talks.

The jockeying has started. Mr. Lieberman has said he won't join the government if Mr. Olmert goes ahead with his plan to unilaterally withdraw from West Bank settlements, while left-wing parties have said they won't join a coalition that includes Mr. Lieberman.

"Lieberman is left in the field as the only Russian player, and he plays it well," Mr. Elman said.

Mr. Lieberman appeals to Russian voters who tend to be highly skeptical about the prospects for peace with the Palestinians.

"In one sense, Lieberman gives an answer to Hamas," said Roman Yucht, a 27-year-old immigrant from the former Soviet Union. "Hamas respects strong men. That's what the Arabs understand."

In past elections, the Russian immigrant vote has been up for grabs as the new Israelis adjusting to the nation's political system.

In 1992 and 1999, Russians were attracted by former military officers leading the left-of-center Labor Party. But the immigrants voted for Likud in 1996 and 2003 after terrorism overtook peace negotiations.

This year, neither Labor nor Likud are expected to attract significant numbers of Russians.

Labor candidate Amir Peretz is disliked for a series of crippling strikes that were seen as benefiting powerful trade unions rather than laborers. Mr. Netanyahu, meanwhile, is remembered as a relatively weak prime minister, analysts say.

Mr. Lieberman, by contrast, is seen as a credible, straight-talking politician, an image that appeals to a voting bloc disillusioned by the seeming inability of politicians to make good on their promises.

"Immigrants tell you in any survey that they're disappointed in the system, and that they don't trust politicians. Lieberman builds his campaign around the issue of credibility," Mr. Elman said.

"Democracy is a fleeting concept for the average Russian voter. Lieberman is not about mutual understanding. He is about saying things clearly and about holding his ground."

Hamas To Seek Economic Accord (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0021326

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- Hamas' nominee for Palestinian finance minister, Omar Abdel Razeq, said yesterday that he hopes to negotiate a new economic treaty with Israel, even though he supports the Islamic militant party's refusal to recognize the Jewish state for peace talks.

The desire to embrace Israel in what would amount to a major treaty indicates how Hamas politicians and the ministerial nominees have resigned themselves to a de facto acknowledgement of Israel to improve the daily lives of their constituents.

The remarks were made a day before Prime Minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, is slated to bring his Cabinet before the Palestinian parliament for a vote of confidence. The 24-member Cabinet is supposed to be sworn in this week, completing the democratic transfer of power after Hamas scored a landslide victory in parliamentary elections in January.

Mr. Abdel Razeq, a professor of economics at An-Najah National University in Nablus, told The Washington Times in an interview at a Ramallah hotel that he hopes the Israeli-Palestinian economics committees established under the Oslo agreements continue.

The nominee, who was just released from an Israeli jail, also said he would be ready to meet an Israeli counterpart to discuss a revision of a customs regime negotiated as part of the 1995 Paris economic agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

"We realize that we are still under occupation, we are under siege, so we have to do anything that eases the daily life problems faced by our people," he said. "We have daily relationships with Israel. We can't just blindfold our eyes and say we don't see the Israelis. The Israelis are there. They occupy our people, our economy and the whole system."

Mr. Abdel Razeq expressed hope that the Israeli government would unfreeze $55 million in customs revenue collected on behalf of the Palestinian Authority but held in escrow by the government of acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Mr. Abdel Razeq said the customs freeze was a decision dictated by Israel's election campaign.

Mr. Abdel Razeq reiterated Hamas' refusal to consider a long-term cease-fire or peace treaty with Israel until the Jewish state agrees to withdraw unconditionally to the 1967 border between the West Bank and Israel. However, Mr. Haniyeh expressed hopes for peace in the Gaza Strip, saying yesterday that Hamas doesn't want the cycle of violence to continue.

Mr. Abdel Razeq's willingness to negotiate an economic treaty with Israel didn't make an impression on Israeli officials.

"Israel and most of the international community won't be doing any negotiating with Hamas unless Hamas substantially changes its position," said Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev. "All of the words coming out of the Hamas leadership up until now have been nothing but verbal gymnastics."

The Palestinian-Aid Puzzle (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Marc Champion

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

In the West Bank town of Qalandiya, a road reconstruction project is on hold after U.S. officials shelved it last month. With so much up in the air in the Palestinian territories, they reasoned, why bulldoze a road that the U.S. may never get around to rebuilding?

That may be the last simple decision the Bush administration makes for a long time on Palestinian funding. After the militant Islamist group Hamas swept to victory in the Palestinian elections in January, President Bush laid down a hard line, saying: "A political party that articulates the destruction of Israel...is a party with which we will not deal."

Things have gotten much stickier since then.

With Hamas likely to form a new government by the end of this week, the U.S. and Europe must decide how to interact with a transformed Palestinian Authority. The U.S., Europe and Israel say they will do nothing directly to prop up a Hamas government that refuses to recognize Israel or renounce violence. Yet they also worry that cutting off Western aid -- totaling roughly $1.3 billion last year, or about one-third of the territories' economy -- would sow chaos and political convulsions, with dire consequences for the region.

DOJ_NMG_0021327

The West faces many quandaries. Should the U.S. and Europe seek to assure Hamas's downfall by cutting off funds, even if the West would then shoulder the blame for its failure? Or, short of an abrupt change in Hamas's ideology, should the aim be to encourage better behavior by conditioning support on such steps as continuing the current cease-fire with Israel?

U.S. officials see their looming face-off with Hamas as a template for dealing with other militant Islamist governments that may come to power through elections elsewhere in the region. "But the problem is that the administration doesn't really know what it wants yet," says Robert Malley, a former Clinton Mideast adviser now with the International Crisis Group, of Brussels. "For instance, is it really in the U.S. interest for Hamas to fail?"

Even basic questions, such as how to sustain humanitarian help while cutting off direct aid, are hard to tackle. As one U.S. official put it, "Our guiding principle right now is not to go off and do something rash. Beyond that, the details get very tough."

What no one questions is Palestinians' dependence on outside assistance. Last year, the Palestinian Authority received about $740 million in tax receipts that Israel collected and turned over -- a spigot the Israelis have shut off. The U.S., Europe and other international donors gave around $950 million for humanitarian and development aid and $350 million for budget support, largely to help pay more than 130,000 government salaries, according to the World Bank.

All that now is in jeopardy, though the U.S. and Europe are scrambling to preserve what they can of the $500 million in humanitarian aid for schools, hospitals, water projects and the like. A World Bank report recently concluded that the Israeli clampdown on tax receipts and guest workers combined with significantly reduced aid would plunge the Palestinian territories this year into "a deep depression."

The U.S. has budgeted around $150 million this fiscal year for Palestinian projects such as food aid, hospital assistance and building a water-purification plant in Hebron. But nongovernmental organizations like Catholic Relief Services, Save the Children and CARE, which do most of the U.S.-funded work, are braced for complications, even if the U.S. says it wants to continue that work. Hamas is deemed a terrorist group under U.S. law, meaning that NGOs may have to seek special Treasury Department approval to work in the territories, or face criminal penalties. There is also international talk of trying to continue aid projects but separately from the Palestinian government -- an idea that NGO representatives dismiss as impossible.

Omar Abdulrazeq, Hamas's prospective finance minister, said in an interview "that once [the U.S. and Europe] see where we are going they will change their minds" and provide at least some direct aid. Still, he said the Palestinian Authority can function effectively on a far smaller budget if Hamas succeeds in cleaning up corruption and tightens spending. "We can make due with less money," he said.

Former World Bank President James Wolfensohn, who is now a special envoy to the Palestinian territories, told a U.S. Senate panel recently that the international community would probably need two more months to find alternative ways to help the Palestinians. He urged U.S. lawmakers to find a way to hold to key principles but also "allow you to keep the patient alive, because the thing that I fear is chaos."

Bush administration officials have resisted calls in Congress to prohibit U.S. money going even to third parties doing work under a Hamas-led government.

The European Union, meanwhile, has laid down the same conditions as the U.S. for direct government funding but already is showing more flexibility -- a twist the U.S. has welcomed.

After Israel last month cut off tax transfers and the U.S. withdrew $50 million for infrastructure projects, the EU stepped in with an extra €120 million ($144 million) to plug an immediate funding gap until Hamas takes over. EU aid until now has helped pay the salaries of 130,000 Palestinian employees, which in turn supports a million Palestinians, according to EU figures. Many of those employees are armed police.

The big decision in Washington and in Europe is what to do next. A three-page fact paper produced for EU member states gives a flavor of how hard it will be to lend a hand outside Palestinian government channels. Fully half of all humanitarian assistance and 90% of "emergency aid" flow through Palestinian ministries, the document says.

The EU has about $1.2 billion in projects under way in the Palestinian territories. Many of them would have to be suspended and 50% of new aid would have to be cut if a decision is made not to work through the Palestinian Authority, the document says.

In Washington, the only real guidance so far has been to hold off on all new projects -- like the road near Qalandiya.

Two Senators Leaving China In Mild Dispute (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

HONG KONG, March 26 — After a weeklong trip to China, two senators who have been pushing Chinese leaders to devalue their nation's currency say they do not agree on how much progress China is making. The split indicates that they are less likely to press for a Senate vote on their trade bill this week.

Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, and Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina, have introduced legislation that would impose a 27.5 percent tariff on all American imports from China in two years unless officials in Beijing allowed "substantial" appreciation in the exchange value of their currency, the yuan.

After a week of meetings with high-ranking officials in Beijing, Shanghai and Hong Kong, Mr. Schumer and Mr. Graham both said in an interview here Saturday that they remained committed to advancing the legislation unless China stopped intervening in currency markets and allowed the yuan to move higher against the dollar.

But they also said that Senator Schumer had been more impressed than Senator Graham by promises from Chinese officials to liberalize their currency policies.

Asked whether the newest development from the trip was the emergence of some differences between the two men, Mr. Schumer replied, "That would be fair."

He said that his views on China's trade and monetary policy had evolved as a result of the trip, and that he believed that the Chinese were taking steps to let the market determine their currency's value.

"I'm convinced they do want to get there, which I wasn't a week ago," he said.

Senator Graham took the same stance he had before. "The status quo is devastating to industries back home," he said.

South Carolina's textile industry has been hit hard by Chinese competition, and its nascent auto parts industry, which has grown up around the BMW factory near Spartanburg, is beginning to face Chinese competition.

The practical implications of the senators' differences may be limited for now. Senator Graham said that he wanted to see the results of President Hu Jintao's visit to the White House in late April and what the Treasury decides in its review at the end of April of whether China manipulates its currency.

That suggests Senator Graham is also willing to take a wait-and-see approach and will not press for a vote in the next five days.

Both senators said that they had not made a final decision on whether to follow through on the previous threat to force a Senate vote by Friday. They said they would wait to do so until after further discussions in Washington with Treasury officials and others.

But differences between the senators could affect policy later, especially if Chinese officials keep up their recent tilt toward slightly more conciliatory rhetoric.

Currency traders around the world have followed every remark by the senators in the past week, especially as China has allowed its currency to creep up slightly faster in the past three weeks, possibly because of pressure from the senators.

Mr. Schumer Goes To China (NYT)

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

The good news is that Senators Lindsey Graham and Charles Schumer have started to inch away from their misguided attempt to club China for its currency policies. At the end of a fact-finding trip last week, Mr. Schumer told reporters he was no longer sure he would push for a vote to impose tariffs on Chinese imports into the United States. "The jury is out," he said. But, he said, "we are more optimistic that this can be worked out than we were in the past."

Maybe the chance to talk face-to-face with Chinese on their home turf is what it took to make Mr. Graham and Mr. Schumer realize that just as trade is a two-way street, so too are sanctions. If lawmakers actually went ahead with the Schumer-Graham bill, which would impose 27.5 percent tariffs — a staggering amount — on Chinese goods, they would be accomplishing little to cut American unemployment, while hurting poor Americans who rely on inexpensive goods and poor Chinese whose livelihoods depend on making those products.

The Schumer-Graham bill is based on a fundamental misunderstanding of the root cause of America's economic problems. No question, the United States trade deficit and the loss of American manufacturing jobs are very serious. But most of the imbalance with China is caused by Americans' insatiable appetite for Chinese imports for which there are few domestic substitutes. While it's unfortunate that the textile industry has all but faded away in this country, the fact is that few American factories make things like low-priced apparel any longer.

As for the yuan, China clearly needs a more flexible currency, both for the sake of trade relations and to gain more control over its economy. But moving the yuan could cause pain in the United States. America's lack of savings is the biggest contributor to global imbalances, making it necessary to "import" billions of dollars of foreign capital daily to cover budget and trade deficits. China is America's second-most-important lender, after Japan.

As long as China links the yuan to the dollar, it needs to keep the American currency stable. If China loosened its currency's peg to the dollar, or removed it altogether, it wouldn't need to buy up dollar-based assets at its current torrid pace. The result could be a rise, even a sharp rise, in United States interest rates and, as a corollary, a fall-off in economic growth.

Thus far the Bush administration has resisted calls to accuse China of currency manipulation, but Treasury Secretary John Snow last month hinted that could change. That too, would be a mistake. The administration has done a fair job so far in its tap dance around America's relationship with the world's fastest-growing economy. Now is not the time to slide back into election-year shortsightedness.

Ukraine Rejects Orange Leaders (FT)

By Stefan Wagstyl And Tom Warner

Financial Times, March 27, 2006

Ukraine's president Viktor Yushchenko looked set for a humiliating defeat on Sunday night in the country's parliamentary elections.

It came at the hands of both Yulia Tymoshenko, his former ally in the Orange Revolution, and Viktor Yanukovich, his opponent in the disputed 2004 presidential election.

The result will complicate efforts to form a coalition, creating fresh political uncertainty as the country struggles to come to terms with the Orange Revolution's aftermath.

As had been widely expected, the pro-Russian Mr Yanukovich – who was condemned for his alleged role in rigging the 2004 poll – was thought to have triumphed over both Mr Yushchenko and Ms Tymoshenko. However, in a shock result, Ms Tymoshenko beat Mr Yushchenko into third place.

According to three different exit polls, Mr Yanukovich's Regions party was forecast to win 27-33 per cent of the vote, followed by Bloc Yulia Tymoshenko, with 21-23 per cent, and the pro-Yushchenko Our Ukraine, with just 13-17 per cent.

But with the Regions party unlikely to secure a parliamentary majority, political leaders face the prospect of prolonged efforts to form a coalition.

Mr Yushchenko and Ms Tymoshenko, who split last year when she was sacked as prime minister, pledged before the polls to try to recreate an Orange alliance, which would stick with western-oriented foreign policies, including increasing ties with the European Union. After casting his vote in Kiev on Sunday Mr Yushchenko said: "Tomorrow we start consolidating the political forces which made up the coalition which was victorious in the Orange Revolution."

With the support of the Socialists and other smaller parties, the Orange leaders could probably command enough seats for a parliamentary majority. But it is unclear whether they will be able to swallow their personal and political differences.

Ms Tymoshenko's unexpectedly strong showing will encourage her to claim the lion's share of ministerial posts, including the premiership for herself. If Mr Yushchenko finds her demands excessive, some of his aides will argue for a deal with Mr Yanukovich's party.

The election was contested by 45 groupings, but only about six are expected to make the 3 per cent threshold for seats.

The electorate faced a bewildering range of choices, with simultaneous regional, district and mayoral polls. Voters in Kiev said they had to wait 45 minutes because it took so long to make sense of the huge ballot form.

Unlike the presidential elections in neighbouring Belarus, Ukraine's polls were preceded by an open campaign with media access for all leading politicians.

International election monitors, who are due to report on Monday, are not expected to have found evidence of the widespread fraud that marred the Belarus vote and previous Ukrainian polls.

Yushchenko Trails Pro-Russia Rival In Ukraine Vote, Exit Polls Show (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

Exit polls from Ukraine's parliamentary elections yesterday signaled a comeback for pro-Russian forces defeated in the country's Orange Revolution, amid plummeting support for the country's Western-oriented president, Viktor Yushchenko.

Mr. Yushchenko may now be forced into a coalition with his erstwhile enemy, Viktor Yanukovych, whose victory in a rigged presidential election triggered the rallies 16 months ago by hundreds of thousands of orange-clad protesters that brought Mr. Yushchenko to power. If confirmed, it would mark a humiliating defeat for Mr. Yushchenko, whom voters appear to have punished for a lackluster first year in office marked by sputtering economic growth and government infighting.

His poor showing marks a setback for pro-European forces in Ukraine, a country that has become a theater in the regional tug of war for influence between Russia and the West. Mr. Yushchenko strove hard to anchor Ukraine in Europe, while Mr. Yanukovych, whose support base is in the Russian-speaking south and east, leans heavily toward Moscow.

One exit poll showed Mr. Yanukovych's Party of the Regions with 33% of the vote; the Bloc of Yulia Tymoshenko, Ukraine's former prime minister, with 23%; and Mr. Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party with 14%.

Mr. Yushchenko must now decide whether to try to form a coalition with Mr. Yanukovych or Ms. Tymoshenko, a firebrand populist whom he sacked as prime minister last September in a move that split the Orange alliance. "If he signs a coalition agreement with Yanukovych, it's the end of him as a politician," said Taras Kuzio, a Ukraine expert at George Washington University. "He will be seen as having betrayed the Orange Revolution."

Mr. Yushchenko said yesterday that talks to revive the Orange alliance would begin immediately after the election. But if the exit polls are anything to go by, he may have trouble cobbling together a viable pro-Western coalition, even if he and Ms. Tymoshenko can bury their differences.

Whatever the outcome, the election was seen as an exercise in democracy in a region increasingly tilting toward authoritarianism. The sight of dozens of parties vying for votes is rare in the former Soviet Union, and proof of the Orange Revolution's legacy, analysts said. European observers said the election appeared to be free and fair, though some criticized long lines at polling stations.

Speaking to reporters yesterday, Mr. Yushchenko called the vote "the first fair democratic elections in Ukraine."

Yet Mr. Yushchenko's decline in popularity has come as pro-democracy movements are in retreat across the former Soviet Union. Elections in Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan last year ended up buttressing autocratic leaders.

And last week, Belarus's hard-line president, Alexander Lukashenko, claimed a landslide victory in an election condemned in the West as rigged. On Saturday, Belarussian security forces beat and arrested dozens of demonstrators protesting the election results, while the U.S. called for a new vote and said it will impose sanctions on the Russian-backed Mr. Lukashenko and other senior Belarussian officials.

Elections in the region are fueling growing tensions between the U.S. and Russia, which sees Western support for opposition movements in former Soviet republics as interference in its sphere. Ukraine's Orange Revolution was seen as a foreign-policy defeat for Moscow, which openly backed Mr. Yanukovych.

Tensions between Moscow and Kiev grew following Mr. Yushchenko's election, rising to a climax this winter when Russia's state-owned gas company OAO Gazprom briefly cut off natural-gas supplies to Ukraine during a pricing dispute. Mr. Yanukovych's comeback provides the Kremlin with a chance to restore its lost influence in Ukraine.

Mr. Yanukovych boosted his chances by running a Western-style campaign, helped by American advisers who honed his message of pro-business growth and patriotism. On the other hand, Ms. Tymoshenko's and Mr. Yushchenko's parties both ended up courting the same dwindling Orange electorate.

Reform Leader Suffers Setback In Ukraine Vote (NYT)

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, Monday, March 27 — President Viktor A. Yushchenko, who led a wave of popular protest to office promising a freer Ukraine aligned with Europe and the United States, suffered a stunning political defeat in parliamentary elections on Sunday, leaving him weakened and his reformist policies in doubt.

Mr. Yushchenko called the vote for a new and newly empowered Parliament "the first fair, democratic elections in Ukraine," and his party appeared to have been routed.

Nearly a year and a half after the protests and international pressure swept Mr. Yushchenko to the presidency, his party fell far behind not only the party of the man he beat for the top job, Viktor F. Yanukovich, but also the party of his former prime minister, Yulia V. Tymoshenko, according to an independent survey of voters leaving the polls, announced by the Democratic Initiatives Foundation, after voting ended at 10 p.m. on Sunday.

Mr. Yanukovich's Party of Regions, which the survey showed with 33 percent of the vote, was poised to win the largest bloc of seats in the 450-seat Parliament, but not enough to win control outright. Ms. Tymoshenko's bloc received 22 percent, while Mr. Yushchenko's party, Our Ukraine, trailed in a distant third place, with only 13 percent, according to the survey.

Mr. Yanukovich, the former prime minister whose supporters were accused of having rigged the presidential race against Mr. Yushchenko in November 2004, declared "a decisive victory," using the sort of language that rallied those against him and his patron, the former president, Leonid D. Kuchma. "Ukraine made its choice," he said. "Its choice is freedom, democracy, stability and confidence in the future."

Mr. Yanukovich's strength is less a reflection of his political successes than it is of the failings of Mr. Yushchenko, whose reputation at home has suffered from one problem after another despite his image abroad as a reform-minded democrat.

His inability to help improve the weak economy and lessen the country's reliance on Russian gas, which caused painful shortages this winter in a price dispute, deeply hurt him.

The election results set the stage for a period of political jockeying that could last for days or even weeks before a new government is formed. Much will depend on the success of an array of smaller parties that needed to win at least 3 percent of the vote to secure seats.

The voting was the first electoral test of the sweeping changes Mr. Yushchenko promised during the huge street protests that came to be known as the "Orange Revolution."

If the results of the voter survey hold, the election will underscore the disastrous turnaround in Mr. Yushchenko's political fate, leaving him forced to compromise.

At stake are Mr. Yushchenko's stated policy goals, including integrating Ukraine into the European Union and NATO. Mr. Yanukovich's party has promised to restore economic stability and forge closer ties with Russia.

The election has added significance for Ukraine, a country of 47 million on the edge of a newly expanded European Union, because of a political compromise that cleared the way for Mr. Yushchenko's presidency. Under constitutional changes adopted then, the new Parliament will have the power to choose the prime minister and most of the cabinet, though Mr. Yushchenko will retain control over foreign affairs and security ministries.

Mr. Yushchenko's party now faces a choice of whether to repair the fractured coalition with Ms. Tymoshenko, who served as his first prime minister until a falling out amid infighting over policy and accusations of corruption, or possibly to face a hostile government. Together, their parties still drew more votes than Mr. Yanukovich's, according to the voter survey, but her showing increased her leverage in the talks.

Without Ms. Tymoshenko's support, Mr. Yushchenko's only other choice would be an improbable alliance with Mr. Yanukovich. The president remained noncommittal on Sunday, saying in televised remarks that he was considering "all kinds of various combinations."

Later, though, as the gravity of his party's poor showing became clear, Mr. Yushchenko's aides said they were prepared to revive the "orange" coalition. The mood at the party's headquarters was funereal, despite rock bands that performed on the central square of Kiev, the capital, and videos that evoked the 2004 protests there.

DOJ_NMG_0021332

A scheduled appearance by the current prime minister and leader of the party, Yury I. Yekhanurov, was abruptly canceled without explanation early Monday morning.

Ms. Tymoshenko, by contrast, clearly relished a result that provided a measure of vengeance after her dismissal last September. She said those who supported the Orange Revolution were still a majority — now led by her, her remarks suggested, though she stopped short of declaring her insistence on becoming prime minister again.

"I would not like us to let the people down again," she said.

Although Mr. Yanukovich's party complained of widespread irregularities ahead of Sunday's vote, including names missing from voter lists or Russian ones mistranslated into Ukrainian, there were few immediate reports of fraud or significant disruptions. But long lines formed as voters slogged through a ballot with 45 parties, and a homemade firebomb damaged one polling place in the Kiev region.

For many of those who voted, the significance was not in the results, but in the process. They described a Ukraine that was freer and more democratic, if also unruly and still divided along the same ethnic, social and political lines of 2004.

"It is already a big victory," Mr. Yushchenko said, putting the best face on his party's performance.

The survey of voters was carried out for the Democratic Initiatives Foundation by the Razumkov Center and the Kiev International Institute of Sociology, which is part of the Kiev-Mohyla Academy. Final results are not expected at least until late Monday, and perhaps later.

Critics of Mr. Yushchenko's performance as president welcomed the freedom of choice.

Maria I. Kompaneyets, 63, said that she voted for Mr. Yanukovich in 2004, but that she had hopes that Mr. Yushchenko would use his popular mandate to improve life in Ukraine, especially the economy and pensions, recurrent complaints among those less well off.

"Nothing changed, at least nothing changed for better, neither in the country nor in our own life," she said, as she voted with her husband, Pyotr. "Of course we had hopes. So much had been said in those days. Who could expect that it would turn out so bad?"

Ruling Party Suffers Rout In Ukraine (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

KIEV, Ukraine, March 26 -- Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko's party finished in a humiliating third place in parliamentary elections on Sunday as the pro-Russian party of the man he defeated for the presidency 15 months ago appeared headed for a clear victory, according to exit polls.

The Party of Regions, led by Viktor Yanukovych, who was defeated by Yushchenko in 2004 following massive street protests dubbed the Orange Revolution, secured a commanding 33.3 percent of the vote, according to one exit poll. A second poll gave the Party of Regions 27.5 percent.

"Our victory will open a new page in the history of Ukraine," Yanukovych said Sunday night. "We are ready to work together with any political party."

Official preliminary results are not expected until Monday.

Weeks of haggling over the composition of a new coalition government is now likely, but with Yanukovych, a Kremlin favorite, at the helm, Ukraine's strategic direction will probably shift from the West and back toward Moscow.

Yanukovych has criticized Yushchenko's stated desire to join NATO and declared himself open to the revival of economic union among Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Kazakhstan.

"Ukraine will never join NATO," Taras Chornovil, the No. 4 figure on the Party of Regions list, said in an interview Sunday night. In Ukraine, voters choose a party list, not individual candidates, and the party decides which of its members on the list enter parliament.

Chornovil said current strains in the relationship between Ukraine and Russia were "absolutely artificial" and created by Yushchenko's policies. He added that the Party of Regions would seek to repair rifts with Russia that climaxed this year in a fight over the price of natural gas.

DOJ_NMG_0021333

The party of Yushchenko's former ally, Yulia Tymoshenko, who had a bitter falling-out with the president last year, came in second with 22.7 percent of the vote, according to one poll. A second national poll gave her party, known as Bloc Yulia Tymoshenko, 21.6 percent.

Yushchenko dismissed Tymoshenko as prime minister last September after mutual accusations of corruption and mismanagement.

Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party received 13.5 percent, according to one poll, an unambiguous verdict on his break with Tymoshenko and his stewardship of the country over the last year, when economic growth fell off dramatically. A second poll gave Our Ukraine 15.5 percent.

Out of the 45 parties in the elections, six or seven are expected to surpass the 3 percent threshold necessary to enter the 450-seat parliament. Two or three of those, including the Communists, are natural coalition partners for Yanukovych's bloc.

"Tomorrow we start consultations with political forces that made up the coalition that was victorious in the Orange Revolution," Yushchenko said after casting his ballot in central Kiev.

The final division of seats, however, may allow Yanukovych to sideline the parties of both Yushchenko and Tymoshenko, even if they reconcile.

Tymoshenko said Sunday night there was still a possibility she could form a government with Yushchenko's party and the Socialists. But she said on Ukrainian television that if she did not become prime minister again, something Yushchenko had hoped to avoid, then "he will have Yanukovych as prime minister."

Chornovil described the Party of Regions as dramatically different from the one that existed little more than a year ago when Yanukovych was accused of rigging the presidential election. Yanukovych was initially declared the winner in that vote, but the Ukrainian Supreme Court overturned the result, saying it was fraudulent. The court ordered another vote, which Yushchenko won.

"Fifty thousand people left the party -- careerists and all of those for whom prison was crying out," Chornovil said. "And we have 500,000 new members."

Chornovil and other members of the Party of Regions acknowledged that the vote was clean and also reluctantly conceded that the now vibrant state of Ukrainian democracy was one positive legacy of the Orange Revolution.

Voters faced a bewildering and unwieldy choice Sunday. Besides the 45 parties running for parliament, voters in Kiev, for instance, grappled with ballots for district councils that listed 59 parties and ballots for city council that listed 53. Thirty-seven candidates were on the ballot in the Kiev mayoral race, among them Vitaliy Klychko, a former heavyweight boxing champion, who was running second, according to exit polls.

Some of the ballots were more than three feet long.

"It's a nightmare," Svetlana Honcharenko, 46, said after voting in Kiev. "There are so many parties, it's almost funny."

Ousted Leader's Party Ahead In Elections (WT)

By Natalia A. Feduschak

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

KIEV -- Followers of Viktor Yanukovych, the pro-Russian leader ousted from power in an Orange Revolution 15 months ago, led the field in parliamentary elections yesterday but fell short of a majority and may not be able to find partners for a coalition government, exit polls showed.

Second place went to an upstart party led by Yulia Tymoshenko, who was dismissed as prime minister amid swirling corruption charges in the summer, while President Viktor Yushchenko's Our Ukraine bloc had less than 14 percent of the vote.

An exit poll conducted by the Democratic Initiatives, International Institute of Sociology and Razumkov Center gave Mr. Yanukovych's Party of the Regions a little more than 33 percent of the vote compared with about 23 percent for Mrs. Tymoshenko's bloc.

Another exit poll said Mr. Yanukovych's party got 27 percent of the vote, while Mrs. Tymoshenko got nearly 22 percent. Official results were expected within three weeks.

Although pollsters had predicted Mr. Yanukovych's party would make a comeback in the face of deep dissatisfaction with Mr. Yushchenko's administration and an economic slowdown, few had predicted that Mrs. Tymoshenko would do so well.

The surprise showing raises the prospect that she could return as prime minister in a coalition that includes Our Ukraine and the Socialist party, which the exit polls showed with more than 5 percent of the vote.

Several small parties failed to pass the 3 percent threshold for seats in parliament, meaning it will take less than 50 percent to achieve a majority of seats under the proportional representation system.

That would permit the president's reform agenda to continue, but with Mrs. Tymoshenko playing a more dominant role. The two have been openly hostile since Mrs. Tymoshenko's firing and were bitterly critical of each other during the campaign.

Mr. Yanukovych claimed a "decisive victory" at his headquarters last night.

"We are ready to take the responsibility of forming a government, and we call on everybody who holds Ukraine's fate dear to join us," he said. "We are ready to work with all political parties which will be represented in parliament."

But Mrs. Tymoshenko indicated she expected to return to the prime minister's office at the head of the current coalition.

"I believe that this coalition agreement will be signed. I see no need to adjust this coalition," she said. "Our political aim will be to follow the path the country chose in the last presidential election."

The election is the first under constitutional changes introduced this year that cut back the president's powers.

Although Mr. Yushchenko will be able to appoint his foreign and defense ministers, he will have to share power with the prime minister, which the new parliament will choose. Parliament, elected by proportional representation, becomes a more powerful body.

In the weeks leading up to yesterday's vote, Mr. Yushchenko seems to have left the door open to an alliance with Mr. Yanukovych's party should the former fail in rebuilding his Orange coalition. But his chief of staff, Oleh Rybachuk, rejected that notion after the exit poll results were announced.

"I could only see that in a nightmare," he told television viewers.

Mr. Yanukovych, who opposes efforts to bring Ukraine into NATO, enjoys support in the Russian-speaking eastern and southern parts of the country.

Belarus Charges Detained Opposition Leader (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

MOSCOW, March 26 — A detained opposition leader in Belarus faced a criminal charge on Sunday and was denied prison visits by a doctor and a lawyer, his wife said. Minsk, the capital, fell quiet after a violent police crackdown against antigovernment demonstrators on Saturday.

Aleksandr V. Kazulin, who had challenged the authoritarian president, Aleksandr G. Lukashenko, in an election earlier this month, was seized Saturday when riot police officers with batons attacked a column of peaceful protesters who were marching to a prison where opposition members had been jailed.

He was held Sunday at a detention center well outside Minsk, on a charge of hooliganism, said his wife, Irina Kazulin. The charge can carry penalties ranging from a fine to several years in prison.

Ms. Kazulin said she visited the jail but was not allowed to see her husband or speak with him by phone. She said she demanded that he be examined by a doctor and allowed to consult a lawyer, but was told by a prison official that there would be no visits before Monday.

"Human rights do not work on Sunday in Belarus," she said bitterly in a telephone interview. She said she was not sure whether her husband had been injured.

Opposition members said at least three people were in serious medical condition with either skull fractures or spinal injuries after being beaten by the police when the march was broken up on Saturday.

One man with a skull injury had been hovering near death, but had survived so far, said Aleksei Shein, a spokesman for Aleksandr Milinkevich, the principal challenger to Mr. Lukashenko.

DOJ_NMG_0021335

"Thank God this man is still alive," Mr. Shein said of the injured demonstrator, who was one of at least two men seen lying immobile on the street after lines of officers from SOBR, a special rapid-reaction force that has been widely accused of extensive human rights abuses, attacked the marchers.

The march was the third opposition event of the day. The police forcibly blocked demonstrators, estimated at 6,000, from reaching a rally planned for October Square, punching and kicking many of them as they tried to push through police lines or block traffic, and ultimately clearing the sidewalks with advancing formations that pummeled people in their path.

A peaceful rally then took place at Yanka Kupala park, which the police videotaped but did not break up. At Mr. Kazulin's urging, several hundred demonstrators left for a march to the prison, during which the worst violence of the day occurred.

Austria, which holds the rotating presidency of the European Union, said in a statement on Sunday that the Union "is appalled by the violence used against demonstrators" and called for the release of Mr. Kazulin and the other protesters.

Such statements by the West have had little visible effect on the Belarussian government, which retains many of the features of the Soviet police state Mr. Lukashenko apparently admires.

Mr. Lukashenko, whose landslide re-election on March 19 has been declared invalid by the West because of charges of wide-scale rigging and abuses of state power, has resorted to police sweeps, mass arrests and violence to try to quell the unrest. Russia, his closest ally, has offered him unequivocal support.

For the first time during Mr. Lukashenko's 12 years of rule, however, demonstrators have defied the police and vowed to carry out more peaceful actions in the face of arrests, state violence and expulsions from universities or jobs. Another rally is set for April 26, the 20th anniversary of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster.

The authorities have not released arrest figures or provided information about the injured, making it difficult to assess the extent of the arrests, or the conditions or even the identities of some of the detained.

Among those thought to be held are a small number of journalists from Russia, Canada and Western Europe, as well as foreign demonstrators, including Ukrainians, Poles and at least one man from Ireland, who was interviewed at a small protest camp Friday shortly before the riot police smashed the camp and arrested demonstrators there.

Belarus Divided, Doubtful After Clashes (AP)

By Steve Gutterman, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 27, 2006

Police kept a close watch Sunday on the square that was the center of an unprecedented week of protests, determined to prevent the opposition from renewing demonstrations against Belarus' authoritarian president.

The protests that culminated Saturday in a clash with riot police left the opposition daunted but determined to try to press ahead.

Many Belarusians now are confronting an array of unanswered questions: It is unclear how much support the opposition really has, how much dissent authorities will tolerate or what effect a stream of denunciations from the West will have.

The EU called on its European partners to join in protesting against Saturday's violence and the detention of Alexander Kozulin, an opposition leader who instigated a march to a jail where detained opposition supporters are being held.

A rights group said more than 100 protesters were detained Saturday in the tightly controlled ex-Soviet republic.

The Belarusian Foreign Ministry claimed Sunday that police had shown "restraint and patience," and officers resorted to force only after being attacked.

E-mails and cell phone text messages reportedly encouraged supporters to gather Sunday evening at Oktyabrskaya Square.

Around 40 police officers kept watch at the edges of the square, eyeing small groups of young people — some clearly dissidents and others apparently just hanging out on a day when sunlight cut the bite of near-freezing temperatures. There were no immediate arrests or scuffles.

After dark, more than 100 mostly young people lit candles and laid flowers at a monument to the 52 people who were killed in an underpass during a 1999 stampede.

DOJ_NMG_0021336

The stampede had no political connection — it took place as rock concert spectators were trying to escape a downpour — but those who came Sunday said their actions were in solidarity with those injured and arrested last week. The choice of location appeared aimed at finding a strategy for expressing dissent without antagonizing authorities.

"Students have awakened.... The more the authorities crush us, the bigger our protest will be," said student Aliena Efanova.

The commemoration lasted about 90 minutes. After holding a moment of silence, the group began to put out their candles, and police ordered the crowd to leave.

Austria, which holds the rotating EU presidency, said the 25-nation bloc "urges the international partners of the EU, and in particular Belarus' other neighbors, to follow the same approach toward Belarus," in an apparent reference to Russia.

The EU statement was the latest in a series from the United States and Europe denouncing the March 19 elections that gave President Alexander Lukashenko a third term.

Lukashenko despises the West and criticism from there fuels his contentions that the West is out to overthrow him. The Belarusian Foreign Ministry said the statements "are on the border of an anti-Belarusian hysteria."

Everyone seems to have a strong opinion on last week's events, and the population is split.

"One must fight fear, because fear is the authorities' strongest weapon," said Alexei, a 20-year-old student unwilling to give his last name because students who back the opposition are often expelled.

But in Dmitry Kursky's view, the demonstrators were irresponsible and goaded by money he believes they received from the West.

"All the opposition is doing is spending the (money) they got from the West. Once they spend the first $100,000, they will pocket the rest," the 23-year-old said.

How much staying power the opposition has was in doubt after Saturday. Activists, encouraged by police allowing them to hold a meeting of some 7,000 in a park, decided to push their luck by marching to a jail where other opposition supporters were being held.

A phalanx of shielded riot police forced them back with percussion grenades and beat some people in the front lines.

Kozulin was arrested in the melee and his wife Irina said Sunday that he was likely to be charged with hooliganism, which can carry a sentence of up to 10 years in prison. Many suspect Kozulin of being a Russian-funded provocateur.

Alexander Milinkevich, the most popular of the opposition leaders, was angry the march was attempted, saying "yesterday's march decreased the number of our supporters."

Blair Admits He Knows When He Will Go (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, March 27, 2006

Tony Blair has admitted for the first time that he has decided when he will resign as prime minister. However, he is not yet revealing the date.

He also insists he wants time to leave a solid platform for his successor, ensuring above all that difficult reforms of the National Health Service are properly implemented before he quits.

Mr Blair has conceded to friends that the government and Labour MPs are finding the leadership transition from himself to Gordon Brown uncertain – and that this is undermining the confidence and morale of ministers and Labour MPs.

The prime minister, who is currently in Australia, has until now never given any indication that he has privately fixed the date for quitting Downing Street.

He said back in 2004 that he would not fight a fourth general election, but has always stuck by the mantra that he will only quit when his job is done.

But in the wake of the “loans for peerages” row, a growing number of Labour MPs believe that Mr Blair – who is widely expected to stand down next year – must publicly state when he intends to quit to ensure an orderly handover to Mr Brown.

Downing Street officials who are travelling with the prime minister insisted that Mr Blair had still not fixed a departure date.

They flatly denied that Mr Blair had any intention of “pre-announcing” his departure date in the next few weeks to stabilise the government in the aftermath of the recent sleaze rows.

DOJ_NMG_0021337

However, the revelation that Mr Blair has a date in mind when he would step aside came as he conceded – also for the first time – that he regretted announcing his intention to stand down at some point in this parliament.

Senior allies of the prime minister have long believed that Mr Blair's declaration 18 months ago that he would not fight a fourth election was a grave error, transforming him into a lame duck premier.

On Sunday Mr Blair expressed his own turmoil over the decision. Asked by an Australian TV reporter whether he should never have announced his decision to quit at some future date, he replied: "It was an unusual thing to say but people kept asking the question so I decided to answer. Maybe that was a mistake."

Mr Blair has told friends he believes the "loans for peerages" row has been a ghastly experience for himself and the Labour party. He now questions whether Labour will ever be able to raise cash again - either in donations or loans.

Is Britain's Labour Selling Lordships? (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, March 27, 2006

LONDON - Will a million pounds make you a "Sir" or a "Lord" in Britain today?

That's what British police are investigating, following complaints that Prime Minister Tony Blair's Labour party rewarded four big financial backers with the promise of seats in the House of Lords, the unelected upper house of parliament that wields considerable influence.

The murky controversy has intensified pressure on Blair to step down and revived a debate about how politics should be funded here.

Infuriated members of Parliament (MPs), including some on the Labour side, warn that democracy is being compromised by dirty money. The scandal has further disenchanted a public already apathetic about the political process, and it is acutely awkward for Blair, who arrived in office in 1997 with a promise to wipe out the "sleaze" that poisoned the previous administration of John Major.

"The Labour Party has been caught cold," says Ian Gibson, a Labour MP. Though it has yet to be definitely proven that benefactors were promised in advance a reward for their cash, MPs have noted that every donor who has given Labour more than a million pounds has received a knighthood (entitling usage of honorific "Sir") or peerage (entitling usage of honorific "Lord").

"People don't give money for nothing and that is how all this is being construed by the public," says Mr. Gibson. "Some of these [donors] got knighthoods and even became government ministers.... We have to move to a system of state funding."

State funding is the norm in France, Germany, and other European countries, where individual and group donations to parties are capped or banned altogether.

Its advantages are a level playing field between parties and greater transparency. The disadvantage is that taxpayers will have to foot the bill, and parties will probably find loopholes, perhaps through lobby groups doing their spending for them. Critics also note that state funding in Germany did not stop former chancellor Helmut Kohl from getting engulfed in a scandal over secret private donations.

British parties have long relied on their memberships and on affiliations - Labour with the union movement, the Conservatives with big business - for their funding. But with party memberships falling fast, and old affiliations not what they used to be, income has shriveled.

All three big parties have turned to benefactors to bail them out. Blair introduced new rules in 1998 to oblige parties to declare all donations over £5,000 ($8,700), but loans don't have to be reported.

The Conservatives have said they too have benefited from big loans, but Blair is under scrutiny because as prime minister, he alone among politicians has the power to nominate individuals to lordships, knighthoods, and other honors.

Labour - Blair's party - has admitted it raised £14 million ($23.4 million) last year in secret loans from 12 millionaires to bankroll its election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0021338

Four were then proposed for lordships. Three have subsequently asked for their nominations to be withdrawn. A fifth, Rod Aldridge, was chairman of a company which benefited from government contracts. Mr. Aldridge quit his job last week, the first victim of the burgeoning cash-for-favors scandal.

Another Labour donor, Chai Patel, said he offered a £1.5 million ($2.6 million) gift, but was urged to make it a loan instead, thus ensuring it passed under the radar of parliamentary scrutiny. He was later nominated for a seat in the House of Lords (a peerage). Mr. Patel is scheduled to testify Tuesday on the matter.

"If I say I'll give you £1.5 million ($2.6 million) for your party, and you say, 'No, don't give it to me, lend it to me,' what is that all about?" asks Elfyn Llwyd, an opposition MP. "Can there be an innocent answer to that question?"

Mr. Llwyd has made a formal complaint to police, who are now investigating whether Labour breached a 1925 law passed after a former prime minister, David Lloyd George, was found to have sold knighthoods for personal gain.

"If we are serious about bringing transparency into this scenario, then there will have to be some partial funding from the state purse," Llwyd adds.

In the wake of the latest furor, Blair has tasked a top former official to look into party financing and the possibility of state funding, and a parliamentary committee is also looking at options for reform. But not everyone believes state-funded politics would be popular.

Donald Shell, lecturer in politics at Bristol University, says that the public would take a dim view of being asked to bankroll elections in which fewer and fewer people are bothering to vote.

"There is so much disdain for politics now, such a lack of respect for parliament and politicians, that the government is very nervous about introducing any "gravy train" arrangements like state funding," he says.

Better alternatives might be to introduce tax-efficient donations, to cap the level of donations from individuals to perhaps £10,000 ($17,400), and to lower the ceiling on election spending, currently £20 million ($34.7 million) per party. The UK Electoral Commission says greater public and party consensus is needed before these changes can be made.

Blair meanwhile insists Labour has done nothing wrong in the loans affair. He has turned the debate around, saying that people who give money to political parties should not be barred from honors.

But the public are not impressed. A recent poll showed 56 percent of voters believed the loans-for-lordships allegations were true, and almost three-quarters agree that Blair's government is now as tainted by sleaze as that of his predecessor, John Major. "If it is established that there were definite offers from his office to big donors, then he's in the most terrible trouble," says Dr. David Baker, a politics expert at Warwick University.

Blair's Last Stand (WKLYSTD)

By Gerard Baker

Weekly Standard, March 27, 2006

TWILIGHT IS HASTENING FOR TONY Blair. Though British prime ministers face no term limits, few can withstand the swelling tide of public boredom and familiarity's contempt. Margaret Thatcher set a peacetime record of 11 years in office before she succumbed; Blair, elected in 1997, will have clocked up nine in May. The gathering consensus now asserts that he will not, in spite of his own ambition and energy, reach the full decade in office he had hoped for.

Last week the constitutional choreography in London seemed to hint strongly at an imminent succession. Blair's designated successor, Gordon Brown, the chancellor of the Exchequer, delivered his tenth budget speech to the House of Commons. The budget is usually a boastful recitation of economic statistics and tweaks to the tax code; the chancellor generally seizes the opportunity to tout the success of the U.K. economy and add a penny or two to the cost of a bottle of whisky.

But this time Brown presented a manifesto for the impending change in leadership. The financial details clearly bore him: Instead he waxed enthusiastic about Britain's global role and the kind of changes in the domestic political framework that are inevitable. And in the pure political theater that only the House of Commons can stage, Brown engaged in an intriguing preview of the struggle between him and David Cameron, the new Conservative party leader, that will define British politics in the run-up to the next election in 2009. Blair was reduced to the status of an amused and slightly detached onlooker.

The prime minister (for he is still that, for now) was hurt by his own campaign promise to stand down before the next election. Though he figured at the time that such a declaration might give him a full U.S.-style final term in office, he did not account for the swift and brutal motion of British politics. Blair was already weakened by the continuing and deepening unpopularity of the Iraq war. A series of domestic legislative fights in the last few months over the introduction of identity cards, toughened antiterrorist laws, and education reforms further undermined him, at least in the unforgiving eyes of his own Labour party.

But earlier this month he seemed to add the insult of venality to the injury of socialist apostasy. The prime minister, the public learned, was recommending several wealthy business leaders who had given generously to the Labour party for elevation to the House of Lords. This news underlined the popular view that this is a government grown remote and contemptuous of the rules of decent governance.

Republicans may fret about an approval rating for President Bush of 36 percent. But that looks positively Reaganesque compared with Blair's plight: He is now despised by two-thirds of Labour voters, three quarters of Conservatives, and a clear majority of independents.

In fact the Bush administration will have played a substantial part in Blair's demise. The Iraq war, of course, has undermined the prime minister; but the Bush administration seems oddly committed to making life even more difficult for him. Britain is in a state of angry ferment about the way its defense contracts have been handled by the Americans. A decision by the Pentagon to cut a British company out of the procurement contracts for the new Joint Strike Fighter has outraged public opinion and led even this most Atlanticist of governments to think seriously about striking out in a new direction with European partners, rather than be more closely integrated with U.S. defense systems. Quite how a beleaguered administration can still find room to alienate one of its few allies in the world is perhaps only for Donald Rumsfeld to explain. But the damage done to Blair's claim that his support for the United States has produced tangible benefits for the United Kingdom is incalculable.

Many American conservatives are tempted to regard the imminent end of Blair as a blessing. They note his statist tendencies when it comes to domestic policies--increased taxes and government spending, bans on fox hunting and other infringements of civil liberties--and wonder what side in the war of ideas he is on. And yet, just when you prepare yourself to welcome the departure of this oddly cynical and infuriatingly political man, he reminds us of just how much he will be missed when he is gone.

Last week, he gave the first of a series of three detailed speeches in defense of the Iraq war and the broader struggle against Islamist extremism. (You can read the first at www.number10.gov.uk; the second will be delivered in Australia this week and the third in Washington next week.) Even a British media that barely stops now to consider the case for the Iraq invasion could not ignore the power of its message. Blair spelled out, without apology, what is truly at stake in Iraq:

People look back on the three years since the Iraq conflict; they point to the precarious nature of Iraq today and to those who have died--mainly in terrorist acts--and they say: How can it have been worth it? But there is a different question to ask: Why is it so important to the forces of reaction and violence to halt Iraq in its democratic tracks and tip it into sectarian war? Why do foreign terrorists from al Qaeda and its associates go across the border to kill and maim? Why does Syria not take stronger action to prevent them? Why does Iran meddle so furiously in the stability of Iraq?

And in explaining the bigger threat from Islamism, he demonstrated how his departure will leave a large gap where the war's most effective advocate has been for the last few years:

Fundamentally, for this ideology, we are the enemy. . . . "We" is not the West. "We" are as much Muslim as Christian or Jew or Hindu. "We" are those who believe in religious tolerance, openness to others, to democracy, liberty, and human rights administered by secular courts. This is not a clash between civilizations. It is a clash about civilization.

In a tumultuous nine years, Blair may have gotten many small things wrong. But, as he demonstrates in these apparently valedictory remarks, when it mattered, he, perhaps better than anyone in the entire world, got the one big thing right.

Italy's Berlusconi Trails Challenger As Polling Ends In Premier's Race (WSJ)

By Gabriel Kahn

DOJ_NMG_0021340

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

ROME -- Just two weeks before national elections, Italy's conservative Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi trails challenger Romano Prodi by three to six percentage points, according to polls -- a gap that analysts say will be difficult to close.

A defeat for Mr. Berlusconi would end one of the world's most intriguing and controversial political careers. A media mogul worth nearly $12 billion, Mr. Berlusconi has led the Italian republic's longest-lasting government but has also been plagued by legal troubles and criticism of the conflict of interest between his political and business lives. A defeat would also deprive President Bush of one of his strongest allies in Europe and could further isolate Washington in its policy toward Iraq.

Friday marked the last day in which opinion polls could be published under Italian election rules before the April 9-10 voting. A poll conducted by GfK Eurisko, published in left-leaning Rome daily La Repubblica, had Mr. Prodi's center-left coalition taking 51.7% of the vote in the lower house of Parliament, compared with 46.6% for Mr. Berlusconi's alliance of center-right parties. The margin was tighter in the Senate, with the left gaining 51.4% of the vote compared with 47.1% for the right, according to GfK Eurisko. Several other published polls reported similar margins in favor of the center-left. Despite a flurry of television and radio appearances by Mr. Berlusconi earlier in the year and an aggressive campaign schedule, the center-right has been unable to gain back much ground in recent months, leaving many analysts to conclude that a victory for the center-left is likely.

"I never say never," said Ilvo Diamanti, a professor of political science at the University of Urbino who has analyzed recent polling data. "But there has been a loss of confidence in Berlusconi and a slight gain in confidence for Prodi." He also noted there was a sizable portion of undecided voters.

During his five years in power, Mr. Berlusconi has forged close ties with Mr. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin, steering Italy away from the foreign-policy lines of European neighbors France and Germany. This month, he addressed a joint meeting of the U.S. Congress.

Under Mr. Berlusconi, Italy has maintained one of the largest military contingents in Iraq, currently numbering more than 2,500 troops, while Mr. Prodi and his coalition allies have been outspoken critics of the war. However, both candidates have indicated that a withdrawal of Italian troops is likely by year end.

Mr. Berlusconi's biggest electoral liability is his management of the economy. The businessman-turned-politician came to power in 2001 pledging to cut taxes and increase jobs in a bid to bolster growth. Italy reported flat economic growth in 2005, the worst performance in the 12-nation euro zone. Italian exports, the engine of the national economy, have lost ground not only to Asian rivals such as China and India but to neighbors such as Germany. Although Mr. Berlusconi did manage to cut income taxes, Italians have seen their overall tax burden drop by less than 1% since he came to power, as local taxes have risen.

Italy's powerful business lobby, the Confindustria, has criticized him repeatedly for failing to lower labor costs or corporate taxes. Mr. Prodi has been pushing an economic platform of reducing the tax burden on businesses in order to jump-start the economy. During this electoral campaign, Mr. Berlusconi has tried to shift attention away from the economy and toward security. In recent years, Italian intelligence services have reported evidence of threats from several Islamist terrorist groups, and concerns about a possible attack remain high. Mr. Berlusconi also has tried to paint the center-left coalition, which includes communist parties, as being run by extremists.

"His only chance is to move the main theme from the economy to security. That's what he's pushing," said Mr. Diamanti.

The campaign has been marked by strident rhetoric and name-calling. On Friday, Mr. Berlusconi quipped from a meeting in Brussels that his opponent "doesn't count for anything." Mr. Prodi responded, "We'll see who counts more on April 10."

Australia Wheat Trade Squeezed By Iraq Scandal (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

SYDNEY, Australia -- Pressure is mounting on Australia to dismantle its powerful wheat-export monopoly amid allegations that it paid kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime to win lucrative wheat contracts in Iraq.

Australia ranks as the world's second-biggest exporter of wheat, behind the U.S., according to U.S. Department of Agriculture statistics, and is a major competitor for U.S. and European farmers overseas. Australia exports about 16 million tons of wheat a year, compared with about 29 million tons by the U.S. Iraq, one of the most important wheat markets, took in about three million tons last year in a global export market of about 110 million tons valued at about $17 billion.

Australia punches above its weight in the market by requiring all its export wheat to be sold through a "single desk" monopoly managed by AWB Ltd., a publicly traded firm that markets Australian grain to foreign buyers. Local growers believe AWB's shared costs and combined supply increase Australia's market clout and generate economies of scale that help it compete with subsidized competitors in the U.S. and elsewhere.

U.S. and European farmers have long argued the single-desk system is a monopoly that distorts the world's wheat trade. They say that if it is dismantled, new markets would open for U.S. and European farmers -- including the Iraq market -- and result in higher prices for their crop. They also argue that tearing down the Australian single desk would pressure other countries to make trade-related concessions -- particularly Canada, the other big wheat exporter with a similar single-desk program.

Allegedly unfair competition from AWB has "led to reduced U.S. wheat exports, which in turn leads to lower U.S. prices -- which hits American wheat farmers in the pocketbook and increases government-support program costs," said Alan Tracy, president of U.S. Wheat Associates, in a recent report to the board of the trade group, based in Washington.

Australia's single desk has survived numerous attacks in the past. But now, Australian government officials are investigating claims that AWB paid more than US$220 million in illegal kickbacks to the Hussein government as part of the scandal-plagued United Nations oil-for-food program. The government agreed in November to open an inquiry, and formal testimony began in January.

A report headed by former U.S. Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker last year found AWB paid the money to a Jordanian company to transport wheat through Iraq. But the funds were channeled to the Hussein government. To some critics, that suggested AWB made the payments as kickbacks to secure wheat contracts. AWB was the biggest supplier of wheat to Iraq under the U.N.'s oil-for-food program.

An AWB spokesman declined to comment on the allegations. AWB has said it is reviewing its governance policies and will take any necessary actions to restore confidence in the company.

The government inquiry isn't expected to release its findings until late June at the earliest. A commission reviewing the matter has emphasized that its mission doesn't include deciding the future of the desk itself. But other Australian officials and wheat-industry leaders have said they would be willing to revisit the system in light of the allegations.

In Iraq, grain-board officials recently said they won't buy wheat from AWB until after the commission releases its findings. A group of Australian agricultural companies has organized to offer wheat in AWB's place -- a potentially significant crack in AWB's export monopoly.

U.S. wheat producers have seized on the scandal to try to drive a wedge deeper into that rift. A U.S. Wheat Associates resolution expressed "moral outrage" and thanked the Australian government inquiry for "bringing sunshine to a dark corner of corporate misbehavior by AWB." The resolution demanded dismantling of the AWB monopoly. Sen. Norm Coleman (R., Minn.) demanded explanations from the Australian government.

Australian farmers have responded in kind, led by the Grains Council of Australia, which represents about 30,000 growers. In one statement, it warned, "The U.S. Wheat Industry Should Back Off."

The council said in a separate release that U.S. companies such as Cargill Inc. already control the lion's share of global trade and that "it has been a clearly stated aim of [U.S. Wheat Associates] to re-capture the Iraq wheat market from Australia." It also says that U.S. farmers receive much larger government subsidies than Australian farmers do.

Mideast Feels Stress Of Stock Slide (WSJ)

By Craig Karmin And Yasmine El-rashidi

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

The Persian Gulf's highflying stock markets, suffering their first serious correction after years of gains, are raising concerns that a speculative bubble may burst and hurt emerging markets more broadly.

DOJ_NMG_0021342

Fueled by cash from high oil prices, stock markets in Dubai, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi and elsewhere in the Gulf have tripled or more in value in the past three years. But in recent weeks, these stocks have suffered double-digit losses, with Saudi Arabia, the region's biggest stock market, shedding about a third of its value since late February.

The declines underscore the risks of emerging-market investing at a time when U.S. investors, from individuals to pensions and hedge funds, are investing more overseas. Emerging-market stock funds world-wide have received $20 billion in new money, or inflows, this year, matching the total inflows for all of 2005, a record year, according to EmergingPortfolio.com Fund Research.

Analysts say the selloff in the Gulf shows few signs of spilling over broadly to other developing countries -- as happened in 1997 when a currency crisis in Thailand sparked broad losses throughout Asia, or when Russia's debt default the following year roiled global markets -- because few investors outside the Gulf own its stocks.

Some economic ripples could reach beyond the Middle East. Fears of any instability in the Gulf tend to boost oil prices, through a so-called political-risk premium attached to the price of crude. "You could see that risk premium widen," said Shigeki Makino, a senior portfolio manager for Putnam Investments in Boston who thinks that would be negative for most stocks globally. "Broadly speaking, markets are very sensitive to oil prices."

A few of the top-performing, but more volatile, emerging markets, such as Turkey and Brazil, are seeing signs that global investors are lightening up on holdings. Their benchmark indexes have fallen more than 5% this month. "It is a warning sign that people are worried about risk," said Arjun Divecha, a fund manager with GMO Emerging Markets in Berkeley, Calif.

The market reversals in the Gulf have triggered outrage among millions of small investors in the region, many of whom started investing in stocks in the past few years and aren't accustomed to precipitous declines. Stock investing has been taken up as a hobby in an unprecedented number of households in the Gulf, where economies are booming from rising oil revenue. An initial public offering of stock from Saudi Arabia's Yanbu National Petrochemicals Co. reportedly received orders from 40% of the kingdom's adult population. Many investors have borrowed money to bet heavily on highflying stocks.

Two weeks ago, angry Kuwaiti investors took to the streets demanding government action to prevent a further slide in share prices. In Qatar, Muslim clerics told a local paper they feared social disruption caused by the market's declines.

Nervous selling by small investors spurred some of the declines. "The panic from small investors who came late to the party and started dumping their stocks recently to cut their losses did not help," said Karim El-Solh, chief executive of Gulf Capital, an investment bank based in Abu Dhabi.

An abrupt or protracted market slump could take a toll on the Gulf economies, which have been expanding at a rate of 6% to 7% annually. Countries such as Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates to a degree have taken advantage of stock-market gains to expedite the sale of state-owned companies into private hands. Analysts say there are about 120 IPOs waiting in the pipeline.

More worrisome, a punctured stock-market bubble could aggravate political and social tensions in an already volatile area. "We are seeing signs of unrest and disquiet in the region that shouldn't lead to political instability but that governments have to address," said Gary Kleiman, a managing partner at Kleiman International Consultants, a Washington, D.C., research company that specializes in emerging markets.

At least tacitly, government officials in the region have acknowledged concern by implementing measures to stanch stock-market bleeding. The Saudis declared foreign residents in the kingdom could invest directly in shares, while the Kuwaiti government announced plans to buy up stocks.

Economists say the broader fallout from severe stock-market corrections in the Gulf would be hard to predict. One result could be a shift in how some of the billions of dollars in Middle Eastern oil money would be invested. In a recent report, HSBC estimated there could be as much as $300 billion from oil revenue available for investment. That is enough to buy one-fifth of the emerging-market stocks listed in the Morgan Stanley Capital International index, or 7% of publicly outstanding U.S. Treasurys.

The run-up in Gulf stock-market prices draws comparisons with the surge in Internet shares in the late 1990s. Seven different markets in the region more than doubled last year, despite formidable restrictions on foreigners that keep most overseas investors away. In Saudi Arabia -- the largest Gulf stock market and the one where investor borrowing has been heaviest -- the market doubled in value last year and has surged nearly sevenfold since 2002. In Qatar, Islamic bank Al Rayyan Bank filled a sports stadium in Doha with tens of thousands of investors hoping to participate in its IPO.

Some say the selloff was sparked by a rule change in the Saudi market that lowered the maximum one-day fluctuation for a stock to 5% from 10%. Analysts say investors interpreted this as a sign authorities were getting nervous about the market's vertiginous level. Others say the collapse of a deal by Dubai Ports World, which is backed by the government of the U.A.E., to take over operations of some U.S. ports hurt investor sentiment.

Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist for Bank of America Corp., suggests a bursting of the Gulf's stock-market bubbles likely would make many of the region's large institutional investors -- which, though more diversified, often participated alongside small investors in the local markets -- more risk-averse.

The oil-price surge in recent years resulted in the Middle East being a net buyer of $20 billion of U.S. securities in 2004, according to Bank of America. While that figure fell to $6 billion last year as the region's stock markets attracted more funds, Mr. Quinlan figures this year it will return to, or perhaps exceed, the previous level.

Turning The Taps Back To The States (WP)

By Monte Reel

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

LOMAS DE ZAMORA, Argentina -- Carina Grossi turned on the tap in her kitchen sink and raised a glass of water to the light, her eyes narrowing in disgust.

"Look at that," said Grossi, 32. "Look how cloudy the water is, how dirty."

"It's a disaster," said her father, Eduardo, a 65-year-old grocer. "That's what is making your mother so sick."

Like many of their neighbors in this working-class suburb of Buenos Aires, the Grossis are convinced that their water is contaminated -- and they now use bottled water to make soup and tea. They blame the problem on the French company that has provided water and sewer service since the federal government privatized the utility in 1993.

Across Latin America, a growing number of people say the privatization of public services, a movement that swept the region in the 1980s and 1990s, has failed. Protests have erupted over the issue in several countries, and some governments are beginning to reverse these policies. Last week Argentina announced it was rescinding its 30-year contract with the French company Suez and reinstating government control of the water supply.

The Grossis, among many others, have welcomed the about-face.

"The trains, the water, the electricity -- I say it all needs to come back to national control," Carina Grossi said. In her suburb, authorities estimate about 30 percent of homes lack water and the majority are without sewage service. "We pay money out to these foreign companies and get nothing in return," she said. "This is our country. We should stop selling it out to others."

The backlash against the private sector has been building for several years in many pockets of the region. In some cases, such as Bolivia and Mexico, it has been actively promoted by grass-roots leaders in tandem with their demands for limiting the influence of foreign interests.

In 2000, street protests in the Bolivian city of Cochabamba prompted the state to annul a water contract with Bechtel Corp.; last year more demonstrations in El Alto, a city adjacent to the capital, La Paz, led to the suspension of a contract with a subsidiary of Suez.

In the past year, protests against the privatization of other sectors, including electricity and energy, have broken out in Peru, Ecuador, Guatemala and Mexico. Last week, several thousand demonstrators marched through Managua, the capital of Nicaragua, to demand the government improve water services without privatizing them.

Last week, representatives from 148 countries gathered in Mexico for the World Water Forum, held every three years to discuss global water supplies. The forum voted to issue a decree stating that governments -- not private companies -- should hold primary responsibility for providing safe drinking water. Bolivia, Cuba, Venezuela and Uruguay attached a separate statement noting their "profound concern" about the possible negative impacts of international investment agreements and free trade.

Some officials and experts who promote the role of the private sector in development of basic services said the swing toward nationalization seems like a case of collective amnesia: People are forgetting that many state-run utilities were a mess, they say, wracked with debt and in need of bailouts.

"It would seem that so many years of bad service and very high costs weren't enough to demonstrate that these roads lead to failure," said Adrian Menem, an Argentine congressman and nephew of former president Carlos Menem, who led the privatization efforts of the 1990s. "We are returning to the blind state of the past century."

President Nestor Kirchner's decision to terminate the French contract and put water in the hands of a new state-run entity is not without precedent. In 2003, he took the nation's postal service out of private hands, and it has since turned a profit.

A desire to replicate that experience in part fueled the decision on water service, said Nicolas Ducote, an analyst with the Center for the Implementation of Public Policies Promoting Equity and Growth, based in Buenos Aires. But popular politics, he said, was just as important.

"The president knows that it's politically popular to bash the private sector," Ducote said. "That sort of approach focuses only on the short term. Six months down the road, if there is one problem with someone's water, he'll pay a price for this."

Suez officials countered Kirchner's criticisms of their performance, saying that the company improved service despite being handcuffed by the government's mandated price freezes after a national economic collapse in 2001. A spokeswoman said the company invested at least four times more than the previous state-run enterprise did, added more than 3,700 miles of new pipes and provided more than 2 million new customers access to drinking water.

The company also said Kirchner's claim that it made "hundreds of millions" of dollars in Argentina was wrong; it asserted it lost nearly $900 million on the deal.

"In certain countries we've found that the governments are not living up to their side of the bargain," the spokeswoman, Luan Greenwood, said in a telephone interview from Suez's Paris headquarters. "We've learned that. We're not going to be burned again."

The financial markets have taken note as well. In the days after the contract was cut, Argentine stock trading slowed considerably. In Bolivia, foreign investment has slowed since President Evo Morales, elected in January, vowed to partly nationalize the energy sector.

In Peru, financial markets took their sharpest tumble of the year this past week when an opinion poll showed that the front-runner in next month's presidential election is Ollanta Humala, a nationalist who is promising to rewrite contracts to make the state an equal partner in the mining and energy sectors.

In Lomas de Zamora, a community of small brick houses and cobblestone streets, some residents say their only concern is getting access to clean, safe drinking water. Marta Guzman, 47, said she had stomach problems earlier this year and attributed them to contaminated tap water.

"Whether it is the state or a private company, I don't care," Guzman said. "All I want is good water. I don't care who I get it from."

Somalis Bury Dead, Brace For Battle (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, March 26 -- Radical Islamic militiamen and rivals buried their dead Sunday and brought in more fighters during a lull after four days of combat on the outskirts of Mogadishu, witnesses said. So far, at least 93 people have died and nearly 200 have been wounded in the violence.

A prominent moderate Islamic scholar appealed to the warring sides not to restart the fighting, which ranks among the deadliest in recent years in the nominal capital of this Horn of Africa country.

"I offer the warring sides a venue for them to talk to resolve their differences," Sharif Sheik Muhidin said.

Somalia has been without a working government for 15 years. The recent battles involve a militia supporting hard-line Islamic clerics who are trying to expand their influence and fighters loyal to businessmen and Somali warlords who have formed an alliance to oppose the religious movement.

DOJ_NMG_0021345

Only junior commanders in the Islamic militia responded positively to Muhidin's call. Key leaders in the group remained silent, and the rival warlords and businessmen were wary of the offer.

The two sides have been fighting for supremacy in the city's northern and northeastern outskirts since Wednesday.

On Saturday, 300 Islamic militiamen staged a pre-dawn attack to capture the area's only working port, El Maan, and an airstrip on Mogadishu's northeastern outskirts. At least 20 people were killed in the fighting, but the attackers failed to reach the port and airstrip.

With the lull Sunday, combatants buried dead comrades and repaired their vehicles while the groups sent in more fighters with weapons and ammunition, witnesses said.

Somalia has had no effective government since 1991, when warlords ousted a dictatorship and then turned on each other, carving the nation of 8.5 million people into a patchwork of fiefdoms.

The International Crisis Group, a nonprofit organization that tracks conflicts, said al-Qaeda contributed to attacks on U.S. and U.N. peacekeepers in Somalia in the early 1990s. The group also said al-Qaeda used the country as a transit zone for terrorist attacks in neighboring Kenya and as a hiding place for some leading members.

Court Calls For Arrest Of Liberian Ex-Leader (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 27, 2006

ABUJA, Nigeria, March 26 -- The international war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone urged Nigeria on Sunday to immediately arrest Charles Taylor, Liberia's exiled former president, because of fears the former president might flee to avoid trial for crimes against humanity.

Nigeria said Saturday it was ready to hand over Taylor, sending a warning to other warmongers on the continent.

"The watching world will wish to see Taylor held in Nigerian detention to avoid the possibility of him using his wealth and associates to slip away, with grave consequences to the stability of the region," the prosecutor of Sierra Leone's war tribunal, Desmond de Silva, said Sunday.

De Silva said he had sent a message asking Nigerian President Olusegun Obasanjo to arrest Taylor.

Taylor has been in exile in the southern Nigerian city of Calabar since being forced from power under a 2003 accord that ended a rebel assault on Liberia's capital.

Nigeria "has resisted persistent pressures to violate the understanding of 2003," which gave Taylor refuge under an internationally brokered peace deal, Obasanjo said in a statement Saturday. Nevertheless, he had informed Liberia's president that "the government of Liberia is free to take former President Charles Taylor into its custody."

Liberia's information minister, Johnny McClain, said his government was working Sunday with other countries to get Taylor sent directly to Sierra Leone.

Taylor, who could not be reached for comment, is accused of starting a 14-year civil war in his homeland that brutalized tens of thousands of young boys and girls drafted as rebel fighters. He also is blamed for a savage war in Sierra Leone where rebels -- including child fighters -- terrorized victims by chopping off arms, legs, ears and lips.

Each of the 17 charges he faces carries a sentence of life in prison.

Taylor also is accused of harboring al-Qaeda suicide bombers who attacked U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

After her inauguration in January, Liberian President Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf said a trial for Taylor was not a priority. But she made a formal request to Nigeria after an official visit to Washington, which is the source of aid needed to rebuild Liberia.

Nigerian presidential spokesman Oluremi Oyo denied in a statement published in ThisDay newspaper that Nigeria was reacting to pressure from the United States. Obasanjo is traveling to the United States this week and is scheduled to meet with President Bush on Wednesday.

Rebuild Liberia (WT)

By Andrew Young And Peter V. Emerson

The Washington Times, March 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0021346

Liberia's Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, Africa's first democratically elected, female president, arrived last week in Washington for a working visit with President Bush. Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf won a special runoff election in November, defeating international soccer star George Weah. Her electoral victory signals a monumental shift in West African political trends. Her presidency is demonstrative of a population yearning to re-establish a free market and a democratic society. These conditions are unique for Africa, and Liberia represents a singular opportunity to stabilize the region and establish a model for African development.

Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf now faces the herculean task of rebuilding a country that for two decades was the battleground of greedy warlords and dictators.

Still, external observers optimistically point to her indomitable spirit and famed incorruptibility. Her prior business, governmental and NGO successes suggest she will salvage this historically prosperous country that is now without basic infrastructure. But her experience and political acuity will not alone suffice to rebuild Liberia and triumph over 85 percent unemployment. Successful redevelopment requires substantial support from the United States and sustained investment by the corporate community.

There are striking historical reasons why America should involve itself.

Liberia has been a quiet and invaluable U.S. ally since its conception by the U.S. Slave Trade Act of 1819. Critically, Liberia was the Allies' primary supplier of rubber during World War II, and has since hosted an ultra-secret Omega tracking station, the African Voice of America transmitter and strategic U.S. military facilities. Nor is this shared ideological congruency surprising: Liberian society has a virile democratic tradition engendered by a constitution modeled on our own.

But rebuilding Liberia is not only a moral obligation; it is, make no mistake, imperative to U.S. national security. Liberia's ties to America are frequently underplayed here, but those very ties define its position in Africa. Amid the Millennium Goals, failure of a favored American ally like Liberia would signal the rest of Africa that such promises about aid and development are hollow rhetoric. Renewed civil unrest and further disintegration of civil society could permanently destabilize the region.

Conversely, a resurgent Liberia will anchor West Africa, serving as a beacon for emerging democratic movements.

The Bush administration made a promise to Africa and must now follow through on that commitment to growth by unveiling a Marshall-style infrastructural recovery plan, by creating a Liberian Enterprise Fund to jumpstart the economy and furnish working capital, by fast-tracking relief from Liberia's $3.8 billion foreign debt burden, by bridging the $12 million gap to complete demobilization and restructuring of Liberia's security sector, by providing substantial funding for education and health care and by increasing numbers of Peace Corps volunteers.

Still, U.S. government money can only lay the foundation for growth. Ultimately, it is the corporate community that can ensure success.

Guarantees for foreign investment are now in place -- Liberia boasts vast natural resources, such as diamonds, gold, iron ore, timber, rubber, coffee, cocoa and undeveloped offshore oil reserves. Marry these untapped resources to a literate, Anglophone workforce in an atmospherehistorically committed to capitalism and you have conditions unique in Africa, arguably the world.

Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf's business and development expertise make her an ideal partner for foreign investors in Africa. She maintains it will be the private sector, rather than the public sector, that will determine Liberia's future. In fact, she has demonstrated her commitment to business by appointing 25-year Wall Street veteran Richard Tolbert as chairman of the National Investment Commission. The commission is responsible for attracting and assisting foreign investment. Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf's message is clear, "Liberia is once again open for business."

We believe the corporate community should echo that message by creating a Corporate Council on Liberia, to be modeled on David Rockefeller's effort for Jamaica. Comprised of corporate executives and entrepreneurs who have business interest in Liberia, this council would be an indispensable sounding board for the president and her economic team as they undertake the challenge of rebuilding.

Today, Liberia is a foundering state buoyed by a hopeful population; America must not allow this close ally to fail. More than mere morals, the security of Africa and perhaps the world are at stake. If the corporate community and the U.S government join with the "Iron Lady" -- as Mrs. Johnson-Sirleaf is known in Africa -- Liberia can again become a model republic anchoring Africa with a free-market economy that will be a beacon to its emerging neighbors.

France's Misguided Protesters (NYT)

The New York Times, March 27, 2006

For the second time in four months, French streets are filled with riot police, tear gas and rampaging youths. But the similarity is deceptive. Back in November, it was the sons of North African immigrants in their dreary suburbs exploding in frustration at the lack of jobs, prospects or programs. It was hard not to feel sympathy with their cause, along with outrage at their response.

This time, privileged university students have been protesting what they see as an assault on the job security that they consider their birthright. But the labor reform to which they are so opposed is much needed and was proposed by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin as a partial answer to those who rioted in the suburbs.

A new law essentially allows companies to fire workers under 26 within the first two years of employment with little notice. The idea is to encourage employers to hire youths on a trial or temporary basis. There is an obvious downside: young workers could be fired on a whim, or simply to make room for another wave of disposable workers. But the alternative is the current state of affairs, in which jobs are sinecures. Unemployment is at 22.2 percent among the young and close to 40 percent in the poor suburbs, compared with 9.6 percent nationwide.

Mr. de Villepin, a patrician notoriously deaf to the streets, did a bad job of presenting and selling the law to the students, the unions and the public. The unions are now threatening a general strike unless Mr. de Villepin backs down, and the prime minister's ratings are plunging. But his law is a reasonable attempt to remedy a serious problem, and the reaction of the students and unions is out of line.

Resistance to the law has been based on a knee-jerk defense of the job security that the French, or at least those who have a job, hold sacred. That has created widespread support for the protests. Even unemployed youths are wary, fearing that if they did get a job, they would be at higher risk than other workers of losing it.

However dramatic the images of the disturbances, the clashes have been localized and relatively brief. Before they get any worse, students should stop focusing on their privileges and heed President Jacques Chirac's call for a creative dialogue about how they can help resolve the real problem facing their generation.

Call Me Jacques (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, March 27, 2006

European Union summits in Brussels just won't be the same without Jacques Chirac. Three years ago, after a little wine at dinner, the French President told the pro-American countries from Eastern Europe to "shut up" -- oops, pardon the Anglicism, se taire -- on Iraq. France's standing in "New Europe" has never recovered.

At the opening of the spring meeting last Thursday, Mr. Chirac was back in form. The head of the Europe-wide employers' federation, the Frenchman Ernest-Antoine Seillière, told the 25 gathered EU leaders that he would address them in "the language of business." C'est l'anglais, Monsieur le President.

Before his compatriot could get another word out, Mr. Chirac stood up and stormed out of the room, tailed by his finance and foreign ministers. The gallant trio returned once Mr. Seillière finished his talk about -- we're not making this up -- the dangerous rise of national chauvinism in business and the economy. The next day the Elysée said that Mr. Chirac acted spontaneously in defense of the French language. Some wags speculated that the President simply wanted to skip a talking to about his country's "patriotisme économique," since protectionism is the one area in which France leads Europe.

It is hard to think of anyone who has done more than this president to marginalize France and the French language -- all in the name of defending them. With a year to go in his second term, a new and much-discussed book in France portrays a sickly President depressed about his low public standing and lack of achievements over the past 11 years. But in Brussels, Mr. Chirac showed that he can't be written off just yet. Thanks for the memories, Jack.
