In January 2005, the Innocence Project joined the case, eventually filing the motion for the DNA testing that ultimately led to the match with Mr. Bench's daughter.

"Whatever happens, I've already proven my innocence; I'm already free," Mr. Brown said. "I may be in prison, but my spirit is free."

5 Houston-Area Men Attacked By Rapist (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

BAYTOWN, Tex., Dec. 20 — A serial rapist appears to be responsible for five attacks and robberies of young men in an area east of Houston, the authorities here said.

The most recent attack took place on Nov. 30 in a prominent Baytown subdivision called Tanglewilde. The first attack occurred in April in eastern Harris County, Capt. Roger Clifford of the Baytown Police Department said Wednesday.

Another attack in eastern Harris County was in September, and the two others in Baytown took place in May and July.

All five victims have been white men who were alone and attacked in or near their homes in upscale neighborhoods, Captain Clifford said. The attacker is described as a black man in his mid-20s who is about 6 feet tall and 200 pounds with short hair and no discernible accent. He is also clean-cut and well dressed and sometimes wears an earring.

The assailant has used a gun and knife to abduct his victims, all of whom have been physically smaller than him, but he has not always been successful in forcing them into sexual acts, Captain Clifford said.

Concerns Raised About Security At Supermax Prison (WP)

By R. Scott Rappold, Mcclatchey Newspapers

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Town Residents Aren't Worried, But Guards Are

FLORENCE, Colo. -- You can't see Supermax from the highway, but everyone knows it's there.

The prison, hidden by the rolling slopes of the high desert 50 miles south of Colorado Springs, houses 400 of the most dangerous inmates in the federal system -- psychopaths, gang leaders, Mafia bosses, multiple murderers and terrorists, including Eric Rudolph, Ramzi Yousef and Zacarias Moussaoui.

Daniel Garcia, who runs the Super 8 Motel a few minutes' dash from the prison, doesn't worry about one of Supermax's notorious inmates escaping and becoming his problem. "The ones that are really dangerous, I don't think they've got much of a chance of walking away," he said.

After all, it's the most secure prison in the nation. Or is it?

Although it was once taken as an article of faith that Supermax -- one of four federal prisons at the complex and officially known as ADX Florence -- is as secure as anyplace on Earth, some aren't so sure now.

The union representing prison guards is raising alarms about staff cuts. A federal report revealed inadequate scanning of terrorists' mail, and an arbitrator agreed that staff cuts had made the prison dangerous for employees.

The presence of a couple of dozen terrorists, while the war against Islamic extremists goes on around the globe, has made prison security a cause celebre for Colorado's U.S. senators, who have toured the facility and pushed for more staff and a perimeter fence.

But on the streets of Florence, there is little concern about a terrorist breaking out -- or his fellow terrorists breaking in.

"If they break out, they're running like crazy," Gail Clairemont said while shopping recently in a Florence coffee shop.

DOJ_NMG_0108242

Across the street, gallery owner Rudl Mergelman doesn't lose sleep about Florence's notorious celebrities.

"The people from out of town are really more concerned about it than we are," he said.

Among those who think the danger has been overblown is the man who once was responsible for making sure Supermax lived up to its name.

"No one's getting out of the Supermax, period. End of story," said Robert Hood, warden of Supermax from 2002 to 2005.

Even union officials concede that an escape is unlikely. But they say staff cuts have made the prison dangerous for employees and vulnerable to attack from the outside.

This year, a federal arbitrator agreed.

The evidence, the arbitrator wrote, is clear: 3,147 critical shifts left unfilled; some housing units unsupervised for entire shifts; cells no longer being regularly searched; a rise in assaults on staff and threats of assaults by inmates angry they can't get their one hour per day of recreation; two murders at the prison in two months last year, after a decade without any.

Suddenly, the issue was viewed as more than union blustering over staff cuts.

"One of the problems we run into as a union is we're always dismissed as trying to pad federal jobs," said Mike Schnobrich, a correctional officer and secretary/treasurer of the American Federation of Government Employees Council of Prison Locals 1302. "We've been saying from the beginning this is not just a management-labor issue. This is a good-government issue."

Federal officials have acknowledged the problem and recently hired or will hire 18 staff members, bringing the total to at least 208 -- still fewer than the 240 the prison had when it opened in the mid-1990s.

The union says it is not enough and has filed a charge of unfair labor practice, saying the prison has not followed the arbitrator's order to create a safe workplace.

"We're talking about a continuing problem," Schnobrich said. "We can't wait two years for budgets to kick in and talk about how to make this facility more safe."

The lack of a fence around the complex has become the central issue for the lawmakers who have taken an interest in the Supermax. Sens. Ken Salazar (D) and Wayne Allard (R) have sought $12 million for a new fence.

State Rep. Liane "Buffie" McFadyen (D) believes a fence would slow down not only an escapee, but anyone trying to break in, such as Islamic extremists bent on rescuing an imprisoned comrade.

The union, although it supports a perimeter fence, agrees it would not be a complete solution. "A fence isn't going to solve every problem we have out here for security," Schnobrich said.

Despite the clamor, many in Florence are against the idea of a fence as an unnecessary blight that would only draw attention to the massive federal prison.

"I don't have any particular concern about somebody getting out of Supermax. I've toured that facility twice," said Fremont County Commissioner Ed Norden (R). "A lot has been said about having a perimeter fence around the entire complex. I hope they give that some careful study."

He is more concerned that local police and emergency officials can't communicate with the prisons by radio. During one escape from the complex -- though not from the Supermax -- police didn't find out until after the inmate had been recaptured.

The Supermax warden, R. Wiley, declined an interview request. Prison spokeswoman Krista Rear, responding to questions in writing, said, "While a perimeter fence around the several buildings that comprise the Florence complex would enhance security, other measures can be taken in lieu of or in addition to the fence that would also assist in limiting access to the property." She did not elaborate.

The presence of terrorists has focused attention on the prison, but former warden Hood said they might not even be the most dangerous inmates at the complex.

Although Supermax is meant to be a transition facility, where inmates can earn through good behavior a transfer to other prisons, the terrorists are probably there to stay -- as much for their own protection as for society's.

"How could you take, anytime in the future, [1993 World Trade Center bomber] Ramzi Yousef and put him on the grounds of Leavenworth and let him walk around every day?" Hood said.

"They can stand on their heads every day for the next 50 years, and they're not going anywhere."

A Vexing Leap In US Robbery Rate (CSM)

By Ben Arnoldy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

It's a crime chosen by those desperate for quick cash - and it's rising faster than a couple of hands during a stickup.

Possible explanations abound for the soaring robbery rate - 9.7 percent nationwide in the first half of 2006, according to federal crime statistics released this week. But a lead suspect in that troubling trend, say some criminologists, is added economic stress.

Small- to medium-size cities are the ones that saw the largest spikes in reported violent crime, especially robbery. In some of those, the poverty rate has also been climbing faster than the national average.

"It strikes me that many of the cities that have experienced increases in poverty and child poverty [in recent years] are the very same places experiencing increases in robbery right now," says Richard Rosenfeld, a criminologist at the University of Missouri.

The Rust Belt has seen large rises in poverty rates between 1999 and 2005, according to a report this month by the Brookings Institution in Washington - and many of the region's cities turn out to have seen sharp increases in robberies this year. In Lansing, Mich., reported robberies rose 34 percent through June 2006, after its poverty rate climbed 7.5 percentage points over the previous six years. In Cleveland, the robbery rate rose 13.1 percent, and the incidence of poverty went up 6.1 points. In Rochester, N.Y.: robbery is up 49.8 percent, and poverty 4.1 points.

But many cities show no such correlation, meaning the root of the problem is more complex than simple economics. In the West, for instance, some places report flat poverty rates and more robberies.

It's too early to pinpoint the causes of the jump in violent crime, caution Mr. Rosenfeld and others. The FBI report this week showed violent crime overall climbing for the second straight year, after more than a decade of declines.

A mix of factors could be contributing, say experts. Among them: overstretched police departments, convicts reentering society, a change in the illegal market for methamphetamine, and a baby-boom "echo" that's entering the 15- to 25-year-old prime crime bracket.

"Economic conditions are certainly not the whole story behind robbery," says Rosenfeld. But "when we're trying to understand year-to-year changes and why they're occurring in certain places and not others, then we need to focus on those factors that change relatively rapidly as opposed to those that don't."

Rosenfeld's previous research shows that robbery rates rise when consumer confidence measures turn negative. Robbery tempts those who see few economic options, he and others say.

Robbery "provides cash immediately. So it's kind of a measure of how desperate people are for cash," says Richard Wright, chairman of the criminology department at the University of Missouri. He has studied differences between the crimes of burglary, in which victims are not present, and robbery, in which they are. Burglary rates spike with the introduction of new and valuable consumer goods, whereas robbery appeals to those seeking an immediate payoff - such as people who can't find work, are addicted to drugs like crack cocaine and methamphetamine, or have just left prison and have nowhere to go, says Mr. Wright.

The robbery statistic is "a kind of leading-edge indicator" of something amiss, says David Harris, professor of law and values at the University of Toledo in Ohio. "When you have an increasing demographic bubble in these crime-prone years [15 to 25], and you combine that with a ... willingness to do something like robbery, then you really do have reason to be concerned."

For his part, Mr. Harris suspects the worsening violent-crime rates may be related to less police presence on the streets. Touring the US to promote his new book, "Good Cops: The Case for Preventive Policing," Mr. Harris says he often hears that police departments have become overstretched. "They have a whole set of demands on their plates that simply didn't exist a few years ago," says Harris, referring to homeland-security duties and less assistance from federal agents reassigned to antiterrorism.

A Justice Department spokesman counters that view, noting that federal spending has never been more than 4 percent of state and local law-enforcement spending. The number of police officers has grown every year regardless of federal funding, he adds, and first responders have benefited from a windfall of homeland-security funding in recent years.

In parsing the crime data, few experts dwelled on illicit drugs. But "meth" was the first word off the lips of police officials in two cities where robbery rates climbed. Spokane, Wash., and Colorado Springs, Colo., are now battling the drug that has long beset the Midwest and rural areas. What's different now, say Spokane police, is that do-it-yourself meth production has been beaten back, and users are buying meth made in Mexico. Hence, a sudden need for cash among addicts.

Free Genarlow Wilson Now (NYT)

Genarlow Wilson loves reading mystery novels and can't wait for the next Harry Potter book. The 20-year-old former high school football player and honor student works in a library, the perfect job for a young bookworm. Unfortunately, that is where the good news ends and a genuine horror story of this country's legal system begins.

The library in Georgia where Mr. Wilson works is in prison. He is two years into a sentence for engaging in consensual oral sex with a 15-year-old girl at a New Year's Eve party when he was 17. He won't be eligible for parole until he has served 10 years, essentially sacrificing his remaining youth to an obvious miscarriage of justice.

As Shaila Dewan reported in The Times this week, Mr. Wilson has been convicted of aggravated child molestation even though he and the girl were both minors at the time. Even if he could win an early release, Mr. Wilson could not go home to his family. He would have to register as a sex offender and would be prohibited from living with his 8-year-old sister. It is all the more disgraceful because the Georgia Supreme Court last week refused to hear his appeal.

The sexual act took place during a party involving sex, marijuana and alcohol, all captured on a graphic videotape. But that does not make Mr. Wilson a child molester. When high school students engage in consensual sexual activity, that is not the same as an adult molesting a teenager or a teenager molesting a child.

What makes this case more absurd is that if Mr. Wilson and the young woman had sexual intercourse, he would have been guilty only of a misdemeanor and not required to register as a sex offender, thanks to a provision in the law meant to avoid just this type of draconian punishment for consensual youthful indiscretions, the "Romeo and Juliet" exception. And since Mr. Wilson's conviction, the law has been changed to exempt oral sex as well. But the courts say that can't help Mr. Wilson retroactively.

His lawyer is planning to file a habeas petition seeking his release. The courts need to grant it and expunge his record so that Mr. Wilson can return to his family and his once promising academic career. Legislators in other states should take notice and make sure that their own laws do not catch children in dragnets designed for predatory adults.

CIVIL LAW:

U.S. Justice Department Moves Against Prosser in Bankruptcy Proceedings (STS)

St. Thomas (USVI) Source, December 21, 2006

Dec. 20, 2006 -- An arm of the U.S. Justice Department has moved against Innovative Communication Corp. owner Jeffrey Prosser in the seemingly endless bankruptcy cases involving, indirectly, Vitelco, the V.I. phone company.

The government unit is the U.S. Trustee, a self-described "watchdog" of the bankruptcy courts. It is part of the U.S. Department of Justice and is separate from the U.S. Bankruptcy Courts, which are part of the judicial system.

The U.S. Trustee moved on Dec. 19 that a case trustee be appointed to manage Prosser's business operations until the bankruptcy case is concluded. The presiding judge, Judith K. Fitzgerald, has already indicated her positive interest in such an appointment.

The judge will decide, presumably in a few weeks, and after a hearing, if such a government-imposed manager is a good idea. If she does she will then order the U.S. Trustee to appoint the case trustee. (The U.S. Trustee deals with all bankruptcies, while a case trustee deals with a single case or group of cases.)

The U.S. Trustee for the southeast United States is Felicia S. Turner, headquartered in Atlanta. Her motion filed with the bankruptcy court was noteworthy because of the directness of the language, for example:

"Virtually no progress has been made in these cases since [they]... were filed almost a year ago...The Debtors [i.e. Prosser and his companies] have done little more than repeatedly request continuances and then fail to meet the extended deadlines … Additionally, since Debtors' management has completely lost the trust of its creditors and other parties in interest, no progress will ever be made in these cases if Debtors' management remains in control of estate assets …."

Turner continues: "Thus while some level of acrimony is to be expected in these circumstances, these cases have been paralyzed by such acrimony. This paralysis combined with the allegation of the Debtors? creditors regarding the Debtors? alleged breach of their fiduciary responsibilities to their creditors is sufficient justification for the appointment of a chapter 11 trustee...."

The appointment of a case trustee, according to the Justice Department publication Bankruptcy Basics, is "a rarity in a chapter 11 case … the court, on motion by a party in interest or the U.S. Trustee, shall order the appointment … for cause, including fraud, dishonesty, incompetence, or gross mismanagement or if such an appointment is in the interest of creditors, any equity security holders, and other interests of the estate." (The estate being the property subject to the bankruptcy proceedings.)

The U.S. Trustee's motion, like several others over the past few months, has nibbled away at the secrecy of these proceedings in that it disclosed the size of the "discounted" settlement that Prosser had once worked out with his main adversaries. The settlement then collapsed, twice, when Prosser could not come up with the needed funding. That settlement – now moot – was set at $402 million.

The $402 million dealt only with debts Prosser and companies owe to his longtime bankers, the Virginia-based Rural Telephone Finance Cooperative, and to the one-time minority stockholders in the predecessor firm to Innovative Communications Co., represented by the Greenlight companies.

In addition, Prosser's group owes about $85 million to a group of Vitelco's preferred stockholders and another $60 million or so to the U.S. Treasury.

The full set of undiscounted debts, including unpaid interest and extensive legal bills, has been estimated as exceeding $800 million.

Meanwhile, on Dec. 19, both RTFC and Greenlight filed separate (and mutually-supporting) motions with the bankruptcy court seeking the appointment of a bankruptcy trustee in another manner. These two organizations asked the judge to transfer the case from the relatively pro-debtor chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code, where it is now, to the harsher chapter 7 of the Code, which would entail the selection of such a trustee.

In their briefs, the two major creditors contended that Prosser should not continue to manage the bankrupt properties on the grounds of "irrefutable conflicts of interest" since he is the sole shareholder of the firms. "Prosser," RTFC argued, "should not be allowed to stay in control of this chapter 11 process through his insider-domination of the corporate Debtors."

A reading of the three briefs – by the U.S. Trustee, RTFC, and Greenlight – indicate that while the last two knew of each other's actions, there was no indication that the U.S. Trustee was aware of the RTFC-Greenlight filings or vice-versa.

State Rep. Stephen LaRoque has joined U.S. Congressman Walter Jones in calling for the investigation of Durham County District Attorney Mike Nifong.

Jones, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, said Nifong might have violated the civil rights of three Duke University lacrosse players accused of raping an exotic dancer last spring. He also could have committed prosecutorial misconduct in his investigation of the case, Jones said.

LaRoque, who represents the 10th House District, was expected to appear last night on Fox News channel's "On the Record," with Greta VanSusteren, to discuss his belief that state law should be changed to allow the Legislature to investigate charges of malfeasance by district attorneys. Currently, the N.C. Bar Association — or a superior court judge — conducts such investigations.

Nifong was running for the Durham County Democratic Party's nomination for district attorney during the early stages of the rape investigation. The alleged victim's accusation of being raped by three lacrosse players during an off-campus party brought national attention to Nifong and his department. He won his nomination, and went on to eventually win the election.

"The prosecutor seems to have put his own political aspirations ahead of justice for these three young men who appear to have been falsely accused," LaRoque said.

LaRoque contends that the N.C. Bar Association should not be the only entity with authority to punish incidents of legal misconduct.

"That's like having the fox guard the hen house," he said.

State lifts new patient moratorium at Fort Bayard (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0108246

SILVER CITY, N.M. (AP) - The state Department of Health has lifted a yearlong-plus moratorium against admitting new long-term patients at its Fort Bayard Medical Center.

The state agency halted new admissions after a Justice Department review of the facility. On Monday, Health Secretary Michelle Lujan Grisham rescinded the motoratorium.

Fort Bayard, with a staff of 320, houses 133 patients.

Justice investigators said last spring they had serious concerns with the care at Fort Bayard. A report said an investigation "revealed a wide range of dangerously deficient medical and nursing care practices," and a failure to comply with federal regulations or meet professional standards.

The state cited the center in December 2004 for failings in maintenance, staff training and administration. The center's administrator was placed on leave three months later, then was fired.

The Department of Health took over management of the hospital in the interim.

Grisham said in August 2005 said officials found a pattern of abuse, neglect and exploitation of residents at Fort Bayard.

Federal investigators who reviewed documents and visited Fort Bayard in July and October 2005 cited inadequate medical care and nutritional services, failure to ensure that residents were safe, the dangerous use of psychotropic medications and numerous incidents of violence against patients and nurses.

The state hired GEO Care Inc. of Florida to run the center in November 2005. GEO Care recently hired an administrator, an assistant administrator and a medical director.

GEO Care asked the state to lift the moratorium, and has proposed a gradual admission of new long-term residents.

The medical center has continued admitting short-term rehabilitation patients.

The state also determined that the center needs a new facility because of deficiencies in the current aging structure. GEO Care plans to build a new $30 million medical center which it would lease to the state.

Grant County residents made it clear they want the state hospital to remain on or near Fort Bayard.

The village of Santa Clara purchased land administered by the U.S. Forest Service for a new facility, and the county provided funds. The county now owns the land where a replacement would be built.

Groundbreaking is tentatively set for next year, and a new center could be ready by mid-2008.

Fort Bayard is one of two state-owned and operated long-term care facilities for low-income New Mexicans. The other is in Las Vegas.

ANTITRUST:

Delta lawyer: US Airways merger has 'antitrust issues' (NMBW)

New Mexico Business Weekly, December 20, 2006

Delta Chairman and CEO Jerry Grinstein continued his offensive against US Airways' hostile takeover bid in a conference call with analysts Tuesday, saying the merger would create too much of a monopoly in too many markets.

"If the suggestion is that we're going to put a for-sale sign on Delta airlines, we're just not going to do that," Grinstein said.

But "if the process of consolidation starts, you do not want to be left out," he added, explaining that all airlines are keeping tabs on each other.

And he touted "the huge amount of value" that has been created at Delta during the Atlanta-based airline's bankruptcy proceedings, essentially pointing to US Airways' $8.7 billion bid as being less than the up to $12 billion in value that Delta believes it is worth. Delta earlier on Thursday filed its standalone plan to emerge from bankruptcy and reported its board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways' takeover bid.

"I hope we'd be an acquirer rather than an 'aquiree,'" Grinstein said.

Delta's chief antitrust lawyer added that he doesn't believe the U.S. Department of Justice will approve a merger between Delta Air Lines Inc. (Pink Sheets: DALRQ) and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. (NYSE: LCC). The two airlines serve New Mexico air travelers through the Albuquerque International Sunport.

"It appears from a factual standpoint this is a merger that clearly has a lot of antitrust issues attached to it," said Jim Weiss, a Washington partner in the law firm Preston Gates & Ellis LLP. "The antitrust risk here is quite high."

Weiss, the former head of the DOJ's antitrust division and a hired gun for Delta since 1988, said he believes it would take the department about a year to review US Airways' hostile bid for Delta. That's because the DOJ will anticipate more merger proposals and would want to go over the Delta/US Airways merger with a fine-toothed comb.

In a detailed PowerPoint presentation available on Delta's Web site, Weiss showed why he believes the Delta/US Airways combination wouldn't pass muster. Chiefly, he said, a lot of small to mid-sized American cities would lose competition if the two airlines merged. The combined airline would be the largest carrier in 127 small communities. And Weiss contends that low cost carriers don't usually go into really small cities, so the competition isn't likely to be replaced.

Other proof he offered for his position: the DOJ rejected a US Airways/United merger after a 14-month investigation. And that merger had even fewer overlapping routes and hubs, Weiss said.

Meanwhile, US Airways continued its public campaign for Delta. The airline sent out a statement from Chairman and CEO Doug Parker saying, "Combining US Airways and Delta will create at least $1.65 billion in annual synergies beyond the value that could be created by any standalone plan. These synergies come on top of the certainty of $4 billion in cash and the upside potential of 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock."

But Grinstein said in the conference call that he expects Delta would be $8 billion in debt when it emerges from bankruptcy. By contrast, he said, a US Airways/Delta merger would be saddled with $23 billion in debt. If that sounds familiar, he quipped, that was the amount of debt Delta had when it filed for Chapter 11 in 2005.

Phone Carriers Win A Skirmish In Cable Wars (NYT)

By Matt Richtel

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Telephone companies got some help yesterday in elbowing their way into the video arena that the cable industry has dominated.

Arguing that cable television rates have surged in the absence of robust competition, federal regulators moved to speed up the local approval process for phone companies seeking to compete.

The action came in a 3-to-2 vote by the Federal Communications Commission. The ruling does not force municipalities to grant phone companies a video franchise, but it does require a decision within 90 days.

Phone carriers, notably Verizon, have asserted that some municipalities are slow to grant approvals, often in the face of cable industry lobbying.

If it succeeds in fostering competition, the decision could eventually affect the rates and services available to the roughly 100 million households that pay for access to television.

The decision is part of a fierce political, regulatory and business battle between the cable and telephone companies. They are battling town by town and household by household to get a share of the growing amount Americans spend on their monthly telecommunications bills.

Cable companies have made considerable inroads at offering telephone service and high-speed Internet access. Telephone companies have in the last year entered cable's traditional turf, television, and say this decision will fuel their offensive.

"This means an end to the automatic skyrocketing in cable prices and means greater choice in service and programming," said David Fish, a Verizon spokesman.

But industry analysts said that the decision would not prompt overnight change, in part because it is likely to face a court challenge, but also because the biggest challenge to the phone companies remains the technical and financial logistics of entering a costly new business.

The F.C.C. found that municipalities were unnecessarily and unfairly delaying approval of franchise agreements, refusing them unreasonably, or making unrelated demands, like requiring financing for public swimming pools or recreation centers.

Cable industry officials said they objected to the decision, arguing it creates an uneven playing field by not similarly expediting the process for renewal of their own franchises — the typically multiyear agreements that allow cable companies to provide television access in a community in exchange for a tax of around 5 percent of their sales.

The industry also rejected F.C.C. data indicating that cable television prices had risen steadily in recent years, even as competition had driven down the cost of other telecommunications services, like Internet and phone access.

The commission found that the average monthly rate for cable service increased 5.2 percent, to $43.04, in 2004 alone, and 93 percent in less than a decade.

Kyle McSlarrow, president and chief executive of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, said those figures were taken from published rate cards, and thus ignored the reality that most subscribers get discounts or other deals.

He said the prices also did not reflect the discounts offered when subscribers buy bundles of telephone, Internet and television service.

Roughly 66 million American households pay for cable service, compared with around 28 million who get satellite access. There are only a few million who get it through telephone lines.

Bills introduced in Congress this year would have eased the franchise approval process, either by making it national or creating a national standard, but no legislation was ultimately approved.

There have also been political battles at the state level, with the phone companies seeking a statewide approval process that would circumvent municipal franchising. They have prevailed in states including Texas, New Jersey and California.

Jessica Zufolo, an analyst who studies the telecommunications market on behalf of investors, called the F.C.C. decision "a huge victory for the Bells," but said "it's a somewhat pyrrhic victory because there's a high, high litigation risk." She said cities in particular might sue, arguing that the F.C.C. had overstepped its authority.

Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein, who voted against the proposal, asserted that the agency lacked the authority to rule as it had. And Jim L. Haggerton, vice chairman of the Information Technology and Communications Committee of the National League of Cities, said the ruling took away municipalities' rightful power.

"We're totally opposed to the federal government making the decisions for cities across the country," said Mr. Haggerton, who sits on the city council in Tukwila, Wash.

Kevin J. Martin, the commission chairman, who voted in favor of the new rule, emphasized the finding that insufficient competition was fueling a rise in cable rates.

"It is critical then that the commission act to remove regulatory barriers to the ability of a second cable operator to enter the market," he said in a statement.

The most aggressive effort to compete against cable companies has come from Verizon. The company said it provided television service to 1.2 million customers, and had franchise agreements in about 300 municipalities including 25 in New York State, mostly on Long Island. That is a small fraction of the more than 3,000 municipalities Verizon said it needed to reach to achieve its goal of providing television service in 60 percent of its telephone territory.

Mr. Fish of Verizon said agreements in other cities had taken many months; he said 83 percent of franchise negotiations with cities had been going on for more than a year.

AT&T, the nation's other big phone company, is so far offering television service in two markets, Houston and San Antonio.

Michael Balmoris, a company spokesman, said AT&T's position was that because it was delivering television service over telephone lines, it was not subject to local franchise regulation.

But it has already encountered local skirmishes over related issues. For example, he said that "multiple cities" in Illinois had not allowed AT&T to upgrade its network to high-speed fiber lines on the ground that doing so would effectively permit the company to offer video service without a franchise agreement.

"We can use the F.C.C. item today in litigation to show we should be able to upgrade" our lines, he said.

Still, analysts said the chief hurdle for telephone companies would be laying lines in the ground capable of delivering television, then convincing consumers to switch.

The F.C.C. decision "certainly alleviates something of a challenge that Verizon and AT&T have to go through," said Alan Bezoza, telecommunications industry analyst with Oppenheimer & Company. "But the biggest challenge will be just rolling this out."

FCC Vote A Victory For Phone Companies (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

A divided Federal Communications Commission yesterday approved a measure aimed at helping telephone companies move into cable television markets by significantly limiting what local officials can demand in return for franchises.

The new rule reflects the intensifying battle between the phone and cable industries over who will control distribution of video, voice and Internet access in an increasingly wired country. But the telephone industry's victory could prove temporary because opponents say the measure will almost certainly be challenged in court.

The FCC voted 3 to 2 along party lines to change how local officials award television franchises to eliminate what Republican supporters said were unreasonable demands and delays.

The measure requires local regulators to rule on franchise applications within 90 days for companies such as Verizon Communications and AT&T that have wires in place. It also bars local officials from requiring that companies provide TV service to everyone in a jurisdiction and prevents them from demanding fees or in-kind contributions exceeding 5 percent of the television revenues.

Verizon has been seeking local TV franchises nationwide and has won more than 200, including agreements with most of the counties and cities in the Washington area. The company has said it plans to win 3,300 franchises nationwide and has been lobbying state legislatures and Congress to speed up the approval process.

The FCC's Republican majority said that removing unreasonable hurdles erected by local governments would translate into lower cable rates. Democratic members disagreed and accused the Republicans of overstepping the FCC's authority.

FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin, a leading proponent of the new federal rule, called it crucial for breaking the virtual monopoly held by cable companies in many areas and reversing the steady increase in cable bills over the past decade. Martin said the measure, which is to take effect next year, also would make broadband Internet access more widely available because telephone companies would gain revenue to continue building fiber-optic networks.

"The record collected by the commission in this proceeding cited instances where [local officials] sat on applications for more than a year or required extraordinary in-kind contributions such as the building of public swimming pools and recreation centers," Martin said.

But the commission's Democrats warned that the FCC, by exceeding its legal mandate, would face time-consuming challenges from opponents, including cable companies and local officials angered by what they say is a preemption of their authority.

"The end result will likely be litigation, confusion of the process and a certain amount of chaos," Commissioner Jonathan S. Adelstein said. He questioned the claim that local officials have unreasonably refused applications, saying the FCC had not cited a single instance in which a franchise was being unduly delayed or held up because of demands for exorbitant fees or concessions.

"The majority simply accepts in every case that the big phone companies are right and the local governments are wrong," Adelstein said.

In the District, where phone companies do not have franchises to provide television service, officials called the FCC decision troubling.

"People in the District would be concerned if control is taken away from local municipalities. Cities could be damaged in many different ways," said J. Carl Wilson, general counsel of the D.C. Office of Cable Television and Telecommunications. He said District residents could suffer if officials no longer asked providers for public channels.

Montgomery County Council President Marilyn Praisner (D-Eastern County) said consumers would suffer from the FCC ruling. "This is an early Christmas present of a stocking full of coal," she said, predicting that the county and other jurisdictions would challenge the decision in court.

Montgomery County and Verizon clashed this year over the company's ultimately successful bid to win a franchise there.

The United States Telecom Association, a telephone industry trade group, said the measure would give consumers more choice.

"The steps outlined today will help fix the franchising process and end the unnecessary delays caused by outdated regulations," said Walter B. McCormick Jr., president of the association.

Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable and Telecommunications Association, said the FCC gave phone companies an unfair advantage over longtime cable providers. FCC officials promised to study how cable providers should be treated when their franchises come up for renewal.

Phone Giants Are Closer To TV Service (USAT)

By Paul Davidson

USA Today, December 21, 2006

To jump-start competition for subscription TV service, the Federal Communications Commission passed new rules Wednesday designed to let the big phone companies obtain local video franchises more easily.

The move is expected to let AT&T and Verizon more quickly enter hundreds of markets in the next few years, spurring new competition for the cable giants and possibly bringing lower prices.

By a 3-2 party-line vote, the Republican-controlled FCC said cities and counties may not impose unreasonable barriers that delay rollout of the video services.

AT&T and Verizon are spending billions to build fiber-optic lines that deliver bundles of voice, broadband and pay-TV services. But when they seek TV franchises, the companies say, local officials often cause delays by making outrageous demands, such as to build swimming pools and recreation centers.

"Such requirements are especially troubling, because competition is desperately needed," FCC Chairman Kevin Martin says.

Phone companies say it typically takes 15 months or more to receive a franchise.

The new rules would force localities to act on the phone companies' franchise requests within 90 days and count the value of any sweeteners the company tosses in toward a 5% fee on revenue that it's already required to pay. Local officials won't be able to force a carrier to offer video to parts of a community it can't serve for technical or other practical reasons.

To lend support to its ruling, the FCC released a study showing that cable prices jumped 93%, to $43.04 a month, from 1995 to 2005. But prices were 17% lower in markets where there was a second landline rival. Satellite services did not manage to hold down cable prices, the FCC says. AT&T says its prices in San Antonio underpriced cable by as much as 42%.

But Kyle McSlarrow, head of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, says the study doesn't account for cable's discount bundles. He also says the FCC is unfairly favoring phone companies.

"We don't believe the commission has the legal authority to establish separate regimes for incumbents and new entrants," he says.

Carolyn Coleman of the National League of Cities says the FCC is overstepping its legal authority by "circumventing negotiations" when there's no evidence to support the phone companies' claims.

Democratic FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein accused the agency of "riding roughshod over local governments."

Martin acted after Congress failed this year to pass a bill that would have created a national video franchise. Eight states, including Texas, California and New Jersey, have streamlined franchising in their communities.

Bell Companies' FCC Victory Might Be Short-Lived (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Phone companies scored a win at the Federal Communications Commission when the agency agreed to change rules to let them enter the cable-television business faster, but the victory may be short-lived, as congressional Democrats complained and opponents threatened legal action.

The FCC, in a 3-2 party-line vote, passed rules that give state and local authorities a 90-day deadline to grant video-franchising agreements to new competitors. The commission also struck down rules requiring that the Bells do more to provide service to all residents in an area than current providers.

· What's New: The FCC changed the rules to make it easier for phone companies to enter the cable television business.

· The Background: The Bells have gotten states to change laws so they can offer video, but want a U.S. standard so they don't have to lobby state-by-state.

· What It Means: Local officials are likely to challenge the FCC action in court and states may be less willing to change their laws if there's a possibility the FCC will pre-empt their efforts anyway.

The FCC action raises potentially significant issues for the Bells, which have persuaded eight states -- including California, New Jersey and Texas -- to change laws to accelerate entry to the video business. State and local officials say the FCC is trying to usurp their authority, and cable companies say the Bells are getting preferential treatment. The matter looks to be heading for court. Yesterday's decision may make it more difficult for the Bells to persuade other states to change some rules that are made somewhat moot by the FCC action.

Verizon Communications Inc. and AT&T Inc. lobbyists have argued to state legislatures that more competition will lead to lower prices and more broadband Internet services.

"We don't expect states [that] are interested in passing legislation to stop that work because of today's FCC action," said David Fish, a Verizon spokesman. Michael Balmoris, an AT&T spokesman, said the company intends to continue to press states to change franchising laws and said the FCC "expressly chose not to pre-empt existing state franchising law."

Verizon, AT&T and other phone companies argue it isn't in the public's best interest for them to have to seek approval from 30,000 local communities to offer digital television service. The Bells say community officials have demanded various incentives -- such as landscaping for parks and street lights -- before allowing them to offer local video service.

FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has argued that the FCC has authority to stop unreasonable delays by local officials in granting video franchises. Mr. Martin said changing the rules nationally to set time limits will promote video competition, increase the spread of high-speed Internet service across the U.S. and lower cable rates. He said he is "committed to seeing that consumers are able to realize the benefits of competition in the forms of better services and lower prices."

In recent weeks, organizations representing U.S. cities, mayors and governors challenged the FCC's authority to impose federal rules on what has been a state and local decision, essentially telling the FCC to back off. Along with cable operators, they argued there is scant evidence suggesting the Bells haven't had success getting approval from communities to offer competitive video service.

FCC Commissioner Jonathan Adelstein, a Democrat who voted against the change, argued the FCC was doing "legal gymnastics that would only impress an Olympic judge whose vote has been promised before the competition begins" to justify its authority.

The decision "undermines local franchising authority and enforcement, threatens local budgets, and limits the benefits of broadband video competition to a few well-to-do neighborhoods," said Larry Naake, executive director for the National Association of Counties.

"Fundamentally, as a matter of good policy, we're not too keen on any proposals that treat us and the telcos differently. We have serious questions about the FCC's ability to set legislative policy," said Kyle McSlarrow, president of the National Cable & Telecommunications Association, a lobbying group.

Questions surrounding the FCC's authority over video franchising is the main reason phone companies tried to get Congress to make similar changes earlier this year. That effort died amid partisan bickering over Internet discrimination rules.

U.S. Clears CVS To Acquire Caremark Rx (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

CVS Corporation has won antitrust approval to purchase Caremark Rx, the pharmacy benefit manager, removing potential regulatory opposition to the pending $21 billion acquisition.

CVS, which is competing against Express Scripts's $26 billion bid for Caremark, received approval from the Federal Trade Commission, Caremark, which is based in Nashville, said in a statement yesterday.

Last month, CVS agreed to buy Caremark to gain more power to negotiate prices with drug makers and to prevent the loss of foot traffic to mail-order medicines from hurting sales of razors, sodas and makeup.

Should either CVS or Caremark scuttle the deal because of a competing offer, it would pay the other a breakup fee of $675 million, CVS's chief financial officer, David B. Rickard, said in an interview last month.

Shares of CVS, which is based in Woonsocket, R.I., fell 7 cents, to $29.91, on the New York Stock Exchange.

Caremark, which fell 28 cents, to $56 yesterday, has risen 11 percent since Dec. 15, the last trading day before the Express Scripts offer. Express Scripts rose $1.52, to $73.78, and has advanced 7.5 percent since Dec. 15.

We Energies Sells Nuclear Plant to FPL (AP)

By Emily Fredrix

AP, December 21, 2006

MILWAUKEE (AP) -- Wisconsin Energy Corp. is selling its only nuclear power plant to Florida-based FPL Energy in a deal worth about $1 billion, the companies announced Wednesday.

We Energies' agreement with the subsidiary of FPL Group Inc. includes $783 million for the plant and $215 million for its nuclear fuel and other inventories.

Milwaukee-based We Energies will buy the entire output of the plant, whose two reactors generate about a quarter of the company's energy needs.

The sale means the company will no longer operate the plant in Two Rivers, Wis., north of Milwaukee, or pay to decommission it in about 20 years, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, said spokesman Barry McNulty.

As part of the deal, We Energies will give FPL Energy $560 million from a trust fund it had set aside to pay for the decommissioning, when the plant is taken offline and cleaned up, McNulty said.

The state's public service commission will consider what to do with the remainder of the trust fund, about $300 million, which customers contributed to, he said. More money could also be available depending on rulings from the Internal Revenue Service, McNulty said.

The commission will rule on the sale and could consider looking at returning some of the money to ratepayers. A message was left with the commission Wednesday seeking details.

Besides the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, other groups that have to rule on the deal include the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission.

One of the reactors at Point Beach, a 1,033-megawatt facility, is licensed to operate until 2030. The second reactor is licensed to operate until 2033.

The deal is expected to close in August 2007.

FPL Energy, based in Juno Beach, Fla., said it will keep the plant's 660 employees.

If the deal is approved, the plant will be FPL Energy's fifth, said Mike O'Sullivan, FPL Energy vice president.

Part of the company's strategy is to buy nuclear plants from utilities that only operate one because with FPL's size, it can run the plants more efficiently, he said. Nearly one year ago, FPL bought 70 percent ownership of Iowa's only nuclear power plant, the Duane Arnold Energy Center, near Palo, for about $373 million.

Wisconsin Energy announced in February its intent to look at selling the plant either outright or partially. The company received several offers of partial buyouts but decided selling the entire plant was the best option, the company's president and chief executive officer, Gale Klappa, told investors in a conference call Wednesday. Based on initial estimates, the deal means We Energies will get energy for 26 years below the cost of continuing to operate the plant, he said.

The deal means We Energies will get the same amount of energy it would have produced but for less money because it will not have to pay to operate the plant, a cost expected to rise in the future, or for its eventual decommission, McNulty said.

FPL Energy and its parent company, FPL Group, operate nuclear plants in Florida, Iowa and New England. FPL Energy is considered the largest wind energy producer in the country. It owns and operates 47 wind energy facilities, including the Montfort Wind Energy Center in Montfort, Wis.

Charlie Higley, the executive director of The Citizens Utility Board in Wisconsin, said the group opposes the sale because We Energies' 1 million customers will eventually pay more for their energy. We Energies was obligated to return any profits to customers as rebates, he said, but if the plant is sold to the out-of-state utility, Wisconsin cannot force the company to return profits to customers.

Business Journal of Milwaukee, December 20, 2006

Wisconsin Energy Corp. has agreed to sell the Point Beach Nuclear Plant in Two Rivers to a unit of Florida energy company FPL Group Inc. for nearly $1 billion.

Point Beach is a 1,033-megawatt power plant. The first unit at Point Beach went into commercial service in 1970 and is licensed to operate until 2030. The second unit was brought on line in 1973 and is licensed to operate until 2033.

FPL Group's FPL Energy Inc. subsidiary will purchase the plant, its nuclear fuel and associated inventories for approximately $998 million from Wisconsin Electric Power Co., a subsidiary of Wisconsin Energy.

FPL will enter into a long-term agreement under which FPL Energy will sell 100 percent of the output of Point Beach to We Energies. The price represents $783 million for the plant itself and $215 million for fuel, inventory and other items, Juno Beach, Fla.-based FPL Group said in a separate statement.

The transaction is expected to close in August 2007. The transaction is subject to a number of state and federal approvals, including the Public Service Commission of Wisconsin, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and review by the Department of Justice.

As part of the transaction, FPL Energy will offer employment to all current employees at the plant. In addition, FPL Energy will be responsible for the ultimate decommissioning of the facility and the cost of that decommissioning.

After closing the transaction, We Energies also will receive approximately $300 million from a trust fund that had been established to pay for the decommissioning of the plant.

The Public Service Commission of Wisconsin will determine how the net proceeds from the sale will be used to benefit customers, Wisconsin Energy said.

Upon closing, FPL Energy will assume management and operation of the plant from Nuclear Management Co., Hudson, and will work with NMC to ensure a smooth transition. NMC, a joint venture of upper Midwest utilities, has managed the plant since 2000.

Wisconsin Energy said in February 2006 that it planned to launch a formal review of its ownership and operation in the Point Beach plant.

Service Corp. Seeks Approval For Sale (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON --Funeral home operator Service Corp. International requested government approval Wednesday to sell several properties in order to comply with an agreement reached with the Federal Trade Commission last month.

Service Corp. petitioned the FTC Wednesday to approve the sale of thirteen funeral homes and cemeteries in Texas, Louisiana and Mississippi to privately-held Legacy Holdings.

The company filed a similar petition Tuesday seeking approval for the sale of two properties in California to Carriage Services Inc. The FTC is seeking public comment on the petitions for thirty days, and will then decide whether to approve the transactions.

SCI agreed with the FTC Nov. 22 to sell a total of 55 properties in order to settle antitrust concerns stemming from its purchase of Alderwoods Group. SCI's purchase of Alderwoods closed Nov. 28.

DOJ_NMG_0108253

The 40 funeral homes and 15 cemeteries that SCI was required to sell generated $57 million in revenue and $11 million in operating income annually, the company said in a November 22 statement. SCI expects to sell the properties for a total of $120 million to $130 million, the company said.

The SCI-Alderwoods combination will have 2,000 funeral home and cemetery locations after the divestitures, SCI said. Those properties are expected to generate $2.3 billion in annual revenue.

Mitchell Katz, an FTC spokesman, said the agency expects further petitions from the company as it sells off additional properties as called for in the agreement.

Shares of SCI dropped 22 cents to $10.13, while Carriage Services shares were unchanged at $5.05 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Lawsuit against Amway still stands (MCT)

By Dan Margolies

Kansas City Star/McClatchy, December 21, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. - Plaintiffs in a massive antitrust action against Amway Corp. overcame another hurdle this week in their long quest to get their case heard by a jury.

A federal judge on Monday refused to dismiss all but one of eight counts against the company, finding that the plaintiffs' allegations were legally sufficient to support claims of price fixing, conspiracy and other charges.

U.S. District Judge Richard E. Dorr agreed to dismiss only a civil racketeering claim, ruling that it failed to establish "a pattern of racketeering activity."

"We are obviously pleased with the ruling," said Kansas City lawyer Dan Boulware, who represents several Amway distributors, including Nitro Distributing Inc. of Springfield, Mo. "All of our claims survived with the exception of the racketeering claim, which was a new claim we had recently added, and the judge kept the door open for that."

Boulware said that he intended to refile the racketeering claim.

Amway, now known as Alticor Inc., said it was "pleased" that the court had rejected the plaintiffs' "misguided effort to sensationalize the case with its unfounded (racketeering) claims."

"The court decided that it would be premature to dismiss Nitro's remaining claims for alleged violations of the antitrust laws and various common law torts," the company said in a news release. "The court noted that, at this early stage of the proceeding, it was legally required to accept Nitro's unproven allegations as true.

"Alticor is confident that, as the litigation proceeds and Nitro is unable to produce evidence to support its claims, Nitro's misguided claims will be dismissed before trial."

The case, which was filed in mid-2003 in the U.S. District Court for the Western District of Missouri, has been closely watched by Amway distributors nationwide. Most recently, a federal appeals court upheld Dorr's rejection of Amway's request to send the case to arbitration.

The lawsuit contends that Amway exaggerates the profits to be made selling its products and pressures distributors into buying its motivational materials. It alleges that a handful of Amway "kingpins" - those who bought into Amway early on - control thousands of down-line distributors and make most of their money by selling them the motivational materials, known at Amway as the "tool and function" business.

The lawsuit says that distributors are misled into thinking they can attain great wealth by selling Amway products. In reality, it says, distributors can only become wealthy by participating in the motivational business. But because that business is dominated by the kingpins, very few succeed.

Among other allegations, the lawsuit says the kingpins use a variety of tactics to exercise control, including illegal tying arrangements, price fixing and blackballing disfavored distributors.

The case is scheduled to go to trial in early 2008.

NYSE Gets OK On Euronext Deal (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, December 21, 2006

NEW YORK — Shareholders in the New York Stock Exchange voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to approve a $14 billion acquisition of Euronext that will create the first trans-Atlantic market for stocks.

"This is an historic day for NYSE Group and reaffirms our leadership position in global finance markets," said NYSE CEO John Thain. The merger will "enable us to move forward with our shared vision of building the first truly global exchange group," he said.

With more than 75% of NYSE shareholders voting, the merger received overwhelming approval, winning an estimated 99.7% of ballots cast. Euronext shareholders approved the deal Tuesday.

Thain spent the first half of the year negotiating the transaction with Euronext, which had also been in merger discussions with the Deutsche Börse. The German exchange finally abandoned its overtures last month, clearing the way for the NYSE deal.

Approval of the Euronext deal comes one year after seat holders on the NYSE voted to approve a merger with Archipelago, an electronic stock exchange. That deal transformed the Big Board from a private club into a public company and also gave the NYSE a much stronger electronic trading platform to go along with its open-floor auction system.

After the approval of the Euronext deal, Thain met with reporters. He said the expansion into Europe was part of the three-pronged strategy he laid out after taking the job as head of the NYSE three years ago.

His first goal was to "de-mutualize" the exchange, and his second was to diversify the NYSE's product offerings. Both strategic goals were accomplished in the Archipelago deal.

The Euronext deal is the first step toward the "globalization" of the NYSE, the final piece of his strategy. The deal is expected to close within three months, since European regulators have already approved it.

Thain said he would look closely at further expansion opportunities in Asia, particularly in China, Japan and India. But he said there was no guarantee that he'd be able to keep rivals from expanding there first. "You have to be concerned about what competitors might do," he said.

Still, Thain's biggest rival, the Nasdaq, has stumbled so far in its own attempt to expand beyond the U.S. borders. It has made two offers to buy the London Stock Exchange in recent months but has been rebuffed both times. This week, LSE chief Clara Furse said she wouldn't even consider the Nasdaq's $5.3 billion takeover bid, calling it "wholly inadequate."

The NYSE's own shares closed at $102.19 Wednesday, down $1.17.

N.Y. Firm To Buy Harland Low-profile M&F Worldwide's $1.7 Billion All-cash Deal For Decatur Check Printing Firm Certain To Face Antitrust Scrutiny. (AJC)

By Péralte C. Paul, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 21, 2006

M&F Worldwide Corp. isn't exactly a household name.

The New York company — which said Wednesday it entered into a $1.7 billion deal to acquire John H. Harland Co., the Decatur-based check maker — owns Clarke American Corp., another big check printer. Its other holding is Mafco Worldwide Corp., a maker of licorice extract used in candies, pharmaceuticals and tobacco products.

OK, so licorice and check printing aren't what you'd call sexy businesses.

But one analyst said the all-cash transaction, which calls for M&F to give $52.75 per share to Harland stockholders, will allow Clarke American to leapfrog Deluxe Corp., the market leader in check printing.

And it fits in with the style of Ronald O. Perelman, an M&F board member and head of cosmetics giant Revlon Inc., said John Kraft, an analyst at D.A. Davidson & Co. who follows Harland.

Perelman is chairman and chief executive of MacAndrews & Forbes Holdings Inc. That company is the principal shareholder in M&F Worldwide.

"He doesn't need a glamorous industry," Kraft said of Perelman, who owns 500,000 shares of M&F, valued at more than $10.2 billion. "He's looking to milk the cash flows."

Printing checks is a business ripe for consolidation.

Check usage has declined dramatically — more than 30 percent since 1995 — as consumers increasingly migrate to other payment forms such as debit and credit cards and online bill paying, government statistics show.

Both Deluxe and Harland, the fiercest competitors in the business, have watched their revenues from their check printing operations decline as a result. Revenues were pushed further downward by the rivals' pricing wars designed to win over financial institutions as clients.

Harland recognized that long ago and sought to extend into other business lines: It bought up technology and software companies that provide services to banks, and it also has Scantron, a standardized testing business.

But Kraft said the check business still has a lot of life left, even as it declines.

"It's manageable," Kraft said. "It's not growing, but that doesn't mean you can't generate money on it."

Even so, Harland was likely to do something. Executives have long said they were looking at ways to maximize shareholder value.

In business-speak, that's usually taken to mean selling off the company or spinning out a unit into a separate, publicly traded company.

DOJ_NMG_0108255

Still, the pending acquisition, which the companies anticipate will close in the second half of next year, isn't necessarily a done deal.

Regulators will take their time in reviewing the proposal because of antitrust concerns, Kraft said.

Deluxe has about 40 percent of the check printing business, which is about $2 billion a year. Harland and Clarke American each have about 30 percent market share.

With both Harland and Clarke American under the same umbrella, M&F would control 60 percent of the market, which is almost certain to raise antitrust concerns, Kraft said.

"Antitrust is going to be the issue," Kraft said. "That's not a slam dunk with regulators."

Wall Street, however, didn't seem to have a problem.

Shares of both Harland and M&F rose dramatically. Even Deluxe got a bit of a boost.

Harland shares rose more than 13 percent Wednesday, climbing $5.84 to close at $50.31. M&F shares rose almost 12 percent, a gain of $2.19 to close at $20.49. Deluxe shares also rose, gaining nearly 3 percent, or 67 cents, to close at $24.17.

Neither executives of M&F nor Harland — both with historically conservative images — would provide additional details about the deal beyond what was said in a joint-issued news release.

"Combining the resources of Harland and Clarke American will provide significant value to customers and shareholders of both companies," said Harland's Timothy C. Tuff, chairman and chief executive.

"Financial institutions of all sizes will have a strategic partner that can provide a full suite of products and services designed to help them meet their business objectives."

Huntington, Sky To Merge Banks (WSJ)

By Ann Carrns

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Huntington Bancshares Inc., a Columbus, Ohio, bank with 380 branches in five states, said it agreed to merge with Sky Financial Group Inc. in a stock-and-cash deal valued at roughly $3.29 billion, signaling that banking-industry consolidation is occurring even in less attractive markets like the Midwest.

Because there are many banks in the region vying for customers amid a relatively slow-growing economy, competition is even more fierce than elsewhere in the country. Sky Financial, Bowling Green, Ohio, has about 330 branches in five states, overlapping with Huntington's footprint in four: Indiana, Michigan, Ohio and West Virginia. The combined banks will have more than 700 branches, 1,384 ATMs and deposits of about $38 billion, the companies said.

The deal is expected to close in the third quarter of next year, subject to the approval of both banks' shareholders and of regulators.

Huntington ranks fourth by deposits in Ohio, with a nearly 8% share of the market as of June 30, according to the most recent Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. data. The bank said the merger will boost it to No. 3 in Ohio as ranked by deposits. The deal also will give Huntington the top spot in several Ohio cities, including Columbus and Toledo; will boost its share in Cleveland; and will give it the No. 3 spot in Indianapolis, which is one of the region's "faster growing" markets, Huntington CEO Thomas Hoaglin said.

Officials at the bank weren't available to discuss the deal, a spokeswoman said.

In 4 p.m. trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market, shares of Huntington closed at $24.70, down seven cents, while shares of Sky Financial closed at $24.29, up 12 cents.

Ericsson's Purchase Of Redback Boosts Internet-Video Strategy (WSJ)

By Bobby White And Sara Silver

The Wall Street Journal, December 20, 2006

Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson's agreement to buy Redback Networks Inc. for $2.1 billion reflects how the explosion in video and other multimedia services over the Internet and a surge in broadband subscribers are driving phone and cable companies to upgrade their networks and spurring big makers of networking hardware to unite.

Ericsson, a Swedish provider of equipment and services for telecommunications infrastructure, said it will pay holders of the Silicon Valley seller of routing equipment $25 a share, or 18% more than Redback's share price before the announcement. Ericsson characterized the price as a 60% premium above the 90-day average for Redback stock.

The companies said the deal will make them more effective suppliers for the fast-moving market. It also could help Redback contend with larger competitors such as Cisco Systems Inc. and Juniper Networks Inc.

"Some companies were reluctant to use our technology because of Redback's size," said Paul Giordano, chairman of Redback's board and chief executive of Tamalpais Asset Management, a hedge fund that is an investor in the company. "Redback can compete in a much stronger way now."

Redback was forced to file for Chapter 11 bankruptcy-court protection in 2003, after an expansion during the telecom boom left the company saddled with debt. It slashed costs, cut nearly 1,000 employees and invested millions of dollars on new technology.

At one point, the stock traded for less than $1. In 4 p.m. Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading, before the deal was announced, the stock traded at $21.17, up 45 cents. In after-hours trading the shares were up $3.63, or 17%, to $24.80.

Kevin Denuccio, Redback's chief executive, said his company had been in talks with Ericsson off and on for months but discussions grew more intense in mid-November. He said Redback was interested in being acquired, hoping "to marry the size, reach and resources of Ericsson with Silicon Valley culture and expertise."

Ericsson, with a market value of $65 billion, is Europe's largest telecom-equipment maker. Its acquisition last year of most of the assets of Marconi PLC set off a wave of consolidation in the industry, which included the proposed combination of the networks divisions of Nokia Corp. and Siemens AG, as well as last month's purchase of Lucent Technologies Inc. by Alcatel SA of France to form Alcatel Lucent.

Marconi's technology, designed to help telecom carriers handle big increases in data traffic, gave Ericsson a foothold in the networks of Marconi's existing customers, which were concentrated in the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany. The Redback deal could further improve Ericsson's ability to sell to U.S. carriers rolling out Internet television services.

"There's a scramble right now between Ericsson and Cisco to become the alternative to Alcatel in Internet television," said Inder Singh, telecom analyst at Prudential Equity Group. He thinks Ericsson could still be in the market for high-speed optical devices that collect and send signals to hundreds of homes.

Redback, of San Jose, Calif., will retain its management team and will operate as a business unit of Ericsson. The deal is expected to close by early 2007.

Arcelor Mittal buys steel plants from Grupo Villacero (BLOOM)

By Alaric Nightingale, Matthew Craze

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

LONDON: Arcelor Mittal, the world's largest steel maker, said Wednesday that it had bought plants owned by Grupo Villacero for $1.4 billion to become the biggest producer of the metal in Mexico.

The purchase is the first since Mittal Steel's $38.3 billion combination with Arcelor this year.

Arcelor Mittal, based in Luxembourg, purchased the Sicartsa mill in Lázaro Cárdenas, Mexico, it said in a statement. It also acquired Border Steel, a mini-mill in Texas, as part of the deal. Arcelor Mittal and Villacero also created a joint venture to become the biggest supplier of steel products in Mexico and the U.S. Southwest.

Arcelor Mittal wants to strengthen its position as the biggest steel maker in the United States and tap growing demand for the metal in Latin America. Mexican steel demand may grow 6 percent a year in the next decade, according to Arcelor Mittal's chief financial officer, Aditya Mittal.

Michael Shillaker, an analyst at Credit Suisse in London, said, "This sends a clear signal to the market that the company will continue a growth path alongside its integration path."

Brussels Approves MAN's Scania Bid (FT)

By Richard Milne In Munich, Tobias Buck In Brussels And David,ibison In Stockholm

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

MAN, the German truckmaker, last night won unconditional approval from Europe's top competition regulator for its €10.3bn ($13.7bn) hostile bid for Swedish rival Scania, removing a significant obstacle from the four-month take-over fight.

The European Commission said there was no reason to object to the transaction on antitrust grounds. TheBrussels-based regulator added that it had "found that European bus and truck markets would remain competitive even after the proposed acquisition, because the merged entity would still face strong competition from a number of other important manufacturers such as DaimlerChrysler, Volvo, Iveco and DAF".

The focus will now move to MAN's efforts to persuade Scania's two largest shareholders - German carmaker Volkswagen and the investment vehicle of the Wallenberg family, Investor - to accept its offer before aJanuary 31 deadline.

The approval by the regulator is a relief to MAN, because the European Commission had previously blocked an attempt by Volvo to take over Scania in 2000. But MAN's bid is still poised on a knife-edge as Scania and Investor, in particular, opposes it strongly.

MAN has said it believes its SKr475 a share is a fair price but admits it has "the theoretical possibility" to increase its offer. The German group is trying to present its offer as "a merger of equals" rather than a straight takeover.

Advisers to MAN say compromises may be possible on issues such as the name of the new company, a possible secondary listing in Stockholm, and the composition of its supervisory board.

But in spite of VW and Investor recognising the industrial logic of a combination, it is not clear whether the Swedish group is prepared to cede control to MAN and a system of corporate governance with which it has big problems.

VW's position is also unclear since Bernd Pischetsrieder, its chief executive, was forced to resign from the end of this month. VW eventually wants to control a company combining all three groups' truck assets, supervisory board members say.

Separately, the uneasy truce between the main labour unions of Scania and MAN collapsed yesterday after IF Metal, the Swedish truckmaker's main union, said the proposed deal was "unrealistic" and would lead to hundreds of job losses.

Its statement will reignite fears any deal will encounter politically explosive labour market opposition in Sweden. "We would lose jobs, and they would gain jobs," the union said.

Intesa Must Sell More Branches, Antitrust Says (BLOOM)

By Steve Scherer, Tommaso Ebhardt

Bloomberg, December 21, 2006

Dec. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Banca Intesa SpA, Italy's second- biggest bank, must sell 748 bank branches and part of its insurance business to win approval from Italy's antitrust regulator for its purchase of Sanpaolo IMI SpA.

Credit Agricole SA, Intesa's biggest shareholder, ``must reduce significantly'' its stake in the new bank and may not play an ``administrative or management role,'' according to a faxed statement from the Rome-based antitrust authority. Intesa must also sell its Po Vita life insurance unit, and limit the sales of insurance products from its bank branches.

Intesa and Sanpaolo shareholders backed the 30.8 billion- euro ($41 billion) acquisition on Dec. 1. The new bank will have almost twice as many domestic customers as UniCredit SpA, Italy's biggest bank. Italian banking takeovers have reached a record $85 billion this year as lenders seek to cut costs and boost profit amid increasing competition from foreign companies.

``It doesn't change substantially the merger,'' said Fabrizio Barini, an analyst at Websim SpA in Milan. ``They won't have any problems selling the extra branches.''

Intesa and Sanpaolo welcomed the antitrust's decision in a statement distributed by the Italian exchange.

``This will allow the merger to be completed by the end of the year,'' the companies said in a joint statement.

Intesa won the support of Credit Agricole for the Sanpaolo transaction by agreeing to sell the French lender 650 branches in northern Italy. That means Intesa is going to have to shed about another hundred to satisfy the regulator.

Representatives of Generali SpA, Italy's biggest insurer, must not participate in discussions or votes that involve Eurizon SpA, which is Sanpaolo's insurance and asset management unit, the regulator said. Generali owns 7.5 percent of Intesa.

Reforestation Lags Amid Record Wildfires (USAT)

By Patrick O'Driscoll

USA Today, December 21, 2006

DENVER — As severe wildfires scorch more of the USA each year, the Forest Service is falling further behind in replacing trees lost to fire, insects and disease because of shrinking budgets and mounting costs of fighting the blazes.

The Forest Service had a backlog of 1.1 million acres that needed replanting in 2005 — a combined area slightly larger than Rhode Island — according to the agency's latest reforestation report. Last year, it could replant only 153,000 acres.

John Rosenow, president of the National Arbor Day Foundation, calls it "a double whammy — the high need (to replant) because of fires, and then the funds having to be diverted."

The Forest Service had to borrow $200 million from other programs to cover firefighting costs this year. Most of that, $159 million, came from reforestation accounts, the agency says.

Wildfires last year scorched almost 8.7 million acres, the highest total in more than a half-century — until this year's record 9.6 million acres burned.

"I'll give you one word: crisis," says forest ecologist Tom Bonnicksen, an adviser to the Forest Foundation, a California-based group. "In California areas burned by wildfires in 2001, only 3.8% were reforested. That, to me, is a crisis."

Not all land burned in these record years are in the 193 million acres of national forests. Nor do all burned forests need intensive replanting. Wildfires can char some areas but only singe others, so some tracts can reseed naturally.

But millions of acres of forestland, especially in the West, are dangerously overgrown because federal policy for decades was to put out every fire. When those forests catch fire now, they can burn so severely that replanting is the only option. If the forests aren't restored, erosion can mar the land, damage wildlife habitat and ruin the water quality of streams that contribute to the nation's water supply.

The Forest Service report says the increased acreage in need of replanting is mostly attributable to major fires in the West since 2000. It also acknowledges a steady decline in replanting since 1990.

"I'm concerned about our ability to do the appropriate level of reforestation," Forest Service Chief Dale Bosworth says. "That is a core value of the Forest Service."

A 2005 study by the Government Accountability Office warned that neglected reforestation could make wildfires worse. The report said that without new trees, burned areas will fill in with brush and weeds, which can dry out quickly and become volatile fuel for more fires.

In an attempt to close the gap, groups and businesses are donating money and seedlings. In October, Enterprise Rent-A-Car, working with the National Arbor Day Foundation, pledged 1 million trees a year for the next 50 years. Earlier this year, Ikea, the home store chain, paired with American Forests, another conservation group, to plant 300,000 trees.

Bosworth says such donations accounted for 12% of reforestation spending in 2004: "I'd like to double that over time."

Two Lawsuits Filed Against ICC (BSUN)

By Timothy B. Wheeler, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, December 21, 2006

Actions are effort to block building of the highway in Maryland suburbs

GAITHERSBURG -- In a challenge to both the outgoing Ehrlich administration and the incoming O'Malley regime, opponents of the proposed Inter-County Connector filed a pair of lawsuits Wednesday seeking to block construction of the east-west toll highway through Washington's Maryland suburbs.

In suits filed in federal courts in the District of Columbia and in Greenbelt, four environmental groups and two Montgomery County residents who live near the proposed highway contend that federal transportation and environmental agencies abrogated their duties in approving the state's plans for the 18-mile, six-lane highway.

Speaking at a news conference at a suburban home that would lose part of its leafy backyard to the highway, the opponents alleged that state and federal officials glossed over the environmental damage the project would do. They also contend that officials failed to consider other ways of easing Washington area traffic congestion that would be less costly and less harmful to human health and natural resources.

"We ask that the federal government go back and take an honest look," said Erik Bluemel, staff attorney for the Institute of Public Representation at Georgetown University Law Center, one of the lawyers representing highway opponents.

The suits name as defendants federal transportation and environmental agencies, along with regional planning entities that approved the state's ICC plans.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. had made the long-planned highway's construction one of his priorities. He revived the project, which his Democratic predecessor, Parris N. Glendening, had rejected on environmental grounds. Ehrlich also sought to "fast-track" approval by federal agencies of a new, more favorable environmental study of the ICC.

Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan defended Wednesday the state's efforts to minimize and mitigate the highway's environmental impact. He dismissed ICC opponents as "a tiny minority of people who are unhappy with the democratic process."

"It's not only the governor, but a very strong majority of legislators, state legislators from across the state, [who] support this project," Flanagan said. "They understand that it's going to be very good for the state of Maryland."

Flanagan said bids are being sought for construction of the first leg of the connector, 7.2 miles from Interstate 370 in Gaithersburg to Georgia Avenue near Silver Spring.

The entire project is expected to cost about $2.4 billion, he said, with about $280 million of that devoted to replacing parkland that would be taken for the highway and restoring woods ands wetlands that would be bulldozed.

A spokesman for Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley said the governor-elect stood by his campaign statements in support of the project -- a rare point of agreement between him and the Republican incumbent he ousted. "We will defend the lawsuits, and the ICC will progress, will be built," said Rick Abbruzzese, O'Malley's spokesman.

But opponents said they hope O'Malley will rethink his position once in office.

"When the highway is running right by the swing set, what do you tell your children?" asked Connie McKenna, president of the Shady Grove Woods Homeowners Association, who lives several doors from where Wednesday's news conference was held. Her son, Artie Sadtler, 12, has asthma, she said, and she worries that air pollution from the 125,000 vehicles a day expected to use the highway would aggravate his breathing difficulties.

"The worst part of this," McKenna added, "is it's not going to solve the terrible traffic we've been living with."

Though transportation officials say the highway would reduce commute times and ease gridlock along some routes, opponents say traffic would increase, worsening congestion elsewhere.

In addition to displacing 11 businesses and 52 homes, the proposed highway would clear 746 acres of woodlands, fill in 47 acres of wetlands and disrupt about seven miles of streams, said John Parrish, vice president of the Maryland Native Plant Society.

The state plans to create almost twice as many acres of wetlands as the highway would destroy, according to a fact sheet from the state Department of Transportation. Similarly, every acre of parkland lost would be replaced by 8 acres elsewhere.

But the highway also would spawn additional development in the area, Parrish pointed out. He said that growth would level another 2,213 acres of woods, fill in 160 acres more of wetlands and disturb an additional 15 miles of stream bed.

Federal Agency Sued Over Environmental Study (WP)

By Katherine Shaver

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Four environmental groups and a Montgomery County couple filed lawsuits yesterday arguing that federal transportation officials approved the intercounty connector project before adequately studying the highway's effects on wildlife and public health.

The two federal lawsuits -- one filed in the District and the other in Maryland -- also allege that the federal environmental review did not meet legal requirements to consider other east-west transportation options. Building mass transit and improving local roads, among other measures, would cost less, do less environmental damage and combat traffic better than an 18-mile road cutting across Montgomery and Prince George's counties, the complaints say.

"The ICC has been steamrolled through the approval process without a thorough evaluation of smarter, more effective and, frankly, healthier alternatives," said one of the plaintiffs, John M. Balbus, director of the health program for Environmental Defense.

Balbus and other highway opponents spoke at a news conference in the back yard of a home on Briardale Road in the Derwood area of Rockville, where the six-lane highway would cut through a swath of woods between two neighborhoods. The road's right of way would take part of the yard and run within a few feet of the family's swing set and basketball hoop.

Doug Hecox, a spokesman for the Federal Highway Administration, said he had not seen the lawsuits. However, he said, the agency does not typically comment on pending litigation.

Maryland highway officials were not named in the lawsuits, but state Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan said he had expected them. Still, he said, he was confident the state's study -- and federal officials' approval of it -- would withstand legal scrutiny.

"Every highway project that's ever been built in modern times has had to face a lawsuit," Flanagan said, adding that he had not seen the complaints. "This highway meets and, in fact, probably exceeds all federal and state environmental laws and regulations."

The plaintiffs said they hope for decisions in the cases by late summer. Their attorneys said they are not seeking an immediate injunction because state highway officials said no work that could cause environmental damage, such as tree cutting or filling in wetlands, would occur while the suits are pending. The suits probably will be settled or decided by a federal judge before any trial, lawyers said.

Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) made building the highway his administration's top transportation priority, saying it would reduce congestion on dangerously crowded east-west local roads while speeding travel between the Interstate-270 corridor in Montgomery and the Interstate-95 corridor in Prince George's. Maryland officials have begun buying property in the path of the toll highway, estimated to cost $2.4 billion. The first major contract -- to design and build the westernmost section between I-270 and Georgia Avenue -- is scheduled to be awarded in March, Flanagan said.

But in U.S. District Court in Maryland, opponents will argue that federal officials didn't consider "reasonable alternatives" to a highway and didn't fully weigh such environmental effects as increased noise on parkland. The complaint listing those allegations was filed by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society, and Roger Metcalf and Eve Burton, a Derwood couple who would lose their Cashell Estates home to the highway.

The other suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Washington by Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club, argues that the federal review did not properly analyze the road's effect on local pollution levels and the health of nearby residents and schoolchildren.

"It's terrifying for us having seen our kids in the hospital with asthma to know this road might be coming," said Connie McKenna, a highway opponent who lives near the proposed route.

Suits Seek To Block ICC Construction (WT/AP)

By Sarah Karush, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Environmental groups filed two court challenges yesterday aimed at blocking construction of Maryland's Intercounty Connector, a highway that officials say will ease commutes and take vehicles off local streets.

The 18-mile, six-lane highway connecting Interstate 270 in Montgomery County with Interstate 95 in Prince George's County has long been championed by regional business groups, but faced stiff opposition from environmentalists as well as concerns over its cost. It finally won federal approval in May.

In one lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in the District, Environmental Defense and the Sierra Club say the air quality analysis conducted by federal and regional officials was inadequate because it gauged the potential pollution from the ICC by using monitors that were more than 1½ miles from major highways.

The second lawsuit -- filed in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt, by the Audubon Naturalist Society, the Maryland Native Plant Society and a family whose property is on the proposed route for the ICC -- says federal officials failed to consider reasonable alternatives to the road and the full environmental impact of the project.

The ICC "would bring 125,000 vehicles per day into quiet residential neighborhoods and scenic parks and in close proximity to five schools where children ... will be exposed to dangerous levels of toxic and particulate matter air pollution," the groups said in the suit filed in the District.

Maryland Transportation Secretary Robert L. Flanagan said the environmental impact studies "exceed the requirements of state and federal regulations."

"Now and until the ICC is built there will be congestion on neighborhood roads in Montgomery County that is more harmful than any emissions emanating from the ICC in the future," Mr. Flanagan said. He noted that studies indicate that moving traffic onto the ICC would reduce the number of serious accidents by 340 a year.

AAA Mid-Atlantic was quick to condemn the lawsuit, as was the Greater Washington Board of Trade.

"The environmental work was very carefully put together in anticipation of these lawsuits," said Bob Grow, director of government relations at the board. "I'd be surprised if they have any traction whatsoever."

Build It (WP)

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

MOST OFFICIALS in Maryland understand that the planned intercounty connector, possibly history's must studied road, has been examined and assessed ad nauseam -- and approved. Still, the Montgomery County Planning Board has blocked the state's purchase of a few small parcels for the 18-mile ICC, thus prolonging the roadway's 40-year-plus odyssey just a little bit more.

Depending on who's doing the explaining, the board has held up sale of 87 acres along the planned route because:

? The precise location of a planned maintenance facility is in dispute.

? Further protection for environmentally sensitive watersheds is required from the state.

? The planning board wants Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D) and the newly elected County Council to affirm that the connector will really be built.

Maybe the board members are also awaiting a bolt of lightning or some other heavenly sign before they give the go-ahead for the road, which would connect two vital corridors in the Maryland suburbs, Interstate 270 in Montgomery County and I-95 in Prince George's County. While they wait, they might consider that the connector has been on the drawing board since the 1950s; that it has been the subject of exhaustive efforts to mitigate possible environmental impacts; that the state and federal governments have given it the green light; that financing is in place; and that the 87 acres in dispute have been purchased, preserved and set aside for the roadway over the course of three decades. As for Mr. O'Malley, he has backed the ICC repeatedly.

Environmentalists filed lawsuits yesterday; that is their right. In the meantime, the planning board should stop its posturing, sell the parcels and get out of the way.

Big Profits, And Questions, In Effort To Cut Emissions (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

New York Times, December 21, 2006

QUZHOU, China — Foreign businesses have embraced an obscure United Nations-backed program as a favored approach to limiting global warming. But the early efforts have revealed some hidden problems.

Under the program, businesses in wealthier nations of Europe and in Japan help pay to reduce pollution in poorer ones as a way of staying within government limits for emitting climate-changing gases like carbon dioxide, as part of the Kyoto Protocol.

Among their targets is a large rusting chemical factory here in southeastern China. Its emissions of just one waste gas contribute as much to global warming each year as the emissions from a million American cars, each driven 12,000 miles.

Cleaning up this factory will require an incinerator that costs $5 million — far less than the cost of cleaning up so many cars, or other sources of pollution in Europe and Japan.

Yet the foreign companies will pay roughly $500 million for the incinerator — 100 times what it cost. The high price is set in a European-based market in carbon dioxide emissions. Because the waste gas has a far more powerful effect on global warming than carbon dioxide emissions, the foreign businesses must pay a premium far beyond the cost of the actual cleanup.

The huge profits from that will be divided by the chemical factory's owners, a Chinese government energy fund, and the consultants and bankers who put together the deal from a mansion in the wealthy Mayfair district of London.

Arrangements like this still make sense to the foreign companies financing them because they are a lot less expensive, despite the large profit for others, than cleaning up their own operations.

Such efforts are being watched in the United States as an alternative more politically attractive than imposing taxes on fossil fuels like coal and oil that emit global-warming gases when burned.

But critics of the fast-growing program, through which European and Japanese companies are paying roughly $3 billion for credits this year, complain that it mostly enriches a few bankers, consultants and factory owners.

With so much money flowing to a few particularly lucrative cleanup deals, the danger is that they will distract attention from the broader effort to curb global warming gases, and that the lure of quick profit will encourage short-term fixes at the expense of fundamental, long-run solutions, including developing renewable energy sources like solar power.

As word of deals like this has spread, everyone involved in the nascent business is searching for other such potential jackpots in developing countries.

As for more modest deals, like small wind farms, "if you don't have a humongous margin, it's not worth it," said Pedro Moura Costa, chief operating officer of EcoSecurities, an emissions-trading company in Oxford, England.

The financing of the chemical factory's incinerator here and other deals like it are now drawing unfavorable attention. Canada's environment minister, Rona Ambrose, announced in October that her government would withdraw from the trading program.

"There is a lot of evidence now about the lack of accountability around these kinds of projects," she said.

Another concern is that the program can have unintended results. The waste gas to be incinerated here is emitted during the production of a refrigerant that will soon be banned in the United States and other industrial nations because it depletes the ozone layer that protects the earth from ultraviolet rays.

Handsome payments to clean up the waste gas have helped chemical companies to expand existing factories that make the old refrigerant and even build new factories, said Michael Wara, a carbon-trading lawyer at Holland & Knight in San Francisco.

Moreover, air-conditioners using this Freon-like refrigerant are much less efficient users of electricity than newer models. The expansion of large middle classes in India and China has led to soaring sales of cheap, inefficient air-conditioners, along with the building of coal-fired plants to power them, further contributing to global warming and the depletion of the ozone layer.

The program is at the forefront of efforts to address the most intractable problem in climate change: how to limit soaring emissions from the largest developing countries. Sometime in 2009, China's total emissions of carbon dioxide, the most important global warming gas, are expected to surpass those from the United States, according to the International Energy Agency.

While the challenge of addressing global warming is daunting, so are the consequences of inaction. Scientists warn that rising concentrations of carbon dioxide and other global warming gases could result in more severe storms, wide crop failures, the spread of tropical diseases and rising sea levels endangering some coastal cities.

Programs like the one the United Nations supports are increasingly common in Europe. In general, they allow companies to buy rights on the market to exceed their limits on global warming gases from other companies prepared to reduce emissions elsewhere at a lower cost. Many economists consider emissions-trading systems, which are driving participants to the cheapest cleanups with the biggest impact, as the most efficient way to address pollution.

But a study commissioned by the world organization has found that the profits are enormous in destroying trifluoromethane, or HFC-23, a very potent greenhouse gas that is produced at the factory here and several dozen other plants in developing countries. The study calculated that industrial nations could pay $800 million a year to buy credits, even though the cost of building and operating incinerators will be only $31 million a year.

The situation has set in motion a diplomatic struggle pitting China, the biggest beneficiary from payments, against advanced industrial nations, particularly in Europe. At a global climate conference in Nairobi, Kenya, in November, European delegates suggested that in the case of Freon factories now under construction in developing countries, any payments for the incineration of the waste gas should go only into an international fund to help factories retool for the production of more modern refrigerants that do not deplete the ozone layer.

But the Chinese government blocked the initiative, insisting that money for Chinese factories go into the government's own clean energy fund. Negotiators ended up setting up a group to study the issue.

Even as hundreds of millions of dollars from the program are devoted to the refrigerant industry, countries in sub-Saharan Africa, which were originally envisioned as big beneficiaries of emissions trading, are receiving almost nothing. Just four nations — China, India, Brazil and South Korea — are collecting four-fifths of the payments under the program, with China alone collecting almost half.

Two-thirds of the payments are going to projects to eliminate HFC-23.

Those payments also illustrate conflicting goals under Kyoto and the Montreal Protocol, a 1987 agreement that requires the phasing out of ozone-depleting substances. The problem is that the trading program backed by the United Nations, known as the Clean Development Mechanism, is helping support an industry that another international organization is trying to phase out.

And while ozone depletion is a separate problem from global warming, some gases, like HFC-23, make both worse. The separate secretariats under the protocols have little legal authority to resolve this quandary.

"It's tricky in that we don't have a mechanism other than the Security Council, and who cares there about HFC's?" said Janos Pasztor, the acting coordinator of the organization that oversees the program.

In the end, officials say, there should be more projects aimed at providing renewable energy and sustainable economic development for the world's poorest people.

"If people only do HFC-23 projects, then they miss the whole idea," Mr. Pasztor said.

Richard Rosenzweig, chief operating officer of Natsource, a company in Washington arranging emissions deals between poor and rich countries, said it was not fair to look only at incineration costs and compare them with the size of payments from industrial nations. The administrative costs of the program are high, he said, and at least disposal of the waste gas is taking place.

If the world tried to reduce emissions through an outright ban or regulation alone, as many environmentalists recommend, it might not happen at all, he said. The United Nations-favored program may have flaws, he added, but "it's a pilot phase — this is a 100-year problem."

Environmental groups say that governments in developing countries should either require factories to incinerate the waste gas as a cost of doing business, or receive aid from wealthier countries to cover the relatively modest cost of incinerators.

"Couldn't we pay for the cost, or even twice the cost, of abatement and spend the rest of the money in better ways?" Mr. Wara asked.

DuPont produces HFC-23 as part of its output of Teflon, but has routinely burned the colorless, odorless waste gas without compensation for many years, even though it is not required by law to do so, a DuPont spokeswoman said.

The secretariat of the Clean Development Mechanism estimates that a ton of HFC-23 in the atmosphere has the same effect as 11,700 tons of carbon dioxide. James Cameron, the vice chairman of Climate Change Capital, which organized the chemical factory deal here, said there were considerable costs and risks in setting up plans that required elaborate certification by consultants, acceptance by developing-country governments and approval by a United Nations secretariat.

For small projects involving less than $250,000 worth of credits, fees for deal makers, consultants and lawyers can far exceed the cost of installing equipment to clean up emissions.

Even the Chinese government, the main seller of carbon credits and a defender of the program, is expressing some misgivings.

"We do not encourage more HFC projects," a statement by Lu Xuedu, deputy director of the Office of Global Environment Affairs at the Ministry of Science and Technology, said. "We would prefer to have more energy efficiency and renewable-energy projects that could help alleviate poverty in the countryside."

But for now, the projects involving industrial gases like HFC-23 are where most of the action is.

DOJ_NMG_0108263

"You can do those quickly," Mr. Rosenzweig of Natsource said, "and it's worth the investment."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexican Indicted On Drug Kingpin Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

A Mexican described by U.S. authorities as "one of the world's major drug traffickers" has been indicted by a federal grand jury in California on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges that carry the death penalty.

U.S. Attorney Carol C. Lam in San Diego said the indictment, unsealed yesterday, accuses Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix of six counts of operating a continuing criminal enterprise, which dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade and flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin.

The indictment accuses Arellano-Felix of maintaining control of his drug trafficking empire by personally ordering kidnappings and up to 20 slayings, including beheadings, of rivals in the drug trade, law-enforcement officers and members of the press.

Arellano-Felix, who also oversaw the construction of sophisticated tunnels to smuggle drugs under the U.S.-Mexico border, was arrested in August by U.S. authorities while deep-sea fishing and is now in custody in San Diego. The U.S. Coast Guard apprehended him aboard a boat known as the "Dock Holiday," 15 miles off the shore of La Paz, Mexico.

An earlier indictment that sought his extradition in 2003 did not include the charges that could lead to his execution and is expected to be dismissed as moot. Mexico has balked at extraditing those facing a possible death sentence in this country.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) spokesman Rusty Payne said a decision whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty has described Arellano-Felix, 37, as "one of the world's major drug traffickers," citing his role as a leader of a brutal international drug gang that includes seven brothers and four sisters.

Mr. McNulty said the Arellano-Felix organization negotiated directly with Colombian cocaine-trafficking organizations, including the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia for the purchase of multiton shipments of cocaine, received those shipments by sea and air in Mexico, and then arranged for smuggling the cocaine into the U.S.

Also indicted was Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, described as a hired assassin for the Arellano-Felix organization. He also was taken into custody on the fishing boat and is held in San Diego.

The indictment describes Arellano-Felix as the gang's principal organizer and top leader since March 2000, and Villarreal as one of its top six under-bosses, in command of crews that carried out enforcement operations and drug trafficking activities.

It names Arellano-Felix and Villarreal in connection with the 2005 killing of Deputy Police Chief Hugo Gabrial Coronel Vargas in Tijuana, Mexico, and the kidnapping, slaying and beheading of three Rosarito Beach police officers in June 2006.

Arellano-Felix also was charged in Mexico in 1993 with conspiring to assassinate Roman Catholic Cardinal Juan Posadas Ocampo. Cardinal Posadas Ocampo, along with six other persons, was assassinated on May 24, 1993, in the parking lot at Guadalajara International Airport. He was shot 14 times.

In January, federal agents located a 2,400-foot-long tunnel built by the Tijuana-based Arellano-Felix organization, filled with 2 tons of marijuana and connecting warehouses in Tijuana to San Diego.

Suspected Drug Kingpin Pleads Not Guilty To New Charges In U.S. (AP)

By Allison Hoffman

AP, December 21, 2006

SAN DIEGO - A man suspected of overseeing one of Mexico's most violent drug cartels and his top associate pleaded not guilty Wednesday to new charges detailing a criminal enterprise that included a hit on Tijuana's deputy police chief and the beheadings of three officers.

The new charges could make Francisco Javier Arellano Felix, 37, and his right-hand man Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, eligible for the death penalty if they are found guilty of crimes outlined in a seven-count indictment unsealed this week.

The two men, both looking pale and drawn, shuffled into the federal courtroom with hands shackled to their waists and ankles chained together. It was far different from the designer cruisewear and flip-flops the pair wore when they made their first court appearance in August, just days after their arrest aboard a sport fishing boat off La Paz, Mexico.

Not guilty pleas were entered on their behalf by their attorneys.

U.S. District Court Judge Jan M. Adler rejected requests by the defense to remove the shackles and ordered both men held without bail. A Jan. 2 hearing was scheduled.

The indictment charges the men with running a criminal enterprise, racketeering and conspiracy to commit racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering. According to the filing, the pair directed the smuggling of cocaine and marijuana shipments from Mexico into the U.S. and oversaw "enforcement operations" - threats and murders designed to reinforce the power of the cartel.

The indictment lists the 2005 murder of Tijuana's deputy police chief, a January shootout between the cartel and officers in Tijuana and the June beheadings of three officers in the Mexican resort town of Rosarito Beach as evidence of the criminal enterprise that authorities say extended into the United States.

Both men face charges for those crimes and broader racketeering charges in Mexican courts, according to the Mexican federal attorney general's office. Officials at Mexico's Foreign Relations Department and attorney general's office said Wednesday they had no immediate response to the new allegations or to the possibility of death sentences, which are illegal under Mexican law.

Villarreal's attorney Kerry Steigerwalt questioned whether his client, who holds dual citizenship and has been seeking extradition to Mexico, would be able to get a fair trial in the U.S.

"It is difficult for us to conduct a defense when we can't subpoena people in Mexico," Steigerwalt said outside court.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Laura Duffy said the Mexican government had agreed to allow the U.S. to complete its prosecution of the pair before pursuing extradition requests. She said the criminal enterprise operated on both sides of the border and merited prosecution in U.S. courts.

"The U.S. has a big interest in this," said John Kirby, a former federal prosecutor who has worked on cartel cases. "A lot of drugs were brought over, and a lot of people were killed in the United States."

Arellano Felix and Villarreal have been held in a San Diego jail since the August raid aboard the yacht. The capture was the culmination of a manhunt triggered by a 2003 indictment charging Arellano Felix and 10 others of running the cartel, which authorities say smuggled tons of Colombian cocaine and Mexican marijuana into the United States.

The indictment also linked Arellano Felix to a 1996 killing in Coronado, near San Diego, and a 1992 shootout at a disco in Puerto Vallarta, Mexico.

Arellano Felix pleaded not guilty to those charges, which would have carried up to 40 years in prison. That case will likely be stayed as prosecution proceeds on the new indictment.

Villarreal was not named in the 2003 indictment and had previously been held as a material witness after the boat raid.

Web Site Puts Undercover Officers At Risk (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, December 21, 2006

What we see often looks easy - slip on the handcuffs for the trip to jail.

But getting the evidence to make an arrest often is a long road paved with trouble at every turn.

One Web site is putting undercover officers and their contacts in the public eye.

“The whole point of putting someone in an undercover capacity is to get them close to the criminal element without them knowing that they are dealing with a police officer,” said Lt. John Martin, Harris County Sheriff’s Dept.

And it works.

So well that some folks want to make being undercover a little more difficult.

It is a Web site called ‘Who’s a Rat’.

Its operators say it was put together to provide defense attorneys with a resource that they may not have access to: searching court records for accusers’ histories or hiring investigators to check out informants takes time and money.

The site is a collection of profiles of alleged confidential informants, submitted by the public.

Search 'Houston' and you’ll find profiles of more than 250 people who are said to be helping police - some with pictures, others with court documents - to back up the claims.

Some defense attorneys call it a potentially important resource.

“The more information you have about an individual, especially if that individual is getting paid or is a criminal themselves. That information should come to light to the defense attorney so that the individual can get a fair trial,” said Randall Kallinen, ACLU criminal defense attorney.

But that is not all that is there. Another section of profiles is a much bigger concern.

“Once that criminal element realizes that they are dealing with a peace officer, then his very life is endanger at that point,” Lt. Martin said.

The site calls them “agents.”

DOJ_NMG_0108265

Search for the term 'Houston', and more than 200 profiles pop up with names and sometimes pictures of officers said to be working at agencies all over the area: state and local police, sheriff's deputies, and even the FBI and DEA.

Still civil libertarians defend the site's right to exist.

"In the world of crime and crime prevention there are some risks," Kallinen said, "However, it has not been shown that this site has led to the injuries of any law enforcement officer."

The site may not have caused damage yet, but law enforcement officials said you don't have to look far to see the potential risk.

Look at the Harris County Law Enforcement Memorial. One of the names is Deputy Rodney Scott Morgan.

"He was working in an undercover capacity, I believe he was a narcotics detective at the time," Lt. John Martin, Harris County Sheriff's Office.

Morgan was in a bar and was recognized by the bartender from his days on patrol.

He tried to play that off, but when he went to the restroom, "We had two very large individuals not letting anyone in while someone else inside was cutting his throat. His partner ended up noticing he had been gone for a very long time and went and intervened and took some of the suspects into custody, but he ended up getting killed from that incident," said Lt. Martin.

The site has gotten the attention of the Judicial Conference and that group sent an official memo last month to all federal judges, alerting them and asking that certain documents be sealed to protect the identities of informants and agents.

Some think that's dangerous.

"An individual needs to have a fair trial. The most common cause of wrongful capital convictions is due to confidential informants. These informants generally are criminals themselves," said Kallinen.

Informants are difficult to track but local law enforcement says no local officer listed on the site right now appears to be working undercover.

Yet with new posts coming each day it is extremely dangerous and of concern when someone takes the cover out of undercover.

KCK Man Sentenced To 121 Months In Connection To Marijuana Bust (KESQ)

KESQ-TV, December 21, 2006

A local medical marijuana dispensary may be in even more trouble now. CannaHelp in Palm Desert continues to do business, even after the city revoked their business license.

"They may well be in violation."

Palm Desert City Attorney David Irwin won't discuss what possible action may be taken against CannaHelp, after the medicinal marijuana dispensary defied the city's cease and desist order to operate.

CannaHelp allegedly sold marijuana to an undercover cop who didn't have necessary credentials. Irwin says that's a city violation.

"They would service people who had certain identification and they didn't do that."

We visited CannaHelp to talk to owner, Stacy Hochanadel, to get his side of the story. He wasn't available for comment.

Feds and local police recently raided CannaHelp, suspecting it sold marijuana for profit. We spoke with Hochanadel after the raid. He said he was, indeed, drawing a salary from CannaHelp sales.

"If you look at the Compassionate Use Act, it specifically says, you shall not sell marijuana for a profit. So I think your interview was very interesting," said Erwin.

Caregivers in Palm Springs shut down after it was raided last month. Marijuana patients say they're the ones really affected.

"People voted a law in and it's kind of a bummer."

With Caregivers now out of business and CannaHelp in hot water, Capps is the only dispensary in the Valley that has not been in trouble. We tried to talk to them about the subject, but they refused.

Meanwhile, Palm Desert's city attorney and his staff are busy figuring out their next move.

"Several alternatives. I don't know which one we will take and I'm not even free to share the alternatives with you."

CannaHelp Still Open In Defiance Of City Order (DS)

Desert Sun, December 20, 2006

A medical marijuana dispensary in Palm Desert remained open for business today, in defiance of a cease-and-desist letter it received from the city Tuesday.

It was business as usual at CannaHelp at 73-350 El Paseo, with a mix of employees and volunteers keeping the doors open, said owner Stacy Hochanadel.

"Our patients are calling and asking us what they can do to let people know they need their medicine from a reliable safe source," Hochanadel said. "They all want to show up to the next City Council meeting."

Hochanadel justified his decision to keep the dispensary open because, he said, the City Council should have held a public hearing before voting to revoke his business license last Thursday.

The vote was taken in a closed session, based on a report stating that Hochanadel sold medical marijuana to an undercover police agent who did not have appropriate paperwork.

Hochanadel has had a business license from the city since he opened the dispensary in October 2005. He signed a letter with the city earlier this year, agreeing to sell medical marijuana only to patients with a state-issued medical marijuana ID card.

City Attorney David Erwin said Tuesday he had yet to determine what action he would recommend the city take if Hochanadel continues to keep the dispensary open despite the letter.

Secrets To Be Declassified Under New Rule At Age 25 (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — It will be a Cinderella moment for the band of researchers who study the hidden history of American government.

At midnight on Dec. 31, hundreds of millions of pages of secret documents will be instantly declassified, including many F.B.I. cold war files on investigations of people suspected of being Communist sympathizers. After years of extensions sought by federal agencies behaving like college students facing a term paper, the end of 2006 means the government's first automatic declassification of records.

Secret documents 25 years old or older will lose their classified status without so much as the stroke of a pen, unless agencies have sought exemptions on the ground that the material remains secret.

Historians say the deadline, created in the Clinton administration but enforced, to the surprise of some scholars, by the secrecy-prone Bush administration, has had huge effects on public access, despite the large numbers of intelligence documents that have been exempted.

And every year from now on, millions of additional documents will be automatically declassified as they reach the 25-year limit, reversing the traditional practice of releasing just what scholars request.

Many historians had expected President Bush to scrap the deadline. His administration has overseen the reclassification of many historical files and restricted access to presidential papers of past administrations, as well as contemporary records.

Practical considerations, including a growing backlog of records at the National Archives, mean that it could take months before the declassified papers are ready for researchers.

"Deadlines clarify the mind," said Thomas S. Blanton, director of the private National Security Archive at George Washington University, which obtains and publishes historical government documents.

Despite what he called a disappointing volume of exemptions, Mr. Blanton said automatic declassification had "given advocates of freedom of information a real lever."

Gearing up to review aging records to meet the deadline, agencies have declassified more than one billion pages, shedding light on the Cuban missile crisis, the Vietnam War and the network of Soviet agents in the American government.

Several hundred million pages will be declassified at midnight on Dec. 31, including 270 million pages at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has lagged most agencies. J. William Leonard, who oversees declassification as head of the Information Security Oversight Office at the National Archives, said the threat that files might be made public without a security review had sent a useful chill through the bureaucracy.

"Unfortunately, you sometimes need a two-by-four to get agencies to pay attention," Mr. Leonard said. "Automatic declassification was essentially that two-by-four."

What surprises await in the documents is impossible to predict.

"It is going to take a generation for scholars to go through the material declassified under this process," said Steven Aftergood, who runs a project on government secrecy for the Federation of American Scientists.

"It represents the classified history of a momentous period, the cold war," Mr. Aftergood said. "Almost every current headline has an echo in the declassified past, whether it's coping with nuclear weapons, understanding the Middle East or dictatorship and democracy in Latin America."

Anna K. Nelson, a historian at American University, said she hoped that the files would shed light on the Central Intelligence Agency role in Iran and deepen the documentation of the Jimmy Carter years, in particular the Camp David accords.

"Americans need to know this history, and the history is in those documents," Ms. Nelson said.

DOJ_NMG_0108267

She said the National Archives staff was buried in a 400-million-page backlog that awaits processing and is not publicly available.

Also, a budget shortfall has cut back on evening and weekend access to the major research center of the archives, in College Park, Md.

"They can declassify the records, but the archives don't have the staff to handle them," Ms. Nelson said.

The first deadline was imposed in an executive order that President Bill Clinton signed in 1995, when officials realized that taxpayers were paying billions of dollars to protect a mountain of cold war documents.

The order gave agencies five years to declassify documents or show the need for continued secrecy.

When agencies protested that they could not meet the 2000 deadline, it was extended to 2003. Mr. Bush then granted another three-year extension, but put out the word that it was the last one, despite the new emphasis on security after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and a new war in Iraq.

"The Bush administration could have said, 'This is a Clinton thing,' and abandoned it," Mr. Aftergood, said. "To their credit, they did not."

As an enforceable deadline loomed, the intelligence agencies that produce most secret material add workers to plow through files from World War II.

The C.I.A. has reviewed more than 100 million pages, released 30 million pages and created a database of documents, Crest, that is accessible from terminals at the National Archives. Although most of the files are exempt, they can be requested under the Freedom of Information Act.

The National Security Agency, the eavesdropping and code-breaking agency, has released 35 million pages, including an extensive collection on the Gulf of Tonkin incident that led to the escalation of the Vietnam War. The agency plans a major release early next year on the Israeli attack on the Liberty, an American eavesdropping ship, in 1967.

The F.B.I., by contrast, negotiated an exemption from the 1995 executive order and concluded last year that the 2003 executive order ended its special status. It has rushed to review material, seeking exemption for 50 million pages on intelligence, counterintelligence and terrorism, but leaving 270 million pages to be automatically declassified now.

Among those files, said David M. Hardy, the bureau declassification chief, are those on investigations of Americans with suspected ties to the Communist Party. Reviewers will keep working on the exempt material to see what can be released, but it is a slow process, Mr. Hardy said.

"The numbers of documents are staggering," Mr. Hardy said.

The bureau is studying digitizing documents and using computers to search for classified material. Some experts say mass declassification is not the smartest approach. L. Britt Snider, a former intelligence official who heads the Public Interest Declassification Board, which advises the White House, said most government records, even top-secret ones, were pretty boring.

"Rather than take this blunderbuss approach," Mr. Snider said, "I'd like to see the agencies concentrate first on what's interesting and what's important."

Federal Inquiry Focuses On 2 Bruno Firms (NYT)

By Mike McIntire

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Federal investigators have issued subpoenas to at least two firms linked to the State Senate majority leader, Joseph L. Bruno, as part of their investigation into his business dealings, one of Mr. Bruno's former business partners and a legislative aide said yesterday.

One of the companies was a partnership involving Mr. Bruno and an influential Albany lobbyist that bought and sold lakeside property in Rensselaer County, including a parcel that was purchased by the wife of Jared E. Abbruzzese. Mr. Abbruzzese is an investor in a group seeking control of the state's thoroughbred racing franchise — a decision in which Mr. Bruno will play a key role.

The other company is a consulting firm that Mr. Bruno operated out of his home that he said had "a client relationship with lawyers and businesspeople." The senator has not identified the clients, but said his work involved providing advice on marketing and business development.

It was unclear whether any of Mr. Bruno's other business dealings have been drawn into the investigation, which Mr. Bruno has said is examining his "relationships and business interests" over the last six years. The two companies that received subpoenas are just a small part of Mr. Bruno's broad array of personal financial interests, several of which have intersected with his activities as the most powerful Republican in the State Legislature.

Mr. Bruno has purchased stock in about a half-dozen companies whose principals obtained state aid or contracts, sometimes with his help, according to a review of his financial-disclosure reports and other public records. He also once co-owned a small apartment building with an Albany-area businessman, who said that Mr. Bruno asked him to step in and replace the senator's son as an investment partner.

Mr. Bruno, who said he learned of the investigation into his business dealings several months ago, disclosed the inquiry at a news conference he called suddenly on Tuesday.

Yesterday, John McArdle, a spokesman for Mr. Bruno, confirmed the impression Mr. Bruno gave on Tuesday that his firm, Capital Business Consultants, was subpoenaed.

The disclosure has rattled the marble-halled State Capitol and prompted speculation about his political viability. As recently as October, Mr. Bruno was calling on the embattled state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, a Democrat, to resign in the face of claims that he used state employees to chauffer his wife.

The United States Attorney's office in Syracuse, which is directing the investigation, declined to comment yesterday.

William Dreyer, a lawyer for Mr. Bruno, also declined to comment.

The inquiry, according to a law enforcement official who has knowledge of the investigation and would speak only on the condition of anonymity, is focusing on how Mr. Bruno's personal affairs may relate to his activities as Senate majority leader.

While Mr. Bruno's revelation threw a broad spotlight on his personal financial affairs, much attention has focused on his relationship with Mr. Abbruzzese, a friend who is a founding investor in Empire Racing Associates, one of several groups vying for the horse racing franchise. Mr. Bruno will have a major role in awarding the franchise, along with the Assembly speaker, Sheldon Silver, and Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer.

One of the federal subpoenas was issued to the First Grafton Corporation, a real estate partnership involving Mr. Bruno that sold 17 housing lots — including one to Mr. Abbruzzese's wife, Sherrie, for $90,000 in November 2004.

Mr. Bruno had a 25 percent interest in the partnership, whose other major investors included James D. Featherstonhaugh, a prominent Albany lawyer and lobbyist. Yesterday, Mr. Featherstonhaugh (pronounced feather-stun-HAW), who kept the records for the partnership, said federal investigators had recently issued a subpoena for them.

Over the last four years, Mr. Bruno directed $500,000 in state funds to Evident Technologies, a company financed by Mr. Abbruzzese, and was instrumental in obtaining $2.5 million in state aid for a joint- development project involving Evident and Russell Sage College in Troy, N.Y., near Mr. Bruno's home.

Mr. Abbruzzese invited Mr. Bruno to fly on his private jet, contributed through his companies more than $118,000 to a campaign committee controlled by Mr. Bruno, and was involved in the senator's purchase of stock in Tejas Inc., a small securities brokerage in Texas that was closely connected to Mr. Abbruzzese. Mr. Bruno ultimately lost money on the stock purchase.

Mr. Bruno's investment in Tejas was one of several that he has made over the years in companies whose principals have interests before the state.

In July 2001, Mr. Bruno took credit for securing $500,000 in state money for a joint research project involving Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy and Plug Power Inc., a maker of fuel cells, near Albany, that has had contracts with the state and received other government assistance. At the time, Mr. Bruno was a shareholder in both Plug Power and a sister company, Mechanical Technology. He bought stock in both firms in 2000, according to his financial disclosure reports.

Mr. McArdle said the senator sold his shares in both companies in 2005 at a loss. Mr. Bruno is not alone in having been a Plug Power shareholder. Other lawmakers who have owned its stock include Mr. Silver, the Assembly speaker.

Mr. Bruno also has owned shares of at least two companies, Vytek and Interliant, run by Leonard Fassler, an information-technology entrepreneur from Westchester County. Vytek had part of a state contract to sell computer-networking equipment.

Last year, Mr. Bruno appeared with Mr. Hevesi to announce an investment of $1.7 million from the state pension fund in another of Mr. Fassler's companies. Mr. McArdle said Mr. Bruno was not involved in securing the investment, and only joined in the announcement because the company was located in his district.

In addition to stock investments, Mr. Bruno also owned an apartment house in Troy, initially taking his son, Joseph M. Bruno, as an investment partner in June 1999, according to county property records. But after a few months, the senator asked a close friend and local technology executive, Joseph Magno, to step in and replace his son as an owner and co-guarantor on a $235,000 bank loan related to the investment, Mr. Magno said yesterday. Mr. Magno agreed.

The following year, Mr. Bruno secured $150,000 in state money to help start up the New York State Software Network, a trade association of technology firms that was headed by Mr. Magno.

Mr. Magno, who became a lobbyist in 2004, said he was not involved in Mr. Bruno's decision to award money to his trade group. He added that he and the senator sold the apartment house in 2002 at a loss.

DOJ_NMG_0108269

"Joe is a good man who's always asking if he can be helpful, but I always prefer to not accept his help," Mr. Magno said in a telephone interview. "I try to stay away of him only because I understand the sensitivity of dealing with him because of his position and because we're friends."

Fear Over Scrutiny Of Bruno (NSDY)

By Errol A. Cockfield Jr. And John Moreno Gonzales, Newsday Albany Bureau

Long Island Newsday, December 21, 2006

Republicans worry about what the result will be of the FBI investigation into the business interests of the State Senate leader.

ALBANY -- An FBI investigation of Senate Majority Leader Joseph Bruno's business interests has set off alarms among Senate Republicans who fear their flagbearer has been wounded as Governor-elect Eliot Spitzer, a tenacious Democrat, prepares to take office.

Members of the GOP held out hope Wednesday that Bruno, 77, can withstand the scrutiny of a federal inquiry, but those sentiments were clouded by apprehension, especially at a time when Democratic state Comptroller Alan Hevesi may be hours from indictment.

"There's a lot of angst about where this is going to go," said one Republican Senate official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "People are wondering whether Bruno can survive and whether he can lead."

Capital Business Consultants, the advisory firm Bruno runs out of his Brunswick home, has been under investigation since late spring, but Bruno tried to stay upbeat when he revealed the federal probe late Tuesday. He even wished members of the press corps "Merry Christmas" at the end of a news conference.

He returned to business Wednesday, but another Republican Senate source said members are in the dark about the gravity of the investigation and what its full ramifications may be.

Bruno now heads into a new session that starts Jan. 3 when Spitzer will lay out his agenda in his first State of the State address. Stanley Klein, a political scientist from Long Island University's C.W. Post Campus and a Suffolk GOP committeeman, said Bruno's legal worries could hurt him as he negotiates with Spitzer and Assembly Speaker Sheldon Silver (D-Manhattan).

"If he has any sort of Damocles hanging over his head, it weakens him," Klein said. "What the Republicans don't need is a scandal."

Republicans hold a 34 to 28 majority in the State Senate and are already gearing up for a fight to hold onto it in 2008, when Democratic turnout is expected to be strong in the presidential race. Democrats outnumber Republicans by a 5 to 3 margin in the state.

For now, Republicans are taking Bruno's word that the investigation will find nothing. Sources familiar with it said it focuses on Bruno's relationship with Jared Abbruzzese, a friend and businessman from Loudonville.

Evident Technologies in Troy, of which Abbruzzese is former co-chairman, has received $500,000 in taxpayer money from Bruno's selected appropriation fund since 2001. The funding of the small nanotechnology firm caught the eye of watchdog groups because such monies are usually funneled to nonprofits.

Abbruzzese's Albany attorney, Stephen R. Coffey, did not return telephone calls.

The connection between Bruno and Abbruzzese stems from their shared love of horse racing, according to published reports. But even that common ground has raised questions, as Abbruzzese, leader of a group called Empire Racing Associates, seeks a state racing franchise that Bruno will have a role in awarding.

The relationship between the men is also being investigated by the state Lobbying Commission, which is seeking to determine if Bruno's flights on Abbruzzese-owned aircraft were illegal gifts. Commission head David Grandeau, who has been accused by Abbruzzese's lawyer of having a vendetta against Bruno, also declined to comment.

Evident Technologies spokesman Steven Talbot did not return calls, but Bruno's office has defended the grants as a gift to a company that will generate jobs.

According to business information listings, the company grew from seven employees three years ago to 25 this year. Its Web site says Evident is a leader in quantum dots, a material that can be drawn into fibers to detect radiation and "serve as Homeland Security devices."

Wednesday, James Featherstonhaugh, an Albany lobbyist and a friend of Bruno's, said investigators had asked him for records related to a now-dissolved real estate company both men were involved in, the Associated Press reported.

Featherstonhaugh said during an interview Wednesday that most of the records are public. "You can go down to the courthouse and get them," he said.

Feds Are Mining Joe's Biz (NYDN)

By Joe Mahoney In Albany, And Corky Siemaszko In New York Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, December 21, 2006

The FBI's corruption probe of New York's most powerful Republican gathered steam as a federal grand jury was going over state Senate Majority Leader Joe Bruno's business dealings, the Daily News learned last night.

The grand jury has authorized FBI subpoenas related to Bruno's dealings with Albany-area businessman Jared (Jerry) Abbruzzese, a principal of a Troy, N.Y., high-tech company to which Bruno steered $500,000 in pork-barrel grants over the past four years, sources said.

One specific subpoena was issued to a big-time Albany lobbyist, who confirmed the FBI rousted him for records on a land deal he and his pal Bruno were involved in until last year.

"Someone from the FBI dropped by with a subpoena and asked for the records," the lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, said. "They were provided."

A spokesman for Bruno, who revealed on Tuesday the FBI has been probing his "outside business interests" for seven months, said there was nothing fishy about First Grafton Corp. - Bruno's real estate venture with Featherstonhaugh.

Bruno placed his 25% stake in First Grafton in a blind trust in 1992 - before he became majority leader - and made no business decisions, the spokesman, John McArdle, said.

"Joe Bruno didn't have any contact with First Grafton for a decade," added Featherstonhaugh.

Abbruzzese also has ties to the Grafton deal. Last year, his wife, Sherrie Abbruzzese, bought a 12-acre waterfront lot from First Grafton for $90,000 in 2004.

The agent who earned the commission on the sale was Bruno's son, former lobbyist Kenneth Bruno. He handled the sale of a lot to his then-girlfriend, lobbyist Theresa Russo.

At the time, the younger Bruno was going through a bitter divorce from his wife, Mary Beth, the mother of their two daughters.

Reached yesterday by The News, Mary Beth Bruno would not say whether she was helping the FBI in the Bruno probe. But sources said records from all her ex's Grafton deals are now in the hands of federal investigators.

Bruno, 77, has denied any wrongdoing and claims he is cooperating with investigators. "I have nothing to hide," he said Tuesday.

Bruno, who earns $79,500 a year as a senator and gets another $41,500 as majority leader, is also a principal in a firm called Capital Business Consultants LLC. The FBI has subpoenaed those company records as well.

Federal prosecutors in Albany declined to comment on the Bruno probe yesterday. But Gov. Pataki stood by Bruno.

"I have confidence in Sen. Bruno, I have confidence in our judiciary system, and I'm confident things will work out fine in the end," the outgoing governor said.

Abbruzzese is also the subject of an ongoing state Lobbying Commission investigation into plane rides he arranged for Bruno after the senator steered $500,000 in pork-barrel money to Evident Technologies Inc. - a private company in which Abbruzzese is one of the principals.

At the time, Abbruzzese was a partner of Empire Racing, which is seeking the state's approval to replace the New York Racing Association. Bruno helps decide which group runs racing in the state.

Land Deal With Albany Lobbyist At Center Of Bruno Inquiry (NYS)

By Jacob Gershman

New York Sun, December 21, 2006

A federal investigation into the business interests of the Republican majority leader of the state Senate, Joseph Bruno, is reportedly connected to a land deal involving Mr. Bruno and a veteran Albany lobbyist who is one of the senator's closest friends.

The lobbyist, James Featherstonhaugh, told the Associated Press yesterday that federal investigators asked him to supply records of an apparently unsuccessful real estate venture in eastern Rensselaer County, First Grafton Corp., a company that dissolved last year.

"I did receive a request for some records and those records have been provided," Mr. Featherstonhaugh told the Associated Press.

On Tuesday, Mr. Bruno, 77, who is the most powerful Republican in Albany, announced that he was the subject of an FBI investigation into his outside business interests. He said he is cooperating with authorities but did not know details of the probe. Federal officials have refused to comment on the inquiry.

Mr. Featherstonhaugh and Douglas Rutnik, a lobbyist who is the father of Rep.-elect Kirsten Gillibrand, reportedly established First Grafton Corp. in the late 1980s, buying hundreds of acres of isolated swampland near Grafton.

After initial investors dropped out of the partnership with little of the land developed, Mr. Bruno, his brother Peter, and a Glenn Falls businessman Richard Carota invested in the venture, the Times Union reported.The newspaper reported that First Grafton bulldozed the land and built a 1.7-mile road without required permits from the Department of Environmental Conservation, prompting federal and state lawsuits that delayed development.

The Times Union reported in July 2005 that Mr. Bruno blocked the Senate from voting on wetlands legislation, the Clean Water Protection/Flood Protection Act, which would have further restricted development.

Prosecutors Eye Rolex To Show A Pattern Of Payoffs (MCS)

By Marc Perrusquia

December 21, 2006 Just when it seemed John Ford's legal troubles couldn't get worse, enter a $40,000 wristwatch of questionable origin.

Federal prosecutors alleged Wednesday that Ford received the watch -- a diamond-studded Rolex Masterpiece -- in 2004 from prominent Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman.

Advertisement

Ford once asserted he got the watch free of charge after using his influence to try to reduce state pollution fines levied against Hyneman, prosecutors said.

Neither Hyneman nor Ford has been charged in connection with the watch transaction, yet prosecutors plan to use it as evidence that Ford, who faces separate corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, had a practice of taking payoffs.

"Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him 1.3 million dollars," says a "Notice of Intervention to Introduce Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs or Acts," filed Wednesday.

The notice by U.S. Atty. David Kustoff and Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza seeks to introduce the watch as evidence in Ford's bribery trial set to start Feb. 5 in Memphis.

Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, said the watch wasn't a payoff or a gift and that he will emphatically fight to keep it out of evidence.

"The watch is completely irrelevant to any of this. It was never used for a payoff or anything else," Scholl said. "That truth will come out in our court filing."

Ford is charged in U.S. District Court in Memphis with taking $55,000 in cash bribes in the FBI's Tennessee Waltz undercover sting. In an unrelated matter, Ford was indicted this week by a federal grand jury in Nashville on charges alleging huge kickbacks taken while he was in the General Assembly.

Ford, 64, denies the charges in both cases.

He resigned from the Senate in May 2005 after his Waltz indictment in Memphis.

According to the notice filed Wednesday, federal authorities relieved Ford of the Rolex when he was arrested. Evidence rules let prosecutors introduce "like and similar" acts by a defendant, but defense attorneys get an opportunity to quash the evidence. No hearing has been set.

Given the government's allegations about the watch, it's not clear why Ford or Hyneman haven't been charged. A retired University of Tennessee law professor said it could be a strategic move by prosecutors.

"It could be that they're after the developer and they're holding these prosecutions out as a stick" to get him to cooperate, said Neil P. Cohen, who has an expertise in criminal law.

The U.S. Attorney's Office won't comment on the case.

The notice says prosecutors will introduce statements by Ford -- presumably taped during the Waltz sting -- that he "had assisted a Memphis developer, Rusty Hyneman, in trying to clear up approximately two million dollars in fines ... ."

The notice said Ford met with state lawyers and a state commissioner and that Ford claimed "he had saved Hyneman one million dollars in fines as a result of the meeting ... .

"The United States will further prove that subsequent to the meeting with environmental officials, John Ford attempted to telephone Rusty Hyneman, and indicated that he wanted 'that watch' ... .

"Ford (later) showed (an) individual a Rolex watch, stating that it was worth fifty thousand dollars. Ford stated that he had received this watch from Rusty Hyneman, and that he had not paid anything for the watch."

The Commercial Appeal reported last year that Ford interceded on behalf of Hyneman, yet based on official accounts, it didn't appear he saved Hyneman any money or that fines were as high as the notice cites Ford as claiming.

After state Atty. Gen. Paul Summers filed suit against Hyneman and two other developers seeking penalties, Ford arranged a meeting to negotiate to reduce the penalties.

Ford, Hyneman and his attorney, Allan Wade, met with Betsy L. Child, then-commissioner of the Tennessee Department of Environment and Conservation, and other state officials on or about Oct. 4, 2004.

The topic was a case in which the state alleged widespread, ongoing water pollution violations at several East Shelby County subdivisions developed by Hyneman.

One of the meeting participants, TDEC general counsel Joseph Sanders, said at the time that he recalled Ford indicated his involvement on behalf of Hyneman was that of a legislator helping a constituent.

The meeting was relatively brief, Sanders said, because the state easily refuted claims by the Hyneman contingent that the enforcement action targeted "paperwork violations" instead of real pollution. State officials presented photos of muddy runoff pouring off construction sites as a result of inadequate erosion-control measures.

After viewing the photos, the Hyneman representatives indicated they were ready to settle the case, Sanders said. The state's response was "make us an offer," he said. But as far as he recalls, no offer was made.

Reached Wednesday, Attorney General chief of staff Leigh Ann Jones said the suit, filed in Davidson County Chancery Court, remains open and is set for trial in July.

Doral Case Comes Back To Bite Politician (MJS)

By Cary Spivak

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, December 21, 2006

Maybe you forgot all about Mequon-based Doral Dental and its controversial ties to a once-powerful Tennessee politician who has a bribery indictment hanging over his head.

Yeah, maybe you forgot about it, but the feds sure haven't.

Federal prosecutors in Nashville, Tenn., this week unsealed a six-count indictment charging former Tennessee Sen. John Ford with wire fraud and failing to disclose more than $400,000 in payments from Doral after he helped the Wisconsin company land a lucrative state contract.

The feds say Ford and two others created a consulting firm, Managed Care Services Group, in 2001 that collected $1 million from Doral after it beat out other firms vying for the three-year, $18 million contract to administer dental payments for poor Tennessee children.

A member of one of the Volunteer State's most powerful political families, Ford received 40% of the Doral money, the feds allege. The consulting firm, the indictment says, had no other clients.

"As a public servant, Sen. Ford had a duty to provide honest services to the people of Tennessee," U.S. Attorney Craig Morford said in a statement. "The facts alleged in this indictment reveal an appalling willingness to violate that duty by using his public position for personal gain."

Through his lawyer, Ford denied wrongdoing, saying he was doing legitimate consulting services for Doral. He goes to trial in February on unrelated charges.

DentaQuest, the Boston company that now owns Doral, issued a statement saying the firm has been cooperative with state and federal authorities investigating the matter. DentaQuest's statement, however, pointedly did not offer a defense of the firm's prior owners - most notably Milwaukee entrepreneurs Craig Kasten and Greg Borca, Doral's co-founders.

"The consulting agreement between Doral Dental and Managed Care Services Group was entered into prior to the acquisition by the current ownership," the statement says. "Doral Dental has been advised that neither it, nor its current owners or management are a target of this investigation."

Kasten's attorney, Dennis Coffey, said he had long expected the charges against Ford. But Coffey said he doesn't expect the Tennessee grand jury to slap anyone else with charges.

"Based on my reading of the indictment, I do not have any reason to believe there will be further charges arising in the state of Tennessee," Coffey said.

But what about Wisconsin and the other states, including Pennsylvania, looking into Doral's dealings?

"I am making no comment whatsoever other than what I have said," Coffey replied. He refused to answer questions about whether Kasten had appeared before the grand jury or was cooperating with authorities.

Consistent with Borca's low-key public profile, his lawyer, Stephen Glynn, declined Wednesday even to confirm that he is representing the Milwaukee-area businessman. But Glynn did suggest that Borca is in the clear.

"Without acknowledging I'm his lawyer or not, in reading the indictment, there is nothing there that suggests that there is anybody at Doral, current or past, who has done anything wrong," Glynn said.

"There's nothing wrong, according to the indictment, with anybody paying him (Ford) that money to act as a consultant. And if he violated the law . . . that's a problem for him but not a problem for the company or the persons that retained him as a consultant."

Since the firm was launched in the '90s, Doral was a profitable but little-known entity in Milwaukee's business community. In 2004, DentaQuest paid $95 million to acquire the business.

But Doral landed in hot water early last year when it was disclosed that Doral had hired Managed Care of Pennsylvania, which began making payments to Ford, then an influential legislative committee chairman, shortly after Doral was awarded the Tennessee contract. Managed Care was paid 3 cents per month for every child enrolled in the dental program.

The indictment notes that Ford had argued in favor of carving out a state contract like the one that Doral ultimately won. He also hauled high-ranking state officials to his office to talk up Doral, with a company official attending at least one of those meetings, the indictment says.

Last year, Kasten acknowledged that Doral had hired Managed Care but said he was unaware that Ford was receiving any money from the partnership. The contract, however, said it would be voided "upon the death of the principal legislator associated" with Managed Care, and several old e-mails showed Ford and Kasten were working closely together.

In the midst of the Doral controversy, Ford and other Tennessee legislators were charged in May 2005 with bribery and threatening to shoot potential witnesses against him. The witnesses turned out to be undercover federal agents running a sting operation dubbed the Tennessee Waltz.

Though the two cases are not linked, Ford's lawyer suggested that it's no coincidence that the feds waited until now to lower the boom in the Doral matter.

"Obviously, this indictment here (Nashville) comes out in December, and we're beginning to start trial in February in Memphis," attorney Michael Scholl said. "This was an investigation that was done years ago.

"You can draw your own conclusion. The dates are what the dates are."

3 Plead Guilty In Alabama Church Arsons (AP)

By Phillip Rawls

AP, December 21, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. - Three former college students pleaded guilty Wednesday to federal arson charges for burning nine churches in a series of blazes that alarmed rural congregations across Alabama.

Matthew Cloyd, Benjamin Nathan Moseley and Russell Lee DeBusk entered the guilty pleas to federal arson and conspiracy charges in the string of church fires set on two nights in February.

The three wore orange jail jumpsuits and leg chains as they stood before U.S. District Judge David Proctor, who told them they all face minimum seven-year sentences.

Cloyd, 21, and Moseley, 20, had a plea agreement with federal prosecutors that called for them to recommend a sentence of up to eight years and one month, but not less than seven years.

DeBusk, 20, did not have an agreement on a sentence with his plea but decided to plead guilty "to help those congregations and others hurt by his behavior continue to heal," defense attorney Brett Bloomston said. A prosecutor said he expects DeBusk to get a shorter sentence because he participated in only five fires.

Defense lawyer Tommy Spina said Cloyd "is incredibly remorseful, and he regrets creating this much misery in people's lives."

The three are also charged with state crimes in Bibb, Pickens, Greene and Sumter counties, including arson, burglary, criminal mischief and cruelty to animals for killing a cow. Defense attorneys have been discussing a similar plea deal with county prosecutors, but none has been reached.

Prosecutors said that the first fires occurred during a night of illegal hunting and underage drinking, and that the second fires were set to throw off investigators.

All the churches have either rebuilt or are in the process after receiving an outpouring of donations.

The Rev. James Posey suffered a stroke and had to step down as pastor after Morning Star Baptist Church in Eutaw was destroyed. Posey, who blames his stroke on the stress of the fire, was pleased to hear of the pleas.

"It sends a message out that you are not going to run amok and not desecrate and destroy property, especially God's church," he said.

Uncle Sam's Private Equity Fund (FOR)

By Mary Crane

Forbes, December 20, 2006

Uncle Sam's got a thing for strip clubs. And banana plantations, horse farms and private prisons. These are just some of the businesses overseen by the federal government while their shady owners sit on trial for various crimes.

DOJ_NMG_0108274

Administering this colorful portfolio is Len Briskman, deputy chief of business management for the U.S. Marshals Service. Call him Washington's own Warren Buffett. At any given time, Briskman presides over 30 businesses--many of them profitable and each with $20 million to $400 million in assets--while their owners get a fair trial, which could take up to seven years. Meanwhile, all of those honest employees get to keep working.

If the bad guys beat the rap, they get their businesses back, in tact and humming. If they don't, Briskman sells off the company, in whole or in pieces, at auction to the highest bidder. Proceeds go to fund the Department of Justice's Asset Forfeiture Program, which the USMS administers, as well as the other agencies that nabbed the criminals, like the Drug Enforcement Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

In Pictures: Crime And Entrepreneurship

How much do Briskman's efforts pull in? "Conservatively, [the government] makes a couple hundred million a year, at least" from selling those businesses (net of losses), he says. That's a pretty snazzy return for a relatively minuscule initial investment.

A deliberate speaker with a grandfatherly disposition and a charming chuckle, Briskman joined the Marshals Service in 1997, less than a year after he had finished selling off the last bits of a publicly held athletic shoe company, Diversified Retail Group, which he founded in the 1970s. "I was burned out from my business, and it looked like a very interesting position," says Briskman, 69.

Indeed, his latest gig is an entrepreneur's dream. Of the 60 businesses referred to him every year, he only takes on those he thinks are viable--or could be, sans the criminal contribution; the rest get sold for parts. The owners may know how to sell drugs, "but they're really dumb when it comes to their investments," he quips. Of the remaining 30 he chooses to look after, only five require close day-to-day management, while the rest simply report weekly or monthly financials.

The variety keeps things interesting, too: Restaurants, car dealerships, supermarkets, casinos, fitness centers, strip clubs and now even hedge funds are in the mix. While some businesses started off clean but turned wayward later, says Briskman, others were tainted from the get-go.

One of them, a Puerto Rican horse farm near San Juan, trained prize-winning Pasa Fino horses worth as much as $50,000 each. The owner, who was moonlighting as a drug-runner, got snared by the DEA in early 2001. As part of his plea agreement, he turned over the farm, which never made much money, to the government. Briskman switched gears and leased the farm to horse enthusiasts, who paid a monthly rental fee. "We ended up making a lot of money on the lease payments over a few years" before selling it all off, he says.

Briskman found himself in Puerto Rico again two years later, this time tending to a banana plantation in Guayanilla. The owner was arrested on drug charges in 2003, and the U.S. Marshals Service managed her banana farm while the Department of Justice worked her case. Briskman hired a Puerto Rican accounting firm to monitor the day-to-day operations, reconcile bank statements and send reports to Washington. Thanks to Briskman's yellow thumb and savvy business skills, the plantation added an extra 65 acres under his watch.

Sometimes, Briskman's stewardship simply amounts to running a sale. That was the case in 2002 with the Ritz Cabaret, Baltimore's most famous strip club. While the club's owner commanded a very valuable asset--one of the only all-nude cabaret licenses in town--he still sunk to underreporting income and money-laundering. Briskman didn't take this one on (the USMS doesn't operate adult-entertainment facilities), but he did manage to sell the club and the license for a cool $1.1 million when the owner was found guilty.

With the number of forfeited businesses growing in recent years, Eben Morales, deputy chief in charge of the Asset Forfeiture Program, wishes he could find "carbon copies" of Briskman to help distribute the workload.

Banana farming, anyone?

Alleged Bank Robber Captured In Florida (AP)

AP, December 21, 2006

CONCORD, N.H. --A suspected bank robber from Manchester has been captured in Florida, according to the U.S. Marshals Service.

The federal marshals said Richard Villar, 33, was arrested and charged with the armed robbery of a St. Mary's Bank in Hudson on April 18.

His alleged accomplices, Joshua Gagnon, 21, of Nashua, and Debra Scott, 28, formerly of Manchester, were arrested in May by Hudson police, but Villar reportedly fled the state and was using an alias.

Federal marshals said they traced him to the St. Petersburg area where he had family and friends. Marshals said he was arrested without incident Tuesday.

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Sued Over Dropping Of Benefits For Disabled (WP)

By Darryl Fears

Washington Post, December 21, 2006

For eight years, Shmul Kaplan lived alone in a suburban Philadelphia housing complex with hardly any furniture and barely enough food to eat. Two years ago, the government told the amputee he would have to make do with less.

Kaplan, who is from Ukraine, lost his $603 in Supplemental Security Income after he missed a seven-year deadline to become a U.S. citizen. The clock started ticking after he was granted asylum in 1997.

A class-action lawsuit filed in federal court in Pennsylvania recently on behalf of people such as Kaplan, 80, contends that they are not responsible for missing the deadline. Kaplan's citizenship application is among hundreds of thousands awaiting background checks by the FBI, a mountainous backlog that grew after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. More than 6,000 physically handicapped people who were granted asylum have had benefits cut as they wait, according to the suit.

"The Social Security Administration . . . projects that over 46,000 immigrants will be cut off from SSI in the years 2006-2012 as a result of delays in granting citizenship and the operation of the seven year rule," the lawsuit says.

The suit's plaintiffs include Eshetu Meri, 51, of Fairfax, a blind man who escaped from Ethiopia, where he was targeted for advocating democracy; Tasim Mandija, 80, of Philadelphia, a native of Albania who suffers from prostate cancer and neuropathy; and Rouzbeh Aliaghaei, 17, an Iranian who suffers from a rare genetic disorder that resulted in autism, seizures, mental retardation and an enlarged head. He came to the United States in 1998 when his parents escaped political persecution.

Kaplan, who is Jewish, claimed religious persecution and was granted asylum in January 1997. He was given humanitarian aid because one of his legs was severed when he ran to catch a train at age 18, slipped on ice and slid beneath the wheels. The other leg was so severely fractured that it arcs like a bow.

"I have a very sick leg," Kaplan said in a telephone interview. "It has a lot of fractures, and now it is a curved leg. My stump, it is not a normal stump. Sometimes I have to see a doctor. They take away my benefits, and, of course, it is very bad for me."

Others in the lawsuit declined to be interviewed, fearing that speaking out might interfere with the progress of their citizenship applications, or that they would be sought out for harm.

The suit was filed against top officials of the Social Security Administration, the Department of Homeland Security, the U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) unit of DHS, the Justice Department and the FBI.

The National Name Check Program at the FBI receives more than 67,000 requests for background checks each week. Half the requests come from the USCIS, said Paul Bresson, an FBI spokesman.

When requests from private entities are included, the total reaches several million each year, Bresson said. The USCIS is the FBI's biggest customer, accounting for about 128,000 background-check requests per month, plus 2.7 million that are backlogged from years past, Bresson said.

The FBI has struggled for years with a growing backlog of such requests from all entities. The Government Accountability Office reported earlier this year that, for immigration cases alone, 113,000 background checks had been pending for more than six months.

USCIS spokeswoman Chris Rhatigan said her agency processes citizenship applications as quickly as it can and is not responsible for the backlog that results from the delay in background checks.

Rhatigan said requests often stall because questions arising from the applications go unanswered. "There could be a number of different reasons," she said. "It could be a failure to respond or a request for additional information."

The Social Security Administration declined to comment on its decision to end the benefits, saying only that the law requires it to do so seven years after asylum is granted if U.S. citizenship has not been obtained.

That may be, said Jonathan Stein, an attorney for the group that has filed suit, but Congress never intended to cut those granted asylum from humanitarian aid when it approved in 1996 the legislation that provides it.

The benefit provides $603 monthly to single recipients and $904 to couples. Congress assumed that seven years was enough time for applicants to make it through the citizenship process. But the Sept. 11 attacks diverted large numbers of FBI agents to counterterrorism duties, greatly slowing the background checks.

Stein wondered why USCIS, FBI and Social Security officials could not flag citizenship requests from disabled applicants here on asylum. "Their lives depend on this," he said. "If they can't expedite their cases, let's at least continue their SSI until they become citizens."

Kaplan began to receive Supplemental Security Income payments in March 1997, two months after he was granted asylum. A year later, he applied for permanent residency, the first step toward naturalized citizenship. The process should have taken a year. But it took six years, according to Kaplan and his attorneys.

With time running out, Kaplan applied for citizenship as soon as he could in the spring of 2004. Fearing he would miss the deadline, aid workers took his letters and pleas for an expedited process to the Social Security office. "They said there was nothing they could do," Kaplan said in his deposition. His benefits were cut that summer.

Too old and too weak to work, Kaplan said he gets by on $215 a month that he uses for paying rent and $140 in food stamps. Regardless, Kaplan said he loves the United States and does not miss life in Ukraine or Russia, where he also lived.

"The food in grocery stores was rationed . . . and many times, I was told that I could not stay in line for the food because I was Jewish," he said in the deposition. "One winter, two men pushed me down when I was walking in the street.

"I knew that I had to leave Russia," he said in the deposition. "If they did not kill me today, I thought, they would kill me tomorrow."

For Divided Family, Border Is Sorrowful Barrier (NYT)

By Mireya Navarro

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

MONTERREY, Mexico — She tells her story from a windowless bedroom in a cinderblock house carved into four apartments that share two showers and two toilet stalls outside. Her kitchen has no refrigerator or sink. To cook, she buys perishables on the same day. To wash dishes, she fills buckets from a faucet in the front yard.

Not so long ago, Irma, 44, had achieved her own modest version of the American dream about 300 miles from here in San Antonio, where she lived illegally for more than six years. She had left Mexico with three of her four daughters, escaping financial turmoil and marriage to a man so violent that she considered suicide, twice slipping a rope over a beam to hang herself.

In Texas, she had learned how to drive and owned not one but two cars. She held two jobs and, after years of sharing homes with her older sister, Raquel Rodríguez, the family’s only legal resident, and other relatives and friends, moved with her daughters into a small rented house furnished from flea markets.

“My daughters were in peace,” Irma recalled, proud in that accomplishment, her last name and those of some relatives not being disclosed here because they have been illegal immigrants. “No one bothered us.”

Then one night over dinner, three years ago, her daughter Mayra, a high school senior, stunned her with the news that she was pregnant and intended to marry her boyfriend. Another daughter, Barbie, not yet 16, was adamant that said she, too, was getting married and moving out.

“I was so depressed,” Irma said. “All I wanted was to pick up my stuff and leave.”

Disillusioned and feeling abandoned, she attended her daughters’ courthouse weddings on a Wednesday but did not stick around for the weekend parties. She made a quick round of goodbyes to her sister Raquel and another sister, Verónica, who was also living illegally in San Antonio.

By Friday she was on her way back to Mexico with her youngest daughter, passengers in a pickup truck that joined the exodus of immigrants who at some point cross in the opposite direction to go back home. Even with the benefit of having sisters nearby, the kind of support that many immigrants cannot do without, Irma felt she could not stay without Mayra to give her a hand with the driving, child care and other needs that can become particularly daunting for a single mother.

She left one daughter her dining room set, washing machine and refrigerator; the other got her living room set, king-size bed and two dressers.

"I doled out everything," Irma said. "I cried so much because it took so much sacrifice to avail myself of things and I had to get rid of them."

Now all she has to show for her migration to the United States, she said, is the heartache of separation.

Her youngest daughter, Lupita, and another daughter, who is married and has three children, now live together just a few blocks from her. But the other two are still in Texas, still illegally, now with one American-born child each.

The border is now a barrier between the Mexican and American sides of her family, and now Irma feels the pull of her absent daughters. The older one has faced her own marital troubles, and both of their families recently moved into an uncle's house to share expenses. If some illness or emergency befell her girls, Irma worries, she could not be there to help them.

"I still feel that I should be with them, supporting them," Irma said. "They're still children."

Back to the Old Neighborhood

In sweltering heat one evening, with an ear out for "Duel of Passions," the telenovela on the television in the bedroom, Irma performed a culinary magic trick. She transformed $5 in groceries into a meal of rice with corn, fried potatoes and steamed nopales, cactus, with vegetables to feed two daughters, three grandchildren and two visitors, and still have enough waiting for Gilberto, a tractor-truck mechanic she fell in love with upon her return to Monterrey.

"I always got my daughters used to the food from over here," she said, perspiring heavily despite the gusts from a stand-up fan. "They're 100 percent Mexican. None of that pizza."

Irma has taken up once again in her old neighborhood, a cluster of lower-middle-class and poor homes at the foot of a mountain called Cerro de la Silla, or Saddle Mountain, in this industrial city of 1.1 million.

The streets in Irma's insular world are lined with ficus trees, and the homes are in varying stages of completion, giving the area the character of a work in progress. Residents buy the land and then build their houses over time, evolving at the pace of their means. Floors are still without tile and zinc roofs have yet to be replaced with cement, though gang graffiti spreads faster than kudzu on the exterior walls.

Irma works part time as a bar waitress and lives in the sparsely furnished home she shares with Gilberto, 35, who makes $120 a week and foots most of the couple's household expenses, including the $150 monthly rent. The house where she lived before meeting Gilberto is still in disrepair, with partly exposed rooms, missing walls and open sections of the roof. Her daughters still live there, their clothes hanging from bare walls moist from the recent rains and the sofas and light fixtures worn out or broken.

At first she stayed in her sister Raquel's second home, a large corner property with an empty swimming pool and rental units, known as La Quinta, that her family in Monterrey — Irma's mother, a sister and four brothers — used for celebrations.

Then she set out to rehabilitate her old five-room house — which she said her estranged husband had been using "as his little hotel" for trysts with women — and bring her family back under one roof. But like a recurring nightmare, her husband, whom she said she could not afford to divorce, still harassed her when he came to visit his daughters.

More and more, her days here are filled with daydreaming about crossing back. A six-hour drive is all that separates her from her daughters in San Antonio. But Irma said she was stuck, with no money to pay for an illegal crossing and no prospects for a tourist visa because she did not own property, hold a full-time job or offer any evidence that she had ties to Mexico that would compel her to return after a visit.

For now, the telephone must do. Twice-a-week calls from San Antonio are her only connection to the life she once had. One morning in October, one of her daughters, Mayra, called and Irma savored each word, careful to shield her own emotions.

"It's been raining. Every day?" she asked. To her delight, Mayra stayed on the phone for more than two hours when her younger sister Lupita got on the line.

Adjusting to Mexico has been even tougher for Lupita, who turns 16 in December and wears her blond hair waist-long and favors outfits that expose her midriff. A drop earring cascades from her navel. She changed schools five times before she dropped out and took a job in customer service and billing with a cellphone company. Lupita hated the schedule of afternoon-only classes, and resented having to pay for her textbooks, something unheard of in Texas.

"It makes me quite sad that she's not in high school," Irma said. "I tell my daughters, 'You don't have to struggle like me.' If I had studied, I'd be in an office, not a bar."

'Over There'

Fanning herself with bare hands in the midday heat, Irma walks around a flea market, casting a disdainful eye over the secondhand shoes, clothes and trinkets spread out on blankets and tables, and sometimes in piles over the dirt of the soccer field. She settles on a pair of bright yellow beach thongs for $1 for herself and two pairs of jeans for Lupita.

She is starting over, from scratch. But she was not thrilled with today's finds. "Over there you pay less and it's new," she said with authority about Texas.

She says it again and again. "Over there" — that world that taught her what she is missing. Irma knew only poverty when she went to San Antonio.

She left school at 12 to start work cleaning houses. At 17 she learned to sew and worked in a factory. At 20, after three years of courtship, she married a neighbor and began a new cycle of deprivation. It was the untenable marriage, more than economic hardship, that compelled her to follow in the footsteps of her sister Raquel, the first in her family to immigrate north and who remains the family's mainstay in San Antonio.

A fading wedding picture in the living room of the home where her daughters live shows the couple in posed embrace, with a darker-haired Irma in white gown and long train and her mustachioed husband holding her by the waist. Irma said the newlywed bliss lasted only two years. Her husband soon started cheating and beating her, once even breaking her nose, she said.

At one point she left with the girls, staying with siblings and moving from house to house. The husband would not give her economic support. Things got so bad, she said, that twice she planned her suicide, but changed her mind when she heard her daughters coming into the house.

"I was tired and desperate," she said of her marital situation. "That wasn't a life."

Her daughter Mayra left for Texas first. The girl was driven across the border with false identification papers. She went to live with her Aunt Raquel in San Antonio and attended middle school there. Irma followed later, leaving her other daughters in Monterrey.

"It went badly for me," she said of that first and toughest year in the north. "I wasn't happy here or there. I had Mayra, who was my solace."

Irma eventually found work as a seamstress, making military uniforms in a maquiladora in San Antonio, a job that paid, by the piece, $400 to $500 in a good week, and enabled her to send $200 to $300 home weekly. But when her family sent word that her husband, a welder, had suffered a severe leg injury at work and was dying and asking for her forgiveness, she returned to Monterrey. A month later, he had recovered and she was back in San Antonio and at Raquel's, this time with two more daughters in tow.

The maquiladora jobs had vanished, so she went to work cleaning and washing dishes at a Mexican restaurant. She had been promoted to cook and substitute restaurant manager, making $5.75 an hour, by the time the two daughters announced their wedding plans.

A Chance Meeting

Despite her sad eyes and unsmiling face, Irma presents a youthful exterior — brown eyes under tattooed eyebrows, short honey-colored hair pinned back with girlish barrettes, form-fitting tops over tight jeans, tattoos on her lower back and left leg and upper arm. A victim of domestic violence by both her father and husband, she said she had long stopped looking for a man.

Then last year, at a girlfriend's birthday party, she met Gilberto.

"We danced and we were giggling and all of a sudden we were kissing," she said. Gilberto has kind eyes and a calm demeanor, but he also had a drinking problem. Irma became his confidante, a supportive friend, but did not agree to live with him, she said, until last summer, when she was convinced he had dealt with his own demons.

Irma's days are now split between Gilberto, her work, her daughters, her grandchildren and, increasingly, her longing for "over there."

She first found work cleaning in a factory for $80 a week. Last March she got a better position as a waitress at a pool hall three days a week for $90. She works Thursday through Saturday, the 3 p.m. to 2 a.m. shift, also getting up at 5 a.m. on weekdays to cook Gilberto's breakfast and pack him a lunch of rice soup or potatoes with chorizo. She watches the news and then walks two blocks to play with her grandchildren.

"The family-oriented lifestyle has not changed for me," said Irma, who prefers a quiet home life after work, with the occasional outing to a karaoke bar or the public swimming pool.

One afternoon, she walked her 6-year-old granddaughter, Briseiry, to school for the United Nations World Food Day. Dressed as a strawberry, Briseiry performed two dance numbers in the school yard, with classmates in grape and potato costumes. Irma and her daughter Mireya laughed and clapped from the sidelines.

From the produce ranks, Briseiry flashed her grandmother a toothless smile, and Irma smiled back with tenderness. But even in this revelry, she pointed out the school's flaws — the chairs without desks and bathrooms that lacked doors and toilet lids.

"The differences are many," she said, comparing Monterrey with San Antonio.

Another American Grandchild

Her brush with American life has made Irma less tolerant of the poverty, quick to find fault with her surroundings. The urge to start over in Texas is the strongest it has been since she returned. Her daughter Barbie gave birth to a second child in December. Once again, Irma missed out on welcoming a new grandchild. And as usual, Irma will wait for one of her sister Raquel's visits to see pictures of her growing American family.

She has her fantasy return planned out. She would take Lupita and Gilberto with her, get a higher-paying job at a restaurant, or cleaning houses, that would allow her to help her daughters in Texas and send money to Mireya in Monterrey to get a tourist visa.

Getting through the border, Irma noted, is not as daunting as coming up with the $2,000 she said she would need to pay for fake identification papers and a coyote to drive her through as his wife or sister. When she first crossed by car in the late 1990s, as the coyote's "wife," she paid only $500.

"Imagine that, together we'd need $4,000," Irma told Gilberto one night.

It would be easier to buy a car, he replied.

Another hope is that Irma's daughters in San Antonio, or maybe her sister Raquel, would become citizens and sponsor her for permanent residency. But that would be years away.

Sometimes Irma looks so melancholic that Gilberto asks if she has misgivings about having returned. She tells him no, because she wouldn't have met him.

"I don't regret having come because, after so many years of being alone, I found Gilberto, who treats me well, who loves me and takes care of me," she says.

But that is only half the truth.

One Thursday afternoon, Irma left home shortly before 3 p.m. for her job at the billiard hall, a short walk through a busy commercial area with restaurants, tortillerias, clothing stores and auto repair shops.

A burly man yelled from across the avenue that he had the reconditioned refrigerator she had been looking for. When she signaled "how much?" he held up five fingers to signal 500 pesos, or about $50.

The rent was due, she said, so the purchase had to wait.

"That's why you don't get ahead here," Irma said of the low salaries. "What you make here in a week, over there you collect daily, even just cleaning up yards."

Irma's workplace is a bar with six pool tables and wall décor that ranges from pictures of Pancho Villa to a calendar featuring topless women.

Three television sets are tuned to Animal Planet.

That night about a dozen men in their 20s and 30s focused on their game and $2 bets. Irma, in jeans and a sweater, moved about at a relaxed pace serving beer and picking up empties from tables.

Most customers summoned her with an "Irma, cerveza!" Many greeted her with a kiss. On busy nights, Irma and another waitress serve up to 200 patrons at a time. No one tips like in Texas, where Irma sometimes ended the night at the restaurant with an extra $40. She has to wait until Saturday to get paid for the three days.

And it is, after all, a bar. "The bad thing here is that people drink until they crawl," she said. "Over there, if they see you drunk, they don't sell to you."

During a break, sitting in a plastic chair and sipping a beer sent over by a customer, she fought back tears as she pondered her future. A customer was grilling meat over firewood in one corner for Irma and his friends. A childhood friend, Antonio Flores, walked in and kissed her on the cheek.

"She was very good and very beautiful," Mr. Flores said, reminiscing of Irma as a teenager.

Irma smiled in appreciation, but on this night, her cocoon in Monterrey felt like a prison.

"If I had the money I'd leave today," she repeated, barely audible over the ranchera playing on the jukebox.

Mr. Bush's Immigration Realism (NYT)

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

Every now and then the public gets a glimpse of the George W. Bush who is a calm realist on immigration, a former governor of a border state who knows, likes and understands Latino immigrants. It's an identity sharply at odds with that of many other members of his Republican Party, especially the snarlers clustered on its right wing.

At his news conference yesterday, Mr. Bush commented on the raids at Swift & Company, the meatpacking giant that, to nobody's surprise, seems to have had hundreds of illegal immigrants with forged papers on its low-skill work force. Mr. Bush did not condemn the detainees as border-crossing evildoers. He spoke with startling tolerance.

"The system we have in place has caused people to rely upon smugglers and forgers in order to do work Americans aren't doing," Mr. Bush said. "It is a system that, frankly, leads to inhumane treatment of people."

He continued: "The best way to deal with an issue that Americans agree on — that we ought to enforce our borders in a humane way — is we've got to have a comprehensive bill."

Mr. Bush understands that many illegal immigrants are doing what they have to do to support families within a system that offers few routes to lawful entry. He understands that giving immigrants the opportunity to earn an honest foothold in this country — the path to citizenship despised by restrictionists as "amnesty" — is not giving a reward to criminals. It is not something for nothing. It is an attempt to fix a system that draws in millions of illegal immigrants each year, efficiently taking their labor but withholding hope.

Mr. Bush has shown a way to move the debate away from the "amnesty" trap by casting reform as a means to end an abusive system and remove the perverse incentives that allow illegality to flourish. It may sound shocking to say that illegal immigrants deserve better. But as long as this country keeps swallowing them up into a broken, unjust system, they do.

Mr. Bush showed yesterday that he gets it. He should do that more often.

TAX:

Judge Refuses To Split Trial In U.S. Case On Tax Shelters (NYT)

By Lynnley Browning

New York Times, December 21, 2006

The federal judge overseeing a mammoth tax shelter case said yesterday that the delayed trial would begin next fall, but he rejected a proposal by prosecutors to try the defendants separately in two groups.

The judge, Lewis A. Kaplan of Federal District Court in Manhattan, ordered jury selection to begin on Sept. 17, 2007, in the criminal trial of the 18 defendants, 16 of whom are former employees of the accounting firm KPMG.

The judge also said that he had tentatively decided not to have separate trials. "Essentially what I have been offered is the opportunity to have two unmanageable trials rather than one," he said.

The judge said he preferred to have one. The trial — the largest criminal tax case in history, according to prosecutors — was originally due to begin last September, but Judge Kaplan postponed it twice, citing concerns over who would pay the defendants' legal bills.

The trial date could still be changed again, because of uncertainty over the issue of legal fees.

A federal appeals panel is weighing whether Judge Kaplan had the authority last June to dismiss KPMG's motion to compel the defendants to submit to arbitration over the fees issue. A panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit is hearing KPMG's appeal of the judge's ruling. The defendants had sued KPMG, seeking to force it to pay the fees.

The 18 defendants are accused of conspiracy and tax fraud by making, selling and, in some cases, using questionable tax shelters that cost the Treasury an estimated $2.5 billion in unpaid taxes.

In his June ruling, Judge Kaplan criticized KPMG, saying it had bowed to prosecutorial pressure to reverse its longstanding policy and cut off legal fees to the defendants or face a heightened risk of indictment. At the time, KPMG was under criminal investigation for its tax shelter work. Last year, the firm averted indictment and instead reached a $456 million deferred-prosecution agreement, one of the largest of its kind.

In the June ruling, Judge Kaplan also criticized what he called the government's abusive prosecutorial guidelines. Last week, amid mounting criticism, the Justice Department changed the guidelines, making it unacceptable for prosecutors weighing whether to indict a company to consider whether the company was paying the legal fees of employees caught up in investigations.

It is unclear whether this policy shift may now strengthen the position of the defendants on the legal fees issue.

Prosecutors are continuing to turn over to the defense scores of documents, most of them from Deutsche Bank, which is itself under investigation over its work with questionable tax shelters.

At yesterday's court hearing, John Hillebrecht, an assistant United States attorney in Manhattan who is overseeing the broad inquiries, said there was "a wide-ranging investigation, and it's still ongoing," looking at accounting firms, banks, law firms and investment boutiques that made and sold questionable shelters.

IRS Scales Back Audits Of Big Firms, Study Finds (WSJ)

By Jesse Drucker

DOJ_NMG_0108281

The Internal Revenue Service audited a smaller proportion of the nation's largest corporations this year than it did in 2005 and, over the past five years, it has cut the average number of hours spent on such audits, according to researchers at Syracuse University.

The university's Transactional Records Access Clearinghouse, which frequently issues reports based on IRS data obtained through the Freedom of Information Act, found that the number of hours the agency spent per audit of corporations with assets of $250 million or more dropped to a projected 958 for 2006 from 1,210 per audit in 2002. (The 2006 projection was based on data through the first six months of the year.)

In a report released yesterday, TRAC also pointed out that the percentage of big companies audited in 2006 dropped to 35.3% from 44.1% in 2005, after rising for two years. The audit rate this year was slightly higher than in 2002, but still far below rates from the early to mid-1990s, when audit coverage sometimes exceeded 50%.

IRS officials said part of the reason for the overall drop in audits of big corporations was that the agency hired hundreds of new auditors in 2006 who required training. The officials cited the decline in hours per audit as a sign of greater efficiency. They pointed out that the amount of money the IRS determined big companies owed as a result of audits was up markedly from 2002, even though the time spent on those audits dropped.

For example, the sums sought from large corporations after audits of big companies were completed nearly doubled to $25.53 billion in 2006 from $13.67 billion in 2002. In that same period, the amount sought per hour spent by auditors on those companies also increased sharply, rising to $6,543 in 2006 from $2,957 in 2002.

IRS Commissioner Mark Everson has cited increased enforcement efforts, particularly those aimed at large corporations and high-income taxpayers, as a top priority.

Some tax analysts said the IRS effort to seek more money per company after audits could be because corporate profits have risen substantially in recent years, meaning there may be more uncollected tax to be found. Eric Toder, a tax economist at the Urban Institute and former IRS director of research, pointed out that the IRS is making comparisons with a very slow year for audits and enforcement activity in 2002.

Joel Slemrod, a professor of economics at the University of Michigan, said the data from both TRAC and the IRS didn't offer enough information to provide a complete picture of whether the IRS has become more or less efficient.

Yankton Firm Implicated In Tax Fraud Case (YDP)

By Nathan Johnson

Yankton (SD) Daily Press, December 21, 2006

A Yankton accounting firm has been implicated in a health care reimbursement tax fraud plan that was recently shut down by a Chicago federal court.

According to a press release issued by the Tax Division of the U.S. Department of Justice, the firm of Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. LLC of Yankton helped businesses in Illinois and Indiana sell "illegal or improper" health care reimbursement plans that the Internal Revenue Service estimates cost the U.S. Treasury between $12 and $63 million.

The district court in Illinois issued a permanent injunction Dec. 5, ordering Carmelo Zanfei of Steger, Ill., and William Crouse of Greenwood, Ind., and any individuals or entities working in association with them, to no longer sell their Health Incentive Plan and HealthIER Plan.

Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. is not named in the injunction but was named in an earlier memorandum opinion and order issued by the court.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Department of Justice, said the organization would not comment on whether there is a criminal investigation into the case.

However, a lawyer representing Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. said he has been assured by the Department of Justice that there will be no criminal investigation into his client's involvement.

"There has not been one hint of criminal accusations against Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co.," said Yankton attorney Mike Marlow. "In fact, they were told (by the Department of Justice) there was no further follow-up, that they were satisfied with the explanations given and were to take no further action -- and that was a couple of years ago."

The Department of Justice said the health care reimbursement plans created and sold by Zanfei and Crouse beginning in 1999 allowed "hundreds of businesses and thousands of employees avoid federal taxes and, in the case of the employees, resulted in the under-reporting of income."

The court found that, under the plans, items such as athletic shoes, health club fees, soaps and daycare were listed as reimbursable expenses. In reality, such expenses are reimbursable only under rare circumstances, according to the court.

Also, the court stated that medical expenses were often reimbursed without being substantiated.

The HI Plan, in particular, was illegal because it "allowed reimbursement for health insurance premiums as opposed to out-of-pocket health care expenses," according to the Department of Justice.

According to court documents, Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. became involved when it entered a formal agreement with the one of the entities selling the HI Plan to provide technical and consulting services. As part of the agreement, Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. prepared opinion letters that stated the plan was in compliance with the Internal Revenue Code and Treasury Regulations. The agreement also specified that the accounting firm would receive a $2,500 retainer and $1 for each participant enrolled in the program. It later entered a similar agreement with another company selling the HI Plan.

The court stated that the opinion letters, written by Blaine Meier, should be discounted because "he had a financial interest in the plans and thus had an incentive to find them legal."

Marlow said Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. stands by its opinion of the HI Program.

"Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. was asked to provide an opinion regarding the deductibility of certain medical expenses under plans proposed by other folks," he said. "Wohlenberg, Ritzman investigated and researched the applicable regulations and opinion letters from the IRS and felt that, as the plan was proposed, it was an appropriate and valid plan."

Additionally, a processing center for the health care plans was established in Yankton to authenticate medical expenses for employers and send them year-end adjustment reports at the cost of $20 per employee. Called Kuhlmann Enterprises, LLC, the processing center was housed in the Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co. building and was staffed by Cynthia Nordstrom, a daughter of one of Wohlenberg's partners.

Court documents state the processing center "was created by WRC." However, Marlow contests that description, saying it was a separate company that rented space from Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Co.

Either way, the court stated that the processing center did not function as it was supposed to and "failed to provide authentication to the majority of the HealthIER Plan customers." During 2004, for example, the center provided adjustment reports to well under 30 percent of the employers enrolled in the plan. For those companies that did receive adjustment reports, employee expenses substantiated whether or not there were receipts to validate them.

Nordstrom told the court that Zanfei and Crouse told her the center should consider all expenses were substantiated whether there was proof or not.

Ultimately, Marlow said it is important to note the Department of Justice has never said the work done by Wohlenberg, Ritzman & Company was inappropriate.

"What the Department of Justice has said is, they don't think (the health care plans), as they were applied by some employers, were the way to go," he said. "That doesn't have anything to do with Wohlenberg, Ritzman or whether it provided appropriate advice regarding this medical insurance deductibility program."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Report Says Berger Hid Archive Documents (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, December 21, 2006

President Clinton's national security adviser removed classified documents from the National Archives, hid them under a construction trailer and later tried to find the trash collector to retrieve them, the agency's internal watchdog said Wednesday.

The report was issued more than a year after Sandy Berger pleaded guilty to unlawfully removing and retaining classified documents.

Berger took the documents in the fall of 2003 while working to prepare himself and Clinton administration witnesses for testimony to the Sept. 11 commission. Berger was authorized as the Clinton administration's representative to make sure the commission got the correct classified materials.

Inspector General Paul Brachfeld reported that National Archives employees spotted Berger outside the building, bending down and fiddling with something white around his ankles.

The employees did not feel at the time that there was enough information to confront someone of Berger's stature, the report said.

Later, when Berger was confronted by Archives officials about the missing documents, he lied by saying he did not take them, the report said.

Brachfeld reported that on one visit, Berger took a break to go outside without an escort while it was dark outside.

"He headed toward a construction area. ... Mr. Berger looked up and down the street, up into the windows of the Archives and the DOJ (Department of Justice), and did not see anyone," said notes prepared by the inspector general's office.

He then slid the documents under a construction trailer, according to the inspector general. Berger acknowledged that he later retrieved the documents from the construction area and returned with them to his office.

"He was aware of the risk he was taking," the inspector general's notes said. Berger then returned to the Archives building without fearing the documents would slip out of his pockets or that staff would notice that his pockets were bulging.

The notes said Berger had not been aware that Archives staff had been tracking the documents he was provided because of earlier suspicions from previous visits that he was removing materials. Also, the employees had made copies of some documents.

In October 2003, the report said, an Archives official called Berger to discuss missing documents from his visit two days earlier. The investigator's notes said, "Mr. Berger panicked because he realized he was caught."

The notes said that Berger had "destroyed, cut into small pieces, three of the four documents. These were put in the trash."

After the trash had been picked up, Berger "tried to find the trash collector but had no luck," the notes said.

The significant portions of the inspector general's report were redacted to protect privacy or national security.

Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said in a statement that the contents of all the documents exist today and were made available to the commission.

For his guilty plea, Berger was fined $50,000, ordered to perform 100 hours of community service and barred from access to classified material for three years.

Report Details Archives Theft By Ex-Adviser (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser to President Bill Clinton, went to such lengths to conceal his theft of classified material from the National Archives that he hid some of the documents under a trailer at a construction site, according to a government report released Wednesday.

The report, prepared by the National Archives inspector general, provided new details about an episode that caused a brief stir in the 2004 presidential campaign and led to a guilty plea to a misdemeanor charge by Mr. Berger a year later.

In 2003, Mr. Berger spent several days at the National Archives reviewing classified material as the Clinton administration's designated liaison to the Sept. 11 commission. He later admitted that he took and destroyed several versions of a classified report prepared in 2000 on the so-called millennium terrorist plots, although the commission had copies of the same reports.

The report on Wednesday disclosed that during a visit to the National Archives in October 2003, Mr. Berger removed four versions of the 2000 report and took them with him when he left the building for a walk after dark.

"He was aware of the risk he was taking," the report said, and "he did not want to run the risk of bringing the documents back in the building," where he might be detected. So he found a nearby construction site and, slid the documents under a trailer. He later returned to the construction site, retrieved the documents and later destroyed some of them. Several days later, archives staff members confronted him.

Still unresolved in the inspector general's report is one lingering mystery in the episode: Whether, as Mr. Berger's critics have charged, he was so cavalier as to stuff classified documents in his socks.

The report said one witness at the archives saw Mr. Berger bending down and "fiddling with something white, which could have been paper, around his ankle." But Mr. Berger denied he had ever stuffed documents in his socks, explaining the episode by saying that "his shoes frequently come untied and his socks frequently fall down."

When the episode first became public, in 2004, Mr. Berger was forced to step down as an adviser to Senator John Kerry's presidential campaign. In 2005, he agreed to plead guilty to unauthorized removal of classified documents. He was fined $50,000 but received no jail time.

Mr. Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said Wednesday that his client considered the matter closed and was seeking to move on.

Berger Hid Archives Papers Under A Trailer, Probe Shows (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

On the evening of Oct. 2, 2003, former White House national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger stashed highly classified documents he had taken from the National Archives beneath a construction trailer at the corner of Ninth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW so he could surreptitiously retrieve them later and take them to his office, according to a newly disclosed government investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0108284

The documents he took detailed how the Clinton administration had responded to the threat of terrorist attacks at the end of 1999. Berger removed a total of five copies of the same document without authorization and later used scissors to destroy three before placing them in his office trash, the National Archives inspector general concluded in a Nov. 4, 2005, report.

After archives officials accused him of taking the documents, Berger told investigators, he "tried to find the trash collector but had no luck." But instead of admitting he had removed them deliberately -- by stuffing them in his suit pockets on multiple occasions -- Berger initially said he had removed them by mistake.

The fact that Berger, one of President Bill Clinton's closest aides from 1997 to 2001, illicitly removed the documents is well-known: A federal judge in September 2005 ordered him to pay a $50,000 fine for his actions and forfeit his security clearance for three years.

What Berger did, and the ham-handed and comical methods by which he did it, are freshly detailed in the National Archives report, which the Associated Press obtained first under a Freedom of Information Act request.

Although the report reiterates that Berger's main motive was to prepare himself for testifying before a commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks, it makes clear that he not only sought to study the documents but also destroyed some copies and -- when initially confronted -- denied he had done so.

His lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said in a statement yesterday that Berger "considers this matter closed, and he is pleased to have moved on." Berger is a principal with Stonebridge International, a consultant to large energy firms that recently opened an office in China.

In the statement, Breuer emphasized that the Justice Department concluded that other copies of the documents at issue existed and that they were provided to the Sept. 11 commission. He also said the Justice Department affirmed that Berger had no intent to hide the contents.

Berger made four visits to the Archives to inspect Clinton administration records in 2003. The inspector general's office attempted to retrieve the missing documents and probed how the archives handled each of his visits. In its report, the office criticized the fact that Berger was given special treatment and also said the archives' investigation of his actions was "improper" because the FBI and Justice Department were not promptly informed.

The report states that in 2003, an official whose name was deleted informed the White House that the documents Berger reviewed during his first two visits -- in May and June of that year -- were so poorly organized and tracked that the archives "would never know what if any original documents were missing." Berger has said he removed nothing during those visits, and a source close to him said last night that no one had accused him of doing so.

In September and October, Berger was able to sneak papers -- slight variations of a report titled "Millennium Alert After Action Review," which looked at U.S. vulnerabilities to terrorists, as well as the notes he took from other classified documents -- into his pockets, the report said, because an unnamed senior official left the room while Berger made or took phone calls.

Although one archives official claimed to have seen Berger fiddling with what appeared to be a piece of paper "rolled around his ankle and underneath his pant leg," Berger told investigators he was merely pulling up his socks, which he said "frequently fall down." He said "this story was absurd and embarrassing."

Berger said that after spending hours at the archives on Oct. 2, he took a walk outside past a construction fence to leave four classified copies of the millennium document beneath a trailer. He later explained that he needed to return to the building for several additional hours of work and was worried that guards would see the documents bulging in his suit.

Berger got caught partly because suspicious archives employees secretly numbered the millennium document copies they showed him in October. When an official challenged him by telephone on Oct. 4, he turned over two copies of the millennium document that he said he had accidentally kept.

Berger Took Papers To A Hiding Place (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

Former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger, fined $50,000 for taking classified documents from the National Archives, hid the papers under a construction trailer where they later could easily be retrieved, a report yesterday said.

The National Archives Office of Inspector General said that during a 2003 visit to the facility, Mr. Berger left the building unescorted for a break, during which time he "placed the documents under a trailer in an accessible construction area outside Archives 1 (the main Archives building)."

The report said Mr. Berger acknowledged that he later retrieved the documents from the construction area and brought them to his office.

Mr. Berger, who served as national security adviser under President Clinton from 1997 to 2000, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material. The material included documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats in the United States during the 2000 New Year's celebration.

He was fined $50,000 by a federal judge, ordered to perform 100 hours of community service and barred from access to classified material for three years. The top Clinton adviser had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement in the case reduced the fine and kept him out of jail.

The removal occurred while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission investigating intelligence and security failures, raising questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

Mr. Berger, with authorization from Mr. Clinton, also was reviewing National Security Council documents on Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda, Sudan and related presidential correspondence to prepare for testimony before the House and Senate intelligence committees.

In his televised testimony to the September 11 commission, Mr. Berger said the Clinton administration's "sustained attention" to terrorist threats and "rigorous actions" had foiled a terrorist threat in December 1999 to bomb airports in the United States.

But Attorney General John Ashcroft told the commission that he saw some of the documents that had turned up missing from the Archives and that the plot was stopped with "luck playing a major role."

During his sentencing in September, Mr. Berger told the court that he let "considerations of personal convenience override clear rules of handling classified material."

"In this case, I failed. I will not again," he said.

The inspector general's report, first made public by the Associated Press, said that when Archives employees first suspected Mr. Berger was removing classified documents, they failed to notify any law-enforcement agency. It also said Archives employees did not feel that there was enough information to confront someone of Mr. Berger's stature.

The report said Mr. Berger removed four documents from the facility.

The government charged that Mr. Berger "knowingly removed classified documents from the National Archives and Records Administration and stored and retained such documents at places," including his office in the District.

Mr. Berger initially claimed he took the documents as the result of an "honest mistake," but later admitted that he placed the classified records in his pants and jacket and put other classified documents in a leather portfolio.

In October, several top House Republicans asked for an investigation and committee hearings to determine which documents were "destroyed, removed or are missing" as a result of Mr. Berger's admitted theft.

In a letter to the House Government Reform Committee, the lawmakers asked Chairman Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, to investigate whether there was criminal misconduct in the removal of the classified documents by the Clinton administration official.

Democrats will assume control of Congress next month, and the request for an investigation is expected to be shelved.

Bush Links Minimum Wage To Tax Break (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush endorsed one of the Democrats' top priorities for the new Congress, a $2.10-an-hour minimum wage increase — and on a faster timetable than they have proposed.

But his support comes with a catch.

Bush said at a Wednesday news conference that any pay hike should be accompanied by tax and regulatory relief for small businesses, potentially a tough sell for Democrats, who are about to reassume control of the House and Senate.

"Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase," responded Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts, who has said that boosting the federal minimum wage will be his chief goal when he takes over as chairman of the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor and Pensions. "We need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible."

The president brought up the issue unprompted during the White House news conference that was dominated by Iraq but veered into domestic issues as well.

Eager to show he heard the message of voters who stripped his party of majorities in both the House and Senate in the November elections, Bush said he'll work hard on what he called "an interesting new challenge" — trying to find common ground with Democrats who will lead Congress for the first time in his presidency.

"I don't expect Democratic leaders to compromise on their principles, and they don't expect me to compromise on mine," he said. "But the American people do expect us to compromise on legislation that will benefit the country."

He said initial consultations with incoming Democratic leaders revealed openings for cooperation in several areas. One was an immigration policy overhaul, including a way for some illegal workers to move toward citizenship. That was stymied this year primarily by conservative Republicans who favored a get-tough-only approach.

Other openings Bush saw for cooperation were increased federal spending on alternate energy sources; reform of Congress' appropriations process that has made it common for lawmakers to slip pet projects into spending bills, and giving American workers new skills and businesses help investing in new innovations.

Despite Washington's changed political reality, Bush also did not shy away from issues that have less chance of being well-received by Democrats, who have felt ignored for the first six years of the president's tenure.

He said he wants to work on the looming insolvency of the Social Security program. But his one-time plan to add private accounts to the system, once the highest domestic priority of his administration, is considered dead by Democrats. Bush is sending Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. to the Hill to gather ideas on how to restructure Social Security.

Bush also said he wants lawmakers to approve new trade deals. But Democrats have said they will insist bilateral trade agreements include tougher labor and environmental standards.

On other topics:

_Bush was asked about the pregnancy of Mary Cheney, Vice President Dick Cheney's openly gay daughter, in light of his previous statements that a child ideally should be raised by in a family headed by a married father and mother.

The president said "we ought to review law to make sure that people are treated fairly" but didn't provide specifics. Neither he nor his questioner referred to Cheney's partner, Heather Poe.

_The president said he first learned from a newspaper story Wednesday that the vice president will be called to testify in the CIA leak case on behalf of his former chief of staff. Defense attorneys for I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, charged with perjury and obstruction, would not say whether Cheney was being subpoenaed — a potential separation-of-powers issue — but said they do not expect the vice president to resist.

"It's an interesting piece of news. And that's all I'm going to comment about an ongoing case," Bush said.

Raising the minimum wage from $5.15 to $7.25 over three years is at the top of Democratic leaders' early to-do list for next year.

GOP-crafted legislation earlier this year combined an increase with a cut in inheritance taxes on multimillion-dollar estates and the resurrection of a number of popular tax breaks, but that combination did not get through the Republican-controlled Congress.

Bush said he supports a $2.10 raise for minimum-wage earners, but over a two-year period instead of three, and added that "we should do it in a way that does not punish" small businesses.

"I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief, to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing," he said.

Bush resisted any attempt to judge his presidency two years before it expires.

"I'm going to sprint to the finish. And we can get a lot done," he said. "I'm reading about George Washington still. My attitude is if they're still analyzing Number One, 43 ought not to worry about it, and just do what he think is right, and make the tough choices necessary."

Minimum-wage Battle May Be Brewing (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — During his news conference Wednesday, President Bush said he was optimistic about working on a range of issues with the Democrats who will lead Congress in January. He said he supported a $2.10 increase in the federal minimum wage, which is $5.15 an hour — a proposal that is a top priority for Democrats. But Bush said he wanted to pair the increase with a cut in taxes and regulations to make it less costly for small businesses.

Efforts to link a hike in the minimum wage to tax cuts have repeatedly failed during Bush's time in office, despite Republican control of Congress.

Democrats have objected to linking the wage increase to tax cuts, and Drew Hammill, a spokesman for incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), said she was not interested in such an arrangement. But shortly afterward, Hammill altered his response. He said that Pelosi preferred a bill unencumbered by tax cuts but that "House Democrats have long supported tax changes that would benefit small business" and would look at such proposals.

Still, there is strong opposition to the idea among Democrats.

"Given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum-wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small-business sector," said Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), incoming chairman of the House Education and Workforce Committee. "More than half the states already have laws setting their own minimum wages above $5.15 per hour."

Signaling a potentially difficult domestic policy road, the president said that in addition to the minimum wage, he hoped to work with Democrats on overhauling Social Security and Medicare — two issues that have defied such efforts for years.

Bush also said he would work with Democrats to pass free-trade agreements and a comprehensive rewriting of immigration laws, and to end the practice of "earmarking," in which lawmakers pepper broad spending bills with pet projects for districts.

Minimum-Wage Deal As Bellwether (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush signaled support for raising the federal minimum wage, suggesting the White House is looking for an early deal with Democrats on one of their priorities next year.

Still, Mr. Bush's insistence on tax breaks and regulatory relief for small business sets up a test that could determine the tenor of relations between the White House and Congress's new leaders for the rest of his term.

Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi and House Democrats plan to pass an increase in the minimum wage in their first 100 hours of work next year. Other priorities include repealing tax breaks for big oil companies, allowing Medicare to negotiate with drug companies for lower prices and cutting interest rates on student loans.

Democrats hope to build enough momentum to move the provisions through the Senate and force Mr. Bush to accept them as they are. A coalition called "Change America Now," involving about 40 liberal and labor groups, is organizing support this week for passing the measures in the 100-hour package into law.

It is unlikely any of those measures will become law without concessions to Republicans, however. The federal minimum wage, now $5.15 an hour, last was raised in 1997 and its purchasing power has eroded. Democrats and some Republicans have pushed for years to raise it, and Democrats' sweep in the midterm elections significantly increased prospects for doing this. Yesterday, Mr. Bush gave the effort another boost, saying he is willing to sign legislation gradually raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour.

"I support the proposed $2.10 increase in the minimum wage over a two-year period," Mr. Bush told reporters at a year-end news conference, calling it an "area where we can work together" with Democratic leaders. At another point, he said that along with education, it is a "key" area where "we've got to work together" with Democrats.

Mr. Bush's comments were his strongest to date in support of a minimum-wage increase, but he also signaled he will expect concessions for business.

"I believe we should do it in a way that does not punish the millions of small businesses that are creating most of the new jobs in our country. So I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and help keep our economy growing." He didn't provide specifics about the tax and regulatory breaks that he will seek.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass.), incoming chairman of the Senate labor committee and the minimum-wage increase's lead sponsor, was cautious in his praise for Mr. Bush's announcement, noting that "we can't slow down this important legislation with other priorities unrelated to the minimum wage."

Rep. George Miller (D., Calif.), who will head the House Education and the Workforce Committee, also opposed the conditions Mr. Bush wants to attach. "A minimum-wage increase should not and need not be conditional on other legislation or policy changes," he said in a statement.

The House Republican leader, John Boehner of Ohio, was more supportive. "It's important for Congress to ensure a minimum-wage mandate does not have a harmful effect on small employers' ability to create jobs," he said.

Mr. Boehner challenged Democrats to allow Republicans to offer similar legislation on the floor. Democrats have promised not to block debate as strictly as Republicans did when they were in charge.

Past efforts to raise the minimum wage have collapsed over Republican demands for concessions. This year, Republicans tried unsuccessfully to link the minimum wage to a deal to extend relief from the estate tax. It is being gradually eliminated under Mr. Bush's 2001 tax cuts, but returns after the breaks expire.

Mr. Bush's demands for tax and regulatory relief for small business -- as yet relatively undefined -- appear to stand a better chance of drawing Democratic support.

Mr. Bush said he and the Democratic Congress can accomplish a lot working together in the final two years of his presidency. "The truth is the American people are sick of partisanship," he said. He promised to "do my part to elevate the tone."

Bush Supports Democrats' Minimum Wage Hike Plan (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

President Bush for the first time endorsed a specific plan for raising the federal minimum wage yesterday, as he embraced Democratic calls to boost it by $2.10, to $7.25 an hour, over two years.

The president's backing greatly enhances the prospects for congressional approval next year of the first hike in the federal minimum wage since 1997. He stressed, however, that it should be accompanied by tax breaks and regulatory relief that would cushion the blow for small businesses.

"I believe we should do it in a way that does not punish the millions of small businesses that are creating most of the new jobs in our country," Bush said during a news conference. "So I support pairing it with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing."

The president's endorsement of a minimum wage increase breaks with the position long held by conservative Republicans that the increase would hurt business and ultimately the economy. But with the Democrats poised to take control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in more than a decade, Bush cited his support of the proposed increase as proof of his intent to operate in a more bipartisan manner during the remaining two years of his presidency.

Beyond increasing the minimum wage, the president said that he hopes to reach agreements with the new Congress on a guest-worker program for low-skill immigrants, renewal of the No Child Left Behind education law and measures aimed at encouraging the development of alternative fuels.

"To achieve these and other key goals, we need to put aside our partisan differences and work constructively to address the vital issues confronting our nation," Bush said.

Democrats and their supporters in organized labor responded warily to Bush's proposal to link a minimum wage hike to tax breaks for business, saying the increase should be passed on its own merits. Democratic leaders have promised to make increasing the $5.15-per-hour minimum wage one of the first orders of business when the new Congress convenes Jan. 4.

"Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase -- we need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who sponsored legislation to increase the wage that failed in Congress earlier this year.

Democrats have pledged to reinstate budget rules that would require that any tax cut be offset by equivalent tax increases or spending cuts. Some Democrats say they do not want to complicate their effort to raise the minimum wage by linking that issue to business tax breaks, as Bush and many Republicans are insisting. House Democrats will vote early next month on a stand-alone wage increase, leadership aides said.

"Let's be clear, given that nearly a decade has passed since the last minimum wage increase, no one can seriously believe that the proposed increase will harm the small-business sector," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the incoming chairman of the House Education and the Workforce Committee. "A minimum wage increase should not and need not be conditional on other legislation or policy changes."

But House Democrats concede that the situation may be different in the Senate. Earlier this year, Senate Republicans voted down a stand-alone wage hike, and Democrats may need 60 votes to break a filibuster if they try to pass a minimum wage increase without tax cuts. Senate Finance Committee aides are already looking for small-business tax breaks that the incoming committee chairman, Max Baucus (D-Mont.) wants passed regardless of minimum wage legislation.

"Senator Baucus is looking at small-business tax breaks for sure," a Baucus aide said. "Whether they're paired with minimum wage or move at another time, he intends to help small business."

White House officials, meanwhile, say they are still working to identify tax cuts they would like to see accompany a minimum wage increase.

Across the country, about 1.9 million workers earn the minimum wage or less, and economists estimate that 14.9 million other workers would benefit from an increase in the standard. When adjusted for inflation, the buying power of the minimum wage has dwindled to its lowest level since 1955, and raising the rate has become a popular issue among voters.

Twenty-eight states and the District of Columbia have established minimum wages that surpass the federal standard. In November, voters ratified ballot initiatives, often backed by coalitions including both organized labor and religious groups, to increase the minimum wage in six states.

"America's workers deserve a clean vote on a $7.25 increase, with no strings attached," AFL-CIO President John J. Sweeney said. "Such an increase helps everyone and hurts no one."

At his news conference, Bush said that, despite the power shift in Congress, he will continue to have a strong voice in domestic policy even if it means reaching across the aisle to get things done. "There's a lot of attitude here that says, 'Well, you lost the Congress. Therefore, you're not going to get anything done.' Quite the contrary," he said. "I have an interest to get things done. And the Democrat leaders have an interest to get something done to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles."

Bush Prepares To Make Deals With Democrats (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday said his top priorities for working together with Democrats in Congress will be raising the minimum wage, renewing the No Child Left Behind education act, boosting energy alternatives to oil and completing an overhaul of the immigration system that includes a guest-worker program.

On immigration, he called for a bill to be put on his desk soon, once again setting a timetable on an issue that has stymied Congress for the last two years.

And in a morning press conference the president pledged to support a $2.10 minimum wage increase over two years, the first time he has endorsed that large an increase, though he said it must be coupled with tax cuts and new regulations that will help businesses offset the costs.

The minimum wage is shaping up as the first major domestic battle next year, and a chance for Democrats to see how far they can press their advantage in Congress.

Mr. Bush said the lesson of November's congressional elections was bipartisanship.

"I don't expect Democratic leaders to compromise on their principles, and they don't expect me to compromise on mine. But the American people do expect us to compromise on legislation that will benefit the country," he said.

Mr. Bush highlighted the new dynamic at work on Capitol Hill, saying now he and the Democrats both have an interest in getting things done -- "to show that they're worthy of their leadership roles."

The president said he is willing to accept a deal with Democrats that raises the minimum wage to $7.25 as long as that doesn't hurt businesses. He said the way to protect businesses is to combine the increase "with targeted tax and regulatory relief to help these small businesses stay competitive and to help keep our economy growing."

Senate and House Republican leaders lined up behind Mr. Bush's position yesterday, with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, saying pairing tax cuts and wage increases makes sense.

But Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and the new chairman of the key committee that handles the issue, rejected that approach.

"We can't slow down this important legislation with other priorities unrelated to the minimum wage," he said. "Minimum wage workers have waited almost 10 long years for an increase -- we need to pass a clean bill giving them the raise they deserve as quickly as possible."

Mr. Kennedy has proposed increasing the wage rate from $5.15 to $7.25 over a little more than two years, with the first 75-cent increase coming 60 days after the bill passes.

Mr. Bush did not say what taxes or regulatory changes he wants included in the bill.

In the past he has supported smaller minimum-wage increases that were tied in one case to research and development and estate-tax-cut provisions, and in another instance were tied to flex-time provisions that would have changed the rules for overtime pay.

Democrats opposed both of those alternatives, insisting on a clean increase.

It is not clear whether the election broke that logjam, especially given the possibility Republicans in the Senate might filibuster a bill that contains only wage increases with no sweeteners for businesses.

The president tried to strike a bipartisan tone on both domestic and international issues, promising to listen to Democrats as he plots a course in Iraq and to "do my part to elevate the tone" in Washington.

"I'm looking forward to working with them. It's going to be an interesting new challenge," Mr. Bush said, pointing out that he worked well with Democrats in the state legislature when he was governor of Texas.

On immigration, Mr. Bush said, "I strongly believe that we can and must get a comprehensive immigration plan on my desk this year." With Congress recessed until after the new year, it is certain he meant 2007.

The president repeated his call for a guest-worker program to handle future foreign workers, which he said is critical to reducing the flow of illegal aliens.

He also said energy policy is a prime spot for cooperation with Democrats.

"There is a consensus that we need to move forward with continued research on alternative forms of energy," he said.

Bush Signs Massive Tax And Trade Bill (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0108290

President Bush revived some 20 tax breaks, extended trade benefits for developing countries and protected doctors from a big cut in Medicare payments by signing sweeping tax and trade legislation Wednesday.

The bill is a patchwork of must-do items that were left for the lame duck Congress. It was bundled together and passed by the House and Senate just before adjourning earlier this month.

"This is a good piece of pro-growth legislation," said Bush, just before putting his signature to the legislation at a White House ceremony.

Republican budget hawks bridled at the measure's approximately $40 billion price tag, and textile state senators objected to trade provisions benefiting Haiti.

The bill would:

_Extend through the end of next year a deduction for research and development initiatives.

_Renew a deduction of up to $4,000 for higher education costs.

_Give tax breaks for teachers who pay for supplies out of their own pockets.

_Let taxpayers deduct state and local sales taxes instead of state and local income taxes, a provision that primarily benefits those in states with no income taxes.

_Open up 8.3 million acres in the Gulf of Mexico to oil and gas drilling, and offer a dozen credits promoting alternative and efficient uses of energy.

_Prevent a 5 percent cut in Medicare payments to doctors from taking effect on Jan. 1.

_Renew, with increased federal contributions, a program to help clean up abandoned coal mines and provide health care for miners who worked for companies that have gone out of business.

_Permanently normalize trade with Vietnam and extend trade benefits for four Andean nations, sub-Saharan African countries and Haiti.

Bush also signed a bill to upgrade and modernize the nation's tsunami warning system, nearly two years after an Indian Ocean tsunami killed some 230,000 people in a dozen countries.

Approved by Congress earlier this month, the legislation is intended to bolster the tsunami detection and warning system in the Pacific Ocean, as well as expand it to any area in the Atlantic and Caribbean considered at risk by federal officials.

Congress Closes With A Pork-filled Flourish (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Walter F. Roche Jr.

WASHINGTON — Christmas arrived Wednesday for the kidney dialysis industry.

That's when President Bush signed into law the last major piece of legislation approved by the outgoing Congress. It was a lavish hodgepodge that included a $100 million-a-year boost in the Medicare reimbursement rates for dialysis providers who proved to be generous contributors to important legislators, notably House Ways and Means Chairman Bill Thomas of Bakersfield.

The dialysis folks were among many special interests benefiting from a piece of legislation that was designed to simply extend existing tax cuts and credits — but ended up freighted with billions of dollars in new spending earmarks for the coal industry, Brooks Brothers and various other interests.

There have been more outrageous end-of-session bills, but following this election — when corruption and fiscal incompetence were campaign themes — some lawmakers found the latest package particularly offensive.

Senate Budget Committee Chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) termed the legislative spectacle "embarrassing." He offered a scathing review of the final bill on the Senate floor, citing its myriad earmarks and other expenditures that had never been reviewed by a congressional committee or subjected to debate.

His statement covered the big-ticket items: a budgetary sleight of hand that blocked a planned 5% reduction in Medicare fees to doctors, a top priority of the powerful American Medical Assn.; the insertion of a rum excise tax shift that benefits Puerto Rico; and the addition of a $35-million earmark to fund a healthcare program in Tennessee.

Gregg reserved special scorn for a $4.9-billion item requested by coal-state senators for health and mine-safety spending. The lawmakers said such spending was necessary because some coal companies had not fulfilled healthcare responsibilities to miners and because abandoned mines remained a serious problem in coal country.

Even Brooks Brothers, an upscale clothing purveyor, walked away a winner. The company was part of a coalition that won about $32 million in refunds of tariffs that it said had penalized the declining domestic shirt-manufacturing industry. The measure also aids domestic cotton growers, many of which are in California.

A Brooks Brothers vice president, Joe Dixon, said the company sought the tariff relief to "save clothing manufacturing jobs in Pennsylvania and North Carolina." The refunds, he said, would make it possible for Brooks Brothers and other U.S. shirt-makers to better modernize plants and compete with foreign manufacturers.

The watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense called the cotton measure "another example of special interests grabbing on to the last train leaving the station…. Obviously Congress didn't think enough of this proposal to pass it on its own during the past two years."

The dialysis earmark, like other nuggets in the bill, had not been authorized by a congressional committee, and its addition to the tax bill was made final in a secret middle-of-the-night meeting in the waning hours of the session on Dec. 7.

Dialysis scored "not because dialysis patients have the most meritorious case," said Sara Rosenbaum, professor of health law and policy at George Washington University, but because the industry is "effective on Capitol Hill."

One example: House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Thomas got $84,250 in donations during the last campaign cycle from DaVita Inc., a leading dialysis company. Thomas was among the negotiators at the late-night meeting who agreed on the dialysis earmark.

Thomas' former chief of staff, Cathy Abernathy, lobbies on DaVita's behalf.

After decades of working for Thomas, Abernathy has built a multimillion-dollar lobbying business focused on healthcare clients, including a coalition of dialysis providers, patients and manufacturers.

DaVita paid Abernathy fees of $20,000, part of the $1.14 million the company reported spending on federal lobbying in the first half of this year. Until recently, Abernathy was also a registered lobbyist for Kidney Care Partners, a nonprofit group representing patients, manufacturers and providers that has been chaired by DaVita's chief executive.

Tucked away in a Senate conference room with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), Sens. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa) and Max Baucus (D-Mont.), and other leaders, Thomas led the charge for the dialysis coalition's proposals, according to a staffer who attended. Thomas recommended not only raising Medicare reimbursements for the dialysis industry but also including an automatic inflation adjustment. He also pushed for incentive bonuses for good healthcare results.

In the end, the negotiators agreed only to a one-time 1.6% increase in the Medicare reimbursement rate for dialysis, which will cost taxpayers $400 million over five years, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

Thomas' staff and DaVita officials said the campaign contributions and the congressman's ties to Abernathy played no role in his championing of the dialysis cause.

"Bill Thomas makes policy decisions based on the merits of policy, not on campaign contributions," said Rob Vanden Heuvel, spokesman for the ways and means committee.

LeAnne Zumwalt, a DaVita vice president, said effective lobbying was important for the dialysis coalition.

"Dialysis is the only Medicare program without an annual update for inflation," Zumwalt said, noting that increased funding had earned support across both parties and houses of Congress.

DaVita executives called the final decision "a step in the right direction."

The company had also sent contributions to other lawmakers who participated in the secret conference, including the only Democratic lawmaker in the room, Baucus, who received $22,000 from DaVita this cycle, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

A Baucus aide said the Montana senator supported a rate hike because of his concerns about the financial stability of dialysis facilities in his home state. Baucus and other lawmakers also noted that an outside bipartisan advisory panel had recommended increasing the rate by twice the congressionally approved amount.

However, Rosenbaum said that the Medicare payment advisory panel made "tons of recommendations all the time" and that other worthy providers — such as community clinics serving the poor — were often overlooked.

Other factors, such as lobbying and the nature of last-minute legislation, explain more powerfully the willingness of Congress to legislate a rate increase for one group of healthcare providers, she said.

FEDERAL DIARY: Price Caps At The Old Stamping Ground (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, December 21, 2006

For almost 12 years, Rep. John M. McHugh (R-N.Y.) has championed legislation to overhaul the U.S. Postal Service. It has been a long and sometimes lonely journey.

McHugh has worked to balance the competing interests of postal management, postal competitors, unions and companies, including Hallmark Cards, L.L. Bean and American Express, that rely on the post office.

Yesterday, he was among a small group from Capitol Hill that saw President Bush sign the Postal Accountability and Enhancement Act, the first change to the Postal Service since President Richard M. Nixon agreed to replace the old Post Office Department with a self-sustaining government corporation.

Thirty-six years ago, of course, the communications landscape was different. The Internet was an infant at the Defense Department, FedEx had not started operations and the United Parcel Service had a smaller market share than it does today.

Concerned that the post office might not be able to continue universal service at reasonable postage rates, McHugh in 1995 began his effort to update the Postal Service's business operations and create a less cumbersome system for setting postal rates. In June 1996, he introduced his first bill to revamp postal laws.

McHugh called the new law "a major achievement," and said it will provide the Postal Service with "the tools to both act and compete as a modern business."

The public, for the most part, will see no change in its dealings with the post office. But stamp prices will probably go up once or twice in the next year. The Postal Service has a request pending to raise first-class postage by 3 cents, to 42 cents, probably in May. Under the new law, the Postal Service can seek one more increase, no later than Dec. 20 next year, before new rules take effect.

The law offers some hope that subsequent increases in postage will be more predictable, especially for letters, magazines and advertising mail. For 10 years, the Postal Service will operate under a price cap that keeps it from raising postage prices above inflation. After that trial run, postal officials and regulators will review the effectiveness of the price cap to see if it should be modified.

The law imposes no price cap on "competitive products," such as Express Mail and Priority Mail. Those rates will be set by the postal board of governors, which will be guided by new regulations developed at the Postal Regulatory Commission (a new name for the Postal Rate Commission). The commission has 18 months to develop the regulations.

In an interview, Postmaster General John E. Potter said some parts of the law will take as long as three years to implement and that changes to postal service standards could take longer.

William Burrus, president of the American Postal Workers Union and a steady critic of the new law, has told his union members that the price cap will make it more difficult to bargain for higher salaries. "This limit on rate increases -- without regard to the actual costs the Postal Service incurs -- will result in an artificial cap on postal workers' wages," he said.

But Potter said the Postal Service plans to continue offering "wages that are comparable to the private sector. The goal here is not to harm postal employees."

The new law shifts responsibility for military pensions earned by postal workers to the Treasury Department, as is the practice for federal agencies. The law also redirects money set aside for postal retirement costs to a new trust fund that will finance retiree health benefits. Potter estimated that about $90 billion will be placed in the trust fund.

Although McHugh pushed the longest and hardest for postal overhaul, others in Congress played key roles in pulling together a compromise acceptable to the White House. Sens. Susan Collins (R-Maine) and Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.) and Reps. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) brokered the final bill, which passed in the hours before Congress adjourned for the year.

On the House floor, McHugh told colleagues, "If there is any truth in the old adage that anything worth having is worth waiting for, this is a very, very good night."Boost for Health Accounts

Federal employees and retirees will be able to take advantage of a tax law signed by the president yesterday and increase the amount of money they contribute to health savings accounts, the Office of Personnel Management announced.

Employees who had a 2006 flexible spending account also will have an opportunity to enroll in a high-deductible health plan with a savings account for 2007, the OPM said. They may roll over any used money in their FSA to their new health spending account.

Belated enrollments in a high-deductible plan and the transfer of FSA funds must be completed by midnight Dec. 31, the OPM said. In 2007, the maximum health savings contribution is $2,850 for an individual and $5,650 for a family, the OPM said. Previously, health savings contributions were limited to the amount of a person's deductible.

Bush OKs Billions To Clean Up Coal Mines (AP)

By Kimberly Hefling

AP, December 21, 2006

President Bush signed legislation Wednesday that gives billions of dollars to coal-producing states to clean up hazardous abandoned coal mines and pay for health care for retired miners.

His signature ends a long fight that has pitted coal-producing states against each other over the best use of funds collected for the nation's coal mine reclamation program.

Coal-producing states will get an estimated $6.3 billion for abandoned mine cleanup and another $1.6 billion to pay for health care for retired miners who worked for coal companies that no longer exist, according to the federal Office of Surface Mining. The money will be distributed from 2007 to 2025.

The bill, part of a sweeping tax bill, renews the abandoned mines land reclamation program that was created in 1977.

Particularly in eastern coalfields, toxins from abandoned mines pollute streams. The unstable land from the abandoned mines has been blamed for fatal accidents by ATV riders and hikers — in Pennsylvania 24 deaths were reported last year on abandoned mine land. Mines sometimes catch fire and burn for years.

The program is based on a per-ton fee that coal companies pay into a fund. The bill makes spending for the reclamation program mandatory, which means it would not be controlled through the annual congressional appropriations process.

"This will provide us long term stability and continuity," said Ben Owens, a spokesman for the Office of Surface Mining, which oversees mine reclamation.

Since the program's creation, much of the nation's mining has shifted from states in the east like Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Kentucky to those in the west, like Wyoming.

The western states have not struggled as much with abandoned mine restoration issues because much of the mining has been done with more modern techniques.

The historic coal mining states have complained that Wyoming uses its abandoned mine land fund for public works. The western states, in turn, have complained of bearing the burden of funding the program.

The legislation signed Wednesday lowers the fees paid into the program and modifies the formula so that historic coal mining states with the more serious problems get a higher stake of the money.

It was supported by a coalition of the coal industry, coalfield communities, environmental conservation organizations, sportsmen and mine workers, according to a joint statement from Pennsylvania Sens. Rick Santorum and Arlen Specter.

New Congress To Toughen Oversight (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

With little prospect of funding bold spending initiatives, Democrats poised to take control of the 110th Congress are reviving the ability to investigate the executive branch.

With more workdays in Washington and the creation of subcommittees charged exclusively with investigation, Democratic leaders and new committee chairs aim to jump-start oversight on issues ranging from the Iraq war to homeland security and consumer protection.

But in a consistent disclaimer, they say the new probes will not be motivated by a spirit of revenge. And they will be conducted, to the extent possible, on a bipartisan basis.

This approach, Democrats say, rejects the example of Rep. Dan Burton (R) of Indiana, who, as chair of the House Government Reform Committee, paved the Clinton presidency with subpoenas. As early as May 2006, Nancy Pelosi also denied speculation that Democrats would try to impeach the president.

Democrats say they will not use their new powers to conduct a witch hunt on the Bush presidency, and will take a more careful tack instead. Time: key resource for investigations

To give committees the time for thorough investigations, Democrats say they will move to a five-day workweek on Capitol Hill. In contrast, under Republican control, the typical House workweek lasted from Tuesday evening to Thursday afternoon.

"We are going to provide the time for committees to do oversight of the executive department and of the way the people's money is being spent and the effectiveness of the policy implementation of the president," said House majority leader Steny Hoyer.

But that time - and the eagerness of new committee chairs - also poses dilemmas for the new Democratic leadership over how to aggressively question administration officials, without distracting them from their work fighting wars and securing the homeland.

"The problem is not that any one committee or subcommittee will suffer an excessive zeal of investigation. The problem is there is so much of it. And so much of it is directed at Iraq that it might become a distraction to people whose job it is to fight the war," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N.J.

Even if no one committee chair takes on the scope of investigation that occurred during former GOP Sen. Joseph McCarthy's assault on alleged communists in government, the volume of appearances before congressional committees for key administration officials could have a demoralizing impact. On the war

In the new Congress, some of the most powerful critics of the Bush administration's conduct during the Iraq war will move into committee chairmanships.

Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, who opposed the decision to go into Iraq, is developing hearings on a phased withdrawal of forces from Iraq. In June, Senator Levin and Sen. Jack Reed (D) of Rhode Island proposed a non-binding amendment calling for US forces to begin a phrased withdrawal from Iraq in 2006. He is also planning probes into waste and abuse in contracting.

On the House side, Rep. Ike Skelton (D) of Missouri, has set as a top priority for the House Armed Services committee the "fixing of US forces." "They're stretched and strained, and I'm convinced the Army and the Marines are near the breaking point," he said in a press briefing on Tuesday.

As chairman, he is also opposing any move to send 20,000 to 30,000 more forces into Iraq, a move he says will only "exacerbate the situation."

But both new chairmen say they are not prepared to resort to the ultimate congressional sanction on a commander-in-chief with whom they disagree: to cut off funding for the war.

Instead, Skelton is reviving his panel's Oversight Investigations Subcommittee, which was axed by Republicans when they took over control of the House in 1995. The new panel, he says, will focus on asking "the tough questions: Why did this happen? Why did you make a decision to do this or that?"

"That does influence behavior," he says. "It's a very solid tool that Congress has not been using." On homeland security

With control of the Senate capable of flipping with a single senator, few members have as much independence as Sen. Joseph Lieberman (D) of Connecticut, the new chairman of the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee.

After losing the Democratic primary, Senator Lieberman won as an independent. He enjoys an unusually strong working relationship with the outgoing chairman, Sen. Susan Collins (R) of Maine. Together, they pushed for the creation of the 9/11 Commission. In the new Congress, the committee will first take up new legislation to implement some of the remaining 9/11 recommendations and to review those that were not implemented well.

"Not enough oversight has taken place of the Department of Homeland Security. This is a relatively new organization, but faces a multitude of management challenges. The senator will be very closely focusing on how the different agencies within DHS integrate with each other," says Lieberman spokeswoman Leslie Phillips.

Other issues that are likely to come up early on include the level of preparedness for a bioterrorist attack.

While the Republican-led Congress issued not one subpoena, Democrats say they will use that power more aggressively. Senators Lieberman and Collins disagreed over whether subpoenas should be issued over the federal government's response to hurricane Katrina. The next time such an issue comes up, he makes the call.

Despite a strong recommendation from the 9/11 Commission that Congress drastically streamline its oversight for intelligence - leaders of the Department of Homeland Security now appear before 88 committees and subcommittees, the panel reported - neither the House nor the Senate is prepared to take up the turf battles necessary to change this.

But citing recommendations of the 9/11 panel, House Democrats are proposing a new Select Intelligence Oversight Panel within the House Appropriations Committee. It's a move they say will "strengthen the oversight process" by considering intelligence funding from the combined perspective of the Appropriations and Intelligence Committees. On the economy

Democrats have lined up some of their sharpest investigators on panels relating to the economy. The incoming chair of the Government Reform Committee, Rep. Henry Waxman (D) of California directed landmark hearings on the tobacco industry and, more recently, produced his own investigations on no-bid contracts in Iraq. He has also peppered the Bush administration with questions on its response to hurricane Katrina and the cost of prescription drugs.

Aides say he has yet to set priorities for the 110th Congress, but is ideally positioned to develop probes on all these fronts. Waxman says he prefers to avoid subpoenas, and that voluntary appearances are better.

As chair of the House Banking Committee, Rep. Barney Frank (D) of Massachusetts is moving consumer protection back onto the legislative agenda. Look for hearings on issues such as predatory lending and data privacy. But in a forum on Dec. 11, he cautioned that "excessive regulation or ineffective regulation is bad for regulation. The market does need some corrections, but if you overdo it, then you weaken your case, he said.

Va. Congressman Fears Election Of 'Many More Muslims' To Office (AP)

WASHINGTON -- Responding to constituent e-mails about Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in, a Virginia congressman warned that "many more Muslims" will be elected demanding to use the Quran unless immigration is tightened.

Rep. Virgil Goode, R-Va., made the comments in a letter sent to hundreds of constituents about Ellison, D-Minn., the first Muslim elected to Congress. The letter triggered angry responses from a New Jersey congressman and an Islamic civil rights group.

In the letter, Goode wrote, "The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

Goode said the U.S. needs to stop illegal immigration "totally" and reduce legal immigration.

Goode added: "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college. He did not return telephone messages left Wednesday.

Meanwhile, Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr., D-N.J., wrote to Goode saying he was "greatly disappointed and in fact startled" by Goode's letter.

"I take your remarks as personally offensive to the large community of Muslim-Americans I represent in the Eighth District of New Jersey," Pascrell wrote. "... Muslim-Americans do not threaten our American values and traditions, in fact they only add to them."

And the Council on American-Islamic Relations called on Goode to apologize.

"Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," said CAIR's national legislative director, Corey Saylor. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Goode spokesman Linwood Duncan said no apology was forthcoming.

"The only statement the congressman has is that he stands by the letter," Duncan said.

The letter was made public by John Cruickshank, the chairman of the Piedmont group of the Sierra Club in central Virginia, who had received it after writing to Goode about environmental issues. Duncan said Goode's office had sent the letter to Cruickshank by mistake.

Cruickshank said he was "deeply offended" by the letter.

"I felt like other people needed to know about it," he said.

Ellison's decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing in next month has generated heated controversy. Conservative talk radio host Dennis Prager has criticized Ellison for it, prompting CAIR to call on Prager's removal from the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum board.

Va. Lawmaker's Remarks On Muslims Criticized (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. (R-Va.) is coming under sharp criticism for lashing out against the decision by Keith Ellison (D-Minn.), who will become the first Muslim member of Congress next month, to use the Koran during a swearing-in ceremony.

In a recent letter to constituents, Goode, a five-term congressman from Rocky Mount, wrote that he does "not subscribe to using the Koran in any way" and added: "The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration, there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations condemned Goode's remarks and called on him to apologize.

"Congressman Goode's ignorant and divisive statements are an affront to Muslims in his district and to Americans of all faiths who believe in our nation's longstanding traditions of religious tolerance and diversity," said Nihad Awad, executive director of the council.

Goode wrote the letter to constituents who had e-mailed him with concerns about Ellison using the Koran, he said in a written response to questions from The Washington Post. That letter was obtained by the C-Ville Weekly, a Charlottesville newspaper, and posted on its Web site.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy . . . allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country," Goode said in the letter. "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America."

When members of Congress are sworn in, they simply raise their right hand. In a ceremony afterward, they may take the oath of office on a Christian Bible, another religious book or no book at all.

In his written response, Goode said he will not apologize and does not see why his comments could be offensive to some Muslims. "The voters of each Congressional district select the representative that they choose to represent them, and perhaps voters in all districts will now ask prospective candidates whether they will use the Bible, the Koran, or anything else," Goode said.

Ellison, who was born in Detroit, could not be reached to comment.

Rep. William J. Pascrell Jr. (D-N.J.), who represents a congressional district with a large Muslim community, yesterday sent Goode a letter challenging his remarks.

"I was greatly disappointed and in fact startled by your recent constituent letter addressing the issue of Representative-elect Keith Ellison using a Koran for his swearing-in ceremony," Pascrell said in the letter. "Your letter also wrongfully equates the issue of immigration with a fear of Muslim integration in our society. I take your remarks as personally offensive to the large community of Muslim-Americans I represent."

Congressman Criticizes Election Of Muslim (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — In a letter sent to hundreds of voters this month, Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., Republican of Virginia, warned that the recent election of the first Muslim to Congress posed a serious threat to the nation's traditional values.

Mr. Goode was referring to Keith Ellison, the Minnesota Democrat and criminal defense lawyer who converted to Islam as a college student and was elected to the House in November. Mr. Ellison's plan to use the Koran during his private swearing-in ceremony in January had outraged some Virginia voters, prompting Mr. Goode to issue a written response to them, a spokesman for Mr. Goode said.

In his letter, which was dated Dec. 5, Mr. Goode said that Americans needed to "wake up" or else there would "likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped," said Mr. Goode, who vowed to use the Bible when taking his own oath of office.

Mr. Goode declined Wednesday to comment on his letter, which quickly stirred a furor among some Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans, who accused him of bigotry and intolerance.

They noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts. The use of the Bible or Koran occurs only in private ceremonial events that take place after lawmakers have officially sworn to uphold the Constitution.

Mr. Ellison dismissed Mr. Goode's comments, saying they seemed ill informed about his personal origins as well as about Constitutional protections of religious freedom. "I'm not an immigrant," added Mr. Ellison, who traces his American ancestors back to 1742. "I'm an African-American."

Since the November election, Mr. Ellison said, he has received hostile phone calls and e-mail messages along with some death threats. But in an interview on Wednesday, he emphasized that members of Congress and ordinary citizens had been overwhelmingly supportive and said he was focusing on setting up his Congressional office, getting phone lines hooked up and staff members hired, not on negative comments.

"I'm not a religious scholar, I'm a politician, and I do what politicians do, which is hopefully pass legislation to help the nation," said Mr. Ellison, who said he planned to focus on secular issues like increasing the federal minimum wage and getting health insurance for the uninsured.

"I'm looking forward to making friends with Representative Goode, or at least getting to know him," Mr. Ellison said, speaking by telephone from Minneapolis. "I want to let him know that there's nothing to fear. The fact that there are many different faiths, many different colors and many different cultures in America is a great strength."

In Washington, Brendan Daly, a spokesman for the incoming House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, called Mr. Goode's letter "offensive." Corey Saylor, legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, criticized what he described as Mr. Goode's "message of intolerance."

Representative Bill Pascrell Jr., Democrat of New Jersey, urged Mr. Goode to reach out to Muslims in Virginia and learn "to dispel misconceptions instead of promoting them."

"Keith Ellison serves as a great example of Muslim Americans in our nation, and he does not have to answer to you, to me or anyone else in regards to questions about his faith," said Mr. Pascrell, whose district includes many Arab-Americans.

The fracas over Mr. Ellison's decision to use the Koran during his personal swearing-in ceremony began last month when Dennis Prager, a conservative columnist and radio host, condemned the decision as one that would undermine American civilization.

"Ellison's doing so will embolden Islamic extremists and make new ones, as Islamists, rightly or wrongly, see the first sign of the realization of their greatest goal — the Islamicization of America," said Mr. Prager, who said the Bible was the only relevant religious text in the United States.

"If you are incapable of taking an oath on that book, don't serve in Congress," Mr. Prager said.

In his letter, Mr. Goode echoed that view, saying that he did not "subscribe to using the Koran in any way." He also called for ending illegal immigration and reducing legal immigration.

Linwood Duncan, a spokesman for Mr. Goode, said the Virginia lawmaker had no intention of backing down, despite the furor.

"He stands by the letter," Mr. Duncan said. "He has no intention of apologizing."

Lawmaker Sees Muslims As Threat (MINNST)

By Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - A Muslim group is asking Virginia Republican Rep. Virgil Goode Jr. to apologize after he told hundreds of his constituents that more Muslims will follow Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, D-Minn., to Congress if strict immigration laws are not passed.

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district, and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," Goode wrote.

The letter was written in response to constituents who contacted Goode after Ellison said he planned to bring his Qur'an with him when he takes the oath of office on Jan. 4.

In his letter, Goode said: "When I raise my hand to take the oath on Swearing In Day, I will have the Bible in my other hand. I do not subscribe to using the Koran in any way."

Goode, an attorney and former state senator who was first elected to Congress in 1996, said he wants to "stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped," Goode wrote.

Corey Saylor, national legislative director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), said Goode's "Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office."

Ellison, who will replace the retiring Democratic Rep. Martin Sabo, did not return phone calls. CAIR officials noted that Ellison traces his family roots in the United States back to 1742. He is a native of Detroit.

Saylor said Goode should apologize, and he offered to arrange a meeting with Goode and Muslims in his district.

Linwood Duncan, Goode's press secretary, said that Goode sent the letter to hundreds of constituents who contacted his office after Ellison disclosed his plans. At about the same time, the head of the local Sierra Club contacted Goode about a different issue, and the letter was accidentally sent to him in response. The Sierra Club official gave a copy of the letter to a reporter.

"The congressman is not apologizing," Duncan said. "He stands by the letter."

John Cruickshank, the Sierra Club official from Earlysville, Va., said he was "deeply offended" when he received the letter from Goode. He said he's in regular contact with Goode on environmental issues.

Goode's letter drew a response from Democratic Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. of New Jersey, who wrote a letter to Goode saying he took his remarks as "personally offensive."I have learned a great deal from the Muslim community and have made it one of my priorities to educate other Americans about the common misconceptions regarding the peaceful faith of Islam," Pascrell wrote.

"There are many valid policy questions regarding immigration that should be addressed by Congress; however, promoting a fear and disrespect of Muslims is not only wrongheaded, but it is reckless. Muslim-Americans do not threaten our American values and traditions, in fact they only add to them."

Goode Stands By Comments On Muslims (RTD)

By Rex Bowman

Richmond Times Dispatch, December 21, 2006

ROCKY MOUNT -- U.S. Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. will not apologize to Islamic groups for a letter he wrote that decries Muslim immigration to America, his press aide said yesterday.

"He stands by the letter," said Linwood Duncan, aide to the 5th District Republican. Duncan refused to say more.

The Council on American-Islamic Relations demanded an apology Tuesday night for the letter, which Goode, of Rocky Mount, sent to hundreds of constituents and which the council labeled Islamophobic.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country," Goode wrote.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Corey Saylor, national legislative director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations, condemned the letter. "Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," Saylor said. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Duncan said Goode wrote the letter this month in response to hundreds of e-mails he had received from 5th District constituents concerned about Minnesota Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's decision to use the Quran in his swearing-in ceremony. Ellison, born in the United States, converted to Islam.

After one of Goode's letters miscarried, its contents were plastered online across the blogosphere.

"I do not subscribe to using the Koran [an alternate spelling of the Muslim holy book] in any way," Goode wrote in the letter's opening paragraph. "The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran."

"It's about as stupid a comment as I've ever heard from a legislator," said Mukit Hossain, president of the Potomac Falls-based Virginia Muslim Political Action Committee, which estimates there are 60,000 Muslim voters in Virginia. "We will do everything we can to keep this issue alive. I think we can educate the people in his district that he is not the right candidate."

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute, said he was horrified when he read the letter. "I said to myself, the only thing that might make it not horrifying is if a staff person wrote it and he never saw it. But he's owning up to it. It's fundamentally wrong in so many ways . . . and ought to disqualify one for public service in so many other ways."

Goode could not be reached for comment by telephone or at his home.

Among the chorus of critics was a fellow lawmaker, Democratic Rep. Bill Pascrell Jr. of New Jersey. He took Goode to task in a letter for Goode's "personally offensive" remarks and for "promoting a fear and disrespect of Muslims."

Goode is Virginia's most outspoken advocate in Congress for clamping down on illegal immigration. He has pushed legislation to build a security fence across the border with Mexico and to make English the nation's official language.

The 5th Congressional District, largely rural, stretches from the North Carolina line between Henry and Brunswick counties north through Charlottesville to Greene County. It is home to few Muslims, but precise numbers are not available because the Census Bureau does not collect data based on religious adherence.

However, there is a small Muslims of America community in western Charlotte County. In recent weeks, members of an organization calling itself the Christian Action Network have sought to have changed the name of the main road, Sheikh Gilani Lane, that runs through the African-American community.

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- A Virginia congressman will not apologize for writing that without immigration reform "there will be many more Muslims elected to office demanding the use of the Quran," his spokesman said.

Republican Rep. Virgil Goode's letter to constituents also warns that without immigration reform "we will have many more Muslims in the United States."

Spokesman Linwood Duncan said Goode's letter was written in response to complaints his office received about Minnesota Rep.-elect Keith Ellison's request to be sworn in using the Quran.

Ellison is the first Muslim to be elected to Congress.

Goode's office released the letter to CNN Wednesday.

In it, Goode wrote, "When I raise my hand to take the oath on Swearing In Day, I will have the Bible in my other hand. I do not subscribe to using the Quran in any way.

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Quran.

"We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country.

"I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

He added, "The Ten Commandments and 'In God We Trust' are on the wall in my office. A Muslim student came by the office and asked why I did not have anything on my wall about the Quran.

"My response was clear, 'As long as I have the honor of representing the citizens of the 5th District of Virginia in the United States House of Representatives, the Quran is not going to be on the wall of my office.' "

The Council on American-Islamic Relations asked Goode to apologize.

"Rep. Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," the council's Corey Saylor said in a statement. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

Duncan told CNN that Goode stands by his comments.

Congress Asked To Intervene In Fla. Race (AP)

By David Royse

AP, December 21, 2006

The Democrat who narrowly lost to a Republican in the race to replace Rep. Katherine Harris asked Congress on Wednesday for an investigation.

The state has declared that Democrat Christine Jennings lost to Republican Vern Buchanan by 369 votes. But 18,000 Sarasota County electronic ballots did not record a choice in the race, and Jennings contends that the number is abnormally high and that the machines lost the votes.

She filed with the House clerk an official contest of the election results in Florida's 13th Congressional District.

She said she will ask Congress to consider ordering a revote if her legal challenge in Florida fails. She is seeking to obtain the programming code for the touch-screen voting machines to determine whether a bug or malicious programming could have lost votes. The state has found no evidence of malfunction.

The company that makes the machines, Electronic Systems & Software Inc., is fighting the effort, saying its programming is a trade secret.

"It's not about me. It's about a revote," Jennings said by telephone from Washington. "I am not trying in any way to tell Congress what they should do. I am simply doing this for the integrity of our voting system."

Buchanan is to be sworn in Jan. 4. He has 30 days to respond to the challenge.

"Our primary concern is representing our constituency," Buchanan spokeswoman Sally Tibbetts said. "Nevertheless, we fully intend to respond."

Congress is unlikely to intervene immediately, said Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the Committee on House Administration. The usual practice in such cases is to wait for the state-declared winner to be sworn in and a court to rule, then investigate if the candidate wishes to continue contesting the case.

Mass. Governor's Rightward Shift Raises Questions (WP)

By Dan Balz And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

As he prepares for a 2008 presidential campaign, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R) has championed the conservative principles that guided President Ronald Reagan, become an outspoken opponent of same-sex marriage and supported overturning the Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

It was not always so. Twelve years ago, Romney boasted that he would be more effective in fighting discrimination against gay men and lesbians than Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), distanced himself from some conservative policies of the Reagan administration, and proudly recalled his family's record in support of abortion rights.

The apparent gulf between the candidate who ran for the Senate in 1994 and the one getting ready to run for president has raised questions as to who is the real Mitt Romney. Is he the self-described moderate who unsuccessfully challenged Kennedy in the year of the Republican landslide, the self-described conservative now ready to bid for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008, or merely an ambitious and adaptable politician? The answer could be crucial to Romney's presidential ambitions.

In stressing his conservative views, Romney has sought to fill a vacuum on the right in the Republican nomination contest. Neither Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) nor former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who top the opinion polls among Republicans, has a comfortable relationship with social and cultural conservatives.

McCain has a long record of opposition to abortion rights, but many conservatives, nonetheless, remain wary of him because he went out of his way in 2000 to attack religious conservative leaders Jerry Falwell and Pat Robertson. Giuliani supports abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, creating potentially irreconcilable differences with many conservatives.

Romney acknowledges that his positions on abortion and gay rights have changed. He told National Review Online last week that he would like to see the Supreme Court overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision and return the issue to the states. He also said he no longer favors a federal non-discrimination law that would cover gay men and lesbians, and no longer backs accelerating the opening up of the military to gay men and lesbians.

Romney declined a request for an interview to discuss the evolution of his thinking on these issues. Aides said his schedule did not permit him to take the time for a telephone interview. They also said he has responded to questions on these subjects many times as he has explored a presidential candidacy.

Eric Fehrnstrom, his statehouse communications director, responded to questions about the apparent shift in Romney's beliefs. "The governor should be judged on his four-year record in office in one of the most liberal states in the country," he said. "He has governed as a mainstream conservative. He's gone after wasteful spending; he's defended traditional marriage; he pushed to bring abstinence education to the classroom; he fought against embryonic cloning and stood up and vetoed an emergency-contraceptive bill."

But it will not just be that record that will attract attention as Romney leaves office in January and turns his attention toward a likely presidential campaign. The entire arc of his political career will be under examination, beginning with that 1994 race for the Senate.

When he challenged Kennedy, Romney was a young businessman with no firm ideological identity, the latest in a line of moderate Massachusetts Republicans that included former governor Francis W. Sargent and then-Gov. William F. Weld. Then 47, he had been a registered independent until 1993 and had voted for Democrat Paul Tsongas in the 1992 presidential primary. He took a tough, more conservative view of crime, immigration and welfare than Kennedy but shared the senator's liberal tolerance on social issues.

"It was a no-rocking-the-boat sort of reformism," said John Gorman, an independent Boston-based pollster.

As a Michigan-born Mormon, Romney was a cultural oddity in Massachusetts. Throughout the campaign, he sought to reassure voters that his religious faith would not influence his public actions. "One of the great things about our nation . . . is that we're each entitled to have strong, personal beliefs," Romney said during his first debate with Kennedy. "But, as a nation, we recognize the right of all people to believe as they want and not to impose our beliefs on other people."

One group he went out of his way to court was the gay rights community. While he noted that he opposed same-sex marriage, Romney said that "certain benefits and privileges should be offered to gay couples and lesbian couples." Acknowledging that Kennedy had a strong record on sexual-orientation issues, Romney said his GOP identity gave his words extra weight.

"There's something to be said for having a Republican who supports civil rights in this broader context, including sexual orientation," he told Bay Windows, a Boston-area newspaper for the gay community, in an Aug. 18, 1994, interview. "When Ted Kennedy speaks on gay rights, he's seen as an extremist. When Mitt Romney speaks on gay rights, he's seen as a centrist and a moderate."

He said he would push gay rights issues if elected. "I think the gay community needs more support from the Republican Party, and I would be a voice in the Republican Party to foster anti-discrimination efforts," he said then.

In an Oct. 6, 1994, letter to the Log Cabin Club of Massachusetts, a GOP gay and lesbian group, Romney endorsed broad federal anti-discrimination protections and the creation of a federal panel to address gay and lesbian youth suicide. He called President Bill Clinton's "don't ask, don't tell" military policy "the first of a number of steps that will ultimately lead to gays and lesbians being able to serve openly and honestly in our nation's military."

Romney has since backed away from his endorsement of that federal anti-discrimination statute and from his previously expansive position on gay people in the military. On that issue, he told National Review Online, he now defers to military leaders.

Fehrnstrom said Romney remains opposed to discrimination against gay men and lesbians, though his focus in the past few years has shifted to the issue of same-sex marriage. "Even as the governor has emerged nationally as a prime defender of traditional marriage, he always cloaks his rhetoric in tolerance and respect for people of all walks of life," he said.

Romney has long said he personally opposes abortion, and in an Oct. 25, 1994, debate with Kennedy, he was asked to reconcile his personal beliefs with his support for abortion rights.

"I believe that abortion should be safe and legal in this country," Romney responded. "I have, since the time when my mom took that position when she ran in 1970 as a U.S. Senate candidate. I believe that since Roe v. Wade has been the law for 20 years, we should sustain and support it. I sustain and support that law and the right of a woman to make that choice. And my personal beliefs, like the personal beliefs of other people, should not be brought into a political campaign."

He ran for governor in 2002 promising to preserve the status quo on abortion in Massachusetts, saying he would oppose changes that either liberalized or restricted access to abortion. He has lived up to that promise. But in late 2004, as he studied the issue of embryonic stem cell research, he underwent what he has called an awakening that led him to the conclusion that "the sanctity of life had been cheapened" by the Roe decision.

That led him to describe himself as "pro-life." Still, he remained cagey about what that meant in terms of public policy, saying only that he would abide by his 2002 campaign promise. Asked in an interview with Washington Post reporters in February 2005 whether he favored making abortion illegal, he replied: "I'm telling you exactly what I will do as governor of Massachusetts, but I'm not going to tell you what I'd do as mayor of Boston or a congressman or any of those positions."

In the 1994 campaign, Romney also proudly labeled himself a moderate. "I'm not a partisan politician," he said in an interview with The Post that fall. "My hope is that, after this election, it will be the moderates of both parties who will control the Senate, not the Jesse Helmses."

Helms, the former Republican senator from North Carolina, was one of the most conservative elected officials in the country.

In his 1994 debate with Kennedy, Romney also refused to endorse the "Contract With America," which House Republicans had proudly presented as their campaign manifesto, and he balked when Kennedy tried to link him to the Reagan administration. "I was an independent during the time of Reagan-Bush," Romney retorted.

Questions about Romney's conservative credentials could provide an opening for several other Republicans exploring 2008 candidacies, among them Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and outgoing Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

Several conservative leaders, Falwell among them, declined to be interviewed for this article. One said it is premature to comment publicly. But Paul M. Weyrich, who is head of the Free Congress Foundation, said Romney should not underestimate the problem he may face as he prepares to launch his campaign.

"I think it's very serious," he said. "Our position is that, if a candidate can change his position sort of overnight, what would he do once he got in office? Would he do the same thing?"

The Courts Need This Watchdog (WP)

By Ronald D. Rotunda

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

The Judicial Transparency and Ethics Enhancement Act of 2006, now before Congress, would create an inspector general for the courts. It offers modest reforms that would keep our judiciary independent (because no one favors a dependent judiciary) and help keep it accountable (because no one favors a judiciary that is above the law).

Nonetheless, there are those who greet it the way Dracula would greet a bouquet of garlic. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, for example, has said of the proposal: "That's a really scary idea."

On the contrary, this bill would strengthen judicial independence because it would give people greater faith that if there were problems, the inspector general for the courts would deal with them and not sweep them under the rug. An inspector general would also protect judges from frivolous or false charges.

There are already 57 inspectors general for other organs of government -- for the Justice Department, Iraq reconstruction and so forth. The House of Representatives has imposed an inspector general on itself. Indeed, one wonders why it has taken so long to create one for the courts.

Giving an IG the power to audit federal judicial expenditures, to recommend changes in laws or regulations governing the judicial branch, and to investigate fraud, waste and abuse, is a modest reform that would not dislodge the heavens. That's why the House Judiciary Committee recently voted in favor of this bill by a bipartisan majority of 20 to 6.

After I testified in favor of the legislation in June, I received many supporting letters. For example, a federal judge, John Kane (who gave me permission to quote his e-mail), wrote, "I've been a district judge for 29 years and think the federal judicial house has brought this legislation on itself." He sat on the 10th Circuit Judicial Council when the first complaint about a judge came up for consideration: A district judge was trying to coerce counsel into establishing a library on product liability cases in honor of the judge.

Judge Kane's e-mail is worth quoting at length. He voted for discipline. The vote was 3 to 3, "and so the Chief Judge voted against sustaining the complaint because it was the first such complaint and he thought a close vote was too slender a reed upon which to proceed. As we were leaving the meeting, one of the judges who had voted to dismiss collared me and said, 'John, think about it. The next time it could be you or me. We've got to stick together.' "

Kane added, "I've recently heard of a number of judges who ruled on cases involving companies in which they owned an interest, yet nothing was done about it. The point is that the current system is a 'kiss your sister' operation that hasn't worked and won't as long as judges are covering one another's butts. The present system is ineffectual and I think that could be demonstrated by the very sorry record."

Other judges may not favor these conclusions but they do not dispute the facts. Justice Stephen Breyer's commission on judicial discipline recently reported that the judiciary failed to conduct a proper investigation of judicial misconduct in five of 17 "high visibility cases" between 2001 and 2005. This error rate, the report admitted, is "far too high."

We can do better.

Right now the discipline process is conducted largely in secret. The proposed bill would give us sunlight, the best disinfectant. As for the independence of the judiciary, the proposed bill provides that the chief justice would appoint, and could remove, the inspector general. Federal judges already have lifetime tenure and salary protection. Giving them an inspector general whom the chief justice appoints and removes would not interfere with their independence.

Opponents of this bill say that the sky is falling. But it is not falling. There are no cracks in the sky. There are not even pre-fracture incipient fissures in the sky. Instead there is a real need for change.

Discover America Partnership Lands Ridge (WP)

By Judy Sarasohn

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

If a travel industry group wanted a big name with big credentials to speak up for opening U.S. borders to let in more business and recreational travelers, it couldn't have done much better than former homeland security secretary Tom Ridge.

And that's just who the Discover America Partnership got.

"It's a huge coup for us. There's no more credible source," Geoff Freeman, executive director of the Discover America Partnership, said yesterday.

The group wants Ridge to evaluate the entry process -- difficulties real and perceived with getting visas and going through airports -- and to propose strategies for a better balance between security and open doors. Freeman declined to say how much the group is paying Ridge.

The coalition and its multimillion-dollar advocacy campaign were launched in September to help boost the number of visitors by 10 million a year. Since Sept. 11, 2001, there has been a 17 percent decline in overseas travel to the United States, the group said.

Ridge said that he doesn't do lobbying, but that he will help devise "a tactical plan of which lobbying may be a part."

"Our borders are where our security and future prosperity intersect. The borders are getting more secure, but the doors are not opened enough," Ridge said. "We're not viewed as easily accessible because we're not."

Some of the coalition members are Steve Porter, president of the InterContinental Hotels Group, the Americas; Joseph A. McInerney, chief executive of the American Hotel and Lodging Association; Roger Dow, chief executive of the Travel Industry Association; and Jay Rasulo, chairman of Walt Disney Parks and Resorts.McCurdy Is Making a Move

Dave McCurdy, a Democratic survivor of the Republican K Street Project, is moving from the Electronic Industries Alliance to become president of the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers.

McCurdy, a former Democratic House member from Oklahoma, will take his post Feb. 12, succeeding Frederick L. Webber, who is retiring.

In 1998, Republicans tried to pressure the EIA into hiring a fellow Republican instead. Some GOP lawmakers told their staffs not to meet with EIA officials, and they delayed passage of legislation that the EIA supported.

Republicans were unsuccessful then -- McCurdy became chief executive of the EIA -- and the House ethics committee privately chastised then-Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Tex.) for threatening retaliation.

McCurdy was unavailable to comment on his new appointment, a spokeswoman for the auto group said. Nels Olson of Korn-Ferry International helped with the executive search.

Among the alliance's issues: The industry wants to avoid what it considers congressional meddling in government regulation of safety standards.

The alliance represents the BMW Group, DaimlerChrysler, Ford Motor Co., General Motors Corp., Mazda, Mitsubishi Motors, Porsche, Toyota and Volkswagen.Shepherd Heading to Venable

Not to be outdone by other law firms snagging Hill investigator types for the much-anticipated oversight investigations in the Democratic-controlled Congress, Venable has signed one up, too.

Raymond Shepherd III, chief counsel of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, is moving to Venable next month to be head of the law firm's new congressional investigation group.

Before going to work for Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) at the subcommittee, Shepherd was oversight counsel at the House Energy and Commerce Committee.

Shepherd was involved with the panel's 25 hearings on such topics as abusive tax shelters, the United Nations oil-for-food program and the USA Patriot Act.

"I've seen a lot of companies prejudiced by counsel not knowing what Congress wants" and not realizing there are few rules that govern congressional investigations, he said.

Shepherd, who also will do some lobbying, will be covered by the one-year ethics ban from contacting former Senate colleagues.

Karl Racine of Venable said that Shepherd is a "special catch," particularly because the Coleman panel was known for its bipartisan approach.Lobby Shop Takes a Left Turn

Johnson, Madigan, Peck, Boland & Stewart has had strong Democratic -- and Republican -- credentials for years, and now it's getting a little more Democratic.

Jonathon Jones, a longtime aide to Sen. Thomas R. Carper (D-Del.), most recently as chief of staff, joined the lobby shop Monday. Jones also helped create the Third Way, a centrist think tank, or "strategy center," for Senate Democrats.

David Johnson, a former executive director of the Senate Democratic Campaign Committee, said of Jones's work with Carper and Third Way: "In the Senate you have to have enough in the middle to get anything done."

Jones is covered by a one-year ban on lobbying Carper or his staff.Here and There

Also moving about town . . . Howard Waltzman, chief counsel for the House Energy and Commerce Committee, is leaving the Hill for Mayer, Brown, Rowe & Maw as a partner in the law firm.

Scott Gottlieb, deputy commissioner for medical and scientific affairs at the Food and Drug Administration, is leaving Jan. 16 to rejoin the American Enterprise Institute.

Chavez Accuses U.S. Envoy Of Lying On Drug Problem (AP)

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) -- The U.S. ambassador's suggestion that better ties were possible with Venezuela's President Hugo Chavez met a blunt reply on Wednesday when Chavez accused the ambassador of lying about drug trafficking.

The lack of counter-drug cooperation between Venezuela and the United States has been one of many diplomatic sticking points between the two countries -- one that has worsened as Chavez has accused American anti-drug agents of involvement in espionage.

"A little while ago, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas told a big lie. He should retract it if it's really true that [U.S. officials] want good relations like they've been saying," Chavez told reporters who questioned him during an unrelated event Wednesday.

Ambassador William Brownfield told the Venezuelan newspaper El Nacional this week that U.S. officials estimate that the amount of cocaine smuggled through Venezuela has increased by 22 to 33 tons (20 to 30 metric tons) a year over the last five years, reaching about 330 tons (300 metric tons) in 2006.

"The drug traffickers have identified a vacuum because there is less police collaboration than in any other country ... and as a result they take advantage of Venezuela to move their product toward the Caribbean," Brownfield told El Nacional.

Brownfield also told El Nacional that Washington is seeking a pragmatic relationship with Chavez's government, cooperating on trade, energy and drug issues despite political differences.

Chavez called Brownfield's claims about drugs "a lack of respect for the truth" and said they were "absolutely false."

He said consumption by Americans was the root of the drug problem and accused the U.S. government of turning from communism to the drug war as an excuse to intervene in Latin America and justify its military presence in the region.

The U.S. Embassy declined to comment Wednesday.

Venezuela, due to its location next to Colombia, is a major transit route for cocaine headed to the United States and Europe.

But Venezuelan officials said they are fighting the drug war with increasing success, claiming that since Chavez broke off cooperation with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration last year, the amount of illegal drugs seized has doubled.

Brownfield has urged Venezuela to sign a new agreement with the DEA, but Chavez revived his earlier claims that officials of that agency had been involved in spying -- allegations that Washington denies.

"They had secret bases here ... the DEA blackmailed Venezuelan police and military officers in order to conduct political espionage," and support efforts to destabilize the country, Chavez said, without elaborating.

Following Chavez's re-election on December 3 by a wide margin, both the U.S. and Venezuelan governments have shown cautious hope for more dialogue despite deep differences.

But Chavez said Brownfield was playing the "bad cop" and was threatening the credibility of U.S. overtures: "It seems the ambassador here doesn't toe that line."

Chavez threatened to kick out Brownfield earlier this year, accusing him of trying to provoke confrontations with his frequent trips into pro-Chavez slums to hand out donations to libraries and youth baseball teams.

Bush Forcefully Rejects Direct Talks With Syria, Iran (MCT)

By William Douglas And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush on Wednesday voiced his strongest opposition yet to talking directly to Iran and Syria as other administration officials acknowledged secret U.S. funding of opponents to Syria's regime.

At a year-end White House news conference, the president insisted that he won't deal with Iran until it verifiably abandons its uranium enrichment program and won't talk with Syria until it stops interfering in Lebanon and Iraq. Both stands are rejections of a key recommendation made earlier this month by the Iraq Study Group.

On Iraq, Bush said he's still consulting and hasn't made up his mind whether to increase U.S. troops there, but he insisted that "victory in Iraq is achievable." The president will outline what he calls "a new way forward" in Iraq in an address to the nation next month.

In addition, Bush said the Army and Marines must grow to fight "radicals and extremists ... for a long period of time" around the world. He offered no specifics but has instructed new Defense Secretary Robert Gates to develop a plan to bolster the ranks of both services.

His strongest language Wednesday concerned Iran and Syria.

He called Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's government "out of step" with the rest of the world and chastised it for sponsoring a conference on the Holocaust that "heralded a really backward view of the history of the world."

"My message to the Iranian people is, `You can do better ...," Bush said. As for Syria, he said, "the message is the same."

He scolded the Syrian government for allowing money and weapons to flow through its borders to insurgents in Iraq and reiterated his call for Syria to end its efforts to destabilize Lebanon's fledgling democratic government.

With such comments, Bush rejected one of the key suggestions from the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member, bipartisan panel led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, D-Ind.

Some analysts believe that Bush's refusal to talk to Syria could be a crucial mistake and undermine his hope of sponsoring a new push for an Israeli-Palestinian settlement. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to the Middle East next month looking to reignite stalled peace efforts.

"The idea that we can't talk with the Syrians when we had talks with the Evil Empire, the Soviet Union, for decades is ridiculous," said David Mack, vice president of the Middle East Institute, a nonprofit group devoted to fostering knowledge of the region.

Rather than talk with Iran and Syria, the White House is taking steps to bolster opponents of the two countries' governing regimes.

U.S. officials confirmed Wednesday that the State Department has been quietly funding meetings of opponents of Syrian President Bashar Assad in Europe.

One official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said the meetings have been coordinated via the Berlin offices of the Aspen Institute, a private think tank, and are funded by the department's Middle East Partnership Initiative, an effort to promote democracy in Arab countries.

This is the first time that the U.S. government has acknowledged funding Syrian opposition groups. Syria holds legislative elections in March.

Ammar Abdulhamid, a critic of the Syrian government who's based in Washington, said the Berlin meetings have involved opposition groups of all stripes. Another is planned for late January or early February, he said.

Asked about the funding, which was first reported on Time magazine's Web site, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it's "no different from any other programs that we have all throughout the rest of the world and especially in the Middle East, promoting those civil society groups who have an interest in greater freedom and democracy in the Middle East."

Other officials say that's not necessarily the case because the funding involves strengthening groups and individuals that favor replacing Assad's regime.

An administration working group, known as the Iran-Syria Operations Group, whose existence is technically classified, has been meeting almost weekly to discuss ways to promote change in Iran and Syria through U.S.-funded broadcasting and other methods. The ISOG and its sub-groups are co-chaired by the White House's National Security Council and the State Department.

Additionally, Bush aides met at the White House in late October with members of a coalition of Syrian opposition groups called the National Salvation Front. That awkward coalition includes secular Syrians who advocate democracy; members of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Middle East's largest Islamist group; and former vice president Abdul Halim Khaddam, once a leading member of the regime.

Rice has made clear that rather than engaging with Iran and Syria, the administration plans to try to reduce their influence. The plan is to bolster a coalition of "mainstream" states, which would include Egypt, Jordan and six Arab nations bordering the Persian Gulf, led by Saudi Arabia. Iran and Syria, which Rice and Bush have repeatedly denounced as destabilizing the region, would be excluded.

Rice, in an interview with McClatchy Newspapers and other news organizations Tuesday, said she plans to encourage the coalition during the rest of her tenure. "I think that's really the diplomacy of the next couple of years, is to try and solidify that alignment in the Middle East," she said.

But while Sunni Arab nations are worried over Shiite Iran's resurgence, they've made clear to Rice that their cooperation is dependent on greater U.S. involvement to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Syria could undermine any such effort in retaliation for U.S. efforts to undermine Syria.

Bush vowed to work with the new Democratic-controlled Congress next year on improving the situation in Iraq and adding more soldiers to the U.S. military.

But some Democrats were skeptical of Bush's comments Wednesday.

"Unfortunately, it is troubling to see that he does not understand the need for urgent change in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader-designate Harry Reid said in a written statement. "The president seems lost within his own rhetoric."

Bush also vowed to work with Democrats to increase the minimum wage by $2.10 over a two-year period, if the increase is coupled with a relaxation of regulations and taxes for small businesses.

And he pledged to try again to get a comprehensive immigration policy that includes a guest worker program.

Kerry, Dodd Meet With Syria President (AP)

By Albert Aji

AP, December 21, 2006

Sens. John Kerry and Christopher Dodd met with Syrian President Bashar Assad on Wednesday and discussed the need for Damascus to cooperate with efforts to maintain the unity and stability of war-ravaged Iraq, state media reported.

The U.S. Embassy in Damascus said the meeting, which lasted two and a half hours, covered "a full-range of topics relating to U.S.-Syrian relations and regional issues."

"I feel quite confident in saying this was a conversation worth having and that the (Bush) administration ought to pursue it," Kerry said in a telephone interview with the Associated Press from Jerusalem where he traveled after the meeting with Assad. "I feel very strongly about that...It's worth following up on a number of avenues."

Kerry said he told Assad the new Democratic-controlled Congress has serious concerns about issues such as the flow of "money, weapons and terrorists" through Syria into Iraq and Lebanon.

Kerry has criticized the Bush administration for refusing to engage with Syria and Iran, a move that was recommended by the recently released Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel.

The Democratic senators, both prospective 2008 presidential candidates, and Assad "reviewed the situation in Iraq and stressed the importance of supporting the current political process to arrive at setting a timetable for the withdrawal of foreign troops," SANA said.

Talks also dealt with ways of stopping the escalating violence in the Palestinian territories, the agency said.

The Bush administration has accused Kerry, Dodd and other senators who have met with Assad of sending mixed signals and has insisted that the U.S. will not make concessions to Damascus to win its help in Iraq.

"We discourage the travel of members of Congress to Syria because we believe it undermines the cause of democracy in the region and particularly" Lebanon's government, White House spokesman Blair Jones said Wednesday night.

Syrian-U.S. relations have been strained for several years. The U.S. government has expressed reluctance to seek help from Damascus on Iraq until the Syrians curb their support to radical Palestinian groups and to the Lebanese Hezbollah and reduce their influence in Lebanon.

The two American lawmakers arrived in Damascus on Tuesday as part of a Middle East tour to investigate Syria's readiness to help bring about stability and security to neighboring Iraq.

Kerry: Syria Leader Wants To Assist In Iraq (BOS)

By Rick Klein

The Boston Globe, December 21, 2006

Senator John F. Kerry said Wednesday that President Bashar Assad of Syria expressed a willingness to work with the United States to bring stability to Iraq, and said Assad personally offered assistance that Kerry plans to convey to the Bush administration.

Kerry -- who visited Syria along with Senator Christopher J. Dodd, Democrat of Connecticut, despite the administration's opposition to the trip -- said the meeting with Assad reinforced the need to follow the Iraq Study Group's recommendation that the US government directly engage Syria and Iran to find a way forward in Iraq.

"He offered some very direct and concrete ways in which they could be helpful in Iraq," Kerry said in an interview conducted by telephone from Damascus. "I came away with a distinct feeling that there are opportunities here. There are fronts in which we can work together if people are inclined to."

Kerry said the Assad government is interested in approaching the Iraq war from a regional perspective, where other Middle East issues -- including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict -- are part of the equation. The Massachusetts Democrat said he would not publicly discuss the substance of his talks with Assad until he has fully briefed State Department officials about his visit.

But Kerry reiterated his position that President Bush is wrong to rule out direct talks with Syria and Iran. He added that he is interested in visiting Iran as well at an "appropriate time" that's well-removed from the country's recent conference for Holocaust deniers, which Kerry labeled "absurd and insulting."

"I think you've got to talk with people," Kerry said. "You can disagree with them and disagree with them and disagree with them, and you may not get anywhere, but you've got to talk to people."

Wednesday's two-hour meeting involving Kerry, Dodd, and Assad is part of a growing diplomatic effort by senators to improve US relations with Syria. Last week, Senator Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, became the first senator in nearly two years to meet with Assad, and Senator Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican, is also due to visit Syria this week.

The Bush administration cut off high-level diplomatic contact with Syria in late 2004, saying that talks with the government had failed to convince Syria to stop the flow of insurgents into Iraq or to stop support for the anti-Israeli militant groups Hezbollah and Hamas.

State Department officials sought to dissuade Kerry, Dodd, and Nelson from going to Syria, though they helped set up logistics of the visits when the lawmakers insisted on making their trips. Last week, White House Press Secretary Tony Snow blasted the visits as "not appropriate," saying that such meetings hand the Syrian government "a PR victory" by allowing officials to showcase what they portray as improved relations with the West.

At a White House press conference Wednesday, Bush defended his administration's decision to rule out talks with Iran and Syria until the leaders of those countries change their behavior.

"We have talked to them about what is necessary for them to have a better relationship with the United States," Bush said. "And they're not unreasonable requests."

Still, Bush cited the fact that US lawmakers are visiting Syria as a signal to the Syrian government that they can work to repair relations with the United States. The Bush administration withdrew its ambassador to Syria in February 2005, after Syria was implicated in the assassination of Rafiq Hariri, a former prime minister of Lebanon, although lower-level staff remain in Damascus.

"We've had visits with the Syrians in the past. Congressmen and senators visit Syria," Bush said at the press conference. "What I would suggest, that if they're interested in better relations with the United States, that they take some concrete, positive steps that promote peace, as opposed to instability."

Nelson told reporters after his meeting with Assad that the Syrian president "clearly indicated the willingness to cooperate" with US and Iraqi forces to secure his country's border with Iraq.

Kerry said his meeting gave him and Dodd a chance to express the "unanimity of Democrats" about the need for an independent Lebanon, free of Syrian interference. In a joint statement, the senators said they laid out a series of steps the Assad government must take to improve its standing in the eyes of the United States.

"While we believe in resuming dialogue, our message is no different: Syria can and should play a more constructive role in the region," the senators said. "We conveyed our strong belief that only concrete and verifiable actions by the Syrian government would help convince Americans that Syria is willing to change course."

But the State Department continued to emphasize that it did not endorse the senators' trip to Syria. Officials' assistance in setting up the trip reflects only the "courtesy that you might expect we would [extend] to senior members of the Senate," said Sean McCormack, a department spokesman.

"Whether they're foreign visitors or US senators or US congressmen, it is their decision to take," McCormack said. "It doesn't mean that we support the fact that they are there or having these discussions."

Syria's official news agency cast Wednesday's meeting as a chance for the Syrian government to work toward an end to violence in Iraq -- and to press Israel to withdraw from the Golan Heights, Syrian territory that has been occupied by Israel since 1967.

"The president and the two senators discussed the deteriorating situation in Palestine and the need to preserve Palestinian national unity," the SANA agency reported. "The Baker-Hamilton [Iraq Study Group] report was discussed and President Assad affirmed the need to stop violence in Iraq, and Syria's readiness to achieve Middle East peace under honest international auspices."

Both Kerry and Dodd are considering running for president in 2008.

Kerry has said he would announce his decision shortly after the turn of the year.

U.S. And Britain To Add Ships To Persian Gulf In Signal To Iran (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — The United States and Britain will begin moving additional warships and strike aircraft into the Persian Gulf region in a display of military resolve toward Iran that will come as the United Nations continues to debate possible sanctions against the country, Pentagon and military officials said Wednesday.

The officials said that Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year.

Senior American officers said the increase in naval power should not be viewed as preparations for any offensive strike against Iran. But they acknowledged that the ability to hit Iran would be increased and that Iranian leaders might well call the growing presence provocative. One purpose of the deployment, they said, is to make clear that the focus on ground troops in Iraq has not made it impossible for the United States and its allies to maintain a military watch on Iran. That would also reassure Washington's allies in the region who are concerned about Iran's intentions.

The officials said the planned growth in naval power in the gulf and surrounding waters would be useful in enforcing any sanctions that the United Nations might impose as part of Washington's strategy to punish Iran for what it sees as ambitions to acquire nuclear weapons. And the buildup would address another concern: that Iran could try to block oil shipments from the gulf in retaliation for United Nations sanctions or other American-led pressure.

Steps are already being taken to increase the number of minesweeping vessels and magnetic "sleds" carried by helicopters to improve the ability to counter Iranian mines that could block oil-shipping lanes, Pentagon and military officials said.

As part of future deployments after the first of the year, the British Navy plans to add two mine-hunting vessels to its ships that already are part of the international coalition patrolling waters in the Persian Gulf.

A Royal Navy news release said the ship movements were aimed at "maintaining familiarity with the challenges of warm water mine-hunting conditions." But a senior British official said: "We are increasing our presence. That is only prudent." Military officers said doubling the aircraft carrier presence in the region could be accomplished quickly by a shift in sailing schedules.

As opposed to ground and air forces that require bases in the region, naval forces offer a capacity for projecting power in parts of the world where a large American footprint is controversial, and unwanted even by allies. Many of the ships could be kept over the horizon, out of sight, but close enough to project their power quickly if needed.

Vice Adm. Patrick M. Walsh, commander of naval forces across the military's Central Command, said that while "Iranian tone and rhetoric creates an environment of intimidation and fear," the United States "must be careful not to contribute to escalation." In an interview from his headquarters in Bahrain, Admiral Walsh declined to discuss the specifics of future deployments. "To assure our friends, we have to have capabilities to secure the critical sea lines of communication," he said.

"They need reassurances that we expect to be part of the effort here for the long term, that we will not run away from intimidation and that we will be part of the effort here for security and stability at sea for the long term," he added. "Our position must be visible and it must have muscle in order to be credible. That requires sustained presence."

Other military and Pentagon officials did describe specifics of the planned deployments in order to clarify the rationale for the movement of ships and aircraft, but they would not do so by name because Mr. Gates had not yet signed any deployment orders.

Pentagon officials said that the military's joint staff, which plans operations and manages deployments, had recently received what is called a "request for forces" from commanders asking for a second aircraft carrier strike group in the region, and that a deployment order was expected to be signed by the end of the week by Mr. Gates. That specific request was mentioned in various news accounts over the past few days.

The aircraft carrier Eisenhower and its strike group — including three escort ships, an attack submarine and 6,500 sailors in all — entered the Persian Gulf on Dec. 11 after a naval exercise to practice halting vessels suspected of smuggling nuclear materials in waters across the region. A carrier had not been inside the gulf since the Enterprise left in July, according to Pentagon officials. The next carrier scheduled to sail toward the Middle East is the Stennis, already set to depart Bremerton, Wash., for the region in late January, Navy officers said.

Officials expressed doubt that the Stennis and its escorts would be asked to set sail before the holiday season, but it could be ordered to sea several weeks earlier than planned. It could then overlap for months with the Eisenhower, which is not scheduled to return home until May, offering ample time to decide whether to send another carrier or to extend the Eisenhower's tour to keep the carrier presence at two.

Doubling the number of carriers in the region offers commanders the flexibility of either keeping both strike groups in the gulf or keeping one near Iran while placing a second carrier group outside the gulf, where it would be in position to fly combat patrols over Afghanistan or cope with growing violence in the Horn of Africa.

But these same officials acknowledge that Iran is the focus of any new deployments, as administration officials view recent bold moves by Iran — and by North Korea, as well — as at least partly explained by assessments in Tehran and North Korea that the American military is bogged down in Iraq and incapable of fully projecting power elsewhere.

Adm. Mike Mullen, the chief of naval operations, has made the case that the United States should seek to create "a thousand-ship Navy." That would be impossible for the United States alone given current budgets, so instead it would be accomplished by operating more closely with allied warships to better cover critical areas like the Persian Gulf.

He said that such a cooperative naval concept would be a "global maritime partnership that unites navies, coast guards, maritime forces, port operators, commercial shippers and many other government and nongovernment agencies to address maritime concerns."

As an example, at present there are about 45 warships deployed in the Persian Gulf and waters across the region from the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean, with a third of those supplied by allies, which this month include Australia, Bahrain, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Pakistan and Britain.

Security Council Set To Vote Friday On Iran Sanctions (AFP)

By Gerard Aziakou

AFP, December 21, 2006

Under pressure from the United States, the UN Security Council edged toward a Friday vote on a compromise draft resolution mandating sanctions against Iran over its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear fuel work.

After the European sponsors offered concessions to overcome Russian objections, Britain's UN envoy Emyr Jones Parry announced: "The president of the council concluded there would be a vote on Friday morning" on the watered-down text.

The new draft, which watered down a contentious proposal for a travel ban on 12 officials directly linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs, was circulated to the council's 15 members Wednesday.

"The travel ban is gone," said Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin, saying the issue was "addressed in a creative manner which is more in line with our original thinking."

The new draft, a copy of which was obtained by AFP, finessed the issue by making the travel ban voluntary.

It urged "all states to exercise vigilance regarding the entry into or transit through their territories of individuals who are engaged in, directly associated with or providing support for Iran's proliferation sensitive nuclear activities or for the development of nuclear weapon delivery systems."

It further says that all states shall notify a monitoring committee "of the entry into or transit through their territories of persons" designated in the draft's annex as well as additional persons found to be linked with Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

The compromise text drawn up by Britain, France and Germany emerged after several rounds of bargaining Wednesday involving envoys of the Security Council's five veto-wielding members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- as well as Germany.

"We are down to two or three issues to be tackled," Churkin said. "I hope they will be by tomorrow."

The new draft also eases some of the financial restrictions slapped on entities or persons linked to Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

"We believe there is no reason we should not have a vote tomorrow," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

US acting ambassador Alejandro Wolff said he was consulting with Washington over the latest changes to the draft.

Asked about the travel ban, which earlier this week he described as a "priority" issue for the US side, Wolff said: "We're still negotiating this... we want a vote early and we want a really good resolution."

"We have been working very hard on this resolution which unfortunately we have to do because Iran has not agreed to suspend certain activities which would have opened the door to negotiations," Churkin said.

The aim, he added, was to "make sure this is a careful targeted resolution, which would created some problems for Iran in pursuing activities which the Security Council does not want to pursue but also will make it very clear that the door is open for negotiation when Iran accepts the requirement for suspension."

Moscow, which like China has strong economic ties with Tehran, strongly backs Iran's right to civilian nuclear technology. The Russians are building the Islamic Republic's first atomic power station in Bushehr.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice meanwhile spoke by telephone Wednesday with her British counterpart Margaret Beckett to discuss "ways to close the remaining gaps" over the wording of the draft, McCormack said.

"I would caution that we're not there yet, we don't have a final agreement on a resolution," the US spokesman added.

The draft calls for a mandatory ban on trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programs and place financial restrictions on persons and entities involved in the sectors.

It demands that Iran "without further delay suspend all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, including research and development and work on all heavy water related projects."

It calls for a report within 60 days by the head of the UN nuclear watchdog agency on whether Iran has complied with fully with UN demands.

It warns that if Tehran refuses to comply, the council "shall adopt further appropriate measures under Article 41 of Chapter Seven" of the UN charter," a reference to economic sanctions only.

The United States and other Western countries suspect that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a civilian nuclear energy program. Tehran denies this.

U.N. Draft Resolution On Iran Loosens Travel Ban And Time Limits (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 20 — The European sponsors of a resolution to take steps against Iran for its refusal to halt sensitive nuclear activities submitted a freshly revised draft to the Security Council on Wednesday evening and called for a vote on Friday.

In a major concession to Russia, the principal dissenter during the months it has taken to settle on the language of the resolution, the final revision eases a travel ban on people involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

Instead of directing countries to prevent entry of such people into their territory, it now "calls upon" states to "exercise vigilance" over those who cross their borders.

It also gives to a monitoring committee that would be set up under the resolution greater authority than earlier drafts did to restrict what people and entities should be listed as suspected participants in nuclear activities.

In addition, the new draft qualifies a freeze on assets of such people and gives countries more time — 60 days instead of 30 — to report to the committee on how they are complying with the demands of the resolution.

The major thrust of the resolution is to demand that Iran immediately end all enrichment of uranium, which can produce fuel for power plants but also for bombs, and cease all its research and development work on the kinds of activities that are aimed at making weapons.

The amendments were added to address complaints from Russia, a country with close economic ties to Iran. Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador to the United Nations, said the resolution appeared largely acceptable to his government.

"The travel ban is gone," he said, adding, "It is addressed in a more creative manner, which is more in line with our original thinking."

Alejandro D. Wolff, the acting American ambassador who on Tuesday had called the ban an American priority, was asked if the new version could still be called a ban.

"Well, under the vigilance, obviously countries can take their decision on whether they are going to allow people to travel into their country or not, so it does not exclude a ban on travel," he said.

Mr. Wolff said that the United States was still studying the text, which was circulated among the 15 members of the Council only at 6 p.m. Countries were expected to seek guidance from their capitals overnight and present any final suggested changes to the text on Thursday.

"We are not necessarily quite there yet," said Emyr Jones Parry, Britain's ambassador. "We will vote this resolution Friday morning — that's what we intend to do."

The resolution bans imports and exports of materials and technology related to uranium enrichment, reprocessing and ballistic missile systems.

An earlier draft extended those restrictions to the light-water reactor that Russia is building in Bushehr in southern Iran, but, in another concession, all mention of the plant was dropped from the measure.

Settling on the language of the resolution has taken months of tough negotiating among ambassadors at the United Nations, periodic meetings in Europe of senior foreign ministry officials of the countries involved and frequent consultations between missions here and their capitals.

The participants have been Germany and the Council's five permanent members: the United States, Britain, China, France and Russia.

The principal stumbling block has been resistance from Russia and China to steps that would punish Iran for its defiance of the Security Council deadline on suspending the enrichment of uranium.

Iran says that it is exercising its sovereign right to develop nuclear power for peaceful energy purposes, but the United States and other Western governments believe Iran is developing nuclear weapons.

Who's Tough On Tehran? (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

Iranians made their feelings plain about Mahmoud Ahmadinejad last week by voting to reject his allies in municipal elections and in the Assembly of Experts, a clerical body that theoretically has authority over Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei. That doesn't mean reformers now run Iran, but it does suggest that international pressure and a policy of democracy promotion may produce the kinds of changes in Iran that three years of Western diplomacy have failed to achieve.

So it's all the more puzzling that, even as Iranians try to apply some pressure on Mr. Ahmadinejad, the international community is about to prove his point that Iran will pay little price for its quest to develop an atomic bomb. Consider what's happening at the U.N., where the Security Council is expected to approve a sanctions resolution this week, nearly four months after its August 31 "deadline" for Tehran to stop enriching uranium.

We've seen the latest draft of the resolution, hashed out among the U.S., the Europeans and Russia. Iran will be forbidden from importing any items or technical assistance "which could contribute to [its] enrichment-related, reprocessing or heavy water related activities, or to the delivery of nuclear weapon delivery systems." The resolution also imposes travel restrictions, and it freezes the financial assets of certain individuals involved in Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs.

This almost sounds tough. But then the resolution carves out exceptions that are broader than the actual rules. Consider the financial freeze: It shall apply in all cases, except where the money is necessary for "basic expenses," "extraordinary expenses," or is "the subject of a judicial, administrative or arbitral lien." Or take the travel ban, which has exceptions for "humanitarian need," "religious obligation," or when the sanctioned individuals need to travel in connection to some nuclear activities as opposed to others.

More dangerous is the exception for Bushehr, the civilian reactor that Russia has built for Iran at a cost of $1 billion and that is expected to be ready by October 2007. Conventional wisdom says "light-water" reactors such as Bushehr can't easily be used to make nukes, one reason the Clinton Administration arranged to build two of them for North Korea.

In fact, says proliferation expert Henry Sokolski, such reactors produce hundreds of tons of reactor-grade plutonium, which can be reprocessed into nuclear fuel for as many as 60 Nagasaki-type bombs in a matter of weeks. The Russians promise to safeguard the nuclear fuel. But the reactor's uranium pellets can be secretly removed by substituting dummy fuel rods and then quickly enriched to weapons-grade material in Iran's centrifuge cascades, without foreign inspectors ever being the wiser. Iranian scientists will also gain invaluable nuclear know-how simply by operating a civilian reactor.

In other words, the Security Council's resolution may well be worse than nothing at all. It reaffirms Iran's "right" to peaceful nuclear energy -- a right it has long since forfeited by violating the terms of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT). And by carving a legally binding exception around Bushehr, the Security Council gives Iran the foothold it needs to develop its nuclear program to within a screw's twist of an actual bomb, without ever trespassing against the sanctions.

The resolution's defenders, particularly at the State Department, tell us this is a price worth paying to accommodate the Russians and achieve an international consensus. They also say the resolution is just the latest incremental step. But at some point one has to ask whether consensus is helping to achieve U.S. policy goals, particularly when Iran keeps using international divisions to buy time for its nuclear programs. Perhaps the best the Administration can hope for is that Iran responds to even these minimal sanctions by making good on its threats to withdraw from the NPT, embarrassing even the U.N. Security Council into tougher action.

Which brings us back to the Iranian elections. It is wrong to imagine that the big winner -- former president and Ayatollah Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani -- is a moderate or a reformer, though he is more certainly presentable than his successor; he too has threatened Israel with nuclear annihilation. But given the limited political choices the regime offers voters, the election indicates that most Iranians dislike the regime and that they take no pleasure in their president's status as a moral pariah.

There's an opening here to promote change, provided the U.S. doesn't reward Mr. Ahmadinejad's bad behavior by failing to punish it, and provided President Bush reminds Iranians that while the U.S. opposes their government, it stands with Iranians who want more freedom.

Iran Admits Oil Projects Suffering (FT)

By Najmeh Bozorgmehr And Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

Iran's oil minister on Wednesday admitted that Tehran was having trouble financing oil projects, in a rare acknowledgment of the economic cost of its nuclear dispute.

"Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their co-operation," Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told the oil ministry news agency, Shana.

The statement underlined the impact of de facto financial sanctions on the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries' second biggest oil producer. As the controversy over Iran's nuclear programme has escalated, the US has applied pressure on European banks and financial institutions to curb dealings with Tehran.

The fact that the UN Security Council could soon impose the first – even if mild – sanctions against Iran has compounded the political uncertainty and risks of doing business with Tehran. Iranian officials insist there is international interest in investing in Iran's oil industry and European executives play down any impact on companies seeking deals in Iran.

The National Iranian Oil Company has signed a memorandum of understanding with China's CNOOC to develop the North Pars gas field. The memorandum, if it turns into a final deal, would bring $16bn worth of Chinese investments for the initial part of any deal, the semi-official Fars news agency reported on Wednesday.

But western officials hope the financial squeeze's effect on the oil industry, the backbone of Iran's economy, will help raise domestic pressure for a change of policy and persuade the regime to heed international calls for a suspension of its uranium enrichment programme.

Iran's oil production capacity, at 4.3m barrels per day, is set to reach 5m bpd, according to the country's latest five-year plan, which closes in 2009. This would involve $16bn of investment in the sector. But the International Energy Agency reckons that Iran's longer term plans to lift oil production to 6.8m bpd by 2030 would require nearly $80bn in investment, with expansion plans for the gas industry requiring an extra $85bn.

"There's a growing awareness that de facto sanctions are beginning to hurt and everyone understands the future of the economy depends on the development of oil and gas," said a western diplomat. "Banks are not lending, partly because of US pressure, but the banks are also drawing their own conclusions."

Mr Vaziri-Hamaneh said projects would be financed from the Oil Stabilisation Fund, which accumulates oil windfalls to promote the private sector and save for periods of low oil prices.

Iran President Facing Revival Of Students' Ire (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

DOJ_NMG_0108312

TEHRAN, Dec. 20 — As protests broke out last week at a prestigious university here, cutting short a speech by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Babak Zamanian could only watch from afar. He was on crutches, having been clubbed by supporters of the president and had his foot run over by a motorcycle during a less publicized student demonstration a few days earlier.

But the significance of the confrontation was easy to grasp, even from a distance, said Mr. Zamanian, a leader of a student political group.

The student movement, which planned the 1979 seizure of the American Embassy from the same university, Amir Kabir, is reawakening from its recent slumber and may even be spearheading a widespread resistance against Mr. Ahmadinejad. This time the catalysts were academic and personal freedom.

"It is not that simple to break up a president's speech," said Alireza Siassirad, a former student political organizer, explaining that an event of that magnitude takes meticulous planning. "I think what happened at Amir Kabir is a very important and a dangerous sign. Students are definitely becoming active again."

The protest, punctuated by shouts of "Death to the dictator," was the first widely publicized outcry against Mr. Ahmadinejad, one that was reflected Friday in local elections, where voters turned out in droves to vote for his opponents.

The students' complaints largely mirrored public frustrations over the president's crackdown on civil liberties, his blundering economic policies and his harsh oratory against the West, which they fear will isolate the country.

But the students had an additional and potent source of outrage: the president's campaign to purge the universities of all vestiges of the reform movement of his predecessor, Mohammad Khatami.

Last summer the newly installed head of the university, Alireza Rahai, ordered the demolition of the office of the Islamic Association, which had been the core of student political activities on campus since 1963 and had matured into a moderate, pro-reform group.

Since then, students say, more than 100 liberal professors have been forced into retirement and many popular figures have been demoted. At least 70 students were suspended for political activities, and two were jailed. Some 30 students were given warnings, and a prominent Ph.D. candidate, Matin Meshkin, was barred from finishing his studies.

The students also complain about overcrowded and crumbling dormitories and proscriptions against women wearing makeup or bright colors, rules that were relaxed when Mr. Khatami came to power in 1997.

Amir Kabir University of Technology, a major polytechnic institute, has been a hotbed of student activism since before Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's Islamic Revolution of 1979. Drawing on networks at universities around the country through an office that links their Islamic associations, students can organize large protests on a moment's notice. There are also student guilds, which are independent, and more than 2,000 student publications.

Mr. Zamanian, the head of public relations of the Islamic Association at Amir Kabir, said that while the situation had not been ideal in the Khatami years, Mr. Ahmadinejad's antireformist campaign had led students to value their previous freedoms.

They were permitted to hold meetings and invite opposition figures to speak, he said, and could freely publish their journals. Now, he said, their papers are forbidden to print anything but reports from official news agencies.

The students also complain about the president's failure to deliver economic growth and jobs. At last week's protest, which coincided with a now infamous Holocaust conference held by the Foreign Ministry, students chanted, "Forget the Holocaust — do something for us."

A student who identified himself only as Ahmad, for fear of retribution, said: "A nuclear program is our right, but we fear that it will bring more damage than good."

Another student said: "It is so hard and costly to come to this university, but I don't see a bright future. Even if you are lucky enough to get a job, the pay would not be enough for you to pay your rent."

Mr. Zamanian said that the protest had not been planned ahead of Mr. Ahmadinejad's visit, but that students were further enraged when they saw supporters of the president being bused in.

Although the auditorium was almost filled with the president's supporters by the time any students were let in, the protesters forced their way inside, chanted, "Death to the dictator," and held banners calling him a "fascist president." They also held up posters of the president with his picture upside down and set fire to three of them. Many of the students are now in hiding.

At one point, the head of a moderate student guild complained to Mr. Ahmadinejad that students were being expelled for political activities and given three stars next to their names in university records, barring them from re-entering. The president responded by ridiculing him, joking that the three stars made them sergeants in the army.

The president was eventually forced to cut his speech short and leave. But angry students stormed his car, kicking it and chanting slogans. His convoy of four cars collided several times as they tried to leave in a rush. Eventually the students were dispersed.

An entry on Mr. Ahmadinejad's Web log, posted Wednesday, played down the scale and significance of the protest, writing that the president had a "good feeling when he saw a small group amid the dominant majority insulting him without any fear."

A few days after the protest, former Amir Kabir students affiliated with the Islamic associations' coordinating office wrote a letter to Mr. Ahmadinejad. In it, they turned down what they said was his invitation to share their problems with him, because they believed that he wanted to use the occasion to bolster his candidates in the local elections.

The students also wrote that the president had insulted their intelligence by talking to them in the same language he uses in remote villages on his provincial trips.

"You should know that what happened at Polytechnic University was the voice of universities and the real voice of the people," they wrote. Tehran Polytechnic was the university's name before the revolution.

Cleric's Star Rises In Iran After Vote (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, December 21, 2006

Elder statesman Hashemi Rafsanjani, a mercurial cleric who has played both sides of Iran's reformist-conservative divide, is rising again as a key challenger to Iran's president after local elections show deep discontent with the president's hard line.

Last week's elections for local councils in towns and cities across Iran were seen as a referendum on President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's 18 months in office, and results so far were showing widespread victories for his opponents.

Since taking power, Ahmadinejad has escalated Iran's confrontation with the United States and the West on multiple fronts, in particular drawing the threat of U.N. sanctions for pushing ahead with uranium enrichment in Iran's nuclear program. He has also sparked widespread international outrage for his comments against Israel and casting doubt on the Nazi Holocaust.

On Wednesday, a leading newspaper that usually reflects the thinking of many in Iran's conservative clerical leadership said in a blistering editorial that the election results showed it was time for Ahmadinejad to moderate his tone and concentrate on improving the ailing economy.

"The election could be very instructive to those who have been in power," the Jomhuri Eslami editorial said. "Arrogance, disregarding people's economic situation, insulting respected people and high-flying policies were among the elements of the failure of those who could not imagine such a failure."

Ahmadinejad, who has not commented on Friday's elections, felt the heat personally during a speech Tuesday in the western town of Kermanshah. During his address, some in the crowd chanted, "unemployment, unemployment, unemployment is a major problem," the pro-government daily Keyhan reported.

The results showed a partial comeback for Iran's reformist movement, which was crushed over the past five years by hard-liners who drove them out of the local councils, parliament and the presidency. The reformers seek closer ties to the West — even the United States — and a loosening of the power of Iran's clerical rulers.

But the big winners were "moderate conservatives," who support the clerical regime but have become disillusioned by Ahmadinejad, saying he needlessly provokes the West, isolates Iran and ignores economic reform.

Many analysts were now predicting a coalition between reformers and moderate conservatives to oppose Ahmadinejad and his hard-line allies in parliament and presidential elections in 2009.

Talk of a political bloc was fueled after two top reformist politicians — former president Mohammad Khatami and Mehdi Karroubi — met on Sunday with Rafsanjani, a top moderate conservative.

Rafsanjani's status was boosted in a parallel election held Friday picking members of the Assembly of Experts, a body made up of 86 clerics that oversees Iran's supreme leader and picks his successor.

Rafsanjani won the most votes of any candidate in Tehran for the assembly — half a million more than his closest competitor — a strong show of support for Rafsanjani, who lost to Ahmadinejad in June 2005 presidential elections.

"The people's vote for Rafsanjani meant they hope he will create and improve the moderate line," said Amir Mohebbian, a political analyst and columnist in Resalat conservative daily.

Final results from the local council election in Tehran were expected on Thursday. The interior ministry said only a few thousand of the 1.9 million votes still remained to be tallied, blaming the delay on the large turnout and the simultaneous vote for the Experts Assembly.

But partial results showed Ahmadinejad's allies won only two seats on Tehran's 15-member council, one of them going to his sister, Parvin Ahmadinejad. Conservative moderates were on track to take eight seats, and reformers four. The last seat appeared set to go to an independent.

Final results were announced for the rest of the country and showed a heavy defeat for Ahmadinejad supporters. None of his candidates won seats on the councils in the cities of Shiraz, Bandar Abbas, Sari, Zanjan and Kerman. Many councils in other cities were divided along similar proportions as Tehran's.

The election does not directly effect Ahmadinejad's power. It chose 113,000 seats on councils that administer city affairs and pick mayors.

It was not clear whether Ahmadinejad will bow to pressure to at least change his tone, if not the substance, of his policies. The pro-government Keyhan called the election as a victory for Ahmadinejad — depicting all conservatives as his supporters — suggesting some in the hard-liner camp do not see it as a call for change.

But many see the vote as signs of an anti-Ahmadinejad moderate coalition rallying behind Rafsanjani.

The 72-year-old Rafsanjani — who served as president from 1989-1997 — has long been an elusive inside player in Iran's clerical leadership. He is mistrusted by reformists because of his closeness to supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei and by hard-liners because of his emphasis on pragmatism over ideology.

Rafsanjani has supported the Islamic republic's policy of shunning the United States, yet played a major role in the 1980s Iran-Contra scandal in which the U.S. sold arms to Iran in return for help in freeing hostages held in Lebanon. He also backs the line rejecting a suspension of Iran's uranium enrichment program, but has shown a willingness to compromise in backroom negotiations on the nuclear program.

Pro-reform students frequently jeered him in demonstrations in the past, and he suffered a humiliating defeat by reformists in 2000 parliament elections, when he failed to win a seat.

In the 2005 run-off presidential election, Rafsanjani was the more moderate candidate in the race against Ahmadinejad, but demoralized pro-reform voters failed to turn out in strength to support him.

But Khatami's meeting with him Sunday suggested reformers could turn to embrace him.

"People showed in the elections that they don't like hard-line policies," said Mohammad Atrianfar, a political activist and a leader of moderate Kargozaran Party. "From now on (Ahmadinejad's) hard-line current will lose its power and it will return to its place."

U.S. Negotiator Notes An Improved Tone In Talks On North Korea (NYT)

By Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, December 21, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 20 — The chief American negotiator at talks to address North Korea's nuclear program said Wednesday that the parties could reach a new agreement on rolling back North Korea's bomb-making effort this week, but the prospects for a meaningful breakthrough remained uncertain.

The chief negotiator, Christopher R. Hill, told reporters that the United States, North Korea and the four other countries participating in the Chinese-sponsored talks had begun discussing details of how to carry out a 2005 draft agreement on ending North Korea's nuclear program. He said the tenor of the often tortuous discussions had improved.

"The discussions for us have been very useful," said Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs. "Certainly we are talking about much more than just agreeing on things on paper. We're discussing actual developments on the ground, and for that reason these discussions are not easy."

The negotiations are part of a series of talks sponsored by China that have continued for more than three years and have failed to make tangible progress in slowing North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

On Oct. 9, North Korea exploded a nuclear device for the first time, prompting the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions. After a frenzied round of Chinese diplomacy, North Korea agreed to return to the six-nation talks for the first time in more than a year.

The talks opened on an unpromising note Monday, when the senior North Korean negotiator, Kim Kye-gwan, declared that as a new nuclear power North Korea would engage only in "arms control" negotiations, implying that it had no intention of eliminating its nuclear program.

But during a series of one-on-one sessions on Tuesday and Wednesday, North Korea's attitude turned more pragmatic, Asian diplomats participating in the talks said, adding that concrete proposals for freezing North Korea's weapons program on the way to a broader accord were under active discussion.

Many analysts say that North Korea is not likely to give up its quest to become a full nuclear power and that any talks are merely a stalling tactic or an attempt to foster good will from China, its main aid supplier.

Others say that North Korea may at some point prove willing to make concessions on its nuclear program in exchange for a big aid program to bail out its closed, ailing economy.

Mr. Hill said he was pleasantly surprised that the talks had moved beyond posturing, and he raised the possibility that they could produce an agreement before the end of the current round this week.

"To be frank, Monday was kind of a difficult day, and the idea that I'd still be here Wednesday night telling you it was useful to continue — I frankly didn't think I would be saying that," he said.

He said China, as the host and mediator, had begun drafting the text of an accord that would commit the parties to concrete steps to carry out a vaguely worded 2005 agreement.

In September 2005, North Korea agreed to end its nuclear weapons program in exchange for security guarantees, diplomatic recognition and economic and energy aid from its neighbors and the United States.

The 2005 accord, though hailed as a breakthrough at the time, collapsed almost immediately after it was reached. North Korea publicly renounced the text.

“The whole purpose is to take the September agreement and start getting it implemented,” Mr. Hill said of the current talks.

AFP, December 21, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear program have entered a fourth day amid a slightly warmer climate, with the US envoy saying negotiations were tough but offered a glimmer of hope.

The talks resumed on Monday after a 13-month break with North Korea, emboldened by its first-ever atomic test on October 9, outlining a long list of hardline demands to be met before it would even consider disarming.

Delegates to the talks -- which involve the two Koreas, host China, the United States, Japan and Russia -- have said those demands are not acceptable and reported no breakthroughs this week.

However US envoy Christopher Hill said late Wednesday after a second straight day of direct talks with his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-Gwan, that he had not given up hope of progress.

"The discussions are not easy -- actually, they are very difficult but we are encouraged by the process," Hill told reporters.

"I think discussions for us have been very useful in the last day and a half. Whether we are successful at the end of the week, I think time will tell."

Hill and the Chinese side have said they want North Korea to recommit to a six-party deal brokered in September last year in which it said it would give up its nuclear program in return for energy assistance and security guarantees.

Hill said Wednesday that was still the goal and that he hoped this could be achieved within one year.

But despite his cautiously upbeat comments, many analysts believe North Korea has no intention of surrendering its nuclear weapons, and it is using the six-party talks to give the impression of wanting to negotiate.

"The bomb is now a symbol of the legitimacy of Kim Jong-Il's regime," Scott Bruce, the program officer at the Nautilus Institute in Berkeley, which specializes in North Korean nuclear issues, told AFP at the start of the week.

"It will take a very large price for the North to trade it in... definitely a higher price than the United States is willing to pay right now."

Japan's chief envoy to the talks, Kenichiro Sasae, also offered a blunt assessment on Wednesday night of the likelihood of a major breakthrough in Beijing this week.

"Our basic stances remain far apart. At this point, I cannot say that the outlook is optimistic," Sasae said.

One of the top priorities for North Korea is the lifting of US sanctions imposed on Pyongyang late last year for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The sanctions have seen bank accounts in Macau that are crucial to Pyongyang's ruling elite frozen, and North Korea has reiterated this week that it will not consider disarming until the financial curbs are removed.

Financial teams from the two nations met on Tuesday and Wednesday in Beijing on the sidelines of the six-party forum to discuss the standoff, but they finished without any agreement being reached.

The US chief negotiator to the sanctions talks, Daniel Glaser, told reporters late Wednesday only that the two sides may meet again in New York next month.

Glaser's confirmation that no breakthrough had been achieved on the sanctions dispute ensured that one of North Korea's key demands this week for disarming would not be met.

North Korean envoy Kim also said on Monday that United Nations sanctions imposed on his country following the atomic test must be lifted before it would consider surrendering its nuclear weapons.

Kim further demanded that North Korea be given help in building a nuclear reactor for power needs, and that the US policy of "hostility" towards it must be dropped.

North Korea is refusing to back down from its demand at international arms talks that U.S. financial restrictions be lifted before it dismantles its nuclear program, delegates said Wednesday.

North Korea agreed to end a 13-month boycott of the talks — which also include China, Japan, Russia, South Korea and the U.S. — to discuss a Washington campaign seeking to isolate the communist nation from the international banking system. The U.S. alleges the North is involved in a range of illegal activity, including counterfeiting $100 bills and money laundering.

U.S. and North Korean experts discussed the U.S. financial restrictions for five hours Wednesday, their second day of meetings this week that are separate from the arms talks, but made no breakthroughs and planned no further meetings.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury Department's deputy assistant secretary for terrorist financing and financial crimes who is leading the U.S. delegation, said the talks at the North Korean Embassy were "businesslike and useful."

Glaser said he would possibly meet the North Koreans next month in New York.

"For this process moving forward to be productive and useful, it's going to have to start focusing very, very closely on the underlying concerns of illicit finance," he told reporters. "We hope to get to do that."

The separate, six-nation nuclear talks are to continue until at least Friday, but negotiators said that does not mean results are guaranteed by then.

"The financial issues are a major interest for North Korea," Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae said after the third day of discussions in Beijing.

Sasae pleaded with the North to put aside that issue at the nuclear talks.

"I think it is not realistic to treat the financial issue as a major block while putting the broader discussion on hold," Sasae said.

However, the North said it would be willing to halt operation of its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspectors "under the right conditions," a South Korean official said on condition of anonymity due to the ongoing negotiations

"We are focusing our discussion on what those conditions would be," he said.

Negotiators were addressing the implementation of a September 2005 agreement where the North pledged to abandon its nuclear weapons in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

"Whether we can start implementing the agreement this week, time will tell," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said Wednesday evening.

He said the talks focused on specific steps toward the North's disarmament that the U.S. hoped would happen in a timeframe "a lot shorter than a year."

The North Koreans appeared interested and there were many questions between the sides, Hill said.

Hill declined to release details of U.S. proposals to North Korea, but a news report Wednesday said the Americans had outlined a process in which the North would first freeze its nuclear program, followed by inspections and eventual dismantlement.

Washington would be willing to give the North a written security guarantee — a pledge that it would not seek to topple the regime by force — as soon as the North allows the return of international nuclear inspectors, South Korea's Yonhap news agency said, citing "diplomatic sources" at the talks.

"We cannot be just optimistic about the situation since this round of talks opened after many difficulties," South Korea's main envoy Chun Yung-woo said, referring to the long break, the North's nuclear test and U.N. sanctions.

North Korea's state media kept up its tough rhetoric against Washington, saying U.S.-South Korean military preparations showed "the United States is trying to pull a dirty business against the (North) behind the curtain of talks."

"This is clear proof that it is seeking to vanquish (North Korea) with a military strong arm, whetting its sword of aggression under the mask of dialogue," the North's Communist Party newspaper Rodong Sinmun said in a commentary carried by the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

U.S. Nuke Envoy Hopes Japan-N.Korea Meet (AP)

By Mari Yamaguchi

AP, December 21, 2006

The top U.S. envoy to the North Korean nuclear talks expressed hope Wednesday that Japan and North Korea would meet on the sidelines of the six-nation negotiations to discuss normalizing their relations.

Japan is the only participating nation that has not met separately with North Korean delegates since the talks resumed Monday in Beijing after a 13-month hiatus.

While the thrust is to dismantle the North's nuclear weapons program, the talks are also about improving diplomatic ties between the nations, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said.

"The normalization process depends on the discussion of ongoing issues and clearly the Japanese have some issues that need to be addressed," Hill told reporters.

"It's our hope that there can be a bilateral meeting between the DPRK and the Japanese aiming at these issues," he said. DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

DOJ_NMG_0108317

Hill did not specify the issues to be resolved between Tokyo and Pyongyang, but Japanese leaders have been demanding more information about Japanese citizens abducted by North Korea decades ago.

The North has acknowledged kidnapping 13 Japanese citizens in the 1970s and 1980s to tutor its spies in Japanese language and culture. Pyongyang allowed five to return home and says the others are dead. It has refused to respond to demands for more information.

Japan's top envoy Kenichiro Sasae said Wednesday that "Japan has always kept its door open for dialogue," indicating that Japan planned to wait for North Korea to make an approach.

China is hosting the talks, which also involve South Korea and Russia.

Somali Government, Islamic Militias Agree To Resume Peace Talks (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

NAIROBI, Dec. 20 -- Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts and the country's transitional government agreed Wednesday to resume peace talks without any preconditions, as fighting broke out between the two sides.

"The mission can be considered a full success," a European Union envoy, Louis Michel, said at a news conference in Nairobi. " . . . There was a broad agreement to de-escalate and refrain from hostile acts. . . . There are still issues that will have to be resolved. But I'm convinced of the sincerity of both parties to go forward."

While Michel discussed peace with their leaders, Islamic Courts militias and the Ethiopian-backed transitional government fought with rockets and heavy weapons in towns just southeast and southwest of Baidoa, the town where the government is based.

Michel said he had "noted" the fighting. "I'm in favor of the optimism of the will, and not the pessimism of reality," he said.

No place or date has been set for the talks, which would be a resumption of negotiations held in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, that fell apart after each side accused the other of violating agreements. Michel said Wednesday that both sides had "reaffirmed previous commitments" made in Khartoum.

The United States and Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi expressed support for the agreement, Michel said, adding that it offered an opportunity to avert a conflict that he and other diplomats say could spill across the Horn of Africa.

Ethiopia is estimated to have at least 8,000 troops in Somalia to protect the fragile transitional government, which it considers a buffer against an Islamic movement that has taken control over most of southern Somalia, including the capital, Mogadishu.

A recent U.N. report found that the Islamic movement has received arms from Eritrea, among other countries.

Michel said no agreement had been made on withdrawing the Ethiopian troops, a primary demand of the Islamic movement, which considers Ethiopia a U.S.-backed invading force.

The Ethiopian government has repeatedly denied having more than a few hundred military trainers in Somalia and accuses the Islamic Courts of backing secessionist groups in the ethnically Somali region of Ethiopia. Both the United States and Ethiopia accuse the Islamic Courts of harboring terrorists, a charge the movement has denied.

Initially a grouping of local clerics, the Islamic Courts came to power this year by defeating U.S.-backed warlords who marketed themselves as an "anti-terrorism" coalition but who mostly terrorized a Somali population that came to despise them.

Beleaguered Somalis embraced the Islamic Courts movement, which has created a semblance of order based on Islamic law in a country of warring clans that has been without a central government since 1991.

Somalia has historically been strategically important to the United States because of its proximity to the Middle East and lucrative Red Sea shipping lanes. But U.S. policy there, driven mostly by fears that Somalia could become an Afghanistan in the Horn of Africa, has been widely viewed as a failure.

The Islamic Court's foreign minister, Ibrahim Hassan Addou, accused the U.S. State Department on Wednesday of exacerbating the situation rather than trying to understand it. The Islamic Courts believe that the United States has given Ethiopia approval to launch an offensive in Somalia, he said.

"They could send a fact-finding mission, talk to leaders," Addou said in an interview from Dubai, United Arab Emirates. "But the U.S. has never bothered. . . . What the U.S. has been doing is intimidation and threats."

Addou praised European Union officials, who flew to Somalia on Wednesday in a delegation that included officials from the Arab League and the Kenyan ambassador to Somalia.

Michel met with the leaders of the transitional government in Baidoa, then jetted to Mogadishu, where he met with an Islamic Courts delegation that included Hassan Dahir Aweys, a top leader.

Aweys is on the State Department's terrorism list because he headed a group, now disbanded, that allegedly had connections with al-Qaeda in the 1990s and was linked to the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania.

Analysts differ on whether he is genuinely striving for legitimacy or simply using negotiations to buy time to advance the Courts' control.

After having a "frank" and "tough" meeting with Aweys, Michel said he shared the former analysis.

"I had the perception that there is a strong goodwill in the ICU to resolve this by a political agreement," he said, referring to the Islamic movement, also known as the Islamic Courts Union. "Maybe I'm wrong, but this is my feeling."

Somalis Agree To Peace Talks Despite Clashes (FT)

By Andrew England

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

A powerful Somali Islamic group and the transitional government on Wednesday agreed to resume peace talks, hours after fresh clashes had broken out between the two groups in central Somalia.

The fighting, which occurred about 15km from the town of Baidoa, the government's seat, had erupted as Louis Michel, the European commissioner for development and aid, visited Somalia to meet officials from both sides and push for a peaceful resolution to the crisis.

While in Mogadishu, the capital, Mr Michel announced the parties had agreed to resume talks in the Sudanese capital, Khartoum. Previous rounds of negotiations have made little progress, but the peace process is deemed crucial to avoiding all-out war in Somalia amid fears this could develop into a regional conflict. No date was given for the talks.

It was unclear how serious the latest fighting was. It followed a period when rhetoric from both the government and the Islamic movement had appeared to be toned down.

The two factions have been at loggerheads since the Islamists, an alliance of Islamic courts, seized Mogadishu from a group of US-backed warlords in June. The alliance has since spread its influence throughout much of southern Somalia, which has been without an effective central government and beset by violence since 1991.

The transitional administration, which is weak and plagued by divisions, has little influence outside Baidoa. But it is internationally recognised and has backing from Ethiopia, which is reported to have several thousand soldiers inside Somalia.

Fears have been mounting for months that the fighting could suck in neighbouring countries. Both Eritrea and Ethiopia have been accused of using Somalia as a proxy for their own border dispute.

However, there have been few big direct clashes between the Somali parties, both of which include hardliners and moderates with differing agendas, analysts say.

"There is still space for diplomacy to work, but something has to give soon. The standoff is unsustainable," said Matt Bryden, a Somalia expert. "The military deployments on both sides are too large and too costly to be sustained indefinitely. They are either going to have to fight or start standing down."

Still, diplomats and analysts say it would serve neither side to push for a military solution, which could lead to a protracted guerrilla war and mean international isolation for the Islamic courts.

Earlier this month the United Nations Security Council passed a US-drafted resolution that authorised the deployment of a regional peacekeeping force in Somalia. The mission, if it were to materialise, would ring-fence the government in Baidoa and be used to train the administration's forces.

But it is unclear who would finance the mission or send troops, with neighbouring countries divided on the issue. There are also concerns that foreign intervention would exacerbate the situation and be seen as a proxy for US interests. Washington, which has a dire track record in Somalia, has accused the Islamists of containing and sheltering al-Qaida suspects.

"The UN Security Council resolution and US diplomacy have probably created a sense of urgency on the side of the courts who think maybe the US will weigh in on the side of Ethiopia and a regional force could be deployed to support the transitional government," Mr Bryden said.

Diplomat Pushes Peace Talks In Somalia (AP)

Somali fighters clashed with artillery, rocket-propelled grenades and anti-aircraft guns Wednesday, even as a European diplomat persuaded both the government and a rival Islamic movement to resume peace talks.

The heavy fighting outside the only town the government controls dragged on into the evening and underlined the difficulties of securing peace in this desperately poor country in the Horn of Africa.

European Union envoy Louis Michel said such skirmishes were likely to continue for now even though both sides had agreed to ease tensions and were committed to negotiations.

DOJ_NMG_0108319

The talks will be held in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital where several rounds of talks have already been held. No date was given.

Somalia's Foreign Minister Ismail Hurre said that while the government seeks a peaceful settlement, it did not believe the Islamic Courts movement does.

Leaders of the Islamic movement said they were willing to attend discussions without conditions. Islamic leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys played down the significance of Wednesday's fighting.

The comments marked a shift in the position of Islamic movement leaders, who previously said they would not attend talks until Ethiopia withdrew its military support for the Somalian government.

Michel, speaking to reporters in neighboring Kenya after a day of diplomacy in Somalia, said he believed both hard liners and moderates in the Islamic movement backed Wednesday's agreement.

The diplomat said that the current conflict in Somalia is being driven by outside forces. In response to a question about Eritrea and Ethiopia, two neighboring states with a history of hostility toward each other, Michel said: "Somalia is suffering because some are using Somalia as a battlefield for other issues."

As many as 8,000 Ethiopian troops may be in Somalia supporting its government, United Nations officials say. Eritrea, the U.N. says, has deployed 2,000 troops in support of the Islamic group. Both countries deny these assertions.

Michel spoke Tuesday to Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi, who expressed support for the EU peace initiative. But the diplomat did not provide other details of their conversation.

Clashes first erupted Wednesday nine miles from the government garrison town of Baidoa, where the EU envoy was meeting with Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi and President Abdullahi Yusuf.

Mohamed Abdullahi Hassan, a Baidoa resident reached by telephone late Wednesday, said the fighting intensified after dark. He said he could hear mortars being fired on the outskirts of town. During a visit to the Baidoa hospital, he said he counted seven government soldiers killed and 18 injured.

The clashes occurred one day after a deadline set by the Islamic group for the withdrawal of Ethiopian troops. The religious movement's fighters had threatened a major attack if Ethiopian forces did not leave Somalia.

As the fighting began, several hundred Ethiopian troops boarded 13 military trucks and — with artillery support — were dispatched to reinforce government troops on the eastern side of the city. The information came from a government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the information.

Somalia's internationally recognized central government holds only a small area around the central town of Baidoa, about 140 miles northwest of the capital of Mogadishu. The Islamic militiamen, meanwhile, control Mogadishu along with most of southern Somalia.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991. The country's secular interim government, set up in 2004 and backed by the U.N., has rejected religious rule. Muslim leaders have insisted on an Islamic government.

The international community is concerned about the Islamic movement's alleged ties to terror groups, something Islamic leaders have repeatedly denied.

Jendayi Frazer, the top U.S. diplomat for Africa, has said al-Qaida militants are operating with "great comfort" in Somalia, providing training and assistance to the Islamic militia.

Somali and Ethiopian officials allege that men wanted in connection with the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania now hold senior command positions within the Islamic forces.

Somalia's deputy defense minister Salad Ali Jelle told reporters Wednesday that one of the embassy bombing suspects, Abu Talha al Sudani, had led Islamic militiamen in a battle with government troops Tuesday near Idale, 37 miles southwest of Baidoa. Ten people were killed.

Fears of a full-blown civil war have intensified in recent weeks. Both sides have moved fighters, fuel and ammunition to the front lines.

Clashes Raise Fears Of Civil War In Somalia (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders And Abukar Albadri

The Los Angeles Times, December 21, 2006

MOGADISHU, SOMALIA — Clashes between Islamic fighters and Ethiopian-backed government soldiers heightened fears Wednesday that Somalia is inching toward a civil war that could drag in the entire Horn of Africa.

As international negotiators worked furiously to resolve the dispute, armed battles around Somalia's transitional capital of Baidoa killed at least one government soldier, according to Somali officials.

DOJ_NMG_0108320

Islamic leaders, who seized control of Mogadishu, the traditional capital, and much of southern Somalia from warlords this summer, are calling for a "holy war" against Christian-dominated Ethiopia unless the neighboring nation withdraws its troops, which were sent across the border to prop up Somalia's weak transitional government.

Both sides have been massing weapons and troops in strategic points around southern Somalia in recent weeks.

It remained unclear who started Wednesday's fighting, but officials said skirmishes were ignited by a gunfight between two rival reconnaissance missions in the town of Idale, about 40 miles southwest of Baidoa, where Somalia's transitional government is based. Fighting spread to two other areas.

"We captured two technical vehicles [converted 4x4s with mounted heavy guns], killed nine soldiers from their side and have prisoners in hand," said Mohammed Ibrahim Bilal, a senior Islamist military official, speaking via telephone from the front line. "In the coming hours, Baidoa will be under our control. We will clean Ethiopians from our soil."

The transitional government's assistant defense minister, Salad Ali Jelle, said only one of his forces' soldiers was killed.

Islamic Courts Union leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys shed his usual religious robes for military fatigues Wednesday and spent much of the day monitoring the fighting, witnesses said. But by Wednesday evening, after meeting with European Union negotiators, he downplayed the skirmishes.

"The war has not started," he told reporters. "Fighting is happening, but it is not between Islamic courts and the government. It's between Islamic courts and Ethiopian invaders."

The Islamic Courts Union is an alliance of religious leaders and their militias that formed to restore order to Somalia. The country has been beset with internecine fighting between warlords since the 1991 collapse of the Mohamed Siad Barre regime, the country's last functioning government.

European Union Development Commissioner Louis Michel flew to Somalia on Wednesday to meet separately with leaders from the Islamic Courts Union and the transitional government, urging them to participate in a fourth round of peace talks, which are being mediated by the Arab League in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital.

At a news conference in Mogadishu, Michel announced that both sides had agreed to pursue mediation rather than war. Michel called the agreement a "breakthrough…. I believe that there is a chance to be able to relaunch the political dialogue."

Experts nevertheless warn that renewed war in Somalia remains a risk and fighting could draw in its neighbors, including Eritrea and Kenya. A recent U.N.-commissioned study said that numerous nations already were sending fighters and guns to fuel the conflict.

"Everyone who knows something about Somalia knows that a real fight could easily spread to the region," said Mario Raffaelli, Italy's special envoy for Somalia.

Ethiopian and U.S. officials accuse the Islamists in Somalia of having links to terrorism and say the courts union seeks to install a Taliban-style regime. In her most blunt assessment yet, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Jendayi E. Frazer last week accused the Islamic union of being controlled by "East Africa Al Qaeda cell individuals."

Islamists dismiss such allegations as Western propaganda, though some concede that the union is struggling to strike a balance between its moderate and fundamentalist factions. One extremist sect is accused of masterminding the September killing of an Italian nun in Mogadishu.

Though Islamist leaders in Mogadishu have won praise from residents for restoring peace and order to the city, the rise of the courts union has stirred anxiety in neighboring Ethiopia. Somalia and Ethiopia have repeatedly gone to war over the years, often over a contested swath of land known as the Ogaden, in eastern Ethiopia. Some Somalis have made no secret of their desire to create a "Greater Somalia," including parts of current-day Ethiopia and Kenya.

In the 1990s, Aweys helped run an Islamic network in Somalia known as Itihaad al Islamiya, which was responsible for several terrorist bombings in Ethiopia.

The United States has taken a largely hands-off policy toward Somalia since 1993, when 18 American servicemen were killed during a failed raid in Mogadishu later chronicled in the book and film "Black Hawk Down." In recent years, however, the U.S. government began quietly funding some warlords as part of the war on terror. Earlier this year, U.S.-backed warlords were chased out of Mogadishu by Islamic soldiers.

Saudi Arabia Set To Name Jubeir As Ambassador (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 21, 2006

Saudi Arabia has informed the State Department that it intends to appoint Adel al-Jubeir as the new ambassador to Washington, according to U.S. officials. Jubeir, who is one of King Abdullah's closest foreign policy advisers, has long been the public face of the oil-rich kingdom in the West.

Jubeir is a well-known figure in Washington who was put out front by the kingdom in an effort to dissociate the Saudi royal family from the Islamic extremism of al-Qaeda after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks by Saudi militant Osama bin Laden. He has often had to defend against tough criticism of one of the world's most autocratic governments.

On CNN "Late Edition" last year, Jubeir disputed reports that bin Laden is still widely popular in the kingdom. "You can talk to radicals in Europe and they'll tell you that their agenda is very popular with the masses when, in fact, it's not," he said. "If Osama bin Laden or al-Qaeda in Saudi Arabia were popular, we would see an increase in recruitment, not a decrease. We would see an increase in their ability to do damage, not a decrease. . . . We are winning the war on terrorism. It will take time, though."

In 2004, when then-Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah said that "Zionist hands" were "95 percent" behind recent terrorist attacks, Jubeir was again dispatched to defuse criticism in the United States. U.S. officials linked al-Qaeda sympathizers with the incidents.

"Bin Laden wants to destroy the Saudi government," Jubeir said, again on CNN. "So you should understand . . . that those who are most critical of Saudi Arabia in a very hostile way in the United States, as well as in Israel, share the same objective as Osama bin Laden and those who committed these acts."

The impending appointment represents a meteoric rise in Saudi diplomacy for a man who last served in Washington as special assistant to Prince Bandar bin Sultan, now the Saudi national security adviser. Jubeir will step in to replace Prince Turki al-Faisal, who quit this month after only 15 months on the job.

The highly sensitive appointment has been shrouded in secrecy. The typed letter delivered to the State Department Friday left blank the name of the ambassador-designate, which was written in by the Saudi envoy shortly before he delivered it, according to well-informed sources who requested anonymity because no announcement has been made.

Jubeir, 44, attended the University of North Texas and Georgetown University. Bandar plucked him from graduate school to help him at the Saudi embassy. He once was featured in U.S. gossip columns for dating NBC news anchor Campbell Brown.

US Deeply Concerned Over Darfur After Visit By Bush Envoy (AFP)

AFP, December 21, 2006

The crisis in Sudan's Darfur region remains an issue of "deep concern" to the United States following a visit to Khartoum last week by a top US envoy, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

Rice called again on Sudan to drop its objections to deployment of a hybrid African-UN peacekeeping force to halt resurgent violence against civilians in the war-torn region.

"It is extremely important (to deploy) a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan," Rice said.

"This is an issue of deep concern to the United States and deep concern to the president of the United States," Rice said following a meeting with Andrew Natsios, President George W. Bush's personal envoy to Sudan.

Natsios met with Sudanese President Omar al-Beshir and other leaders in Khartoum last week but failed to gain their agreement to comply with a deal brokered last month by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to deploy some 20,000 UN-led peacekeepers to Darfur.

With violence against civilians again on the rise in Darfur, largely blamed on Arab militia allied to Beshir's government, US officials last week warned that tougher measures -- including enforcement of a no-fly zone over the region -- could be taken.

Rice said Natsios had "moved the ball forward" by reassuring Khartoum, via a statement issued Tuesday by the current president of the UN Security Council, that Washington and its partners remained committed to the peacekeeping plan rather than coercive options.

"Now we expect the government of Khartoum to respond positively to that action in the UN," Rice said.

The UN estimates that more than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million been displaced in Darfur since early 2003 when the region's ethnic African population revolted against the Arab-led government in Khartoum.

The hybrid peacekeeping force would replace an underfunded 7,000-strong African Union mission which has failed to end the violence.

Beshir has consistently rejected any UN troop presence in Darfur, accusing the West of seeking to partition his country.

U.S. Warns Sudan Of Possible Action (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, December 21, 2006

Sudan must open a path toward ending the Darfur crisis before the end of the year or the international community will take coercive action against the Islamic government, a top U.S. diplomat said Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0108322

Andrew Natsios, special White House envoy to Sudan, said international patience is running out on Sudan almost four years deep into Darfur's humanitarian disaster.

But he declined to say what options are being considered. "It's not useful to make threats," said Natsios, briefing reporters. British officials have said that creation of a no-fly zone over Darfur is one option being considered.

Natsios said there have been so many threats against the Sudanese government to bring peace to Darfur that it no longer takes them seriously.

"None of the threats have been carried out. I think we should stop making threats," said Natsios, who met with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir in Khartoum last week.

Hundreds of thousands of Darfurians have died and an estimated 2.5 million driven from their homes since early 2003.

A 7,000-member African Union force has not brought stability to Darfur. That has prompted proposals for a hybrid mission totaling some 20,000 troops from the African Union and the U.N. Sudan has been unwilling to go along.

To avoid a crisis with the international community, Natsios said, Bashir must allow 60 U.N. troops and civilians stationed in Khartoum to be transported with their equipment to Darfur by the end of the year. Until now, he has forbidden a U.N. military presence in the area.

Another requirement, he said, is Bashir's approval of the combined U.N.-African Union peacekeeping proposal, which would be carried out over three phases. The proposal is spelled out in a letter U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan has sent to Bashir. A top aide to Annan will remain in Khartoum until Bashir responds, Natsios said.

Earlier Wednesday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met with Natsios and said afterward she expects the Sudanese government to respond positively to the proposal for a hybrid force.

It is "extremely important that a robust security force, a robust peacekeeping force" be created," Rice said.

A no-fly zone would be designed to prevent Sudanese military aircraft from continuing to assist government-backed Arab militias, believed to be responsible for most of the atrocities in Darfur. Another option is imposing an asset freeze and a travel ban on Sudanese officials who have abetted the abuses in Darfur.

Sudan Given January 1 Deadline To Accept Darfur Peacekeepers (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, December 21, 2006

A senior US official warned that Sudan faces a January 1 deadline to accept the deployment of UN peacekeepers to Darfur or face coercive international action to halt violence in the region.

US Presidential envoy Andrew Natsios said he told Sudanese leaders in Khartoum last week they must allow an initial group of 60 UN peacekeeping staff currently "marooned" in the Sudanese capital to deploy to Darfur by year's end.

The also must "accept in writing" a plan put forward last month by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to place 20,000 UN-led troops in Darfur to halt violence which has left more than 200,000 people dead and 2.5 million displaced over the past four years.

"I have said publicly that I think making threats is not very useful, but we are going to take a different approach to this in January and there is a plan to do that," Natsios said.

"For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground, in Darfur ... by the end of the year," he said.

Natsios refused to provide details of what he described as "Plan B" if Sudan persists in rejecting the UN deployment, saying it was classified.

But US officials confirmed last week that enforcing a no-fly zone over Darfur, imposing sanctions on Sudan and backing prosecution of some Khartoum officials for crimes against humanity were among available options.

Natsios said the "Plan B" had been discussed with key partners dealing with the crisis, which include the European Union, China and the Arab League.

"We have a consensus that action is going to be taken," he said.

The international community is also seeking to obtain a "humanitarian ceasefire" in fighting between government forces and Darfur rebels over the next 10 days to allow a resumption of aid shipments to camps housing tens of thousands of displaced people, he said.

Natsios spoke to reporters after meeting Wednesday with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and a half-dozen of her top policy advisors on the Darfur crisis.

Rice expressed her "deep concern" with the ongoing violence in Darfur, where government forces recently launched a new offensive against ethnic African rebels seeking greater autonomy from the Arab-led administration in Khartoum.

The government and one of three main rebel factions signed a much-heralded peace agreement earlier this year, but the pact failed to halt the bloodshed.

The UN Security Council then adopted a resolution in July demanding the deployment of 20,000 blue-helmeted peacekeepers to replace an under-funded and ineffective African Union force of 7,000.

The government of President Omar al-Beshir rejected the plan, which he called a Western bid to partition his oil-rich country.

A compromise deal brokered by Annan last month called for the three-phased deployment of a hybrid force made up primarily of African troops but with UN command and logistics support.

While the Sudanese agreed to the plan in principle, Beshir later balked at allowing UN troops into the region, stranding 60 UN military advisors and civilian logistics experts in Khartoum.

Natsios said Wednesday that in order to avoid tougher international action, Khartoum had to let the 60 UN staff and their equipment into Darfur over the next 10 days and definitively accept the rest of the Annan plan.

A senior UN envoy, Ahmadou Ould Abdallah, arrived in Khartoum Wednesday with a letter from Annan laying out the world body's demands and will remain in Sudan until he obtains Beshir's written reply, he said.

During his week of talks in Khartoum, Natsios said the only assurance he received from the Sudanese was that they would "try very hard" to change their policy on rejecting UN troops.

Natsios also said China, which buys most of Sudan's oil and has resisted pressuring Khartoum in the past, was playing a "very helpful role" in the effort to resolve the Darfur crisis.

U.S. Gives Deadline Over Darfur (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

The United States has given Sudan until the end of the year to accept a three-stage U.N. proposal for an international peacekeeping force in Darfur before resorting to a harsher "Plan B," a senior U.S. envoy said yesterday.

The envoy, Andrew S. Natsios, declined to disclose details of the plan, saying it was classified. But diplomats say that a humanitarian corridor and a no-fly zone over Darfur are some of the measures being considered.

"Making threats is not very useful, but we are going to take a different approach to this in January, and there is a plan to do that," Mr. Natsios told reporters at the State Department after briefing Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on his trip to Sudan last week.

"For us to continue on the process of quiet diplomacy, negotiation and a process to resolve Darfur, then we need progress that's operational, on the ground in Darfur... by the end of the year," he said.

Mr. Natsios also said the Bush administration has been working closely with European allies on the fallback plan, although Arab and African countries have yet to be brought on board.

Many Arab governments back U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan's proposal for a three-stage deployment of a 20,000-strong "hybrid" peacekeeping force that includes troops from the United Nations and African Union, he said.

Mr. Annan sent an envoy to Khartoum yesterday with a letter outlining the stages, and Mr. Natsios said Washington needs an official, written response from the Sudanese government.

The first phase calls for a team of about 100 U.N. military advisers and civilian logistics staff, about 60 of whom are stuck in Khartoum, awaiting permission to go to Darfur. In the second stage, 2,000 troops would be deployed, with the remaining troops arriving in the third phase.

Mr. Annan's proposal is a compromise after Khartoum's rejection of a July resolution by the U.N. Security Council calling for a U.N. force to take over from a largely ineffective AU force.

"It is extremely important [to deploy] a robust peacekeeping force that can actually help to end the violence and bring relief to the many innocent men, women and children who are suffering in Sudan," Miss Rice said yesterday.

The Darfur conflict between mostly non-Arab rebels and government-sponsored militias, which Washington has called genocide, began in 2003. The International Criminal Court is investigating possible war crimes in the region, where analysts estimate that 200,000 have been killed and more than 2 million displaced.

Recent attacks on Darfur aid workers' compounds in the town of Gereida have forced the evacuation of 71 staff members and severely restricted humanitarian aid reaching the region's largest population of war victims, officials said yesterday.

About 20 armed men attacked the South Darfur town on Monday night, seizing a dozen vehicles and communications equipment and almost paralyzing aid operations, according to wire service reports.

"It's massive and hugely destructive and has severely disrupted aid operations," said Alun McDonald, spokesman for the British aid organization Oxfam, which had five vehicles stolen and whose compound was fired on during the attack.

US Hits At EU Emissions Plan For Airlines (FT)

By Andrew Bounds

Financial Times, December 21, 2006

The US on Wednesday condemned as illegal plans to include all airlines flying to and from the European Union in the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2012.

"The inclusion of non-EU airlines on a non-consensual basis runs counter to EU member states' legal obligations under the Chicago convention...and their bilateral air transport agreements, including with the US," a government spokesman said.

The European Commission had taken the decision "despite strong objections raised by the US and many other countries," he added. It proposed to "circumvent the appropriate multilateral body", the United Nations-run International Civil Aviation Organisation (ICAO). The US called on the EU's 25 member states to block the proposal, saying that it jeopardised international efforts to tackle the effect of air travel on global warming. It could use a dispute procedure in the 1944 Chicago convention, Washington said.

Stavros Dimas, environment commissioner, stood firm. He said the scheme was legally watertight and that the ICAO, which is expected to produced guidelines on fighting climate change next year, would not act without a firm lead.

Mr Dimas said flights wholly within the EU would be included within the bloc's greenhouse gas trading scheme from 2011, with all flights arriving and departing from the EU being covered a year later. He admitted the fast rate of air travel growth would hardly slow as green groups attacked the plans as too weak.

The European parliament, as well as national governments, must approve the plans. Caroline Lucas, an MEP who drafted a report on the subject that was approved in July, said it was a "wasted opportunity".

Her report noted that airline emissions were up to four times more damaging because they were produced high in the atmosphere. Allowing them to buy cheap permits from other industries would diminish the impact of the scheme.

Mr Dimas's plans to auction 10 per cent of the permits were amended to avoid legal challenges. Instead, the average figure from the 25- member state national allocation plans for industry would be used, which is just under 3 per cent. The rest will be given away based on historic emissions between 2004-6. The World Wildlife Fund estimates the industry could make €3.5bn ($4.6bn, £2.3bn) a year in windfall profits by passing on the perceived costs to customers.

The airline industry welcomed the market-based scheme but said other measures such as a single air traffic control space in the EU would be more useful in cutting emissions.

Europe Acts To Penalize Jet Pollution (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, December 21, 2006

PARIS, Dec. 20 — In the face of stiff opposition from the airline industry, the European Union moved forward Wednesday with plans to impose extra charges on foreign and domestic carriers that pollute too much.

"We are showing our determination to fight climate change," said Europe's environment commissioner, Stavros Dimas, who announced the proposal Wednesday in Brussels. "This is one way to persuade other countries to come along with us."

The rules, which would be legally binding, would apply to all flights within the bloc starting in 2011. Foreign carriers landing and taking off from busy airports like those in Frankfurt, London and Paris would be obliged to join the system the following year. If enacted, the measure could drive up costs for airlines, potentially leading to higher airfares for travelers.

The proposal draws from the principles of an established system that Europe now uses to help combat global warming and meet emissions goals set forth under the Kyoto Protocol.

Under that plan, which has so far exempted airlines, governments set goals for the carbon dioxide emissions of producers of power, cement, fuels, pulp and paper. If they exceed those goals, companies must purchase allocations, or credits. Many airlines, supported by the United States government, are seeking to blunt the European plans, calling them expensive and unworkable. They want the International Civil Aviation Organization, a United Nations agency, to draw up any rules for emissions trading so that all countries comply.

Giovanni Bisignani, director general of the International Air Transport Association, a group that includes most of the world's airlines, said Wednesday that he would continue to seek changes before the plan was approved by European Union governments and the European Parliament, a process that is likely to take years.

"We are concerned about the legal implications of applying the scheme outside Europe from 2012," Mr. Bisignani said. "We must have a global approach for a global problem."

Mr. Dimas maintained that his plans were legal, and he encouraged governments and airlines to speed efforts to reach a global accord to cap emissions, rather than block European efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0108325

Peter Lockley, a policy analyst at the Aviation Environment Federation in London, praised Mr. Dimas for "standing up to pressure from the U.S. and certain sections of the aviation industry" by including all flights landing at and taking off from European airports.

But Mr. Lockley criticized plans to give airlines most of their pollution credits free, rather than through more extensive auctions. Mr. Lockley also said that airlines, like other heavy polluters in Europe, should be required to reduce their emissions from 1990 levels, rather than from present levels.

Officials from the International Air Transport Association acknowledged that they had already won concessions from Europe in recent weeks, including a delay in specific plans to regulate nitrogen oxide, another pollutant emitted by aircraft engines.

British Airways said the planned legislation would "now treat aviation more similarly to other industries." But Lufthansa, a German carrier, sharply criticized the plan, saying that more rapid action to streamline air traffic control and reduce flight detours and holding patterns would be far more effective at cutting emissions.

The proposals "would tie up resources and capital by bureaucracy," Lufthansa said, warning that "important investments in environmentally friendly technologies would have to be postponed." Lufthansa is more dependent for overall sales than British Airways on flights that take off and land in the European Union.

The international air transport group said that Europe's proposal could still cost airlines globally up to 2.9 billion euros ($3.8 billion) a year to buy allowances starting in 2012, when the rules are expected to cover all flights in and out of the union.

But European officials said that airlines should be able to pass much of the extra costs on to passengers, who would face increases in ticket prices of $2 to $12 for a trip within the European Union over the next decade. Officials said a return flight to New York might cost an additional $10 to more than $50, depending on how much individual airlines would have to pay for extra carbon allowances.

Fliers Could See Fares Rise When EU Pollution Allowances Begin (AP)

By Aoife White

AP, December 21, 2006

BRUSSELS — Airlines that fly within the European Union will have to trade pollution allowances beginning in 2011, the European Commission said Wednesday, which could see travelers pay more for popular short-break trips.

Expanded rules covering all airlines that fly into the EU will take effect the next year, a move that would hit U.S. airlines on their lucrative trans-Atlantic routes.

Airlines are generally in favor of the plan, since EU officials had warned them that refusing to back a carbon emissions trading program would result in an aviation tax.

But the Commission urged the airline industry to cut down on releasing the greenhouse gas that causes climate change.

"EU emissions from international air transport are increasing faster than from any other sector," it said. "This growth threatens to undermine the EU's progress in cutting overall greenhouse gas emissions."

The plan could add between 1.80 euros and 9 euros (about $2.40 to $11.80) to a typical return flight within Europe with higher price hikes for long-haul trips. The Commission said this would be "significantly lower" than recent oil price increases passed on to air travelers.

Bowing to pressure from trade partners, the EU's executive arm will give all flights to and from EU airports an extra year to join the program.

All airlines — based in the EU or elsewhere — will have to trade emissions beginning in 2012 for all flights to and from European airports, it said.

The plan is compatible with international rules, EU Environment Commissioner Stavros Dimas said, adding that he did not believe U.S. airlines would win a challenge to it. He called on them to play their part in the fight against climate change.

It's a global problem," Dimas told reporters. "It needs a global solution."

The emissions trading program gives airlines a financial incentive to reduce emissions because they can sell allowances that they don't use. But if they fail to convert to low-carbon technology or simply increase their flights, they will be punished by being forced to buy additional allowances to release more carbon dioxide.

The EU said aircraft emissions currently make up 3% of total greenhouse gas emissions — higher than any other industry — but are increasing fast as cheap flights multiply and would likely double by 2020.

"Without action, the growth in emissions from flights from EU airports will by 2012 cancel out more than a quarter of the 8% emission reduction the EU must achieve to reach its Kyoto Protocol target," it said.

Someone flying from London to New York and back generates about the same level of emissions as the average person in the EU does by heating their home for a year, the Commission said.

Emissions will be capped at the average from 2004 to 2006, it said. Some allowances will be auctioned by national governments but most will be given away.

Scandinavian airline operator SAS AB said carbon trading was the best option because it did not punish economic growth. But it said it would have preferred to start with a global plan "in environmental terms and from a competitive perspective."

The Association of European Airlines, which represents Air France SA and British Airways, backed emissions trading but warned that a poorly designed program could strip airlines of the funds they need to introduce cleaner technology. The International Air Transport Association also gave it a "cautious welcome."

But environmentalists claimed the EU plan was too weak, citing a report from a British research organization, the Institute for Public Policy Research, that said airlines could earn up to 2.7 billion pounds ($5.26 billion) because they will get emissions allowances for free and pass on the costs in higher ticket prices.

One group, Transport and Environment, said the plan would barely reduce overall emissions and more measures were needed such as a tax on fuel and sales tax on tickets.

"This looks like business as usual and the likelihood of massive windfall profits for the industry," said T&E director Jos Dings.

Caroline Lucas, a Green Party member of the European Parliament, said airlines produce other greenhouse gases not covered by the plan, meaning their total contribution to climate change is between two and four times greater than other industries.

The required adoption by the European Parliament was unlikely while the plan runs "completely counter to their clearly stated view that all flights into and out of the EU should be included, and that the non-CO2 emissions should be taken into account,", said Lucas, a British MEP.

EU governments and the Parliament must back the plan — and can make changes — before it takes effect.

Paper Chase China's Reporters Face A Backlash Over Investigations (WSJ)

By Geoffrey A. Fowler And Jason Dean

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

BEIJING -- In a country where media censorship is national policy, Liu Jianqiang has pulled off some remarkable journalistic scoops.

When a wealthy socialite struck and killed a farmer with her BMW in northeastern China three years ago -- and then got off with a slap on the wrist -- it was Mr. Liu, an investigative reporter from out of town, who dug deep into the case. Local reporters who had been hushed up by government officials passed him information on irregularities in the way prosecutors handled the trial.

The result was a widely read story that suggested corruption influenced the verdict. Within days of the article's publication, the government ordered an official investigation. A prosecutor in the case was later convicted of receiving bribes on the BMW and other cases, and sentenced to six years in prison.

"There are people who don't want things to come out," says Mr. Liu. "But there are always other people who do."

Today, China's government is waging a media crackdown on such hard-hitting reports. Some officials fear that investigative reporting feeds public discontent over social ills such as rampant pollution, a growing wealth gap, and especially corruption. Prominent editors at publications around the country have lost their jobs. A law under review in China's legislature could make it much more difficult for reporters like Mr. Liu to investigate emergencies and dig up wrongdoing in distant towns and villages.

Mr. Liu's journalistic successes and the pressure he and his peers now face reflect the Chinese leadership's deep ambivalence toward the press. Journalists have become an effective tool for rooting out corruption, one of China's most intractable problems. They also unnerve Communist Party rulers fearful of unrest and any challenge to their authority.

In September the party ousted one of its highest-ranking members, Shanghai party secretary Chen Liangyu, as part of a probe into misuse of the city's $1.2 billion pension fund. The dismissal of Mr. Chen followed in-depth stories in several publications about the involvement of Mr. Chen's allies in the scandal.

For years, the government treated newspapers and TV stations -- all of which were at least partly state-owned -- as propaganda vehicles, and profitability wasn't a priority. Typical front-page news included tedious recitations of party leader speeches and profiles of model communist workers.

But as China's economic reforms gathered steam a decade ago, the government began cutting subsidies to media outlets and subjecting them to market forces. Many print media groups, increasingly forced to fend for themselves, produced commercial titles to draw readers and tap China's booming ad industry. At the same time, the party began officially encouraging watchdog journalism by state-run media outlets under the rubric "supervision by public opinion."

The changing atmosphere prompted some news outlets to pump up their investigative reporting, which quickly won over readers eager for an alternative to bland propaganda. Southern Weekend, the newspaper where Mr. Liu made his name, was among the first to make that shift. In 1992, the party-controlled Nanfang Daily Group transformed what had been a four-page entertainment newspaper into a hard-hitting weekly covering national news. It won more than a million readers, and advertising dollars flowed in. The paper, based in the booming southern city of Guangzhou, became famous for edgy interviews, such as one published in 2001 with members of a gang that had killed 28 people in a spree of murder and theft. The story analyzed the role of poverty in gang violence, and challenged China's growing inequality.

China's censors still wielded the authority to block sensitive stories about corruption and wrongdoing, and some topics -- such as direct criticism of senior leaders -- remained strictly off limits. But journalists at Southern Weekend and other publications found loopholes.

One of the most effective ones involved reporters digging for news in distant parts of the country, away from their own censors. China's censorship often relies on local officials using their influence over the local press. Out-of-towners escaped their reach.

The practice of sending reporters to investigate wrongdoing in other locations became known as yidi jiandu, or "cross-regional supervision." Journalists exploiting this regulatory gray zone helped expose such problems as China's massive rural HIV/AIDS crisis, which devastated the countryside in Henan province.

Aggrieved farmers and families of mining-disaster victims began seeking out journalists. Some papers, including Southern Weekend, set up special hotlines for calls from readers with grievances and story ideas. The growth of the Internet also helped enterprising reporters sniff out stories or get them published by faraway newspapers. Local government officials in provinces all around China soon feared visits from out-of-town reporters, especially from Southern Weekend.

One of the paper's most aggressive news hounds was Mr. Liu, now 37 years old. During his childhood in rural Shandong province, China didn't have any investigative journalists. His father, who had worked in a small municipal waterworks, was banished with the rest of the family to the countryside during the decadelong Cultural Revolution that began in 1966. With no books in the house, Mr. Liu learned to read using the only written material available -- self-criticisms his father was forced to write for his purported political offenses.

In college, Mr. Liu studied Marxism and then went to work for a bank. Bored with his job, he took a writing test for his local Communist Party newspaper, and landed a reporting job in 1997. The work wasn't as exciting as he had hoped. "I would follow party leaders and write that they went to a place and had a very important speech," he says.

In 2000, Mr. Liu joined a journalism program at Tsinghua University, one of China's top schools. There, he began to read overseas newspapers. He studied the Pulitzer Prizes. "My whole world changed," he says. "I learned what real news was."

After completing his master's degree in 2003, Mr. Liu found a job in the Beijing bureau of Southern Weekend. There, his editors got wind of the BMW incident. Local journalists in Harbin, a major city in the northeast, had been filing uncritical stories on the trial of the wealthy driver. Then, Chinese Internet forum users and bloggers began commenting on the case, raising its national profile.

Mr. Liu went to Harbin to investigate. He says he set up lunch with local journalists, some of whom "had information they could share, but had been instructed by the local propaganda department not to do so." One journalist hinted to Mr. Liu that the trial was flawed, and passed him a videotape of the court proceedings.

Mr. Liu took a taxi to the tiny village where the victim's husband lived. But the husband, Dai Yiquan, didn't want to talk about the accident. As Mr. Liu tried to put him at ease, another farmer pulled up in a tractor with a machine to grind corn into feed. Mr. Liu, familiar with such chores from his childhood on a farm, offered to help Mr. Dai.

Several bushels later, Mr. Liu had won Mr. Dai's trust, and a major lead on the story. The husband, it turned out, had told police that the BMW driver had shouted and cursed at the couple before the collision, and had tried to hit him with her car before striking his wife. This belied the defendant's claims that the incident was a simple accident.

Back in town, Mr. Liu found a judge -- a friend of a friend -- who helped him review the videotape of the court proceedings. They found that the prosecutor never introduced Mr. Dai's recounting of the driver's verbal assault, nor his allegation that the collision was intentional. The judge told Mr. Liu this omission was a violation of Chinese court procedure. Mr. Liu's story ran in the following week's Southern Weekend. The headline read: "Harbin's 'BMW-Hits-Pedestrian' Case Clouded by Doubt: Numerous Problems Emerge in Legal Procedures."

Two officials connected with the case were eventually removed from office. One, a prosecutor named Pang Jiulin, was convicted in August of 2004 of corruption for having taken $10,125 in bribes in the BMW and other cases. He was sentenced to six years in prison. Zhang Yanbin, another local official, was dismissed in July for taking a $1,012 bribe. The court report said that the BMW bribe was from the driver's family, but never said who was doing the bribing in the other cases.

The provincial propaganda department office declined to comment on the case. Messrs. Pang and Zhang couldn't be reached for comment.

Mr. Liu later scored other journalistic coups. A front-page story he wrote last year helped prompt the government to abandon a project to seal the bottom of a Beijing lake after showing that the project was destroying the surrounding ecosystem. It won him an environmental reporting prize sponsored by DuPont Co. After he wrote a piece about an HIV prevention program for sex workers in Yunnan province, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation paid for him to attend the International AIDS Conference in Toronto.

But outwitting the system through yidi jiandu soon got a lot tougher for Mr. Liu and his colleagues. In the summer of 2005, Mr. Liu landed what he thought was another big scoop: a tip, he says, that the deputy governor of Henan province was being investigated for conspiring to have his wife killed.

Mr. Liu called the police for comment. "I knew that the story was sensitive and if I got one little thing wrong, they would use it to come after me," he says. When he called at 10:00 a.m. the day before the story was to run, police confirmed the case existed, but said they were still awaiting instruction from authorities on how to talk about it, Mr. Liu says.

That afternoon, the propaganda department of Guangdong province, Southern Weekend's home, called Mr. Liu's editors and told them not to run the story, he says. He believes the call came because the Henan propaganda department asked the central government to intervene in the case. The Guangdong and Henan propaganda departments didn't respond to a request for an interview.

Only months later did China's high court release rudimentary details of the case. In October of 2005, the vice governor was sentenced to death for the murder of his wife, according to the court's official Web site.

The incident was a sign of bigger problems. As muckraking stirred up public angst, government officials grew frustrated. "The central government is using the media as a watchdog," says Li Xiguang, executive dean at the School of Journalism and Communication at Tsinghua University. But officials are also "very much worried about mistrust of the public toward the government."

In particular, the increasingly freewheeling media were criticized by some outside the government for shoddy journalistic practices. "Commercial pressure seeks readers, and people love negative news," Mr. Li says.

Such criticism resonated with the administration of President Hu Jintao, who has made building a "harmonious society" a big priority since he took office in 2003. Last fall, the government stepped up its curbs on the Internet and fired or censured several prominent editors. The central government also issued a guideline calling for an end to "cross-regional supervision" reporting.

When Southern Weekend's top editor heard the news, he held a somber staff meeting. "Everyone felt helpless," says Ruichun Yang, at the time Southern Weekend's page-one editor, who adds: "If yidi jiandu ends, so does watchdog journalism." Soon after, three of the weekly's front-page stories were yanked before they went to press, says Ms. Yang.

The guidance against yidi jiandu doesn't yet constitute Chinese law, and Southern Weekend still sends its staff to report in other provinces. But editors think twice now before doing so. Today as many as one in five of Southern Weekend's big stories end up getting axed, and many more ideas are killed before they're even reported, Ms. Yang says.

Officials at Nanfang Daily Group, Southern Weekend's owner, didn't respond to a request for an interview.

A frustrated Mr. Liu took a sabbatical last April to write a book about Tibetan culture, and returned only this month. He and other Chinese journalists say they haven't given up. "Even with the restrictions on political reporting, there is a lot of room for Chinese journalists to write meaningful articles," Mr. Liu says.

Last summer, China's legislature began debating a proposed law that would make yidi jiandu harder, by enabling heavy fines against journalists who report news without the authorization of local governments. But in a surprising show of defiance, some newspapers and magazines condemned the draft law almost immediately after lawmakers began considering it in June. The proposal remains under discussion.

Chinese Journalist Freed Five Years Early (WT/AP)

By Elaine Kurtenbach, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 21, 2006

SHANGHAI -- A journalist serving a 13-year jail term for reporting about a bogus irrigation project has been released five years early to unusually vocal official acclaim for his determination to fight corruption.

Gao Qinrong, previously an investigative journalist for a state-run newspaper in northern China's Shanxi province, was imprisoned in 1998 and released earlier this month, according to media activists and state press reports.

Such developments rarely win a mention in China's state-controlled press, given the political sensitivities over Beijing's violations of freedom of press and other civil liberties.

Yet, Mr. Gao's case is being touted as evidence of the country's willingness to empower the press to help fight corruption.

"That the local reporter Gao Qinrong was framed and imprisoned after revealing the frightful spectacle of local corruption is a highly irregular situation," the state-run newspaper Southern Weekend said in a commentary accompanying a lengthy interview with Mr. Gao after his release.

"Why should media today have to face this problem or that problem when reporting on the problem of corruption?" it stated. Mr. Gao, 51, was not immediately available for comment yesterday.

In the interview, he insisted he was right in publishing the reports that resulted in his imprisonment.

"To be a journalist, you have to speak for the people," Mr. Gao told Southern Weekend. "If I hadn't published that report, it would be as if the case never happened. We can't all be yes-men. If we are, what hope is there for our country?

"Corruption must be exposed," he said.

The authorities' motives in highlighting Mr. Gao's case are not clear.

Mr. Gao drew national attention with a 1998 report in the Shanxi Youth Daily that a $35 million irrigation project in Yuncheng, a city in northern China, was a scam meant to boost the careers of local officials. It was published in the Communist Party newspaper the People's Daily and followed on state-run television.

Months later, Mr. Gao was arrested by Yuncheng officials on charges of bribery and fraud, among others, and sentenced after a brief trial to 13 years in prison.

His release comes as China's top leaders are orchestrating simultaneous corruption crackdowns in several major Chinese cities, including Beijing and Shanghai.

The scandals appear to be aimed at appeasing public anger over corruption while shoring up the power base of President Hu Jintao ahead of an important party congress next year.

Welcome, Wal-Mart Comrades (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 21, 2006

For a peek into China's labor market, look no further than Wal-Mart. In North America, the world's biggest retailer prefers to close down stores rather than tolerate unionized staff. But in China, most of Wal-Mart's 68 stores not only have labor unions, but six locations now boast Communist Party branches as well. What's next? Comrade Sam's Clubs?

The latest Wal-Mart Party cell debuted Friday at the chain's headquarters in Shenzhen. This followed the company's decision in July to give in after years of pressure from the nationally sanctioned All-China Federation of Trade Unions. Thirty employees at a Wal-Mart store in Fujian province unionized. According to the ACFTU, it now has more than 6,000 members in Wal-Marts across China. The Party has followed the unions' path through the front doors.

Wal-Mart spokesman Jonathan Dong told China Daily that Wal-Mart supports the Shenzhen cadres. "We have had this attitude since the trade union was established [in July]," he said. "Both will be good for the development of Wal-Mart in China."

That's not a sure thing. For starters, the function of the new unions remains unclear. Labor lawyers tell us that Chinese unions aren't like those in the West. Relations with management are generally benign. Demonstrations are rare, as unions and party cells like to keep a low profile. So a company like Wal-Mart may not perceive much threat from opening its doors to union and Party. But there's nothing to guarantee that union members won't catch onto the practices of their Western peers.

Legal change is afoot, too. Sometime in the next week, Beijing's legislature is expected to hold a second reading of the Labor Contract Law. The document will redefine labor rights and the ACFTU's power. The first draft gave foreign investors a jolt. It made employee dismissals for poor performance difficult. The draft also required company policies and regulations to be negotiated between employer and "employee representatives," a la Germany.

More than 190,000 industry players registered comments on the draft law with the Party. Many believe the new version will be more employer friendly, though the draft still hasn't been made public. Many foreign-invested firms are waiting for the passage of the legislation before deciding whether to admit the ACFTU, as Wal-Mart did.

Which makes Wal-Mart's embrace of union and Party all the more puzzling. Perhaps Wal-Mart wasn't given much of a choice, and was chosen to send a message to other foreign-invested enterprises. Which is: We're watching you from outside, and inside.

Rice Asks Chertoff, DOJ To Review Arar Case. Bloomberg (12/22, Zacharia) reports that in a press conference yesterday with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, "U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked homeland security chief Michael Chertoff and the Justice Department to review the case of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who Canada says was wrongly accused of links to terrorism and remains on a U.S. terrorist watch list. … Canada has removed Arar from its watch list and wants the U.S. to do the same." Bloomberg adds, "Asked if she had anything to say to Arar on how he has been treated, Rice defended U.S. counterterrorism and border security procedures, saying 'it needs to be understood that in the post-September 11 circumstances we are determined to protect our borders.'

CBC News (12/21) reported Rice said that "U.S. security officials will review why…Arar is still on a U.S. terrorist watch list," but she "reiterated that the U.S. makes its own security decisions based on independent information. 'We value accuracy in cases but we do have our own process,' she said. 'It needs to be understood that in the post-Sept. 11 circumstances, we are determined to protect our borders.' MacKay said he brought up Arar's status in the meeting with his U.S. counterpart and reiterated that Arar has been cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism." CBC noted, "The meeting between MacKay and Rice came a day after" DHS Acting Assistant Secretary for International Affairs Paul Rosenzweig "bluntly stated the U.S. would follow its own path on Arar without informing Canadians on its reasons. … Prime Minister Stephen Harper told Sun Media that 'as near as I can see, we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong.'"

New Analysis Finds Hudson River Tunnels Vulnerable To Bomb Attack. The New York Times (12/22, Rashbaum, Neuman, 1.16M) reports, "An analysis done for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey says that the PATH train tunnels under the Hudson River are more vulnerable to a bomb attack than previously thought, and that a relatively small amount of high explosives could cause significant flooding of the rail system within hours." The new information was shared with the Times "by a government official who was troubled by what the official felt was a lack of action in response to the analysis, which the official said the Port Authority got about three weeks ago." The official said the Port Authority had not yet informed the governors of New York and New Jersey, the "Department of Homeland Security, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, the New York Police Department or other law enforcement agencies" of the results of the analysis.

Five Cuban-Americans Testify In Posada Carriles Probe. The AP (12/22, Press) reports, "Five Cuban-Americans were called to testify in a federal grand jury probe exploring allegations they helped send more than $30,000 to an anti-Castro militant suspected of directing attacks on Cuba, their lawyer said Thursday. All five deny wrongdoing, attorney Gilberto M. Garcia said. He told The Record of Bergen County that four of his clients claim someone used their names to send transfers to Luis Posada Carriles," and "a fifth, Oscar Rojas, acknowledges handling transfers but says he did so only at the request of a former millionaire businessman that he worked for and did not know what the funds would be used for, according to The Record." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would neither confirm nor deny an investigation into the money transfers was ongoing."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Chertoff Says DHS Will Issue New Chemical Plant Security Rules. The New York Times (12/22, Lipton, 1.16M) reports following "years of debate, and criticism over the delay," Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that the department will issue chemical plant security rules Friday that "will bring us to a much higher level of security." However, "the draft regulations will almost certainly evoke protest from Democrats on Capitol Hill — as well as from state officials — because they may allow a federal pre-emption of conflicting and perhaps more demanding state laws. They also may allow the Department of Homeland Security, under certain circumstances, to recognize as sufficient the security measures already put in place voluntarily by major chemical manufacturers, meaning that for many plants, few if any changes would be required." The times continues that the draft rules "will leave it up to plant owners to decide what measures are most appropriate, although the Homeland Security Department will review the plans and have the power to order changes."

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A3, Block, 2.04M) reports the rules were "heavily influenced by the chemical industry," and "will tell plants what they need to do, and not how, a strategy unlikely to satisfy many Democratic lawmakers who take control of Congress next month." Chertoff said the announcement "is part two of what we did with respect to trains carrying hazardous chemicals between places. These rules now cover security when those chemicals come to rest." The Journal adds that critics saw the rail security rules unveiled last week "as weak -- a charge also likely to hit the chemical-plant rules."

DHS Privacy Office Says Secure Flight Violated Federal Law. The Washington Post (12/22, A7, Nakashima, Wilber, 690K) reports a report to be issued Friday by the Homeland Security Department's privacy office says "Secure Flight, the US government's stalled program to screen domestic air passengers against terrorism watch lists, violated federal law during a crucial test phase" when it gathered "passenger data from commercial brokers…without notifying the passengers." It is "the first time that the Homeland Security Department has acknowledged that the problem-plagued Secure Flight program has violated the law." The report finds "that 'the disparity between what TSA proposed to do and what it actually did in the testing program resulted in significant privacy concerns being raised."

Audit Finds DHS Lacks Financial Controls. The New York Times (12/22, News, 1.16M) reports the auditing firm KPMG LLP has found, for the third straight year, that it could not provide an opinion on the balance sheet of the Department of Homeland Security "because of its lax financial controls and oversight. The department last year hired a chief financial officer, David Norquist, for the first time. In a Nov. 15 letter, Mr. Norquist wrote: 'We agree with the independent public accountant's conclusions. Since my arrival at the department I have made corrective actions my highest priority.'"

"Material Support" Laws Said To Be Limiting Refugee Admission Into US. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Gaouette, 850K) reports that post-9/11 US laws denying "admission to anyone who has provided 'material support'…to terrorist groups" have expanded over the last few years "to the point that they are disqualifying people who even immigration judges agree pose no threat to the US." Critics say disqualifications of people who unwillingly supported terrorists "are a big reason why refugee admissions in fiscal 2006 fell to 41,277 from more than 50,000 in each of the two previous years. The material-support clause has even snared American allies who fought alongside US troops or at the United States' behest." The Times adds that "Homeland Security officials say they hope for legislation next year" that "would expand the use of government-issued waivers that allow an otherwise banned group or person into the country."

WAR NEWS:

Eight Marines Charged In Haditha Killings. ABC World News (12/21, story 4, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Criminal charges were filed today against eight Marines in a case that has damaged the US military's reputation in Iraq and throughout the Muslim world, the alleged massacre of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Four of the Marines were charged with murder, and four were charged with dereliction of duty." The CBS Evening News (12/21, lead story, 2:41, Couric, 7.66M) said that "in a war filled with horrors, this was one of the most shocking." CBS (Martin) added, "It's the biggest criminal case of the Iraq war, a sergeant faced with 13 counts of murder and a lieutenant colonel accused of dereliction of duty are among the eight Marines charged. It all started when an improvised explosive device, or I.E.D., killed one Marine." Col. Stewart Navarre, spokesman US Marine Corps: "Over the next several hours, 24 Iraqi men, women, and children, died in the vicinity of the IED explosion." Martin: "Sergeant Frank Wuterich, the leader of the squad ambushed in Haditha a year ago, is charged with killing 12 Iraqi civilians. He's also accused of killing six when he opened fire without first identifying his victims. His attorney insists Wuterich was not out for revenge." Neal

Puckett, defense attorney: "Everything he did that day was in an effort to protect his Marines from any further harm after the IED went off." Puckett "portrayed the war -- nasty, urban combat in which one false step can lead to death -- as the real culprit."

NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 4, 1:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Military officials say it appeared some of the victims had been shot execution-style. Defense lawyers argue the Marines were using appropriate force under the current rules of engagement. Four other Marines – officers -- have also been charged with dereliction of duty for failing to investigate the incident. Now, if those four initial Marines are court-martialed and convicted of murder, they could face life in prison on each count." The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Marosi, Perry, 850K) notes, "Initial reports from the Marines stated that 15 civilians died in an explosion and eight Iraqis were killed in a firefight. Only after Time magazine published an investigative story suggesting that the Marine account was false did the military begin its own investigations."

The AP (12/22, Watkins) reports, "At a news conference to announce the charges, military officials would not say what they believe prompted the killings. But investigators have raised the possibility that the men went on a rampage in a fury over the roadside bombing that killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso, Texas, and wounded two other Marines." USA Today (12/22, Kasindorf, 2.27M), New York Times (12/22, Von Zielbauer, Marshall, 1.16M), Washington Post (12/22, A1, White, Geis, 690K) and Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Knickerbocker, 59K) also report on the incident and charges.

Contractor Accused Of Opening Fire On Civilians. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 6, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "two men who went to Iraq as part of a team of heavily-armed private security contractors and who now tell NBC News they saw their supervisor open fire on Iraqi civilians just, as they say, 'for the thrill of it.' An act of violence by contractors would not be an isolated incident in Iraq. But this story comes as a new Federal report accuses the Pentagon of failing to adequately oversee private contractors in that war zone." NBC (Myers) added, "Shane Schmidt is a former Marine Corps sniper, Chuck Shepard, a former Army Ranger. Both joined the legions of heavily-armed private security contractors in Iraq. They claim that during a mission last July, another American fired unprovoked into two Iraqi civilian vehicles, possibly killing at least one person. Do you think a crime was committed that day?" Triple Canopy "does not deny that shootings occurred. But it says the facts, including what might have provoked the shootings, are in dispute and it has no evidence anyone was hurt."

Gates Hears Support For More Troops In Iraq. The AP (12/21, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "traded ideas with Iraqi leaders Thursday about boosting military assistance for the embattled government and warned Iraq's neighbors that the U.S. will be a presence in the Persian Gulf for a long time." Gates said that "Iran and Syria are playing a negative role in the violence" and added, "We need to make damned sure that the neighbors understand that we're going to be here for a long time -- here being the Persian Gulf." He also said that "there are several approaches that could be used to improve security, yet offered few details." In speaking to soldiers, Gates "asked whether adding forces would help" and "got a roomful of nods and smattering of 'yes, sir' responses." Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/22, Cloud, 1.16M) says Gates, "talking to enlisted soldiers on his second day in Iraq, heard broad support today for a proposal to send more American forces to Iraq." Gates also said that in a "meeting with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials…he had discussed 'the possibility of some additional assistance' with the Iraqis, but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops."

The Washington Post (12/22, A23, Ricks, Raghavan, 690K) reports that Maliki told Gates that "he would let U.S. generals decide whether there is a need for a 'surge' in U.S. troops deployed in Iraq." Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir Muhammed Jassim "indicated general acceptance" of an "increase in the number of U.S. troops." But Sami al-Askari, "a Shiite member of parliament who is close to Maliki" said that at a meeting of Shiite parliamentarians "there was a general feeling that 'there's no need for further troops.'" Maliki's office said that he "told Gates that Sunni Arab insurgents and loyalists of Saddam Hussein's former Baath Party were behind the violence unfolding in the capital." Maliki "advisers say he has proposed a two-pronged strategy in which U.S. troops would target Sunni Arab insurgents in outer Baghdad neighborhoods for four to eight weeks, while Iraqi forces would take over control of inner Baghdad." At a breakfast with "more than a dozen enlisted soldiers" Gates "got an earful about the need for more personnel."

Some Military Leaders Could Back Troop Surge. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports,

"Some military leaders aren't opposed to Iraq troop surge. Army leaders privately tell White House they could back more soldiers if Bush provides latitude to sustain the effort through reserve call-ups."

Armed Forces Expansion Favored By Retired Officers And Joint Chiefs. The Washington Times (12/22, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "President Bush only acceded to a jump in the number of U.S. Army and Marine Corps ground troops after intense pressure from senior officers, active and retired, including the Joint Chiefs, defense sources said." Bush "heard about the stressed Army and Marines Corps from a group of retired officers at the Pentagon" and he "listened to a request for more combat forces from Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant." Schoomaker "and Mr. Rumsfeld's staff did not see eye to eye on the size of a budget increases needed to replace damaged equipment." Meanwhile, "the Joint Chiefs do not favor proposals from Democrats to remove all 135,000 troops immediately from Iraq or to bring them out in a preset timeline." Retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Thomas McInerney said, "We are badly under-funding the Department of Defense for the missions we have given them."

Gates, Rumsfeld Styles Contrasted. The New York Times (12/22, Cloud, 1.16M) runs a profile of Gates this morning, in which the new secretary is contrasted (favorably) with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. For example, the Times notes Gates' use of meetings with soldiers to "collect impressions about conditions outside the heavily fortified American military compounds." But "it is easy -- and facile -- to view almost every move he makes as either a deliberate or unconscious repudiation of Mr. Rumsfeld." The article indicates some "similarities" between the two, noting that "both men left Washington for long periods" and that Gates can "be an exacting bureaucratic taskmaster." But "Gates has not returned with sweeping ambitions of transforming the department. Nor has he brought a coterie of ideologically driven aides with him." Gates also "leaves no doubt that he sees fixing Iraq as his overriding mission." And "perhaps he recognizes that his best management tool, at least for now, is to be seen as the anti-Rumsfeld."

Rice Says US Can Still Win In Iraq. In an exclusive interview with the AP (12/22, Gearan), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars and "said the US can still win a conflict that has been more difficult than she expected." Asked whether an additional $100 billion the Pentagon wants for the Iraq and Afghan wars "might amount to throwing good money after bad in Iraq," Rice said, "I don't think it's a matter of money. Along the way there have been plenty of markers that show that this is a country that is worth the investment, because once it emerges as a country that is a stabilizing factor you will have a very different kind of Middle East." The secretary noted that "a lot has been invested in Iraq," and said President Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed."

On PBS' NewsHour (12/21, Warner), Rice said, "The President's looking at his options. And I'm going to look at them with him. And, of course, we'll give him advice. But my view is that we need to do what needs to be done in order to win. … The President is waiting not to hear reports of what commanders may be saying, or rumors about what commanders may be saying, or even the voices of a commander here or a commander there, but rather to get a systematic look at what his options are, at what the people on the ground, the commanders, think is going to help support this Iraqi government in getting control of the violence in Baghdad. And he'll make a decision at that point."

Experts Skeptical About Possibility Of Victory. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 8, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the results of asking "five prominent thinkers and policymakers -- how do you define victory in Iraq?" Their responses were generally negative, saying that victory was "unlikely" or "no longer achievable" yet each held out the hope of a redefined victory under a new strategy. Jamil Mroue, Editor-in-Chief, The Daily Star, Beirut: "Victory to this part of the world is stability." He urged the U.S. to "move from a paradigm of security and force to an active role in justice, which is the essence of America, then there is possibly a win-win situation that would be victory." Susan Rice, Senior Fellow, Brookings Institution: "A stable, democratic, peaceful Iraq -- is no longer achievable in a reasonable timeframe, if it ever was." Instead, "the best we can hope for at this stage, and it is a long shot, is to prevent Iraq from becoming a fully failed state." Dr. Henry Kissinger, Secretary of State, 1973-1977: "Victory…is unlikely." But, "An end to the civil war and a coalition government that prevents the establishment of terrorist ends on its territory" is "achievable, but not by the present strategy." Paul Rieckhoff, Executive Director, Iraq & Afghanistan Veterans of America: "For most of the troops on the ground, the key victory is just surviving." Still, "if victory is trying to stand up a government and trying to save face, maybe we've got a chance." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison: "I think everyone agrees that adjustments are due but let's do it in a way that continues the overall goal of stopping terrorism and protecting Americans and freedom-loving people throughout the world."

Sadr, Sunni Group Seen As Undercutting Drive Toward New Iraqi Coalition. The New York Times (12/22, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Several Iraqi political groups on Thursday maneuvered to undercut an American-backed initiative that would create a multisectarian bloc intended to isolate extremists like the Shiite cleric and militia leader Moktada al-Sadr. The bloc would consist of Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish parties in an alliance that would be novel in Iraq's highly sectarian political environment. This week, Iraqi and Western officials said that Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a highly influential Shiite cleric, had given a tentative go-ahead to the coalition." But yesterday, "Saleem Abdullah, a Sunni Arab lawmaker who is a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said his party had set tough new conditions for its participation in the bloc."

Meanwhile, says USA Today/AP (12/22, 7A), "Sadr has agreed to allow supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government after a three-week boycott, officials close to the militia leader said Thursday, as political rivals pushed to form a coalition without him. Shiites from parliament's largest bloc met Thursday in their holy city of Najaf to try to forge a new coalition across sectarian lines -- one that won't include al-Sadr's supporters." They "hoped, in part, to pressure al-Sadr to rejoin the political process and rein in his Mahdi Army militia, which is blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian violence." In Najaf, "delegates from seven Shiite parties appealed to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, whose word is law to many Shiites, to support a planned governing coalition. The coalition would include Shiites, Kurds and one Sunni party -- and bridge Iraq's treacherous sectarian divide." The AP adds. "Though al-Sistani is expected to approve the deal, he fears the coalition could weaken the Shiite bloc, officials close to him said on condition of anonymity because they were not allowed to speak to the press. It seems likely that al-Sistani intervened to persuade al-Sadr to return to government and avoid a Shiite split."

ABC World News (12/21, story 5, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "word from Iraq tonight of a possible -- and we emphasize possible -- breakthrough in trying to end the political paralysis there." ABC (McCarthy) added that "after reports surfaced that the US was brokering a new coalition government of moderate Sunnis and Shiites, Sadr appears to have become nervous that he would be left out."

Arab States Said To View Iraqi Government As "Iranian Stooge." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "US military officials and diplomats want Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates and other Gulf states to recognize Maliki government, send ambassadors to Baghdad and forgive more than $40 billion in Iraqi debt. Among Sunni states, only Egypt has sent an ambassador, and he was assassinated. The problem: Most Arab states, an official says, 'see the current government as...an Iranian stooge.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Murphy, 59K) reports that leaders of "Jordan, Israel, and Saudi Arabia, and its foes Syria and Iran -- are engaging in new diplomatic efforts, largely aimed at preventing Iraq's fighting from causing broader turmoil." While in some cases the talks are "only tangentially about Iraq, this high-level dialogue appears to reflect a new reality: With US prestige crippled by the war, regional actors are bypassing the West to forge partnerships and find solutions on their own." In Jordan, King Abdullah II sought to relieve growing tensions between Palestinian factions, while Arab League chief Amr Moussa "seems to be making some progress at ending" Lebanon's "political crisis." However, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Israel are "less concerned about democracy in Iraq or Lebanon," but instead are "all committed to opposing an expansion of Iranian power, which they see as threatening their own vital interests."

Three More US Service Members Killed Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 5, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported "the United States military announced the deaths of three more American service members in Iraq. That brings the total number of Americans killed in the month of December to 71. And if the violence does not let up, this could turn out to be the deadliest month of the year, surpassing October's total of 105."

The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Daragahi, 850K) reported that a suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed 14 Iraqis near a crowded police recruitment center in the capital…in the latest salvo by Sunni Arab insurgents against the Shiite Muslim-dominated government." The Washington Post (12/22, A23, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar story,

Contractor Blames Government For Botched Iraq Building Mission. The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Witte, 690K) reports, "Until this year, Parsons Corp. was about as quiet as a $3 billion engineering and construction firm with 12,000 employees could be. That's the way the firm's chief executive for the past decade -- a soft-spoken, white-haired Army veteran named James F. McNulty -- liked it." But "Iraq has changed everything." Parsons "has been reproved in recent federal audits for completing just a small fraction of the 150 primary health clinics originally planned to be built in Iraq and for building a police academy so flawed that human waste rained from the ceilings. For this, it has taken bipartisan hits on Capitol Hill, where its name is now whispered by war critics in the same breath as that perennial boogeyman, Halliburton." The Post adds, "Sick of taking blame, McNulty, 64, is speaking out about what went wrong with his firm's work and what he regards as the problems with how the United States uses private contractors in Iraq. In a recent interview at the firm's Washington offices, one of a series he has given, McNulty said the government handed Parsons an impossible task by setting unrealistically high expectations for how much could be built while under-funding its efforts." McNulty "said the company repeatedly pleaded with the government to either provide enough money to get the job done or scale back its goals, but said its entreaties were ignored." The comments "are unusual for the leader of a firm that makes much of its money doing work for the government. Then again, few have been battered as badly as Parsons."

Saddam's Commanders Deny Gassing Kurds. The AP (12/22, Al-Bashir, Halaby) reports, "Two former Iraqi commanders denied gassing Kurdish civilians in northern Iraq 20 years ago, telling Saddam Hussein's genocide trial Thursday that they used only conventional weapons against Kurdish rebels and Iranian troops." Sultan al-Tai, minister of defense under Saddam, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, a deputy director of army operations, "testified to rebut evidence presented by prosecutors in videos and documents this week."

Former NATO Chief Says Taliban Still Crossing Pakistani Border. AFP (12/22) reports, "Islamic fighters are still entering Afghanistan from Pakistan, despite a deal between Islamabad and tribal chiefs meant to cut down the incursions, NATO's former top General warned." Gen. James Jones, "who handed over to General John Craddock as Supreme Allied Commander Europe this month, said the Western alliance's political leadership would raise the issue with Pakistan unless things improved."

Nicholson Says "Society Would Benefit" From Draft. The AP (12/22, Hunt) reports the Selective Service System "is planning a comprehensive test of the military draft machinery, which hasn't been run since 1998." However, the agency "is not gearing up for a draft, an agency official said Thursday. The test itself would not likely occur until 2009." And after Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said "that 'society would benefit' if the US were to bring back the draft and that it shouldn't have any loopholes for anyone who is called to serve," he "later issued a statement saying he does not support reinstituting a draft." The AP (12/22, Kugler) notes "the administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed." Nicholson, "who served in Vietnam, was in New York to announce a partnership with Mayor Michael Bloomberg to help homeless veterans find housing." A reporter "suggested that the all-volunteer armed forces attract a disproportionate number of minorities and people trying to lift themselves out of poverty, and asked Nicholson if the draft should be reinstated to make the military more equal." Nicholson said, "I think that our society would benefit from that, yes sir."

Ignatius Urges Americans To Read Soldiers' Blogs. In his Washington Post column (12/22, A33), David Ignatius writes, "This holiday season, America is struggling through a searing national debate about Iraq. The horror of the war feels immediate, even to people who've never been near Baghdad, but less so the humanity of the thousands of American soldiers who are serving there. That's part of the Iraq disconnect: The war dominates our political life, but the men and women in the midst of it often are nearly invisible. We see them in thumbnail photos in group obituaries but not as real, living people." Ignatius adds, "If you read soldiers' blogs, and I've looked at several dozen over the past few days, you see a recurring anger that the media aren't telling their story. … Needless to say, the first thing most American soldiers are thinking about is getting back home."

DOJ:

Gonzales Appoints Wrigley To Chair DOJ Crime Subcommittee. WDAY-TV Fargo, ND (12/21, 6:00 p.m.) reported in its broadcast that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "appointed Drew Wrigley, North Dakota's US attorney, to chairman of the Violent and Organized Crime Subcomittee. The 14-member committee will meet every six weeks in Washington with Gonzales," playing "a role in advancing the Justice Department's efforts to battle terrorism, corporate fraud, and other types of crime."

DOJ Move Against Steroid Probe Reporters Expected To Fuel Shield Law Debate. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, B3, Bravin, Ellison, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration is increasingly at odds with some Republicans over its efforts to make journalists reveal confidential sources. The controversy is reaching a flashpoint in San Francisco, where the Justice Department is expected to file papers today urging that two San Francisco Chronicle reporters face jail if they refuse to reveal their source for confidential grand-jury proceedings concerning baseball slugger Barry Bonds's alleged use of steroids." The Journal adds, "Under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the Justice Department has pursued journalists' sources in cases ranging from a terrorism investigation of Islamic charities to the alleged vandalism of a police car. … Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the government continues to follow its guidelines and disputed claims that pursuit of reporters' sources and records has increased under Mr. Gonzales. 'Over the past 15 years there have been less than 20 source subpoenas issued,' she said, although no figures were available on subpoenas for unpublished notes or recordings. 'To say we've been incredibly cautious and restrained when using this lawful tool is an understatement.'" The Journal notes, "Mark Corallo, the Justice Department press secretary under former Attorney General John Ashcroft, filed an affidavit in the Chronicle case saying that he wouldn't have approved the reporter subpoenas. 'This case is so far below the acceptable standards the department has lived by for close to 40 years that it will embolden prosecutors to make this a first step, not a last step,' Mr. Corallo said in an interview."

Defense Lawyer Said To Be Source Of BALCO Leak. The AP (12/22) reports, "A private investigator who worked for defendants in the probe of a Bay Area sports steroid ring said a defense lawyer was the source of leaked federal grand jury testimony in the case, according to a report published Thursday. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame, told the FBI that defense lawyer Troy Ellerman gave the confidential information to a San Francisco Chronicle reporter in 2004, Yahoo.com reported. 'We do have an investigation on those allegations that he (Ellerman) was responsible for the leak,' FBI spokesman Joe Schadler told The Associated Press. Ellerman, who serves as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association, represented Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative. He later represented BALCO vice president James Valente. Both men pleaded guilty in 2005 to distributing steroids."

2006 Seen As "Busy Year" For DOJ. NBC News (12/22, Williams) reported on its Web site, "Between the Supreme Court's striking down of the Bush administration's plan to conduct military trials for war-on-terror detainees and the pursuit of allegedly corrupt government officials, it was a busy year for the Justice Department. With decisions expected on the National Security Agency's Terror Surveillance Program and the Lewis 'Scooter' Libby trial getting underway in January, 2007 is expected to be just as decisive." Reviewing major DOJ-related issues from this past year, NBC noted, "The Justice Department struggled to respond to a setback delivered in June by the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the administration's plan to conduct military trials for detainees picked up in the war on terror." Meanwhile, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pushed Congress to find a way to resolve legal doubts about the government's Terrorist Surveillance Program," but "when the Congress finished its work in early December, no agreement had been reached on clarifying the program's legality." NBC added, "New statistics showed the number of federal terrorism prosecutions dropping to its lowest point since 9/11," yet "the government defended its record. 'We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,' said Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general." Additionally, "A growth area for federal prosecutors came in high profile cases involving government figures."

Retiring Metcalfe Seen As Balanced Advocate Of Open Government. Government Executive (12/22, Pulliam) reports, "After 25 years heading one of the federal government's key privacy and information offices, Daniel J. Metcalfe will retire Jan. 3. Observers say that while they have not always agreed with him, he will be remembered for his ability to administer the open government policies of both Republican and Democratic presidents. As a founding director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy since November 1981, Metcalfe has worked for seven attorneys general, pushed agencies to improve the management of requests for information and made a substantial impact on the law governing agencies' responsibilities to release information to the public. … In an interview with Government Executive, Metcalfe said he believes open government is critical. But at the same time, agencies must ensure that government information is disclosed responsibly." GE notes, "He denied rumors that he is retiring out of frustration with the Bush administration's overall policies on secrecy in government. He said he has averaged more than 75 hours on the job per week since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and his wife is thrilled that he can cut that back to about 40 in 'retirement.' … Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org…said that 'while it is not clear' whether Metcalfe has 'been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been,' he has 'been a good and faithful government official.'"

Former DOJ Civil Rights Prosecutor Rosenthal Joining Venable. The Washington Business Journal (12/22) reports, "Seth Rosenthal, a longtime prosecutor for the U.S. Department of Justice who has spent the past two years as legal director of the Alliance for Justice, has joined Venable as a litigation partner in the law firm's Washington office. Rosenthal, 40, spent 10 years in the DoJ's civil rights division handling a range of federal investigations and prosecutions, including cases involving human trafficking, hate crimes, police misconduct and housing and lending discrimination. … Last year, Rosenthal joined the nonprofit Alliance for Justice, an advocacy organization that monitors the selection of federal judges and tracks efforts to change the civil justice system." WBJ notes, "In making his first move to the private sector, Rosenthal says he sought out a law firm with a strong litigation practice and a commitment to public service."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bristol-Myers Offers To Pay $499 Million Price-Fixing Settlement. The AP (12/22, Witkowski) reports, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. offered to pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into whether the company played a role in a pricing scheme that led insurers and government agencies to overpay for drugs. The company reduced its profit forecast to reflect the charges." Bristol-Myers "entered an agreement in principle with the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts to pay the settlement and avoid civil and criminal charges. The company will also enter a corporate integrity agreement with the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. The agreement must still get final approval from the Justice Department." Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeff McDonald said that "the company expects the Justice Department review to take 'a couple of months' before a decision is made." The AP notes, "The agreement is the latest in a series of deals cut with the government. In June 2005, Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that cost the company $800 million, and was placed under the observation of a federal monitor until 2007."

USA Today (12/22, 2.27M) reports, "The tentative agreement is one of the biggest in recent years for drugmakers regarding drug marketing and pricing. It aims to settle investigations into Bristol's marketing of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder drug Abilify for conditions the drug was not approved to treat, says Bristol spokesman Jeff Macdonald. It also covers some cases in which Bristol allegedly inflated drug prices so government programs for the poor and elderly paid more. It would not negate other so-called average wholesale price cases launched against Bristol by several states and others, Bristol said." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Barris, Moore, 2.04M) notes, "In August, rival Schering-Plough Corp. agreed to pay $435 million and a unit pleaded guilty to criminal charges to settle federal allegations of fraudulent drug marketing and pricing, one of the largest settlements in a crackdown that has forced big drug makers to return billions of dollars the U.S. government says were illegally extracted from the Medicare and Medicaid programs. In its release, Bristol-Myers didn't elaborate on the investigations."

Bloomberg (12/22, Rapaport) reports, "The latest agreement 'removes an overhang, but the lack of information makes it difficult for Wall Street to react,' said Les Funtleyder, an analyst for Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in a telephone interview today. 'The laws around average wholesale pricing are convoluted. It's easy to run afoul of the rules. I don't think Wall Street takes this too seriously.' Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.05 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading." USA adds, "No criminal charges will be filed as a result of today's preliminary settlement, the company said. … Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment in a telephone interview." The Trenton Times (12/22, Jordan) notes, "Wall Street yawned. After dropping in morning trading, Bristol's shares rallied to close up 1 percent. 'This is nothing unexpected,' MacDonald said, adding the settlement was mentioned in Bristol's financial disclosures earlier this year.

Deutsche Bank Agrees To $208 Million Mutual Fund Timing Settlement. The AP (12/22) reports, "Deutsche Bank AG agreed to pay $208 million to end state and federal investigations into the timing of trading in mutual-fund accounts that could benefit insiders and hurt other investors. The settlement is the 21st by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in his mutual-funds investigation over the past three years. Mr. Spitzer had accused the German bank's asset-management division of allowing excessive market timing in its mutual funds. He also accused its broker-dealer division of assisting in what he called deceptive market timing and allowing a form of late trading by one client." The AP notes, "Deutsche Bank didn't admit or deny the allegations as part of the settlement. The company said all the alleged improper arrangements originated in subsidiaries before they became part of Deutsche Bank and that those were stopped before Mr. Spitzer and the Securities and Exchange Commission acted."

SEC Charges Three Former Tyco Executives With Securities Violations. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, C3, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports the SEC "charged three former Tyco International Ltd. financial executives with securities-law violations for 'structuring sham transactions' and 'manipulating reserves' to boost reported income and cash flow by well over $700 million from 1997 to 2002. … The SEC's civil charges name two lower-level officials who reported to" jailed former CEO Dennis Kozlowski former CFO Mark Swartz. "Richard D. Power, now 58, held a series of financial positions in a 20-year career at Tyco, including chief financial officer and vice president-special projects. Edward Federman, 53, was controller of Tyco and later chief financial officer of Tyco Electronics, a big division. The SEC is seeking disgorgement of unspecified gains and fines." The Journal adds, "A third former official, Richard "Skip" Heger, was accused of separate securities violations. He agreed to pay $450,000 to settle with the SEC, without admitting or denying wrongdoing."

Fidelity To Pay Funds $42 Million As Redress For Gifts To Traders. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Levitz, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports, "Fidelity Investments said it will pay $42 million to some of its mutual funds as redress for lavish gifts and entertainment some of its equity traders accepted from brokers between 2002 and 2004. The payments were recommended by several of Fidelity's independent trustees who conducted an internal probe of the matter." The Journal notes, "The trustees concluded 'it was not possible to prove' statistically that shareholders were harmed, according to the report. But they recommended Fidelity pay the penalty, saying the company inadequately supervised the traders. In a rare public statement, Edward C. Johnson III, chairman of Fidelity, posted a letter on Fidelity's Web site, personally offering his apology for 'this improper behavior' and saying that 'there is no question that the Funds were put at potential risk.'"

Sony BMG To Pay $4.25 Million Settlement For Hidden CD Security Software. The AP (12/22, Veiga) reports, "Sony BMG Music Entertainment will pay $4.25 million as part of a settlement with 39 states to resolve investigations into problems caused by music CDs loaded with hidden anti-piracy software. Under terms of Thursday's agreement, which also applies to the District of Columbia, the record company will reimburse consumers whose computers were damaged while trying to uninstall the anti-piracy software. Sony BMG also said it will no longer distribute any compact discs loaded with copy-protection software that hinders computer users from easily locating it or removing it from their PCs." The AP notes, "Customers will be able to file a claim with Sony BMG to receive refunds of up to $175, but claims must include a description of how their computer was harmed and documentation of repair expenses. The refund policy will also apply to states that were not a party to the settlement."

Judge Urged To Unseal San Francisco Chronicle Antitrust Case Documents. The AP (12/22, Chea) reports, "A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle. The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher." Media Alliance and Bay Guardian "argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential." The AP notes, "San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market. The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet."

Business Group Argues PCAOB Lacks Proper Oversight. The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Day, 690K) reports, "A business group argued in U.S. District Court yesterday that a panel created by Congress to police the accounting industry lacks sufficient oversight by the White House. The five-member Public Company Accounting Oversight Board acts as a federal regulator, deciding whether accounting firms are fit to audit the books of publicly traded companies, without having been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate as the Constitution requires, the plaintiffs argued. Lawyers for the accounting board, created in 2002 under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, and the Justice Department argued that the board is legal because it is supervised by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a federal agency whose members are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the agency supports the Justice Department's position." The Post notes, "Lawyers attacking the legality of the accounting oversight board represent Beckstead & Watts, an accounting firm under investigation by the board, and the Free Enterprise Fund, a nonprofit group that advocates 'limited government' and whose chairman, Mallory Factor, is a major Republican fundraiser."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Walters, Gonzales Announce Overall Decline In Youth Drug Use. The Detroit News (12/22, Trowbridge) reports, "Drug use among American youths continued to decline in the past year, according to a federally funded study by the University of Michigan, a trend Bush administration officials said ratified their anti-drug efforts. 'This is not a natural waxing and waning of social forces,' said John Walters, the Bush administration drug czar. He attributed sharp declines since the start of the decade to anti-drug advertising campaigns and other government programs." The News adds, "Walters and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed to figures showing that overall drug use had declined about 23 percent since 2001 as an endorsement of the administration's policies. Walters said anti-drug programs and advertising campaigns designed to make drug use less socially acceptable among young people can have a powerful effect."

The New York Times (12/22, Cohen, 1.16M) reports, "A question was added to the survey in 2002, asking students specifically about the recreational use of Vicodin and OxyContin, both narcotic drugs prescribed to treat pain. Since then, nonmedical use of those drugs has increased slightly, although abuse of OxyContin by eighth graders doubled to 2.6 percent in 2006, from 1.3 percent in 2002. 'We're not changing the rate that prescription medications are being taken by young people,' Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said." Bloomberg (12/22, Schmidt) adds, "Walters and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the results of the study…were mainly positive and continued to show a drop in drug abuse. … The results 'are very, very encouraging to all of us in government,' said Gonzales." The Washington Post (12/22, A3, Lee, 690K) notes that "the survey shows a continued long-term decline in teenagers' use of alcohol and illicit drugs such as marijuana, the most widely used illicit substance. The reduction occurred while federal funding for anti-drug advertising fell annually, from $185 million when President Bush took office in 2001 to $100 million in 2006. However, the past year's declines in drug and alcohol use were 'relatively small,' the report said.

ABC World News (12/21, story 7, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "According to the newly-released survey, one out of every ten high school seniors reported using the painkiller Vicodin in the last year, and disturbing numbers are also using cough and cold medicine. Most have no idea how dangerous an overdose of cough syrup can be. … You can turn to our Web site, where our medical unit is on-hand to answer your questions about teenage drug abuse." The CBS Evening News (12/21, story 5, 0:22, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We've got some good and bad news tonight about American teenagers. A new government survey shows fewer are drinking or using illegal drugs, but more teens are getting high on drugs they find in their parents' medicine chest. One out of ten high school seniors has used Vicodin, and one out of 14 has used cough syrup to get high."

USA Today (12/22, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Abuse of the painkiller OxyContin by younger teens hit record levels in 2006, a national survey says. While most other teen drug and alcohol use continued a decade-long decline, teen abuse of pharmaceuticals, including prescription narcotics, barely budged, the survey says. … For the first time, the survey asked teenagers whether they used over-the-counter cough or cold medicine to get high. One in 25 eighth-graders and one in 14 seniors said they had abused the medicines in the past year. 'Clearly, prescription drugs have become more a part of the problem,' says the study's principal investigator, Lloyd Johnson." USA notes that Walters said "his office will design an ad campaign targeting abuse of prescription drugs." The Washington Times (12/22, Price, Pescatore, 88K), Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Marks, 59K), AP (12/21), UPI (12/21, Dell'amore) and CNN.com (12/22, Frieden) also report on the study, noting the rise in pharmaceutical drug abuse.

Accuracy Of Survey Questioned. The Arizona Daily Star (12/22, 128K) reports the 2006 survey "indicates reductions in the use of nearly every drug, with about 840,000 fewer youths using illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001, according to a news release from the Office of National Drug Control Policy. It notes a 25 percent decrease in marijuana use during the five-year period, and a significant decrease in teens' use of methamphetamine. However, officials at two Tucson programs that work to treat teen addiction say the exact opposite is happening here. 'I'm not sure that the study is an accurate depiction of what is happening and it is certainly not what I am seeing in working with adolescents with drug and alcohol addictions,' said Tori Ferrari, director of the Springboard Home for Youth in Crisis, which houses girls but also provides counseling for families and boys. 'We are actually seeing more and more kids getting involved at younger ages with harder drugs than marijuana.'"

Local TV Coverage. NC8-TV, Washington DC (12/21, 5:00 p.m.) showed Gonzales saying, "Let's start with the good news. The latest study on adolescent drug use shows a slight decline in the number of teens using most illegal drugs and alcohol. That's a drop of more than slight decline in the number of teens using most illegal drugs and alcohol. These survey results of course are very, very encouraging track. But high numbers of teens continue to abuse prescription narcotics with more trying oxycontin, a narcotic pain reliever, than ever before."

KOAT-TV, Albuquerque, Santa Fe, NM (12/21, 12:00 p.m.) reported on its broadcast, "Prescription drug abuse continues to remain high, according to an annual study Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced this morning. The study finds that the use of most illegal drugs and alcohol went down slightly last year among 8th, 10th, and 12th graders." WDKY-TV Lexington, KY (12/21, 10:00 p.m.), WJHL-TV Bristol, TN (12/21, 5:00 p.m.) and KVAL-TV Eugene, OR (12/21, 6:00 p.m.) were among the other local TV stations reporting on the study.

Virginia Task Force Calls For ISPs To Retain Subscriber Data. CNETNews.com (12/21, Broache) reported, "All Internet service providers should keep their subscribers' data for lengthier time periods in order to aid police prowling for criminals online, a task force organized by the Virginia state attorney general recommended this week. Echoing similar calls from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller earlier this year, the latest suggestions arrived in a 103-page report drawn up by Virginia Attorney General Bob McDonnell and his 6-month-old Youth Internet Safety Task Force." CNET added, "Still, rather than prescribing data retention laws, as some members of Congress have supported, the task force makes a vague instruction to Internet service providers: they should commit to 'keeping data relevant to such investigations and engaging at the national level to help define appropriate policies.' That seemingly softer recommendation is likely a reflection of the broader divide over the issue that is mirrored in the task force's makeup. Its members include representatives from various state and local law enforcement bodies, schools, educational agencies, parenting organizations, and corporate entities such as Yahoo, News

Corp.'s MySpace.com, Microsoft, Time Warner's AOL and Sony."

Police Chiefs Call For US To Create National Law Enforcement Commission. USA Today (12/22, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The nation's largest police chiefs' organization is calling on the federal government to re-establish a national law enforcement commission to help restore confidence in local public safety operations. The International Association of Chiefs of Police said Thursday that recent incidents involving officers' questionable use of force and abrupt increases in murder and robbery represent strong evidence for a panel, similar to President Lyndon Johnson's Crime Commission, which would develop a national anti-criminal justice strategy. The panel would address a wide range of topics from police deployment to prison administration." IACP President Joseph Carter said Thursday that "the need for a crime commission was 'validated' earlier this week by an FBI report showing that violent crime remained on the rise during the first six months of 2006." However, Sen. Joe Biden, "instrumental in passing the Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 additional police officers, says more money for additional officers and resources — not a commission — is needed to drive down rising crime." USA notes, "Recent jumps in violence prompted the Justice Department in October to launch its own review of possible causes."

DOJ Investigating Russian Mobster's Connection To Natural Gas Industry. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (12/22, A1, Simpson, 2.04M) reports, "Amid growing concern about Europe's energy dependence on Russia, U.S. authorities are investigating possible links between one of that country's top organized crime figures and multibillion-dollar natural-gas deals between Russia and Ukraine. The wide-ranging inquiry focuses on 60-year-old Semion Mogilevich, one of the FBI's most-wanted men, who is viewed by law-enforcement agencies as one of the world's most-sophisticated international criminals. U.S. officials have long expressed concern that his operations foster high-level official corruption throughout the former Soviet Union, underwriting criminal activities ranging from prostitution and drug dealing to stock fraud." The Journal notes, "In their natural-gas investigation, senior U.S. prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are focusing on connections between Mr. Mogilevich and a Cyprus-registered company called Highrock Holding Ltd. that has played a role in several multibillion-dollar gas deals, according to current and former law-enforcement officials. … The U.S. investigation, which is being led by the Justice Department's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, began early this year, shortly after Moscow's brief cutoff of natural-gas shipments to Ukraine in a price dispute sparked an international crisis."

NYTimes Calls Prison Collect-Call System "Morally Indefensible." The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "Studies of prison inmates clearly show that keeping them in contact with friends and family is vital to giving them a chance to create an honest life after jail instead of committing new crimes that land them right back behind bars. Yet the simple act of picking up the phone to call home can be bankrupting for inmates and their families. The cruel and counterproductive system now in place around the country charges them as much as six times the going rate for collect calls placed from inside state prisons." The Times concludes, "State prison officials say the money is used to pay for programs that benefit inmates. But it also gouges the poorest citizens…to pay for prison services that the state is obligated to provide. It might be legal, but it is also counterproductive and morally indefensible."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Clarifies It Has Not Opened Formal Probe Of Georgia Police Shootings. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/22, Gentry, 379K) reports, "U. S. Justice Department officials said that the department was not conducting an 'independent federal investigation' into a string of fatal police shootings in DeKalb County, but would review investigations by local authorities when they are completed. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division issued a statement Thursday in which she sought to clarify a Dec. 12 letter from Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim to a local activist who had called for a federal investigation." DOJ spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson "said the letter from Kim does not imply that the Justice Department had opened a formal investigation into the shootings. 'While the Department of Justice is gathering information and monitoring that investigation, we have not at this point opened an independent federal investigation into the shootings,' the statement said. 'Federal authorities will review the results of the local investigation and then make an assessment about what additional investigation, if any, is warranted.'" The AJC notes, "Magnuson's statement did not mention the FBI, which was included in Kim's earlier letter. An FBI spokesman declined to comment on Kim's letter on Tuesday."

Judge Overturns Law Giving Villaraigosa Authority Over Los Angeles School District. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Blume, 850K) reports Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Dzintra Janavs "nullified legislation giving" Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "substantial authority over the Los Angeles Unified School District, a stunning setback to Villaraigosa's plans -- already in progress -- to assume direct control of dozens of Los Angeles schools." Villaraigosa said that he will appeal and "would also ask that the California Supreme Court hear the appeal directly." The ruling is called "a sweeping victory for the school district" and "puts in question the mayor's education agenda." Judge Janavs "found the entire law defective and ordered public officials 'to refrain from enforcing or implementing' any part of it." The judge "cited a 1946 constitutional amendment that 'specifically removed municipal authority over school districts and appears to reflect the people's determination to separate municipal functions from school functions due to the variety of conflicts that arise between their respective interests.'"

The Los Angeles Daily News (12/22, Boghossian) reports the ruling is "In a major political blow to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa." Villaraigosa "remained defiant, calling it a 'bump in the road' and vowing to immediately appeal." He also said that "his staff would continue to plan for a mayoral takeover of the 708,000-student district and vowed to get involved in the March school board election, when four of the seven seats are up for grabs." Judge Janavs ruled that the law "violates the state constitution, the City Charter and voter rights." Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "said he still backs the mayor's plan and supports an appeal of the court's decision." The AP (12/22) also reported this story.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division Announces Effort To Streamline Merger Investigations. The Deal (12/22, Lindell) reports, "The Department of Justice's antitrust division on Dec. 15 officially announced further efforts to streamline the time and cost of merger investigations. The changes are part of a 2001 merger process reform effort and closely mirror changes the Federal Trade Commission announced in February. But there's a big catch for merging parties that participate, and if the FTC's track record is an indication, antitrust lawyers won't be pushing clients to sign up. To be eligible for DOJ's latest streamlining efforts, the Justice Department requires merging parties to agree to set a period of pretrial discovery, perhaps as much as six months, should regulators seek a court order to block a merger. That could leave merging parties open to significantly more discovery time than the government usually is granted." The Deal notes, "'Efficient merger enforcement reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary is one of our top priorities,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division. 'The amendments to the division's already successful merger review process initiative are part of our ongoing efforts to reduce enforcement burdens, while at the same time preserve our ability to conduct thorough investigations and protect consumers from anticompetitive transactions.'"

Fifth Samsung Executive Pleads Guilty In DRAM Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (12/22, Robertson) reports, "A Samsung Electronics Co. executive agreed to plead guilty and serve 10 months in prison for his role in a global price-fixing scheme involving a common form of computer memory, federal prosecutors said Thursday. Young Hwan Park, president of Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the company's San Jose-based U.S. subsidiary, is the fifth Samsung executive this year to agree to a prison sentence over price manipulation of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type of memory chip used in personal computers." The AP notes, "In total, four memory chip companies and 18 people have been charged in the Justice Department's investigation of DRAM makers. … 'This latest plea underscores our resolve to hold responsible those who target U.S. businesses and consumers with price-fixing schemes,' Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice Department's antitrust division, said in a statement. 'Individuals who choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions: criminal fines and prison time.'"

IDG News Service (12/21, Gross) also notes Barnett said in his statement that those who "choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions – criminal fines and prison time," and the Financial Times (12/22, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The probe has generated $730m in criminal penalties from the parties involved, the second-highest number of fines to emerge from any single price-fixing conspiracy. … The Justice Department said Mr Park carried out the price-fixing conspiracy from April, 2001 to June, 2002 by participating in meetings and conversations with rivals in the D-Ram market and agreeing to charge certain customers a fixed price. The talks ultimately affected sales to US computer makers such as Dell, HP and Compaq."

US Airways CEO Disputes Delta Claims About Merger Valuation, Approval Hurdles. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/22, Grantham, 379K) reports, "Delta Air Lines' self-valuation that it will be worth as much as $12 billion after bankruptcy 'lacks credibility,' US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said Thursday as he urged creditors to push the Atlanta airline's executives to explore its merger proposal. 'This is where I'd like to see the [Delta] management team come along,' Parker said in a conference call with industry analysts and reporters." The AJC adds, "While Parker said US Airways is in 'continuing dialog' with Delta's creditors and advisers, he said he felt an 'obligation to correct' Delta's claims that its proposal is more valuable and that the merger would fail to win regulatory approval or produce the savings US Airways expects." The AJC notes, "Clark Orsky, an analyst with KDP Investment Advisors, said US Airways made a good case that Delta's value for its plan is 'aggressive' and that concerns the Department of Justice would shoot down the merger are overblown." The Birmingham Business Journal (12/22) notes Parker said, "The anti-trust issues are fully manageable. We've done much more work on this, more than anyone else." Parker "also emphasized that the proposed merger is labor friendly and that employees would possibly come out better than they are now, because the merged airline would go to the 'highest common denominator' contracts."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/22, Olson) reports, "Parker said Delta used 'flawed' criteria in analyzing antitrust issues a merger would raise with the Department of Justice. For instance, Delta's criticism does not allow for the probable entry of discount airlines into markets served by Delta and US Airways. 'We are not going to let this transaction fail on antitrust issues,' Parker said. But the only way to know what antitrust objections might surface is for both US Airways and Delta to file merger plans with the Justice Department, US Airways antitrust attorney Rick Rule told analysts." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A10, Dade, McWilliams, 2.04M) notes, "The denunciation of the plan in a conference call with investors and analysts…comes as creditors are burrowing deeper into the financial projections underlying Delta's valuation of the Atlanta carrier at $9.4 billion to $12 billion once it emerges from bankruptcy proceedings in the spring. Both airlines are expected to aggressively press their case during the next several weeks, and Mr. Parker's remarks showed that US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., remains determined to acquire Delta despite fierce and increasingly vocal opposition by Delta."

The Arizona Republic (12/22, Gilbertson), Washington Times (12/22, Lengell, 88K) and TheStreet.com (12/22, Reed) also report on Parker's comments.

Caremark Shareholders Seek Injunction In CVS Buyout. The AP (12/22, Giuffrida) reports, "A group of shareholders in pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. has filed for an injunction to force company officials to consider a proposed buyout by rival Express Scripts Inc. that could pay more than an offer from CVS Corp. … On Thursday, CVS and Caremark announced that the proposed merger passed antitrust scrutiny of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and could be completed by the first quarter of 2007. The approval comes days after rival pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. proposed to pay about $26 billion in a hostile bid for Caremark that would offer a cash option and premium for shareholders." The AP notes that the shareholder motion "claims that Caremark board members will personally benefit from the CVS deal and have entered into a strict merger agreement that keeps them from seeking out the best deal for shareholders.

Meanwhile, the St. Louis Business Journal (12/21) reported, "Express Scripts Inc. issued a statement late Wednesday calling its $26 billion bid for pharmaceutical services company Caremark Rx Inc. 'superior.' … Express Scripts rival bid, made Monday, represented at the time a 15 percent premium over the all-stock purchase price to be paid to Caremark's stockholders under Caremark's" deal with CVS.

Delta Pine Shareholders Approve Monsanto Merger. Forbes (12/21, Lipton) reported on its Web site, "Two of the largest seed companies in the world just came one step closer to their long-awaited merger. On Thursday, Delta and Pine Land Company announced that at a special meeting held in Memphis, Tenn., the company's shareholders formally approved its merger with Monsanto." Forbes noted, "Mark Gulley, an analyst at Soleil-Gulley & Associates, said the companies still face the challenge of regulatory approval. 'This decision isn't key,' Gulley said in an interview. 'The antitrust review is what we're all waiting for.' Regulators still have to weigh in on the proposed merger and decide whether it's anticompetitive. To close the transaction and satisfy Uncle Sam, Monsanto has already said it's willing to divest the U.S. assets of its Stoneville cottonseed business."

Lockheed Agrees To Buy Management Systems Designers. The AP (12/22) reports, "Military contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. said Thursday it agreed to acquire Fairfax, Va.-based Management Systems Designers Inc. for undisclosed terms. MDS, which has more than 600 employees, is a provider of information technology, primarily for government agencies including the Internal Revenue Service, Department of Homeland Security and Department of Defense." The AP notes, "The transaction is set to close during the first quarter of 2007, subject to regulatory approval."

EU Approves German Movie Industry Subsidies. The AP (12/22) reports, "The European Union on Thursday approved German subsidies totaling $240 million for its movie industry, officials said. The subsidies will back feature length movies, documentaries and cartoons. he aid is approved until 2010."

Finland Says Stora Enso Engaged In Anticompetitive Behavior. The AP (12/22) reports, "Finnish antitrust officials said Thursday that paper maker Stora Enso Oyj should be fined $40 million for anticompetitive behavior. The Finnish Competition Authority proposed the fine to the country's Market Court, saying the Finnish-Swedish company had violated competition laws in buying timber in Finland from 1997 to 2004." The AP adds, "Stora Enso denied the charges, saying the proposal is 'groundless.' Earlier this month, Stora Enso denied any involvement in a price-fixing conspiracy in the United States after a federal grand jury in Hartford, Conn., indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. for being part of a plan to drive up prices of paper used to print magazines and catalogues."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

DaimlerChrysler To Pay $1.2 Billion Air Pollution Reporting Settlement. The AP (12/22) reports, "The Department of Justice said Thursday that Mercedes-Benz USA and parent DaimlerChrysler AG will pay $1.2 million to settle allegations that they failed to report air pollution problems with Mercedes-Benz vehicles to federal regulators. As a result of the complaint brought by the government, Mercedes-Benz USA has issued voluntary recalls and extended warranties to address the defects, at an estimated cost of $59 million. Under the settlement, the company is also required to overhaul its emissions reporting system." The AP notes, "The affected 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. According to the government, the recalls and warranty extensions will reduce the harmful emissions caused by the defects by over 500 tons cumulatively."

The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports, "The settlement, announced by the Justice Department and the EPA, resolves a suspected Clean Air Act violation: The auto manufacturer did not promptly inform the EPA of defects in emission-related parts so the agency could determine whether the emission standards were exceeded and whether a recall was necessary. … 'Reliable and effective automobile pollution control systems are essential to protect human health and the environment from harmful automobile emissions,' said Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge, who heads the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division. 'Mercedes' failure to alert EPA to a number of defects in emission-related components over a multiyear period is a serious violation,' she said."

California High Court Rules Tribes Can Be Sued For Campaign Finance Violations. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Dolan, 850K) reports, "A divided California Supreme Court ruled Thursday that Indian tribes can be sued for violating the state's campaign disclosure law even though tribes enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law. The 4-3 ruling is unprecedented and may be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has consistently protected Indian immunity from lawsuits. The state court justified its ruling in Agua Caliente v. Superior Court by citing the growing role of Indian casino money in state elections and the state's need to protect against political corruption." The Times notes, "Thursday's ruling permits the state's Fair Political Practices Commission to sue the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians, a federally recognized tribe in Palm Springs, for failing to properly report millions of dollars in campaign contributions. The watchdog panel said the tribe did not follow the law when it contributed more than $7.5 million to campaigns in 1998, $175,200 in the first half of 2001, and $426,000 in the first half of 2002."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Head Of Baltimore FBI Office Wants To Boost Criminal Program. The Washington Post (12/21, T3, Rich, 690K) reported, "After running down fugitives in the District and pursuing one of the nation's most storied fugitives, William D. Chase is settling in as the head of the FBI's Baltimore office. Chase, 50, who assumed the job in June, says that while counterterrorism remains the bureau's top priority, he also wants to dedicate more resources to fighting crime, the bureau's traditional role. 'I'm hoping to make some changes to firm up resources to better address the criminal program,' Chase said." The Post noted that since 9/11 "the bureau's top priority has been fighting terrorism," and the "majority of Chase's agents necessarily are assigned to that central responsibility. … Still, he said, he hopes to work more closely with state and local authorities, particularly to address the gang activity that has increasingly taken root in Maryland's Washington suburbs. The Baltimore FBI office covers Maryland and Delaware. The FBI announced in February that Kevin L. Perkins, then the special agent in charge of the bureau's Baltimore office, was being appointed assistant director in charge of the FBI's finance division. Chase replaced him during the summer. Federal law enforcement officials, including U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, spoke highly of Chase in recent interviews." The Post went on to report, "In the late 1990s, Chase was named assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office, a period that he recalls as frustrating and in some ways disappointing."

Tennessee Lawmaker Seeks Return Of $40,000 Watch Said To Have Been A Bribe. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/22, Perrusquia, 163K) reports, "John Ford had one thing to say Thursday about prosecutors' suggestions he took a $40,000 wristwatch as a payoff: He wants the Rolex -- confiscated as evidence -- returned to him. 'I want to get it back,' the former state senator said as his lawyer told reporters that Ford had obtained the watch legally. Ford's comments came a day after the U.S. Attorney's Office alleged Ford accepted the watch from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman after intervening in a 2004 state pollution-control case against the real estate millionaire. 'The watch was completely a legal transaction,' said Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, who said he will spell out details soon in a court filing. Prosecutors hope to use the watch as evidence in Ford's upcoming bribery trial." Ford "is set to stand trial in Memphis for allegedly taking $55,000 in bribes in the FBI's undercover Tennessee Waltz sting. He learned Monday about the new indictment in Nashville alleging he took $800,000 in kickbacks from contractors while in the General Assembly. Ford denies charges in both cases."

The AP (12/22, Baird) reports Scholl "asked Thursday for a delay in the trial, arguing that news reports surrounding Ford's indictment Monday in Nashville on federal charges unrelated to Tennessee Waltz will make picking an impartial jury difficult. Ford is accused in Nashville of taking more than $800,000 from TennCare contractors while he was on several Senate committees overseeing the state's expanded Medicaid program. No trial date has been set on those charges. … Judge J. Daniel Breen told Scholl to put his arguments in writing. 'But at this point, we are set,' the judge said. Prosecutor Tim DiScenza objected to a delay."

New Jersey Developer Admits Bribing Maryland Mayor. The Newark Star-Ledger (12/22, Whelan) reports Moshe 'Michael' Gohar, a Monmouth County developer , "admitted paying off former Ocean Township Mayor Terrance Weldon to increase the zoning density for his housing project." Gohar "acknowledged in federal district court in Trenton that he gave Weldon $50,000 in cash after Weldon helped influence the 2001 vote on the zoning change. … Gohar pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to give and offer corrupt payments. He initially had been indicted in February and also charged with mail fraud and bribery. The latter charge alone could have put him behind bars for up to 10 years. Under the plea agreement between Gohar's attorneys and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Brian Howe and Charles McKenna, Gohar could face between 18 and 27 months in prison. One factor in sentencing could be a previous state tax conviction against Gohar." FBI agents

"raided Weldon's house in January 2002 as part of a long-running corruption probe in Monmouth County, and found the cash in the pocket of a suit jacket in the mayor's attic. Weldon later pleaded guilty on corruption charges."

FBI Announces Reward For Information About Pittsburgh Trestle Fire. WTAE Pittsburgh (12/22) reports the FBI "doesn't know if it was one person or a team effort that started a massive fire on a train trestle in Donegal Township, Butler County -- so they hope a big reward will trigger some leads. 'This was an intentional criminal act of violence that directly attacked the industrial and economic infastructure of our community,' FBI Special Agent Ray Morrow said of the May fire. Business owners who heavily rely on those tracks are offering a $40,000 reward to anyone who helps investigators crack the case.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/22, Ove, 230K) reports, "The bridge, a wooden structure owned by the Buffalo & Pittsburgh Railroad that predated the Civil War, went up in flames just 15 minutes after a train carrying sulphuric acid crossed it. 'That would have been a disaster. That could have wiped out that town,' said Ray Morrow, head of the Pittsburgh FBI office. Another train was some 30 minutes away from crossing the span. The railroad and three companies directly impacted by the loss of the trestle put up the reward money. T he FBI got involved because it has jurisdiction over crimes involving railroad lines; the agency and state police are conducting the investigation."

Four Charged In Georgia Meth, Cocaine-Trafficking Conspiracy. AccessNorthGeorgia.com (12/21) reported four illegal aliens "have been indicted on charges relating to a large scale methamphetamine and cocaine-trafficking conspiracy in Barrow and Gwinnett counties. Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26; Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20; Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33; and Mauricio Medina-Mojica, 26, all believed to be from Mexico, were indicted by a federal grand jury late Wednesday." The indictment "charges all four defendants with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. … DEA Atlanta Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange noted the quantity of methamphetamine seized in this case constitutes the nation's fifth largest methamphetamine seizure in 2006."

The Gwinnett Daily Post (12/22) reports the charges "stem from five separate search warrants executed in November in Gwinnett and Barrow Counties, where law enforcement seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine or ice, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223 caliber AR-15-style rifle, [a] release said." The Athens Banner-Herald (12/22) reports "On Nov. 6, Barrow County Superior Court Judge Joe Booth authorized federal investigators to tap a telephone belonging to Nunez-Villanueva, according to an affidavit that a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent filed in federal court. Through the wiretap, investigators learned that Nunez-Villanueva "appeared to be a broker for numerous illegal drug transactions," the agent said in the affidavit."

Detective In Tennessee Accused Of Helping Family Cocaine Ring. The Nashville City Paper (12/21) reported federal prosecutors on Thursday "unsealed an indictment on a Metro Police narcotics detective, Officer Ernest B. Cecil, charging him with conspiracy for using his police powers to help his nephew run a Nashville cocaine ring. Cecil, a 15-year veteran of the department, was arrested by federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) agents and immediately taken into custody Thursday morning. … Federal officials said they believe Cecil's alleged crimes were all committed to help his nephew, Corey Cecil, hide his drug operation from the rest of the Metro Police Department."

Investor's Business Daily Urges DOJ To Seek Maximum Penalty For Arellano-Felix. In an editorial, Investor's Business Daily (12/21) wrote, "We doubt anyone's facing worse charges in U.S. courts than drug lord Francisco Javier Arellano Felix. So why is the Justice Department hesitating to suggest the death penalty? To put it delicately, this guy's a monster. Apprehended in August by the Drug Enforcement Administration in international waters off Baja California, Arellano was charged in U.S. federal court in San Diego on Wednesday in a string of grotesque crimes on both sides of the U.S.-Mexican border. … There are good reasons for prosecutors to seek the maximum in this case and not worry about public opinion or potential noncooperation on future extraditions from Mexican authorities."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Board Rejects Demjanjuk Appeal. The AP (12/22, Kropko) reports, "A man accused of being a Nazi death camp guard lost an appeal today fighting his deportation." John Demjanjuk "was ordered deported in 2005 after the chief federal immigration judge determined he had served at several Nazi death camps during World War II. Demjanjuk has denied the allegation and still has the right to appeal in federal courts." The Board of Immigration Appeals ruling "said facts established previously in courts identifying him as a Nazi guard 'are conclusively established' and that there is no reason to believe there may be new information about his past in a Soviet KGB file, as his lawyer alleged. The board reviewed legal briefs in the case before dismissing Demjanjuk's appeal, said Elaine Komis, spokeswoman for the Executive Office for Immigration Review." The BBC News (12/21) noted, "The US Justice Department said efforts were continuing to remove him from the country as soon as possible."

Saudi Princess Ordered Deported In Forced Servitude Case. The AP (12/22) reports, "A Saudi Arabian princess who broke U.S. immigration laws to keep her domestic servants was ordered to be deported, prosecutors said Thursday. Hana F. Al Jader of Winchester was sentenced to two years of probation, the first six months of which must be served in home confinement, after which she'll be deported to Saudi Arabia, prosecutors said. U.S. District Judge Reginald J. Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader, 40, to pay $206,000 in restitution to three of her former domestic servants, pay a $40,000 fine, and perform 100 hours of community service." The AP notes, "Al Jader and her husband, Prince Mohamed Bin Turki Al Saud, and have lived in Winchester and Arlington since the mid-1990s, when the couple came to the United States to obtain medical and rehabilitation treatment for injuries the prince suffered in an auto accident."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Grand Jury Subpoenaed Weldon Records In November. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "A federal grand jury has subpoenaed congressional records from Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., as part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe aimed at determining whether Weldon used his influence to win favors for family members, people familiar with the investigation said. The previously unreported subpoena was issued by a grand jury in Washington before the November election, although it is unclear when Weldon received it." The Times notes, "Weldon said public disclosure of the Justice Department investigation, which came three weeks before election day, was politically motivated. He said at the time that he was not aware of any investigation and that he had done nothing wrong."

Bush Issues 16 Pardons. The AP (12/22, Loven) reports, "President Bush issued 16 pardons on Thursday and commuted the sentence of an Iowa man who was convicted on drug charges. Six of the federal offenses were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes. Seven of the 16 received no prison or jail time, instead getting probation or a reduction in their military pension." The AP notes that a White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, "said that after investigation by the Office of the Pardon Attorney at the Justice Department, most weight is given to these factors: the seriousness of the crime; how long ago it was committed; the acceptance of responsibility and showing remorse; post-conviction conduct and contributions to society; any specific compelling need for relief; official recommendations, including from the sentencing judge, the probation officer and the federal prosecutor."

Bush Makes Two Recess Appointments. The AP (12/22) reports, "President Bush has appointed an outspoken conservative television producer to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Warren Bell, executive producer of ABC's 'According to Jim' was first nominated by Bush in June. In September, his nomination was abruptly pulled from the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee's agenda because of some senators' concerns." Bell "has been an online contributor to the conservative National Review magazine. In May 2005 he described himself as 'thoroughly conservative in ways that strike horror into the hearts of my Hollywood colleagues.'" Bell's recess appointment "means he will stay on the board through the congressional session that ends in 2007." The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) runs a truncated version of the AP story.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (12/22, Herman, 88K) reports Bush also gave a recess appointment to Mark McKinnon, who "will join the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG) in time for its Jan. 10 meeting. The recess appointment is good for a year, but Mr. McKinnon said yesterday that he is confident the Senate would confirm him for a full term that would end in 2009. Senators, however, often don't look favorably on recess appointees." The BBG "oversees a global operation that draws more than 100 million listeners and viewers a week. The operations include the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and broadcast systems that cover Asia, Cuba and the Middle East." Bush's "first attempt to get Mr. McKinnon on the board was in September 2005 in a nomination for a seat formerly held by a member whose term expired. The appointment ran into opposition from Democrats because it was a seat reserved for Democrats."

McClatchy (12/22) calls McKinnon "Bush's media adviser," and says "Senate Democrats were livid when the Texan was first nominated for a Democratic slot on the board. His quick re-nomination as a Republican -- the longtime Texas Democrat now calls himself a 'Bush Republican' -- did not appease them, either." Sen. Joe Biden, "the incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee who takes over in January, was not likely to move McKinnon's nomination, said insiders, prompting the White House action. 'The nomination had been out there a very long time and we needed to fill the position,' said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. 'This was the most expedient way to get that slot filled.'"

Bush Gives Pay Raise To Federal Workers, Lawmakers, Cheney. The AP (12/22) reports, "President Bush signed an executive order Thursday to raise the pay of federal workers, members of Congress and Vice President Dick Cheney in the new year." Congress "passed the pay raises earlier this year, but Bush was required to sign an executive order to enforce them." The President's "annual salary of $400,000 is not affected by the legislation." The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Barr, 690K) notes "members of the armed forces will also see their base pay rise next year by an average 2.2 percent, though some military personnel will receive higher increases because they are in hard-to-fill positions or have special skills." Salaries for House members and senators "will climb to $168,000, up from $165,200. Congress has put the raise on hold, however, because Democrats first want to approve an increase in the minimum wage, which they believe will prove popular with voters." Cabinet secretaries "will make $186,600 in 2007, up from $183,500 this year. The vice president's salary will be $215,700, rising from $212,100."

Bush Signs Bill To Preserve Japanese Internment Camps. The AP (12/22) reports President Bush "signed into law a $38 million grant program to preserve notorious internment camps where Japanese-Americans were kept behind barbed wire during World War II." The money "will be administered by the National Park Service to restore and pay for research at 10 camps. The law is intended to help preserve the camps as reminders of how the United States turned on some of its citizens in a time of fear." The camps "housed more than 120,000 Japanese-Americans — U.S. citizens and residents — under an executive order signed by President Roosevelt in 1942, when America was reeling from the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on Dec. 7, 1941."

Rohrabacher Says Petition For Convicted Border Agents Ready For Bush. The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Dana Rohrabacher said in a press conference yesterday that he will soon present President Bush with "a petition signed by 160,000 Americans calling for the commutation of prison sentences for two US Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect in the buttocks." He asked the president to "'have some Christian charity and pardon' Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are scheduled to begin serving 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, next month." Rohrabacher said the petition was "part of a continuing effort to 'turn up the pressure on President Bush to pardon' the agents."

Flawed US Immigration System Said To Invite Illegals. Marcela Sanchez, in her column for the Washington Post (12/22, 690K) writes that last week's immigration raids at Swift & Co. were a "big disappointment all around. People whose intention was to get work used stolen information, such as Social Security numbers. US officials intending to do their jobs used a law meant for a far more serious crime as justification for the crackdown. Both sides are guilty of weakening the rule of law -- a taste of home we Latino immigrants could really do without." Sanchez continues, "Without excusing those who committed fraud to get jobs, it is important to make clear that the United States -- its government, its businesses and even its laws -- invites this type of behavior."

Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that the "career diplomats at the State Department are celebrating a decision this week by the department's director general to overturn the assignment of an aide to Undersecretary Karen Hughes to a top job running the new Public Diplomacy Rapid Response office in Brussels." The American Foreign Service Association two months ago "protested the selection of mid-level civil servant Diane Zeleny for the job, calling it a 'pre-cooked deal' done by manipulating the process and violating personnel rules," Kamen notes. AFSA filed a grievance asking foreign service director general George Staples to "undo this assignment," which he did, but "gave Zeleny until next summer to leave Brussels." Diplomats "said the opening was never properly advertised so senior officials looking for new postings would know about it. And then it was announced at the last minute, so there was no way top officers, who had already gotten new assignments, could apply for it."

Interior Department Study Finds Oil Drilling Incentives Spur Little Production. The New York Times (12/22, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the US "offers some of the most lucrative incentives in the world to companies that drill for oil in publicly owned coastal waters, but a newly released study suggests that the government is getting very little for its money. The study, which the Interior Department refused to release for more than a year, estimates that current inducements could allow drilling companies in the Gulf of Mexico to escape tens of billions of dollars in royalties that they would otherwise pay the government for oil and gas produced in areas that belong to American taxpayers." The "study predicts that the inducements would cause only a tiny increase in production even if they were offered without some of the limitations now in place. It also suggests that the cost of that additional oil could be as much as $80 a barrel, far more than the government would have to pay if it simply bought the oil on its own."

Goode Won't Apologize For Koran Comments. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 7, 2:05, Allen, 9.87M) reported, "Since becoming the nation's first Muslim-American elected to Congress, Keith Ellison of Minnesota says he's received hateful mail and phone calls and a few death threats after saying he'd place his hand on a Koran during a private, unofficial swearing-in ceremony. The latest attack -- this letter from Republican Congressman Virgil Goode of Virginia to hundreds of constituents, urging Americans to '…wake up,' adopt his position on illegal immigration, or '…there will be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran.' Today, with security unusually tight, Goode said he would not apologize for his words. … Ellison has pointed out he is not an immigrant, rather an African-American who can trace his roots to 1742. In a statement today, he said, 'Let's remember…diversity is a great strength of America.' Leading Muslim groups call Goode's letter Islamophobic and ignorant."

The AP (12/22, Lindsey) reports Goode said "he will not retract a letter warning that unless immigration is tightened, 'many more Muslims will be elected' and use the Quran to take the oath of office." Goode "triggered angry responses from a civil rights group and some colleagues with a letter this month to constituents concerned about a decision by Rep.-elect Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, to use the Quran when he is sworn in." Goode said he is "receiving more positive comments from constituents than negative," and he "told Fox News he wants to limit legal immigration and do away with 'diversity visas,' which he said let in people 'not from European countries' and 'some terrorist states.'"

The Washington Times (12/22, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel "called on" Goode "to meet with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison." Emanuel, who is Jewish, said, "If he meets with Keith, he'll see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents." The Times adds Goode "sparked a controversy when he told constituents that if Americans 'don't wake up' and strengthen the country's immigration laws, more Muslims will be elected to Congress and will demand to use the Koran when they take the oath of office." At a Franklin County Courthouse press conference, Goode said, "I will not be putting my hand on the Koran."

Ellison said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/21, Blitzer), "Diversity of our country is a great strength. It's a good thing that we have people from all faiths and all cultures that come here. And we all support one Constitution that upholds our right to equal protection, one Constitution that guarantees us due process under the law, one Constitution which says that there is no religious test for elective office in America. … Diversity in our nation is a great thing and we should embrace it, not be afraid of it." Asked about being sworn in on a Koran, Ellison said, "When I'm officially sworn in, I will do it the same, exact way as every congressperson-elect who is sworn in. We will all stand up and, in unison, lift our hand and swear to uphold that Constitution. And then later, in a private ceremony, of course, I'll put my hand on a book that is the basis of my faith, which is Islam."

WPost Says Goode Is A Bigot. The Washington Post (12/22, A32, 690K) says in an editorial, "Bigotry comes in various guises -- some coded, some closeted, some colossally stupid. The bigotry displayed recently by Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Republican who represents a patch of south-central Virginia, falls squarely in the third category." The "real worry for the nation is that the rest of the world might take Mr. Goode seriously, interpreting his biased remarks about Muslims as proof that America really has embarked on a civilizational war against Islam."

Virginia Interfaith Group Posts Arabic Signs. The AP (12/22, Gelineau) reports that in Richmond, "small beige signs bearing black Arabic script have been appearing all over town on buses and at colleges. … Actual translation: 'Paper or plastic?'" The signs "are part of a campaign by A More Perfect Union, a program of the Virginia Interfaith Center for Public Policy, and are aimed at dispelling some of the public's fears about the Muslim community." The signs "were placed in all 170 Greater Richmond Transit Co. buses in Richmond on Nov. 27 and will remain there through December, though many buses will continue to display them at least through January."

Holocaust Museum Board Criticizes Member For Condemning Ellison. The New York Times (12/22, Swarns, 1.16M) reports the board "that oversees the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum here publicly distanced itself on Thursday from a member who recently condemned the first Muslim elected to Congress for planning to use a Koran during the private part of his swearing-in ceremony." In November, board member Dennis Prager, "a conservative commentator and radio show host, said that Keith Ellison, the newly elected Muslim member of Congress, should give up his post if he could not take his oath on a Bible, which Mr. Prager said was the traditional religious text of the United States." The Holocaust Museum's "executive committee criticized Mr. Prager's remarks as 'antithetical to the mission of the museum as an institution promoting tolerance and respect for all peoples regardless of their race, religion or ethnicity.'"

Davis Continues Probe Of Berger's Removal Of Archive Documents. The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Tom Davis, the outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, "says questions remain about former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's removal of classified documents from the National Archives and pledged yesterday to get the answers." Davis said, "I don't care if it's Sandy Berger or Warren Burger or Veggie Burger who walked off with these documents. It's the lax controls that permitted such a theft; it's the way it was handled internally at the Archives and then by [the Justice Department] that is of grave concern." The Times adds that in October, Davis "led an effort by top House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been 'destroyed, removed or were missing.'" Democrats assume control of Congress next month, and the request is expected to be shelved. But Mr. Davis said his staff continues to look into the matter, and a final investigative report is expected next month."

Report Says Berger Viewed Documents In Archives Official's Office. The Washington Post (12/22, A31, Smith, 690K) reports Berger has "admitted taking five slightly different copies of a highly classified document from the National Archives in 2003 by stuffing them into his suit and sneaking them past guards. He was eventually detected, confronted and ordered by a federal judge to pay a $50,000 fine for his illegal actions." A newly released report "by the National Archives' Office of the Inspector General contains fresh details of the incident, which involved a classified Clinton administration study called the Millennium Alert After Action Review (MAAR)." During "four visits to the Archives in 2003, Berger worked at a small table in the office of a senior Archives official, instead of in the public reading room -- a practice the inspector general said was 'unauthorized.' The official, whose name was redacted from the report, violated standard protocol by leaving the office to give Berger privacy to speak on the telephone."

WSJournal Says Berger's Actions "Astonishing." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the Archives' Inspector General report "suggests Mr. Berger knew he was engaged in a bit of hugger-mugger when he secreted the after-action memos he was reviewing out of the building." Hiding documents "under a trailer in a construction site before returning to retrieve them later" is "not the behavior of a man with a clear conscience. And it's astonishing for a man who served in a senior White House position that made him familiar with the obligations of handling classified papers."

Emanuel To Push Prescription Drug Importation Bill. The Chicago Tribune (12/22, Yednak, 617K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) "said Democrats and Republicans in both chambers will push again for a bill that would allow prescription drugs to be imported to help reduce costs for U.S. consumers." Emanuel said, "People from around the world come to America for first-class medical care, but Americans travel around the world for affordable medications." The Tribune adds the bill "would allow consumers to import drugs directly from Canada, while wholesalers and pharmacies could import FDA-approved drugs from the European Union, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and Japan to offer for sale."

Iraq Complicates Tight Budget For Bush, Congressional Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Iraq is casting a shadow over the next U.S. budget, complicating efforts by President Bush and congressional Democrats to fund domestic programs as costs of the war rise." The fiscal 2008 budget is "expected to be released Feb. 5. The budget is likely to be the tightest of Mr. Bush's presidency, with little new discretionary spending expected for any area outside the departments of Defense and Homeland Security." The costs "associated with the Iraq war and broader war on terrorism have exacerbated funding constraints caused, in large part, by rising mandatory costs for programs such as Medicare and Social Security." The situation is "posing a challenge for the White House, which must craft a budget that will cover rising expenses while preserving Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and not worsening the deficit." Meanwhile, Congress' "new Democratic majority is expected to face an even tougher task as its leaders look to implement their agenda, which may include increased spending in areas such as education, health care and homeland security."

Krugman Says Democrats Should Spend More Rather Than Cut Deficit. In his New York Times column (12/22), Paul Krugman questions if Democrats should "return to Rubinomics — the doctrine, associated with former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, that placed a very high priority on reducing the budget deficit." While Rubinomics "made sense in terms of pure economics, it failed to take account of the ugly realities of contemporary American politics. And the lesson of the last six years is that the Democrats shouldn't spend political capital trying to bring the deficit down. They should refrain from actions that make the deficit worse. But given a choice between cutting the deficit and spending more on good things like health care reform, they should choose the spending."

Pelosi Planning Presidential-Style Inauguration Ceremonies. The Washington Post (12/22, A1, Layton, 690K) reports, "On a scale associated with presidential inaugurations, Nancy Pelosi is planning four days of celebration surrounding her Jan. 4 swearing-in as the first female speaker of the House. She will return to the blue-collar Baltimore neighborhood where she grew up, attend Mass at the women's college where she studied political science, and dine at the Italian Embassy as Tony Bennett sings 'I Left My Heart in San Francisco.'" But "the hoopla is more than just a party." Pelosi "is grabbing the moment to present herself as the new face of the Democratic Party and to restore the party's image as one hospitable to ethnic minorities, families, religion, the working class and women. … In her meticulous selection of events and venues during a week when she expects to attract media attention from as far away as Australia, Pelosi is clearly trying to bury the label 'San Francisco liberal' that Republicans tried to affix to her during the midterm elections." Mike Murphy, "a Republican political consultant and former adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), said the four-day extravaganza is excessive. 'What? No fireworks?' he said." He "said the schedule is 'classic Pelosi.'"

USA Today (12/22, Scouten, 2.27M) reports on inaugural bashes across the nation, "Unlike campaign contributions, most states don't limit or require public disclosure of inaugural fundraising. Edwin Bender of the Institute on Money in State Politics said greater transparency is needed because governors are guaranteed 'to wield a great deal of influence over public policy.'"

DC Circuit Relaxes Restrictions On Special Interest Group "Issue Ads." The AP (12/22, Apuzzo) reports that the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit "loosened restrictions on corporations, unions and other special interest groups that run political advertising in peak election season." The 2-1 ruling "said groups may mention candidates by name in commercials as long as they are trying to influence public policy, rather than sway an election." The ruling "came in a challenge to the so-called McCain-Feingold law designed to reduce the influence of big money in political campaigns." Some lawmakers "have predicted such a ruling would create a loophole in the 2002 law. Advocacy groups have used ads similar to those paid for by the Wisconsin group to advocate for and against candidates."

The Washington Post (12/22, A11, Leonnig, 690K) reports the "divided three-judge court ruled yesterday that ads advocating for an issue and mentioning candidates can run during an election, creating a loophole in the law that sought to control the power of big money in elections." The court "found that the government had no compelling justification to regulate television ads such as the ones Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. broadcast in July 2004, which advocated stopping congressional filibusters against President Bush's judicial nominees." The ads "ran when Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) was running for reelection and had opposed some of Bush's nominees. The ads made no mention of Feingold's record, instead urging Wisconsin residents to call their senators to express their dissatisfaction."

The New York Times (12/22, Phillips, 1.16M) reports the case, "which was heard by a special federal court panel in Washington, now heads to the Supreme Court. If upheld, the ruling would unravel one of the tougher restrictions on the use of unregulated donations that interest groups pumped by the millions of dollars into political commercials." The majority opinion "was by Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court. Judge Richard W. Roberts of Federal District Court dissented." The Washington Times (12/22, Dinan, 88K) notes the ruling is "the first major dent in the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law." The "small but potentially deep change creates an exception to what had been considered a near-blanket rule."

NYTimes Criticizes Brownback Over Neff Nomination. The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "If most people were asked to list the qualities they want in a federal judge, few would include 'has not attended a same-sex commitment ceremony.' But that was the outrageous litmus test that Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, applied to Janet Neff, whose nomination he has been blocking. Mr. Brownback -- who has presidential ambitions -- now says he will allow a vote on her nomination. We hope that is a sign that gay-baiting is becoming less tolerable, even to Republican primary voters." The Times adds, "Whether someone has attended a same-sex commitment ceremony is not a worthy litmus test to impose on someone seeking an important office. Whether someone holds hateful views toward gay people certainly is."

Judge Reduces Texas Vioxx Award From $32 Million To $7 Million. The AP (12/22) reports, "A judge in a Texas widow's lawsuit over the Merck & Co. drug Vioxx on Thursday reduced a $32 million jury award to about $7.75 million, citing Texas' recently enacted caps on punitive damages. The state jury in April found Merck & Co. liable for the death of Leonel Garza, a 71-year-old man who had a fatal heart attack within a month of taking the since-withdrawn painkiller. The company was ordered to pay the Garza family $7 million in non-economic compensatory damages and $25 million in punitive damages. But Judge Alex Garza, in a Rio Grande City courtroom, ordered the punitive damage reduced as required by state law."

US Businessman Pleads Guilty To Bribing UN Official. The New York Times (12/22, Gootman, 1.16M) reports, "A businessman pleaded guilty Thursday to providing cash and a significantly discounted luxury Manhattan condominium to a ranking United Nations procurement official, in a successful effort to win more than $50 million in contracts, federal prosecutors said. The businessman, Nishan Kohli, 30, pleaded guilty in Manhattan federal court to a single count of bribery after acknowledging that he had given cash payments to Sanjaya Bahel, who was chief of the commodity procurement section of the United Nations procurement division from 1998 until 2003. Mr. Kohli faces up to 10 years in prison. He also acknowledged that from 2003 to 2005, he allowed Mr. Bahel to pay reduced rent at a high-rise apartment that Mr. Kohli owned in the Dag Hammarskjold Towers, near United Nations headquarters. In May 2005, Mr. Kohli sold the unit to Mr. Bahel at a price so far below the market value that the condominium's board considered blocking the sale, prosecutors said. … Mr. Kohli's guilty plea is the latest development in a series of corruption charges against United Nations officials and those seeking to do business with them. The plea and Mr. Kohli's agreement to cooperate with the government are likely to strengthen the case against Mr. Bahel, who has pleaded not guilty to bribery charges. His trial is scheduled for May 7."

The New York Sun (12/22, Goldstein) reports, "Prior to Mr. Bahel's recent indictment, another top procurement department employee, Alexander Yakovlev, pleaded guilty in the summer of 2005 to corruption and wire fraud charges. Messrs. Bahel and Yakovlev were key officers involved in the awarding of a U.N. contract to the Swiss-based inspection company Cotecna, which had employed Secretary General Annan's son, Kojo. In addition, last January the U.N. suspended eight employees in the procurement department, including Mr. Bahel, pending an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing."

Mexican Anti-Drug Operation Focuses On Hindering Drug Gang Cash Flow. The USA Today (12/22, 6A, Llana, 2.27M) reports Mexico "has long been under pressure from the United States to crack down on the drug trade and end violence between drug gangs. According to the U.S. State Department, 70%-90% of drugs coming to the USA from Latin America enter through Mexico. Mexico is one of the main producers of marijuana and heroin destined for the USA. U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza has repeatedly expressed concern about the rising violence, most of it drug-related. The week-old Operation Michoacan…is the biggest anti-drug effort taken on by the Mexican government, says Army Gen. Manuel Garcia Ruiz, who heads the operation. … The first goal, Garcia Ruiz says, is to disrupt the drug gangs' source of income and their ability to communicate."

Former Administration Officials Decry White House Op-ed Redaction. The New York Times today's publishes the redacted version of an op-ed written by former NSC adviser Flynt Leverett, and former Foreign Service officer Hillary Mann. In an accompanying op-ed titled "What We Wanted To Tell You About Iran," Leverett and Mann say their original piece was "blacked out by the Central Intelligence Agency's Publication Review Board after the White House intervened in the normal prepublication review process and demanded substantial deletions." Agency officials, the write, "told us that they had concluded on their own that the original draft included no classified material, but that they had to bow to the White House." Leverett and Mann say the deleted passages "go into aspects of American-Iranian relations during the Bush administration's first term that have been publicly discussed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; former Secretary of State Colin Powell; former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage; a former State Department policy planning director, Richard Haass; and a former special envoy to Afghanistan, James Dobbins." The content, they note, have also been "extensively reported in the news media, and one of us, Mr. Leverett, has written about them in The Times and other publications with the explicit permission of the review board." Leverett and Mann provide a list of links to their citations "to demonstrate that all of the material the White House objected to is already in the public domain," noting that "unfortunately, to make sense of much of our Op-Ed article, readers will have to read the citations for themselves." Leverett and Mann conclude by stating that "national security must be above politics. In a democracy, transparency in government has to be honored and protected. To classify information for reasons other than the safety and security of the United States and its interests is a violation of these principles."

Rice Backs UN Resolution On Iran Sanctions As Vote Looms. The AP (12/22, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington "supports a draft UN sanctions resolution against Iran even though it omits a mandatory travel ban against several Iranians involved in the country's nuclear and missile programs." However, she "said she expects changes to be made in the draft before it is put to a vote at the United Nations Security Council, perhaps on Friday." Speaking at a news conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, she offered no details of the revisions she expects, saying, "It's no secret we would have preferred to have this earlier had we been the lone drafter, and of course there might have been other things in it." At the same time, she said the resolution would make clear to Iran that the "international community is not going to tolerate its defiance" of demands that it abandon its nuclear program. The Washington Times (12/22, Pisik, 88K) reports the US and EU yesterday "pushed for a UN Security Council vote as early as today on Iran sanctions," while Russia "said last night that the resolution needed more work, casting doubt on whether the vote could be held today." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice told reporters after a meeting with MacKay that she is "quite satisfied and quite certain" that the resolution "will be adopted."

wrangling." Diplomats "had hoped to adopt" the resolution "today but the vote had slipped to the weekend," saying "some issues still needed to be ironed out but they were hopeful that unanimous agreement could be reached by this morning."

Ahmadinejad Defiant Ahead Of Security Council Vote. AFP (12/22) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "vowed that nothing would stop Iran pushing ahead with its nuclear program," as the UNSC "prepared to vote Friday on sanctions" against Tehran. In a public address, he said "the United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology." The AP (12/22, Dareini) reports Ahmadinejad also called President Bush "the most hated person" in the world Thursday, "keeping up his tirades against the West."

Iranian Official Rejects Talks With US About Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports Tehran's top envoy in Iraq "said there was no need for contacts with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, saying that Iranians already were pursuing channels to help secure their embattled neighbor." Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi "brushed aside recommendations of the Iraq Study Group," saying, "We don't need a Mr. Baker-style proposal calling for Iran to talk with the United States about Iraq. We have our own well-defined policies about Iraq. We have never waited for a Mr. Baker or someone else to offer talks."

NYTimes Urges US To Push For More Effective Sanctions. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) reports Ahmadinejad "has not been having a very good month, which is good news both for the beaten-down people of Iran and for the outside world. The populist demagogue, it seems, is not so popular with important elements of Iranian society growing uneasy over the price Iran may have to pay for his belligerent pursuit of nuclear technology. This week, Mr. Ahmadinejad's oil minister acknowledged that foreign banks were pulling back from financing Iranian oil projects because of the worsening nuclear dispute." Also last week, "in a remarkable show of courage, students at one of Tehran's elite universities openly denounced Mr. Ahmadinejad as a dictator and a fascist, forcing him to cut short his planned address." As some Iranians begin to recognize that their nation's nuclear program may "do more harm than good," the Times says "Washington needs to keep pushing for effective economic sanctions that will compel Mr. Ahmadinejad to recognize it as well."

Saudi Officials Seen As Split Over Iran Policy. The New York Times (12/22, A16, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that across Saudi Arabia, "in both official and casual conversation, once-quiet concern over the chaos in Iraq and Iran's growing regional influence has burst into the open," with many saying "a showdown with Iran is inevitable." According to the Times a "growing debate" in the kingdom "has centered on how Iran should be confronted: head on, with Saudi Arabia throwing its lot in with the full force of the United States, or diplomatically, with a grand bargain Iran would find hard to refuse?" The "apparent split burst into the open last week when Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Washington, abruptly resigned after just 15 months." His resignation is "seen by many…as part of a long-running battle over Saudi Arabia's foreign policy," and "privately some Saudi officials and analysts with knowledge of the situation say Prince Turki resigned over deep differences with Prince Bandar bin Sultan," who is "believed to favor the tough American approach of confronting Iran, analysts say, while Prince Turki advocates more diplomatic tactics, including negotiating with Iran." Also, the new Saudi ambassador, Adel al-Jubeir, a foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah, is seen as "a wild card." Although he "once worked for Prince Bandar," Saudi officials said that Jubeir "did not necessarily share Prince Bandar's opinions," saying instead he will act as "a direct line between the king and the administration."

Bush Signs Measure Blocking Aid To Hamas. The AP (12/22) reports President Bush Thursday signed into law a bill "meant to block US aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government and ban contacts with Hamas until the militant faction has renounced violence and recognized Israel's existence." The measure "also creates a $20 million fund to promote democracy, human rights, freedom of the press and peace between Israel and the Palestinians." Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-KY), co-sponsor of the Senate bill, "said the legislation makes clear the Palestinian Authority can expect no US help so long as it continues to be led by Hamas." For its part, the White House said the legislation Bush signed "reflects the administration's concern over the current government's failure to renounce violence and terror, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements and obligations."

Renewed Fighting Threatens Palestinian Ceasefire. The AP (12/22, Barzak) reports a "fierce gunbattle broke out between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza City early Friday, underscoring the fragility of a two-day old truce that had largely ended factional violence there." The "street battle" erupted when Hamas militiamen "tried to free two kidnapped militants, including a senior member of the Islamic group." Meanwhile, Palestinians "stepped up rocket attacks on Israel," threatening a separate cease-fire between Israel and the Palestinians. In a conflicting report, AFP (12/22, El Oun) writes under the headline "Gaza Breathes A Sigh Of Relief As Ceasefire Holds" that the "embattled Gaza Strip breathed a sigh of relief as a truce between rival Palestinian factions took hold." AFP said "no clashes between" Fatah and Hamas "have been reported since early Wednesday."

US Prepares $500 Million Aid Package To Strengthen Lebanon Against Hezbollah. The Washington Post (12/22, A29, Wright, 690K) reports the US is "preparing a package of almost $500 million in aid for Lebanon's military and police to help strengthen security forces, part of almost $1 billion in total US assistance to help the beleaguered Lebanese government," according to US officials. The package is part of an international effort to "shore up the Lebanese security forces so they can eventually extend their control over the entire country" and "to strengthen the government's hand over the influence of Hezbollah," the sources said. Secretary Rice told The Post last week in an interview that "one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces not -- I think probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform." Rice said the package will require "further consultations with Congress to win funding." The "other half of the $1 billion is likely to be for reconstruction through USAID as well as debt relief," US officials said. The US aid package is being prepared "even as a new report by the International Crisis Group, set to be released today, warns that the Middle Eastern country is at risk of 'renewed collapse' unless domestic and international players work to achieve political compromise." ICG analyst Patrick Haenni warns, "Street politics have replaced institutional politics. Civil war remains unlikely. But with heightened polarization, intensified [religious divisions] and heavy outside interference, it is again becoming thinkable."

Rice Questions Pyongyang's Commitment As Six-Party Talks Stall. In an exclusive interview with the AP (12/22, Gearan), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she has no reason to believe North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons," but this week's six-party talks will help determine "whether or not they follow through." Meanwhile, in Beijing, the New York Times (12/22, A5, Lague, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Thursday said Pyongyang's "determination to link nuclear disarmament with the financial restrictions was an obstacle" to solving what had become a "very urgent problem." Hill said negotiators "have made it very clear that we consider the financial issue quite separately from the denuclearization issue. I would rather not obscure that problem by talking about finances." Kenichiro Sasae, Japan's chief envoy to the talks, said North Korea's refusal to disarm before the United States lifted the financial restrictions meant "there is no prospect for a breakthrough" in the talks. The Washington Post (12/22, A21, Cody, 690K) reports that "after what he described as a frustrating day of discussions," Hill "said he would give the Chinese-sponsored talks another day in hopes that the North Korean negotiators received last-minute instructions from Pyongyang to change their stand. But in any case, he said, he will be making plane reservations to head back to Washington on Saturday." In Washington, Secretary Rice told reporters, "Diplomacy sometimes takes time, but we should not be diverted somehow by an issue that is clearly in another lane and is clearly being dealt with in a way that the North Koreans themselves asked that it be dealt with." The Washington Times (12/22, Kralev, 88K) says Secretary Rice "rejected a North Korean attempt at the six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing to link the negotiations to US financial sanctions imposed last year." Speaking to reporters after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, Rice, "We've been very clear that these are two separate issues."

The AP (12/22, Olesen) notes Hill "said Friday that there were no signs of a breakthrough and accused the communist state of not being serious about the negotiations." Hill was quoted as saying, "When the DPRK raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want but they know they can't have, another day it's something we said about them that hurt their feelings. "What they need to do is to get serious about the issue that made them such a problem...their nuclear activities." AFP (12/22) says the talks "appeared set to end in deadlock."

Korean Expert Says Pyongyang Misunderstood. B.R. Myers, a North Korea researcher at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/22, 2.04M) that the "ideological landscape" of the Korean peninsula "defeats the reasoning that led to the six-party talks in the first place." North Korea, he notes, is "not a communist country with ideological and sentimental reasons to listen to China and Russia; it is a virulently nationalist state that distrusts all the other parties at the table. And though the rhetoric of a 'concerted front' against North Korea has proved to be just that, it has sufficed to heighten South Korea's sense of solidarity with the North. This will continue to mean plenty of aid money for Kim Jong Il with which to build weapons." The US, Myers writes, "has urged Beijing to bring more pressure to bear on the North. But if America can do nothing with its own ally, it can hardly expect the Chinese to do more with theirs."

US Cancels Military Exercise With Philippines Over Detained Marine. The New York Times (12/22, A8, Shanker, 1.16M) reports under the headline "Tensions Flare Over Custody In Rape Case In Philippines" that the commander of American forces in the Pacific announced Thursday that he had canceled "a huge annual military exercise with the Philippines in a dispute over custody of a marine lance corporal convicted of raping a local woman." Adm. William J. Fallon said he also "would halt aid and reconstruction programs carried out by the American military in the Philippines until he was confident that the troops' legal rights would be protected under bilateral agreements governing visiting United States forces." The rape case involving Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith "has tested relations between the countries and challenged the validity" of a bilateral agreement. It has also "sharpened a political division between Filipinos with nationalist resentments" and those "who cite the economic and security benefits of ties to the United States."

Singh Expresses Concerns About Nuclear Pact. The AP (12/22) reports Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told President Bush Thursday that his country has "some concerns" about the nuclear pact signed into law earlier this week, according to a statement by Singh's office. The Indian government has "not elaborated on its concerns, but Congress included a nonbinding clause in the new law directing the White House to certify that India is cooperating in efforts to force Iran to abandon its nuclear programs." The clause has been "criticized by Singh's leftist allies and opposition parties, who claim it violates India's sovereignty." During the telephone call, the two leaders "expressed the hope that remaining concerns will be addressed in the next stage of negotiations" on the nuclear cooperation deal, the statement from Singh's office said.

Somali Government Declares Victory In Battle Against Islamic Militants. The New York Times (12/22, A8, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the transitional government of Somalia "claimed victory on Thursday in the first major confrontation" with Islamic militants. United Nations officials "confirmed heavy Islamist casualties in the fighting, which began Wednesday and continued Thursday." The Islamist fighters, the officials said, were "mowed down by transitional government soldiers backed by the Ethiopian Army." "After initially playing down the fighting, Islamic militant leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, "announced Thursday over national radio that Somalia was at war" and urges "all Somalis" to "take part in this struggle against Ethiopia." The AP (12/22, Duhul) says the "clashes threaten to spiral into a major conflict in this volatile region, sucking in Ethiopia and its bitter rival Eritrea, which is accused of supporting the Islamic group. Analysts believe Ethiopia may soon raise the stakes by deploying attack helicopters in support of the government."

US Embassy Accuses Congolese Company Of Stealing Aid Shipment. AFP (12/22) reports the US embassy in Brazzaville "accused a private Congolese company of stealing more than 5,800 tons of humanitarian aid worth more $3 million with the help of a local magistrate." The embassy accused import-export company Super-Market of having "illegally removed" the aid at the start of December from warehouses of a transit company in Pointe-Noire, according to a statement received by AFP. Ambassador Robert Wesiberg told journalists that Super-Market had "acted in complicity with prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou" and asked the Congolese government to do "everything to remove this aid from Super-Market, so that it can reach people following normal procedures." Wesiberg noted that "so far all attempts to obtain help from ministries had been in vain."

The ambassador on Wednesday "boycotted" a ceremony organized by the UN Development Programme during which an appeal for $28 million in aid for Congo in 2007 was due to be launched.

Sudden Death Of Turkmen President Raises Fears Of Instability. ABC World News (12/21, story 6, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "One of the world's most ruthless and eccentric dictators has died. Saparmurat Niyazov ruled Turkmenistan in central Asia for 21 years. He crushed opponents and named towns, mosques and even months of the year after himself. His bizarre decrees included a ban on lip-syncing. His death raises questions about the stability of Turkmenistan, which has vast natural gas and oil reserves." The Financial Times (12/22, Gorst) says Niyazov's death "has raised the threat of instability in a Central Asian republic that is an important energy supplier to Europe." Niyazov, who ruled for more than 20 years, died "with no obvious successor," likely "to spark both an internal power struggle and a tussle for influence between Russia, China and the US over a country with the world's fifth-largest gas reserves." The New York Times (12/22, Chivers, 1.16M) reports "foreign governments and energy analysts expressed misgivings about the expected succession battles ahead, and what they might mean for stability and the intense international competition for the gas reserves." Acting President Berdymukhammedov, it notes, is "a relatively unknown political figure" and "probably not a long-term successor."

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Chazan, Cullison, 2.04M) says Russia "will probably have the edge in any 'Great Game'-style jockeying for influence over Turkmenistan," noting that President Vladimir Putin "has long nurtured close ties to the Turkmen leadership." However, Niyazov's death "could also revitalize Western-backed efforts to open up new transport routes for Central Asian gas." The AP (12/22, Heintz) reports that "within hours of his death, Turkmenistan appeared to be showing signs of political infighting."

The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Holley, 850K) and Washington Post (12/22, A21, Finn, 690K) run similar reports. Also in the Washington Post (12/22, A33, 690K), Marsha Lipman writes that "struggle seems inevitable. Niyazov's regime implied that he was Turkmenistan's ruler for eternity, and any plans for succession were simply ruled out. Just as it was after Stalin's death, members of the leader's inner circle must be seized by fear and deep distrust of each other. … One would hope that change will at least improve somewhat the situation of the Turkmen people. But with the balance of power in Central Asia at stake, it's unlikely that human rights abuses will be of major concern to the contestants in this tug-of-war."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Editor's Note. In observance of the federal Christmas holiday, the Attorney General's News Briefing will not be published on Monday, December 25. Bulletin News wishes all of our readers a very happy holiday, and we look forward to working with you in 2007.

Rice Asks Chertoff, DOJ To Review Arar Case.

Bloomberg (12/22, Zacharia) reports that in a press conference yesterday with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, "U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked homeland security chief Michael Chertoff and the Justice Department to review the case of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who Canada says was wrongly accused of links to terrorism and remains on a U.S. terrorist watch list. … Canada has removed Arar from its watch list and wants the U.S. to do the same." Bloomberg adds, "Asked if she had anything to say to Arar on how he has been treated, Rice defended U.S. counterterrorism and border security procedures, saying 'it needs to be understood that in the post- September 11 circumstances we are determined to protect our borders.'

CBC News (12/21) reported Rice said that "U.S. security officials will review why…Arar is still on a U.S. terrorist watch list," but she "reiterated that the U.S. makes its own security decisions based on independent information. 'We value accuracy in cases but we do have our own process,' she said. 'It needs to be understood that in the post-Sept. 11 circumstances, we are determined to protect our borders.' MacKay said he brought up Arar's status in the meeting with his U.S. counterpart and reiterated that Arar has been cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism." CBC noted, "The meeting between MacKay and Rice came a day after" DHS Acting Assistant Secretary for International Affairs Paul Rosenzweig "bluntly stated the U.S. would follow its own path on Arar without informing Canadians on its reasons. … Prime Minister Stephen Harper told Sun Media that 'as near as I can see, we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong.'"

New Analysis Finds Hudson River Tunnels Vulnerable To Bomb Attack. The New York Times (12/22, Rashbaum, Neuman, 1.16M) reports, "An analysis done for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey says that the PATH train tunnels under the Hudson River are more vulnerable to a bomb attack than previously thought, and that a relatively small amount of high explosives could cause significant flooding of the rail system within hours." The new information was shared with the Times "by a government official who was troubled by what the official felt was a lack of action in response to the analysis, which the official said the Port Authority got about three weeks ago." The official said the Port Authority had not yet informed the governors of New York and New Jersey, the "Department of Homeland Security, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, the New York Police Department or other law enforcement agencies" of the results of the analysis.

Five Cuban-Americans Testify In Posada Carriles Probe. The AP (12/22, Press) reports, "Five Cuban-Americans were called to testify in a federal grand jury probe exploring allegations they helped send more than $30,000 to an anti-Castro militant suspected of directing attacks on Cuba, their lawyer said Thursday. All five deny wrongdoing, attorney Gilberto M. Garcia said. He told The Record of Bergen County that four of his clients claim someone used their names to send transfers to Luis Posada Carriles," and "a fifth, Oscar Rojas, acknowledges handling transfers but says he did so only at the request of a former millionaire businessman that he worked for and did not know what the funds would be used for, according to The Record." The AP notes, "Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would neither confirm nor deny an investigation into the money transfers was ongoing."

Chertoff Says DHS Will Issue New Chemical Plant Security Rules. The New York Times (12/22, Lipton, 1.16M) reports following "years of debate, and criticism over the delay," Department of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday that the department will issue chemical plant security rules Friday that "will bring us to a much higher level of security." However, "the draft regulations will almost certainly evoke protest from Democrats on Capitol Hill — as well as from state officials — because they may allow a federal pre-emption of conflicting and perhaps more demanding state laws. They also may allow the Department of Homeland Security, under certain circumstances, to recognize as sufficient the security measures already put in place voluntarily by major chemical manufacturers, meaning that for many plants, few if any changes would be required." The times continues that the draft rules "will leave it up to plant owners to decide what measures are most appropriate, although the Homeland Security Department will review the plans and have the power to order changes."

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A3, Block, 2.04M) reports the rules were "heavily influenced by the chemical industry," and "will tell plants what they need to do, and not how, a strategy unlikely to satisfy many Democratic lawmakers who take control of Congress next month." Chertoff said the announcement "is part two of what we did with respect to trains carrying hazardous chemicals between places. These rules now cover security when those chemicals come to rest." The Journal adds that critics saw the rail security rules unveiled last week "as weak -- a charge also likely to hit the chemical-plant rules."

DHS Privacy Office Says Secure Flight Violated Federal Law. The Washington Post (12/22, A7, Nakashima, Wilber, 690K) reports a report to be issued Friday by the Homeland Security Department's privacy office says "Secure Flight, the US government's stalled program to screen domestic air passengers against terrorism watch lists, violated federal law during a crucial test phase" when it gathered "passenger data from commercial brokers…without notifying the passengers." It is "the first time that the Homeland Security Department has acknowledged that the problem-plagued Secure Flight program has violated the law." The report finds "that 'the disparity between what TSA proposed to do and what it actually did in the testing program resulted in significant privacy concerns being raised."

Audit Finds DHS Lacks Financial Controls. The New York Times (12/22, News, 1.16M) reports the auditing firm KPMG LLP has found, for the third straight year, that it could not provide an opinion on the balance sheet of the Department of Homeland Security "because of its lax financial controls and oversight. The department last year hired a chief financial officer, David Norquist, for the first time. In a Nov. 15 letter, Mr. Norquist wrote: 'We agree with the independent public accountant's conclusions. Since my arrival at the department I have made corrective actions my highest priority.'"

"Material Support" Laws Said To Be Limiting Refugee Admission Into US. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Gaouette, 850K) reports that post-9/11 US laws denying "admission to anyone who has provided 'material support'…to terrorist groups" have expanded over the last few years "to the point that they are disqualifying people who even immigration judges agree pose no threat to the US." Critics say disqualifications of people who unwillingly supported terrorists "are a big reason why refugee admissions in fiscal 2006 fell to 41,277 from more than 50,000 in each of the two previous years. The material-support clause has even snared American allies who fought alongside US troops or at the United States' behest." The Times adds that "Homeland Security officials say they hope for legislation next year" that "would expand the use of government-issued waivers that allow an otherwise banned group or person into the country."

WAR NEWS:

Eight Marines Charged In Haditha Killings. ABC World News (12/21, story 4, 2:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Criminal charges were filed today against eight Marines in a case that has damaged the US military's reputation in Iraq and throughout the Muslim world, the alleged massacre of 24 civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Four of the Marines were charged with murder, and four were charged with dereliction of duty." The CBS Evening News (12/21, lead story, 2:41, Couric, 7.66M) said that "in a war filled with horrors, this was one of the most shocking." CBS (Martin) added, "It's the biggest criminal case of the Iraq war, a sergeant faced with 13 counts of murder and a lieutenant colonel accused of dereliction of duty are among the eight Marines charged. It all started when an improvised explosive device, or I.E.D., killed one Marine." Col. Stewart Navarre, spokesman US Marine Corps: "Over the next several hours, 24 Iraqi men, women, and children, died in the vicinity of the IED explosion." Martin: "Sergeant Frank Wuterich, the leader of the squad ambushed in Haditha a year ago, is charged with killing 12 Iraqi civilians. He's also accused of killing six when he opened fire without first identifying his victims. His attorney insists Wuterich was not out for revenge." Neal Puckett, defense attorney: "Everything he did that day was in an effort to protect his Marines from any further harm after the IED went off." Puckett "portrayed the war -- nasty, urban combat in which one false step can lead to death -- as the real culprit."

NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 4, 1:10, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Military officials say it appeared some of the victims had been shot execution-style. Defense lawyers argue the Marines were using appropriate force under the current rules of engagement. Four other Marines – officers -- have also been charged with dereliction of duty for failing to investigate the incident. Now, if those four initial Marines are court-martialed and convicted of murder, they could face life in prison on each count." The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Marosi, Perry, 850K) notes, "Initial reports from the Marines stated that 15 civilians died in an explosion and eight Iraqis were killed in a firefight. Only after Time magazine published an investigative story suggesting that the Marine account was false did the military begin its own investigations."

The AP (12/22, Watkins) reports, "At a news conference to announce the charges, military officials would not say what they believe prompted the killings. But investigators have raised the possibility that the men went on a rampage in a fury over the roadside bombing that killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso, Texas, and wounded two other Marines." USA Today (12/22, Kasindorf, 2.27M), New York Times (12/22, Von Zielbauer, Marshall, 1.16M), Washington Post (12/22, A1, White, Geis, 690K) and Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Knickerbocker, 59K) also report on the incident and charges.

Contractor Accused Of Opening Fire On Civilians. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 6, 2:55, Williams, 9.87M) reported on "two men who went to Iraq as part of a team of heavily-armed private security contractors and who now tell NBC News they saw their supervisor open fire on Iraqi civilians just, as they say, 'for the thrill of it.' An act of violence by contractors would not be an isolated incident in Iraq. But this story comes as a new Federal report accuses the Pentagon of failing to adequately oversee private contractors in that war zone." NBC (Myers) added, "Shane Schmidt is a former Marine Corps sniper, Chuck Shepard, a former Army Ranger. Both joined the legions of heavily-armed private security contractors in Iraq. They claim that during a mission last July, another American fired unprovoked into two Iraqi civilian vehicles, possibly killing at least one person. Do you think a crime was committed that day?" Triple Canopy "does not deny that shootings occurred. But it says the facts, including what might have provoked the shootings, are in dispute and it has no evidence anyone was hurt."

Gates Hears Support For More Troops In Iraq. The AP (12/21, Baldor) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "traded ideas with Iraqi leaders Thursday about boosting military assistance for the embattled government and warned Iraq's neighbors that the U.S. will be a presence in the Persian Gulf for a long time." Gates said that "Iran and Syria are playing a negative role in the violence" and added, "We need to make damned sure that the neighbors understand that we're going to be here for a long time -- here being the Persian Gulf." He also said that "there are several approaches that could be used to improve security, yet offered few details." In speaking to soldiers, Gates "asked whether adding forces would help" and "got a roomful of nods and smattering of 'yes, sir' responses." Meanwhile, the New York Times (12/22, Cloud, 1.16M) says Gates, "talking to enlisted soldiers on his second day in Iraq, heard broad support today for a proposal to send more American forces to Iraq." Gates also said that in a "meeting with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials…he had discussed 'the possibility of some additional assistance' with the Iraqis, but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops."

The Washington Post (12/22, A23, Ricks, Raghavan, 690K) reports that Maliki told Gates that "he would let U.S. generals decide whether there is a need for a 'surge' in U.S. troops deployed in Iraq." Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir Muhammed Jassim "indicated general acceptance" of an "increase in the number of U.S. troops." But Sami al-Askari, "a Shiite member of parliament who is close to Maliki" said that at a meeting of Shiite parliamentarians "there was a general feeling that 'there's no need for further troops.'" Maliki's office said that he "told Gates that Sunni Arab insurgents and loyalists of Saddam Hussein's former Baath Party were behind the violence unfolding in the capital." Maliki "advisers say he has proposed a two-pronged strategy in which U.S. troops would target Sunni Arab insurgents in outer Baghdad neighborhoods for four to eight weeks, while Iraqi forces would take over control of inner Baghdad." At a breakfast with "more than a dozen enlisted soldiers" Gates "got an earful about the need for more personnel."

Some Military Leaders Could Back Troop Surge. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports, "Some military leaders aren't opposed to Iraq troop surge. Army leaders privately tell White House they could back more soldiers if Bush provides latitude to sustain the effort through reserve call-ups."

Armed Forces Expansion Favored By Retired Officers And Joint Chiefs. The Washington Times (12/22, Scarborough, 88K) reports, "President Bush only acceded to a jump in the number of U.S. Army and Marine Corps ground troops after intense pressure from senior officers, active and retired, including the Joint Chiefs, defense sources said." Bush "heard about the stressed Army and Marines Corps from a group of retired officers at the Pentagon" and he "listened to a request for more combat forces from Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant." Schoomaker "and Mr. Rumsfeld's staff did not see eye to eye on the size of a budget increases needed to replace damaged equipment." Meanwhile, "the Joint Chiefs do not favor proposals from Democrats to remove all 135,000 troops immediately from Iraq or to bring them out in a preset timeline." Retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Thomas McInerney said, "We are badly underfunding the Department of Defense for the missions we have given them."

Gates, Rumsfeld Styles Contrasted. The New York Times (12/22, Cloud, 1.16M) runs a profile of Gates this morning, in which the new secretary is contrasted (favorably) with former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. For example, the Times notes Gates' use of meetings with soldiers to "collect impressions about conditions outside the heavily fortified American military compounds." But "it is easy -- and facile -- to view almost every move he makes as either a deliberate or unconscious repudiation of Mr. Rumsfeld." The article indicates some "similarities" between the two, noting that "both men left Washington for long periods" and that Gates can "be an exacting bureaucratic taskmaster." But "Gates has not returned with sweeping ambitions of transforming the department. Nor has he brought a coterie of ideologically driven aides with him." Gates also "leaves no doubt that he sees fixing Iraq as his overriding mission." And "perhaps he recognizes that his best management tool, at least for now, is to be seen as the anti-Rumsfeld."

Rice Says US Can Still Win In Iraq. In an exclusive interview with the AP (12/22, Gearan), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars and "said the US can still win a conflict that has been more difficult than she expected." Asked whether an additional $100 billion the Pentagon wants for the Iraq and Afghan wars "might amount to throwing good money after bad in Iraq," Rice said, "I don't think it's a matter of money. Along the way there have been plenty of markers that show that this is a country that is worth the investment, because once it emerges as a country that is a stabilizing factor you will have a very different kind of Middle East." The secretary noted that "a lot has been invested in Iraq," and said President Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed."

On PBS' NewsHour (12/21, Warner), Rice said, "The President's looking at his options. And I'm going to look at them with him. And, of course, we'll give him advice. But my view is that we need to do what needs to be done in order to win. … The President is waiting not to hear reports of what commanders may be saying, or rumors about what commanders may be saying, or even the voices of a commander here or a commander there, but rather to get a systematic look at what his options are, at what the people on the ground, the commanders, think is going to help support this Iraqi government in getting control of the violence in Baghdad. And he'll make a decision at that point."

Experts Skeptical About Possibility Of Victory. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 8, 3:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported on the results of asking "five prominent thinkers and policymakers -- how do you define victory in Iraq?" Their responses were generally negative, saying that victory was "unlikely" or "no longer achievable" yet each held out the hope of a redefined victory under a new strategy. Jamil Mroue, Editor-in-Chief, The Daily Star, Beirut: "Victory to this part of the world is stability." He urged the U.S. to "move from a paradigm of security and force to an active role in justice, which is the essence of America, then there is possibly a win-win situation that would be victory." Susan Rice, Senior Fellow, Brookings Institution: "A stable, democratic, peaceful Iraq -- is no longer achievable in a reasonable timeframe, if it ever was." Instead, "the best we can hope for at this stage, and it is a long shot, is to prevent Iraq from becoming a fully failed state." Dr. Henry Kissinger, Secretary of State, 1973-1977: "Victory…is unlikely." But, "An end to the civil war and a coalition government that prevents the establishment of terrorist ends on its territory" is "achievable, but not by the present strategy." Paul Rieckhoff, Executive Director, Iraq & Afghanistan Veterans of America: "For most of the troops on the ground, the key victory is just surviving." Still, "if victory is trying to stand up a government and trying to save face, maybe we've got a chance." Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison: "I think everyone agrees that adjustments are due but let's do it in a way that continues the overall goal of stopping terrorism and protecting Americans and freedom-loving people throughout the world."

Sadr, Sunni Group Seen As Undercutting Drive Toward New Iraqi Coalition. The New York Times (12/22, Glanz, 1.16M) reports, "Several Iraqi political groups on Thursday maneuvered to undercut an American-backed initiative that would create a multisectarian bloc intended to isolate extremists like the Shiite cleric and militia leader Moktada al-Sadr. The bloc would consist of Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish parties in an alliance that would be novel in Iraq's highly sectarian political environment. This week, Iraqi and Western officials said that Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a highly influential Shiite cleric, had given a tentative go-ahead to the coalition." But yesterday, "Saleem Abdullah, a Sunni Arab lawmaker who is a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said his party had set tough new conditions for its participation in the bloc."

Meanwhile, says USA Today/AP (12/22, 7A), "Sadr has agreed to allow supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government after a three-week boycott, officials close to the militia leader said Thursday, as political rivals pushed to form a coalition without him. Shiites from parliament's largest bloc met Thursday in their holy city of Najaf to try to forge a new coalition across sectarian lines -- one that won't include al-Sadr's supporters." They "hoped, in part, to pressure al-Sadr to rejoin the political process and rein in his Mahdi Army militia, which is blamed for much of Iraq's sectarian violence." In Najaf, "delegates from seven Shiite parties appealed to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, whose word is law to many Shiites, to support a planned governing coalition. The coalition would include Shiites, Kurds and one Sunni party -- and bridge Iraq's treacherous sectarian divide." The AP adds. "Though al-Sistani is expected to approve the deal, he fears the coalition could weaken the Shiite bloc, officials close to him said on condition of anonymity because they were not allowed to speak to the press. It seems likely that al-Sistani intervened to persuade al-Sadr to return to government and avoid a Shiite split."

ABC World News (12/21, story 5, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "word from Iraq tonight of a possible -- and we emphasize possible -- breakthrough in trying to end the political paralysis there." ABC (McCarthy) added that "after reports surfaced that the US was brokering a new coalition government of moderate Sunnis and Shiites, Sadr appears to have become nervous that he would be left out."

Arab States Said To View Iraqi Government As "Iranian Stooge." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Harwood, 2.04M) reports in its "Washington Wire" column, "US military officials and diplomats want Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates and other Gulf states to recognize Maliki government, send ambassadors to Baghdad and forgive more than $40 billion in Iraqi debt. Among Sunni states, only Egypt has sent an ambassador, and he was assassinated. The problem: Most Arab states, an official says, 'see the current government as...an Iranian stooge.'"

The Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Murphy, 59K) reports that leaders of "Jordan, Israel, and Saudi Arabia, and its foes Syria and Iran -- are engaging in new diplomatic efforts, largely aimed at preventing Iraq's fighting from causing broader turmoil." While in some cases the talks are "only tangentially about Iraq, this high-level dialogue appears to reflect a new reality: With US prestige crippled by the war, regional actors are bypassing the West to forge partnerships and find solutions on their own." In Jordan, King Abdullah II sought to relieve growing tensions between Palestinian factions, while Arab League chief Amr Moussa "seems to be making some progress at ending" Lebanon's "political crisis." However, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Israel are "less concerned about democracy in Iraq or Lebanon," but instead are "all committed to opposing an expansion of Iranian power, which they see as threatening their own vital interests."

Three More US Service Members Killed Iraq. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 5, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) reported "the United States military announced the deaths of three more American service members in Iraq. That brings the total number of Americans killed in the month of December to 71. And if the violence does not let up, this could turn out to be the deadliest month of the year, surpassing October's total of 105."

The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Daragahi, 850K) reported that a suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed 14 Iraqis near a crowded police recruitment center in the capital…in the latest salvo by Sunni Arab insurgents against the Shiite Muslim-dominated government." The Washington Post (12/22, A23, Trejos, 690K) runs a similar story,

Contractor Blames Government For Botched Iraq Building Mission. The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Witte, 690K) reports, "Until this year, Parsons Corp. was about as quiet as a $3 billion engineering and construction firm with 12,000 employees could be. That's the way the firm's chief executive for the past decade -- a soft-spoken, white-haired Army veteran named James F. McNulty -- liked it." But "Iraq has changed everything." Parsons "has been reproved in recent federal audits for completing just a small fraction of the 150 primary health clinics originally planned to be built in Iraq and for building a police academy so flawed that human waste rained from the ceilings. For this, it has taken bipartisan hits on Capitol Hill, where its name is now whispered by war critics in the same breath as that perennial boogeyman, Halliburton." The Post adds, "Sick of taking blame, McNulty, 64, is speaking out about what went wrong with his firm's work and what he regards as the problems with how the United States uses private contractors in Iraq. In a recent interview at the firm's Washington offices, one of a series he has given, McNulty said the government handed Parsons an impossible task by setting unrealistically high expectations for how much could be built while under-funding its efforts." McNulty "said the company repeatedly pleaded with the government to either provide enough money to get the job done or scale back its goals, but said its entreaties were ignored." The comments "are unusual for the leader of a firm that makes much of its money doing work for the government. Then again, few have been battered as badly as Parsons."

Saddam's Commanders Deny Gassing Kurds. The AP (12/22, Al-Bashir, Halaby) reports, "Two former Iraqi commanders denied gassing Kurdish civilians in northern Iraq 20 years ago, telling Saddam Hussein's genocide trial Thursday that they used only conventional weapons against Kurdish rebels and Iranian troops." Sultan al-Tai, minister of defense under Saddam, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, a deputy director of army operations, "testified to rebut evidence presented by prosecutors in videos and documents this week."

Former NATO Chief Says Taliban Still Crossing Pakistani Border. AFP (12/22) reports, "Islamic fighters are still entering Afghanistan from Pakistan, despite a deal between Islamabad and tribal chiefs meant to cut down the incursions, NATO's former top General warned." Gen. James Jones, "who handed over to General John Craddock as Supreme Allied Commander Europe this month, said the Western alliance's political leadership would raise the issue with Pakistan unless things improved."

Nicholson Says "Society Would Benefit" From Draft. The AP (12/22, Hunt) reports the Selective Service System "is planning a comprehensive test of the military draft machinery, which hasn't been run since 1998." However, the agency "is not gearing up for a draft, an agency official said Thursday. The test itself would not likely occur until 2009." And after Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson said "that 'society would benefit' if the US were to bring back the draft and that it shouldn't have any loopholes for anyone who is called to serve," he "later issued a statement saying he does not support reinstituting a draft." The AP (12/22, Kugler) notes "the administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed." Nicholson, "who served in Vietnam, was in New York to announce a partnership with Mayor Michael Bloomberg to help homeless veterans find housing." A reporter "suggested that the all-volunteer armed forces attract a disproportionate number of minorities and people trying to lift themselves out of poverty, and asked Nicholson if the draft should be reinstated to make the military more equal." Nicholson said, "I think that our society would benefit from that, yes sir."

Ignatius Urges Americans To Read Soldiers' Blogs. In his Washington Post column (12/22, A33), David Ignatius writes, "This holiday season, America is struggling through a searing national debate about Iraq. The horror of the war feels immediate, even to people who've never been near Baghdad, but less so the humanity of the thousands of American soldiers who are serving there. That's part of the Iraq disconnect: The war dominates our political life, but the men and women in the midst of it often are nearly invisible. We see them in thumbnail photos in group obituaries but not as real, living people." Ignatius adds, "If you read soldiers' blogs, and I've looked at several dozen over the past few days, you see a recurring anger that the media aren't telling their story. … Needless to say, the first thing most American soldiers are thinking about is getting back home."

6:00 p.m.) reported in its broadcast that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales "appointed Drew Wrigley, North Dakota's US attorney, to chairman of the Violent and Organized Crime Subcomittee. The 14-member committee will meet every six weeks in Washington with Gonzales," playing "a role in advancing the Justice Department's efforts to battle terrorism, corporate fraud, and other types of crime."

DOJ Move Against Steroid Probe Reporters Expected To Fuel Shield Law Debate. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, B3, Bravin, Ellison, 2.04M) reports, "The Bush administration is increasingly at odds with some Republicans over its efforts to make journalists reveal confidential sources. The controversy is reaching a flashpoint in San Francisco, where the Justice Department is expected to file papers today urging that two San Francisco Chronicle reporters face jail if they refuse to reveal their source for confidential grand-jury proceedings concerning baseball slugger Barry Bonds's alleged use of steroids." The Journal adds, "Under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the Justice Department has pursued journalists' sources in cases ranging from a terrorism investigation of Islamic charities to the alleged vandalism of a police car. … Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the government continues to follow its guidelines and disputed claims that pursuit of reporters' sources and records has increased under Mr. Gonzales. 'Over the past 15 years there have been less than 20 source subpoenas issued,' she said, although no figures were available on subpoenas for unpublished notes or recordings. 'To say we've been incredibly cautious and restrained when using this lawful tool is an understatement.'" The Journal notes, "Mark Corallo, the Justice Department press secretary under former Attorney General John Ashcroft, filed an affidavit in the Chronicle case saying that he wouldn't have approved the reporter subpoenas. 'This case is so far below the acceptable standards the department has lived by for close to 40 years that it will embolden prosecutors to make this a first step, not a last step,' Mr. Corallo said in an interview."

Defense Lawyer Said To Be Source Of BALCO Leak. The AP (12/22) reports, "A private investigator who worked for defendants in the probe of a Bay Area sports steroid ring said a defense lawyer was the source of leaked federal grand jury testimony in the case, according to a report published Thursday. Larry McCormack, former executive director of the Pro Rodeo Hall of Fame, told the FBI that defense lawyer Troy Ellerman gave the confidential information to a San Francisco Chronicle reporter in 2004, Yahoo.com reported. 'We do have an investigation on those allegations that he (Ellerman) was responsible for the leak,' FBI spokesman Joe Schadler told The Associated Press. Ellerman, who serves as commissioner of the Professional Rodeo Cowboys Association, represented Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative. He later represented BALCO vice president James Valente. Both men pleaded guilty in 2005 to distributing steroids."

2006 Seen As "Busy Year" For DOJ. NBC News (12/22, Williams) reported on its Web site, "Between the Supreme Court's striking down of the Bush administration's plan to conduct military trials for war-on-terror detainees and the pursuit of allegedly corrupt government officials, it was a busy year for the Justice Department. With decisions expected on the National Security Agency's Terror Surveillance Program and the Lewis 'Scooter' Libby trial getting underway in January, 2007 is expected to be just as decisive." Reviewing major DOJ-related issues from this past year, NBC noted, "The Justice Department struggled to respond to a setback delivered in June by the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the administration's plan to conduct military trials for detainees picked up in the war on terror." Meanwhile, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pushed Congress to find a way to resolve legal doubts about the government's Terrorist Surveillance Program," but "when the Congress finished its work in early December, no agreement had been reached on clarifying the program's legality." NBC added, "New statistics showed the number of federal terrorism prosecutions dropping to its lowest point since 9/11," yet "the government defended its record. 'We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws,' said Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general." Additionally, "A growth area for federal prosecutors came in high profile cases involving government figures."

Retiring Metcalfe Seen As Balanced Advocate Of Open Government. Government Executive (12/22, Pulliam) reports, "After 25 years heading one of the federal government's key privacy and information offices, Daniel J. Metcalfe will retire Jan. 3. Observers say that while they have not always agreed with him, he will be remembered for his ability to administer the open government policies of both Republican and Democratic presidents. As a founding director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy since November 1981, Metcalfe has worked for seven attorneys general, pushed agencies to improve the management of requests for information and made a substantial impact on the law governing agencies' responsibilities to release information to the public. … In an interview with Government Executive, Metcalfe said he believes open government is critical. But at the same time, agencies must ensure that government information is disclosed responsibly." GE notes, "He denied rumors that he is retiring out of frustration with the Bush administration's overall policies on secrecy in government. He said he has averaged more than 75 hours on the job per week since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and his wife is thrilled that he can cut that back to about 40 in 'retirement.' … Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org…said that 'while it is not clear' whether Metcalfe has 'been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been,' he has 'been a good and faithful government official.'"

Former DOJ Civil Rights Prosecutor Rosenthal Joining Venable. The Washington Business Journal (12/22) reports, "Seth Rosenthal, a longtime prosecutor for the U.S. Department of Justice who has spent the past two years as legal director of the Alliance for Justice, has joined Venable as a litigation partner in the law firm's Washington office. Rosenthal, 40, spent 10 years in the DoJ's civil rights division handling a range of federal investigations and prosecutions, including cases involving human trafficking, hate crimes, police misconduct and housing and lending discrimination. … Last year, Rosenthal joined the nonprofit Alliance for Justice, an advocacy organization that monitors the selection of federal judges and tracks efforts to change the civil justice system." WBJ notes, "In making his first move to the private sector, Rosenthal says he sought out a law firm with a strong litigation practice and a commitment to public service."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bristol-Myers Offers To Pay $499 Million Price-Fixing Settlement. The AP (12/22, Witkowski) reports, "Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. offered to pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into whether the company played a role in a pricing scheme that led insurers and government agencies to overpay for drugs. The company reduced its profit forecast to reflect the charges." Bristol-Myers "entered an agreement in principle with the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts to pay the settlement and avoid civil and criminal charges. The company will also enter a corporate integrity agreement with the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. The agreement must still get final approval from the Justice Department." Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeff McDonald said that "the company expects the Justice Department review to take 'a couple of months' before a decision is made." The AP notes, "The agreement is the latest in a series of deals cut with the government. In June 2005, Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that cost the company $800 million, and was placed under the observation of a federal monitor until 2007."

USA Today (12/22, 2.27M) reports, "The tentative agreement is one of the biggest in recent years for drugmakers regarding drug marketing and pricing. It aims to settle investigations into Bristol's marketing of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder drug Abilify for conditions the drug was not approved to treat, says Bristol spokesman Jeff Macdonald. It also covers some cases in which Bristol allegedly inflated drug prices so government programs for the poor and elderly paid more. It would not negate other so-called average wholesale price cases launched against Bristol by several states and others, Bristol said." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Barris, Moore, 2.04M) notes, "In August, rival Schering-Plough Corp. agreed to pay $435 million and a unit pleaded guilty to criminal charges to settle federal allegations of fraudulent drug marketing and pricing, one of the largest settlements in a crackdown that has forced big drug makers to return billions of dollars the U.S. government says were illegally extracted from the Medicare and Medicaid programs. In its release, Bristol-Myers didn't elaborate on the investigations."

Bloomberg (12/22, Rapaport) reports, "The latest agreement 'removes an overhang, but the lack of information makes it difficult for Wall Street to react,' said Les Funtleyder, an analyst for Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in a telephone interview today. 'The laws around average wholesale pricing are convoluted. It's easy to run afoul of the rules. I don't think Wall Street takes this too seriously.' Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.05 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading." USA adds, "No criminal charges will be filed as a result of today's preliminary settlement, the company said. … Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment in a telephone interview." The Trenton Times (12/22, Jordan) notes, "Wall Street yawned. After dropping in morning trading, Bristol's shares rallied to close up 1 percent. 'This is nothing unexpected,' MacDonald said, adding the settlement was mentioned in Bristol's financial disclosures earlier this year.

Deutsche Bank Agrees To $208 Million Mutual Fund Timing Settlement. The AP (12/22) reports, "Deutsche Bank AG agreed to pay $208 million to end state and federal investigations into the timing of trading in mutual-fund accounts that could benefit insiders and hurt other investors. The settlement is the 21st by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in his mutual-funds investigation over the past three years. Mr. Spitzer had accused the German bank's asset-management division of allowing excessive market timing in its mutual funds. He also accused its broker-dealer division of assisting in what he called deceptive market timing and allowing a form of late trading by one client." The AP notes, "Deutsche Bank didn't admit or deny the allegations as part of the settlement. The company said all the alleged improper arrangements originated in subsidiaries before they became part of Deutsche Bank and that those were stopped before Mr. Spitzer and the Securities and Exchange Commission acted."

SEC Charges Three Former Tyco Executives With Securities Violations. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, C3, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports the SEC "charged three former Tyco International Ltd. financial executives with securities-law violations for 'structuring sham transactions' and 'manipulating reserves' to boost reported income and cash flow by well over $700 million from 1997 to 2002. … The SEC's civil charges name two lower-level officials who reported to" jailed former CEO Dennis Kozlowski former CFO Mark Swartz. "Richard D. Power, now 58, held a series of financial positions in a 20-year career at Tyco, including chief financial officer and vice president-special projects. Edward Federman, 53, was controller of Tyco and later chief financial officer of Tyco Electronics, a big division. The SEC is seeking disgorgement of unspecified gains and fines." The Journal adds, "A third former official, Richard "Skip" Heger, was accused of separate securities violations. He agreed to pay $450,000 to settle with the SEC, without admitting or denying wrongdoing."

Fidelity To Pay Funds $42 Million As Redress For Gifts To Traders. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Levitz, Bulkeley, 2.04M) reports, "Fidelity Investments said it will pay $42 million to some of its mutual funds as redress for lavish gifts and entertainment some of its equity traders accepted from brokers between 2002 and 2004. The payments were recommended by several of Fidelity's independent trustees who conducted an internal probe of the matter." The Journal notes, "The trustees concluded 'it was not possible to prove' statistically that shareholders were harmed, according to the report. But they recommended Fidelity pay the penalty, saying the company inadequately supervised the traders. In a rare public statement, Edward C. Johnson III, chairman of Fidelity, posted a letter on Fidelity's Web site, personally offering his apology for 'this improper behavior' and saying that 'there is no question that the Funds were put at potential risk.'"

Sony BMG To Pay $4.25 Million Settlement For Hidden CD Security Software. The AP (12/22, Veiga) reports, "Sony BMG Music Entertainment will pay $4.25 million as part of a settlement with 39 states to resolve investigations into problems caused by music CDs loaded with hidden anti-piracy software. Under terms of Thursday's agreement, which also applies to the District of Columbia, the record company will reimburse consumers whose computers were damaged while trying to uninstall the anti-piracy software. Sony BMG also said it will no longer distribute any compact discs loaded with copy-protection software that hinders computer users from easily locating it or removing it from their PCs." The AP notes, "Customers will be able to file a claim with Sony BMG to receive refunds of up to $175, but claims must include a description of how their computer was harmed and documentation of repair expenses. The refund policy will also apply to states that were not a party to the settlement."

Judge Urged To Unseal San Francisco Chronicle Antitrust Case Documents. The AP (12/22, Chea) reports, "A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle. The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher." Media Alliance and Bay Guardian "argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential." The AP notes, "San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market. The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet."

Business Group Argues PCAOB Lacks Proper Oversight. The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Day, 690K) reports, "A business group argued in U.S. District Court yesterday that a panel created by Congress to police the accounting industry lacks sufficient oversight by the White House. The five-member Public Company Accounting Oversight Board acts as a federal regulator, deciding whether accounting firms are fit to audit the books of publicly traded companies, without having been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate as the Constitution requires, the plaintiffs argued. Lawyers for the accounting board, created in 2002 under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, and the Justice Department argued that the board is legal because it is supervised by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a federal agency whose members are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the agency supports the Justice Department's position." The Post notes, "Lawyers attacking the legality of the accounting oversight board represent Beckstead & Watts, an accounting firm under investigation by the board, and the Free Enterprise Fund, a nonprofit group that advocates 'limited government' and whose chairman, Mallory Factor, is a major Republican fundraiser."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Walters, Gonzales Announce Overall Decline In Youth Drug Use. The Detroit News (12/22, Trowbridge) reports, "Drug use among American youths continued to decline in the past year, according to a federally funded study by the University of Michigan, a trend Bush administration officials said ratified their anti-drug efforts. 'This is not a natural waxing and waning of social forces,' said John Walters, the Bush administration drug czar. He attributed sharp declines since the start of the decade to anti-drug advertising campaigns and other government programs." The News adds, "Walters and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed to figures showing that overall drug use had declined about 23 percent since 2001 as an endorsement of the administration's policies. Walters said anti-drug programs and advertising campaigns designed to make drug use less socially acceptable among young people can have a powerful effect."

The New York Times (12/22, Cohen, 1.16M) reports, "A question was added to the survey in 2002, asking students specifically about the recreational use of Vicodin and OxyContin, both narcotic drugs prescribed to treat pain. Since then, nonmedical use of those drugs has increased slightly, although abuse of OxyContin by eighth graders doubled to 2.6 percent in 2006, from 1.3 percent in 2002. 'We're not changing the rate that prescription medications are being taken by young people,' Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said." Bloomberg (12/22, Schmidt) adds, "Walters and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the results of the study…were mainly positive and continued to show a drop in drug abuse. … The results 'are very, very encouraging to all of us in government,' said Gonzales." The Washington Post (12/22, A3, Lee, 690K) notes that "the survey shows a continued long-term decline in teenagers' use of alcohol and illicit drugs such as marijuana, the most widely used illicit substance. The reduction occurred while federal funding for anti-drug advertising fell annually, from $185 million when President Bush took office in 2001 to $100 million in 2006. However, the past year's declines in drug and alcohol use were 'relatively small,' the report said.

ABC World News (12/21, story 7, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "According to the newly-released survey, one out of every ten high school seniors reported using the painkiller Vicodin in the last year, and disturbing numbers are also using cough and cold medicine. Most have no idea how dangerous an overdose of cough syrup can be. … You can turn to our Web site, where our medical unit is on-hand to answer your questions about teenage drug abuse." The CBS Evening News (12/21, story 5, 0:22, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "We've got some good and bad news tonight about American teenagers. A new government survey shows fewer are drinking or using illegal drugs, but more teens are getting high on drugs they find in their parents' medicine chest. One out of ten high school seniors has used Vicodin, and one out of 14 has used cough syrup to get high."

USA Today (12/22, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Abuse of the painkiller OxyContin by younger teens hit record levels in 2006, a national survey says. While most other teen drug and alcohol use continued a decade-long decline, teen abuse of pharmaceuticals, including prescription narcotics, barely budged, the survey says. … For the first time, the survey asked teenagers whether they used over-the-counter cough or cold medicine to get high. One in 25 eighth-graders and one in 14 seniors said they had abused the medicines in the past year. 'Clearly, prescription drugs have become more a part of the problem,' says the study's principal investigator, Lloyd Johnson." USA notes that Walters said "his office will design an ad campaign targeting abuse of prescription drugs." The Washington Times (12/22, Price, Pescatore, 88K), Christian Science Monitor (12/22, Marks, 59K), AP (12/21), UPI (12/21, Dell'amore) and CNN.com (12/22, Frieden) also report on the study, noting the rise in pharmaceutical drug abuse.

Accuracy Of Survey Questioned. The Arizona Daily Star (12/22, 128K) reports the 2006 survey "indicates reductions in the use of nearly every drug, with about 840,000 fewer youths using illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001, according to a news release from the Office of National Drug Control Policy. It notes a 25 percent decrease in marijuana use during the five-year period, and a significant decrease in teens' use of methamphetamine. However, officials at two Tucson programs that work to treat teen addiction say the exact opposite is happening here. 'I'm not sure that the study is an accurate depiction of what is happening and it is certainly not what I am seeing in working with adolescents with drug and alcohol addictions,' said Tori Ferrari, director of the Springboard Home for Youth in Crisis, which houses girls but also provides counseling for families and boys. 'We are actually seeing more and more kids getting involved at younger ages with harder drugs than marijuana.'"

Local TV Coverage. NC8-TV, Washington DC (12/21, 5:00 p.m.) showed Gonzales saying, "Let's start with the good news. The latest study on adolescent drug use shows a slight decline in the number of teens using most illegal drugs and alcohol. That's a drop of more than slight decline in the number of teens using most illegal drugs and alcohol. These survey results of course are very, very encouraging track. But high numbers of teens continue to abuse prescription narcotics with more trying oxycontin, a narcotic pain reliever, than ever before."

KOAT-TV, Albuquerque, Santa Fe, NM (12/21, 12:00 p.m.) reported on its broadcast, "Prescription drug abuse continues to remain high, according to an annual study Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced this morning. The study finds that the use of most illegal drugs and alcohol went down slightly last year among 8th, 10th, and 12th graders." WDKY-TV Lexington, KY (12/21, 10:00 p.m.), WJHL-TV Bristol, TN (12/21, 5:00 p.m.) and KVAL-TV Eugene, OR (12/21, 6:00 p.m.) were among the other local TV stations reporting on the study.

Virginia Task Force Calls For ISPs To Retain Subscriber Data. CNETNews.com (12/21, Broache) reported, "All Internet service providers should keep their subscribers' data for lengthier time periods in order to aid police prowling for criminals online, a task force organized by the Virginia state attorney general recommended this week. Echoing similar calls from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller earlier this year, the latest suggestions arrived in a 103-page report drawn up by Virginia Attorney General Bob McDonnell and his 6-month-old Youth Internet Safety Task Force." CNET added, "Still, rather than prescribing data retention laws, as some members of Congress have supported, the task force makes a vague instruction to Internet service providers: they should commit to 'keeping data relevant to such investigations and engaging at the national level to help define appropriate policies.' That seemingly softer recommendation is likely a reflection of the broader divide over the issue that is mirrored in the task force's makeup. Its members include representatives from various state and local law enforcement bodies, schools, educational agencies, parenting organizations, and corporate entities such as Yahoo, News Corp.'s MySpace.com, Microsoft, Time Warner's AOL and Sony."

Police Chiefs Call For US To Create National Law Enforcement Commission. USA Today (12/22, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports, "The nation's largest police chiefs' organization is calling on the federal government to re-establish a national law enforcement commission to help restore confidence in local public safety operations. The International Association of Chiefs of Police said Thursday that recent incidents involving officers' questionable use of force and abrupt increases in murder and robbery represent strong evidence for a panel, similar to President Lyndon Johnson's Crime Commission, which would develop a national anti-criminal justice strategy. The panel would address a wide range of topics from police deployment to prison administration." IACP President Joseph Carter said Thursday that "the need for a crime commission was 'validated' earlier this week by an FBI report showing that violent crime remained on the rise during the first six months of 2006." However, Sen. Joe Biden, "instrumental in passing the Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 additional police officers, says more money for additional officers and resources — not a commission — is needed to drive down rising crime." USA notes, "Recent jumps in violence prompted the Justice Department in October to launch its own review of possible causes."

DOJ Investigating Russian Mobster's Connection To Natural Gas Industry. In a front-page story, the Wall Street Journal (12/22, A1, Simpson, 2.04M) reports, "Amid growing concern about Europe's energy dependence on Russia, U.S. authorities are investigating possible links between one of that country's top organized crime figures and multibillion-dollar natural-gas deals between Russia and Ukraine. The wide-ranging inquiry focuses on 60-year-old Semion Mogilevich, one of the FBI's most-wanted men, who is viewed by law-enforcement agencies as one of the world's most-sophisticated international criminals. U.S. officials have long expressed concern that his operations foster high-level official corruption throughout the former Soviet Union, underwriting criminal activities ranging from prostitution and drug dealing to stock fraud." The Journal notes, "In their natural-gas investigation, senior U.S. prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are focusing on connections between Mr. Mogilevich and a Cyprus-registered company called Highrock Holding Ltd. that has played a role in several multibillion-dollar gas deals, according to current and former law-enforcement officials. … The U.S. investigation, which is being led by the Justice Department's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, began early this year, shortly after Moscow's brief cutoff of natural-gas shipments to Ukraine in a price dispute sparked an international crisis."

NYTimes Calls Prison Collect-Call System "Morally Indefensible." The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "Studies of prison inmates clearly show that keeping them in contact with friends and family is vital to giving them a chance to create an honest life after jail instead of committing new crimes that land them right back behind bars. Yet the simple act of picking up the phone to call home can be bankrupting for inmates and their families. The cruel and counterproductive system now in place around the country charges them as much as six times the going rate for collect calls placed from inside state prisons." The Times concludes, "State prison officials say the money is used to pay for programs that benefit inmates. But it also gouges the poorest citizens…to pay for prison services that the state is obligated to provide. It might be legal, but it is also counterproductive and morally indefensible."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Clarifies It Has Not Opened Formal Probe Of Georgia Police Shootings. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/22, Gentry, 379K) reports, "U. S. Justice Department officials said that the department was not conducting an 'independent federal investigation' into a string of fatal police shootings in DeKalb County, but would review investigations by local authorities when they are completed. A spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division issued a statement Thursday in which she sought to clarify a Dec. 12 letter from Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim to a local activist who had called for a federal investigation." DOJ spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson "said the letter from Kim does not imply that the Justice Department had opened a formal investigation into the shootings. 'While the Department of Justice is gathering information and monitoring that investigation, we have not at this point opened an independent federal investigation into the shootings,' the statement said. 'Federal authorities will review the results of the local investigation and then make an assessment about what additional investigation, if any, is warranted.'" The AJC notes, "Magnuson's statement did not mention the FBI, which was included in Kim's earlier letter. An FBI spokesman declined to comment on Kim's letter on Tuesday."

Judge Overturns Law Giving Villaraigosa Authority Over Los Angeles School District. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Blume, 850K) reports Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Dzintra Janavs "nullified legislation giving" Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa "substantial authority over the Los Angeles Unified School District, a stunning setback to Villaraigosa's plans -- already in progress -- to assume direct control of dozens of Los Angeles schools." Villaraigosa said that he will appeal and "would also ask that the California Supreme Court hear the appeal directly." The ruling is called "a sweeping victory for the school district" and "puts in question the mayor's education agenda." Judge Janavs "found the entire law defective and ordered public officials 'to refrain from enforcing or implementing' any part of it." The judge "cited a 1946 constitutional amendment that 'specifically removed municipal authority over school districts and appears to reflect the people's determination to separate municipal functions from school functions due to the variety of conflicts that arise between their respective interests.'"

The Los Angeles Daily News (12/22, Boghossian) reports the ruling is "In a major political blow to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa." Villaraigosa "remained defiant, calling it a 'bump in the road' and vowing to immediately appeal." He also said that "his staff would continue to plan for a mayoral takeover of the 708,000-student district and vowed to get involved in the March school board election, when four of the seven seats are up for grabs." Judge Janavs ruled that the law "violates the state constitution, the City Charter and voter rights." Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "said he still backs the mayor's plan and supports an appeal of the court's decision." The AP (12/22) also reported this story.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Antitrust Division Announces Effort To Streamline Merger Investigations. The Deal (12/22, Lindell) reports, "The Department of Justice's antitrust division on Dec. 15 officially announced further efforts to streamline the time and cost of merger investigations. The changes are part of a 2001 merger process reform effort and closely mirror changes the Federal Trade Commission announced in February. But there's a big catch for merging parties that participate, and if the FTC's track record is an indication, antitrust lawyers won't be pushing clients to sign up. To be eligible for DOJ's latest streamlining efforts, the Justice Department requires merging parties to agree to set a period of pretrial discovery, perhaps as much as six months, should regulators seek a court order to block a merger. That could leave merging parties open to significantly more discovery time than the government usually is granted." The Deal notes, "'Efficient merger enforcement reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary is one of our top priorities,' said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division. 'The amendments to the division's already successful merger review process initiative are part of our ongoing efforts to reduce enforcement burdens, while at the same time preserve our ability to conduct thorough investigations and protect consumers from anticompetitive transactions.'"

Fifth Samsung Executive Pleads Guilty In DRAM Price-Fixing Probe. The AP (12/22, Robertson) reports, "A Samsung Electronics Co. executive agreed to plead guilty and serve 10 months in prison for his role in a global price-fixing scheme involving a common form of computer memory, federal prosecutors said Thursday. Young Hwan Park, president of Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the company's San Jose-based U.S. subsidiary, is the fifth Samsung executive this year to agree to a prison sentence over price manipulation of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type of memory chip used in personal computers." The AP notes, "In total, four memory chip companies and 18 people have been charged in the Justice Department's investigation of DRAM makers. …

'This latest plea underscores our resolve to hold responsible those who target U.S. businesses and consumers with price-fixing schemes,' Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice Department's antitrust division, said in a statement. 'Individuals who choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions: criminal fines and prison time.'"

IDG News Service (12/21, Gross) also notes Barnett said in his statement that those who "choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions – criminal fines and prison time," and the Financial Times (12/22, Kirchgaessner) reports, "The probe has generated $730m in criminal penalties from the parties involved, the second-highest number of fines to emerge from any single price-fixing conspiracy. … The Justice Department said Mr Park carried out the price-fixing conspiracy from April, 2001 to June, 2002 by participating in meetings and conversations with rivals in the D-Ram market and agreeing to charge certain customers a fixed price. The talks ultimately affected sales to US computer makers such as Dell, HP and Compaq."

US Airways CEO Disputes Delta Claims About Merger Valuation, Approval Hurdles. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (12/22, Grantham, 379K) reports, "Delta Air Lines' self-valuation that it will be worth as much as $12 billion after bankruptcy 'lacks credibility,' US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said Thursday as he urged creditors to push the Atlanta airline's executives to explore its merger proposal. 'This is where I'd like to see the [Delta] management team come along,' Parker said in a conference call with industry analysts and reporters." The AJC adds, "While Parker said US Airways is in 'continuing dialog' with Delta's creditors and advisers, he said he felt an 'obligation to correct' Delta's claims that its proposal is more valuable and that the merger would fail to win regulatory approval or produce the savings US Airways expects." The AJC notes, "Clark Orsky, an analyst with KDP Investment Advisors, said US Airways made a good case that Delta's value for its plan is 'aggressive' and that concerns the Department of Justice would shoot down the merger are overblown." The Birmingham Business Journal (12/22) notes Parker said, "The anti-trust issues are fully manageable. We've done much more work on this, more than anyone else." Parker "also emphasized that the proposed merger is labor friendly and that employees would possibly come out better than they are now, because the merged airline would go to the 'highest common denominator' contracts."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (12/22, Olson) reports, "Parker said Delta used 'flawed' criteria in analyzing antitrust issues a merger would raise with the Department of Justice. For instance, Delta's criticism does not allow for the probable entry of discount airlines into markets served by Delta and US Airways. 'We are not going to let this transaction fail on antitrust issues,' Parker said. But the only way to know what antitrust objections might surface is for both US Airways and Delta to file merger plans with the Justice Department, US Airways antitrust attorney Rick Rule told analysts." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A10, Dade, McWilliams, 2.04M) notes, "The denunciation of the plan in a conference call with investors and analysts…comes as creditors are burrowing deeper into the financial projections underlying Delta's valuation of the Atlanta carrier at $9.4 billion to $12 billion once it emerges from bankruptcy proceedings in the spring. Both airlines are expected to aggressively press their case during the next several weeks, and Mr. Parker's remarks showed that US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., remains determined to acquire Delta despite fierce and increasingly vocal opposition by Delta."

The Arizona Republic (12/22, Gilbertson), Washington Times (12/22, Lengell, 88K) and TheStreet.com (12/22, Reed) also report on Parker's comments.

Caremark Shareholders Seek Injunction In CVS Buyout. The AP (12/22, Giuffrida) reports, "A group of shareholders in pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. has filed for an injunction to force company officials to consider a proposed buyout by rival Express Scripts Inc. that could pay more than an offer from CVS Corp. … On Thursday, CVS and Caremark announced that the proposed merger passed antitrust scrutiny of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and could be completed by the first quarter of 2007. The approval comes days after rival pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. proposed to pay about $26 billion in a hostile bid for Caremark that would offer a cash option and premium for shareholders." The AP notes that the shareholder motion "claims that Caremark board members will personally benefit from the CVS deal and have entered into a strict merger agreement that keeps them from seeking out the best deal for shareholders.

Meanwhile, the St. Louis Business Journal (12/21) reported, "Express Scripts Inc. issued a statement late Wednesday calling its $26 billion bid for pharmaceutical services company Caremark Rx Inc. 'superior.' … Express Scripts rival bid, made Monday, represented at the time a 15 percent premium over the all-stock purchase price to be paid to Caremark's stockholders under Caremark's" deal with CVS.

Delta Pine Shareholders Approve Monsanto Merger. Forbes (12/21, Lipton) reported on its Web site, "Two of the largest seed companies in the world just came one step closer to their long-awaited merger. On Thursday, Delta and Pine Land Company announced that at a special meeting held in Memphis, Tenn., the company's shareholders formally approved its merger with Monsanto." Forbes noted, "Mark Gulley, an analyst at Soleil-Gulley & Associates, said the companies still face the challenge of regulatory approval. 'This decision isn't key,' Gulley said in an interview. 'The antitrust review is what we're all waiting for.' Regulators still have to weigh in on the proposed merger and decide whether it's anticompetitive. To close the transaction and satisfy Uncle Sam, Monsanto has already said it's willing to divest the U.S. assets of its Stoneville cottonseed business."

Lockheed Agrees To Buy Management Systems Designers. The AP (12/22) reports, "Military contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. said Thursday it agreed to acquire Fairfax, Va.-based Management Systems Designers Inc. for undisclosed terms. MDS, which has more than 600 employees, is a provider of information technology, primarily for government agencies including the Internal Revenue Service, Department of Homeland Security and Department of Defense." The AP notes, "The transaction is set to close during the first quarter of 2007, subject to regulatory approval."

EU Approves German Movie Industry Subsidies. The AP (12/22) reports, "The European Union on Thursday approved German subsidies totaling $240 million for its movie industry, officials said. The subsidies will back feature length movies, documentaries and cartoons. he aid is approved until 2010."

Finland Says Stora Enso Engaged In Anticompetitive Behavior. The AP (12/22) reports, "Finnish antitrust officials said Thursday that paper maker Stora Enso Oyj should be fined $40 million for anticompetitive behavior. The Finnish Competition Authority proposed the fine to the country's Market Court, saying the Finnish-Swedish company had violated competition laws in buying timber in Finland from 1997 to 2004." The AP adds, "Stora Enso denied the charges, saying the proposal is 'groundless.' Earlier this month, Stora Enso denied any involvement in a price-fixing conspiracy in the United States after a federal grand jury in Hartford, Conn., indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. for being part of a plan to drive up prices of paper used to print magazines and catalogues."

DaimlerChrysler To Pay $1.2 Billion Air Pollution Reporting Settlement. The AP (12/22) reports, "The Department of Justice said Thursday that Mercedes-Benz USA and parent DaimlerChrysler AG will pay $1.2 million to settle allegations that they failed to report air pollution problems with Mercedes-Benz vehicles to federal regulators. As a result of the complaint brought by the government, Mercedes-Benz USA has issued voluntary recalls and extended warranties to address the defects, at an estimated cost of $59 million. Under the settlement, the company is also required to overhaul its emissions reporting system." The AP notes, "The affected 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. According to the government, the recalls and warranty extensions will reduce the harmful emissions caused by the defects by over 500 tons cumulatively."

The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports, "The settlement, announced by the Justice Department and the EPA, resolves a suspected Clean Air Act violation: The auto manufacturer did not promptly inform the EPA of defects in emission-related parts so the agency could determine whether the emission standards were exceeded and whether a recall was necessary. … 'Reliable and effective automobile pollution control systems are essential to protect human health and the environment from harmful automobile emissions,' said Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge, who heads the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division. 'Mercedes' failure to alert EPA to a number of defects in emission-related components over a multiyear period is a serious violation,' she said."

California High Court Rules Tribes Can Be Sued For Campaign Finance Violations. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Dolan, 850K) reports, "A divided California Supreme Court ruled Thursday that Indian tribes can be sued for violating the state's campaign disclosure law even though tribes enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law. The 4-3 ruling is unprecedented and may be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has consistently protected Indian immunity from lawsuits. The state court justified its ruling in Agua Caliente v. Superior Court by citing the growing role of Indian casino money in state elections and the state's need to protect against political corruption." The Times notes, "Thursday's ruling permits the state's Fair Political Practices Commission to sue the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians, a federally recognized tribe in Palm Springs, for failing to properly report millions of dollars in campaign contributions. The watchdog panel said the tribe did not follow the law when it contributed more than $7.5 million to campaigns in 1998, $175,200 in the first half of 2001, and $426,000 in the first half of 2002."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

New Head Of Baltimore FBI Office Wants To Boost Criminal Program. The Washington Post (12/21, T3, Rich, 690K) reported, "After running down fugitives in the District and pursuing one of the nation's most storied fugitives, William D. Chase is settling in as the head of the FBI's Baltimore office. Chase, 50, who assumed the job in June, says that while counterterrorism remains the bureau's top priority, he also wants to dedicate more resources to fighting crime, the bureau's traditional role. 'I'm hoping to make some changes to firm up resources to better address the criminal program,' Chase said." The Post noted that since 9/11 "the bureau's top priority has been fighting terrorism," and the "majority of Chase's agents necessarily are assigned to that central responsibility. … Still, he said, he hopes to work more closely with state and local authorities, particularly to address the gang activity that has increasingly taken root in Maryland's Washington suburbs. The Baltimore FBI office covers Maryland and Delaware. The FBI announced in February that Kevin L. Perkins, then the special agent in charge of the bureau's Baltimore office, was being appointed assistant director in charge of the FBI's finance division. Chase replaced him during the summer. Federal law enforcement officials, including U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, spoke highly of Chase in recent interviews." The Post went on to report, "In the late 1990s, Chase was named assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office, a period that he recalls as frustrating and in some ways disappointing."

Tennessee Lawmaker Seeks Return Of $40,000 Watch Said To Have Been A Bribe. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (12/22, Perrusquia, 163K) reports, "John Ford had one thing to say Thursday about prosecutors' suggestions he took a $40,000 wristwatch as a payoff: He wants the Rolex -- confiscated as evidence -- returned to him. 'I want to get it back,' the former state senator said as his lawyer told reporters that Ford had obtained the watch legally. Ford's comments came a day after the U.S. Attorney's Office alleged Ford accepted the watch from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman after intervening in a 2004 state pollution-control case against the real estate millionaire. 'The watch was completely a legal transaction,' said Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, who said he will spell out details soon in a court filing. Prosecutors hope to use the watch as evidence in Ford's upcoming bribery trial." Ford "is set to stand trial in Memphis for allegedly taking $55,000 in bribes in the FBI's undercover Tennessee Waltz sting. He learned Monday about the new indictment in Nashville alleging he took $800,000 in kickbacks from contractors while in the General Assembly. Ford denies charges in both cases."

The AP (12/22, Baird) reports Scholl "asked Thursday for a delay in the trial, arguing that news reports surrounding Ford's indictment Monday in Nashville on federal charges unrelated to Tennessee Waltz will make picking an impartial jury difficult. Ford is accused in Nashville of taking more than $800,000 from TennCare contractors while he was on several Senate committees overseeing the state's expanded Medicaid program. No trial date has been set on those charges. … Judge J. Daniel Breen told Scholl to put his arguments in writing. 'But at this point, we are set,' the judge said. Prosecutor Tim DiScenza objected to a delay."

New Jersey Developer Admits Bribing Maryland Mayor. The Newark Star-Ledger (12/22, Whelan) reports Moshe 'Michael' Gohar, a Monmouth County developer , "admitted paying off former Ocean Township Mayor Terrance Weldon to increase the zoning density for his housing project." Gohar "acknowledged in federal district court in Trenton that he gave Weldon $50,000 in cash after Weldon helped influence the 2001 vote on the zoning change. … Gohar pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to give and offer corrupt payments. He initially had been indicted in February and also charged with mail fraud and bribery. The latter charge alone could have put him behind bars for up to 10 years. Under the plea agreement between Gohar's attorneys and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Brian Howe and Charles McKenna, Gohar could face between 18 and 27 months in prison. One factor in sentencing could be a previous state tax conviction against Gohar." FBI agents "raided Weldon's house in January 2002 as part of a long-running corruption probe in Monmouth County, and found the cash in the pocket of a suit jacket in the mayor's attic. Weldon later pleaded guilty on corruption charges."

FBI Announces Reward For Information About Pittsburgh Trestle Fire. WTAE Pittsburgh (12/22) reports the FBI "doesn't know if it was one person or a team effort that started a massive fire on a train trestle in Donegal Township, Butler County -- so they hope a big reward will trigger some leads. 'This was an intentional criminal act of violence that directly attacked the industrial and economic infastructure of our community,' FBI Special Agent Ray Morrow said of the May fire. Business owners who heavily rely on those tracks are offering a $40,000 reward to anyone who helps investigators crack the case.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/22, Ove, 230K) reports, "The bridge, a wooden structure owned by the Buffalo & Pittsburgh Railroad that predated the Civil War, went up in flames just 15 minutes after a train carrying sulphuric acid crossed it. 'That would have been a disaster.

That could have wiped out that town,' said Ray Morrow, head of the Pittsburgh FBI office. Another train was some 30 minutes away from crossing the span. The railroad and three companies directly impacted by the loss of the trestle put up the reward money. T he FBI got involved because it has jurisdiction over crimes involving railroad lines; the agency and state police are conducting the investigation."

Four Charged In Georgia Meth, Cocaine-Trafficking Conspiracy. AccessNorthGeorgia.com (12/21) reported four illegal aliens "have been indicted on charges relating to a large scale methamphetamine and cocaine-trafficking conspiracy in Barrow and Gwinnett counties. Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26; Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20; Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33; and Mauricio Medina-Mojica, 26, all believed to be from Mexico, were indicted by a federal grand jury late Wednesday." The indictment "charges all four defendants with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. … DEA Atlanta Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange noted the quantity of methamphetamine seized in this case constitutes the nation's fifth largest methamphetamine seizure in 2006."

The Gwinnett Daily Post (12/22) reports the charges "stem from five separate search warrants executed in November in Gwinnett and Barrow Counties, where law enforcement seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine or ice, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223 caliber AR-15-style rifle, [a] release said." The Athens Banner-Herald (12/22) reports "On Nov. 6, Barrow County Superior Court Judge Joe Booth authorized federal investigators to tap a telephone belonging to Nunez-Villanueva, according to an affidavit that a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent filed in federal court. Through the wiretap, investigators learned that Nunez-Villanueva "appeared to be a broker for numerous illegal drug transactions," the agent said in the affidavit."

Detective In Tennessee Accused Of Helping Family Cocaine Ring. The Nashville City Paper (12/21) reported federal prosecutors on Thursday "unsealed an indictment on a Metro Police narcotics detective, Officer Ernest B. Cecil, charging him with conspiracy for using his police powers to help his nephew run a Nashville cocaine ring. Cecil, a 15-year veteran of the department, was arrested by federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) agents and immediately taken into custody Thursday morning. … Federal officials said they believe Cecil's alleged crimes were all committed to help his nephew, Corey Cecil, hide his drug operation from the rest of the Metro Police Department."

Investor's Business Daily Urges DOJ To Seek Maximum Penalty For Arellano-Felix. In an editorial, Investor's Business Daily (12/21) wrote, "We doubt anyone's facing worse charges in U.S. courts than drug lord Francisco Javier Arellano Felix. So why is the Justice Department hesitating to suggest the death penalty? To put it delicately, this guy's a monster. Apprehended in August by the Drug Enforcement Administration in international waters off Baja California, Arellano was charged in U.S. federal court in San Diego on Wednesday in a string of grotesque crimes on both sides of the U.S.-Mexican border. … There are good reasons for prosecutors to seek the maximum in this case and not worry about public opinion or potential noncooperation on future extraditions from Mexican authorities."

Immigration Board Rejects Demjanjuk Appeal. The AP (12/22, Kropko) reports, "A man accused of being a Nazi death camp guard lost an appeal today fighting his deportation." John Demjanjuk "was ordered deported in 2005 after the chief federal immigration judge determined he had served at several Nazi death camps during World War II. Demjanjuk has denied the allegation and still has the right to appeal in federal courts." The Board of Immigration Appeals ruling "said facts established previously in courts identifying him as a Nazi guard 'are conclusively established' and that there is no reason to believe there may be new information about his past in a Soviet KGB file, as his lawyer alleged. The board reviewed legal briefs in the case before dismissing Demjanjuk's appeal, said Elaine Komis, spokeswoman for the Executive Office for Immigration Review." The BBC News (12/21) noted, "The US Justice Department said efforts were continuing to remove him from the country as soon as possible."

Saudi Princess Ordered Deported In Forced Servitude Case. The AP (12/22) reports, "A Saudi Arabian princess who broke U.S. immigration laws to keep her domestic servants was ordered to be deported, prosecutors said Thursday. Hana F. Al Jader of Winchester was sentenced to two years of probation, the first six months of which must be served in home confinement, after which she'll be deported to Saudi Arabia, prosecutors said. U.S. District Judge Reginald J. Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader, 40, to pay $206,000 in restitution to three of her former domestic servants, pay a $40,000 fine, and perform 100 hours of community service." The AP notes, "Al Jader and her husband, Prince Mohamed Bin Turki Al Saud, and have lived in Winchester and Arlington since the mid-1990s, when the couple came to the United States to obtain medical and rehabilitation treatment for injuries the prince suffered in an auto accident."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Grand Jury Subpoenaed Weldon Records In November. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "A federal grand jury has subpoenaed congressional records from Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., as part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe aimed at determining whether Weldon used his influence to win favors for family members, people familiar with the investigation said. The previously unreported subpoena was issued by a grand jury in Washington before the November election, although it is unclear when Weldon received it." The Times notes, "Weldon said public disclosure of the Justice Department investigation, which came three weeks before election day, was politically motivated. He said at the time that he was not aware of any investigation and that he had done nothing wrong."

Bush Issues 16 Pardons. The AP (12/22, Loven) reports, "President Bush issued 16 pardons on Thursday and commuted the sentence of an Iowa man who was convicted on drug charges. Six of the federal offenses were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes. Seven of the 16 received no prison or jail time, instead getting probation or a reduction in their military pension." The AP notes that a White House spokesman, Tony Fratto, "said that after investigation by the Office of the Pardon Attorney at the Justice Department, most weight is given to these factors: the seriousness of the crime; how long ago it was committed; the acceptance of responsibility and showing remorse; post-conviction conduct and contributions to society; any specific compelling need for relief; official recommendations, including from the sentencing judge, the probation officer and the federal prosecutor."

Bush Makes Two Recess Appointments. The AP (12/22) reports, "President Bush has appointed an outspoken conservative television producer to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting. Warren Bell, executive producer of ABC's 'According to Jim' was first nominated by Bush in June. In September, his nomination was abruptly pulled from the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee's agenda because of some senators' concerns." Bell "has been an online contributor to the conservative National Review magazine. In May 2005 he described himself as 'thoroughly conservative in ways that strike horror into the hearts of my Hollywood colleagues.'" Bell's recess appointment "means he will stay on the board through the congressional session that ends in 2007." The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) runs a truncated version of the AP story.

Meanwhile, the Washington Times (12/22, Herman, 88K) reports Bush also gave a recess appointment to Mark McKinnon, who "will join the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG) in time for its Jan. 10 meeting. The recess appointment is good for a year, but Mr. McKinnon said yesterday that he is confident the Senate would confirm him for a full term that would end in 2009. Senators, however, often don't look favorably on recess appointees." The BBG "oversees a global operation that draws more than 100 million listeners and viewers a week. The operations include the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and broadcast systems that cover Asia, Cuba and the Middle East." Bush's "first attempt to get Mr. McKinnon on the board was in September 2005 in a nomination for a seat formerly held by a member whose term expired. The appointment ran into opposition from Democrats because it was a seat reserved for Democrats."

McClatchy (12/22) calls McKinnon "Bush's media adviser," and says "Senate Democrats were livid when the Texan was first nominated for a Democratic slot on the board. His quick re-nomination as a Republican -- the longtime Texas Democrat now calls himself a 'Bush Republican' -- did not appease them, either." Sen. Joe Biden, "the incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee who takes over in January, was not likely to move McKinnon's nomination, said insiders, prompting the White House action. 'The nomination had been out there a very long time and we needed to fill the position,' said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. 'This was the most expedient way to get that slot filled.'"

Bush Gives Pay Raise To Federal Workers, Lawmakers, Cheney. The AP (12/22) reports, "President Bush signed an executive order Thursday to raise the pay of federal workers, members of Congress and Vice President Dick Cheney in the new year." Congress "passed the pay raises earlier this year, but Bush was required to sign an executive order to enforce them." The President's "annual salary of $400,000 is not affected by the legislation." The Washington Post (12/22, D1, Barr, 690K) notes "members of the armed forces will also see their base pay rise next year by an average 2.2 percent, though some military personnel will receive higher increases because they are in hard-to-fill positions or have special skills." Salaries for House members and senators "will climb to $168,000, up from $165,200. Congress has put the raise on hold, however, because Democrats first want to approve an increase in the minimum wage, which they believe will prove popular with voters." Cabinet secretaries "will make $186,600 in 2007, up from $183,500 this year. The vice president's salary will be $215,700, rising from $212,100."

Bush Signs Bill To Preserve Japanese Internment Camps. The AP (12/22) reports President Bush "signed into law a $38 million grant program to preserve notorious internment camps where Japanese-Americans were kept behind barbed wire during World War II." The money "will be administered by the National Park Service to restore and pay for research at 10 camps. The law is intended to help preserve the camps as reminders of how the United States turned on some of its citizens in a time of fear." The camps "housed more than 120,000 Japanese-Americans — U.S. citizens and residents — under an executive order signed by President Roosevelt in 1942, when America was reeling from the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on Dec. 7, 1941."

Rohrabacher Says Petition For Convicted Border Agents Ready For Bush. The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Dana Rohrabacher said in a press conference yesterday that he will soon present President Bush with "a petition signed by 160,000 Americans calling for the commutation of prison sentences for two US Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect in the buttocks." He asked the president to "'have some Christian charity and pardon' Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are scheduled to begin serving 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, next month." Rohrabacher said the petition was "part of a continuing effort to 'turn up the pressure on President Bush to pardon' the agents."

Flawed US Immigration System Said To Invite Illegals. Marcela Sanchez, in her column for the Washington Post (12/22, 690K) writes that last week's immigration raids at Swift & Co. were a "big disappointment all around. People whose intention was to get work used stolen information, such as Social Security numbers. US officials intending to do their jobs used a law meant for a far more serious crime as justification for the crackdown. Both sides are guilty of weakening the rule of law -- a taste of home we Latino immigrants could really do without." Sanchez continues, "Without excusing those who committed fraud to get jobs, it is important to make clear that the United States -- its government, its businesses and even its laws -- invites this type of behavior."

Zeleny Removed From Post Amid Complaints. The Washington Post's (12/22, A31) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that the "career diplomats at the State Department are celebrating a decision this week by the department's director general to overturn the assignment of an aide to Undersecretary Karen Hughes to a top job running the new Public Diplomacy Rapid Response office in Brussels." The American Foreign Service Association two months ago "protested the selection of mid-level civil servant Diane Zeleny for the job, calling it a 'pre-cooked deal' done by manipulating the process and violating personnel rules," Kamen notes. AFSA filed a grievance asking foreign service director general George Staples to "undo this assignment," which he did, but "gave Zeleny until next summer to leave Brussels." Diplomats "said the opening was never properly advertised so senior officials looking for new postings would know about it. And then it was announced at the last minute, so there was no way top officers, who had already gotten new assignments, could apply for it."

Interior Department Study Finds Oil Drilling Incentives Spur Little Production. The New York Times (12/22, Andrews, 1.16M) reports the US "offers some of the most lucrative incentives in the world to companies that drill for oil in publicly owned coastal waters, but a newly released study suggests that the government is getting very little for its money. The study, which the Interior Department refused to release for more than a year, estimates that current inducements could allow drilling companies in the Gulf of Mexico to escape tens of billions of dollars in royalties that they would otherwise pay the government for oil and gas produced in areas that belong to American taxpayers." The "study predicts that the inducements would cause only a tiny increase in production even if they were offered without some of the limitations now in place. It also suggests that the cost of that additional oil could be as much as $80 a barrel, far more than the government would have to pay if it simply bought the oil on its own."

Goode Won't Apologize For Koran Comments. NBC Nightly News (12/21, story 7, 2:05, Allen, 9.87M) reported, "Since becoming the nation's first Muslim-American elected to Congress, Keith Ellison of Minnesota says he's received hateful mail and phone calls and a few death threats after saying he'd place his hand on a Koran during a private, unofficial swearing-in ceremony. The latest attack -- this letter from Republican Congressman Virgil Goode of Virginia to hundreds of constituents, urging Americans to '…wake up,' adopt his position on illegal immigration, or '…there will be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran.' Today, with security unusually tight, Goode said he would not apologize for his words. … Ellison has pointed out he is not an immigrant, rather an African-American who can trace his roots to 1742. In a statement today, he said, 'Let's remember…diversity is a great strength of America.' Leading Muslim groups call Goode's letter Islamophobic and ignorant."

The AP (12/22, Lindsey) reports Goode said "he will not retract a letter warning that unless immigration is tightened, 'many more Muslims will be elected' and use the Quran to take the oath of office." Goode "triggered angry responses from a civil rights group and some colleagues with a letter this month to constituents concerned about a decision by Rep.-elect Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, to use the Quran when he is sworn in." Goode said he is "receiving more positive comments from constituents than negative," and he "told Fox News he wants to limit legal immigration and do away with 'diversity visas,' which he said let in people 'not from European countries' and 'some terrorist states.'"

The Washington Times (12/22, McLaughlin, 88K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel "called on" Goode "to meet with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison." Emanuel, who is Jewish, said, "If he meets with Keith, he'll see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents." The Times adds Goode "sparked a controversy when he told constituents that if Americans 'don't wake up' and strengthen the country's immigration laws, more Muslims will be elected to Congress and will demand to use the Koran when they take the oath of office." At a Franklin County Courthouse press conference, Goode said, "I will not be putting my hand on the Koran."

Ellison said on CNN's The Situation Room (12/21, Blitzer), "Diversity of our country is a great strength. It's a good thing that we have people from all faiths and all cultures that come here. And we all support one Constitution that upholds our right to equal protection, one Constitution that guarantees us due process under the law, one Constitution which says that there is no religious test for elective office in America. … Diversity in our nation is a great thing and we should embrace it, not be afraid of it." Asked about being sworn in on a Koran, Ellison said, "When I'm officially sworn in, I will do it the same, exact way as every congressperson-elect who is sworn in. We will all stand up and, in unison, lift our hand and swear to uphold that Constitution. And then later, in a private ceremony, of course, I'll put my hand on a book that is the basis of my faith, which is Islam."

WPost Says Goode Is A Bigot. The Washington Post (12/22, A32, 690K) says in an editorial, "Bigotry comes in various guises -- some coded, some closeted, some colossally stupid. The bigotry displayed recently by Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Republican who represents a patch of south-central Virginia, falls squarely in the third category." The "real worry for the nation is that the rest of the world might take Mr. Goode seriously, interpreting his biased remarks about Muslims as proof that America really has embarked on a civilizational war against Islam."

Virginia Interfaith Group Posts Arabic Signs. The AP (12/22, Gelineau) reports that in Richmond, "small beige signs bearing black Arabic script have been appearing all over town on buses and at colleges. … Actual translation: 'Paper or plastic?'" The signs "are part of a campaign by A More Perfect Union, a program of the Virginia Interfaith Center for Public Policy, and are aimed at dispelling some of the public's fears about the Muslim community." The signs "were placed in all 170 Greater Richmond Transit Co. buses in Richmond on Nov. 27 and will remain there through December, though many buses will continue to display them at least through January."

Holocaust Museum Board Criticizes Member For Condemning Ellison. The New York Times (12/22, Swarns, 1.16M) reports the board "that oversees the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum here publicly distanced itself on Thursday from a member who recently condemned the first Muslim elected to Congress for planning to use a Koran during the private part of his swearing-in ceremony." In November, board member Dennis Prager, "a conservative commentator and radio show host, said that Keith Ellison, the newly elected Muslim member of Congress, should give up his post if he could not take his oath on a Bible, which Mr. Prager said was the traditional religious text of the United States." The Holocaust Museum's "executive committee criticized Mr. Prager's remarks as 'antithetical to the mission of the museum as an institution promoting tolerance and respect for all peoples regardless of their race, religion or ethnicity.'"

Davis Continues Probe Of Berger's Removal Of Archive Documents. The Washington Times (12/22, Seper, 88K) reports Rep. Tom Davis, the outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee, "says questions remain about former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's removal of classified documents from the National Archives and pledged yesterday to get the answers." Davis said, "I don't care if it's Sandy Berger or Warren Burger or Veggie Burger who walked off with these documents. It's the lax controls that permitted such a theft; it's the way it was handled internally at the Archives and then by [the Justice Department] that is of grave concern." The Times adds that in October, Davis "led an effort by top House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been 'destroyed, removed or were missing.'" Democrats assume control of Congress next month, and the request is expected to be shelved. But Mr. Davis said his staff continues to look into the matter, and a final investigative report is expected next month."

Report Says Berger Viewed Documents In Archives Official's Office. The Washington Post (12/22, A31, Smith, 690K) reports Berger has "admitted taking five slightly different copies of a highly classified document from the National Archives in 2003 by stuffing them into his suit and sneaking them past guards. He was eventually detected, confronted and ordered by a federal judge to pay a $50,000 fine for his illegal actions." A newly released report "by the National Archives' Office of the Inspector General contains fresh details of the incident, which involved a classified Clinton administration study called the Millennium Alert After

Action Review (MAAR)." During "four visits to the Archives in 2003, Berger worked at a small table in the office of a senior Archives official, instead of in the public reading room -- a practice the inspector general said was 'unauthorized.' The official, whose name was redacted from the report, violated standard protocol by leaving the office to give Berger privacy to speak on the telephone."

WSJournal Says Berger's Actions "Astonishing." The Wall Street Journal (12/22, 2.04M) says in an editorial that the Archives' Inspector General report "suggests Mr. Berger knew he was engaged in a bit of hugger-mugger when he secreted the after-action memos he was reviewing out of the building." Hiding documents "under a trailer in a construction site before returning to retrieve them later" is "not the behavior of a man with a clear conscience. And it's astonishing for a man who served in a senior White House position that made him familiar with the obligations of handling classified papers."

Emanuel To Push Prescription Drug Importation Bill. The Chicago Tribune (12/22, Yednak, 617K) reports Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) "said Democrats and Republicans in both chambers will push again for a bill that would allow prescription drugs to be imported to help reduce costs for U.S. consumers." Emanuel said, "People from around the world come to America for first-class medical care, but Americans travel around the world for affordable medications." The Tribune adds the bill "would allow consumers to import drugs directly from Canada, while wholesalers and pharmacies could import FDA-approved drugs from the European Union, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and Japan to offer for sale."

Iraq Complicates Tight Budget For Bush, Congressional Democrats. The Wall Street Journal (12/22, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Iraq is casting a shadow over the next U.S. budget, complicating efforts by President Bush and congressional Democrats to fund domestic programs as costs of the war rise." The fiscal 2008 budget is "expected to be released Feb. 5. The budget is likely to be the tightest of Mr. Bush's presidency, with little new discretionary spending expected for any area outside the departments of Defense and Homeland Security." The costs "associated with the Iraq war and broader war on terrorism have exacerbated funding constraints caused, in large part, by rising mandatory costs for programs such as Medicare and Social Security." The situation is "posing a challenge for the White House, which must craft a budget that will cover rising expenses while preserving Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and not worsening the deficit." Meanwhile, Congress' "new Democratic majority is expected to face an even tougher task as its leaders look to implement their agenda, which may include increased spending in areas such as education, health care and homeland security."

Krugman Says Democrats Should Spend More Rather Than Cut Deficit. In his New York Times column (12/22), Paul Krugman questions if Democrats should "return to Rubinomics — the doctrine, associated with former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, that placed a very high priority on reducing the budget deficit." While Rubinomics "made sense in terms of pure economics, it failed to take account of the ugly realities of contemporary American politics. And the lesson of the last six years is that the Democrats shouldn't spend political capital trying to bring the deficit down. They should refrain from actions that make the deficit worse. But given a choice between cutting the deficit and spending more on good things like health care reform, they should choose the spending."

Pelosi Planning Presidential-Style Inauguration Ceremonies. The Washington Post (12/22, A1, Layton, 690K) reports, "On a scale associated with presidential inaugurations, Nancy Pelosi is planning four days of celebration surrounding her Jan. 4 swearing-in as the first female speaker of the House. She will return to the blue-collar Baltimore neighborhood where she grew up, attend Mass at the women's college where she studied political science, and dine at the Italian Embassy as Tony Bennett sings 'I Left My Heart in San Francisco.'" But "the hoopla is more than just a party." Pelosi "is grabbing the moment to present herself as the new face of the Democratic Party and to restore the party's image as one hospitable to ethnic minorities, families, religion, the working class and women. … In her meticulous selection of events and venues during a week when she expects to attract media attention from as far away as Australia, Pelosi is clearly trying to bury the label 'San Francisco liberal' that Republicans tried to affix to her during the midterm elections." Mike Murphy, "a Republican political consultant and former adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), said the four-day extravaganza is excessive. 'What? No fireworks?' he said." He "said the schedule is 'classic Pelosi.'"

USA Today (12/22, Scouten, 2.27M) reports on inaugural bashes across the nation, "Unlike campaign contributions, most states don't limit or require public disclosure of inaugural fundraising. Edwin Bender of the Institute on Money in State Politics said greater transparency is needed because governors are guaranteed 'to wield a great deal of influence over public policy.'" unions and other special interest groups that run political advertising in peak election season." The 2-1 ruling "said groups may mention candidates by name in commercials as long as they are trying to influence public policy, rather than sway an election." The ruling "came in a challenge to the so-called McCain-Feingold law designed to reduce the influence of big money in political campaigns." Some lawmakers "have predicted such a ruling would create a loophole in the 2002 law. Advocacy groups have used ads similar to those paid for by the Wisconsin group to advocate for and against candidates."

DC Circuit Relaxes Restrictions On Special Interest Group "Issue Ads." The AP (12/22, Apuzzo) reports that the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit "loosened restrictions on corporations,

The Washington Post (12/22, A11, Leonnig, 690K) reports the "divided three-judge court ruled yesterday that ads advocating for an issue and mentioning candidates can run during an election, creating a loophole in the law that sought to control the power of big money in elections." The court "found that the government had no compelling justification to regulate television ads such as the ones Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. broadcast in July 2004, which advocated stopping congressional filibusters against President Bush's judicial nominees." The ads "ran when Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) was running for reelection and had opposed some of Bush's nominees. The ads made no mention of Feingold's record, instead urging Wisconsin residents to call their senators to express their dissatisfaction."

The New York Times (12/22, Phillips, 1.16M) reports the case, "which was heard by a special federal court panel in Washington, now heads to the Supreme Court. If upheld, the ruling would unravel one of the tougher restrictions on the use of unregulated donations that interest groups pumped by the millions of dollars into political commercials." The majority opinion "was by Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court. Judge Richard W. Roberts of Federal District Court dissented." The Washington Times (12/22, Dinan, 88K) notes the ruling is "the first major dent in the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law." The "small but potentially deep change creates an exception to what had been considered a near-blanket rule."

NYTimes Criticizes Brownback Over Neff Nomination. The New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) editorializes, "If most people were asked to list the qualities they want in a federal judge, few would include 'has not attended a same-sex commitment ceremony.' But that was the outrageous litmus test that Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, applied to Janet Neff, whose nomination he has been blocking. Mr. Brownback -- who has presidential ambitions -- now says he will allow a vote on her nomination. We hope that is a sign that gay-baiting is becoming less tolerable, even to Republican primary voters." The Times adds, "Whether someone has attended a same-sex commitment ceremony is not a worthy litmus test to impose on someone seeking an important office. Whether someone holds hateful views toward gay people certainly is."

Judge Reduces Texas Vioxx Award From $32 Million To $7 Million. The AP (12/22) reports, "A judge in a Texas widow's lawsuit over the Merck & Co. drug Vioxx on Thursday reduced a $32 million jury award to about $7.75 million, citing Texas' recently enacted caps on punitive damages. The state jury in April found Merck & Co. liable for the death of Leonel Garza, a 71-year-old man who had a fatal heart attack within a month of taking the since-withdrawn painkiller. The company was ordered to pay the Garza family $7 million in non-economic compensatory damages and $25 million in punitive damages. But Judge Alex Garza, in a Rio Grande City courtroom, ordered the punitive damage reduced as required by state law."

US Businessman Pleads Guilty To Bribing UN Official. The New York Times (12/22, Gootman, 1.16M) reports, "A businessman pleaded guilty Thursday to providing cash and a significantly discounted luxury Manhattan condominium to a ranking United Nations procurement official, in a successful effort to win more than $50 million in contracts, federal prosecutors said. The businessman, Nishan Kohli, 30, pleaded guilty in Manhattan federal court to a single count of bribery after acknowledging that he had given cash payments to Sanjaya Bahel, who was chief of the commodity procurement section of the United Nations procurement division from 1998 until 2003. Mr. Kohli faces up to 10 years in prison. He also acknowledged that from 2003 to 2005, he allowed Mr. Bahel to pay reduced rent at a high-rise apartment that Mr. Kohli owned in the Dag Hammarskjold Towers, near United Nations headquarters. In May 2005, Mr. Kohli sold the unit to Mr. Bahel at a price so far below the market value that the condominium's board considered blocking the sale, prosecutors said. … Mr. Kohli's guilty plea is the latest development in a series of corruption charges against United Nations officials and those seeking to do business with them. The plea and Mr. Kohli's agreement to cooperate with the government are likely to strengthen the case against Mr. Bahel, who has pleaded not guilty to bribery charges. His trial is scheduled for May 7."

The New York Sun (12/22, Goldstein) reports, "Prior to Mr. Bahel's recent indictment, another top procurement department employee, Alexander Yakovlev, pleaded guilty in the summer of 2005 to corruption and wire fraud charges. Messrs. Bahel and Yakovlev were key officers involved in the awarding of a U.N. contract to the Swiss-based inspection company Cotecna, which had employed Secretary General Annan's son, Kojo. In addition, last January the U.N. suspended eight employees in the procurement department, including Mr. Bahel, pending an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing."

Mexican Anti-Drug Operation Focuses On Hindering Drug Gang Cash Flow. The USA Today (12/22, 6A, Llana, 2.27M) reports Mexico "has long been under pressure from the United States to crack down on the drug trade and end violence between drug gangs. According to the U.S. State Department, 70%-90% of drugs coming to the USA from Latin America enter through Mexico. Mexico is one of the main producers of marijuana and heroin destined for the USA. U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza has repeatedly expressed concern about the rising violence, most of it drug-related. The week-old Operation Michoacan…is the biggest anti-drug effort taken on by the Mexican government, says Army Gen. Manuel Garcia Ruiz, who heads the operation. … The first goal, Garcia Ruiz says, is to disrupt the drug gangs' source of income and their ability to communicate."

Former Administration Officials Decry White House Op-ed Redaction. The New York Times today's publishes the redacted version of an op-ed written by former NSC adviser Flynt Leverett, and former Foreign Service officer Hillary Mann. In an accompanying op-ed titled "What We Wanted To Tell You About Iran," Leverett and Mann say their original piece was "blacked out by the Central Intelligence Agency's Publication Review Board after the White House intervened in the normal prepublication review process and demanded substantial deletions." Agency officials, the write, "told us that they had concluded on their own that the original draft included no classified material, but that they had to bow to the White House." Leverett and Mann say the deleted passages "go into aspects of American-Iranian relations during the Bush administration's first term that have been publicly discussed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; former Secretary of State Colin Powell; former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage; a former State Department policy planning director, Richard Haass; and a former special envoy to Afghanistan, James Dobbins." The content, they note, have also been "extensively reported in the news media, and one of us, Mr. Leverett, has written about them in The Times and other publications with the explicit permission of the review board." Leverett and Mann provide a list of links to their citations "to demonstrate that all of the material the White House objected to is already in the public domain," noting that "unfortunately, to make sense of much of our Op-Ed article, readers will have to read the citations for themselves." Leverett and Mann conclude by stating that "national security must be above politics. In a democracy, transparency in government has to be honored and protected. To classify information for reasons other than the safety and security of the United States and its interests is a violation of these principles."

Rice Backs UN Resolution On Iran Sanctions As Vote Looms. The AP (12/22, Gearan) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Washington "supports a draft UN sanctions resolution against Iran even though it omits a mandatory travel ban against several Iranians involved in the country's nuclear and missile programs." However, she "said she expects changes to be made in the draft before it is put to a vote at the United Nations Security Council, perhaps on Friday." Speaking at a news conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, she offered no details of the revisions she expects, saying, "It's no secret we would have preferred to have this earlier had we been the lone drafter, and of course there might have been other things in it." At the same time, she said the resolution would make clear to Iran that the "international community is not going to tolerate its defiance" of demands that it abandon its nuclear program. The Washington Times (12/22, Pisik, 88K) reports the US and EU yesterday "pushed for a UN Security Council vote as early as today on Iran sanctions," while Russia "said last night that the resolution needed more work, casting doubt on whether the vote could be held today." Meanwhile, Secretary Rice told reporters after a meeting with MacKay that she is "quite satisfied and quite certain" that the resolution "will be adopted."

The Financial Times (12/22, Turner) reports the UNSC is "poised finally to agree sanctions on Iran after months of wrangling." Diplomats "had hoped to adopt" the resolution "today but the vote had slipped to the weekend," saying "some issues still needed to be ironed out but they were hopeful that unanimous agreement could be reached by this morning."

Ahmadinejad Defiant Ahead Of Security Council Vote. AFP (12/22) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "vowed that nothing would stop Iran pushing ahead with its nuclear program," as the UNSC "prepared to vote Friday on sanctions" against Tehran. In a public address, he said "the United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology." The AP (12/22, Dareini) reports Ahmadinejad also called President Bush "the most hated person" in the world Thursday, "keeping up his tirades against the West."

Iranian Official Rejects Talks With US About Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports Tehran's top envoy in Iraq "said there was no need for contacts with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, saying that Iranians already were pursuing channels to help secure their embattled neighbor." Ambassador Hassan

Kazemi-Qomi "brushed aside recommendations of the Iraq Study Group," saying, "We don't need a Mr. Baker-style proposal calling for Iran to talk with the United States about Iraq. We have our own well-defined policies about Iraq. We have never waited for a Mr. Baker or someone else to offer talks."

NYTimes Urges US To Push For More Effective Sanctions. In an editorial, the New York Times (12/22, 1.16M) reports Ahmadinejad "has not been having a very good month, which is good news both for the beaten-down people of Iran and for the outside world. The populist demagogue, it seems, is not so popular with important elements of Iranian society growing uneasy over the price Iran may have to pay for his belligerent pursuit of nuclear technology. This week, Mr. Ahmadinejad's oil minister acknowledged that foreign banks were pulling back from financing Iranian oil projects because of the worsening nuclear dispute." Also last week, "in a remarkable show of courage, students at one of Tehran's elite universities openly denounced Mr. Ahmadinejad as a dictator and a fascist, forcing him to cut short his planned address." As some Iranians begin to recognize that their nation's nuclear program may "do more harm than good," the Times says "Washington needs to keep pushing for effective economic sanctions that will compel Mr. Ahmadinejad to recognize it as well."

Saudi Officials Seen As Split Over Iran Policy. The New York Times (12/22, A16, Fattah, 1.16M) reports that across Saudi Arabia, "in both official and casual conversation, once-quiet concern over the chaos in Iraq and Iran's growing regional influence has burst into the open," with many saying "a showdown with Iran is inevitable." According to the Times a "growing debate" in the kingdom "has centered on how Iran should be confronted: head on, with Saudi Arabia throwing its lot in with the full force of the United States, or diplomatically, with a grand bargain Iran would find hard to refuse?" The "apparent split burst into the open last week when Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Washington, abruptly resigned after just 15 months." His resignation is "seen by many…as part of a long-running battle over Saudi Arabia's foreign policy," and "privately some Saudi officials and analysts with knowledge of the situation say Prince Turki resigned over deep differences with Prince Bandar bin Sultan," who is "believed to favor the tough American approach of confronting Iran, analysts say, while Prince Turki advocates more diplomatic tactics, including negotiating with Iran." Also, the new Saudi ambassador, Adel al-Jubeir, a foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah, is seen as "a wild card." Although he "once worked for Prince Bandar," Saudi officials said that Jubeir "did not necessarily share Prince Bandar's opinions," saying instead he will act as "a direct line between the king and the administration."

Bush Signs Measure Blocking Aid To Hamas. The AP (12/22) reports President Bush Thursday signed into law a bill "meant to block US aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government and ban contacts with Hamas until the militant faction has renounced violence and recognized Israel's existence." The measure "also creates a $20 million fund to promote democracy, human rights, freedom of the press and peace between Israel and the Palestinians." Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-KY), co-sponsor of the Senate bill, "said the legislation makes clear the Palestinian Authority can expect no US help so long as it continues to be led by Hamas." For its part, the White House said the legislation Bush signed "reflects the administration's concern over the current government's failure to renounce violence and terror, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements and obligations."

Renewed Fighting Threatens Palestinian Ceasefire. The AP (12/22, Barzak) reports a "fierce gunbattle broke out between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza City early Friday, underscoring the fragility of a two-day old truce that had largely ended factional violence there." The "street battle" erupted when Hamas militiamen "tried to free two kidnapped militants, including a senior member of the Islamic group." Meanwhile, Palestinians "stepped up rocket attacks on Israel," threatening a separate cease-fire between Israel and the Palestinians. In a conflicting report, AFP (12/22, El Oun) writes under the headline "Gaza Breathes A Sigh Of Relief As Ceasefire Holds" that the "embattled Gaza Strip breathed a sigh of relief as a truce between rival Palestinian factions took hold." AFP said "no clashes between" Fatah and Hamas "have been reported since early Wednesday."

US Prepares $500 Million Aid Package To Strengthen Lebanon Against Hezbollah. The Washington Post (12/22, A29, Wright, 690K) reports the US is "preparing a package of almost $500 million in aid for Lebanon's military and police to help strengthen security forces, part of almost $1 billion in total US assistance to help the beleaguered Lebanese government," according to US officials. The package is part of an international effort to "shore up the Lebanese security forces so they can eventually extend their control over the entire country" and "to strengthen the government's hand over the influence of Hezbollah," the sources said. Secretary Rice told The Post last week in an interview that "one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces not -- I think probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform." Rice said the package will require "further consultations with Congress to win funding." The "other half of the $1 billion is likely to be for reconstruction through USAID as well as debt relief," US officials said. The US aid package is being prepared "even as a new report by the International Crisis Group, set to be released today, warns that the Middle Eastern country is at risk of 'renewed collapse' unless domestic and international players work to achieve political compromise." ICG analyst Patrick Haenni warns, "Street politics have replaced institutional politics. Civil war remains unlikely. But with heightened polarization, intensified [religious divisions] and heavy outside interference, it is again becoming thinkable."

Rice Questions Pyongyang's Commitment As Six-Party Talks Stall. In an exclusive interview with the AP (12/22, Gearan), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "said she has no reason to believe North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons," but this week's six-party talks will help determine "whether or not they follow through." Meanwhile, in Beijing, the New York Times (12/22, A5, Lague, 1.16M) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Thursday said Pyongyang's "determination to link nuclear disarmament with the financial restrictions was an obstacle" to solving what had become a "very urgent problem." Hill said negotiators "have made it very clear that we consider the financial issue quite separately from the denuclearization issue. I would rather not obscure that problem by talking about finances." Kenichiro Sasae, Japan's chief envoy to the talks, said North Korea's refusal to disarm before the United States lifted the financial restrictions meant "there is no prospect for a breakthrough" in the talks. The Washington Post (12/22, A21, Cody, 690K) reports that "after what he described as a frustrating day of discussions," Hill "said he would give the Chinese-sponsored talks another day in hopes that the North Korean negotiators received last-minute instructions from Pyongyang to change their stand. But in any case, he said, he will be making plane reservations to head back to Washington on Saturday." In Washington, Secretary Rice told reporters, "Diplomacy sometimes takes time, but we should not be diverted somehow by an issue that is clearly in another lane and is clearly being dealt with in a way that the North Koreans themselves asked that it be dealt with." The Washington Times (12/22, Kralev, 88K) says Secretary Rice "rejected a North Korean attempt at the six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing to link the negotiations to US financial sanctions imposed last year." Speaking to reporters after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, Rice, "We've been very clear that these are two separate issues."

The AP (12/22, Olesen) notes Hill "said Friday that there were no signs of a breakthrough and accused the communist state of not being serious about the negotiations." Hill was quoted as saying, "When the DPRK raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want but they know they can't have, another day it's something we said about them that hurt their feelings. "What they need to do is to get serious about the issue that made them such a problem...their nuclear activities." AFP (12/22) says the talks "appeared set to end in deadlock."

Korean Expert Says Pyongyang Misunderstood. B.R. Myers, a North Korea researcher at Dongseo University in Busan, South Korea, writes in the Wall Street Journal (12/22, 2.04M) that the "ideological landscape" of the Korean peninsula "defeats the reasoning that led to the six-party talks in the first place." North Korea, he notes, is "not a communist country with ideological and sentimental reasons to listen to China and Russia; it is a virulently nationalist state that distrusts all the other parties at the table. And though the rhetoric of a 'concerted front' against North Korea has proved to be just that, it has sufficed to heighten South Korea's sense of solidarity with the North. This will continue to mean plenty of aid money for Kim Jong Il with which to build weapons." The US, Myers writes, "has urged Beijing to bring more pressure to bear on the North. But if America can do nothing with its own ally, it can hardly expect the Chinese to do more with theirs."

US Cancels Military Exercise With Philippines Over Detained Marine. The New York Times (12/22, A8, Shanker, 1.16M) reports under the headline "Tensions Flare Over Custody In Rape Case In Philippines" that the commander of American forces in the Pacific announced Thursday that he had canceled "a huge annual military exercise with the Philippines in a dispute over custody of a marine lance corporal convicted of raping a local woman." Adm. William J. Fallon said he also "would halt aid and reconstruction programs carried out by the American military in the Philippines until he was confident that the troops' legal rights would be protected under bilateral agreements governing visiting United States forces." The rape case involving Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith "has tested relations between the countries and challenged the validity" of a bilateral agreement. It has also "sharpened a political division between Filipinos with nationalist resentments" and those "who cite the economic and security benefits of ties to the United States."

Singh Expresses Concerns About Nuclear Pact. The AP (12/22) reports Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told President Bush Thursday that his country has "some concerns" about the nuclear pact signed into law earlier this week, according to a statement by Singh's office. The Indian government has "not elaborated on its concerns, but Congress included a nonbinding clause in the new law directing the White House to certify that India is cooperating in efforts to force Iran to abandon its nuclear programs." The clause has been "criticized by Singh's leftist allies and opposition parties, who claim it violates India's sovereignty." During the telephone call, the two leaders "expressed the hope that remaining concerns will be addressed in the next stage of negotiations" on the nuclear cooperation deal, the statement from Singh's office said.

Somali Government Declares Victory In Battle Against Islamic Militants. The New York Times (12/22, A8, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports the transitional government of Somalia "claimed victory on Thursday in the first major confrontation" with Islamic militants. United Nations officials "confirmed heavy Islamist casualties in the fighting, which began Wednesday and continued Thursday." The Islamist fighters, the officials said, were "mowed down by transitional government soldiers backed by the Ethiopian Army." "After initially playing down the fighting, Islamic militant leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, "announced Thursday over national radio that Somalia was at war" and urges "all Somalis" to "take part in this struggle against Ethiopia." The AP (12/22, Duhul) says the "clashes threaten to spiral into a major conflict in this volatile region, sucking in Ethiopia and its bitter rival Eritrea, which is accused of supporting the Islamic group. Analysts believe Ethiopia may soon raise the stakes by deploying attack helicopters in support of the government."

US Embassy Accuses Congolese Company Of Stealing Aid Shipment. AFP (12/22) reports the US embassy in Brazzaville "accused a private Congolese company of stealing more than 5,800 tons of humanitarian aid worth more $3 million with the help of a local magistrate." The embassy accused import-export company Super-Market of having "illegally removed" the aid at the start of December from warehouses of a transit company in Pointe-Noire, according to a statement received by AFP. Ambassador Robert Wesiberg told journalists that Super-Market had "acted in complicity with prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou" and asked the Congolese government to do "everything to remove this aid from Super-Market, so that it can reach people following normal procedures." Wesiberg noted that "so far all attempts to obtain help from ministries had been in vain." The ambassador on Wednesday "boycotted" a ceremony organized by the UN Development Programme during which an appeal for $28 million in aid for Congo in 2007 was due to be launched.

Sudden Death Of Turkmen President Raises Fears Of Instability. ABC World News (12/21, story 6, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "One of the world's most ruthless and eccentric dictators has died. Saparmurat Niyazov ruled Turkmenistan in central Asia for 21 years. He crushed opponents and named towns, mosques and even months of the year after himself. His bizarre decrees included a ban on lip-syncing. His death raises questions about the stability of Turkmenistan, which has vast natural gas and oil reserves." The Financial Times (12/22, Gorst) says Niyazov's death "has raised the threat of instability in a Central Asian republic that is an important energy supplier to Europe." Niyazov, who ruled for more than 20 years, died "with no obvious successor," likely "to spark both an internal power struggle and a tussle for influence between Russia, China and the US over a country with the world's fifth-largest gas reserves." The New York Times (12/22, Chivers, 1.16M) reports "foreign governments and energy analysts expressed misgivings about the expected succession battles ahead, and what they might mean for stability and the intense international competition for the gas reserves." Acting President Berdymukhammedov, it notes, is "a relatively unknown political figure" and "probably not a long-term successor."

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, A4, Chazan, Cullison, 2.04M) says Russia "will probably have the edge in any 'Great Game'-style jockeying for influence over Turkmenistan," noting that President Vladimir Putin "has long nurtured close ties to the Turkmen leadership." However, Niyazov's death "could also revitalize Western-backed efforts to open up new transport routes for Central Asian gas." The AP (12/22, Heintz) reports that "within hours of his death, Turkmenistan appeared to be showing signs of political infighting."

The Los Angeles Times (12/22, Holley, 850K) and Washington Post (12/22, A21, Finn, 690K) run similar reports. Also in the Washington Post (12/22, A33, 690K), Marsha Lipman writes that "struggle seems inevitable. Niyazov's regime implied that he was Turkmenistan's ruler for eternity, and any plans for succession were simply ruled out. Just as it was after Stalin's death, members of the leader's inner circle must be seized by fear and deep distrust of each other. … One would hope that change will at least improve somewhat the situation of the Turkmen people. But with the balance of power in Central Asia at stake, it's unlikely that human rights abuses will be of major concern to the contestants in this tug-of-war."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rice Seeks U.S. Probe Of Why Canada's Arar Still On Watch List (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked homeland security chief Michael Chertoff and the Justice Department to review the case of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who Canada says was wrongly accused of links to terrorism and remains on a U.S. terrorist watch list.

The U.S. accused Arar of links to al-Qaeda when authorities detained him in 2002 at John F. Kennedy International Airport on a stopover during his return to Canada from Tunisia. A Canadian inquiry found in September that Arar was tortured in his native Syria and that Canadian officials gave inaccurate information to the U.S. that portrayed Arar inaccurately as a terrorist.

Canada has removed Arar from its watch list and wants the U.S. to do the same. Rice, speaking at a press conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay at the State Department in Washington today, said she was seeking clarification from Chertoff.

``I talked with Mike Chertoff about this just this morning, and he said that he would examine this and he will be back to us," Rice told reporters.

MacKay, speaking alongside Rice, said that the Canadian inquiry exonerated Arar. The case led to resignation earlier this month of Royal Canadian Mounted Police Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli.

``There's clarity as to Canada's position and the findings with respect to Mr. Arar. We've removed him from our watch list. We've urged the United States to take the same steps," MacKay said.

Asked if she had anything to say to Arar on how he has been treated, Rice defended U.S. counterterrorism and border security procedures, saying ``it needs to be understood that in the post- September 11 circumstances we are determined to protect our borders."

U.S. To Look Into Arar's Status: Rice (CBC)

CBC News, December 21, 2006

U.S. security officials will review why Canadian Maher Arar is still on a U.S. terrorist watch list, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday following a meeting with Canada's foreign affairs minister.

"It will of course be looked at," Rice told reporters at a joint news conference with Peter MacKay in Washington. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay, shown after an appearance in Stellarton, N.S., in September, discussed Maher Arar on Thursday. Rice said his case 'will be looked at.'

Rice said she instructed Michael Chertoff, the Department of Homeland Security's secretary, and the Justice Department to look further into the matter.

"He said he would examine it and would get back to me."

But Rice reiterated that the U.S. makes its own security decisions based on independent information.

"We value accuracy in cases but we do have our own process," she said. "It needs to be understood that in the post-Sept. 11 circumstances, we are determined to protect our borders."

MacKay said he brought up Arar's status in the meeting with his U.S. counterpart and reiterated that Arar has been cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism. "There's clarity in Canada's position with the findings of Mr. Arar," MacKay said. "I'm very pleased at the decision to revisit the restriction on his case."

Arar, a Canadian citizen born in Syria, was seized at a New York airport in 2002 and sent to Syria, where he was tortured. A judicial inquiry into his case led by Justice Dennis O'Connor was set up after Arar returned to Canada more than a year later.

O'Connor concluded Arar had no terror links and the RCMP had given misleading information to U.S. authorities, which may have been the reason he was sent to Syria.

Parliament apologized to Arar and the government has been asking Washington to remove him from a watch list that prevents him from travelling to the U.S. andÂ makes him a marked man, despite being cleared in Canada.

However, the U.S. has refused and has not explained why. 'Go our own way'

The meeting between MacKay and Rice came a day after an American security official bluntly stated the U.S. would follow its own path on Arar without informing Canadians on its reasons.

"With respect to some issues, we're going to have to respectfully but firmly go our own way and the Arar matter, at least for now, is one of those," Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs for the Department of Homeland Security, told reporters in Washington.

"As for the sharing of information with the Canadian government, while I do recognize that in an idealized world we would share every bit of intelligence information with all of our partners, in the real world that is an idealization that isn't achievable."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper told Sun Media that "as near as I can see, we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong."

He said he can't compel the U.S. to explain why it still views Arar with suspicion.

"I'm not aware of the U.S. violating any law by not sharing it with us, but I'm obviously disappointed that they don't seem at this point to have responded fully to the conclusions of our own inquiry, and I have no explanation for why they're taking the position that they are."

Arar's lawsuit against the U.S. has been cited as one reason American authorities won't talk about the case. With files from the Canadian Press

Hudson River Tunnels Seen As Fragile (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum And William Neuman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

An analysis done for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey says that the PATH train tunnels under the Hudson River are more vulnerable to a bomb attack than previously thought, and that a relatively small amount of high explosives could cause significant flooding of the rail system within hours.

The analysis, based on work by Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, revises some critical aspects of an assessment of the system's vulnerability that was presented to the agency last spring. It makes clear that the tunnels — four tubes of varying design and sturdiness that stretch across the Hudson riverbed — are structurally more fragile than first thought.

A draft summary of the most recent analysis was given to The New York Times by a government official who was troubled by what the official felt was a lack of action in response to the analysis, which the official said the Port Authority got about three weeks ago. The official said the latest analysis indicates that it would take only six minutes for one of the PATH tubes to flood if a significant but not necessarily very large bomb were detonated.

Marc La Vorgna, a spokesman for the Port Authority, would not answer specific questions about the analysis, or with whom it had been shared.

"If we believed in any way that passengers were in danger, we'd close the system," he said. "That would happen immediately." He said the Port Authority police had substantially increased patrols and bag searches in the PATH system in recent weeks. In addition, the agency's board voted on Dec. 14 to spend $180 million on PATH security improvements. He refused to say what had prompted the actions.

The vulnerability of the PATH tubes and other tunnels has long been a source of concern to security, transportation and government officials, as well as the public. It has given rise to various projections about their likelihood as a target and what ought to be done to safeguard them.

The fears have existed at least as far back as 1993, the year of the first terror attack on the World Trade Center. Various agencies, including New York City Transit and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, over the years have been studying ways to improve the tunnels' security and stalwartness.

Just last July, several people were arrested overseas in what authorities said was a plot to bomb the PATH system — which has a weekday ridership of 230,000. The arrests halted what officials said was a bid to set off backpack bombs in a PATH train car and flood the tunnels. Some published reports said maps and other material relating to the PATH tunnels had been found on the computer of one of those arrested.

That investigation began a year before the arrests, about the same time that an analysis of the vulnerability of the transit system's underwater train tubes was jointly commissioned by the Port Authority and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, which oversees the operation of the city's subways. It is unclear, however, whether the investigation prompted the analysis.

A 19-page summary of the analysis details some of the measures the Port Authority has been planning to put in place to better secure the PATH system: laying concrete blankets atop the tubes to plug holes caused by a blast, strengthening portions of the tubes and installing floodgates to prevent the system from being overwhelmed.

The official who gave a copy of the report to The Times said the Port Authority, whose executive director and board members are appointed by the governors of New York and New Jersey, had informed neither state executive of the most recent results. Neither has it yet shared the new findings with the United States Department of Homeland Security, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, the New York Police Department or other law enforcement agencies, the official said.

The official disputed the Port Authority's contention that it had increased patrols and bag searches.

Aides speaking for Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Gov. George E. Pataki of New York would not comment on whether the two leaders had been apprised of the latest analysis, but they insisted that the governors are both fully and regularly briefed on the security of the region's mass transportation system.

A spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg would not comment on the analysis. But a senior Police Department official acknowledged that the police had not been informed of the newer findings. Yesterday afternoon, Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, said he could not determine whether anyone at the agency had been notified.

Speaking generally, Mr. La Vorgna of the Port Authority said the agency was "constantly undergoing threat assessment," and that the analysis was regularly shared with its federal, state and city partners.

Since 9/11, government and security officials have emphasized that there is no way to fully protect every possible target. But in New York, officials have regularly sought to reassure the public that serious steps are being taken to address major vulnerabilities in the area's array of tunnels, bridges and rail systems.

The analysis appears to be the most detailed and sophisticated government review of the train tubes' vulnerability. Initial findings were shared last May with the some members of the agency, but was not made public, and further tests were ordered. More tests are being done in an effort to come up with the best way to strengthen the tunnels.

The Hudson River tubes of the PATH system, which suffered serious damage in the 2001 terror attack, are more vulnerable than most other tunnels that pass under the city's waterways because they lie in the soft riverbed, unlike other tunnels that are bored through the underlying bedrock. Silt over years has built up atop the tubes, which were laid roughly 90 years ago, but they are not in bedrock.

Several city subway tunnels beneath the East River are in many ways similar to the four PATH tunnels — essentially cast-iron tubes that run along the riverbed. An official at the Metropolitan Transportation Authority said that agency is working on an analysis of its tubes.

The PATH analysis, which is characterized as preliminary and continuing, examines the three different types of PATH tubes under the Hudson. Roughly three-quarters of the tubes' total length is made of unlined cast iron, with the balance made from concrete-lined cast iron or brick. Many of the details of the analysis — including the size of the bombs under discussion, their placement and the exact nature of the vulnerability — are being withheld by The Times.

The worst case included in the analysis suggests that a bomb that could be easily carried aboard a train could punch a 50-square-foot hole in one side of a tube, possibly breaching both sides of the tunnel. Under that situation, 1.2 million gallons of water a minute could pour into the tunnel, flooding parts of the system in a matter of hours.

That is a much more dire view than an earlier draft of the analysis — completed last May — contemplated.

PATH trains run in sets of seven cars, each with a capacity of 130, so that there could potentially be about 900 people on a crowded train. New cars on order would allow 10-car trains that could carry more people.

The analysis — presented in November by a senior member of the Port Authority's engineering department to a small group of the agency's senior managers, says that the new results are based on a combination of tests on the cast iron from the tunnels and computer modeling. It recommends seeking an additional $3.8 million to supplement the $4.5 million already authorized for the continuing analysis.

Additional computer models, it said, were also being run to develop more specific results. The Livermore laboratory, a government-financed institution that evaluates security threats, has also done blast analysis for the Bay Area Rapid Transit system in the San Francisco Bay area.

The strategy to minimize the impact of explosions in the tunnels has been organized into a three-part program, according to the report: Laying down the material to cover the tubes, known as Geotextile Concrete Mats; installing floodgates on the tunnels to minimize flooding, protect other parts of the system and allow repair after a blast; and strengthening critical portions of the tubes.

Simulations show how, "in the event of a tunnel breach the mat would be pulled into and clog the opening to at least reduce the rate of inflow of soil and water into the tunnel," the summary said.

The summary recommended that Port Authority officials seek authorization for an additional $71 million to build and install floodgates at the World Trade Center and Exchange Place stops at the agency's December board meeting, which occurred Dec. 14. Mr. La Vorgna would not say what measures were covered by the $180 million the agency voted to spend on PATH security improvements or whether that sum included the $71 million.

Lawyer: 5 Tapped In N.J. Posada Probe (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, December 22, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. — Five Cuban-Americans were called to testify in a federal grand jury probe exploring allegations they helped send more than $30,000 to an anti-Castro militant suspected of directing attacks on Cuba, their lawyer said Thursday.

All five deny wrongdoing, attorney Gilberto M. Garcia said. He told The Record of Bergen County that four of his clients claim someone used their names to send transfers to Luis Posada Carriles, an anti-Castro militant wanted in Cuba and Venezuela.

He said a fifth, Oscar Rojas, acknowledges handling transfers but says he did so only at the request of a former millionaire businessman that he worked for and did not know what the funds would be used for, according to The Record.

Garcia said one of his clients testified and that two gave written statements, although he wouldn't specify which. He said two others were excused from testifying after saying they intended to invoke their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination.

Posada, 79, has spent the past 18 months in federal custody in El Paso, Texas, on immigration charges. A judge ruled Posada, who was born in Cuba and naturalized in Venezuela, can not be deported to either country. He is wanted in both for his alleged involvement in a 1976 bombing of a Cuban jet in Venezuela that killed 73 people and a 1997 bombing campaign on Havana hotels, restaurants and clubs.

Besides Rojas, Garcia said his other subpoenaed clients were Abel Hernandez, Angel Alfonso Aleman, Ruben Gonzalo and his son, Jose Gonzalo.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would neither confirm nor deny an investigation into the money transfers was ongoing.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. To Require More Security At High-Risk Chemical Plants (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — After years of debate, and criticism over the delay, the Bush administration will move Friday to require security enhancements at high-risk chemical plants nationwide so their hazardous stockpiles do not become a target for terrorists.

Department of Homeland Security officials said Thursday that the new rules would reduce the likelihood of a catastrophic chemical attack when paired with a recent tightening of regulations for rail shipments of highly toxic materials.

"This will bring us to a much higher level of security," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said in an interview Thursday.

But the draft regulations will almost certainly evoke protest from Democrats on Capitol Hill — as well as from state officials — because they may allow a federal pre-emption of conflicting and perhaps more demanding state laws.

They also may allow the Department of Homeland Security, under certain circumstances, to recognize as sufficient the security measures already put in place voluntarily by major chemical manufacturers, meaning that for many plants, few if any changes would be required.

And the draft rules do not require any specific security measures, like the construction of barriers or a switch to less hazardous chemicals. Instead, they will leave it up to plant owners to decide what measures are most appropriate, although the Homeland Security Department will review the plans and have the power to order changes.

Democrats, who failed this year in an effort to mandate more stringent requirements, said that they intended to take up the issue next year, when they will have the majority.

"It concerns me that the regulations do not require chemical facilities to switch to safer technologies wherever feasible," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, who is to take over as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security. "Without such a requirement, I fear a significant gap remains in our chemical security efforts."

Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said the organization's members, which include industry giants like Dow Chemical and DuPont, welcomed the regulations, particularly if they would credit security investments already made by plant owners, which he said had cost more than $3.3 billion nationwide.

"We want to make sure that work is recognized when it comes to complying with the new regulations," he said.

Rick Hind, a lobbyist for the environmental group Greenpeace, called the regulations "an industry-friendly excuse so they can claim they are doing something."

The debate over the need for chemical plant regulations began shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Unlike nuclear power plants or ports, facilities that manufacture or store large quantities of toxic chemicals are not subject to antiterrorism mandates.

Christie Whitman, the former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, said after she left the agency that its efforts to enact such regulations had been held back by the White House, under pressure from the chemical industry.

The Bush administration and the chemical industry joined with Democrats in calling for regulations because even though the industry had voluntarily adopted security standards, some plants were not abiding by them.

The new regulations, which Congress ordered as part of the 2007 Homeland Security budget act, would require that facilities that manufacture, use or store chemicals evaluate all the ways they could be attacked — from outside the plant, or by sabotage from the inside — and then propose countermeasures.

"We are not going to tell them, 'You have to build a big fence as opposed to putting a tank underground,' " Mr. Chertoff said. "We are simply going to say, 'The choice you make must prevent somebody from being able to shoot the tank and blow it up.' "

Only "high risk" plants are subject to the mandate, although the draft rules do not yet define exactly what that term means, making it impossible to say how many facilities will be subject to the regulation.

Plants that are affected will have to conduct background checks on employees and take at least some steps to control access, secure chemical stockpiles and establish emergency plans in the event of an attack. Plants that ignore the requirements may be subject to fines of up to $25,000 a day or face a shut-down order.

The proposed rules do not explicitly pre-empt state plant security laws, like one adopted last year in New Jersey that requires facilities to consider switching to safer chemicals or technologies. But the draft regulations say the Homeland Security Department may take such a step to "preserve chemical facilities' flexibility to choose security measures."

U.S. Allows Chemical Plants Leeway In Terror Order (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Homeland Security is expected to issue rules today to require thousands of U.S. chemical plants to protect themselves from terrorists. But under the proposed rules -- heavily influenced by the chemical industry -- the department will tell plants what they need to do, and not how, a strategy unlikely to satisfy many Democratic lawmakers who take control of Congress next month.

The department's preliminary rulemaking follows its announcement last week of regulations to ensure that the nation's freight rail system and hazardous chemicals transported by rail aren't vulnerable to terrorists. "This is part two of what we did with respect to trains carrying hazardous chemicals between places. These rules now cover security when those chemicals come to rest," said DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in an interview. There will be a 60-day comment period after the proposed rules for chemical plants are made public.

The rail rules, which included extra security at rail yards across the country and tracking of all hazardous train shipments, fell short of more stringent measures proposed by Democrats, such as rerouting dangerous rail cargo away from heavily populated areas. Critics saw the rules as weak -- a charge also likely to hit the chemical-plant rules.

According to Mr. Chertoff, the proposed chemical security regulations will make the country safer by requiring facilities with the most hazardous chemicals to craft their own risk assessments and security plans to address their specific vulnerabilities. All plans, however, must meet the department's minimum "performance standards," which amount to setting specific security targets, such as protecting chemical-tank cars from weapons fire. But how a particular facility chooses to do that -- such as enclosing them with walls or burying them -- would be up to the individual chemical plant.

The department would review the assessments and plans, requiring facilities that fail to meet standards to go back to the drawing board. Fines for noncompliance could reach $25,000 a day, and for serious breaches the department could close the facility.

"We are not proscribing method, we are simply demanding results," Mr. Chertoff said. "The idea is to be aggressive and comprehensive, but also let industry figure out the way they want to achieve the outcome."

While chemical-industry executives haven't seen the rules in their proposed form, industry representatives had consulted some with the department during their development and they support the general thrust of the approach.

"We think risk-based performance standards, vulnerability assessments and security plans are exactly the way to go," said Ted Cromwell, senior director of Security and Operations for the American Chemistry Council, which represents the country's leading chemical companies, including Dow Chemical, DuPont and BASF. He said the individual-plant approach offers the best security because it "tailors measures to specific vulnerabilities."

Railways and chemical plants have long been identified as the country's most gaping security vulnerabilities. Hundreds of thousands of hazardous-chemical shipments travel unsecured by rail across the country every day. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, there are 7,728 U.S. chemical plants where an accident -- or act of sabotage -- could endanger 1,000 or more nearby residents. However, efforts to make chemical shipments and facilities more resistant to sabotage have languished for years as industry and the White House opposed the imposition of onerous regulation.

The standoff ended in a three-year stop-gap law that was hastily made part of the DHS appropriations bill in September and signed by President Bush on Oct. 4. The chemical industry and the administration worked with Congress on the law, which in many ways limits how far the Homeland Security secretary can go in prescribing measures not backed by industry, such as forcing plants to substitute safer alternative chemicals for dangerous ones.

The latest regulations will be scrutinized by congressional leaders. Democrats say they hope to begin moving permanent chemical-security legislation next year and incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson, has indicated Congress may impose stricter requirements on rail and chemical plants than those proposed by the administration.

Report Says TSA Violated Privacy Law (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Secure Flight, the U.S. government's stalled program to screen domestic air passengers against terrorism watch lists, violated federal law during a crucial test phase, according to a report to be issued today by the Homeland Security Department's privacy office.

The agency found that by gathering passenger data from commercial brokers in 2004 without notifying the passengers, the program violated a 1974 Privacy Act requirement that the public be made aware of any changes in a federal program that affects the privacy of U.S. citizens. "As ultimately implemented, the commercial data test conducted in connection with the Secure Flight program testing did not match [the Transportation Security Administration's] public announcements," the report states.

The finding marks the first time that the Homeland Security Department has acknowledged that the problem-plagued Secure Flight program has violated the law. It comes at a time when a separate program to screen international passengers is under attack for officials' failure to disclose until recently that they were creating passenger profiles that would be stored for 40 years.

The report on Secure Flight says that "the disparity between what TSA proposed to do and what it actually did in the testing program resulted in significant privacy concerns being raised. . . . Privacy missteps such as these undercut an agency's effort to implement a program effectively, even one that promises to improve security."

Congress has halted Secure Flight, except for testing, until it can allay privacy and security concerns.

The report notes that TSA eventually revised its public notice about the program to reflect more closely the program itself. But it also suggests that Secure Flight will run afoul of the law again unless it follows a set of recommendations, including being transparent about the program's collection and use of passengers' personal information.

TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said that he supports the use of Secure Flight and that his agency is working closely with other government officials to ensure it protects privacy. "We are working in a transparent way," Hawley said, adding that the agency's "challenging" goal is to roll out the program in 2008.

In 2004, the TSA published a Federal Register notice on a data-test phase of the program, saying that "strict firewalls" would prevent any commercial data from mixing with government data. However, this was based on the notion that the Secure Flight contractor, EagleForce Associates Inc. of McLean, would ensure that no commercial data were used, the report said.

But by the time the EagleForce contract was finalized, "it was clear that TSA would receive commercial data," the report says. If, for instance, TSA data for an individual passenger lacked an address or date of birth, EagleForce would obtain the missing information from commercial data brokers.

"The fact that EagleForce had access to the commercial data did not create a firewall," the report says, because under the Privacy Act, in effect, "EagleForce stands in the shoes of TSA."

Moreover, commercial databases provided Eagle Force with data for some individuals who were not air passengers. These people were never notified -- a violation of the privacy act, the report says.

TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said the agency has "already implemented or is in the process of implementing" the recommendations contained in the privacy office report. She said the report's conclusions were not surprising, adding that they were "very similar" to those reached last year by the General Accounting Office, the government's auditing arm.

A 2004 probe found that the TSA improperly stored 100 million commercial data records containing personal information on passengers after the agency said no data storage would occur.

Audit Finds Lack Of Financial Controls At Homeland Security (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security lacks adequate financial controls three years after its creation, an independent audit found. The auditing firm KPMG LLP said for the third straight year that it could not provide an opinion on the balance sheet of the $40.3 billion department, the second-largest federal agency, because of its lax financial controls and oversight. The department last year hired a chief financial officer, David Norquist, for the first time. In a Nov. 15 letter, Mr. Norquist wrote: “We agree with the independent public accountant’s conclusions. Since my arrival at the department I have made corrective actions my highest priority.”

Anti-terror Laws Stymie Asylum Seekers (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

WASHINGTON — The first time they came for her, the Colombian guerrillas shoved the 31-year-old nurse blindfolded into the back of a green Renault sedan. Her kidnappers took her to a house and forced her to treat one of their commandants, who was writhing in pain from a bullet wound to the leg.

The woman said she was abducted seven more times in 1997 and 1998 to give medical care to members of the Revolutionary Armed Forces. Each time, they warned her not to go to the police. "I know you have a daughter," one man said as he prodded her back with his gun. In 2000, after her cousin was tortured and killed, she fled the country. Now she is in Northern California, working as a nurse and raising her daughter.

Today, her hopes of staying in the U.S. have run smack into the federal government's war on terrorism. The Department of Homeland Security rejected her claim for asylum. Their reason: By giving the guerrillas medical care — willingly or not — she was supporting terrorism.

Laws passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, deny admission to anyone who has provided "material support" — money, food, clothing, advice — to terrorist groups. In the last few years, these provisions and the definition of terrorism have been expanded to the point that they are disqualifying people who even immigration judges agree pose no threat to the U.S.

Refugee advocates cite cases in which the administration has denied asylum to Liberian women forced to cook and clean for rebels who raped them and killed family members. Colombians who paid kidnappers' ransoms to free family members also have been barred for providing material support. So many refugee applicants have been blocked for this reason that last year the United Nations Refugee Agency stopped trying to settle Colombians in the U.S.

Critics of the government's policy, who are pushing for legislation next year to change the system, say that such disqualifications are a big reason why refugee admissions in fiscal 2006 fell to 41,277 from more than 50,000 in each of the two previous years.

The material-support clause has even snared American allies who fought alongside U.S. troops or at the United States' behest. Cubans who tried to overthrow Fidel Castro in the Bay of Pigs uprising are being denied entry, as are Montagnards and Hmong who fought alongside American troops in Vietnam.

About 2,300 former combatants who have been admitted to the U.S. are unable to apply for permanent legal resident status, a step toward citizenship, because they fear that immigration judges would have to deport them under the expanded definition of terrorism, said Cassandra Champion, director of communications for the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service.

The administration defines a terrorist organization as any group of two or more people, organized or not, that uses any device or weapon to cause injury to person or property. Motive is not a consideration, the person's frame of mind is not an issue, and no exceptions are made if someone, like the Colombian nurse, helped a designated terrorist group only at gunpoint.

"They knew about my daughter; they knew where my parents are; they can make you disappear, and there's nobody in my country who can help you," said the nurse, now 40, in a phone interview. She asked that her name not be used because she feared for the safety of family in Colombia. "What would you do? I never did anything because I wanted to."

Unless she wins an appeal in court, she faces deportation.

Administration officials say they are trying to strike a balance between honoring the American tradition of welcoming asylum-seekers and refugees while managing the security risks of a world transformed by Sept. 11. That kind of transition takes time, they say.

"The president has said he wants to let refugees in," said Paul Rosenzweig, a senior policy advisor at the Homeland Security Department. "In the same vein, he's said he doesn't want to let dangerous people in. The conundrum is that this law applies to both, and the process of sorting them out is not as easy as waving a magic wand."

The government's policy has brought opposition from an unlikely alliance of conservatives, refugee advocates and constitutional experts, who say the Bush administration is clinging to the harshest possible interpretation of the laws.

Michael Horowitz, a former Reagan administration official and senior fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute, is critical of the administration's stance — particularly as it applies to "freedom fighters" and the broad definition of terrorism. He notes that, as written, it would apply to Jews who rose up against the Nazis in the Warsaw Ghetto.

"The administration is being undermined by this caricature of conservatism that is victimizing heroes," Horowitz said. "How does it advance national security when we're defining as terrorists people who fought on our side?"

Refugee advocates have been campaigning for change since the provisions were expanded by the Patriot Act in 2001 and the Real ID Act of 2005. Lately, there have been signs that change may be coming.

This month, the administration sent suggested revisions to Republican lawmakers, in the hope that they would be passed before the 109th Congress adjourned. That didn't happen, and now Homeland Security officials say they hope for legislation next year.

The administration's proposals would expand the use of government-issued waivers that allow an otherwise banned group or person into the country. Only three such waivers have ever been issued.

Though the waivers can cover people who offered material support to so-called freedom fighters, they do not extend to the fighters themselves. The administration proposes to expand the waivers to include freedom fighters, but only if Homeland Security, the Justice Department and the State Department agree. The administration would be able to revoke the waiver at any time, for any reason.

Advocates say the government's unlimited ability to revoke a waiver means refugees entering the country that way could never feel entirely secure. "They're taking a bad problem and seemingly making it worse," said Melanie Nezer of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society.

Rosenzweig said the ability to revoke waivers was to ensure that the government could reverse course if someone did turn out to be a threat.

With Democrats at the helm in Congress, hearings on the topic are likely next year, according to Capitol Hill sources.

Staff for Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) say he will reintroduce legislation that immigrant advocates strongly support. His bill would amend the definition of terrorism to apply only to those who threatened the interests of the U.S. or its allies.

"We recognize that there are some people who meet the definition who aren't in actuality a threat," said Rachel Brand, head of the Justice Department's legal policy office. "The answer to that is to waive them in, not change the definition.... Narrowing the definition would make it harder to exclude people who are actual threats."

Refugee advocates say Brand's worries are unfounded. "Refugees already go through so many security checks. They are fingerprinted, run through FBI databases ... they're a very tightly screened group," said Jana Mason of the International Rescue Committee.

The Pitts bill would also address cases like that of the Colombian nurse, making it clear that people coerced into helping terrorists would not be considered supporters of terrorism.

Administration officials say they can't be sure that refugees' tales of coercion are true. They add that accepting such a defense could weaken their terrorism prosecutions if defendants start arguing that they were forced to participate.

Rosenzweig also cited philosophical reasons for rejecting a duress defense. "We should encourage people to oppose terrorist organizations wherever they are," he said.

Refugee advocates say opposing terrorists is not so easy when a loved one has been kidnapped for ransom.

Said Horowitz: "Any one of us would hand over money if someone held a gun to our child's head."

WAR NEWS:

8 Marines Charged In Haditha Killings (LAT)

By Richard Marosi And Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON — Four Marines were charged today with murder and other offenses in connection with the killings last year of 24 men, women and children in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Four Marine Corp. officers were charged with dereliction of duty for failing to make accurate reports and thoroughly investigate the deaths of the Iraqi civilians.

The most serious accusations were leveled against a squad leader, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, who allegedly murdered 12 people and ordered Marines under his command to "shoot first and ask questions later" in a sweep of homes that led to six more deaths.

The Marines allegedly went on a rampage on Nov. 19, 2005, after a roadside bomb exploded beneath one of the Hummers in their convoy, killing a Marine and injuring two others. Initial reports from the Marines stated that 15 civilians died in an explosion and eight Iraqis were killed in a firefight.

Only after Time magazine published an investigative story suggesting that the Marine account was false did the military begin its own investigations. The criminal investigation, largely by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, led to the charges unveiled today.

Wuterich and other Marines were preparing to storm a house containing several people when Wuterich gave the order to "shoot first and ask questions later," showing wanton disregard for human life, according to the charge sheet. Marines are required to positively identify targets before an engagement, according to the charges.

The victims in Haditha included several women, six children and an elderly man in a wheelchair.

Wuterich also allegedly made a false statement to another Marine in connection with the deaths of four other victims who came upon the Marine convoy in a car, stating that the men had fired on the convoy. Wuterich allegedly solicited another Marine to falsely state that the Iraqi men had been killed by Iraqi soldiers.

Neal Puckett, Wuterich's defense attorney, expressed confidence that his client would be cleared. Innocent civilians did die, he said, but Wuterich acted in accordance with his training.

"Everything he did that day was in an effort to protect his fellow Marines after that [improvised explosive device] went off," said Puckett at a news conference after the charges were announced at Camp Pendleton.

Defense attorneys have said the Marines were following established rules of engagement by tossing fragmentation grenades into homes where insurgents were suspected of hiding, and following up with blasts of M-16 fire.

Wuterich and the other three Marines facing murder counts were charged with unpremeditated murder, which brings a maximum penalty of a life sentence. They are from Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, based at Camp Pendleton. None of the Marines were ordered to be confined during the preliminary hearings.

The other Marines facing murder charges are: Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22; and Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24.

Theresa Sharratt, the mother of Justin, who was charged with murdering three people, denied her son was guilty. "He said, 'Mom, we followed the rules of engagement.' " She added that her son "still loves being a Marine, but they let him down."

The Haditha case represents the most serious case of alleged abuse committed by in Iraq or Afghanistan.

The Marine Corps initially dismissed the deaths as the unfortunate result of a firefight between insurgents and U.S. forces.

Dereliction of duty charges for failing to make accurate reports and thoroughly investigate the incident were filed against four officers: Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 1st Lt. Andrew A. Grayson, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell and Capt. Randy W. Stone. Grayson was also charged with making a false statement.

After the Time magazine story, the then-Marine commandant, Gen. Michael Hagee, went to Iraq to talk to front-line Marines about the need to use restraint and show respect for civilians and their property.

In an e-mail this week to The Times, Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, the convening authority in the case, said that "allegations of what took place in Haditha are not representative of the magnificent conduct our Marines demonstrate daily in a complex and challenging combat environment."

He said that young Marines in Iraq need to "keep their ethical balance under morally bruising conditions," where enemy fighters often hide behind women and children.

He said that Marines show daily restraint "to preserve the lives of those they are sent to protect and defend; often incurring risk to themselves as they strive to protect the noncombatants on the battlefield."

Under the military system of justice, Mattis will play an enormous role in the case.

After preliminary hearings, called Article 32s, he will decide whether the case is strong enough for court-martial. If there is a conviction by jury or judge, he can overturn it. And he is the final arbiter of any plea bargains.

DOJ_NMG_0108403

In another case in Hamandiya, where seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were accused of dragging an Iraqi from his home and murdering him, Mattis permitted plea bargains to lesser charges for the four most inexperienced Marines.

He also turned down a judge's recommendation that after the brig sentences, each be given an dishonorable discharge.

The Haditha case may hinge on the so-called rules of engagement given to Marines by their superiors.

Marines receive lectures about the laws of war and the need to protect noncombatants before they leave the U.S. and soon after they arrive in Iraq. Refresher courses, so-called reset lectures, are given periodically.

In fact, even as the Haditha charges were being announced, Marines were being lectured at Camp Fallouja about the laws of war and the rules of engagement.

The latter are classified rules that, in effect, instruct Marines when it is appropriate to use deadly force — including how much verification is needed before it can be determined that a threat justifies the use of M-16s and other weaponry.

Marines Charged In Iraqi Civilian Deaths (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, December 22, 2006

Eight Marines were charged Thursday in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians last year during a bloody, door-to-door sweep in the town of Haditha that came after one of their comrades was killed by a roadside bomb.

In the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths to come out of the Iraq war, four of the Marines — all enlisted men — were charged with unpremeditated murder.

The other four were officers who were not there during the killings but were accused of failures in investigating and reporting the deaths.

The most serious charges were brought against Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, a 26-year-old squad leader accused of murdering 12 civilians and ordering the murders of six more inside a house cleared by his squad. He was accused of telling his men to "shoot first and ask questions later," according to court papers released by his attorney.

The highest-ranking defendant was Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, 42. He was accused of failing to obey an order or regulation, encompassing dereliction of duty.

At a news conference to announce the charges, military officials would not say what they believe prompted the killings. But investigators have raised the possibility that the men went on a rampage in a fury over the roadside bombing that killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso, Texas, and wounded two other Marines.

Defense attorneys have disputed that, saying their clients were doing what they had been trained to do: responding to a perceived threat with legitimate force.

Terrazas' father denounced the charges, saying his son was murdered by insurgents. "What they are doing to our troops ... it's just wrong," Martin Terrazas said in Texas. "I feel for their families. They are in my prayers."

Wuterich and two comrades charged with murder could get life in prison. The military is not seeking the death penalty. The other men face shorter prison sentences.

The Marine Corps initially reported that 15 Iraqis died in a roadside bomb blast and that Marines killed eight insurgents in an ensuing firefight. That account was widely discredited, and later reports put the number of dead Iraqis at 24.

A criminal probe was launched after Time magazine reported in March, citing survivor accounts and human rights groups, that innocent people were killed.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis, commanding general of the Marine Corps Central Command, said Thursday that the Corps' initial news release, which stated that the civilians in Haditha had been killed by an improvised explosive device, was incorrect.

"We now know with certainty that the press release was incorrect, and that none of the civilians were killed by the IED explosion," Mattis said.

As word spread that charges were imminent, some Iraqis said Thursday that American troops should face justice in Iraq.

"They committed a horrible crime against innocents," Naji al-Ani, a 36-year-old laborer, said by telephone from Haditha.

Other residents of Haditha agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0108404

"Are they terrorists or are they fighting terrorism?" said Jamal al-Obaidi, a 40-year-old teacher. "The trial is not fair because it is taking place in America. Executing them is the minimum penalty."

Besides Wuterich, Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, was accused of the unpremeditated murders of five people and making a false statement. Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Pa., was charged with the unpremeditated murder of three Iraqis. Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla., was accused of the unpremeditated murders of two Iraqis, negligent homicide of four Iraqis and assault.

The other officers charged were 1st Lt. Andrew Grayson, 25, Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, and Capt. Randy Stone, 34, a military attorney.

The men are not being locked up for now because they are unlikely to flee and are not a danger to themselves or others, said Col. Stewart Navarre, a Corps spokesman.

In Meriden, Conn., Frank Wuterich's father, Dave, said his son was out Christmas shopping. The father said family members believe his son's version of events.

"He says they followed the rules of engagement," Dave Wuterich said. "They were taking small arms fire. They did what they had to do."

Squad Leader, 7 Other Marines Charged With Deaths Of Iraqi Civilians (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 22, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. — The Marine Corps leveled homicide charges Thursday against four enlisted men who killed 24 Iraqi civilians in the hostile town of Haditha, and accused four officers of failing to properly investigate the deaths.

All of the enlisted men were charged with unpremeditated murder in the biggest U.S. criminal case to be prosecuted out of the Iraq war. Each could receive a life sentence if convicted.

"The Marine Corps takes allegations of wrongdoing by Marines very seriously and is committed to thoroughly investigating such allegations," Col. Stewart Navarre said. "All Marines are trained in and are expected to fully comply with the law of armed conflict."

Lawyers for the accused vowed to fight the charges and said the Marines were caught in a life-or-death confrontation that led to the unintentional deaths of civilians.

The "very dangerous environment" for Marines in Iraq "puts people on a hair trigger in terms of protecting themselves," said Neal Puckett, a lawyer representing Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich.

The defendants accused of unlawful killing during the Nov. 19, 2005, incident were four members of a rifle squad, led by Wuterich, from Camp Pendleton-based Kilo Company, 3rd Marine Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment. The battalion commander at the time, Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, 42, and the company commander, Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, were among officers charged with dereliction of duty for failing to properly report and investigate the slayings.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis, head of Marine Forces Central Command, authorized the criminal charges under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Charges included unpremeditated murder, negligent homicide, assault, dereliction, making false official statements and obstructing justice.

Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn., was charged with unpremeditated murder in the deaths of 18 Iraqis. Three squadmates — Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 22, Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, and Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25 — were charged with unlawfully killing three, five and six civilians, respectively. The maximum penalty for unpremeditated murder on conviction by a general court-martial is life in prison.

Chessani and McConnell were relieved of command in April. Maximum penalty for dereliction is six months confinement.

Haditha is a Euphrates River farm town of 90,000 about 150 miles northwest of Baghdad in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-led insurgency. Nineteen civilians in three houses and five people in a taxi were killed there in the course of five hours of Marines' weapons fire after a roadside bomb killed a Marine traveling in the squad's convoy.

The Iraqis who died included four women, six children and an elderly man who used a wheelchair.

Soon after the incident, a Marine Corps news release said that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed by the roadside bomb and that Marines killed eight insurgents in an ensuing firefight. Navarre said Thursday that the release was incorrect and that none of the civilians was killed by the improvised explosive device.

Mattis allowed the eight defendants to remain unconfined pending a preliminary hearing, at which a presiding officer will recommend to him whether to order courts-martial or dismiss the charges. Timing of the charges during the holidays was "coincidental," Navarre said.

Only 20 of the 24 civilians who died at Haditha were named as homicide victims. Navarre said it was "privileged information" why four of the deaths were not considered to warrant criminal charges.

Puckett, the lawyer for Wuterich, said his client denies "killing anyone unlawfully" and denies the charge that he made a false official statement.

"They did everything they were supposed to do that day in protecting themselves," Puckett said. The squad "engaged hostile forces" in places that "contained innocent civilians," an unfortunate but common occurrence in war, Puckett said.

The parents and sister of Sharratt, a rifleman from Carbondale, Pa., defended his actions.

"Justin has given everything to his country and has done nothing to disgrace it," said Sharratt's mother, Theresa Sharratt. "To the Marine Corps I simply say: Shame on you - for abandoning my son."

Capt. Randy Stone, 34, who was the military lawyer on Chessani's battalion staff, was alleged to have been derelict in failing to report a possible "violation of the law of war" to higher headquarters. Facing a similar count is 1st Lt. Andrew Grayson, 25, who directed a team that collected photos and other evidence at Haditha.

8 Marines Charged In Killings Of Iraqi Civilians (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer And Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

Responding to one of the most extreme cases of illegal civilian killings by the American troops in Iraq, the Marine Corps today charged four enlisted men with the murders of nearly two dozen people — including at least 10 women and children — in the village of Haditha last year.

Military prosecutors also charged four officers, including a lieutenant colonel in charge of the First Marine Regiment's 3rd Battalion, with dereliction of duty and failing to ensure that accurate information about the killings was delivered up the Marine Corps chain of command.

Marine officials, who announced the charges at Camp Pendleton, Calif., could punish other ranking officers administratively in coming weeks. But the criminal charges filed today against Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 42, and three other officers are an unusually aggressive judicial reaction by military prosecutors to a massacre that has damaged the military's credibility with Iraqi officials and civilians, military justice experts said.

"I think this illustrates the deep seriousness the Marine Corps takes with these events," said Gary Solis, who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University Law Center and at West Point.

"I defintely think the Marine Corps is sending a message to commanders," he added, "to those in authority of combat troops, that they better pay close attention to the activities of their subordinates to ensure that there was no wrongdoing."

The four enlisted men charged with unpremeditated murder, all members of a squad of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment, are: Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn.; Sgt. Sanick De La Cruz, 24, of Chicago; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Penn.; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla.

Sgt. Wuterich was charged with killing 13 Iraqis. Sgt. De La Cruz, a Lance Corporal at the time, was charged with five counts of murder. Lance Cpl. Sharratt, a marine rifleman, was charged with three counts of murder. Lance Cpl. Tatum was charged with murder in the death of two Iraqis, negligent homicide in the deaths of four others, and assault.

The charges are the result of two months-long military investigations of the actions of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment after a roadside bomb killed one of their comrades shortly after 7 a.m. on Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha, a village in a dangerous region northwest of Baghdad rife with Sunni Arab insurgents.

A total of 24 Iraqis, nearly all of them unarmed, were killed by several marines in a series of attacks on a car and three nearby homes over the next several hours, military officials said.

Sgt. Wuterich and Sgt. De La Cruz confronted five military-age men, a taxi driver and and four college students, after marines frantically ordered the vehicle to stop, about 100 yards from the stalled marine convoy of four Humvees. The two marines killed all five men after ordering them out of the taxi, marine officials said.

Several marines then attacked a home nearby, killing several family members inside, military officials and defense lawyer said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing six people in the house. Lance Cpl. Tatum is charged with killing four people, including an elderly man in a wheelchair.

Thinking they were under fire and believing they were pursuing attackers from the first home, squad members proceeded to a second home, defense lawyers said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing six people in that house: two adults and four children, including three who were 4, 6 and 11 years old.

Lance Cpl. Tatum is charged with killing two children in the second house: a 15-year-old boy and girl who was about six years old.

At least two hours later, squad members attacked people in a third home nearby, where one AK-47 was found later, military officials and defense lawyers have said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing the first person in that house. Lance Cpl. Sharrat is charged with the murders of three brothers who rushed to the home to inquire what was happening, military officials have said.

In all, Sgt. Wuterich was charged with 13 counts of murder, falsely telling an investigator that the men from the taxi fired at the convoy, and with urging Sgt. De La Cruz to report that those men were killed by Iraqi Army soldiers at the scene.

Lance Cpl. Sharratt was charged with three counts of murder, and Lance Cpl. Tatum was charged with murder in the death of two Iraqis, negligent homicide in the deaths of four others, and assault.

The lawyers for all four enlisted men declared their clients' innocence, arguing in separate statements that the killings were an unfortunate result of marines properly responding to an insurgent attack in a dangerous area northwest of Baghdad.

Sgt. Wuterich and his men, "did everything they were supposed to do that day to protect themselves," said his lawyer Neal A. Puckett.

In addition to Lt. Col. Chessani, prosecutors charged two captains and a 1st lieutenant with crimes for either covering up or failing to discover and pass along certain facts about the killings.

"The reporting of the incident up the chain of command was inaccurate and untimely," Col. Stewart Navarre said at a news conference at Camp Pendleton, Calif., announcing the charges.

Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, 31, the Company K commander, was charged with dereliction of duty for willfully failing to ensure a thorough investigation; Capt. Randy W. Stone, 34, a military lawyer for the Third Battalion, was charged with dereliction of duty for failing to investigate suspected violations; and 1st Lt.

A marine intelligence officer who was part of a team that photographed the aftermath of the killings, Andrew A. Grayson, 25, was charged with dereliction of duty failure to ensure a thorough investigation, making a false official statement and obstruction of justice.

The murder charges against the four enlisted marines are punishable by a maximum of life in prison and dishonorable discharge, the marines said.

The charges filed against four officers carry significantly less potential prison time — two years for Lt. Col. Chessani and Capt. Stone; six months for Capt. McConnell; and more than 10 years for 1st Lt. Grayson — as well as the prospect of dismissal and forfeiture of pay.

None of the eight marines charged enterered a plea Thursday. Formal reviews, known as Article 32 hearings, to determine whether the charges warrant court martial, could begin for each man as early as next month, Mr. Solis said.

Defense lawyers and military justice experts said that in addition the unusually tough overall charges against the eight marines in the Haditha matter, the charges against Capt. Stone, a military lawyer known as a staff judge advocate, or S.J.A., were the most surprising and least expected.

"Stone has come as a complete surprise to everybody," said Kevin B. McDermott, a lawyer for Capt. McConnell. "His name had never come up at all in the last six, eight months. Nobody every thought that an SJA would be put in the crosshairs."

4 Marines Charged In Haditha Killings (WP)

By Josh White And Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Four U.S. Marines were charged with multiple counts of murder yesterday for their alleged roles in the deaths of two dozen civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last year. The accusations set up what could be the highest-profile atrocity prosecution to arise from the Iraq war.

In an unusual move, the Marine Corps also charged four officers with crimes related to their alleged failure to investigate and report the Nov. 19, 2005, slayings, which occurred when the Marines conducted a house-to-house sweep and attacked a vehicle after a member of their unit was killed in an ambush.

The separate investigation into how the incident was reported led to dereliction charges against a lieutenant colonel, two captains and a first lieutenant. They are accused of failing to thoroughly investigate and accurately report the slayings to superiors. The lieutenant also faces charges of making a false official statement and obstructing justice, according to the Marine Corps.

None of the murder charges carries a possible death sentence, because the Marines are not accused of premeditated murder. But the charging documents indicate that they did not properly identify their targets, did intend to kill the people in the houses and should have known that their actions could lead to the deaths of innocent civilians.

The 24 civilians were killed in a neighborhood near the spot where a roadside bomb killed a Marine who was driving in a convoy of Humvees. Early media reports suggested that the Marines went on a rampage after Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas was killed, but they have claimed through their defense lawyers that they were following their rules of engagement when they responded to the attack.

It took the Marine Corps 13 months to charge the men in part because initial reports about the case delivered up the chain of command were incomplete; a public affairs statement about the incident was incorrect; and investigators were not brought in until months later, after a Time magazine reporter asked about the case. Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have been investigating since March.

Attention to the case increased earlier this year when Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) alleged after briefings from military officials that the Marines had killed civilians "in cold blood."

In a news conference yesterday afternoon at Camp Pendleton, a Marine base north of San Diego, Col. Stewart Navarre declined to comment on details of the cases.

Each of the Marines was charged in multiple slayings, but Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, 26, a squad leader with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, was implicated in 18 deaths. Wuterich faces 13 counts of unpremeditated murder.

Kathleen A. Duignan, executive director of the Washington-based National Institute of Military Justice, said: "I think they know they can't prove premeditated murder, because you need to prove intent." She said prosecutors probably will argue that the Marines did not take due and deliberate care and did not follow rules of engagement.

Defense attorneys are likely to argue that the Marines were following the rules while taking fire and simply made mistakes. Duignan said the case falls into a gray area, where lawful combat could blur into unlawful action.

"It's a very fine line," Duignan said. "It will be a very difficult yet very interesting case."

The charge sheets allege that the Marines failed to properly identify their targets and that Wuterich told his unit to "shoot first and ask questions later."

Iraqis in Haditha have described the incident as a massacre, saying Marines went from house to house indiscriminately shooting at men, women and children. One witness told The Washington Post in May that victims pleaded for their lives and said they were not insurgents, moments before they were shot.

Wuterich has long claimed, through his lawyers, that he was responding to a coordinated attack on his unit and did nothing wrong that day. He and other Marines have told their lawyers that they received small-arms fire from the houses they attacked. They used standard house-clearing techniques to ensure that the threat against them was eliminated from two houses, they have said. The slayings of the civilians -- including women and children -- were an unfortunate result of the Marines' attack, they have argued.

Neal Puckett, one of Wuterich's civilian attorneys, said in an interview yesterday that the allegations do not contradict Wuterich's version of events. Puckett said there is no evidence that the Marines lost control or went on some sort of a rampage.

"It's what happens in wartime. You intend to kill the people you're shooting at," Puckett said. "It would imply that they have no proof of a sweep conducted to punish Iraqis."

Wuterich was later recommended for an award for heroism that said his efforts prevented further injury or death to Marines and civilians.

Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, is charged with three counts of unpremeditated murder, apparently for the deaths of three men he allegedly shot in a third house the Marines entered later on Nov. 19.

Sharratt has maintained his innocence to his family. His parents, Theresa and Daryl Sharratt, were at Camp Pendleton when the charges were announced. In an e-mailed statement, Theresa Sharratt said she believes the Marine Corps has let her son down.

"Justin has given everything to his country and has done nothing to disgrace it," she wrote. "To the Marine Corps I simply say, 'shame on you for abandoning my son who has gallantly served through horrible times.' "

Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, faces five charges of unpremeditated murder for allegedly killing a group of men who approached the Marine convoy in a white car that morning after the bomb blast. Marines who were on the scene have alleged that Dela Cruz emptied his rifle's clip into the victims' bodies. The Marine Corps alleges that he also lied to investigators after the incident.

Also charged with two counts of unpremeditated murder is Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, who joined Wuterich as he cleared the Haditha houses. Tatum also faces four counts of negligent homicide -- which carry a maximum punishment of three years in prison -- and one charge of assault.

Charges in such a case are the first step in the military's legal process and will be followed by an Article 32 hearing, which is roughly equivalent to a civilian grand jury investigation. After that hearing, an investigating officer will recommend how to proceed, and commanders will decide whether the cases should go to courts-martial.

The four Marines charged in the slayings face possible sentences of life in prison. The four officers face much lighter sentences.

They are charged with dereliction for failing to report the incident to superiors and failing to initiate an investigation. None of the officers was at the scene when the slayings occurred. A young lieutenant platoon leader who arrived shortly after the shootings is not accused in the case.

Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 42, the Marines' battalion commander, was charged with one count of violating an order, which carries a maximum sentence of two years in prison, and two counts of dereliction, each of which carries a six-month sentence. Capt. Randy W. Stone, 34, the battalion's staff judge advocate, faces similar accusations. Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, 31, the Marines' company commander, is charged with two counts of dereliction. Lt. Andrew A. Grayson, 25, an intelligence officer, faces two dereliction counts, one count of making a false official statement and one count of obstructing justice.

In a statement to investigators, Chessani said he believed that the Marines' actions followed a complex attack meant to draw them into firing on civilian houses. He said he reported to superiors that civilians had been killed.

"I thought it was very sad, very unfortunate, but at the time I did not suspect any wrongdoing from my Marines," Chessani told investigators, according to a transcript. "I saw it as a combat action."

The four officers are the largest number charged in any one civilian homicide case from the Iraq war and bring to 10 the total number of officers charged in connection with homicide cases.

Sixty-four U.S. service members have been charged in connection with the deaths of Iraqi civilians since the war began in March 2003. Eighteen have been sentenced to prison time, including a 90-year term for an Army soldier who admitted his role in raping an Iraqi teenager in Mahmudiyah and killing her and her family.

'Atrocity' Cases Test US Military Justice (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

Haditha, Hamdaniyah, and Mahmudiya - Iraqi cities where US troops are alleged to have committed wartime atrocities - may not have seared the public consciousness as deeply as did My Lai in Vietnam. But the cases, including new criminal charges filed Thursday against eight marines in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in Haditha, are sure to focus more attention on how the military handles abuse and killing of prisoners and civilians.

The serious charges brought in these cases also raise basic questions about how the US military-justice system proceeds against alleged atrocities:

What constitutes a "war crime"? What is the responsibility of officers of enlisted soldiers and marines who are found guilty? What punishments are being meted out?

Prosecution in such cases falls under the US Uniform Code of Military Justice, the Law of Armed Conflict, and the Geneva Conventions. But it is the "rules of engagement" that may be most relevant for troops going into battle.

Such rules for combat typically are set by the unit commander just before an operation begins, based on an evaluation of mission, enemy, terrain, troops, and time available, says retired Army Col. Dan Smith, a military analyst with the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Quaker lobby in Washington. But, he adds, rules of engagement "can be idiosyncratic."

Colonel Smith notes, too, that "soldiers always have the right of self-defense using even deadly force if they judge that they are in danger of suffering grievous wounds or death from enemy action."

In the Haditha case, those marines charged with killing civilians (including 10 women and children shot at close range) are expected to assert that they were fired on from houses near where their convoy was hit by an improvised explosive device (IED) that killed a lance corporal.

"Our view has been and continues to be that these are combat-related deaths," defense lawyer Gary Myers told the Associated Press. Mr. Myers represents Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, who faces one charge of murder involving unpremeditated killings of three men in a house.

Evidence gathered by military investigators contradicts that, prompting the Marine Corps to charge four of the eight marines with murder. It also led Thursday to charges against four others - unit officers not present at the scene - of failing to properly investigate and report the event. The highest-ranking officer to be charged is a lieutenant colonel, accused of failing to obey an order or regulation, encompassing dereliction of duty.

That raises questions about the responsibility of officers up the chain of command, from lieutenants leading platoons to colonels commanding brigades.

Rank should be important in assessing professional and perhaps even criminal responsibility, says Gary Solis, a 26-year Marine Corps veteran who served as a courts-martial prosecutor and judge.

"Under the law of armed conflict, if a superior knew, or should have known, of a subordinate's misconduct, and he took no action to stop it or to punish it, then he is himself personally criminally liable for the crime committed," says Dr. Solis, who directed the law of war program at West Point and now teaches at Georgetown Law School in Washington.

"That's basic World War II Nuremberg Tribunal stuff," he says. "But how often have we seen the principle honored? Not often."

During the nine-year Vietnam War, 95 soldiers and marines were convicted of murder or manslaughter of noncombatants. Courts-martial resulted in sentences as stiff as 50 years and life in prison.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, most incidents involving civilian deaths caused illegally by US forces have resulted in far lighter punishment, Solis finds.

For example, an Army chief warrant officer charged with negligent homicide in the 2003 death of an Iraqi detainee received a letter of reprimand, a fine of $6,000, and two months' restriction to Fort Carson, Colo. A sergeant involved in the beating death of an Afghan detainee in 2005 was reprimanded, given a one-grade demotion, and fined $1,000. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, the most senior officer punished was Army Reserve Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, demoted to colonel.

But dealing with detainees is very different from fighting in the heat and fog of battle, especially when the enemy emerges from or blends into the civilian populace. That situation, which troops face routinely in Iraq and Afghanistan, can lead to a difficult and potentially deadly paradox.

"Because Army personnel are trained for conventional warfare, they naturally want to kill the enemy," says national security analyst Ivan Eland of the Independent Institute, a nonpartisan think tank. "But in counterinsurgency warfare, a premium must be put on providing security for the population without killing civilians.

"This unfortunately means tighter rules of engagement, which increases US casualties," says Dr. Eland.

In Haditha, the death of one marine and injuries to two others while traveling in a convoy preceded the attacks on Iraqi civilians. The squad leader that day faces the most serious charges - murdering 12 people and ordering other marines to kill six people. His attorney said the charges carry a maximum penalty of life in prison.

Other recent cases of civilian deaths at the hands of US troops point to murderous intent.

In the Hamdaniyah case, seven marines and a Navy corpsman have been charged in the kidnap and murder of an Iraqi man, and then making it look as if he had planted an IED. So far, four have pleaded guilty to lesser charges in return for prison terms of less than two years.

In the Mahmudiya case, five Army soldiers have been charged in the rape and premeditated murder in April of a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and the murder of her parents and 5-year-old sister. One soldier pleaded guilty to avoid the death penalty. Another, a sergeant charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the crimes, accepted an "other than honorable" discharge from the Army. Cases against the others are pending.

As with civilian trials, the nature of the evidence may lead military prosecutors to conclude that negligent homicide - not premeditated murder - is the most serious case they can make.

"Even with negligent homicide, the starched and pressed judge advocate who's not been in combat has to convince a jury that the young [marines] who daily risked their lives in Iraq are unworthy of belief," says Solis, the former Marine Corps judge advocate. "That could be a hard sell, and acquittals would not surprise me."

Some experts attribute such atrocities to the stress of enduring multiple tours of duty in Iraq, as well as the very difficult circumstances of fighting an unconventional war.

"It seems to me the main point is that these incidents are symptoms of combat stress," says John Pike, director of globalsecurity.org. "The question is whether the combat stress management system is doing a good job because there are so few incidents or a bad job because these incidents happened."

Gates Meets With Iraqis On Military Aid (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 22, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates traded ideas with Iraqi leaders Thursday about boosting military assistance for the embattled government and warned Iraq's neighbors that the U.S. will be a presence in the Persian Gulf for a long time.

But on the second day of a visit to the war zone, the new Pentagon chief would not answer the key question on the minds of many, including U.S. troops: Will he recommend a short-term increase in the number of American forces in Iraq?

Speaking to reporters after meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and other Iraqi officials, Gates said the talks were "mainly on the overall approach, including the possibility of some additional assistance." He said no numbers of additional troops were discussed.

"We were really talking in broad terms," said Gates, who is in his first week as defense secretary.

Gates' visit comes as President Bush reassesses U.S. policy in the war, which is solidly opposed by the American public after 3 1/2 years of bloodshed. Among the president's options is whether to quickly add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq, in hopes of staunching the escalating violence in Baghdad and elsewhere.

In the meetings, Gates said he discussed how "with Iraqis in the lead, we can best play a supporting role" in helping bring order to the country. He said he assured the Iraqis of "the steadfastness of American support and our enduring presence in the Persian Gulf."

Earlier in the day, he said Iran and Syria are playing a negative role in the violence. A special U.S. commission, the Iraq Study Group, recently suggested a diplomatic push that would involve all of Iraq's neighbors — including Iran and Syria. Bush, however, has seemed disinclined to involve those two American nemeses.

"We need to make damned sure that the neighbors understand that we're going to be here for a long time — here being the Persian Gulf," said Gates, during a morning meeting with soldiers.

He suggested that commitment will include keeping U.S. logistics and support troops in Iraq for a lot longer than the combat forces.

Gates said he discussed with the Iraqis how their government could address the deteriorating security problems. Besides an unrelenting insurgency, killings and kidnappings between Sunnis and Shiites are approaching civil war dimensions and U.S. and civilian casualties keep rising.

"One of the strong messages I received today was the desire of the Iraqi government to take a leadership role in addressing some of the challenges that face the country, above all the security problem here in Baghdad," Gates said during a press conference with Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir.

Gates said there are several approaches that could be used to improve security, yet offered few details. He sidestepped several questions probing for more details about the possibility of boosting troop levels — an idea that has gotten mixed reviews.

After Gates met with U.S. soldiers at Camp Victory, several said the extra forces would help.

"Sir, I think we need to just keep doing what we're doing," Spc. Jason T. Green, with the 101st Military Intelligence Brigade Combat Team of the 1st Infantry Division, told Gates during a breakfast session with about 15 soldiers.

"I really think we need more troops here," Green said. "With more presence on the ground, more troops might hold them off long enough to where we can get the Iraqi Army trained up."

Military commanders worry that rushing thousands more Americans to the battlefront could prompt Iraqis to slow their effort to take control of their country.

Those concerns are "clearly a consideration" in mapping out future strategy, Gates said.

His hourlong question-and-answer session over scrambled eggs was spent largely gathering insights from those closest to the action.

When Gates asked whether adding forces would help, he got a roomful of nods and smattering of "yes, sir" responses.

"More troops would help us integrate the Iraq Army into patrols more," said Pfc. Cassandra Wallace, from the 10th Mountain Division.

The soldiers told him they think the Iraqi Army is getting better, but that it should be bigger and that many of the Iraqis are still not showing up for duty.

Gates, who later flew by helicopter to Balad Air Base west of Baghdad for a special operations briefing, did not tip his hand much to the soldiers.

Gates planned more meetings Friday before returning to the United States.

Gates, In Iraq, Hears Support For More Troops (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq Dec 21 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, talking to enlisted soldiers on his second day in Iraq, heard broad support today for a proposal to send more American forces to Iraq, an idea that has emerged as a leading option as the Bush administration considers a strategy shift.

DOJ_NMG_0108412

"I really think we need more troops here," said Specialist Jason T. Glenn, one of several soldiers at a breakfast meeting with Mr. Gates who backed the idea. "With more presence here," he said, security might improve to a point that "we can get the Iraqi Army trained up."

Mr. Gates said later, after meeting with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials, that he had discussed "the possibility of some additional assistance" with the Iraqis, but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops.

Although Bush administration officials are considering a temporary troop increase of 20,000 soldiers or more, which would raise troop levels in Iraq to more than 150,000, the idea runs counter to the desire of many American commanders for the Iraqi Army and the Iraqi police to take more responsibility for security. Mr. Gates has provided no firm signs on what he will recommend to Mr. Bush after returning from Iraq.

Still, the Bush administration may see a temporary increase as a way to regain momentum in Baghdad, where security has been deteriorating, as well as providing leverage to get Mr. Maliki to take steps sought by American officials, like moving more Iraqi troops into Baghdad and moving against sectarian militias.

At a news conference with the Iraqi defense minister, Abdul Qadir al-Obaidi, Mr. Gates said he discussed with the Iraqis was how their government could take the lead, especially in reducing the worsening violence in Baghdad.

"One of the strong messages I received today was the desire of the Iraqi government to take a leadership role in addressing some of the challenges that face the country — above all, the security problem here in Baghdad," Mr. Gates said. The talks examined "how in our partnership with the Iraqis in the lead we can best play a supporting role" in improving security, Mr. Gates added.

Mr. Gates said at the breakfast meeting with troops that the Bush administration was putting together a package of idea for reversing the violence, including new procedures for delivering reconstruction assistance quickly to places where the military has conducted operations to clear out insurgents and militias.

Mr. Gates said the first assistance to a neighborhood should come "within hours" of the end of such a clearing operation, to shows residents the tangible benefits of rejecting militants and backing the Iraqi government.

It was not clear how the soldiers who met with Mr. Gates had been selected, but in a show of hands he requested, about half said they were serving their second tour in Iraq and the rest said they were in their first deployment.

Several soldiers said the Iraqi Army and police were improving but were not competent enough for them to shift to a supporting role. Many Iraqi soldiers and police officers do not show up regularly for work, they said, and some tip off insurgents and sectarian militias about coming military operations.

"Are they ready to take it on themselves?" Mr. Gates asked, referring to the Iraqi security forces. Sgt. Christopher Coulter, an infantryman with the First Infantry Division, replied, "Not now, but they're getting a lot better"

When Mr. Gates asked, "Do you think we need more American troops?" a majority of the soldiers nodded their heads or murmured, "Yes, sir."

Iraqi Prime Minister Tells Gates He'll Let U.S. Decide On Troop 'Surge' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told visiting Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that he would let U.S. generals decide whether there is a need for a "surge" in U.S. troops deployed in Iraq, according to Iraqi officials with knowledge of the meeting.

In a news conference, Gates said his conversation with the Iraqi prime minister and defense minister included "no numbers. . . . We were really talking in broader terms."

Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir Muhammed Jassim later indicated general acceptance of an idea that has emerged as one of the chief options President Bush is considering as he reevaluates Iraq policy. "I did not say no to an increase in the number of U.S. troops," Qadir said in a brief interview after the meeting at Maliki's residence in the Green Zone. "If we need it, we need it."

DOJ_NMG_0108413

But after seeing Gates, Maliki met with Shiite Muslim members of his alliance, in a session where divisions unfolded over whether more U.S. troops were needed, said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite member of parliament who is close to Maliki. Askari, who attended the second meeting, said there was a general feeling that "there's no need for further troops."

Gates said that during his meeting with Maliki, he "emphasized . . . the steadfastness of American support" for Iraq. The message he heard back from Maliki, he said, was that the Iraqi government wants to take the lead role in solving the country's security problems -- including in the most violent zones in and around Baghdad.

According to a statement issued by the prime minister's office, Maliki told Gates that Sunni Arab insurgents and loyalists of Saddam Hussein's former Baath Party were behind the violence unfolding in the capital.

Maliki spoke in general terms about the Baghdad security plan he has developed, saying Iraqi forces were working with U.S. troops to enact the plan "according to a new vision," the statement said. Maliki's close advisers say he has proposed a two-pronged strategy in which U.S. troops would target Sunni Arab insurgents in outer Baghdad neighborhoods for four to eight weeks, while Iraqi forces would take over control of inner Baghdad.

Maliki would also launch a political offensive, which would include threats of force, to persuade radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr to agree to contain his Mahdi Army militia during the operation.

Gates has billed his trip to Iraq, launched the day after he became defense secretary earlier this week, as key to formulating his recommendations for Bush on how to reshape the U.S. approach in Iraq. But in his public comments, he gave little indication of how his two days of talks here so far with generals, enlisted soldiers and Iraqi officials have affected his views.

He had breakfast Thursday with more than a dozen enlisted soldiers who were less bashful. Along with his scrambled eggs and hash browns, Gates got an earful about the need for more personnel.

"I really think we need more troops here," said Spec. Jason Glenn, who said he operates an unmanned aerial vehicle in an intelligence unit in the 1st Infantry Division. He said he has noticed that when insurgents see a drone aircraft overhead, they simply lie low, "so I think more presence on the ground" is the answer.

"I think we do need more troops over here," agreed Pfc. Cassandra Wallace, a support soldier in the 10th Mountain Division. "More troops would help us integrate the Iraqi army into patrols here."

Asked later about his breakfast with the soldiers, Gates said he asked for their advice, and "they were not hesitant to give it." He dodged the question raised by their call for a boost in troop levels, saying, "Like most people on the front lines in a battle, they'd always like to have more forces."

There are about 140,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq, and recently there has been an intense discussion inside the Bush administration about whether to increase that by roughly 30,000 troops for six months, to try to bring security to Baghdad.

"Some say 140,000 troops is quite enough to secure Iraq," said Askari, the Shiite politician allied with Maliki. "The problem is not in the number but in the way the security plan is conducted. The concept of trying to balance between a majority and minority in Iraq, and doing plans only if the minority accepts, is the issue. Some see this as the main problem with the plan. As long as the Americans don't change this tactic, adding more troops won't matter."

Other Shiite politicians at the meeting with Maliki said U.S. and Iraqi commanders should decide whether to increase U.S. troop levels, Askari said.

Late Thursday, the Associated Press reported that Sadr had agreed to allow his supporters to return to their positions in the government and end a three-week boycott of the government begun to protest Maliki's meeting with Bush last month. Nassar al-Rubaie, head of Sadr's parliamentary bloc, denied that account.

Askari said members of the Shiite alliance, a coalition of Shiite groups that leads the government, are planning to meet with Sadr to try to persuade him to end the boycott. Others want to take stronger action and demand that he denounce the Mahdi Army's involvement in sectarian strife.

"We have to solve this for good," Askari said. "We have to have him denounce the militias for good." He added that the meeting would dovetail with Maliki's effort to persuade Sadr to lay down his arms, provided the U.S. accepts the prime minister's security plan.

But Askari said it was still unclear whether Sadr would meet with the Shiite alliance members.

ADMINISTRATION LEANS on Persian Gulf allies to help Iraq.

U.S. military officials and diplomats want Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates and other Gulf states to recognize Maliki government, send ambassadors to Baghdad and forgive more than $40 billion in Iraqi debt. Among Sunni states, only Egypt has sent an ambassador, and he was assassinated.

The problem: Most Arab states, an official says, "see the current government as...an Iranian stooge." U.S. conditions military help to counter Iran on assistance in Iraq.

Iran also becomes lever for Rice to rally "mainstream states" behind Israeli-Palestinian solution.

SOME MILITARY LEADERS aren't opposed to Iraq troop surge.

Army leaders privately tell White House they could back more soldiers if Bush provides latitude to sustain the effort through reserve call-ups. One of the first units called back to Iraq could be the Florida National Guard brigade that served in restive Ramadi in 2003.

Army Chief of Staff Schoomaker aims to link surge to pact sharing Iraq's oil revenue, as well as moves by Maliki to isolate Shiite extremists like Moqtada al-Sadr. U.S. wants Iraqis to reduce influence of Sadr -- who has ended a government boycott -- through a coalition of Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS EYE 2008 targets after Democratic sweep.

Campaign committee chief Tom Cole touts 60 seats held by Democrats in districts Bush carried twice. One aim: "Minimize retirements" among Republican members chafing at life in the minority.

"We'll be on offense," says Democratic counterpart Chris Van Hollen, noting that most of those 60 won with at least 55%. Democrats enjoy more favorable 2008 Senate terrain, defending 12 seats to Republicans' 21. Potential retirement of Colorado Republican Sen. Allard represents a pickup opportunity.

Warner of Virginia and Domenici of New Mexico, who will be 81 and 76 by Election Day, signal re-election bids.

BIDEN TIME? After Bayh exits Democrats' 2008 presidential race, Biden's camp insists he's in. One adviser notes the Delaware Democrat's $5.5 million raised through September represents more new money than most would-be rivals to Clinton and Obama. The 34-year Senate veteran will announce an exploratory committee after New Year's, citing foreign-policy experience and the fact that he has never lived in Washington.

GREETINGS: The NRA, which had a deer on holiday card after Republicans' 2004 victory, this year features a tree emblazoned with "Peace on Earth." Card from Republican media firm Brabender Cox reads "Jingle Upsets Prancer," adding, "The extent of voter anger took a lot of people by surprise this year."

HU IN 2008? At Strategic Economic Dialogue with Paulson and other officials, Chinese government voices interest in U.S. ethanol program to ease energy squeeze. China is third after Brazil and the U.S. in ethanol production. Energy Secretary Bodman invites Chinese counterparts to visit U.S. research labs.

FRIENDLY SKIES: A local politician, Prince George's County, Md., executive Jack Johnson, makes blogger Howard Mortman's list of 10 funniest political quotes of 2006 for saying taxpayers want him flying first class. "I don't think they expect me to be riding in a seat with four across and I'm in the middle," Johnson said after winning re-election.

DEMOCRATS INSIST they'll work with White House on trade.

In closed-door meeting, a Pelosi adviser tells National Foreign Trade Council the next speaker will push labor's concerns but opposes protectionism. "We are willing to talk" with the administration, adviser Arshi Siddiqui says, if White House avoids "take it or leave it" stance.

Skepticism mounts on Doha deal during Bush's term. But Trade Representative Schwab seeks to ease political tensions, citing role of labor concerns in talks on bilateral deal with Panama.

Bush Caved To Pressure On Troops (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

President Bush only acceded to a jump in the number of U.S. Army and Marine Corps ground troops after intense pressure from senior officers, active and retired, including the Joint Chiefs, defense sources said.

Mr. Bush, who announced Wednesday that he will increase an active force that now stands at 1.4 million personnel, this month heard about the stressed Army and Marines Corps from a group of retired officers at the Pentagon.

But the deal-clincher came when he traveled to the Pentagon and met with the six-member Joint Chiefs inside the super-secret "tank."

There, the commander in chief listened to a request for more combat forces from Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant, said defense sources briefed on the meeting.

The Army, with a little more than 500,000 active soldiers, is pulling the brunt of the war on terror both in Afghanistan and Iraq. Army combat brigade teams only receive about a 13-month home-base stay before deploying again. What's more, the Army is fast wearing out its inventory of armored vehicles and weapons and needs replacements fast, Gen. Schoomaker has said.

The Marines, who patrol the al Qaeda-infested al Anbar province, west of Baghdad, send 1st and 2nd expeditionary forces on seven-month rotations. Marine officers have complained of insufficient troop numbers to control the Sunni Muslim province.

The messages on a larger armed forces, but not necessarily a troop increase for Iraq, came in rapid succession earlier this month. On Dec. 11, Mr. Bush welcomed to the White House two outside military analysts and three retired officers, including former Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, a critic of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gen. McCaffrey said in a previous interview that the Army should be increased by 80,000 soldiers.

"We have inadequate Army and Marine Corps combat power to sustain this level of deployment," said Gen. McCaffrey, who led the 24th Infantry Division in Desert Storm.

Two days after he met with the retired generals, Mr. Bush went to the Pentagon and later called the discussion "candid." A day later, Gen. Schoomaker told a blue-ribbon commission on the Guard and Reserve that the Army "will break" unless the active force is bumped up. He suggested 6,000 more soldiers per year.

Republicans on the House Armed Services Committee have endorsed an increase of 11,000 Army soldiers, to 523,000, and 8,000 more Marines, to 187,000. On a trip to Iraq this week, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not endorse any specific numbers.

Gen. Schoomaker and Mr. Rumsfeld's staff did not see eye to eye on the size of a budget increases needed to replace damaged equipment in a process called "reset."

"Schoomaker wants everything replaced so every unit and every soldier is equipped to the max," said an aide.

The good news for the president is that the Joint Chiefs do not favor proposals from Democrats to remove all 135,000 troops immediately from Iraq or to bring them out in a preset timeline. A defense source also said the chiefs "are cool at best" to the Iraq Study Group proposal to have virtually all land combat forces out of Iraq by early 2008, if conditions permit.

"I think one of the most important things the new secretary of defense has to do is realize we are badly underfunding the Department of Defense for the missions we have given them," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Thomas McInerney, an Iraq war hawk. "We are going to have to increase the defense budget significantly."

The Pentagon is spending about $460 billion annually, plus an expected $170 billion more this fiscal year to fund the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

"The president is not only going to have to do an Iraq strategy, he is going to have to do a national strategy for the whole military," Gen. McInerney said. "We cannot continue like we are going now."

DOJ_NMG_0108416

Mr. Bush's decision to ask Congress for a bigger Army and Marine Corps is a break from the policy of Mr. Rumsfeld. Instead of seeking a permanently larger Army, he exercised his legal authority to temporarily boost the Army by up to 30,000 soldiers.

At Pentagon, A New Personality Faces The Same Tough Calls (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21— When Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates sat down for breakfast on Thursday with a half-dozen enlisted soldiers here in Iraq, it was not the setting that his aloof predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, would have chosen.

Most often, Mr. Rumsfeld would meet with hundreds of troops at once in Iraq, in town-hall-style sessions that often resembled rallies. He took questions, made sweeping historical comparisons and was often cheered by enthusiastic crowds, but never seemed to use the session to collect impressions about conditions outside the heavily fortified American military compounds.

Mr. Gates, by contrast, listened patiently for almost an hour at the breakfast while enlisted soldiers offered him their views about everything from strategy and tactics to mundane matters of soldier life.

In a statement never heard in public from the supremely confident Mr. Rumsfeld, he closed the session by going around the table one soldier at a time, asking: "What advice would you give me?"

Just days into Mr. Gates's tenure, it is easy — and facile — to view almost every move he makes as either a deliberate or unconscious repudiation of Mr. Rumsfeld. By heading right off to Iraq, the scene of Mr. Rumsfeld's undoing, Mr. Gates has seemed to invite the comparison, even though his one public mention of Mr. Rumsfeld since he was sworn in was to praise him.

Where Mr. Rumsfeld was volcanic and opinionated, Mr. Gates has come across as humble and open-minded.

Where Mr. Rumsfeld fought to keep troop levels in Iraq low, Mr. Gates is assumed to be inching toward recommending increasing American troop levels, even as he professes not to have made up his mind.

When Mr. Gates vowed, as he has several times, to rely heavily on advice from the uniformed military, it was seen as a subtle signal that he would not run roughshod over the Pentagon brass the way Mr. Rumsfeld was widely criticized for doing.

How valid these early impressions of Mr. Gates will prove to be, though, is still an open question.

If Mr. Gates comes down in favor of a troop increase, it will arguably put him in the same position Mr. Rumsfeld often found himself — at odds with his top generals in Iraq, several of whom have expressed reservations about increasing American troop levels.

There are other similarities. Both men left Washington for long periods before assuming the defense secretary job. Those who knew Mr. Gates during his 27-year tenure at the Central Intelligence Agency, where he became the first entry-level analyst to rise to become director, say he could be an exacting bureaucratic taskmaster, just like Mr. Rumsfeld.

But Mr. Rumsfeld returned to Washington determined to accumulate power and run a bureaucracy he viewed as resistant to change, a task he kept at even after the terrorist attacks of 2001 and the invasion of Iraq.

Mr. Gates has not returned with sweeping ambitions of transforming the department.

Nor has he brought a coterie of ideologically driven aides with him, as Mr. Rumsfeld did initially, and Mr. Gates has informed much of Mr. Rumsfeld's senior staff, few of whom are now as ideological as they once were, that he wants them to stay on, to minimize disruption.

Certainly the two men are stylistically very different, as Mr. Gates's breakfast meeting underscored. On Mr. Rumsfeld's visits to Baghdad, he rarely showed much patience for pondering the flaws in American strategy, at least not in public. His answer to questions about stabilizing the country was that it was "tough stuff" but largely up to the Iraqis to accomplish.

Last March, days after the selection of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki as prime minister, Mr. Rumsfeld stared at the ceiling, noticeably uninterested, at a news conference while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice fielded reporters' questions about the worsening sectarian violence.

Mr. Gates, by contrast, leaves no doubt that he sees fixing Iraq as his overriding mission.

He is still working out a public style in a position that brings much more attention than that given a college president or even a C.I.A. director. “I’m new at this,” he reminded reporters at a news conference on Thursday with Iraq’s defense minister, Abdel-Kader Jassem al-Obeidi.

Perhaps he recognizes that his best management tool, at least for now, is to be seen as the anti-Rumsfeld, a persona that will buy him time to consider far-reaching changes in strategy.

Certainly it helped him win bipartisan confirmation in the Senate, winning over Democrats who favored setting a rapid date for beginning troop withdrawals and Republicans who want to send reinforcements.

Just over a month ago, Mr. Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group, apparently as comfortable as the panel’s other members with recommending a major shift in Iraq strategy aimed at getting American combat troops out by early 2008.

“I didn’t dream at that time I would have actual responsibility for what goes forward,” Mr. Gates told reporters this week, in a statement that seemed to indicate he was having sudden doubts about at least some of the study group’s recommendations for getting out quickly.

Since taking office, he said publicly several times that the responsibilities of his office — and the need not to fail in Iraq — are weighing heavily on him.

He has even taken to repeating one of Mr. Rumsfeld’s favorite lines about Iraq: that the problems there will not be solved by the American military, but by the diplomats at the State Department and by the Iraqi government.

Rice: Iraq Worth Investment In U.S. Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told The Associated Press on Thursday that Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars and said the U.S. can still win a conflict that has been more difficult than she expected.

In an interview at the State Department, the nation's highest-ranking black government official also said the United States is ready to elect a black president.

Rice was asked whether an additional $100 billion the Pentagon wants for the Iraq and Afghan wars might amount to throwing good money after bad in Iraq. President Bush and Congress have already provided more than $500 billion for the two conflicts and worldwide efforts against terrorism, including more than $350 billion for Iraq.

"I don't think it's a matter of money," Rice said. "Along the way there have been plenty of markers that show that this is a country that is worth the investment, because once it emerges as a country that is a stabilizing factor you will have a very different kind of Middle East."

The top U.S. diplomat made the remarks as Bush faces mounting pressure from the public and members of Congress to find a fresh course in the long-running war. More than three-and-half years after the U.S. invasion that deposed Saddam Hussein, the conflict shows no signs of nearing an end and has cost the lives of more than 2,950 American troops.

Bush conceded this week for the first time that the U.S. is not winning the conflict, though he said it is also not losing.

"I know from the point of view of not just the monetary cost but the sacrifice of American lives a lot has been sacrificed for Iraq, a lot has been invested in Iraq," Rice said.

Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed," Rice said.

Rice said the Bush administration should be remembered for far more than the Iraq war. She ticked off foreign policy commitments and accomplishments including increased aid to fight AIDS and malaria in Africa and a peace deal ending two decades of North-South warfare in Sudan.

Rice has repeatedly said she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls. Rice declined to say whether she would like to see her predecessor, Colin Powell, become a candidate. Powell is a fellow black Republican.

"I'm not going to give Colin any advice and he's not going to give me any advice on this one," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0108418

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., is the most prominent black politician to emerge as a potential candidate for the 2008 presidential race. Rice was asked whether, watching Obama's rise, she thinks Americans are willing to put a black in the White House.

"Yes, I think a black person can be elected president," Rice said.

She said the first successful black candidate will be "judged by all the things that Americans ultimately end up making their decision on: Do I agree with this person? Do I share this person's basic values? Am I comfortable that this person is going to make decisions when I'm not in the room that are very consequential?"

At the same time, she said, "We should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time."

Rice said she has no reason to believe North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in disarmament talks this week that a Japanese envoy described as deadlocked.

"They're signed on to denuclearization," in an agreement last year that was never implemented. "We'll see whether or not they follow through," Rice said.

A watered-down United Nations sanctions resolution against Iran would have more than symbolic value, Rice said. But she said she has no assurances that Russia will vote for the resolution this week despite long efforts to satisfy Moscow's misgivings about sanctions.

"The Russians say that they want to prevent the Iranians from perfecting technologies that could lead to a nuclear weapon," Rice said. "I take them at their word and that's why I think ... they will reflect that in their support for a resolution."

She said she is confident all U.N. members will enforce the sanctions once passed, no matter how they voted.

Iraqi Factions Try To Undercut A Plan To Isolate Extremists (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 — Several Iraqi political groups on Thursday maneuvered to undercut an American-backed initiative that would create a multisectarian bloc intended to isolate extremists like the Shiite cleric and militia leader Moktada al-Sadr.

The bloc would consist of Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish parties in an alliance that would be novel in Iraq's highly sectarian political environment. This week, Iraqi and Western officials said that Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a highly influential Shiite cleric, had given a tentative go-ahead to the coalition.

But on Thursday, Saleem Abdullah, a Sunni Arab lawmaker who is a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said his party had set tough new conditions for its participation in the bloc.

And Mr. Sadr was considering a plan to announce that his militia, the Mahdi Army, would scale back its military activities in response to accusations that it was involved in sectarian violence, an official knowledgeable about the plan said.

The framers of the bloc seemed highly unlikely to be able to meet some of the Islamic party's demands, like an insistence that more Sunni Arabs be installed in senior positions at Iraqi ministries and security forces now controlled by Shiites.

"Now the negotiations are stopped, and we are waiting for their response," Mr. Abdullah said. "Honestly, I think an agreement will be very difficult."

As those political moves played out, the new United States defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, met with enlisted men and women in Baghdad to talk about the possibility that more troops could be sent to Iraq. And the American military announced that three more service members had died in Iraq, putting December on a pace to be among the deadliest months of the conflict.

Also on Thursday, 38 bodies of Iraqis were found dumped at various sites around Baghdad, apparently the victims of death squads, the Interior Ministry said, and three bombs killed at least 12 and wounded 18.

The deadliest of the blasts was a suicide bomb that went off near a police academy just after 7 a.m., a police official said, killing mostly police recruits. A second bomb exploded near a funeral procession in the Amel neighborhood, and another detonated near a passport office.

DOJ_NMG_0108419

The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds during the 1980s was adjourned until Jan. 8. Prosecutors told the court that Iraqi soldiers had been ordered to cooperate with Turkish forces in the killings, but the precise nature of an implied agreement between the countries was not spelled out.

When a document supposedly describing the agreement was read into the record, the judge ordered the microphone cut off so that reporters could not hear it. Beyond interjecting a few brief comments, Mr. Hussein mostly sat silently.

Mr. Sadr's maneuvers on Thursday were seen by some officials as a possible move to reduce his political and military liabilities as the Americans and their allies pressed to form the bloc meant to marginalize him and perhaps make any attempt to disarm or attack the Mahdi Army more politically palatable.

At the moment, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki owes his power to a coalition that includes a major contingent led by Mr. Sadr, complicating any move against the cleric or his Mahdi Army militia.

Mr. Sadr was also said to be ready to allow his allies to rejoin the government after a three-week boycott, The Associated Press reported.

The walkout, including 30 lawmakers and six cabinet officials, was a protest against Mr. Maliki's meeting with President Bush in Jordan, and it has kept Mr. Maliki's government from passing legislation. Any return by the politicians would make it more likely that Mr. Sadr could keep some influence in the government even if a new cross-sectarian governing bloc was approved.

"Within two days, the Sadr movement will return to the government and Parliament," said Abdul Karim al-Anizi, a lawmaker from Mr. Maliki's Dawa faction, according to The Associated Press. Two allies of Mr. Sadr's who were not identified also said the politicians would return.

Although there were hints on Thursday that the Sunni Arab Iraqi Islamic Party might reconsider some of its demands, if taken at face value they would almost certainly scuttle the formation of the unity bloc because they could never be met in the spoils system of Iraqi politics.

In that system, the ministries are doled out to parties that won various shares of the vote in the last elections, and top ministry posts are given to members of those parties.

In Baghdad, Mr. Gates talked to enlisted service members on the second day of his visit to Iraq. A majority of the troops at the meeting signaled that they supported the idea of sending more American forces to Iraq, a proposal that has emerged as a leading option as the Bush administration considers a strategy shift.

"I really think we need more troops here," said Specialist Jason T. Glenn. "With more presence here," he said, security might improve to a point that "we can get the Iraqi Army trained up."

On Wednesday, American generals expressed concern about such a plan, saying that sending more troops would make Iraqis less likely to take responsibility for security.

After a meeting with Mr. Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials, Mr. Gates said that he had discussed "the possibility of some additional assistance" but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops.

Mr. Gates told the troops that the administration was putting together a package of ideas for reversing sectarian violence, including procedures for delivering reconstruction assistance quickly to places where the military had conducted operations to clear out insurgents and militias.

Mr. Gates said the first assistance to a neighborhood should come "within hours" of such a clearing operation, to shows residents the tangible benefits of rejecting militants and backing the government.

It was not clear how the troops who met with Mr. Gates had been selected, but in a show of hands he requested, about half said they were serving their second tour in Iraq and the rest said they were on their first.

Several said the Iraqi Army and police were improving but were not competent enough for the Americans to shift to a supporting role. Many do not show up regularly for work, they said, and some tip off insurgents and militias about military operations.

Shiite Cleric Lets Supporters Rejoin Iraqi Government (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0108420

BAGHDAD — Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr has agreed to allow his supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government after a three-week boycott to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush, three officials close to the militia leader said late Thursday.

Al-Sadr's loyalists — 30 in parliament and six in the Cabinet — walked out three weeks ago after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met Bush in Jordan. The move halted the passage of legislation.

Shiites from the Iraqi parliament's largest bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, met Thursday in their holy city of Najaf, as part of a plan to persuade the anti-American militia leader to rejoin the political process and rein in his fighters. They were in touch with al-Sadr's aides, and would meet the cleric today or Saturday, aides to participants told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks.

"The main (United Iraqi) Alliance forces and the al-Sadr movement have agreed to solve the problems and overcome the obstacles that made al-Sadr boycott the political process," said Abdul Karim al-Anizi, a Shiite lawmaker from the Dawa faction. Two figures in al-Sadr's movement — an aide and a parliament member — also told AP the cleric had agreed to allow his followers to go back to their jobs.

On Thursday, al-Sadr's loyalists met with members of the Shiite bloc, and laid out their demands for returning to the government, said the lawmaker. "Our demands are to hand over the security file and not allow any regional interference in Iraqi affairs," he said. The Sadrists planned to issue a statement on Saturday, he added.

The reference to the security file appeared to be a demand that U.S. forces cede control of security to the Iraqi government. American forces already are implementing a plan to give more responsibility to Iraqi troops, but doubts remain about whether they are ready.

Al-Sadr's agreement to tell his followers to rejoin politics was possibly the result of intervention by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's top Shiite cleric, in a bid to keep Shiite unity. Still unsettled: the fate of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, blamed for some of the country's worst attacks on Sunnis.

American officials also were considering changes to Iraq policy, including a short-term surge in U.S. troop numbers. Defense Secretary Robert Gates, on his second day in Iraq, met with Iraqi leaders to discuss "the overall approach, including the possibility of some additional assistance." He was vague about the type of assistance and said no specific numbers were discussed.

President Bush is considering whether to quickly send thousands of additional troops to the country.

Mideast Leaders Seek Their Own Solutions For Region (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

CAIRO

For many of the Middle East's leaders, the upshot of the swirling American debate over Iraq is that when, as seems likely, the US withdraws it will leave behind an ongoing war.

So the region's powers - US allies Jordan, Israel, and Saudi Arabia, and its foes Syria and Iran - are engaging in new diplomatic efforts, largely aimed at preventing Iraq's fighting from causing broader turmoil.

While in some cases the talks are only tangentially about Iraq, this high-level dialogue appears to reflect a new reality: With US prestige crippled by the war, regional actors are bypassing the West to forge partnerships and find solutions on their own.

Thursday, Jordan's King Abdullah II, who has recently been more vocal about restarting Arab-Israeli negotiations, invited Palestinian rivals Hamas and Fatah, locked in deadly street battles this past week, to hash out their differences in Jordan on Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0108421

In Beirut, Arab League negotiator Amr Moussa seems to be making some progress at ending the political crisis between the country's ruling coalition and the Shiite militant party Hizbullah.

But in all cases, Iraq is the volatile backdrop, specifically its potential to become a proxy arena for the region's problems.

A good example is Israel. Watching the unfolding tragedy in Iraq and with its own war this summer against the Shiite militants of Hizbullah in mind, it's reaching out to the Jordanians, the Saudis, and the Lebanese to find solutions to its own security problems.

"In the late 1990s, Israel's worldview was that 'we are the military superpower in the region and we are very closely allied with the world's only superpower. So we have very little to worry about,' " says Gidi Grinstein, a former peace negotiator for the Israeli government and now president of the Reut Institute, a Tel Aviv think tank.

Now, he says, "you have America in a situation of very serious overstretch, unable to get a decisive victory across the region ... we have to look for new partners, alliances, and means of cooperation."

Before Sunday's meeting between Fatah and Hamas was announced, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert flew to Jordan Tuesday to talk with Abdullah about reviving failed peace talks with the Palestinians.

Diplomatic activity is also swirling in Lebanon, where a domestic squabble over the country's sectarian power-sharing arrangement, also draws together the competing interests of the Sunni Arab powers of the region on the one side, and Shiite Iran, on the other.

Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa, a former Egyptian foreign minister, returned to Beirut Wednesday, where he met with an Iranian official and Lebanese leaders from the ruling party and Hizbullah, before traveling to Damascus to meet with that country's president, Bashar Assad.

His regional hopscotch is an effort to cobble together a deal that would probably see pressure lessened on Syria over its political role in Lebanon in return for Hizbullah, an ally of Syria and Iran's, agreeing to a smaller role in a new Lebanese government than it has been demanding so far. The current Beirut government, in turn, is heavily backed by both the US and by Saudi Arabia, which sees it as a bulwark against the expansion of Iranian influence in the region.

From Iraq to Lebanon and in the capitals of Amman and Cairo, the perception of Iran as a potential threat is driving the new engagement and is making for unusual alliances in which the interests of a state like Israel's are being closely aligned with those of the Saudi Arabian monarchy.

In a speech in Dubai Wednesday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair starkly summed up the views of the many governments that fear the expansion of Iranian power.

Iran has profited strategically from the rise of a Shiite-dominated government in Iraq whose main leaders are drawn from Shiite Islamist movements, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) and the Dawa Party, which have close ties to Tehran.

Mr. Blair accused parts of Iran's government of "openly supporting terrorism in Iraq ... trying to turn out a democratic government in Lebanon; flaunting the international community's desire for peace in Palestine ... and trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability."

While Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Israel are less concerned about democracy in Iraq or Lebanon, they are all committed to opposing an expansion of Iranian power, which they see as threatening their own vital interests.

In that area of concern, Iraq once again takes center stage. Saudi Arabia and Jordan are not only concerned about refugees and a sectarian war that could spill over and destabilize their countries, analysts say, but with the chance that Iraq could take center stage in the 25-year-old cold war that has persisted between Shiite Iran and its Sunni neighbors.

"All of these players are on the same side wishing to preserve the state order rather than seeing it undone," says Asher Susser, an expert on Jordanian-Israeli relations at Tel Aviv University. "That is why the undoing of Iraq causes such anxiety to Israel, to Jordan, to all those adjacent to Iraq."

Their current maneuvers, talking with disaffected former Baathists in their capitals and, regional diplomats say, quietly passing money to Sunni insurgent groups in Iraq in an effort to build up influence and intelligence aren't particularly likely to end Iraq's war soon.

But they could find a way to contain the violence there and the regional animosities it is threatening to inflame, or set the stage for Iraq to become a proxy battle ground.

"If you're looking forward, this is the next stage," says Toby Dodge, a political scientist and expert on Mideast Politics at Queen Mary College at the University of London. "The point will soon come when it's much more obvious than it is today that the Americans are going home, and then what will the Saudis and others do?

"Will they say, right, the sky is falling in ... but we have an opportunity to contain it by working together? Or, will this become the front line of a much nastier covert war?" he says.

Greg Gause, a political science professor at the University of Vermont and Middle East expert, says: "This is about balance of power politics ... it seems to me what the Saudis, particularly the Saudis, fear is growing Iranian power, and they fear that the Iranians will seek to use that to destabilize the Gulf and their own country, through their own Shia populations."

Regional diplomats say Saudi Arabia is already funding some Sunni groups in the country, and a recent International Crisis Group report on Iraq recommended that Saudi Arabia cut "off funding from private Saudi sources" to insurgent groups in Iraq that refuse work toward a national peace deal.

Iran, for its part, is in fact expanding its influence inside that country. "They want to be the guiding foreign-policy actor in Iraq, which will eventually have an oil policy, and that's also something Iran wants a say in.... I think they're winning all this and they're ambitious," says Mr. Gause.

Mr. Dodge says that Saudi and Jordanian fears about expanding Iranian influence, famously termed by Jordan's Abdullah as a potential "Shiite crescent" arcing from Iran to Lebanon, exaggerates the threat to their states, but the fear itself is nevertheless real and could have negative consequences.

Suicide Bomber Kills 14 In Baghdad (LAT)

BAGHDAD — A suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed 14 Iraqis near a crowded police recruitment center in the capital this morning, in the latest salvo by Sunni Arab insurgents against the Shiite Muslim-dominated government.

Also today, three U.S. troops were reported to have been killed in separate combat incidents.

The police recruiting station bombing cost Mustafa Numan, a 25-year-old trying to sign up for the police, two of his friends.

"We were all getting ready to get into line when the explosion occurred," he said from his bed at Kindi Hospital, where he recovered from stomach and leg wounds. "I lost consciousness and came to at the hospital. I consider myself lucky when I think about those who lost their lives."

Apparent insurgent bomb strikes and shootings in the capital left at least three more dead.

Suspected Shiite militiamen with alleged ties to security forces have waged their own deadly campaign, killing dozens a day in secretive death squad operations. At least 76 unidentified bodies were discovered in and around Baghdad during a 24-hour period ending Wednesday night. Another four bodies were discovered today in southern Iraq.

The three U.S. troops died over the past three days. One Marine died in Al Anbar province today. A soldier was killed in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad on Wednesday. Another soldier died Tuesday in Al Anbar.

December is shaping up as one of the deadliest for Americans in Iraq. But U.S. soldiers told visiting Defense Secretary of State Robert M. Gates that a controversial proposal to increase the American troop presence in Baghdad would buy time to stabilize Iraq.

"I really think we need more troops here," Spc. Jason Glenn told Gates during a meeting at Camp Victory in Baghdad, according to news services. "With more presence on the ground, more troops might hold them [the insurgents] off long enough to where we can get the Iraqi army trained up."

Gates, in Iraq on a second day of a fact-finding mission, was told by the soldier that the current strategy of training Iraqi forces to take over from Americans was working.

"Sir, I think we need to just keep doing what we're doing," Glenn said.

Gates later met with senior Iraqi officials, assuring them of U.S. support for the fractured Baghdad government.

"The Iraqi government is determined to improve the security of the people here in Iraq, and above all here in Baghdad," Gates told reporters after meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and other ranking officials, according to the news agencies.

Meanwhile the judge in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein and six codefendants silenced testimony suggesting that Turkey, a U.S. ally, cooperated with Baghdad during a late 1980s operation to use chemical weapons to crush rebellious Kurds.

"There has to be very delicate cooperation with the Turkish side to ensure that these ... ," said a passage in Aug 21, 1988 document read in the courtroom before the judge cut off the sound.

Another audio snippet a few minutes later referred to a "secret Iraqi-Turkish protocol" that allowed Turkish troops to enter Iraq in pursuit of Kurdish guerrillas fighting the Ankara government.

Three U.S. Troops Killed (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 -- The U.S. military announced Thursday that three more American service members have been killed in Iraq, as a suicide bomber detonated himself in a crowd of police recruits in Baghdad, killing 15.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died in western Anbar province Tuesday, and soldier from the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, died there Wednesday, the military said. The area is considered the heartland of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

A roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded three others while they were escorting personnel to their base south of Baghdad on Wednesday, the military said.

The deaths occur as President Bush, under pressure to come up with a new war strategy, is considering sending more U.S. troops to Iraq. Military casualties have mounted as American forces have tried to calm sectarian violence in the capital while fighting insurgents in Anbar.

The Web site Icasualties.org, which tracks war fatalities, said Thursday that 70 service members had died this month, which would put December on track to becoming one of the deadliest of the year. The U.S. military, whose count often lags behind those of independent organizations, said 51 service members had been killed.

Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, cautioned against ranking death tolls. "We don't count them that way," he said.

Insurgents have often targeted crowds of Iraqi army and police recruits. On Thursday, a suicide bomber detonated explosives in his vest at Baghdad Police College in eastern Baghdad, killing 15 people and wounding 15, the U.S. military said. Police reports said three police officers and 12 recruits were among the dead, according to the military.

An Interior Ministry official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media said the suicide bomber detonated the bomb at 7:15 a.m. as he stood with the police recruits near the ministry building.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, the commander of the Adala Police Station, Col. Adnan Mohammad, escaped an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb exploded in his convoy. Four bodyguards were wounded, according to Col. Yadqar Abdul Allah of the Kirkuk police.

Meanwhile, at Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, prosecutors have spent the week presenting videos and documents purporting to show that Hussein's government sanctioned the use of chemical weapons against civilians.

Sultan Hashem Ahmed, former minister of defense, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, former deputy director of army operations, denied using such weapons. They said that they did use conventional weapons against Iranian troops and insisted that they were carrying out the orders of their superiors.

Hussein and six other defendants are on trial for the so-called Anfal campaign, which prosecutors say resulted in the deaths of as many as 180,000 ethnic Kurds. The trial was adjourned until Jan. 8.

The Builder Who Bombed In Iraq (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Until this year, Parsons Corp. was about as quiet as a $3 billion engineering and construction firm with 12,000 employees could be. That's the way the firm's chief executive for the past decade -- a soft-spoken, white-haired Army veteran named James F. McNulty -- liked it.

But Iraq has changed everything.

Parsons has been reproved in recent federal audits for completing just a small fraction of the 150 primary health clinics originally planned to be built in Iraq and for building a police academy so flawed that human waste rained from the ceilings. For this, it has taken bipartisan hits on Capitol Hill, where its name is now whispered by war critics in the same breath as that perennial boogeyman, Halliburton.

Sick of taking blame, McNulty, 64, is speaking out about what went wrong with his firm's work and what he regards as the problems with how the United States uses private contractors in Iraq.

In a recent interview at the firm's Washington offices, one of a series he has given, McNulty said the government handed Parsons an impossible task by setting unrealistically high expectations for how much could be built while under-funding its efforts. McNulty said the company repeatedly pleaded with the government to either provide enough money to get the job done or scale back its goals, but said its entreaties were ignored.

"The entire reconstruction effort was much too ambitious," McNulty said. For instance, he said, his firm wanted to build a small number of clinics, some in each of three regions of the country, rather than try to do all 150 at once. "If we had built five in each region, we could have at least understood what problems we were going to face in building them," he said. "And we probably would have had 15 darn good clinics up a lot faster."

McNulty, a West Point graduate who served two tours in Vietnam during a 24-year Army career, also suggested the government needed to rethink its heavy dependence on the private sector for reconstruction, security and support in a combat environment.

The comments are unusual for the leader of a firm that makes much of its money doing work for the government. Then again, few have been battered as badly as Parsons, an employee-owned, California-based company with a six-decade track record. Since the spring, when news of the stumbling health clinic program first broke, the company's performance has been derided in the press and put under the microscope at congressional hearings. At a hearing in September, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) spoke of a $75 million police academy that Parsons was responsible for but that went badly awry: "This is the lens through which Iraqis will now see America. Incompetence. Profiteering. Arrogance. And human waste oozing out of ceilings as a result."

At the same hearing, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said 13 out of 14 Parsons projects that his office examined were flawed.

While Bowen's reports have spread the blame for the failed projects between Parsons and the government, one of the firm's customers in Iraq, the Army Corps of Engineers, has pointed responsibility squarely at its contractor.

"We had hundreds and hundreds of projects completed at the same time by other contractors. Parsons just wasn't able to meet their schedules," said Michael Fallon, a corps official who directed reconstruction programs in Iraq.

Fallon said that with the money Parsons was given to build health clinics -- roughly $200 million -- it should have been able to complete its work. The government insisted on 150 clinics, produced on an accelerated schedule, because "the country of Iraq needed health care in a hurry," Fallon said. Parsons says it finished 20 clinics before being terminated from the contract, though the corps insists just seven are operational.

"I don't know how much they understood what they were getting into," Fallon said.

McNulty contends the company was misled. Parsons had worked in Bosnia, Kosovo and Kuwait, and it was prepared for a similar security situation in postwar Iraq. The firm won eight reconstruction contracts, worth $1.7 billion, with a hope that those contracts would serve as a bridge to more work as the country blossomed under new leadership. "All the contractors were told to assume, and this is a quote, a 'permissive security environment.' That means to me you're going to be able to move around the country," he said.

Instead, the company's expatriate employees were virtual prisoners of the heavily fortified, U.S.-run Green Zone. At most sites, it was too dangerous for Parsons's expatriates. The company had to train Iraqis to oversee construction carried out by Iraqi subcontractors. Many were inexperienced firms that found themselves targeted by insurgents. Parsons subcontractors were kidnapped, killed by roadside bombs and assassinated in their offices. McNulty declined to answer questions about violence against expatriate Parsons employees until after they are all out of Iraq.

"You would have 500 workers on the site, and then one kidnapping or one bombing later, you would have no people out there for a week or two," McNulty said.

Meanwhile, McNulty said the company was not getting the help it needed from the government. U.S. officials initially gave the company coordinates for building clinics that turned out to be locations at the bottom of a lake or on top of a mosque. As U.S. officials rotated in and out of Baghdad, priorities shifted. "We couldn't get anybody to really make any decisions," he said.

Those factors took a toll on the company's timelines. But Jon C. Bowersox, who oversaw health care projects for the U.S. Embassy from late 2005 until mid-2006, said the company was not transparent about its problems. "They were giving [the government] very optimistic completion dates," Bowersox said. Clinics that were supposedly 90 percent complete proved to be far from it, he said, although added that he does not blame Parsons entirely.

"The real take-home message is you can't do construction in the midst of a civil war," he said.

McNulty said he would like to see the government rethink how it handles reconstruction in a combat zone. In Iraq, the government oversees the work, but contractors handle both the construction and security at work sites. In future conflicts, he said, he would like to see the U.S. military or an international force at least take over security, and perhaps the construction work itself.

Parsons, meanwhile, is not through with Iraq just yet. The company boasts it has completed more than a thousand projects there, and is still wrapping up others.

McNulty said the criticism Parsons received has been "a huge morale problem" for employees who served in Iraq. He has personally been under intense pressure to explain the company's performance to potential clients and to the public. But he said the firm continues to rack up contracts even as it comes under assault.

"We've lost no business over it," McNulty said. "In fact, the very people who are criticizing us are giving us more work."

Saddam Co-defendants Deny Gassing Kurds (AP)

By Al-Bashir and Halaby

AP, December 22, 2006

Two former Iraqi commanders denied gassing Kurdish civilians in northern Iraq 20 years ago, telling Saddam Hussein's genocide trial Thursday that they used only conventional weapons against Kurdish rebels and Iranian troops.

Sultan al-Tai, minister of defense under Saddam, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, a deputy director of army operations, testified to rebut evidence presented by prosecutors in videos and documents this week.

The documents, prosecutors said, showed Saddam's government sanctioned the use of "special weapons" — mustard or nerve agent — against Kurdish civilians as well as rebel fighters in 1987-88.

In sometimes emotional testimony, al-Tai alleged some of the documents implicating him in waging chemical warfare were forged. "I didn't use any special weapon against the Kurds," al-Tai shouted at the judges.

The two men, Saddam and four other former members of his regime have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their roles in the military campaign, code-named Operation Anfal. The campaign took place during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war.

An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the operation. Saddam and one other defendant have pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

DOJ_NMG_0108426

Al-Tai and Mohammed argued Thursday — shouting at times — that Iranian forces had infiltrated northern Iraq and were using Kurdish rebel bases to attack government troops.

Both men insisted they used only conventional weapons and both said they were carrying out their superiors' orders.

"My job allowed me only limited responsibility," Mohammed told the court. "In an army, a deputy commander is not the responsible person."

He challenged evidence presented by prosecutors. "Did I sign these documents?" he demanded. "Is my name on them? If it's there, I'll sign my execution myself."

The chief judge, Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa, interrupted to say: "Prosecution documents show that special weapons were used, but you say they weren't from army warehouses?"

"No," Mohammed responded.

"So they didn't belong to you," the judge asked.

"Of course not," Mohammed said.

"So, where did they come from?" al-Khalifa asked.

"I don't know. Had I known, I would've told you. You have to ask other people — the military industrialization department," Mohammed replied, provoking a smirk from Saddam, sitting in the dock alongside him.

Al-Tai said the government relocated Kurdish civilians for their safety during the campaign.

"We removed all civilians from the fighting zones. The civilians were transferred in trucks ... and they were put in safe houses," al-Tai said.

Chief prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon scoffed at this claim.

"I wonder where the people in the mass graves come from?" al-Faroon asked the judges rhetorically. "How were they transferred to the mass graves? Maybe in the same trucks that went to the safe houses he's talking about!"

"We saw documents. We watched videos incriminating them. What more do we need — believe the documents and the videos or believe him?" the prosecutor said.

The trial was adjourned to Jan. 8.

At an earlier trial, Saddam was condemned to death for the killing of nearly 150 people in the town of Dujail after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him. His lawyers have appealed both the verdict and sentence, and the appeals court is expected to rule next month.

Iraqi officials suggest that Saddam's prosecution on genocide charges would be halted if the appeal court upholds the death sentence of the first trial.

AFP, December 22, 2006

Islamic fighters are still entering Afghanistan from Pakistan, despite a deal between Islamabad and tribal chiefs meant to cut down the incursions, NATO's former top General warned.

General James Jones, who handed over to General John Craddock as Supreme Allied Commander Europe this month, said the Western alliance's political leadership would raise the issue with Pakistan unless things improved.

Pakistan's government signed peace deals in September with tribal elders along the border, saying the move would help stem the flow of Taliban fighters entering Afghanistan to battle Western troops.

But Jones said during an appearance at the Atlantic Council of the United States think-tank, he had discussed the situation frankly with General Ehsan Ul Haq, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Pakistan's military staff last month.

"I told him that the returns did not really look too encouraging, given the porous nature of the borders and some very physical evidence that fighters were still coming across and returning rather freely across the many border crossings that are there," Jones said.

"I think that from the political side that NATO will be heard through the Secretary General on this issue if it continues to be a significant problem," said Jones.

"The problem of the Taliban is not an Afghan problem alone. This could be a Pakistani problem if Afghanistan doesn't work out the way we want it to."

However, Jones said that he had been convinced of Haq's "earnestness and sincerity" to work with the Western alliance, and said several initiatives involving NATO, Pakistan and Afghanistan would be put in place over the winter.

Agency To Test Military Draft Machinery (AP)

By Kasie Hunt

AP, December 22, 2006

The Selective Service System is planning a comprehensive test of the military draft machinery, which hasn't been run since 1998.

The agency is not gearing up for a draft, an agency official said Thursday. The test itself would not likely occur until 2009.

Meanwhile, the secretary for Veterans Affairs said that "society would benefit" if the U.S. were to bring back the draft and that it shouldn't have any loopholes for anyone who is called to serve. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson later issued a statement saying he does not support reinstituting a draft.

The Selective Service "readiness exercise" would test the system that randomly chooses draftees by birth date and the network of appeals boards that decide how to deal with conscientious objectors and others who want to delay reporting for duty, said Scott Campbell, Selective Service director for operations and chief information officer.

"We're kind of like a fire extinguisher. We sit on a shelf" until needed, Campbell said. "Everyone fears our machine for some reason. Our machine, unless the president and Congress get together and say, 'Turn the machine on' ... we're still on the shelf."

The administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed.

A day earlier, President Bush said he is considering sending more troops to Iraq and has asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to look into adding more troops to the nearly 1.4 million uniformed personnel on active duty.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, increasing the Army by 40,000 troops would cost as much as $2.6 billion the first year and $4 billion after that. Service officials have said the Army wants to increase its force by 20,000 to 30,000 soldiers and the Marine Corps would like 5,000 more troops.

The unpopular war in Iraq, where more than 2,950 American troops have already died, complicates the task of finding more recruits and retaining current troops — to meet its recruitment goals in recent years, the Army has accepted recruits with lower aptitude test scores.

In remarks to reporters in New York, Nicholson recalled his own experience as a company commander in an infantry unit that brought together soldiers of different backgrounds and education levels. He said the draft "does bring people from all quarters of our society together in the common purpose of serving."

Rep. Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat who has said minorities and the poor share an unfair burden of the war, plans to introduce a bill next year to reinstate the draft.

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has said that reinstating the draft would not be high on the Democratic-led Congress' priority list, and the White House said Thursday that no draft proposal is being considered.

Planning for the Selective Service exercise, called the Area Office Mobilization Prototype Exercise, is slated to begin in June or July of next year for a 2009 test. Campbell said budget cuts could force the agency to cancel the test, which he said should take place every three years but hasn't because of funding constraints.

Hearst Newspapers first reported the planned test for a story sent to its subscribers for weekend use.

The military drafted people during the Civil War and both world wars and between 1948 and 1973. An agency independent of the Defense Department, the Selective Service System was reincorporated in 1980 to maintain a registry of 18-year-old men, but call-ups have not occurred since the Vietnam War.

VA Head: Draft Beneficial To Society (AP)

By Sara Kugler

DOJ_NMG_0108428

President Bush's secretary for Veterans Affairs said Thursday that "society would benefit" if the country brought back the military draft, then clarified that he doesn't support such a move.

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson spoke a day after Bush said he is considering sending more troops to Iraq. The administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed.

Nicholson, who served in Vietnam, was in New York to announce a partnership with Mayor Michael Bloomberg to help homeless veterans find housing.

A reporter suggested that the all-volunteer armed forces attract a disproportionate number of minorities and people trying to lift themselves out of poverty, and asked Nicholson if the draft should be reinstated to make the military more equal.

"I think that our society would benefit from that, yes sir," Nicholson said.

The secretary recalled his own experience as a company commander in an infantry unit that brought together soldiers of different backgrounds and education levels, noting that the draft "does bring people from all quarters of our society together in the common purpose of serving."

He later issued a statement saying his comments had been misconstrued and that he does not support bringing back the draft.

Nicholson, a graduate of the military academy at West Point, N.Y., served eight years on active duty as a paratrooper and Ranger-qualified Army officer, then 22 years in the Army reserve. He has held the VA post since February 2005.

Bush said he has not made up his mind about whether to send more troops to Iraq. No timetables or totals have been outlined publicly, but by some accounts roughly 20,000 troops could be added to the 140,000 already there.

Their Christmas At War (WP)

By David Ignatius

Thanks to a military blogger who calls himself "Blackfive" ("The Paratrooper of Love"), we have a snapshot of what Christmas looks like this year at Camp Taji, 20 miles north of Baghdad. It's a man dressed up in a Santa Claus suit, standing behind a "sleigh" that is actually an unmanned aerial vehicle and six soldiers who are wearing antlers and perched precariously on the launch ramp.

Or we can read this Christmas message posted Dec. 21 from "Lt. Col. Patrick," an Air Force C-130 pilot. Next to a picture, taken at his base, of a Christmas tree decorated with festive lights, he writes: "Holiday deployments are difficult but the one characteristic that comes from being away from home at this time of year is that everyone else misses home too. You don't hear people actually complain about missing Christmas at home I think because we're all in it together." Misery may love company, but in the military, it keeps its mouth shut.

This holiday season, America is struggling through a searing national debate about Iraq. The horror of the war feels immediate, even to people who've never been near Baghdad, but less so the humanity of the thousands of American soldiers who are serving there. That's part of the Iraq disconnect: The war dominates our political life, but the men and women in the midst of it often are nearly invisible. We see them in thumbnail photos in group obituaries but not as real, living people.

If you read soldiers' blogs, and I've looked at several dozen over the past few days, you see a recurring anger that the media aren't telling their story. So I'll let a few of the military bloggers speak for themselves. If you want to share in the conversation, a good place to start is http://milblogging.com, which collects blogs from soldiers deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan and around the world.

Needless to say, the first thing most American soldiers are thinking about is getting back home. They wait for a magic acronym: RIP/TOA, which means: "Relief in Place/Transfer of Authority." In his blog, "Duty in the Desert," Lt. Col. Patrick writes: "You can easily tell the folks that have been here awhile from the newer arrivals. New guys tell you how they're doing and what they're feeling. The old heads, deployed longer, start off every sentence with how many days remaining in their tour."

A young woman who calls herself "Techno" has a small Christmas tree at the foot of her bed. She explains in her blog that she broke up with her boyfriend before joining the Army and coming to Iraq. She wrote this week: "I really can't think of a better place to go through all of this. Back home, I would have been a mess for a lot longer and really would have gone back to him."

What does Iraq mean? For many soldiers, the big issues debated back home are less important than the simple reality of being there. A 23-year-old soldier who calls himself "Dreadcow," who recently returned home, tries to explain: "As much as it sucked I wouldn't trade my time in the desert for anything. . . . When people ask me what I did during the war I don't have to say I shoveled [expletive] and picked strawberries." Dreadcow says he has learned two things from Iraqis: the importance of having a special place for your gun at home, and the requirement that "every male should have some sort of facial hair."

The military bloggers celebrate their heroes, like Pfc. Ross A. McGinnis, a 19-year-old Army gunner from Knox, Pa., who died Dec. 4 falling on a grenade that was thrown into his truck, thereby saving his buddies. His platoon sergeant explained: "He had time to jump out of the truck. He chose not to." His friend Pfc. Brennan Beck said of him: "He loved it here in Iraq. He loved being a gunner. It was a thrill, he loved everything about it." He was awarded the Silver Star posthumously.

War changes people. That's something that comes through powerfully in these soldiers' accounts of life in the battle zone. "Grey Eagle," the moniker of a 35-year-old combat medic serving with the 101st Airborne Division, writes in her blog, "I have been living in another life time another dimension so separate from the world I left behind that I fear I may never really find my way back. Will those I love be able to accept me if I was not the exact person they knew. Would they be angry with me for the loss of my innocence."

Media-Sourcing Debate On Deck At Capitol (WSJ)

By JESS BRAVIN, SARAH ELLISON

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is increasingly at odds with some Republicans over its efforts to make journalists reveal confidential sources.

The controversy is reaching a flashpoint in San Francisco, where the Justice Department is expected to file papers today urging that two San Francisco Chronicle reporters face jail if they refuse to reveal their source for confidential grand-jury proceedings concerning baseball slugger Barry Bonds's alleged use of steroids.

The issue also is expected to re-emerge on Capitol Hill next year, where two influential Republicans, Sen. Richard Lugar and Rep. Mike Pence, both of Indiana, plan to reintroduce legislation limiting the government's power to force journalists to disclose confidential sources. Many Democrats, whose party will control Congress next year, also support extending protection to reporters' sources and are expected to co-sponsor the legislation.

Mr. Pence said in an interview that he expects to reintroduce the bill with his Democratic co-sponsor in the previous Congress, Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia. In the upper house, he said Sens. Lugar, Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) and Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) were likely to be involved as well.

"We're suggesting there's been a tear in the First Amendment right now, and it's widening," Mr. Pence said. "The only way you patch it is to do as many states have done and pass a federal statute that clarifies the boundaries."

Mr. Pence said that some were surprised to see him and other conservatives championing a press-freedom bill. "It's one of those things that's a little counterintuitive for a cheerful right-winger to be involved in," he said, but "I really do believe that the framers of the Constitution put a free and independent press in the First Amendment to protect the public's right to know, and the only way you do that is protect reporters' ability to keep certain sources confidential."

Currently, all states except Wyoming have passed laws or issued court rulings that provide some level of protection for reporters' confidential sources or notes from subpoenas, says Marv Johnson, a legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington. The rationale for the so-called shield laws is that society benefits from aggressive news reporting, a value embodied in the First Amendment. Giving prosecutors or other litigants access to reporters' sources could transform journalists into investigators for the government or private parties, media advocates say, potentially exposing sources to retaliation and thereby impeding public access to news of possible wrongdoing or questionable activities.

Others maintain that the First Amendment confers no privilege upon journalists and that, in any case, legal proceedings take precedence over news gathering. In 1972, the Supreme Court upheld a local prosecutor's subpoena to make a Louisville, Ky., reporter disclose the identity of sources he had seen in possession of marijuana. The court rejected "the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it," Justice Byron White wrote.

The case didn't resolve all constitutional questions regarding the issue, however, and various federal circuit courts have interpreted them differently.

The Justice Department also has long taken a stand against letting its prosecutors routinely pry open reporters' notebooks, and in 1973 issued guidelines requiring that the U.S. attorney general personally approve subpoena requests for the news media. In its most recent version, the guidelines state that "except under exigent circumstances" such subpoenas should "be limited to the verification of published information."

Under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the Justice Department has pursued journalists' sources in cases ranging from a terrorism investigation of Islamic charities to the alleged vandalism of a police car. In the latter case, free-lancer Josh Wolf has been jailed since September for refusing to turn over videotape of a July 2005 altercation between protesters and San Francisco police in which a city police car was vandalized. Although California state law would bar local prosecutors from obtaining Mr. Wolf's footage, federal authorities have asserted jurisdiction because the San Francisco Police Department receives some funding from Washington.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the government continues to follow its guidelines and disputed claims that pursuit of reporters' sources and records has increased under Mr. Gonzales. "Over the past 15 years there have been less than 20 source subpoenas issued," she said, although no figures were available on subpoenas for unpublished notes or recordings. "To say we've been incredibly cautious and restrained when using this lawful tool is an understatement."

San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams have published articles and a book involving allegations that Mr. Bonds, the San Francisco Giants slugger, committed perjury when he testified in 2003 that he never knowingly used steroids to boost his performance. At the urging of federal prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White found the Chronicle and its reporters in contempt of court for refusing to reveal how they obtained the information for grand-jury proceedings, with a potential penalty of 18 months in jail and a $1,000 per day fine.

The Chronicle's owner, Hearst Corp., backed by dozens of states and news organizations, appealed to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, also in San Francisco, and the government's response is due today.

In an attempt to turn the tables on the government's push to learn the identity of reporters' confidential sources, Norman Pearlstine, the former top editor at Time Inc. (and earlier of The Wall Street Journal), this week filed a Freedom of Information Act request with Mr. Gonzales seeking documents relating to subpoenas of reporters in three high-profile cases.

The request seeks documents regarding Mr. Gonzales's approval of grand-jury subpoenas sent to the Chronicle and its reporters; to Mr. Wolf; and for telephone records of the New York Times and its former and current reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, respectively, in connection with a federal investigation into Islamic charities.

"I don't know what guidelines Gonzales was reading," Mr. Pearlstine said in an interview, "but I don't see how these cases fit into the Justice Department's own guidelines about subpoenas." Mr. Pearlstine has spent the past year writing a book on anonymous sources. While editor in chief of Time Inc., Mr. Pearlstine agreed to hand over the notes of Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine reporter, after exhausting appeals to a court order to cooperate with a federal grand jury.

Mark Corallo, the Justice Department press secretary under former Attorney General John Ashcroft, filed an affidavit in the Chronicle case saying that he wouldn't have approved the reporter subpoenas. "This case is so far below the acceptable standards the department has lived by for close to 40 years that it will embolden prosecutors to make this a first step, not a last step," Mr. Corallo said in an interview.

Some lawmakers are troubled by the pursuit of reporters' sources as well. "The lack of adherence to departmental standards, to the extent there are any, is a troubling matter and one I expect the committee will want to examine," Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), the House Judiciary Committee's incoming chairman, said through a spokesman.

The War On Terror And Rule Of Law Collide (NBC)

By Pete Williams, Justice correspondent

NBC News, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The judicial branch of the government lived up to its task during the last year, working as a check on both the White House and Congress.

Between the Supreme Court's striking down of the Bush administration's plan to conduct military trials for war-on-terror detainees and the pursuit of allegedly corrupt government officials, it was a busy year for the Justice Department.

With decisions expected on the National Security Agency's Terror Surveillance Program and the Lewis "Scooter" Libby trial getting underway in January, 2007 is expected to be just as decisive.

The year that was: 2006

Legal rights reshaped in war on terror

The Justice Department struggled to respond to a setback delivered in June by the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the administration's plan to conduct military trials for detainees picked up in the war on terror. The court's five-member majority held that the military tribunal rules failed to follow a long-standing federal law requiring all military courts to provide fair trial rights.

Congress passed a new law allowing terror trials before military courts but providing more protections for defendants. Even so, the law raised new questions about the appeal rights of detainees.

Terror Surveillance Program

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pushed Congress to find a way to resolve legal doubts about the government's Terrorist Surveillance Program, the NSA-run effort to monitor the calls of suspected terrorists.

Officials conceded that the program could involve listening in on the calls of American citizens without a court order. The administration disclosed some of the program's details, once among the most closely held secrets, after its existence was reported by the New York Times. Well over a dozen lawsuits were filed in federal courts, challenging the constitutionality of the program. But when the Congress finished its work in early December, no agreement had been reached on clarifying the program's legality.

Terrorism prosecutions

New statistics showed the number of federal terrorism prosecutions dropping to its lowest point since 9/11, with the new cases filed being generally less dramatic.

Seven men in South Florida were accused of being part of a terror plotting to attack prominent buildings, including the Sears Tower. And an Illinois man was accused of planning to set off hand grenades at a shopping mall. But in neither case did those arrested get very far in their planning or even appear to have many resources to carry out an attack.

Nonetheless, the government defended its record. "We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws," said Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general.

High profile prosecutions

A growth area for federal prosecutors came in high profile cases involving government figures. An investigation of Congressman William Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, touched off a prickly battle over access by FBI agents to the offices of members of Congress.

And Jack Abramoff, once Washington's lobbying super-power, made a surprise decision to admit that he tried to bribe congressmen and senators to get official favors for his clients. His plea launched a series of investigations into whether members who received Abramoff's payments broke the law.

Former Enron executive Jeffrey Skilling reported to prison in December, the final step in the Justice Department's high profile prosecution of the former energy giant. The government's Enron task force obtained more than a dozen guilty pleas. Company founder Ken Lay died after a jury convicted him but before he could be sentenced.

Violent crime spike

Despite FBI statistics showing only a modest increase in violent crime nationwide — up 2.3 percent, with murder up 3.4 percent — many of the nation's police chiefs warned that in their cities, violent crimes were spiking.

A survey of 55 cities by the Police Executive Research Forum found murder up in 32, robbery up in 44, and aggravated assault rising in 28, all from January to June. Among the causes, a spread of gangs beyond the biggest cities, an epidemic of guns in younger hands, and acts of spontaneous violence over trivial slights.

Terror Surveillance Program

Justice Department officials will try again to urge Congress to pass a law clarifying the legal status of the Terrorist Surveillance Program. But Democrats in Congress may try to restore appeal rights for terror detainees, giving them greater legal authority to challenge their detentions. Court rulings will be due early in the year that could provide similar protections.

Vice President Cheney to take the stand

Dick Cheney will likely become the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal trial. Lawyers for Lewis "Scooter" Libby, his former chief of staff, expect to call him as a defense witness in Libby's perjury trial, which begins in January. Libby is accused of lying during the investigation of the CIA-Valerie Plame leak case.

Abramoff fallout

The fallout from the Abramoff lobbying scandal could bring further prosecutions against members of Congress

Need to stem violent crime

Pressure will likely grow on the Justice Department to find ways to help cities respond to the spike in violent crime.

Key 'open Government' Official Leaves Policy Mark (GE)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, December 22, 2006

After 25 years heading one of the federal government's key privacy and information offices, Daniel J. Metcalfe will retire Jan. 3. Observers say that while they have not always agreed with him, he will be remembered for his ability to administer the open government policies of both Republican and Democratic presidents.

As a founding director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy since November 1981, Metcalfe has worked for seven attorneys general, pushed agencies to improve the management of requests for information and made a substantial impact on the law governing agencies' responsibilities to release information to the public.

Over that time, Metcalfe has supervised more than 500 Freedom of Information Act and Privacy Act litigation cases. Until last year, he co-directed the Office of Information and Privacy with Richard Huff, who retired after 36 years in the government.

In an interview with Government Executive, Metcalfe said he believes open government is critical. But at the same time, agencies must ensure that government information is disclosed responsibly.

"I'm more supportive of openness than some people might think, but I also recognize and respect the need to protect information," he said. "I have seen the types of sensitive information that the government can have. And I know first-hand the importance of protecting it."

Metcalfe will leave his mark on both the management of requests for information and the policies governing how much is released.

Management of FOIA Requests

President Bush issued an executive order in December 2005 requiring agencies to improve their administration of FOIA requests for government documents. Metcalfe said his office -- and secondarily the Office of Management and Budget -- has been the driving force for enforcing the changes.

According to a Justice report issued in October, agencies are for the most part complying with the executive order, which outlines a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law.

Officials within the privacy community say the executive order staved off legislation that would have imposed stricter enforcement of the existing 20-day deadline for FOIA responses and would have created a system to allow people requesting information to track the status of their queries on the Internet and by telephone.

Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, which collects and publishes declassified documents, said while the information and privacy office has done excellent work, Metcalfe was not empowered to make substantial recommendations that would improve the administration of agency FOIA processes. She said the executive order, since it did not contain any recommendations for increasing funding or staffing levels, exposed the weakness of the information and privacy office.

"When you're in the one office that is charged with making recommendations a reality and you can't do anything to make the recommendations a reality, it's a frustrating situation to be in," Fuchs said.

Metcalfe noted there has not yet been time within agency budget cycles to discuss increasing resources. He said he expects agencies to implement their FOIA improvement plans and issue their progress reports on time.

He added that he has personally spearheaded the executive order's implementation, even as he has prepared to leave government service.

"I've been going out 'full throttle,' so to speak, in both guiding and admonishing the chief FOIA officers of all federal agencies to treat their individual agency executive order responsibilities with the care and seriousness they deserve," Metcalfe said. "Now it is up to them to do their part by meeting their implementation and reporting deadlines on Feb. 1."

Legal Impact

In the spring of 1978, before becoming head of the information and privacy office, Metcalfe began establishing, as a Justice trial attorney, the legal concept in FOIA law known as "survivor privacy," whereby the government can hold back personal information about a deceased person out of respect for the privacy interests of surviving family members.

In Lesar v. Department of Justice, Metcalfe decided to argue that releasing certain FOIA-requested information in the files from the investigation of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. would invade the privacy of the civil rights leader's family.

"I was in a unique position. I was able to decide what was quote unquote 'right,'" Metcalfe said. "I was taking a risk, given the state of the case law at the time, but I thought it was the right thing to do."

The government's decision to withhold the information eventually was upheld by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals in 1980. But Metcalfe's survivor privacy principle was not firmly established until the Supreme Court ruled 9-0 in 2004 that bloody photographs of the body of Deputy White House Counsel Vincent W. Foster Jr., taken after he committed suicide in 1993 with a handgun in a Virginia park managed by the National Park Service, were exempt from release under FOIA.

"It felt quite good that something that I had conceived in 1978 as a matter of litigation policy was ultimately accepted by the Supreme Court," Metcalfe said. "The court recognized that you can have something so sensitive that when it is disclosed, it could harm the survivors.

"Vince Foster's youngest child was still in high school at the time," Metcalfe said. "He could have walked into his classroom and seen his father's death displayed on the television screen there. Or his aged grandmother could have seen it on the cover of a supermarket tabloid. That's the interest we were protecting."

Metcalfe also helped establish the legal principle known as "Glomarization," whereby the government can refuse to confirm or deny whether requested records even exist because such an action could reveal FOIA-exempted information. He litigated the first such cases to go to judgment in the late 1970s and argued the leading appellate case of Gardels v. CIA, which kept the CIA from having to confirm or deny the existence of covert contacts on particular American campuses, hence protecting them from foreign intelligence analysts.

Policy Conflicts

As a career Senior Executive Service official leading an office with significant political undercurrents for four different presidents, Metcalfe often enforced and helped shape governmentwide policies that seemed opposed to one another.

For instance, an October 1993 FOIA standard established by President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno rescinded a 1981 rule that had encouraged agencies to withhold information whenever there was "a substantial legal basis" for doing so. The newer legal standard "strongly encouraged" agencies to disclose information requested under FOIA whenever possible.

But an October 2001 memo from President Bush's attorney general, John Ashcroft, superseded the 1993 memo and was viewed in the FOIA and privacy community as an attempt to hold back government information. The memo urged agencies to disclose information under FOIA only after full consideration of the institutional, commercial and personal privacy implications.

Acknowledging that it might be hard to imagine that a single person could have been involved in crafting the Reno and Ashcroft memos, Metcalfe said it was no secret that he worked on each.

"Our responsibility is to implement, not to mention shape, the policy of the current administration as best we can," Metcalfe said. "We have developed a standard of excellence, and that is a big part of what our office has been known for from the beginning."

He denied rumors that he is retiring out of frustration with the Bush administration's overall policies on secrecy in government. He said he has averaged more than 75 hours on the job per week since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and his wife is thrilled that he can cut that back to about 40 in "retirement." He added that he wants to take advantage of opportunities such as teaching law.

"This has been an absolutely fantastic position for an attorney interested in governmentwide policy and litigation," Metcalfe said. "It has been a fabulous job more than 98 percent of the time, even lately."

Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org, a coalition of journalists and good government groups, said that "while it is not clear" whether Metcalfe has "been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been," he has "been a good and faithful government official."

"He followed whatever official party line of whatever administration he was in," McDermott said. "I don't think he's been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been, but he's done a good job doing what his job tells him to do."

International Advocate

Notwithstanding his domestic management and policy achievements, Metcalfe listed his influence on other countries as one of his biggest accomplishments.

When the Justice information and privacy office was created in 1981, Sweden, Norway and the United States were the only countries that had open government policies, he said.

Starting with a group from Japan that same year, several hundred delegations have come to Metcalfe's office for advice on enacting and then implementing open government policies and procedures.

"We have gone all around the world promoting openness in government," Metcalfe said. "When we started, we had only the three. Then the Berlin Wall fell, and many nations realized that government transparency could be used as emblematic building blocks of modern democracy."

Today there are 68 governments with FOIA-like laws, Metcalfe said, nearly all based closely on the American experience with FOIA.

"It's vitally important to have openness in government. It's a cornerstone of democracy," he said. "But at the same time, you have to have the kind of openness that strives for careful, fully responsible disclosure. Sometimes disclosing more information is not responsible. I would have been irresponsible to not try to protect the privacy of Martin Luther King's family, for example."

Former Justice Department Prosecutor Joins Venable (WBJ)

Washington Business Journal, December 22, 2006

South Florida

Seth Rosenthal, a longtime prosecutor for the U.S. Department of Justice who has spent the past two years as legal director of the Alliance for Justice, has joined Venable as a litigation partner in the law firm's Washington office.

Rosenthal, 40, spent 10 years in the DoJ's civil rights division handling a range of federal investigations and prosecutions, including cases involving human trafficking, hate crimes, police misconduct and housing and lending discrimination.

In 1999, Rosenthal also served under then-U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno on a special task force investigating the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Last year, Rosenthal joined the nonprofit Alliance for Justice, an advocacy organization that monitors the selection of federal judges and tracks efforts to change the civil justice system.

"We are getting a wonderful complement of skill sets with Seth Rosenthal -- it's like getting several attorneys at once," says Geoffrey Garinther, national head of Venable's litigation group, in a statement.

In making his first move to the private sector, Rosenthal says he sought out a law firm with a strong litigation practice and a commitment to public service. "Venable definitely stood out in this regard," he says.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bristol-Myers Agrees To $499M Settlement (AP)

By Wallace Witkowski, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. offered to pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into whether the company played a role in a pricing scheme that led insurers and government agencies to overpay for drugs. The company reduced its profit forecast to reflect the charges.

The New York-based drugmaker entered an agreement in principle with the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts to pay the settlement and avoid civil and criminal charges.

The company will also enter a corporate integrity agreement with the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. The agreement must still get final approval from the Justice Department.

Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeff McDonald said the probe covered "a number" of the company's products introduced before 2006, including the anti-psychotic treatment Abilify, as well as some drugs it no longer markets. The company expects the Justice Department review to take "a couple of months" before a decision is made, McDonald said.

Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Massachusetts, would not comment on the settlement offer.

Attorneys general of several states and a number of counties in New York charged that Bristol-Myers and several other drug companies caused the reported average wholesale prices of their drugs to be inflated -- leading government programs and insurers to overpay since reimbursement rates were based on those lists. All the lawsuits were consolidated under the federal district court in Massachusetts.

The practice of using "average wholesale prices" for reimbursement rates has come under fire recently. First DataBank, a unit of Hearst Corp., collects data from drug wholesalers on how much they have paid drug companies for pharmaceuticals and average prices are published in a list that insurers and government agencies use to base reimbursement. However, critics claim that the system has been gamed by drugmakers, distributors and wholesalers for so long, the prices no longer reflect an accurate price.

In October, First DataBank offered a tentative settlement to the same Massachusetts court that called for it to eventually abandon the use of average wholesale prices, and lower its reported prices. Such moves could save health plans an estimated $4 billion in 2007.

Bristol-Myers products on the wholesale price list included the blood thinner Plavix -- its best-selling drug -- along with blood-pressure drug Avapro, cancer treatment Taxol, and the cholesterol-lowering drug Pravachol. The company booked sales of $19.21 billion in 2005.

As a result of the settlement, Bristol-Myers increased its reserves for the probe by $353 million to total $499 million. Separately, the company said it will take a charge of $220 million for debt restructuring in the fourth quarter.

With the charges, the company lowered its full-year 2006 estimate for earnings per share from continuing operations to a range of 72 cents to 77 cents, from a range of 97 cents to $1.02. The company reiterated its 2006 earnings outlook of $1.02 to $1.07 per share, excluding charges. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect earnings per share of $1.04.

The agreement is the latest in a series of deals cut with the government. In June 2005, Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that cost the company $800 million, and was placed under the observation of a federal monitor until 2007.

The same monitor recommended in September that the company fire Chief Executive Pete Dolan after a failed agreement to keep a lower-priced generic version of Plavix off the market attracted the interest of federal investigators. Dolan stepped down the next day. The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it.

Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents to $26.05 in late afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Bristol's $499M Drug-pricing Settlement Among Biggest (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, December 22, 2006

Drugmaker Bristol-Myers Squibb said Thursday that it would pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into its pricing, sales and marketing practices.

The tentative agreement is one of the biggest in recent years for drugmakers regarding drug marketing and pricing.

It aims to settle investigations into Bristol's marketing of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder drug Abilify for conditions the drug was not approved to treat, says Bristol spokesman Jeff Macdonald.

It also covers some cases in which Bristol allegedly inflated drug prices so government programs for the poor and elderly paid more.

It would not negate other so-called average wholesale price cases launched against Bristol by several states and others, Bristol said.

No criminal charges would be filed against Bristol. The agreement is subject to approval by the U.S. Department of Justice and was struck with Justice and the U.S. Attorney for the District of Massachusetts. Their investigation covered more than five years through 2005. It included several other drugs that Bristol declined to name. The U.S. Attorney's office declined comment.

Doctors can prescribe drugs for whatever reason. But drugmakers cannot promote them to treat conditions unless the Food and Drug Administration approves them for that condition.

Numerous drugmakers are or have been under investigation for marketing. In August, Schering-Plough agreed to pay $435 million to settle federal civil and criminal charges that it illegally promoted several drugs and defrauded Medicaid.

Serono settled similar charges last year involving AIDS drug Serostim, as did Pfizer in 2004 involving pain and anti-seizure drug Neurontin.

Settling the investigation would remove one cloud of uncertainty over Bristol, says Moody's Investors Service pharmaceutical analyst Michael Levesque. Bristol shares closed up 1% Thursday at $26.05. Bristol expects 2006 earnings to range from 72 cents a share to 77 cents a share, down from its prior outlook of 97 cents to $1.02 a share. Excluding one-time items, it still expects earnings of $1.02 to $1.07 a share.

Bristol still faces a federal investigation into a failed patent settlement for blood-clot drug Plavix, its biggest-selling drug. In September, it ousted CEO Peter Dolan for mishandling Plavix and has an interim CEO. This agreement would require Bristol to enter into a corporate integrity agreement with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Bristol-Myers Settles Probes Into Pricing For $499 Million (WSJ)

By Mike Barris And Angela Moore

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said it reached a preliminary agreement with the Justice Department and the U.S. attorney for the district of Massachusetts to settle years-old investigations into its drug pricing, sales and marketing practices.

The New York drug company will pay $499 million and enter a corporate-integrity agreement with the Department of Health and Human Services. There will be no criminal charges against it under the agreement, which must still get final approval from the Justice Department. (See Bristol-Myers statement1.)

Attorneys general of several states and a number of counties in New York charged that Bristol-Myers inflated the average wholesale prices of its drugs, which are used by government programs and insurers for reimbursement purposes. All suits were consolidated under the federal district court in Massachusetts.

Bristol-Myers said it will increase the reserves set aside to cover the cost of the probes by $353 million, to be recorded in the fourth quarter. Separately, the company will take a fourth-quarter charge of $220 million for debt restructuring.

The company now expects 2006 earnings of 72 cents to 77 cents a share, down from an outlook of 97 cents to $1.02. Excluding special items, Bristol-Myers still expects profit of $1.02 to $1.07 a share.

Bristol-Myers shares were up 28 cents, or 1%, to $26.05, in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

In August, rival Schering-Plough Corp. agreed to pay $435 million and a unit pleaded guilty to criminal charges to settle federal allegations of fraudulent drug marketing and pricing, one of the largest settlements in a crackdown that has forced big drug makers to return billions of dollars the U.S. government says were illegally extracted from the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

In its release, Bristol-Myers didn't elaborate on the investigations.

In July 2003, Bristol-Myers started an internal review into whether its sales violated U.S. antikickback laws and drug-pricing rules. That move came just as executives were saying the company had turned the corner after an accounting scandal.

Bristol-Myers Agrees To Settle U.S. Investigation (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. agreed to pay $499 million to settle U.S. allegations it overcharged the government for drugs and promoted medicines for unapproved uses. The company lowered its 2006 earnings forecast 26 percent.

The settlement resolves federal charges the company inflated the average wholesale price of some drugs, Bristol-Myers said in a statement today. Setting aside funds for the settlement will reduce 2006 profit from continuing operations to 72 to 77 cents a share from 97 cents to $1.02.

U.S. investigators in Massachusetts also were examining promotion of the Abilify schizophrenia drug and ``other current and divested products" for unapproved, or off-label, uses, said Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeffrey MacDonald in a telephone interview today. The company last year settled a previous probe involving allegations it boosted sales by encouraging distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell.

The latest agreement ``removes an overhang, but the lack of information makes it difficult for Wall Street to react," said Les Funtleyder, an analyst for Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in a telephone interview today. ``The laws around average wholesale pricing are convoluted. It's easy to run afoul of the rules. I don't think Wall Street takes this too seriously."

Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.05 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock has risen 15 percent in the last 12 months.

Reimbursement Rates

The case stems from the government practice of using average wholesale prices, as reported by the drugmakers, to set reimbursement rates for medicines used by federal health programs, including Medicare and Medicaid. State attorneys and consumer groups claimed the companies used the formula to artificially inflate drug prices.

GlaxoSmithKline Plc, Europe's biggest drugmaker, agreed in August to pay about $70 million to settle claims it overcharged U.S. government health programs by exploiting the formula.

The drugmaker also said today that it boosted its reserves for the latest settlement by $353 million and said it would record an estimated pretax charge of $220 million for previously disclosed debt restructuring. McDonald wouldn't identify the other therapies being probed by regulators.

No criminal charges will be filed as a result of today's preliminary settlement, the company said. The agreement still must be approved by the Justice Department, the statement said.

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment in a telephone interview today.

Private Suit

Bristol-Myers has not yet resolved a private class action suit involving drug prices, MacDonald said. The private case involves pricing of 20 drugs, according to a regulatory filing. MacDonald declined to comment on which drugs were involved.

Separately, Bristol-Myers and other drugmakers have been sued by Attorneys General of several states over pricing practices, according to a regulatory filing. Investigations by the U.S. Attorneys' Offices for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the Northern District of Texas are also continuing.

As part of last year's agreement, the company removed Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan as chairman, paid $300 million to the government and allowed former U.S. District Judge Frederick Lacey to monitor its transactions. In September, the company fired Dolan as CEO on Lacey's urging as a result of an agreement Dolan made to delay competition on the Plavix heart pill.

Strong Medicine (TTNJ)

By George E. Jordan, Times Staff

Trenton Times, December 22, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb's penalty bill has surpassed $1 billion.

The New York drugmaker yesterday announced a proposed $499 million settlement of a criminal investigation in Massachusetts of price-fixing and off-label promotion of a schizophrenia drug. The agreement, which must be approved by federal prosecutors, adds to the company's payouts during the past two years to settle criminal investigations and lawsuits involving patent disputes, pricing practices and drug-safety issues.

The latest probe covered a number of the company's products introduced before 2006, including the anti-psychotic treatment Abilify, as well as some drugs it no longer markets, said Jeff MacDonald, a Bristol spokesman. The company expects the Justice Department review to take "a couple of months" before a decision is made, he said.

The penalty will hurt the company's bottom line. For the second time this year, Bristol lowered its 2006 earnings forecast to between 72 cents and 77 cents a share. Previously, it expected 97 cents to $1.02. The company left unchanged its 2007 earnings forecast for a net profit of between $1.02 and $1.07 a share.

Wall Street yawned. After dropping in morning trading, Bristol's shares rallied to close up 1 percent.

"This is nothing unexpected," MacDonald said, adding the settlement was mentioned in Bristol's financial disclosures earlier this year. "Hopefully, this is not something totally out of left field."

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment.

Bristol -- with 6,000 workers in New Brunswick and Princeton -- remains under criminal investigation by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark for a botched deal with Apotex, a Canadian drugmaker that flooded the U.S. market with copycat versions of the blood thinner Plavix, Bristol's top-selling drug.

After generic Plavix cut into Bristol's revenue, the company fired former Chief Executive Peter Dolan, who was one of the youngest Fortune 500 chieftains, and lowered its 2006 earnings guidance. Bristol is searching for Dolan's successor.

The proposed settlement announced yesterday comes a year after Bristol signed a deferred prosecution agreement with the U.S. Attorney in Newark to avoid criminal prosecution for "pipe-stuffing," a scheme that boosted Bristol's sales in 1999 through 2001 by encouraging distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell. Under the agreement, Bristol reimbursed shareholders $300 million and former U.S. District Judge Frederick Lacey was appointed to monitor Bristol's finances.

In total, Bristol paid $842 million in fines and settlements related to the accounting scandal -- an amount federal prosecutors have said equals the losses suffered by stockholders in the four days after Bristol's 2002 earning restatement.

MacDonald said yesterday's proposed settlement also covers an investigation into alleged overbilling of Medicare and Medicaid by Bristol. The U.S. Justice Department has been investigating several drugmakers for alleged manipulation of the average wholesale price, a system that uses prices as reported by the drugmakers to set reimbursement rates for medicines.

GlaxoSmithKline, Europe's biggest drugmaker, agreed in August to pay about $70 million to settle claims it overcharged U.S. federal health programs.

MacDonald said the company hasn't resolved a private class action lawsuit that alleges the company used the average price formula to inflate prices.

Bristol said it lowered its 2006 earnings to boost its reserves by $353 million to pay the settlement and an estimated pretax charge of $220 million for previously disclosed debt restructuring unrelated to the settlement.

Deutsche Bank Settles Some Cases (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Deutsche Bank AG agreed to pay $208 million to end state and federal investigations into the timing of trading in mutual-fund accounts that could benefit insiders and hurt other investors.

The settlement is the 21st by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in his mutual-funds investigation over the past three years.

Mr. Spitzer had accused the German bank's asset-management division of allowing excessive market timing in its mutual funds. He also accused its broker-dealer division of assisting in what he called deceptive market timing and allowing a form of late trading by one client.

In one scheme, Mr. Spitzer claimed that a favored trader would make a trade before the 4 p.m. close of the U.S. market, but the trade would then be rejected by a fund company. A senior Deutsche Bank broker then would contact the trader and permit him or her to substitute a different trade, sometimes as late as 5 p.m. That would allow the trader to benefit from changes in the market or news not available to most traders.

Deutsche Bank didn't admit or deny the allegations as part of the settlement.

The company said all the alleged improper arrangements originated in subsidiaries before they became part of Deutsche Bank and that those were stopped before Mr. Spitzer and the Securities and Exchange Commission acted. No current employees approved of the arrangements, the company said.

The deal calls for $102 million in restitution to investors and $20 million in civil penalties. Deutsche Bank must reduce fees by $86 million to investors over five years. It agreed to several overhauls, including disclosing to investors expenses and fees and ensuring independent officials monitor operations to avoid conflicts of interest that could hurt investors.

SEC Charges Former Tyco Officials With Fraud (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission charged three former Tyco International Ltd. financial executives with securities-law violations for "structuring sham transactions" and "manipulating reserves" to boost reported income and cash flow by well over $700 million from 1997 to 2002.

Tyco, a conglomerate whose nominal headquarters is now in Bermuda, became a stock market darling in the 1990s, revered for its predictable growth fueled by aggressive acquisitions. However, its stock price started tumbling in 2002 after questions were raised about accounting practices.

Last year, Tyco's former chief executive, L. Dennis Kozlowski was convicted of looting the company. He and former chief financial officer Mark H. Swartz are serving prison sentences in New York state. Both are appealing their convictions.

The SEC's civil charges name two lower-level officials who reported to Mr. Kozlowski or Mr. Swartz. Richard D. Power, now 58, held a series of financial positions in a 20-year career at Tyco, including chief financial officer and vice president-special projects. Edward Federman, 53, was controller of Tyco and later chief financial officer of Tyco Electronics, a big division. The SEC is seeking disgorgement of unspecified gains and fines.

Daniel J. Horwitz, of Dickstein Shapiro who represents Mr. Power, said: "Mr. Power is a person of integrity and we intend to fight these allegations vigorously." Lawyers for the other two men didn't return phone calls. The men didn't return calls.

A third former official, Richard "Skip" Heger, was accused of separate securities violations. He agreed to pay $450,000 to settle with the SEC, without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Mr. Heger had served as vice president for finance of Tyco's fire and security services division until 2002.

According to the SEC, Mr. Power developed an accounting scheme for security-alarm monitoring contracts to boost earnings after Tyco acquired ADT Ltd., a security monitoring company, in 1997. Under the scheme, Tyco added a $200 "growth bonus" to the $800 fee that ADT had been paying dealers for each contract. But it also demanded the dealers pay Tyco a new $200 "dealer connection fee." The SEC said "the sham transaction had no economic substance." But Tyco treated the fee as additional income that it recognized immediately, and it treated the "growth bonus" as a capital expenditure that was amortized over 10 years.

The SEC said that Messrs. Federman and Power also engaged in "abusive acquisition accounting" from 1996 through 2002.

Fidelity Imposes Penalty On Itself After Gifts Probe (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz And William M. Bulkeley

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

BOSTON -- Fidelity Investments said it will pay $42 million to some of its mutual funds as redress for lavish gifts and entertainment some of its equity traders accepted from brokers between 2002 and 2004.

The payments were recommended by several of Fidelity's independent trustees who conducted an internal probe of the matter. They included departed member Robert M. Gates, the new Defense Secretary.

The trustees concluded "it was not possible to prove" statistically that shareholders were harmed, according to the report. But they recommended Fidelity pay the penalty, saying the company inadequately supervised the traders.

In a rare public statement, Edward C. Johnson III, chairman of Fidelity, posted a letter on Fidelity's Web site, personally offering his apology for "this improper behavior" and saying that "there is no question that the Funds were put at potential risk."

"Therefore, I have agreed that Fidelity should pay a penalty set by the Trustees for this misbehavior and the company's failure to stop it," he wrote.

The independent trustees of Fidelity funds launched an investigation in July 2005. Fidelity has disciplined -- including, in some cases, firing -- more than 20 employees on its trading desk and has adopted new policies on gifts. The company so far has not been subject to any regulatory action, unlike the brokers involved, although it remains under investigation by the SEC.

The New York-based brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. two weeks ago agreed to pay more than $10 million to the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Securities and Exchange Commission to settle allegations that a former top employee wooed Fidelity traders with expensive wine and private-jet travel to win mutual-fund trading business.

In its settlement with Jefferies, the SEC noted that its business with Fidelity soared during the time gifts were being doled out. Mutual funds are supposed to send stock trades to whichever firms offer the best price.

Shareholders won't receive a check or a direct payment. The money Fidelity will pay to each mutual fund will become part of the fund's total assets and will "be put to work by the fund by investing in securities," said Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley.

She said Fidelity also plans to make a redress payment to its pension funds and other institutional shareholders.

Sony BMG To Pay $4.25 Million In Settlement With 39 States (AP)

By Alex Veiga, AP Business Writer

AP, December 22, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-Sony BMG Music Entertainment will pay $4.25 million (â,¬3.23 million) as part of a settlement with 39 states to resolve investigations into problems caused by music CDs loaded with hidden anti-piracy software.

Under terms of Thursday's agreement, which also applies to the District of Columbia, the record company will reimburse consumers whose computers were damaged while trying to uninstall the anti-piracy software.

Sony BMG also said it will no longer distribute any compact discs loaded with copy-protection software that hinders computer users from easily locating it or removing it from their PCs.

DOJ_NMG_0108441

The office of Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly took the lead in brokering the multistate agreement, which was expected to be filed Thursday in Suffolk County Superior Court in Boston.

"If companies want to use technology to protect their interests, they need to be up front with consumers, and give consumers the opportunity to make informed choices about buying and using these products," Reilly said in a prepared statement.

Thirteen states that started the settlement process with Sony BMG will each receive $316,538 (â‚¬240,202), while the rest will get $5,000 (â‚¬3,794), Reilly's office said.

New York-based Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG, said it was pleased to reach the agreement.

It covers CDs loaded with one of two types of copy-protection software - MediaMax or XCP. The record label began including MediaMax on some of its discs in August 2003 and introduced XCP in January 2005.

Last year, the record company shipped more than 12 million compact discs on 52 Sony BMG titles, each loaded with one of the two programs. About 4 million CDs with the MediaMax software and about 3 million CDs loaded with the XCP software were sold.

Both programs restricted the number of copies of a disc that a user could make, but the programs caused problems for some users when they played the CDs on their computers.

The XCP software concealed itself to thwart computer users from finding it and attempting to delete it. It also ended up opening a potential security hole on PCs running on Microsoft Corp.'s Windows Operating System, making them vulnerable to viruses or other threats.

Some who used certain antispyware software to remove the programs ended up with a glitch that disabled their CD-ROM drives.

As word spread on the Internet in late 2005 that the CDs carried hidden software, some suggested the company was using the technology to spy on consumers.

Sony BMG maintained it did not use the software to collect personal data about consumers without their consent - an assertion backed up by an outside company commissioned by the company to audit its use of the copy-protection software.

Sony BMG ultimately recalled the discs with XCP in November 2005 and released a way to remove the files from users' computers. It also released a software patch to fix a potential security hole from the MediaMax 5.0 program.

Customers will be able to file a claim with Sony BMG to receive refunds of up to $175 (â‚¬133), but claims must include a description of how their computer was harmed and documentation of repair expenses.

The refund policy will also apply to states that were not a party to the settlement.

The latest settlement closes out the states' investigations into the problem.

On Tuesday, Sony BMG reached a separate settlement with California and Texas, agreeing to pay $1.5 million (â‚¬1.14 million) to the states and reimburse consumers for PC damage. The company earlier settled a class-action case over the episode.

In addition to Massachusetts, the states that were a party to Thursday's settlement are: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (AP)

By Terence Chea

AP, December 22, 2006

A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle.

DOJ_NMG_0108442

The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

After the antitrust lawsuit was filed in July, Hearst and MediaNews asked the judge to seal certain documents containing business information they considered confidential.

In the motion filed Thursday, Media Alliance and the Bay Guardian argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential.

"These are the nation's biggest newspaper chains, and they're moving to destroy daily competition in the Bay Area and impose regional monopoly," said Bruce Brugmann, the Bay Guardian's editor and publisher. "They should not be able to do it in the middle of the night with sealed documents."

Hearst officials were reviewing the motion and could not comment Thursday, said spokesman Paul Luthringer. Representatives at MediaNews did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

New York-based Hearst has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers - on top of the seven it already owns. Hearst's investment helped finance MediaNews' purchase of the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market.

The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet.

On Tuesday, Judge Illston barred Bay Area newspapers owned by MediaNews and Hearst from consolidating some of their business operations until the lawsuit is resolved.

When she issued a temporary restraining order against the alliance in November, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge some of their business operations.

The case is expected to go to trial next spring.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Business Interests Challenge Oversight (WP)

By Kathleen Day

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

A business group argued in U.S. District Court yesterday that a panel created by Congress to police the accounting industry lacks sufficient oversight by the White House.

The five-member Public Company Accounting Oversight Board acts as a federal regulator, deciding whether accounting firms are fit to audit the books of publicly traded companies, without having been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate as the Constitution requires, the plaintiffs argued.

Lawyers for the accounting board, created in 2002 under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, and the Justice Department argued that the board is legal because it is supervised by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a federal agency whose members are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the agency supports the Justice Department's position.

The legal battle is part of an attempt by business groups to roll back Sarbanes-Oxley, which Congress passed in response to widespread corporate frauds such as those at Enron and WorldCom.

At the heart of those frauds were financial statements that presented an inaccurate picture of each company's health to investors and employees, who lost tens of billions of dollars after the problems were made public and the companies' stock prices plummeted. In some cases, stock became worthless.

Among the investor protections created under Sarbanes-Oxley was a board to oversee the accounting industry. The idea was that the board would help to ensure that audits of companies are accurate and not just rubber stamps without meaning.

Lawyers attacking the legality of the accounting oversight board represent Beckstead & Watts, an accounting firm under investigation by the board, and the Free Enterprise Fund, a nonprofit group that advocates "limited government" and whose chairman, Mallory Factor, is a major Republican fundraiser.

Attorney Michael A. Carvin, who presented the oral argument against the accounting board, argued before the Florida Supreme Court on behalf of George W. Bush in the dispute over recounting votes in the 2000 presidential election. Co-counsel Kenneth W. Starr was independent counsel in the Whitewater investigation of President Bill Clinton.

Carvin said the SEC can "veto" the board's rules and "stop them from doing bad things." But, he said, "that's not supervision."

Jeffrey A. Lamken, a lawyer hired by the accounting board, said Congress gave the SEC "broad" authority to supervise the board, including the power to take away its authority in any investigation.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said he would decide the case as soon as possible.

The case pits people who supported President Bush's reelection against the White House policy of supporting the accounting board. And it puts the board in a difficult situation: The panel privately has chafed at SEC oversight but must now publicly argue that it is that oversight that makes it beholden to the president, and therefore legal.

This week the board, under pressure from the SEC, proposed a relaxed set of rules to implement another section of Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires companies to document, and an outside auditor to confirm, that adequate internal controls are in place to ensure that financial statements filed with the SEC are accurate.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Teen Drug Use Down, U-M Study Shows (DET)

By Gordon Trowbridge

Detroit News, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Drug use among American youths continued to decline in the past year, according to a federally funded study by the University of Michigan, a trend Bush administration officials said ratified their anti-drug efforts.

"This is not a natural waxing and waning of social forces," said John Walters, the Bush administration drug czar. He attributed sharp declines since the start of the decade to anti-drug advertising campaigns and other government programs.

U-M's Monitoring the Future survey, in its 32nd year, found small drops in drug use, at any point or in the last 12 months, among the more than 48,000 eighth, 10th and 12th graders surveyed. Most of the decline came in use of marijuana, the most commonly used illegal drug. The number of 12th graders reporting use of marijuana in the last year, for example, declined from 38.4 percent in 2005 to 36.5 percent this year.

Most other drugs showed small declines, but generally the drops were not statistically significant.

Walters and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed to figures showing that overall drug use had declined about 23 percent since 2001 as an endorsement of the administration's policies. Walters said anti-drug programs and advertising campaigns designed to make drug use less socially acceptable among young people can have a powerful effect.

"We have not always delivered that message consistently," he said, saying that the government "took our eye off the ball" in the late 1990s and allowed drug use to increase.

Lloyd Johnston, the U-M researcher, said there were a number of cautionary notes in the survey. Abuse of prescription drugs, especially painkillers such as Vicodin and Oxycontin, is high and in some cases rising; Vicodin has become the second most abused drug among 12th graders, with about 10 percent of those in the survey saying they had abused it in the last year.

Also, after falling by more than 50 percent in the last decade, the declines have stopped in smoking, especially among younger students.

Illegal Drug Use By Teenagers Is On Decline, U.S. Study Finds (NYT)

By Micah Cohen

New York Times, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108444

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The percentage of teenagers using illegal drugs continued a decade-long decline in 2006, but the illicit use of prescription drugs remains worrying, according to a survey released Thursday by the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

"I think we're seeing a generation that has gotten wiser about drugs," said Lloyd D. Johnston, the survey's principal investigator. But more attention, Dr. Johnston said, should be paid to prescription drug abuse.

The survey showed a decline of 23 percent since 2001 in the percentage of students who said they had used "any illicit drug" in the month before taking the survey, with 14.9 percent saying they had used such drugs.

The 32nd annual report was based on a survey of almost 50,000 students in the 8th, 10th, and 12th grades in more than 400 public and private schools nationwide. The survey was financed by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, and carried out by the University of Michigan.

A question was added to the survey in 2002, asking students specifically about the recreational use of Vicodin and OxyContin, both narcotic drugs prescribed to treat pain. Since then, nonmedical use of those drugs has increased slightly, although abuse of OxyContin by eighth graders doubled to 2.6 percent in 2006, from 1.3 percent in 2002.

"We're not changing the rate that prescription medications are being taken by young people," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said.

This 2006 survey asked for the first time whether the students used over-the-counter cough medicine.

John P. Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the response was alarming, with 4.2 percent of 8th graders, 5.3 percent of 10th graders and 6.9 percent of 12th graders saying they used nonprescription cough medicine recreationally.

Because most drug abuse is declining among teenagers, and prescription drug abuse has remained stable, "prescription drug abuse represents a larger part of the total problem," said Dr. Johnston, who is program director at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan.

Mr. Walters said, "Based on the trends we've seen with prescription drug abuse among teens, and corroborated by the results from this report, it's clear we need to start developing messages for young people about the dangers of misusing prescription drugs."

In 1998, three years before Mr. Walters became director, the drug control policy office began the National Youth Anti-Drug Media Campaign — an effort to use multimedia messages to persuade adolescents to stay drug free. That campaign has not produced an advertisement warning about prescription drug abuse.

The survey released Thursday also suggested that the continuous decline in daily smoking of cigarettes by 8th and 10th graders had ended, although the rate, which peaked in the mid-1990's, did not increase.

"I hate to see that improvement stop, as it seems to be doing," Dr. Johnston said.

Teens Getting High On Medicine As Abuse Of Illegal Drugs Falls (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Use of illegal drugs by teenagers fell slightly over the past year as adolescents took prescription drugs and over-the-counter cough medicines to get high, a U.S. government-funded study showed.

The survey found increasing adolescent use of prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin. The annual look at drug use by students in eighth, 10th and 12th grades also showed that teenagers are abusing cough and cold medicine at a rate that U.S. officials said is a cause for concern.

``Youth may think these drugs are safer or safe because they are talked about as medicines," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, at a news conference in Washington. He urged parents to ``go to your medicine cabinet and take unused or those prescription drugs you are finished using and throw them away."

Walters and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the results of the study, sponsored by the National Institute of Drug Abuse and conducted by the University of Michigan, were mainly positive and continued to show a drop in drug abuse.

Youth drug use in 2006 is 23.2 percent lower than it was in 2001, Walters said. Use of marijuana, the most popular illegal drug, fell 25 percent over the five-year period, while cigarette smoking dropped by 29 percent and drinking alcohol fell by 13 percent, he said.

The results ``are very, very encouraging to all of us in government,'' said Gonzales.

Slight Decline

The number of students who reported taking illegal drugs during the past 12 months declined slightly from 2005. Fifteen percent of eighth graders, 29 percent of 10th graders and 37 percent of 12th graders had used illicit drugs, the study said. The reduction from the previous year was less than 1 percent for eighth graders, 1 percent for 10th graders and 1.9 percent for those in 12th grade.

Use of marijuana showed a decline, though researchers said the small decrease for eighth grade students -- 0.5 percent from 2005 -- may mean the five-year drop is ending. Use of methamphetamines fell significantly among 10th graders, though not in the other two grades, the study found.

A number of drugs, including LSD, powder cocaine, heroin and other narcotics, tranquilizers and sedatives, showed no change in use this year, according to researchers. Ecstasy was one of the few drugs that more students reported taking, with its use by 12th graders rising 1.1 percent from last year.

At Some Point in Life

Overall, 21 percent of eighth graders, 36 percent of 10th graders and 28 percent of 12th graders said they had taken an illegal drug at some point in their life, the study found.

Of prescription drugs, the use of Vicodin, a narcotic painkiller, rose among all three grade levels. Abuse of OxyContin, also a painkiller, increased by eighth and 10th graders.

This year's study for the first time included a question on cough and cold medicines. Those that are taken recreationally contain dextromethorphan, which in high doses can cause alterations of mood and consciousness. On the street the drug is known as DXM, Dex or skittles.

Four percent of eighth graders, 5 percent of 10th graders and 7 percent of 12th grade students reported using cough medicines to get high during the prior year, the study said.

The survey showed that 6 percent of eighth graders, 19 percent of 10th graders and 30 percent of 12th graders reported being drunk at least once in the prior month.

Daily cigarette smoking by teens has stopped declining after a decade of improvement, according to the study. Still, since the peak in the mid-1990s, daily smoking has fallen by 50 percent among 12th graders and more than 50 percent of eighth and 10th graders, researchers said.

The survey, which has been conducted since 1975, measures drug, alcohol and cigarette use by adolescent students across the U.S. This year, 48,460 students in eighth, 10th and 12th grades from 410 public and private schools participated.

Illegal Drug Use Among Teenagers Continues To Fall (WP)

By Christopher Lee

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Federal officials are concerned that teenagers are abusing prescription medications and over-the-counter cold remedies even as their use of illegal drugs has generally declined over the past five years, according to a government survey released yesterday.

Illegal drug use by teenagers has fallen 23 percent since 2001, but their use of prescription narcotics, tranquilizers and other medicines remains "relatively high," government investigators said.

For the first time researchers asked whether teenagers were using nonprescription cough or cold medicines to get high and found reason for concern. Over-the-counter medicines often contain the cough suppressant dextromethorphan, which alters mood and consciousness when consumed in high doses and can cause brain damage or even death, officials said.

About 1 in 14 12th-graders, or 7 percent, said they had taken such medicines to get high in the past year. Among eighth-graders, the figure was 1 in 25, or about 4 percent.

"This is now an area of drug abuse that we need to pay more attention to," said Lloyd D. Johnston, the University of Michigan researcher who led the annual "Monitoring the Future" survey, now in its 32nd year. "My guess is that young people do not understand the dangers of abusing these drugs."

The annual government-funded survey reached 48,460 students in the eighth, 10th and 12th grades in 410 public and private schools nationwide.

Prescription-drug abuse remained a persistent problem, officials said. After rising steadily since 2002, the percentage of 12th-graders who said they had used the highly addictive painkiller OxyContin in the past year fell from 5.5 percent to 4.3 percent, about the same level as four years ago. Use of Vicodin, another popular narcotic, more or less has held steady since 2002, with 10 percent of 12th-graders, 7 percent of 10th-graders and 3 percent of eighth-graders saying they had used it to get high within the past year.

"If there is one thing that every adult can do today to help protect young people against prescription drugs, it is go to your medicine cabinet, take those prescription drugs you are finished using and throw them away," said John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy. "If you have teens in your house, remove this hazard today."

Overall, the survey shows a continued long-term decline in teenagers' use of alcohol and illicit drugs such as marijuana, the most widely used illicit substance. The reduction occurred while federal funding for anti-drug advertising fell annually, from $185 million when President Bush took office in 2001 to $100 million in 2006. However, the past year's declines in drug and alcohol use were "relatively small," the report said.

"In many ways, this was a year of modest changes, but nearly all of it in the right direction," Johnston said.

For instance, about 32 percent of high school seniors and 25 percent of 10th-graders said they had used marijuana in the past year, down from 34 percent and 27 percent, respectively, in 2005. Among eighth-graders the figure held steady at about 12 percent. In 2000, the comparable figures were 37 percent for seniors, 32 percent for sophomores and 16 percent for eighth-graders.

In 2006, about 30 percent of 12th-graders said they had been drunk in the month before taking the survey, the same as in 2005. That compared with about 32 percent in 2000 and 31 percent in 1996.

Cocaine use dipped slightly among eighth- and 10th-graders in 2006, with 2 percent and 3 percent, respectively, saying they had used the drug in the past year. But it rose slightly among 12th-graders, to 6 percent from 5 percent. In 2000, by comparison, 5 percent of seniors reported using the drug in the past year, as did 4 percent of sophomores and 3 percent of eighth-graders.

Critics noted that teenagers' use of marijuana, cocaine and other illicit drugs remains higher today than it was 15 years ago. In 2006, 37 percent of high school seniors said they had used an illicit drug in the past year. In 1991, 29 percent said so.

"This isn't progress," said Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Marijuana Policy Project, an advocacy group that wants marijuana to be regulated and taxed the way alcohol is. "The truth is that our policies don't work."

Walters warned that favorable trends could turn around.

"We've had in the past a tendency to take our eye off the ball," he said. "We want to continue this decline, and that requires us to stay at it. If we fail to send anti-drug messages across multiple contexts with young people -- especially given the contrary drumbeat that still appears in popular culture and on the Internet -- we risk losing our progress."

Teen Drug Use Drops, With Exceptions (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Abuse of the painkiller OxyContin by younger teens hit record levels in 2006, a national survey says.

While most other teen drug and alcohol use continued a decade-long decline, teen abuse of pharmaceuticals, including prescription narcotics, barely budged, the survey says.

The annual survey of 50,000 high school and middle school students, released Thursday, was conducted by the University of Michigan for the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

Among high school seniors, the percentage reporting that they had used prescription narcotics, including OxyContin and Vicodin, in the past year declined from 9.5% in 2004, the peak year, to 9% in 2006, the survey found. Among younger teens, OxyContin use rose this year: 2.6% of eighth-graders and 3.8% of 10th-graders reported having used the drug, up from 1.8% and 3.2% in 2005.

For the first time, the survey asked teenagers whether they used over-the-counter cough or cold medicine to get high. One in 25 eighth-graders and one in 14 seniors said they had abused the medicines in the past year.

"Clearly, prescription drugs have become more a part of the problem," says the study's principal investigator, Lloyd Johnson.

High school seniors saw the largest drop in overall drug use. The percentage reporting any illicit drug use was 36.5% in 2006, compared with 38.4% in 2005.

Regular marijuana use among teens declined for the fifth year in a row. Among seniors, 31.5% said they had used the drug in the previous year, compared with 33.6% in 2005 and 37% in 2001.

"It's great to have one-quarter fewer kids using drugs than there were in 2001," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. His office will design an ad campaign targeting abuse of prescription drugs, he said.

Other drugs showing a decline include methamphetamine and crack cocaine. The use of LSD, inhalants, cocaine, crystal meth, heroin, narcotics other than heroin, tranquilizers and sedatives remained stable.

Researchers say they have new concerns about Ecstasy, inhalants and prescription drugs.

The survey noted a slight increase in inhalant and Ecstasy use among seniors and a continuing decline in the percentage of students who consider these drugs dangerous, Johnston said. "It's a little disturbing, and we wouldn't want to see a rebound," he said.

Older students showed the sharpest drops in drug use, which reflects declines in previous years among eighth- and 10th-graders who have carried their lower drug use with them as they age, Johnston said.

The survey shows that federal policies have little effect on drug use in the USA, says Rob Kampia, executive director of the Marijuana Policy Project, a Washington, D.C.-based organization that wants to legalize marijuana.

"Our suggestion is to face the facts, to acknowledge that this war on marijuana users has failed to prevent teenagers from using marijuana," Kampia says. "The federal government hasn't had a new idea in 30 years. … What we've been doing for decades isn't working."

Teens' Use Of Illegal Drugs Drops (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price And Brittney Pescatore

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Teenagers' use of illegal drugs has declined significantly in the past five years, a new government study shows, although the study found a slight increase in teens abusing prescription painkillers and other legally available substances.

Comparing data from 2001 and 2006, the federal study found the number of teens who reported using marijuana within the past 30 days fell 25 percent, while past 30-day use of methamphetamine plunged 50 percent during the same five-year period.

Teen use of cigarettes, alcohol, steroids, cocaine, heroin and LSD were also down, in some cases dramatically, the report from the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) found. Underage drinking is down more than a third since it peaked a decade ago. Past-month teen smoking is at an all-time low, with the biggest declines among 12th-graders.

The 32nd annual NIDA "Monitoring the Future" survey, conducted by the University of Michigan, found that 840,000 fewer adolescents used illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001. The 23-percent decline in past 30-day usage nearly reached President Bush's goal of reducing teens' illicit-drug use by 25 percent during that time period.

However, officials said they were concerned by other findings in this year's report -- based on a survey of nearly 50,000 eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders from 410 public and private schools -- which marked the first time "Monitoring the Future" examined the frequency of teens using over-the-counter (OTC) cough-and-cold medicines to get high.

Dr. Elias A. Zerhouni, director of the National Institutes of Health, of which NIDA is a part, said the report showed that 4.2 percent of eighth-graders, 5.3 percent of 10th-graders and 6.9 percent of 12th-graders reported such misuse of nonprescription cough-and-cold medicines containing dextromethorphan (DXM), a cough suppressant, during the past 12 months. DXM -- known by the slang term "dex" or "skittles" -- is generally safe when taken at recommended levels. But it can cause harmful side effects, such as alterations of consciousness or mood, if taken in large amounts, health officials say.

Coupled with that, the report showed increased teen abuse of prescription painkillers, Vicodin and Oxycontin, and of stimulants including Ritalin, which is commonly prescribed for those suffering attention-deficit disorders.

Authors of the study expressed "significant concern" over the Vicodin data. Use of that drug by teens rose 0.3 percent between 2002 and 2006 and 0.6 percent just from last year. Vicodin use remained high in all three grade levels, with nearly one in 10 high-school seniors saying they had taken it in the past year.

Oxycontin use by high-school seniors dipped between 2005 and 2006 but not for students in younger grades, the report showed.

University of Michigan researcher Lloyd Johnston, lead investigator in the study, told reporters at a press conference yesterday that annual prevalence of Oxycontin use by 12th-graders averaged 4.3 percent this year, down from 5.5 percent in 2005. But the 2.6 percent annual prevalence by eighth-graders and the 3.6 percent prevalence by sophomores were the highest ever. Use among eighth-graders seems to be increasing rapidly.

"Obviously, relatively few young people are using Oxycontin; still, given the addictive potential of this strong narcotic drug, I think we should be concerned about these rates," Mr. Johnston said.

He added: "Because most of the illegal drugs like LSD, Ecstasy, cocaine and heroin have shown considerable declines in recent years, while the misuse of prescription drugs has been growing, the latter have become a more important part of the country's drug problems."

Although use of marijuana also has been declining, it remains the most widely used of all illegal drugs, Mr. Johnston said.

He and others also expressed concern that eighth-graders two years in a row have shown a decreased perception of the harmfulness of Ecstasy. He said too many teens also fail to recognize the dangers posed by DXM in cough medicines.

"The survey results indicate that the messages we are sending to students about addiction and drug abuse are having an overall positive effect," said Dr. Zerhouni. But he called the "rise in prescription-drug use among the younger grades and the intentional abuse of over-the-counter medicines ... very disturbing."

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, urged parents to help the Bush administration's campaign against teen drug abuse by discarding unused and unneeded drugs from their home medicine cabinets.

Teen Drug Abuse Moves To The Medicine Cabinet (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK

There's some very good news in the battle against illicit drugs: Use by America's teens has dropped more than 23 percent during the last five years.

But their abuse of medicines, both over-the-counter and prescription, is rising.

These opposing trends - detailed in a survey of teens released Thursday - reflect the complexity of the US drug scene. They also present a new set of challenges. The most important: How to apply the prevention tools that have apparently succeeded in combating illegal drug use to fight the abuse of legal medicines.

Experts credit campaigns focusing on parental involvement and the dangers of abuse for the significant declines in not only drugs like marijuana, but alcohol and cigarettes as well.

The newly released Monitoring the Future study, which experts consider to be one of the most definitive in the US, is done by the University of Michigan and funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse. It found that teen use of marijuana - their most common drug - declined from 35 percent in 2001 to 29 percent in 2006.

"The broad nature of these declines across multiple drugs and alcohol and cigarettes ... is a kind of youth movement for the good," says John Walters, director of National Drug Control Policy at the press conference in Washington. "This shows us that we can as a society push back and make a difference. When we do that effectively together it has enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives."

Studies consistently show that if people don't start using drugs during their teen years, it is very unlike that they will develop drug problems later in life. That means there will be "less addiction, less suffering, less crime, lower health costs, and higher achievement for this upcoming generation of Americans," Mr. Walters says.

At the same time Walters trumpeted success, he warned that the increase in the abuse of medicines has to be addressed now, if the positive trends are to continue.

Nearly 1 in 10 high school seniors used the narcotic painkiller Vicodin without a prescription and nearly 1 in 20 used the painkiller Oxycontin, according to the Monitoring the Future study.

The findings were backed by recent studies done by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America in New York. Those studies found 1 in 5 teens, ages 12 to 17, report intentionally abusing a prescription drug. As many as 1 in 10 intentionally abused over-the-counter drugs, like cough medicines that contain dextromethorphan.

Focus groups done by the Partnership found that kids think these drugs are either safe, or at least safer, because they're legal. This change of drug type and source, from the neighborhood drug dealer to the family medicine cabinet, is just one of the dilemmas.

"We don't know if they're abusing medicines instead of abusing so-called street drugs," says Tom Hedrick, a founding member of Partnership, "although current research does indicate that heavy abusers of medicines are also abusing illicit drugs."

Another challenge for prevention experts is finessing a message that these legal drugs are safe when used properly, but can be life threatening when abused. That challenge is compounded by both easy access to legal drugs on the Internet and the nation's advertising culture, according to David Rosenbloom, director of Join Together, a nonprofit research and prevention organization based in Boston.

The growth of direct-to-consumer advertising of pharmaceuticals over the past decade has in many ways normalized the use of medicines, making it more difficult to finesse a campaign against abuse, he says.

"The traditional prevention messages become somewhat confused because there are clearly some circumstances under which these medications are wonderful," says Dr. Rosenbloom. "So it's got to be a much more nuanced message and as a practical mater, prevention curricula are still focused on alcohol and illicit drugs."

Three years ago, Linda Surks discovered firsthand the importance of changing the nation's antidrug focus. For more than 15 years she's worked at the National Council of Alcoholism and Drug Dependence on prevention programs in Middlesex County, N.J. As she counseled other parents, she also regularly talked to her son about the dangers of illicit drug abuse. When he was 19, in college studying to become a pharmacist, he died of an overdose of a combination of the antidepressant Xanex and the painkillers Oxycontin and Vicodin.

"I talked about drug abuse a lot more than most parents do," says Ms. Surks. "It wasn't until I was called to the emergency room that I found out he was abusing prescription drugs - and it was quite a shock... because I had no clue he was using at all, and this is from someone who's in prevention and knows what to look for."

Walters says that in order to prevent such tragedies there's something that everyone can do to help deal with the hike in prescription drug abuse.

"Go to your medicine cabinet, take unused prescription [medication] and throw them away," says Walters.

Study: Teens Use Medicines To Get High (AP)

WASHINGTON -- Teens increasingly are getting high with legal drugs like painkillers and mood stimulants, and they're turning to cough syrup as well, says a government survey released Thursday.

The annual study by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, conducted by the University of Michigan, showed mixed results in the nation's longtime campaign against teen drug abuse.

It found that while fewer teens overall drank alcohol or used illegal drugs in the last year, a small but growing number were popping prescription painkillers like OxyContin and Vicodin and stimulants like Ritalin.

As many as one in every 14 high school seniors said they used cold medicine "fairly recently" to get high, the study found.

It was the first year that the government tracked the frequency of teens who reported getting high from over-the-counter medicine for coughs and colds.

"It's bad that kids are buying cough syrup and using it this way - it's not good for them," said John P. Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The study found about one in 10 high school seniors have abused the painkiller Vicodin and Walters said kids may be pilfering the pills from their parents' medicine cabinets.

"That is one thing you can do - take the pills that are no longer being used and throw them away, get rid of them," he said in an interview.

Walters credited public service advertising with a steady decrease in overall teen drug use over the past five years and said the agency would shift some of its 2007 advertising budget toward combatting prescription drug abuse.

He challenged the recommendations of an August government audit that said the anti-drug advertising campaign wasn't working and suggested Congress consider reducing its funding. The report by the Government Accountability Office found some children were actually more likely to use marijuana after seeing the ads.

"We're pushing back," Walters told reporters Thursday as he outlined the study results. "What this shows is we're pushing back successfully."

The rise in prescription drug abuse was a troubling conclusion in a study that Walters described as good news overall because of the drop in teen use of alcohol, cigarettes, marijuana and other illicit substances.

An estimated 840,000 fewer teens reported using illegal drugs now compared to five years ago, he said.

The annual study, in its 32nd year, surveyed 50,000 students in the 8th, 10th and 12th grades at more than 400 schools nationwide. It found, that over the last year:

-Illegal drug use at all three grade levels dropped, if only slightly. An estimated 36.5 percent of high school seniors reported using illicit drugs at some point in the year.

-Marijuana remained the single most abused drug among teens, although its use also dropped slightly within all three grades. Nearly 12 percent of 8th graders reported using it, compared to 25 percent of 10th graders and 31 percent of high school seniors.

-One-third of 8th graders said they had consumed alcoholic beverages, compared to more than a half of 10th graders and two-thirds of seniors surveyed. That also was a small decrease among the three grade levels. But the number of 10th and 12th graders who reported getting drunk increased slightly.

Comparatively, the number of teens who got high from medicines and households items instead of illegal drugs was small. They included:

-Nearly 10 percent of high school seniors admitted to using excessive dosages of Vicodin, a slight increase over the last year.

-Nine percent of 8th graders sniffed glue, spray paints, cleaning fluids or other inhalants, down slightly.

-3.6 percent of 10th graders got high off Ritalin, up two-tenths of 1 percent. Ritalin is used normally to combat effects of attention deficit disorder.

That teens are turning to cough syrup to get high is particularly alarming, experts said, because the medicine is cheap and easy to get. Moreover, few people - teens and their parents alike - recognize the dangers of overdosing on the otherwise safe and legal drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0108451

"There is this mistaken belief that intentionally abusing prescription and over-the-counter drugs is somehow safer than abusing street drugs," said Steve Pasierb, president and chief executive of the New York-based Partnership for Drug Free America. "What parents don't realize is that this is about your kids taking six pills with a beer."

Good And Bad News On Teen Drug Use (UPI)

By Christine Dell'amore, Upi Consumer Health Correspondent

United Press International, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 (UPI) -- Illegal drug use among U.S. teenagers has fallen sharply since 2001, but abuse of prescription drugs continues to soar, according to an annual government survey released Thursday.

The Monitoring the Future Survey, funded by the National Institute of Drug Abuse, found drug use among eighth-, tenth- and twelfth-graders has dropped 23.2 percent since 2001. The results almost hit the 25-percent reduction goal set by President Bush in 2002.

"Today we announce a remarkable achievement," John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, told a news briefing in Washington.

The annual survey asks youths to confidentially answer questionnaires on their drug and alcohol abuse in the past month or year. In 2006, 48,460 students, representing 410 public and private schools, participated.

Past-month marijuana abuse for all three grades plummeted from 2005 to 2006 -- a vital inroad, officials say, because marijuana is often a gateway to other drugs. Cigarette smoking is at an all-time low for the three grades, and alcohol use has also fallen.

The drop in hallucinogens LSD and Ecstasy was dramatic, experts said, going down as much as 50 percent.

Walters stressed the 2006 progress was not due to chance but reflective of anti-drug campaigns and efforts.

"It's not an invisible hand, it's not an automatic waxing and waning of cultural forces -- it's a lot of people out there everyday saving lives, taking these substances of the street."

Yet the report also delivered troubling news: Abuse of the prescription drug Vicodin remained stable -- almost one in 10 high school seniors reported experimenting with the substance in the past year. Painkiller OxyContin was the only drug that went up across all three grades.

Over-the-counter drug medications also seem to be on the rise. Just over 4 percent of eighth-graders, 5.3 percent of tenth-graders and nearly 7 percent of high school seniors reported taking cough or cold medications containing the cough suppressant dextromethorphan to get high in the past year.

The abuse of prescription drugs and OTC medicines, which are often cheap and easily accessible, is a "worrisome trend," said Frank Murphy, director of psychological services at Caron Treatment Centers, a national network of alcohol and drug-addiction treatment centers. "It's almost as if it has gotten chic for kids."

Although the overall trend in marijuana went down, Murphy was alarmed at the 19 percent of twelfth-graders still smoking marijuana. "We're talking about a massive amount of substance on the street," he said. "That's really something for us to pay attention to."

Despite the desirable image of drugs sometimes shown in the popular media, "rejecting a life of drug abuse has now become a national movement among young people, just as unhealthy behavior in drug use became a movement almost three decades ago," Walters said.

However, Walters did not pinpoint a specific campaign or initiative that led to the improvements. Media campaigns, such as TV advertising, have spurred "subtle progress" in implanting anti-drug messages, Lloyd Johnston, the principal investigator for the survey and a research scientist at the University of Michigan, told United Press International.

But recent budget cuts in the National Youth Anti-Drug Media Campaign have led to less advertising reaching kids.

Walters acknowledged anti-drug coalitions put down their guard after waging a fruitful campaign to reduce cocaine use in the 1980s. This led to a redoubling of drug use in the 1990s, a spike that is now finally starting to ebb.

"We've had in the past a tendency to take our eye off the ball," Walters said. "We want to continue this decline, and that requires us to stay at it."

Study: Teens Getting High On Legal Drugs (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Slightly fewer adolescents abused illegal drugs and alcohol in 2006, but fairly high numbers of them continued to abuse prescription narcotics, according to a new study.

Researchers found reasons to be encouraged, but also concerned. The government-funded study, conducted by the University of Michigan, found that a high number of teens are taking over-the-counter cold medicine to get high. Measured for the first time, teenagers' abuse of such medicine is widespread, the survey said.

But officials characterized the overall survey results as generally positive, saying they reflect a slow decade-long decline in the percentage of teenagers who have experimented with illegal drugs.

The study backed by the National Institute on Drug Abuse shows that 21 percent of eighth-graders, 36 percent of 10th-graders and 48 percent of 12th-graders acknowledged that they had at some point tried at least one illicit drug. Those figures represent declines of 0.5 percent, 2.1 percent and 2.2 percent from the previous year, respectively. (Watch how teenagers pop legal pills to get high)Underage drinking also down

The number of students who had tried an illicit drug in the past year also declined from peak levels in the mid-1990s, the study said.

Underage drinking continued to decline as well. About 6 percent of eighth-graders, 19 percent of 10th-graders and 30 percent of 12th-graders said they had been drunk at least once in the past 30 days. The numbers are down significantly from a decade ago.

Officials said the new numbers suggest the decline in alcohol use may be over in the younger grades but continuing in higher grades.

The closely watched annual survey of eighth-, 10th-, and 12th-grade students nationwide will be formally unveiled at a press conference Thursday by the White House Drug Policy Chief John Walters, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other senior government officials. (Look at the trends)Pot still drug-of-choice for teens

By far the most popular illegal drug continues to be marijuana.

For the fifth year in a row, the percentage of 10th- and 12th-grade students using marijuana declined, but there was no corresponding decline in the percentage of eighth-graders who experimented with pot.

"The eighth-graders generally were the first to show the declines [over the past decade] but their improvements now seem near an end," said Lloyd Johnston, the lead investigator for the University of Michigan, which conducts the study.

The use of methamphetamine declined significantly among 10th-graders this year, but not among eighth-graders or 12th-graders, the study found. Meth use is now about 1.8 percent for eighth- and 10th-graders, and 2.5 percent for 12th-graders.Crack abuse down up to 50 percent since late '90s

Crack cocaine use continued to drop with use ranging from 1.3 percent to 2.1 percent, marking a decline of up to 50 percent since teen crack use peaked in the late '90s.

Use of anabolic steroids also dropped last year, which officials said may be attributable to the negative publicity associated with steroid use by professional baseball players.

The scientific survey of 50,000 students in 400 schools nationwide marks the 32nd consecutive year the "Monitoring the Future" study has been done. Anti-drug officials and academicians agree the study has become the key barometer in providing a window on trends of drug use among teenagers at critical decision-making stages of development.

Use of inhalants, LSD and other hallucinogens showed virtually no change in the past year, along with heroin, tranquilizers, sedatives and club drugs such as Ketamine and Rohypnol.

Of some concern to the researchers was a slight increase in the use of ecstasy, and the continued relatively high use of OxyContin and Vicodin.

OxyContin use by 12th-graders, which peaked in 2005 at 5.5 percent, dropped back to 4.3 percent, but the greatest levels to date were observed among eighth-graders (2.6 percent) and 10th-graders (3.8 percent).

DOJ_NMG_0108453

"Obviously relatively few young people are using OxyContin; still, given the addictive potential of this strong narcotic drug, I think we should be concerned about these rates," Johnston said in a prepared statement.

Use of the painkiller Vicodin showed even higher rates. Use this year hit 3 percent for eighth-graders, 7 percent for 10th-graders, and 9.7 percent for 12th-graders.

The abuse of cough and cold medicines called DXM, Dex, and Skittles by teens had attracted 4 percent of eighth-graders, 5 percent of 10th-graders and 7 percent of 12th-graders.

Teen Drug Use Dips Nationally, Not Locally (ADS)

By Alexis Huicochea

Arizona Daily Star, December 22, 2006

Teen drug use across the nation has decreased by more than 20 percent during the last five years, according to a study released Thursday. But officials say the downward trend is not occurring in Pima County.

The Monitoring the Future study, conducted by the University of Michigan, measures drug, alcohol and cigarette use among eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders across the country by asking about drug-use behavior during their lifetime, past year and past month.

The 2006 survey indicates reductions in the use of nearly every drug, with about 840,000 fewer youths using illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001, according to a news release from the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

It notes a 25 percent decrease in marijuana use during the five-year period, and a significant decrease in teens' use of methamphetamine. More on national study, Page A12.

However, officials at two Tucson programs that work to treat teen addiction say the exact opposite is happening here.

"I'm not sure that the study is an accurate depiction of what is happening and it is certainly not what I am seeing in working with adolescents with drug and alcohol addictions," said Tori Ferrari, director of the Springboard Home for Youth in Crisis, which houses girls but also provides counseling for families and boys. "We are actually seeing more and more kids getting involved at younger ages with harder drugs than marijuana."

She said that while marijuana is one of the most commonly used drugs by teens, it is a gateway drug and almost always leads to experimentation with drugs like heroin, cocaine or meth.

Ferrari believes the reason for the increase has to do with the availability of drugs, specifically meth, and the fact that it has become more common or more acceptable to do drugs.

During the last 30 years, Teen Challenge — the group in charge of Springboard — has served nearly 7,500 teens in Arizona.

Compass Health Care, another organization that works with addicted teens, has also seen an increase in not only illicit drug use, but alcohol and prescription drugs as well, said Cynthia Klein, a spokeswoman for the organization.

"We are seeing lots of kids using OxyContin and other drugs that are used to treat attention-deficit disorder because so many young people are on those medications," she said.

Things are not getting any better, she said. The lack of resources for teens dealing with drug and alcohol addictions is also a contributing factor to the problem.

Compass, along with the University of Arizona, recently began a free treatment program that focuses on kids between the ages of 12 and 17.

Virginia Is For Longer Data Retention (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNETNews.com, December 22, 2006

All Internet service providers should keep their subscribers' data for lengthier time periods in order to aid police prowling for criminals online, a task force organized by the Virginia state attorney general recommended this week.

Echoing similar calls from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller earlier this year, the latest suggestions arrived in a 103-page report drawn up by Virginia Attorney General Bob McDonnell (click for PDF) and his 6-month-old Youth Internet Safety Task Force.

Bob McDonnell

"It is the responsibility of business to assist in the apprehension of those who violate the promise of the Internet and prey upon children," the report said in its introductory section. The report did not address how these databases of customer information would be secured or whether they would be available to attorneys in civil lawsuits through subpoenas.

Although all Internet service providers already are legally required to preserve user data when requested by federal police, and some retain their users' connection logs for a few months, practices differ between companies. That means that "there is continuing need for ways of improving and streamlining procedures for disclosing pertinent information," the report went on to say.

Still, rather than prescribing data retention laws, as some members of Congress have supported, the task force makes a vague instruction to Internet service providers: they should commit to "keeping data relevant to such investigations and engaging at the national level to help define appropriate policies."

That seemingly softer recommendation is likely a reflection of the broader divide over the issue that is mirrored in the task force's makeup. Its members include representatives from various state and local law enforcement bodies, schools, educational agencies, parenting organizations, and corporate entities such as Yahoo, News Corp.'s MySpace.com, Microsoft, Time Warner's AOL and Sony.

Law enforcement officials and Internet companies have been at odds over the notion of adopting European-style data retention rules because ISPs maintain that retaining such vast amounts of data presents inordinately high costs and could pose security and privacy complications.

Internet companies also argue that they're already obligated to help law enforcement under a 1996 federal law. Called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act, it requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days, "upon the request of a governmental entity."

As an alternative to mandatory data retention, the task force report also proposes various methods designed to speed up the legal process involved in requesting data preservation.

AOL, which announced that it had donated $100,000 to the state for use in launching an Internet safety awareness campaign, applauded the conclusions. "The findings in this report, if implemented, will help make Virginia a safer place to raise a family," Mark Hileman, the Dulles, Va.-based company's deputy general counsel, said in a statement.

But Internet companies aren't likely to be free from the specter of national data retention laws yet. An FBI representative told CNET News.com recently that the agency continues to support data retention, viewing it as "crucial in advancing our cyberinvestigations to include online sexual exploitation of children." A representative for the National Association of Attorneys General said she wasn't aware that anything had changed since 49 of the state officials signed a letter (click for PDF) in June urging Congress to act on the issue.

Police Chiefs Ask Feds For Crime Commission (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest police chiefs' organization is calling on the federal government to re-establish a national law enforcement commission to help restore confidence in local public safety operations.

The International Association of Chiefs of Police said Thursday that recent incidents involving officers' questionable use of force and abrupt increases in murder and robbery represent strong evidence for a panel, similar to President Lyndon Johnson's Crime Commission, which would develop a national anti-criminal justice strategy. The panel would address a wide range of topics from police deployment to prison administration.

"We're past the time when we've needed to do this," IACP President Joseph Carter said Thursday.

Carter says the need for a crime commission was "validated" earlier this week by an FBI report showing that violent crime remained on the rise during the first six months of 2006.

The review found that overall violent crime was up by 3.7%.

DOJ_NMG_0108455

The IACP also cited "highly publicized" police incidents, such as the New York City shooting death of 23-year-old Sean Bell after his bachelor party and the death of an 88-year-old woman during an Atlanta drug raid.

The IACP's proposal, listed among the organization's highest priorities for 2007, is not winning early support.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., instrumental in passing the Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 additional police officers, says more money for additional officers and resources — not a commission — is needed to drive down rising crime.

"We don't need a commission to tell us what works," says Biden.

Samuel Walker, criminal justice professor at the University of Nebraska, says more attention needs to be focused on the application of the death penalty and such issues as police use of stun-guns.

"But I'm not sure we need a full blown commission," Walker says.

Recent jumps in violence prompted the Justice Department in October to launch its own review of possible causes.

U.S. Probes Possible Crime Links To Russian Natural-Gas Deals (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Amid growing concern about Europe's energy dependence on Russia, U.S. authorities are investigating possible links between one of that country's top organized crime figures and multibillion-dollar natural-gas deals between Russia and Ukraine.

The wide-ranging inquiry focuses on 60-year-old Semion Mogilevich, one of the FBI's most-wanted men, who is viewed by law-enforcement agencies as one of the world's most-sophisticated international criminals. U.S. officials have long expressed concern that his operations foster high-level official corruption throughout the former Soviet Union, underwriting criminal activities ranging from prostitution and drug dealing to stock fraud.

Their concern has only grown as Russia has tightened its grip on the vast oil and gas resources of Central Asia and shown a growing willingness to brandish energy as a political weapon. The European Union gets a quarter of its natural gas from Russia, most of which is shipped by pipeline across Ukraine.

That puts Mr. Mogilevich close to one of Europe's most vital economic crossroads at a time when the West is focusing on the failure of Russian President Vladimir Putin to check rampant organized crime and corporate corruption in Russia. The U.S. is worried that the Russian mafia will spread its influence in the energy industry and use its natural-gas profits to increase its economic and political clout.

Mr. Mogilevich couldn't be reached for comment. A Moscow lawyer who has worked with him declined to comment yesterday. In a 1999 interview with the British Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Mogilevich described himself as a businessman involved in commodities trading.

In 2002, Mr. Mogilevich and an associate, Igor Fisherman, were indicted in Philadelphia on charges of money-laundering and securities fraud in connection with the collapse of YBM Magnex Inc., a Pennsylvania-based company registered in Canada. Prosecutors allege that the two men used fraudulent accounting records and a network of shell companies to manipulate YBM Magnex's stock, then laundered the profits of their stock sales through numerous banks.

Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman haven't responded to the U.S. charges, and, according to the FBI, they now live in Moscow. The U.S. and Russia have no extradition treaty.

In their natural-gas investigation, senior U.S. prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are focusing on connections between Mr. Mogilevich and a Cyprus-registered company called Highrock Holding Ltd. that has played a role in several multibillion-dollar gas deals, according to current and former law-enforcement officials.

Highrock, which has operations in Moscow, Tel Aviv and the Ukrainian capital of Kiev, supplies consumer goods and other products to Turkmenistan and other Central Asian gas producers in exchange for billions of cubic meters of natural gas. The gas is then shipped to customers in Ukraine and other East European countries over pipelines owned by Russian gas giant OAO Gazprom.

Until June of 2003, the wives of Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman were among Highrock's major shareholders, say people familiar with the company's operations. While the wives are no longer listed as shareholders, authorities are investigating whether their husbands retain an interest in the venture. The officials say they have yet to reach any definitive conclusions.

A Ukrainian businessman named Dimytro Firtash, now Highrock's principal owner, says he removed the two men's wives from Highrock in 2003, soon after he learned they were involved with the company. Mr. Firtash says a former partner had brought in Mr. Mogilevich as an investor without his knowledge.

The U.S. investigation, which is being led by the Justice Department's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, began early this year, shortly after Moscow's brief cutoff of natural-gas shipments to Ukraine in a price dispute sparked an international crisis. The January cutoff came during a cold snap, throwing Europe's energy dependence on Russia into sharp relief.

The crisis was resolved when a previously little-known firm called RosUkrenErgo came forward to act as a middleman and broker a compromise. The company, known as RUE, said it was half-owned by Gazprom, but for months it refused to identify its other owners.

After The Wall Street Journal reported in April that RUE was under investigation by the Justice Department's organized-crime unit, Highrock's owner, Mr. Firtash, came forward saying he was RUE's other owner. Today, RUE supplies gas to several other European countries, including Poland and Hungary.

The U.S. investigation's focus on Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman is only now emerging. In recent months, agents have questioned several witnesses in Central and Eastern Europe about their knowledge of Mr. Mogilevich's role in Highrock, people with knowledge of the inquiry said.

The investigation is concentrating on Mr. Mogilevich's former base of operations in Budapest. For the past six years, the FBI has maintained a special unit in the Hungarian capital largely devoted to the investigation of the Mogilevich organization.

According to law-enforcement officials, the FBI team is being aided by authorities in Israel, another of Mr. Mogilevich's suspected bases of operations, and Cyprus, an offshore banking center used by many Russians. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI declined to comment on that matter because it is under investigation.

Global Witness, a London-based watchdog group that monitors the exploitation of natural resources, published a report earlier this year questioning the ownership of RUE, Highrock, and several other firms at the center of the Asian-European natural-gas trade. "There are still too many unanswered questions about these men and the interests they may or may not serve," says Global Witness researcher Tom Mayne. "Gazprom is a major supplier of energy to Europe, so there is a pressing need for more transparency about what is going on in the gas trade."

According to his FBI "Wanted" notice, Mr. Mogilevich, a heavy smoker who weighs nearly 300 pounds, was born in Kiev. He earned a degree in economics from the University of Lvov, according to people familiar with his background. He lived in Israel in the early 1990s, then moved to Hungary in 1995, the FBI says. He was also a prominent figure in a 1998-2006 probe of money laundering at the Bank of New York but wasn't charged in the case.

A substantial part of the natural-gas probe revolves around a network of companies, known as the Itera Group, that dominate the Russia-Ukraine natural-gas trade through their close relationship with Gazprom.

Itera, which is based in Moscow and Jacksonville, Fla., says it is the third-largest gas company in Russia. It has been Gazprom's partner in many gas deals that critics say didn't make business sense for Gazprom.

Itera Chairman Igor Makarov was a business partner of Mr. Firtash. According to Mr. Firtash, Highrock worked closely with Itera for years, providing goods to the Central Asian nations that supplied Itera with natural gas.

In 2000, Olga Shnayder, a private lawyer who worked with Itera, set up Highrock and several offshore affiliates of the company, according to corporate records and statements by Mr. Firtash.

The Highrock entity in Cyprus had three shareholders, one of which was Agatheas Trading Ltd., also of Cyprus. One director of Agatheas was Galina Telesh -- Mr. Mogilevich's wife. People involved in the U.S. inquiry say she represented her husband and Mr. Fisherman's combined one-third interest in Highrock.

Ms. Shnayder is listed in Russian corporate records as part-owner of a well-known Moscow funeral-home business previously owned by a company called Arigon Ltd. According to the Justice Department indictment of Mr. Mogilevich and his associates, "defendant Mogilevich was a 40% shareholder of Arigon, and controlled its operations."

Ms. Shnayder, reached through the funeral-home offices, denied that she was an owner of the funeral home. She said it would be "a violation of client-attorney privilege" to comment on whether Mr. Mogilevich or Itera's Mr. Makarov are her clients.

She also declined to say whether she created Highrock. Itera didn't respond to requests for comment at its U.S. and Moscow offices; in the past, Mr. Makarov has denied having a relationship with Mr. Mogilevich.

The FBI is also conducting a separate corruption inquiry into Itera's ties to Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, a senior Republican in Congress. His daughter, Karen Weldon, a lobbyist, received at least $500,000 in lobbying fees in 2002 from U.S.-based Itera Energy LLC. Rep. Weldon subsequently praised Itera in public statements. He denies any wrongdoing.

The Bankrupt-Your-Family Calling Plan (NYT)

Studies of prison inmates clearly show that keeping them in contact with friends and family is vital to giving them a chance to create an honest life after jail instead of committing new crimes that land them right back behind bars. Yet the simple act of picking up the phone to call home can be bankrupting for inmates and their families.

The cruel and counterproductive system now in place around the country charges them as much as six times the going rate for collect calls placed from inside state prisons. The collect-call service providers keep a stranglehold on the business by paying the state prisons a legalized kickback called a "commission."

These costs are borne by spouses, parents and other collect-call recipients who typically come from the country's poorest families. Worse still, these families can be barred from receiving a prisoner's collect call at all until they open costly accounts with the same companies that provide the prison phone service.

With bills that sometimes reach into the hundreds of dollars a month, families must often choose between talking to a jailed loved one and paying the rent. The lost contact is especially crushing for imprisoned parents, who make up more than half the national prison population and are often held in prisons hundreds of miles away from their children.

A bill that went nowhere in Congress this year would have mandated fair rates for interstate calls made from prison. The bill, introduced by Representative Bobby Rush, Democrat of Illinois, would also have required prisons to use both the collect-calling system and the less expensive debit-calling system. Used in federal prisons, debit calling lets inmates use computer-controlled accounts to pay for easily monitored calls to specified phone numbers.

The collect-call-only system is being challenged in court in a number of states, including New York, where a closely watched case is scheduled to be argued before the state's highest court in early January. The suit rightly argues that the telephone markup is a hidden levy on families who already support the prison system through their taxes.

State prison officials say the money is used to pay for programs that benefit inmates. But it also gouges the poorest citizens — driving them deeper into poverty — to pay for prison services that the state is obligated to provide. It might be legal, but it is also counterproductive and morally indefensible.

Feds: No Independent Probe Of DeKalb Police Justice Department Clarifies Letter, Says It Will Only Review Results Of Local Investigations. (AJC)

By Mae Gentry

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 22, 2006

U. S. Justice Department officials said that the department was not conducting an "independent federal investigation" into a string of fatal police shootings in DeKalb County, but would review investigations by local authorities when they are completed.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division issued a statement Thursday in which she sought to clarify a Dec. 12 letter from Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim to a local activist who had called for a federal investigation.

"The Department is currently gathering information, in conjunction with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, concerning the DeKalb County shootings," Kim wrote in the letter to John Evans, former head of the DeKalb NAACP. "You can be assured that if the evidence shows that there were any prosecutable violations of any federal criminal civil rights statute, appropriate action will be taken."

On Thursday, the spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, said the letter from Kim does not imply that the Justice Department had opened a formal investigation into the shootings. "While the Department of Justice is gathering information and monitoring that investigation, we have not at this point opened an independent federal investigation into the shootings," the statement said. "Federal authorities will review the results of the local investigation and then make an assessment about what additional investigation, if any, is warranted."

DeKalb Interim Police Chief Nick Marinelli last month asked District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming to review the Police Department's investigation of several shootings in 2006. DeKalb's 12 fatal police shootings this year are more than any other department in metro Atlanta.

Keyes Fleming, who said she will request that a special grand jury be impaneled to look into the cases, had said Tuesday, "It appears that the FBI is investigating a completely independent track, and we will continue what we've started."

Magnuson's statement did not mention the FBI, which was included in Kim's earlier letter. An FBI spokesman declined to comment on Kim's letter on Tuesday.

In an interview Thursday, Magnuson said her statement explains Kim's letter. "I don't believe that they're inconsistent," she said.

Evans, however, said the new statement conflicted with the letter from Kim.

"There's conflict in the statements — no doubt about that," he said. "Either what he said wasn't explained properly or there was some political pressure."

Evans said he intended to call Kim to find out "what's what."

Keyes Fleming's spokeswoman, Adora Andy, said Thursday, "The DA has had conversations with the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia, David Nahmias." Andy declined further comment.

Nahmias also spoke to Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones and sent him a copy of Magnuson's statement, according to a news release from Jones' office.

Jones declined Thursday to discuss his conversation with Nahmias.

Judge Scuttles Mayor's School Takeover Plan (LAT)

By Howard Blume

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

A judge today nullified legislation giving Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa substantial authority over the Los Angeles Unified School District, a stunning setback to Villaraigosa's plans -- already in progress -- to assume direct control of dozens of Los Angeles schools.

The mayor, at a news conference this afternoon, said he has instructed lawyers for the city to appeal the ruling. He said he would also ask that the California Supreme Court hear the appeal directly.

"We will not be set back," Villaraigosa said.

He added: "We refuse to be deterred by the forces of the status quo."

The ruling was a sweeping victory for the school district and puts in question the mayor's education agenda, which was embodied in the legislation before the court.

Under Assembly Bill 1381, Villaraigosa would have ratified the hiring and firing of future superintendents through a Council of Mayors that he would have dominated. And he would have had direct authority over three low-performing high schools and the elementary and middle schools that feed into them.

Judge Dzintra Janavs found the entire law defective and ordered public officials "to refrain from enforcing or implementing" any part of it.

"The statute makes drastic changes in the local governance of the LAUSD, giving the mayor a role that is unprecedented in California," she noted in her ruling, adding that the law "completely deprives the LAUSD governing board of any ability to control or influence the actions or decisions" in schools directly under the mayor's control.

DOJ_NMG_0108459

That was a primary goal of the legislation, but the judge rejected that intent as contrary to the California Constitution on numerous grounds. Fundamentally, she said, the Constitution forbids transferring authority over schools to entities outside the public school system.

She cited a 1946 constitutional amendment that "specifically removed municipal authority over school districts and appears to reflect the people's determination to separate municipal functions from school functions due to the variety of conflicts that arise between their respective interests."

The mayor's side argued that the Legislature had broad authority to designate the mayor, or anyone else, as a valid education agency to oversee schools.

The judge disagreed, siding with the district's lawyers.

"The mayor of Los Angeles [and] the members of the Council of Mayors … are not 'authorities' within the public school system or 'officers of the public schools,' " Janavs wrote in a decision issued midafternoon.

She also concluded that the new law violated the Los Angeles City Charter and the state Constitution by emasculating the school board's authority and by putting Villaraigosa in conflicting management roles.

School district officials were elated with the ruling, but measured in their reaction.

"We're anxious to move forward," said district general counsel Kevin Reed, who helped argue the case last week.

"We have believed from the day Mayor Villaraigosa was sworn in that it was important to work with him," Reed said. "We always thought this vehicle was the wrong way to do it. We continue to invite and look forward to a true partnership with him."

Judge Strikes Down LAUSD Takeover Plan (LADN)

By Naush Boghossian

Los Angeles Daily News, December 22, 2006

READ the court ruling striking down AB 1381. In a major political blow to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, a judge on Thursday declared unconstitutional the state Assembly bill that would give the mayor substantial control over the Los Angeles Unified School District and blocked its Jan. 1 implementation.

But while district officials called the ruling just, Villaraigosa remained defiant, calling it a "bump in the road" and vowing to immediately appeal.

"This ruling may seem like a disappointing setback for our kids, but I want to be absolutely clear today -- we will not be set back," he said. " ... We refuse to be defeated by the forces of the status quo. I believe we have the law on our side, I believe we have the constitution on our side, and more than that, I believe we have the people on our side."

And despite the ruling, he said his staff would continue to plan for a mayoral takeover of the 708,000-student district and vowed to get involved in the March school board election, when four of the seven seats are up for grabs. Putting on a conciliatory face, district officials said they were gratified with the ruling and stressed that they want to create a partnership with the mayor and the city of Los Angeles.

School board President Marlene Canter said she and Superintendent David Brewer III already had spoken with the mayor and that they all "agreed to work together on behalf of our students." "Thursday's ruling confirms our long-standing belief that this legislation was unconstitutional and not in the best interest of our students," she said.

In a strong rebuke of the mayor's plan -- Assembly Bill 1381 -- Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Dzintra Janavs sided with all four of the district's arguments on the legality of the bill, including that it violates the state constitution, the City Charter and voter rights.

The judge said the unconstitutional portions of the bill cannot be separated from the rest, meaning the whole thing had to be thrown out.

"There is substantial evidence that passage of AB 1381 was the result of political compromise and that its provisions are so interconnected and so critically dependent upon one another that no single provision would have been enacted or should be given effect without the whole," Janavs wrote in the 20-page ruling.

The district challenged the bill, contending that it violated provisions of the state constitution, which creates a separation between the operation of the municipal government and the education system; the L.A. City Charter, which sets forth the duties of the mayor but does not grant him authority over public schools; and voting rights, disenfranchising voters who don't live in Los Angeles and those who voted for LAUSD board members.

The ruling came after a yearlong battle between the Mayor's Office and the district, with Villaraigosa wanting to shake up the LAUSD with reforms aimed at raising student achievement faster and reducing the dropout rate, which has been pegged anywhere between 24 percent and 50 percent.

He proposed stripping away the school board's authority and shifting it to the superintendent; creating a 28-member council of mayors to review the budget and ratify hiring of new superintendents; giving the mayor direct oversight of three c lusters of the district's lowest-performing schools; and giving schools greater control over budget and curriculum.

Critics called Villaraigosa's efforts a power grab. Besides a few community meetings, he didn't put it to a public vote and used his significant political clout to have the Legislature pass the bill in August. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed it in to law in September, and a coalition led by the district filed suit in October.

For the popular mayor, who used substantial political capital to push for the school reform, the judge's decision is a big setback, said Jaime Regalado, director of the Edmund G. Pat Brown Institute of Public Affairs at California State University, Los Angeles.

"It's a major blow, there's no question about it," Regalado said. "It's a major initial blow."

But the mayor could come out victorious, depending on the state Court of Appeal decision. And this defeat won't have long-term impacts for a mayor who many believe has gubernatorial aspirations, he said.

" ... The fight is not over yet and he has a lot of political capital to burn," Regalado said. "He didn't invest 100 percent of what he had in the vault."

In fact, an appellate court could reach a completely different conclusion from Janavs , and it is that decision that would se t a legal precedent, while Thursday's doesn t.

For his part, Schwarzenegger said he still backs the mayor's plan and supports an appeal of the court's decision.

"I strongly support Mayor Villaraigosa's efforts to put our children first," he said in a written statement. "The status quo simply isn't working -- the current system is failing too many of our students."

Sen. Gloria Romero, D-Los Angeles, a co-author of the bill, said she still believes it s legal and should be appealed all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, if necessary.

"I look forward to that," she said.

The state legislative counsel earlier this year issued an opinion questioning the measure s constitutionality. Concerned that a lawsuit might result in some parts of the bill being overturned while others remained, Sen. George Runner, R-Lancaster, had successfully pushed for the removal of a severability clause, a phrase that says if one part is overturned, the rest remains law. After that clause was added, Runner decided to put aside his misgivings about the bill and vote in favor of it.

But some legal experts said judges are free to use their own discretion on severability, regardless of the presence of an enabling phrase.

Meanwhile Thursday, Villaraigosa said he received an additional $1 million for the cluster of schools he was poised to oversee. Deputy Mayor Ray Cortines would only say it came from a foundation that he'd like to keep anonymous. He collected $1 million from Verizon last week.

Villaraigosa also said he had spoken to Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez, D-Los Angeles, and that they would move to audit the LAUSD to begin the process of determining how much money is being spent on bureaucracy.

Monica Garcia, the sole Villaraigosa supporter on the school board, said she hopes the ruling doesn't send the district the signal that what it has done so far is enough.

In fact, she said, she believes the district should move forward to implement demonstration schools, or clusters of lowest-performing schools, the mayor had proposed to oversee.

"I think this whole effort has encouraged a civic conversation that would not have happened otherwise," said Garcia, who added that she hasn't decided whether to support an appeal of the judge's ruling. "The judge ruled in one way, but the work continues to need aggressive, bold, optimistic reform and leadership."

DOJ_NMG_0108461

While the mayor's detractors will certainly say he was much too ambitious with his plan and was bound to fail, there are plenty in the city who want change and back his plan, Regalado said.

"Most people feel something needs to change at LAUSD, and I think he ll be given plaudits by some, if not the majority of voters, for making the try, for expending capital and putting himself out there on the issues," he said. "It does take a bit of his political capital away, but long-term injuries? Not yet."

California: Judge Strikes Down Los Angeles School Plan (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

A judge struck down a law granting Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa of Los Angeles partial control of the nation's second-largest school district. The law, scheduled to take effect Jan. 1, violated the state's Constitution by interfering with the governing authority of the Los Angeles Unified School District board, the judge, Dzintra I. Janavs of Superior Court, ruled. A coalition of parents, students and administrators sued in October, contending the law took too much power away from the elected school board. Mr. Villaraigosa said he was considering a direct appeal to the State Supreme Court. "I believe we have the law on our side," he said.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Unveils Merger Investigations Reform (DEAL)

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell

The Deal, December 22, 2006

The Department of Justice's antitrust division on Dec. 15 officially announced further efforts to streamline the time and cost of merger investigations. The changes are part of a 2001 merger process reform effort and closely mirror changes the Federal Trade Commission announced in February.

But there's a big catch for merging parties that participate, and if the FTC's track record is an indication, antitrust lawyers won't be pushing clients to sign up. To be eligible for DOJ's latest streamlining efforts, the Justice Department requires merging parties to agree to set a period of pretrial discovery, perhaps as much as six months, should regulators seek a court order to block a merger. That could leave merging parties open to significantly more discovery time than the government usually is granted. The FTC's streamlining, by contrast, requires only two months of discovery.

DOJ's latest changes are intended to ease the burden imposed by a "second request for information," the step antitrust regulators must take to extend a merger investigation beyond limits set by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. After companies notify the antitrust agencies of their plans to merge, the DOJ and the FTC, the agencies then have 30 days -- or 15 in the case of a hostile tender offer -- to decide whether to clear the deal or to issue a second request.

The typical merger review process can take up to a year, but recent efforts have brought the average time for mergers with complex issues to less than six months.

"Efficient merger enforcement reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary is one of our top priorities," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division. "The amendments to the division's already successful merger review process initiative are part of our ongoing efforts to reduce enforcement burdens, while at the same time preserve our ability to conduct thorough investigations and protect consumers from anticompetitive transactions."

The DOJ second request changes are similar to the FTC's, by limiting to 30 the number of corporate officials whose documents will be reviewed and shortening the default time studied from three years to two. (The FTC capped the number officials at 35.) The merger review process initiative also says the staff is encouraged to talk with lawyers for the merging parties early on in an effort to get deals cleared during the initial 30-day period.

Though formally announced only last week, the changes have been in practice at least since October, when senior staff lawyer Bob Kramer told a gathering of antitrust lawyers about the need for changes in how the agencies review mergers. The biggest problem, according to Kramer, was that when companies complied with the second requests, the agency was swamped with documents, much of it superfluous to the investigation.

"Dumping" is a practice of collecting all documents related to the investigation from the merging firms, then filing everything in one fell swoop to the agency staff lawyers who requested it. After lawyers dump on an agency and certify they have complied with a second request, the regulators have only 30 days to review hundreds of thousands of documents and decide whether to block or to permit the deal.

In an effort to avoid these problems, DOJ's reforms include making initial requests for a range of information on a voluntary basis. DOJ is also asking lawyers to come in and discuss the merger with staff lawyers early in the process.

And, as with the FTC, DOJ is also using a carrot-and-stick option. If the merging parties want to move quickly, they can enter a "Process and Timing Agreement" with staff. That would mean the companies provide information to the agency when available, on a rolling basis rather than submitting everything at once. The parties must also agree to give DOJ lawyers extra time before a trial if the agency decides to block the deal.

"Even in cases preceded by full HSR compliance, it has been the division's experience that a period of four to six months is generally necessary to conduct appropriate post-complaint discovery," the agency wrote in its description of the new arrangement.

That means if the merging parties cannot agree with DOJ on a remedy, or if DOJ simply believes the anticompetitive problems with the deal are excessive, the parties must give DOJ four to six months to prepare its case before going to court rather than the three months or less courts typically grant the government.

According to Steve Sunshine, a partner at Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP and a former deputy assistant attorney general at DOJ, the changes are "more of an evolution of best practices" and not a radical change in policy.

The changes "are kind of helpful on the margins," Sunshine said. "Where it can really matter is on a big deal with lots of issues that aren't really deal stoppers; it can help to give some focus" to the investigation.

Barnett said that by helping to focus the investigation, DOJ's process can be helpful, because firms can benefit from time and cost savings.

But for most deals, the longer discovery phase required by the new Process and Timing Agreement is a disincentive to companies that is not offset by the agreement's benefits, Sunshine said. Private firm antitrust lawyers already can negotiate with staff and winnow down the number of people whose files are searched without giving the government more time to prepare a court case.

Indeed, merging parties in only one deal have so far agreed to give the FTC even a two-month discovery period in exchange for any concessions during the HSR process, according to FTC officials.

Barnett acknowledges that the appeal of the latest change may be limited, but the effort to streamline the premerger review process isn't over. The goal has been "to increase transparency and increase communication," he said. "We've been very successful at getting these resolved more quickly."

Prosecutors: 5th Samsung Exec To Plead Guilty In Price-fixing (AP)

By Jordan Robertson

AP, December 22, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - A Samsung Electronics Co. executive agreed to plead guilty and serve 10 months in prison for his role in a global price-fixing scheme involving a common form of computer memory, federal prosecutors said Thursday.

Young Hwan Park, president of Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the company's San Jose-based U.S. subsidiary, is the fifth Samsung executive this year to agree to a prison sentence over price manipulation of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type of memory chip used in personal computers.

A Samsung spokeswoman said Thursday that Park is still with the company but declined to discuss the company's future plans. "Samsung is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior," spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0108463

In total, four memory chip companies and 18 people have been charged in the Justice Department's investigation of DRAM makers.

Samsung, Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc. have all pleaded guilty for roles in the scheme and were ordered to pay about $729 million in fines. The fine for Samsung and its subsidiary totaled $300 million.

Fifteen people charged in the case have now pleaded guilty, including the five Samsung executives, four executives each from Infineon and Hynix, an executive from Elpida and a sales manager from Micron Technology Inc.

Park's prison sentence would be the longest levied against any of the defendants.

The Justice Department said collusion among the world's DRAM makers began in 1996, when manufacturing ramped up but prices failed to drop as expected. Investigators said DRAM executives hatched a covert plan to keep prices artificially high and colluded in the United States and abroad.

The charge against Park was filed and his expected guilty plea, which still needs court approval, was announced simultaneously Thursday in San Francisco federal court. Park also agreed to pay a $250,000 fine. A court date for Park to enter the plea had not been set.

"This latest plea underscores our resolve to hold responsible those who target U.S. businesses and consumers with price-fixing schemes," Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice Department's antitrust division, said in a statement. "Individuals who choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions: criminal fines and prison time."

Park is accused of conspiring with employees from other memory chip makers from April 2001 to June 2002 to keep the prices of chips artificially high. He was vice president of sales for Samsung Electronics at the time.

Prosecutors say the scheme affected sales to computer makers Apple Computer Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Dell Inc., Gateway Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp.

The indictment alleges Park struck deals with other executives in secret meetings about the prices charged to certain manufacturers. The executives allegedly swapped data on DRAM shipments to those manufacturers to make sure everyone was selling at agreed-upon prices.

The probe of anticompetitive practices in the semiconductor industry has since expanded to the sale of graphics processors and cards, and another form of memory known as static random access memory, or SRAM.

At least five SRAM makers have said they were contacted by Justice Department investigators as part of the industrywide probe, including Sony Corp., San Jose-based Cypress Semiconductor Corp., and the U.S. units of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., Samsung Electronics Co. and Toshiba Corp.

SRAM chips are faster and more reliable than DRAM chips, but are also more expensive and found in far smaller quantities in PCs. Worldwide SRAM sales totaled $2.8 billion in 2005, compared with DRAM sales the same year of about $24.8 billion, according to market researcher iSuppli Corp.

Two leading graphics chip companies - Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Nvidia Corp. - have said they were subpoenaed by federal investigators probing possible anticompetitive practices among makers of computer graphics chips.

The Justice Department has declined to discuss details of the graphics chips and SRAM probes.

Samsung Exec Pleads Guilty To DRAM Price Fixing (IDG)

By Grant Gross

IDG News Service, December 22, 2006

A top executive from Samsung Electronics will serve 10 months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine for his role in a global conspiracy to fix DRAM (dynamic RAM) prices, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday.

Young Hwan Park, currently president of Samsung's U.S. subsidiary Samsung Semiconductor Inc., agreed to plead guilty to a violation of the U.S. Sherman Antitrust Act for conspiring with other companies to fix DRAM prices, according to court records.

Park, formerly vice president of sales at Samsung, is the fifth Samsung executive to agree to prison sentences in the DOJ's ongoing price-fixing investigation. Samsung, based in South Korea, is the world's largest manufacturer of DRAM, a memory chip commonly used in PCs and several other electronic devices.

Since December 2003, the DOJ has charged four DRAM vendors and 18 people in the price-fixing investigation.

People who "choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions – criminal fines and prison time," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the DOJ's Antitrust Division, said in a statement.

Park conspired with employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAM sold to OEMs (original equipment manufacturers) from April 2001 to June 2002, according to a felony court filed Thursday in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California in San Francisco. Computer makers affected by the price fixing included Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc., the DOJ said.

Park participated in meetings with other DRAM makers where the prices of DRAM were discussed, and he committed to charging the agreed prices, the DOJ said.

Samsung pleaded guilty to the price-fixing conspiracy and was sentenced to pay a $300 million fine in November 2005. Hynix Semiconductor Inc., the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005.

In January, Japanese manufacturer Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to plead guilty and pay an $84 million fine. In October 2004, German manufacturer Infineon Technologies AG pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $160 million fine.

Samsung Executive Faces Jail Sentence (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

The chief executive of Samsung Electronics' US-based chip division is facing 10 months behind bars after pleading guilty on Thursday to price-fixing charges.

The Korean executive, Park Young-hwan, was involved in a wide-ranging conspiracy involving Samsung and other makers of dynamic random access memory components – or D-Ram chips – while he served as vice-president of the Korean company's sales division.

Mr Park is the fifth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the Justice Department's investigation, which has also ensnared four Hynix executives, four officials at Infineon, and resulted in one obstruction charge against a regional sales manager at Micron Technology. The probe has generated $730m in criminal penalties from the parties involved, the second-highest number of fines to emerge from any single price-fixing conspiracy.

According to Samsung's website, Mr Park has served as president and chief executive of Samsung Semiconductor in the US since March, 2004, leading the industry's second highest-volume supplier of chip products in North America. The website also credits Mr Park for leading the company's memory sales team at a time, between 2001 and 2003, when it saw its "most dramatic growth".

The Justice Department said Mr Park carried out the price-fixing conspiracy from April, 2001 to June, 2002 by participating in meetings and conversations with rivals in the D-Ram market and agreeing to charge certain customers a fixed price. The talks ultimately affected sales to US computer makers such as Dell, HP and Compaq.

US Airways CEO: Delta's Self-valuation 'Lacks Credibility' (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 22, 2006

Delta Air Lines' self-valuation that it will be worth as much as $12 billion after bankruptcy "lacks credibility," US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said Thursday as he urged creditors to push the Atlanta airline's executives to explore its merger proposal.

"This is where I'd like to see the [Delta] management team come along," Parker said in a conference call with industry analysts and reporters. "I've passed the threshold to think that's going to happen soon."

Parker was less ebullient than during a similar call on Nov. 15 in announcing Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' proposed $8.4 billion takeover, but sounded no less determined.

"This is a transaction that makes all the sense in the world and that we are determined and committed to continue to pursue, and we are highly confident we are going to get closed," Parker said.

His comments came on the heels of Delta's filing of a bankruptcy reorganization plan this week, in which the airline said it believes it should emerge from Chapter 11 next spring as an independent carrier. Delta's court-appointed creditors committee stated Wednesday that it welcomed Delta's decision to file a plan but would continue to look at "potential alternatives" as well.

Delta is offering creditors — who effectively control the airline's destiny — an all-stock stake that it values at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. US Airways has offered $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million of its shares with a current market value of $4.4 billion.

US Airways has signaled that it will consider upping its bid, while some industry experts believe Delta's creditors will press both sides to sweeten their offers in coming weeks.

While Parker said US Airways is in "continuing dialog" with Delta's creditors and advisers, he said he felt an "obligation to correct" Delta's claims that its proposal is more valuable and that the merger would fail to win regulatory approval or produce the savings US Airways expects.

"We know how to do this, and we know what the issues are," said Parker, who last year led America West in its takeover of the larger US Airways, assuming the latter company's name. "We're extremely comfortable with our ability to do this."

Dissecting Delta's plan during the one-hour, 40-minute call, Parker said his company values Delta's proposal at $5.5 billion to $6.9 billion.

"Their method is extremely aggressive, and we believe it lacks credibility," he added, noting that Southwest Airlines, the industry's most valuable company, has a current market value of $12.2 billion.

Clark Orsky, an analyst with KDP Investment Advisors, said US Airways made a good case that Delta's value for its plan is "aggressive" and that concerns the Department of Justice would shoot down the merger are overblown. His firm in Montpelier, Vt., is an independent analyst of high-yield debt.

"They seem to poke quite a few holes in the Delta analysis," said Orsky.

US Airways Strikes Back, Doubts Delta's Antitrust Concerns (BBJ)

Birmingham Business Journal, December 22, 2006

After several big days for the Atlanta-based airline Delta Air Lines Inc. -- in which Delta's board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways Group Inc.'s takeover bid, the creditors committee praised Delta for filing its reorganization plan, and Delta's executives formally launched a petition against the takeover -- Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways struck back today.

In a conference call with analysts on Dec. 21, US Airways (NYSE: LCC) Chairman and CEO Doug Parker took Delta to task on the points that the Atlanta-based airline has been harping on: specifically, that the proposed merger poses too many antitrust issues, that the resulting debt level would be exorbitant, and that employee integration, contracts and morale would suffer.

"The anti-trust issues are fully managable," said Parker. "We've done much more work on this, more than anyone else. We are not going to let this deal fail on anti-trust issues."

He also emphasized that the proposed merger is labor friendly and that employees would possibly come out better than they are now, because the merged airline would go to the "highest common denominator" contracts.

Similar to a conference call that Delta held on Dec. 19, US Airways's top executive and top hired gun, lawyer Rick Rule, a partner in the law firm Fried Frank LLP's Washington and New York offices and a former Department of Justice antitrust division attorney, poked holes in Delta's position that a merger would pose too many antitrust issues.

Rule said that Delta's methodology is "severely flawed."

They don't believe the merger would create as many monopolycities as Delta has said.

"We feel very confident, having gotten down in the weeds, that we have accurately and correctly analyzed this merger," said Rule. "At the end of the day, the arbiter of who is right is the Department of Justice."

In a detailed, 24-page presentation on US Airways' Web site, US Airways also shows why it feels Delta has dramatically over-valued itself.

US Airways has offered about $8.7 billion for the Delta, but Delta's standalone plan assumes a value of between $9.4 billion and $12 billion.

"Which we find to be unrealistic," said Parker. "The valuation completely lacks credibility."

Parker said that Delta has been "trying to discredit our proposal and two show that Delta as a standalone is worth more than people believe it is."

US Airways CEO Calls Delta Unrealistic (PTR)

By Thomas Olson

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 22, 2006

Pushing his case for merging with Delta Air Lines, US Airways CEO Doug Parker on Thursday lambasted elements of bankrupt Delta's just-filed reorganization plan as "unrealistic" and "superficial."

Parker spoke to analysts on a conference call to poke holes in Delta's own plan and to answer its criticism of US Airways' bid. He appealed to analysts to scrutinize both plans.

US Airways made a hostile offer last month worth nearly $8.4 billion to acquire the Atlanta-based airline out of bankruptcy. Such a move would create the world's largest airline, better compensate Delta creditors and create $1.6 billion in new revenue and cost savings, Parker claims.

Delta management on Tuesday formally rejected the merger plan, arguing US Airways' offer would result in too big a debt load, would not reach the $1.6 billion in synergies claimed by US Airways and would not pass muster with antitrust regulators.

"The US Airways proposal provides inferior value to our stand-alone plan," Delta spokeswoman Betsy Talton said in a statement.

Delta filed a reorganization plan that values it between $9.4 billion and $12 billion. Its plan would result in $3.55 billion in total projected earnings from 2007 through 2010.

Yesterday, Parker said the profit estimates might be correct, but he termed Delta's valuation projections "unrealistic." Rather, the CEO said Delta's equity would be worth between $5.5 billion and $6.9 billion.

"We think their valuations are really out of whack," Parker said. "Delta coming out and saying they are worth as much as Southwest (Airlines) doesn't pass the smell test."

Parker said Delta used "flawed" criteria in analyzing antitrust issues a merger would raise with the Department of Justice. For instance, Delta's criticism does not allow for the probable entry of discount airlines into markets served by Delta and US Airways.

"We are not going to let this transaction fail on antitrust issues," Parker said.

But the only way to know what antitrust objections might surface is for both US Airways and Delta to file merger plans with the Justice Department, US Airways antitrust attorney Rick Rule told analysts.

"It needs to be done by (Delta) management," Parker said. "Absent that, Delta's creditors would need to direct management to do that, which they have the full ability to do."

US Airways has been directly appealing to Delta's creditors to pressure management into accepting its bid. Delta's creditor committee broke its silence on Wednesday, saying it sided with Delta's stand-alone plan but would consider US Airways' offer and any alternatives.

Delta has discounted US Airways' merger plan because it says the Tempe, Ariz.-based airline has yet to integrate operations with America West.

Yesterday, Parker countered that by saying US Airways has achieved several "milestones." All but one of 38 airports served by US Airways and America West have been integrated. He also cited a labor agreement reached Wednesday.

US Airways reached a single-contract agreement with the Transport Workers Union representing 156 flight dispatchers, covering 120 at US Airways' flight-operation control center in Moon, and 37 at America West's center in Phoenix.

The pact, which does not require formal ratification by union members, mostly raises salaries for the comparatively lower-paid dispatchers in Phoenix, said Don Wright, president of TWU Local 545 in Moon.

Wright declined to provide wage rates and ranges. But he said the new contract will provide additional paid days off, while "meeting the needs of the company" in terms of productivity and work rules.

The labor pact has no bearing on US Airways' pending decision to consolidate the flight control center in either Pittsburgh or Phoenix. That decision is expected in late January or early February.

US Air Challenges Delta's Proposal To Restructure (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Gary Mcwilliams

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. attacked the restructuring plan proposed by Delta Air Lines Inc. this week to fend off an $8.38 billion hostile takeover as "extremely aggressive" and lacking "credibility on any kind of standard."

The denunciation of the plan in a conference call with investors and analysts Thursday by Doug Parker, the US Airways chairman and chief executive who sprang the unsolicited bid on Delta last month and unleashed a frenzy of takeover maneuvering in the U.S. airline industry, comes as creditors are burrowing deeper into the financial projections underlying Delta's valuation of the Atlanta carrier at $9.4 billion to $12 billion once it emerges from bankruptcy proceedings in the spring.

Both airlines are expected to aggressively press their case during the next several weeks, and Mr. Parker's remarks showed that US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., remains determined to acquire Delta despite fierce and increasingly vocal opposition by Delta, which ranks as the third-largest U.S. carrier, by passenger traffic. US Airways ranks sixth.

As a stand-alone company, Delta would be valued at just $5.5 billion to $6.9 billion if the valuation were based on reasonable financial assumptions, Mr. Parker said. US Airways said its takeover offer would be worth $11.6 billion to $14.2 billion under the calculations used in Delta's restructuring plan.

Delta officials were quick to defend their projections, which include swinging from a 2006 loss of $385 million to 2007 net income of $456 million and profit of $1.19 billion in 2010. "Nothing we heard today explains away the fact that the US Airways proposal provides inferior value to our stand-alone plan, is structurally flawed, and raises overwhelming regulatory and labor issues that -- after a lengthy delay -- are likely to prevent the proposed merger from being completed," Delta said in a statement, noting that its projections are based partly on costs already shed during the bankruptcy proceeding.

US Airways Chief Executive Claims Proposal For Reorganization 'clearly Lacks Credibility' (AR)

By Dawn Gilbertson

Arizona Republic, December 22, 2006

Two days after Delta executives called US Airways the worst of all merger partners and continued their blistering assault against its buyout offer, US Airways CEO Doug Parker shot back with a vengeance.

In a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts and the media Thursday, Parker rebutted, in rapid fire, key assumptions in Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy on its own and tried to clear up misconceptions he said that Delta has been spreading to discredit the Tempe airline's $8 billion-plus offer.

The only time Parker paused in the hourlong presentation was for a similarly fast-paced rundown by the attorney handling regulatory matters for the merger.

Parker said the financial plan Delta presented this week "clearly lacks credibility."

The merger, in contrast, "is a transaction that makes all the sense in the world," he said. He said he's "highly confident" the deal will get done and repeatedly referred to the "new Delta's" plans, as the combined airline would be called Delta.

The intensity, coming just a day before a long holiday weekend when business usually grinds to a halt, underscores the high-stakes public relations battle under way on both sides as the industry embarks on what many expect to be another round of consolidation.

Delta creditors hold the key in this case, given Delta's bankruptcy, and both sides are going all out to win their votes.

Parker and US Airways were seen as losing momentum a few weeks ago, in part because of Parker's comments he made suggesting that US Airways would back off if Delta's management didn't buy in.

He has since backed off those comments and the airline has gone more on the offensive publicly in the face of Delta's defiant stance and huge employee rallies against the merger in its hometown of Atlanta.

Parker's comments Thursday weren't as biting as some out of the Delta camp since the deal was proposed Nov. 15, but he got in plenty of digs:

DOJ_NMG_0108468

• On Delta's projections, filed in U.S. Bankruptcy Court this week, that it would be worth between $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it emerges from Chapter 11: "We think their valuation is way out of whack."

Saying Delta would be worth more than Southwest, the industry standard bearer, didn't "pass the smell test," he said.

Referring to the upward slope of Delta's earnings projections over the next few years, Parker said, "They have a pretty big hockey stick built in."

If analysts buy Delta's valuation, he said, then they should value US Airways' offer under the same financial assumptions, which would bring it up to $12 billion to $14 billion.

• On Delta's repeated assertion that the deal won't pass muster with antitrust regulators because there is too much overlap between the airlines: "The Delta analysis has all sorts of flaws in it."

• On Delta's criticisms of US Airways' customer service: "We don't look so good (in baggage handling and customer complaints) and we're well aware of it, but frankly, neither does Delta."

• To Delta's argument that the combined airline's $23 billion debt load would be too high: "Of course, it ends up with higher levels of debt; it's a much larger airline. . . .

"To argue that the absolute level of debt is something meaningful is hard for us to come to grips with."

• To Delta's assertion that US Airways management is not done with the US Airways-America West merger: "What we've learned over the last 14 months have taught us exactly what the issues are going to be. . . . We're extremely comfortable with our ability to manage this."

Airline Pushes Takeover Of Delta (WT)

By Sean Lengell

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

US Airways is continuing to push its takeover of Delta Air Lines, even as the bankrupt creditors say they're not interested in the $8.4 billion offer.

US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker yesterday accused Delta of intentionally misleading its creditors and the public by maligning US Airways' proposal, which was offered Nov. 15 and includes $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million company shares.

He added that Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy alone is "unrealistic" and worth far less than US Airways' offer.

US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest airline, says combining with Delta, the nation's third biggest after American and United, would create annual benefits of $1.65 billion.

"We are going forward [with our plan] and we're dedicated to getting this done," Mr. Parker told analysts during a telephone conference yesterday.

But Delta says it is determined to remain an independent airline. On Tuesday its board unanimously rejected US Airways' offer, saying it was "substantially inferior" to its own reorganization plan.

The board filed a five-year business strategy with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York. The plan lets unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims.

Delta's proposal values the airline at as much as $12 billion. The airline has forecast a net income of $450 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

Trading of Delta unsecured bonds has increased from about 40 cents on the dollar Nov. 14 -- the day before US Airways announced its intention to buy Delta -- to about 66 cents on Wednesday, which Mr. Parker says validates his company's offer.

"This obviously shows that the creditors of Delta believe that the US Airways merger proposal is worth more than [Delta's] stand-alone" plan, he said.

But Delta's creditors remain unconvinced. The airline's creditors committee, appointed after the carrier filed for Chapter 11 protection in September 2005, announced Wednesday it was supporting Delta's reorganization plan.

Delta's pilots' union, a large creditor and committee member, also has said it supports Delta's mission to remain an independent carrier.

The creditors did leave open the possibility of entertaining future offers.

DOJ_NMG_0108469

The committee "will continue to consider potential alternatives in order to maximize the ultimate recoveries for the unsecured creditors in the Delta bankruptcy," the group said Wednesday.

Many analysts had been skeptical that US Airways would be able to pull off the acquisition, even before the creditors' announcement.

Antitrust issues would be difficult to overcome, they said. And a merger of the two airlines would create a cumbersome system with eight hubs -- far too many to be cost-effective.

Mr. Parker downplayed the antitrust question, saying that the issue is "fully manageable."

"We did not go launching this offer without knowing that and assessing the risk of antitrust," he said.

Even if the proposed deal with US Airways falls through, some industry analysts predict that Delta, with its attractive European routes, will have future suitors.

"We thought it was noteworthy that [Delta] management made the point in its conference call with investors [Wednesday] that it is not inherently opposed to considering mergers, but rather the specifics of the US Airways combination," said Clark Orsky, an airline analyst from KDP Investment Advisors.

"We think merger possibilities will remain in the forefront of investors' minds so that, even if [Delta] shortly exits Chapter 11 as an independent carrier, the company will remain a merger candidate for a while."

Parker Fires Back At Delta (STREET)

By Ted Reed

TheStreet.com, December 22, 2006

"Something here looks a little out of whack, to say it politely," he said during an online conference with analysts. Parker responded to the case, which Delta laid out earlier this week, that the US Airways bid is undervalued, unlikely to receive regulatory approval and illegal under its pilot contract.

Parker said Delta's self-valuation of $9.4 billion to $12.2 billion would mean the airline, at the high end, is worth nearly as much as Southwest (LUV - news - Cramer's Take) or as United (UAUA - news - Cramer's Take) and American (AMR - news - Cramer's Take) combined.

The valuation "clearly lacks credibility," he said. For Delta's stock to reach a range implied by the valuation, based on expected 2007 profits, the company would sport a price-to-earnings ratio of 20.6 to 26.3, he said.

Parker also disputed Delta's estimates that its earnings will rise gradually from about $500 million in 2007 to $1.2 billion in 2010. "They have a pretty big hockey stick built in that has 2008 and 2009 ramping up much faster than we would," he said. Using the same multiples for shares given to creditors that Delta uses, US Airways' offer is worth $11.6 billion to $14.2 billion, rather than its $8.6 billion current valuation, he said.

Meanwhile, Rick Rule, US Airways' antitrust attorney, challenged Delta's assertion that Justice Department regulators would reject or delay US Airways' bid to take over its primary competitor. He said the government would be concerned that competition could decline in some small markets, but at the same time a merged, more efficient company "should give them comfort that there won't be increases in fares." In the end, "lower costs benefit consumers," he said.

Caremark Shareholders Fight CVS Deal (AP)

By Greg Giuffrida

AP, December 22, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- A group of shareholders in pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. has filed for an injunction to force company officials to consider a proposed buyout by rival Express Scripts Inc. that could pay more than an offer from CVS Corp.

Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS Corp., the nation's largest operator of drugstores and second to Walgreen Co. in sales, said on Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Nashville-based Caremark for about $21.2 billion in stock.

On Thursday, CVS and Caremark announced that the proposed merger passed antitrust scrutiny of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and could be completed by the first quarter of 2007.

DOJ_NMG_0108470

The approval comes days after rival pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. proposed to pay about $26 billion in a hostile bid for Caremark that would offer a cash option and premium for shareholders.

The shareholders' motion filed Thursday evening in Nashville's U.S. District Court claims that Caremark board members will personally benefit from the CVS deal and have entered into a strict merger agreement that keeps them from seeking out the best deal for shareholders.

The motion comes in a lawsuit originally filed by the Iron Workers of Western Pennsylvania Pension Plan and asks for a judge to immediately order Caremark to end the "draconian" agreement with CVS and turn over internal documents.

"What they have to do is put aside their own individual interests and think only what is best for their own shareholders," said Douglas Johnston, a plaintiffs' attorney with Barrett, Johnston & Parsley of Nashville.

The motion also claims that Caremark chairman E. Mac Crawford would keep his position at the newly formed CVS/Caremark Corp. and make up to $48 million in stock, severance payments and consulting fees.

"Unfortunately, what happens many times is that potential buyers will come in and try to work with the managers, provide special benefits, and as much as they possibly can, prevent the board from doing its fiduciary duties," Johnston said.

A phone message left late Thursday night with Caremark's corporate communications office was not immediately returned.

Caremark officials said this week that they still believe the CVS deal is the best long-term strategic value for shareholders and they remain committed to it.

Under the CVS deal, Caremark shareholders would receive 1.67 shares of CVS for each share of Caremark. CVS shareholders would own 54.5 percent of the combined company and Caremark shareholders would own 45.5 percent.

Under the Express Scripts deal, Caremark stockholders would own approximately 57 percent of the combined company, and Express Scripts stockholders would own approximately 43 percent.

Some analysts have said that Express Scripts' offer to pay $29.25 in cash and 0.426 shares of its stock for each share of Caremark could be more attractive to shareholders.

Caremark shares rose 15 cents, or 0.27 percent, to close at $56.15 on Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. CVS rose $1.01, or 3.38 percent, to $30.92. Maryland Heights, Mo.-based Express Scripts fell 31 cents, or 0.42 percent, to $73.47 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Express Scripts Calls Its Offer For Caremark 'superior' (SLBJ)

St. Louis Business Journal, December 21, 2006

Express Scripts Inc. issued a statement late Wednesday calling its $26 billion bid for pharmaceutical services company Caremark Rx Inc. "superior."

The statement came after Caremark and rival bidder CVS Corp. issued releases Wednesday saying that their previously announced merger deal had cleared a regulatory hurdle: The initial waiting period required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 had expired without a request for additional information from the U.S. Federal Trade Commission.

Express Scripts rival bid, made Monday, represented at the time a 15 percent premium over the all-stock purchase price to be paid to Caremark's stockholders under Caremark's Nov. 1 deal with drug chain CVS (NYSE: CVS), headquartered in Woonsocket, R.I. Express Scripts proposed to acquire all of the outstanding shares of Caremark Rx for $29.25 in cash and 0.426 shares of Express Scripts stock for each share of Caremark stock.

In its release Wednesday, Express Scripts' stated, "As we expected, the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act has expired for CVS Corporation. We said on December 18th that we anticipate the Express Scripts transaction with Caremark would be completed in the third quarter of 2007. The superior value of the Express Scripts offer for Caremark is clear as evidenced by the strong support of both Express Scripts and Caremark stockholders."

Express Scripts said that based on Wednesday's closing stock prices, its offer has a value of $60.68 per share, or $26.5 billion, a 21.5 percent premium on the current value of the CVS offer.

In its release Wednesday, CVS said it anticipates that a shareholder meeting to approve its deal and the closing will occur as early as the first quarter next year. Both CVS' and Caremark's shareholders must approve the transaction.

Delta And Pine Approves Monsanto Merger (FOR)

By Joshua Lipton

Forbes, December 21, 2006

Two of the largest seed companies in the world just came one step closer to their long-awaited merger.

On Thursday, Delta and Pine Land Company (nyse: DLP - news - people) announced that at a special meeting held in Memphis, Tenn., the company's shareholders formally approved its merger with Monsanto (nyse: MON - news - people).

The acquisition is a long time in the making. It was back in 1998 when Monsanto first announced its intention to buy Delta and Pine Land, a leading commercial breeder, producer, and marketer of cotton planting seed. But Monsanto then backed out of the deal. A legal scrap followed, until the new agreement was brokered.

On Aug. 15, Monsanto announced that it would acquire Scott, Miss.-based Delta and Pine Land for $1.5 billion in cash.

"Delta and Pine Land represents an excellent fit for our company as we look to bring value-added traits and high-quality seed to cotton growers around the world," said Monsanto chief executive Hugh Grant, at the time of the announcement. "Delta and Pine Land has strong cotton genetics, and we believe Monsanto's leadership in providing the best cotton traits can improve on this already strong base."

Shares of Monsanto nudged down 25 cents, or 0.5%, to $51.65 while shares of Delta and Pine Land slipped 24 cents, or 0.6%, to $40.56 in Thursday trading.

Mark Gulley, an analyst at Soleil-Gulley & Associates, said the companies still face the challenge of regulatory approval. "This decision isn't key," Gulley said in an interview. "The antitrust review is what we're all waiting for."

Regulators still have to weigh in on the proposed merger and decide whether it's anticompetitive. To close the transaction and satisfy Uncle Sam, Monsanto has already said it's willing to divest the U.S. assets of its Stoneville cottonseed business.

There is no set date on when the government will decide the issue.

Lockheed Martin Buys Management Systems (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BETHESDA, Md. — Military contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. said Thursday it agreed to acquire Fairfax, Va.-based Management Systems Designers Inc. for undisclosed terms.

MDS, which has more than 600 employees, is a provider of information technology, primarily for government agencies including the Internal Revenue Service, Department of Homeland Security and Department of Defense.

Lockheed Martin said the deal, which won't have a material effect on its results, strengthens its initiatives in the growing health care information market.

The transaction is set to close during the first quarter of 2007, subject to regulatory approval.

Shares of Lockheed gained 34 cents to finish at $91.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

ETEU Approves German Movie Subsidies (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) - The European Union on Thursday approved German subsidies totaling $240 million for its movie industry, officials said.

The subsidies will back feature length movies, documentaries and cartoons. The aid is approved until 2010.

"The commission says the new German funds for movie productions are in line with state aid rules," EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said.

Finnish Antitrust Body Proposes $40 Million Fine On Stora Enso (AP)

Associated Press

AP, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108472

HELSINKI, Finland -- Finnish antitrust officials said Thursday that paper maker Stora Enso Oyj should be fined $40 million for anticompetitive behavior.

The Finnish Competition Authority proposed the fine to the country's Market Court, saying the Finnish-Swedish company had violated competition laws in buying timber in Finland from 1997 to 2004. It gave no other details.

Stora Enso denied the charges, saying the proposal is "groundless."

Earlier his month, Stora Enso denied any involvement in a price-fixing conspiracy in the United States after a federal grand jury in Hartford, Conn., indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. for being part of a plan to drive up prices of paper used to print magazines and catalogues.

Stora Enso is one of the world's largest forest product groups, making magazine paper, newsprint, fine paper, pulp and packaging boards. It employs 44,000 people in more than 40 countries.

The group was formed in a 1998 merger between Finland's Enso and Stora of Sweden. The Finnish government is the major shareholder with more than 10 percent of the stock.

DaimlerChrysler Paying $1.2M To Settle Pollution Violation (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Justice said Thursday that Mercedes-Benz USA and parent DaimlerChrysler AG will pay $1.2 million to settle allegations that they failed to report air pollution problems with Mercedes-Benz vehicles to federal regulators.

As a result of the complaint brought by the government, Mercedes-Benz USA has issued voluntary recalls and extended warranties to address the defects, at an estimated cost of $59 million. Under the settlement, the company is also required to overhaul its emissions reporting system. The improvements will likely cost the company $1 million per year, the Department of Justice said in a statement.

The affected 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. According to the government, the recalls and warranty extensions will reduce the harmful emissions caused by the defects by over 500 tons cumulatively.

Under the Clean Air Act auto makers are required to notify the Environmental Protection Agency of problems with vehicle emissions.

Calls for comment were left with DaimlerChrysler.

Shares of DaimlerChrysler fell 36 cents to close at $61.23 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mercedes To Pay EPA $1.2 Million (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Mercedes-Benz USA and its parent company, DaimlerChrysler AG, yesterday agreed to pay the government $1.2 million for failing to notify the Environmental Protection Agency about air pollution controls defects on numerous 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles.

The settlement, announced by the Justice Department and the EPA, resolves a suspected Clean Air Act violation: The auto manufacturer did not promptly inform the EPA of defects in emission-related parts so the agency could determine whether the emission standards were exceeded and whether a recall was necessary.

Both the complaint and the settlement were filed in the U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia.

"Reliable and effective automobile pollution control systems are essential to protect human health and the environment from harmful automobile emissions," said Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge, who heads the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division.

"Mercedes' failure to alert EPA to a number of defects in emission-related components over a multiyear period is a serious violation," she said.

In response to the EPA's investigation, Mercedes began voluntary recalls for two of the defects and notified owners that it would extend the warranty coverage to address a third defect, at an estimated cost of $59 million.

Mercedes U.S. spokeswoman Tracy Darchini wasn't available to comment on the settlement.

Justice Department officials said the vehicles subject to the voluntary recalls and extended warranties have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. The voluntary recalls and extended warranty will reduce the emissions of harmful pollutants caused by the defects by more than 500 tons, they said.

The pollutants include non-methane hydrocarbons, nitrogen oxides, which are key ingredients in the production of ozone, a major contributor to cancer-causing smog. Carbon monoxide, another pollutant, impairs breathing and is especially harmful to children, people with asthma and the elderly.

Under the terms of the consent decree, Mercedes will be required to improve its emissions-defect investigation and reporting system to ensure future compliance, at an estimated cost of $1 million per year.

"These defect reporting requirements are a critical part of EPA's program to ensure that vehicles on the road comply with the Clean Air Act's emissions standards," said Catherine R. McCabe, EPA's principal deputy assistant administrator for the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance.

The agreement is subject to a 30-day public comment period and final court approval.

Court Rules Against Tribes In Disclosure Case (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A divided California Supreme Court ruled Thursday that Indian tribes can be sued for violating the state's campaign disclosure law even though tribes enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law.

The 4-3 ruling is unprecedented and may be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has consistently protected Indian immunity from lawsuits.

The state court justified its ruling in Agua Caliente v. Superior Court by citing the growing role of Indian casino money in state elections and the state's need to protect against political corruption.

Justice Ming Chin, writing for the majority, conceded that Thursday's decision was an "abrogation of the sovereign immunity doctrine" that protects tribes from lawsuits. But he said the ruling was narrow and justified by the state's need to provide "a transparent election process with rules that apply equally to all parties who enter the political fray."

Justice Carlos R. Moreno, writing for the dissenting justices, insisted that only Congress could change Indian tribes' immunity from lawsuits.

"The ideal of Indian tribal sovereign immunity and federal protection has existed side by side with the reality of Indians massacred and dispossessed from their land by state and private interests or more recently, of Indians living in poverty as second-class citizens," Moreno wrote.

Now that some tribes are growing wealthy from casinos, "the ideal of tribal sovereignty is becoming more concretely realized," and any need to modify it must come from Congress, Moreno wrote.

Thursday's ruling permits the state's Fair Political Practices Commission to sue the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians, a federally recognized tribe in Palm Springs, for failing to properly report millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

The watchdog panel said the tribe did not follow the law when it contributed more than $7.5 million to campaigns in 1998, $175,200 in the first half of 2001, and $426,000 in the first half of 2002.

One of the alleged contributions made in 2002 went to support a ballot initiative that would have authorized $15 million a year for eight years to fund several projects, including a passenger rail line from Los Angeles to Palm Springs, where the tribe runs a casino.

DOJ_NMG_0108474

The Fair Political Practices Commission requires full disclosure of contributions in political campaigns, both from the donors and the recipients. The commission sued the tribe, arguing that it had violated the disclosure law in making the contributions from 1998 to 2002. The lawsuit seeks penalties and a court injunction.

The tribe argued the doctrine of sovereign immunity shields it from lawsuits and appealed to the California Supreme Court after losing in the trial and appeals courts.

In ruling against the tribe, the court majority admitted that the U.S. Supreme Court has consistently affirmed the sovereign immunity doctrine. But the majority said the court also has "grown increasingly critical of its continued application in light of the changed status of Indian tribes as viable economic and political nations."

California has the right to regulate its electoral process under the U.S. Constitution's 10th Amendment, which protects state rights, and the guarantee clause, which gives states the duty and power to maintain a republican form of government, the majority said.

Without the ability to enforce tribal compliance, the Political Reform Act of 1974 would be substantially weakened, Chin said.

The court's decision, he wrote, would apply only to attempts to enforce the campaign laws.

The tribe had insisted the state had other means of enforcing its campaign laws, including discussions with the tribe on a government-to-government basis or acquiring the donation information from other sources, and offered to enter into a voluntary compliance agreement with the state.

But the majority rejected the tribe's proposals.

In the dissent, Moreno said the U.S. Supreme Court "has not wavered from the principle that whatever problems arise from the conflict between Indian and state sovereignty are matters for Congress, exercising its plenary power over Indian affairs, to solve."

The federal Constitution gives states "no power to abrogate Indian sovereign immunity" because the states ceded such powers to the federal government when they ratified the Constitution, wrote Moreno, joined by Justices Joyce Kennard and Kathryn Mickle Werdegar.

Moreno noted that the Agua Caliente band has been willing to enter into an agreement to waive its immunity for political reporting and has practical reasons for doing so.

"A tribe concerned with preserving its own sovereignty while at the same time seeking to maintain good relations with the government and the citizens ... may recognize that concessions are necessary to promote its own long-run interests," Moreno wrote.

A lawyer and a spokeswoman for the Agua Caliente band refused to say whether it would appeal the ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The tribe issued a statement from tribal Chairman Richard M. Milanovich, who expressed disappointment and said the Tribal Council would "decide what further actions it may take."

The tribe owns about 31,500 acres in a checkerboard pattern in the alm Springs area and has about 400 members, a spokeswoman said.

FBI Chief For Md. Faces Balancing Act (WP)

By Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Chase Sees Need To Bolster Fight On Crime, Terror

After running down fugitives in the District and pursuing one of the nation's most storied fugitives, William D. Chase is settling in as the head of the FBI's Baltimore office.

Chase, 50, who assumed the job in June, says that while counterterrorism remains the bureau's top priority, he also wants to dedicate more resources to fighting crime, the bureau's traditional role.

"I'm hoping to make some changes to firm up resources to better address the criminal program," Chase said.

DOJ_NMG_0108475

Since the terrorist attacks of 2001, the bureau's top priority has been fighting terrorism, and that is more the case in the Washington area, with its preponderance of government facilities, than elsewhere. The majority of Chase's agents necessarily are assigned to that central responsibility; his agents must follow tips and possible leads of all kinds, even hoaxes, often simply to eliminate them.

Still, he said, he hopes to work more closely with state and local authorities, particularly to address the gang activity that has increasingly taken root in Maryland's Washington suburbs. The Baltimore FBI office covers Maryland and Delaware.

The FBI announced in February that Kevin L. Perkins, then the special agent in charge of the bureau's Baltimore office, was being appointed assistant director in charge of the FBI's finance division.

Chase replaced him during the summer. Federal law enforcement officials, including U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, spoke highly of Chase in recent interviews.

Rosenstein, the top federal prosecutor in Maryland, said he and Chase agree that the Baltimore division must be appropriately mindful of the need to balance counterterrorism activities with the bureau's more traditional crime-fighting role.

"I think he's a very experienced and very responsible leader, and I think we're going to work very effectively together," Rosenstein said.

Clare Weber, a spokeswoman for the Baltimore division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said her agency has worked well with the bureau under Chase. "It's just a good partnership," she said. "Everything is all glowing."

Chase comes to the position with an unusual r?sum?, having started his professional career as a corporate attorney specializing in environmental law. It was "very unfulfilling," said Chase, a graduate of Vermont Law School and a self-described environmentalist.

But Chase had an uncle who was an agent, and over dinner that uncle told stories that intrigued the young lawyer more than a little bit. Chase applied to the bureau "kind of on a whim."

Chase was accepted, and soon he was assigned to St. Louis, where he battled organized crime and drug-trafficking, working closely with local authorities in some of the same ways he hopes his agents do here.

But he was a lawyer, and before long the FBI decided it wanted him in headquarters. He worked in the office of legal counsel from 1986 to 1991, when he was named special assistant to William S. Sessions, then the director of the FBI.

"I came to the bureau to get out of being an attorney, and three years later I was back to being an attorney," he said.

But Chase said he missed doing what the FBI does on the ground level: working cases. He joined the Washington field office in 1993, where he was the head of a fugitive task force. The ratio of paperwork to arrests was very good, he said.

"It was kind of like a law enforcement officer's dream," he said. "We'd hit 10 places a day . . . and usually every arrest was high stress."

The team looked for fugitives anywhere that one could hide -- in dishwashers, in refrigerators -- and looked for such tell-tale signs as loose ceiling tiles. In one instance, he said, a fugitive was found hiding behind a disposal.

In the late 1990s, Chase was named assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office, a period that he recalls as frustrating and in some ways disappointing.

That office, and much of that city, was seemingly fixated on the bureau's long-running search for James "Whitey" Bulger, a reputed mobster and fugitive for more than a decade. It was around that time that the public learned, in an extremely embarrassing moment for the bureau, that the suspected multiple-murderer also had been an FBI informant. Possible sightings were everywhere, from Thailand to South America, and each had to be explored. Bulger remains at large.

The Boston office also came under public scrutiny in what may be one of the FBI's most embarrassing revelations in recent history, that one of its agents had been an informant for the mob.

And Chase was in Boston on Sept. 11 -- his birthday, incidentally -- when two airplanes slammed into the World Trade Center after leaving Logan International Airport. What first seemed to be a hijacking was quickly revealed to be a terrorist attack, and the bureau's mission was recast in a sprint to prevent a feared second wave of attacks.

"I still remember that night," Chase said. "I got home, it was probably 2 in the morning and I turned on the television and I was still watching it at 5 a.m."

Everyone worked every day for two months, he said, and eventually, agents were told they had to take a half-day off on the weekend.

The fear that a second wave would follow immediately belongs to a different era, but in some respects, of course, the concern persists.

"Our mission is that there never be a recurrence of 9/11," Chase said.

Ford Wants Rolex Returned (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 22, 2006

December 22, 2006 John Ford had one thing to say Thursday about prosecutors' suggestions he took a $40,000 wristwatch as a payoff: He wants the Rolex -- confiscated as evidence -- returned to him.

"I want to get it back," the former state senator said as his lawyer told reporters that Ford had obtained the watch legally.

Advertisement

Ford's comments came a day after the U.S. Attorney's Office alleged Ford accepted the watch from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman after intervening in a 2004 state pollution-control case against the real estate millionaire.

"The watch was completely a legal transaction," said Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, who said he will spell out details soon in a court filing.

Prosecutors hope to use the watch as evidence in Ford's upcoming bribery trial.

Ford and Scholl spoke briefly with reporters after a hearing where Scholl asked a judge to postpone Ford's Feb. 5 trial because of publicity this week about the watch and separate corruption charges just unveiled in Nashville.

Ford is set to stand trial in Memphis for allegedly taking $55,000 in bribes in the FBI's undercover Tennessee Waltz sting.

He learned Monday about the new indictment in Nashville alleging he took $800,000 in kickbacks from contractors while in the General Assembly. Ford denies charges in both cases.

Scholl told U.S. Dist. Judge J. Daniel Breen in a hearing in the federal building that all the sudden adverse publicity will make it hard to get a fair trial.

"There almost is no presumption of innocence for Mr. Ford as far as what's been laid out in the media this week day after day," Scholl told the judge.

Less than 50 days from trial, the timing of the Nashville charges and news of the watch create a prejudicial effect, Scholl said.

Breen expressed hesitance, yet said he will consider Scholl's request after he files a written motion, expected next week.

Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza urged the judge to stick to the trial schedule, saying there are plenty of protections to ensure a fair trial.

DiScenza filed a motion Wednesday seeking to introduce the Rolex as evidence of "like and similar" acts by Ford showing he was inclined to take payoffs.

Neither Ford nor Hyneman, who hasn't returned calls for comment, has been charged in connection with the watch.

A legal analyst, retired University of Tennessee law professor Neil P. Cohen, said the lack of charges over the watch could be a strategy by prosecutors to win more witness cooperation.

John Ford Linked To $40,000 Watch (AP)

By Woody Baird

AP, December 22, 2006

MEMPHIS - Former state Sen. John Ford, facing corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, bragged about getting a $40,000 watch for helping a wealthy real estate developer avoid pollution fines, prosecutors say in a court filing.

Prosecutors want to tell Ford's jury about the watch, a Rolex Masterpiece, when he goes to trial on unrelated charges of bribery, extortion and threatening a federal witness.

Ford, 64, is set for trial Feb. 5 on charges he took $55,000 in bribes from undercover agents posing as representatives of E-Cycle Management, a fake company at the center of an FBI investigation code-named Tennessee Waltz.

Defense lawyer Michael Scholl asked Thursday for a delay in the trial, arguing that news reports surrounding Ford's indictment Monday in Nashville on federal charges unrelated to Tennessee Waltz will make picking an impartial jury difficult.

Ford is accused in Nashville of taking more than $800,000 from TennCare contractors while he was on several Senate committees overseeing the state's expanded Medicaid program. No trial date has been set on those charges.

"The attention it's gotten is just unreal," Scholl said.

Judge J. Daniel Breen told Scholl to put his arguments in writing. "But at this point, we are set," the judge said.

Prosecutor Tim DiScenza objected to a delay.

"It's time for this case to be tried," he said. "No part of that Nashville case are we going to use in our case."

Prosecutors filed a request with Breen on Wednesday to bring up Ford's watch at his Memphis trial "as evidence of other crimes, wrongs and acts."

Scholl said Ford got the watch legally.

"This absolutely has nothing to do with this trial," he said.

Following a brief status conference with Breen, Ford refused to talk about the watch, except to say, "I want to get it back."

Prosecutors said Ford talked about getting the watch two years ago from Rusty Hyneman, one of Memphis' best-know real estate developers.

A call to Hyneman's office was not returned.

"Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him $1.3 million dollars," prosecutors said in their petition.

The watch was taken from Ford when he was arrested on the Tennessee Waltz charges last year. Ford, who had represented a Memphis district for more than 30 years, resigned from the Senate shortly after that arrest.

Prosecutors do not identify two individuals with whom they said Ford talked about the watch. During the two-year Tennessee Waltz investigation, the FBI made hundreds of hours of secret audio and video recordings.

Ford met with state officials on Hyneman's behalf after the developer was cited for water pollution violations at subdivisions he was building in Shelby County, prosecutors said.

Ford denies the Nashville charges, saying he had a private consulting business while in the Senate and his dealings with TennCare contractors were proper.

TennCare is an expanded state-federal Medicaid program that provides health care to the poor, elderly, disabled and uninsurable.

Developer Admits Ocean Twp. Graft (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, December 22, 2006

Says he paid mayor $50,000 to boost zoning

A Monmouth County developer yesterday admitted paying off former Ocean Township Mayor Ter rance Weldon to increase the zon ing density for his housing project.

Moshe "Michael" Gohar acknowledged in federal district court in Trenton that he gave Weldon $50,000 in cash after Weldon helped influence the 2001 vote on the zon ing change.

"Where did you do it?" U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano asked of the corrupt payment.

"He came to my house," said Gohar, a 56-year-old Ocean Township resident, his voice barely audible.

The zoning change allowed the developer to build 75 townhouses on 81.1 acres, instead of the roughly 30 single-family homes permitted under the original zoning. The Apple Farm development was never constructed.

Gohar pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to give and offer corrupt payments. He initially had been indicted in February and also charged with mail fraud and bribery. The latter charge alone could have put him behind bars for up to 10 years.

DOJ_NMG_0108478

Under the plea agreement between Gohar's attorneys and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Brian Howe and Charles McKenna, Gohar could face between 18 and 27 months in prison. One factor in sentencing could be a previous state tax conviction against Gohar.

If Pisano stays within the parameters of the plea agreement, neither side can appeal. The judge, however, is not bound by the agreement and Gohar faces a max imum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

"He's contrite," Blair Zwillman, Gohar's attorney, said after the hearing. "He realizes it was a big mistake and wants to go on with his life."

FBI agents raided Weldon's house in January 2002 as part of a long-running corruption probe in Monmouth County, and found the cash in the pocket of a suit jacket in the mayor's attic. Weldon later pleaded guilty on corruption charges.

Gohar also said he conspired with the late Neptune businessman Philip Konvitz in the scheme. Be fore Konvitz died in 2005, a federal judge dismissed corruption charges against him after medical experts agreed that the 92-year-old suffered from Alzheimer's disease and was unfit to stand trial.

Pisano is scheduled to sentence Gohar on March 28. Gohar was re leased on a $500,000 secured property bond after his indictment and remains free pending his sentenc ing.

FBI Offers $40,000 Reward For Info On Trestle Fire (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 22, 2006

The FBI yesterday announced a $40,000 reward for information leading to the conviction of the arsonist who set a fire that destroyed a Butler County train trestle in May, causing an estimated $8 million in damage and lost business to the railroad and three area companies that rely on the rail line.

State police ruled the fire an arson eight days after the blaze, which quickly engulfed the 624-foot Divener Trestle in Donegal.

The bridge, a wooden structure owned by the Buffalo & Pittsburgh Railroad that predated the Civil War, went up in flames just 15 minutes after a train carrying sulphuric acid crossed it.

"That would have been a disaster. That could have wiped out that town," said Ray Morrow, head of the Pittsburgh FBI office.

Another train was some 30 minutes away from crossing the span.

The railroad and three companies directly impacted by the loss of the trestle put up the reward money. The FBI got involved because it has jurisdiction over crimes involving railroad lines; the agency and state police are conducting the investigation.

The railroad had to pay about $2.7 million to replace the bridge.

While the bridge was down, three industrial plants in northern Butler County suffered huge financial hardships.

Indspec Chemical Corp. and Sonneborn Inc., both chemical companies in Petrolia, and Penreco, a supply company in Karns City, estimated the loss of rail access cost them a total of $5.3 million because of disruption of shipments to and from their facilities.

The rail line, a 17-mile link from the city of Butler along Route 68, runs directly into two of the plants.

Anyone with information is asked to call the FBI at 412-432-4000.

Four Indicted On Drug Trafficking Charges (ANG)

Access North Georgia, December 21, 2006

ATLANTA - Four illegal aliens have been indicted on charges relating to a large scale methamphetamine and cocaine trafficking conspiracy in Barrow and Gwinnett counties.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26; Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20; Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33; and Mauricio Medina-Mojica, 26, all believed to be from Mexico, were indicted by a federal grand jury late Wednesday.

Search warrants yielded over 280 pounds of illegal drugs and a rifle, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta.

"We are coming after those responsible for the scourge of methamphetamine and other dangerous drugs that undermine the well being of our community and our country," said United States Attorney David E. Nahmias. "We will also seek additional charges and longer sentences for anyone possessing or using a firearm in conjunction with their drug trafficking activities."

The indictment charges the defendants in relation to five separate search warrants that were executed in Gwinnett and Barrow counties November 21. A search of four residences in those counties yielded a total of 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine (aks Ice), 135 pounds of cocaine, and a .223 caliber AR-15 style rifle.

The indictment charges all four defendants with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. In addition, Miguel Angel Gonzalez is charged with the actual possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

DEA Atlanta Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange noted the quantity of methamphetamine seized in this case constitutes the nation's fifth largest methamphetamine seizure in 2006.

At an earlier news conference outlining details of the seizure, Ms. Strange said that DEA maintains a commitment to disrupt and dismantle the organizations that bring these drugs to Atlanta, commenting, "As members of these groups step up their operations, we are going to step up our operations."

This case is being investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, with assistance from the Barrow County Sheriff's Department and Gwinnett County Police Department.

Four Indicted On Charges They Ran Large Drug Ring (GDP)

Gwinnett Daily Post, December 22, 2006

ATLANTA - Four illegal aliens believed to be from Mexico have been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges related to a large-scale drug-trafficking conspiracy.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26, Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20, Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33, and Mauricio Medino-Mojica, 26, are charged with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine, according to a press release issued by Patrick Crosby, public affairs officer for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Gonzalez is charged with "the actual possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug-trafficking crime," Crosby said.

The charges stem from five separate search warrants executed in November in Gwinnett and Barrow Counties, where law enforcement seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine or ice, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223 caliber AR-15-style rifle, the release said.

Searches were executed at two Lilburn addresses, two Lawrenceville addresses and one Winder address, Crosby said.

Almost all the drugs and the gun were found at the Johns Way address, and the other residences yielded drug ledgers and some drug proceeds, Crosby said.

A Drug Enforcement Administration official noted that this bust is the nation's fifth largest meth seizure this year.

The DEA is investigating the case with assistance from law enforcement in Barrow and Gwinnett Counties.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Garrett M. Heenan is prosecuting the case.

Arrests Tied To Huge Drug Ring (ABH)

Athens Banner-Herald, December 22, 2006

Four Mexican nationals are charged with running the local branch of a massive drug ring out of Gwinnett and Barrow counties, after federal authorities made what they are calling the nation's fifth-largest methamphetamine seizure of the year.

Indictments handed down Wednesday against men believed to be undocumented aliens from Mexico stem from five search warrants executed Nov. 21 at houses in Barrow and Gwinnett counties, U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia David Nahmias said in a news release.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26, Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20, Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33, and Mauricio Medino-Mojica, 26, were indicted Wednesday on charges of engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and meth, according to Nahmias' office. Gonzalez also is charged with possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

The Barrow and Gwinnett searches yielded 145 pounds of crystal meth, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223-caliber AR-15-style rifle.

Agents searched a house off Patrick Mill Road in southwestern Barrow County and four in Gwinnett County - two in Lilburn and two in Lawrenceville. Almost all of the drugs and the rifle were found at one of the Lilburn houses, while investigators found drug ledgers and some drug proceeds at the other houses, according to Patrick Crosby, spokesman for Nahmias.

A day later, federal authorities filed criminal complaints against the four men in advance of the federal grand jury's indictment.

On Nov. 6, Barrow County Superior Court Judge Joe Booth authorized federal investigators to tap a telephone belonging to Nunez-Villanueva, according to an affidavit that a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent filed in federal court.

Through the wiretap, investigators learned that Nunez-Villanueva "appeared to be a broker for numerous illegal drug transactions," the agent said in the affidavit.

Three days later, DEA officers and the Barrow County Sheriff's Office began surveillance of a house at 721 Tom Miller Road - a house where Nunez-Villanueva lived and met with customers, according to the affidavit.

Meanwhile, federal authorities in Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky arrested 13 others, charging them with conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and cocaine. Those 13 men - three of whom are on the lam - are charged with conspiring to bring cocaine and meth from Chicago and Atlanta to southeastern Indiana and Louisville, Ky., according to Susan W. Brooks, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Indiana.

In Chicago and Indiana, investigators seized 15 kilos of cocaine, two vehicles with compartments that could be used for hiding drugs, 25 pounds of meth, almost a kilo of heroin, roughly $400,000 in cash and guns. Authorities also arrested seven others on unrelated charges.

"Based on the amount of cash seized and drugs recovered, we have dismantled a highly productive drug organization," Brooks said in a news release.

Among the customers who went to the Winder house were couriers sent by Clarksville, Ind., resident Francisco Ortuno-Vasquez, who faces an indictment in Indiana, according to court records and Brooks.

The Georgia case is being investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, with help from the Barrow County Sheriff's Office and Gwinnett County police. Assistant U.S. Attorney Garrett M. Heenan is prosecuting the case.

Feds Bust Metro Cop For Helping Family's Cocaine Ring (NCP)

Nashville City Paper, December 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors on Thursday unsealed an indictment on a Metro Police narcotics detective, Officer Ernest B. Cecil, charging him with conspiracy for using his police powers to help his nephew run a Nashville cocaine ring.

Cecil, a 15-year veteran of the department, was arrested by federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) agents and immediately taken into custody Thursday morning, Metro Police Chief Ronal Serpas said at a press conference announcing the indictment.

U.S. Attorney Craig S. Morford – whose office on Monday indicted former State Senator John Ford on a new round of fraud charges – called Thursday's announcement of the indicting of a Metro Police officer a "sad day."

"It is a sad day whenever we have to stand here and announce that we have indicted an officer who is accused of violating the very laws that he has taken an oath to enforce," Morford said.

Cecil was indicted by a federal grand jury on one count of conspiracy to distribute over 5 kilograms of cocaine, one count of possession with the intent to distribute over 500 kilograms cocaine, and one count each of robbery in violation of the Hobbs Act and of brandishing a firearm during a drug trafficking crime.

Federal officials said they believe Cecil's alleged crimes were all committed to help his nephew, Corey Cecil, hide his drug operation from the rest of the Metro Police Department.

"Officer Cecil's nephew, Corey Cecil, and others regularly brought up large amounts of cocaine into Nashville for distribution and resale on the streets of this community," Morford said.

DOJ_NMG_0108481

The indictment charges Cecil with providing protection to those drug dealers by warning his nephew to stay away from certain police-targeted areas, telling his nephew to dump his cell phones because they were no longer safe, arranging for the dismissal of parking tickets for his nephew, and assisted his nephew in retrieving a confiscated cell phone, and making threats on his behalf.

"And most importantly and most significantly, he participated with his nephew and a fellow Metro police officer in the robbery of a cocaine dealer," Morford said.

On April 30, 2003, Officer Cecil and Officer Charles Williams – who is already under indictment and will be going to trial in January – made a bogus police stop on one of the nephew's cocaine suppliers, federal prosecutors said.

That stop and the subsequent indictment of Williams eventually led Metro Police investigators to turn their attention to Cecil, Serpas said.

"There is a zero tolerance in the Metropolitan Police Department for untruthfulness, there's a zero tolerance for unethical behavior, and there's a zero tolerance for unethical behavior," Serpas said.

Serpas said Officer Cecil's arrest should put an end to the Cecil family drug operation.

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Panel Rejects Demjanjuk Appeal Of Deportation Order (AP)

By M. R. Kropko

AP, December 22, 2006

CLEVELAND — A man accused of being a Nazi death camp guard lost an appeal today fighting his deportation.

John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, was ordered deported in 2005 after the chief federal immigration judge determined he had served at several Nazi death camps during World War II. Demjanjuk has denied the allegation and still has the right to appeal in federal courts today's ruling by the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va.

In its 20-page ruling, the board said facts established previously in courts identifying him as a Nazi guard "are conclusively established" and that there is no reason to believe there may be new information about his past in a Soviet KGB file, as his lawyer alleged.

The board reviewed legal briefs in the case before dismissing Demjanjuk's appeal, said Elaine Komis, spokeswoman for the Executive Office for Immigration Review.

"We are studying it," said John Broadley, Demjanjuk's lawyer. "But that's the conclusion they reached. What their reasoning is, we'll have to take a look at, and federal courts will have to look at it, too."

Demjanjuk, a former auto worker, was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible," a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp.

But Demjanjuk, who first lost his U.S. citizenship in 1981, was stripped of his citizenship in 2002 for a second time when a federal district judge in Cleveland ruled that documents from World War II prove he was a Nazi guard at various Nazi death or forced labor camps.

Demjanjuk is in frail health due to leg and back pain and appeared in a wheelchair at his deportation hearing last year. He lives in virtual seclusion at his home in Seven Hills.

"My expectation is that our lawyer is going to want to review it," said Demjanjuk's son, John Demjanjuk Jr. "My understanding it that it's appealable. They can't send him anywhere. We're not aware of any country offering to accept him from the United States."

Former Chief Immigration Judge Michael Creppy ruled Dec. 28 last year that there was no evidence to document Demjanjuk's claim that he would be tortured if deported to his native Ukraine. Creppy ruled that Demjanjuk should be deported to Germany or Poland if Ukraine does not accept him.

Broadley argued in the appeal that Creppy held an administrative position and should not have assigned the case to himself, and that he was biased because he once wrote an article containing his opinions on Nazi cases. Broadley also said Demjanjuk was not given a fair chance to adequately oppose some findings against him.

The 11-member Board of Immigration Appeals is the highest administrative body for interpreting and applying immigration laws. Generally, the board does not conduct courtroom proceedings.

The board hears appeals from decisions of immigration judges and by district directors of the Department of Homeland Security. Decisions of the board are binding unless modified or overruled by the attorney general or a federal appeals court.

Demjanjuk's case started 29 years ago and is the second longest in the records of the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which handles cases against people accused of being former Nazis.

The longest running U.S. case involving an accused Nazi was that of Andrija Artukovic, a Croatia wartime government official. The former Immigration and Naturalization Service started deportation proceedings against him in May 1951, and he was extradited to Yugoslavia in early 1986, some 35 years later.

US 'Nazi Guard' Faces Deportation (BBC)

BBC News, December 22, 2006

An 85-year-old man accused of having been a guard at a Nazi death camp has lost an appeal against his deportation from the US to his native Ukraine.

John Demjanjuk, who was ordered to be deported a year ago, can still make a further appeal against this ruling.

He has denied the allegations and his lawyers argued he would be tortured if sent back to Ukraine.

Mr Demjanjuk migrated to the US in 1951 and was briefly deported to Israel amid a 30-year legal battle over his past.

At the time, he was suspected of having been a notorious concentration camp guard, known by the nickname "Ivan the Terrible".

But his name was eventually cleared in an Israeli court and he was spared the death penalty.

Lack of evidence

The Board of Immigration Appeals upheld the 2005 deportation order which said there was no evidence to prove Mr Damjanjuk would be tortured if returned to the Ukraine.

"Simply put, the respondent's arguments regarding the likelihood of torture are speculative and not based on evidence in record," the board stated.

Mr Damjanjuk's lawyer, John Broadley said he was studying the ruling.

"What their reasoning is, we'll have to take a look at, and federal courts will have to look at it, too," he said.

His son, John Demjanjuk Jr, believed an appeal could still be made, adding: "We're not aware of any country offering to accept him from the United States."

The US Justice Department said efforts were continuing to remove him from the country as soon as possible.

Citizenship battle

Mr Demjanjuk returned to the US and his citizenship - which he had lost for allegedly lying to US immigration officials - was restored in 1998.

However, in 2002, an immigration judge ruled that there was enough evidence to prove Mr Demjanjuk had been a guard at several Nazi death camps and again stripped him of his citizenship.

He lost an appeal against the decision in 2004.

Mr Demjanjuk has always insisted he was a prisoner of war with the Nazis, rather than a guard serving under them.

But his 2002 hearing found that he had been an armed guard at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg concentration camps where tens of thousands of Jews were killed.

Saudi Princess To Be Deported, Judge Orders (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BOSTON --A Saudi Arabian princess who broke U.S. immigration laws to keep her domestic servants was ordered to be deported, prosecutors said Thursday.

Hana F. Al Jader of Winchester was sentenced to two years of probation, the first six months of which must be served in home confinement, after which she'll be deported to Saudi Arabia, prosecutors said.

U.S. District Judge Reginald J. Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader, 40, to pay $206,000 in restitution to three of her former domestic servants, pay a $40,000 fine, and perform 100 hours of community service.

In September, Al Jader pleaded guilty to two counts of visa fraud for lying on immigration forms, and two counts of harboring an alien for keeping the two women at her house though she knew their visas had expired.

In a deal with prosecutors, six counts of forced labor were dropped in exchange for guilty pleas on the other charges.

Prosecutors alleged that Al Jader forced two domestic servants from Indonesia to work long hours, while holding their passports in a safe.

Al Jader submitted fraudulent forms to the U.S. Embassy in Saudi Arabia guaranteeing the women would work eight hours daily for $1,500 a month, they charged.

The women were actually paid just $300 per month after arriving in February 2003 to cook, clean and care for Al Jader's disabled husband, and their children.

Al Jader and her husband, Prince Mohamed Bin Turki Al Saud, and have lived in Winchester and Arlington since the mid-1990s, when the couple came to the United States to obtain medical and rehabilitation treatment for injuries the prince suffered in an auto accident.

Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader to forfeit a second residence in Arlington.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Grand Jury Subpoenas Weldon Records (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

Washington — A federal grand jury has subpoenaed congressional records from Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., as part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe aimed at determining whether Weldon used his influence to win favors for family members, people familiar with the investigation said.

The previously unreported subpoena was issued by a grand jury in Washington before the November election, although it is unclear when Weldon received it.

The 10-term lawmaker was at the time in a tight race to retain his seat representing the Philadelphia suburbs, which he subsequently lost to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Weldon said public disclosure of the Justice Department investigation, which came three weeks before election day, was politically motivated. He said at the time that he was not aware of any investigation and that he had done nothing wrong.

An attorney for Weldon, William J. Winning, did not return messages Thursday seeking comment.

House rules require members of Congress to promptly report the receipt of subpoenas to the leadership when Congress is in session. Notice of the subpoena is then customarily published in the Congressional Record.

A search of the record Thursday did not turn up evidence that Weldon had disclosed the subpoena.

It is possible that the lawmaker did not receive the subpoena until after Congress adjourned following the election, when different reporting rules would have applied. In that case, he still would have been required to notify the leadership, but the subpoena would not become public in the Congressional Record until Congress reconvenes in January.

Weldon is a former vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a leading voice in Washington on the affairs of former Eastern bloc nations. The FBI is investigating whether he traded his influence to get lobbying business for his daughter and others.

Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, a close friend and political adviser to the lawmaker, operated Solutions North America. Investigators are examining about $1 million in contracts from foreign clients that Weldon may have helped steer to the firm.

The corruption probe became known on Oct. 16, when the FBI searched six sites in Philadelphia and Jacksonville, Fla. They included the lobbying firm run by Weldon's daughter and one of its clients, a Russian energy company, Itera International Energy Corp.

DOJ_NMG_0108484

The Los Angeles Times reported in 2004 that Solutions North America won contracts from companies or individuals that Weldon tried to help. The beneficiaries included two struggling Russian companies and a Serbian family linked to accused war criminal Slobodan Milosevic.

The Times reported Itera was paying Solutions $500,000 a year for public relations help around the same time that Weldon was extolling the company and helping to round up 30 congressional colleagues for a dinner honoring the company's chairman.

Weldon said at the time of the October searches that he had "no communication or contact with anyone, nobody from the Justice Department" about an investigation, and had not been told that he was a target of any probe.

Another lawyer for Weldon, William B. Canfield, said at the time that the House Ethics Committee had reviewed the matter, and that it had been resolved, although the report has never been made public. Canfield could not be reached Thursday.

The FBI subsequently opened an investigation into whether law-enforcement officials illegally leaked information about the Weldon probe to the media. It is a violation of the law for government officials to reveal grand jury material publicly.

Legal experts said that Weldon's electoral defeat did not relieve him of the obligation to report the subpoena.

"If they were served with a subpoena before the House adjourned, then they were supposed to give notice immediately," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former counsel to the House.

"For a member not re-elected, the rules are no different," Tiefer said. But he observed that the House has virtually no power to sanction former members for violations of its rules.

Conservative Appointed To CPB Board (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush has appointed an outspoken conservative television producer to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Warren Bell, executive producer of ABC's "According to Jim," was first nominated by Bush in June. In September, his nomination was abruptly pulled from the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee's agenda because of some senators' concerns.

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting is a private, nonprofit company that was created by Congress in 1967 to distribute federal funds to local public television and radio stations.

Bell has been an online contributor to the conservative National Review magazine. In May 2005 he described himself as "thoroughly conservative in ways that strike horror into the hearts of my Hollywood colleagues."

Since then he has pledged to be nonpartisan in his service on the board.

The board has been criticized in recent years as stacked with right-wing political operatives. In 2005, then-chairman Kenneth Tomlinson was accused in an inspector general's report of using "political tests" as a criteria for hiring top employees, exerting political influence over programming, and other offenses.

The appointment, announced Wednesday night, prompted criticism from Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who accused the Bush administration of not caring about the "integrity or quality" of the public broadcasting system.

"First we saw Ken Tomlinson's embarrassing tenure as chairman. Now, the president is putting Warren Bell, an unqualified nominee that the Senate refused to consider, on the CPB board," he said.

Bell's recess appointment means he will stay on the board through the congressional session that ends in 2007.

Bush's Recess Appointment Puts Pick In Broadcast Post (WT/COX)

By Ken Herman, Cox News Service

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

President Bush, blocked by the Senate in two attempts, has used a recess appointment to bypass senators and put his top political advertising adviser on the panel that oversees the nation's international broadcasting operations.

Mark McKinnon will join the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG) in time for its Jan. 10 meeting. The recess appointment is good for a year, but Mr. McKinnon said yesterday that he is confident the Senate would confirm him for a full term that would end in 2009.

Senators, however, often don't look favorably on recess appointees.

The BBG oversees a global operation that draws more than 100 million listeners and viewers a week. The operations include the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and broadcast systems that cover Asia, Cuba and the Middle East.

"This board is doing very important work confronting some of the biggest challenges this country faces trying to communicate the American image abroad," Mr. McKinnon said.

Mr. Bush's first attempt to get Mr. McKinnon on the board was in September 2005 in a nomination for a seat formerly held by a member whose term expired. The appointment ran into opposition from Democrats because it was a seat reserved for Democrats.

The nine-member board consists of four Democrats and four Republicans, as well as the secretary of state.

Several Democratic senators, including Delaware's Joseph R. Biden Jr., were upset by the effort to put Mr. McKinnon in a Democratic seat. Mr. McKinnon had been an adviser to Texas Democrats before he signed on with Mr. Bush in 1997. He directed the media efforts, including advertising, in the 2000 and 2004 presidential campaigns.

In October 2005, Mr. Bush withdrew the McKinnon nomination for the Democratic seat and, instead, tapped him for a seat vacated by a Republican. It was a dual nomination, covering an unexpired term and a full term through 2009.

But senators never confirmed the nomination.

Mr. McKinnon said nominations to the board were held up in the Senate "due to issues that go back years" that had "nothing to do with me."

"I told them I'd be glad to serve whenever it works out," he said.

Mr. McKinnon's nomination got caught up in Senate concerns about partisanship at the board. The concerns deepened when Mr. Bush renominated Kenneth Y. Tomlinson as the panel's chairman. Mr. Tomlinson had drawn criticism during his tenure at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which helps support public radio and television stations. Critics said Mr. Tomlinson politicized that operation.

McKinnon's Appointment To Broadcasting Board Angers Democrats (MCT)

By Maria Recio

McClatchy Newspapers, December 22, 2006

(MCT)

WASHINGTON - President Bush's media adviser, Mark McKinnon, got a recess appointment Wednesday night from the White House to be a member of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, a little-known but influential federal agency that oversees U.S. government-sponsored news outlets such as the Voice of America.

Why would he need a recess appointment - a presidential perk to get around Congress? The Democrat-turned-Republican media consultant's nomination languished for nearly a year and a half in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senate Democrats were livid when the Texan was first nominated for a Democratic slot on the board. His quick re-nomination as a Republican - the longtime Texas Democrat now calls himself a "Bush Republican" - did not appease them, either.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee who takes over in January, was not likely to move McKinnon's nomination, said insiders, prompting the White House action.

"The nomination had been out there a very long time and we needed to fill the position," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. "This was the most expedient way to get that slot filled."

The recess appointment lasts for one year for the part-time position. McKinnon is expected to be formally nominated for the position, as well, but is unlikely to get any further in a Senate controlled by Democrats than he did in one run by Republicans.

While presidential politics may or may not be at play - Biden is a presidential aspirant and McKinnon is an adviser to the all-but-announced presidential campaign of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. - sources close to the issue say the problem is Broadcasting Board of Governors chairman Kenneth Tomlinson.

"The issue is Tomlinson," said a Senate official close to the controversy, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Democrats view Tomlinson as partisan, and some question his ethics after a report by the State Department's inspector general, released in August, said he misused government funds for two years, including using the office's resources to promote his private horse racing operation.

Tomlinson, who denied the conclusions, serves as the board of governors' chair in one of four Republican slots. There are four Democratic slots with the ninth member being the secretary of state. Karen Hughes, Bush's close confidante and image-maker, now the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs, represents Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the board.

Because of a Democratic vacancy, McKinnon's appointment tips the balance of the board to the Republicans. That gives Tomlinson, Democrats say, effective control of the board.

Tomlinson's own nomination has been an issue for more than two years. But the chairman, whose board membership expired in 2004, continues to serve under the provision of the law that created the board. Biden co-authored that law.

Bush Signs Executive Order On Pay Raises (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush signed an executive order Thursday to raise the pay of federal workers, members of Congress and Vice President Dick Cheney in the new year.

Congress passed the pay raises earlier this year, but Bush was required to sign an executive order to enforce them.

The president's annual salary of $400,000 is not affected by the legislation.

The size of the pay raises was based on a formula in federal law that takes into account cost-of-living changes.

Civil servants, on average, will get a 2.2 percent pay increase in January. So will uniformed members of the military.

Members of Congress, the vice president and most senior federal officials will get a 1.7 percent pay increase, as will federal administrative law judges.

Congress opted to put off its pay increases until Feb. 16, not Jan. 1, on the urging of the incoming Democratic leaders in the House and Senate. They say no pay raise should kick in until Congress approves an increase in the federal minimum wage, which has been stuck at $5.15 an hour for the past 10 years.

Currently, rank-and-file members of Congress get $165,200.

Local Government Workers To Get 2.64% Raise In '07 (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

President Bush offered some holiday cheer yesterday by issuing an executive order that provides pay raises next year for federal employees, military personnel, Cabinet officers and members of Congress.

Washington-Baltimore federal employees will receive a 2.64 percent increase under a salary formula that gives higher adjustments to metropolitan areas where federal pay has lagged the furthest behind the private sector. The average civil service raise will be 2.2 percent under the order.

Members of the armed forces will also see their base pay rise next year by an average 2.2 percent, though some military personnel will receive higher increases because they are in hard-to-fill positions or have special skills.

Salaries for House members and senators will climb to $168,000, up from $165,200. Congress has put the raise on hold, however, because Democrats first want to approve an increase in the minimum wage, which they believe will prove popular with voters.

Cabinet secretaries will make $186,600 in 2007, up from $183,500 this year. The vice president's salary will be $215,700, rising from $212,100. (The president's salary has been fixed at $400,000 since 2001.)

The new pay tables show that a captain in the armed forces with four years of service will earn $52,704 in base pay next year and that a typical Foreign Service officer with five years of service will earn $62,935 in base pay.

Federal employees in the Washington area average 16 years of service and earn an average of $89,128, federal data show.

In most years, Congress has approved a federal employee raise by this time of the year and the presidential order merely ratifies that decision.

But Congress has not acted on a civil service raise for next year, in part because the Senate could not clear most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills. The government, except for the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, is operating on an interim funding measure, known as a continuing resolution, that expires Feb. 15. The Defense and DHS bills were passed and signed into law by Bush.

With no congressional action on the federal raise, Bush signaled last month that he would issue his order and trigger the publication of new salary tables. Most of the raises will take effect Jan. 7, officials said.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who will be the House majority leader next year, called the Bush announcement "disappointing" but not a surprise. If Congress had completed work on the transportation-Treasury spending bill, he said, federal employees would be receiving an average raise of 2.7 percent, slightly higher than what Bush has ordered.

"This illustrates once again that when the legislative branch fails to use the power of the purse strings as the Constitution provides, the executive branch fills the vacuum," Hoyer said.

The leader of a union that represents employees in 30 federal agencies suggested that Bush acted like a Grinch. "The reality is that about half the members of the federal workforce will receive a meager pay raise of only 1.8 percent in 2007 -- the lowest amount in 18 years," said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

Federal pay is allocated according to geographic areas, and employees outside 31 specially designated metropolitan areas will receive the 1.8 percent raise. The highest-percentage raise goes to federal employees in the New York City area, 3.02 percent.

The NTEU and the American Federation of Government Employees said they will lobby Congress to increase the civil service and military pay raises when lawmakers return next month.

Congress also has not acted on judicial pay for 2007, and Bush's order keeps the judiciary at its 2006 rates. If Congress does not approve a pay measure for judges, the chief justice of the United States will continue at $212,100, with associate Supreme Court justices at $203,000 and federal district court judges at $165,200 annually.Santa's Fly Zone

Bush Signs Bill To Preserve WWII Camps (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush signed into law a $38 million grant program to preserve notorious internment camps where Japanese-Americans were kept behind barbed wire during World War II.

The money will be administered by the National Park Service to restore and pay for research at 10 camps. The law is intended to help preserve the camps as reminders of how the United States turned on some of its citizens in a time of fear.

DOJ_NMG_0108488

The camps housed more than 120,000 Japanese-Americans — U.S. citizens and residents — under an executive order signed by President Roosevelt in 1942, when America was reeling from the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on Dec. 7, 1941.

At the time there were fears that Japanese-Americans were loyal to Japan. Roosevelt's order prohibited them from living on the West Coast, in a position possibly to help an invasion force.

Thousands of families in California and parts of Washington state, Oregon and Arizona were pushed from their homes and into camps surrounded by armed guards. The sites named in the legislation are in California, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and Idaho.

The last of the camps closed in 1946.

President Reagan signed a presidential apology to Japanese-Americans in 1988.

Co-sponsors of the bill included the two current members of Congress who spent time in the camps as children: Democratic Reps. Mike Honda and Doris Matsui of California. Matsui was born in the Poston camp in Arizona.

The National Park Service already operates facilities at two of the 10 camps: the Manzanar National Historic Site in California and the Minidoka Internment National Monument in Idaho.

The law will give grants to nonfederal organizations for historical, research and restoration work at the sites named in the legislation, as well others selected by the head of the Interior Department, which includes the National Park Service.

Petition Readied For 2 Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

A Republican congressman yesterday announced the pending delivery to President Bush of a petition signed by 160,000 Americans calling for the commutation of prison sentences for two U.S. Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect in the buttocks.

During a press conference on the front steps of the Orange County Courthouse in Santa Ana, Calif., Rep. Dana Rohrabacher asked Mr. Bush to "have some Christian charity and pardon" Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are scheduled to begin serving 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, next month.

Mr. Rohrabacher called on Mr. Bush to "do the right thing and not allow the lives and families of these fine men to be destroyed."

Joined during the press conference by Compean and his family, Mr. Rohrabacher described the petition as part of a continuing effort to "turn up the pressure on President Bush to pardon" the agents.

The congressman recently sent a letter to the president demanding his intervention in the case and was joined last month at a Washington press conference by Republican Reps. Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Ted Poe of Texas and Marsha Blackburn of Tennessee to announce that more than 50 members of Congress had signed on to a pardon request letter to Mr. Bush.

Compean, 28, and Ramos, 37, were sentenced Oct. 19 by U.S. District Court Judge Kathleen Cardone in El Paso, Texas, to prison for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A federal jury had convicted the two men in March after a two-week trial, and Judge Cardone ordered them to report to prison Jan. 17.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a possible drug case after an investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General.

The immunity deal protected Mr. Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country as a drug smuggler. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned in Texas near the U.S.-Mexico border.

DOJ_NMG_0108489

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

"The U.S. attorney wrongly focused on the minor mistakes of the officers instead of on the illegal drug trafficker," said Mr. Rohrabacher, referring to the fact that the agents did not report the shooting in writing and picked up their shell casings.

The government's case began after an investigator from the Office of Inspector General located Mr. Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after Mr. Aldrete-Davila's mother told a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot. That agent notified the Department of Homeland Security.

A Crackdown's Contradictions (WP)

By Marcela Sanchez

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Much has been said about the use of identity theft laws in last week's six-state round up of illegal immigrants working at Swift & Co. meat processing plants. Some observers said it was the long-awaited application of the full weight of U.S. statutes to curb what has become an old practice among immigrants. For others it was a sinister and untimely crackdown on an immigration violation normally considered a misdemeanor.

But I say it is a big disappointment all around. People whose intention was to get work used stolen information, such as Social Security numbers. U.S. officials intending to do their jobs used a law meant for a far more serious crime as justification for the crackdown. Both sides are guilty of weakening the rule of law -- a taste of home we Latino immigrants could really do without.

Unpredictability, inefficiency, corruption, abuse and impunity -- all are attributes of lawlessness that plague the nations most immigrants leave behind. In Latin America, weak rule of law discourages investment, generates instability and disrupts economic activity, keeping the region firmly stuck in the "developing" world.

The social toll is also dramatic. A judicial system that seems arbitrary erodes people's confidence. A general distrust of laws and lawmakers feeds a quaint irreverence that results in justice being denied.

Most people do their best to get by in a flawed system. Others flout it. And yet others leave it all behind and head north.

That's when a culture that believes in laws and one that distrusts them suddenly collide. If you live in a U.S. community with an increasing influx of immigrants, you may have seen that clash play out not far from your doorstep.

You may have already come across the immigrant contractor remodeling a house across the street without all the required permits, or Latinos going to jobs in the back of a pickup. Maybe you've also heard about those who use someone else's Social Security number to gain employment.

Back in the immigrants' home countries, these actions would carry little consequence. But here, sooner or later, the contractor will find an official notice halting all construction until the paperwork is in place. The pickup driver will be stopped and fined. And as it occurred last week, workers detained in Colorado, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Texas and Utah will be charged with identity theft -- a felony that could land them in prison.

"They are not aware that they are stealing somebody's identity," said Guatemala's consul in Texas, Jose Barillas, who has been talking to many of those detained, their families and their co-workers. "All they did was to borrow a Social Security number to be able to work."

Their problem is that under U.S. law, ignorance does not excuse a violation, nor there is such thing as "borrowing" somebody else's identity.

Last week, only 65 of the 1,282 rounded up faced criminal charges, including identify theft. By early this week that number had more than doubled to 144, and U.S. officials insist that as the investigation continues, more workers could be charged.

"These were not victimless crimes," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, adding that hundreds of U.S. citizens and legal residents have suffered the consequences of this practice.

Without excusing those who committed fraud to get jobs, it is important to make clear that the United States -- its government, its businesses and even its laws -- invites this type of behavior. Writing in The Washington Post, Tamar Jacoby, an immigration expert at the Manhattan Institute, has noted that "every year the economy as a whole creates some 500,000 more unskilled jobs than Americans want to do, yet we issue only 5,000 year-round visas for the immigrants who might fill them."

If levels of population growth continue as they are today, 40 percent of the next 100 million people in this country will come from abroad. Just as today, they will be coming to do jobs that the U.S. native work force is not doing but that will need to be filled if the U.S. economy is to grow at its current pace.

Whether many of those jobs will continue to be filled by immigrants working here illegally will depend on what Congress does in the coming year. A proper reform could reward more immigrants who play by the rules.

Or, by inaction, Congress will continue to maintain a system that enjoys and profits from immigrant labor, yet seeks to punish immigrants when they dare fill those vacancies.

That is the kind of arbitrariness immigrants know too well, but it is also the kind unworthy of a nation of laws.

A Diplomat's Plum Post, Plucked Away (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

The career diplomats at the State Department are celebrating a decision this week by the department's director general to overturn the assignment of an aide to Undersecretary Karen Hughes to a top job running the new Public Diplomacy Rapid Response office in Brussels.

The American Foreign Service Association two months ago protested the selection of mid-level civil servant Diane Zeleny for the job, calling it a "pre-cooked deal" done by manipulating the process and violating personnel rules. AFSA filed a grievance asking foreign service director general George Staples to "undo this assignment."

Staples did, though he gave Zeleny until next summer to leave Brussels. Staples, in a joint announcement with AFSA chief J. Anthony Holmes, said "we understand that she is doing an excellent job and is to be commended" for her work. But foreign service officers may now begin applying for the job, they said.

Foggy Bottom folks said the opening was never properly advertised so senior officials looking for new postings would know about it. And then it was announced at the last minute, so there was no way top officers, who had already gotten new assignments, could apply for it.

The Zeleny appointment came at a time when career diplomats were seething over jumps by several other lower-level officers with political connections into top jobs that the career folks thought should have gone to more senior officers.

It probably didn't help matters, in this case, that Zeleny, a talented civil servant -- but not a foreign service officer -- who has some experience overseas, is married to prominent neocon Reuel Marc Gerecht, an Iraq war promoter and occasional Bush adviser.

In addition to Zeleny's removal, the joint cable by Holmes and Staples announced, the "procedures" that led to her getting the assignment in the first place were "not clear," and it outlined steps being taken to "ensure that any future assignments of this nature will be guided by negotiated, established procedures that are fair and transparent."

Some career folks said they were surprised to see that Staples, also a career diplomat, moved with such dispatch to overturn a move made by the political powers.The Best Bettors

And now, the winners in the In the Loop Congressional Election Contest. In order to winnow down the hundreds of entrants, Loop advisers -- okay, a few reporters sitting nearby -- said true prognosticators were those who correctly predicted the Democrats' Senate takeover at 51 to 49. So that was the initial screen.

Then, of that group, the winners were those who most closely predicted the House ratio of 233 Democrats to 202 Republicans.

The Grand Winner, the only entrant who got them both exactly right, was Roger Peterson, who is in public relations in Vancouver, Wash.

Ari Schoenholtz of Bethesda, recently an intern at WAMU radio and now looking for work in public radio, was one off, guessing the Democrats would pick up 234 seats in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0108491

Retired federal employee Dick Harlow of Prescott, Ariz., was one off the other way, guessing 232 Democratic House members.

Lobbyist David Bushnell of Silver Spring was two off on the House vote, as was Fred Huebscher of the Los Angeles area. Peter Lorenzo, a retired political science professor from Roseville, Calif., was three off in the House, as was Montgomery County teacher John M. Mosier.

Ed Black, president and chief executive of the Computer & Communications Industry Association here, was four off, as was George Mason University political science professor Jeremy D. Mayer of Arlington and Alice Johnson Cain of Takoma Park, who works for the incoming House Education Committee chairman, Rep. George Miller.

Three other entrants missed the Senate vote but were exactly right on the House vote: Arlington consultant Stan Karson; Cockeysville, Md., jewelry maker Dori Grasso; and Adam Shah, deputy editorial editor at Media Matters for America.

Congratulations to the winners, and thanks to all for entering.No Longer to Labor at Labor

Moving on . . . Steven J. Law, formerly executive director of the Republican Senatorial Committee under Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and more recently deputy secretary of labor, is moving to the private sector in a few weeks. He'll probably be continuing his work on labor issues involved in trade and immigration matters.Not the Best Bet

Another bitter loss for Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Bad enough that his pals were trounced in this week's local elections in Teheran. Sportsbook.com, the online bookie, reported that almost 33 percent of the betting on Time's Person of the Year was for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Only 21 percent went for Ahmadinejad.

Study Suggests Incentives On Oil Barely Help U.S. (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The United States offers some of the most lucrative incentives in the world to companies that drill for oil in publicly owned coastal waters, but a newly released study suggests that the government is getting very little for its money.

The study, which the Interior Department refused to release for more than a year, estimates that current inducements could allow drilling companies in the Gulf of Mexico to escape tens of billions of dollars in royalties that they would otherwise pay the government for oil and gas produced in areas that belong to American taxpayers.

But the study predicts that the inducements would cause only a tiny increase in production even if they were offered without some of the limitations now in place.

It also suggests that the cost of that additional oil could be as much as $80 a barrel, far more than the government would have to pay if it simply bought the oil on its own.

“They are giving up a lot of money and not getting much in return,” said Robert A. Speir, a former analyst at the Energy Department who worked on the report. “If they took that money, they could buy a whole lot more oil with it on the open market.”

Oil closed Thursday at $62.66 a barrel in regular trading.

The Interior Department study, commissioned to analyze the costs of royalty incentives and their effectiveness at increasing energy supplies, was completed in fall 2005. But the study was not released until last month because senior officials said they considered it incomplete.

After repeated requests, the department provided a copy to The New York Times with a “note to readers” that said the report did not show the “actual effects” of incentives. Indeed, Interior officials contended that the cost of the incentives would turn out to be far less than the study concluded.

They also said that the nation benefits from even small amounts of additional domestic fossil fuels.

But industry analysts who compare oil policies around the world said the United States was much more generous to oil companies than most other countries, demanding a smaller share of revenues than others that let private companies drill on public lands and in public waters. In addition, they said, the United States has sweetened some of its incentives in recent years, while dozens of other countries demanded a bigger share of revenue.

DOJ_NMG_0108492

In the United States, the federal government's take — royalties as well as corporate taxes — is about 40 percent of revenue from oil and gas produced on federal property, according to Van Meurs Associates, an industry consulting firm that compares the taxes of all oil-producing countries.

By contrast, according to Van Meurs, the worldwide average "government take" is about 60 to 65 percent. And that figure, of course, excludes countries that do not allow any private ownership in oil production.

Democratic leaders in Congress have already vowed to roll back royalty incentives and tax breaks for drilling companies when they take control of the House and Senate in January.

"Royalty relief is the gift that keeps on giving," said Representative Nick J. Rahall, Democrat of West Virginia, who will become chairman of the House Resources Committee. "It seems painfully obvious that when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil, the American people are footing the bill."

Supporters of drilling incentives say they make sense for a country that wants to reduce its dependence on foreign oil and whose biggest untapped reserves are in water thousands of feet deep where the cost of drilling a dry hole can hit $100 million.

"The amount of exploration investment that a company has to endure to find and develop reserves in the U.S. is far more than in a place like Angola," said Michael Rodgers, a senior economist at PFC Energy, a consulting firm that analyzes the tax regimes in oil-producing countries.

As oil and gas prices have surged in recent years, moreover, many countries have forced companies to give up a bigger share of revenues. Venezuela, Nigeria and Kazakhstan are among several dozen countries that have forced foreign oil companies to pay more money through either higher taxes or bigger equity stakes for the government.

"They've become emboldened by higher oil prices but they're also being emboldened by muted response from investors," said Michelle Billig, director of political risk analysis at the PIRA Energy Group in New York. "Companies don't have the luxury of contesting and taking a hard line."

Starting this year, Britain imposed the second of two new supplemental taxes on petroleum revenue from the North Sea, pushing the government's share to 50 percent. Norway keeps at least 70 percent of revenues, but the government share increases automatically as oil prices rise and tops out at 78 percent.

Norway is on the growing list of countries that have adopted "progressive" systems that automatically increase the tax rate on oil and gas production as energy prices climb. Several Canadian provinces have adopted similar policies, and Alaska approved a tax system in August that automatically inches up as oil prices climb above $55 a barrel.

"The United States is not extracting sufficient benefit from oil and gas production," said Pedro Van Meurs, president of Van Meurs Associates.

"The U.S. system worked fine when oil was $20 a barrel, but it wasn't changed when prices went up," added Mr. Van Meurs, who advised Alaska legislators on their tax system. When oil prices soar, he said, political leaders almost inevitably view the immutable bargain as too generous to industry.

In principle, the federal government has its own form of a progressive system. It offers royalty relief to companies that drill in very deep waters, but companies are supposed to pay the full rate — 12 to 16 percent — if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel.

In practice, it does not always work out that way. Companies that signed leases in 1998 and 1999 enjoy an unintended loophole that entitles them to royalty-free oil and gas regardless of how high prices climb.

Last week, the Bush administration persuaded five companies to give up the loophole. But about 50 other companies have thus far refused to follow suit.

The Bush administration scaled back the incentive for newer leases, but in 2004, the administration offered lucrative new royalty incentives for companies that drill extremely deep natural gas wells in shallow water. Congress, meanwhile, added several billion dollars worth of new tax breaks in 2004 and 2005 for exploration and drilling.

James A. Watt, chief executive of Remington Oil in Dallas before it was acquired by Helix Energy Solutions in July, said the federal incentives help reduce the risks and high cost of exploring in more difficult areas of the Gulf of Mexico.

"Tax issues are extraordinarily important," Mr. Watt said, in an interview this year. "Having said that, my view is that we just drilled a $50 million dry hole. That swamps the tax benefits we're getting."

DOJ_NMG_0108493

The big issue for both lawmakers and the Interior Department is whether royalty relief has much of an impact.

The new study, prepared under contract to the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department by Innovation and Information Consultants of Concord, Mass., is one of the few attempts to assess the impact through a rigorous econometric analysis.

The report estimates that the current incentives would have a tiny impact that is far exceeded by swings in market prices.

The report predicted that the current incentives would lead to the discovery of only 1.1 percent more reserves than if there had been no incentives at all. Total oil production from 2003 to 2042 would be about 300 million barrels more, or less than 1 percent, than it would have been anyway. Natural gas production would be 0.6 percent greater than it would have been otherwise.

But the cost of those royalty incentives would be high: about $48 billion less in royalty payments over the 40-year period. That loss would be offset by a slight increase in the prices that companies pay when bidding for leases in government auctions, but analysts said the net cost would still be above $40 billion.

The Interior Department, in a written response to questions, said the actual cost of its incentives would be much lower than $40 billion because most leases in the Gulf of Mexico include an escape clause that requires companies to pay full royalties if prices are above $34 a barrel.

But officials conceded that oil companies are still poised to escape billions of dollars in royalties in the next five years alone.

Dozens of companies signed leases in the late 1990's under a Clinton administration program that offered highly generous incentives and, apparently because of a bureaucratic error, omitted the escape clause. The government has estimated that it would have received as much as $10 billion more over the next five years if the mistake had not been made. It is trying to renegotiate the terms.

But as much as half of that money is out of reach. The Bush administration also endorsed a new royalty holiday for "deep gas" drilling in shallow waters even if natural gas prices climb above today's levels. According to internal budget estimates last year, the deep gas incentives account for half of the $10 billion that the government stands to lose.

To be sure, the newly released study found that the extra incentives prompted companies to pay more money upfront when bidding on offshore drilling leases and predicted that they would lead to a small increase in exploration and production.

The actual impact of the incentives depends on what happens to oil prices. But under any of the projections, the cost ended up exceeding the market price for oil.

Analysts said the meager impact of royalty incentives was not surprising: for oil and gas companies deciding whether to drill in deep water, the potential money involved in royalty incentives is small compared with the money at stake in changes of market prices.

Eliminating royalties on oil or gas will save a company 12 to 16 percent on some of its production. But those savings are minuscule compared with the nearly fourfold increase in oil prices from $15 a barrel in 1999 to more than $70 this summer.

At today's prices, even the risk of a $100 million dry hole is not so daunting.

Lawmaker Stands Firm On Quran Criticism (AP)

By Sue Lindsey

AP, December 22, 2006

A congressman said Thursday that he will not retract a letter warning that unless immigration is tightened, "many more Muslims will be elected" and use the Quran to take the oath of office.

Republican Rep. Virgil Goode triggered angry responses from a civil rights group and some colleagues with a letter this month to constituents concerned about a decision by Rep.-elect Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, to use the Quran when he is sworn in.

"I will not be putting my hand on the Quran," Goode said at a news conference Thursday at the Franklin County Courthouse.

DOJ_NMG_0108494

Goode, who represents Virginia's 5th Congressional District, said he is receiving more positive comments from constituents than negative.

"One lady told me she thinks I'm doing the right thing on this," he told Fox News. "I wish more people would take a stand and stand up for the principles on which this country was founded."

Goode also told Fox News he wants to limit legal immigration and do away with "diversity visas," which he said let in people "not from European countries" and "some terrorist states."

In his letter, Goode wrote that strict immigration polices are necessary "to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America."

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," he wrote.

Ellison said Thursday that Goode and others had nothing to fear about Muslims.

"They are our nurses, doctors, husbands, wives, kids, who just want to live and prosper in the American way," Ellison, a Democrat from Minneapolis, said Thursday on CNN when asked what he would say to Goode if they met. "All of us are steadfastly opposed to the same people he's opposed to, which is terrorists, and so there's nothing for him to be afraid of."

Asked whether he thought Goode was a bigot, Ellison said, "I don't know the fellow, and I'd rather just say that he has a lot to learn about Islam. ... I don't want to start any name-calling."

Virginia's senior senator, Republican John Warner, said in a statement Thursday that he respects the right of congressional members to freely "exercise the religion of their choice, including those of the Islamic faith utilizing the Quran."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat who is Jewish, said Thursday that he hoped Goode would meet with Ellison, saying he would "see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations had asked Goode to apologize, saying the remarks sent "a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office."

Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

His decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in next month prompted criticism from conservative talk radio host Dennis Prager. The American-Islamic relations council has called for Prager's removal from the board of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Lawmaker Goode Urged To Reconsider (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

An Illinois Democrat yesterday called on Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. to meet with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, whom the Virginia Republican criticized for his intention to take the oath of office using the Koran rather than the Bible.

"If he meets with Keith, he'll see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents," Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who is Jewish, said of Mr. Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, who is the first Muslim elected to Congress.

Earlier this month, Mr. Goode sparked a controversy when he told constituents that if Americans "don't wake up" and strengthen the country's immigration laws, more Muslims will be elected to Congress and will demand to use the Koran when they take the oath of office.

"I will not be putting my hand on the Koran," Mr. Goode said at a press conference yesterday at the Franklin County Courthouse.

Mr. Goode made the comments in a letter he wrote responding to an onslaught of e-mail complaints he received from constituents who were angered by Mr. Ellison's decision to use the Koran during the swearing-in ceremony.

"The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of the district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," he said in the letter. "We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country."

Mr. Goode said he is receiving more positive than negative comments from constituents.

"One lady told me she thinks I'm doing the right thing on this," he said in a Fox News interview yesterday. "I wish more people would take a stand and stand up for the principles on which this country was founded."

Mr. Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

In the letter, Mr. Goode also wrote, "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Franklin County Sheriff Quint Overton said he had extra officers at the courthouse yesterday because Mr. Goode had received several threatening phone calls.

Asked whether he had received any death threats, Mr. Goode responded, "No comment."

Mr. Ellison offered his comments in a statement released yesterday.

"Let's remember that diversity is a great strength of America. People of all faiths, all cultures, all colors coming together in support of one great nation is a beautiful thing," Mr. Ellison said. "On January 4th, no matter the faith, gender, or culture of the congressperson, all of us will swear to uphold one Constitution the Constitution of the United States."

When asked whether he does not support Muslims in Congress, Mr. Goode told The Washington Times, "That's not said in the letter."

Mr. Goode has stood by his letter, and has not given into the request of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), a civil rights group, that he apologize.

"Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," said Corey Saylor, national legislative director for CAIR. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

House members are sworn in en masse in the chamber, and no Bible or other religious document is used for the oath. However, several incoming House members use Bibles for their individual swearing-in, which is administered by the House Speaker and takes place after the official group oath.

In addition, the U.S. Constitution states that " no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States."

Mr. Ellison has also been criticized by some Christian organizations and conservative radio host Dennis Prager, who say that even if the law allows him to take an oath on the Koran, he should adhere to what they call the historical tradition of taking the oath of office on the Bible.

Mr. Goode's remarks come on the heels of Sen. George Allen's infamous "macaca" remark, which showed the impact a verbal gaffe can have on someone's political future. Mr. Allen, Virginia Republican, lost his re-election bid to Democrat James H. Webb Jr.

A Bigot In Congress (WP)

BIGOTRY COMES in various guises -- some coded, some closeted, some colossally stupid. The bigotry displayed recently by Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Republican who represents a patch of south-central Virginia, falls squarely in the third category. Mr. Goode, evidently in a state of xenophobic delirium, went on a semi-public tirade against the looming peril and corrupting threat posed by Muslim immigration to the United States. "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America," he wrote in a letter to constituents.

The inspiration for Mr. Goode's rant is Keith Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat who last month became the first Muslim elected to Congress. Mr. Ellison, who was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, has decided to use the Koran during a ceremonial swearing-in, as is his constitutional right. This does not sit well with Mr. Goode, who, obnoxiously referring to his congressional colleague-to-be as "the Muslim Representative from Minnesota," warned ominously that current immigration policy would lead to an outbreak of elected Muslims in this country and unfettered use of the Koran.

Forget that Muslims represent a small fraction of immigrants to America. And leave aside the obvious point that Mr. Goode was evidently napping in class the day they taught the traditional American values of tolerance, diversity and religious freedom. This country's history is rife with instances of uncivil, hateful and violent behavior toward newcomers, be they Jewish, Irish, Italian or plenty of others whose ethnicities did not jibe with some pinched view of what it means to be American. Mr. Goode's dimwitted outburst of nativism is nothing new.

No, the real worry for the nation is that the rest of the world might take Mr. Goode seriously, interpreting his biased remarks about Muslims as proof that America really has embarked on a civilizational war against Islam. With 535 members, you'd think that Congress would welcome the presence of a single Muslim representative. Whether it can afford a lawmaker of Mr. Goode's caliber is another question.

Signs Aim To Quash Fear Of Muslims (WT/AP)

By Kristen Gelineau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

RICHMOND -- The small beige signs bearing black Arabic script have been appearing all over town on buses and at colleges.

"Are they secret messages from terrorists?" one panicked bus rider asked. Should the FBI be contacted? What do they mean?

Actual translation: "Paper or plastic?"

The signs are part of a campaign by A More Perfect Union, a program of the Virginia Interfaith Center for Public Policy, and are aimed at dispelling some of the public's fears about the Muslim community.

Organizers hope to expand the program statewide.

"As people see Arabic, they immediately make an association with terrorism," said the Rev. C. Douglas Smith, executive director of the interfaith center. "That's probably because since 9/11, not only is fear overwhelming us, but that's how we're being trained to think."

The signs were placed in all 170 Greater Richmond Transit Co. buses in Richmond on Nov. 27 and will remain there through December, though many buses will continue to display them at least through January.

The signs, designed by the Martin Agency, also have been posted at the University of Richmond and Virginia Commonwealth University.

Along with the "paper or plastic" sign, others translate to "I'm a little teapot" and "Rock, paper, scissors."

The English translations are printed in small text on the bottom of the posters, next to comments such as "Misunderstanding can make anything scary," and "What did you think it said?"

The transit company has fielded several calls from concerned riders, said Gretchen Schoel, executive director of A More Perfect Union.

One woman Miss Schoel described as a well-educated university employee placed a frantic call to the bus company's manager, suggesting that the FBI be called in to investigate.

Even after the signs' English translations were explained to her, she remained concerned that they might contain secret messages, Miss Schoel said.

"It's so great that we're getting feedback, even if it is negative, because it shows that people are looking, they're thinking," Miss Schoel said. "And it really proves the point that this script right here conjures up certain ideas in our heads that we have to work with."

Bias toward the Muslim community is a continuing problem across the country and in Virginia, said Imad Damaj, president of the Virginia Muslim Coalition for Public Affairs.

"There's so many lazy, unexamined assumptions about all of us and how we react to people," Mr. Damaj said. "We need to challenge ourselves."

DOJ_NMG_0108497

Miss Schoel said history has proved that Americans can learn to let go of irrational fears toward other cultures.

"After World War II, when people saw Japanese script, it was scary," she said. "But now we see it and it's fun, it's hip, it signifies a cool culture. That's a huge turnaround."

Holocaust Museum Rebukes Member For Koran Comment (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The board that oversees the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum here publicly distanced itself on Thursday from a member who recently condemned the first Muslim elected to Congress for planning to use a Koran during the private part of his swearing-in ceremony.

In November, the board member, Dennis Prager, a conservative commentator and radio show host, said that Keith Ellison, the newly elected Muslim member of Congress, should give up his post if he could not take his oath on a Bible, which Mr. Prager said was the traditional religious text of the United States.

In its resolution, the council's executive committee criticized Mr. Prager's remarks as "antithetical to the mission of the museum as an institution promoting tolerance and respect for all peoples regardless of their race, religion or ethnicity."

Mr. Prager, one of 68 members of the board, known as the Holocaust Memorial Council, was appointed to the unpaid post by President Bush, and is serving a five-year term, which expires in 2011, said Andrew Hollinger, a spokesman for the council.

Mr. Hollinger said Mr. Bush had the sole power to remove Mr. Prager.

On Wednesday, Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., Republican of Virginia, was sharply criticized by Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans for warning that Mr. Ellison's election to the House posed a serious threat to the traditional values.

Critics of Mr. Goode and Mr. Prager noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts. The use of such texts occurs only in private ceremonies that take place after lawmakers have officially sworn to uphold the Constitution.

Mr. Goode stood by his comments on Thursday and told Fox News that he wanted to restrict legal immigration to the United States "so that we don't have a majority of Muslims elected to the United States House of Representatives." (Mr. Ellison, a lawyer who converted to Islam as a college student, is an African-American, not an immigrant.)

Mr. Prager said Muslim American groups and others had pressured the museum board. "Everybody knows there's no bigotry in what I said, but they felt they had to do it," he said in an interview.

"I completely respect Congressman-Elect Ellison's right to take an oath on the Koran, and regret any language that suggested otherwise," Mr. Prager added in a statement, emphasizing that he began reaching out to the Muslims 20 years ago. "My entire effort in the Keith Ellison matter has been to draw attention to the need to acknowledge the Bible as the basis of America's moral values. Judeo-Christian values are the greatest single protection against another Holocaust."

In response to questions about Mr. Bush's reaction to Mr. Prager's remarks, Nicole M. Guillemard, a spokeswoman for the White House, said by e-mail that President Bush "respects religious freedom and the right to free speech."

Ms. Guillemard did not respond to questions about whether Mr. Bush believed that Mr. Prager should resign or be removed.

Davis Won't Give Up Probe Into Berger-Archives Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

The outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee says questions remain about former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's removal of classified documents from the National Archives and pledged yesterday to get the answers.

"I don't care if it's Sandy Berger or Warren Burger or Veggie Burger who walked off with these documents," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican. "It's the lax controls that permitted such a theft; it's the way it was handled internally at the Archives and then by [the Justice Department] that is of grave concern."

DOJ_NMG_0108498

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort by top House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been "destroyed, removed or were missing."

Democrats assume control of Congress next month, and the request is expected to be shelved. But Mr. Davis said his staff continues to look into the matter, and a final investigative report is expected next month.

Mr. Davis noted that during three visits by Mr. Berger to the Archives, he was given access to three categories of documents: National Security Council (NSC) numbered documents, printed copies of e-mail messages and attachments, and staff member office files (SMOFs).

He said the SMOFs contain the working papers of NSC staff members, including Mr. Berger, and their content is not inventoried by the Archives at the document level. He said that the SMOFs given to Mr. Berger during his first two visits contained only original documents and that there is "no way to determine" whether Mr. Berger "swiped any of these original documents."

As a result, Mr. Davis said, there is no way to know whether Mr. Berger gave the September 11 commission the documents he said he was seeking at the Archives in response to the panel's requests.

"At best, Berger's actions portray a disturbing breach of trust and protocol," Mr. Davis said. "At worst, however, Berger's actions suggest an intentional effort to keep critical information away from the 9/11 commission and the American public.

"Our work has not concluded, and we fully expect to continue our oversight efforts with respect to this matter," he said.

Mr. Berger, national security adviser under President Clinton from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material -- including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. He had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of jail.

Prosecutors had recommended a fine of $10,000, but U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson increased it to $50,000 at Berger's sentencing, saying the lower figure did not "reflect the seriousness of the offense."

The removal of the material occurred while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission investigating intelligence and security failures -- raising questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

On Wednesday, the National Archives Office of Inspector General said Mr. Berger hid the documents under a construction trailer where they could be retrieved easily. It said he left the building unescorted for a break and placed the papers "in an accessible construction area outside" the main Archives building.

The report said Mr. Berger put the documents "in his pockets, headed toward a construction area ... looked up and down the street ... did not see anyone" and then slid them under the trailer.

Mr. Berger's attorney, Lanny Breuer, said his client "considers this matter closed, and he is pleased to have moved on."

Describing the material removed as "code-word documents," meaning only a limited number of people had access to them, Mr. Davis said Mr. Berger's conduct in hiding the papers "exposed this country to more serious national security breaches than previously thought."

More Details About Archives Case (WP)

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger has admitted taking five slightly different copies of a highly classified document from the National Archives in 2003 by stuffing them into his suit and sneaking them past guards. He was eventually detected, confronted and ordered by a federal judge to pay a $50,000 fine for his illegal actions.

A newly released report by the National Archives' Office of the Inspector General contains fresh details of the incident, which involved a classified Clinton administration study called the Millennium Alert After Action Review (MAAR).

The document was an assessment of the nation's handling of a series of terrorist threats in 1999 and its continuing vulnerabilities. It was distributed to only about 15 people and contained 29 recommendations for action and funding.

During four visits to the Archives in 2003, Berger worked at a small table in the office of a senior Archives official, instead of in the public reading room -- a practice the inspector general said was "unauthorized." The official, whose name was redacted from the report, violated standard protocol by leaving the office to give Berger privacy to speak on the telephone.

Berger gave an account of his actions in an interview at his office on July 8, 2005, described below in excerpts from the report. He sought at the outset to deflect any suggestion that he pressured the Archives official into relaxing the rules.

-- R. Jeffrey Smith

"Mr. Berger described his personality as intense. . . . He did not feel he was overbearing and did not seek to intimidate anyone while at the Archives."

Berger said he started taking the copies on Sept. 2, to help him prepare for his testimony before a commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Mr. Berger took the first opportunity when[redacted] was out of[redacted] office to remove the document. He most likely put it in his jacket pocket, after folding it, but he does not have a precise recollection of where he put the document. It is perceivable he put it in his pants pocket. . . .

Mr. Berger denied removing any documents in his socks. . . . He stated his shoes frequently come untied . . . and his socks frequently fell down. [At that point, Mr. Berger lifted his pant leg to reveal a sock falling down his ankle and pale skin.]"

On a subsequent visit, on Oct. 2, Berger was surprised to see other copies of the document in the files he was given, and he slid each one under his briefcase to hide them.

"In total, he removed four documents, all versions of the MAAR . . . . He did not put the documents on his person until he was alone. . . .[Name redacted] suggested he take a walk and come back and finish up. Mr. Berger left the building with all the documents he put in his pockets. . . .

It was dark. He did not want to run the risk of bringing the documents back in the building. . . . He headed towards a construction area on Ninth Street. Mr. Berger looked up and down the street, up into the windows of the Archives and the DOJ[Department of Justice] , and did not see anyone. He removed the documents from his pockets, folded the notes in a 'V' shape and . . . walked inside a construction fence and slid the documents under a trailer.

[After 7 p.m.,] Mr. Berger left the building, retrieved the documents and notes from the construction area, and returned to his office. . . . On Oct. 4, 2003[name redacted] called Mr. Berger . . .[and] said documents were missing after Mr. Berger's visit. . . . Mr. Berger lied to[redacted] telling[redacted] he did not take the documents. . . .

Mr. Berger drove to his office late that afternoon. On the night of Oct. 2, 2003, he had destroyed, cut into small pieces, three of the four documents. These were put in the trash. By Saturday, the trash had been picked up. He tried to find the trash collector but had no luck. . . .

About 7 p.m., Mr. Berger called[redacted] and said 'I think I solved the mystery.' . . . Mr. Berger told[redacted] , 'I found two documents but not the other two.' "

Archives officials -- who had grown so suspicious of Berger in September that they secretly numbered the documents he saw in October -- got angry when they retrieved the two copies at Berger's home on Oct. 6. and saw that one had indeed been taken in September.

The Archives moved cautiously at the outset. The report quotes a senior official as saying he "could not explain" why agency officials did not immediately call the FBI. They did call the White House, but the FBI and the Justice Department were not brought into the case until nine days after two of the five documents were retrieved.

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Bill Clinton's former National Security Adviser, Sandy Berger, has already recanted his initial claim that he removed documents from the National Archives "inadvertently" back in 2003 while preparing for testimony to the 9/11 Commission. He pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor in 2005 and paid a $50,000 fine. But now the report of the Archives' Inspector General has come to light, and it suggests Mr. Berger knew he was engaged in a bit of hugger-mugger when he secreted the after-action memos he was reviewing out of the building.

According to the report, obtained by the Associated Press through a Freedom of Information Act request, Mr. Berger removed the documents and hid some of them under a trailer in a construction site before returning to retrieve them later. This is not the behavior of a man with a clear conscience. And it's astonishing for a man who served in a senior White House position that made him familiar with the obligations of handling classified papers.

At the time of the plea, federal prosecutor Noel Hillman assured this newspaper that Mr. Berger was working off of copies of the memos printed from a hard drive, so there was no danger that handwritten notes in the margins of certain copies could have been destroyed. But one doesn't need to entertain conspiracy theories to be reminded through this tale of how the Clinton Administration had a penchant for abusing the public trust. The Berger story is of a piece with the Travel Office dust-up and the 900 confidential FBI files that the White House somehow managed to collect, some of them pertaining to prominent Republicans. That too was supposed to have been an accident.

To the extent that Mr. Berger's actions did not affect the completeness of the historical record on the Clinton Administration's approach to al Qaeda, we've argued that his plea agreement did justice to the nature of the crime. But the Inspector General's account of Mr. Berger's document-stashing serves as a useful reminder of the Clinton circle's ethos that all too many rules simply did not apply to them.

New Push For Drug Import Bill (CHIT)

By Crystal Yednak

Chicago Tribune, December 22, 2006

U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) said Democrats and Republicans in both chambers will push again for a bill that would allow prescription drugs to be imported to help reduce costs for U.S. consumers.

"People from around the world come to America for first-class medical care, but Americans travel around the world for affordable medications," Emanuel said during a Chicago news conference to announce plans to reintroduce the legislation.

The bill would allow consumers to import drugs directly from Canada, while wholesalers and pharmacies could import FDA-approved drugs from the European Union, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and Japan to offer for sale.

Emanuel said his office keeps comparing the cost of certain drugs at a Chicago Costco and at a Costco in Toronto. December cost comparisons show Lipitor running $242 in the U.S., compared with $156 in Toronto.

"You can clearly get a better price from around the world," Emanuel said.

In 2003, a similar bill passed in the House but failed to pass in the Senate. Emanuel said that with bipartisan sponsors in both chambers, he is hopeful for the support to pass the bill.

Republican Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) will co-sponsor the legislation in the House, while U.S. Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) will sponsor the bill in the Senate, Emanuel said.

Iraq May Crimp Democrats' Priorities (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Iraq is casting a shadow over the next U.S. budget, complicating efforts by President Bush and congressional Democrats to fund domestic programs as costs of the war rise.

The tax-and-spending plan for fiscal 2008, which starts Oct. 1, 2007, is expected to be released Feb. 5. The budget is likely to be the tightest of Mr. Bush's presidency, with little new discretionary spending expected for any area outside the departments of Defense and Homeland Security.

Moreover, the costs associated with the Iraq war and broader war on terrorism have exacerbated funding constraints caused, in large part, by rising mandatory costs for programs such as Medicare and Social Security.

The situation is posing a challenge for the White House, which must craft a budget that will cover rising expenses while preserving Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and not worsening the deficit.

At the same time, Congress' new Democratic majority is expected to face an even tougher task as its leaders look to implement their agenda, which may include increased spending in areas such as education, health care and homeland security. In the past, Democrats looked to defense as a place to cut spending, but given the deteriorating security situation in Iraq, such a move now is considered politically untenable.

The war "certainly makes it hard and makes it hard in two ways: Whatever you think should happen in Iraq, the fact is we have troops there and we have to fund them," said James Horney, senior fellow at the Center on Budget Policies and Priorities, a liberal think tank here.

Since the Iraq invasion in 2003, the U.S. commitment has totaled $379 billion, according to estimates by the Congressional Research Service. During fiscal year 2006, which ended Sept. 30, the war was costing an average of $8 billion a month. Money has come mainly through emergency spending bills passed by Congress. The White House doesn't separate funding for the Iraq war from its broader "global war on terror," so exact numbers are difficult to ascertain.

At the same time, funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments has increased and now equals roughly half the discretionary budget -- that is, annually appropriated spending on programs other than federal entitlement benefits and interest payments.

Of the $843 billion in discretionary spending for 2006, $411 billion went to Defense and $32 billion to Homeland Security. A separate $120 billion in emergency funds also was approved by Congress for the war on terror. Funding in the current budget for fiscal 2007 is expected to be even higher, with $70 billion in emergency funds already approved for war efforts and the Pentagon expected to seek as much as $100 billion more, plus about $435 billion in discretionary spending for the Pentagon's budget.

White House budget chief Rob Portman said in a meeting with reporters this week that rising federal revenue "has more than covered the cost of the war."

Aside from security costs, the government also faces skyrocketing mandatory expenses -- which aren't part of the discretionary budget. Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid now consume 39% of the overall $2.7 trillion federal budget, and those costs are projected to increase as the population ages and fewer people enter the labor market. Medicare costs alone are expected to grow 31% to $501 billion in 2011 from $382 billion in 2007.

With an ever-larger chunk of money devoted to security and mandatory programs -- and the government running a budget deficit -- budget watchers say something has to give, and it undoubtedly will be spending for domestic programs.

"It's getting very difficult to give large spending increases to programs that have already grown immensely while trying to fund the war and entitlements and keep the tax cuts," said Brian Riedl, a federal-budget expert with the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

But cutting costs isn't easy. Spending on nonsecurity discretionary programs has increased by about 23% since Mr. Bush took office. The White House -- prodded by conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill -- has tried to trim spending and asked Congress to cut some nonsecurity discretionary spending for 2006 and 2007. The White House says it has succeeded in slowing the growth of nonsecurity discretionary spending every year since Mr. Bush took office.

For 2008, the White House is expected to try to squeeze funding where it previously sought cuts, including areas like Housing and Urban Development, Education, Labor and the Environmental Protection Agency, all of which were targeted for reductions in 2007. Most of the 2007 budget never passed, however, as Congress adjourned before taking up spending bills other than Defense and Homeland Security. As a result, most agencies are expected to operate at 2006 funding levels, creating more pressure to increase spending in 2008.

While the White House hasn't yet disclosed its proposal for nonsecurity discretionary spending in 2008, it is almost certain to be lower than the 2007 request of $399 billion. At Mr. Portman's swearing-in ceremony earlier this year, Mr. Bush said the government must "control the federal appetite for spending" and said he would continue to "cut unnecessary spending."

Mr. Portman said since the 2007 spending bills were never implemented, the White House expects to reiterate those requests in the 2008 budget. "If we had proposed something be increased or reduced we would probably propose that again," Mr. Portman said.

Democrats, meanwhile, may have a tougher time given their agenda, which includes initiatives expected to cost money, including implementing the full recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and cutting interest rates on student loans. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, (D., Calif.), has called for pay-as-you-go budget rules, which require that any new entitlement spending or tax cuts be accompanied by offsetting revenue increases or spending cuts to avoid widening the deficit.

With a war going on and potentially more troops heading overseas, tapping the defense budget to fund initiatives "risks sending the wrong message to the voter," said Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution.

Instead, Democrats are likely to seek out money by rolling back some subsidies for oil companies and targeting earmark spending. Regardless, policy watchers say, it will be a challenge.

"Democrats are going to have to try to find a way to meet their needs while keeping an eye on the long-term budget problem and not making things worse," Mr. Horney said.

Democrats And The Deficit (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

Now that the Democrats have regained some power, they have to decide what to do. One of the biggest questions is whether the party should return to Rubinomics — the doctrine, associated with former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, that placed a very high priority on reducing the budget deficit.

The answer, I believe, is no. Mr. Rubin was one of the ablest Treasury secretaries in American history. But it's now clear that while Rubinomics made sense in terms of pure economics, it failed to take account of the ugly realities of contemporary American politics.

And the lesson of the last six years is that the Democrats shouldn't spend political capital trying to bring the deficit down. They should refrain from actions that make the deficit worse. But given a choice between cutting the deficit and spending more on good things like health care reform, they should choose the spending.

In a saner political environment, the economic logic behind Rubinomics would have been compelling. Basic fiscal principles tell us that the government should run budget deficits only when it faces unusually high expenses, mainly during wartime. In other periods it should try to run a surplus, paying down its debt.

Since the 1990s were an era of peace, prosperity and favorable demographics (the baby boomers were still in the work force, not collecting Social Security and Medicare), it should have been a good time to put the federal budget in the black. And under Mr. Rubin, the huge deficits of the Reagan-Bush years were transformed into an impressive surplus.

But the realities of American politics ensured that it was all for naught. The second President Bush quickly squandered the surplus on tax cuts that heavily favored the wealthy, then plunged the budget deep into deficit by cutting taxes on dividends and capital gains even as he took the country into a disastrous war. And you can even argue that Mr. Rubin's surplus was a bad thing, because it greased the rails for Mr. Bush's irresponsibility.

As Brad DeLong, a Berkeley economist who served in the Clinton administration, recently wrote on his influential blog: "Rubin and us spearcarriers moved heaven and earth to restore fiscal balance to the American government in order to raise the rate of economic growth. But what we turned out to have done, in the end, was to enable George W. Bush's right-wing class war: his push for greater after-tax income inequality."

My only quibble with Mr. DeLong's characterization is that this wasn't just one man's class war: the whole conservative movement shared Mr. Bush's squanderlust, his urge to run off with the money so carefully saved under Mr. Rubin's leadership.

With the benefit of hindsight, it's clear that conservatives who claimed to care about deficits when Democrats were in power never meant it. Let's not forget how Alan Greenspan, who posed as the high priest of fiscal rectitude as long as Bill Clinton was in the White House, became an apologist for tax cuts — even in the face of budget deficits — once a Republican took up residence.

Now the Democrats are back in control of Congress. They've pledged not to be as irresponsible as their predecessors: Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker, has promised to restore the "pay-as-you-go" rule that the Republicans tossed aside in the Bush years. This rule would basically prevent Congress from passing budgets that increase the deficit.

I'm for pay-as-you-go. The question, however, is whether to go further. Suppose the Democrats can free up some money by fixing the Medicare drug program, by ending the Iraq war and/or clamping down on war profiteering, or by rolling back some of the Bush tax cuts. Should they use the reclaimed revenue to reduce the deficit, or spend it on other things?

The answer, I now think, is to spend the money — while taking great care to ensure that it is spent well, not squandered — and let the deficit be. By spending money well, Democrats can both improve Americans' lives and, more broadly, offer a demonstration of the benefits of good government. Deficit reduction, on the other hand, might just end up playing into the hands of the next irresponsible president.

In the long run, something will have to be done about the deficit. But given the state of our politics, now is not the time.

Pelosi Aims To Recast Self, Party (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

On a scale associated with presidential inaugurations, Nancy Pelosi is planning four days of celebration surrounding her Jan. 4 swearing-in as the first female speaker of the House. She will return to the blue-collar Baltimore neighborhood where she grew up, attend Mass at the women's college where she studied political science, and dine at the Italian Embassy as Tony Bennett sings "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

But the hoopla is more than just a party.

Pelosi is grabbing the moment to present herself as the new face of the Democratic Party and to restore the party's image as one hospitable to ethnic minorities, families, religion, the working class and women.

"This is important strategic repositioning," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, who teaches political communication and rhetoric at the University of Pennsylvania. "Essentially, she's trying to embody the Democratic Party that she would like to offer the nation in 2008."

In her meticulous selection of events and venues during a week when she expects to attract media attention from as far away as Australia, Pelosi is clearly trying to bury the label "San Francisco liberal" that Republicans tried to affix to her during the midterm elections.

" 'San Francisco liberal' is a construct used very effectively for a long time by Republicans," Jamieson said. "It's a little like 'Taxachusetts.' It's telegraphic and very powerful. They haven't been able to get her identified with it because, to this point, a lot of people didn't know who she was. She's trying to position a counterimage before she gets well known."

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said the four-day celebration befits a historic moment in American politics. "We've never had a woman speaker before," Daly said. "This is a big deal."

Newt Gingrich (Ga.) took two days to celebrate his election as speaker when the Republicans formally took control of Congress in 1995. They were largely filled with speeches that outlined his "Contract With America" and fleshed out the ideology of the Republican revolution.

Pelosi's mission is entirely different. She is planning events that will highlight select parts of her personal life while muting her liberal voting record and ideology. "She's showing all the ways she shares other women's lives," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist. "It reminds me of the way Sandra Day O'Connor introduced herself when she was nominated to be the first woman on the Supreme Court -- she talked about growing up on a ranch, working as a secretary, all the dimensions of her life."

Ken Sunshine, a communications consultant for entertainers and Democratic politicians, said Pelosi is not creating a false persona.

"If she's going to Mass, right on," Sunshine said. "Going to Baltimore, right on. This is really where she's from. She wasn't born in an elite setting. Here's a wife, mother, grandmother, and in her spare time, she becomes speaker of the House. I don't know if this is a new brand, but it's true about her. Why should the Republicans have a lock on those qualities?"

Pelosi's public relations offensive follows some missteps that marred her first few weeks after the elections, including a stinging defeat when she backed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) over Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) for the job of House majority leader and a very public spat with Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), who was passed over for the chairmanship of the House intelligence committee.

The day after New Year's Day, Pelosi will visit Albermarle Street in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood, where she grew up as the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors. The current mayor, Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D), will rename

Albermarle "Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi." She will drop by St. Leo the Great Roman Catholic Church and then eat dinner with her extended family at an Italian restaurant.

On Jan. 3, Pelosi will attend morning Mass at Trinity University, her alma mater in Washington, and then attend a tea in the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium for about 400 female politicians, supporters and activists. In the evening, she will be honored at a dinner at the Italian Embassy, where Bennett will perform.

The next day, Pelosi will participate in a nondenominational service at St. Peter's Catholic Church on Capitol Hill and then eat brunch with hundreds of supporters at the Cannon House Office Building and the Library of Congress. At noon, the House will convene to elect Pelosi speaker. That night, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee will hold a fundraiser at the Building Museum, where 1,200 partygoers will pay $1,000 each to applaud Pelosi between performances by Jimmy Buffett, Carole King and Mickey Hart, among others.

Finally, on Jan. 5, Pelosi will hold what she is calling the "People's House" open house at the Cannon House Office Building. But it will be less welcoming than it sounds -- the event is by invitation only.

All the festivities, except the fundraiser at the Building Museum, are being funded by Pelosi's campaign chest.

Mike Murphy, a Republican political consultant and former adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), said the four-day extravaganza is excessive. "What? No fireworks?" he said. "I'm glad they canceled the tickertape parade. They probably couldn't find biodegradable tickertape and a hybrid convertible."

He said the schedule is "classic Pelosi."

"She's not known for a light touch," he said. "She has every right to throw a new-speaker celebration, but it's 500 percent from what is normal. It's an aggressive act to grab the spotlight. Sounds to me like there's nobody at the meetings saying, 'Maybe that's a little too much.' She's needs a deputy chief of staff from the 'It's Not About You' department."

"Instead of pinning medals on each other, maybe it's time for more seriousness and purpose," Murphy added. "Nobody voted for Nancy Pelosi as speaker; they voted for a change in Washington. For her to grab the spotlight seems like a cult of personality. I have a feeling that Steny Hoyer is probably having a quiet lunch with his family."

A spokeswoman for Hoyer said the Marylander, who will become majority leader on Jan. 4, will host a small reception in his office.

Big Donors Bankroll Inaugural Bashes (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The elections are over, but some of the nation's governors are still collecting from individuals and corporations to pay for their upcoming inaugurations. Some of the donations come in amounts that vastly exceed what state law allows in their campaigns.

Unlike campaign contributions, most states don't limit or require public disclosure of inaugural fundraising. Edwin Bender of the Institute on Money in State Politics said greater transparency is needed because governors are guaranteed "to wield a great deal of influence over public policy."

PARTY TIME: No expense spared

•In Massachusetts, Democratic Gov.-elect Deval Patrick is accepting contributions of up to $50,000, including from corporations, to fund his $1 million celebration. State law limits campaign contributions from individuals to $500 a year and bars corporate contributions.

•In Colorado, corporate donors that give at least $20,000 to Gov.-elect Bill Ritter's inaugural can attend a VIP reception and join the Democrat on a day-long train tour. In his campaign, Ritter could take no more than $1,000 in 2006 from corporations — and only through their political action committees.

•California's Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has received $640,000 in contributions from the likes of Chevron and the California Chamber of Commerce to sponsor his Jan. 5 inaugural. State law allows him to receive campaign donations of up to $44,600 from corporations, unions and individuals this year. Inaugural "gold sponsors" such as Chevron and the chamber are giving $50,000.

"Setting ridiculously high limits … is really setting no limits at all," said Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a political watchdog group.

Common Cause Massachusetts has criticized Patrick's inaugural fundraising. Corporations "can't have a role in campaigns, so they shouldn't have a role in inaugurals," said executive director Pamela Wilmot.

Patrick aide Stephen Crawford said the contributions make it possible for more people to participate. They are "designed to include as many people who don't have 'influence' in this celebration," he said.

At least one incoming governor has eschewed new inaugural fundraising. New York Democrat Eliot Spitzer, know for battling Wall Street as state attorney general, will tap $5.5 million left over from his campaign. "We didn't want to create any perception that someone was trying to curry favor with the new governor," spokeswoman Christine Anderson said.

Court Says Issue Ads OK During Elections (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 22, 2006

A federal court on Thursday loosened restrictions on corporations, unions and other special interest groups that run political advertising in peak election season.

The 2-1 ruling said groups may mention candidates by name in commercials as long as they are trying to influence public policy, rather than sway an election.

The ruling came in a challenge to the so-called McCain-Feingold law designed to reduce the influence of big money in political campaigns. The law banned groups from using unrestricted money to run advertisements that name candidates two months before a general election or one month before a primary.

Wisconsin Right to Life, an anti-abortion group, has been fighting the law since 2004, when it sought to run an advertisement urging voters to contact Wisconsin Sens. Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, both Democrats, and ask them not to hold up President Bush's judicial nominees.

Because Feingold was running for re-election in 2004, the ad was prohibited. Wisconsin Right to Life argued that it wasn't trying to influence an election and said the law restricted its constitutional right to petition the government.

Some lawmakers have predicted such a ruling would create a loophole in the 2002 law. Advocacy groups have used ads similar to those paid for by the Wisconsin group to advocate for and against candidates.

Supporters of the law quickly criticized the ruling. Rep. Martin Meehan, D-Mass., a co-sponsor of the campaign finance law, said he was disappointed and that the decision was written narrowly and should not be seen as a "carte blanche" to get around the law.

The case automatically heads to the Supreme Court for review. If the high court agrees with Thursday's decision, the justices may have to establish a test to differentiate genuine issue ads from phony ones.

James Bopp, an attorney for Wisconsin Right to Life, said the McCain-Feingold law is flawed because politicians assume people only want to influence elections and don't care about influencing public policy.

"To them, what's important is whether they're going to be in office two years from now," Bopp said. "But the people, what's important to them is the laws that are being enacted right now."

The Federal Election Commission had argued that it needed a consistent "bright line" rule to prevent organizations from influencing elections using phony issue advertisements, but the three-judge panel disagreed.

"The virtues of a bright-line rule surely cannot alone justify regulating constitutional speech," U.S. District Judge Richard Leon wrote.

Leon was joined in the opinion by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle. U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts dissented.

Federal Election Commissioner David M. Mason said the commission would review the opinion and hoped to have the matter resolved by the 2008 Iowa caucuses.

Issue Advocacy Ads May Run During An Election, Three-Judge Court Rules (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

DOJ_NMG_0108506

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

A divided three-judge court ruled yesterday that ads advocating for an issue and mentioning candidates can run during an election, creating a loophole in the law that sought to control the power of big money in elections.

In a 2 to 1 ruling, the court found that the government had no compelling justification to regulate television ads such as the ones Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. broadcast in July 2004, which advocated stopping congressional filibusters against President Bush's judicial nominees.

The ads ran when Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) was running for reelection and had opposed some of Bush's nominees. The ads made no mention of Feingold's record, instead urging Wisconsin residents to call their senators to express their dissatisfaction.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, joined by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle, agreed with Wisconsin Right to Life that ads such as theirs merely advocate a position without trying to criticize the record of a particular candidate.

The ads are not targeted "electioneering communications" and should not be burdened by the reporting requirements of the federal campaign finance law, Leon wrote.

The ruling was a key victory for Wisconsin Right to Life, which had sued the Federal Election Commission on the grounds that it had infringed on the group's constitutional right to free speech.

The loser was the FEC, which had argued that the Wisconsin Right to Life ads were election ads, and that the antiabortion group had to follow the finance limits and reporting rules called for under the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act. The 2002 amendments to federal campaign finance law are better known as the McCain-Feingold Act, named for Feingold and his Senate co-sponsor, John McCain (R-Ariz.).

In a lengthy dissent, Judge Robert W. Roberts wrote that the majority's approach was too simplistic in reviewing just the language of the ads, even though there is a significant factual dispute about their purpose. He argued that the ads' intent is critical to determining whether the FEC should be regulating them.

First, were the Wisconsin Right to Life ads truly meant to advocate for an issue, as the group's lawyer asserts, Roberts asked, or did the sponsors intend to influence the election and lead voters to cast votes against Feingold? Also, Roberts wrote, no one has definitively addressed the FEC's argument that the ads were sham ads, "designed and timed to set up a legal challenge" and create a loophole in the McCain-Feingold law.

Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor, said the ruling could "create a major loophole in which all groups have to do is say they are running advocacy-issue ads and they can avoid the statute."

FEC Commissioner David M. Mason said in an interview that the six-member commission has not decided whether to appeal the ruling to the Supreme Court, but he cautioned about predicting what campaign finance limits will govern in the 2008 presidential elections. A similar case involving a Maine group is still to be decided, and the Supreme Court could have a different view.

"It's very unlikely this ruling will affect what the law will be a year from now," Mason said.

Court Overturns Limits On Political Ads, Part Of The Campaign Finance Law (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — A three-judge panel on Thursday overturned a key segment of the campaign finance law that banned issue advertisements paid for by corporate or union money in the critical weeks before federal elections.

The case, which was heard by a special federal court panel in Washington, now heads to the Supreme Court. If upheld, the ruling would unravel one of the tougher restrictions on the use of unregulated donations that interest groups pumped by the millions of dollars into political commercials.

The case was brought by Wisconsin Right to Life, which has been fighting the restrictions since 2004, claiming they infringe on its First Amendment guarantee of free speech, among other grounds.

Using its corporate treasury, the group had paid for advertisements denouncing Senate filibusters of judicial nominees and urging viewers to contact either Senator Russell D. Feingold, who was up for re-election that year, or the state's other Democratic senator, Herb Kohl, who was not.

Under the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, groups wanting to broadcast advertisements that name federal candidates within 60 days before a general election, or 30 days before a primary, are required to follow strict rules on how they pay for them. The law requires that donors be disclosed and caps contributions to prevent secretive groups from advocating for or against candidates in thinly disguised advertisements known as issue ads.

This case has been closely watched for several reasons. For one, organizations with quite disparate interests, including the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Rifle Association, the Chamber of Commerce and the conservative Club for Growth, have argued that they have a right to petition the government.

As grassroots lobbying groups, they say, they should be exempt from the ban on issue ads. Some have contended, most recently in an unsuccessful case before the Federal Election Commission, that their First Amendment rights are infringed upon because the law restricts them from pursuing their policy agendas in election seasons.

The court's decision Thursday clearly loosened the clamps on such activities. Those who want to broadcast such ads are "going to push the envelope," said Edward B. Foley, an election law expert at Ohio State University. "They're going to explore the scope of this exemption."

The case has already been heard by the Supreme Court, which kicked it back to the three-judge panel in January. The justices said the panel had misinterpreted a 2003 decision, in which they upheld the McCain-Feingold law, as foreclosing future challenges to the advertising restrictions.

The special panel that ruled Thursday did not consider the right-to-life group's argument for an exemption as a grassroots lobbying organization. The 2-to-1 decision more narrowly found that the group's ads did not violate restrictions against "express advocacy" for or against a federal candidate and were not campaign ads but general issue ads.

The majority opinion was by Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court. Judge Richard W. Roberts of Federal District Court dissented.

The judges adhered strictly to the content of the actual commercials and rejected arguments by the government that the commercials were intended to influence the election. The advertisements did not state the senators' views on the filibusters but urged viewers to call them.

The panel found that the government had not demonstrated a compelling enough interest to impose restrictions on these groups' free speech rights. It said this section of the McCain-Feingold law was unconstitutional because it imposed campaign finance limits on organizations that were using advertisements to advance legislative policy.

Mr. Foley said the court reopened the door to use of corporate money.

"This is clearly a shift in direction and invites the use of corporate money," Mr. Foley said, adding: "You can run ads about any policy issue you want to and you can name members of Congress in the ads. You can use corporate money for any ad that fits this profile."

Mr. Foley said it would appear that so-called 527 groups, which emerged in the 2004 presidential campaign as a powerful force, would also be allowed to use corporate money for general issue ads under the Wisconsin decision. But the law is still murky on the regulation of 527's, named for the part of the tax code that regulates them.

In the Wisconsin case, the F.E.C. had argued that the Wisconsin advertisements were clearly intended to try to defeat Mr. Feingold. The group's opposition to the Senate filibustering of judicial nominees was closely linked to nominees who opposed abortion.

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut and a main architect of the campaign finance law, expressed disappointment in the decision.

"The lower court majority opinion ignores a wealth of evidence that shows W.R.T.L. had a 'priority' to defeat Senator Feingold in the 2004 election, and that the ads in question were part of that effort," Mr. Shays said in a statement. Fred Wertheimer, head of Democracy 21, a campaign finance reform group, and one of the lawyers involved in the case, said he was hopeful that the Supreme Court would overturn the decision.

DOJ_NMG_0108508

"We agree with the dissent in this case," Mr. Wertheimer said, adding, "The context surrounding these ads, and not just the text and the face of these ads, must be considered in making this determination."

Issue Ads Allowed In Election Run-up (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Political groups have a constitutional right to run issue ads that include the name of a candidate for office even in the contentious days before an election, a panel of federal judges ruled yesterday in the first major dent in the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law.

Under that law, ads that interest groups ran 60 days before an election or 30 days before a primary were assumed to be aimed at influencing voters if they mentioned a candidate for federal office.

But in a 2-1 ruling, the panel yesterday said three ads from Wisconsin Right to Life (WRTL) in 2004 were issue ads rather than election ads and cannot be banned outright. The panel said permitting such ads should be decided based on the individual content.

"On their face, WRTL's three 2004 anti-filibuster advertisements were not intended to influence the voters' decisions," District Court Judge Richard J. Leon wrote in the majority opinion, joined by Appeals Court Judge David B. Sentelle.

The small but potentially deep change creates an exception to what had been considered a near-blanket rule.

"A free-speech interest is too substantial here," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, who said the government didn't justify such a broad ban.

The 2002 law was meant to end the use of "soft money," or unrestricted donations, to run ads that appear to be talking about issues but intend to affect an election.

Critics say interest groups could use the ruling as a loophole to run such "sham" ads and say judges should consider the groups' motives.

Interest groups had argued that the law kept them from playing a legitimate role in educating voters and influencing the legislative process.

"This is a victory for the right of the people to lobby their members of Congress on upcoming votes even if there is a pending election," said James Bopp Jr., the right-to-life group's lawyer. "This grass-roots lobbying is simply self-government at work, which is protected by the First Amendment."

Backers of the law were considering an appeal yesterday, while the FEC was weighing options.

"The commission is carefully studying the opinion and will consult with the Justice Department on the next appropriate step," said Michael E. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission.

The ads in question told listeners to call Wisconsin's two senators, Democrats Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, to urge them to oppose a filibuster of President Bush's judicial nominees. Mr. Feingold is one of the key sponsors of the campaign-finance law that bears his name and that of co-sponsor Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

In 2005, the panel ruled that the ads violated the campaign law because they mentioned Mr. Feingold, who was running for re-election. The court said the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling in McConnell v. FEC left no room to judge on a case-by-case basis.

But the Supreme Court sent the case back to the panel earlier this year, ruling that cases could be decided individually.

District Judge Richard W. Roberts dissented from yesterday's ruling, saying more facts were needed to decide what the right-to-life group's motives were in running the ads.

The decision applies only to WRTL's three ads. The court rejected the group's request to write new rules for how to treat ads in the future.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group that backed the McCain-Feingold law, said the decision is narrow but he still disagrees with it. He said the advertiser's motives should matter, even if the ad seems to be straightforward.

"The context surrounding the ads, and not just the text and face of the ads, must be considered in making this determination," said Mr. Wertheimer, who is urging an appeal.

Challenges to the 2002 McCain-Feingold law are heard first by a panel of two district court judges and one judge from the court of appeals for the D.C. circuit. Appeals go directly to the Supreme Court.

Senator Brownback And The Judge (NYT)

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

If most people were asked to list the qualities they want in a federal judge, few would include "has not attended a same-sex commitment ceremony." But that was the outrageous litmus test that Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, applied to Janet Neff, whose nomination he has been blocking. Mr. Brownback — who has presidential ambitions — now says he will allow a vote on her nomination. We hope that is a sign that gay-baiting is becoming less tolerable, even to Republican primary voters.

Judge Neff, a Michigan state court judge, attended the commitment ceremony of the daughter of a family who had lived next door to her for 26 years. She said that attending and delivering a homily was like joining in an important event in the life of one of her own daughters.

Mr. Brownback, one of the most conservative senators, considered it to be a disqualifier for the bench. Later, he made an equally objectionable offer: he would allow a vote on Judge Neff if she agreed to recuse herself from cases involving same-sex unions. The Senate does not get to tell federal judges what areas of law they may rule on.

Senator Brownback now seems to be calculating that even in the Republican Party, the sort of extreme bigotry he has shown toward gay people would not be a selling point. At a time when Vice President Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter is pregnant and President Bush has declared himself "happy for her," Mr. Brownback's hostility puts him far out on the political fringe.

Mr. Brownback says that although he will allow Judge Neff's nomination to come to a vote, he is still likely to vote against her. If he does, he should be asked to explain his vote if he hits the presidential campaign trail. Whether someone has attended a same-sex commitment ceremony is not a worthy litmus test to impose on someone seeking an important office. Whether someone holds hateful views toward gay people certainly is.

Texas Judge Cuts Vioxx Award To $7.75M (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

(AP) - HARLINGEN, Texas-A judge in a Texas widow's lawsuit over the Merck & Co. drug Vioxx on Thursday reduced a $32 million jury award to about $7.75 million, citing Texas' recently enacted caps on punitive damages.

The state jury in April found Merck & Co. liable for the death of Leonel Garza, a 71-year-old man who had a fatal heart attack within a month of taking the since-withdrawn painkiller.

The company was ordered to pay the Garza family $7 million in non-economic compensatory damages and $25 million in punitive damages.

But Judge Alex Garza, in a Rio Grande City courtroom, ordered the punitive damage reduced as required by state law.

The law caps punitive damages at twice the amount of economic damages - lost pay - and up to $750,000 on top of non-economic damages. Because Garza was retired, the jury awarded no economic damages, so Merck was ordered to pay the most the family could receive under state law.

A spokesman for Merck's outside legal counsel said the company was seeking a new trial based on "the undisclosed financial relationship" between the plaintiff and one of the jurors.

Merck attorneys in September were granted access to bank and cell phone records they said would show an improper financial relationship between juror Jose Manuel Rios and Felicia Garza, the widow.

Businessman Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case Involving U.N. (NYT)

By Elissa Gootman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108510

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 21 — A businessman pleaded guilty Thursday to providing cash and a significantly discounted luxury Manhattan condominium to a ranking United Nations procurement official, in a successful effort to win more than $50 million in contracts, federal prosecutors said.

The businessman, Nishan Kohli, 30, pleaded guilty in Manhattan federal court to a single count of bribery after acknowledging that he had given cash payments to Sanjaya Bahel, who was chief of the commodity procurement section of the United Nations procurement division from 1998 until 2003. Mr. Kohli faces up to 10 years in prison.

He also acknowledged that from 2003 to 2005, he allowed Mr. Bahel to pay reduced rent at a high-rise apartment that Mr. Kohli owned in the Dag Hammarskjold Towers, near United Nations headquarters. In May 2005, Mr. Kohli sold the unit to Mr. Bahel at a price so far below the market value that the condominium's board considered blocking the sale, prosecutors said. Mr. Kohli also gave Mr. Bahel a cellphone that allowed them to speak privately.

Mr. Kohli's guilty plea is the latest development in a series of corruption charges against United Nations officials and those seeking to do business with them. The plea and Mr. Kohli's agreement to cooperate with the government are likely to strengthen the case against Mr. Bahel, who has pleaded not guilty to bribery charges. His trial is scheduled for May 7.

Richard Herman, Mr. Bahel's lawyer, said his client had accepted no bribes and was "vigorously fighting the allegations of any wrongdoing." Mr. Herman noted that the condominium sale took place two years after Mr. Bahel, 56, left his procurement position and said that the contracts in question were awarded through a "sealed bid process."

Mr. Bahel has been suspended without pay from his latest position, as chief of the commercial activities service within the United Nations postal administration, for four months since an internal United Nations investigation found he had improperly steered contacts toward Mr. Kohli's companies.

Stéphane Dujarric, a spokesman for Secretary General Kofi Annan, said that the prosecutors' case was "based in large part on evidence uncovered by the United Nations," adding, "We very much welcome the fact that people who have been accused of wrongdoing involving the U.N. are being brought to justice."

Prosecutors said Mr. Kohli's efforts helped secure contracts for the companies he represented, including Telecommunications Consultants India Ltd., an enterprise owned by the Indian government, and Thunderbird Industries, where Mr. Kohli was the managing partner. Since 2000, prosecutors said, Mr. Kohli's businesses have received contracts ranging from nearly $3 million for desktop computers and monitors, to $36 million for radio communications systems.

UN Official Admits Bribery (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein

New York Sun, December 22, 2006

Efforts by federal prosecutors to root out corruption at the U.N. received a boost yesterday when a Florida businessman pleaded guilty to bribing a senior U.N. procurement official.

As a liaison to the U.N. for two companies, the businessman, Nishan Kohli, was able to secure more than $60 million worth of U.N. business contracts. His guilty plea yesterday is part of a cooperation agreement he has entered into with prosecutors.

While the details of the deal did not emerge in court, it is likely that the government will call him as a witness at the trial of the U.N. official, Sanjaya Bahel, 55. The trial is scheduled for May, 2007.

Mr. Bahel was chief of the Commodity Procurement Section within the Procurement Division of the United Nations until 2003.

Prior to Mr. Bahel's recent indictment, another top procurement department employee, Alexander Yakovlev, pleaded guilty in the summer of 2005 to corruption and wire fraud charges. Messrs. Bahel and Yakovlev were key officers involved in the awarding of a U.N. contract to the Swiss-based inspection company Cotecna, which had employed Secretary General Annan's son, Kojo.

In addition, last January the U.N. suspended eight employees in the procurement department, including Mr. Bahel, pending an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing.

Mexican Army Invades Pot Plantations (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

DOJ_NMG_0108511

USA Today, December 22, 2006

LAZARO CARDENAS, Mexico — Thirty-five soldiers jump off two helicopters and fan out across a marijuana field tucked deep into the mountains of Mexico's western state of Michoacan.

The choppers secure the perimeter as soldiers yank out plants growing in neat lines. Two hours later, most of the marijuana smolders in a bonfire.

This is one of 38 marijuana fields identified in a remote area, 25 miles from Aguililla, the nearest town. Rooting out — literally — marijuana plantations is a major component in Mexico's latest war on drugs, announced last week by President Felipe Calderó´n.

Mexico has long been under pressure from the United States to crack down on the drug trade and end violence between drug gangs. According to the U.S. State Department, 70%-90% of drugs coming to the USA from Latin America enter through Mexico. Mexico is one of the main producers of marijuana and heroin destined for the USA.

U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza has repeatedly expressed concern about the rising violence, most of it drug-related.

The week-old Operation Michoacan, Calderó´n's first major initiative since he took office Dec. 1, is the biggest anti-drug effort taken on by the Mexican government, says Army Gen. Manuel Garcia Ruiz, who heads the operation.

The purpose is to "end the impunity of the criminals that puts at risk the tranquility of all Mexicans, especially our families," Interior Secretary Francisco Javier Ramirez Acuna said at a news conference in Mexico City on Monday.

It also is a high-profile effort by the new president to follow through on his campaign vow to improve security in Mexico.

"Calderó´n came in as a law-and-order president and wants to show he is capable of reasserting state authority to convince the Mexican people, as well as the U.S., that he is, in fact, in charge," says Bruce Bagley, a drug specialist at the University of Miami.

Mexico's drug wars claimed about 2,000 lives in 2006, according to the Associated Press, and have been marked by increasing violence as drug lords battle for control of what the State Department says is a multibillion-dollar industry. In September, gunmen stormed a nightclub and hurled five heads onto a dance floor in Uruapan in Michoacan, the president's home state. Juan Antonio Magana, the state's attorney general, told the AP more than 200 homicides here this year were drug-related.

Last week, Calderó´n sent 7,000 military and federal officers into Michoacan to burn drug fields and arrest suspects. "This is a very difficult battle," Garcia Ruiz says. "It will last as long as it is necessary."

About 50 people suspected of drug trafficking, including suspected drug lord Elias Valencia, have been arrested. The soldiers and federal officers have seized about 100 firearms, bulletproof vests, antennas and telephones, officials announced at Monday's news conference. They estimated the raids could cost the cartels as much as $626 million, which includes future profits from the plants and opium seeds.

The first goal, Garcia Ruiz says, is to disrupt the drug gangs' source of income and their ability to communicate. Over the past week, military and police have identified 1,795 marijuana fields covering 585 acres throughout the state.

Attorney General Eduardo Medina says the government will expand the new offensive by sending soldiers and police to several states simultaneously to prevent traffickers from fleeing between regions. The idea is to wrest income and turf from drug traffickers. "The focus is on territory, recovering geographical space for the public," Medina says.

Tuesday, journalists witnessed a raid on a marijuana plantation in Michoacan. The field where the two helicopters landed was ringed with lime trees and an irrigation system: thousands of yards of tubing fed by a nearby rushing creek. Footpaths led to at least two other fields, a 15-minute trek away, and a recently abandoned shack. Half-eaten tamales, corncobs and crushed pepper littered wooden benches.

The type of marijuana growing here illustrates how hard the battle against drugs has become. It's a genetically modified variety resistant to pesticides; it can be killed only if it's pulled out with the roots. It also grows year-round, Garcia Ruiz says.

He says the plants, which mature in two months, are primarily exported to the USA.

Residents in Michoacan hope the operation will tamp down the violence. Rosalba Sanchez, 32, and her mother, Nicolasa Diez, 65, live in Patzcuaro, west of the state capital Morelia. They say that even though the main targets are people who produce and distribute drugs, the violence has affected their quality of life.

A drug-gang-related shootout two weeks ago in the city killed a store owner, they say. "When you leave your house, anything could happen," Sanchez says. "Hopefully with more security, they will be more afraid."

Redacted Version Of Original Op-Ed (NYT)

By Flynt Leverett And Hillary Mann

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

The Iraq Study Group has added its voice to a burgeoning chorus of commentators, politicians, and former officials calling for a limited, tactical dialogue with Iran regarding Iraq. The Bush administration has indicated a conditional willingness to pursue a similarly compartmented dialogue with Tehran over Iran's nuclear activities.

Unfortunately, advocates of limited engagement — either for short-term gains on specific issues or to "test" Iran regarding broader rapprochement — do not seem to understand the 20-year history of United States-Iranian cooperation on discrete issues or appreciate the impact of that history on Iran's strategic outlook. In the current regional context, issue-specific engagement with Iran is bound to fail. The only diplomatic approach that might succeed is a comprehensive one aimed at a "grand bargain" between the United States and the Islamic Republic.

Since the 1980s, cooperation with Iran on specific issues has been tried by successive administrations, but United States policymakers have consistently allowed domestic politics or other foreign policy interests to torpedo such cooperation and any chance for a broader opening. The Reagan administration's engagement with Iran to secure the release of American hostages in Lebanon came to grief in the Iran-contra scandal. The first Bush administration resumed contacts with Tehran to secure release of the last American hostages in Lebanon, but postponed pursuit of broader rapprochement until after the 1992 presidential election.

In 1994, the Clinton administration acquiesced to the shipment of Iranian arms to Bosnian Muslims, but the leak of this activity in 1996 and criticism from presumptive Republican presidential nominee Robert Dole shut down possibilities for further United States-Iranian cooperation for several years.

These episodes reinforced already considerable suspicion among Iranian leaders about United States intentions toward the Islamic Republic. But, in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, senior Iranian diplomats told us that Tehran believed it had a historic opportunity to improve relations with Washington. Iranian leaders offered to help the United States in responding to the attacks without making that help contingent on changes in America's Iran policy — a condition stipulated in the late 1990s when Tehran rejected the Clinton administration's offer of dialogue — calculating that cooperation would ultimately prompt fundamental shifts in United States policy.

The argument that Iran helped America in Afghanistan because it was in Tehran's interest to get rid of the Taliban is misplaced. Iran could have let America remove the Taliban without getting its own hands dirty, as it remained neutral during the 1991 gulf war. Tehran cooperated with United States efforts in Afghanistan primarily because it wanted a better relationship with Washington.

But Tehran was profoundly disappointed with the United States response. Those who argue that Iran did not cause Iraq's problems and therefore can be of only limited help in dealing with Iraq's current instability must also acknowledge that Iran did not "cause" Afghanistan's deterioration into a terrorist-harboring failed state. But, when America and Iran worked together, Afghanistan was much more stable than it is today, Al Qaeda was on the run, the Islamic Republic's Hezbollah protégé was comparatively restrained, and Tehran was not spinning centrifuges. Still, the Bush administration conveyed no interest in building on these positive trends.

xxx xxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxx xxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx x xxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxx xxxxxxxxx xxx xxxxxx xx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxx xxxxxxxx x xx x x xxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xx xxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxx xx

From an Iranian perspective, this record shows that Washington will take what it can get from talking to Iran on specific issues but is not prepared for real rapprochement. Yet American proponents of limited engagement anticipate that Tehran will play this fruitless game once more — even after numerous statements by senior administration figures targeting the Islamic Republic for prospective "regime change" and by President Bush himself that attacking Iran's nuclear and national security infrastructure is "on the table."

Our experience dealing with xxxx xxxx Iranian diplomats over Afghanistan and in more recent private conversations in Europe and elsewhere convince us that Iran will not go down such a dead-end road again. Iran will not help the United States in Iraq because it wants to avoid chaos there; Tehran is well positioned to defend its interests in Iraq unilaterally as America flounders. Similarly, Iran will not accept strategically meaningful limits on its nuclear capabilities for a package of economic and technological goodies.

Iran will only cooperate with the United States, whether in Iraq or on the nuclear issue, as part of a broader rapprochement addressing its core security concerns. This requires extension of a United States security guarantee — effectively, an American commitment not to use force to change the borders or form of government of the Islamic Republic — bolstered by the prospect of lifting United States unilateral sanctions and normalizing bilateral relations. This is something no United States administration has ever offered, and that the Bush administration has explicitly refused to consider.

Indeed, no administration would be able to provide a security guarantee unless United States concerns about Iran's nuclear activities, regional role and support for terrorist organizations were definitively addressed. That is why, at this juncture, resolving any of the significant bilateral differences between the United States and Iran inevitably requires resolving all of them. Implementing the reciprocal commitments entailed in a "grand bargain" would almost certainly play out over time and in phases, but all of the commitments would be agreed up front as a package, so that both sides would know what they were getting.

Unfortunately, the window for pursuing a comprehensive settlement with Iran will not be open indefinitely. The Iranian leadership is more radicalized today, with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president, than it was three years ago, and could become more radicalized in the future, depending on who ultimately succeeds Ayatollah Ali Khamenei as supreme leader. If President Bush does not move decisively toward strategic engagement with Tehran during his remaining two years in office, his successor will not have the same opportunities that he will have so blithely squandered.

What We Wanted To Tell You About Iran (NYT)

By Flynt Leverett And Hillary Mann

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

Washington

HERE is the redacted version of a draft Op-Ed article we wrote for The Times, as blacked out by the Central Intelligence Agency's Publication Review Board after the White House intervened in the normal prepublication review process and demanded substantial deletions. Agency officials told us that they had concluded on their own that the original draft included no classified material, but that they had to bow to the White House.

Indeed, the deleted portions of the original draft reveal no classified material. These passages go into aspects of American-Iranian relations during the Bush administration's first term that have been publicly discussed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; former Secretary of State Colin Powell; former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage; a former State Department policy planning director, Richard Haass; and a former special envoy to Afghanistan, James Dobbins.

These aspects have been extensively reported in the news media, and one of us, Mr. Leverett, has written about them in The Times and other publications with the explicit permission of the review board. We provided the following citations to the board to demonstrate that all of the material the White House objected to is already in the public domain. Unfortunately, to make sense of much of our Op-Ed article, readers will have to read the citations for themselves. (See links at left.)

The decisions of the C.I.A. and the White House took us by surprise. Since leaving government service three and a half years ago, Mr. Leverett has put more than 20 articles through the C.I.A.'s prepublication review process and the Publication Review Board has never changed a word or asked the White House for permission to clear these articles.

What's more, we have spent a collective 20 years serving our country as career civil servants in national security, for both Republican and Democratic administrations. We know firsthand the importance of protecting sensitive information. But we also know the importance of shared knowledge. In the entrance to the C.I.A.'s headquarters the words of the Gospel of John are inscribed, "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free."

National security must be above politics. In a democracy, transparency in government has to be honored and protected. To classify information for reasons other than the safety and security of the United States and its interests is a violation of these principles. It is for this reason that we will continue to press for the release of the article without the material deleted.

Rice: U.S. Backs Iran Sanctions Draft (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 22, 2006

The United States supports a draft U.N. sanctions resolution against Iran even though it omits a mandatory travel ban against several Iranians involved in the country's nuclear and missile programs, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

Rice said she expects changes to be made in the draft before it is put to a vote at the United Nations Security Council, perhaps on Friday.

Speaking at a news conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, she offered no details of the revisions she expects.

"It's no secret we would have preferred to have this earlier had we been the lone drafter, and of course there might have been other things in it," she said of the draft circulated by Britain and France.

At the same time, she said the resolution would make clear to Iran that the "international community is not going to tolerate its defiance" of demands that it abandon its nuclear program. Iranians insist the effort is for peaceful aims, but the United States and other western countries have said the real purpose is the development of nuclear weapons.

The latest draft would order all countries to ban the supply of specified materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

Prodded by MacKay on a different issue, Rice said the United States would review the status of Maher Arar, who was recently cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism.

Arar has become the best-known case of extraordinary rendition, a practice in which the U.S. government sends foreign terror suspects to third countries for interrogation.

Arar says he was shunted to Syria, and was tortured and kept in a dark cell for nearly a year.

DOJ_NMG_0108515

Arar no longer is under travel restrictions in Canada, but remains on a U.S. watch list.

Rice said she had spoken earlier in the day with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, about Arar's status. "He said he would examine it and would get back to me."

U.S., EU Urge Vote On Iran Ban (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States and European Union yesterday pushed for a U.N. Security Council vote as early as today on Iran sanctions, a diluted version that drops a U.S.-backed travel ban on Iranian nuclear officials in a bid to win Russian support.

The governments of Germany, France and Britain drafted the latest text, which calls for a ban on trading parts or technology for use in making ballistic missiles or nuclear fuel.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed to ignore the resolution, which comes just days after Pentagon officials disclosed plans to beef up the contingent of warships in the region by early next year.

"The United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology," Mr. Ahmadinejad said yesterday.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice indicated that Washington would support the draft.

"Had we been the lone drafters of the resolution, of course there might have been other things in it," she told reporters yesterday after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay.

"But I am quite satisfied and quite certain that the resolution that will be adopted will be one that both says to Iran 'you cannot defy the international community' and imposes penalties on Iran for that defiance," Miss Rice said.

Russia said last night that the resolution needed more work, casting doubt on whether the vote could be held today.

The West fears Tehran is developing fissile material for a nuclear weapon, but Iran insists it seeks nuclear power.

The latest council text cites Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, which authorizes the body to undertake economic, political and military action to address threats to international peace and security.

However, the draft stresses the need for a political and diplomatic effort to contain proliferation.

It also calls on the U.N. nuclear agency to report within 60 days whether Iran is complying with its requests for information and access to all enrichment-related activities.

The draft demands that all states to deny Iran technical assistance, training, financial assistance or investment that could be used to advance suspect nuclear activities.

In addition, the resolution would immediately freeze the assets of two dozen individuals and companies listed as crucial to Iran's nuclear or ballistic enterprises.

Iran's oil minister admitted earlier this week that de-facto financial restrictions already in place are making it difficult for the Islamic state to raise needed investment funds for its oil and gas industry.

"Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their cooperation," Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told Shana, the Oil Ministry's news service, according to a report in the Financial Times yesterday.

Some analysts were skeptical that the Security Council could effectively rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"They should get off the U.N. track and go back to the U.S.-EU track, which can take action much more quickly and resolutely than the Security Council can," said Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The U.N. track has been a diversion and sends the wrong message."

Meanwhile, political candidates aligned with Mr. Ahmadinejad appear to have lost last week's local elections, according to results announced early yesterday in Tehran.

Moderates and reformers won most seats from the hard-line ruling party, according to press reports.

UN Poised To Agree Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108516

The United Nations Security Council was poised finally to agree sanctions on Iran after months of wrangling over Tehran's nuclear programme.

Western diplomats say the measures are crucial to creating a united front against Iran's nuclear ambitions but concede that the steps finally agreed, which have been watered down from initial European Union proposals, are likely to have only a limited impact on Tehran. Iran, which insists its nuclear programme is for peaceful purposes, ignored an August 31 UN deadline to suspend uranium enrichment.

A binding resolution, which ambassadors had hoped to adopt today but the vote had slipped to the weekend, would ban countries from sending the most sensitive nuclear materials to Iran and establish limited controls over dual-use technology. It would also freeze the overseas finances of some organisations, companies and people, although Russian opposition led European drafters to step back from a travel ban. A committee would be told of trips by named officials instead.

Diplomats said some issues still needed to be ironed out but they were hopeful that unanimous agreement could be reached by this morning. If adopted, the UN resolution would increase the pressure on Tehran, although experts and diplomats acknowledge its impact may be limited.

Tehran admitted this week that the de facto financial sanctions, encouraged by the US, had started to hurt investment in the oil sector.

Iran dismissed the UN move. Ali Larijani, the secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, was quoted as saying: "The nature of this resolution is not capable of pressuring Iran and Iran will give an appropriate response to it.

"This behaviour will just create more problems. If they ratify the resolution Iran will . . .review its co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency and others [in the] political, economic and cultural fields."

Separately, US Central Command, which oversees military activities in the Middle East, has asked the Pentagon to send a second aircraft carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf in a move that has been interpreted as sending a strong message to Iran. Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary who is visiting Iraq, would have to approve the request.

Iran Defiant On Nuclear Energy Despite Looming Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed that nothing would stop Iran pushing ahead with its nuclear programme, as world powers prepared to vote Friday on sanctions against Tehran.

"The United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology," Ahmadinejad said.

"The bullying powers today, in confronting Iran's peaceful nuclear technology, are faced with a sea of courageous people," he added in a speech in Gilan-e Gharb town, in Iran's western Kermanshah province.

"If they think that nuclear energy only belongs to one group of the Iranian people they are mistaken."

Qatar, which is chairing UN Security Council sessions this month, confirmed Thursday that a draft resolution would be put to a vote before the 15-nation body on Friday.

In Washington, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said her government was seeking last-minute changes to the draft UN resolution ahead of the vote.

The draft calls for a ban on trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

It also waters down a contentious proposal for a travel ban on Iranian officials, in a bid to win Russia's support for the resolution that has been held up for weeks by wrangling amongst the Security Council powers.

Western countries want to impose sanctions on Iran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, for fear that it would lead to Tehran having nuclear weapons that would radically shift the balance of power in the region.

Iran counters that its nuclear programme is only aimed at providing energy for a growing population.

Qatar's UN ambassador Nasser Abdelaziz al-Nasser expressed misgivings about sanctions, saying Thursday: "We don't know how the Iranians are going to react."

"The Middle East is going through difficult times," he told reporters at UN headquarters in New York. "We are worried about this matter. We live there."

DOJ_NMG_0108517

Without elaborating, Rice said Thursday that "there are some changes that are still to be made" to the draft resolution.

But she added Washington was "very supportive" of the overall draft -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany -- and she expressed confidence it would be adopted.

"I am quite satisfied and quite certain that the resolution that will be adopted will be one that both says to Iran 'you cannot defy the international community' and imposes penalties on Iran," she said.

The New York Times newspaper, quoting unnamed US officials, reported Thursday that the United States and Britain would move additional warships into the Gulf region as the Security Council moves on sanctions.

"Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year," it reported.

In his address Thursday, Ahmadinejad reaffirmed his prediction that Iran would be able to hold a "nuclear celebration" at the same time as it marks the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution on February 11.

Iran has not specified exactly what landmark will be feted on that day, but Ahmadinejad added: "Iran is only one step before we reach the zenith and we will take that step with pride."

The Islamic republic has set a goal of installing 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges at a key nuclear plant by March, in what would be an important step towards industrial enrichment.

Iran's President Says Bush 'Most Hated' (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

AP, December 22, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called President Bush "the most hated person" in the world on Thursday, keeping up his tirades against the West despite elections that showed Iranians want him to focus on the country's domestic problems.

In final results announced Thursday from local elections last week, moderate conservatives opposed to Ahmadinejad won a majority of seats. They were followed by reformists, making a comeback after being driven out of local councils, parliament and the presidency over the past five years.

In the capital Tehran, where Ahmadinejad was mayor before becoming president 16 months ago, his allies grabbed only three of the 15 council seats, while moderate conservatives won seven. Reformists won four, and an independent one. Though the Dec. 15 elections were local, they were the first time the public has weighed in on Ahmadinejad's stormy presidency.

But Ahmadinejad appeared unbowed. He toured cities in western Iran, telling the crowds that Iran will not be intimidated by Western demands to dismantle its nuclear program, and scolding Bush.

"Oh, the respectful gentleman, get out of the glassy palace and know that you are the most hated person in the eyes of the world's nations and you can't harm the Iranian nation," Ahmadinejad said, according to the official Iranian Republic News Agency.

He said Iran would continue uranium enrichment even under threat of U.N. sanctions. "A nation that has resisted until today will resist until the last step and will defend its rights," he said.

The United States and its allies believe Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies the allegation, saying its nuclear goal is only to generate electricity.

Ahmadinejad did not comment on the election results. But his hard-line foreign policy, in the absence of a strong domestic agenda or economic program, is believed to have divided the conservative base that voted him into the presidency last year.

The president has sharply escalated Iran's standoff with the United States and its allies over several issues. Besides uranium enrichment, he has sparked international outrage for his calls to eliminate Israel and for casting doubt on the Nazi Holocaust.

Election results outside Tehran also showed a heavy defeat for Ahmadinejad supporters. None of his candidates won seats on the councils in the cities of Shiraz, Bandar Abbas, Sari, Zanjan, Rasht, Ilam, Sanandaj and Kerman, and many councils in other cities were divided like Tehran's.

Similar anti-Ahmadinejad sentiment appeared in final results of a parallel election for the Assembly of Experts, the body of 86 senior clerics that monitors Iran's supreme Islamic leader and chooses his successor.

DOJ_NMG_0108518

A big boost for moderates within the ruling Islamic establishment was visible in the large number of votes for former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, who lost to Ahmadinejad in the 2005 presidential election runoff.

Rafsanjani, who supports dialogue with the United States, got the most votes of any candidate from Tehran to win re-election to the assembly.

Opposition candidates demanded that Ahmadinejad pay more attention to unemployment, now estimated at 11 percent, and other economic problems. He has failed to carry through on several domestic campaign promises, including a pledge to send a share of the country's oil revenues to every family and to implement an anti-poverty program.

The moderate daily newspaper Etemad-e-Melli, or National Confidence, urged Ahmadinejad to change his policies if he has any respect for the vote.

"The result of the elections, if there is any ear to listen or any eye to see, demands reconsideration in policies," the paper said in an editorial Thursday.

Conservative lawmaker Emad Afroogh also called on Ahmadinejad to learn a lesson from the vote. "The people's vote means they don't like Ahmadinejad's populist methods," Afroogh told The Associated Press.

Reformist Saeed Shariati also said the results of the election were a "big no" to Ahmadinejad and his allies, who he accused of harming Iran's interests with their hard line.

"We consider this government's policy to be against Iran's national interests and security. It is simply acting against Iran's interests," said Shariati, a leader of the Islamic Iran Participation Front, Iran's largest reformist party. His party seeks democratic changes within the ruling Islamic establishment and supports relations with the United States.

Iran Forging Ahead In Iraq Without U.S. (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tehran's top envoy here said there was no need for contacts with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, saying that Iranians already were pursuing channels to help secure their embattled neighbor.

Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi brushed aside recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, that the Bush administration speak to Tehran about the chaos in Iraq.

"We don't need a Mr. Baker-style proposal calling for Iran to talk with the United States about Iraq," Kazemi-Qomi said in an interview this week. "We have our own well-defined policies about Iraq. We have never waited for a Mr. Baker or someone else to offer talks."

Washington and Tehran broke formal diplomatic ties after Iranian radicals stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran during the 1979 Islamic Revolution, which toppled the country's pro-U.S. monarch and brought to power the world's first Shiite Muslim theocracy.

U.S. officials have accused Iran's government of destabilizing Iraq by providing arms, training and money to Shiite militias considered to be leading players in the civil war gripping Iraq's central provinces.

Told of Kazemi-Qomi's remarks, a State Department official in Washington accused Tehran of duplicity.

"It's not unusual for the Iranians to say all the right things, but at the same time engage in activities that are problematic, and certainly not what we would hope to see from a country expressing a desire for good neighborly relations," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Iraq Study Group report advised the Bush administration to make diplomatic contacts with Iran to persuade it to stop supporting armed Shiite groups. The controversy surrounding the report has rekindled debate in Iraq and the region about Iran's role here.

Iranians are mostly Persians and Iraqis are mostly Arabs. Their languages are different, but the Shiite majorities in both countries share centuries-old religious and cultural ties.

Iraq's Sunni Arabs accuse Iran of employing Shiite militias to settle old scores with former Iraqi army officers and the United States. They accuse Tehran of fomenting unrest.

DOJ_NMG_0108519

Kazemi-Qomi, speaking in a sitting room in Iran's ornate embassy a block from the perimeter of the U.S.-protected Green Zone, painted a drastically different portrait of Iran's role.

In a rare interview with Western media, he said that Iran maintained strong ties with Sunni as well as Shiite groups, supported the national unity government assembled by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the reconciliation talks taking place between Iraq's squabbling factions.

Iran respects all of Iraq's tribes and political groups, Kazemi-Qomi said. "Our relations are not limited to the Iraqi Shiites."

Iran provides Iraq with refined petroleum products, 140 megawatts of electricity and access to its Persian Gulf ports, and is willing to arm and train Iraqi security forces, he said.

"We are also serious in sharing intelligence with Iraq in an attempt to identify and bust terrorist groups," said KazemiQomi, a former member of Iran's conservative Revolutionary Guard who served in his country's consulate in the western Afghan city of Herat before coming to Iraq. In May, he became his nation's first ambassador to Baghdad in more than 25 years.

Iran is helping Iraq not because it wants to remain in the good graces of Washington, but out of self interest, he said.

"Security in Iraq will strip foreign troops of any pretext to prolong their presence in the country," he said in the 30-minute interview, which was granted only after The Times submitted a list of questions. "Security in Iraq will deprive terrorists of any safe haven, and we will no longer see an influx of Iraqi [refugees] to Iran."

He brushed aside suggestions that Iran was fostering instability in Iraq, instead taking a jab at Washington's Sunni allies in the region.

Iraq's border with Iran is more secure than any of its other borders, he said.

"You can go and find a list of suspected terrorists held in Iraqi prisons. You will definitely find out that no Iranian is among them," Kazemi-Qomi said, adding that few of them are from Afghanistan or Pakistan, which are on Iran's eastern border. "I regret to tell you that the majority of these suspects come from Arab countries."

Some Western diplomats in Iraq say the Iranians are able to leave their embassy compound more easily without fear of kidnapping or street violence, and they call on their Iranian colleagues for assessments of developments in Iraq.

But a number of Iraqis suggest that Tehran exaggerates its influence in Iraq, hoping the perception of its importance will give it more leverage in its dispute with the United States and European allies over its nuclear program.

Iraq's Sunnis have long said Shiite militias linked to major political parties with Iranian ties are at least as destructive as Arab insurgents. Sunnis argue that the increasing abilities of Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army and Abdelaziz Hakim's Badr Brigade reflect help from abroad.

"Who's supporting Mahdi army? And who's supporting Badr?" said Saleh Mutlak, a leader of a hard-line Sunni faction in parliament. "They seem to have a lot of money and a lot of arms. They can't do this on their own."

Mutlak noted that the Shiite militias were not linked to Sunni-dominated countries such as Jordan or Saudi Arabia.

American officials say some types of roadside bombs used against U.S. and British forces in Iraq are similar to those used by the Iranian-financed militant group Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Despite repeated allegations, neither U.S. nor Iraqi officials have presented conclusive evidence that Iran is funding or supporting Shiite militias or violence in Iraq.

"Nobody reveals details," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker. "It's just talk and accusations."

U.S. officials consider Iraqi Shiite groups with the strongest ties to Iran to be the most moderate. Sadr's late uncle, Mohammed Baqer Sadr, had close ties to the founder of Iran's theocracy, Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, and founded the pro-Iranian Dawa Party, which is now led by U.S.-backed Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Hakim, who recently met with President Bush in Washington and has been trying to form a more moderate governing coalition, spent years in exile in Iran and headed an Iraqi military force opposed to Saddam Hussein that was largely created by Iran's Revolutionary Guard.

Shiite groups that were founded and grew exclusively in Iraq are considered the most disruptive. Sadr is an Arab nationalist who has never left Iraq and whose Al Mahdi army derides Hakim as a Persian bent on dividing up Iraq. The Fadila Party, another major Shiite group with few historic ties to Iran, follows a similar line.

Kazemi-Qomi said Iran respected the wishes of Hakim to have good ties to Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0108520

"Icy relations between Iran and the United States have nothing to do with Iran-Iraq ties," he said.

Saner Voices In Iran (NYT)

New York Times, December 22, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran has not been having a very good month, which is good news both for the beaten-down people of Iran and for the outside world.

The populist demagogue, it seems, is not so popular with important elements of Iranian society growing uneasy over the price Iran may have to pay for his belligerent pursuit of nuclear technology. This week, Mr. Ahmadinejad's oil minister acknowledged that foreign banks were pulling back from financing Iranian oil projects because of the worsening nuclear dispute.

The clearest evidence of Mr. Ahmadinejad's troubles came in last week's elections for municipal offices and the national council that oversees the work of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Mr. Ahmadinejad's supporters fared surprisingly poorly. The main gainers came from two very different opposition groups, one aligned with former President Ali Rafsanjani, an establishment conservative, and the other with remnants of the cautious reform movement led by former President Mohammad Khatami.

Mr. Rafsanjani, a venomous foe of Israel (with his own nuclear appetites), is so notorious for the corruption that marred his presidency that his political career had almost gone into eclipse. Mr. Khatami's followers are more high-minded, but still managed to fumble Iran's best chance for reform in decades. What distinguishes them from Mr. Ahmadinejad's supporters is their recognition that Iran exists in the real world. They understand that its future requires good relations with foreign investors, trade partners and educational institutions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has been systematically dynamiting those relations, by defying the International Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations and with his loathsome circus of Holocaust denial. Though meant to whip up voters, that travesty failed to save his supporters from electoral defeat.

Last week, in a remarkable show of courage, students at one of Tehran's elite universities openly denounced Mr. Ahmadinejad as a dictator and a fascist, forcing him to cut short his planned address.

Their anger had been stoked by a blatantly political purge of professors and students, a crackdown on basic personal freedoms, and worries that economic mismanagement and diplomatic provocations were blighting their future. Two weeks ago, the students chanted, "Forget the Holocaust — do something for us." Last week, one of them told a reporter: "A nuclear program is our right. But we fear that it will do more harm than good."

Indeed it would, and it is encouraging to hear from Iranians who recognize that threat. Washington needs to keep pushing for effective economic sanctions that will compel Mr. Ahmadinejad to recognize it as well.

Bickering Saudis Struggle For An Answer To Iran's Rising Influence In The Middle East (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Dec. 21 — At a late-night reading this week, a self-styled poet raised his hand for silence and began a riff on neighboring Iraq, in the old style of Bedouin storytellers.

"Saddam Hussein was a real leader who deserved our support," he began, making up the lines as he went. "He kept Iraq stable and peaceful," he added, "and most of all he fought back the Iranians." He continued, "His one mistake was invading Kuwait."

Across the kingdom, in both official and casual conversation, once-quiet concern over the chaos in Iraq and Iran's growing regional influence has burst into the open.

Saudi newspapers now denounce Iran's growing power. Religious leaders here, who view Shiism as heresy, have begun talking about a "Persian onslaught" that threatens Islam. In the salons and diwans of Riyadh, the "Iranian threat" is raised almost as frequently as the stock market.

DOJ_NMG_0108521

"Iran has become more dangerous than Israel itself," said Sheik Musa bin Abdulaziz, editor of the magazine Al Salafi, who describes himself as a moderate Salafi, a fundamentalist Muslim movement. "The Iranian revolution has come to renew the Persian presence in the region. This is the real clash of civilizations."

Many here say a showdown with Iran is inevitable. After several years of a thaw in relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia, Saudis are growing concerned that Iran may build a nuclear bomb and become the de facto superpower in the region.

In recent weeks, the Saudis, with other Persian Gulf countries, have announced plans to develop peaceful nuclear power. Saudi officials publicly welcomed the Iraqi Harith al-Dhari, whose Muslim Scholars Association has links to the insurgency, during a visit in October, and they have indicated that they may support Iraq's Sunnis over the majority Shiites with links to Iran. All were meant to send a message to Iran.

"You need to create a strategic challenge to Iran," said Steve Clemons, senior fellow and director of the American Strategy Program at the New America Foundation. "To some degree, what the Saudis are doing is puffing up because they see nobody else in the region doing so."

Yet a growing debate here has centered on how Iran should be confronted: head on, with Saudi Arabia throwing its lot in with the full force of the United States, or diplomatically, with a grand bargain Iran would find hard to refuse?

The apparent split burst into the open last week when Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Washington, abruptly resigned after just 15 months. The resignation is seen by many here as part of a long-running battle over Saudi Arabia's foreign policy.

On Tuesday, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the country's ailing foreign minister, confirmed the ambassador's resignation, citing personal reasons. Privately some Saudi officials and analysts with knowledge of the situation say Prince Turki resigned over deep differences with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the national security minister and former Washington ambassador, over how to deal with Iran.

Prince Bandar is believed to favor the tough American approach of confronting Iran, analysts say, while Prince Turki advocates more diplomatic tactics, including negotiating with Iran.

If this is the case, then the successor to Prince Turki as Saudi ambassador — Adel al-Jubeir, a foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah — is a wild card, Saudi and American officials said Thursday.

Polished and American-educated, Mr. Jubeir, 44, once worked for Prince Bandar when he was ambassador to Washington. Mr. Jubeir became well known as the public face of Saudi Arabia, defending Saudi policy after the Sept. 11 attacks, appearing on talk shows and escorting NBC's White House correspondent at the time, Campbell Brown, around town.

But Saudi officials said that Mr. Jubeir did not necessarily share Prince Bandar's opinions. "Basically, the king is putting his own man in America," one Saudi official said. "Adel will be a direct line between the king and the administration."

Mr. Clemons, whose blog, The Washington Note, first reported Mr. Jubeir's appointment on Wednesday, said Mr. Jubeir "is someone who can help de-escalate tensions between quadroons of the royal family. I don't think he necessarily brings Bandar's views on Iran to the table."

Just days before President Bush met with the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the outlines of what seemed to be a new plan were made public by Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security consultant. In an op-ed article in The Washington Post, he said that if the United States withdrew from Iraq, the Saudis would back the Sunnis "to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

Saudi Arabia said Mr. Obaid did not speak on its behalf, and he was subsequently dismissed from his position. He is widely expected to return to the government in some capacity. And King Abdullah warned Vice President Dick Cheney during a meeting in Riyadh three weeks ago that Saudi Arabia would back the Sunnis if the Americans withdrew from Iraq and a civil war ensued.

"The possibility of having conflict is very high," said Abdelrahman Rashid, managing director of the satellite news channel Al Arabiya and a respected Saudi columnist. "Who will face the Iranians tomorrow? Just the Israelis alone? I don't think that is possible." Prince Turki, Mr. Clemons and palace insiders say, had lobbied Washington for a broader policy that eschews a military confrontation in favor of a policy that will strike Iran's interests. In effect, Mr. Clemons said, Prince Turki had sought a plan mirroring some of the recommendations in the Iraq Study Group report but with a harder edge.

"Turki is not playing nice guy at all," he said. "Essentially, the Saudis are engagers. They want to weave together a blurry ambiguity to what they want to do."

A member of the Saudi royal family with knowledge of the discussions between Mr. Cheney and King Abdullah said the king had presented Mr. Cheney with a plan to raise oil production to force down the price, in hopes of causing economic turmoil for Iran without becoming directly involved in a confrontation.

Shortly afterward, Mr. Obaid's op-ed article was published, building on earlier public comments that Saudi Arabia intends to get serious about Iran and may back Sunnis in Iraq in the event of an abrupt United States pullout. Neither Prince Bandar nor Prince Turki was available for comment for this article. An adviser to Prince Bandar said there were no divisions over policy, and many officials have been at pains in recent days to prove there is no split.

Many Saudis have grown openly critical of the country's policy on Iraq, citing its adherence to an American-centric policy at the cost of Saudi interests. More pessimistic analysts here say the country has lost significant strength and stature in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian areas, while Iran, with its populist, anti-American agenda, has benefited.

"The Saudis made a big mistake by following the Americans when they had no plan," said Khalid al-Dakhil, a professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh. "If the Saudis had intervened earlier and helped the Sunnis they could have found a political solution to their differences, instead of the bloodshed we are seeing today."

Last week, a group of prominent Saudi clerics and university professors called on the government to begin actively backing Iraq's Sunnis. The clerics described what they called a Persian-Jewish partnership besieging the Sunnis.

"There is a segment in this country that will do everything the U.S. wants," said Turki al-Rasheed, who runs a group that seeks to encourage democracy in the Persian Gulf. "But fortunately the big leaders know this whole agenda will take us to hell."

Bush OKs Law Blocking Aid To Hamas Gov't (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush signed into law a bill meant to block U.S. aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government and ban contacts with Hamas until the militant faction has renounced violence and recognized Israel's existence.

It also creates a $20 million fund to promote democracy, human rights, freedom of the press and peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Bush administration stopped aid shortly after the January election victory by Hamas, which Washington considers an international terror organization. The bill Bush signed puts into law what already was administration policy.

Republican Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., sponsor of the Senate bill with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said the legislation makes clear the Palestinian Authority can expect no U.S. help so long as it continues to be led by Hamas.

"The Palestinian people are ill-served by a Hamas-led government that refuses to work toward the betterment of its citizens by failing to renounce terror and work toward peace with Israel," McConnell said.

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., ranking member on the House International Relations Committee after Congress reconvenes Jan. 4, said she was pleased the president signed the bill she sponsored in the House.

"By fixing his hand to this legislation today, President Bush has indicated that the U.S. will not, directly or indirectly, allow American taxpayer funds to be used to perpetuate the leadership of an Islamist jihadist entity like Hamas," she said.

The White House said the legislation Bush signed reflects the administration's concern over the current government's failure to renounce violence and terror, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements and obligations. Exceptions are made to provide financial support for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who has committed to a negotiated two-state solution with Israel.

Despite the ban on official aid, the United States has provided $468 million in humanitarian aid, delivered by non-governmental organizations and in other ways that bypass the Hamas government.

Gunbattles Rage Between Hamas And Fatah (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108523

A fierce gunbattle broke out between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza City early Friday, underscoring the fragility of a two-day old truce that had largely ended factional violence there.

The street battle erupted when Hamas militiamen tried to free two kidnapped militants, including a senior member of the Islamic group. It died down after 20 minutes as Muslim clerics and other mediators worked to restore the cease-fire. Nobody was hurt despite the battle's intensity, health officials said.

Hamas said its fighters exchanged fire with Fatah-affiliated militants behind the abductions. The fight quickly spread, drawing in guards outside the residence of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and Hamas militiamen guarding the home of Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas Zahar. Abbas was not in Gaza at the time.

Meanwhile, Palestinians stepped up rocket attacks on Israel, including one that veered off course and hit a Gaza home, injuring a 2-year-old Palestinian boy sleeping in his bedroom, officials aid.

Six other rockets landed in Israel, but nobody was hurt. The barrage threatened a separate cease-fire between Israel and the Palestinians that ended months of Israeli military activity in the Gaza strip.

A minister in Olmert's Cabinet said it was time to call off the cease-fire.

"Enough restraint," Binyamin Ben-Eliezer told Israel Radio. "Israel is many things, but a suicidal state isn't one of them."

A week of factional violence in Gaza has killed 16 people and left dozens injured across Gaza before the truce took effect Tuesday night.

Hamas blamed the Thursday night kidnappings on a clan affiliated with Fatah that was trying to avenge the deaths of two its members in an earlier round of fighting.

In Friday's battle, gunmen on rooftops fired at others in the streets. The presidential guard took up defensive positions behind newly built walls of sandbags and barriers of cement blocs outside Abbas' residence.

Hamas officials said the Fatah gunmen shot at Zahar's home.

One witness said several rocket-propelled grenades were also launched. Residents said they put their children in bath tubs for protection against stray bullets. Others tucked themselves in corners for safety.

The militant group Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for some of the rockets that landed in Israel, including one that hit a community center the southern town of Sderot. The army said the rocket caused some damage but nobody was hurt.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack that struck the Gaza home. In the past, similar cases of Palestinians being hurt by Palestinian rockets have led to backlashes against militant groups, whose attacks against Israel are generally supported by the public.

The boy, Samir al-Masri, suffered two broken legs, said Dr. Said Judeh of Kamal Adwan hospital. The boy's 4-year-old sister and 3-year-old brother were lightly wounded by shrapnel, said their uncle, Jad al-Masri.

Abbas, a moderate, has repeatedly called for an end to rocket fire, saying they only invite harsh Israeli retaliation.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah, Abbas said he hoped to hold a long-awaited summit with Olmert by the end of the year.

"We always showed our willingness to hold this meeting with Olmert, and it's no secret that we hope it will take place before the end of this year," Abbas said at a news conference with the visiting Italian foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema. "There is progress in preparations for this meeting."

The two leaders have repeatedly expressed readiness to meet for what would be their first summit. But preparations have bogged down amid disagreements over the agenda.

Abbas wants Israel to promise to release hundreds of Palestinian prisoners. Olmert has ruled out a prisoner release until Hamas-linked militants free an Israeli soldier they captured last June. Olmert's spokesman, Jacob Galanti, said he was not aware of firm plans for a meeting.

Gaza Breathes A Sigh Of Relief As Ceasefire Holds (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, December 22, 2006

The embattled Gaza Strip breathed a sigh of relief as a truce between rival Palestinian factions took hold and president Mahmud Abbas urged all sides to consolidate the ceasefire.

DOJ_NMG_0108524

No clashes between Abbas's Fatah party and the ruling Hamas movement have been reported since early Wednesday, when a four-hour gunbattle in southern Gaza City killed two Fatah loyalists hours after a new truce went into effect.

Abbas urged the rival factions to respect the truce again on Thursday, following a similar call the night before.

"I call upon my people to show responsibility and work to consolidate the calm in the Gaza Strip," he told a news conference in Ramallah. "I'm convinced that everybody wants security and civil peace."

Hundreds of people, waving the Palestinian standard, gathered in front of the parliament building in Gaza to call on the rivals to respect the truce and restart talks on forming a coalition government.

"O Hamas, O Haniya, we want a government of national unity immediately," they chanted. "Enough with the battles, we want to live in security."

Abbas's call for early elections on Saturday was roundly condemned by Hamas as tantamount to a coup and sparked four days of fierce factional battles.

On Thursday, a militant died of wounds received during the fighting, bringing the toll from the clashes to 14. Dozens were also wounded.

But Abbas reiterated that despite his call for the early polls, he was still open to forming a coalition government with Hamas.

His spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina told AFP, however, that no preparations have been made for a new round of talks.

A Hamas spokesman told AFP that the ruling Islamists were also favorable to dialogue and that prime minister Ismail Haniya was ready to meet with Abbas in Jordan, as suggested earlier in the week by King Abdullah II.

"We have not received an official invitation. If such an invitation is sent to us, we will accept," he said.

The latest truce announced by Abbas and Haniya late Tuesday -- after a previous ceasefire between the factions held barely for 24 hours -- came after the Palestinian president spoke by phone with Abdullah, who offered to host a meeting between the two rival leaders.

Abbas, who said he was prepared to "respond favorably" to the invitation, was due to travel to Jordan on Sunday.

The Palestinian president announced his intention to call early polls as a way to resolve a months-long standoff with the ruling Islamists after talks over forming a national unity government collapsed over Hamas's refusal to bend to the West's demands to renounce violence, recognize Israel and past peace deals.

Haniya's government has been boycotted by Israel and the West since it took office in March after a shock election win over Abbas's long-dominant Fatah, plunging the Palestinian territories into their worst ever financial crisis.

Also Thursday, Abbas said that he hoped to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert before the end of the year. It would be the first meeting between the two leaders in six months.

"Discussions on preparing for the encounter continue and we hope that it will take place before the end of the year," Abbas said.

On a visit to the region on Monday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair called for an initiative to jumpstart the Middle East peace process, in a slumber since 2000.

The following day, Olmert paid a surprise visit to Jordan, whose King Abdullah II has recently issued calls on the necessity to revive talks between Israelis and Palestinians.

Olmert touched on the issue during a phone call with US President George W. Bush on Thursday, his office said.

"The prime minister spoke to the American president on the recent developments on the Israeli-Palestinian track and on the ways to move forward," it said.

U.S. Readies Security Aid Package To Help Lebanon Counter Hezbollah (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

The United States is preparing a package of almost $500 million in aid for Lebanon's military and police to help strengthen security forces, part of almost $1 billion in total U.S. assistance to help the beleaguered Lebanese government, according to U.S. officials.

DOJ_NMG_0108525

The package is part of an effort by the United States, France, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and others to shore up the Lebanese security forces so they can eventually extend their control over the entire country for the first time since civil war erupted there in 1975. It is also designed to strengthen the government's hand over the influence of Hezbollah, Lebanon's last militia and a force often better-equipped than the country's army, the sources said.

After Iraq, Lebanon has become the primary battleground for influence between the United States and Iran.

Tehran is still smuggling arms into Lebanon across the Syrian border in violation of U.N. resolutions, although the shipments to its Hezbollah allies appear to have diminished somewhat since before the war with Israel last summer, U.S. officials say.

The U.S. aid package is being prepared even as a new report by the International Crisis Group, set to be released today, warns that the Middle Eastern country is at risk of "renewed collapse" unless domestic and international players work to achieve political compromise.

"Street politics have replaced institutional politics," said ICG analyst Patrick Haenni. "Civil war remains unlikely. But with heightened polarization, intensified [religious divisions] and heavy outside interference, it is again becoming thinkable."

Although U.S. officials say the final details have to be worked out, the aid package is likely to be divided about evenly among training, spare parts and ammunition. The leadership training will probably be done by contract workers rather than by the U.S. military. U.S. Army trainers attempted to retrain and reform the Lebanese Army in the early 1980s, but they achieved limited results because of sectarian divisions and other problems in the military.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told editors and reporters at The Washington Post last week that strengthening the Lebanese armed forces is a major priority of the United States and the region's "mainstream" Arabs. Stability, particularly along the southern border with Israel, has been dependent on about 15,000 U.N. peacekeeping forces, most of whom were deployed after the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"Ultimately . . . one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces not -- I think probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform," Rice told The Post. "Everybody understands that the future of Lebanon is very important."

Rice said the package will require further consultations with Congress to win funding. The other half of the $1 billion is likely to be for reconstruction through USAID as well as debt relief, U.S. officials said.

The aid increase is one of the largest outside Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years. Until this year, U.S. aid for Lebanese security forces hovered around $2 million to $3 million a year, and training has been limited to 60 to 100 military officers, U.S. officials say. This year, it has increased to roughly $44 million.

The train-and-equip package includes about 300 Humvees that the United States has pledged to deliver by the spring, with up to another 700 Humvees coming during the year, the sources said.

U.S. Negotiator Urges North Korea To End Standoff On Financial Curbs (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 21 — The top American envoy at arms control talks here on Thursday called for North Korea to negotiate the dismantling of its nuclear weapons program without insisting that the United States first lift financial restrictions it had placed on North Korea.

The envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, said North Korea's determination to link nuclear disarmament with the financial restrictions was an obstacle to solving what had become a "very urgent problem" since North Korea tested a nuclear device on Oct. 9.

"We have made it very clear that we consider the financial issue quite separately from the denuclearization issue," Mr. Hill said. "I would rather not obscure that problem by talking about finances."

After four days of six-nation talks in the Chinese capital, it was clear that North Korea's top priority was to restore its access to the international banking system.

DOJ_NMG_0108526

The United States angered North Korea in September 2005 when it began investigating Banco Delta Asia, a bank in the Chinese territory of Macao that handled transactions with North Korean government companies and other entities linked to it.

The investigation has sharply curtailed North Korea's access to the international financial system because other banks have cut ties with North Korea rather than risk becoming the target of similar action.

Some foreigners doing business in North Korea say the inquiry has effectively imposed financial sanctions on the country, limiting its ability to trade and earn hard currency.

"They have had strict instructions from their capital that they can't engage officially on the subject of six-party talks until they have the Banco Delta Asia issue resolved," Mr. Hill said. "I have made it very clear, I am not a Banco Delta Asia negotiator."

Kenichiro Sasae, Japan's chief envoy to the talks, said North Korea's refusal to disarm before the United States lifted the financial restrictions meant that no agreement on dismantling the weapons program was expected, The Associated Press reported.

"The situation remains severe, and there is no prospect for a breakthrough," he said. "North Korea's claims, and its position on financial issues are very firm, and that is the biggest cause of the difficulty."

Mr. Hill said that he expected Friday to be the final day of the talks and that he planned to leave Beijing on Saturday. He said no date had been set for further negotiations.

North Korea restarted the talks only when the United States agreed in October to open separate negotiations into the Banco Delta Asia investigation. Alongside the six-nation talks this week, government financial experts from North Korea and the United States held two days of discussions on the Macao bank without reaching any agreement.

N. Korea Balks At Weapons Discussion (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 21 -- North Korea is refusing to engage in negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program until the United States lifts punitive measures imposed to halt Pyongyang's alleged money-laundering operations, the chief U.S. negotiator said here Thursday.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, after what he described as a frustrating day of discussions, said he would give the Chinese-sponsored talks another day in hopes that the North Korean negotiators received last-minute instructions from Pyongyang to change their stand. But in any case, he said, he will be making plane reservations to head back to Washington on Saturday.

Hill's comments indicated there has been little progress -- and little hope of any -- in the latest round of on-and-off discussions designed to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in return for diplomatic recognition and economic aid. Adding to the pessimism, Japan's chief negotiator, Kenichiro Sasae, described the talks as stalemated and said, "There is no prospect for a breakthrough," the Associated Press reported.

The six-party talks -- which involve the United States, North Korea, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia -- resumed Monday after a 13-month boycott by North Korea over the U.S. Treasury Department's blacklisting of Macau-based Banco Delta Asia. U.S. officials alleged that the bank was being used to inject counterfeit $100 bills and drug money from North Korea into the financial system.

Under pressure from China, the North Korean government agreed Oct. 30 to return to the talks. In return, the United States agreed to parallel discussions on the punitive measures against Banco Delta Asia and its North Korean account holders. A Treasury Department team met Tuesday and Wednesday with North Korean banking officials and set more meetings for January in the United States.

But since the nuclear talks opened Monday, Hill said, North Korean negotiators have been under "strict instructions" not to engage in official discussions on the nuclear dispute until the banking measures are lifted. This has prevented progress on the main subject, which he described as concrete steps by North Korea to take down its nuclear weapons program, as it pledged to do in an agreement in principle reached in September 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0108527

"The purpose of being here was to discuss the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula," Hill said. "I want to emphasize I'm not here to talk about [Banco Delta Asia]. That's not what I do."

At a news conference in Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the talks must remain focused on the issue of denuclearization.

"Diplomacy sometimes takes time, but we should not be diverted somehow by an issue that is clearly in another lane and is clearly being dealt with in a way that the North Koreans themselves asked that it be dealt with," Rice said.

Although the North Koreans have cited the U.S. banking measures as the main obstacle to nuclear negotiations, several diplomats said the overriding issue is whether North Korea genuinely has decided to forgo nuclear weapons. The question is particularly relevant, they said, since the North Korean government tested a nuclear device Oct. 9 and subsequently declared itself a nuclear power.

In public statements, North Korea has said it needs the nuclear weapons because it faces a hostile policy from the United States. Dropping the measures against Banco Delta Asia, a pro-North Korean newspaper in Japan suggested Thursday, would be proof that the Bush administration is willing to end the hostility and thus would make nuclear negotiations possible.

Rice Rejects Tying Nuclear Talks To Currency Issue (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Pyongyang wants curbs lifted on its accounts in Macau bank

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday rejected a North Korean attempt at the six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing to link the negotiations to U.S. financial sanctions imposed last year for purported money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

With the latest round of talks slated to end today, the North Korean delegation said it would not negotiate the nuclear issue until curbs on a Macau bank holding North Korean accounts are lifted, diplomats said.

"We've been very clear that these are two separate issues," Miss Rice told reporters in Washington after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter Mackey.

"We cannot be diverted from what we need to do in the six-party talks, which is to have the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula," she said.

U.S. Treasury officials met Tuesday and Wednesday with North Korean representatives to discuss the financial sanctions, also in Beijing, but in a different building from the venue of the nuclear talks.

Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator at the six-party talks, said he planned to leave China on schedule tomorrow, even if the talks remain deadlocked.

"We are trying as hard as we can to get this done," he said. "But we are not prepared for a situation where somehow we pretend that they are doing things and they pretend to disarm and we pretend to believe them. This has to be real."

The penalties on Macau's Banco Delta Asia (BDA), which the Bush administration called a "willing pawn" in the North's illicit activities, were put in place in September 2005.

U.S. officials say the bank was used by North Korea to distribute high-quality $100 bills it printed.

"They have had strict instructions from their capital that they cannot engage officially on the subject of six-party talks until they have the BDA issue resolved, and I made very clear, I'm not a BDA negotiator," Mr. Hill said of the North Koreans.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States could not close its eyes to its currency being counterfeited, as well as to other illicit activities, even if that might help the nuclear negotiations. The two issues should not be mixed, he said.

The United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia are trying to persuade the North to dismantle its nuclear programs.

In a Sept. 19, 2005, statement issued at the last round of six-party talks, Pyongyang agreed in principle to end its nuclear pursuits in exchange for a series of incentives, including energy, economic aid, security guarantees and normalized relations with the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0108528

But major disagreements remained on the timing and sequencing of the steps.

On Tuesday, Miss Rice said the United States favors a Chinese plan with "sets of actions" both sides must take over a period of at least several months.

The plan would not "marry up every little step," because "the North Koreans are masters" of blaming others for what they fail to do, Miss Rice said. The North Koreans would have to "demonstrate early on" that they are serious about dismantling their nuclear program.

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for Asian and Pacific affairs, said yesterday he was not ready to set a date for a future round of negotiations, but he held out a glimmer of hope that a last-minute deal could be brokered.

"These rounds — you have to judge them by the end," he said. "It's hard to judge them in the middle."

U.S.: N. Korea Not Serious In Nuke Talks (AP)

By Alexa Olesen

AP, December 22, 2006

The U.S. envoy to talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program said Friday that there were no signs of a breakthrough and accused the communist state of not being serious about the negotiations.

Asked if there were any indications of a breakthrough ahead of the last day of talks Friday, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said, "No, I am not aware of any."

After four days of negotiations in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, the North has refused to get into substantive discussions on its atomic weapons, envoys said. Instead, the North has complained about the U.S. blacklisting a Macau bank, where the regime allegedly laundered money to help fund its weapons programs.

"When the DPRK raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want but they know they can't have, another day it's something we said about them that hurt their feelings," Hill said. DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

"What they need to do is to get serious about the issue that made them such a problem ... their nuclear activities," he said.

Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae delivered a similar assessment late Thursday. "The situation remains severe and there is no prospect for a breakthrough," he said. "North Korea's claims and its position on financial issues are very firm and inflexible and that is the biggest cause of the difficulty."

Sasae said Friday that delegates at the closing meeting would would consider dropping the current format involving six countries.

"There will be opinions questioning the credibility of the six-party talks," Sasae said, without elaborating. He did not say what alternative formats would be proposed, if any.

In comments Thursday, Hill said the financial restrictions were a defense against weapons proliferation, warning Pyongyang would find itself further economically isolated if it doesn't disarm.

He said that the North Korean delegation had apparently been instructed to resolve the financial issue before talking about nuclear weapons.

While insisting the financial restrictions were separate from the six-nation arms talks, he acknowledged they were a means to defend against nuclear proliferation.

"We need to protect ourselves in a variety of different ways and we need to make sure that the international financial system is not easily available to countries that are involved in nuclear weapons programs," Hill said Thursday evening.

"There's one thing that anyone involved in denuclearization can predict, that as long as (the North Koreans) stay in this nuclear business, they're going to have more and more and more financial problems," he said.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said North Korea had given the United States no reason to believe it is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in the disarmament talks, she said in an Associated Press interview Thursday.

American and North Korean experts consulted on the financial restrictions for two days this week in Beijing separately from the nuclear talks, but made no breakthroughs and were possibly meeting again next month in New York.

Hill noted he had traveled five times to Beijing since the nuclear test to lay the groundwork for this week's negotiations, which he has said should focus on implementing a September 2005 disarmament pledge by North Korea.

"I would like to see them engage a little more in what we are talking about," he said of the North Koreans. "We've done a lot of work in the last few weeks and we'd like to see the (North Korean) delegation match that amount of work and show they're looking at the proposals."

Hill would not talk about specific incentives the U.S. has offered the North at this week's talks which include China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas but the earlier agreement outlines possibilities such as diplomatic recognition, aid and economic cooperation.

The North has maintained it needs nuclear weapons because of the "hostile" policy of the United States, citing issues including the financial campaign, criticism of North Korea's human rights record and U.S.-South Korean joint military exercises.

Meanwhile, a South Korean lawmaker said Thursday there were signs North Korea could conduct another nuclear test.

Rep. Chung Hyung-keun of the main opposition Grand National Party, a former intelligence official, said North Korea dug two underground tunnels at a mountain in the country's northeast and used one of them for its earlier nuclear test.

"There has been brisk activity since this month" at the other tunnel, he said.

NKorean Nuclear Talks Set To End In Deadlock (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear program have appeared set to end in deadlock, with the chief US envoy accusing the reclusive nation of stubbornly sticking to impossible demands.

Officials and delegates involved in the talks said they had broken down over North Korea's insistence that US financial sanctions against it be lifted before substantive discussions begin on Pyongyang giving up its nuclear arms.

But the United States refused to buckle, maintaining that the sanctions, which were imposed for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting, were a law enforcement issue and not related to North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice reiterated in Washington Thursday that the sanctions -- which led to the freezing of North Korean funds in a Macau bank -- were "clearly in another lane" to the six-party talks.

"We cannot be diverted from what we need to do in the six-party talks, which is to have the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," Rice said. The talks involve China, North and South Korea, the United States, Japan and Russia.

The chief US envoy to the talks, Christopher Hill, said in Beijing on Friday that the onus was on North Korea to make some constructive proposals after the United States had put forward its positions earlier in the week.

"I think what they need to do is get serious about the issues that have made them such problems," Hill told reporters.

When asked about the difficulty of dealing with the North Korean delegation this week, the normally ultra-polished diplomat allowed some frustration to seep into his remarks.

"When the DPRK (North Korea) raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want that they know they can not have, and another day it's something that is said about them that hurts their feelings," he said.

"It's one thing after the other."

Hill said he was scheduled to fly home on Saturday, and with the talks officially due to end on Friday, it appeared certain that this week's forum would achieve very little.

Japan's chief envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, said late Thursday that "no progress" had been achieved due to North Korea's recalcitrance.

"Basically, North Korea has maintained its hard position... we are not seeing any signs of flexibility," Sasae told reporters.

Sasae called North Korea's refusal to budge on its demands "extremely regrettable and unfortunate."

North Korea came to the negotiating table this week emboldened by its first-ever atomic test on October 9.

Aside from the US financial sanctions issue, it listed a wide range of demands that had to be met before it would consider disarming.

These included the lifting of separate United Nations sanctions imposed on North Korea after its atomic test, as well as aid to build a nuclear reactor for power and that the United States drop its "hostile" policy against it.

DOJ_NMG_0108530

The United States had insisted that North Korea take initial steps to prove it was heading along the path towards disarming before receiving any concessions.

All of these negotiations, however, were thrown into the background as North Korea kept the focus on the US financial sanctions.

Nam Sung-Wook, a North Korea expert and professor at Korea University in Seoul, said Friday the talks had been bound to fail from the start.

"North Korea has been only interested in the lifting of sanctions while the US expected to discuss the nuclear issue," Nam said.

"They have had different dreams on the same bed... it was a destined course. It was no surprise."

'Concerted Front' (WSJ)

By B.R. Myers

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

No country today is as misunderstood as North Korea. Journalists still refer to it as a Stalinist or communist state, when in fact it espouses a race-based nationalism such as the West last confronted during the Pacific War. Pyongyang's propaganda touts the moral superiority of the Korean race, condemns South Korea for allowing miscegenation, and stresses the need to defend the Dear Leader with kyeolsa, or dare-to-die spirit -- the Korean version of the Japanese kamikaze slogan kesshi. The six-party talks are therefore less likely to replicate the successes of Cold War détente than the negotiating failures of the 1930s. According to early reports from Beijing, the North Korean delegation appears more confident than ever. It has clearly been emboldened not only by its accession to the nuclear club, but by the awareness that Seoul will continue providing food and financial support no matter what happens.

This support is not meant to expedite unification, which South Koreans are happy to put off indefinitely. Nor has it much to do with concern for starving children; by now everyone knows where the "humanitarian" aid really goes. No, the desire to help North Korea derives in large part from ideological common ground. South Koreans may chuckle at the personality cult, but they generally agree with Pyongyang that Koreans are a pure-blooded race whose innate goodness has made them the perennial victims of rapacious foreign powers. They share the same tendency to regard Koreans as innocent children on the world stage -- and to ascribe evil to foreigners alone. Though the North expresses itself more stridently on such matters, there is no clear ideological divide such as the one that separated West and East Germany. Bonn held its nose when conducting Ostpolitik. Seoul pursues its sunshine policy with respect for Pyongyang.

The relationship between the Koreas can therefore be likened to the relationship between a moderate Muslim state such as Turkey and a fundamentalist one like Iran. The South Koreans have compromised their nationalist principles in a quest for wealth and modernity, and while they're glad they did, they feel a nagging sense of moral inferiority to their more orthodox brethren. They often disapprove of the North's actions, but never with indignation, and always with an effort to blame the outside world for having provoked them. (The same is true of moderate Islam's response to fundamentalist terrorism.) To be sure, there was public anger at Kim Jong Il when his nuclear test made stock prices drop in Seoul, but it dissipated the moment the U.S. began talking sanctions. Seoul has since made clear that the nuclear issue will have no significant effect on its sunshine policy. This earns it no goodwill from the North, mind; between soft-liners and hard-liners, sympathy can only go in one direction.

The ideological landscape of the peninsula defeats the reasoning that led to the six-party talks in the first place. North Korea is not a communist country with ideological and sentimental reasons to listen to China and Russia; it is a virulently nationalist state that distrusts all the other parties at the table. And though the rhetoric of a "concerted front" against North Korea has proved to be just that, it has sufficed to heighten South Korea's sense of solidarity with the North. This will continue to mean plenty of aid money for Kim Jong Il with which to build weapons. The U.S. has urged Beijing to bring more pressure to bear on the North. But if America can do nothing with its own ally, it can hardly expect the Chinese to do more with theirs.

Tensions Flare Over Custody In Rape Case In Philippines (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0108531

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The commander of American forces in the Pacific announced Thursday that he had canceled a huge annual military exercise with the Philippines in a dispute over custody of a marine lance corporal convicted of raping a local woman.

The commander, Adm. William J. Fallon, said he also would halt aid and reconstruction programs carried out by the American military in the Philippines until he was confident that the troops' legal rights would be protected under bilateral agreements governing visiting United States forces.

The bilateral pact that governs American forces in the Philippines, the Visiting Forces Agreement, requires that American military personnel be held in American custody during criminal proceedings, including appeals, until a final resolution of the matter.

But after Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was convicted of rape and sentenced early this month, a judge ordered him held in local police custody even though his case went straight to appeal.

The rape case, which concluded Dec. 4 with a conviction and a sentence of 40 years in prison, has tested relations between the countries and challenged the validity of the bilateral agreement. It also has sharpened a political division between Filipinos with nationalist resentments and those with affection for the former colonial power — or at least those who cite the economic and security benefits of ties to the United States.

In a telephone interview from Pacific Command headquarters in Hawaii, Admiral Fallon said that he already had ordered the withdrawal of an aid team in the Philippines that was assessing needs of a typhoon-ravaged area. He said that he also had canceled a number of visits by American ships.

American military officers said the Philippines armed forces supported the legal position of the United States, and the political officer at the Philippine Embassy in Washington agreed Thursday that the United States' position was correct.

"Regarding the Corporal Smith case, the United States government and the executive branch of the Philippines government are on the same side of this issue," said Patricia Paez, the embassy's political officer here. "We believe Corporal Smith should be in the custody of the U.S. Embassy because of the terms and conditions of the Visiting Forces Agreement."

Ms. Paez said that responsibility for the dispute rested with the judicial branch of her government, and that her nation's president and Parliament were constrained on ending the dispute.

"Just like the United States, we have a separation of branches of government that are co-equal and independent," Ms. Paez said. "We are making our best efforts to make sure the provisions of the Visiting Forces Agreement are enforced."

In a decision with repercussions for regional counterterrorism efforts, Admiral Fallon said he had canceled the field exercise portions of this year's bilateral military exercise, which was to begin in coming weeks and was to involve 4,700 American military personnel and 3,000 from the Philippines.

The annual exercise has taken on greater significance since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as the Philippines battles internal terrorist threats.

"I'm not the judge of the guilt or innocence of the individual," Admiral Fallon said. "The issue is only one of custody. I am responsible to our people in uniform. I have to have guarantees that I can trust their safety to an international agreement."

The cancellation of the exercise and other American military visits to the Philippines jeopardizes disease-prevention programs, water-purification efforts, and more broadly, counterterrorism cooperation between the nations.

The rape case dates from Nov. 1, 2005, when, according to testimony at the trial, four marines from Okinawa who were in the Philippines for training took a 22-year-old woman from a bar where they had met to a van, where one of them raped her.

During the trial, Lance Corporal Smith did not deny having sex with the woman, but said it was consensual. The court heard testimony that the woman was so drunk that she could not have agreed to sex, with one witness saying Lance Corporal Smith had carried her to the van.

Indian Leader Frets About U.S. Nuke Deal (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108532

India's prime minister told President Bush on Thursday that his country is worried about details of a landmark nuclear pact with the United States, under which the U.S. agreed to supply the Indian power industry with fuel and technology.

Bush signed legislation Monday approving the deal, which reverses 30 years of U.S. atomic policy.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told President Bush in a phone call that India has "some concerns" about the nuclear pact, according to a statement by Singh's office.

The Indian government has not elaborated on its concerns, but Congress included a nonbinding clause in the new law directing the White House to certify that India is cooperating in efforts to force Iran to abandon its nuclear programs.

The clause has been criticized by Singh's leftist allies and opposition parties, who claim it violates India's sovereignty. They warn it could lead to efforts to cap, or even roll back, India's cherished nuclear weapons program.

The nuclear deal has been praised as the cornerstone of an emerging partnership between India and the U.S., and is unlikely to be rejected by New Delhi.

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said Bush and Singh "agreed on the importance of completing the necessary remaining steps" and implementing the agreement.

But the alarm in India over the language in the pact regarding Iran shows, perhaps, how far the countries have to go as they try to overcome decades of mistrust.

Singh, in his statement, added that "many" of India's concerns have already been addressed in the president's signing statement.

The White House has frequently blunted the impact of unwelcome provisions in federal legislation by issuing so-called signing statements.

In them, the president has laid out which parts of laws he has just signed he will follow and which he will not. The use of these statements, greatly increased during the Bush presidency, has been criticized by members of Congress.

During Thursday's phone call, which lasted about five minutes, the two leaders "expressed the hope that remaining concerns will be addressed in the next stage of negotiations" on the nuclear cooperation deal, the statement from Singh's office said.

Earlier this week, Singh told parliament that his government would do nothing that violates national interest.

As Fighting Rages In Somalia, Government Claims A Victory (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

ZANZIBAR, Tanzania, Dec. 21 — The transitional government of Somalia, which for several months had been rapidly losing territory to Somalia's growing Islamist movement, claimed victory on Thursday in the first major confrontation between the sides.

"We have overrun their troops," said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed.

United Nations officials confirmed heavy Islamist casualties in the fighting, which began Wednesday and continued Thursday.

The Islamist fighters — many of them lightly armed teenage boys, the officials said — were mowed down by transitional government soldiers backed by the Ethiopian Army, the most powerful military in the region.

"The Islamists attacked, they retreated and then they made the mistake of running into an open field," a United Nations official said on the condition of anonymity. "After that, it was one shot, one kill."

United Nations officials estimated that dozens of Islamists had died. The Islamists denied suffering humiliating defeats. On Thursday, the Islamist clerics who rule Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, ordered schools closed so more children could be sent to the front lines.

After initially playing down the fighting, Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the leader of the Islamist forces, announced Thursday over national radio that Somalia was at war and said, "All Somalis should take part in this struggle against Ethiopia."

DOJ_NMG_0108533

Ethiopia still denies that many of its soldiers are in Somalia, but has acknowledged sending military advisers. Ethiopia has cause to fear a strong Islamist movement next door. Christians have led Ethiopia for centuries, but about half of its population is Muslim, as are the vast majority of Somalis, and the Muslim areas have become more restive.

The fighting started early Wednesday as hundreds of Islamist fighters attacked the transitional government's forces from two sides.

Witnesses said the transitional government, with help from Ethiopia, had repelled the Islamist advance in Daynunay, a town outside the government's base in Baidoa. But in Diinsoor, near Baidoa, the battles were closely contested, and on Thursday, witnesses said each side continued to pound away with artillery, mortars and antiaircraft guns on pickup trucks.

Somalia has been in a state of anarchy since 1991, when the government collapsed in clan warfare. Backing the transitional government was an attempt by donor nations to help bring order, but more Somalis support the Islamists.

The two sides have talked of sharing power. European Union diplomats shuttled between Baidoa and Mogadishu on Wednesday. "The leaders on both sides want dialogue, but we're not necessarily dealing with homogenous groups that always obey their leaders," a European official said Thursday.

Somali Islamic Leader Issues War Decree (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, December 22, 2006

Somalia is in "a state of war," the country's Islamic leader said Thursday, as bodies lay in the streets of strategic villages where U.N.-backed government troops fought advancing Islamic forces.

The clashes threaten to spiral into a major conflict in this volatile region, sucking in Ethiopia and its bitter rival Eritrea, which is accused of supporting the Islamic group. Analysts believe Ethiopia may soon raise the stakes by deploying attack helicopters in support of the government.

An Associated Press photographer saw 19 bodies of Islamic fighters in Moode Moode, a town nine miles from the government garrison town of Baidoa, where fighting had taken place Wednesday.

Three Islamic fighters were captured. One, 25-year-old Aweys Hassan Ma'alim, said he had been forced to fight by the Islamic movement. Another, Adan Abdullahi Mohammed, said he wanted to fight Ethiopians and "die for the sake of Allah in jihad."

Meanwhile Sheikh Ibrahim Shukri Abuu-Zeynab, a spokesman for the Islamic courts, said they had now captured the town of Idale, 37 miles southwest of Baidoa, and killed 200 Ethiopian troops. The claim could not be verified.

"All Somalis should take part in this struggle against Ethiopia," Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, an Islamic leader, told The Associated Press.

Three days of clashes between the Islamic fighters and government forces, newly trained by Ethiopian troops, have left more than 100 people dead.

Ethiopia denies its forces are fighting, but says it has deployed several hundred military trainers in support of the transitional government.

On Wednesday, Aweys told an EU envoy that he was willing to return to peace talks with the U.N.-backed Somali government, but on Thursday, he said "the country is in a state of war."

In Ethiopia, the government said Wednesday that the Islamic group was warmongering and not interested in peace. "Ethiopia has exerted efforts as it will do so for the peaceful resolution of the problem in Somalia," the statement said.

EU envoy Louis Michel, in response to a question about Eritrea and Ethiopia's involvement, said, "Somalia is suffering because some are using Somalia as a battlefield for other issues." Both countries fought an unresolved border war in 1998.

Somalia's deputy defense minister Salad Ali Jelle told reporters that 71 Islamic fighters had been killed and 221 injured so far during clashes near Baidoa.

Three government troops were killed and seven injured, Jelle said.

Separately, witnesses in the town of Bur Haqaba, which is controlled by the Islamic movement, reported hearing mortars, anti-aircraft missiles and rocket-propelled grenades being fired Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0108534

After returning from Somalia late Wednesday, Michel said skirmishes were likely to continue, but said both sides had broadly agreed to ease tensions and hold new talks in Sudan.

The interim government holds only a small area around the central town of Baidoa. The Islamic militiamen control the capital, Mogadishu, but have also fanned out across most of southern Somalia.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991.

US Embassy Accuses Congolese Company Of Massive Aid Theft (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

The US embassy in Brazzaville accused a private Congolese company of stealing more than 5,800 tonnes of humanitarian aid worth more three million dollars with the help of a local magistrate.

The embassy accused import-export company Super-Market of having "illegally removed" the aid at the start of December from warehouses of a transit company in Pointe-Noire, the country's economic capital, according to a statement received by AFP.

The US aid mostly contained supplies for locals.

US ambassador Robert Wesiberg told journalists that Super-Market had acted in complicity with prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou, from Pointe-Noire in the southwest of Congo.

"It's him, the prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou, who authorized Super-Market to remove the humanitarian aid from the warehouses," Wesiberg said.

Ngoulou declined to comment on the accusation to AFP.

"We're asking the government to do everything to remove this aid from Super-Market, so that it can reach people following normal procedures," Wesiberg said, adding that so far all attempts to obtain help from ministries had been in vain.

The US ambassador on Wednesday boycotted a ceremony organized by the UN Development Programme during which an appeal for 28 million dollars' aid for Congo in 2007, sponsored by the US diplomat, was due to be launched.

"Ambassador Wesiberg considered it pointless to take part in launching the reinforced appeal due to the lack of resolution on the question of humanitarian aid illegally removed from Pointe-Noire port," the embassy said in a statement.

US NGO International Partnership for Human Development receives US humanitarian aid to Congo and selects a company to buy the products and sell them on at a low price to locals.

Eight Congolese companies put in tenders for the allegedly stolen goods, including Super-Market, but the company Sadi was chosen almost two months ago. The embassy said that Sadi never received the goods.

Turkmen Leader's Death Fuels Energy Fears (FT)

By Isabel Gorst

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

The sudden death on Thursday of Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmenistan's autocratic and eccentric president, has raised the threat of instability in a Central Asian republic that is an important energy supplier to Europe.

Niyazov, known as Turkmenbashi or Ruler of the Turkmens, left the former Soviet republic he ruled for more than 20 years impoverished, internationally isolated and with no obvious successor. He died of a cardiac arrest, Turkmen state television reported. He was 66.

His death is expected to spark both an internal power struggle and a tussle for influence between Russia, China and the US over a country with the world's fifth-largest gas reserves.

Any disruption to gas exports from Turkmenistan via Russia to Europe – mostly to Ukraine – could affect the continent's energy security. Analysts said, however, there were no immediate signs of unrest that could threaten supply.

Niyazov had himself appointed president for life by Turkmenistan's parliament in 1999. The oddball leader admitted this year to suffering from heart disease.

According to the republic's constitution, the parliament's speaker should have taken power. But he was blocked on Thursday as justice officials opened a criminal probe into him. A deputy prime minister was instead named acting president.

Several former and exiled Turkmen officials said they were considering returning to the country. But Nurmukhamad Khannamov, a former Turkmen ambassador to Israel who is now an opposition leader, warned it might be too dangerous.

Mr Khannamov said the opposition would call for democratic elections and an investigation into Niyazov's huge wealth.

"Niyazov had several foreign bank accounts and we will insist that the money is given back to the people," Mr Khannamov said.

A US embassy spokesman in Ashgabat, the capital, said the US hoped for "a peaceful, smooth constitutional succession".

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, said Moscow hoped that "continuity in our relations is ensured".

Niyazov, a former head of the Turkmen communist party, crushed or exiled opposition in the republic bordering Afghanistan, Iran and Uzbekistan, and left it with no free media.

Turkmens, most of whom live in poverty, were forbidden contact with the outside world.

The governors of Turkmenistan's five main provinces have all been sacked since a failed grain crop this autumn. Last year Niyazov sacked most of the top oil and gas officials accusing them of taking bribes from unnamed foreign companies.

Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmen Leader, Dies At 66 (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 21 — Saparmurat Niyazov, the authoritarian president of Turkmenistan, died unexpectedly today, the Turkmen government said, raising questions about succession and stability in a nation that is an essential supplier of energy to Europe.

Mr. Niyazov, who gave himself the name Turkmenbashi, or the Head of All Turkmen, had ruled his sparsely populated nation since becoming chairman of the Turkmen Communist Party in 1985, when the country was a Soviet republic.

He weathered the Soviet Union's collapse, becoming the president of independent Turkmenistan, pushing through a constitution that concentrated power in his hands and embarking upon a megalomaniacal career as president for life.

While other post-Soviet countries suffered disorder and, in some cases, revolutions or war, Mr. Niyazov lorded over Turkmenistan with a sprawling security apparatus and a fantastically well-developed personality cult. He was 66 and had suffered from heart disease, but never publicly anointed a successor.

Intrigue immediately followed his death. According to the Turkmen constitution, upon the death of a president, the chairman of the Majlis, the country's lower house of parliament, becomes the acting president.

But in Ashgabat, the Turkmen capital, power passed instead to a deputy prime minister, Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, and the state news agency announced that the prosecutor general had opened a criminal investigation against the Majlis chairman, Ovez Atayev.

The news agency also said that the People's Council, the upper house of parliament, would hold an emergency meeting on Tuesday. Under the constitution, the council selects presidential candidates who would stand in a special election in two months, according to Michael J. Denison, a professor at the University of Leeds who specializes in Turkmen politics.

Turkmenistan, located in Central Asia next to Iran, Afghanistan and the Caspian Sea, contains many of world's largest natural gas fields and provides gas to Russia and European countries.

Foreign governments and energy analysts expressed misgivings about the expected succession battles ahead, and what they might mean for stability and the intense international competition for the gas reserves.

Russia's foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, and Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, encouraged Turkmenistan at a joint appearance in Moscow to conduct a legal and orderly succession.

"We hope that the transfer of power will remain within the framework of the law," Mr. Lavrov said, according to Interfax.

Goldman Sachs sent a note to investors saying the abrupt political change "throws into question the country's political stability and control over its substantial natural gas exports."

It added that with Mr. Niyazov gone, the United States and perhaps the European Union might compete with Russia and push Turkmenistan to consider new export routes and weaken the position of Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas monopoly. Gazprom relies in part on Turkmen gas to meet commitments to its customers.

DOJ_NMG_0108536

There was no publicly clear front-runner to follow Mr. Niyazov's long reign, and speculation ranged from insiders of Mr. Niyazov's circle to exiled opposition leaders, at least two of whom said that they planned to return home.

Mr. Niyazov's son, Murat, was also a potential candidate, in part because in 2005 Mr. Niyazov arranged for the deletion of a line in the constitution requiring the president to be an ethnic Turkmen.

Mr. Niyazov was married to a Russian woman; their son is half Turkmen. The constitutional change allowed Murat Niyazov to qualify for the post, although it was not clear whether he had the support to overcome a reputation as a playboy with little backing from the country's five principal tribes.

Acting President Berdymukhammedov is related to Mr. Niyazov. But Mr. Denison said in an e-mail message that he is a relatively unknown political figure and "probably not a long-term successor."

One opposition figure, Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former chairman of Turkmenistan's central bank, said the appointment of Mr. Berdymukhammedov and the criminal charges against the Majlis chairman signaled that the country's security services were influencing events.

The security services, he said, successors to the K.G.B., played a large role in Mr. Niyazov's rule and would try to select a president of their choosing. "We've been afraid of this, because having lots of blood on their hands, they are a force that does not want democratic rule," he said by telephone from Sweden, where he lives in exile.

Inside Turkmenistan, a country largely closed to Westerners, there were signs of official mourning.

Holiday decorations were removed from the streets of the capital. State television showed a portrait of Mr. Niyazov against the sounds of the funeral march from Chopin's Piano Sonata No. 2, according to a resident of Ashgabat reached by telephone.

Such somber pomp was hardly universal, and critics of Mr. Niyazov recalled a dictator who created an almost otherworldly totalitarian state.

Mr. Niyazov forbade independent news media and opposition parties, jailed rivals or drove them to exile, and imposed his name, words and image on all manner of public discourse and life. His face appears on Turkmen currency. His name, given to streets and buildings, is in such abundant local use that it replaced the word January on the official Turkmen calendar.

His pronouncements, many of them disconnected from the normal affairs of state, were sometimes strange enough to assume an irreverent life on the Internet. He banned video games, gold teeth, opera and ballet, and once encouraged his people to chew on bones — good, he said, for their teeth.

It was the sort of declaration that made him the most bizarre dictator in a region dominated by autocrats, but was also a small part of his political canon. The Ruhnama, his semi-autobiographical book of philosophy, poems and instructions for moral living, is required reading in colleges and schools, and is displayed throughout the country, including in mosques.

In Prague, Yovshan Annagurban of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty's Turkmen Service said it was difficult to predict what course Turkmenistan would take now, after suffering decades of repression that reach back to the Soviet Union and became even stranger in Mr. Niyazov's time.

"The problem is he destroyed everything," he said. "He corrupted everything and everyone around him. People at the top as well as ordinary people do not trust anyone and everyone."

Turkmenistan Leader's Death May Spur Struggle (WSJ)

By Guy Chazan And Alan Cullison

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW -- The death of the reclusive dictator of Turkmenistan could spark a fierce struggle between Russia and the West for influence over a country with the world's fifth-largest natural-gas reserves.

Under Saparmurat Niyazov, who died at age 66, Turkmenistan was largely a political and economic pariah, engaged only by Russia and, more recently, China. But his death could revive Western interest in the nation's huge natural resources, especially now amid growing jitters about energy security.

"This could unlock Turkmenistan's potential as an energy supplier," said Christof Van Agt, a Central Asian expert at the International Energy Agency in Paris. "You're going to have a lot more attention focused on its role in Caspian energy."

DOJ_NMG_0108537

Russia will probably have the edge in any "Great Game"-style jockeying for influence over Turkmenistan. President Vladimir Putin has long nurtured close ties to the Turkmen leadership, and in September Russia's natural-gas monopoly OAO Gazprom concluded a deal with Mr. Niyazov that essentially locked up exports of Turkmen natural gas for three years.

But some analysts say a new leader might try to renegotiate natural-gas export prices or seek alternatives to Gazprom, whose imports of Turkmen gas help the company meet domestic needs and its obligations to foreign customers like Ukraine. Any change could tighten supplies in Russia and affect European consumers.

The death of Mr. Niyazov, who had a history of heart disease, could also revitalize Western-backed efforts to open up new transport routes for Central Asian gas. The U.S. has pushed a plan for a pipeline under the Caspian Sea that would originate in Turkmenistan and bypass Russia. But Western companies said they couldn't agree on terms for the project with the eccentric Mr. Niyazov.

"The problems of Turkmenistan have been directly related to Niyazov, and now that he's out of the picture, that creates a lot of opportunities," said Zeyno Baran, director of the Center for Eurasian Policy at the Hudson Institute in Washington. "The question is, though, who is going to take advantage of those opportunities? Is it going to be the Russians? Or the Europeans and the Americans?"

Mr. Niyazov frequently purged potential political opponents, even those within his own family, leaving no obvious successors. In a sign that the post-Niyazov power struggle has already begun, Turkmenistan's State Security Council named Deputy Prime Minister Kurbanguli Berdymukhamedov acting president, even though under the constitution, the speaker of Parliament was supposed to assume the job. The Security Council said it couldn't appoint the speaker because a criminal investigation had been opened against him.

Mr. Berdymukhamedov, 49, was a confidant of Mr. Niyazov and one of the few people in government to survive repeated purges. But some people expect him to face strong challenges from other competing factions in the leadership, including the security forces.

"So much of the country's political and economic life was invested in the personality of Niyazov himself that there's a possibility of serious infighting and instability now that he's gone," said Michael Hall, director of the International Crisis Group's Central Asia project. "There are a lot of lucrative assets to fight over."

Some Central Asian experts say a worst-case scenario is civil unrest and even the breakup of the country along regional and tribal lines. But others disagree. "There may be a fight under the carpet between people at the highest level of power, but the people won't be involved," said Nagia Badykova, a former Turkmen government official who now lectures on international affairs at George Washington University.

Mr. Niyazov's 21-year rule was defined by a bizarre personality cult and the region's most oppressive political regime. He destroyed all domestic opposition after his motorcade came under fire in an alleged attempted coup in 2002. Afterward, opposition activists and their families were arrested.

After Niyazov Dies, Nation At Crossroads (AP)

By Jim Heintz

AP, December 22, 2006

He was, by his own decree, the "Father Of All Turkmen," and his death Thursday leaves an energy-rich, strategically situated swath of Central Asia without an heir apparent — and potentially at the heart of a global tussle between Russia, China and the United States.

President Saparmurat Niyazov, who died at age 66, ruled Turkmenistan for more than two decades with imperial eccentricity — naming towns, mosques and even the days of the week after himself, crushing opposition and requiring children to read his spiritual ruminations daily.

The former Soviet republic — which lent support to the U.S.-led war on terror — now faces a deeply uncertain future.

Some analysts were already predicting the vacuum could spark a new "Great Game" in Central Asia, similar to the struggle for supremacy in the region among imperial powers in the 19th century. At the least, the world's major powers will be watching and maneuvering for influence in the country that neighbors Iran and stretches from the petroleum-rich Caspian Sea to the border of chaotic Afghanistan.

"It's obvious that a serious war for influence in Turkmenistan will begin between Russia and the United States — and added to that will be serious attempts by Iran and the Islamic world to come into this country's political space," said Eldar Namazov, an analyst in Azerbaijan.

The fate of Turkmenistan carries high stakes because of its huge natural gas fields and substantial oil reserves, and its status as an island of stability in a volatile region.

Although Turkmenistan is a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States, a loose grouping of former Soviet republics, its foreign policy has been determinedly neutral — one of its state-run papers is called "Neutral Turkmenistan."

Still, Niyazov helped Washington in its campaign in Afghanistan, allowing overflights by coalition planes. President Bush expressed condolences Thursday, saying: "We look forward to continuing to expand our relations with Turkmenistan, to a bright future for that country and to a government that provides justice and opportunity for its people."

The announcement of their leader's death sent the capital, Ashgabat, into quiet shock.

New Year's decorations on the streets were removed and liquor stores ordered shut. The military was put on heightened alert, but there were no signs of increased military or police presence in the city.

Niyazov's death is "comparable to a shock the Soviet Union felt after Stalin's death," Vyacheslav Nikonov, head of the Moscow-based Politika think tank, was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

Niyazov created an extraordinarily elaborate cult of personality, similar to that around North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il.

Niyazov banned opera and ballet, and railed against lip-synching and car radios. He declared himself "Turkmenbashi" — Father of All Turkmen — and renamed a seaport, the month of January and facilities throughout the country that way.

He also tried to show an affable side. This month he grinned in pleasure as he was greeted by actors dressed as mythological characters at an amusement park named in his honor.

Like Stalin, his dominance left no room for an apparent successor. He is survived by a wife, daughter and son — but analysts say there is little chance of a dynastic succession.

Within hours of his death, Turkmenistan appeared to be showing signs of political infighting. Although the constitution requires that the parliament speaker be named acting president until elections can be held, the State Security Council named the deputy prime minister instead — saying the parliament speaker had been indicted for corruption.

Deputy Prime Minister Kurbanguli Berdymukhamedov pledged to "continue to go the political course of the great leader" in remarks soon after being named acting president.

All political figures in Turkmenistan were loyal to Niyazov, but the country's politics are seen as factional and clan-driven.

If an orderly succession doesn't occur, opposition figures who have long lain low could see an opening. But most of the main opposition figures live in exile and it was unclear if they would be allowed to return.

"We are ready to take part in developments there ... But first we must receive guarantees that our activity there will be made possible," said opposition leader Bairam Shikhmuradov, who lives in Moscow.

Shirin Akiner, a Central Asia specialist at Britain's Royal Institute for International Affairs, said Islamists in Afghanistan may see Niyazov's death as a chance to expand their influence.

Turkmenistan's 5 million people are overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim, but it is not clear how many are observant. Under Niyazov, the government was officially secular, but it encouraged an officially approved version of Islam. The country is home to Central Asia's largest mosque — named "The Spirit of Turkmenbashi."

Any other form of Islam was repressed and the country showed little sign of the religious radicalism that emerged in other ex-Soviet Central Asian states.

But "as new authorities will try to replace the ideology of Niyazov's personality cult with something else, they might try to use Islam to some extent as a substitute," said Eduard Poletayev, a political analyst in Kazakhstan.

Niyazov, who lost all his immediate family to war and earthquakes by age 8, became communist boss of Turkmenistan in 1985 while it was part of the Soviet Union, remaining in power following the 1991 Soviet collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0108539

His cult of personality included authorship of the "Rukhnama," a book of spiritual guidance that became required reading for children. Earlier this year, he said he had asked Allah to ensure that anyone who read the "Rukhnama" three times would go directly to heaven — and he appeared to have little doubt his request would be honored.

Niyazov's visage adorned the country's currency and statues of him were put up throughout the arid, impoverished land, including a golden one in the capital that rotated to follow the sun's path. His face was even featured on some vodka labels and on canisters of tea.

What will become of his iconic presence is unclear.

Maybe it will disappear "in some barbaric way, with the burning of his portraits and demolition of his monuments, (or) maybe gradually like after Stalin," said Poletayev.

Turkmenistan Leader's Death Leaves Vacuum (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW — Turkmenistan's President Saparmurad A. Niyazov, an eccentric leader who ruled his country with an iron hand, died suddenly Thursday, triggering a scramble for power in the gas-rich Central Asian state.

Niyazov, who used the name Turkmenbashi, or "father of all Turkmens," was 66. State television said he died of a heart attack.

In an apparent sign of an immediate power struggle, the country's security council announced the opening of a criminal investigation against the speaker of parliament, Ovezgeldy Atayev, who under the constitution was in line to become acting president.

Instead, the council named Deputy Prime Minister Gurbanguly Berdimukhamedov, 49, to the post. Under the constitution, a presidential election must be held within two months, and the acting president cannot be a candidate.

Turkmenistan has large natural gas reserves and is a major supplier to Western Europe. The gas is piped first to Russia, which then resells it. If political turmoil in Turkmenistan disrupted the flow to Russia, Gazprom, the Russian gas monopoly, might be unable to meet its commitments, the Russian news agency Interfax reported.

Turkmen authorities praised Niyazov's long rule in a statement announcing his death. "The glorious years … confirmed his heavenly faculty to foresee, and his ability to determine priorities," they said. "His unique abilities in the art of leading the nation revealed his talent as a diplomat and a wise and humane person."

Turkmenistan, which is mostly desert and slightly larger than California, has a population of 5 million, most of them Muslim. Any opposition to Niyazov was severely repressed, meaning there is no clear successor.

Niyazov encouraged an extravagant personality cult. He renamed the months of January, April and September after himself, his mother and the Ruhnama, a history and spiritual guide he is said to have written.

In Ashgabat, the capital, a revolving 35-foot golden statue of Niyazov is perched atop the giant Arch of Neutrality, a symbol of his policy of remaining largely isolated to avoid the potentially dominating influences of neighboring Russia, Uzbekistan and Iran. The statue's arms are raised to welcome the sun at dawn and bid it farewell at dusk.

Some observers said a struggle over political succession might ultimately be linked to competition between the West and Russia for control of Turkmenistan's energy resources.

"It is known that Turkey and the United States are making vigorous attempts to pursue their interests in Turkmenistan, primarily its oil and gas sector," Leonid Ivashov, vice president of the Academy for Geopolitical Problems, a Moscow think tank, told Interfax. "If Russia chooses a passive role, it may further weaken its positions."

Opposition rejoices

Several of Turkmenistan's exiled opposition leaders said they would quickly try to return home.

"It is a great joy for all of us … that he has freed the country from himself," Avdy Kuliyev, a former foreign minister who is now an opposition leader, said in a telephone interview from Norway. "We are planning to come back to Turkmenistan in the nearest future…. We want to guide our people in a different way.

DOJ_NMG_0108540

"Certainly Niyazov's supporters who are present in the country would like to continue this same policy, possible slightly changing it," Kuliyev said.

"As for us, we want an absolutely different policy. We want people to get freedom so they could decide themselves on their future."

Turkmen authorities quickly tightened entry rules, with visas no longer available at airports even for those holding official invitations to visit the country, Interfax reported. Citing a law enforcement source in Kazakhstan, another neighboring country, the news agency also said that Turkmenistan's armed forces had been put on combat alert.

Niyazov's funeral was set for Sunday, and the country entered a period of official mourning. Streets and markets in Ashgabat fell silent, New Year's decorations were removed, and flags were at half-staff, Interfax said.

Niyazov, born Feb. 19, 1940, was orphaned as a child. His father died in World War II and the rest of his immediate family died in an earthquake that hit Ashgabat in 1948. He rose through the Communist Party and became the party boss of Turkmenistan in 1985, when it was still part of the Soviet Union.

President for life

After Turkmenistan gained independence in 1991, Niyazov won election the next year with an official 99.5% of the vote, in balloting outsiders deemed neither free nor fair. The People's Council, a handpicked body of loyalists, named him president for life in 1999.

Vitaly Ponomaryov, director of the Central Asia program at Memorial, a human rights group in Moscow, said Niyazov's determination to keep all power in his hands meant he not only left no clear successor, but left no one of political strength in the government.

"There is not a single strong political figure in Niyazov's camp," Ponomaryov said. "Once someone's position and role increased, then, let's say within one or two years, that person was jailed. As a result, there is no real leader in the current government in Turkmenistan. Those who had connections, money or influence were removed from power."

Ponomaryov predicted that some of these ousted former officials would make a bid for power at the same time exiled opposition leaders tried to return.

"Many of these people who worked in governmental structures enjoy support among some governmental groups," he said. "Those people are also well connected with different clan groups."

Exiled opposition leaders have some influence because their views have been carried in Turkmen-language broadcasts of U.S.-sponsored Radio Liberty, Ponomaryov said.

"Today, especially in this transitional situation, all the major countries and the whole world have a unique chance to bring pressure on Turkmenistan, which in its turn might be effective enough to help promote democratic reforms in this country," he said.

Kuliyev acknowledged that Turkmen authorities might try to keep opposition leaders from returning, but indicated the opposition was searching for ways to circumvent any ban.

"To some extent we rely on the United States," he said. "We want a real state to be built on democratic principles, such as freedom of speech and respect for human rights."

After A Tyrant, What Next? (WP)

By Masha Lipman

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW -- Although the official statement yesterday on Turkmenistan's president spoke of his "divine foresight," not even this dictator could foresee his own death or what will happen to his country afterward.

Saparmurad Niyazov, who died unexpectedly yesterday after a heart attack, was a tyrant par excellence. He presided over a closed and repressive regime as uncontested master of the Turkmen people. Those who dared challenge his absolute power were arrested and tortured, then sentenced to long prison terms. Any sign of dissent was fiercely suppressed.

DOJ_NMG_0108541

Among his more recent victims were two journalists who worked for foreign news outlets and one human rights activist. Ogulsapar Muradova, 58, who worked for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, died in prison. Her body showed obvious signs of torture.

Niyazov was the last communist leader of Turkmenistan when it was still part of the Soviet Union. He inherited his country after it was suddenly transformed into an independent state upon the collapse of the U.S.S.R. 15 years ago. He proclaimed himself Turkmenbashi, Father of All Turkmen, and began reshaping his land according to his whims.

The result was that Turkmenistan was plunged into the Middle Ages. Niyazov closed theaters, libraries and newspapers. He limited access to education, travel and medical services. In an abrupt move last year, he ordered that all hospitals be closed except those in the Turkmen capital, Ashgabat. He dramatically cut pensions to the elderly. Houses of those suspected of disloyalty were routinely torn down.

State-controlled media and government officials eulogized the Father of All Turkmen for his loving care for his people. Statues and portraits of him are in the streets of Turkmen towns, many of them renamed after himself and his mother. A gigantic golden statue of Niyazov erected in Ashgabat is equipped with a mechanism ensuring that the Turkmen leader is always facing the sun.

Turkmenbashi authored a book titled "Ruhnama" ("Spirituality") and ordered that all Turkmen schoolchildren, college students and government officials and civil servants study it thoroughly. As befits a divine leader, he claimed to command nature itself. One report has it that he demanded that a crop be harvested early because he'd become tired holding back the rain.

Turkmenbashi renamed months and days of the week and redefined measures of human age, which he subdivided into special periods of his own invention -- at 61 he entered the period of "spiritual greatness." He had his hair dyed black and was not to enter "old age" until he reached 85.

He died at 66, and the immediate future of his country is in the hands of his inner circle. But whoever succeeds Turkmenbashi will have a hard time establishing his own stature and defining his legitimacy, whether it is that of a popularly recognized ruler or the winner of a power struggle.

In fact, the struggle seems inevitable. Niyazov's regime implied that he was Turkmenistan's ruler for eternity, and any plans for succession were simply ruled out. Just as it was after Stalin's death, members of the leader's inner circle must be seized by fear and deep distrust of each other. Some of the Turkmen officials who had earlier fled abroad to avoid repression are talking about coming back, further aggravating the struggle. Chances are that this fight will not be contained within the elites but that it will spill over and turn into popular unrest.

In spite of Turkmenistan's sinister regime, world players -- Russia first and foremost -- have shown great interest in the country because of its rich resources, especially natural gas. Turkmenbashi was a difficult partner for Vladimir Putin -- whimsical and disrespectful, even defiant at times. Under his rule, Turkmen citizens who had Russian passports were commonly subjected to harassment. But Turkmenistan's gas plays a key role in Putin's policy of using energy as a tool of political influence, and so he put up with Niyazov's unruly behavior. (Right now Russia buys Turkmen gas wholesale and resells it. Observers are already warning that a destabilization of Turkmenistan might affect its gas supplies and, consequently, Russia's.)

Since Central Asia has increasingly become an area of rivalry between Russia and the United States, the U.S. government hasn't been very demanding with regard to Niyazov's rule, either. And the Turkmen president eagerly took advantage of the U.S.-Russia rivalry. He agreed to harbor a U.S. military base after it was driven out of Uzbekistan, a favor that ensured that the U.S. administration would show tolerance for blatant abuses of human rights in Turkmenistan, regardless of President Bush's proclaimed mission of bringing freedom and democracy to the world.

Niyazov lived in self-isolation, rarely leaving his country and never binding himself by any alliances. His successor will hardly be able to stay so distanced. Turkmenistan's resources are an obvious source of power, and in the fight to control them, members of the Turkmen elite sooner or later will be tempted to look abroad for backing. The stakes in this geopolitical game could be quite high. For Russia, having a reliable and more compliant partner in Turkmenistan would mean a significant consolidation of its energy weapon, as well as its position vis-a-vis former Soviet states.

One would hope that change will at least improve somewhat the situation of the Turkmen people. But with the balance of power in Central Asia at stake, it's unlikely that human rights abuses will be of major concern to the contestants in this tug-of-war.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Rice Seeks U.S. Probe Of Why Canada's Arar Still On Watch List (BLOOM)

By Janine Zacharia

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has asked homeland security chief Michael Chertoff and the Justice Department to review the case of Maher Arar, a Canadian citizen who Canada says was wrongly accused of links to terrorism and remains on a U.S. terrorist watch list.

The U.S. accused Arar of links to al-Qaeda when authorities detained him in 2002 at John F. Kennedy International Airport on a stopover during his return to Canada from Tunisia. A Canadian inquiry found in September that Arar was tortured in his native Syria and that Canadian officials gave inaccurate information to the U.S. that portrayed Arar inaccurately as a terrorist.

Canada has removed Arar from its watch list and wants the U.S. to do the same. Rice, speaking at a press conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay at the State Department in Washington today, said she was seeking clarification from Chertoff.

``I talked with Mike Chertoff about this just this morning, and he said that he would examine this and he will be back to us," Rice told reporters.

MacKay, speaking alongside Rice, said that the Canadian inquiry exonerated Arar. The case led to resignation earlier this month of Royal Canadian Mounted Police Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli.

``There's clarity as to Canada's position and the findings with respect to Mr. Arar. We've removed him from our watch list. We've urged the United States to take the same steps," MacKay said.

Asked if she had anything to say to Arar on how he has been treated, Rice defended U.S. counterterrorism and border security procedures, saying ``it needs to be understood that in the post- September 11 circumstances we are determined to protect our borders."

U.S. To Look Into Arar's Status: Rice (CBC)

CBC News, December 21, 2006

U.S. security officials will review why Canadian Maher Arar is still on a U.S. terrorist watch list, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday following a meeting with Canada's foreign affairs minister.

"It will of course be looked at," Rice told reporters at a joint news conference with Peter MacKay in Washington. U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay, shown after an appearance in Stellarton, N.S., in September, discussed Maher Arar on Thursday. Rice said his case 'will be looked at.'

Rice said she instructed Michael Chertoff, the Department of Homeland Security's secretary, and the Justice Department to look further into the matter.

"He said he would examine it and would get back to me."

But Rice reiterated that the U.S. makes its own security decisions based on independent information.

"We value accuracy in cases but we do have our own process," she said. "It needs to be understood that in the post-Sept. 11 circumstances, we are determined to protect our borders."

DOJ_NMG_0108546

MacKay said he brought up Arar's status in the meeting with his U.S. counterpart and reiterated that Arar has been cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism. "There's clarity in Canada's position with the findings of Mr. Arar," MacKay said. "I'm very pleased at the decision to revisit the restriction on his case."

Arar, a Canadian citizen born in Syria, was seized at a New York airport in 2002 and sent to Syria, where he was tortured. A judicial inquiry into his case led by Justice Dennis O'Connor was set up after Arar returned to Canada more than a year later.

O'Connor concluded Arar had no terror links and the RCMP had given misleading information to U.S. authorities, which may have been the reason he was sent to Syria.

Parliament apologized to Arar and the government has been asking Washington to remove him from a watch list that prevents him from travelling to the U.S. andÂ makes him a marked man, despite being cleared in Canada.

However, the U.S. has refused and has not explained why. 'Go our own way'

The meeting between MacKay and Rice came a day after an American security official bluntly stated the U.S. would follow its own path on Arar without informing Canadians on its reasons.

"With respect to some issues, we're going to have to respectfully but firmly go our own way and the Arar matter, at least for now, is one of those," Paul Rosenzweig, acting assistant secretary for international affairs for the Department of Homeland Security, told reporters in Washington.

"As for the sharing of information with the Canadian government, while I do recognize that in an idealized world we would share every bit of intelligence information with all of our partners, in the real world that is an idealization that isn't achievable."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper told Sun Media that "as near as I can see, we simply have a U.S. government that won't admit it's wrong."

He said he can't compel the U.S. to explain why it still views Arar with suspicion.

"I'm not aware of the U.S. violating any law by not sharing it with us, but I'm obviously disappointed that they don't seem at this point to have responded fully to the conclusions of our own inquiry, and I have no explanation for why they're taking the position that they are."

Arar's lawsuit against the U.S. has been cited as one reason American authorities won't talk about the case. With files from the Canadian Press

Hudson River Tunnels Seen As Fragile (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum And William Neuman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

An analysis done for the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey says that the PATH train tunnels under the Hudson River are more vulnerable to a bomb attack than previously thought, and that a relatively small amount of high explosives could cause significant flooding of the rail system within hours.

The analysis, based on work by Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory and the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, revises some critical aspects of an assessment of the system's vulnerability that was presented to the agency last spring. It makes clear that the tunnels — four tubes of varying design and sturdiness that stretch across the Hudson riverbed — are structurally more fragile than first thought.

A draft summary of the most recent analysis was given to The New York Times by a government official who was troubled by what the official felt was a lack of action in response to the analysis, which the official said the Port Authority got about three weeks ago. The official said the latest analysis indicates that it would take only six minutes for one of the PATH tubes to flood if a significant but not necessarily very large bomb were detonated.

Marc La Vorgna, a spokesman for the Port Authority, would not answer specific questions about the analysis, or with whom it had been shared.

"If we believed in any way that passengers were in danger, we'd close the system," he said. "That would happen immediately." He said the Port Authority police had substantially increased patrols and bag searches in the PATH system in recent weeks. In addition, the agency's board voted on Dec. 14 to spend $180 million on PATH security improvements. He refused to say what had prompted the actions.

The vulnerability of the PATH tubes and other tunnels has long been a source of concern to security, transportation and government officials, as well as the public. It has given rise to various projections about their likelihood as a target and what ought to be done to safeguard them.

The fears have existed at least as far back as 1993, the year of the first terror attack on the World Trade Center. Various agencies, including New York City Transit and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, over the years have been studying ways to improve the tunnels' security and stalwartness.

Just last July, several people were arrested overseas in what authorities said was a plot to bomb the PATH system — which has a weekday ridership of 230,000. The arrests halted what officials said was a bid to set off backpack bombs in a PATH train car and flood the tunnels. Some published reports said maps and other material relating to the PATH tunnels had been found on the computer of one of those arrested.

That investigation began a year before the arrests, about the same time that an analysis of the vulnerability of the transit system's underwater train tubes was jointly commissioned by the Port Authority and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, which oversees the operation of the city's subways. It is unclear, however, whether the investigation prompted the analysis.

A 19-page summary of the analysis details some of the measures the Port Authority has been planning to put in place to better secure the PATH system: laying concrete blankets atop the tubes to plug holes caused by a blast, strengthening portions of the tubes and installing floodgates to prevent the system from being overwhelmed.

The official who gave a copy of the report to The Times said the Port Authority, whose executive director and board members are appointed by the governors of New York and New Jersey, had informed neither state executive of the most recent results. Neither has it yet shared the new findings with the United States Department of Homeland Security, Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg, the New York Police Department or other law enforcement agencies, the official said.

The official disputed the Port Authority's contention that it had increased patrols and bag searches.

Aides speaking for Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Gov. George E. Pataki of New York would not comment on whether the two leaders had been apprised of the latest analysis, but they insisted that the governors are both fully and regularly briefed on the security of the region's mass transportation system.

A spokesman for Mr. Bloomberg would not comment on the analysis. But a senior Police Department official acknowledged that the police had not been informed of the newer findings. Yesterday afternoon, Russ Knocke, a spokesman for the Department of Homeland Security in Washington, said he could not determine whether anyone at the agency had been notified.

Speaking generally, Mr. La Vorgna of the Port Authority said the agency was "constantly undergoing threat assessment," and that the analysis was regularly shared with its federal, state and city partners.

Since 9/11, government and security officials have emphasized that there is no way to fully protect every possible target. But in New York, officials have regularly sought to reassure the public that serious steps are being taken to address major vulnerabilities in the area's array of tunnels, bridges and rail systems.

The analysis appears to be the most detailed and sophisticated government review of the train tubes' vulnerability. Initial findings were shared last May with the some members of the agency, but was not made public, and further tests were ordered. More tests are being done in an effort to come up with the best way to strengthen the tunnels.

The Hudson River tubes of the PATH system, which suffered serious damage in the 2001 terror attack, are more vulnerable than most other tunnels that pass under the city's waterways because they lie in the soft riverbed, unlike other tunnels that are bored through the underlying bedrock. Silt over years has built up atop the tubes, which were laid roughly 90 years ago, but they are not in bedrock.

Several city subway tunnels beneath the East River are in many ways similar to the four PATH tunnels — essentially cast-iron tubes that run along the riverbed. An official at the Metropolitan Transportation Authority said that agency is working on an analysis of its tubes.

The PATH analysis, which is characterized as preliminary and continuing, examines the three different types of PATH tubes under the Hudson. Roughly three-quarters of the tubes' total length is made of unlined cast iron, with the balance made from concrete-lined cast iron or brick. Many of the details of the analysis — including the size of the bombs under discussion, their placement and the exact nature of the vulnerability — are being withheld by The Times.

The worst case included in the analysis suggests that a bomb that could be easily carried aboard a train could punch a 50-square-foot hole in one side of a tube, possibly breaching both sides of the tunnel. Under that situation, 1.2 million gallons of water a minute could pour into the tunnel, flooding parts of the system in a matter of hours.

That is a much more dire view than an earlier draft of the analysis — completed last May — contemplated.

PATH trains run in sets of seven cars, each with a capacity of 130, so that there could potentially be about 900 people on a crowded train. New cars on order would allow 10-car trains that could carry more people.

The analysis — presented in November by a senior member of the Port Authority's engineering department to a small group of the agency's senior managers, says that the new results are based on a combination of tests on the cast iron from the tunnels and computer modeling. It recommends seeking an additional $3.8 million to supplement the $4.5 million already authorized for the continuing analysis.

Additional computer models, it said, were also being run to develop more specific results. The Livermore laboratory, a government-financed institution that evaluates security threats, has also done blast analysis for the Bay Area Rapid Transit system in the San Francisco Bay area.

The strategy to minimize the impact of explosions in the tunnels has been organized into a three-part program, according to the report: Laying down the material to cover the tubes, known as Geotextile Concrete Mats; installing floodgates on the tunnels to minimize flooding, protect other parts of the system and allow repair after a blast; and strengthening critical portions of the tubes.

Simulations show how, "in the event of a tunnel breach the mat would be pulled into and clog the opening to at least reduce the rate of inflow of soil and water into the tunnel," the summary said.

The summary recommended that Port Authority officials seek authorization for an additional $71 million to build and install floodgates at the World Trade Center and Exchange Place stops at the agency's December board meeting, which occurred Dec. 14. Mr. La Vorgna would not say what measures were covered by the $180 million the agency voted to spend on PATH security improvements or whether that sum included the $71 million.

Lawyer: 5 Tapped In N.J. Posada Probe (AP)

By Associated Press

AP, December 22, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. — Five Cuban-Americans were called to testify in a federal grand jury probe exploring allegations they helped send more than $30,000 to an anti-Castro militant suspected of directing attacks on Cuba, their lawyer said Thursday.

All five deny wrongdoing, attorney Gilberto M. Garcia said. He told The Record of Bergen County that four of his clients claim someone used their names to send transfers to Luis Posada Carriles, an anti-Castro militant wanted in Cuba and Venezuela.

He said a fifth, Oscar Rojas, acknowledges handling transfers but says he did so only at the request of a former millionaire businessman that he worked for and did not know what the funds would be used for, according to The Record.

Garcia said one of his clients testified and that two gave written statements, although he wouldn't specify which. He said two others were excused from testifying after saying they intended to invoke their Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination.

Posada, 79, has spent the past 18 months in federal custody in El Paso, Texas, on immigration charges. A judge ruled Posada, who was born in Cuba and naturalized in Venezuela, can not be deported to either country. He is wanted in both for his alleged involvement in a 1976 bombing of a Cuban jet in Venezuela that killed 73 people and a 1997 bombing campaign on Havana hotels, restaurants and clubs.

Besides Rojas, Garcia said his other subpoenaed clients were Abel Hernandez, Angel Alfonso Aleman, Ruben Gonzalo and his son, Jose Gonzalo.

Justice Department spokesman Bryan Sierra would neither confirm nor deny an investigation into the money transfers was ongoing.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. To Require More Security At High-Risk Chemical Plants (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — After years of debate, and criticism over the delay, the Bush administration will move Friday to require security enhancements at high-risk chemical plants nationwide so their hazardous stockpiles do not become a target for terrorists.

Department of Homeland Security officials said Thursday that the new rules would reduce the likelihood of a catastrophic chemical attack when paired with a recent tightening of regulations for rail shipments of highly toxic materials.

"This will bring us to a much higher level of security," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said in an interview Thursday.

But the draft regulations will almost certainly evoke protest from Democrats on Capitol Hill — as well as from state officials — because they may allow a federal pre-emption of conflicting and perhaps more demanding state laws.

They also may allow the Department of Homeland Security, under certain circumstances, to recognize as sufficient the security measures already put in place voluntarily by major chemical manufacturers, meaning that for many plants, few if any changes would be required.

And the draft rules do not require any specific security measures, like the construction of barriers or a switch to less hazardous chemicals. Instead, they will leave it up to plant owners to decide what measures are most appropriate, although the Homeland Security Department will review the plans and have the power to order changes.

Democrats, who failed this year in an effort to mandate more stringent requirements, said that they intended to take up the issue next year, when they will have the majority.

"It concerns me that the regulations do not require chemical facilities to switch to safer technologies wherever feasible," said Representative Bennie Thompson, Democrat of Mississippi, who is to take over as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security. "Without such a requirement, I fear a significant gap remains in our chemical security efforts."

Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, said the organization's members, which include industry giants like Dow Chemical and DuPont, welcomed the regulations, particularly if they would credit security investments already made by plant owners, which he said had cost more than $3.3 billion nationwide.

"We want to make sure that work is recognized when it comes to complying with the new regulations," he said.

Rick Hind, a lobbyist for the environmental group Greenpeace, called the regulations "an industry-friendly excuse so they can claim they are doing something."

The debate over the need for chemical plant regulations began shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Unlike nuclear power plants or ports, facilities that manufacture or store large quantities of toxic chemicals are not subject to antiterrorism mandates.

Christie Whitman, the former administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, said after she left the agency that its efforts to enact such regulations had been held back by the White House, under pressure from the chemical industry.

The Bush administration and the chemical industry joined with Democrats in calling for regulations because even though the industry had voluntarily adopted security standards, some plants were not abiding by them.

The new regulations, which Congress ordered as part of the 2007 Homeland Security budget act, would require that facilities that manufacture, use or store chemicals evaluate all the ways they could be attacked — from outside the plant, or by sabotage from the inside — and then propose countermeasures.

"We are not going to tell them, 'You have to build a big fence as opposed to putting a tank underground,' " Mr. Chertoff said. "We are simply going to say, 'The choice you make must prevent somebody from being able to shoot the tank and blow it up.' "

Only "high risk" plants are subject to the mandate, although the draft rules do not yet define exactly what that term means, making it impossible to say how many facilities will be subject to the regulation.

Plants that are affected will have to conduct background checks on employees and take at least some steps to control access, secure chemical stockpiles and establish emergency plans in the event of an attack. Plants that ignore the requirements may be subject to fines of up to $25,000 a day or face a shut-down order.

The proposed rules do not explicitly pre-empt state plant security laws, like one adopted last year in New Jersey that requires facilities to consider switching to safer chemicals or technologies. But the draft regulations say the Homeland Security Department may take such a step to "preserve chemical facilities' flexibility to choose security measures."

U.S. Allows Chemical Plants Leeway In Terror Order (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Department of Homeland Security is expected to issue rules today to require thousands of U.S. chemical plants to protect themselves from terrorists. But under the proposed rules -- heavily influenced by the chemical industry -- the department will tell plants what they need to do, and not how, a strategy unlikely to satisfy many Democratic lawmakers who take control of Congress next month.

The department's preliminary rulemaking follows its announcement last week of regulations to ensure that the nation's freight rail system and hazardous chemicals transported by rail aren't vulnerable to terrorists. "This is part two of what we did with respect to trains carrying hazardous chemicals between places. These rules now cover security when those chemicals come to rest," said DHS Secretary Michael Chertoff in an interview. There will be a 60-day comment period after the proposed rules for chemical plants are made public.

The rail rules, which included extra security at rail yards across the country and tracking of all hazardous train shipments, fell short of more stringent measures proposed by Democrats, such as rerouting dangerous rail cargo away from heavily populated areas. Critics saw the rules as weak -- a charge also likely to hit the chemical-plant rules.

According to Mr. Chertoff, the proposed chemical security regulations will make the country safer by requiring facilities with the most hazardous chemicals to craft their own risk assessments and security plans to address their specific vulnerabilities. All plans, however, must meet the department's minimum "performance standards," which amount to setting specific security targets, such as protecting chemical-tank cars from weapons fire. But how a particular facility chooses to do that -- such as enclosing them with walls or burying them -- would be up to the individual chemical plant.

The department would review the assessments and plans, requiring facilities that fail to meet standards to go back to the drawing board. Fines for noncompliance could reach $25,000 a day, and for serious breaches the department could close the facility.

"We are not proscribing method, we are simply demanding results," Mr. Chertoff said. "The idea is to be aggressive and comprehensive, but also let industry figure out the way they want to achieve the outcome."

While chemical-industry executives haven't seen the rules in their proposed form, industry representatives had consulted some with the department during their development and they support the general thrust of the approach.

"We think risk-based performance standards, vulnerability assessments and security plans are exactly the way to go," said Ted Cromwell, senior director of Security and Operations for the American Chemistry Council, which represents the country's leading chemical companies, including Dow Chemical, DuPont and BASF. He said the individual-plant approach offers the best security because it "tailors measures to specific vulnerabilities."

Railways and chemical plants have long been identified as the country's most gaping security vulnerabilities. Hundreds of thousands of hazardous-chemical shipments travel unsecured by rail across the country every day. According to the Environmental Protection Agency, there are 7,728 U.S. chemical plants where an accident -- or act of sabotage -- could endanger 1,000 or more nearby residents. However, efforts to make chemical shipments and facilities more resistant to sabotage have languished for years as industry and the White House opposed the imposition of onerous regulation.

The standoff ended in a three-year stop-gap law that was hastily made part of the DHS appropriations bill in September and signed by President Bush on Oct. 4. The chemical industry and the administration worked with Congress on the law, which in many ways limits how far the Homeland Security secretary can go in prescribing measures not backed by industry, such as forcing plants to substitute safer alternative chemicals for dangerous ones.

The latest regulations will be scrutinized by congressional leaders. Democrats say they hope to begin moving permanent chemical-security legislation next year and incoming chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson, has indicated Congress may impose stricter requirements on rail and chemical plants than those proposed by the administration.

Report Says TSA Violated Privacy Law (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Secure Flight, the U.S. government's stalled program to screen domestic air passengers against terrorism watch lists, violated federal law during a crucial test phase, according to a report to be issued today by the Homeland Security Department's privacy office.

The agency found that by gathering passenger data from commercial brokers in 2004 without notifying the passengers, the program violated a 1974 Privacy Act requirement that the public be made aware of any changes in a federal program that affects the privacy of U.S. citizens. "As ultimately implemented, the commercial data test conducted in connection with the Secure Flight program testing did not match [the Transportation Security Administration's] public announcements," the report states.

The finding marks the first time that the Homeland Security Department has acknowledged that the problem-plagued Secure Flight program has violated the law. It comes at a time when a separate program to screen international passengers is under attack for officials' failure to disclose until recently that they were creating passenger profiles that would be stored for 40 years.

The report on Secure Flight says that "the disparity between what TSA proposed to do and what it actually did in the testing program resulted in significant privacy concerns being raised. . . . Privacy missteps such as these undercut an agency's effort to implement a program effectively, even one that promises to improve security."

Congress has halted Secure Flight, except for testing, until it can allay privacy and security concerns.

The report notes that TSA eventually revised its public notice about the program to reflect more closely the program itself. But it also suggests that Secure Flight will run afoul of the law again unless it follows a set of recommendations, including being transparent about the program's collection and use of passengers' personal information.

TSA Administrator Kip Hawley said that he supports the use of Secure Flight and that his agency is working closely with other government officials to ensure it protects privacy. "We are working in a transparent way," Hawley said, adding that the agency's "challenging" goal is to roll out the program in 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0108551

In 2004, the TSA published a Federal Register notice on a data-test phase of the program, saying that "strict firewalls" would prevent any commercial data from mixing with government data. However, this was based on the notion that the Secure Flight contractor, EagleForce Associates Inc. of McLean, would ensure that no commercial data were used, the report said.

But by the time the EagleForce contract was finalized, "it was clear that TSA would receive commercial data," the report says. If, for instance, TSA data for an individual passenger lacked an address or date of birth, EagleForce would obtain the missing information from commercial data brokers.

"The fact that EagleForce had access to the commercial data did not create a firewall," the report says, because under the Privacy Act, in effect, "EagleForce stands in the shoes of TSA."

Moreover, commercial databases provided Eagle Force with data for some individuals who were not air passengers. These people were never notified -- a violation of the privacy act, the report says.

TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said the agency has "already implemented or is in the process of implementing" the recommendations contained in the privacy office report. She said the report's conclusions were not surprising, adding that they were "very similar" to those reached last year by the General Accounting Office, the government's auditing arm.

A 2004 probe found that the TSA improperly stored 100 million commercial data records containing personal information on passengers after the agency said no data storage would occur.

Audit Finds Lack Of Financial Controls At Homeland Security (NYT/BLOOM)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security lacks adequate financial controls three years after its creation, an independent audit found. The auditing firm KPMG LLP said for the third straight year that it could not provide an opinion on the balance sheet of the $40.3 billion department, the second-largest federal agency, because of its lax financial controls and oversight. The department last year hired a chief financial officer, David Norquist, for the first time. In a Nov. 15 letter, Mr. Norquist wrote: “We agree with the independent public accountant’s conclusions. Since my arrival at the department I have made corrective actions my highest priority.”

Anti-terror Laws Stymie Asylum Seekers (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The first time they came for her, the Colombian guerrillas shoved the 31-year-old nurse blindfolded into the back of a green Renault sedan. Her kidnappers took her to a house and forced her to treat one of their commandants, who was writhing in pain from a bullet wound to the leg.

The woman said she was abducted seven more times in 1997 and 1998 to give medical care to members of the Revolutionary Armed Forces. Each time, they warned her not to go to the police. "I know you have a daughter," one man said as he prodded her back with his gun. In 2000, after her cousin was tortured and killed, she fled the country. Now she is in Northern California, working as a nurse and raising her daughter.

Today, her hopes of staying in the U.S. have run smack into the federal government's war on terrorism. The Department of Homeland Security rejected her claim for asylum. Their reason: By giving the guerrillas medical care — willingly or not — she was supporting terrorism.

Laws passed after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, deny admission to anyone who has provided "material support" — money, food, clothing, advice — to terrorist groups. In the last few years, these provisions and the definition of terrorism have been expanded to the point that they are disqualifying people who even immigration judges agree pose no threat to the U.S.

Refugee advocates cite cases in which the administration has denied asylum to Liberian women forced to cook and clean for rebels who raped them and killed family members. Colombians who paid kidnappers' ransoms to free family members also have been barred for providing material support. So many refugee applicants have been blocked for this reason that last year the United Nations Refugee Agency stopped trying to settle Colombians in the U.S.

Critics of the government's policy, who are pushing for legislation next year to change the system, say that such disqualifications are a big reason why refugee admissions in fiscal 2006 fell to 41,277 from more than 50,000 in each of the two previous years.

The material-support clause has even snared American allies who fought alongside U.S. troops or at the United States' behest. Cubans who tried to overthrow Fidel Castro in the Bay of Pigs uprising are being denied entry, as are Montagnards and Hmong who fought alongside American troops in Vietnam.

About 2,300 former combatants who have been admitted to the U.S. are unable to apply for permanent legal resident status, a step toward citizenship, because they fear that immigration judges would have to deport them under the expanded definition of terrorism, said Cassandra Champion, director of communications for the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service.

The administration defines a terrorist organization as any group of two or more people, organized or not, that uses any device or weapon to cause injury to person or property. Motive is not a consideration, the person's frame of mind is not an issue, and no exceptions are made if someone, like the Colombian nurse, helped a designated terrorist group only at gunpoint.

"They knew about my daughter; they knew where my parents are; they can make you disappear, and there's nobody in my country who can help you," said the nurse, now 40, in a phone interview. She asked that her name not be used because she feared for the safety of family in Colombia. "What would you do? I never did anything because I wanted to."

Unless she wins an appeal in court, she faces deportation.

Administration officials say they are trying to strike a balance between honoring the American tradition of welcoming asylum-seekers and refugees while managing the security risks of a world transformed by Sept. 11. That kind of transition takes time, they say.

"The president has said he wants to let refugees in," said Paul Rosenzweig, a senior policy advisor at the Homeland Security Department. "In the same vein, he's said he doesn't want to let dangerous people in. The conundrum is that this law applies to both, and the process of sorting them out is not as easy as waving a magic wand."

The government's policy has brought opposition from an unlikely alliance of conservatives, refugee advocates and constitutional experts, who say the Bush administration is clinging to the harshest possible interpretation of the laws.

Michael Horowitz, a former Reagan administration official and senior fellow at the conservative Hudson Institute, is critical of the administration's stance — particularly as it applies to "freedom fighters" and the broad definition of terrorism. He notes that, as written, it would apply to Jews who rose up against the Nazis in the Warsaw Ghetto.

"The administration is being undermined by this caricature of conservatism that is victimizing heroes," Horowitz said. "How does it advance national security when we're defining as terrorists people who fought on our side?"

Refugee advocates have been campaigning for change since the provisions were expanded by the Patriot Act in 2001 and the Real ID Act of 2005. Lately, there have been signs that change may be coming.

This month, the administration sent suggested revisions to Republican lawmakers, in the hope that they would be passed before the 109th Congress adjourned. That didn't happen, and now Homeland Security officials say they hope for legislation next year.

The administration's proposals would expand the use of government-issued waivers that allow an otherwise banned group or person into the country. Only three such waivers have ever been issued.

Though the waivers can cover people who offered material support to so-called freedom fighters, they do not extend to the fighters themselves. The administration proposes to expand the waivers to include freedom fighters, but only if Homeland Security, the Justice Department and the State Department agree. The administration would be able to revoke the waiver at any time, for any reason.

Advocates say the government's unlimited ability to revoke a waiver means refugees entering the country that way could never feel entirely secure. "They're taking a bad problem and seemingly making it worse," said Melanie Nezer of the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society.

Rosenzweig said the ability to revoke waivers was to ensure that the government could reverse course if someone did turn out to be a threat.

With Democrats at the helm in Congress, hearings on the topic are likely next year, according to Capitol Hill sources.

Staff for Rep. Joe Pitts (R-Pa.) say he will reintroduce legislation that immigrant advocates strongly support. His bill would amend the definition of terrorism to apply only to those who threatened the interests of the U.S. or its allies.

"We recognize that there are some people who meet the definition who aren't in actuality a threat," said Rachel Brand, head of the Justice Department's legal policy office. "The answer to that is to waive them in, not change the definition.... Narrowing the definition would make it harder to exclude people who are actual threats."

Refugee advocates say Brand's worries are unfounded. "Refugees already go through so many security checks. They are fingerprinted, run through FBI databases ... they're a very tightly screened group," said Jana Mason of the International Rescue Committee.

The Pitts bill would also address cases like that of the Colombian nurse, making it clear that people coerced into helping terrorists would not be considered supporters of terrorism.

Administration officials say they can't be sure that refugees' tales of coercion are true. They add that accepting such a defense could weaken their terrorism prosecutions if defendants start arguing that they were forced to participate.

Rosenzweig also cited philosophical reasons for rejecting a duress defense. "We should encourage people to oppose terrorist organizations wherever they are," he said.

Refugee advocates say opposing terrorists is not so easy when a loved one has been kidnapped for ransom.

Said Horowitz: "Any one of us would hand over money if someone held a gun to our child's head."

8 Marines Charged In Haditha Killings (LAT)

By Richard Marosi And Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON — Four Marines were charged today with murder and other offenses in connection with the killings last year of 24 men, women and children in the Iraqi town of Haditha. Four Marine Corp. officers were charged with dereliction of duty for failing to make accurate reports and thoroughly investigate the deaths of the Iraqi civilians.

The most serious accusations were leveled against a squad leader, Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, who allegedly murdered 12 people and ordered Marines under his command to "shoot first and ask questions later" in a sweep of homes that led to six more deaths.

The Marines allegedly went on a rampage on Nov. 19, 2005, after a roadside bomb exploded beneath one of the Hummers in their convoy, killing a Marine and injuring two others. Initial reports from the Marines stated that 15 civilians died in an explosion and eight Iraqis were killed in a firefight.

Only after Time magazine published an investigative story suggesting that the Marine account was false did the military begin its own investigations. The criminal investigation, largely by the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, led to the charges unveiled today.

Wuterich and other Marines were preparing to storm a house containing several people when Wuterich gave the order to "shoot first and ask questions later," showing wanton disregard for human life, according to the charge sheet. Marines are required to positively identify targets before an engagement, according to the charges.

The victims in Haditha included several women, six children and an elderly man in a wheelchair.

Wuterich also allegedly made a false statement to another Marine in connection with the deaths of four other victims who came upon the Marine convoy in a car, stating that the men had fired on the convoy. Wuterich allegedly solicited another Marine to falsely state that the Iraqi men had been killed by Iraqi soldiers.

Neal Puckett, Wuterich's defense attorney, expressed confidence that his client would be cleared. Innocent civilians did die, he said, but Wuterich acted in accordance with his training.

"Everything he did that day was in an effort to protect his fellow Marines after that [improvised explosive device] went off," said Puckett at a news conference after the charges were announced at Camp Pendleton.

Defense attorneys have said the Marines were following established rules of engagement by tossing fragmentation grenades into homes where insurgents were suspected of hiding, and following up with blasts of M-16 fire.

Wuterich and the other three Marines facing murder counts were charged with unpremeditated murder, which brings a maximum penalty of a life sentence. They are from Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, based at Camp Pendleton. None of the Marines were ordered to be confined during the preliminary hearings.

The other Marines facing murder charges are: Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22; and Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24.

Theresa Sharratt, the mother of Justin, who was charged with murdering three people, denied her son was guilty. "He said, 'Mom, we followed the rules of engagement.' " She added that her son "still loves being a Marine, but they let him down."

The Haditha case represents the most serious case of alleged abuse committed by in Iraq or Afghanistan.

The Marine Corps initially dismissed the deaths as the unfortunate result of a firefight between insurgents and U.S. forces.

Dereliction of duty charges for failing to make accurate reports and thoroughly investigate the incident were filed against four officers: Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 1st Lt. Andrew A. Grayson, Capt. Lucas M. McConnell and Capt. Randy W. Stone. Grayson was also charged with making a false statement.

After the Time magazine story, the then-Marine commandant, Gen. Michael Hagee, went to Iraq to talk to front-line Marines about the need to use restraint and show respect for civilians and their property.

In an e-mail this week to The Times, Lt. Gen. James N. Mattis, the convening authority in the case, said that "allegations of what took place in Haditha are not representative of the magnificent conduct our Marines demonstrate daily in a complex and challenging combat environment."

DOJ_NMG_0108554

He said that young Marines in Iraq need to "keep their ethical balance under morally bruising conditions," where enemy fighters often hide behind women and children.

He said that Marines show daily restraint "to preserve the lives of those they are sent to protect and defend; often incurring risk to themselves as they strive to protect the noncombatants on the battlefield."

Under the military system of justice, Mattis will play an enormous role in the case.

After preliminary hearings, called Article 32s, he will decide whether the case is strong enough for court-martial. If there is a conviction by jury or judge, he can overturn it. And he is the final arbiter of any plea bargains.

In another case in Hamandiya, where seven Marines and a Navy corpsman were accused of dragging an Iraqi from his home and murdering him, Mattis permitted plea bargains to lesser charges for the four most inexperienced Marines.

He also turned down a judge's recommendation that after the brig sentences, each be given an dishonorable discharge.

The Haditha case may hinge on the so-called rules of engagement given to Marines by their superiors.

Marines receive lectures about the laws of war and the need to protect noncombatants before they leave the U.S. and soon after they arrive in Iraq. Refresher courses, so-called reset lectures, are given periodically.

In fact, even as the Haditha charges were being announced, Marines were being lectured at Camp Fallouja about the laws of war and the rules of engagement.

The latter are classified rules that, in effect, instruct Marines when it is appropriate to use deadly force — including how much verification is needed before it can be determined that a threat justifies the use of M-16s and other weaponry.

Marines Charged In Iraqi Civilian Deaths (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, December 22, 2006

Eight Marines were charged Thursday in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians last year during a bloody, door-to-door sweep in the town of Haditha that came after one of their comrades was killed by a roadside bomb.

In the biggest U.S. criminal case involving civilian deaths to come out of the Iraq war, four of the Marines — all enlisted men — were charged with unpremeditated murder.

The other four were officers who were not there during the killings but were accused of failures in investigating and reporting the deaths.

The most serious charges were brought against Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, a 26-year-old squad leader accused of murdering 12 civilians and ordering the murders of six more inside a house cleared by his squad. He was accused of telling his men to "shoot first and ask questions later," according to court papers released by his attorney.

The highest-ranking defendant was Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, 42. He was accused of failing to obey an order or regulation, encompassing dereliction of duty.

At a news conference to announce the charges, military officials would not say what they believe prompted the killings. But investigators have raised the possibility that the men went on a rampage in a fury over the roadside bombing that killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas of El Paso, Texas, and wounded two other Marines.

Defense attorneys have disputed that, saying their clients were doing what they had been trained to do: responding to a perceived threat with legitimate force.

Terrazas' father denounced the charges, saying his son was murdered by insurgents. "What they are doing to our troops ... it's just wrong," Martin Terrazas said in Texas. "I feel for their families. They are in my prayers."

Wuterich and two comrades charged with murder could get life in prison. The military is not seeking the death penalty. The other men face shorter prison sentences.

The Marine Corps initially reported that 15 Iraqis died in a roadside bomb blast and that Marines killed eight insurgents in an ensuing firefight. That account was widely discredited, and later reports put the number of dead Iraqis at 24.

A criminal probe was launched after Time magazine reported in March, citing survivor accounts and human rights groups, that innocent people were killed.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis, commanding general of the Marine Corps Central Command, said Thursday that the Corps' initial news release, which stated that the civilians in Haditha had been killed by an improvised explosive device, was incorrect.

"We now know with certainty that the press release was incorrect, and that none of the civilians were killed by the IED explosion," Mattis said.

As word spread that charges were imminent, some Iraqis said Thursday that American troops should face justice in Iraq.

"They committed a horrible crime against innocents," Naji al-Ani, a 36-year-old laborer, said by telephone from Haditha.

Other residents of Haditha agreed.

DOJ_NMG_0108555

"Are they terrorists or are they fighting terrorism?" said Jamal al-Obaidi, a 40-year-old teacher. "The trial is not fair because it is taking place in America. Executing them is the minimum penalty."

Besides Wuterich, Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, was accused of the unpremeditated murders of five people and making a false statement. Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Pa., was charged with the unpremeditated murder of three Iraqis. Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla., was accused of the unpremeditated murders of two Iraqis, negligent homicide of four Iraqis and assault.

The other officers charged were 1st Lt. Andrew Grayson, 25, Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, and Capt. Randy Stone, 34, a military attorney.

The men are not being locked up for now because they are unlikely to flee and are not a danger to themselves or others, said Col. Stewart Navarre, a Corps spokesman.

In Meriden, Conn., Frank Wuterich's father, Dave, said his son was out Christmas shopping. The father said family members believe his son's version of events.

"He says they followed the rules of engagement," Dave Wuterich said. "They were taking small arms fire. They did what they had to do."

Squad Leader, 7 Other Marines Charged With Deaths Of Iraqi Civilians (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, December 22, 2006

CAMP PENDLETON, Calif. — The Marine Corps leveled homicide charges Thursday against four enlisted men who killed 24 Iraqi civilians in the hostile town of Haditha, and accused four officers of failing to properly investigate the deaths.

All of the enlisted men were charged with unpremeditated murder in the biggest U.S. criminal case to be prosecuted out of the Iraq war. Each could receive a life sentence if convicted.

"The Marine Corps takes allegations of wrongdoing by Marines very seriously and is committed to thoroughly investigating such allegations," Col. Stewart Navarre said. "All Marines are trained in and are expected to fully comply with the law of armed conflict."

Lawyers for the accused vowed to fight the charges and said the Marines were caught in a life-or-death confrontation that led to the unintentional deaths of civilians.

The "very dangerous environment" for Marines in Iraq "puts people on a hair trigger in terms of protecting themselves," said Neal Puckett, a lawyer representing Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich.

The defendants accused of unlawful killing during the Nov. 19, 2005, incident were four members of a rifle squad, led by Wuterich, from Camp Pendleton-based Kilo Company, 3rd Marine Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment. The battalion commander at the time, Lt. Col. Jeffrey Chessani, 42, and the company commander, Capt. Lucas McConnell, 31, were among officers charged with dereliction of duty for failing to properly report and investigate the slayings.

Lt. Gen. James Mattis, head of Marine Forces Central Command, authorized the criminal charges under the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Charges included unpremeditated murder, negligent homicide, assault, dereliction, making false official statements and obstructing justice.

Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn., was charged with unpremeditated murder in the deaths of 18 Iraqis. Three squadmates — Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, 22, Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, and Lance Cpl. Stephen Tatum, 25 — were charged with unlawfully killing three, five and six civilians, respectively. The maximum penalty for unpremeditated murder on conviction by a general court-martial is life in prison.

Chessani and McConnell were relieved of command in April. Maximum penalty for dereliction is six months confinement.

Haditha is a Euphrates River farm town of 90,000 about 150 miles northwest of Baghdad in Anbar province, a hotbed of the Sunni-led insurgency. Nineteen civilians in three houses and five people in a taxi were killed there in the course of five hours of Marines' weapons fire after a roadside bomb killed a Marine traveling in the squad's convoy.

The Iraqis who died included four women, six children and an elderly man who used a wheelchair.

Soon after the incident, a Marine Corps news release said that 15 Iraqi civilians had been killed by the roadside bomb and that Marines killed eight insurgents in an ensuing firefight. Navarre said Thursday that the release was incorrect and that none of the civilians was killed by the improvised explosive device.

DOJ_NMG_0108556

Mattis allowed the eight defendants to remain unconfined pending a preliminary hearing, at which a presiding officer will recommend to him whether to order courts-martial or dismiss the charges. Timing of the charges during the holidays was "coincidental," Navarre said.

Only 20 of the 24 civilians who died at Haditha were named as homicide victims. Navarre said it was "privileged information" why four of the deaths were not considered to warrant criminal charges.

Puckett, the lawyer for Wuterich, said his client denies "killing anyone unlawfully" and denies the charge that he made a false official statement.

"They did everything they were supposed to do that day in protecting themselves," Puckett said. The squad "engaged hostile forces" in places that "contained innocent civilians," an unfortunate but common occurrence in war, Puckett said.

The parents and sister of Sharratt, a rifleman from Carbondale, Pa., defended his actions.

"Justin has given everything to his country and has done nothing to disgrace it," said Sharratt's mother, Theresa Sharratt. "To the Marine Corps I simply say: Shame on you - for abandoning my son."

Capt. Randy Stone, 34, who was the military lawyer on Chessani's battalion staff, was alleged to have been derelict in failing to report a possible "violation of the law of war" to higher headquarters. Facing a similar count is 1st Lt. Andrew Grayson, 25, who directed a team that collected photos and other evidence at Haditha.

8 Marines Charged In Killings Of Iraqi Civilians (NYT)

By Paul Von Zielbauer And Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

Responding to one of the most extreme cases of illegal civilian killings by the American troops in Iraq, the Marine Corps today charged four enlisted men with the murders of nearly two dozen people — including at least 10 women and children — in the village of Haditha last year.

Military prosecutors also charged four officers, including a lieutenant colonel in charge of the First Marine Regiment's 3rd Battalion, with dereliction of duty and failing to ensure that accurate information about the killings was delivered up the Marine Corps chain of command.

Marine officials, who announced the charges at Camp Pendleton, Calif., could punish other ranking officers administratively in coming weeks. But the criminal charges filed today against Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 42, and three other officers are an unusually aggressive judicial reaction by military prosecutors to a massacre that has damaged the military's credibility with Iraqi officials and civilians, military justice experts said.

"I think this illustrates the deep seriousness the Marine Corps takes with these events," said Gary Solis, who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University Law Center and at West Point.

"I defintely think the Marine Corps is sending a message to commanders," he added, "to those in authority of combat troops, that they better pay close attention to the activities of their subordinates to ensure that there was no wrongdoing."

The four enlisted men charged with unpremeditated murder, all members of a squad of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment, are: Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, 26, of Meriden, Conn.; Sgt. Sanick De La Cruz, 24, of Chicago; Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, of Carbondale, Penn.; and Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, of Edmund, Okla.

Sgt. Wuterich was charged with killing 13 Iraqis. Sgt. De La Cruz, a Lance Corporal at the time, was charged with five counts of murder. Lance Cpl. Sharratt, a marine rifleman, was charged with three counts of murder. Lance Cpl. Tatum was charged with murder in the death of two Iraqis, negligent homicide in the deaths of four others, and assault.

The charges are the result of two months-long military investigations of the actions of Company K, Third Battalion, First Marine Regiment after a roadside bomb killed one of their comrades shortly after 7 a.m. on Nov. 19, 2005, in Haditha, a village in a dangerous region northwest of Baghdad rife with Sunni Arab insurgents.

A total of 24 Iraqis, nearly all of them unarmed, were killed by several marines in a series of attacks on a car and three nearby homes over the next several hours, military officials said.

Sgt. Wuterich and Sgt. De La Cruz confronted five military-age men, a taxi driver and and four college students, after marines frantically ordered the vehicle to stop, about 100 yards from the stalled marine convoy of four Humvees. The two marines killed all five men after ordering them out of the taxi, marine officials said.

Several marines then attacked a home nearby, killing several family members inside, military officials and defense lawyer said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing six people in the house. Lance Cpl. Tatum is charged with killing four people, including an elderly man in a wheelchair.

Thinking they were under fire and believing they were pursuing attackers from the first home, squad members proceeded to a second home, defense lawyers said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing six people in that house: two adults and four children, including three who were 4, 6 and 11 years old.

Lance Cpl. Tatum is charged with killing two children in the second house: a 15-year-old boy and girl who was about six years old.

At least two hours later, squad members attacked people in a third home nearby, where one AK-47 was found later, military officials and defense lawyers have said. Sgt. Wuterich is charged with killing the first person in that house. Lance Cpl. Sharrat is charged with the murders of three brothers who rushed to the home to inquire what was happening, military officials have said.

In all, Sgt. Wuterich was charged with 13 counts of murder, falsely telling an investigator that the men from the taxi fired at the convoy, and with urging Sgt. De La Cruz to report that those men were killed by Iraqi Army soldiers at the scene.

Lance Cpl. Sharratt was charged with three counts of murder, and Lance Cpl. Tatum was charged with murder in the death of two Iraqis, negligent homicide in the deaths of four others, and assault.

The lawyers for all four enlisted men declared their clients' innocence, arguing in separate statements that the killings were an unfortunate result of marines properly responding to an insurgent attack in a dangerous area northwest of Baghdad.

Sgt. Wuterich and his men, "did everything they were supposed to do that day to protect themselves," said his lawyer Neal A. Puckett.

In addition to Lt. Col. Chessani, prosecutors charged two captains and a 1st lieutenant with crimes for either covering up or failing to discover and pass along certain facts about the killings.

"The reporting of the incident up the chain of command was inaccurate and untimely," Col. Stewart Navarre said at a news conference at Camp Pendleton, Calif., announcing the charges.

Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, 31, the Company K commander, was charged with dereliction of duty for willfully failing to ensure a thorough investigation; Capt. Randy W. Stone, 34, a military lawyer for the Third Battalion, was charged with dereliction of duty for failing to investigate suspected violations; and 1st Lt.

A marine intelligence officer who was part of a team that photographed the aftermath of the killings, Andrew A. Grayson, 25, was charged with dereliction of duty failure to ensure a thorough investigation, making a false official statement and obstruction of justice.

The murder charges against the four enlisted marines are punishable by a maximum of life in prison and dishonorable discharge, the marines said.

The charges filed against four officers carry significantly less potential prison time — two years for Lt. Col. Chessani and Capt. Stone; six months for Capt. McConnell; and more than 10 years for 1st Lt. Grayson — as well as the prospect of dismissal and forfeiture of pay.

None of the eight marines charged enterered a plea Thursday. Formal reviews, known as Article 32 hearings, to determine whether the charges warrant court martial, could begin for each man as early as next month, Mr. Solis said.

Defense lawyers and military justice experts said that in addition the unusually tough overall charges against the eight marines in the Haditha matter, the charges against Capt. Stone, a military lawyer known as a staff judge advocate, or S.J.A., were the most surprising and least expected.

"Stone has come as a complete surprise to everybody," said Kevin B. McDermott, a lawyer for Capt. McConnell. "His name had never come up at all in the last six, eight months. Nobody every thought that an SJA would be put in the crosshairs."

4 Marines Charged In Haditha Killings (WP)

By Josh White And Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Four U.S. Marines were charged with multiple counts of murder yesterday for their alleged roles in the deaths of two dozen civilians in the Iraqi town of Haditha last year. The accusations set up what could be the highest-profile atrocity prosecution to arise from the Iraq war.

In an unusual move, the Marine Corps also charged four officers with crimes related to their alleged failure to investigate and report the Nov. 19, 2005, slayings, which occurred when the Marines conducted a house-to-house sweep and attacked a vehicle after a member of their unit was killed in an ambush.

The separate investigation into how the incident was reported led to dereliction charges against a lieutenant colonel, two captains and a first lieutenant. They are accused of failing to thoroughly investigate and accurately report the slayings to superiors. The lieutenant also faces charges of making a false official statement and obstructing justice, according to the Marine Corps.

None of the murder charges carries a possible death sentence, because the Marines are not accused of premeditated murder. But the charging documents indicate that they did not properly identify their targets, did intend to kill the people in the houses and should have known that their actions could lead to the deaths of innocent civilians.

The 24 civilians were killed in a neighborhood near the spot where a roadside bomb killed a Marine who was driving in a convoy of Humvees. Early media reports suggested that the Marines went on a rampage after Lance Cpl. Miguel "T.J." Terrazas was killed, but they have claimed through their defense lawyers that they were following their rules of engagement when they responded to the attack.

It took the Marine Corps 13 months to charge the men in part because initial reports about the case delivered up the chain of command were incomplete; a public affairs statement about the incident was incorrect; and investigators were not brought in until months later, after a Time magazine reporter asked about the case. Naval Criminal Investigative Service officials have been investigating since March.

Attention to the case increased earlier this year when Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) alleged after briefings from military officials that the Marines had killed civilians "in cold blood."

In a news conference yesterday afternoon at Camp Pendleton, a Marine base north of San Diego, Col. Stewart Navarre declined to comment on details of the cases.

Each of the Marines was charged in multiple slayings, but Staff Sgt. Frank D. Wuterich, 26, a squad leader with Kilo Company, 3rd Battalion, 1st Marine Regiment, 1st Marine Division, was implicated in 18 deaths. Wuterich faces 13 counts of unpremeditated murder.

Kathleen A. Duignan, executive director of the Washington-based National Institute of Military Justice, said: "I think they know they can't prove premeditated murder, because you need to prove intent." She said prosecutors probably will argue that the Marines did not take due and deliberate care and did not follow rules of engagement.

Defense attorneys are likely to argue that the Marines were following the rules while taking fire and simply made mistakes. Duignan said the case falls into a gray area, where lawful combat could blur into unlawful action.

"It's a very fine line," Duignan said. "It will be a very difficult yet very interesting case."

The charge sheets allege that the Marines failed to properly identify their targets and that Wuterich told his unit to "shoot first and ask questions later."

Iraqis in Haditha have described the incident as a massacre, saying Marines went from house to house indiscriminately shooting at men, women and children. One witness told The Washington Post in May that victims pleaded for their lives and said they were not insurgents, moments before they were shot.

Wuterich has long claimed, through his lawyers, that he was responding to a coordinated attack on his unit and did nothing wrong that day. He and other Marines have told their lawyers that they received small-arms fire from the houses they attacked. They used standard house-clearing techniques to ensure that the threat against them was eliminated from two houses, they have said. The slayings of the civilians -- including women and children -- were an unfortunate result of the Marines' attack, they have argued.

Neal Puckett, one of Wuterich's civilian attorneys, said in an interview yesterday that the allegations do not contradict Wuterich's version of events. Puckett said there is no evidence that the Marines lost control or went on some sort of a rampage.

"It's what happens in wartime. You intend to kill the people you're shooting at," Puckett said. "It would imply that they have no proof of a sweep conducted to punish Iraqis."

Wuterich was later recommended for an award for heroism that said his efforts prevented further injury or death to Marines and civilians.

Lance Cpl. Justin L. Sharratt, 22, is charged with three counts of unpremeditated murder, apparently for the deaths of three men he allegedly shot in a third house the Marines entered later on Nov. 19.

Sharratt has maintained his innocence to his family. His parents, Theresa and Daryl Sharratt, were at Camp Pendleton when the charges were announced. In an e-mailed statement, Theresa Sharratt said she believes the Marine Corps has let her son down.

"Justin has given everything to his country and has done nothing to disgrace it," she wrote. "To the Marine Corps I simply say, 'shame on you for abandoning my son who has gallantly served through horrible times.' "

Sgt. Sanick P. Dela Cruz, 24, faces five charges of unpremeditated murder for allegedly killing a group of men who approached the Marine convoy in a white car that morning after the bomb blast. Marines who were on the scene have alleged that Dela Cruz emptied his rifle's clip into the victims' bodies. The Marine Corps alleges that he also lied to investigators after the incident.

Also charged with two counts of unpremeditated murder is Lance Cpl. Stephen B. Tatum, 25, who joined Wuterich as he cleared the Haditha houses. Tatum also faces four counts of negligent homicide -- which carry a maximum punishment of three years in prison -- and one charge of assault.

DOJ_NMG_0108559

Charges in such a case are the first step in the military's legal process and will be followed by an Article 32 hearing, which is roughly equivalent to a civilian grand jury investigation. After that hearing, an investigating officer will recommend how to proceed, and commanders will decide whether the cases should go to courts-martial.

The four Marines charged in the slayings face possible sentences of life in prison. The four officers face much lighter sentences.

They are charged with dereliction for failing to report the incident to superiors and failing to initiate an investigation. None of the officers was at the scene when the slayings occurred. A young lieutenant platoon leader who arrived shortly after the shootings is not accused in the case.

Lt. Col. Jeffrey R. Chessani, 42, the Marines' battalion commander, was charged with one count of violating an order, which carries a maximum sentence of two years in prison, and two counts of dereliction, each of which carries a six-month sentence. Capt. Randy W. Stone, 34, the battalion's staff judge advocate, faces similar accusations. Capt. Lucas M. McConnell, 31, the Marines' company commander, is charged with two counts of dereliction. Lt. Andrew A. Grayson, 25, an intelligence officer, faces two dereliction counts, one count of making a false official statement and one count of obstructing justice.

In a statement to investigators, Chessani said he believed that the Marines' actions followed a complex attack meant to draw them into firing on civilian houses. He said he reported to superiors that civilians had been killed.

"I thought it was very sad, very unfortunate, but at the time I did not suspect any wrongdoing from my Marines," Chessani told investigators, according to a transcript. "I saw it as a combat action."

The four officers are the largest number charged in any one civilian homicide case from the Iraq war and bring to 10 the total number of officers charged in connection with homicide cases.

Sixty-four U.S. service members have been charged in connection with the deaths of Iraqi civilians since the war began in March 2003. Eighteen have been sentenced to prison time, including a 90-year term for an Army soldier who admitted his role in raping an Iraqi teenager in Mahmudiyah and killing her and her family.

'Atrocity' Cases Test US Military Justice (CSM)

By Brad Knickerbocker

The Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

Haditha, Hamdaniyah, and Mahmudiya - Iraqi cities where US troops are alleged to have committed wartime atrocities - may not have seared the public consciousness as deeply as did My Lai in Vietnam. But the cases, including new criminal charges filed Thursday against eight marines in connection with the killing of 24 civilians in Haditha, are sure to focus more attention on how the military handles abuse and killing of prisoners and civilians.

The serious charges brought in these cases also raise basic questions about how the US military-justice system proceeds against alleged atrocities:

What constitutes a "war crime"? What is the responsibility of officers of enlisted soldiers and marines who are found guilty? What punishments are being meted out?

Prosecution in such cases falls under the US Uniform Code of Military Justice, the Law of Armed Conflict, and the Geneva Conventions. But it is the "rules of engagement" that may be most relevant for troops going into battle.

Such rules for combat typically are set by the unit commander just before an operation begins, based on an evaluation of mission, enemy, terrain, troops, and time available, says retired Army Col. Dan Smith, a military analyst with the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Quaker lobby in Washington. But, he adds, rules of engagement "can be idiosyncratic."

Colonel Smith notes, too, that "soldiers always have the right of self-defense using even deadly force if they judge that they are in danger of suffering grievous wounds or death from enemy action."

In the Haditha case, those marines charged with killing civilians (including 10 women and children shot at close range) are expected to assert that they were fired on from houses near where their convoy was hit by an improvised explosive device (IED) that killed a lance corporal.

"Our view has been and continues to be that these are combat-related deaths," defense lawyer Gary Myers told the Associated Press. Mr. Myers represents Lance Cpl. Justin Sharratt, who faces one charge of murder involving unpremeditated killings of three men in a house.

Evidence gathered by military investigators contradicts that, prompting the Marine Corps to charge four of the eight marines with murder. It also led Thursday to charges against four others - unit officers not present at the scene - of failing to properly investigate and report the event. The highest-ranking officer to be charged is a lieutenant colonel, accused of failing to obey an order or regulation, encompassing dereliction of duty.

That raises questions about the responsibility of officers up the chain of command, from lieutenants leading platoons to colonels commanding brigades.

DOJ_NMG_0108560

Rank should be important in assessing professional and perhaps even criminal responsibility, says Gary Solis, a 26-year Marine Corps veteran who served as a courts-martial prosecutor and judge.

"Under the law of armed conflict, if a superior knew, or should have known, of a subordinate's misconduct, and he took no action to stop it or to punish it, then he is himself personally criminally liable for the crime committed," says Dr. Solis, who directed the law of war program at West Point and now teaches at Georgetown Law School in Washington.

"That's basic World War II Nuremberg Tribunal stuff," he says. "But how often have we seen the principle honored? Not often."

During the nine-year Vietnam War, 95 soldiers and marines were convicted of murder or manslaughter of noncombatants. Courts-martial resulted in sentences as stiff as 50 years and life in prison.

In Iraq and Afghanistan, most incidents involving civilian deaths caused illegally by US forces have resulted in far lighter punishment, Solis finds.

For example, an Army chief warrant officer charged with negligent homicide in the 2003 death of an Iraqi detainee received a letter of reprimand, a fine of $6,000, and two months' restriction to Fort Carson, Colo. A sergeant involved in the beating death of an Afghan detainee in 2005 was reprimanded, given a one-grade demotion, and fined $1,000. In the Abu Ghraib prison scandal, the most senior officer punished was Army Reserve Brig. Gen. Janis Karpinski, demoted to colonel.

But dealing with detainees is very different from fighting in the heat and fog of battle, especially when the enemy emerges from or blends into the civilian populace. That situation, which troops face routinely in Iraq and Afghanistan, can lead to a difficult and potentially deadly paradox.

"Because Army personnel are trained for conventional warfare, they naturally want to kill the enemy," says national security analyst Ivan Eland of the Independent Institute, a nonpartisan think tank. "But in counterinsurgency warfare, a premium must be put on providing security for the population without killing civilians.

"This unfortunately means tighter rules of engagement, which increases US casualties," says Dr. Eland.

In Haditha, the death of one marine and injuries to two others while traveling in a convoy preceded the attacks on Iraqi civilians. The squad leader that day faces the most serious charges - murdering 12 people and ordering other marines to kill six people. His attorney said the charges carry a maximum penalty of life in prison.

Other recent cases of civilian deaths at the hands of US troops point to murderous intent.

In the Hamdaniyah case, seven marines and a Navy corpsman have been charged in the kidnap and murder of an Iraqi man, and then making it look as if he had planted an IED. So far, four have pleaded guilty to lesser charges in return for prison terms of less than two years.

In the Mahmudiya case, five Army soldiers have been charged in the rape and premeditated murder in April of a 14-year-old Iraqi girl and the murder of her parents and 5-year-old sister. One soldier pleaded guilty to avoid the death penalty. Another, a sergeant charged with dereliction of duty for failing to report the crimes, accepted an "other than honorable" discharge from the Army. Cases against the others are pending.

As with civilian trials, the nature of the evidence may lead military prosecutors to conclude that negligent homicide - not premeditated murder - is the most serious case they can make.

"Even with negligent homicide, the starched and pressed judge advocate who's not been in combat has to convince a jury that the young [marines] who daily risked their lives in Iraq are unworthy of belief," says Solis, the former Marine Corps judge advocate. "That could be a hard sell, and acquittals would not surprise me."

Some experts attribute such atrocities to the stress of enduring multiple tours of duty in Iraq, as well as the very difficult circumstances of fighting an unconventional war.

"It seems to me the main point is that these incidents are symptoms of combat stress," says John Pike, director of globalsecurity.org. "The question is whether the combat stress management system is doing a good job because there are so few incidents or a bad job because these incidents happened."

Gates Meets With Iraqis On Military Aid (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 22, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates traded ideas with Iraqi leaders Thursday about boosting military assistance for the embattled government and warned Iraq's neighbors that the U.S. will be a presence in the Persian Gulf for a long time.

But on the second day of a visit to the war zone, the new Pentagon chief would not answer the key question on the minds of many, including U.S. troops: Will he recommend a short-term increase in the number of American forces in Iraq?

DOJ_NMG_0108561

Speaking to reporters after meetings with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and other Iraqi officials, Gates said the talks were "mainly on the overall approach, including the possibility of some additional assistance." He said no numbers of additional troops were discussed.

"We were really talking in broad terms," said Gates, who is in his first week as defense secretary.

Gates' visit comes as President Bush reassesses U.S. policy in the war, which is solidly opposed by the American public after 3 1/2 years of bloodshed. Among the president's options is whether to quickly add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq, in hopes of staunching the escalating violence in Baghdad and elsewhere.

In the meetings, Gates said he discussed how "with Iraqis in the lead, we can best play a supporting role" in helping bring order to the country. He said he assured the Iraqis of "the steadfastness of American support and our enduring presence in the Persian Gulf."

Earlier in the day, he said Iran and Syria are playing a negative role in the violence. A special U.S. commission, the Iraq Study Group, recently suggested a diplomatic push that would involve all of Iraq's neighbors — including Iran and Syria. Bush, however, has seemed disinclined to involve those two American nemeses.

"We need to make damned sure that the neighbors understand that we're going to be here for a long time — here being the Persian Gulf," said Gates, during a morning meeting with soldiers.

He suggested that commitment will include keeping U.S. logistics and support troops in Iraq for a lot longer than the combat forces.

Gates said he discussed with the Iraqis how their government could address the deteriorating security problems. Besides an unrelenting insurgency, killings and kidnappings between Sunnis and Shiites are approaching civil war dimensions and U.S. and civilian casualties keep rising.

"One of the strong messages I received today was the desire of the Iraqi government to take a leadership role in addressing some of the challenges that face the country, above all the security problem here in Baghdad," Gates said during a press conference with Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir.

Gates said there are several approaches that could be used to improve security, yet offered few details. He sidestepped several questions probing for more details about the possibility of boosting troop levels — an idea that has gotten mixed reviews.

After Gates met with U.S. soldiers at Camp Victory, several said the extra forces would help.

"Sir, I think we need to just keep doing what we're doing," Spc. Jason T. Green, with the 101st Military Intelligence Brigade Combat Team of the 1st Infantry Division, told Gates during a breakfast session with about 15 soldiers.

"I really think we need more troops here," Green said. "With more presence on the ground, more troops might hold them off long enough to where we can get the Iraqi Army trained up."

Military commanders worry that rushing thousands more Americans to the battlefront could prompt Iraqis to slow their effort to take control of their country.

Those concerns are "clearly a consideration" in mapping out future strategy, Gates said.

His hourlong question-and-answer session over scrambled eggs was spent largely gathering insights from those closest to the action.

When Gates asked whether adding forces would help, he got a roomful of nods and smattering of "yes, sir" responses.

"More troops would help us integrate the Iraq Army into patrols more," said Pfc. Cassandra Wallace, from the 10th Mountain Division.

The soldiers told him they think the Iraqi Army is getting better, but that it should be bigger and that many of the Iraqis are still not showing up for duty.

Gates, who later flew by helicopter to Balad Air Base west of Baghdad for a special operations briefing, did not tip his hand much to the soldiers.

Gates planned more meetings Friday before returning to the United States.

Gates, In Iraq, Hears Support For More Troops (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq Dec 21 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, talking to enlisted soldiers on his second day in Iraq, heard broad support today for a proposal to send more American forces to Iraq, an idea that has emerged as a leading option as the Bush administration considers a strategy shift.

“I really think we need more troops here,” said Specialist Jason T. Glenn, one of several soldiers at a breakfast meeting with Mr. Gates who backed the idea. “With more presence here,” he said, security might improve to a point that “we can get the Iraqi Army trained up.”

DOJ_NMG_0108562

Mr. Gates said later, after meeting with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials, that he had discussed “the possibility of some additional assistance” with the Iraqis, but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops.

Although Bush administration officials are considering a temporary troop increase of 20,000 soldiers or more, which would raise troop levels in Iraq to more than 150,000, the idea runs counter to the desire of many American commanders for the Iraqi Army and the Iraqi police to take more responsibility for security. Mr. Gates has provided no firm signs on what he will recommend to Mr. Bush after returning from Iraq.

Still, the Bush administration may see a temporary increase as a way to regain momentum in Baghdad, where security has been deteriorating, as well as providing leverage to get Mr. Maliki to take steps sought by American officials, like moving more Iraqi troops into Baghdad and moving against sectarian militias.

At a news conference with the Iraqi defense minister, Abdul Qadir al-Obaidi, Mr. Gates said he discussed with the Iraqis was how their government could take the lead, especially in reducing the worsening violence in Baghdad.

“One of the strong messages I received today was the desire of the Iraqi government to take a leadership role in addressing some of the challenges that face the country — above all, the security problem here in Baghdad,” Mr. Gates said. The talks examined “how in our partnership with the Iraqis in the lead we can best play a supporting role” in improving security, Mr. Gates added.

Mr. Gates said at the breakfast meeting with troops that the Bush administration was putting together a package of idea for reversing the violence, including new procedures for delivering reconstruction assistance quickly to places where the military has conducted operations to clear out insurgents and militias.

Mr. Gates said the first assistance to a neighborhood should come “within hours” of the end of such a clearing operation, to shows residents the tangible benefits of rejecting militants and backing the Iraqi government.

It was not clear how the soldiers who met with Mr. Gates had been selected, but in a show of hands he requested, about half said they were serving their second tour in Iraq and the rest said they were in their first deployment.

Several soldiers said the Iraqi Army and police were improving but were not competent enough for them to shift to a supporting role. Many Iraqi soldiers and police officers do not show up regularly for work, they said, and some tip off insurgents and sectarian militias about coming military operations.

“Are they ready to take it on themselves?” Mr. Gates asked, referring to the Iraqi security forces. Sgt. Christopher Coulter, an infantryman with the First Infantry Division, replied, “Not now, but they’re getting a lot better”

When Mr. Gates asked, “Do you think we need more American troops?” a majority of the soldiers nodded their heads or murmured, “Yes, sir.”

Iraqi Prime Minister Tells Gates He'll Let U.S. Decide On Troop 'Surge' (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks And Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 -- Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told visiting Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates that he would let U.S. generals decide whether there is a need for a "surge" in U.S. troops deployed in Iraq, according to Iraqi officials with knowledge of the meeting.

In a news conference, Gates said his conversation with the Iraqi prime minister and defense minister included "no numbers. . . . We were really talking in broader terms."

Iraqi Defense Minister Abdul Qadir Muhammed Jassim later indicated general acceptance of an idea that has emerged as one of the chief options President Bush is considering as he reevaluates Iraq policy. "I did not say no to an increase in the number of U.S. troops," Qadir said in a brief interview after the meeting at Maliki's residence in the Green Zone. "If we need it, we need it."

But after seeing Gates, Maliki met with Shiite Muslim members of his alliance, in a session where divisions unfolded over whether more U.S. troops were needed, said Sami al-Askari, a Shiite member of parliament who is close to Maliki. Askari, who attended the second meeting, said there was a general feeling that "there's no need for further troops."

Gates said that during his meeting with Maliki, he "emphasized . . . the steadfastness of American support" for Iraq. The message he heard back from Maliki, he said, was that the Iraqi government wants to take the lead role in solving the country's security problems -- including in the most violent zones in and around Baghdad.

According to a statement issued by the prime minister's office, Maliki told Gates that Sunni Arab insurgents and loyalists of Saddam Hussein's former Baath Party were behind the violence unfolding in the capital.

Maliki spoke in general terms about the Baghdad security plan he has developed, saying Iraqi forces were working with U.S. troops to enact the plan "according to a new vision," the statement said. Maliki's close advisers say he has proposed a two-pronged strategy in which U.S. troops would target Sunni Arab insurgents in outer Baghdad neighborhoods for four to eight weeks, while Iraqi forces would take over control of inner Baghdad.

Maliki would also launch a political offensive, which would include threats of force, to persuade radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr to agree to contain his Mahdi Army militia during the operation.

Gates has billed his trip to Iraq, launched the day after he became defense secretary earlier this week, as key to formulating his recommendations for Bush on how to reshape the U.S. approach in Iraq. But in his public comments, he gave little indication of how his two days of talks here so far with generals, enlisted soldiers and Iraqi officials have affected his views.

He had breakfast Thursday with more than a dozen enlisted soldiers who were less bashful. Along with his scrambled eggs and hash browns, Gates got an earful about the need for more personnel.

"I really think we need more troops here," said Spec. Jason Glenn, who said he operates an unmanned aerial vehicle in an intelligence unit in the 1st Infantry Division. He said he has noticed that when insurgents see a drone aircraft overhead, they simply lie low, "so I think more presence on the ground" is the answer.

"I think we do need more troops over here," agreed Pfc. Cassandra Wallace, a support soldier in the 10th Mountain Division. "More troops would help us integrate the Iraqi army into patrols here."

Asked later about his breakfast with the soldiers, Gates said he asked for their advice, and "they were not hesitant to give it." He dodged the question raised by their call for a boost in troop levels, saying, "Like most people on the front lines in a battle, they'd always like to have more forces."

There are about 140,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq, and recently there has been an intense discussion inside the Bush administration about whether to increase that by roughly 30,000 troops for six months, to try to bring security to Baghdad.

"Some say 140,000 troops is quite enough to secure Iraq," said Askari, the Shiite politician allied with Maliki. "The problem is not in the number but in the way the security plan is conducted. The concept of trying to balance between a majority and minority in Iraq, and doing plans only if the minority accepts, is the issue. Some see this as the main problem with the plan. As long as the Americans don't change this tactic, adding more troops won't matter."

Other Shiite politicians at the meeting with Maliki said U.S. and Iraqi commanders should decide whether to increase U.S. troop levels, Askari said.

Late Thursday, the Associated Press reported that Sadr had agreed to allow his supporters to return to their positions in the government and end a three-week boycott of the government begun to protest Maliki's meeting with Bush last month. Nassar al-Rubaie, head of Sadr's parliamentary bloc, denied that account.

Askari said members of the Shiite alliance, a coalition of Shiite groups that leads the government, are planning to meet with Sadr to try to persuade him to end the boycott. Others want to take stronger action and demand that he denounce the Mahdi Army's involvement in sectarian strife.

"We have to solve this for good," Askari said. "We have to have him denounce the militias for good." He added that the meeting would dovetail with Maliki's effort to persuade Sadr to lay down his arms, provided the U.S. accepts the prime minister's security plan.

But Askari said it was still unclear whether Sadr would meet with the Shiite alliance members.

ADMINISTRATION LEANS on Persian Gulf allies to help Iraq.

U.S. military officials and diplomats want Saudi Arabia, United Arab Emirates and other Gulf states to recognize Maliki government, send ambassadors to Baghdad and forgive more than $40 billion in Iraqi debt. Among Sunni states, only Egypt has sent an ambassador, and he was assassinated.

The problem: Most Arab states, an official says, "see the current government as...an Iranian stooge." U.S. conditions military help to counter Iran on assistance in Iraq.

Iran also becomes lever for Rice to rally "mainstream states" behind Israeli-Palestinian solution.

SOME MILITARY LEADERS aren't opposed to Iraq troop surge.

Army leaders privately tell White House they could back more soldiers if Bush provides latitude to sustain the effort through reserve call-ups. One of the first units called back to Iraq could be the Florida National Guard brigade that served in restive Ramadi in 2003.

Army Chief of Staff Schoomaker aims to link surge to pact sharing Iraq's oil revenue, as well as moves by Maliki to isolate Shiite extremists like Moqtada al-Sadr. U.S. wants Iraqis to reduce influence of Sadr -- who has ended a government boycott -- through a coalition of Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish parties.

Bush Caved To Pressure On Troops (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

President Bush only acceded to a jump in the number of U.S. Army and Marine Corps ground troops after intense pressure from senior officers, active and retired, including the Joint Chiefs, defense sources said.

Mr. Bush, who announced Wednesday that he will increase an active force that now stands at 1.4 million personnel, this month heard about the stressed Army and Marines Corps from a group of retired officers at the Pentagon.

But the deal-clincher came when he traveled to the Pentagon and met with the six-member Joint Chiefs inside the super-secret "tank."

There, the commander in chief listened to a request for more combat forces from Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, and Gen. James T. Conway, the Marine commandant, said defense sources briefed on the meeting.

The Army, with a little more than 500,000 active soldiers, is pulling the brunt of the war on terror both in Afghanistan and Iraq. Army combat brigade teams only receive about a 13-month home-base stay before deploying again. What's more, the Army is fast wearing out its inventory of armored vehicles and weapons and needs replacements fast, Gen. Schoomaker has said.

The Marines, who patrol the al Qaeda-infested al Anbar province, west of Baghdad, send 1st and 2nd expeditionary forces on seven-month rotations. Marine officers have complained of insufficient troop numbers to control the Sunni Muslim province.

The messages on a larger armed forces, but not necessarily a troop increase for Iraq, came in rapid succession earlier this month. On Dec. 11, Mr. Bush welcomed to the White House two outside military analysts and three retired officers, including former Army Gen. Barry McCaffrey, a critic of former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Gen. McCaffrey said in a previous interview that the Army should be increased by 80,000 soldiers.

"We have inadequate Army and Marine Corps combat power to sustain this level of deployment," said Gen. McCaffrey, who led the 24th Infantry Division in Desert Storm.

DOJ_NMG_0108565

Two days after he met with the retired generals, Mr. Bush went to the Pentagon and later called the discussion "candid." A day later, Gen. Schoomaker told a blue-ribbon commission on the Guard and Reserve that the Army "will break" unless the active force is bumped up. He suggested 6,000 more soldiers per year.

Republicans on the House Armed Services Committee have endorsed an increase of 11,000 Army soldiers, to 523,000, and 8,000 more Marines, to 187,000. On a trip to Iraq this week, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates did not endorse any specific numbers.

Gen. Schoomaker and Mr. Rumsfeld's staff did not see eye to eye on the size of a budget increases needed to replace damaged equipment in a process called "reset."

"Schoomaker wants everything replaced so every unit and every soldier is equipped to the max," said an aide.

The good news for the president is that the Joint Chiefs do not favor proposals from Democrats to remove all 135,000 troops immediately from Iraq or to bring them out in a preset timeline. A defense source also said the chiefs "are cool at best" to the Iraq Study Group proposal to have virtually all land combat forces out of Iraq by early 2008, if conditions permit.

"I think one of the most important things the new secretary of defense has to do is realize we are badly underfunding the Department of Defense for the missions we have given them," said retired Air Force Lt. Gen. Thomas McInerney, an Iraq war hawk. "We are going to have to increase the defense budget significantly."

The Pentagon is spending about $460 billion annually, plus an expected $170 billion more this fiscal year to fund the Iraq and Afghanistan wars.

"The president is not only going to have to do an Iraq strategy, he is going to have to do a national strategy for the whole military," Gen. McInerney said. "We cannot continue like we are going now."

Mr. Bush's decision to ask Congress for a bigger Army and Marine Corps is a break from the policy of Mr. Rumsfeld. Instead of seeking a permanently larger Army, he exercised his legal authority to temporarily boost the Army by up to 30,000 soldiers.

At Pentagon, A New Personality Faces The Same Tough Calls (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21— When Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates sat down for breakfast on Thursday with a half-dozen enlisted soldiers here in Iraq, it was not the setting that his aloof predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, would have chosen.

Most often, Mr. Rumsfeld would meet with hundreds of troops at once in Iraq, in town-hall-style sessions that often resembled rallies. He took questions, made sweeping historical comparisons and was often cheered by enthusiastic crowds, but never seemed to use the session to collect impressions about conditions outside the heavily fortified American military compounds.

Mr. Gates, by contrast, listened patiently for almost an hour at the breakfast while enlisted soldiers offered him their views about everything from strategy and tactics to mundane matters of soldier life.

In a statement never heard in public from the supremely confident Mr. Rumsfeld, he closed the session by going around the table one soldier at a time, asking: “What advice would you give me?”

Just days into Mr. Gates’s tenure, it is easy — and facile — to view almost every move he makes as either a deliberate or unconscious repudiation of Mr. Rumsfeld. By heading right off to Iraq, the scene of Mr. Rumsfeld’s undoing, Mr. Gates has seemed to invite the comparison, even though his one public mention of Mr. Rumsfeld since he was sworn in was to praise him.

Where Mr. Rumsfeld was volcanic and opinionated, Mr. Gates has come across as humble and open-minded.

Where Mr. Rumsfeld fought to keep troop levels in Iraq low, Mr. Gates is assumed to be inching toward recommending increasing American troop levels, even as he professes not to have made up his mind.

When Mr. Gates vowed, as he has several times, to rely heavily on advice from the uniformed military, it was seen as a subtle signal that he would not run roughshod over the Pentagon brass the way Mr. Rumsfeld was widely criticized for doing.

How valid these early impressions of Mr. Gates will prove to be, though, is still an open question.

If Mr. Gates comes down in favor of a troop increase, it will arguably put him in the same position Mr. Rumsfeld often found himself — at odds with his top generals in Iraq, several of whom have expressed reservations about increasing American troop levels.

There are other similarities. Both men left Washington for long periods before assuming the defense secretary job. Those who knew Mr. Gates during his 27-year tenure at the Central Intelligence Agency, where he became the first entry-level analyst to rise to become director, say he could be an exacting bureaucratic taskmaster, just like Mr. Rumsfeld.

But Mr. Rumsfeld returned to Washington determined to accumulate power and run a bureaucracy he viewed as resistant to change, a task he kept at even after the terrorist attacks of 2001 and the invasion of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0108566

Mr. Gates has not returned with sweeping ambitions of transforming the department.

Nor has he brought a coterie of ideologically driven aides with him, as Mr. Rumsfeld did initially, and Mr. Gates has informed much of Mr. Rumsfeld's senior staff, few of whom are now as ideological as they once were, that he wants them to stay on, to minimize disruption.

Certainly the two men are stylistically very different, as Mr. Gates's breakfast meeting underscored. On Mr. Rumsfeld's visits to Baghdad, he rarely showed much patience for pondering the flaws in American strategy, at least not in public. His answer to questions about stabilizing the country was that it was "tough stuff" but largely up to the Iraqis to accomplish.

Last March, days after the selection of Nuri Kamal al-Maliki as prime minister, Mr. Rumsfeld stared at the ceiling, noticeably uninterested, at a news conference while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice fielded reporters' questions about the worsening sectarian violence.

Mr. Gates, by contrast, leaves no doubt that he sees fixing Iraq as his overriding mission.

He is still working out a public style in a position that brings much more attention than that given a college president or even a C.I.A. director. "I'm new at this," he reminded reporters at a news conference on Thursday with Iraq's defense minister, Abdel-Kader Jassem al-Obeidi.

Perhaps he recognizes that his best management tool, at least for now, is to be seen as the anti-Rumsfeld, a persona that will buy him time to consider far-reaching changes in strategy.

Certainly it helped him win bipartisan confirmation in the Senate, winning over Democrats who favored setting a rapid date for beginning troop withdrawals and Republicans who want to send reinforcements.

Just over a month ago, Mr. Gates was a member of the Iraq Study Group, apparently as comfortable as the panel's other members with recommending a major shift in Iraq strategy aimed at getting American combat troops out by early 2008.

"I didn't dream at that time I would have actual responsibility for what goes forward," Mr. Gates told reporters this week, in a statement that seemed to indicate he was having sudden doubts about at least some of the study group's recommendations for getting out quickly.

Since taking office, he said publicly several times that the responsibilities of his office — and the need not to fail in Iraq — are weighing heavily on him.

He has even taken to repeating one of Mr. Rumsfeld's favorite lines about Iraq: that the problems there will not be solved by the American military, but by the diplomats at the State Department and by the Iraqi government.

Rice: Iraq Worth Investment In U.S. Aid (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told The Associated Press on Thursday that Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars and said the U.S. can still win a conflict that has been more difficult than she expected.

In an interview at the State Department, the nation's highest-ranking black government official also said the United States is ready to elect a black president.

Rice was asked whether an additional $100 billion the Pentagon wants for the Iraq and Afghan wars might amount to throwing good money after bad in Iraq. President Bush and Congress have already provided more than $500 billion for the two conflicts and worldwide efforts against terrorism, including more than $350 billion for Iraq.

"I don't think it's a matter of money," Rice said. "Along the way there have been plenty of markers that show that this is a country that is worth the investment, because once it emerges as a country that is a stabilizing factor you will have a very different kind of Middle East."

The top U.S. diplomat made the remarks as Bush faces mounting pressure from the public and members of Congress to find a fresh course in the long-running war. More than three-and-half years after the U.S. invasion that deposed Saddam Hussein, the conflict shows no signs of nearing an end and has cost the lives of more than 2,950 American troops.

Bush conceded this week for the first time that the U.S. is not winning the conflict, though he said it is also not losing.

"I know from the point of view of not just the monetary cost but the sacrifice of American lives a lot has been sacrificed for Iraq, a lot has been invested in Iraq," Rice said.

Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed," Rice said.

Rice said the Bush administration should be remembered for far more than the Iraq war. She ticked off foreign policy commitments and accomplishments including increased aid to fight AIDS and malaria in Africa and a peace deal ending two decades of North-South warfare in Sudan.

DOJ_NMG_0108567

Rice has repeatedly said she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls. Rice declined to say whether she would like to see her predecessor, Colin Powell, become a candidate. Powell is a fellow black Republican.

"I'm not going to give Colin any advice and he's not going to give me any advice on this one," Rice said.

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., is the most prominent black politician to emerge as a potential candidate for the 2008 presidential race. Rice was asked whether, watching Obama's rise, she thinks Americans are willing to put a black in the White House.

"Yes, I think a black person can be elected president," Rice said.

She said the first successful black candidate will be "judged by all the things that Americans ultimately end up making their decision on: Do I agree with this person? Do I share this person's basic values? Am I comfortable that this person is going to make decisions when I'm not in the room that are very consequential?"

At the same time, she said, "We should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time."

Rice said she has no reason to believe North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in disarmament talks this week that a Japanese envoy described as deadlocked.

"They're signed on to denuclearization," in an agreement last year that was never implemented. "We'll see whether or not they follow through," Rice said.

A watered-down United Nations sanctions resolution against Iran would have more than symbolic value, Rice said. But she said she has no assurances that Russia will vote for the resolution this week despite long efforts to satisfy Moscow's misgivings about sanctions.

"The Russians say that they want to prevent the Iranians from perfecting technologies that could lead to a nuclear weapon," Rice said. "I take them at their word and that's why I think ... they will reflect that in their support for a resolution."

She said she is confident all U.N. members will enforce the sanctions once passed, no matter how they voted.

Iraqi Factions Try To Undercut A Plan To Isolate Extremists (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 — Several Iraqi political groups on Thursday maneuvered to undercut an American-backed initiative that would create a multisectarian bloc intended to isolate extremists like the Shiite cleric and militia leader Moktada al-Sadr.

The bloc would consist of Sunni Arab, Shiite Arab and Kurdish parties in an alliance that would be novel in Iraq's highly sectarian political environment. This week, Iraqi and Western officials said that Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a highly influential Shiite cleric, had given a tentative go-ahead to the coalition.

But on Thursday, Saleem Abdullah, a Sunni Arab lawmaker who is a senior member of the Iraqi Islamic Party, said his party had set tough new conditions for its participation in the bloc.

And Mr. Sadr was considering a plan to announce that his militia, the Mahdi Army, would scale back its military activities in response to accusations that it was involved in sectarian violence, an official knowledgeable about the plan said.

The framers of the bloc seemed highly unlikely to be able to meet some of the Islamic party's demands, like an insistence that more Sunni Arabs be installed in senior positions at Iraqi ministries and security forces now controlled by Shiites.

"Now the negotiations are stopped, and we are waiting for their response," Mr. Abdullah said. "Honestly, I think an agreement will be very difficult."

As those political moves played out, the new United States defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, met with enlisted men and women in Baghdad to talk about the possibility that more troops could be sent to Iraq. And the American military announced that three more service members had died in Iraq, putting December on a pace to be among the deadliest months of the conflict.

Also on Thursday, 38 bodies of Iraqis were found dumped at various sites around Baghdad, apparently the victims of death squads, the Interior Ministry said, and three bombs killed at least 12 and wounded 18.

The deadliest of the blasts was a suicide bomb that went off near a police academy just after 7 a.m., a police official said, killing mostly police recruits. A second bomb exploded near a funeral procession in the Amel neighborhood, and another detonated near a passport office.

The trial of Saddam Hussein on charges of the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds during the 1980s was adjourned until Jan. 8. Prosecutors told the court that Iraqi soldiers had been ordered to cooperate with Turkish forces in the killings, but the precise nature of an implied agreement between the countries was not spelled out.

When a document supposedly describing the agreement was read into the record, the judge ordered the microphone cut off so that reporters could not hear it. Beyond interjecting a few brief comments, Mr. Hussein mostly sat silently.

DOJ_NMG_0108568

Mr. Sadr's maneuvers on Thursday were seen by some officials as a possible move to reduce his political and military liabilities as the Americans and their allies pressed to form the bloc meant to marginalize him and perhaps make any attempt to disarm or attack the Mahdi Army more politically palatable.

At the moment, Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki owes his power to a coalition that includes a major contingent led by Mr. Sadr, complicating any move against the cleric or his Mahdi Army militia.

Mr. Sadr was also said to be ready to allow his allies to rejoin the government after a three-week boycott, The Associated Press reported.

The walkout, including 30 lawmakers and six cabinet officials, was a protest against Mr. Maliki's meeting with President Bush in Jordan, and it has kept Mr. Maliki's government from passing legislation. Any return by the politicians would make it more likely that Mr. Sadr could keep some influence in the government even if a new cross-sectarian governing bloc was approved.

"Within two days, the Sadr movement will return to the government and Parliament," said Abdul Karim al-Anizi, a lawmaker from Mr. Maliki's Dawa faction, according to The Associated Press. Two allies of Mr. Sadr's who were not identified also said the politicians would return.

Although there were hints on Thursday that the Sunni Arab Iraqi Islamic Party might reconsider some of its demands, if taken at face value they would almost certainly scuttle the formation of the unity bloc because they could never be met in the spoils system of Iraqi politics.

In that system, the ministries are doled out to parties that won various shares of the vote in the last elections, and top ministry posts are given to members of those parties.

In Baghdad, Mr. Gates talked to enlisted service members on the second day of his visit to Iraq. A majority of the troops at the meeting signaled that they supported the idea of sending more American forces to Iraq, a proposal that has emerged as a leading option as the Bush administration considers a strategy shift.

"I really think we need more troops here," said Specialist Jason T. Glenn. "With more presence here," he said, security might improve to a point that "we can get the Iraqi Army trained up."

On Wednesday, American generals expressed concern about such a plan, saying that sending more troops would make Iraqis less likely to take responsibility for security.

After a meeting with Mr. Maliki and other senior Iraqi officials, Mr. Gates said that he had discussed "the possibility of some additional assistance" but that there had been no mention of specific numbers of additional American troops.

Mr. Gates told the troops that the administration was putting together a package of ideas for reversing sectarian violence, including procedures for delivering reconstruction assistance quickly to places where the military had conducted operations to clear out insurgents and militias.

Mr. Gates said the first assistance to a neighborhood should come "within hours" of such a clearing operation, to shows residents the tangible benefits of rejecting militants and backing the government.

It was not clear how the troops who met with Mr. Gates had been selected, but in a show of hands he requested, about half said they were serving their second tour in Iraq and the rest said they were on their first.

Several said the Iraqi Army and police were improving but were not competent enough for the Americans to shift to a supporting role. Many do not show up regularly for work, they said, and some tip off insurgents and militias about military operations.

Shiite Cleric Lets Supporters Rejoin Iraqi Government (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD — Radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr has agreed to allow his supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government after a three-week boycott to protest the prime minister's meeting with President Bush, three officials close to the militia leader said late Thursday.

Al-Sadr's loyalists — 30 in parliament and six in the Cabinet — walked out three weeks ago after Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki met Bush in Jordan. The move halted the passage of legislation.

Shiites from the Iraqi parliament's largest bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, met Thursday in their holy city of Najaf, as part of a plan to persuade the anti-American militia leader to rejoin the political process and rein in his fighters. They were in touch with al-Sadr's aides, and would meet the cleric today or Saturday, aides to participants told the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the secrecy of the talks.

"The main (United Iraqi) Alliance forces and the al-Sadr movement have agreed to solve the problems and overcome the obstacles that made al-Sadr boycott the political process," said Abdul Karim al-Anizi, a Shiite lawmaker from the Dawa faction.

DOJ_NMG_0108569

Two figures in al-Sadr's movement — an aide and a parliament member — also told AP the cleric had agreed to allow his followers to go back to their jobs.

On Thursday, al-Sadr's loyalists met with members of the Shiite bloc, and laid out their demands for returning to the government, said the lawmaker. "Our demands are to hand over the security file and not allow any regional interference in Iraqi affairs," he said. The Sadrists planned to issue a statement on Saturday, he added.

The reference to the security file appeared to be a demand that U.S. forces cede control of security to the Iraqi government. American forces already are implementing a plan to give more responsibility to Iraqi troops, but doubts remain about whether they are ready.

Al-Sadr's agreement to tell his followers to rejoin politics was possibly the result of intervention by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's top Shiite cleric, in a bid to keep Shiite unity. Still unsettled: the fate of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, blamed for some of the country's worst attacks on Sunnis.

American officials also were considering changes to Iraq policy, including a short-term surge in U.S. troop numbers. Defense Secretary Robert Gates, on his second day in Iraq, met with Iraqi leaders to discuss "the overall approach, including the possibility of some additional assistance." He was vague about the type of assistance and said no specific numbers were discussed.

President Bush is considering whether to quickly send thousands of additional troops to the country.

Mideast Leaders Seek Their Own Solutions For Region (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

CAIRO

For many of the Middle East's leaders, the upshot of the swirling American debate over Iraq is that when, as seems likely, the US withdraws it will leave behind an ongoing war.

So the region's powers - US allies Jordan, Israel, and Saudi Arabia, and its foes Syria and Iran - are engaging in new diplomatic efforts, largely aimed at preventing Iraq's fighting from causing broader turmoil.

While in some cases the talks are only tangentially about Iraq, this high-level dialogue appears to reflect a new reality: With US prestige crippled by the war, regional actors are bypassing the West to forge partnerships and find solutions on their own.

Thursday, Jordan's King Abdullah II, who has recently been more vocal about restarting Arab-Israeli negotiations, invited Palestinian rivals Hamas and Fatah, locked in deadly street battles this past week, to hash out their differences in Jordan on Sunday.

In Beirut, Arab League negotiator Amr Moussa seems to be making some progress at ending the political crisis between the country's ruling coalition and the Shiite militant party Hizbullah.

But in all cases, Iraq is the volatile backdrop, specifically its potential to become a proxy arena for the region's problems.

A good example is Israel. Watching the unfolding tragedy in Iraq and with its own war this summer against the Shiite militants of Hizbullah in mind, it's reaching out to the Jordanians, the Saudis, and the Lebanese to find solutions to its own security problems.

"In the late 1990s, Israel's worldview was that 'we are the military superpower in the region and we are very closely allied with the world's only superpower. So we have very little to worry about,' " says Gidi Grinstein, a former peace negotiator for the Israeli government and now president of the Reut Institute, a Tel Aviv think tank.

Now, he says, "you have America in a situation of very serious overstretch, unable to get a decisive victory across the region ... we have to look for new partners, alliances, and means of cooperation."

Before Sunday's meeting between Fatah and Hamas was announced, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert flew to Jordan Tuesday to talk with Abdullah about reviving failed peace talks with the Palestinians.

Diplomatic activity is also swirling in Lebanon, where a domestic squabble over the country's sectarian power-sharing arrangement, also draws together the competing interests of the Sunni Arab powers of the region on the one side, and Shiite Iran, on the other.

DOJ_NMG_0108570

Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa, a former Egyptian foreign minister, returned to Beirut Wednesday, where he met with an Iranian official and Lebanese leaders from the ruling party and Hizbullah, before traveling to Damascus to meet with that country's president, Bashar Assad.

His regional hopscotch is an effort to cobble together a deal that would probably see pressure lessened on Syria over its political role in Lebanon in return for Hizbullah, an ally of Syria and Iran's, agreeing to a smaller role in a new Lebanese government than it has been demanding so far. The current Beirut government, in turn, is heavily backed by both the US and by Saudi Arabia, which sees it as a bulwark against the expansion of Iranian influence in the region.

From Iraq to Lebanon and in the capitals of Amman and Cairo, the perception of Iran as a potential threat is driving the new engagement and is making for unusual alliances in which the interests of a state like Israel's are being closely aligned with those of the Saudi Arabian monarchy.

In a speech in Dubai Wednesday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair starkly summed up the views of the many governments that fear the expansion of Iranian power.

Iran has profited strategically from the rise of a Shiite-dominated government in Iraq whose main leaders are drawn from Shiite Islamist movements, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI) and the Dawa Party, which have close ties to Tehran.

Mr. Blair accused parts of Iran's government of "openly supporting terrorism in Iraq ... trying to turn out a democratic government in Lebanon; flaunting the international community's desire for peace in Palestine ... and trying to acquire nuclear weapons capability."

While Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Israel are less concerned about democracy in Iraq or Lebanon, they are all committed to opposing an expansion of Iranian power, which they see as threatening their own vital interests.

In that area of concern, Iraq once again takes center stage. Saudi Arabia and Jordan are not only concerned about refugees and a sectarian war that could spill over and destabilize their countries, analysts say, but with the chance that Iraq could take center stage in the 25-year-old cold war that has persisted between Shiite Iran and its Sunni neighbors.

"All of these players are on the same side wishing to preserve the state order rather than seeing it undone," says Asher Susser, an expert on Jordanian-Israeli relations at Tel Aviv University. "That is why the undoing of Iraq causes such anxiety to Israel, to Jordan, to all those adjacent to Iraq."

Their current maneuvers, talking with disaffected former Baathists in their capitals and, regional diplomats say, quietly passing money to Sunni insurgent groups in Iraq in an effort to build up influence and intelligence aren't particularly likely to end Iraq's war soon.

But they could find a way to contain the violence there and the regional animosities it is threatening to inflame, or set the stage for Iraq to become a proxy battle ground.

"If you're looking forward, this is the next stage," says Toby Dodge, a political scientist and expert on Mideast Politics at Queen Mary College at the University of London. "The point will soon come when it's much more obvious than it is today that the Americans are going home, and then what will the Saudis and others do?

"Will they say, right, the sky is falling in ... but we have an opportunity to contain it by working together? Or, will this become the front line of a much nastier covert war?" he says.

Greg Gause, a political science professor at the University of Vermont and Middle East expert, says: "This is about balance of power politics ... it seems to me what the Saudis, particularly the Saudis, fear is growing Iranian power, and they fear that the Iranians will seek to use that to destabilize the Gulf and their own country, through their own Shia populations."

Regional diplomats say Saudi Arabia is already funding some Sunni groups in the country, and a recent International Crisis Group report on Iraq recommended that Saudi Arabia cut "off funding from private Saudi sources" to insurgent groups in Iraq that refuse work toward a national peace deal.

Iran, for its part, is in fact expanding its influence inside that country. "They want to be the guiding foreign-policy actor in Iraq, which will eventually have an oil policy, and that's also something Iran wants a say in.... I think they're winning all this and they're ambitious," says Mr. Gause.

Mr. Dodge says that Saudi and Jordanian fears about expanding Iranian influence, famously termed by Jordan's Abdullah as a potential "Shiite crescent" arcing from Iran to Lebanon, exaggerates the threat to their states, but the fear itself is nevertheless real and could have negative consequences.

Suicide Bomber Kills 14 In Baghdad (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108571

BAGHDAD — A suicide bomber wearing an explosives-packed belt killed 14 Iraqis near a crowded police recruitment center in the capital this morning, in the latest salvo by Sunni Arab insurgents against the Shiite Muslim-dominated government.

Also today, three U.S. troops were reported to have been killed in separate combat incidents.

The police recruiting station bombing cost Mustafa Numan, a 25-year-old trying to sign up for the police, two of his friends.

"We were all getting ready to get into line when the explosion occurred," he said from his bed at Kindi Hospital, where he recovered from stomach and leg wounds. "I lost consciousness and came to at the hospital. I consider myself lucky when I think about those who lost their lives."

Sunni Arabs distrust Iraq's security forces as a Shiite-controlled tool in the country's sectarian civil war. In addition to the police recruiting center bombing, Sunni insurgents today killed a police intelligence officer in west Baghdad and attempted to kill another police commander near Kirkuk.

Apparent insurgent bomb strikes and shootings in the capital left at least three more dead.

Suspected Shiite militiamen with alleged ties to security forces have waged their own deadly campaign, killing dozens a day in secretive death squad operations. At least 76 unidentified bodies were discovered in and around Baghdad during a 24-hour period ending Wednesday night. Another four bodies were discovered today in southern Iraq.

The three U.S. troops died over the past three days. One Marine died in Al Anbar province today. A soldier was killed in a roadside bombing south of Baghdad on Wednesday. Another soldier died Tuesday in Al Anbar.

December is shaping up as one of the deadliest for Americans in Iraq. But U.S. soldiers told visiting Defense Secretary of State Robert M. Gates that a controversial proposal to increase the American troop presence in Baghdad would buy time to stabilize Iraq.

"I really think we need more troops here," Spc. Jason Glenn told Gates during a meeting at Camp Victory in Baghdad, according to news services. "With more presence on the ground, more troops might hold them [the insurgents] off long enough to where we can get the Iraqi army trained up."

Gates, in Iraq on a second day of a fact-finding mission, was told by the soldier that the current strategy of training Iraqi forces to take over from Americans was working.

"Sir, I think we need to just keep doing what we're doing," Glenn said.

Gates later met with senior Iraqi officials, assuring them of U.S. support for the fractured Baghdad government.

"The Iraqi government is determined to improve the security of the people here in Iraq, and above all here in Baghdad," Gates told reporters after meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and other ranking officials, according to the news agencies.

Meanwhile the judge in the genocide trial of Saddam Hussein and six codefendants silenced testimony suggesting that Turkey, a U.S. ally, cooperated with Baghdad during a late 1980s operation to use chemical weapons to crush rebellious Kurds.

"There has to be very delicate cooperation with the Turkish side to ensure that these ... ," said a passage in Aug 21, 1988 document read in the courtroom before the judge cut off the sound.

Another audio snippet a few minutes later referred to a "secret Iraqi-Turkish protocol" that allowed Turkish troops to enter Iraq in pursuit of Kurdish guerrillas fighting the Ankara government.

Three U.S. Troops Killed (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 21 -- The U.S. military announced Thursday that three more American service members have been killed in Iraq, as a suicide bomber detonated himself in a crowd of police recruits in Baghdad, killing 15.

A Marine assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died in western Anbar province Tuesday, and soldier from the 1st Brigade, 1st Armored Division, died there Wednesday, the military said. The area is considered the heartland of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

A roadside bomb killed one soldier and wounded three others while they were escorting personnel to their base south of Baghdad on Wednesday, the military said.

The deaths occur as President Bush, under pressure to come up with a new war strategy, is considering sending more U.S. troops to Iraq. Military casualties have mounted as American forces have tried to calm sectarian violence in the capital while fighting insurgents in Anbar.

The Web site Icasualties.org, which tracks war fatalities, said Thursday that 70 service members had died this month, which would put December on track to becoming one of the deadliest of the year. The U.S. military, whose count often lags behind those of independent organizations, said 51 service members had been killed.

DOJ_NMG_0108572

Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman, cautioned against ranking death tolls. "We don't count them that way," he said.

Insurgents have often targeted crowds of Iraqi army and police recruits. On Thursday, a suicide bomber detonated explosives in his vest at Baghdad Police College in eastern Baghdad, killing 15 people and wounding 15, the U.S. military said. Police reports said three police officers and 12 recruits were among the dead, according to the military.

An Interior Ministry official who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media said the suicide bomber detonated the bomb at 7:15 a.m. as he stood with the police recruits near the ministry building.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, the commander of the Adala Police Station, Col. Adnan Mohammad, escaped an assassination attempt when a roadside bomb exploded in his convoy. Four bodyguards were wounded, according to Col. Yadqar Abdul Allah of the Kirkuk police.

Meanwhile, at Saddam Hussein's genocide trial, prosecutors have spent the week presenting videos and documents purporting to show that Hussein's government sanctioned the use of chemical weapons against civilians.

Sultan Hashem Ahmed, former minister of defense, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, former deputy director of army operations, denied using such weapons. They said that they did use conventional weapons against Iranian troops and insisted that they were carrying out the orders of their superiors.

Hussein and six other defendants are on trial for the so-called Anfal campaign, which prosecutors say resulted in the deaths of as many as 180,000 ethnic Kurds. The trial was adjourned until Jan. 8.

The Builder Who Bombed In Iraq (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Until this year, Parsons Corp. was about as quiet as a $3 billion engineering and construction firm with 12,000 employees could be. That's the way the firm's chief executive for the past decade -- a soft-spoken, white-haired Army veteran named James F. McNulty -- liked it.

But Iraq has changed everything.

Parsons has been reproved in recent federal audits for completing just a small fraction of the 150 primary health clinics originally planned to be built in Iraq and for building a police academy so flawed that human waste rained from the ceilings. For this, it has taken bipartisan hits on Capitol Hill, where its name is now whispered by war critics in the same breath as that perennial boogeyman, Halliburton.

Sick of taking blame, McNulty, 64, is speaking out about what went wrong with his firm's work and what he regards as the problems with how the United States uses private contractors in Iraq.

In a recent interview at the firm's Washington offices, one of a series he has given, McNulty said the government handed Parsons an impossible task by setting unrealistically high expectations for how much could be built while under-funding its efforts. McNulty said the company repeatedly pleaded with the government to either provide enough money to get the job done or scale back its goals, but said its entreaties were ignored.

"The entire reconstruction effort was much too ambitious," McNulty said. For instance, he said, his firm wanted to build a small number of clinics, some in each of three regions of the country, rather than try to do all 150 at once. "If we had built five in each region, we could have at least understood what problems we were going to face in building them," he said. "And we probably would have had 15 darn good clinics up a lot faster."

McNulty, a West Point graduate who served two tours in Vietnam during a 24-year Army career, also suggested the government needed to rethink its heavy dependence on the private sector for reconstruction, security and support in a combat environment.

The comments are unusual for the leader of a firm that makes much of its money doing work for the government. Then again, few have been battered as badly as Parsons, an employee-owned, California-based company with a six-decade track record. Since the spring, when news of the stumbling health clinic program first broke, the company's performance has been derided in the press and put under the microscope at congressional hearings. At a hearing in September, Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) spoke of a $75 million police academy that Parsons was responsible for but that went badly awry: "This is the lens through which Iraqis will now see America. Incompetence. Profiteering. Arrogance. And human waste oozing out of ceilings as a result."

At the same hearing, Stuart W. Bowen Jr., special inspector general for Iraq reconstruction, said 13 out of 14 Parsons projects that his office examined were flawed.

While Bowen's reports have spread the blame for the failed projects between Parsons and the government, one of the firm's customers in Iraq, the Army Corps of Engineers, has pointed responsibility squarely at its contractor.

DOJ_NMG_0108573

"We had hundreds and hundreds of projects completed at the same time by other contractors. Parsons just wasn't able to meet their schedules," said Michael Fallon, a corps official who directed reconstruction programs in Iraq.

Fallon said that with the money Parsons was given to build health clinics -- roughly $200 million -- it should have been able to complete its work. The government insisted on 150 clinics, produced on an accelerated schedule, because "the country of Iraq needed health care in a hurry," Fallon said. Parsons says it finished 20 clinics before being terminated from the contract, though the corps insists just seven are operational.

"I don't know how much they understood what they were getting into," Fallon said.

McNulty contends the company was misled. Parsons had worked in Bosnia, Kosovo and Kuwait, and it was prepared for a similar security situation in postwar Iraq. The firm won eight reconstruction contracts, worth $1.7 billion, with a hope that those contracts would serve as a bridge to more work as the country blossomed under new leadership. "All the contractors were told to assume, and this is a quote, a 'permissive security environment.' That means to me you're going to be able to move around the country," he said.

Instead, the company's expatriate employees were virtual prisoners of the heavily fortified, U.S.-run Green Zone. At most sites, it was too dangerous for Parsons's expatriates. The company had to train Iraqis to oversee construction carried out by Iraqi subcontractors. Many were inexperienced firms that found themselves targeted by insurgents. Parsons subcontractors were kidnapped, killed by roadside bombs and assassinated in their offices. McNulty declined to answer questions about violence against expatriate Parsons employees until after they are all out of Iraq.

"You would have 500 workers on the site, and then one kidnapping or one bombing later, you would have no people out there for a week or two," McNulty said.

Meanwhile, McNulty said the company was not getting the help it needed from the government. U.S. officials initially gave the company coordinates for building clinics that turned out to be locations at the bottom of a lake or on top of a mosque. As U.S. officials rotated in and out of Baghdad, priorities shifted. "We couldn't get anybody to really make any decisions," he said.

Those factors took a toll on the company's timelines. But Jon C. Bowersox, who oversaw health care projects for the U.S. Embassy from late 2005 until mid-2006, said the company was not transparent about its problems. "They were giving [the government] very optimistic completion dates," Bowersox said. Clinics that were supposedly 90 percent complete proved to be far from it, he said, although added that he does not blame Parsons entirely.

"The real take-home message is you can't do construction in the midst of a civil war," he said.

McNulty said he would like to see the government rethink how it handles reconstruction in a combat zone. In Iraq, the government oversees the work, but contractors handle both the construction and security at work sites. In future conflicts, he said, he would like to see the U.S. military or an international force at least take over security, and perhaps the construction work itself.

Parsons, meanwhile, is not through with Iraq just yet. The company boasts it has completed more than a thousand projects there, and is still wrapping up others.

McNulty said the criticism Parsons received has been "a huge morale problem" for employees who served in Iraq. He has personally been under intense pressure to explain the company's performance to potential clients and to the public. But he said the firm continues to rack up contracts even as it comes under assault.

"We've lost no business over it," McNulty said. "In fact, the very people who are criticizing us are giving us more work."

Saddam Co-defendants Deny Gassing Kurds (AP)

By Al-Bashir and Halaby

AP, December 22, 2006

Two former Iraqi commanders denied gassing Kurdish civilians in northern Iraq 20 years ago, telling Saddam Hussein's genocide trial Thursday that they used only conventional weapons against Kurdish rebels and Iranian troops.

Sultan al-Tai, minister of defense under Saddam, and Gen. Hussein Mohammed, a deputy director of army operations, testified to rebut evidence presented by prosecutors in videos and documents this week.

The documents, prosecutors said, showed Saddam's government sanctioned the use of "special weapons" — mustard or nerve agent — against Kurdish civilians as well as rebel fighters in 1987-88.

In sometimes emotional testimony, al-Tai alleged some of the documents implicating him in waging chemical warfare were forged. "I didn't use any special weapon against the Kurds," al-Tai shouted at the judges.

The two men, Saddam and four other former members of his regime have pleaded innocent to charges of war crimes and crimes against humanity for their roles in the military campaign, code-named Operation Anfal. The campaign took place during the 1980-88 Iraq-Iran war.

DOJ_NMG_0108574

An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the operation. Saddam and one other defendant have pleaded innocent to the additional charge of genocide.

Al-Tai and Mohammed argued Thursday — shouting at times — that Iranian forces had infiltrated northern Iraq and were using Kurdish rebel bases to attack government troops.

Both men insisted they used only conventional weapons and both said they were carrying out their superiors' orders.

"My job allowed me only limited responsibility," Mohammed told the court. "In an army, a deputy commander is not the responsible person."

He challenged evidence presented by prosecutors. "Did I sign these documents?" he demanded. "Is my name on them? If it's there, I'll sign my execution myself."

The chief judge, Mohammed Oreibi al-Khalifa, interrupted to say: "Prosecution documents show that special weapons were used, but you say they weren't from army warehouses?"

"No," Mohammed responded.

"So they didn't belong to you," the judge asked.

"Of course not," Mohammed said.

"So, where did they come from?" al-Khalifa asked.

"I don't know. Had I known, I would've told you. You have to ask other people — the military industrialization department," Mohammed replied, provoking a smirk from Saddam, sitting in the dock alongside him.

Al-Tai said the government relocated Kurdish civilians for their safety during the campaign.

"We removed all civilians from the fighting zones. The civilians were transferred in trucks ... and they were put in safe houses," al-Tai said.

Chief prosecutor Munqith al-Faroon scoffed at this claim.

"I wonder where the people in the mass graves come from?" al-Faroon asked the judges rhetorically. "How were they transferred to the mass graves? Maybe in the same trucks that went to the safe houses he's talking about!"

"We saw documents. We watched videos incriminating them. What more do we need — believe the documents and the videos or believe him?" the prosecutor said.

The trial was adjourned to Jan. 8.

At an earlier trial, Saddam was condemned to death for the killing of nearly 150 people in the town of Dujail after a 1982 attempt to assassinate him. His lawyers have appealed both the verdict and sentence, and the appeals court is expected to rule next month.

Iraqi officials suggest that Saddam's prosecution on genocide charges would be halted if the appeal court upholds the death sentence of the first trial.

NATO Ex-commander Warns On Pakistan Border (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

Islamic fighters are still entering Afghanistan from Pakistan, despite a deal between Islamabad and tribal chiefs meant to cut down the incursions, NATO's former top General warned.

General James Jones, who handed over to General John Craddock as Supreme Allied Commander Europe this month, said the Western alliance's political leadership would raise the issue with Pakistan unless things improved.

Pakistan's government signed peace deals in September with tribal elders along the border, saying the move would help stem the flow of Taliban fighters entering Afghanistan to battle Western troops.

But Jones said during an appearance at the Atlantic Council of the United States think-tank, he had discussed the situation frankly with General Ehsan Ul Haq, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Pakistan's military staff last month.

"I told him that the returns did not really look too encouraging, given the porous nature of the borders and some very physical evidence that fighters were still coming across and returning rather freely across the many border crossings that are there," Jones said.

"I think that from the political side that NATO will be heard through the Secretary General on this issue if it continues to be a significant problem," said Jones.

"The problem of the Taliban is not an Afghan problem alone. This could be a Pakistani problem if Afghanistan doesn't work out the way we want it to."

However, Jones said that he had been convinced of Haq's "earnestness and sincerity" to work with the Western alliance, and said several initiatives involving NATO, Pakistan and Afghanistan would be put in place over the winter.

Agency To Test Military Draft Machinery (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0108575

By Kasie Hunt

AP, December 22, 2006

The Selective Service System is planning a comprehensive test of the military draft machinery, which hasn't been run since 1998.

The agency is not gearing up for a draft, an agency official said Thursday. The test itself would not likely occur until 2009.

Meanwhile, the secretary for Veterans Affairs said that "society would benefit" if the U.S. were to bring back the draft and that it shouldn't have any loopholes for anyone who is called to serve. VA Secretary Jim Nicholson later issued a statement saying he does not support reinstituting a draft.

The Selective Service "readiness exercise" would test the system that randomly chooses draftees by birth date and the network of appeals boards that decide how to deal with conscientious objectors and others who want to delay reporting for duty, said Scott Campbell, Selective Service director for operations and chief information officer.

"We're kind of like a fire extinguisher. We sit on a shelf" until needed, Campbell said. "Everyone fears our machine for some reason. Our machine, unless the president and Congress get together and say, 'Turn the machine on' ... we're still on the shelf."

The administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed.

A day earlier, President Bush said he is considering sending more troops to Iraq and has asked Defense Secretary Robert Gates to look into adding more troops to the nearly 1.4 million uniformed personnel on active duty.

According to the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office, increasing the Army by 40,000 troops would cost as much as $2.6 billion the first year and $4 billion after that. Service officials have said the Army wants to increase its force by 20,000 to 30,000 soldiers and the Marine Corps would like 5,000 more troops.

The unpopular war in Iraq, where more than 2,950 American troops have already died, complicates the task of finding more recruits and retaining current troops — to meet its recruitment goals in recent years, the Army has accepted recruits with lower aptitude test scores.

In remarks to reporters in New York, Nicholson recalled his own experience as a company commander in an infantry unit that brought together soldiers of different backgrounds and education levels. He said the draft "does bring people from all quarters of our society together in the common purpose of serving."

Rep. Charles Rangel, a New York Democrat who has said minorities and the poor share an unfair burden of the war, plans to introduce a bill next year to reinstate the draft.

House Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi has said that reinstating the draft would not be high on the Democratic-led Congress' priority list, and the White House said Thursday that no draft proposal is being considered.

Planning for the Selective Service exercise, called the Area Office Mobilization Prototype Exercise, is slated to begin in June or July of next year for a 2009 test. Campbell said budget cuts could force the agency to cancel the test, which he said should take place every three years but hasn't because of funding constraints.

Hearst Newspapers first reported the planned test for a story sent to its subscribers for weekend use.

The military drafted people during the Civil War and both world wars and between 1948 and 1973. An agency independent of the Defense Department, the Selective Service System was reincorporated in 1980 to maintain a registry of 18-year-old men, but call-ups have not occurred since the Vietnam War.

VA Head: Draft Beneficial To Society (AP)

By Sara Kugler

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush's secretary for Veterans Affairs said Thursday that "society would benefit" if the country brought back the military draft, then clarified that he doesn't support such a move.

Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson spoke a day after Bush said he is considering sending more troops to Iraq. The administration has for years forcefully opposed bringing back the draft, and the White House said Thursday that its position had not changed.

Nicholson, who served in Vietnam, was in New York to announce a partnership with Mayor Michael Bloomberg to help homeless veterans find housing.

A reporter suggested that the all-volunteer armed forces attract a disproportionate number of minorities and people trying to lift themselves out of poverty, and asked Nicholson if the draft should be reinstated to make the military more equal.

"I think that our society would benefit from that, yes sir," Nicholson said.

DOJ_NMG_0108576

The secretary recalled his own experience as a company commander in an infantry unit that brought together soldiers of different backgrounds and education levels, noting that the draft "does bring people from all quarters of our society together in the common purpose of serving."

He later issued a statement saying his comments had been misconstrued and that he does not support bringing back the draft.

Nicholson, a graduate of the military academy at West Point, N.Y., served eight years on active duty as a paratrooper and Ranger-qualified Army officer, then 22 years in the Army reserve. He has held the VA post since February 2005.

Bush said he has not made up his mind about whether to send more troops to Iraq. No timetables or totals have been outlined publicly, but by some accounts roughly 20,000 troops could be added to the 140,000 already there.

Their Christmas At War (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Thanks to a military blogger who calls himself "Blackfive" ("The Paratrooper of Love"), we have a snapshot of what Christmas looks like this year at Camp Taji, 20 miles north of Baghdad. It's a man dressed up in a Santa Claus suit, standing behind a "sleigh" that is actually an unmanned aerial vehicle and six soldiers who are wearing antlers and perched precariously on the launch ramp.

Or we can read this Christmas message posted Dec. 21 from "Lt. Col. Patrick," an Air Force C-130 pilot. Next to a picture, taken at his base, of a Christmas tree decorated with festive lights, he writes: "Holiday deployments are difficult but the one characteristic that comes from being away from home at this time of year is that everyone else misses home too. You don't hear people actually complain about missing Christmas at home I think because we're all in it together." Misery may love company, but in the military, it keeps its mouth shut.

This holiday season, America is struggling through a searing national debate about Iraq. The horror of the war feels immediate, even to people who've never been near Baghdad, but less so the humanity of the thousands of American soldiers who are serving there. That's part of the Iraq disconnect: The war dominates our political life, but the men and women in the midst of it often are nearly invisible. We see them in thumbnail photos in group obituaries but not as real, living people.

If you read soldiers' blogs, and I've looked at several dozen over the past few days, you see a recurring anger that the media aren't telling their story. So I'll let a few of the military bloggers speak for themselves. If you want to share in the conversation, a good place to start is http://milblogging.com, which collects blogs from soldiers deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan and around the world.

Needless to say, the first thing most American soldiers are thinking about is getting back home. They wait for a magic acronym: RIP/TOA, which means: "Relief in Place/Transfer of Authority." In his blog, "Duty in the Desert," Lt. Col. Patrick writes: "You can easily tell the folks that have been here awhile from the newer arrivals. New guys tell you how they're doing and what they're feeling. The old heads, deployed longer, start off every sentence with how many days remaining in their tour."

A young woman who calls herself "Techno" has a small Christmas tree at the foot of her bed. She explains in her blog that she broke up with her boyfriend before joining the Army and coming to Iraq. She wrote this week: "I really can't think of a better place to go through all of this. Back home, I would have been a mess for a lot longer and really would have gone back to him."

What does Iraq mean? For many soldiers, the big issues debated back home are less important than the simple reality of being there. A 23-year-old soldier who calls himself "Dreadcow," who recently returned home, tries to explain: "As much as it sucked I wouldn't trade my time in the desert for anything. . . . When people ask me what I did during the war I don't have to say I shoveled [expletive] and picked strawberries." Dreadcow says he has learned two things from Iraqis: the importance of having a special place for your gun at home, and the requirement that "every male should have some sort of facial hair."

The military bloggers celebrate their heroes, like Pfc. Ross A. McGinnis, a 19-year-old Army gunner from Knox, Pa., who died Dec. 4 falling on a grenade that was thrown into his truck, thereby saving his buddies. His platoon sergeant explained: "He had time to jump out of the truck. He chose not to." His friend Pfc. Brennan Beck said of him: "He loved it here in Iraq. He loved being a gunner. It was a thrill, he loved everything about it." He was awarded the Silver Star posthumously.

War changes people. That's something that comes through powerfully in these soldiers' accounts of life in the battle zone. "Grey Eagle," the moniker of a 35-year-old combat medic serving with the 101st Airborne Division, writes in her blog, "I have been living in another life time another dimension so separate from the world I left behind that I fear I may never really find my way back. Will those I love be able to accept me if I was not the exact person they knew. Would they be angry with me for the loss of my innocence."

Media-Sourcing Debate On Deck At Capitol (WSJ)

By JESS BRAVIN, SARAH ELLISON

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration is increasingly at odds with some Republicans over its efforts to make journalists reveal confidential sources.

The controversy is reaching a flashpoint in San Francisco, where the Justice Department is expected to file papers today urging that two San Francisco Chronicle reporters face jail if they refuse to reveal their source for confidential grand-jury proceedings concerning baseball slugger Barry Bonds's alleged use of steroids.

The issue also is expected to re-emerge on Capitol Hill next year, where two influential Republicans, Sen. Richard Lugar and Rep. Mike Pence, both of Indiana, plan to reintroduce legislation limiting the government's power to force journalists to disclose confidential sources. Many Democrats, whose party will control Congress next year, also support extending protection to reporters' sources and are expected to co-sponsor the legislation.

Mr. Pence said in an interview that he expects to reintroduce the bill with his Democratic co-sponsor in the previous Congress, Rep. Rick Boucher of Virginia. In the upper house, he said Sens. Lugar, Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) and Arlen Specter (R., Pa.) were likely to be involved as well.

"We're suggesting there's been a tear in the First Amendment right now, and it's widening," Mr. Pence said. "The only way you patch it is to do as many states have done and pass a federal statute that clarifies the boundaries."

Mr. Pence said that some were surprised to see him and other conservatives championing a press-freedom bill. "It's one of those things that's a little counterintuitive for a cheerful right-winger to be involved in," he said, but "I really do believe that the framers of the Constitution put a free and independent press in the First Amendment to protect the public's right to know, and the only way you do that is protect reporters' ability to keep certain sources confidential."

Currently, all states except Wyoming have passed laws or issued court rulings that provide some level of protection for reporters' confidential sources or notes from subpoenas, says Marv Johnson, a legislative counsel with the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington. The rationale for the so-called shield laws is that society benefits from aggressive news reporting, a value embodied in the First Amendment. Giving prosecutors or other litigants access to reporters' sources could transform journalists into investigators for the government or private parties, media advocates say, potentially exposing sources to retaliation and thereby impeding public access to news of possible wrongdoing or questionable activities.

Others maintain that the First Amendment confers no privilege upon journalists and that, in any case, legal proceedings take precedence over news gathering. In 1972, the Supreme Court upheld a local prosecutor's subpoena to make a Louisville, Ky., reporter disclose the identity of sources he had seen in possession of marijuana. The court rejected "the notion that the First Amendment protects a newsman's agreement to conceal the criminal conduct of his source, or evidence thereof, on the theory that it is better to write about crime than to do something about it," Justice Byron White wrote.

The case didn't resolve all constitutional questions regarding the issue, however, and various federal circuit courts have interpreted them differently.

The Justice Department also has long taken a stand against letting its prosecutors routinely pry open reporters' notebooks, and in 1973 issued guidelines requiring that the U.S. attorney general personally approve subpoena requests for the news media. In its most recent version, the guidelines state that "except under exigent circumstances" such subpoenas should "be limited to the verification of published information."

Under Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, the Justice Department has pursued journalists' sources in cases ranging from a terrorism investigation of Islamic charities to the alleged vandalism of a police car. In the latter case, free-lancer Josh Wolf has been jailed since September for refusing to turn over videotape of a July 2005 altercation between protesters and San Francisco police in which a city police car was vandalized. Although California state law would bar local prosecutors from obtaining Mr. Wolf's footage, federal authorities have asserted jurisdiction because the San Francisco Police Department receives some funding from Washington.

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said the government continues to follow its guidelines and disputed claims that pursuit of reporters' sources and records has increased under Mr. Gonzales. "Over the past 15 years there have been less than 20 source subpoenas issued," she said, although no figures were available on subpoenas for unpublished notes or recordings. "To say we've been incredibly cautious and restrained when using this lawful tool is an understatement."

DOJ_NMG_0108578

San Francisco Chronicle reporters Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams have published articles and a book involving allegations that Mr. Bonds, the San Francisco Giants slugger, committed perjury when he testified in 2003 that he never knowingly used steroids to boost his performance. At the urging of federal prosecutors, U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White found the Chronicle and its reporters in contempt of court for refusing to reveal how they obtained the information for grand-jury proceedings, with a potential penalty of 18 months in jail and a $1,000 per day fine.

The Chronicle's owner, Hearst Corp., backed by dozens of states and news organizations, appealed to the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, also in San Francisco, and the government's response is due today.

In an attempt to turn the tables on the government's push to learn the identity of reporters' confidential sources, Norman Pearlstine, the former top editor at Time Inc. (and earlier of The Wall Street Journal), this week filed a Freedom of Information Act request with Mr. Gonzales seeking documents relating to subpoenas of reporters in three high-profile cases.

The request seeks documents regarding Mr. Gonzales's approval of grand-jury subpoenas sent to the Chronicle and its reporters; to Mr. Wolf; and for telephone records of the New York Times and its former and current reporters, Judith Miller and Philip Shenon, respectively, in connection with a federal investigation into Islamic charities.

"I don't know what guidelines Gonzales was reading," Mr. Pearlstine said in an interview, "but I don't see how these cases fit into the Justice Department's own guidelines about subpoenas." Mr. Pearlstine has spent the past year writing a book on anonymous sources. While editor in chief of Time Inc., Mr. Pearlstine agreed to hand over the notes of Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine reporter, after exhausting appeals to a court order to cooperate with a federal grand jury.

Mark Corallo, the Justice Department press secretary under former Attorney General John Ashcroft, filed an affidavit in the Chronicle case saying that he wouldn't have approved the reporter subpoenas. "This case is so far below the acceptable standards the department has lived by for close to 40 years that it will embolden prosecutors to make this a first step, not a last step," Mr. Corallo said in an interview.

Some lawmakers are troubled by the pursuit of reporters' sources as well. "The lack of adherence to departmental standards, to the extent there are any, is a troubling matter and one I expect the committee will want to examine," Rep. John Conyers (D., Mich.), the House Judiciary Committee's incoming chairman, said through a spokesman.

The War On Terror And Rule Of Law Collide (NBC)

By Pete Williams, Justice correspondent

NBC News, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The judicial branch of the government lived up to its task during the last year, working as a check on both the White House and Congress.

Between the Supreme Court's striking down of the Bush administration's plan to conduct military trials for war-on-terror detainees and the pursuit of allegedly corrupt government officials, it was a busy year for the Justice Department.

With decisions expected on the National Security Agency's Terror Surveillance Program and the Lewis "Scooter" Libby trial getting underway in January, 2007 is expected to be just as decisive.

The year that was: 2006

Legal rights reshaped in war on terror

The Justice Department struggled to respond to a setback delivered in June by the U.S. Supreme Court, which struck down the administration's plan to conduct military trials for detainees picked up in the war on terror. The court's five-member majority held that the military tribunal rules failed to follow a long-standing federal law requiring all military courts to provide fair trial rights.

Congress passed a new law allowing terror trials before military courts but providing more protections for defendants. Even so, the law raised new questions about the appeal rights of detainees.

Terror Surveillance Program

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pushed Congress to find a way to resolve legal doubts about the government's Terrorist Surveillance Program, the NSA-run effort to monitor the calls of suspected terrorists.

Officials conceded that the program could involve listening in on the calls of American citizens without a court order. The administration disclosed some of the program's details, once among the most closely held secrets, after its existence was reported by the New York Times. Well over a dozen lawsuits were filed in federal courts, challenging the constitutionality of the program. But when the Congress finished its work in early December, no agreement had been reached on clarifying the program's legality.

Terrorism prosecutions

New statistics showed the number of federal terrorism prosecutions dropping to its lowest point since 9/11, with the new cases filed being generally less dramatic.

Seven men in South Florida were accused of being part of a terror plotting to attack prominent buildings, including the Sears Tower. And an Illinois man was accused of planning to set off hand grenades at a shopping mall. But in neither case did those arrested get very far in their planning or even appear to have many resources to carry out an attack.

Nonetheless, the government defended its record. "We could await further action by these men and then arrest and prosecute them. Or we could prosecute at the moment our investigation reveals both a risk to our national security and a violation of our nation's laws," said Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general.

High profile prosecutions

A growth area for federal prosecutors came in high profile cases involving government figures. An investigation of Congressman William Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, touched off a prickly battle over access by FBI agents to the offices of members of Congress.

And Jack Abramoff, once Washington's lobbying super-power, made a surprise decision to admit that he tried to bribe congressmen and senators to get official favors for his clients. His plea launched a series of investigations into whether members who received Abramoff's payments broke the law.

Former Enron executive Jeffrey Skilling reported to prison in December, the final step in the Justice Department's high profile prosecution of the former energy giant. The government's Enron task force obtained more than a dozen guilty pleas. Company founder Ken Lay died after a jury convicted him but before he could be sentenced.

Violent crime spike

Despite FBI statistics showing only a modest increase in violent crime nationwide — up 2.3 percent, with murder up 3.4 percent — many of the nation's police chiefs warned that in their cities, violent crimes were spiking.

A survey of 55 cities by the Police Executive Research Forum found murder up in 32, robbery up in 44, and aggravated assault rising in 28, all from January to June. Among the causes, a spread of gangs beyond the biggest cities, an epidemic of guns in younger hands, and acts of spontaneous violence over trivial slights.

Terror Surveillance Program

Justice Department officials will try again to urge Congress to pass a law clarifying the legal status of the Terrorist Surveillance Program. But Democrats in Congress may try to restore appeal rights for terror detainees, giving them greater legal authority to challenge their detentions. Court rulings will be due early in the year that could provide similar protections.

Vice President Cheney to take the stand

Dick Cheney will likely become the first sitting vice president to testify in a criminal trial. Lawyers for Lewis “Scooter” Libby, his former chief of staff, expect to call him as a defense witness in Libby's perjury trial, which begins in January. Libby is accused of lying during the investigation of the CIA-Valerie Plame leak case.

Abramoff fallout

The fallout from the Abramoff lobbying scandal could bring further prosecutions against members of Congress

Need to stem violent crime

Pressure will likely grow on the Justice Department to find ways to help cities respond to the spike in violent crime.

Key 'open Government' Official Leaves Policy Mark (GE)

By Daniel Pulliam

Government Executive, December 22, 2006

After 25 years heading one of the federal government's key privacy and information offices, Daniel J. Metcalfe will retire Jan. 3. Observers say that while they have not always agreed with him, he will be remembered for his ability to administer the open government policies of both Republican and Democratic presidents.

As a founding director of the Justice Department's Office of Information and Privacy since November 1981, Metcalfe has worked for seven attorneys general, pushed agencies to improve the management of requests for information and made a substantial impact on the law governing agencies' responsibilities to release information to the public.

Over that time, Metcalfe has supervised more than 500 Freedom of Information Act and Privacy Act litigation cases. Until last year, he co-directed the Office of Information and Privacy with Richard Huff, who retired after 36 years in the government.

In an interview with Government Executive, Metcalfe said he believes open government is critical. But at the same time, agencies must ensure that government information is disclosed responsibly.

"I'm more supportive of openness than some people might think, but I also recognize and respect the need to protect information," he said. "I have seen the types of sensitive information that the government can have. And I know first-hand the importance of protecting it."

Metcalfe will leave his mark on both the management of requests for information and the policies governing how much is released.

Management of FOIA Requests

President Bush issued an executive order in December 2005 requiring agencies to improve their administration of FOIA requests for government documents. Metcalfe said his office -- and secondarily the Office of Management and Budget -- has been the driving force for enforcing the changes.

According to a Justice report issued in October, agencies are for the most part complying with the executive order, which outlines a two-year process for improving the implementation of the 40-year-old law.

Officials within the privacy community say the executive order staved off legislation that would have imposed stricter enforcement of the existing 20-day deadline for FOIA responses and would have created a system to allow people requesting information to track the status of their queries on the Internet and by telephone.

Meredith Fuchs, general counsel for the National Security Archive, which collects and publishes declassified documents, said while the information and privacy office has done excellent work, Metcalfe was not empowered to make substantial recommendations that would improve the administration of agency FOIA processes. She said the executive order, since it did not contain any recommendations for increasing funding or staffing levels, exposed the weakness of the information and privacy office.

"When you're in the one office that is charged with making recommendations a reality and you can't do anything to make the recommendations a reality, it's a frustrating situation to be in," Fuchs said.

Metcalfe noted there has not yet been time within agency budget cycles to discuss increasing resources. He said he expects agencies to implement their FOIA improvement plans and issue their progress reports on time.

He added that he has personally spearheaded the executive order's implementation, even as he has prepared to leave government service.

"I've been going out 'full throttle,' so to speak, in both guiding and admonishing the chief FOIA officers of all federal agencies to treat their individual agency executive order responsibilities with the care and seriousness they deserve," Metcalfe said. "Now it is up to them to do their part by meeting their implementation and reporting deadlines on Feb. 1."

Legal Impact

In the spring of 1978, before becoming head of the information and privacy office, Metcalfe began establishing, as a Justice trial attorney, the legal concept in FOIA law known as "survivor privacy," whereby the government can hold back personal information about a deceased person out of respect for the privacy interests of surviving family members.

In Lesar v. Department of Justice, Metcalfe decided to argue that releasing certain FOIA-requested information in the files from the investigation of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. would invade the privacy of the civil rights leader's family.

"I was in a unique position. I was able to decide what was quote unquote 'right,'" Metcalfe said. "I was taking a risk, given the state of the case law at the time, but I thought it was the right thing to do."

The government's decision to withhold the information eventually was upheld by the D.C. Circuit Court of Appeals in 1980. But Metcalfe's survivor privacy principle was not firmly established until the Supreme Court ruled 9-0 in 2004 that bloody photographs of the body of Deputy White House Counsel Vincent W. Foster Jr., taken after he committed suicide in 1993 with a handgun in a Virginia park managed by the National Park Service, were exempt from release under FOIA.

"It felt quite good that something that I had conceived in 1978 as a matter of litigation policy was ultimately accepted by the Supreme Court," Metcalfe said. "The court recognized that you can have something so sensitive that when it is disclosed, it could harm the survivors.

"Vince Foster's youngest child was still in high school at the time," Metcalfe said. "He could have walked into his classroom and seen his father's death displayed on the television screen there. Or his aged grandmother could have seen it on the cover of a supermarket tabloid. That's the interest we were protecting."

Metcalfe also helped establish the legal principle known as "Glomarization," whereby the government can refuse to confirm or deny whether requested records even exist because such an action could reveal FOIA-exempted information. He litigated the first such cases to go to judgment in the late 1970s and argued the leading appellate case of Gardels v. CIA, which kept the CIA from having to confirm or deny the existence of covert contacts on particular American campuses, hence protecting them from foreign intelligence analysts.

Policy Conflicts

As a career Senior Executive Service official leading an office with significant political undercurrents for four different presidents, Metcalfe often enforced and helped shape governmentwide policies that seemed opposed to one another.

For instance, an October 1993 FOIA standard established by President Clinton and Attorney General Janet Reno rescinded a 1981 rule that had encouraged agencies to withhold information whenever there was "a substantial legal basis" for doing so. The newer legal standard "strongly encouraged" agencies to disclose information requested under FOIA whenever possible.

DOJ_NMG_0108581

But an October 2001 memo from President Bush's attorney general, John Ashcroft, superseded the 1993 memo and was viewed in the FOIA and privacy community as an attempt to hold back government information. The memo urged agencies to disclose information under FOIA only after full consideration of the institutional, commercial and personal privacy implications.

Acknowledging that it might be hard to imagine that a single person could have been involved in crafting the Reno and Ashcroft memos, Metcalfe said it was no secret that he worked on each.

"Our responsibility is to implement, not to mention shape, the policy of the current administration as best we can," Metcalfe said. "We have developed a standard of excellence, and that is a big part of what our office has been known for from the beginning."

He denied rumors that he is retiring out of frustration with the Bush administration's overall policies on secrecy in government. He said he has averaged more than 75 hours on the job per week since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and his wife is thrilled that he can cut that back to about 40 in "retirement." He added that he wants to take advantage of opportunities such as teaching law.

"This has been an absolutely fantastic position for an attorney interested in governmentwide policy and litigation," Metcalfe said. "It has been a fabulous job more than 98 percent of the time, even lately."

Patrice McDermott, director of OpenTheGovernment.org, a coalition of journalists and good government groups, said that "while it is not clear" whether Metcalfe has "been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been," he has "been a good and faithful government official."

"He followed whatever official party line of whatever administration he was in," McDermott said. "I don't think he's been an advocate for openness in government the way others have been, but he's done a good job doing what his job tells him to do."

International Advocate

Notwithstanding his domestic management and policy achievements, Metcalfe listed his influence on other countries as one of his biggest accomplishments.

When the Justice information and privacy office was created in 1981, Sweden, Norway and the United States were the only countries that had open government policies, he said.

Starting with a group from Japan that same year, several hundred delegations have come to Metcalfe's office for advice on enacting and then implementing open government policies and procedures.

"We have gone all around the world promoting openness in government," Metcalfe said. "When we started, we had only the three. Then the Berlin Wall fell, and many nations realized that government transparency could be used as emblematic building blocks of modern democracy."

Today there are 68 governments with FOIA-like laws, Metcalfe said, nearly all based closely on the American experience with FOIA.

"It's vitally important to have openness in government. It's a cornerstone of democracy," he said. "But at the same time, you have to have the kind of openness that strives for careful, fully responsible disclosure. Sometimes disclosing more information is not responsible. I would have been irresponsible to not try to protect the privacy of Martin Luther King's family, for example."

Former Justice Department Prosecutor Joins Venable (WBJ)

Washington Business Journal, December 22, 2006

South Florida

Seth Rosenthal, a longtime prosecutor for the U.S. Department of Justice who has spent the past two years as legal director of the Alliance for Justice, has joined Venable as a litigation partner in the law firm's Washington office.

Rosenthal, 40, spent 10 years in the DoJ's civil rights division handling a range of federal investigations and prosecutions, including cases involving human trafficking, hate crimes, police misconduct and housing and lending discrimination.

In 1999, Rosenthal also served under then-U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno on a special task force investigating the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. Last year, Rosenthal joined the nonprofit Alliance for Justice, an advocacy organization that monitors the selection of federal judges and tracks efforts to change the civil justice system.

"We are getting a wonderful complement of skill sets with Seth Rosenthal -- it's like getting several attorneys at once," says Geoffrey Garinther, national head of Venable's litigation group, in a statement.

In making his first move to the private sector, Rosenthal says he sought out a law firm with a strong litigation practice and a commitment to public service. "Venable definitely stood out in this regard," he says.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bristol-Myers Agrees To $499M Settlement (AP)

By Wallace Witkowski, Ap Business Writer

AP, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. offered to pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into whether the company played a role in a pricing scheme that led insurers and government agencies to overpay for drugs. The company reduced its profit forecast to reflect the charges.

The New York-based drugmaker entered an agreement in principle with the Justice Department and the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts to pay the settlement and avoid civil and criminal charges.

The company will also enter a corporate integrity agreement with the Office of Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services. The agreement must still get final approval from the Justice Department.

Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeff McDonald said the probe covered "a number" of the company's products introduced before 2006, including the anti-psychotic treatment Abilify, as well as some drugs it no longer markets. The company expects the Justice Department review to take "a couple of months" before a decision is made, McDonald said.

Samantha Martin, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Massachusetts, would not comment on the settlement offer.

Attorneys general of several states and a number of counties in New York charged that Bristol-Myers and several other drug companies caused the reported average wholesale prices of their drugs to be inflated -- leading government programs and insurers to overpay since reimbursement rates were based on those lists. All the lawsuits were consolidated under the federal district court in Massachusetts.

The practice of using "average wholesale prices" for reimbursement rates has come under fire recently. First DataBank, a unit of Hearst Corp., collects data from drug wholesalers on how much they have paid drug companies for pharmaceuticals and average prices are published in a list that insurers and government agencies use to base reimbursement. However, critics claim that the system has been gamed by drugmakers, distributors and wholesalers for so long, the prices no longer reflect an accurate price.

In October, First DataBank offered a tentative settlement to the same Massachusetts court that called for it to eventually abandon the use of average wholesale prices, and lower its reported prices. Such moves could save health plans an estimated $4 billion in 2007.

Bristol-Myers products on the wholesale price list included the blood thinner Plavix -- its best-selling drug -- along with blood-pressure drug Avapro, cancer treatment Taxol, and the cholesterol-lowering drug Pravachol. The company booked sales of $19.21 billion in 2005.

As a result of the settlement, Bristol-Myers increased its reserves for the probe by $353 million to total $499 million. Separately, the company said it will take a charge of $220 million for debt restructuring in the fourth quarter.

With the charges, the company lowered its full-year 2006 estimate for earnings per share from continuing operations to a range of 72 cents to 77 cents, from a range of 97 cents to $1.02. The company reiterated its 2006 earnings outlook of $1.02 to $1.07 per share, excluding charges. Analysts surveyed by Thomson Financial expect earnings per share of $1.04.

The agreement is the latest in a series of deals cut with the government. In June 2005, Bristol-Myers settled federal charges for an accounting scandal that cost the company $800 million, and was placed under the observation of a federal monitor until 2007.

The same monitor recommended in September that the company fire Chief Executive Pete Dolan after a failed agreement to keep a lower-priced generic version of Plavix off the market attracted the interest of federal investigators. Dolan stepped down the next day. The agreement soured when state attorneys general refused to sign off on it.

Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents to $26.05 in late afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Bristol's $499M Drug-pricing Settlement Among Biggest (USAT)

By Julie Schmit

USA Today, December 22, 2006

Drugmaker Bristol-Myers Squibb said Thursday that it would pay $499 million to settle federal investigations into its pricing, sales and marketing practices.

The tentative agreement is one of the biggest in recent years for drugmakers regarding drug marketing and pricing.

DOJ_NMG_0108583

It aims to settle investigations into Bristol's marketing of schizophrenia and bipolar disorder drug Abilify for conditions the drug was not approved to treat, says Bristol spokesman Jeff Macdonald.

It also covers some cases in which Bristol allegedly inflated drug prices so government programs for the poor and elderly paid more.

It would not negate other so-called average wholesale price cases launched against Bristol by several states and others, Bristol said.

No criminal charges would be filed against Bristol. The agreement is subject to approval by the U.S. Department of Justice and was struck with Justice and the U.S. Attorney for the District of Massachusetts. Their investigation covered more than five years through 2005. It included several other drugs that Bristol declined to name. The U.S. Attorney's office declined comment.

Doctors can prescribe drugs for whatever reason. But drugmakers cannot promote them to treat conditions unless the Food and Drug Administration approves them for that condition.

Numerous drugmakers are or have been under investigation for marketing. In August, Schering-Plough agreed to pay $435 million to settle federal civil and criminal charges that it illegally promoted several drugs and defrauded Medicaid.

Serono settled similar charges last year involving AIDS drug Serostim, as did Pfizer in 2004 involving pain and anti-seizure drug Neurontin.

Settling the investigation would remove one cloud of uncertainty over Bristol, says Moody's Investors Service pharmaceutical analyst Michael Levesque. Bristol shares closed up 1% Thursday at $26.05. Bristol expects 2006 earnings to range from 72 cents a share to 77 cents a share, down from its prior outlook of 97 cents to $1.02 a share. Excluding one-time items, it still expects earnings of $1.02 to $1.07 a share.

Bristol still faces a federal investigation into a failed patent settlement for blood-clot drug Plavix, its biggest-selling drug. In September, it ousted CEO Peter Dolan for mishandling Plavix and has an interim CEO. This agreement would require Bristol to enter into a corporate integrity agreement with the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Bristol-Myers Settles Probes Into Pricing For $499 Million (WSJ)

By Mike Barris And Angela Moore

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. said it reached a preliminary agreement with the Justice Department and the U.S. attorney for the district of Massachusetts to settle years-old investigations into its drug pricing, sales and marketing practices.

The New York drug company will pay $499 million and enter a corporate-integrity agreement with the Department of Health and Human Services. There will be no criminal charges against it under the agreement, which must still get final approval from the Justice Department. (See Bristol-Myers statement1.)

Attorneys general of several states and a number of counties in New York charged that Bristol-Myers inflated the average wholesale prices of its drugs, which are used by government programs and insurers for reimbursement purposes. All suits were consolidated under the federal district court in Massachusetts.

Bristol-Myers said it will increase the reserves set aside to cover the cost of the probes by $353 million, to be recorded in the fourth quarter. Separately, the company will take a fourth-quarter charge of $220 million for debt restructuring.

The company now expects 2006 earnings of 72 cents to 77 cents a share, down from an outlook of 97 cents to $1.02. Excluding special items, Bristol-Myers still expects profit of $1.02 to $1.07 a share.

Bristol-Myers shares were up 28 cents, or 1%, to $26.05, in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

In August, rival Schering-Plough Corp. agreed to pay $435 million and a unit pleaded guilty to criminal charges to settle federal allegations of fraudulent drug marketing and pricing, one of the largest settlements in a crackdown that has forced big drug makers to return billions of dollars the U.S. government says were illegally extracted from the Medicare and Medicaid programs.

In its release, Bristol-Myers didn't elaborate on the investigations.

In July 2003, Bristol-Myers started an internal review into whether its sales violated U.S. antikickback laws and drug-pricing rules. That move came just as executives were saying the company had turned the corner after an accounting scandal.

Bristol-Myers Agrees To Settle U.S. Investigation (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Bristol-Myers Squibb Co. agreed to pay $499 million to settle U.S. allegations it overcharged the government for drugs and promoted medicines for unapproved uses. The company lowered its 2006 earnings forecast 26 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0108584

The settlement resolves federal charges the company inflated the average wholesale price of some drugs, Bristol-Myers said in a statement today. Setting aside funds for the settlement will reduce 2006 profit from continuing operations to 72 to 77 cents a share from 97 cents to $1.02.

U.S. investigators in Massachusetts also were examining promotion of the Abilify schizophrenia drug and ``other current and divested products'' for unapproved, or off-label, uses, said Bristol-Myers spokesman Jeffrey MacDonald in a telephone interview today. The company last year settled a previous probe involving allegations it boosted sales by encouraging distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell.

The latest agreement ``removes an overhang, but the lack of information makes it difficult for Wall Street to react,'' said Les Funtleyder, an analyst for Miller Tabak & Co. in New York, in a telephone interview today. ``The laws around average wholesale pricing are convoluted. It's easy to run afoul of the rules. I don't think Wall Street takes this too seriously.''

Shares of Bristol-Myers rose 28 cents, or 1.1 percent, to $26.05 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. The stock has risen 15 percent in the last 12 months.

Reimbursement Rates

The case stems from the government practice of using average wholesale prices, as reported by the drugmakers, to set reimbursement rates for medicines used by federal health programs, including Medicare and Medicaid. State attorneys and consumer groups claimed the companies used the formula to artificially inflate drug prices.

GlaxoSmithKline Plc, Europe's biggest drugmaker, agreed in August to pay about $70 million to settle claims it overcharged U.S. government health programs by exploiting the formula.

The drugmaker also said today that it boosted its reserves for the latest settlement by $353 million and said it would record an estimated pretax charge of $220 million for previously disclosed debt restructuring. McDonald wouldn't identify the other therapies being probed by regulators.

No criminal charges will be filed as a result of today's preliminary settlement, the company said. The agreement still must be approved by the Justice Department, the statement said.

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment in a telephone interview today.

Private Suit

Bristol-Myers has not yet resolved a private class action suit involving drug prices, MacDonald said. The private case involves pricing of 20 drugs, according to a regulatory filing. MacDonald declined to comment on which drugs were involved.

Separately, Bristol-Myers and other drugmakers have been sued by Attorneys General of several states over pricing practices, according to a regulatory filing. Investigations by the U.S. Attorneys' Offices for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania and the Northern District of Texas are also continuing.

As part of last year's agreement, the company removed Chief Executive Officer Peter Dolan as chairman, paid $300 million to the government and allowed former U.S. District Judge Frederick Lacey to monitor its transactions. In September, the company fired Dolan as CEO on Lacey's urging as a result of an agreement Dolan made to delay competition on the Plavix heart pill.

Strong Medicine (TTNJ)

By George E. Jordan, Times Staff

Trenton Times, December 22, 2006

Bristol-Myers Squibb's penalty bill has surpassed $1 billion.

The New York drugmaker yesterday announced a proposed $499 million settlement of a criminal investigation in Massachusetts of price-fixing and off-label promotion of a schizophrenia drug. The agreement, which must be approved by federal prosecutors, adds to the company's payouts during the past two years to settle criminal investigations and lawsuits involving patent disputes, pricing practices and drug-safety issues.

The latest probe covered a number of the company's products introduced before 2006, including the anti-psychotic treatment Abilify, as well as some drugs it no longer markets, said Jeff MacDonald, a Bristol spokesman. The company expects the Justice Department review to take "a couple of months" before a decision is made, he said.

The penalty will hurt the company's bottom line. For the second time this year, Bristol lowered its 2006 earnings forecast to between 72 cents and 77 cents a share. Previously, it expected 97 cents to $1.02. The company left unchanged its 2007 earnings forecast for a net profit of between $1.02 and $1.07 a share.

Wall Street yawned. After dropping in morning trading, Bristol's shares rallied to close up 1 percent.

"This is nothing unexpected," MacDonald said, adding the settlement was mentioned in Bristol's financial disclosures earlier this year. "Hopefully, this is not something totally out of left field."

DOJ_NMG_0108585

Samantha Martin, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney in Massachusetts, declined to comment.

Bristol -- with 6,000 workers in New Brunswick and Princeton -- remains under criminal investigation by the U.S. Attorney's Office in Newark for a botched deal with Apotex, a Canadian drugmaker that flooded the U.S. market with copycat versions of the blood thinner Plavix, Bristol's top-selling drug.

After generic Plavix cut into Bristol's revenue, the company fired former Chief Executive Peter Dolan, who was one of the youngest Fortune 500 chieftains, and lowered its 2006 earnings guidance. Bristol is searching for Dolan's successor.

The proposed settlement announced yesterday comes a year after Bristol signed a deferred prosecution agreement with the U.S. Attorney in Newark to avoid criminal prosecution for "pipe-stuffing," a scheme that boosted Bristol's sales in 1999 through 2001 by encouraging distributors to buy more medicine than they could sell. Under the agreement, Bristol reimbursed shareholders $300 million and former U.S. District Judge Frederick Lacey was appointed to monitor Bristol's finances.

In total, Bristol paid $842 million in fines and settlements related to the accounting scandal -- an amount federal prosecutors have said equals the losses suffered by stockholders in the four days after Bristol's 2002 earning restatement.

MacDonald said yesterday's proposed settlement also covers an investigation into alleged overbilling of Medicare and Medicaid by Bristol. The U.S. Justice Department has been investigating several drugmakers for alleged manipulation of the average wholesale price, a system that uses prices as reported by the drugmakers to set reimbursement rates for medicines.

GlaxoSmithKline, Europe's biggest drugmaker, agreed in August to pay about $70 million to settle claims it overcharged U.S. federal health programs.

MacDonald said the company hasn't resolved a private class action lawsuit that alleges the company used the average price formula to inflate prices.

Bristol said it lowered its 2006 earnings to boost its reserves by $353 million to pay the settlement and an estimated pretax charge of $220 million for previously disclosed debt restructuring unrelated to the settlement.

Deutsche Bank Settles Some Cases (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Deutsche Bank AG agreed to pay $208 million to end state and federal investigations into the timing of trading in mutual-fund accounts that could benefit insiders and hurt other investors.

The settlement is the 21st by New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer in his mutual-funds investigation over the past three years.

Mr. Spitzer had accused the German bank's asset-management division of allowing excessive market timing in its mutual funds. He also accused its broker-dealer division of assisting in what he called deceptive market timing and allowing a form of late trading by one client.

In one scheme, Mr. Spitzer claimed that a favored trader would make a trade before the 4 p.m. close of the U.S. market, but the trade would then be rejected by a fund company. A senior Deutsche Bank broker then would contact the trader and permit him or her to substitute a different trade, sometimes as late as 5 p.m. That would allow the trader to benefit from changes in the market or news not available to most traders.

Deutsche Bank didn't admit or deny the allegations as part of the settlement.

The company said all the alleged improper arrangements originated in subsidiaries before they became part of Deutsche Bank and that those were stopped before Mr. Spitzer and the Securities and Exchange Commission acted. No current employees approved of the arrangements, the company said.

The deal calls for $102 million in restitution to investors and $20 million in civil penalties. Deutsche Bank must reduce fees by $86 million to investors over five years. It agreed to several overhauls, including disclosing to investors expenses and fees and ensuring independent officials monitor operations to avoid conflicts of interest that could hurt investors.

SEC Charges Former Tyco Officials With Fraud (WSJ)

By William M. Bulkeley

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission charged three former Tyco International Ltd. financial executives with securities-law violations for "structuring sham transactions" and "manipulating reserves" to boost reported income and cash flow by well over $700 million from 1997 to 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0108586

Tyco, a conglomerate whose nominal headquarters is now in Bermuda, became a stock market darling in the 1990s, revered for its predictable growth fueled by aggressive acquisitions. However, its stock price started tumbling in 2002 after questions were raised about accounting practices.

Last year, Tyco's former chief executive, L. Dennis Kozlowski was convicted of looting the company. He and former chief financial officer Mark H. Swartz are serving prison sentences in New York state. Both are appealing their convictions.

The SEC's civil charges name two lower-level officials who reported to Mr. Kozlowski or Mr. Swartz. Richard D. Power, now 58, held a series of financial positions in a 20-year career at Tyco, including chief financial officer and vice president-special projects. Edward Federman, 53, was controller of Tyco and later chief financial officer of Tyco Electronics, a big division. The SEC is seeking disgorgement of unspecified gains and fines.

Daniel J. Horwitz, of Dickstein Shapiro who represents Mr. Power, said: "Mr. Power is a person of integrity and we intend to fight these allegations vigorously." Lawyers for the other two men didn't return phone calls. The men didn't return calls.

A third former official, Richard "Skip" Heger, was accused of separate securities violations. He agreed to pay $450,000 to settle with the SEC, without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Mr. Heger had served as vice president for finance of Tyco's fire and security services division until 2002.

According to the SEC, Mr. Power developed an accounting scheme for security-alarm monitoring contracts to boost earnings after Tyco acquired ADT Ltd., a security monitoring company, in 1997. Under the scheme, Tyco added a $200 "growth bonus" to the $800 fee that ADT had been paying dealers for each contract. But it also demanded the dealers pay Tyco a new $200 "dealer connection fee." The SEC said "the sham transaction had no economic substance." But Tyco treated the fee as additional income that it recognized immediately, and it treated the "growth bonus" as a capital expenditure that was amortized over 10 years.

The SEC said that Messrs. Federman and Power also engaged in "abusive acquisition accounting" from 1996 through 2002.

Fidelity Imposes Penalty On Itself After Gifts Probe (WSJ)

By Jennifer Levitz And William M. Bulkeley

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

BOSTON -- Fidelity Investments said it will pay $42 million to some of its mutual funds as redress for lavish gifts and entertainment some of its equity traders accepted from brokers between 2002 and 2004.

The payments were recommended by several of Fidelity's independent trustees who conducted an internal probe of the matter. They included departed member Robert M. Gates, the new Defense Secretary.

The trustees concluded "it was not possible to prove" statistically that shareholders were harmed, according to the report. But they recommended Fidelity pay the penalty, saying the company inadequately supervised the traders.

In a rare public statement, Edward C. Johnson III, chairman of Fidelity, posted a letter on Fidelity's Web site, personally offering his apology for "this improper behavior" and saying that "there is no question that the Funds were put at potential risk."

"Therefore, I have agreed that Fidelity should pay a penalty set by the Trustees for this misbehavior and the company's failure to stop it," he wrote.

The independent trustees of Fidelity funds launched an investigation in July 2005. Fidelity has disciplined -- including, in some cases, firing -- more than 20 employees on its trading desk and has adopted new policies on gifts. The company so far has not been subject to any regulatory action, unlike the brokers involved, although it remains under investigation by the SEC.

The New York-based brokerage firm Jefferies Group Inc. two weeks ago agreed to pay more than $10 million to the National Association of Securities Dealers and the Securities and Exchange Commission to settle allegations that a former top employee wooed Fidelity traders with expensive wine and private-jet travel to win mutual-fund trading business.

In its settlement with Jefferies, the SEC noted that its business with Fidelity soared during the time gifts were being doled out. Mutual funds are supposed to send stock trades to whichever firms offer the best price.

Shareholders won't receive a check or a direct payment. The money Fidelity will pay to each mutual fund will become part of the fund's total assets and will "be put to work by the fund by investing in securities," said Fidelity spokeswoman Anne Crowley.

She said Fidelity also plans to make a redress payment to its pension funds and other institutional shareholders.

Sony BMG To Pay $4.25 Million In Settlement With 39 States (AP)

By Alex Veiga, AP Business Writer

AP, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108587

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-Sony BMG Music Entertainment will pay $4.25 million (â,¬3.23 million) as part of a settlement with 39 states to resolve investigations into problems caused by music CDs loaded with hidden anti-piracy software.

Under terms of Thursday's agreement, which also applies to the District of Columbia, the record company will reimburse consumers whose computers were damaged while trying to uninstall the anti-piracy software.

Sony BMG also said it will no longer distribute any compact discs loaded with copy-protection software that hinders computer users from easily locating it or removing it from their PCs.

The office of Massachusetts Attorney General Tom Reilly took the lead in brokering the multistate agreement, which was expected to be filed Thursday in Suffolk County Superior Court in Boston.

"If companies want to use technology to protect their interests, they need to be up front with consumers, and give consumers the opportunity to make informed choices about buying and using these products," Reilly said in a prepared statement.

Thirteen states that started the settlement process with Sony BMG will each receive $316,538 (â,¬240,202), while the rest will get $5,000 (â,¬3,794), Reilly's office said.

New York-based Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG, said it was pleased to reach the agreement.

It covers CDs loaded with one of two types of copy-protection software - MediaMax or XCP. The record label began including MediaMax on some of its discs in August 2003 and introduced XCP in January 2005.

Last year, the record company shipped more than 12 million compact discs on 52 Sony BMG titles, each loaded with one of the two programs. About 4 million CDs with the MediaMax software and about 3 million CDs loaded with the XCP software were sold.

Both programs restricted the number of copies of a disc that a user could make, but the programs caused problems for some users when they played the CDs on their computers.

The XCP software concealed itself to thwart computer users from finding it and attempting to delete it. It also ended up opening a potential security hole on PCs running on Microsoft Corp.'s Windows Operating System, making them vulnerable to viruses or other threats.

Some who used certain antispyware software to remove the programs ended up with a glitch that disabled their CD-ROM drives.

As word spread on the Internet in late 2005 that the CDs carried hidden software, some suggested the company was using the technology to spy on consumers.

Sony BMG maintained it did not use the software to collect personal data about consumers without their consent - an assertion backed up by an outside company commissioned by the company to audit its use of the copy-protection software.

Sony BMG ultimately recalled the discs with XCP in November 2005 and released a way to remove the files from users' computers. It also released a software patch to fix a potential security hole from the MediaMax 5.0 program.

Customers will be able to file a claim with Sony BMG to receive refunds of up to $175 (â,¬133), but claims must include a description of how their computer was harmed and documentation of repair expenses.

The refund policy will also apply to states that were not a party to the settlement.

The latest settlement closes out the states' investigations into the problem.

On Tuesday, Sony BMG reached a separate settlement with California and Texas, agreeing to pay $1.5 million (â,¬1.14 million) to the states and reimburse consumers for PC damage. The company earlier settled a class-action case over the episode.

In addition to Massachusetts, the states that were a party to Thursday's settlement are: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New Mexico, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Dakota, Tennessee, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin and Wyoming.

Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (AP)

By Terence Chea

AP, December 22, 2006

A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle.

DOJ_NMG_0108588

The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

After the antitrust lawsuit was filed in July, Hearst and MediaNews asked the judge to seal certain documents containing business information they considered confidential.

In the motion filed Thursday, Media Alliance and the Bay Guardian argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential.

"These are the nation's biggest newspaper chains, and they're moving to destroy daily competition in the Bay Area and impose regional monopoly," said Bruce Brugmann, the Bay Guardian's editor and publisher. "They should not be able to do it in the middle of the night with sealed documents."

Hearst officials were reviewing the motion and could not comment Thursday, said spokesman Paul Luthringer. Representatives at MediaNews did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

New York-based Hearst has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers - on top of the seven it already owns. Hearst's investment helped finance MediaNews' purchase of the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market.

The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet.

On Tuesday, Judge Illston barred Bay Area newspapers owned by MediaNews and Hearst from consolidating some of their business operations until the lawsuit is resolved.

When she issued a temporary restraining order against the alliance in November, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge some of their business operations.

The case is expected to go to trial next spring.

The case is Reilly v. MediaNews Group, 06-4332.

Business Interests Challenge Oversight (WP)

By Kathleen Day

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

A business group argued in U.S. District Court yesterday that a panel created by Congress to police the accounting industry lacks sufficient oversight by the White House.

The five-member Public Company Accounting Oversight Board acts as a federal regulator, deciding whether accounting firms are fit to audit the books of publicly traded companies, without having been appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate as the Constitution requires, the plaintiffs argued.

Lawyers for the accounting board, created in 2002 under the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, and the Justice Department argued that the board is legal because it is supervised by the Securities and Exchange Commission, a federal agency whose members are appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has said the agency supports the Justice Department's position.

The legal battle is part of an attempt by business groups to roll back Sarbanes-Oxley, which Congress passed in response to widespread corporate frauds such as those at Enron and WorldCom.

At the heart of those frauds were financial statements that presented an inaccurate picture of each company's health to investors and employees, who lost tens of billions of dollars after the problems were made public and the companies' stock prices plummeted. In some cases, stock became worthless.

Among the investor protections created under Sarbanes-Oxley was a board to oversee the accounting industry. The idea was that the board would help to ensure that audits of companies are accurate and not just rubber stamps without meaning.

Lawyers attacking the legality of the accounting oversight board represent Beckstead & Watts, an accounting firm under investigation by the board, and the Free Enterprise Fund, a nonprofit group that advocates "limited government" and whose chairman, Mallory Factor, is a major Republican fundraiser.

Attorney Michael A. Carvin, who presented the oral argument against the accounting board, argued before the Florida Supreme Court on behalf of George W. Bush in the dispute over recounting votes in the 2000 presidential election. Co-counsel Kenneth W. Starr was independent counsel in the Whitewater investigation of President Bill Clinton.

Carvin said the SEC can "veto" the board's rules and "stop them from doing bad things." But, he said, "that's not supervision."

Jeffrey A. Lamken, a lawyer hired by the accounting board, said Congress gave the SEC "broad" authority to supervise the board, including the power to take away its authority in any investigation.

U.S. District Judge James Robertson said he would decide the case as soon as possible.

The case pits people who supported President Bush's reelection against the White House policy of supporting the accounting board. And it puts the board in a difficult situation: The panel privately has chafed at SEC oversight but must now publicly argue that it is that oversight that makes it beholden to the president, and therefore legal.

This week the board, under pressure from the SEC, proposed a relaxed set of rules to implement another section of Sarbanes-Oxley, which requires companies to document, and an outside auditor to confirm, that adequate internal controls are in place to ensure that financial statements filed with the SEC are accurate.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Teen Drug Use Down, U-M Study Shows (DET)

By Gordon Trowbridge

Detroit News, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Drug use among American youths continued to decline in the past year, according to a federally funded study by the University of Michigan, a trend Bush administration officials said ratified their anti-drug efforts.

"This is not a natural waxing and waning of social forces," said John Walters, the Bush administration drug czar. He attributed sharp declines since the start of the decade to anti-drug advertising campaigns and other government programs.

U-M's Monitoring the Future survey, in its 32nd year, found small drops in drug use, at any point or in the last 12 months, among the more than 48,000 eighth, 10th and 12th graders surveyed. Most of the decline came in use of marijuana, the most commonly used illegal drug. The number of 12th graders reporting use of marijuana in the last year, for example, declined from 38.4 percent in 2005 to 36.5 percent this year.

Most other drugs showed small declines, but generally the drops were not statistically significant.

Walters and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed to figures showing that overall drug use had declined about 23 percent since 2001 as an endorsement of the administration's policies. Walters said anti-drug programs and advertising campaigns designed to make drug use less socially acceptable among young people can have a powerful effect.

"We have not always delivered that message consistently," he said, saying that the government "took our eye off the ball" in the late 1990s and allowed drug use to increase.

Lloyd Johnston, the U-M researcher, said there were a number of cautionary notes in the survey. Abuse of prescription drugs, especially painkillers such as Vicodin and Oxycontin, is high and in some cases rising; Vicodin has become the second most abused drug among 12th graders, with about 10 percent of those in the survey saying they had abused it in the last year.

Also, after falling by more than 50 percent in the last decade, the declines have stopped in smoking, especially among younger students.

Illegal Drug Use By Teenagers Is On Decline, U.S. Study Finds (NYT)

By Micah Cohen

New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The percentage of teenagers using illegal drugs continued a decade-long decline in 2006, but the illicit use of prescription drugs remains worrying, according to a survey released Thursday by the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

“I think we’re seeing a generation that has gotten wiser about drugs,” said Lloyd D. Johnston, the survey’s principal investigator. But more attention, Dr. Johnston said, should be paid to prescription drug abuse.

The survey showed a decline of 23 percent since 2001 in the percentage of students who said they had used “any illicit drug” in the month before taking the survey, with 14.9 percent saying they had used such drugs.

The 32nd annual report was based on a survey of almost 50,000 students in the 8th, 10th, and 12th grades in more than 400 public and private schools nationwide. The survey was financed by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, and carried out by the University of Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0108590

A question was added to the survey in 2002, asking students specifically about the recreational use of Vicodin and OxyContin, both narcotic drugs prescribed to treat pain. Since then, nonmedical use of those drugs has increased slightly, although abuse of OxyContin by eighth graders doubled to 2.6 percent in 2006, from 1.3 percent in 2002.

"We're not changing the rate that prescription medications are being taken by young people," Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said.

This 2006 survey asked for the first time whether the students used over-the-counter cough medicine.

John P. Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the response was alarming, with 4.2 percent of 8th graders, 5.3 percent of 10th graders and 6.9 percent of 12th graders saying they used nonprescription cough medicine recreationally.

Because most drug abuse is declining among teenagers, and prescription drug abuse has remained stable, "prescription drug abuse represents a larger part of the total problem," said Dr. Johnston, who is program director at the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan.

Mr. Walters said, "Based on the trends we've seen with prescription drug abuse among teens, and corroborated by the results from this report, it's clear we need to start developing messages for young people about the dangers of misusing prescription drugs."

In 1998, three years before Mr. Walters became director, the drug control policy office began the National Youth Anti-Drug Media Campaign — an effort to use multimedia messages to persuade adolescents to stay drug free. That campaign has not produced an advertisement warning about prescription drug abuse.

The survey released Thursday also suggested that the continuous decline in daily smoking of cigarettes by 8th and 10th graders had ended, although the rate, which peaked in the mid-1990's, did not increase.

"I hate to see that improvement stop, as it seems to be doing," Dr. Johnston said.

Teens Getting High On Medicine As Abuse Of Illegal Drugs Falls (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, December 22, 2006

Dec. 21 (Bloomberg) -- Use of illegal drugs by teenagers fell slightly over the past year as adolescents took prescription drugs and over-the-counter cough medicines to get high, a U.S. government-funded study showed.

The survey found increasing adolescent use of prescription drugs such as OxyContin and Vicodin. The annual look at drug use by students in eighth, 10th and 12th grades also showed that teenagers are abusing cough and cold medicine at a rate that U.S. officials said is a cause for concern.

``Youth may think these drugs are safer or safe because they are talked about as medicines," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, at a news conference in Washington. He urged parents to ``go to your medicine cabinet and take unused or those prescription drugs you are finished using and throw them away."

Walters and U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the results of the study, sponsored by the National Institute of Drug Abuse and conducted by the University of Michigan, were mainly positive and continued to show a drop in drug abuse.

Youth drug use in 2006 is 23.2 percent lower than it was in 2001, Walters said. Use of marijuana, the most popular illegal drug, fell 25 percent over the five-year period, while cigarette smoking dropped by 29 percent and drinking alcohol fell by 13 percent, he said.

The results ``are very, very encouraging to all of us in government," said Gonzales.

Slight Decline

The number of students who reported taking illegal drugs during the past 12 months declined slightly from 2005. Fifteen percent of eighth graders, 29 percent of 10th graders and 37 percent of 12th graders had used illicit drugs, the study said. The reduction from the previous year was less than 1 percent for eighth graders, 1 percent for 10th graders and 1.9 percent for those in 12th grade.

Use of marijuana showed a decline, though researchers said the small decrease for eighth grade students -- 0.5 percent from 2005 -- may mean the five-year drop is ending. Use of methamphetamines fell significantly among 10th graders, though not in the other two grades, the study found.

A number of drugs, including LSD, powder cocaine, heroin and other narcotics, tranquilizers and sedatives, showed no change in use this year, according to researchers. Ecstasy was one of the few drugs that more students reported taking, with its use by 12th graders rising 1.1 percent from last year.

At Some Point in Life

Overall, 21 percent of eighth graders, 36 percent of 10th graders and 28 percent of 12th graders said they had taken an illegal drug at some point in their life, the study found.

DOJ_NMG_0108591

Of prescription drugs, the use of Vicodin, a narcotic painkiller, rose among all three grade levels. Abuse of OxyContin, also a painkiller, increased by eighth and 10th graders.

This year's study for the first time included a question on cough and cold medicines. Those that are taken recreationally contain dextromethorphan, which in high doses can cause alterations of mood and consciousness. On the street the drug is known as DXM, Dex or skittles.

Four percent of eighth graders, 5 percent of 10th graders and 7 percent of 12th grade students reported using cough medicines to get high during the prior year, the study said.

The survey showed that 6 percent of eighth graders, 19 percent of 10th graders and 30 percent of 12th graders reported being drunk at least once in the prior month.

Daily cigarette smoking by teens has stopped declining after a decade of improvement, according to the study. Still, since the peak in the mid-1990s, daily smoking has fallen by 50 percent among 12th graders and more than 50 percent of eighth and 10th graders, researchers said.

The survey, which has been conducted since 1975, measures drug, alcohol and cigarette use by adolescent students across the U.S. This year, 48,460 students in eighth, 10th and 12th grades from 410 public and private schools participated.

Illegal Drug Use Among Teenagers Continues To Fall (WP)

By Christopher Lee

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Federal officials are concerned that teenagers are abusing prescription medications and over-the-counter cold remedies even as their use of illegal drugs has generally declined over the past five years, according to a government survey released yesterday.

Illegal drug use by teenagers has fallen 23 percent since 2001, but their use of prescription narcotics, tranquilizers and other medicines remains "relatively high," government investigators said.

For the first time researchers asked whether teenagers were using nonprescription cough or cold medicines to get high and found reason for concern. Over-the-counter medicines often contain the cough suppressant dextromethorphan, which alters mood and consciousness when consumed in high doses and can cause brain damage or even death, officials said.

About 1 in 14 12th-graders, or 7 percent, said they had taken such medicines to get high in the past year. Among eighth-graders, the figure was 1 in 25, or about 4 percent.

"This is now an area of drug abuse that we need to pay more attention to," said Lloyd D. Johnston, the University of Michigan researcher who led the annual "Monitoring the Future" survey, now in its 32nd year. "My guess is that young people do not understand the dangers of abusing these drugs."

The annual government-funded survey reached 48,460 students in the eighth, 10th and 12th grades in 410 public and private schools nationwide.

Prescription-drug abuse remained a persistent problem, officials said. After rising steadily since 2002, the percentage of 12th-graders who said they had used the highly addictive painkiller OxyContin in the past year fell from 5.5 percent to 4.3 percent, about the same level as four years ago. Use of Vicodin, another popular narcotic, more or less has held steady since 2002, with 10 percent of 12th-graders, 7 percent of 10th-graders and 3 percent of eighth-graders saying they had used it to get high within the past year.

"If there is one thing that every adult can do today to help protect young people against prescription drugs, it is go to your medicine cabinet, take those prescription drugs you are finished using and throw them away," said John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy. "If you have teens in your house, remove this hazard today."

Overall, the survey shows a continued long-term decline in teenagers' use of alcohol and illicit drugs such as marijuana, the most widely used illicit substance. The reduction occurred while federal funding for anti-drug advertising fell annually, from $185 million when President Bush took office in 2001 to $100 million in 2006. However, the past year's declines in drug and alcohol use were "relatively small," the report said.

"In many ways, this was a year of modest changes, but nearly all of it in the right direction," Johnston said.

For instance, about 32 percent of high school seniors and 25 percent of 10th-graders said they had used marijuana in the past year, down from 34 percent and 27 percent, respectively, in 2005. Among eighth-graders the figure held steady at about 12 percent. In 2000, the comparable figures were 37 percent for seniors, 32 percent for sophomores and 16 percent for eighth-graders.

In 2006, about 30 percent of 12th-graders said they had been drunk in the month before taking the survey, the same as in 2005. That compared with about 32 percent in 2000 and 31 percent in 1996.

Cocaine use dipped slightly among eighth- and 10th-graders in 2006, with 2 percent and 3 percent, respectively, saying they had used the drug in the past year. But it rose slightly among 12th-graders, to 6 percent from 5 percent. In 2000, by comparison, 5 percent of seniors reported using the drug in the past year, as did 4 percent of sophomores and 3 percent of eighth-graders.

Critics noted that teenagers' use of marijuana, cocaine and other illicit drugs remains higher today than it was 15 years ago. In 2006, 37 percent of high school seniors said they had used an illicit drug in the past year. In 1991, 29 percent said so.

"This isn't progress," said Bruce Mirken, a spokesman for the Marijuana Policy Project, an advocacy group that wants marijuana to be regulated and taxed the way alcohol is. "The truth is that our policies don't work."

Walters warned that favorable trends could turn around.

"We've had in the past a tendency to take our eye off the ball," he said. "We want to continue this decline, and that requires us to stay at it. If we fail to send anti-drug messages across multiple contexts with young people -- especially given the contrary drumbeat that still appears in popular culture and on the Internet -- we risk losing our progress."

Teen Drug Use Drops, With Exceptions (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — Abuse of the painkiller OxyContin by younger teens hit record levels in 2006, a national survey says.

While most other teen drug and alcohol use continued a decade-long decline, teen abuse of pharmaceuticals, including prescription narcotics, barely budged, the survey says.

The annual survey of 50,000 high school and middle school students, released Thursday, was conducted by the University of Michigan for the National Institute on Drug Abuse.

Among high school seniors, the percentage reporting that they had used prescription narcotics, including OxyContin and Vicodin, in the past year declined from 9.5% in 2004, the peak year, to 9% in 2006, the survey found. Among younger teens, OxyContin use rose this year: 2.6% of eighth-graders and 3.8% of 10th-graders reported having used the drug, up from 1.8% and 3.2% in 2005.

For the first time, the survey asked teenagers whether they used over-the-counter cough or cold medicine to get high. One in 25 eighth-graders and one in 14 seniors said they had abused the medicines in the past year.

"Clearly, prescription drugs have become more a part of the problem," says the study's principal investigator, Lloyd Johnson.

High school seniors saw the largest drop in overall drug use. The percentage reporting any illicit drug use was 36.5% in 2006, compared with 38.4% in 2005.

Regular marijuana use among teens declined for the fifth year in a row. Among seniors, 31.5% said they had used the drug in the previous year, compared with 33.6% in 2005 and 37% in 2001.

"It's great to have one-quarter fewer kids using drugs than there were in 2001," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. His office will design an ad campaign targeting abuse of prescription drugs, he said.

Other drugs showing a decline include methamphetamine and crack cocaine. The use of LSD, inhalants, cocaine, crystal meth, heroin, narcotics other than heroin, tranquilizers and sedatives remained stable.

Researchers say they have new concerns about Ecstasy, inhalants and prescription drugs.

The survey noted a slight increase in inhalant and Ecstasy use among seniors and a continuing decline in the percentage of students who consider these drugs dangerous, Johnston said. "It's a little disturbing, and we wouldn't want to see a rebound," he said.

Older students showed the sharpest drops in drug use, which reflects declines in previous years among eighth- and 10th-graders who have carried their lower drug use with them as they age, Johnston said.

The survey shows that federal policies have little effect on drug use in the USA, says Rob Kampia, executive director of the Marijuana Policy Project, a Washington, D.C.-based organization that wants to legalize marijuana.

"Our suggestion is to face the facts, to acknowledge that this war on marijuana users has failed to prevent teenagers from using marijuana," Kampia says. "The federal government hasn't had a new idea in 30 years. … What we've been doing for decades isn't working."

Teens' Use Of Illegal Drugs Drops (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price And Brittney Pescatore

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108593

Teenagers' use of illegal drugs has declined significantly in the past five years, a new government study shows, although the study found a slight increase in teens abusing prescription painkillers and other legally available substances.

Comparing data from 2001 and 2006, the federal study found the number of teens who reported using marijuana within the past 30 days fell 25 percent, while past 30-day use of methamphetamine plunged 50 percent during the same five-year period.

Teen use of cigarettes, alcohol, steroids, cocaine, heroin and LSD were also down, in some cases dramatically, the report from the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) found. Underage drinking is down more than a third since it peaked a decade ago. Past-month teen smoking is at an all-time low, with the biggest declines among 12th-graders.

The 32nd annual NIDA "Monitoring the Future" survey, conducted by the University of Michigan, found that 840,000 fewer adolescents used illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001. The 23-percent decline in past 30-day usage nearly reached President Bush's goal of reducing teens' illicit-drug use by 25 percent during that time period.

However, officials said they were concerned by other findings in this year's report -- based on a survey of nearly 50,000 eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders from 410 public and private schools -- which marked the first time "Monitoring the Future" examined the frequency of teens using over-the-counter (OTC) cough-and-cold medicines to get high.

Dr. Elias A. Zerhouni, director of the National Institutes of Health, of which NIDA is a part, said the report showed that 4.2 percent of eighth-graders, 5.3 percent of 10th-graders and 6.9 percent of 12th-graders reported such misuse of nonprescription cough-and-cold medicines containing dextromethorphan (DXM), a cough suppressant, during the past 12 months. DXM -- known by the slang term "dex" or "skittles" -- is generally safe when taken at recommended levels. But it can cause harmful side effects, such as alterations of consciousness or mood, if taken in large amounts, health officials say.

Coupled with that, the report showed increased teen abuse of prescription painkillers, Vicodin and Oxycontin, and of stimulants including Ritalin, which is commonly prescribed for those suffering attention-deficit disorders.

Authors of the study expressed "significant concern" over the Vicodin data. Use of that drug by teens rose 0.3 percent between 2002 and 2006 and 0.6 percent just from last year. Vicodin use remained high in all three grade levels, with nearly one in 10 high-school seniors saying they had taken it in the past year.

Oxycontin use by high-school seniors dipped between 2005 and 2006 but not for students in younger grades, the report showed.

University of Michigan researcher Lloyd Johnston, lead investigator in the study, told reporters at a press conference yesterday that annual prevalence of Oxycontin use by 12th-graders averaged 4.3 percent this year, down from 5.5 percent in 2005. But the 2.6 percent annual prevalence by eighth-graders and the 3.6 percent prevalence by sophomores were the highest ever. Use among eighth-graders seems to be increasing rapidly.

"Obviously, relatively few young people are using Oxycontin; still, given the addictive potential of this strong narcotic drug, I think we should be concerned about these rates," Mr. Johnston said.

He added: "Because most of the illegal drugs like LSD, Ecstasy, cocaine and heroin have shown considerable declines in recent years, while the misuse of prescription drugs has been growing, the latter have become a more important part of the country's drug problems."

Although use of marijuana also has been declining, it remains the most widely used of all illegal drugs, Mr. Johnston said.

He and others also expressed concern that eighth-graders two years in a row have shown a decreased perception of the harmfulness of Ecstasy. He said too many teens also fail to recognize the dangers posed by DXM in cough medicines.

"The survey results indicate that the messages we are sending to students about addiction and drug abuse are having an overall positive effect," said Dr. Zerhouni. But he called the "rise in prescription-drug use among the younger grades and the intentional abuse of over-the-counter medicines ... very disturbing."

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, urged parents to help the Bush administration's campaign against teen drug abuse by discarding unused and unneeded drugs from their home medicine cabinets.

Teen Drug Abuse Moves To The Medicine Cabinet (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

Christian Science Monitor, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK

There's some very good news in the battle against illicit drugs: Use by America's teens has dropped more than 23 percent during the last five years.

But their abuse of medicines, both over-the-counter and prescription, is rising.

DOJ_NMG_0108594

These opposing trends - detailed in a survey of teens released Thursday - reflect the complexity of the US drug scene. They also present a new set of challenges. The most important: How to apply the prevention tools that have apparently succeeded in combating illegal drug use to fight the abuse of legal medicines.

Experts credit campaigns focusing on parental involvement and the dangers of abuse for the significant declines in not only drugs like marijuana, but alcohol and cigarettes as well.

The newly released Monitoring the Future study, which experts consider to be one of the most definitive in the US, is done by the University of Michigan and funded by the National Institute on Drug Abuse. It found that teen use of marijuana - their most common drug - declined from 35 percent in 2001 to 29 percent in 2006.

"The broad nature of these declines across multiple drugs and alcohol and cigarettes ... is a kind of youth movement for the good," says John Walters, director of National Drug Control Policy at the press conference in Washington. "This shows us that we can as a society push back and make a difference. When we do that effectively together it has enormous beneficial consequences not only for our children now, but for the rest of their lives."

Studies consistently show that if people don't start using drugs during their teen years, it is very unlike that they will develop drug problems later in life. That means there will be "less addiction, less suffering, less crime, lower health costs, and higher achievement for this upcoming generation of Americans," Mr. Walters says.

At the same time Walters trumpeted success, he warned that the increase in the abuse of medicines has to be addressed now, if the positive trends are to continue.

Nearly 1 in 10 high school seniors used the narcotic painkiller Vicodin without a prescription and nearly 1 in 20 used the painkiller Oxycontin, according to the Monitoring the Future study.

The findings were backed by recent studies done by the Partnership for a Drug-Free America in New York. Those studies found 1 in 5 teens, ages 12 to 17, report intentionally abusing a prescription drug. As many as 1 in 10 intentionally abused over-the-counter drugs, like cough medicines that contain dextromethorphan.

Focus groups done by the Partnership found that kids think these drugs are either safe, or at least safer, because they're legal. This change of drug type and source, from the neighborhood drug dealer to the family medicine cabinet, is just one of the dilemmas.

"We don't know if they're abusing medicines instead of abusing so-called street drugs," says Tom Hedrick, a founding member of Partnership, "although current research does indicate that heavy abusers of medicines are also abusing illicit drugs."

Another challenge for prevention experts is finessing a message that these legal drugs are safe when used properly, but can be life threatening when abused. That challenge is compounded by both easy access to legal drugs on the Internet and the nation's advertising culture, according to David Rosenbloom, director of Join Together, a nonprofit research and prevention organization based in Boston.

The growth of direct-to-consumer advertising of pharmaceuticals over the past decade has in many ways normalized the use of medicines, making it more difficult to finesse a campaign against abuse, he says.

"The traditional prevention messages become somewhat confused because there are clearly some circumstances under which these medications are wonderful," says Dr. Rosenbloom. "So it's got to be a much more nuanced message and as a practical mater, prevention curricula are still focused on alcohol and illicit drugs."

Three years ago, Linda Surks discovered firsthand the importance of changing the nation's antidrug focus. For more than 15 years she's worked at the National Council of Alcoholism and Drug Dependence on prevention programs in Middlesex County, N.J. As she counseled other parents, she also regularly talked to her son about the dangers of illicit drug abuse. When he was 19, in college studying to become a pharmacist, he died of an overdose of a combination of the antidepressant Xanex and the painkillers Oxycontin and Vicodin.

"I talked about drug abuse a lot more than most parents do," says Ms. Surks. "It wasn't until I was called to the emergency room that I found out he was abusing prescription drugs - and it was quite a shock... because I had no clue he was using at all, and this is from someone who's in prevention and knows what to look for."

Walters says that in order to prevent such tragedies there's something that everyone can do to help deal with the hike in prescription drug abuse.

"Go to your medicine cabinet, take unused prescription [medication] and throw them away," says Walters.

WASHINGTON -- Teens increasingly are getting high with legal drugs like painkillers and mood stimulants, and they're turning to cough syrup as well, says a government survey released Thursday.

The annual study by the National Institute on Drug Abuse, conducted by the University of Michigan, showed mixed results in the nation's longtime campaign against teen drug abuse.

It found that while fewer teens overall drank alcohol or used illegal drugs in the last year, a small but growing number were popping prescription painkillers like OxyContin and Vicodin and stimulants like Ritalin.

As many as one in every 14 high school seniors said they used cold medicine "fairly recently" to get high, the study found.

It was the first year that the government tracked the frequency of teens who reported getting high from over-the-counter medicine for coughs and colds.

"It's bad that kids are buying cough syrup and using it this way - it's not good for them," said John P. Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

The study found about one in 10 high school seniors have abused the painkiller Vicodin and Walters said kids may be pilfering the pills from their parents' medicine cabinets.

"That is one thing you can do - take the pills that are no longer being used and throw them away, get rid of them," he said in an interview.

Walters credited public service advertising with a steady decrease in overall teen drug use over the past five years and said the agency would shift some of its 2007 advertising budget toward combatting prescription drug abuse.

He challenged the recommendations of an August government audit that said the anti-drug advertising campaign wasn't working and suggested Congress consider reducing its funding. The report by the Government Accountability Office found some children were actually more likely to use marijuana after seeing the ads.

"We're pushing back," Walters told reporters Thursday as he outlined the study results. "What this shows is we're pushing back successfully."

The rise in prescription drug abuse was a troubling conclusion in a study that Walters described as good news overall because of the drop in teen use of alcohol, cigarettes, marijuana and other illicit substances.

An estimated 840,000 fewer teens reported using illegal drugs now compared to five years ago, he said.

The annual study, in its 32nd year, surveyed 50,000 students in the 8th, 10th and 12th grades at more than 400 schools nationwide. It found, that over the last year:

-Illegal drug use at all three grade levels dropped, if only slightly. An estimated 36.5 percent of high school seniors reported using illicit drugs at some point in the year.

-Marijuana remained the single most abused drug among teens, although its use also dropped slightly within all three grades. Nearly 12 percent of 8th graders reported using it, compared to 25 percent of 10th graders and 31 percent of high school seniors.

-One-third of 8th graders said they had consumed alcoholic beverages, compared to more than a half of 10th graders and two-thirds of seniors surveyed. That also was a small decrease among the three grade levels. But the number of 10th and 12th graders who reported getting drunk increased slightly.

Comparatively, the number of teens who got high from medicines and households items instead of illegal drugs was small. They included:

-Nearly 10 percent of high school seniors admitted to using excessive dosages of Vicodin, a slight increase over the last year.

-Nine percent of 8th graders sniffed glue, spray paints, cleaning fluids or other inhalants, down slightly.

-3.6 percent of 10th graders got high off Ritalin, up two-tenths of 1 percent. Ritalin is used normally to combat effects of attention deficit disorder.

That teens are turning to cough syrup to get high is particularly alarming, experts said, because the medicine is cheap and easy to get. Moreover, few people - teens and their parents alike - recognize the dangers of overdosing on the otherwise safe and legal drugs.

"There is this mistaken belief that intentionally abusing prescription and over-the-counter drugs is somehow safer than abusing street drugs," said Steve Pasierb, president and chief executive of the New York-based Partnership for Drug Free America. "What parents don't realize is that this is about your kids taking six pills with a beer."

Good And Bad News On Teen Drug Use (UPI)

DOJ_NMG_0108596

By Christine Dell'amore, Upi Consumer Health Correspondent

United Press International, December 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 (UPI) -- Illegal drug use among U.S. teenagers has fallen sharply since 2001, but abuse of prescription drugs continues to soar, according to an annual government survey released Thursday.

The Monitoring the Future Survey, funded by the National Institute of Drug Abuse, found drug use among eighth-, tenth- and twelfth-graders has dropped 23.2 percent since 2001. The results almost hit the 25-percent reduction goal set by President Bush in 2002.

"Today we announce a remarkable achievement," John P. Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, told a news briefing in Washington.

The annual survey asks youths to confidentially answer questionnaires on their drug and alcohol abuse in the past month or year. In 2006, 48,460 students, representing 410 public and private schools, participated.

Past-month marijuana abuse for all three grades plummeted from 2005 to 2006 -- a vital inroad, officials say, because marijuana is often a gateway to other drugs. Cigarette smoking is at an all-time low for the three grades, and alcohol use has also fallen.

The drop in hallucinogens LSD and Ecstasy was dramatic, experts said, going down as much as 50 percent.

Walters stressed the 2006 progress was not due to chance but reflective of anti-drug campaigns and efforts.

"It's not an invisible hand, it's not an automatic waxing and waning of cultural forces -- it's a lot of people out there everyday saving lives, taking these substances of the street."

Yet the report also delivered troubling news: Abuse of the prescription drug Vicodin remained stable -- almost one in 10 high school seniors reported experimenting with the substance in the past year. Painkiller OxyContin was the only drug that went up across all three grades.

Over-the-counter drug medications also seem to be on the rise. Just over 4 percent of eighth-graders, 5.3 percent of tenth-graders and nearly 7 percent of high school seniors reported taking cough or cold medications containing the cough suppressant dextromethorphan to get high in the past year.

The abuse of prescription drugs and OTC medicines, which are often cheap and easily accessible, is a "worrisome trend," said Frank Murphy, director of psychological services at Caron Treatment Centers, a national network of alcohol and drug-addiction treatment centers. "It's almost as if it has gotten chic for kids."

Although the overall trend in marijuana went down, Murphy was alarmed at the 19 percent of twelfth-graders still smoking marijuana. "We're talking about a massive amount of substance on the street," he said. "That's really something for us to pay attention to."

Despite the desirable image of drugs sometimes shown in the popular media, "rejecting a life of drug abuse has now become a national movement among young people, just as unhealthy behavior in drug use became a movement almost three decades ago," Walters said.

However, Walters did not pinpoint a specific campaign or initiative that led to the improvements. Media campaigns, such as TV advertising, have spurred "subtle progress" in implanting anti-drug messages, Lloyd Johnston, the principal investigator for the survey and a research scientist at the University of Michigan, told United Press International.

But recent budget cuts in the National Youth Anti-Drug Media Campaign have led to less advertising reaching kids.

Walters acknowledged anti-drug coalitions put down their guard after waging a fruitful campaign to reduce cocaine use in the 1980s. This led to a redoubling of drug use in the 1990s, a spike that is now finally starting to ebb.

"We've had in the past a tendency to take our eye off the ball," Walters said. "We want to continue this decline, and that requires us to stay at it."

Study: Teens Getting High On Legal Drugs (CNN)

By Terry Frieden

CNN.com, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Slightly fewer adolescents abused illegal drugs and alcohol in 2006, but fairly high numbers of them continued to abuse prescription narcotics, according to a new study.

Researchers found reasons to be encouraged, but also concerned. The government-funded study, conducted by the University of Michigan, found that a high number of teens are taking over-the-counter cold medicine to get high. Measured for the first time, teenagers' abuse of such medicine is widespread, the survey said.

But officials characterized the overall survey results as generally positive, saying they reflect a slow decade-long decline in the percentage of teenagers who have experimented with illegal drugs.

DOJ_NMG_0108597

The study backed by the National Institute on Drug Abuse shows that 21 percent of eighth-graders, 36 percent of 10th-graders and 48 percent of 12th-graders acknowledged that they had at some point tried at least one illicit drug. Those figures represent declines of 0.5 percent, 2.1 percent and 2.2 percent from the previous year, respectively. (Watch how teenagers pop legal pills to get high)Underage drinking also down

The number of students who had tried an illicit drug in the past year also declined from peak levels in the mid-1990s, the study said.

Underage drinking continued to decline as well. About 6 percent of eighth-graders, 19 percent of 10th-graders and 30 percent of 12th-graders said they had been drunk at least once in the past 30 days. The numbers are down significantly from a decade ago.

Officials said the new numbers suggest the decline in alcohol use may be over in the younger grades but continuing in higher grades.

The closely watched annual survey of eighth-, 10th-, and 12th-grade students nationwide will be formally unveiled at a press conference Thursday by the White House Drug Policy Chief John Walters, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and other senior government officials. (Look at the trends)Pot still drug-of-choice for teens

By far the most popular illegal drug continues to be marijuana.

For the fifth year in a row, the percentage of 10th- and 12th-grade students using marijuana declined, but there was no corresponding decline in the percentage of eighth-graders who experimented with pot.

"The eighth-graders generally were the first to show the declines [over the past decade] but their improvements now seem near an end," said Lloyd Johnston, the lead investigator for the University of Michigan, which conducts the study.

The use of methamphetamine declined significantly among 10th-graders this year, but not among eighth-graders or 12th-graders, the study found. Meth use is now about 1.8 percent for eighth- and 10th-graders, and 2.5 percent for 12th-graders.Crack abuse down up to 50 percent since late '90s

Crack cocaine use continued to drop with use ranging from 1.3 percent to 2.1 percent, marking a decline of up to 50 percent since teen crack use peaked in the late '90s.

Use of anabolic steroids also dropped last year, which officials said may be attributable to the negative publicity associated with steroid use by professional baseball players.

The scientific survey of 50,000 students in 400 schools nationwide marks the 32nd consecutive year the "Monitoring the Future" study has been done. Anti-drug officials and academicians agree the study has become the key barometer in providing a window on trends of drug use among teenagers at critical decision-making stages of development.

Use of inhalants, LSD and other hallucinogens showed virtually no change in the past year, along with heroin, tranquilizers, sedatives and club drugs such as Ketamine and Rohypnol.

Of some concern to the researchers was a slight increase in the use of ecstasy, and the continued relatively high use of OxyContin and Vicodin.

OxyContin use by 12th-graders, which peaked in 2005 at 5.5 percent, dropped back to 4.3 percent, but the greatest levels to date were observed among eighth-graders (2.6 percent) and 10th-graders (3.8 percent).

"Obviously relatively few young people are using OxyContin; still, given the addictive potential of this strong narcotic drug, I think we should be concerned about these rates," Johnston said in a prepared statement.

Use of the painkiller Vicodin showed even higher rates. Use this year hit 3 percent for eighth-graders, 7 percent for 10th-graders, and 9.7 percent for 12th-graders.

The abuse of cough and cold medicines called DXM, Dex, and Skittles by teens had attracted 4 percent of eighth-graders, 5 percent of 10th-graders and 7 percent of 12th-graders.

Teen Drug Use Dips Nationally, Not Locally (ADS)

By Alexis Huicochea

Arizona Daily Star, December 22, 2006

Teen drug use across the nation has decreased by more than 20 percent during the last five years, according to a study released Thursday. But officials say the downward trend is not occurring in Pima County.

The Monitoring the Future study, conducted by the University of Michigan, measures drug, alcohol and cigarette use among eighth-, 10th- and 12th-graders across the country by asking about drug-use behavior during their lifetime, past year and past month.

The 2006 survey indicates reductions in the use of nearly every drug, with about 840,000 fewer youths using illicit drugs in 2006 than in 2001, according to a news release from the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

DOJ_NMG_0108598

It notes a 25 percent decrease in marijuana use during the five-year period, and a significant decrease in teens' use of methamphetamine. More on national study, Page A12.

However, officials at two Tucson programs that work to treat teen addiction say the exact opposite is happening here.

"I'm not sure that the study is an accurate depiction of what is happening and it is certainly not what I am seeing in working with adolescents with drug and alcohol addictions," said Tori Ferrari, director of the Springboard Home for Youth in Crisis, which houses girls but also provides counseling for families and boys. "We are actually seeing more and more kids getting involved at younger ages with harder drugs than marijuana."

She said that while marijuana is one of the most commonly used drugs by teens, it is a gateway drug and almost always leads to experimentation with drugs like heroin, cocaine or meth.

Ferrari believes the reason for the increase has to do with the availability of drugs, specifically meth, and the fact that it has become more common or more acceptable to do drugs.

During the last 30 years, Teen Challenge — the group in charge of Springboard — has served nearly 7,500 teens in Arizona.

Compass Health Care, another organization that works with addicted teens, has also seen an increase in not only illicit drug use, but alcohol and prescription drugs as well, said Cynthia Klein, a spokeswoman for the organization.

"We are seeing lots of kids using OxyContin and other drugs that are used to treat attention-deficit disorder because so many young people are on those medications," she said.

Things are not getting any better, she said. The lack of resources for teens dealing with drug and alcohol addictions is also a contributing factor to the problem.

Compass, along with the University of Arizona, recently began a free treatment program that focuses on kids between the ages of 12 and 17.

Virginia Is For Longer Data Retention (CNET)

By Anne Broache

CNETNews.com, December 22, 2006

All Internet service providers should keep their subscribers' data for lengthier time periods in order to aid police prowling for criminals online, a task force organized by the Virginia state attorney general recommended this week.

Echoing similar calls from U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller earlier this year, the latest suggestions arrived in a 103-page report drawn up by Virginia Attorney General Bob McDonnell (click for PDF) and his 6-month-old Youth Internet Safety Task Force.

Bob McDonnell

"It is the responsibility of business to assist in the apprehension of those who violate the promise of the Internet and prey upon children," the report said in its introductory section. The report did not address how these databases of customer information would be secured or whether they would be available to attorneys in civil lawsuits through subpoenas.

Although all Internet service providers already are legally required to preserve user data when requested by federal police, and some retain their users' connection logs for a few months, practices differ between companies. That means that "there is continuing need for ways of improving and streamlining procedures for disclosing pertinent information," the report went on to say.

Still, rather than prescribing data retention laws, as some members of Congress have supported, the task force makes a vague instruction to Internet service providers: they should commit to "keeping data relevant to such investigations and engaging at the national level to help define appropriate policies."

That seemingly softer recommendation is likely a reflection of the broader divide over the issue that is mirrored in the task force's makeup. Its members include representatives from various state and local law enforcement bodies, schools, educational agencies, parenting organizations, and corporate entities such as Yahoo, News Corp.'s MySpace.com, Microsoft, Time Warner's AOL and Sony.

Law enforcement officials and Internet companies have been at odds over the notion of adopting European-style data retention rules because ISPs maintain that retaining such vast amounts of data presents inordinately high costs and could pose security and privacy complications.

Internet companies also argue that they're already obligated to help law enforcement under a 1996 federal law. Called the Electronic Communication Transactional Records Act, it requires Internet providers to retain any "record" in their possession for 90 days, "upon the request of a governmental entity."

As an alternative to mandatory data retention, the task force report also proposes various methods designed to speed up the legal process involved in requesting data preservation.

AOL, which announced that it had donated $100,000 to the state for use in launching an Internet safety awareness campaign, applauded the conclusions. "The findings in this report, if implemented, will help make Virginia a safer place to raise a family," Mark Hileman, the Dulles, Va.-based company's deputy general counsel, said in a statement.

But Internet companies aren't likely to be free from the specter of national data retention laws yet. An FBI representative told CNET News.com recently that the agency continues to support data retention, viewing it as "crucial in advancing our cyberinvestigations to include online sexual exploitation of children." A representative for the National Association of Attorneys General said she wasn't aware that anything had changed since 49 of the state officials signed a letter (click for PDF) in June urging Congress to act on the issue.

Police Chiefs Ask Feds For Crime Commission (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The nation's largest police chiefs' organization is calling on the federal government to re-establish a national law enforcement commission to help restore confidence in local public safety operations.

The International Association of Chiefs of Police said Thursday that recent incidents involving officers' questionable use of force and abrupt increases in murder and robbery represent strong evidence for a panel, similar to President Lyndon Johnson's Crime Commission, which would develop a national anti-criminal justice strategy. The panel would address a wide range of topics from police deployment to prison administration.

"We're past the time when we've needed to do this," IACP President Joseph Carter said Thursday.

Carter says the need for a crime commission was "validated" earlier this week by an FBI report showing that violent crime remained on the rise during the first six months of 2006.

The review found that overall violent crime was up by 3.7%.

The IACP also cited "highly publicized" police incidents, such as the New York City shooting death of 23-year-old Sean Bell after his bachelor party and the death of an 88-year-old woman during an Atlanta drug raid.

The IACP's proposal, listed among the organization's highest priorities for 2007, is not winning early support.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., instrumental in passing the Clinton administration program to hire 100,000 additional police officers, says more money for additional officers and resources — not a commission — is needed to drive down rising crime.

"We don't need a commission to tell us what works," says Biden.

Samuel Walker, criminal justice professor at the University of Nebraska, says more attention needs to be focused on the application of the death penalty and such issues as police use of stun-guns.

"But I'm not sure we need a full blown commission," Walker says.

Recent jumps in violence prompted the Justice Department in October to launch its own review of possible causes.

U.S. Probes Possible Crime Links To Russian Natural-Gas Deals (WSJ)

By Glenn R. Simpson

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Amid growing concern about Europe's energy dependence on Russia, U.S. authorities are investigating possible links between one of that country's top organized crime figures and multibillion-dollar natural-gas deals between Russia and Ukraine.

The wide-ranging inquiry focuses on 60-year-old Semion Mogilevich, one of the FBI's most-wanted men, who is viewed by law-enforcement agencies as one of the world's most-sophisticated international criminals. U.S. officials have long expressed concern that his operations foster high-level official corruption throughout the former Soviet Union, underwriting criminal activities ranging from prostitution and drug dealing to stock fraud.

Their concern has only grown as Russia has tightened its grip on the vast oil and gas resources of Central Asia and shown a growing willingness to brandish energy as a political weapon. The European Union gets a quarter of its natural gas from Russia, most of which is shipped by pipeline across Ukraine.

That puts Mr. Mogilevich close to one of Europe's most vital economic crossroads at a time when the West is focusing on the failure of Russian President Vladimir Putin to check rampant organized crime and corporate corruption in Russia. The U.S. is worried that the Russian mafia will spread its influence in the energy industry and use its natural-gas profits to increase its economic and political clout.

Mr. Mogilevich couldn't be reached for comment. A Moscow lawyer who has worked with him declined to comment yesterday. In a 1999 interview with the British Broadcasting Corp., Mr. Mogilevich described himself as a businessman involved in commodities trading.

DOJ_NMG_0108600

In 2002, Mr. Mogilevich and an associate, Igor Fisherman, were indicted in Philadelphia on charges of money-laundering and securities fraud in connection with the collapse of YBM Magnex Inc., a Pennsylvania-based company registered in Canada. Prosecutors allege that the two men used fraudulent accounting records and a network of shell companies to manipulate YBM Magnex's stock, then laundered the profits of their stock sales through numerous banks.

Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman haven't responded to the U.S. charges, and, according to the FBI, they now live in Moscow. The U.S. and Russia have no extradition treaty.

In their natural-gas investigation, senior U.S. prosecutors and agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are focusing on connections between Mr. Mogilevich and a Cyprus-registered company called Highrock Holding Ltd. that has played a role in several multibillion-dollar gas deals, according to current and former law-enforcement officials.

Highrock, which has operations in Moscow, Tel Aviv and the Ukrainian capital of Kiev, supplies consumer goods and other products to Turkmenistan and other Central Asian gas producers in exchange for billions of cubic meters of natural gas. The gas is then shipped to customers in Ukraine and other East European countries over pipelines owned by Russian gas giant OAO Gazprom.

Until June of 2003, the wives of Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman were among Highrock's major shareholders, say people familiar with the company's operations. While the wives are no longer listed as shareholders, authorities are investigating whether their husbands retain an interest in the venture. The officials say they have yet to reach any definitive conclusions.

A Ukrainian businessman named Dimytro Firtash, now Highrock's principal owner, says he removed the two men's wives from Highrock in 2003, soon after he learned they were involved with the company. Mr. Firtash says a former partner had brought in Mr. Mogilevich as an investor without his knowledge.

The U.S. investigation, which is being led by the Justice Department's Organized Crime and Racketeering Section, began early this year, shortly after Moscow's brief cutoff of natural-gas shipments to Ukraine in a price dispute sparked an international crisis. The January cutoff came during a cold snap, throwing Europe's energy dependence on Russia into sharp relief.

The crisis was resolved when a previously little-known firm called RosUkrenErgo came forward to act as a middleman and broker a compromise. The company, known as RUE, said it was half-owned by Gazprom, but for months it refused to identify its other owners.

After The Wall Street Journal reported in April that RUE was under investigation by the Justice Department's organized-crime unit, Highrock's owner, Mr. Firtash, came forward saying he was RUE's other owner. Today, RUE supplies gas to several other European countries, including Poland and Hungary.

The U.S. investigation's focus on Messrs. Mogilevich and Fisherman is only now emerging. In recent months, agents have questioned several witnesses in Central and Eastern Europe about their knowledge of Mr. Mogilevich's role in Highrock, people with knowledge of the inquiry said.

The investigation is concentrating on Mr. Mogilevich's former base of operations in Budapest. For the past six years, the FBI has maintained a special unit in the Hungarian capital largely devoted to the investigation of the Mogilevich organization.

According to law-enforcement officials, the FBI team is being aided by authorities in Israel, another of Mr. Mogilevich's suspected bases of operations, and Cyprus, an offshore banking center used by many Russians. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI declined to comment on that matter because it is under investigation.

Global Witness, a London-based watchdog group that monitors the exploitation of natural resources, published a report earlier this year questioning the ownership of RUE, Highrock, and several other firms at the center of the Asian-European natural-gas trade. "There are still too many unanswered questions about these men and the interests they may or may not serve," says Global Witness researcher Tom Mayne. "Gazprom is a major supplier of energy to Europe, so there is a pressing need for more transparency about what is going on in the gas trade."

According to his FBI "Wanted" notice, Mr. Mogilevich, a heavy smoker who weighs nearly 300 pounds, was born in Kiev. He earned a degree in economics from the University of Lvov, according to people familiar with his background. He lived in Israel in the early 1990s, then moved to Hungary in 1995, the FBI says. He was also a prominent figure in a 1998-2006 probe of money laundering at the Bank of New York but wasn't charged in the case.

A substantial part of the natural-gas probe revolves around a network of companies, known as the Itera Group, that dominate the Russia-Ukraine natural-gas trade through their close relationship with Gazprom.

Itera, which is based in Moscow and Jacksonville, Fla., says it is the third-largest gas company in Russia. It has been Gazprom's partner in many gas deals that critics say didn't make business sense for Gazprom.

Itera Chairman Igor Makarov was a business partner of Mr. Firtash. According to Mr. Firtash, Highrock worked closely with Itera for years, providing goods to the Central Asian nations that supplied Itera with natural gas.

In 2000, Olga Shnayder, a private lawyer who worked with Itera, set up Highrock and several offshore affiliates of the company, according to corporate records and statements by Mr. Firtash.

DOJ_NMG_0108601

The Highrock entity in Cyprus had three shareholders, one of which was Agatheas Trading Ltd., also of Cyprus. One director of Agatheas was Galina Telesh -- Mr. Mogilevich's wife. People involved in the U.S. inquiry say she represented her husband and Mr. Fisherman's combined one-third interest in Highrock.

Ms. Shnayder is listed in Russian corporate records as part-owner of a well-known Moscow funeral-home business previously owned by a company called Arigon Ltd. According to the Justice Department indictment of Mr. Mogilevich and his associates, "defendant Mogilevich was a 40% shareholder of Arigon, and controlled its operations."

Ms. Shnayder, reached through the funeral-home offices, denied that she was an owner of the funeral home. She said it would be "a violation of client-attorney privilege" to comment on whether Mr. Mogilevich or Itera's Mr. Makarov are her clients. She also declined to say whether she created Highrock. Itera didn't respond to requests for comment at its U.S. and Moscow offices; in the past, Mr. Makarov has denied having a relationship with Mr. Mogilevich.

The FBI is also conducting a separate corruption inquiry into Itera's ties to Rep. Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania, a senior Republican in Congress. His daughter, Karen Weldon, a lobbyist, received at least $500,000 in lobbying fees in 2002 from U.S.-based Itera Energy LLC. Rep. Weldon subsequently praised Itera in public statements. He denies any wrongdoing.

The Bankrupt-Your-Family Calling Plan (NYT)

New York Times, December 22, 2006

Studies of prison inmates clearly show that keeping them in contact with friends and family is vital to giving them a chance to create an honest life after jail instead of committing new crimes that land them right back behind bars. Yet the simple act of picking up the phone to call home can be bankrupting for inmates and their families.

The cruel and counterproductive system now in place around the country charges them as much as six times the going rate for collect calls placed from inside state prisons. The collect-call service providers keep a stranglehold on the business by paying the state prisons a legalized kickback called a “commission.”

These costs are borne by spouses, parents and other collect-call recipients who typically come from the country’s poorest families. Worse still, these families can be barred from receiving a prisoner’s collect call at all until they open costly accounts with the same companies that provide the prison phone service.

With bills that sometimes reach into the hundreds of dollars a month, families must often choose between talking to a jailed loved one and paying the rent. The lost contact is especially crushing for imprisoned parents, who make up more than half the national prison population and are often held in prisons hundreds of miles away from their children.

A bill that went nowhere in Congress this year would have mandated fair rates for interstate calls made from prison. The bill, introduced by Representative Bobby Rush, Democrat of Illinois, would also have required prisons to use both the collect-calling system and the less expensive debit-calling system. Used in federal prisons, debit calling lets inmates use computer-controlled accounts to pay for easily monitored calls to specified phone numbers.

The collect-call-only system is being challenged in court in a number of states, including New York, where a closely watched case is scheduled to be argued before the state’s highest court in early January. The suit rightly argues that the telephone markup is a hidden levy on families who already support the prison system through their taxes.

State prison officials say the money is used to pay for programs that benefit inmates. But it also gouges the poorest citizens — driving them deeper into poverty — to pay for prison services that the state is obligated to provide. It might be legal, but it is also counterproductive and morally indefensible.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Feds: No Independent Probe Of DeKalb Police Justice Department Clarifies Letter, Says It Will Only Review Results Of Local Investigations. (AJC)

By Mae Gentry

Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 22, 2006

U. S. Justice Department officials said that the department was not conducting an "independent federal investigation" into a string of fatal police shootings in DeKalb County, but would review investigations by local authorities when they are completed.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division issued a statement Thursday in which she sought to clarify a Dec. 12 letter from Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim to a local activist who had called for a federal investigation.

"The Department is currently gathering information, in conjunction with the Federal Bureau of Investigation, concerning the DeKalb County shootings," Kim wrote in the letter to John Evans, former head of the DeKalb NAACP. "You can be assured that if the evidence shows that there were any prosecutable violations of any federal criminal civil rights statute, appropriate action will be taken."

On Thursday, the spokeswoman, Cynthia Magnuson, said the letter from Kim does not imply that the Justice Department had opened a formal investigation into the shootings. "While the Department of Justice is gathering information and monitoring that investigation, we have not at this point opened an independent federal investigation into the shootings," the statement said. "Federal authorities will review the results of the local investigation and then make an assessment about what additional investigation, if any, is warranted."

DeKalb Interim Police Chief Nick Marinelli last month asked District Attorney Gwen Keyes Fleming to review the Police Department's investigation of several shootings in 2006. DeKalb's 12 fatal police shootings this year are more than any other department in metro Atlanta.

Keyes Fleming, who said she will request that a special grand jury be impaneled to look into the cases, had said Tuesday, "It appears that the FBI is investigating a completely independent track, and we will continue what we've started."

Magnuson's statement did not mention the FBI, which was included in Kim's earlier letter. An FBI spokesman declined to comment on Kim's letter on Tuesday.

In an interview Thursday, Magnuson said her statement explains Kim's letter. "I don't believe that they're inconsistent," she said.

Evans, however, said the new statement conflicted with the letter from Kim.

"There's conflict in the statements — no doubt about that," he said. "Either what he said wasn't explained properly or there was some political pressure."

Evans said he intended to call Kim to find out "what's what."

Keyes Fleming's spokeswoman, Adora Andy, said Thursday, "The DA has had conversations with the U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia, David Nahmias." Andy declined further comment.

Nahmias also spoke to Chief Executive Officer Vernon Jones and sent him a copy of Magnuson's statement, according to a news release from Jones' office.

Jones declined Thursday to discuss his conversation with Nahmias.

Judge Scuttles Mayor's School Takeover Plan (LAT)

By Howard Blume

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

A judge today nullified legislation giving Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa substantial authority over the Los Angeles Unified School District, a stunning setback to Villaraigosa's plans -- already in progress -- to assume direct control of dozens of Los Angeles schools.

The mayor, at a news conference this afternoon, said he has instructed lawyers for the city to appeal the ruling. He said he would also ask that the California Supreme Court hear the appeal directly.

"We will not be set back," Villaraigosa said.

He added: "We refuse to be deterred by the forces of the status quo."

The ruling was a sweeping victory for the school district and puts in question the mayor's education agenda, which was embodied in the legislation before the court.

Under Assembly Bill 1381, Villaraigosa would have ratified the hiring and firing of future superintendents through a Council of Mayors that he would have dominated. And he would have had direct authority over three low-performing high schools and the elementary and middle schools that feed into them.

Judge Dzintra Janavs found the entire law defective and ordered public officials "to refrain from enforcing or implementing" any part of it.

"The statute makes drastic changes in the local governance of the LAUSD, giving the mayor a role that is unprecedented in California," she noted in her ruling, adding that the law "completely deprives the LAUSD governing board of any ability to control or influence the actions or decisions" in schools directly under the mayor's control.

That was a primary goal of the legislation, but the judge rejected that intent as contrary to the California Constitution on numerous grounds. Fundamentally, she said, the Constitution forbids transferring authority over schools to entities outside the public school system.

She cited a 1946 constitutional amendment that "specifically removed municipal authority over school districts and appears to reflect the people's determination to separate municipal functions from school functions due to the variety of conflicts that arise between their respective interests."

DOJ_NMG_0108603

The mayor's side argued that the Legislature had broad authority to designate the mayor, or anyone else, as a valid education agency to oversee schools.

The judge disagreed, siding with the district's lawyers.

"The mayor of Los Angeles [and] the members of the Council of Mayors … are not 'authorities' within the public school system or 'officers of the public schools,' " Janavs wrote in a decision issued midafternoon.

She also concluded that the new law violated the Los Angeles City Charter and the state Constitution by emasculating the school board's authority and by putting Villaraigosa in conflicting management roles.

School district officials were elated with the ruling, but measured in their reaction.

"We're anxious to move forward," said district general counsel Kevin Reed, who helped argue the case last week.

"We have believed from the day Mayor Villaraigosa was sworn in that it was important to work with him," Reed said. "We always thought this vehicle was the wrong way to do it. We continue to invite and look forward to a true partnership with him."

Judge Strikes Down LAUSD Takeover Plan (LADN)

By Naush Boghossian

Los Angeles Daily News, December 22, 2006

READ the court ruling striking down AB 1381. In a major political blow to Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa, a judge on Thursday declared unconstitutional the state Assembly bill that would give the mayor substantial control over the Los Angeles Unified School District and blocked its Jan. 1 implementation.

But while district officials called the ruling just, Villaraigosa remained defiant, calling it a "bump in the road" and vowing to immediately appeal.

"This ruling may seem like a disappointing setback for our kids, but I want to be absolutely clear today -- we will not be set back," he said. " ... We refuse to be defeated by the forces of the status quo. I believe we have the law on our side, I believe we have the constitution on our side, and more than that, I believe we have the people on our side."

And despite the ruling, he said his staff would continue to plan for a mayoral takeover of the 708,000-student district and vowed to get involved in the March school board election, when four of the seven seats are up for grabs. Putting on a conciliatory face, district officials said they were gratified with the ruling and stressed that they want to create a partnership with the mayor and the city of Los Angeles.

School board President Marlene Canter said she and Superintendent David Brewer III already had spoken with the mayor and that they all "agreed to work together on behalf of our students." "Thursday's ruling confirms our long-standing belief that this legislation was unconstitutional and not in the best interest of our students," she said.

In a strong rebuke of the mayor's plan -- Assembly Bill 1381 -- Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Dzintra Janavs sided with all four of the district's arguments on the legality of the bill, including that it violates the state constitution, the City Charter and voter rights.

The judge said the unconstitutional portions of the bill cannot be separated from the rest, meaning the whole thing had to be thrown out.

"There is substantial evidence that passage of AB 1381 was the result of political compromise and that its provisions are so interconnected and so critically dependent upon one another that no single provision would have been enacted or should be given effect without the whole," Janavs wrote in the 20-page ruling.

The district challenged the bill, contending that it violated provisions of the state constitution, which creates a separation between the operation of the municipal government and the education system; the L.A. City Charter, which sets forth the duties of the mayor but does not grant him authority over public schools; and voting rights, disenfranchising voters who don't live in Los Angeles and those who voted for LAUSD board members.

The ruling came after a yearlong battle between the Mayor's Office and the district, with Villaraigosa wanting to shake up the LAUSD with reforms aimed at raising student achievement faster and reducing the dropout rate, which has been pegged anywhere between 24 percent and 50 percent.

He proposed stripping away the school board's authority and shifting it to the superintendent; creating a 28-member council of mayors to review the budget and ratify hiring of new superintendents; giving the mayor direct oversight of three clusters of the district's lowest-performing schools; and giving schools greater control over budget and curriculum.

Critics called Villaraigosa's efforts a power grab. Besides a few community meetings, he didn't put it to a public vote and used his significant political clout to have the Legislature pass the bill in August. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger signed it into law in September, and a coalition led by the district filed suit in October.

DOJ_NMG_0108604

For the popular mayor, who used substantial political capital to push for the school reform, the judge's decision is a big setback, said Jaime Regalado, director of the Edmund G. Pat Brown Institute of Public Affairs at California State University, Los Angeles.

"It's a major blow, there's no question about it," Regalado said. "It's a major initial blow."

But the mayor could come out victorious, depending on the state Court of Appeal decision. And this defeat won't have long-term impacts for a mayor who many believe has gubernatorial aspirations, he said.

" ... The fight is not over yet and he has a lot of political capital to burn," Regalado said. "He didn't invest 100 percent of what he had in the vault."

In fact, an appellate court could reach a completely different conclusion from Janavs , and it is that decision that would set a legal precedent, while Thursday's doesn t.

For his part, Schwarzenegger said he still backs the mayor's plan and supports an appeal of the court's decision.

"I strongly support Mayor Villaraigosa's efforts to put our children first," he said in a written statement. "The status quo simply isn't working -- the current system is failing too many of our students."

Sen. Gloria Romero, D-Los Angeles, a co-author of the bill, said she still believes it s legal and should be appealed all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, if necessary.

"I look forward to that," she said.

The state legislative counsel earlier this year issued an opinion questioning the measure s constitutionality. Concerned that a lawsuit might result in some parts of the bill being overturned while others remained, Sen. George Runner, R-Lancaster, had successfully pushed for the removal of a severability clause, a phrase that says if one part is overturned, the rest remains law. After that clause was added, Runner decided to put aside his misgivings about the bill and vote in favor of it.

But some legal experts said judges are free to use their own discretion on severability, regardless of the presence of an enabling phrase.

Meanwhile Thursday, Villaraigosa said he received an additional $1 million for the cluster of schools he was poised to oversee. Deputy Mayor Ray Cortines would only say it came from a foundation that he'd like to keep anonymous. He collected $1 million from Verizon last week.

Villaraigosa also said he had spoken to Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez, D-Los Angeles, and that they would move to audit the LAUSD to begin the process of determining how much money is being spent on bureaucracy.

Monica Garcia, the sole Villaraigosa supporter on the school board, said she hopes the ruling doesn't send the district the signal that what it has done so far is enough.

In fact, she said, she believes the district should move forward to implement demonstration schools, or clusters of lowest-performing schools, the mayor had proposed to oversee.

"I think this whole effort has encouraged a civic conversation that would not have happened otherwise," said Garcia, who added that she hasn't decided whether to support an appeal of the judge's ruling. "The judge ruled in one way, but the work continues to need aggressive, bold, optimistic reform and leadership."

While the mayor's detractors will certainly say he was much too ambitious with his plan and was bound to fail, there are plenty in the city who want change and back his plan, Regalado said.

"Most people feel something needs to change at LAUSD, and I think he ll be given plaudits by some, if not the majority of voters, for making the try, for expending capital and putting himself out there on the issues," he said. "It does take a bit of his political capital away, but long-term injuries? Not yet."

California: Judge Strikes Down Los Angeles School Plan (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

A judge struck down a law granting Mayor Antonio R. Villaraigosa of Los Angeles partial control of the nation's second-largest school district. The law, scheduled to take effect Jan. 1, violated the state's Constitution by interfering with the governing authority of the Los Angeles Unified School District board, the judge, Dzintra I. Janavs of Superior Court, ruled. A coalition of parents, students and administrators sued in October, contending the law took too much power away from the elected school board. Mr. Villaraigosa said he was considering a direct appeal to the State Supreme Court. "I believe we have the law on our side," he said.

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Unveils Merger Investigations Reform (DEAL)

DOJ_NMG_0108605

By Cecile Kohrs Lindell

The Deal, December 22, 2006

The Department of Justice's antitrust division on Dec. 15 officially announced further efforts to streamline the time and cost of merger investigations. The changes are part of a 2001 merger process reform effort and closely mirror changes the Federal Trade Commission announced in February.

But there's a big catch for merging parties that participate, and if the FTC's track record is an indication, antitrust lawyers won't be pushing clients to sign up. To be eligible for DOJ's latest streamlining efforts, the Justice Department requires merging parties to agree to set a period of pretrial discovery, perhaps as much as six months, should regulators seek a court order to block a merger. That could leave merging parties open to significantly more discovery time than the government usually is granted. The FTC's streamlining, by contrast, requires only two months of discovery.

DOJ's latest changes are intended to ease the burden imposed by a "second request for information," the step antitrust regulators must take to extend a merger investigation beyond limits set by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Act. After companies notify the antitrust agencies of their plans to merge, the DOJ and the FTC, the agencies then have 30 days -- or 15 in the case of a hostile tender offer -- to decide whether to clear the deal or to issue a second request.

The typical merger review process can take up to a year, but recent efforts have brought the average time for mergers with complex issues to less than six months.

"Efficient merger enforcement reaching the right answers as quickly as possible with the least burdens necessary is one of our top priorities," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's Antitrust Division. "The amendments to the division's already successful merger review process initiative are part of our ongoing efforts to reduce enforcement burdens, while at the same time preserve our ability to conduct thorough investigations and protect consumers from anticompetitive transactions."

The DOJ second request changes are similar to the FTC's, by limiting to 30 the number of corporate officials whose documents will be reviewed and shortening the default time studied from three years to two. (The FTC capped the number officials at 35.) The merger review process initiative also says the staff is encouraged to talk with lawyers for the merging parties early on in an effort to get deals cleared during the initial 30-day period.

Though formally announced only last week, the changes have been in practice at least since October, when senior staff lawyer Bob Kramer told a gathering of antitrust lawyers about the need for changes in how the agencies review mergers. The biggest problem, according to Kramer, was that when companies complied with the second requests, the agency was swamped with documents, much of it superfluous to the investigation.

"Dumping" is a practice of collecting all documents related to the investigation from the merging firms, then filing everything in one fell swoop to the agency staff lawyers who requested it. After lawyers dump on an agency and certify they have complied with a second request, the regulators have only 30 days to review hundreds of thousands of documents and decide whether to block or to permit the deal.

In an effort to avoid these problems, DOJ's reforms include making initial requests for a range of information on a voluntary basis. DOJ is also asking lawyers to come in and discuss the merger with staff lawyers early in the process.

And, as with the FTC, DOJ is also using a carrot-and-stick option. If the merging parties want to move quickly, they can enter a "Process and Timing Agreement" with staff. That would mean the companies provide information to the agency when available, on a rolling basis rather than submitting everything at once. The parties must also agree to give DOJ lawyers extra time before a trial if the agency decides to block the deal.

"Even in cases preceded by full HSR compliance, it has been the division's experience that a period of four to six months is generally necessary to conduct appropriate post-complaint discovery," the agency wrote in its description of the new arrangement.

That means if the merging parties cannot agree with DOJ on a remedy, or if DOJ simply believes the anticompetitive problems with the deal are excessive, the parties must give DOJ four to six months to prepare its case before going to court rather than the three months or less courts typically grant the government.

According to Steve Sunshine, a partner at Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft LLP and a former deputy assistant attorney general at DOJ, the changes are "more of an evolution of best practices" and not a radical change in policy.

The changes "are kind of helpful on the margins," Sunshine said. "Where it can really matter is on a big deal with lots of issues that aren't really deal stoppers; it can help to give some focus" to the investigation.

Barnett said that by helping to focus the investigation, DOJ's process can be helpful, because firms can benefit from time and cost savings.

But for most deals, the longer discovery phase required by the new Process and Timing Agreement is a disincentive to companies that is not offset by the agreement's benefits, Sunshine said. Private firm antitrust lawyers already can negotiate with staff and winnow down the number of people whose files are searched without giving the government more time to prepare a court case.

Indeed, merging parties in only one deal have so far agreed to give the FTC even a two-month discovery period in exchange for any concessions during the HSR process, according to FTC officials.

Barnett acknowledges that the appeal of the latest change may be limited, but the effort to streamline the premerger review process isn't over. The goal has been "to increase transparency and increase communication," he said. "We've been very successful at getting these resolved more quickly."

Prosecutors: 5th Samsung Exec To Plead Guilty In Price-fixing (AP)

By Jordan Robertson

AP, December 22, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - A Samsung Electronics Co. executive agreed to plead guilty and serve 10 months in prison for his role in a global price-fixing scheme involving a common form of computer memory, federal prosecutors said Thursday.

Young Hwan Park, president of Samsung Semiconductor Inc., the company's San Jose-based U.S. subsidiary, is the fifth Samsung executive this year to agree to a prison sentence over price manipulation of dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, the most common type of memory chip used in personal computers.

A Samsung spokeswoman said Thursday that Park is still with the company but declined to discuss the company's future plans. "Samsung is strongly committed to fair competition and ethical practices and forbids anticompetitive behavior," spokeswoman Chris Goodhart said in a statement.

In total, four memory chip companies and 18 people have been charged in the Justice Department's investigation of DRAM makers.

Samsung, Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc. have all pleaded guilty for roles in the scheme and were ordered to pay about $729 million in fines. The fine for Samsung and its subsidiary totaled $300 million.

Fifteen people charged in the case have now pleaded guilty, including the five Samsung executives, four executives each from Infineon and Hynix, an executive from Elpida and a sales manager from Micron Technology Inc.

Park's prison sentence would be the longest levied against any of the defendants.

The Justice Department said collusion among the world's DRAM makers began in 1996, when manufacturing ramped up but prices failed to drop as expected. Investigators said DRAM executives hatched a covert plan to keep prices artificially high and colluded in the United States and abroad.

The charge against Park was filed and his expected guilty plea, which still needs court approval, was announced simultaneously Thursday in San Francisco federal court. Park also agreed to pay a $250,000 fine. A court date for Park to enter the plea had not been set.

"This latest plea underscores our resolve to hold responsible those who target U.S. businesses and consumers with price-fixing schemes," Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of Justice Department's antitrust division, said in a statement. "Individuals who choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions: criminal fines and prison time."

Park is accused of conspiring with employees from other memory chip makers from April 2001 to June 2002 to keep the prices of chips artificially high. He was vice president of sales for Samsung Electronics at the time.

Prosecutors say the scheme affected sales to computer makers Apple Computer Inc., Compaq Computer Corp., Dell Inc., Gateway Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co. and IBM Corp.

The indictment alleges Park struck deals with other executives in secret meetings about the prices charged to certain manufacturers. The executives allegedly swapped data on DRAM shipments to those manufacturers to make sure everyone was selling at agreed-upon prices.

The probe of anticompetitive practices in the semiconductor industry has since expanded to the sale of graphics processors and cards, and another form of memory known as static random access memory, or SRAM.

At least five SRAM makers have said they were contacted by Justice Department investigators as part of the industrywide probe, including Sony Corp., San Jose-based Cypress Semiconductor Corp., and the U.S. units of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., Samsung Electronics Co. and Toshiba Corp.

SRAM chips are faster and more reliable than DRAM chips, but are also more expensive and found in far smaller quantities in PCs. Worldwide SRAM sales totaled $2.8 billion in 2005, compared with DRAM sales the same year of about $24.8 billion, according to market researcher iSuppli Corp.

Two leading graphics chip companies - Advanced Micro Devices Inc. and Nvidia Corp. - have said they were subpoenaed by federal investigators probing possible anticompetitive practices among makers of computer graphics chips.

The Justice Department has declined to discuss details of the graphics chips and SRAM probes.

Samsung Exec Pleads Guilty To DRAM Price Fixing (IDG)

By Grant Gross

IDG News Service, December 22, 2006

A top executive from Samsung Electronics will serve 10 months in prison and pay a $250,000 fine for his role in a global conspiracy to fix DRAM (dynamic RAM) prices, the U.S. Department of Justice (DOJ) announced Thursday.

Young Hwan Park, currently president of Samsung's U.S. subsidiary Samsung Semiconductor Inc., agreed to plead guilty to a violation of the U.S. Sherman Antitrust Act for conspiring with other companies to fix DRAM prices, according to court records.

Park, formerly vice president of sales at Samsung, is the fifth Samsung executive to agree to prison sentences in the DOJ's ongoing price-fixing investigation. Samsung, based in South Korea, is the world's largest manufacturer of DRAM, a memory chip commonly used in PCs and several other electronic devices.

Since December 2003, the DOJ has charged four DRAM vendors and 18 people in the price-fixing investigation.

People who "choose to engage in price fixing are on notice of the consequences of their illegal actions – criminal fines and prison time," Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the DOJ's Antitrust Division, said in a statement.

Park conspired with employees from other memory makers to fix the prices of DRAM sold to OEMs (original equipment manufacturers) from April 2001 to June 2002, according to a felony court filed Thursday in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of California in San Francisco. Computer makers affected by the price fixing included Dell Inc., Hewlett-Packard Co., Apple Computer Inc. and Gateway Inc., the DOJ said.

Park participated in meetings with other DRAM makers where the prices of DRAM were discussed, and he committed to charging the agreed prices, the DOJ said.

Samsung pleaded guilty to the price-fixing conspiracy and was sentenced to pay a $300 million fine in November 2005. Hynix Semiconductor Inc., the world's second-largest DRAM manufacturer, pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $185 million fine in May 2005.

In January, Japanese manufacturer Elpida Memory Inc. agreed to plead guilty and pay an $84 million fine. In October 2004, German manufacturer Infineon Technologies AG pleaded guilty and was sentenced to pay a $160 million fine.

Samsung Executive Faces Jail Sentence (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

The chief executive of Samsung Electronics' US-based chip division is facing 10 months behind bars after pleading guilty on Thursday to price-fixing charges.

The Korean executive, Park Young-hwan, was involved in a wide-ranging conspiracy involving Samsung and other makers of dynamic random access memory components – or D-Ram chips – while he served as vice-president of the Korean company's sales division.

Mr Park is the fifth Samsung executive to agree to a prison sentence in the Justice Department's investigation, which has also ensnared four Hynix executives, four officials at Infineon, and resulted in one obstruction charge against a regional sales manager at Micron Technology. The probe has generated $730m in criminal penalties from the parties involved, the second-highest number of fines to emerge from any single price-fixing conspiracy.

According to Samsung's website, Mr Park has served as president and chief executive of Samsung Semiconductor in the US since March, 2004, leading the industry's second highest-volume supplier of chip products in North America. The website also credits Mr Park for leading the company's memory sales team at a time, between 2001 and 2003, when it saw its "most dramatic growth".

The Justice Department said Mr Park carried out the price-fixing conspiracy from April, 2001 to June, 2002 by participating in meetings and conversations with rivals in the D-Ram market and agreeing to charge certain customers a fixed price. The talks ultimately affected sales to US computer makers such as Dell, HP and Compaq.

US Airways CEO: Delta's Self-valuation 'Lacks Credibility' (AJC)

By Russell Grantham, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108608

Delta Air Lines' self-valuation that it will be worth as much as $12 billion after bankruptcy "lacks credibility," US Airways Chief Executive Doug Parker said Thursday as he urged creditors to push the Atlanta airline's executives to explore its merger proposal.

"This is where I'd like to see the [Delta] management team come along," Parker said in a conference call with industry analysts and reporters. "I've passed the threshold to think that's going to happen soon."

Parker was less ebullient than during a similar call on Nov. 15 in announcing Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways' proposed $8.4 billion takeover, but sounded no less determined.

"This is a transaction that makes all the sense in the world and that we are determined and committed to continue to pursue, and we are highly confident we are going to get closed," Parker said.

His comments came on the heels of Delta's filing of a bankruptcy reorganization plan this week, in which the airline said it believes it should emerge from Chapter 11 next spring as an independent carrier. Delta's court-appointed creditors committee stated Wednesday that it welcomed Delta's decision to file a plan but would continue to look at "potential alternatives" as well.

Delta is offering creditors — who effectively control the airline's destiny — an all-stock stake that it values at $9.4 billion to $12 billion. US Airways has offered $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million of its shares with a current market value of $4.4 billion.

US Airways has signaled that it will consider upping its bid, while some industry experts believe Delta's creditors will press both sides to sweeten their offers in coming weeks.

While Parker said US Airways is in "continuing dialog" with Delta's creditors and advisers, he said he felt an "obligation to correct" Delta's claims that its proposal is more valuable and that the merger would fail to win regulatory approval or produce the savings US Airways expects.

"We know how to do this, and we know what the issues are," said Parker, who last year led America West in its takeover of the larger US Airways, assuming the latter company's name. "We're extremely comfortable with our ability to do this."

Dissecting Delta's plan during the one-hour, 40-minute call, Parker said his company values Delta's proposal at $5.5 billion to $6.9 billion.

"Their method is extremely aggressive, and we believe it lacks credibility," he added, noting that Southwest Airlines, the industry's most valuable company, has a current market value of $12.2 billion.

Clark Orsky, an analyst with KDP Investment Advisors, said US Airways made a good case that Delta's value for its plan is "aggressive" and that concerns the Department of Justice would shoot down the merger are overblown. His firm in Montpelier, Vt., is an independent analyst of high-yield debt.

"They seem to poke quite a few holes in the Delta analysis," said Orsky.

US Airways Strikes Back, Doubts Delta's Antitrust Concerns (BBJ)

Birmingham Business Journal, December 22, 2006

After several big days for the Atlanta-based airline Delta Air Lines Inc. -- in which Delta's board of directors unanimously rejected US Airways Group Inc.'s takeover bid, the creditors committee praised Delta for filing its reorganization plan, and Delta's executives formally launched a petition against the takeover -- Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways struck back today.

In a conference call with analysts on Dec. 21, US Airways (NYSE: LCC) Chairman and CEO Doug Parker took Delta to task on the points that the Atlanta-based airline has been harping on: specifically, that the proposed merger poses too many antitrust issues, that the resulting debt level would be exorbitant, and that employee integration, contracts and morale would suffer.

"The anti-trust issues are fully managable," said Parker. "We've done much more work on this, more than anyone else. We are not going to let this deal fail on anti-trust issues."

He also emphasized that the proposed merger is labor friendly and that employees would possibly come out better than they are now, because the merged airline would go to the "highest common denominator" contracts.

Similar to a conference call that Delta held on Dec. 19, US Airways's top executive and top hired gun, lawyer Rick Rule, a partner in the law firm Fried Frank LLP's Washington and New York offices and a former Department of Justice antitrust division attorney, poked holes in Delta's position that a merger would pose too many antitrust issues.

Rule said that Delta's methodology is "severely flawed."

They don't believe the merger would create as many monopoly cities as Delta has said.

"We feel very confident, having gotten down in the weeds, that we have accurately and correctly analyzed this merger," said Rule. "At the end of the day, the arbiter of who is right is the Department of Justice."

In a detailed, 24-page presentation on US Airways' Web site, US Airways also shows why it feels Delta has dramatically over-valued itself.

US Airways has offered about $8.7 billion for the Delta, but Delta's standalone plan assumes a value of between $9.4 billion and $12 billion.

"Which we find to be unrealistic," said Parker. "The valuation completely lacks credibility."

Parker said that Delta has been "trying to discredit our proposal and two show that Delta as a standalone is worth more than people believe it is."

US Airways CEO Calls Delta Unrealistic (PTR)

By Thomas Olson

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, December 22, 2006

Pushing his case for merging with Delta Air Lines, US Airways CEO Doug Parker on Thursday lambasted elements of bankrupt Delta's just-filed reorganization plan as "unrealistic" and "superficial."

Parker spoke to analysts on a conference call to poke holes in Delta's own plan and to answer its criticism of US Airways' bid. He appealed to analysts to scrutinize both plans.

US Airways made a hostile offer last month worth nearly $8.4 billion to acquire the Atlanta-based airline out of bankruptcy. Such a move would create the world's largest airline, better compensate Delta creditors and create $1.6 billion in new revenue and cost savings, Parker claims.

Delta management on Tuesday formally rejected the merger plan, arguing US Airways' offer would result in too big a debt load, would not reach the $1.6 billion in synergies claimed by US Airways and would not pass muster with antitrust regulators.

"The US Airways proposal provides inferior value to our stand-alone plan," Delta spokeswoman Betsy Talton said in a statement.

Delta filed a reorganization plan that values it between $9.4 billion and $12 billion. Its plan would result in $3.55 billion in total projected earnings from 2007 through 2010.

Yesterday, Parker said the profit estimates might be correct, but he termed Delta's valuation projections "unrealistic." Rather, the CEO said Delta's equity would be worth between $5.5 billion and $6.9 billion.

"We think their valuations are really out of whack," Parker said. "Delta coming out and saying they are worth as much as Southwest (Airlines) doesn't pass the smell test."

Parker said Delta used "flawed" criteria in analyzing antitrust issues a merger would raise with the Department of Justice. For instance, Delta's criticism does not allow for the probable entry of discount airlines into markets served by Delta and US Airways.

"We are not going to let this transaction fail on antitrust issues," Parker said.

But the only way to know what antitrust objections might surface is for both US Airways and Delta to file merger plans with the Justice Department, US Airways antitrust attorney Rick Rule told analysts.

"It needs to be done by (Delta) management," Parker said. "Absent that, Delta's creditors would need to direct management to do that, which they have the full ability to do."

US Airways has been directly appealing to Delta's creditors to pressure management into accepting its bid. Delta's creditor committee broke its silence on Wednesday, saying it sided with Delta's stand-alone plan but would consider US Airways' offer and any alternatives.

Delta has discounted US Airways' merger plan because it says the Tempe, Ariz.-based airline has yet to integrate operations with America West.

Yesterday, Parker countered that by saying US Airways has achieved several "milestones." All but one of 38 airports served by US Airways and America West have been integrated. He also cited a labor agreement reached Wednesday.

US Airways reached a single-contract agreement with the Transport Workers Union representing 156 flight dispatchers, covering 120 at US Airways' flight-operation control center in Moon, and 37 at America West's center in Phoenix.

The pact, which does not require formal ratification by union members, mostly raises salaries for the comparatively lower-paid dispatchers in Phoenix, said Don Wright, president of TWU Local 545 in Moon.

Wright declined to provide wage rates and ranges. But he said the new contract will provide additional paid days off, while "meeting the needs of the company" in terms of productivity and work rules.

The labor pact has no bearing on US Airways' pending decision to consolidate the flight control center in either Pittsburgh or Phoenix. That decision is expected in late January or early February.

US Air Challenges Delta's Proposal To Restructure (WSJ)

By Corey Dade And Gary Mcwilliams

Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108610

US Airways Group Inc. attacked the restructuring plan proposed by Delta Air Lines Inc. this week to fend off an $8.38 billion hostile takeover as "extremely aggressive" and lacking "credibility on any kind of standard."

The denunciation of the plan in a conference call with investors and analysts Thursday by Doug Parker, the US Airways chairman and chief executive who sprang the unsolicited bid on Delta last month and unleashed a frenzy of takeover maneuvering in the U.S. airline industry, comes as creditors are burrowing deeper into the financial projections underlying Delta's valuation of the Atlanta carrier at $9.4 billion to $12 billion once it emerges from bankruptcy proceedings in the spring.

Both airlines are expected to aggressively press their case during the next several weeks, and Mr. Parker's remarks showed that US Airways, based in Tempe, Ariz., remains determined to acquire Delta despite fierce and increasingly vocal opposition by Delta, which ranks as the third-largest U.S. carrier, by passenger traffic. US Airways ranks sixth.

As a stand-alone company, Delta would be valued at just $5.5 billion to $6.9 billion if the valuation were based on reasonable financial assumptions, Mr. Parker said. US Airways said its takeover offer would be worth $11.6 billion to $14.2 billion under the calculations used in Delta's restructuring plan.

Delta officials were quick to defend their projections, which include swinging from a 2006 loss of $385 million to 2007 net income of $456 million and profit of $1.19 billion in 2010. "Nothing we heard today explains away the fact that the US Airways proposal provides inferior value to our stand-alone plan, is structurally flawed, and raises overwhelming regulatory and labor issues that -- after a lengthy delay -- are likely to prevent the proposed merger from being completed," Delta said in a statement, noting that its projections are based partly on costs already shed during the bankruptcy proceeding.

US Airways Chief Executive Claims Proposal For Reorganization 'clearly Lacks Credibility' (AR)

By Dawn Gilbertson

Arizona Republic, December 22, 2006

Two days after Delta executives called US Airways the worst of all merger partners and continued their blistering assault against its buyout offer, US Airways CEO Doug Parker shot back with a vengeance.

In a hastily arranged conference call with Wall Street analysts and the media Thursday, Parker rebutted, in rapid fire, key assumptions in Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy on its own and tried to clear up misconceptions he said that Delta has been spreading to discredit the Tempe airline's $8 billion-plus offer.

The only time Parker paused in the hourlong presentation was for a similarly fast-paced rundown by the attorney handling regulatory matters for the merger.

Parker said the financial plan Delta presented this week "clearly lacks credibility."

The merger, in contrast, "is a transaction that makes all the sense in the world," he said. He said he's "highly confident" the deal will get done and repeatedly referred to the "new Delta's" plans, as the combined airline would be called Delta.

The intensity, coming just a day before a long holiday weekend when business usually grinds to a halt, underscores the high-stakes public relations battle under way on both sides as the industry embarks on what many expect to be another round of consolidation.

Delta creditors hold the key in this case, given Delta's bankruptcy, and both sides are going all out to win their votes.

Parker and US Airways were seen as losing momentum a few weeks ago, in part because of Parker's comments he made suggesting that US Airways would back off if Delta's management didn't buy in.

He has since backed off those comments and the airline has gone more on the offensive publicly in the face of Delta's defiant stance and huge employee rallies against the merger in its hometown of Atlanta.

Parker's comments Thursday weren't as biting as some out of the Delta camp since the deal was proposed Nov. 15, but he got in plenty of digs:

· On Delta's projections, filed in U.S. Bankruptcy Court this week, that it would be worth between $9.4 billion to $12 billion when it emerges from Chapter 11: "We think their valuation is way out of whack."

Saying Delta would be worth more than Southwest, the industry standard bearer, didn't "pass the smell test," he said.

Referring to the upward slope of Delta's earnings projections over the next few years, Parker said, "They have a pretty big hockey stick built in."

If analysts buy Delta's valuation, he said, then they should value US Airways' offer under the same financial assumptions, which would bring it up to $12 billion to $14 billion.

· On Delta's repeated assertion that the deal won't pass muster with antitrust regulators because there is too much overlap between the airlines: "The Delta analysis has all sorts of flaws in it."

· On Delta's criticisms of US Airways' customer service: "We don't look so good (in baggage handling and customer complaints) and we're well aware of it, but frankly, neither does Delta."

· To Delta's argument that the combined airline's $23 billion debt load would be too high: "Of course, it ends up with higher levels of debt; it's a much larger airline. . . .

"To argue that the absolute level of debt is something meaningful is hard for us to come to grips with."

· To Delta's assertion that US Airways management is not done with the US Airways-America West merger: "What we've learned over the last 14 months have taught us exactly what the issues are going to be. . . . We're extremely comfortable with our ability to manage this."

Airline Pushes Takeover Of Delta (WT)

By Sean Lengell

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

US Airways is continuing to push its takeover of Delta Air Lines, even as the bankrupt creditors say they're not interested in the $8.4 billion offer.

US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker yesterday accused Delta of intentionally misleading its creditors and the public by maligning US Airways' proposal, which was offered Nov. 15 and includes $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million company shares.

He added that Delta's plan to emerge from bankruptcy alone is "unrealistic" and worth far less than US Airways' offer.

US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest airline, says combining with Delta, the nation's third biggest after American and United, would create annual benefits of $1.65 billion.

"We are going forward [with our plan] and we're dedicated to getting this done," Mr. Parker told analysts during a telephone conference yesterday.

But Delta says it is determined to remain an independent airline. On Tuesday its board unanimously rejected US Airways' offer, saying it was "substantially inferior" to its own reorganization plan.

The board filed a five-year business strategy with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in New York. The plan lets unsecured creditors recover 63 percent to 80 percent of their claims.

Delta's proposal values the airline at as much as $12 billion. The airline has forecast a net income of $450 million in 2007 and $1.2 billion in 2010.

Trading of Delta unsecured bonds has increased from about 40 cents on the dollar Nov. 14 -- the day before US Airways announced its intention to buy Delta -- to about 66 cents on Wednesday, which Mr. Parker says validates his company's offer.

"This obviously shows that the creditors of Delta believe that the US Airways merger proposal is worth more than [Delta's] stand-alone" plan, he said.

But Delta's creditors remain unconvinced. The airline's creditors committee, appointed after the carrier filed for Chapter 11 protection in September 2005, announced Wednesday it was supporting Delta's reorganization plan.

Delta's pilots' union, a large creditor and committee member, also has said it supports Delta's mission to remain an independent carrier.

The creditors did leave open the possibility of entertaining future offers.

The committee "will continue to consider potential alternatives in order to maximize the ultimate recoveries for the unsecured creditors in the Delta bankruptcy," the group said Wednesday.

Many analysts had been skeptical that US Airways would be able to pull off the acquisition, even before the creditors' announcement.

Antitrust issues would be difficult to overcome, they said. And a merger of the two airlines would create a cumbersome system with eight hubs -- far too many to be cost-effective.

Mr. Parker downplayed the antitrust question, saying that the issue is "fully manageable."

"We did not go launching this offer without knowing that and assessing the risk of antitrust," he said.

Even if the proposed deal with US Airways falls through, some industry analysts predict that Delta, with its attractive European routes, will have future suitors.

"We thought it was noteworthy that [Delta] management made the point in its conference call with investors [Wednesday] that it is not inherently opposed to considering mergers, but rather the specifics of the US Airways combination," said Clark Orsky, an airline analyst from KDP Investment Advisors.

"We think merger possibilities will remain in the forefront of investors' minds so that, even if [Delta] shortly exits Chapter 11 as an independent carrier, the company will remain a merger candidate for a while."

Parker Fires Back At Delta (STREET)

By Ted Reed

TheStreet.com, December 22, 2006

"Something here looks a little out of whack, to say it politely," he said during an online conference with analysts. Parker responded to the case, which Delta laid out earlier this week, that the US Airways bid is undervalued, unlikely to receive regulatory approval and illegal under its pilot contract.

Parker said Delta's self-valuation of $9.4 billion to $12.2 billion would mean the airline, at the high end, is worth nearly as much as Southwest (LUV - news - Cramer's Take) or as United (UAUA - news - Cramer's Take) and American (AMR - news - Cramer's Take) combined.

The valuation "clearly lacks credibility," he said. For Delta's stock to reach a range implied by the valuation, based on expected 2007 profits, the company would sport a price-to-earnings ratio of 20.6 to 26.3, he said.

Parker also disputed Delta's estimates that its earnings will rise gradually from about $500 million in 2007 to $1.2 billion in 2010. "They have a pretty big hockey stick built in that has 2008 and 2009 ramping up much faster than we would," he said. Using the same multiples for shares given to creditors that Delta uses, US Airways' offer is worth $11.6 billion to $14.2 billion, rather than its $8.6 billion current valuation, he said.

Meanwhile, Rick Rule, US Airways' antitrust attorney, challenged Delta's assertion that Justice Department regulators would reject or delay US Airways' bid to take over its primary competitor. He said the government would be concerned that competition could decline in some small markets, but at the same time a merged, more efficient company "should give them comfort that there won't be increases in fares." In the end, "lower costs benefit consumers," he said.

Caremark Shareholders Fight CVS Deal (AP)

By Greg Giuffrida

AP, December 22, 2006

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) -- A group of shareholders in pharmacy benefits manager Caremark Rx Inc. has filed for an injunction to force company officials to consider a proposed buyout by rival Express Scripts Inc. that could pay more than an offer from CVS Corp.

Woonsocket, R.I.-based CVS Corp., the nation's largest operator of drugstores and second to Walgreen Co. in sales, said on Nov. 1 that it planned to acquire Nashville-based Caremark for about $21.2 billion in stock.

On Thursday, CVS and Caremark announced that the proposed merger passed antitrust scrutiny of the U.S. Federal Trade Commission and could be completed by the first quarter of 2007.

The approval comes days after rival pharmacy benefits manager Express Scripts Inc. proposed to pay about $26 billion in a hostile bid for Caremark that would offer a cash option and premium for shareholders.

The shareholders' motion filed Thursday evening in Nashville's U.S. District Court claims that Caremark board members will personally benefit from the CVS deal and have entered into a strict merger agreement that keeps them from seeking out the best deal for shareholders.

The motion comes in a lawsuit originally filed by the Iron Workers of Western Pennsylvania Pension Plan and asks for a judge to immediately order Caremark to end the "draconian" agreement with CVS and turn over internal documents.

"What they have to do is put aside their own individual interests and think only what is best for their own shareholders," said Douglas Johnston, a plaintiffs' attorney with Barrett, Johnston & Parsley of Nashville.

The motion also claims that Caremark chairman E. Mac Crawford would keep his position at the newly formed CVS/Caremark Corp. and make up to $48 million in stock, severance payments and consulting fees.

"Unfortunately, what happens many times is that potential buyers will come in and try to work with the managers, provide special benefits, and as much as they possibly can, prevent the board from doing its fiduciary duties," Johnston said.

A phone message left late Thursday night with Caremark's corporate communications office was not immediately returned.

Caremark officials said this week that they still believe the CVS deal is the best long-term strategic value for shareholders and they remain committed to it.

Under the CVS deal, Caremark shareholders would receive 1.67 shares of CVS for each share of Caremark. CVS shareholders would own 54.5 percent of the combined company and Caremark shareholders would own 45.5 percent.

Under the Express Scripts deal, Caremark stockholders would own approximately 57 percent of the combined company, and Express Scripts stockholders would own approximately 43 percent.

Some analysts have said that Express Scripts' offer to pay $29.25 in cash and 0.426 shares of its stock for each share of Caremark could be more attractive to shareholders.

Caremark shares rose 15 cents, or 0.27 percent, to close at $56.15 on Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. CVS rose $1.01, or 3.38 percent, to $30.92. Maryland Heights, Mo.-based Express Scripts fell 31 cents, or 0.42 percent, to $73.47 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Express Scripts Calls Its Offer For Caremark 'superior' (SLBJ)

St. Louis Business Journal, December 21, 2006

Express Scripts Inc. issued a statement late Wednesday calling its $26 billion bid for pharmaceutical services company Caremark Rx Inc. "superior."

The statement came after Caremark and rival bidder CVS Corp. issued releases Wednesday saying that their previously announced merger deal had cleared a regulatory hurdle: The initial waiting period required by the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976 had expired without a request for additional information from the U.S. Federal Trade Commission.

Express Scripts rival bid, made Monday, represented at the time a 15 percent premium over the all-stock purchase price to be paid to Caremark's stockholders under Caremark's Nov. 1 deal with drug chain CVS (NYSE: CVS), headquartered in Woonsocket, R.I. Express Scripts proposed to acquire all of the outstanding shares of Caremark Rx for $29.25 in cash and 0.426 shares of Express Scripts stock for each share of Caremark stock.

In its release Wednesday, Express Scripts' stated, "As we expected, the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act has expired for CVS Corporation. We said on December 18th that we anticipate the Express Scripts transaction with Caremark would be completed in the third quarter of 2007. The superior value of the Express Scripts offer for Caremark is clear as evidenced by the strong support of both Express Scripts and Caremark stockholders."

Express Scripts said that based on Wednesday's closing stock prices, its offer has a value of $60.68 per share, or $26.5 billion, a 21.5 percent premium on the current value of the CVS offer.

In its release Wednesday, CVS said it anticipates that a shareholder meeting to approve its deal and the closing will occur as early as the first quarter next year. Both CVS' and Caremark's shareholders must approve the transaction.

Caremark Rx Inc. (NYSE: CMX), based in Nashville, Tenn., dispenses pharmaceuticals to eligible participants in benefit plans maintained by its customers.

Delta And Pine Approves Monsanto Merger (FOR)

By Joshua Lipton

Forbes, December 21, 2006

Two of the largest seed companies in the world just came one step closer to their long-awaited merger.

On Thursday, Delta and Pine Land Company (nyse: DLP - news - people) announced that at a special meeting held in Memphis, Tenn., the company's shareholders formally approved its merger with Monsanto (nyse: MON - news - people).

The acquisition is a long time in the making. It was back in 1998 when Monsanto first announced its intention to buy Delta and Pine Land, a leading commercial breeder, producer, and marketer of cotton planting seed. But Monsanto then backed out of the deal. A legal scrap followed, until the new agreement was brokered.

On Aug. 15, Monsanto announced that it would acquire Scott, Miss.-based Delta and Pine Land for $1.5 billion in cash.

"Delta and Pine Land represents an excellent fit for our company as we look to bring value-added traits and high-quality seed to cotton growers around the world," said Monsanto chief executive Hugh Grant, at the time of the announcement. "Delta and Pine Land has strong cotton genetics, and we believe Monsanto's leadership in providing the best cotton traits can improve on this already strong base."

Shares of Monsanto nudged down 25 cents, or 0.5%, to $51.65 while shares of Delta and Pine Land slipped 24 cents, or 0.6%, to $40.56 in Thursday trading.

Mark Gulley, an analyst at Soleil-Gulley & Associates, said the companies still face the challenge of regulatory approval. "This decision isn't key," Gulley said in an interview. "The antitrust review is what we're all waiting for."

Regulators still have to weigh in on the proposed merger and decide whether it's anticompetitive. To close the transaction and satisfy Uncle Sam, Monsanto has already said it's willing to divest the U.S. assets of its Stoneville cottonseed business.

There is no set date on when the government will decide the issue.

Lockheed Martin Buys Management Systems (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BETHESDA, Md. — Military contractor Lockheed Martin Corp. said Thursday it agreed to acquire Fairfax, Va.-based Management Systems Designers Inc. for undisclosed terms.

MDS, which has more than 600 employees, is a provider of information technology, primarily for government agencies including the Internal Revenue Service, Department of Homeland Security and Department of Defense.

Lockheed Martin said the deal, which won't have a material effect on its results, strengthens its initiatives in the growing health care information market.

The transaction is set to close during the first quarter of 2007, subject to regulatory approval.

Shares of Lockheed gained 34 cents to finish at $91.94 on the New York Stock Exchange.

ETEU Approves German Movie Subsidies (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) - The European Union on Thursday approved German subsidies totaling $240 million for its movie industry, officials said.

The subsidies will back feature length movies, documentaries and cartoons. The aid is approved until 2010.

"The commission says the new German funds for movie productions are in line with state aid rules," EU Antitrust Commissioner Neelie Kroes said.

Finnish Antitrust Body Proposes $40 Million Fine On Stora Enso (AP)

Associated Press

AP, December 22, 2006

HELSINKI, Finland -- Finnish antitrust officials said Thursday that paper maker Stora Enso Oyj should be fined $40 million for anticompetitive behavior.

The Finnish Competition Authority proposed the fine to the country's Market Court, saying the Finnish-Swedish company had violated competition laws in buying timber in Finland from 1997 to 2004. It gave no other details.

Stora Enso denied the charges, saying the proposal is "groundless."

Earlier his month, Stora Enso denied any involvement in a price-fixing conspiracy in the United States after a federal grand jury in Hartford, Conn., indicted Stora Enso North America Corp. for being part of a plan to drive up prices of paper used to print magazines and catalogues.

Stora Enso is one of the world's largest forest product groups, making magazine paper, newsprint, fine paper, pulp and packaging boards. It employs 44,000 people in more than 40 countries.

The group was formed in a 1998 merger between Finland's Enso and Stora of Sweden. The Finnish government is the major shareholder with more than 10 percent of the stock.

DaimlerChrysler Paying $1.2M To Settle Pollution Violation (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Department of Justice said Thursday that Mercedes-Benz USA and parent DaimlerChrysler AG will pay $1.2 million to settle allegations that they failed to report air pollution problems with Mercedes-Benz vehicles to federal regulators.

As a result of the complaint brought by the government, Mercedes-Benz USA has issued voluntary recalls and extended warranties to address the defects, at an estimated cost of $59 million. Under the settlement, the company is also required to overhaul its emissions reporting system. The improvements will likely cost the company $1 million per year, the Department of Justice said in a statement.

The affected 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. According to the government, the recalls and warranty extensions will reduce the harmful emissions caused by the defects by over 500 tons cumulatively.

Under the Clean Air Act auto makers are required to notify the Environmental Protection Agency of problems with vehicle emissions.

Calls for comment were left with DaimlerChrysler.

Shares of DaimlerChrysler fell 36 cents to close at $61.23 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mercedes To Pay EPA $1.2 Million (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Mercedes-Benz USA and its parent company, DaimlerChrysler AG, yesterday agreed to pay the government $1.2 million for failing to notify the Environmental Protection Agency about air pollution controls defects on numerous 1998 to 2006 Mercedes vehicles.

DOJ_NMG_0108615

The settlement, announced by the Justice Department and the EPA, resolves a suspected Clean Air Act violation: The auto manufacturer did not promptly inform the EPA of defects in emission-related parts so the agency could determine whether the emission standards were exceeded and whether a recall was necessary.

Both the complaint and the settlement were filed in the U.S. District Court in the District of Columbia.

"Reliable and effective automobile pollution control systems are essential to protect human health and the environment from harmful automobile emissions," said Assistant Attorney General Sue Ellen Wooldridge, who heads the Justice Department's Environment and Natural Resources Division.

"Mercedes' failure to alert EPA to a number of defects in emission-related components over a multiyear period is a serious violation," she said.

In response to the EPA's investigation, Mercedes began voluntary recalls for two of the defects and notified owners that it would extend the warranty coverage to address a third defect, at an estimated cost of $59 million.

Mercedes U.S. spokeswoman Tracy Darchini wasn't available to comment on the settlement.

Justice Department officials said the vehicles subject to the voluntary recalls and extended warranties have defective catalytic converters or defective air pumps. The voluntary recalls and extended warranty will reduce the emissions of harmful pollutants caused by the defects by more than 500 tons, they said.

The pollutants include non-methane hydrocarbons, nitrogen oxides, which are key ingredients in the production of ozone, a major contributor to cancer-causing smog. Carbon monoxide, another pollutant, impairs breathing and is especially harmful to children, people with asthma and the elderly.

Under the terms of the consent decree, Mercedes will be required to improve its emissions-defect investigation and reporting system to ensure future compliance, at an estimated cost of $1 million per year.

"These defect reporting requirements are a critical part of EPA's program to ensure that vehicles on the road comply with the Clean Air Act's emissions standards," said Catherine R. McCabe, EPA's principal deputy assistant administrator for the Office of Enforcement and Compliance Assurance.

The agreement is subject to a 30-day public comment period and final court approval.

Court Rules Against Tribes In Disclosure Case (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO -- A divided California Supreme Court ruled Thursday that Indian tribes can be sued for violating the state's campaign disclosure law even though tribes enjoy sovereign immunity under federal law.

The 4-3 ruling is unprecedented and may be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which has consistently protected Indian immunity from lawsuits.

The state court justified its ruling in Agua Caliente v. Superior Court by citing the growing role of Indian casino money in state elections and the state's need to protect against political corruption.

Justice Ming Chin, writing for the majority, conceded that Thursday's decision was an "abrogation of the sovereign immunity doctrine" that protects tribes from lawsuits. But he said the ruling was narrow and justified by the state's need to provide "a transparent election process with rules that apply equally to all parties who enter the political fray."

Justice Carlos R. Moreno, writing for the dissenting justices, insisted that only Congress could change Indian tribes' immunity from lawsuits.

"The ideal of Indian tribal sovereign immunity and federal protection has existed side by side with the reality of Indians massacred and dispossessed from their land by state and private interests or more recently, of Indians living in poverty as second-class citizens," Moreno wrote.

Now that some tribes are growing wealthy from casinos, "the ideal of tribal sovereignty is becoming more concretely realized," and any need to modify it must come from Congress, Moreno wrote.

Thursday's ruling permits the state's Fair Political Practices Commission to sue the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians, a federally recognized tribe in Palm Springs, for failing to properly report millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

The watchdog panel said the tribe did not follow the law when it contributed more than $7.5 million to campaigns in 1998, $175,200 in the first half of 2001, and $426,000 in the first half of 2002.

One of the alleged contributions made in 2002 went to support a ballot initiative that would have authorized $15 million a year for eight years to fund several projects, including a passenger rail line from Los Angeles to Palm Springs, where the tribe runs a casino.

DOJ_NMG_0108616

The Fair Political Practices Commission requires full disclosure of contributions in political campaigns, both from the donors and the recipients. The commission sued the tribe, arguing that it had violated the disclosure law in making the contributions from 1998 to 2002. The lawsuit seeks penalties and a court injunction.

The tribe argued the doctrine of sovereign immunity shields it from lawsuits and appealed to the California Supreme Court after losing in the trial and appeals courts.

In ruling against the tribe, the court majority admitted that the U.S. Supreme Court has consistently affirmed the sovereign immunity doctrine. But the majority said the court also has "grown increasingly critical of its continued application in light of the changed status of Indian tribes as viable economic and political nations."

California has the right to regulate its electoral process under the U.S. Constitution's 10th Amendment, which protects state rights, and the guarantee clause, which gives states the duty and power to maintain a republican form of government, the majority said.

Without the ability to enforce tribal compliance, the Political Reform Act of 1974 would be substantially weakened, Chin said.

The court's decision, he wrote, would apply only to attempts to enforce the campaign laws.

The tribe had insisted the state had other means of enforcing its campaign laws, including discussions with the tribe on a government-to-government basis or acquiring the donation information from other sources, and offered to enter into a voluntary compliance agreement with the state.

But the majority rejected the tribe's proposals.

In the dissent, Moreno said the U.S. Supreme Court "has not wavered from the principle that whatever problems arise from the conflict between Indian and state sovereignty are matters for Congress, exercising its plenary power over Indian affairs, to solve."

The federal Constitution gives states "no power to abrogate Indian sovereign immunity" because the states ceded such powers to the federal government when they ratified the Constitution, wrote Moreno, joined by Justices Joyce Kennard and Kathryn Mickle Werdegar.

Moreno noted that the Agua Caliente band has been willing to enter into an agreement to waive its immunity for political reporting and has practical reasons for doing so.

"A tribe concerned with preserving its own sovereignty while at the same time seeking to maintain good relations with the government and the citizens ... may recognize that concessions are necessary to promote its own long-run interests," Moreno wrote.

A lawyer and a spokeswoman for the Agua Caliente band refused to say whether it would appeal the ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court. The tribe issued a statement from tribal Chairman Richard M. Milanovich, who expressed disappointment and said the Tribal Council would "decide what further actions it may take."

The tribe owns about 31,500 acres in a checkerboard pattern in the alm Springs area and has about 400 members, a spokeswoman said.

FBI Chief For Md. Faces Balancing Act (WP)

By Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Chase Sees Need To Bolster Fight On Crime, Terror

After running down fugitives in the District and pursuing one of the nation's most storied fugitives, William D. Chase is settling in as the head of the FBI's Baltimore office.

Chase, 50, who assumed the job in June, says that while counterterrorism remains the bureau's top priority, he also wants to dedicate more resources to fighting crime, the bureau's traditional role.

"I'm hoping to make some changes to firm up resources to better address the criminal program," Chase said.

Since the terrorist attacks of 2001, the bureau's top priority has been fighting terrorism, and that is more the case in the Washington area, with its preponderance of government facilities, than elsewhere. The majority of Chase's agents necessarily are assigned to that central responsibility; his agents must follow tips and possible leads of all kinds, even hoaxes, often simply to eliminate them.

Still, he said, he hopes to work more closely with state and local authorities, particularly to address the gang activity that has increasingly taken root in Maryland's Washington suburbs. The Baltimore FBI office covers Maryland and Delaware.

DOJ_NMG_0108617

The FBI announced in February that Kevin L. Perkins, then the special agent in charge of the bureau's Baltimore office, was being appointed assistant director in charge of the FBI's finance division.

Chase replaced him during the summer. Federal law enforcement officials, including U.S. Attorney Rod J. Rosenstein, spoke highly of Chase in recent interviews.

Rosenstein, the top federal prosecutor in Maryland, said he and Chase agree that the Baltimore division must be appropriately mindful of the need to balance counterterrorism activities with the bureau's more traditional crime-fighting role.

"I think he's a very experienced and very responsible leader, and I think we're going to work very effectively together," Rosenstein said.

Clare Weber, a spokeswoman for the Baltimore division of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, said her agency has worked well with the bureau under Chase. "It's just a good partnership," she said. "Everything is all glowing."

Chase comes to the position with an unusual r?sum?, having started his professional career as a corporate attorney specializing in environmental law. It was "very unfulfilling," said Chase, a graduate of Vermont Law School and a self-described environmentalist.

But Chase had an uncle who was an agent, and over dinner that uncle told stories that intrigued the young lawyer more than a little bit. Chase applied to the bureau "kind of on a whim."

Chase was accepted, and soon he was assigned to St. Louis, where he battled organized crime and drug-trafficking, working closely with local authorities in some of the same ways he hopes his agents do here.

But he was a lawyer, and before long the FBI decided it wanted him in headquarters. He worked in the office of legal counsel from 1986 to 1991, when he was named special assistant to William S. Sessions, then the director of the FBI.

"I came to the bureau to get out of being an attorney, and three years later I was back to being an attorney," he said.

But Chase said he missed doing what the FBI does on the ground level: working cases. He joined the Washington field office in 1993, where he was the head of a fugitive task force. The ratio of paperwork to arrests was very good, he said.

"It was kind of like a law enforcement officer's dream," he said. "We'd hit 10 places a day . . . and usually every arrest was high stress."

The team looked for fugitives anywhere that one could hide -- in dishwashers, in refrigerators -- and looked for such tell-tale signs as loose ceiling tiles. In one instance, he said, a fugitive was found hiding behind a disposal.

In the late 1990s, Chase was named assistant special agent in charge of the Boston office, a period that he recalls as frustrating and in some ways disappointing.

That office, and much of that city, was seemingly fixated on the bureau's long-running search for James "Whitey" Bulger, a reputed mobster and fugitive for more than a decade. It was around that time that the public learned, in an extremely embarrassing moment for the bureau, that the suspected multiple-murderer also had been an FBI informant. Possible sightings were everywhere, from Thailand to South America, and each had to be explored. Bulger remains at large.

The Boston office also came under public scrutiny in what may be one of the FBI's most embarrassing revelations in recent history, that one of its agents had been an informant for the mob.

And Chase was in Boston on Sept. 11 -- his birthday, incidentally -- when two airplanes slammed into the World Trade Center after leaving Logan International Airport. What first seemed to be a hijacking was quickly revealed to be a terrorist attack, and the bureau's mission was recast in a sprint to prevent a feared second wave of attacks.

"I still remember that night," Chase said. "I got home, it was probably 2 in the morning and I turned on the television and I was still watching it at 5 a.m."

Everyone worked every day for two months, he said, and eventually, agents were told they had to take a half-day off on the weekend.

The fear that a second wave would follow immediately belongs to a different era, but in some respects, of course, the concern persists.

"Our mission is that there never be a recurrence of 9/11," Chase said.

Ford Wants Rolex Returned (MCA)

By Marc Perrusquia

Memphis Commercial Appeal, December 22, 2006

December 22, 2006 John Ford had one thing to say Thursday about prosecutors' suggestions he took a $40,000 wristwatch as a payoff: He wants the Rolex -- confiscated as evidence -- returned to him.

"I want to get it back," the former state senator said as his lawyer told reporters that Ford had obtained the watch legally.

Ford's comments came a day after the U.S. Attorney's Office alleged Ford accepted the watch from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman after intervening in a 2004 state pollution-control case against the real estate millionaire.

"The watch was completely a legal transaction," said Ford's lawyer, Michael Scholl, who said he will spell out details soon in a court filing.

Prosecutors hope to use the watch as evidence in Ford's upcoming bribery trial.

Ford and Scholl spoke briefly with reporters after a hearing where Scholl asked a judge to postpone Ford's Feb. 5 trial because of publicity this week about the watch and separate corruption charges just unveiled in Nashville.

Ford is set to stand trial in Memphis for allegedly taking $55,000 in bribes in the FBI's undercover Tennessee Waltz sting.

He learned Monday about the new indictment in Nashville alleging he took $800,000 in kickbacks from contractors while in the General Assembly. Ford denies charges in both cases.

Scholl told U.S. Dist. Judge J. Daniel Breen in a hearing in the federal building that all the sudden adverse publicity will make it hard to get a fair trial.

"There almost is no presumption of innocence for Mr. Ford as far as what's been laid out in the media this week day after day," Scholl told the judge.

Less than 50 days from trial, the timing of the Nashville charges and news of the watch create a prejudicial effect, Scholl said.

Breen expressed hesitance, yet said he will consider Scholl's request after he files a written motion, expected next week.

Asst. U.S. Atty. Tim DiScenza urged the judge to stick to the trial schedule, saying there are plenty of protections to ensure a fair trial.

DiScenza filed a motion Wednesday seeking to introduce the Rolex as evidence of "like and similar" acts by Ford showing he was inclined to take payoffs.

Neither Ford nor Hyneman, who hasn't returned calls for comment, has been charged in connection with the watch.

A legal analyst, retired University of Tennessee law professor Neil P. Cohen, said the lack of charges over the watch could be a strategy by prosecutors to win more witness cooperation.

John Ford Linked To $40,000 Watch (AP)

By Woody Baird

AP, December 22, 2006

MEMPHIS - Former state Sen. John Ford, facing corruption charges in Memphis and Nashville, bragged about getting a $40,000 watch for helping a wealthy real estate developer avoid pollution fines, prosecutors say in a court filing.

Prosecutors want to tell Ford's jury about the watch, a Rolex Masterpiece, when he goes to trial on unrelated charges of bribery, extortion and threatening a federal witness.

Ford, 64, is set for trial Feb. 5 on charges he took $55,000 in bribes from undercover agents posing as representatives of E-Cycle Management, a fake company at the center of an FBI investigation code-named Tennessee Waltz.

Defense lawyer Michael Scholl asked Thursday for a delay in the trial, arguing that news reports surrounding Ford's indictment Monday in Nashville on federal charges unrelated to Tennessee Waltz will make picking an impartial jury difficult.

Ford is accused in Nashville of taking more than $800,000 from TennCare contractors while he was on several Senate committees overseeing the state's expanded Medicaid program. No trial date has been set on those charges.

"The attention it's gotten is just unreal," Scholl said.

Judge J. Daniel Breen told Scholl to put his arguments in writing. "But at this point, we are set," the judge said.

Prosecutor Tim DiScenza objected to a delay.

"It's time for this case to be tried," he said. "No part of that Nashville case are we going to use in our case."

Prosecutors filed a request with Breen on Wednesday to bring up Ford's watch at his Memphis trial "as evidence of other crimes, wrongs and acts."

Scholl said Ford got the watch legally.

"This absolutely has nothing to do with this trial," he said.

Following a brief status conference with Breen, Ford refused to talk about the watch, except to say, "I want to get it back."

Prosecutors said Ford talked about getting the watch two years ago from Rusty Hyneman, one of Memphis' best-know real estate developers.

A call to Hyneman's office was not returned.

"Ford stated that he had received the watch because he had done Hyneman a big favor, that is, saved him $1.3 million dollars," prosecutors said in their petition.

The watch was taken from Ford when he was arrested on the Tennessee Waltz charges last year. Ford, who had represented a Memphis district for more than 30 years, resigned from the Senate shortly after that arrest.

Prosecutors do not identify two individuals with whom they said Ford talked about the watch. During the two-year Tennessee Waltz investigation, the FBI made hundreds of hours of secret audio and video recordings.

Ford met with state officials on Hyneman's behalf after the developer was cited for water pollution violations at subdivisions he was building in Shelby County, prosecutors said.

Ford denies the Nashville charges, saying he had a private consulting business while in the Senate and his dealings with TennCare contractors were proper.

TennCare is an expanded state-federal Medicaid program that provides health care to the poor, elderly, disabled and uninsurable.

Developer Admits Ocean Twp. Graft (NSL)

By Jeff Whelan, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger, December 22, 2006

Says he paid mayor $50,000 to boost zoning

A Monmouth County developer yesterday admitted paying off former Ocean Township Mayor Ter rance Weldon to increase the zon ing density for his housing project.

Moshe "Michael" Gohar acknowledged in federal district court in Trenton that he gave Weldon $50,000 in cash after Weldon helped influence the 2001 vote on the zon ing change.

"Where did you do it?" U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano asked of the corrupt payment.

"He came to my house," said Gohar, a 56-year-old Ocean Township resident, his voice barely audible.

The zoning change allowed the developer to build 75 townhouses on 81.1 acres, instead of the roughly 30 single-family homes permitted under the original zoning. The Apple Farm development was never constructed.

Gohar pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to give and offer corrupt payments. He initially had been indicted in February and also charged with mail fraud and bribery. The latter charge alone could have put him behind bars for up to 10 years.

Under the plea agreement between Gohar's attorneys and Assistant U.S. Attorneys Brian Howe and Charles McKenna, Gohar could face between 18 and 27 months in prison. One factor in sentencing could be a previous state tax conviction against Gohar.

If Pisano stays within the parameters of the plea agreement, neither side can appeal. The judge, however, is not bound by the agreement and Gohar faces a max imum of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

"He's contrite," Blair Zwillman, Gohar's attorney, said after the hearing. "He realizes it was a big mistake and wants to go on with his life."

FBI agents raided Weldon's house in January 2002 as part of a long-running corruption probe in Monmouth County, and found the cash in the pocket of a suit jacket in the mayor's attic. Weldon later pleaded guilty on corruption charges.

Gohar also said he conspired with the late Neptune businessman Philip Konvitz in the scheme. Be fore Konvitz died in 2005, a federal judge dismissed corruption charges against him after medical experts agreed that the 92-year-old suffered from Alzheimer's disease and was unfit to stand trial.

Pisano is scheduled to sentence Gohar on March 28. Gohar was re leased on a $500,000 secured property bond after his indictment and remains free pending his sentenc ing.

FBI Offers $40,000 Reward For Info On Trestle Fire (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, December 22, 2006

The FBI yesterday announced a $40,000 reward for information leading to the conviction of the arsonist who set a fire that destroyed a Butler County train trestle in May, causing an estimated $8 million in damage and lost business to the railroad and three area companies that rely on the rail line.

State police ruled the fire an arson eight days after the blaze, which quickly engulfed the 624-foot Divener Trestle in Donegal.

The bridge, a wooden structure owned by the Buffalo & Pittsburgh Railroad that predated the Civil War, went up in flames just 15 minutes after a train carrying sulphuric acid crossed it.

DOJ_NMG_0108620

"That would have been a disaster. That could have wiped out that town," said Ray Morrow, head of the Pittsburgh FBI office.

Another train was some 30 minutes away from crossing the span.

The railroad and three companies directly impacted by the loss of the trestle put up the reward money. The FBI got involved because it has jurisdiction over crimes involving railroad lines; the agency and state police are conducting the investigation.

The railroad had to pay about $2.7 million to replace the bridge.

While the bridge was down, three industrial plants in northern Butler County suffered huge financial hardships.

Indspec Chemical Corp. and Sonneborn Inc., both chemical companies in Petrolia, and Penreco, a supply company in Karns City, estimated the loss of rail access cost them a total of $5.3 million because of disruption of shipments to and from their facilities.

The rail line, a 17-mile link from the city of Butler along Route 68, runs directly into two of the plants.

Anyone with information is asked to call the FBI at 412-432-4000.

Four Indicted On Drug Trafficking Charges (ANG)

Access North Georgia, December 21, 2006

ATLANTA - Four illegal aliens have been indicted on charges relating to a large scale methamphetamine and cocaine trafficking conspiracy in Barrow and Gwinnett counties.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26; Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20; Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33; and Mauricio Medina-Mojica, 26, all believed to be from Mexico, were indicted by a federal grand jury late Wednesday.

Search warrants yielded over 280 pounds of illegal drugs and a rifle, according to the U.S. Attorney's office in Atlanta.

“We are coming after those responsible for the scourge of methamphetamine and other dangerous drugs that undermine the well being of our community and our country,” said United States Attorney David E. Nahmias. “We will also seek additional charges and longer sentences for anyone possessing or using a firearm in conjunction with their drug trafficking activities.”

The indictment charges the defendants in relation to five separate search warrants that were executed in Gwinnett and Barrow counties November 21. A search of four residences in those counties yielded a total of 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine (aks Ice), 135 pounds of cocaine, and a .223 caliber AR-15 style rifle.

The indictment charges all four defendants with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine. In addition, Miguel Angel Gonzalez is charged with the actual possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

DEA Atlanta Special Agent in Charge Sherri Strange noted the quantity of methamphetamine seized in this case constitutes the nation’s fifth largest methamphetamine seizure in 2006.

At an earlier news conference outlining details of the seizure, Ms. Strange said that DEA maintains a commitment to disrupt and dismantle the organizations that bring these drugs to Atlanta, commenting, “As members of these groups step up their operations, we are going to step up our operations.”

This case is being investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, with assistance from the Barrow County Sheriff's Department and Gwinnett County Police Department.

Four Indicted On Charges They Ran Large Drug Ring (GDP)

Gwinnett Daily Post, December 22, 2006

ATLANTA - Four illegal aliens believed to be from Mexico have been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges related to a large-scale drug-trafficking conspiracy.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26, Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20, Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33, and Mauricio Medino-Mojica, 26, are charged with engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and methamphetamine, according to a press release issued by Patrick Crosby, public affairs officer for the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Gonzalez is charged with "the actual possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug-trafficking crime," Crosby said.

The charges stem from five separate search warrants executed in November in Gwinnett and Barrow Counties, where law enforcement seized 145 pounds of crystal methamphetamine or ice, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223 caliber AR-15-style rifle, the release said.

Searches were executed at two Lilburn addresses, two Lawrenceville addresses and one Winder address, Crosby said.

Almost all the drugs and the gun were found at the Johns Way address, and the other residences yielded drug ledgers and some drug proceeds, Crosby said.

A Drug Enforcement Administration official noted that this bust is the nation's fifth largest meth seizure this year.

Arrests Tied To Huge Drug Ring (ABH)

Athens Banner-Herald, December 22, 2006

Four Mexican nationals are charged with running the local branch of a massive drug ring out of Gwinnett and Barrow counties, after federal authorities made what they are calling the nation's fifth-largest methamphetamine seizure of the year.

Indictments handed down Wednesday against men believed to be undocumented aliens from Mexico stem from five search warrants executed Nov. 21 at houses in Barrow and Gwinnett counties, U.S. Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia David Nahmias said in a news release.

Arnulfo Nunez-Villanueva, 26, Miguel Angel Gonzalez, 20, Rafael Garcia-Nunez, 33, and Mauricio Medino-Mojica, 26, were indicted Wednesday on charges of engaging in a conspiracy to distribute cocaine and meth, according to Nahmias' office. Gonzalez also is charged with possession of cocaine and methamphetamine and the possession of a firearm in furtherance of a drug trafficking crime.

The Barrow and Gwinnett searches yielded 145 pounds of crystal meth, 135 pounds of cocaine and a .223-caliber AR-15-style rifle.

Agents searched a house off Patrick Mill Road in southwestern Barrow County and four in Gwinnett County - two in Lilburn and two in Lawrenceville. Almost all of the drugs and the rifle were found at one of the Lilburn houses, while investigators found drug ledgers and some drug proceeds at the other houses, according to Patrick Crosby, spokesman for Nahmias.

A day later, federal authorities filed criminal complaints against the four men in advance of the federal grand jury's indictment.

On Nov. 6, Barrow County Superior Court Judge Joe Booth authorized federal investigators to tap a telephone belonging to Nunez-Villanueva, according to an affidavit that a Drug Enforcement Administration special agent filed in federal court.

Through the wiretap, investigators learned that Nunez-Villanueva "appeared to be a broker for numerous illegal drug transactions," the agent said in the affidavit.

Three days later, DEA officers and the Barrow County Sheriff's Office began surveillance of a house at 721 Tom Miller Road - a house where Nunez-Villanueva lived and met with customers, according to the affidavit.

Meanwhile, federal authorities in Illinois, Indiana and Kentucky arrested 13 others, charging them with conspiracy to distribute methamphetamine and cocaine. Those 13 men - three of whom are on the lam - are charged with conspiring to bring cocaine and meth from Chicago and Atlanta to southeastern Indiana and Louisville, Ky., according to Susan W. Brooks, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of Indiana.

In Chicago and Indiana, investigators seized 15 kilos of cocaine, two vehicles with compartments that could be used for hiding drugs, 25 pounds of meth, almost a kilo of heroin, roughly $400,000 in cash and guns. Authorities also arrested seven others on unrelated charges.

"Based on the amount of cash seized and drugs recovered, we have dismantled a highly productive drug organization," Brooks said in a news release.

Among the customers who went to the Winder house were couriers sent by Clarksville, Ind., resident Francisco Ortuno-Vasquez, who faces an indictment in Indiana, according to court records and Brooks.

The Georgia case is being investigated by the Drug Enforcement Administration, with help from the Barrow County Sheriff's Office and Gwinnett County police. Assistant U.S. Attorney Garrett M. Heenan is prosecuting the case.

Feds Bust Metro Cop For Helping Family's Cocaine Ring (NCP)

Nashville City Paper, December 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors on Thursday unsealed an indictment on a Metro Police narcotics detective, Officer Ernest B. Cecil, charging him with conspiracy for using his police powers to help his nephew run a Nashville cocaine ring.

Cecil, a 15-year veteran of the department, was arrested by federal Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) agents and immediately taken into custody Thursday morning, Metro Police Chief Ronal Serpas said at a press conference announcing the indictment.

U.S. Attorney Craig S. Morford – whose office on Monday indicted former State Senator John Ford on a new round of fraud charges – called Thursday's announcement of the indicting of a Metro Police officer a "sad day."

"It is a sad day whenever we have to stand here and announce that we have indicted an officer who is accused of violating the very laws that he has taken an oath to enforce," Morford said.

Cecil was indicted by a federal grand jury on one count of conspiracy to distribute over 5 kilograms of cocaine, one count of possession with the intent to distribute over 500 kilograms cocaine, and one count each of robbery in violation of the Hobbs Act and of brandishing a firearm during a drug trafficking crime.

Federal officials said they believe Cecil's alleged crimes were all committed to help his nephew, Corey Cecil, hide his drug operation from the rest of the Metro Police Department.

"Officer Cecil's nephew, Corey Cecil, and others regularly brought up large amounts of cocaine into Nashville for distribution and resale on the streets of this community," Morford said.

The indictment charges Cecil with providing protection to those drug dealers by warning his nephew to stay away from certain police-targeted areas, telling his nephew to dump his cell phones because they were no longer safe, arranging for the dismissal of parking tickets for his nephew, and assisted his nephew in retrieving a confiscated cell phone, and making threats on his behalf.

"And most importantly and most significantly, he participated with his nephew and a fellow Metro police officer in the robbery of a cocaine dealer," Morford said.

On April 30, 2003, Officer Cecil and Officer Charles Williams – who is already under indictment and will be going to trial in January – made a bogus police stop on one of the nephew's cocaine suppliers, federal prosecutors said.

That stop and the subsequent indictment of Williams eventually led Metro Police investigators to turn their attention to Cecil, Serpas said.

"There is a zero tolerance in the Metropolitan Police Department for untruthfulness, there's a zero tolerance for unethical behavior, and there's a zero tolerance for unethical behavior," Serpas said.

Serpas said Officer Cecil's arrest should put an end to the Cecil family drug operation.

IMMIGRATION:

Federal Panel Rejects Demjanjuk Appeal Of Deportation Order (AP)

By M. R. Kropko

AP, December 22, 2006

CLEVELAND — A man accused of being a Nazi death camp guard lost an appeal today fighting his deportation.

John Demjanjuk, 86, of suburban Cleveland, was ordered deported in 2005 after the chief federal immigration judge determined he had served at several Nazi death camps during World War II. Demjanjuk has denied the allegation and still has the right to appeal in federal courts today's ruling by the Board of Immigration Appeals in Falls Church, Va.

In its 20-page ruling, the board said facts established previously in courts identifying him as a Nazi guard "are conclusively established" and that there is no reason to believe there may be new information about his past in a Soviet KGB file, as his lawyer alleged.

The board reviewed legal briefs in the case before dismissing Demjanjuk's appeal, said Elaine Komis, spokeswoman for the Executive Office for Immigration Review.

"We are studying it," said John Broadley, Demjanjuk's lawyer. "But that's the conclusion they reached. What their reasoning is, we'll have to take a look at, and federal courts will have to look at it, too."

Demjanjuk, a former auto worker, was cleared in 1993 in Israel of being the notorious "Ivan the Terrible," a sadistic guard at the Treblinka concentration camp.

But Demjanjuk, who first lost his U.S. citizenship in 1981, was stripped of his citizenship in 2002 for a second time when a federal district judge in Cleveland ruled that documents from World War II prove he was a Nazi guard at various Nazi death or forced labor camps.

Demjanjuk is in frail health due to leg and back pain and appeared in a wheelchair at his deportation hearing last year. He lives in virtual seclusion at his home in Seven Hills.

"My expectation is that our lawyer is going to want to review it," said Demjanjuk's son, John Demjanjuk Jr. "My understanding it that it's appealable. They can't send him anywhere. We're not aware of any country offering to accept him from the United States."

Former Chief Immigration Judge Michael Creppy ruled Dec. 28 last year that there was no evidence to document Demjanjuk's claim that he would be tortured if deported to his native Ukraine. Creppy ruled that Demjanjuk should be deported to Germany or Poland if Ukraine does not accept him.

Broadley argued in the appeal that Creppy held an administrative position and should not have assigned the case to himself, and that he was biased because he once wrote an article containing his opinions on Nazi cases. Broadley also said Demjanjuk was not given a fair chance to adequately oppose some findings against him.

The 11-member Board of Immigration Appeals is the highest administrative body for interpreting and applying immigration laws. Generally, the board does not conduct courtroom proceedings.

The board hears appeals from decisions of immigration judges and by district directors of the Department of Homeland Security. Decisions of the board are binding unless modified or overruled by the attorney general or a federal appeals court.

Demjanjuk's case started 29 years ago and is the second longest in the records of the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations, which handles cases against people accused of being former Nazis.

The longest running U.S. case involving an accused Nazi was that of Andrija Artukovic, a Croatia wartime government official. The former Immigration and Naturalization Service started deportation proceedings against him in May 1951, and he was extradited to Yugoslavia in early 1986, some 35 years later.

US 'Nazi Guard' Faces Deportation (BBC)

BBC News, December 22, 2006

An 85-year-old man accused of having been a guard at a Nazi death camp has lost an appeal against his deportation from the US to his native Ukraine.

John Demjanjuk, who was ordered to be deported a year ago, can still make a further appeal against this ruling.

He has denied the allegations and his lawyers argued he would be tortured if sent back to Ukraine.

Mr Demjanjuk migrated to the US in 1951 and was briefly deported to Israel amid a 30-year legal battle over his past.

At the time, he was suspected of having been a notorious concentration camp guard, known by the nickname "Ivan the Terrible".

But his name was eventually cleared in an Israeli court and he was spared the death penalty.

Lack of evidence

The Board of Immigration Appeals upheld the 2005 deportation order which said there was no evidence to prove Mr Damjanjuk would be tortured if returned to the Ukraine.

"Simply put, the respondent's arguments regarding the likelihood of torture are speculative and not based on evidence in record," the board stated.

Mr Damjanjuk's lawyer, John Broadley said he was studying the ruling.

"What their reasoning is, we'll have to take a look at, and federal courts will have to look at it, too," he said.

His son, John Demjanjuk Jr, believed an appeal could still be made, adding: "We're not aware of any country offering to accept him from the United States."

The US Justice Department said efforts were continuing to remove him from the country as soon as possible.

Citizenship battle

Mr Demjanjuk returned to the US and his citizenship - which he had lost for allegedly lying to US immigration officials - was restored in 1998.

However, in 2002, an immigration judge ruled that there was enough evidence to prove Mr Demjanjuk had been a guard at several Nazi death camps and again stripped him of his citizenship.

He lost an appeal against the decision in 2004.

Mr Demjanjuk has always insisted he was a prisoner of war with the Nazis, rather than a guard serving under them.

But his 2002 hearing found that he had been an armed guard at the Sobibor, Majdanek and Flossenburg concentration camps where tens of thousands of Jews were killed.

Saudi Princess To Be Deported, Judge Orders (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

BOSTON --A Saudi Arabian princess who broke U.S. immigration laws to keep her domestic servants was ordered to be deported, prosecutors said Thursday.

Hana F. Al Jader of Winchester was sentenced to two years of probation, the first six months of which must be served in home confinement, after which she'll be deported to Saudi Arabia, prosecutors said.

U.S. District Judge Reginald J. Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader, 40, to pay $206,000 in restitution to three of her former domestic servants, pay a $40,000 fine, and perform 100 hours of community service.

In September, Al Jader pleaded guilty to two counts of visa fraud for lying on immigration forms, and two counts of harboring an alien for keeping the two women at her house though she knew their visas had expired.

DOJ_NMG_0108624

In a deal with prosecutors, six counts of forced labor were dropped in exchange for guilty pleas on the other charges.

Prosecutors alleged that Al Jader forced two domestic servants from Indonesia to work long hours, while holding their passports in a safe.

Al Jader submitted fraudulent forms to the U.S. Embassy in Saudi Arabia guaranteeing the women would work eight hours daily for $1,500 a month, they charged.

The women were actually paid just $300 per month after arriving in February 2003 to cook, clean and care for Al Jader's disabled husband, and their children.

Al Jader and her husband, Prince Mohamed Bin Turki Al Saud, and have lived in Winchester and Arlington since the mid-1990s, when the couple came to the United States to obtain medical and rehabilitation treatment for injuries the prince suffered in an auto accident.

Lindsay also sentenced Al Jader to forfeit a second residence in Arlington.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Grand Jury Subpoenas Weldon Records (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

Washington — A federal grand jury has subpoenaed congressional records from Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., as part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe aimed at determining whether Weldon used his influence to win favors for family members, people familiar with the investigation said.

The previously unreported subpoena was issued by a grand jury in Washington before the November election, although it is unclear when Weldon received it.

The 10-term lawmaker was at the time in a tight race to retain his seat representing the Philadelphia suburbs, which he subsequently lost to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Weldon said public disclosure of the Justice Department investigation, which came three weeks before election day, was politically motivated. He said at the time that he was not aware of any investigation and that he had done nothing wrong.

An attorney for Weldon, William J. Winning, did not return messages Thursday seeking comment.

House rules require members of Congress to promptly report the receipt of subpoenas to the leadership when Congress is in session. Notice of the subpoena is then customarily published in the Congressional Record.

A search of the record Thursday did not turn up evidence that Weldon had disclosed the subpoena.

It is possible that the lawmaker did not receive the subpoena until after Congress adjourned following the election, when different reporting rules would have applied. In that case, he still would have been required to notify the leadership, but the subpoena would not become public in the Congressional Record until Congress reconvenes in January.

Weldon is a former vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and a leading voice in Washington on the affairs of former Eastern bloc nations. The FBI is investigating whether he traded his influence to get lobbying business for his daughter and others.

Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, a close friend and political adviser to the lawmaker, operated Solutions North America. Investigators are examining about $1 million in contracts from foreign clients that Weldon may have helped steer to the firm.

The corruption probe became known on Oct. 16, when the FBI searched six sites in Philadelphia and Jacksonville, Fla. They included the lobbying firm run by Weldon's daughter and one of its clients, a Russian energy company, Itera International Energy Corp.

The Los Angeles Times reported in 2004 that Solutions North America won contracts from companies or individuals that Weldon tried to help. The beneficiaries included two struggling Russian companies and a Serbian family linked to accused war criminal Slobodan Milosevic.

The Times reported Itera was paying Solutions $500,000 a year for public relations help around the same time that Weldon was extolling the company and helping to round up 30 congressional colleagues for a dinner honoring the company's chairman.

Weldon said at the time of the October searches that he had "no communication or contact with anyone, nobody from the Justice Department" about an investigation, and had not been told that he was a target of any probe.

Another lawyer for Weldon, William B. Canfield, said at the time that the House Ethics Committee had reviewed the matter, and that it had been resolved, although the report has never been made public. Canfield could not be reached Thursday.

The FBI subsequently opened an investigation into whether law-enforcement officials illegally leaked information about the Weldon probe to the media. It is a violation of the law for government officials to reveal grand jury material publicly.

Legal experts said that Weldon's electoral defeat did not relieve him of the obligation to report the subpoena.

"If they were served with a subpoena before the House adjourned, then they were supposed to give notice immediately," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former counsel to the House.

"For a member not re-elected, the rules are no different," Tiefer said. But he observed that the House has virtually no power to sanction former members for violations of its rules.

Conservative Appointed To CPB Board (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush has appointed an outspoken conservative television producer to the board of directors of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Warren Bell, executive producer of ABC's "According to Jim," was first nominated by Bush in June. In September, his nomination was abruptly pulled from the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee's agenda because of some senators' concerns.

The Corporation for Public Broadcasting is a private, nonprofit company that was created by Congress in 1967 to distribute federal funds to local public television and radio stations.

Bell has been an online contributor to the conservative National Review magazine. In May 2005 he described himself as "thoroughly conservative in ways that strike horror into the hearts of my Hollywood colleagues."

Since then he has pledged to be nonpartisan in his service on the board.

The board has been criticized in recent years as stacked with right-wing political operatives. In 2005, then-chairman Kenneth Tomlinson was accused in an inspector general's report of using "political tests" as a criteria for hiring top employees, exerting political influence over programming, and other offenses.

The appointment, announced Wednesday night, prompted criticism from Sen. Frank Lautenberg, D-N.J., who accused the Bush administration of not caring about the "integrity or quality" of the public broadcasting system.

"First we saw Ken Tomlinson's embarrassing tenure as chairman. Now, the president is putting Warren Bell, an unqualified nominee that the Senate refused to consider, on the CPB board," he said.

Bell's recess appointment means he will stay on the board through the congressional session that ends in 2007.

Bush's Recess Appointment Puts Pick In Broadcast Post (WT/COX)

By Ken Herman, Cox News Service

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

President Bush, blocked by the Senate in two attempts, has used a recess appointment to bypass senators and put his top political advertising adviser on the panel that oversees the nation's international broadcasting operations.

Mark McKinnon will join the Broadcasting Board of Governors (BBG) in time for its Jan. 10 meeting. The recess appointment is good for a year, but Mr. McKinnon said yesterday that he is confident the Senate would confirm him for a full term that would end in 2009.

Senators, however, often don't look favorably on recess appointees.

The BBG oversees a global operation that draws more than 100 million listeners and viewers a week. The operations include the Voice of America, Radio Free Europe and broadcast systems that cover Asia, Cuba and the Middle East.

"This board is doing very important work confronting some of the biggest challenges this country faces trying to communicate the American image abroad," Mr. McKinnon said.

Mr. Bush's first attempt to get Mr. McKinnon on the board was in September 2005 in a nomination for a seat formerly held by a member whose term expired. The appointment ran into opposition from Democrats because it was a seat reserved for Democrats.

The nine-member board consists of four Democrats and four Republicans, as well as the secretary of state.

Several Democratic senators, including Delaware's Joseph R. Biden Jr., were upset by the effort to put Mr. McKinnon in a Democratic seat. Mr. McKinnon had been an adviser to Texas Democrats before he signed on with Mr. Bush in 1997. He directed the media efforts, including advertising, in the 2000 and 2004 presidential campaigns.

In October 2005, Mr. Bush withdrew the McKinnon nomination for the Democratic seat and, instead, tapped him for a seat vacated by a Republican. It was a dual nomination, covering an unexpired term and a full term through 2009.

But senators never confirmed the nomination.

Mr. McKinnon said nominations to the board were held up in the Senate "due to issues that go back years" that had "nothing to do with me."

"I told them I'd be glad to serve whenever it works out," he said.

Mr. McKinnon's nomination got caught up in Senate concerns about partisanship at the board. The concerns deepened when Mr. Bush renominated Kenneth Y. Tomlinson as the panel's chairman. Mr. Tomlinson had drawn criticism during his tenure at the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which helps support public radio and television stations. Critics said Mr. Tomlinson politicized that operation.

McKinnon's Appointment To Broadcasting Board Angers Democrats (MCT)

By Maria Recio

McClatchy Newspapers, December 22, 2006

(MCT)

WASHINGTON - President Bush's media adviser, Mark McKinnon, got a recess appointment Wednesday night from the White House to be a member of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, a little-known but influential federal agency that oversees U.S. government-sponsored news outlets such as the Voice of America.

Why would he need a recess appointment - a presidential perk to get around Congress? The Democrat-turned-Republican media consultant's nomination languished for nearly a year and a half in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

Senate Democrats were livid when the Texan was first nominated for a Democratic slot on the board. His quick re-nomination as a Republican - the longtime Texas Democrat now calls himself a "Bush Republican" - did not appease them, either.

Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., the incoming Senate Foreign Relations Committee who takes over in January, was not likely to move McKinnon's nomination, said insiders, prompting the White House action.

"The nomination had been out there a very long time and we needed to fill the position," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto. "This was the most expedient way to get that slot filled."

The recess appointment lasts for one year for the part-time position. McKinnon is expected to be formally nominated for the position, as well, but is unlikely to get any further in a Senate controlled by Democrats than he did in one run by Republicans.

While presidential politics may or may not be at play - Biden is a presidential aspirant and McKinnon is an adviser to the all-but-announced presidential campaign of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. - sources close to the issue say the problem is Broadcasting Board of Governors chairman Kenneth Tomlinson.

"The issue is Tomlinson," said a Senate official close to the controversy, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

Democrats view Tomlinson as partisan, and some question his ethics after a report by the State Department's inspector general, released in August, said he misused government funds for two years, including using the office's resources to promote his private horse racing operation.

Tomlinson, who denied the conclusions, serves as the board of governors' chair in one of four Republican slots. There are four Democratic slots with the ninth member being the secretary of state. Karen Hughes, Bush's close confidante and image-maker, now the undersecretary of state for public diplomacy and public affairs, represents Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on the board.

Because of a Democratic vacancy, McKinnon's appointment tips the balance of the board to the Republicans. That gives Tomlinson, Democrats say, effective control of the board.

Tomlinson's own nomination has been an issue for more than two years. But the chairman, whose board membership expired in 2004, continues to serve under the provision of the law that created the board. Biden co-authored that law.

Bush Signs Executive Order On Pay Raises (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108627

President Bush signed an executive order Thursday to raise the pay of federal workers, members of Congress and Vice President Dick Cheney in the new year.

Congress passed the pay raises earlier this year, but Bush was required to sign an executive order to enforce them.

The president's annual salary of $400,000 is not affected by the legislation.

The size of the pay raises was based on a formula in federal law that takes into account cost-of-living changes.

Civil servants, on average, will get a 2.2 percent pay increase in January. So will uniformed members of the military.

Members of Congress, the vice president and most senior federal officials will get a 1.7 percent pay increase, as will federal administrative law judges.

Congress opted to put off its pay increases until Feb. 16, not Jan. 1, on the urging of the incoming Democratic leaders in the House and Senate. They say no pay raise should kick in until Congress approves an increase in the federal minimum wage, which has been stuck at $5.15 an hour for the past 10 years.

Currently, rank-and-file members of Congress get $165,200.

Local Government Workers To Get 2.64% Raise In '07 (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

P resident Bush offered some holiday cheer yesterday by issuing an executive order that provides pay raises next year for federal employees, military personnel, Cabinet officers and members of Congress.

Washington-Baltimore federal employees will receive a 2.64 percent increase under a salary formula that gives higher adjustments to metropolitan areas where federal pay has lagged the furthest behind the private sector. The average civil service raise will be 2.2 percent under the order.

Members of the armed forces will also see their base pay rise next year by an average 2.2 percent, though some military personnel will receive higher increases because they are in hard-to-fill positions or have special skills.

Salaries for House members and senators will climb to $168,000, up from $165,200. Congress has put the raise on hold, however, because Democrats first want to approve an increase in the minimum wage, which they believe will prove popular with voters.

Cabinet secretaries will make $186,600 in 2007, up from $183,500 this year. The vice president's salary will be $215,700, rising from $212,100. (The president's salary has been fixed at $400,000 since 2001.)

The new pay tables show that a captain in the armed forces with four years of service will earn $52,704 in base pay next year and that a typical Foreign Service officer with five years of service will earn $62,935 in base pay.

Federal employees in the Washington area average 16 years of service and earn an average of $89,128, federal data show.

In most years, Congress has approved a federal employee raise by this time of the year and the presidential order merely ratifies that decision.

But Congress has not acted on a civil service raise for next year, in part because the Senate could not clear most of the fiscal 2007 spending bills. The government, except for the departments of Defense and Homeland Security, is operating on an interim funding measure, known as a continuing resolution, that expires Feb. 15. The Defense and DHS bills were passed and signed into law by Bush.

With no congressional action on the federal raise, Bush signaled last month that he would issue his order and trigger the publication of new salary tables. Most of the raises will take effect Jan. 7, officials said.

Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), who will be the House majority leader next year, called the Bush announcement "disappointing" but not a surprise. If Congress had completed work on the transportation-Treasury spending bill, he said, federal employees would be receiving an average raise of 2.7 percent, slightly higher than what Bush has ordered.

"This illustrates once again that when the legislative branch fails to use the power of the purse strings as the Constitution provides, the executive branch fills the vacuum," Hoyer said.

The leader of a union that represents employees in 30 federal agencies suggested that Bush acted like a Grinch. "The reality is that about half the members of the federal workforce will receive a meager pay raise of only 1.8 percent in 2007 -- the lowest amount in 18 years," said Colleen M. Kelley, president of the National Treasury Employees Union.

Federal pay is allocated according to geographic areas, and employees outside 31 specially designated metropolitan areas will receive the 1.8 percent raise. The highest-percentage raise goes to federal employees in the New York City area, 3.02 percent.

The NTEU and the American Federation of Government Employees said they will lobby Congress to increase the civil service and military pay raises when lawmakers return next month.

DOJ_NMG_0108628

Congress also has not acted on judicial pay for 2007, and Bush's order keeps the judiciary at its 2006 rates. If Congress does not approve a pay measure for judges, the chief justice of the United States will continue at $212,100, with associate Supreme Court justices at $203,000 and federal district court judges at $165,200 annually.Santa's Fly Zone

Bush Signs Bill To Preserve WWII Camps (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush signed into law a $38 million grant program to preserve notorious internment camps where Japanese-Americans were kept behind barbed wire during World War II.

The money will be administered by the National Park Service to restore and pay for research at 10 camps. The law is intended to help preserve the camps as reminders of how the United States turned on some of its citizens in a time of fear.

The camps housed more than 120,000 Japanese-Americans — U.S. citizens and residents — under an executive order signed by President Roosevelt in 1942, when America was reeling from the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on Dec. 7, 1941.

At the time there were fears that Japanese-Americans were loyal to Japan. Roosevelt's order prohibited them from living on the West Coast, in a position possibly to help an invasion force.

Thousands of families in California and parts of Washington state, Oregon and Arizona were pushed from their homes and into camps surrounded by armed guards. The sites named in the legislation are in California, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Wyoming, Utah and Idaho.

The last of the camps closed in 1946.

President Reagan signed a presidential apology to Japanese-Americans in 1988.

Co-sponsors of the bill included the two current members of Congress who spent time in the camps as children: Democratic Reps. Mike Honda and Doris Matsui of California. Matsui was born in the Poston camp in Arizona.

The National Park Service already operates facilities at two of the 10 camps: the Manzanar National Historic Site in California and the Minidoka Internment National Monument in Idaho.

The law will give grants to nonfederal organizations for historical, research and restoration work at the sites named in the legislation, as well others selected by the head of the Interior Department, which includes the National Park Service.

Petition Readied For 2 Border Agents (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

A Republican congressman yesterday announced the pending delivery to President Bush of a petition signed by 160,000 Americans calling for the commutation of prison sentences for two U.S. Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a drug smuggling suspect in the buttocks.

During a press conference on the front steps of the Orange County Courthouse in Santa Ana, Calif., Rep. Dana Rohrabacher asked Mr. Bush to "have some Christian charity and pardon" Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean, who are scheduled to begin serving 11- and 12-year prison terms, respectively, next month.

Mr. Rohrabacher called on Mr. Bush to "do the right thing and not allow the lives and families of these fine men to be destroyed."

Joined during the press conference by Compean and his family, Mr. Rohrabacher described the petition as part of a continuing effort to "turn up the pressure on President Bush to pardon" the agents.

The congressman recently sent a letter to the president demanding his intervention in the case and was joined last month at a Washington press conference by Republican Reps. Walter B. Jones of North Carolina, Ted Poe of Texas and Marsha Blackburn of Tennessee to announce that more than 50 members of Congress had signed on to a pardon request letter to Mr. Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0108629

Compean, 28, and Ramos, 37, were sentenced Oct. 19 by U.S. District Court Judge Kathleen Cardone in El Paso, Texas, to prison for causing serious bodily injury, assault with a deadly weapon, discharge of a firearm in relation to a crime of violence and a civil rights violation.

A federal jury had convicted the two men in March after a two-week trial, and Judge Cardone ordered them to report to prison Jan. 17.

The government brought the charges after Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican national, agreed to testify against the agents in exchange for a grant of immunity in a possible drug case after an investigation by the Department of Homeland Security's Office of Inspector General.

The immunity deal protected Mr. Aldrete-Davila from being charged in this country as a drug smuggler. Ramos and Compean found 743 pounds of marijuana in a van Mr. Aldrete-Davila abandoned in Texas near the U.S.-Mexico border.

Mr. Aldrete-Davila was shot after he illegally entered the United States near Fabens, Texas, and ignored efforts by the agents to stop the van. Court records show he jumped from the vehicle and ran south to the Rio Grande, where he was confronted by Compean, who was knocked to the ground.

Although wounded, Mr. Aldrete-Davila crossed the border and escaped in a waiting van.

"The U.S. attorney wrongly focused on the minor mistakes of the officers instead of on the illegal drug trafficker," said Mr. Rohrabacher, referring to the fact that the agents did not report the shooting in writing and picked up their shell casings.

The government's case began after an investigator from the Office of Inspector General located Mr. Aldrete-Davila in Mexico. The investigator had been dispatched after Mr. Aldrete-Davila's mother told a Border Patrol agent in Arizona that her son had been shot. That agent notified the Department of Homeland Security.

A Crackdown's Contradictions (WP)

By Marcela Sanchez

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Much has been said about the use of identity theft laws in last week's six-state round up of illegal immigrants working at Swift & Co. meat processing plants. Some observers said it was the long-awaited application of the full weight of U.S. statutes to curb what has become an old practice among immigrants. For others it was a sinister and untimely crackdown on an immigration violation normally considered a misdemeanor.

But I say it is a big disappointment all around. People whose intention was to get work used stolen information, such as Social Security numbers. U.S. officials intending to do their jobs used a law meant for a far more serious crime as justification for the crackdown. Both sides are guilty of weakening the rule of law -- a taste of home we Latino immigrants could really do without.

Unpredictability, inefficiency, corruption, abuse and impunity -- all are attributes of lawlessness that plague the nations most immigrants leave behind. In Latin America, weak rule of law discourages investment, generates instability and disrupts economic activity, keeping the region firmly stuck in the "developing" world.

The social toll is also dramatic. A judicial system that seems arbitrary erodes people's confidence. A general distrust of laws and lawmakers feeds a quaint irreverence that results in justice being denied.

Most people do their best to get by in a flawed system. Others flout it. And yet others leave it all behind and head north.

That's when a culture that believes in laws and one that distrusts them suddenly collide. If you live in a U.S. community with an increasing influx of immigrants, you may have seen that clash play out not far from your doorstep.

You may have already come across the immigrant contractor remodeling a house across the street without all the required permits, or Latinos going to jobs in the back of a pickup. Maybe you've also heard about those who use someone else's Social Security number to gain employment.

Back in the immigrants' home countries, these actions would carry little consequence. But here, sooner or later, the contractor will find an official notice halting all construction until the paperwork is in place. The pickup driver will be stopped and fined. And as it occurred last week, workers detained in Colorado, Iowa, Minnesota, Nebraska, Texas and Utah will be charged with identity theft -- a felony that could land them in prison.

"They are not aware that they are stealing somebody's identity," said Guatemala's consul in Texas, Jose Barillas, who has been talking to many of those detained, their families and their co-workers. "All they did was to borrow a Social Security number to be able to work."

Their problem is that under U.S. law, ignorance does not excuse a violation, nor there is such thing as "borrowing" somebody else's identity.

Last week, only 65 of the 1,282 rounded up faced criminal charges, including identify theft. By early this week that number had more than doubled to 144, and U.S. officials insist that as the investigation continues, more workers could be charged.

DOJ_NMG_0108630

"These were not victimless crimes," said Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, adding that hundreds of U.S. citizens and legal residents have suffered the consequences of this practice.

Without excusing those who committed fraud to get jobs, it is important to make clear that the United States -- its government, its businesses and even its laws -- invites this type of behavior. Writing in The Washington Post, Tamar Jacoby, an immigration expert at the Manhattan Institute, has noted that "every year the economy as a whole creates some 500,000 more unskilled jobs than Americans want to do, yet we issue only 5,000 year-round visas for the immigrants who might fill them."

If levels of population growth continue as they are today, 40 percent of the next 100 million people in this country will come from abroad. Just as today, they will be coming to do jobs that the U.S. native work force is not doing but that will need to be filled if the U.S. economy is to grow at its current pace.

Whether many of those jobs will continue to be filled by immigrants working here illegally will depend on what Congress does in the coming year. A proper reform could reward more immigrants who play by the rules.

Or, by inaction, Congress will continue to maintain a system that enjoys and profits from immigrant labor, yet seeks to punish immigrants when they dare fill those vacancies.

That is the kind of arbitrariness immigrants know too well, but it is also the kind unworthy of a nation of laws.

A Diplomat's Plum Post, Plucked Away (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

The career diplomats at the State Department are celebrating a decision this week by the department's director general to overturn the assignment of an aide to Undersecretary Karen Hughes to a top job running the new Public Diplomacy Rapid Response office in Brussels.

The American Foreign Service Association two months ago protested the selection of mid-level civil servant Diane Zeleny for the job, calling it a "pre-cooked deal" done by manipulating the process and violating personnel rules. AFSA filed a grievance asking foreign service director general George Staples to "undo this assignment."

Staples did, though he gave Zeleny until next summer to leave Brussels. Staples, in a joint announcement with AFSA chief J. Anthony Holmes, said "we understand that she is doing an excellent job and is to be commended" for her work. But foreign service officers may now begin applying for the job, they said.

Foggy Bottom folks said the opening was never properly advertised so senior officials looking for new postings would know about it. And then it was announced at the last minute, so there was no way top officers, who had already gotten new assignments, could apply for it.

The Zeleny appointment came at a time when career diplomats were seething over jumps by several other lower-level officers with political connections into top jobs that the career folks thought should have gone to more senior officers.

It probably didn't help matters, in this case, that Zeleny, a talented civil servant -- but not a foreign service officer -- who has some experience overseas, is married to prominent neocon Reuel Marc Gerecht, an Iraq war promoter and occasional Bush adviser.

In addition to Zeleny's removal, the joint cable by Holmes and Staples announced, the "procedures" that led to her getting the assignment in the first place were "not clear," and it outlined steps being taken to "ensure that any future assignments of this nature will be guided by negotiated, established procedures that are fair and transparent."

Some career folks said they were surprised to see that Staples, also a career diplomat, moved with such dispatch to overturn a move made by the political powers.The Best Bettors

And now, the winners in the In the Loop Congressional Election Contest. In order to winnow down the hundreds of entrants, Loop advisers -- okay, a few reporters sitting nearby -- said true prognosticators were those who correctly predicted the Democrats' Senate takeover at 51 to 49. So that was the initial screen.

Then, of that group, the winners were those who most closely predicted the House ratio of 233 Democrats to 202 Republicans.

The Grand Winner, the only entrant who got them both exactly right, was Roger Peterson, who is in public relations in Vancouver, Wash.

Ari Schoenholtz of Bethesda, recently an intern at WAMU radio and now looking for work in public radio, was one off, guessing the Democrats would pick up 234 seats in the House.

Retired federal employee Dick Harlow of Prescott, Ariz., was one off the other way, guessing 232 Democratic House members.

Lobbyist David Bushnell of Silver Spring was two off on the House vote, as was Fred Huebscher of the Los Angeles area. Peter Lorenzo, a retired political science professor from Roseville, Calif., was three off in the House, as was Montgomery County teacher John M. Mosier.

Ed Black, president and chief executive of the Computer & Communications Industry Association here, was four off, as was George Mason University political science professor Jeremy D. Mayer of Arlington and Alice Johnson Cain of Takoma Park, who works for the incoming House Education Committee chairman, Rep. George Miller.

Three other entrants missed the Senate vote but were exactly right on the House vote: Arlington consultant Stan Karson; Cockeysville, Md., jewelry maker Dori Grasso; and Adam Shah, deputy editorial editor at Media Matters for America.

Congratulations to the winners, and thanks to all for entering.No Longer to Labor at Labor

Another bitter loss for Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Bad enough that his pals were trounced in this week's local elections in Teheran. Study Suggests Incentives On Oil Barely Help U.S. (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The United States offers some of the most lucrative incentives in the world to companies that drill for oil in publicly owned coastal waters, but a newly released study suggests that the government is getting very little for its money.

The study, which the Interior Department refused to release for more than a year, estimates that current inducements could allow drilling companies in the Gulf of Mexico to escape tens of billions of dollars in royalties that they would otherwise pay the government for oil and gas produced in areas that belong to American taxpayers.

But the study predicts that the inducements would cause only a tiny increase in production even if they were offered without some of the limitations now in place.

It also suggests that the cost of that additional oil could be as much as $80 a barrel, far more than the government would have to pay if it simply bought the oil on its own.

“They are giving up a lot of money and not getting much in return,” said Robert A. Speir, a former analyst at the Energy Department who worked on the report. “If they took that money, they could buy a whole lot more oil with it on the open market.”

Oil closed Thursday at $62.66 a barrel in regular trading.

The Interior Department study, commissioned to analyze the costs of royalty incentives and their effectiveness at increasing energy supplies, was completed in fall 2005. But the study was not released until last month because senior officials said they considered it incomplete.

After repeated requests, the department provided a copy to The New York Times with a “note to readers” that said the report did not show the “actual effects” of incentives. Indeed, Interior officials contended that the cost of the incentives would turn out to be far less than the study concluded.

They also said that the nation benefits from even small amounts of additional domestic fossil fuels.

But industry analysts who compare oil policies around the world said the United States was much more generous to oil companies than most other countries, demanding a smaller share of revenues than others that let private companies drill on public lands and in public waters. In addition, they said, the United States has sweetened some of its incentives in recent years, while dozens of other countries demanded a bigger share of revenue.

In the United States, the federal government’s take — royalties as well as corporate taxes — is about 40 percent of revenue from oil and gas produced on federal property, according to Van Meurs Associates, an industry consulting firm that compares the taxes of all oil-producing countries.

By contrast, according to Van Meurs, the worldwide average “government take” is about 60 to 65 percent. And that figure, of course, excludes countries that do not allow any private ownership in oil production.

Democratic leaders in Congress have already vowed to roll back royalty incentives and tax breaks for drilling companies when they take control of the House and Senate in January.

“Royalty relief is the gift that keeps on giving,” said Representative Nick J. Rahall, Democrat of West Virginia, who will become chairman of the House Resources Committee. “It seems painfully obvious that when the government gives tax breaks in the form of royalty relief to Big Oil, the American people are footing the bill.”

DOJ_NMG_0108632

Supporters of drilling incentives say they make sense for a country that wants to reduce its dependence on foreign oil and whose biggest untapped reserves are in water thousands of feet deep where the cost of drilling a dry hole can hit $100 million.

"The amount of exploration investment that a company has to endure to find and develop reserves in the U.S. is far more than in a place like Angola," said Michael Rodgers, a senior economist at PFC Energy, a consulting firm that analyzes the tax regimes in oil-producing countries.

As oil and gas prices have surged in recent years, moreover, many countries have forced companies to give up a bigger share of revenues. Venezuela, Nigeria and Kazakhstan are among several dozen countries that have forced foreign oil companies to pay more money through either higher taxes or bigger equity stakes for the government.

"They've become emboldened by higher oil prices but they're also being emboldened by muted response from investors," said Michelle Billig, director of political risk analysis at the PIRA Energy Group in New York. "Companies don't have the luxury of contesting and taking a hard line."

Starting this year, Britain imposed the second of two new supplemental taxes on petroleum revenue from the North Sea, pushing the government's share to 50 percent. Norway keeps at least 70 percent of revenues, but the government share increases automatically as oil prices rise and tops out at 78 percent.

Norway is on the growing list of countries that have adopted "progressive" systems that automatically increase the tax rate on oil and gas production as energy prices climb. Several Canadian provinces have adopted similar policies, and Alaska approved a tax system in August that automatically inches up as oil prices climb above $55 a barrel.

"The United States is not extracting sufficient benefit from oil and gas production," said Pedro Van Meurs, president of Van Meurs Associates.

"The U.S. system worked fine when oil was $20 a barrel, but it wasn't changed when prices went up," added Mr. Van Meurs, who advised Alaska legislators on their tax system. When oil prices soar, he said, political leaders almost inevitably view the immutable bargain as too generous to industry.

In principle, the federal government has its own form of a progressive system. It offers royalty relief to companies that drill in very deep waters, but companies are supposed to pay the full rate — 12 to 16 percent — if oil prices climb above about $34 a barrel.

In practice, it does not always work out that way. Companies that signed leases in 1998 and 1999 enjoy an unintended loophole that entitles them to royalty-free oil and gas regardless of how high prices climb.

Last week, the Bush administration persuaded five companies to give up the loophole. But about 50 other companies have thus far refused to follow suit.

The Bush administration scaled back the incentive for newer leases, but in 2004, the administration offered lucrative new royalty incentives for companies that drill extremely deep natural gas wells in shallow water. Congress, meanwhile, added several billion dollars worth of new tax breaks in 2004 and 2005 for exploration and drilling.

James A. Watt, chief executive of Remington Oil in Dallas before it was acquired by Helix Energy Solutions in July, said the federal incentives help reduce the risks and high cost of exploring in more difficult areas of the Gulf of Mexico.

"Tax issues are extraordinarily important," Mr. Watt said, in an interview this year. "Having said that, my view is that we just drilled a $50 million dry hole. That swamps the tax benefits we're getting."

The big issue for both lawmakers and the Interior Department is whether royalty relief has much of an impact.

The new study, prepared under contract to the Minerals Management Service of the Interior Department by Innovation and Information Consultants of Concord, Mass., is one of the few attempts to assess the impact through a rigorous econometric analysis.

The report estimates that the current incentives would have a tiny impact that is far exceeded by swings in market prices.

The report predicted that the current incentives would lead to the discovery of only 1.1 percent more reserves than if there had been no incentives at all. Total oil production from 2003 to 2042 would be about 300 million barrels more, or less than 1 percent, than it would have been anyway. Natural gas production would be 0.6 percent greater than it would have been otherwise.

But the cost of those royalty incentives would be high: about $48 billion less in royalty payments over the 40-year period. That loss would be offset by a slight increase in the prices that companies pay when bidding for leases in government auctions, but analysts said the net cost would still be above $40 billion.

The Interior Department, in a written response to questions, said the actual cost of its incentives would be much lower than $40 billion because most leases in the Gulf of Mexico include an escape clause that requires companies to pay full royalties if prices are above $34 a barrel.

But officials conceded that oil companies are still poised to escape billions of dollars in royalties in the next five years alone.

Dozens of companies signed leases in the late 1990's under a Clinton administration program that offered highly generous incentives and, apparently because of a bureaucratic error, omitted the escape clause. The government has estimated that it would have received as much as $10 billion more over the next five years if the mistake had not been made. It is trying to renegotiate the terms.

But as much as half of that money is out of reach. The Bush administration also endorsed a new royalty holiday for "deep gas" drilling in shallow waters even if natural gas prices climb above today's levels. According to internal budget estimates last year, the deep gas incentives account for half of the $10 billion that the government stands to lose.

To be sure, the newly released study found that the extra incentives prompted companies to pay more money upfront when bidding on offshore drilling leases and predicted that they would lead to a small increase in exploration and production.

The actual impact of the incentives depends on what happens to oil prices. But under any of the projections, the cost ended up exceeding the market price for oil.

Analysts said the meager impact of royalty incentives was not surprising: for oil and gas companies deciding whether to drill in deep water, the potential money involved in royalty incentives is small compared with the money at stake in changes of market prices.

Eliminating royalties on oil or gas will save a company 12 to 16 percent on some of its production. But those savings are minuscule compared with the nearly fourfold increase in oil prices from $15 a barrel in 1999 to more than $70 this summer.

At today's prices, even the risk of a $100 million dry hole is not so daunting.

Lawmaker Stands Firm On Quran Criticism (AP)

By Sue Lindsey

AP, December 22, 2006

A congressman said Thursday that he will not retract a letter warning that unless immigration is tightened, "many more Muslims will be elected" and use the Quran to take the oath of office.

Republican Rep. Virgil Goode triggered angry responses from a civil rights group and some colleagues with a letter this month to constituents concerned about a decision by Rep.-elect Keith Ellison of Minnesota, the first Muslim elected to Congress, to use the Quran when he is sworn in.

"I will not be putting my hand on the Quran," Goode said at a news conference Thursday at the Franklin County Courthouse.

Goode, who represents Virginia's 5th Congressional District, said he is receiving more positive comments from constituents than negative.

"One lady told me she thinks I'm doing the right thing on this," he told Fox News. "I wish more people would take a stand and stand up for the principles on which this country was founded."

Goode also told Fox News he wants to limit legal immigration and do away with "diversity visas," which he said let in people "not from European countries" and "some terrorist states."

In his letter, Goode wrote that strict immigration polices are necessary "to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America."

"The Muslim representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of that district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," he wrote.

Ellison said Thursday that Goode and others had nothing to fear about Muslims.

"They are our nurses, doctors, husbands, wives, kids, who just want to live and prosper in the American way," Ellison, a Democrat from Minneapolis, said Thursday on CNN when asked what he would say to Goode if they met. "All of us are steadfastly opposed to the same people he's opposed to, which is terrorists, and so there's nothing for him to be afraid of."

Asked whether he thought Goode was a bigot, Ellison said, "I don't know the fellow, and I'd rather just say that he has a lot to learn about Islam. ... I don't want to start any name-calling."

Virginia's senior senator, Republican John Warner, said in a statement Thursday that he respects the right of congressional members to freely "exercise the religion of their choice, including those of the Islamic faith utilizing the Quran."

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, an Illinois Democrat who is Jewish, said Thursday that he hoped Goode would meet with Ellison, saying he would "see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents."

The Council on American-Islamic Relations had asked Goode to apologize, saying the remarks sent "a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office."

Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

His decision to use the Quran at his ceremonial swearing-in next month prompted criticism from conservative talk radio host Dennis Prager. The American-Islamic relations council has called for Prager's removal from the board of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

Lawmaker Goode Urged To Reconsider (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

An Illinois Democrat yesterday called on Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr. to meet with Rep.-elect Keith Ellison, whom the Virginia Republican criticized for his intention to take the oath of office using the Koran rather than the Bible.

"If he meets with Keith, he'll see what I saw: a good American with good values of a different faith who's trying to do right by the people he represents," Rep. Rahm Emanuel, who is Jewish, said of Mr. Ellison, Minnesota Democrat, who is the first Muslim elected to Congress.

Earlier this month, Mr. Goode sparked a controversy when he told constituents that if Americans "don't wake up" and strengthen the country's immigration laws, more Muslims will be elected to Congress and will demand to use the Koran when they take the oath of office.

"I will not be putting my hand on the Koran," Mr. Goode said at a press conference yesterday at the Franklin County Courthouse.

Mr. Goode made the comments in a letter he wrote responding to an onslaught of e-mail complaints he received from constituents who were angered by Mr. Ellison's decision to use the Koran during the swearing-in ceremony.

"The Muslim Representative from Minnesota was elected by the voters of the district and if American citizens don't wake up and adopt the Virgil Goode position on immigration there will likely be many more Muslims elected to office and demanding the use of the Koran," he said in the letter. "We need to stop illegal immigration totally and reduce legal immigration and end the diversity visas policy pushed hard by President Clinton and allowing many persons from the Middle East to come to this country."

Mr. Goode said he is receiving more positive than negative comments from constituents.

"One lady told me she thinks I'm doing the right thing on this," he said in a Fox News interview yesterday. "I wish more people would take a stand and stand up for the principles on which this country was founded."

Mr. Ellison was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college.

In the letter, Mr. Goode also wrote, "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America and to prevent our resources from being swamped."

Franklin County Sheriff Quint Overton said he had extra officers at the courthouse yesterday because Mr. Goode had received several threatening phone calls.

Asked whether he had received any death threats, Mr. Goode responded, "No comment."

Mr. Ellison offered his comments in a statement released yesterday.

"Let's remember that diversity is a great strength of America. People of all faiths, all cultures, all colors coming together in support of one great nation is a beautiful thing," Mr. Ellison said. "On January 4th, no matter the faith, gender, or culture of the congressperson, all of us will swear to uphold one Constitution the Constitution of the United States."

When asked whether he does not support Muslims in Congress, Mr. Goode told The Washington Times, "That's not said in the letter."

Mr. Goode has stood by his letter, and has not given into the request of the Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), a civil rights group, that he apologize.

"Representative Goode's Islamophobic remarks send a message of intolerance that is unworthy of anyone elected to public office," said Corey Saylor, national legislative director for CAIR. "There can be no reasonable defense for such bigotry."

House members are sworn in en masse in the chamber, and no Bible or other religious document is used for the oath. However, several incoming House members use Bibles for their individual swearing-in, which is administered by the House Speaker and takes place after the official group oath.

In addition, the U.S. Constitution states that " no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States."

Mr. Ellison has also been criticized by some Christian organizations and conservative radio host Dennis Prager, who say that even if the law allows him to take an oath on the Koran, he should adhere to what they call the historical tradition of taking the oath of office on the Bible.

DOJ_NMG_0108635

Mr. Goode's remarks come on the heels of Sen. George Allen's infamous "macaca" remark, which showed the impact a verbal gaffe can have on someone's political future. Mr. Allen, Virginia Republican, lost his re-election bid to Democrat James H. Webb Jr.

A Bigot In Congress (WP)

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BIGOTRY COMES in various guises -- some coded, some closeted, some colossally stupid. The bigotry displayed recently by Rep. Virgil H. Goode Jr., a Republican who represents a patch of south-central Virginia, falls squarely in the third category. Mr. Goode, evidently in a state of xenophobic delirium, went on a semi-public tirade against the looming peril and corrupting threat posed by Muslim immigration to the United States. "I fear that in the next century we will have many more Muslims in the United States if we do not adopt the strict immigration policies that I believe are necessary to preserve the values and beliefs traditional to the United States of America," he wrote in a letter to constituents.

The inspiration for Mr. Goode's rant is Keith Ellison, a Minnesota Democrat who last month became the first Muslim elected to Congress. Mr. Ellison, who was born in Detroit and converted to Islam in college, has decided to use the Koran during a ceremonial swearing-in, as is his constitutional right. This does not sit well with Mr. Goode, who, obnoxiously referring to his congressional colleague-to-be as "the Muslim Representative from Minnesota," warned ominously that current immigration policy would lead to an outbreak of elected Muslims in this country and unfettered use of the Koran.

Forget that Muslims represent a small fraction of immigrants to America. And leave aside the obvious point that Mr. Goode was evidently napping in class the day they taught the traditional American values of tolerance, diversity and religious freedom. This country's history is rife with instances of uncivil, hateful and violent behavior toward newcomers, be they Jewish, Irish, Italian or plenty of others whose ethnicities did not jibe with some pinched view of what it means to be American. Mr. Goode's dimwitted outburst of nativism is nothing new.

No, the real worry for the nation is that the rest of the world might take Mr. Goode seriously, interpreting his biased remarks about Muslims as proof that America really has embarked on a civilizational war against Islam. With 535 members, you'd think that Congress would welcome the presence of a single Muslim representative. Whether it can afford a lawmaker of Mr. Goode's caliber is another question.

Signs Aim To Quash Fear Of Muslims (WT/AP)

By Kristen Gelineau, Associated Press

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

RICHMOND -- The small beige signs bearing black Arabic script have been appearing all over town on buses and at colleges.

"Are they secret messages from terrorists?" one panicked bus rider asked. Should the FBI be contacted? What do they mean?

Actual translation: "Paper or plastic?"

The signs are part of a campaign by A More Perfect Union, a program of the Virginia Interfaith Center for Public Policy, and are aimed at dispelling some of the public's fears about the Muslim community.

Organizers hope to expand the program statewide.

"As people see Arabic, they immediately make an association with terrorism," said the Rev. C. Douglas Smith, executive director of the interfaith center. "That's probably because since 9/11, not only is fear overwhelming us, but that's how we're being trained to think."

The signs were placed in all 170 Greater Richmond Transit Co. buses in Richmond on Nov. 27 and will remain there through December, though many buses will continue to display them at least through January.

The signs, designed by the Martin Agency, also have been posted at the University of Richmond and Virginia Commonwealth University.

Along with the "paper or plastic" sign, others translate to "I'm a little teapot" and "Rock, paper, scissors."

The English translations are printed in small text on the bottom of the posters, next to comments such as "Misunderstanding can make anything scary," and "What did you think it said?"

The transit company has fielded several calls from concerned riders, said Gretchen Schoel, executive director of A More Perfect Union.

One woman Miss Schoel described as a well-educated university employee placed a frantic call to the bus company's manager, suggesting that the FBI be called in to investigate.

DOJ_NMG_0108636

Even after the signs' English translations were explained to her, she remained concerned that they might contain secret messages, Miss Schoel said.

"It's so great that we're getting feedback, even if it is negative, because it shows that people are looking, they're thinking," Miss Schoel said. "And it really proves the point that this script right here conjures up certain ideas in our heads that we have to work with."

Bias toward the Muslim community is a continuing problem across the country and in Virginia, said Imad Damaj, president of the Virginia Muslim Coalition for Public Affairs.

"There's so many lazy, unexamined assumptions about all of us and how we react to people," Mr. Damaj said. "We need to challenge ourselves."

Miss Schoel said history has proved that Americans can learn to let go of irrational fears toward other cultures.

"After World War II, when people saw Japanese script, it was scary," she said. "But now we see it and it's fun, it's hip, it signifies a cool culture. That's a huge turnaround."

Holocaust Museum Rebukes Member For Koran Comment (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The board that oversees the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum here publicly distanced itself on Thursday from a member who recently condemned the first Muslim elected to Congress for planning to use a Koran during the private part of his swearing-in ceremony.

In November, the board member, Dennis Prager, a conservative commentator and radio show host, said that Keith Ellison, the newly elected Muslim member of Congress, should give up his post if he could not take his oath on a Bible, which Mr. Prager said was the traditional religious text of the United States.

In its resolution, the council's executive committee criticized Mr. Prager's remarks as "antithetical to the mission of the museum as an institution promoting tolerance and respect for all peoples regardless of their race, religion or ethnicity."

Mr. Prager, one of 68 members of the board, known as the Holocaust Memorial Council, was appointed to the unpaid post by President Bush, and is serving a five-year term, which expires in 2011, said Andrew Hollinger, a spokesman for the council.

Mr. Hollinger said Mr. Bush had the sole power to remove Mr. Prager.

On Wednesday, Representative Virgil H. Goode Jr., Republican of Virginia, was sharply criticized by Congressional Democrats and Muslim Americans for warning that Mr. Ellison's election to the House posed a serious threat to the traditional values.

Critics of Mr. Goode and Mr. Prager noted that the Constitution specifically bars any religious screening of members of Congress and that the actual swearing in of those lawmakers occurs without any religious texts. The use of such texts occurs only in private ceremonies that take place after lawmakers have officially sworn to uphold the Constitution.

Mr. Goode stood by his comments on Thursday and told Fox News that he wanted to restrict legal immigration to the United States "so that we don't have a majority of Muslims elected to the United States House of Representatives." (Mr. Ellison, a lawyer who converted to Islam as a college student, is an African-American, not an immigrant.)

Mr. Prager said Muslim American groups and others had pressured the museum board. "Everybody knows there's no bigotry in what I said, but they felt they had to do it," he said in an interview.

"I completely respect Congressman-Elect Ellison's right to take an oath on the Koran, and regret any language that suggested otherwise," Mr. Prager added in a statement, emphasizing that he began reaching out to the Muslims 20 years ago. "My entire effort in the Keith Ellison matter has been to draw attention to the need to acknowledge the Bible as the basis of America's moral values. Judeo-Christian values are the greatest single protection against another Holocaust."

In response to questions about Mr. Bush's reaction to Mr. Prager's remarks, Nicole M. Guillemard, a spokeswoman for the White House, said by e-mail that President Bush "respects religious freedom and the right to free speech."

Ms. Guillemard did not respond to questions about whether Mr. Bush believed that Mr. Prager should resign or be removed.

Davis Won't Give Up Probe Into Berger-Archives Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

The outgoing chairman of the House Government Reform Committee says questions remain about former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger's removal of classified documents from the National Archives and pledged yesterday to get the answers.

DOJ_NMG_0108637

"I don't care if it's Sandy Berger or Warren Burger or Veggie Burger who walked off with these documents," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican. "It's the lax controls that permitted such a theft; it's the way it was handled internally at the Archives and then by [the Justice Department] that is of grave concern."

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort by top House Republicans to investigate and hold hearings on which documents might have been "destroyed, removed or were missing."

Democrats assume control of Congress next month, and the request is expected to be shelved. But Mr. Davis said his staff continues to look into the matter, and a final investigative report is expected next month.

Mr. Davis noted that during three visits by Mr. Berger to the Archives, he was given access to three categories of documents: National Security Council (NSC) numbered documents, printed copies of e-mail messages and attachments, and staff member office files (SMOFs).

He said the SMOFs contain the working papers of NSC staff members, including Mr. Berger, and their content is not inventoried by the Archives at the document level. He said that the SMOFs given to Mr. Berger during his first two visits contained only original documents and that there is "no way to determine" whether Mr. Berger "swiped any of these original documents."

As a result, Mr. Davis said, there is no way to know whether Mr. Berger gave the September 11 commission the documents he said he was seeking at the Archives in response to the panel's requests.

"At best, Berger's actions portray a disturbing breach of trust and protocol," Mr. Davis said. "At worst, however, Berger's actions suggest an intentional effort to keep critical information away from the 9/11 commission and the American public.

"Our work has not concluded, and we fully expect to continue our oversight efforts with respect to this matter," he said.

Mr. Berger, national security adviser under President Clinton from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material -- including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States.

He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years. He had faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but a plea agreement with the Justice Department reduced the fine and kept him out of jail.

Prosecutors had recommended a fine of $10,000, but U.S. Magistrate Judge Deborah A. Robinson increased it to $50,000 at Berger's sentencing, saying the lower figure did not "reflect the seriousness of the offense."

The removal of the material occurred while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the September 11 commission investigating intelligence and security failures -- raising questions about whether he was attempting to cover up the Clinton administration's counterterrorism policies and actions.

On Wednesday, the National Archives Office of Inspector General said Mr. Berger hid the documents under a construction trailer where they could be retrieved easily. It said he left the building unescorted for a break and placed the papers "in an accessible construction area outside" the main Archives building.

The report said Mr. Berger put the documents "in his pockets, headed toward a construction area ... looked up and down the street ... did not see anyone" and then slid them under the trailer.

Mr. Berger's attorney, Lanny Breuer, said his client "considers this matter closed, and he is pleased to have moved on."

Describing the material removed as "code-word documents," meaning only a limited number of people had access to them, Mr. Davis said Mr. Berger's conduct in hiding the papers "exposed this country to more serious national security breaches than previously thought."

More Details About Archives Case (WP)

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

Former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger has admitted taking five slightly different copies of a highly classified document from the National Archives in 2003 by stuffing them into his suit and sneaking them past guards. He was eventually detected, confronted and ordered by a federal judge to pay a $50,000 fine for his illegal actions.

A newly released report by the National Archives' Office of the Inspector General contains fresh details of the incident, which involved a classified Clinton administration study called the Millennium Alert After Action Review (MAAR).

The document was an assessment of the nation's handling of a series of terrorist threats in 1999 and its continuing vulnerabilities. It was distributed to only about 15 people and contained 29 recommendations for action and funding.

During four visits to the Archives in 2003, Berger worked at a small table in the office of a senior Archives official, instead of in the public reading room -- a practice the inspector general said was "unauthorized." The official, whose name was redacted from the report, violated standard protocol by leaving the office to give Berger privacy to speak on the telephone.

Berger gave an account of his actions in an interview at his office on July 8, 2005, described below in excerpts from the report. He sought at the outset to deflect any suggestion that he pressured the Archives official into relaxing the rules.

DOJ_NMG_0108638

-- R. Jeffrey Smith

"Mr. Berger described his personality as intense. . . . He did not feel he was overbearing and did not seek to intimidate anyone while at the Archives."

Berger said he started taking the copies on Sept. 2, to help him prepare for his testimony before a commission investigating the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"Mr. Berger took the first opportunity when[redacted] was out of[redacted] office to remove the document. He most likely put it in his jacket pocket, after folding it, but he does not have a precise recollection of where he put the document. It is perceivable he put it in his pants pocket. . . .

Mr. Berger denied removing any documents in his socks. . . . He stated his shoes frequently come untied . . . and his socks frequently fell down. [At that point, Mr. Berger lifted his pant leg to reveal a sock falling down his ankle and pale skin.]"

On a subsequent visit, on Oct. 2, Berger was surprised to see other copies of the document in the files he was given, and he slid each one under his briefcase to hide them.

"In total, he removed four documents, all versions of the MAAR . . . . He did not put the documents on his person until he was alone. . . .[Name redacted] suggested he take a walk and come back and finish up. Mr. Berger left the building with all the documents he put in his pockets. . . .

It was dark. He did not want to run the risk of bringing the documents back in the building. . . . He headed towards a construction area on Ninth Street. Mr. Berger looked up and down the street, up into the windows of the Archives and the DOJ[Department of Justice] , and did not see anyone. He removed the documents from his pockets, folded the notes in a 'V' shape and . . . walked inside a construction fence and slid the documents under a trailer.

[After 7 p.m.,] Mr. Berger left the building, retrieved the documents and notes from the construction area, and returned to his office. . . . On Oct. 4, 2003[name redacted] called Mr. Berger . . .[and] said documents were missing after Mr. Berger's visit. . . . Mr. Berger lied to[redacted] telling[redacted] he did not take the documents. . . .

Mr. Berger drove to his office late that afternoon. On the night of Oct. 2, 2003, he had destroyed, cut into small pieces, three of the four documents. These were put in the trash. By Saturday, the trash had been picked up. He tried to find the trash collector but had no luck. . . .

About 7 p.m., Mr. Berger called[redacted] and said 'I think I solved the mystery.' . . . Mr. Berger told[redacted] , 'I found two documents but not the other two.' "

Archives officials -- who had grown so suspicious of Berger in September that they secretly numbered the documents he saw in October -- got angry when they retrieved the two copies at Berger's home on Oct. 6. and saw that one had indeed been taken in September.

The Archives moved cautiously at the outset. The report quotes a senior official as saying he "could not explain" why agency officials did not immediately call the FBI. They did call the White House, but the FBI and the Justice Department were not brought into the case until nine days after two of the five documents were retrieved.

Trailer Trash (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

Bill Clinton's former National Security Adviser, Sandy Berger, has already recanted his initial claim that he removed documents from the National Archives "inadvertently" back in 2003 while preparing for testimony to the 9/11 Commission. He pleaded guilty to a misdemeanor in 2005 and paid a $50,000 fine. But now the report of the Archives' Inspector General has come to light, and it suggests Mr. Berger knew he was engaged in a bit of hugger-mugger when he secreted the after-action memos he was reviewing out of the building.

According to the report, obtained by the Associated Press through a Freedom of Information Act request, Mr. Berger removed the documents and hid some of them under a trailer in a construction site before returning to retrieve them later. This is not the behavior of a man with a clear conscience. And it's astonishing for a man who served in a senior White House position that made him familiar with the obligations of handling classified papers.

At the time of the plea, federal prosecutor Noel Hillman assured this newspaper that Mr. Berger was working off of copies of the memos printed from a hard drive, so there was no danger that handwritten notes in the margins of certain copies could have been destroyed. But one doesn't need to entertain conspiracy theories to be reminded through this tale of how the Clinton Administration had a penchant for abusing the public trust. The Berger story is of a piece with the Travel Office dust-up and the 900 confidential FBI files that the White House somehow managed to collect, some of them pertaining to prominent Republicans. That too was supposed to have been an accident.

To the extent that Mr. Berger's actions did not affect the completeness of the historical record on the Clinton Administration's approach to al Qaeda, we've argued that his plea agreement did justice to the nature of the crime. But the Inspector General's account of Mr. Berger's document-stashing serves as a useful reminder of the Clinton circle's ethos that all too many rules simply did not apply to them.

New Push For Drug Import Bill (CHIT)

By Crystal Yednak

Chicago Tribune, December 22, 2006

U.S. Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.) said Democrats and Republicans in both chambers will push again for a bill that would allow prescription drugs to be imported to help reduce costs for U.S. consumers.

"People from around the world come to America for first-class medical care, but Americans travel around the world for affordable medications," Emanuel said during a Chicago news conference to announce plans to reintroduce the legislation.

The bill would allow consumers to import drugs directly from Canada, while wholesalers and pharmacies could import FDA-approved drugs from the European Union, Canada, New Zealand, Australia and Japan to offer for sale.

Emanuel said his office keeps comparing the cost of certain drugs at a Chicago Costco and at a Costco in Toronto. December cost comparisons show Lipitor running $242 in the U.S., compared with $156 in Toronto.

"You can clearly get a better price from around the world," Emanuel said.

In 2003, a similar bill passed in the House but failed to pass in the Senate. Emanuel said that with bipartisan sponsors in both chambers, he is hopeful for the support to pass the bill.

Republican Rep. Jo Ann Emerson (R-Mo.) will co-sponsor the legislation in the House, while U.S. Sens. Byron Dorgan (D-N.D.) and Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) will sponsor the bill in the Senate, Emanuel said.

Iraq May Crimp Democrats' Priorities (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Iraq is casting a shadow over the next U.S. budget, complicating efforts by President Bush and congressional Democrats to fund domestic programs as costs of the war rise.

The tax-and-spending plan for fiscal 2008, which starts Oct. 1, 2007, is expected to be released Feb. 5. The budget is likely to be the tightest of Mr. Bush's presidency, with little new discretionary spending expected for any area outside the departments of Defense and Homeland Security.

Moreover, the costs associated with the Iraq war and broader war on terrorism have exacerbated funding constraints caused, in large part, by rising mandatory costs for programs such as Medicare and Social Security.

The situation is posing a challenge for the White House, which must craft a budget that will cover rising expenses while preserving Mr. Bush's 2001 and 2003 tax cuts and not worsening the deficit.

At the same time, Congress' new Democratic majority is expected to face an even tougher task as its leaders look to implement their agenda, which may include increased spending in areas such as education, health care and homeland security. In the past, Democrats looked to defense as a place to cut spending, but given the deteriorating security situation in Iraq, such a move now is considered politically untenable.

The war "certainly makes it hard and makes it hard in two ways: Whatever you think should happen in Iraq, the fact is we have troops there and we have to fund them," said James Horney, senior fellow at the Center on Budget Policies and Priorities, a liberal think tank here.

Since the Iraq invasion in 2003, the U.S. commitment has totaled $379 billion, according to estimates by the Congressional Research Service. During fiscal year 2006, which ended Sept. 30, the war was costing an average of $8 billion a month. Money has come mainly through emergency spending bills passed by Congress. The White House doesn't separate funding for the Iraq war from its broader "global war on terror," so exact numbers are difficult to ascertain.

At the same time, funding for the Defense and Homeland Security departments has increased and now equals roughly half the discretionary budget -- that is, annually appropriated spending on programs other than federal entitlement benefits and interest payments.

Of the $843 billion in discretionary spending for 2006, $411 billion went to Defense and $32 billion to Homeland Security. A separate $120 billion in emergency funds also was approved by Congress for the war on terror. Funding in the current budget for fiscal 2007 is expected to be even higher, with $70 billion in emergency funds already approved for war efforts and the Pentagon expected to seek as much as $100 billion more, plus about $435 billion in discretionary spending for the Pentagon's budget.

White House budget chief Rob Portman said in a meeting with reporters this week that rising federal revenue "has more than covered the cost of the war."

DOJ_NMG_0108640

Aside from security costs, the government also faces skyrocketing mandatory expenses -- which aren't part of the discretionary budget. Medicare, Social Security and Medicaid now consume 39% of the overall $2.7 trillion federal budget, and those costs are projected to increase as the population ages and fewer people enter the labor market. Medicare costs alone are expected to grow 31% to $501 billion in 2011 from $382 billion in 2007.

With an ever-larger chunk of money devoted to security and mandatory programs -- and the government running a budget deficit -- budget watchers say something has to give, and it undoubtedly will be spending for domestic programs.

"It's getting very difficult to give large spending increases to programs that have already grown immensely while trying to fund the war and entitlements and keep the tax cuts," said Brian Riedl, a federal-budget expert with the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

But cutting costs isn't easy. Spending on nonsecurity discretionary programs has increased by about 23% since Mr. Bush took office. The White House -- prodded by conservative Republicans on Capitol Hill -- has tried to trim spending and asked Congress to cut some nonsecurity discretionary spending for 2006 and 2007. The White House says it has succeeded in slowing the growth of nonsecurity discretionary spending every year since Mr. Bush took office.

For 2008, the White House is expected to try to squeeze funding where it previously sought cuts, including areas like Housing and Urban Development, Education, Labor and the Environmental Protection Agency, all of which were targeted for reductions in 2007. Most of the 2007 budget never passed, however, as Congress adjourned before taking up spending bills other than Defense and Homeland Security. As a result, most agencies are expected to operate at 2006 funding levels, creating more pressure to increase spending in 2008.

While the White House hasn't yet disclosed its proposal for nonsecurity discretionary spending in 2008, it is almost certain to be lower than the 2007 request of $399 billion. At Mr. Portman's swearing-in ceremony earlier this year, Mr. Bush said the government must "control the federal appetite for spending" and said he would continue to "cut unnecessary spending."

Mr. Portman said since the 2007 spending bills were never implemented, the White House expects to reiterate those requests in the 2008 budget. "If we had proposed something be increased or reduced we would probably propose that again," Mr. Portman said.

Democrats, meanwhile, may have a tougher time given their agenda, which includes initiatives expected to cost money, including implementing the full recommendations of the 9/11 Commission and cutting interest rates on student loans. Incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, (D., Calif.), has called for pay-as-you-go budget rules, which require that any new entitlement spending or tax cuts be accompanied by offsetting revenue increases or spending cuts to avoid widening the deficit.

With a war going on and potentially more troops heading overseas, tapping the defense budget to fund initiatives "risks sending the wrong message to the voter," said Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow with the Brookings Institution.

Instead, Democrats are likely to seek out money by rolling back some subsidies for oil companies and targeting earmark spending. Regardless, policy watchers say, it will be a challenge.

"Democrats are going to have to try to find a way to meet their needs while keeping an eye on the long-term budget problem and not making things worse," Mr. Horney said.

Democrats And The Deficit (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

Now that the Democrats have regained some power, they have to decide what to do. One of the biggest questions is whether the party should return to Rubinomics — the doctrine, associated with former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, that placed a very high priority on reducing the budget deficit.

The answer, I believe, is no. Mr. Rubin was one of the ablest Treasury secretaries in American history. But it's now clear that while Rubinomics made sense in terms of pure economics, it failed to take account of the ugly realities of contemporary American politics.

And the lesson of the last six years is that the Democrats shouldn't spend political capital trying to bring the deficit down. They should refrain from actions that make the deficit worse. But given a choice between cutting the deficit and spending more on good things like health care reform, they should choose the spending.

In a saner political environment, the economic logic behind Rubinomics would have been compelling. Basic fiscal principles tell us that the government should run budget deficits only when it faces unusually high expenses, mainly during wartime. In other periods it should try to run a surplus, paying down its debt.

Since the 1990s were an era of peace, prosperity and favorable demographics (the baby boomers were still in the work force, not collecting Social Security and Medicare), it should have been a good time to put the federal budget in the black. And under Mr. Rubin, the huge deficits of the Reagan-Bush years were transformed into an impressive surplus.

But the realities of American politics ensured that it was all for naught. The second President Bush quickly squandered the surplus on tax cuts that heavily favored the wealthy, then plunged the budget deep into deficit by cutting taxes on dividends and capital gains even as he took the country into a disastrous war. And you can even argue that Mr. Rubin's surplus was a bad thing, because it greased the rails for Mr. Bush's irresponsibility.

As Brad DeLong, a Berkeley economist who served in the Clinton administration, recently wrote on his influential blog: "Rubin and us spearcarriers moved heaven and earth to restore fiscal balance to the American government in order to raise the rate of economic growth. But what we turned out to have done, in the end, was to enable George W. Bush's right-wing class war: his push for greater after-tax income inequality."

My only quibble with Mr. DeLong's characterization is that this wasn't just one man's class war: the whole conservative movement shared Mr. Bush's squanderlust, his urge to run off with the money so carefully saved under Mr. Rubin's leadership.

With the benefit of hindsight, it's clear that conservatives who claimed to care about deficits when Democrats were in power never meant it. Let's not forget how Alan Greenspan, who posed as the high priest of fiscal rectitude as long as Bill Clinton was in the White House, became an apologist for tax cuts — even in the face of budget deficits — once a Republican took up residence.

Now the Democrats are back in control of Congress. They've pledged not to be as irresponsible as their predecessors: Nancy Pelosi, the incoming House speaker, has promised to restore the "pay-as-you-go" rule that the Republicans tossed aside in the Bush years. This rule would basically prevent Congress from passing budgets that increase the deficit.

I'm for pay-as-you-go. The question, however, is whether to go further. Suppose the Democrats can free up some money by fixing the Medicare drug program, by ending the Iraq war and/or clamping down on war profiteering, or by rolling back some of the Bush tax cuts. Should they use the reclaimed revenue to reduce the deficit, or spend it on other things?

The answer, I now think, is to spend the money — while taking great care to ensure that it is spent well, not squandered — and let the deficit be. By spending money well, Democrats can both improve Americans' lives and, more broadly, offer a demonstration of the benefits of good government. Deficit reduction, on the other hand, might just end up playing into the hands of the next irresponsible president.

In the long run, something will have to be done about the deficit. But given the state of our politics, now is not the time.

Pelosi Aims To Recast Self, Party (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

On a scale associated with presidential inaugurations, Nancy Pelosi is planning four days of celebration surrounding her Jan. 4 swearing-in as the first female speaker of the House. She will return to the blue-collar Baltimore neighborhood where she grew up, attend Mass at the women's college where she studied political science, and dine at the Italian Embassy as Tony Bennett sings "I Left My Heart in San Francisco."

But the hoopla is more than just a party.

Pelosi is grabbing the moment to present herself as the new face of the Democratic Party and to restore the party's image as one hospitable to ethnic minorities, families, religion, the working class and women.

"This is important strategic repositioning," said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, who teaches political communication and rhetoric at the University of Pennsylvania. "Essentially, she's trying to embody the Democratic Party that she would like to offer the nation in 2008."

In her meticulous selection of events and venues during a week when she expects to attract media attention from as far away as Australia, Pelosi is clearly trying to bury the label "San Francisco liberal" that Republicans tried to affix to her during the midterm elections.

" 'San Francisco liberal' is a construct used very effectively for a long time by Republicans," Jamieson said. "It's a little like 'Taxachusetts.' It's telegraphic and very powerful. They haven't been able to get her identified with it because, to this point, a lot of people didn't know who she was. She's trying to position a counterimage before she gets well known."

Brendan Daly, Pelosi's spokesman, said the four-day celebration befits a historic moment in American politics. "We've never had a woman speaker before," Daly said. "This is a big deal."

Newt Gingrich (Ga.) took two days to celebrate his election as speaker when the Republicans formally took control of Congress in 1995. They were largely filled with speeches that outlined his "Contract With America" and fleshed out the ideology of the Republican revolution.

Pelosi's mission is entirely different. She is planning events that will highlight select parts of her personal life while muting her liberal voting record and ideology. "She's showing all the ways she shares other women's lives," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist. "It reminds me of the way Sandra Day O'Connor introduced herself when she was nominated to be the first woman on the Supreme Court -- she talked about growing up on a ranch, working as a secretary, all the dimensions of her life."

Ken Sunshine, a communications consultant for entertainers and Democratic politicians, said Pelosi is not creating a false persona.

"If she's going to Mass, right on," Sunshine said. "Going to Baltimore, right on. This is really where she's from. She wasn't born in an elite setting. Here's a wife, mother, grandmother, and in her spare time, she becomes speaker of the House. I don't know if this is a new brand, but it's true about her. Why should the Republicans have a lock on those qualities?"

Pelosi's public relations offensive follows some missteps that marred her first few weeks after the elections, including a stinging defeat when she backed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) over Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) for the job of House majority leader and a very public spat with Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), who was passed over for the chairmanship of the House intelligence committee.

The day after New Year's Day, Pelosi will visit Albermarle Street in Baltimore's Little Italy neighborhood, where she grew up as the daughter and sister of Baltimore mayors. The current mayor, Maryland Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley (D), will rename Albermarle "Via Nancy D'Alesandro Pelosi." She will drop by St. Leo the Great Roman Catholic Church and then eat dinner with her extended family at an Italian restaurant.

On Jan. 3, Pelosi will attend morning Mass at Trinity University, her alma mater in Washington, and then attend a tea in the Andrew W. Mellon Auditorium for about 400 female politicians, supporters and activists. In the evening, she will be honored at a dinner at the Italian Embassy, where Bennett will perform.

The next day, Pelosi will participate in a nondenominational service at St. Peter's Catholic Church on Capitol Hill and then eat brunch with hundreds of supporters at the Cannon House Office Building and the Library of Congress. At noon, the House will convene to elect Pelosi speaker. That night, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee will hold a fundraiser at the Building Museum, where 1,200 partygoers will pay $1,000 each to applaud Pelosi between performances by Jimmy Buffett, Carole King and Mickey Hart, among others.

Finally, on Jan. 5, Pelosi will hold what she is calling the "People's House" open house at the Cannon House Office Building. But it will be less welcoming than it sounds -- the event is by invitation only.

All the festivities, except the fundraiser at the Building Museum, are being funded by Pelosi's campaign chest.

Mike Murphy, a Republican political consultant and former adviser to Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), said the four-day extravaganza is excessive. "What? No fireworks?" he said. "I'm glad they canceled the tickertape parade. They probably couldn't find biodegradable tickertape and a hybrid convertible."

He said the schedule is "classic Pelosi."

"She's not known for a light touch," he said. "She has every right to throw a new-speaker celebration, but it's 500 percent from what is normal. It's an aggressive act to grab the spotlight. Sounds to me like there's nobody at the meetings saying, 'Maybe that's a little too much.' She's needs a deputy chief of staff from the 'It's Not About You' department."

"Instead of pinning medals on each other, maybe it's time for more seriousness and purpose," Murphy added. "Nobody voted for Nancy Pelosi as speaker; they voted for a change in Washington. For her to grab the spotlight seems like a cult of personality. I have a feeling that Steny Hoyer is probably having a quiet lunch with his family."

A spokeswoman for Hoyer said the Marylander, who will become majority leader on Jan. 4, will host a small reception in his office.

Big Donors Bankroll Inaugural Bashes (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON — The elections are over, but some of the nation's governors are still collecting from individuals and corporations to pay for their upcoming inaugurations. Some of the donations come in amounts that vastly exceed what state law allows in their campaigns.

Unlike campaign contributions, most states don't limit or require public disclosure of inaugural fundraising. Edwin Bender of the Institute on Money in State Politics said greater transparency is needed because governors are guaranteed "to wield a great deal of influence over public policy."

PARTY TIME: No expense spared

·In Massachusetts, Democratic Gov.-elect Deval Patrick is accepting contributions of up to $50,000, including from corporations, to fund his $1 million celebration. State law limits campaign contributions from individuals to $500 a year and bars corporate contributions.

DOJ_NMG_0108643

·In Colorado, corporate donors that give at least $20,000 to Gov.-elect Bill Ritter's inaugural can attend a VIP reception and join the Democrat on a day-long train tour. In his campaign, Ritter could take no more than $1,000 in 2006 from corporations — and only through their political action committees.

·California's Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger has received $640,000 in contributions from the likes of Chevron and the California Chamber of Commerce to sponsor his Jan. 5 inaugural. State law allows him to receive campaign donations of up to $44,600 from corporations, unions and individuals this year. Inaugural "gold sponsors" such as Chevron and the chamber are giving $50,000.

"Setting ridiculously high limits … is really setting no limits at all," said Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a political watchdog group.

Common Cause Massachusetts has criticized Patrick's inaugural fundraising. Corporations "can't have a role in campaigns, so they shouldn't have a role in inaugurals," said executive director Pamela Wilmot.

Patrick aide Stephen Crawford said the contributions make it possible for more people to participate. They are "designed to include as many people who don't have 'influence' in this celebration," he said.

At least one incoming governor has eschewed new inaugural fundraising. New York Democrat Eliot Spitzer, know for battling Wall Street as state attorney general, will tap $5.5 million left over from his campaign. "We didn't want to create any perception that someone was trying to curry favor with the new governor," spokeswoman Christine Anderson said.

Court Says Issue Ads OK During Elections (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, December 22, 2006

A federal court on Thursday loosened restrictions on corporations, unions and other special interest groups that run political advertising in peak election season.

The 2-1 ruling said groups may mention candidates by name in commercials as long as they are trying to influence public policy, rather than sway an election.

The ruling came in a challenge to the so-called McCain-Feingold law designed to reduce the influence of big money in political campaigns. The law banned groups from using unrestricted money to run advertisements that name candidates two months before a general election or one month before a primary.

Wisconsin Right to Life, an anti-abortion group, has been fighting the law since 2004, when it sought to run an advertisement urging voters to contact Wisconsin Sens. Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, both Democrats, and ask them not to hold up President Bush's judicial nominees.

Because Feingold was running for re-election in 2004, the ad was prohibited. Wisconsin Right to Life argued that it wasn't trying to influence an election and said the law restricted its constitutional right to petition the government.

Some lawmakers have predicted such a ruling would create a loophole in the 2002 law. Advocacy groups have used ads similar to those paid for by the Wisconsin group to advocate for and against candidates.

Supporters of the law quickly criticized the ruling. Rep. Martin Meehan, D-Mass., a co-sponsor of the campaign finance law, said he was disappointed and that the decision was written narrowly and should not be seen as a "carte blanche" to get around the law.

The case automatically heads to the Supreme Court for review. If the high court agrees with Thursday's decision, the justices may have to establish a test to differentiate genuine issue ads from phony ones.

James Bopp, an attorney for Wisconsin Right to Life, said the McCain-Feingold law is flawed because politicians assume people only want to influence elections and don't care about influencing public policy.

"To them, what's important is whether they're going to be in office two years from now," Bopp said. "But the people, what's important to them is the laws that are being enacted right now."

The Federal Election Commission had argued that it needed a consistent "bright line" rule to prevent organizations from influencing elections using phony issue advertisements, but the three-judge panel disagreed.

"The virtues of a bright-line rule surely cannot alone justify regulating constitutional speech," U.S. District Judge Richard Leon wrote.

Leon was joined in the opinion by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle. U.S. District Judge Richard W. Roberts dissented.

Federal Election Commissioner David M. Mason said the commission would review the opinion and hoped to have the matter resolved by the 2008 Iowa caucuses.

Issue Advocacy Ads May Run During An Election, Three-Judge Court Rules (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0108644

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

A divided three-judge court ruled yesterday that ads advocating for an issue and mentioning candidates can run during an election, creating a loophole in the law that sought to control the power of big money in elections.

In a 2 to 1 ruling, the court found that the government had no compelling justification to regulate television ads such as the ones Wisconsin Right to Life Inc. broadcast in July 2004, which advocated stopping congressional filibusters against President Bush's judicial nominees.

The ads ran when Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) was running for reelection and had opposed some of Bush's nominees. The ads made no mention of Feingold's record, instead urging Wisconsin residents to call their senators to express their dissatisfaction.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, joined by U.S. Court of Appeals Judge David B. Sentelle, agreed with Wisconsin Right to Life that ads such as theirs merely advocate a position without trying to criticize the record of a particular candidate.

The ads are not targeted "electioneering communications" and should not be burdened by the reporting requirements of the federal campaign finance law, Leon wrote.

The ruling was a key victory for Wisconsin Right to Life, which had sued the Federal Election Commission on the grounds that it had infringed on the group's constitutional right to free speech.

The loser was the FEC, which had argued that the Wisconsin Right to Life ads were election ads, and that the antiabortion group had to follow the finance limits and reporting rules called for under the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act. The 2002 amendments to federal campaign finance law are better known as the McCain-Feingold Act, named for Feingold and his Senate co-sponsor, John McCain (R-Ariz.).

In a lengthy dissent, Judge Robert W. Roberts wrote that the majority's approach was too simplistic in reviewing just the language of the ads, even though there is a significant factual dispute about their purpose. He argued that the ads' intent is critical to determining whether the FEC should be regulating them.

First, were the Wisconsin Right to Life ads truly meant to advocate for an issue, as the group's lawyer asserts, Roberts asked, or did the sponsors intend to influence the election and lead voters to cast votes against Feingold? Also, Roberts wrote, no one has definitively addressed the FEC's argument that the ads were sham ads, "designed and timed to set up a legal challenge" and create a loophole in the McCain-Feingold law.

Carl Tobias, a University of Richmond law professor, said the ruling could "create a major loophole in which all groups have to do is say they are running advocacy-issue ads and they can avoid the statute."

FEC Commissioner David M. Mason said in an interview that the six-member commission has not decided whether to appeal the ruling to the Supreme Court, but he cautioned about predicting what campaign finance limits will govern in the 2008 presidential elections. A similar case involving a Maine group is still to be decided, and the Supreme Court could have a different view.

"It's very unlikely this ruling will affect what the law will be a year from now," Mason said.

Court Overturns Limits On Political Ads, Part Of The Campaign Finance Law (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — A three-judge panel on Thursday overturned a key segment of the campaign finance law that banned issue advertisements paid for by corporate or union money in the critical weeks before federal elections.

The case, which was heard by a special federal court panel in Washington, now heads to the Supreme Court. If upheld, the ruling would unravel one of the tougher restrictions on the use of unregulated donations that interest groups pumped by the millions of dollars into political commercials.

The case was brought by Wisconsin Right to Life, which has been fighting the restrictions since 2004, claiming they infringe on its First Amendment guarantee of free speech, among other grounds.

Using its corporate treasury, the group had paid for advertisements denouncing Senate filibusters of judicial nominees and urging viewers to contact either Senator Russell D. Feingold, who was up for re-election that year, or the state's other Democratic senator, Herb Kohl, who was not.

Under the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, groups wanting to broadcast advertisements that name federal candidates within 60 days before a general election, or 30 days before a primary, are required to follow strict rules on how they pay for them. The law requires that donors be disclosed and caps contributions to prevent secretive groups from advocating for or against candidates in thinly disguised advertisements known as issue ads.

DOJ_NMG_0108645

This case has been closely watched for several reasons. For one, organizations with quite disparate interests, including the American Civil Liberties Union, the National Rifle Association, the Chamber of Commerce and the conservative Club for Growth, have argued that they have a right to petition the government.

As grassroots lobbying groups, they say, they should be exempt from the ban on issue ads. Some have contended, most recently in an unsuccessful case before the Federal Election Commission, that their First Amendment rights are infringed upon because the law restricts them from pursuing their policy agendas in election seasons.

The court's decision Thursday clearly loosened the clamps on such activities. Those who want to broadcast such ads are "going to push the envelope," said Edward B. Foley, an election law expert at Ohio State University. "They're going to explore the scope of this exemption."

The case has already been heard by the Supreme Court, which kicked it back to the three-judge panel in January. The justices said the panel had misinterpreted a 2003 decision, in which they upheld the McCain-Feingold law, as foreclosing future challenges to the advertising restrictions.

The special panel that ruled Thursday did not consider the right-to-life group's argument for an exemption as a grassroots lobbying organization. The 2-to-1 decision more narrowly found that the group's ads did not violate restrictions against "express advocacy" for or against a federal candidate and were not campaign ads but general issue ads.

The majority opinion was by Judge David B. Sentelle of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit and Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court. Judge Richard W. Roberts of Federal District Court dissented.

The judges adhered strictly to the content of the actual commercials and rejected arguments by the government that the commercials were intended to influence the election. The advertisements did not state the senators' views on the filibusters but urged viewers to call them.

The panel found that the government had not demonstrated a compelling enough interest to impose restrictions on these groups' free speech rights. It said this section of the McCain-Feingold law was unconstitutional because it imposed campaign finance limits on organizations that were using advertisements to advance legislative policy.

Mr. Foley said the court reopened the door to use of corporate money.

"This is clearly a shift in direction and invites the use of corporate money," Mr. Foley said, adding: "You can run ads about any policy issue you want to and you can name members of Congress in the ads. You can use corporate money for any ad that fits this profile."

Mr. Foley said it would appear that so-called 527 groups, which emerged in the 2004 presidential campaign as a powerful force, would also be allowed to use corporate money for general issue ads under the Wisconsin decision. But the law is still murky on the regulation of 527's, named for the part of the tax code that regulates them.

In the Wisconsin case, the F.E.C. had argued that the Wisconsin advertisements were clearly intended to try to defeat Mr. Feingold. The group's opposition to the Senate filibustering of judicial nominees was closely linked to nominees who opposed abortion.

Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut and a main architect of the campaign finance law, expressed disappointment in the decision.

"The lower court majority opinion ignores a wealth of evidence that shows W.R.T.L. had a 'priority' to defeat Senator Feingold in the 2004 election, and that the ads in question were part of that effort," Mr. Shays said in a statement. Fred Wertheimer, head of Democracy 21, a campaign finance reform group, and one of the lawyers involved in the case, said he was hopeful that the Supreme Court would overturn the decision.

"We agree with the dissent in this case," Mr. Wertheimer said, adding, "The context surrounding these ads, and not just the text and the face of these ads, must be considered in making this determination."

Issue Ads Allowed In Election Run-up (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Political groups have a constitutional right to run issue ads that include the name of a candidate for office even in the contentious days before an election, a panel of federal judges ruled yesterday in the first major dent in the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign-finance law.

Under that law, ads that interest groups ran 60 days before an election or 30 days before a primary were assumed to be aimed at influencing voters if they mentioned a candidate for federal office.

But in a 2-1 ruling, the panel yesterday said three ads from Wisconsin Right to Life (WRTL) in 2004 were issue ads rather than election ads and cannot be banned outright. The panel said permitting such ads should be decided based on the individual content.

DOJ_NMG_0108646

"On their face, WRTL's three 2004 anti-filibuster advertisements were not intended to influence the voters' decisions," District Court Judge Richard J. Leon wrote in the majority opinion, joined by Appeals Court Judge David B. Sentelle.

The small but potentially deep change creates an exception to what had been considered a near-blanket rule.

"A free-speech interest is too substantial here," said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, who said the government didn't justify such a broad ban.

The 2002 law was meant to end the use of "soft money," or unrestricted donations, to run ads that appear to be talking about issues but intend to affect an election.

Critics say interest groups could use the ruling as a loophole to run such "sham" ads and say judges should consider the groups' motives.

Interest groups had argued that the law kept them from playing a legitimate role in educating voters and influencing the legislative process.

"This is a victory for the right of the people to lobby their members of Congress on upcoming votes even if there is a pending election," said James Bopp Jr., the right-to-life group's lawyer. "This grass-roots lobbying is simply self-government at work, which is protected by the First Amendment."

Backers of the law were considering an appeal yesterday, while the FEC was weighing options.

"The commission is carefully studying the opinion and will consult with the Justice Department on the next appropriate step," said Michael E. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission.

The ads in question told listeners to call Wisconsin's two senators, Democrats Russ Feingold and Herb Kohl, to urge them to oppose a filibuster of President Bush's judicial nominees. Mr. Feingold is one of the key sponsors of the campaign-finance law that bears his name and that of co-sponsor Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

In 2005, the panel ruled that the ads violated the campaign law because they mentioned Mr. Feingold, who was running for re-election. The court said the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling in McConnell v. FEC left no room to judge on a case-by-case basis.

But the Supreme Court sent the case back to the panel earlier this year, ruling that cases could be decided individually.

District Judge Richard W. Roberts dissented from yesterday's ruling, saying more facts were needed to decide what the right-to-life group's motives were in running the ads.

The decision applies only to WRTL's three ads. The court rejected the group's request to write new rules for how to treat ads in the future.

Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a group that backed the McCain-Feingold law, said the decision is narrow but he still disagrees with it. He said the advertiser's motives should matter, even if the ad seems to be straightforward.

"The context surrounding the ads, and not just the text and face of the ads, must be considered in making this determination," said Mr. Wertheimer, who is urging an appeal.

Challenges to the 2002 McCain-Feingold law are heard first by a panel of two district court judges and one judge from the court of appeals for the D.C. circuit. Appeals go directly to the Supreme Court.

Senator Brownback And The Judge (NYT)

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

If most people were asked to list the qualities they want in a federal judge, few would include “has not attended a same-sex commitment ceremony.” But that was the outrageous litmus test that Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas, applied to Janet Neff, whose nomination he has been blocking. Mr. Brownback — who has presidential ambitions — now says he will allow a vote on her nomination. We hope that is a sign that gay-baiting is becoming less tolerable, even to Republican primary voters.

Judge Neff, a Michigan state court judge, attended the commitment ceremony of the daughter of a family who had lived next door to her for 26 years. She said that attending and delivering a homily was like joining in an important event in the life of one of her own daughters.

Mr. Brownback, one of the most conservative senators, considered it to be a disqualifier for the bench. Later, he made an equally objectionable offer: he would allow a vote on Judge Neff if she agreed to recuse herself from cases involving same-sex unions. The Senate does not get to tell federal judges what areas of law they may rule on.

Senator Brownback now seems to be calculating that even in the Republican Party, the sort of extreme bigotry he has shown toward gay people would not be a selling point. At a time when Vice President Dick Cheney’s lesbian daughter is pregnant and President Bush has declared himself “happy for her,” Mr. Brownback’s hostility puts him far out on the political fringe.

Mr. Brownback says that although he will allow Judge Neff’s nomination to come to a vote, he is still likely to vote against her. If he does, he should be asked to explain his vote if he hits the presidential campaign trail. Whether someone has attended a same-sex commitment ceremony is not a worthy litmus test to impose on someone seeking an important office. Whether someone holds hateful views toward gay people certainly is.

Texas Judge Cuts Vioxx Award To $7.75M (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

(AP) - HARLINGEN, Texas-A judge in a Texas widow's lawsuit over the Merck & Co. drug Vioxx on Thursday reduced a $32 million jury award to about $7.75 million, citing Texas' recently enacted caps on punitive damages.

The state jury in April found Merck & Co. liable for the death of Leonel Garza, a 71-year-old man who had a fatal heart attack within a month of taking the since-withdrawn painkiller.

The company was ordered to pay the Garza family $7 million in non-economic compensatory damages and $25 million in punitive damages.

But Judge Alex Garza, in a Rio Grande City courtroom, ordered the punitive damage reduced as required by state law.

The law caps punitive damages at twice the amount of economic damages - lost pay - and up to $750,000 on top of non-economic damages. Because Garza was retired, the jury awarded no economic damages, so Merck was ordered to pay the most the family could receive under state law.

A spokesman for Merck's outside legal counsel said the company was seeking a new trial based on "the undisclosed financial relationship" between the plaintiff and one of the jurors.

Merck attorneys in September were granted access to bank and cell phone records they said would show an improper financial relationship between juror Jose Manuel Rios and Felicia Garza, the widow.

Businessman Pleads Guilty In Bribery Case Involving U.N. (NYT)

By Elissa Gootman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Dec. 21 — A businessman pleaded guilty Thursday to providing cash and a significantly discounted luxury Manhattan condominium to a ranking United Nations procurement official, in a successful effort to win more than $50 million in contracts, federal prosecutors said.

The businessman, Nishan Kohli, 30, pleaded guilty in Manhattan federal court to a single count of bribery after acknowledging that he had given cash payments to Sanjaya Bahel, who was chief of the commodity procurement section of the United Nations procurement division from 1998 until 2003. Mr. Kohli faces up to 10 years in prison.

He also acknowledged that from 2003 to 2005, he allowed Mr. Bahel to pay reduced rent at a high-rise apartment that Mr. Kohli owned in the Dag Hammarskjold Towers, near United Nations headquarters. In May 2005, Mr. Kohli sold the unit to Mr. Bahel at a price so far below the market value that the condominium's board considered blocking the sale, prosecutors said. Mr. Kohli also gave Mr. Bahel a cellphone that allowed them to speak privately.

Mr. Kohli's guilty plea is the latest development in a series of corruption charges against United Nations officials and those seeking to do business with them. The plea and Mr. Kohli's agreement to cooperate with the government are likely to strengthen the case against Mr. Bahel, who has pleaded not guilty to bribery charges. His trial is scheduled for May 7.

Richard Herman, Mr. Bahel's lawyer, said his client had accepted no bribes and was "vigorously fighting the allegations of any wrongdoing." Mr. Herman noted that the condominium sale took place two years after Mr. Bahel, 56, left his procurement position and said that the contracts in question were awarded through a "sealed bid process."

Mr. Bahel has been suspended without pay from his latest position, as chief of the commercial activities service within the United Nations postal administration, for four months since an internal United Nations investigation found he had improperly steered contacts toward Mr. Kohli's companies.

Stéphane Dujarric, a spokesman for Secretary General Kofi Annan, said that the prosecutors' case was "based in large part on evidence uncovered by the United Nations," adding, "We very much welcome the fact that people who have been accused of wrongdoing involving the U.N. are being brought to justice."

Prosecutors said Mr. Kohli's efforts helped secure contracts for the companies he represented, including Telecommunications Consultants India Ltd., an enterprise owned by the Indian government, and Thunderbird Industries, where Mr. Kohli was the managing partner. Since 2000, prosecutors said, Mr. Kohli's businesses have received contracts ranging from nearly $3 million for desktop computers and monitors, to $36 million for radio communications systems.

UN Official Admits Bribery (NYS)

By Joseph Goldstein

New York Sun, December 22, 2006

Efforts by federal prosecutors to root out corruption at the U.N. received a boost yesterday when a Florida businessman pleaded guilty to bribing a senior U.N. procurement official.

As a liaison to the U.N. for two companies, the businessman, Nishan Kohli, was able to secure more than $60 million worth of U.N. business contracts. His guilty plea yesterday is part of a cooperation agreement he has entered into with prosecutors.

While the details of the deal did not emerge in court, it is likely that the government will call him as a witness at the trial of the U.N. official, Sanjaya Bahel, 55. The trial is scheduled for May, 2007.

Mr. Bahel was chief of the Commodity Procurement Section within the Procurement Division of the United Nations until 2003.

Prior to Mr. Bahel's recent indictment, another top procurement department employee, Alexander Yakovlev, pleaded guilty in the summer of 2005 to corruption and wire fraud charges. Messrs. Bahel and Yakovlev were key officers involved in the awarding of a U.N. contract to the Swiss-based inspection company Cotecna, which had employed Secretary General Annan's son, Kojo.

In addition, last January the U.N. suspended eight employees in the procurement department, including Mr. Bahel, pending an investigation into allegations of wrongdoing.

Mexican Army Invades Pot Plantations (USAT)

By Sara Miller Llana

USA Today, December 22, 2006

LAZARO CARDENAS, Mexico — Thirty-five soldiers jump off two helicopters and fan out across a marijuana field tucked deep into the mountains of Mexico's western state of Michoacan.

The choppers secure the perimeter as soldiers yank out plants growing in neat lines. Two hours later, most of the marijuana smolders in a bonfire.

This is one of 38 marijuana fields identified in a remote area, 25 miles from Aguililla, the nearest town. Rooting out — literally — marijuana plantations is a major component in Mexico's latest war on drugs, announced last week by President Felipe Calderó´n.

Mexico has long been under pressure from the United States to crack down on the drug trade and end violence between drug gangs. According to the U.S. State Department, 70%-90% of drugs coming to the USA from Latin America enter through Mexico. Mexico is one of the main producers of marijuana and heroin destined for the USA.

U.S. Ambassador Tony Garza has repeatedly expressed concern about the rising violence, most of it drug-related.

The week-old Operation Michoacan, Calderó´n's first major initiative since he took office Dec. 1, is the biggest anti-drug effort taken on by the Mexican government, says Army Gen. Manuel Garcia Ruiz, who heads the operation.

The purpose is to "end the impunity of the criminals that puts at risk the tranquility of all Mexicans, especially our families," Interior Secretary Francisco Javier Ramirez Acuna said at a news conference in Mexico City on Monday.

It also is a high-profile effort by the new president to follow through on his campaign vow to improve security in Mexico.

"Calderó´n came in as a law-and-order president and wants to show he is capable of reasserting state authority to convince the Mexican people, as well as the U.S., that he is, in fact, in charge," says Bruce Bagley, a drug specialist at the University of Miami.

Mexico's drug wars claimed about 2,000 lives in 2006, according to the Associated Press, and have been marked by increasing violence as drug lords battle for control of what the State Department says is a multibillion-dollar industry. In September, gunmen stormed a nightclub and hurled five heads onto a dance floor in Uruapan in Michoacan, the president's home state. Juan Antonio Magana, the state's attorney general, told the AP more than 200 homicides here this year were drug-related.

Last week, Calderó´n sent 7,000 military and federal officers into Michoacan to burn drug fields and arrest suspects. "This is a very difficult battle," Garcia Ruiz says. "It will last as long as it is necessary."

About 50 people suspected of drug trafficking, including suspected drug lord Elias Valencia, have been arrested. The soldiers and federal officers have seized about 100 firearms, bulletproof vests, antennas and telephones, officials announced at Monday's news conference. They estimated the raids could cost the cartels as much as $626 million, which includes future profits from the plants and opium seeds.

DOJ_NMG_0108649

The first goal, Garcia Ruiz says, is to disrupt the drug gangs' source of income and their ability to communicate. Over the past week, military and police have identified 1,795 marijuana fields covering 585 acres throughout the state.

Attorney General Eduardo Medina says the government will expand the new offensive by sending soldiers and police to several states simultaneously to prevent traffickers from fleeing between regions. The idea is to wrest income and turf from drug traffickers. "The focus is on territory, recovering geographical space for the public," Medina says.

Tuesday, journalists witnessed a raid on a marijuana plantation in Michoacan. The field where the two helicopters landed was ringed with lime trees and an irrigation system: thousands of yards of tubing fed by a nearby rushing creek. Footpaths led to at least two other fields, a 15-minute trek away, and a recently abandoned shack. Half-eaten tamales, corncobs and crushed pepper littered wooden benches.

The type of marijuana growing here illustrates how hard the battle against drugs has become. It's a genetically modified variety resistant to pesticides; it can be killed only if it's pulled out with the roots. It also grows year-round, Garcia Ruiz says.

He says the plants, which mature in two months, are primarily exported to the USA.

Residents in Michoacan hope the operation will tamp down the violence. Rosalba Sanchez, 32, and her mother, Nicolasa Diez, 65, live in Patzcuaro, west of the state capital Morelia. They say that even though the main targets are people who produce and distribute drugs, the violence has affected their quality of life.

A drug-gang-related shootout two weeks ago in the city killed a store owner, they say. "When you leave your house, anything could happen," Sanchez says. "Hopefully with more security, they will be more afraid."

Redacted Version Of Original Op-Ed (NYT)

By Flynt Leverett And Hillary Mann

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

The Iraq Study Group has added its voice to a burgeoning chorus of commentators, politicians, and former officials calling for a limited, tactical dialogue with Iran regarding Iraq. The Bush administration has indicated a conditional willingness to pursue a similarly compartmented dialogue with Tehran over Iran's nuclear activities.

Unfortunately, advocates of limited engagement — either for short-term gains on specific issues or to "test" Iran regarding broader rapprochement — do not seem to understand the 20-year history of United States-Iranian cooperation on discrete issues or appreciate the impact of that history on Iran's strategic outlook. In the current regional context, issue-specific engagement with Iran is bound to fail. The only diplomatic approach that might succeed is a comprehensive one aimed at a "grand bargain" between the United States and the Islamic Republic.

Since the 1980s, cooperation with Iran on specific issues has been tried by successive administrations, but United States policymakers have consistently allowed domestic politics or other foreign policy interests to torpedo such cooperation and any chance for a broader opening. The Reagan administration's engagement with Iran to secure the release of American hostages in Lebanon came to grief in the Iran-contra scandal. The first Bush administration resumed contacts with Tehran to secure release of the last American hostages in Lebanon, but postponed pursuit of broader rapprochement until after the 1992 presidential election.

In 1994, the Clinton administration acquiesced to the shipment of Iranian arms to Bosnian Muslims, but the leak of this activity in 1996 and criticism from presumptive Republican presidential nominee Robert Dole shut down possibilities for further United States-Iranian cooperation for several years.

These episodes reinforced already considerable suspicion among Iranian leaders about United States intentions toward the Islamic Republic. But, in the wake of the 9/11 attacks, senior Iranian diplomats told us that Tehran believed it had a historic opportunity to improve relations with Washington. Iranian leaders offered to help the United States in responding to the attacks without making that help contingent on changes in America's Iran policy — a condition stipulated in the late 1990s when Tehran rejected the Clinton administration's offer of dialogue — calculating that cooperation would ultimately prompt fundamental shifts in United States policy.

The argument that Iran helped America in Afghanistan because it was in Tehran's interest to get rid of the Taliban is misplaced. Iran could have let America remove the Taliban without getting its own hands dirty, as it remained neutral during the 1991 gulf war. Tehran cooperated with United States efforts in Afghanistan primarily because it wanted a better relationship with Washington.

But Tehran was profoundly disappointed with the United States response. After the 9/11 attacks, xxx xxx xx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxxx xx set the stage for a November 2001 meeting between Secretary of State Colin Powell and the foreign ministers of Afghanistan's six neighbors and Russia. xxxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxx xx xxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxxxx Iran went along, working with the United States to eliminate the Taliban and establish a post-Taliban political order in Afghanistan.

But, in his January 2002 State of the Union address, President Bush did just that in labeling Iran part of the "axis of evil." Unsurprisingly, Mr. Hekmatyar managed to leave Iran in short order after the speech. xxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxxx xxxx xxx the Islamic Republic could not be seen to be harboring terrorists.

xxx xxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxxx xxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxxxxx xxxx xxxxxxxx xxxx xxxxxxxx xxxx xx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxx xxxxx xxxx xxxxx xxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xxxxxx xx xxxxx xxx xx xxxxxxx This demonstrated to Afghan warlords that they could not play America and Iran off one another and prompted Tehran to deport hundreds of suspected Al Qaeda and Taliban operatives who had fled Afghanistan.

Those who argue that Iran did not cause Iraq's problems and therefore can be of only limited help in dealing with Iraq's current instability must also acknowledge that Iran did not "cause" Afghanistan's deterioration into a terrorist-harboring failed state. But, when America and Iran worked together, Afghanistan was much more stable than it is today, Al Qaeda was on the run, the Islamic Republic's Hezbollah protégé was comparatively restrained, and Tehran was not spinning centrifuges. Still, the Bush administration conveyed no interest in building on these positive trends.

xxx xxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxx xxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx x xxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxx xxxxxxxxx xxx xxxxxx xx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxx xxxxxxxx x xx x x xxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xx xxxx xxxxx xxxxx xx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xx xxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxx xxxxx xxxx xxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxx xxxxxxxxx xxxxx xxxxxxxx xx

From an Iranian perspective, this record shows that Washington will take what it can get from talking to Iran on specific issues but is not prepared for real rapprochement. Yet American proponents of limited engagement anticipate that Tehran will play this fruitless game once more — even after numerous statements by senior administration figures targeting the Islamic Republic for prospective "regime change" and by President Bush himself that attacking Iran's nuclear and national security infrastructure is "on the table."

Our experience dealing with xxxx xxxx Iranian diplomats over Afghanistan and in more recent private conversations in Europe and elsewhere convince us that Iran will not go down such a dead-end road again. Iran will not help the United States in Iraq because it wants to avoid chaos there; Tehran is well positioned to defend its interests in Iraq unilaterally as America flounders. Similarly, Iran will not accept strategically meaningful limits on its nuclear capabilities for a package of economic and technological goodies.

Iran will only cooperate with the United States, whether in Iraq or on the nuclear issue, as part of a broader rapprochement addressing its core security concerns. This requires extension of a United States security guarantee — effectively, an American commitment not to use force to change the borders or form of government of the Islamic Republic — bolstered by the prospect of lifting United States unilateral sanctions and normalizing bilateral relations. This is something no United States administration has ever offered, and that the Bush administration has explicitly refused to consider.

Indeed, no administration would be able to provide a security guarantee unless United States concerns about Iran's nuclear activities, regional role and support for terrorist organizations were definitively addressed. That is why, at this juncture, resolving any of the significant bilateral differences between the United States and Iran inevitably requires resolving all of them. Implementing the reciprocal commitments entailed in a "grand bargain" would almost certainly play out over time and in phases, but all of the commitments would be agreed up front as a package, so that both sides would know what they were getting.

Unfortunately, the window for pursuing a comprehensive settlement with Iran will not be open indefinitely. The Iranian leadership is more radicalized today, with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as president, than it was three years ago, and could become more radicalized in the future, depending on who ultimately succeeds Ayatollah Ali Khamenei as supreme leader. If President Bush does not move decisively toward strategic engagement with Tehran during his remaining two years in office, his successor will not have the same opportunities that he will have so blithely squandered.

HERE is the redacted version of a draft Op-Ed article we wrote for The Times, as blacked out by the Central Intelligence Agency's Publication Review Board after the White House intervened in the normal prepublication review process and demanded substantial deletions. Agency officials told us that they had concluded on their own that the original draft included no classified material, but that they had to bow to the White House.

Indeed, the deleted portions of the original draft reveal no classified material. These passages go into aspects of American-Iranian relations during the Bush administration's first term that have been publicly discussed by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice; former Secretary of State Colin Powell; former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage; a former State Department policy planning director, Richard Haass; and a former special envoy to Afghanistan, James Dobbins.

These aspects have been extensively reported in the news media, and one of us, Mr. Leverett, has written about them in The Times and other publications with the explicit permission of the review board. We provided the following citations to the board to demonstrate that all of the material the White House objected to is already in the public domain. Unfortunately, to make sense of much of our Op-Ed article, readers will have to read the citations for themselves. (See links at left.)

The decisions of the C.I.A. and the White House took us by surprise. Since leaving government service three and a half years ago, Mr. Leverett has put more than 20 articles through the C.I.A.'s prepublication review process and the Publication Review Board has never changed a word or asked the White House for permission to clear these articles.

What's more, we have spent a collective 20 years serving our country as career civil servants in national security, for both Republican and Democratic administrations. We know firsthand the importance of protecting sensitive information. But we also know the importance of shared knowledge. In the entrance to the C.I.A.'s headquarters the words of the Gospel of John are inscribed, "And ye shall know the truth and the truth shall set you free."

National security must be above politics. In a democracy, transparency in government has to be honored and protected. To classify information for reasons other than the safety and security of the United States and its interests is a violation of these principles. It is for this reason that we will continue to press for the release of the article without the material deleted.

Rice: U.S. Backs Iran Sanctions Draft (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, December 22, 2006

The United States supports a draft U.N. sanctions resolution against Iran even though it omits a mandatory travel ban against several Iranians involved in the country's nuclear and missile programs, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday.

Rice said she expects changes to be made in the draft before it is put to a vote at the United Nations Security Council, perhaps on Friday.

Speaking at a news conference with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay, she offered no details of the revisions she expects.

"It's no secret we would have preferred to have this earlier had we been the lone drafter, and of course there might have been other things in it," she said of the draft circulated by Britain and France.

At the same time, she said the resolution would make clear to Iran that the "international community is not going to tolerate its defiance" of demands that it abandon its nuclear program. Iranians insist the effort is for peaceful aims, but the United States and other western countries have said the real purpose is the development of nuclear weapons.

The latest draft would order all countries to ban the supply of specified materials and technology that could contribute to Iran's nuclear and missile programs.

Prodded by MacKay on a different issue, Rice said the United States would review the status of Maher Arar, who was recently cleared by the Canadian government of any ties to terrorism.

Arar has become the best-known case of extraordinary rendition, a practice in which the U.S. government sends foreign terror suspects to third countries for interrogation.

Arar says he was shunted to Syria, and was tortured and kept in a dark cell for nearly a year.

Arar no longer is under travel restrictions in Canada, but remains on a U.S. watch list.

Rice said she had spoken earlier in the day with Michael Chertoff, the secretary of the Department of Homeland Security, about Arar's status. "He said he would examine it and would get back to me."

U.S., EU Urge Vote On Iran Ban (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States and European Union yesterday pushed for a U.N. Security Council vote as early as today on Iran sanctions, a diluted version that drops a U.S.-backed travel ban on Iranian nuclear officials in a bid to win Russian support.

The governments of Germany, France and Britain drafted the latest text, which calls for a ban on trading parts or technology for use in making ballistic missiles or nuclear fuel.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed to ignore the resolution, which comes just days after Pentagon officials disclosed plans to beef up the contingent of warships in the region by early next year.

"The United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology," Mr. Ahmadinejad said yesterday.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice indicated that Washington would support the draft.

"Had we been the lone drafters of the resolution, of course there might have been other things in it," she told reporters yesterday after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay.

"But I am quite satisfied and quite certain that the resolution that will be adopted will be one that both says to Iran 'you cannot defy the international community' and imposes penalties on Iran for that defiance," Miss Rice said.

Russia said last night that the resolution needed more work, casting doubt on whether the vote could be held today.

The West fears Tehran is developing fissile material for a nuclear weapon, but Iran insists it seeks nuclear power.

The latest council text cites Chapter VII of the U.N. Charter, which authorizes the body to undertake economic, political and military action to address threats to international peace and security.

However, the draft stresses the need for a political and diplomatic effort to contain proliferation.

It also calls on the U.N. nuclear agency to report within 60 days whether Iran is complying with its requests for information and access to all enrichment-related activities.

The draft demands that all states to deny Iran technical assistance, training, financial assistance or investment that could be used to advance suspect nuclear activities.

In addition, the resolution would immediately freeze the assets of two dozen individuals and companies listed as crucial to Iran's nuclear or ballistic enterprises.

Iran's oil minister admitted earlier this week that de-facto financial restrictions already in place are making it difficult for the Islamic state to raise needed investment funds for its oil and gas industry.

"Currently, overseas banks and financiers have decreased their cooperation," Oil Minister Kazem Vaziri-Hamaneh told Shana, the Oil Ministry's news service, according to a report in the Financial Times yesterday.

Some analysts were skeptical that the Security Council could effectively rein in Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"They should get off the U.N. track and go back to the U.S.-EU track, which can take action much more quickly and resolutely than the Security Council can," said Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations. "The U.N. track has been a diversion and sends the wrong message."

Meanwhile, political candidates aligned with Mr. Ahmadinejad appear to have lost last week's local elections, according to results announced early yesterday in Tehran.

Moderates and reformers won most seats from the hard-line ruling party, according to press reports.

UN Poised To Agree Sanctions On Iran (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

The United Nations Security Council was poised finally to agree sanctions on Iran after months of wrangling over Tehran's nuclear programme.

Western diplomats say the measures are crucial to creating a united front against Iran's nuclear ambitions but concede that the steps finally agreed, which have been watered down from initial European Union proposals, are likely to have only a limited impact on Tehran. Iran, which insists its nuclear programme is for peaceful purposes, ignored an August 31 UN deadline to suspend uranium enrichment.

A binding resolution, which ambassadors had hoped to adopt today but the vote had slipped to the weekend, would ban countries from sending the most sensitive nuclear materials to Iran and establish limited controls over dual-use technology. It would also freeze the overseas finances of some organisations, companies and people, although Russian opposition led European drafters to step back from a travel ban. A committee would be told of trips by named officials instead.

Diplomats said some issues still needed to be ironed out but they were hopeful that unanimous agreement could be reached by this morning. If adopted, the UN resolution would increase the pressure on Tehran, although experts and diplomats acknowledge its impact may be limited.

Tehran admitted this week that the de facto financial sanctions, encouraged by the US, had started to hurt investment in the oil sector.

Iran dismissed the UN move. Ali Larijani, the secretary of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, was quoted as saying: "The nature of this resolution is not capable of pressuring Iran and Iran will give an appropriate response to it.

"This behaviour will just create more problems. If they ratify the resolution Iran will . . .review its co-operation with the International Atomic Energy Agency and others [in the] political, economic and cultural fields."

Separately, US Central Command, which oversees military activities in the Middle East, has asked the Pentagon to send a second aircraft carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf in a move that has been interpreted as sending a strong message to Iran. Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary who is visiting Iraq, would have to approve the request.

Iran Defiant On Nuclear Energy Despite Looming Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad vowed that nothing would stop Iran pushing ahead with its nuclear programme, as world powers prepared to vote Friday on sanctions against Tehran.

"The United States and Europeans know well that they cannot do anything against Iran and their pressure will not hold back Iran's desire to fully obtain peaceful nuclear technology," Ahmadinejad said.

"The bullying powers today, in confronting Iran's peaceful nuclear technology, are faced with a sea of courageous people," he added in a speech in Gilan-e Gharb town, in Iran's western Kermanshah province.

"If they think that nuclear energy only belongs to one group of the Iranian people they are mistaken."

Qatar, which is chairing UN Security Council sessions this month, confirmed Thursday that a draft resolution would be put to a vote before the 15-nation body on Friday.

In Washington, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said her government was seeking last-minute changes to the draft UN resolution ahead of the vote.

The draft calls for a ban on trade with Iran in goods related to its nuclear and ballistic missile programmes.

It also waters down a contentious proposal for a travel ban on Iranian officials, in a bid to win Russia's support for the resolution that has been held up for weeks by wrangling amongst the Security Council powers.

Western countries want to impose sanctions on Iran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment, for fear that it would lead to Tehran having nuclear weapons that would radically shift the balance of power in the region.

Iran counters that its nuclear programme is only aimed at providing energy for a growing population.

Qatar's UN ambassador Nasser Abdelaziz al-Nasser expressed misgivings about sanctions, saying Thursday: "We don't know how the Iranians are going to react."

"The Middle East is going through difficult times," he told reporters at UN headquarters in New York. "We are worried about this matter. We live there."

Without elaborating, Rice said Thursday that "there are some changes that are still to be made" to the draft resolution.

But she added Washington was "very supportive" of the overall draft -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany -- and she expressed confidence it would be adopted.

"I am quite satisfied and quite certain that the resolution that will be adopted will be one that both says to Iran 'you cannot defy the international community' and imposes penalties on Iran," she said.

The New York Times newspaper, quoting unnamed US officials, reported Thursday that the United States and Britain would move additional warships into the Gulf region as the Security Council moves on sanctions.

"Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates was expected this week to approve a request by commanders for a second aircraft carrier and its supporting ships to be stationed within quick sailing distance of Iran by early next year," it reported.

In his address Thursday, Ahmadinejad reaffirmed his prediction that Iran would be able to hold a "nuclear celebration" at the same time as it marks the 28th anniversary of the Islamic revolution on February 11.

Iran has not specified exactly what landmark will be feted on that day, but Ahmadinejad added: "Iran is only one step before we reach the zenith and we will take that step with pride."

The Islamic republic has set a goal of installing 3,000 uranium enriching centrifuges at a key nuclear plant by March, in what would be an important step towards industrial enrichment.

Iran's President Says Bush 'Most Hated' (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0108654

By Ali Akbar Dareini
AP, December 22, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad called President Bush "the most hated person" in the world on Thursday, keeping up his tirades against the West despite elections that showed Iranians want him to focus on the country's domestic problems.

In final results announced Thursday from local elections last week, moderate conservatives opposed to Ahmadinejad won a majority of seats. They were followed by reformists, making a comeback after being driven out of local councils, parliament and the presidency over the past five years.

In the capital Tehran, where Ahmadinejad was mayor before becoming president 16 months ago, his allies grabbed only three of the 15 council seats, while moderate conservatives won seven. Reformists won four, and an independent one. Though the Dec. 15 elections were local, they were the first time the public has weighed in on Ahmadinejad's stormy presidency.

But Ahmadinejad appeared unbowed. He toured cities in western Iran, telling the crowds that Iran will not be intimidated by Western demands to dismantle its nuclear program, and scolding Bush.

"Oh, the respectful gentleman, get out of the glassy palace and know that you are the most hated person in the eyes of the world's nations and you can't harm the Iranian nation," Ahmadinejad said, according to the official Iranian Republic News Agency.

He said Iran would continue uranium enrichment even under threat of U.N. sanctions. "A nation that has resisted until today will resist until the last step and will defend its rights," he said.

The United States and its allies believe Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies the allegation, saying its nuclear goal is only to generate electricity.

Ahmadinejad did not comment on the election results. But his hard-line foreign policy, in the absence of a strong domestic agenda or economic program, is believed to have divided the conservative base that voted him into the presidency last year.

The president has sharply escalated Iran's standoff with the United States and its allies over several issues. Besides uranium enrichment, he has sparked international outrage for his calls to eliminate Israel and for casting doubt on the Nazi Holocaust.

Election results outside Tehran also showed a heavy defeat for Ahmadinejad supporters. None of his candidates won seats on the councils in the cities of Shiraz, Bandar Abbas, Sari, Zanjan, Rasht, Ilam, Sanandaj and Kerman, and many councils in other cities were divided like Tehran's.

Similar anti-Ahmadinejad sentiment appeared in final results of a parallel election for the Assembly of Experts, the body of 86 senior clerics that monitors Iran's supreme Islamic leader and chooses his successor.

A big boost for moderates within the ruling Islamic establishment was visible in the large number of votes for former President Hashemi Rafsanjani, who lost to Ahmadinejad in the 2005 presidential election runoff.

Rafsanjani, who supports dialogue with the United States, got the most votes of any candidate from Tehran to win re-election to the assembly.

Opposition candidates demanded that Ahmadinejad pay more attention to unemployment, now estimated at 11 percent, and other economic problems. He has failed to carry through on several domestic campaign promises, including a pledge to send a share of the country's oil revenues to every family and to implement an anti-poverty program.

The moderate daily newspaper Etemad-e-Melli, or National Confidence, urged Ahmadinejad to change his policies if he has any respect for the vote.

"The result of the elections, if there is any ear to listen or any eye to see, demands reconsideration in policies," the paper said in an editorial Thursday.

Conservative lawmaker Emad Afroogh also called on Ahmadinejad to learn a lesson from the vote. "The people's vote means they don't like Ahmadinejad's populist methods," Afroogh told The Associated Press.

Reformist Saeed Shariati also said the results of the election were a "big no" to Ahmadinejad and his allies, who he accused of harming Iran's interests with their hard line.

"We consider this government's policy to be against Iran's national interests and security. It is simply acting against Iran's interests," said Shariati, a leader of the Islamic Iran Participation Front, Iran's largest reformist party. His party seeks democratic changes within the ruling Islamic establishment and supports relations with the United States.

Iran Forging Ahead In Iraq Without U.S. (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi
The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD — Tehran's top envoy here said there was no need for contacts with the United States aimed at stabilizing Iraq, saying that Iranians already were pursuing channels to help secure their embattled neighbor.

DOJ_NMG_0108655

Ambassador Hassan Kazemi-Qomi brushed aside recommendations of the Iraq Study Group, led by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, that the Bush administration speak to Tehran about the chaos in Iraq.

"We don't need a Mr. Baker-style proposal calling for Iran to talk with the United States about Iraq," Kazemi-Qomi said in an interview this week. "We have our own well-defined policies about Iraq. We have never waited for a Mr. Baker or someone else to offer talks."

Washington and Tehran broke formal diplomatic ties after Iranian radicals stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran during the 1979 Islamic Revolution, which toppled the country's pro-U.S. monarch and brought to power the world's first Shiite Muslim theocracy.

U.S. officials have accused Iran's government of destabilizing Iraq by providing arms, training and money to Shiite militias considered to be leading players in the civil war gripping Iraq's central provinces.

Told of Kazemi-Qomi's remarks, a State Department official in Washington accused Tehran of duplicity.

"It's not unusual for the Iranians to say all the right things, but at the same time engage in activities that are problematic, and certainly not what we would hope to see from a country expressing a desire for good neighborly relations," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The Iraq Study Group report advised the Bush administration to make diplomatic contacts with Iran to persuade it to stop supporting armed Shiite groups. The controversy surrounding the report has rekindled debate in Iraq and the region about Iran's role here.

Iranians are mostly Persians and Iraqis are mostly Arabs. Their languages are different, but the Shiite majorities in both countries share centuries-old religious and cultural ties.

Iraq's Sunni Arabs accuse Iran of employing Shiite militias to settle old scores with former Iraqi army officers and the United States. They accuse Tehran of fomenting unrest.

Kazemi-Qomi, speaking in a sitting room in Iran's ornate embassy a block from the perimeter of the U.S.-protected Green Zone, painted a drastically different portrait of Iran's role.

In a rare interview with Western media, he said that Iran maintained strong ties with Sunni as well as Shiite groups, supported the national unity government assembled by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and the reconciliation talks taking place between Iraq's squabbling factions.

Iran respects all of Iraq's tribes and political groups, Kazemi-Qomi said. "Our relations are not limited to the Iraqi Shiites."

Iran provides Iraq with refined petroleum products, 140 megawatts of electricity and access to its Persian Gulf ports, and is willing to arm and train Iraqi security forces, he said.

"We are also serious in sharing intelligence with Iraq in an attempt to identify and bust terrorist groups," said KazemiQomi, a former member of Iran's conservative Revolutionary Guard who served in his country's consulate in the western Afghan city of Herat before coming to Iraq. In May, he became his nation's first ambassador to Baghdad in more than 25 years.

Iran is helping Iraq not because it wants to remain in the good graces of Washington, but out of self interest, he said.

"Security in Iraq will strip foreign troops of any pretext to prolong their presence in the country," he said in the 30-minute interview, which was granted only after The Times submitted a list of questions. "Security in Iraq will deprive terrorists of any safe haven, and we will no longer see an influx of Iraqi [refugees] to Iran."

He brushed aside suggestions that Iran was fostering instability in Iraq, instead taking a jab at Washington's Sunni allies in the region.

Iraq's border with Iran is more secure than any of its other borders, he said.

"You can go and find a list of suspected terrorists held in Iraqi prisons. You will definitely find out that no Iranian is among them," Kazemi-Qomi said, adding that few of them are from Afghanistan or Pakistan, which are on Iran's eastern border. "I regret to tell you that the majority of these suspects come from Arab countries."

Some Western diplomats in Iraq say the Iranians are able to leave their embassy compound more easily without fear of kidnapping or street violence, and they call on their Iranian colleagues for assessments of developments in Iraq.

But a number of Iraqis suggest that Tehran exaggerates its influence in Iraq, hoping the perception of its importance will give it more leverage in its dispute with the United States and European allies over its nuclear program.

Iraq's Sunnis have long said Shiite militias linked to major political parties with Iranian ties are at least as destructive as Arab insurgents. Sunnis argue that the increasing abilities of Muqtada Sadr's Al Mahdi army and Abdelaziz Hakim's Badr Brigade reflect help from abroad.

"Who's supporting Mahdi army? And who's supporting Badr?" said Saleh Mutlak, a leader of a hard-line Sunni faction in parliament. "They seem to have a lot of money and a lot of arms. They can't do this on their own."

Mutlak noted that the Shiite militias were not linked to Sunni-dominated countries such as Jordan or Saudi Arabia.

American officials say some types of roadside bombs used against U.S. and British forces in Iraq are similar to those used by the Iranian-financed militant group Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Despite repeated allegations, neither U.S. nor Iraqi officials have presented conclusive evidence that Iran is funding or supporting Shiite militias or violence in Iraq.

"Nobody reveals details," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker. "It's just talk and accusations."

U.S. officials consider Iraqi Shiite groups with the strongest ties to Iran to be the most moderate. Sadr's late uncle, Mohammed Baqer Sadr, had close ties to the founder of Iran's theocracy, Grand Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, and founded the pro-Iranian Dawa Party, which is now led by U.S.-backed Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Hakim, who recently met with President Bush in Washington and has been trying to form a more moderate governing coalition, spent years in exile in Iran and headed an Iraqi military force opposed to Saddam Hussein that was largely created by Iran's Revolutionary Guard.

Shiite groups that were founded and grew exclusively in Iraq are considered the most disruptive. Sadr is an Arab nationalist who has never left Iraq and whose Al Mahdi army derides Hakim as a Persian bent on dividing up Iraq. The Fadila Party, another major Shiite group with few historic ties to Iran, follows a similar line.

Kazemi-Qomi said Iran respected the wishes of Hakim to have good ties to Washington.

"Icy relations between Iran and the United States have nothing to do with Iran-Iraq ties," he said.

Saner Voices In Iran (NYT)

New York Times, December 22, 2006

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran has not been having a very good month, which is good news both for the beaten-down people of Iran and for the outside world.

The populist demagogue, it seems, is not so popular with important elements of Iranian society growing uneasy over the price Iran may have to pay for his belligerent pursuit of nuclear technology. This week, Mr. Ahmadinejad's oil minister acknowledged that foreign banks were pulling back from financing Iranian oil projects because of the worsening nuclear dispute.

The clearest evidence of Mr. Ahmadinejad's troubles came in last week's elections for municipal offices and the national council that oversees the work of Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Mr. Ahmadinejad's supporters fared surprisingly poorly. The main gainers came from two very different opposition groups, one aligned with former President Ali Rafsanjani, an establishment conservative, and the other with remnants of the cautious reform movement led by former President Mohammad Khatami.

Mr. Rafsanjani, a venomous foe of Israel (with his own nuclear appetites), is so notorious for the corruption that marred his presidency that his political career had almost gone into eclipse. Mr. Khatami's followers are more high-minded, but still managed to fumble Iran's best chance for reform in decades. What distinguishes them from Mr. Ahmadinejad's supporters is their recognition that Iran exists in the real world. They understand that its future requires good relations with foreign investors, trade partners and educational institutions.

Mr. Ahmadinejad has been systematically dynamiting those relations, by defying the International Atomic Energy Agency and the United Nations and with his loathsome circus of Holocaust denial. Though meant to whip up voters, that travesty failed to save his supporters from electoral defeat.

Last week, in a remarkable show of courage, students at one of Tehran's elite universities openly denounced Mr. Ahmadinejad as a dictator and a fascist, forcing him to cut short his planned address.

Their anger had been stoked by a blatantly political purge of professors and students, a crackdown on basic personal freedoms, and worries that economic mismanagement and diplomatic provocations were blighting their future. Two weeks ago, the students chanted, "Forget the Holocaust — do something for us." Last week, one of them told a reporter: "A nuclear program is our right. But we fear that it will do more harm than good."

Indeed it would, and it is encouraging to hear from Iranians who recognize that threat. Washington needs to keep pushing for effective economic sanctions that will compel Mr. Ahmadinejad to recognize it as well.

Bickering Saudis Struggle For An Answer To Iran's Rising Influence In The Middle East (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Dec. 21 — At a late-night reading this week, a self-styled poet raised his hand for silence and began a riff on neighboring Iraq, in the old style of Bedouin storytellers.

DOJ_NMG_0108657

"Saddam Hussein was a real leader who deserved our support," he began, making up the lines as he went. "He kept Iraq stable and peaceful," he added, "and most of all he fought back the Iranians." He continued, "His one mistake was invading Kuwait."

Across the kingdom, in both official and casual conversation, once-quiet concern over the chaos in Iraq and Iran's growing regional influence has burst into the open.

Saudi newspapers now denounce Iran's growing power. Religious leaders here, who view Shiism as heresy, have begun talking about a "Persian onslaught" that threatens Islam. In the salons and diwans of Riyadh, the "Iranian threat" is raised almost as frequently as the stock market.

"Iran has become more dangerous than Israel itself," said Sheik Musa bin Abdulaziz, editor of the magazine Al Salafi, who describes himself as a moderate Salafi, a fundamentalist Muslim movement. "The Iranian revolution has come to renew the Persian presence in the region. This is the real clash of civilizations."

Many here say a showdown with Iran is inevitable. After several years of a thaw in relations between Iran and Saudi Arabia, Saudis are growing concerned that Iran may build a nuclear bomb and become the de facto superpower in the region.

In recent weeks, the Saudis, with other Persian Gulf countries, have announced plans to develop peaceful nuclear power. Saudi officials publicly welcomed the Iraqi Harith al-Dhari, whose Muslim Scholars Association has links to the insurgency, during a visit in October, and they have indicated that they may support Iraq's Sunnis over the majority Shiites with links to Iran. All were meant to send a message to Iran.

"You need to create a strategic challenge to Iran," said Steve Clemons, senior fellow and director of the American Strategy Program at the New America Foundation. "To some degree, what the Saudis are doing is puffing up because they see nobody else in the region doing so."

Yet a growing debate here has centered on how Iran should be confronted: head on, with Saudi Arabia throwing its lot in with the full force of the United States, or diplomatically, with a grand bargain Iran would find hard to refuse?

The apparent split burst into the open last week when Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Washington, abruptly resigned after just 15 months. The resignation is seen by many here as part of a long-running battle over Saudi Arabia's foreign policy.

On Tuesday, Prince Saud al-Faisal, the country's ailing foreign minister, confirmed the ambassador's resignation, citing personal reasons. Privately some Saudi officials and analysts with knowledge of the situation say Prince Turki resigned over deep differences with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the national security minister and former Washington ambassador, over how to deal with Iran.

Prince Bandar is believed to favor the tough American approach of confronting Iran, analysts say, while Prince Turki advocates more diplomatic tactics, including negotiating with Iran.

If this is the case, then the successor to Prince Turki as Saudi ambassador — Adel al-Jubeir, a foreign policy adviser to King Abdullah — is a wild card, Saudi and American officials said Thursday.

Polished and American-educated, Mr. Jubeir, 44, once worked for Prince Bandar when he was ambassador to Washington. Mr. Jubeir became well known as the public face of Saudi Arabia, defending Saudi policy after the Sept. 11 attacks, appearing on talk shows and escorting NBC's White House correspondent at the time, Campbell Brown, around town.

But Saudi officials said that Mr. Jubeir did not necessarily share Prince Bandar's opinions. "Basically, the king is putting his own man in America," one Saudi official said. "Adel will be a direct line between the king and the administration."

Mr. Clemons, whose blog, The Washington Note, first reported Mr. Jubeir's appointment on Wednesday, said Mr. Jubeir "is someone who can help de-escalate tensions between quadroons of the royal family. I don't think he necessarily brings Bandar's views on Iran to the table."

Just days before President Bush met with the Iraqi prime minister, Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the outlines of what seemed to be a new plan were made public by Nawaf Obaid, a Saudi security consultant. In an op-ed article in The Washington Post, he said that if the United States withdrew from Iraq, the Saudis would back the Sunnis "to stop Iranian-backed Shiite militias from butchering Iraqi Sunnis."

Saudi Arabia said Mr. Obaid did not speak on its behalf, and he was subsequently dismissed from his position. He is widely expected to return to the government in some capacity. And King Abdullah warned Vice President Dick Cheney during a meeting in Riyadh three weeks ago that Saudi Arabia would back the Sunnis if the Americans withdrew from Iraq and a civil war ensued.

"The possibility of having conflict is very high," said Abdelrahman Rashid, managing director of the satellite news channel Al Arabiya and a respected Saudi columnist. "Who will face the Iranians tomorrow? Just the Israelis alone? I don't think that is possible." Prince Turki, Mr. Clemons and palace insiders say, had lobbied Washington for a broader policy that eschews a military confrontation in favor of a policy that will strike Iran's interests. In effect, Mr. Clemons said, Prince Turki had sought a plan mirroring some of the recommendations in the Iraq Study Group report but with a harder edge.

"Turki is not playing nice guy at all," he said. "Essentially, the Saudis are engagers. They want to weave together a blurry ambiguity to what they want to do."

A member of the Saudi royal family with knowledge of the discussions between Mr. Cheney and King Abdullah said the king had presented Mr. Cheney with a plan to raise oil production to force down the price, in hopes of causing economic turmoil for Iran without becoming directly involved in a confrontation.

Shortly afterward, Mr. Obaid's op-ed article was published, building on earlier public comments that Saudi Arabia intends to get serious about Iran and may back Sunnis in Iraq in the event of an abrupt United States pullout. Neither Prince Bandar nor Prince Turki was available for comment for this article. An adviser to Prince Bandar said there were no divisions over policy, and many officials have been at pains in recent days to prove there is no split.

Many Saudis have grown openly critical of the country's policy on Iraq, citing its adherence to an American-centric policy at the cost of Saudi interests. More pessimistic analysts here say the country has lost significant strength and stature in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian areas, while Iran, with its populist, anti-American agenda, has benefited.

"The Saudis made a big mistake by following the Americans when they had no plan," said Khalid al-Dakhil, a professor of political sociology at King Saud University in Riyadh. "If the Saudis had intervened earlier and helped the Sunnis they could have found a political solution to their differences, instead of the bloodshed we are seeing today."

Last week, a group of prominent Saudi clerics and university professors called on the government to begin actively backing Iraq's Sunnis. The clerics described what they called a Persian-Jewish partnership besieging the Sunnis.

"There is a segment in this country that will do everything the U.S. wants," said Turki al-Rasheed, who runs a group that seeks to encourage democracy in the Persian Gulf. "But fortunately the big leaders know this whole agenda will take us to hell."

Bush OKs Law Blocking Aid To Hamas Gov't (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

President Bush signed into law a bill meant to block U.S. aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian government and ban contacts with Hamas until the militant faction has renounced violence and recognized Israel's existence.

It also creates a $20 million fund to promote democracy, human rights, freedom of the press and peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

The Bush administration stopped aid shortly after the January election victory by Hamas, which Washington considers an international terror organization. The bill Bush signed puts into law what already was administration policy.

Republican Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., sponsor of the Senate bill with Sen. Joe Biden, D-Del., said the legislation makes clear the Palestinian Authority can expect no U.S. help so long as it continues to be led by Hamas.

"The Palestinian people are ill-served by a Hamas-led government that refuses to work toward the betterment of its citizens by failing to renounce terror and work toward peace with Israel," McConnell said.

Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., ranking member on the House International Relations Committee after Congress reconvenes Jan. 4, said she was pleased the president signed the bill she sponsored in the House.

"By fixing his hand to this legislation today, President Bush has indicated that the U.S. will not, directly or indirectly, allow American taxpayer funds to be used to perpetuate the leadership of an Islamist jihadist entity like Hamas," she said.

The White House said the legislation Bush signed reflects the administration's concern over the current government's failure to renounce violence and terror, recognize Israel and respect previous agreements and obligations. Exceptions are made to provide financial support for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, who has committed to a negotiated two-state solution with Israel.

Despite the ban on official aid, the United States has provided $468 million in humanitarian aid, delivered by non-governmental organizations and in other ways that bypass the Hamas government.

Gunbattles Rage Between Hamas And Fatah (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak

AP, December 22, 2006

A fierce gunbattle broke out between Hamas and Fatah militants in Gaza City early Friday, underscoring the fragility of a two-day old truce that had largely ended factional violence there.

The street battle erupted when Hamas militiamen tried to free two kidnapped militants, including a senior member of the Islamic group. It died down after 20 minutes as Muslim clerics and other mediators worked to restore the cease-fire. Nobody was hurt despite the battle's intensity, health officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0108659

Hamas said its fighters exchanged fire with Fatah-affiliated militants behind the abductions. The fight quickly spread, drawing in guards outside the residence of Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, and Hamas militiamen guarding the home of Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar of Hamas Zahar. Abbas was not in Gaza at the time.

Meanwhile, Palestinians stepped up rocket attacks on Israel, including one that veered off course and hit a Gaza home, injuring a 2-year-old Palestinian boy sleeping in his bedroom, officials aid.

Six other rockets landed in Israel, but nobody was hurt. The barrage threatened a separate cease-fire between Israel and the Palestinians that ended months of Israeli military activity in the Gaza strip.

A minister in Olmert's Cabinet said it was time to call off the cease-fire.

"Enough restraint," Binyamin Ben-Eliezer told Israel Radio. "Israel is many things, but a suicidal state isn't one of them."

A week of factional violence in Gaza has killed 16 people and left dozens injured across Gaza before the truce took effect Tuesday night.

Hamas blamed the Thursday night kidnappings on a clan affiliated with Fatah that was trying to avenge the deaths of two its members in an earlier round of fighting.

In Friday's battle, gunmen on rooftops fired at others in the streets. The presidential guard took up defensive positions behind newly built walls of sandbags and barriers of cement blocs outside Abbas' residence.

Hamas officials said the Fatah gunmen shot at Zahar's home.

One witness said several rocket-propelled grenades were also launched. Residents said they put their children in bathtubs for protection against stray bullets. Others tucked themselves in corners for safety.

The militant group Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for some of the rockets that landed in Israel, including one that hit a community center the southern town of Sderot. The army said the rocket caused some damage but nobody was hurt.

There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack that struck the Gaza home. In the past, similar cases of Palestinians being hurt by Palestinian rockets have led to backlashes against militant groups, whose attacks against Israel are generally supported by the public.

The boy, Samir al-Masri, suffered two broken legs, said Dr. Said Judeh of Kamal Adwan hospital. The boy's 4-year-old sister and 3-year-old brother were lightly wounded by shrapnel, said their uncle, Jad al-Masri.

Abbas, a moderate, has repeatedly called for an end to rocket fire, saying they only invite harsh Israeli retaliation.

In the West Bank town of Ramallah, Abbas said he hoped to hold a long-awaited summit with Olmert by the end of the year.

"We always showed our willingness to hold this meeting with Olmert, and it's no secret that we hope it will take place before the end of this year," Abbas said at a news conference with the visiting Italian foreign minister, Massimo D'Alema. "There is progress in preparations for this meeting."

The two leaders have repeatedly expressed readiness to meet for what would be their first summit. But preparations have bogged down amid disagreements over the agenda.

Abbas wants Israel to promise to release hundreds of Palestinian prisoners. Olmert has ruled out a prisoner release until Hamas-linked militants free an Israeli soldier they captured last June. Olmert's spokesman, Jacob Galanti, said he was not aware of firm plans for a meeting.

Gaza Breathes A Sigh Of Relief As Ceasefire Holds (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, December 22, 2006

The embattled Gaza Strip breathed a sigh of relief as a truce between rival Palestinian factions took hold and president Mahmud Abbas urged all sides to consolidate the ceasefire.

No clashes between Abbas's Fatah party and the ruling Hamas movement have been reported since early Wednesday, when a four-hour gunbattle in southern Gaza City killed two Fatah loyalists hours after a new truce went into effect.

Abbas urged the rival factions to respect the truce again on Thursday, following a similar call the night before.

"I call upon my people to show responsibility and work to consolidate the calm in the Gaza Strip," he told a news conference in Ramallah. "I'm convinced that everybody wants security and civil peace."

Hundreds of people, waving the Palestinian standard, gathered in front of the parliament building in Gaza to call on the rivals to respect the truce and restart talks on forming a coalition government.

"O Hamas, O Haniya, we want a government of national unity immediately," they chanted. "Enough with the battles, we want to live in security."

Abbas's call for early elections on Saturday was roundly condemned by Hamas as tantamount to a coup and sparked four days of fierce factional battles.

DOJ_NMG_0108660

On Thursday, a militant died of wounds received during the fighting, bringing the toll from the clashes to 14. Dozens were also wounded.

But Abbas reiterated that despite his call for the early polls, he was still open to forming a coalition government with Hamas.

His spokesman Nabil Abu Rudeina told AFP, however, that no preparations have been made for a new round of talks.

A Hamas spokesman told AFP that the ruling Islamists were also favorable to dialogue and that prime minister Ismail Haniya was ready to meet with Abbas in Jordan, as suggested earlier in the week by King Abdullah II.

"We have not received an official invitation. If such an invitation is sent to us, we will accept," he said.

The latest truce announced by Abbas and Haniya late Tuesday -- after a previous ceasefire between the factions held barely for 24 hours -- came after the Palestinian president spoke by phone with Abdullah, who offered to host a meeting between the two rival leaders.

Abbas, who said he was prepared to "respond favorably" to the invitation, was due to travel to Jordan on Sunday.

The Palestinian president announced his intention to call early polls as a way to resolve a months-long standoff with the ruling Islamists after talks over forming a national unity government collapsed over Hamas's refusal to bend to the West's demands to renounce violence, recognize Israel and past peace deals.

Haniya's government has been boycotted by Israel and the West since it took office in March after a shock election win over Abbas's long-dominant Fatah, plunging the Palestinian territories into their worst ever financial crisis.

Also Thursday, Abbas said that he hoped to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert before the end of the year. It would be the first meeting between the two leaders in six months.

"Discussions on preparing for the encounter continue and we hope that it will take place before the end of the year," Abbas said.

On a visit to the region on Monday, British Prime Minister Tony Blair called for an initiative to jumpstart the Middle East peace process, in a slumber since 2000.

The following day, Olmert paid a surprise visit to Jordan, whose King Abdullah II has recently issued calls on the necessity to revive talks between Israelis and Palestinians.

Olmert touched on the issue during a phone call with US President George W. Bush on Thursday, his office said.

"The prime minister spoke to the American president on the recent developments on the Israeli-Palestinian track and on the ways to move forward," it said.

U.S. Readies Security Aid Package To Help Lebanon Counter Hezbollah (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

The United States is preparing a package of almost $500 million in aid for Lebanon's military and police to help strengthen security forces, part of almost $1 billion in total U.S. assistance to help the beleaguered Lebanese government, according to U.S. officials.

The package is part of an effort by the United States, France, Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and others to shore up the Lebanese security forces so they can eventually extend their control over the entire country for the first time since civil war erupted there in 1975. It is also designed to strengthen the government's hand over the influence of Hezbollah, Lebanon's last militia and a force often better-equipped than the country's army, the sources said.

After Iraq, Lebanon has become the primary battleground for influence between the United States and Iran.

Tehran is still smuggling arms into Lebanon across the Syrian border in violation of U.N. resolutions, although the shipments to its Hezbollah allies appear to have diminished somewhat since before the war with Israel last summer, U.S. officials say.

The U.S. aid package is being prepared even as a new report by the International Crisis Group, set to be released today, warns that the Middle Eastern country is at risk of "renewed collapse" unless domestic and international players work to achieve political compromise.

"Street politics have replaced institutional politics," said ICG analyst Patrick Haenni. "Civil war remains unlikely. But with heightened polarization, intensified [religious divisions] and heavy outside interference, it is again becoming thinkable."

Although U.S. officials say the final details have to be worked out, the aid package is likely to be divided about evenly among training, spare parts and ammunition. The leadership training will probably be done by contract workers rather than by the U.S. military. U.S. Army trainers attempted to retrain and reform the Lebanese Army in the early 1980s, but they achieved limited results because of sectarian divisions and other problems in the military.

DOJ_NMG_0108661

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told editors and reporters at The Washington Post last week that strengthening the Lebanese armed forces is a major priority of the United States and the region's "mainstream" Arabs. Stability, particularly along the southern border with Israel, has been dependent on about 15,000 U.N. peacekeeping forces, most of whom were deployed after the summer war between Hezbollah and Israel.

"Ultimately . . . one of the most important things that you can do is to strengthen the Lebanese armed forces not -- I think probably not to replace the United Nations forces for some time, but to be more capable themselves of defending the country and providing a stable platform," Rice told The Post. "Everybody understands that the future of Lebanon is very important."

Rice said the package will require further consultations with Congress to win funding. The other half of the $1 billion is likely to be for reconstruction through USAID as well as debt relief, U.S. officials said.

The aid increase is one of the largest outside Iraq and Afghanistan in recent years. Until this year, U.S. aid for Lebanese security forces hovered around $2 million to $3 million a year, and training has been limited to 60 to 100 military officers, U.S. officials say. This year, it has increased to roughly $44 million.

The train-and-equip package includes about 300 Humvees that the United States has pledged to deliver by the spring, with up to another 700 Humvees coming during the year, the sources said.

U.S. Negotiator Urges North Korea To End Standoff On Financial Curbs (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 21 — The top American envoy at arms control talks here on Thursday called for North Korea to negotiate the dismantling of its nuclear weapons program without insisting that the United States first lift financial restrictions it had placed on North Korea.

The envoy, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, said North Korea's determination to link nuclear disarmament with the financial restrictions was an obstacle to solving what had become a "very urgent problem" since North Korea tested a nuclear device on Oct. 9.

"We have made it very clear that we consider the financial issue quite separately from the denuclearization issue," Mr. Hill said. "I would rather not obscure that problem by talking about finances."

After four days of six-nation talks in the Chinese capital, it was clear that North Korea's top priority was to restore its access to the international banking system.

The United States angered North Korea in September 2005 when it began investigating Banco Delta Asia, a bank in the Chinese territory of Macao that handled transactions with North Korean government companies and other entities linked to it.

The investigation has sharply curtailed North Korea's access to the international financial system because other banks have cut ties with North Korea rather than risk becoming the target of similar action.

Some foreigners doing business in North Korea say the inquiry has effectively imposed financial sanctions on the country, limiting its ability to trade and earn hard currency.

"They have had strict instructions from their capital that they can't engage officially on the subject of six-party talks until they have the Banco Delta Asia issue resolved," Mr. Hill said. "I have made it very clear, I am not a Banco Delta Asia negotiator."

Kenichiro Sasae, Japan's chief envoy to the talks, said North Korea's refusal to disarm before the United States lifted the financial restrictions meant that no agreement on dismantling the weapons program was expected, The Associated Press reported.

"The situation remains severe, and there is no prospect for a breakthrough," he said. "North Korea's claims, and its position on financial issues are very firm, and that is the biggest cause of the difficulty."

Mr. Hill said that he expected Friday to be the final day of the talks and that he planned to leave Beijing on Saturday. He said no date had been set for further negotiations.

North Korea restarted the talks only when the United States agreed in October to open separate negotiations into the Banco Delta Asia investigation. Alongside the six-nation talks this week, government financial experts from North Korea and the United States held two days of discussions on the Macao bank without reaching any agreement.

N. Korea Balks At Weapons Discussion (WP)

By Edward Cody

The Washington Post, December 22, 2006

BEIJING, Dec. 21 -- North Korea is refusing to engage in negotiations on ending its nuclear weapons program until the United States lifts punitive measures imposed to halt Pyongyang's alleged money-laundering operations, the chief U.S. negotiator said here Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0108662

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, after what he described as a frustrating day of discussions, said he would give the Chinese-sponsored talks another day in hopes that the North Korean negotiators received last-minute instructions from Pyongyang to change their stand. But in any case, he said, he will be making plane reservations to head back to Washington on Saturday.

Hill's comments indicated there has been little progress -- and little hope of any -- in the latest round of on-and-off discussions designed to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program in return for diplomatic recognition and economic aid. Adding to the pessimism, Japan's chief negotiator, Kenichiro Sasae, described the talks as stalemated and said, "There is no prospect for a breakthrough," the Associated Press reported.

The six-party talks -- which involve the United States, North Korea, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia -- resumed Monday after a 13-month boycott by North Korea over the U.S. Treasury Department's blacklisting of Macau-based Banco Delta Asia. U.S. officials alleged that the bank was being used to inject counterfeit $100 bills and drug money from North Korea into the financial system.

Under pressure from China, the North Korean government agreed Oct. 30 to return to the talks. In return, the United States agreed to parallel discussions on the punitive measures against Banco Delta Asia and its North Korean account holders. A Treasury Department team met Tuesday and Wednesday with North Korean banking officials and set more meetings for January in the United States.

But since the nuclear talks opened Monday, Hill said, North Korean negotiators have been under "strict instructions" not to engage in official discussions on the nuclear dispute until the banking measures are lifted. This has prevented progress on the main subject, which he described as concrete steps by North Korea to take down its nuclear weapons program, as it pledged to do in an agreement in principle reached in September 2005.

"The purpose of being here was to discuss the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula," Hill said. "I want to emphasize I'm not here to talk about [Banco Delta Asia]. That's not what I do."

At a news conference in Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the talks must remain focused on the issue of denuclearization.

"Diplomacy sometimes takes time, but we should not be diverted somehow by an issue that is clearly in another lane and is clearly being dealt with in a way that the North Koreans themselves asked that it be dealt with," Rice said.

Although the North Koreans have cited the U.S. banking measures as the main obstacle to nuclear negotiations, several diplomats said the overriding issue is whether North Korea genuinely has decided to forgo nuclear weapons. The question is particularly relevant, they said, since the North Korean government tested a nuclear device Oct. 9 and subsequently declared itself a nuclear power.

In public statements, North Korea has said it needs the nuclear weapons because it faces a hostile policy from the United States. Dropping the measures against Banco Delta Asia, a pro-North Korean newspaper in Japan suggested Thursday, would be proof that the Bush administration is willing to end the hostility and thus would make nuclear negotiations possible.

Rice Rejects Tying Nuclear Talks To Currency Issue (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, December 22, 2006

Pyongyang wants curbs lifted on its accounts in Macau bank

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice yesterday rejected a North Korean attempt at the six-nation nuclear talks in Beijing to link the negotiations to U.S. financial sanctions imposed last year for purported money laundering and counterfeiting of U.S. currency.

With the latest round of talks slated to end today, the North Korean delegation said it would not negotiate the nuclear issue until curbs on a Macau bank holding North Korean accounts are lifted, diplomats said.

"We've been very clear that these are two separate issues," Miss Rice told reporters in Washington after a meeting with Canadian Foreign Minister Peter Mackey.

"We cannot be diverted from what we need to do in the six-party talks, which is to have the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula," she said.

U.S. Treasury officials met Tuesday and Wednesday with North Korean representatives to discuss the financial sanctions, also in Beijing, but in a different building from the venue of the nuclear talks.

Christopher Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator at the six-party talks, said he planned to leave China on schedule tomorrow, even if the talks remain deadlocked.

"We are trying as hard as we can to get this done," he said. "But we are not prepared for a situation where somehow we pretend that they are doing things and they pretend to disarm and we pretend to believe them. This has to be real."

DOJ_NMG_0108663

The penalties on Macau's Banco Delta Asia (BDA), which the Bush administration called a "willing pawn" in the North's illicit activities, were put in place in September 2005.

U.S. officials say the bank was used by North Korea to distribute high-quality $100 bills it printed.

"They have had strict instructions from their capital that they cannot engage officially on the subject of six-party talks until they have the BDA issue resolved, and I made very clear, I'm not a BDA negotiator," Mr. Hill said of the North Koreans.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the United States could not close its eyes to its currency being counterfeited, as well as to other illicit activities, even if that might help the nuclear negotiations. The two issues should not be mixed, he said.

The United States, China, Japan, South Korea and Russia are trying to persuade the North to dismantle its nuclear programs.

In a Sept. 19, 2005, statement issued at the last round of six-party talks, Pyongyang agreed in principle to end its nuclear pursuits in exchange for a series of incentives, including energy, economic aid, security guarantees and normalized relations with the United States.

But major disagreements remained on the timing and sequencing of the steps.

On Tuesday, Miss Rice said the United States favors a Chinese plan with "sets of actions" both sides must take over a period of at least several months.

The plan would not "marry up every little step," because "the North Koreans are masters" of blaming others for what they fail to do, Miss Rice said. The North Koreans would have to "demonstrate early on" that they are serious about dismantling their nuclear program.

Mr. Hill, assistant secretary of state for Asian and Pacific affairs, said yesterday he was not ready to set a date for a future round of negotiations, but he held out a glimmer of hope that a last-minute deal could be brokered.

"These rounds — you have to judge them by the end," he said. "It's hard to judge them in the middle."

U.S.: N. Korea Not Serious In Nuke Talks (AP)

By Alexa Olesen

AP, December 22, 2006

The U.S. envoy to talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear weapons program said Friday that there were no signs of a breakthrough and accused the communist state of not being serious about the negotiations.

Asked if there were any indications of a breakthrough ahead of the last day of talks Friday, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill said, "No, I am not aware of any."

After four days of negotiations in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, the North has refused to get into substantive discussions on its atomic weapons, envoys said. Instead, the North has complained about the U.S. blacklisting a Macau bank, where the regime allegedly laundered money to help fund its weapons programs.

"When the DPRK raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want but they know they can't have, another day it's something we said about them that hurt their feelings," Hill said. DPRK stands for the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, the North's official name.

"What they need to do is to get serious about the issue that made them such a problem ... their nuclear activities," he said.

Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae delivered a similar assessment late Thursday. "The situation remains severe and there is no prospect for a breakthrough," he said. "North Korea's claims and its position on financial issues are very firm and inflexible and that is the biggest cause of the difficulty."

Sasae said Friday that delegates at the closing meeting would would consider dropping the current format involving six countries.

"There will be opinions questioning the credibility of the six-party talks," Sasae said, without elaborating. He did not say what alternative formats would be proposed, if any.

In comments Thursday, Hill said the financial restrictions were a defense against weapons proliferation, warning Pyongyang would find itself further economically isolated if it doesn't disarm.

He said that the North Korean delegation had apparently been instructed to resolve the financial issue before talking about nuclear weapons.

While insisting the financial restrictions were separate from the six-nation arms talks, he acknowledged they were a means to defend against nuclear proliferation.

"We need to protect ourselves in a variety of different ways and we need to make sure that the international financial system is not easily available to countries that are involved in nuclear weapons programs," Hill said Thursday evening.

DOJ_NMG_0108664

"There's one thing that anyone involved in denuclearization can predict, that as long as (the North Koreans) stay in this nuclear business, they're going to have more and more and more financial problems," he said.

In Washington, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said North Korea had given the United States no reason to believe it is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in the disarmament talks, she said in an Associated Press interview Thursday.

American and North Korean experts consulted on the financial restrictions for two days this week in Beijing separately from the nuclear talks, but made no breakthroughs and were possibly meeting again next month in New York.

Hill noted he had traveled five times to Beijing since the nuclear test to lay the groundwork for this week's negotiations, which he has said should focus on implementing a September 2005 disarmament pledge by North Korea.

"I would like to see them engage a little more in what we are talking about," he said of the North Koreans. "We've done a lot of work in the last few weeks and we'd like to see the (North Korean) delegation match that amount of work and show they're looking at the proposals."

Hill would not talk about specific incentives the U.S. has offered the North at this week's talks which include China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas but the earlier agreement outlines possibilities such as diplomatic recognition, aid and economic cooperation.

The North has maintained it needs nuclear weapons because of the "hostile" policy of the United States, citing issues including the financial campaign, criticism of North Korea's human rights record and U.S.-South Korean joint military exercises.

Meanwhile, a South Korean lawmaker said Thursday there were signs North Korea could conduct another nuclear test.

Rep. Chung Hyung-keun of the main opposition Grand National Party, a former intelligence official, said North Korea dug two underground tunnels at a mountain in the country's northeast and used one of them for its earlier nuclear test.

"There has been brisk activity since this month" at the other tunnel, he said.

NKorean Nuclear Talks Set To End In Deadlock (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

Six-nation talks aimed at ending North Korea's nuclear program have appeared set to end in deadlock, with the chief US envoy accusing the reclusive nation of stubbornly sticking to impossible demands.

Officials and delegates involved in the talks said they had broken down over North Korea's insistence that US financial sanctions against it be lifted before substantive discussions begin on Pyongyang giving up its nuclear arms.

But the United States refused to buckle, maintaining that the sanctions, which were imposed for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting, were a law enforcement issue and not related to North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice reiterated in Washington Thursday that the sanctions -- which led to the freezing of North Korean funds in a Macau bank -- were "clearly in another lane" to the six-party talks.

"We cannot be diverted from what we need to do in the six-party talks, which is to have the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula," Rice said. The talks involve China, North and South Korea, the United States, Japan and Russia.

The chief US envoy to the talks, Christopher Hill, said in Beijing on Friday that the onus was on North Korea to make some constructive proposals after the United States had put forward its positions earlier in the week.

"I think what they need to do is get serious about the issues that have made them such problems," Hill told reporters.

When asked about the difficulty of dealing with the North Korean delegation this week, the normally ultra-polished diplomat allowed some frustration to seep into his remarks.

"When the DPRK (North Korea) raises problems, one day it's financial issues, another day it's something they want that they know they can not have, and another day it's something that is said about them that hurts their feelings," he said.

"It's one thing after the other."

Hill said he was scheduled to fly home on Saturday, and with the talks officially due to end on Friday, it appeared certain that this week's forum would achieve very little.

Japan's chief envoy, Kenichiro Sasae, said late Thursday that "no progress" had been achieved due to North Korea's recalcitrance.

"Basically, North Korea has maintained its hard position... we are not seeing any signs of flexibility," Sasae told reporters.

Sasae called North Korea's refusal to budge on its demands "extremely regrettable and unfortunate."

North Korea came to the negotiating table this week emboldened by its first-ever atomic test on October 9.

Aside from the US financial sanctions issue, it listed a wide range of demands that had to be met before it would consider disarming.

These included the lifting of separate United Nations sanctions imposed on North Korea after its atomic test, as well as aid to build a nuclear reactor for power and that the United States drop its "hostile" policy against it.

DOJ_NMG_0108665

The United States had insisted that North Korea take initial steps to prove it was heading along the path towards disarming before receiving any concessions.

All of these negotiations, however, were thrown into the background as North Korea kept the focus on the US financial sanctions.

Nam Sung-Wook, a North Korea expert and professor at Korea University in Seoul, said Friday the talks had been bound to fail from the start.

"North Korea has been only interested in the lifting of sanctions while the US expected to discuss the nuclear issue," Nam said.

"They have had different dreams on the same bed... it was a destined course. It was no surprise."

'Concerted Front' (WSJ)

By B.R. Myers

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

No country today is as misunderstood as North Korea. Journalists still refer to it as a Stalinist or communist state, when in fact it espouses a race-based nationalism such as the West last confronted during the Pacific War. Pyongyang's propaganda touts the moral superiority of the Korean race, condemns South Korea for allowing miscegenation, and stresses the need to defend the Dear Leader with kyeolsa, or dare-to-die spirit -- the Korean version of the Japanese kamikaze slogan kesshi. The six-party talks are therefore less likely to replicate the successes of Cold War détente than the negotiating failures of the 1930s. According to early reports from Beijing, the North Korean delegation appears more confident than ever. It has clearly been emboldened not only by its accession to the nuclear club, but by the awareness that Seoul will continue providing food and financial support no matter what happens.

This support is not meant to expedite unification, which South Koreans are happy to put off indefinitely. Nor has it much to do with concern for starving children; by now everyone knows where the "humanitarian" aid really goes. No, the desire to help North Korea derives in large part from ideological common ground. South Koreans may chuckle at the personality cult, but they generally agree with Pyongyang that Koreans are a pure-blooded race whose innate goodness has made them the perennial victims of rapacious foreign powers. They share the same tendency to regard Koreans as innocent children on the world stage -- and to ascribe evil to foreigners alone. Though the North expresses itself more stridently on such matters, there is no clear ideological divide such as the one that separated West and East Germany. Bonn held its nose when conducting Ostpolitik. Seoul pursues its sunshine policy with respect for Pyongyang.

The relationship between the Koreas can therefore be likened to the relationship between a moderate Muslim state such as Turkey and a fundamentalist one like Iran. The South Koreans have compromised their nationalist principles in a quest for wealth and modernity, and while they're glad they did, they feel a nagging sense of moral inferiority to their more orthodox brethren. They often disapprove of the North's actions, but never with indignation, and always with an effort to blame the outside world for having provoked them. (The same is true of moderate Islam's response to fundamentalist terrorism.) To be sure, there was public anger at Kim Jong Il when his nuclear test made stock prices drop in Seoul, but it dissipated the moment the U.S. began talking sanctions. Seoul has since made clear that the nuclear issue will have no significant effect on its sunshine policy. This earns it no goodwill from the North, mind; between soft-liners and hard-liners, sympathy can only go in one direction.

The ideological landscape of the peninsula defeats the reasoning that led to the six-party talks in the first place. North Korea is not a communist country with ideological and sentimental reasons to listen to China and Russia; it is a virulently nationalist state that distrusts all the other parties at the table. And though the rhetoric of a "concerted front" against North Korea has proved to be just that, it has sufficed to heighten South Korea's sense of solidarity with the North. This will continue to mean plenty of aid money for Kim Jong Il with which to build weapons. The U.S. has urged Beijing to bring more pressure to bear on the North. But if America can do nothing with its own ally, it can hardly expect the Chinese to do more with theirs.

Tensions Flare Over Custody In Rape Case In Philippines (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 21 — The commander of American forces in the Pacific announced Thursday that he had canceled a huge annual military exercise with the Philippines in a dispute over custody of a marine lance corporal convicted of raping a local woman.

DOJ_NMG_0108666

The commander, Adm. William J. Fallon, said he also would halt aid and reconstruction programs carried out by the American military in the Philippines until he was confident that the troops' legal rights would be protected under bilateral agreements governing visiting United States forces.

The bilateral pact that governs American forces in the Philippines, the Visiting Forces Agreement, requires that American military personnel be held in American custody during criminal proceedings, including appeals, until a final resolution of the matter.

But after Lance Cpl. Daniel Smith was convicted of rape and sentenced early this month, a judge ordered him held in local police custody even though his case went straight to appeal.

The rape case, which concluded Dec. 4 with a conviction and a sentence of 40 years in prison, has tested relations between the countries and challenged the validity of the bilateral agreement. It also has sharpened a political division between Filipinos with nationalist resentments and those with affection for the former colonial power — or at least those who cite the economic and security benefits of ties to the United States.

In a telephone interview from Pacific Command headquarters in Hawaii, Admiral Fallon said that he already had ordered the withdrawal of an aid team in the Philippines that was assessing needs of a typhoon-ravaged area. He said that he also had canceled a number of visits by American ships.

American military officers said the Philippines armed forces supported the legal position of the United States, and the political officer at the Philippine Embassy in Washington agreed Thursday that the United States' position was correct.

"Regarding the Corporal Smith case, the United States government and the executive branch of the Philippines government are on the same side of this issue," said Patricia Paez, the embassy's political officer here. "We believe Corporal Smith should be in the custody of the U.S. Embassy because of the terms and conditions of the Visiting Forces Agreement."

Ms. Paez said that responsibility for the dispute rested with the judicial branch of her government, and that her nation's president and Parliament were constrained on ending the dispute.

"Just like the United States, we have a separation of branches of government that are co-equal and independent," Ms. Paez said. "We are making our best efforts to make sure the provisions of the Visiting Forces Agreement are enforced."

In a decision with repercussions for regional counterterrorism efforts, Admiral Fallon said he had canceled the field exercise portions of this year's bilateral military exercise, which was to begin in coming weeks and was to involve 4,700 American military personnel and 3,000 from the Philippines.

The annual exercise has taken on greater significance since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, as the Philippines battles internal terrorist threats.

"I'm not the judge of the guilt or innocence of the individual," Admiral Fallon said. "The issue is only one of custody. I am responsible to our people in uniform. I have to have guarantees that I can trust their safety to an international agreement."

The cancellation of the exercise and other American military visits to the Philippines jeopardizes disease-prevention programs, water-purification efforts, and more broadly, counterterrorism cooperation between the nations.

The rape case dates from Nov. 1, 2005, when, according to testimony at the trial, four marines from Okinawa who were in the Philippines for training took a 22-year-old woman from a bar where they had met to a van, where one of them raped her.

During the trial, Lance Corporal Smith did not deny having sex with the woman, but said it was consensual. The court heard testimony that the woman was so drunk that she could not have agreed to sex, with one witness saying Lance Corporal Smith had carried her to the van.

Indian Leader Frets About U.S. Nuke Deal (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

India's prime minister told President Bush on Thursday that his country is worried about details of a landmark nuclear pact with the United States, under which the U.S. agreed to supply the Indian power industry with fuel and technology.

Bush signed legislation Monday approving the deal, which reverses 30 years of U.S. atomic policy.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh told President Bush in a phone call that India has "some concerns" about the nuclear pact, according to a statement by Singh's office.

The Indian government has not elaborated on its concerns, but Congress included a nonbinding clause in the new law directing the White House to certify that India is cooperating in efforts to force Iran to abandon its nuclear programs.

The clause has been criticized by Singh's leftist allies and opposition parties, who claim it violates India's sovereignty. They warn it could lead to efforts to cap, or even roll back, India's cherished nuclear weapons program.

The nuclear deal has been praised as the cornerstone of an emerging partnership between India and the U.S., and is unlikely to be rejected by New Delhi.

DOJ_NMG_0108667

Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for Bush's National Security Council, said Bush and Singh "agreed on the importance of completing the necessary remaining steps" and implementing the agreement.

But the alarm in India over the language in the pact regarding Iran shows, perhaps, how far the countries have to go as they try to overcome decades of mistrust.

Singh, in his statement, added that "many" of India's concerns have already been addressed in the president's signing statement.

The White House has frequently blunted the impact of unwelcome provisions in federal legislation by issuing so-called signing statements.

In them, the president has laid out which parts of laws he has just signed he will follow and which he will not. The use of these statements, greatly increased during the Bush presidency, has been criticized by members of Congress.

During Thursday's phone call, which lasted about five minutes, the two leaders "expressed the hope that remaining concerns will be addressed in the next stage of negotiations" on the nuclear cooperation deal, the statement from Singh's office said.

Earlier this week, Singh told parliament that his government would do nothing that violates national interest.

As Fighting Rages In Somalia, Government Claims A Victory (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

ZANZIBAR, Tanzania, Dec. 21 — The transitional government of Somalia, which for several months had been rapidly losing territory to Somalia's growing Islamist movement, claimed victory on Thursday in the first major confrontation between the sides.

"We have overrun their troops," said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed.

United Nations officials confirmed heavy Islamist casualties in the fighting, which began Wednesday and continued Thursday.

The Islamist fighters — many of them lightly armed teenage boys, the officials said — were mowed down by transitional government soldiers backed by the Ethiopian Army, the most powerful military in the region.

"The Islamists attacked, they retreated and then they made the mistake of running into an open field," a United Nations official said on the condition of anonymity. "After that, it was one shot, one kill."

United Nations officials estimated that dozens of Islamists had died. The Islamists denied suffering humiliating defeats. On Thursday, the Islamist clerics who rule Mogadishu, Somalia's capital, ordered schools closed so more children could be sent to the front lines.

After initially playing down the fighting, Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the leader of the Islamist forces, announced Thursday over national radio that Somalia was at war and said, "All Somalis should take part in this struggle against Ethiopia."

Ethiopia still denies that many of its soldiers are in Somalia, but has acknowledged sending military advisers. Ethiopia has cause to fear a strong Islamist movement next door. Christians have led Ethiopia for centuries, but about half of its population is Muslim, as are the vast majority of Somalis, and the Muslim areas have become more restive.

The fighting started early Wednesday as hundreds of Islamist fighters attacked the transitional government's forces from two sides.

Witnesses said the transitional government, with help from Ethiopia, had repelled the Islamist advance in Daynunay, a town outside the government's base in Baidoa. But in Diinsoor, near Baidoa, the battles were closely contested, and on Thursday, witnesses said each side continued to pound away with artillery, mortars and antiaircraft guns on pickup trucks.

Somalia has been in a state of anarchy since 1991, when the government collapsed in clan warfare. Backing the transitional government was an attempt by donor nations to help bring order, but more Somalis support the Islamists.

The two sides have talked of sharing power. European Union diplomats shuttled between Baidoa and Mogadishu on Wednesday. "The leaders on both sides want dialogue, but we're not necessarily dealing with homogenous groups that always obey their leaders," a European official said Thursday.

Somali Islamic Leader Issues War Decree (AP)

By Salad Duhul

AP, December 22, 2006

Somalia is in "a state of war," the country's Islamic leader said Thursday, as bodies lay in the streets of strategic villages where U.N.-backed government troops fought advancing Islamic forces.

DOJ_NMG_0108668

The clashes threaten to spiral into a major conflict in this volatile region, sucking in Ethiopia and its bitter rival Eritrea, which is accused of supporting the Islamic group. Analysts believe Ethiopia may soon raise the stakes by deploying attack helicopters in support of the government.

An Associated Press photographer saw 19 bodies of Islamic fighters in Moode Moode, a town nine miles from the government garrison town of Baidoa, where fighting had taken place Wednesday.

Three Islamic fighters were captured. One, 25-year-old Aweys Hassan Ma'alim, said he had been forced to fight by the Islamic movement. Another, Adan Abdullahi Mohammed, said he wanted to fight Ethiopians and "die for the sake of Allah in jihad."

Meanwhile Sheikh Ibrahim Shukri Abuu-Zeynab, a spokesman for the Islamic courts, said they had now captured the town of Idale, 37 miles southwest of Baidoa, and killed 200 Ethiopian troops. The claim could not be verified.

"All Somalis should take part in this struggle against Ethiopia," Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, an Islamic leader, told The Associated Press.

Three days of clashes between the Islamic fighters and government forces, newly trained by Ethiopian troops, have left more than 100 people dead.

Ethiopia denies its forces are fighting, but says it has deployed several hundred military trainers in support of the transitional government.

On Wednesday, Aweys told an EU envoy that he was willing to return to peace talks with the U.N.-backed Somali government, but on Thursday, he said "the country is in a state of war."

In Ethiopia, the government said Wednesday that the Islamic group was warmongering and not interested in peace. "Ethiopia has exerted efforts as it will do so for the peaceful resolution of the problem in Somalia," the statement said.

EU envoy Louis Michel, in response to a question about Eritrea and Ethiopia's involvement, said, "Somalia is suffering because some are using Somalia as a battlefield for other issues." Both countries fought an unresolved border war in 1998.

Somalia's deputy defense minister Salad Ali Jelle told reporters that 71 Islamic fighters had been killed and 221 injured so far during clashes near Baidoa.

Three government troops were killed and seven injured, Jelle said.

Separately, witnesses in the town of Bur Haqaba, which is controlled by the Islamic movement, reported hearing mortars, anti-aircraft missiles and rocket-propelled grenades being fired Thursday.

After returning from Somalia late Wednesday, Michel said skirmishes were likely to continue, but said both sides had broadly agreed to ease tensions and hold new talks in Sudan.

The interim government holds only a small area around the central town of Baidoa. The Islamic militiamen control the capital, Mogadishu, but have also fanned out across most of southern Somalia.

Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991.

US Embassy Accuses Congolese Company Of Massive Aid Theft (AFP)

AFP, December 22, 2006

The US embassy in Brazzaville accused a private Congolese company of stealing more than 5,800 tonnes of humanitarian aid worth more three million dollars with the help of a local magistrate.

The embassy accused import-export company Super-Market of having "illegally removed" the aid at the start of December from warehouses of a transit company in Pointe-Noire, the country's economic capital, according to a statement received by AFP.

The US aid mostly contained supplies for locals.

US ambassador Robert Wesiberg told journalists that Super-Market had acted in complicity with prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou, from Pointe-Noire in the southwest of Congo.

"It's him, the prosecutor Narcisse Ngoulou, who authorized Super-Market to remove the humanitarian aid from the warehouses," Wesiberg said.

Ngoulou declined to comment on the accusation to AFP.

"We're asking the government to do everything to remove this aid from Super-Market, so that it can reach people following normal procedures," Wesiberg said, adding that so far all attempts to obtain help from ministries had been in vain.

The US ambassador on Wednesday boycotted a ceremony organized by the UN Development Programme during which an appeal for 28 million dollars' aid for Congo in 2007, sponsored by the US diplomat, was due to be launched.

"Ambassador Wesiberg considered it pointless to take part in launching the reinforced appeal due to the lack of resolution on the question of humanitarian aid illegally removed from Pointe-Noire port," the embassy said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0108669

US NGO International Partnership for Human Development receives US humanitarian aid to Congo and selects a company to buy the products and sell them on at a low price to locals.

Eight Congolese companies put in tenders for the allegedly stolen goods, including Super-Market, but the company Sadi was chosen almost two months ago. The embassy said that Sadi never received the goods.

Turkmen Leader's Death Fuels Energy Fears (FT)

By Isabel Gorst

Financial Times, December 22, 2006

The sudden death on Thursday of Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmenistan's autocratic and eccentric president, has raised the threat of instability in a Central Asian republic that is an important energy supplier to Europe.

Niyazov, known as Turkmenbashi or Ruler of the Turkmens, left the former Soviet republic he ruled for more than 20 years impoverished, internationally isolated and with no obvious successor. He died of a cardiac arrest, Turkmen state television reported. He was 66.

His death is expected to spark both an internal power struggle and a tussle for influence between Russia, China and the US over a country with the world's fifth-largest gas reserves.

Any disruption to gas exports from Turkmenistan via Russia to Europe – mostly to Ukraine – could affect the continent's energy security. Analysts said, however, there were no immediate signs of unrest that could threaten supply.

Niyazov had himself appointed president for life by Turkmenistan's parliament in 1999. The oddball leader admitted this year to suffering from heart disease.

According to the republic's constitution, the parliament's speaker should have taken power. But he was blocked on Thursday as justice officials opened a criminal probe into him. A deputy prime minister was instead named acting president.

Several former and exiled Turkmen officials said they were considering returning to the country. But Nurmukhamad Khannamov, a former Turkmen ambassador to Israel who is now an opposition leader, warned it might be too dangerous.

Mr Khannamov said the opposition would call for democratic elections and an investigation into Niyazov's huge wealth.

"Niyazov had several foreign bank accounts and we will insist that the money is given back to the people," Mr Khannamov said.

A US embassy spokesman in Ashgabat, the capital, said the US hoped for "a peaceful, smooth constitutional succession".

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, said Moscow hoped that "continuity in our relations is ensured".

Niyazov, a former head of the Turkmen communist party, crushed or exiled opposition in the republic bordering Afghanistan, Iran and Uzbekistan, and left it with no free media.

Turkmens, most of whom live in poverty, were forbidden contact with the outside world.

The governors of Turkmenistan's five main provinces have all been sacked since a failed grain crop this autumn. Last year Niyazov sacked most of the top oil and gas officials accusing them of taking bribes from unnamed foreign companies.

Saparmurat Niyazov, Turkmen Leader, Dies At 66 (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Dec. 21 — Saparmurat Niyazov, the authoritarian president of Turkmenistan, died unexpectedly today, the Turkmen government said, raising questions about succession and stability in a nation that is an essential supplier of energy to Europe.

Mr. Niyazov, who gave himself the name Turkmenbashi, or the Head of All Turkmen, had ruled his sparsely populated nation since becoming chairman of the Turkmen Communist Party in 1985, when the country was a Soviet republic.

He weathered the Soviet Union's collapse, becoming the president of independent Turkmenistan, pushing through a constitution that concentrated power in his hands and embarking upon a megalomaniacal career as president for life.

While other post-Soviet countries suffered disorder and, in some cases, revolutions or war, Mr. Niyazov lorded over Turkmenistan with a sprawling security apparatus and a fantastically well-developed personality cult. He was 66 and had suffered from heart disease, but never publicly anointed a successor.

Intrigue immediately followed his death. According to the Turkmen constitution, upon the death of a president, the chairman of the Majlis, the country's lower house of parliament, becomes the acting president.

But in Ashgabat, the Turkmen capital, power passed instead to a deputy prime minister, Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, and the state news agency announced that the prosecutor general had opened a criminal investigation against the Majlis chairman, Ovez Atayev.

DOJ_NMG_0108670

The news agency also said that the People's Council, the upper house of parliament, would hold an emergency meeting on Tuesday. Under the constitution, the council selects presidential candidates who would stand in a special election in two months, according to Michael J. Denison, a professor at the University of Leeds who specializes in Turkmen politics.

Turkmenistan, located in Central Asia next to Iran, Afghanistan and the Caspian Sea, contains many of world's largest natural gas fields and provides gas to Russia and European countries.

Foreign governments and energy analysts expressed misgivings about the expected succession battles ahead, and what they might mean for stability and the intense international competition for the gas reserves.

Russia's foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, and Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, encouraged Turkmenistan at a joint appearance in Moscow to conduct a legal and orderly succession.

"We hope that the transfer of power will remain within the framework of the law," Mr. Lavrov said, according to Interfax.

Goldman Sachs sent a note to investors saying the abrupt political change "throws into question the country's political stability and control over its substantial natural gas exports."

It added that with Mr. Niyazov gone, the United States and perhaps the European Union might compete with Russia and push Turkmenistan to consider new export routes and weaken the position of Gazprom, Russia's state-controlled gas monopoly. Gazprom relies in part on Turkmen gas to meet commitments to its customers.

There was no publicly clear front-runner to follow Mr. Niyazov's long reign, and speculation ranged from insiders of Mr. Niyazov's circle to exiled opposition leaders, at least two of whom said that they planned to return home.

Mr. Niyazov's son, Murat, was also a potential candidate, in part because in 2005 Mr. Niyazov arranged for the deletion of a line in the constitution requiring the president to be an ethnic Turkmen.

Mr. Niyazov was married to a Russian woman; their son is half Turkmen. The constitutional change allowed Murat Niyazov to qualify for the post, although it was not clear whether he had the support to overcome a reputation as a playboy with little backing from the country's five principal tribes.

Acting President Berdymukhammedov is related to Mr. Niyazov. But Mr. Denison said in an e-mail message that he is a relatively unknown political figure and "probably not a long-term successor."

One opposition figure, Khudaiberdy Orazov, a former chairman of Turkmenistan's central bank, said the appointment of Mr. Berdymukhammedov and the criminal charges against the Majlis chairman signaled that the country's security services were influencing events.

The security services, he said, successors to the K.G.B., played a large role in Mr. Niyazov's rule and would try to select a president of their choosing. "We've been afraid of this, because having lots of blood on their hands, they are a force that does not want democratic rule," he said by telephone from Sweden, where he lives in exile.

Inside Turkmenistan, a country largely closed to Westerners, there were signs of official mourning.

Holiday decorations were removed from the streets of the capital. State television showed a portrait of Mr. Niyazov against the sounds of the funeral march from Chopin's Piano Sonata No. 2, according to a resident of Ashgabat reached by telephone.

Such somber pomp was hardly universal, and critics of Mr. Niyazov recalled a dictator who created an almost otherworldly totalitarian state.

Mr. Niyazov forbade independent news media and opposition parties, jailed rivals or drove them to exile, and imposed his name, words and image on all manner of public discourse and life. His face appears on Turkmen currency. His name, given to streets and buildings, is in such abundant local use that it replaced the word January on the official Turkmen calendar.

His pronouncements, many of them disconnected from the normal affairs of state, were sometimes strange enough to assume an irreverent life on the Internet. He banned video games, gold teeth, opera and ballet, and once encouraged his people to chew on bones — good, he said, for their teeth.

It was the sort of declaration that made him the most bizarre dictator in a region dominated by autocrats, but was also a small part of his political canon. The Ruhnama, his semi-autobiographical book of philosophy, poems and instructions for moral living, is required reading in colleges and schools, and is displayed throughout the country, including in mosques.

In Prague, Yovshan Annagurban of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty's Turkmen Service said it was difficult to predict what course Turkmenistan would take now, after suffering decades of repression that reach back to the Soviet Union and became even stranger in Mr. Niyazov's time.

"The problem is he destroyed everything," he said. "He corrupted everything and everyone around him. People at the top as well as ordinary people do not trust anyone and everyone."

Turkmenistan Leader's Death May Spur Struggle (WSJ)

MOSCOW -- The death of the reclusive dictator of Turkmenistan could spark a fierce struggle between Russia and the West for influence over a country with the world's fifth-largest natural-gas reserves.

Under Saparmurat Niyazov, who died at age 66, Turkmenistan was largely a political and economic pariah, engaged only by Russia and, more recently, China. But his death could revive Western interest in the nation's huge natural resources, especially now amid growing jitters about energy security.

"This could unlock Turkmenistan's potential as an energy supplier," said Christof Van Agt, a Central Asian expert at the International Energy Agency in Paris. "You're going to have a lot more attention focused on its role in Caspian energy."

Russia will probably have the edge in any "Great Game"-style jockeying for influence over Turkmenistan. President Vladimir Putin has long nurtured close ties to the Turkmen leadership, and in September Russia's natural-gas monopoly OAO Gazprom concluded a deal with Mr. Niyazov that essentially locked up exports of Turkmen natural gas for three years.

But some analysts say a new leader might try to renegotiate natural-gas export prices or seek alternatives to Gazprom, whose imports of Turkmen gas help the company meet domestic needs and its obligations to foreign customers like Ukraine. Any change could tighten supplies in Russia and affect European consumers.

The death of Mr. Niyazov, who had a history of heart disease, could also revitalize Western-backed efforts to open up new transport routes for Central Asian gas. The U.S. has pushed a plan for a pipeline under the Caspian Sea that would originate in Turkmenistan and bypass Russia. But Western companies said they couldn't agree on terms for the project with the eccentric Mr. Niyazov.

"The problems of Turkmenistan have been directly related to Niyazov, and now that he's out of the picture, that creates a lot of opportunities," said Zeyno Baran, director of the Center for Eurasian Policy at the Hudson Institute in Washington. "The question is, though, who is going to take advantage of those opportunities? Is it going to be the Russians? Or the Europeans and the Americans?"

Mr. Niyazov frequently purged potential political opponents, even those within his own family, leaving no obvious successors. In a sign that the post-Niyazov power struggle has already begun, Turkmenistan's State Security Council named Deputy Prime Minister Kurbanguli Berdymukhamedov acting president, even though under the constitution, the speaker of Parliament was supposed to assume the job. The Security Council said it couldn't appoint the speaker because a criminal investigation had been opened against him.

Mr. Berdymukhamedov, 49, was a confidant of Mr. Niyazov and one of the few people in government to survive repeated purges. But some people expect him to face strong challenges from other competing factions in the leadership, including the security forces.

"So much of the country's political and economic life was invested in the personality of Niyazov himself that there's a possibility of serious infighting and instability now that he's gone," said Michael Hall, director of the International Crisis Group's Central Asia project. "There are a lot of lucrative assets to fight over."

Some Central Asian experts say a worst-case scenario is civil unrest and even the breakup of the country along regional and tribal lines. But others disagree. "There may be a fight under the carpet between people at the highest level of power, but the people won't be involved," said Nagia Badykova, a former Turkmen government official who now lectures on international affairs at George Washington University.

Mr. Niyazov's 21-year rule was defined by a bizarre personality cult and the region's most oppressive political regime. He destroyed all domestic opposition after his motorcade came under fire in an alleged attempted coup in 2002. Afterward, opposition activists and their families were arrested.

After Niyazov Dies, Nation At Crossroads (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

He was, by his own decree, the "Father Of All Turkmen," and his death Thursday leaves an energy-rich, strategically situated swath of Central Asia without an heir apparent — and potentially at the heart of a global tussle between Russia, China and the United States.

President Saparmurat Niyazov, who died at age 66, ruled Turkmenistan for more than two decades with imperial eccentricity — naming towns, mosques and even the days of the week after himself, crushing opposition and requiring children to read his spiritual ruminations daily.

The former Soviet republic — which lent support to the U.S.-led war on terror — now faces a deeply uncertain future.

Some analysts were already predicting the vacuum could spark a new "Great Game" in Central Asia, similar to the struggle for supremacy in the region among imperial powers in the 19th century. At the least, the world's major powers will be watching and maneuvering for influence in the country that neighbors Iran and stretches from the petroleum-rich Caspian Sea to the border of chaotic Afghanistan.

"It's obvious that a serious war for influence in Turkmenistan will begin between Russia and the United States — and added to that will be serious attempts by Iran and the Islamic world to come into this country's political space," said Eldar Namazov, an analyst in Azerbaijan.

The fate of Turkmenistan carries high stakes because of its huge natural gas fields and substantial oil reserves, and its status as an island of stability in a volatile region.

Although Turkmenistan is a member of the Commonwealth of Independent States, a loose grouping of former Soviet republics, its foreign policy has been determinedly neutral — one of its state-run papers is called "Neutral Turkmenistan."

Still, Niyazov helped Washington in its campaign in Afghanistan, allowing overflights by coalition planes. President Bush expressed condolences Thursday, saying: "We look forward to continuing to expand our relations with Turkmenistan, to a bright future for that country and to a government that provides justice and opportunity for its people."

The announcement of their leader's death sent the capital, Ashgabat, into quiet shock.

New Year's decorations on the streets were removed and liquor stores ordered shut. The military was put on heightened alert, but there were no signs of increased military or police presence in the city.

Niyazov's death is "comparable to a shock the Soviet Union felt after Stalin's death," Vyacheslav Nikonov, head of the Moscow-based Politika think tank, was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

Niyazov created an extraordinarily elaborate cult of personality, similar to that around North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il.

Niyazov banned opera and ballet, and railed against lip-synching and car radios. He declared himself "Turkmenbashi" — Father of All Turkmen — and renamed a seaport, the month of January and facilities throughout the country that way.

He also tried to show an affable side. This month he grinned in pleasure as he was greeted by actors dressed as mythological characters at an amusement park named in his honor.

Like Stalin, his dominance left no room for an apparent successor. He is survived by a wife, daughter and son — but analysts say there is little chance of a dynastic succession.

Within hours of his death, Turkmenistan appeared to be showing signs of political infighting. Although the constitution requires that the parliament speaker be named acting president until elections can be held, the State Security Council named the deputy prime minister instead — saying the parliament speaker had been indicted for corruption.

Deputy Prime Minister Kurbanguli Berdymukhamedov pledged to "continue to go the political course of the great leader" in remarks soon after being named acting president.

All political figures in Turkmenistan were loyal to Niyazov, but the country's politics are seen as factional and clan-driven.

If an orderly succession doesn't occur, opposition figures who have long lain low could see an opening. But most of the main opposition figures live in exile and it was unclear if they would be allowed to return.

"We are ready to take part in developments there ... But first we must receive guarantees that our activity there will be made possible," said opposition leader Bairam Shikhmuradov, who lives in Moscow.

Shirin Akiner, a Central Asia specialist at Britain's Royal Institute for International Affairs, said Islamists in Afghanistan may see Niyazov's death as a chance to expand their influence.

Turkmenistan's 5 million people are overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim, but it is not clear how many are observant. Under Niyazov, the government was officially secular, but it encouraged an officially approved version of Islam. The country is home to Central Asia's largest mosque — named "The Spirit of Turkmenbashi."

Any other form of Islam was repressed and the country showed little sign of the religious radicalism that emerged in other ex-Soviet Central Asian states.

But "as new authorities will try to replace the ideology of Niyazov's personality cult with something else, they might try to use Islam to some extent as a substitute," said Eduard Poletayev, a political analyst in Kazakhstan.

Niyazov, who lost all his immediate family to war and earthquakes by age 8, became communist boss of Turkmenistan in 1985 while it was part of the Soviet Union, remaining in power following the 1991 Soviet collapse.

His cult of personality included authorship of the "Rukhnama," a book of spiritual guidance that became required reading for children. Earlier this year, he said he had asked Allah to ensure that anyone who read the "Rukhnama" three times would go directly to heaven — and he appeared to have little doubt his request would be honored.

Niyazov's visage adorned the country's currency and statues of him were put up throughout the arid, impoverished land, including a golden one in the capital that rotated to follow the sun's path. His face was even featured on some vodka labels and on canisters of tea.

What will become of his iconic presence is unclear.

Maybe it will disappear "in some barbaric way, with the burning of his portraits and demolition of his monuments, (or) maybe gradually like after Stalin," said Poletayev.

Turkmenistan Leader's Death Leaves Vacuum (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW — Turkmenistan's President Saparmurad A. Niyazov, an eccentric leader who ruled his country with an iron hand, died suddenly Thursday, triggering a scramble for power in the gas-rich Central Asian state.

Niyazov, who used the name Turkmenbashi, or "father of all Turkmens," was 66. State television said he died of a heart attack.

In an apparent sign of an immediate power struggle, the country's security council announced the opening of a criminal investigation against the speaker of parliament, Ovezgeldy Atayev, who under the constitution was in line to become acting president.

Instead, the council named Deputy Prime Minister Gurbanguly Berdimukhamedov, 49, to the post. Under the constitution, a presidential election must be held within two months, and the acting president cannot be a candidate.

Turkmenistan has large natural gas reserves and is a major supplier to Western Europe. The gas is piped first to Russia, which then resells it. If political turmoil in Turkmenistan disrupted the flow to Russia, Gazprom, the Russian gas monopoly, might be unable to meet its commitments, the Russian news agency Interfax reported.

Turkmen authorities praised Niyazov's long rule in a statement announcing his death. "The glorious years … confirmed his heavenly faculty to foresee, and his ability to determine priorities," they said. "His unique abilities in the art of leading the nation revealed his talent as a diplomat and a wise and humane person."

Turkmenistan, which is mostly desert and slightly larger than California, has a population of 5 million, most of them Muslim. Any opposition to Niyazov was severely repressed, meaning there is no clear successor.

Niyazov encouraged an extravagant personality cult. He renamed the months of January, April and September after himself, his mother and the Ruhnama, a history and spiritual guide he is said to have written.

In Ashgabat, the capital, a revolving 35-foot golden statue of Niyazov is perched atop the giant Arch of Neutrality, a symbol of his policy of remaining largely isolated to avoid the potentially dominating influences of neighboring Russia, Uzbekistan and Iran. The statue's arms are raised to welcome the sun at dawn and bid it farewell at dusk.

Some observers said a struggle over political succession might ultimately be linked to competition between the West and Russia for control of Turkmenistan's energy resources.

"It is known that Turkey and the United States are making vigorous attempts to pursue their interests in Turkmenistan, primarily its oil and gas sector," Leonid Ivashov, vice president of the Academy for Geopolitical Problems, a Moscow think tank, told Interfax. "If Russia chooses a passive role, it may further weaken its positions."

Opposition rejoices

Several of Turkmenistan's exiled opposition leaders said they would quickly try to return home.

"It is a great joy for all of us … that he has freed the country from himself," Avdy Kuliyev, a former foreign minister who is now an opposition leader, said in a telephone interview from Norway. "We are planning to come back to Turkmenistan in the nearest future…. We want to guide our people in a different way.

"Certainly Niyazov's supporters who are present in the country would like to continue this same policy, possible slightly changing it," Kuliyev said.

"As for us, we want an absolutely different policy. We want people to get freedom so they could decide themselves on their future."

Turkmen authorities quickly tightened entry rules, with visas no longer available at airports even for those holding official invitations to visit the country, Interfax reported. Citing a law enforcement source in Kazakhstan, another neighboring country, the news agency also said that Turkmenistan's armed forces had been put on combat alert.

Niyazov's funeral was set for Sunday, and the country entered a period of official mourning. Streets and markets in Ashgabat fell silent, New Year's decorations were removed, and flags were at half-staff, Interfax said.

Niyazov, born Feb. 19, 1940, was orphaned as a child. His father died in World War II and the rest of his immediate family died in an earthquake that hit Ashgabat in 1948. He rose through the Communist Party and became the party boss of Turkmenistan in 1985, when it was still part of the Soviet Union.

President for life

DOJ_NMG_0108674

After Turkmenistan gained independence in 1991, Niyazov won election the next year with an official 99.5% of the vote, in balloting outsiders deemed neither free nor fair. The People's Council, a handpicked body of loyalists, named him president for life in 1999.

Vitaly Ponomaryov, director of the Central Asia program at Memorial, a human rights group in Moscow, said Niyazov's determination to keep all power in his hands meant he not only left no clear successor, but left no one of political strength in the government.

"There is not a single strong political figure in Niyazov's camp," Ponomaryov said. "Once someone's position and role increased, then, let's say within one or two years, that person was jailed. As a result, there is no real leader in the current government in Turkmenistan. Those who had connections, money or influence were removed from power."

Ponomaryov predicted that some of these ousted former officials would make a bid for power at the same time exiled opposition leaders tried to return.

"Many of these people who worked in governmental structures enjoy support among some governmental groups," he said. "Those people are also well connected with different clan groups."

Exiled opposition leaders have some influence because their views have been carried in Turkmen-language broadcasts of U.S.-sponsored Radio Liberty, Ponomaryov said.

"Today, especially in this transitional situation, all the major countries and the whole world have a unique chance to bring pressure on Turkmenistan, which in its turn might be effective enough to help promote democratic reforms in this country," he said.

Kuliyev acknowledged that Turkmen authorities might try to keep opposition leaders from returning, but indicated the opposition was searching for ways to circumvent any ban.

"To some extent we rely on the United States," he said. "We want a real state to be built on democratic principles, such as freedom of speech and respect for human rights."

After A Tyrant, What Next? (WP)

Washington Post, December 22, 2006

MOSCOW -- Although the official statement yesterday on Turkmenistan's president spoke of his "divine foresight," not even this dictator could foresee his own death or what will happen to his country afterward.
