TERRORISM NEWS:

Court Case Challenges Power Of President (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

Military Tribunals' Legitimacy at Issue

Seized by U.S. forces in Afghanistan and imprisoned at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Osama bin Laden's former chauffeur is now seeking victory over President Bush in a new arena: the Supreme Court.

In oral arguments Tuesday, an attorney for Salim Ahmed Hamdan will ask the justices to declare unconstitutional the U.S. military commission that plans to try him for conspiring with his former boss to carry out terrorist attacks.

Significant as that demand is, its potential impact is much wider, making Hamdan's case one of the most important of Bush's presidency. It is a challenge to the broad vision of presidential power that Bush has asserted since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

In blunt terms, Hamdan's brief calls on the court to stop "this unprecedented arrogation of power." Just as urgently, the administration's brief urges the court not to second-guess the decisions of the commander in chief while "the armed conflict against al Qaeda remains ongoing."

The case may not produce a frontal clash between the judiciary and the executive -- if the court decides that a recently enacted federal law on military commissions deprives it of jurisdiction to rule on Hamdan's case. Yet another possibility is that the court could reach an inconclusive 4 to 4 tie because Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. had ruled on the case while he was on a federal appeals court and must sit out now.

But if the court fears to tread on such difficult ground, it has given no sign of that. It has refused the administration's invitation to dismiss the case for lack of jurisdiction before hearing arguments, and, perhaps more important, it has already refused to defer completely to the president in two previous terrorism-related cases.

"There are so many issues in the case -- whether the president was authorized by the Constitution, or a statute, to set up the commissions -- right down to exactly how to fit this kind of a war into the existing laws of war," said Richard Lazarus, a law professor at Georgetown University who specializes in Supreme Court litigation. "Most cases have two or three or four issues. This one has 10 or 12, which makes it very hard to handicap."

Whether designating an American citizen as an "enemy combatant" subject to military confinement, denying coverage under the Geneva Conventions to detainees at Guantanamo Bay, or using the National Security Agency to eavesdrop on domestic communications, Bush has said that the Constitution and a broadly worded congressional resolution passed three days after Sept. 11, 2001, empower him to wage war against terrorists all but unencumbered by judicial review, congressional oversight or international law.

Those assertions emerged in Bush's Military Order No. 1 of Nov. 13, 2001, which established the commissions and set off one of the first political debates in the United States over terrorism after two months of relative unity after the attacks.

The administration wanted a tough-minded alternative to the civilian court system that the Clinton administration had used against terrorists. Yet the swift and certain punishment that supporters of the commissions expected has not materialized. Though 10 of the 490 terrorism suspects currently held at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay have been designated for trial, not a single case has been decided.

From the outset, the commissions have been plagued by questions about their fairness and workability. Critics argued that the commissions were flawed because, as Hamdan's brief, written by Georgetown University law professor Neal K. Katyal, puts it, they would try suspects "for crimes defined by the President alone, under procedures lacking basic protections, before 'judges' who are his chosen subordinates."

After lengthy internal debates, the administration modified the commissions, requiring that trials be public and that defendants be presumed innocent until proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

But that did not persuade critics who pointed out that the executive branch would still be the only one deciding who is an "unlawful enemy combatant" eligible for trial in the first place.

Critics also argue that the Geneva Conventions require that each detainee should be given an individual hearing, with access to the federal courts through habeas corpus.

Historically, the courts have been reluctant to take on presidents during wartime. As a result, Lazarus said, Hamdan's supporters "need to make it clear there is a reason not to trust" Bush with unchecked power. That reason, Lazarus noted, may come from the allegations of torture at Guantanamo Bay and at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq, which surfaced in 2004 and are discussed extensively in briefs on Hamdan's side.

Several members of the court are especially sensitive to international opinion, which has generally seen Guantanamo as a symbol of U.S. excesses in the war against al-Qaeda. The court has been bombarded by friend-of-the-court briefs urging it to think about the impact of the Hamdan case on the image of the United States abroad.

Two years ago, the Supreme Court ruled 6 to 3 that federal law gave U.S. courts the power to hear the prisoners' challenges to their detention at Guantanamo Bay. In a separate case involving an American citizen held there, a plurality of justices noted that the court would not give the president "a blank check" on national security matters.

Hamdan's attorneys say that neither the broadly worded Sept. 14, 2001, House-Senate resolution that endorsed the use of force against al-Qaeda nor older statutes give Bush the clear legislative approval he needs to set up the commissions. They also contend that the commissions violate the Geneva Conventions, which, they say, are enforceable by U.S. courts and entitle Hamdan to the same kind of trial a U.S. soldier would get from a court-martial.

The rules of the tribunals, which allow evidence that "would . . . have probative value to a reasonable person," provide no guarantee against the use of evidence gathered through torture, Hamdan's supporters say.

In response, the Bush administration notes that military commissions have a long history in war and were contemplated by the Sept. 14, 2001, resolution.

But the administration's brief, written by Solicitor General Paul D. Clement, also says that "even if Congress's support for the President's Military Order were not so clear, the President has the inherent authority to convene military commissions to try and punish captured enemy combatants in wartime -- even in the absence of any statutory authorization."

As for the Geneva Conventions, they are not enforceable by U.S. courts and do not apply to Hamdan because al-Qaeda is a terrorist network that has not signed the conventions and regularly violates them, the administration says.

So far, the administration has prevailed. Last year, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, one of whose members was Roberts, upheld the administration's position, overruling a decision in Hamdan's favor by the U.S. District Court in Washington.

After the Supreme Court agreed to hear Hamdan's appeal of the D.C. Circuit's ruling, Congress stepped in.

The Detainee Treatment Act (DTA), enacted in December, reinforces the president's authority under the Sept. 14 resolution, the administration says. By modifying the rules related to the commissions, the measure implicitly accepts their legitimacy, the administration says.

The DTA stripped federal courts of jurisdiction over habeas corpus petitions from the Guantanamo Bay detainees "pending on or after" the date of its enactment -- and it provides an alternative military process for reviewing their enemy combatant status, to be followed by appeals to the D.C. Circuit court. Under the law, that court is the exclusive venue for appeals of military commission verdicts.

On Jan. 12, the administration asked the Supreme Court to dismiss the Hamdan case, arguing that it is covered by the "pending on or after" phrase. The proper time for his constitutional challenge is after his trial, the administration argued.

But Hamdan's attorneys contend that the DTA was a compromise intended to apply only to new cases, not to those that had already been filed. At a minimum, it does not provide a clear enough statement of congressional intent to deny Hamdan and others a day in court, they say.

The case is Hamdan v. Rumsfeld , No. 05-184. A decision is expected by July.

Bush's Powers Again Under Review By Court (AP)

By Gina Holland

His wartime powers undercut once before by the Supreme Court, President Bush could take a second hit in a case in which Osama bin Laden's former driver is seeking to head off a trial before military officers.

At stake is more than whether Salim Ahmed Hamdan, after nearly four years at the Navy prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, goes on trial for war crimes before a special military commission.

Analysts say if the high court rejects Bush's plan to hold such trials for the first time since the aftermath of World War II, it could rein in the president's expanded powers in pursuing and punishing suspected terrorists.

In addition to special military trials for Hamdan and others, the Bush administration since the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, has claimed it has the authority to eavesdrop on telephone conversations without court oversight, aggressively interrogate foreigners and imprison people without giving them traditional legal rights.

Hamdan was one of hundreds of people captured during the 2001 U.S.-led war that drove the ruling Taliban from power in Afghanistan. The native of Yemen denies that he is a terrorist and claims he took the driving job to provide for his young family.

Hamdan's appeal, set for arguments Tuesday, is one of the biggest cases of the court's current term, the first for Chief Justice John Roberts. He, however, will not participate in the Hamdan case. Last year, Roberts was on a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that ruled unanimously against Hamdan.

It is that ruling that the Supreme Court now is reviewing.

With Roberts withdrawing from the case, the high court could split 4-4, leaving the appeals court ruling in place. A ruling is expected before July.

"The stakes are very high for this administration because it has predicated all of its policies in this war on terror on the principle that the president as commander in chief cannot be constrained by Congress or the courts," said Scott Silliman, a former military lawyer who teaches at Duke University.

"If the court in any way limits presidential authority with regard to military commissions, it will spill over into other areas of his authority in this new type of war," Silliman said.

A second element of Bush's terrorism-fighting measures is under scrutiny as the Senate Judiciary Committee on Wednesday examines the president's domestic eavesdropping program, which The New York Times disclosed in December.

Since shortly after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the National Security Agency has monitored the international communications of people inside the United States when their calls and e-mails are believed to be linked to al-Qaida. The government normally has to get a court order to monitor domestic communications; Bush signed an executive order directing the NSA to conduct the operations without a judge's approval.

Hamdan may find hope for his appeal from a pair of 2004 rulings in which the justices rejected the president's claim of authority to seize and detain terrorism suspects while indefinitely deny access to courts or lawyers.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote at the time that "a state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens."

The moderate O'Connor has been replaced by a Bush appointee, Samuel Alito, who could play a prominent role in the Hamdan case. As a former Reagan administration lawyer he could be sympathetic to White House arguments.

Hamdan is one of about 490 prisoners being held at Guantanamo Bay as what the administration terms as enemy combatants. Only 10 of them have been charged with a crime.

The administration had kept secret the identities, home countries and other information about the men, who were accused of having links to the Taliban or al-Qaida. But this month the Pentagon released details after losing a lawsuit filing by The Associated Press under the Freedom of Information Act.

The importance of the Hamdan case is illustrated by the dozens of filings on both sides.

The issues it raises are complex, with claims based on the Constitution, federal laws and treaties.

The administration hopes to get Hamdan's appeal dismissed altogether, on grounds that Congress last year stripped the Supreme Court's authority to consider it. A law passed late last year bars Guantanamo prisoners from filing petitions to fight their detentions; the administration claims this law retroactively voided hundreds of lawsuits.

Hamdan's lawyers dispute the government's claim that the law is retroactive and they say the administration has set up a sham system to try Hamdan on a charge of conspiracy to commit war crimes, murder and terrorism.

"The president's assertion of absolute dominion over human subjects and trial and punishment cannot be reconciled" with the Constitution, lead lawyer Neal Katyal, a Georgetown law professor, told justices in a filing this month.

Accused terrorists can receive the death penalty in the military trials, although the government says it is not seeking that against Hamdan.

In his filings, the administration's Supreme Court lawyer, Paul Clement, cites the "savage attacks" of Sept. 11 and the president's response. Clement portrays Hamdan as a trained terrorist who served as a personal bodyguard to bin Laden.

The justices said they will release an audio of the argument after it concludes, something done only for high-profile cases.

The case is Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, 05-184.

Justices To Hear Constitutional Challenge To Special War Courts (KRT)

By Carol Rosenberg

DOJ_NMG_0021777

Five years ago, Salim Hamdan was living all but anonymously in Taliban-ruled Afghanistan, driving a Toyota pickup for Osama bin Laden on his Kandahar farm.

On Tuesday, the tale of the wiry Yemeni with a fourth-grade education will take center stage at the U.S. Supreme Court, as lawyers argue a landmark case over whether President Bush had the power to create a special war court to try Hamdan.

An extraordinary case for extraordinary times, Hamdan's constitutional challenge claims that the court the Pentagon constructed is unfair and un-American. He's joined in his argument by a celebrated cast of supporters - a former secretary of state, retired federal judges and U.S. military officers, and international jurists - in a clash that's not lost on him.

"Are we going to be making history?" he asked his military lawyer, Navy Lt. Comdr. Charles Swift, as the case headed for the high court.

"I don't want to make history," he added. "I just want to go home."

At issue is not whether the U.S. has the power to detain the 36-year-old father of two at the Navy base, where he'll have been held four years by the time the justices rule this summer.

The core of the challenge is in which American court, if any, Hamdan can face an American military charge of conspiracy as part of al Qaida's world-terrorism network.

Government lawyers say Congress gave President Bush the power to create a war court in its use-of-force resolution after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. They say Hamdan should challenge the new panel system only after he's tried at Guantanamo Bay, and only if he's convicted.

Hamdan's advocates argue that he deserves to face an already established U.S. court, not the first American war-crimes tribunal since World War II. They also argue that the U.S. breached international treaty obligations by denying Hamdan the possibility of prisoner-of-war status under the Geneva Conventions.

"Not only do these military commissions betray our commitment to the rule of law, they damage our reputation abroad and undermine our ability to promote the global rule of law as an antidote to terrorism," Yale Law School Dean Harold Hongju Koh says in a brief for former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and 20 other former U.S. diplomats.

Hamdan's case not only tests the limits of presidential powers over the 10 Guantanamo captives facing trial by a tribunal of American military officers, called a military commission. Legal experts say his case also has implications for the nearly 500 "enemy combatants": whether and how they can turn to civilian courts to intervene on their behalf in Pentagon detention processes.

Said lawyer Scott Silliman, a retired Air Force colonel who now runs the Duke University Center on Law, Ethics and National Security:

"Hamdan gives the court the opportunity to define this war on terrorism, to give us a more current view of the constitutional authority of the president in this new type of war and the tools available to him in fighting it."

Bush advocates argue that America is facing an enemy unrivaled in its history, so it's crafted a court that shields classified information from public view to allow prosecutions in a war with no end in sight.

Air Force Col. Moe Davis, the chief prosecutor, noted the quandary of waiting until the war on terrorism ends to try captives: "Damned if you do, damned if you don't," he said.

In a sense, Hamdan started down his roundabout road to the Supreme Court on Nov. 13, 2001, when President Bush signed an order authorizing the defense secretary to detain foreigners indefinitely - and ordered him to prepare military commissions to try some of them.

Across the globe, when U.S. bombs blasted Afghanistan, Hamdan spirited his pregnant wife and 2-year-old daughter to safety in Pakistan.

Hamdan's attorney says Hamdan was returning a borrowed car when Afghan warlords captured him and handed him over to American forces, for a bounty that U.S. agents were offering for foreign Muslims, he believes.

By the time Washington inaugurated its offshore interrogation center with an 8,000-mile air bridge to Cuba in January 2002, Hamdan was already in American hands.

He was taken to Cuba four months later, manacled and masked in a 27-hour trip long after the Bush administration had declared captives there "unlawful combatants," not prisoners of war.

Hamdan told his attorney Swift that he wasn't a war criminal. He described himself as a privately paid $200-a-month driver who worked at bin Laden's farm; his livelihood vanished when terrorists crashed those planes into the Pentagon and World Trade Center.

On Feb. 10, 2004, Swift told his client's story for the first time: The man who would challenge President Bush's war powers was an alleged foot soldier, not an al Qaida architect.

Rather than enter a guilty plea, Swift sued the United States by filing a habeas corpus petition in U.S. District Court in Washington.

Defense attorneys from all four military services - the Army, Navy, Air Force and Marines - call the war court unconstitutional. They charge that the Bush administration crafted an unfair court rather than try Hamdan before civilian judges in the United States or at a U.S. military court-martial, which would offer him the same rights and protections as an American soldier.

"It's a separation of powers, checks-and-balances issue," said Marine Col. Dwight Sullivan, the chief commission defense counsel and a former lawyer with the American Civil Liberties Union.

Sullivan cautioned that, whatever the high court decides, it's not being asked to rule in the larger debate over whether the United States should close its prison camp at Guantanamo.

The chief justice of the United States, John G. Roberts, is recusing himself because as an appeals court judge he was part of the panel that unanimously upheld Bush's war powers in the Hamdan case.

Republican Sens. John Kyl of Arizona and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina argue that Hamdan's case shouldn't be before the high court in the first place. They championed a measure that Congress passed late last year stripping Guantanamo captives of pretrial civilian review.

Now the court must decide how much of that law stands, too.

The Bush administration originally argued that, as enemy combatants held offshore, Guantanamo captives couldn't sue in civilian court. The Supreme Court rejected that notion in June 2004, opening the federal courts to review the case of any detainee who sues for his freedom.

"Guantanamo Bay is a military base in a foreign country," the senators write in their brief, echoing the government's position. "The military's mission of winning battles cannot be encumbered with a requirement that every enemy captured abroad be given a lawyer and a hearing."

A Bellwether For The Power Of A President (NYT)

By Jonathan Mahler

TAKE a good look at the prosecution of Zacarias Moussaoui, an admitted member of Al Qaeda who may soon be sentenced to death, after pleading guilty to conspiracy in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks. It may be the last time a suspected terrorist will enjoy the full panoply of rights — a jury of civilians, an independent judge, the guarantee of an open trial — accorded to criminal defendants in the United States.

Instead, the government plans to try accused terrorists before special tribunals in which the judge is appointed by the Pentagon, the jurors are military officers and certain canonical rights in our civil system — like the right to be present at all sessions of the trial — are absent. The future of the tribunals will be up to the Supreme Court, which will rule on their legality in Salim Hamdan v. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, which is to be argued on Tuesday.

Salim Hamdan, born in Yemen, was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001 and has confessed to working as a driver for Osama bin Laden. Like Mr. Moussaoui, Mr. Hamdan was charged with conspiring with Al Qaeda to commit acts of terrorism. The critical distinction, though, is that Mr. Hamdan was charged as a war criminal, meaning he was designated for prosecution before a military tribunal rather than in a federal court. His lawyers, led by Neal K. Katyal, a professor at Georgetown University, have sued to block the tribunal; hence Hamdan v. Rumsfeld.

There is much more at stake here than the fate of one detainee. Mr. Hamdan's case will test a broader strategic shift in the American approach to fighting terrorism. By treating terrorism as an act of war rather than a crime, the Bush administration is hoping to end an embarrassing string of botched criminal terrorism prosecutions, including those of Mr. Moussaoui — where the judge recently rebuked a government prosecutor for improperly coaching witnesses — and Sami al-Arian, who is accused of being an Islamic Jihad activist and who was acquitted of various charges by a Florida jury several months ago.

The administration is also trying to ease the burdens of proof on its prosecutors, whom the government believes are at a disadvantage in the post-Sept. 11 era, when the emphasis is on prevention of terrorist attacks rather than their prosecution. "If you are serious about stopping people before things take off, then necessarily your evidence is going to be more ambiguous," said Andrew McCarthy, the lead prosecutor in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

More significant, President Bush would be extending his commander-in-chief authority to the war on terror. What this means in a practical sense is that he and his successors would be vested with perhaps greater wartime powers than any previous president. Unlike prior wars, limited by duration and geography, the war on terror is global and potentially endless. Indeed, terrorism will last well beyond the defeat of radical Islam.

IS the war on terror really a war? The logical parallel to Sept. 11 would appear to be Pearl Harbor, but Bruce Ackerman, a Yale law professor and author of "Before the Next Attack," argues that the two are not the same. "Pearl Harbor was an act of violent incursion that everybody recognized augured more violent acts of incursion because there was a Japanese fleet out there," he says. "We don't know whether we're looking at a powerful and well-organized enemy, or some terrorists who just happened to get lucky."

Yet the alternative — defining terrorist attacks simply as crimes — doesn't seem quite right either. After all, it was no coincidence that a target of the Sept. 11 hijackers was the headquarters of the United States military. Terrorists are capable of inflicting damage on a scale beyond the reach of any criminal enterprise. Anyway, the United States has responded to the attacks with military force; it seems a little late to debate whether the country is at war.

What are the implications of an unending war with no geographical boundaries? In one of their briefs, Mr. Hamdan's lawyers warn of "a dangerous and unprecedented expansion of executive authority" that would be tantamount to a re-allocation of constitutional power. A precedent that gave the president sweeping authority to fight the war on terror, they argue, could become "the edifice upon which any number of actions could be grounded, even against U.S. citizens." The president could assert his commander-in-chief powers to permit electronic surveillance without a wiretap, for instance, or to detain indefinitely an American citizen arrested in Cleveland.

Draconian as this sounds, advocates of the administration's position point out that warrantless surveillance and protracted detentions of suspected enemy combatants, even if they are American citizens, pale in comparison with the suspensions of civil rights deemed necessary in previous wars. During World War I, for instance, an American was sentenced to 10 years for questioning the "good faith" of our ally. His crime was making a film that depicted British atrocities in the Revolutionary War.

The court has traditionally deferred to the president in wartime, then gradually stripped the office of any newly accrued authority once the hostilities ended. Given the indefinite nature of the war on terror, though, this pattern no longer seems relevant.

The last time a president tried to make the case that the theater of war should not be confined to the area of hostilities, he was rebuffed: during the Korean War, the Supreme Court barred Harry S. Truman from seizing steel mills to prevent a strike. Of course, Truman could not point to a recent attack on American soil to help make his case.

In short, the Hamdan case presents the Supreme Court with two historically unappealing choices: to police the president's ability to make war or to allow executive authority to go unchecked.

9/11 Trial Reveals Troubles Then, And Ahead (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — Harry Samit was green. He'd been an FBI agent just two years. He was assigned to a terrorism task force, but in the bureau's field office in Minneapolis — about the least likely city in America for stumbling across an extremist.

Michael Rolince was a coat-and-tie supervisor at the FBI headquarters in Washington. For nearly 30 years, he'd worked for the bureau, handling organized crime, drugs, intelligence. Now he was running the international terrorism operations section. That made him a regular at classified meetings in the White House Situation Room.

Out in Minneapolis, Samit was tipped that an inexperienced student at a local flight school had plunked down cash to learn to fly jumbo jets. The young agent pounced. The student, a French Muslim, was arrested, and Samit worked desperately to get him to talk.

The matter was duly reported to the terrorism operations center in Washington, but Rolince heard about it in just two brief hallway chats with other bureau officials. The ops center was already tracking 70 threats; only a tiny fraction had anything to do with airplanes. There were at least 100 buildings in New York and Washington alone that Rolince viewed as "logical targets."

The time was August 2001, and history was about to drop the hammer. The man Samit collared and tried to warn Rolince and others about was Zacarias Moussaoui, now on trial for his life as the only Sept. 11 conspirator to be prosecuted in the United States. And the story of the new FBI agent and his veteran superior in the weeks before Sept. 11 — as it is emerging in Moussaoui's sentencing trial — is more than a tragedy of fumbled opportunities.

And it is a lesson for the future. Much has been done to improve the nation's defenses against terrorism, but the evidence presented over the last several weeks underscores just how daunting the challenge remains. Extracting meaningful clues from the mass of tips and gossip and incomplete information is worse than looking for a needle in a haystack. It's like looking for a particular wisp of hay in that haystack.

Samit and Rolince were hard-working public servants, as were their colleagues. Neither underestimated the threat. Yet both fell short.

In demanding the death penalty for Moussaoui, Justice Department lawyers argue that if he had fully disclosed what he knew about the Sept. 11 plot, it could have been thwarted. Moussaoui's lawyers contend that the government's anti-terrorism system was so fouled up that nothing could have kept the hijackers out of the planes.

A jury will sort out the question as it applies to Moussaoui. But the larger issue — how to make sure the system spots important scraps of information among mountains of such scraps — is far from resolved.

Samit and Rolince are not alone in the glare of hindsight. The trial has shown that Federal Aviation Administration officials barely raised an eyebrow when told that Mohamed Atta, who turned out to be the lead hijacker, had abandoned a small plane on a runway at Miami International Airport. Further, testimony has detailed how CIA agents missed clues that two other hijackers were living in San Diego.

But it is the Olympian battle between Samit and Rolince that has defined much of this trial and offered new insights into the challenge of preventing terrorism — insights into how something as elusive as the mind set of the FBI can play a role, for example, or the different perspectives of two men who stood at a historic crossroads but did not quite realize their moment.

Samit said FBI headquarters was guilty of "criminal negligence" for not letting him seek search warrants on Moussaoui and learn more about the plot. Rolince countered that Samit was an overeager agent who was being "spun up," that he was obsessing about Moussaoui's arrest on a minor immigration infraction.

Samit continues to fight crime in Minneapolis. Rolince retired last October. Both men love the FBI.

"I didn't agree with them, but they are in charge," Samit said of headquarters. Said Rolince: "Agent Samit's suppositions and hunches were one thing. What we actually knew at the time of the arrest was clearly something else."

Samit is a short, stocky man with a buzz haircut, a leftover from his enlistment as a naval intelligence officer and pilot. At the FBI field office in Minneapolis, he was attached to "Squad 5" and its joint task force on terrorism.

Samit was alarmed that Moussaoui, with little flying experience, was training on a jumbo jet simulator, had paid cash for lessons and was outspoken in his criticism of America.

Washington initially advised Samit to limit himself to putting Moussaoui under surveillance. But Samit had already told the manager of the Residence Inn where Moussaoui was staying that the FBI wanted him. The agent decided he had to act.

Agents arrested Moussaoui in mid-August as he was coming out of the motel. He had a small knife in his pocket, another in his car. Taken to an immigration detention center, he talked to Samit for a while, saying he was in the U.S. to learn to fly for personal reasons. Moussaoui then asked for a lawyer, and that ended all interviews.

Samit still wanted to search Moussaoui's belongings — his laptop computer, a black duffel bag and other items in his car and his apartment back in Norman, Okla.

The agent asked Washington for approval to seek a criminal search warrant; Washington said no because more seasoned heads felt it would be denied for insufficient evidence. Samit asked Washington for permission to obtain a special intelligence court search warrant. Washington said no again, fearing that if the intelligence court said no, the bureau would never be able to go back and get a warrant from a criminal court judge.

The next request was for approval to place an informant inside Moussaoui's jail cell. Denied again.

Worse, as Samit saw it, was that FBI headquarters never told him of other leads percolating around the country, most important, a fellow agent's memo out of Phoenix that reported suspicious Middle Eastern immigrants taking flying lessons.

"You didn't know at that point in time that Mr. Moussaoui was the most dangerous man in the history of the United States?" Samit was asked by a defense lawyer.

"Absolutely not, sir."

But Samit had not stopped. He spent several days drafting the 25-page memo to Rolince's office

He described the knives and the flying lessons. He discussed the large amounts of cash Moussaoui was carrying. He reported how Moussaoui's companion spoke of his friend's determination to wage jihad, his hatred of Americans, his loyalty to Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

"You wanted the people in Washington to know all this information about Moussaoui, didn't you?" he was asked on the stand.

"Yes, sir, that's correct," he said. "I did."

But when Washington came through, it was too late.

Rolince was besieged with his own problems. He said his office was taking in leads from 56 FBI field offices and 400 smaller agencies around the country.

The summer chatter was high, but Rolince said none of the tips rose to the level of "actionable" information for agents to make arrests.

"The threats covered about every area that one could possibly conceive," he told the jury. "From the traditional truck bomb to the use of chemical, radiological, biological, nuclear, to kidnappings, to assassinations …."

Sometimes the threats dealt with civil aviation, but "I think that was on three occasions out of the thousand or something" raw leads, Rolince said.

On June 12, the CIA warned that Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11 plot, "was recruiting people to travel to the United States to meet with colleagues already there so that they might conduct terrorist attacks on Osama bin Laden's behalf."

On June 10, the CIA notified all its station chiefs of a possible "Al Qaeda suicide attack on a United States target over the next few days."

Late in the month, a CIA terrorist threat advisory indicated a "high probability of near-term spectacular terrorist attacks resulting in numerous casualties." More such warnings poured in. Meetings in the White House Situation Room were now increased to three times a week.

And then Rolince heard a whisper about Samit's case.

"My unit chief approached me on two different occasions in hallway conversations that an individual had been reported by a flight school," Rolince recalled. But Rolince said that "the FBI did not possess sufficient information to levy a charge."

In his eyes, whatever threat Moussaoui had posed was neutralized by his arrest. For that reason, Rolince said, the search warrants were not approved.

Instead, Rolince OKd Samit's last-ditch idea to fly with Moussaoui when he was deported back to Europe. Moussaoui's bags and other belongings would be automatically subject to inspection there.

Rolince gave his approval late in the day, on Sept. 10.

But the next morning, no one was going anywhere.

Does Killing Really Give Closure? (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The past few weeks have been rife with the prospect of closure denied.

The families of Slobodan Milosevic's tens of thousands of victims were ostensibly denied closure when he died before the conclusion of his war crimes tribunal. The decision over where to try exiled Liberian ruler Charles Taylor turns largely on how to afford closure to his victims. And the families of those killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks despaired that government misconduct had ended not only the prosecution, but also their one chance at closure. "I felt like my heart had been ripped out," said Rosemary Dillard, whose husband died in the attack on the Pentagon. "I felt like my husband had been killed again."

The death penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui has been touted by the government as a way to bring resolution to bereft families. Hundreds watch the proceedings on remote, closed-circuit televisions. Dozens will testify about their losses. This will be their "day in court." Since as far back as 2002, when then-Attorney General John D. Ashcroft announced he'd seek the death penalty for Moussaoui to "carry out justice," it's been assumed that this outcome would bring closure. Just as, in 2001, when Ashcroft decided that family members of the Oklahoma City bombing victims could witness the execution of Timothy McVeigh on closed-circuit television, he said it would "meet their need for closure."

Why? What's the empirical basis for the government assumption that all, or even most victims of terrible tragedy will find "closure" through protracted trials and executions?

To the extent the data on the needs of victims suggests anything at all, it says there is no magical solution, no one-size-fits-all mechanism to afford closure to the victims and survivors of violent crime. That makes the Justice Department's message that healing requires victim participation in the Moussaoui trial and an eventual execution for the offender even more disturbing; it offers the illusion of government-approved "closure" to thousands of people who desperately seek it, but may not ever find it here.

In a seminal 1985 law review article, law professor Lynne Henderson examined the relationship between victims' rights and criminal justice policy. Looking carefully at the psychological data on the needs of victims, Henderson discovered a wide array of responses to tragedy -- responses that differ widely from victim to victim, and that change significantly over a victim's lifetime. More crucially, Henderson's research reveals that "common assumptions about crime victims -- that they are all 'outraged' and want revenge and tougher law enforcement -- underlie much of the current victim's rights rhetoric. But in light of the existing psychological evidence, these assumptions fail to address the experience and real needs of past victims."

Criminal trials and the promise of an execution offer a seemingly appealing tool for assigning blame and channeling rage. But many crime victims have reported that the endless repetition of their tragic stories, the formal legal rules, and the years and years between appeals only serve to increase stress and delay healing.

This isn't to say that many victims of 9/11 don't want to see Moussaoui executed. As the mother of one victim told ABC News, "I was looking to this trial to see if we could eradicate one evil person, to remove one force of evil from this beautiful world." It is to say that in promoting the notion that only a death penalty can afford closure, the prosecution is disregarding the wants and needs of many others.

This is not the first time we have seen this phenomenon: The survivors of the Oklahoma City bombings who didn't want to see McVeigh executed were not permitted to offer victim impact statements. As Bruce Shapiro pointed out in a 1997 essay in Salon, the terror trial that made "victim closure" a national buzzword was structured such that "any victim or relative who wanted to play a part in the sentencing phase of the trial first had to pass a death-penalty loyalty test."

Many, many victims of violent tragedy object to this assumption that their interest in justice is congruent with that of state prosecutors seeking the death penalty. Just last month, Vicki Schieber, the mother of Shannon Schieber, a Wharton Business School student murdered in 1998 by a serial rapist, testified before the U.S. Senate's subcommittee on the Constitution, civil rights and property rights. As she told the committee: "The word closure is invoked so frequently in discussions of victims and the death penalty that victims' family members jokingly refer to it as 'the c word.' But I can tell you with all seriousness that there is no such thing as closure when a violent crime rips away the life of someone dear to you." Schieber testified that a single-minded government focus on executions shifts the focus away from other, more meaningful legal reforms that might better honor victims and support their families.

This jibes with Henderson's empirical data, which suggests that more than anything -- maybe even executions -- the families of tragedy victims ultimately need answers. They need to know "why." And perhaps it's no accident, then, that so many of the 9/11 families who are avidly following the Moussaoui trial say they are not doing so in the hopes of a death sentence. Some don't want to give Moussaoui the martyr status that he craves. Many others just seem to be looking for answers. As Blake Allison, whose wife was killed, told The Washington Post: "I felt the government wasn't telling us all that it knew." Fiona Havlish, who lost her husband, echoed that: "I think what all of us are looking for is the truth, and the truth has not been forthcoming out of Washington."

And if Henderson's data is right, and what most 9/11 victims need is answers, you have to wonder whether the government is in fact victimizing them twice with this crazy trial. Not only is the Bush administration still withholding vital information that might afford them comfort. It's also proving that government incompetence, bureaucracy and willful blindness were as much the reason "why" as Zacarias Moussaoui.

One Mistaken Clue Sets A Spy Saga In Motion (OREG)

By Mark Larabee And Ashbel S. Green, The Oregonian

Mayfield case - A report reveals the secret steps agents took to trail a terror suspect, and the flaws that led them to the wrong man

A newly declassified report into the FBI's investigation of Brandon Mayfield offers a rare look inside a fast-paced international terrorism investigation, revealing some of the secret tactics investigators used, the intense pressures they faced and their disagreements.

In its 273 pages, the report by the Justice Department's inspector general reveals that investigators initially worried that Mayfield -- who was wrongly linked by faulty fingerprint analysis to the March 2004 bombings in Madrid, Spain -- could be part of a second wave of U.S. terror attacks.

The report explains how investigators' goal from the beginning was to spy on Mayfield and possibly recruit him as a covert agent. But media leaks in Europe forced their hand.

The FBI bungled its surveillance, the report says, to the degree that the mild-mannered Portland-area lawyer figured out that he was being watched before federal agents were ready to confront him.

"Had Mayfield been a terrorist, the FBI's failure . . . could have had serious national security implications," the report says.

And the report makes clear that without the media leaks, Spanish police eventually would have figured out that the fingerprint belonged to an Algerian terrorist, allowing the FBI to realize its mistake and shut down the Mayfield operation.

Mayfield's secret file would have been forever sealed away in FBI archives without most people ever knowing it existed.

Not even Brandon Mayfield.

Fueled by coincidences

Eight days after Islamic terrorists bombed Spanish commuter trains in March 2004, counterterrorism officials at FBI headquarters called field agents in Portland.

A fingerprint on a blue plastic bag filled with detonators found near the bombing site in Madrid belonged to Mayfield.

Within hours, investigators were digging into Mayfield's background and by that afternoon had him under 24-hour surveillance.

Initially, Portland's squad of investigators had just a few pieces of information about Mayfield other than the fingerprint.

They knew his birthday and Social Security number and that he'd served in the military from 1985 to 1994. Analysts checked FBI databases to see if Mayfield was the subject of any investigations. He wasn't, but a deeper search circumstantially connected Mayfield to "other suspected terrorists."

Court records showed that less than two years earlier, Mayfield had represented Jeffrey Leon Battle in a custody dispute. Battle was a member of the Portland Seven, a group arrested in 2002 for plotting to fight with the Taliban against U.S. soldiers.

This was one of several coincidences that fueled the investigation's initial sense of urgency.

Investigators learned that Mayfield was a converted Muslim whose wife was an Egyptian naturalized as a U.S. citizen and that he went to a Portland-area mosque where some of the Portland Seven worshipped.

Mayfield had telephone contact with the U.S. director of an international Islamic charity accused of having terrorist connections. And Mayfield advertised in a business directory administered by a man convicted in the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

From the first day of the investigation, the government used every tool available to investigate Mayfield.

The FBI issued National Security Letters, which can be used in intelligence cases to obtain a variety of information, including financial records. The letters prohibit the source of the information, such as a bank or credit card company, from disclosing the inquiry.

A federal grand jury issued subpoenas for information about Mayfield. And the government placed Mayfield's name on national watch lists.

The FBI applied to a secret court for a warrant under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, known as FISA. The FISA court gave FBI agents retroactive authority to listen to Mayfield's conversations and conduct "sneak and peek" searches, a rarely used and controversial tactic that would allow agents to go into Mayfield's office and home and collect information without telling him they were there.

During covert searches of Mayfield's home and office, FBI agents photographed documents and made copies of computer hard drives. They also copied some of Mayfield's client files, requiring the assignment of a "taint agent," to filter documents that were protected by attorney-client privilege.

During a second search of Mayfield's house, the FBI collected 10 DNA samples and six cigarette butts to compare with samples from Madrid.

The report shows that the hasty surveillance was picked up by Mayfield. Suspicious that he was under surveillance, Mayfield tried to catch his pursuers in the act.

FBI agents noticed him pulling into driveways and cul-de-sacs, only to quickly turn around. He would drive into parking lots, sit for a few moments and then pull out. On his way home, he would drive around the block several times and sit in his driveway and watch to see if he was being followed. The FBI also saw Mona Mayfield using binoculars in the parking lot of her husband's office.

Even as Mayfield suspected someone was following him, he continued to go through his daily routines at work and home, leading one agent to say that "if he is guilty -- he is one cool customer."

After entering Mayfield's home a second time, the FBI realized "there were problems with the search." It's unclear how because the details in the report are blacked out by federal authorities. But it's possible that the FBI agents overheard the Mayfields talking about their suspicions.

Mayfield's wife, Mona, would later tell reporters that she saw footprints in the carpeting and that blinds in the home were not in their usual position.

The FBI called off any more sneak and peeks.

Doubts begin

As investigators pored through the material seized during the searches, they were not finding evidence of a link to Spain.

There was no record of Mayfield's traveling there, and the couple's passports had expired.

The agents believed there was a possibility Mayfield had used an alias to travel to Spain. But "given the character and known terrorism ties of several of his associates, it appears possible that someone else in the community is the link between Mayfield and the Madrid bombings," one FBI memo said.

DOJ_NMG_0021784

Eventually, investigators began to wonder if Mayfield could have touched the blue bag in the U.S. before it was "transported by a third unknown party to Europe."

If they couldn't find more evidence, the FBI planned to interview Mayfield in June. Until then, they would continue surveillance.

But bigger doubts about Mayfield were brewing in Spain.

Spanish authorities had all along expressed concern about the Mayfield identification. Initially, the Spanish were amazed that an American would be involved an attack in which all the suspects were local Moroccans.

By mid-April 2004, the Spaniards were more doubtful, and they challenged the FBI's fingerprint identification of Mayfield. To their eyes, the FBI's findings were "inconclusive." While the Spaniards saw many points of similarity between the two prints, they discounted Mayfield based on several significant differences.

This became known as the "April 13 Negativo Report."

Looking again, FBI fingerprint examiners saw a "concerning discrepancy," but they theorized that it was due to a blurring by a "second touch" in the corner of what they still insisted was Mayfield's fingerprint. Convinced they were right, FBI examiners agreed to travel to Spain to explain their findings.

Word of the Negativo Report raised red flags among Portland investigators and prosecutors. But FBI officials in Washington reassured them.

"I spoke with the lab this morning and they are absolutely confident that they have a match on the print. -- No doubt about it!!!! -- They will testify in any court you swear them into," said an April 15 e-mail from an FBI counterterrorism supervisor.

About a week later, an FBI examiner flew to Madrid and demonstrated to Spanish officials how the FBI lab made the match. Although the Spaniards still noted significant differences between the two prints, they agreed to take another look.

But a different version of the meeting was transmitted to officials in the United States.

The Madrid legal attache, or legat, the only American at the meeting who spoke Spanish and served as translator, said the Spaniards seemed satisfied with the FBI's presentation. He also said he expected the Spaniards to fully confirm the FBI.

The arrest

On May 4, a Paris-based Los Angeles Times reporter called the FBI legat in Madrid and asked whether two fingerprint experts could disagree over the identification of a single print. Then the reporter asked, "What about this American" whose print was found in connection with the Madrid bombings?

It was the first indication of a leak, but not the last. The next day, a reporter from a Spanish magazine made a similar inquiry.

The news forced investigators to make a decision. Portland FBI chief Robert Jordan didn't want to take any chances, arguing to take Mayfield into custody to prevent him from fleeing the country.

But top anti-terrorism officials in Washington wanted to continue surveillance. One top official said he did not want to lose the opportunity to "recruit" Mayfield and get him to help the FBI thwart a "second wave" of U.S. terror attacks.

After much debate, it was agreed that agents would approach Mayfield for an interview with a material witness warrant "in their pocket," to be used as a last resort.

Preparing for an arrest, the FBI asked Spanish officials for a report confirming that Mayfield's print was found in Madrid. But the Spaniards were still re-examining the prints.

On May 6, U.S. District Judge Robert E. Jones issued a material witness warrant for Mayfield. Three FBI agents drove to Mayfield's office shortly after 9 a.m. hoping to "smooth-talk him and try to get him to cooperate."

Mayfield had other ideas.

"I don't want you in my office," he told them. "I have client files in here. I don't want to talk with you."

Seeing no other choice, the agents arrested and handcuffed him. They again tried to get Mayfield into a discussion. But he told them he wanted a hearing, that he knew Judge Jones and could not believe that Jones would sign such a warrant.

During the ride to the federal courthouse, Mayfield told the agents he wanted a lawyer.

Between 10 a.m. and 3 p.m., FBI agents searched Mayfield's house, office and car, removing documents, computers and other property. Mona Mayfield told agents that she and her husband were not involved in the Madrid bombings or any other terrorist acts.

Mayfield went before Judge Jones that afternoon. He said the fingerprint wasn't his and that if it was, he had no idea how it got to Spain. Jones considered Mayfield a flight risk and ordered him to jail.

Agents soon discovered that Mayfield's home computers had accessed Web sites relating to the Spanish rail system, Spain's largest airline, a Spanish airport and a Spanish terror group known as ETA. They also found Mayfield's pilot training logs from the 1980s and a book chronicling the development of al-Qaida.

While the FBI was adding to its list of damning circumstantial evidence, long-standing doubts in Spain were becoming public.

The Spanish newspaper El Pais reported May 8 that Spanish National Police were "very doubtful" that Mayfield's print matched the one found on the bag.

Mayfield's lawyers sought his release May 17, but the FBI was still calling Mayfield's print a 100 percent match and the judge denied the move.

The release

On May 19, Portland prosecutors learned that the Spaniards had matched the blue-bag prints to an Algerian named Ouhnane Daoud. Daoud was among a group of militants who blew themselves up in April as police were raiding their suburban Madrid apartment.

During a morning hearing, a prosecutor briefed the judge in private about the new information about Daoud. Without elaborating, Jones determined that Mayfield should remain in custody.

On May 20, higher-resolution copies of Daoud's fingerprints reached the FBI lab. A top lab official told a Portland prosecutor that it would take more time to resolve the conflict but that the FBI examiners "see what the Spanish see."

While the FBI fingerprint experts agreed to return to Spain for further discussions, prosecutors in Portland decided the doubts warranted Mayfield's release. The judge granted the request that afternoon, and Mayfield returned to his family.

On May 24, Jordan held a news conference in Portland and apologized to Mayfield.

FBI fingerprint experts eventually retreated, saying the print was of such poor quality that it could not be used. But they also sent officials back to Spain for a third time, and they got their first look at the original print and the bag.

Muslim Convert & Drifter Wanted To Fly But Did Months In Jail (NYDN)

By RUSS BUETTNER, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 26, 2006

An innocent man's life left in ruins

Blake has lived a legal nightmare in the post-9/11 era. Born and raised in the Bronx, Blake was held without bail for three months and has been unable to work for nearly a year because federal officials have kept his identification. A pretrial report even alleged he belonged to a terrorist organization, court records show.

Now, as he has spiraled into homelessness, federal prosecutors have dropped every charge against him.

Blake said investigators told him his troubles began when the mother of his estranged wife allegedly reported that he was a terrorist, and because events in his life fit that profile.

Blake, 36, converted to Islam and adopted a Muslim name in 1991. He traveled through the Middle East off and on for a decade, without obvious sources of cash, before returning to the United States to study aviation.

But a closer look offers mundane explanations. His mother says she paid for his travels. His interest in aviation dates back to his childhood, when he would ride subways and buses to airfields and heliports, including Floyd Bennett Field.

"I really wish I had had the money right out of high school for him to study to be a pilot," said his mother, Toni Blake, who now lives in South Carolina.

Blake's experience highlights the line that federal investigators continue to walk between respecting the rights of innocent people and risking disaster should they let a real terrorist remain free.

Arsalan Iftikhar, the national legal director of the Council on American-Islamic Relations, acknowledged the difficulty, but added that Blake's experiences sound like too many other examples of Muslims being unnecessarily detained since 9/11. "The American Muslim community feels as though they have been under siege by an overzealous Justice Department," said Iftikhar. "Unfortunately, the vast majority of these cases turn out to be nothing more than minor civil violations."

Wants to help his son

Blake said he abhors terrorism. By the time prosecutors dropped his case, he was living at the men's homeless shelter in Manhattan. But he expressed no bitterness.

"I just want to get my identification back and get a job so I can send money to help my wife raise our son," he said.

Blake readily admits that his life has lacked focus. But his interest in aviation was always there.

Patricia Wagner, now the general manager of the E. 34th St. Metroport, said she recalled a young Blake hanging around when she ran the heliport at E. 60th St. in the late 1980s. "He just liked being around aviation, it was one of his passions," Wagner said. "He was always very personable."

Blake was born with the name Christopher Mussenden and attended public schools in the Bronx. He said he spent four years in Seattle, during which he converted to Islam, changed his name to Idris Jibreel and made a pilgrimage to Mecca. From 1997 through 2004, Blake traveled repeatedly through the Middle East and to Asia, sometimes working in the gem industry, he said.

After 9/11, he returned briefly to New York and changed his name to Adam Blake, adopting his mother's maiden name. "I didn't want problems running around with a name like Jibreel," he said. "And I never liked the name Christopher."

During a month-long trip to Kuwait in 2004, he met a Vancouver woman online.

"I told her that I had no money and no prospects," Blake said. "She said, 'Come here and let's start a new life.'"

Three months together didn't go well, though a child was conceived. In August 2004, Blake got on a bus to Seattle.

After many calls, Blake was told the new passport was ready. But when he went to pick it up, he was arrested by federal and local officials on a 1993 warrant alleging he had used his employer's phone to make personal calls, said Lawrence Hildes, a Washington attorney who advised Blake on his passport woes.

"It gives the strong appearance that they were targeting him because they believed him to be part of a terrorist organization, which I'm 100% sure he's not," Hildes said.

Blake said he was held at a county jail for six weeks. After his release, he enrolled in a correspondence course in aviation.

In January 2005, he was told again that his passport was ready. This time he was interrogated by the FBI for five hours before being sent home, he said.

The following day, Blake was arrested on charges that in 1995 he had failed to check a box on a passport application noting that he had previously possessed a passport, and that on another application in 1996 he had misstated the date that his most recent passport had been issued.

Blake's wife, Megan Harrison, told the Daily News she didn't believe her mother had called authorities - or that Blake has ever been interested in terrorism.

"It's laughable to anyone who knows him," said Harrison, who still lives in Vancouver.

Blake was sent back to Manhattan and held without bail until April, when he was released on a $50,000 bond signed by his mother. Still lacking his essential identification papers, prosecutors gave him a letter saying he had a federal case pending.

Last month, prosecutors offered Blake a deferred prosecution agreement. It would have erased the case after a year if he followed the "instructions and advice" of a pretrial services officer - and waived his right to sue.

Blake resisted, even as his court-appointed attorneys and the judge in his case, John Keenan, pressured him to sign.

"I told you it was a great deal," Keenan said in court. "I never met a man in my life until I met you that wouldn't accept a deferred prosecution agreement."

"This, unfortunately, I believe, is the br'er rabbit defense," added Frederick Cohn, Blake's court-appointed attorney. "But I don't believe he was born and bred in the briar patch."

Cohn declined to comment to The News.

But on March 6, prosecutors dropped the charges based on "a review of the evidence."

Blake has now boarded a bus and moved to his mother's home.

"It's just terrible what they tried to do to him," she said. "He's never been in any trouble."

Detainee's Release May Be Coming (LAT)

By H.g. Reza

Magistrate's finding and a ruling in another case bolster hopes of Muslim immigrant held 20 months. U.S. accuses him of ties to terrorists.

Accused of having ties to terrorists and being a national security risk but convicted only of living in the United States illegally, a Buena Park man could soon be released after 20 months in jail.

Abdel-Jabbar Hamdan's hopes have been buoyed by a federal magistrate's recommendation last week that he be released and by an appeals court ruling in the case of a Sri Lankan immigrant.

"I am very excited and hope that a judge will see that my incarceration is unjust," Hamdan, a Jordanian of Palestinian descent, said in a telephone interview from jail. "I want to go home to my wife and children."

U.S. Magistrate Judge Jeffrey W. Johnson said that Hamdan's "indefinite detention" was unreasonable and violated a 2001 Supreme Court ruling. Johnson forwarded his 12-page recommendation to U.S. District Court in Los Angeles.

Hamdan's case has been a rallying cry for critics of the Bush administration's practice of using terrorism allegations to arrest Muslims. In almost every case, suspects are not charged with terrorism but instead are prosecuted for immigration law violations and held without bond.

Hamdan has been locked up at the immigration detention facility at Terminal Island after he was arrested July 27, 2004, convicted of living illegally in the United States and ordered deported. Normally, he would qualify for bond pending deportation, but Department of Homeland Security officials said he should remain jailed because of his alleged ties to terrorism and for being a security threat.

Hamdan worked as a fund-raiser for the Texas-based Holy Land Foundation, an Islamic charity U.S. officials shut down in December 2001 for allegedly raising money for Hamas, a Palestinian organization the U.S. State Department has designated as terrorist. He was arrested along with three other foundation leaders.

Although Homeland Security officials said Hamdan, 45, had ties to terrorism, he was charged only with violating immigration law. He was convicted of overstaying the student visa he received in 1979. His three co-defendants were charged with terrorism-related crimes. They were released on their own recognizance after a federal judge ruled that the government had failed to prove they were flight risks and a threat to national security.

Johnson said that keeping Hamdan locked up violates a Supreme Court ruling prohibiting an immigrant's indefinite detention. A U.S. District Court judge will decide if Hamdan, an engineering graduate of USC, should be freed while awaiting deportation. Hamdan's lawyers have also filed a habeas corpus petition to obtain his release.

Hamdan's appeal appears to have been strengthened by a March 7 ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Ahilan Nadarajah.

After Nadarajah was arrested in October 2001 in San Diego, immigration judges twice awarded him political asylum. But Homeland Security officials kept him jailed on grounds that he was a terrorist and national security threat while they appealed his grant of asylum.

The court ruled that Nadarajah's lengthy incarceration was unreasonable.

"The government does not possess the authority under the general detention statutes to hold Nadarajah, or any other alien who is similarly situated, indefinitely," the panel said in a 37-page ruling. It also called Nadarajah's detention of nearly five years "plainly unreasonable under any measure."

Nadarajah walked out of jail Tuesday, on his 26th birthday, wearing the same clothes he wore when he was arrested almost five years ago. Like Hamdan, Nadarajah was represented by the ACLU in Los Angeles.

ACLU attorney Ahilan T. Arulanantham who represented Nadarajah, said the 9th Circuit ruling is one of the first successful challenges to the Bush administration's policy of indefinite detention of immigrants.

As they did in Nadarajah's case, U.S. officials say they have the authority to keep Hamdan locked up while appeals are pending.

Officials at the U.S. Justice Department and the U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement declined to comment. In 2005, an immigration judge ordered Hamdan deported for being in the country illegally. However, the same judge then blocked immigration officials from sending him to Jordan — a U.S. ally — on grounds that he would be tortured there.

Hamdan, who helped found a mosque in Anaheim, is being held without bond while Justice Department lawyers appeal the order that stopped the government from sending him to Jordan. His wife and six American-born children visit him in jail four times a week.

Johnson wrote that Hamdan's continued detention violates the Supreme Court ruling that an immigrant can be detained for only six months following a judge's deportation order if U.S. officials cannot find a country that will accept him. Johnson said it is unlikely that another country would accept Hamdan after American authorities tied him to terrorism.

Johnson said that U.S. officials could have continued Hamdan's detention if Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales had certified him a national security threat under the Patriot Act.

The judge said failure to use the law suggests that the "government does not now believe [Hamdan] is a significant threat to the security of this country."

Because Johnson's finding is only a recommendation, attorneys for Hamdan and the government must file responses by April 10.

Hamdan said he did not know if any money he raised went to Hamas. He said it was supposed to go to Palestinian families.

"I was proud to help my people, but in a legitimate way. As far as I know, Holy Land was an American charity abiding by American laws," he said.

Lawyer Cleared To Visit Guantanamo Inmate (AP)

By Pete Yost

AP, March 26, 2006

Chronicling a long list of delays by the Bush administration at the Guantanamo Bay prison, a federal magistrate has ordered the government to stop blocking a private attorney from meeting with one of the 500 detainees at the facility.

The 33-page opinion released last week by U.S. Magistrate Alan Kay may be among the last by lower-court judges criticizing the administration's conduct at Guantanamo Bay. President Bush signed the Detainee Treatment Act on Dec. 30, which sharply curtails the prisoners' ability to go to court. The Bush administration is seeking to apply the new law to existing detainee cases.

Kay said the cases of 11 detainees have been at a standstill in the courts since October because the administration is challenging the standing of one detainee to file a petition on behalf of another.

Fifty-six other detainees who represent themselves sent petitions that took as long as six months to arrive at court through the military's mail system, according to information contained in Kay's ruling.

As of last month, nearly a year after the 56 prisoners wrote the petitions, not a single detainee had met or spoken with court-appointed lawyers, Kay wrote.

In October 2004, Kay noted, federal courts rejected the Bush administration's legal position that detainees' access to lawyers "existed purely at the pleasure of the government."

Ruling in the case of Salim Muhood Adem, the magistrate said the Sudanese national who was arrested in Pakistan had asked for a lawyer in late 2004 to help him challenge his detention.

Adem communicated his request for a lawyer through another Guantanamo prisoner who did have an attorney.

After a lawyer was arranged for Adem through the Center for Constitutional Rights, the government said it needed written authorization before allowing a face-to-face meeting. Kay noted that such evidence is hard to come by without seeing his client.

The magistrate noted that until midsummer 2005, the government raised no objection to the practice of any detainee initiating a petition through a fellow detainee who was a friend.

The government then began challenging the standing of detainees serving as "next friends."

At the same time, the government refused to allow Adem's lawyer to meet with the detainee.

The government suggested that Adem's lawyer mail a letter to Adem seeking authorization, creating "another Catch-22," Kay noted.

The government barred the lawyer from using the military's swift delivery system for legal mail because the government refused to acknowledge the lawyer's authority to represent Adem. The letter from early January had to be sent instead by much slower nonlegal military mail, which is subject to review and censorship by military personnel at Guantanamo. The attorney hasn't heard back yet.

"They are not singling me out," Adem's lawyer, Murray Fogler, said Friday of the Bush administration. "They are treating a vast array of detainees this way. The government is setting up as many roadblocks as they can."

Adem, a Sudanese national, was arrested in Pakistan where he had lived since 1991.

The government alleges that Adem is an al-Qaida associate. Adem denies it, saying he was an education official whose job was to inspect teachers at schools run by the Revival of Islamic Heritage Society.

Globalization 2.0 (NYT)

By David Rieff

The New York Times, March 26, 2006

Globalization is both unavoidable and of great benefit to the world as a whole. At least that has been the conventional wisdom for more than two decades now, except at the far fringes of the radical, antiglobalization left and the xenophobic, protectionist right. But is it true? Is the march toward economic interdependence, open markets and the weakening of national identity really as unstoppable as all that?

Two recent controversies — the sale of port facilities to a company owned by the government of Dubai and the negotiation of a controversial nuclear cooperation deal with India — underscore the tensions and contradictions between America's commitment to economic globalization and its political priorities in a post-9/11 world.

In part, these controversies pitted desirable outcomes — political stability and national security on the one hand; economic dynamism on the other — against one another. In the ports case, the principles of globalization demanded that the Dubai company be allowed to take over the management of the six ports in question. But advocates of globalization never really took into account the possibility that even as nations become interdependent on one another, political difficulties may continue to separate them.

Globalization is a coherent theory for times of comparative peace and economic expansion like the 1990's. It is less persuasive in times of conflict and fear like those we live in today. Although the presidential adviser Karl Rove has insisted that Democrats live in a pre-9/11 world and Republicans do not, the Bush administration's defense of the ports deal seems like a classic case of pre-9/11 thinking. The administration argued that the deal had to go forward if Americans were to remain true to their commitment to open markets and the free movement of investment capital. But add the threat of terrorism and the specter of weapons of mass destruction to the equation, and suddenly the words "free movement" seem more like a threat than a harbinger of a more prosperous economic future.

Bush's deal with India also illustrates the new and unexpected conundrums of globalization. The administration pledged to help India develop nuclear power plants despite that country's refusal to sign the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and its maintenance of an atomic-weapons arsenal. An implicit argument was this: Because India is so important a strategic partner and, prospectively at least, a major economic power, Washington is no longer in a position to insist, even rhetorically, that New Delhi abide by the established rules of the nuclear game.

U.S. officials made little effort to deny that they were making an exception in India's case — an exception they were at pains to point out they would never make for Iran. Rather, as Bush made clear in his joint press conference with the Indian prime minister, Manmohan Singh, the cementing and deepening of the U.S.-Indian alliance were simply too important to allow a mere international legal regime to get in the way. In a world where the economic balance of power is steadily tilting toward Asia, American concerns about runaway arms races are very likely to be overshadowed by American concerns about the need to prevent a destructive competition for scarce fossil-fuel resources with India and China. Better to accept an India that uses more civilian nuclear power (and offers U.S. companies the chance to benefit from the sector's expansion) than to vainly chastise an India that is not going to abandon its nuclear arsenal anyway, whatever the effect on nonproliferation globally.

In retrospect, globalization's most fervent partisans and critics were both naïve to imagine that geopolitics would play second fiddle to geoeconomics. Obviously, the Dubai ports fiasco and the nuclear agreement with India posed very different policy challenges. In the case of Dubai ports, America's traditional role of sponsor and advocate for globalization was politically unsustainable, much to the chagrin of the Bush administration. In the case of the agreement with India, the administration took the view that long-term global stability, including the stability of energy prices, required the abandonment of long-held international legal rules. This is certainly not your grandfather's globalization.

The Achilles heel of that "inevitabilist" vision of globalization, so dominant in the 1990's, was its rigid, almost Marxist-like economic determinism. Today's globalization — inseparable from political concerns, no longer able to overrule nationalist sentiments or national security objections, increasingly marked by the phenomenon of Asian companies buying European and North American assets — is most likely to be far more controversial and far less orderly.

In all likelihood, Asians will complain about Western hypocrisy. After all, when globalization meant Western companies buying one another and acquiring assets in Asia, the U.S. and the countries of the European Union were unstinting advocates of globalization. Now it may seem that Western nations were never committed to economic interdependence — globalization in the true sense of the word — but simply to opening new markets for their own corporations and exporting political and legal norms coined in Washington or Brussels. But could it have been otherwise? As both the Indian nuclear agreement and the furor over the Dubai ports deal demonstrate, imagining that nations could not politicize international trade and economic issues or legal norms is as vain a hope as expecting them to act against their own self-interest in any other sphere of public life. Doubtless, some form of globalization is unavoidable. It will just not be the globalization we had been led to expect.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Company Defends Its Security Plans (WT/AP)

By William Foreman, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

HONG KONG -- A Hong Kong conglomerate that has won a U.S. government contract to screen U.S.-bound cargo in the Bahamas for terror threats defended the plan yesterday, saying it would not be feasible for American officials to work in ports across the globe.

Some U.S. lawmakers and security specialists have expressed concern about the contract for Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. because American customs agents will not be working with the screening equipment, designed to detect smuggled radioactive materials.

The Hong Kong company is in the final stages of being awarded a no-bid, $6 million contract from the United States for screening at the Freeport Container Terminal in the Bahamas, just 65 miles from the American shoreline.

John Meredith, group managing director for Hutchison Port Holdings, the maritime subsidiary for Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. and the world's largest ports company, said it would be impractical for American agents to work in every port that handles U.S.-bound cargo.

Mr. Meredith said the best option for the United States is to rely on trusted agents using sophisticated inspection equipment to scan shipments at ports abroad.

Among concerns is that a low-paid employee might be vulnerable to bribes and provide terrorists with information about how the equipment works and which material triggers alarms, security specialists said.

But Mr. Meredith told the Associated Press his firm has elaborate security checks, including filming inspectors checking the containers.

U.S. customs inspectors already work at 43 foreign ports helping to inspect and scan cargo with the permission of foreign governments under a U.S. port-security program known as the "container security initiative."

Some of the 43 ports are operated by Hutchison, and each of these ports has radiation scanners. Cargo that flows through the ports is expedited through American security procedures once it reaches the United States.

Customs security procedures at the Bahamas port are not rigorous enough to qualify it for participation in the U.S. customs security program, and no American agents work there.

Hutchison's billionaire chairman, Li Ka-shing, has substantial business ties to the Chinese government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years. But Mr. Meredith said Mr. Li's relations with Chinese leaders should not be an issue.

"It's unfair to go and chop a guy up because he knows people," he said. "He's a 100 percent self-made businessman. He's respected by heads of state everywhere."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat, who raised early questions about the Bahamas contract and was a leading opponent of a Dubai company's effort to gain operational control of six U.S. ports, said he does not oppose awarding the contract to a foreign company. But he thinks U.S. customs agents should be stationed at the Bahamas port.

Airport Rangers Ride To The Rescue (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

Houston Group Formed After 9/11 Patrols Woods Around Bush Intercontinental

HOUSTON -- This threat was deemed to be credible: Some storage tanks on the west side of the sprawling George Bush Intercontinental Airport might be targeted by terrorists. Who you gonna call?

The SWAT team, they're not. The Special Forces, they aren't. Armed? Not unless you count a cellphone. But they've passed background checks, they're trained, they're badged, and they patrol the perimeter of Houston's largest airport looking for anything unusual, including, maybe, al-Qaeda terrorists.

"I live within spitting distance from the airport on the north side -- about three miles -- so it's to my advantage to make sure that those areas are safe and patrolled," said Jeannie Green, who, along with her 28-year-old quarter horse, Cowboy, answered the call for volunteers to respond to what authorities had determined was a possible threat to the airport in January.

Green is one of 800 volunteers who make up the Houston Airport Rangers, a post-Sept. 11, low-tech project created to increase security at the nation's fourth-largest airport system. Like tens of thousands of Americans who responded to calls by the Bush administration to join in the domestic fight against terrorism, Green stepped up. Some volunteer programs are run under the administration's Citizens Corps and others by the Coast Guard auxiliary. Still others are run by various states and cities.

Within a month of the Sept. 11 attacks, the Austin Police Department created a volunteer battalion that has performed tasks including patrolling gas pipeline facilities and water treatment plants looking for terrorists, and scouting school zones in search of sexual predators believed to be residing in the area. Austin's program was aimed at attracting retired citizens, but 60 to 70 percent of the 400-strong battalion is younger than 55.

The Houston airport isn't the only busy airport using civilians in its security plan. After the 2001 attacks, Boston's Logan Airport -- from which the two Boeing 767s that destroyed the World Trade Center departed -- tightened security significantly. As a result, clammers long accustomed to digging in Boston Harbor off the airport's shoreline were banned. Officials later relented, but the clammers had to agree to undergo a security check, wear badges and special vests while working the mudflats, and report suspicious activity to airport authorities.

Recently, the Transportation Security Administration asked the clammers to test new technology to control access to facility perimeters. The clammers were lent Global Positioning System-equipped, voice-activated cellphones for a 90-day test that ended in January. They used the phones to register their voices and locations as they approached the clam beds, and the airport, in their boats.

"The goal is to determine if this type of device can augment security and add to our multi-layer security plan," TSA spokeswoman Ann Davis said.

The Houston Airport Ranger program was also born out of a post-Sept. 11 heightened security plan. Equestrians who had been riding in the woods around the airport for years were suddenly prohibited from the property. Airport director Richard Vacar, an avid horseman, sympathized with them. He decided to give them access, under certain rules, if they would help with security, said Mark Mancuso, the airport director of public safety.

The mounted volunteer force began patrolling the perimeter of Bush Intercontinental in December 2003. Since then, the program has grown to 800 riders, nearly 70 percent of them women in their forties. It will soon be replicated by Nashville International Airport, officials there said.

"Is it a fun program? Of course," said David Poynor, the Houston program's coordinator. "But it's a serious security program."

The Houston airport is installing a sophisticated $3.5 million intrusion detection system that is capable of tracking ground-based moving targets, such as missiles. In the meantime, its homespun patrol program cost $50,000. The budget paid for the background checks and badges for volunteers, and for cutting 50 miles of rough trails through the heavily wooded perimeter of the 12,000-acre airport. Poynor, an airport employee, holds weekend training sessions in a classroom and on horseback as part of his job.

Rangers provide their own horses and cellphones and attend regular training sessions. Their job is not to get into a confrontation with anyone, but to alert airport police to suspicious activity so officers can be dispatched. The advantage the rangers have, officials said, is they can ride where police vehicles can't: along rough, narrow trails and through the woods.

There is no set schedule for rangers to ride, intentionally keeping the patrols unpredictable.

There have been no terrorist sightings. But there have been many discoveries of deer poachers, all-terrain vehicle joy-riders, target shooters, bikers, homeless campers, aviation enthusiasts and one suspicious character who turned out to be driving a stolen car. All were trespassing on airport property; all were reported to authorities. Rangers have also reported damaged fences along the airport perimeter and the dumping of hazardous waste.

"We're not out there being cops," said Green, who responded to Poynor's emergency request in late January for rangers to ride the airport perimeter because of a threat of a weekend attack on the Houston facility. (Ultimately, the threat was discredited, Poynor said.) "We're trying to be their eyes and ears," she said.

In November 2004, Green also responded to Poynor's request for rangers to report for duty on Election Day because of concerns that the reelection of George W. Bush might prompt threats against George Bush Intercontinental Airport, named after Bush's father.

The day was gray, cold and rainy, but Green, who took a day of vacation from her job as a software developer to do ranger duty, went out on Cowboy anyway. She did not see a soul during her five-hour, bone-chilling patrol, but she had no complaints.

"There are a lot of things about Houston that might make us a target -- the port, all the refineries. Our airport is George Bush Intercontinental," Green said. "I'm not a vigilante type of person. . . . But if I can enjoy riding my horse and I think I'm making a difference, that works for me."

A Chemical Nonreaction (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

I DON'T WANT to alarm you. No, wait. I do want to alarm you. You and your loved ones are in danger of dying horrible, gruesome deaths at the hands of a terrorist chemical attack, and the government has refused to do anything about it.

The prospect of a chemical attack, of course, has been a favorite weapon in the Republican arsenal for years. President Bush has insisted that, after 9/11, he could not ignore the potential threat from Iraq's weapons of mass destruction. Stopping Iraq from obtaining nuclear weapons was, in my view, a good rationale for war, but Iraq didn't have those yet. So Bush thought it would be scarier to emphasize the stuff Iraq was known to have, namely chemical weapons. But the notion that Iraq's chemical weapons posed any threat to us was wildly farfetched. Mustard gas is effective in trench warfare, not in cross-hemisphere attacks. Even if terrorists smuggled chemical weapons into the country, the casualties would be fairly minor.

The only way to kill lots of people with chemicals is to concentrate the chemicals in huge quantities near a big city. And, in fact, this country has lots of weapons like that. They're called chemical plants. Attacking one with a truck bomb, or a small plane, would disperse far more toxins than any chemical weapons attack. The Congressional Research Service has found that we have 100 chemical plants that, if struck, would endanger more than 1 million lives. Indeed, U.S. intelligence has discovered that Al Qaeda has studied the possibilities.

After the 9/11 attacks, both Republicans and Democrats reacted with horror at the prospect of a terrorist chemical attack. Then-Sen. Jon Corzine (D-N.J.) sponsored a bill to require tough security measures at vulnerable chemical plants, and the Senate Committee on the Environment and Public Works passed it by a vote of 19 to 1. But lobbyists for the chemical industry went to work and persuaded Republicans to kill the bill, which they did.

The Republican position since then is that we can rely on voluntary action by the chemical industry. Newspaper exposes have shown that many plants have remained appallingly vulnerable. Domestic security experts have shouted from the rooftops that something has to be done. Nothing has.

Last week, finally, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff appeared before the American Chemistry Council to gently nudge it out of its inaction. He expressed his desire for legislation but remained vague on the details. The closest Chertoff came to a rousing call for action was his observation that "we are four years after 9/11, and the time to wait on voluntariness [sic] as the sole solution, I think, has begun to pass." Well, let's not rush ourselves.

You may wonder where all the so-called post-9/11 conservatives are on this issue. You know, the hawks who remind us every day that we're still at war and insist that Sept. 11 "changed everything." I think the answer is that they're so wedded to the image of Bush as decisive war leader who prioritizes terrorism above all that they simply refuse to consider any evidence to the contrary.

One of the few times I've seen a conservative even engage the issue of Bush's inaction on chemical security is in a book called "Bush Country," a paean to Bush's wisdom and greatness. The author, John Podhoretz, labels the idea that Bush has fallen short on homeland security a "crazy liberal idea." He cites a 2003 article I wrote in the New Republic detailing the GOP's initial cave-in on the chemical plant security bill. Podhoretz was aghast that the bill "would have authorized civil and criminal actions against plant managers and officials who supposedly weren't doing enough to secure their facilities."

Why is this bad? Because "such law would turn Americans against each other rather than allow them to focus on the true, external threat." Our very social fabric would be torn — brother against brother, chemical plant owner against nonchemical plant owner. Much better to leave the plants unprotected than risk those bitter divisions.

Podhoretz goes on to argue, in a manner revealing of the conservative mind-set, that my critique of the situation "flies in the face of the passionate seriousness with which Bush has addressed the issue of homeland security and the war on terror." Let me translate: We know Bush is serious about homeland security because he says he is.

Of course, Bush said he was serious about planning for Hurricane Katrina too.

Terrorist 007, Exposed (WP)

By Rita Katz And Michael Kern

For almost two years, intelligence services around the world tried to uncover the identity of an Internet hacker who had become a key conduit for al-Qaeda. The savvy, English-speaking, presumably young webmaster taunted his pursuers, calling himself Irhabi -- Terrorist -- 007. He hacked into American university computers, propagandized for the Iraq insurgents led by Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and taught other online jihadists how to wield their computers for the cause.

Suddenly last fall, Irhabi 007 disappeared from the message boards. The postings ended after Scotland Yard arrested a 22-year-old West Londoner, Younis Tsouli, suspected of participating in an alleged bomb plot. In November, British authorities brought a range of charges against him related to that plot. Only later, according to our sources familiar with the British probe, was Tsouli's other suspected identity revealed. British investigators eventually confirmed to us that they believe he is Irhabi 007.

The unwitting end of the hunt comes at a time when al-Qaeda sympathizers like Irhabi 007 are making explosive new use of the Internet. Countless Web sites and password-protected forums -- most of which have sprung up in the last several years -- now cater to would-be jihadists like Irhabi 007. The terrorists who congregate in those cybercommunities are rapidly becoming skilled in hacking, programming, executing online attacks and mastering digital and media design -- and Irhabi was a master of all those arts.

But the manner of his arrest demonstrates how challenging it is to combat such online activities and to prevent others from following Irhabi's example: After pursuing an investigation into a European terrorism suspect, British investigators raided Tsouli's house, where they found stolen credit card information, according to an American source familiar with the probe. Looking further, they found that the cards were used to pay American Internet providers on whose servers he had posted jihadi propaganda.

Only then did investigators come to believe that they had netted the infamous hacker. And that element of luck is a problem. The Internet has presented investigators with an extraordinary challenge. But our future security is going to depend increasingly on identifying and catching the shadowy figures who exist primarily in the elusive online world.

The short career of Irhabi 007 offers a case study in the evolving nature of the threat that we at the SITE Institute track every day by monitoring and then joining the password-protected forums and communicating with the online jihadi community. Celebrated for his computer expertise, Irhabi 007 had propelled the jihadists into a 21st-century offensive through his ability to covertly and securely disseminate manuals of weaponry, videos of insurgent feats such as beheadings and other inflammatory material. It is by analyzing the trail of information left by such postings that we are able to distinguish the patterns of communication used by individual terrorists.

Irhabi's success stemmed from a combination of skill and timing. In early 2004, he joined the password-protected message forum known as Muntada al-Ansar al-Islami (Islam Supporters Forum) and, soon after, al-Ekhlas (Sincerity) -- two of the password-protected forums with thousands of members that al-Qaeda had been using for military instructions, propaganda and recruitment. (These two forums have since been taken down.) This was around the time that Zarqawi began using the Internet as his primary means of disseminating propaganda for his insurgency in Iraq. Zarqawi needed computer-savvy associates, and Irhabi proved to be a standout among the volunteers, many of whom were based in Europe.

Irhabi's central role became apparent to outsiders in April of that year, when Zarqawi's group, later renamed al-Qaeda in Iraq, began releasing its communiqués through its official spokesman, Abu Maysara al-Iraqi, on the Ansar forum. In his first posting, al-Iraqi wrote in Arabic about "the good news" that "a group of proud and brave men" intended to "strike the economic interests of the countries of blasphemy and atheism, that came to raise the banner of the Cross in the country of the Muslims."

At the time, some doubted that posting's authenticity, but Irhabi, who was the first to post a response, offered words of support. Before long, al-Iraqi answered in like fashion, establishing their relationship -- and Irhabi's central role.

Over the following year and a half, Irhabi established himself as the top jihadi expert on all things Internet-related. He became a very active member of many jihadi forums in Arabic and English. He worked on both defeating and enhancing online security, linking to multimedia and providing online seminars on the use of the Internet. He seemed to be online night and day, ready to answer questions about how to post a video, for example -- and often willing to take over and do the posting himself. Irhabi focused on hacking into Web sites as well as educating Internet surfers in the secrets to anonymous browsing.

In one instance, Irhabi posted a 20-page message titled "Seminar on Hacking Websites," to the Ekhlas forum. It provided detailed information on the art of hacking, listing dozens of vulnerable Web sites to which one could upload shared media. Irhabi used this strategy himself, uploading data to a Web site run by the state of Arkansas, and then to another run by George Washington University. This stunt led many experts to believe -- erroneously -- that Irhabi was based in the United States.

Irhabi used countless other Web sites as free hosts for material that the jihadists needed to upload and share. In addition to these sites, Irhabi provided techniques for discovering server vulnerabilities, in the event that his suggested sites became secure. In this way, jihadists could use third-party hosts to disseminate propaganda so that they did not have to risk using their own web space and, more importantly, their own money.

As he provided seemingly limitless space captured from vulnerable servers throughout the Internet, Irhabi was celebrated by his online followers. A mark of that appreciation was the following memorandum of praise offered by a member of Ansar in August 2004:

"To Our Brother Irhabi 007. Our brother Irhabi 007, you have shown very good efforts in serving this message board, as I can see, and in serving jihad for the sake of God. By God, we do not like to hear what hurts you, so we ask God to keep you in his care.

You are one of the top people who care about serving your brothers. May God add all of that on the side of your good work, and may you go careful and successful.

We say carry on with God's blessing.

Carry on, may God protect you.

Carry on serving jihad and its supporters.

And I ask the mighty, gracious and merciful God to keep for us everyone who wants to support his faith.

Amen."

Irhabi's hacking ability was useful not only in the exchange of media, but also in the distribution of large-scale al-Qaeda productions. In one instance, a film produced by Zarqawi's al-Qaeda, titled "All Is for Allah's Religion," was distributed from a page at www.alaflam.net/wdkl .

The links, uploaded in June 2005, provided numerous outlets where visitors could find the video. In the event that one of the sites was disabled, many other sources were available as backups. Several were based on domains such as www.irhabi007.ca or www.irhabi007.tv , indicating a strong involvement by Irhabi himself. The film, a major release by al-Qaeda in Iraq, showed many of the insurgents' recent exploits compiled with footage of Osama bin Laden, commentary on the Abu Ghraib prison, and political statements about the rule of then-Iraqi Interim Prime Minister Ayad Allawi.

Tsouli has been charged with eight offenses including conspiracy to murder, conspiracy to cause an explosion, conspiracy to cause a public nuisance, conspiracy to obtain money by deception and offences relating to the possession of articles for terrorist purposes and fundraising. So far there are no charges directly related to his alleged activities as Irhabi on the Internet, but given the charges already mounted against him, it will probably be a long time before the 22-year-old is able to go online again.

But Irhabi's absence from the Internet may not be as noticeable as many hope. Indeed, the hacker had anticipated his own disappearance. In the months beforehand, Irhabi released his will on the Internet. In it, he provided links to help visitors with their own Internet security and hacking skills in the event of his absence -- a rubric for jihadists seeking the means to continue to serve their nefarious ends. Irhabi may have been caught, but his online legacy may be the creation of many thousands of 007s.

FEMA: 'Don't Wait On Maps' (BRA/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press

Baton Rogue Advocate, March 26, 2006

Old levels valid on flood policies

WASHINGTON — Delays in releasing new federal maps of New Orleans' most flood-prone neighborhoods have slowed rebuilding, frustrated homeowners and created uncertainty about the future of the region ravaged by Hurricane Katrina.

And the angst may all be for nothing, the government says.

Residents of the city and surrounding communities have waited since the fall for the maps that will help determine how much flood insurance they will need to rebuild. Under current maps, 80 percent of New Orleans lies in a federally designated flood plain; that figure probably will rise.

Without the maps, homeowners say they do not know if they can afford to stay and buy the additional insurance required by mortgages or if they will be forced to leave and move farther inland.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency, which is issuing preliminary new building standards as early as this week, says homeowners do not have to make that decision now.

They say people who build now will not have to pay higher flood insurance rates even if the new maps and building standards eventually require higher rates. Only people building after the new maps and standards are finished will face higher rates, they say. That process could take another year.

The confusion is the latest example of Gulf Coast residents' distrust of FEMA, which is widely blamed for the government's slow and lackluster storm response. Katrina, which hit Aug. 29, left more than 1,300 people dead and hundreds of thousands homeless.

Asked why so many on the Gulf Coast believe the maps will have an immediate effect on insurance rates, FEMA flood map spokesman Butch Kinerney acknowledged, "They won't believe us."

He also said FEMA has not done a good enough job explaining its policy.

New Orleans native John Hyatt returned to the city after the waters receded to find his home gutted and covered with mold from 5 feet of water. Hyatt is rebuilding his house, but he fears his annual $469 flood insurance premium will double or triple when the maps are issued.

"There's just not a lot of money," said Hyatt, 62, a cargo shipping consultant who cashed in about $60,000 of his retirement savings to repair his gutted, moldy shell of a house.

"We might be faced with a couple of different options — like not take the insurance and hope for the best," Hyatt said.

After months of delays, FEMA is expected to issue advisory standards this week suggesting how high homes need to be rebuilt to be considered safer from floods in Orleans, Jefferson, St. Bernard and Plaquemines parishes in southern Louisiana. Orleans includes the city of New Orleans.

The standards will be followed by geographic maps later this spring that probably will expand the boundary of the region's flood plain — the area with the greatest potential to flood each year.

The flood plain maps have not been updated since the mid-1980s.

The preliminary building standards and maps must be approved by local officials, many of whom will spend the next year negotiating the details.

Construction begun before the maps are approved will be insured under current rates, FEMA's Kinerney said. Only projects built after the maps are adopted will feel the rate change, he said.

"You don't need to wait on us, and you don't need to wait on these maps," Kinerney said. "Rates are not going up for anyone in compliance. As long as you're in compliance now when you build your house, you'll always be in compliance."

The problem comes as Congress considers revamping the FEMA-run National Flood Insurance Program, which will pay out an estimated $23 billion in flood insurance claims as a result of hurricanes Katrina and Rita. The program collects about $2 billion annually in premiums, and is depending on loans from the Treasury to fulfill current claims.

Bud Schauerte, who administered the flood insurance program in the first Bush administration between 1991 and 1993, said the maps will all but certainly raise premium rates along the Gulf Coast.

"The liability is just too great; it's too much of a risk," Schauerte said. "This is why you have insurance — to protect yourself. So they can't afford it? Maybe they should move inland if it costs more."

FEMA has issued the advisory maps in three Mississippi counties and 11 other Louisiana parishes that were not protected by levees when Katrina hit. Communities ultimately can reject the final federal standards, but they rarely do as they would then be ineligible for future flood relief.

In Gulfport, Miss., Mayor Brent Warr is pushing FEMA to scale back new flood plain building standards that raise the base of a house by 2 feet — from 15 feet to 17 feet.

The new elevation levels would be too high, Warr said, and would result in costly insurance premiums for about 600 homeowners in his city who cannot build to those standards. Homeowners who refuse to pay the higher insurance rates will almost certainly see their property values depreciate.

"It's their sole investment, and now because (FEMA) set the new line, the value of the home went down," Warr said. "And you've just taken away something that's pretty precious."

Those concerns are mirrored in the New Orleans area, too, where the map delays have exhausted the patience of residents.

"It is definitely slowing the process for people to come back and repair their homes," said Jefferson Parish flood plain manager Tom Rodrigue. "It's a joke."

Engineers' Panel Urges Study Of All Levees In New Orleans (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The safety of New Orleans's battered levees is "open to question" until the entire system can be analyzed in light of new information about how the 17th Street Canal levee failed after Hurricane Katrina, according to a review panel of civil engineers.

In a strongly worded letter sent Friday to Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, the chief engineer of the Army Corps of Engineers, the panel, from the American Society of Civil Engineers, said that "a determination of the overall safety of the hurricane protection system cannot be made until such time as the remainder of the system can be evaluated with the benefit of this new information."

The Corps has been racing to repair damaged sections of the levees by June 1, the start of the Atlantic hurricane season. The letter argues that regardless of the quality of those repairs, the parts of the system that survived the hurricane and were built to the old standard should be given a close look before the city can be declared safe.

The group found that the 17th Street Canal floodwall "appears to reflect an overall pattern of engineering judgment inconsistent with that required for critical structures."

The design, the letter said, did not include a margin of safety allowing for stresses beyond the expected: for example, I-shaped walls were used when an inverted-T shape would have provided greater strength.

The review panel, which the Corps formed to analyze the work of its own investigation of the levee failures, was responding to a March 10 report by the investigators. The report found that the designers of the levees and floodwalls had not anticipated that floodwaters might push the floodwall away from the soil base, allowing water to course down into the gap and push the structure aside.

A 1988 report by the Corps showed that such a chain of events was possible. That and other studies, apparently, "never triggered an assessment of the impact that such a gap would have on the stability of the existing levee and floodwall system," the panel of engineers said.

The Corps investigators' report said a second factor in the 17th Street Canal failure was soft soils behind the levee that did not withstand the push from within the canal.

All such soils should be tested and "all I-walls should be re-evaluated" immediately to see what stress they can withstand, the engineers' group said in its letter.

Ivor van Heerden, a leader of Team Louisiana, the group studying the levee failures for the state, said he was pleasantly surprised to see that the panel had reached similar findings. The fact that the groups the Corps formed to review its work have taken such a strong stand, he said, means "it's not just the crazy Cajuns with funny-sounding accents" criticizing the Corps.

A Corps spokesman, Paul Johnston, said that "in general, we agree" with the engineers' concerns, adding, "In fact, we're already implementing a lot of those recommendations."

The review panel's chairman, David E. Daniel, said in an interview that he was encouraged to see that the Corps accepted the conclusions. But, he said, "Simply restoring levees to pre-Katrina levels does not address the question of whether the design was adequate in the first place."

Dr. Daniel, who is also the president of the University of Texas at Dallas, also criticized the tendency of some Corps officials and public figures to proclaim the levees safe.

People deserve "the straight scoop on what the risks are, for those who do decide to return to New Orleans," Dr. Daniel said.

WAR NEWS:

Fear Casts A Shadow On 'Free City' Touted By Bush (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

TALL AFAR, Iraq — Last fall, thousands of U.S. and Iraqi troops descended on this ancient city close to the border with Syria. In the shadow of an Ottoman-era castle, they fought in narrow alleyways to clear the city of insurgents.

Last week, President Bush held up Tall Afar as an example of success in the country, calling it "a free city that gives reason for hope for a free Iraq."

The large-scale offensive in September, dubbed "Restoring Rights," may have rid Tall Afar of hard-core insurgent cells. But today this ethnically mixed city has become mired in the same sectarian strife and economic problems that afflict much of the rest of the country.

Fear is palpable in the streets of Tall Afar. Residents complain that the city is increasingly divided as tribal violence sharpens the boundaries between Sunni and Shiite Muslim neighborhoods.

"Violence has increased, mortar attacks have increased, roadside bombs have increased," said Mohammed Taqi, a national legislator from the city who recently wrote to Iraq's interim president and prime minister, requesting that Tall Afar's administrative affairs be handled in Baghdad rather than the provincial capital, Mosul. The roads to that city — as well as two neighborhoods in Tall Afar — are controlled by insurgents, he said.

While acknowledging the rebel holdouts in the city, U.S. commanders here say that attacks have decreased significantly after last fall's offensive.

To prevent more violence, the streets have been blanketed with troops. Four thousand U.S. troops and 8,000 Iraqi troops as well as about 1,700 police officers are in the city of 200,000 residents, said Col. Sean MacFarland, commander of the 1st Brigade Combat Team, 1st Armored Division.

"You can't go very far without seeing a patrol base or a checkpoint," he said.

But families in Tall Afar complain of no-go areas in the city, boundaries drawn up by sectarian violence or intimidation by rebels.

One sheik, Hashim Antar, said rebels were targeting Shiites to incite sectarian violence. These days, he said, Shiites cannot safely visit the city's only hospital.

"What is increasing is the targeting of the Shiites by the terrorist groups," he said.

MacFarland acknowledged that "there's a lot of intimidation going on" in the city, adding that most of the recent violence is between tribes.

"The situation is bad in Tall Afar," said Mohammed Abdullah, a 52-year-old retired government employee, as he was leaving the Khalil Yas mosque in the Sarai neighborhood Friday.

"Every day we hear about the police and the army clashing with armed men [and] random assassinations between the tribes," said Abdullah, a Sunni. "The people can't live their normal lives. The man is afraid of his brother."

A hospital official said 71 Tall Afar residents had been killed in the last five months.

Although U.S. troops will remain in and around Tall Afar, commanders have moved up the date of the city's transfer this year to the Iraqi army's control.

"Our goal is to slowly diminish the U.S. presence," MacFarland said.

DOJ_NMG_0021797

In a press tour last week arranged by U.S. officials to highlight advances made in the city, Mayor Najim Abdullah Jubouri said he believed it would take at least three years before Iraqi security forces would be able to secure the city without the help of American forces.

Later that day, a mortar attack in the city wounded six children.

Devising an economic as well as a military strategy will be key to overcoming violence in the city, U.S. commanders say.

"It's been said that you can't kill your way out of an insurgency, and it's true," MacFarland said. "I think a military-age male, after a hard day of digging the land, won't go out and plant" roadside bombs.

But six months after the U.S.-led operation destroyed parts of the city, the local government has not honored claims from thousands of families whose houses or businesses were ruined.

The Iraqi government initially promised $50 million to rebuild the city, but not all of the money has arrived, said Mohammed Jimsheed, head of the city's reconstruction committee.

Money to compensate families has been allocated but not yet distributed, Jimsheed said, pointing to a holdup at the mayor's office.

The mayor said that processing paperwork for nearly 30,000 families had taken longer than expected and that, eventually, each family would receive 250,000 Iraqi dinars, or about $170.

Many of Tall Afar's residents remain displaced, some waiting for compensation to rebuild their homes, others fearing violence. MacFarland estimated that about a quarter of Tall Afar remained empty, with parts of the city still uninhabitable.

At the market, many shopkeepers draw the shutters and close their business as early as 4 p.m., afraid of walking through the city at night.

"The place here is not safe at all," said Salim Ibrahim, a local leader. He, like many others, is still apprehensive about Tall Afar's future. For now, he said, "it's a city of ghosts."

Colonel Becomes Bush Poster Boy (BOS)

By Nina J. Easton

The Boston Globe, March 26, 2006

In the brutal world of Washington politics, it pays to keep your friends close -- and your potential critics even closer. Was that President Bush's strategy last week when he repeatedly lauded the work of Colonel H. R. McMaster of the Third Armored Calvary Regiment?

McMaster led US and Iraqi forces last year in a successful operation to recapture the town of Tal Afar, which had become a haven for Al Qaeda after US forces failed to keep the region under their control. The town's mayor commended McMaster for transforming a terrorist-controlled "slaughterhouse" into a city that is "breathing life again."

But McMaster also happens to be the author of the award-winning book "Dereliction of Duty: Lyndon Johnson, Robert McNamara, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, and the Lies that Led to Vietnam," published in 1997 and still widely read among Pentagon brass. As the title suggests, McMaster's book is a searing account of official deception behind the Vietnam War.

McMaster's position at the heart of the Iraq war begs the question: Does he hold views that will wind up in a similarly critical account of President Bush's war? "As a trained historian, I'm reluctant to draw parallels," McMaster said in an interview Friday.

Meanwhile, this soldier-scholar -- who taught at West Point and was a fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution -- now stars in Bush speeches explaining how the military is winning friends in Iraq.

In other words, McMaster has become the president's poster boy for US progress on the ground.

McMaster, who spoke to us from Fort Carson, Colo., where his regiment is based, wasn't about to spill the beans on his personal views about the leadership of the Iraq war or whether there's another book in his future.

"As a military officer, it's my job to do our mission," he said.

When pressed for his views on the Iraq war, McMaster laughed and added, "Gosh, it's a lot easier to talk about things from 30 years ago."

Rumsfeldian wit stays sharp

The knives were out for Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld last week, starting with a New York Times op-ed article March 19 in which retired General Paul D. Eaton, who was in charge of training the Iraqi military from 2003 to 2004, called for his former boss's resignation and accused Rumsfeld of putting the Pentagon "at the mercy of his ego."

The Washington press corps took the cue, and at a news conference Thursday, reporters pestered the irascible Rumsfeld with questions about whether he felt "at all embattled" or whether he should "step down and smell the roses, perhaps?"

It's safe to report that the defense secretary has lost none of the famed Rumsfeldian wit. One reporter cited a column by New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd quoting an unnamed administration official asserting that in administration meetings Rumsfeld is treated as "an eccentric old uncle who's ignored."

Rumsfeld shot back, "If you believe everything you read in Maureen Dowd, you better get a life." With that, Rumsfeld got a laugh.

Website targets legislator's tastes

Republicans have launched a website, www.fancyford.com, which ridicules US Representative Harold Ford Jr., the Tennessee Democrat running for Senator Bill Frist's seat this year, for his expensive tastes.

Ford, the site says, "likes to live the good life . . . perhaps a little too much. . . . Lavish hotel stays. Fine Dining. Couture suits. Parties with Playboy playmates. All on the campaign contributors' dime."

Apparently, though, Ford considered this slam below-the-(Armani) belt, so he complained.

The result? More publicity for the Republican website. The site has now received more than 256,000 hits, and Dan Ronayne, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, says he appreciates the help.

Of course, the Democrats have struck back with their own Web attack: www.fancyfrist.com, which accuses the Senate Republican leader of lavish hotel stays, big business-funded chartered flights, and investment schemes with the family fortune.

The only problem with the Democrats' counterattack: Ford is running for a Senate seat; Frist is retiring.

Weapon of choice? The Web

And more Web attacks: Republicans are trying to make light of the Democrats' repeated allegation of "dangerous incompetence" against the White House.

The Michigan GOP -- thrilled with Democratic Senator Debbie Stabenow's unfortunate video image in which she stood next to a sign reading "DANGEROUS INCOMPETENCE" -- have launched a fairly hilarious website mocking her: www.dangerousdebbie.com.

Kennedy pitches book in blue zone

Howard Dean, Democratic National Committee chairman, may be trekking through conservative states to make the case for his party. But Senator Edward M. Kennedy apparently doesn't feel the need. The tour for his newly released book, "America Back on Track," stays safely inside the Amtrak blue zone: New York, Boston, and Washington, D.C.

Plan Is Floated To Open Choice Of Premier To Iraqi Parliament (NYT)

By Edward Wong

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 25 — Iraqi politicians say they are considering asking the main Shiite political bloc to allow a vote by the entire Parliament on a candidate for prime minister. In the proposed plan, the Parliament would choose among three candidates, including Ibrahim al-Jaafari, the current prime minister, the politicians say.

The Shiite bloc, which has 130 of 275 seats in the Parliament, has already nominated Mr. Jaafari to be the next prime minister. Political negotiations to form a new government have been deadlocked over the past month on the issue — the main Kurdish, Sunni Arab and secular blocs in Parliament are all opposing Mr. Jaafari, for various reasons.

Under the Constitution that Iraqi voters approved last fall, the bloc with the most seats in Parliament gets first shot at nominating a prime minister. The document has no explicit passages allowing the entire Parliament to decide on a nominee.

The idea of having Parliament vote for one of three Shiite candidates is being floated among the blocs opposing Mr. Jaafari's candidacy. Some leaders of those blocs would prefer that the Shiites nominate Adel Abdul Mahdi, another prominent Shiite politician. Early last month, the Shiites held a secret ballot among themselves to choose the nominee, and Mr. Mahdi lost to Mr. Jaafari by one vote.

Politicians supporting a parliamentary vote to nominate the prime minister say the plan has yet to be formally presented to the Shiite bloc.

The vote would be a way for the Shiite bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, to back down from their support of Mr. Jaafari in light of the intense opposition and still save face, said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish legislator.

"We don't want to embarrass the United Iraqi Alliance," he said in a telephone interview.

Mr. Jaafari has been widely criticized for failing to quell the insurgency, letting Shiite death squads run rampant and doing little to improve reconstruction.

So far, the various parties in the Shiite bloc have publicly stood by Mr. Jaafari. The question is whether there is dissent among them behind closed doors, and whether the Shiite alliance will crack.

Haider al-Ubady, an adviser to Mr. Jaafari and a member of the Shiite bloc, said the proposed vote "is not being discussed at all inside the alliance." He said there was no legal mechanism that allowed for the Parliament as a whole to elect the nominee for prime minister.

The talks over government formation continued Saturday afternoon at the riverside villa of President Jalal Talabani. Before the negotiations, Mr. Talabani met briefly with the United States ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, and a delegation of visiting American politicians including Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin.

"We expressed our concern and urgency concerning the issue of forming a government of unity," Senator McCain said at a news conference.

A bomb in a traffic police booth exploded in the morning, killing at least four civilians in a minibus and wounding two others, an Interior Ministry official said. Friday night, American forces found the bodies of six people who had been garroted, and the Iraqi police on Saturday found a body that had been tortured and shot, the official said. At least 240 bodies of people shot dead have been found in nearly three weeks. A 4 p.m., a mortar struck a residential area of Mahmudiya, south of Baghdad, killing at least four people and wounding at least 13.

Failure To Form Government Is Hurting Iraq, Leaders Admit (KRT)

By Nancy A. Youssef

BAGHDAD - Iraqi leaders acknowledge that their inability to form a government more than three months after national elections aggravates religious and ethnic violence and is eroding public confidence that they can solve the nation's problems.

Some leaders said that forming an effective and inclusive democratic state takes time, but the security situation does not give them that luxury. Some fear that even after a government is formed, it could be difficult to reverse religious tensions that have only increased since the Dec. 15 elections.

"The situation is getting worse, and people are losing hope. That despair stokes violence," said Saleh Al-Mutlaq, a Sunni Muslim and member of the Iraqi National Dialogue slate.

Since the Feb. 22 bombing of the sacred Shiite Golden Dome in Samarra, as many as 1,000 people have been killed in retaliatory violence. Another 10 bodies were discovered throughout Baghdad Saturday, nearly all tortured.

Both sects of Islam are under attack. Scores of the dead have been Sunnis killed by largely Shiite militias, while Shiites have been targeted by the Sunni-dominated insurgency. The tit-for-tat killings cause Iraqis to feel that they must fend for themselves because the state cannot protect them from members of their rival sect, who are often their neighbors.

On Saturday, Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, said that militias now are killing more Iraqis than the insurgency, an apparent reversal since the election.

"It obviously is not good to have a vacuum. That is undeniable," said Barham Saleh, a top Kurdish leader. "We need to make a change and bring about a government."

Leaders offered a myriad of reasons for the delay in forming a government, and their reasoning often reflected their religious or ethnic loyalties. Shiite leaders accused American officials of interfering too much, saying the Americans want to give Sunnis more power than they earned in the election. Sunnis charged that the other parties are not committed to a national unity government and are unwilling to share power.

The Shiite slate, the United Iraqi Alliance, won 128 seats, 10 short of a majority; members will serve four-year terms.

Khalilzad has "shown bias to certain groups and that impedes the flow of negotiations," said Haider Ibadi, an advisor to interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al Jaafari. "There must be coordination and cooperation among Iraqi groups to accelerate the formation of the government. Instead, it is clear there is an effort to weaken the biggest block."

Still others said the delay was because leaders couldn't decide whether the newly created National Security Council should be more than an advisory board. And they said they still don't know who will serve in key ministries, like Defense and Interior.

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish National Assembly member, said elected leaders did not begin serious discussions until 10 days ago.

Shortly after the election for Iraq's 275-member parliament, U.S. leaders said the new governing body must be more representative than the largely Shiite interim assembly. They said that if Sunnis still feel ostracized after voting, it could strengthen the insurgency.

Despite the delay, the fact that elected leaders are willing to take some responsibility for the state of the country is encouraging, said Noah Feldman, a law professor of New York University, who visited Iraq with U.S. officials in 2003.

"If they are acknowledging that the delay is costing them - that it is making things worse - that is a step in the right direction," said Feldman.

During a visit to Khartoum Friday, Iraq's Foreign Minister Hoshiyar Zebari said he was optimistic that the parties would not continuing holding out for only their own interests.

"If we fail to get a government that is accepted by all key Iraqi political players and communities, the country would degenerate into more instability and everybody would then take the law into their own hands and the country would be divided," he said.

Jaafari has said he thinks leaders will form a new government by the end of next month.

U.S. Losing Patience, Senators Tell Iraqis (WP)

By Vanessa Arrington

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- As a gunbattle raged south of Baghdad, Sens. John McCain and Russell Feingold told Iraqi leaders Saturday that American patience was growing thin and they needed to urgently overcome their stalemate and form a national unity government.

It was the second high-level U.S. delegation in less than a week delivering the same stark message to Iraqi politicians as the Bush administration steps up pressure to overcome the political impasse that threatens to scuttle hopes to start an American troop pullout this summer.

"We need very badly to form this unity government as soon as possible," McCain, R-Ariz., said at a news conference after meetings with President Jalal Talabani and Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari. "We all know the polls show declining support among the American people."

The U.S. delegation also voiced alarm about increasing sectarian violence in Iraq showing itself in the daily count of drive-by shootings, bombings and dumped corpses, victims of execution-style killings in the shadowy Shiite-Sunni settling of scores.

Seven people _ most civilians killed in their homes by mortar fire _ died and several others were wounded in a gunbattle between forces of the Shiite Mahdi Army militia and Sunni insurgents near Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of the capital.

At least 13 other people were killed in scattered violence Saturday and two more bodies were found dumped in the capital, shot in the head with their hands and feet bound.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who has patiently shepherded negotiations to form a new government, already was looking beyond that task to the need to cap the sectarian, militia-inspired killing.

"More Iraqis are dying today from the militia violence than from the terrorists," Khalilzad told reporters during a visit to a sports complex refurbished with American aid. "This will be a challenge for the new government _ what to do about the militias."

The country's leadership must "overcome the strife that threatens to rip apart Iraq," he said.

Nevertheless, a sixth session of multi-party meetings Saturday failed to overcome the logjam that has snarled formation of a government for more than three months.

Feingold, of Wisconsin and the ranking Democrat in the U.S. delegation joined McCain in pressing for the quick formation of a government, but he spoke bluntly of his concern that the continued presence of American forces was prolonging the conflict.

"It's the reality of a situation like this that when you have a large troop presence that it has the tendency to fuel the insurgency because they can make the incorrect and unfair claim that somehow the United States is here to occupy this country, which of course is not true," Feingold said.

With November's midterm congressional elections drawing nearer and American voters increasingly disenchanted with the Iraq war, the two visits in quick succession by high-powered U.S. politicians signaled deep concern over potential fallout from a lack of progress in Iraq.

"We are very concerned about the sectarian violence that is happening out there and how that erodes not only the confidence of the Iraqi people in this process, but certainly also the confidence of the American people and their commitment to this effort," Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., said.

Talabani, a Kurd, has formed a coalition with Sunni and secular politicians against a second term for al-Jaafari, a move that only deepened the government stalemate more than three months after the Dec. 15 parliamentary elections.

The U.S. politicians met separately with each of the men, as well as the U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey.

On Tuesday, a delegation led by Sen. John Warner, the Virginia Republican who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, delivered the same tough message, saying the uneasiness back home could force U.S. lawmakers to press for a reduction in American troop strength if the government delay were prolonged _ regardless of the consequences.

McCain agreed that the damage could be enormous.

Failure in Iraq, he said, would leave "this part of the world in chaos. Not just Iraq, but all of the surrounding countries as well."

In other violence Saturday, according to police:

_ A female teacher was killed by Iraqi soldiers as she drove past their convoy in Baghdad.

_ A Sunni mosque preacher was killed by gunmen when he stopped to have his car repaired in west Baghdad.

_ Gunmen killed a man driving with his family and wounded his two sons in the capital.

_ A bomb exploded in a traffic police hut near the Iraqi Finance Ministry in north Baghdad, killing four civilians and wounding five people, including a traffic policeman.

_ Gunmen killed three people in the northern city of Mosul.

_ Drive-by gunmen killed the bodyguard of the head of Basra's Sunni Endowment, the organization that oversees the sect's religious property in the predominantly Shiite southern city.

U.S. Again Presses Iraqis On Task (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Visiting officials note waning support among Americans for the war and remind leaders of the urgent need to form a unity government.

BAGHDAD — For the second time in less than a week, a group of U.S. senators met Saturday with Iraqi leaders to warn that American interest in stabilizing the country could dwindle unless they speed up work to form a unity government.

"This issue needs to be resolved, not only quickly but also inclusively," Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said as Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, standing beside him, nodded in agreement.

McCain, who backed the 2003 U.S.-led invasion to topple Saddam Hussein, said later he believed Iraqis "understand the sense of urgency we have conveyed to them."

"We all know the polls show declining support among the American people," McCain said.

As his delegation left a lunch at Talabani's villa, heavily armed convoys arrived, bringing leaders of Iraq's main political blocs to another round of wrangling over priorities and procedural rules for a new government. Later they reported progress, but cautioned that the task was complex.

Political violence claimed at least 20 lives across the country Saturday. The bloodiest attack occurred in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad, where mortar rounds from insurgents that were apparently aimed at an Iraqi army base hit a nearby neighborhood and mosque, killing four civilians and wounding 13.

The day's casualties also included victims of apparent sectarian attacks, a Sunni Muslim imam who had stopped on a Baghdad street to repair his car and two men found with hands and feet tied and bullet wounds to the head.

Speaking at a community sports center during the day, U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad told Iraqi athletes that the violence "threatens to rip Iraq apart." He called the effort to form a government "a defining moment." Iraq's ethnic and religious political factions have been deadlocked in that effort since the Dec. 15 elections left none with a majority in parliament.

One obstacle has been resistance to the dominant Shiite bloc's nomination of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari to keep his job. Another is distrust among the religious, ethnic and secular political factions.

Facing vocal criticism from U.S. officials and ordinary Iraqis, factional leaders have met several times over the last two weeks and reported some progress. A week ago, they agreed to create a 19-member council representing the main factions to guide the new government's policies. On Friday they settled a dispute over the council's authority by deciding that its decisions wouldn't be binding on the prime minister or his Cabinet.

Saturday's talks focused on principles for the government, a formula for giving each faction a share of Cabinet seats, and a procedure for reaching Cabinet decisions.

Participants said they expected to reach agreement on those points in the coming days. They said they had set no deadline for the more difficult task of deciding who would fill the posts of president, prime minister, speaker of parliament, and the Cabinet.

"I sympathize very much with people who say the Iraqi street is very disturbed by this delay," Tariq Hashimi, a Sunni participant in the talks, said at a news conference after Saturday's session. "What we are discussing is quite serious. It demands a lot of effort to prepare a solid political foundation. Naming the people in charge of the government, that will happen as soon as we build the foundation."

A Western diplomat monitoring the talks said the effort was more complex than it was last year, when Shiites and Kurds took nearly three months to form an interim government.

"This time the Sunnis are in the game," he said, noting that Sunni parties had boycotted the January 2005 vote. "It's good that the talks are more inclusive, but it's harder to make the necessary compromises."

The most explosive issue for the new government is how to curb Shiite militias. Some of them operate from within the police force, and they are accused of killing hundreds of unarmed Sunnis in sectarian attacks. The principles being studied in the negotiations include a commitment to dissolve those militias.

McCain said his delegation asked Iraqi leaders about the issue Saturday but "didn't get any real frank discussion of it." The delegation included two other senators, three House members and three governors. A separate delegation of six senators visited Iraq on Tuesday.

Sen. Russell D. Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat and opponent of the war, joined Saturday in pressing for the speedy formation of a government. But he also voiced concern that the continued U.S. presence "has the tendency to fuel the insurgency."

Asked by reporters whether the U.S. visitors had brought helpful advice for breaking the stalemate, Talabani said: "Only friendly words like, 'Please hurry up.' "

McCain, Feingold Air Views In Iraq (WP)

By Jonathan Finer

Visiting Legislators Debate U.S. Policy as Violence Rages

BAGHDAD, March 25 -- The increasingly rancorous public debate in the United States over the war spilled into Iraq during a news conference Saturday with two visiting lawmakers who are outspoken in their opposing stands on the issue.

Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a longtime supporter of the Bush administration's Iraq policy, and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), who voted against the invasion and has spoken out against the war ever since, said they had come not to air their divergent views but to urge Iraqi politicians to speed up the process of forming a government. But during questions from reporters, they argued -- cordially and pointedly -- over such issues as the timing of any withdrawal of U.S. troops and whether their continued presence is doing more harm than good.

Feingold said he believed "a large troop presence has a tendency to fuel the insurgency because they can make the incorrect and unfair claim that the U.S. is here to occupy the country."

"I think that it's very possible that the sectarian differences are inflamed by the fact that U.S. troops are here," he continued, adding that their long-term presence "may well be destabilizing, not stabilizing."

Asked a question on a different topic, McCain quickly responded: "I believe that premature troop withdrawal is not in consonance with what's going on the ground."

With Iraq bogged down in sectarian violence in recent months while political leaders struggle to form a new government, debate over the American presence has intensified in the United States. Several visiting politicians, including McCain, have warned that the American public was turning against the war and urged Iraqi leaders to move more quickly in building a coalition government.

U.S. politicians traditionally avoid public disagreements when traveling abroad, particularly in war zones where U.S. troops are engaged. McCain said the argument was better suited for the Senate floor, and Feingold said he would "go into more details when I'm home." The two senators, considered potential presidential candidates in 2008, were among a seven-member delegation of legislators and governors -- five Republicans and two Democrats -- who met Saturday with such Iraqi leaders as President Jalal Talabani and Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jafari, and with U.S. military commanders.

Their visit came as more violence was reported across Iraq, including a terrifying incident earlier in the week in the western city of Ramadi. On Wednesday, armed insurgents burst into the classroom of Khidhir al-Mihallawi, an English teacher at Sajariyah High School, accused him of being an agent for the CIA and Israeli intelligence and beheaded him in front of his students, according to students, fellow instructors and a physician at a local hospital.

One teacher, who spoke on the condition that he not be named because he feared retaliation from insurgents, said that most students ran from the classroom but that some stayed to watch. Many stopped coming to school after the incident, he said. Another teacher, who said he moved his mathematics class to his home to accommodate frightened students, said Mihallawi had earlier been threatened because he worked as a translator for U.S. forces in Ramadi, a hotbed of the Sunni Arab insurgency.

Mihallawi "looked at us just like he was telling us that we do not have to be scared. Even as we were running out of the door, his looks were still telling us that nothing will happen and we do not have to be scared," said a student, whose father asked that his name not be used. "I heard him screaming for a few seconds, then stop screaming."

The father said his son has had trouble sleeping since the incident. "He always has nightmares and he always wakes up screaming and shaking, talking in his dreams," he said.

The mujaheddin shura, a recently formed council of insurgent groups believed to be led by al-Qaeda in Iraq, said in a statement distributed in several Ramadi mosques that Mihallawi had provided information about insurgents to U.S. forces. "Because of that, the religious committee at the al-Qaeda court sentenced him to death to apply God's punishment," the statement continued.

A physician at Ramadi's hospital said he kept Mihallawi's body in a morgue refrigerator until his family could recover it discreetly. The Post is withholding the physician's name for security reasons.

A spokesman for the U.S. Marines in Anbar province, of which Ramadi is the capital, said he had no information on the attack. A spokesman for al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Maysara al-Iraqi, acknowledged that the group had killed Mihallawi but denied he was beheaded and said he was killed outside the school. He asked reporters not to publicize the incident, calling it "an internal affair."

In Baghdad on Saturday, a mortar shell struck a home in the restive neighborhood of Dora, killing two people and wounding six, according to police Capt. Raad al-Timmimi.

Elsewhere in Iraq, police officers south of Baghdad found the bodies of at least 10 people shot to death with their hands bound. East of Baghdad, four people were killed and two wounded when a roadside bomb tore through their vehicle. And in the town of Mahmudiyah, police said Sunni insurgents fought for several hours with members of a Shiite militia loyal to influential cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, leading to the detention of several insurgents.

With sectarian violence surging across the country since the bombing last month of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad, each member of the U.S. delegation visiting Baghdad stressed the urgency of forming a new government. McCain pointed to a dearth of economic development but said he had been encouraged by reports of improvements in Iraq's security forces and a burgeoning rift between Iraqi and foreign insurgents. "The statistics that I see is that slow and steady progress is being made," the Arizona senator said.

Feingold, who recently called for the Senate to censure President Bush over a domestic surveillance program run by the National Security Agency, said he was dismayed not to hear any of the military commanders he met with mention al-Qaeda as a source of the problems in Iraq. The Bush administration and U.S. officials here often point to the radical group as a major source of instability in the country.

"There seems to be a disconnect between the rhetoric in Washington about what this is all about and what we hear here," Feingold said. McCain responded that he did "not want to get into a back-and-forth with one of my best friends."

"Russ could have been a lot more outspoken," said Rep. Tom Udall (D-N.M.), who was part of the visiting delegation. "There's always been with foreign policy an idea that debate stops at the shores. . . . At times today it didn't."

Special correspondents Naseer Nouri, Omar Fekeiki and Saad al-Izzi in Baghdad and Saad Sarhan in Najaf contributed to this report.

Violence Worse In Iraq, Pawlenty Says (MINNST)

By Mary Lynn Smith

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 26, 2006

In a visit to Iraq, he urged officials there to move more quickly to form a government

On his second tour of Iraq since 2004, Gov. Tim Pawlenty said he could see and feel that the violence there has worsened. But withdrawing troops would create more chaos in the Middle East, he said during a Saturday telephone news conference from Baghdad.

Pawlenty quietly left Minnesota on Thursday for a visit to Iraq with a delegation led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. With 2,600 Minnesota National Guard members headed to Iraq, Pawlenty got an up-close look at the situation there.

The delegation met with leaders in Kuwait and then made its way to Iraq, where it has met with high-ranking U.S. and Iraqi officials.

Pawlenty acknowledged growing frustration among Americans over the war.

"In many ways, it has been two steps forward and one step back," Pawlenty said Saturday. "There's no question about that. And there have been mistakes made. There's no question about that and we have to be candid and blunt about that."

More than three months after Iraqi elections, the country's coalition government still isn't up and running, Pawlenty said. "And that is a matter of significant concern," he said.

Talking to Iraqi leaders, the American delegation made clear there's an urgency to show more tangible progress

The hope is that a coalition government will bring the opposing factions to the table, possibly reducing the violence and the need for U.S. soldiers.

Withdrawing U.S. troops now could result in more instability in Iraq, Pawlenty said. "It has the potential of creating turmoil in the Middle East [at] a profound level," he said.

"People understandably have mixed feelings about the war," he said. But he called for unified support of the troops, who he said display fortitude, courage, morale and dedication that are inspiring.

The delegation, he said, is meeting with troops to express gratitude for their service. Pawlenty said he will return to Minnesota in a few days but said he couldn't disclose travel plans because of security concerns.

A Professor's Bleak View Of Iraq's Future (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 26, 2006

"Insurgency and Counter-Insurgency in Iraq" (Cornell), by Prof. Ahmed S. Hashim of the United States Naval War College, is a pessimistic analysis of the war that is causing controversy ahead of its May publication.

In a phone interview, Mr. Hashim, who finished the book last November, discussed his findings.

Q. Can the insurgency be stopped?

A.The insurgency is primarily in Anbar Province, in western Iraq, but also along the fault lines wherever the major ethno-sectarian groups rub up against one another.

To begin to improve the situation, we need to focus on resolving violence in those places, make sure the Iraqi security forces are representative of the entire country and, thirdly, to stop cosseting the Shiite religious bodies. Not by ignoring them — you can't ignore groups that represent 60 percent of the population. But they are not our natural allies in trying create a democratic Iraq. They are trying to create a theocracy, and the more religion enters Iraqi politics, the more violence there will be.

Q. So what should American troops do?

A. We still tend to have an approach of big unit actions, killing people instead of creating a mixed basket of military, political, economic, diplomatic and cultural initiatives to help the Iraqis.

The military culture still has little understanding of the origins and goals of the insurgency. They still think it has primarily to do with Al Qaeda, and ignore the fact that the Sunni insurgents feel their identity is threatened.

Q. What is likely to happen next?

A. The best way to salvage the situation is to reorient our strategy to create a loose federation, stationing American troops at the fault lines between the ethno-sectarian groups to prevent them from killing each other until the hatred and violence of last few years dissipate. In a few years' time, they can sit down and talk and wonder how they can proceed from their loose confederation to something else.

Bound, Blindfolded And Dead: The Face Of Atrocity In Baghdad (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 25 — Mohannad al-Azawi had just finished sprinkling food in his bird cages at his pet shop in southern Baghdad, when three carloads of gunmen pulled up.

In front of a crowd, he was grabbed by his shirt and driven off.

Mr. Azawi was among the few Sunni Arabs on the block, and, according to witnesses, when a Shiite friend tried to intervene, a gunman stuck a pistol to his head and said, "You want us to blow your brains out, too?"

Mr. Azawi's body was found the next morning at a sewage treatment plant. A slight man who raised nightingales, he had been hogtied, drilled with power tools and shot.

In the last month, hundreds of men have been kidnapped, tortured and executed in Baghdad. As Iraqi and American leaders struggle to avert a civil war, the bodies keep piling up. The city's homicide rate has tripled from 11 to 33 a day, military officials said. The period from March 7 to March 21 was typically brutal: at least 191 bodies, many mutilated, surfaced in garbage bins, drainage ditches, minibuses and pickup trucks.

There were the four Duleimi brothers, Khalid, Tarek, Taleb and Salaam, seized from their home in front of their wives. And Achmed Abdulsalam, last seen at a checkpoint in his freshly painted BMW and found dead under a bridge two days later. And Mushtak al-Nidawi, a law student nicknamed Titanic for his Leonardo DiCaprio good looks, whose body was returned to his family with his skull chopped in half.

What frightens Iraqis most about these gangland-style killings is the impunity. According to reports filed by family members and more than a dozen interviews, many men were taken in daylight, in public, with witnesses all around. Few cases, if any, have been investigated.

Part of the reason may be that most victims are Sunnis, and there is growing suspicion that they were killed by Shiite death squads backed by government forces in a cycle of sectarian revenge. That allegation has been circulating in Baghdad for months, and as more Sunnis turn up dead, more people are inclined to believe it.

"This is sectarian cleansing," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of Parliament, who has maintained a degree of neutrality between Shiites and Sunnis.

Mr. Othman said there were atrocities on each side. "But what is different is when Shiites get killed by suicide bombs, everyone comes together to fight the Sunni terrorists," he said. "When Shiites kill Sunnis, there is no response, because much of this killing is done by militias connected to the government."

The imbalance of killing, and the suspicion the government may be involved, is deepening the Shiite-Sunni divide, just as American officials are urging Sunni and Shiite leaders to form an inclusive government, hoping that such a show of unity will prevent a full-scale civil war.

The pressure is increasing on Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, a Shiite, but few expect him to crack down, partly because he needs the support of the Shiite militias to stay in power.

Haidar al-Ibadi, Mr. Jaafari's spokesman, acknowledged that "some of the police forces have been infiltrated." But he said "outsiders," rather than Iraqis, were to blame.

Now many Sunnis, who used to be the most anti-American community in Iraq, are asking for American help.

"If the Americans leave, we are finished," said Hassan al-Azawi, whose brother was taken from the pet shop.

He thought for a moment more.

"We may be finished already."

The human rights office of the Iraqi Islamic Party, a mostly Sunni group, has cataloged more than 540 cases of Sunni men and a few of Sunni women who were kidnapped and killed since Feb. 22, when a Shiite shrine in Samarra was destroyed, unleashing a wave of sectarian fury.

As the case of Mr. Azawi shows, some were easy targets.

Mr. Azawi was the youngest of five brothers. He was 27 and lived with his parents. He loved birds since he was a boy. Nightingales were his favorite. Then canaries, pigeons and doves.

During Saddam Hussein's reign, he was drafted into the army, but he deserted.

"He was crazy about birds," said a Shiite neighbor, Ibrahim Muhammad.

A few years ago, Mr. Azawi opened a small pet shop in Dawra, a rough-and-tumble, mostly Shiite neighborhood in southern Baghdad.

Friends said that Mr. Azawi was not interested in politics or religion. He never went to the Sunni mosque, though his brothers did. He did not pay attention to news or watch television. That characteristic might have cost him his life.

On Feb. 22, the Askariya Shrine in Samarra was attacked at 7 a.m. But Mr. Azawi did not know what had happened until 4 p.m., his friends said. He was in his own little world, tending his birds, when a Shiite shopkeeper broke the news and told him to close. He stayed in his house for three days after that. His friends said he was terrified.

The day of the shrine attack, Shiite mobs began rampaging through Baghdad, burning Sunni mosques and slaughtering Sunni residents. Some Sunnis struck back and killed Shiites. The mayhem claimed hundreds of lives and exposed tensions that until then had been bubbling just beneath the surface.

Two Shiite militias, the Badr Organization, which once trained in Iran, and the Mahdi Army, the foot soldiers of a young, firebrand Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, were blamed for much of the bloodshed. Mr. Sadr's men often wear all-black uniforms, and many of the relatives of kidnapped people said men in black uniforms had taken them. Many people also said the men in black arrived with the police.

Around 9 on the night of the shrine bombing, a mob of black-clad men surrounded the Duleimi brothers, family members said.

The brothers lived in New Baghdad, a working-class neighborhood that is mostly Shiite. They were all gardeners and religious men who prayed five times a day. They had relatives in Falluja, in the heart of Sunni territory.

Where a family hails from in Iraq often reveals whether it is Sunni or Shiite. Nowadays, because of the sectarian friction, people are increasingly aware of the slight regional differences in accent, dress and name. Some first names, like Omar for Sunnis, or Haidar for Shiites, are clear giveaways. Others, like Khalid, are not. Tribal names can also be a sign.

A cousin of the Duleimi brothers, who identified himself as Khalaf, said the four men were taken at gunpoint from the small house they shared. The next day, their bodies turned up in a drainage ditch near Sadr City, a stronghold of the Mahdi Army. All their fingers and toes had been sawed off.

That same day Mushtak al-Nidawi, 20, was kidnapped. According to an aunt, Aliah al-Bakr, he was chatting on his cellphone outside his home in Bayah when a squad of Mahdi militiamen marched up the street, shouting, "We're coming after you, Sunnis!"

Ms. Bakr said they snatched Mr. Nidawi while his mother stood at the door. His body surfaced on the streets seven days later, his skin a map of bruises, his handsome face burned by acid, his fingernails pulled out.

"I told his mother he was shot," Ms. Bakr said.

Sheik Kamal al-Araji, a spokesman for Mr. Sadr, said "the Mahdi Army does not commit such crimes."

He also said the militiamen would soon change their uniforms so they would no longer be confused with thugs.

The question of who exactly is behind these collective assassinations has become a delicate political issue. So has the disparity in the killings.

Many Sunni politicians, including secular ones like Methal al-Alusi, accuse the Shiite-led government of backing a campaign to wipe out Sunnis. Many Shiite leaders, including Prime Minister Jaafari, blame "foreign terrorists," without being more specific. It seems that Shiite militias, unable to strike back against the presumably Sunni suicide bombers who kill Shiite civilians, are now victimizing Sunni civilians. There is no evidence that the Sunnis who have been kidnapped and killed are connected to terrorists.

Zalmay Khalilzad, the American ambassador, is now saying that militias are Iraq's No. 1 security threat. But he has been careful to paint the problem in broad strokes, implying both sides are at fault.

There are a few Shiite victims, like Mohammed Jabbar Hussein, who lived in a mostly Sunni area west of Baghdad. He disappeared on Feb. 26 and was found four days later, shot in the head.

But the militias under the greatest suspicion, and the ones with the strongest ties to the government, are Shiite. Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a spokesman for the American military, said Shiite militias have played a role in the killings and "the government of Iraq has to take action."

Then there is the question of prosecution. While countless Sunni insurgents have been arrested and tried on murder charges, very few Shiite militiamen have been apprehended.

Thamir al-Janabi, who is in charge of the Interior Ministry's criminal investigation department, declined to comment. So did several other Interior Ministry officials.

A new round of revenge attacks began March 12, around 6 p.m., when a string of car bombs exploded in Sadr City, killing nearly 50 civilians. Most security officials, Shiite and Sunni, blamed Sunni terrorists.

An hour and a half later, half a dozen gunmen arrived at Mr. Azawi's pet shop.

Wisam Saad Nawaf was playing pool across the street. He said that a man wearing a ski mask arrived with the gunmen, who were not wearing masks, and that when they grabbed Mr. Azawi, the masked man nodded. "He must have been an informant from the neighborhood," Mr. Nawaf explained.

Mr. Azawi got into a car. The gunmen closed the doors. The next morning Mr. Azawi's body was found at the sewage plant. Autopsy photos showed how badly he had been abused. His skin was covered with purple welts. His legs and face had drill holes in them. Both shoulders had been broken.

His brother Hassan carries the autopsy photos with him, along with a pistol. "I cannot live without vengeance," he said.

Hassan said there were a few Shiites at his brother's funeral, which he took as a grim speck of hope.

One week later, on March 20, the body of Mr. Abdulsalam, another Sunni, was found under a bridge. Mr. Abdulsalam, 21, worked with his father in a real estate office. His family said he was last seen in his BMW, stopped at a Mahdi Army checkpoint.

Redirecting Bullets In Baghdad (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

BAGHDAD, Iraq

I GOT back to Iraq two weeks ago, having been away more than a year. The first story I covered began with a tip that vigilantes had hanged four suspected terrorists from lamp posts in Sadr City, a Shiite slum. The minute I got to the scene, I realized I was stepping into a new Iraq. Another new Iraq, really; maybe even the third Iraq I have seen since I began reporting here in 2003.

Gone were the American tanks that used to guard the intersections. Instead, aggressive teenagers with machine guns and shiny soccer jerseys ruled the streets. They poked their heads into cars and detained whomever they wanted. There were even

8-year-olds running checkpoints, some toting toy pistols, others toting real ones. Whatever they carried, 4-foot-tall militias made me nervous. The streets now had a truly Liberian feel.

The episode was oddly symmetrical with a moment in 2004 when mobs in Falluja swarmed four American contractors and hung the bodies from a bridge. But there were a few big differences. For one, this wasn't Falluja, angry heart of the insurgency. This was Baghdad. And these weren't Americans dangling from rope. They were Sunni Arab Iraqis.

I had thought Iraq might be getting quieter. Fewer mortars were sailing into the Green Zone, where the Americans are based, and fewer suicide bombings were disrupting the morning rush. Even the airport road, the most dreaded strip of asphalt in the world, was doing better. It had been repaved and was flowing with traffic.

But soon I caught on. The violence had not declined. It had just turned inward. No longer was most of it pointed at the Americans, either directly or indirectly, as it had been during the invasion and when the insurgency exploded in 2004. Back then, if G.I.'s were not the targets, their helpers were — the Iraqi police, regional governors, Kurdish leaders, foreign civilians, anyone remotely connected to the "occupiers."

It's true that American soldiers are still dying, but the focus of the bloodshed has changed.

The day after that mob scene in Sadr City, bodies started showing up, first a couple and then dozens. By conservative counts, nearly 200 civilian men have been executed in the past two weeks and dumped on Baghdad's streets. Many have been hogtied. Some have had acid splashed on their faces. Others have been found without toes, fingers, eyes.

Granted, Baghdad is no stranger to the corpse. There were assassinations two years ago, when an entire intellectual class was being wiped out.

But this new wave of executions was different. It was more sadistic and less selective. These people weren't rounded up because they were important. They were tortured and killed simply because of their religion. And because most of them were Sunni Muslim Arabs, there was no response from the Shiite-led government.

Mass murder used to provoke some form of official reaction, however feeble. I remember seeing the Iraqi police seal off areas after big bomb attacks and poke around for evidence. Now, there are major crimes with no crime scenes. Very few of these mystery killings have been investigated, and it isn't for lack of witnesses. Many of these men were abducted in daylight, in public, in front of crowds.

Not enough can be said about the attack on a Shiite shrine in Samarra last month. That explosion opened a cycle of revenge that seems to have split modern Iraqi history. There is before Samarra and after. Before Samarra, many Iraqis tried to play down Sunni-Shiite tensions. Since Samarra, they live in mortal fear of them.

If this all sounds depressing, it is. That's how people here feel. I've been looking hard, but in two weeks I haven't found an Iraqi optimist. In the summer of 2004, I profiled a band of young artists who braved dangerous roads to get away from Baghdad and paint pretty pictures of the Tigris River. Now, they're homebound. There is a similar sense of newfound hopelessness in the faces of the Iraqis I work with.

"What is the style of death?" is the No. 1 question in our bureau, now that all these bodies have turned up.

Of course, the old insurgency hasn't abated. Last week, 200 masked insurgents besieged a jail, killing more than a dozen guards and springing their comrades. A few days ago, one of our translator's uncles was killed when a box of sweets blew up in a tea shop. It seems as if half of our staff has had family murdered.

It is difficult to communicate just how violent Baghdad has become. A DVD was recently circulated in markets showing an imam being dragged behind a pickup truck. There was also a home video of a family of four, including a 10-day-old girl, all of them wrapped in plastic in the morgue.

Everyone has guns. We interviewed an educated woman who rides the bus with a loaded Glock pistol in her lap.

This is not to say life has ground to a halt. Stores are open, though the curfew has cut into business. Children go to school. The other day a mortar shell flew over a swing set and the children kept on swinging, even as a cloud of dust rose behind them.

I recently met a Sunni man who used to be virulently anti-American. He showed me postmortem pictures of his younger brother, who had been kidnapped by death squads and had holes drilled in his face.

"Even the Americans wouldn't do this," he said.

Ancient Rift Brings Fear On Streets Of Baghdad (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 25 — The difference between Shiites and Sunnis is sometimes explained simply as a disagreement over who should have become the leader of the Muslim community after the Prophet Muhammad died nearly 1,400 years ago.

But in Iraq, the divide goes beyond that, partly because of geography and partly because of history. With sectarian tensions rising, Iraqis are paying more attention to the little things that signal whether someone is Shiite or Sunni. None of the indicators are foolproof. But a name, an accent and even the color of a head scarf can provide clues.

Complicating all of this is the reality that many Iraqis have intermarried and that for much of Iraq's history, the two communities have coexisted peacefully. Very rarely has sectarian identity been a life or death matter, the way it is now on some of Baghdad's streets.

Shiites split off from Sunnis after the Prophet Muhammad died in the seventh century. That created a crisis over who would succeed him as leader of the Muslim community. One group of Muslims chose Muhammad's friend, Abu Bakr. They would become the Sunnis, a vast majority of the world's Muslims.

A smaller group believed the rightful successor was Ali, the prophet's son-in-law and cousin. They would become the Shiites, who today are concentrated in India, Pakistan and Persian Gulf countries. Abu Bakr won out, though after he died Ali eventually became caliph. He was assassinated, and the Muslim community began to splinter. Ali's son Hussein led a rebellion but he, too, was cut down, in a battle in Karbala, Iraq. Hussein's death was the beginning of Shiism and it started a culture of martyrdom, evident each year during a festival in Karbala when Shiites whip and cut themselves to symbolize Hussein's pain.

Over the years, the rivalry between the partisans of Ali and those who supported Abu Bakr evolved into two schools of theology. For example, when it comes time to pray, Shiites believe a person's arms should be straight; most Sunnis say they should be bent. Shiites allow temporary marriage; Sunnis say it is forbidden. In some cases, Shiite inheritance law is more generous to women than is Sunni inheritance law.

Shiites follow ayatollahs, or supreme jurists, who some believe have divine powers. Sunni Islam is more decentralized among local imams.

Southern Iraq is essentially the center of Shiite Islam, with holy shrines in Karbala, Kufa and Najaf. The Sunni Arabs are concentrated in the west, especially in Anbar Province, the heartland of Iraqi tribal culture. In Baghdad and eastern cities like Baquba, the populations are mixed, while in the north, Sunni Kurds predominate.

In Iraq, tribal identity is also important, and many people use tribal names as last names. Because certain tribes are rooted in certain areas, a last name like Saidi, Maliki or Kinani may be typically Shiite, while names like Zobi, Tikriti and Hamdani are typically Sunni.

Certain first names may also reveal sect: Omar and Othman are Sunni names; Haidar and Karrar are Shiite ones.

Dress, too, can be a sign, but again not because it has religious significance. In western Iraq, the favored headdress is white and red; in the south it is white and black.

Historians say Shiites and Sunnis in Iraq have had periods of peace and conflict. Saddam Hussein exacerbated the rivalry, most notably after 1991, when Shiites in the south revolted and he used predominantly Sunni tribes to crush them.

Nearly 60 percent of Iraq's population of some 25 million are Shiite, with Sunni Arabs and Sunni Kurds making up roughly 40 percent.

Iran To Talk With US Conditionally: Ahmadinejad (AFP)

AFP, March 26, 2006

TEHRAN (AFP) - Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reportedly said Tehran will hold talks on neighboring Iraq with Washington "in spite of distrusting Americans."

"We will ... talk with America about Iraq because of requests by the Iraqi people and government, but with consideration of Iraqis and the Islamic world's interests and in consultation with Islamic countries," Ahmadinejad said during a meeting with Syria's visiting First Vice President Faruq al-Shara according to the ISNA news agency.

"We basically do not trust Americans," he added.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, on Tuesday gave a tacit blessing to talks between the Islamic republic and the United States, but said the Islamic republic wanted Washington to leave Iraq.

The idea was first floated just over a week ago by Ali Larjani, head of Iran's Supreme National Security Council, its nuclear chief and one of the country's most visible officials.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday she was "quite certain" that US officials would hold direct talks with Iran on the turmoil in Iraq, but could not say when.

In an interview with the Washington Post, US envoy to Baghdad Zalmay Khalilzad, who would lead talks with Tehran, accused the Islamic republic of aiding Iraqi militia and insurgents groups.

The White House suspects Iran waited months to accept the US offer, first approved last November, in order to deflect pressure from Tehran's atomic energy program, which has been referred to the UN Security Council.

The United States charges Iran with seeking to obtain nuclear weapons, while Tehran insists its programme is meant only for peaceful purposes.

The Word At War (WP)

By Lynne Duke

Propaganda? Nah, Here's the Scoop, Say the Guys Who Planted Stories in Iraqi Papers

Oh, no, not at all -- the Lincoln Group does not do propaganda. Sure, the firm's been tarred by some in Congress, the media and the defense establishment for paying Iraqi newspapers to publish hundreds of "news" stories secretly written by U.S. troops.

But Paige Craig, the West Point dropout and former Marine intelligence specialist who is the Lincoln Group's president, says the practice is not propaganda. The word carries such baggage, such suggestions of mind control. So in an industry in which euphemism thrives, a more elegant word is deployed.

"We call it 'influence,' " says Craig, whose business has 12 U.S. government contracts totaling more than $130 million.

The Lincoln Group even has a "senior director for insight and influence." His name is Andrew Garfield. Over lunch near the group's Pennsylvania Avenue offices, he also tries to steer the lexicon at play around the table and to clarify what he calls the "tradecraft" of "influence."

Take "psyops," for instance. That's short for "psychological operations." Like the word "propaganda," it, too, conjures mystery, deception.

But that's not what the Lincoln Group does, says Garfield. The company has been contracted by a psyops division of the U.S. military, but Garfield insists that Lincoln's work cannot be considered psyops. That word, Garfield protests, refers to a military operation. And Garfield is very familiar with military psyops, as he is a former British military and intelligence official who regularly teaches a course at the U.S. Army base at Fort Bragg -- a course on . . . psyops.

Bombs are blasting in Baghdad. War fills the air there and fills the airwaves here. But a more quiet war -- the information war -- is waged by stealth, in the words and images deployed by pundits, partisans, policymakers, propagandists, psychological operators and influence specialists, both civilian and military.

Call it influence. Or call it propaganda, info-ops, psyops or strat comm (that's short for "strategic communications"). It's all information, and information can be a weapon as lethal, at times, as bullets and bombs.

But wait! Not only are we in an information war, we are also in a war over the info war -- over techniques such as Lincoln's and the extent to which the U.S. government should or does disseminate propaganda, even pay to publish favorable "news" stories.

Outrage was so great when word leaked last December of Lincoln Group's Iraq activities -- one writer described it as bribery -- that the Pentagon launched an investigation. Army Gen. George W. Casey announced earlier this month that the probe had found the Lincoln Group's work violated no law or policy. But the final report, while completed, is under internal review. No additional details have been released.

And so we meet the influencers: Craig, 31, one of the brains behind the business, a California guy who grew up fascinated by foreign cultures and drawn by geopolitics; Garfield, 45, the former intelligence analyst turned romantic who married an American physical therapist who helped him through an illness; and Scott Feldmayer, 29, the former Army brat in Europe turned Army captain in Iraq turned influence manager at Lincoln.

Over a recent lunch, they agreed to discuss what they do, albeit only in broad brush. They are stingy with details, they said, because their contracts prohibit them from revealing too much.

Lincoln Group works in Iraq, Afghanistan, United Arab Emirates and Jordan, employing about 200 people, says Craig, who attended but did not graduate from West Point before he joined the Marines. He founded Lincoln along with Christian Bailey, a British entrepreneur. Bailey was not available for lunch, as he was off in the world somewhere, influencing.The P-Word

Words can change what people think. Add some emotional punch and piercing imagery, and words can change how people behave. Repeat these words and images over and over, and they can define a culture.

That's the info war -- far more intense than mere "spin" -- and it's been raging in the United States since the words "war on terror" were uttered in public and the national zeitgeist became one of fear. With the body politic and the vox populi deeply polarized before and after the war started, "we look at everything in terms of propaganda," says Nancy Snow, a former State Department official and author of "Information War."

Think of all the big-ticket war issues that still are contested: WMD, aluminum tubes, uranium, the spurious Saddam-9/11 connection, the Iraqis whom U.S. officials said would greet U.S. troops as liberators, the good news that allegedly is being ignored by all those journalists who keep writing about the bombs still exploding, the bodies still falling.

In the most recent burst of concern about disinformation and the war, enter the Lincoln Group and accusations that its packaging of an American point of view is just propaganda.

It's that P-word again. So let's parse it. It means "any systematic, widespread dissemination or promotion of particular ideas, doctrines, practices, etc., to further one's own cause or to damage an opposing one." That's the basic Webster definition, which sounds so straightforward.

In the real world, though, the word is "a contested term, ideologically based," says Snow, a senior research fellow at the Center on Public Diplomacy at the University of Southern California and an assistant professor in communications at the California State University at Fullerton.

It's a slippery word indeed. At the core, it's about manipulation, planting an idea in your head or a sentiment in your heart on the sly.

"Part of the beauty of real successful propaganda is it works without you knowing that it works," says Anthony Pratkanis, co-author of "Age of Propaganda" and a professor of social psychology at the University of California at Santa Cruz.

The word "propaganda" conjures some pretty ugly stuff, like the old Bolshevik and Soviet agitprop, the sinister wordsmithery of Nazi Joseph Goebbels, the "destroy the village to save it" doublespeak of U.S. military leaders during the Vietnam War.

To be lumped with those folks is, well, understandably upsetting.

"When you use that term about our business, you discredit our business," says Garfield, the influence director.

For Craig, the Lincoln Group president, "propaganda" conjures "posters from World War II where every American is thinking that Germans are just stabbing babies or the Japanese are a bunch of crazy lunatics."

Now he breaks into a full-bore lecture: "It's as if telling the Iraqi people about the positive aspects, about the emergence of democracy in their country, the significant efforts being done by the coalition to protect them, to achieve the security that everybody acknowledges is necessary for people to embrace a new government and a new armed forces -- as if all of that is bad. The moment you label it with the term propaganda, you immediately end any debate. It's absolutely necessary to counter the negative use of information by our adversaries."Sending Signals

So how does the Lincoln Group attempt to capture Iraqi hearts and minds? "We use whatever mediums one could employ to influence an audience," says Garfield.

They've planted those fake news articles trumpeting pro-U.S. stories. They've conceived and distributed anti-terror comic strips and leaflets. They ran a campaign that distributed water bottles bearing a phone number that Iraqis could call to report terror activity to U.S. authorities. They do research, media analysis, polling and focus groups. They seek to completely understand a culture, so they can better influence it.

Speaking hypothetically, the Lincoln officials said entertainment, music, soap operas, comedy, documentaries, educational programs and advertising also can be employed to influence.

Would a visitor be able to identify Lincoln Group's work in Iraq?

"You shouldn't stumble across our work," says Garfield. "What I mean is: You shouldn't know it was our work."

Lincoln's work complements military psyops. In Iraq and Afghanistan, psyops teams have air-dropped leaflets telling people not to resist U.S. troops. They've hollered through loudspeakers urging the enemy to surrender. They have transmitted radio broadcasts from an airplane called Commando Solo and distributed radios on which such broadcasts can be heard.

Military commanders have at times used false information to fool the enemy, such as the October 2004 announcement that the battle of Fallujah had started when, in fact, it did not begin until three weeks later. Information has been used to buoy the spirits of the American public, such as the initial heroic fiction offered on the capture and rescue of Army Pfc. Jessica Lynch.

The Lynch story was among the stories cited in a 2003 analysis titled "Truth From These Podia," by Sam Gardiner, a retired U.S. Air Force colonel and former instructor at the National War College. Gardiner studied the Iraq-war-related statements of U.S. and British officials and found "over 50 stories manufactured or at least engineered that distorted the picture" for American and British newspaper readers.

These media-related tactics aren't limited to wartime. Remember those columnists paid to write in support of Bush administration education and marriage initiatives? And the dissemination of fake TV news stories to promote the administration's prescription drug plan? "The Daily Show" dubbed these techniques "infoganda."

But none of this is new -- especially not in war. The effort to sway, influence, deceive and propagandize is as old as combat.Back in the 4th century B.C., Alexander the Great ordered his troops to craft huge breastplates of armor that they left behind to trick the enemy into thinking Alexander had giants in his army.

During World War I, the U.S. government's Office of Public Information dispatched thousands of "four-minute men" in cities and towns across the country to make boisterous and emotional pro-war appeals.

During World War II, there was the Orwellian-sounding Office of Facts and Figures, later renamed the Office of War Information. It touted war bonds and rationing. It immortalized "Rosie the Riveter" to propel women to leave their homes and go to work. It leaned on Hollywood to make patriotic films. It warned Americans to watch their tongues. A famous wartime poster said: "Loose Lips Might Sink Ships" -- now a timeworn and abbreviated cliche.Rumsfeld's 'Roadmap'

But Americans just don't understand. The culture hasn't come to grips with information as a part of warfare. That's Garfield, lecturing again.

"I think we've got to back up a little bit and look at warfare," he says, telling how the conventional notion of war has changed, with insurgencies and asymmetric conflict growing more prevalent, meaning that bullets and bombs alone won't win. Information -- its strategic use -- can tip the scales. And yet this fact does not yet resonate in American culture.

"People are more comfortable with killing than they are with influencing," he says. "The majority can be convinced that the use of military force is acceptable, but everybody becomes very uncomfortable when you talk about the use of information," like "promoting your cause, promoting your ideals" and "discrediting the tactics and the arguments and the strategy of the enemy."

Not surprisingly, considering who the Lincoln Group's big client is, Garfield sounds very much in sync with Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld.

Rumsfeld's got an "Information Operations Roadmap," which he approved in 2003 and which was declassified earlier this year. It's supposed to "advance the goal of information operations as a core military competency."

The Roadmap follows an earlier information effort, the Pentagon's Office of Strategic Influence, which was dismantled in 2002 after news reports, since denied, that the Pentagon intended to plant false news items in the foreign press. A version of that effort was then outsourced to the Lincoln Group, though Craig and Garfield say they traffic only in truth.

In an op-ed piece last month in the Los Angeles Times, Rumsfeld bemoaned the uproar over the Lincoln Group and described its work as a "non-traditional means to provide accurate information to the Iraqi people in the face of an aggressive campaign of disinformation. Yet this has been portrayed as inappropriate: for example, the allegations of 'buying news.' "

In a way, this is the price to be paid for not going covert all the way. Had the program been conducted completely undercover, it would have been better, says Reuel Marc Gerecht, a former CIA case officer and now a resident fellow at the American Enterprise Institute.

"You can compliment the Pentagon for at least trying," he says of the military's outsourcing to Lincoln. "I think the agency [CIA] should have been engaged in this a long time ago."

"I suppose the historical parallel would be the agency's efforts during the Cold War to fund magazines, newspapers and journalists who believed that the West should triumph over communism," he says. "Much of what you do ought to be covert, and, certainly, if you contract it out, it isn't."The Truth of the Matter

Craig and Garfield make much of their assertion that they traffic in the truth. It's as if they think truth and propaganda are mutually exclusive. But consider this:

"For a long time, propagandists have recognized that lying must be avoided," wrote Jacques Ellul in his classic 1965 work, "Propaganda: The Formation of Men's Attitudes." For the masses to believe it, "propaganda must be based on some truth that can be said in a few words and is able to linger in the collective consciousness."

But truth can be elastic, even inconvenient. For instance, Garfield says Lincoln really had no choice but to hide the authorship of those upbeat "news" stories.

Had they been identified as products of the U.S. government, someone could have gotten killed. And just how receptive would Iraqi readers have been to a U.S. government product anyway?

"You wouldn't look at them objectively," says Garfield, projecting what an Iraqi reader might think. "You wouldn't give them a fair hearing."

He says: "How do you get a fair hearing when (a) the audience is preconditioned to respond negatively to anything you say, and (b) just as importantly, there's a whole bunch of people out there who will do whatever they can to prevent that fair hearing? If you just stand up and say, 'I stand for truth and freedom and you should listen to me because of it,' forget it. You're dead. Do you not engage in an argument with those people because it doesn't say, 'Paid for by the United States'?"

So, yes, there was that deception.

"But the aim is not deceit," he says.

It's just a means to an end in wartime.

Embedded With U.S. Troops In Ramadi (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

RAMADI

My flight to Ramadi left from a heliport in Baghdad's so-called "Green Zone." For Americans, this is probably the safest place in the country. It is a grid of protected streets along the banks of the Tigris River, surrounded by high concrete blast walls and coils of barbed wire, where suicide bomber-weary tank turrets point at passing traffic.

There is high security here because this is home to the U.S. Embassy as well as the seat of the Iraqi government. Most everything outside, they call the "Red Zone."

I wait for several hours in a room reserved for press heading for embeds. The Pentagon Channel plays on a large flat-screen TV, showing feature stories on Afghanistan and Iraq, and a special about searching for the remains of soldiers still missing from the Vietnam War.

I am carrying a white helmet, and some soldiers are cracking jokes about it. White will stand out at night, and help insurgents pinpoint my forehead, they say. After another soldier points at my helmet with real concern, I start getting worried. I ask if there is any camouflage netting I can string over it. There is not, but he finds a can of black spray-paint, and soon we are outside doing an urgent paint job.

In the dinning hall, the fridges are full of milk, Gatorade and canned sodas. There is salad, Mexican fare and pumpkin pie. There are rows and rows of tables. Some people are eating outside, beside a sprawling pool and palm tree strung with lights.

Later at the helipad's one-roomed waiting room, I'm surprised to find a "customer satisfaction survey." I don't fill it out. There are only a couple people flying. A soldier working there has bought a new X-Box video console. I'm looking forward to watching him play Halo 2, but he plugs it mistakenly into a 220 volt plug, frying the machine.

We board a cream-colored, twin-rotored Marine Chinook helicopter near midnight and lift into the sky, with the lights of Baghdad below us. The back door is wide open, and air flows easily through, out the gunner's windows in front. It is safer to fly at night, without lights, and so we do.

We arrived in Ramadi around 2 a.m. Saturday. I'm picked up by a public affairs Sgt. 1st Class Richard Scaricaciottoli, known to most here as Sgt. Scary.

Knowing my tent would not stand up well to a mortar attack, and knowing the base has come under attack, I ask if there are any "Duck And Cover Bunkers" _ small concrete shelters _ like they have in the Green Zone. "If you don't get hit, you're good," he says. "If you get hit, you'll probably never know it."

The tent I sleep in is full of soldiers.

On Sunday, another public affairs officer, Capt. Alfred Smith, escorts me to a briefing with the command. It is a slideshow projected on the wall, and I see a picture I saw at the heliport in Baghdad _ a newspaper photograph of Marine Sgt. Michael Burghardt, who was wounded by an improvised explosive device in Ramadi in September. Medics have removed his bloodied pants, but he is standing, surrounded by soldiers with Humvees and the blades of a waiting medical evacuation helicopter behind him.

The picture has become famous among troops here, because he is waving his middle finger in the air, ostensibly at insurgents somewhere in the distance. The photo caption explains Burghardt is "signaling his defiance."

The medics who attended Burghardt were surprised he was alive, and even more surprised he refused a stretcher and walked away on his own two feet from the blast site, said Col. Regis Cardiff, Deputy Commander of the Army's 2nd Brigade Combat Team, 28th Infantry Division, which is responsible for Ramadi. Commanders say the image symbolizes their defiance against the insurgents, that no matter what happens, the troops will fight on and win.

The U.S. military's mission here, deputy commander Col. Regis Cardiff says, is to help train the Iraqi army and police, help the government develop, and return "normalcy" to Ramadi.

DOJ_NMG_0021813

There are no police deployed here yet, though an initial batch just graduated from a 10-week training course in Baghdad and will be on the streets next month. U.S. troops are deployed in the roughest parts of Ramadi, but Cardiff says Iraqi troops control "battlespace" in some areas of town. Despite that, insurgent attacks occur daily.

Afterward, I am walking to lunch with Smith, and the base air-raid sirens go off briefly, bellowing the word "incoming" over loudspeakers. We sprint up to some sand-filled barriers for cover, and as we kneel down against them, Smith tells me that several troops on the base were killed in rocket or mortar attacks in just this way. One of them was also walking to lunch.

One of them was disintegrated. This time, there are no booms.

Hours later, I am waiting near the gate to go out on a patrol with the Philadelphia-based 104th Calvary Regiment of the Pennsylvania National Guard unit when three or four mortars hit somewhere just outside the base. A brief volley of outgoing U.S. artillery fire follows. We jump in the Humvees and try to find a suspicious vehicle that was in the area at the time.

Along the highway, two trucks have stopped after seeing explosions. It is dark, and the soldiers order them out at gunpoint and search their vehicles, then let them go.

I spend the rest of the night with these soldiers moving up and down a highway in Humvees. Their lights off, and they steer with night-vision goggles. We check on observation posts scattered along the roads _ tanks or humvees perched on highway overpasses and beside the Euphrates River.

At one post by the roadside, we are standing beside the vehicles with the stars above us. I can see the Orion Nebula brightly lit overhead. The soldiers talk of how insurgents have sniped troops or blown up their tanks with roadside bombs. They talk of how to avoid casualties. Some talk of home. I am glad to be here with them, seeing Iraq with my own eyes again.

There is one burst of light on the horizon, followed a few seconds later by a loud boom. It could have been a roadside bomb, or perhaps a controlled explosion. Later, we hear machine-gun fire repeatedly. Troops somewhere are at the firing range.

We were picked up Thursday at Baghdad International Airport by our security guards, who inform us there have been a couple "incidents" _ brief gunfights _ that afternoon on the main road we were to travel on to town. Snipers have been firing on the convoys of private security contractors, they say.

It's nothing new. One guy was shot in the neck recently but it's unclear how. Was his window open? Was he standing out of the vehicle in some kind of turret? You try not to envisage these things, but they stick in your mind as you pass all the two and three story villas set a small ways from the roadsides and wonder if somebody is in one of them looking for targets.

We are given flak jackets, and I put on one, then cover it with my black jacket because I don't want to stand out any more than I already do.

We get in our bulletproof vehicle and head onto the highway into the city. As always, it looks absolutely normal, almost. There are thousands of Iraqi civilian vehicles on the streets. Coming the other direction is a line of U.S. military Humvees. U.S. Bradley fighting vehicles are pulling guard duty in a median in the road. It's a quiet drive, and I'm grateful.

I haven't been to the Palestine Hotel, where AP's Baghdad offices are located, in a year. After a suicide bomber rammed through the high blast walls surrounding the hotel complex a few months ago, the place is still a wreck. The hotel itself is completely intact, but wires hang down from the broken walls overhead in the lobby. Plastic sheets hang over shattered windows. Twisted metal and rubble are piled up outside. A lightpost is bent over an angle, probably damaged by the blast.

Journalists and translators already here tell me there are a couple running gunbattles going on in Baghdad. From where we sit though, it's quiet, except for the noise of traffic outside. Soon that will stop, too: there is an 8 p.m. curfew these days.

I go to the window in my hotel room to look out at the beautiful blue-domed mosque on the other side of a roundabout. A couple gunshots ring out in the distance and police in four-wheel drives speed by.

In 2004, the U.S. army cleared a swathe of the bank along the Tigris River which we can see from the hotel balcony. Technically, it was a good idea, but it seemed odd at the time _ mortar rounds were landing daily in the park and across the river in the Green Zone. Who would want to picnic there? They cleared it flat, though it is still interspersed with trees, and built curving sidewalks. Today, it appears to be abandoned, desolate. There is a lot of very tall grass you could get lost in.

I see one of the Iraqi reporters here, a good friend, and ask him how things are going. "It's getting worse not by the day, but by the hour," he says, laughing a little bit. The head of AP television here starts ticking off several neighborhoods he says are too dangerous these days even for his brave Iraqi cameramen to go. More than 50 Iraqis have been killed in scattered violence yesterday, the day I arrived.

Today in Baghdad alone, nearly 20 are dead in drive-by shootings, roadside bombings and sectarian violence. Nearly everybody here has a tragic story to tell, of friends and family being killed or kidnapped, of staying in the hotel with us for fear of their own lives. Many have fled to nearby countries.

The reporter _ I don't want to name him _ hides what he does from people in his neighborhood, who think he is a businessman. He cannot say he's working with Americans _ even if it is a news agency.

I've come to Iraq to embed with U.S. troops stationed in Ramadi, and Baghdad is a stopover. I'm hoping to get on a military helicopter flight there tonight.

The Post And The Whole Picture In Iraq (WP)

By Deborah Howell

The third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq provides an opportunity to look at The Post's war reporting, which has brought a steady trickle of complaints that the coverage focuses too much on violence.

It's understandable that military and civilian readers, especially those with family members in Iraq, hunger for positive stories. The Post has done many such stories, but they are overshadowed in readers' minds by the more spectacular articles and images of violence from the insurgency.

The Post's senior military reporter, Thomas E. Ricks, believes journalists in Iraq are providing a more accurate picture about what is happening than the military. He believes that any problems between the military and the media "grow out of the fundamentally political nature of the fight. The military wants to be judged in military terms -- 'look at all the bad guys we killed, and don't forget the school our soldiers painted.' But the media, which is trained to measure the politics of a situation, knows the answer isn't killing bad guys, and may not be painting schools. It probably is providing security to the people."

Post reporters scramble to keep up with daily events in an atmosphere so dangerous that it is impossible to move freely around Baghdad or the countryside. About 60 Post journalists, from the buildup to the invasion through today, have covered the war -- all of them volunteers. The hardest day-to-day work falls to three full-time U.S. employees stationed in Baghdad: Ellen Knickmeyer, the bureau chief; Jonathan Finer, a correspondent; and one reporter on rotation (now John Ward Anderson). The Post also has four Iraqi reporter-translators -- Naseer Nouri, Omar Fekeiki, Bassam Sebti and K.I. Ibrahim -- who frequently have bylined stories; most have been with The Post since shortly after the fall of Baghdad.

Recent reporting trips by Ricks, Pentagon reporter Ann Scott Tyson and op-ed columnist David Ignatius have added depth to the daily coverage. Last Sunday's coverage, tied to the anniversary of the 2003 invasion and including interviews with soldiers who are or had been there, provided a needed dimension, as did the excellent Outlook section articles, most of them written by Iraqis, whose thoughts and feelings are often the missing elements in daily journalism.

To look at balance, I re-read February's staff-written stories from Iraq, not including editorial page pieces. Seventeen stories were on the troops, their mission or democracy-building; five of those stories were on Page 1. Fifteen stories were on violence or corruption; five of those were on Page 1. Two inside stories were routine. I felt the coverage was balanced and authoritative.

Staff writer Steve Fainaru, who recently returned after 14 months in Iraq, said, "There aren't that many people who want to go to Iraq. Maybe that's why reporters are sensitive to criticism that they are in it with an agenda. The job of soldiering over there is incredibly difficult. I have tremendous respect for those guys. But sometimes I find the criticism bewildering. Should we really be focusing on a school opening when Iraq is teetering on the brink of civil war?"

Bryan Whitman, deputy assistant secretary of defense for public affairs, almost echoed Fainaru: "I have a tremendous respect for the journalists over there. I don't want to minimize the danger of operating in Iraq. Journalists are a target of the insurgency. They have competing pressures with limited resources."

Yet Whitman is frustrated because, he says, soldiers, public officials and reconstruction workers return to the United States from Iraq and complain that what they see in the way of economic and military progress isn't represented in news coverage.

Some of the best Post reporting has come from "embedding," which puts reporters in the field with military units and gives them freedom to report in exchange for agreeing not to endanger the troops' security. Embedding is also dangerous. ABC-TV's Bob Woodruff was seriously injured while embedded.

Marine Col. David Lapan, a public affairs officer just back from Fallujah, and Army Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, who manages reporters' embeds at the Combined Press Information Center in Baghdad, strongly support embedding, but they cannot force it on commanders.

While the vast majority of requests are granted, a number of reporters, including the legendary military correspondent Joe Galloway of Knight Ridder, tell me that they have been turned down for embed assignments by commanders in the field. That's unfortunate.

Retired Maj. Gen. John Batiste, now president of Klein Steel Service in Rochester, N.Y., was in Iraq until February 2005 and never turned down a reporter seeking an embed. He had the right approach: "You have to take a risk. We owe to the citizens of our country to tell them what is going on. I share everything with embeds. I never regretted taking them into my confidence."

While Batiste and other commanders may have good relations with the press, the military and the media are generally going to be at loggerheads in wartime. The two institutions have vastly different missions.

Lapan gave what I think is an excellent description of the cultural difference between the military and the press: "Reporters are generally idealists, trained to be skeptical (some would say cynical), and we're generally optimists and realists. Reporters are taught to question authority; we're taught to follow it."

David Hoffman, assistant managing editor for foreign news, supervises coverage of Iraq. "Impaired mobility" is the biggest obstacle to reporting more stories, "especially about the daily lives of ordinary Iraqis," he said. "We do all we can in the time we have. Iraq is a country at war. We're stationed right in the middle of it. That's what we do, observe, describe, report. If we lived in a perfect world, we would see everything. You cover the war you got. The people who complain of the limitations ignore the reality of what courageous reporters do."

My research on Iraq coverage has gone on for months, with interviews with experts in journalism and the military. Readers are invited to see some of that research in a much longer article at http://www.washingtonpost.com/opinions.

Russia Denies Leaking U.S. Intelligence To Iraq In 2003 (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

MOSCOW, March 25 -- Russia's foreign spy agency denied Saturday that Moscow had given former Iraqi president Saddam Hussein information on U.S. troop movements and plans during the invasion of Iraq, while analysts speculated that the Pentagon claim was tied to a growing rift between the West and the Kremlin.

A Pentagon report Friday cited two seized Iraqi documents as saying Russia obtained information from sources "inside the American Central Command" in Qatar and passed battlefield intelligence to Hussein through the former Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

The Russian Foreign Intelligence Service dismissed the claims.

"Similar baseless accusations concerning Russia's intelligence have been made more than once," Boris Labusov, an agency spokesman, said. "We don't consider it necessary to comment on such fabrications."

A leading Russian Internet news agency, Gazeta.ru, speculated that the Pentagon report was released to affect the U.N. Security Council debate on what to do about Iran's nuclear program, with Russia, along with China, resisting U.S. and European demands for a tough stand.

Sergei Oznobishchev, head of the Institute of Strategic Evaluations and Analyses, also tied the report to increasing U.S. distrust of Russia. "They are irritated by Russia's strengthening position in the international arena and its foreign policy course," Oznobishchev was quoted as saying by the RIA Novosti news agency.

The Pentagon report wasn't the first to raise questions about Russian assistance to Hussein's government at the time of the invasion in March 2003.

Gazeta.ru reported then that two retired Russian generals had visited Baghdad less than 10 days before the U.S.-led offensive and speculated that they were advising the Iraqi military. The report showed photographs of them receiving medals from the Iraqi defense minister.

Nezavisimaya Gazeta, a newspaper believed at the time to have well-placed contacts in Russia's military and intelligence spheres, reported in March 2003 that Russian intelligence agents were holding daily meetings with Iraqi officials.

The unclassified Pentagon report did not assess the value or accuracy of the information Hussein received or offer details on Russia's information pipeline.

Russia Denies Spying For Saddam In 2003 (WT/AP)

By Judith Ingram, Associated Press

MOSCOW -- Russia's foreign spy agency yesterday denied that Moscow gave Saddam Hussein information on U.S. troop movements and plans during the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

A Pentagon report Friday cited two seized Iraqi documents as saying Russia obtained information from sources "inside the American Central Command" in Qatar and passed battlefield intelligence to Saddam through the former Russian ambassador in Baghdad, Vladimir Titorenko.

The Russian Foreign Intelligence Service dismissed the claims.

"Similar, baseless accusations concerning Russia's intelligence have been made more than once," agency spokesman Boris Labusov said. "We don't consider it necessary to comment on such fabrications."

Yevgenia Albats, a Moscow-based journalist who specializes in intelligence matters, said she suspected there was "at least a certain truth reflected in the Pentagon report," considering Russia's close relationship with the ousted Iraqi leader.

But she cautioned that didn't necessarily mean the Kremlin was involved.

"It is sometimes difficult to figure out whether certain steps were undertaken with the knowledge of top Russian authorities or whether those were steps undertaken by certain intelligence officers on their own," Miss Albats told the Associated Press.

Sergei Oznobishchev, head of the Institute of Strategic Evaluations and Analysis, suggested that the public release of the report reflected increasing U.S. distrust for Russia.

"They are irritated by Russia's strengthening position in the international arena and its foreign policy course," Mr. Oznobishchev was quoted as saying by the RIA Novosti news agency.

The Iraqi documents also left unknown who may have been the sources at Central Command's war-fighting headquarters, which is at Camp As Sayliyah just outside Doha, the capital of Qatar. No Russians were authorized to be at the closely guarded base.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, Sens. John McCain and Russell Feingold told Iraqi leaders yesterday that American patience was growing thin and they needed to urgently overcome their stalemate and form a national unity government.

"We need very badly to form this unity government as soon as possible," Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, said after meetings with President Jalal Talabani and Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari.

Russia Denies Slipping U.S. War Plans To Iraq (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

MOSCOW—Russia on Saturday dismissed a new Pentagon report that said Russian diplomats shared information about U.S. war plans in Iraq with the government of Saddam Hussein.

In a series of official denials, Russian authorities asserted there was no truth to the captured Iraqi documents cited in the study, which was released Friday. However, military analysts in Moscow said it was well known that Russian intelligence agents and retired Russian generals were operating in Iraq before the war and were in close contact with the Iraqi government.

Retired Col. Gen. Igor Maltsev, the former deputy commander of Soviet air defense who made several trips to Baghdad on the eve of the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, told The Times that he advised the Iraqis on how to improve their air defenses but was not involved in concrete aid to the Iraqi regime.

The Russian Information Agency quoted Boris Labusov, head of the Foreign Intelligence Service's press office, as calling the U.S. revelations "unsubstantiated allegations." The agency quoted an unnamed official who said they were "a form of revenge on the part of the U.S. for Russia's firm position in regard to hostilities on Iraq's territory."

Maltsev and other Russian officials, including the former Russian ambassador apparently cited in the documents, have long been at the center of controversy over allegations that Russian diplomats and intelligence agents hauled secret cargo out of Iraq in the early days of the war.

One news report said they removed Iraqi intelligence files. Other reports suggested they took samples of U.S. military equipment recovered during the invasion, and one military analyst suggested to The Times that they took confidential Russian Embassy papers that the Kremlin did not want to fall into U.S. hands.

"Common sense suggests that if Russians had something they wanted to carry out from Iraq, they certainly did it. But it's a waste of time to talk about it, if no one knows about it for sure," Maltsev said.

Russia's ambassador to Iraq at the time of the invasion, Vladimir Titorenko, was shot and wounded in April 2003 along with three other people when their convoy came under U.S. fire as they were leaving Baghdad.

The Pentagon study, which examined the Iraqi military's decision-making, included one document that purported to summarize information on U.S. troop movements provided by the Russian ambassador to Iraqi officials. Another claimed Moscow had "sources" inside the U.S. military's headquarters in Qatar during the invasion. Some of the information about U.S. troop movements and intentions later proved inaccurate.

Pavel Felgenhauer, an independent military analyst in Moscow, said he noticed similarities between the information in the study and a series of postings on a Russian website in 2003 that purported to come from a group of retired intelligence officers who claimed to have contacts with "special informational structures."

It was common knowledge that agents of the Russian GRU, or military intelligence, were then operating in Iraq. But Felgenhauer said the Internet postings did not appear to be the kind of top-level information that was going to the Kremlin.

Still, Felgenhauer said the postings revealed "obvious military intelligence connections," so the documents in the Pentagon study seemed plausible.

But another senior military analyst at a Russian think tank, Dmitry Trenin of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said it was highly unlikely that the Kremlin would have done something as risky as passing intelligence to Iraqi officials.

"I think Russia was essentially trying to avoid at that time a major clash with the United States over Iraq," he said. "But in any situation like this, there are things that countries were doing … that will be kept secret for a long time, if not forever."

Karzai Striving To Free Convert (WT/AP)

By Daniel Cooney, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan -- President Hamid Karzai searched yesterday for a way to free an Afghan man on trial for converting from Islam to Christianity without angering Muslim clerics who have called for him to be killed.

Mr. Karzai and several Cabinet ministers discussed the case of Abdul Rahman, who faces a possible death sentence for apostasy, an official at Mr. Karzai's palace said. But she declined to comment on the outcome of the talks yesterday.

Hours earlier, another official said Mr. Rahman "could be released soon." Both spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the matter with the press.

Pope Benedict XVI has sent a message to Mr. Karzai asking that the case be dropped, citing respect for religious freedom, the Vatican said.

Afghan clerics have questioned Mr. Karzai's authority to order Mr. Rahman's release and have warned of a possible revolt if he tries.

"The Koran is very clear, and the words of our prophet are very clear. There can only be one outcome: death," said cleric Khoja Ahmad Sediqi, who is also a member of the Supreme Court. "If Karzai releases him, it will play into the hands of our enemy, and there could be an uprising."

Mr. Rahman is being prosecuted under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

The case has put Mr. Karzai in an awkward position.

While the United States, Britain and other countries that prop up his government have demanded Mr. Rahman's release, the president would be reluctant to offend Islamic sensibilities at home or alienate religious hard-liners who wield considerable power.

The trial highlights a conflict of values between Islam and the West. Throughout much of the Muslim world, conversion from Islam to Christianity or any other religion is considered a capital offense. Anyone born to Muslim parents is automatically considered a Muslim and is not allowed to change their religion.

The pope's message to Mr. Karzai came in a letter dated March 22 and written by the Vatican's No. 2 official, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said in a statement yesterday.

"I am certain, Mr. President, that dropping the case against Mr. Rahman would bestow great honor upon the Afghan people and would raise a chorus of admiration in the international community," Cardinal Sodano said in the letter.

Meanwhile, a respected cleric in the northern city of Mazar-e-Sharif, Mohammed Qasim, said: "We don't care if the West drops its support for us. God will look after Afghanistan."

In Kabul, A Test For Shariah (NYT)

By Andrea Elliott

THE news that a man in Afghanistan might face a death sentence for converting to Christianity brought cries of outrage around the world last week.

In Washington, the matter of Abdul Rahman commanded attention at the highest levels. President Bush said he was "deeply troubled." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called Afghanistan's President, Hamid Karzai, to urge a "favorable resolution," her spokesman said. In Kabul, the judge in the case said he would resist interference.

More quietly, the case struck a chord among Muslim scholars in the West who have been immersed in a debate about the adaptability of Shariah, or Islamic law, to the modern era.

Mr. Rahman, 41, stands accused of apostasy, or ridda, the act of renouncing one's faith. Apostasy is a grave sin in Islam, and according to classical Shariah, it warrants a punishment of execution. But Islamic laws, including those governing the treatment of apostates, were developed as early as the eighth century against a vastly different political and social backdrop.

Progressive Muslim scholars argue that the meaning of those laws has been lost over time: When the laws were created, they say, apostasy was seen as the equivalent of treason. "To be a Muslim was to live in an Islamic state or empire, so the presumption was you were not only becoming the enemy of God but the enemy of the empire," said John L. Esposito, a professor of religion and international affairs at Georgetown University.

Muslim jurists who support the execution of apostates often point to a hadith — a tradition attributed to the Prophet Muhammad in the seventh century — in which he is recorded as saying that a person who changes religions should be killed.

But while the Koran mentions ridda, it never calls for the execution of apostates. There is no record of the prophet killing an apostate himself. And executions of apostates have been rare in Islamic history.

"The common argument is that it clearly contradicts the Koran, which says there should not be compulsion in religion," said Khaled Abou El Fadl, an Islamic law expert and professor at the University of California, Los Angeles.

What complicates the debate is that Islam has no central doctrinal authority, no Vatican to issue an ultimate decree. And while Shariah is the product of human interpretation, it is also seen as divine law, which prompts many Muslims to argue against change.

Still, only a handful of apostasy executions are known to have occurred in Muslim-majority countries in recent decades.

An official of the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom, an advisory body created by Congress, said he knew of only four such cases: one in Sudan in 1985; two in Iran, in 1989 and 1998; and one in Saudi Arabia in 1992.

The notion that classical Islamic law calls for the execution of apostates is widely known but often ignored in predominantly Muslim countries. Most have not adopted official laws against apostasy.

IT'S like the issue of slavery," said Bernard Haykel, an Islamic studies professor at New York University. "Slavery exists in Islamic law and most Muslims have decided to ignore it. It's what I call collective amnesia."

Yet apostasy has a deep cultural resonance among Muslims, making a case like Mr. Rahman's an opportunity for religious conservatives with political agendas, Mr. Haykel said.

"Islamists will always use cases like this one to gain political mileage and credibility," he said. "They become the champions of Islamic law, of Islam. They can present themselves as authentic Muslims."

The case of Mr. Rahman, whose conversion was reported to the authorities by family members after he sought custody of his children from his parents, has been widely characterized as a test for Afghanistan's American-backed government.

Afghanistan's new Constitution, like Iraq's, makes room for both Shariah and secular law, but it is still unclear how successfully they will coexist. The Afghan Constitution states that "no law shall contravene the tenets and provisions of the holy religion of Islam," but it also declares that the state will observe the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

"Iraq has more vigorous protections in its Constitution for human rights than Afghanistan, yet still it has a provision that no law should be contrary to Islam," said Tad Stahnke, policy director of the United States Commission on International Religious Freedom. "It hasn't been tested. But it will."

A recent report by the commission, which examined the constitutions of 44 predominantly Muslim countries, found that most included some protections for religious freedoms. Those protections were most common in countries where no role is provided for Shariah in the constitution.

The commission still lists Afghanistan as one of the world's 10 declared Islamic states. But even under the Taliban, which meted out harsh justice to women and others — including execution — there were no known apostasy executions, several experts said.

DIVORCE proceedings bring out the worst in people. When Abdul Rahman tried to get custody of his daughters in Kabul, Afghanistan, his wife's family told the court that he was unfit to care for his children because he had converted from Islam to Christianity some 16 years ago. A zealous prosecutor, hearing of the case, charged Mr. Rahman with apostasy, a crime punishable by death under some interpretations of Islamic law. If Mr. Rahman does not repudiate Christianity, the judge in the case has said, he will get the death penalty.

Mr. Rahman's case is a discouraging illustration of the uneasy balance between the democratic norms Afghanistan's Constitution enshrines and the conservative Islamic values its judiciary upholds. On the one hand, the Afghan Constitution states that "followers of other religions are free to exercise their faith and perform their religious rites within the limits of the provisions of the law," and it requires the state to adhere to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which clearly protects freedom of conscience and the right to change one's religion.

On the other hand, the Constitution also says that no law can be "contrary to the beliefs and provisions of Islam," and it gives judges broad power to interpret and apply Islamic law. Several schools of Islam do indeed prescribe the ultimate punishment for those who abandon the faith. And so Mr. Rahman's case may well come down to the interpretive leanings of the court.

Moderate Islamic jurists in some countries have attempted to balance or reconcile these often-conflicting interests. In Egypt, for instance, the Islamic Research Center decreed that although apostasy may be a crime, the time period for redemption is limitless — in other words, it is up to the individual, not the state, to adhere to divine will. The former chief justice of Pakistan, which has explicit anti-blasphemy laws, has written that the death penalty for apostasy is not required by the Koran and conflicts with other Islamic values.

Afghanistan's post-Taliban judiciary, however, has shown a propensity to use Islam as a political weapon. The country's chief justice, Fazil Hadi Shinwari, is a hard-line conservative associated with the Islamist parties of Abdul Rasul Sayyaf and Burhanuddin Rabbani. He has used the court as a bully-pulpit, issuing fatwas on a variety of issues outside his jurisdiction.

For instance, under Justice Shinwari's leadership the Supreme Court has variously attempted to ban co-education; tried to eliminate a rival to President Hamid Karzai from the 2004 elections; and jailed newspaper editors, all in the name of Islam.

In other words, the court has overstepped its bounds and contributed to the radicalization of Afghan politics in the process. To further his aims, Justice Shinwari has packed the lower courts with judges who have Islamic educations but no foundation in Afghan law or experience in the judiciary.

President Karzai has a unique opportunity to change this. Under the Constitution, Mr. Karzai must appoint a new Supreme Court this month, and he sent his slate of nine justices to Parliament for approval last week. Although the current chief justice has retained his position, there are some very promising choices among the eight other justices. They include known moderates, like the former chairman of the Judicial Reform Commission, Bahauddin Baha, and the deputy minister of justice, Qasim Hashimzai, who led a major corruption investigation involving members of President Karzai's cabinet.

These appointments mark President Karzai's first opportunity to compose Afghanistan's Supreme Court under a fully constitutional government. They are of momentous importance to the country's stabilization and the consolidation of its nascent democracy.

By creating a competent, professional and moderate judiciary, President Karzai will help to establish the rule of law. If, however, the court remains in the thrall of ideology and factionalism, Afghanistan's experiment in democracy will be compromised.

But the new judges will be powerless to reform the system unless they are given the political support and resources to do so. International involvement in Afghanistan's justice sector since 2001 has been inadequate. Both the Afghan government and its donors need a strategic vision for the judiciary's future and the political focus to make it a reality.

The new judiciary will need support to review the qualifications of the lower court judges, facilities to train new judges and functioning courthouses in the provinces. It will need to be able to share information, laws and legal decisions among officials throughout the country and to pay judges a living wage.

We must do more than simply react loudly to the most extreme cases, like that of Mr. Rahman. Instead, we must partner with the Afghans and other democratic governments in the Islamic world as they struggle to promote modernity and the rule of law. This means working with judicial systems on less controversial, bread-and-butter issues like criminal law and property disputes.

We have seen throughout the world, and in our own history, that competent and independent judges will stand up for the rule of law even when their decisions indict the powerful and defend the unpopular. Mr. Rahman's case should remind us of how important it is to help Afghanistan develop such judges if we want its democracy to succeed.

Where Are All The Jobs? (CHIST)

By Cheryl L. Reed

Chicago Sun-Times, March 26, 2006

In two tours in Iraq as a Marine sergeant, Angelina Summerfield supervised up to 50 switchboard and radio operators whose job was to monitor U.S. spy planes and report sightings of roadside bombs.

Now back in civilian life and living in Blue Island, Summerfield, like thousands of other veterans returning home after serving in Iraq, is finding it tough to get a job despite her military experience.

"I've filled out dozens of applications," said Summerfield, 28. "They say you need a college education to do these jobs. Yet I was a supervisor in the military."

More than half a million reservists and guardsmen have been called to active duty in Iraq. When they come home, will they have jobs?

She has been scanning the classifieds, interviewing for security jobs and hunting for work at a couple of malls, where she applied for security work and also to be a sales clerk or a cashier. "I'm not even good at retail," she said, "but I'd do it for a paycheck."

Summerfield said she has faced tough challenges before and come out fine: She boxed in the Marine Corps' women's league, winning seven of 10 bouts. But, after three months on unemployment, she said, "I'm finding it hard to adjust."

Three years into the war in Iraq, Americans who leave the military are coming home to face a problem most never expected: Veterans are having a hard time getting hired.

It's a national problem. But it's affecting some vets more than others. Hardest hit are the youngest vets -- whose unemployment rate is the highest since the early 1980s -- and those trying to find work in the Chicago area and the rest of Illinois, according to the U.S. Labor Department, which distributes $161 million a year to subsidize states' efforts to help veterans get jobs. Illinois state officials question the Labor Department figures. But, even by their reckoning, the state still ranks among the nation's worst at finding jobs for vets.

Nationwide, the unemployment rate for veterans between 20 and 24 years old was 16 percent last year -- compared with a 9 percent unemployment rate for non-vets in that same age range. Overall, the nation's unemployment rate last year was 5.1 percent.

"In a strong economy, these numbers don't fit," said Sen. Larry Craig (R-Idaho), who chairs the Senate's Veterans Affairs Committee.

Recruitment ads boast that those who enlist will learn job skills in the military.

"It's a very shrewd, sophisticated marketing strategy," said Robert Bruno, a professor at the Institute of Labor and Industrial Relations at the University of Illinois at Chicago. "It doesn't bear any real significance to the marketability of someone coming back into civilian life."

Skills learned in the military often don't translate to civilian jobs, vets and labor experts say -- unless the job seekers also have college degrees and work experience.

"The jobs that are offered veterans suck," said one state veterans employment representative, speaking only on the condition that his name not be used because his agency ordered workers not to talk with a reporter. "They are coming home to a society that wants to pay them $9 an hour, with no benefits. And they cannot afford to live on that. Employers are not taking into consideration their military experience."

Among reasons vets' unemployment is higher today:

*This war hasn't boosted the nation's economy like past wars have, creating civilian jobs. Heavy employment among war veterans in past generations had more to do with the economy than patriotism, Bruno said. When vets came home from World War II and Korea, they found a greater demand for labor generated by those wars, he said.

*Fewer corporate managers today have personal connections to the military and so are less likely to highly value the skills learned in the military, Bruno said.

*There's a stigma in the eyes of some employers about vets in an era when psychological problems such as post-traumatic stress disorder is far more commonly diagnosed. The Journal of the American Medical Association published a military study this month that found that 35 percent of those who have returned from service in Iraq have sought mental health services.

*More than ever, experts say, employers are looking for workers who have demonstrated skills that tie directly to the job. Vets might have skills, even leadership experience, but that isn't always enough to convince skittish employers.

"The military might have taught them skills such as dealing with war and weaponry," said Lane Knox, who heads Illinois' veterans employment representatives. "Of course, there are no demands for that once they are released from the military."

Illinois' job efforts faulted

In Illinois, which gets $6.5 million a year from the federal government to help veterans find work, 34 percent of unemployed vets who sought help from the Illinois Department of Employment Security found jobs last year, according to the U.S. Labor Department, which ranks Illinois as the worst state in the nation for getting jobs for vets.

"It makes me angry, and it's discouraging to thousands of veterans in Illinois who have served their country," Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said. "We can't afford what appears to be mismanagement of a program that is vital in making sure veterans can support themselves."

Illinois employment officials dispute the Labor Department's rankings. They point to new data that show the state is doing better. Even so, the Illinois program would rate better than those in only seven other states for helping uninjured vets find work last year -- and better than those in just four other states at getting jobs for disabled vets.

Indiana ranked near the top for helping vets get jobs -- and No. 1 by a measure that looked at how long vets hold on to those jobs.

Defending state's record

Illinois' veterans employment representatives also maintain that younger vets here are more likely to choose to go to college rather than keep looking for permanent employment -- especially when they realize how limited their job prospects are without a college degree.

In the last five years, the number of veterans using GI Bill college benefits nationwide has risen 20 percent. But in Illinois, it has gone up more than 53 percent. A key reason: This is one of the few states to offer veterans four years of college benefits, in addition to what they get through the federal GI Bill.

In some cases, Illinois Department of Employment Security workers say, veterans register with the agency's Illinois Skills Match computerized job bank but have no intention of taking a job. Instead, they plan to live off their GI Bill money -- $1,034 a month -- while their state education benefits pay their college tuition. "A lot of our younger veterans went into the military so they could get benefits to go to school," Knox said. "They don't want to work. But if someone's taking statistics, all they see is this person is not working."

A bigger problem, according to the state agency, is poor tracking. Illinois doesn't require Social Security numbers when veterans register for jobs on the state's job bank -- which they say makes it more enticing for vets to sign up, for privacy reasons, but impossible for the state to track whether a vet finds work.

At Summerfield's home in Blue Island, her job-hunting troubles strike her father as history repeating itself. Marvin Summerfield says he found many doors closed when he returned from serving in Vietnam as a Marine in 1969.

"Nobody wanted to talk to you," said Marvin Summerfield, 58. "Employers would say, 'We'll get back to you.' Everyone was suspicious. They didn't know if you were psycho and going to grab a gun and shoot someone."

After six months of looking for work, he says he got hired as a salesman -- on commission -- at a Loop printing business. "I don't expect them to be more open to veterans now," he said. "Nobody's going to give a veteran the edge just because they served in a foreign country."

'All a smoke screen'

When Michael McCoy returned from Iraq to Chicago Heights in April 2004, he saw yellow ribbons and American flags everywhere. "I thought I would have an upper hand [compared] to everyone else in the world," he said. "I thought it would look good on my background. I was wrong."

McCoy's job in the Army was ordering parts for military vehicles. He hoped his Army job training would help him find similar work as a civilian, but potential employers told him he would need a college degree. Now he feels duped, saying of the Army's recruiting pitch, "It was all a smoke screen, this stuff about them training you for a job."

McCoy, 24, signed up for unemployment benefits and registered on Illinois Skills Match. Many of the jobs listed on the state job bank are for unskilled labor. Earlier this month, the database listed 27,857 job openings. Four percent were management positions. Vying for those jobs were 12,611 veterans and 97,148 civilians.

It took McCoy five months to get a job -- which he found on his own -- as a UPS package handler, making $8.50 an hour, with no benefits, and just part-time. But that was OK with McCoy, who plans to use his military education benefits to get the credential other employers told him he needs -- a college education.

One problem McCoy realizes he faces is dealing with the psychological repercussions of his experience in Iraq. Recently, he was diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder -- a common condition among Iraq war vets, according to the military study's findings released earlier this month.

Employers "look at you the wrong way," said McCoy, who now sees a Department of Veterans Affairs therapist. "You've been to war, and they think you're a dangerous guy."

State veterans employment representatives -- many of whom are Vietnam War veterans -- call it the "crazy vet stigma" and counsel vets on how to avoid being stigmatized by it.

Reginald Whitley, an Illinois veterans employment representative, recently coached Summerfield on how to deal with an interview for a job doing undercover security. Summerfield wanted to play up her extensive experience with weapons. Whitley shook his head.

"You shouldn't mention the weapons," he told her. "It might make them a little nervous."

A Pointed Symbol Brings Cross Words (LAT)

By John M. Glionna, Times Staff Writer

Around the nation, the icons erected as memorials to service members killed in Iraq inspire bitter exchanges, even violence.

ALBION, Calif. — Crosses in hand, the protesters gathered in the predawn gloom along the Mendocino coastline, two dozen rural Californians sickened by the mounting body count of war.

Under a cold November rain, they busily pounded 2,035 foot-tall redwood symbols into the soggy ground along both sides of Highway 1 — one for each U.S. serviceman and woman who had been killed in Iraq as of that date.

The gesture provoked an immediate response — but not one the activists had anticipated. State highway crews soon arrived to tear down the crosses. Critics said that using a religious symbol in a protest was offensive at worst, insensitive at best. Defenders countered that the field of crosses was a fitting tribute to combatants fighting for their country.

Protesters are discovering that symbols, like certain words, can convey meanings never intended. Cross critics and defenders alike accuse each other of trying to hijack the icon's powerful emotional image for their own ends.

Nationwide, the memorials, which evoke the seemingly endless rows of crosses of World War II-era cemeteries in Europe, are inspiring bitter exchanges and even violence.

Last summer, a man in Crawford, Texas, attached a pipe and chain to his pickup truck and mowed down many of the 2,000 crosses erected outside President Bush's ranch. In December, vandals drove over 100 crosses that were part of a rural memorial in Stoutsville, Ohio. Vandals also removed several crosses erected last fall at the University of Georgia.

Organized by veterans and antiwar groups, cross memorials have sprung up along roadsides, in churchyards and on such public beaches as Santa Monica and Santa Barbara. Erected each weekend when visibility is highest and then dismantled, the displays often include small American flags, votive candles and the names and photos of dead soldiers.

Others, like the Albion memorial, are impromptu gestures by individuals — permanent dedications of crudely made crosses. More crosses often are added as the number of war dead rises.

Detractors say the crosses do a disservice to the dead.

"I object to these groups who say they're mourning for our soldiers — people they didn't even know," said Deb Meyer, a South Bend, Ind., mother whose stepson died in Iraq in 2003. "There's a difference between honoring the dead and counting bodies for your own political purposes."

Recently, Meyer tried to retrieve one of 2,000 white crosses that activists erected outside a military recruiting office, but arrived after they had been removed.

"Yes, I'm aware my stepson was killed; I live with it every day," she said. "For those people to use his death like that — it was a slap in the face. I wanted that cross back."

Sylvia Grider, an anthropologist at Texas A&M University, said the cross isn't the first symbol to cause division. During the Vietnam War, the circular peace symbol enraged many older Americans. Other symbols, like the Nazi swastika, are used to provoke a reaction.

"The point is that symbols draw attention and elicit an emotional response," she said. "For most people, whether they realize it or not, that's usually their intention of using [symbols]."

Michael Astley said he wasn't trying to provoke anyone when he created a 10,000-square-foot memorial last September in a field outside the town of Stoutsville in central Ohio.

The memorial featured 676 white wooden crosses arranged like standing ranks of soldiers. A sign read: "The Cost of War; Final Formation."

Tempers quickly flared, tiffs that often spilled into church when neighbors faced off after Sunday services. Soon, vandals drove over many of the crosses near Astley's rural market.

Astley salvaged the broken crosses and re-erected them.

"I had heard talk, folks saying, 'You know those crosses out on Highway 22? We ought to do something about them,' " said Astley, 52.

"You can see the crosses as a positive thing or the work of another damn peacenik trying to tear down the country. For those who vilified me, my message was misunderstood."

Neighbor Art Dossman understands just fine.

"It's not a memorial; it's an anti-Bush demonstration," said Doss, 75, a Korean War veteran. "He can keep those crosses up; it's his land. But his sign should read, 'The price of freedom.' "

Much of the cross debate is being argued on religious grounds. Detractors, saying the icons exclude Jews and Muslims, have pushed for the Star of David and the crescent moon to be added to memorials.

In Albion, critics called the crosses a thinly veiled religious statement about Christian supremacy that suggested a modern crusade against Muslims. The cross, they argued via a local Internet chat room, carried too much religious and historical freight to convey an unambiguous meaning.

"The cross is not a universal symbol," said Marinela Miclea, a Bay Area software writer who spearheaded the Internet debate. "Not everyone who died in Iraq is a Christian. I know I would resent someone representing me with a cross."

Another writer didn't find fault with the crosses: "Two small sticks of wood nailed together and multiplied by 2000-plus is symbolically a simple and immediately powerful way to communicate the tragedy of lives lost. It's a brilliant, heart-wrenching display."

In Christianity, the cross is the faith's most powerful symbol, representing both sacrifice — Christ's crucifixion — and the promise of salvation.

But plain crosses also have been used for generations as nonsecular markers for the dead.

"People even mark the graves of pets with crosses," said Grider, the anthropologist. "That cross doesn't mean that Fluffy was a Christian; it just means Fluffy was a beloved pet now buried in a marked grave in the backyard. The cross furor seems an overreaction to a long-standing tradition."

Activist Cliff Kindy didn't take lightly his group's decision to uses crosses at a memorial in Fort Wayne, Ind., for the more than 50 servicemen and women from the state who had been killed in Iraq.

"We debated it for weeks," said the organizer for the Chicago-based antiwar group known as the Christian Peacemakers Team. "We struggled with questions about what the crosses represented. We didn't want to hurt people's feelings."

Kindy didn't even refer to the crosses as crosses. He called them "markers."

Still, when the memorial moved last fall to a nearby college, a professor complained that it should have included icons for Jews and Muslims.

"It didn't dawn on us to use any other symbol," Kindy said. "But after it was brought to our attention, that's what we did."

Antiwar activists in Waterville, Maine, never considered using crosses in a memorial erected last fall, choosing instead another traditional icon: a white flag.

Lisa Savage said her group obtained a city permit to display the 2,000 flags, along with signs protesting the war. They worked hard to find a proper symbol to express their sorrow over lives lost in Iraq and briefly considered small U.S. flags. But they wanted a simple, unique image.

"Black flags were rejected as too morbid and red as too bloody," she said. "White seemed a color associated with memorials and cemeteries."

Local veterans insisted that the white flags signified surrender. In a Veterans Day standoff, five men were arrested for criminal trespass as they ceremoniously began pulling up flags before officers moved in to stop them.

"I was fuming," said Wayne Elkins, a carpenter and Vietnam veteran who was one of those arrested. "Those people didn't understand the symbol they were using. They needed to do their homework because those flags offended veterans."

Savage says veterans stole their message: "If someone installs a memorial, why do other people get to define what it symbolizes? They can tell us they're offended. They can't tell us what we meant to portray."

In Albion, 180 miles north of San Francisco, activists said their intentions also were misinterpreted.

Soon after the 2,035 crosses were erected, Caltrans workers began removing them — not because of their political intent but because they were considered a safety hazard. Protesters called the action a desecration.

"Please don't do that," Bosk pleaded with the workers as she videotaped them. "Can't you stop one minute and think why those crosses are here? You're the same age as the men and women who are dying in this war. It's a shame."

The men continued throwing the crosses into a pile.

"We're sorry," he added softly.

Activists later moved the crosses to a small, private, triangular field within sight of the town's main market and post office.

Passersby have added flowers and small U.S. flags. Nearby is a plaque whose message begins: "Here are the symbolic grave markers for the young Americans who volunteered to fight and ultimately lose their lives in a sovereign country, halfway around the world."

Most residents appear to support the memorial, organized by a local Vietnam veteran. The critics, they insist, are outsiders.

"These crosses can't be claimed by any religion," Bosk said. "They belong to every mother who gave birth to a son who has fallen in this war."

Despite the controversy, she added, the crosses will stay where they are for now.

Rescued Hostage Rations His Thanks (WT/LST)

By Sean Rayment, London Sunday Telegraph

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

LONDON -- Freed peace activist Norman Kember gave qualified thanks yesterday to the soldiers who rescued him and two colleagues after 119 days of captivity in Iraq.

"I do not believe that a lasting peace is achieved by armed force," Mr. Kember said, "but I pay tribute to their courage and thank those who played a part in my rescue."

The brief statement by the retired physics professor appeared to be an attempt to quell the furor surrounding his failure -- and that of others in the Christian Peacemaker Teams (CPT) organization -- to thank the soldiers who risked their lives in the three-month rescue effort.

Anger and disbelief had greeted his earlier failure to thank the hundreds of British and American personnel who worked to free him and the three other original captives, all members of the CPT.

When Mr. Kember and two of the others were freed Thursday, the CPT's co-chairman, Doug Pritchard, told reporters in Toronto that "the illegal occupation of Iraq by multinational forces" was the "root cause" of the kidnappings. He offered no words of thanks for multinational forces that participated in the rescue.

Gen. Mike Jackson, chief of the British general staff, had expressed dismay at Mr. Kember's apparent refusal to say "thank you," saying he was "saddened that there does not seem to have been a note of gratitude for the soldiers who risked their lives to save those lives."

The three freed hostages refused to take part in a critical debriefing session with intelligence officers.

"It is the ordinary people of Iraq that you should be talking to -- the people who have suffered so much over many years and still await the stable and just society that they deserve," Mr. Kember said yesterday.

"While in Baghdad we had opportunity to thank the British Embassy staff who worked so diligently for our release. I now thank the staff in Britain who also dedicated so much time to the same end."

The full gamut of Britain's intelligence services was involved in the hunt for the hostages, in an operation that cost millions of dollars. Agents from MI6, MI5, the Joint Communications Headquarters at Cheltenham and soldiers from the Special Air Service and the Special Reconnaissance Regiment all took part.

Cobra, the civil contingencies committee made up of senior Cabinet ministers and intelligence chiefs, was kept up to date on developments in the search for the Briton, American and two Canadians following their abduction in November by a group calling itself the Swords of Righteousness Brigade.

Jan Benvie, 51, an Edinburgh teacher who is due to go to Iraq with CPT this summer, said: "We make clear that if we are kidnapped we do not want there to be force or any form of violence used to release us."

Rescuing Mr. Kember and his colleagues became the main priority of Task Force Black, the coalition special forces unit that carries out counter-terrorist operations in Baghdad.

After the slayings of Kenneth Bigley and Margaret Hassan, two British nationals killed by kidnappers in Iraq, few within the British military expected Mr. Kember to be found alive.

Those fears grew when Tom Fox, a resident of Clear Brook, Va., and the fourth captive in Mr. Kember's group, was killed and his body dumped two weeks ago.

"Nobody expected Mr. Kember or the others to be found alive, especially after one was murdered," a senior officer said, "so it was a real champagne moment when he was found safely."

Freed British Hostage Returns Home (WP)

By Thomas Wagner

LONDON -- Freed British hostage Norman Kember returned home Saturday after four months in captivity in Iraq and thanked the soldiers who saved him and two other peace activists.

Kember, 74, arrived on a commercial flight from Kuwait and was reunited with his wife, Pat, in a terminal in Heathrow Airport. He waved to the waiting TV cameras.

A joint U.S.-British military operation freed Kember and Canadians James Loney, 41, and Harmeet Singh Sooden, 32, on Thursday. They were rescued without violence from a house west of Baghdad.

"I do not believe that a lasting peace is achieved by armed force, but I pay tribute to their courage and thank those who played a part in my rescue," Kember said in a statement he read to journalists while smiling and holding his wife's hand.

After their rescue, the three members of the Christian Peacemakers Teams group learned that a fellow hostage, 54-year-old American Tom Fox, had been killed by the hostage-takers weeks earlier.

Kember declined to answer questions about his ordeal and said the world's focus should be on the needs of the Iraqi people.

"There's a real sense in which you are interviewing the wrong person. It's the ordinary people of Iraq you should be talking to, the people who have suffered so much over many years and still await the stable and just society they deserve."

Some British media were critical of what they viewed as an apparent lack of a formal thank you from the peace activists for the efforts to rescue them. But Kember's supporters maintained that thanks was expressed quickly.

"We are thankful to all the people who gave of themselves sacrificially to free Jim, Norman, Harmeet and Tom over the last four months, and those supporters who prayed and wept for our brothers in captivity, for their loved ones and for us, their co-workers," Christian Peacemaker Teams said Thursday in a statement.

Kember was flown out of Baghdad Friday on a British military plane, saying: "I'm very much looking forward to getting home to British soil and to being reunited with my family."

The Rev. Bob Gardiner of the Harrow Baptist Church in London, where Kember and his wife worship, praised the soldiers for carrying out the rescue without any violence or loss of life.

"We were impressed by the sensitivity with which it (the British government) responded to our concerns about any possible use of force in any rescue attempt," Gardiner said.

Maj. Gen. Rick Lynch, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad, said the rescue was launched three hours after a detainee captured the night before told American forces where the hostages were.

The four activists were kidnapped Nov. 26, and Fox's body was found dumped in western Baghdad on March 9. He had been shot in the head and chest.

The release of the trio has raised hopes among U.S. officials and family members that American reporter Jill Carroll, a freelance writer for The Christian Science Monitor who was abducted Jan. 7, could eventually be freed.

Peggy Gish, a Christian Peacekeeping Team member in Baghdad, said Kember and the two Canadians did not appear to have been tortured or abused. Most of the time, the captives were not tied up, and the captors _ a little-known Iraqi radical group _ provided Kember with medication for high blood pressure and an aneurysm.

Gish said the captors tied up the hostages, then fled before the multinational forces arrived.

Keeping The Faith, Globally (LAT)

By Gregory Rodriguez

AFTER THREE LONG years of war in Iraq, a growing number of Americans are deciding that the U.S. should turn its attention inward. An October poll found that since 2002 the percentage of Americans who think that the nation "should mind its own business internationally" has risen from 30% to 42%. Likewise, trade protectionism and nativism are on the rise. Is the United States destined to enter a period of isolationism? Probably not. That's because evangelical Christians, who make up somewhere between one-quarter and one-third of the U.S. population, won't let it happen.

Surprised? You may characterize evangelicals only by way of hot-button domestic issues — abortion, stem cell research, same-sex marriage. But it's at least as interesting to look at them in terms of global issues. Once upon a time, they were among the most isolationist of Americans, but no more. If that weren't true, we'd see much higher figures when it came to those who think the United States should merely be minding "its own business."

"Bible-believing" Christians have, in a way, always been internationalists. After all, "evangelism" means spreading the Gospel and missionary work around the world is central to their faith. But before the last quarter of the 20th century, most evangelical leaders eschewed real-world politics and foreign policy strategizing for more otherworldly concerns. In 1965, Jerry Falwell gave a now famous sermon, "Ministers and Marchers," in which he declared that evangelicals' duty was to "preach the Word" and not to "reform the externals."

But that was when conservative Christians felt that their culture was America's culture. It was the liberal shift during the cultural revolution of the late 1960s and early 1970s that pushed them into the public square, at the same time that they felt themselves becoming marginalized. Politicized, activist evangelism, as sociologist Christian Smith observed, "thrives on distinction, engagement, tension, conflict and threat."

This sense of "minorityness" became an important element in pushing evangelical engagement with global human rights issues. One of their initial forays into foreign policy was driven by their concern for the persecution of fellow Christians overseas.

In 1998, U.S. evangelical activists scored a major foreign policy victory with the passage of the International Religious Freedom Act, one of the most comprehensive human rights laws on the books. It established an ambassador-at-large for international religious freedom and mandated that the State Department publish an annual report on the status of religious freedom around the world. The fruits of such activism were on display last week as the State Department spoke out against the impending execution of a Christian convert in Afghanistan.

In recent years, evangelicals such as Charles Colson have turned their attention to efforts to halt human trafficking. Last March, the National Evangelical Assn., which represents 30 million Americans from 56 denominations, published a call to civic responsibility, which emphasized evangelicals' global involvement in activities such as disaster relief, refugee resettlement, the fight against AIDS and poverty, and the need for greater international aid.

More recently, evangelical lobbying has pushed President Bush to pay attention to the genocide and famine in the Darfur region in Sudan. Last month, 80 prominent evangelical leaders launched a campaign to persuade their congregants that more should be done to combat global warming.

As U.S. evangelicalism has grown in scope and strength, its most fundamentalist branches have become less central to the movement. "It's not just Jerry Falwell in Virginia anymore," says Dennis Hoover, vice president for research and publications at the Institute for Global Engagement. "Now it's also Hawaiian-shirt-wearing Rick Warren in California and huge megachurches in middle America."

This broader profile coupled with a growing interest in foreign affairs has forged alliances that once would have been impossible to imagine. One example: Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, a leading evangelical figure, has teamed with California Sen. Barbara Boxer on women's rights in Afghanistan.

Evangelicals are among the Americans who believe most strongly in this nation's providential role in history. And because they make up one-quarter of the U.S. electorate, they see themselves positioned to help it along.

"Never before has God given American evangelicals such an awesome opportunity to shape public policy in ways that could contribute to the well-being of the entire world," wrote the board of the National Evangelical Assn. in its call to civic responsibility. "Disengagement is not an option."

DOJ:

Minnesota Lawmakers Fight For Grants To Battle Drugs (MINNST)

By Aaron Blake

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 26, 2006

Members of Congress want to save a federal law-enforcement program, but critics say it funds corrupt policing.

WASHINGTON - When the White House launched a website that helps taxpayers understand federal programs, something called the Byrne Grants received a very low rating. The program, which pays for drug task forces and other local law enforcement programs, has no meaningful goals, is unfocused and should be axed altogether, the White House said.

Perfect fodder for a Congress in budget-cutting mode? Hardly, if you ask members of the Minnesota delegation.

The Edward Byrne Memorial Justice Assistance Grant Program, or Byrne Grants, has lots of enemies - from the American Civil Liberties Union to conservative groups - and for the second consecutive year it is slated for elimination in President Bush's budget. But a number of legislators, including several in Minnesota, feel passionately that it represents a lifeline in the war on drugs - specifically, methamphetamine - and will fight to save it yet again this year.

The battle is one of the first being fought in what's sure to be another tooth-pulling process within Congress over the growing federal budget. And it shows that sides aren't always drawn according to party politics.

This month the Senate fired the first salvo, approving Sen. Mark Dayton's legislation to restore funding for the Byrne Grants to $900 million. The Senate did the same thing last year, but Congress ended up approving just $416 million, and funding has declined each of the past four years.

"Who will be there to protect our children from those making and pushing poisons like meth if the House approves the elimination of the Byrne Justice Assistance Grant program?" Rep. Mark Kennedy, R-Minn., asked the House Budget Committee.

Critics say the grants are ineffective and prone to corruption. For example, in Tulia, Texas, in 1999, dozens of residents were sentenced to decades in prison based on the uncorroborated testimony of one drug task force officer. Most of them were pardoned four years later by Gov. Rick Perry, and the officer was convicted of perjury.

Last May, Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, introduced a "No More Tulias" Act, which would require states either to install safeguards against task force corruption or to eliminate task forces altogether in order to receive any law enforcement money from the Justice Department.

The structure of the task forces is "hugely problematic," said Bill Piper, director of national affairs for the Drug Policy Alliance. Task forces are federally funded, state managed and locally staffed, and often they cover multiple jurisdictions. The number of scandals speaks for itself, he said.

"There's enough to suggest that it's not a question of a few bad apples in law enforcement; it's more of a system that's inherently corrupt," Piper said.

Minnesota lawmakers say that local problems are simply that and that Minnesota is an example of how effective state oversight can be.

"Don't paint the whole country with a problem that's occurred in Houston; try to fix your problem," said Rep. Jim Oberstar, D-Minn.

Critics also say the program isn't being held accountable by the federal, and often state, governments. The Government Accountability Office has issued reports in recent years that say the monitoring of Byrne Grants has lacked documentation.

David Muhlhausen, a senior policy analyst at the conservative Heritage Foundation, said lawmakers use Byrne Grants simply to appear tough on drugs and crime. Other conservative groups, including Americans for Tax Reform and the National Taxpayers Union, have urged that the Byrne Grants be eliminated.

"After that press release goes out, Congress really doesn't care too much what goes on with the funding," Muhlhausen said.

Dayton, D-Minn., said he judges the program based on the feedback he gets from Minnesota officers: "This is one of the important and one of the very few ways in which the federal government helps state and local governments with law enforcement."

Minnesota has 21 task forces, which will receive $2.6 million from the grants in 2006. In 2005, the state's drug task forces seized more than 180 pounds of methamphetamine and cocaine, made almost 6,000 arrests, seized 100 meth labs and made more than 500 educational presentations to 46,000 people. Almost half of their arrests involved meth.

This month the Dakota County Drug Task Force assisted in the arrests of 26 alleged gang members on federal narcotics and firearms trafficking charges in what federal officials call one of the largest drug busts in Minnesota history.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Quattrone's Victory May Not Echo (BLOOM)

By Ann Woolner, BLOOMBERG NEWS

Bloomberg News, March 26, 2006

Frank Quattrone has squeezed by again. Catlike in his ability to maneuver through tight spaces and survive steep falls, the former high-tech investment banker last week shook off a conviction it took prosecutors two trials and three years to nail.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals set it aside because of a few wrong words in the judge's jury instructions, even while finding sufficient evidence to convict.

The appeals court gave Quattrone another boost, too, by removing U.S. District Judge Richard Owen from his case. If Quattrone is retried, he won't again face the same pro-prosecution judge who made the defense miserable through his first two trials.

Prosecutors haven't said whether they will seek retrial, go for a plea deal, appeal or simply drop the whole thing. Any of those options would be better than the 18 months in prison assigned to him by Owen, and there's a decent chance Quattrone just might land in the clear.

But what does this decision mean to anyone else?

Coming after the reversal of Arthur Andersen LLP's conviction, does it represent a pendulum swing against corporate criminal prosecutions? Might it help Enron Corp.'s two former chief executives now on trial in Houston?

No and no.

The Quattrone decision is a limited one and, like the Andersen ruling, came in a case involving document destruction.

Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, on the other hand, are accused of lying to the public about Enron's finances.

Quattrone's misstep came at a time when a federal grand jury and the Securities and Exchange Commission were looking into certain conduct at Credit Suisse First Boston, where he ran the high-tech group.

As 2000 was ending, Quattrone endorsed and sent to all employees in his group an e-mail drafted by an underling.

"With the recent tumble in stock prices, and many deals now trading below issue price, I understand the securities litigation bar is mounting an all-out assault on broken tech IPOs," banker Richard Char wrote.

Quattrone had just learned about the grand jury investigation. Before forwarding the e-mail, he added to Char's message, "I strongly advise you to follow these procedures," noting that he had been "a key witness in a securities litigation case."

A New York federal jury decided that was obstruction and witness tampering, just as a federal jury in Houston convicted Andersen of obstructing justice for urging employees to shred documents wanted by the SEC.

Besides, two cases do not a trend make.

"For every high-profile reversal, there are probably 20 convictions," said William Mateja, who formerly helped oversee the Justice Department's Corporate Crime Task Force.

As of last summer, the task force counted 700 corporate fraud convictions over three years, including 100 CEOs and company presidents, according to the Justice Department.

"The numbers are staggering," said Mateja, now a defense lawyer at the Dallas firm of Fish and Richardson.

Even in the limited area of document destruction, there is little in the Quattrone case to help those who shred possibly incriminating papers when worried about regulators, prosecutors or plaintiffs' lawyers getting them.

Owen correctly charged the jury on what it takes to convict someone of obstructing justice and tampering with a witness. The problem is that the judge added words that undid all the others, the appeals court said.

After explaining criminal intent, after telling jurors they needed to find some nexus between Quattrone urging document destruction and his knowledge that those documents were wanted by investigators, Owen then "eviscerated" a crucial requirement he had already explained, the appeals court said.

He told jurors they could convict if they decided that Quattrone "directed the destruction of documents that were called for by a grand jury subpoena" regardless of whether he knew they were wanted by the jury.

The law says a defendant had to have known the documents to be destroyed could be wanted by authorities for it to constitute obstruction.

And even though the appellate judges found prosecutors had offered sufficient evidence for reasonable jurors to conclude Quattrone knew exactly what he was doing when he endorsed a file cleanup, the appellate judges said they couldn't be certain the jury would have convicted if Owen hadn't improperly made it so easy to do so.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Former DeLay Aide Enriched By Nonprofit (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

Bulk of Group's Funds Tied to Abramoff

A top adviser to former House Whip Tom DeLay received more than a third of all the money collected by the U.S. Family Network, a nonprofit organization the adviser created to promote a pro-family political agenda in Congress, according to the group's accounting records.

DeLay's former chief of staff, Edwin A. Buckham, who helped create the group while still in DeLay's employ, and his wife, Wendy, were the principal beneficiaries of the group's $3.02 million in revenue, collecting payments totaling $1,022,729 during a five-year period ending in 2001, public and private records show.

The group's revenue was drawn mostly from clients of Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, according to its records. From an FBI subpoena for the records, it can be inferred that the bureau is exploring whether there were links between the payments and favorable legislative treatment of Abramoff's clients by DeLay's office.

In recent months, Abramoff pleaded guilty to charges of tax fraud and conspiracy to defraud clients and bribe a public official; DeLay (R-Tex.) stepped down from his post as House majority leader; and Buckham folded his lobbying firm, the Alexander Strategy Group.

In the late 1990s, when DeLay's influence was growing, the lawmaker depicted the USFN in a promotional letter as a nationwide, grass-roots organization. In fact, it had a tiny staff that barely registered an impact on Capitol Hill. The group appears to have served mostly as a vehicle for funneling corporate funds to DeLay's advisers and financing ads that attacked Democrats.

The group's payments to the Buckhams -- in the form of a monthly retainer as well as commissions on donations by Abramoff's clients -- overlapped briefly with Edwin Buckham's service as chief of staff to DeLay and continued during his subsequent role as DeLay's chief political adviser.

During this latter period, Buckham and his wife, Wendy, acting through their consulting firm, made monthly payments averaging $3,200-$3,400 apiece to DeLay's wife, Christine, for three of the years in which he collected money from the USFN and some other clients.

Even though Buckham left DeLay's staff at the end of 1997, he still coordinated much of the congressional office's work and ran DeLay's principal fundraising committee from a building bought with USFN money, according to three former DeLay staff members who said they had firsthand knowledge of his role then.

"If an individual called DeLay's appointments secretary saying they wanted to talk to DeLay about overregulation, the appointment secretary would say go speak to Buckham," one former aide said. Buckham, an evangelical minister, also continued to serve as DeLay's spiritual adviser and prayed frequently with him, the former aides said.

DeLay's lawyer, Richard Cullen, disputed the accounts of Buckham's influence. He said Buckham made appointment requests but was not involved in final decisions on scheduling after he left the office. He also said Buckham did not coordinate the office's activities, saying that was done by successors.

Abramoff, for his part, once boasted that he had invested a million dollars in Buckham, according to a former Abramoff colleague who said he witnessed the conversation. Abramoff expressed confidence that the funds would bring a good return for his clients, the colleague said. Abramoff, through a spokesman, declined comment on this claim or other details of this article.

Wendy Buckham was not the only spouse of a DeLay staffer to benefit from the USFN revenue stream sustained by Abramoff's clients. A consulting firm owned by the wife of Tony C. Rudy, DeLay's deputy chief of staff, was paid $15,600 by the group in 1999 and another $10,400 in 2000. Rudy resigned to work with Abramoff in 2001. It could not be determined what the payments were for.

DeLay supported the interests of many USFN donors on Capitol Hill, including an Indian tribe seeking to keep a tax exemption for gambling revenue and wealthy Russians seeking a favorable vote on Russian aid legislation. DeLay's spokesman has said his opinions and votes were based solely on "good policy" and national interests.

Edwin and Wendy Buckham and their lawyer, Laura A. Miller, did not respond to multiple requests for comment on USFN spending or the money they received. The Rudys did not return calls to their home and Tony Rudy's cellphone.

The accounting records reviewed by The Washington Post included a list of every transaction by the USFN from 1996 to 2000 and the group's tax returns for 2001, the last year it existed. They demonstrate that the consulting fees, bonuses and fundraising commissions for the Buckhams -- plus the purchase of a townhouse that served as the locus of DeLay's own fundraising efforts -- consumed far more of the group's budget than its spending for lobbying on "moral fitness" issues.

A previous article in The Post detailed how USFN had drawn its largest checks from Abramoff's clients, including $1 million from what several former Buckham associates described as Russian oil and gas executives and hundreds of thousands of dollars from an Indian tribe.

Records obtained by federal investigators after that article appeared and reviewed by The Post make clear just how unusual USFN's spending was. Its revenue was lavished not only on DeLay's advisers but on a variety of expenses that experts say are atypical for such a small nonprofit: $62,375 for wall art, a vase listed at $20,100, airfare and meals for Abramoff that cost $11,548, and $267,202 in travel and entertainment expenses that appear to have benefited mostly Buckham, the group's board members, and its tiny staff.

"They were using donor funds for interior decorating," said Chris Geeslin, a pastor in Frederick, Md., who between 1998 and 2001 served as one of the group's directors and then its president. He blamed what he described as the group's misspending on Buckham, who he said "would tell us where you should put things. He orchestrated all this. . . . He used us."A Handpicked Board

When the USFN was incorporated at Buckham's instigation in 1996, it described its purpose as promoting policies favorable for "families, the economic prosperity, social improvement, moral fitness, and general well being of the United States."

From the outset, it was organized differently from other public advocacy groups located in the capital that hoped to influence the nation's leaders. For example, Buckham selected as its board members three evangelical Christians from the tiny town of Republic, Wash. (pop. 954), who associates say he had met at a religious retreat.

According to the minutes from its March 1997 board meeting, the group considered appointing "J. Abramoff" to the board, but never did. The group's first donation, a $15,000 check, came from the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, one of Abramoff's highest-paying clients, and the next two donor checks came from other groups linked with Abramoff.

Formally, Buckham was a consultant to the board, but he said in an October 2003 deposition taken by Federal Election Commission lawyers and obtained by The Post that he had a verbal understanding allowing him to take whatever actions he deemed "in the best interest of the USFN pertaining to issues that they cared about." This included authorizing payments to others.

But some routine procedures were not followed: USFN officials did not register as lobbyists until 2000, when the group became the target of a complaint at the FEC, and they sent in retroactive registrations for the three previous years.

The Buckhams closely controlled the group's finances. Wendy Buckham formally served as the group's treasurer and secretary for only five months in 1996 and 1997, but kept the books and signed its checks until it folded in 2001, according to its tax forms and former officers. Edwin Buckham said in the 2003 deposition it was he who suggested she take this role.

USFN nevertheless paid both an accounting firm and Wendy Buckham for accounting in 1997. She also collected $43,000 in "commissions" that year on the first $524,975 in contributions to the group from business entities that worked with Abramoff, according to its ledger. Congressional ethics rules do not bar such payments to spouses unless they are meant to purchase favors from lawmakers or staff.

The Alexander Strategy Group began collecting its monthly stipend of $10,000-$12,000 from USFN in October 1997 to perform fundraising and other services, even while Buckham was still receiving a salary from the whip's office, according to House payroll records. House rules allow such overlap only if the outside income is limited and not a reward for official acts.

Within four weeks after Buckham resigned from DeLay's staff in December 1997, the Alexander Strategy Group began also collecting commissions on donations to USFN from firms that worked with Abramoff. The largest were two $75,000 payments in 1998 and one for $104,500 in 1999. The total reached $364,500 before they stopped at the end of 1999. USFN's ledger also lists an unexplained "bonus" payment of $60,000 in December 1998.

The Internal Revenue Service generally requires that board members of nonprofits approve all payments to related entities. But several documents labeled as contracts with Buckham's firm in the group's papers are not signed, and Geeslin said in an interview that some of the minutes for board meetings in 1998 and 1999 were formally written after the FEC began its investigation.

Besides spending lavishly during its meetings at various resorts, the group also spent $149,000 in July 1998 to lease a skybox at MCI Center "at the request of one of the donors to USFN," the group's internal audit states. Geeslin said that person was actually Abramoff, who expressed his gratitude while sitting near him at a sporting event.

In the version of the group's official, typewritten ledgers, supplied to the FBI last month under subpoena, several of its most unusual expenditures are partially crossed out and relabeled in ink. The $20,100 purchase of a vase in October 1999 from a Royal Doulton dealer in Miami was relabeled "office equipment," and the $62,375 purchase in January 1999 of a collection of Salvador Dali and Peter Max prints was relabeled "office fixtures."

Asked about the handwritten changes, the group's former lawyer, J. Thomas Smith, said he did not recall seeing them and declined further comment.

Art Taylor, head of the Better Business Bureau's Wise Giving Alliance, a watchdog group, noted after reviewing the nonprofit group's tax returns for 1998 and 1999 that a tax inspector might wonder if "they have enough activity going on" of public benefit to justify their tax exemption. "If they were a charity," he said, "they don't meet our standards."Labor in the Marianas

One of the first policy issues to be discussed by the group's board, according to its March 1997 minutes, was a "free-market research project" in the Northern Marianas Islands, a U.S. protectorate in the Pacific Ocean.

At the time, Abramoff was under contract with the Marianas government to lobby against congressional legislation to impede the free flow of immigrant labor to the islands from China and elsewhere in Asia, and impose a minimum hourly wage exceeding the island's standard rate of $3.05.

To U.S. immigration officials and other critics, maintaining the Marianas' exemptions from these rules amounted to providing legal protection for sweatshops. But textile manufacturers, who dominated the islands' politics and profited heavily from paying immigrant workers less than required on the mainland, ardently opposed the legislation. The Marianas government paid Abramoff a total of $7.17 million in lobbying fees from 1996 to 2001, according to an audit there.

Abramoff focused on DeLay's office in his lobbying effort, billing the Marianas for 187 contacts in 1996 and 1997, including 104 conversations with Buckham and 16 direct meetings with DeLay, according to Abramoff's billing records. Buckham affirmed in a 1995 interview withNational Journal that Abramoff "is someone on our side. . . . He has access to DeLay."

So it was perhaps understandable that in the spring of 1997, USFN's board was eager to demonstrate that the economic policies that were good for the Marianas (pop. 53,552) could be good for America. To do so, it dispatched its first director, a former manager of DeLay's 1996 Texas reelection campaign named Robert G. Mills.

During the trip, Mills -- accompanied by Buckham, who was still on DeLay's staff -- met with Willie Tan, the islands' largest private employer. Tan's textile companies had settled a lawsuit filed five years earlier by the U.S. Labor Department charging workplace abuses, and he had long cultivated contacts in Washington to stop the immigration and wage legislation.

In April 1997, for example, a longtime Tan aide and island politician named Benigno Fitial went to Washington, where he sang "Happy Birthday" to DeLay in the whip's office. He sent Buckham an e-mail after the trip expressing appreciation for his support and recalling Buckham's explanation that one of his roles was to "stop legislation from getting on the floor of the House." Fitial signed the e-mail, "YOUR 'ADOPTED' BROTHER BEN."

Three months earlier, Tan's network of companies had written five checks of $10,000 each to USFN, and Buckham's wife had claimed $10,000 in "commissions" on these checks, according to the group's ledger.

These were just the first of 23 payments by Tan's companies to the group, which eventually totaled $650,000.

Later in 1997, Wendy Buckham claimed another $10,000 in commissions on Tan's checks, and in 1998, the couple's jointly owned consulting firm took another $20,000 in commissions explicitly attributed to the Tan donations, according to the ledger. Many other "commissions" collected by the couple were not linked in the ledgers to a specific donor.

DeLay saw Tan when he took his wife and daughter to the Marianas in a December 1997 trip arranged with the help of Abramoff and his lobby firm. After brunching with Tan on his first full day, followed by a round of golf with Tan and others, DeLay attended a dinner in his honor sponsored by Tan's holding company at the local Pacific Islands Club.

It was at this dinner that DeLay gave the speech in which he called Abramoff "one of my closest and dearest friends," according to a copy. DeLay also reminded Tan and his colleagues of his earlier promise that no wage and immigration legislation would be passed.

"Stand firm," DeLay said in his closing. "Resist evil. Remember that all truth and blessings emanate from our Creator." He then departed with Tan to see a cockfight, according to a written account by one of the trip participants.

In response to a reporter's question, Tan said in an e-mail Friday that "we hired [a] reputable firm, and we never ask[ed] the firm to do anything wrong." He said he was unaware of the commissions collected personally by the Buckhams.

No Marianas immigration or wage reform legislation passed Congress. Aides to Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), a key sponsor, say that Senate-passed legislation was never taken up by any House committee.Attack Ads

Before the U.S. Family Network folded in 2001 under pressure from an FEC probe, it became involved in other controversial political matters.

In 1998, the group lobbied Congress against new regulations on cigarettes and collected a $100,000 donation from the R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. It also spent $75,863 that year on radio ads that called for President Clinton's resignation and attacked Democrats, according to the group's ledger and transcripts of the ads.

The following year, the National Republican Congressional Committee gave the USFN a $500,000 check to finance additional radio ads in the districts of vulnerable Democrats. Buckham told the FEC he solicited the check, and others told FEC investigators it was paid over the objections of the NRCC's director and chief counsel.

Of the $500,000, USFN gave just $300,000 to another nonprofit group for the ads. In his deposition, Buckham explained that he retained a portion of the Republican Party's check as a commission. "If I raise money, I get a portion," Buckham said. "It is in my contract."

The NRCC in 2004 paid the eighth-highest fine in FEC history to settle allegations that some of its officials colluded with USFN on the ads in violation of campaign finance laws.

As the group started to wind down, it made five payments totaling nearly $200,000 to entities affiliated with its staff or board members or located at USFN's address, according to the ledger. It sold the townhouse at a $19,000 loss.

The board also agreed at its final meeting in January 2001 to pay $150,000 to the Dorothy Joan Morris Foundation.

The minutes state this was done at the request of "the gentleman who donated the largest amount of money to USFN" -- a term that Geeslin said is a euphemism for Buckham's fundraising.

Incorporation papers on file with the Maryland Secretary of State list the foundation's location as an insurance company office in a strip mall in Frederick.

The papers state that the foundation is in turn owned by another group, Foundation Ministries Inc., which has its legal address at the Frederick home of the Buckhams.

Dorothy Joan Morris is the name of the 79-year-old mother of a former Buckham assistant named Roger Albanese, who is described in USFN documents as collecting roughly $20,000 from the group for "program services related to prayer." She says she never authorized the use of her name for the foundation, was never told about the $150,000 donation and never saw any of the proceeds.

"What rights does he [Buckham] have to put that in my name?" asked Morris, who said she lives with her husband in a trailer home parked in Las Vegas. "It's fishy."

From A Conservative, A Lack Of Compassion For Ralph Reed (WP)

By Thomas B. Edsall And Dan Balz

Ralph Reed, candidate for Georgia lieutenant governor and former executive director of the Christian Coalition, has a standard line when opponents link him to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. "The Democrats, radical left, and dominant media have made numerous unfair personal attacks against Ralph," his Web site declares.

Lately, however, it's becoming harder for Reed to dismiss his critics as ideologically motivated. One of the toughest is Marvin Olasky, a close associate of President Bush who helped developed the administration's faith-based initiative and the concept of "compassionate conservatism."

Olasky, a journalism professor at the University of Texas, is editor in chief of World magazine, the mission of which "is to glorify God and enjoy Him forever." Since Nov. 19, World has run 10 articles and essays describing the $4 million in gambling money Abramoff paid to Reed to lobby against casinos competing with Abramoff's clients. The articles have highlighted incriminating e-mails and other disclosures that have raised doubts about Reed's explanations of his activities.

Reed, Olasky wrote March 4, "has damaged Christian political work by confirming for some the stereotype that evangelicals are easily manipulated and that evangelical leaders use moral issues to line their own pockets."

On Feb. 6, Reed wrote Olasky to say he was " very disappointed that WORLD would repeat false and politically-motivated attacks by liberal groups in Texas."

In language similar to his campaign stump responses, Reed said: "Had I known then what I know now, I would not have undertaken the work. On reflection, I should have declined the work and I regret any difficulty it has caused the pro-family community, for which I have accepted full responsibility. . . . What I do not appreciate and what I am confident your readers will reject is an unfair attempt by the media to engage in guilt by association."

Some polling data have been published in Georgia indicating that the Abramoff scandal has hurt Reed's first bid for elective office. Most recently, the Atlanta Journal-Constitution cited a survey suggesting that if Reed wins the Republican nomination, his presence could weaken support for the reelection of Gov. Sonny Perdue (R).

When 500 Republicans were asked whether the presence of Reed on a ticket with Perdue would increase or decrease their likelihood of voting for the Republican governor, 18 percent said it would improve the chances, while 26 percent said it would diminish the prospect of voting for Perdue, a net eight-point negative, the newspaper reported.MoveOn to Stoke House Races

One of the biggest obstacles facing Democrats in their quest to capture control of the House in November is the relatively limited number of competitive seats. MoveOn.org, the liberal grass-roots activist organization, hopes to help make the playing field bigger.

Beginning in April, MoveOn will begin bombarding five congressional districts with advertising campaigns aimed at turning second-tier targets into competitive contests, all with the goal of generating the kind of anti-incumbent sentiment that will topple the Republican majority.

"If we can put enough districts in play that [analysts] say the House is up for grabs, that will open the floodgate in terms of energy from our members and in terms of money from donors who otherwise might be reticent to give to many different races," said Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn's political action committee. "The earlier that we can flip that switch where someone says that, the better off we believe we are in terms of the amount of energy that people are going to put into the election."

Pariser won't say which five districts will draw the initial advertising, only that the commercials will attempt to connect a local House member's votes to sentiment that lobbyists and corporate interests have too much sway with the current Congress. Nor will Pariser say whether MoveOn will seek to go into additional districts if the first ads prove successful.

MoveOn's PAC has become one of the largest collectors of so-called hard-dollar contributions in the country. In the 2004 cycle, the group raised about $30 million, putting it behind Emily's List but ahead of any number of other well-known interest groups on the left and right. Last year, the organization raised $10 million, and this year has set a goal of $15 million to $20 million. Some of that will be used for ads, some for voter mobilization, some for direct contributions.

The ads will run at what Pariser called "near saturation" level, with interruptions, for a period of about three months. "Realistically, we're not going to single-handedly create a change election," Pariser said. "I think we can play a role in tipping a number of close races and helping to make sure that as we move closer to the election that the right issues are on voters' minds."

Bombing Victim's Father Goes On Trial In Birmingham (AJC)

By DREW JUBERA, The Atlanta Journal-Constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, March 26, 2006

Birmingham — It's this city's most sacred acre. About 100,000 visitors file each year through the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church, most pausing in the basement at what's now an outdated kitchen, but which nearly 43 years ago was the ladies room where four black schoolgirls died in a bomb blast while straightening their dresses for a Sunday youth service.

Plotted by four Klansmen, the 1963 murders caused even whites to realize that things were out of hand in a city whose dynamite-happy segregationists earned it the nickname "Bombingham."

The murders became modern Birmingham's defining moment, and perhaps no one is linked more closely with the city's recovery than Chris McNair, father of 11-year-old Denise, youngest of the four girls killed.

McNair emerged from his daughter's racist killing as a bridge between blacks and whites. He and his wife, Maxine, waited 39 years for the final conviction in their daughter's murder, in 2002, and McNair became one of the first African-Americans since Reconstruction elected to the state Legislature, as well as a long-serving county commissioner.

The Birmingham News lauded him as the city's "steady father figure." A fellow county commissioner compared him to Job.

But in a turn almost as shocking to many here as the bombings, McNair, now 80, is scheduled to stand trial in federal court next month on bribery charges, with almost any jail time effectively seen as a life sentence.

He is accused of taking nearly $1 million in work, goods and cash from contractors hired for part of the county's $3 billion sewer rebuild. His defense lawyer is Doug Jones, who prosecuted two of the church bombers for the U.S. attorney's office.

McNair has pleaded not guilty and calls the charges against him "a grave injustice."

The town, both black and white, has been stunned into a kind of silent, if simmering, disbelief. Many, regardless of whether they think McNair is guilty, say he and his wife have suffered enough, victims of both murderous racism and a system that long did what it could to deny them justice.

"This would be one of the last things we would want to happen to a person like Chris and his family," said the Rev. Abraham Woods, president of the local chapter of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. "It's hit us like a ton of bricks."

"It's like somebody dropping a bomb on them again," added Barbara Cross, who as the oldest daughter of the Rev. John Cross, then pastor of Sixteenth Street Baptist, was in the church basement when Denise — along with Addie Mae Collins, Carole Robertson and Cynthia Wesley, all 14 — was killed. "I just hope it's not true."

Even white conservatives, who often chafe at the city's frequent civil rights commemorations, have been largely mum on the topic.

"It's almost taboo," Russ Fine, co-host of a popular talk-radio show, said of the lack of discussion of McNair's indictments. "I think whites and blacks alike feel the same way: 'Please, let's just get by this.' This makes us all uncomfortable."

Fine added: "I feel bad for what happened to him and his family and the grief they've had to deal with all their lives. But that doesn't justify this, if he's complicit in what he's charged with."

Much of the black community has yet to react to the trial's possible consequences. Woods, who called the indictments "suspicious," said the SCLC and other civil rights organizations might rally at the trial "depending on what transpires."

Donna Edwards Todd, 54, a volunteer tour guide at 16th Street Baptist, added that most blacks here view the indictments as "more farcical than anything."

"If people felt it was serious, they'd be marching in the street," she said. "But I don't think anybody thinks he'll end up found guilty or put in jail. I mean, come on. Chris McNair? In jail?"

From grief to action

McNair's role as racial reconciler began shortly after the church bombing. He wasn't an activist before that — 41 racially motivated bombings between 1947 and 1963 prompted many local blacks to keep a low profile.

But McNair, a Tuskegee Institute graduate who has long owned a photography studio, took pictures of prominent movement figures and events for black publications such as Jet, including Gov. George Wallace standing in front of the "schoolhouse door" on June 11, 1963, to preserve segregation at the University of Alabama.

Then, at 10:22 a.m. on Sept. 15, 1963, a bomb made of bundled dynamite exploded beneath a stone staircase on the Baptist church's east side. Neither McNair, nor the country, would ever be the same.

"It was the worst noise. I thought Russia had attacked," recalled Cross, whose last-minute Sunday school assignment kept her from being in the restroom with her four friends.

McNair was at another church when he heard about the bombing. A block away, he ran into his wife's cousin, who told him Denise was missing. He found her dead in a hospital room with the three other girls.

"It's still a shocker to me today," McNair said. "I didn't cry for months after. I was angry. But I had a sense of balance. People were asking me, 'Why don't you leave?' I said, 'Where else can I go and not still be black in the United States?'

"My intent was to try to make this a better section of the world. Being angry doesn't ever totally escape you. But you have to be broad and smart enough not to let anger control your emotions."

"I might not have done what some people hoped I'd do," he added of more militant activists. "But I did the good Lord's will."

Several years later, McNair supported local officials in their bid to gain Birmingham "All American City" status, which they hoped would help erase the bombing's blot. In 1973, he was elected to the state House, winning white votes largely out of sympathy for what he'd been through and appreciation for how he'd reacted, political observers say. Yet he never mentioned his daughter's death then, or in later campaigns.

During the Alabama Legislature's turbulent, post-segregation years, McNair remained a calming presence. Alvin Holmes, a black Democrat from Montgomery elected a year later, took more provocative stands, which he said prompted white legislators to negotiate with middle-of-the-roaders like McNair.

"He was not as aggressive as I was, but he wasn't no Uncle Tom," Holmes said. "He and I conflicted sometimes. He thought I was too militant and I thought he was too mild."

Meanwhile, McNair and his wife began a new family: two daughters were born within five years of Denise's killing. The McNairs worked hard to keep the two girls from being overshadowed by their dead sister, whose mythology grew each year the killers remained free. (A Justice Department report later concluded that former FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover had blocked their prosecution in 1965). The story was resurrected in 1977 when Robert "Dynamite Bob" Chambliss was convicted of the murders in state court and sentenced to life in prison. He died there in 1985.

"My parents didn't want to 'wash our face in it,' that was what my dad always said," recalled Kimberly McNair, 37, who works in her father's studio. "People had their perception of how they thought we should live our lives. My mother felt the pressure that everyone's always watching, seeing how we're reacting."

McNair ran for the U.S. House in 1978 against now-Republican U.S. Sen. Richard Shelby, then a Democrat, and lost. He then ran against Shelby for U.S. Senate in 1992. He lost again, but carried Jefferson County, the state's most populous, where he'd been a commissioner since 1987.

His reputation was as a moderate, often stubborn, sometimes maverick politician who kept an eye on government spending.

Then McNair resigned unexpectedly in 2001, 19 months into his term. He says he was "just tired out."

Rumors circulated about money falling like rain around the county. A multibillion-dollar sewer project was prompted by a 1994 suit by the U.S. Justice Department that alleged the county's crumbling system put it in violation of the Clean Water Act.

In the year after McNair's resignation, the world media again descended on Birmingham for the bombing trials of Thomas Blanton and Bobby Frank Cherry. Prosecuted by Jones, who met McNair as a college student in the early '70s, both men were convicted of murder and got life sentences.

McNair continued to run his studio, located on a rundown business strip south of downtown. It now included a gallery room devoted to Denise's memory.

Among the room's items: the black Buster Brown patent leather shoes Denise wore the day she died, her children's prayer book, and a flat stone pulled from her skull. A tissue box rests atop a display case of her toys — jump rope, cowgirl hat, roller skates. Student groups from as far away as California and New York tour the room and talk with McNair.

"It's always with me," he said. "My daughter would be 54. You see kids who were her classmates, they're grandparents now. And you wonder, 'What would my daughter be doing now?' "

'No special treatment'

"I'm aware he was a county commissioner, and that we allege he took bribes," said Alice Martin, U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Alabama. "He'll receive no special treatment. Like every other person under federal indictment, he's innocent until proven guilty, and we look forward to presenting our case."

In the 80-page indictment against a parade of individuals and corporations, McNair is accused of taking about $955,000 from those who won bids on the county's $3 billion sewer system upgrade, which began in 1997.

This includes $225,000 for work done at McNair's studio as part of the building's elaborate expansion, including the memorial room.

Prosecutors also contend McNair accepted work worth $320,000 by contractors to build a lake house in Arkansas, where he grew up; $410,000 in cash; and tickets for Alaska cruise vacations.

"Mr. McNair not only pleads not guilty," Jones said, "but we don't believe a jury will see any kind of corrupt attempt whatsoever on his part in this case."

The trial begins April 3 and some here wonder how a local jury will react to the sight of McNair at the defense table. He and his wife, the last surviving parents of the four murdered girls, have sat through three highly publicized trials for their daughter's killers. For two of those trials, Jones has been their high-profile advocate.

Then just last month, the 16th Street Baptist Church, a staging area for movement meetings before the bombing, was declared a national historic landmark. Attending the ceremony: U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez and Interior Secretary Gale Norton, who leaves office at the end of this month. And McNair.

"It's impossible to separate Chris from the bombing incident," said Jesse Lewis, who founded the black Birmingham Times in 1964, and now runs a local marketing firm. "It has to have an effect on how people feel. Everybody's in sympathy with what happened to him."

Natalie Davis, a political analyst and pollster who did work for McNair during his campaigns and is a professor at Birmingham-Southern College, went further.

"Chris McNair is a hero in this community, to whites and blacks," said Davis, who is white. "Jurors are going to have a very hard time with this case. If I was on the jury, and if the evidence was compelling on the part of the prosecution, I don't care what it was, I'd find Chris McNair not guilty.

"I know that's wrong," she added. "But anybody whose child was bombed in Birmingham and who has rendered decent service to this community — I just couldn't go there."

Can Judge Avert A Mistrial? (CHIT)

By Michael Higgins And Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Staff Reporters Rudolph Bush, Jeff Coen And Ray Gibson Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, March 26, 2006

Questionable pasts put case on thin ice

The discovery that two jurors appear to have hidden arrests or convictions has pushed the corruption trial of former Gov. George Ryan into treacherous seas, forcing a federal judge to steer carefully to avoid a mistrial, veteran trial lawyers said.

U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer has options, but none of them is without risks.

"Any misstep by the trial court can lead to a reversal," said Ronald Safer, a defense attorney and former federal prosecutor. "It's an extremely delicate process.... If you leave a juror on, you can be reversed. If you take a juror off, you can be reversed."

After a 5 1/2-month trial and eight days of jury deliberations, the Tribune uncovered public records last week that appear to indicate that two jurors gave false answers on their jury questionnaires.

The Tribune revealed on its Web site Thursday that a male juror had the same name and other identifying characteristics as a man with a felony DUI conviction. Shortly after learning of the Tribune's information, Pallmeyer sent the jury home early and said she had launched an investigation into one juror.

On Friday, the Tribune revealed on its Web site that a second juror, a woman, could be linked through public records to an alias. The woman with that alias faced drug and other charges. She was not convicted, records show.

The jurors both said on pretrial questionnaires that they had never been charged with a crime.

In other cases in recent years, false statements during jury screening have led to juror dismissals or mistrials, or they have formed the basis for appeals.

Assessing what happens next is difficult, because Pallmeyer has gagged the lawyers from talking to reporters and has held all discussions about the jurors behind closed doors.

But lawyers suggest that Pallmeyer might remove the two jurors and call in alternate jurors to replace them.

Or, if she decides to remove just one juror, she might order the deliberations to continue with only 11 jurors.

It's not a situation that any judge envies, said Gregory Mize, a retired judge in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia who studies juries.

A judge's nightmare

"When a court and lawyers work so hard to prepare a case, to have something like this come up at the tail end is a nightmare," Mize said.

The case also raises the issue of whether the court or prosecutors should run background checks on prospective jurors early in the selection process to ensure they've filled out juror questionnaires honestly.

Federal prosecutors appear to run background checks rarely, if ever.

Many states' prosecutors avoid them as well. Faced with limited resources, they rely on jurors' honesty and the common belief that people are far more likely to lie to get off a jury than to get on.

Yet at least some prosecutors in state courts, including Cook County State's Atty. Richard Devine's office, say they routinely check prospective jurors for criminal records.

High-priced defense attorneys typically hire jury consultants, though the attorneys in this case have never publicly discussed their strategy, including whether they have hired consultants. Jury consultants are mixed on whether they do criminal background checks--some say they do, others say they don't.

But the defense lawyers would have been obligated, as officers of the court, to reveal to prosecutors and Pallmeyer if they had discovered that a juror had been untruthful on a questionnaire.

Ryan, 72, and his co-defendant, lobbyist Lawrence Warner, 67, are on trial on charges that the former governor steered millions of dollars in state contracts and leases to Warner and other friends in return for vacations, gifts and other benefits.

Pallmeyer might remove the two jurors, call two alternate jurors back to the courthouse and restart jury deliberations from the beginning. But she must confirm that the alternates have obeyed her orders not to discuss the case and to avoid media coverage.

"What's the likelihood of that?" Safer said. "You know that they're exposed to press coverage. You know that they talked to friends. You know that they've formed opinions outside the jury room. All that is poison to deliberations."

Rick Halprin, a veteran criminal-defense lawyer, saw the situation as less dire. He said the alternates likely would be cleared to serve if they simply said they could put aside those issues and be fair to Ryan.

As a result of the trial's length and expense, Halprin said, he expects the judge "to move heaven and earth to keep it going."

"She has all the resources of all the judges there," he said. "They'll figure out the answers. There's a lot of latitude here for the judge as long as they're still deliberating."

If Pallmeyer decides that only one juror must be removed, she could order deliberations to continue with 11 jurors. To reduce the jury to 10, however, she would need the consent of the defense, which would be highly unlikely, several lawyers said.

Prosecutors also would have to agree.

Even if Pallmeyer dismisses one or both jurors, she still must address whether the jury selection process had been tainted by any bias held by either juror, several lawyers said.

The man with the same name as one of the jurors had his driving privileges suspended or revoked on numerous occasions when Ryan was secretary of state.

Adding to the complexities would be that one or two alternates could be joining a jury in conflict, apparently divided in cliques. Last week, jurors sent out two notes about difficulties in deliberation. Pallmeyer responded with a note warning jurors to treat one another "with dignity and respect."

Some jurors hide past

Some studies have suggested potential jurors often hide important information, especially in response to what are often intrusive questions.

In 1998, Mize studied the issue at his own courthouse in Washington, D.C. The court's standard practice was to question potential jurors in open court, asking them, for example, to raise their hands if they had been convicted of a felony or knew someone in the case.

Instead, Mize decided that he and the lawyers in each case also would question each juror briefly in a small room, asking the jurors, in a more private setting, if they had anything else to add.

The results were "absolutely jaw-dropping," Mize said. "One woman said to me, `I'm sorry, Judge. I should have said this. The defendant is my fiance.'"

In theory, prosecutors should be able to determine if any potential juror has concealed a criminal record.

Devine's office has checked the backgrounds of prospective jurors at the Criminal Courts Building and other courthouses as a matter of routine for decades, First Assistant State's Atty. Robert Milan said.

The checks take place after jurors are notified about their jury duty but before they appear, Milan said. Prosecutors have a brief report on hand to use in questioning each juror at the start of a trial.

Milan said the checks are made at each courthouse in the Cook County system, for both felonies and misdemeanors.

"For both prosecutors and defense attorneys to have it is important," Milan said. "We see it as integral when this person is being asked to decide on a criminal case."

A matter of trust

In the federal court system, however, many prosecutors said such checks are simply not done.

"I've never heard of it happening," said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. Atty. Debra Wong Yang in Los Angeles. "I think it's just a matter of [believing] in the system and the truthfulness" of potential jurors.

The U.S. attorney's office in Seattle also does not check, a spokeswoman said.

"Courts doing any kind of confirmation is very unusual, because they just don't have the staffing," said Paula Hannaford-Agor, director of the Center for Jury Studies at the National Center for State Courts. "You're really dependent on the candid responses of the jurors."

It is also very rare to charge a lying juror with perjury, experts said. But some also noted that the Ryan trial is far from typical.

"It's a high profile case; I think they would be more inclined to set an example," said Jean Rosenbluth, a law professor at University of Southern California and a former federal prosecutor.

Ryan Mistrial Unlikely, Say Legal Experts (CHIST)

By RUMMANA HUSSAIN AND ART GOLAB, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, March 26, 2006

Despite the revelation that two jurors in George Ryan's public corruption trial may have hidden their criminal records from the judge, legal experts said Saturday the possibility of a mistrial is highly unlikely.

"It would surprise me from the outside looking in if she declared a mistrial," University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign law Professor Andrew Leipold said of U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer's options.

Last week Pallmeyer was investigating a suburban male juror who may have hidden his felony DUI conviction from her, when it was revealed a female juror from Chicago appeared to have six arrests under a different name. Pallmeyer's probe into the suburban juror came after questions were raised by the Chicago Tribune.

The Chicago juror was never convicted, but public records indicate that between 1984 and 1994, she was charged with crimes including misdemeanor child neglect, assault and weapons possession, as well as felony drug possession. The records also appear to show she served about two months in jail after a 1994 drug arrest before being found not guilty.

Both jurors wrote on their pre-trial juror questionnaires that they had never been accused of a crime.

However, the female juror was apparently called to serve under her married name, while the charges were filed under her original name. Both names are linked by birth date and Social Security numbers in public records.

'Appearance of justice'

Not only do experts doubt a mistrial will be declared, some question if Pallmeyer will even replace the two jurors with alternates. If she does, the jury would be asked to begin its deliberations over again. Pallmeyer could opt to bounce the jurors and deliberate with 10, but she would need approval from both the feds and the defense, and that's unlikely, lawyers specializing in the jury system said.

"The appearance of justice is very important," DePaul University law Professor Stephen Landsman said. "When you have jurors who lie about their criminal past, you can't know how it will cut or whether it cuts at all, but there's always a nagging suspicion, and no one will be comfortable with it."

Ammunition for defense

University of Chicago law Professor Albert Alschuler said there's a high probability more jurors lie about their criminal backgrounds than people think. "If I were the judge, I would just continue with the 12 jurors she's got. I think it'd be a bad mistake to substitute the jurors at this time," Alschuler said.

Chicago-Kent College law Professor Richard Kling found it "absolutely astonishing" that neither the U.S. attorney's office nor the defense team did additional background checks on the jurors. "Even in state courts, they do it inevitably," he said.

Most of the experts said it's hard to gauge what Pallmeyer will do.

But some said the legal fiasco could eventually be ammunition for the defense. "No matter what happens, all of this will be used as a base for an appeal if there is conviction," said John Marshall Law School acting Dean John Corkery.

Retired F.B.I. Agent Is Accused Of Helping In Mafia Murders (NYT)

By Anthony Ramirez

A grand jury in Brooklyn has accused a retired F.B.I. agent of helping a Mafia killer and bureau informant murder or help murder at least three people, a law enforcement official with knowledge of the indictment confirmed yesterday.

The murder indictment in Supreme Court names R. Lindley DeVecchio, a career investigator and onetime head of the bureau's Colombo and Bonanno families squads. He led a government surveillance team during a bloody mob civil war in the 1980's. That war left at least 10 men dead and 14 wounded.

Mr. DeVecchio, 65, reached yesterday by telephone at his home in Sarasota, Fla., denied any wrongdoing and referred all further questions to his lawyer, Douglas Grover, who said the district attorney's case against his client was "complete nonsense."

"I'm going to bang the table" in court on Monday "and get a copy of the indictment," he said. Mr. Grover, a former federal prosecutor with the Organized Crime Task Force, added: "It's common for an indictment to be filed and sealed and kept secret until prosecutors make a decision as to how they want to deal with the arraignment. But it's uncommon to leak it to the press."

Starting in 1982, Mr. DeVecchio began grooming Gregory Scarpa Sr., a captain and an assassin for the Colombo crime family, as a mole for the F.B.I.

According to the still-sealed indictment, the law enforcement official said, Mr. DeVecchio, while an F.B.I. agent, provided information to Mr. Scarpa, who in 1984 killed Mary Bari, who had dated a mobster and become a bureau informant.

The indictment also charges that Mr. DeVecchio provided information that helped Mr. Scarpa assist in the 1987 killing of Joseph DeDomenico, a mobster also known as Joe Brewster, as well as in the 1992 death of Larry Lampesi, a mob associate.

Mr. DeVecchio had also been investigated in the death of a fourth person, Nicholas Grancio, a Colombo family captain. It is not clear if that case is addressed in the indictment.

In 1992, a hit team organized by Mr. Scarpa pulled alongside Mr. Grancio's car and killed him with a shotgun blast. Investigators wondered whether Mr. DeVecchio had withdrawn F.B.I. agents from the scene, making the murder possible.

In 1993, Mr. Scarpa pleaded guilty to murder and racketeering charges. He died of AIDS a year later in a prison hospital at age 66 after contracting the virus that causes it from a blood transfusion.

The indictment of Mr. DeVecchio was reported yesterday in The New York Daily News and The New York Post. Details of his possible indictment were also reported this month by Jerry Capeci, a longtime reporter on organized crime, on his Web site, GangLandNews.com.

Mr. DeVecchio's lawyer, Mr. Grover, said that Mr. Scarpa was interviewed in prison by the F.B.I. and was asked specifically whether Mr. DeVecchio was his source. "Scarpa said no," Mr. Grover said.

Mr. Grover described Mr. DeVecchio as a friend who had become a client and who had testified or worked in many organized-crime cases while Mr. Grover was a federal prosecutor.

Contrary to some press depictions of his client as a hermit, Mr. Grover said, "Lynn is not a recluse. He lives in a house in Florida. He has a significant other. He is retired from the F.B.I. but still works for a living, and he travels to New York on occasion. And I have seen him socially."

By NANCIE L. KATZ, DAILY NEWS STAFF WRITER

New York Daily News, March 26, 2006

A retired FBI agent has been charged with helping a mob informant carry out at least three bloody hits, the Daily News has learned.

The blockbuster indictment delivered by a secret Brooklyn grand jury caps an exhaustive six-month probe into allegations that Lindley DeVecchio, a federal agent for 33 years, helped his longtime Colombo crime family informer, Gregory Scarpa Sr., wipe out at least three enemies, a well-informed source said.

Prosecutors do not believe DeVecchio was directly involved in the slayings - including that of Mary Bari, a beautiful brunette - but they presented evidence the agent gave Scarpa information that led him to kill, sources said.

DeVecchio is expected to be arraigned on at least three counts of second-degree murder in Brooklyn Supreme Court next week. He could face up to 25 years to life in prison on each count if convicted.

DeVecchio declined to return a phone call to his Florida home and his attorney Mark Federo said he was unaware of any indictment.

"The allegations that he is involved in the murder of Mary Bari or gangsters or anyone of that sort is absolutely ridiculous," Federo said. "We will vigorously defend against those allegations and will do so in court."

DeVecchio, an FBI supervisor for 11 years, has long weathered accusations of an improper relationship with Scarpa. But he was cleared of wrongdoing after a two-year federal probe in 1996 and by a federal judge in 2004.

Scarpa, a violent sociopath who died in prison in 1994 at 66, rose through the ranks of the Colombo family and was a paid FBI informant for more than 30 years. For 13 of those years, beginning in 1980, DeVecchio was his handler.

The Brooklyn grand jury heard evidence that DeVecchio told Scarpa in 1984 that Mary Bari - a dark-haired beauty who hung out with a Colombo family mobster - was a paid informant for the FBI. Scarpa shot her dead on Sept. 24, 1984, in a Brooklyn club as his son, Gregory Jr., held her down, according to court records quoted by the Web site Gangland News.

A second victim, Joseph (Joe Brewster) DeDomenico, was killed in 1987 after DeVecchio told Scarpa the mobster might become a turncoat, sources said. In 1992, during the 1991-93 Colombo family war, DeVecchio also is accused of helping Scarpa find and kill Larry Lampesi, a mob rival, sources said.

The office of Brooklyn District Attorney Charles Hynes, which led the probe, declined to comment yesterday. The FBI did not return calls.

Red Cross, Humane Society Under Investigation (WP)

By Jacqueline L. Salmon

The Louisiana attorney general has launched inquiries into two of the country's best-known charities -- the American Red Cross and the Humane Society of the United States -- after receiving complaints that they misused some of the millions of dollars they raised in the fall to help the human and non-human victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Attorney General Charles C. Foti Jr. plans to announce tomorrow that he is looking into allegations that Red Cross volunteers diverted money and supplies meant for hurricane victims in New Orleans, spokeswoman Kris Wartelle said. And the attorney general's office has begun an inquiry into whether the Humane Society spent the money it raised after Hurricane Katrina appropriately.

The Red Cross said yesterday that it has dismissed three of its volunteers who had been involved in food and shelter operations in the stricken city after the storm. The volunteers "have been relieved of their duties" after it was determined that "allegations involving waste and abuse were substantial enough to warrant their immediate removal," said a senior Red Cross official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

He said the organization expects to refer its findings -- including possible criminal activity -- to law enforcement agencies.

Such controversies over how nonprofit organizations have used the more than $3 billion raised from the American public for the Katrina relief effort are severely damaging public confidence in charities, Paul Light, a professor of public service at New York University, said yesterday.

Trust in charities, which dropped sharply after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks when questions arose over how billions raised to help victims was spent, has dropped further since Hurricane Katrina, Light said. More than 40 percent of the American public has "no confidence or not much confidence" in U.S. charities, Light said, compared with about one-third who said they lacked such trust before Katrina struck.

And the crisis in confidence hasn't affected just the charities involved in Katrina relief efforts, he said.

"I don't know of a single nationally known charity whose confidence has managed to hold up in the wake of Katrina. It's serious," Light said. "It's almost like the beating that businesses took after Enron. It didn't matter how clean you were, the public lost confidence."

Foti's examination of Katrina charities might extend beyond the Humane Society and the Red Cross, which is also under investigation by the Senate Finance Committee.

Wartelle said her office is looking into complaints lodged against a number of charities that raised money for Katrina victims, although it has opened only these two formal inquiries.

"In general, the attorney general's office is very concerned about the number of charities that raised money for the Katrina disaster," she said. Often in disasters, "the money doesn't necessarily go to the people" affected.

Yesterday, Red Cross volunteer Jerome Nickerson Jr., a Baltimore lawyer who was asked by the Red Cross in the fall to team with another volunteer to investigate complaints of misuse of supplies and cash, said he found numerous problems in the disaster-relief operation.

He said they found "rogue warehouses" filled with Red Cross supplies that they believed were being sold. Also, some disaster staffers were ordering suspiciously large volumes of such supplies as cooking oil, coffee and canned food from Red Cross warehouses for areas in which they weren't needed. Large numbers of prepared meals were also being ordered and, in at least once instance, were delivered to local restaurants, Nickerson said. Red Cross volunteers were also using multiple debit cards loaded with thousands of dollars in Red Cross funds. "It was completely out of control," he said.

Nickerson said other Red Cross disaster volunteers and staffers interfered with their investigation, corrupting computer files and refusing to give them documents.

But in December, after Nickerson and his partner, Michael Wolters, a Wisconsin security guard, presented their findings to Red Cross officials in Louisiana, and told them they wanted to investigate further, they were sent home.

"It was very disappointing," Nickerson said.

In the case of the Humane Society, Wartelle said her office is in the initial phase of fact-finding regarding for what purpose the money was raised and whether it was used for the intended purpose. She declined to identify the charity, but Humane Society officials confirmed that it was their organization.

Humane Society officials said they are cooperating with Foti's inquiry, but they believe they have done nothing wrong.

"I can't for the life of me see any issue here," said Wayne Pacelle, chief executive of the Washington-based group, which raised $30 million from the public. Pacelle said that so far, the organization has spent or committed $25 million of that to rescue animals, rebuild destroyed shelters along the Gulf Coast and reunite Katrina evacuees with their pets.

Wartelle said her office has received complaints that even though the organization had raised millions of dollars, it had not done enough to reunite Katrina evacuees with their pets.

Pacelle said the group set up a reunion center and, with other groups, helped reunite about 2,300 pets with their owners. More than 10,000 animals were rescued from areas devastated by Katrina.

Red Cross Fires 3rd Volunteer Amid Inquiry (NYT)

By The New York Times

By The New York Times

The American Red Cross has dismissed a third volunteer in its widening inquiry into accusations of improprieties involving the relief effort after Hurricane Katrina, and the agency expects to make criminal referrals to the authorities, a Red Cross official said Saturday.

The Red Cross acknowledged last week that it was looking into accusations that relief supplies were improperly diverted, that volunteers had failed to follow Red Cross procedures in tracking and distributing supplies, and that felons were used as volunteers in violation of Red Cross rules.

Though supervisors said they had no official estimates of the cash or the value of supplies that might have been misappropriated, the volunteers who made the accusations said the amount was in the millions of dollars.

Americans donated $3.6 billion for hurricane relief, and 60 percent of that went to the Red Cross, where 95 percent of the personnel, including supervisors, are volunteers.

"Three volunteers have now been relieved of their duties by Red Cross investigators, who determined on scene that allegations of waste and abuse involving those volunteers were substantial enough to warrant their immediate removal," Charles Dean Connor, a spokesman for the agency, said on Saturday. "The Red Cross will spare no effort as it continues its investigation. Criminal referrals to appropriate law enforcement agencies are anticipated."

Mr. Connor did not identify any of the three dismissed volunteers. But last week, three other volunteers currently involved in relief operations in New Orleans identified one of them as Patrick Keena, the senior official responsible for the agency's food and shelter operations in the disaster area. They said he was fired on Friday.

Mr. Keena, who had been affiliated with the Red Cross for 25 years, could not be reached for comment. But he reportedly told volunteers he worked with that he was leaving because of a medical emergency.

CIVIL LAW:

Rendell Vetoes Bill Limiting Civil Liability (AP)

By MARC LEVY, The Associated Press

AP, March 25, 2006

HARRISBURG, Pa. - Gov. Ed Rendell on Friday vetoed legislation that would have broadly scaled back the obligation of defendants to pay damage awards in some civil lawsuits, including medical malpractice.

The legislation, championed largely by Republicans and opposed mostly by Democrats, would have unfairly restricted the ability of victims to get compensation for their injuries or damages, Rendell said.

Lawyers' groups and business advocates have lobbied heavily over the issue for years. Competing legislation favored by the Democratic governor failed narrowly in the Republican-controlled Legislature.

"I believe we must find a better way - a law that will balance the equities between our businesses and the victims of negligence," Rendell said in a statement.

Republicans, business advocates and Rendell's presumptive Republican opponent in the fall general election, Lynn Swann, cried foul, saying that Rendell had signaled his support for their legislation during his campaign for governor several years ago. The legislation's sponsor, Sen. Jake Corman, R-Centre, said he believed the bill was fair and would have freed businesses to spend more on payroll and less on liability costs.

"We had to make hard choices and you have to weigh anyone's right to sue anyone for anything against the ability to have family sustaining jobs," Corman said in a telephone interview.

The AARP and Mothers Against Drunk Driving had supported a veto, Rendell said. Lawsuits over drunk-driving crashes, environmental accidents and intentional actions would not have been covered by the legislation.

The Republican-sponsored bill would have revived a 2002 law that was never enforced before Democrats filed a legal challenge and a court struck it down, citing procedural errors in its passage.

The legislation would have prevented victims from suing multiple defendants with one lawsuit. Also, defendants would only have to pay a share of the damages proportionate to their liability, unless they were at least 60 percent liable or their actions were intentional.

Under current law, victims can sue multiple defendants and be reimbursed for an entire damage award. If defendants do not have enough money to pay their share, then the other defendants must pay that share.

The legislation that Rendell favored would have lowered financial penalties for defendants in cases where the plaintiff bore some responsibility for an injury or damage.

That legislation failed 26-24 in the Senate in December and 100-99 in the House of Representatives last week.

Skullcap On Recruit's Head Keeps Him From Serving In Coast Guard (NYT)

By Andy Newman

Jack Rosenberg wants to serve his country.

Mr. Rosenberg, a 34-year-old tire technician and a certified pilot from Spring Valley, N.Y., signed up for the Coast Guard Auxiliary last year, hoping to fly on search-and-rescue missions and the like.

He underwent a full military background check. He had several sets of fingerprints taken. He passed the boating test and the written course.

"But as soon as I got sworn in and got ready to put on the uniform," Mr. Rosenberg said, "the commander came to me and said it's going to be a problem."

The problem was on top of Mr. Rosenberg's head. He is a Hasidic Jew, and he wears a skullcap at all times except when showering or swimming. The skullcap clashed with the uniform.

Wearing a visible piece of religious garb violates Coast Guard regulations. It says so in the Coast Guard manual, right between "Umbrellas" ("Plain black or navy blue, expandable, straight handle. Must be carried in left hand.") and "Backpacks" ("Must be carried in left hand when in uniform"). "Religious Items," the manual says. "Concealed or worn only during religious services."

Mr. Rosenberg's main skullcap, a black velvet model, is about six inches across. On occasions when Coast Guard protocol calls for wearing the official cap, including most outdoor activities, it would conceal the skullcap.

But indoors, auxiliarists are not supposed to wear their caps. (They are also told not to wear them while walking to a plane at an airport; a blast of prop wash could lead to the undignified sight of an auxiliarist chasing his bounding cap across the tarmac.)

If Mr. Rosenberg had joined the Army, things might be different. Since 1987, in response to a lawsuit, the armed services have let members wear skullcaps, head scarves, and other religious garments "except under circumstances in which an item is not neat and conservative or its wearing shall interfere with the performance of the member's military duties."

Other organizations have dealt with similar controversies. The Metropolitan Transportation Authority has eased its restrictions even as it fights a federal suit involving bus drivers who were not allowed to wear their Muslim head scarves.

But the Coast Guard does not answer to the Department of Defense, or to the transportation authority for that matter. It is under the Department of Homeland Security, and it has its own regulations.

Mr. Rosenberg said his flotilla commander, Arthur Ramirez, of the auxiliary unit based in Lincoln Park., N.J., tried to accommodate him.

"Is it possible," Commander Ramirez asked in an e-mail message, "that you could wear a 'miniature' yarmulke, small enough to be concealed by your hair?"

It would have to be very small indeed. Mr. Rosenberg is bald on top.

Commander Ramirez referred the matter to his supervisors, to no avail.

Things looked grim. Mr. Rosenberg's smart blue dress uniform hung unworn in a closet in his home in Rockland County. He was not about to compromise on the skullcap, which Orthodox Jews commonly wear to remind them of God's position above humankind.

A relative referred Mr. Rosenberg to a state assemblyman in Brooklyn, Dov Hikind, who has many Orthodox constituents. Mr. Hikind wrote on March 7 to the commandant of the Coast Guard, reminding him that a homeland security expert at the University of Maryland had recently called the Coast Guard "vastly understaffed and underresourced" and that turning away a willing volunteer might not be a good idea.

The commandant has not responded. But as it turns out, the Coast Guard's uniform board has its annual meeting this week in Washington.

One item up for discussion is whether to relax the restrictions on religious accessories to bring them in line with armed forces policy. The policy chief for the Coast Guard Auxiliary, Steve Minutolo, said he expected a change.

"I'd be striving to align as closely as possible with our D.O.D. counterparts," he said, adding that he had not heard of Mr. Rosenberg's case and that the proposal had been in the works long before Mr. Hikind's letter.

So it now looks as if Mr. Rosenberg may be able to take his uniform out of the closet after all. As long as he keeps his beard less than half an inch long, that is.

Or at least, as long as it looks as if he does.

"Do you know how long my beard is?" Mr. Rosenberg asked. He reached under his chin, undid a hidden black rubber band, and pulled and teased and pulled and teased until two long locks of hair flowed down from his chin to his navel.

"You just have to keep it up," he said.

Officials from Charles County, La Plata and several organizations have scheduled a community meeting Wednesday evening to discuss last weekend's fatal shooting of a suspect by a sheriff's officer.

Jonathon Lyles of Oxon Hill, who had been visiting an apartment complex along Zekiah Run Road, was arrested after officers administered a field sobriety test. As officers attempted to handcuff him, Lyles pulled away and "a violent struggle ensued," sheriff's office spokeswoman Kristen Timko said last week. Authorities said Lyles pulled out a handgun and shot at police, missing them. One of three officers on the scene then fired back once and hit Lyles in the chest, police said.

In announcing the meeting, the sheriff's office said it is for residents of the La Plata Grande Apartments and the Phoenix Run, Kent Square and Heritage Place neighborhoods as well as other concerned community members. The sheriff's office announcement said the facts surrounding the shooting will be presented, and authorities will address any concerns residents might have regarding the investigation or efforts to ensure the safety of residents in these neighborhoods.

In addition to the sheriff's office, others planning to participate in the meeting are the Charles County commissioners, the Charles County state's attorney's office, La Plata officials, county public school officials, the LifeStyles Inc. community service organization, the NAACP, the U.S. Justice Department and church leaders.

The meeting is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. Wednesday at the Department of Social Services, 200 Kent Ave., La Plata.

Election Whistle-Blower Stymied By Vendors (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

After Official's Criticism About Security, Three Firms Reject Bid for Voting Machines

MIAMI -- Among those who worry that hackers might sabotage election tallies, Ion Sancho is something of a hero.

The maverick elections supervisor in Leon County, Fla., last year helped show that electronic voting machines from one of the major manufacturers are vulnerable, according to experts, and would allow election workers to alter vote counts without detection.

Now, however, Sancho may be paying an unexpected price for his whistle-blowing: None of the state-approved companies here will sell him the voting machines the county needs.

"I've essentially embarrassed the current companies for the way they do business, and now I believe I'm being singled out for punishment by the vendors," he said.

There are three vendors approved to sell voting equipment in Florida, and each has indicated it cannot or will not fill Sancho's order for 160 voting machines for the disabled. Already, he has had to return a $564,000 federal grant to buy the machines because he has been unable to acquire the machines yet.

"I'm very troubled by this, to be honest -- I can't believe the way he's being treated," said David Wagner, a computer scientist at the University of California at Berkeley who sits on a California board that reviews voting machine security. "What kind of message is this sending to elections supervisors?"

The trouble began last year when Sancho allowed a Finnish computer scientist to test Leon County's Diebold voting machines, a common type that uses an optical scanner to count votes from ballots that voters have marked. Diebold Election Systems is one of the largest voting machine companies in the United States.

While some tests showed that the system is resistant to outside attack, others showed that elections workers could alter the vote tallies by manipulating the removable memory cards in the voting machines, and do so without detection.

A Diebold spokesman scoffed at the results, and compared them to "leaving your car unlocked, with the windows down and keys left in the ignition and then acting surprised when your car is stolen."

State officials similarly played down the results.

But last month, California elections officials arranged for experts to perform a similar analysis of the Diebold machines and also found them vulnerable -- noting a wider variety of flaws than Sancho's experts had. They characterized the vulnerabilities as "serious" but "fixable."

"What he [Sancho] discovered was -- oops -- that the conventional wisdom was all wrong," said Wagner, a member of the panel that reviewed the Diebold machines. "It was possible to subvert the memory card without detection."

In the wake of that finding, Florida elections officials issued new guidelines this month for handling the memory cards. They require records showing who had custody of the memory cards, and are aimed at the same kind of security attack Sancho had simulated.

"It was total vindication," Sancho said.

Diebold officials maintain that their systems are secure when standard safety procedures are used to protect the memory cards from tampering.

"It didn't vindicate Mr. Sancho," said Diebold spokesman David Bear. "You basically follow these industry standards, and you don't have issues."

Regardless, the announcement out of California echoing the Leon County findings was a sweet moment for Sancho, a public official for whom election validity is a very personal interest. In 1986, Sancho was defeated in a botched county commission election in which thousands of votes were believed to have been lost.

"That was the most searing event of my life," he said. "Having run for office and seeing the whole process come down on my head has made me who I am."

He ran for elections supervisor in 1988 and won.

Now he is required under federal laws instituted after the Florida voting debacle in 2000 to acquire 160 voting machines for disabled people -- and none of the state-approved vendors will provide the machines.

A spokesman said Diebold will not sell to Sancho without assurances that he will not permit more such tests, which the company considers a reckless use of the machines.

"While we welcome authorized testing and examination of our products by qualified professionals," Diebold attorney Michael E. Lindroos wrote Sancho last year, "actions such as yours only serve to undermine the public's confidence in the security and accuracy that good systems can provide when used with the proper procedures and by authorized personnel."

Another company, Sequoia Voting Systems, backed out of discussions with Sancho earlier this year. Spokesman Michelle Shafer said the company lacks the capacity to fill his order.

The third voting machine company, Election Systems & Software Inc., did not respond to three calls for comment directed through their sales representative.

The dispute highlights what many elections experts say is a failure in federal oversight. In Maryland, North Carolina, Texas and elsewhere, elections officials have called into question the security and accuracy of new voting machines. The experts said that a more rigorous federal oversight process, in which machine testers have no financial connections to the voting machine companies, is needed to ensure election security in the United States.

"The federal certification process for voting machines is broken, sadly, when it comes to security," Wagner said. "It was designed for the era of mechanical machines, and it hasn't kept up."

Florida County Supervisor Draws Criticism (AP)

By Brent Kallestad

AP, March 26, 2006

Elections controversies just seem to stick to Florida. With the memory of a botched 2000 presidential election still etched in the minds of most elections supervisors in the state, Leon County's Ion Sancho is now finding he can't get the equipment he says he needs to guarantee an honest election.

Vendors of the ATM-like electronic voting machines, tired of Sancho's criticisms over the level of security in their software, no longer want to do business with him or the county. All three companies certified to do business in Florida — Diebold Inc., Election Systems & Software Inc. and Sequoia Voting Systems Inc. — have said "no."

Sancho's insistence on quality also has angered several Florida officials, including Gov. Jeb Bush, and has already cost his county more than a half million dollars.

Nonetheless, the feisty 55-year-old has his share of supporters, with the Tallahassee Democrat dubbing him "a zealous soldier in election reform battles."

"Ion is one of the few to ask the questions," said Herbert Thompson, chief security strategist for Boston-based firm Security Innovation. "Like, what is this thing actually doing to my vote? How is it processing my vote?"

Thompson said most elections officials use the new equipment blindly.

"Nowadays, with the electronic voting systems, you don't know what even looks suspicious if you're an elections official," Thompson said. "You need people who understand software and software security to understand what the risks are."

The 2000 vote recount in Florida that settled the U.S. presidential race exposed myriad problems in the state and led to widespread voter skepticism across the nation.

More problems surfaced during the 2002 election cycle in Broward and Miami-Dade counties in heavily populated southeastern Florida, helping to spur Congress to pass a law that led more counties to adopt the high-tech, e-voting equipment.

Nearly a quarter of Americans who voted in 2004 used an electronic ballot, almost doubling the percentage from the 2002 election, according to the political consulting firm, Election Data Services.

But a September report from Government Accountability Office, the investigative arm of Congress, pointed to significant security and reliability problems long the subject of complaints from computer scientists and security experts.

A separate review of voting machine logs used in Palm Beach County in the 2002 election revealed thousands of errors — just two years after it was forced to manually recount votes when Florida's massive elections problems surfaced while a presidential election was being settled.

Sancho wants to make sure such problems don't occur in Leon County.

"Florida is one example of how partisan politics interfere with having folks' votes being counted accurately," Sancho said in his office overlooking a series of mildew-stained white government buildings near the state Capitol. "Americans have taken elections for granted for far too long."

A major concern in Florida is around computerized ballots — their frequent inability to produce a written receipt of a vote. Beginning with Nevada, some 25 states now have requirements for e-voting machines with attached printers producing voter-verified paper audit trails while others, like Florida, rely on the audit capabilities of the equipment.

"If you make a system that can be manipulated, unfortunately in our current political environment, it probably will be," Sancho said. "Why take that chance?"

He likes the optical scanners used in his county the past several election cycles, but if a county is going to use electronic machines, he believes there ought to be a paper trail. To underscore the system's vulnerabilities, he even had his own system hacked into in December.

And that has ruffled some of his colleagues around the state.

"He kind of has his own drummer," said Susan Gill, the Citrus County elections supervisor who also serves as president of the Florida State Association of Supervisors of Elections. "He doesn't object to being viewed as someone standing out there by himself."

A 1986 Florida State law school graduate of Puerto Rican and French descent, Sancho worries that his demands for security guarantees have led vendors to boycott Leon County, home to Florida's capital in Tallahassee.

He recently ran into trouble with his commissioners over the loss of $564,421 in federal grant money because the county missed a Jan. 1 deadline for meeting a federal requirement to provide voting systems for disabled people. Now, it's up to the Legislature to decide whether to reinstate the money.

Sancho, who got into the elections business after losing a 1986 bid for a county commission seat in a disputed election, had tried to buy touchscreen machines for the disabled from ES&S, but they refused to fill his order.

"We did not believe that we would have the kind of working relationship that is key to providing smooth running, reliable and accurate elections," ES&S spokesman Ken Fields said.

Sequioa and Diebold also refused.

A Sequoia spokeswoman said it was simply a business decision.

"Due to the timing and everything our plate is full," Michelle Shafer said. "We haven't been taking on new customers that haven't already signed contracts."

Diebold, which currently supplies Leon's optical scanners, did not immediately return a message for comment. Leon has a legal dispute with Diebold over software upgrades for the optical scanners.

For the disabled, Sancho now prefers to use a vote-by-phone system from Louisville-based IVS LLC, saying it's cheaper, more reliable and more user-friendly, but it's not one of the three companies certified in Florida.

The three vendors' refusal to work with Sancho led to a complaint from the Miami-Dade Election Reform Coalition on Wednesday, asking Attorney General Charlie Crist to investigate if those companies were violating antitrust laws.

"It's of concern," Crist said Thursday. "We want to make sure we have free, fair and open elections."

Sancho met March 13 for the first time with Florida Secretary of State Sue Cobb in hopes of getting equipment put in place by May 1.

"What he's done has put the entire state of Florida in jeopardy," Cobb's spokeswoman Jenny Nash said, explaining that the U.S. Department of Justice will declare the entire state noncompliant just because one county isn't.

While unpopular in some halls of government and even among some of his supervisors, Sancho is supported by voters in his county. First elected in 1988, he's been sent back four times since.

Sancho said the first elections supervisors conference he ever attended inspired his long pursuit of seeking perfection in the voting process. And he's still wary of the politics in that process.

"An honest man with integrity is probably not the person you want to bet on in the American political system," Sancho said.

Voting Rights Act On Table (BRA)

By Damiane Ricks

Baton Rogue Advocate, March 26, 2006

Symposium focuses on N.O. election

Legal professionals warned Saturday there is the “opportunity” to dilute” the voter rights of people displaced by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita unless the Voting Rights Act of 1965 is renewed.

Attorneys, judges and legal scholars took part in a symposium at the Southern University Law Center aimed at discussing the importance of the Voting Rights Act and the dangers of living without it.

While most of the act is permanent, three sections will expire in 2007 unless renewed by Congress.

Those sections require state and parish governments to get federal approval before changing election laws and procedures, provides language assistance to voters who do not speak English, and empowers the U.S. attorney general to send federal examiners to monitor elections, said LaShawn Warren of the American Civil Liberties Union in Washington, D.C.

While the Constitution of the United States gives every U.S. citizen the right to vote, the Voting Rights Act prohibits city and state governing bodies from practices — such as imposing literacy tests and gerrymandering — which would exclude a group of voters, said Stanley Halpin, a Southern University Law Center professor.

Gerrymandering is the dividing of a geographic area into voting districts so as to give an unfair advantage to one voting group over others.

Halpin said this practice was used in the past to prevent black voters in predominantly black areas from electing their own representatives to office. He said the same could happen if predominantly black New Orleans became predominantly white after large numbers of black voters were displaced by last year’s hurricanes.

“Our task, I think, is to determine how the Voting Rights Act can be used, and to make sure it’s renewed so that it can be used to deal with this discrimination,” Halpin said.

Attorney Rob McDuff said that 20 years ago, state judiciaries remained non-representative of the people with only six black judges elected to office across Louisiana until litigation redrew election districts for trial and appeal court judges in Louisiana in 1992.

There are presently 76 black judges in Louisiana, the largest number of elected black judges per capita in the nation, said Judge Gene Thibodeaux of the state 3rd Circuit Court of Appeal, a symposium panelist.

McDuff, who was part of the litigation in Louisiana, as well as similar litigation in Mississippi, said the gains of the past can be undone without the Voting Rights Act.

“Until the people of Mississippi and Louisiana start voting on the basis of qualifications and stop voting on the basis of race, until the dominant majority really allows the political system to be opened up, the Voting Rights Act has to stay in place,” McDuff said.

Professor Donald Tibbs, director of Southern University Law Center's Civil Rights and Justice Institute, said the potential dilution of blacks' voter rights, especially hurricane survivors, is not a foregone conclusion, but more people are needed to champion the cause to renew the act.

As part of the symposium, some volunteers took part in advocacy training to advance efforts to renew the Voting Rights Act and help displaced New Orleans residents participate in upcoming Orleans Parish elections on April 22.

Tibbs said everyone should be concerned when efforts are made to subvert the rights granted by the Constitution.

"This is not just a black issue, it's a Constitutional issue," he said.

Missouri Lawmakers May End Limits On Funding (SLPD)

By Jo Mannies

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, March 26, 2006

The Missouri Senate has voted to ask Gov. Matt Blunt to consider scrapping the state's campaign-finance restrictions that his father helped put in place 12 years ago.

It's now up to the state House to take up the proposal, which would eliminate Missouri's limits on how much individuals or groups can donate to candidates running for office. The proposal is attached to a broader ethics bill.

The measure was approved by the state Senate earlier this month and instead would impose contribution and spending limits on state House and Senate campaign committees. It also would bar legislators from collecting contributions when the Legislature is in session.

State Sen. Tim Green, the proposal's architect, said he's calling for the changes out of frustration. He added that he is somewhat surprised fellow senators overwhelmingly approved the idea.

Green, D-St. Louis County, says the limits have become "a complete joke" because so many officeholders have figured out ways to skirt them.

"We're not stopping the flow of money from coming in," he said. "You just can't track it."

Green contends that it would be better if Missouri went back to its old system of unlimited donations, with full disclosure. That's the approach still in place in Illinois.

A spokesman for the governor says he has yet to take a position on the bill. That's also the case for the state Republican and Democratic parties.

But Missouri Attorney General Jay Nixon says he opposes any effort to remove Missouri's donation limits, which he defended in court during numerous legal battles throughout the 1990s. In the end, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2000 in favor of the current setup.

"As I said in the U.S. Supreme Court. ... a regime of unlimited contributions creates a public belief that access to an elected official and control over the public agenda are for sale, and available for a price that only a few can pay," Nixon said.

Missouri's current individual donation limits are $1,275 per election for statewide candidates, $650 for state Senate candidates and $325 for state House candidates. Similar restrictions, which are increased periodically to reflect inflation, also apply to candidates for local offices.

But Green notes that many officeholders and donors are finding legal ways around the limits. Some officials influence "legislative district committees," which are fundraising entities set up by local political parties or activists. These committees can accept donations of any size.

Any private donor can give unlimited amounts to multiple independent or political groups, who each in turn can make donations within the limits to the same favored candidate.

Political parties and independent groups also can collect donations of unlimited size for "independent expenditures" on behalf of a candidate. That spending doesn't count against the donation limits, as long as there is no coordination with the candidate.

"I'm just sick of seeing all the money funneled to these committees," Green said. He noted that he was in the state House when it approved the limits in 1994. "We thought we'd slow this spending down. We didn't."

Bipartisan push for limits

The effort to set Missouri's donation limits was born in 1993, just months after the state's voters overwhelmingly approved term limits for state legislators.

Among those lobbying for the limits was Roy Blunt, who lost a 1992 bid for governor and had just left office as Missouri's secretary of state. During his eight years as the state's chief elections official, Blunt had annually called for donation restrictions.

In 1993, Blunt became one of the leaders of Missourians for Fair Elections, a bipartisan group that launched an initiative-petition drive for donation limits because the Legislature refused to act.

"The introduction of limits on political contributions in our state was a good thing," Blunt said Friday. "I'm not opposed to revisiting the amount of the limits, but I would hate to see them eliminated altogether. The state House and Senate have plenty of time to revisit the issue, and I'll be watching the issue with interest."

At issue in 1993 was the long-standing practice of Missouri candidates to rely on "angels," a name given donors who were willing to contribute large sums to campaigns.

For example: Anheuser-Busch Cos. Inc., the state's undisputed largest donor at the time, gave more than $200,000 just to the two major-party nominees for governor in 1992. The brewery donated $131,000 to Republican William L. Webster and $75,000 to Democrat Mel Carnahan.

Soon other organizations joined in the pro-limit effort, including the Missouri leaders of Ross Perot's United We Stand, and the neighborhood-activist group known as ACORN.

Blunt and his allies dropped the initiative-petition drive after then-Gov. Carnahan persuaded the Legislature to approve the current setup in 1994.

But ACORN then launched its own effort for even lower donation limits. In November 1994, 74 percent of Missouri voters approved Proposition A, which restricted individual contributions to no more than $300 during each two-year election cycle.

A long court fight ensued. By July 1996, the U.S. Supreme Court had tossed out Proposition A. In January 2000, the high court ruled in favor of the current setup.

However, for a few weeks in 1999, Missouri candidates could accept donations of any size while the Supreme Court pondered its decision. And the state's candidates for governor took advantage.

Green acknowledges that a return to such large donations may raise eyebrows. But he added that at least the public will know who wrote those big checks, and who got them.

N.J. Dems Dump Arab-American Candidate (AP)

By Wayne Parry

AP, March 26, 2006

Democrats pulled an Arab-American candidate from their election ticket on Saturday amid a furor over comments he made four years ago that some interpreted as sympathetic to Palestinian suicide bombers.

At the urging of state party leaders, including Gov. Jon S. Corzine and U.S. Sen. Robert Menendez, Passaic County Democrats withdrew its endorsement of Sami Merhi for freeholder, a member of the county's legislative body. They chose a school board member to run in his place.

"I'm in shock, feeling betrayed," Merhi said. "They should be ashamed of themselves."

The Lebanese-born Merhi made the comments at a September 2002 Democratic fundraiser U.S. Rep. Bill Pascrell (news, bio, voting record), where he condemned the Sept. 11 terrorists "as cold-blooded murders" and "crazy fanatics."

When asked whether he would apply the same label to Palestinian suicide bombers who target Israelis, Merhi said, "I can't see the comparison."

In an interview with The Associated Press earlier this week, Merhi said, while all murder is wrong, the World Trade Center attack was mass murder on an unprecedented scale. It also was an attack in which his godson was killed.

Merhi, who narrowly lost out on the party's nod in 2004 because of the comments, was endorsed by the party last week. But top Democrats said they opposed his candidacy and asked county leaders decided to reconsider.

Merhi said he appealed to them during Saturday's meeting, saying that he opposes all forms of terrorism and that killing innocent people is always wrong. But, he said, party chairman John Currie told him, "We love you. We all like you. But this is about politics."

Currie did not immediately return messages left at his office and home Saturday.

"They have insulted an entire community," said Merhi, who runs a medical marketing firm with his business partner, an Israeli Jew. "I have done nothing to deserve this insult."

James Zogby, president of the Arab American Institute in Washington, said the county Democrats had offered Merhi another, lesser position. But he said New Jersey Democrats still risk alienating a sizable community of Arab-American and Muslim voters.

Merhi has not decided whether he will run in the primary without the party's endorsement or whether he'd consider changing his party affiliation to Republican.

He said he was asked after the meeting if Democrats should be worried about whether a ticket with him on it could win in November in the heavily Arab-American area.

"They should be more worried about a ticket without me on it," he said.

For Some Women, Senate Choice Is No Choice (PPG)

By Maeve Reston

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- One of the more intriguing dynamics of this year's Pennsylvania Senate race is that when faced with a Democrat and a Republican who both oppose abortion, some Democratic women are going to sit the race out.

The issue was thrust to the forefront this past week when several women's groups endorsed a virtually unknown Democrat, Alan M. Sandals, as their choice to challenge Sen. Rick Santorum, largely because Mr. Sandals supports abortion rights.

In interviews, members of the National Organization for Women and other women who are staunch supporters of abortion rights, said they were still seething over party leadership's decision to push the candidacy of state Treasurer Bob Casey Jr. Some said they felt abandoned by their party and that they would skip that race on the ballot in November and wouldn't be opening their checkbooks as they have for other Democrats.

For now, Mr. Casey appears to be doing fine without them. He is clobbering Mr. Santorum in the polls, largely because of the perception that he can beat the incumbent Republican senator. His treasury is robust and the party leaders who ushered him into the race are working to soothe the concerns of abortion rights advocates within the Democratic base.

But the question of how many women will stay home is creating interesting calculations in the campaign war rooms. One is whether the desire among Democrats to topple Mr. Santorum can balance out the women the campaign will lose on abortion. Another is whether Mr. Casey's positions on abortion and gun rights can bring back significant numbers of conservative Democrats who have been voting Republican.

In 2004, when Pennsylvania's electoral votes hung in the balance, President Bush and Sen. John F. Kerry raced through narrowly divided areas such as the Philadelphia suburbs, competing for what became the archetypal Pennsylvania swing voter: Republican women who tilted toward Mr. Bush on national security issues, but agreed with Mr. Kerry on abortion rights.

Though Mr. Casey and Mr. Santorum still are likely to compete for that trove of unpredictable voters, abortion won't be the swing issue.

Like Mr. Santorum, Mr. Casey believes Roe v. Wade should be overturned. He doesn't think the federal government should expand its support of embryonic stem cell research beyond the policy Mr. Bush laid out in 2001, and he said he would have voted to confirm Supreme Court Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., who was opposed by 41 of the Senate's 44 Democratic senators.

But Mr. Casey's campaign manager, Jay Reiff, said he believed many Democratic women who favor abortion rights would side with his candidate because of related issues on which the two candidates disagree. For example, Mr. Casey supports making emergency contraceptives available and wants to boost federal funding for family planning in the United States and abroad, while Mr. Santorum does not.

"[Mr. Casey] believes that there is a consensus in this country from President Bush to Senator Clinton that we should be working toward reducing abortions ... and often that consensus gets overlooked," Mr. Reiff said.

Mr. Reiff predicted that Mr. Casey would do better across the state and in the rural middle of the state than more liberal Democrats have done because of what he sees as the consensus on the issue.

"I think it kind of all balances out," Mr. Reiff said.

But Mr. Santorum's supporters are eager to play up the fissures among Democrats at this early stage.

Sen. Arlen Specter, a Pennsylvania Republican who has benefited mightily from the crossover vote on abortion rights, which he supports, said this week that Mr. Casey's views on abortion would help Mr. Santorum.

"There's a lot of angst in the country and in the state about a woman's right to choose. People are very edgy about what [Chief Justice John] Roberts and [Justice] Alito are going to do," said Mr. Specter, who oversaw the Supreme Court confirmation hearings as Senate Judiciary Committee chairman.

"The people who really care about that issue are going to stay home [this fall]," Mr. Specter said. "Maybe not all of them will stay home, but there won't be enthusiasm, they won't be getting their friends out."

One of those people is Jeanne K.C. Clark, of Shadyside, who heads a group known as Women Leaders Online and says she corresponds constantly with women across Pennsylvania who share her frustration with Mr. Casey's views on abortion, stem cell research, the Patriot Act and Justice Alito.

"He doesn't just need people to vote for him, he needs people to work for him," Ms. Clark said of Mr. Casey, adding that when she goes to the polls this November, she expects to leave the Casey-Santorum choice blank.

"I have been involved in every campaign since I turned 21 ... and I know that, where I live in Pittsburgh and across the state, the Democrats poured out their hearts for John Kerry. And they did it for [Governor] Ed Rendell, but they didn't do it for [2000 Democratic Senate candidate] Ron Klink, and they're not about to do it for Bob Casey."

There are many Democrats who do not agree with that sentiment. Some strategists note that while Mr. Santorum defeated Mr. Klink, who was anti-abortion and pro-gun rights, the incumbent senator led by significant margins in most polls throughout the race.

They note that Mr. Casey's father, who was far more outspoken than his son about his opposition to abortion, swept the 1990 governor's race by a huge margin.

So to allay concerns among some Democrats about the abortion issue and to make sure they stay involved, prominent members of the party such as Mr. Rendell and Democratic U.S. Rep. Allyson Y. Schwartz are talking up what they see as the strengths of Mr. Casey's record on women's issues.

Ms. Schwartz, an abortion rights supporter who represents Montgomery County and Northeast Philadelphia, said women who care about abortion rights "will also look at who can they trust to stand up for quality education, access to health care for themselves and their children, and who can they better trust to care about issues like child care."

And the decision-making process of women such as Kate Michelman, the former head of the abortion rights group NARAL who considered running in the Pennsylvania Senate race as an independent, might become a template for the women who share her views.

"It was very hard for me, personally, to decide what the right thing to do is, and I think for many voters in Pennsylvania, pro-choice or concerned about the future of our personal and religious liberties, this race has caused some conflict," Ms. Michelman said.

"In the end, defeating Santorum as an important step in taking back the country from the forces of extremism became a principle unto its own," she said.

But asked whether she would work to get Mr. Casey elected, Ms. Michelman said that was one decision she had yet to make.

Morning After In America (LAT)

PRESIDENT BUSH'S UNEASY relationship with science and policy is about to hurt him as much as it has already hurt American women. For years now the Food and Drug Administration has failed to make the morning-after contraceptive pill, commonly known as Plan B, available over the counter. This despite numerous studies (including ones by the FDA) showing that the medication is effective and as safe as Tylenol. The result? Millions of women have been deprived of easier and cheaper access to an important product. And the agency has seriously damaged its reputation among scientists, Congress and the American public.

Now this inaction is about to claim another avoidable casualty. Bush has nominated Dr. Andrew C. von Eschenbach, who has been the agency's acting commissioner since fall, to keep his job permanently. Von Eschenbach is a sound choice with a stellar resume. He is a respected Texas surgeon who headed the National Cancer Institute for four years. And he is a cancer survivor, so it's hard not to root for him in a Lance Armstrong sort of way.

But Democratic Sens. Hillary Clinton of New York and Patty Murray of Washington are invoking senatorial privilege to block the nomination until the agency makes a decision on Plan B. In this case, the senators have every right to resort to blackmail. Last summer, they agreed to back the nomination of former FDA Commissioner Lester M. Crawford only after he promised to approve the drug. But the minute he got in office, he balked; then he abruptly resigned two months later.

In the months since, it's been downright painful listening to FDA officials explain their obfuscations on the issue. Even they can barely say "we need to study the issue some more" with a straight face. To see why, visit the website of Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Los Angeles) — earlier this month, he posted leaked evidence from within the agency showing its scientists supported the retail sale of Plan B in 2004.

Incredibly, that smoking gun probably won't shame agency officials into changing their minds. Yet the administration insists that the issue will be addressed soon and that senators should just go ahead and approve the nomination. (If anyone buys that, we've got a beautiful plot of land in Antarctica they just have too see.)

It's high time for the FDA to approve the morning-after pill for retail sale. Then Von Eschenbach can begin to help the troubled agency deal with its many urgent reforms.

Officials Target BGE Merger (WT/AP)

By Kristen Wyatt, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

ANNAPOLIS -- Maryland lawmakers moved closer yesterday to delaying the upcoming merger of Baltimore Gas & Electric's parent company and a Florida utility, which has resulted in the power company's saying a lawsuit is possible.

The debate about whether to delay an $11 billion merger between the parent company, Constellation Energy Group, and Florida Power & Light, is the latest political maneuver by state lawmakers looking for ways to cushion double-digit rate increases expected this summer across much of Maryland when rate caps expire.

The bill doesn't address rate increases specifically, but it would give the General Assembly more say over the workings of Constellation.

The House voted to give preliminary approval to the bill, with final approval possible this week.

The measure would require the General Assembly, not just the utility-regulating Public Service Commission, to sign off on a utility merger. The bill's sponsor, Delegate Dereck Davis, Prince George's Democrat, said lawmakers need to know more about the proposed merger of BGE with an out-of-state company.

"We haven't determined yet whether it's a good thing," he said.

Constellation strongly opposes the measure, calling it an unwarranted intrusion. Company spokesman Rob Gould said yesterday a lawsuit is possible if lawmakers attempt to meddle with Florida Power's $11 billion purchase of Constellation.

"We're extremely troubled by the prospect that the legislature is attempting to hold our proposed merger hostage, and to that end we will be considering all options, including the legal route," Mr. Gould said.

Mr. Gould said Friday that blocking the merger would create an economic condition that would keep the company from gradually phasing in a 72 percent increase in electricity bills.

The Senate has yet to consider the measure, which is opposed by Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican.

Some House Republicans also oppose the idea. Delegate George C. Edwards, Allegany and Garrett counties Republican, compared the plan to a law enacted earlier this year to require Wal-Mart to spend more on employee health care. Business groups are now fighting the move in court.

"Here again we're getting into private enterprise," said Mr. Edwards, who also said Democrats wanted to "micromanage" businesses.

"We don't need to be getting into the mergers of companies," he said.

The rate increases are partly the result of the 1999 deregulation plan approved by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly and signed by Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.

When A Disease Loses Its Most Potent Ally, Fear (NYT)

By Donald G. Mcneil Jr.

The New York Times, March 26, 2006

THE obituary for mad cow disease was written earlier this month. Maybe you didn't notice.

The disease isn't really dead. But its power to terrify seems to be.

On March 13, the government said that a cow in Alabama was the third in the country to have the disease. The New York Times ran its article on Page 25, and other papers did roughly the same.

There was no clamor of "press cover-up!" But neither had the disease, formally called spongiform encephalopathy, which turns the brain into a grainy lump of Swiss cheese, become any less horrific since the first mad cow in the United States, discovered in December 2003, led to nervous "Is Beef Safe?" headlines across the country.

Instead, it had finally become clear that any threat to people is very, very remote.

Over the last two years, bending to pressure from consumer groups and its own inspector general, the Agriculture Department had finally tested 650,000 animals instead of a token handful. It had also adopted rapid tests and banned "downer" cattle from the food supply so that the most disgusting aspect of the first case would not be repeated: that the old dairy cow that tested positive had been in a truckload of animals so broken by age, disease and injury that some had to be winched out to the slaughter, and that all had been ground into hamburger and sold before the test results were in.

Mad cow isn't the only disease in recent years to soar into high-flying panic and then collapse into the "I wonder whatever happened to ... ?" category.

One could argue that the obituary for resurgent smallpox was written on June 18, 2003, and that SARS died on Feb. 19, 2005.

The first date is the one on which the Centers for Disease Control admitted that the smallpox vaccination drive ordered by the Bush administration in the lead-up to invading Iraq had ground to a halt. The administration had wanted 500,000 health workers to be vaccinated because Saddam Hussein or others might unleash weaponized smallpox. But barely 38,000 volunteered.

The latter date is the one on which a microbiologist from the University of Colorado, after a review of worldwide scientific literature, announced that the virus that causes SARS, a respiratory illness that had killed about 10 percent of 8,000 victims two years earlier, was no longer found in humans. (Later, scientists found that it thrives in bats, ending hope of total eradication.)

Why, in each of these cases, was a public frenzy whipped up, only to fade again? And what does that say about today's mounting frenzy over avian flu? In the past, "we cried wolf too fast, revving up the emotions and there was nothing to show for it," said Judith Walzer Leavitt, professor of medical history at the University of Wisconsin.

An obvious scapegoat is the media, which is often accused of being alarmist about medical news. But a more important factor was simpler: fear waxed or waned according to whether the public thought government was being honest.

In the case of mad cow disease, there were early accusations that the government was playing down the threat to protect the beef industry. The secretary of agriculture when the first case was found, Ann M. Veneman, was a former food industry lobbyist, her critics noted, and her chief spokeswoman's last job had been press representative for the National Cattlemen's Beef Association.

In the case of smallpox, there was suspicion that the government was exaggerating the threat to whip up support for its drive to war. As skeptics then pointed out, smallpox had been eradicated worldwide in 1977, and if Mr. Hussein had a cache, he presumably would have vaccinated his troops against it, which he had not.

In the case of SARS, it was not the American government, but the Chinese one, whose motives were questioned. It was concealing cases and refusing entry to international disease detectives.

"If you want the public's cooperation, honesty and frankness is much better," Professor Leavitt said.

In 1894, she noted, smallpox sparked a month of rioting in Milwaukee. The cause wasn't the disease itself, but the city's policy of seizing sick children in immigrant Polish and German neighborhoods and taking them to isolation hospitals, while leaving wealthy families alone, saying their larger houses and abundant servants would isolate them. With rioters flinging hot water and pepper in the eyes of the police and their horses, a vaccination drive collapsed and the epidemic spread.

Now the public is nervous about another potential pandemic.

Virologists disagree about whether the A(H5N1) virus that is killing chickens by the millions has the genetic power to do the same to humans, as the flus of 1918, 1957 and 1968 did. It could be a plague of medieval proportions — or it could fade as the swine flu threat of 1976 did.

Right now, the situation is reminiscent of SARS. Like that disease, avian flu originated in China, and some crucial questions have never been answered — like how much Chinese poultry vaccines were to blame for the disease festering in birds for nine years, and whether the virus infected thousands of Chinese who never got sick.

But no one is speculating about an American government cover-up. Its most respected health officials, like Dr. Anthony Fauci and Dr. Julie Gerberding, have admitted that the country is utterly vulnerable.

Nor is any powerful industry, like drugmakers or poultry raisers, accused of having a thumb on the scale of public policy, as the beef industry was during mad cow.

Predicting what a virus will do is impossible. But humans are predictable. John M. Barry, author of "The Great Influenza," a history of the 1918 pandemic argued that even if A(H5N1) becomes a killer, the panic it creates will fade faster than might be expected now, when a sense of mystery still enshrouds a threat that normally would sound silly — a "killer bird flu."

"What people are afraid of is the unknown," he said. "Not eating meat because you're worried about mad cow is like not going in the water because you saw 'Jaws.' But once the threat arrives, even if there's an undercurrent of terror in the whole society, people see the consequences and they get accustomed to it, just as they got accustomed to plague in the Middle Ages."

Congressman Faces Fight Over Species Act (AP)

By Erica Werner

AP, March 26, 2006

Rep. Richard Pombo (news, bio, voting record) has never gotten over being outfoxed by the endangered San Joaquin kit fox.

The rancher and chairman of the House Resources Committee is closer than ever to his goal of rewriting the Endangered Species Act to expand property rights — his mission ever since the obscure fox species blocked development of a neighboring town 25 years ago.

The prospect of long-fought success has made Pombo a target in the November election. The conservative Republican has abandoned the cowboy hat in his official congressional photo and is looking a little more worldly as he confronts a changing electorate in his district.

Seeking his eighth term, Pombo, 45, faces a primary challenge on June 6 from a moderate Republican who helped write the landmark species protections. Democrats see a glimmer of hope of capturing the seat; environmentalists say his defeat would be the best thing that could happen in November.

On top of all that, Pombo is facing ethical questions arising from his ties with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff and his own unconventional financial arrangements.

"The easiest thing in the world is for an incumbent congressman to get re-elected if you don't do anything," Pombo said in the kitchen of his ranch on sloping central California farmland. "But I figure I'm here for a reason — that's to get things done."

Pombo grew up in a large Portuguese ranching family. He says his immigrant grandfather taught him to prize land ownership above almost anything. That pride of ownership is evident as he points out cows, sheep and the barn he just built on the ranch he shares with his wife, Annette, and their three children. His parents and brothers live next door.

"There's got to be something that you're willing to lose your election over," he says. He describes moderates as people who "just can't make up their mind what they believe in."

Pombo's country style — he still wears cowboy boots — is an odd fit in upscale, liberal towns such as Pleasanton that were added to his district after the 2000 census. But he remains popular with traditional constituents in the agricultural sections of an area that straddles the San Joaquin Valley and the San Francisco Bay area, including his hometown of Tracy, where signs for his uncle's real estate firm dot rural roads.

"He comes from a good family, a long, longtime Tracy family," said Linda Alegre, who works at a menswear store in the fast-growing exurb's faded downtown. "The Democrats want to get rid of him because he's gotten too strong."

But Claudia Hess, a gallery director in Pleasanton and a Republican undecided about how to vote, says, "He looks like a hick to me."

In 2004, Pombo won with 61 percent of the vote in a district where Republicans outnumber Democrats.

He is favored against little-known Democratic contenders — among them engineer Jerry McNerney and Steve Filson, a Navy veteran and airline pilot. But it is early and the national Democratic Party is spending time and money to try to weaken him.

First, Pombo faces a primary challenge from former Rep. Pete McCloskey, an author of the Endangered Species Act. McCloskey moved into the district after failing to recruit another Republican to run against Pombo.

"He's been there too long and power has corrupted him," McCloskey said.

Environmentalists promise to spend plenty against Pombo. They note his proposals to sell public lands and his support for oil drilling offshore and in an Alaskan wildlife refuge, as well as his stance on endangered species.

"Getting rid of him would be the best thing politically that could happen to us in the November election," said Rodger Schlickeisen, president of Defenders of Wildlife.

Pombo's quest to rewrite the species act had its genesis in an earlier fight.

In the early 1980s, he was upset when the presence of the endangered San Joaquin kit fox contributed to stopping development of a proposed town outside Tracy. After serving on the Tracy City Council from 1990 to 1992, Pombo won a congressional seat by pledging to revise the legislation.

Opponents "were able to use an endangered species that no one had ever seen or heard of in order to stop that project from going forward," said Pombo, co-author of the 1996 book, "This Land is Our Land: How to End the War on Private Property."

He pushed a bill through the House last year that would require the government to compensate property owners if species protections thwart development plans and would block critical habitat designations that restrict development.

Senators may write their own version. It remains unclear whether any legislation will reach President Bush.

As for ethics, Pombo is among lawmakers who got thousands of dollars in questionable contributions from Abramoff or his clients while supporting the lobbyist's causes. After that came out, Pombo gave $7,000 to charity that he had received from Abramoff. The congressman denies taking any positions because of the money.

Pombo has been criticized for billing taxpayers $5,000 to rent an RV to tour national parks and for letting a top committee aide who lives in California bill for frequent travel to Washington.

Pombo asserts: "I don't break the rules."

Bending With The Wind (WP)

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

"He fought against federal control of lands and resources to which Alaskans are rightfully entitled -- a battle he continues today."

-- from Rep. Don Young's Web site

FOR YEARS NOW a story line in Massachusetts has featured the Kennedy family, enthusiastic environmentalists all, loudly opposing one of the most environmentally progressive schemes in the state's history: a large, offshore wind farm known as Cape Wind, to be placed in Nantucket Sound, the only viable site for such a farm off the New England coast. Although the farm would cleanly and quietly produce three-quarters of the total electrical demand for Cape Cod and nearby islands -- a region that could otherwise soon be facing serious power shortages -- and although it has passed through multiple regulatory hoops, both Robert F. Kennedy Jr. and his uncle, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), have denounced the project, in part on the grounds that it would spoil the views "from 16 historic sites and lighthouses on the cape and nearby islands" and presumably from their own summer house as well.

But while everyone was clucking at the Kennedy hypocrisy, few noticed that Cape Wind had a much more dangerous opponent: Rep. Don Young (R-Alaska). Mr. Young has used his position as chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee to insert a last-minute clause into the Coast Guard appropriations bill that would ban all offshore wind projects within 1.5 miles of a navigation channel. Not only would the amendment stop Cape Wind, it could halt other offshore wind projects as well (which is why the chairman and ranking Democrat on the Senate Energy Committee both oppose it). Ostensibly, the amendment addresses Coast Guard concerns. But the Coast Guard has the opportunity to oppose or modify the project under current regulations, and a number of European countries have safely built offshore wind farms without imposing similar restrictions.

Why, then, is Mr. Young, an Alaskan and lifelong opponent of federal intervention in state resource issues, pushing a federal regulation to block a Massachusetts wind farm that the Massachusetts public overwhelmingly supports? Apparently he doesn't want anyone to explore that question; he refuses to discuss the issue with the company concerned, his spokesman refers queries to the office of Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.) and he kept his amendment out of the legislation until the last minute. That means Congress cannot reject it without scuttling the annual funding package for the Coast Guard, along with its port security programs. Others on the transportation committee say they aren't sure how this became an issue, since it was never mentioned in earlier discussions of the bill.

Here's one possible explanation. According to Capecodtoday.com, the http:// Alliance to Protect Nantucket Sound, founded by Nantucket Island and Cape Cod homeowners and receiving 80 percent of its funding from just 30 people, has spent more than $1 million on Washington lobbyists, including some with ties to Mr. Young. One of the alliance's founders, William Koch -- owner of a Cape Cod summer home, as well as an oil and gas billionaire who might have other reasons to dislike wind farms -- has separately funneled money through his company's Washington lobbyists to another firm that has ties to Mr. Young. Cape Wind has also spent money lobbying but apparently not as well.

Sadly, then, this appears to be another disturbing story about the power of the wealthy to change laws in Washington and the lack of transparency in the legislative process. Whether this wind farm deserves to be built should be a matter for local officials and regulators to decide, not for a congressional committee acting on behalf of its chairman or his friends.

Medical Cannabis User Tries Novel Approach In Federal Court Appeal (FRARGUS)

By Josh Richman, STAFF WRITER

Fremont (CA) Argus, March 26, 2006

Less than a year after the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against her, Oakland medical marijuana patient and advocate Angel Raich will go back before a federal appeals court Monday with a different legal argument.

Her lawyers will try to persuade a three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, sitting in Pasadena, that keeping her from using marijuana as medicine unduly burdens her fundamental rights to life and freedom from pain, as protected by the Fifth Amendment's due process clause and the Ninth Amendment.

The government argues there is no constitutionally protected fundamental right to obtain and use marijuana in defiance of the federal ban on the drug.

"Nor can plaintiffs establish that the use of any particular drug, free of a regulatory scheme designed to protect the public health and safety, is a fundamental right that is deeply rooted in our nation's history, legal traditions and practices," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan wrote in his January brief to the appeals court.

Each side will have 30 minutes to argue its case. It will probably be months before the court rules.

Raich and Diane Monson of Oroville, plus two unnamed providers, sued the government in October 2002 to prevent any interference with their medical marijuana use, but this case's seeds actually were sown in the Supreme Court's May 2001 decision on the Oakland Cannabis Buyers Cooperative's case.

The court in that case ruled there is no collective medical necessity exception to the federal ban, which defines marijuana as having no valid medical use. But it didn't rule on constitutional questions underlying the medical marijuana debate, so Raich, Monson and their lawyers tailor-made a case raising exactly those issues.

A federal judge in San Francisco rejected their arguments in March 2003, but a 9th Circuit appeal panel reversed that ruling nine months later.

That panel believed the plaintiffs could prevail at trial on their claim that the Constitution's Commerce Clause lets Congress regulate only interstate commerce, and that Californians' medical marijuana use neither crosses state lines nor involves money changing hands.

The U.S. Supreme Court in June 2005 ruled 6-3 to uphold the federal ban, finding that even marijuana grown in back yards for personal medical use can affect or contribute to the illegal interstate market for marijuana and so it is within Congress' constitutional reach.

But the 9th Circuit panel and the Supreme Court dealt only with the commerce clause argument, not the other constitutional issues. With the case remanded back to the 9th Circuit, Raich's attorneys now are pursuing the remaining arguments; Monson dropped out of the case late last year.

Besides the Fifth- and Ninth-Amendment arguments, Raich's lawyers also claim the common-law doctrine of necessity — the idea that it's OK to break the law when forces beyond one's control compel it and there's no reasonable, legal alternative — bars the government from applying the Controlled Substances Act to ban medically necessary activities. The government argues the Supreme Court's decision in the Oakland Cannabis Buyers Cooperative case already ruled out a medical-necessity argument.

And Raich's lawyers claim the Tenth Amendment protects against federal interference with state regulation of personal, non-commercial medical activities within their own borders — namely, medical marijuana laws. But the government says the Supreme Court's rejection of the Commerce Clause argument last year already covered that ground.

"I know we're going to win, I feel pretty good about the 9th Circuit," Raich said Friday.

Raich says without the drug's appetite boost, her wasting syndrome causes rapid, dangerous weight loss threatening her life. She also suffers from ailments including an inoperable brain tumor and nonepileptic seizures, and in November had a hysterectomy following her precervical-cancer diagnosis.

Meanwhile, she's planning a Capitol Hill lobbying blitz with renowned talk-show host and fellow medical marijuana user Montel Williams, perhaps to begin as early as May.

The House last June defeated an amendment which would've forbidden the Justice Department from using public money to raid, arrest or prosecute patients and providers in states with medical marijuana laws. The amendment got 161 votes — more votes than it had in 2003 and 2004 — but still fell 57 short of the 218 it needed for passage.

IMMIGRATION:

An Issue Without Borders (CHIT)

By Jeff Zeleny

Chicago Tribune, March 26, 2006

The immigration debate, resonating in political campaigns from Texas to Iowa, creates special problems for the Republican Party

Brian Kennedy, a Republican candidate for Congress, stood near the banks of the Rio Grande as a photographer snapped a picture of a boat crossing the water behind him. Within days, he turned the image into a campaign ad, demanding "Do something about illegal immigration!"

DOJ_NMG_0021855

The exercise in political theater was hardly remarkable, except for one notable geographical point: Kennedy lives 1,384 miles away from the site he selected along the Mexican border, and the congressional seat he seeks is an eastern Iowa district with a minuscule immigrant population.

"Illegal immigration has become a dominant issue in this race," Kennedy said. "It's another example of where people see a lack of leadership in Washington."

As a fight over immigration intensifies next week in the Senate, politicians and candidates aren't waiting for a federal solution to what has become one of the more divisive issues in the midterm election year, a fact made vivid Friday by pro-immigration demonstrators in Los Angeles, Phoenix and Atlanta. More immigration-related bills have been introduced in state legislatures than at any other time in the last decade as Republicans across the nation scramble to distance themselves from the White House.

President Bush has urged a civil debate "in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another." His advisers and party strategists worry that a rising anti-immigration sentiment could cost Republicans the support of Latino voters, the fastest-growing segment of the electorate. They also are concerned about alienating moderates and business leaders who rely on an immigrant labor force.

"This is a really tough political issue, particularly for Republicans," said Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.). "It's not just happening in border states. Anywhere you go, this is passionately, passionately raised, and people have a visceral reaction to it."

In Iowa, lawmakers have sought to prohibit illegal immigrants from buying homes. In New Hampshire, legislators have tried changing state law so undocumented workers could be charged with trespassing. In Colorado, lawmakers attempted to make employers liable for any "bad behavior" by illegal immigrants.

In other states, businesses could face felony charges and fines for employing illegal immigrants. Elsewhere, lawmakers have proposed denying health services to people who cannot prove their citizenship. Even though many of the proposals are unlikely to pass, nearly 400 bills have been introduced in at least 42 states, underscoring the scope of concern.

"Obviously the federal government has not done enough. It would be silly to suggest the current system is working," said Minnesota Gov. Tim Pawlenty. "I don't know if it is a lack of will or lack of interest or if it has been too politically dicey, but states are hitting a tipping point."

After releasing a study showing illegal immigrants cost Minnesota taxpayers up to $188 million a year, Pawlenty recently proposed a seven-point plan to crack down on the problem. The plan drew applause from the Republican's conservative base but stirred criticism from Democrats and immigrant-rights groups.

"You can't use positive economic news to justify the behavior. There are all kinds of illegal acts that could boost the economy," said Pawlenty, who is seeking re-election this fall. "But as soon as I brought up the proposals, people on the left were spouting off that I was racist and those on the right also were using words that were harsh or inflammatory."

Governor eases position

Still, a week after announcing his initiative, Pawlenty took a softer approach and introduced another seven-point plan designed to help immigrants "play by the rules." His ideas include providing a $300 tax credit per family to help pay for English classes and citizenship application fees as well as increasing immunizations for immigrants.

Steve Camarota, director of research at the Center for Immigration Studies, said states' proposals have the potential of creating a chaotic patchwork of immigration laws rather than a uniform policy.

"It's an issue that is important in the public's mind, but politicians just don't know how to talk about it," said Camarota, whose group favors tighter controls on immigration. "The Republicans are tearing themselves to pieces over it."

To be sure, Democrats hope to achieve gains over immigration. Yet the party has its own struggles, particularly among blue-collar workers concerned about losing jobs to immigrants.

The fissures inside the Republican Party will be exposed when the Senate is scheduled to begin debating major immigration reforms next week. Among the points of contention is a White House proposal to create a guest-worker program for some of the estimated 11 million people who are living in the U.S. illegally. That proposal has met strong opposition from conservatives who consider it a form of amnesty for lawbreakers.

For three weeks, members of the Senate Judiciary Committee have struggled to reach a resolution that would toughen border security while also making some accommodation for illegal immigrants. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has threatened to bypass that compromise legislation by bringing a hard-line enforcement bill to the floor. The House has passed a similar bill.

"Some conservatives and some Republicans don't appear to be interested in solving the problem, but rather to use it as a way of attracting attention to themselves or using it for political reasons," Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas) said. "The important thing for me is that they not represent the face of the Republican Party for a lot of reasons."

If Republicans pursue a course of simply building a wall or increasing border security, Cornyn said, "we are doing so at our own peril."

Scent of election politics

Patricia Hamm, a political scientist at Iowa State University who specializes in immigration policy, said officials at all levels of government are paying more attention to immigration because it is an election year. The debate is complicated further, she said, because Frist and others with presidential ambitions are eager to appeal to social conservatives through hot-button issues such as illegal immigration.

"The most visible way of being tough is doing something physical like sending more agents to the border or building walls," Hamm said. "They sound tough, and [it] may work in the short run, but in the long run they are not doing anything to solve the question of unauthorized immigration."

Max Cardenas, a consultant to immigrant-owned businesses in Iowa, added, "No one is going to vote for you just because of your immigration policy."

Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) is challenging that theory. He is seeking grass-roots support for a possible presidential bid built on his sharp anti-immigration views. Along the way, he is influencing the immigration debate in other races, including the U.S. House seat in eastern Iowa.

Kennedy said Tancredo's message resonates with social conservatives. The two other Republicans in the primary race have increased their discussion of illegal immigration, and he dismissed the suggestion by some Republicans that the party should tread lightly.

"It an issue where a lot of our anxieties come together, from national security anxieties to economic anxieties," Kennedy said. "We put principle first and worry about politics later."

A G.O.P. Split On Immigration Vexes A Senator (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

WASHINGTON, March 25 — The telephone lines in the unassuming Houston offices of Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, have been sizzling in recent weeks as anxious Republican voters call to find out precisely where their tough-minded senator stands on illegal immigration.

Mr. Cornyn is a former state attorney general and a fiscal conservative, a Texan who wears cowboy boots with his pinstripes and prides himself on his 100 percent approval rating from the American Conservative Union.

But as the Senate prepares to wrestle this week with the question of legalizing much of the illegal immigrant population, Mr. Cornyn, like many Republicans, finds himself squeezed by warring factions in his own party.

President Bush focused on the issue in his weekly radio speech on Saturday, a day after protests in three cities by immigrant rights advocates. As Mr. Bush spoke, people gathered at rallies across the country, including hundreds of thousands of immigrant rights advocates in Los Angeles and a few hundred demonstrators in New York. [Page 31.]

Mr. Cornyn has been criticized on conservative talk radio and labeled a "sellout" on some Web logs for promoting legislation that would allow millions of illegal immigrants to remain in the United States for five more years. The proposal would also create a temporary worker program that would allow those immigrants and hundreds of thousands of foreigners abroad to work here legally for up to six years.

At the same time, business groups have been pressing him to go further by supporting legislation that would put their illegal workers on the road to citizenship.

The legislative battle has pitted Republican against Republican, with conservatives deriding guest worker programs as an amnesty for lawbreakers and calling for a wall to be built along the border with Mexico, and with business leaders pushing for legalization of the illegal workforce and the admission of thousands of foreign workers.

With the Senate expected to start voting on legislation as early as Tuesday and Congressional staff members negotiating furiously over the fine print, some lawmakers are struggling to find middle ground.

In his radio talk, Mr. Bush acknowledged the difficulty that lawmakers faced. "This is an emotional debate," he said. "America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society. We can be both at the same time."

But finding that balance has been enormously difficult. When asked how he felt on a recent day when he had shuttled from a telephone interview on Fox News Radio to a luncheon with business executives, Mr. Cornyn said, "In between."

"I have people come to see me who say, 'The wall is the answer,' " Mr. Cornyn said as he settled into a leather couch in his office in Houston. "I hear others say we ought to be sympathetic, we ought to just let them stay and call them legal and declare an amnesty. And I don't think either of those alternatives are possible or viable.

"Sometimes they end up yelling at me," he said of his conservative constituents. "But my job, and our job in Congress, is to see the whole picture and to come up with a realistic consensus."

Mr. Cornyn acknowledged, however, that it would be difficult to reach given the deep divide within his party. "It's the hardest thing," he said. "I honestly don't think we'll know the outcome until we get there."

The rift emerged in 2004 when Mr. Bush first urged Congress to create a program that would legalize illegal workers and allow for foreign workers to come here in the future. Both groups would be required to return home after a period of time.

The proposal was hailed by the United States Chamber of Commerce, typically a staunch Republican ally and a formidable political force. But it fueled a revolt among some conservatives in the party who demanded tighter border controls to stop the waves of illegal immigration that they view as a threat to American culture, jobs and security.

In December, the Republican-controlled House defied Mr. Bush's call for a temporary worker program. Instead, the House passed a tough border security bill that would, among other things, make it a federal crime to live in this country illegally, turning the millions of illegal immigrants here into felons, ineligible to win any legal status. (Currently, living in this country without authorization is a violation of civil immigration law, not criminal law.)

Meanwhile, many business leaders have thrown their weight behind legislation sponsored by Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, that would grant permanent residency — and ultimately citizenship — to the 11 million illegal immigrants believed to be living in the United States. To qualify, immigrants would have to pay a fine and back taxes, learn English and work here for six more years.

Mr. Cornyn has tried to build a middle path: sponsoring legislation that would deal with illegal immigrants and the needs of businesses for foreign workers while trying to avoid being tarred with the amnesty label by requiring both groups to return home after a certain time. Under his plan, people could only apply for permanent residency from their home countries.

The Senate Judiciary Committee, of which Mr. Cornyn is a member, is trying to cobble together elements of both pieces of legislation to produce a bill for the vote. Any legislation that passes the Senate will have to be reconciled with the House bill.

"Amnesty is off the table," Mr. Cornyn has said repeatedly.

But Republican hard-liners here and on the Judiciary Committee scoff at efforts to distinguish temporary worker plans from Mr. McCain's more liberal proposal. Many fear participants in such a program will simply vanish when it is time for them to go home.

"You say it's not amnesty, but it is," Senator Charles E. Grassley of Iowa said of temporary worker proposals. "If it looks, acts and smells like amnesty, then in my eyes, it is amnesty."

The issue is so politically explosive, particularly with Congressional elections looming, that some Republicans on the Judiciary Committee avoid discussing it. Senators Mike DeWine of Ohio and Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, who have favored immigrant rights in the past, both declined interviews to discuss their positions publicly. Both are up for re-election.

And Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who supports legalizing illegal immigrants, warned fellow Republicans that they could expect little more than criticism for their labors.

"A lot of people, particularly on our side, don't want to have a debate about this," Mr. Graham said. "Even if you debate it, you're wrong. Even if you're open-minded about compromise, you're wrong."

Mr. Cornyn, however, has thrown himself into the fray with enthusiasm.

He recently entered into negotiations with Mr. Kennedy and others in an effort to build some consensus on a temporary worker program. He appears regularly on conservative talk radio and meets with competing constituencies like conservative leaders, business executives and Hispanic lawyers. Members of his staff have also been in regular contact with the White House.

"Coming from a red state, one that has a large Hispanic population and one that's a border state, makes it easier to bridge those divisions among Republicans and find common ground with some Democrats," said Mr. Cornyn, who has close ties to Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's adviser.

His efforts were welcomed at a luncheon at the InterContinental Hotel in Houston, where business leaders gave him a standing ovation. But even some of those executives said they were optimistic that his position might shift a bit.

That was not the view of a group of about 25 conservative voters protesting recently outside of Mr. Cornyn's office.

Leslie Wetzel, who organized the protest, dismissed Mr. Cornyn's balancing act as more "mixed messages." "He professes to be a conservative, but like so many other Republicans he's not a true conservative," Mrs. Wetzel said. "They say, 'Oh, it's not amnesty; it's guest worker.' Well, I don't care what kind of spin you put on it. It's rewarding people for breaking the law."

With conservatives turning up the heat, Mr. Cornyn issued a flurry of press releases, emphasizing again that he opposed amnesty. Some Congressional staff members said he had rejected a compromise with Mr. Kennedy and Mr. McCain.

But business leaders said they still hoped Mr. Cornyn would strive for some consensus. "There's a lot of pressure on him," said Laura Reiff, a co-chairwoman of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, which represents hotels, restaurants, construction companies and other service industries. "He's put in a position now of really having to soul search and figure out where he's going to be."

U.S. Can Be 'Welcoming,' 'Lawful' (LAT)

By Faye Fiore, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

President Bush treads carefully in his radio address as he makes the case for an immigration policy overhaul.

WASHINGTON — With the Senate poised for an emotional debate on immigration law this week, President Bush called Saturday for an immigration policy that embraces some foreign workers while increasing security at the nation's borders.

"America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society. We can do both at the same time," Bush said in his weekly radio address, which he devoted to a subject that has divided his party and the nation.

The president repeated his call for a guest-worker program that would "create a legal way to match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill jobs that Americans will not do."

At the same time, Bush endorsed measures already underway to tighten security. He repeated his opposition to amnesty, which he said would "allow those who break the law to jump ahead of people who play by the rules and wait in the citizenship line."

Since he took office, Bush said, border security funding has risen 66% and the Department of Homeland Security has caught and sent home nearly 6 million illegal immigrants.

"We're making good progress, but we have much more work ahead, and we will not be satisfied until we have control of our border," he said.

Striving to appear both tough and compassionate on a contentious subject, Bush announced he would attend a naturalization ceremony Monday in Washington, saying "America is better off" because of those who immigrate legally.

In Los Angeles and elsewhere, huge rallies have been held to protest strict immigration curbs passed by the House in December. That bill, sponsored by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.), calls for erecting a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border and making it a felony to immigrate illegally or help someone who has.

In Washington, the Senate is expected to take up its own proposals this week to overhaul immigration policy, with lawmakers bitterly split over key provisions, such as whether to permit some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants in the United States to stay while pursuing legal status.

Members of the restaurant, hotel and agricultural industries favor an approach by Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) that includes a guest-worker program that would lead to legal status as well as a path to citizenship for some illegal immigrants already in the United States.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) proposed a bill last week that addresses only border security and enforcement, with no provisions for allowing current undocumented workers to remain in the United States or additional foreigners to enter for work.

Congressional and public rhetoric has grown so heated that Bush last week called for the discussion to proceed "in a way that brings dignity to the process."

Again on Saturday, he asked those deciding the issue to remember that "there are hard-working individuals, doing jobs that Americans will not do, who are contributing to the economic vitality of our country."

Much is at stake for Bush and his party. A harsh debate over immigration could wipe out recent GOP gains among Latinos, whose move toward the Republican Party has been a key objective for Bush's chief political advisor, Karl Rove.

Bush Calls For Fair Immigration Bill (AP)

The debate over immigration stretched from the White House to the West Coast on Saturday as thousands of demonstrators protested proposals to crack down on illegal immigrants.

President Bush, in addressing an issue that has divided his party, underscored America's immigrant history and called for secure borders and strict immigration enforcement.

Bush also urged Congress to write new immigration law with a guest worker program that could provide legal status — short of citizenship — for some of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants in the United States.

"As we debate the immigration issue, we must remember there are hardworking individuals, doing jobs that Americans will not do, who are contributing to the economic vitality of our country," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

The House has passed legislation that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants, and erect fences along one-third of the U.S.-Mexican border. The Senate is to begin debating immigration proposals on Tuesday.

In Los Angeles, thousands of people — some waving and wearing flags of Mexico and other nations — streamed into downtown streets for what was expected to be one of the city's largest pro-immigrant rallies.

Efforts to get tough on illegal immigration also spurred thousands of people to stage school walkouts, work stoppages and marches on Friday in cities such as Los Angeles, Phoenix and Atlanta.

The demonstrations are expected to culminate April 10 in a "National Day of Action" organized by labor, immigration, civil rights and religious groups.

Bush, who plans to attend a naturalization ceremony on Monday in Washington, is bracing for a standoff in the Senate this week before he heads south to Cancun, Mexico, where he'll discuss immigration with Mexican President Vicente Fox, a supporter of Bush's guest worker plan.

"America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws, and our immigration laws are in need of reform," Bush said.

Bush wants Congress to create a program to let foreigners gain legal status for a set amount of time to do specific jobs. When the time is up, they would be required to return home without an automatic path to citizenship.

"This program would create a legal way to match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill jobs that Americans will not do," he said.

Some critics argue that a guest worker program would create an underclass of foreign workers and stigmatize some jobs associated with foreign labor.

Some Republicans worry that the foreign workers would stay on and become citizens, further straining America's social service and education systems.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., thinks immigration enforcement, national security and border concerns should drive immigration reform. Frist's bill, which sidesteps the question of temporary work permits, would tighten borders, add Border Patrol agents and punish employers who hire illegal immigrants.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., backed by labor unions, has said he will do all he can, including filibuster, to thwart Frist's legislation.

The hottest debate in the Senate will be whether to pass some version of a guest worker program proposed by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. Their bill would provide up to 400,000 visas in the first year and allow participants, after six years, to seek permanent residency.

Immigration March Draws 500,000 In L.A. (SFC/AP)

By Peter Prengaman, Associated Press Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, March 26, 2006

Immigration rights advocates more than 500,000 strong marched in downtown Los Angeles on Saturday, demanding that Congress abandon attempts to make illegal immigration a felony and to build more walls along the border.

The massive demonstration, by far the biggest of several around the nation in recent days, came as President Bush prodded Republican congressional leaders to give some illegal immigrants a chance to work legally in the U.S. under certain conditions.

Wearing white shirts to symbolize peace, marchers chanted "Mexico!""USA!" and "Si se puede," an old Mexican-American civil rights shout that means "Yes, we can." They waved the flags of the U.S., Mexico and other countries, and some wore them as capes.

Saturday's march was among the largest for any cause in recent U.S. history. Police came up with the crowd estimate using aerial photographs and other techniques, police Cmdr. Louis Gray Jr. said.

Other demonstrations drew 50,000 people in Denver and several thousand in Sacramento and Charlotte, N.C.

Many protesters said lawmakers were unfairly targeting immigrants who provide a major labor pool for America's economy.

"Enough is enough of the xenophobic movement," said Norman Martinez, 63, who immigrated from Honduras as a child and marched in Los Angeles. "They are picking on the weakest link in society, which has built this country."

The U.S. House of Representatives has passed legislation that would make it a felony to be in the U.S. illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants, require churches to check the legal status of people they help, and erect fences along one-third of the U.S.-Mexican border.

Elger Aloy, 26, of Riverside, a premed student, pushed a stroller with his 8-month-old son at Saturday's Los Angeles march and called the legislation "inhumane."

"Everybody deserves the right to a better life," he said.

President Bush on Saturday called for legislation that does not force America to choose between being a welcoming society and a lawful one.

"America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws," Bush said in his weekly radio address, discussing an issue that had driven a wedge into his own party.

Bush sides with business leaders who want legislation to let some of the estimated 12 million undocumented immigrants stay in the country and work for a set period of time. Others, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, say national security concerns should drive immigration reform.

"They say we are criminals. We are not criminals," said Salvador Hernandez, 43, of Los Angeles, a resident alien who came to the United States illegally from El Salvador 14 years ago and worked as truck driver, painter and day laborer.

Francisco Flores, 27, a wood flooring installer from Santa Clarita who is a former illegal immigrant, said, "We want to work legally, so we can pay our taxes and support the country, our country."

In Denver, police said more than 50,000 people gathered downtown at Civic Center Park next to the Capitol to urge the state Senate to reject a resolution supporting a ballot issue that would deny many government services to illegal immigrants in Colorado.

Elsa Rodriguez, 30, a trained pilot who came to Colorado in 1999 from Mexico to look for work, said she just wants to be considered equal.

"We're like the ancestors who started this country, they came from other countries without documents, too," the Arvada resident. "They call us lazy and dirty, but we just want to come to work. If you see, we have families, too."

Between 5,000 and 7,000 people gathered Saturday in Charlotte, carrying signs with slogans such as "Am I Not a Human Being?" In Sacramento, more than 4,000 people protested immigration legislation at an annual march honoring the late farm labor leader Cesar Chavez.

About 200 people protested outside a town hall-style meeting held by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., a leading sponsor of the House bill. He defended the legislation, saying he's trying to stop people from exploiting illegal immigrants for cheap labor, drug trafficking and prostitution.

"Those who do that are 21st-century slave masters, just like the 19th-century slave masters that we fought a civil war to get rid of," Sensenbrenner said at the meeting. "Unless we do something about illegal immigration, we're consigning illegal immigrants to be a permanent underclass, and I don't think that's moral."

Since Thursday tens of thousands of people have joined in rallies in cities including Milwaukee, Los Angeles, Phoenix and Atlanta, and staged school walkouts, marches and work stoppages.

The demonstrations are expected to culminate April 10 in a "National Day of Action" organized by labor, immigration, civil rights and religious groups.

Bush Defends Need For Immigrants And Opposes Amnesty (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, March 25, 2006

March 25 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush endorsed the economic importance of immigrants while opposing amnesty for those who enter the U.S. illegally as thousands of protesters renewed street demonstrations against tougher curbs on immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0021861

``America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. ``We can be both at the same time."

Congress will consider immigration proposals next week in a debate that has divided Bush's Republican Party. Lawmakers are trying to balance voter demands for tighter border security with a need for companies to hire workers from abroad.

Thousands of protesters took to the streets for a second straight day, rallying against proposed legislation to strengthen enforcement along the U.S.-Mexico border and require employers to certify their workers are in the U.S. legally. Demonstrators waved flags of Mexico and other nations as they streamed into downtown Los Angeles today, the Associated Press reported. Phoenix and Atlanta have had similar protests.

``As we debate the immigration issue, we must remember there are hard-working individuals, doing jobs that Americans will not do, who are contributing to the economic vitality of our country," Bush said in his radio address.

He said he will attend a naturalization ceremony next week for immigrants who are becoming American citizens and will lay out his ideas for changing the law. He said he will call for improving border security, enforcing existing laws, ending the ``unwise practice" of catching and then releasing illegal immigrants into society and forming a temporary worker program.

Guest Workers

Bush has backed a ``guest worker program" to encourage people already in the U.S. to register. Business groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, support the idea.

``This program would create a legal way to match willing foreign workers with willing American employers to fill jobs that Americans will not do," Bush said. ``By reducing the number of people trying to sneak across the border, we would free up our law enforcement officers to focus on criminals and drug dealers and terrorists and others who mean us harm."

More than 1.1 million people were caught trying to illegally cross the U.S.-Mexico border in 2004, and an estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants now live in the U.S.

Republican Opposition

Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado is leading the Republican opposition to Bush's guest worker proposal, pushing instead for tougher enforcement on the border and requiring companies to certify their employees are eligible to work.

Bush cautioned that the guest worker program wouldn't include provisions to give illegal immigrants ``amnesty" from U.S. laws.

``Granting amnesty would be unfair, because it would allow those who break the law to jump ahead of people who play by the rules and wait in the citizenship line," Bush said. ``Amnesty would also be unwise, because it would encourage waves of illegal immigration, increase pressure on the border and make it more difficult for law enforcement to focus on those who mean us harm."

Compromise on immigration legislation in Congress has been elusive, and Bush predicted an ``emotional debate" and urged unity.

``We must also ensure that immigrants assimilate into our society and learn our customs and values -- including the English language," Bush said. ``By working together, we can meet our duty to fix our immigration system and deliver a bill that protects our country, upholds our laws and makes our nation proud."

Resuming Debate

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to resume debate next week on a program that would let workers remain in the U.S. for as many as six years before returning to their home countries.

Representatives of restaurants, hotels and the agricultural industry prefer the approach of Democrat Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts and Arizona Republican John McCain, whose proposal wouldn't require temporary workers to return home.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican, last week filed a measure that addresses only border security and enforcement, which he says he will bring to the Senate floor as early as next week. He indicated he might change course if the Judiciary Committee agrees on a more comprehensive alternative.

Immigration may be on the agenda when Bush meets with President Vicente Fox of Mexico and Prime Minister Stephen Harper of Canada in the resort city of Cancun, Mexico, on March 30-31.

Bush Shifts Emphasis To Safe Borders (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

President Bush, stepping up his focus on border security in the run-up to the Senate immigration debate this week, yesterday used his weekly radio address to tout increased spending on related law enforcement.

"Comprehensive immigration reform begins with securing our borders," Mr. Bush said.

The president cited a 66 percent increase in border-security funding since he took office, along with a 42 percent increase in interior-enforcement spending and a total of 6 million illegal aliens caught and returned home.

The administration failed in the early part of the immigration debate by not concentrating on border security, White House press secretary Scott McClellan said Thursday, but Mr. Bush has been committed all along to enforcing the law.

"I think that he was focusing on all aspects. I'm not sure that all aspects were getting the kind of attention that maybe it should have," Mr. McClellan said. "That's probably, from a communication standpoint, probably our fault."

Mr. Bush yesterday underscored his commitment to border security by saying the government is trying to end the practice of releasing illegal aliens soon after capture because of a lack of space in detention centers.

"We're adding more beds, so we can hold the people we catch, and we're reducing the time it takes to send them back home," the president said. "When illegal immigrants know they will be caught and sent home, they will be less likely to break the rules, and our immigration system will be more orderly and secure."

In recent weeks, Mr. Bush has put far more emphasis on enforcement in an effort to convince lawmakers he is serious about the issue, even as he tries to win passage of a guest-worker program.

The president said he hopes the Senate, which begins floor debate this week, will pass a bill that includes both issues. Still, although he has laid out a somewhat detailed guest-worker proposal, he has not produced a major new enforcement measure. This leaves some House Republicans wondering how serious he is about it.

The House in December passed an enforcement-only bill that calls for fences and a way for employers to ensure they are hiring legal workers. The legislation was widely considered a rejection of the president's call for guest workers and for temporary legal status for current illegal aliens.

Top House Republicans said they needed to prove the borders could be secured and laws enforced before voters would accept a new guest-worker program. However, Mr. Bush insists the issues fit together, arguing a new worker program would offer a legal channel to many currently illegal aliens and would allow the U.S. Border Patrol to focus on the others.

Opponents of a guest-worker plan said it rewards illegal aliens by giving them exactly what they seek -- some sort of legal status. They also say the federal government has shown it cannot tell who is coming and going, which could be a security hole in any new program.

"Recent reports have shown that the agency that would handle a foreign-worker program is overwhelmed and is unable to correct or even detect rampant corruption among its employees," said Rep. Tom Tancredo, Colorado Republican. "With no effective screening process in place, such a plan poses a major national security threat."

For the first 18 months after he proposed his guest-worker plan in January 2004, Mr. Bush focused on the workers and economic need. Last October, however, with the House clearly moving toward a security-first approach, Mr. Bush began highlighting border security far more heavily.

In a town hall event and a press conference last week, the president said the first priority is securing the border.

"Step one, focus on enforcing the border," he told an audience in Cleveland. "When we find people, [we] send them home, so that the work of our Border Patrol is productive work."

Mr. Bush met Thursday with representatives of groups, mostly businesses, that want to legalize illegal-alien workers and create a new stream of foreign workers. Participants said Mr. Bush realizes his role, for now, is limited to pressing for action. But they also said the president promised to be active in helping to write the final proposal when the House and Senate go to conference on their bills.

In his radio address yesterday,Mr. Bush said he will attend a naturalization ceremony tomorrow and press for action on a comprehensive immigration bill.

But he stressed that he will not accept amnesty.

"Granting amnesty would be unfair, because it would allow those who break the law to jump ahead of people who play by the rules and wait in the citizenship line," he said, adding that amnesty now would encourage another wave of illegal aliens in the future.

Mr. Bush also repeated his call for civility as the congressional debate continues.

"This is an emotional debate," he said. "America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society. We can be both at the same time."

CNN, March 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES, California (CNN) -- As thousands of people were expected to protest legislation cracking down on illegal immigrants on Saturday, President Bush said he planned to toughen enforcement of immigration laws.

"America is a nation of immigrants, and we're also a nation of laws," Bush said in his weekly radio address.

"When illegal immigrants know they will be caught and sent home, they will be less likely to break the rules, and our immigration system will be more orderly and secure."

The president acknowledged it was an "emotional debate" but continued "America does not have to choose between being a welcoming society and being a lawful society."

A march against proposed legislation in Congress was set for Saturday through downtown Los Angeles, California, a day after thousands of people staged similar demonstrations in Georgia, Arizona and elsewhere.

Next week, the Senate will take up immigration overhaul, with at least four different proposals rattling around the Capitol.

Among the thorny issues the Senate will tackle is Bush's guest worker program for immigrants, which has proven unpopular with many of his fellow Republicans. Senators must also decide whether more than 11 million people already in the United States illegally will be given a chance to earn legal status -- a process critics dismiss as "amnesty."

An immigration bill that passed the House of Representatives in December makes entering the country illegally a felony and calls for construction of 700 miles of security fence along the U.S.-Mexico border.

The House bill would also require employers to verify the immigration status of workers before hiring them, with increased fines for employers who fail to comply. The proposals have angered many Latinos.

"As we debate the immigration issue, we must remember there are hardworking individuals, doing jobs that Americans will not do, who are contributing to the economic vitality of our country," said Bush.

In Phoenix, Arizona, on Friday, police said 20,000 demonstrators marched to the office of Republican Sen. Jon Kyl, co-sponsor of a bill that would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country, The Associated Press reported. The turnout clogged major thoroughfares in what officials said was one of the largest protests in the city's history. People also protested outside Kyl's Tucson office, according to AP.

Protesters "should be pleased that the Senate is probably going to address this in a much more comprehensive way," Kyl told the Tucson Citizen newspaper during a meeting with its editorial board, according to AP.

In Los Angeles, more than 2,700 students from at least eight high schools and junior high schools walked out Friday, district officials told AP. Some carried Mexican flags as they walked down the streets, police cruisers behind them. Peach State protest

In Georgia, activists said tens of thousands of workers did not show up at their jobs Friday after calls for a work stoppage to protest a bill passed by the Georgia House on Thursday.

That bill, which has yet to gain Senate approval, would deny state services to adults living in the U.S. illegally and impose a 5 percent surcharge on wire transfers from illegal immigrants.

Supporters say the Georgia measure is vital to homeland security and frees up limited state services for people legally entitled to them. Opponents say it unfairly targets workers meeting the demands of some of the state's largest industries.

Teodoro Maus, an organizer of the Georgia protest, estimated as many as 80,000 Hispanics did not show up for work, AP reported. About 200 converged on the steps of the Georgia Capitol, some wrapped in Mexican flags and holding signs reading: "Don't panic, we're Hispanic" and "We have a dream, too."

Jennifer Garcia told AP she was worried what the proposal would do to her family. She said her husband is an illegal Mexican immigrant.

"If they send him back to Mexico, who's going to take care of them and me?" she asked AP. Garcia said of herself and her four children. "This is the United States. We need to come together and be a whole."

On Monday, Bush is to attend a naturalization ceremony in Washington where he will watch new citizens raise their right hands and swear to uphold the laws of the United States, according to The Associated Press. Later in the week, immigration likely will surface as a topic in Cancun, Mexico, where Bush is to meet with Mexico's President Vicente Fox, AP reported.

Bush said the government is trying to end a decades-long practice of releasing illegal immigrants soon after capture because of a lack of space in detention centers.

"We're adding more beds so we can hold the people we catch, and we're reducing the time it takes to send them back home," he said.

The president emphasized that a temporary worker program he's proposed would not provide amnesty to illegal immigrants in the United States. "For the sake of justice and for the sake of border security, I firmly oppose amnesty," Bush said.

Hot-button Immigration Debate Looms (KCS)

By Rick Montgomery

The Kansas City Star, March 26, 2006

A nervous Congress — pushed by voters who want action now — is bracing for an immigration showdown.

The Senate Judiciary Committee on Monday will attempt to hammer out a bill certain to press some of the hottest buttons of this election year: swelling number of illegal immigrants, proposals for temporary guest-worker status and the porous state of America's border with Mexico.

"All of Congress is boxed in a corner here," said John Keeley of the Center for Immigration Studies. "It's a mess of their own making."

Across the nation, including in Kansas City, Kan., on Friday, thousands of immigrants and their advocates have marched in support of comprehensive, compassionate reform. On Saturday, for example, an estimated 500,000 people rallied in Los Angeles.

In many areas, Latino-owned businesses shut down to let their workers march. On Monday, Washington will be host to a large rally of faith leaders opposed to criminalizing undocumented workers.

Some experts sense a historic decision is in the making, but only if lawmakers are able to compromise.

More Than 500,000 Rally In L.A. For Immigrants' Rights (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe And Anna Gorman

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Joining what some are calling the nation's largest mobilization of immigrants ever, hundreds of thousands of people boisterously marched in downtown Los Angeles Saturday to protest federal legislation that would crack down on undocumented immigrants, penalize those who help them and build a security wall on the U.S. southern border. Spirited crowds representing labor, religious groups, civil-rights advocates and ordinary immigrants stretched over 26 blocks of downtown Los Angeles from Adams Blvd. along Spring Street and Broadway to City Hall, tooting kazoos, waving American flags and chanting "Si se puede!" (Yes we can!). The crowd, estimated by police at more than 500.000, represented one of the largest protest marches in Los Angeles history, surpassing Vietnam War demonstrations and the 70,000 who rallied downtown against Proposition 187, a 1994 state initiative that denied public benefits to undocumented migrants.

The marchers included both longtime residents and the newly arrived, bound by a desire for a better life and a love for this county.

Arbelica Lazo, 40, illegally immigrated from El Salvador two decades ago but said she now owns two business and pays $7,000 in taxes annually.

Jose Alberto Salvador, 33, came here illegally just four months ago to find work to support the wife and five children he left behind; in his native Guatemala, he said, what little work he could find paid only $10 a day. "As much as we need this country, we love this country," Salvador said, waving a stick with both the American and Guatemalan flag. "This country gives us opportunities we don't get at home."

Saturday's rally, spurred by anger over legislation passed by the U.S. House of Representatives last December, was part of what many say is an unprecedented effort to organize immigrants and their supporters across the nation. The U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee is to take up efforts Monday to complete work on a comprehensive immigration reform proposal. Unlike the House bill, which beefed up border security and toughened immigration laws, the Senate committee's version is expected to include a guest worker program and a path to legalization for the nation's 10 to 12 million undocumented immigrants.

In recent weeks, hundreds of thousands of people have staged demonstrations in more than a dozen cities. The Roman Catholic Church and other religious communities have launched immigrant rights campaigns, with Los Angeles Cardinal Roger Mahony taking a leading role in speaking out against the House bill and calling on his priests to defy its provisions that would make felons of anyone who aided undocumented immigrants. In addition, several cities, including Los Angeles, have passed resolutions against the House legislation and some, such as Maywood, have declared itself a "sanctuary" for undocumented immigrants.

"There has never been this kind of mobilization in the immigrant community ever," said Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights. "They have kicked the sleeping giant. It's the beginning of a massive immigrant civil rights struggle."

One of the marchers Saturday, Jose Alberto Salvador, 33, left his wife and children behind in Guatemala four months ago to cross the border into the United States so he could earn enough money to return home and buy a house.

Jorge Valdovinos, 43, is a legal immigrant from Mexico who has three US-born children and works as a financial advisor.

Amid a sea of American and Mexican flags, protesters chanted "Si Se Puede!" and waved banners in Spanish that read, "We aren't criminals" and "The USA is made by immigrants."

"I love this country as if it were my own, for the opportunities it has given me," said Laurentino Ramirez, an illegal immigrant from Mexico who works at a garment factory. "The law is unjust for those who don't have papers. We come to work. We don't come to do harm to anyone."

Many of the marchers were immigrants themselves — both legal and illegal -- from Mexico and Central America. Some had just crossed the border, while others had been here for decades. There were construction workers and business owners; families with young children and people in wheelchairs. Throughout the afternoon, protesters heard speakers demand a path toward legalization and denounce HR 4437, which would tighten border enforcement and crack down on employers who hire undocumented workers.

The rally was organized by numerous unions, religious organizations and immigrant rights groups and publicized through Spanish-language media, which encouraged participants to wear white to symbolize peace and bring American flags. The mostly peaceful march stretched over 26 blocks, shutting down streets and tying up traffic around downtown for hours. Police estimated the crowd at 500,000, more than five times the size of the 1994 rally against California's Proposition 187, which would have denied services to undocumented immigrants. Participants said the massive mobilization shows that immigrants' voices must be heard and that they are contributing to the country's economy.

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

Measure Was Passed by U.S. House

LOS ANGELES, March 25 -- They surprised the police, and maybe themselves, their T-shirts turning block after block of downtown Los Angeles streets white in a demonstration so massive that few causes in recent U.S. history could have matched it.

Police said more than 500,000 people marched Saturday to protest a proposed federal crackdown on illegal immigration. Wearing white as a sign of peace -- and waving flags from the United States, Mexico, Guatemala and other countries -- they came to show that illegal immigrants are already part of the American fabric, and want the chance to be legal, law-abiding citizens.

Police used helicopters to come up with the crowd estimate. "I've been on the force 38 years, and I've never seen a rally this big," said Cmdr. Louis Gray Jr., incident commander for the rally.

In Charlotte, between 5,000 and 7,000 people gathered Saturday carrying signs with slogans such as "Am I Not a Human Being?" In Sacramento, more than 4,000 people protested during a march honoring the late farm labor leader Cesar Chavez. In Denver, more than 50,000 people protested downtown, according to police who had expected only a few thousand.

Phoenix was similarly surprised Friday when an estimated 20,000 people gathered for one of the biggest demonstrations in city history, and more than 10,000 marched in Milwaukee on Thursday.

The demonstrators oppose legislation passed by the U.S. House that would make it a felony to be in the United States illegally. It would also impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants, require churches to check the legal status of parishioners before helping them, and order the construction of fences along one-third of the U.S.-Mexican border.

"I think it's just inhumane. . . . Everybody deserves the right to a better life," said Elger Aloy of Riverside, 26, who brought his infant son to the Los Angeles march.

Many of the demonstrators who weren't immigrants said they have relatives who are. "My mom came from Mexico. She had to cross the river, and thank God she did," said David Gonzalez, 22. He rejected assertions by advocates of the legislation that it would help protect the nation from terrorism. He said it would hurt Hispanics the most.

President Bush is pushing for a guest-worker program that could provide temporary legal status to some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants. Many of his fellow Republicans are taking a more restrictive stance.

Many Stories, A Single Theme (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Recent illegal migrants and those who have gained legal status cite their contributions to the U.S. 'I love this country,' says one undocumented man.

Candido Hernandez, 26, trekked through the mountains from Mexico more than two decades ago and now works construction to support his three U.S.-born children.

Carmen Vazquez, 50, cleaned homes in Los Angeles while relatives raised her daughter in El Salvador before she became a legal resident and the two were able to reunite here several years later.

Maria Ortega, 30, came from Mexico to look for better opportunities and found work at a plastics factory after presenting false documents.

The three were among a festive crowd police estimated at 500,000 that marched through downtown Los Angeles to City Hall on Saturday to support immigrants rights and oppose a pending federal bill that would make illegal immigration a felony.

The march stretched more than 20 blocks along three streets, tying up traffic through midafternoon. There were no arrests.

"This was a massive protest," said Los Angeles Police Department spokeswoman Sandra Escalante, who said the crowd peaked at just over half a million by 11:30 a.m. "I can't recall a larger one."

Amid a sea of American and Mexican flags, protesters waved banners in Spanish that read, "We aren't criminals" and "The USA is made by immigrants."

"I love this country as if it were my own, for the opportunities it has given me," said Laurentino Ramirez, 32, an illegal immigrant from Mexico who makes minimum wage at a Los Angeles garment factory.

Ramirez took the day off to attend the march with 20 relatives. He worries about being deported and separated from his two children. If he became a permanent resident, Ramirez said, he could get a driver's license and a higher-paying job.

The marchers passed kazoo and ice pop vendors and carts steaming with hot dogs. Music blared over loudspeakers, Aztec dancers performed and peddlers hawked flags. A circle of drummers stopped frequently along the procession to play and shout. Many of the participants were immigrants — both legal and illegal — from Mexico and Central America. Some had recently crossed the border, while others have been in the United States for decades. Construction workers, business owners, families with young children and people in wheelchairs joined the march, coming from San Francisco, San Diego and other parts of the state.

Jorge Valdovinos, 43, of Fresno came with his wife and three children to show that he and other immigrants have made significant contributions to the U.S. economy.

"It's outrageous, because this country is built by immigrants," said Valdovinos, a permanent resident who owns a financial services company.

Julio Cruz, 20, said he does not want to return to Mexico because his infant daughter is hospitalized here.

In Mexico, Cruz made about $3.50 a day. Here, he said, he earns considerably more in construction.

"I came here to work," said Cruz. "I didn't come here to be out in the streets…. I don't think it would be too much to ask for legal documents so that I could keep working."

The rally was organized and funded by unions, religious organizations and immigrants rights groups, including Service Employees International Union Local 660; United Farm Workers; Hermandad Mexicana, an organization that assists immigrants; and the Korean Resource Center in Los Angeles.

It was publicized through Spanish-language media, which encouraged participants to wear white for peace and carry American flags to show patriotism. The organizers bused in participants who lacked transportation and helped guide them along the route.

The march started at 9th Street and followed Broadway, Main and Spring streets before converging at City Hall. Speakers demanded a path toward legalization and denounced congressional legislation that would tighten border enforcement and crack down on employers who hire undocumented workers.

"We're not going to let them treat us like modern-day slaves," Angela Sanbrano, executive director of the Central American Resource Center, said to the crowd in Spanish. "You have all sent a very clear message to the president. We're going to fight for just laws that recognize what immigrants have done for this country."

Organizers said the massive mobilization shows that immigrants' voices must be heard.

"People are really upset that all the work they do, everything that they give to this nation, is ignored," said Angelica Salas, executive director of the Coalition of Humane Immigrant Rights, which helped organize the march.

"Instead," she said, "there are all these proposed laws against them…. This is unacceptable."

One bill proposes adding 700 miles of fencing along the southern border, which Mexican immigrant Ortega said will only make the journey for illegal immigrants riskier.

Ortega, who has three children, paid a coyote to take her through the mountains nine years ago. "The people aren't going to stop coming; there will be more deaths."

Ortega said she also worries that police will be given more power to enforce immigration law. "Instead of trusting them, we are going to fear them," she said.

Ana Velasquez, 46, worked as a seamstress after arriving from El Salvador 26 years ago. She became a citizen after the 1986 amnesty and believes others should have the same opportunity.

"I want justice for the people who have been here and deserve to be here," Velasquez said as she marched on Broadway. "I'm very grateful for the chance to be in this country."

Thousands March On Kyl Offices (ADS)

By Brady McCombs

Arizona Daily Star, March 26, 2006

Senator's bill gives illegal entrants five years to leave the country

Oscar Soto took the day off from his warehouse job Friday to come with his wife, two children, nephew, niece and mother-in-law to an immigrant-rights rally on Tucson's Northwest Side to stand up for himself and his family.

Oscar Cruz managed to get time off from his apartment maintenance job to stand on the front line of the protest at Sen. Jon Kyl's Tucson office, 7315 N. Oracle Road, and hold a cardboard sign with white spray paint that read: "Senator Kyl: No more walls." It rested on top of a sign that read: "Humanitarian Aid Is Never A Crime."

On Friday both were part of an estimated 500 boisterous protesters who hoisted signs, held U.S. and Mexican flags and chanted, sang and shouted when drivers honked in support.

Participants wore white stickers that had the rally's theme in black letters: "We are not the enemy, we are part of the solution" or "No Somos el enemigo, somos parte de la solución."

In Phoenix, an estimated 20,000 people marched to Kyl's office to protest, according to Phoenix police.

Thousands more took part in protests in cities across the country, staging school walkouts, marches and work stoppages.

In Los Angeles where 2,700 students from at least eight high schools and junior high schools walked out, fights broke out between black students and Hispanic students attempting to join the protest.

In Tucson, neither Cruz nor Soto — who have both lived and worked in the United States for more than a decade without permanent residency or citizenship — had ever been to a rally before. But they said they staunchly oppose recent immigration proposals like House Bill 4437 and a proposal from Sens. Kyl, R-Ariz., and John Cornyn, R-Texas, that they believe would make them criminals.

"We want residency," said Cruz, 48, who was born in Nicaragua and lived in El Salvador before arriving in the United States in 1985.

Cruz has been able to work on renewable visas under the Nicaraguan Adjustment and Central American Relief Act but says he wants a chance to become a legal permanent resident.

Mexican native Soto, 32, wants the same thing. He came here 10 years ago to work and said he pays taxes, obeys laws and respects the culture and government of the United States.

"We came here so they don't treat us like criminals," Soto said about participating in the rally.

Soto's two children, an 8-year-old girl and a 6-year-old boy, are U.S. citizens who were born in this country. He and his wife, Jocabed Soto, are preparing to buy a house. They feel they are law-abiding and productive and deserve the chance to become citizens.

"It is not a crime to work," Oscar Soto said.

"They deserve some way to come into this country and work without the fear of being sent back in four of five years," said Bill Kinkead, 73, who is a member of Humane Borders.

The Kyl-Cornyn proposal would give illegal entrants up to five years to leave the country. These illegal entrants could apply from their home country to return as temporary workers, or they could apply for permanent residency. House Bill 4437, passed by the House on Dec. 16, would create 700 miles of fence along the border, make living in the country illegally a felony and increase penalties for employers who hire illegal workers.

"We're getting fed up, particularly with the gentleman whose office is behind us," Bill Kinkead said. "I hate the fact that he represents Arizona in Congress."

In a written response to Friday's rallies, Kyl didn't address the protesters as much as reiterate his stance on the issues.

"I have advocated for the adoption of a comprehensive plan that increases border security, provides a temporary-worker program, ensures enforcement of our laws at the border and at the workplace, and deals with those illegal immigrants already in the country," the statement said.

Democrat Jim Pederson, who is challenging Kyl for his Senate seat, issued a statement criticizing Kyl's proposal as a last-ditch election-year effort that "borders on fantasy."

He said marchers targeted Kyl's office because "they know that Jon Kyl's immigration plan is no plan at all. It's unworkable, partisan and needlessly divisive."

He said he would offer a plan that addresses border enforcement as well as a way to deal with the people already here.

Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network, called Friday's rally one of the biggest immigrant-rights rallies in recent Tucson history. Allen said 200 people showed up in December for a similar rally.

"People know that this is a historic moment and that the immigrant community is part of making history," Allen said. "That's why they are here."

Glenn Spencer, president of the American Border Patrol, which advocates for stricter border enforcement, watched and filmed the protest. He said the relatively small number of cars that honked represented the true sentiment.

Those who didn't honk "are the silent majority," Spencer said. "They do nothing and I think that's a reflection of the polls that show people want our borders controlled."

Cruz and the Sotos said Friday's rally, which concluded about 12:30 p.m., will make an impact.

"It will make them see how many we are and what we want," Jocabed Soto said.

Tens Of Thousands Protest Bill (DENP)

By Kirk Mitchell and Annette Espinoza

Denver Post, March 26, 2006

Immigration bill sparks Denver gathering

If there was any doubt about the large volume of migrant workers in Colorado, a crowd of more than 50,000 Latino demonstrators proved it today.

Throngs of people marched in front of the State Capitol on Colfax Avenue and packed Civic Center, waving signs that said “No on H.R. 4437,” a proposed federal law that would make illegal immigration a felony, and chanted “Si se puede,” or “yes we can” (unite).

“It's just incredible,” said Polly Baca, former state legislator and executive director of Latin American Research and Service Agency. “You can see that a day without these people working would be devastating for Colorado's economy.”

But U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo, R-Colo., said the crowd would have been much smaller or could have been quickly dispersed had Immigration and Customs Enforcement officers shown up with buses and started checking identification.

“When the rest of America looks at these demonstrations they'll agree it's getting more difficult to control illegal immigration,” Tancrado said. “We'd better do something about this.”

Farm, construction and hotel workers from Pueblo to Fort Collins drove to Denver for the mass demonstration, Baca said. Many people walked from as far as 20 blocks, pushing baby strollers and waving large red, white and green Mexican flags.

The large turnout stunned even the organizers.

A grass-roots campaign to get people to participate in the demonstration has been weeks in the making, with announcements on Spanish-language radio stations and at churches such as Centro Nueva Vida, 6738 E. Colfax Ave.

“The Time is Now Rally” organizers began meeting eight days ago. At its first meeting, the organizers anticipated two dozen, by last Wednesday they thought it would be a couple of hundred. They never imagined it would be more than that.

"Our goal is to get mass awarness to the people of Colorado and to the immigrant community on current immigration issues and to call for action," said Ida Sandoval.

Illegal immigration has also been in the spotlight in Colorado with bills in the Legislature including one that would make it a felony to transport illegal immigrants. On Monday and Tuesday, more than 80 illegal immigrants were arrested after highway accidents during a snowstorm.

“My people come not because they are bad people but because they are hungry,” said Maria Zayas, who was a migrant worker for 20 years before becoming a U.S. citizen. “If we leave, the U.S. would go down.”

Joel Canales said undocumented immigrants are worried about HB 4437 because it will prevent them from working. “They're just looking for a better life for themselves,” said Canales, who is a U.S. citizen but has several relatives who are illegal and work in the United States.

The bill, which recently passed the House, would turn 11 million undocumented workers in the U.S. into criminals. Tancredo said the bill would give the U.S. power to enforce the law.

Protesters Rally For Immigrants' Rights (DMN)

By Karin Shaw Anderson And Dianne Solis

The Dallas Morning News, March 26, 2006

Latino protesters criticize current policies, ask for better treatment

Sitting next to bronze statues of cattle in Dallas' Pioneer Plaza, 12-year-old Cesar Hernandez talked about the struggles his family has endured while making a life in the U.S.

His mother returned to Mexico last year to get treatment for her diabetes, something she could not find here because of her immigrant status.

MARIA OLIVAS / Special to Al Dia Demonstrators gathered in front of Dallas' City Hall on Saturday afternoon to protest immigration proposals.

Cesar attended a rally Saturday near City Hall with two of his aunts and two cousins to push for immigrant rights and to protest recent proposals to keep more people from entering the country illegally.

"We need papers and passports," he said, translating for the aunt who now cares for him in Dallas. "We came here to earn respect. We need a better life."

About 1,500 protesters attended the rally, one of several in cities across the country.

Baltazar Ortega pressed his face to a Mexican flag someone handed him before the rally started.

"I love my flag," he said. "It's a source of pride for me. It's my first time holding a flag in my hands."

Dozens of flags from many Latin American countries fluttered in the wind as speakers took the stage.

Mr. Ortega came to the gathering with his friends Hugo Ortega and Juan Carlos Martinez to show their contributions to the American workforce.

"I'm a truck driver," Mr. Martinez said, hugging his daughter. "But a lot of people think that if you are an illegal, you're a criminal."

After a recording of his song "Mexican Revolution" was played at the rally, rapper Jorge Ruiz said that Latino immigrants like his parents helped build Dallas.

"We construct your schools. We cook your food," he said. "We are the motor of this nation, but people don't see us.

"Blacks and whites, they had their revolution. They had their Martin Luther King. Now it is time for us."

Diana Flores, a Mexican-American and a trustee with the Dallas County Community College District, roused the crowd.

"People don't sleep anymore. People don't sleep anymore," she said in Spanish. "When we don't get involved, when we don't participate ... they treat us as though as we are the worst element of this city.

"You are not alone," she said. "We are here to demand [legal] residency. We cannot stop. We will achieve justice."

Francisco Rojas, a member of Grupo Jalisco, said he could see changes stirring.

"We are right now doing our first step," he said in Spanish. "It's like an animal that's waking from many years of sleep. We are very strong, and right now is our opportunity to be important through our words and our ideas."

About 200 Demonstrate In Waukesha Against Immigration Bill (MJS)

By Larry Sandler

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 26, 2006

Waukesha - Some 200 protesters rallied Saturday against U.S. Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner's bill to levy criminal penalties against illegal immigrants and those who aid them.

But as the demonstrators chanted outside Waukesha State Bank in Spanish and English, the Menomonee Falls Republican held firm to his position in a feisty debate with constituents inside.

"We're here protesting everything he stands for," Barney Gonzales of Waukesha told the largely Latino crowd gathered in the bank's parking lot.

Sensenbrenner's bill represents "discrimination and oppression" against "people who came here for a better life," added Deborah Luna of Waukesha.

But Sensenbrenner said he was concerned about businesses that see illegal immigrants as cheap labor and "coyotes" who smuggle people across the U.S.-Mexican border for drug trafficking and prostitution. He said U.S. schools and social services would be overtaxed if projections hold true that the number of illegal immigrants eventually will grow from 11 million to 30 million.

"Unless we do something about illegal immigration, we're consigning illegal immigrants to be a permanent underclass, and I don't think that's moral," Sensenbrenner told about 50 people at his town hall meeting at the bank.

Sensenbrenner's bill, which has been approved by the House, also would build a wall along the border and get tough on businesses that hire illegal immigrants. The legislation has stirred controversy nationwide, drawing 100,000 people to a rally in Chicago this month and at least 10,000 to a march Thursday in Milwaukee.

By contrast, Gonzales conceded, Saturday's demonstration was a "small-scale protest." Demonstrators started gathering well before the meeting started and kept chanting slogans and waving signs after it ended, even as they were pelted by freezing rain.

Chants of "¡Viva La Raza!" (Long live the Hispanic people), "Sí, se puede" (Yes, we can) and "Latinos unidos" (Latinos united) echoed throughout downtown Waukesha. Protesters held up U.S. flags and signs that read: "We're not a threat. We love America, too," and "America was built on immigration."

Inside, questions about immigration policy dominated the meeting. Sensenbrenner's critics were led by Stewards of Prophetic, Hopeful, Intentional Action, or SOPHIA, a coalition of Waukesha County churches.

Mark Doremus, the coalition's president, urged Sensenbrenner to "temper justice with mercy." Doremus noted that churches often help immigrants and added, "To tell us that someone who reaches out in Christian love to another will be a felon is very disturbing."

Sensenbrenner, the House Judiciary Committee chairman, said he had tried to amend his bill to change the crime from a felony to a misdemeanor but Democrats helped vote down that move. Many of the votes cast against that amendment were aimed at defeating the bill altogether.

Bishop Paul Stumme-Diers, leader of the Greater Milwaukee Synod of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, said he hoped Congress would adopt legislation less like Sensenbrenner's and more like a competing measure sponsored by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.). The McCain-Kennedy bill would provide a way for illegal immigrants already in this country to win legal status.

Sensenbrenner called the McCain-Kennedy legislation "an amnesty bill." He said he could not accept amnesty for illegal immigrants because it would give them precedence over those who were following the long process to immigrate and win citizenship legally.

Ralph Onsager of Brookfield lashed out at Sensenbrenner's Christian critics, claiming the Bible said they should follow the law.

"Just like Jesus?" the crowd jeered, recalling how Jesus had resisted the Roman authorities.

The Senate will open debate Tuesday on immigration reform. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, is seeking to forge a compromise between the Sensenbrenner and McCain-Kennedy bills.

Sensenbrenner said he could not predict how the Senate would act but noted he would sit on the conference committee that shapes the final deal.

Chairman's bill rallies his foes on immigration

Washington - As chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Jim Sensenbrenner is a pivotal figure in the fight over immigration.

But lately he has become more than that.

With the issue boiling over politically, Sensenbrenner and the get-tough immigration bill he sponsored have turned into bitter rallying cries for an increasingly vocal opposition, especially among Hispanics, fueling protests such as the one that drew more than 10,000 people Thursday in Milwaukee.

To those mobilizing against his bill, the 62-year-old congressman has attained a kind of infamy.

"Chairman Sensenbrenner is becoming a household word in the Latino community," said Cecilia Muñoz of the National Council of La Raza, a leading Hispanic group.

"We want to thank Congressman Sensenbrenner, because he has brought us all together," said Luis Pelayo, a Chicago activist and the president of the Hispanic Council, a small non-profit in Bensenville, Ill. "We have never had a leader so powerful that has united our community like him."

One sign at last week's Milwaukee protest read "Deportemos Sensenbrenner" - "Let's Deport Sensenbrenner."

DOJ_NMG_0021871

"People who know very little about bills and Congress do know who Congressman Sensenbrenner is. He's become shorthand for the anti-immigrant movement," said Deepak Barghava, a Washington anti-poverty activist fighting the Sensenbrenner bill. "In church basements and town meetings, the name Sensenbrenner gets an incredible reaction."

Denies he's anti-immigration

In an interview last week, Sensenbrenner said the reaction he and his House-approved legislation have inspired "comes as no surprise to me."

"Let me say this shows how tremendously difficult it is do anything to fix our broken immigration system," Sensenbrenner said. "I've never been one that shied away from controversy. What I'm doing is the right thing. We've got to get control of our borders."

He rejects the notion that he is anti-immigration, and his high profile on the issue is a relatively recent thing. In fact, he calls Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, an outspoken Republican crusader against immigration, a "zealot."

But last year, Sensenbrenner got a law enacted that was aimed at barring illegal immigrants from getting driver's licenses. And in December, he left his stamp on the broader immigration debate. The powerful committee chairman sponsored and won passage of an immigration bill that would build a long wall on the Mexican border, beef up enforcement against hiring undocumented workers, criminalize illegal presence in the United States and expand the laws against aiding illegal immigrants.

Sensenbrenner says his bill is what the public wants and was the only approach that could win approval from a deeply divided GOP majority.

"The Republicans are not like the Rockettes on the issue of immigration," he said.

Focused on security and enforcement, his measure steered clear of the most divisive questions: whether to let in more foreigners as temporary workers and whether to give the estimated 11 million to 12 million illegal immigrants already in the U.S. a way to earn legal status.

The bill was hailed by those who want to restrict immigration, a goal shared by many Americans, particularly in the GOP's conservative base. But it has pitted Sensenbrenner against a broad set of political forces: not just Hispanic groups and congressional Democrats, but President Bush, the business lobby, the Roman Catholic Church and others who favor a more liberal immigration policy.

With the Senate debate coming to a head over the next few weeks, opponents of the Sensenbrenner bill are massing against it, with protests and vigils and demonstrations around the country. A rally in Chicago this month drew an estimated 100,000 people and was followed by nationwide events, including Saturday in Los Angeles, where more than 100,000 marched. Organizers plan events in Milwaukee and at least nine other cities April 10.

At a news conference here last week, activists opposing the bill called it "ugly," "evil" and "un-American." They said it was punitive and failed to give undocumented workers a path "out of the shadows." They also argued that it would backfire politically on the GOP by alienating the nation's growing Hispanic population, a concern shared by some Republican strategists.

Talk of repercussions

The refrain from the bill's opponents is that Sensenbrenner has roused a "sleeping giant" in America's immigrant population.

"He is (now) famous as a guy who put forward a bill that criminalizes 11 million people and criminalizes people who are engaged in charity," said Muñoz, of La Raza. "I have worked in Washington for almost 20 years, and that is not the kind of guy the chairman is. But I think he and the Republican leadership are making a very grave mistake with this bill. And that mistake will have repercussions for their priorities for years to come."

"The Sensenbrenner bill has proven to be one of the great mobilizing forces for the pro (immigration) reform alliance in this country," said Frank Sharry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, an immigrant's rights organization based in Washington.

"Growers, restaurant owners, nursing home operators, unions, immigrant communities, the Catholic Church are coming out against this bill. . . . This has proven to be a match on a fire," he said.

Cardinal Roger Mahony of Los Angeles has urged priests there to ignore the bill if its provisions against aiding illegal immigrants become law.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) joined in last week, saying Sensenbrenner's bill "would literally criminalize the good Samaritan - and probably even Jesus himself."

Moral element is argued

Sensenbrenner says his bill is not aimed at criminalizing good Samaritans coming to the aid of undocumented immigrants but at so-called coyotes who smuggle people across the border.

And he defends the idea of making illegal presence a crime. It is now a civil violation.

"The way to come to the United States is to obey the law. And illegal immigrants are violating the law," he said.

Sensenbrenner argues that "the best way to help illegal aliens is to stop illegal immigration," which he says creates an exploited underclass.

"Those who hire large numbers of illegal aliens are the 21st-century slave masters. And in my opinion, that's just as immoral as the 19th-century slave masters we had to fight a civil war to get rid of," said Sensenbrenner, who wants the legal status of workers to be verified before they're hired.

He says cracking down on illegal immigration is a "national security issue."

As for the politics, the Menomonee Falls Republican accused "zealots" on both sides of polarizing the discussion.

"It's much harder as a result of the shrillness of the debate," said Sensenbrenner, who accuses the Mexican government of engaging in a public relations campaign against the bill "that's aimed greatly at me."

One activist on Sensenbrenner's side of the debate, Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies, said he thought the congressman's critics were making a tactical mistake by excoriating him.

"I'm not really sure these protests against him and personalizing him as the locus of evil is going to do the other side any good," Krikorian said. "As far as I can tell, he's not the sort of guy that's going to take very well to that kind of thing."

The Senate Judiciary Committee will attempt to agree on a bill Monday that includes guest workers and could provide a way for illegal immigrants to become legal residents. But Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist has offered a bill much more like Sensenbrenner's.

Anything passed by the Senate would become the subject of negotiations with the House, and Sensenbrenner will play a key role in that process. He says one of his bottom lines is no "amnesty" for illegal immigrants. By that, Sensenbrenner means that illegal immigrants should have to return to their country of origin before they can be considered for legal residence in the U.S., an idea that his critics say is unworkable.

The lawmaker said last week that he doesn't know if Congress can agree on a new immigration law.

"I have said repeatedly this is the most difficult thing I have done in my public career," Sensenbrenner said.

And one that, one way or another, might shape his political legacy.

Miscue Enables 15 Illegals To Go Free (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, March 26, 2006

DENVER -- When a Colorado state trooper pulled over a van crammed with 15 illegal aliens headed for Iowa City, it looked like their plans to visit the Hawkeye State had come to a screeching halt.

Instead, Trooper John Lopez released the van and its occupants after an Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agent told the Colorado State Patrol that he didn't have the staff to detain the admitted illegal aliens.

Immigration officials now say that the decision Thursday to let them go was based on a miscommunication about the van's location. Even so, the release has fueled frustration over what critics see as the federal agency's inability to handle the unabated flow of undocumented workers.

"What I've picked up on is that ICE seems to be understaffed, underfunded and doesn't seem to be able to handle the magnitude of the problem we have here in Colorado," said Fred Elbel, co-director of Defend Colorado Now, which plans to place a measure on the November ballot aimed at discouraging illegal immigration.

"Local police have told me on numerous occasions that they're reluctant to call ICE, because often ICE can't do anything," Mr. Elbel said.

ICE regional spokesman Carl Rusnok said the agency is "reviewing what happened and wants to correct this," but he defended its overall record of handling calls from local authorities.

Immigration officials have had their hands full as illegal aliens pour into the country for the spring planting season: On Monday and Tuesday, 113 illegal aliens were picked up on Colorado highways after their vehicles rolled over or skidded off the highway during a snowstorm. The Justice Prisoner Alien Transportation System is in the process of returning them to Mexico, Mr. Rusnok said.

"I'm not saying that it never happens, that we always respond to these calls, but look what happened on Tuesday," he said. "We had all these rollovers, and we responded to each of those and took custody of all illegal aliens in a timely manner."

On Thursday, the state patrol contacted the ICE office in Brush, Colo., when Trooper Lopez discovered the 15 illegal aliens after a traffic stop. Their 2000 Chevy Astro was traveling on Interstate 76 about six miles east of Sterling in northeast Colorado.

But the ICE agent thought the trooper said Interstate 70, more than 100 miles away in Denver, Mr. Rusnok said.

"The agent thought they said I-70, and it would have been a manpower problem. He didn't have the guys to drive all the way over there," Mr. Rusnok said. "What he should have said was, 'You know, I don't have the manpower for this right now, why don't you call the Denver office.' "

Mr. Rusnok added that he didn't know exactly what the agent told the state patrol.

"I don't know if he told them to let them go, or he didn't have enough manpower, but it's essentially the same thing," he said.

Colorado State Patrol Master Trooper Ron Watkins attributed the miscommunication to ICE. "There's no way our trooper is going to say I-70 when he's on the I-76," he said.

After the agent said he couldn't send officers to the scene, the state patrol could do nothing more.

"[Trooper Lopez] told them where he was at, and they said they couldn't respond. We don't have the jurisdiction or authority to arrest them. That's Immigration's job," Trooper Watkins said, referring to ICE.

The state patrol encounters about 500 illegal aliens each week on Colorado highways, but ICE agents don't always respond, he said.

"They don't always handle it," Trooper Watkins said. "It's an overwhelming number. It not only ties up ICE; it ties up us, too."

The state legislature took on the issue Monday when the Senate Judiciary Committee approved 6-0 two bills to crack down on human smuggling and trafficking. The legislation, introduced by state Sen. Peter Groff, would make such crimes felonies.

Customs Agent Let Drugs Slip Through (HC)

By James Pinkerton

Houston Chronicle, March 26, 2006

Case is example of border official lured to 'dark side' by easy money

PROGRESO - With surveillance cameras secretly rolling, U.S. Customs Inspector Lizandro Martinez greeted the driver of a truck that pulled into his inspection lane at 5:30 a.m.

The driver, a pal from the inspector's days as a police officer more than a decade earlier, told Martinez that the cargo he'd been expecting was right behind his truck. And sure enough, a white Ford pickup appeared. It carried 1,635 pounds of marijuana, packed and ready for the streets of America.

But Martinez didn't stop it, didn't inspect it, didn't call out the dogs. He just waved it through on that lonely morning, FBI agents say. And for that, agents say, drug traffickers paid him $10,000.

Three years later, Martinez, 44, is behind bars, suspected of taking more than $1 million in bribes while waving through more than 50 tons of drugs — more than his law-abiding colleagues seized at eight South Texas ports of entry in an entire year.

As Martinez awaits sentencing, set for April 26, authorities are trying to figure out what happened, how an agent on the front lines of the so-called "drug war" went so terribly bad. And what's emerging, some former law enforcement officials say, is a troubling picture, a striking example of how Customs failed to prevent flagrant corruption on the Texas-Mexico border.

Neither Martinez, in custody since his arrest on Nov. 7, 2004, nor his lawyer, Charles Banker, could be reached for comment.

In October, court records show, Martinez pleaded guilty to charges of money laundering and conspiracy to import more than 1,000 kilos of marijuana. He faces as much as life in prison and a $4 million fine.

What's most disturbing about his case, some law enforcement officials say, is that U.S. Customs and Border Protection kept Martinez on its payroll even as complaints against him mounted during his 13-year tenure.

Customs internal affairs officers investigated Martinez 15 times, resulting in letters of caution, oral and written reprimands, mandatory counseling, three short suspensions and two attempts to fire him permanently, according to testimony at a Feb. 22, 2005, court hearing.

Customs officials declined to talk about why Martinez wasn't taken off the streets sooner. "We don't comment on specific cases," said Lynn Holinger, a CBP spokeswoman in Washington.

Martinez kept his job on one occasion, thanks to the Washington, D.C.-based National Treasury Employees Union.

Union officials said they only tried to ensure that Martinez was treated fairly.

"The role of NTEU or any union is to ensure that employees accused of misconduct are fairly represented in proceedings with the agency," union president Colleen M. Kelley said in a statement.

Cash purchases

According to court records, the FBI and Immigration and Customs Enforcement learned that Martinez was allegedly taking drug bribes in August 2003. The agencies — along with the IRS and the Texas Department of Public Safety — began investigating him as part of what they called Operation Dark Shadows.

Investigators found that Martinez and his wife, Sandra, who was not charged in the case, appeared to be living far beyond their means. He earned $55,664 a year and she did not report an income. Yet in 2003, agents said, the couple made more than $400,000 in cash purchases. They bought such items as diamond rings and a diamond-studded Rolex watch. They purchased a $240,000 used car dealership in downtown McAllen and 10 classic, big-engine "muscle cars" worth $76,800, according to government documents.

They also made cash payments toward a $529,963 home in McAllen. The luxurious house featured a swimming pool, elaborate stained-glass windows, balconies, a basement movie theater and two free-standing garages. Each room was equipped with a television.

All despite the fact that Martinez and his wife had gone through bankruptcy proceedings in 2000 and had claimed assets of only $7,850, court records show.

Martinez began working at Customs in September 1991. He had been a police officer in the South Texas town of Hidalgo in 1984 and 1985. While there, he met Roberto Dominguez, an officer since 1979. But Dominguez was fired in 1996 after an alleged off-duty shoplifting incident in McAllen, said his lawyer, Al Alvarez.

Sometime later, federal agents say, Dominguez began working with traffickers. They allege he escorted trucks carrying drug loads and tipped off Martinez when they were about to cross the border.

In November 2004, Dominguez was indicted along with Martinez and six others. Now in custody, Dominguez has pleaded guilty to drug charges and awaits sentencing.

During their investigation, agents filmed Martinez as he waved drug-laden trucks through his lane at Progreso. The trucks' cargo beds were covered with tarps and "filled to the top with marijuana ... sometimes you could see it protruding," FBI agent Marella Ruelas testified.

To avoid letting the smugglers know that Martinez was being watched, agents allowed the drug loads to pass through Progreso. But they arranged for state troopers or police to stop the vehicles later and seize the drugs as part of what would appear to be unrelated traffic stops, Ruelas said.

The federal indictment formally charged Martinez with allowing eight loads of marijuana totalling 9,530 pounds to cross at Progreso. Court records show he was accused but not charged in connection with another four loads weighing 3,945 pounds, meaning he was linked to a total of 13,475 pounds of illicit cargo.

But investigators in the case suspect that Martinez actually waved through much more contraband — more than 100,000 pounds of drugs, according to an estimate by an investigator familiar with the case.

That would be more narcotics than was confiscated at eight ports of entry stretching from Brownsville to Del Rio in fiscal 2005, ending Sept. 30. During that period, inspectors seized 79,633 pounds — or 39.8 tons — of marijuana and 10,600 pounds — or 5.3 tons — of cocaine from cars and trucks, federal statistics show.

Investigators say their estimates of what Martinez allowed to cross are based on interviews with drivers accused of bringing loads across the bridge. They calculate he let through at least 100 loads.

Smugglers were so confident, sometimes they crossed the bridge in the inspector's lane twice a day, agents say.

The smuggling operation fell apart after one participant and an informant began talking to authorities, Alvarez said.

"All these cases end up the same way," said Alvarez. "There is no honor among thieves, as they say."

Disciplinary problemsWhat surprised some law enforcement officers was that Martinez wasn't caught sooner.

His history of disciplinary problems came to light at the Feb. 22, 2005, McAllen court hearing in which his lawyer was appealing a district court decision to hold him and Dominguez without bail.

According to testimony at the hearing:

Customs suspended Martinez for 30 days in August 1993 for allegedly threatening to cut off the penis of a man he suspected of having an affair with his wife. That punishment was reduced to 14 days after union arbitration.

In May 1997, according to testimony, Customs fired Martinez after internal affairs officers investigated allegations that he had been spotted at a party attended by Mexican drug traffickers, made threatening calls to the home where his ex-wife lived and used a government vehicle to run personal errands.

"We defended Mr. Martinez on a charge of misuse of a government vehicle, not a drug-related charge," Kelley said in her statement. "Whatever he may have been suspected of then or now had no bearing on that case, and he was reinstated by a neutral third party.

"In our society, everyone is entitled to a defense and that is what we provided Mr. Martinez in the case involving the government vehicle. Any attack on our role in that matter is fundamentally an attack on the right of every American to have adequate representation when accused of an offense."

Given last chance

Customs later tried firing Martinez again, accusing the inspector of being absent without leave, improperly copying Customs entry documents and allegedly forcing a teenage girl to partially disrobe even though female inspectors were available, a violation of search guidelines.

But after union arbitration, his proposed dismissal was reduced to a 30-day suspension in March 2001 and he was transferred to Progreso under a "last chance" agreement.

Customs officials say that only a tiny minority of border agents is ever accused of drug corruption.

"But is one too many? Darn tooting, and it's a sad thing," said David Higgerson, acting director of field operations at the CBP's regional office in Laredo.

"We are always concerned with these cases," Higgerson said. "We have an ongoing program with our managers to spot these things before it gets too bad. We have ways of ferreting out people who go over to the dark side. And it's sad. These are people who have taken an oath."

Bill Spurs Brief Boycott Of Miller Brewing (MJS)

By daniel Reilly

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, March 26, 2006

Chicago group targeted company because of Sensenbrenner donation

Washington - Opposition to Rep. Jim Sensenbrenner's immigration bill led one Chicago group to launch a boycott of Miller Brewing Co. this month because Miller is a Wisconsin company that has made contributions to the GOP lawmaker.

The brief boycott was called off after the two sides met in Chicago and the brewery agreed to run newspaper ads denouncing the bill and to help the group lobby in Washington against the measure.

Miller says it had decided before meeting with the group to oppose the legislation.

On March 10, at a massive pro-immigration rally in Chicago, the Chicago Committee Against HR 4437, an umbrella group composed of Latino community organizations from across the Midwest, announced the boycott.

"The primary reason we targeted Miller was that they had donated money to Sensenbrenner's campaign," said Omar Lopez, a member of the committee and one of the organizers of the boycott. "And since Miller does a lot of business in the Mexican community, we felt they needed to get in sync with the (sentiments) of one of their biggest audiences."

$2,000 donation

The Miller Brewing political action committee made $2,000 in political contributions to Sensenbrenner in the 2004 election cycle, according to Federal Election Commission records.

The boycott ended after one week. Miller took out a full-page ad in the Spanish-language newspaper Hoy in Chicago and agreed to help arrange meetings on behalf of the group.

However, the boycott did not determine Miller's position on Sensenbrenner's bill as "the decision to oppose it. . . and vocally demonstrate our opposition to the bill had already been made," according to Pete Marino, acting corporate media relations director at Miller.

According to Lopez, Miller also agreed to take out similar full-page ads in The New York Times and The Washington Post. But Marino would not confirm that, stating that the company had agreed to place ads in English-language media, but "the exact locations of those ads are still being determined."

Support in the future?

Although Miller has expressed its displeasure over the legislation, it is unclear whether that will affect the company's future support of Sensenbrenner.

"Certainly, we will consider Representative Sensenbrenner's sponsorship of this bill in terms of future support. However, we do not support or oppose any candidate based on any one single issue," Marino said.

Lopez said that the Chicago committee was evaluating other companies that support Sensenbrenner and would not rule out the possibility of other boycotts.

'Guest Workers' Won't Work (WP)

By Tamar Jacoby

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

A Path to Permanent Citizenship Would Benefit Everyone

The conventional wisdom is all but unanimous, so much so that even those who hold the opposing view pay homage to it. Sure, some people dispute even the notion that we need foreign workers to keep the U.S. economy growing. But among those who recognize the necessity of a continued flow of immigrants to do dirty, unskilled jobs that educated Americans increasingly no longer want to do, the mantra goes unquestioned: What's needed is a guest worker program to deliver this labor in a timely, efficient way.

But the conventional wisdom is wrong, and as the Senate debates immigration in the weeks to come, members would do well to reexamine the assumption. The last thing the United States needs is an inflexible guest worker plan.

It isn't hard to understand where the idea came from or why it's popular in Washington. Policymakers from George W. Bush to Sens. John McCain, John Cornyn and Edward Kennedy grasp that the main problem with our immigration system is the lack of visas for foreign workers. International supply and demand -- demand created by U.S. labor needs -- generate a flow of roughly 1.5 million immigrants a year. But our annual immigration quotas accommodate less than two-thirds of that number, producing an annual spillover of about a half-million illegal workers that erodes the rule of law and undermines our security.

The logical remedy: to provide these additional workers with visas and allow them to enter the country in a lawful, dignified way. The only problem: Policymakers are afraid the public would reject such a large increase in permanent immigration. So even those who have been most courageous in promoting reform talk instead about temporary visas. Bush and Cornyn would require foreigners to go home at the end of their work stints. McCain and Kennedy would allow some workers to stay permanently, but they, too, call their proposal a temporary worker program, and many of those who support their package -- including myself -- have gone along in adopting the term.

The problem with the guest worker idea starts with practicality: Appealing as it sounds to some, a time-limited program will not work. The adage is true: There is nothing more permanent than a temporary worker. Many of those who come to the United States for short stints will want to stay on when their visas expire, perpetuating the underground economy that the program is supposed to eliminate.

This isn't just speculation -- look at the reality today. True enough, many young foreign workers initially come to the United States for what they think will be a short visit, and many do go home after a few years. But unlike past such workers, an increasing number are now staying on. This is partly a result of U.S. policy: Our efforts to fortify the border have made it harder for people to travel back and forth. But other, deeper forces are at work. The traditional flow of migrant farmworkers -- truly seasonal laborers, usually single men -- is giving way to a more diverse stream: both men and women, often with families, less rooted at home and more open to the lure of life in America.

Meanwhile, growing immigrant communities have made settling here a more attractive choice. Of some 11 million illegal immigrants in the United States, only 2.4 million are single men, while nearly half are couples and many have children. Legal migrants are even more rooted.

The bottom line: It won't help to bring our quotas more into line with the size of the immigrant flow if we don't also craft a policy in keeping with the way these workers behave -- and today that means accepting the reality that many will want to settle permanently in the United States.

But that's not all. Admitting foreign workers on a strictly temporary basis would also violate American traditions -- our democratic values and our history as a nation of immigrants -- and it would be deeply unpopular with the voting public.

The Manhattan Institute and the National Immigration Forum recently conducted a series of focus groups testing two contrasting options: a guest worker program or a more traditional immigration plan based on the idea of citizenship. The results ran sharply counter to the expectations of policymakers in Washington. Democrats and Republicans alike overwhelmingly preferred the citizenship model for reasons of both principle and practicality. It might make sense initially, these voters said, to admit workers on a provisional basis. It might also make sense to create incentives for the more transient to go home at the end of their work stints. But if they worked hard, put down roots and invested in their communities, wouldn't we want to encourage them to stay? Don't we want immigrants to assimilate? Don't we want to attract the kind of hard-working, committed folks who plan for the future and invest?

The answer is, of course, that we do. This isn't just the American way, it's also the antidote to many of our worst fears about immigration: Sojourners with no stake in the future are going to be much less likely to learn English or buy their own homes or make an effort to move up on the job.

Sure, a citizenship plan looks like a bigger gamble; like the workers, the changes that come with it will be permanent. But surely it would be better to face up to that change and shape it in a way consistent with our values. Rather than a one-size-fits-all guest worker program, we need a system that leaves room for workers to choose, welcoming those who feel they belong and who work their way up and make our country stronger as they do.

Kiss Me, I'm Illegal (NYT)

By Paul Vitello

MURKY self-described patriot groups call them "terrorists." On combative talk radio shows the term is "illegal aliens." Advocates for immigrants prefer the Emma Lazarus-evoking "economic refugees."

The most common label attached to the estimated 12 million foreign-born people living in the United States without visas may be "illegal immigrants," even though some grammarians argue that the adjective can modify actions and things (like left turns and hallucinogenic drugs) but not people. President Bush, a proponent of offering citizenship to at least some of them, has used the more optimistic and implicitly promising term "undocumented immigrants."

There is an almost magical power in naming things. To give a person, an act or a group its name is to define it, assert a measure of control over how it is perceived. (See Adam, in Genesis 2:20, who "gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field." Also, see the playbooks of most campaign managers.)

Like the battles over civil rights and abortion, the contest over immigration has been joined as much in the naming of things as in the writing of laws. Consider the labyrinth of language in play as Congress grapples with an overhaul of immigration policy, its effort to fix what is widely considered a broken system of deciding how many and which foreigners are allowed to enter, work in or become citizens of the United States.

Tumbling in the air of the debate like so many juggled balls are enough words and catch phrases — some old, some new — to form a peculiar dialect of the national ambivalence: Guest workers. Willing workers. America's security. Permanent temporary residents. Immigrant smuggling syndicate. Earned legalization. Virtual fence. Birthright citizenship abuse (coined by lawmakers who would cancel the citizenship rights of children born here to illegal immigrants). Anchor babies (the term coined for such children). Police state (what Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York says would result if illegal immigration were criminalized). Two-time losers (Justice Antonin Scalia's phrase for illegal immigrants who are deported twice — one such immigrant brought a case heard by the court last week).

George Lakoff, a linguistics professor at the University of California at Berkeley and author of "Don't Think of an Elephant: Know Your Values and Frame the Debate," says the different language used in any public policy debate is ultimately a contest for the public mind. "Metaphors repeated often enough eventually become part of your physical brain," he said. "Use the word 'illegal' often enough, which suggests criminal, which suggests immoral, and you have framed the issue of immigration to a remarkable degree."

Every side, of course, claims that its choice of words is not only correct but a reflection of the literal truth. Those favoring more restrictive laws, for instance, assert that people who violate immigration laws are, de facto, illegal residents.

"Immigration is such an emotional issue at this point that every word is being hotly contested," said Frank Sherry, executive director of the National Immigration Forum, a group based in Washington that advocates a liberalized policy. "You know where people stand pretty much from the language they use," said Mr. Sherry, who uses the term "undocumented immigrants."

A House bill that would stiffen penalties for unauthorized immigration adds yet another term to the list of synonyms for the illegal immigrant: felon. Under that bill, which led to protests in Washington, Chicago and San Francisco a couple of weeks ago, illegal immigrants would be charged with aggravated felony and face five years in prison.

A Senate bill produced yet more terminology — earned legalization — which would apply to illegal immigrants who pay their back taxes and stiff fines, promise to learn English and wait in line. Earned legalization is not to be confused with amnesty, a word in the immigration debate that is a bugaboo to all sides, on the theory that rewarding illegal behavior would only lead to more of it.

The language can be so arcane that even people who track immigration policy might have been hard pressed to follow the conversation on ABC's "This Week" between the host, George Stephanopoulos, and the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist. In one 10-second exchange, Mr. Frist said he was for enforcement, and Mr. Stephanopoulos asked if Mr. Frist was also for guest worker, to which Mr. Frist replied that he was for guest worker but against amnesty.

Enforcement, in the debate, is code for border security. The enforcement-only bill passed by the House focuses exclusively on tightening border security. It authorizes the building of a 700-mile fence, or the deployment of electronic devices and drone aircraft to create a "virtual fence." It does not establish a guest worker program.

The enforcement-plus bills under review in the Senate (there are three, with a fourth pending) tighten border security and create versions of a guest worker program. (In Washington, to be in favor of "enforcement-only" or "enforcement-plus" is to state one's immigration weltanschauung.)

As for the meaning of "guest worker" in the enforcement-plus universe, it depends. It can signify a long-term foreign worker who might eventually become a citizen. It can also indicate someone who works for two years with no such expectation, and then goes home. It can be a seasonal worker who goes home after every harvest. And in the most restrictive version, it is perhaps a little like the homey status of the political prisoners in Frank O'Connor's short story "Guests of the Nation." The prisoners are treated like friends of the family until one is ordered executed in the national interest.

Ultimately, there may be no neutral language possible in the immigration debate — any more than there is in other emotionally charged human interaction, said Deborah Tannen, a professor of linguistics at Georgetown University and the author of the best-selling "You're Wearing That? Understanding Mothers and Daughters in Conversation." Ms. Tannen claims no special expertise about immigration, but she knows communication. "People cling to words, and use them, as a way of showing whose side they're on, who their people are," she said.

Guillermo Gómez-Peña, a performance artist and writer born in Mexico known for his observations about the cultural life of the border, has coined his own term for the movement of people, legally or illegally, temporarily or permanently, willingly or not, from south of the border to the north. In a recent performance, he mordantly referred to it all as "original sin."

Making Sense Of Immigration (LAT)

THERE ARE TWO SCHOOLS of thought in Washington on immigration reform. The negative one bemoans the fact that, after George Bush pushed the issue early on in his presidency, populist scare-politics have hijacked the effort, as evidenced by the absurd bill passed in the House of Representatives in December.

The more positive one marvels at the fact that despite this misdirection, there still appears a sliver of a chance for sensible legislation that would address the nation's need for immigrant workers without turning them into criminals.

Reason is still trying to prevail in the Senate, where a compromise bill by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) may be considered this week. The Specter proposal, which is still being fleshed out, incorporates much of the White House's thinking on the issue, as well as features from legislation by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.). But it faces long odds, especially in light of the split within the Republican Party on immigration.

The party's own Senate majority leader, Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), is fighting the White House, threatening to advance alternative legislation that apes the House's nonsensical bill, which is all about enforcing border security without adopting any type of guest-worker program. The subtext here is that Frist, as he did in the Terri Schiavo tragedy, is pandering to the far right in preparation for his 2008 presidential bid, though conservative Republicans should know better than to try outlawing the supply of labor while ignoring the demand for it.

The Specter compromise is a practical, fair and sensible approach to immigration, making it very different from the reflexive xenophobia we've come to expect from this session of Congress. It focuses both on tightening border security and creating a program that allows the millions of people already in the country illegally to obtain guest-worker permits.

The bill does not give a free pass to illegal immigrants. Employers would have to demonstrate that U.S. workers wouldn't take the position offered to the guest worker. Once the visa has expired, probably after six years, the workers could apply for U.S. citizenship, but their applications would be processed after those of legal immigrants waiting in line, and they would have to pay hefty fines. Thus, contrary to the accusations of opponents, the law would by no means reward people who came to this country illegally, nor is it unfair to those who played by the rules.

Immigration is among the thorniest of issues for Republicans, with their business-oriented base heavily in favor of a guest-worker program and their social conservative base wanting to build a wall across the border and kick the illegals out. The split is complicated by President Bush's weakness, upcoming congressional elections and the 2008 presidential race.

But the Senate as an institution has an opportunity, and an obligation, to rise above Washington's preelection silly season and pass immigration legislation that reflects the country's real needs, not its baser instincts.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

War May Hurt GOP In Heartland (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Johanna Neuman, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Democrats hope that souring public opinion will swing parts of the country their way.

SEYMOUR, Ind. — As Liz Larrison cooks up breakfast for customers at her family's diner in a farm town long friendly to the Republican Party, she listens as the regulars sling political opinions as easily as she slings ham steaks.

Increasingly, the talk these days revolves around Iraq, and it is the kind of talk that could spell trouble for the GOP.

"Nobody is against the people fighting the war. I think you'll hear that everywhere," she said. "We're just against it going on and on."

On top of other woes confronting Republicans, the continuing violence in Iraq and President Bush's message last week that the deployment would last several more years has heightened Republicans' concerns about how voters such as Larrison will view the party in the November elections.

In fact, Larrison — who, like many of her customers, considers herself independent but tends to vote for Republicans — says she will vote against her Republican congressman.

Even in the heartland, Democrats suddenly see advantage on an issue that is usually considered a GOP trump card: national security.

Baron Hill, who hopes to unseat the Republican who represents this region of Indiana, said it used to be hard for Democrats to criticize the Iraq war without sounding unpatriotic.

"Not anymore," Hill said in an interview. "I think people are very skeptical now about what is going on over there, and you have more freedom to talk about Iraq."

A Fox News poll this month showed the war in a statistical tie with spending and taxes as voters' top concerns heading into election season. And 50% of respondents to a recent Newsweek poll said they would like to see Democrats take control of Congress; 34% said they would like to see it remain in Republican hands.

It's too soon to conclude whether the political winds will blow against Republicans all the way until election day in November. But with bad news about Iraq beginning to penetrate deep in the heartland, Democrats are hoping that parts of the country that swung Republican in recent years will swing Democratic again.

"All you need is a weak Republican year for Democrats to be competitive in southern Indiana," said political scientist Bill Blomquist of Indiana University-Purdue University Indianapolis. "And this is a weak Republican year."

The equation is true elsewhere as Republicans try to repel Democratic efforts to seize control of the House and Senate this year.

Two years ago in Kentucky, Republican Rep. Anne M. Northup wrapped herself in the American flag, held hands with the president, and defeated a popular Democrat in part by suggesting that his antiwar views would leave America unprotected.

This time, Democratic challenger Andrew Horne — one of more than 50 war veterans running for Congress as Democrats — is betting that public opinion has so soured against the war in Iraq in this horse-country swing district that it's now safe for him to run against Northup's support for the war.

He registered as a Democrat for the first time in December, when he announced his candidacy.

At the Red Barn, a social hall at the University of Louisville, Horne, a Marine who served in Iraq, spent hours working the crowd last week along with his wife, Stephanie.

"War is not the most important question for this district, but that's what gets me in the door," he said in an interview.

His message — that the Bush administration's handling of the war is symptomatic of a series of leadership failures — seemed to resonate with students.

Sophomore Dennis Chaney said he was a registered Republican and planned to support Horne. Like the candidate, he sees the administration's actions on Iraq as emblematic: "They're corrupt, so they lied about the war," he said.

Challenging Horne in the May 16 Democratic primary is a better-known candidate: John Yarmuth, a liberal who founded an alternative newspaper in Louisville.

But no one counts out Northup, a fierce competitor and skillful fundraiser who has delivered economic benefits to her district. Despite seeing antiwar protesters on her front lawn in Louisville every Sunday, Northup said, she sensed little change in the mood of constituents.

"Nobody thinks we should just leave," she said of U.S. troops in Iraq. But in a softer moment she demurred: "I'm not saying, 'No matter what it costs.' But I still have hope that it's not only possible, it's likely we'll succeed."

In Indiana, Republican Mike Sodrel unseated a Democrat in 2004 and now represents the state's 9th District, which includes Seymour. Like Northup, Sodrel — a trucking company owner who won by 1,425 votes out of more than 280,000 cast — is struggling to find the right balance between "staying the course" in Iraq and expressing his concern over the ongoing losses.

In travels around his district during a congressional recess last week, Sodrel was asked often about Iraq. Though he supports the president — and stood side-by-side with Bush at a public fundraiser Friday — he emphasized not only progress but also his hopes for withdrawal.

"The goal isn't to have an Iraq that is bomb-free or incident-free before we can leave," Sodrel told students at Shawe Memorial High School in Madison, Ind. "We just have to have a government that is stable enough and a military that is trained enough and a society that is cohesive enough."

A few hours later, speaking at Hanover College in Hanover, Ind., his pitch was more direct: "I would like to see a serious withdrawal as soon as this government is formed."

The tone appeared to work with his audience. Some said it sounded as if Sodrel had changed his position on the war.

But Sodrel said that his support for the president and the war hadn't flagged and that he was not worried about Bush's sagging poll numbers. Sodrel faces a fierce rematch with Hill, who represented the district for three terms in Congress before Sodrel ousted him in 2004.

While in Congress, Hill voted to authorize the invasion of Iraq. He considers his vote — and his story about how he believes he was misled by the administration — to be an advantage with voters, he said.

Hill said he had planned to vote against the war resolution until he was invited to the Pentagon for a top-secret briefing from Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. There, Hill said, he was shown intelligence that suggested Iraq had the ability to attack the United States with weapons of mass destruction using unmanned aircraft.

That briefing "was a deliberate misrepresentation," Hill said, and his message to Indiana's independent-minded voters will be that "it's healthy for us to be skeptical."

Similar themes are cropping up in eastern Pennsylvania, where Republican Rep. Jim Gerlach is fighting for reelection in the state's 6th District.

Mindful that the district voted Democratic in the last two presidential elections, local GOP leaders are playing down their candidate's party loyalty and portraying him as a centrist who puts constituent interests ahead of party politics.

"This is going to be one of the interesting case studies nationally of how far he can run away from the president," said Chris Borick, director of the Muhlenberg College Institute of Public Opinion in Allentown, Pa. "One of the things he's going to have to do is make clear … that he is not in lock step with the White House."

In the end, the biggest hurdle for incumbent Republicans across the country might not be their Democratic challengers but voter turnout. Fewer people vote in midterm elections at the best of times.

Former Seymour Mayor Bill Bailey predicted that many Republicans might not bother to vote this year.

"With this Iraq war, every month that goes by, it becomes tougher for Sodrel or any other Republican who rode in on Bush's coattails," Bailey said. "I think you'll see a lot of people stay home."

Debating Bush Censure Serves Dueling Purposes Ronald Brownstein (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Maybe to save money and reduce duplication, MoveOn.org and the Republican National Committee should just hire the same ad agency.

Usually, the RNC and MoveOn, the giant online liberal advocacy group, go at it hammer and tongs. But they have found common cause of a sort. Both are highlighting the resolution by Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.) asking the Senate to censure President Bush for authorizing warrantless surveillance by the National Security Agency.

Feingold and his resolution dominated prime real estate on the websites of both MoveOn.org and the RNC. Possibly not since an unknown Bruce Springsteen simultaneously scored the covers of Time and Newsweek three decades ago has any public figure landed such an unlikely twofer.

MoveOn, of course, championed Feingold's idea, and the RNC condemned it. But both want it in the voters' minds as the elections approach.

One group has been conspicuously absent from that consensus: most Democrats in Washington. Their objections to Feingold's gambit are both substantive and political. Although sharing his concern about the legality of the NSA program, some worry about formally sanctioning another president so soon after the Republican Congress impeached Bill Clinton. Others complain that Feingold's resolution diverts the debate from the surveillance program itself to whether it is appropriate to officially rebuke the commander in chief at a time of war (as Republicans like to put it).

It's an understatement to say Feingold's proposal doesn't fit with his party's emerging election strategy. In a narrow sense, many Democrats would rather focus on Iraq than on the NSA surveillance, on which polls show Bush enjoys greater support.

On a broader level, Democratic leaders are drifting toward a midterm message that indicts Bush more on grounds of competence (on issues such as Iraq, Hurricane Katrina and prescription drugs) than ideology. It wasn't a coincidence when three senior Senate Democrats marked the third anniversary of the Iraq war last weekend by employing variations on the phrase "dangerous incompetence" to describe Bush's record there.

Such language is a tip-off that Democrats want Americans to cast their ballots this November looking backward, at the missteps and setbacks that have depressed Bush's approval ratings to anemic levels.

A focus on ideology, by contrast, inherently tilts the election forward: It asks voters to decide which side has a better plan to move ahead. Most Democratic leaders seem leery about that approach.

Not Feingold. He and his allies, such as MoveOn, believe Democrats should present clear, confrontational alternatives to Bush (like censure) that will inspire a large turnout from the party's base. "Our biggest problem is Democrats, all over America, saying: 'Why don't you guys ever stand up?' " Feingold insists.

Eli Pariser, executive director of MoveOn's political action committee, seconds Feingold. Promoting censure, Pariser says, will convince voters that "Democrats are strong and will take principled positions."

Republican strategists, perhaps over-optimistically, welcome such talk. They insist their prospects will improve if Democrats present a sharper alternative this fall. Republicans want voters to see the election more as a choice than a referendum.

That's one reason Republicans are drawing attention to Feingold's censure idea. The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing on it Friday. Almost daily, the RNC issues statements charging that Feingold's resolution is the first step in a Democratic plan to impeach Bush if the party recaptures the House.

Those jabs are designed mostly to energize the Republican base. But they are also likely to be one of many GOP efforts this year to persuade voters that Democrats can't be trusted with power.

The censure debate carries implications for 2008 too. Feingold, who appears likely to seek the Democratic presidential nomination, is positioning himself as the next Howard Dean: the truth-teller willing to confront Bush when a spineless party establishment won't. In that sense, Feingold may welcome opposition to the resolution from his Democratic colleagues (whom he didn't notify before introducing it two weeks ago). The more they oppose him, the more they prove his point.

Feingold's ambitions, and ideals, help explain his call for censure. But the debate also seems the nearly inevitable product of Washington's unending spiral of conflict.

The resolution wasn't the first punch in this fight. It followed months of frustration among Senate Democrats over the White House's refusal to provide meaningful answers about the NSA program and the unwillingness of most Senate Republicans to demand them.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is exploring the program's legal justification, but shortly before Feingold introduced his proposal, the Senate Intelligence Committee, on a party-line vote, rejected an investigation of the program's operation. The same day, four Senate Republicans introduced legislation to legalize the program with little change.

Feingold said those decisions convinced him that the possibility of serious accountability or change "had been completely shut down." So he rolled his grenade into the tent. With that, Feingold successfully blasted the dispute back into the headlines.

Now, the question is whether everyone involved wants to find solutions — or just escalate further. A showdown over censure promises unnecessary division. But so does the prospect of Republicans imposing a GOP-only solution to the NSA controversy.

The country needs a stable strategy for collecting intelligence on terrorists, and that will come only with a bipartisan consensus on the balance between civil liberties and national security. Whether the Senate endorses, rejects or ignores Feingold's resolution, the job of fashioning such a durable accommodation will still be waiting.

Censure Resolution Could Pay Off For Feingold (GBPG/AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer, Associated Press

Green Bay Press Gazette, March 26, 2006

WASHINGTON — So far, only two Senate Democrats have embraced Sen. Russ Feingold's call for censuring President Bush. But most Democratic voters favor the proposal, a national poll shows, suggesting the move might pay off for Feingold as he ponders a presidential race.

Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat, insists that his proposal has nothing to do with his own political ambitions. But he does challenge Democrats who argue that it will help energize the Republican base.

"Those Democrats said that within two minutes of my announcing my idea," Feingold said in a telephone interview last week. "I don't see any serious evidence of that."

Feingold's resolution would censure Bush for authorizing a warrantless surveillance program, which the senator contends is illegal. The White House argues that Bush was authorized to do so under his powers as commander in chief. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, and Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., are the only senators who have co-sponsored the resolution.

A Newsweek poll taken March 16-17 found that 50 percent of those surveyed opposed censure while 42 percent supported it, but among Democrats, 60 percent supported it.

Feingold said his sole purpose was holding Bush accountable, but he argued it was also good politics.

"These Democratic pundits are all scared of the Republican base getting energized, but they're willing to pay the price of not energizing the Democratic base," he said. "It's an overly defensive and meek approach to politics."

Some Democrats have called the proposal a distraction, especially at a time when the Bush administration was on the ropes over Iraq and a since-scuttled port deal.

"It just takes us off discussions we ought to be having in this country on issues that really matter in people's lives," said Rep. Sherrod Brown, a liberal Democrat from Ohio who is running for Senate.

Republicans have been thanking Feingold for what they consider a political fumble.

"This is such a gift," Rush Limbaugh said on his radio show. The National Review came to an identical conclusion. In an online editorial titled, "Feingold's Gift to the GOP," the conservative magazine wrote that Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman would hug Feingold if given the chance.

During a visit to Wisconsin last week, Mehlman skipped the hug and instead criticized Feingold's proposal. That reinforced an RNC radio buy in the state, in which a narrator says, "Call Russ Feingold and ask him why he's more interested in censuring the president than protecting our freedom."

The RNC even makes Feingold its poster child, featuring a photo of him on its Web site pointing his finger, next to the words, "Democrats Want To Censure President Bush For Fighting The War on Terror."

Feingold's response, essentially, is bring it on.

"I welcome their attempt to make a campaign issue of the question of whether there will be accountability for the president's breaking the law," he said. "They will remind people every minute that the president thumbed his nose at the law. So I hope they do it. I hope they do it every day. You know why? It will be a flop."

"And I honestly believe that, in fact, he's winning this debate right now," Kristol said on "Fox News Sunday." "... Suddenly everyone is talking about warrantless wiretapping."

Still, Republicans argue that the issue will help them in this year's midterm congressional elections.

"The bottom line is that Republicans have worked with President Bush to enact policies that kept America safe during the war on terror," said Brian Nick, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

For Some Who Solve Puzzle, Medicare Drug Plan Pays Off (NYT)

By Robert Pear

TULSA, Okla., March 21 — When Virginia G. Shores went to a pharmacy here to pick up five prescriptions, she thought she heard the pharmacist say she owed $250, but she was wrong. The cost, with her new Medicare prescription drug card, was just $50.

"I was flabbergasted," said Mrs. Shores, whose kitchen counter looks like a medicine chest, full of pills for high blood pressure, heart failure, arthritis, nerve pain and lung disease.

Mrs. Shores, 80, had been buying medicines from a mail-order pharmacy in Winnipeg, Manitoba, but now uses Medicare instead. "I was amazed at the amount of money it saved," Mrs. Shores said. "It was hard to believe."

She is one of Medicare's satisfied customers. They are not vocal, they are not organized, but they say it was worth wading through the confusion and complexity of the new program to enroll.

Treasury Department figures show that Medicare spent a total of $5.1 billion on prescription drug benefits in January and February, the first months of the new program, which is expected to cost more than $675 billion over 10 years. Medicare officials say the program is paying for more than a million prescriptions a day.

One way to assess the program is to talk to people in a place like Tulsa. People here are far removed from the raucous debate in Washington, where Republicans describe the drug benefit as a boon to older Americans and many Democrats call it a disaster.

The experience of those who have enrolled is particularly significant because millions of Medicare beneficiaries face a May 15 deadline for signing up. Current beneficiaries who decide to join after that date will generally have to wait until Nov. 15 and will then pay higher premiums as a penalty for late enrollment.

In Oklahoma, Medicare beneficiaries can choose from 43 prescription drug plans, with premiums ranging from $10.07 to $70.79 a month, different co-payments and very different lists of covered drugs.

Satisfied beneficiaries say they could never have analyzed the options or made a choice without the help of friends and relatives, pharmacists or counselors from groups like LIFE Senior Services, a private nonprofit group, which offers advice at seminars and enrollment clinics in the Tulsa area.

The counselors are adept at using the Medicare Web site to compare drug plans and identify the ones with the lowest overall annual cost for a particular beneficiary. Before selecting a plan, a beneficiary typically must spend an hour with a counselor, but some spend much more time.

For example, Bobby G. Brown, a retired letter carrier, and his wife, Anna, both 71, spent four hours with a LIFE counselor. "It was well worth the time," said Mrs. Brown, who is being treated for congestive heart failure, rheumatoid arthritis, lupus, high cholesterol, depression and other ailments.

He takes 6 drugs; she takes 18. They enrolled in different plans — WellCare's Signature plan and the basic plan offered by Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Oklahoma — and their combined drug costs will plunge to $4,900 or less a year, from more than $25,000.

Mrs. Brown, 71, had been relying on free samples from doctors for some expensive medications, but she found it demeaning to ask for them. "You get the feeling you're a beggar," she said.

The satisfaction of some beneficiaries stands in contrast to the frustration of many others, who were overcharged or unable to get essential medicines in the first chaotic weeks of the program.

"People who are satisfied are the quieter voices," said Leslie A. Dick, executive director of the Burgundy Place retirement community in Tulsa.

Many beneficiaries say they are grateful to local insurance counselors, rather than to Medicare, the government or politicians.

"We had a whole lot better deal before the government started messing with it," said Francis A. Murphy, 79, a retired airline mechanic who is losing drug benefits from a former employer. He said he did not expect to see any savings under Medicare. Beneficiaries are anxious about their choices for good reason. Their out-of-pocket costs under different plans can vary by hundreds or thousands of dollars a year.

Jack L. Coffey, associate dean of the University of Oklahoma College of Pharmacy, owns four drugstores. "In a majority of cases, I have seen some reduction in costs to the patient," Mr. Coffey said. "But for some people, their medications will cost them more."

People may pay more if they already had good coverage, from Medicaid or private insurance, or if they select a Medicare drug plan that does not cover the drugs they need.

Even those who save money may complain because the new program is "much too complicated for a lot of people to understand," Mr. Coffey said.

Todd E. Pendergraft, owner of a Medicine Shoppe pharmacy in Broken Arrow, Okla., outside Tulsa, said the new drug coverage was "significantly beneficial" to one-third of his 750 Medicare patients, "marginally beneficial" to half the patients and "no benefit at all" to the remainder.

People satisfied with the new drug benefit appear to share these characteristics:

They did not sign up for one plan and then switch to another.

They did not rely on advertising or their own instincts, but got help from Medicare experts, insurance counselors or computer-savvy friends and relatives, who used the automated "plan finder" at the medicare.gov Web site.

They are not on Medicaid, the federal-state program for the poor. People eligible for both Medicaid and Medicare had comprehensive drug coverage under Medicaid, but lost it on Jan. 1 and were assigned at random to private Medicare drug plans. The Medicare plans may charge slightly higher co-payments and often cover fewer drugs.

In addition, Medicare beneficiaries are more likely to appreciate the new benefit if they live in places like Oklahoma that did not have generous state-financed programs to help them with their drug costs. Drug benefits have been available for years to low-income people through state programs in Maine, New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania, among other states.

Dr. M. Jean Root, a geriatrician in Tulsa with several hundred Medicare patients, said: "About half of my patients say they like the new benefit and are saving money. The people most likely to benefit have enough education and perseverance to navigate the system, which is extremely convoluted and complex. Or they have friends and relatives to help them."

But Dr. Root said, "The other half of my patients, including those with dementia and terminal illnesses, don't have the energy, the interest or the mental capacity to work through the system."

Counselors are reaching a small fraction of all beneficiaries. Carol H. Carter, a spokeswoman for LIFE Senior Services, said: "Many beneficiaries are terrified of making the wrong decision and overwhelmed by having so many choices. The only reliable way to compare plans is on the Medicare Web site, and that in itself is scary to some seniors."

DOJ_NMG_0021884

Beneficiaries could face new problems in coming months. Insurers can impose stricter limits on access to certain drugs after March 31, when a 90-day transition period ends. In addition, some beneficiaries will have to pay more at the pharmacy counter, because most drug plans have a gap in coverage after a person's total drug costs reach $2,250. The gap lasts until the beneficiary incurs total drug costs of $5,100. Beyond that point, Medicare pays about 95 percent of the cost of each prescription.

Still, counselors say, many beneficiaries will come out ahead if they enroll.

Those who have signed up say the total cost of all their drugs under Medicare is often less than the amount they were paying for just one prescription in the past.

Mary N. Hooser, 89, of Sapulpa, Okla., takes eight medications for heart disease, ulcers, depression and early signs of Alzheimer's disease. Her children had been chipping in to cover the cost, $476 a month, including $155 for the Alzheimer's drug. Under Medicare, the cost for all her drugs is less than $100 a month.

"This is a tremendous help to my mother and me," said Mrs. Hooser's 73-year-old daughter, Mary L. Ward.

Charlene G. Bandurski, who had polio as a young child, was not enthusiastic about the prospect of signing up for the Medicare drug benefit. Indeed, she said: "I looked forward to it with dread. We had heard that it was a mess, and so confusing."

But since signing up in December, Ms. Bandurski said, she has been pleasantly surprised. "For a medicine that cost $120, we now pay $20," she said. "At first, you don't believe it. It's almost like it's too good to be true."

Dems Lambast Prescription Drug Benefit (AP)

AP, March 26, 2006

Seniors need another six months to sign up for the Medicare prescription drug benefit, a Democratic congressman who's also a pharmacist said Saturday.

Rep. Marion Berry (news, bio, voting record) of Arkansas also said the government needs to think long and hard about meaningful Medicare reform.

Berry said people eligible for the prescription benefit are confused by the various offerings, and some are even paying more for medicine now than they were before they joined the program.

"We need to extend the sign-up period by six months to give seniors more time to make sense of this benefit, and we need to eliminate the Bush administration's prescription drug tax," Berry said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

May 15 is the deadline for enrolling in the new Medicare drug benefit plan, which was enacted by Congress in 2003. People who sign up later probably will have to pay higher premiums.

Seniors complain they're confused by the myriad of private options offered in the prescription drug program. Many poor people ran into problems when they were switched over from their drug benefits within Medicaid, the health insurance program for the poor, to the Medicare drug benefit.

And many pharmacists are struggling because they haven't been paid for drugs administered by the program, Berry said.

"I will never forget one conversation I had with a pharmacist from DeWitt, Ark., who had given away $60,000 in free medications in just one week because he knew his customers might die if they did not receive their refill that day. Medicare Part D is the FEMA of health care," Berry said.

Medicare could bargain for lower drug prices to save money for the government and for the elderly, he said.

"Every American deserves the best health care we can provide. We do not have to accept a failed benefit and we do not have to tolerate a culture of corruption or leaders who are afraid to admit their mistakes. Democrats have the answer, and under a Democratic Congress, we will give seniors the prescription drug benefit they were promised years ago. Together we can do better," Berry said.

Schools Cut Back Subjects To Push Reading And Math (NYT)

By Sam Dillon

SACRAMENTO — Thousands of schools across the nation are responding to the reading and math testing requirements laid out in No Child Left Behind, President Bush's signature education law, by reducing class time spent on other subjects and, for some low-proficiency students, eliminating it.

Schools from Vermont to California are increasing — in some cases tripling — the class time that low-proficiency students spend on reading and math, mainly because the federal law, signed in 2002, requires annual exams only in those subjects and punishes schools that fall short of rising benchmarks.

The changes appear to principally affect schools and students who test below grade level.

The intense focus on the two basic skills is a sea change in American instructional practice, with many schools that once offered rich curriculums now systematically trimming courses like social studies, science and art. A nationwide survey by a nonpartisan group that is to be made public on March 28 indicates that the practice, known as narrowing the curriculum, has become standard procedure in many communities.

The survey, by the Center on Education Policy, found that since the passage of the federal law, 71 percent of the nation's 15,000 school districts had reduced the hours of instructional time spent on history, music and other subjects to open up more time for reading and math. The center is an independent group that has made a thorough study of the new act and has published a detailed yearly report on the implementation of the law in dozens of districts.

"Narrowing the curriculum has clearly become a nationwide pattern," said Jack Jennings, the president of the center, which is based in Washington.

At Martin Luther King Jr. Junior High School in Sacramento, about 150 of the school's 885 students spend five of their six class periods on math, reading and gym, leaving only one 55-minute period for all other subjects.

About 125 of the school's lowest-performing students are barred from taking anything except math, reading and gym, a measure that Samuel Harris, a former lieutenant colonel in the Army who is the school's principal, said was draconian but necessary. "When you look at a kid and you know he can't read, that's a tough call you've got to make," Mr. Harris said.

The increasing focus on two basic subjects has divided the nation's educational establishment. Some authorities, including Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings, say the federal law's focus on basic skills is raising achievement in thousands of low-performing schools. Other experts warn that by reducing the academic menu to steak and potatoes, schools risk giving bored teenagers the message that school means repetition and drilling.

"Only two subjects? What a sadness," said Thomas Sobol, an education professor at Columbia Teachers College and a former New York State education commissioner. "That's like a violin student who's only permitted to play scales, nothing else, day after day, scales, scales, scales. They'd lose their zest for music."

But officials in Cuero, Tex., have adopted an intensive approach and said it was helping them meet the federal requirements. They have doubled the time that all sixth graders and some seventh and eighth graders devote to reading and math, and have reduced it for other subjects.

"When you only have so many hours per day and you're behind in some area that's being hammered on, you have to work on that," said Henry Lind, the schools superintendent. "It's like basketball. If you can't make layups, then you've got to work on layups."

Chad Colby, a spokesman for the federal Department of Education, said the department neither endorsed nor criticized schools that concentrated instructional time on math and reading as they sought to meet the test benchmarks laid out in the federal law's accountability system, known as adequate yearly progress.

"We don't choose the curriculum," Mr. Colby said. "That's a decision that local leaders have to make. But for every school you point to, I can show you five other schools across the country where students are still taking a well-rounded curriculum and are still making adequate yearly progress. I don't think it's unreasonable to ask our schools to get kids proficient at grade level in reading and math."

Since America's public schools began taking shape in the early 1800's, shifting fashions have repeatedly reworked the curriculum. Courses like woodworking and sewing joined the three R's. After World War I, vocational courses, languages and other subjects broadened the instructional menu into a smorgasbord.

A federal law passed after the Russian launching of Sputnik in 1957 spurred a renewed emphasis on science and math, and a 1975 law that guaranteed educational rights for the disabled also provoked sweeping change, said William Reese, a professor at the University of Wisconsin and author of "America's Public Schools: From the Common School to No Child Left Behind." But the education law has leveraged one of the most abrupt instructional shifts, he said.

"Because of its emphasis on testing and accountability in particular subjects, it apparently forces some school districts down narrow intellectual paths," Dr. Reese said. "If a subject is not tested, why teach it?"

The shift has been felt in the labor market, heightening demand for math teachers and forcing educators in subjects like art and foreign languages to search longer for work, leaders of teachers groups said.

The survey coming out this week looks at 299 school districts in 50 states. It was conducted as part of a four-year study of No Child Left Behind and appears to be the most systematic effort to track the law's footprints through the classroom, although other authorities had warned of its effect on teaching practices.

The historian David McCullough told a Senate Committee last June that because of the law, "history is being put on the back burner or taken off the stove altogether in many or most schools, in favor of math and reading."

The report says that at districts in Colorado, Texas, Vermont, California, Nebraska and elsewhere, math and reading are squeezing other subjects. At one district cited, the Bayonne City Schools in New Jersey, low-performing ninth graders will be barred from taking Spanish, music or any other elective next fall so they can take extra periods of math and reading, said Ellen O'Connor, an assistant superintendent.

"We're using that as a motivation," Dr. O'Connor said. "We're hoping they'll concentrate on their math and reading so they can again participate in some course they love."

At King Junior High, in a poor neighborhood in Sacramento a few miles from a decommissioned Air Force base, the intensive reading and math classes have raised test scores for several years running. That has helped Larry Buchanan, the superintendent of the Grant Joint Union High School District, which oversees the school, to be selected by an administrators' group as California's 2005 superintendent of the year.

But in spite of the progress, the school's scores on California state exams, used for compliance with the federal law, are increasing not nearly fast enough to allow the school to keep up with the rising test benchmarks. On the math exams administered last spring, for instance, 17.4 percent of students scored at the proficient level or above, and on the reading exams, only 14.9 percent.

With scores still so low, Mr. Harris, the school's principal, and Mr. Buchanan said they had little alternative but to continue remedial instruction for the lower-achieving among the school's nearly 900 students.

The students are the sons and daughters of mostly Hispanic, black and Laotian Hmong parents, many of whom work as gardeners, welders and hotel maids or are unemployed. The district administers frequent diagnostic tests so that teachers can carefully calibrate lessons to students' needs.

Rubén Jimenez, a seventh grader whose father is a construction laborer, has a schedule typical of many students at the school, with six class periods a day, not counting lunch.

Rubén studies English for the first three periods, and pre-algebra and math during the fourth and fifth. His sixth period is gym. How does he enjoy taking only reading and math, a recent visitor asked.

"I don't like history or science anyway," Rubén said. But a moment later, perhaps recalling something exciting he had heard about lab science, he sounded ambivalent.

"It'd be fun to dissect something," he said.

Martín Lara, Rubén's teacher, said the intense focus on math was paying off because his math skills were solidifying. Rubén said math had become his favorite subject.

But other students, like Paris Smith, an eighth grader, were less enthusiastic. Last semester, Paris failed one of the two math classes he takes, back to back, each morning.

"I hate having two math classes in a row," Paris said. "Two hours of math is too much. I can't concentrate that long."

Donna Simmons, his mother, said Mr. Lara seemed to be working hard to help Paris understand math.

"The school cares," Ms. Simmons said. "The faculty cares. I want him to keep trying."

Sydney Smith, a vice principal who oversees instruction at the school, said she had heard only minimal grumbling from students excluded from electives.

"I've only had about two students come to my office and say: 'What in the world? I'm just taking two courses?' " Ms. Smith said. "So most students are not complaining about being miserable."

But Lorie Turner, who teaches English to some pupils for three consecutive periods and to others for two periods each day, said she used some students' frustration to persuade them to try for higher scores on the annual exams administered under California's Standardized Testing and Reporting program, known as Star.

"I have some little girls who are dying to get out of this class and get into a mainstream class," Ms. Turner said. "But I tell them the only way out is to do better on that Star test."

U.S. Planning Base On Moon To Prepare For Trip To Mars (WP)

By Guy Gugliotta

Scientists Hard at Work On Technological Hurdles

HOUSTON -- For the first time since 1972, the United States is planning to fly to the moon, but instead of a quick, Apollo-like visit, astronauts intend to build a permanent base and live there while they prepare what may be the most ambitious undertaking in history -- putting human beings on Mars.

President Bush in 2004 announced to great fanfare plans to build a new spaceship, get back to the moon by 2020 and travel on to Mars after that. But, with NASA focused on designing a new spaceship and spending about 40 percent of its budget on the troubled space shuttle and international space station programs, that timetable may suffer.

Still, NASA's moon planners are closely following the spaceship initiative and, within six months, will outline what they need from the new vehicle to enable astronauts to explore the lunar surface.

"It's deep in the future before we go there," said architect Larry Toups, head of habitation systems for NASA's Advanced Projects Office. "But it's like going on a camping trip and buying a new car. You want to make sure you have a trailer hitch if you need it."

Scientists and engineers are hard at work studying technologies that don't yet exist and puzzling over questions such as how to handle the psychological stress of moon settlement, how to build lunar bulldozers and how to reacquire what planetary scientist Christopher P. McKay of NASA's Ames Research Center calls "our culture of exploration."

The moon is not for the faint of heart. It is a lethal place, without atmosphere, pelted constantly by cosmic rays and micrometeorites, plagued by temperature swings of hundreds of degrees, and swathed in a blanket of dust that can ruin space suits, pollute the air supply and bring machinery to a screeching halt.

And that says nothing about the imponderables. Will working in one-sixth of Earth's gravity for a year cause crippling health problems? What happens when someone suffers from a traumatic injury that can't be treated by fellow astronauts? How do people react to living in a tiny space under dangerous conditions for six months?

"It's like Magellan. You send them off, and maybe they come back, maybe they don't," said planetary scientist Wendell W. Mendell, manager of NASA's Office for Human Exploration Science, during an interview at the recently concluded Lunar and Planetary Science Conference here. "There's a lot of pathologies that show up, and there's nobody in the Yellow Pages."

In some ways, the moon will be harder than Mars. Moon dust is much more abrasive than Mars dust; Mars has atmosphere; Mars has more gravity (one-third of Earth's); Mars has plenty of ice for a potential water supply, while the moon may have some, but probably not very much.

Still, the moon is ultimately much more forgiving because it is much closer -- 250,000 miles away, while Mars is 34 million miles from Earth at its closest point. If someone needs help on the moon, it takes three days to get there. By contrast, Mars will be several months away even with the help of advanced -- and as yet nonexistent -- propulsion systems.

Not having to pay as dearly for mistakes is one key reason why the moon is an integral part of the Bush initiative. The other, as even scientists point out, is that if the United States does not return to the moon, others will.

"The new thing is China, and they've announced they're going to the moon. The Europeans want to go; the Russians want to go; and if we don't go, maybe they'll go with the Chinese," Mars Institute Chairman Pascal Lee said in an interview. "Could we bypass the moon and go to Mars while India and China are going to the moon? I don't think so."

Bush's 2004 "Vision for Space Exploration," by calling for a lunar return and a subsequent Mars mission, set goals, which, if achieved, would keep the United States in the forefront of space exploration for decades.

Since then, mishaps and delays with the space shuttle and the space station programs have shrunk both the moon research budget and the rhetoric promoting the mission.

Instead, NASA Administrator Michael D. Griffin has focused agency attention and resources on the design and construction of a new "crew exploration vehicle" and its attendant rocketry -- the spacecraft that will push U.S. astronauts once again beyond low Earth orbit.

Despite the moon's current low profile, however, NASA continues to plan a lunar mission and to promote the technological advances needed to achieve it. Toups, one of the moon program's designers, said NASA envisions that a lunar presence, once achieved, will begin with two-to-four years of "sorties" to "targeted areas."

These early forays will resemble the six Apollo lunar missions, which ended in 1972. "You have four crew for seven to 10 days," Toups said in a telephone interview. "Then, if you found a site of particular interest, you would want to set up a permanent outpost there."

The south pole is currently the top target. It is a craggy and difficult area, but it is also the likeliest part of the lunar surface to have both permanent sunlight, for electric power, and ice, although many scientists have questions about how much ice there is. Without enough water, mission planners might pick a gentler landscape.

Site selection will mark the end of what McKay calls Apollo-style "camping trips." "There's got to be a lot more autonomy, so we keep it simple," McKay said. "We're going to be on Mars for a long time, and we have to use the moon to think in those terms."

The templates, cited frequently by moon mavens, are the U.S. bases in Antarctica, noteworthy for isolation, extreme environment, limited access, lack of indigenous population and no possibility of survival without extensive logistical support.

"The lunar base is not a 'colony,' " Lee said. " 'Colonization' implies populating the place, and that's not on the plate. This is a research outpost."

Once planners choose a base, the astronauts will immediately need to bring a host of technologies to bear, none of which currently exist. "Power is a big challenge," Toups said. Solar arrays are an obvious answer, but away from the poles 14 days of lunar sunlight are followed by 14 days of darkness, so "how do you handle the dormancy periods?"

Next is the spacesuit. Apollo suits weighed 270 pounds on Earth, a relatively comfortable "felt weight" of 40 to 50 pounds on the moon, but an unacceptable 102 pounds on Mars. "You can't haul that around, bend down or climb hills," Lee said. "Somehow we have to cut the mass of the current spacesuit in half."

And the new suit, unlike the Apollo suits or the current 300-pound shuttle suit, is going to have to be relatively easy to put on and take off, and to be able withstand the dreaded moon dust.

After three days, Apollo astronauts reported that the dust was causing the joints in their suits to jam, "and we're not talking about three outings," Lee said of the next moon missions. "We're talking about once a week for 500 days -- between 70 and 100 spacewalks."

Dealing with dust is also a major concern in building shelters on the lunar surface. Toups said it might be possible to harden the ground by microwaving it, creating a crust "like a tarp when you're camping." Otherwise, the dust pervades everything, and prolonged exposure could even lead to silicosis.

Dust also makes it virtually impossible to use any kind of machinery with ball bearings. Civil engineer Darryl J. Calkins, of the Army Corps of Engineers Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory, warned that the combination of dust, low gravity, temperature swings and the high cost of flying things to the moon is going to define the lunar tool kit in unforeseen ways.

"You can't put a diesel up there; you can't put a 20,000-pound bulldozer up there; and none of our oils or hydraulic fluids are going to survive," Calkins said in a telephone interview. "We may have to go back to the 19th century to find appropriate tools -- use cables, pulleys, levers."

And even then, it will be difficult to level a base site and haul away the fill because there's not enough gravity to give a tractor adequate purchase. Instead, Calkins envisions a device that can "scrape and shave" small amounts of soil and take it away bit by bit.

But in the end, "you have to learn how to do it, with real people," McKay said. "This is hard, but we can learn it. And if we do it right on the moon, we will be able to answer my ultimate question: Can Mars be habitable? I think the answer is 'yes.' "

The stock market was so somnolent last week that after five days and hundreds of billions of dollars of trading, the Dow Jones industrial average moved just a third of a point.

Not that it matters when the move is so small, but the Dow did advance -- to 11,279.97 from 11,279.65. The Nasdaq Stock Market composite index gained six points, closing at 2312.82. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell four points to 1302.95.

The market was encouraged by Thursday's report that sales of existing homes jumped in February, but that impact was offset a day later by news that new-home sales had slumped.

The new-home number is probably a better indicator of what's ahead. Sales of existing homes are reported after a sale closes. New-home sales are recorded after a sales contract is signed -- weeks or months before move-in.

Thus, the jump in sales of existing houses tells us people were buying earlier this year, while the new-home number reveals they're not buying as much now.

If people are buying fewer houses, they could be buying less of everything -- even stocks.

Grads See Rise In Job Offers (PPG)

By Anya Sostek

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 26, 2006

Colleges report best in years

When Shaun Byrnes graduated from college in 2001, he dropped off more than 200 resumes and was rewarded with two job offers.

Despite the fact that Mr. Byrnes had gotten an undergraduate degree from the Wharton School at the University of Pennsylvania, one of the most prestigious business programs in the country, neither job offered to him was in his preferred area of financial planning or asset management.

Oh, how times have changed. As Mr. Byrnes, 27, of Squirrel Hill, prepares to graduate this spring with a master's degree in information security policy and management from Carnegie Mellon University, he has multiple offers for government information technology jobs in Washington, D.C., which is exactly what he wants to do and where he wants to be.

As Mr. Byrnes and other college and graduate students can attest, after years of meager offerings, the job market is looking up, fueled by a national economy in its fifth year of expansion and a local economy expected to experience its first significant job growth since the late 1990s.

"We were the first year after the bust. We just didn't have much opportunity" Mr. Byrnes said of his 2001 job hunt. "It does seem like it's a lot easier this time around."

The National Association of Colleges and Employers reports a 14.5 percent jump in the number of new college graduates that companies nationwide expect to hire this year over last year, bringing hiring to its highest levels since 2001.

At the University of Pittsburgh career center last week, students were doing mock job interviews as part of Real World Week and picking up fliers listing careers for liberal arts majors such as classics and philosophy.

Marvin Roth, director of career services at Pitt, said the bottom started to fall out of the job market in 2001. "Each year thereafter," he said, "there's been a gradual increase in employer activity. Each year, we've seen ... improvement over the previous year."

At Carnegie Mellon, the number of companies participating in the school's spring job fair is up 50 percent over last year, to 120 from roughly 80, said Judi Mancuso, associate director of the Carnegie Mellon career center.

Those numbers aren't as good as they were six or seven years ago, but, then again, many of the jobs that were filled back then are no longer around.

"In 1999 and 2000, it was a very unrealistic job market," Ms. Mancuso said. "A lot of those jobs were based on companies that don't even exist anymore."

At one of Carnegie Mellon's fall job fairs this year, senior William Gronim stopped by a booth run by the online selling giant Amazon.com. He quickly answered a few general computer questions from the recruiter, and then some specific questions about Amazon's business before being invited to further interviews.

Last summer, Mr. Gronim was an intern at IBM's hyper-competitive Extreme Blue program for promising students pursuing software development and MBA degrees. He received three job offers from IBM at the end of the summer program, then, in the fall, interviewed for several other jobs, including one on an Army base where he would have had to take a daily two-hour afternoon break to escape deafening artillery tests, and received more job offers.

"I didn't think it would be this easy," he said in an interview last week. Some companies, he said, are now cold-calling him to offer jobs, drawn by his experience with Extreme Blue.

Mr. Gronim, a computer science major originally from Brooklyn, N.Y., eventually chose to move to Seattle for what he calls "a dream job" at Amazon.com.

He'll make about $80,000, not including a signing bonus and company stock. "I was shocked when they offered me stock," he said. "I thought that was a six-years-ago kind of thing."

While Mr. Gronim's experience shows that some companies have clearly returned to the good old days, it's not yet the norm, particularly for students looking locally.

"The job market has clearly picked up in Pittsburgh, there's no question in my mind," said Jim McClenahan, director of the career services center at Duquesne University. "But it still isn't what it should be for all of our students. I wouldn't call this a strong job market."

Even though the seven-county area added 3,300 jobs last year and is forecast to add more than 11,000 this year, it still has a lot of ground to make up. Regional nonfarm employment last year trailed its 2001 peak by 17,000, according to recent estimates from the state Department of Labor and Industry.

Mr. McClenahan said he had seen strong demand regionally in accounting, finance and supply management jobs, but that demand for students with information technology degrees was still somewhat weak.

She's put her resume on such national job search sites as monster.com, but has heard back only from companies that are out of state, or out of country, in India.

"I don't feel like it's gotten that much better," she said. "You still have to know people."

Her friend and fellow Pitt senior, Melissa Ellsworth, hasn't found a job either, though she acknowledges she hasn't done much looking. With a double major in political science and communications, she's not optimistic about her prospects.

"I started with pharmacy," she said. "I should have stuck with pharmacy."

Mr. Roth, at Pitt, notes that even with an improved job market, students still need to get experience through internships and be aggressive about their job searches.

"The fear I have is that students might become complacent," he said. "It's still not a situation where students will find employers falling all over themselves."

U.S. And Russia Divided On Wording Of U.N. Statement On Iran (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

WASHINGTON, March 25 — The Bush administration and Russia, struggling to forge a joint strategy on Iran, remain at odds over whether the United Nations Security Council should take a step toward imposing penalties on Iran by labeling its nuclear activities a threat to world peace, American and European officials say.

The officials say that the Russian-American impasse, in which leading European countries are siding with the Bush administration, has held up what the West had hoped would be a unanimous move by the Security Council on Iran this month. The impasse also has echoes of the Iraq war, they say, in that Russia is concerned about a possible replay of the United States' using resolutions by the Council to confront Iran in the same way it acted against Iraq.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the Russian foreign minister, Sergey V. Lavrov, spoke Friday to try to close a crucial difference over the language of a possible Security Council statement on Iran, specifically the statement's reference to Iran's nuclear activities as "a threat to international peace and security," various officials said. That wording, by implication, would open the door for further Security Council action against Iran.

Ms. Rice said Friday that Russian and American officials would work through the weekend to resolve their differences.

The sensitive talks with Russia are only the latest in a series of difficulties that have strained relations in the last couple years. Among the irritants have been Russia's crackdown on dissent, its cutoff of natural gas shipments to Ukraine and its efforts to extend influence in the region.

A new source of irritation could come with the disclosure from Iraqi documents that a possible Russian spy operation early in the Iraq war in 2003 provided Saddam Hussein with information about American war plans and troop movements.

A senior State Department official said Saturday that the department was studying details related to the disclosure, and no decision had been made on whether to raise the matter diplomatically with the Russians. But American officials say that Russia is extremely sensitive over the Iraq war, and it has vowed not to let the United States use pressure from the Security Council on Iran as a means to authorize economic penalties or even military action.

Russia's foreign intelligence service has denied passing information the war plans. On Saturday, a state news agency, RIA, cited unidentified Russian security officials as saying that the American Defense Department study that included the documents seemed intended to punish Russia for opposing the 2003 invasion. "This kind of unsubstantiated allegation against Russia's intelligence service has been voiced repeatedly," said Boris Labusov, a spokesman for the service.

A Western diplomat, referring to the Security Council discussions on Iran, and speaking on condition of anonymity because the negotiations are confidential, said: "The Russians are worried that if you label Iran a threat to international peace, it's the beginning of a process. If there is going to be a solution, it will have to be negotiated by Lavrov and Rice."

The Bush administration had some hope over the weekend that the Russian-American talks could produce agreement soon. That contrasted with the mood early this week after a contentious session involving American, European, Russian and Chinese envoys at the United Nations.

Bush administration officials have declined to discuss the possibility of penalties on Iran. They and European diplomats emphasize that any future penalties against Tehran would be structured to avoid strangling the Iranian economy as a whole and stirring anti-Western resentment among ordinary Iranians.

The administration concern is that suffering by Iranians would delay the day of a more pro-Western government taking power in Tehran, undercutting a planned $85 million American program to subsidize Iranian dissidents, promote exchange programs and sponsor broadcasts to encourage pro-Western attitudes.

Despite the desire to win over Iranians, the administration and its European partners have prepared a series of escalating economic and political penalties that could be ready for imposition on Iran by the summer, officials said.

Those penalties, they said, would start with imposing travel bans or freezing foreign-held assets of Iranian officials, followed by a ban on commercial dealings with any businesses connected to Iran's military or to its nuclear programs.

More sweeping bans on commercial, business and energy relations would be saved for later, various officials have said, adding that if the Security Council does not authorize penalties, European countries may act unilaterally after consultation with the United States.

But a ban on military and nuclear energy dealings with Iran would have immediate economic effects on Russia, which has contracted with Iran to develop military defense systems and establish a civilian nuclear reactor on the Persian Gulf coast city of Bushehr. For its part, Russia argues that penalties would backfire and cut off what little cooperation Iran is still giving.

European diplomats also say that the Russians have raised objections to the American spending plan to encourage political change inside Iran. The plan is widely seen as analogous to efforts to bring about "regime change" in Iraq a few years ago.

Iranian news media outlets, meanwhile, are praising Russia and China for trying to block a Security Council action that would impose penalties on Iran, according to Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford University.

"The Iranian papers are bursting with stories about how China and Russia are not caving to the American pressure to punish Iran," Mr. Milani said. "It's clear that they are trying to portray this as a victory for Iranian diplomacy, which has gotten Russia and China not to cave in to U.S. pressure."

AFP, March 26, 2006

The head of the United Nations nuclear watchdog called for urgent reform of the UN Security Council to give it greater powers, especially in addressing the threat of nuclear proliferation.

"It is clearly time for the Security Council to be reformed, expanded and strengthened, as part of the current efforts to reform and revitalize the United Nations," said Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Agency for Atomic Energy (IAEA) in Vienna, currently at the centre of a tense stand-off with Iran over nuclear power.

In a highly critical review of the UN body's record, he said a lecture, the text of which was published on the IAEA website: "When dealing with threats of nuclear proliferation and arms control, the Security Council has too often fallen short."

In specific cases of arms control, the Security Council's efforts had not been very systematic or successful.

In the case of Iraq, it had over a decade imposed a series of blanket economic sanctions "which were manipulated to the advantage of the ruthless regime in power, and resulted in the death and suffering of hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians.

"The Council could not later agree, in 2003, on either the need for or the timing of the use of force in Iraq."

The Council had also "made little effort to address nuclear proliferation threats in context, by dealing with the drivers of insecurity that give rise to proliferation.

"It has not responded or followed up effectively to the emergence of new countries with nuclear weapons. And it has not exercised its arms limitation mandate."

"Too often, the Security Councils engagement is inadequate, selective, or after the fact," ElBaradei said.

"The tragedies of recent years in Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), and Darfur are cases in point.

"In the case of Rwanda in mid-1994, the Security Council was unable to move much beyond hand-wringing, with the result that 800 000 people lost their lives in the span of a few months."

In the DRC War, its efforts in the interest of diplomacy and peacekeeping had not been enough to prevent the deaths of an estimated 3.8 millions.

The UN Security Council is currently stalled over issuing a statement that would call on Iran to suspend enrichment, which Tehran says is to produce nuclear reactor fuel but can make atom bomb material.

Washington and its European allies have been pressing Tehran to suspend its uranium enrichment activities and return to negotiations aimed at weaning them from suspected nuclear ambitions with economic and other incentives.

Iran denies claims that it is seeking to acquire nuclear weapons and insists that as a signatory of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, it has a right to conduct uranium enrichment.

A Knesset Class In Need Of Remedial Ethics (NYT)

By Greg Myre

JERUSALEM, March 25 — How pervasive were the misdeeds of Israel's departing legislators?

At least 15 lawmakers have been investigated, indicted or convicted in the Parliament that is leaving, accounting for more than 10 percent of the legislature. If they banded together, they would constitute one of the largest factions in the Knesset.

As Israel prepares for parliamentary elections on Tuesday, the departing legislature is being described as perhaps the most ethically challenged in the country's history. And while the conflict with the Palestinians has been the dominant campaign theme, corruption has become a major issue for voters.

"In terms of corruption, the last Parliament was the worst in the state of Israel," said Yossi Sarid, a left-wing lawmaker who is retiring after 32 years. "We're not talking about minor individuals and backbenchers, we're talking about some of the most prominent figures."

The election is at a pivotal time for Israel: Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lies in a coma. On Saturday, the Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, signaled that he would not block the formation of a government dominated by the militant group

Hamas. And Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert, says he wants to unilaterally draw Israel's borders if he is elected. Yet for all that, the campaign has been lackluster, and voter turnout is forecast to be well below the norm.

Many analysts agree that the corruption scandals and a general distrust of politicians have fueled much of the discontent, a sense that there is too much conniving in the Knesset.

On Thursday, Yair Peretz from the religious party Shas became the fourth member of the current Parliament to be convicted of a crime. The Tel Aviv Magistrates Court found that Mr. Peretz had submitted papers written by others to fraudulently obtain a university degree. Mr. Peretz resigned from Parliament immediately after the verdict.

The Israeli news media reported that one of the papers he had submitted had been written by a woman, and he had not taken the trouble to change the feminine form of the Hebrew words into the masculine.

Four additional legislators have been charged with crimes or soon will be, the attorney general said. They include a cabinet minister, Tzachi Hanegbi, who, according to an investigation by the attorney general, gave government jobs to friends. Also, two lawmakers have been reprimanded by Parliament's Ethics Committee. At least five more are under investigation.

Mr. Sharon has been the subject of two investigations linked to his family's finances and his campaigns. In one case, an Israeli businessman was charged with paying hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes sent to Mr. Sharon's son Gilad. Mr. Sharon's older son, Omri, also a member of Parliament, pleaded guilty in November to illegal fund-raising in the 1999 campaign. He was sentenced to nine months in prison and resigned from Parliament.

Israel's politics are intensely competitive, and politicians frequently toss accusations of wrongdoing at rivals. In addition, news media and legal scrutiny often leads to public investigations. And frequent elections — this is the fourth national ballot in seven years — create a need for frequent fund-raising, which has been at the root of several scandals. Some politicians complain that the fund-raising laws are too strict in an era of television campaigning.

During this campaign, the state comptroller, who investigates government matters, has examined two questions involving Mr. Olmert.

The comptroller recently reported that nothing was illegal about a deal in which Mr. Olmert sold his Jerusalem home for $2.7 million to S. Daniel Abraham, an American billionaire who has contributed money to Israeli politics. Mr. Olmert has continued living in the home, renting it for around $2,500 a month, while he builds another.

In the second matter, the comptroller is still investigating whether anything was improper about personnel appointments made by Mr. Olmert while he was minister of trade and industry. Mr. Olmert has denied any wrongdoing.

"There is a school of thought here that says we are too quick to undermine our elected leaders," said Uri Dromi of the Israel Democracy Institute, a private research organization.

"But this Knesset was truly outstanding when it came to corruption," said Mr. Dromi, who was the spokesman for Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister who was assassinated in 1995. "They crossed a lot of thresholds and turned this into an issue that couldn't be ignored."

Some cases have bordered on farce.

One lawmaker, Yehiel Hazan, is facing forgery charges — accused of voting twice, once for himself and once for an absent lawmaker during a marathon budget debate in 2003. The act was captured on camera, prosecutors said. Last November, Mr. Hazan went into a Knesset storeroom and removed the voting machine in question. This, too, was caught on camera. Mr. Hazan said that he had permission to remove it and that he later returned it.

Another Likud legislator, Michael Gorlovsky, acknowledged voting from the seat of an absent lawmaker in the same 2003 parliamentary session, but said he did it because he saw others doing the same thing. Last week, Mr. Gorlovsky was in Belarus, the Israeli news media reported, observing the presidential balloting that was declared invalid by the United States and others.

Another case involved Joseph Paritzky, formerly a leading figure in Shinui, a centrist party that fared well in the 2003 election on its clean government platform.

But Mr. Paritzky was drummed out of the party a year later after Israeli television played a tape of him plotting with a private investigator to, as Mr. Paritzky put it, "set a trap" to ruin the political career of a fellow Shinui legislator. Mr. Paritzky was investigated but not charged.

"In the 1970's, you could only find rare cases of corruption," said Eliad Shraga, a prominent lawyer who founded the Movement for Quality Government in Israel, a private watchdog group. "Unfortunately, in recent years we've been on a slippery slope, and we have to fight to preserve our values and norms."

At the group's offices in Jerusalem, law students sit in front of a bank of computers, where they take calls from citizens who have complaints about the government in Israel at all levels.

More than 1,000 complaints a year are called in, and the group carries out its own investigations. In cases with enough evidence, the group forwards its finding to the police or the attorney general. It may also petition Israel's High Court of Justice. Many prosecutions have resulted.

The group's stature is such that Mr. Olmert made a campaign stop at its offices on Tuesday to sign its charter against corruption.

"We have many lovely, honest people here, and we are not a corrupt society," Mr. Shraga said. "But we have had messed-up management."

Populist Bids Israeli Voters Back To Labor (WP)

Amir Peretz Invokes Traditional Themes in Campaign to Return Party to Power

KIBBUTZ MISGAV AM, Israel -- Amir Peretz is everything that previous leaders of Israel's Labor Party were not: North African by birth, populist in his politics, dynamic on the stump. Even the moustache that his opponents cite as evidence of everything from ethnic radicalism to a resemblance to Joseph Stalin sets Peretz apart from the Israeli founding fathers whose party he took over last year.

Many Israelis of Peretz's background turned against Labor decades ago. To punish a governing party that in their eyes had become an elitist enterprise unconcerned with the plight of immigrants from North Africa and the Middle East, known collectively as Mizrahi Jews, they turned to the more hawkish Likud Party. Peretz is trying to win them back.

In the campaign leading to Tuesday's national elections, Peretz has focused on returning Labor to its roots, promising to raise the minimum wage, patch up Israel's fraying social safety net and pursue negotiations with the Palestinians at a time when a unilateral withdrawal from the occupied territories is in vogue. Along the way, Peretz, a former leader of Israel's largest trade-union federation, is finding new enemies in old friends and new friends in old enemies. As the Mizrahi Jews weigh whether to return to Labor, many of the Ashkenazi Jews -- those of European descent -- who dominate the party are unconvinced that he is the man to lead the party into elections.

"There are two genies in this campaign: the nationalist and the ethnic," Peretz, 54, said in an interview Thursday during a campaign swing through Galilee. "Both genies are working against the social revolution I have in mind. And I am trying my best to kill them both."

The short journey between Kibbutz Misgav Am, a cliff-top community where Labor candidates have traditionally felt at home, and the market stalls of Kiryat Shmona on the flatlands below spans the opportunities and challenges Peretz faces as he tries to return the party to power.

The kibbutz movement has been a symbol of the Labor elite since before Israel's founding in 1948, which was made possible in part by the Histadrut labor union federation created by early Zionists to develop the economy and secure a sovereign Jewish state. The Labor Party held power for Israel's first three decades of independence, but "by the 1960s the Labor movement had nothing new to say and nothing has changed since then until today," said Zeev Sternhell, a retired Hebrew University professor and author of the "The Founding Myths of Israel." "The first time the party has had a chance to create something new is now."

As evinced by the small audience here to see Peretz, the kibbutz movement is made up almost entirely of Ashkenazi Jews. The sons and daughters of Labor's pre-state pioneers still live here in a wind-swept compound overlooking southern Lebanon, idyllic except for the threat of the radical Islamic movement Hezbollah across the border.

For years its collective business enterprises have thrived on land provided by the state. The socialists have grown rich, and Israel as a whole has prospered over the decades. But the Labor Party's vision of equality among Jews remains unfulfilled. As a result, resentment has welled up not only in places like the neglected southern city of Sderot in the Negev desert, where Peretz grew up, but also within the party's populist wing that he embodies.

"A part of the Labor Party, and I hope it's a small part, is disappointed because they do not think Peretz is the person to head it," said Aharon Valency, 63, a French immigrant and kibbutz member who has always voted Labor. "The important thing is that this is not only Peretz, but the team."

Yellow Hezbollah banners were visible from the overlook where Peretz gathered with kibbutz leaders and Matan Vilnai, a former major general on the Labor candidate list, in a photo opportunity intended to convey a commitment to security. In the party of Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin, and Ehud Barak, Peretz's scant military experience has been something he has had to defend.

While serving in the Sinai Peninsula during the 1973 Middle East war, Peretz was crushed under an Israeli tank while trying to free it from the sand. Doctors told him he would never walk again, a prediction he defied after two years of arduous rehabilitation.

Peretz told the audience here that he trusted the Israeli military to combat the nation's enemies. But he also said another unilateral withdrawal from Palestinian territories would not bring peace to Israel, a shot at the front-running Kadima party now peeling off votes in Labor enclaves like this one.

Less than a year after Prime Minister Ariel Sharon engineered Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and formed Kadima when some of his fellow Likud members balked at the move, Kadima's leaders have outlined plans to withdraw Israeli soldiers and settlers from parts of the West Bank, keeping large settlement blocs on Israel's side of the separation barrier. Their idea, which has won popular support, is to define Israel's final borders without negotiating terms with the Palestinians.

"Kadima are the only ones that will give back territory," said Jospeh Lakho, 63, who has lived on this kibbutz for more than four decades and voted Labor even longer, a streak he will break in this election. "Peretz is new to this, and according to the polls, he doesn't have much chance."

But Peretz, a disciple of Rabin, who as prime minister signed the Oslo accords with the Palestinians in 1993 and was killed by a Jewish extremist two years later, maintains that "disengagement was not an act of peace, but of security. Peace must be agreed upon by both parties."

After acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, the second candidate on Kadima's list is Shimon Peres, 82, who was one of Labor's earliest activists. Peretz narrowly defeated Peres for the party leadership in November, and the older man joined his long-time friend Sharon in Kadima soon after. Peres said in a meeting with foreign reporters Thursday that Labor's "campaign has not changed according to the needs of the times."

In introducing Peretz here, Valency admitted that he had favored Peres in the Labor leadership vote. But he urged the audience to support Peretz and the party, now projected to win 21 of parliament's 120 seats. That would put Labor a distant second to Kadima.

Peretz was criticized early in his decade running the Histadrut union for calling frequent general strikes that damaged the economy. He changed tactics over time and earned the respect of many government ministers. He also remained popular among the Mizrahi Jews and Arab citizens of Israel who comprise much of the union ranks. Now he is seeking their support.

At the same time, Peretz has filled out his candidate list with well-known Ashkenazis. Among them are Vilnai, who was deputy commander of Israel's military when he retired, and Avishay Braverman, a former World Bank economist and university president who was pursued by various parties like colleges pursue a high-school basketball star. He said he chose Peretz's Labor because "a moral society must be our goal," but also said he joined to "whiten" the party leader.

Down the mountain, a different crowd welcomed Peretz in what has long been a no-go zone for Labor politicians identified with the hilltop elite.

"This time we're voting for the Moroccan," shouted Morris Ben-Itah, a wiry man in a knit kippa , or skullcap, as Peretz's bus pulled into the market of Kiryat Shmona.

Ben-Itah, 52, arrived more than four decades ago from Algeria. As soon as he was old enough, he cast his ballot for Likud and hasn't stopped.

But the father of five said Likud had done nothing to improve his life after promising to do so in each election season. A gardener for the municipal government, he hasn't been paid in two months.

"Likud is burned to me," Ben-Itah said. "This time I won't be ashamed to vote for the Moroccan. He's promised better pay for everyone. We're going to give him a chance. If he fails, we'll vote him out."

Peretz emerged from the bus to the celebratory screech of ululation imported from the Arab Middle East. The smell of greasy food followed him into the crowded vegetable stalls where he handed out ersatz $1,000 bills, the sum he proposes for the monthly minimum wage. He has promised not to sit in a government that does not agree.

"These are people who voted for Likud but in their day-to-day lives are social democrats," Peretz said in a voice that is disappearing as the campaign winds down. "This is the first time there will be a completeness in the way they live and in the way they vote these values."

Palestinian Leader To Accept Hamas Cabinet (WP)

By Scott Wilson

Aide Says Abbas Seeks 'Transformation' Of Rival Party's Stance Toward Israelis

JERUSALEM, March 25 -- Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas notified Hamas officials Saturday that he would accept their proposed cabinet even though its program does not endorse previous agreements or peace initiatives that recognize Israel and are backed by the Palestinian Authority.

At the same time, Abbas reiterated his demand that Hamas adopt his vision of a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to avoid putting "our national struggle in opposition to international legitimacy." Hamas, known formally as the Islamic Resistance Movement, is designated a terrorist organization by the United States and the European Union.

Abbas, the Palestinian Authority president, outlined his position in a letter addressed to Ismail Haniyeh, whom Hamas designated to become prime minister after the party's surprise victory in January parliamentary elections.

The document clears the way for the Palestinian parliament to begin debating the proposed cabinet, comprising only Hamas members and independents allied with the movement, early next week. Haniyeh said the parliament would approve the new ministers Wednesday, a day after Israel's national elections.

The letter also signals Abbas's approach to the Hamas cabinet at a time when international donors are deciding whether to continue funding the Palestinian Authority. His strategy, as outlined by two people close to him, is a gamble that will depend on cooperation from Israel and such donors as the United States to achieve his goal of pressuring Hamas to abandon its declared war with Israel.

"What we need is for the world to support the moderate line and help Abbas step in to save the day," said one of the sources, who outlined the calculations behind the letter on condition of anonymity. "There is no immediate clear-cut solution to this. This is a long-term process of transformation or a collapse of the Palestinian Authority."

Abbas's letter warns Hamas that its position imperils political and financial support for the Palestinians' national cause and precludes the formation of a unity government, which would include his secular-nationalist Fatah movement. The source called those warnings "battle lines" that Abbas will invoke in what he hopes will become a domestic political contest with Hamas, which has no governing experience above the local level.

Abbas could have rejected Hamas's proposed cabinet and risked a constitutional crisis that could have resulted in the dissolution of the Palestinian Authority. But Abbas wrote that he would accept the cabinet "out of respect for the democratic process."

He is also doing so to challenge Hamas to govern effectively or suffer the consequences. Abbas is betting that Hamas will do no better than Fatah in controlling Palestinian militias, improving the economy or reducing the Israeli checkpoints, military operations, crossing closures and other hardships of the occupation.

The president does not have the legal authority to call new parliamentary elections, although he can dismiss the prime minister and his cabinet. But sources close to Abbas say they believe Hamas leaders might agree to new elections, perhaps as soon as six months from now, if the party's political standing fades while leading the government.

In the meantime, Abbas may propose the outline of a peace settlement with Israel to rally the Palestinian public around his approach.

But Abbas is counting on the next Israeli government and international donors to support the Palestinian Authority after Hamas takes over its ministries, something that appears unlikely. Cutting off foreign aid that accounts for nearly half the authority's budget would allow Hamas to blame its failures on what one source called a "foreign conspiracy."

Israel has frozen the monthly transfer of roughly $55 million in tax and customs revenue it collects for the Palestinian Authority, an amount equal to nearly half its payroll. The Bush administration has suspended U.S.-funded development projects in the Palestinian territories.

Abbas is calculating that neither Israel nor foreign donors want the Palestinian Authority to collapse. That would require the Israeli government, as the occupying power, to assume a larger role in the territories at a time when Israel's leading political party is proposing a unilateral withdrawal from parts of the West Bank after the election.

"Where we differ from the international community is that Abbas doesn't want Hamas to fail; Abbas wants Hamas to transform," one source close to the president said. "His ultimate constituency is the domestic one. What we hope is that the international community will see his engagement as part of a complex situation and not that he is in bed with terrorists."

HOW you see something," said Nigel Parsons, the managing director of Al Jazeera International, "depends very much on where you're sitting."

Those words could well serve as the manifesto for the channel, the English-language offspring of the polarizing pan-Arab network, which will make its debut in more than 40 million households in late May.

Addressing hundreds of journalists and academics who had come to Doha, Qatar, for the second Al Jazeera Forum, Mr. Parsons promised that the new channel — with its headquarters there and broadcast centers in Washington, London and Kuala Lumpur — will cover the stories and people that the Western-owned news media overlook. "We're not going to be another CNN, BBC or Sky," he told the attendees on the last day of January. "If we were, there'd be no point." But, he added, "It's not our position to tell viewers what to think."

During a freewheeling question-and-answer session, the audience pressed him for details. With costs already surpassing a billion dollars, Al Jazeera is the most ambitious television network start-up in recent years. Will it be the first network to crack the Western monopoly on delivering news and opinion to a global audience? Will it provide an Arab and Muslim point of view to the rest of the world?

Many at the forum hoped it would. But its top management is British, and its high-profile hires — like the smooth interviewer David Frost and the former "Nightline" correspondent Dave Marash — are hardly representative of the developing world. Will it then, the journalists wanted to know, just be colonialism in more modern garb?

Outside of that crowded conference room, the pressure is just as great. In the Arab world, Al Jazeera has a reputation for tackling the thorny issues. But in the United States, where it is best known for showing tapes of Osama Bin Laden's tirades, one person's fearless reporting can quickly become another's dangerous propaganda. And the more widely it is viewed as a terrorist mouthpiece, the harder a time the channel will have getting a spot on the already-crowded American cable line-ups.

Mr. Parsons understands the need to reassure new viewers in the West without disappointing old ones in the Arab world. "Essentially, it's about getting the balance right," he said.

A little more than five minutes from the 1980's-era opulence of the vast Sheraton on the Doha's corniche — if the traffic-clogged roundabouts thoughtfully bequeathed by the British do not double the commute time — lies the headquarters of the Al Jazeera networks. To describe the exterior as nondescript would be giving the dusty compound of squat buildings and satellite transponders too much credit. But inside, another story unfolds.

The Arabic-channel's new newsroom, which opened last year, is an airy space filled with Aeron chairs, slick flat-screen LG and Samsung monitors and on-air sets whose color scheme (orangey green) morphs through the day. Next door, in a former parking lot, swarms of men in smocks — imported cheap labor from Southeast Asia — hurry to complete the English-language headquarters.

Employees at Al Jazeera International boast of having one of the largest plasma screens of any newsroom in the world. From the newsroom on the first floor, a glass spiral staircase will lead to a mezzanine of open-plan news desks for the Web site and glass-walled offices, a rarity in the Arab world, where executive suites are more often clubby, private affairs. A fiber-optic network will connect Doha to its broadcast centers and other bureaus. There will also be a prayer room, as is customary in Qatari workplaces. Over all, it's a far cry from the tiny newsroom of the channel's early years, the one that prompted the Egyptian leader Hosni Mubarak to marvel during a 2000 visit, "All this trouble from a matchbox like this."

Al Jazeera's rapid growth over the last decade is primarily the doing of one man, the emir of Qatar, Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa al Thani. Since bloodlessly overthrowing his father in 1995, Sheik Hamad has overseen the vast natural gas reserves of his country, a sandy spit of land about the size of Connecticut and Rhode Island combined that juts out of Saudi Arabia into the Persian Gulf.

But those reserves will not last forever, so he has used the profits to diversify. He has opened Qatar to the West, turning it into a regional education hub, setting off a building boom and loosening some political restrictions. In 1996, he issued a decree establishing Al Jazeera, and then bankrolled its first five years with a grant of $137 million. He is still footing the bulk of the channel's annual budget.

"He's thinking long-term," said Hugh Miles, the author of "Al Jazeera: The Inside Story of the Arab News Channel That is Challenging the West" (Grove Press). In a rough neighborhood, he wants to build "an Arab version of Switzerland — rich, neutral and secure," Mr. Miles said.

Mahmud Shammam, the Washington bureau chief of Al Watan newspaper and Newsweek in Arabic, as well as the emir's latest addition to Al Jazeera's board of directors, said Sheik Hamad hoped the network would be a countervailing force to some of the political and social trends in the Middle East. "He wants Al Jazeera to be a force for democracy and modernization in the Arab world," Mr. Shammam said.

Certainly the region has not been a haven for the free press. Owned or controlled by the state, the television channels in the region are often filled with dreary state receptions and handshakes of smiling kings and autocratic generals, breaking-news bulletins of the queen's latest ribbon cutting, and an avoidance of anything remotely controversial.

But since its debut in November 1996, Al Jazeera has offended multitudes with news and commentary that do not necessarily conform to the views of mullahs or kings. To the outrage of social conservatives, the host of a religion show said the Koran did not forbid fellatio. Guests have questioned the right of the Saud family to rule Saudi Arabia. At some time or another, nearly every country in the Middle East — save Israel — has banned or curtailed its reporters.

Meanwhile Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has accused the network of "vicious lies" and of promoting an anti-American worldview. (An Al Jazeera journalist in Spain was sentenced last year in that country to seven years in prison for collaborating with Al Qaeda; Al Jazeera is appealing the verdict.)

The reality of what is on the channel is more nuanced. (See sidebar.) Just as the emir and Qatar play host to the American military while offering asylum to Saddam Hussein's wife, Al Jazeera offers a showcase for dissenting views — such as Dr. Wafa Sultan, an Arab-American psychiatrist who recently denounced some Muslims for what she called their backwardness — but a definite worldview dominates, one that is pro-Palestinian and skeptical of the West's intentions. Particularly America's intentions, post 9/11. Recently the administration has chosen to engage more with the channel; American officials, such as Condoleezza Rice, have occasionally appeared as guests.

"Al Jazeera has played a very important role in creating foundations for democracy and pluralism in the Middle East," said Marc Lynch, an associate professor of political science at Williams College and the author of "Voices of a New Arab Public: Iraq, Al Jazeera and a Middle East Politics Today" (Columbia University Press). "It can also fan the flame of populism and anti-Americanism. And there's an ongoing struggle between these two forces."

Dealing with that struggle falls to Mr. Parsons, as he sets out to convince cable and satellite operators, politicians and curious prospective viewers that Al Jazeera International will not be biased against the West, but will nonetheless offer a needed alternative to CNN International and BBC World.

The son of a British military officer, Mr. Parsons, 54, grew up in countries like Singapore and Malaysia, and has spent 30 years working for news outlets ranging from BBC Radio to Associated Press Television News. When he was first approached about the position at Al Jazeera International, he was frustrated with the tenor of most English-language news. "Especially the coverage of the Iraqi invasion," he said. "Somehow it seemed to me that the Fourth Estate had got into bed with the third estate and the rest of us had been left outside the bedroom. So when this came along, it was blank sheet of paper and a chance to make a difference, and to do things differently."

The new English-language channel will have all of the standard accoutrements: interview programs, panels of political experts and critiques of the news media. "Frost Over the World," for example, will showcase Mr. Frost's one-on-one skills with global newsmakers each Friday.

But Al Jazeera's main business program has the far-from-Wall-Street title "People and Power," and its host, a former Economist correspondent, Dr. Shereen El Feki, pledges to cover the "grassroots" along with the executive suites. And "Witness," the channel's daily documentary series out of London, will feature the films as well as conversations with their makers.

And though Al Jazeera International's competitors have also laid claim to the think globally, act locally mentality (and dispute that Western ownership leads to Western-centric newscasts), the new channel is turning the idea into a physical reality. Its broadcasting day is expected to begin in Kuala Lumpur, 9 a.m. local time, and over the next four hours the journalists there will drive the report. The following 11 hours will come out of Doha, before the London broadcast center takes the reins for five. Then, for four hours beginning at 4 p.m. on the East Coast of the United States, Washington will gain its measure of control.

This setup, Al Jazeera International executives say, will differentiate the channel from its more centralized competitors and ensure that important regional stories do not get overlooked — as Bangladesh's deadly typhoons did in the aftermath of Hurricane Rita, said Steve Clark, a former Sky News executive who is the new channel's director of news.

So do not expect much coverage of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, the annual winter home for privileged white men (and Angelina Jolie) that is much adored by the Western news media. "I don't think we'd have even gone there," Mr. Parsons said.

Just how willingly an international audience will flock to this alternative news channel — and whether that migration will reward the emir's huge wager — is unclear. "People are far more interested in the price of petrol at their local petrol station than they are in probably what's happening in Sudan," Mr. Parsons said. "That's just a fact. But there is a hunger for international news. If you do it through human interest, people will always relate."

The fact that Al Jazeera International's target audience — Arab and Asian expatriates, non Arabic-speaking Muslims and news hounds — is so geographically diffuse only complicates matters. Al Jazeera also faces the same squeeze in the United States as other fledgling cable channels not backed by a media conglomerate: no room at the inn.

Executives do not want the channel relegated to a premium tier, as the Arabic-language channel is in this country, available only to subscribers of the Dish Network willing to pay an extra $26 to $40 a month. But mainstream tiers are already crowded, and newer channels devoted to murder mysteries (Sleuth) and conspicuous consumption (Fine Living) can be much more lucrative. And there's another competitor looming; BBC World has said it plans to bring its 24-hour news channel to the United States, and is working with Discovery Communications.

So far, Al Jazeera International has not found a cable or satellite provider. The search continues, and the channel says it has received offers across the United States, including a proposal from one major cable operator. And the channel is considering streaming the video over the Internet, so viewers can watch the network on computers. Either way, the emir's largess takes some of the pressure off. "We'd love to have cable distribution," said Lindsay Oliver, the channel's commercial director, "but it's not going to kill us if we don't."

The perception that despite the Middle Eastern base, Westerners once again are dictating the news could ultimately pose a much bigger threat to the channel. At the Al Jazeera forum in Doha, some employees of the Arabic-language channel joined the grumbling about the Western tilt in the top ranks.

The English-language channel has been filling out its staff with Arab and Muslim journalists, but even so, the complaints continue. "Does the emir know," asked one post on the Friends of Al Jazeera blog, "his money is being shared around a group of television people who would make Fox News proud? Fellow Arabs in Doha are not amused."

All told, Al Jazeera International expects to hire more than 500 people, of which more than 150 will be journalists. Although the new channel will be a separate entity, it will share some resources with its Arabic-language sibling, and to build camaraderie between the two staffs, movie nights and dinners have already been held.

Mr. Shammam of Al Watan said that while he understands why language requirements would limit the network's hiring pool, he would like to see more diversity. "If it is international, it has to be international," he said.

And any eventual success of Al Jazeera International will probably not be measured on the bottom line, but on the international battlefield of ideas. "It has a chance of shifting slightly the agenda-setting decisions made by the media in New York, London and Atlanta," said Daoud Kuttab, the director of the Institute of Modern Media at Al Quds University in Ramallah.

For the emir of a tiny country striving to show the West "the real Arab world, the real Muslim world," in the words of Mr. Shammam, that may be victory enough.

America, The Global Target (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

Hoping to lower tensions between the Muslim world and the West, British Prime Minister Tony Blair maintained the other day that the world confronts "a clash about civilization," not "a clash between civilizations." But the overriding lesson of events since Sept. 11, 2001, may be that you can't have one without the other.

In radical Islamic propaganda, the United States has graduated from being a mere Great Satan out to undermine Iran's ayatollahs to being depicted as a global monster responsible for virtually every crime and failing since the dawn of modern history. Meet the new Jews: the Americans.

Don't misunderstand. Americans have not replaced Jews at the top of the hate parade in Islamic countries. But the history of anti-Semitism, a word coined in Germany to provide a bogus scientific basis for prejudice against Jews, and its spread in recent years across the Middle East as an all-purpose explanation of whatever is wrong, should give Americans no cause for complacency.

The centrality of American power to global change -- good and bad, economic and political, topsy and turvy -- inevitably carries with it a heavy burden abroad of resentment and opposition. In the wake of Sept. 11 and wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, a widespread stereotyping and a visceral hatred that imputes racial characteristics to national policies and actions have also taken hold.

The distemper of these global times can be read in a wide variety of settings, where this new virulent anti-Americanism competes with historical anti-Semitism as a single explanation for the failures and delusions of entire nations.

The change can be seen in Turkish and Egyptian movie houses, where overflow crowds watch depictions of Americans routinely raping, killing, firebombing mosques and torturing innocents as a function of national character. It flows through the fanatical statements of Osama bin Laden and others that conflate "Jews" and "Crusaders." It peeks out of an overjoyed online announcement I came across last week that Hitler's favorite book, "The Riddle of the Jew's Success," is back in print.

Nothing new in this, it can be said. Besides, American movies, comics, journalists and politicians among others have never hesitated to stereotype Arabs, Turks or any other foreigners for their purposes, and often in extremely crude terms. Finally, the terrible polarizing effect of the conflict in Iraq and the crimes committed at Abu Ghraib and elsewhere do invite harsh criticism of Americans rooted not in animus but in a sense of justice.

But the central and intrusive role of the United States in unleashing the traumatic changes of globalization on families, workplaces and nations everywhere brings unintended consequences. The forces that created anti-Semitism are not confined to one group of people or one moment in history.

" The Jew is in every respect the center of the language of the Third Reich, indeed of its whole view of the epoch," literary scholar Viktor Klemperer wrote in his Nazi-era diary. A forthcoming book quotes that passage to explain how long-standing prejudice was mobilized as engine and rationale for mass murder and state terrorism in Germany.

"Anti-Semitism was not only a set of prejudices and hatreds but also an explanatory framework for historical events," Jeffrey Herf writes in "The Jewish Enemy." He demonstrates that while Hitler was convincing Germans that the Jews were about to annihilate them, the numbers and influence of Jews in Germany were sharply declining. Facts did not get in Hitler's way.

A vehement counter-ideology is developing across the Arab world today to President Bush's drive to put America even more at the center of democratic change and material progress in that region. Some of the reaction is reasoned and pragmatic; much of it veers into hate propaganda that confounds nationality with race.

That suggests two initial propositions for an ongoing discussion of this vast subject:

The Bush administration must avoid throwing gasoline on this raging fire by making assertive declarations about preemptive warfare, or God's gifts of democracy being distributed to Arabs by Americans or the like. It must show that misbehavior or crimes in Iraq or elsewhere will be punished up to the highest level of responsibility.

Second, Americans need to recognize that the problems we face in the Middle East are bigger than the failings or mistakes of Bush & Co. Those problems would not fade quickly if U.S. troops left Iraq tomorrow. Repairing America's image at home and abroad is also a complex, generational task that begins now.

In Dubai, An Outcry From Asians For Workplace Rights (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates, March 25 — For Rajee Kumaran, this was the city of dreams.

Dubai's gleaming high rises, idyllic beaches and seemingly limitless opportunities glittered on the pages of brochures and in the stories told by laborers returning home to his native Kerala, India. But after five years here, surviving in squalid conditions and barely making ends meet on less than $200 a month, Mr. Kumaran, 28, says his dream has long since faded.

"I thought this was the land of opportunity, but I was fooled," he said Thursday, as he stood with several other construction workers outside their work camp in the desert on the outskirts of the city.

When hundreds of workers angered by low salaries and mistreatment rioted Tuesday night at the site of what is to become the world's tallest skyscraper, not only were they expressing the growing frustration of Asian migrants here, they offered a glimpse of an increasingly organized labor force.

Far from the high-rise towers and luxury hotels emblematic of Dubai, the workers turning this swath of desert into a modern metropolis live in a Dickensian world of cramped labor camps, low pay and increasing desperation.

For years, workers like Mr. Kumaran have done whatever they could to get here, often paying thousands of dollars to unscrupulous recruiters for the chance to work at one of the hundreds of construction sites in the emirates.

Of the 1.5 million residents of Dubai, as many as a million are immigrants who have come here to work in some capacity, with the largest subgroup being construction workers, said Hadi Ghaemi, a researcher with Human Rights Watch who covers the United Arab Emirates, citing government statistics. A vast majority of the immigrants come from the Indian subcontinent and the Philippines.

With the cost of living rising, many have abandoned dreams of returning with a fortune. The construction workers' camps, in particular, have been set up ever deeper in the desert. That adds an hour or two just to get to the job site every morning, in addition to the workers' 12-hour shifts.

A growing number have resorted to suicide rather than return home with empty pockets: last year, 84 South Asians committed suicide in Dubai, according to the Indian Consulate here, up from 70 in 2004.

Mr. Kumaran, who earns 550 dirhams every month, or about $150, as a laborer, sends home almost half his earnings and lives on the equivalent of roughly $60 a month. That is barely enough to pay for food and cigarettes and using his cellphone from time to time. But he is not sure how he will repay the loan he took to get here.

"If I'd stayed in India and worked just as hard as I do now, I could have made the same money," he said. "And I wouldn't have needed to get a loan to come here."

Since last September, when 800 workers staged a protest march down a main highway in the heart of the city and set off a national debate about the treatment of foreign workers, laborers have held at least eight major strikes to demand their rights and get their pay, which is sometimes withheld.

But the mass action on Tuesday was the most significant of its kind. Hundreds of workers building the Burj Dubai skyscraper chased security guards and broke into offices, smashing computers, scattering files and wrecking cars and construction machines. When they returned to work the next day, demanding better pay and improved working conditions, thousands of laborers building an airport terminal across town also laid down their tools, demanding better conditions, too. The workers also halted work on Thursday, until a settlement was negotiated.

"It was a watershed moment in coordination and organization," Mr. Ghaemi said. "It started with increasing numbers of strikes, and has now evolved into very organized and coordinated activities. If these grievances are not addressed quickly by the government they are sure to begin hurting the economic growth of the country."

Those workers have few rights. Visa sponsors and employers typically confiscate their passports and residency permits when they sign on, restricting their freedom of movement and their ability to report abuse.

Most pay money to recruiters to find work here, a practice that the U.A.E. government has sought to stop. When they get here, few can leave the country without the permission of their employers, who can block them from working elsewhere in the country if they resign or are fired.

Unionizing is forbidden, too, and most workers have no recourse other than the Labor Ministry.

Denial of wages is the most common abuse of workers, as contracting companies typically wait to pay their workers until they themselves get paid. In the worst cases, workers have been denied wages for more than 10 months, only to lose the entire salary when the contracting companies go bankrupt, leaving the men destitute and with few options.

The U.A.E.'s Ministry of Labor has tried to tackle the problem in recent months, making changes meant to allow workers to change employers more easily and imposing strict penalties on employers that do not pay their workers.

Workers can call a toll-free hot line to the ministry to lodge complaints, which are investigated. And ministry inspectors do travel to work camps to inspect them.

"We always support the workers and want to protect their rights, but we must protect employers' rights as well," said Ali al-Kaabi, the labor minister in the U.A.E. "As long as these three factors are in place, the workers have no reason to protest. If they have any problems or complaints they should speak with a supervisor, who should come to the ministry. Then if we don't act they have the right to protest."

But the sheer number of workers who have poured into the country over the past two years and inadequate staffing at the ministry have meant that many problems slip through, some officials and human rights workers say.

Only 80 government inspectors oversee about 200,000 companies and other establishments that employ migrant workers, Mr. Ghaemi said, citing government figures. The inspectors also look at labor camps: of the 36 camps inspected from May through December last year, the ministry ranked 27 well below government standards.

"There's such a boom and so many laborers required here that the government is bringing measures which are not entirely adequate," said B. S. Mubarak, labor and welfare consul at the Consulate General of India in Dubai. "Neither we nor the ministry can cope with the growing number of laborers and growing number of complaints."

As he boards a bus to his construction site every morning but Friday, Mr. Kumaran says he looks up at Dubai's skyline of gleaming high rises with a degree of sadness.

"I wish the rich people would realize who is building these towers," Mr. Kumaran said, flanked by his co-workers. "I wish they could come and see how sad this life is."

Imams In Spain Say Muslims And Jews Must Confront Extremism (NYT)

By Renwick Mclean

SEVILLE, Spain, March 23 -- Scores of rabbis and imams gathered here this week to discuss what they called a deepening crisis in relations between Muslims and Jews, saying religious leaders must confront religious extremism and the failure to make meaningful progress on the conflict in the Middle East.

The meeting did not produce any sweeping agreements, but it was nonetheless heralded by many participants as a breakthrough, bringing together religious leaders who have the potential to bridge the divisions between Muslims and Jews, but who rarely interact.

Leaders who seldom cross paths despite living only minutes apart, like ultra-Orthodox rabbis from Israel and former members of the radical Palestinian group Hamas, spent four days in a hotel here sitting in the same rooms, eating the same meals and occasionally talking, guardedly at first, but increasingly freely as the conference progressed.

“You have some of the most fundamentalist people from both religions here,” said Eliezer Simcha Weisz, a rabbi in Emek Hefer, Israel. “These people would never sit together in Israel.”

The meeting, organized by the French foundation Hommes de Parole, which promotes dialogue between conflicting groups, included hostile exchanges and pointed arguments about terrorism, Israeli settlements and claims to Jerusalem. But it also led to some uninhibited displays of camaraderie, like rabbis and imams singing and dancing together during an impromptu musical performance in the hotel lobby near midnight.

But sporadic displays of conviviality did not temper the underlying tension. At the opening ceremony on Sunday, the chief rabbi of Israel, Yona Metzger, noting that most Muslims are moderates, asked the imams in the audience: "Why don't you speak when Bin Laden invokes your religion to justify terrorism? Why don't you express yourselves in a loud voice?"

Even discussions as seemingly innocuous as the virtues of peace often turned into arguments. "No one can speak about peace while there is occupation," said Imad al-Falouji, a former Hamas member and one of the most prominent imams in Gaza, referring to the Israeli presence in the West Bank.

But the participants appeared to agree broadly that tensions between Muslims and Jews had grown worse in recent years in part because religious leaders had lost their voice, allowing politicians, diplomats and, most worrisome, extremists to dictate relations between the two religions.

"Religion has been misused by the fundamentalists, who have taken over religion and made us hostages," said André Azoulay, a Jew from Morocco who is a senior adviser to King Mohammed VI. "They could do so because we were silent."

Rabbi Daniel Sperber, president of the Institute for Advanced Torah Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, Israel, said that religious leaders had many shared beliefs and might be able to reach agreements where diplomats had failed.

"We haven't even begun to tap the resources of the religious world," he said. "This is the first stage, trying to bring people together to establish some sort of common agenda."

At the conclusion of the conference on Wednesday, the leaders issued a joint communiqué denouncing the use of religion to justify violence and urging respect for religious symbols, an apparent response to the recent protests of cartoons depicting the Prophet Muhammad.

The declaration also included an implicit condemnation of statements from Hamas and the president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, calling for the destruction of Israel. "We condemn any incitement against a faith or people, let alone any call for their elimination, and we urge authorities to do likewise," the statement said.

But the real value of the conference, most participants said, was in the informal meetings that took place in the hallways and at the dinner tables, allowing participants to put faces on people often portrayed as the enemy back home.

Ashour Kullab, a Muslim leader from Gaza who had never spoken with a rabbi before coming here, said he spoke with two rabbis on the first morning of the conference. "There were no problems with them," he said. "They listened and I listened. They are my friends now."

The encounter, he said, could never have happened in the Gaza Strip, where extremists do not tolerate friendships with Jews. "If I go with them in the streets in Gaza, I might get shot," he said.

The group first met last year in Brussels. In bringing the conference to Seville this year, organizers hoped to recapture some of the relative harmony that is said to have governed Muslim-Jewish relations here during the Middle Ages, when Spain was a Muslim-controlled territory called Al Andalus.

That sense of cooperation seemed to find its way into many discussions.

During a coffee break early in the conference, Stuart Altshuler, a rabbi from Mission Viejo, Calif., got into an angry dispute with Mr. Falouji, the imam from Gaza, over the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians.

But the two made up shortly after, saying they had benefited from the exchange. "I was able to meet with Falouji from Gaza," Rabbi Altshuler said the next day. "I've dreamed of a chance to do that."

Belarus Police Deter Thousands Of Protesters (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

MINSK, Belarus, March 25 — Riot police dispersed a fresh challenge to President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko on Saturday, blocking thousands of antigovernment demonstrators from reaching the central square in the capital and later arresting a top opposition leader.

The leader, Aleksandr V. Kazulin, was seized as he marched with hundreds of supporters on a prison where opposition members are held. The police also shoved and beat many of the protesters while they gathered on the sidewalks in the capital's center. Dozens of people were arrested, the opposition said.

Before the police seized Mr. Kazulin, one of the candidates who had challenged Mr. Lukashenko in the recent election, the two sides had been jostling throughout the day to show their strength, and the opposition displayed surprising resolve in the first hour.

Despite hundreds of arrests during the week and a police crackdown in which many of the most active members of the opposition have been detained, at least 6,000 people appeared at noon in central Minsk, where they were met by phalanxes of riot police with clubs. Some demonstrators carried flowers. They chanted "Truth! Truth! Truth!" and "Freedom! Freedom!"

After being blocked from October Square during a tense hour of confrontations with formations of riot police, the crowd dispersed and reassembled at a nearby Yanka Kupala Park, where another opposition leader said they would not cease in their campaign of civil disobedience against Mr. Lukashenko and his autocratic government.

"What is going on in Belarus can be compared to the storm of a fortress," said Aleksandr Milinkevich, the principal challenger to Mr. Lukashenko in the election this month. "This was the first storm. We will use peaceful methods. We will surround that fortress and we will not retreat."

In time, he said, "We will turn that fortress upside down."

Later, when demonstrators led by Mr. Kazulin marched on the prison, participants said the police dispersed them using stun grenades. Mr. Kazulin was arrested by a team of special forces officers who rushed him and snatched him from the crowd, witnesses said.

The police also arrested Mr. Milinkevich's spokesman in a separate confrontation. He was later released. The charges against Mr. Kazulin were not immediately clear.

The unauthorized rallies continued a week of small but intensive public defiance against Mr. Lukashenko, who is often called Europe's last dictator and whose police state, an island of Soviet nostalgia and Communist ideology, is feared by citizens for its brutality.

Mr. Lukashenko was re-elected on March 19 in a vote the West and the opposition regard as rigged, and the United States has called for a new vote and said it will impose penalties against Mr. Lukashenko and his top officials. The European Union has also said it will seek penalties.

For the first time in 12 years of Mr. Lukashenko's rule, people have carried out sustained demonstrations against him, including four nights of continuous protests on October Square, before the riot police conducted a mass arrest of hundreds of demonstrators early on Friday morning.

Mr. Milinkevich had called for another demonstration on Saturday, an unofficial holiday celebrating a brief period of Belarussian independence in 1918.

The turnout on Saturday in the face of police violence suggested that the opposition had far more support than Mr. Lukashenko had conceded in his derisive public remarks.

The protesters, who have modeled their effort in part after freedom movements against Communist or post-Soviet governments in Poland, Serbia, Georgia, Ukraine and elsewhere, were young and old, men and women. They called loudly for a new way of life, free of state repression and with integration with the West, which Mr. Lukashenko loathes.

In a move reminiscent of Soviet times, the authorities said protesters were not allowed to walk on October Square because the ice on the skating rink there was being removed for spring. The demonstrators rejected the explanation as another official lie.

They massed on the sidewalks near the square, waved flowers and banned Belarussian flags, and shouted at the police: "Shame! Shame! Shame!" As their numbers grew they began to push, at one point forcing a line of police half a block backward, and almost reaching the square's edge.

But the police reinforced themselves swiftly, and thick lines of officers jogged into place and stopped the advance. The demonstrators also briefly blocked traffic two times at one of Minsk's main intersections, but were forced away within minutes by police charges.

More police reinforcements arrived, and began plunging into the crowd in platoon-sized formations, separating it into smaller groups that were then forced to move away.

Many demonstrators in the front rows were beaten, punched or kicked, but the officers did not seem as interested in arresting them as they were in clearing them from Independence Avenue, one of Minsk's principal streets. Once the crowd backed away the officers did not pursue it. As the demonstrators gave ground, they jeered at the dense formations of officers, clad in black, on whom they said the government had spent extravagant sums to protect itself from its own people.

"This is where our money goes," said Galina Apalko, 23, a student, before being chased back half a block by a rushing line of police.

"These special forces — they are black cockroaches," said one stooped and elderly pensioner, who gave only her first name, Maria. "They are hirelings. My parents were oppressed. I am oppressed. I hate this power."

Mr. Milinkevich said in an interview in the evening that it was possible the authorities might arrest him as well, but that he would continue to organize peaceful resistance.

He disapproved of Mr. Kazulin's march on the prison, saying that marching on a secure building was too provocative, and that demonstrators should try to assemble in public spaces. "I am categorically against such actions," he said. "It is important for us to show that we are not aggressive, that we are for only peaceful acts. Then we attract more people and we can grow."

Mr. Milinkevich said the opposition's next attempt at mass public assembly would be April 26, the 20th anniversary of the nuclear disaster at Chernobyl, which blanketed much of Belarus with radioactive waste.

He said he would be working with volunteers to mobilize more people to demonstrate on that day, using his supporters to spread the word in small meetings, e-mail messages and fliers. Gathering public supporters here is difficult, as students have been threatened with expulsion and workers with dismissal for participating in opposition events.

There is also virtually no independent news media in Belarus, and television is run by Mr. Lukashenko's centralized state, making it difficult for opposition organizers to circulate word of their actions. Still, Mr. Milinkevich has been confident in recent days, saying that Belarussians are shedding their fear, and that Mr. Lukashenko will be chased from power before the end of his five-year term.

As has been the case all week, state television belittled the opposition and the demonstrators, saying on the news that they were agents of foreign governments.

"Today, the ex-candidates who lost the elections call on a storm of state offices, the forced seizure of power and a push to bloodshed in the streets of Minsk," the presenter on BT television station said.

"As it became known to us from informed circles, the organization of riots in the streets of Minsk is taking place in accordance with the instructions received from the European Union."

Protest Takes Bloody Detour In Belarus (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

In a clash over the March 19 vote, riot police confront marchers, clubbing some to the ground and arresting dozens.

MOSCOW — A rally billed as a last-ditch attempt to challenge a discredited presidential election in Belarus erupted in violence Saturday as riot police plunged into the crowd with truncheons and arrested dozens of people, including opposition candidate Alexander Kozulin.

As protesters, some of them bloodied, ran screaming from the scene, police chased organizers down side streets of the capital, Minsk, clubbing them to the ground once they were caught.

"Law enforcement took maximum security measures to prevent an escalation, and protected people who were simply trying to spend their leisure time nearby," Interior Minister Vladimir Naumov said at a news conference later in the day.

He accused Kozulin, one of two opposition candidates who unsuccessfully challenged President Alexander G. Lukashenko in the March 19 election, of urging supporters to storm a jail where detained activists were being held and of calling "for the physical elimination of the head of state, and for a power grab."

But Kozulin's spokeswoman, Nina Shidlovskaya, said the protest was only intended as a peaceful show of support for the detainees.

Kozulin, a former university rector, stepped in front of the crowd to negotiate, "to try to explain why we were here, and that we didn't mean any harm," she said in a telephone interview. "But when he started walking toward them, the police began to beat their clubs against their shields, and they were advancing toward us like an iron-clad army."

The protesters turned down another street, but were suddenly set upon by police who broke the crowd into sections of several dozen each and began beating protesters with clubs, Shidlovskaya said.

"People began to fall down with bloodied heads. It was a horrible scene. All I could see was clubs rising and falling on people's heads. The street was filled with screams of pain," she said. "I turned and saw Alexander [Kozulin], who had been all the time next to me. He was a few steps behind me, and a policeman was holding him with one hand and raising his club with the other hand over his head. That was the last time I saw him."

Eight policemen were injured in the clashes, authorities said.

Lukashenko, a former collective farm manager who has been accused of manipulating elections to remain in power for the last 12 years, maintains a government-controlled economy and repressive security apparatus to run a country often seen as a relic of the Soviet era.

Relative prosperity and a wide social services network have assured Lukashenko's popularity, but international observers found deep flaws in the voting that handed the president an 82.6% victory. They said harassment and arrests of opposition leaders and members of the independent media rendered the balloting undemocratic.

On Friday, the United States and the European Union said they would impose targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions on Belarus.

In an interview with Kremlin political consultant Gleb Pavlovsky that aired on the Russian NTV network Saturday night, Lukashenko asserted that Belarus compared favorably with Western Europe.

"They say that Lukashenko is a bad one because he is taking a third term. But why is nobody saying that [British Prime Minister Tony] Blair is bad because he's taking a third term?" Lukashenko said, speaking of himself in the third person. "They say France has such a democratic society, but then we saw Paris on fire. What kind of democracy is this?"

"Everyone lives together amicably here," he said, adding that the West was unhappy because he had frustrated plans to extend the reach of institutions such as the EU and NATO into Belarus.

The rally, on the anniversary of the declaration of the first independent Belarusian state in 1918, began as a peaceful show of support for a new election.

When police quietly blocked access to Oktyabrskaya Square in the center of the city, the scene of major protests for several days last week, an estimated 5,000 people moved farther down the street to a nearby park. Demonstrators waved flags and chanted "We are not afraid!"

Another opposition candidate, Alexander Milinkevich, who won 6% of the vote in the official count, announced the creation of a broad-based new civil rights movement: Truth, Justice and Freedom.

After about three hours, Kozulin, who drew about 2% of the vote, called on about 1,000 supporters to march toward the detention center. Shidlovskaya, his spokeswoman, said the plan was to "express solidarity with our comrades who were arrested" during the forced closure early Friday of an opposition tent camp in Oktyabrskaya Square.

Milinkevich was furious, saying Kozulin's move helped turn the peaceful protest into a violent debacle.

"We were resolutely against it. We knew it would provoke the authorities," he said in a telephone interview from a police station where he was seeking the release of his press secretary.

"We didn't want to offer the authorities another chance to show their cruel face, and we wanted people to go home," he said. "It was a bloody, violent scene, and that's exactly what the authorities wanted. Now they're going to portray us all over television as terrorists…. But it was not a fight. Peaceful, unarmed people were beaten up by heavily armed police."

He said the arrests numbered in the hundreds. Authorities declined to give a number.

Milinkevich said opposition leaders were not planning more rallies during the next 30 days.

"Some people think I should hide, that the authorities may be looking for me to arrest me," he said. "But if they want to arrest me, I have no place to hide. I'm certainly not leaving the country, not now, not ever."

Belarus Witness: 'They Knocked My Husband Off His Feet And Dragged Him Away' (TIME)

By Yuri Zarakhovich

Time, March 26, 2006

After the brutal crackdown, an opposition leader's wife gives her firsthand account of his beating and arrest

"My husband walked up to the commanding officer smiling and with flowers in hand. But before he started talking, the officer ordered attack. They knocked my husband off his feet, started beating him up, and then dragged him away" Irina Kozulina told Time in a phone interview, Saturday. "Then, they started beating up the rest of us."

The beating and arrest Saturday of Alexander Kozulin, a key opposition leader and a presidential candidate in last week's election — now branded as a farce by the EU and the U.S. — signaled the onset of a bloody melee in Minsk that left thousands beaten up,several of them in grave condition, tear-gassed, stunned with percussion grenades and chased all over town by club-wielding policemen. Hundreds have been detained. Arrests are still underway in the city. Earlier, Kazulin had told TIME in an interview that the government's response to the protests underscored its lack of legitimacy.

Although the habit is frowned upon by the government, March 25 is celebrated by many in Belarus as Liberty Day — the anniversary of the short-lived independent People's Republic of Belarus, proclaimed in 1918, but crushed by the Bolsheviks six months later. This year's anniversary coincided with a mass protest rally against the fraudulent election staged by President Alexander Lukashenko in order to extend his 12 years in power.

The opposition had planned to hold the rally in Oktyabrskaya Square in the center of the capital, Minsk, where police on Friday had destroyed a protest tent camp and arrested 328 activists. Human rights groups allege that many of these detainees were badly beaten and abused. And then, as Saturday's protesters began heading to the Square, they found it and the approaching streets blocked by riot police, who had blockaded the entire town, forcing the opposition into a nearby Yanka Kupala park.

The opposition stresses its intentions had been peaceful. "We're not planning any violence, any taking of the Bastille," vowed Alexander Milinkevich, a presidential candidate of united democratic parties and opposition leader. "I hope the authorities understand this."

But the authorities that had rigged the election were in no mood to extend such understanding to Milinkevich and his followers. Instead, their attempt to squelch a peaceful protest added to the growing resentment and provoked a major clash.

Says Irina Khalip, a respected Belarus journalist and human rights activist honored in 2005 as one of Time's European Heroes, "There were some 20,000 of us, packed in the park and gathered around. The people were angry with the rigged election, mass arrests and inhuman treatment of the detainees which their families learned about from cell phone calls and messages, before the phones were taken away. Most families did not even know where their sons and daughters were held. So, Kozulin led the protest march to the Okrestina street jail. The people wanted to protest and to find out where their relatives are."

Nataliya Razina of the Charter 97 human rights group, who took part in the march, says marchers headed for Okrestina jail in a Liberty Day show of solidarity with the prisoners. "It was all so peaceful, people were carrying balloons, flowers, and smiling," she says. "I don't recall having felt so good over these last tense weeks. But all of a sudden they started shooting grenades and tear gas at us. It was such a transition to horror."

The column had been met with lines of riot police, whose commanding officer Kozulin approached with a smile on his lips and flowers in hand. Khalip remembers the troopers launching the assault, but it's painful to her to talk more — she is still suffering aftershocks of a stun grenade exploding near her.

Now, even more people are desperately searching for their arrested or missing relatives and friends. "We have been calling all the precincts, jails and hospitals for the last two hours," Irina Kozulina told Time, "But we still don't know where they keep my husband and what became of him."

Nor do the people know what will become of their Belarus under the authoritarian rule of Lukashenko. Shortly before Saturday's crackdown, Milinkevich had pledged to join forces with Kozulin to create an opposition united front. But Milinkevich has since blamed Kozulin for having provoked the melee, suggesting the nascent coalition may be short-lived — and leaving opposition supporters disorganized and leaderless in the face of a crackdown. Still, many vow they will fight back, regardless of who is willing to lead them.

Ukraine Is The Winner As Nation Heads To The Polls (LAT)

By David Holley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

The first parliamentary election since the Orange Revolution reflects the nuanced politics expected of a democracy.

KIEV, Ukraine — Less than a year and a half after President Viktor Yushchenko struggled to power in a historic contest filled with clashes over corruption and fraud, voters today head into parliamentary elections in which the tone is much closer to the nuanced politics expected of a democracy.

The dreamy pro-Western coalition that brought Yushchenko victory through the Orange Revolution has broken into competing factions.

That sets the stage for a three-way race featuring the Party of Regions, headed by Viktor Yanukovich, the pro-Russian former prime minister who lost the 2004 presidential race; Yushchenko's Our Ukraine; and the Yulia Tymoshenko Bloc.

None of these parties is expected to win a majority, but any combination of two probably could name the next prime minister.

Yushchenko contends that by bringing democracy to this former Soviet republic of 48 million, the Orange Revolution is an irreversible success, whoever comes to power this time.

"This is the first democratic election," Yushchenko said at a recent news conference. "Colleagues, it is sufficient for us to be proud of."

Polls show that Yanukovich's party, with its strong base in industrialized eastern Ukraine, is likely to finish first, with about 30% of the vote, and the two main parties that led the Orange Revolution are each expected to have a share of 15% to 20%. Seats in the 450-member parliament are allocated proportionally according to the vote count.

A total of 45 parties and blocs are competing in the election, several of which are likely to get at least 3% of the vote, the threshold for getting into parliament. Some of them are seen as potential coalition partners for any of the three main parties.

No matter who comes out the winner, the most important changes triggered by the Orange Revolution are permanent because "the train has already moved way too far toward Europe and democracy and freedom," said Denis Bohush, who is running on the Pora-PRP ticket, which unites Orange activists and the Reforms and Order Party.

"People had perceived themselves as a second-class nation, or the younger brother of Russia. Now we are very proud of our country, and you can't kill that," Bohush said.

"That's the main thing. Second, censorship in the media is gone." Unlike the early rounds of balloting in 2004, this election will be honest, he said.

"Even if Yanukovich wins this election, the people would know this is fair," he said. "That's another positive fact: The results of this election will be the real results."

University student Aleksandra Dubnya, a supporter of the Orange Revolution, has one worry: that parties loyal to the two leaders who clashed so bitterly in the presidential race could end up running the country jointly in a "grand coalition."

"I think that's something that might happen," she said. "I would be very sad about it. We have a saying that 'you can't mix holy things and sins.' "

For Dubnya, 20, the "holy things" are the people and dreams that came together two years ago around Yushchenko's campaign, which achieved victory only after huge protests against electoral fraud forced a repeat runoff with Yanukovich, who was prime minister.

The orange-bedecked revolutionaries, who supported Yushchenko's vision of remaking Ukraine in the image of a Western European country, viewed Yanukovich as the representative of corrupt business interests from the country's generally pro-Russian eastern region.

How the post-election horse-trading will work out is far from clear, but many observers think it conceivable that Yanukovich could end up back in the prime minister's post, as Dubnya fears.

Her friend Victor Kusnezh, 23, a graduate student in physics who also backs Yushchenko, is more sanguine. He says that the Orange Revolution's dreams and passions soared unrealistically high, and that whatever happens, things will be OK now.

"Everything was seen as black and white: Yanukovich was a thief and an enemy, and Yushchenko was the hero of the Ukrainian nation," Kusnezh said. "But it was impossible for that to be completely accurate. There were many different kinds of people on Yushchenko's side — they can't be 'holy.' I think even if Yushchenko makes a deal with Yanukovich, that's not terrible. That's democracy. The purpose of the fight was democracy in Ukraine."

The leader of the third main party, Tymoshenko, played a key role in bringing Yushchenko to power and served as his first prime minister. Their split in September was triggered by feuding allies and differences over economic policy and the pace of changes: Tymoshenko favored radical moves and the president a more cautious approach.

Tymoshenko has said she would never join forces with Yanukovich. But Yushchenko has kept the door open to that possibility.

Supporters of a Yanukovich-Yushchenko coalition think it would help unify Ukraine's disparate regions and ensure steady economic development.

But critics say it would be a sellout by Yushchenko of the Orange Revolution's democratic and pro-Western ideals.

Anna Bychkova, 66, a pensioner in the eastern city of Alchevsk who moved from Russia in 1958 to take a job at a chemical factory, is typical of those who hope Yanukovich will come back to power and boost government backing for state-run industries.

"Yanukovich speaks Russian more, and he's more for the simple people," she said.

Although most Ukrainians can speak both languages, those in western Ukraine tend to prefer Ukrainian and those in the eastern part of the country are more likely to think in Russian.

Promotion of Russian as a second official language is in the Party of Regions' campaign platform. Yushchenko and Tymoshenko usually speak Ukrainian at political events and Yanukovich typically speaks Russian.

Stanislav Belich, head of the miners union at the Bazhanov coal mine near the eastern city of Donetsk, said he would vote for the Party of Regions because he liked the government's policies when Yanukovich was prime minister, from 2002 to 2004.

"They stopped closing the mines," he said. "Factories increased production. This happened when Yanukovich was in power, so the eastern regions have been supporting him."

In Ukraine, Moscow's Man Makes Comeback (WP)

Kremlin Trying to Maintain Sympathies of Ex-Soviet States

KIEV, Ukraine, March 25 -- For a man who was supposed to be politically dead, Viktor Yanukovych has a light step. With a bounce in his stride, he emerged onto a downtown stage Friday evening, faux-marble columns framing his salute, as a crowd of thousands chanted his name in four hard beats: "Yan-U-Kov-Ych."

The Kremlin's favorite for power in this former Soviet republic, he was vanquished 16 months ago by the weeks of marches and sit-ins known as the Orange Revolution. Now, opinion polls predict that his party will win the largest number of seats in parliamentary elections Sunday.

His comeback reflects the advent of genuine democratic freedoms in Ukraine, a nation of 47 million people on the shores of the Black Sea, and the rapid disintegration of the political coalition the revolution brought to office. President Viktor Yushchenko and his former allies on the streets now trade accusations of corruption, incompetence and betrayal almost daily.

Russia is watching the vote closely. Yanukovych is the country's hope for the central goal of its foreign policy: the fostering of sympathetic governments in the former Soviet republics that share its borders. In the months since the revolution, Ukraine has aligned itself firmly with the European Union, the United States and NATO; Yanukovych has said that any government he heads would swing back toward Moscow.

Across the border in Belarus, elections last weekend brought results that pleased Russia, an official 82 percent victory for pro-Moscow President Alexander Lukashenko. On Friday and Saturday, riot police were crushing the seeds of what the opposition was calling the Denim Revolution. The West has promised sanctions. Russia has nodded its approval of the conduct of the election and the police response to the demonstrations.

Russia last year signed a military cooperation agreement with Uzbekistan, which closed a U.S. air base and is rounding up dissidents, but elsewhere, the Kremlin has failed to keep the former republics in its orbit. The three Baltic states, Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia, are now E.U. members; Georgia has a strongly pro-Western president.

Following independence with the 1991 breakup of the Soviet Union, Ukraine remained largely in Russia's camp. State television and newspapers hardly mentioned the opposition; permits for rallies were rarely granted; and protesters were often harassed. There were accusations of politically motivated murders.

In late 2004, Yanukovych campaigned with Moscow's backing against Yushchenko. Drawing most of his votes from Ukraine's large Russian-speaking population in its eastern region, Yanukovych was declared the winner. That brought hundreds of thousands of people into the streets, led by Yushchenko and Yulia Tymoshenko, a charismatic businesswoman and politician. A new vote was ordered; this time, Yushchenko was declared the winner.

But in September, Yushchenko dismissed Tymoshenko from the post of prime minister, sundering the alliance that was at the heart of the demonstrations. The political divorce heightened deep public discontent with Ukraine's weakening economy under their stewardship.

Economic growth fell dramatically in 2005 and is now stalled. In the first two months of this year, the economy expanded at an annual rate of only 2 percent, one of the slowest in Eastern Europe.

"There was a crash of illusions, a crash of expectations," said Kost Bondarenko, a political analyst. "A year ago, Yushchenko was an unambiguous hero."

In addition, tensions mounted with Russia. This winter, Russia's state-controlled energy firm Gazprom briefly cut off natural gas supplies in a pricing dispute that was seen here as punishment for the government's westward turn.

A recent opinion poll by the Democratic Initiative Fund and Ukrainian Social Service projected that Yanukovych's party would win 30 percent of the vote, the biggest of any group, assuring it the largest share of seats in the 450-seat parliament.

At his rally Friday, Yanukovych declared 2006 to be "the year of unification and revival. They deceived one part of the nation and put the other part on its knees," he said, referring to the Orange Revolution leaders. "We should never again allow such irresponsible power."

Jostling for second place in the polls is Yushchenko's Our Ukraine party, with 17 percent of the vote, and Bloc Yulia, the political arm of Tymoshenko, with a slightly smaller figure.

After the vote, Ukraine will likely face weeks of backroom negotiations on the formation of a government. And while Yushchenko and Tymoshenko may yet reconcile and overcome their months of bitter sniping, a once unimaginable possibility has floated out of the wreckage of their alliance: a government formed between the parties of Yushchenko and Yanukovych.

"It is sad that those who falsified the elections only yesterday and humiliated citizens are shouting about comeback today," said Yushchenko, 52, in a televised address to the nation Friday night. But he did not rule out the possibility of working with Yanukovych. Tymoshenko, however, has. "Why did we have a revolution then?" she asked at a meeting with foreign reporters Thursday.

Bondarenko, the analyst, sees positive potential in an alliance. "For Yushchenko," he said, "a coalition with the Party of Regions can offer a period of stable development and it may also legitimize his presidency in eastern Ukraine" among Russian speakers there.

But other analysts believe that such a shift could leave Tymoshenko as the sole inheritor of the Orange Revolution and its voters in future elections. "Going with the Party of Regions will be a political death for Yushchenko," said Volodymyr Polokhalo, editor in chief of Political Thought, a political science journal.

While the shape of the future government and Ukraine's strategic direction remains uncertain, the Orange Revolution has bequeathed one visible legacy, vibrant politics.

The election campaign, though fueled by the funds of local tycoons who continue to wield enormous influence behind the scenes, is competitive; foreign monitors expect it to be largely free and fair.

Until Friday night, the official end of the campaign, the streets here were alive with the colors of parties -- 45 in all -- that are vying for seats. Not just Yushchenko's orange, Yanukovych's blue and Tymoshenko's white, but the pink, greens, yellows and reds of smaller parties. The airwaves crackled with the kind debate and analysis that doesn't exist in many other parts of the former Soviet Union.

"It's very confusing and I think there are too many parties, but you can't deny the competition and I like that," said Larysa Bilevych, a 58-year-old pensioner.

Supporters of opposing parties mingled easily, unlike in 2004, and phalanxes of flag-waving activists marched around the city, which was dotted with the tents of all the major parties.

It's a stark contrast with Belarus. International election observers called the election there seriously flawed. Thousands of opposition supporters, seeking to emulate the Orange Revolution, took to the streets in a small but unprecedented defiance of the government.

The Kremlin congratulated Lukashenko and accused the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, a transatlantic group that monitors elections, of bias and incitement.

Belarusian police waited until the middle of the night Friday, when the strength of the crowd was at its weakest, and then cleared a central square that demonstrators had occupied. On Saturday, they sealed off the square and dispersed reassembling protesters with baton charges and tear gas. "I declare the creation of a popular movement for the liberation of Belarus," opposition leader Alexander Milinkevich told his supporters Saturday.

The opposition announced that no new rallies were planned until April 26, the 20th anniversary of Chernobyl nuclear disaster.

Ukraine's Election (WP)

The Washington Post, March 26, 2006

AS UKRAINIANS prepare to participate in the most democratic election in their nation's history today, they need only cast a glance northward to see how much they gained from their Orange Revolution. Early Friday morning riot police in neighboring Belarus scattered or arrested the courageous citizens who had camped in the main square of Minsk to protest last weekend's blatantly unfair presidential vote, which extended the mandate of autocrat Alexander Lukashenko. Police broke up another protest yesterday.

Mr. Lukashenko awarded himself 83 percent of the vote, a result deemed credible by only one world leader -- Russian President Vladimir Putin, who backs Belarus's corrupt dictatorship in order to maintain Moscow's dominion over the country. Mr. Putin's colleagues in the Group of Eight nations are rushing to announce new sanctions against Mr. Lukashenko's regime while studiously ignoring the fact that their chairman, who is proudly preparing to host the G-8 summit this summer, is responsible for it.

Mr. Putin tried the same strategy in Ukraine, but the crowds that gathered in Kiev in 2004 were too large to disperse, and the attempt to install a president by thuggery and fraud collapsed. As a direct result Ukrainians will vote today for a newly empowered parliament: Forty-five parties are competing, and everything indicates the election will be free and fair.

That doesn't mean, of course, that this strategic country has become a stable democracy. Ukraine has had a bumpy 16 months since the revolution. Its government split after a populist prime minister recklessly mismanaged the economy, and the popularity of President Viktor Yushchenko, the revolution's hero, has plunged. Mr. Putin, meanwhile, has managed to gain a stranglehold over Ukraine's energy supplies through a one-sided and probably corrupt gas deal. The pro-Russian party he tried to install in power has made a comeback and could win the largest share of today's vote.

This muddled situation has prompted a debate in Washington about how to manage relations with Ukraine once the vote comes in. Some in the Bush administration are quietly encouraging the Orange Revolution parties to set aside their differences and form a new coalition so as to prevent the pro-Moscow candidate, Viktor Yanukovych, from becoming prime minister. But a few experts outside the government argue that Mr. Yanukovych's party, backed by some of Ukraine's biggest private businessmen, is ready to embrace Western capitalism and that a coalition between it and Mr. Yushchenko's party could heal Ukraine's lingering divisions.

Whatever the outcome, continued Western engagement with Ukraine will be vital. To preserve the country's independence, the new government will need closer ties with the European Union and NATO. It may seek a NATO "membership action plan"; if so, the alliance should respond favorably. The new administration will also need Western support to renegotiate the terms of energy supplies with Russia, so as to eliminate the corruption and unfairness of the current arrangement. Mr. Putin's vision for Ukraine was on stark display in Belarus last week. If Western governments want to preserve the democracy that has flourished against his wishes, they must provide it tangible support.

AOSHI, China -- On a recent day in this southern Chinese village, an elderly peasant wearing a conical straw hat hoed fitfully at the dirt in a vacant lot. Only 90 feet to the east, but a world away, the winners in China's new economy pulled into a shiny new Honda dealership.

Not long ago, the two-acre lot where the cars are sold -- under a proud red tower with "Honda" emblazoned on it -- was lush with rice paddies, truck farms and peanut plots. But times have changed. The fields of Aoshi and surrounding hamlets have been swallowed up by economic development unfurling at breakneck speed across the plains and hills here in Guangdong province, about 175 miles northwest of Hong Kong.

Like the stooped peasant working the soil, many farmers here have been reduced to tilling vacant strips along the borders of new buildings and construction sites, raising crops on ground that is no longer legally theirs to work. Their land, on the edge of fast-growing Yunfu city, has been marked for development, and they have been marked for obsolescence.

"We can't afford to buy those cars," a farmer said, looking at the Honda dealership as if it were in a foreign country. "The only ones buying them are government officials."

Across China, millions of farmers in thousands of villages have met similar fates, pushed aside by the need for land to build factories, apartments, hospitals and roads in a country enjoying more than 9 percent annual growth. The boom has led to a better life for most of the 1.3 billion Chinese, often including farmers. But it has come at the price of tearing peasants from their roots and their livelihood, leaving them no option but to become migrant workers in factories far from home.

"We don't have our land anymore, so where do we go?" said a young farmer whose family plot in Aoshi was bulldozed to make way for a fire station.

Without an independent court system and unschooled in the ways of bureaucracy, the farmers fend for themselves against frequently corrupt local Communist Party officials with broad authority and powerful economic incentive to confiscate farmland to sell to developers. In recent years, the result increasingly has been rage and violent protest. Stability in the countryside has become a major worry for President Hu Jintao's government, leading Hu to launch an intense campaign for improving life in the countryside.

In Aoshi and the adjacent villages of Xiangyang, Baimianshi and Shangxiangwei, the price of progress was made clear when officials from Yunfu city showed up one day a year and a half ago and told farmers to quickly harvest as many fruits and vegetables as they could. Heavy equipment arrived 90 minutes later and was in use until nightfall, villagers recalled, destroying rice paddies, truck gardens and peanut plots that had provided them with a livelihood for generations untold.Protests Put Down

The farmers in Aoshi, on Yunfu's northern edge, protested noisily when the bulldozers came. Hundreds of policemen quickly put down the demonstration. Ten farmers said they were arrested -- a pattern that would be repeated during protests over the next year.

The bulldozers and front-end loaders kept at it for 10 days, until about 36 acres had been scraped bare for construction. Although not a large amount of land by U.S. standards, farmers supporting 144 families, comprising most of the four villages' 800 residents, had been put out of work, their leaders said.

Within two weeks, the farmers had organized and gone to Yunfu's Land and Resources Administration to complain. Yunfu's compensation offer, a one-time payment averaging $875 per landholding villager, was inadequate, they said. Instead, they insisted on a lifetime pension of $44 a month per villager. Officials repeatedly told them everything had been carried out according to law.

They also turned to the courts. But a court official told them nothing could be done. "Yunfu is just too corrupt," the official told them. They went to see provincial authorities in Guangzhou, who also rejected their pleas.

Undaunted, the farmers traveled to Beijing on Nov. 19, 2004, two months after the bulldozers showed up. They visited the Land and Resources Ministry, the petition office of Premier Wen Jiabao's government headquarters and China Central Television, where, they said, no one was interested in a DVD showing the destruction of their fields.

Instead of attention, they said, they received repeated visits from city and provincial officials urging them to stay home and avoid making more trouble. Three months passed, and they were no closer to recovering their land or getting what they considered acceptable compensation.4out of their villages at 1 a.m., six of the farmers traveled to the capital on March 15, 2005. Despite their stealth, they recalled, Yunfu police and civilian officials tracked them down and ordered them to drop their petitions or face problems at home.

The farmers instead split into three pairs to shake the tail. The tactic worked. One team eluded the police and presented another petition to Wen's office. There was no response, and on the train back to Guangzhou, they noticed a policeman still shadowing them.

By May, work had begun on the Honda dealership and, down the road, on the regional fire station. With no compensation settlement in sight, villagers grew desperate as months went by. Again sneaking out one by one after midnight Nov. 1, six farmers returned to Beijing, hoping to present their petition anew in Wen's office.

"That's the only place we knew to go," one said.Hopes Dashed

This time, their hopes rose. An official in the petition office of the State Council, or cabinet, gave them a letter in a sealed envelope. Do not open it, they recalled him saying, but give it to the Guangdong provincial petition office and await a response. On Nov. 17, they got an appointment to present the letter. The Guangdong petition official, they recalled, read the letter from Beijing and then handed them another letter, also sealed, and asked them to hand it over unopened to the Yunfu petition office.

At last, things seemed to be working. So by Nov. 21, when they got in to see a Yunfu petition official and give him the provincial letter, their spirits were high. The official reminded them that the petition office was only a mediator, they recalled, but he promised to turn the letter over to the appropriate authorities and get them an answer.

Nearly three months went by, the farmers said, before village leaders were finally called into a meeting on Feb. 16 with two North Yunfu District officials. "They once again said the land confiscation was legal," a participant said.

The distraught farmers pulled out a newspaper in which the Guangdong provincial party secretary, Zhang Dejiang, was quoted as saying that no land confiscation could be carried out until farmers and authorities agreed on the compensation. "Yes, we've seen that," one of the officials responded laconically, according to farmers in the meeting. "But you have to understand us. Our city is very poor. We can't give you everything you want."

Ye Rui, who heads the Yunfu Land and Resources Administration, said the city followed government rules, calculating compensation according to the value of crops in recent years. Asked for a more detailed accounting, he said in a telephone conversation that he first needed authorization from Guangdong provincial authorities. Provincial authorities, asked for the authorization, forwarded a fax nine days later affirming that the rules had been followed and adding no details.

An entrepreneur involved in the Honda dealership's land-use purchase said that the owner paid $250,000 for a little more than two acres. That amounted to many times the compensation offered to the peasants who worked the land, the farmers said, and they expressed interest in knowing who pocketed the difference.

Similar transactions have made land confiscations a source of revenue for cities across China, according to government officials, and a pool of ready funds for corrupt cadres to skim from. Zhou Tianyong, a professor at the Central Party School, estimated last year that resale of farmland for development has brought in $600 billion nationwide since 2003, and only 10 percent of that was paid to farmers in compensation.

In a recent speech, Wen condemned such profit-taking, joining President Hu in urging better treatment for China's 750 million farmers. The Yunfu party secretary, Zheng Liping, echoed the party's new theme recently, calling on the local government to "sincerely welcome petitions and sincerely resolve problems" raised by farmers, according to the South China Morning Post.

But in Aoshi and surrounding villages, the welcome was tense. Yunfu peppered the area with police after a Washington Post correspondent visited recently. Because of the heavy police presence, farmers were reluctant to leave their homes. Most of those interviewed asked that their names not be used for fear of retribution.

When the Post correspondent returned a couple of weeks later, he was swiftly surrounded by four unmarked vehicles and taken by plainclothes police to North Yunfu District headquarters. There he was interrogated and lectured on the need for authorization from provincial authorities for any reporting in Yunfu, before being escorted to the city limits and sent on his way.

Nigeria Will End Asylum For Warlord (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen And Marc Lacey

FREETOWN, Sierra Leone, March 25 — Nigeria said Saturday that it would end the asylum of the deposed Liberian dictator Charles G. Taylor and turn him over to the Liberian government for trial.

Mr. Taylor, a warlord-turned-president, spawned a bloody cycle of civil wars that killed 300,000 people across West Africa in the 1990's. He was indicted by the United Nations-backed Special Court here in Sierra Leone in 2003 for war crimes and crimes against humanity during this country's decade-long insurgency.

But the court has been unable to arrest Mr. Taylor, who left Liberia as rebels narrowed in on him in 2003. Instead, he went into exile in Nigeria, where authorities agreed in an internationally brokered deal to grant him safe haven in order to end 14 years of civil war in Liberia.

"God willing, I will be back," the flamboyant Mr. Taylor said as he bid farewell to his country.

Since agreeing to accept Mr. Taylor, the Nigerian government has rebuffed many attempts to put him on trial before the international court, saying it was awaiting a request from an elected Liberian government. Liberia's new president, Ellen Johnson

Sirleaf, raised the issue this month with President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria, describing it as an important part of bringing stability to Liberia.

"Liberia's peace is fragile," she said this month after announcing her extradition request. "There are many loyalists in our country to Mr. Taylor."

In Sierra Leone, where a cell has sat empty awaiting Mr. Taylor's arrival, there was fear and awe of the man who let loose so much misery in a nation smaller than South Carolina and home to five million people.

"We are very afraid of Charles Taylor coming here," said Jerry Nyuma Bongay, a 25-year-old student in Freetown. "But we want him to face justice. He hurt us too much."

Desmond De Silva, the chief prosecutor for the Sierra Leone court, hailed the announcement. "This is a remarkable day for justice," he said. "This is very important because it is all part of the fight against impunity."

In a statement on Saturday, Mr. Obasanjo said Liberia was free to take Mr. Taylor into custody. Although he is not under indictment in Liberia, United Nations peacekeepers there have been authorized by the Security Council to transfer him to Sierra Leone.

The statement gave no date or details for the transfer, but Mr. Obasanjo said he had never been against surrendering Mr. Taylor to a democratically elected government in Liberia. Ms. Johnson Sirleaf was sworn in as Liberia's president in January, becoming Africa's first woman to be elected head of state.

Mr. Taylor was forbidden from leaving Nigeria during his exile, but he continued to meddle in his former country's affairs from his government guest house in Calabar, on Nigeria's southern coast, using some of the millions of dollars he is accused of stealing from Liberia's coffers.

Security around Mr. Taylor's villa has been lax, said Corinne Dufka, a researcher for Human Rights Watch based in Dakar, Senegal, prompting fears that Mr. Taylor may try to escape. "We are calling on Nigeria to tighten security around Taylor," Ms. Dufka said. "I think there will be a great sense of relief when Charles Taylor is actually in the custody of the special court."

The court, set up in 2000, had issued an arrest warrant for Mr. Taylor on 17 counts in 2003 but Nigeria ignored it. Mr. Obasanjo had said that he would honor a request by Liberia's government to relinquish Mr. Taylor, but until this year Liberia had only transitional leaders.

With the backing of Libya and other regional powers, Mr. Taylor unleashed his horrific brand of warfare across the region for the better part of two decades, dragooning young boys into combat, first with violence, then with drugs, money and sex.

In Sierra Leone, he is accused of training and arming Sierra Leone's rebels in a bloody conflict left tens of thousands of people dead.

Nigeria Ready To Surrender Ex-Liberian Ruler For War Crimes Trial (WP)

By Michelle Faul

ABUJA, Nigeria, March 25 -- Nigeria announced Saturday that it was ready to hand over former Liberian president Charles Taylor to a U.N. tribunal, a move that would make him the first former African head of state to stand trial for crimes against humanity.

The tribunal has accused Taylor of instigating wars that devastated two West African countries, killed 1.2 million people and left millions homeless and maimed. He also allegedly harbored al-Qaeda suicide bombers who attacked the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998.

Taylor has been living in exile in the southern Nigerian city of Calabar since he was forced from power under a 2003 accord that ended a rebel assault on Liberia's capital. But Nigeria had resisted extraditing him, arguing he was given refuge under an internationally brokered peace deal.

Many African leaders are reluctant to prosecute former presidents or dictators, apparently concerned they could be the next to be accused of human rights abuses or other crimes. Others fear that a push to prosecute toppled leaders would encourage those in power to more fiercely resist democratic change.

In the case of Taylor, President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria said in a statement that he had informed Liberia's president, Ellen Johnson-Sirleaf, that "the government of Liberia is free to take former President Charles Taylor into its custody."

After her inauguration in January, Johnson-Sirleaf said a trial for Taylor wasn't a priority. But she made a formal request to Nigeria after an official visit to Washington, a major source of aid needed to rebuild Liberia, which was founded by freed American slaves in 1847.

There was speculation that Taylor would be sent directly to the U.N. war crimes tribunal in Sierra Leone rather than to Liberia, where some have expressed concern that his presence could destabilize efforts to recover from 14 years of war.

Liberia's government had no immediate comment, and neither Taylor nor his spokesman could be reached for comment.

David M. Crane, the American prosecutor who drew up Taylor's indictment, said his extradition would send a powerful message. "Certainly African leaders, members of the good-old-boy network, are under notice that you cannot destroy your own citizens for your own personal gain, and you don't go after women and children, don't rape women, don't turn children into monsters," he said.

Taylor started a civil war in his homeland that brutalized tens of thousands of boys and girls drafted as rebel fighters. He also is blamed for a savage war in neighboring Sierra Leone where rebels terrorized victims with a maiming campaign.

Taylor allegedly started the Sierra Leone war to enable his fighters to gain access to its rich diamond fields. In Liberia, he enriched himself from diamonds, timber and rubber.

In Nigeria, Things Fall Apart (NYT)

When President Olusegun Obasanjo of Nigeria visits Washington this week, he will probably be lauded for his crucial role as a regional African leader. During his seven years in power, Mr. Obasanjo helped end Liberia's civil war by taking in the strongman Charles Taylor and refused to accept a coup in Togo. He was instrumental in making sure that the African Union did not destroy its international credibility by installing Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, as its head despite the continuing carnage in Darfur. President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa, the continent's other big player, could learn a lot from Mr. Obasanjo about how to use his country's economic and military strength to promote peace and stability around the region.

Unfortunately, while Mr. Obasanjo deserves credit for good deeds outside of Nigeria, his own country is deteriorating fast and he is partly to blame. For one thing, by trying to change Nigeria's Constitution to allow himself to run for a third four-year term as president, Mr. Obasanjo is further enflaming political tensions among Nigeria's polarized ethnic groups, particularly the Muslims in the north and Christians in the south.

Nigeria lost more than 100 people in tit-for-tat sectarian rioting over Danish caricatures of the Prophet Muhammad. In the north, Muslims attacked and killed Christians. In the south, Christian mobs wielding machetes and knives set upon their Muslim neighbors in retaliation. And in the Niger River delta, militants seeking more local control over oil money have attacked pipelines and even captured oil workers.

Fueling some of this is the perception, right or wrong, that Mr. Obasanjo's much vaunted anti-corruption campaign concentrates only on critics of his government. Certainly, bad things continue to happen to foes of the Obasanjo government. Three months ago, the wife of a prominent northern politician was found stabbed to death in her home. Nothing was taken from the house, leading many to conclude that her killing was a warning to her husband, Abubakar Rimi, a crucial member of a coalition of powerful northerners opposed to any extension of Mr. Obasanjo's rule. And last week, police arrested Mr. Rimi and other opposition leaders for trying to hold a peaceful rally.

The last thing Africa needs is its most populous country — Nigeria has between 120 million and 150 million people — in a civil war. An out-of-control Nigeria would undermine its already fragile neighbors, like Liberia, Togo, Ivory Coast and the Congo.

In his two terms, Mr. Obasanjo has helped bring stability to a volatile region. But two terms is enough, and it is incumbent on President Bush to tell Mr. Obasanjo that changing his country's Constitution so that he can remain in office is foolhardy. Another four years is not worth a Nigerian civil war.

Gov. Bush's Plan To Aid Haiti Fails To Draw Wide Support (FLSUNSEN)

By Alva James-johnson

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, March 26, 2006

Gov. Jeb Bush's vision for a Florida plan to aid Haiti included efforts to improve security, host political reconciliation talks, prepare for disasters and develop the impoverished nation's economy.

But a year after the governor's Haiti Advisory Group recommended assistance to Florida's Caribbean neighbor, the state has made little progress toward those goals, some Haitian Americans say.

The advisory group, set up in July 2004, called for a state-funded entity to manage an ongoing Florida-Haiti initiative. Despite the Republican Bush's status as a strong governor whose party controls both houses of the Legislature, the governor could not win $1 million in recommended funding.

Florida also delayed work on an ambitious goal: to "sponsor and host" National Dialogue and Reconciliation talks between Haitian political forces and parties. At the suggestion of the U.S. Agency for International Development, Bush postponed the conference pending the Haitian elections. Haiti held a presidential election in February and scheduled a legislative runoff for April 21.

State officials and members of volunteer groups have made some technical training and information gathering trips to Haiti, but the advisory group's 25 proposals largely remain a wish list.

"They have to put the money where their mouth is," said Dr. Aldy Castor, a Weston gynecologist and Republican who served on the task force. "If not, this will turn out like many initiatives in Haiti -- 1 million projects without a mission."

Still, Castor commended Bush for setting up the taskforce. He also blamed the lack of progress on Haiti's interim government and political upheaval in the country.

But another task force member, state Rep. Phillip Brutus, D-Miami, said the recommendations have "sat on the shelf gathering dust," because neither Tallahassee nor Washington has the will to foster real change in Haiti.

The largest expatriate Haitian community lives in Florida. They're among those living abroad who send more than $1 billion in remittances annually to their homeland.

When the advisory group submitted its report a year ago, some Haitian Americans greeted it with enthusiasm because Haiti's interim prime minister, Gerard Latortue, a former Boca Raton retiree, was in power. They hoped his connection to South Florida would allow Haitian-Americans to play a greater role in stabilizing the country.

Bush spokesman Russell Schweiss said the governor included the $1 million for the Haiti initiative in his recommended state budget last year, but could not convince state legislators to fund it. Bush will try again, Schweiss said.

The governor's office helped send volunteers to Haiti to conduct disaster preparedness and economic development workshops, and to develop plans to address the HIV virus and AIDS, according to a staff report. The state Legislature also gave the Florida Association for Volunteer Action in the Caribbean and the Americas $650,000 for missions to the Caribbean with special emphasis on Haiti. That was $150,000 more than Florida gave the organization in 2004.

"The governor's office will continue to work to implement the recommendations of the advisory group," Schweiss said.

Dan Erikson, an analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington think tank, said the governor's plan could succeed if it extends beyond his term to the next Florida administration and is continued by his successor. Any effort to help rebuild the impoverished nation should be judged on a long-term basis, Erikson said.

States can do little to change a foreign country, but Florida is in a unique position because of its proximity to Haiti and the governor's relationship to the president, Erikson said

"It's only an hour-and-a-half plane ride away, and there's no state in the union better positioned be useful than Florida," he said. "But obviously there are going to be limitations."

Still, some think the Republican governor and his task force did not go far enough.

"The governor has the good fortune to have the House and the Senate controlled by his party," said Jean-Robert Lafortune, president of Haitian American Grassroots Coalition in Miami. "If he says he has failed to get funding for those initiatives being proposed by the advisory board, I think this is an indication of his leadership or his commitment regarding Haiti."

Lafortune said many Haitian Americans wanted temporary protected status for Haitian refugees trying to escape political turmoil in their homeland.

Temporary protected status allows foreign nationals who might have slipped into the United States illegally, overstayed their visas, or who are seeking asylum, to live and work in the United States without being deported.

"The fact that the advisory board didn't make TPS a priority sent a bad vibe to the Haitian community here," Lafortune said. "It seems the advisory board had a political aim to it, instead of a humanitarian aim that people think it should have. It was just a way for the governor to appease the Haitian community by showing that he's doing something good."

Marie Florence Bell, a Republican who was chairwoman of the now dissolved advisory group, said it chose to focus on security, disaster preparedness, economic development and the environment.

"Immigration is not one of our key areas because there are other people on the forefront of immigration," she said.

Bell said the state delayed a student exchange program and other initiatives because of political upheaval in Haiti, but the governor's office is working on them. She expects Bush to obtain funding this year.

"He's committed to completing all his obligations before the end of his term," she said. "That's what he said and I believe him."

Bolivia Bomb Suspect 'Own Worst Enemy' (LAT)

By Patrick J. Mcdonnell And Lee Romney, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 26, 2006

Northern California native served time in state youth and mental facilities and six months in Argentina for a 2005 blast at a bank.

DOJ_NMG_0021914

BUENOS AIRES — As a defiant youngster in rural California, he spat at a judge, spent years in juvenile lockups and psychiatric institutions and was suspected of blowing up a telephone booth.

As an adult, he decamped to South America, where he posted Internet messages seeking female companionship, became infatuated with a Uruguayan hairdresser 21 years his senior and was jailed for six months for bombing a bank in Argentina.

He described himself as a pagan high priest, a lawyer, a philosopher. He adopted the name of a literary vampire.

Finally, he ended up in the rough-and-tumble dynamite trade in Bolivia, distributing a racy promotional calendar that featured his girlfriend posing in the buff amid a cache of explosives.

But none of Triston Jay Amero's previous misadventures compare to his current predicament: Amero, 24, and his Uruguayan companion are in custody in Bolivia facing murder charges in connection with bombings at two hotels that killed two people and wounded seven others last week in the capital, La Paz.

As grave as the blasts were, the matter escalated into an international incident when Bolivia's outspoken president, Evo Morales, cited the possible involvement of a U.S. government eager to undermine his new socialist administration, which at times has been openly hostile to Washington.

"This American was putting bombs in hotels," Morales told reporters. "The U.S. government fights terrorism, and they send us terrorists."

U.S. officials dismissed any link to the bombings, and Bolivian investigators said the bomber may well have been mentally deranged or had vague "religious" motives.

At the center of this unlikely imbroglio is Amero, a paunchy, ponytailed, Internet-blabbing native of Northern California with sociopathic tendencies and a fierce rage against a system he views as victimizing him. He also has a thing for explosives.

"He was a troubled, probably fairly bright individual," said Joseph Warchol, chief probation officer of El Dorado County in Northern California, where the teenage Amero first went astray of the law.

While Amero was in juvenile hall, Warchol recalled, he cut himself and scribbled threats on the wall in his own blood.

Amero's rebel-without-a-cause fury aggravated the significance of relatively minor juvenile offenses. He peppered the California Youth Authority with nearly 20 lawsuits, assailing the "dread Court" and claiming his civil rights had been violated. He made constant threats to those in power, addressing menacing missives to his overseers and at one point spitting in the face of a juvenile judge — an act he later ascribed to "political reasons."

Said Warchol: "He was his own worst enemy…. He just had an uncontrollable mouth."

Amero is a native of Butte County, a rural pastiche of farmland, forested hills and suburban settlements north of Sacramento.

In comments to authorities, Amero said he never advanced beyond second grade and was kicked out of elementary school. "I absolutely despise formal academic curriculum," Amero declared in one statement. "I am a lone wolf, when it comes to studying."

He said he was committed to a psychiatric institution as a youth and diagnosed with a sociopathic personality disorder, among other maladies.

By age 14, he was questioned as a suspect in the bombing of a phone booth outside a market in the small town of Magalia. Much of his teenage years were spent in and out of juvenile detention sites, where he declared a "war of wills" between himself and authorities.

"They wanted to change me in their image," Amero said. "I knew that the only way … I could get out of that kind of a program is to raise hell."

Once freed, Amero launched his expansive Internet life, casting his online persona as a "Wiccan High Priest" fed up with "Bible-mongering Christians" and adept at discerning the metaphysical forces of good and evil.

Reviewing a treatise titled "Satanic Rituals," Amero cautioned against emulating such rites, but agreed with the author's assessment "on the state of society: In short, that most people tend to be scum."

Despite such misanthropic tendencies, Amero apparently aspired to be a democratic representative of the people, seeking seats on both a school board and a fire protection panel in the November 2002 elections in El Dorado County. He finished last in both races, but received 4,360 votes in the hotly contested school board contest — not a bad showing for someone who went by his "Lord Cactus" moniker on the ballot and described his occupation as "Clergyman/Process Server."

Evidently soured on politics, Amero made good on his longtime vow to flee the United States. For reasons that remain opaque, he chose South America as his destination, despite his lack of Spanish-language skills. In this case, though, part of his motivation seemed wholly conventional: women.

In May 2004, he posted his particulars on a website frequented by visitors to Colombia, describing himself as "a political refugee from the United States" and explaining that he was seeking an "affectionate woman aged 18-25 for a possible long-term relationship." He only encouraged replies from "those who speak good English."

A month later on the site, he bemoaned his checkered love life, describing himself as "SUPER LOOSER OF THE SUPER LOOSERS" (sic). "The last time I was rejected by a woman (in Uruguay), I tried to kill Myself like six times in one Week," he wrote.

By now, Amero had adopted his signature alternate identity, concluding his Web postings with the grandiose signoff Lestat Claudius de Orléans y Montevideo, declaring, "yes, that is my Real Name."

Lestat is the name of the vampire in the dark novels of Anne Rice, a role played on screen by Tom Cruise in "Interview With the Vampire."

At some point, Amero met Alba Ribeiro Acosta, the hairdresser who seems to have become his soul mate. In an entry presumably written by Amero on Wikipedia, a user-contributed online encyclopedia, Ribeiro is described as a "sacred woman" pregnant with the child of "Political Philosopher" Lestat.

The couple lived for a while in the tranquil Uruguayan river town of Fray Bentos, where, according to media accounts, Amero gained the nickname tira-bomba, or bomb-thrower, because of his propensity to toss small explosives at pigeons in a plaza.

Bolivian authorities say the two touched down in their country in May 2005 in the grim mining town of Potosi, where sticks of dynamite are sold openly in the markets.

Both were arrested when a bomb went off shortly after midnight on June 2, 2005, at a branch of Banco Macro in the Argentine town of La Quiaca, on the border with Bolivia. Police called it a botched attempt to get money from an ATM. Amero spent six months in jail; Ribeiro was judged not guilty.

Both returned to Bolivia in December 2005, authorities say, and apparently dedicated themselves to their dynamite business, selling liquor and fireworks as a sideline.

The motive for last week's dynamite bombing at the pair of hotels remains unclear, authorities say. Police say Amero was also scouting other potential targets here in Bolivia, including the Chilean Consulate in La Paz.

The couple faces up to 30 years in prison if convicted in the hotel attacks. Police say Amero confessed to the crime, and his alleged accomplice screamed to reporters that her "husband" was to blame — though it was unclear if the two were ever married.

"From what I know about the kid, he's capable of doing it," said Todd Riebe, district attorney in Amador County in Northern California. "He was a very disturbed kid."

Fighting For The Rainforests (NSWK)

By Antonia Francis

Newsweek, March 26, 2006

There's a reason that William Powers's writing is so down to earth. It's because Powers's goal is to protect the earth. On the front line of conservation in the Amazon, Powers has successfully initiated the largest rainforest-based carbon project in the world. He has harnessed big-business financing from companies such as British Petroleum and American Electric Power to protect Bolivia's rainforests in exchange for "green points"—a system allowing Kyoto Protocol signatories to gain credits for activities that boost the environment's capacity to absorb carbon.

In the process, Powers's project has protected 2 million hectares—almost 5 million acres—of carbon-absorbent forest, saved endangered species such as the jaguar and river dolphin and ensured legal rights to the land for 2,000 native Chiquitano Indians, who now head the project themselves. His new book, "Whispering in the Giant's Ear" (Bloomsbury) is a rip-roaring chronicle of the struggles and compromises, doubts and determination needed to implement the Kyoto accords—an international agreement setting targets for industrialized countries to cut their greenhouse-gas emissions—in Bolivia. With a host of unlikely heroes, it pits petroleum companies alongside local Indians, fighting against loggers.

Bolivia's leftist new president, however, could pose a fresh threat to the protected forests as he tries to help his nation's impoverished farmers. Evo Morales and his party, the Movimiento al Socialismo (MAS), advocate the expansion of legal coca cultivation, which could encourage thousands of coca growers and landless poor into protected forests in search of new soil to harvest. (Over the last 20 years, the coca-growing region of Chapare has lost about 40,000 hectares—almost 99,000 acres—of forest.) Industrial soya and cattle farmers are also lobbying hard for access to these areas. To aggravate matters for the environmentalists, MAS last month closed Bolivia's Ministry of Sustainable Development. MAS describes the change as structural readjustment and says that the ministry's responsibilities have simply been absorbed by three larger ministries; Powers says its removal makes harder for the Bolivian government to co-ordinate a national conservation plan. Powers spoke to Antonia Francis about Kyoto, coca and Morales. Excerpts:

FRANCIS: You've led the largest Kyoto experiment in the world here in Bolivia. Why is it considered such a success?

William Powers: The Noel Kempff Climate Action Project is the largest rainforest-based Kyoto Protocol pilot in the world. It shows how you can combine, synergetically, biodiversity conservation of one of the most important areas in the world, the Amazon, empowering native Americans and [working toward] the primary objective [of] slowing global warming. It's brilliant because they've been able to tweak market incentives to give value to rainforests that wouldn't have existed otherwise. And the [rainforest's] value is to suck carbon out of the atmosphere and cool the planet.

You criticize other international environmental aid agencies such as the World Wildlife Fund and CARE, claiming donors could spend their money better. What's your Kyoto alternative?

With many aid organizations, there's a feel-good, warm and fuzzy idea that if you show enough pretty pictures, it's going to change things. But you have to ask, what are the incentives for change? How are you going to make it last? If one hectare of rainforest is worth $100 as ranch land but worth $101 to remain as rainforest, you've created the incentive.

It's cheaper for companies to buy Kyoto Protocol green points here rather than reduce their own pollutant emissions. Is this a case of industrialized countries shifting their problems onto poorer countries like Bolivia?

Of course, the companies are not doing this out of the goodness of their heart. Nor are they doing this for "green-washing." They are doing this because the global community got together and passed the Kyoto Protocol, which forced these companies to reduce their [greenhouse gas] emissions. Right now you have carbon brokers traveling the world, looking for projects they can actually invest in. I see this project as a complete win-win—for the environment, the local people and for the climate. To the cynics, I ask: What have you done for the 2,000 Chiquitano Indians, who, thanks to this project have been able to leapfrog local corrupt officials, oligarchic governments and gain land tenure and business in their territory?

What is President Evo Morales doing for the environment?

Evo is indigenous, so there's a positive side to his leadership, a sense of new ownership amongst indigenous people. In Carrasco National Park, local Indians are actually blocking migrant colonists from settling in the park. Why? Because they say, now the park is ours, we will protect it. But at the same time, there are bulldozers gassing up on the other edge of the park, ready to [illegally] cut a road right through. I don't see how we can stop that.

Could Morales stop the bulldozers if he wanted to?

Of course Evo could stop them. It's a national park. But he probably won't. Evo's MAS party is not prioritizing environmental issues, despite its rhetoric about how George Bush is the enemy of the global environment. In practice, the environment is [about] No. 20 on MAS's list of things to do. Of course, shutting down the sustainable-development ministry makes it even harder for MAS to co-ordinate conservation into a national vision.

Why does Morales seem so unconcerned about the environment? Is it because of his promises to the coca-growing unions?

Definitely. The coca growers are a danger. If they came en masse, it could mean the construction of roads into the national parks like Madidi and Carrasco. Even now, the cocaleros [coca growers] have been entering right inside, cutting lines every hundred meters [330 feet]. On a big scale, they could just slash and burn to the horizon. Coca's the most lucrative crop around and it grows really well in national park region.

So current U.S. anti-coca-cultivation policies are indirectly protecting Bolivia's rainforests?

[I've] never looked at it like that before. No. What protects Bolivia's forests is the fact they are national parks, legal entities that protect that part of Bolivia for nature. The problem is that those boundaries are not as respected now that MAS has come into power. That's the main issue.

And have you seen MAS supporters slashing and burning the land?

Well, I've had those experiences several years before with MAS. In 2003, I was in the buffer zone of Amboró National Park, and new colonists tied to the MAS party threatened us with machetes, saying we were on their land. It wasn't their land, it was a 1,200 hectare cloud forest that belonged to a Bolivian environmental organization. But that's the ideology amongst many of the campesinos [rural population]—the land is for those who work it.

What other dangers are there to the forests apart from the coca growers?

The biggest short-term pressure from within the MAS party is to give land to the poor.

There's also the temptation to open up the Bolivian Amazon to cash-crop interests—for example, the Brazilian soy companies. The price of land in Bolivia is something like 10 times less than it is in Brazil, right now. The same risk with cattle ranching. So the danger of Morales? Instead of doing what he should do—which is protect the rainforest for the long term sustainable growth of this country—he could just to sell it off.

Do you support coca cultivation for legal purposes?

Well, we're working with one municipality which wants to become an "eco-coca zone." They've zoned the ecological area, but they want to plant coca as well. They say they'll sell it for local, traditional use—to chew, to use as toothpaste, treatment for hunger and altitude sickness. They've actually named 35 products they can make from the coca leaf. But the reality of it is that a lot of it will go into the illegal drugs market.

Why don't you believe all the coca will be used for legal purposes?

How is that possible? The market is the market. Of course the solution is to change that market—make Bolivian coca-leaf products into a brand. But promoting new products takes a long time.

Jews In France Feel Sting As Anti-Semitism Surges Among Children Of Immigrants (NYT)

By Craig S. Smith

The New York Times, March 26, 2006

SARCELLES, France — In working-class Parisian suburbs like this one, heavily populated by North African immigrants, the word "Jew" is now a standard epithet. It appears in graffiti on middle school walls and neighborhood playgrounds and on the tongues of the young.

"It's blacks and Arabs on one side and Jews on the other," said Sebastian Daranal, a young black man standing in the parking lot of a government-subsidized housing project with two friends.

Eight men beat the son of a rabbi here in March. Another Jew was attacked the next day.

In the wake of the torture and killing in February of Ilan Halimi, a 23-year-old Jew, attention has focused on an undeniable problem: anti-Semitism among France's second-generation immigrant youth, whose high jobless rate the government is trying to address with a law drawing widespread protests across the country.

The law, intended to increase employment, especially among the young, has drawn opposition because of a provision that allows companies to hire people 25 or younger for a two-year trial period, during which they can be fired without cause.

Schools are the battleground over anti-Semitism, and teachers complain that the government has done little, despite many proposals.

"The minister of education has done nothing," said Jean-Pierre Obin, an inspector general of education in France, who wrote a report in 2004 that called anti-Semitism "ubiquitous" in the 61 schools surveyed. "He prefers not to talk about it."

Mr. Obin wrote in the report of "a stupefying and cruel reality: in France, Jewish children — and they are alone in this case — can no longer be educated in just any school."

Ianis Roder, 34, a history teacher in a middle school northeast of Paris, said he was stunned by what he witnessed after Sept. 11, 2001. The next day, someone spray-painted in a stairwell of the school the image of an airplane crashing into the World Trade Center beside the words "Death to the U.S., Death to Jews."

When he told his class months later that Hitler had killed millions of million Jews, one boy blurted out, "He would have made a good Muslim!" Mr. Roder told of a Muslim teacher who dismissed her class after a shouting match over Nazi propaganda. The students said the offensive images accurately depicted Jews.

Even today, he said, there is widespread belief that the Sept. 11 attacks were a Jewish plot and that Jews were notified beforehand.

Barbara Lefèbvre, a history teacher who has taught in several of the working-class suburbs, said many people minimize the anti-Semitism among France's youth.

"They say, 'That's the way the kids talk — they don't mean it in the same way that you or I would,' " she said. Ms. Lefèbvre, who is Jewish, said she had to argue with the principal of her school several years ago to get an investigation when a student wrote "dirty Jew" on a notebook used by her class. The student, a French-Arab boy, was ultimately given just two hours of detention.

Some teachers simply gloss over subjects likely to elicit anti-Semitic responses. Ms. Lefèbvre said she knows teachers who even show fictional films, like Roberto Benigni's "Life Is Beautiful," instead of treating the Holocaust directly.

France was the first European country to offer Jews full citizenship and has done as much as any to exorcise the ghosts of Nazi collaboration.

But the postwar climate for Jews has steadily soured as attention has focused on the Palestinian cause and Muslims have moved here in large numbers.

With the outbreak of the second Palestinian Intifada against Israel in 2000, anti-Semitic attacks in France skyrocketed. While the number of reported incidents has fallen since peaking in 2004, anti-Semitism is now entrenched in many of the country's working-class housing projects.

The Arab communities of North Africa had no postwar sense of Holocaust guilt. If anything, distress over the creation of Israel in 1948 reinforced anger at Jews to the point that successive waves of anti-Jewish riots drove most of North Africa's Jews to Israel and Europe — primarily France — in the 1950's and 1960's.

Some people say that many of the North African Arabs who subsequently moved to France carried anti-Jewish prejudices with them and passed them to a second-generation, where they have been reinforced by support for the Palestinian cause. And French guilt over colonialism has made such prejudices harder to counter.

"As long as anti-Semitism came from the extreme right there was a reaction," said Ms. Lefèbvre, who has written about anti-Semitism and sexism in the schools. "But when it came from that part of the population that itself was a victim of racism, no one wanted to see it."

Sitting in a room hung with posters deploring racism at a youth center in La Courneuve, a suburb on the outskirts of Paris, Yannis, the 16-year-old son of a French father and Algerian mother, said racist talk was common. "We've become used to it, hearing it day after day, so we've all started to speak like that," he said, adding that even 7-year-olds say, "Don't eat like a Jew," if someone is being stingy with food.

Fahima, 14, with long black hair and limpid eyes, doing her homework beside him, spoke of a confrontation she had with a Jewish teacher two years ago.

"He said, 'You blacks and Arabs will never get apartments in Paris,' " she said, explaining that he meant the students would never manage to move out of the poor suburbs. Fahima, who is French-Algerian, said she retorted, "You Jews only have apartments there because you were picked on during the war."

"I was mean," she said, playing with a shiny cellphone. "But I'm not anti-Semitic."

The girls with her complained about the teacher, saying he talked often about his family's suffering in the Holocaust. "He cries whenever he mentions his grandmother," one girl said with exasperation.

Some schools have tried to defuse the problem without addressing it directly. After a Jewish girl was harassed in Saint-Ouen two years ago, the administration of her school decided to show "Night and Fog," a haunting 1955 documentary film that includes graphic footage of Nazi death camps.

Initially, teachers feared that showing the movie risked inciting confusing comparisons between the Holocaust and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but then relented.

At the film's end, one boy — not a Muslim — asked how Jews who had known such suffering could treat Palestinians "the same way."

No one responded, though Carole Diamant, a philosophy teacher, said she spoke to him privately later about why he was wrong. "I felt like we were on a wire," she said, describing the tension. Since then, the school has included the Holocaust in a broader program on genocide.

Anti-Semitism is felt most acutely in communities like Sarcelles, where many North Africans settled in the 1950's and 1960's. Sarcelles is home to one of the most concentrated Jewish communities in France, surrounded by an unsightly sprawl of apartment blocks that house the North African and sub-Saharan immigrants who arrived later.

France has a well-established Jewish community with European roots, many of whose members occupy the upper echelons of French society. Hundreds of thousands of poorer North African Jews have more recently swelled the Jewish community to about 600,000, making it the largest in Europe. Those North African Jews and their children bear the brunt of the anti-Semitism in the working-class neighborhoods.

Each time anti-Semitic attacks make news, the Interior Ministry promises more security around Jewish institutions. But "more police aren't the answer because it remains in the spirit of the people," said Dr. Marc Djebali, a spokesman for the Jewish community in Sarcelles.

Laurent Berros, the synagogue's rabbi, said local imams had evaded his suggestion that Jewish and Muslim leaders go together into troubled neighborhoods. "They say that bringing a rabbi into these neighborhoods isn't easy," he said. "There is a fear that they'll be seen as collaborators."

The deteriorating climate has led thousands of French Jews to move to Israel in the past five years, including about 3,300 last year, a 35-year high.

Murielle Brami, 42, whose parents immigrated to France to escape anti-Jewish riots in Tunisia, has the sinking feeling that history is repeating itself. "All the Jews in France want one thing, to leave for Israel or the United States," she said. That is hyperbole, but it is a sign of the anxiety percolating through France's Jewish community. "When our parents came, it was paradise here," said Ms. Brami, who remembers staying out late without worrying about her safety.

Now she avoids certain neighborhoods even in the day and no longer allows her son to wear a yarmulke in the street after some youths put a knife to his throat last year.

Paris Burning, Once Again (WP)

By Claire Berlinski

PARIS

Last Saturday morning, needing help to move several heavy cartons of books from my apartment in central Paris to a storage room, I hired two movers and a van from the want ads. Students were in the streets protesting the Contrat de Premier Embauche (CPE) -- a law proposed to combat unemployment by giving employers more flexibility to fire young employees -- and the barricades and traffic diversions made our four-block drive into a half-hour ordeal. As we turned down one obstructed street after another, the movers -- both Arab immigrants -- became more and more incensed."They're idiots," said the driver, gesturing toward the ecstatic protesters. "Puppets for the socialists and the communists." He pantomimed pulling the strings of a marionette.

"It's us they hurt," added the second man. By this he meant immigrants and their children, particularly the residents of France's suburban ghettos, where unemployment runs as high as 50 percent. And, of course, he was right, as everyone with even a rudimentary grasp of economics appreciates: If employers are unable to fire workers, they will be less likely to hire them. It is now almost impossible to fire an employee in France, a circumstance that disproportionately penalizes groups seen by employers as risky: minorities, inexperienced workers and those without elite educations, like the outraged man sitting beside me.

This is the second time in four months that France has been seized with violent protests. And in an important sense, these are counter-riots, since the goals of the privileged students conflict with those of the suburban rioters who took to the streets last November. The message of the suburban rioters: Things must change. The message of the students: Things must stay the same. In other words: Screw the immigrants.

The issue at stake is not, of course, the CPE, which in addition to being unknown in its effects would apply only to a two-year trial period, after which employees would still, effectively, be guaranteed jobs for life. The issue is fear of a real overhaul of France's economically stifling labor laws. While some of the suburban hoodlums have joined in these protests -- after all, a riot is a riot -- it is clear that unless this overhaul proceeds, the immigrants are doomed. If so, last year's violence will seem a lark compared with what is coming.

Curiously, however, no French politician will say this openly. They will not even say these obvious words: France is a representative democracy; if you don't like what your elected leaders are doing, you can vote against them. Some more words you will never hear in France: Students who continue to disrupt civil and academic life will be expelled. Strikers will be fired. We are calling in the troops.

Instead, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin is nightly seen on television, earnestly proposing one compromise after the other, even as his supporters scuttle for cover. The powerful barons of the labor unions, on the other hand -- the puppet masters of that golden flock of imbeciles now on the streets -- can scarcely be bothered to give interviews. Compromise? Only when the law is repealed. By then, of course, compromise would be unnecessary. Instead of negotiations, they call for a general strike.

That's because France is still in the grip of precisely the political mentality that has prevailed here since the Middle Ages. As the protesters themselves cheerfully declare: It's the street that rules. Today's mobs, like their predecessors, are notable for their poor grasp of economic principles and their hostility to the free market. Only wardrobe distinguishes these demonstrations from those that led to the invasion of the national convention in 1795, when first the mob protested that commodity prices were too high; when the government responded with price controls, it protested with equal vigor that goods had disappeared and black market prices had risen. Similarly, the students on the streets today espouse economic views entirely unpolluted by reality. If the CPE is enacted, said one young woman, "You'll get a job knowing that you've got to do every single thing they ask you to do because otherwise you may get sacked."

Imagine that.

As a legacy of this long tradition, the choice in France now is between popular legislation -- that is, useless legislation -- and the street. Thus the paradox at the heart of the protests: Those who want power exploit the mobs to maneuver themselves into position, but having gained power cannot use it to achieve anything worthwhile, lest the same tactics be used against them. The fear of the mob has created a cadre of politicians in France who are unable to speak the truth and thereby prepare French citizens for the inevitable. No one in France -- not one single politician, nor anyone in the media -- is willing to say it: France's labor laws are an absurdity, and if they are not reformed at once, France will go under. "What do they think?" said my driver, who was not, he told me, a mover by trade but an unemployed radio journalist forced to moonlight. "Do they think that jobs just fall from the sky?"

Apparently, they think just that.

In this regard, France, like every European country, remains blackmailed by its history. French rulers, seemingly unable to appeal to the legitimacy they possess as elected leaders, instead behave as popular kings, or as leaders of some faction -- like a king's ministers. They cannot seem to forget what happens when a king loses his popularity. There are thus two choices for the French ruling elite, as they see it: toady or go under.

When Margaret Thatcher took power in 1979, an urgent question hung in the air: In Britain, who rules? It was a question to which Britain's powerful unions had a ready answer: We do. Men such as Arthur Scargill, the head of the miner's union, were convinced that although they would never lead Britain, it was within their power to run it and to run it for their benefit through labor laws that anyone beyond the union halls could see would destroy the nation as a competitive economic power. Thatcher so thoroughly crushed both Scargill and his union that neither recovered. For a brief moment, power politics stood revealed. The unions had made a bid for power. They lost.

The same question is now being raised in France: Who rules? This is the second time in 11 years that a popularly elected government here faces dismissal not from the voters, but from the streets. If this does not represent a direct challenge to the government's power, it is hard to know what would. Should the government fall, the question will have been answered.

And the answer will be the mob. As usual.

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Says NSA Can Eavesdrop On Lawyer-Client, Doctor-Patient Communications. The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) reports that the the Justice Department told Congress in "written responses to nearly 100 questions posed by Republicans and Democrats about the N.S.A.'s eavesdropping program" that "the National Security Agency has the authority to listen without warrants to conversations between lawyers and their clients and doctors and their patients if a connection to Al Qaeda is suspected." Michigan Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D) said "the answers were 'vague and unresponsive' and reflected an effort by the administration to 'thumb its nose at the American people and their elected representatives.'" The AP (3/25, Shrader) adds, "the department also said that it sees no prohibition to using information collected under the NSA's program in court."

Judge Appointed To FISA Court. The AP (3/25) reports U.S. District Judge John Bates has been named to the FISA court to replace "U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who quit shortly after news reports about the Bush administration going around the court to eavesdrop on U.S. citizens suspected of communicating with terrorists."

Moussaoui Trial Shines Unwelcome Light On FBI. The New York Times (3/25, Lewis, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "even those who strongly supported an aggressive prosecution may wonder whether the trial has shed as much light on Mr. Moussaoui's culpability as it has on the missteps and mistakes by law enforcement agencies. The testimony of two prosecution witnesses," Harry Samit, an F.B.I. agent and Michael Rolince, a retired F.B.I. counterterrorism supervisor, "has brought renewed and unwelcome attention to how the Federal Bureau of Investigation dealt with early warning signs." Another "problem for the bureau is that the backbone of the prosecution case, that the bureau could have disrupted the plot had Mr. Moussaoui admitted all he knew, represents a substantial revision of conventional wisdom at the law enforcement agency."

Martin Won't Testify On Her Actions. The Washington Post (3/25, A8, Markon, 744K) reports that "Judge Leonie M. Brinkema yesterday quashed the subpoena" for Carla J. Martin, the "government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui," to testify at his trial. Legal experts said this could mean she advised the court she "planned to invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/25, Gordon, 424K) adds, "It was not immediately clear whether Martin, a Transportation Security Administration attorney, would appear later or had signaled her intention to exercise her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. It was also possible her testimony was no longer thought to be necessary."

Defense Attorneys Appeal "Classified" Mosque Wiretap Order. The AP (3/24) reports, "Defense lawyers have asked a federal appeals court to intervene in the case of two Albany Muslims accused of supporting terrorism, saying the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret." The AP continues, "Attorneys for Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain filed a writ Friday asking the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals to review Judge Thomas McAvoy's pretrial ruling. Arguing that illegal warrantless wiretaps may have been used, they had filed a motion to thrown out charges, suppress any evidence from such wiretaps and force prosecutors to disclose whether they were used." The AP adds, "McAvoy on March 10 rejected the motion. His 'classified' ruling leaves his reasons secret. The earlier responses by prosecutors and the U.S. Justice Department also were classified. … The writ says the judge 'failed to rule on the legality of the NSA surveillance program, even though it is clearly a source of evidence in this case.' They called the judge's handling of the issue 'an especially serious breach of due process.' … Yassin Aref, 35, imam at Masjid as-Salam in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, 50, are accused of laundering money in 2003-2004 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer. Neither is accused of actual violence."

Pakistan Repels Militant Attack. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Ali, 958K) reports, "Pakistani security forces shot dead at least 18 militants in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region near the border with Afghanistan early Friday, security officials said," although "government claims could not be independently verified." According to officials, "the attackers fired rockets on the troops and security forces returned fire," and "one security official said that Cobra helicopters were called in to assist ground forces in repulsing the attack."

Italy Opposition Leader Pans US Travel Alert. The Washington Post (3/25, Delaney, 744K) reports, "Opposition leader Romano Prodi says he got on the phone to the US ambassador right away to demand an explanation: Why did the State Department issue a public announcement warning Americans in Italy to stay away from political rallies because of possible violence?" Prodi is quoted as saying, "The US alert surprised me. ... A move like this, with elections nearing, can cause a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that." A US embassy spokesman is quoted as saying that the warning "is not political."

Israeli Athlete From '72 Games Recounts Terrorist Attack. The New York Times (3/25, Salzman, 1.19M) reports that Dan Alon, a former champion Israeli fencer who survived the attacks at the Munich Olympics in 1972, "spoke about his ordeal for the first time in the United States on Thursday night at Yale, warning that reprisal killings of terrorists only lead to 'bloodshed and more bloodshed.'" He "had kept silent in the nearly 34 years since the attack, not even telling his wife and daughter," but "said he was inspired by watching the movie "Munich" to tell the story of his escape from the building where the Palestinian terrorist group Black September had taken his fellow athletes and some coaches hostage, later killing 11 of them."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Thompson Seeks Assurances On Port Security Deal. The AP (3/25, Bridis) reports that Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson (D), the senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, "sought assurances Friday over a no-bid contract the Bush administration is finalizing with a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere" in "the first time a foreign company will be involved in running sophisticated U.S. radiation-detection equipment at an overseas port without American customs agents present." Thompson is "h concerned there will be inadequate oversight."

The AP (3/25, Bridis, Solomon) adds, "A U.S. military intelligence report, once marked 'secret,' cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas," and "some security experts questioned whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States."

Lawmakers Move To Change Investment-Review Process. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Hitt, King, 2.11M) reports, "With lawmakers still fuming over DP World and economic nationalism running high, Congress is all but certain to pass sweeping changes to the investment-review process." Now, "building on their win in the Dubai ports deal, U.S. lawmakers are moving to gain leverage over a swath of foreign investments in the U.S., an effort that business leaders and President Bush's aides warn could harm the U.S. economy." Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby "released the summary of a bill Friday that would greatly expand the array of foreign acquisitions subject to automatic scrutiny and would require the administration to notify lawmakers as soon as it begins to review any foreign transaction," although "the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared."

Despite Lack Of Support Some Struggle Against 9/11 Memorial. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Barry, 958K) reports Rosaleen Tallon, the sister of firefighter who died in the Twin Towers collapse has tried for months to rally a broad protest against the 9/11, "memorial, 'Reflecting Absence,' in a city that is frustrated with paralysis at ground zero. Three weeks ago, intent on getting out her message, she came up with the idea of a vigil. Now, every night, outside the fire station, she," and a small group warn, "that the underground memorial could bring on a new cataclysm, trapping innocent people in the event of an attack." The Times adds now New Yorkers are saying, "what they had not said before: that certain Sept. 11 families were obstructing progress at ground zero and should step aside." … If there is a point of consensus, it is that the hole has gaped here too long. With plans to rebuild office buildings at a deadlock over financing, 'Reflecting Absence' is the only plan that seems to be moving forward."

Spitzer Questions Plans For Rebuilding Ground Zero. The New York Times (3/25, Healy, 1.19M) reports new York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer "expressed concern last night that the Freedom Tower project at ground zero lacked 'economic viability' and could turn into 'a white elephant.'" Spitzer" suggested that, as New York's next governor, he would move more swiftly than Gov. George E. Pataki in rebuilding Lower Manhattan."

Red Cross Accused Of Mishandling Katrina Funds. ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 1, 3:00, Vargas) led its broadcast last night with a report detailing, "allegations of fraud and theft inside" the American Red Cross after hurricane Katrina. ABC continued, "After Katrina, the American Red Cross raised more than $2 billion to help hurricane victims. But this internal Red Cross investigation obtained by ABC News says much of that money, perhaps million, was misused. The report uncovered 'outright contempt for well established arc fiscal controls, intentionally diluted or ignored' for personal gain, fraud constituting 'a breathtaking systematic failure on the part of senior management.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 4, 2:30, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "Today the Red Cross said that it is aggressively investigating allegations brought by volunteers of outright criminal activity during Katrina. Former Red Cross volunteer and attorney Jerome Nickerson wrote a tough investigative report made public today. In an exclusive interview with CBS News Nickerson says he found widespread evidence of theft and fraud including a veritable black market of disaster relief goods operating out of New Orleans with the knowledge of some Red Cross supervisors."

The New York Times (3/25, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "In a major shake-up of its relief operations in New Orleans, the American Red Cross dismissed two key supervisors yesterday as part of a wide-ranging inquiry into the improper diversion of relief supplies after Hurricane Katrina, a Red Cross official said." The supervisors "were in charge of the organization's kitchens and shelters, which have assisted tens of thousands of the hurricane's victims." The dismissals "came a day after the interim president of the Red Cross said the organization was investigating accusations of impropriety, including possible criminal activity." Among the accusations under investigation: "That supervisors in charge of the kitchens have been ordering more food than is needed, raising questions about where the extra food is going."

Senator Presses Red Cross Investigation. The AP (3/25, Kellman) reports, "Pressed by Congress, the American Red Cross said Friday it is investigating claims that volunteers engaged in widespread theft in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. … Allegations of wrongdoing go far beyond what the statement said were 'inevitable ... departures from standard procedures' after such a catastrophe, according to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee," IA Sen. Charles Grassley (R). Grassley "has said volunteers may have committed criminal fraud."

Civil Engineers Questions Army Corps Of Engineers Design of New Orleans Flood Walls. The Army Corps of Engineers has come under criticism from a civil engineers organization that is reviewing the Army Corps of Engineers' levee work in New Orleans. The Washington Post (3/25, A6, Warrick, Whoriskey, 744K) reports that the American Society of Civil Engineers' External Review Panel, "which was appointed to oversee the Corps investigation of the levee system's collapse during Hurricane Katrina," has questioned "the soundness of large portions of New Orleans's levee system, warning that the city's federally designed flood walls were not built to standards stringent enough to protect a large city."

Texans Said To See Administration As "Heartless" On Recovery. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Bustillo, 958K) reports that six months after Hurricane Rita, "in the president's home state, in a region densely populated by energy and petrochemical industries with warm ties to the White House, consensus is that progress is being made in spite of the federal government, not because of it. Dissatisfaction with what is seen as a heartless Bush administration recovery effort is widespread." However, "Federal officials counter that…Compared with the calamity Katrina caused in Mississippi and Louisiana, Rita's toll on Texas is smaller and commands less attention, especially because the state is well on the road to recovery."

Houstonians Believe Katrina Refugees A "Considerable Strain" On City. The Houston Chronicle (3/25, Berger, 581K) reports that "a new poll finds Houstonians increasingly weary and wary of the 150,000 Louisiana evacuees who landed here after fleeing Hurricane Katrina. Three-quarters of Harris County residents surveyed by Rice University sociologist Stephen Klineberg say the influx of Katrina evacuees, many of whom remain seven months after landfall, has put a 'considerable strain' on the Houston community." Also, two-thirds "say evacuees bear responsibility for 'a major increase in violent crime,' and twice as many local residents believe Houston will be 'worse off' rather than 'better off' if most evacuees remain here permanently." The survey "is expected to be finalized later this month." Houston's Mayor Bill White "acknowledged the increased strains on city services, notably crime and traffic management."

Barbara Bush Donation Stipulated Buying Son's Software. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Hart, 958K) reports that Barbara Bush's donation to the Bush-Clinton Houston Hurricane Relief Fund "stipulated that part of her contribution was to be spent on educational software purchased from her son Neil's company, Ignite Learning of Austin, Texas." Daniel Borochoff, president of the American Institute of Philanthropy, a charity watchdog group, "said donors who direct that their money be used to buy products from a family business set a bad precedent."

WAR NEWS:

Russians Passed Invasion Data To Baghdad. The Pentagon revealed the Russian government, in particular its ambassador to Iraq before the US toppled Saddam Hussein, passed detailed information on the US invasion plans to Hussein. While US officials downplayed the value of the information it was seen as a potential problem for US-Russian relations. The story was widely covered by wire services, major US newspapers and all three network news broadcasts.

Highlighting the seriousness of the problem for the US, ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 2, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Now to potentially explosive report about an important U.S. Ally. Iraqi government documents just released show that before the war began in Iraq, a Russian diplomat obtained details about the U.S. war plans and then gave them to the Iraqis. This raises major questions about the Russians and about the U.S. government's ability to guard top secret information."

The CBS Evening News (3/24, lead story, 2:00, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "U.S. officials say none of the information passed on by the Russians had any real strategic value. Military officials here will only say on the record that they were surprised by the Russian's actions. And only time will tell whether or not this has a big impact on future U.S.-Russian relations." Stahl: "Does the Pentagon know why the Russians did this. They didn't think Saddam was going to win, did they?" Orr: "The information wasn't very good so it is doubtful anybody thought it would affect the military outcome. The best guess is this Russia was trying to curry favor with the bureaucracy in Baghdad to maintain good economic relations no matter who was in power. So going forward they would have good economic relations."

NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 3, 1:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Military investigators found no evidence any spies were operating in the command. It is believed the Russians obtained the information through electronic eavesdropping. Saddam Hussein didn't believe the information and made no attempts to try to counter the attack. Three days later the US Army stormed into Baghdad."

The New York Times (3/25, Shanker, 1.19M) notes that the revelation "may have more political than military significance," and that "the study notes that some information obtained by Iraq from Russian sources was false, raising at least the possibility that it was circulated as part of a deliberate American campaign intended to fool or demoralize Iraqi troops and leaders." The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Spiegel, Miller, 958K) adds, "Analysts also said it would be important to learn whether upper levels of the Russian government were involved, adding that the signals were more likely to have come from diplomatic and intelligence agents in the region rather than from Moscow."

The AP (3/25, Burns) also mentions the possibility the Russians fed Iraq false data. In contrast, the Washington Times (3/25, A1, Scarborough, 90K) in a front page story is more strident, reporting, "The new disclosures show that Moscow was working against the Bush administration in private."

US, Iran Will Meet On Iraq, Rice Says. The AP (3/25) reports, Secretary Rice "said Friday she was sure US and Iranian representatives would meet to discuss security in Iraq, but she gave no time for the sessions. 'Those meetings will take place, I'm certain, at the appropriate time,' Rice said. The United States previously had said contact with the Iranians could occur if Washington found it useful, but questioned the timing and motive of Iran in seeking talks." Rice is later quoted as saying, "I think that everybody just needs to get to work and let's get this done so that the Iranians have a very clear message about what's going on. ... We agreed to ask our negotiators to work again over the next of couple of days...really deciding that maybe they won't even have a weekend because we need to work on this text.'

US Commander Praises Iraqi Forces After Mosque Bombing. The New York Times (3/25, Shanker, 1.19M) reports that Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the US commander for training Iraqi security forces, "expressed guarded satisfaction on Friday with the performance of new Iraqi Army and national police units in tamping down the sectarian violence that erupted after the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month," although he "acknowledged that the crisis also provided a clearer picture of the troubling shortfalls of the Iraqi local police, on whom, he said, American trainers now must focus their efforts." Dempsey "also raised concern about the role played by independent militias during the crisis."

Murtha Speaks On Iraq War. The Uniontown Herald Standard (3/25, Zalar) reports that Speaking during a taping of "Behind the Headlines," U.S. Rep. John Murtha said that "when initial threats that biological weapons would be used if troops crossed a certain line didn't come to fruition and weapons of mass destruction were not found, he felt something was wrong and started 'sending signals to the White House.'" He said that "he is perplexed as to why Bush will not admit he made a mistake by relying on flawed intelligence," adding "'You have to wonder if they're competent,'…of the people making decisions regarding the war."

Iraq's President Is Optimistic About Unity Government. The AP (3/25, Abdul-Zahra) reports that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani "issued a highly optimistic report yesterday on progress among politicians trying to hammer out the shape of a new unity government," saying that "the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month." However, "a less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari…has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April."

Laura Bush Maintains US Is Admired By Much Of The World. Asked on CNN'S Larry King Live (3/24) how she is "handling the stress of diminishing poll results," First Lady Laura Bush replied, "I know how every problem in the world eventually comes to the foot of the President of the United States to the American people, because we are so much more prosperous, so much more affluent in many ways, not just financially affluent as a country, but also many of the ideas we have. … They may say they're anti-American, they may say they hate things we stand for, but in most cases, I think they would like their countries to have similar values and similar qualities, and certainly a similar sort of life." Bush added, "I think it's difficult, it's very difficult to watch on television and see the loss of our soldiers in Iraq and to get the idea that the Iraqis don't care, that they don't want us there, that it's a sacrifice they don't respect or regard. I do think they do. … I know the people of Afghanistan, from when I've been there, say, 'don't leave. Don't leave us yet. Let us build our democracy. Let us get all of the institutions of democracy into place before you go.'"

Zaraqawi Keeping Lower Profile. The New York Times (3/25, A1, Filkins, 1.19M) reports that Abu Musab al-Zarqawi "has sharply lowered his profile in recent months, and his group claims to have submitted itself to the leadership of an Iraqi" as part of a council with five other guerrilla groups. The group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, "stopped taking responsibility for large-scale suicide attacks against civilians,…toned down its fierce verbal attacks against Iraq's Shiite majority," and stopped "beheading its captives," which seems "to follow closely the advice in a letter believed to have been written last year by Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's second in command."

US Arrests Translator For Bribery. The US arrested Faheem Mousa Salam, a translator working in Iraq, at Dulles International Airport, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million. The New York Times (3/25, Glanz, 1.19M) reports that the Justice Department said Salam, "probably acting as an intermediary for others who have not yet been identified, offered tens of thousands of dollars in bribes to people inside the Iraqi Interior Ministry for a contract to provide some $1 million in flak jackets and other equipment to an organization that trains Iraqi police officers."

The Washington Post/AP (3/25, A20) adds, "The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraq reconstruction contracts. At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery-and-kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts."

No Charges To Be Filed In Contractor Incident. The Washington Post (3/25, A15, Witte, White, 744K) reports, "Military investigators said yesterday that they will not file any charges after completing their investigation into an incident in Iraq last May in which a group of Marines alleged they had been fired on by U.S. security contractors" and the contractors "had said they were detained by the Marines…and subjected to rough treatment." The encounter "highlighted tension in the field between active-duty military personnel and the burgeoning ranks of private contractors the Defense Department has hired to support the war effort."

Newspaper Editor Disputes Iraq Coverage Bias Claim. Clark Hoyt, Knight Ridder's Washington editor, writes in an op-ed in Knight Ridder (3/25) that "President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and assorted supporters...are blaming the messengers - the news media - for the public's growing disenchantment with the war in Iraq." Since "the polls have gone south…the administration has escalated a soft attack on the media." However, Robert J. Callahan, who served as the press attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad from June 2004 to May 2005, "doesn't think" that "the story of Iraq being distorted by reporting that focuses on violence and fails to tell the good news." He says, "American reporters have faced criticism for their coverage of Iraq, but rarely from those of us who have been there and have seen these journalists at work." Callahan also notes that "American diplomats stopped encouraging coverage of good-news events such as the reconstruction of a school because it often invited terrorist attacks that cost innocent lives."

Reporter's Video Diary Shows Increasing Instability In Iraq. NBC correspondent Richard Engel's daily video diary of his experiences in Iraq portray the environment as growing worse as violence increases. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 5, 2:20, Engel, 9.87M) reported that while Iraq was relatively secure after the liberation, "in March 2004, four American contractors were ambushed in Falujah and everything changed." When the "violence increased, like Iraqis, foreign reporters adapted. It's too dangerous to run on the streets, so we use a treadmill." Engel noted, "Reporting trips are now military-style missions. … It's been a three year journey through war, and it's not nearly over."

In a story similarly describing the environment in Iraq as deteriorating the Los Angeles Times (3/25, Roug, 958K) adds that for Iraqi psychiatrist Baher Butti, after Hussein was toppled "a hope grew. With the Americans, perhaps a kind of progress would arrive." However, "instead of progress, he and his wife saw advancing irrationality," and after their daughter was injured by a bomb, it was "a seed of hope he could no longer sustain." He decided to move from Iraq.

Killings Continue In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/25) reports, "At least 51 people, including two U.S. soldiers and five Sunnis leaving a mosque, were killed Friday in attacks around Iraq," and "Baghdad police said they found 25 more bodies blindfolded, shot and dumped throughout the capital." The other "victims died in a variety of attacks, which included drive-by slayings of three policemen in west Baghdad and three power station workers headed to their jobs in Taji, just north of the capital, police said."

UN Concerned For Safety Of Palestinians In Iraq. The United Nations refugee agency is concerned about the safety of Palestinians in Iraq after death threats against families in one Baghdad neighborhood. The New York Times (3/25, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "The Palestinian community was once a pet cause of Saddam Hussein, who granted its members special treatment," and "now, its members say, they are suffering the backlash of that favoritism," as "Palestinians have been frequent targets of Shiite death squads." The Palestinian observer to the United Nations "appealed for international intervention to protect the Palestinians in Iraq." The AP (3/25, Klapper) adds, "Many Shiites and Kurds have come to view Palestinians as sympathetic to the Sunni-dominated insurgency."

Unique Relationship With US Keeps Salvadorans In Iraq. The Washington Post (3/25, A1, Aizenman, 744K) in a front page story reports that for Salvadoran troops, combat in Iraq is reminiscent of fighting in their own civil war. The Post reports, "The Salvadoran government's willingness to keep sending troops to Iraq -- after three other Latin American countries pulled out their forces -- underscores the unusually strong political and economic bonds, as well as the unique military relationship, forged in the past two decades between this tiny country and the United States." Analysts say "one reason El Salvador has agreed to stay…is that its three most recent elected presidents have been members of the rightist ARENA party, which has close ties with the Bush administration and shares its commitment to a proposed regional free-trade agreement."

US Officials Confident Case Of Afghan Convert Will Be Resolved. US officials were confident that US and international pressure would save an Afghan man facing the death penalty for converting to Christianity, but the story was seen as potentially adding to President Bush's problems. It was prominently featured by the network news broadcasts and major US newspapers. The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 2, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Administration officials are growing more confident tonight that Abdul Rahmen will not be executed for converting from Islam to Christianity." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "We are working with the Afghans and we look to a favorable resolution of this case. It needs to be favorably resolved." ... Axelrod: "Look for Rahmen to be freed before Tuesday. Why? Well, Congress is considering a request from the Bush administration for an additional $2.5 billion in aid to Afghanistan. And Tuesday is the day Secretary of State Rice goes to Capitol Hill to make the case for that money."

Stressing the problems the dispute presents for Bush, ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 3, 2:00, Raddatz) reported, "For 4 1/2 year, the Bush Administration has been touting Afghanistan and its President Hamid Karzai as shining examples of freedom and democracy. But President Karzai is in an extremely tough position, with the enormous amount of capital the U.S. is providing on one hand, and his country's conservative public on the other. But it appears Hamid Karzai is siding with the U.S. Tonight a senior U.S. Official tells ABC News that the Afghan government may be releasing Abdul Rahman soon."

NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 2, 2:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "This case created a diplomatic nightmare for the US at home and abroad. Kabul's proposed solution may not be good enough for Washington." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Christian conservatives, a crucial part of George Bush's republican base, protesting today outside the Afghan embassy in Washington." Protestors: "The whole world is watching." Mitchell: "Desperate to prevent a rebellion on the right, the administration ratcheted up the pressure for the release of 41 year old Abdul Rahman, threatened with death for converting to Christianity." The dispute "could cost President Bush more support for the war in Iraq." Lt. Col. Robert Maginnis (ret.), Christian Broadcast Analyst: "The American people don't want to think we spent our blood and treasures for new regimes that are just as oppressive as the old."

The Washington Times/AP (3/25, A1, Shah) adds that Ansarullah Mawlavi Zada, the chief among three judges trying the case "defended the court's autonomy yesterday amid reports the man could be freed." The New York Times (3/25, Wafa, 1.19M) reports that in Afghanistan "preachers used Friday Prayer services to call for the execution of an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity, despite growing protests in the West."

Bush Under Pressure From Core Constituency. The AP (3/25, Spielmann) reports, "Christian lobby groups are urging President Bush to do more to save a man on trial in Afghanistan for converting from Islam to Christianity," and "American Christians have criticized the Bush administration for what they feel is an inadequate response to a fundamental issue of freedom of conscience." Shoul Rahman be executed, "political experts agree, Bush will have alienated his most loyal core constituency — Christian conservatives."

Karzai Facing Pressure From Both Sides. The Time (3/25, Morarjee) reports that Afghan President Hamid Karzai "must…contend with deeply conservative Afghans" even as "the judge presiding over the case has rejected international calls for leniency and warned the Karzai government not to interfere with the judicial process." However, "Karzai is acutely aware of how badly a death sentence would play with foreign governments whose aid dollars keep the Afghan economy afloat — and whose troops keep the peace."

Cohen Notes That West And Islam Are At Conflict Here. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) that this situation "has elements that should lead everyone to ponder whether the West's problem is really with a 'perversion' of Islam, as politicians from President George W. Bush to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain have insisted, or with Islam itself." Both sides "mutual incomprehension, and anger, is strong," and "Rahman offers a timely reminder. The West and Islam are not at war, but they are in conflict. And it seems myopic and counterproductive to view the war as anything but the extreme expression of that conflict."

Foundation Drives For $65 Million For Memorial To Disabled Veterans. The AP (3/25, Hananel) reports, "Planners are raising money for a new site -- nestled among the tributes to fallen war heroes, from World War II, Korea and Vietnam -- to salute roughly 3 million disabled veterans." The memorial, dubbed the "American Veterans Disabled for Life Memorial," expected "to open in the next three to four years" will be "on an impressive two-acre site near the National Mall, just steps from the Capitol." The project is being planned by the Disabled Veterans LIFE Memorial Foundation, which "is in the midst of a $65 million private fundraising campaign to build the memorial."

American Use Of Torture In Iraq Condemned. In a Los Angeles Times (3/25, 958K) op-ed Olga Talamante, the executive director of California's Chicana/Latina Foundation and a survivor of torture in Argentina during the 1970's, writes, "three years into the Iraq war, we have seen the images of Abu Ghraib and read accounts of the atrocities at Baghdad's Camp Nama.

Americans once shocked by my experience now hear officials defend torture as a necessary evil in the war against terrorism. But it is only evil." Talamante continues, "The Argentine military had its own sick rationale for policies that would ultimately 'disappear' thousands of men, women and children — they were fighting an enemy from within. But the Argentine people had a better name for it: the 'dirty war.' … Iraq has become our dirty war. To those who defend torture there, beware. There will be survivors, and they will tell their stories."

Psychotherapist Sees "Desperation" In Military Recruitment Effort. In an op-ed that reflects poorly on the US military's recruitment efforts, psychotherapist Brian Ford writes in the Washington Post (3/25, A19, 744K) about his evaluation of a military recruit who left the service three years ago under a "general discharge." In the op-ed, headlined "Uncle Sam's Desperation – And A Recruit's," Ford writes, "To my knowledge, a general discharge was both negative and not that easy to get. The kid must have been in pretty bad shape." In recapping the session with the recruit, Ford notes his concerns with the recruit's past history and says the recruiter "sounded like a realtor or a car salesman making one last pitch to a prospect."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Lifts NASD's Lifetime Ban On Quattrone. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Smith) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission set aside a lifetime ban from the securities industry that had been imposed against Frank Quattrone, the former star investment banker." The Journal continues, "It was Mr. Quattrone's second big win of the week related to charges against him. On Monday, a federal appeals court vacated his May 2004 criminal conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by his trial judge." The Journal adds, "In the SEC action Friday, the federal securities regulator struck down a lifetime ban from the business, which had been imposed in November 2004 by an arm of the National Association of Securities Dealers. The move puts him a step closer to returning to the securities industry. … The ban resulted from Mr. Quattrone's failure to testify during an investigation by the NASD into allegations of possible improper 'spinning,' or rule violations related to steering hot initial public offerings of stock to investment-banking clients."

Current SEC Punishments Considered Ineffective. In a New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) op-ed Gary Weiss, author of forthcoming book on Wall Street, states to combat illegal Wall Street actions we need, "some pain. The SEC needs to make Wall Street firms wince when they do something wrong." Weiss continues, "An admission of guilt would be a good start. Then private litigants stand a far better chance of collecting. Call it the regulatory equivalent of a tow truck. Congress could help by passing a provision of tax-relief legislation, now before a House-Senate conference, that would make it harder for firms to take write-offs from settlements with government agencies. Market observers speak of a 'cycle of scandal' on Wall Street — a pattern of transgressions recurring periodically, often as a coda to bull markets, undeterred by an inadequate regulatory response. Until regulators start making errant firms feel some real pain, the next Wall Street scandal is not a question of if, but when."

PBGC Seeks Outside Counsel In GMAC Negotiations. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, 2.11M) reports the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. "is seeking outside legal counsel to help represent its interests in financial transactions at General Motors Corp." The PBGC "filed a solicitation for help in negotiations with GM over its plans to spin off a portion of its valuable financing unit, General Motors Acceptance Corp. The PBGC wants to make sure that it has access to all GM assets if it were required to take on GM employee pension obligations."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Says He Will Not Implicate DeLay In Any Wrongdoing. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/25) writes that Jack Abramoff "has advised friends that he has no derogatory information about former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and is not implicating him as part of his plea bargain with federal prosecutors. … However, Abramoff has not given a clean bill of health to any other congressman -- including Rep. Robert Ney."

Abramoff Subpoenaed In "Mob-Style" Murder Related To Casino Boat. The AP (3/25, Anderson) reports Circuit Judge Michael Kaplan "approved subpoenas for" Jack Abramoff and Adam Kidan, "an ex-business partner to answer questions about the mob-style slaying of the owner of a gambling fleet they bought." Abramoff and Kidan "have insisted…that they know nothing about the slaying of Konstantinos 'Gus' Boulis, who was ambushed in his car by a gunman in Fort Lauderdale a few months after the pair bought SunCruz Casinos from him." Abramoff and Kidan "are not charged in the slaying but are scheduled to be sentenced Wednesday in federal court after pleading guilty earlier this year to fraud charges stemming from the purchase."

US Charges Translator With Offering Bribe. The AP (3/25, Sherman) reports, "U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million." The AP continues, "Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport in Virginia, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq. … He was released from custody after a hearing Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court April 5." The AP adds, "Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. He is accused of offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint. … Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said. … Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said."

Second Juror In Ryan Case Under Scrutiny. The Chicago Tribune (3/25, Gibson, O'Connor, Heinzmann) reports, "Public records reviewed by the Tribune suggest that a second juror deciding the fate of former Gov. George Ryan has a history of arrests that was not disclosed during the jury-selection process." The Tribune continues, "The revelation comes one day after the Tribune reported that a male juror has the same name and other identifying characteristics as a man with a felony drunken driving conviction." The Tribune adds, "Hours after learning of the Tribune's information on Thursday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer halted deliberations and said she had launched an investigation into a juror. … Further record searches Friday linked the name of a female juror to an alias. The woman with that alias faced felony drug charges, as well as misdemeanor child-neglect and assault charges, records show. She was not convicted of these charges, the records show. … The female juror linked to that alias stated on a jury questionnaire before the trial that she had never been charged or accused of a crime." The Tribune notes, "After sending the jury home early Thursday, Pallmeyer said she would not reveal the outcome of her investigation before Monday. … The judge met with prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case on Friday, then returned to the bench and said the investigation was continuing. … She also said she expected the jury to resume deliberations on Monday."

SCOTUS To Rehear Death Penalty Case. The AP (3/25) reports the Supreme Court announced on Friday "it would hear arguments a second time before ruling on the constitutionality of a Kansas death penalty law, apparently so new Justice Samuel Alito can break a tie. The case is the second one that deadlocked the court following Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement in late January. The other one involves government whistleblowers."

The Kansas City Star (3/25, Bauer, Klepper, 286K) reports, "Some said it was not unprecedented for the court to ask to rehear arguments when there is a new justice. Others believe the court is split and Alito would break the tie. One reason: It ordered the same arguments presented and did not request additional briefs."

Former DSCC Aide Sentenced For Accessing Steele's Credit Card History. The Baltimore Sun/AP (3/25) reports Lauren B. Weiner, a former Democratic staffer "pleaded guilty today to computer fraud for snooping on" Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele. "Under the plea agreement in U.S. District Court," Weiner "avoids jail time, but she has a year to do 150 hours of community service." Steele "was notified by Democrats in Washington that a staffer used Steele's Social Security number to obtain his credit report last year. Weiner was fired from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee after the breach was discovered."

Steele Considering Civil Suit Against Weiner And DSCC. The Washington Post (3/25, B2, Wagner, 744K) reports, "An attorney for Steele said the lieutenant governor is considering a civil suit against Weiner…and the Democratic committee to learn more about what he called 'a dirty trick.'"

CIVIL LAW:

Small Heart Device Maker Under Federal Probe. The New York Times (3/25, Meier) reports, "Federal authorities are conducting an inquiry into Ela Medical, a small maker of defibrillators and other heart devices, according to a government official and an industry official." The Times continues, "The precise nature of the government's interest in Ela Medical, which is a division of the Sorin Group, is unclear and any inquiry appears to be at an early stage. But the inquiry comes amid a broader, continuing government investigation into relationships between larger makers of heart devices and doctors. That investigation is looking into whether the companies provided incentives to physicians to use their products." The Times adds, "One government official said authorities were looking into Ela Medical's activities in the Miami area. Separately, a device industry official said that federal authorities had made inquiries about Ela Medical. Both people spoke on the condition of anonymity because the inquiry is in progress and not yet a public matter. … The inquiry into Ela Medical is apparently being conducted by investigators with the Food and Drug Administration and the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services." The Times notes, "The Justice Department is investigating whether the country's three big makers of implanted heart devices — Medtronic, Guidant and St. Jude Medical — used illegal inducements to get doctors to use their products. They have all denied wrongdoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Alleges Voting Bias In Euclid, OH. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (3/25, Ott, Atassi) reports, "The Justice Department has threatened to sue Euclid (OH) and force changes in an election system that the federal government says prevents black candidates from winning seats on its City Council." The Plain Dealer continues, "A former Justice Department lawyer found the timing suspicious. He suggested that the Bush administration, which has not vigorously pressed voting-rights suits, may be trying to polish its image quickly. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to question Justice Department officials in May about whether they have adequately protected the rights of minority voters. … 'It's an outright embarrassment that this appears to be the first case on behalf of black voters brought forth during the Bush administration,' said David Becker, who worked for the Department of Justice from 1998 to 2005. The department 'had to file a case on behalf of black voters before the oversight hearing took place. Otherwise they would have had a lot of explaining to do about why it hasn't happened in almost six years.'" The Plain Dealer adds, "Though Euclid's black population reached 30 percent in the last census, voters have never elected a black candidate to any city or school office. The school board appointed Howard Drake to a vacant seat in 1998, but he lost in an election the next year. … The investigation, which began three years ago, targeted elections for City Council. The city is broken into four wards, which each elect one council member. Four other council members and the council president are elected citywide. … All five of those elected citywide in 2005 live in the same ward, in Euclid's northeast corner. … In a letter dated Monday, the head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division told Euclid Law Director Chris Frey that the structure dilutes minority voting power in a city that is racially divided and votes along racial lines. Black candidates would have a better chance of winning if the city were broken into eight wards, with one council member elected in each, Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim said in the letter."

DOJ Asked To Probe Tennessee Police Beating. The Jackson (TN) Sun (3/25, Reed) reports that Dr. Isaac Richmond, national director for the Commission on Religion and Racism, has joined with "members of Memphis-based CORR and more than 30 concerned citizens from the Brownsville (TN) community" to urge that "two white Brownsville Police investigators to be charged, put on trial and dismissed from the police force." Richmond accuses Chad Jackson and Brian Nichols with "brutally beating Robert Lee Jones, 42, of Brownsville, on March 17. Richmond said that Jones had not violated any laws and that the charges Jones now faces were false. … However, Mayor Webb Banks said Thursday night that Jones did break the law by attempting to evade arrest about 6:09 p.m. on March 17 on Margin Street. Banks said Jackson and Nichols chased after Jones, and that Jones swallowed what appeared to be crack cocaine during the chase." The Sun adds, "Robert Lee Jones was arraigned Monday and charged with aggravated assault, evading arrest, resisting arrest and tampering with evidence. He is being held without bond in Haywood County Jail. … A news release from CORR on Friday said that the group 'has filed charges with the U.S. Department of Justice, seeking an investigation of the Brownsville law enforcement for the human rights violations of African-American males in general, and Mr. Jones' case in particular.' The release also said that the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department has been requested to bring charges against the officers. … Banks said Thursday that an internal investigation is being conducted by the Brownsville police, but the officers are still on active duty."

Federal Judge To Rehear New Orleans Poll Complaints. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/25, Eggler) reports, "A New Orleans federal judge who refused last month to order Louisiana officials to provide out-of-state satellite polling places or take other steps to help displaced residents vote in the upcoming municipal elections has agreed to rehear some of the claims of those who say African-American voters will not have a fair chance to participate in the balloting." The Times-Picayune continues, "Judge Ivan Lemelle will hold a hearing Monday on a request by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund that he reconsider his decision not to order the state to take further steps to assist displaced voters beyond those already taken by Secretary of State Al Ater and approved by a recent special session of the Legislature." The Times-Picayune adds, "Ater has said that thanks to those actions and an aggressive campaign to notify displaced voters how they can participate in the election, this will be 'the most accessible election' in U.S. history. … The U.S. Justice Department last week approved the plans for the elections, saying the actions taken by the state meet the federal Voting Rights Act's requirements for protecting black voters' rights. … But the NAACP lawyers and local lawyers Roy Rodney and John Etter, working with them, submitted a 21-page motion citing a list of reasons why Lemelle should order further action 'to prevent manifest injustice' …"

California County Phases Out Punch Cards To Comply With DOJ Rules. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Griggs) reports Ventura County election officials "are replacing their decades-old punch-card voting system in time for the June 6 primary election. After more than 30 years of voting with punch cards, most county voters will now mark their choices with ink. … The U.S. Department of Justice had accused the county of discriminating against Latinos, who make up about a third of the population, by failing to employ sufficient numbers of bilingual poll workers or to provide adequate Spanish-language voting materials."

Black Activists Seek Satellite Voting For Displaced New Orleans Residents. The AP (3/25, Lester) reports "several black leaders" are advocating allowing displaced New Orleans to vote from "locations outside Louisiana." The AP cites Al Sharpton, Jesse Jackson, NAACP President Bruce Gordon and Urban League President Marc Morial.

Keeton Strayhorn Sues Texas Secretary Of State Over Petition Rules. The AP (3/25, Shannon) reports comptroller of Texas and independent gubernatorial candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn "sued the secretary of state Friday, claiming he is hurting her campaign for governor by unfairly enforcing rules for independent political candidates. Keeton Strayhorn "has complained for weeks about Secretary of State Roger Williams and even urged that he be removed from office because of his close ties with Perry. … Strayhorn's campaign sued in federal court in Austin over Williams' plan to have her petition examined manually, signature by signature, instead of using statistical sampling, which examines only a portion of the signatures."

Affirmative Action For Males Opposed. In his New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) op-ed column John Tierney says as the number of males in the college, "applicant pool keeps shrinking — it will soon be down to 40 percent nationally — colleges are admitting less-qualified boys in order to keep the gender ratio balanced on campus." Tierney thinks this is not fair to girls and it's, "not fair to the boys, either, if they're not ready to keep up with their classmates. Affirmative action just makes them prone to fail." Tierney concludes rather than admit less qualified males the Education Department should be, "figuring out how to help boys reach college."

Pro-Abortion Activists Seek To Overturn New South Dakota Law. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Riccardi, 958K) reports, "Opponents of South Dakota's ban on nearly all abortions announced the launch of a ballot initiative Friday aimed at overturning the new law. If the South Dakota Campaign For Healthy Families collects 16,728 signatures, the law — a direct challenge to Roe vs. Wade — will be placed on hold." According to the Times, "Proponents of the ban said they welcomed the challenge, and said the measure to reverse the law would fail at the polls."

NYTimes Says Block FDA Nominee Until Action On Morning After Pill. An editorial in The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) thinks both, "Senators Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray surely have good cause to block a vote on the nomination of Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration until the agency makes a final decision on the morning-after pill. There is no excuse for the administration's endless obfuscation and delays on making the pill available without a prescription when the overwhelming bulk of expert opinion says it is safe to do so." The Time adds, "There is little likelihood that the Senate will reject Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination in a floor vote, although the senators could at least push him for guarantees that safety issues will not be submerged in the rush to approve new drugs and conquer cancer. But the vote should not take place until the FDA has the spine to tackle the morning-after pill head-on."

ANTITRUST:

Proposed Alcatel-Lucent Merger To Face US Scrutiny. The Financial Times (3/25, Kirchgaessner, Hollinger, Taylor) reports, "Alcatel's talks with Lucent about a possible takeover – a deal that would combine a telecoms equipment company that controls sensitive US technology with a French group – will face a regulatory review in Washington on national security grounds." The Times continues, "Such a move would come at a time when protectionist sentiment in the US is at an all-time high, and raises questions about whether the Bush administration would be prepared to approve the deal." The Times adds, "The merger, which is being driven by growing competitive pressure on equipment makers and could be valued at up to $36bn, would create the world's leading maker of fixed telecoms networks and the second largest in mobile infrastructure. … It also follows in the wake of a wave of consolidation in the telecoms sector – in particlular between some of the companies' biggest clients, including the proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth and the recent takeover of MCI by Verizon."

The Washington Post (3/25, D1, Mohammed) reports, "A merger of Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel would likely draw federal scrutiny to see if it threatens national security following the furor over a Dubai-based company's plan to acquire control of six U.S. ports, communications and national security analysts said yesterday. … But analysts said they saw no obvious reason why a combination of the two telecommunications equipment makers would face major objections from the government on security or antitrust grounds." The Post adds, "Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent and Paris-based Alcatel said late Thursday that they are 'engaged in discussions about a potential merger,' but said they could not guarantee they would reach any agreement. A merger would greatly expand Alcatel's business in the United States and allow the two companies to cut costs and better compete with their larger competitors. … It is unclear how a merger, if one materializes, would be structured."

BGE Says Merger Will Buffer Rate Increases. The Washington Times (3/25, Miller) reports, "A Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. executive yesterday warned that lawmakers' attempts to block a multibillion-dollar merger could force the utility to more quickly implement a 72-percent increase in energy rates. … 'Without the merger there is no room to lower rates,' said Robert L. Gould, communications director for BGE parent company Constellation Energy Group. 'We have gone right to the edge of how much we can tolerate on the balance sheet.'" The Times continues, "He also said if lawmakers make good on their threat to block Florida Power & Light's $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy, they likely would derail plans to gradually phase in a 72-percent increase in electric bills. … 'One of the benefits of the merger is you have a bigger balance sheet,' Mr. Gould said. 'You take that away, and it will be tougher and our credit rating will be thrown into question.' … As proof, he said Moody's Investor Service has already put Constellation on a watch list because of uncertainty about the regulatory environment taking shape in Maryland's legislature."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Results Of Yucca Probe Forwarded To DOJ. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/25, Tetreault) reports, "Federal prosecutors are reviewing evidence gathered by investigators into whether scientists falsified quality assurance documents at Yucca Mountain, officials confirmed Friday." The Review-Journal continues, "Inspectors general for the Interior and Energy departments sent a report to U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in Las Vegas in the past month, said Roy

Kimes, a spokesman for Interior Department Inspector General Earl Devaney. … 'The investigative work has been done, and the report has been forwarded to the Department of Justice,' Kimes said. 'It is not considered finalized until we get an indication from DOJ that they are going to prosecute or not going to prosecute.'" Denise Smith, a spokeswoman for Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman, "said 'it is possible' that evidence of wrongdoing was discovered, but communications between investigators and prosecutors do not necessarily signal the probe is near an end. … 'As evidence is uncovered, there are dealings with the U.S. attorney's office, and oftentimes the U.S. attorney may have us do additional work or not depending on what is found,' Smith said. … Inspectors were asked to determine possible criminal activity by federal employees after the disclosure in March 2005 of provocative e-mails. … In the messages, which were written between 1998 and 2000, several workers discussed possible alterations of quality assurance documents that backed up their water infiltration models at the nuclear waste site."

Officials Warn Of Threat From Viruses Transmitted From Animals To Humans. The New York Times (3/25, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "Stronger ties between veterinarians and physicians are needed to prevent further outbreaks of the animal diseases that have caused deaths and serious illness among humans in many countries in recent years," according to international health officials. The Times notes, "The AIDS, SARS and A(H5N1) avian influenza viruses and at least eight other infectious agents carried by animals have led to new and emerging human diseases in recent years."

NYTimes Wants National Forest Sale Blocked. A New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) editorial says President Bush's 2007 budget proposes to raise money by, "auctioning off about 300,000 acres of federal forest in 41 states, at an anticipated price of $800 million." The Time continues, "This page has objected on many occasions to the administration's efforts to roll back protections for the national forests, chiefly its decision to rescind President Bill Clinton's 'roadless rule,' which would have shielded nearly 60 million acres of national forest from further commercial intrusions. Though it involves much less acreage, the proposal to sell forest land reflects the same insensitivity to environmental values, not to mention misplaced budget priorities. In addition to the forest sale, the administration also proposes to sell a half-million acres managed by the Interior Department, not for any purposes related to stewardship of the public lands, but simply to reduce a national deficit already bloated by tax cuts. Congress should reject both ideas out of hand."

Sections Of Voting Rights Act Affecting Indians Soon Up For Reauthorization. Indian Country Today (3/24, Melmer) reports, "The Voting Rights Act, enacted in 1965, will celebrate its 41st anniversary on Aug. 7; yet some provisions of the act, which supporters argue have brought American Indians into the political arena, are due to expire in 2007." ICT continues, "American Indian and non-Indian organizations are in the midst of compiling and reporting research that shows the VRA - with some permanent provisions and some temporary - has made a difference to many minorities and furthers the argument that the VRA is still needed in its entirety." ICT adds, "Section 5 of the act, renewed several times, requires nine states and portion of seven states to submit changes that affect voting in any way to the U.S. Department of Justice for approval, or pre-clearance, as it is referred. That section is due to expire in 2007. Section 5 was last renewed by Congress for a term of 25 years, and that is the recommendation again. … Section 203, which requires assistance for limited-English speakers at the polls, and Sections 6 - 9, which authorize the federal government to monitor elections, are all set to expire. … The American Civil Liberties Union submitted a comprehensive report on how the VRA affects Indian country. The states that benefited the most from the VRA were Montana, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado and South Dakota. In each state, litigation or the threat of litigation mitigated state voting legislation that would have adversely impacted American Indian residents."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Addresses Houston Crime, Terrorism Forum. KPRC-TV Houston (3/24, 10:05 p.m.) reported, "The director of the FBI was in town today talking about Houston safety and security. Gang violence, human smuggling and port security were just some of the big issues Robert Mueller talked about," and "he says the key to fighting the growing crime in Houston is by sharing intelligence and creating task forces." KRIV-TV Houston

(3/24, 9:47 p.m.) noted that "Mueller made a stop in Houston today, but it wasn't for investigative work. He spoke to the Houston Forum on Globalization of Crime and Terror." KHOU-TV Houston (3/24, McShan) reports, "The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston." FBI director Robert Mueller said of the bureau's role, "We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both (HPD Chief Harold Hurtt) and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now." KHOU adds that "both cities are cracking down on gangs, and no one wants them to call their city home."

KHOU-TV Houston (3/26, Edwards) reports on the proliferation of New Orleans gang graffiti, noting, "Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston" and "authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston." But it is "a battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police. 'For us to be effective, we have to work together,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said. 'We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans.'"

Mueller Praises New Orleans Agents, Says Headquarters Will Reopen In June. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/24, Chapple) reports, "The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish. … Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said." Mueller added, "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here. Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding." Before his meeting with Mueller, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens "praised the FBI," saying, "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about. They were there for us when we needed them."

WDSU-TV New Orleans (3/24, 6:11 p.m.) reported, "Since Hurricane Katrina damaged the FBI's building in Lakefront, the bureau has been using rented space at the Covington Country Club on the north shore. Agency Director Robert Mueller says that despite relocating, agents and staff were able to salvage evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm." WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/24, 5:01 p.m.) noted that "Mueller visited the temporary office yesterday."

Three Plead Guilty In "Operation Lively Green" Probe. The Washington Times (3/25, Seper) reports, "Two U.S. soldiers and a former Air Force sergeant have pleaded guilty in a widespread bribery and extortion conspiracy as part of an ongoing undercover investigation that has already resulted in 50 guilty pleas from servicemen and civilian government workers, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said yesterday." The Times continues, "Pleading guilty in Tucson, Ariz., on Thursday to one count each of 'conspiring to enrich themselves by obtaining cash bribes from persons they believed to be drug traffickers' were Curtis W. Boston II, 24, formerly a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force; U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Rodney E. Mills, 39; and Arizona National Guard Sgt. Gustavo C. Soto, 33." The Times adds, "Court documents show the smugglers were actually undercover FBI agents, part of 'Operation Lively Green,' with whom the three are accused of conspiring to use their positions to 'assist, protect and participate in the activities of an illegal narcotics trafficking organization engaged in the business of transporting and distributing cocaine from Arizona to other locations in the southwestern United States.' … In order to protect the cocaine shipments, the records said, the men wore their uniforms, carried official identification cards and drove in military vehicles to prevent police inspections for narcotics as they transported the drugs through U.S. Border Patrol, Arizona Department of Public Safety and Nevada law-enforcement checkpoints. … Mrs. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division, said all the defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations that included Nogales, Ariz., and Tucson, to large metro areas including Phoenix and Las Vegas. The three who pleaded guilty on Thursday accepted $50,000 in bribes for their participation. The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. All three agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation and will be sentenced in June."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Seen As Unlikely To Make Progress On Immigration In Cancun. Knight Ridder (3/25, Douglas) reports that when President Bush, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Mexican President Vicente Fox meet in Cancun on Thursday "U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting. … Given the political climate across the United States, it's doubtful that Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year. Bush is weakened by low approval ratings, and opposition to illegal immigration has become a red-hot issue in many states where lawmakers face voters in November. Moreover, several potential 2008 presidential candidates are weighing in from opposing sides, lessening the chance for compromise."

Cornyn Describes McCain-Kennedy Bill As "Amnesty." The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/25, Montgomery, 247K) reports Sen. John Cornyn "vowed Friday to oppose a bipartisan immigration measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward legalization, saying the bill would 'encourage further disrespect for our laws.' … He described the McCain-Kennedy bill as amnesty for illegal immigrants."

Cornyn-Kyl Bill Ridiculed As "Report-To-Deport" Plan. The Dallas Morning News (3/25, Mittelstadt), in an article carried by at least fourteen papers across the US, reports Cornyn and Sen. Jon Kyl "have crafted a rival proposal that would permit illegal immigrants to become guest workers for six years but then require them to return home. That plan, derided as 'report-to-deport' by critics, has received little support – and those who marched on Mr. Kyl's office Friday favor a much more liberal legalization plan."

Legal Scholars Object To Senate Bills' Provision On Immigration Appeals. The New York Times (3/25, Swarns, 1.19M) reports that "a little-noticed provision" in Senate immigration bills sponsored by Sens. Bill Frist and Arlen Specter "would reshape the handling of immigration appeals cases and has touched off an outcry from several legal scholars, federal judges and the policy-making group for the federal courts." The bill designates the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which "currently handles no immigration appeals, as the only court in the nation to handle immigration appeals. Such appeals are currently shared by the 12 other federal appellate courts. The judges and scholars say that the circuit court in Washington, which handles about 1,500 nonimmigration cases a year, would be swamped by an additional 12,000 immigration cases. And they say that the court lacks the expertise to handle complex immigration cases, which often raise a host of constitutional and human-rights issues."

Guest Worker Proposals' Antecedents Noted. The AP (3/25, Abrams) reports, "Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers." McCain and Kennedy's bill "would build on a near-century old tradition of turning to foreign unskilled laborers, mainly from Mexico, in response to labor shortages, often during times of war." During World War I, "an agreement was reached with Mexico to let in unskilled workers. … A much larger exchange, the Bracero program, began in 1942, during World War II, and continued in varying forms through 1964."

Immigrants Protest Congressional Border Security Bill. NBC Nightly News (3/24, lead story, 3:00, Brown, 9.87M) opened its broadcast with a report on immigrants' protests across the country. ABC and CBS also ran relatively long pieces on the immigration issue, but ABC concentrated on legislation being considered by the Georgia legislature that would severely restrict the ability of Illegals to find employment. NBC reported, "It is happening around the country now, by the thousands people are taking to the streets in protest, walking out of schools, shutting down businesses. The issue they are so outraged over is immigration. … The protests were sparked by a plan Congress is taking up next week aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration with tough new penalties." NBC contended, "Here in California and across the US everyone agrees that the immigration system needs to be fixed, the question is how." Senator Bill Frist was shown saying, "In order to stop the flow of illegal immigration and make America safer from criminals and terrorists."

ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 5, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "Today, protesters around the country opposed tough, new immigration laws that are in the works. 10,000 people rallied in Phoenix. 30,000 marched in Milwaukee. And in Los Angeles, 500 students walked out of their school."

The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 3, 2:20, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "The protests were much bigger and angrier than anyone expected." CBS added, "A usually silent minority made some noise today. … Fighting against house Bill 4437 passed in December, it would make illegal immigrants felons and build a 700 mile border fence." The Senate "begins work on its immigration reform bill on Monday with republicans fractured. Some side with President Bush who wants a guest worker program for the more than 12 million illegal immigrants. Others are calling for more restrictive reform." According to CBS, "the rallies aren't over yet. Tomorrow in Los Angeles, another protest. Tens of thousands of people are expected to march through downtown."

The Scripps Howard News Service/Arizona Daily Star (3/25, McCombs) reports, "Immigrant advocates across the country want to make sure nobody misses their message: Don't criminalize illegal entrants. Groups have ramped up efforts this month by organizing large street rallies, holding press conferences and meeting with state and federal lawmakers."

Phoenix Protestors March On Kyl's Office. The AP (3/25) reports, "In Phoenix, the police said 20,000 people marched to the office of Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican and the co-sponsor of a bill that would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country. Officials said it was one of the largest protests in the city's history. Mr. Kyl pointed out that most were speaking out against the House bill making it a felony to be an illegal immigrant, not against his bill, which would also step up border enforcement and create a temporary guest-worker program."

KOLD-TV Tucson, AZ (3/25, Patel) reports, "Hundreds of mothers, children, teachers, and construction workers with American and Mexican flags stood on Ina and Oracle in front of Senator John Kyl's Tucson office. Up in Phoenix, more than 20-thousand marched to Kyl's office. All voicing their opposition for Bill H.R. 4437 that's headed for the Senate. If passed it makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to live here and penalizes anyone who helps them. Some protestors believe the Sensenbrenner Bill H.R.4437 is similar to another bill Senator Kyl is trying to pass."

Los Angeles Students Stage Walkout. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Keller, Gorman, 958K) reports, "On the eve of a large rally planned downtown, hundreds of Los Angeles-area high school students staged a walkout Friday. … Disrupting classes at more than half a dozen schools, students marched onto city streets waving Mexican flags and clutching red, white and green balloons as they chanted 'Viva Mexico!'" The Times claims, "Students said they were protesting what activists see as mostly punitive legislation proposed by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner."

Border Region Sheriffs Meet To Coordinate Efforts. The Dallas Morning News (3/25, Corchado) reports, "Border county sheriffs from Texas to California joined forces Friday in an effort to stop the violence along an increasingly chaotic U.S.-Mexico border and pressure the U.S. government to take control of its territory. Following a two-day closed-door meeting here [El Paso] sheriffs from California, Arizona and New Mexico pledged to work with their hosts, the 16-member Texas Sheriff Coalition, to stop traffickers and potential terrorists at the border."

Proposed Georgia Immigration Reform Among Nation's Most Restrictive. ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 5, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "The government estimates there are 8 million to 10 million illegal workers in the country right now. There is legislation in Washington that may soon change that, but many states aren't willing to wait and are taking action on their own." ABC went on to note that the Georgia legislature is likely to approve "one of the most restrictive pieces of immigration legislation in the country." If the legislation becomes law, "Any employers with state contracts…would be barred from hiring illegal immigrants. Private businesses would face stiff fines for the same practice. Illegal immigrants would be dropped from social services, health care programs, schools, anything funded with taxpayer dollars. And there's even a possible 5% tax on money illegal immigrants wire to other countries. Georgia lawmakers say that if congress can't seem to curb illegal immigration, they will do it for them." ABC noted, "In Georgia, polls show that 80% of residents support limiting illegals."

The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 3, 2:20, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "In Georgia today an estimated 80,000 Hispanics didn't show up for work."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Cheney Highlight Differences With Democrats. President Bush and Vice President Cheney aggressively challenged Democrats on both domestic and foreign policy Friday. Their effort was characterized as a political response to dropping poll ratings as the 2006 elections approach. Bush's trip received prominent coverage in the nation's major newspapers, on local TV stations and on cable TV, but was ignored by the national network news.

The AP (3/25, Riechmann) reports Bush and Cheney "launched a one-two political punch against Democrats on Friday, saying they are ill-equipped to handle the economic recovery or the war on terror." In the face of "dismal poll ratings, Bush worked to frame the debate ahead of this year's congressional elections by telling supporters that 'the difference is clear' between the two parties on how to sustain the recovery." Meanwhile, Cheney "took on Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid and party chairman Howard Dean by name. He said leading Democrats have demanded a 'sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting.'"

The Washington Post (3/25, A3, Vandehei, 744K) says Bush "provided a preview of his two-front strategy for protecting the Republican congressional majority in an ominous political climate: hammer Democrats on national security and the economy, and raise millions of dollars for embattled GOP candidates." He "is adjusting his approach to befit the environment and is shifting into campaign mode. He realizes, aides say, that he is no longer the political force he was in the days before the 2002 and 2004 elections." Their "short-term goal is stabilize Bush's low public-approval ratings by talking about the progress and prospects for victory in Iraq. The White House also hopes to minimize intramural GOP feuding with a skeletal domestic agenda." Meanwhile, "Cheney has emerged as a central player in this strategy." He "has participated in 46 fundraisers since the beginning of 2005, including 25 for House members." In Florida Cheney "offered a variation of the new White House attack on Democrats that aides said will become a staple of campaign-oriented speeches." He "portrayed the entire Democratic leadership as wobbly in the fight against terrorism."

The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Gerstenzang, 958K) in an article titled "Bush Slams Democrats On Taxes, War" reports, "As he has all week, Bush delivered a strong pitch for fighting the war in Iraq." Bush said, "The only way that we can lose is if we lose our will. … It's the only way we can lose." Yet "he also spotlighted domestic issues, blasting Democratic opposition to the tax cuts that have been at the core of his economic program." Bush was quoted saying, "The difference is clear. … If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat. If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican" by most newspaper coverage Saturday morning.

Bloomberg (3/25 Murray, Roberts) adds, "In Indiana today, Bush said he understood that the 'turbulence on the TV screen affects the conscience of America.' He maintained that Iraqi troops are improving and that the U.S. won't retreat." While Cheney said in Florida "With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence."

Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) reported President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney "hit the ground today." Cameron: "At a campaign fundraiser for Indiana candidate it took only 13 words for the president to lay out the G.O.P. strategy as painting themselves as strong and democrats as timid on terror." Bush: "We must have members of the United States congress who will not weaken." Cameron: "That was tame compared to vice president Dick Cheney who had an answer too -- he blasted top party democrats for the their comments saying plans are dangerously incompetent."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "The top guns of the Bush White House have been firing away at Democrats. President Bush and Vice President Cheney appearing in different states but seem to be working together to try to help their party and perhaps the President's poll numbers as well."

CNN correspondent Dana Bash said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) that "today really felt like the beginning of 2006, the campaign year of 2006 for this White House. As you mentioned, both the Vice President and the President were out at fund-raisers for Congressional candidates. And Mr. Cheney, for his part, came out breathing fire on Iraq. His mission today was to hit back against the Democratic" leadership.

Local Newspaper Coverage. The Indianapolis Star (3/25, Ruthhart, 267K) reports, "Bush said he needs more 'good, honest' men like Sodrel in Congress to help him push his agenda during the final two years of his presidency. Several times Bush laid out his policy positions, punctuated by the phrase 'and Mike Sodrel understands that.'" The Star notes, "Perhaps his most emphatic call came for making permanent the tax cuts passed earlier in his presidency, which will expire in coming years if no action is taken."

The Indianapolis Star (3/25, 267K) also provides a minute-by-minute account of Bush's trip saying, "Speaking for about 30 minutes, the president offered a folksy defense of his policies and made a hard push for a continued Republican-controlled Congress."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/25, 261K) in a brief article without much coverage of Bush's message reports, "While at the airport," Bush "also presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Edy Hope, a volunteer with Carebreak at the Watson Institute in Sewickley who helps a family with a 6-year-old autistic girl." Meanwhile, "Bush opponents…organized a demonstration in downtown Sewickley last night."

In a second article from Orlando the AP (3/25, Reed) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney blasted Democrats for opposing provisions of the Patriot Act and criticizing President Bush's approval of secret wiretaps for domestic surveillance at a fundraising lunch Friday," saying that "if Democrats were capable of handling the war on terror, 'Then I ought to be singing on American Idol.'"

The Orlando Sentinel (3/25, Damron, 265K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney touted a robust economy and defended the Bush administration's tax cuts and handling of the Iraq war to an Orlando crowd of fundraisers for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller on Friday." The "event raised $250,000 for a re-election campaign that now has $1.2 million." Florida Today (3/25, Peterson, 84K) also covers this story.

Bush Poor Poll Numbers Dominate Local TV Campaign Stop Coverage. More than 30 local television stations reported on President Bush's campaign stops in Indiana and Pennsylvania. The stories focused heavily on Bush's negative poll numbers and frequently said that Senator Santorum was avoiding being publicly seen with the President. Still many of the stories mention the large financial boon these trips are expected to bring for the candidates. One example: KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "This morning, he left Washington DC on a campaign trek first to Indianapolis and later to Pittsburgh and here to help Senator Rick Santorum for an event I'm told may raise as much as $1 million dollars." KDKA continues that at "this event Senator Santorum I think is worried that President Bush's poll numbers in Pennsylvania are really low. They're very low right at the moment. And the fact is, that he may not want to be tarred with the President."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is in Pittsburgh, he's here breaking away from a string of visits to get support for the war on terror to help a fellow Republican, a fund-raiser for Rick Santorum." WPXI-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush hopes the stop in Sewickley will pay off in November. The President was in town for that private fundraiser for Rick Santorum."

WLWT-TV Cincinnati (3/24, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush headed out to campaign in Indiana today lugging heavy baggage. The war in Iraq Hurricane Katrina, and a wave of layoffs. House Republican Mike Sodrel braved the stage with Mr. Bush today. But tonight's fundraiser in Pittsburgh is closed." WKRN-TV Nashville (3/24, 5:30 a.m.) reported, "President Bush's visit to a fund raiser today in Indianapolis could bring in more than a-half million dollars for Indiana Congressman Mike Sodrel."

KQCA-TV Sacramento-Stockton (3/24 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush's popularity is so bad that even in Republican circles, candidates are giving the Commander-in-Chief the cold shoulder. In most years, candidates are begging the White House for the President to campaign with them. Not this year. Tonight, one particular fundraiser in Pittsburgh was closed to the public, so Senator Rick Santorum could avoid being seen in public with President Bush. The President's current approval rating is 34 percent."

KSFY-TV Sioux Falls-Mitchell (3/24, 5:30 a.m.) reported, "President Bush will be on the campaign fund-raising trail today in Indiana and Pennsylvania." Earlier this week, "Bush told a White House news conference he knows congressional republicans are nervous this year. But despite Bush's slump in public opinion polls, spokesman Scott McClellan says the President is still a big fund-raising draw."

GOP Candidates Keep Distance From Bush But Seek His Fundraising Help. Virtually ignoring Bush's message and focusing on the problems Bush faces in getting support from GOP lawmakers while on the campaign trail, the New York Times (3/25, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports "when Mr. Bush arrived at the Pittsburgh airport…Santorum was the first to greet him, and the president spun the senator so that he faced the press pool for photos of the two of them, according to the pool report."

The AP (3/25, Raum), in an article titled "Candidates Cool To Bush, But Not His Money," reports, "Many worried Republicans on the ballot in November have been pushing away from the White House, not wanting to be dragged under by President Bush's sinking approval ratings and growing anxiety over Iraq. That doesn't mean they're fleeing his cash offerings, however." The AP adds, "Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser. Vice President Dick Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. … Even as some Republicans are becoming increasingly defiant on a range of issues, they're still lining up dutifully for the president's campaign dollars." The AP goes on to note several instances in which GOP candidates have failed to attend events featuring either the president or vice president.

Time Poll Suggests GOP Will Retain Control Of Congress. Time (3/25) in a web exclusive reports its latest poll conducted March 22-23 "finds Americans unhappy with the performance of the Republican-controlled Congress — 39% approve, versus 49% who disapprove — and gives Democrats a 9-point lead when voters are asked to state which party's candidate they would choose for a House of Representatives seat (50% answered Democrat, 41% chose Republican)." Yet, "voter unhappiness over the Republican-controlled Congress and White House has not yet translated into a groundswell of support for the Democrats. … Nor will President Bush's dismal 39% approval rating necessarily drag down his party: almost half of voters (44%) were indifferent to whether their preferred Congressional candidate supports or opposes Bush." Time notes that "one strong sign that a political earthquake is unlikely in November: almost two out of three respondents (63%) approved of the job their own congressional representative is doing." Currently, the Democrats' "9-point advantage in party preference may not be a reliable indicator of a shift in control of the House of Representatives."

House GOP Said To Hope Baker Group Provides Iraq Exit Strategy. Newsweek's Eleanor Clift (3/25) writes, "Bush has his eye on his legacy, but House Republicans have a more immediate concern -- and that is how to save their jobs come November. 'Stay the course' is not a popular slogan on the campaign trail. That's why a new Iraq Study Group commissioned by Congress and co-chaired by former cabinet member James A. Baker III, the Bush family Mr. Fix-It, is seen by many Republicans as their best hope to forge a path out of the hell that Iraq has become. … It's Baker's cunning and diplomatic deftness that Republicans hope will extricate them from Iraq, or at least give them some new talking points in the run-up to the election."

Small Towns Begin To Have Doubts About The Iraq War. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 4, 1:50, Brown, 9.87M) reported on how the war in Iraq has affected two small towns – one in rural Pennsylvania and on in Mississippi. According to NBC, "At Susquehanna High in rural Pennsylvania" National Guard recruiters are "welcome in a school where even in wartime the military's an attractive option. … But for all of the authentic Patriotism here" recruiters have "heard more and more doubts raised about the war itself." NBC added that in Bruce, Mississippi, "though there's still support for the war" also "there are now more questions."

Support For Impeaching Bush Seen As Gaining Steam Among Liberals. The Washington Post (3/25, A1, Powell, 744K) in a front page story titled "Impeachment Whispers Get Louder" on its web site focuses on how support for impeaching Bush in is growing reporting, "It would be a considerable overstatement to say the fledgling impeachment movement threatens to topple a presidency -- there are just 33 House co-sponsors of a motion by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) to investigate and perhaps impeach Bush, and a large majority of elected Democrats think it is a bad idea. But talk bubbles up in many corners of the nation, and on the Internet, where several Web sites have led the charge, giving liberals an outlet for anger that has been years in the making." In addition to local Democrats, one "Zogby International poll showed that 51 percent of respondents agreed that Bush should be impeached if he lied about Iraq, a far greater percentage than believed President Bill Clinton should be impeached during the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal."

Specter Schedules Hearing For Bush Censure Resolution. The AP (3/25) in a brief story notes, "The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for next Friday on Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing a warrantless surveillance program."

The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter "said he had decided to schedule the session after Mr. Feingold, in a television interview, pressed for hearings on the censure proposal." He "said his intent was not to use the session as a political forum but to explore issues surrounding the proposed censure. He said he believed the proposal was baseless." Specter said, "I am prepared to deal with it. … I am sure not going to sit back and have Feingold spout off."

More Commentary On Bush And Cheney Challenge To Democrats. Former presidential adviser David Gergen said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (3/24, 6:00 p.m.), "It seems like a peculiar time for rhetorical volleys back and forth. They have a few months to get this straightened out in Iraq, the window's closing there. Got get a government, an all-hands effort to push the Iraqis. And the President was talking about that this week. We need action. We need the secretary of state over there, the Vice President over there knocking heads among Iraqis to get a government tomorrow formed and they've got to have a strategy." Gergen added, "They ought to stress policy and action and personnel, not all this rhetorical stuff."

Chris Matthews said on MSNBC's Hardball (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "The White House unleashed Dick Cheney to defend the honor of the President and crush Democratic critics who question his fitness to protect the country." He later added "Let me ask you about this Cheney thing. People think he is the most powerful Vice President and he goes today with a mission which he announced himself and said I'm going out to defend the President of the United States against the charge of incompetence. I find that so ironic and almost disloyal to Bush because it looks like they made a charge against him and had to defend him."

Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) compared Cheney's remarks to Spiro Agnew's complaints about the "nattering nabobs of negativism" and said, "Look, the Vice President is out there swinging, although, I'm not sure you can laugh off the competence charge with a joke like that. After all, even apart from the war, you have Katrina, the Harriet Miers deal, the ports stuff, stuff that was not really well-handled. The way to handle the competence charge is to do thing that are competent between now and election day. They ought to draw on the weakness of the Democrats and the war but they are all over the map. With the speeches he made speaking without a prompter and from his heart, the President at least rallies those who support the war."

Morton Kondracke on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) said that "the problem is I'm not sure talk will do it this time. Talk by itself. I think there's got to be a government forum in Iraq, it's got to be a good government. The Iraqi military has got to fight and win battles against the insurgency, and there's got to be troop withdrawal by November in order for the republicans to do well in the election."

Fred Barnes on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) said, "What Cheney previewed was the campaign Republicans are going to run probably before the fall. They are not going to allow it, don't want it to be a referendum on the President. They want it to be a choice. They say 'you may not agree fully with what we're doing in Iraq but these guys are going to pull out and the whole world will collapse.' And they are going to make it a them or us choice."

Democratic strategist James Carville said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.), "here is a man who said that we would be greeted as liberators, that Iraq had reconstituted the nuclear weapons program. It is kind of funny. Him talking about competence is like me talking about hair. Don't know very much about it now, do we? And I have to say when it comes to Cheney -- red Rover, red Rover, send Dick Cheney right over."

President of American Cause Bay Buchanan said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "The key is this is reminiscent of the old Spiro Agnew. The key -- what the vice president is trying to do here is create a national agenda for Republicans. So whether he goes into this state or not or just talks to national television, the point is make that trump card stronger than ever. National security works for Republicans. Let's bring it up there. Let's put the Democrats on the defense. They are splintered on it. They fall apart every time somebody says something strong in their -- takes strong action in their party. Let that happen again between now and November."

Former Presidential Candidate Rev. Al Sharpton said on MSNBC's Hardball (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "I think that for the Cheney statements today and others to act as though they can shift this to the competence of the Democrats when they were in charge not only of the White House, but of the Congress, is what's going to come and burn them in the midterm election." He later added, "If we had a meeting at democratic headquarters to choose who we could get to defend Bush, Dick Cheney would have won. He would be by far, the one I would want to help Bush."

First Lady Says She Has Hand In White House Personnel Decisions. The New York Times (3/25, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports that in an interview with CNN's Larry King broadcast Friday night, First Lady Laura Bush said "she advised her husband regularly on personnel, and she suggested that she had weighed in on the continuing calls from Republicans for new blood in the West Wing." The Times notes that the First Lady "made her comments in response to questions from Mr. King about a Washington Post article on Friday by Sally Quinn. In a 'Dear Laura' essay in the Style section, Ms. Quinn wrote that Mrs. Bush was the only person who could tell her husband the truth about the problems he faces." Asked if she gives the president advise about personnel, she responded, "I would certainly — that's one of the things we do talk about the most, are personalities. I know everyone as well as he does, who works here. I've worked with them also. So certainly I would give him that kind of advice."

Bush To Throw Out First Pitch In Cincinnati. The Cincinatti Enquirer (3/25, Wilkinson) reports, "President Bush will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday." Sen. Mike DeWine, a season ticket holder "will be in his seat on the mezzanine level for Opening Day."

Government Releases $1.5 Billion To States To Offset Health Costs. The AP (3/25) reports, "The federal government released $1.5 billion on Friday to offset health care expenses that states incurred when assisting Hurricane Katrina evacuees." Congress has "set aside $2 billion to reimburse states" and "the $500 million not distributed yet will cover future expenses." The federal government "granted waivers to states that had temporarily enrolled evacuees into their Medicaid programs" after the hurricane.

Medicare Benefit Makes Obtaining Drugs Harder For Some Seniors. Knight Ridder (3/25, Pugh) reports patients "are facing a new problem with the fledgling Medicare prescription drug benefit: Medications they once received without question from other plans are being denied by the private insurers running the Medicare plan. When they appeal the coverage denials, the patients and their physicians face confusing forms, time-consuming demands for personal medical information and long delays." Knight Ridder adds, "And many fear things will worsen in April when tens of thousands of elderly and disabled patients must formally petition the plans to get refills on medications that were provided on a temporary emergency basis.

Employees Often Burdened By Obligations To Elderly Parents. The New York Times (3/25, Gross, 1.19M) reports that "as corporate America scrambles to help the soaring number of baby boomers, mostly working women, whose obligation to frail, elderly parents results in absenteeism, workday distractions or stress-related health problems. Companies are responding, but experts say they often use child care benefits as a model when they do not suit the different and unpredictable needs of the elderly."

OTHER NEWS:

New Home Sales' Steep Drop May Signal End Of Housing Boom. The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 6, :30, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "A sharp drop in new-home sales reported today surprised analysts who say the long housing boom may finally be losing steam. Sales of new single-family homes fell 10.5% in February, the biggest decline in almost nine years. And for the fourth straight month the median price of a new home dropped to $230,400."

The Washington Times (3/25, A1, Hill, 90K) in a front page story reports, "The downturn in the housing market is deepening, with new home sales at a nine-year low, prices down for the fourth month in a row and mortgage applications at their lowest point in three years." The "rapidly decelerating housing market" is a concern for both the stock market and the Federal Reserve which "is scheduled to meet on Tuesday to decide on raising interest rates once again. While most Fed-watchers say another rate increase is in store next week, the faltering housing market may influence the Fed to consider pausing later this spring."

The Washington Post (3/25, D1, Tse, 744K) notes that in contrast a National Association of Realtors survey showed "that existing-home sales had increased in February after a five-month decline." While experts "cautioned against reading too much into monthly changes in either report," there "is no question, experts said, that things are cooling."

Bloomberg (3/25, Richter) notes it was the biggest decline "in nine years" and says, "Rising mortgage rates are making new homes less affordable. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.25 percent in February from 6.15 percent the month before, according to Freddie Mac."

The Financial Times (3/25, Swann) adds, "A big slowdown could prompt consumers to cut spending and boost savings. Such a shift could help reduce the current account deficit but at the cost of significantly slower growth." The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Dunham, 2.11M) and the Los Angeles Times (3/25, Haddad, 958K) also report on the drop in new-home sales.

Stocks Finish Up Slightly For The Week. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 7, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished the week with modest gains. The Dow was up just under 10 points. For the week the Dow was almost unchanged up less than one point. The NASDAQ gained just over six points on the week."

The Wall Street Journal (3/25, McKay, 2.11M) reports, "Economic data from the Commerce Department contributed to the gains, after a seesaw day of trading. Durable-goods orders rose 2.6% in February, better than analysts expected." And while the Commerce Department reported new-home sales plunged in February, "it was something of a welcome sign for investors hoping the Fed will limit further interest-rate increases, convinced the economy isn't overheating."

Bloomberg (3/25, Baker) notes, "The S&P 500 rose 1.28, or 0.1 percent, to 1302.95. The Dow Jones Industrial Average added 9.68, or 0.1 percent, to 11,279.97. Google's gain aided the Nasdaq Composite Index, which advanced 12.67, or 0.6 percent, to 2312.82."

Iran Could Have Bomb In 3 Years, LATimes Reports. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Rubin, Farley, 958K) reports, "With efforts to halt its nuclear program at an impasse, Iran is moving faster than expected and is just days from making the first steps toward enriching uranium, said diplomats who have been briefed on the program. If engineers encounter no major technical problems, Iran could manufacture enough highly enriched uranium to build a bomb within three years, much more quickly than the common estimate of five to 10 years, the diplomats said." According to the Times, "New information about Iran's program came from diplomats representing countries on the United Nations Security Council." A "senior diplomat in Vienna" is quoted as saying, "We're getting conflicting signals from the United States; it now appears they want to escalate the situation. ... The Russians see that as a slippery slope."

Iran Top Of Agenda For Rice European Trip Next Week. AFP (3/25) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Europe next week for talks to be dominated by the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, diplomatic sources said. The trip will begin Thursday in Germany and also take in France and Britain -- the three European Union countries that had led negotiations to press Iran to suspend all uranium-enrichment activities." According to AFP, "The German government confirmed that Rice would meet Chancellor Angela Merkel and Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin Thursday. Government spokesman Thomas Steg told a press conference that their talks would cover a wide range of topics, including the Iranian nuclear crisis."

"Military Solution" Not A Near-Term Option, Pace Says. AFP (3/24) reports, 'The top US military officer said here that Washington does not consider military action as an immediate option to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program. 'Iran is a long way from needing any kind of military solution,' General Peter Pace...said in an interview with the NTV news channel during a visit to Turkey. 'The United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia-- other countries, certainly the Turkish government -- are all working to persuade the Iranian government to function in a way that is not dangerous. ... There are many more things to be done politically and diplomatically before anybody, any country, considers some kind of a military option.'"

Sharon's Shadow Looms Over Upcoming Election. A number of print sources cover the Tuesday election in Israel. The New York Times (3/25, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, 'Nearly three months after [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon's major stroke on Jan. 4, his spirit hangs over this Israeli election, as the country prepares to give its verdict on Tuesday on Kadima, the centrist party he created. Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, leaves Mr. Sharon's big chair empty at the center of the cabinet table and does not use the prime minister's office. Mr. Sharon's huge photo is wrapped around the suburban headquarters of Kadima. ... Yet the image of Mr. Sharon, so recently considered the indispensable figure in Israeli politics, has now faded from the advertisements and even the television programs."

The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Leggett, Spindle, 2.11M) notes, "Kadima, the political party he created just weeks before suffering a brain hemorrhage, may score a sweeping victory, according to polls. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, previously Mr. Sharon's little-noticed deputy, is poised to ride Mr. Sharon's legacy to the prime minister's office. That could mean important changes in Israeli policies, especially concerning relations with the Palestinians. And it could present new challenges for the US and Europe when it comes to Middle East peacemaking."

Olmert is largely relying on Sharon's legacy, as a Financial Times (3/25, Morris) analysis adds, "If Ehud Olmert next week fulfills a life-long ambition to become prime minister of Israel, it will not be on the basis of his personal popularity. In a telling response to pollsters, evidently running out of questions to ask the public in one of the country's least animated election campaigns, only one in eight Israelis queried said they would want him as a dinner partner. It is a statistic that might floor a more sensitive candidate. But Mr Olmert has grown a tough skin during an abrasive political career spanning more than four decades in which he has rarely gone out of his way to court the public's affection."

As Israelis Prep For Vote, Unilateralism Is The New Watchword. Knight Ridder (3/25, Nissenbaum) reports, "Few people who are preparing to vote Tuesday talk about peace. Instead, they talk about giving the next government a green light to set Israel's boundaries without negotiating with the Palestinians. Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that within four years he wants to shut down the more remote Jewish communities in the predominantly Palestinian West Bank, formally absorb the bigger Jewish settlements around Jerusalem and retain a protective military presence in the occupied valley near Jordan. Critics of the plan say it's likely to backfire. Instead of buying Israel a few years of stability, they warn, the idea of effectively seizing more West Bank land that's supposed to be part of a Palestinian state, walling Israel behind the separation barrier and retaining a military presence near Jordan will only inflame frustrations." Yossi Alpher, a former director of the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University, is quoted as saying, "Unilateralism cannot forge a lasting peace. ... It can't forge any peace. Unilateralism creates a better territorial situation looking towards a peace process somewhere down the line."

"Everything Is Open," Hamas Leader Says Of Vote. Newsweek (3/25, Peraino) reports, "Mahmoud Zahar is an unlikely expert on Israeli politics. In the almost two decades since he helped to found the Islamist group Hamas, Zahar has lived through six Israeli election cycles. But the most important lesson his experience has taught him is that predicting the results is a fool's errand—even in a year when one party seems poised to dominate." Zahar is quoted as saying, "Israeli society is divided into so many parties and sectors. ... Even in one party there are different sectors." Newsweek continues, "Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima bloc may seem poised to crush its nearest rivals in next Tuesday's parliamentary polls. But Zahar knows the real game doesn't begin until the postelection horse-trading starts—an inevitability in a nation where 15 different parties are likely to win seats in Parliament, and none a majority. 'In Israel, everything is open,' Zahar says."

Impact Of Israeli-Arab Voters Likely To Be Limited. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, King, 958K) reports, "Arab citizens of Israel make up 13% of the country's eligible voters, and if numbers alone were what counted, they would be a powerful political bloc, eagerly courted by all sides. Instead, the mood among the Arab electorate is largely one of listlessness. Pollsters are forecasting that their turnout will be low, and those who do vote are likely to divide their support among a number of small Arab parties."

UN Help In Offing For Trial Of Hariri Murder Suspects. AFP (3/25) reports, "The Security Council was set to ask UN chief Kofi Annan next week to strike a deal with Lebanon on creating an international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's ex-premier, Argentina's ambassador said. Cesar Mayoral, the president of the Security Council for March, told reporters that the 15-member body would vote Tuesday on a French-drafted resolution urging Annan to negotiate an accord on the tribunal for suspects in the slaying of Rafiq Hariri. Diplomats said the text was virtually certain to be adopted."

Activist Develops A Presidential Following In Lebanon. Newsweek (3/25, Glain) reports, "Even though a national election isn't scheduled, human-rights activist Chibli Mallat is running for president. And his chances of winning are looking better all the time. Chibli Mallat, a Lebanese human-rights lawyer and activist, is campaigning as an independent for his country's presidency. That makes him unique, for two reasons: First, in Lebanon's highly factionalized politics, no one gets anywhere without belonging to an ethnic or religious clan. Second, there are no scheduled elections to contest."

Cunningham-Linked Contractor Formed Non-Profit To Push Democracy In Iran. Knight Ridder (3/25, Strobel) reports, "In a new example of disgraced defense contractor Mitchell Wade's attempts to exert influence in Washington and beyond, Wade and two business partners formed a nonprofit group in 2004 to promote democracy in Iran, according to documents and interviews. Wade and the two partners, who have been large contributors to Republican political campaigns, formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation in April 2004, according to incorporation papers filed in Washington. The timing coincides with a push by opponents of the theocratic regime in Tehran to appropriate more money for democracy programs." Knight Ridder adds, "Behrooz Behbudi, who helped incorporate the foundation, said in a telephone interview that Wade 'was supposed to get funds from the Congress' for the project. The two later fell out over business dealings in Iraq, Behbudi said."

Columnist Questions Whether US Democracy-Promotion Efforts Are Targeted Correctly. In a Los Angeles Times (3/25, 958K) column, former Malaysian deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim, writes, "Since 9/11, the United States has pursued what the White House calls a 'forward strategy of freedom' predicated on the belief that a dearth of democracy in Muslim countries has led to the spread of a deadly strain of Islamic extremism." However, "as the first returns come in on this democratization effort in the Muslim world, there is growing anxiety in the US about the resulting character of these nascent, freely elected governments. Some have begun to even question whether these countries have the innate ability to sustain democracy. For the United States, the fear is real, though perhaps tinged with a bit of Islamophobia: How terrible an irony it would be if this grand effort to spread liberty abroad resulted in anti-US Islamic states imposing Sharia, or Islamic law, on their people."

Egyptian Activist Endured Jail In Name Of Democracy -- And Islamic Law. In a related story, the New York Times (3/25, Slackman, 1.19M) asks, "What makes a person go to jail for his beliefs and fortifies that person to hold strong while the moments of life — weddings, births, deaths — pass by? Essam el-Erian missed six and a half years of freedom for his political work." But "Mr. Erian's push for democracy does not sit as well with those in the West, namely the United States and Europe, because while he calls for free elections, freedom of speech and due process, he freely admits that he wants those political changes to help bring Islamic law to Egypt. His critics believe that religious-based organizations like his want to use the mechanics of democracy to achieve power, but have no intention of actually supporting democratic values or practices." Erian, a leading figure in the Muslim Brotherhood, is quoted as saying, "It is a duty to do it, it is a religious duty. ... Our people look like slaves to dictatorships, and Islam came to release people from slavery to be only slaves of the God."

US Retracts Pakistani Senator's Visa. The Washington Post (3/25, A3, Vedantam, 744K) reports, "The Bush administration has withdrawn an invitation to a Pakistani lawmaker and a prominent critic of President Pervez Musharraf who was to arrive in the United States today as a guest of the State Department, setting off charges that the action came at the behest of the Pakistani government. Sana Ullah Baloch, who had been invited by the State Department last year and issued a visa, was told recently by the US Embassy in Islamabad that he could not attend a State Department-sponsored program on accountability in government and business and that a visa he had already received had been revoked." During a Wednesday interview, "State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck said the problem was not funding but rather new information that was received after Baloch had been approved that 'led us to believe he was not eligible for a visa.' She declined to elaborate."

Indian Premier Favors Treaty, Pakistan Asks For Kashmir Solution First. The New York Times (3/25, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, Indian "Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called Friday for a far-reaching 'treaty of peace, security and friendship' between India and Pakistan, in what appeared to be an effort to stanch criticism from across the border for inaction on the contested Kashmir region. Pakistan politely welcomed the offer but pointed, not surprisingly, to the need to take on the Kashmir issue." Mr. Singh is quoted as saying, "We are not afraid of discussing Jammu and Kashmir or of finding pragmatic, practical solutions to resolve this issue as well," though he added that territorial lines were not up for discussion.

US, Europe Will Place Sanctions On Belarus. The New York Times (3/25, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Europe said Friday that they would impose sanctions against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko of Belarus and other top officials for cracking down on a peaceful protest over his re-election, which was widely seen as a sham." The US "stopped short of cutting its ties with the Belarus government, but a senior State Department official said that travel and financial restrictions already in place on 'fewer than a dozen' Belarussian government officials would probably be extended to more than 50, including Mr. Lukashenko. The European Union announced similar moves."

In its coverage, the Financial Times (3/25, Buckley, Dombey) notes, "The tough EU and US response set them sharply at odds with Russia. Moscow has accepted the election results and congratulated Mr Lukashenko on winning a third five-year presidential term with an official 82.6 per cent of the vote, on a 92 per cent turnout." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, "on Friday accused the

The Washington Post (3/25, A12, Branigin, 744K) adds, "White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the United States demanded the immediate release of hundreds of protesters who have been arrested for demonstrating against March 19 elections, which President Alexander Lukashenko claims to have won with nearly 83 percent of the vote." McClellan is quoted as saying, "The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views. ... We strongly condemn the actions by Belarusan security services, [who] forcibly seized and detained citizens of Belarus who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19th election results."

And in an exclusive interview with Professor Alexander Kozulin, one of the two top Belarussian opposition leaders, Time (3/24, Zarakhovich) quotes Kozulin as saying, "Lukashenko's lost his nerve. Tomorrow, Saturday, March 25, is a major national holiday, albeit unrecognized officially — the anniversary of the Belarus People's Republic, our independent state, proclaimed back in 1918 and destroyed several months later. Lots of people always gather to mark this day. Now, the anniversary coincided with mass election fraud protests. The opposition has called upon the people to come to the square en masse to protest. The authorities were scared that this 'pathetic tent camp' worked as a toehold for the dozens of thousands who would show up tomorrow — and turn Minsk into a free city. So they moved to remove it." The AP (3/25) also covers the story.

Opposition Focus Shifts To Detention Center. A separate New York Times (3/25, Chivers, 1.19M) notes, "The center of the psychological chess game between the autocratic government of Belarus and its emboldened new opposition shifted Friday from a small camp on October Square to a pretrial detention center, where much of the opposition movement now finds itself locked up." On Friday, "relatives of the detained and opposition members who had eluded arrest turned up at the jailhouse walls, demanding to know who was inside, and trying to get the officials to accept parcels for the detainees. The bags contained nuts, juice, toothbrushes and clean clothes."

Schumer, Graham Take Softer Line On China Penalties. The Financial Times (3/25, Dyer, Swann) reports, "Advocates of free trade were hopeful on Friday that a more conciliatory stance by two US senators who have threatened draconian legislation against China would help cool anger in Congress over China's trade policies. Senators Charles Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who sponsored a bill to place a 27.5 per cent tariff on Chinese exports entering the US, said the country had taken 'a big first step' towards establishing a more flexible currency regime. Speaking on a visit to China, they said they would make a decision only next week on whether to put their bill for a vote on March 31. They hinted, however, that any vote would be delayed for at least a month."

Lucent, Alcatel Hope An Ascendant China Will Give Legs To Tie-Up. As Alcatel pursues a $13 billion merger with Lucent Technologies Inc., the Wall Street Journal (3/25, Silver, Berman, Abboud, 2.11M) reports, "There is renewed urgency for a deal. Chinese upstarts such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. are beginning to enter their turf with cheaper products, threatening to seize market share, take jobs and set industry standards for the huge Chinese market." Both Lucent and Alcatel hope that the fast-changing global telecom landscape will keep their deal from becoming a political football," as the recent Dubai Ports World debacle and the "possible purchase of Unocal Corp. by China's Cnooc Ltd., fell apart over U.S. opposition."

China's Imposition Of Consumption Taxes A Good Example For US, NYTimes Says. After an announcement by Beijing last week that it would "raise existing taxes and impose new ones on things like gas-guzzling cars and trucks, and disposable wooden chopsticks," the New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "China's relentless economic growth has created severe environmental problems and depleted its natural resources. Its energy demands have contributed to rising oil prices and the gases associated with global warming. So it is heartening when China, the world's most populous nation, takes steps to curb its appetites. We hope other countries (like the United States) may be similarly inspired."

US Proposal To Change How UN Funding Mechanism Rankles Russia, China. The Financial Times (3/25, Nations) reports, "The US has sparked protests from Russia and China by proposing a fundamental change to the way contributions to the United Nations are calculated that would make them pay more. The US...wants to shift from a formula broadly based on gross national income (GNI) to one that takes account of purchasing power parity (PPP) – a tool used by economists to compare living standards in different countries more accurately. In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, before that hearing was delayed, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, argued that the GNI-based calculations could be 'greatly skewed by distortions introduced into the marketplace by -currencies which are non--convertible'." But "the move is a clear challenge to China and Russia, and to developing countries, whose relative wealth is considerably higher when measured by PPP. 'PPP would radically shift the balance,' said one UN diplomat. 'Developing countries would pay a lot more.'"

UN Security Council Wants Faster Darfur Planning. The AFP (3/25) reports, "The UN Security Council called for faster preparations for the African Union (AU) to hand over its peacekeeping mission in Sudan's western Darfur region to the United Nations. The 15-member body unanimously adopted a resolution that also decided to extend for at least six months the mandate of the UN mission in south Sudan (UNMIS). The text directed UN chief Kofi Annan, working with the AU and in consultations with the council 'to expedite the necessary preparatory planning for transition' from the AU force known as AMIS to a UN operation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Says NSA Can Eavesdrop On Lawyer-Client, Doctor-Patient Communications. The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) reports that the the Justice Department told Congress in "written responses to nearly 100 questions posed by Republicans and Democrats about the N.S.A.'s eavesdropping program" that "the National Security Agency has the authority to listen without warrants to conversations between lawyers and their clients and doctors and their patients if a connection to Al Qaeda is suspected." Michigan Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D) said "the answers were 'vague and unresponsive' and reflected an effort by the administration to 'thumb its nose at the American people and their elected representatives.'" The AP (3/25, Shrader) adds, "the department also said that it sees no prohibition to using information collected under the NSA's program in court."

Judge Appointed To FISA Court. The AP (3/25) reports U.S. District Judge John Bates has been named to the FISA court to replace "U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who quit shortly after news reports about the Bush administration going around the court to eavesdrop on U.S. citizens suspected of communicating with terrorists."

Moussaoui Trial Shines Unwelcome Light On FBI. The New York Times (3/25, Lewis, Johnston, 1.19M) reports, "even those who strongly supported an aggressive prosecution may wonder whether the trial has shed as much light on Mr. Moussaoui's culpability as it has on the missteps and mistakes by law enforcement agencies. The testimony of two prosecution witnesses," Harry Samit, an F.B.I. agent and Michael Rolince, a retired F.B.I. counterterrorism supervisor, "has brought renewed and unwelcome attention to how the Federal Bureau of Investigation dealt with early warning signs." Another "problem for the bureau is that the backbone of the prosecution case, that the bureau could have disrupted the plot had Mr. Moussaoui admitted all he knew, represents a substantial revision of conventional wisdom at the law enforcement agency."

Martin Won't Testify On Her Actions. The Washington Post (3/25, A8, Markon, 744K) reports that "Judge Leonie M. Brinkema yesterday quashed the subpoena" for Carla J. Martin, the "government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui," to testify at his trial. Legal experts said this could mean she advised the court she "planned to invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify." The Minneapolis Star Tribune (3/25, Gordon, 424K) adds, "It was not immediately clear whether Martin, a Transportation Security Administration attorney, would appear later or had signaled her intention to exercise her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. It was also possible her testimony was no longer thought to be necessary."

have asked a federal appeals court to intervene in the case of two Albany Muslims accused of supporting terrorism, saying the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret." The AP continues, "Attorneys for Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain filed a writ Friday asking the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals to review Judge Thomas McAvoy's pretrial ruling. Arguing that illegal warrantless wiretaps may have been used, they had filed a motion to thrown out charges, suppress any evidence from such wiretaps and force prosecutors to disclose whether they were used." The AP adds, "McAvoy on March 10 rejected the motion. His 'classified' ruling leaves his reasons secret. The earlier responses by prosecutors and the U.S. Justice Department also were classified. … The writ says the judge 'failed to rule on the legality of the NSA surveillance program, even though it is clearly a source of evidence in this case.' They called the judge's handling of the issue 'an especially serious breach of due process.' … Yassin Aref, 35, imam at Masjid as-Salam in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, 50, are accused of laundering money in 2003-2004 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer. Neither is accused of actual violence."

Pakistan Repels Militant Attack. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Ali, 958K) reports, "Pakistani security forces shot dead at least 18 militants in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region near the border with Afghanistan early Friday, security officials said," although "government claims could not be independently verified." According to officials, "the attackers fired rockets on the troops and security forces returned fire," and "one security official said that Cobra helicopters were called in to assist ground forces in repulsing the attack."

Italy Opposition Leader Pans US Travel Alert. The Washington Post (3/25, Delaney, 744K) reports, "Opposition leader Romano Prodi says he got on the phone to the US ambassador right away to demand an explanation: Why did the State Department issue a public announcement warning Americans in Italy to stay away from political rallies because of possible violence?" Prodi is quoted as saying, "The US alert surprised me. ... A move like this, with elections nearing, can cause a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that." A US embassy spokesman is quoted as saying that the warning "is not political."

Israeli Athlete From '72 Games Recounts Terrorist Attack. The New York Times (3/25, Salzman, 1.19M) reports that Dan Alon, a former champion Israeli fencer who survived the attacks at the Munich Olympics in 1972, "spoke about his ordeal for the first time in the United States on Thursday night at Yale, warning that reprisal killings of terrorists only lead to 'bloodshed and more bloodshed.'" He "had kept silent in the nearly 34 years since the attack, not even telling his wife and daughter," but "said he was inspired by watching the movie "Munich" to tell the story of his escape from the building where the Palestinian terrorist group Black September had taken his fellow athletes and some coaches hostage, later killing 11 of them."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Thompson Seeks Assurances On Port Security Deal. The AP (3/25, Bridis) reports that Mississippi Rep. Bennie Thompson (D), the senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, "sought assurances Friday over a no-bid contract the Bush administration is finalizing with a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere" in "the first time a foreign company will be involved in running sophisticated U.S. radiation-detection equipment at an overseas port without American customs agents present." Thompson is "h concerned there will be inadequate oversight."

The AP (3/25, Bridis, Solomon) adds, "A U.S. military intelligence report, once marked 'secret,' cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas," and "some security experts questioned whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States."

Lawmakers Move To Change Investment-Review Process. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Hitt, King, 2.11M) reports, "With lawmakers still fuming over DP World and economic nationalism running high, Congress is all but certain to pass sweeping changes to the investment-review process." Now, "building on their win in the Dubai ports deal, U.S. lawmakers are moving to gain leverage over a swath of foreign investments in the U.S., an effort that business leaders and President Bush's aides warn could harm the U.S. economy." Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby "released the summary of a bill Friday that would greatly expand the array of foreign acquisitions subject to automatic scrutiny and would require the administration to notify lawmakers as soon as it begins to review any foreign transaction," although "the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared."

Despite Lack Of Support Some Struggle Against 9/11 Memorial. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Barry, 958K) reports Rosaleen Tallon, the sister of firefighter who died in the Twin Towers collapse has tried for months to rally a broad protest against the 9/11, "memorial, 'Reflecting Absence,' in a city that is frustrated with paralysis at ground zero. Three weeks ago, intent on getting out her message, she came up with the idea of a vigil. Now, every night, outside the fire station, she," and a small group warn, "that the underground memorial could bring on a new cataclysm, trapping innocent people in the event of an attack." The Times adds now New Yorkers are saying, "what they had not said before: that certain Sept. 11 families were obstructing progress at ground zero and should step aside." … If there is a point of consensus, it is that the hole has gaped here too long. With plans to rebuild office buildings at a deadlock over financing, 'Reflecting Absence' is the only plan that seems to be moving forward."

Spitzer Questions Plans For Rebuilding Ground Zero. The New York Times (3/25, Healy, 1.19M) reports new York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer "expressed concern last night that the Freedom Tower project at ground zero lacked 'economic viability' and could turn into 'a white elephant.'" Spitzer" suggested that, as New York's next governor, he would move more swiftly than Gov. George E. Pataki in rebuilding Lower Manhattan."

Red Cross Accused Of Mishandling Katrina Funds. ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 1, 3:00, Vargas) led its broadcast last night with a report detailing, "allegations of fraud and theft inside" the American Red Cross after hurricane Katrina. ABC continued, "After Katrina, the American Red Cross raised more than $2 billion to help hurricane victims. But this internal Red Cross investigation obtained by ABC News says much of that money, perhaps million, was misused. The report uncovered 'outright contempt for well established arc fiscal controls, intentionally diluted or ignored' for personal gain, fraud constituting 'a breathtaking systematic failure on the part of senior management.'"

The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 4, 2:30, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "Today the Red Cross said that it is aggressively investigating allegations brought by volunteers of outright criminal activity during Katrina. Former Red Cross volunteer and attorney Jerome Nickerson wrote a tough investigative report made public today. In an exclusive interview with CBS News Nickerson says he found widespread evidence of theft and fraud including a veritable black market of disaster relief goods operating out of New Orleans with the knowledge of some Red Cross supervisors."

The New York Times (3/25, Strom, 1.19M) reports, "In a major shake-up of its relief operations in New Orleans, the American Red Cross dismissed two key supervisors yesterday as part of a wide-ranging inquiry into the improper diversion of relief supplies after Hurricane Katrina, a Red Cross official said." The supervisors "were in charge of the organization's kitchens and shelters, which have assisted tens of thousands of the hurricane's victims." The dismissals "came a day after the interim president of the Red Cross said the organization was investigating accusations of impropriety, including possible criminal activity." Among the accusations under investigation: "That supervisors in charge of the kitchens have been ordering more food than is needed, raising questions about where the extra food is going."

Senator Presses Red Cross Investigation. The AP (3/25, Kellman) reports, "Pressed by Congress, the American Red Cross said Friday it is investigating claims that volunteers engaged in widespread theft in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. … Allegations of wrongdoing go far beyond what the statement said were 'inevitable ... departures from standard procedures' after such a catastrophe, according to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee," IA Sen. Charles Grassley (R). Grassley "has said volunteers may have committed criminal fraud."

Civil Engineers Questions Army Corps Of Engineers Design of New Orleans Flood Walls. The Army Corps of Engineers has come under criticism from a civil engineers organization that is reviewing the Army Corps of Engineers' levee work in New Orleans. The Washington Post (3/25, A6, Warrick, Whoriskey, 744K) reports that the American Society of Civil Engineers' External Review Panel, "which was appointed to oversee the Corps investigation of the levee system's collapse during Hurricane Katrina," has questioned "the soundness of large portions of New Orleans's levee system, warning that the city's federally designed flood walls were not built to standards stringent enough to protect a large city."

Texans Said To See Administration As "Heartless" On Recovery. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Bustillo, 958K) reports that six months after Hurricane Rita, "in the president's home state, in a region densely populated by energy and petrochemical industries with warm ties to the White House, consensus is that progress is being made in spite of the federal government, not because of it. Dissatisfaction with what is seen as a heartless Bush administration recovery effort is widespread." However, "Federal officials counter that…Compared with the calamity Katrina caused in Mississippi and Louisiana, Rita's toll on Texas is smaller and commands less attention, especially because the state is well on the road to recovery."

Houstonians Believe Katrina Refugees A "Considerable Strain" On City. The Houston Chronicle (3/25, Berger, 581K) reports that "a new poll finds Houstonians increasingly weary and wary of the 150,000 Louisiana evacuees who landed here after fleeing Hurricane Katrina. Three-quarters of Harris County residents surveyed by Rice University sociologist Stephen Klineberg say the influx of Katrina evacuees, many of whom remain seven months after landfall, has put a 'considerable strain' on the Houston community." Also, two-thirds "say evacuees bear responsibility for 'a major increase in violent crime,' and twice as many local residents believe Houston will be 'worse off' rather than 'better off' if most evacuees remain here permanently." The survey "is expected to be finalized later this month." Houston's Mayor Bill White "acknowledged the increased strains on city services, notably crime and traffic management."

Barbara Bush Donation Stipulated Buying Son's Software. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Hart, 958K) reports that Barbara Bush's donation to the Bush-Clinton Houston Hurricane Relief Fund "stipulated that part of her contribution was to be spent on educational software purchased from her son Neil's company, Ignite Learning of Austin, Texas." Daniel Borochoff, president of the American Institute of Philanthropy, a charity watchdog group, "said donors who direct that their money be used to buy products from a family business set a bad precedent."

WAR NEWS:

Russians Passed Invasion Data To Baghdad. The Pentagon revealed the Russian government, in particular its ambassador to Iraq before the US toppled Saddam Hussein, passed detailed information on the US invasion plans to Hussein. While US officials downplayed the value of the information it was seen as a potential problem for US-Russian relations. The story was widely covered by wire services, major US newspapers and all three network news broadcasts.

Highlighting the seriousness of the problem for the US, ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 2, 3:00, Vargas) reported, "Now to potentially explosive report about an important U.S. Ally. Iraqi government documents just released show that before the war began in Iraq, a Russian diplomat obtained details about the U.S. war plans and then gave them to the Iraqis. This raises major questions about the Russians and about the U.S. government's ability to guard top secret information."

The CBS Evening News (3/24, lead story, 2:00, Orr, 7.66M) reported, "U.S. officials say none of the information passed on by the Russians had any real strategic value. Military officials here will only say on the record that they were surprised by the Russian's actions. And only time will tell whether or not this has a big impact on future U.S.-Russian relations." Stahl: "Does the Pentagon know why the Russians did this. They didn't think Saddam was going to win, did they?" Orr: "The information wasn't very good so it is doubtful anybody thought it would affect the military outcome. The best guess is this Russia was trying to curry favor with the bureaucracy in Baghdad to maintain good economic relations no matter who was in power. So going forward they would have good economic relations."

NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 3, 1:00, Miklaszewski, 9.87M) reported, "Military investigators found no evidence any spies were operating in the command. It is believed the Russians obtained the information through electronic eavesdropping. Saddam Hussein didn't believe the information and made no attempts to try to counter the attack. Three days later the US Army stormed into Baghdad."

The New York Times (3/25, Shanker, 1.19M) notes that the revelation "may have more political than military significance," and that "the study notes that some information obtained by Iraq from Russian sources was false, raising at least the possibility that it was circulated as part of a deliberate American campaign intended to fool or demoralize Iraqi troops and leaders." The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Spiegel, Miller, 958K) adds, "Analysts also said it would be important to learn whether upper levels of the Russian government were involved, adding that the signals were more likely to have come from diplomatic and intelligence agents in the region rather than from Moscow."

The AP (3/25, Burns) also mentions the possibility the Russians fed Iraq false data. In contrast, the Washington Times (3/25, A1, Scarborough, 90K) in a front page story is more strident, reporting, "The new disclosures show that Moscow was working against the Bush administration in private."

US, Iran Will Meet On Iraq, Rice Says. The AP (3/25) reports, Secretary Rice "said Friday she was sure US and Iranian representatives would meet to discuss security in Iraq, but she gave no time for the sessions. 'Those meetings will take place, I'm certain, at the appropriate time,' Rice said. The United States previously had said contact with the Iranians could occur if Washington found it useful, but questioned the timing and motive of Iran in seeking talks." Rice is later quoted as saying, "I think that everybody just needs to get to work and let's get this done so that the Iranians have a very clear message about what's going on. ... We agreed to ask our negotiators to work again over the next of couple of days...really deciding that maybe they won't even have a weekend because we need to work on this text.'

Shanker, 1.19M) reports that Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the US commander for training Iraqi security forces, "expressed guarded satisfaction on Friday with the performance of new Iraqi Army and national police units in tamping down the sectarian violence that erupted after the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month," although he "acknowledged that the crisis also provided a clearer picture of the troubling shortfalls of the Iraqi local police, on whom, he said, American trainers now must focus their efforts." Dempsey "also raised concern about the role played by independent militias during the crisis."

Murtha Speaks On Iraq War. The Uniontown Herald Standard (3/25, Zalar) reports that Speaking during a taping of "Behind the Headlines," U.S. Rep. John Murtha said that "when initial threats that biological weapons would be used if troops crossed a certain line didn't come to fruition and weapons of mass destruction were not found, he felt something was wrong and started 'sending signals to the White House.'" He said that "he is perplexed as to why Bush will not admit he made a mistake by relying on flawed intelligence," adding "'You have to wonder if they're competent,'…of the people making decisions regarding the war."

Iraq's President Is Optimistic About Unity Government. The AP (3/25, Abdul-Zahra) reports that Iraqi President Jalal Talabani "issued a highly optimistic report yesterday on progress among politicians trying to hammer out the shape of a new unity government," saying that "the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month." However, "a less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari…has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April."

Laura Bush Maintains US Is Admired By Much Of The World. Asked on CNN'S Larry King Live (3/24) how she is "handling the stress of diminishing poll results," First Lady Laura Bush replied, "I know how every problem in the world eventually comes to the foot of the President of the United States to the American people, because we are so much more prosperous, so much more affluent in many ways, not just financially affluent as a country, but also many of the ideas we have. … They may say they're anti-American, they may say they hate things we stand for, but in most cases, I think they would like their countries to have similar values and similar qualities, and certainly a similar sort of life." Bush added, "I think it's difficult, it's very difficult to watch on television and see the loss of our soldiers in Iraq and to get the idea that the Iraqis don't care, that they don't want us there, that it's a sacrifice they don't respect or regard. I do think they do. … I know the people of Afghanistan, from when I've been there, say, 'don't leave. Don't leave us yet. Let us build our democracy. Let us get all of the institutions of democracy into place before you go.'"

Zaraqawi Keeping Lower Profile. The New York Times (3/25, A1, Filkins, 1.19M) reports that Abu Musab al-Zarqawi "has sharply lowered his profile in recent months, and his group claims to have submitted itself to the leadership of an Iraqi" as part of a council with five other guerrilla groups. The group, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, "stopped taking responsibility for large-scale suicide attacks against civilians,…toned down its fierce verbal attacks against Iraq's Shiite majority," and stopped "beheading its captives," which seems "to follow closely the advice in a letter believed to have been written last year by Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's second in command."

US Arrests Translator For Bribery. The US arrested Faheem Mousa Salam, a translator working in Iraq, at Dulles International Airport, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million. The New York Times (3/25, Glanz, 1.19M) reports that the Justice Department said Salam, "probably acting as an intermediary for others who have not yet been identified, offered tens of thousands of dollars in bribes to people inside the Iraqi Interior Ministry for a contract to provide some $1 million in flak jackets and other equipment to an organization that trains Iraqi police officers."

The Washington Post/AP (3/25, A20) adds, "The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraq reconstruction contracts. At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery-and-kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts."

No Charges To Be Filed In Contractor Incident. The Washington Post (3/25, A15, Witte, White, 744K) reports, "Military investigators said yesterday that they will not file any charges after completing their investigation into an incident in Iraq last May in which a group of Marines alleged they had been fired on by U.S. security contractors" and the contractors "had said they were detained by the Marines…and subjected to rough treatment." The encounter "highlighted tension in the field between active-duty military personnel and the burgeoning ranks of private contractors the Defense Department has hired to support the war effort."

Newspaper Editor Disputes Iraq Coverage Bias Claim. Clark Hoyt, Knight Ridder's Washington editor, writes in an op-ed in Knight Ridder (3/25) that "President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and assorted supporters...are blaming the messengers - the news media - for the public's growing disenchantment with the war in Iraq." Since "the polls have gone south…the administration has escalated a soft attack on the media." However, Robert J. Callahan, who served as the press attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad from June 2004 to May 2005, "doesn't think" that "the story of Iraq being distorted by reporting that focuses on violence and fails to tell the good news." He says, "American reporters have faced criticism for their coverage of Iraq, but rarely from those of us who have been there and have seen these journalists at work." Callahan also notes that "American diplomats stopped encouraging coverage of good-news events such as the reconstruction of a school because it often invited terrorist attacks that cost innocent lives."

Reporter's Video Diary Shows Increasing Instability In Iraq. NBC correspondent Richard Engel's daily video diary of his experiences in Iraq portray the environment as growing worse as violence increases. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 5, 2:20, Engel, 9.87M) reported that while Iraq was relatively secure after the liberation, "in March 2004, four American contractors were ambushed in Falujah and everything changed." When the "violence increased, like Iraqis, foreign reporters adapted. It's too dangerous to run on the streets, so we use a treadmill." Engel noted, "Reporting trips are now military-style missions. … It's been a three year journey through war, and it's not nearly over."

In a story similarly describing the environment in Iraq as deteriorating the Los Angeles Times (3/25, Roug, 958K) adds that for Iraqi psychiatrist Baher Butti, after Hussein was toppled "a hope grew. With the Americans, perhaps a kind of progress would arrive." However, "instead of progress, he and his wife saw advancing irrationality," and after their daughter was injured by a bomb, it was "a seed of hope he could no longer sustain." He decided to move from Iraq.

Killings Continue In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times/AP (3/25) reports, "At least 51 people, including two U.S. soldiers and five Sunnis leaving a mosque, were killed Friday in attacks around Iraq," and "Baghdad police said they found 25 more bodies blindfolded, shot and dumped throughout the capital." The other "victims died in a variety of attacks, which included drive-by slayings of three policemen in west Baghdad and three power station workers headed to their jobs in Taji, just north of the capital, police said."

UN Concerned For Safety Of Palestinians In Iraq. The United Nations refugee agency is concerned about the safety of Palestinians in Iraq after death threats against families in one Baghdad neighborhood. The New York Times (3/25, Semple, 1.19M) reports, "The Palestinian community was once a pet cause of Saddam Hussein, who granted its members special treatment," and "now, its members say, they are suffering the backlash of that favoritism," as "Palestinians have been frequent targets of Shiite death squads." The Palestinian observer to the United Nations "appealed for international intervention to protect the Palestinians in Iraq." The AP (3/25, Klapper) adds, "Many Shiites and Kurds have come to view Palestinians as sympathetic to the Sunni-dominated insurgency."

Unique Relationship With US Keeps Salvadorans In Iraq. The Washington Post (3/25, A1, Aizenman, 744K) in a front page story reports that for Salvadoran troops, combat in Iraq is reminiscent of fighting in their own civil war. The Post reports, "The Salvadoran government's willingness to keep sending troops to Iraq -- after three other Latin American countries pulled out their forces -- underscores the unusually strong political and economic bonds, as well as the unique military relationship, forged in the past two decades between this tiny country and the United States." Analysts say "one reason El Salvador has agreed to stay…is that its three most recent elected presidents have been members of the rightist ARENA party, which has close ties with the Bush administration and shares its commitment to a proposed regional free-trade agreement."

US Officials Confident Case Of Afghan Convert Will Be Resolved. US officials were confident that US and international pressure would save an Afghan man facing the death penalty for converting to Christianity, but the story was seen as potentially adding to President Bush's problems. It was prominently featured by the network news broadcasts and major US newspapers. The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 2, 2:15, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "Administration officials are growing more confident tonight that Abdul Rahmen will not be executed for converting from Islam to Christianity." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice: "We are working with the Afghans and we look to a favorable resolution of this case. It needs to be favorably resolved." ... Axelrod: "Look for Rahmen to be freed before Tuesday. Why? Well, Congress is considering a request from the Bush administration for an additional $2.5 billion in aid to Afghanistan. And Tuesday is the day Secretary of State Rice goes to Capitol Hill to make the case for that money."

Stressing the problems the dispute presents for Bush, ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 3, 2:00, Raddatz) reported, "For 4 1/2 year, the Bush Administration has been touting Afghanistan and its President Hamid Karzai as shining examples of freedom and democracy. But President Karzai is in an extremely tough position, with the enormous amount of capital the U.S. is providing on one hand, and his country's conservative public on the other. But it appears Hamid Karzai is siding with the U.S. Tonight a senior U.S. Official tells ABC News that the Afghan government may be releasing Abdul Rahman soon."

NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 2, 2:10, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "This case created a diplomatic nightmare for the US at home and abroad. Kabul's proposed solution may not be good enough for Washington." NBC (Mitchell) added, "Christian conservatives, a crucial part of George Bush's republican base, protesting today outside the Afghan embassy in Washington." Protestors: "The whole world is watching." Mitchell: "Desperate to prevent a rebellion on the right, the administration ratcheted up the pressure for the release of 41 year old Abdul Rahman, threatened with death for converting to Christianity." The dispute "could cost President Bush more support for the war in Iraq." Lt. Col. Robert Maginnis (ret.), Christian Broadcast Analyst: "The American people don't want to think we spent our blood and treasures for new regimes that are just as oppressive as the old."

The Washington Times/AP (3/25, A1, Shah) adds that Ansarullah Mawlavi Zada, the chief among three judges trying the case "defended the court's autonomy yesterday amid reports the man could be freed." The New York Times (3/25, Wafa, 1.19M) reports that in Afghanistan "preachers used Friday Prayer services to call for the execution of an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity, despite growing protests in the West."

Bush Under Pressure From Core Constituency. The AP (3/25, Spielmann) reports, "Christian lobby groups are urging President Bush to do more to save a man on trial in Afghanistan for converting from Islam to Christianity," and "American Christians have criticized the Bush administration for what they feel is an inadequate response to a fundamental issue of freedom of conscience." Shoul Rahman be executed, "political experts agree, Bush will have alienated his most loyal core constituency — Christian conservatives."

Karzai Facing Pressure From Both Sides. The Time (3/25, Morarjee) reports that Afghan President Hamid Karzai "must…contend with deeply conservative Afghans" even as "the judge presiding over the case has rejected international calls for leniency and warned the Karzai government not to interfere with the judicial process." However, "Karzai is acutely aware of how badly a death sentence would play with foreign governments whose aid dollars keep the Afghan economy afloat — and whose troops keep the peace."

Cohen Notes That West And Islam Are At Conflict Here. Roger Cohen writes in his column in the New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) that this situation "has elements that should lead everyone to ponder whether the West's problem is really with a 'perversion' of Islam, as politicians from President George W. Bush to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain have insisted, or with Islam itself." Both sides "mutual incomprehension, and anger, is strong," and "Rahman offers a timely reminder. The West and Islam are not at war, but they are in conflict. And it seems myopic and counterproductive to view the war as anything but the extreme expression of that conflict."

Foundation Drives For $65 Million For Memorial To Disabled Veterans. The AP (3/25, Hananel) reports, "Planners are raising money for a new site -- nestled among the tributes to fallen war heroes, from World War II, Korea and Vietnam -- to salute roughly 3 million disabled veterans." The memorial, dubbed the "American Veterans Disabled for Life Memorial," expected "to open in the next three to four years" will be "on an impressive two-acre site near the National Mall, just steps from the Capitol." The project is being planned by the Disabled Veterans LIFE Memorial Foundation, which "is in the midst of a $65 million private fundraising campaign to build the memorial."

American Use Of Torture In Iraq Condemned. In a Los Angeles Times (3/25, 958K) op-ed Olga Talamante, the executive director of California's Chicana/Latina Foundation and a survivor of torture in Argentina during the 1970's, writes, "three years into the Iraq war, we have seen the images of Abu Ghraib and read accounts of the atrocities at Baghdad's Camp Nama. Americans once shocked by my experience now hear officials defend torture as a necessary evil in the war against terrorism. But it is only evil." Talamante continues, "The Argentine military had its own sick rationale for policies that would ultimately 'disappear' thousands of men, women and children — they were fighting an enemy from within. But the Argentine people had a better name for it: the 'dirty war.' … Iraq has become our dirty war. To those who defend torture there, beware. There will be survivors, and they will tell their stories."

Psychotherapist Sees "Desperation" In Military Recruitment Effort. In an op-ed that reflects poorly on the US military's recruitment efforts, psychotherapist Brian Ford writes in the Washington Post (3/25, A19, 744K) about his evaluation of a military recruit who left the service three years ago under a "general discharge." In the op-ed, headlined "Uncle Sam's Desperation – And A Recruit's," Ford writes, "To my knowledge, a general discharge was both negative and not that easy to get. The kid must have been in pretty bad shape." In recapping the session with the recruit, Ford notes his concerns with the recruit's past history and says the recruiter "sounded like a realtor or a car salesman making one last pitch to a prospect."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Lifts NASD's Lifetime Ban On Quattrone. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Smith) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission set aside a lifetime ban from the securities industry that had been imposed against Frank Quattrone, the former star investment banker." The Journal continues, "It was Mr. Quattrone's second big win of the week related to charges against him. On Monday, a federal appeals court vacated his May 2004 criminal conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by his trial judge." The Journal adds, "In the SEC action Friday, the federal securities regulator struck down a lifetime ban from the business, which had been imposed in November 2004 by an arm of the National Association of Securities Dealers. The move puts him a step closer to returning to the securities industry. … The ban resulted from Mr. Quattrone's failure to testify during an investigation by the NASD into allegations of possible improper 'spinning,' or rule violations related to steering hot initial public offerings of stock to investment-banking clients."

Current SEC Punishments Considered Ineffective. In a New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) op-ed Gary Weiss, author of forthcoming book on Wall Street, states to combat illegal Wall Street actions we need, "some pain. The SEC needs to make Wall Street firms wince when they do something wrong." Weiss continues, "An admission of guilt would be a good start. Then private litigants stand a far better chance of collecting. Call it the regulatory equivalent of a tow truck. Congress could help by passing a provision of tax-relief legislation, now before a House-Senate conference, that would make it harder for firms to take write-offs from settlements with government agencies. Market observers speak of a 'cycle of scandal' on Wall Street — a pattern of transgressions recurring periodically, often as a coda to bull markets, undeterred by an inadequate regulatory response. Until regulators start making errant firms feel some real pain, the next Wall Street scandal is not a question of if, but when."

PBGC Seeks Outside Counsel In GMAC Negotiations. The Wall Street Journal (3/25, 2.11M) reports the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. "is seeking outside legal counsel to help represent its interests in financial transactions at General Motors Corp." The PBGC "filed a solicitation for help in negotiations with GM over its plans to spin off a portion of its valuable financing unit, General Motors Acceptance Corp. The PBGC wants to make sure that it has access to all GM assets if it were required to take on GM employee pension obligations."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Says He Will Not Implicate DeLay In Any Wrongdoing. Syndicated columnist Robert Novak (3/25) writes that Jack Abramoff "has advised friends that he has no derogatory information about former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and is not implicating him as part of his plea bargain with federal prosecutors. … However, Abramoff has not given a clean bill of health to any other congressman -- including Rep. Robert Ney."

Abramoff Subpoenaed In "Mob-Style" Murder Related To Casino Boat. The AP (3/25, Anderson) reports Circuit Judge Michael Kaplan "approved subpoenas for" Jack Abramoff and Adam Kidan, "an ex-business partner to answer questions about the mob-style slaying of the owner of a gambling fleet they bought." Abramoff and Kidan "have insisted…that they know nothing about the slaying of Konstantinos 'Gus' Boulis, who was ambushed in his car by a gunman in Fort Lauderdale a few months after the pair bought SunCruz Casinos from him." Abramoff and Kidan "are not charged in the slaying but are scheduled to be sentenced Wednesday in federal court after pleading guilty earlier this year to fraud charges stemming from the purchase."

US Charges Translator With Offering Bribe. The AP (3/25, Sherman) reports, "U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million." The AP continues, "Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport in Virginia, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq. … He was released from custody after a hearing Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court April 5." The AP adds, "Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. He is accused of offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint. … Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said. … Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said."

Second Juror In Ryan Case Under Scrutiny. The Chicago Tribune (3/25, Gibson, O'Connor, Heinzmann) reports, "Public records reviewed by the Tribune suggest that a second juror deciding the fate of former Gov. George Ryan has a history of arrests that was not disclosed during the jury-selection process." The Tribune continues, "The revelation comes one day after the Tribune reported that a male juror has the same name and other identifying characteristics as a man with a felony drunken driving conviction." The Tribune adds, "Hours after learning of the Tribune's information on Thursday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer halted deliberations and said she had launched an investigation into a juror. … Further record searches Friday linked the name of a female juror to an alias. The woman with that alias faced felony drug charges, as well as misdemeanor child-neglect and assault charges, records show. She was not convicted of these charges, the records show. … The female juror linked to that alias stated on a jury questionnaire before the trial that she had never been charged or accused of a crime." The Tribune notes, "After sending the jury home early Thursday, Pallmeyer said she would not reveal the outcome of her investigation before Monday. … The judge met with prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case on Friday, then returned to the bench and said the investigation was continuing. … She also said she expected the jury to resume deliberations on Monday."

SCOTUS To Rehear Death Penalty Case. The AP (3/25) reports the Supreme Court announced on Friday "it would hear arguments a second time before ruling on the constitutionality of a Kansas death penalty law, apparently so new Justice Samuel Alito can break a tie. The case is the second one that deadlocked the court following Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement in late January. The other one involves government whistleblowers."

The Kansas City Star (3/25, Bauer, Klepper, 286K) reports, "Some said it was not unprecedented for the court to ask to rehear arguments when there is a new justice. Others believe the court is split and Alito would break the tie. One reason: It ordered the same arguments presented and did not request additional briefs."

Former DSCC Aide Sentenced For Accessing Steele's Credit Card History. The Baltimore Sun/AP (3/25) reports Lauren B. Weiner, a former Democratic staffer "pleaded guilty today to computer fraud for snooping on" Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele. "Under the plea agreement in U.S. District Court," Weiner "avoids jail time, but she has a year to do 150 hours of community service." Steele "was notified by Democrats in Washington that a staffer used Steele's Social Security number to obtain his credit report last year. Weiner was fired from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee after the breach was discovered."

Steele Considering Civil Suit Against Weiner And DSCC. The Washington Post (3/25, B2, Wagner, 744K) reports, "An attorney for Steele said the lieutenant governor is considering a civil suit against Weiner…and the Democratic committee to learn more about what he called 'a dirty trick.'"

CIVIL LAW:

Small Heart Device Maker Under Federal Probe. The New York Times (3/25, Meier) reports, "Federal authorities are conducting an inquiry into Ela Medical, a small maker of defibrillators and other heart devices, according to a government official and an industry official." The Times continues, "The precise nature of the government's interest in Ela Medical, which is a division of the Sorin Group, is unclear and any inquiry appears to be at an early stage. But the inquiry comes amid a broader, continuing government investigation into relationships between larger makers of heart devices and doctors. That investigation is looking into whether the companies provided incentives to physicians to use their products." The Times adds, "One government official said authorities were looking into Ela Medical's activities in the Miami area. Separately, a device industry official said that federal authorities had made inquiries about Ela Medical. Both people spoke on the condition of anonymity because the inquiry is in progress and not yet a public matter. … The inquiry into Ela Medical is apparently being conducted by investigators with the Food and Drug Administration and the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services." The Times notes, "The Justice Department is investigating whether the country's three big makers of implanted heart devices — Medtronic, Guidant and St. Jude Medical — used illegal inducements to get doctors to use their products. They have all denied wrongdoing."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ Alleges Voting Bias In Euclid, OH. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (3/25, Ott, Atassi) reports, "The Justice Department has threatened to sue Euclid (OH) and force changes in an election system that the federal government says prevents black candidates from winning seats on its City Council." The Plain Dealer continues, "A former Justice Department lawyer found the timing suspicious. He suggested that the Bush administration, which has not vigorously pressed voting-rights suits, may be trying to polish its image quickly. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to question Justice Department officials in May about whether they have adequately protected the rights of minority voters. … 'It's an outright embarrassment that this appears to be the first case on behalf of black voters brought forth during the Bush administration,' said David Becker, who worked for the Department of Justice from 1998 to 2005. The department 'had to file a case on behalf of black voters before the oversight hearing took place. Otherwise they would have had a lot of explaining to do about why it hasn't happened in almost six years.'" The Plain Dealer adds, "Though Euclid's black population reached 30 percent in the last census, voters have never elected a black candidate to any city or school office. The school board appointed Howard Drake to a vacant seat in 1998, but he lost in an election the next year. … The investigation, which began three years ago, targeted elections for City Council. The city is broken into four wards, which each elect one council member. Four other council members and the council president are elected citywide. … All five of those elected citywide in 2005 live in the same ward, in Euclid's northeast corner. … In a letter dated Monday, the head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division told Euclid Law Director Chris Frey that the structure dilutes minority voting power in a city that is racially divided and votes along racial lines. Black candidates would have a better chance of winning if the city were broken into eight wards, with one council member elected in each, Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim said in the letter."

DOJ Asked To Probe Tennessee Police Beating. The Jackson (TN) Sun (3/25, Reed) reports that Dr. Isaac Richmond, national director for the Commission on Religion and Racism, has joined with "members of Memphis-based CORR and more than 30 concerned citizens from the Brownsville (TN) community" to urge that "two white Brownsville Police investigators to be charged, put on trial and dismissed from the police force." Richmond accuses Chad Jackson and Brian Nichols with "brutally beating Robert Lee Jones, 42, of Brownsville, on March 17. Richmond said that Jones had not violated any laws and that the charges Jones now faces were false. … However, Mayor Webb Banks said Thursday night that Jones did break the law by attempting to evade arrest about 6:09 p.m. on March 17 on Margin Street. Banks said Jackson and Nichols chased after Jones, and that Jones swallowed what appeared to be crack cocaine during the chase." The Sun adds, "Robert Lee Jones was arraigned Monday and charged with aggravated assault, evading arrest, resisting arrest and tampering with evidence. He is being held without bond in Haywood County Jail. … A news release from CORR on Friday said that the group 'has filed charges with the U.S. Department of Justice, seeking an investigation of the Brownsville law enforcement for the human rights violations of African-American males in general, and Mr. Jones' case in particular.' The release also said that the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department has been requested to bring charges against the officers. … Banks said Thursday that an internal investigation is being conducted by the Brownsville police, but the officers are still on active duty."

Federal Judge To Rehear New Orleans Poll Complaints. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/25, Eggler) reports, "A New Orleans federal judge who refused last month to order Louisiana officials to provide out-of-state satellite polling places or take other steps to help displaced residents vote in the upcoming municipal elections has agreed to rehear some of the claims of those who say African-American voters will not have a fair chance to participate in the balloting." The Times-Picayune continues, "Judge Ivan Lemelle will hold a hearing Monday on a request by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund that he reconsider his decision not to order the state to take further steps to assist displaced voters beyond those already taken by Secretary of State Al Ater and approved by a recent special session of the Legislature." The Times-Picayune adds, "Ater has said that thanks to those actions and an aggressive campaign to notify displaced voters how they can participate in the election, this will be 'the most accessible election' in U.S. history. … The U.S. Justice Department last week approved the plans for the elections, saying the actions taken by the state meet the federal Voting Rights Act's requirements for protecting black voters' rights. … But the NAACP lawyers and local lawyers Roy Rodney and John Etter, working with them, submitted a 21-page motion citing a list of reasons why Lemelle should order further action 'to prevent manifest injustice' …"

California County Phases Out Punch Cards To Comply With DOJ Rules. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Griggs) reports Ventura County election officials "are replacing their decades-old punch-card voting system in time for the June 6 primary election. After more than 30 years of voting with punch cards, most county voters will now mark their choices with ink. … The U.S. Department of Justice had accused the county of discriminating against Latinos, who make up about a third of the population, by failing to employ sufficient numbers of bilingual poll workers or to provide adequate Spanish-language voting materials."

Black Activists Seek Satellite Voting For Displaced New Orleans Residents. The AP (3/25, Lester) reports "several black leaders" are advocating allowing displaced New Orleans to vote from "locations outside Louisiana." The AP cites Al Sharpton, Jesse Jackson, NAACP President Bruce Gordon and Urban League President Marc Morial.

Keeton Strayhorn Sues Texas Secretary Of State Over Petition Rules. The AP (3/25, Shannon) reports comptroller of Texas and independent gubernatorial candidate Carole Keeton Strayhorn "sued the secretary of state Friday, claiming he is hurting her campaign for governor by unfairly enforcing rules for independent political candidates. Keeton Strayhorn "has complained for weeks about Secretary of State Roger Williams and even urged that he be removed from office because of his close ties with Perry. … Strayhorn's campaign sued in federal court in Austin over Williams' plan to have her petition examined manually, signature by signature, instead of using statistical sampling, which examines only a portion of the signatures."

Affirmative Action For Males Opposed. In his New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) op-ed column John Tierney says as the number of males in the college, "applicant pool keeps shrinking — it will soon be down to 40 percent nationally — colleges are admitting less-qualified boys in order to keep the gender ratio balanced on campus." Tierney thinks this is not fair to girls and it's, "not fair to the boys, either, if they're not ready to keep up with their classmates. Affirmative action just makes them prone to fail." Tierney concludes rather than admit less qualified males the Education Department should be, "figuring out how to help boys reach college."

Pro-Abortion Activists Seek To Overturn New South Dakota Law. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Riccardi, 958K) reports, "Opponents of South Dakota's ban on nearly all abortions announced the launch of a ballot initiative Friday aimed at overturning the new law. If the South Dakota Campaign For Healthy Families collects 16,728 signatures, the law — a direct challenge to Roe vs. Wade — will be placed on hold." According to the Times, "Proponents of the ban said they welcomed the challenge, and said the measure to reverse the law would fail at the polls."

NYTimes Says Block FDA Nominee Until Action On Morning After Pill. An editorial in The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) thinks both, "Senators Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray surely have good cause to block a vote on the nomination of Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration until the agency makes a final decision on the morning-after pill. There is no excuse for the administration's endless obfuscation and delays on making the pill available without a prescription when the overwhelming bulk of expert opinion says it is safe to do so." The Time adds, "There is little likelihood that the Senate will reject Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination in a floor vote, although the senators could at least push him for guarantees that safety issues will not be submerged in the rush to approve new drugs and conquer cancer. But the vote should not take place until the FDA has the spine to tackle the morning-after pill head-on."

ANTITRUST:

Proposed Alcatel-Lucent Merger To Face US Scrutiny. The Financial Times (3/25, Kirchgaessner, Hollinger, Taylor) reports, "Alcatel's talks with Lucent about a possible takeover – a deal that would combine a telecoms equipment company that controls sensitive US technology with a French group – will face a regulatory review in Washington on national security grounds." The Times continues, "Such a move would come at a time when protectionist sentiment in the US is at an all-time high, and raises questions about whether the Bush administration would be prepared to approve the deal." The Times adds, "The merger, which is being driven by growing competitive pressure on equipment makers and could be valued at up to $36bn, would create the world's leading maker of fixed telecoms networks and the second largest in mobile infrastructure. … It also follows in the wake of a wave of consolidation in the telecoms sector – in particlular between some of the companies' biggest clients, including the proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth and the recent takeover of MCI by Verizon."

The Washington Post (3/25, D1, Mohammed) reports, "A merger of Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel would likely draw federal scrutiny to see if it threatens national security following the furor over a Dubai-based company's plan to acquire control of six U.S. ports, communications and national security analysts said yesterday. … But analysts said they saw no obvious reason why a combination of the two telecommunications equipment makers would face major objections from the government on security or antitrust grounds." The Post adds, "Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent and Paris-based Alcatel said late Thursday that they are 'engaged in discussions about a potential merger,' but said they could not guarantee they would reach any agreement. A merger would greatly expand Alcatel's business in the United States and allow the two companies to cut costs and better compete with their larger competitors. … It is unclear how a merger, if one materializes, would be structured."

BGE Says Merger Will Buffer Rate Increases. The Washington Times (3/25, Miller) reports, "A Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. executive yesterday warned that lawmakers' attempts to block a multibillion-dollar merger could force the utility to more quickly implement a 72-percent increase in energy rates. … 'Without the merger there is no room to lower rates,' said Robert L. Gould, communications director for BGE parent company Constellation Energy

Group. 'We have gone right to the edge of how much we can tolerate on the balance sheet.'" The Times continues, "He also said if lawmakers make good on their threat to block Florida Power & Light's $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy, they likely would derail plans to gradually phase in a 72-percent increase in electric bills. … 'One of the benefits of the merger is you have a bigger balance sheet,' Mr. Gould said. 'You take that away, and it will be tougher and our credit rating will be thrown into question.' … As proof, he said Moody's Investor Service has already put Constellation on a watch list because of uncertainty about the regulatory environment taking shape in Maryland's legislature."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Results Of Yucca Probe Forwarded To DOJ. The Las Vegas Review-Journal (3/25, Tetreault) reports, "Federal prosecutors are reviewing evidence gathered by investigators into whether scientists falsified quality assurance documents at Yucca Mountain, officials confirmed Friday." The Review-Journal continues, "Inspectors general for the Interior and Energy departments sent a report to U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in Las Vegas in the past month, said Roy Kimes, a spokesman for Interior Department Inspector General Earl Devaney. … 'The investigative work has been done, and the report has been forwarded to the Department of Justice,' Kimes said. 'It is not considered finalized until we get an indication from DOJ that they are going to prosecute or not going to prosecute.'" Denise Smith, a spokeswoman for Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman, "said 'it is possible' that evidence of wrongdoing was discovered, but communications between investigators and prosecutors do not necessarily signal the probe is near an end. … 'As evidence is uncovered, there are dealings with the U.S. attorney's office, and oftentimes the U.S. attorney may have us do additional work or not depending on what is found,' Smith said. … Inspectors were asked to determine possible criminal activity by federal employees after the disclosure in March 2005 of provocative e-mails. … In the messages, which were written between 1998 and 2000, several workers discussed possible alterations of quality assurance documents that backed up their water infiltration models at the nuclear waste site."

Officials Warn Of Threat From Viruses Transmitted From Animals To Humans. The New York Times (3/25, Altman, 1.19M) reports, "Stronger ties between veterinarians and physicians are needed to prevent further outbreaks of the animal diseases that have caused deaths and serious illness among humans in many countries in recent years," according to international health officials. The Times notes, "The AIDS, SARS and A(H5N1) avian influenza viruses and at least eight other infectious agents carried by animals have led to new and emerging human diseases in recent years."

NYTimes Wants National Forest Sale Blocked. A New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) editorial says President Bush's 2007 budget proposes to raise money by, "auctioning off about 300,000 acres of federal forest in 41 states, at an anticipated price of $800 million." The Time continues, "This page has objected on many occasions to the administration's efforts to roll back protections for the national forests, chiefly its decision to rescind President Bill Clinton's 'roadless rule,' which would have shielded nearly 60 million acres of national forest from further commercial intrusions. Though it involves much less acreage, the proposal to sell forest land reflects the same insensitivity to environmental values, not to mention misplaced budget priorities. In addition to the forest sale, the administration also proposes to sell a half-million acres managed by the Interior Department, not for any purposes related to stewardship of the public lands, but simply to reduce a national deficit already bloated by tax cuts. Congress should reject both ideas out of hand."

Sections Of Voting Rights Act Affecting Indians Soon Up For Reauthorization. Indian Country Today (3/24, Melmer) reports, "The Voting Rights Act, enacted in 1965, will celebrate its 41st anniversary on Aug. 7; yet some provisions of the act, which supporters argue have brought American Indians into the political arena, are due to expire in 2007." ICT continues, "American Indian and non-Indian organizations are in the midst of compiling and reporting research that shows the VRA - with some permanent provisions and some temporary - has made a difference to many minorities and furthers the argument that the VRA is still needed in its entirety." ICT adds, "Section 5 of the act, renewed several times, requires nine states and portion of seven states to submit changes that affect voting in any way to the U.S. Department of Justice for approval, or pre-clearance, as it is referred. That section is due to expire in 2007. Section 5 was last renewed by Congress for a term of 25 years, and that is the recommendation again. … Section 203, which requires assistance for limited-English speakers at the polls, and Sections 6 - 9, which authorize the federal government to monitor elections, are all set to expire. … The American Civil Liberties Union submitted a comprehensive report on how the VRA affects Indian country. The states that benefited the most from the VRA were Montana, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado and South Dakota. In each state, litigation or the threat of litigation mitigated state voting legislation that would have adversely impacted American Indian residents."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mueller Addresses Houston Crime, Terrorism Forum. KPRC-TV Houston (3/24, 10:05 p.m.) reported, "The director of the FBI was in town today talking about Houston safety and security. Gang violence, human smuggling and port security were just some of the big issues Robert Mueller talked about," and "he says the key to fighting the growing crime in Houston is by sharing intelligence and creating task forces." KRIV-TV Houston (3/24, 9:47 p.m.) noted that "Mueller made a stop in Houston today, but it wasn't for investigative work. He spoke to the Houston Forum on Globalization of Crime and Terror." KHOU-TV Houston (3/24, McShan) reports, "The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston." FBI director Robert Mueller said of the bureau's role, "We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both (HPD Chief Harold Hurtt) and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now." KHOU adds that "both cities are cracking down on gangs, and no one wants them to call their city home."

KHOU-TV Houston (3/26, Edwards) reports on the proliferation of New Orleans gang graffiti, noting, "Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston" and "authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston." But it is "a battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police. 'For us to be effective, we have to work together,' FBI Director Robert Mueller said. 'We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans.'"

Mueller Praises New Orleans Agents, Says Headquarters Will Reopen In June. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (3/24, Chapple) reports, "The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish. … Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said." Mueller added, "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here. Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding." Before his meeting with Mueller, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens "praised the FBI," saying, "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about. They were there for us when we needed them."

WDSU-TV New Orleans (3/24, 6:11 p.m.) reported, "Since Hurricane Katrina damaged the FBI's building in Lakefront, the bureau has been using rented space at the Covington Country Club on the north shore. Agency Director Robert Mueller says that despite relocating, agents and staff were able to salvage evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm." WGNO-TV New Orleans (3/24, 5:01 p.m.) noted that "Mueller visited the temporary office yesterday."

Three Plead Guilty In "Operation Lively Green" Probe. The Washington Times (3/25, Seper) reports, "Two U.S. soldiers and a former Air Force sergeant have pleaded guilty in a widespread bribery and extortion conspiracy as part of an ongoing undercover investigation that has already resulted in 50 guilty pleas from servicemen and civilian government workers, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said yesterday." The Times continues, "Pleading guilty in Tucson, Ariz., on Thursday to one count each of 'conspiring to enrich themselves by obtaining cash bribes from persons they believed to be drug traffickers' were Curtis W. Boston II, 24, formerly a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force; U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Rodney E. Mills, 39; and Arizona National Guard Sgt. Gustavo C. Soto, 33." The Times adds, "Court documents show the smugglers were actually undercover FBI agents, part of 'Operation Lively Green,' with whom the three are accused of conspiring to use their positions to 'assist, protect and participate in the activities of an illegal narcotics trafficking organization engaged in the business of transporting and distributing cocaine from Arizona to other locations in the southwestern United States.' … In order to protect the cocaine shipments, the records said, the men wore their uniforms, carried official identification cards and drove in military vehicles to prevent police inspections for narcotics as they transported the drugs through U.S. Border Patrol, Arizona Department of Public Safety and Nevada law-enforcement checkpoints. … Mrs. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division, said all the defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations that included Nogales, Ariz., and Tucson, to large metro areas including Phoenix and Las Vegas. The three who pleaded guilty on Thursday accepted $50,000 in bribes for their participation. The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. All three agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation and will be sentenced in June."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Seen As Unlikely To Make Progress On Immigration In Cancun. Knight Ridder (3/25, Douglas) reports that when President Bush, Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Mexican President Vicente Fox meet in Cancun on Thursday "U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting. … Given the political climate across the United States, it's doubtful that Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year. Bush is weakened by low approval ratings, and opposition to illegal immigration has become a red-hot issue in many states where lawmakers face voters in November. Moreover, several potential 2008 presidential candidates are weighing in from opposing sides, lessening the chance for compromise."

Cornyn Describes McCain-Kennedy Bill As "Amnesty." The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (3/25, Montgomery, 247K) reports Sen. John Cornyn "vowed Friday to oppose a bipartisan immigration measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward legalization, saying the bill would 'encourage further disrespect for our laws.' … He described the McCain-Kennedy bill as amnesty for illegal immigrants."

Cornyn-Kyl Bill Ridiculed As "Report-To-Deport" Plan. The Dallas Morning News (3/25, Mittelstadt), in an article carried by at least fourteen papers across the US, reports Cornyn and Sen. Jon Kyl "have crafted a rival proposal that would permit illegal immigrants to become guest workers for six years but then require them to return home. That plan, derided as 'report-to-deport' by critics, has received little support – and those who marched on Mr. Kyl's office Friday favor a much more liberal legalization plan."

Legal Scholars Object To Senate Bills' Provision On Immigration Appeals. The New York Times (3/25, Swarns, 1.19M) reports that "a little-noticed provision" in Senate immigration bills sponsored by Sens. Bill Frist and Arlen Specter "would reshape the handling of immigration appeals cases and has touched off an outcry from several legal scholars, federal judges and the policy-making group for the federal courts." The bill designates the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit, which "currently handles no immigration appeals, as the only court in the nation to handle immigration appeals. Such appeals are currently shared by the 12 other federal appellate courts. The judges and scholars say that the circuit court in Washington, which handles about 1,500 nonimmigration cases a year, would be swamped by an additional 12,000 immigration cases. And they say that the court lacks the expertise to handle complex immigration cases, which often raise a host of constitutional and human-rights issues."

Guest Worker Proposals' Antecedents Noted. The AP (3/25, Abrams) reports, "Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers." McCain and Kennedy's bill "would build on a near-century old tradition of turning to foreign unskilled laborers, mainly from Mexico, in response to labor shortages, often during times of war." During World War I, "an agreement was reached with Mexico to let in unskilled workers. … A much larger exchange, the Bracero program, began in 1942, during World War II, and continued in varying forms through 1964."

Immigrants Protest Congressional Border Security Bill. NBC Nightly News (3/24, lead story, 3:00, Brown, 9.87M) opened its broadcast with a report on immigrants' protests across the country. ABC and CBS also ran relatively long pieces on the immigration issue, but ABC concentrated on legislation being considered by the Georgia legislature that would severely restrict the ability of Illegals to find employment. NBC reported, "It is happening around the country now, by the thousands people are taking to the streets in protest, walking out of schools, shutting down businesses. The issue they are so outraged over is immigration. … The protests were sparked by a plan Congress is taking up next week aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration with tough new penalties." NBC contended, "Here in California and across the US everyone agrees that the immigration system needs to be fixed, the question is how." Senator Bill Frist was shown saying, "In order to stop the flow of illegal immigration and make America safer from criminals and terrorists."

ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 5, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "Today, protesters around the country opposed tough, new immigration laws that are in the works. 10,000 people rallied in Phoenix. 30,000 marched in Milwaukee. And in Los Angeles, 500 students walked out of their school."

The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 3, 2:20, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "The protests were much bigger and angrier than anyone expected." CBS added, "A usually silent minority made some noise today. … Fighting against house Bill 4437 passed in December, it would make illegal immigrants felons and build a 700 mile border fence." The Senate "begins work on its immigration reform bill on Monday with republicans fractured. Some side with President Bush who wants a guest worker program for the more than 12 million illegal immigrants. Others are calling for more restrictive reform." According to CBS, "the rallies aren't over yet. Tomorrow in Los Angeles, another protest. Tens of thousands of people are expected to march through downtown."

The Scripps Howard News Service/Arizona Daily Star (3/25, McCombs) reports, "Immigrant advocates across the country want to make sure nobody misses their message: Don't criminalize illegal entrants. Groups have ramped up efforts this month by organizing large street rallies, holding press conferences and meeting with state and federal lawmakers."

Phoenix Protestors March On Kyl's Office. The AP (3/25) reports, "In Phoenix, the police said 20,000 people marched to the office of Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican and the co-sponsor of a bill that would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country. Officials said it was one of the largest protests in the city's history. Mr. Kyl pointed out that most were speaking out against the House bill making it a felony to be an illegal immigrant, not against his bill, which would also step up border enforcement and create a temporary guest-worker program."

KOLD-TV Tucson, AZ (3/25, Patel) reports, "Hundreds of mothers, children, teachers, and construction workers with American and Mexican flags stood on Ina and Oracle in front of Senator John Kyl's Tucson office. Up in Phoenix, more than 20-thousand marched to Kyl's office. All voicing their opposition for Bill H.R. 4437 that's headed for the Senate. If passed it makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to live here and penalizes anyone who helps them. Some protestors believe the Sensenbrenner Bill H.R.4437 is similar to another bill Senator Kyl is trying to pass."

Los Angeles Students Stage Walkout. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Keller, Gorman, 958K) reports, "On the eve of a large rally planned downtown, hundreds of Los Angeles-area high school students staged a walkout Friday. … Disrupting classes at more than half a dozen schools, students marched onto city streets waving Mexican flags and clutching red, white and green balloons as they chanted 'Viva Mexico!'" The Times claims, "Students said they were protesting what activists see as mostly punitive legislation proposed by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner."

Border Region Sheriffs Meet To Coordinate Efforts. The Dallas Morning News (3/25, Corchado) reports, "Border county sheriffs from Texas to California joined forces Friday in an effort to stop the violence along an increasingly chaotic U.S.-Mexico border and pressure the U.S. government to take control of its territory. Following a two-day closed-door meeting here [El Paso] sheriffs from California, Arizona and New Mexico pledged to work with their hosts, the 16-member Texas Sheriff Coalition, to stop traffickers and potential terrorists at the border."

Proposed Georgia Immigration Reform Among Nation's Most Restrictive. ABC's World News Tonight (3/24, story 5, 2:00, Vargas) reported, "The government estimates there are 8 million to 10 million illegal workers in the country right now. There is legislation in Washington that may soon change that, but many states aren't willing to wait and are taking action on their own." ABC went on to note that the Georgia legislature is likely to approve "one of the most restrictive pieces of immigration legislation in the country." If the legislation becomes law, "Any employers with state contracts…would be barred from hiring illegal immigrants. Private businesses would face stiff fines for the same practice. Illegal immigrants would be dropped from social services, health care programs, schools, anything funded with taxpayer dollars. And there's even a possible 5% tax on money illegal immigrants wire to other countries. Georgia lawmakers say that if congress can't seem to curb illegal immigration, they will do it for them." ABC noted, "In Georgia, polls show that 80% of residents support limiting illegals."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Cheney Highlight Differences With Democrats. President Bush and Vice President Cheney aggressively challenged Democrats on both domestic and foreign policy Friday. Their effort was characterized as a political response to dropping poll ratings as the 2006 elections approach. Bush's trip received prominent coverage in the nation's major newspapers, on local TV stations and on cable TV, but was ignored by the national network news.

The AP (3/25, Riechmann) reports Bush and Cheney "launched a one-two political punch against Democrats on Friday, saying they are ill-equipped to handle the economic recovery or the war on terror." In the face of "dismal poll ratings, Bush worked to frame the debate ahead of this year's congressional elections by telling supporters that 'the difference is clear' between the two parties on how to sustain the recovery." Meanwhile, Cheney "took on Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid and party chairman Howard Dean by name. He said leading Democrats have demanded a 'sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting.'"

The Washington Post (3/25, A3, Vandehei, 744K) says Bush "provided a preview of his two-front strategy for protecting the Republican congressional majority in an ominous political climate: hammer Democrats on national security and the economy, and raise millions of dollars for embattled GOP candidates." He "is adjusting his approach to befit the environment and is shifting into campaign mode. He realizes, aides say, that he is no longer the political force he was in the days before the 2002 and 2004 elections." Their "short-term goal is stabilize Bush's low public-approval ratings by talking about the progress and prospects for victory in Iraq. The White House also hopes to minimize intramural GOP feuding with a skeletal domestic agenda." Meanwhile, "Cheney has emerged as a central player in this strategy." He "has participated in 46 fundraisers since the beginning of 2005, including 25 for House members." In Florida Cheney "offered a variation of the new White House attack on Democrats that aides said will become a staple of campaign-oriented speeches." He "portrayed the entire Democratic leadership as wobbly in the fight against terrorism."

The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Gerstenzang, 958K) in an article titled "Bush Slams Democrats On Taxes, War" reports, "As he has all week, Bush delivered a strong pitch for fighting the war in Iraq." Bush said, "The only way that we can lose is if we lose our will. … It's the only way we can lose." Yet "he also spotlighted domestic issues, blasting Democratic opposition to the tax cuts that have been at the core of his economic program." Bush was quoted saying, "The difference is clear. … If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat. If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican" by most newspaper coverage Saturday morning.

Bloomberg (3/25 Murray, Roberts) adds, "In Indiana today, Bush said he understood that the 'turbulence on the TV screen affects the conscience of America.' He maintained that Iraqi troops are improving and that the U.S. won't retreat." While Cheney said in Florida "With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence."

Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) reported President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney "hit the ground today." Cameron: "At a campaign fundraiser for Indiana candidate it took only 13 words for the president to lay out the G.O.P. strategy as painting themselves as strong and democrats as timid on terror." Bush: "We must have members of the United States congress who will not weaken." Cameron: "That was tame compared to vice president Dick Cheney who had an answer too -- he blasted top party democrats for the their comments saying plans are dangerously incompetent."

CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "The top guns of the Bush White House have been firing away at Democrats. President Bush and Vice President Cheney appearing in different states but seem to be working together to try to help their party and perhaps the President's poll numbers as well."

CNN correspondent Dana Bash said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) that "today really felt like the beginning of 2006, the campaign year of 2006 for this White House. As you mentioned, both the Vice President and the President were out at fund-raisers for Congressional candidates. And Mr. Cheney, for his part, came out breathing fire on Iraq. His mission today was to hit back against the Democratic" leadership.

Local Newspaper Coverage. The Indianapolis Star (3/25, Ruthhart, 267K) reports, "Bush said he needs more 'good, honest' men like Sodrel in Congress to help him push his agenda during the final two years of his presidency. Several times Bush laid out his policy positions, punctuated by the phrase 'and Mike Sodrel understands that.'" The Star notes, "Perhaps his most emphatic call came for making permanent the tax cuts passed earlier in his presidency, which will expire in coming years if no action is taken."

The Indianapolis Star (3/25, 267K) also provides a minute-by-minute account of Bush's trip saying, "Speaking for about 30 minutes, the president offered a folksy defense of his policies and made a hard push for a continued Republican-controlled Congress."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (3/25, 261K) in a brief article without much coverage of Bush's message reports, "While at the airport," Bush "also presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Edy Hope, a volunteer with Carebreak at the Watson Institute in Sewickley who helps a family with a 6-year-old autistic girl." Meanwhile, "Bush opponents…organized a demonstration in downtown Sewickley last night."

In a second article from Orlando the AP (3/25, Reed) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney blasted Democrats for opposing provisions of the Patriot Act and criticizing President Bush's approval of secret wiretaps for domestic surveillance at a fundraising lunch Friday," saying that "if Democrats were capable of handling the war on terror, 'Then I ought to be singing on American Idol.'"

The Orlando Sentinel (3/25, Damron, 265K) reports, "Vice President Dick Cheney touted a robust economy and defended the Bush administration's tax cuts and handling of the Iraq war to an Orlando crowd of fundraisers for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller on Friday." The "event raised $250,000 for a re-election campaign that now has $1.2 million." Florida Today (3/25, Peterson, 84K) also covers this story.

Bush Poor Poll Numbers Dominate Local TV Campaign Stop Coverage. More than 30 local television stations reported on President Bush's campaign stops in Indiana and Pennsylvania. The stories focused heavily on Bush's negative poll numbers and frequently said that Senator Santorum was avoiding being publicly seen with the President. Still many of the stories mention the large financial boon these trips are expected to bring for the candidates. One example: KDKA-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "This morning, he left Washington DC on a campaign trek first to Indianapolis and later to Pittsburgh and here to help Senator Rick Santorum for an event I'm told may raise as much as $1 million dollars." KDKA continues that at

"this event Senator Santorum I think is worried that President Bush's poll numbers in Pennsylvania are really low. They're very low right at the moment. And the fact is, that he may not want to be tarred with the President."

WTAE-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "President Bush is in Pittsburgh, he's here breaking away from a string of visits to get support for the war on terror to help a fellow Republican, a fund-raiser for Rick Santorum." WPXI-TV Pittsburgh (3/24, 11:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush hopes the stop in Sewickley will pay off in November. The President was in town for that private fundraiser for Rick Santorum."

WLWT-TV Cincinnati (3/24, 5:00 p.m.) reported, "Bush headed out to campaign in Indiana today lugging heavy baggage. The war in Iraq Hurricane Katrina, and a wave of layoffs. House Republican Mike Sodrel braved the stage with Mr. Bush today. But tonight's fundraiser in Pittsburgh is closed." WKRN-TV Nashville (3/24, 5:30 a.m.) reported, "President Bush's visit to a fund raiser today in Indianapolis could bring in more than a-half million dollars for Indiana Congressman Mike Sodrel."

KQCA-TV Sacramento-Stockton (3/24 10:00 p.m.) reported, "President Bush's popularity is so bad that even in Republican circles, candidates are giving the Commander-in-Chief the cold shoulder. In most years, candidates are begging the White House for the President to campaign with them. Not this year. Tonight, one particular fundraiser in Pittsburgh was closed to the public, so Senator Rick Santorum could avoid being seen in public with President Bush. The President's current approval rating is 34 percent."

KSFY-TV Sioux Falls-Mitchell (3/24, 5:30 a.m.) reported, "President Bush will be on the campaign fund-raising trail today in Indiana and Pennsylvania." Earlier this week, "Bush told a White House news conference he knows congressional republicans are nervous this year. But despite Bush's slump in public opinion polls, spokesman Scott McClellan says the President is still a big fund-raising draw."

GOP Candidates Keep Distance From Bush But Seek His Fundraising Help. Virtually ignoring Bush's message and focusing on the problems Bush faces in getting support from GOP lawmakers while on the campaign trail, the New York Times (3/25, Stolberg, 1.19M) reports "when Mr. Bush arrived at the Pittsburgh airport…Santorum was the first to greet him, and the president spun the senator so that he faced the press pool for photos of the two of them, according to the pool report."

The AP (3/25, Raum), in an article titled "Candidates Cool To Bush, But Not His Money," reports, "Many worried Republicans on the ballot in November have been pushing away from the White House, not wanting to be dragged under by President Bush's sinking approval ratings and growing anxiety over Iraq. That doesn't mean they're fleeing his cash offerings, however." The AP adds, "Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser. Vice President Dick Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. … Even as some Republicans are becoming increasingly defiant on a range of issues, they're still lining up dutifully for the president's campaign dollars." The AP goes on to note several instances in which GOP candidates have failed to attend events featuring either the president or vice president.

Time Poll Suggests GOP Will Retain Control Of Congress. Time (3/25) in a web exclusive reports its latest poll conducted March 22-23 "finds Americans unhappy with the performance of the Republican-controlled Congress — 39% approve, versus 49% who disapprove — and gives Democrats a 9-point lead when voters are asked to state which party's candidate they would choose for a House of Representatives seat (50% answered Democrat, 41% chose Republican)." Yet, "voter unhappiness over the Republican-controlled Congress and White House has not yet translated into a groundswell of support for the Democrats. … Nor will President Bush's dismal 39% approval rating necessarily drag down his party: almost half of voters (44%) were indifferent to whether their preferred Congressional candidate supports or opposes Bush." Time notes that "one strong sign that a political earthquake is unlikely in November: almost two out of three respondents (63%) approved of the job their own congressional representative is doing." Currently, the Democrats' "9-point advantage in party preference may not be a reliable indicator of a shift in control of the House of Representatives."

House GOP Said To Hope Baker Group Provides Iraq Exit Strategy. Newsweek's Eleanor Clift (3/25) writes, "Bush has his eye on his legacy, but House Republicans have a more immediate concern -- and that is how to save their jobs come November. 'Stay the course' is not a popular slogan on the campaign trail. That's why a new Iraq Study Group commissioned by Congress and co-chaired by former cabinet member James A. Baker III, the Bush family Mr. Fix-It, is seen by many Republicans as their best hope to forge a path out of the hell that Iraq has become. … It's Baker's cunning and diplomatic deftness that Republicans hope will extricate them from Iraq, or at least give them some new talking points in the run-up to the election."

Small Towns Begin To Have Doubts About The Iraq War. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 4, 1:50, Brown, 9.87M) reported on how the war in Iraq has affected two small towns – one in rural Pennsylvania and on in Mississippi. According to NBC, "At Susquehanna High in rural Pennsylvania" National Guard recruiters are "welcome in a school where even in wartime the military's an attractive option. … But for all of the authentic Patriotism here" recruiters have "heard more and more doubts raised about the war itself." NBC added that in Bruce, Mississippi, "though there's still support for the war" also "there are now more questions."

Support For Impeaching Bush Seen As Gaining Steam Among Liberals. The Washington Post (3/25, A1, Powell, 744K) in a front page story titled "Impeachment Whispers Get Louder" on its web site focuses on how support for impeaching Bush in is growing reporting, "It would be a considerable overstatement to say the fledgling impeachment movement threatens to topple a presidency -- there are just 33 House co-sponsors of a motion by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) to investigate and perhaps impeach Bush, and a large majority of elected Democrats think it is a bad idea. But talk bubbles up in many corners of the nation, and on the Internet, where several Web sites have led the charge, giving liberals an outlet for anger that has been years in the making." In addition to local Democrats, one "Zogby International poll showed that 51 percent of respondents agreed that Bush should be impeached if he lied about Iraq, a far greater percentage than believed President Bill Clinton should be impeached during the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal."

Specter Schedules Hearing For Bush Censure Resolution. The AP (3/25) in a brief story notes, "The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for next Friday on Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing a warrantless surveillance program."

The New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) reports Sen. Arlen Specter "said he had decided to schedule the session after Mr. Feingold, in a television interview, pressed for hearings on the censure proposal." He "said his intent was not to use the session as a political forum but to explore issues surrounding the proposed censure. He said he believed the proposal was baseless." Specter said, "I am prepared to deal with it. … I am sure not going to sit back and have Feingold spout off."

More Commentary On Bush And Cheney Challenge To Democrats. Former presidential adviser David Gergen said on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (3/24, 6:00 p.m.), "It seems like a peculiar time for rhetorical volleys back and forth. They have a few months to get this straightened out in Iraq, the window's closing there. Got get a government, an all-hands effort to push the Iraqis. And the President was talking about that this week. We need action. We need the secretary of state over there, the Vice President over there knocking heads among Iraqis to get a government tomorrow formed and they've got to have a strategy." Gergen added, "They ought to stress policy and action and personnel, not all this rhetorical stuff."

Chris Matthews said on MSNBC's Hardball (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "The White House unleashed Dick Cheney to defend the honor of the President and crush Democratic critics who question his fitness to protect the country." He later added "Let me ask you about this Cheney thing. People think he is the most powerful Vice President and he goes today with a mission which he announced himself and said I'm going out to defend the President of the United States against the charge of incompetence. I find that so ironic and almost disloyal to Bush because it looks like they made a charge against him and had to defend him."

Syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) compared Cheney's remarks to Spiro Agnew's complaints about the "nattering nabobs of negativism" and said, "Look, the Vice President is out there swinging, although, I'm not sure you can laugh off the competence charge with a joke like that. After all, even apart from the war, you have Katrina, the Harriet Miers deal, the ports stuff, stuff that was not really well-handled. The way to handle the competence charge is to do thing that are competent between now and election day. They ought to draw on the weakness of the Democrats and the war but they are all over the map. With the speeches he made speaking without a prompter and from his heart, the President at least rallies those who support the war."

Morton Kondracke on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) said that "the problem is I'm not sure talk will do it this time. Talk by itself. I think there's got to be a government forum in Iraq, it's got to be a good government. The Iraqi military has got to fight and win battles against the insurgency, and there's got to be troop withdrawal by November in order for the republicans to do well in the election."

Fred Barnes on Fox News Special Report With Brit Hume (3/24, Angle) said, "What Cheney previewed was the campaign Republicans are going to run probably before the fall. They are not going to allow it, don't want it to be a referendum on the President. They want it to be a choice. They say 'you may not agree fully with what we're doing in Iraq but these guys are going to pull out and the whole world will collapse.' And they are going to make it a them or us choice."

Democratic strategist James Carville said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.), "here is a man who said that we would be greeted as liberators, that Iraq had reconstituted the nuclear weapons program. It is kind of funny. Him talking about competence is like me talking about hair. Don't know very much about it now, do we? And I have to say when it comes to Cheney -- red Rover, red Rover, send Dick Cheney right over."

President of American Cause Bay Buchanan said on CNN's The Situation Room (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "The key is this is reminiscent of the old Spiro Agnew. The key -- what the vice president is trying to do here is create a national agenda for Republicans. So whether he goes into this state or not or just talks to national television, the point is make that trump card stronger than ever. National security works for Republicans. Let's bring it up there. Let's put the Democrats on the defense. They are splintered on it. They fall apart every time somebody says something strong in their -- takes strong action in their party. Let that happen again between now and November."

Former Presidential Candidate Rev. Al Sharpton said on MSNBC's Hardball (3/24, 7:00 p.m.) "I think that for the Cheney statements today and others to act as though they can shift this to the competence of the Democrats when they were in charge not only of the White House, but of the Congress, is what's going to come and burn them in the midterm election." He later added, "If we had a meeting at democratic headquarters to choose who we could get to defend Bush, Dick Cheney would have won. He would be by far, the one I would want to help Bush."

First Lady Says She Has Hand In White House Personnel Decisions. The New York Times (3/25, Bumiller, 1.19M) reports that in an interview with CNN's Larry King broadcast Friday night, First Lady Laura Bush said "she advised her husband regularly on personnel, and she suggested that she had weighed in on the continuing calls from Republicans for new blood in the West Wing." The Times notes that the First Lady "made her comments in response to questions from Mr. King about a Washington Post article on Friday by Sally Quinn. In a 'Dear Laura' essay in the Style section, Ms. Quinn wrote that Mrs. Bush was the only person who could tell her husband the truth about the problems he faces." Asked if she gives the president advise about personnel, she responded, "I would certainly — that's one of the things we do talk about the most, are personalities. I know everyone as well as he does, who works here. I've worked with them also. So certainly I would give him that kind of advice."

Bush To Throw Out First Pitch In Cincinnati. The Cincinatti Enquirer (3/25, Wilkinson) reports, "President Bush will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday." Sen. Mike DeWine, a season ticket holder "will be in his seat on the mezzanine level for Opening Day."

Government Releases $1.5 Billion To States To Offset Health Costs. The AP (3/25) reports, "The federal government released $1.5 billion on Friday to offset health care expenses that states incurred when assisting Hurricane Katrina evacuees." Congress has "set aside $2 billion to reimburse states" and "the $500 million not distributed yet will cover future expenses." The federal government "granted waivers to states that had temporarily enrolled evacuees into their Medicaid programs" after the hurricane.

Medicare Benefit Makes Obtaining Drugs Harder For Some Seniors. Knight Ridder (3/25, Pugh) reports patients "are facing a new problem with the fledgling Medicare prescription drug benefit: Medications they once received without question from other plans are being denied by the private insurers running the Medicare plan. When they appeal the coverage denials, the patients and their physicians face confusing forms, time-consuming demands for personal medical information and long delays." Knight Ridder adds, "And many fear things will worsen in April when tens of thousands of elderly and disabled patients must formally petition the plans to get refills on medications that were provided on a temporary emergency basis.

Employees Often Burdened By Obligations To Elderly Parents. The New York Times (3/25, Gross, 1.19M) reports that "as corporate America scrambles to help the soaring number of baby boomers, mostly working women, whose obligation to frail, elderly parents results in absenteeism, workday distractions or stress-related health problems. Companies are responding, but experts say they often use child care benefits as a model when they do not suit the different and unpredictable needs of the elderly."

OTHER NEWS:

New Home Sales' Steep Drop May Signal End Of Housing Boom. The CBS Evening News (3/24, story 6, :30, Stahl, 7.66M) reported, "A sharp drop in new-home sales reported today surprised analysts who say the long housing boom may finally be losing steam. Sales of new single-family homes fell 10.5% in February, the biggest decline in almost nine years. And for the fourth straight month the median price of a new home dropped to $230,400."

The Washington Times (3/25, A1, Hill, 90K) in a front page story reports, "The downturn in the housing market is deepening, with new home sales at a nine-year low, prices down for the fourth month in a row and mortgage applications at their lowest point in three years." The "rapidly decelerating housing market" is a concern for both the stock market and the Federal Reserve which "is scheduled to meet on Tuesday to decide on raising interest rates once again. While most Fed-watchers say another rate increase is in store next week, the faltering housing market may influence the Fed to consider pausing later this spring."

The Washington Post (3/25, D1, Tse, 744K) notes that in contrast a National Association of Realtors survey showed "that existing-home sales had increased in February after a five-month decline." While experts "cautioned against reading too much into monthly changes in either report," there "is no question, experts said, that things are cooling."

Bloomberg (3/25, Richter) notes it was the biggest decline "in nine years" and says, "Rising mortgage rates are making new homes less affordable. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.25 percent in February from 6.15 percent the month before, according to Freddie Mac."

The Financial Times (3/25, Swann) adds, "A big slowdown could prompt consumers to cut spending and boost savings. Such a shift could help reduce the current account deficit but at the cost of significantly slower growth." The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Dunham, 2.11M) and the Los Angeles Times (3/25, Haddad, 958K) also report on the drop in new-home sales.

Stocks Finish Up Slightly For The Week. NBC Nightly News (3/24, story 7, 0:20, Brown, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street today stocks finished the week with modest gains. The Dow was up just under 10 points. For the week the Dow was almost unchanged up less than one point. The NASDAQ gained just over six points on the week."

The Wall Street Journal (3/25, McKay, 2.11M) reports, "Economic data from the Commerce Department contributed to the gains, after a seesaw day of trading. Durable-goods orders rose 2.6% in February, better than analysts expected." And while the Commerce Department reported new-home sales plunged in February, "it was something of a welcome sign for investors hoping the Fed will limit further interest-rate increases, convinced the economy isn't overheating."

Bloomberg (3/25, Baker) notes, "The S&P 500 rose 1.28, or 0.1 percent, to 1302.95. The Dow Jones Industrial Average added 9.68, or 0.1 percent, to 11,279.97. Google's gain aided the Nasdaq Composite Index, which advanced 12.67, or 0.6 percent, to 2312.82."

Iran Could Have Bomb In 3 Years, LATimes Reports. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, Rubin, Farley, 958K) reports, "With efforts to halt its nuclear program at an impasse, Iran is moving faster than expected and is just days from making the first steps toward enriching uranium, said diplomats who have been briefed on the program. If engineers encounter no major technical problems, Iran could manufacture enough highly enriched uranium to build a bomb within three years, much more quickly than the common estimate of five to 10 years, the diplomats said." According to the Times, "New information about Iran's program came from diplomats representing countries on the United Nations Security Council." A "senior diplomat in Vienna" is quoted as saying, "We're getting conflicting signals from the United States; it now appears they want to escalate the situation. ... The Russians see that as a slippery slope."

Iran Top Of Agenda For Rice European Trip Next Week. AFP (3/25) reports, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Europe next week for talks to be dominated by the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, diplomatic sources said. The trip will begin Thursday in Germany and also take in France and Britain -- the three European Union countries that had led negotiations to press Iran to suspend all uranium-enrichment activities." According to AFP, "The German government confirmed that Rice would meet Chancellor Angela Merkel and Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin Thursday. Government spokesman Thomas Steg told a press conference that their talks would cover a wide range of topics, including the Iranian nuclear crisis."

"Military Solution" Not A Near-Term Option, Pace Says. AFP (3/24) reports, 'The top US military officer said here that Washington does not consider military action as an immediate option to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program. 'Iran is a long way from needing any kind of military solution,' General Peter Pace...said in an interview with the NTV news channel during a visit to Turkey. 'The United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia-- other countries, certainly the Turkish government -- are all working to persuade the Iranian government to function in a way that is not dangerous. ... There are many more things to be done politically and diplomatically before anybody, any country, considers some kind of a military option.'"

Sharon's Shadow Looms Over Upcoming Election. A number of print sources cover the Tuesday election in Israel. The New York Times (3/25, Erlanger, 1.19M) reports, 'Nearly three months after [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon's major stroke on Jan. 4, his spirit hangs over this Israeli election, as the country prepares to give its verdict on Tuesday on Kadima, the centrist party he created. Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, leaves Mr. Sharon's big chair empty at the center of the cabinet table and does not use the prime minister's office. Mr. Sharon's huge photo is wrapped around the suburban headquarters of Kadima. ... Yet the image of Mr. Sharon, so recently considered the indispensable figure in Israeli politics, has now faded from the advertisements and even the television programs."

The Wall Street Journal (3/25, Leggett, Spindle, 2.11M) notes, "Kadima, the political party he created just weeks before suffering a brain hemorrhage, may score a sweeping victory, according to polls. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, previously Mr. Sharon's little-noticed deputy, is poised to ride Mr. Sharon's legacy to the prime minister's office. That could mean important changes in Israeli policies, especially concerning relations with the Palestinians. And it could present new challenges for the US and Europe when it comes to Middle East peacemaking."

Olmert is largely relying on Sharon's legacy, as a Financial Times (3/25, Morris) analysis adds, "If Ehud Olmert next week fulfills a life-long ambition to become prime minister of Israel, it will not be on the basis of his personal popularity. In a telling response to pollsters, evidently running out of questions to ask the public in one of the country's least animated election campaigns, only one in eight Israelis queried said they would want him as a dinner partner. It is a statistic that might floor a more sensitive candidate. But Mr Olmert has grown a tough skin during an abrasive political career spanning more than four decades in which he has rarely gone out of his way to court the public's affection."

As Israelis Prep For Vote, Unilateralism Is The New Watchword. Knight Ridder (3/25, Nissenbaum) reports, "Few people who are preparing to vote Tuesday talk about peace. Instead, they talk about giving the next government a green light to set Israel's boundaries without negotiating with the Palestinians. Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that within four years he wants to shut down the more remote Jewish communities in the predominantly Palestinian West Bank, formally absorb the bigger Jewish settlements around Jerusalem and retain a protective military presence in the occupied valley near Jordan. Critics of the plan say it's likely to backfire. Instead of buying Israel a few years of stability, they warn, the idea of effectively seizing more West Bank land that's supposed to be part of a Palestinian state, walling Israel behind the separation barrier and retaining a military presence near Jordan will only inflame frustrations." Yossi Alpher, a former director of the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University, is quoted as saying, "Unilateralism cannot forge a lasting peace. ... It can't forge any peace. Unilateralism creates a better territorial situation looking towards a peace process somewhere down the line."

"Everything Is Open," Hamas Leader Says Of Vote. Newsweek (3/25, Peraino) reports, "Mahmoud Zahar is an unlikely expert on Israeli politics. In the almost two decades since he helped to found the Islamist group Hamas, Zahar has lived through six Israeli election cycles. But the most important lesson his experience has taught him is that predicting the results is a fool's errand—even in a year when one party seems poised to dominate." Zahar is quoted as saying, "Israeli society is divided into so many parties and sectors. ... Even in one party there are different sectors." Newsweek continues, "Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima bloc may seem poised to crush its nearest rivals in next Tuesday's parliamentary polls. But Zahar knows the real game doesn't begin until the postelection horse-trading starts—an inevitability in a nation where 15 different parties are likely to win seats in Parliament, and none a majority. 'In Israel, everything is open,' Zahar says."

Impact Of Israeli-Arab Voters Likely To Be Limited. The Los Angeles Times (3/25, King, 958K) reports, "Arab citizens of Israel make up 13% of the country's eligible voters, and if numbers alone were what counted, they would be a powerful political bloc, eagerly courted by all sides. Instead, the mood among the Arab electorate is largely one of listlessness. Pollsters are forecasting that their turnout will be low, and those who do vote are likely to divide their support among a number of small Arab parties."

UN Help In Offing For Trial Of Hariri Murder Suspects. AFP (3/25) reports, "The Security Council was set to ask UN chief Kofi Annan next week to strike a deal with Lebanon on creating an international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's ex-premier, Argentina's ambassador said. Cesar Mayoral, the president of the Security Council for March, told reporters that the 15-member body would vote Tuesday on a French-drafted resolution urging Annan to negotiate an accord on the tribunal for suspects in the slaying of Rafiq Hariri. Diplomats said the text was virtually certain to be adopted."

Activist Develops A Presidential Following In Lebanon. Newsweek (3/25, Glain) reports, "Even though a national election isn't scheduled, human-rights activist Chibli Mallat is running for president. And his chances of winning are looking better all the time. Chibli Mallat, a Lebanese human-rights lawyer and activist, is campaigning as an independent for his country's presidency. That makes him unique, for two reasons: First, in Lebanon's highly factionalized politics, no one gets anywhere without belonging to an ethnic or religious clan. Second, there are no scheduled elections to contest."

Cunningham-Linked Contractor Formed Non-Profit To Push Democracy In Iran. Knight Ridder (3/25, Strobel) reports, "In a new example of disgraced defense contractor Mitchell Wade's attempts to exert influence in Washington and beyond, Wade and two business partners formed a nonprofit group in 2004 to promote democracy in Iran, according to documents and interviews. Wade and the two partners, who have been large contributors to Republican political campaigns, formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation in April 2004, according to incorporation papers filed in Washington. The timing coincides with a push by opponents of the theocratic regime in Tehran to appropriate more money for democracy programs." Knight Ridder adds, "Behrooz Behbudi, who helped incorporate the foundation, said in a telephone interview that Wade 'was supposed to get funds from the Congress' for the project. The two later fell out over business dealings in Iraq, Behbudi said."

Columnist Questions Whether US Democracy-Promotion Efforts Are Targeted Correctly. In a Los Angeles Times (3/25, 958K) column, former Malaysian deputy Prime Minister Anwar Ibrahim, writes, "Since 9/11, the United States has pursued what the White House calls a

'forward strategy of freedom' predicated on the belief that a dearth of democracy in Muslim countries has led to the spread of a deadly strain of Islamic extremism." However, "as the first returns come in on this democratization effort in the Muslim world, there is growing anxiety in the US about the resulting character of these nascent, freely elected governments. Some have begun to even question whether these countries have the innate ability to sustain democracy. For the United States, the fear is real, though perhaps tinged with a bit of Islamophobia: How terrible an irony it would be if this grand effort to spread liberty abroad resulted in anti-US Islamic states imposing Sharia, or Islamic law, on their people."

Egyptian Activist Endured Jail In Name Of Democracy -- And Islamic Law. In a related story, the New York Times (3/25, Slackman, 1.19M) asks, "What makes a person go to jail for his beliefs and fortifies that person to hold strong while the moments of life — weddings, births, deaths — pass by? Essam el-Erian missed six and a half years of freedom for his political work." But "Mr. Erian's push for democracy does not sit as well with those in the West, namely the United States and Europe, because while he calls for free elections, freedom of speech and due process, he freely admits that he wants those political changes to help bring Islamic law to Egypt. His critics believe that religious-based organizations like his want to use the mechanics of democracy to achieve power, but have no intention of actually supporting democratic values or practices." Erian, a leading figure in the Muslim Brotherhood, is quoted as saying, "It is a duty to do it, it is a religious duty. ... Our people look like slaves to dictatorships, and Islam came to release people from slavery to be only slaves of the God."

US Retracts Pakistani Senator's Visa. The Washington Post (3/25, A3, Vedantam, 744K) reports, "The Bush administration has withdrawn an invitation to a Pakistani lawmaker and a prominent critic of President Pervez Musharraf who was to arrive in the United States today as a guest of the State Department, setting off charges that the action came at the behest of the Pakistani government. Sana Ullah Baloch, who had been invited by the State Department last year and issued a visa, was told recently by the US Embassy in Islamabad that he could not attend a State Department-sponsored program on accountability in government and business and that a visa he had already received had been revoked." During a Wednesday interview, "State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck said the problem was not funding but rather new information that was received after Baloch had been approved that 'led us to believe he was not eligible for a visa.' She declined to elaborate."

Indian Premier Favors Treaty, Pakistan Asks For Kashmir Solution First. The New York Times (3/25, Sengupta, 1.19M) reports, Indian "Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called Friday for a far-reaching 'treaty of peace, security and friendship' between India and Pakistan, in what appeared to be an effort to stanch criticism from across the border for inaction on the contested Kashmir region. Pakistan politely welcomed the offer but pointed, not surprisingly, to the need to take on the Kashmir issue." Mr. Singh is quoted as saying, "We are not afraid of discussing Jammu and Kashmir or of finding pragmatic, practical solutions to resolve this issue as well," though he added that territorial lines were not up for discussion.

US, Europe Will Place Sanctions On Belarus. The New York Times (3/25, Chivers, 1.19M) reports, "The United States and Europe said Friday that they would impose sanctions against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko of Belarus and other top officials for cracking down on a peaceful protest over his re-election, which was widely seen as a sham." The US "stopped short of cutting its ties with the Belarus government, but a senior State Department official said that travel and financial restrictions already in place on 'fewer than a dozen' Belarussian government officials would probably be extended to more than 50, including Mr. Lukashenko. The European Union announced similar moves."

In its coverage, the Financial Times (3/25, Buckley, Dombey) notes, "The tough EU and US response set them sharply at odds with Russia. Moscow has accepted the election results and congratulated Mr Lukashenko on winning a third five-year presidential term with an official 82.6 per cent of the vote, on a 92 per cent turnout." Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, "on Friday accused the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe...of delivering a biased verdict."

The Washington Post (3/25, A12, Branigin, 744K) adds, "White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the United States demanded the immediate release of hundreds of protesters who have been arrested for demonstrating against March 19 elections, which President Alexander Lukashenko claims to have won with nearly 83 percent of the vote." McClellan is quoted as saying, "The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views. ... We strongly condemn the actions by Belarusan security services, [who] forcibly seized and detained citizens of Belarus who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19th election results."

And in an exclusive interview with Professor Alexander Kozulin, one of the two top Belarussian opposition leaders, Time (3/24, Zarakhovich) quotes Kozulin as saying, "Lukashenko's lost his nerve. Tomorrow, Saturday, March 25, is a major national holiday, albeit unrecognized officially — the anniversary of the Belarus People's Republic, our independent state, proclaimed back in 1918 and destroyed several months later. Lots of people always gather to mark this day. Now, the anniversary coincided with mass election fraud protests. The opposition has called upon the people to come to the square en masse to protest. The authorities were scared that this 'pathetic tent camp' worked as a toehold for the dozens of thousands who would show up tomorrow — and turn Minsk into a free city. So they moved to remove it." The AP (3/25) also covers the story.

Opposition Focus Shifts To Detention Center. A separate New York Times (3/25, Chivers, 1.19M) notes, "The center of the psychological chess game between the autocratic government of Belarus and its emboldened new opposition shifted Friday from a small camp on October Square to a pretrial detention center, where much of the opposition movement now finds itself locked up." On Friday, "relatives of the detained and opposition members who had eluded arrest turned up at the jailhouse walls, demanding to know who was inside, and trying to get the officials to accept parcels for the detainees. The bags contained nuts, juice, toothbrushes and clean clothes."

Schumer, Graham Take Softer Line On China Penalties. The Financial Times (3/25, Dyer, Swann) reports, "Advocates of free trade were hopeful on Friday that a more conciliatory stance by two US senators who have threatened draconian legislation against China would help cool anger in Congress over China's trade policies. Senators Charles Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who sponsored a bill to place a 27.5 per cent tariff on Chinese exports entering the US, said the country had taken 'a big first step' towards establishing a more flexible currency regime. Speaking on a visit to China, they said they would make a decision only next week on whether to put their bill for a vote on March 31. They hinted, however, that any vote would be delayed for at least a month."

Lucent, Alcatel Hope An Ascendant China Will Give Legs To Tie-Up. As Alcatel pursues a $13 billion merger with Lucent Technologies Inc., the Wall Street Journal (3/25, Silver, Berman, Abboud, 2.11M) reports, "There is renewed urgency for a deal. Chinese upstarts such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. are beginning to enter their turf with cheaper products, threatening to seize market share, take jobs and set industry standards for the huge Chinese market." Both Lucent and Alcatel hope that the fast-changing global telecom landscape will keep their deal from becoming a political football," as the recent Dubai Ports World debacle and the "possible purchase of Unocal Corp. by China's Cnooc Ltd., fell apart over U.S. opposition."

China's Imposition Of Consumption Taxes A Good Example For US, NYTimes Says. After an announcement by Beijing last week that it would "raise existing taxes and impose new ones on things like gas-guzzling cars and trucks, and disposable wooden chopsticks," the New York Times (3/25, 1.19M) editorializes, "China's relentless economic growth has created severe environmental problems and depleted its natural resources. Its energy demands have contributed to rising oil prices and the gases associated with global warming. So it is heartening when China, the world's most populous nation, takes steps to curb its appetites. We hope other countries (like the United States) may be similarly inspired."

US Proposal To Change How UN Funding Mechanism Rankles Russia, China. The Financial Times (3/25, Nations) reports, "The US has sparked protests from Russia and China by proposing a fundamental change to the way contributions to the United Nations are calculated that would make them pay more. The US...wants to shift from a formula broadly based on gross national income (GNI) to one that takes account of purchasing power parity (PPP) – a tool used by economists to compare living standards in different countries more accurately. In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, before that hearing was delayed, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, argued that the GNI-based calculations could be 'greatly skewed by distortions introduced into the marketplace by -currencies which are non--convertible'." But "the move is a clear challenge to China and Russia, and to developing countries, whose relative wealth is considerably higher when measured by PPP. 'PPP would radically shift the balance,' said one UN diplomat. 'Developing countries would pay a lot more.'"

UN Security Council Wants Faster Darfur Planning. The AFP (3/25) reports, "The UN Security Council called for faster preparations for the African Union (AU) to hand over its peacekeeping mission in Sudan's western Darfur region to the United Nations. The 15-member body unanimously adopted a resolution that also decided to extend for at least six months the mandate of the UN mission in south Sudan (UNMIS). The text directed UN chief Kofi Annan, working with the AU and in consultations with the council 'to expedite the necessary preparatory planning for transition' from the AU force known as AMIS to a UN operation."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privileged Conversations Said Not Excluded From Spying (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The National Security Agency has the authority to listen without warrants to conversations between lawyers and their clients and doctors and their patients if a connection to Al Qaeda is suspected, the Justice Department told Congress in a report released Friday.

"Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception" if they met the other requirements of the eavesdropping program, including if there were a suspected link to Al Qaeda and if one party were outside the United States, the Justice Department said. It did not say whether that authority had been used.

Federal policy generally recognizes a high standard of confidentiality for privileged attorney-client and doctor-patient conversations. The monitoring of federal jailhouse conversations between a lawyer and a client, for instance, requires a special order of the attorney general.

The Justice Department's position on the question of privileged conversations came in its written responses to nearly 100 questions posed by Republicans and Democrats about the N.S.A.'s eavesdropping program, which has provoked fierce debate in Congress since it was disclosed last December.

Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, one of the Democrats who questioned the department about the legal and operational details of the program, said the administration's suggestion that privileged communications could be monitored without a warrant was "one of the few revealing answers" in more than 50 pages of responses.

For the most part, Mr. Conyers said, the answers were "vague and unresponsive" and reflected an effort by the administration to "thumb its nose at the American people and their elected representatives."

The bulk of the written responses repeated the assertions the administration has made in defending the program in public statements, written reports and Congressional testimony in the last three months.

Once again, the Justice Department strongly defended the legality of the program, based on President Bush's constitutional authority to protect the country and a Congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The department characterized as flawed and unfounded charges from critics that the program violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which required warrants from a special court for eavesdropping operations in intelligence cases.

The department also defended the effectiveness of the program, despite suggestions from some law enforcement officials that it had led to far more dead ends than productive leads. With the operation aimed at preventing another terrorist attack, the Justice Department said it "is confident that the program is helping to achieve that goal."

But as it has done repeatedly, the department refused to answer directly nearly all the questions raised by Democrats about the operational aspects of the program or what limits if any it saw to the president's legal authority to protect the country.

DOJ: NSA Could've Monitored Lawyers' Calls (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, March 25, 2006

The National Security Agency could have legally monitored ordinarily confidential communications between doctors and patients or attorneys and their clients, the Justice Department said Friday of its controversial warrantless surveillance program.

Responding to questions from Congress, the department also said that it sees no prohibition to using information collected under the NSA's program in court.

"Because collecting foreign intelligence information without a warrant does not violate the Fourth Amendment and because the Terrorist Surveillance Program is lawful, there appears to be no legal barrier against introducing this evidence in a criminal prosecution," the department said in responses to questions from lawmakers released Friday evening.

The department said that considerations, including whether classified information could be disclosed, must be weighed.

In classified court filings, the Justice Department has responded to questions about whether information from the government's warrantless surveillance program was used to prosecute terror suspects. Defense attorneys are hoping to use that information to challenge the cases against their clients.

Since the program was disclosed in December, some skeptical lawmakers have investigated the Bush administration's legal footing, raising questions including whether the program could capture doctor-patient and attorney-client communications. Such communications normally receive special legal protections.

"Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception," the department said.

The department said the same general criteria for the surveillance program would also apply to doctors' and lawyers' calls: one party must be outside the United States and there must be reason to believe one party is linked to al-Qaida. The department's written response also said that these communications aren't specifically targeted and safeguards are in place to protect privacy rights.

Michigan Rep. John Conyers (news, bio, voting record), the House Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, complained about the department's evasiveness in answers to questions from the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, submitted to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. All but two of 45 answers to the House Judiciary Democrats were vague and unresponsive, Conyers said.

He found the response regarding doctor-patient and attorney-client privilege particularly troublesome. More generally, the "need for oversight is especially glaring," he said in a statement.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department "has been extremely forthcoming and clear about the administration's legal analysis through multiple briefings with Congress, three hearings with the Attorney General, multiple letters to Congress, a 42-page white paper and dozens of questions for the record."

Responding in 75 typed pages, the department clarified some points in the three-month-old debate over the program. But it also left many questions unanswered, citing the need for national security.

The House Democrats asked if any other president has authorized wiretaps without court warrants since the passage of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which governs intelligence collection inside the United States.

Choosing its words carefully, the department said, "if the question is limited to 'electronic surveillance' ... we are unaware of such authorizations."

The department also made clear that the program — as confirmed by President Bush — has never been suspended since it began in October 2001. That would include 2004, when reports indicate serious doubts about the program were raised by Justice Department officials.

But the department refused to discuss, or even confirm, a meeting in 2004 at then-Attorney General John Ashcroft's hospital bed. News reports indicated that White House Chief of Staff Andy Card and Gonzales, then White House counsel, needed his help to quell dissent about the program.

Lawmakers also asked whether federal judges on a secretive intelligence court objected to the program and, if so, how the administration responded.

The department wouldn't answer, citing the need to protect classified information. "We assure you, however, that the department keeps the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court fully informed regarding information that is relevant to the FISA process," the response said.

The department also avoided questions on whether the administration believes it is legal to wiretap purely domestic calls without a warrant, when al-Qaida activity is suspected. The department wouldn't say specifically that it hasn't been done.

"Interception of the content of domestic communications would present a different legal question," the department said.

Federal Judge Appointed To FISA Court (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

U.S. District Judge John D. Bates has been named to replace a judge who resigned from the secretive court set up by Congress to oversee domestic spying.

Bates, a former Whitewater prosecutor, was appointed by Chief Justice John Roberts in February to replace U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who quit shortly after news reports about the Bush administration going around the court to eavesdrop on U.S. citizens suspected of communicating with terrorists.

The appointment was not announced by the court. Secrecy News reported the appointment Friday after it appeared in Bates' official online biography.

"In February 2006, he was appointed by Chief Justice Roberts to serve as a judge of the United States Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court," according to Bates' bio on the Web site maintained by the U.S. District Court of the District of Columbia.

Bates was named to the federal bench in 2001 by President Bush. Prior to joining the court, Bates worked as a private practice attorney. From 1995 to 1997, he was an assistant U.S. attorney who wored for Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr on the investigation into President Clinton's Whitewater investment deals.

The FISA court reviews applications for domestic intelligence surveillance and search warrant requests, as outlined in the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

While Robertson never spoke publicly of his resignation, many believe he quit in protest over the National Security Agency's monitoring of international calls — when one party is inside the United States — without first getting court approval.

Under the program first disclosed last year, the NSA has been conducting the surveillance when calls and e-mails are thought to involve al-Qaida. President Bush authorized the program after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Unwelcome Attention From Moussaoui Trial (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And David Johnston

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui was supposed to have been the government's best opportunity to hold someone accountable for the deaths on Sept. 11, 2001.

But after federal prosecutors finished laying out their case this week, even those who strongly supported an aggressive prosecution may wonder whether the trial has shed as much light on Mr. Moussaoui's culpability as it has on the missteps and mistakes by law enforcement agencies.

The testimony of two prosecution witnesses, in particular, has brought renewed and unwelcome attention to how the Federal Bureau of Investigation dealt with early warning signs.

Mr. Moussaoui is the sole person to go to trial in an American courtroom for the attacks, making him a proxy for the 19 hijackers who were killed carrying out the attacks and the chief planners who are being held in secret C.I.A. prisons overseas.

Mr. Moussaoui in jail on Sept. 11, but prosecutors have argued that he deserves to be executed because he lied to investigators about what he knew of Al Qaeda plans to fly planes into buildings when he was arrested three weeks earlier on immigration violations.

On Monday, defense lawyers are expected to offer a set of extraordinary trial exhibits, statements about Mr. Moussaoui by a handful of senior Qaeda officials gathered somewhere in the secret overseas detention centers that the C.I.A. maintains.

The jury will be read the statements from detainees including Khalid Shaik Mohammed, the mastermind of Sept. 11, and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, its paymaster. Officials expect the two to describe Mr. Moussaoui as an unreliable fringe figure in Al Qaeda.

The government presentation, which ended on Thursday, did not go smoothly. First, the prosecution nearly collapsed after the disclosure that a transportation lawyer working with the prosecutors had improperly coached aviation witnesses.

Although that occurred out of the jury's view, other problems surfaced when the prosecutors presented two witnesses supposed to bolster their case that Mr. Moussaoui's lies made him responsible for nearly 3,000 deaths. The two witnesses testified that if he had told the truth on Aug. 16, 2001, the bureau could have moved swiftly to foil the plot.

The first witness, Harry Samit, an F.B.I. agent in Minnesota who questioned Mr. Moussaoui at his arrest, firmly asserted that had he been given the truth "we would have several new leads to investigate," and the plot might have been thwarted. Instead, he said, Mr. Moussaoui's answers sent investigators on "wild goose chases."

Under cross-examination by Edward B. MacMahon Jr., a court-appointed lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, Mr. Samit acknowledged that after the attacks he had written strongly worded reports saying his superiors had improperly blocked his efforts to investigate Mr. Moussaoui. He added that he was convinced that Mr. Moussaoui was a terrorist involved in an imminent hijacking plot.

That senior bureau officials dragged their feet on investigating Mr. Moussaoui by seeking search warrants from a special intelligence court or a more routine criminal search warrant was not new. But it had never been presented so vividly as a reluctant Mr. Samit was obliged to do under cross-examination.

He offered a devastating comment from a supervisor who said pressing too hard to obtain a warrant for Mr. Moussaoui would hurt his career. Mr. Samit also wrote that his superiors did not act because they were guilty of "criminal negligence" and they were gambling that Mr. Moussaoui had little to offer. The lost wager, Mr. Samit said, was paid in many lives.

Mr. Samit was followed to the witness stand by Michael Rolince, a retired F.B.I. counterterrorism supervisor who similarly recited a list of actions that the bureau could have taken if Mr. Moussaoui had told them about Qaeda plans to take over planes with knives and fly into buildings.

But when Mr. MacMahon began reading from a document detailing many suspicions about Mr. Moussaoui's intentions, Mr. Rolince interrupted, "Can I ask what document that's coming from?"

Mr. MacMahon obliged, noting that it was an urgent memorandum written by Mr. Samit on Aug. 18, 2001, hoping to attract the attention of headquarters. Mr. Rolince had inadvertently underlined that the agent's suspicions had never risen to his attention.

One problem for the bureau is that the backbone of the prosecution case, that the bureau could have disrupted the plot had Mr. Moussaoui admitted all he knew, represents a substantial revision of conventional wisdom at the law enforcement agency.

For years, agents have expressed the view that Mr. Moussaoui knew little about what his Qaeda superiors wanted of him and had said that it was highly speculative whether more information would have deterred the attacks.

A number of bureau officials have contended that even if the bureau had more clues about the hijackers, they might have been able only to put them under surveillance because they had not committed any crime.

Sally Regenhard of the Bronx, whose son, a probationary firefighter, was killed in the collapse of the World Trade Center, said she was upset by the reminders of the failure of law enforcement authorities to heed many leads before the attacks.

"It's dismaying, but there it is," said Ms. Regenhard, who has been one of the dozens of family members of Sept. 11 victims who have visited the Virginia courtroom to observe the trial. "There were discrete warnings known to the government. People don't realize this."

The most pivotal moment may occur next week, however, when Mr. Moussaoui is expected to take the stand. Under the federal death penalty law, the jurors have to consider first whether he is responsible for any of the Sept. 11 deaths before they consider several factors in deciding whether to order his execution. The jury would have to be unanimous in deciding he bore responsibility for the trial to go to the next phase.

In addition to the evidence, the jurors may respond viscerally and decide that Mr. Moussaoui is an odious figure undeserving of sympathy. They have heard some of his outbursts in pretrial proceedings in which he proclaimed in their presence his membership in Al Qaeda. He has said that he was indeed training to fly a plane into a building but that he was not involved in the Sept. 11 plot and should not be executed for it.

His testimony will give the jurors another opportunity to take his measure.

9/11 Lawyer Won't Testify On Her Actions (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Violation Halted Moussaoui Case

A government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui will not have to testify about her actions at a hearing Monday, court officials said yesterday.

Attorneys for Moussaoui had subpoenaed Carla J. Martin, who brought Moussaoui's sentencing hearing to a halt last week after she violated a court order by sharing testimony with upcoming witnesses. The subpoena had instructed her to report to U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

But Judge Leonie M. Brinkema yesterday quashed the subpoena, according to a brief notation on the court docket, which said a hearing scheduled for 9 a.m. Monday had been canceled. The docket did not offer an explanation. Attorneys for Moussaoui and Martin declined to comment because the matter remains under a court seal.

One reason a judge would quash a subpoena, legal experts said, is if the person ordered to court planned to invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify. Martin declined to testify at a hearing last week. Her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has said Martin is assembling a defense but is not yet ready to explain her actions publicly.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda and is the only person convicted in an American courtroom on charges stemming from the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. A federal jury in Alexandria will decide whether he receives the death penalty.

Brinkema stopped the sentencing hearing for a week after Martin violated the order forbidding most witnesses from attending or following the trial or reading transcripts. Martin e-mailed trial transcripts to seven witnesses and coached them on their testimony. She had been a liaison between aviation witnesses and the prosecution team.

Brinkema called it "the most egregious violation of the court's rules on witnesses" she had seen "in all the years I've been on the bench."

In response, Brinkema barred the testimony of the witnesses Martin had contacted and all aviation evidence, severely damaging the government's case. But after prosecutors offered a compromise, Brinkema issued a revised order saying they could use new aviation witnesses untainted by Martin's conduct.

The aviation evidence is crucial to the government's central argument for Moussaoui's execution: that if he had not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001, the Sept. 11 attacks could have been stopped. Armed with Moussaoui's information about the plot, prosecutors say, the Federal Aviation Administration could have ratcheted up security at the nation's airports.

Moussaoui Trial: Attempt To Subpoena Martin Is Quashed (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 25, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, VA. - Without public explanation, the judge in the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui on Friday quashed a defense subpoena for the testimony of Carla Martin, a government lawyer found to have improperly coached prosecution witnesses.

It was not immediately clear whether Martin, a Transportation Security Administration attorney, would appear later or had signaled her intention to exercise her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. It was also possible her testimony was no longer thought to be necessary.

Disclosures that Martin circulated transcripts of the trial's first day to seven potential federal aviation witnesses and made suggestions as to how some of them should testify nearly undermined the government's push for Moussaoui's execution.

But Brinkema allowed prosecutors to present a new witness, former Federal Aviation Administration official Robert Cammaroto, this week after holding a closed hearing to evaluate whether he was free of any taint.

Cammaroto testified that if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about an Al-Qaida suicide hijacking plot when he was arrested in Minnesota weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks, the FAA could have swiftly tightened security at the nation's airports.

Defense lawyers, however, petitioned the court to require Martin to testify to determine whether the "taint" extended further and subpoenaed her to appear in court at 9 a.m. Monday. Prosecutors had advised the judge they welcomed her appearance, but only if she would not invoke the Fifth Amendment.

Martin's attorney, Roscoe Howard, declined to respond to phone calls.

AP, March 24, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Defense lawyers have asked a federal appeals court to intervene in the case of two Albany Muslims accused of supporting terrorism, saying the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret.

Attorneys for Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain filed a writ Friday asking the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals to review Judge Thomas McAvoy's pretrial ruling. Arguing that illegal warrantless wiretaps may have been used, they had filed a motion to thrown out charges, suppress any evidence from such wiretaps and force prosecutors to disclose whether they were used.

McAvoy on March 10 rejected the motion. His "classified" ruling leaves his reasons secret. The earlier responses by prosecutors and the U.S. Justice Department also were classified.

The writ says the judge "failed to rule on the legality of the NSA surveillance program, even though it is clearly a source of evidence in this case." They called the judge's handling of the issue "an especially serious breach of due process."

Yassin Aref, 35, imam at Masjid as-Salam in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, 50, are accused of laundering money in 2003-2004 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer. Neither is accused of actual violence.

Both deny charges that they conspired to provide support to Jaish-e-Mohammed, a Pakistan-based group listed by the federal government as a terrorist organization. Aref, an emigre from the Kurdish region of northern Iraq, remains in jail awaiting trial, while Hossain is free on bond.

The NSA wiretap program, disclosed publicly Dec. 16 by The New York Times, began sometime after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and involved electronic intercepts of telephone calls and e-mails in the U.S. of people with suspected ties to al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

The disclosure prompted national debate about its legality. President Bush defended the program, saying it is an effective tool to disrupt terrorists and insisted it was not an abuse of Americans' civil liberties. Its details have not been disclosed.

On Friday, the Justice Department told Congress that it sees no prohibition to using information from the NSA program in court, and thatcalls between attorneys and their clients "would not be categorically excluded from interception." The department asserted that collecting foreign intelligence information does not violate the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unlawful searches and that the terrorist surveillance program is lawful.

Prosecutors had also asked McAvoy to shield several documents about the Albany investigation since the men were arrested almost two years ago, citing national security. Some information was released Tuesday in compliance with another order from McAvoy.

Pakistani Forces Kill 18 Militants (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Security officials say the fighting began when a government outpost was attacked in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region. One soldier dies.

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — Pakistani security forces shot dead at least 18 militants in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region near the border with Afghanistan early Friday, security officials said.

Syed Zaheerul Islam, administrator of the troubled region, said one soldier was killed and two others were wounded in the two-hour battle. He also said that foreign militants might be among the dead. The government claims could not be independently verified.

Officials said the fighting began in the Tith Nary area, southwest of Miram Shah, the regional administrative headquarters, when militants attacked a government outpost. The attackers fired rockets on the troops and security forces returned fire, authorities said.

One security official said that Cobra helicopters were called in to assist ground forces in repulsing the attack.

"We have not counted the bodies, but from the blood littered at the area and some eyewitnesses reports, we can presume that militants have suffered heavy casualties," the official said.

A recent wave of clashes has left nearly 200 militants dead in the region, officials said. Authorities have set a night curfew in Miram Shah to curtail attacks on security forces and government installations.

Opposition Decries U.S. Travel Alert For Italy As Interference In Election (WP)

By Sarah Delaney

ROME, March 24 -- Opposition leader Romano Prodi says he got on the phone to the U.S. ambassador right away to demand an explanation: Why did the State Department issue a public announcement warning Americans in Italy to stay away from political rallies because of possible violence?

The March 21 caution came in the final weeks of a vitriolic election campaign in which Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, a close U.S. ally, is trailing in the polls. To many opposition ears, the U.S. statement seemed to support Berlusconi's accusations that Prodi's alliance harbors fringe groups in its ranks that resort to violence.

"The U.S. alert surprised me," Prodi told reporters here. ". . . A move like this, with elections nearing, can cause a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that."

The warning to travelers and a U.S. decision to allow Berlusconi to address a joint session of Congress in Washington on March 1, a rare honor for a foreign leader, have led to allegations here that the United States is trying to help Berlusconi win a new term.

The warning "is not political," a U.S. Embassy spokesman said. "It's not taking sides. It doesn't even have to be necessarily a political protest. We're just urging Americans to be prudent in any public protest situation." The announcement cited a March 11 incident in Milan in which youths clashed with riot police, injuring some of them and causing considerable damage to streets, cars and shops.

In a day of bickering over the warning, Berlusconi criticized Prodi for contacting the ambassador, Ronald P. Spogli, calling it "undue interference in American affairs." He said the State Department had been justified in issuing the warning, because "the United States addresses its citizens, as is its right, warning them that in Italian political demonstrations there are situations that may be dangerous for Americans."

Prodi accused the Italian government of being behind the State Department announcement, citing an explanatory note posted on the embassy Web site in response to criticisms. "The Italian government is aware of this announcement, which corresponds to various public statements by Italian authorities," the note read. The embassy said it had acted on its own initiative.

Berlusconi has backed the war in Iraq, sending about 3,000 troops to the southern part of the country after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Italy's participation has been unpopular with its people; from the start, the opposition has strongly criticized Berlusconi for sending the force.

The campaign has been heating up as the April 9-10 elections near. Polls show Berlusconi's House of Liberties coalition trailing the opposition's Union coalition by as much as 5 percentage points.

He denied that Italy was in economic decline and said that left-leaning newspapers, some bankers and some industrialists were intentionally giving the wrong impression of the country's economic health.

Berlusconi and Prodi have already faced off in a television debate, in a format close to that used for U.S. presidential debates. The formal and tightly monitored question-and-answer formula favored Prodi, many political analysts concluded, with Berlusconi coming off looking tense.

The two are to debate again on April 3.

Israeli Athlete In '72 Games Recalls Terror (NYT)

By Avi Salzman

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

NEW HAVEN, March 23 — An Israeli athlete who survived the attacks at the Munich Olympics in 1972 spoke about his ordeal for the first time in the United States on Thursday night at Yale, warning that reprisal killings of terrorists only lead to "bloodshed and more bloodshed."

Dan Alon, once a champion Israeli fencer, said he was inspired by watching the movie "Munich" to tell the story of his escape from the building where the Palestinian terrorist group Black September had taken his fellow athletes and some coaches hostage, later killing 11 of them. He said he had kept silent in the nearly 34 years since the attack, not even telling his wife and daughter, who sat in the back of the room.

"It was emotional," he said later, explaining why he kept silent for so long. "It was very hard for me to talk."

Mr. Alon, now 60, recalled the harrowing details of his escape, including the decision by members of the shooting team not to use the guns they had brought for competition to attack the terrorists, and the sound of the creaky steps the athletes had to walk down to escape from the building.

The Munich Games, he said, had begun on a high note. The opening ceremony was "the most beautiful day of my life," he said, particularly because it was the first Olympic Games in Germany since the Holocaust.

"Coming in with the Israeli flag, it was really something I can't explain," he said. "It was really very touching."

Around 4:30 a.m. on Sept. 5, 1972, Mr. Alon said he awoke to loud noises, but he figured that another team was celebrating and he fell back asleep. Soon afterward, however, gunshots shook the walls of his room. Looking out the window, he saw a wrestling coach, Moshe Weinberg, lying on the ground outside and heard one of the terrorists speaking to German police about how they had taken hostages and wanted hundreds of Palestinian prisoners released. The terrorists, Mr. Alon said, had attacked the Israelis in apartments on either side of him, but for some unknown reason they had passed his door. He said he thinks Mr. Weinberg protected him by leading the terrorists away from his apartment.

Mr. Alon was staying with members of the shooting team, who had guns. After a short discussion, however, the athletes decided not to shoot their attackers because they did not know how many had entered the complex or whether they would retaliate by killing the hostages.

They crept slowly down the stairs of their apartment — "walking on eggs" — so as not to alert the attackers, he said.

Eventually, they got out of the building by jumping over a balcony railing and running through a garden to the German police, who shuttled them to safety. Mr. Alon said he started to cry when he saw his fellow Israelis ride by as hostages in a bus on their way to the airport where they would all die.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Assurances Sought On Port-Security Deal (AP)

By Ted Bridis

AP, March 25, 2006

The senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee sought assurances Friday over a no-bid contract the Bush administration is finalizing with a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (news, bio, voting record), D-Miss., said he was concerned there will be inadequate oversight in the Bahamas, just 65 miles from Florida's coast. He cited a story published Thursday by The Associated Press describing the $6 million contract involving radiation-scanning at the largest seaport in the Bahamas.

The administration acknowledges its contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running sophisticated U.S. radiation-detection equipment at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

"I am concerned that under the arrangement detailed, a foreign company is responsible for screening containers for illicit materials without any government involvement," Thompson wrote in a letter to leaders at the Homeland Security Department and the Energy Department.

The Republican chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, Rep. Peter King (news, bio, voting record) of New York, could not be reached Friday for comment.

The contract is being negotiated by the National Nuclear Security Administration, part of the Energy Department. It has said employees of Hutchison — the world's largest ports operator — will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner at the sprawling Freeport Container Port under the direct supervision of Bahamian customs officials.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. customs officials working at an anti-terrorism center in northern Virginia.

A spokesman for the NNSA said the agency had not yet received the letter from Thompson.

News of the contract surfaced just as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff prepared to leave on a trip to China, Japan and Singapore, where part of his mission will be to discuss air and sea port security.

Hutchison's ports subsidiary said in a statement Friday from its headquarters in Hong Kong that the U.S. contract was not yet finalized and that it was confident Bahamian customs inspectors will notify U.S. authorities whenever it is appropriate.

Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner. Separately, there are no U.S. customs agents checking cargo containers in Freeport under a related U.S. port-security program known as the Container Security Initiative run by U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

In his letter, Thompson urged better coordination between the two security programs run by agencies within the departments of Energy and Homeland Security.

"A coordinated policy between your departments would ensure that our government would have oversight over the deployment and operation of equipment in any event, especially if involvement of a foreign company is necessary," Thompson wrote to Chertoff and to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

Thompson said he will support upcoming legislative efforts to combine the two programs under offices within the Homeland Security Department "to create a more streamlined security system."

Hutchison Whampoa is among the shipping industry's most-respected companies and was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

The Homeland Security Department has worked since last year to include Freeport in its Container Security Initiative program, which would include stationing U.S. customs agents at the ports. Thompson asked when those efforts will be completed. Other Hutchison-run ports in other countries already participate in that program.

U.S. To Contract Foreign Co. To Scan Cargo (AP)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon

AP, March 25, 2006

One of Americans' favorite beach destinations, the Bahamas, is getting a new U.S. arrival — sophisticated equipment to detect radioactive materials in shipping cargo.

But U.S. customs agents won't be on site to supervise the machine's use as a nuclear safeguard for the American shoreline that is just 65 miles away from Freeport. Under an unusual arrangement, a Hong Kong company will help operate the detector.

The Bush administration says it is finalizing a no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. It acknowledged the deal is the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

The administration is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press. At dozens of other overseas ports, foreign governments are primarily responsible for scanning cargo.

While President Bush recently reassured Congress that foreigners would not manage security at U.S. ports, the Hutchison deal in the Bahamas illustrates how the administration is relying on foreign companies at overseas ports to safeguard cargo headed to the United States.

Hutchison Whampoa is the world's largest ports operator and among the industry's most-respected companies. It was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

"Li Ka-Shing is pretty close to a lot of senior leaders of the Chinese government and the Chinese Communist Party," said Larry M. Wortzel, head of a U.S. government commission that studies China security and economic issues. But Wortzel said Hutchison operates independently from Beijing, and he described Li as "a very legitimate international businessman."

"One can conceive legitimate security concerns and would hope either the Homeland Security Department or the intelligence services of the United States work very hard to satisfy those concerns," Wortzel said.

Three years ago, the Bush administration effectively blocked a Hutchison subsidiary from buying part of a bankrupt U.S. telecommunications company, Global Crossing Ltd., on national security grounds.

And a U.S. military intelligence report, once marked "secret," cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas.

DOJ_NMG_0021990

Hutchison's port operations in the Bahamas and Panama "could provide a conduit for illegal shipments of technology or prohibited items from the West to the PRC (People's Republic of China), or facilitate the movement of arms and other prohibited items into the Americas," the now-declassified assessment said.

The CIA currently has no security concerns about Hutchison's port operations, and the Bush administration believes the pending deal with the foreign company would be safe, officials said.

Supervised by Bahamian customs officials, Hutchison employees will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner that moves slowly over large cargo containers and scans them for radiation that might be emitted by plutonium or a radiological weapon.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials working at an anti-terrorism center 800 miles away in northern Virginia. Any alarm would prompt a closer inspection of the cargo, and there are multiple layers of security to prevent tampering, officials said.

"The equipment operates itself," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the U.S. National Nuclear Security Administration, the agency negotiating the contract. "It's not going to be someone standing at the controls pressing buttons and flipping switches."

Hutchison's ports subsidiary said in a statement Friday from its headquarters in Hong Kong it was confident that Bahamian customs inspectors will notify U.S. authorities whenever it is appropriate.

The administration is finalizing the contract amid a national debate over maritime security sparked by the furor over now-abandoned plans by Dubai-owned DP World to take over significant operations at major U.S. ports.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (news, bio, voting record), the senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, said President Bush "needs to explain what safeguards are in place at foreign ports to assure that operators are not jeopardizing our security."

"If a port operator has been identified as posing a potential threat to national security, it is only common sense that Americans should be working on site to assure U.S. security is taken seriously," Thompson said. "If the president needs more U.S. Customs inspectors to get the job done, I'd be happy to lead the charge to get however many is needed to keep America safe."

Some security experts questioned whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States.

"Giving a no-bid contract to a foreign company to carry out the most sensitive security screening for radioactive materials at ports abroad raises many questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

A low-paid employee with access to the screening equipment could frustrate international security by studying how the equipment works and which materials set off its alarms, warned a retired U.S. Customs investigator who specialized in smuggling cases.

"Money buys a lot of things," Robert Sheridan said. "The fact that foreign workers would have access to how the United States screens various containers for nuclear material and how this technology scrutinizes the containers — all those things allow someone with a nefarious intention to thwart the screening."

The Hutchison deal in the Bahamas was flagged in a report in October by ATS Worldwide Services, a Florida firm that identifies potential risks for private-sector and government clients. Company officials said they shared the report with some officials in Congress, the military and law enforcement.

Other experts discounted concerns. They cited Hutchison's reputation as a leading ports company and said the United States inevitably must rely for some security on large commercial operators in the global maritime industry.

"We must not allow an unwarranted fear of foreign ownership or involvement in offshore operations to impair our ability to protect against nuclear weapons being smuggled into this country," said Sen. Norm Coleman (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., a member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "We must work with these foreign companies."

A former Coast Guard commander, Stephen Flynn, said foreign companies sometimes prove more trustworthy — and susceptible to U.S. influence — than governments.

DOJ_NMG_0021991

"It's a very fragile system," Flynn said. Foreign companies "recognize the U.S. has the capacity and willingness to exercise a kill switch if something goes wrong."

There are no U.S. customs agents checking any cargo containers at the Hutchison port in Freeport. Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner.

Hutchison operates the sprawling Freeport Container Port on Grand Bahama Island. Its subsidiary, Hutchison Port Holdings, has operations in more than 20 countries but none in the United States.

Contract documents obtained by AP indicate Hutchison will be paid roughly $6 million. The contract is for one year with options for three years.

The National Nuclear Security Administration, which is an Energy Department agency tasked with strengthening nuclear security worldwide, is negotiating the Bahamas contract under a $121 million program it calls the "second line of defense." Wilkes, the NNSA spokesman, said the Bahamian government dictated that the U.S. give the contract to Hutchison.

"It's their country, their port. The driver of the mobile carrier is the contractor selected by their government. We had no say or no choice," he said. "We are fortunate to have allies who are signing these agreements with us."

Some security experts said that is a weak explanation in the Bahamas, with its close reliance on the United States. The administration could insist that the Bahamas permit U.S. Customs agents to operate at the port, said Albert Santoli, an expert on national security issues in Asia and the Pacific.

"Why would they not accept that?" said Santoli, a former national security aide to Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif. "There is an interest in the Bahamas and every other country in the region to make sure the U.S. stays safe and strong. That's how this should be negotiated."

Lawmakers Seek Earlier Notice On Foreign Deals (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Congress Aims for Leverage After Dubai Ports Conflict; White House Fears Impact

WASHINGTON -- Building on their win in the Dubai ports deal, U.S. lawmakers are moving to gain leverage over a swath of foreign investments in the U.S., an effort that business leaders and President Bush's aides warn could harm the U.S. economy.

In the first serious legislative move, Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) released the summary of a bill Friday that would greatly expand the array of foreign acquisitions subject to automatic scrutiny and would require the administration to notify lawmakers as soon as it begins to review any foreign transaction. The bill also would require the administration to rank all countries according to their relations with the U.S. and their support for weapons-control deals. Approvals would then depend in part on the ranking of a company's home country.

The administration would have to report to Congress on why it approved or rejected any transaction, but the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared.

Business groups and Bush administration officials expressed immediate alarm over several provisions in the bill, which Shelby aides claim has the support of other members of the Banking Committee. In a letter to Sen. Shelby this week, seven groups representing the nation's top banks and finance companies warned that legislative proposals making the rounds of Congress "would threaten job-creation prospects for the U.S. economy" and "reduce U.S. economic growth."

David Marchick, a corporate lawyer at Covington & Burling who has just written a book on foreign investment and national security, called the Shelby measure "an extremely tough bill that reflects an incredibly difficult political environment." But he also said that the bill "risks chilling foreign investment" across a significant portion of the U.S. economy.

Beyond the Shelby bill, lawmakers have introduced more than half a dozen measures in recent weeks, all meant to alter the way the government reviews foreign mergers and acquisitions in the U.S., a job that now falls to the confidential interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., known as CFIUS. Nearly all of the measures call for notifying Congress of deals in time for lawmakers to shape the outcome of debate within the administration.

Some lawmakers, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) want to go further by giving Congress a de facto veto over administration decisions, a move the White House would stiffly oppose. The legislative action comes two weeks after congressional critics threatened to block Dubai Ports World's plan to take over management of commercial operations at five major U.S. ports. The company now promises to pull out of the U.S. market.

With lawmakers still fuming over DP World and economic nationalism running high, Congress is all but certain to pass sweeping changes to the investment-review process. In an interview, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said the Bush administration intends to "do everything we can to avoid" legislation "that tells the world that we are less welcoming of foreign capital."

The U.S. relies heavily on foreign investment. Last year, foreign direct investment in the U.S., which covers things like buildings and factories, totaled $128.63 billion, up 20% from 2004. Foreign investors annually spend tens of billions more on U.S. stocks and bonds, drawn by the stability and transparency of the nation's economy. If that cross-border flow of investments ever dried up, many economists fear the U.S. would suffer a painful economic adjustment.

The Shelby bill is intended as a compromise to head off more-draconian measures floated by other lawmakers. It proposes keeping the Treasury Department as the lead agency in the review process, while creating a vice-chairman position held by the secretary of defense. It would also require that all proposed acquisitions by state-owned foreign companies be given higher scrutiny. In a move sure to generate stiff business opposition, the bill would require immediate review of all transactions involving "critical infrastructure," including food, energy, telecommunications and computer companies and banks.

CFIUS considers dozens of cases every year, the vast majority of which concern defense contractors, which was the original intent of the 1988 law. From 1997 to 2004, the committee received 470 notifications of pending deals. Of those, only eight were given extended scrutiny -- a 45-day investigation on top of the standard 30-day review.

The White House and the business community have mobilized to fend off congressional attempts to alter the review process too dramatically. Treasury Department officials are fighting in particular to assure that the review process doesn't become politicized within Congress and that corporate proprietary information won't be leaked. As such, the administration wants to limit notification of active reviews to a small number of lawmakers.

"We want increased transparency," said House Small Business Chairman Don Manzullo (R., Ill.), one of the biggest advocates for changes to CFIUS. "There should be a way of knowing when a review is going on." But critics have strong doubts about giving lawmakers a heads-up on pending deals. They suggest a less stringent model of disclosure, such as the regular briefings provided lawmakers -- after the fact -- on antitrust cases.

Trying To Fill A Void Left By 9/11 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Rosaleen Tallon's little brother, a firefighter, died in the towers' collapse. She's fought a lonely battle in his memory ever since.

NEW YORK — Some time around 4 a.m., when Rosaleen Tallon has stretched out on a cot on the bare, freezing sidewalk, a still figure appears on the corner beside her.

He is a firefighter named O'Toole, with broad shoulders and a drooping ginger-colored mustache, and he has driven down from the Bronx to Lower Manhattan a couple of hours before his shift started. He doesn't wake her, but stands there in the dark, quietly watching to make sure she is OK.

It is Rosaleen's eighth night outside. It is a full-moon night, clear and wind-whipped, and the cold creeps up from the sidewalk through the sleeping bag and her husband's ski pants. The only sound is the rumble of the commuter rail as it comes into the World Trade Center station. She is a tiny figure, surrounded by skyscrapers.

News crews might be around the next morning, and Rosaleen could find an audience for the message she desperately wants to convey: that the Sept. 11 memorial under construction is dangerous and disgraces the memory of the people who died that day, including her brother, rookie firefighter Sean Tallon.

But at 4 a.m., the night seems endless. Pedestrian traffic has dropped off. Three supporters lie near her, clutching themselves against the cold. O'Toole wonders aloud, as he stands near the sleeping figures, what this is going to accomplish.

"They're going to make their stand, their Little Big Horn," said O'Toole, who met Rosaleen at a union rally and gives his first name as "Toolie." "They're going to get their ass kicked, and she knows it."

Rosaleen is 34, and has a 3-year-old and a 1-year-old at home. Every night, she tucks them into bed and says goodbye to her husband, a builder named Rob DeRos who described himself as "100% supportive." Then she leaves her home, a Tudor-style three-bedroom in Yonkers, and drives to a stretch of sidewalk outside Engine Company 10-Ladder Company 10 — the fire station that faces ground zero.

Sleeping outside her brother's firehouse is, she knows, an extreme measure. For months she has tried to rally broad protest against the memorial, "Reflecting Absence," in a city that is frustrated with paralysis at ground zero. Three weeks ago, intent on getting out her message, she came up with the idea of a vigil. Now, every night, outside the fire station, she warns passersby that the underground memorial could bring on a new cataclysm, trapping innocent people in the event of an attack.

"It almost makes my stomach turn thinking of people pouring into the hole, into an underground cavern," she said.

When she arrives about 10 p.m. — swathed in woolens, impossibly cheerful — a small group of well-wishers converge. A ground zero volunteer known as "Billy Cigars" presents her with a loaf of soda bread baked by his mother. Bernhard Goetz — who became known as the "subway vigilante" after shooting four would-be muggers on the train in 1987 — is chattering anxiously about the weather.

"This is overdoing it. They should have a tent. I think they should have warmer stuff. If you're going to be out like this, you should have outdoor camping stuff," said Goetz, who now operates a small company called Vigilante Electronics. "What are your thoughts on that? Isn't it a little cold to be out?

"This is crazy," he said. "Ay yi yi."

Among the regulars at ground zero is an array of missionaries and lost souls. There are also sophisticated lobbying organizations formed by families that had lost relatives on Sept. 11. Rosaleen, a stay-at-home mom whose activism before the attacks consisted of antiabortion prayer vigils, does not fall precisely into either category.

Her companion here is the Rev. Bill Minson, a former producer from Santa Monica who broke into show business in the 1960s managing a troupe of unicyclists. Minson, 56, has been a presence at ground zero for almost five years, building a following among Sept. 11 families, who have by and large adjusted to his quirks.

This week, for instance, he is on a liquid fast, subsisting on a mixture of lemon juice, water and honey, as well as regular doses of oil of oregano. He occasionally ducks into a Chinatown office building to coat his skin with olive oil, a tip he got from comedian and civil rights activist Dick Gregory, a former client, who said it would keep him from becoming dehydrated.

Rosaleen, a devout Roman Catholic and the daughter of Irish immigrants, confesses that she is leery of "the whole lemon thing." But she is steadfastly loyal to Minson. "I said, 'Bill, if this helps you in terms of talking to God, that's your business,' " she said.

Rosaleen's only sibling was in her thrall from early on. As a toddler, Sean would wander around the house looking lost if Rosaleen, three years his senior, left home for a play date. He could not get over her mastery of the button accordion or the columns of A's on her report cards. If he was going on a date, he would ask her to check his outfit.

"He was average," said her mother, Eileen Tallon. "And she loved him."

Sean Tallon, 26, was in the firehouse when the first plane crashed into the north tower. The firefighters went out to the street, where debris was raining down from a black sky, and rushed around the corner to the building's lobby. The Tallon family later saw footage shot there by a French filmmaker. Sean, said his mother, "had a very sad, worried face on him. He was so worried-looking that it rips you down inside."

He was on the 30th floor when the tower collapsed. His body was found two weeks later with a cluster of civilians and firefighters; the firefighters had apparently tried to protect the civilians with their gear. A steel beam had fallen on his head, crushing it.

Sean's death sent Rosaleen outside the previous boundaries of her life. She thrust herself into political activism: The family attempted to sue the city and Motorola Inc. over radios that did not transmit an evacuation order to firefighters. (The suit was

Rosaleen also brought a complaint — shared by many in the fire department — to the Lower Manhattan Development Commission, entrusted with building the Sept. 11 memorial. She said that the memorial should list rescue workers separately from other victims, because, unlike the others, they "gave their lives so the innocent men and women whom the terrorists targeted might be saved."

The designer, Michael Arad, disagreed, saying the list of the dead should evoke the day's randomness.

It was at a meeting to discuss the issue that Rosaleen set eyes on a model of "Reflecting Absence," selected by a jury two years ago after a painstaking review of 5,201 entries. At that moment, she forgot about the names.

The design centers on two "voids" on the towers' footprints, and requires visitors to descend past curtains of water to underground plazas that give a view of the towers' foundations. The jury praised the design for "letting absence speak for itself." But Rosaleen was appalled that it would be underground. She had imagined a monument glistening in the sun. "Reflecting Absence" made her think of falling, of the people who fell.

Hers is not a popular argument in New York right now. Late last year, Sept. 11 families succeeded in scuttling a proposal for the International Freedom Center, whose exhibits were intended to delineate "freedom's evolution." Its critics said that the exhibits might dishonor the site with unpatriotic messages.

New Yorkers began to say what they had not said before: that certain Sept. 11 families were obstructing progress at ground zero and should step aside. New York magazine put a group on the cover with the headline "The Bullies of Ground Zero."

If there is a point of consensus, it is that the hole has gaped here too long. With plans to rebuild office buildings at a deadlock over financing, "Reflecting Absence" is the only plan that seems to be moving forward. On March 13, construction workers began, without fanfare, clearing gravel off the space where the buildings once stood.

Rosaleen knows the odds of halting construction are long. She was unsuccessful, she said, when she tried to rally families behind an aboveground monument. Although the Coalition of 9/11 Families has filed a lawsuit against the development commission to stop construction, it is for another reason: Because "Reflecting Absence" alters the historic footprints of the towers.

As for ordinary New Yorkers, Rosaleen said, "They are 9/11'd out. I am too."

But the passion keeps rising up in her. She glows every time a sympathetic pedestrian comes by to talk to her. She is heartened by her new website and by the 8,500 people who have signed a petition calling for an aboveground memorial.

There are times when the vigil itself gives her a feeling of great clarity.

After a few nights outside, she was feeling so miserably guilty about leaving her children that she went to Toys "R" Us to buy them gifts. She was in the parking lot when she was flooded with the conviction that she should go forward. At the fire station, the feeling returns to her.

"I feel like I have a connection to that spot," she said. "I can feel him leaving there, going up. He went and he faced the worst you can face. He would have been so nervous. This would have been his first real fire. I think of him and what he faced that day, and I could do anything. I could face any kind of ridicule. You feel an amazing strength. What people have factored out … is the strength of the souls that have gone out of there."

At other times, she is pierced by sadness, by how far she has drifted from normal.

Not long ago, she was walking through the A&P supermarket to pick up lemons for Minson's mixture. All around her, women pushed carts full of cereal and vegetables and hamburger meat, ordinary food for ordinary families.

"I felt like, 'Everyone here is normal, and I'm on this strange journey,' " she said. At this thought, her cheerful expression went to pieces; she began to cry, homesick for that old life.

It is after midnight on Liberty Street when five people hold hands in a circle. Minson — on Day 12 without solid food — thanks God for giving them "hearts with fire in them." A garbage collector, Andrew Macchio, stands on the corner and sings "Amazing Grace" in a resonant, operatic tenor before leaving to catch the last train home.

Then the streets are empty. The protesters sit on folding chairs and chat about Osama bin Laden and Minson's snoring. Dominick DeRubbio, 20, who lost his uncle, a firefighter, on Sept. 11, holds up a can of Budweiser and proposes a toast to "all the people behind us."

At 1:53 a.m., Rosaleen lies down on her cot and burrows into her sleeping bag. The temperature has dropped to freezing.

Sally Regenhard, whose firefighter son, Christian, also died in the World Trade Center, fishes out a black fur coat from a bag of used clothing and lays it carefully on top of Rosaleen. There is no movement, no conversation. Foul-smelling steam rises out of a nearby sewer vent. Minson, wrapped like a mummy in his sleeping bag, snores steadily.

Rosaleen often does not sleep at all, she said, but lies there with her mind racing.

It's like she has two angels whispering in her ears; "one a planner," she said, and "one a doubter." How many signatures would she get on the petition tomorrow? What will she say to the TV cameras? Is there any point to this at all?

Sometimes she has the feeling that this is it — her last big push. Minson plans to leave New York in the fall and travel south to minister to Hurricane Katrina victims. The time is coming, Rosaleen thinks, when she too will no longer be on a mission.

Already, she feels some of the burden lifted.

"I will someday let it all go. There comes a point in time when you have put forth your fight, and that's the best you can do and you can be proud of it," she said.

At about 4:30, delivery trucks roll into the streets around ground zero, and Wall Street Journals slap down in doorways. The first few customers tug open the door at Charly's on Trinity Place, where a tray of blueberry muffins, crusted with sugar, has been delivered. Just before 6 a.m., the streetlights flicker off.

Rosaleen will drive back to Yonkers and the warm bodies of her sleeping children, who may or may not know that she was gone.

By this time, the sky is pale blue and luminous. Light reflects from thousands of mirrored windows onto windows opposite, reflecting and reflecting until it tips into the great hole.

Spitzer Assails Leadership In Ground Zero Stalemate (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a candidate for governor, expressed concern last night that the Freedom Tower project at ground zero lacked "economic viability" and could turn into "a white elephant."

Mr. Spitzer suggested that, as New York's next governor, he would move more swiftly than Gov. George E. Pataki in rebuilding Lower Manhattan.

In his most expansive comments to date about ground zero, which were made during an interview on NY1 News, Mr. Spitzer said that Mr. Pataki, if anyone, deserved blame for "a failure of leadership" that has led to disputes and over plans for the 9/11 site. In turn, he also tacitly defended Larry A. Silverstein, the ground zero developer, who has been accused by Pataki allies of delaying work there out of greed.

"I think it's too bad that people are pointing the finger at one individual and saying he's at fault — if anybody's responsible, it's the governor," said Mr. Spitzer, who is leading in polls for the Democratic nomination. "The governor must be in a position to demonstrate leadership, get everybody to agree upon a plan."

By contrast, Mr. Spitzer said, "If I'm governor, on January 1, we will put ourselves in a room if this issue isn't resolved and we will get it resolved so quickly that people will say, 'Wow, what happened?' "

Mr. Spitzer raised particular doubts about plans for the Freedom Tower, the symbolic centerpiece of the site, given the challenges of finding tenants and ensuring security and the disputes about the cost and insurance money for the tower.

"I certainly think that there's a very serious question about the economic viability of the Freedom Tower," Mr. Spitzer said. "The prospect that the Freedom Tower would be built and would sit there vacant — as essentially a white elephant — that would sap the entire cash available to build the other buildings, is something that is very problematic."

Mr. Spitzer stopped short of seconding Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg's call for a sizable residential component at ground zero. But he did indicate that he might try to reorder the sequence of new buildings at the site, which will include towers and a memorial that commemorates the 9/11 attack.

Mr. Spitzer rarely makes direct, or critical, comparisons between himself and Mr. Pataki, who is stepping down this fall after three terms.

David M. Catalfamo, a spokesman for Governor Pataki, replied to Mr. Spitzer's remarks by noting the political environment.

"It must be campaign season, because it's the first time that I've heard Eliot Spitzer mention the words 'ground zero' in four years," Mr. Catalfamo said.

Mr. Spitzer answered a range of questions during the half-hour interview. He disclosed that he voted for Michael S. Dukakis for president in 1988 and would have preferred that Mr. Dukakis, a former governor of Massachusetts, as president instead of George H. W. Bush.

William F. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, had characterized Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Dukakis as big-government Democrats in a speech on Thursday; Mr. Weld himself is a former governor of Massachusetts.

In response to Mr. Spitzer's remark, Mr. Weld said last night, "I'm not at all surprised that Mr. Spitzer voted for Governor Dukakis, as they both appear to embrace the 'nanny state' approach to government."

Mr. Spitzer also ruled out attacking Mr. Weld over his leadership at Decker College, a bankrupt Kentucky trade school that is now under federal investigation for alleged financial aid fraud. "It's not relevant to me," Mr. Spitzer said.

Red Cross Fires Administrators In New Orleans (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

In a major shake-up of its relief operations in New Orleans, the American Red Cross dismissed two key supervisors yesterday as part of a wide-ranging inquiry into the improper diversion of relief supplies after Hurricane Katrina, a Red Cross official said.

The supervisors — volunteers, as are 95 percent of Red Cross personnel — were in charge of the organization's kitchens and shelters, which have assisted tens of thousands of the hurricane's victims.

The move came a day after the interim president of the Red Cross said the organization was investigating accusations of impropriety, including possible criminal activity.

"We have relieved certain volunteers of their duties in connection with our investigation," said a senior Red Cross official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the actions.

Three volunteers currently working in the area identified one of the officials who was dismissed as Patrick Keena, the senior official responsible for the organization's food and shelter operations in the disaster area. They said he was fired early yesterday.

The identity of the other dismissed supervisor could not be determined.

Mr. Keena, who has been affiliated with the Red Cross for 25 years, told volunteers in the disaster area that he was leaving because of a medical emergency.

He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Several volunteers who had served in the area complained over the last four months that Mr. Keena had ignored Red Cross rules, overridden efforts to establish procedures to keep track of relief supplies and interfered with internal investigations into the diversion of supplies.

Two volunteers assigned by Red Cross national headquarters last fall to look into those and other accusations of wrongdoing urged the removal of Mr. Keena and other senior managers in a report they filed with senior organization officials on Dec. 5.

A second supervisor, Jill Paul, who was in charge of the kitchens where meals were prepared for delivery to the needy, told volunteers yesterday that she had elected to leave the operation, several volunteers said. But it could not be determined if Ms. Paul was the second worker ordered out of the area.

She could not be reached for comment.

Teala Brewer, a former Secret Service agent who is the Red Cross's director of ethics and compliance, was in New Orleans yesterday with volunteers who had pointed out problems.

One of the accusations they are investigating is that supervisors in charge of the kitchens have been ordering more food than is needed, raising questions about where the extra food is going.

In one case highlighted by the volunteers, Ms. Paul recommended sending 1,500 meals a day into the New Orleans neighborhood of Bywater because residents had only limited access to utilities, potable water and a small convenience store.

Eight days after she filed her recommendation, volunteers assigned to go street by street in Bywater to estimate the number of meals needed said they came up with an assessment of only 500 meals needed on the route every day.

"They found that not only did a great portion of the route have full utilities, they also had a major grocery store up and running and public transportation," said a volunteer who had seen their report but requested anonymity because she said she had been physically threatened by a supervisor. "Much of the area was back to pre-Katrina, and the rest of it was so bad that no one was living in it."

Volunteers delivering meals said investigators from national headquarters had been trailing them over the last week and interviewing people living along their routes.

The interim president of the Red Cross, John F. McGuire, acknowledged this week that the organization was investigating accusations that relief supplies had been improperly diverted and that procedures for tracking inventory had been ignored.

Initially, according to those raising such concerns, their warnings were ignored.

In fact, Jerome H. Nickerson Jr. and Michael A. Wolters, who wrote the report recommending that the supervisors in New Orleans be removed, said they were relieved of their responsibilities.

Mr. Nickerson, a Maryland lawyer, said his name disappeared from the Red Cross database of trained disaster volunteers, and Mr. Wolters, a security guard, said his local chapter was told that he was forbidden from entering disaster areas on orders of the Red Cross's general counsel.

"When I first came out of New Orleans, I couldn't sleep for about a month because I just couldn't figure out why people weren't moving on this," Mr. Nickerson said yesterday. "But now people are paying attention, and the people who were doing this bad stuff are being called to account."

According to Red Cross publications, Mr. Keena has assisted with disaster response for the last 12 of his 25 years as a volunteer, working at 26 major disasters. The Colorado Springs Gazette reported last year that Mr. Keena, whose wife is in the Air Force, worked at the Double Eagle Casino in Cripple Creek, Colo.

The Gazette said Mr. Keena volunteered at the local Pikes Peak Chapter of the Red Cross, but Paul Koch, the financial director there, said yesterday that he did not know Mr. Keena.

Mr. Keena was on an elite team of paid Red Cross volunteers, known as temporary disaster reserves, who have extensive experience in disaster relief work. They are called out at the onset of an emergency and paid because they are needed for an extended period.

Red Cross Probes Katrina Misconduct, Theft (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, March 25, 2006

Pressed by Congress, the American Red Cross said Friday it is investigating claims that volunteers engaged in widespread theft in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"Any conduct that violates either the law or Red Cross code of conduct is not tolerated," said spokesman Chuck Connor, adding that any criminal wrongdoing uncovered by the group's conduct and ethics office will be turned over to law enforcement officials.

Allegations of wrongdoing go far beyond what the statement said were "inevitable ... departures from standard procedures" after such a catastrophe, according to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, has said volunteers may have committed criminal fraud. The accusations include improperly diverting relief supplies and violating Red Cross rules by using felons as volunteers in the disaster area. Grassley has threatened to rewrite or revoke the organization's charter if it does not overhaul its operations.

In a statement Friday, Grassley said he hopes the Red Cross' investigation will embrace whistleblowers and provide a top-to-bottom review of the group's leadership, oversight and openness.

Especially worrying, Grassley said, was the Red Cross' failure to take seriously the concerns of volunteers reporting the thefts "until I drew attention to them."

"The Red Cross needs to change its mind-set so it addresses volunteers' concerns swiftly and appropriately, regardless of whether a Senate committee chairman is asking questions," Grassley said.

The New York Times reported Friday that more than a dozen Red Cross volunteers described an organization that had few cost controls, little oversight of its inventory and no system of basic background checks for its volunteers.

The volunteers cited little direct evidence of criminal activity, but the magnitude of the missing goods had convinced them that the operations were being manipulated for private gain.

In one case, a kitchen manager swapped 300 prepared meals for parking spaces for Red Cross emergency response vehicles without creating any record of the transaction.

The Red Cross had 235,000 volunteers working in the Katrina disaster area, nearly six times the previous peak of 40,000. The sheer number collapsed the normal vetting process, the volunteers said.

The charity has said it responded to Katrina the best it could in circumstances almost unimaginable, while acknowledging that it stumbled in "technology, logistics and coordination."

That admission was not good enough for Grassley, who said he is set to meet next week with American Red Cross board of governors chairwoman Bonnie McElveen-Hunter.

"I hope to understand better what the timeline is for a complete review and reforms," Grassley said.

The inquiry comes after the Red Cross has seen two presidents resign in a little more than four years. Both resignations came after clashes with the board of governors on the tail of major disasters: Dr. Bernadine Healy stepped down shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks and, more recently, Marsha Evans quit following Hurricane Katrina.

Army Corps Is Faulted On New Orleans Levees (WP)

By Joby Warrick And Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Panel Says Studies Foresaw Failure, Urges New Scrutiny

An organization of civil engineers yesterday questioned the soundness of large portions of New Orleans's levee system, warning that the city's federally designed flood walls were not built to standards stringent enough to protect a large city.

The group faulted the agency responsible for the levees, the Army Corps of Engineers, for adopting safety standards that were "too close to the margin" to protect human life. It also called for an urgent reexamination of the entire levee system, saying there are no assurances that the miles of concrete "I-walls" in New Orleans will hold up against even a moderate hurricane.

"The ability of any I-wall in New Orleans to withstand . . . is unknown," said the American Society of Civil Engineers' External Review Panel, which was appointed to oversee the Corps investigation of the levee system's collapse during Hurricane Katrina.

The civil engineers group also rejected the explanation given by the Corps that the system had failed because Katrina had unleashed "unforeseeable" physical forces that weakened the flood walls. In a letter to Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, the Corps' commander, the civil engineers cited three previous Corps studies that predicted precisely the chain of events that caused the city's 17th Street Canal flood wall to fail. The breach left much of central and downtown New Orleans underwater.

"It appears that this information never triggered an assessment . . . neither at the time of the design of the 17th Street Canal flood wall, nor following its construction," the letter said.

Corps officials said they had already taken steps to address problems identified in the letter, starting with an effort to replace miles of I-walls with sturdier structures. But agency officials insisted the Corps was not solely to blame for weaknesses in the system.

"We have done the best things we could have done. We live here," spokeswoman Susan J. Jackson said. During four decades of levee-building in New Orleans, Jackson said, the agency frequently found its hands tied because of restrictions imposed by budgets, by Congress or by local governments that often failed to meet financial responsibilities to help build and maintain the levees. Jackson added: "It was a question of who was going to pay, and how much."

The American Society of Civil Engineers panel is one of three independent teams investigating the failure of the New Orleans levees, and until now it has been the most cautious in its public criticisms. The other investigating teams quickly endorsed its findings.

"We agree that every single foot of the I-walls is suspect," said Ivor van Heerden, leader of a Louisiana-appointed team of engineers. "When asked, we have constantly urged anyone returning to New Orleans to exercise caution, because the system now in place could fail in a Category 2 storm. It has already failed during a fast-moving Category 3 storm that missed New Orleans by 30 miles."

Two weeks ago, the Corps proposed a new theory for why the 17th Street Canal flood wall collapsed on Aug. 29, despite never being overtopped by Katrina's floodwaters. Whereas previous investigations had pointed to weak soils beneath the flood wall, new data suggested a combination of factors: First, the force of rising floodwaters inside the canal bent the walls outward, creating a small gap between the walls and their earthen foundation. Then, water surged into the gap, pressing the walls further until they broke through a layer of weak soil piled up against the sides. In effect, the levee was sliced in half along its ridge.

Corps officials initially said they had never known a levee to fail this way, and they suggested that no one could have predicted it. But the civil engineers panel said yesterday that the failure was foreseen by the Corps' own studies, dating to the mid-1980s. It said the Corps' failure to anticipate the problem reflected an "overall pattern of engineering judgment inconsistent with that required for critical structures."

Throughout the design process, the civil engineers said, the Corps consistently failed to make the kinds of conservative judgments necessary when working in an environment where the soils are notoriously unstable and the stakes, as measured in human lives, are high.

"These findings present significant implications for current and future safety offered by levees, flood walls and control structures in New Orleans, and perhaps elsewhere," the letter to Strock said.

The civil engineers panel is due to release a formal report on its findings in two weeks, but its members chose to send the letter to Strock separately, citing the "gravity and potential impact" of their findings.

Whoriskey reported from New Orleans.

Thanks For Nothing, Texans Say (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Gulf Coast residents are seeing life return to normal after Hurricane Rita, but they give little credit to the federal government.

PORT ARTHUR, Texas — Sitting on a sheet of fresh plywood atop a newly rebuilt roof, Joaquin Rojas thanked the heavens for all the help he was receiving to repair his El Buen Pastor church after Hurricane Rita.

The pastor was not praising the generosity of President Bush and other Washington politicians.

Rather, he was expressing gratitude that good-hearted fellow Christians from Michigan traveled to Texas and volunteered to piece his broken church back together.

"What's happening here is because of other churches, not because of the government," Rojas said in Spanish. "Those missionaries from Michigan, I thank the Lord for them."

Six months after Hurricane Rita delivered a second wallop to a Gulf Coast region already socked by Hurricane Katrina, life is slowly but surely returning to normal in the blue-collar oil and gas towns of southeastern Texas, where more than 70,000 houses were damaged or destroyed by 120-mph winds.

But even here in the president's home state, in a region densely populated by energy and petrochemical industries with warm ties to the White House, consensus is that progress is being made in spite of the federal government, not because of it. Dissatisfaction with what is seen as a heartless Bush administration recovery effort is widespread.

"We need some compassionate conservatism," said Mark Viator, a chemical company official who is chairman of the Southeast Texas Recovery Coalition, a group of area leaders that has been lobbying Washington for assistance.

Some Texas officials are convinced the state has become a victim of hurricane politics, and said White House officials might be neglecting Texas for fear that helping the state would raise accusations of favoritism.

Others complain that Republicans in Congress and in the Bush administration, many of them Texans, have taken a rigid ideological stand against compensating hurricane losses not covered by insurance, including millions that utilities have spent to restore basic water and electricity.

"Make no mistake about it: They don't care about you, and they don't care about what is happening in our communities," said Chester R. Jourdan Jr., executive director of the Southeast Texas Regional Planning Commission. Jourdan made his comments at a public meeting last week less than two hours after returning from a fruitless lobbying trip to the nation's capital.

"This went on deaf ears in D.C., deaf ears. One of the biggest challenges we have is the administration," he said.

Federal officials counter that the truth is more mundane: Compared with the calamity Katrina caused in Mississippi and Louisiana, Rita's toll on Texas is smaller and commands less attention, especially because the state is well on the road to recovery.

"I don't think the perception of being an afterthought is really true," said Dianne Coghlan, the Federal Emergency Management Agency's senior official in southeast Texas. "I hate to compare it to other states, but if you look at what we have done here, we have clearly made major strides."

Many in Texas are particularly upset by the lack of federal funding flowing into the Lone Star State compared with Louisiana and Mississippi.

Texas politicians note that just across the state line, parts of rural Louisiana also hit hard by Rita have received more money.

And Texas officials say that a state that opened its doors to half a million hurricane evacuees from Louisiana and Mississippi — and is still housing more than 400,000 — should be better reimbursed for its effort.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) recently angered Texas officials when he said that Texas was not entitled to repayment for merely "being a good neighbor."

His words apparently represented the feeling of many on Capitol Hill. A recent request for $2 billion in aid by Texas' governor, Republican Rick Perry, is going nowhere, according to some of its backers.

"I know the administration has a tremendous burden responding to the enormity of this disaster, and everyone acknowledges that Louisiana and Mississippi took the worst hit. But I think what is happening in Texas is not fair," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas), one of the most aggressive supporters of the state's case.

"The administration acknowledges we are getting $4,000 per pupil when it costs $6,000 to $7,000 to educate a child. It's just frustrating that we have not been able to get across the point that this is a new kind of crisis," she said.

While Texas politicians continue to complain about aid and reimbursement, FEMA officials rattle off statistics to show that Texas has made progress more quickly than other hurricane-damaged states.

Rita's winds reportedly felled 25% of trees in some heavily wooded parts of eastern Texas. But 99% of the debris has been cleaned up.

Of the 4,500 Texans who requested temporary trailers, 3,880 have received them. Blue tarps have been installed on 21,000 damaged homes. The federal Small Business Administration has provided Texans with $157 million in loans, and FEMA has spent close to $500 million assisting individuals.

In contrast to much of Louisiana, FEMA officials contend, Texas has advanced from the initial crisis stage of hurricane relief since the storm made landfall near the Sabine Pass on Sept. 24, and the state is on the path to long-term recovery.

Some residents agree. "Things are almost back to normal. I see business bouncing back," said Carlton Jackson, a 41-year-old construction worker, as he loaded some pipes into his truck last week to finish repairs on his home in Beaumont.

Yet local officials report sluggish progress. They express concerns that long-term housing shortages and high electricity bills from utilities looking to recoup hurricane costs could cripple a Texas Gulf Coast region that accounts for about a quarter of the nation's oil refining capacity.

"We are strategically very important to this country," said Everett "Bo" Alfred, a commissioner in Jefferson County, an area of 250,000 people that includes the city of Beaumont. "You think gasoline prices are high now? Just wait to see what happens if we get hit with another hurricane. We've been depleted."

Joe Hopkins, mayor of Vidor, is still recovering from broken ribs he suffered when he tumbled out of a tree that had fallen on a constituent's home.

The Fire Department serving this community of 11,000, which is home to many refinery employees, is still working out of temporary buildings resembling Quonset huts across the street from City Hall.

"We have an opportunity for people to get back to work. I'd say 80% of businesses have help-wanted [advertisements], but we don't have places for people to stay," Hopkins said. "Our grandchildren are going to be paying for this."

At the El Buen Pastor church in Port Arthur, Rojas maintains a more positive outlook. He and most of his 120 parishioners evacuated en masse to San Antonio when Rita roared toward Texas' coast. They returned days later to find the church soaked in water, its roof torn off.

Damage was extensive, but the church is close to being repaired because of the largesse of volunteer workers.

Rojas, 51, said he received $2,000 from FEMA immediately after the storm, and was grateful for it. But he said he understood that the real rebuilding assistance would have to come from the religious community, not the government.

"The government is the government," said Dina Lozano, Rojas' sister-in-law. From his newly rebuilt rooftop, Rojas sipped bottled water and nodded in agreement.

Houstonians Evacuee-weary, Poll Says (HC)

Houston Chronicle, March 25, 2006

While residents are proud of city's response, they feel a growing 'strain'

Amid growing concern about the city's homicide rate and overburdened social services, a new poll finds Houstonians increasingly weary and wary of the 150,000 Louisiana evacuees who landed here after fleeing Hurricane Katrina.

Three-quarters of Harris County residents surveyed by Rice University sociologist Stephen Klineberg say the influx of Katrina evacuees, many of whom remain seven months after landfall, has put a "considerable strain" on the Houston community.

Additionally, two-thirds say evacuees bear responsibility for "a major increase in violent crime," and twice as many local residents believe Houston will be "worse off" rather than "better off" if most evacuees remain here permanently.

The preliminary results of Klineberg's annual survey, which is expected to be finalized later this month, suggest that a sizable fraction of area residents have tired of their guests from New Orleans.

"These results reflect what I'm hearing from my constituents," said U.S. Rep. John Culberson, R-Houston. "I think the percentage of people unhappy with the deadbeats from New Orleans would be larger but for the big hearts of Houstonians who want these folks to get back on their feet, as I do."

Houston Mayor Bill White, who along with Harris County Judge Robert Eckels led efforts to welcome and shelter evacuees, acknowledged the increased strains on city services, notably crime and traffic management.

"People are of two minds on this issue," White said. "They are proud of the competence that Houston showed in responding to Americans in need. But they are also aware that it's not a disaster for nothing. There's a big job that the evacuees and the host community have in getting people on their feet, employed and looking to the future."

Culberson said the sentiment is much stronger, at least in his district (which includes west Houston, the Texas Medical Center and much of western and northwestern Harris County). He said his constituents are concerned about rising crime and no longer want to house New Orleanians who choose to rely on social services.

"If they can work, but won't work, ship 'em back," he said. "If they cause problems in the schools, if they commit crime, there ought to be a one-strike rule — ship 'em back."

Although Culberson said he has been trying to attach such a provision to pending legislation, it's unclear how such an idea could be implemented.

"Whatever we want to do, these are American citizens, and they can stay here if they want," said Eckels. "The difference is, when they're here and they get into trouble, there are consequences. They put up with a lot of things in New Orleans that we don't put up with here."

Generous responseHouston arguably had the most generous response to Katrina's devastation. Largely because of White, and the need to empty evacuees from shelters and area hotels, Houston launched a federally reimbursed program to provide 12 months of apartment housing and utilities to anyone from an area affected by Katrina or Rita. About 80,000 Louisiana residents were housed by the program.

It became so popular that evacuees from Louisiana who initially landed elsewhere flocked to Houston. Just before Houston stopped enrolling evacuees in mid-December, three-quarters of applicants for the housing program had been in the area for three days or less.

Houston clearly still feels good about its initial generosity after the storm, when 60,000 residents flooded Reliant Park to help in any way they could, and the positive publicity it generated around the country. According to the survey, 97 percent of respondents agreed that Houston "really came together" to assist evacuees.

"People are very proud of the first phase, when Houston opened its doors," Klineberg said. "I've never had a question where there's been 97 percent agreement. That's real, and that's a reflection of a remarkable month and a half when Houston poured its heart out."

Crime on people's mindsKlineberg has conducted his survey annually since 1982. He surveyed 765 Harris County residents in late February, and the results have a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

For the first time since 1999, he said, most people now say crime is the city's biggest problem, topping such issues as traffic.

Additionally, there are more requests for public help from the medically uninsured and city health officials have added staff to deal with an increased number of sexually transmitted diseases attributed to evacuees.

Still, Klineberg believes the problems associated with evacuees will fade over time as 150,000 Louisianans return home or melt into the greater Houston area's 5.6 million people.

In studies of civic engagement — which measure such things as participation in civic clubs — Houston generally scores well below other cities, Klineberg said. We spend more time in our cars and less time in collective activities.

But the outpouring after Katrina may represent a new Houston, a collective action and a sense of shared responsibility.

"Houston has always been for individualism," he said. "After Katrina we had this moment of extraordinary civic engagement, and I think that's what's going to remain with us. I may be overly optimistic, but that's what I really believe."

Evacuees' view differs

Angelo Edwards, vice president of the ACORN Katrina Survivors Association, said he and others have sensed some resentment from local residents. Locals will grumble about the free housing and the money given out initially after the storm, Edwards said, asking why, if it's good enough for people from another state, it's not good enough for us?

"We're definitely seeing it," he said. "But no one is saying anything about Florida, after they have hurricanes there, and San Francisco, where they have earthquakes."

Edwards also fears that tensions between school-age children from Houston and Louisiana could "boil over" once the school year ends and there are fewer structured activities during the day.

"I'm not saying it will happen, but this is something that's ripe for conflict," he said.

Will tensions subside?But another local official, Harris County Tax Assessor-Collector Paul Bettencourt, agreed with Klineberg's view that tensions would probably subside with time.

Texas has better resources and a better criminal-justice system than Louisiana, Bettencourt said.

"Eventually what happens is you clean up all the bad apples," he said. "We're not going to get another wave of bad apples. We're just going to have to clean up whatever problems local government in Louisiana had been ignoring, like B-Stupid, and we'll do that." (His reference was to Ivory "B-Stupid" Harris, an evacuee suspected in New Orleans and Houston homicides, who was arrested last week after a major manhunt in both cities.)

Bettencourt is optimistic for another reason — tax receipts are up. Sales taxes have averaged double-digit increases, he said, housing prices are up, and evacuees have attracted some $150 million in loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration.

Looking aheadThe evacuees who crowded into the Reliant Astrodome may have been more visible, he said, but there have been just as many residents from New Orleans who bought homes and are actively contributing to the economy.

A political science professor at the University of Houston, Richard Murray, said he did not believe the current opinions on evacuees would ultimately harm the political fortunes of White and Eckels. They have a handy scapegoat, he said: the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"These politicos will probably raise hell with the feds for not fully reimbursing us," Murray said, "and that will tend to deflect a lot of the flak."

Indeed, during an interview for this article, without being asked, White expressed his concern about needing more federal funding for crime and housing, noting that Houston was "on the front lines of our nations's response to a national disaster."

Hurricane Donation Benefited Bush Son (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Barbara Bush required that some of her gift be spent on software from Neil Bush's Texas firm.

HOUSTON — In a city housing thousands of Katrina evacuees, Barbara Bush's donation to a local hurricane relief fund normally would not seem controversial.

But more than a few eyebrows were raised when the former first lady stipulated that part of her contribution was to be spent on educational software purchased from her son Neil's company, Ignite Learning of Austin, Texas.

"I would think if she wants to do something beneficial for Katrina victims, she shouldn't be making the decision that the vendor is her son," said Daniel Borochoff, president of the American Institute of Philanthropy, a charity watchdog group. "Other education experts need to be making that decision, not somebody who has a family interest in the success of her son's business."

Barbara Bush's donation to the Bush-Clinton Houston Hurricane Relief Fund was made a few weeks ago, said Steve Maislin, president of the Greater Houston Community Foundation, which administers the fund. That fund, which supports Houston-area relief efforts, is not connected to the national Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund, he said.

The Houston fund forwarded Bush's donation to another nonprofit organization, which bought the software.

"There are a lot of students who went through Katrina and Rita in the Houston area, and she wanted to do something very specific to help them," Jean Becker, chief of staff for former President George H.W. Bush, said of Barbara Bush.

"She is a huge fan of her son's software program — it has gotten great reviews from teachers and students — and she wanted to make sure it was available to the students."

Maislin would not disclose the amount of the donation, but he said it was not unusual for a contributor to specify how his or her money should be spent.

"It's common for someone to say: 'I want to give money, but I want it to go to a certain organization,' " he said.

But Borochoff said donors who direct that their money be used to buy products from a family business set a bad precedent.

"If everybody started doing that, it would ruin our whole system for tax-exempt organizations, because people would be using them to benefit their business rather than for the public benefit. That's not why our government gives tax deductions for donations," he said. "I hope other donors across the country don't start dictating that their contributions go to their family business. That would be a rip-off of our tax system."

Bush contributed to the relief fund instead of directly to her son's company to help publicize the nonprofit, Maislin said. "It helps us when someone with her visibility contributes. We could advertise the fact … and help build momentum" for donations.

Russians Helped Iraq, Study Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Papers Show Hussein Was Tipped Off About U.S. Strategy During Invasion

Russian officials collected intelligence on U.S. troop movements and attack plans from inside the American military command leading the 2003 invasion of Iraq and passed that information to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, according to a U.S. military study released yesterday.

The intelligence reports, which the study said were provided to Hussein through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad at the height of the U.S. assault, warned accurately that American formations intended to bypass Iraqi cities on their thrust toward Baghdad. The reports provided some specific numbers on U.S. troops, units and locations, according to Iraqi documents dated March and April 2003 and later captured by the United States.

"The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible, and that they have changed their tactic," said one captured Iraqi document titled "Letter from Russian Official to Presidential Secretary Concerning American Intentions in Iraq" and dated March 25, 2003.

A Russian official at the United Nations strongly rejected the allegations that Russian officials gave information to Baghdad. "This is absolutely nonsense," said Maria Zakharova, a spokeswoman for the Russian mission to the United Nations. She said the allegations were never presented to the Russian government before being issued to the news media.

Russia was among the nations opposed to the U.S. war with Iraq. Russian President Vladimir Putin warned on the eve of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 that an American attack would have grave consequences. He urged Washington to resolve its conflicts with Baghdad peacefully.

The study gives no indication who the alleged sources inside the U.S. Central Command might have been, or whether American officials believe the Kremlin authorized the transfer of information to Hussein's government.

The Central Command, which oversees military operations in the Middle East and is headquartered in Tampa, did not respond to requests for comment. A State Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

The U.S. military and defense officials who released the study said the revelations about Russia in the captured documents came as a surprise. They said they believe the captured Iraqi documents are authentic.

"Certainly, sure, I was surprised," said Army Brig. Gen. Anthony A. Cucolo III, director of the Joint Center for Operational Analysis and Lessons Learned under the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk. He said he thinks the alleged Russian intelligence-sharing was linked to Moscow's commercial interests in Iraq. "Essentially, it's driven by economic interests," he told reporters at the Pentagon. "I don't see it as an aberration. I see it as a follow-on to economic engagement." Retired Lt. Col. Kevin M. Woods, the project director, said he has "no reason to doubt the Iraqi documents."

The 210-page study, called the Iraqi Perspectives Project, draws on declassified information from an internal U.S. military report that was based on the examination of more than half a million files of Iraqi documents and dozens of interviews with former senior Iraqi military and political leaders. Some of that information remains classified.

The study offers little analysis of the consequences for the U.S. military of the alleged Russian-supplied intelligence, which was received by what the study depicts as a hopelessly confused Iraqi chain of command.

One document, for example, was sent to Hussein as rumors swirled in Baghdad that the main American military push would come not from the south -- as it in fact did -- but through Jordan into western Iraq, a misperception that U.S. Special Forces units operating throughout the western desert were seeking to create.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the study says, citing the March 25 document.

Another captured Iraqi document, dated April 2, 2003, said Russian intelligence had reported to Hussein more detailed and potentially damaging information: The Americans had their heaviest concentration of forces, 12,000 troops and 1,000 vehicles, near the Iraqi city of Karbala and were moving to cut off Baghdad.

In fact, the Army's 3rd Infantry Division and other U.S. forces at the time were making a precarious move through a narrow strip of land known as the Karbala Gap, where they anticipated major resistance from the Iraqi Republican Guard and possible chemical or biological weapons attacks.

One senior Republican Guard commander, Raad Majid Rashid al-Hamdani, issued a warning in line with the Russian intelligence when he told Hussein's son Qusay that the main U.S. attack was coming past Karbala. But Hamdani was largely ignored by Qusay Hussein and other generals, to his dismay, he told the authors of the study while describing the internal debates in an interview. "It was the kind of arguments that I imagine took place in Hitler's bunker in Berlin. Were all these men on drugs?" he said.

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, said the passing of information on U.S. troop movements during combat, if true, constituted "a stark betrayal." He added: "I think we should be demanding a fairly clear explanation from Moscow."

But Celeste A. Wallander, director of the Russia and Eurasia program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said that although Russia probably had intelligence on U.S. war plans, she is skeptical that the Kremlin would have ordered that it be passed to Hussein's government.

It is more likely that a "freelancing" Russian official such as the ambassador in Baghdad personally shuttled the information, she said.

"If it were the case that the Kremlin had approved passing along what the Russian military knew about American war planning, that would be extraordinary," Wallander said.

"If it were ordered, it would be a direct action that would in effect help another country to use more effectively their military forces against U.S. forces."

U.S. Inquiry Finds Russians Passed Spy Data To Iraq In '03 (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — Captured Iraqi documents describe a Russian spy operation that was aimed at the United States Central Command in the early days of the American invasion of Iraq in 2003, according to a new American military report. The report says information on war plans and troop movements was passed through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

Revelation of the operation, contained in the public version of a Joint Forces Command classified study, the Iraqi Perspectives Project, may have more political than military significance because American forces overwhelmed the underequipped and poorly led Iraqi Army to oust Saddam Hussein.

The information in the military study, an analysis based on captured documents and interviews with Iraqi military and political leaders, makes it difficult to get a clear picture of the Russian spy operation. It says a captured Iraqi document cited "information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha," in Qatar.

But the study notes that some information obtained by Iraq from Russian sources was false, raising at least the possibility that it was circulated as part of a deliberate American campaign intended to fool or demoralize Iraqi troops and leaders. Military officers have disclosed separately that false war plans were part of the campaign, and it remains unclear whether any Russians may have played into that strategy.

The Central Command, responsible for American military actions from the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean, led the Iraq war from headquarters in Qatar, where access was highly restricted. But the documents cite the Qatar headquarters as the source of the intelligence.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the report states, citing a document sent to Mr. Hussein on March 24, 2003.

The Russian report stated — inaccurately — that the coalition thrust into Baghdad would come from the west and would await the Fourth Infantry Division, whose entry from the north was vetoed by Turkey. In fact, the main lines of the offensive moved from Kuwait in the south before the arrival of the Fourth Infantry.

An author of the study, Kevin M. Woods, said during a Pentagon news conference that there was no obvious reason to doubt the authenticity of the documents.

At the same briefing, Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo, in charge of the unit that conducted the study, said any intelligence-gathering by the Russians was very likely motivated by economic ties with Iraq.

Russians Told Iraqi Regime Of U.S. Troop Movements (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Russian diplomats passed detailed but sometimes inaccurate information about American troop movements to senior Iraqi officials even as U.S. troops closed in on Baghdad during the 2003 invasion, according to a Pentagon study released Friday.

The revelations, based on captured Iraqi intelligence documents, could jeopardize U.S.-Russian relations more than any single event since the end of the Cold War, analysts said. Although they cautioned that Moscow might have an explanation, the analysts said some of the details were so sensitive that they would be difficult for the government of President Vladimir V. Putin to justify.

One of the documents, which purports to be a summary of a letter sent to Saddam Hussein's office by a Russian official, claimed that Moscow had "sources inside the American Central Command in Doha," the U.S. military's headquarters in Qatar during the war.

Russia had well-known and extensive diplomatic and economic ties to Baghdad before the U.S.-led invasion and occasionally clashed with the Bush administration during the international debate over how to deal with Hussein's regime.

But the documents, made public in a study of the Iraqi military's decision-making, are the first to assert that Russia actively passed sensitive military intelligence to Baghdad during the war.

"This is one step short of firing upon us themselves with Russian equipment," said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst with the Brookings Institution. "It's actively aiding and abetting the enemy tactically. It's hard to get more unfriendly than that."

Press officials at the Russian Embassy did not return calls seeking comment. An official who answered the phone in the military attache's office at the embassy said he was unfamiliar with the report.

One of the most sensitive revelations, which came in a captured letter detailing Russian intelligence on American troop movements, accurately informed Baghdad that U.S. forces were massing south of a narrow passage near the southern city of Karbala.

The April 2, 2003, letter, which was reportedly passed through Moscow's ambassador to Baghdad, informed Iraqi leaders that "the heaviest concentration of troops (12,000 troops plus 1,000 vehicles) was in the vicinity of Karbala."

The Army's 3rd Infantry Division eventually captured western Baghdad after pushing through the Karbala gap just days later. Marines moved into Baghdad from the east.

Other information provided by the Russians, however, was wildly inaccurate. In a document on March 24 and again in the April 2 letter, the Iraqis were told to expect the main U.S. offensive from the western desert, including a major attack from Jordanian soil.

Kevin Wood, a retired Army officer who served as the senior researcher and chief author of the study, said he was surprised when he learned of the Russian actions. Although there was little corroboration of the contacts beyond the documents themselves, his team had no reason to doubt their authenticity, Wood said.

But Frederick Kagan, a Russia and defense expert at the American Enterprise Institute, said the actions would not be out of keeping with other efforts by Moscow to advance Iraq's cause internationally.

"We knew the Russians were opposed to the sanctions; we knew they opposed the war," Kagan said. "I'm not terribly surprised."

Analysts also said it would be important to learn whether upper levels of the Russian government were involved, adding that the signals were more likely to have come from diplomatic and intelligence agents in the region rather than from Moscow.

It also was unclear how much of the information was genuine intelligence and how much was educated guesswork.

Regardless, the revelations could undermine efforts to forge a united front against Iran's nuclear program.

"I think we have to assume that we can't trust the Russians to be impartial or even honest with us," Kagan said. "The Russians have ties with the Iranians that are also very worrying."

The 210-page report, compiled by staff at the Pentagon's Joint Forces Command after interviewing more than 100 former Iraqi officials and sifting through half a million documents, contains the most detailed accounts to date of Hussein's thinking as U.S. and coalition troops massed on his border and eventually pushed into Iraq.

It is unclear whether the Iraqi leader, who was not interviewed for the report, acted on any of the Russian information.

The authors depict Hussein as more worried about an internal coup or a repeat of the 1991 Shiite uprising in the south than he was about the coalition forces, even when they were on the outskirts of Baghdad. He continued to make tactical military decisions based on that fear until the last days of his regime.

Senior military commanders were ordered not to blow up bridges connecting Baghdad to southern Iraq so that Hussein could send loyal troops to quell any domestic opposition, even though the bridges made it easier for the Americans to advance.

The report also said Hussein frequently pointed to the failed American operation in Somalia and Washington's reluctance to introduce ground forces in the Balkans as proof the U.S. would not long tolerate bloody ground warfare.

And although Hussein had established loyal paramilitaries to suppress any uprisings and scattered them throughout Iraq, the report casts doubt on the idea that his regime made preparations to launch an insurgency if the Iraqi army met with defeat.

"There were no national plans to transition to a guerrilla war in the event of a military defeat," the report found. "Nor, as their world crumbled around them, did the regime appear to cobble together such plans."

The report's authors found Hussein and his top commanders to be badly out of touch with reality, both before and during the war. Hussein and his inner circle were fed a steady diet of lies, mainly overly optimistic assessments about Iraq's military capabilities, from subordinates who feared they would pay with their lives for speaking the truth.

Misinformation also flowed down through the ranks. The report cited an April 6 memo from the Defense Ministry telling subordinate units that "we are doing great" and reminding officers to "avoid exaggerating the enemy's abilities."

But as the scope of the defeat dawned on him, Hussein's tone was that of a man "who had lost his will to resist," and "knew the regime was coming to an end," said Tarik Aziz, the former deputy prime minister who was one of 23 senior officials interviewed by U.S. military researchers.

Hussein was moving from one safe house to another every three to six hours. During a late-night meeting with his sons and members of his inner circle April 6, Hussein issued orders to defend Baghdad to the death and prepare for urban warfare.

By then, however, "an American armored brigade already held Baghdad's airport," the report said, and American armor "was busily chewing up the manicured lawn in front of his palace in the center of the city."

The United States also made miscalculations, including devoting significant resources to preventing the destruction of Iraqi oil fields.

The report indicates that regional Iraqi commanders had made plans to destroy the northern and southern oil fields, and there are accounts that demolition charges and other equipment were moved into place.

The report quoted a senior Republican Guard officer as saying Hussein blocked those plans because he believed that destroying the oil fields would damage the morale of soldiers and the Iraqi people.

Report: Russia Had Sources In U.S. Command (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, March 25, 2006

The Russian government collected intelligence from sources inside the American military command as the U.S. mounted the invasion of Iraq, and the Russians fed information to Saddam Hussein on troop movements and plans, according to Iraqi documents cited in a Pentagon report released Friday.

The Russians relayed information to Saddam during the opening days of the war in late March and early April 2003, including a crucial time before the ground assault on Baghdad, according to the documents.

The unclassified report does not assess the value of the information or provide details beyond citing two captured Iraqi documents that say the Russians collected information from sources "inside the American Central Command" and that battlefield intelligence was provided to Saddam through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

A classified version of the Pentagon report, titled "Iraqi Perspectives Project," is not being made public.

In Moscow, a duty officer with Russia's Foreign Ministry declined to comment on the report late Friday. No one answered the phones at the Defense Ministry.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli declined to comment.

In addition to citing the Iraqi documents on the matter of Russian intelligence, the report also directly asserted that an intelligence link existed.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the report's authors wrote. They cited as an example a document that was sent to Saddam on March 24, 2003, and captured by the U.S. military after Baghdad fell.

The report said the Iraqi document was titled, "Letter from Russian official to presidential secretary concerning American intentions in Iraq." The Iraqi document said, "The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible," and that as a result the U.S. military would avoid urban combat.

"The strategy is to isolate Iraq from its western borders," the document added.

The lead author of the Pentagon report, Kevin Woods, told reporters at a briefing that he was surprised to learn that the Russians had passed intelligence to Saddam, and he said he had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the Iraqi documents.

"But I don't have any other knowledge of that topic," Woods added, referring to the Russian link.

Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo, who appeared with Woods and also was closely involved in the project, said he believed such a link reflected a long-standing close economic relationship between Moscow and Baghdad.

"I don't see it as an aberration," Cucolo said. "I see it as a follow-on to economic engagement and economic interests."

In the end, one piece of Russian intelligence actually contributed to an important U.S. military deception effort. By telling Saddam that the main attack on Baghdad would not begin until the Army's 4th Infantry Division arrived around April 15, the Russians reinforced an impression that U.S. commanders were trying to catch the Iraqis by surprise.

The attack on Baghdad began well before the 4th Infantry arrived, and the government collapsed quickly.

As originally planned by Gen. Tommy Franks, the Central Command chief who ran the war, the 4th Infantry was to attack into northern Iraq from Turkey, but the Turkish government refused to go along. Meanwhile the 4th Infantry's tanks and other equipment remained on ships in the eastern Mediterranean for weeks — a problem that Franks sought to turn into an advantage by attacking Baghdad without them.

Based on a captured Iraqi document — a memo to Saddam from his Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dated April 2 — Russian intelligence reported through its ambassador that the American forces were moving to cut off Baghdad from the south, east and north, with the heaviest concentration of troops in the Karbala area. It said the Americans had 12,000 troops in the area, along with 1,000 vehicles.

Indeed, Karbala was a major step on the U.S. invasion route along the Euphrates River to Baghdad. A key bridge over the Euphrates, near Karbala, was seized on April 2, permitting U.S. forces to approach Baghdad from the southwest before Iraq could move sufficient forces from the north.

The Pentagon report also said the Russians told the Iraqis that the Americans planned to concentrate on bombing in and around Baghdad, cutting the road to Syria and Jordan and creating enough confusion to force residents to flee.

"The largest contributing factor to the complete defeat of Iraq's military forces was the continued interference by Saddam," the report said.

Moscow Spies Tipped Saddam On U.S. War Plan (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

Moscow had informants inside U.S. Central Command whose information on the March 2003 invasion of Iraq was relayed to dictator Saddam Hussein days before American troops ousted him from power, according to a Defense Department history released yesterday.

And, as U.S. troops encircled Baghdad in April, Russia's ambassador fed information from Moscow's intelligence service to Saddam's regime regarding U.S. troop movements.

The new disclosures show that Moscow was working against the Bush administration in private, as it opposed in public the U.S. desire for a United Nations Security Council resolution explicitly authorizing the invasion.

The report was produced in book form by U.S. Forces Command, which studies "lessons learned" in military operations. This document, however, focused not on American units, but on how Saddam, his regime and military prepared for the March 19, 2003, attack and tried to blunt it. Titled "Iraqi Perspective Project: A View of Operation Iraqi Freedom From Saddam's Senior Leadership," it is based largely on postwar interviews and seized documents. It is in one of those documents that the Iraqis told of spies inside U.S. Central Command, which planned and executed the invasion.

"The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha [Qatar] is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible, and that they have changed their tactic," states the Iraq intelligence report. Another part states, "Jordan had accepted the American 4th Mechanized Infantry Division."

Although U.S. forces did avoid occupying towns and cities on the march to Baghdad, they did enter Tikrit, Mosul and other large cities. But as for Jordan, the 4th Infantry Division never docked there, instead traveling by sea to Kuwait.

The Forces Command report offered no information on whether Central Command ever identified and purged the spies.

The report also tells of a seized memorandum from Iraqi's Foreign Ministry. The memo said Russia's ambassador was relaying intelligence reports to Saddam aides, including one memo that stated that allied forces would not enter Baghdad until the 4th Infantry Division arrived. That turned out to be false.

In other report findings:

A seized Dec. 15, 2002, memo, written by an Iraqi intelligence agent posing as a U.N. escort, states, "Inside Bader WMD inspection site, there are Russian and Turkish scientists. When we visited the site, they were forced to hide from inspectors' eyes."

And, Saddam continued to tell his commanders he still had such weapons. "For him, there were real dividends to be gained by letting his enemies believe he possessed WMD, whether it was true or not," the report said.

•The quickly assembled air strike on one of Saddam's residences, Dora Farms, in pre-dawn March 19, 2003, never had a chance of succeeding. Saddam had not stayed there since 1995.

•There was no evidence that Saddam or his top aides planned the insurgency, now in its fourth year; in fact, Saddam was sure the Americans would never advance on Baghdad.

"There were no national plans to transition to a guerrilla war in the event of military defeat," the report states.

This fact helps explain why commanders did not predict, nor plan for, the robust insurgency and al Qaeda terrorists now spreading violence.

Saddam's misguided belief that he would stay in power in 2003 was fed by the support he got from France and Russia, his top aide, Tariq Aziz, told U.S. investigators.

DOJ_NMG_0022010

"France and Russia each secure millions of dollars worth of trade and service contracts in Iraq, with the implied understanding that their political posture with regard to sanctions on Iraq would be pro-Iraqi," Mr. Aziz said. "In addition, the French wanted sanctions lifted to safeguard their trade and service contracts in Iraq."

Rice Expects U.S., Iran To Meet On Iraq (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday she was sure U.S. and Iranian representatives would meet to discuss security in Iraq, but she gave no time for the sessions.

"Those meetings will take place, I'm certain, at the appropriate time," Rice said.

The United States previously had said contact with the Iranians could occur if Washington found it useful, but questioned the timing and motive of Iran in seeking talks.

The Bush administration says discussions would be limited to the situation in Iraq, where Washington has long accused Iran of making trouble. The U.S. ambassador in Baghdad has had authority to talk to his Iranian counterpart since last year, but Tehran only recently said it wants to meet.

President Bush's national security adviser, Steven J. Hadley, last week dismissed Iran's willingness to talk about Iraq as a way for Iran to divert pressure from the nuclear weapons issue. Iran claims it is pursuing nuclear technology only for generation of electricity.

The two countries have had no diplomatic relations since the 1979 storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The United States is now pushing for strong U.N. Security Council action to try to stop what it claims is Iranian ambition to build a nuclear bomb. The U.N. body has been bogged down for two weeks over how to make a first move.

"I think that everybody just needs to get to work and let's get this done so that the Iranians have a very clear message about what's going on," Rice said when asked whether Iran allies Russia and China are dragging their feet.

Rice spoke Friday to Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to try to break an impasse over the wording of a Security Council statement on Iran, and may meet soon with other permanent members of the Security Council if the group can agree on the document.

"We agreed to ask our negotiators to work again over the next of couple of days," Rice told reporters, "really deciding that maybe they won't even have a weekend because we need to work on this text."

Rice spoke following a meeting with Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Derbez.

She also met in Washington with U.N. Ambassador John Bolton on Iran and other topics.

"We are waiting to see what happens in the talks between the ministers of foreign affairs of the P-5," Argentina's U.N. Ambassador Cesar Mayoral, the current Security Council president, said Friday, when asked when the council might meet to discuss the proposed statement.

The U.S. and its European allies want a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog _ the International Atomic Energy Agency _ that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

The Russians and Chinese have opposed tough language including a demand for a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA demands.

Russia and China also want the IAEA to keep the main role in cajoling Iran on uranium enrichment. They have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

"The Security Council has, of course, at its disposal tools that are not there for the IAEA," Rice said Friday.

"This first order of business is to get a presidential statement that will make very clear that it is in the international community's very strong demand of Iran that Iran adhere to these requirements."

General Praises Iraqi Forces In Mosque Attack Mayhem (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

DOJ_NMG_0022011

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The United States commander for training Iraqi security forces expressed guarded satisfaction on Friday with the performance of new Iraqi Army and national police units in tamping down the sectarian violence that erupted after the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month.

But the commander, Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, acknowledged that the crisis also provided a clearer picture of the troubling shortfalls of the Iraqi local police, on whom, he said, American trainers now must focus their efforts.

American officers in Iraq and Pentagon officials reviewing reports from the field say the Iraqi Army helped calm the situation. They also say that the national police responded well, but that some local police units only huddled in their stations during the early hours of the crisis.

General Dempsey also raised concern about the role played by independent militias during the crisis. In a video news conference from Baghdad, General Dempsey pointed out that certain militias were recognized under the new Constitution — like the pesh merga force of Kurdish fighters and the Badr Corps, a Shiite militia — and that efforts were under way to assimilate them into security units. But he said one powerful militia, which answers to Moktada al-Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric, remained outside of any government control.

"What happened in the aftermath of the Samarra mosque bombing was that several of these militias took to the streets, took to the streets in a way that could have been very threatening to the population, particularly in the mixed areas," General Dempsey said. "The Iraqi legitimate security forces, the army and the police, in every case were a settling influence."

Because of the threat of spiraling sectarian violence, Iraqi government and security officials "made a conscious decision not to confront but rather to contain these militias," General Dempsey said. "They decided that they wouldn't add the militia problem to their other problem, which is the heightened tensions after the bombing."

General Dempsey said Iraqi security forces facing off against these armed, unofficial bands were ordered to stop them from violating the law — but did not always halt their movements through checkpoints if they were traveling peacefully. "They separated groups," he said. "They protected mosques. They talked to political leaders, religious leaders, politicians, local leaders, and they really did a fantastic job of settling the situation without also confronting the militia."

The militia problem is clearly a threat to stability in Iraq, and General Dempsey said the issue was "something the new government's got to take on with some immediacy as soon as they get seated."

President Bush's strategy for withdrawing American troops from Iraq requires an increasing number of Iraqi security forces to take on increasing levels of responsibility. Last week, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq, announced that by the end of summer, 75 percent of the country would be the responsibility of Iraqi security forces.

Asked whether Iraqis were given security responsibilities only in relatively stable or underpopulated areas, General Dempsey said Friday that Iraqis already controlled some crowded, tense areas — certain neighborhoods of Baghdad, for example — and that this percentage would grow.

Military officers in Iraq and at the Pentagon said both the army and national police responded rapidly in the hours after the mosque bombing. All Iraqi personnel not already on duty were called back from leaves and ordered to increase patrols.

One senior officer said that while the new Iraqi security forces took sides in sectarian violence in 2004, the aftermath of the Samarra bombing resulted in "very, very few reports of either the army or national police battalions acting in a sectarian way themselves."

In interviews and e-mails from Iraq, American military officers underscored that the efforts by local clerics and politicians were even more important than the actions of security forces in keeping the lid on civil war in recent weeks.

Since the insurgency began, American commanders have argued that there is no solely military path to ultimate success in Iraq, only a political solution. After the mosque bombing, these officers say, it is inconceivable that the Iraqi Army and police alone could have tamped down the violence unless senior clerics and the Iraqi political leadership — Sunni, Shiite and Kurd — had immediately called for calm, as they did.

Despite concerns of sweeping sectarian attacks, the violence after the mosque bombing was limited to specific neighborhoods, mostly in the mixed Sunni-Shiite areas near the Sadr City slum in Baghdad and other areas mostly north of the capital.

And as bodies keep turning up, especially in Baghdad, proof that sectarian killings continue at an alarming rate, commanders admit that the local police cannot halt such individual acts of sectarian vengeance.

"You've heard us call this the year of the police," said General Dempsey, who previously spent 14 months in Iraq as commander of the First Armored Division. "We're really equipping them at a very aggressive rate in order to put them in a position to restore civil security by the end of the year."

Murtha Defends Position On War In Iraq (HS)

By Amy Zalar

Herald Standard, March 25, 2006

U.S. Rep. John Murtha (D-Johnstown), theorized Friday that President George W. Bush was trying to justify what didn't happen following the first Gulf War when he waged war on Iraq three years ago.

Murtha, 73, said he believes there was a miscalculation when troops didn't stay around to rehabilitate the Middle East after the conclusion of the first Gulf War, and it led to the current conflict.

Regarding the current Iraq war, Murtha said when initial threats that biological weapons would be used if troops crossed a certain line didn't come to fruition and weapons of mass destruction were not found, he felt something was wrong and started "sending signals to the White House."

Speaking during a taping of "Behind the Headlines" for HSTV, Murtha said although he supported the war initially, he began to lose confidence because of the way it has been handled. The Vietnam veteran said the three things that are needed to go to war were not there for the Iraq invasion, including a threat to national security, the use of overwhelming force and an exit strategy.

Murtha has been criticized for publicly taking the position that the United States needs to get out of Iraq, a stance that he unequivocally defended.

"It's time for us to redeploy to the periphery and let the Iraqis do this themselves," Murtha said. He said he is also concerned about the $450 billion cost of the war and the burden on the American people.

Murtha said he is perplexed as to why Bush will not admit he made a mistake by relying on flawed intelligence. He said when Bush's father, George Herbert Walker Bush, contemplated the first Gulf War, he established a real international coalition and Congress participated in the process, two things that did not occur this time. A long-time member of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, Murtha has had intimate involvement with major war decisions during his years in Congress. He was first elected in 1974.

Now, Murtha said the Iraq conflict has deteriorated into a civil war and the American troops are caught in the middle. "The Iraqis are fighting with each other and we're caught in between," Murtha said.

Murtha said Vice President Dick Cheney was a "damn good secretary of defense" in the elder Bush's administration, but many people said they don't know Cheney today. "You have to wonder if they're competent," Murtha said of the people making decisions regarding the war.

Calling this administration the most secretive he has ever seen, Murtha said when you are in public office, you must listen to the people and look at history. Murtha said some Republicans would have to speak out against the war for anything to change. "I feel it is an American problem and not a political problem. Because (Bush) didn't seek advice it has gotten to where it is now and that's a very dangerous situation," Murtha said.

In being asked to speak about comparisons between the Iraq War and Vietnam, Murtha said that big difference is we support the troops in the current war. Murtha said he has worked to ensure troops receive body armor and equipment that is needed. "We have separated the warrior from the war and in Vietnam we didn't do that," Murtha said.

A weekly visitor to military hospitals, Murtha said in addition to the 2,300 American soldiers that have been killed, there are between 16,000 and 17,000 that have been wounded, and the government must take care of them.

Murtha said he wasn't completely surprised that his military record was attacked when he spoke out against the current direction of the war, but he said he didn't think such vicious attacks were warranted. He said attacking someone who disagrees with you isn't the way it should be done. "To me what's important is the country," Murtha said.

Murtha said the White House tried to get military officials to attack him, which was largely unsuccessful. He predicted a Democratic-controlled Con-gress after the fall election, and possibly a Democratic-controlled Senate also.

Murtha is seeking re-election, but will not face a Democratic challenger. Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey has filed to run as a Republican. Murtha said he takes any opponent seriously. He said since Irey has taken a position in favor of the war, it will likely be a campaign issue.

Murtha said he has credibility in the House, as well as years of experience and an important position on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. He said it would be difficult for a new person to get things done for the district that he has achieved.

Murtha said he concentrates on a lot of projects that are important to the district, including diabetes, and works with county commissioners to get infrastructure projects, which he called the glue to put everything together.

IRAQI PREZ OPTIMISTIC ABOUT CABINET; 51 MORE DIE (PHDN)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

Philadelphia Daily News, March 25, 2006

BAGHDAD - Iraq's president issued a highly optimistic report yesterday on progress among politicians trying to hammer out the shape of a new unity government. At the same time, at least 51 more people, including two U.S. soldiers, were reported dead in rampant violence.

President Jalal Talabani said the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month, though he acknowledged "I am usually a very optimistic person."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad brokered the sessions, with the Bush administration applying extreme pressure on Iraqi politicians to form a government. Washington hopes to begin withdrawing troops this summer, banking on a decrease in violence once a national unity government is in place.

A less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose nomination by the Shiite bloc for a second term produced the political stalemate, has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April, a full month beyond the Talabani estimate.

The rising death toll among Iraqis included five worshippers killed yesterday in a bombing outside a Sunni mosque.

The two U.S. soldiers were killed in combat in insurgent-ridden Anbar province, the American military reported yesterday. The statement said the soldiers, assigned to the 2/28th Brigade Combat Team, were killed Thursday.

Iraq Qaeda Chief Seems To Pursue A Lower Profile (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist and the head of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, has sharply lowered his profile in recent months, and his group claims to have submitted itself to the leadership of an Iraqi.

In postings on Web sites used by jihadi groups, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the terrorist network's arm in Iraq, claims to have joined with five other guerrilla groups to form the Mujahedeen Shura, or Council of Holy Warriors. The new group, whose formation was announced in January, is said to be headed by an Iraqi named Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi. Since then, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has stopped issuing its own proclamations.

The Mujahedeen Shura, which continues to call for attacks against American and Iraqi forces, has stopped taking responsibility for large-scale suicide attacks against civilians, and it has toned down its fierce verbal attacks against Iraq's Shiite majority.

Mr. Zarqawi's group also appears to have stopped, at least for now, the practice of beheading its captives. Since last summer, the group has begun to carry out attacks outside Iraq.

The activities seem to follow closely the advice in a letter believed to have been written last year by Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's second in command.

Previously, Mr. Zarqawi's group celebrated large-scale civilian massacres, and often made videos of the attacks and of beheadings and posted the videos on jihadi Web sites. Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which is dominated by followers of Islam's Sunni sect, also boasted of the mass killing of Shiite civilians, whom it labeled derogatorily as "converters."

While it is impossible to verify the claims on the Web sites, experts believe it significant that Mr. Zarqawi apparently feels the need to send such signals, which offer clues about what he and other senior jihadi leaders might be thinking and doing.

Since the announcement of the Mujahedeen Shura in January, Mr. Zarqawi has stayed largely out of view. His last public statement, released a few days before the announcement, ranted in typical fashion against Americans and Jews but gave no sign that changes were afoot.

American and Iraqi officials, as well as independent terrorism experts, are divided on the signals from Al Qaeda. Most believe that Mr. Zarqawi is alive, in Iraq, and still in charge of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. They say the group remains the leading suspect in the Feb. 22 attack against the Shiite shrine in Samarra, which set off a wave of sectarian violence. No group has taken responsibility for that attack.

Sectarian attacks have helped bring Iraq to the brink of full-scale civil war. A document obtained by the Americans in January 2004, and believed to have been written by Mr. Zarqawi, calls for attacks on Shiites in order to bring about a sectarian bloodbath.

American and Iraqi officials concede that they know little about the Mujahedeen Shura or of Mr. Baghdadi or, indeed, whether they exist at all. The officials say the proclamations by Al Qaeda and the Mujahedeen Shura, as well as the claim that an Iraqi is in charge, are probably ploys to give the illusion of changes that have not taken place.

"Propaganda is a critical component of his efforts, and that's what's involved here," said an American intelligence official. "It's a shift in tactics, not a real change."

In the letter thought to have been written by Mr. Zawahiri, an Egyptian physician believed to be hiding along the mountainous border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, Mr. Zarqawi was told that he needed to cultivate local support in Iraq to ensure the survival of his movement. The letter was captured by the Americans last summer.

The letter suggested a role for a council that would unite the various insurgent groups and help lay the political groundwork for the day the Americans depart.

It also questioned Mr. Zarqawi's emphasis on killing Shiites, suggesting that such killings alienated Iraqis and detracted from the larger goal of driving out the Americans. For the same reasons, the letter said, it was not necessary to cut off the heads of captives. "We can kill the captives by bullet," the letter said.

The letter also called for Mr. Zarqawi to "extend the jihad to secular countries neighboring Iraq." In recent months, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has taken responsibility for a number of attacks outside the country, including the suicide bombing of three hotels in Amman, Jordan, in November, which killed more than 57 people. The group has also said it fired rockets from Lebanon into Israel last December, and a pair of missiles at American naval vessels in Aqaba, Jordan, last August.

"Zarqawi wanted to hand over Al Qaeda to the Iraqis so he could move on to the next phase of jihad," said Rita Katz, the director of the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups. Ms. Katz recently made such an argument in an opinion article in The Boston Globe.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorist expert at the Rand Corporation's Washington office, said he believed that the Mujahedeen Shura and Mr. Baghdadi were real, but was unconvinced that Mr. Zarqawi had ceded control of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. Having brought the country to the brink of civil war, Mr. Zarqawi may have decided that it was a good time to step back as events in Iraq unfold, Mr. Hoffman said, "like a poker player."

There are other reasons why Mr. Zarqawi might want to take a less prominent role in Iraq. As a Jordanian, Mr. Zarqawi is a foreigner in Iraq, where family and blood lines count for a lot. In recent months, evidence has surfaced that Iraqi guerrillas resent the dominance of foreigners in the insurgency.

In addition, there have been growing indications that the large-scale suicide bombings directed at civilians were alienating Arab backers outside the country as well as ordinary Iraqis. Mr. Zarqawi is believed to depend heavily on money provided by Arabs from outside of Iraq.

The suicide attacks on the three Jordanian hotels set off a wave of popular anger so furious that Mr. Zarqawi released an audio tape to explain his actions. Mr. Zarqawi did not apologize for the attacks — far from it — but he was clearly stunned by the vehemence of the reaction. "As for those Muslims who were killed," Mr. Zarqawi said on the tape, "we have not thought for even one moment about targeting them, even if they are sinful people."

Ms. Katz, the director of SITE, which provided the translations of his statements, said that even if he had stepped back, Mr. Zarqawi was probably still the dominant force in Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

Mr. Zarqawi has long made it clear that he sees Iraq as a stepping stone to the larger goal of overthrowing what he believes to be corrupt and secular regimes across the Arab world and re-establishing the Islamic Caliphate that reigned over the Middle East for centuries.

Whatever Mr. Zarqawi is up to, the successor organization, the Mujahedeen Shura, has lost no vehemence. In one of its most recent communiqués, it celebrated an attack on an American Humvee it claimed to have carried out this week in Miqadadiya, Iraq.

"A car bomb was detonated on a Crusader support patrol, resulting in the destruction of the Humvee and all who were in it," the statement said. "Thanks unto God."

Iraqi Translator Is Accused Of Bribery In Kickback Case (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

The Justice Department said yesterday that it had arrested an Iraqi-American translator from Michigan on bribery charges in the latest case involving accusations of corruption, which have become a steady accompaniment to the war in Iraq.

The Justice Department said the translator, Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., probably acting as an intermediary for others who have not yet been identified, offered tens of thousands of dollars in bribes to people inside the Iraqi Interior Ministry for a contract to provide some $1 million in flak jackets and other equipment to an organization that trains Iraqi police officers.

Mr. Salam was working as a translator for the Titan Corporation, a division of the L-3 Government Services Group. The federal complaint says that in the course of his work, Mr. Salam offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who eventually referred Mr. Salam to someone the official described as a procurement officer for the American-operated program to train the Iraqi police.

In fact, the officer was an undercover agent for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, an independent office that has been investigating cases of potential fraud, waste and abuse. Mr. Salam repeated his bribery offer and was arrested late Thursday night at Dulles International Airport near Washington, as he returned from Iraq.

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who heads the office of the inspector general, said he expected more arrests in the case but declined to give further details or say who had been expected to provide the approximately 1,000 flak jackets — Mr. Salam showed a sample to the undercover agent — to the Interior Ministry. Mr. Salam also offered to sell a sophisticated map printer as part of the deal.

Mr. Bowen said that in the cash economy of Iraq, where traditional investigative methods like tracing money transfers are nonexistent, tracking down fraud is especially challenging.

"We realize we have to use every means at our disposal," Mr. Bowen said. The traditional sting operation, he added, "is one of them."

A call to the federal public defender acting as Mr. Salam's lawyer, Tony Axam, went unanswered yesterday. A spokesman for L-3 Government Services, Rick Kiernan, said the reported bribery attempt "appears to be isolated and not part of a larger incident."

"L-3 has not been related in any way to the incident itself," Mr. Kiernan said. "We have been cooperating with the Department of Justice on this entire matter."

The case against Mr. Salam is one of at least eight major cases said to involve bribery, kickbacks, money laundering, conspiracy, fraudulent billing and other crimes that prosecutors say have plagued civilians and military personnel who work with contractors in Iraq.

At least a dozen arrests have been made and more are expected as the cases widen and new cases emerge. Mr. Bowen said his office alone was investigating around 60 cases that had not yet been made public.

Still, Mr. Bowen said out-and-out fraud was not pervasive among Americans now in Iraq, adding that many of his cases turned up in the early months after the invasion when controls were especially weak.

"I think it's a few individuals who took advantage of a chaotic situation early on," he said, "and it's my job to track them down and bring them to justice."

Of the arrests, at least six involve people who at one time worked directly for Kellogg Brown & Root, the Halliburton subsidiary, or for outside subcontractors working for the company. The Army has awarded Kellogg Brown & Root three huge contracts to do things like deliver food and fuel and repair oil equipment and facilities in Iraq.

The largest single case has swirled around an American businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who lived in Romania for many years but won at least $8.6 million in reconstruction contracts around Hilla, south of Baghdad, by paying what prosecutors said were hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in 2003 and 2004 to at least a half-dozen officials in the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Some expect more arrests. "I would suspect that the more we peel back on this, the more we're going to find," said Steve Ellis, a vice president at Taxpayers for Common Sense in Washington. So many arrests have been announced recently, Mr. Ellis said, that "it's not until you actually step back and you look at the whole of it that you realize how enormous the waste and corruption may actually be."

U.S. Charges Civilian Translator With Trying To Bribe Iraqi Police (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq and charged him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

He was released from custody after a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court on April 5.

Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act for offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint. Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said.

Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator who was posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said.

Titan Corp. did not immediately comment.

If convicted, Salam faces up to five years in prison and a fine of at least $100,000.

The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraq reconstruction contracts.

At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery-and-kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts. Robert J. Stein Jr., a former contracting official in Iraq, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to steal more than $2 million in reconstruction money and steer contracts to a businessman in exchange for more than $1 million in cash, cars and jewelry.

Navy Won't File Charges In Iraq Contractor Fracas (WP)

By Griff Witte And Josh White

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Military investigators said yesterday that they will not file any charges after completing their investigation into an incident in Iraq last May in which a group of Marines alleged they had been fired on by U.S. security contractors.

The contractors, in turn, had said they were detained by the Marines for three days in a holding facility normally reserved for suspected insurgents, and subjected to rough treatment. The incident highlighted tension in the field between active-duty military personnel and the burgeoning ranks of private contractors the Defense Department has hired to support the war effort.

But the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said there was not sufficient evidence to warrant prosecution of Marines or employees of North Carolina-based Zapata Engineering.

"There was evidence that shots had been fired by Zapata, but there was no way to connect the dots together in a way that we could go forward with the case," said NCIS spokesman Ed Buice.

The 16 American contractors have never denied that they fired shots on May 28, 2005, as they traveled through Fallujah. But they say their shots -- three in total -- went straight into the ground as they tried to get the attention of a truck driver who was moving precariously close to their convoy.

The Marines told a different story, accusing the contractors of firing indiscriminately at civilians and at a Marine checkpoint. Buice said yesterday that investigators had not been able to verify that conclusion.

"It's a world of relief," said Pete Ginter, one of the contractors who were detained. "We knew from the beginning that we didn't do anything wrong. But we were being penalized for something we didn't do."

Ginter said he and the other contractors involved have been effectively blacklisted since the incident, with many of them having trouble finding work and unable to return to Iraq, where demand for contractors is high.

Mark Schopper, an attorney for four of the detained contractors, said that while he welcomed the NCIS's decision, questions remain. "We're still incensed at what happened to them," Schopper said.

Marine officials at the Pentagon yesterday referred questions on the matter to military spokesmen in Baghdad, who were unable to comment immediately.

The contractors claim they were changing a tire at a Marine checkpoint last May when they were suddenly ordered to report to a nearby base. From there they were taken to a detention facility where they each were handed an orange jumpsuit, a bottle in which to urinate, a Koran and a prayer mat. The contractors, many of whom were ex-Marines, said they received rough treatment, with guards shoving them to the ground and, in Ginter's case, squeezing his testicles.

The men were held for three days in the same facility where the military held suspected insurgents. During that time, they have said, they were refused all requests to contact the Red Cross, their employer or their families. Once released, they were barred from operating in a large area of Iraq. They also lost their jobs with Zapata, which had a contract with the Army Corps of Engineers to dispose of ordnance.

Buice, the NCIS spokesman, said investigators never formally looked into the allegations of abuse because the contractors did not go through the proper channels of filing a complaint. He also said the treatment they received appeared to be standard for incoming prisoners. "The fact that you're asked to take off all your clothes and put on an orange jumpsuit, that's not mistreatment," he said.

But Gary Myers, a lawyer representing several of the contractors, said the way the military handled the case was unjust.

"These men did nothing wrong. They were forced out of the country by the Marines who in fact had engaged in conduct that was abusive to our own citizens," Myers said. "I'm pleased that whatever cloud that was hanging over those men is now removed, even if the Marine Corps will not admit it made a mistake."

An estimated 20,000 private security contractors are operating in Iraq. Tension between contractors and active-duty personnel has run high in some cases because the contractors fall outside the normal military chain of command and make considerably higher salaries than their counterparts in the armed forces. In this case, Schopper said the Marines taunted the contractors while they were in custody by asking, "How does it feel to be a rich contractor now?"

Gary Simpler, a 20-year Army veteran who was among the contractors detained, said in an e-mailed response to questions that the Marine Corps was "heavy-handed, abusive to fellow American citizens and should apologize."

Reporting From Iraq: A Failure Or An Accurate Account Of What's Happening? (KRT)

By Clark Hoyt

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ever since Cleopatra threatened to have a slave whipped with wire and stewed in brine for bringing her the news that Mark Antony had married Caesar's sister, people in power haven't had much tolerance for bearers of bad tidings.

DOJ_NMG_0022018

It doesn't matter that, as Cleopatra's poor slave said in Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," "I that do bring the news made not the match."

Today, it's President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and assorted supporters who are blaming the messengers - the news media - for the public's growing disenchantment with the war in Iraq.

As the polls have gone south - 65 percent disapprove of the president's handling of the war in the latest Newsweek Poll - the administration has escalated a soft attack on the media. I say "soft" because the criticism usually is artfully couched. It's not that reporters are disloyal or motivated by partisanship. They're either huddled fearfully in their hotels and can't see what's really happening or they're trapped in a definition of news that values only vividly violent bad news, preferably with pictures.

Last week on CBS' "Face the Nation," Cheney said his comments that Iraqis would welcome Americans as "liberators" and the Iraqi insurgency was "in its last throes" were "basically accurate and reflect reality." The problem, he said, was that news reporting has created a negative impression "because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad. It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress toward rebuilding Iraq."

So, is the story of Iraq being distorted by reporting that focuses on violence and fails to tell the good news?

Robert J. Callahan, who served as the press attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad from June 2004 to May 2005, doesn't think so. In an article in the current American Journalism Review, Callahan, who's still a Foreign Service officer, said, "American reporters have faced criticism for their coverage of Iraq, but rarely from those of us who have been there and have seen these journalists at work."

The most persistent criticism, Callahan wrote, comes from people who charge that the media are ignoring the good news in Iraq. He disagrees and points to the saturation coverage of the January 2005 election, when purple ink-stained fingers "became an international symbol of courage and defiance."

Callahan said American diplomats stopped encouraging coverage of good-news events such as the reconstruction of a school because it often invited terrorist attacks that cost innocent lives. "It was frustrating, to be sure," he said, "but prudent."

The truth of Iraq is complex. It's not as rosy as a presidential anecdote about U.S. military success in one isolated town, Tal Afar, suggests. But it's more than the carnage on television news.

Our reporting tells us that it's true that there are areas of Iraq - in the Shiite south and the Kurdish north - where people walk the streets in relative peace. But Baghdad, Iraq's capital and most populous city, and the Sunni Triangle to its northwest are hellishly dangerous. And that lack of security has overshadowed everything else as Iraqis struggle to build a democratic future.

Iraqis have held two successful elections since the U.S.-led invasion, but they're having a hard time establishing a permanent representative government. Though unemployment is more than 30 percent, cell phones and satellite dishes - once forbidden - are everywhere. Baghdad's legendary traffic jams are partly a result of an explosion of automobile ownership.

An Iraqi acquaintance agrees with a majority of Americans that her country is better off without Saddam Hussein, but she says that doesn't mean Iraqis feel good about their lives today. In the old days, in her mixed Baghdad neighborhood of Sunni and Shiite Muslims, everyone knew who the informers were, and to whom they were informing. Now, people live in fear of everyone outside their own families. Death squads roam the streets. Neighbors disappear in the night. Nobody knows who took them, where or why.

A lot of American reconstruction money has been diverted to pay for security, according to the Government Accountability Office. Some projects have ground to a halt. Iraqi oil production remains below prewar levels. So does the availability of electricity. Sewage overflows, and there's little running water that's safe to drink. In a nation that has one of the world's largest known reserves of oil, Iraqis wait in lines a mile long for gasoline.

Through it all, more than 60 percent of Iraqis say they're hopeful about their future. And more than 85 percent want the United States to set a timetable for getting American troops out.

To bring the story of Iraq to you, Knight Ridder maintains a bureau in Baghdad and a network of Iraqi special correspondents around the country. Bureau Chief Nancy A. Youssef, who speaks Arabic, and correspondent Tom Lasseter often are joined by other Knight Ridder colleagues. Our Berlin correspondent, Matthew Schofield, a veteran of several Iraq tours, has just concluded a rotation. They're aided in Baghdad by a staff of a dozen Iraqis: drivers, so-called "fixers" and translators, many of whom have embraced Western journalistic values and become excellent reporters. They're able to go where Americans cannot.

DOJ_NMG_0022019

The hotel that houses the Knight Ridder bureau isn't in the isolated Green Zone, where U.S. diplomats and Iraqi leaders are, but it's heavily fortified with concrete blast walls we helped pay for, and it's guarded by an international force of security agents, which we also help support. The hotel has twice been shaken by bombs, once so violently that most of the windows blew out.

Knight Ridder maintains security advisers, former British Royal Marine commandoes who are combat veterans. They're heavily armed. They train the staff daily in security procedures and first aid.

Despite the danger, Nancy and her colleagues do venture out and do find inventive ways to talk with ordinary Iraqis. Nancy says, "When I go grocery shopping, I listen to people's conversations. What are they talking about? And how has their conversation changed since the week before?" Several times, her careful listening has led to stories.

It's a dangerous and sometimes frustrating job. Nancy says, "A colleague of mine described it beautifully. We are living in darkness, shining a flashlight around us and reporting on what we see. Sometimes we see the most important things, sometimes not."

Regardless, each story is part of the fabric of truth.

3 Years Of War Wither A Family's Seed Of Hope (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — As U.S. forces made their way to the capital, Baher Butti sat alone in his house with the AK-47 that Baath Party officials had given him to guard his neighborhood. It was March 25, 2003, and the psychiatrist had just celebrated his 43rd birthday.

"The war on Iraq has started," he wrote in his diary. "I have not prepared myself to be a fighter but a doctor and a family man."

A man trained to heal the suffering of others, Butti would see trauma enter his own house in the three years to follow. Fighting and havoc would empty his church, claim the lives of friends and relatives and, finally, touch his 9-year-old daughter — leaving her scarred and traumatized after a bomb ripped through her school bus.

That March night, Butti described sneaking out from his forced guard duty to see his wife and three children at her father's home.

"I used a road that I thought was convenient to avoid the risk of bombings. I returned back very quickly to resume my duties," he wrote. "I am now in my house. I feel mentally exhausted."

Target practice had been part of Butti's high school curriculum, and Baath Party membership was almost mandatory for him to work as a doctor. But the idea of using a weapon to defend the regime repelled him.

"I feel afraid after I was put by the [party] in this silly role," he wrote. "I was overcome by the feeling of being a sheep on the way to the slaughterhouse."

Street fighting never came to his neighborhood. On April 6, Butti crossed the river and joined his family. Together on a rooftop they watched the tanks enter the city. His wife, Balsam, a more vociferous critic of Saddam Hussein's regime, greeted arriving U.S. soldiers with tea and biscuits.

The soldiers refused.

"We were so happy" that the soldiers had arrived, Balsam Butti recalled later. "But they were afraid of us."

Her husband, for his part, was bewildered by the sight of Americans riding their tanks through the streets of his city.

The idea that his country was occupied by foreigners made Butti uncomfortable. Still, a hope grew. With the Americans, perhaps a kind of progress would arrive.

Butti, a graduate of the Jesuit High School in Baghdad, quickly became involved in local politics, writing pamphlets and columns. He talked to journalists and pontificated on the meaning of democracy, tyranny and freedom.

He stopped keeping a diary. His writing — by necessity private during Hussein's regime — became public.

In June, three months after the invasion, Butti was still trying to articulate what was happening in his country.

DOJ_NMG_0022020

"When people saw the statue [of Hussein] falling in Firdos Square, the mountains of oppression that were in their souls started to explode," Butti wrote with characteristic flair.

With Hussein gone, U.S. forces watched as Iraqis looted the city. Freedom meant "do what you feel like," he wrote.

He was still ambivalent about the Americans — "friend or an enemy?"

A few days after the invasion, his wife, an obstetrician, returned to her clinic. Their children, a girl and two boys, went back to school. And Butti resumed his job at Ibn Rushd Teaching Psychiatric Hospital, Baghdad's biggest mental hospital.

Psychiatry had been a neglected field in Iraq for decades. Butti and his colleagues maintained little contact with the outside world and relied on outdated theories and textbooks.

The psychiatrist dreamed of building a small clinic in Baghdad that would offer group therapy and counseling. He brought American doctors to Iraqi mental wards to show them Iraq's abysmal healthcare system. He sent funding proposals to the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ruled Iraq after Hussein's fall.

U.S. officials listened with sympathy but had no money for his project. Their priorities were first relief, then election campaigns and eventually security, he said.

As violence worsened, American and Iraqi officials moved into the Green Zone, a heavily fortified compound along the Tigris River. U.S. soldiers began to refer to the city outside as the "red zone." Baghdad was being divided.

"We used to meet them outside the Green Zone," Butti said of U.S. officials. "Then things became that we had to go to the Green Zone [because] they couldn't go out. Then our entrance to the Green Zone became very difficult."

Outside the compound, gunmen took over streets, kidnapping and killing Iraqis. Doctors and academics in particular became targets. By 2004, many of the doctors who stayed in Iraq carried guns as they made their hospital rounds.

Leaving the house became a gamble, said Butti, who refused to arm himself for work.

Instead of progress, he and his wife saw advancing irrationality. Baher Butti — a slight, balding man with a bookish air — observed the proliferation of faith healers. Balsam Butti — composed, beautiful and partial to charcoal-colored suits — noticed that more women were giving birth at home, unable to make it to the hospital because of curfews or violence. As a result, more babies were stillborn and more women bled to death during labor, she said.

"Collectively speaking, we have regressed," Baher Butti said. "I'm a believer in God, but it doesn't make me superstitious. But our people are becoming superstitious."

Fundamentalism also took hold. Arsonists torched the Buttis' local library. Liquor store owners were assassinated. Three gunmen shot Balsam Butti's cousin in the stomach as he stood behind the counter of his convenience store. His family believes he was killed for selling beer.

Under Hussein's secular rule, Iraq's Christians were allowed to prosper and practice their faith without much trouble. At Christmas, Iraqi Muslims would go out caroling with their Christian neighbors.

But in the new Iraq, Christians in the Buttis' neighborhood received death threats and fled. By Christmas 2004, pews at their local church were half empty. Extremists targeted barbers for giving Western-style haircuts and violating strict Islamic teachings by trimming or removing men's beards. Baher Butti forbade his teenage son to wear his hair the way he wanted it — spiky.

Violence closed in. Their world was shrinking.

The retreat into their middle-class home in the Baghdad suburbs was bittersweet. Suddenly, there was more time with each other and their children — 9-year-old Ula and her two brothers, 17-year-old Sarmad and 20-year-old Fadhil. Baher and Balsam's marriage blossomed.

On most nights, the family would gather in their cozy living room, watching their favorite TV shows — "Friends" and "The West Wing." Shipwrecked by the upheaval around them, they clung to each other and their island of normality.

Baher refused his family's advice: Abandon Baghdad, move abroad and start a new life. He believed his roots in Iraq were too deep. His grandfather had served as a minister of culture. Baher wanted to build his own legacy — the Al Janna, or Paradise, clinic.

On May 7, 2005, a bright Saturday morning, Balsam was standing in the kitchen rolling up dolmas. The phone rang and Sarmad picked it up. After a brief conversation, he turned to his mother. "Mama, Ula is in danger," he said. "She is in Al Kindi Hospital."

A bomb had ripped through the school bus carrying Ula and seven other girls from Dijla Primary School. Balsam, otherwise unflappable, panicked. She frantically called Baher, who had taken their car for repairs. Rushing to the hospital in a taxi, Baher prayed incessantly for his daughter's survival.

At Al Kindi — a dirty, depleted hospital downtown — doctors had taken Ula for X-rays, examining the damage done to her freckled face. They stitched her wounds without anesthetics.

When Baher found Ula, he showered her bruised and bloodied face with kisses. He thanked God that shrapnel had slashed his daughter's nose rather than her eyes, that only her lips, not her throat, had been slit open. He swept her up and took her to a plastic surgeon, a family friend, who immediately treated the girl. Eventually, the scars would disfigure only Ula's skinny arms.

"That day," Balsam said, "she blamed me because she didn't want to go to school but I had forced her to go."

Ula's nightmares, which she often remembered the next morning, added to her mother's feelings of guilt.

"During the first month, every day she would give us a segment of the incident, a phrase here and a phrase there," Balsam said. "She used to say: 'There was a tank beside us, and the tank was hit. The driver was injured.' In another segment she said: 'The girl beside me was silent. Why was she silent? Did she die or not?' "

Although some were seriously injured, all seven girls survived.

Later her daughter told her, " 'I don't want to remember,' " Balsam said. " 'I don't remember and I don't want to remember.' "

Baher let his daughter be. Better that she forgets, he thought, even if he could not.

On a recent spring day in Baghdad, traffic was at a standstill as trucks unloaded mountains of generators and washing machines — goods once unobtainable in Iraq.

A hot dog vendor did brisk business underneath a sign advertising the South Korean company LG and its slogan, "Life's good." Down a side street, a group of boys played soccer in a dusty field.

Around the corner in a garden, six female doctors and healthcare workers sat in the shade, talking shop. Baher Butti was listening in on their discussion. Behind him, a sign spelled out "Al Janna" — Paradise.

He had finally built it.

An Iraqi advertising executive, looking for publicity, had donated $10,000. Baher used the money to buy a modest house, creating a refuge for the afflicted. Upstairs, in an empty studio, a patient had been working on a painting as part of his therapy. The half-finished piece on the aisle showed soldiers on horseback attacked by lions.

"It's a small place, but it's just the beginning," Baher said, mixing pride and apology.

For him, however, it was the end — a seed of hope he could no longer sustain. After Ula's school bus was hit, the Buttis decided to leave Iraq. As soon as Sarmad finishes his exams, they will join relatives in the United Arab Emirates.

But that decision ruptured the family bond that had strengthened during the last three years of violence.

The older son, Fadhil, has refused to leave, convinced that he and his friends will be able to change Iraq for the better.

"It's my country," Fadhil said. "This is the place I was born, and I want to die here. I don't want to go outside. We — the students — we will change it. It's our duty."

2 U.S. Soldiers Among 51 People Slain In Iraqi Violence (LAT/AP)

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Five Sunnis die in a mosque attack north of Baghdad. Talabani sees progress on the Cabinet.

BAGHDAD — At least 51 people, including two U.S. soldiers and five Sunnis leaving a mosque, were killed Friday in attacks around Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0022022

The soldiers died in combat in Al Anbar province, the U.S. military said in a statement. It said the men, assigned to the 2/28th Brigade Combat Team, were killed Thursday.

The deaths raised to at least 2,320 the number of U.S. military personnel who have died since the war began in March 2003.

The mosque attack took place in Khalis, north of Baghdad, Iraq's military reported. In addition to the worshipers killed, at least 15 were wounded, it said.

Baghdad police said they found 25 more bodies blindfolded, shot and dumped throughout the capital. Sectarian killings among Shiite and Sunni Muslims have become increasingly common in the city since the Feb. 22 bombing of a key Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The rest of the victims died in a variety of attacks, which included drive-by slayings of three policemen in west Baghdad and three power station workers headed to their jobs in Taji, just north of the capital, police said.

In south Baghdad, gunmen killed four pastry shop employees, officers said.

Meanwhile, former hostage Norman Kember, 74, flew out of Baghdad on a British transport plane Friday, according to the Christian Peacemaker Teams, a day after he and two Canadian men were rescued by U.S., British and Canadian forces.

The two Canadians were to leave this weekend. Friday was Harmeet Singh Sooden's 33rd birthday, and he and James Loney, 41, celebrated with a white cake decorated with a pink Canadian maple leaf.

The three men were kidnapped Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54. Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in west Baghdad.

Amid Friday's violence, Iraq's president issued a highly optimistic report on progress among politicians trying to hammer out a new unity government.

Jalal Talabani said the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month, though he acknowledged that "I am usually a very optimistic person."

He spoke to reporters after a fifth round of talks among the country's polarized political factions.

A less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April.

Separately, the Iraqi mission to the United Nations said the country had signed two deals for a metering system to track oil and gas flows, a step that could help get its economy back on track and reduce oil smuggling.

Iraq's economy has been severely weakened by oil smuggling to neighboring countries. Some experts think oil smuggling may be funding Iraq's insurgency.

As Palestinians Wait At Iraqi Border, Others Get Threats (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 24 — The bill of death appeared overnight, scattered on doorsteps and littering the sidewalk. It was addressed to "the Palestinian traitors."

"We warn you that we will eliminate you all if you don't leave the area for good within 10 days," the leaflet said. It bore the signature of a group called the Judgment Day Battalion, and the Palestinian residents of Hurriya, a northern Baghdad neighborhood, found it when they awoke Thursday morning.

"We are ready to leave Iraq — if we have the chance," a Palestinian resident said Friday, declining to provide his name because of fear of retribution. "This is the opinion of everyone here. We feel unsafe, and today is better than tomorrow."

The Palestinian community was once a pet cause of Saddam Hussein, who granted its members special treatment. But now, its members say, they are suffering the backlash of that favoritism, and are singled out for being Sunni Arabs.

As sectarian killings have intensified in the past several weeks, the Palestinians have been frequent targets of Shiite death squads, some in the uniforms of government security forces, several Palestinians said in interviews this week. Scores have been pulled from their homes in Palestinian enclaves around the capital, residents said, and many have turned up dead in the morgue.

The Palestinian observer to the United Nations has appealed to the Security Council for help, and the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has warned of the potential for a crisis.

Many Palestinian families "are in a state of shock and panic," according to a statement from the refugee agency distributed Friday. "This panic may spread and lead to more Palestinians fleeing Baghdad." Many Palestinians pulled their children from schools and stopped going to work, the statement said.

Violence has afflicted every community in Iraq, which has suffered increased sectarian bloodshed since a major Shiite mosque in Samarra was bombed last month.

Insurgent attacks on Friday killed 12 people. One attack involved an improvised bomb that killed 5 worshipers and wounded 17 as they left a Sunni Arab mosque in Khalis, about 35 miles east of Baghdad. The American military reported that two soldiers died in combat in Anbar Province on Thursday.

And the authorities recovered 15 more bodies from the streets of Baghdad on Friday, the latest victims in a wave of mysterious slayings. More than 200 bodies — most bound, some blindfolded and all either shot in the head or garroted — have been discovered in less than three weeks in the Baghdad area, according to the Interior Ministry.

Some victims have been Palestinians, relatives said in interviews, and community members insist they are targets because of their special relationship with Mr. Hussein and their sectarian allegiances.

Riyad Mansour, the Palestinian observer to the United Nations, said in a letter to the Security Council on Thursday that 10 Palestinians were killed and several kidnapped in the previous week alone. He appealed for international intervention to protect the Palestinians in Iraq.

The United Nations estimates that 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq, and many were born in the country. They were given safe harbor during successive regional crises, beginning with the Arab-Israeli war of 1948.

Mr. Hussein, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a pan-Arab leader, was particularly solicitous of their support. He provided many with free schooling, and free or heavily subsidized housing. But he did not give them the right to own property or the right to citizenship — legal restrictions that remain.

With the fall of Mr. Hussein, many Palestinians were driven from their homes by property owners whose houses had been appropriated by Mr. Hussein. Others came under attack by resentful Iraqis.

Several Palestinians interviewed Friday said the latest generation of violent persecution began last year. At first it was gradual: an unexplained detention here, an assassination there. But since the bombing of the Askariya shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22, violence against Palestinians, particularly in Baghdad, has greatly increased, community members say.

"Now any Palestinian, whether a child or an adult, thinks of himself as a target," said Ali Hussein, 66, a resident of an housing complex for poor Palestinians in Baladiyat, in eastern Baghdad.

Another Baladiyat resident, Fatma Ahmed, said her husband was dragged from his barber shop on Jan. 15 by armed men and driven away. His family found his body in a morgue in March with gunshots to the head and torture wounds on his body.

Sitting in her small apartment in the squalid housing complex, Ms. Ahmed, a heavyset woman with sad eyes, presented a reporter with a two-page typed testimony to her husband's life and unexplained death. "He was known as a hard worker and serious man," the document said, "and his only crime was being Palestinian."

On March 14, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, António Guterres, sent a letter to President Jalal Talabani expressing his concern about reports of violence against Palestinians, and "the limited capacity of the Iraqi security forces to provide effective protection," according to Astrid van Genderen Stort, a spokeswoman for the refugee agency. Mr. Guterres suggested the creation of "a special protection office" in areas populated by Palestinians.

Last Sunday, 89 Palestinians from enclaves around Baghdad arrived at the Jordanian border in two buses seeking refuge. They were turned back by the Jordanian authorities, who closed the border on Monday, and they remained stranded for several days between the Iraqi and Jordanian border posts, a Jordanian government spokesman said.

On Wednesday, the Iraqi government moved them to an Iraqi camp near the border, where the United Nations refugee agency delivered supplies and food. Jordan reopened the border early Thursday, according to Nasser Judeh, a Jordanian spokesman.

The group is "adamant" that it does not want to remain in Iraq, according to a statement from United Nations agency. "They said the killings, disappearance and hostage-taking, affecting their families, neighbors and friends, had become intolerable."

Neighbors and relatives of those in the group say they are watching what happens on the border before they decide whether they, too, will try to flee. But they also said they feared the consequences of staying put.

A Palestinian laborer and resident of Hurriya said the posted death threats have made waiting unbearable. "The countdown has begun," he said.

Threats On Palestians Concern U.N. Agency (AP)

By Bradley S. Klapper, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 25, 2006

The United Nations refugee agency said Friday it was concerned about the safety of Palestinians in Iraq, citing death threats against families in one Baghdad neighborhood.

"They are feeling increasingly trapped, and for security reasons, many have stopped going to work and have taken their children out of school," said Jennifer Pagonis, spokeswoman for the U.N.'s High Commissioner for Refugees.

The agency said threats were posted Thursday on the doors of about 100 Palestinian families. "We will eliminate you all if you don't leave the area for good within 10 days," read a translation of the threats obtained by the U.N. agency.

In the sectarian strife that has recently roiled Iraq, many Shiites and Kurds have come to view Palestinians as sympathetic to the Sunni-dominated insurgency. There also is resentment over privileges they received under Saddam Hussein's rule.

Astrid van Genderen Stort, another UNHCR spokeswoman, said the agency has asked Iraqi authorities to provide increased protection for the Palestinians. Attacks against Palestinians appear to have increased in recent months, she said.

Pagonis said the agency also was concerned about several dozen Palestinians who fled recently to Iraq's Jordanian border.

Jordan refused the group entry and has said it will not take any refugees from Iraq, fearing another exodus to a country already burdened by Palestinians displaced in previous wars.

The UNHCR estimates about 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq. Many came as refugees of the Arab-Israeli wars.

Pawlenty Goes To Iraq In Group Led By McCain (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez and Mark Brunswick

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 25, 2006

He will "be getting a forward look" at challenges facing Minnesota soldiers soon.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty has left for Iraq as part of a delegation led by U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., the governor's office said Friday.

Brian McClung, Pawlenty's spokesman, said that the governor left Thursday afternoon but that McCain's office had asked them to withhold further details of the trip. Also in the delegation are Govs. Bob Riley of Alabama and Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah.

Pawlenty expects to speak to the news media in a conference at midday today.

In a statement released Friday morning, he said the trip is in part to scope out the ground situation in the Middle East, where 2,600 Minnesota National Guard members are headed.

"Together, with Minnesota Reserves and active-duty military, there will be more than 3,000 Minnesota soldiers in Iraq," Pawlenty said in the statement. "During this trip, I will be getting a forward look at the challenges and conditions our Minnesota soldiers will now be facing."

He said he will meet with Minnesota soldiers and military and Iraqi leaders during his stay.

McClung said McCain approached Pawlenty with the invitation after they had chatted at the recent National Governors Association meeting in February. National Guard spokeswoman Lt. Shannon Purvis said few of the new Minnesota troops are in Iraq. Most remain in Kuwait being trained and getting acclimated to desert conditions.

This will be Pawlenty's second surprise visit to Iraq.

He visited Baghdad in February 2004 at the invitation of President Bush, as part of a six-governor fact-finding mission.

While Pawlenty said he never felt endangered on that trip, it was marked by heavy outbreaks of violence in the region, including tracer fire and suicide bombers who killed more than 100 people in two days.

McCain, considered a presidential contender for 2008, is also scheduled to headline fundraisers for Pawlenty in Minneapolis and St. Cloud on April 12.

Salvadorans Ambushed By Memories In Iraq (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

U.S. Had Aided Soldiers in Civil War

SAN SALVADOR -- The convoy of Salvadoran troops was rumbling along a highway in southern Iraq when a bomb exploded under the first Humvee, slicing the driver's neck with shrapnel. As a medic scrambled to reach him, insurgents hiding nearby unleashed a torrent of small-arms fire.

It was the soldiers' first taste of combat in Iraq. But for those who had fought in El Salvador's fierce civil war as teenagers two decades earlier, the skirmish near Diwaniyah last September felt uncomfortably familiar.

Once again, they were crouching for cover against the deafening rat-a-tat-tat of AK-47 assault rifles. Once again, they were firing back with weapons and ammunition supplied by the U.S. government.

"Suddenly all these memories of the civil war came back to me," recalled Gustavo, a 35-year-old sergeant who returned to his village in northern El Salvador last month. Like other soldiers interviewed, he asked that his full name not be published because he was not authorized to speak publicly. "It was strange," he said. "I started remembering all these ambushes and battles I hadn't thought about in so long."

The Salvadoran government's willingness to keep sending troops to Iraq -- after three other Latin American countries pulled out their forces -- underscores the unusually strong political and economic bonds, as well as the unique military relationship, forged in the past two decades between this tiny country and the United States. More than 1 million Salvadorans now live in the United States, including 125,000 in the Washington region, census figures show. The Salvadoran Embassy estimates the number in the region at 500,000.

The Salvadoran and U.S. militaries have largely reversed their roles in the two conflicts. In El Salvador, Salvadoran soldiers did nearly all the fighting against leftist guerrillas, while dozens of U.S. military advisers trained, armed and often secretly directed them as part of a broader policy to prevent any more Central American nations from succumbing to the leftist revolution that swept Nicaragua in 1979.

In Iraq, the roughly 380 Salvadoran troops are a tiny presence compared with the 133,000 U.S. troops there. Perhaps their greatest contribution is to help preserve the diminishing "coalition of the willing" that President Bush assembled in 2003. Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic originally sent troops but have since withdrawn.

One reason El Salvador has agreed to stay, according to analysts, is that its three most recent elected presidents have been members of the rightist ARENA party, which has close ties with the Bush administration and shares its commitment to a proposed regional free-trade agreement.

Salvadoran workers in the United States send home $2.8 billion annually, and the current Salvadoran president, Elias Antonio Saca, has been lobbying the U.S. government to liberalize immigration laws so more can enter legally. He has also requested repeated extensions of the temporary legal status that the United States granted to more than 220,000 illegal Salvadoran immigrants in 2001 after earthquakes devastated El Salvador.

Last month, the Bush administration announced the latest extension of the controversial program, two weeks after Saca agreed to send a sixth contingent of troops to Iraq. So far, more than 2,300 Salvadorans have served there, and two have been killed.

"ARENA has evolved considerably, but the continuity is still there," noted Peter Hakim, president of the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based research group. Although neither government has acknowledged a link to El Salvador's Iraq policy, "it certainly doesn't hurt," he observed.

Some Salvadorans feel it is unfair to send the troops to Iraq. One is Herminia Ramos, whose son Natividad died there in 2004.

"Yes, they have a duty to serve. But it's a duty to protect their own country, not to take care of a country so far away that has nothing to do with us," Ramos, 47, said bitterly on a recent morning as she shelled peas in the dirt yard of her village home. "It's like our government is selling these soldiers to the United States."

Ramos said Natividad dropped out of school at age 15 to join the army after his father died. Ramos, an illiterate laundress, needed money to raise her three younger children, and the army paid about $240 a month.

Within two years, Natividad was deployed to Iraq. He was killed in the city of Najaf on April 4, 2004, when supporters of the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr stormed a barracks defended by Salvadoran and Spanish troops. A second Salvadoran soldier died in a vehicle accident.

Ramos said she knew her son was dead the moment she saw a delegation of soldiers coming up the path to her mud-brick hut. "I had this horrible feeling in my stomach," she recalled, tears rolling down her cheeks. "All I felt was pain."

Her grief soon turned to anger. It took months of nagging to get the military to build the small cement house it had promised her, and Natividad's $7,000 government life insurance payment soon ran out.

Last summer, with help from another son, Ramos wrote to President Saca, begging him not to send any more soldiers to Iraq. But there have been only small, scattered antiwar demonstrations in El Salvador, and several recently returned soldiers said they did not resent being deployed.

"Maybe going doesn't benefit me personally. But I know it's good for the country and for all those Salvadorans in the United States," Gustavo said.

Other soldiers said that when they passed through John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York on their way to Iraq, Salvadoran janitors thanked them, saying their military service was creating more respect for Salvadoran immigrants.

Many also said they felt a personal duty to repay U.S. soldiers for serving alongside them during the civil war.

The U.S. involvement in that conflict remains controversial because U.S. officials overlooked or played down atrocities committed by the Salvadoran military against civilians. But many Salvadorans who were drafted as teenagers to fight guerrillas viewed the U.S. money and training as a lifesaver for their country.

In Iraq, the warm relations have continued. Salvadorans said many U.S. soldiers, particularly those who spoke some Spanish, would seek them out in mess halls or stop by their barracks to say hello.

"They'd call us 'brother' and ask for our Salvadoran flag patches to put on their uniforms," recalled Cesar, 37, a sergeant who lives near the capital. In response, he said, he stuck an American flag patch on his flak vest, until his Iraqi translator warned him it would increase his chances of being shot at by insurgents.

Salvadoran soldiers have faced plenty of danger in Iraq, including the ambush at Diwaniyah. On patrols, they said, bullets would strike their Humvees; at night, their barracks were frequently attacked with mortars.

One day, Gustavo's unit was called to guard the scene of a suicide bombing in a market. Picking his way past body parts, he said, he was flooded with gruesome memories of the civil war he had tried to forget: his brother, blinded after stepping on a mine; the corpse of a female social worker, cut open and left naked in the middle of a road.

Now, three weeks after returning home, Gustavo said he still has trouble sleeping. If his wife taps him even gently, he bounds out of bed and takes cover.

"You felt like you were taunting death every time you went out," Gustavo said.

Over time, the soldiers became more reluctant to go on patrols. The decline in morale was partly fueled by rumors of corruption among the battalion's leadership, whom soldiers suspected of stealing new uniforms and boots. They were also humiliated to learn that troops from other developing nations were being paid up to seven times what they were getting.

Pablo, 37, a corporal now on leave in his cinder-block home in a slum near the capital, said he was hoping for his first raise in 10 years. If it doesn't come through, he said, he will have no choice but to try to sneak into the United States. He has four young children and mounting school expenses.

Besides, he said with a hopeful smile, "if the border police catch me, then I'll just explain to them that I'm a Salvadoran who served in Iraq. Then maybe they'll let me stay."

Afghan Judge Balks At Prodding (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

KABUL -- The chief judge trying an Afghan man who faces a death sentence for converting from Islam to Christianity defended the court's autonomy yesterday amid reports the man could be freed.

Ansarullah Mawlavi Zada, the chief among three judges trying the case, asserted the autonomy of the court.

"We have constitution and law here. Nobody has the right to put pressure on us," he said. International pressure against the case has been building, and the Afghan government may be rethinking the charges against Abdul Rahman. A government official and MSNBC said yesterday that Mr. Rahman may be freed within the next few days.

Senior clerics condemned Mr. Rahman as an apostate.

Mr. Rahman had "committed the greatest sin" by converting to Christianity and deserved to be killed, cleric Abdul Raoulf said in a sermon yesterday at Herati Mosque.

"God's way is the right way, and this man whose name is Abdul Rahman is an apostate," he told about 150 worshippers.

Another cleric, Asife Muhseni, told a gathering of preachers and intellectuals at a Kabul hotel that the Afghan president had no right to overturn the punishment of an apostate.

He demanded that clerics be able to question Mr. Rahman in jail to discover why he had converted to Christianity. He suggested it could have been the result of a conspiracy by Western nations or Jews.

Nevertheless, speculation grew yesterday that the death penalty would not be carried out. "He could be released soon," an Afghan government official said on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the case.

MSNBC, citing an Afghan diplomatic official it did not identify, said Mr. Rahman, 41, could be released Monday. The British Broadcasting Corp. said government officials were meeting today to discuss the case.

Senior clerics in the Afghan capital have voiced strong support for prosecuting Mr. Rahman and again warned yesterday they would incite people to kill him unless he reverted to Islam.

Australia's Prime Minister John Howard, meanwhile, joined the chorus of Western leaders expressing outrage over the prosecution and said he would protest personally to President Hamid Karzai.

"This is appalling. When I saw the report about this I felt sick literally," Mr. Howard told an Australian radio network yesterday. "The idea that a person could be punished because of their religious belief and the idea they might be executed is just beyond belief."

Mr. Rahman faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Mr. Karzai's office has declined to comment on the case, which has put the Afghan leader in an awkward position.

Mr. Karzai took power after the ouster of the hard-line Taliban regime in a U.S.-led war in late 2001 and he relies on international forces to maintain his still-shaky grip on the country. However, he could be reluctant to offend Islamic sensibilities at home or alienate religious conservatives wielding considerable power.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Mr. Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to determine whether he is fit to stand trial.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Mr. Karzai on Thursday, seeking a "favorable resolution" of the case. She said Washington looked forward to that "in the very near future."

At a fruit market in Kabul, many ordinary Afghans said they supported the death penalty, but some wanted more investigation before meting out the punishment.

"In the past 30 years, so many Afghans have been killed in name of communism, Taliban and politics or for robbery. It's enough Afghans killed," said Ghulam Muhammad, 45, a former army officer. "Clerics should talk to [Mr. Rahman] and bring him to the right way," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0022028

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 24 — Preachers used Friday Prayer services to call for the execution of an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity, despite growing protests in the West. The conversion of the man, Abdul Rahman, 15 years ago was brought to the attention of the authorities as part of a child custody dispute.

The Bush administration and European governments have strongly protested the case as a violation of religious freedom. But Mr. Rahman has drawn a strong reaction in Afghanistan, too, and for many hardline clerics, there is no greater offense than apostasy.

One speaker, Maulavi Habibullah, told more than a thousand clerics and young people gathered in Kabul: "Afghanistan does not have any obligation under international laws. The prophet says, when somebody changes religion, he must be killed."

He and others demanded that the country's political leaders and judges resist international pressure.

Germany's chancellor, Angela Merkel, told reporters on Friday that she had been assured by President Hamid Karzai in a telephone call that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, The Associated Press reported.

A senior government official said Mr. Rahman, 41, would be released from jail soon, Agence France-Presse reported. The agency did not identify the official, who added that there would be a top-level meeting on the case on Saturday.

The dispute has exposed the contradictions in Afghanistan's Constitution, which promises freedom of religion on the one hand, and on the other declares Islam supreme.

Sheik Asif Muhsini, a Shiite cleric, emphasized that the Constitution says, "No law can contradict Islam and the values of the Constitution."

The case has fueled feelings here of an assault against Islam, coming after reports of the possible desecration of the Koran in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, in 2004 by American soldiers and, more recently, cartoons published in Europe that mocked the Prophet Muhammad.

U.S. Christians Outraged Over Afghan Trial (AP)

By Peter James Spielmann

AP, March 25, 2006

Christian lobby groups are urging President Bush to do more to save a man on trial in Afghanistan for converting from Islam to Christianity.

Anger among American Christians continued to mount against the U.S.-backed government of Afghanistan, where Abdul Rahman, a 41-year-old former medical aid worker, faces the death penalty under Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

Rahman's trial, which started last week, has fired passions in conservative Muslim Afghanistan and highlighted a conflict of values between Afghanistan and its Western backers — notably American Christians who cheered the Bush administration when it toppled the oppressive Taliban regime.

American Christians have criticized the Bush administration for what they feel is an inadequate response to a fundamental issue of freedom of conscience.

"That there should even be such a trial is an outrage. How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians?" Family Research Council president Tony Perkins said in a statement.

"Americans will not give their blood and treasure to prop up new Islamic fundamentalist regimes. Religious freedom is not just 'an important element' of democracy; it is its cornerstone. Religious persecution leads inevitably to political tyranny. Five hundred years of history confirm this. Americans have not given their lives so that Christians can be put to death," Perkins said.

Such sentiments are spreading through Christian radio stations, Web sites and blogs, stoked by traditional conservative institutions as National Review magazine.

National Review Online quoted Chuck Colson, a former Nixon White House official, disgraced by Watergate and rehabilitated as a Christian preacher, as saying:

DOJ_NMG_0022029

"I have supported the Bush administration's foreign policy because I came to believe that the best way to stop Islamo-fascism was by promoting democracy," Colson said. "But if we can't guarantee fundamental religious freedoms in the countries where we establish democratic reforms, then the whole credibility of our foreign policy is thrown into serious question."

The American Family Association has organized an Internet campaign to e-mail Bush and "ask him to intervene to save the life of Abdul Rahman. Help get others involved in saving the life of this Christian who refuses to deny Christ."

Bush expressed alarm this week, and on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Karzai, seeking a "favorable resolution" of the Rahman case.

Rice spokesman Sean McCormack said she told Karzai it is important for the Afghan people to know that freedom of religion is observed in their country.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to see whether he is fit to stand trial.

If Rahman is executed, political experts agree, Bush will have alienated his most loyal core constituency — Christian conservatives.

"The Bush administration simply cannot let this happen. They have to stop this one way or the other. It would make a mockery of much of what President Bush has about our creation of a new democracy in Afghanistan," said Professor Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia, a keen analyst of American political trends.

"It splits his base, and it will be endless trouble for him if it goes forward, and I'm sure he won't it happen," Sabato said.

The largest Protestant denomination in America, the usually conservative Southern Baptists, also mobilized on the issue:

"The American people are not sending their young men and women to Afghanistan for this definition of freedom," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission. "Compulsion in the name of any religion is shameful and should be rejected by any sincere professor of any religion. Mr. Rahman should be released immediately.

Christian activists have had strong influence over particular Bush foreign policy issues which they see as morally pivotal.

Christian lobbyists have focused on global trafficking in refugees, especially sex slaves; tried to pacify a two-decade war in Sudan between the Muslim government in the north and Christian and animist groups in the south; and have tried to crack North Korea's oppressive isolation by sending aid to covert Christian groups and smuggling out refugees.

Republican Congressman Chris Smith wrote to Bush saying that "the arrest of Mr. Rahman indicates that religious freedom and the fundamental human rights of not just this one man, but of each and every Afghan citizen, are still not fully protected in Afghanistan."

The Compass Direct News Agency, a group that monitors the persecutions of Christians worldwide, reported this week that two more Afghan Christians have been arrested and said more are being beaten and harassed by Afghans riled over the Rahman case.

The Afghan Christian: A Problem For Karzai (TIME)

By Rachel Morarjee

Time, March 24, 2006

The man facing a death sentence for converting to Christianity has put Afghanistan's president in a bind

President Hamid Karzai's fragile Afghan government finds itself in a bind over the trial of Abdul Rahman, 41, who faces the death sentence for converting to Christianity. International pressure is building on Karzai to interfere in the judicial process and free Rahman. But the President must also contend with deeply conservative Afghans — many of whom already regard him as too pro-West — who believe the convert should be punished under Islamic law.

This week, several world leaders — including those with peacekeeping troops in Afghanistan — have voiced alarm about the trial. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Karzai on Thursday, urging a "favorable resolution" to the case.

But for many Afghans, the "favorable resolution" would be Rahman's execution. It's not only the country's conservative clergy that is calling for his death. "He has brought shame on the name of Afghanistan and deserves to die," said Daud Massoud, 37, a taxi driver in Kabul. That sentiment resonates strongest in the country's deeply conservative south and east, over which

Kabul exercises little control. These are also the areas where the Taliban is making a comeback and top Al-Qaeda commanders are believed to be hiding.

Meanwhile, the judge presiding over the case has rejected international calls for leniency and warned the Karzai government not to interfere with the judicial process. Ansarullah Maulavizada appealed for the West to respect the independence of the Afghan judiciary. “In the West you allow two women to get married because that is the law and I respect that,” he told TIME. “In Afghanistan, we have Sharia law and the people respect and accept this.”

The only concession Maulavizada is prepared to make is to speed up the trial process. "Because this is a complex case we would like to get it over with quickly — the hearing will be this week," he said.

Karzai is acutely aware of how badly a death sentence would play with foreign governments whose aid dollars keep the Afghan economy afloat — and whose troops keep the peace. “There is no way it would come to a death penalty,” a top Afghan government official told TIME, “because Karzai would have the final say on any appeal [Rahman] made to have his sentence commuted.” Karzai has greenlighted only one death sentence since he came to office.

It may not come to that. Some officials have suggested that Rahman may be declared mentally ill, allowing the judge to show leniency. “He has said he is a Christian, but we do not know about his mental state,” said Maulavizada. “We will investigate and if we find he is mentally ill we will send him to the doctors.”

In Afghan Christian, Story Of A Larger Conflict (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

BERLIN Edmund Stoiber, the conservative German who runs the conservative and successful state of Bavaria, put his country's outrage bluntly. "A change of belief is supremely private," he said. "The state has nothing to do with it."

The change in question was that of Abdul Rahman, an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity. Apostasy is about as bad as it gets under Islamic law and Rahman is facing a possible death sentence in Kabul.

The plight of Rahman, who was denounced by his family for abandoning Islam and is in jail in Afghanistan, has got Germany in a tizzy. The case has all the elements to stoke German outrage.

It also has elements that should lead everyone to ponder whether the West's problem is really with a "perversion" of Islam, as politicians from President George W. Bush to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain have insisted, or with Islam itself.

German ire has been particularly intense for several reasons: Rahman once lived in Germany; the country is ferociously opposed to the death sentence; it is ferociously attached to freedom of religious choice; and it has over 2,000 troops in Afghanistan to promote precisely the democratic values it sees being trampled in the Rahman case.

Rahman's words in a recent Kabul court appearance have become a kind of rallying cry for an indignant Germany: "I'm not an apostate, I'm obedient to God but I'm a Christian, that's my choice."

Seems reasonable enough to the average citizen of the West. But not to the conservative religious leaders who dominate Afghan courts. The judge told Rahman, who converted 15 years ago while working for an aid group in Pakistan, that he could face the death penalty if he refused to become a Muslim again.

So what, Germans wondered, were their troops doing in this faraway place, if a 41-year-old man who has not hurt a flea but prefers Christianity to Islam could face execution?

Politicians have scurried to register outrage. Chancellor Angela Merkel, a Christian Democrat, called the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, to protest. She then declared that "Afghanistan must keep to its international obligations," whatever they may be.

Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the Social Democratic foreign minister, has also been on the phone, speaking to the Afghan foreign minister, Abdullah. He expressed hope that a solution might be found and cautioned that the withdrawal of German aid or soldiers - a measure demanded by several members of Parliament - could "play into the hands of those who would like to reverse the process of recent years."

Germany, of course, is not alone in its indignation. Bush has said he's "deeply troubled." Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, has given Abdullah an earful. A State Department spokesman has alluded to the flouting of "universal democratic values." Christian talk shows in the United States have moved into overdrive.

With all this commotion, it seems reasonable to take a deep breath and ask what's actually going on. Afghan prosecutors have no doubt Rahman's a "microbe," as they've called him, and that they are fulfilling their obligations under Shariah law.

European and American politicians have no doubt that the values of the civilization they represent are being threatened in a state they are striving to remake, if not in their image, at least in an image acceptable to the West.

The mutual incomprehension, and anger, is strong. It reflects a basic fact that Western politicians have tended to shy away from: Islam, the youngest of the world's major religions, is still, more than a quarter-century after the Iranian revolution, in the midst of a tremendous political effervescence.

After the eclipse of Nasserite pan- Arabism, it became the political refuge of millions of people questing for some alternative to the corrupt Middle Eastern tyrannies they saw being supported by the West, particularly the United States. The contemporary rise of Hamas, and the political success of the Taliban in Afghanistan in the 1990s, are just two illustrations of this phenomenon.

Such political Islam takes many forms, but central to it is the notion that the Koran and other sacred texts provide a complete system of laws for societies and individuals. The Western notion of a separation of church and state, of religion and politics belonging respectively to the private and public spheres, is anathema.

In this sense, two worlds often confront each other across the gulf between the West and Islam, worlds that the West would characterize as modern and anti-modern. To ignore this seems treacherous.

But Western leaders have striven to confine the scope of the conflict. They talk of being at war with Islamic fundamentalists who have "perverted" their religion in the name of a murderous and fanatical ideology. They insist their quarrel is not with Islam itself.

This is understandable: Islam is a great world religion followed by more than a fifth of humanity. No Islamic text exhorts the random slaughter of civilians, although every violent and fundamentalist group of the bin Laden school has tried to sanctify its actions through references to jihad against the infidel and claims to represent a purer, more authentic Islam.

In reality, it seems, there is an overall conflict and there is a war. The war has been declared by Bush against Islamic extremism, the kind that produced the 9/11 attack. The overall conflict is illustrated in the Rahman case.

Here, over the fate of a Christian Afghan, the values of the West and the values of Islam fight each other. They are violently at odds; no ecumenical circumlocution gets around that.

The West and Islam also fight each other in European societies where honor killings take the lives of young Muslim women, or homosexuals get assaulted. Two views of society and the place of religion within it vie with each other.

In this sense, Rahman offers a timely reminder. The West and Islam are not at war, but they are in conflict. And it seems myopic and counterproductive to view the war as anything but the extreme expression of that conflict.

Planners Raise Funds For Veterans Memorial (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, March 25, 2006

Soldiers returning from Iraq and other conflicts with missing limbs and shattered bodies will have a place of honor among the memorials of the nation's capital.

Planners are raising money for a new site — nestled among the tributes to fallen war heroes, from World War II, Korea and Vietnam — to salute roughly 3 million disabled veterans.

The American Veterans Disabled for Life Memorial is expected to open in the next three to four years on an impressive two-acre site near the National Mall, just steps from the Capitol.

Authorized by federal legislation in 2000, the future memorial has taken on added meaning as Americans watch a new generation of disabled veterans return from war in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Now it's even more important than ever with the number of people coming back wounded, maimed and in some cases disabled for life," said Arthur Wilson, president of the Disabled Veterans' LIFE Memorial Foundation, the group planning the project. "This will be the only war memorial that will honor the living as opposed to the deceased."

DOJ_NMG_0022032

The foundation is in the midst of a $65 million private fundraising campaign to build the memorial. Earlier this year, the group tapped former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony Principi to join its advisory board and help raise the private funds needed to design and build the site.

Actor Gary Sinise, who played the crusty, wheelchair-bound Vietnam Veteran Lt. Dan in the movie "Forrest Gump," is serving as a national spokesman for the memorial.

Pope said she was moved by the story of wounded soldiers in the 1970s, after she performed for injured veterans at the Rusk Rehabilitation Center in New York.

"I chose the song 'Somewhere' from 'West Side Story' and one of the lyrics goes, 'Hold my hand and I'll take you there,'" she said in a telephone interview from her office in Delray Beach, Fla. "I looked down and one of the men had no hands, but he smiled and it changed my life."

Several years later, she began working with then-Veterans Affairs Secretary Jesse Brown to persuade Congress to approve the memorial. It received strong bipartisan support, and President Clinton signed legislation authorizing the plan in 2000. Pope has already donated $2 million toward the project and has pledged to give more through matching gifts.

The memorial's design — still being fine tuned — features a reflecting pool with an eternal flame at the center, surrounded by a grove of trees. Two walls of glass will be etched with quotations from dignitaries and veterans of various wars, with comments discussing when they were injured and how they cope with being disabled.

Four 9-foot-tall bronze sculptures interspersed in openings along the glass wall will show the human body in various states of injury to suggest a sense of loss.

Ironically, interest in the memorial has increased since the Iraq war began. So far, the foundation has raised more than $10 million and received support and donations from a variety of veterans groups, including Kansas City, Mo.-based Veterans of Foreign Wars, which donated $100,000.

While there are no firm statistics yet on how many disabled veterans have emerged from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the rate of severe injuries is higher than previous wars because improvements in body armor and battlefield medical treatment allow more troops to survive blast injuries.

Jeremy Chwat, policy director of the service members' aid group Wounded Warrior Project, estimates 6,000 to 8,000 of the wounded soldiers in the conflicts have suffered severe injuries.

"And by severe, we mean living with a disability for the rest of their lives," Chwat said.

That includes more than 1,000 soldiers suffering traumatic brain injury and nearly 400 amputees — many from roadside bombs — according to the latest figures from the U.S. Army Medical Command and Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington.

Surviving To Tell The Tale Of Torture (LAT)

By Olga Talamante, Olga Talamante Is The Executive Director Of California's Chicana/latina Foundation.

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

THE BURLAP BAG felt rough and scratchy against my cheek, but it also smelled earthy and deceptively comforting. Thick tape already covered my eyes, so the bag's only purpose was to frighten me. And it worked. I knew I had entered another dimension.

A day earlier I had been a not-too-unusual 24-year-old American student from UC Santa Cruz, working with the Peronist Youth organization for social change in Azul, Argentina. For the next 16 months, I would become one of thousands of political prisoners and torture victims taken into custody as Argentina first declared martial law and then later suffered a right-wing military coup. But I was one of the lucky ones — a survivor, thanks to family and friends in the United States who won my release on March 27, 1976.

When I returned home to California and testified about the torture, my stories horrified listeners. But we could feel safe here because torture was the province of brutal, unsophisticated despots. It was a time when the average American could not imagine our soldiers abroad participating in anything remotely similar. Now, three years into the Iraq war, we have seen the images of Abu Ghraib and read accounts of the atrocities at Baghdad's Camp Nama.

Americans once shocked by my experience now hear officials defend torture as a necessary evil in the war against terrorism. But it is only evil.

In my secret torture chamber — later it was confirmed to have been within the walls of the local police station — a slight turn of my head could bring on a new barrage of insults and fists.

On one occasion, hands grabbed and pushed me up stairs. I could feel furniture and tried to use the contour of a chair, the edge of a table and sounds to get my bearings. I wanted to know exactly where I was: to the left of the table, to the right of the credenza or in front of the water fountain?

My torturers pushed me here and there. But I was determined. With my elbow, I felt the corner of a table, then a chair. Victory. They wanted me confused, but I knew my exact position. I was between the table and the chair. As long as my position was clear, some odd reasoning assured me, survival would follow.

They took me to another room. I sensed several new people. I heard men's voices. They untied my hands and feet. They ordered me to take my clothes off. I hesitated, and they made it clear that it was not a request but a demand. Now naked except for the tape over my eyes, I felt hands sit me down on a bed and then push me back, spreading my arms and legs, tying them at each corner. If I know where I am, I can survive? The thought was less convincing.

Electric currents were applied to the most sensitive parts of my body.

All I could do was scream. The terror came after. They are going to do it again, I thought. Someone shoved a pillow over my face to muffle my screams. I panicked. To survive, I must be able to breathe and scream.

After about the third time the electric current surged, I figured out a brilliant maneuver. Right before the hands holding the pillow pushed down again, I turned my head sideways and took a breath. The timing of this took complete focus. It was a project. New reasoning kicked in: As long as I could get the timing right, I would survive.

Now, every time I read a story about U.S. forces participating in similar acts, it takes me back to that torture room.

The Argentine military had its own sick rationale for policies that would ultimately "disappear" thousands of men, women and children — they were fighting an enemy from within. But the Argentine people had a better name for it: the "dirty war."

As Argentina marked the 30th anniversary of the military coup last week, ex-Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, key implementer of that dirty war, was under house arrest, with thousands of people camped outside his home. The former general has been convicted for multiple cases of robbery, homicide, aggravated false arrests, torture and torture resulting in death between 1976 and 1981. He has been sentenced to life imprisonment. The people are demanding that he serve out that sentence.

Iraq has become our dirty war. To those who defend torture there, beware. There will be survivors, and they will tell their stories.

Uncle Sam's Desperation -- And A Recruit's (WP)

By Brian Ford

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

"Can you give a psychological clearance for someone who wants to go into the military?" asked the caller, in a crisp, authoritative voice.

Having heard so much about the military's recent recruiting difficulties, I was intrigued. "Sure, assuming the person's okay."

"Now, I'm only authorized to pay for one session, but we don't want you to do psychoanalysis. You just need to say that this kid is okay to rejoin the Army."

"Rejoin?"

"He signed up three years ago, but then he got homesick and depressed, didn't feel comfortable handling weapons or with all the violence. He was generally discharged."

To my knowledge, a general discharge was both negative and not that easy to get. The kid must have been in pretty bad shape. "Why would he be any different now?"

DOJ_NMG_0022034

"Says he sees the opportunity he gave up and now he wants to make the Army his career. We'd like to help him do that." "Help him" seemed to hang in the air, like a hawk above some oblivious fledgling.

"Honestly," the recruiter said, "we didn't used to consider someone like this, but we're under lots of pressure these days."

I thought back to my hospital emergency room days and the many patients I'd seen whose first psychiatric problems had emerged while they were in the military. They might have arisen anyway, but the stress of military service had always seemed a contributing factor.

"Maybe you'd like to see his discharge report?"

A grainy fax soon arrived. "Serious symptoms of anxiety and depression," the evaluator had written, "likely to get worse if subject remains in military." Also attached was the kid's own handwritten statement. "I hate this 'kill, kill, kill' all the time. Maybe the army is great, but it's not for me."

The plaintive tone was even more compelling than the evaluator's. Could the kid's attitude possibly have changed that much? Still, I tried to be open-minded when Juan arrived next morning in a worn gray sweatshirt and jeans. He was so short, maybe 5-3, that I wondered if the Army had any sort of height requirement.

I ran through the standard questions about hallucinations, delusions, substance abuse, suicidal or violent thoughts, suppressing an ironic smile at this last query. Juan said nothing remarkable.

"I've got your discharge evaluation," I told him finally, plucking the document from my desk, "but maybe it would be better if you just tell me what happened back then."

Juan took a deep breath. "Bad timing," he said. "I signed up between my junior and senior years in high school, but by the time I had to go I was married and had a son. My wife kept writing saying how much she missed me, how I wasn't seeing my baby grow up. That really got me. She's all for it now," he quickly added. "She's thinking of joining herself once she gets her GED."

"You had a hard time with all the violence."

Juan ducked his head sheepishly. "I made that up. It wasn't like I loved the Army or anything, but back then I didn't know what life was about. As soon as I left I wanted to go back, but you have to wait two years to reapply after a general discharge."

"What have you done since then?"

"Worked at a warehouse till it closed, McDonald's, Wal-Mart. I'm temping now since my family's been in the shelter."

"The shelter."

"Couldn't pay the rent. It's kind of funny, the building is right across the street from the recruiting center." Juan smiled at this evident transparency. "But that's why I want to enlist -- put a roof over my family's head."

Maybe with more sessions we could have explored whether this was what he really wanted. But that wasn't our task. "If you get in, I guess you could wind up in Iraq."

"They tell us 70 percent."

"How do you feel about possibly getting wounded or even killed?"

"I just keep my mind on the paycheck, health insurance, even the uniform. I think of my son looking at me and saying, 'Wow! A soldier.' "

I looked at him. Was it a facade or had he accurately calculated that this truly was the most promising of his potential life paths? I didn't know which was worse.

"So what do you think?" he asked.

"You seem fine now. I'm concerned how you'll manage if you get back in."

"No one knows that."

"We have to consider past history."

"Even though I'm saying I made it all up?"

"Yes."

He looked crushed, as though seeing life's opportunities lost to one youthful indiscretion. "But really, I'm all right now."

The recruiter called after he left. "Do you have to write that you're not sure how he'll manage?"

"Yes."

"The kid really wants this." He sounded like a realtor or a car salesman making one last pitch to a prospect.

DOJ_NMG_0022035

"I know."

Juan came by next morning to pick up his evaluation. "If this doesn't work out, what will you do?" I asked.

"Just keep trying," He tucked the letter in his pocket. "This is my dream."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Overturns Lifetime Ban On Quattrone By NASD (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission set aside a lifetime ban from the securities industry that had been imposed against Frank Quattrone, the former star investment banker.

It was Mr. Quattrone's second big win of the week related to charges against him. On Monday, a federal appeals court vacated his May 2004 criminal conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by his trial judge.

In the SEC action Friday, the federal securities regulator struck down a lifetime ban from the business, which had been imposed in November 2004 by an arm of the National Association of Securities Dealers. The move puts him a step closer to returning to the securities industry.

The ban resulted from Mr. Quattrone's failure to testify during an investigation by the NASD into allegations of possible improper "spinning," or rule violations related to steering hot initial public offerings of stock to investment-banking clients.

A lawyer for Mr. Quattrone, Jerome B. Falk, said the SEC decision "corrects the NASD's gross injustice," and is "particularly appropriate" considering the appeals court ruling. The NASD declined to comment, saying it was "reviewing the commission's decision." A Quattrone spokesman said it is "too early" to address any possible return to Wall Street by the banker.

Although the ruling could open the door for Mr. Quattrone's return to the securities business, he faces a possible third trial on the same federal criminal obstruction charges, and a separate set of charges against him by the NASD remains pending. Those charges relate to the issues of spinning and research bias. A criminal conviction would carry a 10-year industry ban.

Mr. Quattrone, 50 years old, who at the time the NASD sought his testimony was under investigation for possible obstruction, cited his fifth-amendment right against self-incrimination. He had previously testified in the same proceeding, and asked for a delay until the criminal proceedings were resolved.

In January 2004, an NASD hearing panel suspended Mr. Quattrone for a year. After both the NASD and Mr. Quattrone appealed, the NASD's National Adjudicatory Council ordered a more stringent lifetime ban, which Mr. Quattrone then appealed to the SEC.

Mr. Quattrone argued that because the NASD was probing possible spinning and research-bias charges against numerous firms in conjunction with the SEC, the NASD was acting as a government agency, which should have given him the right to avoid testifying. He also said he was being treated unfairly because of his notoriety. Mr. Quattrone was the top technology banker for the former Credit Suisse First Boston unit of Credit Suisse Group during the Internet market mania.

Friday's SEC ruling said that the NASD should have given Mr. Quattrone's argument a hearing.

A Fine That Fits The Crime (NYT)

By Gary Weiss

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

THE mutual fund scandals, which exploded with a thunderclap of attention in September 2003, are winding down. You might even say they are over. The more or less final act came earlier this month, when Bear Stearns agreed to a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission under which it would pay $250 million to investors for its alleged fund-related transgressions.

DOJ_NMG_0022036

If one represents "yelling at customers" and 10 is "stealing their money," what Bear Stearns did was a solid six on the scale of Wall Street improprieties. Professional traders, mostly at hedge funds, had engaged in rapid-fire trading of otherwise innocent-looking mutual funds. This seesaw damaged the funds' net asset values and thus the IRA's and 401(k)'s of small investors. By some accounts, traders had been doing that kind of thing for many years, until regulators and, particularly, Eliot Spitzer, the New York State attorney general, nabbed them.

Through it all, regulators have relied mainly, though not exclusively, on monetary sanctions. Bear Stearns's wasn't even the largest — Bank of America holds the record at $675 million.

But while these large "fines," as they are usually called in the news media, are reassuring, it's arguable at best whether they mean very much to the companies being penalized. Just as the hedge fund giant Long-Term Capital Management was too big to fail in 1998, when it was bailed out to keep from torpedoing the entire financial system, the biggest Wall Street firms are simply too large to be effectively punished. At least, not by the kind of sanctions meted out to Bear Stearns.

To begin with, Bear Stearns did not pay a "fine." The company will pay $250 million in "disgorgements and penalties." The penalty part was just $90 million. The other $160 million consisted of restitution, with interest, of profits gained by abetting the illicit trading from 1999 to 2003. As is typical in S.E.C. settlements, Bear Stearns agreed to pay all this money without admitting or denying the allegations.

Whatever you call it, the simple fact is that a firm the size of Bear Stearns can easily afford to pay that kind of money.

Sure, the $250 million comprises nearly half of the company's net income for the first quarter. But keep in mind that this is not "income" in the sense of the word used by most people. The corporate term of art describes (broadly speaking) revenue in excess of expenses — what most people would call "money tucked away for a rainy day." If you had committed a crime and as punishment you had to give up half of what you would normally put in a savings or retirement account over a three-month period — well, would you complain? I certainly wouldn't. I'd sign a settlement like that, particularly if I didn't have to say I did anything wrong.

When compared to what most people would define as "income," the penalty shrinks to a hair under one-fifteenth (one-14.6th, to be exact) of Bear Stearns's gross revenue of $3.6 billion during the first quarter. For most households struggling to make ends meet on $100,000 a year, a fine of one-14.6th of three months' pay would come to about $1,712. That's about, oh, maybe 15 unpaid New York City parking tickets?

The penalty has the same unimpressive quality when compared to Bear Stearns's total wealth. The company's shareholders' equity is just shy of $11.2 billion. Divided into that sum, the $250 million shrinks way down to one-44.7th of the total. Now really, if you were caught doing something allegedly illegal, and had a net worth of, say, $200,000, would you object to a fine of about $4,500?

To be fair, I should point out that Bear Stearns did more than just agree to pay some money that it didn't admit owing from all the things it didn't admit doing. The firm also agreed, among other things, to hire a consultant to ensure that all the stuff it didn't admit doing never happens again.

A real shellacking — in the form of, say, a meaningful fine — was never in the cards, and for good reason. While it's easy to scoff at the size of the penalties, it cannot be disputed that Bear Stearns, as a premier bond trader, stock titan and derivatives powerhouse, is far too large to risk driving out of business. The only other alternative would be jail terms. But they carry their own disadvantages, not the least of which is that mutual fund trading transgressions are not on the same level of perfidy as, say, boiler-room thievery.

So we are left with an essentially meaningless penalty, no admission of guilt — and, in all likelihood, a Wall Street that is no less likely to push against the envelope of propriety.

What's needed is some pain. The S.E.C. needs to make Wall Street firms wince when they do something wrong. The same kind of hurt you or I feel when we have to trudge down to the impound lot to get our cars out of hock for those 15 unpaid parking tickets.

An admission of guilt would be a good start. Then private litigants stand a far better chance of collecting. Call it the regulatory equivalent of a tow truck. Congress could help by passing a provision of tax-relief legislation, now before a House-Senate conference, that would make it harder for firms to take write-offs from settlements with government agencies.

Market observers speak of a "cycle of scandal" on Wall Street — a pattern of transgressions recurring periodically, often as a coda to bull markets, undeterred by an inadequate regulatory response. Until regulators start making errant firms feel some real pain, the next Wall Street scandal is not a question of if, but when.

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The federal agency that insures private pensions is seeking outside legal counsel to help represent its interests in financial transactions at General Motors Corp.

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. filed a solicitation for help in negotiations with GM over its plans to spin off a portion of its valuable financing unit, General Motors Acceptance Corp. The PBGC wants to make sure that it has access to all GM assets if it were required to take on GM employee pension obligations.

The agency, which hired counsel in the bankruptcy of UAL Corp.'s United Airlines, has a responsibility to protect its financial interests in the event that GM decided to file for bankruptcy protection down the road.

The PBGC, which insures defined-benefit plans, has reported a deficit of $22.8 billion. Bankrupt steel and airline companies that have transferred pension responsibilities to the PBGC have been a major factor in the agency's swollen debt.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Clearing DeLay (TH)

By Robert Novak

Towhall, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has advised friends that he has no derogatory information about former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and is not implicating him as part of his plea bargain with federal prosecutors.

Abramoff's guilty plea on fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy charges requires him to provide evidence about members of Congress. That led to speculation that this would mean trouble for DeLay, who faces money laundering and conspiracy charges in Texas.

However, Abramoff has not given a clean bill of health to any other congressman -- including Rep. Robert Ney, who has stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee. Ney was the only member of Congress named in court papers connected with Abramoff's guilty plea Jan. 4.

BUSH'S SPRING OFFENSIVE

While President Bush hits the road to build support, his spring offensive is bringing conservative activists and businessmen into the White House for briefings in small groups.

"I've been in the White House more in the last two weeks than I was in the last two years," Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform told this column. Norquist and conservative theoretician Jeffrey Bell were called into a meeting on the administration's embattled immigration bill. Also attending were representatives of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business.

Bush has been criticized for being reclusive as he and the Republican Party tumble in the polls.

KERRY IN '08

Even before Gore's surprising decision, Kerry political operatives were telling Democrats that the senator was a likely candidate. Kerry's 2004 running mate, John Edwards, is also inclined to run. But his campaign is menaced by a possible candidacy by Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who would block Edwards in the Iowa caucuses.

A footnote: Democratic politicians were surprised by the message from Sen. Clinton's camp that she henceforth would censor Bill Clinton's comments to prevent recurrence of their heavily publicized disagreements over Dubai Ports. While such restraint on the former president was considered desirable, it was viewed as something that should not be talked about publicly.

DEMOCRATIC TARGET

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), has taken the unusual step of targeting his Republican counterpart, Rep. Tom Reynolds, for defeat in his upstate New York district this year. There is no record of a House campaign committee chairman ever being defeated for re-election by the opposition party.

The DCCC claims secret polls showed the supposedly safe Republican district represented by Reynolds is competitive this year. Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, in 2004 won re-election to a fourth term with a surprisingly low 56 percent. His Democratic opponent was retired industrialist Jack Davis, who spent $1,250,000 of his own money in 2004 and is trying again.

In its campaign to seize control of the House, the DCCC is aiming at three other upstate New York districts to take advantage of the region's low popularity ratings for President Bush and the Republican Party. The Democrats have targeted ninth-term Rep. James Walsh and fourth-term Rep. John Sweeney, plus the seat left vacant by 12-term Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's retirement.

STUMBLING IN JERSEY

Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr., who has lost an early lead in his New Jersey campaign for the U.S. Senate, is engaged in a backstage power struggle with the influential, relatively conservative Republican organizations in Bergen and Passaic counties.

Kean, whose father was a two-term governor, has identified himself with the pro-choice social liberals in the state party. A key role in his campaign is being played by former Rep. Bob Franks, considered a moderate during four terms in Congress.

After starting the campaign ahead of appointed Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, Kean has fallen behind by four percentage points according to surveys last week by the Quinnipiac University poll. Democrats chided Kean for coming so late to his own Newark fund-raiser Monday that he missed the principal speech by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Abramoff, Ex-Partner May Give Statements (WP)

By Curt Anderson

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- A judge has approved subpoenas for former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and an ex-business partner to answer questions about the mob-style slaying of the owner of a gambling fleet they bought.

Abramoff and Adam Kidan have insisted, through their attorneys, that they know nothing about the slaying of Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who was ambushed in his car by a gunman in Fort Lauderdale a few months after the pair bought SunCruz Casinos from him.

A lawyer for Anthony "Big Tony" Moscatiello, one of three men charged in the 2001 slaying, wants to question Abramoff and Kidan, according to court documents. Circuit Judge Michael Kaplan approved the request Thursday, but the subpoenas had not been issued as of Friday.

The SunCruz purchase is "at the heart" of the murder case, Moscatiello attorney Dave Bogenschutz said in court papers.

Abramoff and Kidan are not charged in the slaying but are scheduled to be sentenced Wednesday in federal court after pleading guilty earlier this year to fraud charges stemming from the purchase. Their lawyers did not return telephone calls or e-mails seeking comment Friday.

Abramoff, once a prominent Republican lobbyist and political fundraiser, has also pleaded guilty to federal charges in a Washington corruption investigation that threatens several powerful members of Congress and their staff members.

As part of their federal plea deals, Abramoff and Kidan are required to cooperate with prosecutors in any state or federal investigation.

Moscatiello, 67, allegedly has ties to New York's Gambino crime family and worked as a consultant for Kidan at SunCruz.

Kidan paid companies linked to Moscatiello about $145,000 while he ran SunCruz. Prosecutors have said they believe Boulis was slain in a battle for control of the gambling fleet out of concern that those payments might dry up.

Bogenschutz said in an interview Friday that Abramoff and Kidan's testimony is critical in showing the bitter feelings and power struggle that followed their purchase of SunCruz. He said Abramoff has never been implicated in the Boulis slaying.

"He knows the inside workings of SunCruz Casinos. It's clearly of interest to us," Bogenschutz said, adding that it was not certain that Abramoff would actually testify in a trial. "It depends on what he says."

Prosecutor Brian Cavanagh said his office had not intended on calling Abramoff as a witness in part because he would be given immunity from prosecution for anything he says under those conditions. Cavanagh also said that Kidan has not been cleared as a suspect in the Boulis slaying.

Moscatiello is charged along with Anthony "Little Tony" Ferrari, 49, and 28-year-old James "Pudgy" Fiorillo in the Boulis killing. All three have pleaded not guilty and could face the death penalty if convicted.

Investigators have testified that records show that cell phones belonging to Ferrari and Fiorillo were within 500 feet of the Boulis murder scene moments after the killing and that one was used to call Moscatiello.

Kaplan heard testimony Friday on a motion by Moscatiello and Fiorillo claiming that the prosecution's case isn't strong enough to warrant keeping them in custody without bail, but no decision was made. Ferrari has not joined in that motion.

Abramoff and Kidan face prison sentences of just more than seven years in the Florida fraud case. They admitted fabricating a fake wire transfer to make it appear they were putting a sizable chunk of their own money into the $147.5 million purchase of the gambling fleet.

Translator Accused Of Offering A Bribe (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport in Virginia, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

He was released from custody after a hearing Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court April 5.

Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. He is accused of offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint.

Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said.

Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said.

The Titan Corp. did not immediately comment Friday.

If convicted, Salam faces up to five years in prison and a fine of at least $100,000.

The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraqi reconstruction contracts.

At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery and kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts.

Robert Stein, a former contracting official in Iraq, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to steal more than $2 million in reconstruction money and steer contracts to a businessman in exchange for more than $1 million in cash, cars and jewelry.

2nd Ryan Juror In Question (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, March 25, 2006

Tribune record search finds apparent history of arrests

Public records reviewed by the Tribune suggest that a second juror deciding the fate of former Gov. George Ryan has a history of arrests that was not disclosed during the jury-selection process.

The revelation comes one day after the Tribune reported that a male juror has the same name and other identifying characteristics as a man with a felony drunken driving conviction.

Hours after learning of the Tribune's information on Thursday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer halted deliberations and said she had launched an investigation into a juror.

Further record searches Friday linked the name of a female juror to an alias. The woman with that alias faced felony drug charges, as well as misdemeanor child-neglect and assault charges, records show. She was not convicted of these charges, the records show.

The female juror linked to that alias stated on a jury questionnaire before the trial that she had never been charged or accused of a crime.

A number of public records--from bankruptcy filings to land transactions--appear to show that the juror and the woman with several arrests are the same person.

It is unclear what impact the revelation regarding the second juror will have on the deliberations in the 5-month-old public corruption trial.

Prosecutors could argue someone with that background might be biased against law enforcement.

After sending the jury home early Thursday, Pallmeyer said she would not reveal the outcome of her investigation before Monday.

The judge met with prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case on Friday, then returned to the bench and said the investigation was continuing.

She also said she expected the jury to resume deliberations on Monday.

Earlier Friday, the Tribune contacted federal court officials to ask about the second juror, and Chief Judge Charles Kocoras indicated he intended to speak to Pallmeyer about the matter.

The Tribune is not identifying either juror it has raised questions about because it is the newspaper's standard practice not to name a member of a jury during a trial. The newspaper also cannot approach jurors to confirm the information because a court order bars contact with the jury.

Defense lawyers and prosecutors involved in the case are prohibited from discussing the developments because of a gag order issued by Pallmeyer.

The questionnaires filled out by jurors are used to screen for possible bias, and lying on them can disrupt a trial for several reasons. In other criminal cases, such false statements have led judges to dismiss jurors and have formed the basis for appeals.

Potential jurors in the Ryan case had to sign the questionnaires under penalty of perjury, and they swore that their answers were "true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

In answer to a question asking whether the potential juror had "ever been charged with or accused of a crime," the female juror checked "No."

The paper trail from the juror to the woman charged with crimes is a complicated one.

The juror has the same name as a woman who filed for bankruptcy. Land records also link the two.

Further, the juror and the woman who filed for bankruptcy list the same obscure profession for their husband.

The bankruptcy records list an alias for the woman. Both names have the same Social Security number.

Records under that alias, with the same Social Security number as the woman in the bankruptcy, show a criminal history of six charges dating to 1984.

That woman and four other people were arrested on felony drug charges in the 1200 block of West 13th Street on Jan. 4, 1994. One of the men was convicted of unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon and armed violence in the case, but all five defendants were acquitted of the drug charges in a trial on April 28, 1994, according to court records.

Records show all the other charges against the woman were dropped.

The revelations of the links between two jurors and criminal records have cast a shadow over the trial and raised questions about the course of jury deliberations, which were already troubled. Earlier on Thursday Pallmeyer responded to indications of dissension on the jury by warning jurors to treat each other "with dignity and respect."

Jurors had deliberated for eight days before Pallmeyer interrupted their work to deal with the emerging problems.

"Right now I am expecting that they will resume their deliberation, I hope, by around 11 o'clock on Monday morning. I think that should give us the time that we need to complete whatever additional investigation there may be in the case," Pallmeyer said in court Friday afternoon.

The judge has the sole discretion to decide jurors' fates. If she dismisses one or two jurors, she may replace them with alternates. She also may decide to reduce the size of the jury to 11 people instead of 12. But she may not reduce the jury to 10 people.

Typically, federal prosecutors have not conducted background checks of potential or impaneled jurors.

While the revelations about the jurors may provide fodder for eventual appeals of the case, it is unclear what effect removing one or two jurors might have on the deliberations.

During the jury-selection process, when the female juror was questioned about her impressions of the allegations against Ryan, she said, "I wouldn't want to be in his shoes--the decisions he had to make."

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, 67, are charged with using Ryan's offices as secretary of state and governor to enrich themselves.

Supreme Court To Rehear Death Penalty Case (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The Supreme Court said Friday that it would hear arguments a second time before ruling on the constitutionality of a Kansas death penalty law, apparently so new Justice Samuel Alito can break a tie.

The case is the second one that deadlocked the court following Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement in late January. The other one involves government whistleblowers.

Justices heard arguments on Dec. 7 in the Kansas case, which involves rules for how juries weigh evidence for and against the death penalty.

The 1994 law says if the evidence for and against imposing a death sentence is equal, Kansas juries must impose death instead of life in prison. The state Supreme Court struck it down, invalidating the death sentences of six convicted killers.

The Supreme Court did not say when a new argument would be scheduled.

Alito could vote differently than O'Connor would have in the case.

O'Connor was a swing vote in death penalty cases, sometimes joining the four more liberal members in throwing out death sentences.

Fifteen states had filed friend-of-the-court briefs, predicting that a ruling against Kansas would require states with capital punishment to set up special systems for juries to weigh evidence at sentencing.

The case is Kansas v. Marsh, 04-1170.

Kansas Death Penalty Statute Heads Back To U.S. High Court (KCS)

By Laura Bauer And David Klepper

The Kansas City Star, March 25, 2006

Three months after the U.S. Supreme Court heard arguments over the constitutionality of Kansas' death penalty, justices want to hear them again.

But this time, a new justice — Samuel Alito — will hear those arguments. Those who want to see Kansas' law kept in place think this could work in their favor.

In an order released Friday, the court said the case would be put back on its calendar. According to attorneys on both sides of the issue, it could be reheard in as little as a month's time.

The court announced the rehearing in a one-sentence order that did not explain why. This left the significance of the move open to interpretation.

DOJ_NMG_0022042

Some said it was not unprecedented for the court to ask to rehear arguments when there is a new justice. Others believe the court is split and Alito would break the tie. One reason: It ordered the same arguments presented and did not request additional briefs.

House Speaker Doug Mays, a Topeka Republican, said: "It increases the likelihood they will reinstate the death penalty."

In 2004 the state Supreme Court struck down the capital punishment law, ruling 4-3 that language concerning jury instructions was unfair to defendants. This left the fate of seven inmates sentenced to death uncertain.

The instructions had to do with how juries weigh evidence. The law indicated that jurors should vote for capital punishment — rather than life imprisonment — in instances where the evidence for and against execution was equal. Juries have not received those instructions in years, but the requirements were never deleted from the death penalty statute.

The only way to reinstate the death sentences of serial killer John E. Robinson Sr. and the rest of the state's death row is if the high court overturns the ruling. The Kansas Supreme Court had commuted their sentences to prison terms.

Rebecca Woodman of the Kansas capital appellate defender's office, who argued the case the first time opposite Attorney General Phill Kline, does not agree with legislators who see Friday's order as a positive sign.

"I think all of that is speculation, and I don't want to speculate what's in the court's mind," she said. "I read it as the court is hung up on something and wants to hear it again."

Woodman represents Michael Marsh II of Wichita, who was sentenced to die for the 1996 murders of Marry Ane Pusch and her 19-month-old daughter. The mother was shot and stabbed, her throat was slit, and she was doused with lighter fluid and set on fire. Her daughter died of burns.

In its ruling, the Kansas Supreme Court struck down the death penalty law and ordered a new trial for Marsh.

Woodman argued in December that the state court's decision should stand. Kline disagreed.

In a statement his office issued Friday and through comments by his spokesman Whitney Watson, the attorney general said he welcomed the chance to speak before the justices again.

"This is an important issue to Kansans," his statement read, "and I am committed to make sure that this tool for justice remains available to prosecutors and that the voice of the people will be heard."

Alito replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was a swing vote in death penalty cases, sometimes joining the four more liberal members in throwing out death sentences.

If the U.S. Supreme Court agrees with the state court, the men originally sentenced to death will serve life sentences and the Legislature would need to craft a new death penalty law. The court could determine it does not have jurisdiction to hear a case relating to the Kansas Constitution.

If the court overturns the Kansas ruling, the death penalty would stand and the convicted killers could ultimately be put to death.

So everyone from legislators and attorneys to prosecutors wait to see what the federal court does. If there is indeed a tie and Alito breaks it, many proponents think it will bode well for Kline and his push to have the state ruling overturned.

State Sen. John Vratil, a Leawood Republican who leads the Senate Judiciary Committee, cautioned against the assumption that that the court is deadlocked 4-4.

Vratil said the court could be split 3-3, with two justices undecided, or other similar permutations. Some justices may want to overturn the ruling while others want to remand it to Kansas court.

"You can't absolutely conclude that there's a 4-4 split," he said. "It's not just an up or down situation."

Fifteen states had filed friend-of-the-court briefs, predicting that a ruling against Kansas would require states with capital punishment to set up special systems for juries to weigh evidence at sentencing.

The case is Kansas v. Marsh, 04-1170.

About the case

¦ On an appeal by convicted killer Michael Marsh II, the Kansas Supreme Court in 2004 overturned the state's death penalty statute. The court rejected a section of the law that said when evidence for and against execution balances out, a jury must decide in favor of execution over life in prison. The state appealed that ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court, which heard arguments in December 2005.

Woman Pleads Guilty In Steele Credit Report Case (BSUN/AP)

By Associated press

The Baltimore Sun, March 25, 2006

Former Democratic staffer avoids jail time for computer fraud

WASHINGTON -- A former Democratic staffer pleaded guilty today to computer fraud for snooping on Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Under the plea agreement in U.S. District Court, Lauren B. Weiner, 25, avoids jail time, but she has a year to do 150 hours of community service.

Steele -- a Republican running for U.S. Senate -- was notified by Democrats in Washington that a staffer used Steele's Social Security number to obtain his credit report last year. Weiner was fired from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee after the breach was discovered.

Democrats say Steele's credit information was promptly destroyed, but Steele's lawyer, E. Mark Braden, says he wants to know more about why Democrats tapped into Steele's personal financial records.

Democrat Pleads Guilty In Steele Case (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Researcher Falsely Got Credit Report; Charge Could Be Dropped in Year

A Democratic researcher pleaded guilty yesterday to misrepresenting herself on a Web site as Michael S. Steele, Maryland's lieutenant governor and a Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, and fraudulently obtaining his credit report last summer.

Under a plea agreement reached with prosecutors, the misdemeanor charge against Lauren B. Weiner, a former staff member of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, could be dropped in a year if she completes 150 hours of community service and commits no other offenses.

"I believe this is the end of the episode, and she can now get on with her life," said Whitney C. Ellerman, an attorney for Weiner.

An attorney for Steele said the lieutenant governor is considering a civil suit against Weiner, 25, and the Democratic committee to learn more about what he called "a dirty trick."

E. Mark Braden, who attended the hearing in U.S. District Court in Washington, said a "statement of the offense" released yesterday contains several troubling details about the episode, including Weiner's use of a committee credit card to access Steele's report over the Internet.

The discovery process of a civil suit would allow Steele to learn more about what happened, Braden said. "I don't think the story is necessarily over," he said. "This answers some questions but not all questions. We'll have to see where we go from here. . . . This was a carefully calculated plan to steal private information."

The episode took place in July as both parties started investigating the backgrounds of candidates in Maryland's marquee races this year.

According to the prosecutor's statement, which Weiner said was accurate, she used Steele's Social Security number to access his credit report on a Web site designed to let people view their reports.

Weiner pretended that she was Steele, even creating an e-mail address -- gopsteele@yahoo.com -- needed to obtain the report, the statement said. She also agreed to the "terms of service" on the site, which included a warning "not to impersonate another person."

According to the statement, Weiner's superiors were notified within hours of the episode, and the report was destroyed the next morning before it could be disseminated. Weiner and her boss, the committee's director of research, later resigned.

Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said it does not appear as though Weiner acted alone. "It looks like the DSCC is trying to make a scapegoat of a younger staffer," he said.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the committee, said yesterday that the prosecutor's statement showed that "the DSCC responded to this incident in an exemplary way."

"The U.S. attorney's office also confirmed that the DSCC, as it has repeatedly said, did not use the credit report for any financial or political purpose and that Mr. Steele suffered no economic harm," Singer said. He said he believes "this matter is now closed."

Yesterday's hearing was delayed briefly after Magistrate Judge John M. Facciola disclosed from the bench that "Michael Steele is a friend of mine." Facciola said he and Steele are members of the John Carroll Society, an association of Catholic laypeople, and he offered to recuse himself.

Neither Weiner nor the U.S. attorney's office objected to Facciola continuing to handle the case.

Weiner was instructed to return to Facciola's courtroom for sentencing a year from now. Ellerman, her attorney, said he expects the charge to be dropped then.

In the meantime, Facciola told Weiner that she will need the court's permission before leaving the Washington area for more than 48 hours and is expected to remain a District resident.

CIVIL LAW:

Small Maker Of Heart Devices Is Said To Be Focus Of Inquiry (NYT)

By Barry Meier

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Federal authorities are conducting an inquiry into Ela Medical, a small maker of defibrillators and other heart devices, according to a government official and an industry official.

The precise nature of the government's interest in Ela Medical, which is a division of the Sorin Group, is unclear and any inquiry appears to be at an early stage. But the inquiry comes amid a broader, continuing government investigation into relationships between larger makers of heart devices and doctors. That investigation is looking into whether the companies provided incentives to physicians to use their products.

One government official said authorities were looking into Ela Medical's activities in the Miami area. Separately, a device industry official said that federal authorities had made inquiries about Ela Medical. Both people spoke on the condition of anonymity because the inquiry is in progress and not yet a public matter.

The general counsel for the Sorin Group, an Italian company based in Milan, said in a statement that the device maker was unaware of any investigations. The company has said it complies with all applicable regulations and industry practices.

"To the best of our knowledge, neither Ela Medical nor any other Sorin Group company is a target of any inquiry or investigation by any law enforcement agency," that executive, Brian Sheridan, wrote this month in an e-mail message.

The inquiry into Ela Medical is apparently being conducted by investigators with the Food and Drug Administration and the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services.

A spokesman for the F.D.A., Jason Brodsky, and a spokeswoman for the inspector general's office, Laura Bradbard, said that as a matter of policy the agencies do not confirm or deny the existence of any investigation.

Ela Medical is a very small player in the United States market for heart devices like defibrillators, according to analysts' estimates. Together, it and Biotronik, a German company based in Berlin, have about a 5 percent market share.

A defibrillator is a device that uses electricity to interrupt a type of irregular heart rhythm that is potentially fatal. A pacemaker stimulates a heart that is beating too slowly.

With the aging of the population, defibrillators are among the fastest growing categories of medical devices and can cost from $20,000 to $35,000 a unit. They also have profit margins of about 75 percent.

Not surprisingly, there is intense competition by producers for the loyalties of heart specialists who either prescribe or implant such devices.

The Justice Department is investigating whether the country's three big makers of implanted heart devices — Medtronic, Guidant and St. Jude Medical — used illegal inducements to get doctors to use their products. They have all denied wrongdoing.

Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product.

The Justice Department investigation is said to be looking at whether the big companies, among other things, provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in post-marketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. Such studies can have questionable scientific value, experts said.

That investigation began in October, soon after an article in The New York Times reported that internal Guidant e-mail messages suggested that a product evaluation survey run by that company, in which doctors were paid $1,000 each to participate, was actually an effort to improve device sales.

In October, when the Justice Department issued its subpoenas, it did not send one to Ela Medical. The company said recently that it had not received any demands for information.

Late last year, the Sorin Group, in response to an inquiry from a reporter, declined to release a list of the postmarketing trials that Ela Medical was sponsoring in this country. The company said it believed that its payments to doctors were modest and in line with payments made by other producers.

Several hospitals in the Miami area said this month that they had not been contacted by government officials about Ela Medical. Company sales representatives in Florida did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Euclid Accused Of Bias In Voting (CLPD)

By Thomas Ott And Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporters

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, March 25, 2006

Blacks can't win office, U.S. probe concludes

Euclid -- The Justice Department has threatened to sue Euclid and force changes in an election system that the federal government says prevents black candidates from winning seats on its City Council.

A former Justice Department lawyer found the timing suspicious. He suggested that the Bush administration, which has not vigorously pressed voting-rights suits, may be trying to polish its image quickly. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to question Justice Department officials in May about whether they have adequately protected the rights of minority voters.

"It's an outright embarrassment that this appears to be the first case on behalf of black voters brought forth during the Bush administration," said David Becker, who worked for the Department of Justice from 1998 to 2005. The department "had to file a case on behalf of black voters before the oversight hearing took place. Otherwise they would have had a lot of explaining to do about why it hasn't happened in almost six years."

Though Euclid's black population reached 30 percent in the last census, voters have never elected a black candidate to any city or school office. The school board appointed Howard Drake to a vacant seat in 1998, but he lost in an election the next year.

The investigation, which began three years ago, targeted elections for City Council. The city is broken into four wards, which each elect one council member. Four other council members and the council president are elected citywide.

All five of those elected citywide in 2005 live in the same ward, in Euclid's northeast corner.

In a letter dated Monday, the head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division told Euclid Law Director Chris Frey that the structure dilutes minority voting power in a city that is racially divided and votes along racial lines. Black candidates would have a better chance of winning if the city were broken into eight wards, with one council member elected in each, Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim said in the letter.

Kim has approved filing a lawsuit but will wait to see if the Justice Department and the city can work out a settlement. Frey said the system could be changed by voter approval or court order.

The Justice Department would not discuss the matter. Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, who represents Euclid in Congress, said that the legal issue here isn't whether Euclid purposely tried to exclude black people from public office.

"In discrimination lawsuits, often we look at policies, practices or laws that appear to be neutral on their face but the outcome is discriminatory," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0022046

Mayor Bill Cervenik and Council President Ed Gudenas said they want to hear details of the investigation before deciding how to respond.

Cervenik said the federal government should consider factors such as black voter turnout and the lack of black candidates.

Though three black candidates ran for council in 2003, last year's ballot had none. Cervenik said that he welcomes ways to involve black residents in Euclid's government but that the city should not be targeted to appease President Bush's critics.

"I'm very convinced that the city of Euclid has done nothing wrong - at least not intentionally," he said.

The Rev. Gary Henderson, the black pastor at Euclid's East Shore United Methodist Church, said the city must take aggressive steps to elect black leaders.

"Our officials, in ethnic identity, don't reflect the racial makeup of the community," he said. "If all our players are not sitting at the table, it's difficult to make decisions the whole community can embrace."

Cervenik and his predecessor, Paul Oyaski, appointed several black residents to boards and commissions.

Cervenik and Frey said they aggressively lobbied a black resident to run in the last election, but she declined.

Euclid has a long way to go before it erases a reputation for racial bias.

In 1975, the school board avoided more-serious Justice Department action by agreeing to hire more black teachers. The federal government froze hundreds of thousands of dollars in grants in the late 1970s until the city agreed to promote fair housing.

Two years ago, voters rejected rezoning for a new church and houses proposed by a black congregation from Cleveland. Cervenik overturned the vote to settle a lawsuit that the church filed in federal court, then successfully survived a recall prompted in part by his action.

Protesters Claim Police Brutality (JACKSUN)

By TYRONE TONY REED JR.

Jackson (TN) Sun, March 25, 2006

Brownsville police conducting internal probe, Mayor Banks says

BROWNSVILLE - Dr. Isaac Richmond, national director for the Commission on Religion and Racism summed up in one thought why he was protesting what he called the "vicious beating" and "unlawful detainment" of a black man in Brownsville on March 17:

"If we don't stand together, we'll be beaten separately."

Richmond, members of Memphis-based CORR and more than 30 concerned citizens from the Brownsville community stood together in front of City Hall on a chilly Friday afternoon. They sang freedom hymns and chanted for two white Brownsville Police investigators to be charged, put on trial and dismissed from the police force. "Let's put an end to police brutality in Brownsville, Tennessee," Richmond said through a megaphone. "Chad Jackson and Brian Nichols must be brought to justice."

Richmond accuses Jackson and Nichols of brutally beating Robert Lee Jones, 42, of Brownsville, on March 17. Richmond said that Jones had not violated any laws and that the charges Jones now faces were false.

However, Mayor Webb Banks said Thursday night that Jones did break the law by attempting to evade arrest about 6:09 p.m. on March 17 on Margin Street. Banks said Jackson and Nichols chased after Jones, and that Jones swallowed what appeared to be crack cocaine during the chase.

After the officers caught Jones, the three of them scuffled and Jones attempted to grab Jackson's gun to shoot the officers, Banks said.

While all three suffered minor injuries, CORR had accused the officers of denying Jones medical attention. Banks denied that claim.

"When the report was first given to me, it said that he did not receive medical treatment," Richmond said during the protest. "So, let me clear it up now. Mr. Jones did in fact receive medical treatment, which is clear evidence that he was beaten."

DOJ_NMG_0022047

Robert Lee Jones' brother, David Jones, 35, of Stanton, said that he notified CORR of his brother's situation and that he knows that his brother was beaten by the officers because he has heard it from too many witnesses.

"I want justice to be served," David Jones said during the protest. "I want those officers removed from the force. My brother is on crutches, his face is swollen and he's been complaining about his ribs."

David Jones said that his brother told him that Jackson and Nichols didn't identify themselves as officers.

Robert Lee Jones was arraigned Monday and charged with aggravated assault, evading arrest, resisting arrest and tampering with evidence. He is being held without bond in Haywood County Jail.

A news release from CORR on Friday said that the group "has filed charges with the U.S. Department of Justice, seeking an investigation of the Brownsville law enforcement for the human rights violations of African-American males in general, and Mr. Jones' case in particular." The release also said that the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department has been requested to bring charges against the officers.

Banks said Thursday that an internal investigation is being conducted by the Brownsville police, but the officers are still on active duty.

Judge To Rehear Poll Complaints (NOTP)

By Bruce Eggler, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 25, 2006

N.O. plan is called unfair to black voters

A New Orleans federal judge who refused last month to order Louisiana officials to provide out-of-state satellite polling places or take other steps to help displaced residents vote in the upcoming municipal elections has agreed to rehear some of the claims of those who say African-American voters will not have a fair chance to participate in the balloting.

Judge Ivan Lemelle will hold a hearing Monday on a request by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund that he reconsider his decision not to order the state to take further steps to assist displaced voters beyond those already taken by Secretary of State Al Ater and approved by a recent special session of the Legislature.

Ater has said that thanks to those actions and an aggressive campaign to notify displaced voters how they can participate in the election, this will be "the most accessible election" in U.S. history.

The U.S. Justice Department last week approved the plans for the elections, saying the actions taken by the state meet the federal Voting Rights Act's requirements for protecting black voters' rights.

But the NAACP lawyers and local lawyers Roy Rodney and John Etter, working with them, submitted a 21-page motion citing a list of reasons why Lemelle should order further action "to prevent manifest injustice," including:

-- A law passed at the special session to allow absentee voting by mail by first-time voters who registered by mail and have never voted in person applies only to those who registered between Oct. 5, 2004, and Sept. 24, 2005. The motion says this would help only 1,800 of 15,000 potential first-time voters, 72 percent of whom are black.

-- The law setting up satellite polling places in 10 other Louisiana parishes, where displaced New Orleans voters can cast early ballots April 10-13 and April 15 for the April 22 primary, restricted their use to voters who registered before Sept. 24, although registration for the primary did not close until this week.

-- State officials never seriously considered the idea of establishing out-of-state satellite polling places, such as figuring out how much they would cost.

-- Lack of money and transportation is likely to keep tens of thousands of displaced voters, now living both in and outside Louisiana, from traveling to New Orleans or one of the 10 in-state satellite polls. Most of these voters are African-American, the motion says.

-- On March 16, the City Council, at the behest of Ater's office, changed the polling places for 93 precincts, most of them in majority-black wards, making it likely that many potential voters are likely to be confused about where to go and end up not voting, especially because many of the new sites "are not currently accessible by public transportation."

During a February hearing, the NAACP's motion says, Lemelle said the issue before him was whether the changes approved by the Legislature were "sufficient now to take care of any adverse impact on black voters."

DOJ_NMG_0022048

"The answer to this question is a resounding 'No!' " the motion says.

The NAACP request is opposed by a group of voters, later joined by the ACLU, who filed suit in December seeking to have the New Orleans elections, which Gov. Kathleen Blanco had postponed indefinitely after Hurricane Katrina, held as soon as possible.

With Lemelle pressing for the same goal, the primary and runoff elections, originally set for Feb. 4 and March 4, eventually were rescheduled for April 22 and May 20.

In a related development, a group of civil rights leaders gathered in Washington, D.C., Friday to condemn the scheduled election as unfair to displaced African-American voters now living in 44 states.

"We are about to witness the most blatant and dramatic violation of the Voting Rights Act since it was passed in 1965," the Rev. Al Sharpton said. "This is beyond the poll tax. This is the high-tech disenfranchisement of voters."

Sharpton, Jesse Jackson and Urban League President and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial were among those who called on the state to erect satellite voting places in cities such as Houston, Dallas and Atlanta. Morial said that asking evacuees to vote by mail places a "cumbersome, complex and confusing" burden on them and offers no guarantee their votes will be counted.

In a letter to Blanco, Jackson noted that satellite voting places have been set up to make it easier for Iraqis and Mexicans living in the United States to cast ballots in their native countries' elections. "Our New Orleans citizens deserve no less from our democracy," he wrote.

Despite the cordial tone of his March 22 letter, Jackson left little doubt Friday that he sees Blanco as the engineer of a scheme to keep African-American evacuees from the polls. He called her and other Louisiana Democrats who supported the voting procedures approved by the Legislature "Dixiecrats," the name given to the group of Southern politicians who broke with the Democratic Party in 1948 over the party's support for civil rights.

Ventura County Plugs Hole In Voting System With Ink (LAT)

By Gregory W. Griggs

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

To comply with a federal order to end bias against Latinos, it's replacing punch cards with pens.

Ventura County election officials are replacing their decades-old punch-card voting system in time for the June 6 primary election.

After more than 30 years of voting with punch cards, most county voters will now mark their choices with ink. Those who have trouble seeing the ballots or using the pens will be able to vote on computer touch screens.

County officials say their new systems will serve Spanish-speaking voters better and ensure that those who are disabled can cast secret ballots.

The county has used punch-card technology for more than three decades, but officials agreed in 2004 to replace the system under a federal consent decree.

The U.S. Department of Justice had accused the county of discriminating against Latinos, who make up about a third of the population, by failing to employ sufficient numbers of bilingual poll workers or to provide adequate Spanish-language voting materials.

The settlement required the county to print bilingual ballots. But Gene Browning, the county's assistant registrar of voters, said the old punch cards could not be printed easily in two languages.

The new system, which cost $6 million, was paid for using federal and state funds. It was manufactured by Oakland-based Sequoia Voting Systems. And like the punch-card system, it uses paper.

Although other counties have opted to switch entirely to computer touch screens, Browning said county voters made it clear that they still wanted a paper-based system.

"Whenever they would hear about counties going totally electronic, the reaction was: 'We need to have paper,' " he said.

In the new system, voters will feed their completed ballots into optical scanners that will instantly check for errors. The scanners will kick back incomplete ballots or ones filled out incorrectly, with too many candidates selected.

Once approved, results will be recorded on memory cards, which will later be uploaded into a centralized elections computer in Ventura. A percentage of the paper ballots also will be hand-counted to verify results, Browning said.

At each polling place, voters who are visually impaired or have difficulty using a pen will be able to cast secret ballots using computer touch screens. The machines will be equipped with headphones for people to hear the choices on the ballot.

California passed a law in 2004 requiring electronic ballot machines to also use some form of paper verification. Counties have until June 2006 to comply.

To meet the deadline, Riverside County in January agreed to spend $14.2 million to replace its 6-year-old touch-screen voting machines with newer models that provide paper confirmation.

By never abandoning paper-based voting, Ventura County showed its fiscal prudence, said Kim Alexander, president of the California Voter Foundation.

"Counties that go all electronic typically spend three times more to purchase new equipment," Alexander said.

Prominent Blacks Want N.O. Satellite Voting (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, March 25, 2006

Displaced New Orleans residents deserve the same voting privileges as the people of war-torn Iraq, several black leaders argued Friday in pushing for satellite voting from locations outside Louisiana.

"We are seeing people from Iraq being treated better than people from New Orleans," said Al Sharpton, who joined Jesse Jackson, NAACP President Bruce Gordon, Urban League President Marc Morial and several other influential black leaders in calling for steps to improve participation in New Orleans' April 22 elections.

Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 200,000 New Orleans residents of voting age, many of them black voters, and the black leaders contend that city elections could violate the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

"This is a Florida in the making," said Morial, a former New Orleans mayor, referring to Florida's extensive voting problems in the 2000 elections. "If you see an election train wreck coming, why not do something to prevent it before the wreck occurs?"

A spokeswoman for Secretary of State Al Ater, the state's top election official, said out-of-state voting operations are not legal under Louisiana law.

The Justice Department approved the city's election plan last week.

Complaints about the plan included inadequate voting options for thousands of displaced New Orleans residents, cumbersome absentee ballot procedures, frequent movement of precinct locations and a refusal to share information about how candidates can reach displaced voters.

The groups upset about the election are calling for an April 1 march on New Orleans to protest elections they claim could sharply erode one of the most important federal civil rights laws.

The New Orleans' election was postponed from its original Feb. 4 date, when state officials said they could not organize it in time, given the destruction of polling places and dispersal of voters caused by Katrina.

Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said Louisiana's legislative black caucus has endorsed the plan. However, several members of the caucus voted against it, and state Sen. Cleo Fields, a prominent member of the caucus, is a leader in the effort to delay the election.

The decision not to share the contact information for displaced New Orleans voters was not the choice of the secretary of state, said his spokeswoman, Jennifer Marusak. She said federal officials ordered the state not to share the Federal Emergency Management Agency's list of displaced New Orleans residents to protect their privacy.

Jackson has called for Gov. Kathleen Blanco to postpone the election to allow a fairer election plan.

State officials have worked out a plan for the election and are doing their best to contact displaced voters, said Blanco's spokeswoman Denise Bottcher, adding, "We are going forward."

Republican Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record) said Friday that Democrats are out to defeat him to avenge the 2004 defeat of then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle by Republican John Thune.

"They see this as sort of payback time for Tom Daschle's loss, and I'm running for the No. 2 spot on the Republican leadership ladder and this would be a plum for them, if they are able to pick me off," the Pennsylvania lawmaker said in an interview broadcast Friday evening on Fox News' Special Report.

The GOP holds a 55-44 majority in the Senate, with one Democratic-leaning independent. Democrats see the Senate race in Pennsylvania, a state that went for John Kerry in 2004, as a prime target.

Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican, has trailed his leading Democratic opponent, State Treasurer Bob Casey, in polls. Casey is the son of the late Pennsylvania governor with the same name.

"I think I'm safe to say that if his name wasn't Bob Casey, he wouldn't be running for the U.S. Senate today, and my name's Rick Santorum and I didn't get to be a U.S. senator cause my name's Rick Santorum," Santorum said.

Casey told the news channel that voters want change, and Santorum is too cozy with lobbyists.

"I think when you are the leading recipient of lobbyist money and you are meeting with lobbyists and they've having, I think, a disproportionate and sometimes adverse impact on legislation that affects real people, then I think you've got some explaining to do."

Texas Candidate Sues Over Campaign Laws (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, March 25, 2006

The comptroller of Texas sued the secretary of state Friday, claiming he is hurting her campaign for governor by unfairly enforcing rules for independent political candidates.

Keeton Strayhorn, elected as comptroller in 1998 and running as an independent against Republican Gov. Rick Perry, has complained for weeks about Secretary of State Roger Williams and even urged that he be removed from office because of his close ties with Perry. Williams, a Perry appointee, is the state's chief elections officer.

Strayhorn's campaign sued in federal court in Austin over Williams' plan to have her petition examined manually, signature by signature, instead of using statistical sampling, which examines only a portion of the signatures. The lawsuit says Williams' plan violates her constitutional rights.

Spokesman Scott Haywood said Williams will continue to apply Texas law fairly to all candidates "and will not grant special treatment to any candidate."

Perry's spokesman, Robert Black, called Williams "an outstanding public servant" who won't give preferential treatment to anyone.

Independent candidates for governor must collect 45,540 signatures from registered voters who did not cast ballots in the Republican or Democratic primaries. The petitions are due May 11.

Because multiple candidates are trying to get on the November ballot as independents, the signatures need to be verified individually, Haywood said. Musician and author Kinky Friedman also is running as an independent.

The secretary of state's office has said it will take possibly until July to validate signatures and determine whether the candidates make the November ballot.

The lawsuit — which includes three voters as plaintiffs — seeks to require Williams to review the validity of her petition immediately after he receives it in the quickest manner possible, said her campaign spokesman, Mark Sanders.

Suggesting the agency is trying to prevent Strayhorn from getting on the November ballot, Sanders said, "This whole situation begs the question: What are they afraid of?"

Strayhorn's campaign has complained about other treatment, including that it was not allowed to begin collecting signatures immediately after the primary polls closed. Williams cited state law in rejecting the request.

Texas has some of the nation's toughest laws on independent candidates. No independent has been elected governor there since Sam Houston in 1859.

On Campus, A Good Man Is Hard To Find (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

When a boy opens his acceptance letter from college, he now has to wonder what most impressed the admissions officers. Did they want him for his mind, or just his body?

The admissions director at Kenyon College, Jennifer Delahunty Britz, published an Op-Ed article this week revealing an awkward truth about her job: affirmative action for boys. As the share of the boys in the applicant pool keeps shrinking — it will soon be down to 40 percent nationally — colleges are admitting less-qualified boys in order to keep the gender ratio balanced on campus.

This week's revelation did not please Kim Gandy, the president of the National Organization for Women, who told me that she might challenge the legality of affirmative action for male applicants. She and I are not normally ideological soulmates, but I have some sympathy with her on this policy.

It's not fair to the girls who are rejected despite having higher grades and test scores than the boys who get fat envelopes. It's not fair to the boys, either, if they're not ready to keep up with their classmates. Affirmative action just makes them prone to fail, and is probably one of the reasons that men are more likely than women to drop out of college.

After consulting with the federal Education Department, I can confidently report that this discrimination may violate the law — or then again, it may not. Either way, I agree with Gandy that public colleges shouldn't practice it, because the government shouldn't favor one group over another.

Gandy's also wary of allowing private schools like Kenyon to discriminate, and she's skeptical of their justification: that they need a fairly even male-female ratio on campus to attract the best applicants of either sex. I'm not sure if that's true, but I trust the colleges to know better than me or Gandy or federal lawyers. As long as a school is private, let it favor whomever it wants — men, women, alumni children, Latinos, African-Americans — without any interference from the Education Department.

What the department should be doing is figuring out how to help boys reach college. The gender gap has been getting worse for two decades, but the Education Department still isn't focusing on it. Instead, it has an "educational equity" program aimed at helping girls and women.

The department is paying to encourage African and Slavic girls and women in Oregon to pursue careers in science. There's a grant to help women in West Virginia overcome "traditional, outdated 19th-century attitudes" by pursuing jobs in blue-collar trades. Another grant aims to motivate women at the Medgar Evers College in Brooklyn to study math.

Those are all noble goals. I'd be glad to see the women in Brooklyn take up advanced calculus. But the chief "equity" issue at their college is the shortage of men, who make up barely a fifth of the student body. What happened to the boys who didn't make it?

Boys are, on average, as smart as girls, but they are much less fond of school. They consistently receive lower grades, have more discipline problems and are more likely to be held back for a year or placed in special education classes. The Harvard economist Brian Jacob attributes these problems to boys' lack of "noncognitive skills," like their difficulties with paying attention in class, their disorganization and their reluctance to seek help from others.

Those are serious handicaps, but they could be mitigated if schools became more boy-friendly.

A few educators have suggested reforms: more games and competitions that appeal to boys, more outdoor exercise, more male teachers, more experiments with single-sex schools. But those ideas have gotten little attention or money. Schools have been too busy trying to close the gender gap in the few areas where boys are ahead, like sports and science.

No matter what changes are made to help boys, they'll probably still be less likely than girls to go on to college, simply because girls' skills and interests are better suited to the types of white-collar jobs that now require college degrees. Boys will remain more inclined to skip college in favor of relatively high-paying jobs in fields like construction and manufacturing.

There's no reason to expect a 50-50 ratio on campus — and certainly no reason to mandate it. Boys don't need that kind of affirmative action. What they could use, long before college, is equal attention.

Initiative Targets Abortion Ban (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Foes of South Dakota's new law are gathering signatures for a ballot challenge to overturn it.

Opponents of South Dakota's ban on nearly all abortions announced the launch of a ballot initiative Friday aimed at overturning the new law.

If the South Dakota Campaign For Healthy Families collects 16,728 signatures, the law — a direct challenge to Roe vs. Wade — will be placed on hold.

Democratic State Sen. Elaine Roberts said at a news conference in Sioux Falls that legislators went too far when they passed their bill last month banning abortions even in cases of rape and incest. The only exception is if physicians deem an abortion necessary to save the mother's life.

"The vast majority of South Dakotans are somewhere in the middle," Roberts said. "They have mixed feelings on this issue."

Proponents of the ban said they welcomed the challenge, and said the measure to reverse the law would fail at the polls.

"I know South Dakota politics," said Leslee Unruh, president of the Abstinence Clearinghouse in Sioux Falls and a prominent antiabortion activist. "The people of South Dakota stand for life, for protecting an unborn child."

Some antiabortion activists hope that President Bush's two Supreme Court appointments could lead the court to overturn the landmark 1973 Supreme Court case that established abortion as a constitutional right.

The legislature overwhelmingly passed the bill last month, and South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, signed it into law shortly afterward.

As opponents and proponents each released polls showing a majority of voters siding with them on the ban, abortion-rights advocates were debating whether to challenge the law in court or at the ballot box.

Some prominent state Democrats were leaning toward a ballot challenge. This week they unveiled a bipartisan group — led by a former Republican state legislator — to move the initiative campaign forward.

Planned Parenthood, which operates the only abortion clinic in the state, also is involved.

"We don't want it to be seen as a partisan assault on the ban," said Jeff Masten, a former chairman of the state Democratic Party who is involved in the campaign. "That legislation simply went too far."

Republican South Dakota House Speaker Matt Michels, who backed the ban, predicted that organizers would easily collect enough signatures to place it on the ballot because of what he deemed the state's minimal requirements for voter initiatives.

He also forecast a campaign financed by big-money donors on both sides of the issue that would saturate the airwaves of the lightly populated state.

"They're going to bombard us," Michels said.

Time To Stall A Bush Nominee (NYT)

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

We don't generally approve of holding nominations hostage to other political objectives. But Senators Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray surely have good cause to block a vote on the nomination of Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration until the agency makes a final decision on the morning-after pill. There is no excuse for the administration's endless obfuscation and delays on making the pill available without a prescription when the overwhelming bulk of expert opinion says it is safe to do so. The pill must be taken within 72 hours of unprotected intercourse, preferably within 24 hours, leaving little time to visit a doctor to get a prescription.

The two senators, both Democrats, have good reason to feel betrayed. When they threatened last year to hold up the confirmation of a previous commissioner until a decision on the pill was made, they ultimately relented because of a written assurance from Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, who said the F.D.A. would act on the issue by Sept. 1. Sadly, Mr. Leavitt was misinformed by the agency, overruled by the White House or deliberately deceptive with the senators. The only action the agency took in September was to defer a decision indefinitely.

The case for approving the use of the pill without a prescription has become even stronger in recent months. Evidence has emerged that high officials at the agency overruled their professional staff and ignored expert advisory committees when they rejected the application. Moreover, the agency's claim that it needed more time to consider "novel" issues raised by a proposal to require prescriptions for young teenagers was belied by internal documents revealing that the issues had been discussed for some time but not analyzed aggressively. The logical inference is that the result was dictated by politics — by a desire to placate religious and social conservatives who consider the pill an invitation to promiscuity and an abortifacient.

Should this nomination ultimately go forward, senators will still need to assess the qualifications of Dr. von Eschenbach, who has been acting commissioner since last September. He is a respected surgeon and was president-elect of the American Cancer Society. But his record as director of the National Cancer Institute, a post he holds even as he runs the F.D.A., gets mixed reviews.

His goal to eliminate death and suffering from cancer by 2015 is deemed visionary by some, but wildly unrealistic by others. His desire to bring medicines to market more quickly and more cheaply wins plaudits from the drug industry and some patient advocates, but criticism from consumer advocates who worry that safety will be undermined.

There is little likelihood that the Senate will reject Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination in a floor vote, although the senators could at least push him for guarantees that safety issues will not be submerged in the rush to approve new drugs and conquer cancer. But the vote should not take place until the F.D.A. has the spine to tackle the morning-after pill head-on.

ANTITRUST:

Alcatel And Lucent Set To Face US Review (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington, Peggy Hollinger In Paris And Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Alcatel's talks with Lucent about a possible takeover – a deal that would combine a telecoms equipment company that controls sensitive US technology with a French group – will face a regulatory review in Washington on national security grounds.

Such a move would come at a time when protectionist sentiment in the US is at an all-time high, and raises questions about whether the Bush administration would be prepared to approve the deal.

The merger, which is being driven by growing competitive pressure on equipment makers and could be valued at up to $36bn, would create the world's leading maker of fixed telecoms networks and the second largest in mobile infrastructure.

It also follows in the wake of a wave of consolidation in the telecoms sector – in particlular between some of the companies' biggest clients, including the proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth and the recent takeover of MCI by Verizon.

The companies have provisionally agreed that Lucent's chief executive Patricia Russo will succeed Alcatel's 68-year-old Serge Tchuruk as chief executive when he steps up to chairman in June.

It is far from clear, however, whether a deal that is viewed as increasingly necessary for the two companies will be able to withstand Washington regulatory scrutiny. While US authorities may be concerned about the security issues surrounding Bell Labs, a revered US research facility, the French government is likely to welcome the deal if the headquarters remain in France.

However it will be keen to safeguard Alcatel's sensitive interests, including its 9.5 per cent stake in defence electronics group Thales and the missile joint venture with Italy's Finmeccanica. One option would be to sell these to Franco-German aerospace group EADS, which has long wanted to acquire Thales.

DOJ_NMG_0022054

Even if the deal is presented as a merger of equals, regulatory experts say it faces an extensive review by the US Committee on Foreign Investments in the US, or Cfius, an inter-agency panel that investigates foreign acquisitions of US assets.

Lawmakers in the Senate are in the process of negotiating legislation that would make Cfius reviews even tougher and more lengthy.

The Dubai Ports World debacle, in which a Dubai-controlled company was forced to agree to sell port terminals it acquired after receiving regulatory clearance from Cfius because of a backlash in Congress, has, according to an attorney who works on Cfius deals, changed the balance of power of the panel.

An Israeli company, Check Point Software, was on Thursday forced to withdraw from a merger with a US group, Sourcefire, after the Bush administration raised national security concerns, underscoring that even the US's closest allies are under close scrutiny.

Lucent-Alcatel Merger Would Face Scrutiny (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

A merger of Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel would likely draw federal scrutiny to see if it threatens national security following the furor over a Dubai-based company's plan to acquire control of six U.S. ports, communications and national security analysts said yesterday.

But analysts said they saw no obvious reason why a combination of the two telecommunications equipment makers would face major objections from the government on security or antitrust grounds.

Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent and Paris-based Alcatel said late Thursday that they are "engaged in discussions about a potential merger," but said they could not guarantee they would reach any agreement. A merger would greatly expand Alcatel's business in the United States and allow the two companies to cut costs and better compete with their larger competitors.

It is unclear how a merger, if one materializes, would be structured. The two companies said they were discussing "a merger of equals that is intended to be priced at market." Spokespeople for Alcatel and Lucent, which had discussed merging in May 2001, declined comment beyond their statement.

If Alcatel, the larger of the two companies, were to buy Lucent, that could trigger a review by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States (CFIUS), the interagency group chaired by the Treasury secretary that is charged with investigating such deals to ensure they do not endanger U.S. national security.

"I think in this political climate, everything that is coming through CFIUS is gong to get more attention," said Richard A. Falkenrath, a Brookings Institution scholar who served as deputy homeland security adviser and deputy assistant to the president in 2003 and 2004.

Congressional concerns this month forced the United Arab Emirates-based maritime company Dubai Ports World to abandon its plan to acquire operations at six U.S. ports, amid heightened worries about protecting vital infrastructure after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But analysts saw few appropriate comparisons in the possible Alcatel-Lucent deal, noting that the French company already does work for the U.S. government and that the sale of telecom equipment is a less sensitive matter than the management of U.S. ports, which have long been seen as vulnerable to attack.

"Alcatel is already delivering advanced network solutions to the federal government. Lucent of course has a long history of providing advanced communications services and infrastructure to the federal government," said Mark Bieberich of the Boston-based Yankee Group Research Inc. "Both companies have been properly vetted . . . so I think the risk posed by the merger to the federal government is minimal."

AT&T Corp., the former long-distance giant that has now been dismembered, spun off Lucent as a separate company in 1996. Bell Labs, AT&T's legendary research arm, went with Lucent.

At its peak, Bell Labs was deeply involved in classified work for the U.S. government. It worked on radar and missile guidance systems, and it designed a secure, scrambled communications system that allowed Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Winston Churchill to talk to each other during World War II, said AT&T's former corporate historian Sheldon Hochheiser.

While Lucent still does work for the government, the amount is a far cry from the Cold War, when Hochheiser estimated that as much as a third of Bell Labs' budget was paid for by Washington.

In fiscal 2005, Lucent had $104.7 million in federal contracts, with about 65 percent of those coming from the U.S. Army, according to Eagle Eye Publishers Inc., a Fairfax company that tracks federal contracts. Alcatel had $22.4 million in such contracts the same year, with nearly 53 percent for the Army, according to Eagle Eye figures. Today, Alcatel and Lucent are the seventh- and ninth-largest telecom equipment makers, respectively, according to Yankee Group.

"In its heyday, this would have been a huge blow to national security and to national pride, but Lucent is a shadow of itself," said University of Colorado law professor Philip J. Weiser.

BGE Sees Merger As Buffer For Rates (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

BALTIMORE -- A Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. executive yesterday warned that lawmakers' attempts to block a multibillion-dollar merger could force the utility to more quickly implement a 72-percent increase in energy rates.

"Without the merger there is no room to lower rates," said Robert L. Gould, communications director for BGE parent company Constellation Energy Group. "We have gone right to the edge of how much we can tolerate on the balance sheet."

He also said if lawmakers make good on their threat to block Florida Power & Light's $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy, they likely would derail plans to gradually phase in a 72-percent increase in electric bills.

"One of the benefits of the merger is you have a bigger balance sheet," Mr. Gould said. "You take that away, and it will be tougher and our credit rating will be thrown into question."

As proof, he said Moody's Investor Service has already put Constellation on a watch list because of uncertainty about the regulatory environment taking shape in Maryland's legislature.

A spokeswoman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, said the governor is wary of government interference in business but "still believes that more can and should be done" to keep electricity affordable.

"He does support the merger, and he is aware of the negative impact that interfering in the merger could have on Maryland business," said spokeswoman Shareese N. DeLeaver. But "the governor believes that we should put the customer first."

Staving off "rate shocks" for BGE's 1.2 million customers has become the hottest issue in this election year, in which Mr. Ehrlich is seeking re-election and every seat in the General Assembly is up for grabs.

Since the increases were announced March 7, several bills have been introduced to prevent or postpone Maryland's higher energy rates, including plans to cap rates, to give the legislature authority over utility mergers and even to return to a public utility system.

Miss DeLeaver said the legislature's attack of the energy issue was "like a cat swatting a ball of yarn," while the governor was crafting an alternative rate-reduction plan to be presented to the power company in coming weeks.

The power company has proposed gradually phasing in higher rates over a 15-month period, beginning with a 13-percent increase in July. The average BGE electric bill would increase from $81.65 to $92.60 a month, according to the company.

Rates would increase 15 percent in January and 15 percent in June 2007, then increase to market rates by fall 2007. At that time, the average electric bill would have increased from $81.65 to $140.50. Customers also would pay a monthly charge of $4.40 for the next eight years -- a total of about $422 -- to pay for the loan BGE would need to cover the cost of the deferred rate increase, according to the company.

"We have put a very aggressive package on the table already," Mr. Gould said.

He said the proposal also included $150 million to reduce electric rates in the future. The money, he said, would come from cost savings resulting from the merger.

"That's a true subsidy," Mr. Gould said. "We would actually reach in our pockets and lower rates that much."

The increases are partly the result of the 1999 deregulation plan approved by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly and signed by Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.

DOJ_NMG_0022056

The plan included rate caps that kept electric bills artificially low for the past six years and discouraged competition from entering Maryland's partially deregulated utility market.

The caps expire in July, when rates are set to increase 72 percent to market levels for BGE customers. Rates also are increasing 39 percent for Potomac Electric Power Co. and 35 percent for Delmarva Power.

Utility executives warn that continued price controls could bankrupt Maryland power companies and cause power shortages like those in California in 2000.

Last summer, residential customers paid an average of 11.72 cents per kilowatt-hour in the mid-Atlantic region, according to the Edison Electric Institute, an electric utility association.

However, BGE customers paid an average 9.251 cents per kilowatt-hour last summer, according to the Maryland Public Service Commission, which regulates utilities.

BGE's planned increase to 14.834 cents per kilowatt-hour should bring its prices up to current market rates, said Jason Cuevas of the Edison Electric Institute.

Yucca Probe Forwarded (LVRJ)

By STEVE TETREAULT, STEPHENS WASHINGTON BUREAU

Las Vegas Review-Journal, March 25, 2006

Federal prosecutors reviewing evidence

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors are reviewing evidence gathered by investigators into whether scientists falsified quality assurance documents at Yucca Mountain, officials confirmed Friday.

Inspectors general for the Interior and Energy departments sent a report to U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden in Las Vegas in the past month, said Roy Kimes, a spokesman for Interior Department Inspector General Earl Devaney.

"The investigative work has been done, and the report has been forwarded to the Department of Justice," Kimes said. "It is not considered finalized until we get an indication from DOJ that they are going to prosecute or not going to prosecute."

Neither Kimes nor Denise Smith, a spokeswoman for Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman, would discuss details.

Smith said "it is possible" that evidence of wrongdoing was discovered, but communications between investigators and prosecutors do not necessarily signal the probe is near an end.

"As evidence is uncovered, there are dealings with the U.S. attorney's office, and oftentimes the U.S. attorney may have us do additional work or not depending on what is found," Smith said.

Inspectors were asked to determine possible criminal activity by federal employees after the disclosure in March 2005 of provocative e-mails.

In the messages, which were written between 1998 and 2000, several workers discussed possible alterations of quality assurance documents that backed up their water infiltration models at the nuclear waste site.

Natalie Collins, an aide to Bogden, said she would not confirm or deny the federal attorney's involvement in the matter.

A person familiar with the process said, "I wouldn't think they would send something over (to Bogden) that they didn't think ought to be considered for prosecution."

On Thursday, Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., told reporters that a Justice Department evaluation "was forthcoming."

"They want to find out if it was done maliciously or done in error," Porter said of the allegations of document mishandling. "They want to find out if there was any criminal activity."

Porter heads a House subcommittee that has been conducting a separate probe of quality assurance at Yucca Mountain and issues related to the e-mails.

The Yucca project was rocked and investigations were triggered when the e-mails were disclosed by Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and by Charles Groat, then-director of the U.S. Geological Survey.

DOJ_NMG_0022057

The messages circulated among a small number of employees. The primary authors later were identified as USGS hydrologists Joseph Hevesi, Allen Flint and Lorraine Flint.

Hevesi appeared before Porter's subcommittee in June and offered explanations for some of the messages. He testified under oath that he did not alter documents or data. The Flints, who are married, were questioned by subcommittee investigators but have not commented publicly.

The Energy Department recently completed an audit of the work performed by the USGS scientists. A report issued Feb. 17 concluded the science was valid but the research would be redone by Sandia National Laboratories to meet quality assurance standards.

The hydrologists remain employed at the USGS, spokeswoman A.B. Wade said. Agency officials have said any possible disciplinary action was being postponed until completion of the inspectors general probe.

Tackling The Animal-to-Human Link In Illness (NYT)

By Lawrence K. Altman

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

ATLANTA, March 24 — Stronger ties between veterinarians and physicians are needed to prevent further outbreaks of the animal diseases that have caused deaths and serious illness among humans in many countries in recent years, international health officials said at a meeting here.

The diseases are known as zoonoses because they affect animals primarily, and humans only incidentally. The AIDS, SARS and A(H5N1) avian influenza viruses and at least eight other infectious agents carried by animals have led to new and emerging human diseases in recent years.

The spread of new and emerging diseases can be a two-way street as people occasionally transmit human diseases like tuberculosis to elephants in captivity in the United States and Sweden and mongooses in Africa.

The latest and most visible zoonosis is A(H5N1) avian influenza. Through illness and culling, the virus has led to the death of an estimated 200 million birds worldwide. In Asia and Europe, the virus has caused 185 human cases of which 104 have been fatal.

New diseases are occurring in part because of globalization and because people are encroaching on areas once reserved for wildlife. After the AIDS virus infected tens of millions of people worldwide and an animal disease, anthrax, was deliberately spread through the United States postal system after Sept. 11, public health has become intertwined with national security.

Experts at the three-day International Symposium on Emerging Zoonoses said they had no way of predicting what human disease would emerge next from an animal source.

Preventing further outbreaks, participants said, will require a variety of measures, including more education about zoonoses among veterinarians and physicians; more integration of animal diseases into health plans; the creation of more laboratories to detect animal diseases; and possibly changes in the foods people eat and the animals they keep as pets.

Breaking down barriers among government agencies, academia and special interest groups will be needed as scientists seek new ways to collect reliable evidence to protect the health of animals and humans, participants said.

But "no single institution has the capacity to do all this," said Dr. Pierre Formenty, a veterinarian and epidemiologist at the World Health Organization in Geneva.

The meeting was the first between the World Animal Health Organization, a cooperative of chief veterinary officers from 167 countries, based in Paris, and the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, based in Atlanta, said Dr. Lonnie King, the dean of Michigan State University's veterinary school.

Dr. King is soon joining the C.D.C., which is expected to become a laboratory and epidemiology reference center for the animal organization.

"We are creating the conditions for the spread of these viruses" that cause zoonoses and human illness through tourism, hunting and farming, said Dr. Bruno Chomel, a professor of zoonoses at the University of California, Davis.

DOJ_NMG_0022058

For example, Dr. Chomel said, the corn mouse that carries the virus that causes Argentine hemorrhagic fever has spread its range with changes in farming, leading to outbreaks of the bleeding disease.

The liver infection caused by the hepatitis E virus, which has been detected mainly in poor countries, is being increasingly recognized in wealthy countries in small numbers. Two outbreaks of hepatitis E occurred recently in Japan after people ate raw liver from infected wild boar and deer, Dr. Chomel said.

In 1999, scientists discovered the Nipah virus among pig workers in Malaysia and Singapore who developed inflammation of the brain and respiratory illness. Farming practices on pig farms where fruit trees were abundant created opportunities for transmission of the Nipah virus, said Dr. Peter W. Daniels of the Australian Animal Health Laboratory in Geelong.

Fruit bats carried the Nipah virus, and it was transmitted to pigs that lived in an open farm environment. In turn, the virus was transmitted to humans and their pets.

Additional factors favoring Nipah virus transmission were disrespect for regulations and the frequent breaking of rules to increase profits. It was a lesson that self-regulation must be realistically audited, Dr. Daniels said.

The demand for exotic pets can also spread zoonoses.

Customs inspectors recently stopped the potential spread of A(H5N1) virus in Belgium by catching a man trying to smuggle infected Thai eagles that had been stuffed alive in a roller tube.

Cats, leopards and tigers have died from A(H5N1) avian influenza in southeast Asia and Europe. Though the number of cases is small, they have raised concern that the virus could become a bigger problem among felines. The 10,000 tigers now being kept as pets in the United States outnumber the 6,000 in the wild worldwide, Dr. Chomel said.

Another zoonosis, rabies, killed 50,000 people in 2005, mainly from dog bites in Africa and Asia despite availability of an effective vaccine, according to the World Health Organization.

In poor countries, many dogs go unvaccinated because they are believed to be strays. But many strays turn out not to be strays, said Dr. Jakob Zinsstag of the Swiss Tropical Institute in Basel. In a pilot study in Chad, his team vaccinated and tagged stray dogs. When the Swiss team recaptured stray dogs, it found that 70 percent had been vaccinated, concluding that their owners had let them roam freely and that opportunities existed to conduct rabies vaccination programs.

Many disease outbreaks like avian influenza often lead to mass cullings that create practical and emotional problems for animal health workers, said Dr. Larry Granger, a veterinarian at the United States Department of Agriculture in Riverdale, Md. When mass euthanasia of animals is carried out, all workers should be debriefed to help relieve their stress, Dr. Granger said.

Selling The Forests (NYT)

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

It's rarely a good idea to sell off assets to pay normal operating expenses. It's an even worse idea when the assets are chunks of national forest. But that's exactly what the Bush administration wants to do.

Washington has long sent money to isolated local communities surrounded by national forests. The communities cannot tax federal property, so the money helps pay for schools. The grants were calculated as a percentage of timber sales. When the annual harvest declined, partly as a result of court rulings in favor of various endangered species, the money was taken from general revenues.

President Bush's 2007 budget proposes to raise the money by auctioning off about 300,000 acres of federal forest in 41 states, at an anticipated price of $800 million. The administration recently sent a bill to Congress that would give the Forest Service the authority to conduct the sales. The bill has many defects, especially a provision that would sharply limit the public's opportunity to comment on the sales, short of embarking on expensive litigation. But its most glaring defect is its underlying strategy of trading long-term assets for short-term gain.

Gov. Mike Easley of North Carolina, which would lose 9,828 acres, or nearly 1 percent of its national forest acreage, put the matter eloquently in a letter to Mark Rey, the under secretary of agriculture who helped concoct this scheme. The plan, he said, would blatantly contradict North Carolina's efforts to preserve open space for future generations by removing priceless resources "from public access for all time in order to provide temporary funding."

This page has objected on many occasions to the administration's efforts to roll back protections for the national forests, chiefly its decision to rescind President Bill Clinton's "roadless rule," which would have shielded nearly 60 million acres of national forest from further commercial intrusions. Though it involves much less acreage, the proposal to sell forest land reflects the same insensitivity to environmental values, not to mention misplaced budget priorities. In addition to the forest sale, the administration also proposes to sell a half-million acres managed by the Interior Department, not for any purposes related to stewardship of the public lands, but simply to reduce a national deficit already bloated by tax cuts.

Congress should reject both ideas out of hand.

Sections Of The Voting Rights Act Will Soon Need Reauthorization (ICT)

By David Melmer, Indian Country Today

Indian Country Today, March 24, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Voting Rights Act, enacted in 1965, will celebrate its 41st anniversary on Aug. 7; yet some provisions of the act, which supporters argue have brought American Indians into the political arena, are due to expire in 2007.

American Indian and non-Indian organizations are in the midst of compiling and reporting research that shows the VRA - with some permanent provisions and some temporary - has made a difference to many minorities and furthers the argument that the VRA is still needed in its entirety.

Section 5 of the act, renewed several times, requires nine states and portion of seven states to submit changes that affect voting in any way to the U.S. Department of Justice for approval, or pre-clearance, as it is referred. That section is due to expire in 2007. Section 5 was last renewed by Congress for a term of 25 years, and that is the recommendation again.

Section 203, which requires assistance for limited-English speakers at the polls, and Sections 6 - 9, which authorize the federal government to monitor elections, are all set to expire.

The American Civil Liberties Union submitted a comprehensive report on how the VRA affects Indian country. The states that benefited the most from the VRA were Montana, Nebraska, Wyoming, Colorado and South Dakota. In each state, litigation or the threat of litigation mitigated state voting legislation that would have adversely impacted American Indian residents.

"By tearing down the barriers to equal opportunity for racial and language minorities in voting, the Act removed the political mechanism that was essential to maintaining the legal structure of segregation. As the Supreme Court has said, the equal right to vote is fundamental because it is preservative of all rights," the report stated.

The report used selected documentation from trial transcripts to support the claim that the VRA is important to Indian country. In other parts of the country, specifically Southern states, litigation and voting rights changes have occurred since the VRA's beginning in 1965. It hasn't been until recently that Indian country has benefited from the VRA.

Had it not been for the VRA, the report asserts, American Indians in some states would not have the representation they prefer; yet there is more work to do and litigation is still a necessary tool in keeping the states in line.

Although the act eradicated at-large voting, just after it was signed some states changed some districts to at-large voting only to face legal action. At-large representation was ended early on in the act's life in the South, but in Indian country only just recently has at-large selection of representatives been stopped.

Only one lawsuit was filed between 1974 and 1990 in Indian country. That lawsuit challenged the Montana at-large elections as diluting American Indian voting strength, despite the presence of seven reservations and a significant American Indian population. American Indians make up eight percent of Montana's population.

Other lawsuits filed in Montana resulted in the election of eight American Indians to the state Legislature, more American Indian lawmakers than any other state. Not all the lawsuits in Montana went to court.

The 1992 redistricting plan in Montana was challenged four years later. The redistricting commission, made up of both political parties, did not have any American Indian representation, but tribes submitted a plan that they thought would be fair. The commission rejected the plan and ended up in court in 1996. It was redrawn, but not to the full satisfaction of the tribes.

In 2000, the commission included one American Indian and the result was the creation of 100 house districts, six of which were majority American Indian; and 50 Senate districts, three of which were majority American Indian, the report noted.

South Dakota, with a larger American Indian population and smaller overall population than Montana, has only four American Indians in the state Legislature. Changes to redistricting after the state was found in violation of the VRA resulted in a split district that may allow American Indian voters to elect up to three more of their preferred candidates.

South Dakota is the only state in the Plains and Mountain states required by the VRA to submit any changes in voting laws or rules to the Justice Department for pre-clearance. Two of its counties, Todd and Shannon, home to the Rosebud and Pine Ridge reservations respectively, are listed under Section 5.

According to the report, several factors kept lawsuits at bay in Indian country: lack of resources and access to legal assistance, lax enforcement of the VRA by the Department of Justice, the isolation of the American Indian community and the debilitating legacy of years of discrimination by the federal and state governments.

American Indian voters' rights were being challenged in the southern Plains states as well.

It wasn't until 1970 that the Colorado Constitution was amended to allow American Indians to vote and take part in the political process.

In the 1980s and 1990s, Ute members were not allowed to register to vote at the tribal headquarters, while the non-Indian population was afforded satellite registration locations in various communities. Litigation changed that situation. Prior to 1997, no American Indian had ever been elected to a county office in Montezuma County, home of the Ute Mountain Utes.

The report stated that defendants in American Indian voting rights cases frequently argue that "Indians are mainly loyal to their tribes and simply don't care about participation in elections run by the state."

The report went on to say it was the state itself that created an atmosphere of non-loyalty to the state by denying the American Indian the right to vote.

"The courts have invariably found patterns of widespread discrimination against Indians in the political process, including chronic racial bloc voting," the report stated.

FBI Helps ID New Orleans Gangs In Houston (KHOU-TV)

By Jeff McShan, 11 News

KHOU-TV, March 25, 2006

The FBI is helping police identify gang members from New Orleans who are now in Houston.

11 News talked with Houston's police chief about the gang crackdown and how officers are using the information.

In New Orleans, police say some gang members that evacuated their city are now beginning to come back.

"I think what we have seen is a few bad guys have reoccupied the city," said New Orleans police chief Warren Riley.

Apparently they are coming back to redefine their territories.

"The people we suspect of this are some folks that were in Houston a while back. I think Houston's obviously on them," said Riley.

After a slow start. Houston, specifically HPD, is onto them because vital communication between the two cities is finally taking place.

FBI director Robert Mueller says the federal agency played a big role in making that happen.

"We have worked together both New Orleans and in Houston to exchange intelligence information that will enable both Harold and the New Orleans police department to do the jobs. We recognize that not just in terms of New Orleans and Houston, but gangs and criminals that traverse the country now," said Mueller.

It's been well documented that after the storm, homicides here shot up more than 25 percent.

Chief Harold Hurtt said his department is getting a handle on it by targeting the hot spots and getting much-needed information on the criminals that came here from our neighboring state.

"I think we are doing a good job of sharing intelligence now because they are getting access to databases in Louisiana which we didn't have in the beginning. And we have identified a lot of people as you know, locally here in the media. We have done some roundups of some individuals from New Orleans that was involved in gang activity, as well as drugs, and we are going to stay on top of that," said Hurtt.

In New Orleans the chief says they're trying to stay on top of it too.

"Advise citizens that we're on it, let the gang members know that we're on it and to do all we can to discourage them from re-occupying or coming back to the city," said Riley.

In other words, both cities are cracking down on gangs and no one wants them to call their city home.

New Graffiti Signs Put Officials On Alert (KHOU-TV)

By Wendell Edwards, 11 News

KHOU-TV, March 25, 2006

At a fund-raiser for the Mademoiselles of Madison High School, washing cars was the easy part.

But the group said they wish keeping buildings graffiti-free in the neighborhood was just as simple.

"It's a disgrace to the neighborhood," student Kelcie Fields said. "It's trashy."

Houston is no stranger to gangs or how members mark their territory.

But when strange symbols and signs started showing up, Precinct 7 deputies took notice.

"It wasn't very long after their arrival," Sgt. Ray Hughes said. "They made themselves very known pretty quickly."

Sgt. Ray Hughes said the new graffiti is from New Orleans gangs.

Authorities said the new markings are all over southeast and parts of southwest Houston, adding to an already crowded canvas.

"It's very hard. I gotta tell you — we're swamped," Sgt. Hughes said. "We try really hard to keep up with it but we can't."

In New Orleans, they aren't called gangs. They are known as members of rival housing projects. But authorities said they have brought their turf war to Houston.

A war that includes graffiti and violent crime.

A battle that the FBI director said can be stopped with the help of local police.

"For us to be effective, we have to work together," FBI Director Robert Mueller said. "We are here in Houston and as well as back in New Orleans."

A crackdown that puts gangs on alert, authorities on patrol and a clear sign that neither side is backing down.

FBI Planning To Return To N.O. By Early June (NOTP)

By Charlie Chapple, St. Tammany Bureau

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 25, 2006

Director tours temporary site

The FBI will move back into its New Orleans headquarters on the Lakefront by early June, agency Director Robert Mueller said Thursday after visiting agents in St. Tammany Parish.

"We expect to be back sometime in late May or early June," Mueller said after meeting with agents and other law enforcement officials at the FBI's temporary field office and compound at Covington Country Club.

After the FBI's Lakefront headquarters were heavily damaged by Hurricane Katrina, the agency rented the country club's clubhouse and turned the facility into a fenced and secured compound for agents and staff members.

Mueller, a former U.S. attorney and prosecutor who has led the agency since August 2001, said he has made several trips to the New Orleans area since the hurricane, but Thursday was his first visit to the temporary office.

Despite having to relocate and work under adverse conditions, local agents and staff have never missed a beat, Mueller said. They were able to salvage all evidence and case files from the New Orleans office after the storm, he said. And continuing fraud investigations have resulted in 71 indictments or charges, he said.

During his two-hour visit to the temporary office, Mueller also met with several state and local law enforcement officers, including State Police Superintendent Henry Whitehorn, St. Bernard Parish Sheriff Jack Stephens and representatives from the New Orleans Police Department, the Jefferson Parish Sheriff's Office and Plaquemines Parish Sheriff's Office.

Mueller said his visit had a dual purpose. "I wanted to talk to the FBI personnel here," Mueller said. "Many lost their homes and continued to work. I wanted to see how they were doing in terms of rebuilding."

The FBI head said he also wanted to thank state and local law enforcement officers for continuing the relationship they've built with the agency since Katrina and to "assure them we are ready for the next hurricane down the line."

As he waited to talk with Mueller, Stephens praised the FBI. "They're one federal agency which I have no complaints about," he said. "They were there for us when we needed them."

6 Convicted Of Racketeering After Muscling In On Mob (NYT)

By JULIA PRESTON

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Six men accused of being members of a gang led by Balkan immigrants that seized control of illegal gambling in old-time Mafia strongholds were convicted of racketeering yesterday in federal court.

Prosecutors charged that the organization, which they said was sometimes called the Corporation, had used strong-arm tactics to set up illegal gambling clubs in Astoria and Bayside, Queens, and in the Bronx, pushing aside the Luchese and Gambino crime family.

Gang leaders at one point sought to show their muscle by insisting on being seated at the old table of the late John J. Gotti, the don of the Gambino crime family, at Rao's restaurant in East Harlem, the prosecutors said.

After a three-month trial in Federal District Court in Manhattan, Alex Rudaj, who is from Montenegro and who prosecutors said was the ringleader of the Albanian organized crime group, and five other defendants were found guilty of multiple counts of racketeering, illegal gambling and extortion.

Mr. Rudaj and another defendant, Nardino Colotti, were acquitted of the most serious charge in the trial, the attempted murder of Gaetano Peduto, then an associate of the Bonnano crime family, during a Bronx car chase in 1993.

Mr. Rudaj's lawyer, James Kousouros, said that defeating the attempted murder charge was "huge" for the defense, because that charge carries a mandatory life sentence.

The jury also found the defendants not guilty of another serious charge of violence, a pistol-whipping attack in August 2001 on a gang rival.

But the guilty verdicts showed that the jury was amply persuaded that Mr. Rudaj, 38, and his associates were part of a criminal organization that spread its illegal gambling operation, often with threats of force, from Astoria to Westchester County. The assistant United States attorneys who prosecuted the case, Jennifer G. Rodgers, Timothy Treanor and Benjamin Gruenstein, said that Mr. Rudaj's group collected at least $4 million a year from a network of 50 video gambling machines. The machines are not illegal, prosecutors said, but collecting gambling proceeds from them is.

"They used force and intimidation as their primary business tactic," Ms. Rodgers said in her closing arguments on Dec. 19.

"They took and they tried to take territory by violence, force and threat of violence," she said.

Ms. Rodgers described an instance in which she said Mr. Rudaj had beaten an extortion victim to a "bloody pulp" and then complained that the victim's blood had spattered all over his off-white pants.

Mr. Kousouros never denied during the trial that Mr. Rudaj had engaged in gambling. "A lot of it," Mr. Kousouros said. But he argued that his client was not part of a violent organized crime group.

The other defendants were Nikola Dedaj, Prenka Ivezaj, Ljusa Nuculovic and Angelo DiPietro.

The jurors found that the gang, which prosecutors said was formed in 1993, engaged in loan sharking, and extorted bars and social clubs to force in their illegal gambling operations. The defendants face seven years to life. Mr. Kousouros said he planned an appeal for Mr. Rudaj on the extortion charges. </NYT_TEXT>

3 Plead Guilty In Conspiracy (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

Two U.S. soldiers and a former Air Force sergeant have pleaded guilty in a widespread bribery and extortion conspiracy as part of an ongoing undercover investigation that has already resulted in 50 guilty pleas from servicemen and civilian government workers, Assistant Attorney General Alice S. Fisher said yesterday.

Pleading guilty in Tucson, Ariz., on Thursday to one count each of "conspiring to enrich themselves by obtaining cash bribes from persons they believed to be drug traffickers" were Curtis W. Boston II, 24, formerly a sergeant in the U.S. Air Force; U.S. Army Staff Sgt. Rodney E. Mills, 39; and Arizona National Guard Sgt. Gustavo C. Soto, 33.

Court documents show the smugglers were actually undercover FBI agents, part of "Operation Lively Green," with whom the three are accused of conspiring to use their positions to "assist, protect and participate in the activities of an illegal narcotics trafficking organization engaged in the business of transporting and distributing cocaine from Arizona to other locations in the southwestern United States."

In order to protect the cocaine shipments, the records said, the men wore their uniforms, carried official identification cards and drove in military vehicles to prevent police inspections for narcotics as they transported the drugs through U.S. Border Patrol, Arizona Department of Public Safety and Nevada law-enforcement checkpoints.

Mrs. Fisher, who heads the Justice Department's criminal division, said all the defendants escorted at least one shipment of cocaine from locations that included Nogales, Ariz., and Tucson, to large metro areas including Phoenix and Las Vegas. The three who pleaded guilty on Thursday accepted $50,000 in bribes for their participation. The conspiracy charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. All three agreed to cooperate in the ongoing investigation and will be sentenced in June.

The fifty who have already pleaded were involved in more than $420,000 in bribes, Justice Department officials said, adding that more than 1,500 pounds of cocaine was transported by the servicemen and others. They will also be sentenced in June.

Authorities detailed one of the previous cases where soldiers drove three official government vehicles, including two military Humvees, to a clandestine desert airstrip near Benson, Ariz., where they met a twin-engine King Air aircraft flown by undercover FBI agents.

While in full uniform, the soldiers supervised the unloading of more than 130 pounds of cocaine from the airplane into their vehicles, which they then delivered to other agents posing as high-echelon narcotics traffickers at a resort hotel in Phoenix, the authorities said.

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration To Take Center Stage At Trilateral Summit (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush will meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox in Cancun on Thursday to discuss immigration reform, even as the Senate debates whether to give legal status to the millions of illegal immigrants who are already in the United States.

Bush and Fox are scheduled to meet in the Yucatan vacation resort as part of a trilateral summit with new Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper. While Bush has serious economic issues to address with Harper, U.S.-Mexican immigration is expected to dominate the two-day meeting.

"The immigration debate is a vital debate for our country," Bush said Thursday, after a White House meeting on the issue with agricultural and faith-based leaders. "It must be done in a way that doesn't pit one group of people against another."

Given the political climate across the United States, it's doubtful that Bush will get his wish for a nondivisive debate. Many in Washington question whether any immigration legislation can pass this year. Bush is weakened by low approval ratings, and opposition to illegal immigration has become a red-hot issue in many states where lawmakers face voters in November.

Moreover, several potential 2008 presidential candidates are weighing in from opposing sides, lessening the chance for compromise.

"There's nothing that Bush can promise credibly to the Mexicans," said George Grayson, a professor who specializes in U.S.-Mexico relations at Virginia's College of William and Mary. "He's had a rough couple of months, and the Republicans sought to separate themselves from him in the Dubai Ports deal. They have a chance to do it again with immigration."

That isn't stopping Bush from promoting his plan to overhaul immigration law. He highlights his call for a guest-worker program, which would allow illegal immigrants and foreign workers to apply for temporary legal status to accept U.S. jobs. After a maximum of six years, they would be required to go back to their home countries and wouldn't be placed on track for permanent residency.

Bowing to rising resentment of illegal immigrants across the heartland, Bush also has recently emphasized tighter security along the U.S.-Mexican border and called for illegal immigrants registering for his guest-worker program to pay unspecified fines.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., a potential 2008 presidential candidate, is staking out a harder stance. The Senate will begin two weeks of debate on immigration on Tuesday, and Frist is sponsoring a bill that would toughen border security without offering a guest-worker program.

His proposal mirrors an enforcement-only bill that the House of Representatives passed on Dec. 16. Lawmakers opposing the guest-worker plan say that giving illegal immigrants the opportunity to work and live here legally would reward bad behavior.

Meanwhile, on Monday the Senate Judiciary Committee will take up a bill by Sens. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass, and John McCain, R-Ariz., another likely 2008 presidential candidate, that would let illegal immigrants hold temporary work visas for up to six years after they pay $1,000 fines and pass background checks. Illegal immigrants could apply for permanent residence and eventual citizenship under the Kennedy-McCain measure.

Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the panel's chairman, is trying to broker a compromise that includes guest-worker and enforcement provisions.

Most experts think Bush faces an uphill fight to win congressional approval of any terms granting legal status to illegal aliens, which opponents denounce as amnesty for lawbreakers.

"I think it's going to be difficult for the president," said Ira Mehlman, spokesman for the Federation for American Immigration Reform, which opposes giving legal status to illegal aliens. "Whatever political capital he thought he had last year is spent and, like the rest of the federal government, is in deficit. Amnesty, on a visceral level, most Americans object to."

Polls reflect America's unease with some of the proposed changes. In a Quinnipiac national survey last month, 62 percent said they oppose making it easier for illegal immigrants to become citizens, while only 32 percent supported the idea. An NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll two weeks ago found that 56 percent said the United States shouldn't grant temporary worker status to illegal immigrants.

Mexican officials are under a growing sense of urgency after watching the issue heat up among their northern neighbors. Fox is in his last year in office and would like immigration reform to be part of his legacy, Grayson said.

"Fox leaves office and has precious little to show," Grayson said. "He's hoping to pull a rabbit out of his hat."

Seeking to influence U.S. lawmakers and public opinion, the Fox government paid $369,500 for full-page ads that advocate a guest-worker program and argue that Mexico should help the United States design it. The ads ran this week in The Washington Post, The New York Times and The Los Angeles Times.

"Perhaps we are at the most important moment in this debate in the last five, six years," said Geronimo Gutierrez, undersecretary for North America in Mexico's Ministry of Foreign Affairs. "... Anything can happen with migration reform in the U.S., and we are aware of that. ... We want to send a message that Mexico is part of the solution, not part of the problem."

The NBC News/Wall Street Journal Poll was taken March 10-13. The poll was a sampling of 1,005 adults - 48 percent male, 52 percent females. The margin of error is plus or minus 3.1 percentage points. The Quinnipiac University Poll was conducted Feb. 21-28 with 1,892 registered voters nationwide. The margin of error is plus or minus 2.3 percentage points.

Cornyn Vows To Oppose Immigration Bill (FWST)

By Dave Montgomery

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. John Cornyn of Texas vowed Friday to oppose a bipartisan immigration measure that would put millions of illegal immigrants on track toward legalization, saying the bill would "encourage further disrespect for our laws."

The Texas Republican signaled his intention to oppose the bill, by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., amid signs that a tentative compromise among Senate Judiciary Committee members may be collapsing.

The Senate faces a showdown on immigration next week.

Senators are deeply divided over proposals to toughen border security and more comprehensive measures that would include President Bush's calls for a guest worker plan.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., said he will submit a limited border enforcement measure as a starting point unless the Judiciary Committee completes work on a more extensive plan embracing key elements of the McCain-Kennedy bill.

Frist gave the committee until late Monday to complete its work.

"I don't think the Judiciary Committee is going to be able to complete a bill by Monday," said Cornyn, a member of the panel and co-sponsor of a rival immigration bill. "There is just not enough time for us to have a committee product."

Most of the committee embraced a tentative compromise before Congress began a weeklong recess, with plans to return and vote on a final version Monday.

But immigration advocates said the agreement may be disintegrating as committee staff members struggle to draft a bill.

"I'm not sure that's holding," said Tamar Jacoby of the Manhattan Institute, which supports a guest worker plan. "The handshake from last Thursday is turning out to be pretty hard to write into legislative language."

The McCain-Kennedy bill would let illegal immigrants hold temporary work visas for up to six years after they pay a $1,000 fine, pass background checks and meet other conditions.

They would also be eligible to apply for permanent residence and eventual citizenship.

"I'm not going to vote for anything that essentially rewards illegal conduct," said Cornyn.

He described the McCain-Kennedy bill as amnesty for illegal immigrants.

The bill's supporters say the amnesty tag is inaccurate because illegal immigrants would have to pay a fine.

Thousands Rally For Immigrants' Rights (DMN)

By Michelle Mittelstadt

The Dallas Morning News, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON – In church pews, union halls and now the streets of Chicago, Phoenix, Milwaukee and Los Angeles, hundreds of thousands have clamored in recent weeks for Congress to confer legal status on the country's 11 million-plus illegal immigrants.

The street rallies, scattered work stoppages and protests in cities across the nation are reaching a crescendo this weekend in preparation for Monday's launch of a two-week Senate debate to fix the deeply dysfunctional immigration system.

More than 20,000 spilled into the streets of Phoenix on Friday, marching on the office of a senator who wants illegal immigrants to leave the country before they can apply to return as temporary workers. Perhaps as many as a half-million marchers are expected today for a rally in Los Angeles, and hundreds more will gather at Dallas City Hall.

At the top of their agenda: Pressuring senators to bring the nation's illegal immigrants out of the shadows and create legal pathways for workers who want to come here in the future.

AP Thousands of supporters of immigrant rights clogged major thoroughfares in central Phoenix Friday.

"Not since the days of César Chavez have we seen such grassroots mobilization for any cause," said the Rev. Samuel Rodriguez Jr., head of the National Hispanic Christian Leadership Conference.

Said Joshua Hoyt, executive director of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights: "Nothing like this has been seen in this country. And if it continues moving forward, it's the beginning of a massive immigrant civil-rights struggle."

DOJ_NMG_0022066

Angered by the House's approval in December of an enforcement-only strategy that calls for Southwest border fencing, beefed-up security, and the criminalization of illegal immigrants and those who help them, the protesters are using street theater to flex their political muscle.

"We believe this [proposal] is not fair and goes against human rights and, more importantly, against our Christian beliefs of providing protection to whomever needs it, no questions asked," said Gustavo Bujanda Reyes, leader of Redes Ciudadanas, a network of community groups in Dallas.

Support in doubt

With individual senators indicating a deep unease with some of the harshest House provisions, the Senate appears unlikely to embrace the House's course.

But it remains unclear whether there's enough support in the Senate for any type of plan to legalize illegal immigrants here and create a guest worker program for future arrivals – though advocates insist they remain hopeful.

Texas Sen. John Cornyn, who chairs the Senate immigration subcommittee, made clear Friday that he will oppose the leading legalization proposal, offered by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass.

Their plan would place illegal immigrants on a path to eventual citizenship if they pay $2,000 in fines, make good on any back taxes, pass a criminal background check and demonstrate English proficiency.

The proposal "rewards illegal immigrants and will be considered an amnesty by Americans," Mr. Cornyn said. "It will encourage further disrespect for our laws, and will undercut our efforts to shore up homeland security."

Mr. Cornyn and a fellow Republican, Arizona Sen. Jon Kyl, have crafted a rival proposal that would permit illegal immigrants to become guest workers for six years but then require them to return home. That plan, derided as "report-to-deport" by critics, has received little support – and those who marched on Mr. Kyl's office Friday favor a much more liberal legalization plan.

'Anti-amnesty'

Though the protesters have received major attention, there's a quieter effort under way by opponents of a broad legalization program. Don Stewart, a spokesman for Mr. Cornyn, said that 50 to 60 percent of the calls to the senator's offices in Texas and Washington are "anti-amnesty."

"If we are just listening to our constituents here, I know where we are headed," Mr. Stewart said.

The showdown begins Monday when the Senate Judiciary Committee meets in a last-ditch bid to finalize several weeks of work on a massive immigration bill that would provide for increased border security and immigration enforcement – and possibly include a guest worker program.

The committee's slow pace was jolted when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., imposed a tight deadline.

To the consternation of many senators, Dr. Frist has made clear that if the committee doesn't approve a bill Monday, he'll substitute his own border security plan for the Senate debate that kicks off Tuesday. Doing so, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., predicted, would lead to a "donnybrook" on the floor as senators fight to attach a slew of competing immigration plans to what's already a huge and complicated bill.

GOP schism

Fraught with controversy in the best of times, the immigration debate has been further complicated this year by a deep philosophical schism in the Republican Party and the presidential aspirations of Dr. Frist, Mr. McCain and other key players.

And while the immigration debate hasn't broken neatly along party lines, a rift opened this week when Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid of Nevada threatened a filibuster or other legislative tactics if Dr. Frist brings up a bill that doesn't address the status of illegal immigrants.

President Bush, who has remained largely out of the legislative fray, on Thursday renewed his push for a bill that pairs increased border security with a guest worker program. He'll renew that message Monday in a speech in downtown Washington to a group of newest Americans: Those taking the oath of citizenship.

In Bills' Small Print, Critics See A Threat To Immigration (NYT)

By Rachel L Swarns

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — A little-noticed provision in two key Senate immigration bills would reshape the handling of immigration appeals cases and has touched off an outcry from several legal scholars, federal judges and the policy-making group for the federal courts.

The measure would designate the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit here, an administrative court that focuses primarily on patent cases and currently handles no immigration appeals, as the only court in the nation to handle immigration appeals. Such appeals are currently shared by the 12 other federal appellate courts.

The judges and scholars say that the circuit court in Washington, which handles about 1,500 nonimmigration cases a year, would be swamped by an additional 12,000 immigration cases. And they say that the court lacks the expertise to handle complex immigration cases, which often raise a host of constitutional and human-rights issues.

The question of how these cases are handled is particularly sensitive because federal appeals judges have sharply criticized what they have described as a pattern of biased and incoherent decisions from immigration judges in asylum cases, which make up the bulk of immigration appeals.

The two bills — one by Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the other by Senator Bill Frist, Republican of Tennessee and the majority leader — were intended in part to ease the burden on the nation's federal appeals courts, which have had a sharp increase in immigration cases. The provisions may come up for a vote in the Senate as early as next week.

Judiciary Committee staff members said that designating a single court to handle the cases would ensure a consistent standard for immigration decisions and discourage immigrants from shopping for favorable courts. They said that immigration lawyers would also be assigned to the court to help enhance expertise and that the number of judges would be increased to 15 from 12.

"You're trying to avoid forum shopping and trying to create a uniform national policy for immigration," said a senior aide to Mr. Specter who spoke on condition of anonymity because details of the legislation were still being negotiated.

But Richard A. Posner, a prominent federal appeals judge in Chicago, said the measures were "not a sound solution."

Even with the three additional judges, Judge Posner said, the annual caseload would surge to 900 per judge from 125.

"I cannot think of an area of law that is more remote from immigration than patents," the judge wrote to Senator Richard J. Durbin, an Illinois Democrat on the Judiciary Committee. "No doubt the judges of the federal circuit can become knowledgeable about immigration law, but they will be overwhelmed by the new caseload."

Leonidas Ralph Mecham, secretary for the Judicial Conference of the United States, a group of judges who make policy for the federal courts and who present the judiciary's views to Congress, raised similar concerns.

"No sufficient justification to support changing the status quo and shifting these cases from the regional courts to the Federal Circuit has been provided," Mr. Mecham wrote to Mr. Specter.

The judges also raised concerns about a proposal that would appoint a single judge to decide whether immigration cases were worthy of consideration for appeal. If the judge declined the case, no further review would be available.

Mr. Durbin said he planned to offer an amendment that would kill the measures, telling his colleagues on the Judiciary Committee that it would be premature to make such changes before holding hearings.

But the senior aide to Mr. Specter strongly defended the measure, noting that the Federal Circuit would have fewer cases than many of the federal appeals circuits, even with the additional workload. He also pointed out that most of the Federal Circuit's judges were generalists, not specialists, before they were appointed.

The surge in immigration appeals occurred after Attorney General John Ashcroft made changes in 2002 to streamline appellate review within the immigration courts.

Many appellate judges say those changes essentially shifted work to them. Immigration cases accounted for about 17 percent of all federal appeals cases last year, up from 3 percent in 2001. In New York and California, nearly 40 percent of federal appeals involved immigration.

Critics of the new legislation say that shifting appeals to Washington is misdirected and that a better solution would be to add resources to the overstrapped local immigration courts and to an interim-level immigration appeals court, known as the Board of Immigration Appeals. They said proposed increases in financing were inadequate, leaving immigration judges overburdened and threatening immigrants' rights to federal review.

"Congress needs to address the virtual collapse of the immigration judge and appeals system, not deny immigrants a chance to have their day in federal court," said Lucas Guttentag, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's immigrant rights project.

The American Intellectual Property Law Association, which represents 16,000 lawyers, also objects to the change, saying the caseload increase would hurt the way patent cases are handled.

Guest Worker Programs Have Flawed Past (MINNST/AP)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers.

By JIM ABRAMS, Associated Press Writer WASHINGTON (AP) - Proponents of a guest worker program to address the chaos of illegal immigration have a hard sell in front of them. Similar programs in the past have been plagued by abuses and have done little to stem the influx of undocumented workers.

"These programs are seductive, and that is what is so troubling to us right now," said Ana Avendano, associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO. The labor federation has been critical of guest worker programs in proposed immigration reform legislation that the Senate will debate next week.

President Bush urged Congress two years ago to write new immigration law with a guest worker program that could provide legal status, but not a road to citizenship, for some of the 11 million undocumented immigrants in the country.

The hottest debate in the Senate will be whether to pass some version of a guest worker program proposed by Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass. The bill by McCain, a contender for the 2008 GOP presidential nomination, and Kennedy would provide up to 400,000 visas in the first year and allow participants, after six years, to seek permanent residency.

Their proposal, strongly backed by the business community, would supplement existing temporary worker programs, such as the H-2A program that brings about 45,000 agriculture workers into the country every year, and H-1B visas issued to up to 65,000 high-tech and other skilled foreign workers.

It also would build on a near-century old tradition of turning to foreign unskilled laborers, mainly from Mexico, in response to labor shortages, often during times of war.

"Its historic role has been as a national emergency program," Cornell University economist Vernon Briggs wrote in a 2004 paper. "They are extraordinary policies to be used as a last resort - and then only as temporary measures."

In 1917, during World War I, an agreement was reached with Mexico to let in unskilled workers. During the program's five-year life span, 77,000 Mexicans were admitted but fewer than half returned to Mexico. "The program spawned illegal immigration," Briggs said.

A much larger exchange, the Bracero program, began in 1942, during World War II, and continued in varying forms through 1964. Some 4.6 million Mexicans came to the United States, with a peak of 439,000 in 1959.

The program stipulated that guest workers were to get free housing, medical treatment, transportation and prevailing wages. The reality was often different.

Avendano of the AFL-CIO said workers were underpaid or cheated out of wages, exposed to unsafe conditions, faced racial discrimination and were saddled with debt from recruiters and employers. Workers were unable to exercise their rights because the employer could have them deported. Under such conditions, she said, "Workers would rather be undocumented because they have full mobility."

Others argue that guest worker programs create an underclass of foreign workers and stigmatize some jobs associated with foreign labor.

Kennedy, in a statement, agreed that the existing system hasn't worked because it allows "so much exploitation and abuse of temporary workers and undermines the jobs, wages and working conditions of U.S. workers."

But he said the McCain-Kennedy bill and others like it "will avoid those problems by streamlining the application process for employers and strengthening key protections for the workers."

Major immigration reform enacted in 1986 included language providing eventual permanent resident status to those who could prove they had worked in agriculture the previous year. Nearly 1 million applications were accepted. Critics argued that many used fraudulent documents and that this amnesty rewarded those who entered the country illegally.

In 1995, the U.S. Commission on Immigration, headed by the late Rep. Barbara Jordan, D-Texas, reported to Congress its unanimous conclusion that an agriculture guest worker program "is not in the national interest and ... would be a grievous mistake."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., at recent Senate hearings on the immigration bill, said the recent tide of illegal immigrants raises "the question of whether guest worker programs become magnets for more undocumented populations."

Eliseo Medina, executive vice president of the Service Employees International Union, said his father was a "bracero" so he's "very aware of how these programs can be abused."

Medina said he supports the McCain-Kennedy approach because it gives temporary workers job portability, so they don't have to stay with an employer who mistreats them.

"When you were dependent on that one employer, people couldn't complain," Medina said. "That was my father's experience."

Immigrant Advocates Feel 'sense Of Urgency' About Border Policy (ADS)

By BRADY McCOMBS

Arizona Daily Star, March 24, 2006

TUCSON, Ariz. -- Immigrant advocates across the country want to make sure nobody misses their message: Don't criminalize illegal entrants.

Groups have ramped up efforts this month by organizing large street rallies, holding press conferences and meeting with state and federal lawmakers.

"There is definitely a sense of urgency," said Geoffrey Boyce, spokesman for No More Deaths. "People are feeling like if our voices are going to be heard, now is the time."

On Thursday, Derechos Humanos and the Unidos en Arizona Coalition organized a press conference at El Tiradito Shrine in Downtown Tucson with three out-of-state legislators who spoke out against proposed immigration legislation.

Friday, a host of groups including Border Action Network and No More Deaths are organized a late-morning rally in Tucson. In Phoenix, organizers are expecting thousands at the rally there. Previous rallies held this month in Chicago; Washington, D.C.; and Trenton, N.J., have drawn thousands.

A week ago, the Coalition to Bring Down the Walls sent a delegation to Washington to meet with federal lawmakers about their concerns.

"I think the biggest advantage is that people are waking up and realizing that if they don't speak up now it will be too late," said Felix Ortiz, a Democratic assemblyman from New York and president of the National Hispanic Caucus of State Legislatures.

Ortiz was one of three members of the caucus who came to Tucson this week to see the border and show their support. Ryan Guillen, a Texas Democrat, and Minnie Gonzalez, a Connecticut Democrat, traveled into Mexico south of Sasabe Thursday to see a staging ground for illegal entrants preparing to enter the United States.

They told about 20 people Thursday that they must stand up against anti-immigrant legislation and demand legislation that respects the dignity and civil rights of illegal entrants. Guillen believes politicians will listen because of the power of the collective voice.

"I think they've woken a sleeping giant, and that's the reason this movement has started," Guillen said.

Jennifer Allen, director of the Border Action Network, said organizers are trying to make sure the rallies take place while the Senate Judiciary Committee is still considering legislation.

The source of the ire from the immigrant advocacy groups is directed at the Border Protection, Anti-Terrorism and Illegal Immigration Control Act, sponsored by Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., passed by the House Dec. 16 by a vote of 239-182.

The proposal would create 700 miles of fence on along the border, make living in the country illegally a felony and increase penalties for employers who hire illegal workers.

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

LOS ANGELES, March 24 (AP) — Thousands of people across the country protested Friday against legislation cracking down on illegal immigrants, with demonstrators in cities including Los Angeles, Phoenix and Atlanta staging school walkouts, marches and work stoppages.

Congress is considering bills that would make it a felony to be in the United States illegally, impose new penalties on employers who hire illegal immigrants and erect fences along one-third of the border with Mexico. The proposals have angered many Hispanics.

The Los Angeles demonstration led to fights between black and Hispanic students at one high school, but the protests were largely peaceful, the authorities said.

In Phoenix, the police said 20,000 people marched to the office of Senator Jon Kyl, a Republican and the co-sponsor of a bill that would give illegal immigrants up to five years to leave the country. Officials said it was one of the largest protests in the city's history.

Mr. Kyl pointed out that most were speaking out against the House bill making it a felony to be an illegal immigrant, not against his bill, which would also step up border enforcement and create a temporary guest-worker program.

In Georgia, activists said tens of thousands of workers did not show up at their jobs after calls to protest a state bill that would deny state services to adults living in the country illegally. The House passed the bill on Thursday, but it has yet to gain Senate approval.

In Atlanta, about 200 protesters converged on the steps of the State Capitol, some wrapped in Mexican flags and holding signs saying "Don't panic, we're Hispanic" and "We have a dream, too."

KOLD News 13

Some say the solution to the problem is simple, but having lawmakers and protestors agree on a law that enhances border security, supports economic growth and gives lawful permanent residency for the millions of illegal immigrants in our country is a challenge.

Hundreds of mothers, children, teachers, and construction workers with American and Mexican flags stood on Ina and Oracle in front of Senator John Kyl's Tucson office.

Up in Phoenix, more than 20-thousand marched to Kyl's office.

All voicing their opposition for Bill H.R. 4437 that's headed for the Senate. If passed it makes it a felony for illegal immigrants to live here and penalizes anyone who helps them.

Some protestors believe the Sensenbrenner Bill H.R.4437 is similar to another bill Senator Kyl is trying to pass.

While Kyl is against amnesty, his bill proposes people who are here illegally sign up for a guest worker program and work for 5-years then go back to Mexico and re-apply.

Jim Peterson is running against Kyl in November and says it's time to get practical and produce a bill that's not a fantasy.

Kyl's bill passed in the house and on Monday will be voted on by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

High School Students Leave School To Protest Immigration Legislation (LAT)

By Michelle Keller And Anna Gorman, Times Staff Writers

DOJ_NMG_0022071

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Hundreds take to the streets to call attention to a Republican House bill that activists contend is punitive and tinged with racism.

On the eve of a large rally planned downtown, hundreds of Los Angeles-area high school students staged a walkout Friday to protest proposed federal legislation that calls for building a 700-mile-long wall along the Mexican border and making felons of illegal immigrants.

Disrupting classes at more than half a dozen schools, students marched onto city streets waving Mexican flags and clutching red, white and green balloons as they chanted "Viva Mexico!"

"Without immigrants, this country wouldn't be anything," said freshman Anna Benitez, as she joined about 500 fellow Huntington Park High students outside the school on Firestone Boulevard. "This protest is not about rebellion. We're not criminals. We're in this country to work."

Walkouts also took place at Garfield, Roosevelt and Montebello high schools, while students at South Gate, Bell and San Fernando high schools protested on campus. At Bell, teacher Joan Dooley said hundreds of students climbed the gates when administrators declared a lockdown.

"Those kids had a right to walk out," Dooley said. "When they saw this huge mob … they should have opened the gate."

Outside South East High in South Gate, at least one person was arrested on suspicion of throwing bottles at police officers, but it was unclear if it was a student, said Dan Isaacs, chief operating officer for the Los Angeles Unified School District. For the most part, however, the protests were peaceful, causing a few traffic tie-ups, he said.

In Riverside County, 400 students at two campuses in the Moreno Valley Unified School District held rallies but did not leave school grounds, officials said.

Students said they were protesting what activists see as mostly punitive legislation proposed by Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. (R-Wis.) that the House passed in December.

Sensenbrenner's bill would crack down on employers who hire illegal immigrants, penalize those who assist them and step up enforcement along the Mexican border, a move that could include erecting 700 miles of fencing.

The bill would also make it a felony to enter the country illegally. Supporters say tougher controls are needed to secure the country's border and to protect American jobs.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is scheduled to begin hearings Monday on a possible compromise bill, after several weeks of debate over whether to concentrate solely on enforcement or to also develop a temporary guest worker program. The highly charged issue has divided the Republican-controlled Congress.

"This economy is based on immigrants," said Garfield High School student William Pasillas, 14, who left campus Friday morning to participate in a rally. Pasillas said his parents came from Mexico in the 1970s and now are naturalized citizens. "Why shouldn't other people get that opportunity?"

Other students were protesting what they said was the racism that many immigrants face.

"I'm here to make sure that the Mexicans get their freedom, their rights," said Montebello High School student Jeannette Garcia, 15, who held up a sign that said "Freedom."

Los Angeles school officials said activists and community groups e-mailed students, urging them to walk out. Several students said they received fliers and heard about the demonstrations from friends.

"We have always condoned freedom of expression on our campuses," said Isaacs, the L.A. Unified official. "We do not condone students leaving campus."

A protest march in downtown Los Angeles is planned for today as part of a "Weekend of Action" against the Sensenbrenner bill and related legislation. A similar demonstration in Phoenix on Friday drew more than 15,000 protesters.

Immigrant rights groups said they were demanding more tolerant and humane laws that would give undocumented workers a chance at becoming citizens.

"We want to send a message to Congress that enough is enough, that we need real reform that gives folks here a path to legal residency and citizenship," said Alvaro Huerta, spokesman for the Coalition for Humane Immigrant Rights of Los Angeles. "We don't want this second-class status."

Border Sheriffs Unite For Order (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado

The Dallas Morning News, March 25, 2006

Officials from Texas to California want U.S. aid to halt drug violence

EL PASO – Border county sheriffs from Texas to California joined forces Friday in an effort to stop the violence along an increasingly chaotic U.S.-Mexico border and pressure the U.S. government to take control of its territory.

Following a two-day closed-door meeting here, sheriffs from California, Arizona and New Mexico pledged to work with their hosts, the 16-member Texas Sheriff Coalition, to stop traffickers and potential terrorists at the border.

"When you squeeze one area, other parts of the border heat up," said Sheriff Larry A. Dever of Cochise County in Bisbee, Ariz., referring to the attention now focused on the Laredo-Nuevo Laredo border region.

"There's a serious problem and it's not just on the border anymore," said Sheriff Dever. "It's now reached the interior of the country, and communities across the nation are beginning to feel the pinch."

Drug-related violence in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, continues unchecked as the Gulf and Sinaloa cartels battle for control of the lucrative route from Nuevo Laredo via Interstate 35 through Texas and Dallas, an important hub for drug distribution, and north to Canada.

This week, authorities discovered three charred bodies in a shallow hole in the city. Last week, four federal police officers were assassinated, and two weeks ago gunmen killed the chief of the state police unit in Nuevo Laredo.

Sheriff Omar Lucio of Cameron County in the Lower Rio Grande Valley welcomed the sheriffs, saying: "In the end, the task of stopping traffickers and terrorists at the border falls on us. We have to stop these criminals before they reach Dallas, or Houston, or New York City."

The newly formed Southwest Border Sheriff's Coalition hopes to flex its political muscle in demanding more resources from Congress for one of the most impoverished regions in the country.

The new group includes all sheriffs' departments within the 24 border counties, from California to Texas.

Specifically, the sheriffs want more money for manpower, equipment and training. Timing is crucial. Congress is debating immigration reform, and one plan calls for earmarking $100 million to help sheriffs with increased resources.

The alliance grew out of concern about the killing of Mexican local, state and federal policemen, the discovery of underground tunnels used for smuggling drugs and what some called routine confrontation with drug smugglers "armed to the teeth," said Sheriff Rick Flores of Webb County, which includes Laredo.

"We're outgunned. We're outmanned. And we're outspent," Sheriff Flores said. "That's no way to protect our border and our country. It's shameful."

Most recently, the resignation of Nuevo Laredo Police Chief Omar Pimentel raised concerns among some of the sheriffs who view his departure as a sign that the Mexican government is losing control of the situation.

"He was in a tough situation, and I'm not surprised at all that he resigned," Sheriff Lucio said. "The violence from Nuevo Laredo is not just spilling across the border into Laredo and other Texas cities, but it's also spreading up and down the border, and that's a big concern for all of us here, especially for my county."

But U.S. Rep. Silvestre Reyes, a 26-year law enforcement veteran and former Border Patrol chief, cautioned sheriffs not to make Mexico a punching bag to justify increased funding. Cooperation between the countries, he said, is key.

"Mexico is a friend of ours, and we don't have an antagonistic relationship with them," the El Paso Democrat said. "We also know that the issue of corruption is big, but it doesn't stop at the border. It affects both sides."

In a separate interview, Mr. Reyes added: "What kind of a border do we want with Mexico? Do we want a border fraught with barriers and walls, with deputies armed to the teeth with high-caliber weapons, or do we want a peaceful, tranquil border with a willing partner in Mexico? What's in our long-term interest?"

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush And Cheney Go After The Democrats (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0022073

By Deb Riechmann

AP, March 25, 2006

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney launched a one-two political punch against Democrats on Friday, saying they are ill-equipped to handle the economic recovery or the war on terror.

Shouldering dismal poll ratings, Bush worked to frame the debate ahead of this year's congressional elections by telling supporters that "the difference is clear" between the two parties on how to sustain the recovery.

"If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said. "If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican."

Cheney, speaking at a GOP fundraiser in Orlando, Fla., took on Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid and party chairman Howard Dean by name. He said leading Democrats have demanded a "sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq — the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting."

"With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol,'" Cheney said.

The remark drew robust laughter. "I don't know why that's funny," Cheney said at the event for Rep. Ric Keller (news, bio, voting record), R-Fla.

Democrats were quick to counterpunch.

"Under this administration's watch, Iraq has become a training ground and launching pad for international terrorism, North Korea has likely quadrupled its nuclear arsenal, bin Laden remains on the loose, terror attacks across the world are on the rise, and Katrina exposed the staggering gaps in the administration's ability to protect America," said Reid's spokesman, Jim Manley.

Democratic National Committee spokesman Luis Miranda said: "Instead of offering a plan for victory in Iraq, the vice president today again resorted to attacks to try to distract from the Bush administration's commitment to a failed strategy."

Bush and Cheney appeared to be repeating a page from the 2004 presidential campaign.

During a campaign stop then in Des Moines, Iowa, Cheney said a vote for Democrat John Kerry would risk another terror attack. Making the "wrong choice" on Election Day would mean Kerry would follow a pre-Sept. 11 policy of reacting defensively, Cheney said.

Some wary Republicans on the ballot in November have been trying to stay at arm's length from the White House to avoid being tainted by Bush's job approval ratings, in the 30s. But presidents attract crowds and supporters with deep pockets, and Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser.

Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. Both have raised tens of millions of dollars for GOP congressional and gubernatorial candidates running in this year's midterm elections.

Bush spoke at a fundraiser for Rep. Mike Sodrel, raising more than $500,000 to help the freshman Republican beat Democrat Baron Hill. The race is considered a toss-up in the GOP quest to retain control of the House.

He said the Republicans have an economic record to run on, and he urged Congress to make permanent various tax cuts due to expire within a few years. He tried to draw a sharp contrast between the two parties' economic policies.

"In 2001, more than 90 percent of the congressional Democrats voted against cutting income tax rates," Bush said, referring to votes on his initial package of tax cuts.

He told the Republican audience that, by overwhelming margins, Democrats also voted to reject his legislation — which eventually passed — to provide tax relief for married couples, double the child credit and cut taxes on dividends and capital gains.

Later, the president traveled to an affluent Pittsburgh suburb to raise an estimated $700,000 for Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record).

Santorum, trailing Casey in polls, broke with Bush on a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports and has raised concerns about the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq. But Santorum met Bush at an airport in Pittsburgh, and the two smiled for cameras.

Democrats are hungry for a victory in Pennsylvania and hope to replace the two-term senator with State Treasurer Bob Casey Jr., a Democrat who is against abortion.

DOJ_NMG_0022074

"Senator Santorum and President Bush should publicly explain why they've advanced policies that have cost Pennsylvania over 180,000 manufacturing jobs and caused over 700,000 Pennsylvanians to lose their health insurance," said Casey spokesman Larry Smar. "Senator Santorum should work for the people of Pennsylvania and not be a rubber stamp in order to gain campaign cash."

Bush Shows Strategy For Keeping Hill Majorities (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Democrats Assailed On National Security, As Well as the Economy

INDIANAPOLIS, March 24 -- President Bush on Friday provided a preview of his two-front strategy for protecting the Republican congressional majority in an ominous political climate: hammer Democrats on national security and the economy, and raise millions of dollars for embattled GOP candidates such as Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (Ind.).

At a luncheon fundraiser here, Bush repeatedly called Sodrel an indispensable ally in fighting terrorism, and emphasized his support for the military and a robust U.S. foreign policy. Sodrel, he said, "understands this is a nation at war" against terrorists intent on striking America again. It is imperative that voters elect candidates who know that "there is an enemy which hates those of us who embrace freedom and would like to strike us again." He warned the crowd that Democrats will raise taxes and harm the economy if they are elected. "If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said.

It was not cheap to hear the president's newest campaign pitch eight months before the midterm elections. Republicans paid $1,000 for the buffet lunch and presidential speech; $10,000 if they wanted a picture snapped at a private reception afterward. For Sodrel, who won by a thinner margin than any other House member in 2004, the $500,000 he expected to raise through the event is much needed to fend off a tough challenger, former Democratic representative Baron Hill. Afterward, Bush flew to Pennsylvania for a nighttime fundraiser that was expected to net half a million dollars for Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), who faces one of the toughest reelection campaigns in the country.

The back-to-back events capped a week that highlighted how a president dogged by sagging poll numbers and an unpopular war plans to help his party and himself. Election analysts say Republicans could lose seats, if not their House and Senate majorities, if the public's gloomy view of Bush, Congress and the direction of the country does not brighten this summer.

A Democratic majority in the House or the Senate would be likely to launch hearings and investigations into the war and other issues, and would be positioned to stop the Bush agenda in the remaining two years of the Bush presidency. "The Democrats' plan for 2006? Take the House and Senate, and impeach the president," Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, warned in a fundraising e-mail sent to party members this week. "With our nation at war, is this the kind of Congress you want?"

Bush is adjusting his approach to befit the environment and is shifting into campaign mode. He realizes, aides say, that he is no longer the political force he was in the days before the 2002 and 2004 elections, when lawmakers lined up for high-profile presidential visits. In fact, some lawmakers in tight races in swing states such as Ohio have passed on chances to appear side by side with Bush at recent events. Santorum, for instance, cited "scheduling conflicts" in skipping a recent Bush speech in his state but has not missed a chance to raise money with the president at private gatherings like the one held Friday night.

Bush remains popular with the Republican base, and he and Vice President Cheney are top fundraising draws. GOP strategists say Bush and Cheney have sent word to Capitol Hill that they would be happy to raise money even for those candidates who, for political reasons, want to put some distance between themselves and the White House.

The short-term goal is stabilize Bush's low public-approval ratings by talking about the progress and prospects for victory in Iraq. The White House also hopes to minimize intramural GOP feuding with a skeletal domestic agenda. Congressional leaders have a legislative schedule that will have members out of Washington much of the time.

With little notice, Cheney has emerged as a central player in this strategy. The vice president has participated in 46 fundraisers since the beginning of 2005, including 25 for House members, according to his office. He took part in five events this week alone, including one that raised $500,000 for Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) Thursday night.

In Florida on Friday, Cheney played host at an event for Rep. Ric Keller (R) and offered a variation of the new White House attack on Democrats that aides said will become a staple of campaign-oriented speeches in the weeks ahead. Attacking figures ranging from Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) to Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, Cheney portrayed the entire Democratic leadership as wobbly in the fight against terrorism.

"Leading Democrats have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting," Cheney said. "And with that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol.' "

Recent polls show a growing number of Americans questioning the competence of the Bush White House. Since the Hurricane Katrina disaster, Democrats have made the charge of incompetence the centerpiece of their attack on Bush, and many Republicans are worried that it is sticking. "The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic Party view the war on terror," Cheney said.

Bush Slams Democrats On Taxes, War (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

SEWICKLEY HEIGHTS, Pa. — President Bush focused on politics Friday, campaigning for two Republicans who face tough reelection challenges and sharply attacking Democrats over their opposition to tax cuts.

Vice President Dick Cheney also was on the campaign trail, headlining a fundraiser in Florida. He used the occasion to question the commitment by leading Democrats to the "the battle against terrorists in Iraq."

Accusing them of having a "sorry record" on that issue, Cheney said Democratic leaders had "decided to run on the theme of competence. If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on 'American Idol.' "

After his crack drew a big laugh, Cheney — with a slight smile on his face — responded, "I don't know why that's funny."

Democrats lashed back.

"Under this administration's watch, Iraq has become a training ground and launching pad for international terrorism, North Korea has likely quadrupled its nuclear arsenal, [Osama] bin Laden remains on the loose, terror attacks across the world are on the rise, and Katrina exposed the staggering gaps in the administration's ability to protect America," said a spokesman for Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Bush began his day in Indianapolis, helping freshman Rep. Mike Sodrel raise $500,000 for his reelection bid. And he ended it in this tony suburb of Pittsburgh as the star attraction at an event expected to generate more than $1 million for Sen. Rick Santorum's run for a third term.

Bush has raised $88 million at 26 appearances in 2005 and 2006 for the GOP and its candidates, and Cheney has raised nearly $17 million at 47 events, according to Tracey Schmitt, communications director for the Republican National Committee.

Sodrel is facing yet another rematch with former Democratic lawmaker Baron Hill in a House race likely to be among the most competitive in the nation. Hill won a third term when he defeated Sodrel in 2002, but the Republican upended the incumbent in 2004, claiming the seat by fewer than 1,500 votes.

As he has all week, Bush delivered a strong pitch for fighting the war in Iraq.

"The only way that we can lose is if we lose our will," he said. "It's the only way we can lose."

But he also spotlighted domestic issues, blasting Democratic opposition to the tax cuts that have been at the core of his economic program.

"The Democratic Party has a clear record. In 2001, more than 90% of the congressional Democrats voted against cutting income tax rates," he said, referring to votes on the initial legislative package he proposed that year.

"The difference is clear," he went on, his voice rising to a near shout. "If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat. If you want to keep more of your hard-earned money, vote Republican."

The president made no public remarks during his stop for Santorum.

DOJ_NMG_0022076

A conservative running behind in Pennsylvania polls, Santorum was waiting to greet Bush as the president descended the steps of Air Force One, which provided a brief photo opportunity. But the fundraising event at a nearby white brick home was closed to news coverage.

The low-key nature of Bush's visit was not surprising. He and his campaign team worked hard to try to carry Pennsylvania in the 2000 and 2004 presidential campaigns, but he lost the state both times.

Now with Bush's approval rating at an all-time low in several national polls, fewer GOP candidates regard a public appearance with the president as a way to capture the backing of swing voters. Instead, the president is relied upon to draw the party faithful — and their contributions.

Democrats view the Pennsylvania race as one of the prime opportunities to gain a Senate seat in November's election.

Santorum's likely opponent is Bob Casey Jr., the state treasurer who party leaders hope can peel away some of Santorum's support because he shares the incumbent's opposition to abortion rights.

Cheney Assails Democrats' `Competence' Against Terror (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- Vice President Dick Cheney said Democrats have a ``sorry record'' on national security and suggested the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq they have proposed would fulfill the hopes of terrorist leader Osama Bin Laden.

``The leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence,'' Cheney said in Orlando at a fund- raising event for U.S. Representative Ric Keller, a Florida Republican. ``If they're competent to fight this war, then I ought to be singing on American Idol.''

Cheney was responding to statements by the Democratic National Committee, which has called the Bush administration and its Iraq war plan ``dangerously incompetent.'' U.S. Representative John Murtha, a Pennsylvania Democrat, and some other party lawmakers have called for the U.S. to begin a withdrawal from Iraq.

``Issues of national security will clearly be at the top of the agenda as the mid-term elections near,'' Cheney said. ``The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic Party view the war on terror.''

The Bush administration has stepped up defense of its Iraq policy this week as the war enters its fourth year. Five times in the past seven days President George W. Bush has restated his reasoning behind the March 2003 invasion of Iraq, saying toppling Saddam Hussein's regime was an important part of the global war against terrorism.

Turbulence

In Indiana today, Bush said he understood that the ``turbulence on the TV screen affects the conscience of America.'' He maintained that Iraqi troops are improving and that the U.S. won't retreat.

Cheney said in Florida that ``leading Democrats have demanded a sudden withdrawal from the battle against terrorists in Iraq -- the very kind of retreat that Osama bin Laden has been predicting.''

``With that sorry record, the leaders of the Democratic Party have decided to run on the theme of competence,'' he said.

The U.S. military and their coalition partners in Iraq have battled an insurgency, and there have been 1,821 U.S. military personnel killed in combat since the start of the war, according to a Defense Department tally.

The financial cost of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan has risen to $9.8 billion a month from the $6.8 billion a month the Pentagon said it spent last year, according to a report this month by the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service.

A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released March 16 showed 51 percent of respondents said the overthrow of Hussein's regime in Iraq hasn't been worth the cost in human and financial terms.

Debate

DOJ_NMG_0022077

Opponents of an open-ended engagement in Iraq plan to try to force a debate in the House of Representatives, according to North Carolina Republican Walter B. Jones. Jones said he was ``very surprised'' at Bush's suggestion during a press conference this week that the next U.S. president would have to complete a pullout of troops.

``When you say to the American people and to the Congress, `Well, we've going to be there three more years from now and the next president can deal with it,' that to me, is not leadership,'' Jones said in a telephone interview today.

Jones, Republican Representatives Wayne Gilchrest of Maryland and Ron Paul of Texas, and a number of Democrats plan to seek a vote in the House on April 5 to force Republican leaders to open up a debate on Bush's Iraq policy.

``I do believe than many of my colleagues in the Republican Party are concerned by the fact that there seems to be no end point,'' to the U.S. military action in Iraq, Jones said.

Bush Visit Is Boon For Congressman (INDYSTAR)

By Bill Ruthhart

The Indianapolis Star, March 25, 2006

'Mike Sodrel understands,' Bush emphasizes at Downtown stop

President Bush called for resolve in Iraq and tax cuts at home during a stop in Indianapolis on Friday to help a Southern Indiana congressman facing a tough re-election race.

ON THE ISSUES

Here's a quick look at what the president had to say in Indianapolis on a variety of issues:

War against terrorism

"This turbulence on your TV screens affects the conscience of Americans. I know that, and so does the enemy. But amidst all the turmoil, I want you to remember that progress towards democracy is being made."

Tax cuts

"The fundamental question confronting us in Washington is how do we keep this economic recovery going. . . . The first thing is: Make the tax cuts permanent."

Education

"I think it makes sense if you're spending a lot of money to say to the school districts, 'Why don't you show us whether or not a child can read and write?' It seems like a legitimate question to me."

Alternative fuels

"I want people driving with corn extract, ethanol, grown right here in the state of Indiana in order to keep these cars moving."

Mitch Daniels

"I like a fellow who doesn't run a poll to tell him what to think. I like somebody who stands up and does what he thinks is right."

WORKERS NOT HAPPY ABOUT THIS 'HOLIDAY'

The president's visit Friday meant a half-day off without pay for 100 construction workers working on the airport's new terminal.

John Kish, the project director at the airport, said officials were told the construction site had to close at noon as part of the security for Bush's visit. Hourly construction workers did not receive pay for the afternoon because they could not work those hours, he said.

"The folks who were sent home without pay already had a short week with the snowstorm Monday, so they were particularly unhappy about it," Kish said.

DOJ_NMG_0022078

The president helped reel in an estimated $500,000 for Sodrel, who is expected to face a November rematch against former Democratic Rep. Baron Hill in Indiana's 9th District.

"I'm here because I strongly believe it's in Indiana's interest to send Mike Sodrel back to the United States Congress," Bush said. "Some of you are from his district, some of you aren't, but all of you are wise enough to know a good candidate when you see one."

Bush spoke for about 30 minutes at the Murat Centre in Downtown Indianapolis. Roughly 75 of the 500 chairs set up for the $1,000 per plate luncheon were empty, many of them in the back corners of the building's Egyptian Room.

"That clearly shows a lack of support for Mike Sodrel," said Indiana Democratic Party Chairman Dan Parker. "He couldn't fill up the room, even though he had the president there."

Campaign officials cautioned against putting too much emphasis on empty chairs. A number of people at the event also paid $10,000 for a picture with the president at a private reception before the speech. In addition, some paying guests couldn't come because of other commitments, and extra chairs are often set up for nonpaying guests.

Sodrel defeated Hill, then a three-term incumbent, in 2004 in one of the tightest congressional races nationwide.

Bush said he needs more "good, honest" men like Sodrel in Congress to help him push his agenda during the final two years of his presidency. Several times Bush laid out his policy positions, punctuated by the phrase "and Mike Sodrel understands that."

Perhaps his most emphatic call came for making permanent the tax cuts passed earlier in his presidency, which will expire in coming years if no action is taken.

"If you want the government in your pocket, vote Democrat," Bush said.

While the president has visited Indiana twice recently, he has made no appearances in a setting where the general public could see him.

"Bush and (Vice President Dick) Cheney both have been out at a lot of fundraisers," said Larry J. Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia. "It's the one thing they both can still do for their party."

An Indianapolis Star poll two weeks ago showed Bush's approval rating had sunk to 37 percent among Hoosiers. Sabato said his national rating has been similar but added that more than 80 percent of Republicans still support the president.

"Despite his overall unpopularity, the president is still able to raise money for the congressmen who need it," Sabato said.

Bush raised more than $600,000 in South Bend last month for U.S. Rep. Chris Chocola. Sodrel said the money raised Friday will be key to his campaign. The $500,000 is more than half of the $900,0000 he raised during all of last year. He spent $1.4 million in his 2004 campaign.

"This is a big boost for me, particularly to have it come this early in the election season," Sodrel said after the fundraiser.

Democrats criticized Bush for not traveling to Sodrel's district.

"He had to bring the president to Indianapolis to raise money for him, because it's clear he doesn't want to be seen with the president in his district," the Democrats' Parker said.

Sodrel denied the president is reluctant to partake in public events, saying, "A lot of the president's travel is in the public."

After leaving Indianapolis around 3:30 p.m., Bush flew to Pittsburgh for a fundraiser at a private residence for Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa.

Bush's popularity isn't sagging with Charlie Bryant, who drove up from Southern Indiana and paid $1,000 to attend the fundraiser.

"It was worth every penny," said Bryant, 63, a retired farm equipment dealer. "It's not every day you see the president of the United States."

Sodrel's campaign said it would pay $40,000 to reimburse the president's travel expenses, since the appearance was purely a political one. The Indianapolis Police Department spent an estimated $19,500 to free up 110 police officers to provide security for Bush's two-hour visit.

Cam Savage, a spokesman for Sodrel's office, said some cities in the past have requested reimbursements for such expenses if they are tied to a political trip from the president. Savage said Indianapolis typically doesn't and hadn't Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0022079

The 57-year-old ex-Marine from Greenwood shouted a popular cheer among protesters even though buses shielded them from Bush's arrival.

"Hey, ho, Bush and Cheney got to go! Bring the troops home now!"

Minute-by-minute Account Of Visit (INDYSTAR)

The Indianapolis Star, March 25, 2006

A team of Star reporters filed these accounts during President Bush's visit to Indianapolis.

3:34 P.M. -- President departs and one crewman moves on

If you're an airplane buff, you could spend a long time just staring at Air Force One. Especially at the Indianapolis International Airport, an aircraft of the Boeing 747's size stands out. Indianapolis is an airport served by mostly small "regional jets" and airliners no larger than the Boeing 737, Airbus 319 and DC-9. The largest plane to regularly use the Indianapolis airport is the MD-11 cargo plane that serves the FedEx freight terminal.

For the presidential visit, Bush's support equipment came in on a military C-17, an oversized plane that, with its huge, sloping wings, is an impressive sight -- but that aircraft is dwarfed by Air Force One.

Only a few people get to work on the huge plane, and for one of them the Friday trip was his final journey as a crew member. Air Force officer William Thomas of Maryland has worked in the plane's communications section for 20 years, and is moving on after the Indianapolis trip. His wife and infant daughter were at international arrivals to meet the president. "He was so friendly," Jennifer Thomas said about meeting Bush.

Air buffs might have gotten to see the president's plane in the air when the clouds weren't in the way, but they had little chance to see it on the ground. Only the tail was visible from the road that passes the international arrivals terminal, and that road was closed during the presidential visit.

The end of the presidential trip had the same sort of weather luck as the beginning. When word spread that the motorcade was rolling from Downtown to the airport, a high black cloud was forming to the west where it framed Air Force One. By the time the police motorcycle escort reached the international arrivals ramp, the cloud had moved overhead and was dropping snow on the area.

Bush got out of his limousine, walked up the main steps alone and waved twice, while the rest of the contingent went up the plane's back steps. Air Force One taxied away, reached the runway and took off, disappearing in the clouds and the spray kicked up by its engines. Barely five minutes after the motorcade reached the airport, the plane was loaded and leaving -- around 3:35 p.m., on time.

As soon as the plane moved out of sight, the same people who had worked hard to prepare for the started to undo what they had done. Cables were removed, barriers put away and equipment stored on the Air Force cargo plane.

3:16 P.M. -- Bush talks of tax cuts, Iraq

Speaking for about 30 minutes, the president offered a folksy defense of his policies and made a hard push for a continued Republican-controlled Congress.

"I saw a threat in Saddam Hussein," he said. "Removing Saddam Hussein has made this nation and this world a safer place."

Bush acknowledged the current public nervousness about the war, but argued, "I'm not going to make up my mind about Iraq based on polls and focus groups."

The speech was little different than numerous others Bush has given. He pushed for tax cuts and Social Security reform.

He said members of Congress like Sodrel, "understand this is a nation at war," that needs to remain focused on national security. He spoke of enemies who have "an ideology of hatred" that can only be defeated "with a philosophy of light."

The room included many of the state's top Republican names, such as Gov. Mitch Daniels, but there were also dozens of empty seats.

2:26 P.M. -- Hey, isn't that ...

DOJ_NMG_0022080

No, it wasn't Richard Nixon, but many people did a double take on John Ancelep, 23, who works for a landscaping firm in downtown Indianapolis.

Clocking out a little early today, Ancelep - in a gray suit and tie - walked around the Murat with a first-class mask of Nixon.

He was hoping President Bush would see him - poised to give him the classic Nixon salute.

Two hands up, two fingers extended, "I am not a crook" - as a way of poining out what he calls a parallel between Bush and Nixon: "An unpopular president and an unpopular war," he said.

Ancelep said he got the mask last year for Halloween.

By now, he is one no more than a dozen people remaining outside the Murat. Most people took down their signs, rolled up their flags and left the area once Bush entered the Murat.

1:51 P.M. -- Motorcade arrives at Murat

President Bush has arrived in downtown Indianapolis.

The presidential motorcade pulled into New Jersey Street entrance to the Murat, zipping by protesters in the process.

Demonstrators rushed toward the intersection of Michigan and Alabama holding up signs. But Bush likely did not get much of a glimpse.

-- Rob Schneider

1:44 P.M. -- Air Force One lands

When Air Force One landed at Indianapolis International Airport at 1:22 p.m., light rain began to fall from the cloudy skies and by the time Bush's entourage had left the airport for the Murat downtown, the motorcade was wet from what had turned into a steady rainfall.

It was the exact opposite of a 1988 arrival, when the current president's father appeared with Dan Quayle at a campaign rally in Huntington, Ind. On that day, a rainy morning, the skies cleared and the sun came out just as the candidates emerged from the Huntington courthouse.

Today, the weather did not discourage Marvin Bardo of the Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, who was part of the welcoming party and briefly got to meet the President.

"It was pretty cool. He talked to me. He said thanks for volunteering," said Bardo of his momentary time with Bush.

Watching the presidential arrival gave an impression of how tightly organized the arrival business can be on Air Force One.

The first people to emerge from the Boeing 747 using a rear staircase were military assistants and the Washington D.C. press corps. Some of them had gathered next to one of the airplane's engines by the time the President emerged from a front door and came down one of the outside staircases at the airport.

After a brief meeting with Bardo and several others outside the plane, the president waved once again to the group watching, mostly reporters and photographers behind a steel barrier, got into a custom Cadillac limousine, and drove away.

Prominent at the end of the motorcade - and a reminder of how seriously this exercise is taken - was a Wishard Hospital advance life support medic ambulance.

-- Kevin O'Neal

1:37 P.M. -- Conrbread protest falters

They wanted to serve beans and cornbread - a cheap meal compared to the big-buck buffet inside the Murat - but a coalition of groups focused on hunger issues and economic justice - could not get a health permit in time for today's protest.

So instead, they're handing out cans of beans and boxes of cornbread.

Meanwhile, about 250 people had lined the curbs along Alabama Street in front of the Murat, where a marquee was perhaps a little more welcoming than those chanting and holding signs.

The signs were varied:

"War is not the answer"

"$10,000: Lunch with Bush; Standing up for justice: priceless"

"Guilty of war crimes"

"Impeach bush"

DOJ_NMG_0022081

Also, a large Hispanic group chanting slogans in Spanish protesting federal legislation making criminals out of people who assist undocumented workers - including social workers and churches.

1:06 P.M. -- Republicans nibble on appetizers, rhetoric

Inside the Murat, about 500 people are expected to turn out, according to organizers, a number that is expected to raise roughly $500,000 U.S. Rep. Mike Sodrel's reelection campaign.

The Republicans dined on fried appetizers and listened to red-meat speeches prior to Bush's arrival.

"You want to know what Baron Hill's supporters look like? said US Rep. Steve Buyer. "They are right across the street."

He was referring to protesters lined up to jeer the president, including a group of veterans who are against the war in Iraq.

The crowd so far includes several members of Gov. Mitch Daniels' administration, former Indianapolis Mayor Stephen Goldsmith and many Republican members of Congress and the Indiana General Assembly.

-- Matt Tully

12:45 P.M. -- Bush shielded from demonstrators

Protesters on both sides of the Bush fence stood shoulder to shoulder in front of the Chatterbox Tavern in the 400 block of Mass. Ave., just a block away from the Murat.

On one side was the Veterans For Peace, Indiana Chapter 49.

On the other, the College Republicans from Indiana University in Bloomington.

The veterans were holding American flags and their own black and white flag with an image of a dove. The young Republicans were holding Bush-Cheney signs from the presidential campaign.

Tara Virgil, an IU sophomore from Newberry, Ind., hoisted one sign up high, even though she had little hope that Bush would be able to see it as he rode the caravan to the Murat.

"We just wanted to show our support in general," said Virgil. "We support what he is doing for our country."

Meanwhile, 57-year-old ex-Marine Harold Donle of Greenwood was joining his fellow protesters with this chant: "Hey hey ho, Bush and Cheney got to go. Bring the troops home now."

A line of IndyGo buses filled the intersection of Mass. and Michigan, making it virtually impossible for anyone on the other side to see what was going on.

Donle was asked if he planned to do some marching today.

"Hell no, I've got diabetes. I am not going to march anywhere," he replied.

Donle added that he was sorry to see the buses lined up, indicating to him that Bush does not want to see anything unpleasant.

"We've got no business being in Iraq. He lied to get us into the war."

-- Rob Schneider

12:44 P.M. -- Hoping for more volunteers

With about 40 minutes before the president's arrival, the International Arrivals terminal has gotten busy. More reporters and guests have shown up, and the weather has improved - the morning's steady snow and drizzle has ended, although it's still cold and breezy.

While police milled around the International Arrivals ramp, drivers lined up the vans for the motorcade downtown and TV reporters got ready for the president's arrival, Marvin Bardo stood and watched the flurry of activity. "I think it's really exciting to see the cameras and the Secret Service and to see everyone running around like they're important," said Bardo, one of the leaders of the Kappa Alpha Psi fraternity in Indianapolis. The organization, which was active with a Black History Month information fair and a prostate cancer information program in February, drew the attention of the White House, and the president planned to meet Bardo when he made his trip to Indianapolis. Bardo didn't learn until Monday about the meeting.

He still doesn't know how he came to the White House's attention.

While Bardo's honored to have the chance to meet President Bush, he also hoping to use the event to attract more volunteers to work with the fraternity's programs. "You never have enough volunteers," he said, adding that people who want to help can check the fraternity's web site at http://www.indykappa.com/.

12:39 P.M. -- Motorcade drivers ready to roll

The guys behind the wheels of the Presidential motorcade got their official White House pins a few moments ago and promptly stuck them into their outfits, branding themselves as the official navigators of Bush's visit to Indianapolis.

There are seven drivers in all gathered at the airport along with a large contingent of media from local newspapers, radio stations and television stations. U.S. Rep. Mike Sodrel is busy working the media with interviews.

-- Bill Ruthhart

12:13 P.M. -- VIPs begin to arrive

Not only reporters are being kept at the international arrivals terminal in a medium-sized room, filled mostly with an X-ray machine and metal detector.

Marvin Bardo, the community volunteer who's due to get some attention from the president, is an early arrival at Indianapolis International Airport. Also on hand is Rep. Mike Sodrel, R-Ind., and a small entourage

"It's pretty hectic when you get an event like this," Sodrel said on his arrival. "People say it will be a tight race. I ran for Congress twice; both of them were tight races, and I don't think this will be any different."

Sodrel said he hopes to raise $500,000 - as much as a quarter of his campaign budget - from President Bush's visit.

Also there's Christi Boze, her husband and granddaughter, a three-decade GOP precinct committee leader in Anderson, who managed to work her connections and attend the arrival. Boze said she's met every president since Kennedy except Clinton and the second Bush.

On politics in Anderson, often controlled by Democrats, Boze said "For Republicans, politics is a hobby. For Democrats, politics is a profession."

The color scheme of this day is gray. The walls of the International Arrivals terminal are gray, matching the color of the rainy sky outside. The only sign of color for those waiting for the president is the yellow paint on the camera platform that will be used when Bush arrives in Indianapolis. The platform is visible from the holding room where reporters are waiting for the start of the trip. Already, that group has gone through the procedure of setting equipment bags on the floor and having one of the military police dogs sniff them for anything risky.

Other than the airliners outside in the murky gray, the only movement comes from plainclothes men in dark coats and suits, radio attachments inserted in one ear.

10:16 A.M. -- Snowflakes greet advance team

The National Weather Service got the forecast right. There are snow showers falling at the Indianapolis International Airport, creating a cold, non-glamorous atmosphere as the advance crew gathers for the arrival of President Bush.

The international arrivals terminal that the president will use looks at first as if it's a staging area for this week's winter storm. Some of the airport snowplows that were hard at work keeping runways clear are lined up along a fence outside the terminal. Those big, heavy trucks are clearly forming an additional barrier between the terminal's parking lot and the ramp where the president's plane will arrive. Already parked on that ramp is a big four-engine Air Force transport plane.

A collection of police is gathering in the parking lot, including a couple of military police from Midwest bases and their search dogs. They'll be used to check the terminal before the president arrives. One of those officers joked that the weather turned bad the last time Bush made a trip to the Midwest.

This chilly morning is far different than other times at this isolated terminal, when sports fans have gathered to greet the Pacers and Colts after big playoff victories on the road. And it's different than Bush's 2000 campaign trip to Indianapolis, where he arrived in a private jet, stopped at the smaller Raytheon hangar, and caught a ride down from then-mayor Steve Goldsmith.

Bush Visits Pittsburgh For Santorum Fund-raiser (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, March 25, 2006

Visit sparks evening protest vigil on downtown Sewickley corner

Mr. Bush attended a fund-raiser for Mr. Santorum last night in Sewickley Heights. While at the airport, he also presented the President's Volunteer Service Award to Edy Hope, a volunteer with Carebreak at the Watson Institute in Sewickley who helps a family with a 6-year-old autistic girl.

Bush opponents, below, organized a demonstration in downtown Sewickley last night.

Cheney Goes On Attack In Orlando After Dems Blast Bush (ORS/AP)

By Travis Reed, Associated Press

The Orlando Sentinel, March 25, 2006

Vice President Dick Cheney blasted Democrats for opposing provisions of the Patriot Act and criticizing President Bush's approval of secret wiretaps for domestic surveillance at a fundraising lunch Friday.

Two days after Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid called Bush "dangerously incompetent," Cheney said if Democrats were capable of handling the war on terror, "Then I ought to be singing on American Idol."

"The president and I welcome the debate, because every voter in America needs to know how the leaders of the Democratic party view the war on terror," he said at the event for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller, R-Orlando.

Reid had said the United States was failing military and economically in Iraq, and questioned why Bush was campaigning for Republicans instead of meeting with leaders in the Middle East.

Cheney defended the wiretaps, which he said the president has reauthorized more than 30 times since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, as "essential to the security of the United States."

"Instead of acknowledging the urgent need to track enemy communications in a time of war, some Democrats in Congress have decided that the president is the enemy, and that the terrorist surveillance program is grounds for censuring the president," Cheney said. "This outrageous proposition that we ought to protect the al-Qaida ability to communicate as they plot against America poses a key test for Democratic leaders. Do they support the extreme, counterproductive antics of a few, or do they support a lawful program vital to the security of this nation?"

The Orlando speech was one of several around the nation for Cheney, who along with Bush continues to rake in millions at campaign stops despite low approval ratings. Cheney was also scheduled to visit Jacksonville Friday before leaving Florida.

The 200-person event raised $225,000 for Keller, who faces two challengers for his central Florida seat.

Some candidates in targeted districts have sought to distance themselves from the administration, but Keller appeared onstage with Cheney.

In brief remarks before introducing Cheney, Keller said he told the vice president he opposed the abandoned Dubai-owned DP World bid to run terminals at some U.S. ports and an administration plan to sell nearly 1,000 acres of the Florida's Ocala National Forest.

"The vice president replied, 'Now don't be too hasty. Let's go hunting and we'll talk about it,'" Keller joked.

At a news conference before the speech, Democratic challenger Charlie Stuart criticized Keller for increasing the national debt and voting against veterans' benefits. Stuart's campaign has raised about $360,000, just a shade more than Keller netted from Cheney's visit alone.

However, the former office furniture executive and current business consultant, author and speaker said he welcomed the attention from Washington.

"I'm thrilled that they see such a challenge that they have to bring in the vice president this close to the campaign," he said, adding that he'd be appearing Sunday with former U.S. senator and Florida governor Bob Graham.

Keller's other Democratic challenger, Orange County Commissioner Homer Hartage, declined to comment Friday.

Cheney Stumps For Keller Campaign (ORS)

By David Damron

The Orlando Sentinel, March 25, 2006

The vice president defends the Bush tax cuts and helps Keller raise cash.

Vice President Dick Cheney touted a robust economy and defended the Bush administration's tax cuts and handling of the Iraq war to an Orlando crowd of fundraisers for U.S. Rep. Ric Keller on Friday.

Cheney said the country's low unemployment rate is in peril without locking in tax cuts that Keller, R-Orlando, helped President Bush pass.

"If we do nothing, Americans would face a massive tax increase," Cheney said. "Congress needs to make the Bush tax cuts permanent."

The Keller event raised $250,000 for a re-election campaign that now has $1.2 million. Keller faces a possible primary foe in Republican Elizabeth Doran. Democrats Charlie Stuart and Orange County Commissioner Homer Hartage also have announced to run.

Keller waved off the Bush administration's low approval ratings in the polls and said Cheney's visit was not an indication that he was worried about his re-election chances.

But Keller said he used his private time with Cheney to not only discuss national security, but also political differences.

"I believe the vice president is the most effective vice president in the history of our country," Keller said. "But he realizes that I've opposed this administration on the ports deal, on the potential sale of part of the Ocala National Forest, and on the administration's attempt to get rid of the Perkins student-loan program."

The takeover of major U.S. ocean ports by a Middle East company touched off a political uproar when Bush approved of the deal. The Dubai-owned company later offered to transfer fully its U.S. operations to an unspecified American company.

Perkins loans are low-interest advances awarded to lower-income students based on need.

Restaurant owner Eric Holm liked Cheney's focus on preserving tax cuts and was reassured that national security is top priority. "Bottom line: We are secure," said Holm, 50.

Ashley Ansara, president of a Lake Mary financial holding company, said he hoped to hear more about controlling the deficit and pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq. "The civil war there has already set in."

A few protesters outside the Orlando Marriott Downtown event urged passers-by to "Drive Out the Bush Regime."

"I've just gotten tired of one scandal after another," said student Thomas Hellinger, 22. "There's a need for boots on the street."

Keller and Cheney both quipped about the vice president's recent shooting of a hunting companion. After sharing his political quarrels, Keller joked that Cheney responded, " 'Let's go hunting and we'll talk about it.' "

Cheney Gives Keller A Boost (FLTODAY)

By Patrick Peterson

Florida Today, March 25, 2006

ORLANDO - Vice President Dick Cheney raised $250,000 Friday at a fundraiser at the Downtown Marriott for 8th District Congressman Ric Keller.

From 200 lunch guests, Keller raised a quarter-million dollars, charging $500 for lunch, $1,000 for a photo session and received donations of up to $7,500, said a spokesman.

Cheney has raised $1.6 million this year at 11 other events, according to a report by The Associated Press.

Like Cheney, Keller has his supporters.

Republican restaurateur Eric Holm stands by Keller for sponsoring a bill that makes overeaters responsible for their weight gain.

"It made it difficult to sue us," said Holm, who owns 36 restaurants that specialize in beef.

"Ric Keller eats with us," added Holm, who attended with his wife, Diane. "I think he's a great congressman."

After a joke about shooting a Texas lawyer during a quail-hunting trip, Cheney read a speech that contained all the familiar positions and touchstones.

DOJ_NMG_0022085

The economy is good. The Bush tax cuts should be permanent. Judicial restraint is ensconced in the U.S. Supreme Court. There will be no timeline for troop withdrawals.

And Iraqis are making progress, despite scores of civilian deaths daily, an elected government that cannot function and falling public support in the U.S.

"There's still hard work ahead in the war on terror," said Cheney, who added that progress has been "steady."

"We have no fear of the future because we intend to shape it," said Cheney, who wears the same brand of heart monitoring device as Keller.

Despite lagging poll numbers, President Bush and Cheney remain popular with their core supporters.

Even on the thorniest issues, Republicans remain staunch.

"I think we're doing the right thing in Iraq," said Khaled Akkawi, an Orlando shooting range owner who graduated from high school with Keller. "Sometimes, doing the right thing isn't popular."

Not every Republican at the Downtown Marriott was a supporter.

"I've been disappointed in two or three things," said Atlanta health care executive Joe Malloy, in town on business with his wife, Janet.

The Malloys waited in the lobby for a glimpse of Cheney, but did not attend the luncheon. They have given money to the Republican party, but intend to withhold financial support for a while.

The Malloys are not ready to abandon the GOP, however.

"I don't think (the Democrats) have a plan," Janet Malloy said.

Meanwhile, four protesters stood on a curb outside the Marriott, holding homemade banners.

"Can you believe what (the Republicans) are doing now?" said Miami Democrat Bob Kunst, referring to a proposed deal that would give a Hong Kong company control of some port security.

While Cheney spoke in the luxury hotel, Kunst campaigned on the street with a poster for New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, who has yet to declare that she will run for president in 2008.

"I've gotten a pretty good reaction," said Kunst, who said he has attended 120 demonstrations. "We could turn this thing around."

Bush, On The Road, Adds To G.O.P. War Chest (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

INDIANAPOLIS, March 24 — President Bush took to the campaign trail Friday, raising $1.2 million for two of his party's most vulnerable incumbents: Representative Mike Sodrel of Indiana and Senator Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania.

At a $1,000-a-plate luncheon in a downtown auditorium here, Mr. Bush delivered a 30-minute speech centered largely on a defense of the war in Iraq, and then exhorted the crowd of 500 to re-elect Mr. Sodrel, a freshman locked in a tight race against Baron Hill, a former Democratic congressman whom he unseated in 2004.

Later, Mr. Bush flew to Pennsylvania to join Mr. Santorum, who is facing a difficult race against the Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr., the state treasurer and son of a popular former governor.

The Santorum event, a dinner at a residence in the Pittsburgh suburb of Sewickley Heights, was closed to the press. That was standard procedure for the Bush White House when a fund-raiser is held at a private home, but an excuse for Democrats to make a case that growing numbers of Republicans no longer want to be seen in public with a president bedeviled by political woes.

Yet when Mr. Bush arrived at the Pittsburgh airport on Friday, Mr. Santorum was the first to greet him, and the president spun the senator so that he faced the press pool for photos of the two of them, according to the pool report.

Further, whatever Mr. Bush's poll ratings in a year when his party is running hard to retain its majorities in both houses of Congress, Republicans in trouble embrace him and Vice President Dick Cheney for their ability to raise money. The president has raised more than $12.5 million for Republicans this year, the Republican National Committee says, and Mr. Cheney more than $1.5 million.

The fund-raiser for Mr. Sodrel was Mr. Bush's fourth for a House member facing re-election in 2006, and Mr. Cheney has held about two dozen House events in recent months, said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"The president and vice president are the best fund-raisers we have," said Mr. Forti, adding that the visits brought good local press for candidates. "They're on the front page of the paper the day before they come, the front page of the paper the day they're there and the front page the day after. It's great exposure."

Indeed, Mr. Sodrel was beaming Friday as he stood alongside Mr. Bush for the traditional grip-and-grin campaign photograph. His organization hoped to bring in $500,000 from the event.

But Mr. Bush's last fund-raising trip to Indiana, for Representative Chris Chocola, proved costly for the incumbent. The presidential visit generated critical news accounts about the security expense to taxpayers, and Mr. Chocola wound up promising to reimburse two Indiana communities, South Bend and Mishawaka, a total of $12,000.

And some Republicans, especially in swing states, do appear to be avoiding Mr. Bush and Mr. Cheney.

On Monday, for instance, Thomas H. Kean Jr., a Republican running for the Senate from New Jersey, took an uncommon route to a fund-raiser on his behalf featuring Mr. Cheney; Mr. Kean, who is challenging Senator Robert Menendez, became trapped in bumper-to-bumper traffic and did not arrive until after the vice president had left, prompting questions about whether he was practicing the politics of avoidance.

The same day, Senator Mike DeWine, an Ohio Republican in a tough race, skipped an appearance by Mr. Bush in Cleveland. His campaign spokesman, Brian Seitchik, said Friday that the senator had been in Florida with his father, who is recuperating from surgery.

That was not the only Bush trip Mr. DeWine has missed. When the president appeared in Dublin, Ohio, in February to talk about health care, Mr. DeWine was back in Washington, running a subcommittee hearing. And when Mr. Bush traveled to Ohio to raise money for Mr. DeWine, the senator did not welcome him at the airport. "He wanted to greet his guests, the attendees, personally," Mr. Seitchik explained.

Candidates Cool To Bush, But Not His Money (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, March 25, 2006

Many worried Republicans on the ballot in November have been pushing away from the White House, not wanting to be dragged under by President Bush's sinking approval ratings and growing anxiety over Iraq.

That doesn't mean they're fleeing his cash offerings, however.

Despite approval ratings in the mid-to-upper 30s, Bush remains the nation's most successful fundraiser. Vice President Dick Cheney, whose poll numbers are even lower than Bush's, is not far behind. Both have raised tens of millions of dollars for GOP congressional and gubernatorial candidates running in this year's midterm elections.

Even as some Republicans are becoming increasingly defiant on a range of issues, they're still lining up dutifully for the president's campaign dollars.

"I would be shocked if a legitimate Republican candidate, not just a fringe candidate, who got word that the president was coming to do a fundraiser said, `No, don't come to my district,'" said GOP consultant Rich Galen.

That said, Republican candidates don't want to be forced off message by such a visit and "have to spend the next two or three days talking about the president's policies ... or what happened yesterday in Ramadi (Iraq)," Galen said.

It has resulted in some fancy GOP footwork as candidates in tight races step away from Bush and Cheney on divisive issues but dance toward them when the subject is money.

Bush presided over a fundraiser Friday for Rep. Mike Sodrel of Indiana at The Murat Centre in Indianapolis, calling Sodrel "a strong supporter of the United States military" and citing "troubled times."

Another one was scheduled for later Friday for Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record), R-Pa., at a private residence in the Pittsburgh area.

DOJ_NMG_0022087

He's doing another fundraiser at a Washington hotel on Monday for Sen. Conrad Burns (news, bio, voting record), R-Mont., where $1,000 will get you in the door, and $10,000 in combined contributions from others will get you a "photo opportunity with the president," according to an invitation.

Bush and Santorum, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, are not scheduled to appear together publicly on Friday. Santorum, trailing Democrat Bob Casey in polls, broke with Bush on a plan to have an Arab company based in Dubai run terminals at some U.S. ports and has raised concerns about the administration's conduct of the war in Iraq.

When Bush went to Cleveland earlier in the week to make a major speech on Iraq, there was a noticeable absence of top Ohio Republicans, including Sen. Mike DeWine (news, bio, voting record), who is locked in a tight re-election race.

Cheney went to Newark, N.J., earlier in the week to help raise $400,000 for New Jersey GOP Senate candidate Tom Kean Jr. But Kean showed up 15 minutes after Cheney left. Kean said he got stuck in traffic, a claim critics questioned based on the route he took.

Michael Steele, the GOP Senate candidate in Maryland, skipped Bush's speech at the U.S. Naval Academy in November, but joined the president later at a $500,000 fundraiser.

At a local GOP gathering in Nevada last weekend, Republican Sen. John Ensign (news, bio, voting record) tied himself to Ronald Reagan rather than Bush, saying spending under the Bush administration "has upset me."

Rep. Jon Porter (news, bio, voting record), R-Nev., who also attended the gathering, told reporters: "I believe the president has his agenda, his focus. I have mine. I will always run on mine."

Worries over the Iraq war are weighing down all Republicans and causing strains between Bush and his congressional allies. "The big issue is now the war," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

In a White House news conference earlier this week, Bush acknowledged the war was dominating the nation's attention. "So there's a certain unease as you head into an election year. I understand that," he said.

A president is typically his party's fundraiser-in-chief, and Bush has embraced the role like no other, besting even the reception-loving Bill Clinton in total dollars collected. Bush headlined events that raised more than $140 million for Republican Party committees and candidates in each of the 2002 and 2004 election cycles.

In 2005, Bush held 20 fundraising events, raising $75.5 million, while Cheney held 36 events that brought in $15 million. So far this year, Bush has held six events raising $12.5 million, and Cheney has held 11 events that raised $1.6 million, according to a GOP tabulation.

"The Republicans want to make withdrawals from the White House ATM. But at the same time, they don't want to be photographed or be seen being anywhere near the White House at this time," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But Brian Nick, spokesman of the counterpart National Republican Senatorial Committee, said the large sums of money that Bush and Cheney are able to attract are "indicative of what both the president and the vice president have been willing to do since their election. ... It shows the dedication to keeping the majority."

Polls show Bush and Cheney remain enormously popular with the GOP base and conservatives. An AP-Ipsos poll earlier this month showed Bush holding a 74 percent approval rating among Republicans, compared with 37 percent overall.

"He enjoys very strong support there. His problem is with swing voters," said Rutgers political scientist Ross Baker.

It is in states like New Jersey and Ohio, where swing voters have the most clout, that the races are the tightest, and where Democrats are working hard to tie Republican candidates to Bush administration policies.

Democrats, for instance, had some fun with Kean missing Cheney at the New Jersey fundraiser, pointing to news accounts that he had taken traffic-clogged Route 1 — at rush hour — rather than driving on the less-congested New Jersey Turnpike. "We made the photo that Tom Kean Jr. feared," said a Democratic news release with a computer-generated picture of Kean and Cheney standing side by side.

For his part, Cheney seemed to take Kean's absence in stride. "I do some of my best work when I'm without a candidate," he quipped at the fundraiser.

A New Poll: The Democrats By 9 Points (TIME)

DOJ_NMG_0022088

Time, March 24, 2006

TIME's survey shows unhappiness with the GOP in Congress, but can the Democrats translate that into a power shift?

TIME's latest poll finds American voters heading into November's election dissatisfied with the Republican-dominated status quo, but not necessarily convinced that the answer lies in voting Democratic. The poll, conducted March 22-23, finds Americans unhappy with the performance of the Republican-controlled Congress — 39% approve, versus 49% who disapprove — and gives Democrats a 9-point lead when voters are asked to state which party's candidate they would choose for a House of Representatives seat (50% answered Democrat, 41% chose Republican). Voters favor Democratic control of Congress by 49% compared with 38% for Republican control.

But voter unhappiness over the Republican-controlled Congress and White House has not yet translated into a groundswell of support for the Democrats. Right now, the approval rating for Congressional Democrats is no higher (39%) than that of Republicans, and 56% of voters don't believe the Democrats offer a clear set of alternative policies. Nor will President Bush's dismal 39% approval rating necessarily drag down his party: almost half of voters (44%) were indifferent to whether their preferred Congressional candidate supports or opposes Bush.

Although the Democrats have a 14-point edge on the issue of dealing with corruption, one in three voters — including almost half of independents — says neither party has much to crow about on this issue. And one strong sign that a political earthquake is unlikely in November: almost two out of three respondents (63%) approved of the job their own congressional representative is doing.

At this stage, then, the Democrats' 9-point advantage in party preference may not be a reliable indicator of a shift in control of the House of Representatives. Democrats almost always trump Republicans on the generic party preference question in pre-election polling, but the voting day outcomes are often shaped by turnout. Indeed, the equivalent question in a spring 1994 Gallup survey gave the Democrats a 6-point lead — and that was the year of the Republican Revolution, in which Newt Gingrich's troops, armed with their Contract with America, gained control of both chambers of Congress.

Gingrich's Contract was a voter-friendly manifesto that tied together Republican advantages on themes as disparate as congressional ethics and tax policy into a manifesto for an electoral landslide. The Democrats may envy the former House Speaker's success in creating a winning narrative, given the large advantage they enjoy on issues such as rebuilding after Hurricane Katrina, protecting Americans' rights, standing up to special interests and corruption, managing government spending and tax policy. Still, the Republicans retain an 11-point edge over the Democrats on the question of dealing with terrorism, while voters are evenly split on the question of which party would better handle the war in Iraq — issues that were key to the Republicans' success in the last two elections.

Mr. Fix-It (NSWK)

By Eleanor Clift

Newsweek, March 24, 2006

Republicans hope that James Baker's involvement in the new Iraq Study Group will help them forge a path out of the war-torn country.

President Bush was trying to show resolve, but instead it looked like he was trying to pass the buck when he said the decision on when to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq would be made by a future U.S. president and Iraqi government.

Handing off responsibility is a hallmark of Bush's leadership. He doesn't want to go down in history as the president who lost Iraq, so he'll hang tough and leave the day of reckoning to his successor. Stating publicly and proudly that there is no end in sight for the U.S. mission in Iraq feeds Bush's delusion that his determination—along with his low poll numbers—will be vindicated at some future date.

Bush has his eye on his legacy, but House Republicans have a more immediate concern—and that is how to save their jobs come November. "Stay the course" is not a popular slogan on the campaign trail. That's why a new Iraq Study Group commissioned by Congress and co-chaired by former cabinet member James A. Baker III, the Bush family Mr. Fix-It, is seen by many Republicans as their best hope to forge a path out of the hell that Iraq has become. It was Baker—the secretary of State in the first Bush administration—who parachuted into Florida after the disputed 2000 vote and executed the legal strategy that made

Bush president. Now it's Baker's cunning and diplomatic deftness that Republicans hope will extricate them from Iraq, or at least give them some new talking points in the run-up to the election.

The commission was the inspiration of Virginia Republican Rep. Frank Wolf, a thoughtful moderate with genuine concerns about his party's policies in Iraq. He also has an important seat on the House Appropriations Committee, which decides the State Department's budget, so when it comes to diplomacy, he has a captive audience. Wolf has been calling for a fresh look at Iraq since at least last fall, and his main criterion for choosing the commission's 11 bipartisan members was that they bring a wow factor, that their very names would command attention. Co-chairing with Baker is the Democrats' Mr. Integrity, former Indiana congressman Lee Hamilton, who is fresh from co-chairing the 9/11 commission. Among the other luminaries are former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani and the Clinton's confidant—superlawyer Vernon Jordan. "They're going to go everywhere and look at this thing and come up with something, and the president will pay attention," vows a foreign-policy specialist who helped shape the idea.

The prospect of getting bailed out by his daddy's buddy must rankle Bush, but he needs a new approach. He can't keep asserting, as he did this week, that we're at war and he's got a plan for victory. Baker has an enviable track record in the diplomatic and political arenas, but he didn't do handstands when he got called to serve. "It's like being called over to the White House when you're 25 points behind and you're made chief of staff," says a former colleague. "The odds are against finding a solution." Still, if anybody can find a light to lead U.S. forces out of the current morass, it's Baker. There is a high degree of confidence in his abilities on both sides of the aisle. "He has the interest; he has the clout, and he'll make the time," says the foreign-policy adviser who worked with Baker in the former Bush administration.

Among Baker's admirers is former ambassador Joseph Wilson, who recalls the secretary of State's heroic efforts in putting together the coalition for the first gulf war. Wilson prefers to talk about the way ahead in Iraq rather than the still unresolved case of who leaked the identity of his wife, Valerie Plame, as a CIA operative. He told NEWSWEEK that a debate based on setting a timetable and exit strategies is "all wrong." Though Wilson gained notoriety as a critic of the Bush administration over its WMD claims, he stands with the president in believing U.S. troops cannot leave Iraq until there is a political solution. Wilson proposes what he calls a "concert of nations" that would bring together all the various factions and their patrons in the region, which means having the Iranians at the table along with the Saudis, Jordanians, Egyptians, Russians, some of the Europeans and the Turks. "If they're not there to hammer out a political solution, you can be darned sure they'll be there supporting their various factions as we go through cycle after cycle of instability, insurrection and civil war," he says.

They don't call it a "concert of nations" at the White House or at Baker's shop, but a similar proposal for a major diplomatic push is making the rounds. It would test U.S. leadership and force the administration to reach out to friends as well as foes. The one card Bush has left to play in November is that he's not backing down. Implicit in that statement is that the Democrats will. Whether the voters still buy the tough talk is another matter.

Near Paul Revere Country, Anti-Bush Cries Get Louder (WP)

By Michael Powell

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

HOLYOKE, Mass. -- To drive through the mill towns and curling country roads here is to journey into New England's impeachment belt. Three of this state's 10 House members have called for the investigation and possible impeachment of President Bush.

Thirty miles north, residents in four Vermont villages voted earlier this month at annual town meetings to buy more rock salt, approve school budgets, and impeach the president for lying about Iraq having weapons of mass destruction and for sanctioning torture.

Window cleaner Ira Clemons put down his squeegee in the lobby of a city mall and stroked his goatee as he considered the question: Would you support your congressman's call to impeach Bush? His smile grew until it looked like a three-quarters moon.

"Why not? The man's been lying from Jump Street on the war in Iraq," Clemons said. "Bush says there were weapons of mass destruction, but there wasn't. Says we had enough soldiers, but we didn't. Says it's not a civil war -- but it is." He added: "I was really upset about 9/11 -- so don't lie to me."

It would be a considerable overstatement to say the fledgling impeachment movement threatens to topple a presidency -- there are just 33 House co-sponsors of a motion by Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) to investigate and perhaps impeach Bush, and a large majority of elected Democrats think it is a bad idea. But talk bubbles up in many corners of the nation, and on the Internet, where several Web sites have led the charge, giving liberals an outlet for anger that has been years in the making.

"The value of a powerful idea, like impeachment of the president for criminal acts, is that it has a long shelf life and opens a debate," said Bill Goodman of the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents Guantanamo Bay detainees.

The San Francisco Board of Supervisors voted last month to urge Congress to impeach Bush, as have state Democratic parties, including those of New Mexico, Nevada, North Carolina and Wisconsin. A Zogby International poll showed that 51 percent of respondents agreed that Bush should be impeached if he lied about Iraq, a far greater percentage than believed President Bill Clinton should be impeached during the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal.

And Harper's Magazine this month ran a cover piece titled "The Case for Impeachment: Why We Can No Longer Afford George W. Bush."

"If the president says 'We made mistakes,' fine, let's move on," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.). "But if he lied to get America into a war, I can't imagine anything more impeachable."

Democrats remain far from unified. Prominent party leaders -- and a large majority of those in Congress -- distance themselves from the effort. They say the very word is a distraction, that talk of impeachment and censure reflect the polarization of politics. Activists spend too many hours dialing Democratic politicians and angrily demanding impeachment votes, they say.

In California, poet Kevin Hearle, an impeachment supporter, is challenging liberal Rep. Tom Lantos -- who opposes impeachment -- in the Democratic primary in June.

"Impeachment is an outlet for anger and frustration, which I share, but politics ain't therapy," said Rep. Barney Frank, a Massachusetts liberal who declined to sign the Conyers resolution. "Bush would much rather debate impeachment than the disastrous war in Iraq."

The GOP establishment has welcomed the threat. It has been a rough patch for the party -- Bush's approval ratings in polls are lower than for any president in recent history. With midterm elections in the offing, Republican leaders view impeachment as kerosene poured on the bonfires of their party base.

"The Democrats' plan for 2006?" Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman wrote in a fundraising e-mail Thursday. "Take the House and Senate and impeach the president. With our nation at war, is this the kind of Congress you want?"

The argument for an impeachment inquiry -- which draws support from prominent constitutional scholars such as Harvard's Laurence H. Tribe and former Reagan deputy attorney general Bruce Fein -- centers on Bush's conduct before and after the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

It is argued that Bush and his officials conspired to manufacture evidence of weapons of mass destruction to persuade Congress to approve the invasion. Former Treasury secretary Paul H. O'Neill told CBS News's "60 Minutes" that "from the very beginning there was a conviction that Saddam Hussein was a bad person and that he needed to go . . . it was all about finding a way to do it." And a senior British intelligence official wrote in what is now known as the "Downing Street memo" that Bush officials were intent on fixing "the intelligence and the facts . . . around the policy."

Critics point to Bush's approval of harsh interrogations of prisoners captured Iraq and Afghanistan, tactics that human rights groups such as Amnesty International say amount to torture. Bush also authorized warrantless electronic surveillance of telephone calls and e-mails, subjecting possibly thousands of Americans each year to eavesdropping since 2001.

"Bush is saying 'I'm the president' and, on a range of issues -- from war to torture to illegal surveillance -- 'I can do as I like,' " said Michael Ratner of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "This administration needs to be slapped down and held accountable for actions that could change the shape of our democracy."

DOJ_NMG_0022091

Tribe wrote Conyers, dismissing Bush's defense of warrantless surveillance as "poppycock." It constituted, Tribe concluded, "as grave an abuse of executive authority as I can recall ever having studied."

But posed against this bill of aggrievement are legal and practical realities. Not all scholars, even of a liberal bent, agree that Bush has committed "high crimes and misdemeanors." Bush's legal advice may be wrong, they say, but still reside within the bounds of reason.

"The Clinton impeachment was plainly unconstitutional, and a Bush impeachment would be nearly as bad," said Cass R. Sunstein, a professor of constitutional law at the University of Chicago. "There is a very good argument that the president had it wrong on WMD in Iraq but that he was acting in complete good faith."

Sunstein argues that Bush's decision to conduct surveillance of Americans without court approval flowed from Congress's vote to allow an armed struggle against al-Qaeda. "If you can kill them, why can't you spy on them?" Sunstein said, adding that this is a minority view.

Here in Massachusetts and Vermont, though, in the back roads and on the streets of Holyoke and Springfield, the discontent with Bush is palpable. These are states that, per capita, have sent disproportionate numbers of soldiers to Iraq. Many in these middle- and working-class towns are not pleased that so many friends and cousins are coming back wounded or dead.

"He picks and chooses his information and can't admit it's erroneous, and he annoys me," said Colleen Kucinski, walking Aleks, 5, and Gregory, 2, home.

Would she support impeachment? Kucinski wags her head "yes" before the question is finished. "Without a doubt. This is far more serious than Clinton and Monica. This is about life and death. We're fighting a war on his say-so and it was all wrong."

Senate To Hold Hearing On Feingold's Censure Resolution (FWST)

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Senate Judiciary Committee has scheduled a hearing for next Friday on Sen. Russ Feingold's resolution to censure President Bush for authorizing a warrantless surveillance program.

Feingold, D-Wis., argues that the program is illegal. The White House maintains that Bush was authorized to do so under his powers as commander in chief.

So far, only two senators, Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, and Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., have co-sponsored the resolution.

A censure resolution, if adopted, would amount to Congress scolding the president.

Senator Sets Hearing On Censure Of Bush (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The Senate Judiciary Committee has set a hearing for next Friday on the call by Senator Russell D. Feingold, Democrat of Wisconsin, to censure President Bush for his approval of a program to allow electronic eavesdropping without warrants.

Senator Arlen Specter, the Pennsylvania Republican who is chairman of the panel, said he had decided to schedule the session after Mr. Feingold, in a television interview, pressed for hearings on the censure proposal.

Some Republicans have seized on the issue to rally their supporters by arguing that the censure plan is evidence that Democrats would try to take some action against Mr. Bush should they gain control of the House or Senate in the November elections.

The issue has also energized some Democrats who contend their party has shied from confronting Mr. Bush. But Mr. Feingold's Democratic colleagues have been cautious about endorsing the plan.

Mr. Specter said his intent was not to use the session as a political forum but to explore issues surrounding the proposed censure. He said he believed the proposal was baseless.

"I am prepared to deal with it," Mr. Specter said. "I am sure not going to sit back and have Feingold spout off."

First Lady Has Husband's Ear, Even About Staffing, She Says (NYT)

By Elisabeth Bumiller

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — President Bush has said he is listening to advice about his staff from a lot of people, and one of them is evidently his wife.

In an interview with Larry King broadcast on CNN on Friday night, Laura Bush said that she advised her husband regularly on personnel, and she suggested that she had weighed in on the continuing calls from Republicans for new blood in the West Wing.

Mrs. Bush made her comments in response to questions from Mr. King about a Washington Post article on Friday by Sally Quinn. In a "Dear Laura" essay in the Style section, Ms. Quinn wrote that Mrs. Bush was the only person who could tell her husband the truth about the problems he faces.

With the president's poll numbers at record lows, Congressional Republicans in rebellion and Americans increasingly doubtful about the war in Iraq, Ms. Quinn advised Mrs. Bush to tell her husband that he needed to listen to outside opinion, pay attention to Congress and bring an old Washington hand into the White House.

Asked what she thought of the advice, Mrs. Bush said, "There's some of it that's right and some of it that isn't, of course."

She added: "And I know that the view from outside is a lot different from the view that George and I have inside, with each other, by ourselves. And there's certainly some advice I would feel free to give him, and do. There's other advice that I really don't think I should give him."

Mr. King asked, "Like personnel?"

Mrs. Bush replied, "Well, no, I mean, I would certainly — that's one of the things we do talk about the most, are personalities. I know everyone as well as he does, who works here. I've worked with them also. So certainly I would give him that kind of advice."

Mrs. Bush also said: "This is so typical of Washington that on the front page of the Style section would be the advice to the first lady. But I take advice to heart. I really do."

In the same interview, Mrs. Bush restated that she thought Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would make an "excellent" president, "but I don't think we can talk her into running."

The first lady added, "I think she sincerely does not want to run, but I wish she would."

Mrs. Bush said that Ms. Rice "probably wants to move back to California and have a wonderful life, post-secretary of state."

Bush Accepts Reds' Pitch (CINE)

By Howard Wilkinson

The Cincinnati Enquirer, March 25, 2006

President Bush will become the first sitting president to throw out the ceremonial first pitch at the Reds' Opening Day game, the White House and the team confirmed Friday.

Bush will take the mound shortly before the 2:10 p.m. start of the Reds' game against the Chicago Cubs on April 3.

"The president looks forward to throwing out the first pitch," White House spokesman Blair Jones said.

Bob Castellini, the Reds' new chief executive officer, has been a Bush supporter, raising more than $100,000 for the president's 2004 re-election campaign.

Last month, Castellini was among those who greeted the president at a private home in Indian Hill, where Bush attended a $1.1 million fundraiser for Sen. Mike DeWine.

DeWine, a Reds season-ticket holder since the early days of Riverfront Stadium, will be in his seat on the mezzanine level for Opening Day.

President Bush won't be the first of his family to throw out a first pitch on Opening Day. Three years ago, at the inaugural game of Great American Ball Park, his father, former President George H.W. Bush, did the honors.

Having a president in the ball park will mean extra security, and if it is anything like the 2004 Opening Day, when Vice President Dick Cheney tossed out the ball, fans can expect some delays getting to their seats.

When Cheney came to Opening Day, fans with tickets in the lower terrace level, from first base to third base, had to pass through metal detectors to get to their seats, in addition to the usual bag check outside the ballpark's turnstiles.

The extra security meant that some got to their seats after the real "first pitch" of the game.

President Nixon came to Cincinnati in July, 1970, Riverfront Stadium's inaugural season, to throw out the first pitch at the All-Star Game.

Last year, President Bush threw out the ceremonial first pitch in Washington, D.C., for the first home game of the Washington Nationals.

States Get Reimbursement For Katrina Aid (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The federal government released $1.5 billion on Friday to offset health care expenses that states incurred when assisting Hurricane Katrina evacuees.

Congress set aside $2 billion to reimburse states. The $500 million not distributed yet will cover future expenses.

After the hurricane, the federal government granted waivers to states that had temporarily enrolled evacuees into their Medicaid programs. The benefits particularly targeted low-income children, pregnant women, the elderly and disabled.

Medicaid is the state-federal health insurance program for the poor. The reimbursement can also be used to leverage an additional $4.5 billion in federal funding, officials with the Department of Health and Human Services said.

The states getting relief funds are Texas, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Idaho, Arkansas, Georgia, Tennessee, South Carolina, Indiana, Maryland, Louisiana, Nevada, California, Ohio, Rhode Island, North Carolina, Wyoming, Arizona, Massachusetts, North Dakota, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Oregon, Iowa, Virginia, Minnesota, Montana, Utah and Wisconsin. Puerto Rico and the District of Columbia also received funding.

Seniors Struggle To Get Drug Plans To Pay For Some Prescriptions (KRT)

By Tony Pugh

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Some patients and doctors are facing a new problem with the fledgling Medicare prescription drug benefit: Medications they once received without question from other plans are being denied by the private insurers running the Medicare plan.

When they appeal the coverage denials, the patients and their physicians face confusing forms, time-consuming demands for personal medical information and long delays.

In some cases, the private plans won't cover the full dosage called for in a prescription or try to steer patients to drugs other than those prescribed by their doctors.

When disputes arise, doctors are asked to justify their prescribing decisions in writing, sometimes with patients' medical histories or test results as supporting evidence. Some plans even ask for doctors' notes or for peer-reviewed articles that justify their decisions.

"Whether intended or not, it's a process that nobody can navigate in an efficient way. It's a major problem right now," said Sam Muszynski, head of health care systems and financing at the American Psychiatric Institute.

And many fear things will worsen in April when tens of thousands of elderly and disabled patients must formally petition the plans to get refills on medications that were provided on a temporary emergency basis.

"The system is going to melt down, and I think it's going to require some emergency legislation," said Dr. Holly Leeds, a general practitioner in Auburn, Calif.

Amid widespread complaints about coverage lapses following the January launch of the Medicare drug benefit, federal officials told plans to pay for drugs that they wouldn't normally cover until March 31. Meanwhile, patients were urged to either switch to medications that were covered or file appeals to have the plans pay for their preferred drugs.

Many of those who petitioned the plans say the appeals process is often a poorly managed, highly subjective nightmare. Doctors say phone delays frequently leave their staff on hold with the plans for hours.

Some plans don't meet mandatory time requirements to resolve appeals. Dr. Elizabeth Delesante, a psychiatrist in Brainerd, Minn., said she still hasn't heard from anyone at the Humana plan she filed two appeals with in January.

Delesante gives her patients free samples to ensure that they get their medication while the cases are pending. "If it weren't for that, these people would be in trouble," she said. Officials at Humana said they have contacted Delesante and will work to resolve her complaints.

Doctors also say it's hard getting the proper forms from the Medicare plans. "And none of these are standardized forms. Every company uses a different one, which is ridiculous," said Dr. Rosemary Deleo of Kingston, N.Y.

Mohit Ghose, a spokesman for America's Health Insurance Plans, a trade association, acknowledged that the process has problems. He said the plans are working with Medicare and physician groups to develop standardized appeals forms to simplify the process.

The plans also will soon offer a messaging system that gives pharmacists a list of alternative medications that patients can use when a plan denies a prescription request.

"I can assure you that the processes are getting better and they are getting streamlined," Ghose said.

Medicare administrator Mark McClellan said the agency will monitor complaints about the appeals process and could levy fines and penalties if widespread problems persist.

To avoid further complications, Medicare is urging the plans to alert members whose medications will no longer be covered in April. Medicare officials also want the plans to increase telephone staffing for the expected rush of appeals and to extend drug coverage for people who haven't resolved appeals by March 31.

But many worry that patients who lose their appeals could be forced to take less effective alternative medicines or, at worst, drugs that could endanger their health.

Riley has used Norvasc since 2004, but after his drug coverage shifted from Medicaid to Medicare in January, he ran into problems. Riley's Medicare plan from United Healthcare won't pay for the drug in the amount prescribed by his doctors - two 10mg tablets a day.

The plan would cover only one 10mg tablet a day. To continue the higher dosages, the plan wanted a written explanation and supporting documents from his doctors. One doctor complied. Another refused, unwilling to spend untold hours on the phone chasing plan representatives, said Riley's daughter-in-law, Paula Riley.

After Riley was denied twice by the plan, Paula Riley started working with attorneys from the Medicare Rights Center, a national patient advocacy group, to appeal the case to a mediator that's contracted by Medicare. Until his case is resolved, Riley is taking only half his Norvasc dosage, and his blood pressure is creeping up.

The plan said he can switch to a new medication that's fully covered, but his family is reluctant because neuropathy has diminished his ability to feel what's going on in his body.

"If he changes medicines and has a side effect, he can't feel it or tell you what it is," Paula Riley said. "The only way we can detect it is by having him on a monitor or watching him. And I don't have 24 hours a day to watch this man. So I don't want to change what's working. I don't feel I should have to."

Neither does Dr. Larry Fields, president of the American Academy of Family Physicians. He said that if a doctor thinks a higher dose is needed, the drug plan should stay out of it.

"That's a doctor's decision. The doctor is taking the responsibility to give a different dose and that should not be something that the plan's involved in," Fields said. "Their job is to supply drugs for the patients. ... It's not their job to decide which drug and it's not their job to decide how much."

Because of privacy laws, United Healthcare officials couldn't comment directly on Riley's case. But they said U.S. Food and Drug Administration guidelines set the maximum dosage level for Norvasc at 10mg per day. Federal rules require Medicare drug plans to follow these guidelines and other medically accepted practices when covering drugs under the Medicare benefit, said United Healthcare spokeswoman Joyce Larkin.

While doctors often exceed FDA-recommended dosing levels and sometimes prescribe drugs for ailments they weren't designed to treat, these practices require strict review by Medicare plans to determine their medical appropriateness and eligibility for program coverage.

If a Medicare drug plan denies a prescription request, the patient or doctor can call the plan to seek a coverage exception. Plans are required to respond within 72 hours or within 24 hours if a doctor makes an expedited request for a patient whose health is in danger.

If the plan denies the request, the patient can seek a second review by the plan. Second reviews must be decided within seven days or 72 hours for an expedited appeal. Leeds said that most plans don't meet the time requirements, even on the expedited requests. "If I'm lucky it might happen, but more often than not, it doesn't," she said.

If a patient still isn't satisfied, he or she can appeal the case to an independent review agency contracted by Medicare, the Maximus Center for Health Dispute Resolution. So far, the company has received nearly 1,000 requests for appeals, McClellan said.

Additional appeals can then go to an administrative law judge, to the Medicare Appeals Council and even to federal court.

As Parents Age, Baby Boomers And Business Struggle To Cope (NYT)

By Jane Gross

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Nancy Goodman's employer, a telecommunications company in Boston, offers benefits to help employees care for elderly parents. But she found them nearly useless during four years of caring for her mother, who has Parkinson's disease, and her father, who died of kidney failure last year.

"They say they want to do the right thing," Ms. Goodman, 58, said of her employer, which she would not identify for fear of losing her job. "But when it comes down to it, they're not seeing the true picture."

Ms. Goodman's lament is common, as corporate America scrambles to help the soaring number of baby boomers, mostly working women, whose obligation to frail, elderly parents results in absenteeism, workday distractions or stress-related health problems.

Companies are responding, but experts say they often use child care benefits as a model when they do not suit the different and unpredictable needs of the elderly. In addition, at a time of cutbacks in expensive health insurance and pensions, the most commonly offered benefits are those that cost a company little or nothing, like referral services and unpaid leaves.

Ms. Goodman, for instance, tried her company's referral service to supplement inadequate staffing when her parents lived at an assisted living center in Connecticut. It was "like going to the yellow pages," she said, since it did not relieve her of the time-consuming tasks of arranging for and supervising the services from afar. Ms. Goodman was also entitled to a year's leave of absence, a benefit a new mother might appreciate. But if she took a leave now, what happened if her mother lingered?

Employees with ailing parents, more than 20 million nationwide, cite other benefits that would allow them to focus more on their jobs, like geriatric case managers to guide them through the mysteries of Medicaid and Medicare, or backup care for emergencies like a last-minute business trip. Companies that offer this kind of hands-on assistance generally pay for at least part of the service.

But they are rare. According to the Society for Human Resource Management, which represents more than 200,000 human resource and other corporate officials, 39 percent of its members said in 2003 that elder care benefits were "too costly to be feasible." Only 1 percent of their companies subsidized any elder care benefits last year. And only 3 percent offered the emergency backup care — subsidized or otherwise — that experts say saves money by keeping workers at work.

"The perception among companies is that they can't afford elder care benefits," said Frank Scanlan, a spokesman for the society.

It is the largest companies that are the most generous, but even those often subscribe to the mistaken notion that the Mommy Track and the Daughter Track are the same, said Chris Gatti, president of the Work Options Group in Superior, Colo. Work Options, whose clients employ 400,000 people nationwide, provides in-home care for children and the elderly.

"These benefits fall under the same umbrella but are fundamentally different," Mr. Gatti said. "Child care programs are relatively straight-forward and easy to administer compared to elder care, which is a maze with lots of sharp corners and dark secluded places."

An individual supervisor can ease an employee's burden but still leave them vulnerable to management changes. Just 6 percent of employers have written policies about elder care, according to surveys by the Society for Human Resource Management, while 76 percent say they help employees on a case-by-case basis.

For Ms. Goodman, the one godsend since her father died and her mother moved into her Boston apartment has been permission to work at home. But that is likely to change with a new boss. "I'm walking on eggs right now," Ms. Goodman said.

The distinctions between child care and elder care have become apparent as the first of the 77 million baby boomers turn 60 and their parents live past 85, joining the fastest-growing segment of the population.

The most obvious is that children's schedules are predictable — a school holiday next Monday — while elderly parents' needs — a trip to the emergency room — are crisis-driven. Also, children are raised at home; an elderly parent often lives far away.

Guiding the decisions of an elderly parent also requires mastery of arcane legal, financial and medical matters.

"It's a new and very confusing skill set," said Maureen Corcoran, a vice president at Prudential Financial. "You don't just give people a list; you lead them there. Otherwise they spend hours upon hours figuring it out themselves."

For both employees and employers, the costs of elder care are enormous, according to studies by the MetLife Mature Market Institute, which is in the midst of updated analysis to reflect rapidly changing demographics.

The price tag for employers in 1997 ranged from $11.5 billion to $29 billion a year. Most expensive were the replacement of lost workers (at least $4.9 billion a year), workday interruptions ($3.7 billion) and absenteeism ($885 million). The employees lose salary, Social Security and pension benefits as a result of refusing promotions, switching to part-time work or retiring early.

Certain benefits mitigate these costs, and certain companies have learned there is a clear return on investment. At Prudential, for instance, subsidized emergency backup care prevents absenteeism and workday interruptions. Prudential's 21,000 employees, with one phone call to Work Options Group, can get help for parents by the next morning, for a co-payment of $4 an hour.

A $20-an-hour aide, on an eight-hour shift, would otherwise cost a Prudential employee $160, rather than $32. Yet the company says it will save $650,000 during a three-year contract with Work Options, Ms. Corcoran said, because "if our employees needs are taken care of, they can focus on work."

Diane Yankencheck, a Prudential employee in Newark, said the service kept her working during a crisis. Her father has a degenerative neurological disease and round-the-clock care. Her mother manages the household, or did until she broke her wrist. Now an aide from Work Options cooks, cleans and helps her bathe and dress.

Kent Burtis, a Verizon technician in Bayville, N.J., uses similar backup care for his father, who is paralyzed and incontinent. For a while, Mr. Burtis spent hours before work feeding, diapering and dressing him. Now an aide does the morning shift. "It's kept me from slitting my throat," Mr. Burtis said.

Elder care benefits most often seem a luxury at small companies and nonprofits. So even at AARP, dedicated to the needs of older Americans, Deborah Russell, the director of work force issues, was daunted by coordinating long-distance care for her mother and then missing weeks of work to be at her bedside when death neared.

Ms. Russell and her two sisters, grateful for AARP's excellent referral service, still spent "an inordinate amount of time on the telephone" during working hours, distracted and unproductive. As their mother's condition deteriorated, and the siblings rotated weeks in Florida, Ms. Russell used paid vacation time rather than the 12 weeks of unpaid leave guaranteed by the federal Family Medical Leave Act or AARP's more generous 16-week program, also unpaid.

Another benefit assumed to be useful is the flexible spending account, governed by the Internal Revenue Service and widely offered by companies. It permits the use of pretax dollars for dependent care, as long as the dependent meets the I.R.S. definition. Virtually all children do, but most aged parents do not. That means tax breaks for baby sitters but not companions for the elderly.

Experts disagree about whether women will push employers for help with their parents, as they did 30 years ago when child care was their pressing issue.

Ellen Galinsky, 63, president of the Family and Work Institute, led the charge for a day care center at Bank Street College when she was a researcher there in 1969. After "huge resistance," the center opened in 1974. Ms. Galinsky predicts a similar awakening to elder care issues because "demographics are destiny."

"Everyone I know is dealing with this," said Ms. Galinsky, who recently stayed at the bedside of her 98-year-old mother for the last two months of her life. The institute allows unlimited sick leave for such family emergencies. But even with that leeway, Ms. Galinsky said: "I was on another planet. It's like no other experience. I barely have words for how hard it is."

Todd Groves, founder of LTC Financial Partners in Seattle, who advises human resource managers on long term care, is not convinced that women like Ms. Galinsky will have the same galvanizing effect this time around, regardless of their numbers or their passion.

"Back then you still had a paternal business culture," Mr. Groves said. "Now people feel out on their own. They are fearful about their careers and don't feel they can ask for help."

New Home Sales Slumping (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

The downturn in the housing market is deepening, with new home sales at a nine-year low, prices down for the fourth month in a row and mortgage applications at their lowest point in three years.

Last month's 1.08 million rate of new home sales was 10.5 percent below January's rate and down 13.4 percent from a year ago, the Commerce Department reported yesterday.

New home prices have declined steadily from a median of $243,900 in October to $230,400 last month, the agency said.

The rapidly decelerating housing market is causing concern on Wall Street and at the Federal Reserve. A collapse in the market is one of the biggest risks facing the U.S. economy because it would drag down consumer spending that has been closely linked to climbing house prices and kill thousands of high-paid jobs in the real estate industry.

"Bubbles burst, they really do," said Joel Naroff of Naroff Economic Advisers. "The Federal Reserve has to be concerned that just may happen, which could make them more cautious going forward."

The Fed is scheduled to meet on Tuesday to decide on raising interest rates once again. While most Fed-watchers say another rate increase is in store next week, the faltering housing market may influence the Fed to consider pausing later this spring.

Federal Reserve Bank of Boston President Cathy Minehan said this week that the Fed's forecast of "solid growth" in the economy this year was predicated on the housing market cooling off or leveling. But anything more dramatic than that would be "a downside risk to growth," she said, because it would cause consumers to stop using their houses like ATMs and cut back on spending.

"We see construction diminishing somewhat and real estate prices flattening, not declining," she said. "Clearly, however, we could be wrong on the magnitudes."

Housing wealth, which surged by $5 trillion in the first half of the decade, has been a powerful generator of consumer spending since nearly 70 percent of American households own homes. Consumers liquidated as much as $600 billion of their home equity last year to spend and invest, according to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., eclipsing their $375 billion gain in after-tax income.

Mr. Naroff said the home market's steep decline since the fall may start snowballing and affecting consumer wealth. Already, sluggish sales and traffic have prompted homebuilders to offer discounts and incentives on homes for sale, but they will have to start cutting prices in earnest if they want to unload the record inventories of unsold homes they've been accumulating, he said.

Unsold new homes totaled 548,000 last month or 6.3 months of homes at the current sales rate -- a stunning 45 percent above year-ago levels, according to the department.

DOJ_NMG_0022098

"The product overhang just keeps growing," in both the markets for new and existing homes, where unsold homes also are at record highs, said Mr. Naroff.

"Declining new home prices would ultimately spill over into the existing home market," where the consuming public would start to feel the pinch, he said.

Economists say falling home prices could wreak disaster on consumer finances, not only by preventing many from cashing into home equity as they have been to boost their incomes and spending, but also by putting many borrowers on shaky financial ground because they took out huge mortgages with backloaded payment schedules to purchase their homes.

Meredith Whitney, executive director at CIBC World Markets, said the Fed has been trying to cool down the housing market with sharply higher short-term rates, and that is hurting the most vulnerable borrowers who took out adjustable-rate mortgages keyed to rates driven higher by the Fed.

Caught between the squeeze of rising rates and a falling market, these borrowers -- most heavily indebted segment of the consuming public -- will fall into a spending slump this year because they have taken on burdensome and risky mortgages and are too overstretched to maintain their spending and debt payments, she said.

"The picture is getting less and less pretty," said Phillip Neuhart, economist with Wachovia Securities. But he noted that other housing reports, notably one showing a 5.6 percent boost in existing home sales in January due to unseasonably warm weather, are not signaling as profound a weakness as yesterday's report.

"One month of surprisingly weak new home sales does not constitute a market bust," he said. "However, if new home sales were to continue their plummet and existing home sales follow suit," the Fed would have to start worrying about the health of the economy.

New-Home Sales Fell In Feb.; Inventories Rose To New Record (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Sales of new homes fell more than expected in February, while a record number of houses sat unsold, according to a Commerce Department report released yesterday.

The inventory of 548,000 new single-family homes -- the largest since the department began tracking data in 1963 -- represents a 6.3 month supply of houses. In comparison, the supply in January was 5.3 months; in February of last year, it was 4.4 months.

The pace of sales fell 10.5 percent last month to an annualized rate of 1.08 million. It was the largest percentage drop in almost nine years.

The median sales price also dropped for the fourth straight month, to $230,400.

Taken together, the figures provide further evidence that the housing boom of the past five years is ending, economists said.

"The numbers are really, really, really weak," said Patrick Newport, economist at Global Insight, a Massachusetts-based market research firm. Newport had expected sales to drop by a much slower rate of 3 percent.

Despite the report, shares of large home-building firms remained stable yesterday. NVR Inc. stock closed at $775.98, up a third of a percentage point, and Toll Brothers Inc. stock closed at $34.35, down a third of a percentage point.

Yesterday's report came a day after the National Association of Realtors released a survey showing that existing-home sales had increased in February after a five-month decline. According to the survey, sales of existing single-family houses, townhouses and condos went up 5.2 percent from January, but were down 0.3 percent from February 2005.

Economists attributed the increase to warm weather, which spurred sales, particularly in the Northeast and the Midwest, regions typically more affected by climate.

Market observers cautioned against reading too much into monthly changes in either report. The new-home statistics, in particular, are based on a small sample with large margins of error. And the "noise" in the data is amplified when "markets are turning," said Susan Wachter, professor of real estate and finance at the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School. For example, Wachter said, limited-time incentives that home builders started offering at the beginning of the year, such as help with closing costs, could have propped up January figures by luring in buyers who may otherwise have waited until February.

But there is no question, experts said, that things are cooling. "All of the numbers are basically telling you the same thing," Newport said. "We're just going to see a continued slowdown over the next few months and it's probably going to extend into the next few years."

In the government report released yesterday, the South region, which includes the Washington area, saw a more moderate decline in sales compared with the nation as a whole. The region experienced a 6.4 percent decline compared with the previous month, and a 9.6 percent drop from February 2005.

"The market has peaked. Now the question is, when do we start going down the back side?" said Christopher Thornberg, an economist for the Anderson Forecast at UCLA's Anderson School of Business. "I don't hear the wind whistling past my ears just yet. But I think I will over the course of this year."

U.S. Economy: New Home Sales Fell Most In Nine Years (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Courtney Schlisserman Joe Richter

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- Sales of new U.S. homes slumped by the most in nine years and demand for business equipment declined last month, prompting some economists to lower their growth forecasts.

Home purchases fell 10.5 percent to an annual rate of 1.08 million, causing prices to fall and leaving more houses on the market, the Commerce Department said in Washington. Orders for durable goods excluding transportation equipment fell 1.3 percent, the most since July, the department also said.

``The new home sales report is in an indication of what we'll see in the remainder of 2006 for housing, and that unequivocally points to a slowdown," said Brian Bethune, an economist at Global Insight, a forecasting firm in Lexington, Massachusetts. At the same time, he said, ``this will be more of an average quarter for business investment, not a stellar quarter."

The drop in durable goods orders caused economists at Morgan Stanley to mark down their first-quarter growth estimate to 4.2 percent from 4.6 percent. U.S. Treasury securities rose on speculation less business investment and slower home sales will limit the number of Federal Reserve interest-rate increases.

The yield on the benchmark 10-year Treasury note fell 6 basis points to 4.67 percent at 4:04 p.m. in New York. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point. The dollar fell to $1.2039 per euro, the first drop in five days, from $1.1973 late yesterday.

`More Cautious'

February's decline in home sales was the biggest since April 1997. Economists expected new home sales to fall to a 1.2 million rate from January's originally reported 1.233 million, according to the median of 61 forecasts in a Bloomberg News survey. Estimates ranged from 1.17 million to 1.275 million.

``Consumers are a little more cautious," J. Larry Sorsby, chief financial officer of Hovnanian Enterprises Inc., New Jersey's largest homebuilder, said in an interview. ``You can't open a newspaper these days without seeing someone saying the housing market is softening."

The report comes a day after the National Association of Realtors said sales of previously owned homes rose 5.2 percent last month to an annual rate of 6.91 million. Purchases of new homes are considered a leading indicator of housing because they are based on contract signings, which typically occur at least a month before the closing. The rise in February sales of existing homes may have reflected purchase decisions made in January, when record-warm temperatures brought out buyers.

The median selling price of a new home last month fell 2.9 percent from February 2005, to $230,400, the first decrease since December 2003 and the biggest year-over-year decline since January 2003.

The number of homes for sale rose to a record 548,000 from January's 525,000. At the current sales pace, there were enough new homes on the market to satisfy demand for the next 6.3 months, the largest amount in more than a decade.

Less Affordable

Rising mortgage rates are making new homes less affordable. The average rate on a 30-year mortgage rose to 6.25 percent in February from 6.15 percent the month before, according to Freddie Mac.

Sales fell in two of four regions. They declined 29 percent in the West and 6.4 percent in the South. Sales rose 12.7 percent in the Northeast and 5.2 percent in the Midwest.

Orders for durable goods excluding transportation equipment fell after rising 1.6 percent a month earlier. A jump in demand for commercial aircraft led to a 2.6 percent increase in orders for all durable goods after an 8.9 percent decrease.

Economists projected durable goods orders would rise 1.3 percent in February, based on the median of 70 estimates in a Bloomberg News survey. Orders excluding transportation equipment were forecast to rise 1 percent.

Aircraft Orders

Orders for transportation equipment rose 13 percent after falling 29 percent in January. Aircraft orders jumped 53 percent after falling 70 percent in the previous month. Bookings for motor vehicles fell 3.3 percent.

Chicago-based Boeing Co., the world's second-biggest maker of commercial airplanes, said it received 25 aircraft orders in February, down from the 39 in the previous month. Boeing's orders more than tripled to a record 1,002 last year on demand from Asian and Middle Eastern carriers.

Production Cuts

Production cuts by some automakers may have restrained durable goods orders in February. Cars and light trucks sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 16.6 million during the month, down from 17.6 million in January.

General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co., the two biggest U.S. automakers, on March 1 said they will cut second-quarter production in North America after reporting U.S. sales declines in February.

Sales of non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft, which the government uses to construct quarterly gross domestic product figures, fell 1.1 percent in February after no change. Orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft, a proxy for future business investment, fell 2.3 percent last month after rising 0.3 percent.

Unfilled orders of business equipment rose 0.5 percent in February after no change.

Inventories of durable goods fell 0.5 percent after rising 1 percent in January. Unfilled orders, a gauge of future production, rose 0.9 percent after falling 0.2 percent.

Signs Of Slowdown In US Housing (FT)

By Christopher Swann

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Sales of new US homes plunged 10.5 per cent last month, prices fell and the stock of unsold homes hit its highest level in 10 years, providing the clearest indications yet that the red-hot housing market may be cooling.

A big slowdown could prompt consumers to cut spending and boost savings. Such a shift could help reduce the current account deficit but at the cost of significantly slower growth.

New home sales slid to 1.08m, the fourth consecutive decline, and the price of new homes fell 3 per cent from a year ago. With a flood of new properties coming on to the market, at the present pace of sales, it will take 6.3 months to clear the backlog.

Economists have long been expecting a slowdown and some have predicted declines in prices. “New home sales are softening fast,” said Celia Chen, a housing expert at Economy.com. “Affordability has declined to a near 15-year low. Rising mortgage interest rates and rising house prices are constraining demand.”

Ian Morris, economist at HSBC, said: “Over the next 12 months we suspect a hard landing is more likely.” But there had been regional factors in the slowdown. Sales fell in the west but rose in the midwest and north-east.

The rising stock of unsold houses could lower prices still further. Research at HSBC suggests that seven months’ supply of unsold housing will mean a soft landing for the market. But if the figure rises towards nine months it will be a hard landing.

New-Home Sales Tumble 10.5%; Durable-Goods Picture Is Mixed (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Sales of new homes in February took the biggest one-month drop in nearly nine years as inventories soared, in the latest sign that the housing market is cooling. Meanwhile, a separate report used to forecast the health of the manufacturing sector offered a mixed reading.

DOJ_NMG_0022101

The Commerce Department Friday said newly built single-family homes sold at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.080 million units in February, a 10.5% drop after a revised 5.3% decline one month earlier. The February drop was the largest since the same percentage decrease occurred in April 1997.

The new-home data followed Thursday's more optimistic report on existing-home sales. The National Association of Realtors said sales of previously occupied homes, which account for about 85% of the residential market, climbed 5.2% in February. Economists, however, suspect sales were inflated by unusually warm weather.

The reality regarding the state of housing demand "is probably somewhere in between the two reports," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital Markets. Economists point out that the new-home sales series is extremely volatile during the first few months of the year. Mr. Stanley added that such huge monthly increases and declines aren't uncommon and there usually are significant revisions to the data.

Still, "the main message is that new-home sales are coming off at a faster clip than we had expected," said Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. That was illuminated this past week when KB Home, one of the nation's largest home builders, said new-home orders fell 12% during its first quarter ended Feb. 28.

In a separate report, the Commerce Department Friday said new orders for durable goods -- vehicles, machinery, appliances and other items intended to last more than three years -- rose a greater-than-expected 2.6% to $215.8 billion in February. That is up from a revised 8.9% plunge a month earlier.

Economists say the durable-goods picture tends to be muddled because month-to-month changes can be extreme, particularly in the areas of defense and aircraft. Indeed, the February increase was fueled by a 52.5% rise in civilian aircraft orders and a 104.1% rise in defense orders. Also, the January plunge stemmed from a 70.1% decline in civilian aircraft orders.

Stripping out the volatile transportation category, new orders for durable goods declined 1.3% in February, following gains of 1.6% in January and 1.9% in December. Orders for motor vehicles dropped 3.3% in February after a 3.2% decline in January. Meanwhile, nondefense capital-goods orders excluding aircraft -- considered an important indicator of future business-equipment investment -- fell 2.3%. Though the decline follows a four-month cumulative increase of more than 6%, some economists were nevertheless disappointed.

"While nothing is falling apart, there is clearly a softening on the domestic variables that influence manufacturing," said Cliff Waldman, economist for Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI.

In the new-home sales report, economists said the most troubling factor was the severe climb in inventories. There were about 548,000 homes for sale at the end of February, representing a 6.3 months' supply at the current sales rate. That is up from a 5.3 months' supply a month earlier. Some pointed out that this could have reflected an increasing number of speculators putting homes on the market.

The median sales price of a new home declined to $230,400 in February from $234,200 a month earlier, while the average sales price rose to $296,700 from $287,200.

New-Home Sales Rise In Region (LAT)

By Annette Haddad

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

While the U.S. posts a 10.5% month-to-month fall, Southern California records a 9.5% gain.

In what's increasingly becoming a tale of widely divergent regional real estate markets, Southern California's new-home sector is holding up much better than other parts of the nation and even the rest of the state.

The latest evidence came Friday when the Commerce Department reported that the number of new single-family homes sold nationwide fell 10.5% last month from the month before, to an annual rate of 1.08 million units, marking the biggest drop in new-home sales in nearly nine years.

The drop pushed a gauge of the volume of unsold new homes to its highest level in more than a decade. In February, 548,000 new homes went unsold, representing a 6.3-month supply — meaning it would take that long to sell them at current sales rates. In January, there was a 5.3-month supply.

In the West, which includes California, the sales plunge was even worse: down 29.4%, partly reflecting stalling sales in Sacramento and the Central Valley and in other Western states such as Arizona.

Yet in Southern California, sales of new single-family houses and condominiums saw their strongest February since 1988, according to statistics compiled by real estate research firm DataQuick Information Systems. Last month, sales rose 9.5% to 4,980 from January's 4,550, and were up 19% from the year before.

By comparison, new-home sales in the Sacramento area have been much weaker, DataQuick said. Although sales there were up 13% in February from the previous month, that was after January marked the worst month in six years. As many new homes were sold in December as in January and February combined, according to DataQuick. And sales plunged 45% in February from the year before.

What's more, the inventory of unsold new homes in Southern California, although rising, is below levels elsewhere in the West and in the nation.

In February, there was a 2.1-month supply of unsold new homes from Ventura County to the Mexican border, said Steve Johnson, director of the Southern California region for real estate consulting firm MetroStudy. Around Phoenix, there's three times the inventory available.

The reason for the difference: There has been less home building in much of Southern California, thanks largely to tight governmental regulations and a lack of available land.

"We just don't have much excess supply," Johnson said.

The Southland housing market also is holding up better because its economy is more diverse and job creation remains strong, thanks in part to growth in such sectors as tourism, trade and aerospace. The region also is proving to be less volatile because the presence of real estate speculators has been less than in other hot markets.

However, the Southland's February inventory of unsold homes was up 80% from a year earlier, Johnson said, suggesting that demand here was cooling nonetheless.

"Builders used to be able to take the 'Field of Dreams' approach — built it and they will come," Johnson said. "Now they have to do their homework and evaluate the market more carefully."

One thing builders are finding is that rising home prices, coupled with rising mortgage rates, are tempering the ardor of prospective buyers, experts said.

Many Southland builders are working to adjust their strategies to accommodate the more-reticent attitude of buyers.

They are building smaller homes, such as condominiums and town homes, or converting existing apartment units into for-sale housing, which are usually priced lower than single-family houses.

Builders also have scaled back the number of homes released for sale at their new-home communities. "Builders will shift their mix of products to accommodate the market," said John Karevoll, chief analyst for DataQuick.

That has helped local builders avoid having to offer discounts or other concessions to stoke buyer demand. At certain new-home communities in Sacramento, for instance, builders slashed prices to close sales.

"The Sacramento market went up very quickly, perhaps too quickly," said Patrick Duffy, a market analyst for Hanley Wood Market Intelligence.

Builders in Southern California, he said, generally are reluctant to offer price cuts or free upgrades.

"It's like car dealers," Duffy said. "Once you start offering incentives, then everybody starts expecting them."

Stocks Rise Slightly Ahead Of Fed Meeting (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Stocks inched higher, as investors did some last-minute fine-tuning of their portfolios before an impending meeting of Federal Reserve policy makers.

Economic data from the Commerce Department contributed to the gains, after a seesaw day of trading. Durable-goods orders rose 2.6% in February, better than analysts expected.

DOJ_NMG_0022103

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rose 9.68 points, or 0.1%, to 11279.97, nearly unchanged for the week and within reach of a six-year high. Boeing and United Technologies were among the Dow's strongest components, helped by the durable-goods data.

The government also reported that new-home sales plunged 10.5% in February, the biggest drop in almost nine years.

Although that might sound like bad news, it was something of a welcome sign for investors hoping the Fed will limit further interest-rate increases, convinced the economy isn't overheating. Higher interest rates typically are a negative for the stock market because they increase costs for businesses and consumers.

"Investors are reasonably comfortable with what's going on," said Robert E. Weissenstein, managing director at Credit Suisse Securities LLC. "They're focused on the positive aspects of the housing market slowing down, not the negatives."

The Fed's rate-setting committee, which meets Monday and Tuesday, is expected to raise its target short-term rate by a quarter percentage point to 4.75%. But Wall Street has been busy guessing how far the Fed will go beyond that level. Federal-funds futures indicate investors expect one more increase in May, bringing the rate to 5%.

Other stock indicators followed the Dow higher. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also gained 0.1%, or 1.28 points, to end at 1302.95, off 0.3% on the week.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 0.6%, or 12.67, to close at 2312.82, up 0.3% on the week. Talk of a possible merger of Lucent Technologies and Alcatel helped the tech sector, as did Thursday night's news that Google will be added to the S&P 500.

Holding stocks in check all week was a gradual rise in oil futures; they rose 2.4% on the week, to $64.26 a barrel. In major U.S. market action:

Stock1 and bond prices2 rose. The 10-year Treasury note gained 17/32, or $5.31 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.673%. The 30-year bond gained 30/32 to yield 4.693%.

The dollar weakened3, to 117.45 yen from 117.90 yen; the euro rose to $1.2036 from $1.1974.

U.S. Stocks Rise As Home Sales Ease Fed Concern; Lucent Gains (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, March 24, 2006

March 24 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks rose after the biggest reported drop in new-home sales since 1997 and falling orders for business equipment diminished the risk that the Federal Reserve will persist in raising interest rates.

``Hopefully this puts a ceiling on where the Fed ultimately goes," said Wendell Perkins, who helps manage $1.3 billion at Johnson Asset Management in Racine, Wisconsin. ``This, generally, would be a positive" for the market, he said.

Phone-equipment makers rallied after Alcatel SA said it may buy Lucent Technologies Inc. for at least $12.6 billion. Again in oil prices lifted energy shares. Google Inc. climbed after being picked to join the Standard & Poor's 500 Index.

Losses for retailers and real-estate developers, among industries affected most by higher rates, limited the advance and left indexes little changed for the week. Fed policy makers will meet next week.

The S&P 500 rose 1.28, or 0.1 percent, to 1302.95. The Dow Jones Industrial Average added 9.68, or 0.1 percent, to 11,279.97. Google's gain aided the Nasdaq Composite Index, which advanced 12.67, or 0.6 percent, to 2312.82.

This week, the S&P 500 slipped 0.3 percent, while the Dow industrials rose less than 1 point. The Nasdaq added 0.3 percent. All three have gained more than 4 percent so far this year as investors bet profit growth will outpace gains in borrowing costs.

Interest Rates

Remarks by Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke and a report on producer prices earlier in the week increased speculation the Fed will keep raising rates past midyear. Data yesterday showing that sales of existing homes unexpectedly rose in February had reinforced those expectations. The Fed will boost the main U.S. interest rate a 15th time to 4.75 percent on March 28, according to all except two of 90 economists surveyed by Bloomberg.

DOJ_NMG_0022104

A U.S. Commerce Department report today indicated the housing market is cooling after a five-year boom. New-home sales fell 10.5 percent last month to an annual rate of 1.08 million, the biggest drop since April 1997, from a revised 1.207 million in January. The number of homes for sale rose to a record 548,000 from January's 525,000.

Excluding more-volatile transportation items, factory orders for equipment made to last at least several years fell 1.3 percent last month, the biggest drop since July, according to another Commerce Department report.

Lucent

Lucent, the largest U.S. maker of phone equipment, jumped 24 cents, or 8.5 percent, to $3.06. Alcatel, the biggest maker of broadband Internet gear, may buy Lucent to create a communications-equipment company with combined sales of more than $25 billion. Alcatel American depositary receipts, each representing one regular share, added 25 cents to $15.70.

Lucent had the biggest gain in the S&P 500, followed by phone-equipment makers Tellabs Inc. and Ciena Corp. Tellabs advanced $1.11, or 7.8 percent, to $15.35, while Ciena rose 34 cents, or 7.1 percent, to $5.15. Nortel Networks Corp., North America's largest telephone-equipment maker, added 12 cents to $2.93.

A gauge of energy shares gained 0.6 percent for the largest advance among 10 industry group in the S&P 500. Chevron Corp., the No. 2 U.S. oil company, rose 94 cents to $57.57. BJ Services Co., an oilfield contractor, rose 51 cents to $33.52. Crude for May delivery climbed 0.6 percent to $64.26 a barrel in New York.

Google

Google added $23.91, or 7 percent, to $365.80. The most- used Internet search engine will replace Burlington Resources Inc., an oil producer being sold to ConocoPhillips, on March 31. Google fell 18 percent this year before being tapped for the index amid concern growth may slow.

Google had a market value of $101.6 billion at the close of trading yesterday, while Burlington was worth $33.9 billion.

``Indexers have to raise money to pay for Google because the market cap for Google is substantially higher than the name coming out," said Peter Boockvar, equity strategist at Miller Tabak & Co. in New York. To do that, funds that track the S&P 500's performance have to pare their stakes in the other 499 companies in the benchmark, which may pressure the index, he added. ``This is how the game works."

Retailers and real-estate companies slid ahead of the Fed's meeting next week.

A gauge of retailers dropped 0.6 percent for the biggest decline among 24 groups in the S&P 500. Home Depot Inc., the No. 1 home-improvement retailer, fell 69 cents to $43.12. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the biggest retailer in the world, slipped 35 cents to $48.19.

Real-Estate Companies

A measure of real-estate companies slid 0.5 percent, extending its drop for the week to 3 percent. Vornado Realty Trust, a property owner with investments in retailers including Sears Holdings Corp. and Toys ``R" Us Inc., slumped 44 cents to $95.41. Archstone-Smith Trust, an apartment developer, lost 50 cents to $48.20.

The durable-goods-orders data pressured some industrial companies. Caterpillar Inc., the world's largest maker of earthmoving equipment, slumped 76 cents, or 1 percent, to $75.50 for the second-biggest drop in the Dow average.

Tim Hortons Inc. surged $5.01, or 22 percent, to $28.17 in the stock's debut. The No. 1 Canadian doughnut chain had the biggest North American initial public offering in nine months. Wendy's International Inc., which owns Tim Hortons, had the third-biggest decline in the S&P 500, falling $2.08, or 3.2 percent, to $62.93.

About seven stocks advanced for every four that declined on the New York Stock Exchange. Some 1.46 billion shares changed hands on the Big Board, 12 percent less than the three-month daily average.

Cephalon Slides

Cephalon Inc. dropped $9.51, or 13 percent, to $63.80 after its drug for attention deficit disorder in children was deemed not safe enough by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to be put on the market. Credit Suisse cut its price forecast on the stock to $70 from $86, citing the decision.

Apollo Group Inc. lost $2.12, or 4 percent, to $51.60 for the second-biggest drop in the S&P 500. The No. 1 U.S. for- profit education company's share-price estimate was cut to $62 from $66 by Morgan Stanley analyst Chris Gutek, who wrote that declining enrollment was ``troubling."

Iran's Nuclear Steps Quicken, Diplomats Say (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin And Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Tehran reportedly is gearing up for uranium enrichment. A split in the Security Council may impede efforts to halt the program.

VIENNA — With efforts to halt its nuclear program at an impasse, Iran is moving faster than expected and is just days from making the first steps toward enriching uranium, said diplomats who have been briefed on the program.

If engineers encounter no major technical problems, Iran could manufacture enough highly enriched uranium to build a bomb within three years, much more quickly than the common estimate of five to 10 years, the diplomats said.

Iran insists that it is interested only in producing electricity, which requires low-grade enrichment of uranium.

New information about Iran's program came from diplomats representing countries on the United Nations Security Council. They were briefed by senior staff of the International Atomic Energy Agency, which maintains monitors in Iran. The diplomats spoke on condition of anonymity because the briefing was private.

Even as Iran apparently moves forward, diplomatic efforts to persuade it to halt its nuclear work appeared to be faltering in the face of distrust among powerful Security Council members and disagreements over the best strategy.

"We're getting conflicting signals from the United States; it now appears they want to escalate the situation," said a senior diplomat in Vienna. "The Russians see that as a slippery slope."

Officials said Iran was on the verge of feeding uranium gas into centrifuges, the first step toward enrichment. That move is in keeping with Iran's experience level and its previous statements, experts said.

According to one non-Western official who closely follows Iran's progress, engineers at a pilot plant in Natanz are likely to start crucial testing in the next couple of days to ensure that the centrifuges and the pipes connecting them are properly vacuum sealed. They are likely to begin feeding uranium hexafluoride gas into a series of 164 connected centrifuges within about two weeks, the official said.

Diplomats and experts say Iran has forgone usual testing periods for individual centrifuges and small series of linked centrifuges, instead apparently trying to put together as many as possible, as quickly as possible.

They said Iran also was likely to begin assembling more centrifuges in mid-April to put together additional cascades of linked centrifuges. The pilot plant can hold up to six cascades of 164 centrifuges each. It could take many months to complete that work, the diplomats said.

The U.S. and its British, French and German allies believe Iran intends to build nuclear weapons, and must be stopped before learning how to enrich uranium. They view the ability to operate a series of centrifuges as a technological tipping point.

"If you can do one centrifuge, you can do 164," said Emyr Jones Parry, British envoy to the U.N. "If you can do 164, you probably can do many more. That means you have the potential to do full-scale enrichment. If you can do enrichment up to 7%, you can do 80%. If you can do 80%, you can produce a bomb."

Policymakers watching Iran's program are making two separate assessments: a technical one based on Iran's ability to enrich uranium and a political judgment on whether Iran is attempting to make a bomb or merely trying to enrich uranium to a low level for civilian purposes, as Iranian officials insist.

The three-year time frame for Iran to produce a bomb cited by diplomats is the same as an estimate by former nuclear weapons inspector David Albright.

In a paper that will be released Monday by the Institute for Science and International Security, which Albright founded, he and a colleague give a detailed description of how, under a best-case scenario, Iran would be able to manufacture enough highly enriched uranium for a crude nuclear device in three years. Albright cautioned, however, that Iran faces many technical hurdles it might find difficult to overcome.

Gary S. Samore, a former nonproliferation expert at the National Security Council, now at the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation, also said it was far more likely that the Iranians would encounter problems and that it could take them four to five years.

If Iran decides to make highly enriched uranium, it would need either to do so clandestinely, or leave the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which prohibits signatories from producing highly enriched uranium.

The IAEA board of governors reported Iran to the Security Council for failing to respond to requests from inspectors for information about its program, which it kept hidden for 18 years.

All the members of the Security Council agree that Iran should not be permitted to produce a bomb. Under an agreement with Russia and China, the council only began to discuss Tehran's case in mid-March. The next steps are hotly disputed.

The European Union and the Americans want to exert vigorous pressure on Iran. They insist on a reinstatement of a total moratorium on uranium enrichment that Iran had voluntarily put in place in late 2004 while negotiating with the EU. The U.S. and EU are willing to use a U.N. procedure that gives Security Council resolutions the force of law, and to impose sanctions.

The Russians and the Chinese, mindful of the buildup to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq three years ago, fear that taking too hard a line would lead to an escalation of tensions that could result in military action against Iran. They believe that sanctions and other measures might push Iran to abandon the nonproliferation treaty, which keeps international inspectors in the country.

Russia and China would be willing to allow Iran to retain a small cascade of centrifuges for research purposes.

The difference among the permanent Security Council members suggest it could be a long time before they reach a consensus.

"I don't think anyone can predict if there will be serious action in the Security Council," said Stephen G. Rademaker, acting assistant secretary of State for security and nonproliferation, in an interview this week.

The U.S. and its allies face the difficulty of allaying Russian suspicion that reporting Iran to the Security Council was a way to make the case for military action.

"The Russian concern is with the medium- and long-term plan: 'Where's it going?' " said a diplomat from a European Union country. "Even though we say military action is not an option, they have a concern that we're going down a route that ends up in a single place."

The diplomat said the West's counter-argument is that moving ahead in a unified way sends a signal that the five powerful permanent members of the Security Council are united and that Iran needs to listen.

However, getting Russia on board probably will be more difficult after a letter written by John Sawers of the British Foreign Office to his counterparts in the United States, France and German, was leaked this week. The letter touched on several issues, including the need for the U.S. to be involved in a package of incentives for Iran to halt its uranium enrichment, but it also made it clear that the U.S. and its European partners jointly were negotiating a position without consulting the Russians and Chinese.

"Moscow is unlikely to agree to anything devised behind its back and then presented as the sole solution possible," said Russian Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov.

In the meantime, the situation is changing daily as the Iranians move ahead.

"We're getting to the point where this fundamental difference between the U.S. and EU position and that of the Russians is being overtaken by Iran's … putting new facts on the ground," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a nuclear nonproliferation expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, who previously worked for the U.S. State Department on nuclear issues. "Iran is closer and closer to enrichment, so the effort to deny them the capability is rapidly failing."

Rice To Tour Europe Next Week For Talks On Iran: Sources (AFP)

AFP, March 25, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Europe next week for talks to be dominated by the dispute over Iran's nuclear program, diplomatic sources said.

The trip will begin Thursday in Germany and also take in France and Britain -- the three European Union countries that had led negotiations to press Iran to suspend all uranium-enrichment activities.

The German government confirmed that Rice would meet Chancellor Angela Merkel and Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier in Berlin Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0022107

Government spokesman Thomas Steg told a press conference that their talks would cover a wide range of topics, including the Iranian nuclear crisis.

He said Rice's trip would also help prepare the way for Merkel's next visit to the United States in May when she is to attend the 100th anniversary celebrations for the American Jewish Committee in New York.

No press conference has been scheduled as yet during Rice's visit to Berlin.

Rice last came to Germany in December at the height of the controversy over European countries' reported involvement in clandestine CIA flights.

The diplomatic sources said Rice would stay in Berlin for a few hours Thursday before continuing on to Paris and then London.

Rice displayed impatience Thursday with slow UN talks on Iran's nuclear activities.

"There is no time for delay in taking on this issue," Rice said of the discussions on a draft UN Security Council statement on Iran that has faced objections from Russia and China.

"There can't be any stalling. The international community has got to act."

A Western diplomat said Thursday that the UN Security Council would not reach agreement this week on a Franco-British statement demanding that Iran suspend all uranium-enrichment activities.

The diplomat, who asked not to be named, said the council's five veto-wielding permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States -- were too far apart for a deal to be sealed this week.

Washington and its European allies have been pressing Tehran to suspend its uranium-enrichment activities and return to negotiations on economic and other incentives for abandoning any nuclear weapons aspirations.

Iran Dispute 'long Way' From Military Solution: US Army Chief (AFP)

AFP, March 24, 2006

The top US military officer said here that Washington does not consider military action as an immediate option to resolve the dispute over Iran's nuclear program.

"Iran is a long way from needing any kind of military solution," General Peter Pace, the chairman of the US joint chiefs of staff, said in an interview with the NTV news channel during a visit to Turkey.

"The United Kingdom, France, Germany, Russia-- other countries, certainly the Turkish government -- are all working to persuade the Iranian government to function in a way that is not dangerous or threatening to its neighbors, to have power, but not nuclear weapons power.

"There are many more things to be done politically and diplomatically before anybody, any country, considers some kind of a military option," he said.

Pace denied media speculation that the United States might be seeking the use of Turkish military bases for a possible strike on Iran, Turkey's eastern neighbor.

Earlier in the day, Pace addressed a conference on global terrorism in Ankara, and on Thursday met Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan and the chief of general staff, General Hilmi Ozkok.

Sharon's Spirit, And Absence, Pervade Election (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

JERUSALEM, March 24 — On Ariel Sharon's 78th birthday a few weeks ago, those closest to him joined his two sons around the bedside where he lies, silent and comatose, in a hospital on a hill high above Jerusalem. They chatted and ate cake made by a friend of his late wife, Lily, using her recipe.

Uri Dan, a Sharon intimate and chronicler since 1954, was among them. "The Jewish Caesar is there alive," he said. People come up to Mr. Dan all the time to express their pain, he said.

"They knew they could sleep at night because he was not sleeping, that there was someone to guide the Zionist ship in a sea full of mines," he said. "They feel that the captain is gone."

DOJ_NMG_0022108

Nearly three months after Mr. Sharon's major stroke on Jan. 4, his spirit hangs over this Israeli election, as the country prepares to give its verdict on Tuesday on Kadima, the centrist party he created.

Ehud Olmert, the acting prime minister, leaves Mr. Sharon's big chair empty at the center of the cabinet table and does not use the prime minister's office. Mr. Sharon's huge photo is wrapped around the suburban headquarters of Kadima, whose name means "forward," and the party's e-mail messages still come from kadimasharon.co.il.

Yet the image of Mr. Sharon, so recently considered the indispensable figure in Israeli politics, has now faded from the advertisements and even the television programs.

Mr. Olmert has carefully tried to extract himself from Mr. Sharon's huge shadow, forced by politics to create his own identity as a prime minister, and not just as a clever, cigar-smoking aide. He and Kadima pay every due respect to their fallen leader.

But it is their opposition, especially the Likud Party that Mr. Sharon broke apart, that uses Mr. Sharon's image more to portray the former general, whom the rump Likud battled to the end and regarded as a betrayer, as a heroic figure in contrast with their present foe, Mr. Olmert.

"Olmert's real race wasn't against the opposition," said Aluf Benn, a political correspondent for the daily Haaretz. "It was against the shadow, the candidate who isn't here: Sharon." By now, he said, "the public doesn't talk about Sharon very much."

But Mr. Sharon's absence has probably cost Kadima at least six parliamentary seats. His illness and a less dynamic group of contenders seem to have taken the passion out of an election that is about important issues, including the next Israeli pullout from the West Bank. Kadima is still well ahead in the polls, though complacency and an expected low voter turnout could hurt it.

Mr. Sharon is missed in the alleys of the Mahane Yehuda market, where Jerusalemites were shopping for the weekend amid the smells of spices, baking bread and freshly butchered meat.

"I think about him all the time," Leah Nakash, 70, said when asked about Mr. Sharon. She stopped to squeeze some tomatoes, then said: "I hope he'll get better, but I think there's no hope. We pray for him."

She would have voted for Mr. Sharon at the head of Kadima without a second thought, she said. Now, she is not so sure, torn between Mr. Olmert's Kadima and Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud. "It wasn't a very safe country with Sharon," Mrs. Nakash said. "But now, it's a little more dangerous."

Yitzik Sasson, 51, has four children and lives in the settlement of Qiryat Arba, where he works in security. He said that he had moved there less for ideology than for cheap housing, but that he would also have voted for Mr. Sharon. Now he is torn between Mr. Olmert's Kadima and Avigdor Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu, a hawkish Russian-oriented party that wants to swap Arab Israeli towns for West Bank settlements.

Mr. Sharon has a great legacy, Mr. Sasson said, and the country is somber, but life continues. "Of course, I hope he'll get better," he said. "But he won't return to anything."

At first, Mr. Sharon's image was everywhere, and Kadima's first television spots emphasized his stewardship and his "team." But by the end of January, the party jingle was "Kadima Israel," not, as planned, "Kadima Sharon."

Eyal Arad, one of Mr. Sharon's closest political advisers, continues to advise Kadima. "Sharon founded Kadima, selected the people and Ehud Olmert to be his deputy," Mr. Arad said. Inside the new party, "there's a strong commitment to continue what he started to make happen," he said. "The emotional commitment is stronger than what you usually get in campaigns."

The focus groups continue to show strong attachment to Mr. Sharon, Mr. Arad said, as a guarantor of security. "Now he's gone, people wonder, 'What will happen to us?' They're looking for someone not with a particular policy statement, but someone who can continue the same path as Sharon."

The effort has been to portray Mr. Olmert and his team "as good enough people to follow in the footsteps of Sharon," Mr. Arad said. "People liked the center, and Sharon promised to build them a home there. They liked the builder. But the wish for the center and the liking of the plans doesn't disappear."

But there is less passion.

Mr. Dan, Mr. Sharon's friend and defender, is fiercely hopeful. Israel is "a country of at least a miracle a day," he said. "And we may find ourselves one day coming to Sharon, 80 and recovered, and asking him, 'Can you get us out of this mess?' "

But Idan Haroush, 23, like most Israelis, has no such faith. He works in his family's hardware shop; he wears an earring and a sweatshirt reading, "No Bad Power!"

DOJ_NMG_0022109

"I'm very patriotic," he said. "I think about what Sharon did for the country. But Sharon is history, I'm sorry to say it."

As Israel Votes, Sharon's Vision Is Taking Hold (WSJ)

'Disengagement' Becomes The Best Hope for Security For Many Weary of Violence

JERUSALEM -- When Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon became incapacitated in January, his political agenda looked as if could suffer a similar fate.

But as Israeli voters prepare to go to the polls on Tuesday, Mr. Sharon's controversial vision for Israel has done more than survive. Kadima, the political party he created just weeks before suffering a brain hemorrhage, may score a sweeping victory, according to polls. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, previously Mr. Sharon's little-noticed deputy, is poised to ride Mr. Sharon's legacy to the prime minister's office.

That could mean important changes in Israeli policies, especially concerning relations with the Palestinians. And it could present new challenges for the U.S. and Europe when it comes to Middle East peacemaking. Under the 60-year-old Mr. Olmert's surprisingly assertive leadership, Kadima is pushing forward Mr. Sharon's ideas for reshaping Israel's future faster and more forcefully than Mr. Sharon did.

The party, whose name means "forward" in Hebrew, has embraced an idea that just a few years ago was so controversial few Israeli politicians spoke openly about its full implications for Israelis, Palestinians and the international community. Dubbed "disengagement," the idea is straightforward: Israel can't expect to negotiate a deal with the Palestinians or to crush them militarily, so it must separate from them by drawing its own borders based on what's best for Israel.

Mr. Sharon rarely spelled out what that could mean -- certainly not with the clarity Mr. Olmert has adopted. The notion of unilaterally setting borders flies in the face of decades of internationally backed Middle East peacemaking efforts. Those efforts, including the Bush administration's signature "road map" initiative, envision Israelis and Palestinians eventually negotiating mutually acceptable borders for two states with intertwined economies and a shared capital in Jerusalem.

The idea is also not simple to implement. Among the roughly seven million people of Israel, it almost certainly invites a nasty brawl, politically and literally, with supporters of nearly a quarter-million Jews who have settled in the West Bank during the decades of occupation. Many of those settlements would have to be dismantled to create the borders Kadima now favors drawing unilaterally. For the nearly four million Palestinians, it would mean having Israel impose frontiers that cut through land where they live and work without consulting or compensating them.

Some large settlements that Mr. Olmert has vowed Israel will keep jut far into the West Bank, cutting Palestinian cities off from one another. And for all sides it could mean managing a downward-spiraling Palestinian economy that leaves more Palestinians angry and, perhaps, violent.

A few analysts argue disengagement might lead in the end to a better solution for all sides. It would begin to roll back settlement expansion that has inflamed Palestinians for years. And if Hamas, the militant group swept to power in recent Palestinian elections, focuses more attention on Palestinians and less on attacking Israel, both sides could wind up curtailing the activities most provocative to the other. "You'll have two parallel processes," says Asher Susser, director of the Moshe Dayan Center for Middle Eastern and African Studies at Tel Aviv University. "Maybe in the end a better result emerges than you could get through negotiations."

But others worry that aggressive unilateral moves by Israel to set borders could enrage Arab governments, isolate Israel and subvert what has long been considered the only viable end game -- two states with mutually agreed borders.

For many Kadima supporters, the immediate goal is security. They don't see how negotiations or military force has made them safer. And Mr. Sharon, a longtime security hawk and settlements advocate, offered them a decisive way out.

Disengagement remains so closely associated with Mr. Sharon that supporters sometimes talk as if Mr. Sharon were still heading Kadima. "I wouldn't have voted for him in the past, but I like the path Sharon took," said Osnat Acker, a 24-year-old student from Jerusalem, at a Kadima rally where huge posters of Messrs. Sharon and Olmert hung side by side in large hall.

"The last few years have been the worst. Sharon opened a way to end this situation. I'm pessimistic it will end, but if someone opens a gate, we have to try to go through it."

Many predicted that Kadima -- which Mr. Sharon formed by luring high-profile politicians from both the left-leaning Labor and right-leaning Likud parties -- would crumble without Mr. Sharon's forceful and popular personality at the helm. After Mr. Sharon's stroke, Mr. Olmert and a team of Mr. Sharon's longtime advisers held the party together by twisting arms behind the scenes and laying out the disengagement vision with a clarity and forcefulness Mr. Sharon himself never dared.

"Olmert has taken it much, much further than Sharon," said Avraham Diskin, a political scientist at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Disengagement might never have taken hold without Mr. Sharon. The son of Russian immigrants, he is a former general who participated in all of Israel's wars. As defense minister, he orchestrated Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982. He lost that job after an Israeli inquiry held him "indirectly responsible" for the massacre of Palestinian refugees by Israeli-allied Christian militiamen in a Beirut camp.

In and out of government, Mr. Sharon was a huge supporter of Israel's settlers. He encouraged thousands of Jews to move to the Palestinian-dominated West Bank and Gaza Strip, helping transform the settlement enterprise into a national and religious movement from the mid-1970s on.

Mr. Sharon became prime minister in 2001 as a period of relative calm between Palestinians and Israelis was coming unraveled. It was the fruitless end of a decade-long negotiation between the two sides that had become known as the Oslo Process. Mr. Sharon bitterly opposed it as offering far too much to the Palestinians.

His first years in office saw a spiral of violence. Radical Palestinian groups tapped what seemed like an endless reservoir of suicide bombers to kill Israelis. Israelis re-extended a taxing military occupation of Palestinian territory. Israel methodically assassinated the leaders of terrorist groups, sometimes hitting Palestinian bystanders in the strikes.

Then, in late 2003, came rumblings of change. Mr. Sharon sent his deputy, Mr. Olmert, to represent him at an annual commemoration day for Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. In his speech, Mr. Olmert raised eyebrows with a vague call for Israeli leaders capable of making "a painful compromise."

His speech was widely viewed as a trial balloon -- Mr. Sharon testing public reaction to an explosive idea. Behind the scenes, he and his inner circle had decided on a plan that would be bitterly divisive for Israelis: dismantling all 21 settlements in Gaza. Containing about 8,000 Jews among about 1.3 million Palestinians, the settlements were simply too draining for Israel to defend, Mr. Sharon believed.

The notion of separating Israelis from the Palestinians had bubbled beneath the surface prior to this. Mr. Sharon had backed construction of a security barrier that attempted to divide the two populations -- and that helped reduce the number of suicide attacks. But Mr. Sharon always described the barrier -- a combination of walls, fences and checkpoints winding from north to south though the West Bank -- as merely a way to stop suicide bombers. When it cut deep into Palestinian-dominated areas, often dividing Palestinian towns and fields, he denied it constituted a border or had any political significance.

Mr. Sharon emptied Gaza and four West Bank enclaves of Jewish settlers in a tumultuous few weeks last year. Against expectations, his popularity rose among Israelis.

Still, many fellow conservatives, who cherished the settlers and saw any pullback as rewarding terrorists, were only beginning to realize the extent of Mr. Sharon's plans and his determination to carry them out. Some could scarcely believe one of the biggest backers of the settlement movement was now determined to clip its wings. Mr. Sharon made clear he had every intention of keeping the largest settlements. He also vowed to keep the whole of Jerusalem, which today is informally split into Israeli and Palestinian parts and contains holy sites for Jews, Muslims and Christians, though Israel controls the entire city.

When members of his own Likud Party challenged him late last year, however, Mr. Sharon again shocked Israelis by leaving a party he had been a part of for decades. He formed Kadima on Nov. 21, quickly pulling in important politicians from the Labor Party to go along with a cadre of conservatives who followed him out of Likud. Simultaneously, he began to prepare for next week's elections.

Within weeks, Mr. Sharon had reshaped Israel's political landscape. Then, on Dec. 18, he suffered a minor stroke. After a brief hospitalization, he was given a blood thinner and even went back to work, hammering out Kadima's lineup. But while resting on his farm in Southern Israel's Negev region on Jan. 4, Mr. Sharon suffered a massive brain hemorrhage. Israel was in crisis.

Mr. Olmert was named acting prime minister 20 minutes before midnight that evening. A highly defended motorcade picked him up at his home the next morning and whisked him to the prime minister's office. There, Mr. Olmert presided over an emergency meeting of the cabinet. Mr. Sharon's chair sat empty next to him.

Kadima had no plan for how to carry on without Mr. Sharon's towering presence. Even after Mr. Sharon's first stroke, discussion of a succession plan, "was like eating pork in a synagogue," said one senior Sharon adviser.

Kadima still had no finalized positions, no set list of candidates, not even an official No. 2 behind Mr. Sharon. Mr. Olmert wasn't particularly popular among Israelis, according to opinion polls taken before Mr. Sharon's incapacitation.

To prevent infighting, Mr. Olmert personally called members of Mr. Sharon's brain trust of private advisers and asked them to stay on. They urged Kadima members to remain on board. Kadima would crumble if they scurried back to their former parties now. Kadima needed, in the words of one Sharon adviser, "to stay in line."

The party overcame the immediate crisis a month later. With Mr. Sharon still unconscious, the dozen founding members of Kadima met behind closed doors in a room at the Knesset, Israel's parliament. There they voted unanimously to make Mr. Olmert Kadima's new leader, according to people familiar with the meeting.

Mr. Olmert, a lawyer who entered politics at age 28, had been mayor of Jerusalem for a decade before joining Mr. Sharon's government in 2003. Before Mr. Sharon's incapacitation, Mr. Olmert was an important player in Kadima, but hardly one of its more charismatic figures.

With the election just a few months away, Kadima strategists had been gearing up for a campaign built around Mr. Sharon -- especially his record as someone capable of leading Israelis down a difficult new path. They had also planned to be careful about outlining what exactly that meant.

Indeed, Mr. Sharon and his inner circle deliberately stopped short of even drafting a detailed internal plan for themselves. That would have involved naming settlements for evacuation, which would infuriate many Israelis. They also knew any talk of setting permanent borders unilaterally would encounter stiff resistance from the outside world, particularly Europe and the U.S. Mr. Sharon was a master of ambiguity, leaving all sides guessing but trustful enough to go along. Mr. Olmert and Kadima strategists soon decided that wouldn't work for him.

Another historic turn worked in favor of a more aggressive plan. In late January, Hamas won a sweeping victory in Palestinian elections. While Hamas stopped attacks in the past several months, the group still calls for the destruction of Israel. Potential Palestinian negotiating partners appeared further away than ever.

Kadima is now attempting to create a sense of a historic moment -- with Mr. Sharon still comatose but present in spirit at every turn in Kadima's campaign. Mr. Olmert now wants a clear electoral mandate for his plan to separate Israel from the Palestinians and draw permanent borders on Israel's terms.

Mr. Olmert has made clear that all but the biggest settlements outside the security barrier now under construction could find themselves outside Israel forever. Kadima, he states clearly, wants to set those borders within just a few years.

To gain support from the left, he has said that if a reasonable Palestinian negotiating partner emerges, he would negotiate those borders. To bolster his right, Mr. Olmert says the Israeli military would continue to occupy evacuated settlement lands so the Palestinians can't claim to have driven Jews from them. But he's hammered home that Kadima aims to establish permanent borders for Israel.

That message has resonated with voters so far. Recent polls show Kadima becoming the largest bloc in the Knesset, capturing perhaps as much as double the number of seats as Likud or Labor. Still, even with a strong showing, Kadima won't be able to rule without forming a coalition government. That could force Mr. Olmert to water down his agenda. Some predict the party will come unraveled as it tries to implement its plans in the years ahead.

Pollsters also caution that polls may not reflect the actual results. The number of undecided voters is unusually high, and it's unclear how many Israelis will turn out to vote in a campaign dominated by an untested new party.

But whatever the outcome, the appeal of separation isn't likely to evaporate with a Hamas-led government representing the Palestinians and an Israeli public tired of dealing with an occupation.

An Unloved Vote Winner (FT)

By Harvey Morris

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

If Ehud Olmert next week fulfills a life-long ambition to become prime minister of Israel, it will not be on the basis of his personal popularity. In a telling response to pollsters, evidently running out of questions to ask the public in one of the country's least animated election campaigns, only one in eight Israelis queried said they would want him as a dinner partner.

It is a statistic that might floor a more sensitive candidate. But Mr Olmert has grown a tough skin during an abrasive political career spanning more than four decades in which he has rarely gone out of his way to court the public's affection.

Comparing him with his nearest rivals, Labour's Amir Peretz and Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, Nadav Eyal, the daily Maariv's commentator, wrote: "The difference between him and the other two is that Olmert has never sought love. He just wants to win."

The acting prime minister is a career politician, a relatively rare phenomenon in a country that during its 58-year history has been principally governed at the top by a succession of founding fathers and ex-generals.

Absent is the whiff of cordite that trailed the likes of Ariel Sharon, perhaps the last example of a disappearing breed. Mr Olmert favours elegant suits, Havana cigars and a daily six-mile jog. It is a style perhaps better suited to a maturing Israeli state in which sociologists note the decline of ideology and the rise of a more hard-headed pragmatism, a longing for bourgeois normality in the midst of a deeply perceived existential threat.

The frontiersmen of the West Bank settlements, once fêted by rightwing politicians such as Mr Olmert, are rapidly going the way of the almost extinct socialist kibbutzniks as models of Zionist idealism.

So, even though they may not like him very much, enough Israelis are apparently prepared to vote for him next Tuesday as the standard-bearer of the new centrism to hand him sufficient seats to form the next coalition government. They probably would have preferred Mr Sharon as a safer and more experienced pair of hands. But the stroke that incapacitated the prime minister in January catapulted his successor into power earlier than had been expected.

The fact that his elevation owed more to accident than design did not mean, however, that it was one for which Mr Olmert had not long prepared. He is said to have dreamt of becoming prime minister since he was a boy growing up in the uncertain first decade of the new state, an ambition that was to win out over a parallel obsession with soccer.

He was born in 1945 to a Russian-born father and Ukrainian-born mother, activists in the militant rightwing Irgun that harried the British in the closing years of their mandate. His political home was the revisionist Herut party, a movement that brooded on the sidelines during the first three decades of Labour Zionist domination before coming to power in 1977 as the most ideological element of the rightist Likud bloc.

Unlike Mr Sharon, latest in a line of powerful mentors to whom he attached himself, Mr Olmert was a political princeling, heir to a pre-state tradition that dreamt of an Israel that would span both banks of the Jordan river. He was a member of the rightwing Betar youth movement and remains a loyal supporter of the Betar Jerusalem soccer team that bears its name. Mr Olmert, however, has travelled considerably further than many of his fellow fans, whose aggressive anti-Arabism has given the club a reputation for unbridled -jingoism.

While his political transformation in recent years is seen by some rivals as political opportunism, Mr Olmert never entirely fitted the mould of unreconstructed rightist. He first made his mark as a precocious 20-year-old, eight years before he was to become the youngest member of the Knesset, when he upbraided Menachem Begin, the veteran Herut leader, for losing six elections in a row and called on him to resign.

He was among those of Yitzhak Shamir's inner circle who in 1990 persuaded the then prime minister to start peace talks with the Palestinians and Israel's other Arab neighbours. A Herut heir, he married a committed leftwinger, the artist and writer Aliza Richter, of whom he joked: "Thirty five years of Aliza working on me are at last starting to bear fruit."

For a decade from 1993, Mr Olmert laboured in the relative backwater of the Jerusalem mayor's office after Mr Netanyahu, three years his junior, won the Likud leadership. He used his municipal role in part to promote the expansion of Jewish settlements around the city.

Mr Sharon summoned him back to national politics for the 2003 election, although the low 34th place he secured on the Likud electoral list was a reflection of his lack of popularity within the ruling party. He coveted the finance minister's post that went to Mr Netanyahu. But the consolation prize of the deputy premiership put him in poll position when Mr Sharon was felled by a stroke.

During Mr Sharon's second term, he emerged as the prime minister's most loyal ally and most trusted aide. He embraced and promoted Mr Sharon's politically risky plan to turn his back on a legacy of expansion and disengage unilaterally from Palestinian territories for which Israel had no long-term use. Both men argued it was the only way to preserve Israel's existence as both a democratic and Jewish state.

In some ways, Mr Olmert had moved beyond his mentor, who, despite a career aggressively promoting the settler cause, was ultimately seen as returning to his Labour Zionist roots.

Mr Olmert, who had long since burnt his bridges with much of the Likud leadership, is credited with encouraging Mr Sharon to abandon it and form the Kadima party as a platform for possible further territorial moves.

The new centrist faction has faltered slightly in opinion polls since Mr Sharon's exit from the political scene, but Mr Olmert's delicate handling of the succession has won him plaudits for statesmanship even among those who baulked in the past at his argumentative style.

He has declined to occupy the prime minister's seat until he earns it on his own merit and has been sparing in his usual sharp-tongued criticism of his rivals. His enemies on the right have nevertheless accused him of exploiting the Sharon legacy by posing as natural heir-apparent.

Apart from set-piece interviews, he has been remarkably absent from a generally low-key campaign. Perhaps it is the right approach towards an electorate that would not invite him for dinner.

Talk Of Peace Negotiations Has All But Ended In Israel (KRT)

By Dion Nissenbaum

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

BINYAMINA, Israel - Drora Vered is tired of fruitless peace talks with the Palestinians; so tired that she supports completion of the contentious separation barrier that slices through parts of the West Bank.

"I want a wall," Vered said as she threw up her hands in her living room. "We're here, you are there and a wall in between us until we meet again."

The 58-year-old tour guide's view is shared by many Israelis, who are expected to endorse a risky strategic shift in Israel's quest for security. Few people who are preparing to vote Tuesday talk about peace. Instead, they talk about giving the next government a green light to set Israel's boundaries without negotiating with the Palestinians.

Acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has said that within four years he wants to shut down the more remote Jewish communities in the predominantly Palestinian West Bank, formally absorb the bigger Jewish settlements around Jerusalem and retain a protective military presence in the occupied valley near Jordan.

The "convergence plan" being pushed by the fledgling Kadima party, now headed by Olmert, is proving to be popular with voters such as Vered. But even some supporters of this unilateral approach concede that ignoring the Palestinians isn't likely to lead to long-term peace, much less near-term stability.

"Unilateralism cannot forge a lasting peace," said Yossi Alpher, a former director of the Jaffe Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University who now runs the www.bitterlemons.org political Web site. "It can't forge any peace. Unilateralism creates a better territorial situation looking towards a peace process somewhere down the line."

Critics of the plan say it's likely to backfire. Instead of buying Israel a few years of stability, they warn, the idea of effectively seizing more West Bank land that's supposed to be part of a Palestinian state, walling Israel behind the separation barrier and retaining a military presence near Jordan will only inflame frustrations.

DOJ_NMG_0022114

"I absolutely don't think there is a unilateral solution that works," said Shibley Telhami, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy. "It works fine as a tactical argument, but it isn't going to solve even the immediate problems. I don't think that worsening economic and political conditions in the Palestinian areas are going to be helpful to the Israelis."

In fact, Telhami said, a second settlement pullout could end up further empowering Hamas, the Islamist militant group that now dominates the Palestinian Authority. Hamas has argued that its suicide-bombing strategy was a main reason that Israel withdrew from the predominantly Palestinian Gaza Strip last summer.

Edward Abington, a former U.S. consul general who's now advising Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, said the plan as laid out by Olmert did little more than create more politically palatable Israeli domination.

"What the Israelis are saying is they've given up on any idea of any kind of agreement leading to statehood with the Palestinians," Abington said. "What they have settled on instead is reorganizing the occupation in a way where, by Israeli calculations, they will be more secure and suffer less in the way of casualties. It's not stable."

Unilateralism has quickly become Israel's populist political movement. And, for the first time, Israelis will have a chance to formally endorse the idea.

When Ariel Sharon became prime minister in 2001, he publicly rebuffed talk of abandoning some 250,000 Jews living in disputed West Bank and Gaza Strip settlements amid millions of Palestinians under Israeli military rule.

So many people were shocked in 2004 when Sharon unveiled his plan to raze all 21 Jewish settlements in the Gaza Strip and end Israel's military presence in the coastal region, which is home to 1.3 million Palestinians.

Israel's pullout from Gaza last summer won broad support from the Israeli public, and Sharon was considering a similar plan for the West Bank when his political career was cut short by a debilitating stroke in January.

Olmert, then Sharon's second-in-command, stepped in as acting prime minister and leader of the new breakaway Kadima party, which is expected to win the most parliamentary seats Tuesday.

Olmert has made it clear that he'll form a coalition government only with smaller political parties that support the idea of a partial West Bank pullout.

"I want to make this clear, so that no one is in any doubt: I intend to implement this plan," Olmert told Israeli television last week. "Anyone who does not wish this plan to be implemented will not be in my coalition. I do not intend to compromise on the details of the plan. This is the plan, and there is no other."

The idea of going it alone has gained greater cachet since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Authority through elections in January.

Hamas has ruled out recognizing Israel as a nation, much less negotiating with it. That's allowed Israeli politicians to shun Hamas as a potential partner and has given more credence to the unilateral proposal.

Miri Eisin, a former intelligence officer in the Israel Defense Forces, said that, while risky, unilateralism was the only option Israel had now.

"Anybody will tell you that you can't define a border unilaterally; that's an oxymoron," Eisin said. "But the alternative is to negotiate, and that's not feasible with Hamas."

Eisin admits that peace isn't on the horizon, but she sees no other alternative after years of suicide bombings and peace talks that produced few stable results.

"It's a different mood," she said. "Israelis don't talk about peace. We talk about nonviolence. We talk about separation. The last five and a half years have pretty dramatically changed the Israeli society's psyche and the political realpolitik."

Even with a clear front runner in next Tuesday's Israeli parliamentary elections, the makeup of the future government—and its relations with Hamas—remain uncertain.

Mahmoud Zahar is an unlikely expert on Israeli politics. In the almost two decades since he helped to found the Islamist group Hamas, Zahar has lived through six Israeli election cycles. But the most important lesson his experience has taught him is that predicting the results is a fool's errand—even in a year when one party seems poised to dominate. "Israeli society is divided into so many parties and sectors," Zahar told NEWSWEEK earlier this week at his Gaza City home. "Even in one party there are different sectors." Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima bloc may seem poised to crush its nearest rivals in next Tuesday's parliamentary polls. But Zahar knows the real game doesn't begin until the postelection horse-trading starts—an inevitability in a nation where 15 different parties are likely to win seats in Parliament, and none a majority. "In Israel, everything is open," Zahar says.

On the surface, this year's contest has been one of the least dynamic in recent memory. Despite a string of jarring plot twists—like the incapacitating illness of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the surprise victory of Hamas in January's Palestinian elections—the poll numbers have hardly budged. The latest projections suggest Kadima will win roughly 37 of Israel's 120 Knesset seats, Amir Peretz's Labor Party around 19 seats and Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud Party about 14—pretty much exactly where they were three months ago. Olmert's numbers jumped slightly after Israeli troops raided a Jericho prison a week and a half ago and seized a Palestinian militant. But a week later, they were right back to preraid levels. So much for what the pundits were calling "the Jericho effect."

What accounts for the stability? A lack of disruptive suicide attacks, to start. In 1996, Likud candidate Netanyahu came from behind to defeat Labor's Shimon Peres—thanks largely to intensified attacks from Zahar's associates in Hamas. "If they lose their security just before the election, they are not going to vote for the present government," says Zahar. But this year, Hamas seems committed to at least a short-term truce. Of course, that doesn't mean it can control all the factions in the Palestinian territories, and last-minute attacks could still shake up the numbers. Just last week, Israeli police chased down a van on the main highway from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv after the Shin Bet security service warned of a possible imminent attack. As helicopters swooped overhead in pursuit, traffic backed up for miles. When Israeli troopers stormed the van, they discovered an unexploded 15-pound bomb.

As the Israeli campaign limps into its final days, there are some signs that hard-liners are beginning to make gains. One surprise candidate: Avigdor Lieberman, a controversial Russian immigrant whose Israel Beitenu Party advocates shifting some Israeli Arab villages to Palestinian control. Lieberman's bloc could win as many as 10 seats in the Knesset, a dramatic jump from the early days of the campaign. But the gains would come partly at the expense of disenchanted hawks in Likud. And Lieberman's surge probably owes more to his catchy ad campaign than to any bedrock shift in the Israeli electorate. Lieberman's secret weapon from America: Republican Party strategist Arthur Finkelstein, a veteran of Israeli campaigns who helped supercharge Israel's political system by introducing the techniques of modern campaigning in the 1996 election cycle. In this campaign, Israelis all over the country are repeating Lieberman's catchy tagline in Russian: "Nyet, Nyet, Da" (No, No, Yes). Even rival strategists, like Kadima media boss Eyal Arad, admit Lieberman's ads are some of the best of the campaign. (For a look at some of the Israeli political ads, see "Air Power: A Fight for the Last Voter.")

If Hamas was one architect of Netanyahu's victory in 1996, Arad was the other. As Netanyahu's campaign manager in that contest, Arad deftly exploited Israeli security fears. But Arad switched loyalties when Sharon abandoned Likud and now finds himself in a unique position to savage his former boss. Kadima's attack ads in this cycle have made quick work of Netanyahu. The most effective one: a smarmy image of Netanyahu's face with a simple voice-over: "Once was enough." Arad's tougher challenge has been to convince swing voters that Olmert is as dynamic a character as Sharon, who is still in a coma and not expected to recover. These voters "lean toward Kadima," Arad told NEWSWEEK recently at his party's Tel Aviv production offices. "But they're hesitant about Olmert." Yet ads alone can't do much to shape these kinds of long-term perceptions. Only time—and not a few external factors—can do that.

Zahar's Hamas organization is perhaps the ultimate X factor. Around the same time Israelis will vote next week, Zahar is expected to be named the Palestinian Authority's new foreign minister. Saddled with crushing budget shortfalls, Zahar will travel the Middle East trying to woo potential donors. It won't be easy. So far, "nobody is committed except Saudi Arabia," Zahar says. And that's where Olmert's real problems could start. For now, Hamas is busy trying to seat its own government and has little interest in antagonizing Israel as it attempts to recover aid money. But if the economy continues to deteriorate, "the people are not going to allow Israel to starve them," Zahar warns. Such a situation could lead to what Zahar describes—a little menacingly—only as "problems. For us, and the Israelis." Olmert and Kadima may well weather the fire from their political opponents in Tuesday's election. But in the Middle East, the real trouble often starts only after the returns are in.

Israeli Arabs Feel Little Stake In Vote (LAT)

By Laura King, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

As they gear up for polls, some in the minority electorate say they feel cut off from the state.

NAZARETH, Israel — Lounging in the doorway of a dress shop just down the street from the towering Basilica of the Annunciation, Majdoline Mimo shook her curly head and clucked her tongue at the mention of Israel's elections Tuesday.

"I'll cast a blank ballot," the young Israeli Arab woman said, as her girlfriends nodded in agreement. "I don't see any party that really represents my goals."

Arab citizens of Israel make up 13% of the country's eligible voters, and if numbers alone were what counted, they would be a powerful political bloc, eagerly courted by all sides. Instead, the mood among the Arab electorate is largely one of listlessness. Pollsters are forecasting that their turnout will be low, and those who do vote are likely to divide their support among a number of small Arab parties.

In Nazareth, Israel's largest Arab-dominated city and the town where Jesus is believed to have spent his boyhood, nearly all those asked said they felt cut off from the Jewish state and its institutions. But according to the polls, up to one-fifth of Arab voters will nonetheless cast ballots for one of the mainstream Israeli parties.

Israel's left-leaning Labor Party is expected to attract considerable numbers of Arab voters, in part because of its leftist platform and in part because it is headed by Amir Peretz, a Moroccan-born Jew whose native language is Arabic.

"Everyone is saying we should vote for the Arab parties, because they are our own people, but to me it is throwing the vote away," said Azhar abu Hamad, 19, in Nazareth. She said she would vote for Meretz, the most leftist of what people here call the "Zionist" parties.

Three Arab parties are likely to divide the rest of the Arab vote among themselves, for a total of about 10 of the 120 seats in the Knesset, or parliament.

A political bloc of that size can often wield disproportionate clout under Israel's parliamentary system by positioning itself as a swing vote. But the Arab parties tend to be sidetracked by their differing ideologies, which run from Islamist to communist.

"If we ran a single Arab list of candidates, everyone would have to pay more attention to us in the parliament," said Yusef Habiballah, a student from a village outside Nazareth. "But it seems we can't find a way to unite."

Some commentators have predicted an "echo effect" from the triumph of the militant group Hamas in January's Palestinian elections, with a surge in support for Islamists. But others say they do not see these candidates winning a much larger following than usual — in part because the Islamic movement is split into two factions, one of which is boycotting the balloting.

In Nazareth, where tensions between Christians and Muslims occasionally boil over into violence, many expressed nervousness over a vote boycott called by a little-known Islamic group calling itself Ansar Allah, or Followers of God. The group distributed fliers describing the Knesset as a defamer of the prophet Muhammad.

Boycott calls have come from secular Arabs as well, including some intellectuals who see the vote as an exercise in colonialism because Israel's Arab citizens are a downtrodden minority.

Joblessness and poverty rates are much higher among Israeli Arabs than among the Jewish majority. Arabs as a rule do not serve in the Israeli army, which gives many young Israelis a boost in their career prospects.

Arab cities and towns inside Israel receive substantially less funding than Jewish municipalities. And a poll last week suggested that a majority of Israeli Jews regard Arab citizens as a threat to national security.

"People feel disaffected, certainly," said Sammy Smooha, a University of Haifa sociologist who specializes in Israeli Arab issues. "Many Arab citizens feel that Jews view them as disloyal to Israel."

DOJ_NMG_0022117

Most of the Arab candidates use their campaign appearances to drive that point home. At a town hall-type gathering in a Nazareth neighborhood last week, Azmi Bishara, a candidate for the nationalist Balad party, told the crowd: "Israel sees you only as a demographic liability."

"Our situation today is that of citizens without true citizenship," Ahmed Tibi, running on the ticket of the Arab Party for Change, told the Haaretz newspaper.

Most Israeli Jews paid little attention to campaign events on the Arab side. Somewhat tellingly, the debate among the main candidates of the Arab parties took place not on Israeli television, but on Al Jazeera, the pan-Arab satellite channel.

This month, the government of acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert proposed an initiative to guarantee more civil service jobs to Arab citizens, a gesture that even Israeli media described as an election ploy.

"Whenever the elections approach, the political establishment suddenly remembers that a fifth of the country's population is Arab, and that they are deprived," the mass-circulation Yediot Aharonot newspaper said in a commentary. "So all of a sudden, a program is devised for aid, rehabilitation, recovery.... It is very doubtful that even a small portion of this money finds its way to the Arab sector."

All the Arab parties have their own take on what is a central dilemma for Israeli Arabs: whether they should identify more strongly with their Palestinian brethren in the West Bank and Gaza Strip or seek to strengthen their own identity within Israel.

Balad, for example, calls for Israel to recognize Arab citizens as a national minority and grant them control over their own governing and cultural institutions. The communist-inspired Hadash party has advocated changing Israel's exclusively Jewish national symbols, including the Star of David on the flag.

But as the elections approached, many Arab voters acknowledged an overpowering sense of weariness with the political process.

"There are so many problems for which there seem to be no real solution," said Ayad Mahroun, a young Nazareth woman who said she would vote for Hadash, but only because she felt it was her civic duty. "We are looking for equality," she said, "and no election will bring that."

Security Council To Okay UN Help For Trial Of Hariri Murder Suspects (AFP)

AFP, March 25, 2006

The Security Council was set to ask UN chief Kofi Annan next week to strike a deal with Lebanon on creating an international tribunal to try suspects in the murder of Lebanon's ex-premier, Argentina's ambassador said.

Cesar Mayoral, the president of the Security Council for March, told reporters that the 15-member body would vote Tuesday on a French-drafted resolution urging Annan to negotiate an accord on the tribunal for suspects in the slaying of Rafiq Hariri.

Diplomats said the text was virtually certain to be adopted.

The draft, made available Friday, also asks Annan "to submit in a timely manner for the consideration of the Council a report on the implementation of this resolution ... including options for a funding mechanism appropriate to ensure the continued and effective functioning of the tribunal."

In a report released Tuesday, Annan suggested creation of a mixed tribunal involving Lebanese and international judges that "would best balance the need for Lebanese and international involvement in the work of the tribunal."

"That balance would be determined by such important characteristics as the tribunal's founding instrument, applicable law, location, composition and financial arrangements," it added.

It noted that Lebanese authorities believe that for security reasons the court should be established outside Lebanon.

The UN Security Council last December authorized Lebanon to create a special tribunal for the murder of Hariri and 20 others in a February 2005 bombing in downtown Beirut.

Belgian prosecutor Serge Brammertz, who is currently leading a six-month UN probe of the slaying, last week cited progress in the investigation but stressed that Syrian cooperation would be crucial to make further headway.

Two previous reports by Brammertz's predecessor, German prosecutor Detlev Mehlis, had suggested top-level Syrian involvement in the assassination plot, and blasted Damascus for failing to cooperate and actively seeking to mislead the investigation.

Syria, the longtime powerbroker in Lebanon, has denied any involvement in Hariri's murder and accused the UN panel of political bias.

From Dreamer To Contender (NSWK)

By Stephen Glain

Newsweek, March 25, 2006

Even though a national election isn't scheduled, human-rights activist Chibli Mallat is running for president. And his chances of winning are looking better all the time.

Chibli Mallat, a Lebanese human-rights lawyer and activist, is campaigning as an independent for his country's presidency. That makes him unique, for two reasons: First, in Lebanon's highly factionalized politics, no one gets anywhere without belonging to an ethnic or religious clan. Second, there are no scheduled elections to contest. Last year's Cedar Revolution, ignited by the killing of the Sunni political leader Rafik Hariri, may have put an end to Syria's decades-long occupation of Lebanon, but Syrian proxy Emile Lahoud remains as the country's president. Pro-democracy groups engaged in a so-called National Dialogue have as yet failed to hatch a plan to remove Lahoud without provoking a violent backlash from Damascus.

Nonetheless, political groups are jockeying for power, inspired in part by what they say is stiff pressure on Syria from Arab governments—in particular Saudi Arabia, which enjoyed close ties with Hariri—in favor of a peaceful transition of power in Lebanon. The 46-year-old Mallat's own poll numbers meanwhile, indicate he has reached spoiler status. This month, Lebanon's Maronite patriarch, the leader of the country's largest Christian sect, gave the candidate what was interpreted by some as a passive endorsement, and the Saudi and Iranian ambassadors have requested interviews with Mallat. He spoke with NEWSWEEK's Stephen Glain this week. Excerpts:

NEWSWEEK: What are the odds that Syria will remove Lahoud anytime soon?

Chibli Mallat: Considering that everyone in the National Dialogue accepts there is a crisis in the presidency that needs to be addressed and the only way to address it is with a new president, the likelihood is much higher today than it was two months ago. You could have a new president in a week or a month.

What makes you think Lahoud's presidency may be in jeopardy?

The Syrians will hang on to him as much as they can, but eventually they will cut their losses because Arab leaders are pressuring them to do so. It's because of Saad Hariri [Rafik's son and a political leader]. He is saying "I want him out," and the Saudis will not go against him on this, though the pressure is clandestine. The atmosphere has changed to the point where the Saudis are saying, "Let's agree on [a Lahoud successor]" rather than "let's not stir up change in Lebanon."

Assuming Lahoud goes and an election is scheduled, how do you rate your chances?

The [candidate] that is least objectionable to everyone involved is probably me, because while I belong to this Cedar Revolution atmosphere, I am not directly associated with or against any one camp. The patriarch came out with specifications for a best-candidate's profile—someone young, educated, middle of the road—which was read widely to be a reference to me. Since I announced my campaign, I've propelled my image from innocuous dreamer to one of the contenders on the public radar. We had a poll done this week between me and [Gen. Michel] Aoun and the result was 59 percent for Aoun and 40 percent for Mallat, which is significant [considering] when I started out.

What is it about you that appeals to voters?

There is a sense of relative youth, a sense of novelty that is not available with other candidates, who are all either steeped in blood like Aoun or were in arrangements with the Syrians to be deputies of one thing or another. Most important, the political movement in Lebanon is a movement of the professional class, the middle class, and that is my profile. It is a revolt of the bankers and lawyers. To see them in the street is very unusual in Lebanon.

The leaders of the National Dialogue seem to be maneuvering to simply name a successor rather than hold an election. Wasn't the Cedar Revolution all about the popular yearning for a pluralist democracy?

Of course. But people in this country are so tired of violence in politics they don't see the importance of democratic competition. In democracy, there is the notion that the losers of today will be the winners of tomorrow. That alternation game is the essence of democracy, but there is a sense that Lebanon is so fragile and people are obsessed with consensus. The only practical alternative in my view is to allow the constitutional process to play itself out in the form of an election. That way, hopefully, the best person will emerge.

President George W. Bush continues to make the spread of democracy the cornerstone of his foreign policy. Does that sustain you?

I support his policy wholeheartedly. We activists in the human-rights community have been calling for democracy for years, and now that the Americans are embracing it, we won't turn back. My only request is that the policy be imposed without exemption. It is easy to attack Syria on the basis that it is not democratic, but it is important that the [United States] apply the same standards to Egypt, to push for peaceful change at the top there. That also includes Tunisia, which is an extraordinary dictatorship, and of course Israel, which is ruining the lives of millions of people under its occupation. The Bush administration must do something positive on this to show his call for freedom and democracy is not opportunistic.

Is the United States doing enough to pressure Syria to allow Lebanon full independence?

Short of sending 100,000 Marines to Damascus, my sense is the U.S. policy on Damascus is the correct one. I don't think sanctions would be useful in any way, and in fact they've proved counterproductive elsewhere. The Syrians are not behaving well on a number of fronts, including in Lebanon, and that will continue. But most worryingly, what we're seeing in Syria is that the country is going down the path of domestic violence. Every few days we hear of skirmishes and numbers of people killed. This touches a broad spectrum of the population, which is increasingly unhappy. It really has nothing to do with Lebanon, and it is bound to get worse.

Disgraced Defense Contractor Planned To Promote Democracy In Iran (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - In a new example of disgraced defense contractor Mitchell Wade's attempts to exert influence in Washington and beyond, Wade and two business partners formed a nonprofit group in 2004 to promote democracy in Iran, according to documents and interviews.

Wade and the two partners, who have been large contributors to Republican political campaigns, formed the Iranian Democratization Foundation in April 2004, according to incorporation papers filed in Washington.

The timing coincides with a push by opponents of the theocratic regime in Tehran to appropriate more money for democracy programs.

In November 2004, Congress approved spending $3 million to promote democracy in Iran. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice last month asked Congress for a large boost in funding, to $75 million.

Behrooz Behbudi, who helped incorporate the foundation, said in a telephone interview that Wade "was supposed to get funds from the Congress" for the project. The two later fell out over business dealings in Iraq, Behbudi said.

Wade, who headed contractor MZM Inc., pleaded guilty last month to bribery-related charges and making illegal campaign contributions. His chief congressional patron, former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, pleaded guilty in November to taking bribes.

Wade's dealings, which include contracts MZM received from Pentagon intelligence agencies, are under investigation.

A phone call to Wade's lawyer seeking comment wasn't immediately returned.

Much is still unclear about the Iranian Democratization Foundation, including whether it ever took in money or carried out any activities. It was dissolved in November 2004 and apparently never filed federal disclosure forms required of nonprofits with more than $25,000 in income.

The foundation's existence was first reported this month by the Web log Talking Points Memo.

Behbudi, who lives in West Vancouver, Canada, and whose family was close to the late shah of Iran, said Wade apparently saw him as a conduit for helping expand his activities in the Middle East.

Behbudi said he was introduced to Wade by New York-based real estate developer Sonny Lee, the third officer of the foundation. The foundation's listed address was the same as MZM's.

DOJ_NMG_0022120

"We wanted to bring freedom to the people of Iran, freedom from the mullahs," Lee said in a brief telephone interview. The project was stopped "after the government told us they would take care of that themselves," he said. He didn't elaborate.

Behbudi and Lee donated heavily to Republican political causes, according to federal records.

Behbudi gave $17,000 to the National Republican Senatorial Committee in 2003 and $1,250 to President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign.

Lee gave at least $41,250 to the Senatorial Committee and $2,000 to Bush. A biography on the Rotary Club of New York's Web site says Lee was twice awarded the Medal of Freedom by the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Lee, chairman of the Great American International Development Corp., called Wade "a good Christian man" and said they met through Wade's wife, Christiane.

Behbudi said he and Wade had a deal to try to get a contract to rebuild the gutted Central Bank of Iraq headquarters building in downtown Baghdad.

Behbudi said he traveled twice to Baghdad soon after the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime and "came up with the most beautiful building" design for the new headquarters.

"Mitch was supposed to come up with the contracts and secure the funds. I was supposed to do the work," Behbudi said. But, he said, Wade never paid him for the design work.

Behbudi's account couldn't be independently confirmed. He said he had a signed contract with Wade, but had to check with his business partners before making it public.

Available contracting records show MZM got one contract for Iraq reconstruction, a $5 million award in March 2003 to provide linguists and interpreters for the Pentagon.

Cultivating The Seeds Of Democracy (LAT)

By Anwar Ibrahim, Anwar Ibrahim Is A Former Finance Minister And Deputy Prime Minister Of Malaysia. He Is A Visiting P

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

SINCE 9/11, the United States has pursued what the White House calls a "forward strategy of freedom" predicated on the belief that a dearth of democracy in Muslim countries has led to the spread of a deadly strain of Islamic extremism. Emboldened by a hard-won ideological victory over the regimes in Eastern Europe during the Cold War, the U.S. once again has sought to foment democracy abroad to ensure security at home.

However, as the first returns come in on this democratization effort in the Muslim world, there is growing anxiety in the U.S. about the resulting character of these nascent, freely elected governments. Some have begun to even question whether these countries have the innate ability to sustain democracy.

Although it cannot be denied that U.S. initiatives for reform have contributed significantly to developments in the Middle East, fear is growing that radicals may hijack democracy. Recent Islamist electoral successes in Iran, Egypt and the Palestinian territories have given rise to questions about the ability of liberal forces to prevail against fundamentalism.

For the United States, the fear is real, though perhaps tinged with a bit of Islamophobia: How terrible an irony it would be if this grand effort to spread liberty abroad resulted in anti-U.S. Islamic states imposing Sharia, or Islamic law, on their people.

The example of Hamas' ascension in Gaza and the West Bank presents obvious difficulties. But it would be fallacious to assume that it was democracy that voted in Islamic extremism. More correctly, it was the years of corruption and abuse of power of the Fatah-led administration that voted Hamas into power. If the exercise of democracy is about venting the people's anger and dissatisfaction with the powers that be, then the outcome was a foregone conclusion.

Be that as it may, there are some who say that "stability" not liberty is what the U.S. should be promoting throughout the Islamic world. Their view is that championing electoral democracy does not immediately serve U.S. interests abroad, particularly in the war on terrorism, and that the hearts and minds of terrorists and suicide bombers are not turned by the virtues of democracy. They say the war against terrorism must be waged with an iron hand, not kid gloves woven from the fabric of constitutional liberties.

These views on democracy and stability in the Muslim world are not only wrong but carry grave consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0022121

In a way, Washington's strategy may be viewed as expiation for past sins, when the U.S. was a stumbling block to democracy in the Middle East. Iran was a democracy in 1953 when the CIA engineered the coup that transformed it into an absolute monarchy. The U.S. also has supported other tyrants in the region, including, of course, Saddam Hussein. All of this in the name of stability and security in the decades-long confrontation with the communist bloc.

Is Washington really caught between the Scylla of supporting dictators and the Charybdis of promoting democracies that could bring Islamist radicals to power?

THE BEST ANSWERS to the question of whether America should reassess its strategy lie in Indonesia and Turkey, refreshing examples of Muslim democratic self-assertion.

Seven years ago, Indonesia plunged headlong into democracy after more than 30 years of autocratic dictatorship. As the largest Muslim nation in the world, it stands out as perhaps the most significant political phenomenon in the recent history of democracy. Indonesians have gone to the polls twice since, and they overwhelmingly rejected the Islamist radicals, who then tried to push their agenda through other avenues. Again, this was met with a resounding "no" by the Indonesian people, including major Muslim organizations.

The press in Indonesia is free, and the elections are fair. Fundamental liberties are enshrined in the constitution and fully recognized and respected by the powers that be. For example, unlike in neighboring Malaysia, Indonesians may gather to protest government decisions and policies without fear of reprisals. Arbitrary arrests and political detentions are unheard of.

As fledgling democracies, Indonesia and Turkey still have a long way to go. In Indonesia, it is in fulfilling the socioeconomic objectives of democracy that can only happen over time. In Turkey, the containment of an unrestricted military establishment has aided in that country's European Union ascension. Nevertheless, they now stand as beacons, both for Muslim nations and for those who seek to help them.

To be successful in its efforts to spread freedom, the U.S. must remember that constitutional democracy cannot take root in a society, whether secular or Islamic, without the firm commitment of the politically empowered to protect the fundamental rights to liberty, equality and freedom of all.

The true cultivation of democracy requires more than simply the introduction of elections. It also requires the establishment of democratic processes and a leveling of the political playing field. It needs the guarantee of a separation of powers and the liberation of the judicial system from the stranglehold of autocrats and tyrants. Most of all, it requires the protection of fundamental liberties and a free press.

It is in these prerequisites of democracy that the U.S. and the Muslim world need to invest, with far more significant effort, for the causes of liberty to truly prevail.

Braving Jail For Democracy, But Is That A Goal Or A Tool? (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

CAIRO

WHAT makes a person go to jail for his beliefs and fortifies that person to hold strong while the moments of life — weddings, births, deaths — pass by?

Essam el-Erian missed six and a half years of freedom for his political work. In that way he has something in common with those who accepted prison to call for freedom from the oppression of the Soviet Union. He shares something in common with Riad Seif, a former prisoner in Syria who was recently released after serving more than five years for his democracy work, and Ayman Nour, sentenced to five years hard labor in Egypt after challenging the governing party's monopoly on power.

But Mr. Erian's push for democracy does not sit as well with those in the West, namely the United States and Europe, because while he calls for free elections, freedom of speech and due process, he freely admits that he wants those political changes to help bring Islamic law to Egypt. His critics believe that religious-based organizations like his want to use the mechanics of democracy to achieve power, but have no intention of actually supporting democratic values or practices.

"It is a duty to do it, it is a religious duty," Mr. Erian, 52, said when asked about his motivation. "I put my first footprint in this way more than 35 years ago, to save myself. Of course it may be difficult to understand, but secondly, it is to save our people. Our people look like slaves to dictatorships, and Islam came to release people from slavery to be only slaves of the God."

Mr. Erian is a leading figure within the Muslim Brotherhood, a fundamentalist Islamic organization that is technically illegal in Egypt but is officially tolerated. He has worked for decades to help the group emerge from years in the underground as Egypt's only real political opposition. He was released in October after his latest stretch in prison, five and a half months, and got right back to work, rejoining the ranks of the Brotherhood just as its members won 88 seats in Parliament, a small step toward realizing his dreams.

Yet, facing an increasingly intolerant government, Mr. Erian operates on a short leash, which can snap back at any time. On Wednesday, for example, as he tried to board a flight to attend a conference in Bahrain, he was stopped at passport control and denied permission to leave the country. No reason was given.

If he has his way, the Brotherhood will follow in the footsteps of Hamas, the militant Palestinian organization that won parliamentary elections in January. And that, critics say, is precisely the problem. The Brotherhood, they say, is professing fealty to democracy only to gain power, after which it intends to dismantle democratic practices.

Mr. Erian is clear about his agenda: transforming Egypt into his vision of an Islamic state, where the Koran is not just the basis of all law, as in Egypt today, but where it is the law. But he rejects those who say he and the Brotherhood are antidemocratic.

"The main goal of Islam is to liberate people," he said during an interview in the office of the Muslim Brotherhood on the banks of the Nile here. "The way that you can apply liberty in your life now is democracy. All are linked. They come from the same source. Of course you can find many, many Muslims, or the majority of Muslims, who do not understand that, but Hassan al-Bana, who is the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, said that freedom, liberty is one of the main pieces of Islam."

MR. ERIAN was born in a small village in Giza, called Nahya, not far from the Pyramids. His father was a teacher, and like most of the people in the village, he was raised observant, praying five times a day and fasting during the holy month of Ramadan. But he heard the call — to faith and politics — after an accident. He said he was about 15 years old when he was nearly electrocuted by touching the exposed wires on a lamp.

"I went to the street alone and asked myself, 'What am I living for?' "

For a teenager, the answer was found in the Muslim Brotherhood. "When I found the Muslim Brothers, of course, it was very good help for me because I put all my efforts in clear strategy, clear techniques, clear tasks," he said.

Mr. Erian, one of the two brightest students in his village, was selected to study medicine in Cairo. While in school, he joined a whole class of young people who were working to transform the Brotherhood with pragmatic ideas and a strategy of pushing the group into politics. Alarmed, the government struck back, and Mr. Erian, as the vanguard of that new generation, often felt the heat personally. He eventually earned a master's degree in clinical pathology but never managed to finish his medical training because he was sent to jail, he said.

Mr. Erian served in the Egyptian Parliament from 1987 to 1990 as an independent, because the Brotherhood could not run candidates as an outlawed group. In 1995 he was sentenced to five years in prison for belonging to a banned group that sought to create an Islamic state in Egypt. That conviction automatically disqualified him from running for public office again.

The Brotherhood has a violent past, and was outlawed after its members tried to assassinate Gamal Abdel Nasser even before he became president. Now it has to contend with that not-so-subtle undercurrent of suspicion that Mr. Erian and others are opportunists looking to ride the coattails of democracy to power — with no intention of then ever letting go. American policy makers have gone so far as to say they refuse to speak with the Brotherhood because of its illegal status. Recently, however, a British publication, The New Statesman, published documents on its Web site leaked from the British Embassy in Cairo in which an analyst there said that it was time to begin at least an informal dialogue with the Brotherhood.

MR. ERIAN bridles at the policy of opposing the Brotherhood because of what it might do, saying it diverted attention from more substantive issues. "The problem is that our rulers in this region are in power for half a century or more, supported by the states and they don't leave power," he said. "You are afraid that somebody else can come to power and not give away. Let us put guarantees to prevent this. Don't prevent people from change because you are afraid or because you are weak. Strengthen yourself, don't weaken the others."

Mr. Erian has picked supporters outside Islamic ranks. Saad Eddin Ibrahim, a Western-educated pioneer in pressing Egypt's government for accountability who found himself imprisoned some years ago for his trouble, said he trusted Mr. Erian. "Probably because of his moderate attitude and his outstanding leadership qualities, Mubarak's regime put Essam el-Erian behind bars," wrote Mr. Ibrahim while he was in jail. "So, let all the free people in Egypt and the world unite with him.

"Hands off Essam el-Erian, Mubarak!"

That call never did resonate, in Washington or Europe. But Mr. Erian said he did not care much, because he took the risks in support of his faith. "It is only to obey my God," he said.

U.S. Revokes Visa Of Pakistani Senator (WP)

By Shankar Vedantam

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Musharraf Critic Was to Be State Dept. Guest

The Bush administration has withdrawn an invitation to a Pakistani lawmaker and a prominent critic of President Pervez Musharraf who was to arrive in the United States today as a guest of the State Department, setting off charges that the action came at the behest of the Pakistani government.

Sana Ullah Baloch, who had been invited by the State Department last year and issued a visa, was told recently by the U.S. Embassy in Islamabad that he could not attend a State Department-sponsored program on accountability in government and business and that a visa he had already received had been revoked.

American officials first told Baloch in a letter sent March 13 that they had taken the action because of "a recent withdrawal in funding which made it necessary for us to scale back the program."

In an interview Wednesday, State Department spokeswoman Nancy Beck said the problem was not funding but rather new information that was received after Baloch had been approved that "led us to believe he was not eligible for a visa." She declined to elaborate.

The incident has drawn sharp parallels with the case of Mukhtar Mai, a woman gang-raped in 2002 by a village council in Pakistan, who was prevented by the Pakistani government from traveling to the United States last summer to publicize her story. The government later relented.

The changing explanations fueled suspicion among some South Asia experts in Washington that Pakistan, a U.S. ally in the hunt for al-Qaeda leaders, asked the Bush administration not to permit Baloch to come to the United States. Baloch has been highly critical of Musharraf's handling of an intensifying conflict in Baluchistan, a restive province that Baloch represents in the national parliament.

"What is truly outrageous about his situation is this was a U.S.-government-sponsored trip," said Michael McFaul, a senior fellow at the Hoover Institution in Washington, who spent three weeks with Baloch at a meeting at Stanford University aimed at promoting democracy and human rights. "Since when do we let other countries decide whom we should invite to our country?"

"We are all embarrassed because we all suspect the same thing, but so far the questions we have asked the administration remain unanswered," said Frederic Grare, a scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which was forced to cancel next week's event for Baloch.

Amnesty International's advocacy director for Asia, T. Kumar, said the group would bring the issue to the attention of Congress: "This is a coverup. This is a war on terror issue, and they need Pakistan."

Baloch's allies note that they have no direct evidence of their claims, and the Pakistani government and the State Department deny that Pakistan was involved.

Tariq Azim Khan, one of Baloch's fellow senators and a spokesman for the Pakistani government, joked that "it is surprising to note that Pakistan has that much sway with the State Department and the American Embassy in Islamabad."

Baloch was welcome to express his views anywhere, Khan said, adding that the Pakistani government itself had included the critic in many interparliamentary delegations. Khan described the unrest in Baluchistan as the work of a tiny but vocal minority, led by people such as Baloch, who Khan charged was upset because traditional roles of patronage were being sidelined by development programs.

Marvin Weinbaum, a former State Department analyst for Afghanistan who now works for the Middle East Institute in Washington, said the department's intelligence analysts may have learned something problematic about Baloch. But Selig Harrison, author of "In Afghanistan's Shadow," a book on Baluch nationalism, said that absent evidence, "one would discount that as simply a cover story."

In an interview via cellphone, Baloch said that his province -- the largest in Pakistan -- was being exploited for its natural resources, even as the region was starved of development funds. The province borders Iran and Afghanistan and is strategically important to oil-shipping lanes. Baloch said locals want more authority but were being undermined by the Pakistani government's leverage of radical Islam in the liberal-minded region.

"They don't want to allow any Baluch political activist to get in touch with the international community regarding the human rights violations in Baluchistan," he said, adding that about 600 people had been killed in recent months.

As Indian Premier Calls For Treaty, Pakistan Says Kashmir Is The Key (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

NEW DELHI, March 24 — Prime Minister Manmohan Singh called Friday for a far-reaching "treaty of peace, security and friendship" between India and Pakistan, in what appeared to be an effort to stanch criticism from across the border for inaction on the contested Kashmir region.

Pakistan politely welcomed the offer but pointed, not surprisingly, to the need to take on the Kashmir issue.

"We are not afraid of discussing Jammu and Kashmir or of finding pragmatic, practical solutions to resolve this issue as well," Mr. Singh said. He went on to say that territorial lines could not be redrawn — the Indian government's longstanding position — but that the two countries could work toward making them irrelevant, or as he also put it, "just lines on a map."

The two countries, violently separated at birth in 1947 but unable ever since to agree over who controls the Himalayan territory of Kashmir, have been engaged in peace talks for more than two years. Those talks have yielded little more than modest agreements to open train and bus links across the border.

For the last several months Pakistan has stepped up criticism of India for what it calls New Delhi's recalcitrance on resolving the Kashmir dispute. Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, for his part, has dangled the idea of greater self-rule for Kashmiris on both sides of the de facto border.

"I think it's a response to Pakistan's upping the diplomatic ante recently," said Kanti Bajpai, the principal of the exclusive Doon School in the Indian city of Dehra Dun and an expert on Kashmir.

India and Pakistan have fought three wars, two of them over Kashmir, and reached the brink of a fourth.

The spokeswoman for the Pakistani Foreign Ministry, Tasnim Aslam, on Friday called India's overtures positive but also described Kashmir as being "at the heart of conflict, mistrust and hostility" and having "bedeviled relations between the two countries for such a long time."

"We also need sincerity and flexibility in order to overcome the legacy of the past," Ms. Aslam said.

Mr. Singh praised General Musharraf's efforts to curb terrorism and urged him to do more. Mr. Singh also spoke of the need to address lingering disputes over the waters of Sir Creek, at the southern end of the countries' common border, and a dam called Baglihar on the Indian-held side of Kashmir that Pakistan fears will allow India to tamper with its water supply.

Mr. Singh's statement was perhaps more revealing for where it was delivered than what it said. He spoke at the unveiling of the latest bus link between the countries, this one cutting across divided Punjab from the Indian city of Amritsar to the Sikh pilgrimage site of Nankana Sahib in Pakistan, the birthplace of the Sikh religion's founder.

Punjab is the center of the carnage that characterized the partition of South Asia in 1947, when India and Pakistan won independence from British rule. Millions streamed across the frontier at the time, Sikhs and Hindus to India, Muslims to Pakistan.

Mr. Singh was among them. A Sikh, he was born in what is now the Pakistani province of Punjab, just as General Musharraf was born here in what is now the capital of India.

U.S. And Europe Plan Sanctions Against Belarus (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 24 — The United States and Europe said Friday that they would impose sanctions against President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko of Belarus and other top officials for cracking down on a peaceful protest over his re-election, which was widely seen as a sham.

The swift and nearly unanimous condemnations from Western nations widened their rift with Belarus and posed new challenges for their relations with Russia, which has stood behind Mr. Lukashenko.

The United States stopped short of cutting its ties with the Belarus government, but a senior State Department official said that travel and financial restrictions already in place on "fewer than a dozen" Belarussian government officials would probably be extended to more than 50, including Mr. Lukashenko.

The European Union announced similar moves.

The announcements came as Belarussian authorities were processing hundreds of demonstrators in a Soviet-era prison here in the capital, and holding what the opposition described as closed trials without legal representation or defense witnesses.

The opposition also said that since their members were arrested in a police sweep early Friday morning, many detainees had been beaten, denied the use of toilets, forced to stand for hours in subfreezing temperatures, and packed nearly by the score into small prison cells.

"It is a horrible violation of human rights and the law," said Aleksandr Milinkevich, the principal challenger to Mr. Lukashenko in last Sunday's presidential election. "They do not consider us to be people."

Mr. Lukashenko made no immediate comment about the planned sanctions. But Belarus's Foreign Ministry suggested the West was being hypocritical and he hinted at retaliation.

"If the United States and European Union countries respect the people of Belarus, they should respect their choice," Andrei Popov, a ministry spokesman, said on national television. "The Republic of Belarus retains the right to take retaliatory measures.'

The threat seemed to expand on a remark earlier in the week by Mr. Lukashenko, who said Europe would hardly be able to restrict its trade with Belarus, a main transit route to the West for Russian gas and oil.

The United States said that it "condemns the actions of the Belarussian security services" in which "they forcibly seized and detained Belarussian citizens who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19 election results," according to a State Department statement.

The sanctions are likely to irritate Russia, which endorsed the presidential election on Monday and made light of the violence on Friday.

As many as 1,000 people have been arrested in the past several days for participating in rallies or supporting the opposition, including for trying to give demonstrators food, according to Mr. Milinkevich and Aleksandr Kazulin, another presidential candidate. The United States echoed appeals by both candidates for Belarus to release the detainees immediately.

"The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained, not only in the past 24 hours, but in recent days and weeks, simply for expressing their political views," said the White House press secretary, Scott McClellan.

Leaders of the European Union said they would add Mr. Lukashenko's name to an existing visa ban against six Belarussian officials. The move puts him on the same blacklist as Zimbabwe's president, Robert Mugabe, and Myanmar's military leaders, all of whom have had their European assets frozen.

The Polish foreign minister, Stefan Meller, said the new restrictions, which will take effect around April 10, could involve more than a dozen people. "This is a fight of good against evil," he said.

The officials subject to the sanctions would be forbidden to travel to the United States or Europe, or to fly on airlines belonging to any of those countries. Assets they hold in American or European banks will probably be frozen, though officials noted that the details had not yet been determined.

DOJ_NMG_0022126

The administration hopes the threat of sanctions might change behavior in Belarus even before the new rules are put into place. Their goal, said the senior State Department official, who declined to be identified under department rules, is to "hold individuals accountable, to squeeze them" so that some might "peel off" to escape "the tightening noose."

The crackdown creates a fresh strain on relations between the West and Russia, which has congratulated Mr. Lukashenko for his official victory, and said the election, seen in the West as a farce, signified "the development of democratic institutions and the strengthening of the foundations of civic society in Belarus."

Russia, which holds the rotating chairmanship of the Group of Eight industrialized nations, showed no sign on Friday of rejecting its embrace of Mr. Lukashenko, who, according to official results, was re-elected to a third term on Sunday with 83 percent of the vote.

Foreign Minister Sergey V. Lavrov, at a news conference in Moscow, dismissed the protests as "illegal activities." He accused the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which monitored the elections, of having prejudged them and of instigating the demonstrations that followed.

"It has played an inflammatory role," Mr. Lavrov said, according to a transcript provided by the Foreign Ministry. "To goad people into illegal activities is, I think, wrong."

Christian Strohal, director of the organization's human rights arm, responded in a statement that Mr. Lavrov's statements showed "a deliberate disregard" for the facts.

The State Department played down the American disagreement with Russia. A spokesman, Adam Ereli, noted that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice spoke with Mr. Lavrov by telephone on Friday and did not even bring up the issue of Belarus.

Nonetheless, the West's actions may be seen as a challenge in Russia. "The United States and Europe have laid down markers that it will not accept fraudulent elections in Belarus," said Celeste A. Wallander, director of the Russia and Eurasia program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. The implication, she said, is that the West "will not accept fraud in Russian elections, either."

But James. M. Goldgeier, a Russia expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said that message may be undercut by the fact that Russia faced no consequences after similar disagreements over other elections in its former republics over the past two years.

In Minsk, the police crackdown hardly lessened the tension. For all its speed and efficiency, with hundreds of protesters being removed from their camp on October Square by the riot police in less than 25 minutes, the action seemed to have done little to break the opposition's will.

Opposition members and relatives of those detained gathered outside the walls of the pretrial detention center and cheered every time a bus with detainees left the compound.

The unrest in recent days was the first sustained public dissent in the 12-year rule of a president often called Europe's last dictator. Freedom of assembly and speech are almost nonexistent here, and the economy remains managed by the state.

Mr. Milinkevich called for wide sanctions against Belarussian officials, including television journalists who he said knowingly spread lies on state television. He said a rally planned for Saturday would go forward, no matter how few people showed up.

The event seems certain to present a fresh challenge to the government, if only on a small scale. Several demonstrators who have thus far eluded arrest said they would appear on October Square, against the government's orders, in a continued show of civil disobedience.

One young man, who said he escaped from the crackdown early Friday by running from the police as they began seizing the demonstrators, stood on the square Friday afternoon, wearing a red-and-white button that read "For Freedom."

The protester, who gave only his first name, Mikhail, said that he would be back with more demonstrators on Saturday, and that he expected he would be arrested.

West Backs Sanctions Against Belarus (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022127

Alexander Lukashenko, Belarus' authoritarian president, was on Friday night facing coordinated sanctions from the European Union and US, hours after riot police wielding batons arrested 200 people staging a peaceful protest over Sunday's disputed elections in the capital, Minsk.

EU leaders, at a summit in Brussels, and the White House both indicated they would impose visa bans on a wide range of senior officials from the former Soviet republic, including Mr Lukashenko himself. They also planned financial sanctions, such as freezes on bank accounts abroad.

The tough EU and US response set them sharply at odds with Russia. Moscow has accepted the election results and congratulated Mr Lukashenko on winning a third five-year presidential term with an official 82.6 per cent of the vote, on a 92 per cent turnout.

Sergei Lavrov, Russian foreign minister, on Friday accused the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe – which described the elections as severely flawed – of delivering a biased verdict and playing an "inflammatory role" in Belarus. The OSCE insisted it had given an "impartial, balanced picture of the entire election process".

In Minsk, Alexander Milinkevich, the main opposition candidate, vowed to go ahead with a peaceful rally planned for Saturday, anniversary of the start of an earlier short-lived period of independence for Belarus in 1918.

It was unclear, however, how many supporters would attend and whether the authorities would allow the rally to take place.

Several thousand opposition supporters have gathered on Minsk's central October Square each evening since last Sunday. But police at about 3am on Friday stormed a small colony of tents demonstrators had erected on the square in a round-the-clock protest, bundling their occupants into trucks.

The EU and US both condemned the crackdown, calling on the Belarusian authorities to release those arrested and refrain from action against any peaceful protest on Saturday.

Brussels and Washington have endorsed the findings of the 500-strong OSCE monitoring mission which concluded that last Sunday's election was not free and fair, and took place in a "climate of intimidation".

"Lukashenko will be banned from travelling to the EU," said Stefan Meller, foreign minister of Poland, which championed EU sanctions together with Lithuania – both neighbours of Belarus. He added that the new visa ban would apply to "many, many officials", and significantly broaden an existing ban imposed in 2004 on six lower-level Belarusian officials.

Scott McLellan, the White House spokesman, said the US planned "parallel steps involving targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions"

U.S. To Sanction Belarus For Stifling Protests (WP)

By William Branigin

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Demonstrators Are Jailed in Capital for Rally Against Vote

The White House yesterday denounced the suppression of political protests against election fraud in Belarus and said the United States planned to join European nations in imposing sanctions on Belarusan leaders.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the United States demanded the immediate release of hundreds of protesters who have been arrested for demonstrating against March 19 elections, which President Alexander Lukashenko claims to have won with nearly 83 percent of the vote.

Riot police broke up days of demonstrations in Minsk, the Belarusan capital, early yesterday. About 200 protesters who had been camped in the main square were arrested and carted away in trucks.

The opposition, whose candidate received only 6 percent of the vote, charged that the elections were blatantly fraudulent, an assertion backed by independent election observers and the United States.

Under Lukashenko, 51, a former Soviet collective farm manager who came to power in 1994 as an anti-corruption crusader, Belarus has become one of the world's "outposts of tyranny," a phrase Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has used to describe half a dozen authoritarian countries. But the man Western critics have dubbed "Europe's last dictator" has won the support of Russian President Vladimir Putin, whose foreign minister defended today's police action against the protesters.

McClellan told reporters, "The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views."

He said, "We strongly condemn the actions by Belarusan security services," who "forcibly seized and detained citizens of Belarus who were peacefully demonstrating against the fraudulent March 19th election results."

Praising the European Union's decision to impose sanctions on Belarusan leaders, McClellan said, "We plan to take parallel steps involving targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions." The U.S. sanctions appeared likely to include travel restrictions against Lukashenko and other top Belarusan officials.

Lukashenko has denied being a dictator but has freely acknowledged his authoritarian tendencies.

"An authoritarian style of rule is characteristic of me, and I have always admitted it," he said in 2003, according to a BBC profile. "You need to control the country, and the main thing is not to ruin people's lives."

Election observers from the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe concluded that the March 19 balloting was not free and fair, citing a "pattern of intimidation" by the state throughout the campaign. However, some Western and Russian polling organizations have found considerable popular support for Lukashenko in Belarus, which has recorded strong economic growth under his presidency and has avoided some pitfalls of the transition to capitalism experienced by other former Soviet republics.

Behind The Crackdown In Belarus (TIME)

By Yuri Zarakhovich

Time, March 24, 2006

Exclusive: "A legitimately elected President does not have to react so cowardly," an opposition leader tells TIME in an interview after police break up a five-day protest

After five days of protests against the reelection of Alexander Lukashenko as President of Belarus, police early Friday morning arrested hundreds in an improvised tent camp in downtown Minsk, installed there as a token of popular protest against an election widely described as fraudulent and unrecognized by the U.S. TIME's Yuri Zarakhovich discussed the overnight crackdown in a phone interview with Professor Alexander Kozulin, a presidential candidate from the opposition Social-Democratic Hramada party and one of the two top opposition leaders in Belarus.

TIME: The authorities have been promising not to crack down on what they called "a pathetic tent camp." Why such a change of heart on their part?

Kozulin: Lukashenko's lost his nerve. Tomorrow, Saturday, March 25, is a major national holiday, albeit unrecognized officially — the anniversary of the Belarus People's Republic, our independent state, proclaimed back in 1918 and destroyed several months later. Lots of people always gather to mark this day. Now, the anniversary coincided with mass election fraud protests. The opposition has called upon the people to come to the square en masse to protest. The authorities were scared that this "pathetic tent camp" worked as a toehold for the dozens of thousands who would show up tomorrow — and turn Minsk into a free city. So they moved to remove it.

TIME: How did the crackdown happen?

Kozulin: As the night was falling, most people left the square. Just some 300 kids were staying there to keep vigil overnight. Most of them students. When the police surrounded them, the kids just sat on the ground in a circle, holding hands. They did not resist. First, the cops removed all the media from the vicinity of the square, then they started carrying the protesters to prison wagons bodily. My two nephews were among those arrested in the square. They are still in jail.

TIME: How do the people react?

Kozulin: My mom, who survived the Nazi occupation, says that Lukashism is worse.

TIME: How so?

Kozulin: What happened last night is just a part of a general crackdown. They have been picking up people individually — not just opposition activists, but many of those who as much as dared bring food to the tent camp. Same as the Nazis arrested those trying to bring some food to concentration camps inmates. In just three days after the election, they have arrested close to 1,000 people, including the kids in the square. They had also arrested some 500 activists within the week before the election.

DOJ_NMG_0022129

They destroy this country's future when they stifle the people's right to self-expression and protest. They destroy this country's future when they thrown the young in jails. This is Lukashism.

TIME: What now?

Kozulin: Now they will cordon the square off and try to keep the people out. But the people will be coming tomorrow anyway. We have always called for peaceful protests, but now Lukashenko provokes violence. He will bear the entire responsibility, should it happen. The authorities should have learned to listen to their people. But they are provoking violence instead. This only proves once again that they are illegitimate, and that this "election" was a fraudulent farce.

TIME: Why?

Kozulin: A legitimately elected President does not have to react so cowardly. Lukashenko has overstepped all the boundaries. He is a menace to his own people. He has been scared of a revolution, but what he does not understand is that he has triggered that revolution himself. His abuse of power has triggered the most important revolution of all — the one in people's minds. Even many of those who had sided with him are now indignant at this rape of the Constitution and crackdown on the people.

TIME: What do you think of the world's reaction?

Kozulin: The U.S. and the E.U. stands have been very encouraging. However, it is important that they remain consistent positions, rather than just one-time declared stands. All the possibilities of talking with Lukashenko have been exhausted; he understands only the language of force. He is not a menace just to his own country; he is a menace to the world. If the international community wants to defuse this menace, the Belarusian issue must be brought to the U.N. Security Council and raised at the G-8 summit, planned in St. Petersburg, Russia in July. Otherwise, this summit will be just so much mockery of the G-8 principles.

White House Joins In Sanctions Vs. Belarus (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The United States joined European nations Friday in imposing sanctions on Belarus in retaliation for a crackdown on political protesters after an election that the White House said was fraudulent.

Washington will act in unison with the European Union in applying targeted travel restrictions and financial sanctions against President Alexander Lukashenko and others, the White House said.

"Our nation's thoughts are with those who have been harassed, detained, imprisoned or beaten for their efforts" to return freedom to Belarus, the White House said in a presidential message.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said the administration urges "all members of the international community to demand that authorities in Belarus respect the rights of their own citizens to express themselves peacefully and to condemn any and all abuses."

He said the United States strongly condemned actions by Belarus' security forces who seized and detained citizens demonstrating against the results of the presidential election.

"The United States calls on authorities in Belarus to release without delay the hundreds of citizens who have been detained not only in the past 24 hours but in recent days and weeks simply for expressing their political views," McClellan said.

Russia, which is close to the former Soviet republic, has taken a different tack, saying the media had distorted the severity of the police action.

A State Department spokesman, Adam Ereli, said, "The Russians have obviously taken a position regarding the elections in Belarus I think that differs from ours."

"Every country is obviously free to decide what it wants to do," Ereli said.

Defiant Belarus Opposition Shifts To A Jailhouse Wall (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

MINSK, Belarus, March 24 — The young man stood by the prison wall and read the names to a crowd of family members.

"Vitushka," he said. "Ten days."

DOJ_NMG_0022130

"Vinogradov," he said. "Ten days."

"Marchuk," he said, and repeated the same jail sentence, written on a scrap of paper he said the opposition had managed to smuggle out.

The center of the psychological chess game between the autocratic government of Belarus and its emboldened new opposition shifted Friday from a small camp on October Square to a pretrial detention center, where much of the opposition movement now finds itself locked up.

Since March 19, when President Aleksandr G. Lukashenko won a landslide re-election that the West and the opposition say was tainted by abuse and fraud, Belarus's opposition has challenged Mr. Lukashenko as never before, risking police violence and arrest to assemble in public and denounce the official result.

Mr. Lukashenko and his police forces, which had never allowed such dissent, refrained from arresting the demonstrators until early Friday morning, when the riot police broke up a demonstration that had continued for more than 80 hours.

The crackdown stopped the largest public display of defiance against Mr. Lukashenko's rule, but it was only the most visible effort of the government's effort to tamp down these protests before they spread.

During the demonstration, each time protesters ventured away from the relative safety of their camp, they faced a gantlet of undercover security officers, waiting at subway token booths, lurking on train platforms, loitering near their homes.

The officers arrested demonstrators by the score, and hunted for anyone believed to be a potential supporter or participant in the demonstration.

On Friday, the relatives of the detained and opposition members who had eluded arrest turned up at the jailhouse walls, demanding to know who was inside, and trying to get the officials to accept parcels for the detainees. The bags contained nuts, juice, toothbrushes and clean clothes.

The jail officials refused to accept them, just as they refused to provide a list of detainees, forcing the relatives to rely on the occasional call from within on smuggled cellphones, and to trade stories of beatings and young men spending the night shivering outside in the jail yard.

Sometimes the gates would open and several prisoners would be seen being transferred away by bus. "We are together!" their friends and family would chant. Sometimes an ambulance would appear, and the crowd would wonder who had been hurt?

One man passed the limited word they had of trials. The trend was clear: 10-day sentences. The charge: participating in an unsanctioned rally.

Jail sentences will not stop them, opposition members said. Their next move, they said, will be to try to assemble for another demonstration on Saturday.

But the government was already moving against them, deploying more police officers on the square, and using state television to denounce those already in jail.

A propaganda campaign was also under way. After the protest was broken up, state television showed images of a square littered with alcohol containers and pornography, along with syringes and packets of white powder, and suggested that the camp was simply a drug-fueled orgy.

"Of course it is easier to carry out different sexual experiments on psychologically unstable youth," the news broadcaster said. October Square, he said, was turned by the demonstrators into "an ugly, criminal tumor on Minsk's body."

But journalists for The New York Times passed all four nights night on the square and saw no alcohol, drugs or pornographic materials inside the camp. Minutes after the riot police departed early Friday, alcohol bottles and pornography were in abundance, as if they had been planted.

At the prison walls, the remaining opposition members said they were undeterred. "It is easy to sit in your warm kitchen and speak against this regime," said Sergei Karievsky, 50, an architect. "But if the sleeping society is ever going to be awakened, someone has to go out in the cold and fight for their rights."

Senators Soften Line On China Trade Sanctions (FT)

By Geoff Dyer And Chris Swann

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022131

Advocates of free trade were hopeful on Friday that a more conciliatory stance by two US senators who have threatened draconian legislation against China would help cool anger in Congress over China's trade policies.

Senators Charles Schumer of New York and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, who sponsored a bill to place a 27.5 per cent tariff on Chinese exports entering the US, said the country had taken "a big first step" towards establishing a more flexible currency regime. Speaking on a visit to China, they said they would make a decision only next week on whether to put their bill for a vote on March 31. They hinted, however, that any vote would be delayed for at least a month.

The two senators have been visiting China this week to monitor progress China has made in reforming its currency, which they believe is 15-40 per cent undervalued. Their bill has become the focal point of growing commercial tensions between the US and China and prompted fears of a wave of protectionism.

"There has been a meeting of minds [on the issue of a floating currency] which we have helped accomplish," Mr Schumer said in Shanghai on Friday. "Before Sunday I would have characterised China's trade policy as mercantilist. But I am convinced now that the Chinese government agrees that the currency should float."

The idea had been included in China's 11th five-year plan, outlined this month, although it was added at the last minute, he said. His latest comments gave reason to believe that he would not push for a vote on the bill next week.

The softer tone may also take pressure off the administration of President George W. Bush, which has been struggling to contain mounting frustration on Congress.

"The legislation was unlikely ever to have become law, because the Republican leadership in the House would have been reluctant to let it go to a vote," said Dan Griswold, director of the centre for trade policy studies at the Cato Institute. "But as a symbol the proposed legislation was very unhelpful. The threat of high and sweeping tariffs against our third largest trading partner was the height of irresponsibility."

China revalued its currency by 2.1 per cent last July but since then the pace of appreciation has been slow, with the renminbi rising by less than 1 per cent against the dollar. According to Mr Schumer, Zhou Xiaochuan, the head of the Chinese central bank, explained that the government had needed time to establish the market infrastructure for a floating currency.

The senators did not give the Chinese a deadline for moving to a floating renminbi, although Mr Schumer added: "Six months is obviously too short for the Chinese,10 years too long."

Mr Graham was more sceptical. "Are they just doing the least amount possible or is there a genuine effort to embrace reform? The jury is still out," he said. However, he implied that any vote on the bill would be delayed at least until after the April visit to the US of President Hu Jintao of China. "By the end of April we will know more [about Chinese intentions]," he said.

Stephen Green, economist with Standard Chartered Bank in Shanghai, said: "We believe that Senator Schumer will not table the bill on the basis of the real progress that has been made...in part because of the pressure created by their bill."

However, Chuck Grassley, the chairman of the Senate finance committee, and Max Baucus, the ranking Democrat, may yet unveil even stronger draft legislation on China next week. It is expected to include provisions for the US to push complaints forward at the World Trade Organisation.

Enemy Lines In Lucent Deal, Two Rivals Face Inroads From China (WSJ)

By Sara Silver, Dennis K. Berman, Leila Abboud

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

U.S. Firm, France's Alcatel See Bulking Up as a Key To Thriving in Telecom Gearing for Beijing Olympics

One key factor fueling the merger talks between France's leading telecommunications-equipment maker and its longtime U.S. rival is a looming competitive threat: China.

In a plan made public late Thursday night, Alcatel SA of Paris is pursuing a more than $13 billion merger1 with Lucent Technologies Inc., whose roots stretch back to Alexander Graham Bell's first telephone. The two came close to merging five years ago but talks fell apart.

Now, there is renewed urgency for a deal. Chinese upstarts such as Huawei Technologies Co. and ZTE Corp. are beginning to enter their turf with cheaper products, threatening to seize market share, take jobs and set industry standards for the huge Chinese market.

Alcatel, Lucent and its main competitors Telefon AB L.M. Ericsson, Nokia Corp. and Nortel Networks Corp., make technology that is largely invisible to consumers but underlies many of the services they use: telecommunications networks transmitting voice, video and Internet traffic.

Both Lucent and Alcatel hope that the fast-changing global telecom landscape will keep their deal from becoming a political football. A slew of other recent deals, including Dubai Ports World's plan to take over some operations at key U.S. ports and a possible purchase of Unocal Corp. by China's Cnooc Ltd., fell apart over U.S. opposition. Lucent may be an especially sensitive target, because its research arm, Bell Labs, develops defense and homeland-security technology. So far there hasn't been any uproar in Washington over the prospect of a deal.

Across the Atlantic, France has become increasingly prickly about mergers affecting its home-grown companies. The proposed Alcatel-Lucent deal would likely cost thousands of jobs, as the companies try to slash costs.

The planned transaction comes amid a massive consolidation of the U.S. telecom industry, which is still struggling to recover from a collapse that began in 2001. Some $200 billion of deals have been announced in the past two years. Most recently, AT&T Inc. announced plans to buy BellSouth Corp. for $67 billion. Other transactions have included Verizon Communications Inc.'s acquisition of MCI Inc., and the earlier purchase of AT&T Corp. by the former SBC Communications Inc., which took the AT&T name.

For Alcatel and Lucent, the deal makes sense because of the shrinking of the U.S. and European client pool and the prospect of stronger Chinese competition.

Last year, for instance, BT Group PLC of the United Kingdom signaled Huawei had arrived on the global stage by awarding it a sizeable piece of its multibillion-dollar project to upgrade its infrastructure. Huawei, based in the southern Chinese city of Shenzhen, started by concentrating its export strategy on developing countries, partly to avoid competing with the industry's giants as it built up its expertise, touting deals in Thailand, Indonesia and Bulgaria.

The pressures Lucent and Alcatel are facing in such markets was visible at an industry trade show in New Delhi this week. Just inside the main entrance, the first sight for many attendees was the giant booth of China's ZTE, where it demonstrated equipment for next-generation cellphone networks, wireless broadband and video cellphones.

For ZTE and Huawei, India is a second big opportunity to prove themselves against global competitors. Both companies played starring roles in the rapid buildup of China's wireless networks during the past six years.

Meanwhile, China is expected to start awarding licenses for so-called third-generation, or 3G, networks in the next six months in order to give its own state-owned phone companies time to prepare services for the 2008 Olympics in Beijing. China already is the largest mobile-phone market, and the upgrade may form the world's biggest high-speed wireless network.

To be sure, Chinese vendors including Huawei currently make up a fraction of the world market. They hold about 5% of the wireless market, including new contracts within China, and about 10% of the market for optical equipment such as switches, according to analyst Paul Sagawa of Sanford Bernstein.

"The biggest impediment to Huawei on a global stage is the lack of a service and support infrastructure," Mr. Sagawa says. "Carriers don't want to have to rely on engineers in Beijing to solve problems. They want people on the ground."

Once a highflying industry leader, Lucent now stands to represent something far different: the globalization of technology markets, where a few huge players supply gear to everyone from Polish wireless companies to Brazilian cable-TV firms.

In this transition, Lucent, once the most widely held stock in America, would enter a new era. As envisioned, the combined company will be registered as a French firm, have its executive offices in Paris and its operational offices in New Jersey, according to people familiar with the matter. It would trade on European markets, with its American depositary receipts still trading on the New York Stock Exchange. All told, Alcatel would hold about 60% of a newly combined firm.

Lucent would continue to hold power, too. Current Chief Executive Patricia Russo would become the company's chief executive, with Alcatel's Mike Quigley retaining his No. 2 spot.

Alcatel's Serge Tchuruk would be company chairman, and the two sides would share equal representation on the board.

The two sides have already had a preliminary agreement in place for about two weeks, said a person familiar with the matter. A final announcement could come next week, this person said, though the timing could slip. One item still on the agenda: the new firm's name. The two companies are more likely to choose an entirely new moniker than keep their existing names.

Lucent and Alcatel declined to comment.

Integrating two bureaucratic organizations -- Lucent has 30,000 employees and Alcatel about 56,000 -- would be a difficult task for any manager. Language differences and time-zone changes make that harder.

Industry observers have long expected equipment makers to follow the wave of mergers among operators that has marked the telecommunications industry in recent years.

But consolidation among operators in domestic markets is just one factor pushing equipment makers into each other's arms. New equipment makers have arrived on the scene as developing countries are becoming major markets for advanced technology. European and American companies don't have deep-rooted business connections to lock out the newcomers in those markets. Indeed, some countries see a political, as well as economic, advantage in working with manufacturers from other developing countries, such as China.

For Lucent, a deal with Alcatel would reinsert it in a larger company after a roller-coaster decade on its own. Spun off from the old AT&T in 1996, Lucent ultimately slashed close to 80% of its peak work force through spinoffs, buyouts and layoffs. Ms. Russo, a former Eastman Kodak Co. executive, became chairwoman and CEO of Lucent in 2002, and was credited with navigating the turmoil.

She tried to focus the company more on its customers, use its scientists to help solve their problems and to devise new business lines for the company, and expand into emerging markets, especially China. Lucent recently won bids to provide Internet-based network systems for television, telephone and high-speed data traffic that are expected to produce significant sales in 2007.

Lucent was profitable in 2004 and 2005, although most were paper profits from credits in the company's overfunded pension plans, not profit from operations.

It was in part delays in signing contracts to build China's next-generation networks that led Lucent to a loss in its first fiscal quarter of 2006, which began in October.

Any merger would mark a big boost for Alcatel and cap Mr. Tchuruk's decade at its helm. If successful, the move would stake Alcatel's future on increasing its market in the U.S. Lucent is strong in the wireless technology, called CDMA, used by big U.S. mobile-phone providers such as Verizon Wireless and Sprint Nextel Corp. Geographical reach in the U.S. was one of the main reasons Alcatel had sought a failed merger with Lucent five years ago.

The Marseilles-born son of Armenian immigrants, Mr. Tchuruk guided Alcatel through the tech bubble, and subsequent implosion, by streamlining operations and refocusing on telecom. He reduced Alcatel's work force by about 70%, or 40,000 employees, through job cuts and by selling off its mobile-handset division and engineering units.

Slowly, Alcatel emerged as a global leader in DSL technology, which updates regular telephone lines to carry high-speed Internet and other digital services. The company won major contracts with phone companies, which needed to revamp their lines to offer new services such as digital TV to compete with cable companies raiding their turf.

Even as Mr. Tchuruk had stabilized the business, signs of problems began emerging last year, analysts say. The company lost some contracts, issued profit warnings and experienced volatile swings. Alcatel also faced looming strategic choices: Should it focus investment on its dominant fixed-line business, or try to bolster its relatively weak wireless business through acquisitions?

Some analysts wonder why Mr. Tchuruk is plunging the company into a risky deal when Alcatel just now seems to have gotten its own house in order. "It would take a herculean feat to put two companies together," said Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura Securities. "You likely end up with a value-destroying merger."

Large buyers of telecom equipment signaled their support over the prospect of a deal. William Smith, chief technology officer of BellSouth, says that "there is an onslaught of new Chinese technology" that poses a threat to companies such as Lucent and Alcatel. By pooling research resources, the telecom industry could see the development of more new technologies, he adds. "You haven't seen any Nobel Prizes out of those organizations recently," he said.

Follow The Chopsticks (NYT)

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

China's relentless economic growth has created severe environmental problems and depleted its natural resources. Its energy demands have contributed to rising oil prices and the gases associated with global warming. So it is heartening when China, the world's most populous nation, takes steps to curb its appetites. We hope other countries (like the United States) may be similarly inspired.

Last week, Beijing announced plans to raise existing taxes and impose new ones on things like gas-guzzling cars and trucks, and disposable wooden chopsticks. The 5 percent chopsticks tax (a tax that also extends to floor planking) is intended to persuade people to buy reusable and plastic chopsticks in order to slow clear-cutting in Southeast Asia.

Similarly, Chinese officials announced a big jump in taxes on vehicles with large engines, while reducing taxes on smaller vehicles. This follows an earlier directive imposing more stringent fuel-economy standards on all vehicles sold after July 1. Taken together, the moves reflect growing official concern about the rapid proliferation of private vehicles in China.

This is good news for anyone worried about global warming because a big percentage of greenhouse gas emissions come from vehicles. Even with more efficient cars, however, China is expected to be an increasingly heavy producer of those gases because it relies so heavily on coal-fired power plants. The increased gases from these plants are likely to cancel out any savings from automobiles unless some way is found to reduce them.

Still, China is to be commended for using regulatory levers and economic incentives to encourage more efficient cars and trucks. Neither Congress nor the White House has done much of anything to improve the efficiency of this country's vehicles for the past 20 years.

Russia And China Bridle At Paying UN More (FT)

By Mark Turner

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

The US has sparked protests from Russia and China by proposing a fundamental change to the way contributions to the United Nations are calculated that would make them pay more.

The US, the organisation's biggest contributor, wants to shift from a formula broadly based on gross national income (GNI) to one that takes account of purchasing power parity (PPP) – a tool used by economists to compare living standards in different countries more accurately.

In testimony prepared for a congressional hearing, before that hearing was delayed, John Bolton, the US ambassador to the UN, argued that the GNI-based calculations could be "greatly skewed by distortions introduced into the marketplace by -currencies which are non--convertible". By using PPP indicators "as an important economic tool in its discussions of scale of assessments", Mr Bolton says, the UN would be "be better equipped and have more balanced data".

But the move is a clear challenge to China and Russia, and to developing countries, whose relative wealth is considerably higher when measured by PPP.

"PPP would radically shift the balance," said one UN diplomat. "Developing countries would pay a lot more."

China would be particularly affected: its share of world GNI is about 4 per cent, a UN economist said, but when measured by PPP it rises to 12 per cent.

Currently China contributes only 2.1 per cent of the UN's budget, while Russia accounts for 1.1 per cent. By contrast, the US pays 22 per cent, and France and the UK each pay about 6 per cent.

Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, told the FT that Beijing was "definitely opposed" to a PPP-based formula. He said there was no consensus on how it should be measured.

Andrey Denisov, the Russian ambassador, similarly hit out against the proposal, saying that Moscow was ready to consider increasing its contribution but that this had to be done "in a voluntary way", through a "more fair, less induced" mechanism.

The US proposal is being made as European countries seek to increase or remove a cap that limits to 22 per cent the percentage of the UN's core budget paid by any one member state. Without that cap, the US contribution would rise to more than 30 per cent under the current formula, a diplomat said. Meanwhile Japan is pushing what its diplomats describe as a more “modest proposal”, which does not use PPP. It wants permanent members of the Security Council to pay at least 3 or 5 per cent of the core budget.

The US and Japanese proposals will be considered among others by an expert committee in June, ahead of a final decision by the end of the year.

Security Council Urges Faster Planning For UN Force In Darfur (AFP)

AFP, March 25, 2006

The UN Security Council called for faster preparations for the African Union (AU) to hand over its peacekeeping mission in Sudan's western Darfur region to the United Nations.

The 15-member body unanimously adopted a resolution that also decided to extend for at least six months the mandate of the UN mission in south Sudan (UNMIS).

The text directed UN chief Kofi Annan, working with the AU and in consultations with the council "to expedite the necessary preparatory planning for transition" from the AU force known as AMIS to a UN operation.

This would include options for how UNMIS can provide transitional assistance -- such as in logistics, mobility and communications.

"The unacceptable violence in western Darfur and on the Chad border has influenced the discussions in New York about the renewal of the UNMIS mandate in a way that we are looking to help facilitate the transition to a rehatted UN force by putting in language and procedures to strengthen that now and not have to wait for six months," US State Department Deputy spokesman Adam Ereli said in Washington.

Early this month, AU foreign ministers agreed in principle at a meeting in the Ethiopian capital Addis Ababa to transfer the AU mission in strife-torn Darfur to the United Nations. They also extended the current AMIS mission for six months.

The AU reached the decision despite spirited opposition from Khartoum, which argued that the transfer would risk worsening the situation in Darfur.

Friday's resolution also called on Annan to report to the council by April 24 "on a range of options for a United Nations operation in Darfur" and to continue to provide "maximum possible assistance to AMIS."

It asked Annan and the AU to consult with international and regional bodies and member states "to identify resources to support AMIS during transition to a United Nations operation."

The text also strongly condemned activities of militias and armed groups such as Uganda's rebel Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), "which continue to attack civilians and commit human rights abuses in Sudan."

Under pressure from Ugandan troops, LRA rebels have fled to southern Sudan and Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC). Ugandan troops have permission from Khartoum to pursue the rebels on southern Sudanese soil.

Sunday Annan appealed for Sudanese cooperation in the handover of AMIS peacekeeping duties to the UN as security deteriorates in Darfur.

"The situation in Darfur is deteriorating. We must do everything to help the displaced people and those in need of assistance," he told a press conference at the end of a visit to the Indian Ocean island of Madagascar.

"I hope we will have the cooperation of the Sudanese government," he added.

In February, the Security Council approved contingency planning for a UN takeover in Darfur and Annan suggested that Western countries help by providing logistical support and air assets for the new UN force.

The 7,000-strong AMIS force, which was deployed in 2004, has been suffering from poor funding and inadequate resources to contain the escalating bloodshed.

The United States has been lobbying for the sending of a UN-led force, backed by NATO, and probably double the current AU deployment, to take over peacekeeping in Darfur.

War in Darfur broke out in February 2003, when black ethnic groups launched a rebellion against Khartoum that was brutally repressed by the Arab Islamist regime and local militiamen, the Janjaweed. Both sides have been accused of violating a truce signed in April 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0022136

The combined effect of the war and one of the world's worst humanitarian crises has left up to 300,000 people dead and an estimated 2.4 million displaced.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Privileged Conversations Said Not Excluded From Spying (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The National Security Agency has the authority to listen without warrants to conversations between lawyers and their clients and doctors and their patients if a connection to Al Qaeda is suspected, the Justice Department told Congress in a report released Friday.

"Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception" if they met the other requirements of the eavesdropping program, including if there were a suspected link to Al Qaeda and if one party were outside the United States, the Justice Department said. It did not say whether that authority had been used.

Federal policy generally recognizes a high standard of confidentiality for privileged attorney-client and doctor-patient conversations. The monitoring of federal jailhouse conversations between a lawyer and a client, for instance, requires a special order of the attorney general.

The Justice Department's position on the question of privileged conversations came in its written responses to nearly 100 questions posed by Republicans and Democrats about the N.S.A.'s eavesdropping program, which has provoked fierce debate in Congress since it was disclosed last December.

Representative John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, one of the Democrats who questioned the department about the legal and operational details of the program, said the administration's suggestion that privileged communications could be monitored without a warrant was "one of the few revealing answers" in more than 50 pages of responses.

For the most part, Mr. Conyers said, the answers were "vague and unresponsive" and reflected an effort by the administration to "thumb its nose at the American people and their elected representatives."

The bulk of the written responses repeated the assertions the administration has made in defending the program in public statements, written reports and Congressional testimony in the last three months.

Once again, the Justice Department strongly defended the legality of the program, based on President Bush's constitutional authority to protect the country and a Congressional resolution passed after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. The department characterized as flawed and unfounded charges from critics that the program violated the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act of 1978, which required warrants from a special court for eavesdropping operations in intelligence cases.

The department also defended the effectiveness of the program, despite suggestions from some law enforcement officials that it had led to far more dead ends than productive leads. With the operation aimed at preventing another terrorist attack, the Justice Department said it "is confident that the program is helping to achieve that goal."

But as it has done repeatedly, the department refused to answer directly nearly all the questions raised by Democrats about the operational aspects of the program or what limits if any it saw to the president's legal authority to protect the country.

DOJ: NSA Could've Monitored Lawyers' Calls (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, March 25, 2006

The National Security Agency could have legally monitored ordinarily confidential communications between doctors and patients or attorneys and their clients, the Justice Department said Friday of its controversial warrantless surveillance program.

Responding to questions from Congress, the department also said that it sees no prohibition to using information collected under the NSA's program in court.

DOJ_NMG_0022140

"Because collecting foreign intelligence information without a warrant does not violate the Fourth Amendment and because the Terrorist Surveillance Program is lawful, there appears to be no legal barrier against introducing this evidence in a criminal prosecution," the department said in responses to questions from lawmakers released Friday evening.

The department said that considerations, including whether classified information could be disclosed, must be weighed.

In classified court filings, the Justice Department has responded to questions about whether information from the government's warrantless surveillance program was used to prosecute terror suspects. Defense attorneys are hoping to use that information to challenge the cases against their clients.

Since the program was disclosed in December, some skeptical lawmakers have investigated the Bush administration's legal footing, raising questions including whether the program could capture doctor-patient and attorney-client communications. Such communications normally receive special legal protections.

"Although the program does not specifically target the communications of attorneys or physicians, calls involving such persons would not be categorically excluded from interception," the department said.

The department said the same general criteria for the surveillance program would also apply to doctors' and lawyers' calls: one party must be outside the United States and there must be reason to believe one party is linked to al-Qaida. The department's written response also said that these communications aren't specifically targeted and safeguards are in place to protect privacy rights.

Michigan Rep. John Conyers (news, bio, voting record), the House Judiciary Committee's top Democrat, complained about the department's evasiveness in answers to questions from the House and Senate Judiciary Committees, submitted to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. All but two of 45 answers to the House Judiciary Democrats were vague and unresponsive, Conyers said.

He found the response regarding doctor-patient and attorney-client privilege particularly troublesome. More generally, the "need for oversight is especially glaring," he said in a statement.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said the department "has been extremely forthcoming and clear about the administration's legal analysis through multiple briefings with Congress, three hearings with the Attorney General, multiple letters to Congress, a 42-page white paper and dozens of questions for the record."

Responding in 75 typed pages, the department clarified some points in the three-month-old debate over the program. But it also left many questions unanswered, citing the need for national security.

The House Democrats asked if any other president has authorized wiretaps without court warrants since the passage of the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, which governs intelligence collection inside the United States.

Choosing its words carefully, the department said, "if the question is limited to 'electronic surveillance' ... we are unaware of such authorizations."

The department also made clear that the program — as confirmed by President Bush — has never been suspended since it began in October 2001. That would include 2004, when reports indicate serious doubts about the program were raised by Justice Department officials.

But the department refused to discuss, or even confirm, a meeting in 2004 at then-Attorney General John Ashcroft's hospital bed. News reports indicated that White House Chief of Staff Andy Card and Gonzales, then White House counsel, needed his help to quell dissent about the program.

Lawmakers also asked whether federal judges on a secretive intelligence court objected to the program and, if so, how the administration responded.

The department wouldn't answer, citing the need to protect classified information. "We assure you, however, that the department keeps the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court fully informed regarding information that is relevant to the FISA process," the response said.

The department also avoided questions on whether the administration believes it is legal to wiretap purely domestic calls without a warrant, when al-Qaida activity is suspected. The department wouldn't say specifically that it hasn't been done.

"Interception of the content of domestic communications would present a different legal question," the department said.

Federal Judge Appointed To FISA Court (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

U.S. District Judge John D. Bates has been named to replace a judge who resigned from the secretive court set up by Congress to oversee domestic spying.

DOJ_NMG_0022141

Bates, a former Whitewater prosecutor, was appointed by Chief Justice John Roberts in February to replace U.S. District Judge James Robertson, who quit shortly after news reports about the Bush administration going around the court to eavesdrop on U.S. citizens suspected of communicating with terrorists.

The appointment was not announced by the court. Secrecy News reported the appointment Friday after it appeared in Bates' official online biography.

"In February 2006, he was appointed by Chief Justice Roberts to serve as a judge of the United States Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court," according to Bates' bio on the Web site maintained by the U.S. District Court of the District of Columbia.

Bates was named to the federal bench in 2001 by President Bush. Prior to joining the court, Bates worked as a private practice attorney. From 1995 to 1997, he was an assistant U.S. attorney who wored for Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr on the investigation into President Clinton's Whitewater investment deals.

The FISA court reviews applications for domestic intelligence surveillance and search warrant requests, as outlined in the 1978 Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

While Robertson never spoke publicly of his resignation, many believe he quit in protest over the National Security Agency's monitoring of international calls — when one party is inside the United States — without first getting court approval.

Under the program first disclosed last year, the NSA has been conducting the surveillance when calls and e-mails are thought to involve al-Qaida. President Bush authorized the program after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

Unwelcome Attention From Moussaoui Trial (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis And David Johnston

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The sentencing trial of Zacarias Moussaoui was supposed to have been the government's best opportunity to hold someone accountable for the deaths on Sept. 11, 2001.

But after federal prosecutors finished laying out their case this week, even those who strongly supported an aggressive prosecution may wonder whether the trial has shed as much light on Mr. Moussaoui's culpability as it has on the missteps and mistakes by law enforcement agencies.

The testimony of two prosecution witnesses, in particular, has brought renewed and unwelcome attention to how the Federal Bureau of Investigation dealt with early warning signs.

Mr. Moussaoui is the sole person to go to trial in an American courtroom for the attacks, making him a proxy for the 19 hijackers who were killed carrying out the attacks and the chief planners who are being held in secret C.I.A. prisons overseas.

Mr. Moussaoui in jail on Sept. 11, but prosecutors have argued that he deserves to be executed because he lied to investigators about what he knew of Al Qaeda plans to fly planes into buildings when he was arrested three weeks earlier on immigration violations.

On Monday, defense lawyers are expected to offer a set of extraordinary trial exhibits, statements about Mr. Moussaoui by a handful of senior Qaeda officials gathered somewhere in the secret overseas detention centers that the C.I.A. maintains.

The jury will be read the statements from detainees including Khalid Shaik Mohammed, the mastermind of Sept. 11, and Ramzi bin al-Shibh, its paymaster. Officials expect the two to describe Mr. Moussaoui as an unreliable fringe figure in Al Qaeda.

The government presentation, which ended on Thursday, did not go smoothly. First, the prosecution nearly collapsed after the disclosure that a transportation lawyer working with the prosecutors had improperly coached aviation witnesses.

Although that occurred out of the jury's view, other problems surfaced when the prosecutors presented two witnesses supposed to bolster their case that Mr. Moussaoui's lies made him responsible for nearly 3,000 deaths. The two witnesses testified that if he had told the truth on Aug. 16, 2001, the bureau could have moved swiftly to foil the plot.

The first witness, Harry Samit, an F.B.I. agent in Minnesota who questioned Mr. Moussaoui at his arrest, firmly asserted that had he been given the truth "we would have several new leads to investigate," and the plot might have been thwarted. Instead, he said, Mr. Moussaoui's answers sent investigators on "wild goose chases."

Under cross-examination by Edward B. MacMahon Jr., a court-appointed lawyer for Mr. Moussaoui, Mr. Samit acknowledged that after the attacks he had written strongly worded reports saying his superiors had improperly blocked his efforts to investigate Mr. Moussaoui. He added that he was convinced that Mr. Moussaoui was a terrorist involved in an imminent hijacking plot.

That senior bureau officials dragged their feet on investigating Mr. Moussaoui by seeking search warrants from a special intelligence court or a more routine criminal search warrant was not new. But it had never been presented so vividly as a reluctant Mr. Samit was obliged to do under cross-examination.

He offered a devastating comment from a supervisor who said pressing too hard to obtain a warrant for Mr. Moussaoui would hurt his career. Mr. Samit also wrote that his superiors did not act because they were guilty of "criminal negligence" and they were gambling that Mr. Moussaoui had little to offer. The lost wager, Mr. Samit said, was paid in many lives.

Mr. Samit was followed to the witness stand by Michael Rolince, a retired F.B.I. counterterrorism supervisor who similarly recited a list of actions that the bureau could have taken if Mr. Moussaoui had told them about Qaeda plans to take over planes with knives and fly into buildings.

But when Mr. MacMahon began reading from a document detailing many suspicions about Mr. Moussaoui's intentions, Mr. Rolince interrupted, "Can I ask what document that's coming from?"

Mr. MacMahon obliged, noting that it was an urgent memorandum written by Mr. Samit on Aug. 18, 2001, hoping to attract the attention of headquarters. Mr. Rolince had inadvertently underlined that the agent's suspicions had never risen to his attention.

One problem for the bureau is that the backbone of the prosecution case, that the bureau could have disrupted the plot had Mr. Moussaoui admitted all he knew, represents a substantial revision of conventional wisdom at the law enforcement agency.

For years, agents have expressed the view that Mr. Moussaoui knew little about what his Qaeda superiors wanted of him and had said that it was highly speculative whether more information would have deterred the attacks.

A number of bureau officials have contended that even if the bureau had more clues about the hijackers, they might have been able only to put them under surveillance because they had not committed any crime.

Sally Regenhard of the Bronx, whose son, a probationary firefighter, was killed in the collapse of the World Trade Center, said she was upset by the reminders of the failure of law enforcement authorities to heed many leads before the attacks.

"It's dismaying, but there it is," said Ms. Regenhard, who has been one of the dozens of family members of Sept. 11 victims who have visited the Virginia courtroom to observe the trial. "There were discrete warnings known to the government. People don't realize this."

The most pivotal moment may occur next week, however, when Mr. Moussaoui is expected to take the stand. Under the federal death penalty law, the jurors have to consider first whether he is responsible for any of the Sept. 11 deaths before they consider several factors in deciding whether to order his execution. The jury would have to be unanimous in deciding he bore responsibility for the trial to go to the next phase.

In addition to the evidence, the jurors may respond viscerally and decide that Mr. Moussaoui is an odious figure undeserving of sympathy. They have heard some of his outbursts in pretrial proceedings in which he proclaimed in their presence his membership in Al Qaeda. He has said that he was indeed training to fly a plane into a building but that he was not involved in the Sept. 11 plot and should not be executed for it.

His testimony will give the jurors another opportunity to take his measure.

9/11 Lawyer Won't Testify On Her Actions (WP)

By Jerry Markon

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Violation Halted Moussaoui Case

A government lawyer whose misconduct nearly derailed the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui will not have to testify about her actions at a hearing Monday, court officials said yesterday.

Attorneys for Moussaoui had subpoenaed Carla J. Martin, who brought Moussaoui's sentencing hearing to a halt last week after she violated a court order by sharing testimony with upcoming witnesses. The subpoena had instructed her to report to U.S. District Court in Alexandria.

But Judge Leonie M. Brinkema yesterday quashed the subpoena, according to a brief notation on the court docket, which said a hearing scheduled for 9 a.m. Monday had been canceled. The docket did not offer an explanation. Attorneys for Moussaoui and Martin declined to comment because the matter remains under a court seal.

One reason a judge would quash a subpoena, legal experts said, is if the person ordered to court planned to invoke her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination and refuse to testify. Martin declined to testify at a hearing last week. Her attorney, Roscoe C. Howard Jr., has said Martin is assembling a defense but is not yet ready to explain her actions publicly.

Moussaoui, 37, pleaded guilty last year to conspiring with al-Qaeda and is the only person convicted in an American courtroom on charges stemming from the attacks on the World Trade Center and Pentagon. A federal jury in Alexandria will decide whether he receives the death penalty.

Brinkema stopped the sentencing hearing for a week after Martin violated the order forbidding most witnesses from attending or following the trial or reading transcripts. Martin e-mailed trial transcripts to seven witnesses and coached them on their testimony. She had been a liaison between aviation witnesses and the prosecution team.

Brinkema called it "the most egregious violation of the court's rules on witnesses" she had seen "in all the years I've been on the bench."

In response, Brinkema barred the testimony of the witnesses Martin had contacted and all aviation evidence, severely damaging the government's case. But after prosecutors offered a compromise, Brinkema issued a revised order saying they could use new aviation witnesses untainted by Martin's conduct.

The aviation evidence is crucial to the government's central argument for Moussaoui's execution: that if he had not lied to the FBI when he was arrested in August 2001, the Sept. 11 attacks could have been stopped. Armed with Moussaoui's information about the plot, prosecutors say, the Federal Aviation Administration could have ratcheted up security at the nation's airports.

Moussaoui Trial: Attempt To Subpoena Martin Is Quashed (MINNST)

By Greg Gordon

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 25, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, VA. - Without public explanation, the judge in the death-penalty trial of Zacarias Moussaoui on Friday quashed a defense subpoena for the testimony of Carla Martin, a government lawyer found to have improperly coached prosecution witnesses.

It was not immediately clear whether Martin, a Transportation Security Administration attorney, would appear later or had signaled her intention to exercise her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. It was also possible her testimony was no longer thought to be necessary.

Disclosures that Martin circulated transcripts of the trial's first day to seven potential federal aviation witnesses and made suggestions as to how some of them should testify nearly undermined the government's push for Moussaoui's execution.

But Brinkema allowed prosecutors to present a new witness, former Federal Aviation Administration official Robert Cammaroto, this week after holding a closed hearing to evaluate whether he was free of any taint.

Cammaroto testified that if Moussaoui had told federal agents what he knew about an Al-Qaida suicide hijacking plot when he was arrested in Minnesota weeks before the Sept. 11 attacks, the FAA could have swiftly tightened security at the nation's airports.

Defense lawyers, however, petitioned the court to require Martin to testify to determine whether the "taint" extended further and subpoenaed her to appear in court at 9 a.m. Monday. Prosecutors had advised the judge they welcomed her appearance, but only if she would not invoke the Fifth Amendment.

Martin's attorney, Roscoe Howard, declined to respond to phone calls.

AP, March 24, 2006

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Defense lawyers have asked a federal appeals court to intervene in the case of two Albany Muslims accused of supporting terrorism, saying the judge erred in letting authorities keep information about wiretaps secret.

Attorneys for Yassin Aref and Mohammed Hossain filed a writ Friday asking the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals to review Judge Thomas McAvoy's pretrial ruling. Arguing that illegal warrantless wiretaps may have been used, they had filed a motion to thrown out charges, suppress any evidence from such wiretaps and force prosecutors to disclose whether they were used.

McAvoy on March 10 rejected the motion. His "classified" ruling leaves his reasons secret. The earlier responses by prosecutors and the U.S. Justice Department also were classified.

The writ says the judge "failed to rule on the legality of the NSA surveillance program, even though it is clearly a source of evidence in this case." They called the judge's handling of the issue "an especially serious breach of due process."

Yassin Aref, 35, imam at Masjid as-Salam in Albany, and Mohammed Hossain, 50, are accused of laundering money in 2003-2004 for an FBI informant, a Pakistani businessman posing as an arms dealer. Neither is accused of actual violence.

Both deny charges that they conspired to provide support to Jaish-e-Mohammed, a Pakistan-based group listed by the federal government as a terrorist organization. Aref, an emigre from the Kurdish region of northern Iraq, remains in jail awaiting trial, while Hossain is free on bond.

The NSA wiretap program, disclosed publicly Dec. 16 by The New York Times, began sometime after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and involved electronic intercepts of telephone calls and e-mails in the U.S. of people with suspected ties to al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

The disclosure prompted national debate about its legality. President Bush defended the program, saying it is an effective tool to disrupt terrorists and insisted it was not an abuse of Americans' civil liberties. Its details have not been disclosed.

On Friday, the Justice Department told Congress that it sees no prohibition to using information from the NSA program in court, and thatcalls between attorneys and their clients "would not be categorically excluded from interception." The department asserted that collecting foreign intelligence information does not violate the Fourth Amendment prohibition against unlawful searches and that the terrorist surveillance program is lawful.

Prosecutors had also asked McAvoy to shield several documents about the Albany investigation since the men were arrested almost two years ago, citing national security. Some information was released Tuesday in compliance with another order from McAvoy.

Pakistani Forces Kill 18 Militants (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Security officials say the fighting began when a government outpost was attacked in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region. One soldier dies.

PESHAWAR, Pakistan — Pakistani security forces shot dead at least 18 militants in the volatile North Waziristan tribal region near the border with Afghanistan early Friday, security officials said.

Syed Zaheerul Islam, administrator of the troubled region, said one soldier was killed and two others were wounded in the two-hour battle. He also said that foreign militants might be among the dead. The government claims could not be independently verified.

Officials said the fighting began in the Tith Nary area, southwest of Miram Shah, the regional administrative headquarters, when militants attacked a government outpost. The attackers fired rockets on the troops and security forces returned fire, authorities said.

One security official said that Cobra helicopters were called in to assist ground forces in repulsing the attack.

"We have not counted the bodies, but from the blood littered at the area and some eyewitnesses reports, we can presume that militants have suffered heavy casualties," the official said.

A recent wave of clashes has left nearly 200 militants dead in the region, officials said. Authorities have set a night curfew in Miram Shah to curtail attacks on security forces and government installations.

Opposition Decries U.S. Travel Alert For Italy As Interference In Election (WP)

By Sarah Delaney

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

ROME, March 24 -- Opposition leader Romano Prodi says he got on the phone to the U.S. ambassador right away to demand an explanation: Why did the State Department issue a public announcement warning Americans in Italy to stay away from political rallies because of possible violence?

The March 21 caution came in the final weeks of a vitriolic election campaign in which Prime Minister Silvio Berlusconi, a close U.S. ally, is trailing in the polls. To many opposition ears, the U.S. statement seemed to support Berlusconi's accusations that Prodi's alliance harbors fringe groups in its ranks that resort to violence.

"The U.S. alert surprised me," Prodi told reporters here. ". . . A move like this, with elections nearing, can cause a sense of anguish and fear, and there is no need for that."

The warning to travelers and a U.S. decision to allow Berlusconi to address a joint session of Congress in Washington on March 1, a rare honor for a foreign leader, have led to allegations here that the United States is trying to help Berlusconi win a new term.

The warning "is not political," a U.S. Embassy spokesman said. "It's not taking sides. It doesn't even have to be necessarily a political protest. We're just urging Americans to be prudent in any public protest situation." The announcement cited a March 11 incident in Milan in which youths clashed with riot police, injuring some of them and causing considerable damage to streets, cars and shops.

In a day of bickering over the warning, Berlusconi criticized Prodi for contacting the ambassador, Ronald P. Spogli, calling it "undue interference in American affairs." He said the State Department had been justified in issuing the warning, because "the United States addresses its citizens, as is its right, warning them that in Italian political demonstrations there are situations that may be dangerous for Americans."

Prodi accused the Italian government of being behind the State Department announcement, citing an explanatory note posted on the embassy Web site in response to criticisms. "The Italian government is aware of this announcement, which corresponds to various public statements by Italian authorities," the note read. The embassy said it had acted on its own initiative.

Berlusconi has backed the war in Iraq, sending about 3,000 troops to the southern part of the country after the 2003 U.S.-led invasion. Italy's participation has been unpopular with its people; from the start, the opposition has strongly criticized Berlusconi for sending the force.

The campaign has been heating up as the April 9-10 elections near. Polls show Berlusconi's House of Liberties coalition trailing the opposition's Union coalition by as much as 5 percentage points.

Last weekend, the prime minister addressed Confindustria, the powerful employers' association, accusing opposition leaders of siding with the left and calling people who supported the opposition "out of their minds."

He denied that Italy was in economic decline and said that left-leaning newspapers, some bankers and some industrialists were intentionally giving the wrong impression of the country's economic health.

Berlusconi and Prodi have already faced off in a television debate, in a format close to that used for U.S. presidential debates. The formal and tightly monitored question-and-answer formula favored Prodi, many political analysts concluded, with Berlusconi coming off looking tense.

The two are to debate again on April 3.

Israeli Athlete In '72 Games Recalls Terror (NYT)

By Avi Salzman

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

NEW HAVEN, March 23 — An Israeli athlete who survived the attacks at the Munich Olympics in 1972 spoke about his ordeal for the first time in the United States on Thursday night at Yale, warning that reprisal killings of terrorists only lead to "bloodshed and more bloodshed."

Dan Alon, once a champion Israeli fencer, said he was inspired by watching the movie "Munich" to tell the story of his escape from the building where the Palestinian terrorist group Black September had taken his fellow athletes and some coaches hostage, later killing 11 of them. He said he had kept silent in the nearly 34 years since the attack, not even telling his wife and daughter, who sat in the back of the room.

"It was emotional," he said later, explaining why he kept silent for so long. "It was very hard for me to talk."

Mr. Alon, now 60, recalled the harrowing details of his escape, including the decision by members of the shooting team not to use the guns they had brought for competition to attack the terrorists, and the sound of the creaky steps the athletes had to walk down to escape from the building.

The Munich Games, he said, had begun on a high note. The opening ceremony was "the most beautiful day of my life," he said, particularly because it was the first Olympic Games in Germany since the Holocaust.

"Coming in with the Israeli flag, it was really something I can't explain," he said. "It was really very touching."

Around 4:30 a.m. on Sept. 5, 1972, Mr. Alon said he awoke to loud noises, but he figured that another team was celebrating and he fell back asleep. Soon afterward, however, gunshots shook the walls of his room. Looking out the window, he saw a wrestling coach, Moshe Weinberg, lying on the ground outside and heard one of the terrorists speaking to German police about how they had taken hostages and wanted hundreds of Palestinian prisoners released. The terrorists, Mr. Alon said, had attacked the Israelis in apartments on either side of him, but for some unknown reason they had passed his door. He said he thinks Mr. Weinberg protected him by leading the terrorists away from his apartment.

Mr. Alon was staying with members of the shooting team, who had guns. After a short discussion, however, the athletes decided not to shoot their attackers because they did not know how many had entered the complex or whether they would retaliate by killing the hostages.

They crept slowly down the stairs of their apartment — "walking on eggs" — so as not to alert the attackers, he said.

Eventually, they got out of the building by jumping over a balcony railing and running through a garden to the German police, who shuttled them to safety. Mr. Alon said he started to cry when he saw his fellow Israelis ride by as hostages in a bus on their way to the airport where they would all die.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Assurances Sought On Port-Security Deal (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0022146

By Ted Bridis
AP, March 25, 2006

The senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee sought assurances Friday over a no-bid contract the Bush administration is finalizing with a Hong Kong conglomerate to help detect nuclear materials inside cargo passing through the Bahamas to the United States and elsewhere.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (news, bio, voting record), D-Miss., said he was concerned there will be inadequate oversight in the Bahamas, just 65 miles from Florida's coast. He cited a story published Thursday by The Associated Press describing the $6 million contract involving radiation-scanning at the largest seaport in the Bahamas.

The administration acknowledges its contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. represents the first time a foreign company will be involved in running sophisticated U.S. radiation-detection equipment at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

"I am concerned that under the arrangement detailed, a foreign company is responsible for screening containers for illicit materials without any government involvement," Thompson wrote in a letter to leaders at the Homeland Security Department and the Energy Department.

The Republican chairman of the Homeland Security Committee, Rep. Peter King (news, bio, voting record) of New York, could not be reached Friday for comment.

The contract is being negotiated by the National Nuclear Security Administration, part of the Energy Department. It has said employees of Hutchison — the world's largest ports operator — will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner at the sprawling Freeport Container Port under the direct supervision of Bahamian customs officials.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. customs officials working at an anti-terrorism center in northern Virginia.

A spokesman for the NNSA said the agency had not yet received the letter from Thompson.

News of the contract surfaced just as Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff prepared to leave on a trip to China, Japan and Singapore, where part of his mission will be to discuss air and sea port security.

Hutchison's ports subsidiary said in a statement Friday from its headquarters in Hong Kong that the U.S. contract was not yet finalized and that it was confident Bahamian customs inspectors will notify U.S. authorities whenever it is appropriate.

Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner. Separately, there are no U.S. customs agents checking cargo containers in Freeport under a related U.S. port-security program known as the Container Security Initiative run by U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

In his letter, Thompson urged better coordination between the two security programs run by agencies within the departments of Energy and Homeland Security.

"A coordinated policy between your departments would ensure that our government would have oversight over the deployment and operation of equipment in any event, especially if involvement of a foreign company is necessary," Thompson wrote to Chertoff and to Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman.

Thompson said he will support upcoming legislative efforts to combine the two programs under offices within the Homeland Security Department "to create a more streamlined security system."

Hutchison Whampoa is among the shipping industry's most-respected companies and was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

The Homeland Security Department has worked since last year to include Freeport in its Container Security Initiative program, which would include stationing U.S. customs agents at the ports. Thompson asked when those efforts will be completed. Other Hutchison-run ports in other countries already participate in that program.

U.S. To Contract Foreign Co. To Scan Cargo (AP)

By Ted Bridis And John Solomon
AP, March 25, 2006

One of Americans' favorite beach destinations, the Bahamas, is getting a new U.S. arrival — sophisticated equipment to detect radioactive materials in shipping cargo.

But U.S. customs agents won't be on site to supervise the machine's use as a nuclear safeguard for the American shoreline that is just 65 miles away from Freeport. Under an unusual arrangement, a Hong Kong company will help operate the detector.

DOJ_NMG_0022147

The Bush administration says it is finalizing a no-bid contract with Hutchison Whampoa Ltd. It acknowledged the deal is the first time a foreign company will be involved in running a radiation detector at an overseas port without American customs agents present.

The administration is negotiating a second no-bid contract for a Philippine company to install radiation detectors in its home country, according to documents obtained by The Associated Press. At dozens of other overseas ports, foreign governments are primarily responsible for scanning cargo.

While President Bush recently reassured Congress that foreigners would not manage security at U.S. ports, the Hutchison deal in the Bahamas illustrates how the administration is relying on foreign companies at overseas ports to safeguard cargo headed to the United States.

Hutchison Whampoa is the world's largest ports operator and among the industry's most-respected companies. It was an early adopter of U.S. anti-terror measures. But its billionaire chairman, Li Ka-Shing, also has substantial business ties to China's government that have raised U.S. concerns over the years.

"Li Ka-Shing is pretty close to a lot of senior leaders of the Chinese government and the Chinese Communist Party," said Larry M. Wortzel, head of a U.S. government commission that studies China security and economic issues. But Wortzel said Hutchison operates independently from Beijing, and he described Li as "a very legitimate international businessman."

"One can conceive legitimate security concerns and would hope either the Homeland Security Department or the intelligence services of the United States work very hard to satisfy those concerns," Wortzel said.

Three years ago, the Bush administration effectively blocked a Hutchison subsidiary from buying part of a bankrupt U.S. telecommunications company, Global Crossing Ltd., on national security grounds.

And a U.S. military intelligence report, once marked "secret," cited Hutchison in 1999 as a potential risk for smuggling arms and other prohibited materials into the United States from the Bahamas.

Hutchison's port operations in the Bahamas and Panama "could provide a conduit for illegal shipments of technology or prohibited items from the West to the PRC (People's Republic of China), or facilitate the movement of arms and other prohibited items into the Americas," the now-declassified assessment said.

The CIA currently has no security concerns about Hutchison's port operations, and the Bush administration believes the pending deal with the foreign company would be safe, officials said.

Supervised by Bahamian customs officials, Hutchison employees will drive the towering, truck-like radiation scanner that moves slowly over large cargo containers and scans them for radiation that might be emitted by plutonium or a radiological weapon.

Any positive reading would set off alarms monitored simultaneously by Bahamian customs inspectors at Freeport and by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials working at an anti-terrorism center 800 miles away in northern Virginia. Any alarm would prompt a closer inspection of the cargo, and there are multiple layers of security to prevent tampering, officials said.

"The equipment operates itself," said Bryan Wilkes, a spokesman for the U.S. National Nuclear Security Administration, the agency negotiating the contract. "It's not going to be someone standing at the controls pressing buttons and flipping switches."

Hutchison's ports subsidiary said in a statement Friday from its headquarters in Hong Kong it was confident that Bahamian customs inspectors will notify U.S. authorities whenever it is appropriate.

The administration is finalizing the contract amid a national debate over maritime security sparked by the furor over now-abandoned plans by Dubai-owned DP World to take over significant operations at major U.S. ports.

Rep. Bennie Thompson (news, bio, voting record), the senior Democrat on the House Homeland Security Committee, said President Bush "needs to explain what safeguards are in place at foreign ports to assure that operators are not jeopardizing our security."

"If a port operator has been identified as posing a potential threat to national security, it is only common sense that Americans should be working on site to assure U.S. security is taken seriously," Thompson said. "If the president needs more U.S. Customs inspectors to get the job done, I'd be happy to lead the charge to get however many is needed to keep America safe."

Some security experts questioned whether the U.S. should pay a foreign company with ties to China to keep radioactive material out of the United States.

"Giving a no-bid contract to a foreign company to carry out the most sensitive security screening for radioactive materials at ports abroad raises many questions," said Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y.

A low-paid employee with access to the screening equipment could frustrate international security by studying how the equipment works and which materials set off its alarms, warned a retired U.S. Customs investigator who specialized in smuggling cases.

"Money buys a lot of things," Robert Sheridan said. "The fact that foreign workers would have access to how the United States screens various containers for nuclear material and how this technology scrutinizes the containers — all those things allow someone with a nefarious intention to thwart the screening."

The Hutchison deal in the Bahamas was flagged in a report in October by ATS Worldwide Services, a Florida firm that identifies potential risks for private-sector and government clients. Company officials said they shared the report with some officials in Congress, the military and law enforcement.

Other experts discounted concerns. They cited Hutchison's reputation as a leading ports company and said the United States inevitably must rely for some security on large commercial operators in the global maritime industry.

"We must not allow an unwarranted fear of foreign ownership or involvement in offshore operations to impair our ability to protect against nuclear weapons being smuggled into this country," said Sen. Norm Coleman (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., a member of the Senate Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee. "We must work with these foreign companies."

A former Coast Guard commander, Stephen Flynn, said foreign companies sometimes prove more trustworthy — and susceptible to U.S. influence — than governments.

"It's a very fragile system," Flynn said. Foreign companies "recognize the U.S. has the capacity and willingness to exercise a kill switch if something goes wrong."

There are no U.S. customs agents checking any cargo containers at the Hutchison port in Freeport. Under the contract, no U.S. officials would be stationed permanently in the Bahamas with the radiation scanner.

Hutchison operates the sprawling Freeport Container Port on Grand Bahama Island. Its subsidiary, Hutchison Port Holdings, has operations in more than 20 countries but none in the United States.

Contract documents obtained by AP indicate Hutchison will be paid roughly $6 million. The contract is for one year with options for three years.

The National Nuclear Security Administration, which is an Energy Department agency tasked with strengthening nuclear security worldwide, is negotiating the Bahamas contract under a $121 million program it calls the "second line of defense." Wilkes, the NNSA spokesman, said the Bahamian government dictated that the U.S. give the contract to Hutchison.

"It's their country, their port. The driver of the mobile carrier is the contractor selected by their government. We had no say or no choice," he said. "We are fortunate to have allies who are signing these agreements with us."

Some security experts said that is a weak explanation in the Bahamas, with its close reliance on the United States. The administration could insist that the Bahamas permit U.S. Customs agents to operate at the port, said Albert Santoli, an expert on national security issues in Asia and the Pacific.

"Why would they not accept that?" said Santoli, a former national security aide to Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif. "There is an interest in the Bahamas and every other country in the region to make sure the U.S. stays safe and strong. That's how this should be negotiated."

By Greg Hitt And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

Congress Aims for Leverage After Dubai Ports Conflict; White House Fears Impact

WASHINGTON -- Building on their win in the Dubai ports deal, U.S. lawmakers are moving to gain leverage over a swath of foreign investments in the U.S., an effort that business leaders and President Bush's aides warn could harm the U.S. economy.

In the first serious legislative move, Senate Banking Chairman Richard Shelby (R., Ala.) released the summary of a bill Friday that would greatly expand the array of foreign acquisitions subject to automatic scrutiny and would require the administration to notify lawmakers as soon as it begins to review any foreign transaction. The bill also would require the administration to rank all countries according to their relations with the U.S. and their support for weapons-control deals. Approvals would then depend in part on the ranking of a company's home country.

The administration would have to report to Congress on why it approved or rejected any transaction, but the bill wouldn't give lawmakers the power to veto a deal, as many critics feared.

Business groups and Bush administration officials expressed immediate alarm over several provisions in the bill, which Shelby aides claim has the support of other members of the Banking Committee. In a letter to Sen. Shelby this week, seven groups representing the nation's top banks and finance companies warned that legislative proposals making the rounds of Congress "would threaten job-creation prospects for the U.S. economy" and "reduce U.S. economic growth."

David Marchick, a corporate lawyer at Covington & Burling who has just written a book on foreign investment and national security, called the Shelby measure "an extremely tough bill that reflects an incredibly difficult political environment." But he also said that the bill "risks chilling foreign investment" across a significant portion of the U.S. economy.

Beyond the Shelby bill, lawmakers have introduced more than half a dozen measures in recent weeks, all meant to alter the way the government reviews foreign mergers and acquisitions in the U.S., a job that now falls to the confidential interagency Committee on Foreign Investment in the U.S., known as CFIUS. Nearly all of the measures call for notifying Congress of deals in time for lawmakers to shape the outcome of debate within the administration.

Some lawmakers, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R., Tenn.) want to go further by giving Congress a de facto veto over administration decisions, a move the White House would stiffly oppose. The legislative action comes two weeks after congressional critics threatened to block Dubai Ports World's plan to take over management of commercial operations at five major U.S. ports. The company now promises to pull out of the U.S. market.

With lawmakers still fuming over DP World and economic nationalism running high, Congress is all but certain to pass sweeping changes to the investment-review process. In an interview, Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez said the Bush administration intends to "do everything we can to avoid" legislation "that tells the world that we are less welcoming of foreign capital."

The U.S. relies heavily on foreign investment. Last year, foreign direct investment in the U.S., which covers things like buildings and factories, totaled $128.63 billion, up 20% from 2004. Foreign investors annually spend tens of billions more on U.S. stocks and bonds, drawn by the stability and transparency of the nation's economy. If that cross-border flow of investments ever dried up, many economists fear the U.S. would suffer a painful economic adjustment.

The Shelby bill is intended as a compromise to head off more-draconian measures floated by other lawmakers. It proposes keeping the Treasury Department as the lead agency in the review process, while creating a vice-chairman position held by the secretary of defense. It would also require that all proposed acquisitions by state-owned foreign companies be given higher scrutiny. In a move sure to generate stiff business opposition, the bill would require immediate review of all transactions involving "critical infrastructure," including food, energy, telecommunications and computer companies and banks.

CFIUS considers dozens of cases every year, the vast majority of which concern defense contractors, which was the original intent of the 1988 law. From 1997 to 2004, the committee received 470 notifications of pending deals. Of those, only eight were given extended scrutiny -- a 45-day investigation on top of the standard 30-day review.

The White House and the business community have mobilized to fend off congressional attempts to alter the review process too dramatically. Treasury Department officials are fighting in particular to assure that the review process doesn't become politicized within Congress and that corporate proprietary information won't be leaked. As such, the administration wants to limit notification of active reviews to a small number of lawmakers.

"We want increased transparency," said House Small Business Chairman Don Manzullo (R., Ill.), one of the biggest advocates for changes to CFIUS. "There should be a way of knowing when a review is going on." But critics have strong doubts about giving lawmakers a heads-up on pending deals. They suggest a less stringent model of disclosure, such as the regular briefings provided lawmakers -- after the fact -- on antitrust cases.

Trying To Fill A Void Left By 9/11 (LAT)

By Ellen Barry

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Rosaleen Tallon's little brother, a firefighter, died in the towers' collapse. She's fought a lonely battle in his memory ever since.

NEW YORK — Some time around 4 a.m., when Rosaleen Tallon has stretched out on a cot on the bare, freezing sidewalk, a still figure appears on the corner beside her.

He is a firefighter named O'Toole, with broad shoulders and a drooping ginger-colored mustache, and he has driven down from the Bronx to Lower Manhattan a couple of hours before his shift started. He doesn't wake her, but stands there in the dark, quietly watching to make sure she is OK.

It is Rosaleen's eighth night outside. It is a full-moon night, clear and wind-whipped, and the cold creeps up from the sidewalk through the sleeping bag and her husband's ski pants. The only sound is the rumble of the commuter rail as it comes into the World Trade Center station. She is a tiny figure, surrounded by skyscrapers.

News crews might be around the next morning, and Rosaleen could find an audience for the message she desperately wants to convey: that the Sept. 11 memorial under construction is dangerous and disgraces the memory of the people who died that day, including her brother, rookie firefighter Sean Tallon.

But at 4 a.m., the night seems endless. Pedestrian traffic has dropped off. Three supporters lie near her, clutching themselves against the cold. O'Toole wonders aloud, as he stands near the sleeping figures, what this is going to accomplish.

"They're going to make their stand, their Little Big Horn," said O'Toole, who met Rosaleen at a union rally and gives his first name as "Toolie." "They're going to get their ass kicked, and she knows it."

Rosaleen is 34, and has a 3-year-old and a 1-year-old at home. Every night, she tucks them into bed and says goodbye to her husband, a builder named Rob DeRos who described himself as "100% supportive." Then she leaves her home, a Tudor-style three-bedroom in Yonkers, and drives to a stretch of sidewalk outside Engine Company 10-Ladder Company 10 — the fire station that faces ground zero.

Sleeping outside her brother's firehouse is, she knows, an extreme measure. For months she has tried to rally broad protest against the memorial, "Reflecting Absence," in a city that is frustrated with paralysis at ground zero. Three weeks ago, intent on getting out her message, she came up with the idea of a vigil. Now, every night, outside the fire station, she warns passersby that the underground memorial could bring on a new cataclysm, trapping innocent people in the event of an attack.

"It almost makes my stomach turn thinking of people pouring into the hole, into an underground cavern," she said.

When she arrives about 10 p.m. — swathed in woolens, impossibly cheerful — a small group of well-wishers converge. A ground zero volunteer known as "Billy Cigars" presents her with a loaf of soda bread baked by his mother. Bernhard Goetz — who became known as the "subway vigilante" after shooting four would-be muggers on the train in 1987 — is chattering anxiously about the weather.

"This is overdoing it. They should have a tent. I think they should have warmer stuff. If you're going to be out like this, you should have outdoor camping stuff," said Goetz, who now operates a small company called Vigilante Electronics. "What are your thoughts on that? Isn't it a little cold to be out?

"This is crazy," he said. "Ay yi yi."

Among the regulars at ground zero is an array of missionaries and lost souls. There are also sophisticated lobbying organizations formed by families that had lost relatives on Sept. 11. Rosaleen, a stay-at-home mom whose activism before the attacks consisted of antiabortion prayer vigils, does not fall precisely into either category.

Her companion here is the Rev. Bill Minson, a former producer from Santa Monica who broke into show business in the 1960s managing a troupe of unicyclists. Minson, 56, has been a presence at ground zero for almost five years, building a following among Sept. 11 families, who have by and large adjusted to his quirks.

This week, for instance, he is on a liquid fast, subsisting on a mixture of lemon juice, water and honey, as well as regular doses of oil of oregano. He occasionally ducks into a Chinatown office building to coat his skin with olive oil, a tip he got from comedian and civil rights activist Dick Gregory, a former client, who said it would keep him from becoming dehydrated.

Rosaleen, a devout Roman Catholic and the daughter of Irish immigrants, confesses that she is leery of "the whole lemon thing." But she is steadfastly loyal to Minson. "I said, 'Bill, if this helps you in terms of talking to God, that's your business,' " she said.

Rosaleen's only sibling was in her thrall from early on. As a toddler, Sean would wander around the house looking lost if Rosaleen, three years his senior, left home for a play date. He could not get over her mastery of the button accordion or the columns of A's on her report cards. If he was going on a date, he would ask her to check his outfit.

"He was average," said her mother, Eileen Tallon. "And she loved him."

Sean Tallon, 26, was in the firehouse when the first plane crashed into the north tower. The firefighters went out to the street, where debris was raining down from a black sky, and rushed around the corner to the building's lobby. The Tallon family later saw footage shot there by a French filmmaker. Sean, said his mother, "had a very sad, worried face on him. He was so worried-looking that it rips you down inside."

He was on the 30th floor when the tower collapsed. His body was found two weeks later with a cluster of civilians and firefighters; the firefighters had apparently tried to protect the civilians with their gear. A steel beam had fallen on his head, crushing it.

Sean's death sent Rosaleen outside the previous boundaries of her life. She thrust herself into political activism: The family attempted to sue the city and Motorola Inc. over radios that did not transmit an evacuation order to firefighters. (The suit was rejected, most recently by the U.S. Supreme Court, because the plaintiffs had accepted money from the victims' compensation fund.)

Rosaleen also brought a complaint — shared by many in the fire department — to the Lower Manhattan Development Commission, entrusted with building the Sept. 11 memorial. She said that the memorial should list rescue workers separately from other victims, because, unlike the others, they "gave their lives so the innocent men and women whom the terrorists targeted might be saved."

The designer, Michael Arad, disagreed, saying the list of the dead should evoke the day's randomness.

It was at a meeting to discuss the issue that Rosaleen set eyes on a model of "Reflecting Absence," selected by a jury two years ago after a painstaking review of 5,201 entries. At that moment, she forgot about the names.

The design centers on two "voids" on the towers' footprints, and requires visitors to descend past curtains of water to underground plazas that give a view of the towers' foundations. The jury praised the design for "letting absence speak for itself." But Rosaleen was appalled that it would be underground. She had imagined a monument glistening in the sun. "Reflecting Absence" made her think of falling, of the people who fell.

Hers is not a popular argument in New York right now. Late last year, Sept. 11 families succeeded in scuttling a proposal for the International Freedom Center, whose exhibits were intended to delineate "freedom's evolution." Its critics said that the exhibits might dishonor the site with unpatriotic messages.

New Yorkers began to say what they had not said before: that certain Sept. 11 families were obstructing progress at ground zero and should step aside. New York magazine put a group on the cover with the headline "The Bullies of Ground Zero."

If there is a point of consensus, it is that the hole has gaped here too long. With plans to rebuild office buildings at a deadlock over financing, "Reflecting Absence" is the only plan that seems to be moving forward. On March 13, construction workers began, without fanfare, clearing gravel off the space where the buildings once stood.

Rosaleen knows the odds of halting construction are long. She was unsuccessful, she said, when she tried to rally families behind an aboveground monument. Although the Coalition of 9/11 Families has filed a lawsuit against the development commission to stop construction, it is for another reason: Because "Reflecting Absence" alters the historic footprints of the towers.

As for ordinary New Yorkers, Rosaleen said, "They are 9/11'd out. I am too."

But the passion keeps rising up in her. She glows every time a sympathetic pedestrian comes by to talk to her. She is heartened by her new website and by the 8,500 people who have signed a petition calling for an aboveground memorial.

There are times when the vigil itself gives her a feeling of great clarity.

After a few nights outside, she was feeling so miserably guilty about leaving her children that she went to Toys "R" Us to buy them gifts. She was in the parking lot when she was flooded with the conviction that she should go forward. At the fire station, the feeling returns to her.

"I feel like I have a connection to that spot," she said. "I can feel him leaving there, going up. He went and he faced the worst you can face. He would have been so nervous. This would have been his first real fire. I think of him and what he faced that day, and I could do anything. I could face any kind of ridicule. You feel an amazing strength. What people have factored out … is the strength of the souls that have gone out of there."

At other times, she is pierced by sadness, by how far she has drifted from normal.

Not long ago, she was walking through the A&P supermarket to pick up lemons for Minson's mixture. All around her, women pushed carts full of cereal and vegetables and hamburger meat, ordinary food for ordinary families.

"I felt like, 'Everyone here is normal, and I'm on this strange journey,' " she said. At this thought, her cheerful expression went to pieces; she began to cry, homesick for that old life.

It is after midnight on Liberty Street when five people hold hands in a circle. Minson — on Day 12 without solid food — thanks God for giving them "hearts with fire in them." A garbage collector, Andrew Macchio, stands on the corner and sings "Amazing Grace" in a resonant, operatic tenor before leaving to catch the last train home.

Then the streets are empty. The protesters sit on folding chairs and chat about Osama bin Laden and Minson's snoring. Dominick DeRubbio, 20, who lost his uncle, a firefighter, on Sept. 11, holds up a can of Budweiser and proposes a toast to "all the people behind us."

At 1:53 a.m., Rosaleen lies down on her cot and burrows into her sleeping bag. The temperature has dropped to freezing.

Sally Regenhard, whose firefighter son, Christian, also died in the World Trade Center, fishes out a black fur coat from a bag of used clothing and lays it carefully on top of Rosaleen. There is no movement, no conversation. Foul-smelling steam rises out of a nearby sewer vent. Minson, wrapped like a mummy in his sleeping bag, snores steadily.

Rosaleen often does not sleep at all, she said, but lies there with her mind racing.

It's like she has two angels whispering in her ears; "one a planner," she said, and "one a doubter." How many signatures would she get on the petition tomorrow? What will she say to the TV cameras? Is there any point to this at all?

Sometimes she has the feeling that this is it — her last big push. Minson plans to leave New York in the fall and travel south to minister to Hurricane Katrina victims. The time is coming, Rosaleen thinks, when she too will no longer be on a mission.

Already, she feels some of the burden lifted.

"I will someday let it all go. There comes a point in time when you have put forth your fight, and that's the best you can do and you can be proud of it," she said.

At about 4:30, delivery trucks roll into the streets around ground zero, and Wall Street Journals slap down in doorways. The first few customers tug open the door at Charly's on Trinity Place, where a tray of blueberry muffins, crusted with sugar, has been delivered. Just before 6 a.m., the streetlights flicker off.

Rosaleen will drive back to Yonkers and the warm bodies of her sleeping children, who may or may not know that she was gone.

By this time, the sky is pale blue and luminous. Light reflects from thousands of mirrored windows onto windows opposite, reflecting and reflecting until it tips into the great hole.

Spitzer Assails Leadership In Ground Zero Stalemate (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a candidate for governor, expressed concern last night that the Freedom Tower project at ground zero lacked "economic viability" and could turn into "a white elephant."

Mr. Spitzer suggested that, as New York's next governor, he would move more swiftly than Gov. George E. Pataki in rebuilding Lower Manhattan.

In his most expansive comments to date about ground zero, which were made during an interview on NY1 News, Mr. Spitzer said that Mr. Pataki, if anyone, deserved blame for "a failure of leadership" that has led to disputes and over plans for the 9/11 site. In turn, he also tacitly defended Larry A. Silverstein, the ground zero developer, who has been accused by Pataki allies of delaying work there out of greed.

"I think it's too bad that people are pointing the finger at one individual and saying he's at fault — if anybody's responsible, it's the governor," said Mr. Spitzer, who is leading in polls for the Democratic nomination. "The governor must be in a position to demonstrate leadership, get everybody to agree upon a plan."

By contrast, Mr. Spitzer said, "If I'm governor, on January 1, we will put ourselves in a room if this issue isn't resolved and we will get it resolved so quickly that people will say, 'Wow, what happened?' "

Mr. Spitzer raised particular doubts about plans for the Freedom Tower, the symbolic centerpiece of the site, given the challenges of finding tenants and ensuring security and the disputes about the cost and insurance money for the tower.

"I certainly think that there's a very serious question about the economic viability of the Freedom Tower," Mr. Spitzer said. "The prospect that the Freedom Tower would be built and would sit there vacant — as essentially a white elephant — that would sap the entire cash available to build the other buildings, is something that is very problematic."

Mr. Spitzer stopped short of seconding Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg's call for a sizable residential component at ground zero. But he did indicate that he might try to reorder the sequence of new buildings at the site, which will include towers and a memorial that commemorates the 9/11 attack.

Mr. Spitzer rarely makes direct, or critical, comparisons between himself and Mr. Pataki, who is stepping down this fall after three terms.

David M. Catalfamo, a spokesman for Governor Pataki, replied to Mr. Spitzer's remarks by noting the political environment.

"It must be campaign season, because it's the first time that I've heard Eliot Spitzer mention the words 'ground zero' in four years," Mr. Catalfamo said.

Mr. Spitzer answered a range of questions during the half-hour interview. He disclosed that he voted for Michael S. Dukakis for president in 1988 and would have preferred that Mr. Dukakis, a former governor of Massachusetts, as president instead of George H. W. Bush.

William F. Weld, a Republican candidate for governor, had characterized Mr. Spitzer and Mr. Dukakis as big-government Democrats in a speech on Thursday; Mr. Weld himself is a former governor of Massachusetts.

In response to Mr. Spitzer's remark, Mr. Weld said last night, "I'm not at all surprised that Mr. Spitzer voted for Governor Dukakis, as they both appear to embrace the 'nanny state' approach to government."

Mr. Spitzer also ruled out attacking Mr. Weld over his leadership at Decker College, a bankrupt Kentucky trade school that is now under federal investigation for alleged financial aid fraud. "It's not relevant to me," Mr. Spitzer said.

Red Cross Fires Administrators In New Orleans (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

DOJ_NMG_0022153

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

In a major shake-up of its relief operations in New Orleans, the American Red Cross dismissed two key supervisors yesterday as part of a wide-ranging inquiry into the improper diversion of relief supplies after Hurricane Katrina, a Red Cross official said.

The supervisors — volunteers, as are 95 percent of Red Cross personnel — were in charge of the organization's kitchens and shelters, which have assisted tens of thousands of the hurricane's victims.

The move came a day after the interim president of the Red Cross said the organization was investigating accusations of impropriety, including possible criminal activity.

"We have relieved certain volunteers of their duties in connection with our investigation," said a senior Red Cross official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the actions.

Three volunteers currently working in the area identified one of the officials who was dismissed as Patrick Keena, the senior official responsible for the organization's food and shelter operations in the disaster area. They said he was fired early yesterday.

The identity of the other dismissed supervisor could not be determined.

Mr. Keena, who has been affiliated with the Red Cross for 25 years, told volunteers in the disaster area that he was leaving because of a medical emergency.

He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Several volunteers who had served in the area complained over the last four months that Mr. Keena had ignored Red Cross rules, overridden efforts to establish procedures to keep track of relief supplies and interfered with internal investigations into the diversion of supplies.

Two volunteers assigned by Red Cross national headquarters last fall to look into those and other accusations of wrongdoing urged the removal of Mr. Keena and other senior managers in a report they filed with senior organization officials on Dec. 5.

A second supervisor, Jill Paul, who was in charge of the kitchens where meals were prepared for delivery to the needy, told volunteers yesterday that she had elected to leave the operation, several volunteers said. But it could not be determined if Ms. Paul was the second worker ordered out of the area.

She could not be reached for comment.

Teala Brewer, a former Secret Service agent who is the Red Cross's director of ethics and compliance, was in New Orleans yesterday with volunteers who had pointed out problems.

One of the accusations they are investigating is that supervisors in charge of the kitchens have been ordering more food than is needed, raising questions about where the extra food is going.

In one case highlighted by the volunteers, Ms. Paul recommended sending 1,500 meals a day into the New Orleans neighborhood of Bywater because residents had only limited access to utilities, potable water and a small convenience store.

Eight days after she filed her recommendation, volunteers assigned to go street by street in Bywater to estimate the number of meals needed said they came up with an assessment of only 500 meals needed on the route every day.

"They found that not only did a great portion of the route have full utilities, they also had a major grocery store up and running and public transportation," said a volunteer who had seen their report but requested anonymity because she said she had been physically threatened by a supervisor. "Much of the area was back to pre-Katrina, and the rest of it was so bad that no one was living in it."

Volunteers delivering meals said investigators from national headquarters had been trailing them over the last week and interviewing people living along their routes.

The interim president of the Red Cross, John F. McGuire, acknowledged this week that the organization was investigating accusations that relief supplies had been improperly diverted and that procedures for tracking inventory had been ignored.

Initially, according to those raising such concerns, their warnings were ignored.

In fact, Jerome H. Nickerson Jr. and Michael A. Wolters, who wrote the report recommending that the supervisors in New Orleans be removed, said they were relieved of their responsibilities.

Mr. Nickerson, a Maryland lawyer, said his name disappeared from the Red Cross database of trained disaster volunteers, and Mr. Wolters, a security guard, said his local chapter was told that he was forbidden from entering disaster areas on orders of the Red Cross's general counsel.

"When I first came out of New Orleans, I couldn't sleep for about a month because I just couldn't figure out why people weren't moving on this," Mr. Nickerson said yesterday. "But now people are paying attention, and the people who were doing this bad stuff are being called to account."

According to Red Cross publications, Mr. Keena has assisted with disaster response for the last 12 of his 25 years as a volunteer, working at 26 major disasters. The Colorado Springs Gazette reported last year that Mr. Keena, whose wife is in the Air Force, worked at the Double Eagle Casino in Cripple Creek, Colo.

The Gazette said Mr. Keena volunteered at the local Pikes Peak Chapter of the Red Cross, but Paul Koch, the financial director there, said yesterday that he did not know Mr. Keena.

Mr. Keena was on an elite team of paid Red Cross volunteers, known as temporary disaster reserves, who have extensive experience in disaster relief work. They are called out at the onset of an emergency and paid because they are needed for an extended period.

Red Cross Probes Katrina Misconduct, Theft (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, March 25, 2006

Pressed by Congress, the American Red Cross said Friday it is investigating claims that volunteers engaged in widespread theft in the wake of Hurricane Katrina.

"Any conduct that violates either the law or Red Cross code of conduct is not tolerated," said spokesman Chuck Connor, adding that any criminal wrongdoing uncovered by the group's conduct and ethics office will be turned over to law enforcement officials.

Allegations of wrongdoing go far beyond what the statement said were "inevitable ... departures from standard procedures" after such a catastrophe, according to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

Sen. Charles Grassley (news, bio, voting record), R-Iowa, has said volunteers may have committed criminal fraud. The accusations include improperly diverting relief supplies and violating Red Cross rules by using felons as volunteers in the disaster area. Grassley has threatened to rewrite or revoke the organization's charter if it does not overhaul its operations.

In a statement Friday, Grassley said he hopes the Red Cross' investigation will embrace whistleblowers and provide a top-to-bottom review of the group's leadership, oversight and openness.

Especially worrying, Grassley said, was the Red Cross' failure to take seriously the concerns of volunteers reporting the thefts "until I drew attention to them."

"The Red Cross needs to change its mind-set so it addresses volunteers' concerns swiftly and appropriately, regardless of whether a Senate committee chairman is asking questions," Grassley said.

The New York Times reported Friday that more than a dozen Red Cross volunteers described an organization that had few cost controls, little oversight of its inventory and no system of basic background checks for its volunteers.

The volunteers cited little direct evidence of criminal activity, but the magnitude of the missing goods had convinced them that the operations were being manipulated for private gain.

In one case, a kitchen manager swapped 300 prepared meals for parking spaces for Red Cross emergency response vehicles without creating any record of the transaction.

The Red Cross had 235,000 volunteers working in the Katrina disaster area, nearly six times the previous peak of 40,000. The sheer number collapsed the normal vetting process, the volunteers said.

The charity has said it responded to Katrina the best it could in circumstances almost unimaginable, while acknowledging that it stumbled in "technology, logistics and coordination."

That admission was not good enough for Grassley, who said he is set to meet next week with American Red Cross board of governors chairwoman Bonnie McElveen-Hunter.

"I hope to understand better what the timeline is for a complete review and reforms," Grassley said.

The inquiry comes after the Red Cross has seen two presidents resign in a little more than four years. Both resignations came after clashes with the board of governors on the tail of major disasters: Dr. Bernadine Healy stepped down shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001 terror attacks and, more recently, Marsha Evans quit following Hurricane Katrina.

Army Corps Is Faulted On New Orleans Levees (WP)

By Joby Warrick And Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Panel Says Studies Foresaw Failure, Urges New Scrutiny

An organization of civil engineers yesterday questioned the soundness of large portions of New Orleans's levee system, warning that the city's federally designed flood walls were not built to standards stringent enough to protect a large city.

DOJ_NMG_0022155

The group faulted the agency responsible for the levees, the Army Corps of Engineers, for adopting safety standards that were "too close to the margin" to protect human life. It also called for an urgent reexamination of the entire levee system, saying there are no assurances that the miles of concrete "I-walls" in New Orleans will hold up against even a moderate hurricane.

"The ability of any I-wall in New Orleans to withstand . . . is unknown," said the American Society of Civil Engineers' External Review Panel, which was appointed to oversee the Corps investigation of the levee system's collapse during Hurricane Katrina.

The civil engineers group also rejected the explanation given by the Corps that the system had failed because Katrina had unleashed "unforeseeable" physical forces that weakened the flood walls. In a letter to Lt. Gen. Carl A. Strock, the Corps' commander, the civil engineers cited three previous Corps studies that predicted precisely the chain of events that caused the city's 17th Street Canal flood wall to fail. The breach left much of central and downtown New Orleans underwater.

"It appears that this information never triggered an assessment . . . neither at the time of the design of the 17th Street Canal flood wall, nor following its construction," the letter said.

Corps officials said they had already taken steps to address problems identified in the letter, starting with an effort to replace miles of I-walls with sturdier structures. But agency officials insisted the Corps was not solely to blame for weaknesses in the system.

"We have done the best things we could have done. We live here," spokeswoman Susan J. Jackson said. During four decades of levee-building in New Orleans, Jackson said, the agency frequently found its hands tied because of restrictions imposed by budgets, by Congress or by local governments that often failed to meet financial responsibilities to help build and maintain the levees. Jackson added: "It was a question of who was going to pay, and how much."

The American Society of Civil Engineers panel is one of three independent teams investigating the failure of the New Orleans levees, and until now it has been the most cautious in its public criticisms. The other investigating teams quickly endorsed its findings.

"We agree that every single foot of the I-walls is suspect," said Ivor van Heerden, leader of a Louisiana-appointed team of engineers. "When asked, we have constantly urged anyone returning to New Orleans to exercise caution, because the system now in place could fail in a Category 2 storm. It has already failed during a fast-moving Category 3 storm that missed New Orleans by 30 miles."

Two weeks ago, the Corps proposed a new theory for why the 17th Street Canal flood wall collapsed on Aug. 29, despite never being overtopped by Katrina's floodwaters. Whereas previous investigations had pointed to weak soils beneath the flood wall, new data suggested a combination of factors: First, the force of rising floodwaters inside the canal bent the walls outward, creating a small gap between the walls and their earthen foundation. Then, water surged into the gap, pressing the walls further until they broke through a layer of weak soil piled up against the sides. In effect, the levee was sliced in half along its ridge.

Corps officials initially said they had never known a levee to fail this way, and they suggested that no one could have predicted it. But the civil engineers panel said yesterday that the failure was foreseen by the Corps' own studies, dating to the mid-1980s. It said the Corps' failure to anticipate the problem reflected an "overall pattern of engineering judgment inconsistent with that required for critical structures."

Throughout the design process, the civil engineers said, the Corps consistently failed to make the kinds of conservative judgments necessary when working in an environment where the soils are notoriously unstable and the stakes, as measured in human lives, are high.

"These findings present significant implications for current and future safety offered by levees, flood walls and control structures in New Orleans, and perhaps elsewhere," the letter to Strock said.

The civil engineers panel is due to release a formal report on its findings in two weeks, but its members chose to send the letter to Strock separately, citing the "gravity and potential impact" of their findings.

Thanks For Nothing, Texans Say (LAT)

By Miguel Bustillo, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Gulf Coast residents are seeing life return to normal after Hurricane Rita, but they give little credit to the federal government.

PORT ARTHUR, Texas — Sitting on a sheet of fresh plywood atop a newly rebuilt roof, Joaquin Rojas thanked the heavens for all the help he was receiving to repair his El Buen Pastor church after Hurricane Rita.

The pastor was not praising the generosity of President Bush and other Washington politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0022156

Rather, he was expressing gratitude that good-hearted fellow Christians from Michigan traveled to Texas and volunteered to piece his broken church back together.

"What's happening here is because of other churches, not because of the government," Rojas said in Spanish. "Those missionaries from Michigan, I thank the Lord for them."

Six months after Hurricane Rita delivered a second wallop to a Gulf Coast region already socked by Hurricane Katrina, life is slowly but surely returning to normal in the blue-collar oil and gas towns of southeastern Texas, where more than 70,000 houses were damaged or destroyed by 120-mph winds.

But even here in the president's home state, in a region densely populated by energy and petrochemical industries with warm ties to the White House, consensus is that progress is being made in spite of the federal government, not because of it. Dissatisfaction with what is seen as a heartless Bush administration recovery effort is widespread.

"We need some compassionate conservatism," said Mark Viator, a chemical company official who is chairman of the Southeast Texas Recovery Coalition, a group of area leaders that has been lobbying Washington for assistance.

Some Texas officials are convinced the state has become a victim of hurricane politics, and said White House officials might be neglecting Texas for fear that helping the state would raise accusations of favoritism.

Others complain that Republicans in Congress and in the Bush administration, many of them Texans, have taken a rigid ideological stand against compensating hurricane losses not covered by insurance, including millions that utilities have spent to restore basic water and electricity.

"Make no mistake about it: They don't care about you, and they don't care about what is happening in our communities," said Chester R. Jourdan Jr., executive director of the Southeast Texas Regional Planning Commission. Jourdan made his comments at a public meeting last week less than two hours after returning from a fruitless lobbying trip to the nation's capital.

"This went on deaf ears in D.C., deaf ears. One of the biggest challenges we have is the administration," he said.

Federal officials counter that the truth is more mundane: Compared with the calamity Katrina caused in Mississippi and Louisiana, Rita's toll on Texas is smaller and commands less attention, especially because the state is well on the road to recovery.

"I don't think the perception of being an afterthought is really true," said Dianne Coghlan, the Federal Emergency Management Agency's senior official in southeast Texas. "I hate to compare it to other states, but if you look at what we have done here, we have clearly made major strides."

Many in Texas are particularly upset by the lack of federal funding flowing into the Lone Star State compared with Louisiana and Mississippi.

Texas politicians note that just across the state line, parts of rural Louisiana also hit hard by Rita have received more money.

And Texas officials say that a state that opened its doors to half a million hurricane evacuees from Louisiana and Mississippi — and is still housing more than 400,000 — should be better reimbursed for its effort.

Sen. Christopher S. Bond (R-Mo.) recently angered Texas officials when he said that Texas was not entitled to repayment for merely "being a good neighbor."

His words apparently represented the feeling of many on Capitol Hill. A recent request for $2 billion in aid by Texas' governor, Republican Rick Perry, is going nowhere, according to some of its backers.

"I know the administration has a tremendous burden responding to the enormity of this disaster, and everyone acknowledges that Louisiana and Mississippi took the worst hit. But I think what is happening in Texas is not fair," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas), one of the most aggressive supporters of the state's case.

"The administration acknowledges we are getting $4,000 per pupil when it costs $6,000 to $7,000 to educate a child. It's just frustrating that we have not been able to get across the point that this is a new kind of crisis," she said.

While Texas politicians continue to complain about aid and reimbursement, FEMA officials rattle off statistics to show that Texas has made progress more quickly than other hurricane-damaged states.

Rita's winds reportedly felled 25% of trees in some heavily wooded parts of eastern Texas. But 99% of the debris has been cleaned up.

Of the 4,500 Texans who requested temporary trailers, 3,880 have received them. Blue tarps have been installed on 21,000 damaged homes. The federal Small Business Administration has provided Texans with $157 million in loans, and FEMA has spent close to $500 million assisting individuals.

In contrast to much of Louisiana, FEMA officials contend, Texas has advanced from the initial crisis stage of hurricane relief since the storm made landfall near the Sabine Pass on Sept. 24, and the state is on the path to long-term recovery.

Some residents agree. "Things are almost back to normal. I see business bouncing back," said Carlton Jackson, a 41-year-old construction worker, as he loaded some pipes into his truck last week to finish repairs on his home in Beaumont.

Yet local officials report sluggish progress. They express concerns that long-term housing shortages and high electricity bills from utilities looking to recoup hurricane costs could cripple a Texas Gulf Coast region that accounts for about a quarter of the nation's oil refining capacity.

"We are strategically very important to this country," said Everett "Bo" Alfred, a commissioner in Jefferson County, an area of 250,000 people that includes the city of Beaumont. "You think gasoline prices are high now? Just wait to see what happens if we get hit with another hurricane. We've been depleted."

Joe Hopkins, mayor of Vidor, is still recovering from broken ribs he suffered when he tumbled out of a tree that had fallen on a constituent's home.

The Fire Department serving this community of 11,000, which is home to many refinery employees, is still working out of temporary buildings resembling Quonset huts across the street from City Hall.

"We have an opportunity for people to get back to work. I'd say 80% of businesses have help-wanted [advertisements], but we don't have places for people to stay," Hopkins said. "Our grandchildren are going to be paying for this."

At the El Buen Pastor church in Port Arthur, Rojas maintains a more positive outlook. He and most of his 120 parishioners evacuated en masse to San Antonio when Rita roared toward Texas' coast. They returned days later to find the church soaked in water, its roof torn off.

Damage was extensive, but the church is close to being repaired because of the largesse of volunteer workers.

Rojas, 51, said he received $2,000 from FEMA immediately after the storm, and was grateful for it. But he said he understood that the real rebuilding assistance would have to come from the religious community, not the government.

"The government is the government," said Dina Lozano, Rojas' sister-in-law. From his newly rebuilt rooftop, Rojas sipped bottled water and nodded in agreement.

Houstonians Evacuee-weary, Poll Says (HC)

Houston Chronicle, March 25, 2006

While residents are proud of city's response, they feel a growing 'strain'

Amid growing concern about the city's homicide rate and overburdened social services, a new poll finds Houstonians increasingly weary and wary of the 150,000 Louisiana evacuees who landed here after fleeing Hurricane Katrina.

Three-quarters of Harris County residents surveyed by Rice University sociologist Stephen Klineberg say the influx of Katrina evacuees, many of whom remain seven months after landfall, has put a "considerable strain" on the Houston community.

Additionally, two-thirds say evacuees bear responsibility for "a major increase in violent crime," and twice as many local residents believe Houston will be "worse off" rather than "better off" if most evacuees remain here permanently.

The preliminary results of Klineberg's annual survey, which is expected to be finalized later this month, suggest that a sizable fraction of area residents have tired of their guests from New Orleans.

"These results reflect what I'm hearing from my constituents," said U.S. Rep. John Culberson, R-Houston. "I think the percentage of people unhappy with the deadbeats from New Orleans would be larger but for the big hearts of Houstonians who want these folks to get back on their feet, as I do."

Houston Mayor Bill White, who along with Harris County Judge Robert Eckels led efforts to welcome and shelter evacuees, acknowledged the increased strains on city services, notably crime and traffic management.

"People are of two minds on this issue," White said. "They are proud of the competence that Houston showed in responding to Americans in need. But they are also aware that it's not a disaster for nothing. There's a big job that the evacuees and the host community have in getting people on their feet, employed and looking to the future."

Culberson said the sentiment is much stronger, at least in his district (which includes west Houston, the Texas Medical Center and much of western and northwestern Harris County). He said his constituents are concerned about rising crime and no longer want to house New Orleanians who choose to rely on social services.

"If they can work, but won't work, ship 'em back," he said. "If they cause problems in the schools, if they commit crime, there ought to be a one-strike rule — ship 'em back."

Although Culberson said he has been trying to attach such a provision to pending legislation, it's unclear how such an idea could be implemented.

"Whatever we want to do, these are American citizens, and they can stay here if they want," said Eckels. "The difference is, when they're here and they get into trouble, there are consequences. They put up with a lot of things in New Orleans that we don't put up with here."

Generous responseHouston arguably had the most generous response to Katrina's devastation. Largely because of White, and the need to empty evacuees from shelters and area hotels, Houston launched a federally reimbursed program to provide 12 months of apartment housing and utilities to anyone from an area affected by Katrina or Rita. About 80,000 Louisiana residents were housed by the program.

It became so popular that evacuees from Louisiana who initially landed elsewhere flocked to Houston. Just before Houston stopped enrolling evacuees in mid-December, three-quarters of applicants for the housing program had been in the area for three days or less.

Houston clearly still feels good about its initial generosity after the storm, when 60,000 residents flooded Reliant Park to help in any way they could, and the positive publicity it generated around the country. According to the survey, 97 percent of respondents agreed that Houston "really came together" to assist evacuees.

"People are very proud of the first phase, when Houston opened its doors," Klineberg said. "I've never had a question where there's been 97 percent agreement. That's real, and that's a reflection of a remarkable month and a half when Houston poured its heart out."

Crime on people's mindsKlineberg has conducted his survey annually since 1982. He surveyed 765 Harris County residents in late February, and the results have a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

For the first time since 1999, he said, most people now say crime is the city's biggest problem, topping such issues as traffic.

Additionally, there are more requests for public help from the medically uninsured and city health officials have added staff to deal with an increased number of sexually transmitted diseases attributed to evacuees.

Still, Klineberg believes the problems associated with evacuees will fade over time as 150,000 Louisianans return home or melt into the greater Houston area's 5.6 million people.

In studies of civic engagement — which measure such things as participation in civic clubs — Houston generally scores well below other cities, Klineberg said. We spend more time in our cars and less time in collective activities.

But the outpouring after Katrina may represent a new Houston, a collective action and a sense of shared responsibility.

"Houston has always been for individualism," he said. "After Katrina we had this moment of extraordinary civic engagement, and I think that's what's going to remain with us. I may be overly optimistic, but that's what I really believe."

Evacuees' view differs

The view is less optimistic from the vantage point of some evacuees in Houston.

Angelo Edwards, vice president of the ACORN Katrina Survivors Association, said he and others have sensed some resentment from local residents. Locals will grumble about the free housing and the money given out initially after the storm, Edwards said, asking why, if it's good enough for people from another state, it's not good enough for us?

"We're definitely seeing it," he said. "But no one is saying anything about Florida, after they have hurricanes there, and San Francisco, where they have earthquakes."

Edwards also fears that tensions between school-age children from Houston and Louisiana could "boil over" once the school year ends and there are fewer structured activities during the day.

"I'm not saying it will happen, but this is something that's ripe for conflict," he said.

Will tensions subside?But another local official, Harris County Tax Assessor-Collector Paul Bettencourt, agreed with Klineberg's view that tensions would probably subside with time.

Texas has better resources and a better criminal-justice system than Louisiana, Bettencourt said.

"Eventually what happens is you clean up all the bad apples," he said. "We're not going to get another wave of bad apples. We're just going to have to clean up whatever problems local government in Louisiana had been ignoring, like B-Stupid, and we'll do that." (His reference was to Ivory "B-Stupid" Harris, an evacuee suspected in New Orleans and Houston homicides, who was arrested last week after a major manhunt in both cities.)

Bettencourt is optimistic for another reason — tax receipts are up. Sales taxes have averaged double-digit increases, he said, housing prices are up, and evacuees have attracted some $150 million in loans from the U.S. Small Business Administration.

Looking aheadThe evacuees who crowded into the Reliant Astrodome may have been more visible, he said, but there have been just as many residents from New Orleans who bought homes and are actively contributing to the economy.

A political science professor at the University of Houston, Richard Murray, said he did not believe the current opinions on evacuees would ultimately harm the political fortunes of White and Eckels. They have a handy scapegoat, he said: the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"These politicos will probably raise hell with the feds for not fully reimbursing us," Murray said, "and that will tend to deflect a lot of the flak."

Indeed, during an interview for this article, without being asked, White expressed his concern about needing more federal funding for crime and housing, noting that Houston was "on the front lines of our nations's response to a national disaster."

Hurricane Donation Benefited Bush Son (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Barbara Bush required that some of her gift be spent on software from Neil Bush's Texas firm.

HOUSTON — In a city housing thousands of Katrina evacuees, Barbara Bush's donation to a local hurricane relief fund normally would not seem controversial.

But more than a few eyebrows were raised when the former first lady stipulated that part of her contribution was to be spent on educational software purchased from her son Neil's company, Ignite Learning of Austin, Texas.

"I would think if she wants to do something beneficial for Katrina victims, she shouldn't be making the decision that the vendor is her son," said Daniel Borochoff, president of the American Institute of Philanthropy, a charity watchdog group. "Other education experts need to be making that decision, not somebody who has a family interest in the success of her son's business."

Barbara Bush's donation to the Bush-Clinton Houston Hurricane Relief Fund was made a few weeks ago, said Steve Maislin, president of the Greater Houston Community Foundation, which administers the fund. That fund, which supports Houston-area relief efforts, is not connected to the national Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund, he said.

The Houston fund forwarded Bush's donation to another nonprofit organization, which bought the software.

"There are a lot of students who went through Katrina and Rita in the Houston area, and she wanted to do something very specific to help them," Jean Becker, chief of staff for former President George H.W. Bush, said of Barbara Bush.

"She is a huge fan of her son's software program — it has gotten great reviews from teachers and students — and she wanted to make sure it was available to the students."

Maislin would not disclose the amount of the donation, but he said it was not unusual for a contributor to specify how his or her money should be spent.

"It's common for someone to say: 'I want to give money, but I want it to go to a certain organization,' " he said.

But Borochoff said donors who direct that their money be used to buy products from a family business set a bad precedent.

"If everybody started doing that, it would ruin our whole system for tax-exempt organizations, because people would be using them to benefit their business rather than for the public benefit. That's not why our government gives tax deductions for donations," he said. "I hope other donors across the country don't start dictating that their contributions go to their family business. That would be a rip-off of our tax system."

Bush contributed to the relief fund instead of directly to her son's company to help publicize the nonprofit, Maislin said. "It helps us when someone with her visibility contributes. We could advertise the fact … and help build momentum" for donations.

WAR NEWS:

Russians Helped Iraq, Study Says (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Josh White

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Russian officials collected intelligence on U.S. troop movements and attack plans from inside the American military command leading the 2003 invasion of Iraq and passed that information to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, according to a U.S. military study released yesterday.

The intelligence reports, which the study said were provided to Hussein through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad at the height of the U.S. assault, warned accurately that American formations intended to bypass Iraqi cities on their thrust toward Baghdad. The reports provided some specific numbers on U.S. troops, units and locations, according to Iraqi documents dated March and April 2003 and later captured by the United States.

"The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible, and that they have changed their tactic," said one captured Iraqi document titled "Letter from Russian Official to Presidential Secretary Concerning American Intentions in Iraq" and dated March 25, 2003.

A Russian official at the United Nations strongly rejected the allegations that Russian officials gave information to Baghdad. "This is absolutely nonsense," said Maria Zakharova, a spokeswoman for the Russian mission to the United Nations. She said the allegations were never presented to the Russian government before being issued to the news media.

Russia was among the nations opposed to the U.S. war with Iraq. Russian President Vladimir Putin warned on the eve of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 that an American attack would have grave consequences. He urged Washington to resolve its conflicts with Baghdad peacefully.

The study gives no indication who the alleged sources inside the U.S. Central Command might have been, or whether American officials believe the Kremlin authorized the transfer of information to Hussein's government.

The Central Command, which oversees military operations in the Middle East and is headquartered in Tampa, did not respond to requests for comment. A State Department spokeswoman declined to comment.

The U.S. military and defense officials who released the study said the revelations about Russia in the captured documents came as a surprise. They said they believe the captured Iraqi documents are authentic.

"Certainly, sure, I was surprised," said Army Brig. Gen. Anthony A. Cucolo III, director of the Joint Center for Operational Analysis and Lessons Learned under the Joint Forces Command in Norfolk. He said he thinks the alleged Russian intelligence-sharing was linked to Moscow's commercial interests in Iraq. "Essentially, it's driven by economic interests," he told reporters at the Pentagon. "I don't see it as an aberration. I see it as a follow-on to economic engagement." Retired Lt. Col. Kevin M. Woods, the project director, said he has "no reason to doubt the Iraqi documents."

The 210-page study, called the Iraqi Perspectives Project, draws on declassified information from an internal U.S. military report that was based on the examination of more than half a million files of Iraqi documents and dozens of interviews with former senior Iraqi military and political leaders. Some of that information remains classified.

The study offers little analysis of the consequences for the U.S. military of the alleged Russian-supplied intelligence, which was received by what the study depicts as a hopelessly confused Iraqi chain of command.

One document, for example, was sent to Hussein as rumors swirled in Baghdad that the main American military push would come not from the south -- as it in fact did -- but through Jordan into western Iraq, a misperception that U.S. Special Forces units operating throughout the western desert were seeking to create.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the study says, citing the March 25 document.

Another captured Iraqi document, dated April 2, 2003, said Russian intelligence had reported to Hussein more detailed and potentially damaging information: The Americans had their heaviest concentration of forces, 12,000 troops and 1,000 vehicles, near the Iraqi city of Karbala and were moving to cut off Baghdad.

In fact, the Army's 3rd Infantry Division and other U.S. forces at the time were making a precarious move through a narrow strip of land known as the Karbala Gap, where they anticipated major resistance from the Iraqi Republican Guard and possible chemical or biological weapons attacks.

One senior Republican Guard commander, Raad Majid Rashid al-Hamdani, issued a warning in line with the Russian intelligence when he told Hussein's son Qusay that the main U.S. attack was coming past Karbala. But Hamdani was largely ignored by Qusay Hussein and other generals, to his dismay, he told the authors of the study while describing the internal debates in an interview. "It was the kind of arguments that I imagine took place in Hitler's bunker in Berlin. Were all these men on drugs?" he said.

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a defense expert at the Brookings Institution, said the passing of information on U.S. troop movements during combat, if true, constituted "a stark betrayal." He added: "I think we should be demanding a fairly clear explanation from Moscow."

But Celeste A. Wallander, director of the Russia and Eurasia program at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said that although Russia probably had intelligence on U.S. war plans, she is skeptical that the Kremlin would have ordered that it be passed to Hussein's government.

It is more likely that a "freelancing" Russian official such as the ambassador in Baghdad personally shuttled the information, she said.

"If it were the case that the Kremlin had approved passing along what the Russian military knew about American war planning, that would be extraordinary," Wallander said.

"If it were ordered, it would be a direct action that would in effect help another country to use more effectively their military forces against U.S. forces."

Staff writer Colum Lynch at the United Nations contributed to this report.

U.S. Inquiry Finds Russians Passed Spy Data To Iraq In '03 (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022161

WASHINGTON, March 24 — Captured Iraqi documents describe a Russian spy operation that was aimed at the United States Central Command in the early days of the American invasion of Iraq in 2003, according to a new American military report. The report says information on war plans and troop movements was passed through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

Revelation of the operation, contained in the public version of a Joint Forces Command classified study, the Iraqi Perspectives Project, may have more political than military significance because American forces overwhelmed the underequipped and poorly led Iraqi Army to oust Saddam Hussein.

The information in the military study, an analysis based on captured documents and interviews with Iraqi military and political leaders, makes it difficult to get a clear picture of the Russian spy operation. It says a captured Iraqi document cited "information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha," in Qatar.

But the study notes that some information obtained by Iraq from Russian sources was false, raising at least the possibility that it was circulated as part of a deliberate American campaign intended to fool or demoralize Iraqi troops and leaders. Military officers have disclosed separately that false war plans were part of the campaign, and it remains unclear whether any Russians may have played into that strategy.

The Central Command, responsible for American military actions from the Red Sea to the Indian Ocean, led the Iraq war from headquarters in Qatar, where access was highly restricted. But the documents cite the Qatar headquarters as the source of the intelligence.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the report states, citing a document sent to Mr. Hussein on March 24, 2003.

The Russian report stated — inaccurately — that the coalition thrust into Baghdad would come from the west and would await the Fourth Infantry Division, whose entry from the north was vetoed by Turkey. In fact, the main lines of the offensive moved from Kuwait in the south before the arrival of the Fourth Infantry.

An author of the study, Kevin M. Woods, said during a Pentagon news conference that there was no obvious reason to doubt the authenticity of the documents.

At the same briefing, Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo, in charge of the unit that conducted the study, said any intelligence-gathering by the Russians was very likely motivated by economic ties with Iraq.

Russians Told Iraqi Regime Of U.S. Troop Movements (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — Russian diplomats passed detailed but sometimes inaccurate information about American troop movements to senior Iraqi officials even as U.S. troops closed in on Baghdad during the 2003 invasion, according to a Pentagon study released Friday.

The revelations, based on captured Iraqi intelligence documents, could jeopardize U.S.-Russian relations more than any single event since the end of the Cold War, analysts said. Although they cautioned that Moscow might have an explanation, the analysts said some of the details were so sensitive that they would be difficult for the government of President Vladimir V. Putin to justify.

One of the documents, which purports to be a summary of a letter sent to Saddam Hussein's office by a Russian official, claimed that Moscow had "sources inside the American Central Command in Doha," the U.S. military's headquarters in Qatar during the war.

Russia had well-known and extensive diplomatic and economic ties to Baghdad before the U.S.-led invasion and occasionally clashed with the Bush administration during the international debate over how to deal with Hussein's regime.

But the documents, made public in a study of the Iraqi military's decision-making, are the first to assert that Russia actively passed sensitive military intelligence to Baghdad during the war.

"This is one step short of firing upon us themselves with Russian equipment," said Michael O'Hanlon, a military analyst with the Brookings Institution. "It's actively aiding and abetting the enemy tactically. It's hard to get more unfriendly than that."

Press officials at the Russian Embassy did not return calls seeking comment. An official who answered the phone in the military attache's office at the embassy said he was unfamiliar with the report.

One of the most sensitive revelations, which came in a captured letter detailing Russian intelligence on American troop movements, accurately informed Baghdad that U.S. forces were massing south of a narrow passage near the southern city of Karbala.

The April 2, 2003, letter, which was reportedly passed through Moscow's ambassador to Baghdad, informed Iraqi leaders that "the heaviest concentration of troops (12,000 troops plus 1,000 vehicles) was in the vicinity of Karbala."

The Army's 3rd Infantry Division eventually captured western Baghdad after pushing through the Karbala gap just days later. Marines moved into Baghdad from the east.

Other information provided by the Russians, however, was wildly inaccurate. In a document on March 24 and again in the April 2 letter, the Iraqis were told to expect the main U.S. offensive from the western desert, including a major attack from Jordanian soil.

Kevin Wood, a retired Army officer who served as the senior researcher and chief author of the study, said he was surprised when he learned of the Russian actions. Although there was little corroboration of the contacts beyond the documents themselves, his team had no reason to doubt their authenticity, Wood said.

But Frederick Kagan, a Russia and defense expert at the American Enterprise Institute, said the actions would not be out of keeping with other efforts by Moscow to advance Iraq's cause internationally.

"We knew the Russians were opposed to the sanctions; we knew they opposed the war," Kagan said. "I'm not terribly surprised."

Analysts also said it would be important to learn whether upper levels of the Russian government were involved, adding that the signals were more likely to have come from diplomatic and intelligence agents in the region rather than from Moscow.

It also was unclear how much of the information was genuine intelligence and how much was educated guesswork.

Regardless, the revelations could undermine efforts to forge a united front against Iran's nuclear program.

"I think we have to assume that we can't trust the Russians to be impartial or even honest with us," Kagan said. "The Russians have ties with the Iranians that are also very worrying."

The 210-page report, compiled by staff at the Pentagon's Joint Forces Command after interviewing more than 100 former Iraqi officials and sifting through half a million documents, contains the most detailed accounts to date of Hussein's thinking as U.S. and coalition troops massed on his border and eventually pushed into Iraq.

It is unclear whether the Iraqi leader, who was not interviewed for the report, acted on any of the Russian information.

The authors depict Hussein as more worried about an internal coup or a repeat of the 1991 Shiite uprising in the south than he was about the coalition forces, even when they were on the outskirts of Baghdad. He continued to make tactical military decisions based on that fear until the last days of his regime.

Senior military commanders were ordered not to blow up bridges connecting Baghdad to southern Iraq so that Hussein could send loyal troops to quell any domestic opposition, even though the bridges made it easier for the Americans to advance.

The report also said Hussein frequently pointed to the failed American operation in Somalia and Washington's reluctance to introduce ground forces in the Balkans as proof the U.S. would not long tolerate bloody ground warfare.

And although Hussein had established loyal paramilitaries to suppress any uprisings and scattered them throughout Iraq, the report casts doubt on the idea that his regime made preparations to launch an insurgency if the Iraqi army met with defeat.

"There were no national plans to transition to a guerrilla war in the event of a military defeat," the report found. "Nor, as their world crumbled around them, did the regime appear to cobble together such plans."

The report's authors found Hussein and his top commanders to be badly out of touch with reality, both before and during the war. Hussein and his inner circle were fed a steady diet of lies, mainly overly optimistic assessments about Iraq's military capabilities, from subordinates who feared they would pay with their lives for speaking the truth.

Misinformation also flowed down through the ranks. The report cited an April 6 memo from the Defense Ministry telling subordinate units that "we are doing great" and reminding officers to "avoid exaggerating the enemy's abilities."

But as the scope of the defeat dawned on him, Hussein's tone was that of a man "who had lost his will to resist," and "knew the regime was coming to an end," said Tarik Aziz, the former deputy prime minister who was one of 23 senior officials interviewed by U.S. military researchers.

Hussein was moving from one safe house to another every three to six hours. During a late-night meeting with his sons and members of his inner circle April 6, Hussein issued orders to defend Baghdad to the death and prepare for urban warfare.

By then, however, "an American armored brigade already held Baghdad's airport," the report said, and American armor "was busily chewing up the manicured lawn in front of his palace in the center of the city."

The United States also made miscalculations, including devoting significant resources to preventing the destruction of Iraqi oil fields.

The report indicates that regional Iraqi commanders had made plans to destroy the northern and southern oil fields, and there are accounts that demolition charges and other equipment were moved into place.

The report quoted a senior Republican Guard officer as saying Hussein blocked those plans because he believed that destroying the oil fields would damage the morale of soldiers and the Iraqi people.

Report: Russia Had Sources In U.S. Command (AP)

By Robert Burns
AP, March 25, 2006

The Russian government collected intelligence from sources inside the American military command as the U.S. mounted the invasion of Iraq, and the Russians fed information to Saddam Hussein on troop movements and plans, according to Iraqi documents cited in a Pentagon report released Friday.

The Russians relayed information to Saddam during the opening days of the war in late March and early April 2003, including a crucial time before the ground assault on Baghdad, according to the documents.

The unclassified report does not assess the value of the information or provide details beyond citing two captured Iraqi documents that say the Russians collected information from sources "inside the American Central Command" and that battlefield intelligence was provided to Saddam through the Russian ambassador in Baghdad.

A classified version of the Pentagon report, titled "Iraqi Perspectives Project," is not being made public.

In Moscow, a duty officer with Russia's Foreign Ministry declined to comment on the report late Friday. No one answered the phones at the Defense Ministry.

State Department spokesman Adam Ereli declined to comment.

In addition to citing the Iraqi documents on the matter of Russian intelligence, the report also directly asserted that an intelligence link existed.

"Significantly, the regime was also receiving intelligence from the Russians that fed suspicions that the attack out of Kuwait was merely a diversion," the report's authors wrote. They cited as an example a document that was sent to Saddam on March 24, 2003, and captured by the U.S. military after Baghdad fell.

The report said the Iraqi document was titled, "Letter from Russian official to presidential secretary concerning American intentions in Iraq." The Iraqi document said, "The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible," and that as a result the U.S. military would avoid urban combat.

"The strategy is to isolate Iraq from its western borders," the document added.

The lead author of the Pentagon report, Kevin Woods, told reporters at a briefing that he was surprised to learn that the Russians had passed intelligence to Saddam, and he said he had no reason to doubt the authenticity of the Iraqi documents.

"But I don't have any other knowledge of that topic," Woods added, referring to the Russian link.

Brig. Gen. Anthony Cucolo, who appeared with Woods and also was closely involved in the project, said he believed such a link reflected a long-standing close economic relationship between Moscow and Baghdad.

"I don't see it as an aberration," Cucolo said. "I see it as a follow-on to economic engagement and economic interests."

In the end, one piece of Russian intelligence actually contributed to an important U.S. military deception effort. By telling Saddam that the main attack on Baghdad would not begin until the Army's 4th Infantry Division arrived around April 15, the Russians reinforced an impression that U.S. commanders were trying to catch the Iraqis by surprise.

The attack on Baghdad began well before the 4th Infantry arrived, and the government collapsed quickly.

As originally planned by Gen. Tommy Franks, the Central Command chief who ran the war, the 4th Infantry was to attack into northern Iraq from Turkey, but the Turkish government refused to go along. Meanwhile the 4th Infantry's tanks and other equipment remained on ships in the eastern Mediterranean for weeks — a problem that Franks sought to turn into an advantage by attacking Baghdad without them.

Based on a captured Iraqi document — a memo to Saddam from his Ministry of Foreign Affairs, dated April 2 — Russian intelligence reported through its ambassador that the American forces were moving to cut off Baghdad from the south, east and north, with the heaviest concentration of troops in the Karbala area. It said the Americans had 12,000 troops in the area, along with 1,000 vehicles.

Indeed, Karbala was a major step on the U.S. invasion route along the Euphrates River to Baghdad. A key bridge over the Euphrates, near Karbala, was seized on April 2, permitting U.S. forces to approach Baghdad from the southwest before Iraq could move sufficient forces from the north.

The Pentagon report also said the Russians told the Iraqis that the Americans planned to concentrate on bombing in and around Baghdad, cutting the road to Syria and Jordan and creating enough confusion to force residents to flee.

The Pentagon report, designed to help U.S. officials understand in hindsight how Saddam and his military commanders prepared for and fought the war, paints a picture of an Iraqi government blind to the threat it faced, hampered by Saddam's inept military leadership and deceived by its own propaganda.

"The largest contributing factor to the complete defeat of Iraq's military forces was the continued interference by Saddam," the report said.

Moscow Spies Tipped Saddam On U.S. War Plan (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

Moscow had informants inside U.S. Central Command whose information on the March 2003 invasion of Iraq was relayed to dictator Saddam Hussein days before American troops ousted him from power, according to a Defense Department history released yesterday.

And, as U.S. troops encircled Baghdad in April, Russia's ambassador fed information from Moscow's intelligence service to Saddam's regime regarding U.S. troop movements.

The new disclosures show that Moscow was working against the Bush administration in private, as it opposed in public the U.S. desire for a United Nations Security Council resolution explicitly authorizing the invasion.

The report was produced in book form by U.S. Forces Command, which studies "lessons learned" in military operations. This document, however, focused not on American units, but on how Saddam, his regime and military prepared for the March 19, 2003, attack and tried to blunt it. Titled "Iraqi Perspective Project: A View of Operation Iraqi Freedom From Saddam's Senior Leadership," it is based largely on postwar interviews and seized documents. It is in one of those documents that the Iraqis told of spies inside U.S. Central Command, which planned and executed the invasion.

"The information that the Russians have collected from their sources inside the American Central Command in Doha [Qatar] is that the United States is convinced that occupying Iraqi cities are impossible, and that they have changed their tactic," states the Iraq intelligence report. Another part states, "Jordan had accepted the American 4th Mechanized Infantry Division."

Although U.S. forces did avoid occupying towns and cities on the march to Baghdad, they did enter Tikrit, Mosul and other large cities. But as for Jordan, the 4th Infantry Division never docked there, instead traveling by sea to Kuwait.

The Forces Command report offered no information on whether Central Command ever identified and purged the spies.

The report also tells of a seized memorandum from Iraqi's Foreign Ministry. The memo said Russia's ambassador was relaying intelligence reports to Saddam aides, including one memo that stated that allied forces would not enter Baghdad until the 4th Infantry Division arrived. That turned out to be false.

In other report findings:

A seized Dec. 15, 2002, memo, written by an Iraqi intelligence agent posing as a U.N. escort, states, "Inside Bader WMD inspection site, there are Russian and Turkish scientists. When we visited the site, they were forced to hide from inspectors' eyes."

And, Saddam continued to tell his commanders he still had such weapons. "For him, there were real dividends to be gained by letting his enemies believe he possessed WMD, whether it was true or not," the report said.

·The quickly assembled air strike on one of Saddam's residences, Dora Farms, in pre-dawn March 19, 2003, never had a chance of succeeding. Saddam had not stayed there since 1995.

·There was no evidence that Saddam or his top aides planned the insurgency, now in its fourth year; in fact, Saddam was sure the Americans would never advance on Baghdad.

"There were no national plans to transition to a guerrilla war in the event of military defeat," the report states.

This fact helps explain why commanders did not predict, nor plan for, the robust insurgency and al Qaeda terrorists now spreading violence.

Saddam's misguided belief that he would stay in power in 2003 was fed by the support he got from France and Russia, his top aide, Tariq Aziz, told U.S. investigators.

"France and Russia each secure millions of dollars worth of trade and service contracts in Iraq, with the implied understanding that their political posture with regard to sanctions on Iraq would be pro-Iraqi," Mr. Aziz said. "In addition, the French wanted sanctions lifted to safeguard their trade and service contracts in Iraq."

Rice Expects U.S., Iran To Meet On Iraq (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Friday she was sure U.S. and Iranian representatives would meet to discuss security in Iraq, but she gave no time for the sessions.

"Those meetings will take place, I'm certain, at the appropriate time," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0022165

The United States previously had said contact with the Iranians could occur if Washington found it useful, but questioned the timing and motive of Iran in seeking talks.

The Bush administration says discussions would be limited to the situation in Iraq, where Washington has long accused Iran of making trouble. The U.S. ambassador in Baghdad has had authority to talk to his Iranian counterpart since last year, but Tehran only recently said it wants to meet.

President Bush's national security adviser, Steven J. Hadley, last week dismissed Iran's willingness to talk about Iraq as a way for Iran to divert pressure from the nuclear weapons issue. Iran claims it is pursuing nuclear technology only for generation of electricity.

The two countries have had no diplomatic relations since the 1979 storming of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

The United States is now pushing for strong U.N. Security Council action to try to stop what it claims is Iranian ambition to build a nuclear bomb. The U.N. body has been bogged down for two weeks over how to make a first move.

"I think that everybody just needs to get to work and let's get this done so that the Iranians have a very clear message about what's going on," Rice said when asked whether Iran allies Russia and China are dragging their feet.

Rice spoke Friday to Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov to try to break an impasse over the wording of a Security Council statement on Iran, and may meet soon with other permanent members of the Security Council if the group can agree on the document.

"We agreed to ask our negotiators to work again over the next of couple of days," Rice told reporters, "really deciding that maybe they won't even have a weekend because we need to work on this text."

Rice spoke following a meeting with Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Derbez.

She also met in Washington with U.N. Ambassador John Bolton on Iran and other topics.

"We are waiting to see what happens in the talks between the ministers of foreign affairs of the P-5," Argentina's U.N. Ambassador Cesar Mayoral, the current Security Council president, said Friday, when asked when the council might meet to discuss the proposed statement.

The U.S. and its European allies want a statement reiterating demands by the U.N. nuclear watchdog _ the International Atomic Energy Agency _ that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the process that can be used to generate nuclear power or make nuclear weapons.

The Russians and Chinese have opposed tough language including a demand for a report in 14 days on Iran's compliance with the IAEA demands.

Russia and China also want the IAEA to keep the main role in cajoling Iran on uranium enrichment. They have raised concerns that pushing Iran too hard could lead to its withdrawal from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and expulsion of IAEA inspectors.

"The Security Council has, of course, at its disposal tools that are not there for the IAEA," Rice said Friday.

"This first order of business is to get a presidential statement that will make very clear that it is in the international community's very strong demand of Iran that Iran adhere to these requirements."

General Praises Iraqi Forces In Mosque Attack Mayhem (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON, March 24 — The United States commander for training Iraqi security forces expressed guarded satisfaction on Friday with the performance of new Iraqi Army and national police units in tamping down the sectarian violence that erupted after the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra last month.

But the commander, Lt. Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, acknowledged that the crisis also provided a clearer picture of the troubling shortfalls of the Iraqi local police, on whom, he said, American trainers now must focus their efforts.

American officers in Iraq and Pentagon officials reviewing reports from the field say the Iraqi Army helped calm the situation. They also say that the national police responded well, but that some local police units only huddled in their stations during the early hours of the crisis.

General Dempsey also raised concern about the role played by independent militias during the crisis. In a video news conference from Baghdad, General Dempsey pointed out that certain militias were recognized under the new Constitution— like the pesh merga force of Kurdish fighters and the Badr Corps, a Shiite militia — and that efforts were under way to assimilate them into security units. But he said one powerful militia, which answers to Moktada al-Sadr, a radical Shiite cleric, remained outside of any government control.

"What happened in the aftermath of the Samarra mosque bombing was that several of these militias took to the streets, took to the streets in a way that could have been very threatening to the population, particularly in the mixed areas," General Dempsey said. "The Iraqi legitimate security forces, the army and the police, in every case were a settling influence."

Because of the threat of spiraling sectarian violence, Iraqi government and security officials "made a conscious decision not to confront but rather to contain these militias," General Dempsey said. "They decided that they wouldn't add the militia problem to their other problem, which is the heightened tensions after the bombing."

General Dempsey said Iraqi security forces facing off against these armed, unofficial bands were ordered to stop them from violating the law — but did not always halt their movements through checkpoints if they were traveling peacefully. "They separated groups," he said. "They protected mosques. They talked to political leaders, religious leaders, politicians, local leaders, and they really did a fantastic job of settling the situation without also confronting the militia."

The militia problem is clearly a threat to stability in Iraq, and General Dempsey said the issue was "something the new government's got to take on with some immediacy as soon as they get seated."

President Bush's strategy for withdrawing American troops from Iraq requires an increasing number of Iraqi security forces to take on increasing levels of responsibility. Last week, Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, commander of day-to-day military operations in Iraq, announced that by the end of summer, 75 percent of the country would be the responsibility of Iraqi security forces.

Asked whether Iraqis were given security responsibilities only in relatively stable or underpopulated areas, General Dempsey said Friday that Iraqis already controlled some crowded, tense areas — certain neighborhoods of Baghdad, for example — and that this percentage would grow.

Military officers in Iraq and at the Pentagon said both the army and national police responded rapidly in the hours after the mosque bombing. All Iraqi personnel not already on duty were called back from leaves and ordered to increase patrols.

One senior officer said that while the new Iraqi security forces took sides in sectarian violence in 2004, the aftermath of the Samarra bombing resulted in "very, very few reports of either the army or national police battalions acting in a sectarian way themselves."

In interviews and e-mails from Iraq, American military officers underscored that the efforts by local clerics and politicians were even more important than the actions of security forces in keeping the lid on civil war in recent weeks.

Since the insurgency began, American commanders have argued that there is no solely military path to ultimate success in Iraq, only a political solution. After the mosque bombing, these officers say, it is inconceivable that the Iraqi Army and police alone could have tamped down the violence unless senior clerics and the Iraqi political leadership — Sunni, Shiite and Kurd — had immediately called for calm, as they did.

Despite concerns of sweeping sectarian attacks, the violence after the mosque bombing was limited to specific neighborhoods, mostly in the mixed Sunni-Shiite areas near the Sadr City slum in Baghdad and other areas mostly north of the capital.

And as bodies keep turning up, especially in Baghdad, proof that sectarian killings continue at an alarming rate, commanders admit that the local police cannot halt such individual acts of sectarian vengeance.

"You've heard us call this the year of the police," said General Dempsey, who previously spent 14 months in Iraq as commander of the First Armored Division. "We're really equipping them at a very aggressive rate in order to put them in a position to restore civil security by the end of the year."

Murtha Defends Position On War In Iraq (HS)

By Amy Zalar

Herald Standard, March 25, 2006

U.S. Rep. John Murtha (D-Johnstown), theorized Friday that President George W. Bush was trying to justify what didn't happen following the first Gulf War when he waged war on Iraq three years ago.

Murtha, 73, said he believes there was a miscalculation when troops didn't stay around to rehabilitate the Middle East after the conclusion of the first Gulf War, and it led to the current conflict.

Regarding the current Iraq war, Murtha said when initial threats that biological weapons would be used if troops crossed a certain line didn't come to fruition and weapons of mass destruction were not found, he felt something was wrong and started "sending signals to the White House."

Speaking during a taping of "Behind the Headlines" for HSTV, Murtha said although he supported the war initially, he began to lose confidence because of the way it has been handled. The Vietnam veteran said the three things that are needed to go to war were not there for the Iraq invasion, including a threat to national security, the use of overwhelming force and an exit strategy.

Murtha has been criticized for publicly taking the position that the United States needs to get out of Iraq, a stance that he unequivocally defended.

"It's time for us to redeploy to the periphery and let the Iraqis do this themselves," Murtha said. He said he is also concerned about the $450 billion cost of the war and the burden on the American people.

Murtha said he is perplexed as to why Bush will not admit he made a mistake by relying on flawed intelligence. He said when Bush's father, George Herbert Walker Bush, contemplated the first Gulf War, he established a real international coalition and Congress participated in the process, two things that did not occur this time. A long-time member of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, Murtha has had intimate involvement with major war decisions during his years in Congress. He was first elected in 1974.

Now, Murtha said the Iraq conflict has deteriorated into a civil war and the American troops are caught in the middle. "The Iraqis are fighting with each other and we're caught in between," Murtha said.

Murtha said Vice President Dick Cheney was a "damn good secretary of defense" in the elder Bush's administration, but many people said they don't know Cheney today. "You have to wonder if they're competent," Murtha said of the people making decisions regarding the war.

Calling this administration the most secretive he has ever seen, Murtha said when you are in public office, you must listen to the people and look at history. Murtha said some Republicans would have to speak out against the war for anything to change. "I feel it is an American problem and not a political problem. Because (Bush) didn't seek advice it has gotten to where it is now and that's a very dangerous situation," Murtha said.

In being asked to speak about comparisons between the Iraq War and Vietnam, Murtha said that big difference is we support the troops in the current war. Murtha said he has worked to ensure troops receive body armor and equipment that is needed. "We have separated the warrior from the war and in Vietnam we didn't do that," Murtha said.

A weekly visitor to military hospitals, Murtha said in addition to the 2,300 American soldiers that have been killed, there are between 16,000 and 17,000 that have been wounded, and the government must take care of them.

Murtha said he wasn't completely surprised that his military record was attacked when he spoke out against the current direction of the war, but he said he didn't think such vicious attacks were warranted. He said attacking someone who disagrees with you isn't the way it should be done. "To me what's important is the country," Murtha said.

Murtha said the White House tried to get military officials to attack him, which was largely unsuccessful. He predicted a Democratic-controlled Con-gress after the fall election, and possibly a Democratic-controlled Senate also.

Murtha is seeking re-election, but will not face a Democratic challenger. Washington County Commissioner Diana Irey has filed to run as a Republican. Murtha said he takes any opponent seriously. He said since Irey has taken a position in favor of the war, it will likely be a campaign issue.

Murtha said he has credibility in the House, as well as years of experience and an important position on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee. He said it would be difficult for a new person to get things done for the district that he has achieved.

Murtha said he concentrates on a lot of projects that are important to the district, including diabetes, and works with county commissioners to get infrastructure projects, which he called the glue to put everything together.

By Qassim Abdul-zahra

Philadelphia Daily News, March 25, 2006

BAGHDAD - Iraq's president issued a highly optimistic report yesterday on progress among politicians trying to hammer out the shape of a new unity government. At the same time, at least 51 more people, including two U.S. soldiers, were reported dead in rampant violence.

President Jalal Talabani said the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month, though he acknowledged "I am usually a very optimistic person."

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad brokered the sessions, with the Bush administration applying extreme pressure on Iraqi politicians to form a government. Washington hopes to begin withdrawing troops this summer, banking on a decrease in violence once a national unity government is in place.

A less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, whose nomination by the Shiite bloc for a second term produced the political stalemate, has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April, a full month beyond the Talabani estimate.

The rising death toll among Iraqis included five worshippers killed yesterday in a bombing outside a Sunni mosque.

The two U.S. soldiers were killed in combat in insurgent-ridden Anbar province, the American military reported yesterday. The statement said the soldiers, assigned to the 2/28th Brigade Combat Team, were killed Thursday.

Iraq Qaeda Chief Seems To Pursue A Lower Profile (NYT)

By Dexter Filkins

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Jordanian terrorist and the head of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, has sharply lowered his profile in recent months, and his group claims to have submitted itself to the leadership of an Iraqi.

In postings on Web sites used by jihadi groups, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, the terrorist network's arm in Iraq, claims to have joined with five other guerrilla groups to form the Mujahedeen Shura, or Council of Holy Warriors. The new group, whose formation was announced in January, is said to be headed by an Iraqi named Abdullah Rashid al-Baghdadi. Since then, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has stopped issuing its own proclamations.

The Mujahedeen Shura, which continues to call for attacks against American and Iraqi forces, has stopped taking responsibility for large-scale suicide attacks against civilians, and it has toned down its fierce verbal attacks against Iraq's Shiite majority.

Mr. Zarqawi's group also appears to have stopped, at least for now, the practice of beheading its captives. Since last summer, the group has begun to carry out attacks outside Iraq.

The activities seem to follow closely the advice in a letter believed to have been written last year by Ayman al-Zawahiri, Al Qaeda's second in command.

Previously, Mr. Zarqawi's group celebrated large-scale civilian massacres, and often made videos of the attacks and of beheadings and posted the videos on jihadi Web sites. Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which is dominated by followers of Islam's Sunni sect, also boasted of the mass killing of Shiite civilians, whom it labeled derogatorily as "converters."

While it is impossible to verify the claims on the Web sites, experts believe it significant that Mr. Zarqawi apparently feels the need to send such signals, which offer clues about what he and other senior jihadi leaders might be thinking and doing.

Since the announcement of the Mujahedeen Shura in January, Mr. Zarqawi has stayed largely out of view. His last public statement, released a few days before the announcement, ranted in typical fashion against Americans and Jews but gave no sign that changes were afoot.

American and Iraqi officials, as well as independent terrorism experts, are divided on the signals from Al Qaeda. Most believe that Mr. Zarqawi is alive, in Iraq, and still in charge of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. They say the group remains the leading suspect in the Feb. 22 attack against the Shiite shrine in Samarra, which set off a wave of sectarian violence. No group has taken responsibility for that attack.

Sectarian attacks have helped bring Iraq to the brink of full-scale civil war. A document obtained by the Americans in January 2004, and believed to have been written by Mr. Zarqawi, calls for attacks on Shiites in order to bring about a sectarian bloodbath.

American and Iraqi officials concede that they know little about the Mujahedeen Shura or of Mr. Baghdadi or, indeed, whether they exist at all. The officials say the proclamations by Al Qaeda and the Mujahedeen Shura, as well as the claim that an Iraqi is in charge, are probably ploys to give the illusion of changes that have not taken place.

"Propaganda is a critical component of his efforts, and that's what's involved here," said an American intelligence official. "It's a shift in tactics, not a real change."

In the letter thought to have been written by Mr. Zawahiri, an Egyptian physician believed to be hiding along the mountainous border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, Mr. Zarqawi was told that he needed to cultivate local support in Iraq to ensure the survival of his movement. The letter was captured by the Americans last summer.

The letter suggested a role for a council that would unite the various insurgent groups and help lay the political groundwork for the day the Americans depart.

It also questioned Mr. Zarqawi's emphasis on killing Shiites, suggesting that such killings alienated Iraqis and detracted from the larger goal of driving out the Americans. For the same reasons, the letter said, it was not necessary to cut off the heads of captives. "We can kill the captives by bullet," the letter said.

The letter also called for Mr. Zarqawi to "extend the jihad to secular countries neighboring Iraq." In recent months, Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia has taken responsibility for a number of attacks outside the country, including the suicide bombing of three hotels in Amman, Jordan, in November, which killed more than 57 people. The group has also said it fired rockets from Lebanon into Israel last December, and a pair of missiles at American naval vessels in Aqaba, Jordan, last August.

"Zarqawi wanted to hand over Al Qaeda to the Iraqis so he could move on to the next phase of jihad," said Rita Katz, the director of the SITE Institute, which tracks violent Islamist groups. Ms. Katz recently made such an argument in an opinion article in The Boston Globe.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorist expert at the Rand Corporation's Washington office, said he believed that the Mujahedeen Shura and Mr. Baghdadi were real, but was unconvinced that Mr. Zarqawi had ceded control of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. Having brought the country to the brink of civil war, Mr. Zarqawi may have decided that it was a good time to step back as events in Iraq unfold, Mr. Hoffman said, "like a poker player."

There are other reasons why Mr. Zarqawi might want to take a less prominent role in Iraq. As a Jordanian, Mr. Zarqawi is a foreigner in Iraq, where family and blood lines count for a lot. In recent months, evidence has surfaced that Iraqi guerrillas resent the dominance of foreigners in the insurgency.

In addition, there have been growing indications that the large-scale suicide bombings directed at civilians were alienating Arab backers outside the country as well as ordinary Iraqis. Mr. Zarqawi is believed to depend heavily on money provided by Arabs from outside of Iraq.

The suicide attacks on the three Jordanian hotels set off a wave of popular anger so furious that Mr. Zarqawi released an audio tape to explain his actions. Mr. Zarqawi did not apologize for the attacks — far from it — but he was clearly stunned by the vehemence of the reaction. "As for those Muslims who were killed," Mr. Zarqawi said on the tape, "we have not thought for even one moment about targeting them, even if they are sinful people."

Ms. Katz, the director of SITE, which provided the translations of his statements, said that even if he had stepped back, Mr. Zarqawi was probably still the dominant force in Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia.

Mr. Zarqawi has long made it clear that he sees Iraq as a stepping stone to the larger goal of overthrowing what he believes to be corrupt and secular regimes across the Arab world and re-establishing the Islamic Caliphate that reigned over the Middle East for centuries.

Whatever Mr. Zarqawi is up to, the successor organization, the Mujahedeen Shura, has lost no vehemence. In one of its most recent communiqués, it celebrated an attack on an American Humvee it claimed to have carried out this week in Miqadadiya, Iraq.

"A car bomb was detonated on a Crusader support patrol, resulting in the destruction of the Humvee and all who were in it," the statement said. "Thanks unto God."

Iraqi Translator Is Accused Of Bribery In Kickback Case (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

The Justice Department said yesterday that it had arrested an Iraqi-American translator from Michigan on bribery charges in the latest case involving accusations of corruption, which have become a steady accompaniment to the war in Iraq.

The Justice Department said the translator, Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., probably acting as an intermediary for others who have not yet been identified, offered tens of thousands of dollars in bribes to people inside the Iraqi Interior Ministry for a contract to provide some $1 million in flak jackets and other equipment to an organization that trains Iraqi police officers.

Mr. Salam was working as a translator for the Titan Corporation, a division of the L-3 Government Services Group. The federal complaint says that in the course of his work, Mr. Salam offered $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who eventually referred Mr. Salam to someone the official described as a procurement officer for the American-operated program to train the Iraqi police.

In fact, the officer was an undercover agent for the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction, an independent office that has been investigating cases of potential fraud, waste and abuse. Mr. Salam repeated his bribery offer and was arrested late Thursday night at Dulles International Airport near Washington, as he returned from Iraq.

Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who heads the office of the inspector general, said he expected more arrests in the case but declined to give further details or say who had been expected to provide the approximately 1,000 flak jackets — Mr. Salam showed a sample to the undercover agent — to the Interior Ministry. Mr. Salam also offered to sell a sophisticated map printer as part of the deal.

Mr. Bowen said that in the cash economy of Iraq, where traditional investigative methods like tracing money transfers are nonexistent, tracking down fraud is especially challenging.

"We realize we have to use every means at our disposal," Mr. Bowen said. The traditional sting operation, he added, "is one of them."

A call to the federal public defender acting as Mr. Salam's lawyer, Tony Axam, went unanswered yesterday. A spokesman for L-3 Government Services, Rick Kiernan, said the reported bribery attempt "appears to be isolated and not part of a larger incident."

"L-3 has not been related in any way to the incident itself," Mr. Kiernan said. "We have been cooperating with the Department of Justice on this entire matter."

DOJ_NMG_0022170

The case against Mr. Salam is one of at least eight major cases said to involve bribery, kickbacks, money laundering, conspiracy, fraudulent billing and other crimes that prosecutors say have plagued civilians and military personnel who work with contractors in Iraq.

At least a dozen arrests have been made and more are expected as the cases widen and new cases emerge. Mr. Bowen said his office alone was investigating around 60 cases that had not yet been made public.

Still, Mr. Bowen said out-and-out fraud was not pervasive among Americans now in Iraq, adding that many of his cases turned up in the early months after the invasion when controls were especially weak.

"I think it's a few individuals who took advantage of a chaotic situation early on," he said, "and it's my job to track them down and bring them to justice."

Of the arrests, at least six involve people who at one time worked directly for Kellogg Brown & Root, the Halliburton subsidiary, or for outside subcontractors working for the company. The Army has awarded Kellogg Brown & Root three huge contracts to do things like deliver food and fuel and repair oil equipment and facilities in Iraq.

The largest single case has swirled around an American businessman, Philip H. Bloom, who lived in Romania for many years but won at least $8.6 million in reconstruction contracts around Hilla, south of Baghdad, by paying what prosecutors said were hundreds of thousands of dollars in bribes in 2003 and 2004 to at least a half-dozen officials in the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Some expect more arrests. "I would suspect that the more we peel back on this, the more we're going to find," said Steve Ellis, a vice president at Taxpayers for Common Sense in Washington. So many arrests have been announced recently, Mr. Ellis said, that "it's not until you actually step back and you look at the whole of it that you realize how enormous the waste and corruption may actually be."

U.S. Charges Civilian Translator With Trying To Bribe Iraqi Police (WP/AP)

By Associated Press

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq and charged him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

He was released from custody after a hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court on April 5.

Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act for offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint. Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said.

Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator who was posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said.

Titan Corp. did not immediately comment.

If convicted, Salam faces up to five years in prison and a fine of at least $100,000.

The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart W. Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraq reconstruction contracts.

At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery-and-kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts. Robert J. Stein Jr., a former contracting official in Iraq, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to steal more than $2 million in reconstruction money and steer contracts to a businessman in exchange for more than $1 million in cash, cars and jewelry.

Navy Won't File Charges In Iraq Contractor Fracas (WP)

By Griff Witte And Josh White

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Military investigators said yesterday that they will not file any charges after completing their investigation into an incident in Iraq last May in which a group of Marines alleged they had been fired on by U.S. security contractors.

The contractors, in turn, had said they were detained by the Marines for three days in a holding facility normally reserved for suspected insurgents, and subjected to rough treatment. The incident highlighted tension in the field between active-duty military personnel and the burgeoning ranks of private contractors the Defense Department has hired to support the war effort.

DOJ_NMG_0022171

But the Naval Criminal Investigative Service said there was not sufficient evidence to warrant prosecution of Marines or employees of North Carolina-based Zapata Engineering.

"There was evidence that shots had been fired by Zapata, but there was no way to connect the dots together in a way that we could go forward with the case," said NCIS spokesman Ed Buice.

The 16 American contractors have never denied that they fired shots on May 28, 2005, as they traveled through Fallujah. But they say their shots -- three in total -- went straight into the ground as they tried to get the attention of a truck driver who was moving precariously close to their convoy.

The Marines told a different story, accusing the contractors of firing indiscriminately at civilians and at a Marine checkpoint. Buice said yesterday that investigators had not been able to verify that conclusion.

"It's a world of relief," said Pete Ginter, one of the contractors who were detained. "We knew from the beginning that we didn't do anything wrong. But we were being penalized for something we didn't do."

Ginter said he and the other contractors involved have been effectively blacklisted since the incident, with many of them having trouble finding work and unable to return to Iraq, where demand for contractors is high.

Mark Schopper, an attorney for four of the detained contractors, said that while he welcomed the NCIS's decision, questions remain. "We're still incensed at what happened to them," Schopper said.

Marine officials at the Pentagon yesterday referred questions on the matter to military spokesmen in Baghdad, who were unable to comment immediately.

The contractors claim they were changing a tire at a Marine checkpoint last May when they were suddenly ordered to report to a nearby base. From there they were taken to a detention facility where they each were handed an orange jumpsuit, a bottle in which to urinate, a Koran and a prayer mat. The contractors, many of whom were ex-Marines, said they received rough treatment, with guards shoving them to the ground and, in Ginter's case, squeezing his testicles.

The men were held for three days in the same facility where the military held suspected insurgents. During that time, they have said, they were refused all requests to contact the Red Cross, their employer or their families. Once released, they were barred from operating in a large area of Iraq. They also lost their jobs with Zapata, which had a contract with the Army Corps of Engineers to dispose of ordnance.

Buice, the NCIS spokesman, said investigators never formally looked into the allegations of abuse because the contractors did not go through the proper channels of filing a complaint. He also said the treatment they received appeared to be standard for incoming prisoners. "The fact that you're asked to take off all your clothes and put on an orange jumpsuit, that's not mistreatment," he said.

But Gary Myers, a lawyer representing several of the contractors, said the way the military handled the case was unjust.

"These men did nothing wrong. They were forced out of the country by the Marines who in fact had engaged in conduct that was abusive to our own citizens," Myers said. "I'm pleased that whatever cloud that was hanging over those men is now removed, even if the Marine Corps will not admit it made a mistake."

An estimated 20,000 private security contractors are operating in Iraq. Tension between contractors and active-duty personnel has run high in some cases because the contractors fall outside the normal military chain of command and make considerably higher salaries than their counterparts in the armed forces. In this case, Schopper said the Marines taunted the contractors while they were in custody by asking, "How does it feel to be a rich contractor now?"

Gary Simpler, a 20-year Army veteran who was among the contractors detained, said in an e-mailed response to questions that the Marine Corps was "heavy-handed, abusive to fellow American citizens and should apologize."

Reporting From Iraq: A Failure Or An Accurate Account Of What's Happening? (KRT)

By Clark Hoyt

Knight Ridder, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - Ever since Cleopatra threatened to have a slave whipped with wire and stewed in brine for bringing her the news that Mark Antony had married Caesar's sister, people in power haven't had much tolerance for bearers of bad tidings.

It doesn't matter that, as Cleopatra's poor slave said in Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," "I that do bring the news made not the match."

Today, it's President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and assorted supporters who are blaming the messengers - the news media - for the public's growing disenchantment with the war in Iraq.

As the polls have gone south - 65 percent disapprove of the president's handling of the war in the latest Newsweek Poll - the administration has escalated a soft attack on the media. I say "soft" because the criticism usually is artfully couched. It's not that reporters are disloyal or motivated by partisanship. They're either huddled fearfully in their hotels and can't see what's really happening or they're trapped in a definition of news that values only vividly violent bad news, preferably with pictures.

DOJ_NMG_0022172

Last week on CBS' "Face the Nation," Cheney said his comments that Iraqis would welcome Americans as "liberators" and the Iraqi insurgency was "in its last throes" were "basically accurate and reflect reality." The problem, he said, was that news reporting has created a negative impression "because what's newsworthy is the car bomb in Baghdad. It's not all the work that went on that day in 15 other provinces in terms of making progress toward rebuilding Iraq."

So, is the story of Iraq being distorted by reporting that focuses on violence and fails to tell the good news?

Robert J. Callahan, who served as the press attache at the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad from June 2004 to May 2005, doesn't think so. In an article in the current American Journalism Review, Callahan, who's still a Foreign Service officer, said, "American reporters have faced criticism for their coverage of Iraq, but rarely from those of us who have been there and have seen these journalists at work."

The most persistent criticism, Callahan wrote, comes from people who charge that the media are ignoring the good news in Iraq. He disagrees and points to the saturation coverage of the January 2005 election, when purple ink-stained fingers "became an international symbol of courage and defiance."

Callahan said American diplomats stopped encouraging coverage of good-news events such as the reconstruction of a school because it often invited terrorist attacks that cost innocent lives. "It was frustrating, to be sure," he said, "but prudent."

The truth of Iraq is complex. It's not as rosy as a presidential anecdote about U.S. military success in one isolated town, Tal Afar, suggests. But it's more than the carnage on television news.

Our reporting tells us that it's true that there are areas of Iraq - in the Shiite south and the Kurdish north - where people walk the streets in relative peace. But Baghdad, Iraq's capital and most populous city, and the Sunni Triangle to its northwest are hellishly dangerous. And that lack of security has overshadowed everything else as Iraqis struggle to build a democratic future.

Iraqis have held two successful elections since the U.S.-led invasion, but they're having a hard time establishing a permanent representative government. Though unemployment is more than 30 percent, cell phones and satellite dishes - once forbidden - are everywhere. Baghdad's legendary traffic jams are partly a result of an explosion of automobile ownership.

An Iraqi acquaintance agrees with a majority of Americans that her country is better off without Saddam Hussein, but she says that doesn't mean Iraqis feel good about their lives today. In the old days, in her mixed Baghdad neighborhood of Sunni and Shiite Muslims, everyone knew who the informers were, and to whom they were informing. Now, people live in fear of everyone outside their own families. Death squads roam the streets. Neighbors disappear in the night. Nobody knows who took them, where or why.

A lot of American reconstruction money has been diverted to pay for security, according to the Government Accountability Office. Some projects have ground to a halt. Iraqi oil production remains below prewar levels. So does the availability of electricity. Sewage overflows, and there's little running water that's safe to drink. In a nation that has one of the world's largest known reserves of oil, Iraqis wait in lines a mile long for gasoline.

Through it all, more than 60 percent of Iraqis say they're hopeful about their future. And more than 85 percent want the United States to set a timetable for getting American troops out.

To bring the story of Iraq to you, Knight Ridder maintains a bureau in Baghdad and a network of Iraqi special correspondents around the country. Bureau Chief Nancy A. Youssef, who speaks Arabic, and correspondent Tom Lasseter often are joined by other Knight Ridder colleagues. Our Berlin correspondent, Matthew Schofield, a veteran of several Iraq tours, has just concluded a rotation. They're aided in Baghdad by a staff of a dozen Iraqis: drivers, so-called "fixers" and translators, many of whom have embraced Western journalistic values and become excellent reporters. They're able to go where Americans cannot.

The hotel that houses the Knight Ridder bureau isn't in the isolated Green Zone, where U.S. diplomats and Iraqi leaders are, but it's heavily fortified with concrete blast walls we helped pay for, and it's guarded by an international force of security agents, which we also help support. The hotel has twice been shaken by bombs, once so violently that most of the windows blew out.

Knight Ridder maintains security advisers, former British Royal Marine commandoes who are combat veterans. They're heavily armed. They train the staff daily in security procedures and first aid.

Despite the danger, Nancy and her colleagues do venture out and do find inventive ways to talk with ordinary Iraqis. Nancy says, "When I go grocery shopping, I listen to people's conversations. What are they talking about? And how has their conversation changed since the week before?" Several times, her careful listening has led to stories.

It's a dangerous and sometimes frustrating job. Nancy says, "A colleague of mine described it beautifully. We are living in darkness, shining a flashlight around us and reporting on what we see. Sometimes we see the most important things, sometimes not."

Regardless, each story is part of the fabric of truth.

3 Years Of War Wither A Family's Seed Of Hope (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — As U.S. forces made their way to the capital, Baher Butti sat alone in his house with the AK-47 that Baath Party officials had given him to guard his neighborhood. It was March 25, 2003, and the psychiatrist had just celebrated his 43rd birthday.

"The war on Iraq has started," he wrote in his diary. "I have not prepared myself to be a fighter but a doctor and a family man."

A man trained to heal the suffering of others, Butti would see trauma enter his own house in the three years to follow. Fighting and havoc would empty his church, claim the lives of friends and relatives and, finally, touch his 9-year-old daughter — leaving her scarred and traumatized after a bomb ripped through her school bus.

That March night, Butti described sneaking out from his forced guard duty to see his wife and three children at her father's home.

"I used a road that I thought was convenient to avoid the risk of bombings. I returned back very quickly to resume my duties," he wrote. "I am now in my house. I feel mentally exhausted."

Target practice had been part of Butti's high school curriculum, and Baath Party membership was almost mandatory for him to work as a doctor. But the idea of using a weapon to defend the regime repelled him.

"I feel afraid after I was put by the [party] in this silly role," he wrote. "I was overcome by the feeling of being a sheep on the way to the slaughterhouse."

Street fighting never came to his neighborhood. On April 6, Butti crossed the river and joined his family. Together on a rooftop they watched the tanks enter the city. His wife, Balsam, a more vociferous critic of Saddam Hussein's regime, greeted arriving U.S. soldiers with tea and biscuits.

The soldiers refused.

"We were so happy" that the soldiers had arrived, Balsam Butti recalled later. "But they were afraid of us."

Her husband, for his part, was bewildered by the sight of Americans riding their tanks through the streets of his city.

The idea that his country was occupied by foreigners made Butti uncomfortable. Still, a hope grew. With the Americans, perhaps a kind of progress would arrive.

Butti, a graduate of the Jesuit High School in Baghdad, quickly became involved in local politics, writing pamphlets and columns. He talked to journalists and pontificated on the meaning of democracy, tyranny and freedom.

He stopped keeping a diary. His writing — by necessity private during Hussein's regime — became public.

In June, three months after the invasion, Butti was still trying to articulate what was happening in his country.

"When people saw the statue [of Hussein] falling in Firdos Square, the mountains of oppression that were in their souls started to explode," Butti wrote with characteristic flair.

With Hussein gone, U.S. forces watched as Iraqis looted the city. Freedom meant "do what you feel like," he wrote.

He was still ambivalent about the Americans — "friend or an enemy?"

A few days after the invasion, his wife, an obstetrician, returned to her clinic. Their children, a girl and two boys, went back to school. And Butti resumed his job at Ibn Rushd Teaching Psychiatric Hospital, Baghdad's biggest mental hospital.

Psychiatry had been a neglected field in Iraq for decades. Butti and his colleagues maintained little contact with the outside world and relied on outdated theories and textbooks.

The psychiatrist dreamed of building a small clinic in Baghdad that would offer group therapy and counseling. He brought American doctors to Iraqi mental wards to show them Iraq's abysmal healthcare system. He sent funding proposals to the Coalition Provisional Authority, which ruled Iraq after Hussein's fall.

U.S. officials listened with sympathy but had no money for his project. Their priorities were first relief, then election campaigns and eventually security, he said.

As violence worsened, American and Iraqi officials moved into the Green Zone, a heavily fortified compound along the Tigris River. U.S. soldiers began to refer to the city outside as the "red zone." Baghdad was being divided.

"We used to meet them outside the Green Zone," Butti said of U.S. officials. "Then things became that we had to go to the Green Zone [because] they couldn't go out. Then our entrance to the Green Zone became very difficult."

Outside the compound, gunmen took over streets, kidnapping and killing Iraqis. Doctors and academics in particular became targets. By 2004, many of the doctors who stayed in Iraq carried guns as they made their hospital rounds.

Leaving the house became a gamble, said Butti, who refused to arm himself for work.

DOJ_NMG_0022174

Instead of progress, he and his wife saw advancing irrationality. Baher Butti — a slight, balding man with a bookish air — observed the proliferation of faith healers. Balsam Butti — composed, beautiful and partial to charcoal-colored suits — noticed that more women were giving birth at home, unable to make it to the hospital because of curfews or violence. As a result, more babies were stillborn and more women bled to death during labor, she said.

"Collectively speaking, we have regressed," Baher Butti said. "I'm a believer in God, but it doesn't make me superstitious. But our people are becoming superstitious."

Fundamentalism also took hold. Arsonists torched the Buttis' local library. Liquor store owners were assassinated. Three gunmen shot Balsam Butti's cousin in the stomach as he stood behind the counter of his convenience store. His family believes he was killed for selling beer.

Under Hussein's secular rule, Iraq's Christians were allowed to prosper and practice their faith without much trouble. At Christmas, Iraqi Muslims would go out caroling with their Christian neighbors.

But in the new Iraq, Christians in the Buttis' neighborhood received death threats and fled. By Christmas 2004, pews at their local church were half empty. Extremists targeted barbers for giving Western-style haircuts and violating strict Islamic teachings by trimming or removing men's beards. Baher Butti forbade his teenage son to wear his hair the way he wanted it — spiky.

Violence closed in. Their world was shrinking.

The retreat into their middle-class home in the Baghdad suburbs was bittersweet. Suddenly, there was more time with each other and their children — 9-year-old Ula and her two brothers, 17-year-old Sarmad and 20-year-old Fadhil. Baher and Balsam's marriage blossomed.

On most nights, the family would gather in their cozy living room, watching their favorite TV shows — "Friends" and "The West Wing." Shipwrecked by the upheaval around them, they clung to each other and their island of normality.

Baher refused his family's advice: Abandon Baghdad, move abroad and start a new life. He believed his roots in Iraq were too deep. His grandfather had served as a minister of culture. Baher wanted to build his own legacy — the Al Janna, or Paradise, clinic.

On May 7, 2005, a bright Saturday morning, Balsam was standing in the kitchen rolling up dolmas. The phone rang and Sarmad picked it up. After a brief conversation, he turned to his mother. "Mama, Ula is in danger," he said. "She is in Al Kindi Hospital."

A bomb had ripped through the school bus carrying Ula and seven other girls from Dijla Primary School. Balsam, otherwise unflappable, panicked. She frantically called Baher, who had taken their car for repairs. Rushing to the hospital in a taxi, Baher prayed incessantly for his daughter's survival.

At Al Kindi — a dirty, depleted hospital downtown — doctors had taken Ula for X-rays, examining the damage done to her freckled face. They stitched her wounds without anesthetics.

When Baher found Ula, he showered her bruised and bloodied face with kisses. He thanked God that shrapnel had slashed his daughter's nose rather than her eyes, that only her lips, not her throat, had been slit open. He swept her up and took her to a plastic surgeon, a family friend, who immediately treated the girl. Eventually, the scars would disfigure only Ula's skinny arms.

"That day," Balsam said, "she blamed me because she didn't want to go to school but I had forced her to go."

Ula's nightmares, which she often remembered the next morning, added to her mother's feelings of guilt.

"During the first month, every day she would give us a segment of the incident, a phrase here and a phrase there," Balsam said. "She used to say: 'There was a tank beside us, and the tank was hit. The driver was injured.' In another segment she said: 'The girl beside me was silent. Why was she silent? Did she die or not?' "

Although some were seriously injured, all seven girls survived.

Later her daughter told her, " 'I don't want to remember,' " Balsam said. " 'I don't remember and I don't want to remember.' "

Baher let his daughter be. Better that she forgets, he thought, even if he could not.

On a recent spring day in Baghdad, traffic was at a standstill as trucks unloaded mountains of generators and washing machines — goods once unobtainable in Iraq.

A hot dog vendor did brisk business underneath a sign advertising the South Korean company LG and its slogan, "Life's good." Down a side street, a group of boys played soccer in a dusty field.

Around the corner in a garden, six female doctors and healthcare workers sat in the shade, talking shop. Baher Butti was listening in on their discussion. Behind him, a sign spelled out "Al Janna" — Paradise.

He had finally built it.

DOJ_NMG_0022175

An Iraqi advertising executive, looking for publicity, had donated $10,000. Baher used the money to buy a modest house, creating a refuge for the afflicted. Upstairs, in an empty studio, a patient had been working on a painting as part of his therapy. The half-finished piece on the aisle showed soldiers on horseback attacked by lions.

"It's a small place, but it's just the beginning," Baher said, mixing pride and apology.

For him, however, it was the end — a seed of hope he could no longer sustain. After Ula's school bus was hit, the Buttis decided to leave Iraq. As soon as Sarmad finishes his exams, they will join relatives in the United Arab Emirates.

But that decision ruptured the family bond that had strengthened during the last three years of violence.

The older son, Fadhil, has refused to leave, convinced that he and his friends will be able to change Iraq for the better.

"It's my country," Fadhil said. "This is the place I was born, and I want to die here. I don't want to go outside. We — the students — we will change it. It's our duty."

By Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Five Sunnis die in a mosque attack north of Baghdad. Talabani sees progress on the Cabinet.

BAGHDAD — At least 51 people, including two U.S. soldiers and five Sunnis leaving a mosque, were killed Friday in attacks around Iraq.

The soldiers died in combat in Al Anbar province, the U.S. military said in a statement. It said the men, assigned to the 2/28th Brigade Combat Team, were killed Thursday.

The deaths raised to at least 2,320 the number of U.S. military personnel who have died since the war began in March 2003.

The mosque attack took place in Khalis, north of Baghdad, Iraq's military reported. In addition to the worshipers killed, at least 15 were wounded, it said.

Baghdad police said they found 25 more bodies blindfolded, shot and dumped throughout the capital. Sectarian killings among Shiite and Sunni Muslims have become increasingly common in the city since the Feb. 22 bombing of a key Shiite shrine in Samarra.

The rest of the victims died in a variety of attacks, which included drive-by slayings of three policemen in west Baghdad and three power station workers headed to their jobs in Taji, just north of the capital, police said.

In south Baghdad, gunmen killed four pastry shop employees, officers said.

Meanwhile, former hostage Norman Kember, 74, flew out of Baghdad on a British transport plane Friday, according to the Christian Peacemaker Teams, a day after he and two Canadian men were rescued by U.S., British and Canadian forces.

The two Canadians were to leave this weekend. Friday was Harmeet Singh Sooden's 33rd birthday, and he and James Loney, 41, celebrated with a white cake decorated with a pink Canadian maple leaf.

The three men were kidnapped Nov. 26 along with an American colleague, Tom Fox, 54. Fox's body was found this month, shot and dumped in west Baghdad.

Amid Friday's violence, Iraq's president issued a highly optimistic report on progress among politicians trying to hammer out a new unity government.

Jalal Talabani said the government could be in place for parliamentary approval by the end of the month, though he acknowledged that "I am usually a very optimistic person."

He spoke to reporters after a fifth round of talks among the country's polarized political factions.

A less optimistic Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari has said a Cabinet list could be ready by the end of April.

Separately, the Iraqi mission to the United Nations said the country had signed two deals for a metering system to track oil and gas flows, a step that could help get its economy back on track and reduce oil smuggling.

Iraq's economy has been severely weakened by oil smuggling to neighboring countries. Some experts think oil smuggling may be funding Iraq's insurgency.

As Palestinians Wait At Iraqi Border, Others Get Threats (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022176

BAGHDAD, Iraq, March 24 — The bill of death appeared overnight, scattered on doorsteps and littering the sidewalk. It was addressed to "the Palestinian traitors."

"We warn you that we will eliminate you all if you don't leave the area for good within 10 days," the leaflet said. It bore the signature of a group called the Judgment Day Battalion, and the Palestinian residents of Hurriya, a northern Baghdad neighborhood, found it when they awoke Thursday morning.

"We are ready to leave Iraq — if we have the chance," a Palestinian resident said Friday, declining to provide his name because of fear of retribution. "This is the opinion of everyone here. We feel unsafe, and today is better than tomorrow."

The Palestinian community was once a pet cause of Saddam Hussein, who granted its members special treatment. But now, its members say, they are suffering the backlash of that favoritism, and are singled out for being Sunni Arabs.

As sectarian killings have intensified in the past several weeks, the Palestinians have been frequent targets of Shiite death squads, some in the uniforms of government security forces, several Palestinians said in interviews this week. Scores have been pulled from their homes in Palestinian enclaves around the capital, residents said, and many have turned up dead in the morgue.

The Palestinian observer to the United Nations has appealed to the Security Council for help, and the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has warned of the potential for a crisis.

Many Palestinian families "are in a state of shock and panic," according to a statement from the refugee agency distributed Friday. "This panic may spread and lead to more Palestinians fleeing Baghdad." Many Palestinians pulled their children from schools and stopped going to work, the statement said.

Violence has afflicted every community in Iraq, which has suffered increased sectarian bloodshed since a major Shiite mosque in Samarra was bombed last month.

Insurgent attacks on Friday killed 12 people. One attack involved an improvised bomb that killed 5 worshipers and wounded 17 as they left a Sunni Arab mosque in Khalis, about 35 miles east of Baghdad. The American military reported that two soldiers died in combat in Anbar Province on Thursday.

And the authorities recovered 15 more bodies from the streets of Baghdad on Friday, the latest victims in a wave of mysterious slayings. More than 200 bodies — most bound, some blindfolded and all either shot in the head or garroted — have been discovered in less than three weeks in the Baghdad area, according to the Interior Ministry.

Some victims have been Palestinians, relatives said in interviews, and community members insist they are targets because of their special relationship with Mr. Hussein and their sectarian allegiances.

Riyad Mansour, the Palestinian observer to the United Nations, said in a letter to the Security Council on Thursday that 10 Palestinians were killed and several kidnapped in the previous week alone. He appealed for international intervention to protect the Palestinians in Iraq.

The United Nations estimates that 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq, and many were born in the country. They were given safe harbor during successive regional crises, beginning with the Arab-Israeli war of 1948.

Mr. Hussein, as part of his campaign to fashion himself into a pan-Arab leader, was particularly solicitous of their support. He provided many with free schooling, and free or heavily subsidized housing. But he did not give them the right to own property or the right to citizenship — legal restrictions that remain.

With the fall of Mr. Hussein, many Palestinians were driven from their homes by property owners whose houses had been appropriated by Mr. Hussein. Others came under attack by resentful Iraqis.

Several Palestinians interviewed Friday said the latest generation of violent persecution began last year. At first it was gradual: an unexplained detention here, an assassination there. But since the bombing of the Askariya shrine in Samarra on Feb. 22, violence against Palestinians, particularly in Baghdad, has greatly increased, community members say.

"Now any Palestinian, whether a child or an adult, thinks of himself as a target," said Ali Hussein, 66, a resident of an housing complex for poor Palestinians in Baladiyat, in eastern Baghdad.

Another Baladiyat resident, Fatma Ahmed, said her husband was dragged from his barber shop on Jan. 15 by armed men and driven away. His family found his body in a morgue in March with gunshots to the head and torture wounds on his body.

Sitting in her small apartment in the squalid housing complex, Ms. Ahmed, a heavyset woman with sad eyes, presented a reporter with a two-page typed testimony to her husband's life and unexplained death. "He was known as a hard worker and serious man," the document said, "and his only crime was being Palestinian."

On March 14, the United Nations high commissioner for refugees, António Guterres, sent a letter to President Jalal Talabani expressing his concern about reports of violence against Palestinians, and "the limited capacity of the Iraqi security forces to provide effective protection," according to Astrid van Genderen Stort, a spokeswoman for the refugee agency. Mr. Guterres suggested the creation of "a special protection office" in areas populated by Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0022177

Last Sunday, 89 Palestinians from enclaves around Baghdad arrived at the Jordanian border in two buses seeking refuge. They were turned back by the Jordanian authorities, who closed the border on Monday, and they remained stranded for several days between the Iraqi and Jordanian border posts, a Jordanian government spokesman said.

On Wednesday, the Iraqi government moved them to an Iraqi camp near the border, where the United Nations refugee agency delivered supplies and food. Jordan reopened the border early Thursday, according to Nasser Judeh, a Jordanian spokesman.

The group is "adamant" that it does not want to remain in Iraq, according to a statement from United Nations agency. "They said the killings, disappearance and hostage-taking, affecting their families, neighbors and friends, had become intolerable."

Neighbors and relatives of those in the group say they are watching what happens on the border before they decide whether they, too, will try to flee. But they also said they feared the consequences of staying put.

A Palestinian laborer and resident of Hurriya said the posted death threats have made waiting unbearable. "The countdown has begun," he said.

Threats On Palestians Concern U.N. Agency (AP)

By Bradley S. Klapper, Associated Press Writer

AP, March 25, 2006

The United Nations refugee agency said Friday it was concerned about the safety of Palestinians in Iraq, citing death threats against families in one Baghdad neighborhood.

"They are feeling increasingly trapped, and for security reasons, many have stopped going to work and have taken their children out of school," said Jennifer Pagonis, spokeswoman for the U.N.'s High Commissioner for Refugees.

The agency said threats were posted Thursday on the doors of about 100 Palestinian families. "We will eliminate you all if you don't leave the area for good within 10 days," read a translation of the threats obtained by the U.N. agency.

In the sectarian strife that has recently roiled Iraq, many Shiites and Kurds have come to view Palestinians as sympathetic to the Sunni-dominated insurgency. There also is resentment over privileges they received under Saddam Hussein's rule.

Astrid van Genderen Stort, another UNHCR spokeswoman, said the agency has asked Iraqi authorities to provide increased protection for the Palestinians. Attacks against Palestinians appear to have increased in recent months, she said.

Pagonis said the agency also was concerned about several dozen Palestinians who fled recently to Iraq's Jordanian border.

Jordan refused the group entry and has said it will not take any refugees from Iraq, fearing another exodus to a country already burdened by Palestinians displaced in previous wars.

The UNHCR estimates about 34,000 Palestinians live in Iraq. Many came as refugees of the Arab-Israeli wars.

Pawlenty Goes To Iraq In Group Led By McCain (MINNST)

By Patricia Lopez and Mark Brunswick

Minneapolis Star Tribune, March 25, 2006

He will "be getting a forward look" at challenges facing Minnesota soldiers soon.

Gov. Tim Pawlenty has left for Iraq as part of a delegation led by U.S. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., the governor's office said Friday.

Brian McClung, Pawlenty's spokesman, said that the governor left Thursday afternoon but that McCain's office had asked them to withhold further details of the trip. Also in the delegation are Govs. Bob Riley of Alabama and Jon Huntsman Jr. of Utah.

Pawlenty expects to speak to the news media in a conference at midday today.

In a statement released Friday morning, he said the trip is in part to scope out the ground situation in the Middle East, where 2,600 Minnesota National Guard members are headed.

"Together, with Minnesota Reserves and active-duty military, there will be more than 3,000 Minnesota soldiers in Iraq," Pawlenty said in the statement. "During this trip, I will be getting a forward look at the challenges and conditions our Minnesota soldiers will now be facing."

He said he will meet with Minnesota soldiers and military and Iraqi leaders during his stay.

McClung said McCain approached Pawlenty with the invitation after they had chatted at the recent National Governors Association meeting in February. National Guard spokeswoman Lt. Shannon Purvis said few of the new Minnesota troops are in Iraq. Most remain in Kuwait being trained and getting acclimated to desert conditions.

This will be Pawlenty's second surprise visit to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0022178

He visited Baghdad in February 2004 at the invitation of President Bush, as part of a six-governor fact-finding mission.

While Pawlenty said he never felt endangered on that trip, it was marked by heavy outbreaks of violence in the region, including tracer fire and suicide bombers who killed more than 100 people in two days.

McCain, considered a presidential contender for 2008, is also scheduled to headline fundraisers for Pawlenty in Minneapolis and St. Cloud on April 12.

Salvadorans Ambushed By Memories In Iraq (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

U.S. Had Aided Soldiers in Civil War

SAN SALVADOR -- The convoy of Salvadoran troops was rumbling along a highway in southern Iraq when a bomb exploded under the first Humvee, slicing the driver's neck with shrapnel. As a medic scrambled to reach him, insurgents hiding nearby unleashed a torrent of small-arms fire.

It was the soldiers' first taste of combat in Iraq. But for those who had fought in El Salvador's fierce civil war as teenagers two decades earlier, the skirmish near Diwaniyah last September felt uncomfortably familiar.

Once again, they were crouching for cover against the deafening rat-a-tat-tat of AK-47 assault rifles. Once again, they were firing back with weapons and ammunition supplied by the U.S. government.

"Suddenly all these memories of the civil war came back to me," recalled Gustavo, a 35-year-old sergeant who returned to his village in northern El Salvador last month. Like other soldiers interviewed, he asked that his full name not be published because he was not authorized to speak publicly. "It was strange," he said. "I started remembering all these ambushes and battles I hadn't thought about in so long."

The Salvadoran government's willingness to keep sending troops to Iraq -- after three other Latin American countries pulled out their forces -- underscores the unusually strong political and economic bonds, as well as the unique military relationship, forged in the past two decades between this tiny country and the United States. More than 1 million Salvadorans now live in the United States, including 125,000 in the Washington region, census figures show. The Salvadoran Embassy estimates the number in the region at 500,000.

The Salvadoran and U.S. militaries have largely reversed their roles in the two conflicts. In El Salvador, Salvadoran soldiers did nearly all the fighting against leftist guerrillas, while dozens of U.S. military advisers trained, armed and often secretly directed them as part of a broader policy to prevent any more Central American nations from succumbing to the leftist revolution that swept Nicaragua in 1979.

In Iraq, the roughly 380 Salvadoran troops are a tiny presence compared with the 133,000 U.S. troops there. Perhaps their greatest contribution is to help preserve the diminishing "coalition of the willing" that President Bush assembled in 2003. Honduras, Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic originally sent troops but have since withdrawn.

One reason El Salvador has agreed to stay, according to analysts, is that its three most recent elected presidents have been members of the rightist ARENA party, which has close ties with the Bush administration and shares its commitment to a proposed regional free-trade agreement.

Salvadoran workers in the United States send home $2.8 billion annually, and the current Salvadoran president, Elias Antonio Saca, has been lobbying the U.S. government to liberalize immigration laws so more can enter legally. He has also requested repeated extensions of the temporary legal status that the United States granted to more than 220,000 illegal Salvadoran immigrants in 2001 after earthquakes devastated El Salvador.

Last month, the Bush administration announced the latest extension of the controversial program, two weeks after Saca agreed to send a sixth contingent of troops to Iraq. So far, more than 2,300 Salvadorans have served there, and two have been killed.

"ARENA has evolved considerably, but the continuity is still there," noted Peter Hakim, president of the Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington-based research group. Although neither government has acknowledged a link to El Salvador's Iraq policy, "it certainly doesn't hurt," he observed.

Some Salvadorans feel it is unfair to send the troops to Iraq. One is Herminia Ramos, whose son Natividad died there in 2004.

"Yes, they have a duty to serve. But it's a duty to protect their own country, not to take care of a country so far away that has nothing to do with us," Ramos, 47, said bitterly on a recent morning as she shelled peas in the dirt yard of her village home. "It's like our government is selling these soldiers to the United States."

Ramos said Natividad dropped out of school at age 15 to join the army after his father died. Ramos, an illiterate laundress, needed money to raise her three younger children, and the army paid about $240 a month.

DOJ_NMG_0022179

Within two years, Natividad was deployed to Iraq. He was killed in the city of Najaf on April 4, 2004, when supporters of the Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr stormed a barracks defended by Salvadoran and Spanish troops. A second Salvadoran soldier died in a vehicle accident.

Ramos said she knew her son was dead the moment she saw a delegation of soldiers coming up the path to her mud-brick hut. "I had this horrible feeling in my stomach," she recalled, tears rolling down her cheeks. "All I felt was pain."

Her grief soon turned to anger. It took months of nagging to get the military to build the small cement house it had promised her, and Natividad's $7,000 government life insurance payment soon ran out.

Last summer, with help from another son, Ramos wrote to President Saca, begging him not to send any more soldiers to Iraq. But there have been only small, scattered antiwar demonstrations in El Salvador, and several recently returned soldiers said they did not resent being deployed.

"Maybe going doesn't benefit me personally. But I know it's good for the country and for all those Salvadorans in the United States," Gustavo said.

Other soldiers said that when they passed through John F. Kennedy International Airport in New York on their way to Iraq, Salvadoran janitors thanked them, saying their military service was creating more respect for Salvadoran immigrants.

Many also said they felt a personal duty to repay U.S. soldiers for serving alongside them during the civil war.

The U.S. involvement in that conflict remains controversial because U.S. officials overlooked or played down atrocities committed by the Salvadoran military against civilians. But many Salvadorans who were drafted as teenagers to fight guerrillas viewed the U.S. money and training as a lifesaver for their country.

In Iraq, the warm relations have continued. Salvadorans said many U.S. soldiers, particularly those who spoke some Spanish, would seek them out in mess halls or stop by their barracks to say hello.

"They'd call us 'brother' and ask for our Salvadoran flag patches to put on their uniforms," recalled Cesar, 37, a sergeant who lives near the capital. In response, he said, he stuck an American flag patch on his flak vest, until his Iraqi translator warned him it would increase his chances of being shot at by insurgents.

Salvadoran soldiers have faced plenty of danger in Iraq, including the ambush at Diwaniyah. On patrols, they said, bullets would strike their Humvees; at night, their barracks were frequently attacked with mortars.

One day, Gustavo's unit was called to guard the scene of a suicide bombing in a market. Picking his way past body parts, he said, he was flooded with gruesome memories of the civil war he had tried to forget: his brother, blinded after stepping on a mine; the corpse of a female social worker, cut open and left naked in the middle of a road.

Now, three weeks after returning home, Gustavo said he still has trouble sleeping. If his wife taps him even gently, he bounds out of bed and takes cover.

"You felt like you were taunting death every time you went out," Gustavo said.

Over time, the soldiers became more reluctant to go on patrols. The decline in morale was partly fueled by rumors of corruption among the battalion's leadership, whom soldiers suspected of stealing new uniforms and boots. They were also humiliated to learn that troops from other developing nations were being paid up to seven times what they were getting.

Pablo, 37, a corporal now on leave in his cinder-block home in a slum near the capital, said he was hoping for his first raise in 10 years. If it doesn't come through, he said, he will have no choice but to try to sneak into the United States. He has four young children and mounting school expenses.

Besides, he said with a hopeful smile, "if the border police catch me, then I'll just explain to them that I'm a Salvadoran who served in Iraq. Then maybe they'll let me stay."

Afghan Judge Balks At Prodding (WT/AP)

By Amir Shah, Associated Press

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

KABUL -- The chief judge trying an Afghan man who faces a death sentence for converting from Islam to Christianity defended the court's autonomy yesterday amid reports the man could be freed.

Ansarullah Mawlavi Zada, the chief among three judges trying the case, asserted the autonomy of the court.

"We have constitution and law here. Nobody has the right to put pressure on us," he said. International pressure against the case has been building, and the Afghan government may be rethinking the charges against Abdul Rahman. A government official and MSNBC said yesterday that Mr. Rahman may be freed within the next few days.

Senior clerics condemned Mr. Rahman as an apostate.

Mr. Rahman had "committed the greatest sin" by converting to Christianity and deserved to be killed, cleric Abdul Raoulf said in a sermon yesterday at Herati Mosque.

"God's way is the right way, and this man whose name is Abdul Rahman is an apostate," he told about 150 worshippers.

DOJ_NMG_0022180

Another cleric, Asife Muhseni, told a gathering of preachers and intellectuals at a Kabul hotel that the Afghan president had no right to overturn the punishment of an apostate.

He demanded that clerics be able to question Mr. Rahman in jail to discover why he had converted to Christianity. He suggested it could have been the result of a conspiracy by Western nations or Jews.

Nevertheless, speculation grew yesterday that the death penalty would not be carried out. "He could be released soon," an Afghan government official said on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to comment on the case.

MSNBC, citing an Afghan diplomatic official it did not identify, said Mr. Rahman, 41, could be released Monday. The British Broadcasting Corp. said government officials were meeting today to discuss the case.

Senior clerics in the Afghan capital have voiced strong support for prosecuting Mr. Rahman and again warned yesterday they would incite people to kill him unless he reverted to Islam.

Australia's Prime Minister John Howard, meanwhile, joined the chorus of Western leaders expressing outrage over the prosecution and said he would protest personally to President Hamid Karzai.

"This is appalling. When I saw the report about this I felt sick literally," Mr. Howard told an Australian radio network yesterday. "The idea that a person could be punished because of their religious belief and the idea they might be executed is just beyond belief."

Mr. Rahman faces the death penalty under Afghanistan's Islamic laws for converting 16 years ago while working as a medical aid worker for an international Christian group helping Afghan refugees in Pakistan.

Mr. Karzai's office has declined to comment on the case, which has put the Afghan leader in an awkward position.

Mr. Karzai took power after the ouster of the hard-line Taliban regime in a U.S.-led war in late 2001 and he relies on international forces to maintain his still-shaky grip on the country. However, he could be reluctant to offend Islamic sensibilities at home or alienate religious conservatives wielding considerable power.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Mr. Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to determine whether he is fit to stand trial.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice telephoned Mr. Karzai on Thursday, seeking a "favorable resolution" of the case. She said Washington looked forward to that "in the very near future."

At a fruit market in Kabul, many ordinary Afghans said they supported the death penalty, but some wanted more investigation before meting out the punishment.

"In the past 30 years, so many Afghans have been killed in name of communism, Taliban and politics or for robbery. It's enough Afghans killed," said Ghulam Muhammad, 45, a former army officer. "Clerics should talk to [Mr. Rahman] and bring him to the right way," he said.

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, March 24 — Preachers used Friday Prayer services to call for the execution of an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity, despite growing protests in the West. The conversion of the man, Abdul Rahman, 15 years ago was brought to the attention of the authorities as part of a child custody dispute.

The Bush administration and European governments have strongly protested the case as a violation of religious freedom. But Mr. Rahman has drawn a strong reaction in Afghanistan, too, and for many hardline clerics, there is no greater offense than apostasy.

One speaker, Maulavi Habibullah, told more than a thousand clerics and young people gathered in Kabul: "Afghanistan does not have any obligation under international laws. The prophet says, when somebody changes religion, he must be killed."

He and others demanded that the country's political leaders and judges resist international pressure.

Germany's chancellor, Angela Merkel, told reporters on Friday that she had been assured by President Hamid Karzai in a telephone call that Mr. Rahman would not be executed, The Associated Press reported.

A senior government official said Mr. Rahman, 41, would be released from jail soon, Agence France-Presse reported. The agency did not identify the official, who added that there would be a top-level meeting on the case on Saturday.

The dispute has exposed the contradictions in Afghanistan's Constitution, which promises freedom of religion on the one hand, and on the other declares Islam supreme.

Sheik Asif Muhsini, a Shiite cleric, emphasized that the Constitution says, "No law can contradict Islam and the values of the Constitution."

DOJ_NMG_0022181

The case has fueled feelings here of an assault against Islam, coming after reports of the possible desecration of the Koran in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, in 2004 by American soldiers and, more recently, cartoons published in Europe that mocked the Prophet Muhammad.

U.S. Christians Outraged Over Afghan Trial (AP)

By Peter James Spielmann

AP, March 25, 2006

Christian lobby groups are urging President Bush to do more to save a man on trial in Afghanistan for converting from Islam to Christianity.

Anger among American Christians continued to mount against the U.S.-backed government of Afghanistan, where Abdul Rahman, a 41-year-old former medical aid worker, faces the death penalty under Islamic laws for becoming a Christian.

Rahman's trial, which started last week, has fired passions in conservative Muslim Afghanistan and highlighted a conflict of values between Afghanistan and its Western backers — notably American Christians who cheered the Bush administration when it toppled the oppressive Taliban regime.

American Christians have criticized the Bush administration for what they feel is an inadequate response to a fundamental issue of freedom of conscience.

"That there should even be such a trial is an outrage. How can we congratulate ourselves for liberating Afghanistan from the rule of jihadists only to be ruled by radical Islamists who kill Christians?" Family Research Council president Tony Perkins said in a statement.

"Americans will not give their blood and treasure to prop up new Islamic fundamentalist regimes. Religious freedom is not just 'an important element' of democracy; it is its cornerstone. Religious persecution leads inevitably to political tyranny. Five hundred years of history confirm this. Americans have not given their lives so that Christians can be put to death," Perkins said.

Such sentiments are spreading through Christian radio stations, Web sites and blogs, stoked by traditional conservative institutions as National Review magazine.

National Review Online quoted Chuck Colson, a former Nixon White House official, disgraced by Watergate and rehabilitated as a Christian preacher, as saying:

"I have supported the Bush administration's foreign policy because I came to believe that the best way to stop Islamo-fascism was by promoting democracy," Colson said. "But if we can't guarantee fundamental religious freedoms in the countries where we establish democratic reforms, then the whole credibility of our foreign policy is thrown into serious question."

The American Family Association has organized an Internet campaign to e-mail Bush and "ask him to intervene to save the life of Abdul Rahman. Help get others involved in saving the life of this Christian who refuses to deny Christ."

Bush expressed alarm this week, and on Thursday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Karzai, seeking a "favorable resolution" of the Rahman case.

Rice spokesman Sean McCormack said she told Karzai it is important for the Afghan people to know that freedom of religion is observed in their country.

Diplomats have said the Afghan government is searching for a way to drop the case. On Wednesday, authorities said Rahman is suspected of being mentally ill and would undergo psychological examinations to see whether he is fit to stand trial.

If Rahman is executed, political experts agree, Bush will have alienated his most loyal core constituency — Christian conservatives.

"The Bush administration simply cannot let this happen. They have to stop this one way or the other. It would make a mockery of much of what President Bush has about our creation of a new democracy in Afghanistan," said Professor Larry Sabato of the University of Virginia, a keen analyst of American political trends.

"It splits his base, and it will be endless trouble for him if it goes forward, and I'm sure he won't it happen," Sabato said.

The largest Protestant denomination in America, the usually conservative Southern Baptists, also mobilized on the issue:

"The American people are not sending their young men and women to Afghanistan for this definition of freedom," said Richard Land, president of the Southern Baptist Ethics and Religious Liberty Commission. "Compulsion in the name of any religion is shameful and should be rejected by any sincere professor of any religion. Mr. Rahman should be released immediately.

Christian activists have had strong influence over particular Bush foreign policy issues which they see as morally pivotal.

Christian lobbyists have focused on global trafficking in refugees, especially sex slaves; tried to pacify a two-decade war in Sudan between the Muslim government in the north and Christian and animist groups in the south; and have tried to crack North Korea's oppressive isolation by sending aid to covert Christian groups and smuggling out refugees.

DOJ_NMG_0022182

Republican Congressman Chris Smith wrote to Bush saying that "the arrest of Mr. Rahman indicates that religious freedom and the fundamental human rights of not just this one man, but of each and every Afghan citizen, are still not fully protected in Afghanistan."

The Compass Direct News Agency, a group that monitors the persecutions of Christians worldwide, reported this week that two more Afghan Christians have been arrested and said more are being beaten and harassed by Afghans riled over the Rahman case.

The Afghan Christian: A Problem For Karzai (TIME)

By Rachel Morarjee

Time, March 24, 2006

The man facing a death sentence for converting to Christianity has put Afghanistan's president in a bind

President Hamid Karzai's fragile Afghan government finds itself in a bind over the trial of Abdul Rahman, 41, who faces the death sentence for converting to Christianity. International pressure is building on Karzai to interfere in the judicial process and free Rahman. But the President must also contend with deeply conservative Afghans — many of whom already regard him as too pro-West — who believe the convert should be punished under Islamic law.

This week, several world leaders — including those with peacekeeping troops in Afghanistan — have voiced alarm about the trial. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice phoned Karzai on Thursday, urging a "favorable resolution" to the case.

But for many Afghans, the "favorable resolution" would be Rahman's execution. It's not only the country's conservative clergy that is calling for his death. "He has brought shame on the name of Afghanistan and deserves to die," said Daud Massoud, 37, a taxi driver in Kabul. That sentiment resonates strongest in the country's deeply conservative south and east, over which Kabul exercises little control. These are also the areas where the Taliban is making a comeback and top Al-Qaeda commanders are believed to be hiding.

Meanwhile, the judge presiding over the case has rejected international calls for leniency and warned the Karzai government not to interfere with the judicial process. Ansarullah Maulavizada appealed for the West to respect the independence of the Afghan judiciary. "In the West you allow two women to get married because that is the law and I respect that," he told TIME. "In Afghanistan, we have Sharia law and the people respect and accept this."

The only concession Maulavizada is prepared to make is to speed up the trial process. "Because this is a complex case we would like to get it over with quickly — the hearing will be this week," he said.

Karzai is acutely aware of how badly a death sentence would play with foreign governments whose aid dollars keep the Afghan economy afloat — and whose troops keep the peace. "There is no way it would come to a death penalty," a top Afghan government official told TIME, "because Karzai would have the final say on any appeal [Rahman] made to have his sentence commuted." Karzai has greenlighted only one death sentence since he came to office.

It may not come to that. Some officials have suggested that Rahman may be declared mentally ill, allowing the judge to show leniency. "He has said he is a Christian, but we do not know about his mental state," said Maulavizada. "We will investigate and if we find he is mentally ill we will send him to the doctors."

In Afghan Christian, Story Of A Larger Conflict (NYT)

By Roger Cohen International Herald Tribune

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

BERLIN Edmund Stoiber, the conservative German who runs the conservative and successful state of Bavaria, put his country's outrage bluntly. "A change of belief is supremely private," he said. "The state has nothing to do with it."

The change in question was that of Abdul Rahman, an Afghan Muslim who converted to Christianity. Apostasy is about as bad as it gets under Islamic law and Rahman is facing a possible death sentence in Kabul.

The plight of Rahman, who was denounced by his family for abandoning Islam and is in jail in Afghanistan, has got Germany in a tizzy. The case has all the elements to stoke German outrage.

It also has elements that should lead everyone to ponder whether the West's problem is really with a "perversion" of Islam, as politicians from President George W. Bush to Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain have insisted, or with Islam itself.

German ire has been particularly intense for several reasons: Rahman once lived in Germany; the country is ferociously opposed to the death sentence; it is ferociously attached to freedom of religious choice; and it has over 2,000 troops in Afghanistan to promote precisely the democratic values it sees being trampled in the Rahman case.

Rahman's words in a recent Kabul court appearance have become a kind of rallying cry for an indignant Germany: "I'm not an apostate, I'm obedient to God but I'm a Christian, that's my choice."

DOJ_NMG_0022183

Seems reasonable enough to the average citizen of the West. But not to the conservative religious leaders who dominate Afghan courts. The judge told Rahman, who converted 15 years ago while working for an aid group in Pakistan, that he could face the death penalty if he refused to become a Muslim again.

So what, Germans wondered, were their troops doing in this faraway place, if a 41-year-old man who has not hurt a flea but prefers Christianity to Islam could face execution?

Politicians have scurried to register outrage. Chancellor Angela Merkel, a Christian Democrat, called the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, to protest. She then declared that "Afghanistan must keep to its international obligations," whatever they may be.

Frank-Walter Steinmeier, the Social Democratic foreign minister, has also been on the phone, speaking to the Afghan foreign minister, Abdullah. He expressed hope that a solution might be found and cautioned that the withdrawal of German aid or soldiers - a measure demanded by several members of Parliament - could "play into the hands of those who would like to reverse the process of recent years."

Germany, of course, is not alone in its indignation. Bush has said he's "deeply troubled." Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, has given Abdullah an earful. A State Department spokesman has alluded to the flouting of "universal democratic values." Christian talk shows in the United States have moved into overdrive.

With all this commotion, it seems reasonable to take a deep breath and ask what's actually going on. Afghan prosecutors have no doubt Rahman's a "microbe," as they've called him, and that they are fulfilling their obligations under Shariah law.

European and American politicians have no doubt that the values of the civilization they represent are being threatened in a state they are striving to remake, if not in their image, at least in an image acceptable to the West.

The mutual incomprehension, and anger, is strong. It reflects a basic fact that Western politicians have tended to shy away from: Islam, the youngest of the world's major religions, is still, more than a quarter-century after the Iranian revolution, in the midst of a tremendous political effervescence.

After the eclipse of Nasserite pan- Arabism, it became the political refuge of millions of people questing for some alternative to the corrupt Middle Eastern tyrannies they saw being supported by the West, particularly the United States. The contemporary rise of Hamas, and the political success of the Taliban in Afghanistan in the 1990s, are just two illustrations of this phenomenon.

Such political Islam takes many forms, but central to it is the notion that the Koran and other sacred texts provide a complete system of laws for societies and individuals. The Western notion of a separation of church and state, of religion and politics belonging respectively to the private and public spheres, is anathema.

In this sense, two worlds often confront each other across the gulf between the West and Islam, worlds that the West would characterize as modern and anti-modern. To ignore this seems treacherous.

But Western leaders have striven to confine the scope of the conflict. They talk of being at war with Islamic fundamentalists who have "perverted" their religion in the name of a murderous and fanatical ideology. They insist their quarrel is not with Islam itself.

This is understandable: Islam is a great world religion followed by more than a fifth of humanity. No Islamic text exhorts the random slaughter of civilians, although every violent and fundamentalist group of the bin Laden school has tried to sanctify its actions through references to jihad against the infidel and claims to represent a purer, more authentic Islam.

In reality, it seems, there is an overall conflict and there is a war. The war has been declared by Bush against Islamic extremism, the kind that produced the 9/11 attack. The overall conflict is illustrated in the Rahman case.

Here, over the fate of a Christian Afghan, the values of the West and the values of Islam fight each other. They are violently at odds; no ecumenical circumlocution gets around that.

The West and Islam also fight each other in European societies where honor killings take the lives of young Muslim women, or homosexuals get assaulted. Two views of society and the place of religion within it vie with each other.

In this sense, Rahman offers a timely reminder. The West and Islam are not at war, but they are in conflict. And it seems myopic and counterproductive to view the war as anything but the extreme expression of that conflict.

Planners Raise Funds For Veterans Memorial (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, March 25, 2006

Soldiers returning from Iraq and other conflicts with missing limbs and shattered bodies will have a place of honor among the memorials of the nation's capital.

Planners are raising money for a new site — nestled among the tributes to fallen war heroes, from World War II, Korea and Vietnam — to salute roughly 3 million disabled veterans.

The American Veterans Disabled for Life Memorial is expected to open in the next three to four years on an impressive two-acre site near the National Mall, just steps from the Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0022184

Authorized by federal legislation in 2000, the future memorial has taken on added meaning as Americans watch a new generation of disabled veterans return from war in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"Now it's even more important than ever with the number of people coming back wounded, maimed and in some cases disabled for life," said Arthur Wilson, president of the Disabled Veterans' LIFE Memorial Foundation, the group planning the project. "This will be the only war memorial that will honor the living as opposed to the deceased."

The foundation is in the midst of a $65 million private fundraising campaign to build the memorial. Earlier this year, the group tapped former Veterans Affairs Secretary Anthony Principi to join its advisory board and help raise the private funds needed to design and build the site.

Pope said she was moved by the story of wounded soldiers in the 1970s, after she performed for injured veterans at the Rusk Rehabilitation Center in New York.

"I chose the song 'Somewhere' from 'West Side Story' and one of the lyrics goes, 'Hold my hand and I'll take you there,'" she said in a telephone interview from her office in Delray Beach, Fla. "I looked down and one of the men had no hands, but he smiled and it changed my life."

Several years later, she began working with then-Veterans Affairs Secretary Jesse Brown to persuade Congress to approve the memorial. It received strong bipartisan support, and President Clinton signed legislation authorizing the plan in 2000. Pope has already donated $2 million toward the project and has pledged to give more through matching gifts.

The memorial's design — still being fine tuned — features a reflecting pool with an eternal flame at the center, surrounded by a grove of trees. Two walls of glass will be etched with quotations from dignitaries and veterans of various wars, with comments discussing when they were injured and how they cope with being disabled.

Four 9-foot-tall bronze sculptures interspersed in openings along the glass wall will show the human body in various states of injury to suggest a sense of loss.

Ironically, interest in the memorial has increased since the Iraq war began. So far, the foundation has raised more than $10 million and received support and donations from a variety of veterans groups, including Kansas City, Mo.-based Veterans of Foreign Wars, which donated $100,000.

While there are no firm statistics yet on how many disabled veterans have emerged from the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, the rate of severe injuries is higher than previous wars because improvements in body armor and battlefield medical treatment allow more troops to survive blast injuries.

Jeremy Chwat, policy director of the service members' aid group Wounded Warrior Project, estimates 6,000 to 8,000 of the wounded soldiers in the conflicts have suffered severe injuries.

"And by severe, we mean living with a disability for the rest of their lives," Chwat said.

That includes more than 1,000 soldiers suffering traumatic brain injury and nearly 400 amputees — many from roadside bombs — according to the latest figures from the U.S. Army Medical Command and Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington.

Surviving To Tell The Tale Of Torture (LAT)

By Olga Talamante, Olga Talamante Is The Executive Director Of California's Chicana/latina Foundation.

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

THE BURLAP BAG felt rough and scratchy against my cheek, but it also smelled earthy and deceptively comforting. Thick tape already covered my eyes, so the bag's only purpose was to frighten me. And it worked. I knew I had entered another dimension.

A day earlier I had been a not-too-unusual 24-year-old American student from UC Santa Cruz, working with the Peronist Youth organization for social change in Azul, Argentina. For the next 16 months, I would become one of thousands of political prisoners and torture victims taken into custody as Argentina first declared martial law and then later suffered a right-wing military coup. But I was one of the lucky ones — a survivor, thanks to family and friends in the United States who won my release on March 27, 1976.

When I returned home to California and testified about the torture, my stories horrified listeners. But we could feel safe here because torture was the province of brutal, unsophisticated despots. It was a time when the average American could not imagine our soldiers abroad participating in anything remotely similar. Now, three years into the Iraq war, we have seen the images of Abu Ghraib and read accounts of the atrocities at Baghdad's Camp Nama.

Americans once shocked by my experience now hear officials defend torture as a necessary evil in the war against terrorism. But it is only evil.

In my secret torture chamber — later it was confirmed to have been within the walls of the local police station — a slight turn of my head could bring on a new barrage of insults and fists.

On one occasion, hands grabbed and pushed me up stairs. I could feel furniture and tried to use the contour of a chair, the edge of a table and sounds to get my bearings. I wanted to know exactly where I was: to the left of the table, to the right of the credenza or in front of the water fountain?

My torturers pushed me here and there. But I was determined. With my elbow, I felt the corner of a table, then a chair. Victory. They wanted me confused, but I knew my exact position. I was between the table and the chair. As long as my position was clear, some odd reasoning assured me, survival would follow.

They took me to another room. I sensed several new people. I heard men's voices. They untied my hands and feet. They ordered me to take my clothes off. I hesitated, and they made it clear that it was not a request but a demand. Now naked except for the tape over my eyes, I felt hands sit me down on a bed and then push me back, spreading my arms and legs, tying them at each corner. If I know where I am, I can survive? The thought was less convincing.

Electric currents were applied to the most sensitive parts of my body.

All I could do was scream. The terror came after. They are going to do it again, I thought. Someone shoved a pillow over my face to muffle my screams. I panicked. To survive, I must be able to breathe and scream.

After about the third time the electric current surged, I figured out a brilliant maneuver. Right before the hands holding the pillow pushed down again, I turned my head sideways and took a breath. The timing of this took complete focus. It was a project. New reasoning kicked in: As long as I could get the timing right, I would survive.

Now, every time I read a story about U.S. forces participating in similar acts, it takes me back to that torture room.

The Argentine military had its own sick rationale for policies that would ultimately "disappear" thousands of men, women and children — they were fighting an enemy from within. But the Argentine people had a better name for it: the "dirty war."

As Argentina marked the 30th anniversary of the military coup last week, ex-Gen. Jorge Rafael Videla, key implementer of that dirty war, was under house arrest, with thousands of people camped outside his home. The former general has been convicted for multiple cases of robbery, homicide, aggravated false arrests, torture and torture resulting in death between 1976 and 1981. He has been sentenced to life imprisonment. The people are demanding that he serve out that sentence.

Iraq has become our dirty war. To those who defend torture there, beware. There will be survivors, and they will tell their stories.

Uncle Sam's Desperation -- And A Recruit's (WP)

By Brian Ford

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

"Can you give a psychological clearance for someone who wants to go into the military?" asked the caller, in a crisp, authoritative voice.

Having heard so much about the military's recent recruiting difficulties, I was intrigued. "Sure, assuming the person's okay."

"Now, I'm only authorized to pay for one session, but we don't want you to do psychoanalysis. You just need to say that this kid is okay to rejoin the Army."

"Rejoin?"

"He signed up three years ago, but then he got homesick and depressed, didn't feel comfortable handling weapons or with all the violence. He was generally discharged."

To my knowledge, a general discharge was both negative and not that easy to get. The kid must have been in pretty bad shape. "Why would he be any different now?"

"Says he sees the opportunity he gave up and now he wants to make the Army his career. We'd like to help him do that." "Help him" seemed to hang in the air, like a hawk above some oblivious fledgling.

"Honestly," the recruiter said, "we didn't used to consider someone like this, but we're under lots of pressure these days."

I thought back to my hospital emergency room days and the many patients I'd seen whose first psychiatric problems had emerged while they were in the military. They might have arisen anyway, but the stress of military service had always seemed a contributing factor.

"Maybe you'd like to see his discharge report?"

A grainy fax soon arrived. "Serious symptoms of anxiety and depression," the evaluator had written, "likely to get worse if subject remains in military." Also attached was the kid's own handwritten statement. "I hate this 'kill, kill, kill' all the time. Maybe the army is great, but it's not for me."

DOJ_NMG_0022186

The plaintive tone was even more compelling than the evaluator's. Could the kid's attitude possibly have changed that much? Still, I tried to be open-minded when Juan arrived next morning in a worn gray sweatshirt and jeans. He was so short, maybe 5-3, that I wondered if the Army had any sort of height requirement.

I ran through the standard questions about hallucinations, delusions, substance abuse, suicidal or violent thoughts, suppressing an ironic smile at this last query. Juan said nothing remarkable.

"I've got your discharge evaluation," I told him finally, plucking the document from my desk, "but maybe it would be better if you just tell me what happened back then."

Juan took a deep breath. "Bad timing," he said. "I signed up between my junior and senior years in high school, but by the time I had to go I was married and had a son. My wife kept writing saying how much she missed me, how I wasn't seeing my baby grow up. That really got me. She's all for it now," he quickly added. "She's thinking of joining herself once she gets her GED."

"You had a hard time with all the violence."

Juan ducked his head sheepishly. "I made that up. It wasn't like I loved the Army or anything, but back then I didn't know what life was about. As soon as I left I wanted to go back, but you have to wait two years to reapply after a general discharge."

"What have you done since then?"

"Worked at a warehouse till it closed, McDonald's, Wal-Mart. I'm temping now since my family's been in the shelter."

"The shelter."

"Couldn't pay the rent. It's kind of funny, the building is right across the street from the recruiting center." Juan smiled at this evident transparency. "But that's why I want to enlist -- put a roof over my family's head."

Maybe with more sessions we could have explored whether this was what he really wanted. But that wasn't our task. "If you get in, I guess you could wind up in Iraq."

"They tell us 70 percent."

"How do you feel about possibly getting wounded or even killed?"

"I just keep my mind on the paycheck, health insurance, even the uniform. I think of my son looking at me and saying, 'Wow! A soldier.' "

I looked at him. Was it a facade or had he accurately calculated that this truly was the most promising of his potential life paths? I didn't know which was worse.

"So what do you think?" he asked.

"You seem fine now. I'm concerned how you'll manage if you get back in."

"No one knows that."

"We have to consider past history."

"Even though I'm saying I made it all up?"

"Yes."

He looked crushed, as though seeing life's opportunities lost to one youthful indiscretion. "But really, I'm all right now."

The recruiter called after he left. "Do you have to write that you're not sure how he'll manage?"

"Yes."

"The kid really wants this." He sounded like a realtor or a car salesman making one last pitch to a prospect.

"I know."

Juan came by next morning to pick up his evaluation. "If this doesn't work out, what will you do?" I asked.

"Just keep trying," He tucked the letter in his pocket. "This is my dream."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

SEC Overturns Lifetime Ban On Quattrone By NASD (WSJ)

By Randall Smith

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

The Securities and Exchange Commission set aside a lifetime ban from the securities industry that had been imposed against Frank Quattrone, the former star investment banker.

It was Mr. Quattrone's second big win of the week related to charges against him. On Monday, a federal appeals court vacated his May 2004 criminal conviction on obstruction-of-justice charges, citing faulty jury instructions and other errors by his trial judge.

In the SEC action Friday, the federal securities regulator struck down a lifetime ban from the business, which had been imposed in November 2004 by an arm of the National Association of Securities Dealers. The move puts him a step closer to returning to the securities industry.

The ban resulted from Mr. Quattrone's failure to testify during an investigation by the NASD into allegations of possible improper "spinning," or rule violations related to steering hot initial public offerings of stock to investment-banking clients.

A lawyer for Mr. Quattrone, Jerome B. Falk, said the SEC decision "corrects the NASD's gross injustice," and is "particularly appropriate" considering the appeals court ruling. The NASD declined to comment, saying it was "reviewing the commission's decision." A Quattrone spokesman said it is "too early" to address any possible return to Wall Street by the banker.

Although the ruling could open the door for Mr. Quattrone's return to the securities business, he faces a possible third trial on the same federal criminal obstruction charges, and a separate set of charges against him by the NASD remains pending. Those charges relate to the issues of spinning and research bias. A criminal conviction would carry a 10-year industry ban.

Mr. Quattrone, 50 years old, who at the time the NASD sought his testimony was under investigation for possible obstruction, cited his fifth-amendment right against self-incrimination. He had previously testified in the same proceeding, and asked for a delay until the criminal proceedings were resolved.

In January 2004, an NASD hearing panel suspended Mr. Quattrone for a year. After both the NASD and Mr. Quattrone appealed, the NASD's National Adjudicatory Council ordered a more stringent lifetime ban, which Mr. Quattrone then appealed to the SEC.

Mr. Quattrone argued that because the NASD was probing possible spinning and research-bias charges against numerous firms in conjunction with the SEC, the NASD was acting as a government agency, which should have given him the right to avoid testifying. He also said he was being treated unfairly because of his notoriety. Mr. Quattrone was the top technology banker for the former Credit Suisse First Boston unit of Credit Suisse Group during the Internet market mania.

Friday's SEC ruling said that the NASD should have given Mr. Quattrone's argument a hearing.

A Fine That Fits The Crime (NYT)

By Gary Weiss

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

THE mutual fund scandals, which exploded with a thunderclap of attention in September 2003, are winding down. You might even say they are over. The more or less final act came earlier this month, when Bear Stearns agreed to a settlement with the Securities and Exchange Commission under which it would pay $250 million to investors for its alleged fund-related transgressions.

If one represents "yelling at customers" and 10 is "stealing their money," what Bear Stearns did was a solid six on the scale of Wall Street improprieties. Professional traders, mostly at hedge funds, had engaged in rapid-fire trading of otherwise innocent-looking mutual funds. This seesaw damaged the funds' net asset values and thus the IRA's and 401(k)'s of small investors. By some accounts, traders had been doing that kind of thing for many years, until regulators and, particularly, Eliot Spitzer, the New York State attorney general, nabbed them.

Through it all, regulators have relied mainly, though not exclusively, on monetary sanctions. Bear Stearns's wasn't even the largest — Bank of America holds the record at $675 million.

But while these large "fines," as they are usually called in the news media, are reassuring, it's arguable at best whether they mean very much to the companies being penalized. Just as the hedge fund giant Long-Term Capital Management was too big to fail in 1998, when it was bailed out to keep from torpedoing the entire financial system, the biggest Wall Street firms are simply too large to be effectively punished. At least, not by the kind of sanctions meted out to Bear Stearns.

To begin with, Bear Stearns did not pay a "fine." The company will pay $250 million in "disgorgements and penalties." The penalty part was just $90 million. The other $160 million consisted of restitution, with interest, of profits gained by abetting the illicit trading from 1999 to 2003. As is typical in S.E.C. settlements, Bear Stearns agreed to pay all this money without admitting or denying the allegations.

Whatever you call it, the simple fact is that a firm the size of Bear Stearns can easily afford to pay that kind of money.

Sure, the $250 million comprises nearly half of the company's net income for the first quarter. But keep in mind that this is not "income" in the sense of the word used by most people. The corporate term of art describes (broadly speaking) revenue in excess of expenses — what most people would call "money tucked away for a rainy day." If you had committed a crime and as punishment you had to give up half of what you would normally put in a savings or retirement account over a three-month period — well, would you complain? I certainly wouldn't. I'd sign a settlement like that, particularly if I didn't have to say I did anything wrong.

When compared to what most people would define as "income," the penalty shrinks to a hair under one-fifteenth (one-14.6th, to be exact) of Bear Stearns's gross revenue of $3.6 billion during the first quarter. For most households struggling to make ends meet on $100,000 a year, a fine of one-14.6th of three months' pay would come to about $1,712. That's about, oh, maybe 15 unpaid New York City parking tickets?

The penalty has the same unimpressive quality when compared to Bear Stearns's total wealth. The company's shareholders' equity is just shy of $11.2 billion. Divided into that sum, the $250 million shrinks way down to one-44.7th of the total. Now really, if you were caught doing something allegedly illegal, and had a net worth of, say, $200,000, would you object to a fine of about $4,500?

To be fair, I should point out that Bear Stearns did more than just agree to pay some money that it didn't admit owing from all the things it didn't admit doing. The firm also agreed, among other things, to hire a consultant to ensure that all the stuff it didn't admit doing never happens again.

A real shellacking — in the form of, say, a meaningful fine — was never in the cards, and for good reason. While it's easy to scoff at the size of the penalties, it cannot be disputed that Bear Stearns, as a premier bond trader, stock titan and derivatives powerhouse, is far too large to risk driving out of business. The only other alternative would be jail terms. But they carry their own disadvantages, not the least of which is that mutual fund trading transgressions are not on the same level of perfidy as, say, boiler-room thievery.

So we are left with an essentially meaningless penalty, no admission of guilt — and, in all likelihood, a Wall Street that is no less likely to push against the envelope of propriety.

What's needed is some pain. The S.E.C. needs to make Wall Street firms wince when they do something wrong. The same kind of hurt you or I feel when we have to trudge down to the impound lot to get our cars out of hock for those 15 unpaid parking tickets.

An admission of guilt would be a good start. Then private litigants stand a far better chance of collecting. Call it the regulatory equivalent of a tow truck. Congress could help by passing a provision of tax-relief legislation, now before a House-Senate conference, that would make it harder for firms to take write-offs from settlements with government agencies.

Market observers speak of a "cycle of scandal" on Wall Street — a pattern of transgressions recurring periodically, often as a coda to bull markets, undeterred by an inadequate regulatory response. Until regulators start making errant firms feel some real pain, the next Wall Street scandal is not a question of if, but when.

The Wall Street Journal, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The federal agency that insures private pensions is seeking outside legal counsel to help represent its interests in financial transactions at General Motors Corp.

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. filed a solicitation for help in negotiations with GM over its plans to spin off a portion of its valuable financing unit, General Motors Acceptance Corp. The PBGC wants to make sure that it has access to all GM assets if it were required to take on GM employee pension obligations.

The agency, which hired counsel in the bankruptcy of UAL Corp.'s United Airlines, has a responsibility to protect its financial interests in the event that GM decided to file for bankruptcy protection down the road.

The PBGC, which insures defined-benefit plans, has reported a deficit of $22.8 billion. Bankrupt steel and airline companies that have transferred pension responsibilities to the PBGC have been a major factor in the agency's swollen debt.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Clearing DeLay (TH)

By Robert Novak

Towhall, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff has advised friends that he has no derogatory information about former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay and is not implicating him as part of his plea bargain with federal prosecutors.

Abramoff's guilty plea on fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy charges requires him to provide evidence about members of Congress. That led to speculation that this would mean trouble for DeLay, who faces money laundering and conspiracy charges in Texas.

However, Abramoff has not given a clean bill of health to any other congressman -- including Rep. Robert Ney, who has stepped down as chairman of the House Administration Committee. Ney was the only member of Congress named in court papers connected with Abramoff's guilty plea Jan. 4.

BUSH'S SPRING OFFENSIVE

While President Bush hits the road to build support, his spring offensive is bringing conservative activists and businessmen into the White House for briefings in small groups.

"I've been in the White House more in the last two weeks than I was in the last two years," Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform told this column. Norquist and conservative theoretician Jeffrey Bell were called into a meeting on the administration's embattled immigration bill. Also attending were representatives of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business.

Bush has been criticized for being reclusive as he and the Republican Party tumble in the polls.

KERRY IN '08

Even before Gore's surprising decision, Kerry political operatives were telling Democrats that the senator was a likely candidate. Kerry's 2004 running mate, John Edwards, is also inclined to run. But his campaign is menaced by a possible candidacy by Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who would block Edwards in the Iowa caucuses.

A footnote: Democratic politicians were surprised by the message from Sen. Clinton's camp that she henceforth would censor Bill Clinton's comments to prevent recurrence of their heavily publicized disagreements over Dubai Ports. While such restraint on the former president was considered desirable, it was viewed as something that should not be talked about publicly.

DEMOCRATIC TARGET

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), has taken the unusual step of targeting his Republican counterpart, Rep. Tom Reynolds, for defeat in his upstate New York district this year. There is no record of a House campaign committee chairman ever being defeated for re-election by the opposition party.

The DCCC claims secret polls showed the supposedly safe Republican district represented by Reynolds is competitive this year. Reynolds, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, in 2004 won re-election to a fourth term with a surprisingly low 56 percent. His Democratic opponent was retired industrialist Jack Davis, who spent $1,250,000 of his own money in 2004 and is trying again.

In its campaign to seize control of the House, the DCCC is aiming at three other upstate New York districts to take advantage of the region's low popularity ratings for President Bush and the Republican Party. The Democrats have targeted ninth-term Rep. James Walsh and fourth-term Rep. John Sweeney, plus the seat left vacant by 12-term Rep. Sherwood Boehlert's retirement.

STUMBLING IN JERSEY

Republican State Sen. Tom Kean Jr., who has lost an early lead in his New Jersey campaign for the U.S. Senate, is engaged in a backstage power struggle with the influential, relatively conservative Republican organizations in Bergen and Passaic counties.

Kean, whose father was a two-term governor, has identified himself with the pro-choice social liberals in the state party. A key role in his campaign is being played by former Rep. Bob Franks, considered a moderate during four terms in Congress.

After starting the campaign ahead of appointed Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez, Kean has fallen behind by four percentage points according to surveys last week by the Quinnipiac University poll. Democrats chided Kean for coming so late to his own Newark fund-raiser Monday that he missed the principal speech by Vice President Dick Cheney.

Abramoff, Ex-Partner May Give Statements (WP)

By Curt Anderson

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. -- A judge has approved subpoenas for former lobbyist Jack Abramoff and an ex-business partner to answer questions about the mob-style slaying of the owner of a gambling fleet they bought.

Abramoff and Adam Kidan have insisted, through their attorneys, that they know nothing about the slaying of Konstantinos "Gus" Boulis, who was ambushed in his car by a gunman in Fort Lauderdale a few months after the pair bought SunCruz Casinos from him.

DOJ_NMG_0022190

A lawyer for Anthony "Big Tony" Moscatiello, one of three men charged in the 2001 slaying, wants to question Abramoff and Kidan, according to court documents. Circuit Judge Michael Kaplan approved the request Thursday, but the subpoenas had not been issued as of Friday.

The SunCruz purchase is "at the heart" of the murder case, Moscatiello attorney Dave Bogenschutz said in court papers.

Abramoff and Kidan are not charged in the slaying but are scheduled to be sentenced Wednesday in federal court after pleading guilty earlier this year to fraud charges stemming from the purchase. Their lawyers did not return telephone calls or e-mails seeking comment Friday.

Abramoff, once a prominent Republican lobbyist and political fundraiser, has also pleaded guilty to federal charges in a Washington corruption investigation that threatens several powerful members of Congress and their staff members.

As part of their federal plea deals, Abramoff and Kidan are required to cooperate with prosecutors in any state or federal investigation.

Moscatiello, 67, allegedly has ties to New York's Gambino crime family and worked as a consultant for Kidan at SunCruz.

Kidan paid companies linked to Moscatiello about $145,000 while he ran SunCruz. Prosecutors have said they believe Boulis was slain in a battle for control of the gambling fleet out of concern that those payments might dry up.

Bogenschutz said in an interview Friday that Abramoff and Kidan's testimony is critical in showing the bitter feelings and power struggle that followed their purchase of SunCruz. He said Abramoff has never been implicated in the Boulis slaying.

"He knows the inside workings of SunCruz Casinos. It's clearly of interest to us," Bogenschutz said, adding that it was not certain that Abramoff would actually testify in a trial. "It depends on what he says."

Prosecutor Brian Cavanagh said his office had not intended on calling Abramoff as a witness in part because he would be given immunity from prosecution for anything he says under those conditions. Cavanagh also said that Kidan has not been cleared as a suspect in the Boulis slaying.

Moscatiello is charged along with Anthony "Little Tony" Ferrari, 49, and 28-year-old James "Pudgy" Fiorillo in the Boulis killing. All three have pleaded not guilty and could face the death penalty if convicted.

Investigators have testified that records show that cell phones belonging to Ferrari and Fiorillo were within 500 feet of the Boulis murder scene moments after the killing and that one was used to call Moscatiello.

Kaplan heard testimony Friday on a motion by Moscatiello and Fiorillo claiming that the prosecution's case isn't strong enough to warrant keeping them in custody without bail, but no decision was made. Ferrari has not joined in that motion.

Abramoff and Kidan face prison sentences of just more than seven years in the Florida fraud case. They admitted fabricating a fake wire transfer to make it appear they were putting a sizable chunk of their own money into the $147.5 million purchase of the gambling fleet.

Translator Accused Of Offering A Bribe (AP)

By Mark Sherman

AP, March 25, 2006

WASHINGTON - U.S. authorities have arrested a translator working in Iraq, charging him with offering a bribe to entice a police official to buy armored vests and other equipment for $1 million.

Faheem Mousa Salam, 27, of Livonia, Mich., was arrested Thursday at Dulles International Airport in Virginia, the Justice Department said. Salam is an employee of the Titan Corp., a government contractor working in Iraq.

He was released from custody after a hearing Friday in U.S. District Court in Washington. He is due back in court April 5.

Salam was charged under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. He is accused of offering $60,000 to an Iraqi police official who Salam believed could help arrange the purchase of the goods by a police training organization, according to a criminal complaint.

Salam said he wanted to sell the group 1,000 vests and a sophisticated map printer, the court papers said.

Salam, described in court papers as a naturalized U.S. citizen, later made similar offers to an undercover investigator posing as a purchasing officer for the police group, the Civilian Police Assistance Training Team, the complaint said.

The Titan Corp. did not immediately comment Friday.

If convicted, Salam faces up to five years in prison and a fine of at least $100,000.

The bribery charge is the latest case to emerge from investigations begun by Inspector General Stuart Bowen Jr., who was appointed to look into Iraqi reconstruction contracts.

At least seven Americans have been implicated in a separate bribery and kickback scheme involving the award of millions of dollars in reconstruction contracts.

Robert Stein, a former contracting official in Iraq, pleaded guilty last month to conspiring to steal more than $2 million in reconstruction money and steer contracts to a businessman in exchange for more than $1 million in cash, cars and jewelry.

2nd Ryan Juror In Question (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, March 25, 2006

Tribune record search finds apparent history of arrests

Public records reviewed by the Tribune suggest that a second juror deciding the fate of former Gov. George Ryan has a history of arrests that was not disclosed during the jury-selection process.

The revelation comes one day after the Tribune reported that a male juror has the same name and other identifying characteristics as a man with a felony drunken driving conviction.

Hours after learning of the Tribune's information on Thursday, U.S. District Judge Rebecca Pallmeyer halted deliberations and said she had launched an investigation into a juror.

Further record searches Friday linked the name of a female juror to an alias. The woman with that alias faced felony drug charges, as well as misdemeanor child-neglect and assault charges, records show. She was not convicted of these charges, the records show.

The female juror linked to that alias stated on a jury questionnaire before the trial that she had never been charged or accused of a crime.

A number of public records--from bankruptcy filings to land transactions--appear to show that the juror and the woman with several arrests are the same person.

It is unclear what impact the revelation regarding the second juror will have on the deliberations in the 5-month-old public corruption trial.

Prosecutors could argue someone with that background might be biased against law enforcement.

After sending the jury home early Thursday, Pallmeyer said she would not reveal the outcome of her investigation before Monday.

The judge met with prosecutors and defense attorneys in the case on Friday, then returned to the bench and said the investigation was continuing.

She also said she expected the jury to resume deliberations on Monday.

Earlier Friday, the Tribune contacted federal court officials to ask about the second juror, and Chief Judge Charles Kocoras indicated he intended to speak to Pallmeyer about the matter.

The Tribune is not identifying either juror it has raised questions about because it is the newspaper's standard practice not to name a member of a jury during a trial. The newspaper also cannot approach jurors to confirm the information because a court order bars contact with the jury.

Defense lawyers and prosecutors involved in the case are prohibited from discussing the developments because of a gag order issued by Pallmeyer.

The questionnaires filled out by jurors are used to screen for possible bias, and lying on them can disrupt a trial for several reasons. In other criminal cases, such false statements have led judges to dismiss jurors and have formed the basis for appeals.

Potential jurors in the Ryan case had to sign the questionnaires under penalty of perjury, and they swore that their answers were "true and correct to the best of my knowledge and belief."

In answer to a question asking whether the potential juror had "ever been charged with or accused of a crime," the female juror checked "No."

The paper trail from the juror to the woman charged with crimes is a complicated one.

The juror has the same name as a woman who filed for bankruptcy. Land records also link the two.

Further, the juror and the woman who filed for bankruptcy list the same obscure profession for their husband.

The bankruptcy records list an alias for the woman. Both names have the same Social Security number.

Records under that alias, with the same Social Security number as the woman in the bankruptcy, show a criminal history of six charges dating to 1984.

That woman and four other people were arrested on felony drug charges in the 1200 block of West 13th Street on Jan. 4, 1994. One of the men was convicted of unlawful possession of a weapon by a felon and armed violence in the case, but all five defendants were acquitted of the drug charges in a trial on April 28, 1994, according to court records.

Records show all the other charges against the woman were dropped.

The revelations of the links between two jurors and criminal records have cast a shadow over the trial and raised questions about the course of jury deliberations, which were already troubled. Earlier on Thursday Pallmeyer responded to indications of dissension on the jury by warning jurors to treat each other "with dignity and respect."

Jurors had deliberated for eight days before Pallmeyer interrupted their work to deal with the emerging problems.

"Right now I am expecting that they will resume their deliberation, I hope, by around 11 o'clock on Monday morning. I think that should give us the time that we need to complete whatever additional investigation there may be in the case," Pallmeyer said in court Friday afternoon.

The judge has the sole discretion to decide jurors' fates. If she dismisses one or two jurors, she may replace them with alternates. She also may decide to reduce the size of the jury to 11 people instead of 12. But she may not reduce the jury to 10 people.

Typically, federal prosecutors have not conducted background checks of potential or impaneled jurors.

While the revelations about the jurors may provide fodder for eventual appeals of the case, it is unclear what effect removing one or two jurors might have on the deliberations.

During the jury-selection process, when the female juror was questioned about her impressions of the allegations against Ryan, she said, "I wouldn't want to be in his shoes--the decisions he had to make."

Ryan, 72, and co-defendant Lawrence Warner, 67, are charged with using Ryan's offices as secretary of state and governor to enrich themselves.

Supreme Court To Rehear Death Penalty Case (AP)

AP, March 25, 2006

The Supreme Court said Friday that it would hear arguments a second time before ruling on the constitutionality of a Kansas death penalty law, apparently so new Justice Samuel Alito can break a tie.

The case is the second one that deadlocked the court following Justice Sandra Day O'Connor's retirement in late January. The other one involves government whistleblowers.

Justices heard arguments on Dec. 7 in the Kansas case, which involves rules for how juries weigh evidence for and against the death penalty.

The 1994 law says if the evidence for and against imposing a death sentence is equal, Kansas juries must impose death instead of life in prison. The state Supreme Court struck it down, invalidating the death sentences of six convicted killers.

The Supreme Court did not say when a new argument would be scheduled.

Alito could vote differently than O'Connor would have in the case.

O'Connor was a swing vote in death penalty cases, sometimes joining the four more liberal members in throwing out death sentences.

Fifteen states had filed friend-of-the-court briefs, predicting that a ruling against Kansas would require states with capital punishment to set up special systems for juries to weigh evidence at sentencing.

The case is Kansas v. Marsh, 04-1170.

Kansas Death Penalty Statute Heads Back To U.S. High Court (KCS)

By Laura Bauer And David Klepper

The Kansas City Star, March 25, 2006

Three months after the U.S. Supreme Court heard arguments over the constitutionality of Kansas' death penalty, justices want to hear them again.

But this time, a new justice — Samuel Alito — will hear those arguments. Those who want to see Kansas' law kept in place think this could work in their favor.

In an order released Friday, the court said the case would be put back on its calendar. According to attorneys on both sides of the issue, it could be reheard in as little as a month's time.

The court announced the rehearing in a one-sentence order that did not explain why. This left the significance of the move open to interpretation.

Some said it was not unprecedented for the court to ask to rehear arguments when there is a new justice. Others believe the court is split and Alito would break the tie. One reason: It ordered the same arguments presented and did not request additional briefs.

House Speaker Doug Mays, a Topeka Republican, said: "It increases the likelihood they will reinstate the death penalty."

In 2004 the state Supreme Court struck down the capital punishment law, ruling 4-3 that language concerning jury instructions was unfair to defendants. This left the fate of seven inmates sentenced to death uncertain.

DOJ_NMG_0022193

The instructions had to do with how juries weigh evidence. The law indicated that jurors should vote for capital punishment — rather than life imprisonment — in instances where the evidence for and against execution was equal. Juries have not received those instructions in years, but the requirements were never deleted from the death penalty statute.

The only way to reinstate the death sentences of serial killer John E. Robinson Sr. and the rest of the state's death row is if the high court overturns the ruling. The Kansas Supreme Court had commuted their sentences to prison terms.

Rebecca Woodman of the Kansas capital appellate defender's office, who argued the case the first time opposite Attorney General Phill Kline, does not agree with legislators who see Friday's order as a positive sign.

"I think all of that is speculation, and I don't want to speculate what's in the court's mind," she said. "I read it as the court is hung up on something and wants to hear it again."

Woodman represents Michael Marsh II of Wichita, who was sentenced to die for the 1996 murders of Marry Ane Pusch and her 19-month-old daughter. The mother was shot and stabbed, her throat was slit, and she was doused with lighter fluid and set on fire. Her daughter died of burns.

In its ruling, the Kansas Supreme Court struck down the death penalty law and ordered a new trial for Marsh.

Woodman argued in December that the state court's decision should stand. Kline disagreed.

In a statement his office issued Friday and through comments by his spokesman Whitney Watson, the attorney general said he welcomed the chance to speak before the justices again.

"This is an important issue to Kansans," his statement read, "and I am committed to make sure that this tool for justice remains available to prosecutors and that the voice of the people will be heard."

Alito replaced Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who was a swing vote in death penalty cases, sometimes joining the four more liberal members in throwing out death sentences.

If the U.S. Supreme Court agrees with the state court, the men originally sentenced to death will serve life sentences and the Legislature would need to craft a new death penalty law. The court could determine it does not have jurisdiction to hear a case relating to the Kansas Constitution.

If the court overturns the Kansas ruling, the death penalty would stand and the convicted killers could ultimately be put to death.

So everyone from legislators and attorneys to prosecutors wait to see what the federal court does. If there is indeed a tie and Alito breaks it, many proponents think it will bode well for Kline and his push to have the state ruling overturned.

State Sen. John Vratil, a Leawood Republican who leads the Senate Judiciary Committee, cautioned against the assumption that that the court is deadlocked 4-4.

Vratil said the court could be split 3-3, with two justices undecided, or other similar permutations. Some justices may want to overturn the ruling while others want to remand it to Kansas court.

"You can't absolutely conclude that there's a 4-4 split," he said. "It's not just an up or down situation."

Fifteen states had filed friend-of-the-court briefs, predicting that a ruling against Kansas would require states with capital punishment to set up special systems for juries to weigh evidence at sentencing.

The case is Kansas v. Marsh, 04-1170.

About the case

¦ On an appeal by convicted killer Michael Marsh II, the Kansas Supreme Court in 2004 overturned the state's death penalty statute. The court rejected a section of the law that said when evidence for and against execution balances out, a jury must decide in favor of execution over life in prison. The state appealed that ruling to the U.S. Supreme Court, which heard arguments in December 2005.

Woman Pleads Guilty In Steele Credit Report Case (BSUN/AP)

By Associated press

The Baltimore Sun, March 25, 2006

Former Democratic staffer avoids jail time for computer fraud

WASHINGTON -- A former Democratic staffer pleaded guilty today to computer fraud for snooping on Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele.

Under the plea agreement in U.S. District Court, Lauren B. Weiner, 25, avoids jail time, but she has a year to do 150 hours of community service.

Steele -- a Republican running for U.S. Senate -- was notified by Democrats in Washington that a staffer used Steele's Social Security number to obtain his credit report last year. Weiner was fired from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee after the breach was discovered.

Democrats say Steele's credit information was promptly destroyed, but Steele's lawyer, E. Mark Braden, says he wants to know more about why Democrats tapped into Steele's personal financial records.

Democrat Pleads Guilty In Steele Case (WP)

By John Wagner

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

Researcher Falsely Got Credit Report; Charge Could Be Dropped in Year

A Democratic researcher pleaded guilty yesterday to misrepresenting herself on a Web site as Michael S. Steele, Maryland's lieutenant governor and a Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, and fraudulently obtaining his credit report last summer.

Under a plea agreement reached with prosecutors, the misdemeanor charge against Lauren B. Weiner, a former staff member of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, could be dropped in a year if she completes 150 hours of community service and commits no other offenses.

"I believe this is the end of the episode, and she can now get on with her life," said Whitney C. Ellerman, an attorney for Weiner.

An attorney for Steele said the lieutenant governor is considering a civil suit against Weiner, 25, and the Democratic committee to learn more about what he called "a dirty trick."

E. Mark Braden, who attended the hearing in U.S. District Court in Washington, said a "statement of the offense" released yesterday contains several troubling details about the episode, including Weiner's use of a committee credit card to access Steele's report over the Internet.

The discovery process of a civil suit would allow Steele to learn more about what happened, Braden said. "I don't think the story is necessarily over," he said. "This answers some questions but not all questions. We'll have to see where we go from here. . . . This was a carefully calculated plan to steal private information."

The episode took place in July as both parties started investigating the backgrounds of candidates in Maryland's marquee races this year.

According to the prosecutor's statement, which Weiner said was accurate, she used Steele's Social Security number to access his credit report on a Web site designed to let people view their reports.

Weiner pretended that she was Steele, even creating an e-mail address -- gopsteele@yahoo.com -- needed to obtain the report, the statement said. She also agreed to the "terms of service" on the site, which included a warning "not to impersonate another person."

According to the statement, Weiner's superiors were notified within hours of the episode, and the report was destroyed the next morning before it could be disseminated. Weiner and her boss, the committee's director of research, later resigned.

Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said it does not appear as though Weiner acted alone. "It looks like the DSCC is trying to make a scapegoat of a younger staffer," he said.

Phil Singer, a spokesman for the committee, said yesterday that the prosecutor's statement showed that "the DSCC responded to this incident in an exemplary way."

"The U.S. attorney's office also confirmed that the DSCC, as it has repeatedly said, did not use the credit report for any financial or political purpose and that Mr. Steele suffered no economic harm," Singer said. He said he believes "this matter is now closed."

Yesterday's hearing was delayed briefly after Magistrate Judge John M. Facciola disclosed from the bench that "Michael Steele is a friend of mine." Facciola said he and Steele are members of the John Carroll Society, an association of Catholic laypeople, and he offered to recuse himself.

Neither Weiner nor the U.S. attorney's office objected to Facciola continuing to handle the case.

Weiner was instructed to return to Facciola's courtroom for sentencing a year from now. Ellerman, her attorney, said he expects the charge to be dropped then.

In the meantime, Facciola told Weiner that she will need the court's permission before leaving the Washington area for more than 48 hours and is expected to remain a District resident.

Small Maker Of Heart Devices Is Said To Be Focus Of Inquiry (NYT)

By Barry Meier

DOJ_NMG_0022195

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

Federal authorities are conducting an inquiry into Ela Medical, a small maker of defibrillators and other heart devices, according to a government official and an industry official.

The precise nature of the government's interest in Ela Medical, which is a division of the Sorin Group, is unclear and any inquiry appears to be at an early stage. But the inquiry comes amid a broader, continuing government investigation into relationships between larger makers of heart devices and doctors. That investigation is looking into whether the companies provided incentives to physicians to use their products.

One government official said authorities were looking into Ela Medical's activities in the Miami area. Separately, a device industry official said that federal authorities had made inquiries about Ela Medical. Both people spoke on the condition of anonymity because the inquiry is in progress and not yet a public matter.

The general counsel for the Sorin Group, an Italian company based in Milan, said in a statement that the device maker was unaware of any investigations. The company has said it complies with all applicable regulations and industry practices.

"To the best of our knowledge, neither Ela Medical nor any other Sorin Group company is a target of any inquiry or investigation by any law enforcement agency," that executive, Brian Sheridan, wrote this month in an e-mail message.

The inquiry into Ela Medical is apparently being conducted by investigators with the Food and Drug Administration and the Office of the Inspector General of the Department of Health and Human Services.

A spokesman for the F.D.A., Jason Brodsky, and a spokeswoman for the inspector general's office, Laura Bradbard, said that as a matter of policy the agencies do not confirm or deny the existence of any investigation.

Ela Medical is a very small player in the United States market for heart devices like defibrillators, according to analysts' estimates. Together, it and Biotronik, a German company based in Berlin, have about a 5 percent market share.

A defibrillator is a device that uses electricity to interrupt a type of irregular heart rhythm that is potentially fatal. A pacemaker stimulates a heart that is beating too slowly.

With the aging of the population, defibrillators are among the fastest growing categories of medical devices and can cost from $20,000 to $35,000 a unit. They also have profit margins of about 75 percent.

Not surprisingly, there is intense competition by producers for the loyalties of heart specialists who either prescribe or implant such devices.

The Justice Department is investigating whether the country's three big makers of implanted heart devices — Medtronic, Guidant and St. Jude Medical — used illegal inducements to get doctors to use their products. They have all denied wrongdoing.

Federal law prohibits certain types of payments to doctors that are meant to influence their choice of a particular product.

The Justice Department investigation is said to be looking at whether the big companies, among other things, provided doctors with excessive payments to enroll patients in post-marketing studies of their devices as a way of increasing sales. Such studies can have questionable scientific value, experts said.

That investigation began in October, soon after an article in The New York Times reported that internal Guidant e-mail messages suggested that a product evaluation survey run by that company, in which doctors were paid $1,000 each to participate, was actually an effort to improve device sales.

In October, when the Justice Department issued its subpoenas, it did not send one to Ela Medical. The company said recently that it had not received any demands for information.

Late last year, the Sorin Group, in response to an inquiry from a reporter, declined to release a list of the postmarketing trials that Ela Medical was sponsoring in this country. The company said it believed that its payments to doctors were modest and in line with payments made by other producers.

Several hospitals in the Miami area said this month that they had not been contacted by government officials about Ela Medical. Company sales representatives in Florida did not return telephone calls seeking comment.

Euclid Accused Of Bias In Voting (CLPD)

By Thomas Ott And Leila Atassi, Plain Dealer Reporters

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, March 25, 2006

Blacks can't win office, U.S. probe concludes

Euclid -- The Justice Department has threatened to sue Euclid and force changes in an election system that the federal government says prevents black candidates from winning seats on its City Council.

DOJ_NMG_0022196

A former Justice Department lawyer found the timing suspicious. He suggested that the Bush administration, which has not vigorously pressed voting-rights suits, may be trying to polish its image quickly. The Senate Judiciary Committee plans to question Justice Department officials in May about whether they have adequately protected the rights of minority voters.

"It's an outright embarrassment that this appears to be the first case on behalf of black voters brought forth during the Bush administration," said David Becker, who worked for the Department of Justice from 1998 to 2005. The department "had to file a case on behalf of black voters before the oversight hearing took place. Otherwise they would have had a lot of explaining to do about why it hasn't happened in almost six years."

Though Euclid's black population reached 30 percent in the last census, voters have never elected a black candidate to any city or school office. The school board appointed Howard Drake to a vacant seat in 1998, but he lost in an election the next year.

The investigation, which began three years ago, targeted elections for City Council. The city is broken into four wards, which each elect one council member. Four other council members and the council president are elected citywide.

All five of those elected citywide in 2005 live in the same ward, in Euclid's northeast corner.

In a letter dated Monday, the head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division told Euclid Law Director Chris Frey that the structure dilutes minority voting power in a city that is racially divided and votes along racial lines. Black candidates would have a better chance of winning if the city were broken into eight wards, with one council member elected in each, Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim said in the letter.

Kim has approved filing a lawsuit but will wait to see if the Justice Department and the city can work out a settlement. Frey said the system could be changed by voter approval or court order.

The Justice Department would not discuss the matter. Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, who represents Euclid in Congress, said that the legal issue here isn't whether Euclid purposely tried to exclude black people from public office.

"In discrimination lawsuits, often we look at policies, practices or laws that appear to be neutral on their face but the outcome is discriminatory," she said.

Mayor Bill Cervenik and Council President Ed Gudenas said they want to hear details of the investigation before deciding how to respond.

Cervenik said the federal government should consider factors such as black voter turnout and the lack of black candidates.

Though three black candidates ran for council in 2003, last year's ballot had none. Cervenik said that he welcomes ways to involve black residents in Euclid's government but that the city should not be targeted to appease President Bush's critics.

"I'm very convinced that the city of Euclid has done nothing wrong - at least not intentionally," he said.

The Rev. Gary Henderson, the black pastor at Euclid's East Shore United Methodist Church, said the city must take aggressive steps to elect black leaders.

"Our officials, in ethnic identity, don't reflect the racial makeup of the community," he said. "If all our players are not sitting at the table, it's difficult to make decisions the whole community can embrace."

Cervenik and his predecessor, Paul Oyaski, appointed several black residents to boards and commissions.

Cervenik and Frey said they aggressively lobbied a black resident to run in the last election, but she declined.

Euclid has a long way to go before it erases a reputation for racial bias.

In 1975, the school board avoided more-serious Justice Department action by agreeing to hire more black teachers. The federal government froze hundreds of thousands of dollars in grants in the late 1970s until the city agreed to promote fair housing.

Two years ago, voters rejected rezoning for a new church and houses proposed by a black congregation from Cleveland. Cervenik overturned the vote to settle a lawsuit that the church filed in federal court, then successfully survived a recall prompted in part by his action.

Washington bureau chief Stephen Koff contributed to this story.

Protesters Claim Police Brutality (JACKSUN)

By TYRONE TONY REED JR.

Jackson (TN) Sun, March 25, 2006

Brownsville police conducting internal probe, Mayor Banks says

DOJ_NMG_0022197

BROWNSVILLE - Dr. Isaac Richmond, national director for the Commission on Religion and Racism summed up in one thought why he was protesting what he called the "vicious beating" and "unlawful detainment" of a black man in Brownsville on March 17:

"If we don't stand together, we'll be beaten separately."

Richmond, members of Memphis-based CORR and more than 30 concerned citizens from the Brownsville community stood together in front of City Hall on a chilly Friday afternoon. They sang freedom hymns and chanted for two white Brownsville Police investigators to be charged, put on trial and dismissed from the police force. "Let's put an end to police brutality in Brownsville, Tennessee," Richmond said through a megaphone. "Chad Jackson and Brian Nichols must be brought to justice."

Richmond accuses Jackson and Nichols of brutally beating Robert Lee Jones, 42, of Brownsville, on March 17. Richmond said that Jones had not violated any laws and that the charges Jones now faces were false.

However, Mayor Webb Banks said Thursday night that Jones did break the law by attempting to evade arrest about 6:09 p.m. on March 17 on Margin Street. Banks said Jackson and Nichols chased after Jones, and that Jones swallowed what appeared to be crack cocaine during the chase.

After the officers caught Jones, the three of them scuffled and Jones attempted to grab Jackson's gun to shoot the officers, Banks said.

While all three suffered minor injuries, CORR had accused the officers of denying Jones medical attention. Banks denied that claim.

"When the report was first given to me, it said that he did not receive medical treatment," Richmond said during the protest. "So, let me clear it up now. Mr. Jones did in fact receive medical treatment, which is clear evidence that he was beaten."

Robert Lee Jones' brother, David Jones, 35, of Stanton, said that he notified CORR of his brother's situation and that he knows that his brother was beaten by the officers because he has heard it from too many witnesses.

"I want justice to be served," David Jones said during the protest. "I want those officers removed from the force. My brother is on crutches, his face is swollen and he's been complaining about his ribs."

David Jones said that his brother told him that Jackson and Nichols didn't identify themselves as officers.

Robert Lee Jones was arraigned Monday and charged with aggravated assault, evading arrest, resisting arrest and tampering with evidence. He is being held without bond in Haywood County Jail.

A news release from CORR on Friday said that the group "has filed charges with the U.S. Department of Justice, seeking an investigation of the Brownsville law enforcement for the human rights violations of African-American males in general, and Mr. Jones' case in particular." The release also said that the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department has been requested to bring charges against the officers.

Banks said Thursday that an internal investigation is being conducted by the Brownsville police, but the officers are still on active duty.

Judge To Rehear Poll Complaints (NOTP)

By Bruce Eggler, Staff Writer

New Orleans Times-Picayune, March 25, 2006

N.O. plan is called unfair to black voters

A New Orleans federal judge who refused last month to order Louisiana officials to provide out-of-state satellite polling places or take other steps to help displaced residents vote in the upcoming municipal elections has agreed to rehear some of the claims of those who say African-American voters will not have a fair chance to participate in the balloting.

Judge Ivan Lemelle will hold a hearing Monday on a request by the NAACP Legal Defense Fund that he reconsider his decision not to order the state to take further steps to assist displaced voters beyond those already taken by Secretary of State Al Ater and approved by a recent special session of the Legislature.

Ater has said that thanks to those actions and an aggressive campaign to notify displaced voters how they can participate in the election, this will be "the most accessible election" in U.S. history.

The U.S. Justice Department last week approved the plans for the elections, saying the actions taken by the state meet the federal Voting Rights Act's requirements for protecting black voters' rights.

But the NAACP lawyers and local lawyers Roy Rodney and John Etter, working with them, submitted a 21-page motion citing a list of reasons why Lemelle should order further action "to prevent manifest injustice," including:

-- A law passed at the special session to allow absentee voting by mail by first-time voters who registered by mail and have never voted in person applies only to those who registered between Oct. 5, 2004, and Sept. 24, 2005. The motion says this would help only 1,800 of 15,000 potential first-time voters, 72 percent of whom are black.

DOJ_NMG_0022198

-- The law setting up satellite polling places in 10 other Louisiana parishes, where displaced New Orleans voters can cast early ballots April 10-13 and April 15 for the April 22 primary, restricted their use to voters who registered before Sept. 24, although registration for the primary did not close until this week.

-- State officials never seriously considered the idea of establishing out-of-state satellite polling places, such as figuring out how much they would cost.

-- Lack of money and transportation is likely to keep tens of thousands of displaced voters, now living both in and outside Louisiana, from traveling to New Orleans or one of the 10 in-state satellite polls. Most of these voters are African-American, the motion says.

-- On March 16, the City Council, at the behest of Ater's office, changed the polling places for 93 precincts, most of them in majority-black wards, making it likely that many potential voters are likely to be confused about where to go and end up not voting, especially because many of the new sites "are not currently accessible by public transportation."

During a February hearing, the NAACP's motion says, Lemelle said the issue before him was whether the changes approved by the Legislature were "sufficient now to take care of any adverse impact on black voters."

"The answer to this question is a resounding 'No!' " the motion says.

The NAACP request is opposed by a group of voters, later joined by the ACLU, who filed suit in December seeking to have the New Orleans elections, which Gov. Kathleen Blanco had postponed indefinitely after Hurricane Katrina, held as soon as possible.

With Lemelle pressing for the same goal, the primary and runoff elections, originally set for Feb. 4 and March 4, eventually were rescheduled for April 22 and May 20.

In a related development, a group of civil rights leaders gathered in Washington, D.C., Friday to condemn the scheduled election as unfair to displaced African-American voters now living in 44 states.

"We are about to witness the most blatant and dramatic violation of the Voting Rights Act since it was passed in 1965," the Rev. Al Sharpton said. "This is beyond the poll tax. This is the high-tech disenfranchisement of voters."

Sharpton, Jesse Jackson and Urban League President and former New Orleans Mayor Marc Morial were among those who called on the state to erect satellite voting places in cities such as Houston, Dallas and Atlanta. Morial said that asking evacuees to vote by mail places a "cumbersome, complex and confusing" burden on them and offers no guarantee their votes will be counted.

In a letter to Blanco, Jackson noted that satellite voting places have been set up to make it easier for Iraqis and Mexicans living in the United States to cast ballots in their native countries' elections. "Our New Orleans citizens deserve no less from our democracy," he wrote.

Despite the cordial tone of his March 22 letter, Jackson left little doubt Friday that he sees Blanco as the engineer of a scheme to keep African-American evacuees from the polls. He called her and other Louisiana Democrats who supported the voting procedures approved by the Legislature "Dixiecrats," the name given to the group of Southern politicians who broke with the Democratic Party in 1948 over the party's support for civil rights.

Ventura County Plugs Hole In Voting System With Ink (LAT)

By Gregory W. Griggs

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

To comply with a federal order to end bias against Latinos, it's replacing punch cards with pens.

Ventura County election officials are replacing their decades-old punch-card voting system in time for the June 6 primary election.

After more than 30 years of voting with punch cards, most county voters will now mark their choices with ink. Those who have trouble seeing the ballots or using the pens will be able to vote on computer touch screens.

County officials say their new systems will serve Spanish-speaking voters better and ensure that those who are disabled can cast secret ballots.

The county has used punch-card technology for more than three decades, but officials agreed in 2004 to replace the system under a federal consent decree.

The U.S. Department of Justice had accused the county of discriminating against Latinos, who make up about a third of the population, by failing to employ sufficient numbers of bilingual poll workers or to provide adequate Spanish-language voting materials.

The settlement required the county to print bilingual ballots. But Gene Browning, the county's assistant registrar of voters, said the old punch cards could not be printed easily in two languages.

The new system, which cost $6 million, was paid for using federal and state funds. It was manufactured by Oakland-based Sequoia Voting Systems. And like the punch-card system, it uses paper.

Although other counties have opted to switch entirely to computer touch screens, Browning said county voters made it clear that they still wanted a paper-based system.

"Whenever they would hear about counties going totally electronic, the reaction was: 'We need to have paper,' " he said.

In the new system, voters will feed their completed ballots into optical scanners that will instantly check for errors. The scanners will kick back incomplete ballots or ones filled out incorrectly, with too many candidates selected.

Once approved, results will be recorded on memory cards, which will later be uploaded into a centralized elections computer in Ventura. A percentage of the paper ballots also will be hand-counted to verify results, Browning said.

At each polling place, voters who are visually impaired or have difficulty using a pen will be able to cast secret ballots using computer touch screens. The machines will be equipped with headphones for people to hear the choices on the ballot.

California passed a law in 2004 requiring electronic ballot machines to also use some form of paper verification. Counties have until June 2006 to comply.

To meet the deadline, Riverside County in January agreed to spend $14.2 million to replace its 6-year-old touch-screen voting machines with newer models that provide paper confirmation.

By never abandoning paper-based voting, Ventura County showed its fiscal prudence, said Kim Alexander, president of the California Voter Foundation.

"Counties that go all electronic typically spend three times more to purchase new equipment," Alexander said.

Prominent Blacks Want N.O. Satellite Voting (AP)

By Will Lester

AP, March 25, 2006

Displaced New Orleans residents deserve the same voting privileges as the people of war-torn Iraq, several black leaders argued Friday in pushing for satellite voting from locations outside Louisiana.

"We are seeing people from Iraq being treated better than people from New Orleans," said Al Sharpton, who joined Jesse Jackson, NAACP President Bruce Gordon, Urban League President Marc Morial and several other influential black leaders in calling for steps to improve participation in New Orleans' April 22 elections.

Hurricane Katrina displaced more than 200,000 New Orleans residents of voting age, many of them black voters, and the black leaders contend that city elections could violate the 1965 Voting Rights Act.

"This is a Florida in the making," said Morial, a former New Orleans mayor, referring to Florida's extensive voting problems in the 2000 elections. "If you see an election train wreck coming, why not do something to prevent it before the wreck occurs?"

A spokeswoman for Secretary of State Al Ater, the state's top election official, said out-of-state voting operations are not legal under Louisiana law.

The Justice Department approved the city's election plan last week.

Complaints about the plan included inadequate voting options for thousands of displaced New Orleans residents, cumbersome absentee ballot procedures, frequent movement of precinct locations and a refusal to share information about how candidates can reach displaced voters.

The groups upset about the election are calling for an April 1 march on New Orleans to protest elections they claim could sharply erode one of the most important federal civil rights laws.

The New Orleans' election was postponed from its original Feb. 4 date, when state officials said they could not organize it in time, given the destruction of polling places and dispersal of voters caused by Katrina.

Justice Department spokesman Eric Holland said Louisiana's legislative black caucus has endorsed the plan. However, several members of the caucus voted against it, and state Sen. Cleo Fields, a prominent member of the caucus, is a leader in the effort to delay the election.

The decision not to share the contact information for displaced New Orleans voters was not the choice of the secretary of state, said his spokeswoman, Jennifer Marusak. She said federal officials ordered the state not to share the Federal Emergency Management Agency's list of displaced New Orleans residents to protect their privacy.

Jackson has called for Gov. Kathleen Blanco to postpone the election to allow a fairer election plan.

State officials have worked out a plan for the election and are doing their best to contact displaced voters, said Blanco's spokeswoman Denise Bottcher, adding, "We are going forward."

Republican Sen. Rick Santorum (news, bio, voting record) said Friday that Democrats are out to defeat him to avenge the 2004 defeat of then-Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle by Republican John Thune.

"They see this as sort of payback time for Tom Daschle's loss, and I'm running for the No. 2 spot on the Republican leadership ladder and this would be a plum for them, if they are able to pick me off," the Pennsylvania lawmaker said in an interview broadcast Friday evening on Fox News' Special Report.

The GOP holds a 55-44 majority in the Senate, with one Democratic-leaning independent. Democrats see the Senate race in Pennsylvania, a state that went for John Kerry in 2004, as a prime target.

Santorum, the No. 3 Senate Republican, has trailed his leading Democratic opponent, State Treasurer Bob Casey, in polls. Casey is the son of the late Pennsylvania governor with the same name.

"I think I'm safe to say that if his name wasn't Bob Casey, he wouldn't be running for the U.S. Senate today, and my name's Rick Santorum and I didn't get to be a U.S. senator cause my name's Rick Santorum," Santorum said.

Casey told the news channel that voters want change, and Santorum is too cozy with lobbyists.

"I think when you are the leading recipient of lobbyist money and you are meeting with lobbyists and they've having, I think, a disproportionate and sometimes adverse impact on legislation that affects real people, then I think you've got some explaining to do."

Texas Candidate Sues Over Campaign Laws (AP)

By Kelley Shannon

AP, March 25, 2006

The comptroller of Texas sued the secretary of state Friday, claiming he is hurting her campaign for governor by unfairly enforcing rules for independent political candidates.

Keeton Strayhorn, elected as comptroller in 1998 and running as an independent against Republican Gov. Rick Perry, has complained for weeks about Secretary of State Roger Williams and even urged that he be removed from office because of his close ties with Perry. Williams, a Perry appointee, is the state's chief elections officer.

Strayhorn's campaign sued in federal court in Austin over Williams' plan to have her petition examined manually, signature by signature, instead of using statistical sampling, which examines only a portion of the signatures. The lawsuit says Williams' plan violates her constitutional rights.

Spokesman Scott Haywood said Williams will continue to apply Texas law fairly to all candidates "and will not grant special treatment to any candidate."

Perry's spokesman, Robert Black, called Williams "an outstanding public servant" who won't give preferential treatment to anyone.

Independent candidates for governor must collect 45,540 signatures from registered voters who did not cast ballots in the Republican or Democratic primaries. The petitions are due May 11.

Because multiple candidates are trying to get on the November ballot as independents, the signatures need to be verified individually, Haywood said. Musician and author Kinky Friedman also is running as an independent.

The secretary of state's office has said it will take possibly until July to validate signatures and determine whether the candidates make the November ballot.

The lawsuit — which includes three voters as plaintiffs — seeks to require Williams to review the validity of her petition immediately after he receives it in the quickest manner possible, said her campaign spokesman, Mark Sanders.

Suggesting the agency is trying to prevent Strayhorn from getting on the November ballot, Sanders said, "This whole situation begs the question: What are they afraid of?"

Strayhorn's campaign has complained about other treatment, including that it was not allowed to begin collecting signatures immediately after the primary polls closed. Williams cited state law in rejecting the request.

Texas has some of the nation's toughest laws on independent candidates. No independent has been elected governor there since Sam Houston in 1859.

Former Congressman Chris Bell is the Democratic nominee for governor.

On Campus, A Good Man Is Hard To Find (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0022201

When a boy opens his acceptance letter from college, he now has to wonder what most impressed the admissions officers. Did they want him for his mind, or just his body?

The admissions director at Kenyon College, Jennifer Delahunty Britz, published an Op-Ed article this week revealing an awkward truth about her job: affirmative action for boys. As the share of the boys in the applicant pool keeps shrinking — it will soon be down to 40 percent nationally — colleges are admitting less-qualified boys in order to keep the gender ratio balanced on campus.

This week's revelation did not please Kim Gandy, the president of the National Organization for Women, who told me that she might challenge the legality of affirmative action for male applicants. She and I are not normally ideological soulmates, but I have some sympathy with her on this policy.

It's not fair to the girls who are rejected despite having higher grades and test scores than the boys who get fat envelopes. It's not fair to the boys, either, if they're not ready to keep up with their classmates. Affirmative action just makes them prone to fail, and is probably one of the reasons that men are more likely than women to drop out of college.

After consulting with the federal Education Department, I can confidently report that this discrimination may violate the law — or then again, it may not. Either way, I agree with Gandy that public colleges shouldn't practice it, because the government shouldn't favor one group over another.

Gandy's also wary of allowing private schools like Kenyon to discriminate, and she's skeptical of their justification: that they need a fairly even male-female ratio on campus to attract the best applicants of either sex. I'm not sure if that's true, but I trust the colleges to know better than me or Gandy or federal lawyers. As long as a school is private, let it favor whomever it wants — men, women, alumni children, Latinos, African-Americans — without any interference from the Education Department.

What the department should be doing is figuring out how to help boys reach college. The gender gap has been getting worse for two decades, but the Education Department still isn't focusing on it. Instead, it has an "educational equity" program aimed at helping girls and women.

The department is paying to encourage African and Slavic girls and women in Oregon to pursue careers in science. There's a grant to help women in West Virginia overcome "traditional, outdated 19th-century attitudes" by pursuing jobs in blue-collar trades. Another grant aims to motivate women at the Medgar Evers College in Brooklyn to study math.

Those are all noble goals. I'd be glad to see the women in Brooklyn take up advanced calculus. But the chief "equity" issue at their college is the shortage of men, who make up barely a fifth of the student body. What happened to the boys who didn't make it?

Boys are, on average, as smart as girls, but they are much less fond of school. They consistently receive lower grades, have more discipline problems and are more likely to be held back for a year or placed in special education classes. The Harvard economist Brian Jacob attributes these problems to boys' lack of "noncognitive skills," like their difficulties with paying attention in class, their disorganization and their reluctance to seek help from others.

Those are serious handicaps, but they could be mitigated if schools became more boy-friendly.

A few educators have suggested reforms: more games and competitions that appeal to boys, more outdoor exercise, more male teachers, more experiments with single-sex schools. But those ideas have gotten little attention or money. Schools have been too busy trying to close the gender gap in the few areas where boys are ahead, like sports and science.

No matter what changes are made to help boys, they'll probably still be less likely than girls to go on to college, simply because girls' skills and interests are better suited to the types of white-collar jobs that now require college degrees. Boys will remain more inclined to skip college in favor of relatively high-paying jobs in fields like construction and manufacturing.

There's no reason to expect a 50-50 ratio on campus — and certainly no reason to mandate it. Boys don't need that kind of affirmative action. What they could use, long before college, is equal attention.

Initiative Targets Abortion Ban (LAT)

By Nicholas Riccardi, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, March 25, 2006

Foes of South Dakota's new law are gathering signatures for a ballot challenge to overturn it.

Opponents of South Dakota's ban on nearly all abortions announced the launch of a ballot initiative Friday aimed at overturning the new law.

If the South Dakota Campaign For Healthy Families collects 16,728 signatures, the law — a direct challenge to Roe vs. Wade — will be placed on hold.

Democratic State Sen. Elaine Roberts said at a news conference in Sioux Falls that legislators went too far when they passed their bill last month banning abortions even in cases of rape and incest. The only exception is if physicians deem an abortion necessary to save the mother's life.

DOJ_NMG_0022202

"The vast majority of South Dakotans are somewhere in the middle," Roberts said. "They have mixed feelings on this issue."

Proponents of the ban said they welcomed the challenge, and said the measure to reverse the law would fail at the polls.

"I know South Dakota politics," said Leslee Unruh, president of the Abstinence Clearinghouse in Sioux Falls and a prominent antiabortion activist. "The people of South Dakota stand for life, for protecting an unborn child."

South Dakota is one of several states that opened the year mulling a strict ban that would contradict Roe vs. Wade.

Some antiabortion activists hope that President Bush's two Supreme Court appointments could lead the court to overturn the landmark 1973 Supreme Court case that established abortion as a constitutional right.

The legislature overwhelmingly passed the bill last month, and South Dakota Gov. Michael Rounds, a Republican, signed it into law shortly afterward.

As opponents and proponents each released polls showing a majority of voters siding with them on the ban, abortion-rights advocates were debating whether to challenge the law in court or at the ballot box.

Some prominent state Democrats were leaning toward a ballot challenge. This week they unveiled a bipartisan group — led by a former Republican state legislator — to move the initiative campaign forward.

Planned Parenthood, which operates the only abortion clinic in the state, also is involved.

"We don't want it to be seen as a partisan assault on the ban," said Jeff Masten, a former chairman of the state Democratic Party who is involved in the campaign. "That legislation simply went too far."

Republican South Dakota House Speaker Matt Michels, who backed the ban, predicted that organizers would easily collect enough signatures to place it on the ballot because of what he deemed the state's minimal requirements for voter initiatives.

He also forecast a campaign financed by big-money donors on both sides of the issue that would saturate the airwaves of the lightly populated state.

"They're going to bombard us," Michels said.

Time To Stall A Bush Nominee (NYT)

The New York Times, March 25, 2006

We don't generally approve of holding nominations hostage to other political objectives. But Senators Hillary Clinton and Patty Murray surely have good cause to block a vote on the nomination of Dr. Andrew von Eschenbach to become commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration until the agency makes a final decision on the morning-after pill. There is no excuse for the administration's endless obfuscation and delays on making the pill available without a prescription when the overwhelming bulk of expert opinion says it is safe to do so. The pill must be taken within 72 hours of unprotected intercourse, preferably within 24 hours, leaving little time to visit a doctor to get a prescription.

The two senators, both Democrats, have good reason to feel betrayed. When they threatened last year to hold up the confirmation of a previous commissioner until a decision on the pill was made, they ultimately relented because of a written assurance from Michael Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, who said the F.D.A. would act on the issue by Sept. 1. Sadly, Mr. Leavitt was misinformed by the agency, overruled by the White House or deliberately deceptive with the senators. The only action the agency took in September was to defer a decision indefinitely.

The case for approving the use of the pill without a prescription has become even stronger in recent months. Evidence has emerged that high officials at the agency overruled their professional staff and ignored expert advisory committees when they rejected the application. Moreover, the agency's claim that it needed more time to consider "novel" issues raised by a proposal to require prescriptions for young teenagers was belied by internal documents revealing that the issues had been discussed for some time but not analyzed aggressively. The logical inference is that the result was dictated by politics — by a desire to placate religious and social conservatives who consider the pill an invitation to promiscuity and an abortifacient.

Should this nomination ultimately go forward, senators will still need to assess the qualifications of Dr. von Eschenbach, who has been acting commissioner since last September. He is a respected surgeon and was president-elect of the American Cancer Society. But his record as director of the National Cancer Institute, a post he holds even as he runs the F.D.A., gets mixed reviews.

His goal to eliminate death and suffering from cancer by 2015 is deemed visionary by some, but wildly unrealistic by others. His desire to bring medicines to market more quickly and more cheaply wins plaudits from the drug industry and some patient advocates, but criticism from consumer advocates who worry that safety will be undermined.

DOJ_NMG_0022203

There is little likelihood that the Senate will reject Dr. von Eschenbach's nomination in a floor vote, although the senators could at least push him for guarantees that safety issues will not be submerged in the rush to approve new drugs and conquer cancer. But the vote should not take place until the F.D.A. has the spine to tackle the morning-after pill head-on.

ANTITRUST:

Alcatel And Lucent Set To Face US Review (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington, Peggy Hollinger In Paris And Paul Taylor In New York

Financial Times, March 25, 2006

Alcatel's talks with Lucent about a possible takeover – a deal that would combine a telecoms equipment company that controls sensitive US technology with a French group – will face a regulatory review in Washington on national security grounds.

Such a move would come at a time when protectionist sentiment in the US is at an all-time high, and raises questions about whether the Bush administration would be prepared to approve the deal.

The merger, which is being driven by growing competitive pressure on equipment makers and could be valued at up to $36bn, would create the world's leading maker of fixed telecoms networks and the second largest in mobile infrastructure.

It also follows in the wake of a wave of consolidation in the telecoms sector – in particlular between some of the companies' biggest clients, including the proposed merger between AT&T and BellSouth and the recent takeover of MCI by Verizon.

The companies have provisionally agreed that Lucent's chief executive Patricia Russo will succeed Alcatel's 68-year-old Serge Tchuruk as chief executive when he steps up to chairman in June.

It is far from clear, however, whether a deal that is viewed as increasingly necessary for the two companies will be able to withstand Washington regulatory scrutiny. While US authorities may be concerned about the security issues surrounding Bell Labs, a revered US research facility, the French government is likely to welcome the deal if the headquarters remain in France.

However it will be keen to safeguard Alcatel's sensitive interests, including its 9.5 per cent stake in defence electronics group Thales and the missile joint venture with Italy's Finmeccanica. One option would be to sell these to Franco-German aerospace group EADS, which has long wanted to acquire Thales.

Even if the deal is presented as a merger of equals, regulatory experts say it faces an extensive review by the US Committee on Foreign Investments in the US, or Cfius, an inter-agency panel that investigates foreign acquisitions of US assets.

Lawmakers in the Senate are in the process of negotiating legislation that would make Cfius reviews even tougher and more lengthy.

The Dubai Ports World debacle, in which a Dubai-controlled company was forced to agree to sell port terminals it acquired after receiving regulatory clearance from Cfius because of a backlash in Congress, has, according to an attorney who works on Cfius deals, changed the balance of power of the panel.

An Israeli company, Check Point Software, was on Thursday forced to withdraw from a merger with a US group, Sourcefire, after the Bush administration raised national security concerns, underscoring that even the US's closest allies are under close scrutiny.

Lucent-Alcatel Merger Would Face Scrutiny (WP)

By Arshad Mohammed

The Washington Post, March 25, 2006

A merger of Lucent Technologies Inc. and France's Alcatel would likely draw federal scrutiny to see if it threatens national security following the furor over a Dubai-based company's plan to acquire control of six U.S. ports, communications and national security analysts said yesterday.

But analysts said they saw no obvious reason why a combination of the two telecommunications equipment makers would face major objections from the government on security or antitrust grounds.

Murray Hill, N.J.-based Lucent and Paris-based Alcatel said late Thursday that they are "engaged in discussions about a potential merger," but said they could not guarantee they would reach any agreement. A merger would greatly expand Alcatel's business in the United States and allow the two companies to cut costs and better compete with their larger competitors.

It is unclear how a merger, if one materializes, would be structured. The two companies said they were discussing "a merger of equals that is intended to be priced at market." Spokespeople for Alcatel and Lucent, which had discussed merging in May 2001, declined comment beyond their statement.

If Alcatel, the larger of the two companies, were to buy Lucent, that could trigger a review by the Committee on Foreign Investments in the United States (CFIUS), the interagency group chaired by the Treasury secretary that is charged with investigating such deals to ensure they do not endanger U.S. national security.

"I think in this political climate, everything that is coming through CFIUS is gong to get more attention," said Richard A. Falkenrath, a Brookings Institution scholar who served as deputy homeland security adviser and deputy assistant to the president in 2003 and 2004.

Congressional concerns this month forced the United Arab Emirates-based maritime company Dubai Ports World to abandon its plan to acquire operations at six U.S. ports, amid heightened worries about protecting vital infrastructure after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

But analysts saw few appropriate comparisons in the possible Alcatel-Lucent deal, noting that the French company already does work for the U.S. government and that the sale of telecom equipment is a less sensitive matter than the management of U.S. ports, which have long been seen as vulnerable to attack.

"Alcatel is already delivering advanced network solutions to the federal government. Lucent of course has a long history of providing advanced communications services and infrastructure to the federal government," said Mark Bieberich of the Boston-based Yankee Group Research Inc. "Both companies have been properly vetted . . . so I think the risk posed by the merger to the federal government is minimal."

AT&T Corp., the former long-distance giant that has now been dismembered, spun off Lucent as a separate company in 1996. Bell Labs, AT&T's legendary research arm, went with Lucent.

At its peak, Bell Labs was deeply involved in classified work for the U.S. government. It worked on radar and missile guidance systems, and it designed a secure, scrambled communications system that allowed Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Winston Churchill to talk to each other during World War II, said AT&T's former corporate historian Sheldon Hochheiser.

While Lucent still does work for the government, the amount is a far cry from the Cold War, when Hochheiser estimated that as much as a third of Bell Labs' budget was paid for by Washington.

In fiscal 2005, Lucent had $104.7 million in federal contracts, with about 65 percent of those coming from the U.S. Army, according to Eagle Eye Publishers Inc., a Fairfax company that tracks federal contracts. Alcatel had $22.4 million in such contracts the same year, with nearly 53 percent for the Army, according to Eagle Eye figures. Today, Alcatel and Lucent are the seventh- and ninth-largest telecom equipment makers, respectively, according to Yankee Group.

"In its heyday, this would have been a huge blow to national security and to national pride, but Lucent is a shadow of itself," said University of Colorado law professor Philip J. Weiser.

BGE Sees Merger As Buffer For Rates (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, March 25, 2006

BALTIMORE -- A Baltimore Gas and Electric Co. executive yesterday warned that lawmakers' attempts to block a multibillion-dollar merger could force the utility to more quickly implement a 72-percent increase in energy rates.

"Without the merger there is no room to lower rates," said Robert L. Gould, communications director for BGE parent company Constellation Energy Group. "We have gone right to the edge of how much we can tolerate on the balance sheet."

He also said if lawmakers make good on their threat to block Florida Power & Light's $11 billion purchase of Constellation Energy, they likely would derail plans to gradually phase in a 72-percent increase in electric bills.

"One of the benefits of the merger is you have a bigger balance sheet," Mr. Gould said. "You take that away, and it will be tougher and our credit rating will be thrown into question."

As proof, he said Moody's Investor Service has already put Constellation on a watch list because of uncertainty about the regulatory environment taking shape in Maryland's legislature.

A spokeswoman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican, said the governor is wary of government interference in business but "still believes that more can and should be done" to keep electricity affordable.

"He does support the merger, and he is aware of the negative impact that interfering in the merger could have on Maryland business," said spokeswoman Shareese N. DeLeaver. But "the governor believes that we should put the customer first."

Staving off "rate shocks" for BGE's 1.2 million customers has become the hottest issue in this election year, in which Mr. Ehrlich is seeking re-election and every seat in the General Assembly is up for grabs.

Since the increases were announced March 7, several bills have been introduced to prevent or postpone Maryland's higher energy rates, including plans to cap rates, to give the legislature authority over utility mergers and even to return to a public utility system.

Miss DeLeaver said the legislature's attack of the energy issue was "like a cat swatting a ball of yarn," while the governor was crafting an alternative rate-reduction plan to be presented to the power company in coming weeks.

The power company has proposed gradually phasing in higher rates over a 15-month period, beginning with a 13-percent increase in July. The average BGE electric bill would increase from $81.65 to $92.60 a month, according to the company.

Rates would increase 15 percent in January and 15 percent in June 2007, then increase to market rates by fall 2007. At that time, the average electric bill would have increased from $81.65 to $140.50. Customers also would pay a monthly charge of $4.40 for the next eight years -- a total of about $422 -- to pay for the loan BGE would need to cover the cost of the deferred rate increase, according to the company.

"We have put a very aggressive package on the table already," Mr. Gould said.

He said the proposal also included $150 million to reduce electric rates in the future. The money, he said, would come from cost savings resulting from the merger.

"That's a true subsidy," Mr. Gould said. "We would actually reach in our pockets and lower rates that much."

The increases are partly the result of the 1999 deregulation plan approved by the Democratic-controlled General Assembly and signed by Gov. Parris N. Glendening, a Democrat.
