Saparmurad Niyazov, who died unexpectedly yesterday after a heart attack, was a tyrant par excellence. He presided over a closed and repressive regime as uncontested master of the Turkmen people. Those who dared challenge his absolute power were arrested and tortured, then sentenced to long prison terms. Any sign of dissent was fiercely suppressed.

Among his more recent victims were two journalists who worked for foreign news outlets and one human rights activist. Ogulsapar Muradova, 58, who worked for Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, died in prison. Her body showed obvious signs of torture.

Niyazov was the last communist leader of Turkmenistan when it was still part of the Soviet Union. He inherited his country after it was suddenly transformed into an independent state upon the collapse of the U.S.S.R. 15 years ago. He proclaimed himself Turkmenbashi, Father of All Turkmen, and began reshaping his land according to his whims.

The result was that Turkmenistan was plunged into the Middle Ages. Niyazov closed theaters, libraries and newspapers. He limited access to education, travel and medical services. In an abrupt move last year, he ordered that all hospitals be closed except those in the Turkmen capital, Ashgabat. He dramatically cut pensions to the elderly. Houses of those suspected of disloyalty were routinely torn down.

State-controlled media and government officials eulogized the Father of All Turkmen for his loving care for his people. Statues and portraits of him are in the streets of Turkmen towns, many of them renamed after himself and his mother. A gigantic golden statue of Niyazov erected in Ashgabat is equipped with a mechanism ensuring that the Turkmen leader is always facing the sun.

Turkmenbashi authored a book titled "Ruhnama" ("Spirituality") and ordered that all Turkmen schoolchildren, college students and government officials and civil servants study it thoroughly. As befits a divine leader, he claimed to command nature itself. One report has it that he demanded that a crop be harvested early because he'd become tired holding back the rain.

Turkmenbashi renamed months and days of the week and redefined measures of human age, which he subdivided into special periods of his own invention -- at 61 he entered the period of "spiritual greatness." He had his hair dyed black and was not to enter "old age" until he reached 85.

DOJ_NMG_0108675

He died at 66, and the immediate future of his country is in the hands of his inner circle. But whoever succeeds Turkmenbashi will have a hard time establishing his own stature and defining his legitimacy, whether it is that of a popularly recognized ruler or the winner of a power struggle.

In fact, the struggle seems inevitable. Niyazov's regime implied that he was Turkmenistan's ruler for eternity, and any plans for succession were simply ruled out. Just as it was after Stalin's death, members of the leader's inner circle must be seized by fear and deep distrust of each other. Some of the Turkmen officials who had earlier fled abroad to avoid repression are talking about coming back, further aggravating the struggle. Chances are that this fight will not be contained within the elites but that it will spill over and turn into popular unrest.

In spite of Turkmenistan's sinister regime, world players -- Russia first and foremost -- have shown great interest in the country because of its rich resources, especially natural gas. Turkmenbashi was a difficult partner for Vladimir Putin -- whimsical and disrespectful, even defiant at times. Under his rule, Turkmen citizens who had Russian passports were commonly subjected to harassment. But Turkmenistan's gas plays a key role in Putin's policy of using energy as a tool of political influence, and so he put up with Niyazov's unruly behavior. (Right now Russia buys Turkmen gas wholesale and resells it. Observers are already warning that a destabilization of Turkmenistan might affect its gas supplies and, consequently, Russia's.)

Since Central Asia has increasingly become an area of rivalry between Russia and the United States, the U.S. government hasn't been very demanding with regard to Niyazov's rule, either. And the Turkmen president eagerly took advantage of the U.S.-Russia rivalry. He agreed to harbor a U.S. military base after it was driven out of Uzbekistan, a favor that ensured that the U.S. administration would show tolerance for blatant abuses of human rights in Turkmenistan, regardless of President Bush's proclaimed mission of bringing freedom and democracy to the world.

Niyazov lived in self-isolation, rarely leaving his country and never binding himself by any alliances. His successor will hardly be able to stay so distanced. Turkmenistan's resources are an obvious source of power, and in the fight to control them, members of the Turkmen elite sooner or later will be tempted to look abroad for backing. The stakes in this geopolitical game could be quite high. For Russia, having a reliable and more compliant partner in Turkmenistan would mean a significant consolidation of its energy weapon, as well as its position vis-a-vis former Soviet states.

One would hope that change will at least improve somewhat the situation of the Turkmen people. But with the balance of power in Central Asia at stake, it's unlikely that human rights abuses will be of major concern to the contestants in this tug-of-war.

Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal, writes a monthly column for The Post.

DOJ_NMG_0108676

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 26, 2006 9:37 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Tuesday, December 26, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061226.pdf; dojclips061226.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Panel Faults FBI In Okla. Bombing Follow-Up (WP/AP) 2
Feds Failed To Follow Bombing Evidence (SLT) 2
Courts Side With NSA On Wiretaps (NYSUN).....4

Homeland Response:

Alarming 9/11 Claim Is Found Baseless (LAT) 5
Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s (USAT).....6

War News:

Shiite-on-Shiite Violence Racks Southern Iraqi City (LAT) 7
British Soldiers Storm Iraqi Jail, Citing Torture (NYT) 9
Hundreds Disappear Into The Black Hole Of The Kurdish Prison System In Iraq (NYT) 10
U.S. Military Death Toll In Iraq Exceeds Number Of Deaths In Sept. 11, 2001, Attacks (USAT/AP) 13
Troop Push Is Personal For McCain (WP) 15
Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP) 16

Corporate Scandals:

DCX Probe Spans Globe (DET NEWS) 17
Report: Ex-FBI Boss Aids DaimlerChrysler (AP)..... 19
Ex-Trader Tells Story As A Warning (NYT) 19
Exxon Damages For Valdez Spill Are Cut In Half (WSJ/AP).... 20
Lots Of Cheer From R.I.M., But No News On Options (NYT). 21

Criminal Law:

Why L.A. Jail Cells Have Revolving Doors (LAT) 23
Duke Rape Case Unravels (CSM) 28
After Years Of Agony, Death Turns Assaults Into Homicides (NYT) 29
A Delusional System Of Justice (WP)..... 32
Federal RICO Statute Has A Tough Year (AP) 33
Sentencing Guidelines Face New Scrutiny (WSJ)..... 34
The Tell-Tell Rap? (WP)..... 35

Civil Law:

No Fed Oversight On Some Air Charters (USAT/AP)..... 36
Where Real Money Meets Virtual Reality, The Jury Is Still Out (WP).....37

Civil Rights:

Justice Dept. Database Stirs Privacy Fears (WP).....39
Diabetics In The Workplace Confront A Tangle Of Laws (NYT).....41

Antitrust:

Judge Postpones Delphi Hearing After New Plan (WSJ).....45

Environment/Indian Affairs:

After Long Struggle, Whooping Crane Population Hits Milestone (WP).....46

Immigration:

Bipartisan Effort To Draft Immigration Bill (NYT) 47

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Pledge To Restrain Spending (WP) 49

Other News:

Roberts Leading Court In More Media-friendly Direction (USAT/AP).....51
Italian In Poison Case Arrested (AP) 52
Ethiopian Jets Strafe Mogadishu Airports (NYT) 53
Ethiopia Steps Up Attacks On Somalia (WP).....54
Ethiopian Jets Bomb Two Main Airports In Somalia (AP) 56
Somalia Could Be Ethiopia's Quagmire (LAT).....57
Israel Approves West Bank Roadblock Removals (USAT).....58
Olmert Says He'd Like To Renew Talks With Syria (AP) 59

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Panel Faults FBI In Okla. Bombing Follow-Up (WP/AP)

By John Solomon, Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

The FBI failed to fully investigate information suggesting other suspects may have helped Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols with the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, allowing questions to linger more than a decade after the deadly attack, a congressional inquiry concludes.

The House International Relations investigative subcommittee will release the findings of its two-year review as early as Wednesday, declaring that no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection to the attack exists but that far too many unanswered questions remain.

The report sharply criticizes the FBI for failing to be curious enough to pursue credible information that foreign or U.S. citizens may have had contact with Nichols or McVeigh and could have assisted the pair. Their truck bomb killed 168 people in the main federal building in Oklahoma City on April 19, 1995.

McVeigh and Nichols were convicted of murder. McVeigh was executed in 2001; Nichols is serving a life sentence without the possibility of parole.

"We did our best with limited resources, and I think we moved the understanding of this issue forward a couple of notches, even though important questions remain unanswered," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), the subcommittee chairman, said in an interview.

The subcommittee's report discloses for the first time that Nichols admitted participating in the robbery of an Arkansas gun dealer, the crime that funded the attack. There have long been questions about that robbery because the FBI concluded McVeigh was in another state when it occurred.

Rohrabacher's subcommittee saved its sharpest words for the Justice Department, saying officials there exhibited a mindset of thwarting congressional oversight and did not assist the investigation fully.

The report says the inadequacy of the FBI's work was exposed two years ago when some bombing evidence overlooked for 10 years was discovered in a house linked to Nichols that had been searched repeatedly by agents.

Special Agent Richard Kolko, an FBI spokesman, declined to comment on the report yesterday because he had not seen it.

Kolko said: "The Oklahoma City bombing case was the largest case the FBI worked on before 9/11. Agents at virtually every office, domestically and overseas, covered thousands of leads. Every bit of information was investigated and reviewed. The FBI worked tirelessly to cover all of the leads and conducted a thorough and complete investigation."

The bureau has said previously there is no credible evidence that other people were involved.

The subcommittee concludes that the Justice Department should not have rushed to execute McVeigh after he dropped his court appeals, and that officials should have made more efforts to interview and question him about evidence suggesting he might have had help beyond Nichols's.

Feds Failed To Follow Bombing Evidence (SLT)

By Pamela Manson

Salt Lake Tribune, December 25, 2006

For years, Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue has maintained his brother was killed in prison months after the Oklahoma City bombing by interrogators who mistakenly believed he was connected to the attack.

Now, a new congressional report says federal authorities failed to investigate evidence suggesting Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had assistance plotting the bombing - and some of the information pointing to co-conspirators came out of Trentadue's lawsuits against the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0108679

And it adds fuel to the mystery of Kenneth Trentadue's supposed suicide in 1995 at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City.

Trentadue believes FBI records hold clues to his brother's death and has fought the agency in court for those documents. Some that have been ordered released say investigators got tips about a possible link between the April 19, 1995, bombing and a group of white supremacist bank robbers with links to a training camp in Elohim City, Okla.

That information is included in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee.

Trentadue said Sunday that two findings in the report stand out, including the lack of cooperation by the FBI in the congressional body's investigation.

The second is that McVeigh and Nichols may have been aided by others.

"It's pretty clear, whether Islamic terrorists or homegrown neo-Nazis, there were other people involved," Trentadue said, adding that the subcommittee's probe "will help reveal the truth about the Oklahoma City bombing, which I now know is linked to my brother's death."

Kenneth Trentadue, who had served time for bank robbery, was arrested near San Diego in June 1995, two months after the bombing that killed 168 people. He was sent to the transfer center in Oklahoma City for an alleged parole violation. On Aug. 21, guards found Trentadue's blood-soaked body in his cell hanging from a noose made of torn bedsheets. Prison officials say the 44-year-old inmate committed suicide.

According to Jesse Trentadue, his brother bore a strong resemblance to Richard Lee Guthrie, a bank robber and alleged accomplice of McVeigh. He maintains that authorities mistakenly thought his brother was Guthrie - a member of the Midwest Bank Robbery Gang, an arm of the Aryan Republican Army that stole from financial institutions to fund attacks on government buildings - and killed him during an interrogation that got out of hand.

Guthrie was arrested on bank robbery charges in 1996 and eventually struck a plea bargain with prosecutors. In fall 1996, he claimed he would soon be revealing information that "would blow the lid off the Oklahoma City bombing case," according to the report. The next day, he was found dead, hanging in his cell in Kentucky, purportedly a suicide.

"This suspicious 'suicide' mirrored the similar death of [Kenneth] Trentadue, another prisoner, who may have been tangentially and incorrectly linked to the Oklahoma City bombing," the subcommittee report says.

Trentadue has filed three lawsuits in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City alleging, among other claims, that the FBI has violated the Freedom of Information Act by failing to turn over requested documents on the Oklahoma City bombing. In one of the suits, Judge Dale Kimball ordered the agency to produce some of the disputed records on information about a possible white supremacist link to the bombing.

The House International Relations investigative subcommittee will release the findings of its two-year review as early as Wednesday, declaring there is no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection to the attack but far too many unanswered questions remain.

The subcommittee's report will conclude there is no doubt McVeigh and Nichols were the main perpetrators, and it discloses for the first time that Nichols confirmed to House investigators he participated in the robbery of an Arkansas gun dealer that provided the proceeds for the attack.

There have long been questions about that robbery because the FBI concluded McVeigh was in another state at the time it occurred.

The report also sharply criticizes the FBI for failing to be curious enough to pursue credible information that foreign or U.S. citizens may have had contact with Nichols or McVeigh and could have assisted their plot.

The subcommittee saved its sharpest words for the Justice Department, saying officials there exhibited a mindset of thwarting congressional oversight and did not assist the investigation fully.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said Sunday, "The Oklahoma City bombing case was the largest case the FBI worked on before 9/11. Agents at virtually every office, domestically and overseas, covered thousands of leads. Every bit of information was investigated and reviewed. The FBI worked tirelessly to cover all of the leads and conducted a thorough and complete investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0108680

Courts Side With NSA On Wiretaps (NYSUN)

By Joseph Goldstein

New York Sun, December 26, 2006

Defense lawyers who had hoped that the public disclosure a year ago of the National Security Agency's wiretapping program would yield information favorable to their clients are being rebuffed by the federal judiciary, which in a series of unusually consistent rulings has rejected efforts by terrorism suspects to access the records.

In at least 17 criminal cases, federal district judges nominated to the federal bench by presidents Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Clinton, and George W. Bush have ruled against requests to force the government to tell defendants, most accused of terrorism-related crimes, whether the NSA eavesdropped on them without a court warrant.

The rulings indicate that even as public support for the war in Iraq has eroded in polls and as the NSA program has come under criticism from congressional Democrats, and even some Republicans, federal judges may be a bulwark that the Bush administration can rely on to defer to at least some aspects of its wartime policies.

The judges' decisions have come after defense attorneys filed motions requesting access to relevant surveillance intercepts that the government obtained without a warrant. Defense attorneys claim they are entitled to such information and that evidence obtained from warrantless wiretaps is tainted and inadmissible at trial. In many, but not all instances, the motions were filed after a conviction.

Individually, the judges' orders, often very brief and rarely providing explanations, indicate little. Taken together, however, they signal that the judges are unwilling to permit defense attorneys to use prosecutions to force disclosures about the program.

The legality of the NSA program is being litigated in several civil lawsuits across the country. In one case, a district judge in Detroit, Anna Diggs Taylor, ruled in August that the program was unconstitutional, a decision that the government has appealed. Legal observers dispute whether even a ruling by the Supreme Court that the program is unconstitutional would lead to the overturning of criminal convictions in which the program played a role in securing evidence or targeting the defendants.

In every instance, the Justice Department's policy is to refuse to say publicly whether the NSA program was involved in a case, because denying its role in one case but refusing to deny its role elsewhere could disclose classified information, according to public government court filings. Rather, in response to defense motions, the Justice Department has filed secret documents with the court that are not supplied to defense lawyers.

"There is a veil of secrecy over these parts of the proceedings," said one attorney, Marvin Miller, who filed such a motion on behalf of Ali Asad Chandia, who was convicted in Alexandria, Va., of aiding a terrorist organization in Pakistan.

Defense attorneys say they are frustrated that judges are accepting these secret briefs from the government.

"Whatever the government is saying in these secret ex parte in camera filings, it is sure clamming up a lot of judges," said attorney Jeanne Baker, who represents Adham Amin Hassoun, a co-defendant of "dirty bomb" suspect Jose Padilla.

Speculation abounds among attorneys over just what the Justice Department is saying in the secret briefs.

Some defense attorneys suggest that the government's ex parte briefs may contain a simple yes-or-no answer as to whether a specific defendant was targeted by the NSA program. Another defense attorney, Jill Shellow-Lavine, speculates that the size of the program may prevent the government from stating whether a particular defendant was the subject of the surveillance.

A former Justice Department official says that the government probably declines to give any answers in its secret filings.

"There is no basis to assume than the government is making defendant-specific disclosures," David Rivkin, who served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations, said. "The far more likely scenario is that the government is telling the relevant judges that the classified program has nothing to do with this prosecution."

Defense attorneys say the willingness of judges to accept secret briefings puts them in an unfair position.

"It short-circuits the adversary system, and it prevents the issues from being litigated," a lawyer who has filed a motion for disclosure regarding the NSA program, Malick Ghachem, said. "I haven't found a single judge so far who has been willing to take a serious look at this or at least let the defendants know they are taking a serious look at it."

Defense attorneys acknowledge that these motions for disclosure are made routinely, even without any evidence to suggest that their clients were targeted by the NSA program.

DOJ_NMG_0108681

Still, even in cases in which the NSA program is believed to have played a role, it is not clear that judges would rule any differently. Officials in the Bush administration have credited the NSA program with helping uncover the terrorist plot of an Ohio truck driver, Iyman Faris, to topple the Brooklyn Bridge, according to a New York Times report. In October a federal judge in Alexandria, Va., Leonie Brinkema, declined Faris's request for government documents about the NSA program's role in the case. Last month, Judge Brinkema upheld Faris's guilty plea from 2003, ruling that Faris did not have standing to bring his challenge even if "electronic surveillance" had first led the government to him.

In only one case has a federal appeals court looked at the relationship of the NSA program to criminal prosecutions. The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., in April remanded a separate case to Judge Brinkema, questioning whether the government possessed "undisclosed intercepts" that should have been turned over. The case involved a Muslim cleric, Ali al-Timimi, who was found guilty last year of encouraging Muslims to join the Taliban's war efforts.

Timimi's attorney, Jonathan Turley, said he believes that NSA intercepts may contain exculpatory evidence that could have benefited Timimi, rather than incriminating evidence used to target him.

A court filing by the Justice Department in the case against Lynne Stewart, the New York lawyer who was convicted of criminally helping her terrorist client communicate with his followers, listed 17 criminal cases in which judges have denied motions for disclosure about the NSA program. The New York Sun reviewed 14 of them. In those orders, the judges, excluding Judge Brinkema, did not state any reason for denying the defense motions, except to indicate that they had considered the secret briefs of the government. In one written order, a judge implied that his willingness to sentence a defendant without further hearings was on the condition that the government's secret brief said no evidence came from the NSA program.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Alarming 9/11 Claim Is Found Baseless (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 25, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate Intelligence Committee has rejected as untrue one of the most disturbing claims about the Sept. 11 terrorist strikes — a congressman's contention that a team of military analysts identified Mohamed Atta or other hijackers before the attacks — according to a summary of the panel's investigation obtained by The Times.

The conclusion contradicts assertions by Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and a few military officers that U.S. national security officials ignored startling intelligence available in early 2001 that might have helped to prevent the attacks.

In particular, Weldon and other officials have repeatedly claimed that the military analysts' effort, known as Able Danger, produced a chart that included a picture of Atta and identified him as being tied to an Al Qaeda cell in Brooklyn, N.Y. Weldon has also said that the chart was shared with White House officials, including Stephen J. Hadley, then deputy national security advisor.

But after a 16-month investigation, the Intelligence Committee has concluded that those assertions are unfounded.

"Able Danger did not identify Mohammed Atta or any other 9/11 hijacker at any time prior to Sept. 11, 2001," the committee determined, according to an eight-page letter sent last week to panel members by the top Republican and Democrat on the committee.

Weldon, the focus of an unrelated Justice Department corruption probe, was defeated last month in his campaign for an 11th term in a suburban Philadelphia district that has a large GOP majority in voter registration. Attempts were unsuccessful Sunday to reach a Weldon spokesman and an attorney representing Weldon in the Justice Department investigation.

The Senate panel began investigating Able Danger in August 2005, after Weldon and people close to the program went public with their claims. At the time, Weldon was the vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and the House Homeland Security Committee.

The recently completed probe also dismissed other assertions that have fueled conspiracy theories surrounding the Sept. 11 attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0108682

The panel said it found "no evidence" to support claims by military officers connected to Able Danger that Defense Department lawyers prevented the team's analysts from sharing their findings with FBI counter-terrorism officials before the attacks.

Nor was the alleged chart or any information developed by Able Danger improperly destroyed at the direction of Pentagon lawyers, the panel concluded — a charge that had stoked claims of a cover-up.

Though the committee concluded that claims about Able Danger were unfounded, two of the hijackers were known to the U.S. intelligence community before the Sept. 11 attacks. The two had been observed by the CIA attending a meeting with Al Qaeda operatives in Malaysia, but that information was not shared with other agencies in time to locate them after they had entered the United States and moved to San Diego.

Able Danger was the unclassified name given to a program launched in 1999 by the U.S. Special Operations Command as part of an effort to develop military plans targeting the leadership ranks of Al Qaeda and other terrorist networks.

Military analysts assigned to the effort did create charts with pictures of Al Qaeda operatives whose identities were known publicly at the time, the committee found. But the committee concluded that none of those charts depicted Atta, and that the claims of Weldon and others may have been caused by confusion.

One of the charts, titled "The Al Qaeda Network: Snapshots of Typical Operational Cells Associated With UBL [Usama bin Laden]," was attached to the letter sent to committee members last week by Sens. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) and John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the panel's leaders.

"One of these individuals depicted on the chart arguably looked like Mohammed Atta," the committee concluded. "In addition, the chart contained names of Al Qaeda associates that sound like Atta, as well as numerous variations of the common Arab name Mohammed."

The committee also suggested that officials' memories may have been clouded by the flurry of charts and photographs of Atta that surfaced after the attacks. The panel noted that a defense contractor that produced the chart at the center of the controversy subsequently created a follow-up chart, after the attacks, that did include Atta.

Atta, an Egyptian-born Islamic radical, was the ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks and pilot of one of the planes that struck the World Trade Center.

In June 2005, Weldon generated controversy when he declared in a speech on the House floor and in a book released that month that he had met with Hadley at the White House shortly after the attacks and had given the national security official a copy of a chart showing that Atta had been identified by Able Danger.

But the committee concluded that the chart "was not a pre-9/11 chart" and that "at no time did Mr. Hadley ever see a chart with pre-9/11 data bearing Atta's picture or name as described by Congressman Weldon."

The Senate Intelligence Committee noted in its report that its findings were consistent with those of a similar investigation of Able Danger by the Defense Department inspector general's office, released in September.

Weldon has relished the role of calling attention to national security threats he believes are being ignored by others in government. At times he has carried around a replica of a suitcase-size nuclear bomb to highlight terrorist nuclear dangers. He has also accused Iran of hiding Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

Weldon's rising legal troubles played a role in his reelection loss last month. It was disclosed last week that a federal grand jury had subpoenaed congressional records from Weldon's office as part of an FBI probe aimed at determining whether he traded his influence to get lobbying business for his daughter Karen and others.

The House seat was won by Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, December 25, 2006

Annual incidents of trafficking and mishandling of nuclear and other radioactive material reported to U.S. intelligence officials have more than doubled since the early 1990s, says the director of domestic nuclear detection at the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0108683

Also up: scams in which fake or non-existent nuclear or radioactive material is offered for sale, often online, says Vayl Oxford, nuclear detection director at the department.

"We sense that people have recognized the value of nuclear material as a useful way of making money," Oxford said. "Nuclear material is becoming a marketable commodity."

The incidents tracked by the department, based on its reporting and information from foreign diplomatic and intelligence sources, average about twice the number made public each year by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

Oxford said reports of nuclear and radioactive materials trafficking have ranged from 200 to 250 a year since 2000, up from about 100 a year in the 1990s.

The reports include incidents in which material was stolen, offered for sale, lost or mishandled.

The IAEA, whose members self-report trafficking incidents on a voluntary basis, said there were 121 such incidents in 2004 and 103 last year. The agency, based in Vienna, reports only trafficking incidents that its members have confirmed and elected to make public. The Department of Homeland Security numbers include all known or suspected trafficking incidents identified by the United States and allied governments.

Reported incidents may be increasing, Oxford says, because since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, governments have become more diligent about policing material that could be used by terrorists to build a radioactive "dirty bomb" or similar device.

Most reported incidents occurred outside the USA. There are no reported incidents in which radioactive or nuclear material was successfully sold to a terror group, according to the IAEA.

Some of the incidents have involved enriched uranium or plutonium of the type that can be used to make a nuclear weapon. In June 2003, for instance, a smuggler was arrested trying to carry 170 grams of enriched uranium across a border in Sadahlo, Georgia, in the former Soviet Union.

Most incidents involved very small amounts of material that were mishandled by authorities and never intended to be sold, the IAEA said. In New Jersey last year, a package containing 3.3 grams of enriched helium was "accidentally disposed of," the IAEA reported.

Some experts are concerned that the increase in trafficking incidents makes it more likely terrorists could acquire nuclear material.

"We're only seeing the dysfunctional part of the market — the supplier who's dumb enough to try to sell it to the police," said Jeffrey Lewis, director of the Project on Managing the Atom at Harvard University's Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs.

WAR NEWS:

Shiite-on-Shiite Violence Racks Southern Iraqi City (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Shiite militia fighters clashed with police Sunday in Samawah, a provincial capital in southern Iraq, transforming it into a lawless battleground and exposing rifts that increasingly divide Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority.

Nine people, including four police officers, have died in the violence gripping parts of Samawah since Friday, police said. On Sunday, police backed by some Shiite tribal leaders called in Iraqi soldiers from nearby Diwaniya to help battle the militia. The security forces closed entrances to the city, which is about 145 miles southeast of Baghdad, imposed a curfew and shut the schools as they traded fire with militiamen.

Much of the death and destruction in Iraq this year has involved fighting between Shiites and the Sunni Muslim minority, which dominated the country under former President Saddam Hussein. But the violence in Samawah underscores the difficulty that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and other Shiite leaders have had in maintaining order among members of their sect in a country where people's loyalties are divided among political parties, religious groupings and tribes.

Conflicts within Shiite communities have troubled Baghdad and other parts of Iraq in recent weeks, but the violence has been particularly notable in Samawah, capital of the first province handed over by U.S.-led forces to Iraqi control.

DOJ_NMG_0108684

At a news conference Sunday, Iraq's interior minister, Jawad Bolani, a Shiite, said police were restoring order in Samawah. "People who try to create problems can appear in any city in the world," he said. "The important thing is that [security forces] are there to stop them."

Samawah police say they are battling a militia associated with the Al Mahdi army of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, but Sadr associates said Sunday that the militia involved in the fighting is an offshoot led by a local Shiite cleric feuding with rival tribes.

The conflict in Samawah began Dec. 1, when gunmen attempted to rescue detainees from a local prison, killing three people, according to local hospital staffers. Militia leaders agreed to a cease-fire with police and provincial officials two days later, then apparently broke the agreement Friday after clashing with police at checkpoints near local mosques.

A Sadr associate, who spoke on condition that his name not be used, said the Samawah militia is led by Sheik Ghazi Zurgani, a renegade cleric. The Sadr associate said Sadr was distancing himself from the Samawah militia and stood by the Dec. 3 cease-fire.

But Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a member of Sadr's party in parliament, blamed the latest conflict on local police, who he said provoked militias Friday by opening fire on Shiite worshipers as they celebrated a religious anniversary. He called the police "provocative and intimidating."

"They are dealing with people as if they are still in the Saddam era," he said.

Jaafar Abdul Razzaq, a spokesman from Sadr's Samawah office, said the militia would not stop fighting until police released about 30 militia members detained since Friday. Police officials said they were negotiating another cease-fire with militia leaders.

Saad Aziz, a Shiite member of the Samawah city council, said local Shiites were divided by tribe and political party, with some loyal to Sadr's parliamentary bloc, others to another leading Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI.

"The Ziad tribe itself is now divided among those who support SCIRI and those who are supporting Sadr," Aziz said, referring to one of the area's major clans. "There is now internal fighting inside the tribe itself."

Abdul Hussein Dhalimi, the acting governor of Muthanna province and a SCIRI member, said he met Sunday with provincial leaders and with delegates from the nearby holy Shiite cities of Karbala and Najaf to "settle things down in the province."

"The security forces are controlling the situation. The city is under their control," he said, adding that local leaders would not negotiate with the militia until it disarmed. "The arms must be carried by the security forces only," he said.

Muthanna, of which Samawah is the capital, is one of the three provinces out of 18 transferred to Iraqi security control since 2003. British forces handed over control of Muthanna nearly six months ago. Italian forces transferred neighboring Dhi Qar province in September, and last week, U.S. forces handed over nearby Najaf province.

The British left behind an "overwatch battle group" in Muthanna of about 800 Australian soldiers responsible to local and national Iraqi authorities, according to Capt. Tane Dunlop, a British forces spokesman.

Iraqi authorities did not ask for support from Australian forces in Samawah on Sunday, Dunlop said, but the Australian troops were "keeping an eye on the situation."

"There seems to be a standoff up there, and the Iraqi forces have it under control," Dunlop said, adding that the Australians were staying out of the fighting out of respect for the fledgling provincial security forces. Getting involved, even to crush a rogue militia, might undermine Iraqi sovereignty, he said.

"The whole point is to hand over control to all the provinces. If we hand over control, we can't go around saying how people should handle that control. They'll deal with things the way they see fit," he said. "We can't keep sort of charging back in."

Also on Sunday, the U.S. military announced that six soldiers had been killed Saturday.

Three soldiers in the 89th Military Police Brigade were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in east Baghdad, and another soldier with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, died in an explosion in Diyala province.

A roadside bomb southeast of the capital killed one soldier on patrol and wounded four, and another roadside bomb southwest of the capital killed a soldier on a combat resupply mission.

Their deaths brought U.S. troop fatalities since the conflict began to 2,969, according to icasualties.org.

DOJ_NMG_0108685

The military also released a statement saying it had detained four suspected insurgents in central Baghdad.

Several mortar attacks were reported in Baghdad on Sunday, including an afternoon assault on an athletic club and an attack on a Shiite neighborhood in the northern part of the city. Baghdad police reported recovering 29 bodies in the 24-hour period ending Sunday. Elsewhere in the country, a suicide bomber killed seven Iraqi police and injured 30 others in the city of Muqdadiya, about 60 miles northeast of the capital, officials said. In the northern city of Kirkuk, gunmen killed two brothers, according to police Lt. Salah Juboori.

Meanwhile in Baghdad, where U.S. forces have stepped up raids in recent weeks, residents of the Kamaliya neighborhood in the eastern part of the city protested Sunday after U.S. soldiers blocked the area to cars and pedestrians with barbed wire at 5 a.m., searching homes and shops for insurgents and weapons, witnesses said.

Resident Mohammed Abu Zahara, 34, was stuck at home with his family, without heat or electricity, thankful he went to the market Saturday and didn't need to go out. He watched as neighbors, unable to work or run errands, were forced to open their homes to U.S. troops.

British Soldiers Storm Iraqi Jail, Citing Torture (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 25 — Hundreds of British and Iraqi soldiers assaulted a police station in the southern city of Basra on Monday, killing seven gunmen, rescuing 127 prisoners from what the British said was almost certain execution and ultimately reducing the facility to rubble.

The military action was one of the most significant undertaken by British troops since the 2003 invasion, British officials said, adding that it was an essential step in any plan to re-establish security in Basra.

When the combined British and Iraqi force of 1,400 troops gained control of the station, it found the prisoners being held in conditions that a British military spokesman, Maj. Charlie Burbridge, described as “appalling.” More than 100 men were crowded into a single cell, 30 feet by 40 feet, he said, with two open toilets, two sinks and just a few blankets spread over the concrete floor.

A significant number showed signs of torture. Some had crushed hands and feet, Major Burbridge said, while others had cigarette and electrical burns and a significant number had gunshot wounds to their legs and knees.

The fetid dungeon was another example of abuses by the Iraqi security forces. The discovery highlighted the continuing struggle to combat the infiltration of the police and army by militias and criminal elements — even in a Shiite city like Basra, where there has been no sectarian violence.

As recently as October, the Iraqi government suspended an entire police brigade in Baghdad on suspicion of participation in death squads. The raid on Monday also raised echoes of the infamous Baghdad prison run by the Interior Ministry, known as Site 4, where more than 1,400 prisoners were subjected to systematic abuse and torture.

The focus of the attack was an arm of the local police called the serious crimes unit, which British officials said had been thoroughly infiltrated by criminals and militias who used it to terrorize local residents and violently settle scores with political or tribal rivals.

“The serious crimes unit was at the center of death squad activity,” Major Burbridge said.

A little over a year ago, British troops stormed the same building seeking to rescue two British special forces soldiers who had been captured by militants. A mob of 1,000 to 2,000 people gathered in protest, and a widely circulated video showed boys throwing stones at a burning British armored fighting vehicle parked outside the station. The soldiers, who were being held in a nearby building, were eventually freed.

Although some local officials, including Basra’s police chief, publicly condemned the action, local residents privately said they were grateful, and described what they said was an organization widely feared for its brutality.

“They are like savage dogs that bite when they are hungry,” said one resident, who spoke anonymously for fear of retribution. “Their evaluation of guilt or innocence is how much money you can pay.”

Residents said that people were afraid to challenge the officers because they were backed by powerful militia groups, including the Mahdi Army, which is led by the rebel cleric Moktada al-Sadr, though the extent of his control is unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0108686

"Everyone wants to avoid the mouth of the lion," one resident said. "From this, they became stronger and stronger."

Major Burbridge said that the dismantling of the serious crimes unit had been planned for months.

As far back as 2004, he said, there was a growing realization that the police had been widely infiltrated by members of various militias and elements of organized crime. To combat their influence, the British have been trying to cull them from the forces in a campaign that began in September.

After trying to determine who was fit to serve in the police, the British began outfitting trusted officers with sophisticated identification cards meant to limit the access of impostors to police intelligence, weapons and vehicles.

In late October, gunmen — believed by the British to have been connected to the serious crimes unit — ambushed a minibus carrying 17 employees of a new police academy and killed them all. Their mutilated remains were dumped in the Shuaiba area of the city in an effort to intimidate the local population.

"It had simply gone beyond the pale and it was clear it was time for the serious crimes unit to go," Major Burbridge said in an interview.

While they had planned to take over the station on Monday, British forces had to speed up the operation by several hours. "We received information late last night," Major Burbridge said Monday, "that the crimes unit was aware this was going to take place and we received information that the prisoners' lives were in danger."

More than 800 British soldiers, supported by five Challenger tanks and roughly 40 Warrior fighting vehicles, began their assault at 2 a.m. on Monday. They were aided by 600 Iraqi soldiers.

The British force faced the heaviest fighting as it made its way through the city, coming under sporadic attacks by rocket-propelled grenades and small-arms fire. Of the seven guerrillas killed, six were gunned down as the unit made its way to the police station.

Upon reaching the station, British troops killed a guard in a watchtower who had fired on the approaching forces, but there was little other resistance.

The members of the serious crimes unit who had been occupying the building, several dozen, according to the British military, fled and were not caught. The British forces turned over the prisoners to the regular Iraqi police, who put them in a new detention facility.

The two-story building, once used by Saddam Hussein's security forces, was then demolished, in an attempt to remove all traces of the serious crimes unit, Major Burbridge said.

The battle lasted nearly three hours. There were no British casualties, but the streets around the station were littered with bombed-out cars and rubble.

The violence in Basra, Iraq's second largest city, is different from that in Baghdad to the north or Anbar Province to the west, Major Burbridge said.

The killing in Baghdad in recent months has primarily been the result of sectarian violence, as Shiites have sought to drive Sunnis from mixed neighborhoods and Sunnis have retaliated. On Monday, at least 10 civilians were killed and 15 were wounded when a car bomb exploded in the mixed neighborhood of Jadida.

In northeastern Baghdad, a suicide bomber with explosives tied to his body blew himself up on a crowded bus, killing 2 people and wounding 20 others.

An American soldier also died Monday in Baghdad in a roadside bomb attack.

In Sunni-controlled Anbar Province, where the fighting is mainly between insurgents and American troops, two American soldiers were killed in fighting on Sunday.

In southern cities like Basra, dominated by Shiites, the fighting is a combination of battles between rival militias vying for power, warring tribes and organized crime, Major Burbridge said.

"In northern Basra, the fighting is mainly between three warring tribes," he said. "The death squads are typically related to political maneuvering and tribal gain. Then there are rogue elements of militias aiming attacks on the multinational forces. You throw all those elements into a melting pot and you get a picture of the complexity of what we are facing."

Hundreds Disappear Into The Black Hole Of The Kurdish Prison System In Iraq (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0108687

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

SULAIMANIYA, Iraq — The inmates began their strike with an angry call. "Allahu akbar!" they shouted, 120 voices joining in a cadence punctuated by whoops.

They thrust their arms between the metal bars and ripped away the curtains and plastic sheets covering the windows facing the prison courtyard. Their squinting faces were exposed to light.

Their Kurdish guards gathered, ready to control a prison break. There was no break. The inmates were able only to shove their bunks against the doors and barricade themselves in their cells. They settled into a day of issuing complaints.

They were not allowed the Koran, they said. Their rations were meager and often moldy. Sometimes the guards beat them, they said, and several inmates had disappeared. The entire inmate population had either been denied trials or had been held beyond the terms of their sentences, they said — lost in legal limbo in the Kurdish-controlled region of Iraq.

The prison strike here, on Dec. 4, ended when the local authorities agreed to transfer three unpopular guards and to allow copies of the Koran in the cells. But it exposed an intractable problem that has accompanied Kurdish cooperation with the United States in Iraq.

The Kurdish prison population has swelled to include at least several hundred suspected insurgents, and yet there is no legal system to sort out their fates. So the inmates wait, a population for which there is no plan.

The Kurdish government that holds the prisoners says they are dangerous, and points out that the population includes men who have attended terrorist or guerrilla training in Iraq or Afghanistan. But it also concedes to being stymied, with a small budget, limited prison space and little legal precedent to look back on.

"We have not had trials for them," said Brig. Sarkawt Hassan Jalal, the director of security in the Sulaimaniya region. "We have no counterterrorism law, and any law we would pass would not affect them because it would not be retroactive."

The problems reach back to before the American-led invasion, when northern Iraq was a Kurdish enclave out of Saddam Hussein's control.

At the time, the Kurds in northeastern Iraq were fighting Ansar al-Islam, a small insurgent and terrorist group that seized control of a slice of territory along the Iranian border in 2002.

The Kurds captured several prisoners and suspected terrorists, but had no clear idea what to do with them, other than to hold them in cells.

Several weeks after the war started in 2003, an attack by American special forces and Kurdish fighters pushed Ansar al-Islam off Kurdish turf. But the border with Iran had not been sealed before the attack. Most of the insurgents escaped.

In the years since, Ansar al-Islam's ideological war has spread throughout Sunni Arab regions of Iraq, becoming a far more dangerous insurgency. Kurdish jails have swelled with people accused of participating in it.

Many of the detained men exude menace. But others claim they are innocent. And Kurdish officials say they have a limited capacity to disentangle the groups.

Brig. Hassan Nouri, the Kurdish security official responsible for the prisons in northeastern Iraq, said the detainees are in a status resembling that of the American-held detainees in Guantánamo Bay. "We cannot let them go, and we will hold them as long as we have to," he said.

The population's size is unclear. In this prison run by the local security service on a Kurdish military base at Sulaimaniya's outskirts, 120 accused insurgents are held.

Hania Mufti, a researcher for Human Rights Watch who has investigated the prison conditions and the absence of due process for the inmates, said that about 2,500 people are being held by the security services of the two ruling Kurdish parties. She estimated that two-thirds of them are accused of participating in the insurgency.

Ms. Mufti said she has encouraged Kurdish political leaders to set up an independent commission to review each of the accused insurgents' cases.

"We're not saying, 'throw open the doors of the prisons,' " she said, but rather are suggesting that the Kurds create a means to examine the merits of each man's detention, and to determine why and whether each of them should be held and for how long, and under what conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0108688

Kurdish officials have not yet developed such a policy; the detainees are essentially warehoused. The strike in early December exposed the strains the unresolved status has placed on the Kurdish government and the inmates alike.

The four visible cells here, spaces of about 7 yards by 8 yards, each were packed with 30 men. The men shared a toilet on the floor outside the cells, in a hall. The group seethes. One inmate shouted at two journalists through the bars. "Stop your hatred toward Islam!" he said. "Otherwise we will kill you!"

Speaking from a law enforcement perspective, Mr. Jalal said the close quarters and evident anger had made many of the inmates more radical, and that the prison serves as an insurgents' nest.

The detainees themselves blame the Kurds. As the disruption began, one inmate who had been outside the cells to meet a family member was swiftly pushed into a guard bunkroom and left with two journalists.

The man, Yunis Ahmad, 34, of Kirkuk, said he had been held two years without being charged. He was briefly detained, he said, by the American military, and then turned over to the Kurds.

Behind him on the wall of the guard's room hung two pieces of heavy electric cable, a common tool for beatings.

Mr. Ahmad said that the Americans had treated him decently, interviewing him politely and giving him food and juice. But since being in Kurdish custody, he said, he had been tortured, including having a bed placed on him and then being nearly crushed with weights and having his arms almost pulled from his shoulder sockets by the guards.

"I promise you, if they pulled your arms like that, you will confess to being in Al Qaeda," he said.

He was an Islamic cleric, he said, and his brother was an insurgent. He said he did not know the reasons for his incarceration. "The people who are here don't know why they are here," he said.

Later, other prisoners spoke through their windows and cell doors.

One man, Ahmed Jamal, 24, said he was an Australian citizen and had been held without being charged since he was arrested by Kurdish authorities in Aug. 2004.

"They don't give us enough to drink," he said. "They don't give us medicine." He pointed to a middle-aged man who was moaning on a bunk, semi-conscious, and said that the authorities would not provide the man with medical treatment.

Mr. Jamal's own journey into custody appeared strange. Kurdish authorities said that Mr. Jamal came to Iraq to join the insurgency, a topic Mr. Jamal was evasive about.

He said he had flown to Baghdad in 2004 because he planned to drive into Jordan illegally, and was then arrested in Mosul by the Kurds. He could not fly directly to Jordan, he said, because the Jordanian government considered him a terrorist, which he said he was not.

Asked how he ended up in Mosul, which is not on the way to Jordan from Baghdad, he shrugged, and said, "My plans changed."

Andrew S. Todd, a senior spokesman for the Australian Department of Foreign Affairs, confirmed by telephone that Mr. Jamal is an Australian citizen. He added that he had been visited by consular officials, who have been discussing his circumstances with the Kurdish authorities. He declined to discuss the case further, citing diplomatic protocol.

Another inmate, Haqi Ismail Ibrahim, an Iraqi Arab who had trained with the Taliban in Afghanistan before the terrorist attacks in the United States in 2001, said he had been held without charges or a legal hearing for more than five years. (Mr. Ibrahim has been held since at least 2002, when he was previously interviewed by The New York Times.)

He said 10 to 15 other inmates have vanished, and that he feared they had been executed. "We asked the Red Cross to search for these people," he said through the bars. "But they do not know where they are."

One of the prisoners who Mr. Ibrahim said was now missing, Qais Ibrahim Khadir, was captured in 2002 after an assassination attempt against Barham Salih. Mr. Salih was then the prime minister of the eastern Kurdish enclave and is now a deputy prime minister of Iraq. Five Kurdish guards were killed in the attempt.

Mr. Salih later said he wanted to spare Mr. Khadir's life, as part of an example of official restraint and respect for life in a country that had endured unchecked state violence under Mr. Hussein. Other Kurdish officials, in interviews in 2002 and 2003, dismissed such notions as fancy, and said Mr. Khadir would be executed.

Mr. Khadir's fate has never been disclosed. Mr. Jalal and Mr. Nouri would say publicly only that he is no longer in his custody.

DOJ_NMG_0108689

The International Committee for the Red Cross has an office in Sulaimaniya. Its head of mission declined to comment about the prisoners' allegations, other than to say that the organization visits the prison and the inmates and is in contact with the Kurdish authorities.

The United States military said it was also not directly involved in these jails. "We just don't have that role in the Kurdish legal system," said Maj. Derrick W. Cheng, a spokesman for the Third Brigade, 25th Infantry Division. "We have security overwatch in the area, but we don't have an immediate or direct role in the prisons."

U.S. Military Death Toll In Iraq Exceeds Number Of Deaths In Sept. 11, 2001, Attacks (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Two more American soldiers were killed in Iraq, officials said Tuesday, pushing the U.S. military death toll to at least 2,974 — one more than the number killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The tragic milestone came with the deaths of the two soldiers Monday in a bomb explosion southwest of Baghdad, the military said.

The deaths — announced Tuesday — raised the number of troops killed to 2,974 since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes at least seven military civilians.

The Sept. 11, 2001, attacks claimed 2,973 victims in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania. Opponents of President Bush have criticized him for raising the attacks as a justification for the protracted fight in Iraq.

"The joint patrol was conducting security operations in order to stop terrorists from placing roadside bombs in the area," the military said in a statement on the latest deaths. "As they conducted their mission, a roadside bomb exploded near one of their vehicles."

Another soldier was wounded in the explosion, the military said.

On Monday, the U.S. command announced the deaths of two other soldiers and a Marine. It said one soldier died and two were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near a U.S. military vehicle in southern Baghdad on Monday. An American soldier and a Marine died Sunday from combat wounds suffered in Anbar province.

Prior to the deaths announced Tuesday, the AP count was 15 higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Friday at 10 a.m. ET. At least 2,377 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

The British military has reported 126 deaths; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; Denmark, six; El Salvador, five; Slovakia, four; Estonia, Netherlands, Thailand, two each; and Australia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Latvia, Romania, one death each.

On Monday, British soldiers backed by tanks raided a police station in the southern city of Basra, killing seven gunmen in an effort to stop renegade Iraqi officers from executing their prisoners, the British military said.

After the British stormed the Basra police station, they removed the prisoners, who showed evidence of torture, then evacuated the building before blowing it up.

The operation showed how closely aligned some police units are with militias and death squads — and the challenges coalition forces face as they transfer authority for security to Iraqis.

In Baghdad, police found 40 bodies, apparent victims of sectarian violence. A car bomb exploded beside a market and a suicide bomber struck a bus in separate attacks that killed 14 civilians and wounded at least 33.

In the Basra raid, the British set out to arrest officers with the station's serious crimes unit who were suspected of involvement with Shiite death squads. Seven members of the rogue police unit were apprehended three days ago in other raids, said a British spokeswoman, Royal Navy Lt. Jenny Saleh.

"We had intelligence to indicate that the serious crimes unit would execute its prisoners in the coming days, so we decided to intervene," Saleh said.

British troops were fired on as they approached the station and their return fire killed seven gunmen, said Maj. Charlie Burbridge, another British military spokesman.

DOJ_NMG_0108690

British and Iraqi forces transferred all 76 prisoners at the station to another facility in downtown Basra, he said. Some prisoners had "classic torture injuries" such as crushed hands and feet, cigarette and electrical burns and gunshot wounds in the knees, Burbridge said.

The British demolished the building in an effort to disband the unit. "We identified the serious crimes unit as, frankly, too far gone," Burbridge said. "We just had to get rid of it."

The unit's members, he alleged, were involved in tribal and political feuds in southern Iraq, which is mostly Shiite. They were not, he said, engaged in the kind of sectarian reprisal killings that have terrorized mixed neighborhoods of Baghdad.

Most of Britain's 7,200 troops in Iraq are based in the Basra area.

Mohammed al-Askari, a spokesman for Iraq's Defense Ministry, said the operation was coordinated with the Iraqi government. "Multinational forces got approval for this raid from this ministry and with participation of the Iraqi army," he said.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who is in charge of training Iraqi forces, said in Washington last week that efforts were underway to weed out Iraqi national police believed to be sympathetic to the militias.

Up to a quarter are thought to be aligned with the militias, which are engaged in sectarian violence.

The establishment of a viable Iraqi police force is vital to the U.S.-led coalition's goal of handing responsibility for security to Iraqis, so foreign troops can return home.

In another sign of lawlessness in Basra, gunmen on Monday robbed $740,000 from a bank about half a mile from the raided police station.

The car bomb in Baghdad, meanwhile, struck a mostly Shiite district to the east that attracts crowds of shoppers and laborers looking for work.

In another part of eastern Baghdad, a suicide bomber exploded in a minibus, killing three people and injuring 19, police said.

Another suicide bomber killed two policemen at a checkpoint at a university entrance in Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, a stronghold of the Sunni-dominated insurgency.

The deaths came a day after Iraq's interior minister said attacks targeting police had killed some 12,000 officers since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein.

Christians attended Christmas services in Baghdad and northern Iraq, home to most of Iraq's 800,000 Christians. Some in Baghdad stayed home, however, fearing violence.

Christians are on the fringes of the conflict, which mostly involves Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs — but they have been targeted by Islamic militants.

"I hope next year will bring good things and unite all Iraqis because there is no difference between Christians and Muslims," said Abu Fadi, a worshipper who does not use his Christian name because he fears for his safety. "May God bring relief from this."

In another sign of escalating diplomatic tensions between the U.S. and Iran, the White House said Monday that U.S. troops in Iraq detained at least two Iranians and released two others who had diplomatic immunity.

U.S. officials have charged that Iran provides training and other aid to Shiite militias in Iraq — including the equipment used to build roadside bombs. The Tehran regime says it only has political and religious links with Iraqi Shiites.

But Iran is believed to be expanding its shadowy role in Iraq, partly to counter U.S. influence in the region.

In Baghdad, a spokesman for Iraqi President Jalal Talabani confirmed that U.S. troops had detained two Iranians who were in Iraq at his invitation. "The president is unhappy about it," said Hiwa Osman, Talabani's media adviser.

He gave no further details, and the U.S. military said it had no comment.

"We suspect this event validates our claims about Iranian meddling, but we want to finish our investigation of the detained Iranians before characterizing their activities," White House spokesman Alex Conant said Monday. "We will be better able to explain what this means about the larger picture after we finish our investigation."

He said that a routine raid on suspected insurgents netted the Iranians. Two had diplomatic immunity and were released to the Iraqi government, which then released them to Iran, Conant said.

DOJ_NMG_0108691

Troop Push Is Personal For McCain (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

As the Iraq Study Group issued its long-awaited report on the war, declaring that the United States should not dispatch more troops, Sen. John McCain reacted with his long-held and contrary view: It will take more boots on the ground, or the nation faces "sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq."

Then the Arizona Republican discreetly flew to San Diego, where the next day, Dec. 8, he sat under a hot sun to watch a skinny 18-year-old in military-issue glasses graduate from boot camp and become a Marine. His son Jimmy.

John McCain's public certainty about Iraq masks a more private and potentially wrenching connection. If more troops go there, as McCain hopes they will, his youngest son could be one of them, taking his place in a line of family warriors that is one of the longest in U.S. history.

Sen.-elect James Webb (D-Va.) also has a son in the Marine Corps named Jimmy. On the campaign trail, Webb declined to talk about his son, who is in Iraq, but he wore Jimmy's boots as he called for American forces to come home.

McCain has not drawn any attention to his son and declined to be interviewed for this article.

A leading contender for the GOP presidential nomination, McCain has been one of the few and among the most vocal politicians pressing for more troops in Iraq. "We left Vietnam, it was over, we just had to heal the wounds of war. We leave this place . . . and they'll follow us home," he said on a news show recently. "So there's a great deal more at stake."

McCain's own father faced the anguish of sending a son to war. Adm. John McCain Jr., who commanded Pacific forces during the Vietnam War, ordered airstrikes on Hanoi even while his son, a Navy pilot, was imprisoned there after being shot down.

McCain was held captive for more than five years, repeatedly beaten and tortured. On more than one occasion, the North Vietnamese offered to release him as a propaganda move to shame his father. McCain, citing a prisoners' code of conduct requiring that POWs be released in order of capture, refused.

During McCain's imprisonment, his father, while privately collecting every scrap of information about his son that he could, "made an ironclad rule that no one would talk about his son around him," said Torie Clark, who was a staffer for the younger McCain and a Pentagon spokeswoman. "He wanted to make sure he made decisions based on what was right for U.S. forces . . . not what would be good or bad for his son.

"I'm not surprised that the current John McCain separates the private from the public."

In "Faith of My Fathers," the family memoir McCain wrote in 1999 with Mark Salter, his chief of staff, he recalls the prisoners' jubilation at the 1972 bombing of Hanoi, ordered by his father, that helped end the war. His thoughts foreshadowed his position on Iraq:

"The misery we had endured . . . was made all the worse by our fear that the United States was unprepared to do what was necessary to bring the war to a reasonably swift conclusion," the authors wrote.

"No one who goes to war believes once he is there that it is worth the terrible cost of war to fight it by half measures," they wrote. "War is too horrible a thing to drag out unnecessarily. It was a shameful waste to ask men to suffer and die, to persevere through awful afflictions and heartaches, for a cause that half the country didn't believe in and our leaders weren't committed to winning."

Those who know McCain say they are not surprised that his children would feel a call to duty -- his son Jack is a Naval Academy midshipmen -- and that the senator would not allow his paternal concerns to influence his thinking about how the war should be conducted.

"I get a feeling that he sometimes must think he's seeing an old movie being played back," said George "Bud" Day, who was McCain's cellmate in Hanoi and remains close to him now. "There's no doubt his kids have the McCain genes. That means they're going to war."

McCain's view of the war and his family history is born of "his sense of duty, that is so deeply ingrained . . . there were probably times that he felt a prisoner of it," said Robert Timberg, who has written a book about McCain and who, the senator has said, "knows more about me than I do."

DOJ_NMG_0108692

McCain has spoken publicly about Jimmy only once. In response to questions from Time magazine in June, as his son prepared for boot camp, he said, "I'm obviously very proud of my son, but also understandably a little nervous." After the interview, the magazine reported, McCain tried to get the story killed.

His reluctance to publicly discuss his thoughts about his son going to Iraq is a sign of decency, said Timberg, a fellow Annapolis graduate and Vietnam veteran. But there is another reason, common to fathers with sons in war.

"The last thing in the world he'd want to do," Timberg said, "is to anger the gods."

Jimmy McCain is an outgoing young man who told his fellow recruits that he had no ambition for politics, recalled Lance Cpl. Dominic Stam, 17, who served in a platoon with him for a time.

"On the very first day, I felt sorry for him because all the drill instructors already knew who he was," Stam said. Over three months of rigorous training, 80 of the 500 recruits quit. McCain "did really well" and "was a squad leader for a while," he said. "He started out as John McCain's son . . . and became Private McCain, just another Marine."

Stam said McCain signed up for the infantry. He reports to Camp Pendleton for more training in early January and could deploy by mid-2007. "He decided to choose one of the most dangerous jobs in the Marine Corps, and I respected him for it," Stam said. "He could have chosen something where he would be safe."

On graduation day, Stam scanned the military officers and family on the reviewing stand. There was John McCain, in suit and sunglasses.

"He sat there like a normal parent," Stam said. "He looked proud to me. I can't imagine a parent not being proud."

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling and research editor Alice Crites contributed to this report.

Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Despite Upbeat Details, Updates Paint a Picture of Failure

A year ago, President Bush announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around "eight pillars" of U.S. policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure.

But never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on.

The State Department continues every Wednesday to issue a 30-page public report that details exactly how the U.S. government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan. The report frames the data around Bush's storied eight pillars, which include such goals as "Defeat the Terrorists and Neutralize the Insurgents" (Pillar 1) and "Increase International Support for Iraq" (Pillar 7).

In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met.

The report is often upbeat as it presents some of the most minuscule factoids of the situation in Iraq. The Dec. 13 report noted that on Dec. 7, 40 sheikhs from across Diyala province met "to discuss ways to maintain peace and stability" and that on Dec. 9, U.S. soldiers discovered a factory for making improvised explosive devices in a house in Baqubah.

But the bottom-line graphs tell a story of failure. Under Pillar 5 ("Help Iraq Strengthen Its Economy") the reports show that week after week, the Iraqis cannot meet their goals for crude oil production. Another chart shows that efforts to build a 15-day supply of all refined products, such as diesel and gasoline, are woefully behind schedule, reaching a peak of a four-day supply.

Under Pillar 7, increasing international support, the trends are on the decline. The first report of the year showed that 28 countries, in addition to the United States, contributed 23,000 troops to coalition forces. By last week's report, the number of countries had fallen to 25 -- and the number of troops was down to 16,860, a decrease of more than 25 percent. Italy recently dropped off the list when the last of its troops departed.

One figure has not really budged: the $20 billion apportioned for rebuilding Iraq (under Pillar 4, "Help Iraq Build Government Capacity and Provide Essential Services"). That is because the administration ran out of money for rebuilding Iraq, in part because about 25 percent was diverted to security. The latest report says that all but $4 billion has been disbursed.

DOJ_NMG_0108693

A State Department official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to reporters about the report, said it still plays an important role because it provides the administration with a single set of numbers about the situation in Iraq. Previously, State and Defense department officials might have arrived at meetings armed with different data, but "now everyone is talking off the same sheet on music," he said.

There is also a classified version of the report, which includes details on counterterrorism operations, given to top policymakers on Fridays.

The report is prepared not by State Department officials but by a team of about 10 people hired by a management consulting firm. The firm, BearingPoint, has a $2 million contract to produce the report and to manage the process of running Iraq policy in the administration, the State Department official said.

Below the level of the top policymakers, working groups from across the government implement Iraq policy day by day. The BearingPoint employees, who work out of offices in the State Department, arrange the meetings, set the agendas, take notes and provide summaries of the discussions, the official said. They also maintain the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

The twists and turns of American policy are imperfectly reflected in the report. "Operation Together Forward," the effort this summer to bolster security in Baghdad, which was later deemed a disappointment, was the subject of several upbeat reports but then seemed to fade in importance. During the spike in violence in October, the report noted that the Iraqi Ministry of Interior had recalled a police brigade for more training after "possible complicity with sectarian violence," though it brightly added that the training "will improve the professionalism and confidence within the national police."

The report seemed uncertain how to treat the release of a report by the Iraq Study Group, the independent bipartisan panel that criticized the administration's policy and spurred the White House to come up with a new plan. The earliest mention of the study group's report, in the Dec. 13 edition, came under Pillar 3, "Help Iraqis to Forge a National Compact for Democratic Government."

The headline said it all: "Iraqi Leaders Blast Iraq Study Group's Report." The State Department, perhaps in an effort to demonstrate the unity of Iraqi leaders, then devoted a whole page to negative quotes about the panel's recommendations.

The Dec. 20 report featured one curious item. Under the rubric of increasing international support, the report highlighted a visit to Damascus, Syria, by Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). The senators "arrived in Syria December 19 to discuss how Damascus could help bring stability and security in Iraq," the report said, noting that another senator, Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in early December.

The State Department had strongly discouraged the trips, saying Syria is a key source of problems in Iraq.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DCX Probe Spans Globe (DETNEWS)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, December 26, 2006

Internal probe reveals bribes; ex-FBI chief hired as monitor

WASHINGTON -- DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation.

The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said.

The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department.

Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards. We take these matters very seriously," DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said. "We're still conducting our investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0108694

At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said.

Investigators traveled to 25 countries and interviewed dozens of people, including former DaimlerChrysler Chairman Juergen Schrempp and other executives, the people said. Investigators also uncovered evidence of secret bank accounts.

This fall, DaimlerChrysler hired Freeh as a consultant to monitor the company's compliance with anti-bribery regulations and to review its internal investigation. Freeh's hiring hasn't been announced publicly.

Efforts by The News to reach Freeh, who works as a consultant to companies facing legal issues, were unsuccessful.

DaimlerChrysler has been regularly debriefing the SEC and Justice Department on the findings of its investigation and has turned over interview summaries and documents.

The bribes were seen by some company officials as an accepted way of doing business in many countries, according to people familiar with the investigation. In some cases, the amount of bribes was based on how many Mercedes vehicles were sold in a given market, the people said. In certain instances, investigators struggled to follow the money trail because intermediaries were used.

While DaimlerChrysler's internal probe is nearing completion, federal officials aren't expected to complete their investigations until 2007. Serious settlement discussions aren't expected until early next year.

Aiming to minimize penalties

DaimlerChrysler is clearly aiming to minimize any fines or sanctions by hiring Freeh as an internal monitor and providing federal investigators with the findings of the exhaustive internal investigation.

DaimlerChrysler, which is based in Stuttgart, Germany, and controls the Auburn Hills-based Chrysler Group, could face charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1977 law designed to prevent U.S. companies from acting unethically abroad, because its stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

German companies could deduct certain types of bribes on their taxes until the late 1990s.

German prosecutors in Stuttgart also are investigating whether the company violated anti-bribery and disclosure laws.

In March, DaimlerChrysler revealed in its annual report that an undisclosed number of executives have been disciplined or fired as a result of the investigation and admitted that "improper payments" were made in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

The company reduced 2005 net income by $84.5 million and 2005 operating profit by $21 million to account for the improper payments. It also faces the prospect of having to pay back taxes. Still unclear is how much senior executives knew of the arrangements.

No U.S.-based employees are believed to be involved.

Whistle-blower cases settled

On Dec. 6, the company settled the last of two 2004 whistle-blower suits filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that prompted the probe. Christine Holtzmann had alleged the company ignored reports of accounting fraud and mishandled audits. She said she was fired in December 2003 after an 18-year career with the automaker after speaking up about the fraud.

In July 2005, DaimlerChrysler settled a 2004 wrongful-firing suit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit by former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta.

Bazzetta claimed he was fired in January 2004 in part because he talked to superiors about as many as 40 secret bank accounts maintained by the Mercedes unit to bribe foreign government officials.

He said in his lawsuit he learned of the bank accounts during a corporate audit committee meeting in July 2001 in Stuttgart. According to court filings, Bazzetta claimed a vice president of corporate audit, Hubertus Buderath, told a group "a common practice of Daimler Benz was the use of secret bank accounts to bribe government officials." Buderath allegedly told then-chairman Schrempp that 40 of those accounts still existed and "were buried deep in (the company's) balance sheet." Schrempp denied knowledge of any accounts.

SEC lawyers interviewed Bazzetta and Holtzmann.

Point man is powerful lawyer

DOJ_NMG_0108695

The point man for DaimlerChrysler in the internal investigation is Bennett, a high-powered attorney who has represented Enron and KPMG in corporate scandals. He was President Clinton's personal attorney in the Paula Jones civil case and is a partner in Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Bennett declined to comment.

Skadden partner Colleen Mahoney, a former deputy director of enforcement at the SEC, who is also involved in the DaimlerChrysler internal investigation, could not be reached. Two other Skadden Arps partners, former assistant U.S. attorney Gary DiBianco and Mitchell Ettinger, a former chief prosecutor for the Air Force, also have been involved in the probe.

Mark F. Mendelsohn, deputy chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, and Frederic D. Firestone, an SEC associate director of enforcement, who are overseeing the government's investigations into DaimlerChrysler, also declined to comment.

Numerous German companies have faced bribery investigations -- Volkswagen AG for allegedly bribing union officials and most recently engineering giant Siemens AG for allegedly bribing customers using secret bank accounts.

Experts said the government's focus on DaimlerChrysler may be to send a message to the world's third-largest economy to take bribery more seriously.

"The U.S. government really wants to encourage the Germans to crack down," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State University law professor and former SEC attorney. "It's the principle here. The amounts are usually never that large. It's surprisingly cheap to bribe public officials in the Third World."

The SEC has ramped up enforcement of its anti-bribery laws recently, filing more than 100 cases in 2006.

You can reach David Shepardson at (202) 662-8735 or dshepardson@detnews.com.

Report: Ex-FBI Boss Aids DaimlerChrysler (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP) -- Former FBI Director Louis Freeh is aiding DaimlerChrysler AG in its internal investigation of bribery allegations involving company employees, a newspaper reported Tuesday.

The Detroit News quoted unidentified sources as saying that the German-American company hired Freeh in the fall.

Freeh is a member of the Gavel Group, which consists of former federal judges "who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations," according to the group's Web site.

An e-mail message seeking comment from Freeh was left with the Gavel Group before business hours Tuesday.

A DaimlerChrysler spokesman declined comment.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards," Han Tjan told the newspaper.

DaimlerChrysler has acknowledged a U.S. Justice Department probe of allegations the company bribed foreign officials with the knowledge of senior executives.

Last year, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

Ex-Trader Tells Story As A Warning (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

GALWAY, Ireland — As an unsupervised young chief trader in Singapore in 1995, Nicholas W. Leeson lost $1.3 billion in frenzied trades in Japanese stock futures and bonds, destroying his employer, the 233-year-old Barings Bank, which had Queen Elizabeth as a customer.

Now, Mr. Leeson, having served four years in prison and survived a bout with colon cancer, has managed to turn those money-losing bets into a money-making enterprise — warning bankers of their continuing vulnerability to rogue traders.

The paradox is that he is earning a very good living from a notorious past, getting £5,000 ($9,800) a speech.

In November, he spoke at an annual dinner of financial regulators in London's financial district and then headed to Amsterdam for a speech to a large firm of auditors. The previous month, he gave a presentation at a Dublin function on banking scandals, arguing that he should have been stopped by Barings at an early stage. The British bank, he says, was culpable for failing to supervise him and for accepting the bluster of a young trader who was prepared to disguise his trading losses.

DOJ_NMG_0108696

Mr. Leeson, now 39, has recently been freed from an agreement in which he surrendered some of his earnings to the liquidators of Barings, which was sold to ING of the Netherlands. For over a decade, the liquidators had sought to recover money for creditors of the ruined bank.

Seated in a coffeehouse close to the Galway seashore, he still looks every bit the chief trader, dressed in pinstripes.

"I suppose it embodies more where I am now in life and the changes I have been through in the last 15 to 20 years," he said about his new start in the west of Ireland. "Life is a little bit more slow-paced, but there is a quality of life which was possibly missing when I was in Singapore, when it was all about succeeding. I am more happy now."

He spoke of his new day job as general manager of Galway's soccer club, in which he is responsible for everything from shirt sponsorship to planning for a potential redevelopment of the club's stadium. "There's a sea change in the way the club is run today," he said in a softened London accent. His new home, with its large college student population and prosperous computer and tourism industries, has a reputation as Ireland's summertime party town.

Mr. Leeson, who grew up north of London in a working-class family, left school at 18 but managed to land a job in London's financial district in 1985, when the economy was booming. He joined Barings in 1989 as a back-office clerk but did well enough that he was offered a job in Singapore.

He continued to advance, landing a trading job. His successes led to a salary and bonus that was reportedly more than $1 million a year in the early half of the 1990s. But at some point, Mr. Leeson began taking what amounted to a gamble on the direction of Japanese stock prices and interest rates — a gamble that began to go wrong early in 1995.

By the end of February, Barings had collapsed under the weight of more than $1 billion in losses. In December, Mr. Leeson pleaded guilty to two criminal charges that he had illegally covered up his trading losses and was sentenced in Singapore to six and a half years in prison.

But after serving a little over half that prison sentence, he was released in 1999, and offers began to flood in. He did a string of television commercials, including one for a Swedish stock brokerage firm, and was paid $100,000 for an appearance before an audience of Dutch bankers and brokers. "Half went to the liquidators, half to me," he said the other day.

He also wrote a book, "Rogue Trader," while in prison that was later turned into a movie.

He said he believed he had picked the opportunities wisely. "It's one of the things I have done reasonably well since I have been released," he said. "I don't do everything that is offered me."

He is still in touch with some former colleagues in Singapore but is banned from returning to the country. He laughs when asked about his slim prospects of ever working for a bank again.

He mentioned that he still trades currencies — mostly the dollar against the British pound and the euro — through an account at an online brokerage firm. This time, he says, he feels confident in his trading decisions, contending that he was "ill-disposed" to knowing his limitations 11 years ago.

Speaking in mid-November, he confidently predicted that the dollar had further to fall against the pound and euro.

"If I am risking my money it should be O.K.," he said. "If I were employed by a bank, it would be a different matter."

When reminded that the anniversaries of the Barings collapse coincide with his birthday, he replied: "It is one of those quirks of fate. It does not mean a lot other than I am a year older."

He added, "The positive is that it is a further year on" from the events that made his name synonymous with "rogue trader."

Exxon Damages For Valdez Spill Are Cut In Half (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

A federal appeals court cut in half a $5 billion jury award for punitive damages against Exxon Mobil Corp. in the 1989 Valdez oil spill that affected about 1,500 miles of Alaskan coastline.

DOJ_NMG_0108697

The case, one of the nation's longest-running, noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the punitive damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were harmed when the Valdez oil tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil.

It is the third time the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive considering U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

This time, in its 2-1 decision, the court ordered a specific amount in damages, while its previous rulings demanded a lower court to come up with its own figures. "It is time for this protracted litigation to end," Chief Judge Mary Schroeder and Judge Andrew Kleinfeld wrote.

U.S. District Judge H. Russel Holland of Anchorage begrudgingly complied in 2002, reducing damages to $4 billion. Exxon, Irving, Texas, again appealed.

The following year, the appeals court ordered Judge Holland to revisit his decision, this time balancing it against a new 2003 Supreme Court ruling that said punitive damages usually couldn't be more than nine times general damages. The Anchorage jury awarded $287 million in general damages and issued punitive damages that were 17 times that amount.

Judge Holland, appointed by President Reagan in 1984, declared Exxon's conduct "reprehensible" and set the figure at $4.5 billion plus interest, ruling that the Supreme Court's precedent didn't directly apply to the case.

Exxon again appealed, and argued it should have to pay no more than $25 million in punitive damages. Exxon spokesman Dave Gardner criticized the appeals-court decision. "The facts of this case do not warrant an award this size," he said. He didn't say whether the company would appeal the decision.

David Oesting, the lead lawyer from Anchorage representing the plaintiffs, said he was considering whether to ask the court to rehear the case with 15 judges or to go to the Supreme Court.

Lots Of Cheer From R.I.M., But No News On Options (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, December 25, 2006

OTTAWA, Dec. 24 — James L. Balsillie, the chairman and co-chief executive of Research In Motion, offered plenty of cheery news during an investor conference call last week: quarterly profit up 47 percent from the same period a year ago and a sales increase of 49 percent, largely based on the company's successful move into the consumer market.

On another issue, Mr. Balsillie had no comment: the review of R.I.M.'s stock options grants being undertaken by the independent board directors. The lack of information follows a pattern at R.I.M., the Canadian company that created the BlackBerry and made it a global brand. Ever since late September, when R.I.M. said it had started the review, the company has offered investors and regulators few details, making it difficult to assess its potential impact or full extent.

An eight-page letter it submitted at the beginning of last week for an Ontario Securities Commission hearing only added to the uncertainty. It indicated that the review was "proceeding more slowly than anticipated" and that various complications "substantially increase" the $25 million to $45 million in restatements the company initially anticipated.

The lack of information is baffling to investors, particularly at a time when the company's stock on the Nasdaq has climbed to $130 on Friday, from $81.93 at the beginning of September.

"If I were a portfolio manager, I would have a hard time figuring out how significant this issue is," said Henry T. C. Hu, a professor of corporate and securities law at the University of Texas in Austin.

"I can't figure out what the best case is," he said. " 'Substantially increase,' does that mean we ought to apply a multiple of 2 or a higher multiple? All we know is that there are enough zeros that they're using the word substantially."

R.I.M. has yet to disclose the nature of the problems with its options-granting policies, including whether the company backdated some options to allow employees and executives to purchase stock at lower prices. Nor is it clear if the options situation directly involves Mr. Balsillie or Michael Lazaridis, the company's president and other co-chief executive.

And at least one small Canadian institutional investor, the Ironworkers Ontario Pension Fund, through a lawyer who specializes in securities-related class-action lawsuits, is raising questions about the wisdom of having the review supervised by directors who themselves benefited from R.I.M. stock options.

DOJ_NMG_0108698

R.I.M. is one of many companies facing questions over their options practices. The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating at least 120 companies, including Apple Computer, UnitedHealth Group and dozens of technology companies, for possible stock-options manipulation, and the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews.

For the moment, however, the uncertainties at R.I.M. appear to have been swept aside in most investors' and analysts' minds by R.I.M.'s overwhelming dominance of the wireless e-mail market for business users and by the immediate, and surprisingly strong, success of its first BlackBerry built for consumers, the Pearl.

This much is known about the situation: four independent directors on R.I.M.'s audit committee, assisted by outside lawyers and accountants, are examining about 3,200 stock options given to about 2,000 employees that date back at least 10 years. The company began trading publicly in 1997.

Searches of the company's computer system, its data backup and something the company calls "forensic imaging" have produced about 650,000 documents related to the options. The delay in the investigation, the company said in its letter, largely comes from the fact that the audit committee is dealing with 250,000 more documents than it originally expected.

What remains unclear is why the company now expects to make a larger-than-expected financial restatement. In its filings, R.I.M. has said only that "certain accounting errors" understated noncash charges from the options and effectively inflated earnings. Exactly what those noncash items are is not known.

Since starting the investigation, the committee has found an "additional error" in accounting that substantially understated the options-related charges.

On Friday, the day after Mr. Balsillie's conference call, Peter Misek, a technology analyst with Canaccord Adams in Toronto, appeared on Report on Business Television, a Canadian cable channel. Like many other analysts, he was effusive about R.I.M.'s results and the company's potential, particularly in the consumer market.

"They were blow-out results," Mr. Misek told viewers. "This is a table pounder for us. You've got to own the stock."

During a subsequent interview, Mr. Misek, whose firm trades R.I.M. shares on behalf of clients but has no holdings or dealings with the company, acknowledged that the uncertainty surrounding the options review made him uneasy.

"I'm not going to deny that I'm nervous," Mr. Misek said, "but I'm going to continue to believe that this was a past issue that was unfortunate. And, I think in the end management will do the right thing."

Mr. Misek estimates that the restatement is in the range of $100 million, although he acknowledged that the figure is a guess. Mr. Misek does not believe that options were adjusted to improperly benefit employees. Instead, he believes that the review will find that bookkeeping systems at the company failed to keep pace with the rapid growth at R.I.M. that followed the introduction of the BlackBerry in January 1999.

But Mr. Misek's anxiety goes beyond the potential amount of the financial restatement. R.I.M.'s success can largely be traced to both Mr. Balsillie and Mr. Lazaridis. Anything that jeopardized their positions within the company would most likely depress R.I.M.'s stock.

Mr. Lazaridis's engineering skills are widely admired. His innovations include obvious features such as the BlackBerry's thumb-operated keyboard, as well as critical technical innovations in the device's radio system, electronics and, above all, the software it uses to route e-mail messages.

It was Mr. Balsillie's aggressive enthusiasm for the BlackBerry that first persuaded major wireless service providers in the United States and Europe to offer an untried product and service from an obscure maker of wireless modems in Canada.

Having known Mr. Balsillie and Mr. Lazaridis for more than six years, Mr. Misek said he did not believe that they would have acted improperly for personal gain.

"I have no love for any executive, but I don't see it in this case," said Mr. Misek, who is an accountant by training. "Mike's not motivated by money," he added, referring to Mr. Lazaridis.

R.I.M. and its directors have consistently declined to discuss the review. But in its letter to the Ontario regulator, the company argued that the amount of information it is providing "is more detailed and informative than the information provided by comparable companies in the United States in similar circumstances."

DOJ_NMG_0108699

During the conference call, Mr. Balsillie spoke at length about the Pearl, which is the first BlackBerry with multimedia capabilities, saying it is just the beginning of a range of new products and services from R.I.M. And while he was talking about new technologies, Mr. Balsillie made a comment that might also apply to the options review.

"Those of you that follow us closely, I would argue that if you really paid attention to us and you are a real expert, you might have a sense of 20 percent of what's really going on," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Why L.A. Jail Cells Have Revolving Doors (LAT)

By Megan Garvey And Jack Leonard, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

A strained justice system and a flawed rehab law feed the cycle of repeat offenders.

Bertha Cuestas was standing outside her Highland Park apartment scratching off an instant lottery ticket when veteran Los Angeles Police Department Officers J.C. Duarte and Harold Marinelli spotted the 50-year-old from their patrol car.

They had been arresting Cuestas for prostitution and drugs since their days on the vice squad in the mid-1990s. On this warm October afternoon, she was wanted for failing to report to the judge in her most recent drug case.

"Why didn't you go to court?" Duarte asked her.

"I was busy," she replied.

Cuestas knew the drill. She asked a friend for money, then stuffed the $7.42 he gave her into her bra for the bus ride home when she got out of jail.

"How many times have you guys done this with her?" her son asked, cradling his infant daughter in his arm.

"Too many times," Marinelli said.

It was the start of a typical week for Duarte and Marinelli. Like other patrol officers throughout Los Angeles County, the longtime partners are spending more and more time picking up old regulars like Cuestas.

A Times investigation has found that thieves, drug offenders and other repeat criminals are cycling in and out of jail faster than ever.

Since 2000, the number of people booked two or more times into jails in Los Angeles County in a single year has jumped 73%, reaching 61,646 last year, according to a Times analysis. Repeat offenders now account for 42% of bookings, up from 26% in 2000.

Once booked, defendants enter a justice system whose resources have not kept pace with demand, even as crime has dropped in recent years.

There are not enough prosecutors to try them. There are not enough courts to sentence them. There are not enough jail or prison beds to house them. And there is not enough treatment to help them.

Instead, repeat offenders drain limited justice resources and are quickly back on the streets to get arrested again, taking up the time of police, prosecutors, public defenders and judges. Patrol cops are frustrated. Victims feel forgotten.

"Under any other definition of crisis, this would be an emergency," said Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca, who runs the nation's largest network of jails. "The system is collapsing because of its volume."

A solution, top law enforcement officials say, would require far more money than lawmakers have been willing to commit.

"We didn't cure malaria until we started draining the swamps instead of just swatting at the mosquitoes," said Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton. "The resources have just not been committed to draining the swamps."

A week on the beat

To gauge the effects of the revolving door, The Times examined jail bookings since 2000. Reporters interviewed prosecutors, judges, defense attorneys, law enforcement leaders and criminologists.

The paper also spent a week in October with officers in the LAPD's Northeast Division, a 29-square-mile collection of affluent and poor neighborhoods that runs from Eagle Rock to eastern Hollywood.

DOJ_NMG_0108700

Police that week made 28 adult felony arrests, on typical charges for the division's patrol officers, mostly drug offenses, thefts and domestic violence. Within six weeks of their arrests, 12 had cycled through the court system, were found guilty and were back on the streets. Three others arrested on warrants were released by judges within days.

Of those 15, three have already been rearrested and are back in jail.

"We get so many repeaters it's ridiculous," Officer Duarte said. "They do a few days and then they're back out again."

Duarte and Marinelli had a hand in five arrests that week, all involving repeat offenders. Together, the five had at least 106 previous arrests and 61 convictions. Cuestas alone had been arrested 21 times, most recently in July.

Cuestas had been ordered to enter rehab in August under Proposition 36, the 2000 state initiative that mandates treatment rather than incarceration for most nonviolent drug offenders. She never went, leading to the warrant.

She is among thousands who have failed to complete treatment. Although nearly 8,000 people in the county successfully completed Proposition 36 rehab between July 2001 and June 2005, they are the minority. UCLA researchers found that about 75% of those sentenced to treatment opted out, never showed up or stopped going.

Duarte and Marinelli believe the initiative gives longtime, chronic users like Cuestas too many chances to reoffend, with little consequence.

"We need to let the courts know Prop. 36 is not working for a lot of people," Duarte said.

A parolee is arrested

A day after they arrested Cuestas, Marinelli and Duarte were called in to help with a search. Rodolfo Salcido, 35, had been pulled over driving a stolen 1991 Toyota Camry. Before police could detain him, he fled, jumping over a picket fence in a Cypress Park neighborhood.

Police found Salcido crammed into an attic crawl space in the laundry room of a nearby apartment building.

"All right, officers, I'm coming out," he told them. He was on parole for stealing another car. Sweat poured from his shaved head and tattooed torso.

Salcido had spent the last seven years in and out of prison, never in for more than a year or out for more than nine months. In 1999, he was convicted of stealing a $4,000 LAPD radio from an unmarked police car. Soon after, he went to prison in another burglary case, the first of four prison terms.

In his wake, he left victims like Emma Sanchez, a mother of two and owner of the stolen Camry. Sanchez is one of more than 23,000 people whose cars were stolen in the city this year. She said it took her more than six months, working for minimum wage as a lunch-truck driver, to save $2,500 to buy the car.

She said she paid about $220 to the city to get her car out of the impound lot. Her prized $400 stereo was gone.

The Camry smelled of stale beer and cigarettes.

She feels uneasy behind the wheel, as though the car is no longer hers.

"They say once a car is stolen, it's not good anymore," Sanchez said. "I don't even like driving in it. It's not the same anymore. It feels like it was violated."

'Don't I know you?'

A few hours after Salcido's arrest, Duarte and Marinelli were on a new case. The division's detectives received a tip that Orlando Gallegos, 34, a burglary suspect also wanted for failing to report for his parole, was living at a dingy Highland Park hotel.

In the late afternoon, the officers pounded on his door. They found him in his narrow room, several baggies of heroin in the freezer, stolen credit cards on the dresser and two convicted criminals as company.

In the dim hallway, the suspects knelt, handcuffed and facing the wall. Gallegos caught the eye of Marinelli.

"Don't I know you?" Marinelli asked him. "You look familiar to me."

A check of Gallegos' rap sheet jogged Marinelli's memory. Three years earlier, Gallegos had led him on a brief high-speed chase in a stolen car.

"I knew I knew you," said Marinelli, shaking his head.

Gallegos told police he'd found the credit cards in a trashcan.

Police first arrested Gallegos when he was 18 for possession of a small amount of marijuana. Five years later, he was arrested and convicted of vandalism.

DOJ_NMG_0108701

In 1999, he was convicted of domestic violence. A burglary conviction in 2000 led to prison time after he violated probation. Two years later, when Marinelli caught him driving a stolen car, he was sent back to prison.

Gallegos' convictions, though frequent, never met the threshold of a strike under California's three-strikes law, which increases sentences for repeat offenders convicted of more serious or violent crimes. And so he cycled rapidly in and out of jail and prison.

One of the men in the hotel room, Evaristo Torres, 31, was furious at the arrival of police. He said he'd only come by to find someone to "smoke some weed with, get a beer with." He told officers he didn't even know the names of the other men.

Gilbert Morales, 46, told police he was on parole for drunk driving and on probation for drug possession. In the cinderblock holding cells of the Northeast Division, an officer searched him.

The officer pulled a tiny baggie filled with what looked like rock cocaine from Morales' small front jeans pocket. Another bag held what appeared to be a balloon of heroin and powder cocaine.

"Am I going to find anything else?" the officer asked. "You might as well tell me because I'm going to find it."

"No, nothing," Morales said.

The officer pulled another tiny bag from one of Morales' socks: methamphetamine and a single tablet of Tylenol.

It was his 47th arrest. Over the years, he'd had 24 convictions, seven for felonies. This was his third arrest this year.

After nightfall, Marinelli and Duarte helped drive Gallegos, Morales and Torres to the city's downtown jail in Parker Center.

There, Morales said he believed he could stop using drugs, if he could get the right help.

"I did good for a while when I had residential treatment. Maybe if I can get that again," he said.

His friend Gallegos needed medical evaluation for an old head injury. A nurse asked if he was on any medication.

"Dylantin for seizures," he said. She gave him his dose for the day.

Was he on any drugs or alcohol? He shook his head no.

"He got interrupted," Marinelli said.

Some deals are made

Duarte and Marinelli doubted that the five suspects they helped arrest would serve much time. They were right. Four were back on the streets within three weeks.

Cuestas, the drug abuser whose son watched her arrest, spent six days in jail before a judge released her on probation.

On Dec. 7, she failed to show up for a court hearing to decide whether her probation should be revoked. A judge issued a new arrest warrant.

Twelve days after his arrest for car theft, Rodolfo Salcido shuffled into Department 50 of the downtown Los Angeles criminal courthouse. His previous convictions — for robbery, burglary and car theft, among other crimes — meant that he faced up to 13 years in prison. Because his 1995 robbery is considered a strike under the three-strikes law, he would have to serve 80% of the time.

But prosecutors and Judge David M. Horwitz agreed on a three-year prison sentence in return for a guilty plea. As part of the deal, the judge did not consider Salcido's robbery conviction. With credit for good behavior, he is likely to serve only half his sentence.

It did not take long to resolve the drug arrests of the three men in Orlando Gallegos' Highland Park hotel room.

Torres sat in jail for five days until he appeared in court and promised to pay the fine he owed on his previous drug case. When he did so three weeks later, the case was dismissed.

Less than three weeks after their arrests, Gallegos and Morales each pleaded guilty to drug possession. Probation officers recommended prison for Morales, noting that he had already been sentenced under Proposition 36 and "has either been unable or unwilling to rehabilitate."

But Proposition 36 required that both men be sentenced to treatment. In drug court, Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Maria E. Stratton read aloud a long list of probation conditions.

"If you mess up — and you might mess up — come to court," she told them. "Don't just blow it off. I'd hate to have the police sent out to find you."

That afternoon, the friends left the criminal courthouse together as free men. It had been 19 days since their arrests.

DOJ_NMG_0108702

On Dec. 1, Gallegos rode a bus to the downtown criminal courthouse to check in with Stratton. He had yet to enroll in treatment or attend 12-step meetings. She told him to come back in January with more to show for himself.

His friend Morales was due in court the same day. But there was no answer when Stratton called his name. The judge issued a warrant for his arrest.

A vicious cycle

The county's top law enforcement officials concede that local justice often appears at odds with itself. The number of arrests by county police agencies has risen sharply since 2000. Yet budget cuts have reduced the number of prosecutors available to handle their cases.

The county's courts have not added a single judge to hear criminal cases in more than a decade. Overwhelmed, judges are increasingly relying on special courts where defendants are offered more generous deals in return for quick guilty pleas.

The available room for offenders in jail has also shrunk, due to financial woes and federal court limits on overcrowding. Most offenders sentenced to jail are released well before they complete their sentences. Since 2002, more than 16,000 inmates have been rearrested during time they would still have been in jail if not for early release.

Low-level offenders with enough felony convictions eventually get sent to state prison. But they too cycle in and out. More than half are back in prison within two years of their release.

Beyond jail and prison walls, the state has committed $120 million each year to Proposition 36 — an expense that researchers note has saved millions more on incarceration costs. But a shortage of funds for treatment programs has created waiting lists for residential rehab beds, increasing the chance participants in the program will relapse while awaiting treatment.

Baca blames state lawmakers for concentrating their efforts on enacting laws that increase prison terms for the worst offenders, such as murderers, rapists and other violent criminals. Those laws, he said, fail to deal with drug abuse that plagues lower-level offenders, who commit the bulk of crimes.

"All of these extraordinary laws only work for the worst of the worst," Baca said. For the common offender, he said, they are "not a deterrent."

'We need help'

Even criminals say the system is failing.

On a recent Saturday, Salcido walked into the visiting area of the county's Pitchess Detention Center in Castaic. He was still awaiting transport to prison on his car-theft conviction. Salcido worried his children would read about him. But he began speaking about his drug problems. When he was caught, he said, he'd been on a three-week methamphetamine bender.

"Why do you think these crimes are committed — because I like committing crimes?" he asked. "I've done [prison]. What's the point? Obviously, it's not helping me. Can't they put two and two together? Why not say, 'Here's 18 months in a live-in program?' "

Salcido said he'd attended AA meetings in prison but needed more help. After leaving prison in January, he said, he stayed off drugs for months. Then he was ordered to make child-support payments that took nearly half his $400-a-week construction job wages.

"Instead of drinking a couple of beers, you start doing a couple of lines. Stop coming home. Stop going to work. You're going to lose your job," he said.

"It's always prison, prison, prison. It just corrupts you more," he said, his voice angry and frustrated. "We need help. We're sick. It shouldn't just be back to prison."

Out of jail after his latest arrest, Orlando Gallegos was struggling to rebuild his life.

During the three weeks he was incarcerated, he lost his job servicing old refrigerators. The manager of the hotel where he'd been living threatened to evict him. He had no rent money.

Three weeks after his release, Gallegos said he needed a steady job to stay out of trouble. But his criminal history along with the seizures he suffers make it difficult for him to find work.

"I can't get a job so I find different ways of trying to make my money. When I don't have no work, sometimes I have to steal for it," said Gallegos, who spoke slowly and sometimes struggled to articulate his thoughts. "A car — if I see a window open, I might see what's in it or I might go into a store and steal whatever I can steal. Like, if there's a bike laying out in front of the yard, I might take it…. I do these little [crimes] that I know I'm not going to go to prison for the rest of my life."

DOJ_NMG_0108703

For now, he said, he was managing to stay clear of heroin and wanted to find work again.

"I like being — how do you say? — stable … taking care of myself, you know. Paying my bills, you know. That felt good, you know, paying my rent every month. And to buy something. I don't have to go steal for it," he said.

Marinelli and Duarte, who have been partners for 18 years, said they've seen too few people turn their lives around.

"A lot of these guys could change if they really wanted to, but the problem is that it's too hard," Duarte said. "Too hard once you've got a felony record — to get a decent job or to make ends meet. And especially if you've got a drug problem, then forget it. All bets are off."

But both officers said their sympathies lie with victims.

"They get outraged," Marinelli said. "'What? He's already out?' Or they'll call us and say, 'Hey! The guy you arrested yesterday for vandalizing my wall is standing right in front of my house right now!' They don't understand the system."

Postscript:

On Dec. 18, Gilbert Morales was arrested again by LAPD officers and is facing new drug possession charges. Bertha Cuestas was arrested Dec. 20 for failing to appear in court. Rodolfo Salcido is awaiting transportation to state prison. Orlando Gallegos said he planned to enter treatment next month. Evaristo Torres lost his job while in jail. He said he is struggling financially and emotionally but has not had new trouble with the law.

megan.garvey@latimes.com

jack.leonard@latimes.com

Times researcher Maloy Moore and staff writer Hector Becerra contributed to this report. Data analysis by Doug Smith and Sandra Poindexter.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Rise in caseload

In recent years, Los Angeles County's courts and jails have struggled to keep pace with demand.

2000

Total number of bookings: 321,032

Bookings involving repeat offenders: 82,400

Felony filings: 56,404

Number of county prosecutors: 989

2005

Total number of bookings: 375,655

Bookings involving repeat offenders: 159,389

Felony filings: 68,277

Number of county prosecutors: 903

Note: Bookings based on calendar year data. Filings, number of prosecutors are for fiscal years.

Case study: Northeast Division

During the week of Oct. 2 to Oct. 8, police made 28 adult felony arrests in the LAPD's Northeast Division on suspicion of crimes that included drug possession, theft, assault and a variety of other offenses.

Of the 28 arrested:

12 were found guilty, sentenced and let out of but two were rearrested and are back in jail

5 have court cases pending

3 were sentenced to prison

DOJ_NMG_0108704

3 were released by the courts, but one was rearrested and is back in jail

2 were released early but placed in federal custody on unrelated charges

2 were not charged with a crime

1 was sentenced to drug treatment in jail

Sources: L.A. County Superior Court, L.A. County district attorney's office, L.A. County Sheriff's Department.

Duke Rape Case Unravels (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 26, 2006

ATLANTA – Fueled by stereotypes of race and class, as well as a zealous prosecutor, the criminal case against three Duke lacrosse players emerged as a test of the ability of the justice system to sift evidence through a prism of prejudices. Now, after the key charges of rape were dropped Friday, the case is also being seen as a cautionary tale for prosecutors and pundits alike, emblematic of how cultural stereotypes and perceptions don't always add up to hard facts on the ground.

The fuse was lit last March in Durham, N.C., at an off-campus party for lacrosse players - many of whom were Northerners enjoying an exclusive Southern university. Add to the scene two black exotic dancers, who grew up in the predominantly black city walled off from the school. Soon after, three of the white players were charged with kidnapping, assaulting, and raping one of the exotic dancers, allegedly amid a litany of racial slurs.

Yet since then, it's hardly been an open-and-shut case.

"As you look at the facts in the case and look at the testimony, everybody agrees that the case has many significant weaknesses, any one of which may be sufficient basis for either a judge to dismiss or a jury to find the defendants not guilty," says Bennett Gershman, a civil rights law professor at Pace University in White Plains, N.Y.

Charges of kidnapping and first-degree sexual offense (which includes acts similar to rape) are still lodged against Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y.; David Evans of Bethesda, Md.; and Reade Seligmann of Essex Fells, N.J. But the rape charges were dropped because the alleged victim "could no longer testify with certainty that it occurred," according to court documents.

The move came a week after a Dec. 15 court hearing in which a judge ordered a paternity test for the now-pregnant accuser. In addition, facts showed that District Attorney Mike Nifong asked a DNA lab director to withhold potentially exculpatory information from defense attorneys for "the Duke Three," as supporters call them.

Problems for the prosecution

Mr. Nifong still believes "hooligans" committed criminal acts that night, people close to the case say. And the two remaining charges, under North Carolina law, are just as serious as rape and carry equal jail time. But the accuser's changing story, lack of hard evidence of rape, mismatched witness testimony, and possibly exculpatory evidence presented by the defense remain problems for the prosecution. Dropping the rape charge makes the case more manageable, though still difficult to prove in front of a jury, lawyers say.

Nifong has "eliminated the most difficult charge he had to prove," says Woody Vann, a Durham defense attorney who's familiar with the case. "Does this make his case better? No, it just makes it easier."

Either way, the case had already divided a city, a university, and beyond. The perception of rich white college athletes violating a young black mother trying to make a living in an unsavory profession touched sensitivities about race, class, and status in America.

Early on, the "group of 88," a consortium of Duke faculty, condemned the culture of hilarity and immunity allegedly enjoyed by athletes at Duke. As time has worn on, though, supporters of the lacrosse players have pointed to emerging weaknesses in the case as reasons for Nifong to dismiss all the charges.

"Black people used this case as an opportunity to lash out at the privileged people at the university and to air some of their racial grievances," says La Shawn Barber, a conservative black blogger who has focused on the case for the past eight months. "But in the end, those issues have nothing to do with whether this woman was raped or not."

DOJ_NMG_0108705

At the very least, experts say Nifong made several moves that may have hurt his case. He apparently changed police policy on lineups, which are used to identify alleged perpetrators, when he included only lacrosse players. Last week it was revealed he did not release information that showed the lab found DNA from five men, none of them lacrosse players, on the woman or her clothing. Moreover, Nifong's early fiery rhetoric and attendance at community events at North Carolina Central University, the historically black school, raised questions about his political motives, which he repeatedly denied as he ran for and won the DA's seat in November as a Democrat.

"Yes, local prosecutors are elected, but you can't play party, you can't play politics, you can't play race, you can't play anything," says Professor Gershman.

Indeed, criticism of the case has led to some calls for Nifong's disbarment. A North Carolina legislator has asked the US Department of Justice to investigate the case. And legal experts say that while prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity inside the courtroom, Nifong's actions as a lead investigator outside the courtroom for this case may have left him exposed to a potential civil lawsuit from the Duke Three.

"The irony is that although this involved a bunch of white, privileged young defendants, [a potential civil lawsuit against Nifong] might wind up setting a precedent which will help hundreds of other defendants who are black and lack their financial and other resources, because prosecutors around the country will be a little bit more worried about violating civil rights," says John Banzhaf III, a law professor at George Washington University.

Next hearing

The next hearing in the case is scheduled for Feb. 5, when the court is to hear motions to suppress evidence. Some say Nifong may be looking for a face-saving way to back out of the case. Others say the prosecution is as hardened as ever, determined to bring the Duke Three to trial.

"If this case goes to trial, this is going to get much worse, because what you would have is a case with no evidence, where its only chance in trial would be [for Nifong] to stoke these tensions as much as he can," says KC Johnson, a constitutional history professor at Brooklyn College in New York, who runs a blog on the Duke case.

After Years Of Agony, Death Turns Assaults Into Homicides (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

Sirkime Stevenson died this year, but he was killed in 1991.

Mr. Stevenson was tall, strapping and 18 that year, when bullets fired from a stranger's gun struck his lower back, shattered parts of his spine and froze him from the waist down.

Even as his body withered around the wounds, he dreamed of walking again — until 1997, when bedsores ate his left leg to the bone and doctors amputated it at the hip. More infections brewed, eroding Mr. Stevenson's insides before finally stopping his heart in January.

Armani Eaddy also died this year, but she was killed in 1997.

Armani was 4 months old that year when she was shaken so violently that delicate parts of her brain were destroyed. She went blind, was never able to walk and had to be fed through a tube tunneled into her stomach. To the amazement of her doctors, Armani survived past the age of 5.

But violent seizures plagued her throughout her life, one so ferocious that it put her in a coma last spring, when she was 8. Two days later, she died.

Two fatal wounds, two deaths years later.

The New York City medical examiner has ruled that both Mr. Stevenson and Armani were the victims of homicides, a medical finding that is not surprising, considering the nature of their wounds. But what is unusual is the amount of time that passed between the fatal wounds and the fatalities themselves.

Both Mr. Stevenson and Armani fell into a subset of crime called "reclassified" homicides, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. For reasons that no one can quite explain, a record number of reclassified homicides were recorded in

DOJ_NMG_0108706

New York City this year. In all, 35 deaths in the city in 2006 have been linked to wounds incurred as long as 30 years ago. That is roughly three times the historical average, and 14 more than the year before.

The Police Department has cited those figures as accounting for some of the rise in New York's homicide rate, which has outpaced the rate in 2005: by mid-December, 566 homicides had been reported this year, compared with 517 for the same time in 2005.

For those 35, death came in myriad forms, connected only by the excruciatingly glacial tempo of its arrival. From blood poisoning leached from old shot wounds. From infected intestines, slit open in the 1970's by knives. From pneumonia linked to paralysis, which in turn was traced to a bullet lodged long ago in a spine.

For Mr. Stevenson, those who knew him said, death also came from a broken heart. Up until the day that doctors amputated his left leg, he believed he would walk again.

He had been an accomplished basketball and football player, collecting trophies playing for Eastern District High School in Brooklyn. But one chilly autumn night in 1991, after seeing a horror movie called "The People Under the Stairs" with friends, Mr. Stevenson was caught in the middle of a fight. Bullets tore through his intestines, shattering his lower spine. The gunman was never caught.

Mr. Stevenson's voice broke when saw his grandmother, Josephine Anderson, in the hospital. "Grandma," he whispered hoarsely, "I can't move my legs," Ms. Anderson recalled.

Ms. Anderson and her husband, Joseph, had raised Mr. Stevenson in a series of public housing apartments. He had been their light. After the shooting, they tried to buoy his spirits, but after his friends dropped away, his loneliness hardened into despair.

The Andersons urged Mr. Stevenson to finish high school, but he felt alienated surrounded by people who could walk. He also dropped out of physical therapy because he hated being around people in wheelchairs. "I'm not like them," he would say.

Yet even as his once-muscular legs wasted away, Mr. Stevenson clung to the hope of walking again.

After the amputation, Ms. Anderson saw something in her grandson flicker out. Then her own health and her husband's declined. Mr. Anderson lost both legs to diabetes. Arthritis invaded Ms. Anderson's joints.

Exhausted by caring for the family, Ms. Anderson had a nervous breakdown midway through 2005 and went to a nursing home. Early this year, Mr. Stevenson called her, sounding hopeless.

"Grandma, I'm going to die," he said. Ms. Anderson's response was quick and sharp. "The Lord did not bring you this far to drop you now," she said.

But one icy morning a week later, the family's home attendant heard a dull thump from Mr. Stevenson's room. She raced to him, finding him unconscious, wedged between his bed and the wall.

He died at the hospital. The official cause of death was sepsis, a bacterial infection in the blood, linked to his paraplegia and the 1991 wounds, the medical examiner's office said.

But Ms. Anderson said her grandson had simply lost the will to live. "His main friends did not stay with him," she said. "I think he died of heartbreak."

Beating the Odds, for a Time

For nearly four years, Armani Eaddy cheated death.

The brain damage she suffered after being shaken as an infant was so severe that doctors warned that she was unlikely to live more than a handful of years. Five years, tops, they said.

"After six came, then seven, I thought, 'We made it,' said Armani's mother, Teresa Almonte, 33. "I would throw a big party for her, and buy the most expensive cake I could afford."

Ms. Almonte said she had never felt vengeful toward Armani's father, who was charged with attempted murder after Armani was hurt. Ms. Almonte said the man, Derek Eaddy, told her he had done nothing wrong, only found the infant in her crib, unwell. In 1999, he was convicted of assault and was sentenced to one year in prison.

Ms. Almonte did not know what to believe. All she knew was that her once-perfect daughter was now the victim of shaken baby syndrome, and that the brain damage could never be reversed.

DOJ_NMG_0108707

At first, Ms. Almonte raged inward, slipping into an immobilizing depression. She went into therapy and was told she had bipolar disorder. She took mood stabilizers and antipsychotic medications, all the while raising her sons, now aged 11, 8 and 3. But she also devoted herself to Armani, who somehow helped Ms. Almonte forget herself.

Blind, incapacitated and able to make only gurgling sounds, Armani experienced the world through her ears. She adored being outside, listening to bird song and street noises, and feeling the sun's kiss on her skin. Indoors, cloaked in the silence of the family's basement apartment in the Bronx, Armani squealed in protest until someone flipped on the radio or television.

Caring for Armani, Ms. Almonte found, gave her a sense of resolve and purpose. "She taught me patience, how to be responsive," she said. "She taught me how to be a parent."

As Armani's fifth birthday neared, paranoia consumed Ms. Almonte. Then, miraculously, the dreaded birthday passed. Armani seemed to be doing better than ever. At the urging of a neurologist, Ms. Almonte took her off her anti-seizure medications. She allowed herself a glimmer of hope.

The urgent call from Armani's home attendant came on March 4. A violent seizure — "like a volt to the brain," Ms. Almonte said — had put her in a coma. She was being kept alive by a breathing machine, her chest rising and falling amid a tangled octopus of tubes.

For two days, Ms. Almonte agonized. Then acceptance came. "I'm not getting her back," Ms. Almonte realized. She told the doctor to take Armani off the machine, and watched her little girl slip away.

This year, Ms. Almonte and her sons celebrated Armani's ninth birthday anyway. They brought balloons and cake to their favorite treed nook in Mullaly Park in the Bronx. Then they mourned. "The party this year was a memorial," Ms. Almonte said. "And it was the worst."

'I Loved This Girl'

LaPriest Ward believed Shareema Williams was trying to kill herself before her injuries did.

He had loved her from the moment he set eyes on her, outside a friend's building in Brownsville, Brooklyn, in 1993. She managed a smile, her brown eyes twinkling, even though tears of exhaustion were spilling down her cheeks. She was already in a wheelchair then. Mr. Ward was bewitched.

Ms. Williams was 18 and dancing in a Brooklyn nightclub in 1988 when an unwanted suitor refused to leave her alone. He groped her, and she swung at him. Moments later, he returned with a gun, and shot her in the back. Ms. Williams was paralyzed, and later doctors removed her hip joints, which had been shattered by the blasts. Bullet scars pocked her back and buttocks, which bore a patchwork quilt of skin grafts.

Mr. Ward was disabled too. A car accident in 1986 crushed his larynx, and afterward he could speak only in gasps. Yet he and Ms. Williams found solace in each other. He was her legs. She was his voice.

Mr. Ward said Ms. Williams refused to talk about her attacker, although the police said the man was charged with assault and is serving his sentence in Attica state prison.

"She'd say, 'Don't worry about it; what's done is done,' " Mr. Ward said. But demons still stalked Ms. Williams. Before the attack, Mr. Ward said, she barely touched drugs, only occasionally using marijuana. She had left her family because of their drug abuse, Mr. Ward said. But after the shooting, she began to smoke crack.

"She felt insecure," Mr. Ward said in gasps. "She was just trying to blend into her environment. It was a way to take her mind off of herself."

Still, they moved in together and later had five children, including triplets. Mr. Ward, a man of sparkling intelligence, had to settle for jobs as a cook or a stock boy because of his disability.

He would return from work and hunt for Ms. Williams in the forbidding streets near their Bronx apartment. The triplets were taken from them because of her drug abuse, and their two other daughters were, too. Eventually Mr. Ward's mother adopted all five of their children, and they live in Queens.

Mr. Ward, who insists he has never used drugs, still stuck with Ms. Williams, determined to save her from herself.

"I loved this girl, but I don't know how I loved this girl,' " he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108708

Repeated complications kept her returning to the hospital. Spasms. Urinary tract infections. Late in August, a kidney infection put her back in the hospital. Her body swelled up. Mr. Ward was convinced she would get better. She always had before. But she was so swollen, he barely recognized her.

On the morning of Sept. 12, Mr. Ward took a break from Ms. Williams's bedside, overwhelmed. He walked to a welfare office in the Bronx, and sat down. Hours passed. Suddenly, in the late afternoon, a terrible feeling set in. He raced to the hospital, arriving at 5 p.m. A plastic sheet had been drawn over Ms. Williams. A nurse told him she had died at 4:45 p.m.

Two weeks later, the medical examiner determined that Ms. Williams had died from multiple complications caused by the old bullet wounds. Her death became the 28th reclassified homicide of the year.

A Delusional System Of Justice (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Since this is my last column of 2006, tradition and custom obligate me to choose a person of the year. This practice was started by the late Henry Luce, who realized that choosing a man of the year would call as much attention to his Time magazine as it would to the person himself. I have somewhat the same object in mind. My person of the year is Gregory Thompson. I choose him to call attention to the madness of the death penalty.

I apologize for the un-Christmasy nature of my topic, and I will understand if you choose to skip to another subject. But if you can spare me a moment, I'd like to tell you about Thompson. He is a cold-blooded killer, plain and simple. He is also out of his mind.

Thompson, 45, is delusional. He is also paranoid, schizophrenic and depressed. For these ailments, he receives daily doses of drugs and, twice a month, anti-psychotic injections. The state of Tennessee wants very much to put him to death for the horrendous 1985 murder of Brenda Blanton Lane, of which there is no doubt about his guilt. There is grave doubt, though, about the constitutionality, not to mention the decency, of executing an insane man. Thus the 12 pills Thompson takes every day. The idea, according to a recent account of his case in the Wall Street Journal, is to make him sane enough to be put to death.

Shortly before Justice Harry Blackmun retired from the Supreme Court in 1994, he reversed himself on the death penalty. Blackmun had been a lifelong supporter, but finally had had enough. In words that were to become famous, he wrote, "From this day forward, I no longer shall tinker with the machinery of death." It's as if Blackmun had Thompson in mind, for in his case the tinkering occurs on a daily basis.

Blackmun was not the only Supreme Court justice to change his mind about capital punishment. Lewis Powell did something similar. He never got to the point where he considered it unconstitutional or immoral -- he just concluded there was no way to get it right.

Now, from Powell's point of view, matters have even worsened. The death penalty has become so necessarily cumbersome to implement, so full of essential safeguards, that it not only sometimes cannot be done -- note the recent suspensions of executions by lethal injection -- but it takes forever to do it. Thompson, you might have noticed, has been awaiting execution for nearly 22 years -- arguably cruel and unusual punishment in itself.

If I were not forced to choose a person as my person of the year, I might choose a concept: certainty. It is the one concept we cannot afford. Certainty is where we all get into trouble. We were so certain that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction that it was reason enough to go to war. And once we went to war, we were certain that we would be welcomed in Baghdad by adoring throngs of Iraqis. And all that certainty was itself preceded by the fervid certainty of a president that he had been chosen for this war, this moment, this task. This was the worst certainty of them all.

As we keep learning, the devil is not in the details, it's in our certainty. This almost always is true of death-penalty cases. They are built on certainty -- witnesses who were certain, technicians who were certain, cops who were certain, prosecutors who were certain and jurors who were certain beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet routinely we read about convictions being overturned by DNA evidence. All those witnesses, technicians, cops, prosecutors and jurors were wrong -- certain, but wrong. That, in effect, is the only certainty. Occasionally, we will be wrong.

DOJ_NMG_0108709

This year saw the fewest executions in a decade and growing public support for the alternative sentence of life without the possibility of parole. The cynic in me suspects that this is a result of historically low crime rates, not a sudden appreciation of how difficult it is to kill people properly, legally and, of course, justly.

Maybe, though, Americans are beginning to understand that we just don't need the death penalty, that it makes us no safer and demeans us as a people. The case of Gregory Thompson is a case in point. He was probably insane when he murdered Brenda Blanton Lane but will be deemed sane if and when he's executed. He's my person of the year -- a fleetingly sane man in the maw of a thoroughly insane system.

cohenr@washpost.com

Federal RICO Statute Has A Tough Year (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- For more than two decades, the federal RICO law was a pitiless tool in the fight against organized crime -- corralling, convicting and incarcerating a long string of mob bosses once considered untouchable.

But in 2006, federal prosecutors lost a pair of major RICO cases: Second-generation mob boss John A. "Junior" Gotti walked after three mistrials, and the most corrupt officers in NYPD history -- "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa -- had their convictions overturned.

Are these nothing more than legal oddities? Or, mother of mercy, is this the end of RICO -- the statute that allows prosecutors to jail mobsters for decades by tying them to as few as two crimes linked to a criminal enterprise?

"It's not the end," insists Notre Dame law professor G. Robert Blakey, the creator of the law. "A good RICO is virtually impossible to defend."

In both cases, defense attorneys used the statute of limitations to fend off the feds. Gotti's lawyer employed a withdrawal defense, claiming his client had quit the mob more than five years before his indictment, putting him beyond the reach of RICO.

Attorneys for Eppolito and Caracappa argued the defendants' crimes while on the payrolls of both the NYPD and a murderous Luchese family boss had occurred long before the five-year statute of limitations expired. Those crimes, committed between 1986-90, included participation in eight murders; a federal jury found both men guilty.

A federal judge -- who had just three weeks earlier said the two detectives had committed "the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse" -- agreed with the defense lawyers, and reversed the cops' convictions last June.

Defense attorney Edward Hayes was part of the legal team that convinced U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein to overturn the convictions of the "Mafia Cops." And Hayes believes their triumph could provide a blueprint for other defense lawyers: "Bruce (Cutler) and I made a very good team ... It's likely other lawyers (would) use us as a model."

Other attorneys, from both sides of the aisle, disagree.

"I don't think the statute of limitations defense is terribly appealing to juries, because there's almost an implicit statement -- even if the defense attorney is careful -- that `I did it, but ...'," said Jim Walden, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice.

"I think what you had were some talented lawyers, and cases with problematic cooperators," continued Walden, who spent nine years as an assistant U.S. attorney. "The arguments were successful, but I don't think it's a trend."

Veteran defense lawyer Ron Kuby agreed that there's no "huge lesson here for the defense."

Blakey has never explained the origin of his acronym for the law known officially as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations act. But it's often theorized the name was chosen in homage to the 1931 mob flick "Little Caesar," where Edward G. Robinson played a crook named Rico Bandello whose dying plea to "mother of mercy" is cinematic legend.

The law was initially designed not only to take down the mob, but also to target white-collar criminals. RICO was passed in 1970 -- and then largely ignored for years by shortsighted prosecutors.

Blakey recalled a 1972 visit to Whitney North Seymour Jr., the Manhattan U.S. attorney, where he eagerly explained the new statute's potential. Blakey remembered Seymour cutting him off with a curt remark: "You don't know what you're talking about."

It wasn't until 1985 that federal prosecutor Rudolph Giuliani seized on the RICO act as a way to indict the Mafia's ruling Commission, the heads of New York's five families.

DOJ_NMG_0108710

Convictions came back against Genovese crime family boss Anthony "Fat Tony" Salerno, Colombo boss Carmine "Junior" Persico, and Luchese boss Anthony "Tony Ducks" Corallo, along with five other top level mobsters.

Federal prosecutors were now convinced that they had a friend in RICO. The mob cases were almost foolproof, and the list of convicted mobsters expanded. Genovese head Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, who had avoided conviction since 1970 by feigning mental illness, was finally brought down by a 1997 racketeering conviction.

The highest profile racketeering defeat, John Gotti Sr.'s acquittal at a 1987 trial, came only after the "Teflon Don" greased one juror with $60,000. And when the government brought a second racketeering case in 1992, Gotti was convicted, jailed and died behind bars.

More devastating for the mob were the stiff penalties with RICO: 20 years, minimum. A parade of mobsters became government witnesses, trading information for reduced sentences or a walk.

The racketeering cases also allowed authorities to use new informants to win convictions for ancient crimes, as long as prosecutors could demonstrate an ongoing enterprise. In the case of La Cosa Nostra families, that was rarely a problem.

Walden successfully prosecuted Bonanno family consigliere Anthony Spero for racketeering in 2001 -- a charge that included three murders dating back as far as a decade.

A RICO indictment "was an enormous advantage," he said. "A couple of cooperators and surveillance got you pretty far down the road. It produced spectacular successes, but the failures this year were spectacular, too."

The racketeering defeats came despite several cooperating witnesses in the Gotti and the "Mafia Cops" cases -- both of which involved crimes going back more than a dozen years. The main charge against the younger Gotti, that he ordered the kidnapping and beating of talk radio host Curtis Sliwa, occurred in 1992.

Three trials against Gotti produced three hung juries, with his lawyer able to convince members of each panel that Junior had walked away from the mob before 1999 -- five years before his latest indictment.

The "Mafia Cops" trial was less protracted, but more painful. The duo was tried once, after years of pursuit by law enforcement for crimes dating back to 1986. And the government convicted the pair on every count in their indictment.

But Hayes and Cutler argued there was no evidence that the conspiracy between the two detectives and the Luchese crime family had continued once the pair left the NYPD in the early 1990s. Weinstein agreed, and threw out the convictions.

"The Justice Department just way overstretched RICO," said Hayes.

Kuby believes the lesson in the Gotti and "Mafia Cops" cases is more for the prosecution than the defense.

"You can't take people decades later and try to make them answerable," Kuby said. "You have to do your best law enforcement work earlier, rather than later."

Sentencing Guidelines Face New Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats poised to take control of Congress, law-enforcement officials are preparing to defend two decades of federal sentencing policies that mandated harsh prison terms on a variety of crimes and led to a boom in the prison population.

Michigan Rep. John Conyers, the incoming chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and Rep. Robert Scott (D., Va.) have already said they plan hearings early in the term to look at how nonviolent drug offenders are punished under mandatory minimum laws.

An early target will be the prison terms mandated by Congress for crack-cocaine convictions. Under current law, someone caught with five grams of crack gets a five-year sentence, while it takes 500 grams of powder cocaine to trigger the same sentence, even though there is no physiological difference. Critics have long maintained that the law unfairly targets African-American communities, where crack is more prevalent. In contrast, suburban white users tend to prefer cocaine in its powder form.

Mr. Conyers has called the crack-cocaine sentences the "most outrageous example of the unfairness of mandatory minimums."

DOJ_NMG_0108711

Democrats are buoyed by recent signals from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which sets guidelines for judges to use in an advisory capacity when they hand down sentences. Members of the commission are likely to recommend a change in the crack-cocaine penalties next year, according to commission members. The commission has tried since 1995 to bring the penalties for crack crimes more in line with powder cocaine but the Republican-controlled Congress has ignored past attempts.

Soft on Crime

Reversing drug laws, though, is politically dangerous, for it risks angering law-enforcement officials and police unions. In addition, it could resurrect the soft-on-crime mantra that Republicans have long used to bludgeon Democrats. As a result, some Democrats might be reluctant to be viewed as rolling back harsh sentences just when the nation's violent crime is starting to rise.

"Whenever you suggest somebody's sentence is too long or a policy is too draconian, the immediate reaction in the political arena is you're soft on crime and you're not taking public safety seriously," says Alexander Busansky, director of the Washington office of the Vera Institute of Justice, a criminal-justice reform organization based in New York.

That claim, though, may no longer be as effective, he adds. Some Republicans have spearheaded efforts to reduce recidivism, and the effort to address the crack-cocaine disparity has attracted some bipartisan backing.

Nevertheless, law-enforcement officials -- from the Justice Department to police groups -- are joining forces to oppose any changes that decrease the severity of the crack penalty, warning that it's a slippery slope that could weaken other mandatory sentences.

"Our position on crack versus powder has been to increase the penalty for powder cocaine, not decrease the punishment for crack," says Gene Voegtlin, of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents 18,000 chiefs, department heads and other law-enforcement officials.

Prisoners in Their Own Homes

Street cops agree with this view as well, says James Pasco, of the Fraternal Order of Police, which represents about 324,000 street-level police officers, deputies and agents. Mr. Pasco says there is more violence attached to crack-related crimes, making residents in the communities where these crimes occur -- often poor, urban areas -- prisoners in their own homes. "We're not opposing this because of its impact on law enforcement. We're opposing this because of its impact on the communities we protect," says Mr. Pasco.

Law-enforcement groups, however, need to push back not too hard, lest they anger Democrats who control funding over various programs that benefit local police. For example, Rep. Bennie Thompson (D., Miss.), who co-sponsored a crack-powder penalty-equalization bill in the last Congress, is the incoming chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. He plans to push an agenda to improve intelligence sharing and communications ability between federal and local law-enforcement officials, a key goal for police groups.

The police groups' biggest ally in preventing a reversal of mandatory minimums will be Republican lawmakers, such as Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, who will be the ranking minority member on the House Judiciary Committee.

"The sentencing disparity between possession of crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a valid issue, and I look forward to a discussion next year," says Mr. Smith. "But we need to remember that the drug trade is directly linked to the level of violent crime in America. This week, the [Federal Bureau of Investigation] reported the number of violent crimes committed in 2005 rose more than it has in any of the last 15 years....We need tough drug laws that deter drug abuse -- not increase it."

At least one advocacy group that opposes the mandatory minimums believes the debate is being couched incorrectly. Julie Stewart, founder and president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums, says lawmakers should look at the crack-cocaine sentencing and decide whether it is fair on its own merit, not in comparison with powder cocaine.

"The problem is not powder cocaine. The problem is crack," she said. If five grams is not an amount handled by a major trafficker, "then let's figure out what quantity is more reflective of someone who is dealing at a higher level," she said. "We shouldn't be focused on ratio between the two."

Write to Gary Fields at gary.fields@wsj.com1

The Tell-Tell Rap? (WP)

By Jabari Asim

DOJ_NMG_0108712

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Rap lyrics stole much of the spotlight during the recent capital murder trial of Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old Staten Island native also known as "Rated R." Wilson stood accused of killing two New York undercover detectives, James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews, in March 2003.

Prosecutors argued that the scribbled lyrics found in Wilson's pocket soon after the deaths of the officers were evidence of his guilt. But other evidence -- which didn't receive as much attention as the defendant's half-baked rhymes -- did more to persuade the jury. That evidence included eyewitness testimony, DNA findings, video and audio surveillance footage and the opinions of scientific experts. Wilson was found guilty of 10 crimes in all, several of them punishable by death. The death penalty phase of his trial begins Jan. 10.

Still, prosecutors and the media made much of Wilson's lyrics, which make the Black Eyed Peas sound like Langston Hughes. A sample for your delectation: "Leave a 45 slugs in da back of ya head. Cause I'm gettin dat bread /aint' goin stop to I'm dead."

To prosecutors, the words were a confession, a revelatory window into the fevered mind of a cold-blooded murderer. To me, they resembled a cut-rate ripoff of the Notorious B.I.G.'s 1994 hit "Ready to Die": "As I grab the glock, put it to your headpiece/One in the chamber, the safety is off release/straight at your dome homes, I wanna see cabbage."

The B.I.G. went on to rhyme "cabbage" with "brain damage" before announcing that, like Rated R, he was fully prepared to shuffle off this mortal coil.

The defense team was not allowed to place a rap expert on the stand. But such an expert might have pointed out that Rated R's lyrics were not only predictable, but derivative too.

The use of hip-hop lyrics in trials is not new, as George Washington University law professor Paul Butler and others have pointed out. Still, the courts remain somewhat baffled as to how to regard them. Are they straight-up autobiography or merely macho fantasies?

Two Live Crew's obscenity trial in Florida in October 1990 may have been the first high-profile courtroom drama involving rap lyrics. In that case, Henry Louis Gates Jr., a well-known black scholar, testified that the trio's lyrics were part of a lengthy tradition and not meant to be taken seriously. "It's a way the black people could fight against the oppression of their white masters," he said. "They would mock each other to release anger and tension."

That explanation shed little light on how the group's persistent, gleefully vulgar mockery of women amounted to resistance to white oppression. But that was not a question the mostly white jury needed to wrestle with. For their part, jurors expressed little difficulty with the Crew's lyrics. "Those were their songs. They were doing their poetry in song," said a 65-year-old juror who voted quickly for acquittal.

Her very charitable assessment will have to go unchallenged here, because it is almost impossible to refute without quoting from the lyrics -- an equally unlikely task in a family newspaper.

The stakes were starker and higher in Wilson's trial. Ultimately, this was no showdown over naughty words or celebrations of strip-club hedonism but a murder case involving the deaths of two brave, hardworking family men. And the fascination with the killer's lyrics threatened to overshadow all that.

Nemorin was 36 and a married father of three. Andrews was 34 and a divorced father of two. Shortly after New York police killed 23-year-old Sean Bell, an unarmed black man, in a hail of bullets, at least one rapper took to the airwaves to offer musical tribute to the victim's tragically brief life. It takes nothing away from Bell to ask where all the rappers are now; and to wonder who will offer rhymes in memory of two brave police officers who also died way too young.

CIVIL LAW:

No Fed Oversight On Some Air Charters (USAT/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108713

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Travelers who pay a premium for the convenience of charter air travel could unknowingly end up on a flights operated without direct federal oversight.

That fact — along with an effort to change it — is central to a lawsuit filed by NBC Sports executive Dick Ebersol and actress Susan Saint James over the 2004 crash that killed their teenage son.

Charter flights have gained in popularity among executives and the wealthy as an alternative to the long lines for commercial flights. They have become safer in the last two decades, but the accident rate is still higher than for commercial airlines.

Not all charter operations are certified by the Federal Aviation Administration. Those outside the FAA umbrella aren't required to give flight crews the same training required of certified companies, and it isn't always obvious which aren't certified. Some non-certified operators fly under the auspices of other companies.

In Ebersol's case, the family says it wasn't told that charter operator Key Air Inc. had hired another operator, Air Castle of Millville, N.J., to make the flight.

Just before takeoff from Montrose, Colo., on Nov. 28, 2004, Ebersol saw slush sliding off the fuselage. Moments later, the plane crashed, killing his 14-year-old son, Edward "Teddy" Ebersol, the pilot and a flight attendant.

According to the Ebersol lawsuit, the Air Castle pilots were unqualified to fly in the weather when the plane crashed.

"This is an issue Dick Ebersol thinks needs to be at the forefront of commercial aviation in America," said his attorney, Robert Clifford.

Air Castle officials declined to comment.

Key Air Chief Executive Brad Kost said Air Castle had an excellent reputation and the crew possessed all the certificates required by regulators.

Doug Carr, vice president of safety for the National Business Aviation Association, which claims 7,000 members, said charter flights are not inherently more dangerous, but he said some charter operators rely on planes that are more susceptible to poor weather and higher altitudes.

The National Transportation Safety Board concluded in May that the pilot's failure to carefully examine the wings for icing probably caused the crash that killed Ebersol's son.

NTSB members agreed that the pilots should have taken several safety precautions before flying in icing conditions and that their lack of experience in such weather contributed to the crash. They are now urging the FAA to require more training for charter crews and better disclosure to customers.

"We're looking for more transparency," NTSB Chairman Mark Rosenker said.

The safety board also cited a 2005 charter jet crash in New Jersey that injured 10 people as a need for reform.

In that case, a small jet was unable to get airborne and overran a runway at Teterboro Airport because the flight crew failed to properly calculate the plane's center of gravity. At least half of the eight passengers were not wearing seat belts because they were hidden, and a cabin aide could not open the main door for evacuation, the investigators' report said.

The NTSB ruled that the FAA's lack of close oversight of the charter industry was a contributing factor in the Teterboro crash.

FAA officials say they are addressing the concerns by meeting with charter operators to make sure they comply with regulations. The agency also will issue new operating specifications in the next few months to clearly spell out what is required of flight operators.

Ebersol's flight had been arranged by General Electric Corporate Air Transport, and charter operator Key Air brokered the flight to Air Castle because it didn't have any planes available, according to NTSB member Deborah A.P. Hersman.

"GE Corporate Air Transport undoubtedly believed it was diligent in insisting on certain standards for the air charter operator, but it did not get what it probably thought it was getting," Hersman wrote in the NTSB's report of the crash.

"If an experienced corporate travel organization like GE Corporate Air Transport can be so fooled," she said, "how easy is it for others with perhaps far less savvy and market power to hire air charter services that are less safe than they expect?"

Where Real Money Meets Virtual Reality, The Jury Is Still Out (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0108714

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Veronica Brown is a hot fashion designer, making a living off the virtual lingerie and formalwear she sells inside the online fantasy world Second Life. She expects to have earned about $60,000 this year from people who buy her digital garments to outfit their animated self-images in this fast-growing virtual community.

But Brown got an unnerving reminder last month of how tenuous her livelihood is when a rogue software program that copies animated objects appeared in Second Life. Scared that their handiwork could be cloned and sold by others, Brown and her fellow shopkeepers launched a general strike and briefly closed the electronic storefronts where they peddle digital furniture, automobiles, hairdos and other virtual wares.

"It was fear, fear of your effort being stolen," said Brown, 44, whose online alter ego, Simone Stern, trades under the name Simone! Design.

Brown has reopened her boutique but remains uncomfortably aware that the issue of whether she owns what she makes -- a fundamental right underpinning nearly all businesses -- is unresolved.

As virtual worlds proliferate across the Web, software designers and lawyers are straining to define property rights in this emerging digital realm. The debate over these rights extends far beyond the early computer games that pioneered virtual reality into the new frontiers of commerce.

"Courts are trying to figure out how to apply laws from real life, which we've grown accustomed to, to the new world," said Greg Lastowka, a professor at Rutgers School of Law at Camden in New Jersey. "The law is struggling to keep up."

U.S. courts have heard several cases involving virtual-world property rights but have yet to set a clear precedent clarifying whether people own the electronic goods they make, buy or accumulate in Second Life and other online landscapes. Also unclear is whether people have any claim when their real-life property is depicted online, for instance in Microsoft's new three-dimensional renderings of actual real estate.

The debate is assuming greater urgency as commerce gains pace in virtual reality. In Second Life, where nearly 2 million people have signed up to create their own characters and socialize with other digital beings, the virtual economy is booming, with total transactions in November reaching the equivalent of $20 million. Second Life's creator, Linden Lab, allows members to exchange the electronic currency they accumulate online with real U.S. dollars. Last month, people converted about $3 million at the Lindex currency market.

Second Life's economy has been surging since Linden Lab made the unusual decision three years ago to grant users intellectual property rights for what they create with the Web site's free software tools. Thousands of people have created homes and businesses on virtual land leased from the site and are peddling virtual items as varied as yachts and ice cream.

Congress has taken note and is completing a study of whether income in the virtual economy, such as from the sale of gowns that Brown makes, should be taxed by the Internal Revenue Service. The Joint Economic Committee of Congress is expected to issue its findings early next year.

"There seems to be a lack of ground rules in an area that would have explosive growth in the next decade or two," said Christopher Frenze, the committee's executive director.

Though she grew up watching her mother at the sewing machine, learning the craft with each loving stitch of the family's clothes, Brown never considered making it a career until two years ago, when she entered Second Life. Within days, she studied up on the basic software skills and began designing virtual women's apparel from her home in Indiana. "When I design," she said, "I think about how the cloth falls and the sheen silk has compared to satin." She said she now spends 70 hours a week on her trade. Starting with four original outfits, she now offers 1,200 designs and has also moved into men's fashion.

But the rogue program, called a copybot, that appeared last month in Second Life underscored the need to clarify her property rights. After the attack, Linden Lab announced efforts to ban the program and encouraged users to report abuses. Some users argued that even stronger property protections were needed.

"I'm feeling uncomfortable," Brown admitted. "I'm safe for now, but it's very tentative."

Linden Lab made cyber-history when it gave Second Life users the intellectual property rights to their creations -- similar to the copyright real-world authors have to their writings. By contrast, most Web sites offering virtual experiences have not accorded users any property rights, requiring them to accept a license agreement stating that all content belongs solely to the Web site owner.

DOJ_NMG_0108715

Four years ago, several online gaming veterans tried to get around this agreement and make real money by selling game items from Dark Age of Camelot on eBay and at specialty online auctions. The items, which included weapons, armor and specialized characters, in some cases went for more than $300 each. The developers of the Camelot game blocked them. When the gaming veterans sued, claiming that they had rights to the items they acquired in the game, a federal court in California ruled against them on the grounds that the license agreement took precedence. Other recent U.S. court rulings in virtual disputes have come to similar conclusions.

But judges elsewhere have taken a different view. A Chinese player in the Korean-made online game Mir 3 claimed that his personal rights had been violated when the game's local Chinese operators deleted the magic sword he used to battle virtual villains. The operators claimed it had been illegally duplicated from an original. The player filed suit, contending that he had bought the magic sword in good faith and that it was worth about $120. A Chinese court in Xuhui district ruled against the game's operators, essentially finding that the player's property rights were paramount.

In Second Life, Linden Lab executives wanted to avoid this confusion, believing that users needed clear ownership for economic activity to thrive, recounted Cory Ondrejka, chief technical officer. Otherwise, users would have little incentive to invest.

But he stressed that this ownership did not extend to full property rights -- creators have intellectual property rights to the software patterns used in making virtual objects but no rights to the objects themselves. Under this formulation, Brown owns her designs but not the individual dresses and pieces of underwear. Nor do her customers "own" the apparel they purchase and hang in their virtual closets.

"Everything in the virtual world is intellectual property, as much as it looks like property or as much as property is a useful metaphor," Ondrejka said. "Copying it is not theft. It's infringement, but it's not theft."

But Joshua Fairfield, a professor at Indiana University School of Law, said there's more to online rights than just intellectual property. He said there are legal reasons to believe that property rights to objects can exist in a virtual realm, but no U.S. court has affirmed the concept.

Earlier this month, U.S. Circuit Judge Richard A. Posner visited Second Life, appearing as a balding, bespectacled cartoon rendering of himself, and addressed a crowd of other animated characters on a range of legal issues, including property rights in virtual reality. Posner stressed that it was in Linden Lab's interest to ensure due process and other rights.

"They want people to invest in Second Life, and we know people won't invest if their rights are not reasonably secure," he told the audience, which included a giant chipmunk and several supermodels. He went on to predict the eventual emergence of an "international law of virtual worlds" similar to international maritime law.

Meanwhile, as mapping technologies rapidly improve, companies are increasingly able to transfer the real world to the online world. But are property rights any clearer in such a "real" virtual world?

Microsoft, for instance, launched an online service last month called Virtual Earth that features highly detailed three-dimensional photographic maps of American cities. Microsoft plans to make money by selling advertising billboards in this virtual depiction of urban America.

But the company's lawyers and advertising executives are still grappling with the question of whether those who own the property depicted in Microsoft's 3-D images have any control over how their depicted property is used online. For instance, does Federal Express have the right to object if an ad for its competitor DHL is posted in the parking lot at virtual FedEx Field?

"We haven't fully delineated all the guidelines for do's and don'ts," said Bobby Figueroa, a director of product management at Microsoft.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Database Stirs Privacy Fears (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108716

Size and Scope of the Interagency Investigative Tool Worry Civil Libertarians

The Justice Department is building a massive database that allows state and local police officers around the country to search millions of case files from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and other federal law enforcement agencies, according to Justice officials.

The system, known as "OneDOJ," already holds approximately 1 million case records and is projected to triple in size over the next three years, Justice officials said. The files include investigative reports, criminal-history information, details of offenses, and the names, addresses and other information of criminal suspects or targets, officials said.

The database is billed by its supporters as a much-needed step toward better information-sharing with local law enforcement agencies, which have long complained about a lack of cooperation from the federal government.

But civil-liberties and privacy advocates say the scale and contents of such a database raise immediate privacy and civil rights concerns, in part because tens of thousands of local police officers could gain access to personal details about people who have not been arrested or charged with crimes.

The little-noticed program has been coming together over the past year and a half. It already is in use in pilot projects with local police in Seattle, San Diego and a handful of other areas, officials said. About 150 separate police agencies have access, officials said.

But in a memorandum sent last week to the FBI, U.S. attorneys and other senior Justice officials, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty announced that the program will be expanded immediately to 15 additional regions and that federal authorities will "accelerate . . . efforts to share information from both open and closed cases."

Eventually, the department hopes, the database will be a central mechanism for sharing federal law enforcement information with local and state investigators, who now run checks individually, and often manually, with Justice's five main law enforcement agencies: the FBI, the DEA, the U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Within three years, officials said, about 750 law enforcement agencies nationwide will have access.

In an interview last week, McNulty said the goal is to broaden the pool of data available to local and state investigators beyond systems such as the National Crime Information Center, the FBI-run repository of basic criminal records used by police and sheriff's deputies around the country.

By tapping into the details available in incident reports, interrogation summaries and other documents, investigators will dramatically improve their chances of closing cases, he said.

"The goal is that all of U.S. law enforcement will be able to look at each other's records to solve cases and protect U.S. citizens," McNulty said. "With OneDOJ, we will essentially hook them up to a pipe that will take them into its records."

McNulty and other Justice officials emphasize that the information available in the database already is held individually by the FBI and other federal agencies. Much information will be kept out of the system, including data about public corruption cases, classified or sensitive topics, confidential informants, administrative cases and civil rights probes involving allegations of wrongdoing by police, officials said.

But civil-liberties and privacy advocates -- many of whom are already alarmed by the proliferation of federal databases -- warn that granting broad access to such a system is almost certain to invite abuse and lead to police mistakes.

Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Project at the American Civil Liberties Union, said the main problem is one of "garbage in, garbage out," because case files frequently include erroneous or unproved allegations.

"Raw police files or FBI reports can never be verified and can never be corrected," Steinhardt said. "That is a problem with even more formal and controlled systems. The idea that they're creating another whole system that is going to be full of inaccurate information is just chilling."

Steinhardt noted that in 2003, the FBI announced that it would no longer meet the Privacy Act's accuracy requirements for the National Crime Information Center, its main criminal-background-check database, which is used by 80,000 law enforcement agencies across the country.

"I look at this system and imagine it will raise many of the same questions that the whole information-sharing approach is raising across the government," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington-based group that has criticized many of the government's data-gathering policies.

"Information that's collected in the law enforcement realm can find [its way] into other arenas and be abused very easily," Rotenberg said.

McNulty and other officials said the data compiled under OneDOJ would be subject to the same civil-liberties and privacy oversight as any other Justice Department database. A coordinating committee within Justice will oversee the database and other information-sharing initiatives, according to McNulty's memo.

Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the Arlington-based International Association of Chiefs of Police, said his group welcomes any initiatives to share more data with local law enforcement agencies.

"The working partnership between the states and the feds has gotten much better than the pre-9/11 era," Voegtlin said. "But we're still overcoming a lot of issues, both functional and organizational . . . so we're happy to see DOJ taking positive steps in that area."

Diabetics In The Workplace Confront A Tangle Of Laws (NYT)

By N. R. Kleinfield

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — John Steigauf spent more than a decade fiddling with the innards of those huge United Parcel Service trucks until an icy day two years ago when the company put him on leave from his mechanic's job. A supervisor escorted him off the premises.

His work was good. He hadn't socked the boss or embezzled money. It had to do with what was inside him: diabetes.

U.P.S. framed it as a safety issue: Mr. Steigauf's blood sugar might suddenly plummet while he tested a truck, causing him to slam into someone.

Mr. Steigauf considered it discrimination, a taint that diabetes can carry. "I was regarded as a damaged piece of meat," he said. "It was like, 'You're one of those, and we can't have one of those.' "

With 21 million American diabetics, disputes like this have increasingly rippled through the workplace:

¶A mortgage loan officer in Oregon was denied permission to eat at her desk to stanch her sugar fluctuations, and eventually was fired.

¶A Sears lingerie saleswoman in Illinois with nerve damage in her leg quit after being told she could not cut through a stockroom to reach her department.

¶A worker at a candy company in Wisconsin was fired after asking where he could dispose of his insulin needles.

In each instance, diabetics contend that they are being blocked by their employers from the near-normal lives their doctors say are possible. But the companies say they are struggling, too, with confusion about whether diabetes is a legitimate disability and with concern about whether it is overly expensive, hazardous and disruptive to accommodate the illness.

The debate will probably intensify. The number of diabetics in America swelled by 80 percent in the past decade. Experts say the disease is on its way to becoming a conspicuous fact of life in the nation's labor force, raising all sorts of issues for workers and managers.

Even an outspoken advocate for diabetics like Fran Carpentier, a Type 1 diabetic and a senior editor at Parade magazine, understands the implications for business. "Knowing what it's like to live with the disease hour by hour, day by day, I wonder if I owned my own company if I would hire someone with diabetes," she said. "I'm being bluntly honest. And it kills me to say this."

Doctors, though, say that with improved medications and methods of self-testing blood sugar, most diabetics can do almost any job if they properly manage their illness. Yet myths about the disease persist, advocates say, leading many companies to shun diabetic employees.

"It's not all about ignorance, but if I can get rid of ignorance, I can get rid of a lot of discrimination," said Shereen Arent, the director of legal advocacy for the American Diabetes Association.

DOJ_NMG_0108718

Part of the confusion is a byproduct of the disease itself, a capricious illness of elevated, damaging levels of sugar in the blood. Type 1 is a malfunction of the immune system that usually appears in childhood, while the far more prevalent Type 2 is closely associated with obesity and inactivity. Many people with diabetes will face withering complications like blindness, amputations and heart disease. Others will not.

For some, particularly insulin users prone to the abnormal drops in blood sugar known as hypoglycemia, the illness can cause dizziness, fainting or muddled judgment. Doctors, however, say those constitute a tiny number of readily identifiable cases.

Nonetheless, the risk of plunging blood sugars has fueled a longstanding reluctance to employ diabetics in jobs like those of truck driver or police officer, if they are on insulin. Until this summer, the National Fire Protection Association cautioned against making it too easy for even non-insulin-dependent diabetics to become firefighters. Now the association recommends an individual assessment.

Federal law bars diabetics from joining the armed services and prevents diabetics on insulin from becoming commercial pilots.

Innumerable diabetics, though, are engaged in more mundane jobs uninvolved in matters of life and death. For these people, secretaries and factory workers and programmers, a "reasonable accommodation," like permission to eat at one's desk or to be excused from fluctuating shifts, can make the difference in whether they can function.

When disputes can't be resolved, the cases often land in court or before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The commission, which enforces the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990, says diabetes-related complaints have been on the rise, one of the few conditions generally showing an increase in complaints. Diabetes accounts for nearly 5 percent of the 15,000 annual allegations that the commission gets under that act, trailing only back impairment, other orthopedic injuries and depression.

Often the courts are of scant help in bringing clarity. Mr. Steigauf has spent two years trying to thread his way through the disability discrimination law. The federal law can be fuzzy, for it mentions no illness or handicap by name but supplies a legal test under which plaintiffs must usually demonstrate that a "major life activity," like walking or vision, is "substantially limited."

This is easy enough for anyone who has lost sight or a limb. But the restrictions of diabetes are often invisible. Diabetics thus can find themselves teetering on a balance beam, needing to prove they are disabled enough to fit under the law but not so impaired that they can't do a job.

Judges in nearly identical cases have ruled in completely opposite ways, leaving diabetics bewildered and businesses unsure what, if anything, they should do. While some courts, for example, have held that the eating restrictions diabetics face satisfy the substantial limitation, others have disagreed.

"Usually the battle is over that word, 'substantially,' " said Craig A. Crispin, an Oregon employment lawyer. "If you say the person is disabled because of the impact on eating, the other side will say: 'Hey, look, she's eating a sandwich. Where's the disability?' "

Seeking Accommodations

The quarrels are as varied as working life: a musician rejected for a cruise ship's cabaret band, baggage handlers and plane cleaners fired by an airline, a blackjack dealer dismissed by a casino.

The American Diabetes Association fields about 100 calls a month about workplace tussles like these. Many of them revolve around accommodations, though the changes sought tend to be modest: predictable hours, a place to test blood, freedom to snack when sugars get unbalanced.

Companies often cite workplace safety as their paramount concern, though there is little hard evidence to suggest that diabetics are a risk.

In one case in 2002, ConAgra Foods withdrew a job offer to Rudy Rodriguez at a Texas baked bean plant after a physical suggested that his Type 2 diabetes was so out of control that he was a hazard. Mr. Rodriguez had performed fine as an interim laborer, but the examining doctor declared there was nowhere he could safely work "outside of a padded room where he could even then fall and break his neck from dizziness or fainting."

An appeals court found otherwise and held that ConAgra had violated the law. The case was settled, and Mr. Rodriguez now works for a printer.

DOJ_NMG_0108719

"Some people who have a problem with hypoglycemia should not be doing public safety-type jobs," said John W. Griffin Jr., a lawyer from Texas with Type 2 diabetes who handles discrimination cases. "But I guarantee you that that baked bean factory was not public safety."

There has been other progress for diabetics: the San Antonio Police Department's barring of diabetics on insulin was struck down. Insulin-using diabetics in good control of their illness can get private pilot's licenses.

In the lingerie saleswoman's case, Sears agreed to a consent decree awarding the woman $150,000 and stipulating that the store train supervisors about disability discrimination.

Employers, however, prevail in a vast majority of cases (many are settled). It is hard even to get lawyers to pursue complaints since prejudice is tricky to prove. Establishing discrimination has become harder since 1999, when the Supreme Court held that if a disability can be corrected with medicine or things like prostheses, it is not necessarily protected. Advocates for the disabled say the ruling warped the intent of Congress.

Ruth Colker, a law professor at Ohio State University who studies disability discrimination, said that very few working people with diabetes now find themselves guarded by the law.

Judges, in fact, have deemed these diabetics not disabled: a Maine store manager who had trouble walking because of poor circulation, and a New York security guard without vision in one eye and declining vision in the other who had four episodes of hypoglycemia in two years.

In some instances, employers have said they took action against an employee because of diabetes, but the court still found that the worker was not disabled and threw out the case.

"There's not a remedy for every wrong," said David A. Copus, a lawyer who represents employers and specializes in disability issues. "There are employers who don't like ugly people. They're not protected by the law."

Mr. Copus said he was not unsympathetic. His father had diabetes; it was very debilitating.

Wary of bad outcomes, many diabetics conceal their illness on the job. Brian T. McMahon, a professor at Virginia Commonwealth University who studies workplace discrimination, said: "You get to the question of whether or not to disclose you have diabetes. Most people opt not to, for they fear: Am I inviting more trouble?"

Figuring Employer Costs

There was a time, four or five decades ago, when you wouldn't find one diabetic on the entire floor of a factory. Now, Type 2 diabetics are commonplace. It is not only the ascendancy of the disease, but also the fact that a condition once considered a corollary to old age is striking people sooner, catching them long before retirement. And this comes as companies are already struggling to balance productivity in the workplace with soaring medical costs.

To understand the brutal math of diabetes, all a business has to do is consult the Web site diabetesatwork.org, set up by the government to furnish advice on addressing diabetes in the workplace. One of its tools is a calculator that uses rough assumptions to suggest what costs might be involved.

Businesses plug in the number of employees, the tally is multiplied by 8.2 percent (a slightly dated national prevalence rate for diabetes), then that figure is multiplied by $13,243, an estimate for yearly medical costs of a diabetic. Voilà: the price tag of diabetes. It is a burden more than five times that of workers without diabetes.

Ron Z. Goetzel, a vice president for Thomson Medstat, which analyzes health care costs for businesses, said that if absenteeism and productivity losses are added, diabetes ranks third among major conditions as an economic cost to employers, after heart disease and hypertension.

Companies have only started to reckon with this, and with the disease's ancillary concerns. Even if advocates say safety is rarely a factor, companies argue they cannot take chances with some types of workers, like school bus drivers or even pizza deliverers.

Concessions may seem small — for example, granting a bank teller more frequent breaks — but many employers contend that if rules bend for one person, then that breeds resentment among other employees. Co-workers cannot see the diabetes, and if an employer gives preferential treatment to a diabetic worker, it cannot legally tell other workers it is because of the diabetes. Companies feel that indulging all diabetics trivializes the meaning of disability and of fairness.

DOJ_NMG_0108720

"It comes down to how many extra points do I give you," said William J. Kilberg, a Washington employment lawyer. "Why is everybody a victim?"

He said too many people who are not disabled demand special favors. "I mean, I wear eyeglasses," he said.

In addition to the threat of a suit under federal or state disability law, businesses must grapple with the Family and Medical Leave Act, which requires them to grant unpaid leave to ill workers. That can create scheduling difficulties.

"This whole area gets complicated, because the medical leave act can mean employees absent from the workplace for extended periods," said Stephen A. Bokat, general counsel for the United States Chamber of Commerce. "That bothers employers even more than an employee needing a half-hour during the day to administer some insulin."

Health care consultants urge companies to become proactive, try to use tools like wellness programs to forestall diabetes' claim on their workers and install disease management programs to improve existing cases. And many do. Companies dangle $100 incentives (though more often a mug or a T-shirt) if an employee submits to a health assessment or accepts a phone call from a health coach.

But getting participation is hard. And the economic worth of these undertakings to a business is difficult to gauge with a progressive disease like diabetes. Sometimes the evident benefits of in-house health programs are years down the road, when an employee a business invested in may well be working elsewhere.

When Safety Comes First

John Steigauf's fellow mechanics called him "Flunky." The name caught on after Mr. Steigauf gave advice to a prickly supervisor, who thundered, "I'm not going to let some flunky mechanic tell me how to do my job." Mr. Steigauf, 47, wanted it embroidered onto his uniform. Supervisors said forget it.

He joined United Parcel in Minneapolis in 1991, turning wrenches from the start. Five years ago, he learned that he had Type 2 diabetes. Though it often goes with being overweight, he had a wide receiver's build: 6-foot-2, 193 pounds. But his mother had diabetes.

He was put on pills and watched his diet, abandoning his cherished hot chocolate. Yet his blood sugar remained high. If it didn't drop, he would need insulin. That sent fear pumping through him.

U.P.S. requires mechanics, like its interstate drivers, to hold a commercial driver's license and to be cleared to drive out of state so they can road-test trucks. In reality, mechanics could go weeks without leaving the yard, but those were the rules. And at the time, federal officials did not grant interstate licenses to insulin-using diabetics.

They did dispense a few exemptions. But Mr. Steigauf, who started using insulin only in 2004, stood no chance. The requirement was to have driven safely while on insulin for three years.

So Mr. Steigauf tried starving himself, slicing off 30 pounds. It made him crabby, fatigued and so thin "that if I stuck my tongue out, I looked like a zipper."

His blood sugars did not budge. But after he took insulin, his diabetes settled down almost at once.

Later in 2004, he had to have a physical to renew his commercial license, a test he could no longer pass. Minnesota did not have the three-year rule, and since he had never had a hypoglycemic episode or other problems, Mr. Steigauf got an exemption to drive within the state. Given that he didn't even leave the county while road-testing trucks, he hoped that would be good enough.

It wasn't. For consistency, U.P.S. wanted all its mechanics to be certified to drive from state to state, whether they needed to or not. So Mr. Steigauf was sent home on disability, even though he felt fine.

Norman Black, a U.P.S. spokesman, said the company had always intended to find Mr. Steigauf another position. He said the company did not discriminate but was passionate about safety.

Studies tracking accident rates of diabetics are inconclusive; some indicate worse outcomes, others don't. But either way, Mr. Steigauf's direct supervisor at the time, Dan Welke, said he thought the company had gone too far, that somebody else could road-test the trucks repaired by Mr. Steigauf.

"It just seemed ridiculous," Mr. Welke said.

Mr. Steigauf also had trouble making sense of this. When his diabetes raged out of control, it had been all right to fix trucks. Now, with the illness under control, it wasn't.

DOJ_NMG_0108721

When he spoke to someone in human resources, Mr. Steigauf said he was told that he would never come back. The notion that he was a human tinderbox punctuated his interactions. "I'd be told that I could pull a tractor up to a fuel pump and pass out and the thing would explode," he said. "I was like a grenade and was going to kill people."

At home in Bloomington, Minn., where Mr. Steigauf's tidy ranch is bordered by a soupçon of lawn, he, his wife, Dawn, their twin daughters and their severely autistic son struggled on a weekly disability check of $431, about half his old pay.

To keep going, he did odd jobs. Friends at U.P.S. dug into their pockets. The family cut one another's hair and skipped sending Christmas cards.

Finally, Mr. Steigauf asked U.P.S. to excuse him from interstate driving as a "reasonable accommodation" under disability law. After all, he had left the state for U.P.S. only once in 13 years. Some of his colleagues, he found out, did not even have commercial driver's licenses.

But U.P.S. refused, saying he was not disabled under discrimination law, and thus not entitled to an accommodation.

So, in early 2005, he filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and waited, interned in his house, as if he had evaporated — all the while collecting disability from a company that said he was not disabled.

After seven months, U.P.S. offered him a lower-paying job, fixing trailers. He could not touch an engine or drive. But he took it while he battled for his former position.

Then he had some luck. Federal officials changed their rules on interstate licenses and Mr. Steigauf qualified for a waiver, allowing him to return to his old job. He is expected to start within a month or so.

This fall, the E.E.O.C. concluded that he had been discriminated against and that U.P.S. owed him relief. U.P.S. said it would contest the decision.

Mr. Steigauf is still bitter, not toward U.P.S. itself, but toward the way he believes it treats diabetics. Even now, he feels singled out.

"I've had unloaders at work say to me, 'Are you that diabetic guy?' " he said. "I don't know what they mean. Nothing? Or, 'You shouldn't be working here'?"

To keep his exemption, he must obey a complicated protocol to show the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration that he remains fit. Every three months, he has to report how much he drives and his sugar levels. If he has an accident, even if someone rams his car while he's in a movie, he has two days to alert the government. He has seven days to let the government know if he has a new car or a new phone number.

"The exemption adds to the discrimination," he said one afternoon at home. "It constantly reminds me that I'm different."

His children skittered through the room.

"You become a show dog," he said. "I fix engines. I don't want to be a show dog."

ANTITRUST:

Judge Postpones Delphi Hearing After New Plan (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain postponed a key hearing in the Delphi Corp. bankruptcy case to Jan. 11 from Jan. 5, allowing more time for critics to compose arguments against the auto-parts supplier's proposed $3.4 billion bankruptcy-emergence equity deal with a group of investors led by Appaloosa Management.

The bankruptcy court must approve the deal by Jan. 22, or it can be nullified by the Appaloosa group, according to a letter the hedge fund's team sent to Delphi last week. Cerberus Capital Management, hedge fund Harbinger Capital, Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS AG's UBS Securities are part of Appaloosa's team.

Judge Drain changed the hearing date following an alternative $4.7 billion funding plan proposed Thursday by hedge fund Highland Capital, which says it owns about 8.8% of Delphi's stock and has positioned itself as a rival to Appaloosa in the battle to shape Delphi's future. The fund's actions highlight the growing interest among private-capital players in the restructuring of the U.S. auto industry.

DOJ_NMG_0108722

Highland accuses the Appaloosa team of forging a deal that gives too much preference to the investment group. Other stakeholders have also filed court papers expressing displeasure with the Appaloosa plan, which was first announced early last week.

Separately, General Motors Corp. said it plans to honor an agreement with the Appaloosa team not to talk to other Delphi stakeholders about alternative funding plans before April 2, though GM spokeswoman Renee Rashid-Merem said there may be certain contingencies that eventually allow the auto maker to discuss alternative plans with other stakeholders, including Highland, prior to April 2.

GM, which spun off Delphi in 1999, stands to hold about a 5% equity stake in the new Delphi under Appaloosa's proposal.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin said the Troy, Mich., company will consider Highland's proposal and discuss its merit with its board.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

After Long Struggle, Whooping Crane Population Hits Milestone (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

AUSTWELL, Tex. -- One of the most beloved groups of winter Texans is back, in the largest number in a century and with a record 45 youngsters in tow, including an even rarer seven pairs of twins.

They flew 2,400 miles from Canada's Northwest Territories and can be seen munching on blue crabs and bright red-orange wolfberries among the marshes of the Aransas National Wildlife Refuge.

The whooping crane, the tallest bird in North America, whose numbers dwindled to fewer than 20 in 1941, is not only back from the brink of extinction but also thriving -- a comeback story, federal wildlife officials say, that illustrates how a coordinated conservation effort can save a species.

"The whooping crane continues to mirror the success of endangered species recovery when man sets his mind to it," said Tom Stehn, the national whooping crane coordinator for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. "We have come a long way, but we do have a long, long way to go."

This year, the nation's only natural wild population of whooping cranes reached a milestone. Stehn's mid-December census of the migratory crane flock at the wildlife refuge, where he is based, numbered 237. Combined with the number of birds in captivity in three special flocks raised for reintroduction to the wild and those in zoos, the crane population now numbers 518. This is the first time in more than a century that whooping cranes have numbered more than 500.

Deboarding from the tour boat Skimmer at Aransas one sunny morning a few days before Christmas, Mike Dixon explained why he and his family drove in from West Texas just to see the huge white birds and their rusty brown chicks.

"Those birds out there are the result of a whole lot of effort, money and concern to save a species, and that's exciting," he said.

Recovery efforts date to 1938, a year after the federal government established the Aransas Wildlife Refuge along the south Texas Gulf Coast. The salt marsh was known to be the winter home of several species of migratory birds, including the majestic whooping crane, with its long sinuous neck, height of five feet and wingspan of seven feet.

The cranes numbered just over 20 in the first census, in 1938. By 1941, the migratory flock was down to 15, largely because of shooting, the conversion of grasslands to agriculture and the draining of wetlands.

"This species was virtually four nesting females away from extinction, and that's why this is so significant," Stehn said. "It was just such a close call, such an incredibly close call."

The crane's breeding grounds were unknown until 1954, when a fire crew flying over Wood Buffalo National Park in Canada's Northwest Territories accidentally discovered the migratory flock. In the United States, the whooping crane was listed as a threatened species in 1968 and moved to the endangered list two years later, prompting a series of efforts to increase the flock's size.

DOJ_NMG_0108723

From the mid-1970s to the late 1980s, whooping crane eggs were placed in sandhill crane nests in Idaho so the sandhill cranes could teach the whoopers how to survive in the wild, when to migrate and where to winter. But that whooping crane flock never paired or reproduced, and the last whooper in the Rocky Mountains died in 2002.

U.S. scientists also developed a technique in the 1980s for raising whoopers in captivity by using crane handlers -- humans dressed in costumes that resemble cranes -- to raise chicks in isolation from actual human contact, so they grow up to be wild. Starting in 1993, many of those captive cranes have been released yearly in central Florida, where they have stayed because they never learned how to migrate, behavior that would normally be passed on by their parents.

In 2001, the Whooping Crane Eastern Partnership, an American-Canadian partnership of governments, nonprofit organizations, citizens and corporations, developed a method to teach captive-raised whoopers how to migrate so they could be introduced to the wild. Since then, young cranes have been led in migration every fall by gliders flying from the Necedah National Wildlife Refuge in Wisconsin to the Chassahowitzka National Wildlife Refuge in Florida, 1,200 miles away. The cranes return on their own in the spring.

These efforts involve the Canadian and U.S. governments; federal agencies such as the Fish and Wildlife Service and the Geological Survey; state agencies; conservation groups such as the Whooping Crane Eastern Partnership and the International Crane Foundation of Baraboo, Wis.; and local zoos.

"For all of us, this is exactly what we are all about: trying to get animals reproduced and back out in the wild," said San Antonio Zoo bird curator Josef San Miguel. His staff specializes in costume-rearing whooping crane chicks, some of which are donated yearly to the International Crane Foundation for the glider migration project.

"It's a group effort, and when you hear the birds are doing what we need for them to do, it makes us all feel good," San Miguel said.

Extremely good nest production this summer in Wood Buffalo National Park is credited with producing this winter's record flock at the Aransas refuge. Stuart Macmillan, a biologist at Wood Buffalo, cited favorable breeding conditions such as adequate water levels in ponds where cranes build their nests, an ample food supply and fewer natural predators.

Today's threats to the species are power lines, which cranes crash into during migration; loss of stopover habitat; a lack of genetic diversity; disease; and a decline in habitat conditions at the Aransas refuge because less freshwater is flowing into the salt marsh.

"There are a lot of threats out there on the horizon, and that's what worries us," Stehn said. The whooping crane is likely to remain on the endangered species list until the migratory flock numbers more than 5,000, he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Bipartisan Effort To Draft Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25 — Counting on the support of the new Democratic majority in Congress, Democratic lawmakers and their Republican allies are working on measures that could place millions of illegal immigrants on a more direct path to citizenship than would a bill that the Senate passed in the spring.

The lawmakers are considering abandoning a requirement in the Senate bill that would compel several million illegal immigrants to leave the United States before becoming eligible to apply for citizenship.

The lawmakers are also considering denying financing for 700 miles of fencing along the border with Mexico, a law championed by Republicans that passed with significant Democratic support.

Details of the bill, which would be introduced early next year, are being drafted. The lawmakers, who hope for bipartisan support, will almost certainly face pressure to compromise on the issues from some Republicans and conservative Democrats.

Still, the proposals reflect significant shifts since the November elections, as well as critical support from the Homeland Security Department.

DOJ_NMG_0108724

Proponents said the prospects for such a measure, which would include tougher border security and a guest worker plan, had markedly improved since Nov. 7.

The Senate plans to introduce its immigration bill next month with an eye toward passage in March or April, officials said. The House is expected to consider its version later. President Bush said last week that he hoped to sign an immigration bill next year.

The major lawmakers drafting the legislation include Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, and John McCain, Republican of Arizona, along with Representatives Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, and Luis V. Gutierrez, Democrat of Illinois. The four met this month, and their staffs have begun working on a bill.

"I'm very hopeful about this, both in terms of the substance and the politics of it," said Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Senate Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship Subcommittee.

Mr. Kennedy acknowledged that there would be hurdles. But he and other lawmakers say Republicans and Democrats are now more likely to work together to repair a system widely considered as broken.

House Republicans blocked consideration of the bill that passed the Senate this year, saying it amounted to an amnesty for lawbreakers and voicing confidence that a tough stance would touch off a groundswell of support in the Congressional elections. The strategy largely failed.

Hispanic voters, a swing constituency that Republicans covet, abandoned the party in large numbers. Several Republican hardliners, including Representatives John Hostettler of Indiana and J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, lost their seats. After the dismal showing, House Republicans denied F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, the departing chairman of the Judiciary Committee and an architect of the House immigration approach, a senior position on any major committee in the new Congress.

Domestic security officials have voiced support for important elements of the framework under consideration. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has repeatedly raised doubts about the effectiveness of border fencing in remote desert areas. Mr. Bush signed the fence bill this year, but Congress did not appropriate enough money for it. Officials say they would also prefer a less burdensome process than the original Senate bill outlined.

That bill divided the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants into three groups, those living here for five years or more, those here for two to five years and those here for less than two years.

All but the illegal immigrants living here for five years or more, roughly seven million, would have to leave the country briefly to be eligible for legal status. Those here for fewer than two years would have to leave the country and would not even be guaranteed a slot in a guest worker plan.

Domestic security officials said the original plan would have been enormously difficult to administer because many illegal immigrants lacked documentation to prove how long they had been in the United States.

The officials said it would have fueled a market in fraudulent documents as illegal immigrants scrambled to offer proof of residency.

The three-tiered approach would also discourage millions of illegal immigrants from registering, driving millions deeper underground.

"We do have concerns over breaking it down into that tiered system," said a domestic security official who insisted on anonymity. "When you do that, you run the risk of people trying to create false documentation that would get them the highest benefits."

Also expected to have prominent roles in the debate are Representatives Zoe Lofgren, the California Democrat who is likely to head the House Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee; Howard L. Berman, a California Democrat who has followed immigration issues closely for many years; and Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who is set to lead the House Homeland Security Committee and has said he plans to re-evaluate the 700-mile fence.

But Mr. Flake described himself as optimistic, saying the elections had disabused many Republicans of the notion that opposing legalization and guest worker plans would win widespread support.

"That illusion is gone," he said.

The percentage of Hispanics who voted for Republicans fell to 29 percent, from 44 percent in 2004, and some Republicans say passing immigration bills is a crucial part of the effort to win them back.

DOJ_NMG_0108725

Mr. Flake warned that some Republicans might balk at proposals like broadening the number of illegal immigrants eligible for a less burdensome path to citizenship, making passage of bipartisan legislation potentially "politically more difficult."

The prospects for a bill that contains such a proposal remain particularly uncertain in the House, where many prominent Democrats want to ensure broad bipartisan backing as part of their efforts to maintain their majority in 2008, Congressional aides said.

The House Democrats are concerned about protecting newly elected moderate and conservative Democrats, some of whom had campaigned against legalizing illegal immigrants.

It is also unclear whether Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Flake will produce the only House legislation on immigration and whether their plan will ultimately become the basis for the bill that emerges.

In the Senate, Mr. Kennedy's bill certainly has the backing of the Democratic leadership, Congressional aides said.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, argued that expanding citizenship eligibility and abandoning financing for the fence would alienate moderates in both parties. The three-tier legalization system, a hard-fought compromise, was critical for moderate Republican support for the original bill.

The plan under consideration would allow 10 million or 11 million illegal immigrants to become eligible to apply for citizenship without returning home, up from 7 million in the original Senate bill. To be granted citizenship, they would have to remain employed, pass background checks, pay fines and back taxes, and enroll in English classes.

"I think it's a nonstarter," said Mr. Cornyn, who opposes a path to citizenship for illegal workers, but supports a plan for temporary workers that would let foreigners work here temporarily before returning home.

Congressional aides and lawyers familiar with the proposed bills emphasize that it will be very difficult for a smaller group of illegal immigrants, those who arrived after a certain date, perhaps 2004, to become citizens. The aides said the bill might include incentives for illegal immigrants to leave the country. While they hope such elements may ease concerns, many challenges remain.

Some powerful unions, which expect to exert more leverage in the new Congress, remain deeply opposed to the temporary worker program in the Senate bill. The unions say it threatens American jobs.

Officials at the A.F.L.-C.I.O. say they can scuttle such a plan next year, even though Mr. Bush and businesses say it is critical to ensure an adequate labor force.

There is also the political clock to consider. Supporters of immigration measures acknowledge that the prospects for a bipartisan bill will dim significantly if a bill is not passed before the presidential primaries of 2008 are in full swing.

Some Congressional aides and immigrants' advocates worry about the commitment of Mr. McCain, a likely presidential candidate in 2008.

Mr. McCain has long supported legalization that would not require illegal immigrants to leave the United States. Some advocates fear that his ambitions may lead to a shifting of that stance to avoid alienating moderate Republicans.

A spokeswoman for Mr. McCain said last week that he was not available to comment on the bill being drafted.

Many lawmakers say their hope is growing that Congress will pass an immigration bill next year.

"There are going to be hard choices that are going to be made, because we need to build a bipartisan, broad-based coalition," said Mr. Gutierrez, who leads the House Democratic immigration group. "But I'm hopeful that in the environment in which we're working now we can get it done."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Pledge To Restrain Spending (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Determined to banish their old tax-and-spend image, Democrats want to shrink the federal deficit, preserve tax cuts for the middle class and challenge the president to raise money for the Iraq war when they take control of Congress next week. But it won't be easy.

DOJ_NMG_0108726

The incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget committees said they plan to honor a campaign promise to devote billions of additional dollars a year to homeland security and education. And they reiterated a commitment not to cut off funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But with the costs of those military operations rising and President Bush considering an expansion of forces, the incoming chairmen, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.) and Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.), said they will have little room in their budget blueprints for significant new domestic spending, such as closing a much-criticized gap in the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit that forces millions of seniors to pay 100 percent of drug costs for a few weeks or months each year.

They said they will press Bush to help finance a war that is costing the nation as much as $8 billion a month.

"Raising taxes would certainly be an option," Conrad said in an interview. "The president, this is his policy. He's got an obligation to pay for it."

The two chairmen said they would seek to save money by demanding a better accounting of military spending and an end to "the ever-expanding 'shadow budget' of supplemental and bridge funds," as they put it in a letter to the White House last week that was also signed by outgoing Senate Budget Committee chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). Those budget mechanisms have funneled more than $500 billion to terror-related operations since Sept. 11, 2001, with little scrutiny from the Republican lawmakers who are leaving power. Spratt said he would spend most of January in oversight hearings to determine where the money is going.

"When the president talks about staying the course, he never mentions cost as a factor," Spratt said. "But it is a factor, particularly when you get costs over $100 billion a year."

Spratt and Conrad said they would aim to balance the budget by 2012, a goal that could anger liberal Democrats eager for new spending on domestic programs and conservative Republicans determined to preserve the tax cuts passed during Bush's first term. But it also could establish the Democrats as able stewards of the nation's treasury, political analysts said, giving the party's presidential candidates an important accomplishment for the 2008 campaign.

"In terms of practical politics, the reality is this: We have to be on good behavior so we have a chance to win the presidency," said Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), a leader of the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative House Democrats whose ranks swelled to 44 in the November elections. "We have a chance now of having a new Democratic Party that supports the middle class and has middle-class priorities at heart."

Republicans and budget experts say they doubt Democrats can simultaneously cut the deficit and meet their spending goals, especially given GOP opposition to higher taxes. Bush's top budget advisers said last week that they see no need to increase taxes to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which are expected to cost $170 billion this year, up from $120 billion in fiscal 2006.

Despite the rising expense of the war, the annual budget deficit declined to $248 billion in the fiscal year ended in September because of an unexpected surge in tax collections.

"Revenues are up because of a growing economy," said White House budget director Rob Portman. "That has enabled us not just to afford the relatively high [war] supplementals -- higher than we expected -- but actually to decline the deficit."

Democrats say the annual deficit is kept artificially low with cash borrowed from the Social Security trust fund. The nation's overall indebtedness is approaching $9 trillion, and interest on that debt grew by 23 percent last year, making it the fastest-growing part of the budget.

Less than 20 percent of the budget is available for education, highways, housing and courts, discretionary programs that are being further squeezed by an increasingly expensive military. In the session that just ended, Congress failed to pass budget bills for most domestic agencies, in part because lawmakers refused to support painful spending restraints.

Two weeks ago, Democrats announced plans to plug some of the most difficult holes in the current fiscal year by stripping funds for lawmakers' pet projects, known as earmarks, from the bills. For next year, Spratt and Conrad said they plan to keep the purse strings pulled tight on discretionary programs and apply a pay-as-you-go rule to changes in tax policy and mandatory programs such as Social Security and health care.

That will force Democrats to find spending cuts or new revenue to pay for some big-ticket items: They have promised to halve interest rates for federal student loans, which would cost as much as $60 billion over five years. They want more money for border and port security, first responders and the National Guard. They say health programs for children and veterans need more cash to avoid dropping thousands of people from their rolls. And they want to extend some of the Bush tax cuts that are set to expire in 2010, including an expanded child credit, a reduction in the so-called marriage penalty and the new 10 percent tax bracket.

DOJ_NMG_0108727

Plus, Democrats have promised to freeze the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax structure that will add thousands of dollars to the tax bills of millions of families unless Congress comes up with about $50 billion to halt its expansion for another year.

Democrats say they will cover that cost by ending tax breaks on foreign profits of U.S. businesses, closing corporate tax shelters, cutting subsidies to oil and gas companies and giving the federal government authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. They would also tap the vast amount of uncollected tax revenue known as the tax gap, which has been projected at $300 billion a year.

But some of those funding sources are highly uncertain. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has said negotiating drug prices is unlikely to produce much savings. Past attempts to harness the tax gap have produced little new revenue.

Without more money, Democrats will face "a real struggle for which wins out: the political promises or the fiscal-responsibility promise," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a nonpartisan group that opposes deficits. "If the public perceives that they're making real choices and cutting back on some things they want to do politically because they're trying to be fiscally responsible, then they can declare victory." But if people perceive that they're honoring fiscal restraint in word but not in deed, then they'll look pretty silly, Bixby said.

So far, Bixby said, he has been impressed by Democratic leaders' commitment to deficit reduction, calling the elimination of earmarks "rather stunning." Another Blue Dog leader, Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), said the Democrats' conservative wing will block any effort in the House to backslide on those promises.

"Yes, there's going to be tough medicine," Cardoza said. "But we are incredibly united behind these goals. And they need us to do anything."

OTHER NEWS:

Roberts Leading Court In More Media-friendly Direction (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Many Supreme Court justices prize the anonymity that comes with their lifetime appointments and camera-free courtroom. Unrecognized, justices have snapped pictures for tourists in front of the court or been asked to move out of the way of a shot.

On rare occasion, a justice might consent to an interview on the C-SPAN cable network to discuss a recent book or be shown addressing a lawyers' gathering somewhere.

Lately, however, some members of the court have been popping up in unusual places — including network television news programs — and talking about more than just the law.

For an institution that has kept the media at a comfortable distance for much of its existence, the Supreme Court's increasingly public face is astonishing, said University of Chicago law professor Dennis Hutchinson, who served as a law clerk for Justices Byron White and William Douglas.

"More and more, the justices are spending time talking off the bench informally to reporters, on the record, off the record, in public, on tape, on film," Hutchinson said.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer recently debated their competing views of the Constitution. Breyer and retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor have talked publicly and repeatedly about threats to judicial independence. Justice Samuel Alito proudly affirmed his membership in the conservative Federalist Society, speaking in a packed ballroom at its recent convention.

DOJ_NMG_0108728

Perhaps most noteworthy, though, has been the media-friendly attitude adoped by new Chief Justice John Roberts, in contrast to his predecessor William Rehnquist. Roberts recently was featured on ABC News' Nightline discussing both his view of the court and his son Jack's Spiderman imitation at Roberts' introduction by President Bush.

"Roberts is putting a smiley face in the center chair," said Hutchinson, who recalled earlier eras in which chief justices rigorously avoided the press and looked askance at their colleagues who consented to the rare interview.

Having spent more of his legal career as an advocate than as a judge, Roberts is at ease on a public stage. He has longstanding professional relationships with many in the court's veteran reporting corps.

For many years, justices held to the view that the court's mystique and reputation were enhanced by their distance from the public. The justices spoke through their written opinions, laying out not only what they had decided, but why.

Their unbending refusal to allow cameras in the courtroom has been part and parcel of this belief that the Supreme Court is unlike the Congress and the presidency in that it does not serve at the pleasure of voters.

Rehnquist could stroll around the court, unrecognized by tourists. Justice Anthony Kennedy snapped a photograph for visitors who had no idea who he was. Justice John Paul Stevens once was asked to move out of the way by a picture-taking tourist.

Now comes Roberts, who appears intent on allowing the public more of a look inside the court, although the prospect of televised court sessions still seems remote. He also heartily endorsed tighter ethics rules for judges, although those rules do not apply to the Supreme Court.

Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine law professor and Justice Department official in earlier Republican administrations, said Roberts' public relations effort is in line with his desire to have the court issue narrower, more consensual rulings.

"I think he feels a burden of explanation. The court has become so much the storm center of cultural controversy. Roberts is committed to not having that be so," Kmiec said. "If that's the case, it requires a certain amount of public explanation."

Stephen Wermiel, a law professor at American University, agreed that "the idea of more consensus brought about by narrower decision making enhances the public image of the court."

Yet Breyer and Scalia, for instance, have said they don't necessarily agree with the chief's call for greater consensus on the court. Scalia made clear he prefers bold rulings that serve as a guide for lower courts and lawyers, saying narrow rulings can be so constricted as to be useless

Another possibility, said University of Virginia law professor G. Edward White, is that the court will stay in the middle of national controversies and that Roberts believes its credibility will be enhanced if the justices appear less remote.

It may also be that the justices believe they can keep proponents of even greater openness, especially cameras in the courtroom, at bay.

At this early stage in his tenure, it is unclear just where the court is headed. With Roberts and Alito two new conservative faces on the court, high-profile cases involving abortion, race and the environment await decisions.

But by courting the media, the chief justice already has broken with his predecessors in one respect.

Italian In Poison Case Arrested (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

ROME — An Italian who met with an ex-KGB agent around the time that radiation made the Russian fatally ill was arrested Sunday on charges of international arms trafficking and slander, the Italian man's father said.

The accusations against Mario Scaramella were not believed to be directly related to the investigation into the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko.

Scaramella, the first person connected to the poisoning case to be arrested, met Litvinenko at a London sushi bar Nov. 1, the apparent day that the former agent was poisoned. Litvinenko died of exposure to polonium-210 on Nov. 23.

Amedeo Scaramella said his son was arrested in Naples after returning from London, where he had been hospitalized for radiation exposure.

Ten people in Britain have tested positive for exposure since Litvinenko died.

DOJ_NMG_0108729

Scaramella said he showed Litvinenko e-mails at the Nov. 1 meeting from a confidential source identifying the possible killers of Russian investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya and listing other potential targets for assassination — including himself and Litvinenko.

On his deathbed, Litvinenko blamed Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his poisoning — an allegation that the Kremlin denied.

Ethiopian Jets Strafe Mogadishu Airports (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 25 — An Ethiopian fighter jet strafed Mogadishu's airport on Monday in a striking show of force that took the growing conflict in the Horn of Africa to Somalia's capital for the first time.

Across the country, Somalia's Islamist leaders conceded that they were rapidly losing territory to the forces of Somalia's internationally recognized transitional government.

In Beledweyne, a town near the Ethiopian border, residents resumed the lives they had led before Islamist rule, not even a day after the Islamist forces pulled out. A truck hauling chat, a mildly narcotic leaf that the Islamists had outlawed, pulled into the market to a burst of cheers.

"It was wonderful to see that truck," said Farah Abdi Dereer, a vendor of spare parts.

The fighting between Somalia's transitional government and the country's powerful Islamist movement, based in Mogadishu, has been raging on and off for nearly a week.

On Sunday, Ethiopia officially joined the hostilities, with the tacit blessing of the United States, bombing Islamist positions in several frontline areas and pushing ground troops deep into Somali territory. Ethiopian officials said they sided with the transitional government because the Islamists, whom American officials have accused of harboring Qaeda terrorists, posed a threat to the region.

On Monday, witnesses in Mogadishu said that a lone Ethiopian fighter jet roared over the Indian Ocean around 9 a.m., fired machine guns at the parking lot of the international airport, which was mostly empty, and banked sharply away.

The attack was apparently meant to be more a demonstration of military might than a destructive mission; the only reported casualty was an airport janitor who was slightly wounded. It did, however, have the intended effect of shutting the airport down as Daallo Airlines, one of the last carriers to fly into Somalia, promptly canceled all service.

Witnesses said four more Ethiopian fighter planes then attacked an intensely guarded military airport west of Mogadishu, where the Islamist forces stored their heavy weapons and ammunition.

Ethiopian officials said they were following specific instructions by the transitional government to seal Somalia's borders to bar foreign fighters. According to United Nations officials, the Islamists are supported by several thousand Eritreans, Libyans, Syrians and Yemenis who have responded to the call of a holy war against Ethiopia, a Christian-led country.

In Baidoa, the inland seat of the transitional government, top officials were sounding increasingly confident. After months of isolation in a provincial market town, too weak to spread their administration to Somalia's cities, transitional government officials laid out an ambitious three-part plan.

"We're going to eradicate the enemy, we're going to appoint administrators and we're going to rule nationwide," said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed.

A few weeks ago, this would have sounded preposterous. But the injection of forces from Ethiopia, which commands the most powerful military in the region, seems to be changing Somalia's wobbly balance of power.

Still, with attacks and counterattacks continuing, the outcome remains uncertain. Western diplomats have cautioned Ethiopia not to try to overthrow the Islamists and occupy Mogadishu, fearing that would spawn a long, messy guerrilla war.

Already, thousands of people, with barely enough to eat before conflict struck, are fleeing their homes and their farms, creating a worrisome situation for the few aid organizations still operating in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0108730

Ethiopian officials reiterated Monday that they felt they were forced to act because of the threat the Islamists posed to their security. So far, the Ethiopian military seems to be selecting targets mostly outside urban areas in an effort to reduce civilian casualties.

But the extent of the casualties is hard to tell. Warfare in Somalia is traditionally mobile and small scale, fought between armed pickup trucks and small crews of fighters. Red Cross officials have said that they have treated more than 400 people for combat injuries, and United Nations officials put the death toll from the past week in the low hundreds.

Both sides have published pictures of the dead sprawled on the battlefield. On Monday, the Islamists showed images of prisoners of war with their arms bound behind their backs and their throats slit. Last week, the Islamists vowed to execute all captives.

Though the Islamist leaders conceded Monday that they had retreated from two towns they had controlled (the transitional government said the true number was five), they seemed unbowed. Mosques in Mogadishu continued to blare out recruitment calls, and thousands of young men, many in their early teens, continued to enlist.

But some people in Mogadishu who used to support the Islamists — who did indeed bring a semblance of order to a very dangerous city — were beginning to express doubts.

Asho Ali, a mother of eight, went to the hospital on Sunday to see her 16-year-old son, who had been wounded fighting for the Islamists. On Monday, he died.

“For no reason we are losing our children,” she said. “Why are they doing this?”

Ethiopia Steps Up Attacks On Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 25 -- Ethiopian warplanes attacked the airport in Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, on Monday in another major escalation of fighting between the Ethiopian-backed Somali government and the Islamic Courts movement that in recent months has taken over much of the country.

In Mogadishu, businesses shut down and thousands of enraged Somalis loyal to the Islamic movement rallied in the streets, once again proclaiming holy war against Ethiopia, a bitter enemy that is widely perceived to be supported by the U.S. government. Witnesses said young Somali men who have grown up in a country awash with AK-47 assault rifles continued to pour into recruiting centers to sign up to fight.

And 150 miles away on the front lines near Baidoa, seat of the fragile interim government, sources said that fighters from Eritrea and Pakistan, among others, had joined the Islamic movement's battle against Ethiopia in a conflict that analysts fear could engulf the Horn of Africa.

"The feelings are very bad, very confusing -- everywhere, it's confusing," said a businessman in Mogadishu who did not want to be identified. "I didn't expect this scale of war, but most Somalis, even if they were fighting each other before on a clan basis, they are united now against Ethiopia. And there's a feeling that the international community is not helping."

Thousands of Somalis who had fled war and drought earlier this year and epic flooding in recent weeks once again abandoned villages, leaving behind fields and livestock at harvest time, aid workers said. Droves of villagers trudged down muddy roads toward refugee camps just across the Kenyan border. The camps are already full of Somalis displaced by years of fighting and natural disasters.

"These families are really pushed into the extreme limits," Pedram Yazdi, a spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross, said from Nairobi, adding that Red Cross-supported medical facilities had received more than 440 wounded and that the total "is rising every hour." Aid workers believe the number of dead is in the hundreds.

Meanwhile, Ethiopian officials said on state-run television Monday that they would continue the assault against the Islamic movement and vowed to push toward Mogadishu, clearing the Islamic fighters out of every town they control over the next five days. By Monday night, Ethiopian forces, which are vastly superior to the Islamic movement in conventional military terms, had secured the strategically important town of Beledweyne, which is near the Ethiopian border and along a main road to Mogadishu.

DOJ_NMG_0108731

The Associated Press reported that Ethiopian and government forces had also captured three villages in a push toward Jowhar, about 60 miles north of Mogadishu.

AP also reported that airstrikes hit a second airport, Baledogle Airport, outside Mogadishu.

Negotiations between Somalia's weak but internationally recognized interim government and the Islamic movement have fallen apart in recent months as the Islamic group has become stronger and advanced its control. The current conflict began even as the two sides had signed an agreement to de-escalate fighting and resume talks.

Analysts believe that Ethiopia's offensive is intended to force the movement back into negotiations by changing the situation on the ground.

But some analysts have expressed fear that Ethiopia's military calculation is seriously flawed, and that even if its superior military initially routs the Islamic movement, the ideologically driven militias will become only more motivated to pursue a guerrilla-style war or terrorist attacks across the region.

Ethiopia, which has fought two wars with Somalia in the past 45 years, is perceived as a historically Christian nation, though Muslims now make up nearly half its population.

"Hasn't anyone heard of Iraq?" said John Prendergast, a senior analyst with the International Crisis Group in Washington. "A military strategy of 'countering terrorism' never works and will likely blow up in their faces."

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has maintained, however, that this is a war of self-defense and that dialogue has only bought the Islamic movement time to expand its control. He has repeatedly accused the Islamic movement of supporting secessionist Somali groups inside Ethiopia, and, along with the United States, has accused the movement of harboring terrorists, an allegation it has denied.

Though the United States has remained on the sidelines as the situation has deteriorated, Meles has said he has support for a defensive war from the United States, which fears that Somalia, a country without a central government since 1991, could become a new base for terrorist groups.

Opposition groups inside Ethiopia say that Meles, an increasingly authoritarian leader, has shrewdly played up the terrorism charges to win U.S. support. Based in part on intelligence out of Ethiopia, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer has asserted that the Islamic movement is now under the control of an al-Qaeda cell, a claim that regional analysts believe is exaggerated.

Although some analysts believe al-Qaeda may exert influence over some military and political leaders within the Islamic movement, they caution that the leadership is very large and complex and that claims that any one person or group is in control is a misunderstanding of the movement.

Somalia has historically been of strategic importance to the United States because of its proximity to the Middle East and Red Sea shipping lanes. But U.S. policy there has been sharply criticized over the years.

A U.S.-led attempt to stabilize the country led to the deaths of 18 American troops in October 1993 in an incident depicted in a popular book and film, "Black Hawk Down." And more recently, the United States financed warlords in Somalia who described themselves as an "anti-terrorism coalition" but who mostly terrorized local Somalis, who came to despise them.

The Islamic Courts, initially a grouping of local clerics, came to power in that context, establishing order based on Islamic law village by village, and winning the support of businessmen and others who found the transitional government ineffective and the warlords unacceptable. Analysts say it is a measure of beleaguered Somalis' desire for order, rather than a tendency toward religious extremism, that they embraced the movement.

The movement is well financed, receiving money from the Somali diaspora and countries such as Eritrea, Yemen and others, according to a recent U.N. report.

Though the movement includes moderate leaders, it is backed by a militant core of young fighters called shebab, who have been indoctrinated with the ideology of holy war and whose leaders, analysts say, seem to have become more influential in recent months.

Analysts said the current crisis stems from another failure of U.S. policy in an increasingly vulnerable region. "All this could have been averted," Prendergast said. "If the U.S. joined a serious diplomatic effort aimed at finding a compromise between Ethiopia and the Courts, negotiations could have had a much better chance. Once the serious punching has started, it's going to be increasingly difficult to stop this brawl."

DOJ_NMG_0108732

Ethiopian Jets Bomb Two Main Airports In Somalia (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia (AP) — Ethiopian jets bombed Somalia's two main airports Monday while ground troops captured three villages and a strategic border town, lending Somalia's internationally backed government crucial military aid in its struggle against a powerful Islamic militia.

Russian-made jets swept low over the capital at midmorning, dropping two bombs on Mogadishu International Airport, part of a major escalation in the week-old fighting. The leader of the Islamic militia, Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, flew into the airport shortly after the attack; it was not clear if he was an intended target.

Airstrikes also hit Baledogle Airport outside Mogadishu.

"We heard the sound of the jets and then they pounded," said Abdi Mudey, a soldier with Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts, which has seized the capital and much of southern Somalia since June.

Somalia has not had an effective government since warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, pushing the country into anarchy. Two years ago, the United Nations helped set up a central government for the arid, impoverished nation on the Horn of Africa.

But the government has not been able to extend its influence outside the city of Baidoa, where it is headquartered about 140 miles northeast of Mogadishu. The country was largely under the control of warlords until this past summer, when the Islamic militia movement seized power.

Experts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. A recent U.N. report said 10 countries have been supplying arms and equipment to both sides of the conflict, using Somalia as a proxy battlefield. Some analysts also fear that the courts movement hopes to make Somalia a third front, after Afghanistan and Iraq, in militant Islam's war against the West.

The Islamic group's often severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent, to some, of Afghanistan's Taliban regime — ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden. The U.S. government says four al-Qaeda leaders, believed to be behind the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, are now leaders in the Islamic militia.

Militia forces have surrounded Somali government forces in Baidoa, where heavy artillery and mortar fire echoed through the streets, said Mohammed Sheik Ali, a resident reached by telephone.

But Ethiopian-backed government troops appeared to take the initiative on Monday.

Pro-government forces drove Islamic fighters out of the key border town of Belet Weyne, then headed south in pursuit of fleeing militiamen, a Somali officer said. Government troops were enforcing a curfew of 3 p.m. to 6 a.m.

"Anyone who has a gun but is not wearing a government uniform will be targeted as a terrorist," said Aden Garase, a government soldier who was put in charge of Belet Weyne.

On Ethiopian television Monday night, the defense ministry said troops would move toward the city of Jowhar, about 55 miles from Mogadishu. Later, Ethiopia made a push in that direction, capturing the villages of Bandiradley, Adadow and Galinsor, according Yusuf Ahmed Ali, a businessman in Adadow.

As its military forces advanced against militia fighters, Somalia's government also sought to seal its borders in order to prevent foreign Islamic militants from joining the Islamic courts forces.

Residents living along Somalia's coast have seen hundreds of militants arriving by boat, apparently in answer to calls by religious leaders to wage a holy war against Ethiopia.

It seems unlikely the government can blockade Somalia's 1,860-mile coastline — the longest in Africa. But the closures could hamper humanitarian aid deliveries to the country, where one in five children dies before age 5 from a preventable disease.

The U.N. World Food Program airlifted several tons of food and other aid into Somalia on Monday, but had not yet been notified of any border closings, agency spokesman Peter Smerdon said.

DOJ_NMG_0108733

The Islamic militia, which grew out of a network of ad hoc Muslim courts, has brought a measure of law to a lawless country: The international airport reopened in July after being closed for a decade.

But leaders of the Islamic courts movement alarmed the country's neighbors by threatening to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

Many Somalis are enraged by Ethiopian intervention because the countries have fought two wars over their disputed border in the past 45 years. Somalia is overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim, while Ethiopia has a large Christian minority.

Despite this friction, the Somali government — which has failed to assert any real control since it was formed two years ago — relies on its neighbor's military strength.

Earlier, Ethiopia had said it sent advisers to bolster the Somali government's outgunned military forces, but denied dispatching combat troops. The U.N., though, estimates that Ethiopia has 8,000 troops in the country.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Sunday that his country was "forced to enter a war" with Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts after the group declared holy war on Ethiopia.

So far, Ethiopian and Somali troops have used MiG jet fighters and artillery to attack the Islamists, who have no military aircraft and can return fire only with much smaller mortars and recoilless rifles.

Meles has said he does not intend to keep his forces in Somalia for long, perhaps only a few weeks. He has told visiting dignitaries that his goal is to damage the courts' military capabilities, take away their sense of invincibility and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing.

Government officials and Islamic militiamen have said hundreds of people have been killed in clashes since Tuesday, but the claims could not be independently confirmed. Aid groups put the death toll in the dozens.

–

Somalia Could Be Ethiopia's Quagmire (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

A more involved military offensive might pose the same problems the U.S. is facing in Iraq, observers say.

NAIROBI, KENYA — Ethiopia's attacks against Islamic forces in Somalia may have delivered a short-term military victory, but analysts warned that a longer offensive could present the U.S. ally with some of the same challenges facing American forces in Iraq.

Airstrikes against the Somali capital, Mogadishu, and other towns Sunday and Monday demonstrated Ethiopia's military superiority over the Islamic forces that seized most of southern Somalia during the summer.

But Ethiopia would be hard-pressed to dispatch enough troops to capture and occupy Islamic-held areas of Somalia.

"I don't understand what Ethiopia's objective is," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia and now a political science professor at George Washington University. "I can't imagine their objective is to occupy and hold Somalia. It was a very limited victory."

Most experts agree that Ethiopia's battle-tested army, numbering as many as 150,000 troops, could easily beat Somalia's ragtag Islamic fighters, which are believed to total under 10,000.

But Islamists say they would compensate for their lack of numbers and sophisticated weaponry by pursuing an unconventional war, including suicide attacks and other insurgency-style tactics that U.S. and allied troops face in Iraq.

"The Ethiopians could get bogged down into a hopeless, long-term guerrilla campaign with enormous supply lines," Shinn said. "I don't see how they 'defeat' the Islamists in the long run."

The attacks Sunday and Monday marked the first time Ethiopia has publicly acknowledged taking direct military action against Somalia's Islamists.

Ethiopian officials said they acted to preempt threats by Islamic forces to launch a "holy war" against them. Ethiopia is also moving to protect Somalia's weak transitional government, which has been battling with Islamists over who will control the Horn of Africa nation.

Somalia has been without a functioning government since 1991.

DOJ_NMG_0108734

Anger over the Ethiopian airstrikes reverberated Monday throughout Mogadishu. Local radio stations flooded the airwaves with nationalist songs, recalling the history of tensions between Ethiopia and Somalia, which last went to war in 1977.

Angry youths rioted in several Somali cities, urging all adult males to join the Islamic forces.

The Ethiopian attacks appeared to be bolstering support for the Islamists.

"I used to think that the Islamic courts were just another interest group, but now I recognize that they are standing up for the country and religion," said Muse Ali Omar, a banana vendor in Mogadishu.

"Ethiopia is my enemy, I will not sell bananas anymore," he said. "I will take my gun and go for jihad. Otherwise I am sure they will kill me in my banana kiosk if I wait for them here."

Mohammed Ibrahim Mohammed, a moderate Muslim, said, "As long as the West is supporting Ethiopian invasion, it will open the door for Islamic courts."

The Ethiopian strikes have helped unify the Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of religious leaders that came together to defeat U.S.-backed warlords this year. In recent months, some cracks were beginning to appear inside the alliance over how rigorously to implement Islamic law.

But more recently, U.S. and Ethiopian officials have concluded that extremists have seized control of the courts. They accuse court leaders of having links to terrorist groups, including Al Qaeda.

Last weekend, one Islamist leader issued an invitation to Muslims worldwide to join the fighting in Somalia. Eritrea is also believed to have dispatched as many as 2,000 troops to aid the Islamists.

U.S. officials Monday called on Somali groups to end their fighting, but they did not call for an Ethiopian withdrawal.

"Ethiopia has genuine security concerns," said one U.S. official, adding that State Department officials have urged the Ethiopian government to use "maximum restraint."

The U.S. has worked closely with Ethiopia, including training elements of its military, in its four-year effort to contain the spread of Islamic extremism in the Horn of Africa. U.S. officials repeatedly have denied using Ethiopia as a proxy against Somali Islamists, and have insisted that they argued against an Ethiopian invasion with officials in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital.

A U.S. military official said the Pentagon, which set up a 1,500-man task force in neighboring Djibouti in 2002 because of concerns Al Qaeda-linked groups were seeking refuge in the region, has yet to take any action in response to the Ethiopian offensive.

"We're just watching it," the official said.

Shinn said international leaders should immediately intervene and push to remove all foreign fighters from Somalia.

"A week ago I was still optimistic that we could get this cat back in the box," he said. "Now I'm not clear if that's an option."

edmund.sanders@latimes.com

Times staff writer Peter Spiegel in Washington and special correspondent Abukar Albadri in Mogadishu contributed to this report.

Israel Approves West Bank Roadblock Removals (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, December 25, 2006

TEL AVIV — Israel is boosting support for moderate Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas as his Fatah Party and the ruling militant Hamas government wage an increasingly violent battle for control of the Palestinian territories.

On Monday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert approved in principle the removal of some army roadblocks that have hindered Palestinian travel in the West Bank "to strengthen moderate (Palestinian) elements," according to a statement from Olmert's office.

Olmert, who met with Abbas for the first time in Jerusalem on Saturday, pledged to transfer $100 million in tax money Israel had been withholding to the Palestinians, his office said. Israel also will transfer $8 million to Palestinian-run hospitals in Jerusalem, Abbas aide Saeb Erekat said.

The goodwill gestures could lead to resumption of peace talks after years of hostility between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Olmert said Monday that his weekend meeting with Abbas would "hopefully lead to additional meetings."

DOJ_NMG_0108735

Shlomo Dror, spokesman for the Israeli Coordinator of Activities in the Territories, said the diplomatic "quartet" seeking to facilitate Middle East peace talks — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — transferred $450 million this year in direct aid to Abbas, not to the Hamas-led government's offices.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, took office in March after beating Fatah in elections in January. After the victory, the United States and the EU cut off direct aid to the Palestinian government. Both say Hamas is a terrorist group.

"The money is not transferred to the government ministries since they are controlled by Hamas," Dror said. "Rather, the money goes directly to bank accounts controlled by Abbas in Ramallah under European supervision."

The United States has set aside about $42 million to fund a program that trains Abbas' Presidential Guard. The program seeks to restructure Fatah and gives electoral training and strategic advice to moderate parties.

Hamas accuses the United States of trying to overthrow the Palestinian government. "The U.S. is trying to bring down our government by undermining us politically and economically," spokesman Ghazi Hamad said in an interview from Gaza. "By not giving us money, they are essentially acting against an elected government."

Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem said, "The Hamas government is responsible for its situation by not participating in international norms of governing and by not meeting previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

The lack of foreign funding has forced Hamas to smuggle cash in suitcases into Gaza to meet expenses such as salaries for government and security personnel. Two weeks ago, Israel closed the crossing from Egypt into Gaza after Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh tried to carry in $35 million.

Gidi Grinstein, head of the Reut Institute, a think tank in Tel Aviv, said Israel and the United States should beware of "overembracing" Abbas and other moderates because such support could cause Palestinians to turn against the Palestinian president. "The Palestinians live with an eternal fear that everything is a conspiracy against them," Grinstein said.

Hamas spokesman Hamad says Palestinians will see through attempts to bolster Abbas and will vote for Hamas in the next elections. He says Abbas has received nearly $100 million in backdoor donations in addition to official aid. "The money will not weaken Hamas, and if the Americans think it will, then they are deceiving themselves," he says. "People support us not through money, but through views and honesty, and money cannot buy integrity."

Contributing: The Associated Press

Olmert Says He'd Like To Renew Talks With Syria (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

JERUSALEM (AP) — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday said he would like to renew peace talks with Syria, but insisted that Damascus first end its support of anti-Israel militant groups in the Palestinian areas and Lebanon.

Syria has said on several occasions recently that it would like to resume negotiations with Israel, which broke down seven years ago. Olmert has rejected the offers, citing Syria's support for Hamas, Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas and other militant groups.

"I hope we will be able to arrive at dialogue with Syria at some point if Syria upholds the most basic of commitments, the cessation of violence — the same commitment we demand of anyone we talk to," Olmert told a meeting of lawmakers from his Kadima party.

"If Syria agrees to stop the violence, stop its support for Hamas, stop its support for Hezbollah, and sever its appalling connection with Iran, then we'll be able to engage in a diplomatic process," Olmert added. "I have no doubt that this is something we want to happen."

Syria hosts headquarters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Palestinian militant groups committed to Israel's destruction, and offers financial and logistical support to Hezbollah, which battled the Israeli army to a stalemate during a 34-day war last summer.

There was no immediate reaction from Syria to Olmert's latest comments. The recent Baker-Hamilton report submitted to the White House recommended that Israel resume talks with Syria to help ease Mideast tensions. Olmert has rejected the report's conclusions.

DOJ_NMG_0108736

Israeli officials have been divided over whether Assad's latest gestures are sincere. A senior military intelligence official said Monday that he believes the Syrian offer is genuine, lawmakers said.

Brig. Gen. Yossi Baidatz, head of military intelligence's research decision, told parliament's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee that Syria is interested in talks to boost its international standing, said committee member Yuval Steinitz.

But the officer stopped short of saying Syria is interested in a peace agreement, committee members said.

Steinitz said he thinks Syria wants to open negotiations to buy itself time to topple the government in neighboring Lebanon. Syria controlled its smaller neighbor for 29 years before being forced to withdraw its troops in 2005.

Last week, Meir Dagan, director of the Mossad spy agency, took the opposite view of Baidatz's, saying Syria was not prepared to return to the negotiating table, despite its overtures.

Peace talks between Israel and Syria broke down in January 2000 over Syria's demand for a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Israel captured the plateau, which overlooks northern Israel, in the 1967 Mideast War.

DOJ_NMG_0108737

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: TUESDAY, DECEMBER 26, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Panel Faults FBI In Okla. Bombing Follow-Up (WP/AP) 1
Feds Failed To Follow Bombing Evidence (SLT) 2
Courts Side With NSA On Wiretaps (NYSUN) 3

Homeland Response:
Alarming 9/11 Claim Is Found Baseless (LAT)..... 4
Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s (USAT)..... 6

War News:
Shiite-on-Shiite Violence Racks Southern Iraqi City (LAT)..... 6
British Soldiers Storm Iraqi Jail, Citing Torture (NYT) 8
Hundreds Disappear Into The Black Hole Of The Kurdish Prison System In Iraq (NYT)..... 9
U.S. Military Death Toll In Iraq Exceeds Number Of Deaths In Sept. 11, 2001, Attacks (USAT/AP)..... 11
Troop Push Is Personal For McCain (WP) 13
Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP)... 14

Corporate Scandals:
DCX Probe Spans Globe (DETNEWS) 15
Report: Ex-FBI Boss Aids DaimlerChrysler (AP)..... 17
Ex-Trader Tells Story As A Warning (NYT) 17
Exxon Damages For Valdez Spill Are Cut In Half (WSJ/AP) 18
Lots Of Cheer From R.I.M., But No News On Options (NYT)..... 18

Criminal Law:
Why L.A. Jail Cells Have Revolving Doors (LAT)..... 20
Duke Rape Case Unravels (CSM)..... 24
After Years Of Agony, Death Turns Assaults Into Homicides (NYT) 25
A Delusional System Of Justice (WP) 28
Federal RICO Statute Has A Tough Year (AP) 29
Sentencing Guidelines Face New Scrutiny (WSJ) 30
The Tell-Tell Rap? (WP) 31

Civil Law:
No Fed Oversight On Some Air Charters (USAT/AP)..... 32
Where Real Money Meets Virtual Reality, The Jury Is Still Out (WP)..... 33

Civil Rights:
Justice Dept. Database Stirs Privacy Fears (WP)..... 34
Diabetics In The Workplace Confront A Tangle Of Laws (NYT) . 36

Antitrust:
Judge Postpones Delphi Hearing After New Plan (WSJ)..... 39

Environment/Indian Affairs:
After Long Struggle, Whooping Crane Population Hits Milestone (WP)..... 40

Immigration:
Bipartisan Effort To Draft Immigration Bill (NYT)..... 41

Congress-Administration:
Democrats Pledge To Restrain Spending (WP)..... 43

Other News:
Roberts Leading Court In More Media-friendly Direction (USAT/AP) 45
Italian In Poison Case Arrested (AP) 46
Ethiopian Jets Strafe Mogadishu Airports (NYT)..... 46
Ethiopia Steps Up Attacks On Somalia (WP) 47
Ethiopian Jets Bomb Two Main Airports In Somalia (AP) 48
Somalia Could Be Ethiopia's Quagmire (LAT)..... 50
Israel Approves West Bank Roadblock Removals (USAT)..... 51
Olmert Says He'd Like To Renew Talks With Syria (AP) 52

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Panel Faults FBI In Okla. Bombing Follow-Up (WP/AP)

By John Solomon, Associated Press

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

The FBI failed to fully investigate information suggesting other suspects may have helped Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols with the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, allowing questions to linger more than a decade after the deadly attack, a congressional inquiry concludes.

The House International Relations investigative subcommittee will release the findings of its two-year review as early as Wednesday, declaring that no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection to the attack exists but that far too many unanswered questions remain.

The report sharply criticizes the FBI for failing to be curious enough to pursue credible information that foreign or U.S. citizens may have had contact with Nichols or McVeigh and could have assisted the pair. Their truck bomb killed 168 people in the main federal building in Oklahoma City on April 19, 1995.

McVeigh and Nichols were convicted of murder. McVeigh was executed in 2001; Nichols is serving a life sentence without the possibility of parole.

"We did our best with limited resources, and I think we moved the understanding of this issue forward a couple of notches, even though important questions remain unanswered," Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Calif.), the subcommittee chairman, said in an interview.

The subcommittee's report discloses for the first time that Nichols admitted participating in the robbery of an Arkansas gun dealer, the crime that funded the attack. There have long been questions about that robbery because the FBI concluded McVeigh was in another state when it occurred.

Rohrabacher's subcommittee saved its sharpest words for the Justice Department, saying officials there exhibited a mindset of thwarting congressional oversight and did not assist the investigation fully.

The report says the inadequacy of the FBI's work was exposed two years ago when some bombing evidence overlooked for 10 years was discovered in a house linked to Nichols that had been searched repeatedly by agents.

Special Agent Richard Kolko, an FBI spokesman, declined to comment on the report yesterday because he had not seen it.

Kolko said: "The Oklahoma City bombing case was the largest case the FBI worked on before 9/11. Agents at virtually every office, domestically and overseas, covered thousands of leads. Every bit of information was investigated and reviewed. The FBI worked tirelessly to cover all of the leads and conducted a thorough and complete investigation."

The bureau has said previously there is no credible evidence that other people were involved.

The subcommittee concludes that the Justice Department should not have rushed to execute McVeigh after he dropped his court appeals, and that officials should have made more efforts to interview and question him about evidence suggesting he might have had help beyond Nichols's.

Feds Failed To Follow Bombing Evidence (SLT)

By Pamela Manson

Salt Lake Tribune, December 25, 2006

For years, Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue has maintained his brother was killed in prison months after the Oklahoma City bombing by interrogators who mistakenly believed he was connected to the attack.

Now, a new congressional report says federal authorities failed to investigate evidence suggesting Timothy McVeigh and Terry Nichols had assistance plotting the bombing - and some of the information pointing to co-conspirators came out of Trentadue's lawsuits against the FBI.

And it adds fuel to the mystery of Kenneth Trentadue's supposed suicide in 1995 at the Federal Transfer Center in Oklahoma City.

Trentadue believes FBI records hold clues to his brother's death and has fought the agency in court for those documents. Some that have been ordered released say investigators got tips about a possible link between the April 19, 1995, bombing and a group of white supremacist bank robbers with links to a training camp in Elohim City, Okla.

That information is included in the report by the House International Relations investigative subcommittee.

Trentadue said Sunday that two findings in the report stand out, including the lack of cooperation by the FBI in the congressional body's investigation.

The second is that McVeigh and Nichols may have been aided by others.

"It's pretty clear, whether Islamic terrorists or homegrown neo-Nazis, there were other people involved," Trentadue said, adding that the subcommittee's probe "will help reveal the truth about the Oklahoma City bombing, which I now know is linked to my brother's death."

DOJ_NMG_0108739

Kenneth Trentadue, who had served time for bank robbery, was arrested near San Diego in June 1995, two months after the bombing that killed 168 people. He was sent to the transfer center in Oklahoma City for an alleged parole violation. On Aug. 21, guards found Trentadue's blood-soaked body in his cell hanging from a noose made of torn bedsheets. Prison officials say the 44-year-old inmate committed suicide.

According to Jesse Trentadue, his brother bore a strong resemblance to Richard Lee Guthrie, a bank robber and alleged accomplice of McVeigh. He maintains that authorities mistakenly thought his brother was Guthrie - a member of the Midwest Bank Robbery Gang, an arm of the Aryan Republican Army that stole from financial institutions to fund attacks on government buildings - and killed him during an interrogation that got out of hand.

Guthrie was arrested on bank robbery charges in 1996 and eventually struck a plea bargain with prosecutors. In fall 1996, he claimed he would soon be revealing information that "would blow the lid off the Oklahoma City bombing case," according to the report. The next day, he was found dead, hanging in his cell in Kentucky, purportedly a suicide.

"This suspicious 'suicide' mirrored the similar death of [Kenneth] Trentadue, another prisoner, who may have been tangentially and incorrectly linked to the Oklahoma City bombing," the subcommittee report says.

Trentadue has filed three lawsuits in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City alleging, among other claims, that the FBI has violated the Freedom of Information Act by failing to turn over requested documents on the Oklahoma City bombing. In one of the suits, Judge Dale Kimball ordered the agency to produce some of the disputed records on information about a possible white supremacist link to the bombing.

The House International Relations investigative subcommittee will release the findings of its two-year review as early as Wednesday, declaring there is no conclusive evidence of a foreign connection to the attack but far too many unanswered questions remain.

The subcommittee's report will conclude there is no doubt McVeigh and Nichols were the main perpetrators, and it discloses for the first time that Nichols confirmed to House investigators he participated in the robbery of an Arkansas gun dealer that provided the proceeds for the attack.

There have long been questions about that robbery because the FBI concluded McVeigh was in another state at the time it occurred.

The report also sharply criticizes the FBI for failing to be curious enough to pursue credible information that foreign or U.S. citizens may have had contact with Nichols or McVeigh and could have assisted their plot.

The subcommittee saved its sharpest words for the Justice Department, saying officials there exhibited a mindset of thwarting congressional oversight and did not assist the investigation fully.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said Sunday, "The Oklahoma City bombing case was the largest case the FBI worked on before 9/11. Agents at virtually every office, domestically and overseas, covered thousands of leads. Every bit of information was investigated and reviewed. The FBI worked tirelessly to cover all of the leads and conducted a thorough and complete investigation."

Courts Side With NSA On Wiretaps (NYSUN)

By Joseph Goldstein

New York Sun, December 26, 2006

Defense lawyers who had hoped that the public disclosure a year ago of the National Security Agency's wiretapping program would yield information favorable to their clients are being rebuffed by the federal judiciary, which in a series of unusually consistent rulings has rejected efforts by terrorism suspects to access the records.

In at least 17 criminal cases, federal district judges nominated to the federal bench by presidents Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Clinton, and George W. Bush have ruled against requests to force the government to tell defendants, most accused of terrorism-related crimes, whether the NSA eavesdropped on them without a court warrant.

The rulings indicate that even as public support for the war in Iraq has eroded in polls and as the NSA program has come under criticism from congressional Democrats, and even some Republicans, federal judges may be a bulwark that the Bush administration can rely on to defer to at least some aspects of its wartime policies.

The judges' decisions have come after defense attorneys filed motions requesting access to relevant surveillance intercepts that the government obtained without a warrant. Defense attorneys claim they are entitled to such information and that evidence obtained from warrantless wiretaps is tainted and inadmissible at trial. In many, but not all instances, the motions were filed after a conviction.

Individually, the judges' orders, often very brief and rarely providing explanations, indicate little. Taken together, however, they signal that the judges are unwilling to permit defense attorneys to use prosecutions to force disclosures about the program.

DOJ_NMG_0108740

The legality of the NSA program is being litigated in several civil lawsuits across the country. In one case, a district judge in Detroit, Anna Diggs Taylor, ruled in August that the program was unconstitutional, a decision that the government has appealed. Legal observers dispute whether even a ruling by the Supreme Court that the program is unconstitutional would lead to the overturning of criminal convictions in which the program played a role in securing evidence or targeting the defendants.

In every instance, the Justice Department's policy is to refuse to say publicly whether the NSA program was involved in a case, because denying its role in one case but refusing to deny its role elsewhere could disclose classified information, according to public government court filings. Rather, in response to defense motions, the Justice Department has filed secret documents with the court that are not supplied to defense lawyers.

"There is a veil of secrecy over these parts of the proceedings," said one attorney, Marvin Miller, who filed such a motion on behalf of Ali Asad Chandia, who was convicted in Alexandria, Va., of aiding a terrorist organization in Pakistan.

Defense attorneys say they are frustrated that judges are accepting these secret briefs from the government.

"Whatever the government is saying in these secret ex parte in camera filings, it is sure clamming up a lot of judges," said attorney Jeanne Baker, who represents Adham Amin Hassoun, a co-defendant of "dirty bomb" suspect Jose Padilla.

Speculation abounds among attorneys over just what the Justice Department is saying in the secret briefs.

Some defense attorneys suggest that the government's ex parte briefs may contain a simple yes-or-no answer as to whether a specific defendant was targeted by the NSA program. Another defense attorney, Jill Shellow-Lavine, speculates that the size of the program may prevent the government from stating whether a particular defendant was the subject of the surveillance.

A former Justice Department official says that the government probably declines to give any answers in its secret filings.

"There is no basis to assume than the government is making defendant-specific disclosures," David Rivkin, who served in the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations, said. "The far more likely scenario is that the government is telling the relevant judges that the classified program has nothing to do with this prosecution."

Defense attorneys say the willingness of judges to accept secret briefings puts them in an unfair position.

"It short-circuits the adversary system, and it prevents the issues from being litigated," a lawyer who has filed a motion for disclosure regarding the NSA program, Malick Ghachem, said. "I haven't found a single judge so far who has been willing to take a serious look at this or at least let the defendants know they are taking a serious look at it."

Defense attorneys acknowledge that these motions for disclosure are made routinely, even without any evidence to suggest that their clients were targeted by the NSA program.

Still, even in cases in which the NSA program is believed to have played a role, it is not clear that judges would rule any differently. Officials in the Bush administration have credited the NSA program with helping uncover the terrorist plot of an Ohio truck driver, Iyman Faris, to topple the Brooklyn Bridge, according to a New York Times report. In October a federal judge in Alexandria, Va., Leonie Brinkema, declined Faris's request for government documents about the NSA program's role in the case. Last month, Judge Brinkema upheld Faris's guilty plea from 2003, ruling that Faris did not have standing to bring his challenge even if "electronic surveillance" had first led the government to him.

In only one case has a federal appeals court looked at the relationship of the NSA program to criminal prosecutions. The 4th Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., in April remanded a separate case to Judge Brinkema, questioning whether the government possessed "undisclosed intercepts" that should have been turned over. The case involved a Muslim cleric, Ali al-Timimi, who was found guilty last year of encouraging Muslims to join the Taliban's war efforts.

Timimi's attorney, Jonathan Turley, said he believes that NSA intercepts may contain exculpatory evidence that could have benefited Timimi, rather than incriminating evidence used to target him.

A court filing by the Justice Department in the case against Lynne Stewart, the New York lawyer who was convicted of criminally helping her terrorist client communicate with his followers, listed 17 criminal cases in which judges have denied motions for disclosure about the NSA program. The New York Sun reviewed 14 of them. In those orders, the judges, excluding Judge Brinkema, did not state any reason for denying the defense motions, except to indicate that they had considered the secret briefs of the government. In one written order, a judge implied that his willingness to sentence a defendant without further hearings was on the condition that the government's secret brief said no evidence came from the NSA program.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Alarming 9/11 Claim Is Found Baseless (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, December 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108741

WASHINGTON — The Senate Intelligence Committee has rejected as untrue one of the most disturbing claims about the Sept. 11 terrorist strikes — a congressman's contention that a team of military analysts identified Mohamed Atta or other hijackers before the attacks — according to a summary of the panel's investigation obtained by The Times.

The conclusion contradicts assertions by Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) and a few military officers that U.S. national security officials ignored startling intelligence available in early 2001 that might have helped to prevent the attacks.

In particular, Weldon and other officials have repeatedly claimed that the military analysts' effort, known as Able Danger, produced a chart that included a picture of Atta and identified him as being tied to an Al Qaeda cell in Brooklyn, N.Y. Weldon has also said that the chart was shared with White House officials, including Stephen J. Hadley, then deputy national security advisor.

But after a 16-month investigation, the Intelligence Committee has concluded that those assertions are unfounded.

"Able Danger did not identify Mohammed Atta or any other 9/11 hijacker at any time prior to Sept. 11, 2001," the committee determined, according to an eight-page letter sent last week to panel members by the top Republican and Democrat on the committee.

Weldon, the focus of an unrelated Justice Department corruption probe, was defeated last month in his campaign for an 11th term in a suburban Philadelphia district that has a large GOP majority in voter registration. Attempts were unsuccessful Sunday to reach a Weldon spokesman and an attorney representing Weldon in the Justice Department investigation.

The Senate panel began investigating Able Danger in August 2005, after Weldon and people close to the program went public with their claims. At the time, Weldon was the vice chairman of the House Armed Services Committee and the House Homeland Security Committee.

The recently completed probe also dismissed other assertions that have fueled conspiracy theories surrounding the Sept. 11 attacks.

The panel said it found "no evidence" to support claims by military officers connected to Able Danger that Defense Department lawyers prevented the team's analysts from sharing their findings with FBI counter-terrorism officials before the attacks.

Nor was the alleged chart or any information developed by Able Danger improperly destroyed at the direction of Pentagon lawyers, the panel concluded — a charge that had stoked claims of a cover-up.

Though the committee concluded that claims about Able Danger were unfounded, two of the hijackers were known to the U.S. intelligence community before the Sept. 11 attacks. The two had been observed by the CIA attending a meeting with Al Qaeda operatives in Malaysia, but that information was not shared with other agencies in time to locate them after they had entered the United States and moved to San Diego.

Able Danger was the unclassified name given to a program launched in 1999 by the U.S. Special Operations Command as part of an effort to develop military plans targeting the leadership ranks of Al Qaeda and other terrorist networks.

Military analysts assigned to the effort did create charts with pictures of Al Qaeda operatives whose identities were known publicly at the time, the committee found. But the committee concluded that none of those charts depicted Atta, and that the claims of Weldon and others may have been caused by confusion.

One of the charts, titled "The Al Qaeda Network: Snapshots of Typical Operational Cells Associated With UBL [Usama bin Laden]," was attached to the letter sent to committee members last week by Sens. Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) and John D. "Jay" Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), the panel's leaders.

"One of these individuals depicted on the chart arguably looked like Mohammed Atta," the committee concluded. "In addition, the chart contained names of Al Qaeda associates that sound like Atta, as well as numerous variations of the common Arab name Mohammed."

The committee also suggested that officials' memories may have been clouded by the flurry of charts and photographs of Atta that surfaced after the attacks. The panel noted that a defense contractor that produced the chart at the center of the controversy subsequently created a follow-up chart, after the attacks, that did include Atta.

Atta, an Egyptian-born Islamic radical, was the ringleader of the Sept. 11 attacks and pilot of one of the planes that struck the World Trade Center.

In June 2005, Weldon generated controversy when he declared in a speech on the House floor and in a book released that month that he had met with Hadley at the White House shortly after the attacks and had given the national security official a copy of a chart showing that Atta had been identified by Able Danger.

But the committee concluded that the chart "was not a pre-9/11 chart" and that "at no time did Mr. Hadley ever see a chart with pre-9/11 data bearing Atta's picture or name as described by Congressman Weldon."

The Senate Intelligence Committee noted in its report that its findings were consistent with those of a similar investigation of Able Danger by the Defense Department inspector general's office, released in September.

DOJ_NMG_0108742

Weldon has relished the role of calling attention to national security threats he believes are being ignored by others in government. At times he has carried around a replica of a suitcase-size nuclear bomb to highlight terrorist nuclear dangers. He has also accused Iran of hiding Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden.

Weldon's rising legal troubles played a role in his reelection loss last month. It was disclosed last week that a federal grand jury had subpoenaed congressional records from Weldon's office as part of an FBI probe aimed at determining whether he traded his influence to get lobbying business for his daughter Karen and others.

The House seat was won by Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, December 25, 2006

Annual incidents of trafficking and mishandling of nuclear and other radioactive material reported to U.S. intelligence officials have more than doubled since the early 1990s, says the director of domestic nuclear detection at the Department of Homeland Security.

Also up: scams in which fake or non-existent nuclear or radioactive material is offered for sale, often online, says Vayl Oxford, nuclear detection director at the department.

"We sense that people have recognized the value of nuclear material as a useful way of making money," Oxford said. "Nuclear material is becoming a marketable commodity."

The incidents tracked by the department, based on its reporting and information from foreign diplomatic and intelligence sources, average about twice the number made public each year by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

Oxford said reports of nuclear and radioactive materials trafficking have ranged from 200 to 250 a year since 2000, up from about 100 a year in the 1990s.

The reports include incidents in which material was stolen, offered for sale, lost or mishandled.

The IAEA, whose members self-report trafficking incidents on a voluntary basis, said there were 121 such incidents in 2004 and 103 last year. The agency, based in Vienna, reports only trafficking incidents that its members have confirmed and elected to make public. The Department of Homeland Security numbers include all known or suspected trafficking incidents identified by the United States and allied governments.

Reported incidents may be increasing, Oxford says, because since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, governments have become more diligent about policing material that could be used by terrorists to build a radioactive "dirty bomb" or similar device.

Most reported incidents occurred outside the USA. There are no reported incidents in which radioactive or nuclear material was successfully sold to a terror group, according to the IAEA.

Some of the incidents have involved enriched uranium or plutonium of the type that can be used to make a nuclear weapon. In June 2003, for instance, a smuggler was arrested trying to carry 170 grams of enriched uranium across a border in Sadahlo, Georgia, in the former Soviet Union.

Most incidents involved very small amounts of material that were mishandled by authorities and never intended to be sold, the IAEA said. In New Jersey last year, a package containing 3.3 grams of enriched helium was "accidentally disposed of," the IAEA reported.

Some experts are concerned that the increase in trafficking incidents makes it more likely terrorists could acquire nuclear material.

"We're only seeing the dysfunctional part of the market — the supplier who's dumb enough to try to sell it to the police," said Jeffrey Lewis, director of the Project on Managing the Atom at Harvard University's Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs.

WAR NEWS:

Shiite-on-Shiite Violence Racks Southern Iraqi City (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 25, 2006

BAGHDAD — Shiite militia fighters clashed with police Sunday in Samawah, a provincial capital in southern Iraq, transforming it into a lawless battleground and exposing rifts that increasingly divide Iraq's Shiite Muslim majority.

Nine people, including four police officers, have died in the violence gripping parts of Samawah since Friday, police said. On Sunday, police backed by some Shiite tribal leaders called in Iraqi soldiers from nearby Diwaniya to help battle the militia.

DOJ_NMG_0108743

The security forces closed entrances to the city, which is about 145 miles southeast of Baghdad, imposed a curfew and shut the schools as they traded fire with militiamen.

Much of the death and destruction in Iraq this year has involved fighting between Shiites and the Sunni Muslim minority, which dominated the country under former President Saddam Hussein. But the violence in Samawah underscores the difficulty that Prime Minister Nouri Maliki and other Shiite leaders have had in maintaining order among members of their sect in a country where people's loyalties are divided among political parties, religious groupings and tribes.

Conflicts within Shiite communities have troubled Baghdad and other parts of Iraq in recent weeks, but the violence has been particularly notable in Samawah, capital of the first province handed over by U.S.-led forces to Iraqi control.

At a news conference Sunday, Iraq's interior minister, Jawad Bolani, a Shiite, said police were restoring order in Samawah. "People who try to create problems can appear in any city in the world," he said. "The important thing is that [security forces] are there to stop them."

Samawah police say they are battling a militia associated with the Al Mahdi army of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, but Sadr associates said Sunday that the militia involved in the fighting is an offshoot led by a local Shiite cleric feuding with rival tribes.

The conflict in Samawah began Dec. 1, when gunmen attempted to rescue detainees from a local prison, killing three people, according to local hospital staffers. Militia leaders agreed to a cease-fire with police and provincial officials two days later, then apparently broke the agreement Friday after clashing with police at checkpoints near local mosques.

A Sadr associate, who spoke on condition that his name not be used, said the Samawah militia is led by Sheik Ghazi Zurgani, a renegade cleric. The Sadr associate said Sadr was distancing himself from the Samawah militia and stood by the Dec. 3 cease-fire.

But Qusai Abdul-Wahab, a member of Sadr's party in parliament, blamed the latest conflict on local police, who he said provoked militias Friday by opening fire on Shiite worshipers as they celebrated a religious anniversary. He called the police "provocative and intimidating."

"They are dealing with people as if they are still in the Saddam era," he said.

Jaafar Abdul Razzaq, a spokesman from Sadr's Samawah office, said the militia would not stop fighting until police released about 30 militia members detained since Friday. Police officials said they were negotiating another cease-fire with militia leaders.

Saad Aziz, a Shiite member of the Samawah city council, said local Shiites were divided by tribe and political party, with some loyal to Sadr's parliamentary bloc, others to another leading Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI.

"The Ziad tribe itself is now divided among those who support SCIRI and those who are supporting Sadr," Aziz said, referring to one of the area's major clans. "There is now internal fighting inside the tribe itself."

Abdul Hussein Dhalimi, the acting governor of Muthanna province and a SCIRI member, said he met Sunday with provincial leaders and with delegates from the nearby holy Shiite cities of Karbala and Najaf to "settle things down in the province."

"The security forces are controlling the situation. The city is under their control," he said, adding that local leaders would not negotiate with the militia until it disarmed. "The arms must be carried by the security forces only," he said.

Muthanna, of which Samawah is the capital, is one of the three provinces out of 18 transferred to Iraqi security control since 2003. British forces handed over control of Muthanna nearly six months ago. Italian forces transferred neighboring Dhi Qar province in September, and last week, U.S. forces handed over nearby Najaf province.

The British left behind an "overwatch battle group" in Muthanna of about 800 Australian soldiers responsible to local and national Iraqi authorities, according to Capt. Tane Dunlop, a British forces spokesman.

Iraqi authorities did not ask for support from Australian forces in Samawah on Sunday, Dunlop said, but the Australian troops were "keeping an eye on the situation."

"There seems to be a standoff up there, and the Iraqi forces have it under control," Dunlop said, adding that the Australians were staying out of the fighting out of respect for the fledgling provincial security forces. Getting involved, even to crush a rogue militia, might undermine Iraqi sovereignty, he said.

"The whole point is to hand over control to all the provinces. If we hand over control, we can't go around saying how people should handle that control. They'll deal with things the way they see fit," he said. "We can't keep sort of charging back in."

Also on Sunday, the U.S. military announced that six soldiers had been killed Saturday.

Three soldiers in the 89th Military Police Brigade were killed by a roadside bomb while on patrol in east Baghdad, and another soldier with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, died in an explosion in Diyala province.

A roadside bomb southeast of the capital killed one soldier on patrol and wounded four, and another roadside bomb southwest of the capital killed a soldier on a combat resupply mission.

DOJ_NMG_0108744

Their deaths brought U.S. troop fatalities since the conflict began to 2,969, according to icasualties.org.

The military also released a statement saying it had detained four suspected insurgents in central Baghdad.

Several mortar attacks were reported in Baghdad on Sunday, including an afternoon assault on an athletic club and an attack on a Shiite neighborhood in the northern part of the city. Baghdad police reported recovering 29 bodies in the 24-hour period ending Sunday. Elsewhere in the country, a suicide bomber killed seven Iraqi police and injured 30 others in the city of Muqdadiya, about 60 miles northeast of the capital, officials said. In the northern city of Kirkuk, gunmen killed two brothers, according to police Lt. Salah Juboori.

Meanwhile in Baghdad, where U.S. forces have stepped up raids in recent weeks, residents of the Kamaliya neighborhood in the eastern part of the city protested Sunday after U.S. soldiers blocked the area to cars and pedestrians with barbed wire at 5 a.m., searching homes and shops for insurgents and weapons, witnesses said.

Resident Mohammed Abu Zahara, 34, was stuck at home with his family, without heat or electricity, thankful he went to the market Saturday and didn't need to go out. He watched as neighbors, unable to work or run errands, were forced to open their homes to U.S. troops.

British Soldiers Storm Iraqi Jail, Citing Torture (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 25 — Hundreds of British and Iraqi soldiers assaulted a police station in the southern city of Basra on Monday, killing seven gunmen, rescuing 127 prisoners from what the British said was almost certain execution and ultimately reducing the facility to rubble.

The military action was one of the most significant undertaken by British troops since the 2003 invasion, British officials said, adding that it was an essential step in any plan to re-establish security in Basra.

When the combined British and Iraqi force of 1,400 troops gained control of the station, it found the prisoners being held in conditions that a British military spokesman, Maj. Charlie Burbridge, described as “appalling.” More than 100 men were crowded into a single cell, 30 feet by 40 feet, he said, with two open toilets, two sinks and just a few blankets spread over the concrete floor.

A significant number showed signs of torture. Some had crushed hands and feet, Major Burbridge said, while others had cigarette and electrical burns and a significant number had gunshot wounds to their legs and knees.

The fetid dungeon was another example of abuses by the Iraqi security forces. The discovery highlighted the continuing struggle to combat the infiltration of the police and army by militias and criminal elements — even in a Shiite city like Basra, where there has been no sectarian violence.

As recently as October, the Iraqi government suspended an entire police brigade in Baghdad on suspicion of participation in death squads. The raid on Monday also raised echoes of the infamous Baghdad prison run by the Interior Ministry, known as Site 4, where more than 1,400 prisoners were subjected to systematic abuse and torture.

The focus of the attack was an arm of the local police called the serious crimes unit, which British officials said had been thoroughly infiltrated by criminals and militias who used it to terrorize local residents and violently settle scores with political or tribal rivals.

“The serious crimes unit was at the center of death squad activity,” Major Burbridge said.

A little over a year ago, British troops stormed the same building seeking to rescue two British special forces soldiers who had been captured by militants. A mob of 1,000 to 2,000 people gathered in protest, and a widely circulated video showed boys throwing stones at a burning British armored fighting vehicle parked outside the station. The soldiers, who were being held in a nearby building, were eventually freed.

Although some local officials, including Basra’s police chief, publicly condemned the action, local residents privately said they were grateful, and described what they said was an organization widely feared for its brutality.

“They are like savage dogs that bite when they are hungry,” said one resident, who spoke anonymously for fear of retribution. “Their evaluation of guilt or innocence is how much money you can pay.”

Residents said that people were afraid to challenge the officers because they were backed by powerful militia groups, including the Mahdi Army, which is led by the rebel cleric Moktada al-Sadr, though the extent of his control is unclear.

“Everyone wants to avoid the mouth of the lion,” one resident said. “From this, they became stronger and stronger.”

Major Burbridge said that the dismantling of the serious crimes unit had been planned for months.

As far back as 2004, he said, there was a growing realization that the police had been widely infiltrated by members of various militias and elements of organized crime. To combat their influence, the British have been trying to cull them from the forces in a campaign that began in September.

DOJ_NMG_0108745

After trying to determine who was fit to serve in the police, the British began outfitting trusted officers with sophisticated identification cards meant to limit the access of impostors to police intelligence, weapons and vehicles.

In late October, gunmen — believed by the British to have been connected to the serious crimes unit — ambushed a minibus carrying 17 employees of a new police academy and killed them all. Their mutilated remains were dumped in the Shuaiba area of the city in an effort to intimidate the local population.

"It had simply gone beyond the pale and it was clear it was time for the serious crimes unit to go," Major Burbridge said in an interview.

While they had planned to take over the station on Monday, British forces had to speed up the operation by several hours. "We received information late last night," Major Burbridge said Monday, "that the crimes unit was aware this was going to take place and we received information that the prisoners' lives were in danger."

More than 800 British soldiers, supported by five Challenger tanks and roughly 40 Warrior fighting vehicles, began their assault at 2 a.m. on Monday. They were aided by 600 Iraqi soldiers.

The British force faced the heaviest fighting as it made its way through the city, coming under sporadic attacks by rocket-propelled grenades and small-arms fire. Of the seven guerrillas killed, six were gunned down as the unit made its way to the police station.

Upon reaching the station, British troops killed a guard in a watchtower who had fired on the approaching forces, but there was little other resistance.

The members of the serious crimes unit who had been occupying the building, several dozen, according to the British military, fled and were not caught. The British forces turned over the prisoners to the regular Iraqi police, who put them in a new detention facility.

The two-story building, once used by Saddam Hussein's security forces, was then demolished, in an attempt to remove all traces of the serious crimes unit, Major Burbridge said.

The battle lasted nearly three hours. There were no British casualties, but the streets around the station were littered with bombed-out cars and rubble.

The violence in Basra, Iraq's second largest city, is different from that in Baghdad to the north or Anbar Province to the west, Major Burbridge said.

The killing in Baghdad in recent months has primarily been the result of sectarian violence, as Shiites have sought to drive Sunnis from mixed neighborhoods and Sunnis have retaliated. On Monday, at least 10 civilians were killed and 15 were wounded when a car bomb exploded in the mixed neighborhood of Jadida.

In northeastern Baghdad, a suicide bomber with explosives tied to his body blew himself up on a crowded bus, killing 2 people and wounding 20 others.

An American soldier also died Monday in Baghdad in a roadside bomb attack.

In Sunni-controlled Anbar Province, where the fighting is mainly between insurgents and American troops, two American soldiers were killed in fighting on Sunday.

In southern cities like Basra, dominated by Shiites, the fighting is a combination of battles between rival militias vying for power, warring tribes and organized crime, Major Burbridge said.

"In northern Basra, the fighting is mainly between three warring tribes," he said. "The death squads are typically related to political maneuvering and tribal gain. Then there are rogue elements of militias aiming attacks on the multinational forces. You throw all those elements into a melting pot and you get a picture of the complexity of what we are facing."

Hundreds Disappear Into The Black Hole Of The Kurdish Prison System In Iraq (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

SULAIMANIYA, Iraq — The inmates began their strike with an angry call. "Allahu akbar!" they shouted, 120 voices joining in a cadence punctuated by whoops.

They thrust their arms between the metal bars and ripped away the curtains and plastic sheets covering the windows facing the prison courtyard. Their squinting faces were exposed to light.

Their Kurdish guards gathered, ready to control a prison break. There was no break. The inmates were able only to shove their bunks against the doors and barricade themselves in their cells. They settled into a day of issuing complaints.

They were not allowed the Koran, they said. Their rations were meager and often moldy. Sometimes the guards beat them, they said, and several inmates had disappeared. The entire inmate population had either been denied trials or had been held beyond the terms of their sentences, they said — lost in legal limbo in the Kurdish-controlled region of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0108746

The prison strike here, on Dec. 4, ended when the local authorities agreed to transfer three unpopular guards and to allow copies of the Koran in the cells. But it exposed an intractable problem that has accompanied Kurdish cooperation with the United States in Iraq.

The Kurdish prison population has swelled to include at least several hundred suspected insurgents, and yet there is no legal system to sort out their fates. So the inmates wait, a population for which there is no plan.

The Kurdish government that holds the prisoners says they are dangerous, and points out that the population includes men who have attended terrorist or guerrilla training in Iraq or Afghanistan. But it also concedes to being stymied, with a small budget, limited prison space and little legal precedent to look back on.

"We have not had trials for them," said Brig. Sarkawt Hassan Jalal, the director of security in the Sulaimaniya region. "We have no counterterrorism law, and any law we would pass would not affect them because it would not be retroactive."

The problems reach back to before the American-led invasion, when northern Iraq was a Kurdish enclave out of Saddam Hussein's control.

At the time, the Kurds in northeastern Iraq were fighting Ansar al-Islam, a small insurgent and terrorist group that seized control of a slice of territory along the Iranian border in 2002.

The Kurds captured several prisoners and suspected terrorists, but had no clear idea what to do with them, other than to hold them in cells.

Several weeks after the war started in 2003, an attack by American special forces and Kurdish fighters pushed Ansar al-Islam off Kurdish turf. But the border with Iran had not been sealed before the attack. Most of the insurgents escaped.

In the years since, Ansar al-Islam's ideological war has spread throughout Sunni Arab regions of Iraq, becoming a far more dangerous insurgency. Kurdish jails have swelled with people accused of participating in it.

Many of the detained men exude menace. But others claim they are innocent. And Kurdish officials say they have a limited capacity to disentangle the groups.

Brig. Hassan Nouri, the Kurdish security official responsible for the prisons in northeastern Iraq, said the detainees are in a status resembling that of the American-held detainees in Guantánamo Bay. "We cannot let them go, and we will hold them as long as we have to," he said.

The population's size is unclear. In this prison run by the local security service on a Kurdish military base at Sulaimaniya's outskirts, 120 accused insurgents are held.

Hania Mufti, a researcher for Human Rights Watch who has investigated the prison conditions and the absence of due process for the inmates, said that about 2,500 people are being held by the security services of the two ruling Kurdish parties. She estimated that two-thirds of them are accused of participating in the insurgency.

Ms. Mufti said she has encouraged Kurdish political leaders to set up an independent commission to review each of the accused insurgents' cases.

"We're not saying, 'throw open the doors of the prisons,' " she said, but rather are suggesting that the Kurds create a means to examine the merits of each man's detention, and to determine why and whether each of them should be held and for how long, and under what conditions.

Kurdish officials have not yet developed such a policy; the detainees are essentially warehoused. The strike in early December exposed the strains the unresolved status has placed on the Kurdish government and the inmates alike.

The four visible cells here, spaces of about 7 yards by 8 yards, each were packed with 30 men. The men shared a toilet on the floor outside the cells, in a hall. The group seethes. One inmate shouted at two journalists through the bars. "Stop your hatred toward Islam!" he said. "Otherwise we will kill you!"

Speaking from a law enforcement perspective, Mr. Jalal said the close quarters and evident anger had made many of the inmates more radical, and that the prison serves as an insurgents' nest.

The detainees themselves blame the Kurds. As the disruption began, one inmate who had been outside the cells to meet a family member was swiftly pushed into a guard bunkroom and left with two journalists.

The man, Yunis Ahmad, 34, of Kirkuk, said he had been held two years without being charged. He was briefly detained, he said, by the American military, and then turned over to the Kurds.

Behind him on the wall of the guard's room hung two pieces of heavy electric cable, a common tool for beatings.

Mr. Ahmad said that the Americans had treated him decently, interviewing him politely and giving him food and juice. But since being in Kurdish custody, he said, he had been tortured, including having a bed placed on him and then being nearly crushed with weights and having his arms almost pulled from his shoulder sockets by the guards.

"I promise you, if they pulled your arms like that, you will confess to being in Al Qaeda," he said.

He was an Islamic cleric, he said, and his brother was an insurgent. He said he did not know the reasons for his incarceration. "The people who are here don't know why they are here," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108747

Later, other prisoners spoke through their windows and cell doors.

One man, Ahmed Jamal, 24, said he was an Australian citizen and had been held without being charged since he was arrested by Kurdish authorities in Aug. 2004.

"They don't give us enough to drink," he said. "They don't give us medicine." He pointed to a middle-aged man who was moaning on a bunk, semi-conscious, and said that the authorities would not provide the man with medical treatment.

Mr. Jamal's own journey into custody appeared strange. Kurdish authorities said that Mr. Jamal came to Iraq to join the insurgency, a topic Mr. Jamal was evasive about.

He said he had flown to Baghdad in 2004 because he planned to drive into Jordan illegally, and was then arrested in Mosul by the Kurds. He could not fly directly to Jordan, he said, because the Jordanian government considered him a terrorist, which he said he was not.

Asked how he ended up in Mosul, which is not on the way to Jordan from Baghdad, he shrugged, and said, "My plans changed."

Andrew S. Todd, a senior spokesman for the Australian Department of Foreign Affairs, confirmed by telephone that Mr. Jamal is an Australian citizen. He added that he had been visited by consular officials, who have been discussing his circumstances with the Kurdish authorities. He declined to discuss the case further, citing diplomatic protocol.

Another inmate, Haqi Ismail Ibrahim, an Iraqi Arab who had trained with the Taliban in Afghanistan before the terrorist attacks in the United States in 2001, said he had been held without charges or a legal hearing for more than five years. (Mr. Ibrahim has been held since at least 2002, when he was previously interviewed by The New York Times.)

He said 10 to 15 other inmates have vanished, and that he feared they had been executed. "We asked the Red Cross to search for these people," he said through the bars. "But they do not know where they are."

One of the prisoners who Mr. Ibrahim said was now missing, Qais Ibrahim Khadir, was captured in 2002 after an assassination attempt against Barham Salih. Mr. Salih was then the prime minister of the eastern Kurdish enclave and is now a deputy prime minister of Iraq. Five Kurdish guards were killed in the attempt.

Mr. Salih later said he wanted to spare Mr. Khadir's life, as part of an example of official restraint and respect for life in a country that had endured unchecked state violence under Mr. Hussein. Other Kurdish officials, in interviews in 2002 and 2003, dismissed such notions as fancy, and said Mr. Khadir would be executed.

Mr. Khadir's fate has never been disclosed. Mr. Jalal and Mr. Nouri would say publicly only that he is no longer in his custody.

The International Committee for the Red Cross has an office in Sulaimaniya. Its head of mission declined to comment about the prisoners' allegations, other than to say that the organization visits the prison and the inmates and is in contact with the Kurdish authorities.

The United States military said it was also not directly involved in these jails. "We just don't have that role in the Kurdish legal system," said Maj. Derrick W. Cheng, a spokesman for the Third Brigade, 25th Infantry Division. "We have security overwatch in the area, but we don't have an immediate or direct role in the prisons."

U.S. Military Death Toll In Iraq Exceeds Number Of Deaths In Sept. 11, 2001, Attacks (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

BAGHDAD (AP) — Two more American soldiers were killed in Iraq, officials said Tuesday, pushing the U.S. military death toll to at least 2,974 — one more than the number killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

The tragic milestone came with the deaths of the two soldiers Monday in a bomb explosion southwest of Baghdad, the military said.

The deaths — announced Tuesday — raised the number of troops killed to 2,974 since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes at least seven military civilians.

The Sept. 11, 2001, attacks claimed 2,973 victims in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania. Opponents of President Bush have criticized him for raising the attacks as a justification for the protracted fight in Iraq.

"The joint patrol was conducting security operations in order to stop terrorists from placing roadside bombs in the area," the military said in a statement on the latest deaths. "As they conducted their mission, a roadside bomb exploded near one of their vehicles."

Another soldier was wounded in the explosion, the military said.

On Monday, the U.S. command announced the deaths of two other soldiers and a Marine. It said one soldier died and two were wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near a U.S. military vehicle in southern Baghdad on Monday. An American soldier and a Marine died Sunday from combat wounds suffered in Anbar province.

DOJ_NMG_0108748

Prior to the deaths announced Tuesday, the AP count was 15 higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Friday at 10 a.m. ET. At least 2,377 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

The British military has reported 126 deaths; Italy, 33; Ukraine, 18; Poland, 18; Bulgaria, 13; Spain, 11; Denmark, six; El Salvador, five; Slovakia, four; Estonia, Netherlands, Thailand, two each; and Australia, Hungary, Kazakhstan, Latvia, Romania, one death each.

On Monday, British soldiers backed by tanks raided a police station in the southern city of Basra, killing seven gunmen in an effort to stop renegade Iraqi officers from executing their prisoners, the British military said.

After the British stormed the Basra police station, they removed the prisoners, who showed evidence of torture, then evacuated the building before blowing it up.

The operation showed how closely aligned some police units are with militias and death squads — and the challenges coalition forces face as they transfer authority for security to Iraqis.

In Baghdad, police found 40 bodies, apparent victims of sectarian violence. A car bomb exploded beside a market and a suicide bomber struck a bus in separate attacks that killed 14 civilians and wounded at least 33.

In the Basra raid, the British set out to arrest officers with the station's serious crimes unit who were suspected of involvement with Shiite death squads. Seven members of the rogue police unit were apprehended three days ago in other raids, said a British spokeswoman, Royal Navy Lt. Jenny Saleh.

"We had intelligence to indicate that the serious crimes unit would execute its prisoners in the coming days, so we decided to intervene," Saleh said.

British troops were fired on as they approached the station and their return fire killed seven gunmen, said Maj. Charlie Burbridge, another British military spokesman.

British and Iraqi forces transferred all 76 prisoners at the station to another facility in downtown Basra, he said. Some prisoners had "classic torture injuries" such as crushed hands and feet, cigarette and electrical burns and gunshot wounds in the knees, Burbridge said.

The British demolished the building in an effort to disband the unit. "We identified the serious crimes unit as, frankly, too far gone," Burbridge said. "We just had to get rid of it."

The unit's members, he alleged, were involved in tribal and political feuds in southern Iraq, which is mostly Shiite. They were not, he said, engaged in the kind of sectarian reprisal killings that have terrorized mixed neighborhoods of Baghdad.

Most of Britain's 7,200 troops in Iraq are based in the Basra area.

Mohammed al-Askari, a spokesman for Iraq's Defense Ministry, said the operation was coordinated with the Iraqi government. "Multinational forces got approval for this raid from this ministry and with participation of the Iraqi army," he said.

U.S. Army Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who is in charge of training Iraqi forces, said in Washington last week that efforts were underway to weed out Iraqi national police believed to be sympathetic to the militias.

Up to a quarter are thought to be aligned with the militias, which are engaged in sectarian violence.

The establishment of a viable Iraqi police force is vital to the U.S.-led coalition's goal of handing responsibility for security to Iraqis, so foreign troops can return home.

In another sign of lawlessness in Basra, gunmen on Monday robbed $740,000 from a bank about half a mile from the raided police station.

The car bomb in Baghdad, meanwhile, struck a mostly Shiite district to the east that attracts crowds of shoppers and laborers looking for work.

In another part of eastern Baghdad, a suicide bomber exploded in a minibus, killing three people and injuring 19, police said.

Another suicide bomber killed two policemen at a checkpoint at a university entrance in Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, a stronghold of the Sunni-dominated insurgency.

The deaths came a day after Iraq's interior minister said attacks targeting police had killed some 12,000 officers since the 2003 fall of Saddam Hussein.

Christians attended Christmas services in Baghdad and northern Iraq, home to most of Iraq's 800,000 Christians. Some in Baghdad stayed home, however, fearing violence.

Christians are on the fringes of the conflict, which mostly involves Shiite Muslims and Sunni Arabs — but they have been targeted by Islamic militants.

"I hope next year will bring good things and unite all Iraqis because there is no difference between Christians and Muslims," said Abu Fadi, a worshipper who does not use his Christian name because he fears for his safety. "May God bring relief from this."

DOJ_NMG_0108749

In another sign of escalating diplomatic tensions between the U.S. and Iran, the White House said Monday that U.S. troops in Iraq detained at least two Iranians and released two others who had diplomatic immunity.

U.S. officials have charged that Iran provides training and other aid to Shiite militias in Iraq — including the equipment used to build roadside bombs. The Tehran regime says it only has political and religious links with Iraqi Shiites.

But Iran is believed to be expanding its shadowy role in Iraq, partly to counter U.S. influence in the region.

In Baghdad, a spokesman for Iraqi President Jalal Talabani confirmed that U.S. troops had detained two Iranians who were in Iraq at his invitation. "The president is unhappy about it," said Hiwa Osman, Talabani's media adviser.

He gave no further details, and the U.S. military said it had no comment.

"We suspect this event validates our claims about Iranian meddling, but we want to finish our investigation of the detained Iranians before characterizing their activities," White House spokesman Alex Conant said Monday. "We will be better able to explain what this means about the larger picture after we finish our investigation."

He said that a routine raid on suspected insurgents netted the Iranians. Two had diplomatic immunity and were released to the Iraqi government, which then released them to Iran, Conant said.

Troop Push Is Personal For McCain (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

As the Iraq Study Group issued its long-awaited report on the war, declaring that the United States should not dispatch more troops, Sen. John McCain reacted with his long-held and contrary view: It will take more boots on the ground, or the nation faces "sooner or later, our defeat in Iraq."

Then the Arizona Republican discreetly flew to San Diego, where the next day, Dec. 8, he sat under a hot sun to watch a skinny 18-year-old in military-issue glasses graduate from boot camp and become a Marine. His son Jimmy.

John McCain's public certainty about Iraq masks a more private and potentially wrenching connection. If more troops go there, as McCain hopes they will, his youngest son could be one of them, taking his place in a line of family warriors that is one of the longest in U.S. history.

Sen.-elect James Webb (D-Va.) also has a son in the Marine Corps named Jimmy. On the campaign trail, Webb declined to talk about his son, who is in Iraq, but he wore Jimmy's boots as he called for American forces to come home.

McCain has not drawn any attention to his son and declined to be interviewed for this article.

A leading contender for the GOP presidential nomination, McCain has been one of the few and among the most vocal politicians pressing for more troops in Iraq. "We left Vietnam, it was over, we just had to heal the wounds of war. We leave this place . . . and they'll follow us home," he said on a news show recently. "So there's a great deal more at stake."

McCain's own father faced the anguish of sending a son to war. Adm. John McCain Jr., who commanded Pacific forces during the Vietnam War, ordered airstrikes on Hanoi even while his son, a Navy pilot, was imprisoned there after being shot down.

McCain was held captive for more than five years, repeatedly beaten and tortured. On more than one occasion, the North Vietnamese offered to release him as a propaganda move to shame his father. McCain, citing a prisoners' code of conduct requiring that POWs be released in order of capture, refused.

During McCain's imprisonment, his father, while privately collecting every scrap of information about his son that he could, "made an ironclad rule that no one would talk about his son around him," said Torie Clark, who was a staffer for the younger McCain and a Pentagon spokeswoman. "He wanted to make sure he made decisions based on what was right for U.S. forces . . . not what would be good or bad for his son.

"I'm not surprised that the current John McCain separates the private from the public."

In "Faith of My Fathers," the family memoir McCain wrote in 1999 with Mark Salter, his chief of staff, he recalls the prisoners' jubilation at the 1972 bombing of Hanoi, ordered by his father, that helped end the war. His thoughts foreshadowed his position on Iraq:

"The misery we had endured . . . was made all the worse by our fear that the United States was unprepared to do what was necessary to bring the war to a reasonably swift conclusion," the authors wrote.

"No one who goes to war believes once he is there that it is worth the terrible cost of war to fight it by half measures," they wrote. "War is too horrible a thing to drag out unnecessarily. It was a shameful waste to ask men to suffer and die, to persevere through awful afflictions and heartaches, for a cause that half the country didn't believe in and our leaders weren't committed to winning."

DOJ_NMG_0108750

Those who know McCain say they are not surprised that his children would feel a call to duty -- his son Jack is a Naval Academy midshipmen -- and that the senator would not allow his paternal concerns to influence his thinking about how the war should be conducted.

"I get a feeling that he sometimes must think he's seeing an old movie being played back," said George "Bud" Day, who was McCain's cellmate in Hanoi and remains close to him now. "There's no doubt his kids have the McCain genes. That means they're going to war."

McCain's view of the war and his family history is born of "his sense of duty, that is so deeply ingrained . . . there were probably times that he felt a prisoner of it," said Robert Timberg, who has written a book about McCain and who, the senator has said, "knows more about me than I do."

McCain has spoken publicly about Jimmy only once. In response to questions from Time magazine in June, as his son prepared for boot camp, he said, "I'm obviously very proud of my son, but also understandably a little nervous." After the interview, the magazine reported, McCain tried to get the story killed.

His reluctance to publicly discuss his thoughts about his son going to Iraq is a sign of decency, said Timberg, a fellow Annapolis graduate and Vietnam veteran. But there is another reason, common to fathers with sons in war.

"The last thing in the world he'd want to do," Timberg said, "is to anger the gods."

Jimmy McCain is an outgoing young man who told his fellow recruits that he had no ambition for politics, recalled Lance Cpl. Dominic Stam, 17, who served in a platoon with him for a time.

"On the very first day, I felt sorry for him because all the drill instructors already knew who he was," Stam said. Over three months of rigorous training, 80 of the 500 recruits quit. McCain "did really well" and "was a squad leader for a while," he said. "He started out as John McCain's son . . . and became Private McCain, just another Marine."

Stam said McCain signed up for the infantry. He reports to Camp Pendleton for more training in early January and could deploy by mid-2007. "He decided to choose one of the most dangerous jobs in the Marine Corps, and I respected him for it," Stam said. "He could have chosen something where he would be safe."

On graduation day, Stam scanned the military officers and family on the reviewing stand. There was John McCain, in suit and sunglasses.

"He sat there like a normal parent," Stam said. "He looked proud to me. I can't imagine a parent not being proud."

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling and research editor Alice Crites contributed to this report.

Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Despite Upbeat Details, Updates Paint a Picture of Failure

A year ago, President Bush announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around "eight pillars" of U.S. policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure.

But never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on.

The State Department continues every Wednesday to issue a 30-page public report that details exactly how the U.S. government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan. The report frames the data around Bush's storied eight pillars, which include such goals as "Defeat the Terrorists and Neutralize the Insurgents" (Pillar 1) and "Increase International Support for Iraq" (Pillar 7).

In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met.

The report is often upbeat as it presents some of the most minuscule factoids of the situation in Iraq. The Dec. 13 report noted that on Dec. 7, 40 sheikhs from across Diyala province met "to discuss ways to maintain peace and stability" and that on Dec. 9, U.S. soldiers discovered a factory for making improvised explosive devices in a house in Baqubah.

But the bottom-line graphs tell a story of failure. Under Pillar 5 ("Help Iraq Strengthen Its Economy") the reports show that week after week, the Iraqis cannot meet their goals for crude oil production. Another chart shows that efforts to build a 15-day supply of all refined products, such as diesel and gasoline, are woefully behind schedule, reaching a peak of a four-day supply.

Under Pillar 7, increasing international support, the trends are on the decline. The first report of the year showed that 28 countries, in addition to the United States, contributed 23,000 troops to coalition forces. By last week's report, the number of countries had fallen to 25 -- and the number of troops was down to 16,860, a decrease of more than 25 percent. Italy recently dropped off the list when the last of its troops departed.

DOJ_NMG_0108751

One figure has not really budged: the $20 billion apportioned for rebuilding Iraq (under Pillar 4, "Help Iraq Build Government Capacity and Provide Essential Services"). That is because the administration ran out of money for rebuilding Iraq, in part because about 25 percent was diverted to security. The latest report says that all but $4 billion has been disbursed.

A State Department official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to reporters about the report, said it still plays an important role because it provides the administration with a single set of numbers about the situation in Iraq. Previously, State and Defense department officials might have arrived at meetings armed with different data, but "now everyone is talking off the same sheet on music," he said.

There is also a classified version of the report, which includes details on counterterrorism operations, given to top policymakers on Fridays.

The report is prepared not by State Department officials but by a team of about 10 people hired by a management consulting firm. The firm, BearingPoint, has a $2 million contract to produce the report and to manage the process of running Iraq policy in the administration, the State Department official said.

Below the level of the top policymakers, working groups from across the government implement Iraq policy day by day. The BearingPoint employees, who work out of offices in the State Department, arrange the meetings, set the agendas, take notes and provide summaries of the discussions, the official said. They also maintain the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

The twists and turns of American policy are imperfectly reflected in the report. "Operation Together Forward," the effort this summer to bolster security in Baghdad, which was later deemed a disappointment, was the subject of several upbeat reports but then seemed to fade in importance. During the spike in violence in October, the report noted that the Iraqi Ministry of Interior had recalled a police brigade for more training after "possible complicity with sectarian violence," though it brightly added that the training "will improve the professionalism and confidence within the national police."

The report seemed uncertain how to treat the release of a report by the Iraq Study Group, the independent bipartisan panel that criticized the administration's policy and spurred the White House to come up with a new plan. The earliest mention of the study group's report, in the Dec. 13 edition, came under Pillar 3, "Help Iraqis to Forge a National Compact for Democratic Government."

The headline said it all: "Iraqi Leaders Blast Iraq Study Group's Report." The State Department, perhaps in an effort to demonstrate the unity of Iraqi leaders, then devoted a whole page to negative quotes about the panel's recommendations.

The Dec. 20 report featured one curious item. Under the rubric of increasing international support, the report highlighted a visit to Damascus, Syria, by Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). The senators "arrived in Syria December 19 to discuss how Damascus could help bring stability and security in Iraq," the report said, noting that another senator, Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in early December.

The State Department had strongly discouraged the trips, saying Syria is a key source of problems in Iraq.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DCX Probe Spans Globe (DETNEWS)

By David Shepardson

Detroit News, December 26, 2006

Internal probe reveals bribes; ex-FBI chief hired as monitor

WASHINGTON -- DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation.

The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said.

The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department.

Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards. We take these matters very seriously," DaimlerChrysler spokesman Han Tjan said. "We're still conducting our investigation."

At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said.

DOJ_NMG_0108752

Investigators traveled to 25 countries and interviewed dozens of people, including former DaimlerChrysler Chairman Juergen Schrempp and other executives, the people said. Investigators also uncovered evidence of secret bank accounts.

This fall, DaimlerChrysler hired Freeh as a consultant to monitor the company's compliance with anti-bribery regulations and to review its internal investigation. Freeh's hiring hasn't been announced publicly.

Efforts by The News to reach Freeh, who works as a consultant to companies facing legal issues, were unsuccessful.

DaimlerChrysler has been regularly debriefing the SEC and Justice Department on the findings of its investigation and has turned over interview summaries and documents.

The bribes were seen by some company officials as an accepted way of doing business in many countries, according to people familiar with the investigation. In some cases, the amount of bribes was based on how many Mercedes vehicles were sold in a given market, the people said. In certain instances, investigators struggled to follow the money trail because intermediaries were used.

While DaimlerChrysler's internal probe is nearing completion, federal officials aren't expected to complete their investigations until 2007. Serious settlement discussions aren't expected until early next year.

Aiming to minimize penalties

DaimlerChrysler is clearly aiming to minimize any fines or sanctions by hiring Freeh as an internal monitor and providing federal investigators with the findings of the exhaustive internal investigation.

DaimlerChrysler, which is based in Stuttgart, Germany, and controls the Auburn Hills-based Chrysler Group, could face charges under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, a 1977 law designed to prevent U.S. companies from acting unethically abroad, because its stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange.

German companies could deduct certain types of bribes on their taxes until the late 1990s.

German prosecutors in Stuttgart also are investigating whether the company violated anti-bribery and disclosure laws.

In March, DaimlerChrysler revealed in its annual report that an undisclosed number of executives have been disciplined or fired as a result of the investigation and admitted that "improper payments" were made in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe.

The company reduced 2005 net income by $84.5 million and 2005 operating profit by $21 million to account for the improper payments. It also faces the prospect of having to pay back taxes. Still unclear is how much senior executives knew of the arrangements.

No U.S.-based employees are believed to be involved.

Whistle-blower cases settled

On Dec. 6, the company settled the last of two 2004 whistle-blower suits filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit that prompted the probe. Christine Holtzmann had alleged the company ignored reports of accounting fraud and mishandled audits. She said she was fired in December 2003 after an 18-year career with the automaker after speaking up about the fraud.

In July 2005, DaimlerChrysler settled a 2004 wrongful-firing suit filed in U.S. District Court in Detroit by former Chrysler accountant David Bazzetta.

Bazzetta claimed he was fired in January 2004 in part because he talked to superiors about as many as 40 secret bank accounts maintained by the Mercedes unit to bribe foreign government officials.

He said in his lawsuit he learned of the bank accounts during a corporate audit committee meeting in July 2001 in Stuttgart. According to court filings, Bazzetta claimed a vice president of corporate audit, Hubertus Buderath, told a group "a common practice of Daimler Benz was the use of secret bank accounts to bribe government officials." Buderath allegedly told then-chairman Schrempp that 40 of those accounts still existed and "were buried deep in (the company's) balance sheet." Schrempp denied knowledge of any accounts.

SEC lawyers interviewed Bazzetta and Holtzmann.

Point man is powerful lawyer

The point man for DaimlerChrysler in the internal investigation is Bennett, a high-powered attorney who has represented Enron and KPMG in corporate scandals. He was President Clinton's personal attorney in the Paula Jones civil case and is a partner in Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom LLP.

Bennett declined to comment.

Skadden partner Colleen Mahoney, a former deputy director of enforcement at the SEC, who is also involved in the DaimlerChrysler internal investigation, could not be reached. Two other Skadden Arps partners, former assistant U.S. attorney Gary DiBianco and Mitchell Ettinger, a former chief prosecutor for the Air Force, also have been involved in the probe.

Mark F. Mendelsohn, deputy chief of the Justice Department's fraud section, and Frederic D. Firestone, an SEC associate director of enforcement, who are overseeing the government's investigations into DaimlerChrysler, also declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0108753

Numerous German companies have faced bribery investigations -- Volkswagen AG for allegedly bribing union officials and most recently engineering giant Siemens AG for allegedly bribing customers using secret bank accounts.

Experts said the government's focus on DaimlerChrysler may be to send a message to the world's third-largest economy to take bribery more seriously.

"The U.S. government really wants to encourage the Germans to crack down," said Peter Henning, a Wayne State University law professor and former SEC attorney. "It's the principle here. The amounts are usually never that large. It's surprisingly cheap to bribe public officials in the Third World."

The SEC has ramped up enforcement of its anti-bribery laws recently, filing more than 100 cases in 2006.

You can reach David Shepardson at (202) 662-8735 or dshepardson@detnews.com.

Report: Ex-FBI Boss Aids DaimlerChrysler (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

AUBURN HILLS, Mich. (AP) -- Former FBI Director Louis Freeh is aiding DaimlerChrysler AG in its internal investigation of bribery allegations involving company employees, a newspaper reported Tuesday.

The Detroit News quoted unidentified sources as saying that the German-American company hired Freeh in the fall.

Freeh is a member of the Gavel Group, which consists of former federal judges "who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations," according to the group's Web site.

An e-mail message seeking comment from Freeh was left with the Gavel Group before business hours Tuesday.

A DaimlerChrysler spokesman declined comment.

"The company is very determined to operate our business with the highest ethical standards," Han Tjan told the newspaper.

DaimlerChrysler has acknowledged a U.S. Justice Department probe of allegations the company bribed foreign officials with the knowledge of senior executives.

Last year, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials.

Ex-Trader Tells Story As A Warning (NYT)

By Eamon Quinn

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

GALWAY, Ireland — As an unsupervised young chief trader in Singapore in 1995, Nicholas W. Leeson lost $1.3 billion in frenzied trades in Japanese stock futures and bonds, destroying his employer, the 233-year-old Barings Bank, which had Queen Elizabeth as a customer.

Now, Mr. Leeson, having served four years in prison and survived a bout with colon cancer, has managed to turn those money-losing bets into a money-making enterprise — warning bankers of their continuing vulnerability to rogue traders.

The paradox is that he is earning a very good living from a notorious past, getting £5,000 ($9,800) a speech.

In November, he spoke at an annual dinner of financial regulators in London's financial district and then headed to Amsterdam for a speech to a large firm of auditors. The previous month, he gave a presentation at a Dublin function on banking scandals, arguing that he should have been stopped by Barings at an early stage. The British bank, he says, was culpable for failing to supervise him and for accepting the bluster of a young trader who was prepared to disguise his trading losses.

Mr. Leeson, now 39, has recently been freed from an agreement in which he surrendered some of his earnings to the liquidators of Barings, which was sold to ING of the Netherlands. For over a decade, the liquidators had sought to recover money for creditors of the ruined bank.

Seated in a coffeehouse close to the Galway seashore, he still looks every bit the chief trader, dressed in pinstripes.

"I suppose it embodies more where I am now in life and the changes I have been through in the last 15 to 20 years," he said about his new start in the west of Ireland. "Life is a little bit more slow-paced, but there is a quality of life which was possibly missing when I was in Singapore, when it was all about succeeding. I am more happy now."

He spoke of his new day job as general manager of Galway's soccer club, in which he is responsible for everything from shirt sponsorship to planning for a potential redevelopment of the club's stadium. "There's a sea change in the way the club is run today," he said in a softened London accent. His new home, with its large college student population and prosperous computer and tourism industries, has a reputation as Ireland's summertime party town.

Mr. Leeson, who grew up north of London in a working-class family, left school at 18 but managed to land a job in London's financial district in 1985, when the economy was booming. He joined Barings in 1989 as a back-office clerk but did well enough that he was offered a job in Singapore.

DOJ_NMG_0108754

He continued to advance, landing a trading job. His successes led to a salary and bonus that was reportedly more than $1 million a year in the early half of the 1990s. But at some point, Mr. Leeson began taking what amounted to a gamble on the direction of Japanese stock prices and interest rates — a gamble that began to go wrong early in 1995.

By the end of February, Barings had collapsed under the weight of more than $1 billion in losses. In December, Mr. Leeson pleaded guilty to two criminal charges that he had illegally covered up his trading losses and was sentenced in Singapore to six and a half years in prison.

But after serving a little over half that prison sentence, he was released in 1999, and offers began to flood in. He did a string of television commercials, including one for a Swedish stock brokerage firm, and was paid $100,000 for an appearance before an audience of Dutch bankers and brokers. “Half went to the liquidators, half to me,” he said the other day.

He also wrote a book, “Rogue Trader,” while in prison that was later turned into a movie.

He said he believed he had picked the opportunities wisely. “It’s one of the things I have done reasonably well since I have been released,” he said. “I don’t do everything that is offered me.”

He is still in touch with some former colleagues in Singapore but is banned from returning to the country. He laughs when asked about his slim prospects of ever working for a bank again.

He mentioned that he still trades currencies — mostly the dollar against the British pound and the euro — through an account at an online brokerage firm. This time, he says, he feels confident in his trading decisions, contending that he was “ill-disposed” to knowing his limitations 11 years ago.

Speaking in mid-November, he confidently predicted that the dollar had further to fall against the pound and euro.

“If I am risking my money it should be O.K.,” he said. “If I were employed by a bank, it would be a different matter.”

When reminded that the anniversaries of the Barings collapse coincide with his birthday, he replied: “It is one of those quirks of fate. It does not mean a lot other than I am a year older.”

He added, “The positive is that it is a further year on” from the events that made his name synonymous with “rogue trader.”

Exxon Damages For Valdez Spill Are Cut In Half (WSJ/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

A federal appeals court cut in half a $5 billion jury award for punitive damages against Exxon Mobil Corp. in the 1989 Valdez oil spill that affected about 1,500 miles of Alaskan coastline.

The case, one of the nation's longest-running, noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the punitive damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were harmed when the Valdez oil tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil.

It is the third time the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive considering U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

This time, in its 2-1 decision, the court ordered a specific amount in damages, while its previous rulings demanded a lower court to come up with its own figures. "It is time for this protracted litigation to end," Chief Judge Mary Schroeder and Judge Andrew Kleinfeld wrote.

U.S. District Judge H. Russel Holland of Anchorage begrudgingly complied in 2002, reducing damages to $4 billion. Exxon, Irving, Texas, again appealed.

The following year, the appeals court ordered Judge Holland to revisit his decision, this time balancing it against a new 2003 Supreme Court ruling that said punitive damages usually couldn't be more than nine times general damages. The Anchorage jury awarded $287 million in general damages and issued punitive damages that were 17 times that amount.

Judge Holland, appointed by President Reagan in 1984, declared Exxon's conduct "reprehensible" and set the figure at $4.5 billion plus interest, ruling that the Supreme Court's precedent didn't directly apply to the case.

Exxon again appealed, and argued it should have to pay no more than $25 million in punitive damages. Exxon spokesman Dave Gardner criticized the appeals-court decision. "The facts of this case do not warrant an award this size," he said. He didn't say whether the company would appeal the decision.

David Oesting, the lead lawyer from Anchorage representing the plaintiffs, said he was considering whether to ask the court to rehear the case with 15 judges or to go to the Supreme Court.

Lots Of Cheer From R.I.M., But No News On Options (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, December 25, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108755

OTTAWA, Dec. 24 — James L. Balsillie, the chairman and co-chief executive of Research In Motion, offered plenty of cheery news during an investor conference call last week: quarterly profit up 47 percent from the same period a year ago and a sales increase of 49 percent, largely based on the company's successful move into the consumer market.

On another issue, Mr. Balsillie had no comment: the review of R.I.M.'s stock options grants being undertaken by the independent board directors. The lack of information follows a pattern at R.I.M., the Canadian company that created the BlackBerry and made it a global brand. Ever since late September, when R.I.M. said it had started the review, the company has offered investors and regulators few details, making it difficult to assess its potential impact or full extent.

An eight-page letter it submitted at the beginning of last week for an Ontario Securities Commission hearing only added to the uncertainty. It indicated that the review was "proceeding more slowly than anticipated" and that various complications "substantially increase" the $25 million to $45 million in restatements the company initially anticipated.

The lack of information is baffling to investors, particularly at a time when the company's stock on the Nasdaq has climbed to $130 on Friday, from $81.93 at the beginning of September.

"If I were a portfolio manager, I would have a hard time figuring out how significant this issue is," said Henry T. C. Hu, a professor of corporate and securities law at the University of Texas in Austin.

"I can't figure out what the best case is," he said. " 'Substantially increase,' does that mean we ought to apply a multiple of 2 or a higher multiple? All we know is that there are enough zeros that they're using the word substantially."

R.I.M. has yet to disclose the nature of the problems with its options-granting policies, including whether the company backdated some options to allow employees and executives to purchase stock at lower prices. Nor is it clear if the options situation directly involves Mr. Balsillie or Michael Lazaridis, the company's president and other co-chief executive.

And at least one small Canadian institutional investor, the Ironworkers Ontario Pension Fund, through a lawyer who specializes in securities-related class-action lawsuits, is raising questions about the wisdom of having the review supervised by directors who themselves benefited from R.I.M. stock options.

R.I.M. is one of many companies facing questions over their options practices. The Securities and Exchange Commission is investigating at least 120 companies, including Apple Computer, UnitedHealth Group and dozens of technology companies, for possible stock-options manipulation, and the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service are conducting separate reviews.

For the moment, however, the uncertainties at R.I.M. appear to have been swept aside in most investors' and analysts' minds by R.I.M.'s overwhelming dominance of the wireless e-mail market for business users and by the immediate, and surprisingly strong, success of its first BlackBerry built for consumers, the Pearl.

This much is known about the situation: four independent directors on R.I.M.'s audit committee, assisted by outside lawyers and accountants, are examining about 3,200 stock options given to about 2,000 employees that date back at least 10 years. The company began trading publicly in 1997.

Searches of the company's computer system, its data backup and something the company calls "forensic imaging" have produced about 650,000 documents related to the options. The delay in the investigation, the company said in its letter, largely comes from the fact that the audit committee is dealing with 250,000 more documents than it originally expected.

What remains unclear is why the company now expects to make a larger-than-expected financial restatement. In its filings, R.I.M. has said only that "certain accounting errors" understated noncash charges from the options and effectively inflated earnings. Exactly what those noncash items are is not known.

Since starting the investigation, the committee has found an "additional error" in accounting that substantially understated the options-related charges.

On Friday, the day after Mr. Balsillie's conference call, Peter Misek, a technology analyst with Canaccord Adams in Toronto, appeared on Report on Business Television, a Canadian cable channel. Like many other analysts, he was effusive about R.I.M.'s results and the company's potential, particularly in the consumer market.

"They were blow-out results," Mr. Misek told viewers. "This is a table pounder for us. You've got to own the stock."

During a subsequent interview, Mr. Misek, whose firm trades R.I.M. shares on behalf of clients but has no holdings or dealings with the company, acknowledged that the uncertainty surrounding the options review made him uneasy.

"I'm not going to deny that I'm nervous," Mr. Misek said, "but I'm going to continue to believe that this was a past issue that was unfortunate. And, I think in the end management will do the right thing."

Mr. Misek estimates that the restatement is in the range of $100 million, although he acknowledged that the figure is a guess. Mr. Misek does not believe that options were adjusted to improperly benefit employees. Instead, he believes that the review will find that bookkeeping systems at the company failed to keep pace with the rapid growth at R.I.M. that followed the introduction of the BlackBerry in January 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0108756

But Mr. Misek's anxiety goes beyond the potential amount of the financial restatement. R.I.M.'s success can largely be traced to both Mr. Balsillie and Mr. Lazaridis. Anything that jeopardized their positions within the company would most likely depress R.I.M.'s stock.

Mr. Lazaridis's engineering skills are widely admired. His innovations include obvious features such as the BlackBerry's thumb-operated keyboard, as well as critical technical innovations in the device's radio system, electronics and, above all, the software it uses to route e-mail messages.

It was Mr. Balsillie's aggressive enthusiasm for the BlackBerry that first persuaded major wireless service providers in the United States and Europe to offer an untried product and service from an obscure maker of wireless modems in Canada.

Having known Mr. Balsillie and Mr. Lazaridis for more than six years, Mr. Misek said he did not believe that they would have acted improperly for personal gain.

"I have no love for any executive, but I don't see it in this case," said Mr. Misek, who is an accountant by training. "Mike's not motivated by money," he added, referring to Mr. Lazaridis.

R.I.M. and its directors have consistently declined to discuss the review. But in its letter to the Ontario regulator, the company argued that the amount of information it is providing "is more detailed and informative than the information provided by comparable companies in the United States in similar circumstances."

During the conference call, Mr. Balsillie spoke at length about the Pearl, which is the first BlackBerry with multimedia capabilities, saying it is just the beginning of a range of new products and services from R.I.M. And while he was talking about new technologies, Mr. Balsillie made a comment that might also apply to the options review.

"Those of you that follow us closely, I would argue that if you really paid attention to us and you are a real expert, you might have a sense of 20 percent of what's really going on," he said.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Why L.A. Jail Cells Have Revolving Doors (LAT)

By Megan Garvey And Jack Leonard, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

A strained justice system and a flawed rehab law feed the cycle of repeat offenders.

Bertha Cuestas was standing outside her Highland Park apartment scratching off an instant lottery ticket when veteran Los Angeles Police Department Officers J.C. Duarte and Harold Marinelli spotted the 50-year-old from their patrol car.

They had been arresting Cuestas for prostitution and drugs since their days on the vice squad in the mid-1990s. On this warm October afternoon, she was wanted for failing to report to the judge in her most recent drug case.

"Why didn't you go to court?" Duarte asked her.

"I was busy," she replied.

Cuestas knew the drill. She asked a friend for money, then stuffed the $7.42 he gave her into her bra for the bus ride home when she got out of jail.

"How many times have you guys done this with her?" her son asked, cradling his infant daughter in his arm.

"Too many times," Marinelli said.

It was the start of a typical week for Duarte and Marinelli. Like other patrol officers throughout Los Angeles County, the longtime partners are spending more and more time picking up old regulars like Cuestas.

A Times investigation has found that thieves, drug offenders and other repeat criminals are cycling in and out of jail faster than ever.

Since 2000, the number of people booked two or more times into jails in Los Angeles County in a single year has jumped 73%, reaching 61,646 last year, according to a Times analysis. Repeat offenders now account for 42% of bookings, up from 26% in 2000.

Once booked, defendants enter a justice system whose resources have not kept pace with demand, even as crime has dropped in recent years.

There are not enough prosecutors to try them. There are not enough courts to sentence them. There are not enough jail or prison beds to house them. And there is not enough treatment to help them.

Instead, repeat offenders drain limited justice resources and are quickly back on the streets to get arrested again, taking up the time of police, prosecutors, public defenders and judges. Patrol cops are frustrated. Victims feel forgotten.

"Under any other definition of crisis, this would be an emergency," said Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca, who runs the nation's largest network of jails. "The system is collapsing because of its volume."

DOJ_NMG_0108757

A solution, top law enforcement officials say, would require far more money than lawmakers have been willing to commit.

"We didn't cure malaria until we started draining the swamps instead of just swatting at the mosquitoes," said Los Angeles Police Chief William J. Bratton. "The resources have just not been committed to draining the swamps."

A week on the beat

To gauge the effects of the revolving door, The Times examined jail bookings since 2000. Reporters interviewed prosecutors, judges, defense attorneys, law enforcement leaders and criminologists.

The paper also spent a week in October with officers in the LAPD's Northeast Division, a 29-square-mile collection of affluent and poor neighborhoods that runs from Eagle Rock to eastern Hollywood.

Police that week made 28 adult felony arrests, on typical charges for the division's patrol officers, mostly drug offenses, thefts and domestic violence. Within six weeks of their arrests, 12 had cycled through the court system, were found guilty and were back on the streets. Three others arrested on warrants were released by judges within days.

Of those 15, three have already been rearrested and are back in jail.

"We get so many repeaters it's ridiculous," Officer Duarte said. "They do a few days and then they're back out again."

Duarte and Marinelli had a hand in five arrests that week, all involving repeat offenders. Together, the five had at least 106 previous arrests and 61 convictions. Cuestas alone had been arrested 21 times, most recently in July.

Cuestas had been ordered to enter rehab in August under Proposition 36, the 2000 state initiative that mandates treatment rather than incarceration for most nonviolent drug offenders. She never went, leading to the warrant.

She is among thousands who have failed to complete treatment. Although nearly 8,000 people in the county successfully completed Proposition 36 rehab between July 2001 and June 2005, they are the minority. UCLA researchers found that about 75% of those sentenced to treatment opted out, never showed up or stopped going.

Duarte and Marinelli believe the initiative gives longtime, chronic users like Cuestas too many chances to reoffend, with little consequence.

"We need to let the courts know Prop. 36 is not working for a lot of people," Duarte said.

A parolee is arrested

A day after they arrested Cuestas, Marinelli and Duarte were called in to help with a search. Rodolfo Salcido, 35, had been pulled over driving a stolen 1991 Toyota Camry. Before police could detain him, he fled, jumping over a picket fence in a Cypress Park neighborhood.

Police found Salcido crammed into an attic crawl space in the laundry room of a nearby apartment building.

"All right, officers, I'm coming out," he told them. He was on parole for stealing another car. Sweat poured from his shaved head and tattooed torso.

Salcido had spent the last seven years in and out of prison, never in for more than a year or out for more than nine months. In 1999, he was convicted of stealing a $4,000 LAPD radio from an unmarked police car. Soon after, he went to prison in another burglary case, the first of four prison terms.

In his wake, he left victims like Emma Sanchez, a mother of two and owner of the stolen Camry. Sanchez is one of more than 23,000 people whose cars were stolen in the city this year. She said it took her more than six months, working for minimum wage as a lunch-truck driver, to save $2,500 to buy the car.

She said she paid about $220 to the city to get her car out of the impound lot. Her prized $400 stereo was gone.

The Camry smelled of stale beer and cigarettes.

She feels uneasy behind the wheel, as though the car is no longer hers.

"They say once a car is stolen, it's not good anymore," Sanchez said. "I don't even like driving in it. It's not the same anymore. It feels like it was violated."

'Don't I know you?'

A few hours after Salcido's arrest, Duarte and Marinelli were on a new case. The division's detectives received a tip that Orlando Gallegos, 34, a burglary suspect also wanted for failing to report for his parole, was living at a dingy Highland Park hotel.

In the late afternoon, the officers pounded on his door. They found him in his narrow room, several baggies of heroin in the freezer, stolen credit cards on the dresser and two convicted criminals as company.

In the dim hallway, the suspects knelt, handcuffed and facing the wall. Gallegos caught the eye of Marinelli.

"Don't I know you?" Marinelli asked him. "You look familiar to me."

A check of Gallegos' rap sheet jogged Marinelli's memory. Three years earlier, Gallegos had led him on a brief high-speed chase in a stolen car.

"I knew I knew you," said Marinelli, shaking his head.

Gallegos told police he'd found the credit cards in a trashcan.

DOJ_NMG_0108758

Police first arrested Gallegos when he was 18 for possession of a small amount of marijuana. Five years later, he was arrested and convicted of vandalism.

In 1999, he was convicted of domestic violence. A burglary conviction in 2000 led to prison time after he violated probation. Two years later, when Marinelli caught him driving a stolen car, he was sent back to prison.

Gallegos' convictions, though frequent, never met the threshold of a strike under California's three-strikes law, which increases sentences for repeat offenders convicted of more serious or violent crimes. And so he cycled rapidly in and out of jail and prison.

One of the men in the hotel room, Evaristo Torres, 31, was furious at the arrival of police. He said he'd only come by to find someone to "smoke some weed with, get a beer with." He told officers he didn't even know the names of the other men.

Gilbert Morales, 46, told police he was on parole for drunk driving and on probation for drug possession. In the cinderblock holding cells of the Northeast Division, an officer searched him.

The officer pulled a tiny baggie filled with what looked like rock cocaine from Morales' small front jeans pocket. Another bag held what appeared to be a balloon of heroin and powder cocaine.

"Am I going to find anything else?" the officer asked. "You might as well tell me because I'm going to find it."

"No, nothing," Morales said.

The officer pulled another tiny bag from one of Morales' socks: methamphetamine and a single tablet of Tylenol.

It was his 47th arrest. Over the years, he'd had 24 convictions, seven for felonies. This was his third arrest this year.

After nightfall, Marinelli and Duarte helped drive Gallegos, Morales and Torres to the city's downtown jail in Parker Center.

There, Morales said he believed he could stop using drugs, if he could get the right help.

"I did good for a while when I had residential treatment. Maybe if I can get that again," he said.

His friend Gallegos needed medical evaluation for an old head injury. A nurse asked if he was on any medication.

"Dylantin for seizures," he said. She gave him his dose for the day.

Was he on any drugs or alcohol? He shook his head no.

"He got interrupted," Marinelli said.

Some deals are made

Duarte and Marinelli doubted that the five suspects they helped arrest would serve much time. They were right. Four were back on the streets within three weeks.

Cuestas, the drug abuser whose son watched her arrest, spent six days in jail before a judge released her on probation.

On Dec. 7, she failed to show up for a court hearing to decide whether her probation should be revoked. A judge issued a new arrest warrant.

Twelve days after his arrest for car theft, Rodolfo Salcido shuffled into Department 50 of the downtown Los Angeles criminal courthouse. His previous convictions — for robbery, burglary and car theft, among other crimes — meant that he faced up to 13 years in prison. Because his 1995 robbery is considered a strike under the three-strikes law, he would have to serve 80% of the time.

But prosecutors and Judge David M. Horwitz agreed on a three-year prison sentence in return for a guilty plea. As part of the deal, the judge did not consider Salcido's robbery conviction. With credit for good behavior, he is likely to serve only half his sentence.

It did not take long to resolve the drug arrests of the three men in Orlando Gallegos' Highland Park hotel room.

Torres sat in jail for five days until he appeared in court and promised to pay the fine he owed on his previous drug case. When he did so three weeks later, the case was dismissed.

Less than three weeks after their arrests, Gallegos and Morales each pleaded guilty to drug possession. Probation officers recommended prison for Morales, noting that he had already been sentenced under Proposition 36 and "has either been unable or unwilling to rehabilitate."

But Proposition 36 required that both men be sentenced to treatment. In drug court, Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Maria E. Stratton read aloud a long list of probation conditions.

"If you mess up — and you might mess up — come to court," she told them. "Don't just blow it off. I'd hate to have the police sent out to find you."

That afternoon, the friends left the criminal courthouse together as free men. It had been 19 days since their arrests.

On Dec. 1, Gallegos rode a bus to the downtown criminal courthouse to check in with Stratton. He had yet to enroll in treatment or attend 12-step meetings. She told him to come back in January with more to show for himself.

His friend Morales was due in court the same day. But there was no answer when Stratton called his name. The judge issued a warrant for his arrest.

A vicious cycle

DOJ_NMG_0108759

The county's top law enforcement officials concede that local justice often appears at odds with itself. The number of arrests by county police agencies has risen sharply since 2000. Yet budget cuts have reduced the number of prosecutors available to handle their cases.

The county's courts have not added a single judge to hear criminal cases in more than a decade. Overwhelmed, judges are increasingly relying on special courts where defendants are offered more generous deals in return for quick guilty pleas.

The available room for offenders in jail has also shrunk, due to financial woes and federal court limits on overcrowding. Most offenders sentenced to jail are released well before they complete their sentences. Since 2002, more than 16,000 inmates have been rearrested during time they would still have been in jail if not for early release.

Low-level offenders with enough felony convictions eventually get sent to state prison. But they too cycle in and out. More than half are back in prison within two years of their release.

Beyond jail and prison walls, the state has committed $120 million each year to Proposition 36 — an expense that researchers note has saved millions more on incarceration costs. But a shortage of funds for treatment programs has created waiting lists for residential rehab beds, increasing the chance participants in the program will relapse while awaiting treatment.

Baca blames state lawmakers for concentrating their efforts on enacting laws that increase prison terms for the worst offenders, such as murderers, rapists and other violent criminals. Those laws, he said, fail to deal with drug abuse that plagues lower-level offenders, who commit the bulk of crimes.

"All of these extraordinary laws only work for the worst of the worst," Baca said. For the common offender, he said, they are "not a deterrent."

'We need help'

Even criminals say the system is failing.

On a recent Saturday, Salcido walked into the visiting area of the county's Pitchess Detention Center in Castaic. He was still awaiting transport to prison on his car-theft conviction. Salcido worried his children would read about him. But he began speaking about his drug problems. When he was caught, he said, he'd been on a three-week methamphetamine bender.

"Why do you think these crimes are committed — because I like committing crimes?" he asked. "I've done [prison]. What's the point? Obviously, it's not helping me. Can't they put two and two together? Why not say, 'Here's 18 months in a live-in program?' "

Salcido said he'd attended AA meetings in prison but needed more help. After leaving prison in January, he said, he stayed off drugs for months. Then he was ordered to make child-support payments that took nearly half his $400-a-week construction job wages.

"Instead of drinking a couple of beers, you start doing a couple of lines. Stop coming home. Stop going to work. You're going to lose your job," he said.

"It's always prison, prison, prison. It just corrupts you more," he said, his voice angry and frustrated. "We need help. We're sick. It shouldn't just be back to prison."

Out of jail after his latest arrest, Orlando Gallegos was struggling to rebuild his life.

During the three weeks he was incarcerated, he lost his job servicing old refrigerators. The manager of the hotel where he'd been living threatened to evict him. He had no rent money.

Three weeks after his release, Gallegos said he needed a steady job to stay out of trouble. But his criminal history along with the seizures he suffers make it difficult for him to find work.

"I can't get a job so I find different ways of trying to make my money. When I don't have no work, sometimes I have to steal for it," said Gallegos, who spoke slowly and sometimes struggled to articulate his thoughts. "A car — if I see a window open, I might see what's in it or I might go into a store and steal whatever I can steal. Like, if there's a bike laying out in front of the yard, I might take it…. I do these little [crimes] that I know I'm not going to go to prison for the rest of my life."

For now, he said, he was managing to stay clear of heroin and wanted to find work again.

"I like being — how do you say? — stable … taking care of myself, you know. Paying my bills, you know. That felt good, you know, paying my rent every month. And to buy something. I don't have to go steal for it," he said.

Marinelli and Duarte, who have been partners for 18 years, said they've seen too few people turn their lives around.

"A lot of these guys could change if they really wanted to, but the problem is that it's too hard," Duarte said. "Too hard once you've got a felony record — to get a decent job or to make ends meet. And especially if you've got a drug problem, then forget it. All bets are off."

But both officers said their sympathies lie with victims.

"They get outraged," Marinelli said. "'What? He's already out?' Or they'll call us and say, 'Hey! The guy you arrested yesterday for vandalizing my wall is standing right in front of my house right now!' They don't understand the system."

Postscript:

DOJ_NMG_0108760

On Dec. 18, Gilbert Morales was arrested again by LAPD officers and is facing new drug possession charges. Bertha Cuestas was arrested Dec. 20 for failing to appear in court. Rodolfo Salcido is awaiting transportation to state prison. Orlando Gallegos said he planned to enter treatment next month. Evaristo Torres lost his job while in jail. He said he is struggling financially and emotionally but has not had new trouble with the law.

megan.garvey@latimes.com

jack.leonard@latimes.com

Times researcher Maloy Moore and staff writer Hector Becerra contributed to this report. Data analysis by Doug Smith and Sandra Poindexter.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Rise in caseload

In recent years, Los Angeles County's courts and jails have struggled to keep pace with demand.

2000

Total number of bookings: 321,032

Bookings involving repeat offenders: 82,400

Felony filings: 56,404

Number of county prosecutors: 989

2005

Total number of bookings: 375,655

Bookings involving repeat offenders: 159,389

Felony filings: 68,277

Number of county prosecutors: 903

Note: Bookings based on calendar year data. Filings, number of prosecutors are for fiscal years.

Case study: Northeast Division

During the week of Oct. 2 to Oct. 8, police made 28 adult felony arrests in the LAPD's Northeast Division on suspicion of crimes that included drug possession, theft, assault and a variety of other offenses.

Of the 28 arrested:

12 were found guilty, sentenced and let out of but two were rearrested and are back in jail

5 have court cases pending

3 were sentenced to prison

3 were released by the courts, but one was rearrested and is back in jail

2 were released early but placed in federal custody on unrelated charges

2 were not charged with a crime

1 was sentenced to drug treatment in jail

Sources: L.A. County Superior Court, L.A. County district attorney's office, L.A. County Sheriff's Department.

Duke Rape Case Unravels (CSM)

By Patrik Jonsson

The Christian Science Monitor, December 26, 2006

ATLANTA – Fueled by stereotypes of race and class, as well as a zealous prosecutor, the criminal case against three Duke lacrosse players emerged as a test of the ability of the justice system to sift evidence through a prism of prejudices. Now, after the key charges of rape were dropped Friday, the case is also being seen as a cautionary tale for prosecutors and pundits alike, emblematic of how cultural stereotypes and perceptions don't always add up to hard facts on the ground.

The fuse was lit last March in Durham, N.C., at an off-campus party for lacrosse players - many of whom were Northerners enjoying an exclusive Southern university. Add to the scene two black exotic dancers, who grew up in the predominantly black city walled off from the school. Soon after, three of the white players were charged with kidnapping, assaulting, and raping one of the exotic dancers, allegedly amid a litany of racial slurs.

Yet since then, it's hardly been an open-and-shut case.

DOJ_NMG_0108761

"As you look at the facts in the case and look at the testimony, everybody agrees that the case has many significant weaknesses, any one of which may be sufficient basis for either a judge to dismiss or a jury to find the defendants not guilty," says Bennett Gershman, a civil rights law professor at Pace University in White Plains, N.Y.

Charges of kidnapping and first-degree sexual offense (which includes acts similar to rape) are still lodged against Collin Finnerty of Garden City, N.Y.; David Evans of Bethesda, Md.; and Reade Seligmann of Essex Fells, N.J. But the rape charges were dropped because the alleged victim "could no longer testify with certainty that it occurred," according to court documents.

The move came a week after a Dec. 15 court hearing in which a judge ordered a paternity test for the now-pregnant accuser. In addition, facts showed that District Attorney Mike Nifong asked a DNA lab director to withhold potentially exculpatory information from defense attorneys for "the Duke Three," as supporters call them.

Problems for the prosecution

Mr. Nifong still believes "hooligans" committed criminal acts that night, people close to the case say. And the two remaining charges, under North Carolina law, are just as serious as rape and carry equal jail time. But the accuser's changing story, lack of hard evidence of rape, mismatched witness testimony, and possibly exculpatory evidence presented by the defense remain problems for the prosecution. Dropping the rape charge makes the case more manageable, though still difficult to prove in front of a jury, lawyers say.

Nifong has "eliminated the most difficult charge he had to prove," says Woody Vann, a Durham defense attorney who's familiar with the case. "Does this make his case better? No, it just makes it easier."

Either way, the case had already divided a city, a university, and beyond. The perception of rich white college athletes violating a young black mother trying to make a living in an unsavory profession touched sensitivities about race, class, and status in America.

Early on, the "group of 88," a consortium of Duke faculty, condemned the culture of hilarity and immunity allegedly enjoyed by athletes at Duke. As time has worn on, though, supporters of the lacrosse players have pointed to emerging weaknesses in the case as reasons for Nifong to dismiss all the charges.

"Black people used this case as an opportunity to lash out at the privileged people at the university and to air some of their racial grievances," says La Shawn Barber, a conservative black blogger who has focused on the case for the past eight months. "But in the end, those issues have nothing to do with whether this woman was raped or not."

At the very least, experts say Nifong made several moves that may have hurt his case. He apparently changed police policy on lineups, which are used to identify alleged perpetrators, when he included only lacrosse players. Last week it was revealed he did not release information that showed the lab found DNA from five men, none of them lacrosse players, on the woman or her clothing. Moreover, Nifong's early fiery rhetoric and attendance at community events at North Carolina Central University, the historically black school, raised questions about his political motives, which he repeatedly denied as he ran for and won the DA's seat in November as a Democrat.

"Yes, local prosecutors are elected, but you can't play party, you can't play politics, you can't play race, you can't play anything," says Professor Gershman.

Indeed, criticism of the case has led to some calls for Nifong's disbarment. A North Carolina legislator has asked the US Department of Justice to investigate the case. And legal experts say that while prosecutors enjoy absolute immunity inside the courtroom, Nifong's actions as a lead investigator outside the courtroom for this case may have left him exposed to a potential civil lawsuit from the Duke Three.

"The irony is that although this involved a bunch of white, privileged young defendants, [a potential civil lawsuit against Nifong] might wind up setting a precedent which will help hundreds of other defendants who are black and lack their financial and other resources, because prosecutors around the country will be a little bit more worried about violating civil rights," says John Banzhaf III, a law professor at George Washington University.

Next hearing

The next hearing in the case is scheduled for Feb. 5, when the court is to hear motions to suppress evidence. Some say Nifong may be looking for a face-saving way to back out of the case. Others say the prosecution is as hardened as ever, determined to bring the Duke Three to trial.

"If this case goes to trial, this is going to get much worse, because what you would have is a case with no evidence, where its only chance in trial would be [for Nifong] to stoke these tensions as much as he can," says KC Johnson, a constitutional history professor at Brooklyn College in New York, who runs a blog on the Duke case.

After Years Of Agony, Death Turns Assaults Into Homicides (NYT)

By Cara Buckley

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108762

Sirkime Stevenson died this year, but he was killed in 1991.

Mr. Stevenson was tall, strapping and 18 that year, when bullets fired from a stranger's gun struck his lower back, shattered parts of his spine and froze him from the waist down.

Even as his body withered around the wounds, he dreamed of walking again — until 1997, when bedsores ate his left leg to the bone and doctors amputated it at the hip. More infections brewed, eroding Mr. Stevenson's insides before finally stopping his heart in January.

Armani Eaddy also died this year, but she was killed in 1997.

Armani was 4 months old that year when she was shaken so violently that delicate parts of her brain were destroyed. She went blind, was never able to walk and had to be fed through a tube tunneled into her stomach. To the amazement of her doctors, Armani survived past the age of 5.

But violent seizures plagued her throughout her life, one so ferocious that it put her in a coma last spring, when she was 8. Two days later, she died.

Two fatal wounds, two deaths years later.

The New York City medical examiner has ruled that both Mr. Stevenson and Armani were the victims of homicides, a medical finding that is not surprising, considering the nature of their wounds. But what is unusual is the amount of time that passed between the fatal wounds and the fatalities themselves.

Both Mr. Stevenson and Armani fell into a subset of crime called "reclassified" homicides, deaths linked to injuries incurred in months or years past. For reasons that no one can quite explain, a record number of reclassified homicides were recorded in New York City this year. In all, 35 deaths in the city in 2006 have been linked to wounds incurred as long as 30 years ago. That is roughly three times the historical average, and 14 more than the year before.

The Police Department has cited those figures as accounting for some of the rise in New York's homicide rate, which has outpaced the rate in 2005: by mid-December, 566 homicides had been reported this year, compared with 517 for the same time in 2005.

For those 35, death came in myriad forms, connected only by the excruciatingly glacial tempo of its arrival. From blood poisoning leached from old shot wounds. From infected intestines, slit open in the 1970's by knives. From pneumonia linked to paralysis, which in turn was traced to a bullet lodged long ago in a spine.

For Mr. Stevenson, those who knew him said, death also came from a broken heart. Up until the day that doctors amputated his left leg, he believed he would walk again.

He had been an accomplished basketball and football player, collecting trophies playing for Eastern District High School in Brooklyn. But one chilly autumn night in 1991, after seeing a horror movie called "The People Under the Stairs" with friends, Mr. Stevenson was caught in the middle of a fight. Bullets tore through his intestines, shattering his lower spine. The gunman was never caught.

Mr. Stevenson's voice broke when saw his grandmother, Josephine Anderson, in the hospital. "Grandma," he whispered hoarsely, "I can't move my legs," Ms. Anderson recalled.

Ms. Anderson and her husband, Joseph, had raised Mr. Stevenson in a series of public housing apartments. He had been their light. After the shooting, they tried to buoy his spirits, but after his friends dropped away, his loneliness hardened into despair.

The Andersons urged Mr. Stevenson to finish high school, but he felt alienated surrounded by people who could walk. He also dropped out of physical therapy because he hated being around people in wheelchairs. "I'm not like them," he would say.

Yet even as his once-muscular legs wasted away, Mr. Stevenson clung to the hope of walking again.

After the amputation, Ms. Anderson saw something in her grandson flicker out. Then her own health and her husband's declined. Mr. Anderson lost both legs to diabetes. Arthritis invaded Ms. Anderson's joints.

Exhausted by caring for the family, Ms. Anderson had a nervous breakdown midway through 2005 and went to a nursing home. Early this year, Mr. Stevenson called her, sounding hopeless.

"Grandma, I'm going to die," he said. Ms. Anderson's response was quick and sharp. "The Lord did not bring you this far to drop you now," she said.

But one icy morning a week later, the family's home attendant heard a dull thump from Mr. Stevenson's room. She raced to him, finding him unconscious, wedged between his bed and the wall.

He died at the hospital. The official cause of death was sepsis, a bacterial infection in the blood, linked to his paraplegia and the 1991 wounds, the medical examiner's office said.

But Ms. Anderson said her grandson had simply lost the will to live. "His main friends did not stay with him," she said. "I think he died of heartbreak."

Beating the Odds, for a Time

DOJ_NMG_0108763

For nearly four years, Armani Eaddy cheated death.

The brain damage she suffered after being shaken as an infant was so severe that doctors warned that she was unlikely to live more than a handful of years. Five years, tops, they said.

"After six came, then seven, I thought, 'We made it,' said Armani's mother, Teresa Almonte, 33. "I would throw a big party for her, and buy the most expensive cake I could afford."

Ms. Almonte said she had never felt vengeful toward Armani's father, who was charged with attempted murder after Armani was hurt. Ms. Almonte said the man, Derek Eaddy, told her he had done nothing wrong, only found the infant in her crib, unwell. In 1999, he was convicted of assault and was sentenced to one year in prison.

Ms. Almonte did not know what to believe. All she knew was that her once-perfect daughter was now the victim of shaken baby syndrome, and that the brain damage could never be reversed.

At first, Ms. Almonte raged inward, slipping into an immobilizing depression. She went into therapy and was told she had bipolar disorder. She took mood stabilizers and antipsychotic medications, all the while raising her sons, now aged 11, 8 and 3. But she also devoted herself to Armani, who somehow helped Ms. Almonte forget herself.

Blind, incapacitated and able to make only gurgling sounds, Armani experienced the world through her ears. She adored being outside, listening to bird song and street noises, and feeling the sun's kiss on her skin. Indoors, cloaked in the silence of the family's basement apartment in the Bronx, Armani squealed in protest until someone flipped on the radio or television.

Caring for Armani, Ms. Almonte found, gave her a sense of resolve and purpose. "She taught me patience, how to be responsive," she said. "She taught me how to be a parent."

As Armani's fifth birthday neared, paranoia consumed Ms. Almonte. Then, miraculously, the dreaded birthday passed. Armani seemed to be doing better than ever. At the urging of a neurologist, Ms. Almonte took her off her anti-seizure medications. She allowed herself a glimmer of hope.

The urgent call from Armani's home attendant came on March 4. A violent seizure — "like a volt to the brain," Ms. Almonte said — had put her in a coma. She was being kept alive by a breathing machine, her chest rising and falling amid a tangled octopus of tubes.

For two days, Ms. Almonte agonized. Then acceptance came. "I'm not getting her back," Ms. Almonte realized. She told the doctor to take Armani off the machine, and watched her little girl slip away.

This year, Ms. Almonte and her sons celebrated Armani's ninth birthday anyway. They brought balloons and cake to their favorite treed nook in Mullaly Park in the Bronx. Then they mourned. "The party this year was a memorial," Ms. Almonte said. "And it was the worst."

'I Loved This Girl'

LaPriest Ward believed Shareema Williams was trying to kill herself before her injuries did.

He had loved her from the moment he set eyes on her, outside a friend's building in Brownsville, Brooklyn, in 1993. She managed a smile, her brown eyes twinkling, even though tears of exhaustion were spilling down her cheeks. She was already in a wheelchair then. Mr. Ward was bewitched.

Ms. Williams was 18 and dancing in a Brooklyn nightclub in 1988 when an unwanted suitor refused to leave her alone. He groped her, and she swung at him. Moments later, he returned with a gun, and shot her in the back. Ms. Williams was paralyzed, and later doctors removed her hip joints, which had been shattered by the blasts. Bullet scars pocked her back and buttocks, which bore a patchwork quilt of skin grafts.

Mr. Ward was disabled too. A car accident in 1986 crushed his larynx, and afterward he could speak only in gasps. Yet he and Ms. Williams found solace in each other. He was her legs. She was his voice.

Mr. Ward said Ms. Williams refused to talk about her attacker, although the police said the man was charged with assault and is serving his sentence in Attica state prison.

"She'd say, 'Don't worry about it; what's done is done,' " Mr. Ward said. But demons still stalked Ms. Williams. Before the attack, Mr. Ward said, she barely touched drugs, only occasionally using marijuana. She had left her family because of their drug abuse, Mr. Ward said. But after the shooting, she began to smoke crack.

"She felt insecure," Mr. Ward said in gasps. "She was just trying to blend into her environment. It was a way to take her mind off of herself."

Still, they moved in together and later had five children, including triplets. Mr. Ward, a man of sparkling intelligence, had to settle for jobs as a cook or a stock boy because of his disability.

He would return from work and hunt for Ms. Williams in the forbidding streets near their Bronx apartment. The triplets were taken from them because of her drug abuse, and their two other daughters were, too. Eventually Mr. Ward's mother adopted all five of their children, and they live in Queens.

Mr. Ward, who insists he has never used drugs, still stuck with Ms. Williams, determined to save her from herself.

DOJ_NMG_0108764

"I loved this girl, but I don't know how I loved this girl,' " he said.

Repeated complications kept her returning to the hospital. Spasms. Urinary tract infections. Late in August, a kidney infection put her back in the hospital. Her body swelled up. Mr. Ward was convinced she would get better. She always had before. But she was so swollen, he barely recognized her.

On the morning of Sept. 12, Mr. Ward took a break from Ms. Williams's bedside, overwhelmed. He walked to a welfare office in the Bronx, and sat down. Hours passed. Suddenly, in the late afternoon, a terrible feeling set in. He raced to the hospital, arriving at 5 p.m. A plastic sheet had been drawn over Ms. Williams. A nurse told him she had died at 4:45 p.m.

Two weeks later, the medical examiner determined that Ms. Williams had died from multiple complications caused by the old bullet wounds. Her death became the 28th reclassified homicide of the year.

A Delusional System Of Justice (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Since this is my last column of 2006, tradition and custom obligate me to choose a person of the year. This practice was started by the late Henry Luce, who realized that choosing a man of the year would call as much attention to his Time magazine as it would to the person himself. I have somewhat the same object in mind. My person of the year is Gregory Thompson. I choose him to call attention to the madness of the death penalty.

I apologize for the un-Christmasy nature of my topic, and I will understand if you choose to skip to another subject. But if you can spare me a moment, I'd like to tell you about Thompson. He is a cold-blooded killer, plain and simple. He is also out of his mind.

Thompson, 45, is delusional. He is also paranoid, schizophrenic and depressed. For these ailments, he receives daily doses of drugs and, twice a month, anti-psychotic injections. The state of Tennessee wants very much to put him to death for the horrendous 1985 murder of Brenda Blanton Lane, of which there is no doubt about his guilt. There is grave doubt, though, about the constitutionality, not to mention the decency, of executing an insane man. Thus the 12 pills Thompson takes every day. The idea, according to a recent account of his case in the Wall Street Journal, is to make him sane enough to be put to death.

Shortly before Justice Harry Blackmun retired from the Supreme Court in 1994, he reversed himself on the death penalty. Blackmun had been a lifelong supporter, but finally had had enough. In words that were to become famous, he wrote, "From this day forward, I no longer shall tinker with the machinery of death." It's as if Blackmun had Thompson in mind, for in his case the tinkering occurs on a daily basis.

Blackmun was not the only Supreme Court justice to change his mind about capital punishment. Lewis Powell did something similar. He never got to the point where he considered it unconstitutional or immoral -- he just concluded there was no way to get it right.

Now, from Powell's point of view, matters have even worsened. The death penalty has become so necessarily cumbersome to implement, so full of essential safeguards, that it not only sometimes cannot be done -- note the recent suspensions of executions by lethal injection -- but it takes forever to do it. Thompson, you might have noticed, has been awaiting execution for nearly 22 years -- arguably cruel and unusual punishment in itself.

If I were not forced to choose a person as my person of the year, I might choose a concept: certainty. It is the one concept we cannot afford. Certainty is where we all get into trouble. We were so certain that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction that it was reason enough to go to war. And once we went to war, we were certain that we would be welcomed in Baghdad by adoring throngs of Iraqis. And all that certainty was itself preceded by the fervid certainty of a president that he had been chosen for this war, this moment, this task. This was the worst certainty of them all.

As we keep learning, the devil is not in the details, it's in our certainty. This almost always is true of death-penalty cases. They are built on certainty -- witnesses who were certain, technicians who were certain, cops who were certain, prosecutors who were certain and jurors who were certain beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet routinely we read about convictions being overturned by DNA evidence. All those witnesses, technicians, cops, prosecutors and jurors were wrong -- certain, but wrong. That, in effect, is the only certainty. Occasionally, we will be wrong.

This year saw the fewest executions in a decade and growing public support for the alternative sentence of life without the possibility of parole. The cynic in me suspects that this is a result of historically low crime rates, not a sudden appreciation of how difficult it is to kill people properly, legally and, of course, justly.

Maybe, though, Americans are beginning to understand that we just don't need the death penalty, that it makes us no safer and demeans us as a people. The case of Gregory Thompson is a case in point. He was probably insane when he murdered Brenda Blanton Lane but will be deemed sane if and when he's executed. He's my person of the year -- a fleetingly sane man in the maw of a thoroughly insane system.

DOJ_NMG_0108765

cohenr@washpost.com

Federal RICO Statute Has A Tough Year (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) -- For more than two decades, the federal RICO law was a pitiless tool in the fight against organized crime -- corralling, convicting and incarcerating a long string of mob bosses once considered untouchable.

But in 2006, federal prosecutors lost a pair of major RICO cases: Second-generation mob boss John A. "Junior" Gotti walked after three mistrials, and the most corrupt officers in NYPD history -- "Mafia Cops" Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa -- had their convictions overturned.

Are these nothing more than legal oddities? Or, mother of mercy, is this the end of RICO -- the statute that allows prosecutors to jail mobsters for decades by tying them to as few as two crimes linked to a criminal enterprise?

"It's not the end," insists Notre Dame law professor G. Robert Blakey, the creator of the law. "A good RICO is virtually impossible to defend."

In both cases, defense attorneys used the statute of limitations to fend off the feds. Gotti's lawyer employed a withdrawal defense, claiming his client had quit the mob more than five years before his indictment, putting him beyond the reach of RICO.

Attorneys for Eppolito and Caracappa argued the defendants' crimes while on the payrolls of both the NYPD and a murderous Luchese family boss had occurred long before the five-year statute of limitations expired. Those crimes, committed between 1986-90, included participation in eight murders; a federal jury found both men guilty.

A federal judge -- who had just three weeks earlier said the two detectives had committed "the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse" -- agreed with the defense lawyers, and reversed the cops' convictions last June.

Defense attorney Edward Hayes was part of the legal team that convinced U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein to overturn the convictions of the "Mafia Cops." And Hayes believes their triumph could provide a blueprint for other defense lawyers: "Bruce (Cutler) and I made a very good team ... It's likely other lawyers (would) use us as a model."

Other attorneys, from both sides of the aisle, disagree.

"I don't think the statute of limitations defense is terribly appealing to juries, because there's almost an implicit statement -- even if the defense attorney is careful -- that `I did it, but ...'," said Jim Walden, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice.

"I think what you had were some talented lawyers, and cases with problematic cooperators," continued Walden, who spent nine years as an assistant U.S. attorney. "The arguments were successful, but I don't think it's a trend."

Veteran defense lawyer Ron Kuby agreed that there's no "huge lesson here for the defense."

Blakey has never explained the origin of his acronym for the law known officially as the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations act. But it's often theorized the name was chosen in homage to the 1931 mob flick "Little Caesar," where Edward G. Robinson played a crook named Rico Bandello whose dying plea to "mother of mercy" is cinematic legend.

The law was initially designed not only to take down the mob, but also to target white-collar criminals. RICO was passed in 1970 -- and then largely ignored for years by shortsighted prosecutors.

Blakey recalled a 1972 visit to Whitney North Seymour Jr., the Manhattan U.S. attorney, where he eagerly explained the new statute's potential. Blakey remembered Seymour cutting him off with a curt remark: "You don't know what you're talking about."

It wasn't until 1985 that federal prosecutor Rudolph Giuliani seized on the RICO act as a way to indict the Mafia's ruling Commission, the heads of New York's five families.

Convictions came back against Genovese crime family boss Anthony "Fat Tony" Salerno, Colombo boss Carmine "Junior" Persico, and Luchese boss Anthony "Tony Ducks" Corallo, along with five other top level mobsters.

Federal prosecutors were now convinced that they had a friend in RICO. The mob cases were almost foolproof, and the list of convicted mobsters expanded. Genovese head Vincent "The Chin" Gigante, who had avoided conviction since 1970 by feigning mental illness, was finally brought down by a 1997 racketeering conviction.

The highest profile racketeering defeat, John Gotti Sr.'s acquittal at a 1987 trial, came only after the "Teflon Don" greased one juror with $60,000. And when the government brought a second racketeering case in 1992, Gotti was convicted, jailed and died behind bars.

More devastating for the mob were the stiff penalties with RICO: 20 years, minimum. A parade of mobsters became government witnesses, trading information for reduced sentences or a walk.

The racketeering cases also allowed authorities to use new informants to win convictions for ancient crimes, as long as prosecutors could demonstrate an ongoing enterprise. In the case of La Cosa Nostra families, that was rarely a problem.

DOJ_NMG_0108766

Walden successfully prosecuted Bonanno family consigliere Anthony Spero for racketeering in 2001 -- a charge that included three murders dating back as far as a decade.

A RICO indictment "was an enormous advantage," he said. "A couple of cooperators and surveillance got you pretty far down the road. It produced spectacular successes, but the failures this year were spectacular, too."

The racketeering defeats came despite several cooperating witnesses in the Gotti and the "Mafia Cops" cases -- both of which involved crimes going back more than a dozen years. The main charge against the younger Gotti, that he ordered the kidnapping and beating of talk radio host Curtis Sliwa, occurred in 1992.

Three trials against Gotti produced three hung juries, with his lawyer able to convince members of each panel that Junior had walked away from the mob before 1999 -- five years before his latest indictment.

The "Mafia Cops" trial was less protracted, but more painful. The duo was tried once, after years of pursuit by law enforcement for crimes dating back to 1986. And the government convicted the pair on every count in their indictment.

But Hayes and Cutler argued there was no evidence that the conspiracy between the two detectives and the Luchese crime family had continued once the pair left the NYPD in the early 1990s. Weinstein agreed, and threw out the convictions.

"The Justice Department just way overstretched RICO," said Hayes.

Kuby believes the lesson in the Gotti and "Mafia Cops" cases is more for the prosecution than the defense.

"You can't take people decades later and try to make them answerable," Kuby said. "You have to do your best law enforcement work earlier, rather than later."

Sentencing Guidelines Face New Scrutiny (WSJ)

By Gary Fields

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With Democrats poised to take control of Congress, law-enforcement officials are preparing to defend two decades of federal sentencing policies that mandated harsh prison terms on a variety of crimes and led to a boom in the prison population.

Michigan Rep. John Conyers, the incoming chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and Rep. Robert Scott (D., Va.) have already said they plan hearings early in the term to look at how nonviolent drug offenders are punished under mandatory minimum laws.

An early target will be the prison terms mandated by Congress for crack-cocaine convictions. Under current law, someone caught with five grams of crack gets a five-year sentence, while it takes 500 grams of powder cocaine to trigger the same sentence, even though there is no physiological difference. Critics have long maintained that the law unfairly targets African-American communities, where crack is more prevalent. In contrast, suburban white users tend to prefer cocaine in its powder form.

Mr. Conyers has called the crack-cocaine sentences the "most outrageous example of the unfairness of mandatory minimums."

Democrats are buoyed by recent signals from the U.S. Sentencing Commission, which sets guidelines for judges to use in an advisory capacity when they hand down sentences. Members of the commission are likely to recommend a change in the crack-cocaine penalties next year, according to commission members. The commission has tried since 1995 to bring the penalties for crack crimes more in line with powder cocaine but the Republican-controlled Congress has ignored past attempts.

Soft on Crime

Reversing drug laws, though, is politically dangerous, for it risks angering law-enforcement officials and police unions. In addition, it could resurrect the soft-on-crime mantra that Republicans have long used to bludgeon Democrats. As a result, some Democrats might be reluctant to be viewed as rolling back harsh sentences just when the nation's violent crime is starting to rise.

"Whenever you suggest somebody's sentence is too long or a policy is too draconian, the immediate reaction in the political arena is you're soft on crime and you're not taking public safety seriously," says Alexander Busansky, director of the Washington office of the Vera Institute of Justice, a criminal-justice reform organization based in New York.

That claim, though, may no longer be as effective, he adds. Some Republicans have spearheaded efforts to reduce recidivism, and the effort to address the crack-cocaine disparity has attracted some bipartisan backing.

Nevertheless, law-enforcement officials -- from the Justice Department to police groups -- are joining forces to oppose any changes that decrease the severity of the crack penalty, warning that it's a slippery slope that could weaken other mandatory sentences.

"Our position on crack versus powder has been to increase the penalty for powder cocaine, not decrease the punishment for crack," says Gene Voegtlin, of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, which represents 18,000 chiefs, department heads and other law-enforcement officials.

DOJ_NMG_0108767

Prisoners in Their Own Homes

Street cops agree with this view as well, says James Pasco, of the Fraternal Order of Police, which represents about 324,000 street-level police officers, deputies and agents. Mr. Pasco says there is more violence attached to crack-related crimes, making residents in the communities where these crimes occur -- often poor, urban areas -- prisoners in their own homes. "We're not opposing this because of its impact on law enforcement. We're opposing this because of its impact on the communities we protect," says Mr. Pasco.

Law-enforcement groups, however, need to push back not too hard, lest they anger Democrats who control funding over various programs that benefit local police. For example, Rep. Bennie Thompson (D., Miss.), who co-sponsored a crack-powder penalty-equalization bill in the last Congress, is the incoming chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. He plans to push an agenda to improve intelligence sharing and communications ability between federal and local law-enforcement officials, a key goal for police groups.

The police groups' biggest ally in preventing a reversal of mandatory minimums will be Republican lawmakers, such as Rep. Lamar Smith of Texas, who will be the ranking minority member on the House Judiciary Committee.

"The sentencing disparity between possession of crack cocaine and powder cocaine is a valid issue, and I look forward to a discussion next year," says Mr. Smith. "But we need to remember that the drug trade is directly linked to the level of violent crime in America. This week, the [Federal Bureau of Investigation] reported the number of violent crimes committed in 2005 rose more than it has in any of the last 15 years....We need tough drug laws that deter drug abuse -- not increase it."

At least one advocacy group that opposes the mandatory minimums believes the debate is being couched incorrectly. Julie Stewart, founder and president of Families Against Mandatory Minimums, says lawmakers should look at the crack-cocaine sentencing and decide whether it is fair on its own merit, not in comparison with powder cocaine.

"The problem is not powder cocaine. The problem is crack," she said. If five grams is not an amount handled by a major trafficker, "then let's figure out what quantity is more reflective of someone who is dealing at a higher level," she said. "We shouldn't be focused on ratio between the two."

Write to Gary Fields at gary.fields@wsj.com1

The Tell-Tell Rap? (WP)

By Jabari Asim

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Rap lyrics stole much of the spotlight during the recent capital murder trial of Ronell Wilson, a 24-year-old Staten Island native also known as "Rated R." Wilson stood accused of killing two New York undercover detectives, James V. Nemorin and Rodney J. Andrews, in March 2003.

Prosecutors argued that the scribbled lyrics found in Wilson's pocket soon after the deaths of the officers were evidence of his guilt. But other evidence -- which didn't receive as much attention as the defendant's half-baked rhymes -- did more to persuade the jury. That evidence included eyewitness testimony, DNA findings, video and audio surveillance footage and the opinions of scientific experts. Wilson was found guilty of 10 crimes in all, several of them punishable by death. The death penalty phase of his trial begins Jan. 10.

Still, prosecutors and the media made much of Wilson's lyrics, which make the Black Eyed Peas sound like Langston Hughes. A sample for your delectation: "Leave a 45 slugs in da back of ya head. Cause I'm gettin dat bread /aint' goin stop to I'm dead."

To prosecutors, the words were a confession, a revelatory window into the fevered mind of a cold-blooded murderer. To me, they resembled a cut-rate ripoff of the Notorious B.I.G.'s 1994 hit "Ready to Die": "As I grab the glock, put it to your headpiece/One in the chamber, the safety is off release/straight at your dome homes, I wanna see cabbage."

The B.I.G. went on to rhyme "cabbage" with "brain damage" before announcing that, like Rated R, he was fully prepared to shuffle off this mortal coil.

The defense team was not allowed to place a rap expert on the stand. But such an expert might have pointed out that Rated R's lyrics were not only predictable, but derivative too.

The use of hip-hop lyrics in trials is not new, as George Washington University law professor Paul Butler and others have pointed out. Still, the courts remain somewhat baffled as to how to regard them. Are they straight-up autobiography or merely macho fantasies?

Two Live Crew's obscenity trial in Florida in October 1990 may have been the first high-profile courtroom drama involving rap lyrics. In that case, Henry Louis Gates Jr., a well-known black scholar, testified that the trio's lyrics were part of a lengthy tradition and not meant to be taken seriously. "It's a way the black people could fight against the oppression of their white masters," he said. "They would mock each other to release anger and tension."

DOJ_NMG_0108768

That explanation shed little light on how the group's persistent, gleefully vulgar mockery of women amounted to resistance to white oppression. But that was not a question the mostly white jury needed to wrestle with. For their part, jurors expressed little difficulty with the Crew's lyrics. "Those were their songs. They were doing their poetry in song," said a 65-year-old juror who voted quickly for acquittal.

Her very charitable assessment will have to go unchallenged here, because it is almost impossible to refute without quoting from the lyrics -- an equally unlikely task in a family newspaper.

The stakes were starker and higher in Wilson's trial. Ultimately, this was no showdown over naughty words or celebrations of strip-club hedonism but a murder case involving the deaths of two brave, hardworking family men. And the fascination with the killer's lyrics threatened to overshadow all that.

Nemorin was 36 and a married father of three. Andrews was 34 and a divorced father of two. Shortly after New York police killed 23-year-old Sean Bell, an unarmed black man, in a hail of bullets, at least one rapper took to the airwaves to offer musical tribute to the victim's tragically brief life. It takes nothing away from Bell to ask where all the rappers are now; and to wonder who will offer rhymes in memory of two brave police officers who also died way too young.

CIVIL LAW:

No Fed Oversight On Some Air Charters (USAT/AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

NEW HAVEN, Conn. — Travelers who pay a premium for the convenience of charter air travel could unknowingly end up on a flights operated without direct federal oversight.

That fact — along with an effort to change it — is central to a lawsuit filed by NBC Sports executive Dick Ebersol and actress Susan Saint James over the 2004 crash that killed their teenage son.

Charter flights have gained in popularity among executives and the wealthy as an alternative to the long lines for commercial flights. They have become safer in the last two decades, but the accident rate is still higher than for commercial airlines.

Not all charter operations are certified by the Federal Aviation Administration. Those outside the FAA umbrella aren't required to give flight crews the same training required of certified companies, and it isn't always obvious which aren't certified. Some non-certified operators fly under the auspices of other companies.

In Ebersol's case, the family says it wasn't told that charter operator Key Air Inc. had hired another operator, Air Castle of Millville, N.J., to make the flight.

Just before takeoff from Montrose, Colo., on Nov. 28, 2004, Ebersol saw slush sliding off the fuselage. Moments later, the plane crashed, killing his 14-year-old son, Edward "Teddy" Ebersol, the pilot and a flight attendant.

According to the Ebersol lawsuit, the Air Castle pilots were unqualified to fly in the weather when the plane crashed.

"This is an issue Dick Ebersol thinks needs to be at the forefront of commercial aviation in America," said his attorney, Robert Clifford.

Air Castle officials declined to comment.

Key Air Chief Executive Brad Kost said Air Castle had an excellent reputation and the crew possessed all the certificates required by regulators.

Doug Carr, vice president of safety for the National Business Aviation Association, which claims 7,000 members, said charter flights are not inherently more dangerous, but he said some charter operators rely on planes that are more susceptible to poor weather and higher altitudes.

The National Transportation Safety Board concluded in May that the pilot's failure to carefully examine the wings for icing probably caused the crash that killed Ebersol's son.

NTSB members agreed that the pilots should have taken several safety precautions before flying in icing conditions and that their lack of experience in such weather contributed to the crash. They are now urging the FAA to require more training for charter crews and better disclosure to customers.

"We're looking for more transparency," NTSB Chairman Mark Rosenker said.

The safety board also cited a 2005 charter jet crash in New Jersey that injured 10 people as a need for reform.

In that case, a small jet was unable to get airborne and overran a runway at Teterboro Airport because the flight crew failed to properly calculate the plane's center of gravity. At least half of the eight passengers were not wearing seat belts because they were hidden, and a cabin aide could not open the main door for evacuation, the investigators' report said.

DOJ_NMG_0108769

The NTSB ruled that the FAA's lack of close oversight of the charter industry was a contributing factor in the Teterboro crash.

FAA officials say they are addressing the concerns by meeting with charter operators to make sure they comply with regulations. The agency also will issue new operating specifications in the next few months to clearly spell out what is required of flight operators.

Ebersol's flight had been arranged by General Electric Corporate Air Transport, and charter operator Key Air brokered the flight to Air Castle because it didn't have any planes available, according to NTSB member Deborah A.P. Hersman.

"GE Corporate Air Transport undoubtedly believed it was diligent in insisting on certain standards for the air charter operator, but it did not get what it probably thought it was getting," Hersman wrote in the NTSB's report of the crash.

"If an experienced corporate travel organization like GE Corporate Air Transport can be so fooled," she said, "how easy is it for others with perhaps far less savvy and market power to hire air charter services that are less safe than they expect?"

Where Real Money Meets Virtual Reality, The Jury Is Still Out (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Veronica Brown is a hot fashion designer, making a living off the virtual lingerie and formalwear she sells inside the online fantasy world Second Life. She expects to have earned about $60,000 this year from people who buy her digital garments to outfit their animated self-images in this fast-growing virtual community.

But Brown got an unnerving reminder last month of how tenuous her livelihood is when a rogue software program that copies animated objects appeared in Second Life. Scared that their handiwork could be cloned and sold by others, Brown and her fellow shopkeepers launched a general strike and briefly closed the electronic storefronts where they peddle digital furniture, automobiles, hairdos and other virtual wares.

"It was fear, fear of your effort being stolen," said Brown, 44, whose online alter ego, Simone Stern, trades under the name Simone! Design.

Brown has reopened her boutique but remains uncomfortably aware that the issue of whether she owns what she makes -- a fundamental right underpinning nearly all businesses -- is unresolved.

As virtual worlds proliferate across the Web, software designers and lawyers are straining to define property rights in this emerging digital realm. The debate over these rights extends far beyond the early computer games that pioneered virtual reality into the new frontiers of commerce.

"Courts are trying to figure out how to apply laws from real life, which we've grown accustomed to, to the new world," said Greg Lastowka, a professor at Rutgers School of Law at Camden in New Jersey. "The law is struggling to keep up."

U.S. courts have heard several cases involving virtual-world property rights but have yet to set a clear precedent clarifying whether people own the electronic goods they make, buy or accumulate in Second Life and other online landscapes. Also unclear is whether people have any claim when their real-life property is depicted online, for instance in Microsoft's new three-dimensional renderings of actual real estate.

The debate is assuming greater urgency as commerce gains pace in virtual reality. In Second Life, where nearly 2 million people have signed up to create their own characters and socialize with other digital beings, the virtual economy is booming, with total transactions in November reaching the equivalent of $20 million. Second Life's creator, Linden Lab, allows members to exchange the electronic currency they accumulate online with real U.S. dollars. Last month, people converted about $3 million at the Lindex currency market.

Second Life's economy has been surging since Linden Lab made the unusual decision three years ago to grant users intellectual property rights for what they create with the Web site's free software tools. Thousands of people have created homes and businesses on virtual land leased from the site and are peddling virtual items as varied as yachts and ice cream.

Congress has taken note and is completing a study of whether income in the virtual economy, such as from the sale of gowns that Brown makes, should be taxed by the Internal Revenue Service. The Joint Economic Committee of Congress is expected to issue its findings early next year.

"There seems to be a lack of ground rules in an area that would have explosive growth in the next decade or two," said Christopher Frenze, the committee's executive director.

Though she grew up watching her mother at the sewing machine, learning the craft with each loving stitch of the family's clothes, Brown never considered making it a career until two years ago, when she entered Second Life. Within days, she studied up on the basic software skills and began designing virtual women's apparel from her home in Indiana. "When I design," she said, "I think about how the cloth falls and the sheen silk has compared to satin." She said she now spends 70 hours a week on her trade. Starting with four original outfits, she now offers 1,200 designs and has also moved into men's fashion.

DOJ_NMG_0108770

But the rogue program, called a copybot, that appeared last month in Second Life underscored the need to clarify her property rights. After the attack, Linden Lab announced efforts to ban the program and encouraged users to report abuses. Some users argued that even stronger property protections were needed.

"I'm feeling uncomfortable," Brown admitted. "I'm safe for now, but it's very tentative."

Linden Lab made cyber-history when it gave Second Life users the intellectual property rights to their creations -- similar to the copyright real-world authors have to their writings. By contrast, most Web sites offering virtual experiences have not accorded users any property rights, requiring them to accept a license agreement stating that all content belongs solely to the Web site owner.

Four years ago, several online gaming veterans tried to get around this agreement and make real money by selling game items from Dark Age of Camelot on eBay and at specialty online auctions. The items, which included weapons, armor and specialized characters, in some cases went for more than $300 each. The developers of the Camelot game blocked them. When the gaming veterans sued, claiming that they had rights to the items they acquired in the game, a federal court in California ruled against them on the grounds that the license agreement took precedence. Other recent U.S. court rulings in virtual disputes have come to similar conclusions.

But judges elsewhere have taken a different view. A Chinese player in the Korean-made online game Mir 3 claimed that his personal rights had been violated when the game's local Chinese operators deleted the magic sword he used to battle virtual villains. The operators claimed it had been illegally duplicated from an original. The player filed suit, contending that he had bought the magic sword in good faith and that it was worth about $120. A Chinese court in Xuhui district ruled against the game's operators, essentially finding that the player's property rights were paramount.

In Second Life, Linden Lab executives wanted to avoid this confusion, believing that users needed clear ownership for economic activity to thrive, recounted Cory Ondrejka, chief technical officer. Otherwise, users would have little incentive to invest.

But he stressed that this ownership did not extend to full property rights -- creators have intellectual property rights to the software patterns used in making virtual objects but no rights to the objects themselves. Under this formulation, Brown owns her designs but not the individual dresses and pieces of underwear. Nor do her customers "own" the apparel they purchase and hang in their virtual closets.

"Everything in the virtual world is intellectual property, as much as it looks like property or as much as property is a useful metaphor," Ondrejka said. "Copying it is not theft. It's infringement, but it's not theft."

But Joshua Fairfield, a professor at Indiana University School of Law, said there's more to online rights than just intellectual property. He said there are legal reasons to believe that property rights to objects can exist in a virtual realm, but no U.S. court has affirmed the concept.

Earlier this month, U.S. Circuit Judge Richard A. Posner visited Second Life, appearing as a balding, bespectacled cartoon rendering of himself, and addressed a crowd of other animated characters on a range of legal issues, including property rights in virtual reality. Posner stressed that it was in Linden Lab's interest to ensure due process and other rights.

"They want people to invest in Second Life, and we know people won't invest if their rights are not reasonably secure," he told the audience, which included a giant chipmunk and several supermodels. He went on to predict the eventual emergence of an "international law of virtual worlds" similar to international maritime law.

Meanwhile, as mapping technologies rapidly improve, companies are increasingly able to transfer the real world to the online world. But are property rights any clearer in such a "real" virtual world?

Microsoft, for instance, launched an online service last month called Virtual Earth that features highly detailed three-dimensional photographic maps of American cities. Microsoft plans to make money by selling advertising billboards in this virtual depiction of urban America.

But the company's lawyers and advertising executives are still grappling with the question of whether those who own the property depicted in Microsoft's 3-D images have any control over how their depicted property is used online. For instance, does Federal Express have the right to object if an ad for its competitor DHL is posted in the parking lot at virtual FedEx Field?

"We haven't fully delineated all the guidelines for do's and don'ts," said Bobby Figueroa, a director of product management at Microsoft.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Database Stirs Privacy Fears (WP)

By Dan Eggen, Washington Post Staff Writer
The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108771

Size and Scope of the Interagency Investigative Tool Worry Civil Libertarians

The Justice Department is building a massive database that allows state and local police officers around the country to search millions of case files from the FBI, Drug Enforcement Administration and other federal law enforcement agencies, according to Justice officials.

The system, known as "OneDOJ," already holds approximately 1 million case records and is projected to triple in size over the next three years, Justice officials said. The files include investigative reports, criminal-history information, details of offenses, and the names, addresses and other information of criminal suspects or targets, officials said.

The database is billed by its supporters as a much-needed step toward better information-sharing with local law enforcement agencies, which have long complained about a lack of cooperation from the federal government.

But civil-liberties and privacy advocates say the scale and contents of such a database raise immediate privacy and civil rights concerns, in part because tens of thousands of local police officers could gain access to personal details about people who have not been arrested or charged with crimes.

The little-noticed program has been coming together over the past year and a half. It already is in use in pilot projects with local police in Seattle, San Diego and a handful of other areas, officials said. About 150 separate police agencies have access, officials said.

But in a memorandum sent last week to the FBI, U.S. attorneys and other senior Justice officials, Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty announced that the program will be expanded immediately to 15 additional regions and that federal authorities will "accelerate . . . efforts to share information from both open and closed cases."

Eventually, the department hopes, the database will be a central mechanism for sharing federal law enforcement information with local and state investigators, who now run checks individually, and often manually, with Justice's five main law enforcement agencies: the FBI, the DEA, the U.S. Marshals Service, the Bureau of Prisons and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

Within three years, officials said, about 750 law enforcement agencies nationwide will have access.

In an interview last week, McNulty said the goal is to broaden the pool of data available to local and state investigators beyond systems such as the National Crime Information Center, the FBI-run repository of basic criminal records used by police and sheriff's deputies around the country.

By tapping into the details available in incident reports, interrogation summaries and other documents, investigators will dramatically improve their chances of closing cases, he said.

"The goal is that all of U.S. law enforcement will be able to look at each other's records to solve cases and protect U.S. citizens," McNulty said. "With OneDOJ, we will essentially hook them up to a pipe that will take them into its records."

McNulty and other Justice officials emphasize that the information available in the database already is held individually by the FBI and other federal agencies. Much information will be kept out of the system, including data about public corruption cases, classified or sensitive topics, confidential informants, administrative cases and civil rights probes involving allegations of wrongdoing by police, officials said.

But civil-liberties and privacy advocates -- many of whom are already alarmed by the proliferation of federal databases -- warn that granting broad access to such a system is almost certain to invite abuse and lead to police mistakes.

Barry Steinhardt, director of the Technology and Liberty Project at the American Civil Liberties Union, said the main problem is one of "garbage in, garbage out," because case files frequently include erroneous or unproved allegations.

"Raw police files or FBI reports can never be verified and can never be corrected," Steinhardt said. "That is a problem with even more formal and controlled systems. The idea that they're creating another whole system that is going to be full of inaccurate information is just chilling."

Steinhardt noted that in 2003, the FBI announced that it would no longer meet the Privacy Act's accuracy requirements for the National Crime Information Center, its main criminal-background-check database, which is used by 80,000 law enforcement agencies across the country.

"I look at this system and imagine it will raise many of the same questions that the whole information-sharing approach is raising across the government," said Marc Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center, a Washington-based group that has criticized many of the government's data-gathering policies.

"Information that's collected in the law enforcement realm can find [its way] into other arenas and be abused very easily," Rotenberg said.

McNulty and other officials said the data compiled under OneDOJ would be subject to the same civil-liberties and privacy oversight as any other Justice Department database. A coordinating committee within Justice will oversee the database and other information-sharing initiatives, according to McNulty's memo.

Gene Voegtlin, legislative counsel for the Arlington-based International Association of Chiefs of Police, said his group welcomes any initiatives to share more data with local law enforcement agencies.

"The working partnership between the states and the feds has gotten much better than the pre-9/11 era," Voegtlin said. "But we're still overcoming a lot of issues, both functional and organizational . . . so we're happy to see DOJ taking positive steps in that area."

Diabetics In The Workplace Confront A Tangle Of Laws (NYT)

By N. R. Kleinfield

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

MINNEAPOLIS — John Steigauf spent more than a decade fiddling with the innards of those huge United Parcel Service trucks until an icy day two years ago when the company put him on leave from his mechanic's job. A supervisor escorted him off the premises.

His work was good. He hadn't socked the boss or embezzled money. It had to do with what was inside him: diabetes.

U.P.S. framed it as a safety issue: Mr. Steigauf's blood sugar might suddenly plummet while he tested a truck, causing him to slam into someone.

Mr. Steigauf considered it discrimination, a taint that diabetes can carry. "I was regarded as a damaged piece of meat," he said. "It was like, 'You're one of those, and we can't have one of those.' "

With 21 million American diabetics, disputes like this have increasingly rippled through the workplace:

¶A mortgage loan officer in Oregon was denied permission to eat at her desk to stanch her sugar fluctuations, and eventually was fired.

¶A Sears lingerie saleswoman in Illinois with nerve damage in her leg quit after being told she could not cut through a stockroom to reach her department.

¶A worker at a candy company in Wisconsin was fired after asking where he could dispose of his insulin needles.

In each instance, diabetics contend that they are being blocked by their employers from the near-normal lives their doctors say are possible. But the companies say they are struggling, too, with confusion about whether diabetes is a legitimate disability and with concern about whether it is overly expensive, hazardous and disruptive to accommodate the illness.

The debate will probably intensify. The number of diabetics in America swelled by 80 percent in the past decade. Experts say the disease is on its way to becoming a conspicuous fact of life in the nation's labor force, raising all sorts of issues for workers and managers.

Even an outspoken advocate for diabetics like Fran Carpentier, a Type 1 diabetic and a senior editor at Parade magazine, understands the implications for business. "Knowing what it's like to live with the disease hour by hour, day by day, I wonder if I owned my own company if I would hire someone with diabetes," she said. "I'm being bluntly honest. And it kills me to say this."

Doctors, though, say that with improved medications and methods of self-testing blood sugar, most diabetics can do almost any job if they properly manage their illness. Yet myths about the disease persist, advocates say, leading many companies to shun diabetic employees.

"It's not all about ignorance, but if I can get rid of ignorance, I can get rid of a lot of discrimination," said Shereen Arent, the director of legal advocacy for the American Diabetes Association.

Part of the confusion is a byproduct of the disease itself, a capricious illness of elevated, damaging levels of sugar in the blood. Type 1 is a malfunction of the immune system that usually appears in childhood, while the far more prevalent Type 2 is closely associated with obesity and inactivity. Many people with diabetes will face withering complications like blindness, amputations and heart disease. Others will not.

For some, particularly insulin users prone to the abnormal drops in blood sugar known as hypoglycemia, the illness can cause dizziness, fainting or muddled judgment. Doctors, however, say those constitute a tiny number of readily identifiable cases.

Nonetheless, the risk of plunging blood sugars has fueled a longstanding reluctance to employ diabetics in jobs like those of truck driver or police officer, if they are on insulin. Until this summer, the National Fire Protection Association cautioned against making it too easy for even non-insulin-dependent diabetics to become firefighters. Now the association recommends an individual assessment.

Federal law bars diabetics from joining the armed services and prevents diabetics on insulin from becoming commercial pilots.

Innumerable diabetics, though, are engaged in more mundane jobs uninvolved in matters of life and death. For these people, secretaries and factory workers and programmers, a "reasonable accommodation," like permission to eat at one's desk or to be excused from fluctuating shifts, can make the difference in whether they can function.

DOJ_NMG_0108773

When disputes can't be resolved, the cases often land in court or before the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The commission, which enforces the Americans With Disabilities Act of 1990, says diabetes-related complaints have been on the rise, one of the few conditions generally showing an increase in complaints. Diabetes accounts for nearly 5 percent of the 15,000 annual allegations that the commission gets under that act, trailing only back impairment, other orthopedic injuries and depression.

Often the courts are of scant help in bringing clarity. Mr. Steigauf has spent two years trying to thread his way through the disability discrimination law. The federal law can be fuzzy, for it mentions no illness or handicap by name but supplies a legal test under which plaintiffs must usually demonstrate that a "major life activity," like walking or vision, is "substantially limited."

This is easy enough for anyone who has lost sight or a limb. But the restrictions of diabetes are often invisible. Diabetics thus can find themselves teetering on a balance beam, needing to prove they are disabled enough to fit under the law but not so impaired that they can't do a job.

Judges in nearly identical cases have ruled in completely opposite ways, leaving diabetics bewildered and businesses unsure what, if anything, they should do. While some courts, for example, have held that the eating restrictions diabetics face satisfy the substantial limitation, others have disagreed.

"Usually the battle is over that word, 'substantially,' " said Craig A. Crispin, an Oregon employment lawyer. "If you say the person is disabled because of the impact on eating, the other side will say: 'Hey, look, she's eating a sandwich. Where's the disability?' "

Seeking Accommodations

The quarrels are as varied as working life: a musician rejected for a cruise ship's cabaret band, baggage handlers and plane cleaners fired by an airline, a blackjack dealer dismissed by a casino.

The American Diabetes Association fields about 100 calls a month about workplace tussles like these. Many of them revolve around accommodations, though the changes sought tend to be modest: predictable hours, a place to test blood, freedom to snack when sugars get unbalanced.

Companies often cite workplace safety as their paramount concern, though there is little hard evidence to suggest that diabetics are a risk.

In one case in 2002, ConAgra Foods withdrew a job offer to Rudy Rodriguez at a Texas baked bean plant after a physical suggested that his Type 2 diabetes was so out of control that he was a hazard. Mr. Rodriguez had performed fine as an interim laborer, but the examining doctor declared there was nowhere he could safely work "outside of a padded room where he could even then fall and break his neck from dizziness or fainting."

An appeals court found otherwise and held that ConAgra had violated the law. The case was settled, and Mr. Rodriguez now works for a printer.

"Some people who have a problem with hypoglycemia should not be doing public safety-type jobs," said John W. Griffin Jr., a lawyer from Texas with Type 2 diabetes who handles discrimination cases. "But I guarantee you that that baked bean factory was not public safety."

There has been other progress for diabetics: the San Antonio Police Department's barring of diabetics on insulin was struck down. Insulin-using diabetics in good control of their illness can get private pilot's licenses.

In the lingerie saleswoman's case, Sears agreed to a consent decree awarding the woman $150,000 and stipulating that the store train supervisors about disability discrimination.

Employers, however, prevail in a vast majority of cases (many are settled). It is hard even to get lawyers to pursue complaints since prejudice is tricky to prove. Establishing discrimination has become harder since 1999, when the Supreme Court held that if a disability can be corrected with medicine or things like prostheses, it is not necessarily protected. Advocates for the disabled say the ruling warped the intent of Congress.

Ruth Colker, a law professor at Ohio State University who studies disability discrimination, said that very few working people with diabetes now find themselves guarded by the law.

Judges, in fact, have deemed these diabetics not disabled: a Maine store manager who had trouble walking because of poor circulation, and a New York security guard without vision in one eye and declining vision in the other who had four episodes of hypoglycemia in two years.

In some instances, employers have said they took action against an employee because of diabetes, but the court still found that the worker was not disabled and threw out the case.

"There's not a remedy for every wrong," said David A. Copus, a lawyer who represents employers and specializes in disability issues. "There are employers who don't like ugly people. They're not protected by the law."

Mr. Copus said he was not unsympathetic. His father had diabetes; it was very debilitating.

DOJ_NMG_0108774

Wary of bad outcomes, many diabetics conceal their illness on the job. Brian T. McMahon, a professor at Virginia Commonwealth University who studies workplace discrimination, said: "You get to the question of whether or not to disclose you have diabetes. Most people opt not to, for they fear: Am I inviting more trouble?"

Figuring Employer Costs

There was a time, four or five decades ago, when you wouldn't find one diabetic on the entire floor of a factory. Now, Type 2 diabetics are commonplace. It is not only the ascendancy of the disease, but also the fact that a condition once considered a corollary to old age is striking people sooner, catching them long before retirement. And this comes as companies are already struggling to balance productivity in the workplace with soaring medical costs.

To understand the brutal math of diabetes, all a business has to do is consult the Web site diabetesatwork.org, set up by the government to furnish advice on addressing diabetes in the workplace. One of its tools is a calculator that uses rough assumptions to suggest what costs might be involved.

Businesses plug in the number of employees, the tally is multiplied by 8.2 percent (a slightly dated national prevalence rate for diabetes), then that figure is multiplied by $13,243, an estimate for yearly medical costs of a diabetic. Voilà: the price tag of diabetes. It is a burden more than five times that of workers without diabetes.

Ron Z. Goetzel, a vice president for Thomson Medstat, which analyzes health care costs for businesses, said that if absenteeism and productivity losses are added, diabetes ranks third among major conditions as an economic cost to employers, after heart disease and hypertension.

Companies have only started to reckon with this, and with the disease's ancillary concerns. Even if advocates say safety is rarely a factor, companies argue they cannot take chances with some types of workers, like school bus drivers or even pizza deliverers.

Concessions may seem small — for example, granting a bank teller more frequent breaks — but many employers contend that if rules bend for one person, then that breeds resentment among other employees. Co-workers cannot see the diabetes, and if an employer gives preferential treatment to a diabetic worker, it cannot legally tell other workers it is because of the diabetes. Companies feel that indulging all diabetics trivializes the meaning of disability and of fairness.

"It comes down to how many extra points do I give you," said William J. Kilberg, a Washington employment lawyer. "Why is everybody a victim?"

He said too many people who are not disabled demand special favors. "I mean, I wear eyeglasses," he said.

In addition to the threat of a suit under federal or state disability law, businesses must grapple with the Family and Medical Leave Act, which requires them to grant unpaid leave to ill workers. That can create scheduling difficulties.

"This whole area gets complicated, because the medical leave act can mean employees absent from the workplace for extended periods," said Stephen A. Bokat, general counsel for the United States Chamber of Commerce. "That bothers employers even more than an employee needing a half-hour during the day to administer some insulin."

Health care consultants urge companies to become proactive, try to use tools like wellness programs to forestall diabetes' claim on their workers and install disease management programs to improve existing cases. And many do. Companies dangle $100 incentives (though more often a mug or a T-shirt) if an employee submits to a health assessment or accepts a phone call from a health coach.

But getting participation is hard. And the economic worth of these undertakings to a business is difficult to gauge with a progressive disease like diabetes. Sometimes the evident benefits of in-house health programs are years down the road, when an employee a business invested in may well be working elsewhere.

When Safety Comes First

John Steigauf's fellow mechanics called him "Flunky." The name caught on after Mr. Steigauf gave advice to a prickly supervisor, who thundered, "I'm not going to let some flunky mechanic tell me how to do my job." Mr. Steigauf, 47, wanted it embroidered onto his uniform. Supervisors said forget it.

He joined United Parcel in Minneapolis in 1991, turning wrenches from the start. Five years ago, he learned that he had Type 2 diabetes. Though it often goes with being overweight, he had a wide receiver's build: 6-foot-2, 193 pounds. But his mother had diabetes.

He was put on pills and watched his diet, abandoning his cherished hot chocolate. Yet his blood sugar remained high. If it didn't drop, he would need insulin. That sent fear pumping through him.

U.P.S. requires mechanics, like its interstate drivers, to hold a commercial driver's license and to be cleared to drive out of state so they can road-test trucks. In reality, mechanics could go weeks without leaving the yard, but those were the rules. And at the time, federal officials did not grant interstate licenses to insulin-using diabetics.

They did dispense a few exemptions. But Mr. Steigauf, who started using insulin only in 2004, stood no chance. The requirement was to have driven safely while on insulin for three years.

DOJ_NMG_0108775

So Mr. Steigauf tried starving himself, slicing off 30 pounds. It made him crabby, fatigued and so thin "that if I stuck my tongue out, I looked like a zipper."

His blood sugars did not budge. But after he took insulin, his diabetes settled down almost at once.

Later in 2004, he had to have a physical to renew his commercial license, a test he could no longer pass. Minnesota did not have the three-year rule, and since he had never had a hypoglycemic episode or other problems, Mr. Steigauf got an exemption to drive within the state. Given that he didn't even leave the county while road-testing trucks, he hoped that would be good enough.

It wasn't. For consistency, U.P.S. wanted all its mechanics to be certified to drive from state to state, whether they needed to or not. So Mr. Steigauf was sent home on disability, even though he felt fine.

Norman Black, a U.P.S. spokesman, said the company had always intended to find Mr. Steigauf another position. He said the company did not discriminate but was passionate about safety.

Studies tracking accident rates of diabetics are inconclusive; some indicate worse outcomes, others don't. But either way, Mr. Steigauf's direct supervisor at the time, Dan Welke, said he thought the company had gone too far, that somebody else could road-test the trucks repaired by Mr. Steigauf.

"It just seemed ridiculous," Mr. Welke said.

Mr. Steigauf also had trouble making sense of this. When his diabetes raged out of control, it had been all right to fix trucks. Now, with the illness under control, it wasn't.

When he spoke to someone in human resources, Mr. Steigauf said he was told that he would never come back. The notion that he was a human tinderbox punctuated his interactions. "I'd be told that I could pull a tractor up to a fuel pump and pass out and the thing would explode," he said. "I was like a grenade and was going to kill people."

At home in Bloomington, Minn., where Mr. Steigauf's tidy ranch is bordered by a soupçon of lawn, he, his wife, Dawn, their twin daughters and their severely autistic son struggled on a weekly disability check of $431, about half his old pay.

To keep going, he did odd jobs. Friends at U.P.S. dug into their pockets. The family cut one another's hair and skipped sending Christmas cards.

Finally, Mr. Steigauf asked U.P.S. to excuse him from interstate driving as a "reasonable accommodation" under disability law. After all, he had left the state for U.P.S. only once in 13 years. Some of his colleagues, he found out, did not even have commercial driver's licenses.

But U.P.S. refused, saying he was not disabled under discrimination law, and thus not entitled to an accommodation.

So, in early 2005, he filed a complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and waited, interned in his house, as if he had evaporated — all the while collecting disability from a company that said he was not disabled.

After seven months, U.P.S. offered him a lower-paying job, fixing trailers. He could not touch an engine or drive. But he took it while he battled for his former position.

Then he had some luck. Federal officials changed their rules on interstate licenses and Mr. Steigauf qualified for a waiver, allowing him to return to his old job. He is expected to start within a month or so.

This fall, the E.E.O.C. concluded that he had been discriminated against and that U.P.S. owed him relief. U.P.S. said it would contest the decision.

Mr. Steigauf is still bitter, not toward U.P.S. itself, but toward the way he believes it treats diabetics. Even now, he feels singled out.

"I've had unloaders at work say to me, 'Are you that diabetic guy?' " he said. "I don't know what they mean. Nothing? Or, 'You shouldn't be working here'?"

To keep his exemption, he must obey a complicated protocol to show the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration that he remains fit. Every three months, he has to report how much he drives and his sugar levels. If he has an accident, even if someone rams his car while he's in a movie, he has two days to alert the government. He has seven days to let the government know if he has a new car or a new phone number.

"The exemption adds to the discrimination," he said one afternoon at home. "It constantly reminds me that I'm different."

His children skittered through the room.

"You become a show dog," he said. "I fix engines. I don't want to be a show dog."

ANTITRUST:

Judge Postpones Delphi Hearing After New Plan (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

DOJ_NMG_0108776

The Wall Street Journal, December 26, 2006

Bankruptcy Judge Robert Drain postponed a key hearing in the Delphi Corp. bankruptcy case to Jan. 11 from Jan. 5, allowing more time for critics to compose arguments against the auto-parts supplier's proposed $3.4 billion bankruptcy-emergence equity deal with a group of investors led by Appaloosa Management.

The bankruptcy court must approve the deal by Jan. 22, or it can be nullified by the Appaloosa group, according to a letter the hedge fund's team sent to Delphi last week. Cerberus Capital Management, hedge fund Harbinger Capital, Merrill Lynch & Co. and UBS AG's UBS Securities are part of Appaloosa's team.

Judge Drain changed the hearing date following an alternative $4.7 billion funding plan proposed Thursday by hedge fund Highland Capital, which says it owns about 8.8% of Delphi's stock and has positioned itself as a rival to Appaloosa in the battle to shape Delphi's future. The fund's actions highlight the growing interest among private-capital players in the restructuring of the U.S. auto industry.

Highland accuses the Appaloosa team of forging a deal that gives too much preference to the investment group. Other stakeholders have also filed court papers expressing displeasure with the Appaloosa plan, which was first announced early last week.

Separately, General Motors Corp. said it plans to honor an agreement with the Appaloosa team not to talk to other Delphi stakeholders about alternative funding plans before April 2, though GM spokeswoman Renee Rashid-Merem said there may be certain contingencies that eventually allow the auto maker to discuss alternative plans with other stakeholders, including Highland, prior to April 2.

GM, which spun off Delphi in 1999, stands to hold about a 5% equity stake in the new Delphi under Appaloosa's proposal.

Delphi spokeswoman Claudia Piccinin said the Troy, Mich., company will consider Highland's proposal and discuss its merit with its board.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

After Long Struggle, Whooping Crane Population Hits Milestone (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

AUSTWELL, Tex. -- One of the most beloved groups of winter Texans is back, in the largest number in a century and with a record 45 youngsters in tow, including an even rarer seven pairs of twins.

They flew 2,400 miles from Canada's Northwest Territories and can be seen munching on blue crabs and bright red-orange wolfberries among the marshes of the Aransas National Wildlife Refuge.

The whooping crane, the tallest bird in North America, whose numbers dwindled to fewer than 20 in 1941, is not only back from the brink of extinction but also thriving -- a comeback story, federal wildlife officials say, that illustrates how a coordinated conservation effort can save a species.

"The whooping crane continues to mirror the success of endangered species recovery when man sets his mind to it," said Tom Stehn, the national whooping crane coordinator for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service. "We have come a long way, but we do have a long, long way to go."

This year, the nation's only natural wild population of whooping cranes reached a milestone. Stehn's mid-December census of the migratory crane flock at the wildlife refuge, where he is based, numbered 237. Combined with the number of birds in captivity in three special flocks raised for reintroduction to the wild and those in zoos, the crane population now numbers 518. This is the first time in more than a century that whooping cranes have numbered more than 500.

Deboarding from the tour boat Skimmer at Aransas one sunny morning a few days before Christmas, Mike Dixon explained why he and his family drove in from West Texas just to see the huge white birds and their rusty brown chicks.

"Those birds out there are the result of a whole lot of effort, money and concern to save a species, and that's exciting," he said.

Recovery efforts date to 1938, a year after the federal government established the Aransas Wildlife Refuge along the south Texas Gulf Coast. The salt marsh was known to be the winter home of several species of migratory birds, including the majestic whooping crane, with its long sinuous neck, height of five feet and wingspan of seven feet.

The cranes numbered just over 20 in the first census, in 1938. By 1941, the migratory flock was down to 15, largely because of shooting, the conversion of grasslands to agriculture and the draining of wetlands.

"This species was virtually four nesting females away from extinction, and that's why this is so significant," Stehn said. "It was just such a close call, such an incredibly close call."

DOJ_NMG_0108777

The crane's breeding grounds were unknown until 1954, when a fire crew flying over Wood Buffalo National Park in Canada's Northwest Territories accidentally discovered the migratory flock. In the United States, the whooping crane was listed as a threatened species in 1968 and moved to the endangered list two years later, prompting a series of efforts to increase the flock's size.

From the mid-1970s to the late 1980s, whooping crane eggs were placed in sandhill crane nests in Idaho so the sandhill cranes could teach the whoopers how to survive in the wild, when to migrate and where to winter. But that whooping crane flock never paired or reproduced, and the last whooper in the Rocky Mountains died in 2002.

U.S. scientists also developed a technique in the 1980s for raising whoopers in captivity by using crane handlers -- humans dressed in costumes that resemble cranes -- to raise chicks in isolation from actual human contact, so they grow up to be wild. Starting in 1993, many of those captive cranes have been released yearly in central Florida, where they have stayed because they never learned how to migrate, behavior that would normally be passed on by their parents.

In 2001, the Whooping Crane Eastern Partnership, an American-Canadian partnership of governments, nonprofit organizations, citizens and corporations, developed a method to teach captive-raised whoopers how to migrate so they could be introduced to the wild. Since then, young cranes have been led in migration every fall by gliders flying from the Necedah National Wildlife Refuge in Wisconsin to the Chassahowitzka National Wildlife Refuge in Florida, 1,200 miles away. The cranes return on their own in the spring.

These efforts involve the Canadian and U.S. governments; federal agencies such as the Fish and Wildlife Service and the Geological Survey; state agencies; conservation groups such as the Whooping Crane Eastern Partnership and the International Crane Foundation of Baraboo, Wis.; and local zoos.

"For all of us, this is exactly what we are all about: trying to get animals reproduced and back out in the wild," said San Antonio Zoo bird curator Josef San Miguel. His staff specializes in costume-rearing whooping crane chicks, some of which are donated yearly to the International Crane Foundation for the glider migration project.

"It's a group effort, and when you hear the birds are doing what we need for them to do, it makes us all feel good," San Miguel said.

Extremely good nest production this summer in Wood Buffalo National Park is credited with producing this winter's record flock at the Aransas refuge. Stuart Macmillan, a biologist at Wood Buffalo, cited favorable breeding conditions such as adequate water levels in ponds where cranes build their nests, an ample food supply and fewer natural predators.

Today's threats to the species are power lines, which cranes crash into during migration; loss of stopover habitat; a lack of genetic diversity; disease; and a decline in habitat conditions at the Aransas refuge because less freshwater is flowing into the salt marsh.

"There are a lot of threats out there on the horizon, and that's what worries us," Stehn said. The whooping crane is likely to remain on the endangered species list until the migratory flock numbers more than 5,000, he said.

IMMIGRATION:

Bipartisan Effort To Draft Immigration Bill (NYT)

By Rachel L. Swarns

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 25 — Counting on the support of the new Democratic majority in Congress, Democratic lawmakers and their Republican allies are working on measures that could place millions of illegal immigrants on a more direct path to citizenship than would a bill that the Senate passed in the spring.

The lawmakers are considering abandoning a requirement in the Senate bill that would compel several million illegal immigrants to leave the United States before becoming eligible to apply for citizenship.

The lawmakers are also considering denying financing for 700 miles of fencing along the border with Mexico, a law championed by Republicans that passed with significant Democratic support.

Details of the bill, which would be introduced early next year, are being drafted. The lawmakers, who hope for bipartisan support, will almost certainly face pressure to compromise on the issues from some Republicans and conservative Democrats.

Still, the proposals reflect significant shifts since the November elections, as well as critical support from the Homeland Security Department.

Proponents said the prospects for such a measure, which would include tougher border security and a guest worker plan, had markedly improved since Nov. 7.

DOJ_NMG_0108778

The Senate plans to introduce its immigration bill next month with an eye toward passage in March or April, officials said. The House is expected to consider its version later. President Bush said last week that he hoped to sign an immigration bill next year.

The major lawmakers drafting the legislation include Senators Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, and John McCain, Republican of Arizona, along with Representatives Jeff Flake, Republican of Arizona, and Luis V. Gutierrez, Democrat of Illinois. The four met this month, and their staffs have begun working on a bill.

"I'm very hopeful about this, both in terms of the substance and the politics of it," said Mr. Kennedy, the incoming chairman of the Senate Immigration, Border Security and Citizenship Subcommittee.

Mr. Kennedy acknowledged that there would be hurdles. But he and other lawmakers say Republicans and Democrats are now more likely to work together to repair a system widely considered as broken.

House Republicans blocked consideration of the bill that passed the Senate this year, saying it amounted to an amnesty for lawbreakers and voicing confidence that a tough stance would touch off a groundswell of support in the Congressional elections. The strategy largely failed.

Hispanic voters, a swing constituency that Republicans covet, abandoned the party in large numbers. Several Republican hardliners, including Representatives John Hostettler of Indiana and J. D. Hayworth of Arizona, lost their seats. After the dismal showing, House Republicans denied F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, the departing chairman of the Judiciary Committee and an architect of the House immigration approach, a senior position on any major committee in the new Congress.

Domestic security officials have voiced support for important elements of the framework under consideration. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has repeatedly raised doubts about the effectiveness of border fencing in remote desert areas. Mr. Bush signed the fence bill this year, but Congress did not appropriate enough money for it. Officials say they would also prefer a less burdensome process than the original Senate bill outlined.

That bill divided the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants into three groups, those living here for five years or more, those here for two to five years and those here for less than two years.

All but the illegal immigrants living here for five years or more, roughly seven million, would have to leave the country briefly to be eligible for legal status. Those here for fewer than two years would have to leave the country and would not even be guaranteed a slot in a guest worker plan.

Domestic security officials said the original plan would have been enormously difficult to administer because many illegal immigrants lacked documentation to prove how long they had been in the United States.

The officials said it would have fueled a market in fraudulent documents as illegal immigrants scrambled to offer proof of residency.

The three-tiered approach would also discourage millions of illegal immigrants from registering, driving millions deeper underground.

"We do have concerns over breaking it down into that tiered system," said a domestic security official who insisted on anonymity. "When you do that, you run the risk of people trying to create false documentation that would get them the highest benefits."

Also expected to have prominent roles in the debate are Representatives Zoe Lofgren, the California Democrat who is likely to head the House Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee; Howard L. Berman, a California Democrat who has followed immigration issues closely for many years; and Bennie Thompson, the Mississippi Democrat who is set to lead the House Homeland Security Committee and has said he plans to re-evaluate the 700-mile fence.

But Mr. Flake described himself as optimistic, saying the elections had disabused many Republicans of the notion that opposing legalization and guest worker plans would win widespread support.

"That illusion is gone," he said.

The percentage of Hispanics who voted for Republicans fell to 29 percent, from 44 percent in 2004, and some Republicans say passing immigration bills is a crucial part of the effort to win them back.

Mr. Flake warned that some Republicans might balk at proposals like broadening the number of illegal immigrants eligible for a less burdensome path to citizenship, making passage of bipartisan legislation potentially "politically more difficult."

The prospects for a bill that contains such a proposal remain particularly uncertain in the House, where many prominent Democrats want to ensure broad bipartisan backing as part of their efforts to maintain their majority in 2008, Congressional aides said.

The House Democrats are concerned about protecting newly elected moderate and conservative Democrats, some of whom had campaigned against legalizing illegal immigrants.

It is also unclear whether Mr. Gutierrez and Mr. Flake will produce the only House legislation on immigration and whether their plan will ultimately become the basis for the bill that emerges.

DOJ_NMG_0108779

In the Senate, Mr. Kennedy's bill certainly has the backing of the Democratic leadership, Congressional aides said.

Senator John Cornyn, Republican of Texas, argued that expanding citizenship eligibility and abandoning financing for the fence would alienate moderates in both parties. The three-tier legalization system, a hard-fought compromise, was critical for moderate Republican support for the original bill.

The plan under consideration would allow 10 million or 11 million illegal immigrants to become eligible to apply for citizenship without returning home, up from 7 million in the original Senate bill. To be granted citizenship, they would have to remain employed, pass background checks, pay fines and back taxes, and enroll in English classes.

"I think it's a nonstarter," said Mr. Cornyn, who opposes a path to citizenship for illegal workers, but supports a plan for temporary workers that would let foreigners work here temporarily before returning home.

Congressional aides and lawyers familiar with the proposed bills emphasize that it will be very difficult for a smaller group of illegal immigrants, those who arrived after a certain date, perhaps 2004, to become citizens. The aides said the bill might include incentives for illegal immigrants to leave the country. While they hope such elements may ease concerns, many challenges remain.

Some powerful unions, which expect to exert more leverage in the new Congress, remain deeply opposed to the temporary worker program in the Senate bill. The unions say it threatens American jobs.

Officials at the A.F.L.-C.I.O. say they can scuttle such a plan next year, even though Mr. Bush and businesses say it is critical to ensure an adequate labor force.

There is also the political clock to consider. Supporters of immigration measures acknowledge that the prospects for a bipartisan bill will dim significantly if a bill is not passed before the presidential primaries of 2008 are in full swing.

Some Congressional aides and immigrants' advocates worry about the commitment of Mr. McCain, a likely presidential candidate in 2008.

Mr. McCain has long supported legalization that would not require illegal immigrants to leave the United States. Some advocates fear that his ambitions may lead to a shifting of that stance to avoid alienating moderate Republicans.

A spokeswoman for Mr. McCain said last week that he was not available to comment on the bill being drafted.

Many lawmakers say their hope is growing that Congress will pass an immigration bill next year.

"There are going to be hard choices that are going to be made, because we need to build a bipartisan, broad-based coalition," said Mr. Gutierrez, who leads the House Democratic immigration group. "But I'm hopeful that in the environment in which we're working now we can get it done."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Pledge To Restrain Spending (WP)

By Lori Montgomery

The Washington Post, December 25, 2006

Determined to banish their old tax-and-spend image, Democrats want to shrink the federal deficit, preserve tax cuts for the middle class and challenge the president to raise money for the Iraq war when they take control of Congress next week. But it won't be easy.

The incoming Democratic chairmen of the House and Senate Budget committees said they plan to honor a campaign promise to devote billions of additional dollars a year to homeland security and education. And they reiterated a commitment not to cut off funding for U.S. troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

But with the costs of those military operations rising and President Bush considering an expansion of forces, the incoming chairmen, Rep. John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.) and Sen. Kent Conrad (N.D.), said they will have little room in their budget blueprints for significant new domestic spending, such as closing a much-criticized gap in the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit that forces millions of seniors to pay 100 percent of drug costs for a few weeks or months each year.

They said they will press Bush to help finance a war that is costing the nation as much as $8 billion a month.

"Raising taxes would certainly be an option," Conrad said in an interview. "The president, this is his policy. He's got an obligation to pay for it."

The two chairmen said they would seek to save money by demanding a better accounting of military spending and an end to "the ever-expanding 'shadow budget' of supplemental and bridge funds," as they put it in a letter to the White House last week that was also signed by outgoing Senate Budget Committee chairman Judd Gregg (R-N.H.). Those budget mechanisms have funneled more than $500 billion to terror-related operations since Sept. 11, 2001, with little scrutiny from the Republican lawmakers who are leaving power. Spratt said he would spend most of January in oversight hearings to determine where the money is going.

DOJ_NMG_0108780

"When the president talks about staying the course, he never mentions cost as a factor," Spratt said. "But it is a factor, particularly when you get costs over $100 billion a year."

Spratt and Conrad said they would aim to balance the budget by 2012, a goal that could anger liberal Democrats eager for new spending on domestic programs and conservative Republicans determined to preserve the tax cuts passed during Bush's first term. But it also could establish the Democrats as able stewards of the nation's treasury, political analysts said, giving the party's presidential candidates an important accomplishment for the 2008 campaign.

"In terms of practical politics, the reality is this: We have to be on good behavior so we have a chance to win the presidency," said Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), a leader of the Blue Dog Coalition, a group of conservative House Democrats whose ranks swelled to 44 in the November elections. "We have a chance now of having a new Democratic Party that supports the middle class and has middle-class priorities at heart."

Republicans and budget experts say they doubt Democrats can simultaneously cut the deficit and meet their spending goals, especially given GOP opposition to higher taxes. Bush's top budget advisers said last week that they see no need to increase taxes to pay for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, which are expected to cost $170 billion this year, up from $120 billion in fiscal 2006.

Despite the rising expense of the war, the annual budget deficit declined to $248 billion in the fiscal year ended in September because of an unexpected surge in tax collections.

"Revenues are up because of a growing economy," said White House budget director Rob Portman. "That has enabled us not just to afford the relatively high [war] supplementals -- higher than we expected -- but actually to decline the deficit."

Democrats say the annual deficit is kept artificially low with cash borrowed from the Social Security trust fund. The nation's overall indebtedness is approaching $9 trillion, and interest on that debt grew by 23 percent last year, making it the fastest-growing part of the budget.

Less than 20 percent of the budget is available for education, highways, housing and courts, discretionary programs that are being further squeezed by an increasingly expensive military. In the session that just ended, Congress failed to pass budget bills for most domestic agencies, in part because lawmakers refused to support painful spending restraints.

Two weeks ago, Democrats announced plans to plug some of the most difficult holes in the current fiscal year by stripping funds for lawmakers' pet projects, known as earmarks, from the bills. For next year, Spratt and Conrad said they plan to keep the purse strings pulled tight on discretionary programs and apply a pay-as-you-go rule to changes in tax policy and mandatory programs such as Social Security and health care.

That will force Democrats to find spending cuts or new revenue to pay for some big-ticket items: They have promised to halve interest rates for federal student loans, which would cost as much as $60 billion over five years. They want more money for border and port security, first responders and the National Guard. They say health programs for children and veterans need more cash to avoid dropping thousands of people from their rolls. And they want to extend some of the Bush tax cuts that are set to expire in 2010, including an expanded child credit, a reduction in the so-called marriage penalty and the new 10 percent tax bracket.

Plus, Democrats have promised to freeze the alternative minimum tax, a parallel tax structure that will add thousands of dollars to the tax bills of millions of families unless Congress comes up with about $50 billion to halt its expansion for another year.

Democrats say they will cover that cost by ending tax breaks on foreign profits of U.S. businesses, closing corporate tax shelters, cutting subsidies to oil and gas companies and giving the federal government authority to negotiate lower drug prices for Medicare. They would also tap the vast amount of uncollected tax revenue known as the tax gap, which has been projected at $300 billion a year.

But some of those funding sources are highly uncertain. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has said negotiating drug prices is unlikely to produce much savings. Past attempts to harness the tax gap have produced little new revenue.

Without more money, Democrats will face "a real struggle for which wins out: the political promises or the fiscal-responsibility promise," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a nonpartisan group that opposes deficits. "If the public perceives that they're making real choices and cutting back on some things they want to do politically because they're trying to be fiscally responsible, then they can declare victory." But if people perceive that they're honoring fiscal restraint in word but not in deed, then they'll look pretty silly, Bixby said.

So far, Bixby said, he has been impressed by Democratic leaders' commitment to deficit reduction, calling the elimination of earmarks "rather stunning." Another Blue Dog leader, Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), said the Democrats' conservative wing will block any effort in the House to backslide on those promises.

DOJ_NMG_0108781

"Yes, there's going to be tough medicine," Cardoza said. "But we are incredibly united behind these goals. And they need us to do anything."

OTHER NEWS:

Roberts Leading Court In More Media-friendly Direction (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, December 25, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Many Supreme Court justices prize the anonymity that comes with their lifetime appointments and camera-free courtroom. Unrecognized, justices have snapped pictures for tourists in front of the court or been asked to move out of the way of a shot.

On rare occasion, a justice might consent to an interview on the C-SPAN cable network to discuss a recent book or be shown addressing a lawyers' gathering somewhere.

Lately, however, some members of the court have been popping up in unusual places — including network television news programs — and talking about more than just the law.

For an institution that has kept the media at a comfortable distance for much of its existence, the Supreme Court's increasingly public face is astonishing, said University of Chicago law professor Dennis Hutchinson, who served as a law clerk for Justices Byron White and William Douglas.

"More and more, the justices are spending time talking off the bench informally to reporters, on the record, off the record, in public, on tape, on film," Hutchinson said.

Justices Antonin Scalia and Stephen Breyer recently debated their competing views of the Constitution. Breyer and retired Justice Sandra Day O'Connor have talked publicly and repeatedly about threats to judicial independence. Justice Samuel Alito proudly affirmed his membership in the conservative Federalist Society, speaking in a packed ballroom at its recent convention.

Perhaps most noteworthy, though, has been the media-friendly attitude adoped by new Chief Justice John Roberts, in contrast to his predecessor William Rehnquist. Roberts recently was featured on ABC News' Nightline discussing both his view of the court and his son Jack's Spiderman imitation at Roberts' introduction by President Bush.

"Roberts is putting a smiley face in the center chair," said Hutchinson, who recalled earlier eras in which chief justices rigorously avoided the press and looked askance at their colleagues who consented to the rare interview.

Having spent more of his legal career as an advocate than as a judge, Roberts is at ease on a public stage. He has longstanding professional relationships with many in the court's veteran reporting corps.

For many years, justices held to the view that the court's mystique and reputation were enhanced by their distance from the public. The justices spoke through their written opinions, laying out not only what they had decided, but why.

Their unbending refusal to allow cameras in the courtroom has been part and parcel of this belief that the Supreme Court is unlike the Congress and the presidency in that it does not serve at the pleasure of voters.

Rehnquist could stroll around the court, unrecognized by tourists. Justice Anthony Kennedy snapped a photograph for visitors who had no idea who he was. Justice John Paul Stevens once was asked to move out of the way by a picture-taking tourist.

Now comes Roberts, who appears intent on allowing the public more of a look inside the court, although the prospect of televised court sessions still seems remote. He also heartily endorsed tighter ethics rules for judges, although those rules do not apply to the Supreme Court.

Douglas Kmiec, a Pepperdine law professor and Justice Department official in earlier Republican administrations, said Roberts' public relations effort is in line with his desire to have the court issue narrower, more consensual rulings.

"I think he feels a burden of explanation. The court has become so much the storm center of cultural controversy. Roberts is committed to not having that be so," Kmiec said. "If that's the case, it requires a certain amount of public explanation."

Stephen Wermiel, a law professor at American University, agreed that "the idea of more consensus brought about by narrower decision making enhances the public image of the court."

Yet Breyer and Scalia, for instance, have said they don't necessarily agree with the chief's call for greater consensus on the court. Scalia made clear he prefers bold rulings that serve as a guide for lower courts and lawyers, saying narrow rulings can be so constricted as to be useless

Another possibility, said University of Virginia law professor G. Edward White, is that the court will stay in the middle of national controversies and that Roberts believes its credibility will be enhanced if the justices appear less remote.

DOJ_NMG_0108782

It may also be that the justices believe they can keep proponents of even greater openness, especially cameras in the courtroom, at bay.

At this early stage in his tenure, it is unclear just where the court is headed. With Roberts and Alito two new conservative faces on the court, high-profile cases involving abortion, race and the environment await decisions.

But by courting the media, the chief justice already has broken with his predecessors in one respect.

Italian In Poison Case Arrested (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

ROME — An Italian who met with an ex-KGB agent around the time that radiation made the Russian fatally ill was arrested Sunday on charges of international arms trafficking and slander, the Italian man's father said.

The accusations against Mario Scaramella were not believed to be directly related to the investigation into the poisoning death of Alexander Litvinenko.

Scaramella, the first person connected to the poisoning case to be arrested, met Litvinenko at a London sushi bar Nov. 1, the apparent day that the former agent was poisoned. Litvinenko died of exposure to polonium-210 on Nov. 23.

Amedeo Scaramella said his son was arrested in Naples after returning from London, where he had been hospitalized for radiation exposure.

Ten people in Britain have tested positive for exposure since Litvinenko died.

Scaramella said he showed Litvinenko e-mails at the Nov. 1 meeting from a confidential source identifying the possible killers of Russian investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya and listing other potential targets for assassination — including himself and Litvinenko.

On his deathbed, Litvinenko blamed Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for his poisoning — an allegation that the Kremlin denied.

Ethiopian Jets Strafe Mogadishu Airports (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, December 26, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Dec. 25 — An Ethiopian fighter jet strafed Mogadishu's airport on Monday in a striking show of force that took the growing conflict in the Horn of Africa to Somalia's capital for the first time.

Across the country, Somalia's Islamist leaders conceded that they were rapidly losing territory to the forces of Somalia's internationally recognized transitional government.

In Beledweyne, a town near the Ethiopian border, residents resumed the lives they had led before Islamist rule, not even a day after the Islamist forces pulled out. A truck hauling chat, a mildly narcotic leaf that the Islamists had outlawed, pulled into the market to a burst of cheers.

"It was wonderful to see that truck," said Farah Abdi Dereer, a vendor of spare parts.

The fighting between Somalia's transitional government and the country's powerful Islamist movement, based in Mogadishu, has been raging on and off for nearly a week.

On Sunday, Ethiopia officially joined the hostilities, with the tacit blessing of the United States, bombing Islamist positions in several frontline areas and pushing ground troops deep into Somali territory. Ethiopian officials said they sided with the transitional government because the Islamists, whom American officials have accused of harboring Qaeda terrorists, posed a threat to the region.

On Monday, witnesses in Mogadishu said that a lone Ethiopian fighter jet roared over the Indian Ocean around 9 a.m., fired machine guns at the parking lot of the international airport, which was mostly empty, and banked sharply away.

The attack was apparently meant to be more a demonstration of military might than a destructive mission; the only reported casualty was an airport janitor who was slightly wounded. It did, however, have the intended effect of shutting the airport down as Daallo Airlines, one of the last carriers to fly into Somalia, promptly canceled all service.

Witnesses said four more Ethiopian fighter planes then attacked an intensely guarded military airport west of Mogadishu, where the Islamist forces stored their heavy weapons and ammunition.

Ethiopian officials said they were following specific instructions by the transitional government to seal Somalia's borders to bar foreign fighters. According to United Nations officials, the Islamists are supported by several thousand Eritreans, Libyans, Syrians and Yemenis who have responded to the call of a holy war against Ethiopia, a Christian-led country.

In Baidoa, the inland seat of the transitional government, top officials were sounding increasingly confident. After months of isolation in a provincial market town, too weak to spread their administration to Somalia's cities, transitional government officials laid out an ambitious three-part plan.

DOJ_NMG_0108783

"We're going to eradicate the enemy, we're going to appoint administrators and we're going to rule nationwide," said Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for President Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed.

A few weeks ago, this would have sounded preposterous. But the injection of forces from Ethiopia, which commands the most powerful military in the region, seems to be changing Somalia's wobbly balance of power.

Still, with attacks and counterattacks continuing, the outcome remains uncertain. Western diplomats have cautioned Ethiopia not to try to overthrow the Islamists and occupy Mogadishu, fearing that would spawn a long, messy guerrilla war.

Already, thousands of people, with barely enough to eat before conflict struck, are fleeing their homes and their farms, creating a worrisome situation for the few aid organizations still operating in Somalia.

Ethiopian officials reiterated Monday that they felt they were forced to act because of the threat the Islamists posed to their security. So far, the Ethiopian military seems to be selecting targets mostly outside urban areas in an effort to reduce civilian casualties.

But the extent of the casualties is hard to tell. Warfare in Somalia is traditionally mobile and small scale, fought between armed pickup trucks and small crews of fighters. Red Cross officials have said that they have treated more than 400 people for combat injuries, and United Nations officials put the death toll from the past week in the low hundreds.

Both sides have published pictures of the dead sprawled on the battlefield. On Monday, the Islamists showed images of prisoners of war with their arms bound behind their backs and their throats slit. Last week, the Islamists vowed to execute all captives.

Though the Islamist leaders conceded Monday that they had retreated from two towns they had controlled (the transitional government said the true number was five), they seemed unbowed. Mosques in Mogadishu continued to blare out recruitment calls, and thousands of young men, many in their early teens, continued to enlist.

But some people in Mogadishu who used to support the Islamists — who did indeed bring a semblance of order to a very dangerous city — were beginning to express doubts.

Asho Ali, a mother of eight, went to the hospital on Sunday to see her 16-year-old son, who had been wounded fighting for the Islamists. On Monday, he died.

"For no reason we are losing our children," she said. "Why are they doing this?"

Ethiopia Steps Up Attacks On Somalia (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

LONDON, Dec. 25 -- Ethiopian warplanes attacked the airport in Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, on Monday in another major escalation of fighting between the Ethiopian-backed Somali government and the Islamic Courts movement that in recent months has taken over much of the country.

In Mogadishu, businesses shut down and thousands of enraged Somalis loyal to the Islamic movement rallied in the streets, once again proclaiming holy war against Ethiopia, a bitter enemy that is widely perceived to be supported by the U.S. government. Witnesses said young Somali men who have grown up in a country awash with AK-47 assault rifles continued to pour into recruiting centers to sign up to fight.

And 150 miles away on the front lines near Baidoa, seat of the fragile interim government, sources said that fighters from Eritrea and Pakistan, among others, had joined the Islamic movement's battle against Ethiopia in a conflict that analysts fear could engulf the Horn of Africa.

"The feelings are very bad, very confusing -- everywhere, it's confusing," said a businessman in Mogadishu who did not want to be identified. "I didn't expect this scale of war, but most Somalis, even if they were fighting each other before on a clan basis, they are united now against Ethiopia. And there's a feeling that the international community is not helping."

Thousands of Somalis who had fled war and drought earlier this year and epic flooding in recent weeks once again abandoned villages, leaving behind fields and livestock at harvest time, aid workers said. Droves of villagers trudged down muddy roads toward refugee camps just across the Kenyan border. The camps are already full of Somalis displaced by years of fighting and natural disasters.

"These families are really pushed into the extreme limits," Pedram Yazdi, a spokesman for the International Committee of the Red Cross, said from Nairobi, adding that Red Cross-supported medical facilities had received more than 440 wounded and that the total "is rising every hour." Aid workers believe the number of dead is in the hundreds.

Meanwhile, Ethiopian officials said on state-run television Monday that they would continue the assault against the Islamic movement and vowed to push toward Mogadishu, clearing the Islamic fighters out of every town they control over the next five days. By Monday night, Ethiopian forces, which are vastly superior to the Islamic movement in conventional military terms, had secured the strategically important town of Beledweyne, which is near the Ethiopian border and along a main road to Mogadishu.

DOJ_NMG_0108784

The Associated Press reported that Ethiopian and government forces had also captured three villages in a push toward Jowhar, about 60 miles north of Mogadishu.

AP also reported that airstrikes hit a second airport, Baledogle Airport, outside Mogadishu.

Negotiations between Somalia's weak but internationally recognized interim government and the Islamic movement have fallen apart in recent months as the Islamic group has become stronger and advanced its control. The current conflict began even as the two sides had signed an agreement to de-escalate fighting and resume talks.

Analysts believe that Ethiopia's offensive is intended to force the movement back into negotiations by changing the situation on the ground.

But some analysts have expressed fear that Ethiopia's military calculation is seriously flawed, and that even if its superior military initially routs the Islamic movement, the ideologically driven militias will become only more motivated to pursue a guerrilla-style war or terrorist attacks across the region.

Ethiopia, which has fought two wars with Somalia in the past 45 years, is perceived as a historically Christian nation, though Muslims now make up nearly half its population.

"Hasn't anyone heard of Iraq?" said John Prendergast, a senior analyst with the International Crisis Group in Washington. "A military strategy of 'countering terrorism' never works and will likely blow up in their faces."

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi has maintained, however, that this is a war of self-defense and that dialogue has only bought the Islamic movement time to expand its control. He has repeatedly accused the Islamic movement of supporting secessionist Somali groups inside Ethiopia, and, along with the United States, has accused the movement of harboring terrorists, an allegation it has denied.

Though the United States has remained on the sidelines as the situation has deteriorated, Meles has said he has support for a defensive war from the United States, which fears that Somalia, a country without a central government since 1991, could become a new base for terrorist groups.

Opposition groups inside Ethiopia say that Meles, an increasingly authoritarian leader, has shrewdly played up the terrorism charges to win U.S. support. Based in part on intelligence out of Ethiopia, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Jendayi E. Frazer has asserted that the Islamic movement is now under the control of an al-Qaeda cell, a claim that regional analysts believe is exaggerated.

Although some analysts believe al-Qaeda may exert influence over some military and political leaders within the Islamic movement, they caution that the leadership is very large and complex and that claims that any one person or group is in control is a misunderstanding of the movement.

Somalia has historically been of strategic importance to the United States because of its proximity to the Middle East and Red Sea shipping lanes. But U.S. policy there has been sharply criticized over the years.

A U.S.-led attempt to stabilize the country led to the deaths of 18 American troops in October 1993 in an incident depicted in a popular book and film, "Black Hawk Down." And more recently, the United States financed warlords in Somalia who described themselves as an "anti-terrorism coalition" but who mostly terrorized local Somalis, who came to despise them.

The Islamic Courts, initially a grouping of local clerics, came to power in that context, establishing order based on Islamic law village by village, and winning the support of businessmen and others who found the transitional government ineffective and the warlords unacceptable. Analysts say it is a measure of beleaguered Somalis' desire for order, rather than a tendency toward religious extremism, that they embraced the movement.

The movement is well financed, receiving money from the Somali diaspora and countries such as Eritrea, Yemen and others, according to a recent U.N. report.

Though the movement includes moderate leaders, it is backed by a militant core of young fighters called shebab, who have been indoctrinated with the ideology of holy war and whose leaders, analysts say, seem to have become more influential in recent months.

Analysts said the current crisis stems from another failure of U.S. policy in an increasingly vulnerable region. "All this could have been averted," Prendergast said. "If the U.S. joined a serious diplomatic effort aimed at finding a compromise between Ethiopia and the Courts, negotiations could have had a much better chance. Once the serious punching has started, it's going to be increasingly difficult to stop this brawl."

Ethiopian Jets Bomb Two Main Airports In Somalia (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia (AP) — Ethiopian jets bombed Somalia's two main airports Monday while ground troops captured three villages and a strategic border town, lending Somalia's internationally backed government crucial military aid in its struggle against a powerful Islamic militia.

DOJ_NMG_0108785

Russian-made jets swept low over the capital at midmorning, dropping two bombs on Mogadishu International Airport, part of a major escalation in the week-old fighting. The leader of the Islamic militia, Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, flew into the airport shortly after the attack; it was not clear if he was an intended target.

Airstrikes also hit Baledogle Airport outside Mogadishu.

"We heard the sound of the jets and then they pounded," said Abdi Mudey, a soldier with Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts, which has seized the capital and much of southern Somalia since June.

Somalia has not had an effective government since warlords overthrew longtime dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in 1991, pushing the country into anarchy. Two years ago, the United Nations helped set up a central government for the arid, impoverished nation on the Horn of Africa.

But the government has not been able to extend its influence outside the city of Baidoa, where it is headquartered about 140 miles northeast of Mogadishu. The country was largely under the control of warlords until this past summer, when the Islamic militia movement seized power.

Experts fear the conflict in Somalia could engulf the region. A recent U.N. report said 10 countries have been supplying arms and equipment to both sides of the conflict, using Somalia as a proxy battlefield. Some analysts also fear that the courts movement hopes to make Somalia a third front, after Afghanistan and Iraq, in militant Islam's war against the West.

The Islamic group's often severe interpretation of Islam is reminiscent, to some, of Afghanistan's Taliban regime — ousted by a U.S.-led campaign in 2001 for harboring Osama bin Laden. The U.S. government says four al-Qaeda leaders, believed to be behind the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania, are now leaders in the Islamic militia.

Militia forces have surrounded Somali government forces in Baidoa, where heavy artillery and mortar fire echoed through the streets, said Mohammed Sheik Ali, a resident reached by telephone.

But Ethiopian-backed government troops appeared to take the initiative on Monday.

Pro-government forces drove Islamic fighters out of the key border town of Belet Weyne, then headed south in pursuit of fleeing militiamen, a Somali officer said. Government troops were enforcing a curfew of 3 p.m. to 6 a.m.

"Anyone who has a gun but is not wearing a government uniform will be targeted as a terrorist," said Aden Garase, a government soldier who was put in charge of Belet Weyne.

On Ethiopian television Monday night, the defense ministry said troops would move toward the city of Jowhar, about 55 miles from Mogadishu. Later, Ethiopia made a push in that direction, capturing the villages of Bandiradley, Adadow and Galinsor, according Yusuf Ahmed Ali, a businessman in Adadow.

As its military forces advanced against militia fighters, Somalia's government also sought to seal its borders in order to prevent foreign Islamic militants from joining the Islamic courts forces.

Residents living along Somalia's coast have seen hundreds of militants arriving by boat, apparently in answer to calls by religious leaders to wage a holy war against Ethiopia.

It seems unlikely the government can blockade Somalia's 1,860-mile coastline — the longest in Africa. But the closures could hamper humanitarian aid deliveries to the country, where one in five children dies before age 5 from a preventable disease.

The U.N. World Food Program airlifted several tons of food and other aid into Somalia on Monday, but had not yet been notified of any border closings, agency spokesman Peter Smerdon said.

The Islamic militia, which grew out of a network of ad hoc Muslim courts, has brought a measure of law to a lawless country: The international airport reopened in July after being closed for a decade.

But leaders of the Islamic courts movement alarmed the country's neighbors by threatening to incorporate ethnic Somalis living in eastern Ethiopia, northeastern Kenya and Djibouti into a Greater Somalia.

Many Somalis are enraged by Ethiopian intervention because the countries have fought two wars over their disputed border in the past 45 years. Somalia is overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim, while Ethiopia has a large Christian minority.

Despite this friction, the Somali government — which has failed to assert any real control since it was formed two years ago — relies on its neighbor's military strength.

Earlier, Ethiopia had said it sent advisers to bolster the Somali government's outgunned military forces, but denied dispatching combat troops. The U.N., though, estimates that Ethiopia has 8,000 troops in the country.

Ethiopian Prime Minister Meles Zenawi said Sunday that his country was "forced to enter a war" with Somalia's Council of Islamic Courts after the group declared holy war on Ethiopia.

So far, Ethiopian and Somali troops have used MiG jet fighters and artillery to attack the Islamists, who have no military aircraft and can return fire only with much smaller mortars and recoilless rifles.

DOJ_NMG_0108786

Meles has said he does not intend to keep his forces in Somalia for long, perhaps only a few weeks. He has told visiting dignitaries that his goal is to damage the courts' military capabilities, take away their sense of invincibility and allow both sides to return to peace talks on an even footing.

Government officials and Islamic militiamen have said hundreds of people have been killed in clashes since Tuesday, but the claims could not be independently confirmed. Aid groups put the death toll in the dozens.

–

Somalia Could Be Ethiopia's Quagmire (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 26, 2006

A more involved military offensive might pose the same problems the U.S. is facing in Iraq, observers say.

NAIROBI, KENYA — Ethiopia's attacks against Islamic forces in Somalia may have delivered a short-term military victory, but analysts warned that a longer offensive could present the U.S. ally with some of the same challenges facing American forces in Iraq.

Airstrikes against the Somali capital, Mogadishu, and other towns Sunday and Monday demonstrated Ethiopia's military superiority over the Islamic forces that seized most of southern Somalia during the summer.

But Ethiopia would be hard-pressed to dispatch enough troops to capture and occupy Islamic-held areas of Somalia.

"I don't understand what Ethiopia's objective is," said David Shinn, a former U.S. ambassador to Ethiopia and now a political science professor at George Washington University. "I can't imagine their objective is to occupy and hold Somalia. It was a very limited victory."

Most experts agree that Ethiopia's battle-tested army, numbering as many as 150,000 troops, could easily beat Somalia's ragtag Islamic fighters, which are believed to total under 10,000.

But Islamists say they would compensate for their lack of numbers and sophisticated weaponry by pursuing an unconventional war, including suicide attacks and other insurgency-style tactics that U.S. and allied troops face in Iraq.

"The Ethiopians could get bogged down into a hopeless, long-term guerrilla campaign with enormous supply lines," Shinn said. "I don't see how they 'defeat' the Islamists in the long run."

The attacks Sunday and Monday marked the first time Ethiopia has publicly acknowledged taking direct military action against Somalia's Islamists.

Ethiopian officials said they acted to preempt threats by Islamic forces to launch a "holy war" against them. Ethiopia is also moving to protect Somalia's weak transitional government, which has been battling with Islamists over who will control the Horn of Africa nation.

Somalia has been without a functioning government since 1991.

Anger over the Ethiopian airstrikes reverberated Monday throughout Mogadishu. Local radio stations flooded the airwaves with nationalist songs, recalling the history of tensions between Ethiopia and Somalia, which last went to war in 1977.

Angry youths rioted in several Somali cities, urging all adult males to join the Islamic forces.

The Ethiopian attacks appeared to be bolstering support for the Islamists.

"I used to think that the Islamic courts were just another interest group, but now I recognize that they are standing up for the country and religion," said Muse Ali Omar, a banana vendor in Mogadishu.

"Ethiopia is my enemy, I will not sell bananas anymore," he said. "I will take my gun and go for jihad. Otherwise I am sure they will kill me in my banana kiosk if I wait for them here."

Mohammed Ibrahim Mohammed, a moderate Muslim, said, "As long as the West is supporting Ethiopian invasion, it will open the door for Islamic courts."

The Ethiopian strikes have helped unify the Islamic Courts Union, an alliance of religious leaders that came together to defeat U.S.-backed warlords this year. In recent months, some cracks were beginning to appear inside the alliance over how rigorously to implement Islamic law.

But more recently, U.S. and Ethiopian officials have concluded that extremists have seized control of the courts. They accuse court leaders of having links to terrorist groups, including Al Qaeda.

Last weekend, one Islamist leader issued an invitation to Muslims worldwide to join the fighting in Somalia. Eritrea is also believed to have dispatched as many as 2,000 troops to aid the Islamists.

U.S. officials Monday called on Somali groups to end their fighting, but they did not call for an Ethiopian withdrawal.

"Ethiopia has genuine security concerns," said one U.S. official, adding that State Department officials have urged the Ethiopian government to use "maximum restraint."

DOJ_NMG_0108787

The U.S. has worked closely with Ethiopia, including training elements of its military, in its four-year effort to contain the spread of Islamic extremism in the Horn of Africa. U.S. officials repeatedly have denied using Ethiopia as a proxy against Somali Islamists, and have insisted that they argued against an Ethiopian invasion with officials in Addis Ababa, the Ethiopian capital.

A U.S. military official said the Pentagon, which set up a 1,500-man task force in neighboring Djibouti in 2002 because of concerns Al Qaeda-linked groups were seeking refuge in the region, has yet to take any action in response to the Ethiopian offensive.

"We're just watching it," the official said.

Shinn said international leaders should immediately intervene and push to remove all foreign fighters from Somalia.

"A week ago I was still optimistic that we could get this cat back in the box," he said. "Now I'm not clear if that's an option."

edmund.sanders@latimes.com

Times staff writer Peter Spiegel in Washington and special correspondent Abukar Albadri in Mogadishu contributed to this report.

Israel Approves West Bank Roadblock Removals (USAT)

By Yaakov Katz

USA Today, December 25, 2006

TEL AVIV — Israel is boosting support for moderate Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas as his Fatah Party and the ruling militant Hamas government wage an increasingly violent battle for control of the Palestinian territories.

On Monday, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert approved in principle the removal of some army roadblocks that have hindered Palestinian travel in the West Bank "to strengthen moderate (Palestinian) elements," according to a statement from Olmert's office.

Olmert, who met with Abbas for the first time in Jerusalem on Saturday, pledged to transfer $100 million in tax money Israel had been withholding to the Palestinians, his office said. Israel also will transfer $8 million to Palestinian-run hospitals in Jerusalem, Abbas aide Saeb Erekat said.

The goodwill gestures could lead to resumption of peace talks after years of hostility between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Olmert said Monday that his weekend meeting with Abbas would "hopefully lead to additional meetings."

Shlomo Dror, spokesman for the Israeli Coordinator of Activities in the Territories, said the diplomatic "quartet" seeking to facilitate Middle East peace talks — the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia — transferred $450 million this year in direct aid to Abbas, not to the Hamas-led government's offices.

Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist, took office in March after beating Fatah in elections in January. After the victory, the United States and the EU cut off direct aid to the Palestinian government. Both say Hamas is a terrorist group.

"The money is not transferred to the government ministries since they are controlled by Hamas," Dror said. "Rather, the money goes directly to bank accounts controlled by Abbas in Ramallah under European supervision."

The United States has set aside about $42 million to fund a program that trains Abbas' Presidential Guard. The program seeks to restructure Fatah and gives electoral training and strategic advice to moderate parties.

Hamas accuses the United States of trying to overthrow the Palestinian government. "The U.S. is trying to bring down our government by undermining us politically and economically," spokesman Ghazi Hamad said in an interview from Gaza. "By not giving us money, they are essentially acting against an elected government."

Micaela Schweitzer-Bluhm, spokeswoman for the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem said, "The Hamas government is responsible for its situation by not participating in international norms of governing and by not meeting previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinian Authority."

The lack of foreign funding has forced Hamas to smuggle cash in suitcases into Gaza to meet expenses such as salaries for government and security personnel. Two weeks ago, Israel closed the crossing from Egypt into Gaza after Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh tried to carry in $35 million.

Gidi Grinstein, head of the Reut Institute, a think tank in Tel Aviv, said Israel and the United States should beware of "overembracing" Abbas and other moderates because such support could cause Palestinians to turn against the Palestinian president. "The Palestinians live with an eternal fear that everything is a conspiracy against them," Grinstein said.

Hamas spokesman Hamad says Palestinians will see through attempts to bolster Abbas and will vote for Hamas in the next elections. He says Abbas has received nearly $100 million in backdoor donations in addition to official aid. "The money will not weaken Hamas, and if the Americans think it will, then they are deceiving themselves," he says. "People support us not through money, but through views and honesty, and money cannot buy integrity."

Contributing: The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0108788

Olmert Says He'd Like To Renew Talks With Syria (AP)

AP, December 25, 2006

JERUSALEM (AP) — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Monday said he would like to renew peace talks with Syria, but insisted that Damascus first end its support of anti-Israel militant groups in the Palestinian areas and Lebanon.

Syria has said on several occasions recently that it would like to resume negotiations with Israel, which broke down seven years ago. Olmert has rejected the offers, citing Syria's support for Hamas, Lebanese Hezbollah guerrillas and other militant groups.

"I hope we will be able to arrive at dialogue with Syria at some point if Syria upholds the most basic of commitments, the cessation of violence — the same commitment we demand of anyone we talk to," Olmert told a meeting of lawmakers from his Kadima party.

"If Syria agrees to stop the violence, stop its support for Hamas, stop its support for Hezbollah, and sever its appalling connection with Iran, then we'll be able to engage in a diplomatic process," Olmert added. "I have no doubt that this is something we want to happen."

Syria hosts headquarters of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, Palestinian militant groups committed to Israel's destruction, and offers financial and logistical support to Hezbollah, which battled the Israeli army to a stalemate during a 34-day war last summer.

There was no immediate reaction from Syria to Olmert's latest comments. The recent Baker-Hamilton report submitted to the White House recommended that Israel resume talks with Syria to help ease Mideast tensions. Olmert has rejected the report's conclusions.

Israeli officials have been divided over whether Assad's latest gestures are sincere. A senior military intelligence official said Monday that he believes the Syrian offer is genuine, lawmakers said.

Brig. Gen. Yossi Baidatz, head of military intelligence's research decision, told parliament's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee that Syria is interested in talks to boost its international standing, said committee member Yuval Steinitz.

But the officer stopped short of saying Syria is interested in a peace agreement, committee members said.

Steinitz said he thinks Syria wants to open negotiations to buy itself time to topple the government in neighboring Lebanon. Syria controlled its smaller neighbor for 29 years before being forced to withdraw its troops in 2005.

Last week, Meir Dagan, director of the Mossad spy agency, took the opposite view of Baidatz's, saying Syria was not prepared to return to the negotiating table, despite its overtures.

Peace talks between Israel and Syria broke down in January 2000 over Syria's demand for a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Israel captured the plateau, which overlooks northern Israel, in the 1967 Mideast War.

DOJ_NMG_0108789

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 26, 2006 9:37 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, December 23, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061223.pdf; agnb061223.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Iraqi-Trained Terrorists Could Be Planning Terror Attacks On Europe, US....2
NYPD Seeks Study On Train Tunnels' Vulnerability To Terrorism....2
Judge Attributes "Significant Responsibility" To Iran For Khobar Towers Bombing....2

Homeland Response:

DHS Releases New Chemical Plant Security Rules....3
DHS Admits Secure Flight Privacy Violations....3

War News:

Gates Sees "Broad Agreement" On Having Iraqis Take Lead....3
Al Qaeda Allies Claim Wider Base Of Support In Iraq....4
Five US Soldiers Killed In Iraq....4
Shia Begin To Remake Baghdad....4
Iraqi Citizens Sue Over Oil For Food Bank, Wheat Exporter....4
Flurry Of Calls Over Draft Reaches Spokesman....5

Corporate Scandals:

Siemens CEO Remains Positive....5
Justice Investigates Minerals Management Service....5
Potential Conflict Of Interest Seen For US Attorney....6
Smartmatic Blames US Scrutiny For Sale Of Voting-Machine Company....6

Criminal Law:

Nifong Drops Rape Charges In Duke Lacrosse Case....6
Bush's Pardon List Includes Several Never Sentenced To Jail....6

Civil Law:

Federal Appeals Court Sides With FEMA On Restart Of Katrina Housing Program....6

Civil Rights:

Pennsylvania At Risk Of Losing House Seat At Next Reapportionment....7
Abortion Case Brought By Departing Kansas AG Thrown Out....7
Justice Report Offers "Nightmarish Picture" Of Lubbock State School....7

Antitrust:

Murdoch Announces Agreement To Sell DirecTV Stake To Liberty....8
Dicks Sporting Goods Receives Antitrust Approval For Golf Galaxy Acquisition....8
Judge Asked To Unseal MediaNews Antitrust Documents....8

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Court Strikes Down Bush Administration Clean Air Regulations....8
Ninth Circuit Panel Halves Damages Stemming From Exxon Valdez Spill....8

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Probe Into Stevens' Son Could Be Expanding....9

Immigration:

ICE Has Repatriated 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Past Two Weeks....9

Congress-Administration:

Attorneys Detail Potential Pitfalls For Witnesses In Congressional Hearings....9

Other News:

Edwards, Obama Tied For Lead, Clinton Fourth, In Iowa Caucus Poll....9
McCain Leads Giuliani By One Point In Iowa Caucus Poll....10
Aide Says Romney Presidential Run Will Begin In Early January....10
Rice Says US Ready To Elect Black President....10
WPost Laments Shrinking Presidential Field, But Also Gilmore Candidacy....10

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington....10

Other:.....10

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages.....10

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Iraqi-Trained Terrorists Could Be Planning Terror Attacks On Europe, US. ABC World News (12/22, story 4, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "British officials are on edge tonight concerning about a possible imminent terrorist attack. Intelligence sources tell ABC News that al Qaeda operatives in Britain are being encouraged to strike during the Christmas holidays. Britain's top policeman said he has no intelligence about exactly when an attack may occur, but counterterrorism police have never been busier." ABC went on to report, "One of the reasons British officials are anxious involves a new threat. Hundreds of European Muslims traveled to Iraq to join the insurgency, and ABC News learns intelligence officials fear some foreign fighters may return to Europe to execute attacks, and the US could be at risk as well. A new State Department report obtained by ABC News says foreign fighters in Iraq include Islamic radicals 'from France, Germany, Italy, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.' The report calls them 'Iraq war alumni' and concludes the 'radicalization is a high risk to US interests.' A major concern: those radicals will return from Iraq as heroes and may find fertile recruiting ground in Europe."

The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 7, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The police chief in London said today that al Qaeda might be planning a Christmastime attack." The AP (12/22) reports Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Ian Blair "said al-Qaeda represented the gravest threat to Britain since World War II and was of an 'unparalleled nature and growing.' 'The threat of another terrorist attempt is ever present,' he told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. 'Christmas is a period when that might happen. We have no specific intelligence to do (with) that.'"

NYPD Seeks Study On Train Tunnels' Vulnerability To Terrorism. The New York Times (12/23, B5, Neuman, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reports New York police commissioner Ray Kelly "said yesterday that he had asked the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to turn over a copy of a security analysis of the PATH train tubes beneath the Hudson River that shows they might be more vulnerable than previously thought to a small but powerful bomb. Mr. Kelly's request came after a government official provided a draft summary of the analysis to The New York Times because the official was concerned that the Port Authority had not acted with sufficient urgency in its response to the findings. The findings were presented to senior managers at the agency, which runs the PATH trains, last month, the official said." Kelly "called the new data on the PATH tubes 'a cause for concern,' although he said he believed the trains were safe." The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 7, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "a government report says train tunnels between New York and New Jersey are vulnerable to an attack. The report, obtained by the New York Times, warns a small bomb could trigger a flood inside those tunnels. The Port Authority, which operates the tunnels, insists they are safe."

Judge Attributes "Significant Responsibility" To Iran For Khobar Towers Bombing. The New York Times (12/23, A13, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "A federal trial judge ruled Friday that the government of Iran bore significant responsibility for the June 25, 1996, bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, and ordered Tehran to pay more than $253 million in damages to surviving family members of many of the American airmen killed there. Judge Royce C. Lamberth overturned an earlier ruling by a United States magistrate judge who had found that there was insufficient evidence to tie Iran to the terrorist attack, in which 19 military service members were killed. In this case, as in several similar lawsuits, Iran did not participate in the trial, holding that as a sovereign government it could not be sued in an American court." Lambeth "ruled that Iran lacked sovereign immunity under the law, which was amended about 10 years ago to cover acts of terrorism, and entered a default judgment — that is, a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs because there was no response from the other side." He "was persuaded of Iran's involvement by testimony from Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the F.B.I., who had taken a deep personal interest in the investigation, and from the bureau's former deputy chief counterterrorism official, Dale Watson."

DOJ_NMG_0108792

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Releases New Chemical Plant Security Rules. The Washington Post (12/23, A22, 690K) reports, "The nation's chemical companies would have to submit to new security inspections and provide the government with plans for protecting themselves from terrorist attacks under proposed rules released yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security. The rules, scheduled to take effect April 4, closely follow the recommendations of the chemical industry and result from legislation President Bush signed into law in October. Companies would be required to assess their own vulnerabilities and provide the government with plans for fixing them under the new rules, which were released for public comment. Industry representatives welcomed their arrival." According to the Post, Democrats "view the new rules as too soft on industry and have sought to require manufacturers, in some cases, to replace toxic materials with safer but more expensive substitutes."

DHS Admits Secure Flight Privacy Violations. The AP (12/22) reports DHS "admitted Friday it violated the Privacy Act two years ago by obtaining more commercial data about U.S. airline passengers than it had announced it would. Seventeen months ago, the Government Accountability Office, Congress' auditing arm, reached the same conclusion: The department's Transportation Security Administration 'did not fully disclose to the public its use of personal information in its fall 2004 privacy notices as required by the Privacy Act.' Even so, in a report Friday on the testing of TSA's Secure Flight domestic air passenger screening program, the Homeland Security department's privacy office acknowledged TSA didn't comply with the law. But the privacy office still couldn't bring itself to use the word 'violate.' Instead, the privacy office said, 'TSA announced one testing program, but conducted an entirely different one.'" TSA spokesman Christopher White "noted the GAO's earlier conclusions and said, 'TSA has already implemented or is in the process of implementing each of the DHS privacy office recommendations.'"

CNET News.com (12/23, McCullagh) adds, "The Transportation Security Agency, operating under the auspices of Homeland Security, had publicly pledged two years ago--in official notices describing the Secure Flight program--that it "will not receive" or have access to dossiers on American travelers compiled by a Beltway contractor. That promise turned out to be untrue, according to a report published Friday by DHS' privacy office. The commercial data 'made its way directly to TSA, contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program,' the report says. … The report, and a second one critiquing a government database called Matrix, was released on the last business day before Christmas, a tactic that federal agencies and publicly traded companies sometimes use to avoid drawing attention to critical findings. Neither report appears on the DHS.gov or TSA.gov home pages, or even on the home page of the DHS privacy office, but rather was linked to from a subpage on the DHS privacy site."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Sees "Broad Agreement" On Having Iraqis Take Lead. The New York Times (12/23, A12, Cloud, O'Neil, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Friday that American and Iraqi officials were in 'broad strategic agreement' about how to address the violence here, and he stressed that success 'will only be achieved with a joint effort with the Iraqis taking the lead.' The Times adds, "The policy review has created tensions between White House officials who have been pressing for a so-called surge — the temporary addition of American troops to quell violence in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar Province — and military leaders, who have warned that the move could slow the rate at which Iraqi troops move to the forefront." Gates "seemed to emphasize the need for Iraqi troops to play a larger part, saying that he was impressed with the Iraqi government's determination 'to take a leadership role in dealing with some of these security problems and then economic reconstruction.'"

The Financial Times (12/23, Negus) reports, "US commanders in Baghdad are understood to have told Mr Gates what the joint chiefs in the Pentagon have already concluded: that a surge in troop levels would be counter-productive because it could not be sustained for a long period, and would reduce the pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian militias. While it is unclear whether Mr Gates will endorse the views of military leaders, Mr Bush this week side-stepped a question about whether he would ignore the advice of his commanders." However, the Los Angeles Times (12/23, Barnes, 850K) has a different take, saying in a front-page report that "op U.S. military commanders in Iraq have decided to recommend a 'surge' of fresh American combat forces, eliminating one of the last remaining hurdles to proposals being considered by President Bush for a troop increase."

DOJ_NMG_0108793

Lawmakers Might Resist "New Way Forward." The Los Angeles Times (12/23, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "As President Bush considers whether to temporarily boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, few members of Congress are stepping forward forcefully to promote the idea," mostly reacting with a "mix of silence, skepticism and outright opposition. ... Some members of Congress are asking what mission the troops would be charged with performing and questioning the likelihood of success."

Al Qaeda Allies Claim Wider Base Of Support In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/23, A17, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Forces allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed yesterday to have broadened their base of support among Iraqi Sunnis, saying that 70 percent of tribal sheiks and a number of previously independent insurgent groups have pledged allegiance to what has been called the Islamic State of Iraq under its emir, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi." An audiotape "attributed to Baghdadi and released on the Internet invited officers in ousted president Saddam Hussein's disbanded army to join the insurgents. ... Since the death last summer of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the brutal leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, once-disparate Sunni insurgent groups have portrayed themselves as increasingly unified, with political as well as military goals. ... The insurgents appear well aware of the Bush administration's current policy review, saying that U.S. military forces in Iraq are staggering and 'starting to look for flight.'"

Insurgents Offer US 30-Day Truce. CNN.com (12/22) reports that in the tape "a speaker identified as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahideen Shura Council, said that if U.S. forces begin withdrawing from Iraq immediately and leave their heavy weaponry behind, 'we will allow your withdrawal to complete without anyone targeting you with any explosive or anything else.'"

AFP (12/23) also reports the offer, saying, "Abu Omar al-Baghdadi also charged that Washington had attempted to open communications through Saudi intermediaries but said he had rebuffed the overture, in the voice recording whose authenticity could not immediately be verified."

Five US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The Iraq death toll for December was mentioned by both CBS and NBC. The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "December's been another especially deadly month for American forces in Iraq. Today the military announced five more deaths in Anbar province. That brings the total for the month to 76." NBC Nightly News (12/22, story 3, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) ran a similar brief item, and the Washington Post (12/23, A17, Trejos, 690K) and the Washington Times/AP (12/23, Torchia) also have reports.

Shiites Begin To Remake Baghdad. The New York Times (12/23, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Large portions of Baghdad have become Shiite in recent months, as militias press their fight against Sunni militants deeper into the heart of the capital, displacing thousands of Sunni residents. At least 10 neighborhoods that a year ago were mixed Sunni and Shiite are now almost entirely Shiite, according to residents, American and Iraqi military commanders and local officials. For the first years of the war, Sunni militants were dominant, forcing Shiites out of neighborhoods and systematically killing bakers, barbers and trash collectors, who were often Shiites. But starting in February, after the bombing of a shrine in the city of Samarra, Shiite militias began to strike back ... Sunnis have grown suspicious [of the 'Shiite-dominated government"s promises]." The Times adds, "The debate reaches to the heart of the American enterprise here. While President Bush is considering more troops, some in the Shiite-dominated government say the Americans should stay out of the sectarian fight in Baghdad and let the battle run its course." Meanwhile, Sunni Arabs contend "that an emboldened [Shiite] fringe will conduct broader killings without being stopped by the government, or, some fear, with its help. That could, in turn, draw Sunni countries into the fight and lead to a protracted regional war, precisely the outcome that Americans most fear."

Iraqi Citizens Sue Over Oil For Food Bank, Wheat Exporter. The AP (12/23, Neumeister) reports, "[Seven] Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying they were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted. ... The suit, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks at least $200 million in damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act." The suit "said the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003." The Washington Post (12/23, A10, 690K) runs an abbreviated version of the story.

DOJ_NMG_0108794

Flurry Of Calls Over Draft Reaches Spokesman. The New York Times (12/23, A14, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports on Dick Flahavan, the "de facto media contact" for Selective Service: "With the military draft out of business since 1973, the Selective Service just doesn't get a lot of calls these days. But by midday Friday, Mr. Flahavan's office had fielded dozens of inquiries, not just from reporters but from some anxious parents as well, all with some variation of the same urgent question: Are you reinstituting the draft?" Calls resulted from "a Hearst wire service article noting that the Selective Service was making plans for a 'mock' draft exercise that would use computerized models to determine how, if necessary, the government would get some 100,000 young adults to report to their local draft boards. ... With President Bush saying that he wants to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps, the military strained near the breaking point and the secretary of veterans affairs suggesting publicly this week that a reconstituted draft could 'benefit' the country, even the notion of a mock exercise seemed to strike a nerve." The Times adds, "Although senior military officers agree that the armed forces are stretched, they also agree that a return to the draft is not the best way to fill the ranks."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens CEO Remains Positive. Financial Times (12/23, Milne) reports, "Fighting to save his reputation - and that of Europe's largest engineering group - amid a €420m ($553m) bribery scandal," Siemens CEO Klaus Kleinfeld "has already had to undergo the indignity of giving up a 30 per cent pay rise and becoming perhaps the most unpopular manager in Germany after a former division became insolvent. … But in an interview over lunch at the German group's Munich headquarters Mr Kleinfeld strikes a bullish note, annus horribilis or not. … Mr Kleinfeld is adamant that the Nokia deal will go ahead - almost certainly without financial penalties for Siemens. But there is little doubt that he is taxed by the bribery scandal and the bashing Siemens' reputation has received as a result. Mr Kleinfeld says he is determined not only that the truth comes out about what happened but that 'five years down the road I want people to say that Siemens [sets] an example for a transparent company.'"

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, B4, Esterl, 2.04M) reported, "Siemens AG Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld said he is hopeful the financial scope of alleged fraud at the German conglomerate will shrink from the €420 million ($553 million) in transactions the company has identified as suspicious. Mr. Kleinfeld defended top management's role in the money-laundering and bribery investigation, saying that Europe's largest engineering company by sales has tightened compliance procedures in recent years. But he also acknowledged that the investigation, which has forced the delay of a €16 billion merger of the telecommunications equipment divisions of Siemens and Finland's Nokia Corp., has exposed shortcomings in corporate governance at the German company."

Justice Investigates Minerals Management Service. The Midland (TX) Reporter-Telegram (12/23) reports, "The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property. The new investigations are still in the early stages, said congressional officials who were briefed earlier this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator." They "are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters. … That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the FBI."

DOJ_NMG_0108795

Potential Conflict Of Interest Seen For US Attorney. The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/23, Thornton, 324K) reports, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is, or was, a longtime client of financial adviser and pension whistle-blower Diann Shipione – a relationship that some lawyers said raises the specter of conflict of interest. Shipione, a vice president at UBS Financial, an investment banking and securities firm, is likely to be a key witness in the federal case brought by Lam's office against five former San Diego pension officials. Defense attorneys said Lam may have been improperly influenced by Shipione and that the entire case is tainted as a result. They said they intend to investigate and possibly seek dismissal of the case, but some legal experts said that without proof of egregious misconduct, such a severe remedy is unlikely."

Smartmatic Blames US Scrutiny For Sale Of Voting-Machine Company. Financial Times (12/23, Kirchgaessner) reports, "A company with ties to Venezuela yesterday blamed Washington's increasing scrutiny of foreign acquisitions of US assets for its decision to sell a California-based voting-machine company it acquired last year. The move by Smartmatic comes months after the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US (Cfius) opened an investigation into the national security implications of the company's ownership of Sequoia, a supplier of voting machines used in US elections. The inter-agency committee took the unusual step of investigating the deal months after it was completed, when a New York congresswoman, Carolyn Maloney, wrote to the then Treasury secretary, John Snow, with questions about the deal and whether the company had ties to the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nifong Drops Rape Charges In Duke Lacrosse Case. The New York Times (12/23, Barstow, Wilson, 1.16M) reports, "The Durham district attorney dropped rape charges against three former Duke lacrosse players on Friday, but he said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges that carry equally stiff sentences. The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, who has faced relentless and rising criticism for his handling of the case, said he dismissed the rape charges because the accuser had begun to waver on crucial details." The Times adds, "[H]is decision, coming in a case that has already transfixed and divided this state and much of the nation, also intensified questions about Mr. Nifong himself. Since the first frenzied weeks of this case, Mr. Nifong's judgment has repeatedly come under fire. Defense lawyers, defendants' families and friends, bloggers and many experts have attacked him for making early outspoken comments about the case, setting up a lineup that violated police procedures, failing to interview the woman himself and sitting on evidence favorable to the defendants. Above all, they say, he ignored his basic obligation to seek the truth."

Bush's Pardon List Includes Several Never Sentenced To Jail. The Washington Times (12/23, 88K) reports President Bush "ave a pre-Christmas gift to 17 minor criminals, but even after adding these pardons and one sentence commutation to his record he remains one of the least-forgiving of presidents. Six of the federal offenses involved in the 16 pardons and one commutation issued Thursday were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes. Seven of the 17 weren't even sent to prison or jail, getting probation, small fines or other penalties instead. The longest sentence was nine years, for aiding cocaine distribution, followed by a six-year term for conspiracy to possess marijuana. With this batch, Mr. Bush has issued 113 pardons and commuted three sentences in his nearly six years in the White House, according to spokesman Tony Fratto."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Appeals Court Sides With FEMA On Restart Of Katrina Housing Program. The Washington Post (12/23, A22, Apuzzo, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court told the Bush administration yesterday that it does not need to immediately restart a housing program for thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims. The ruling by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit puts a restart on hold at least until March, when the court will hear arguments in the case. The court suspended an order by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who said last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency violated the Constitution when it eliminated short-term housing assistance. … Under Leon's order, FEMA told officials in Texas early this week to expect federal money for housing about 4,200 evacuees. Yesterday's ruling means FEMA can advise Texas that plans have changed." The New York Times (12/23, A14, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Last spring, FEMA began notifying thousands of families who were given emergency shelter after the storms that they did not qualify for long-term help in the form of rent and utility payments, shocking many families who had been given housing vouchers good for a year." The Houston Chronicle (12/23, Reinert, Carroll, 530K) reports, "The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, or ACORN, sued FEMA in August for failing to adequately explain why the housing benefits were ending. … In addition to the rental subsidies, estimated at $750 per family per month, Leon was pushing FEMA to make back payments for September, October and November. He also ordered the agency to explain to the evacuees why the assistance was denied in the first place and what they are required to do to reinstate it."

DOJ_NMG_0108796

Louisiana Officials Upset By Distribution Of FEMA Housing Grants. The New York Times (12/23, A14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "FEMA trailers, the cramped, impersonal housing units that have come to define the federal response to major disasters, may be on the way out, thanks to $388 million in federal grants, announced Friday, that will test half a dozen cozier, more permanent models of postdisaster housing. … Mississippi came out on top in the contest for the grants, receiving $280.8 million, compared with $74.5 million for Louisiana, $16.5 million for Texas and $15.7 million for Alabama. Officials in Louisiana were furious, saying their state, which suffered the greatest losses in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year, had been shortchanged." Sen. Mary Landrieu is quoted as saying, ""FEMA has clearly learned very little from its mistakes, let alone basic math or a sense of fundamental fairness." However, FEMA officials "said Mississippi's big share simply reflected the creativity of its plans, as the financing was awarded competitively, based on how quickly the new models could be set up, how comfortable and safe they would be and how much they would cost, among other factors."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pennsylvania At Risk Of Losing House Seat At Next Reapportionment. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/23, Fifield, 385K) reports, "New U.S. census data could mean the loss of congressional clout for both Pennsylvania and New Jersey and drops the Garden State from among the nation's 10-most-populous states." If the House "were reapportioned based on the numbers, Pennsylvania would be among seven states to lose a seat," while New Jersey would hold all of its 13 seats. Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, and Ohio "also would shed seats, while Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah would each gain one and Texas would pick up two."

Nevada Now Fastest-Growing State. NBC Nightly News (12/22, story 8, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It has taken 19 years but tonight, Nevada has been knocked out of first place as the fastest-growing state in America. The new fastest growing state in the nation: not Nevada, it's in Arizona, according to the US Census Bureau's latest population report, which shows some 32,000 immigrants moving there, along with four times as many people relocating from California and elsewhere. Nevada is now the second-fastest growing state, followed by Idaho, Georgia and Texas. At the other end of the spectrum, losing population were Washington, D.C., along with Rhode Island, New York, and Louisiana, which by the way, lost more people than any other state largely because of Hurricane Katrina."

Abortion Case Brought By Departing Kansas AG Thrown Out. The Washington Post (12/23, A3, Hegeman, 690K) reports Kansas Attorney General Phil Kline "charged a well-known abortion provider Friday with illegally performing late-term abortions, but a Sedgwick County judge threw out the charges only hours later. Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges against George Tiller at the request of Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston, who said her office had not been consulted." Kline, "who lost his reelection bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, said he would try to get Clark to reinstate the charges."

Justice Report Offers "Nightmarish Picture" Of Lubbock State School. The Dallas Morning News/AP (12/23, Peterson) reports, "Shoddy health care, substantial neglect and harmful treatment techniques have jeopardized the lives of Lubbock State School residents, federal investigators said in a report that criticized nearly every part of the facility. The U.S. Department of Justice report paints a nightmarish picture of the facility that cares for about 350 people with mental retardation and developmental disabilities. … Michael Jones, a spokesman for the state agency that oversees the state school, said he could not comment on the report's contents because 'it's still a potential legal matter.' But he would say the facility has a new management team that has worked hard to improve training and hire more medical professionals."

DOJ_NMG_0108797

ANTITRUST:

Murdoch Announces Agreement To Sell DirecTV Stake To Liberty. USA Today (12/22, Lieberman, 2.27M) reported, "On Friday — three years, to the day, after News Corp. (NWS) took control of DirecTV — CEO Rupert Murdoch announced an agreement to turn over his controlling 38.5% interest in the No. 1 satellite company, as well as three regional sports networks and $550 million in cash, to Liberty in exchange for its 16.3% stake in News Corp. The deal, which values Liberty's shares at about $11 billion, ends a potential threat to Murdoch's control of News Corp. that Malone posed after he acquired his voting shares two years ago. Executives expect the deal to close in the middle of 2007 following approvals from News Corp. shareholders, federal antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission."

Murdoch, Malone Now Free To "Pursue Broader Ambitions." The Los Angeles Times (12/23, Menn, 850K) reports that the "long-awaited agreement…frees" Murdoch and Liberty CEO John Malone to each "pursue broader ambitions in his medium of choice. Murdoch expects faster growth in the Internet business than he does in U.S. satellite TV distribution." The Times writes, "By solidifying control of News Corp., Murdoch can more easily seek out deals like the 2005 acquisition of the MySpace.com social networking site. Meanwhile, Malone is unlikely to settle for the investment in El Segundo-based DirecTV Group Inc. that he gets from Murdoch."

Dicks Sporting Goods Receives Antitrust Approval For Golf Galaxy Acquisition. The AP (12/22) reported, "Dick's Sporting Goods Inc. on Friday said federal authorities have approved its pending $225 million acquisition of Golf Galaxy Inc. The companies agreed to the takeover in November, under which Dick's will pay Golf Galaxy shareholders $18.82 per share in cash."

Judge Asked To Unseal MediaNews Antitrust Documents. The Eureka Reporter (12/23) reports, "A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle. The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Court Strikes Down Bush Administration Clean Air Regulations. The Washington Post (12/23, A10, Heilprin, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court yesterday struck down the Bush administration's strategy for reducing smog, ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency's rules for forcing state cleanups do not meet requirements of the Clean Air Act. Judge Judith W. Rogers, writing for the three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said, 'EPA has failed to heed the restrictions on its discretion set forth in the Act.' The court ordered the agency to come up with another enforcement plan. … EPA in 2004 issued new smog standards requiring 474 counties, with about 159 million people living in them, to reduce pollution of smog-causing ozone and improve the air enough to meet federal health standards. The agency gave them three to 17 years to do so. The appellate panel said that was too long. It also said the agency was allowing 'backsliding' by states when it should have been directing them to order new emission controls on industrial plants, more public transportation, tougher vehicle-inspection programs or cleaner-burning gasoline."

Ninth Circuit Panel Halves Damages Stemming From Exxon Valdez Spill. The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 5, 0:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The world's biggest oil company got an early Christmas present today." The New York Times (12/23, A17, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "A federal appeals panel on Friday cut nearly in half the $4.5 billion punitive damage award against Exxon Mobil as a result of the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989. A majority of a three-judge panel said the company's negligent conduct, while 'particularly egregious,' was not intentional and did not warrant the maximum financial penalty that a lower court imposed. The panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, split on applying legal precedents to the company responsible for the worst oil spill in United States history. It cut the award for punitive damages to $2.5 billion." The Washington Post (12/23, D1, Kravets, 690K) reports, "The case, one of the nation's longest-running noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were damaged when the Exxon Valdez tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil. It is the third time the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive in light of U.S. Supreme Court precedent."

DOJ_NMG_0108798

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Probe Into Stevens' Son Could Be Expanding. On its web site, Roll Call (12/22, Stanton) reports, "In a move that could signal a widening of the investigation into the son of Sen. Ted Stevens," federal investigators probing Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens "have issued a host of subpoenas to fishing industry executives and trade associations in Seattle, Alaska and Washington, D.C., sources familiar with the investigation said. Federal investigators with the FBI and the Department of Justice have been looking into Ben Stevens for at least a year as part of a broader ethics probe of a group of state lawmakers." The scandal "has swept up some of the state's most powerful families and companies, including the Stevenses, energy industry giant VECO Corp. and other entities in the oil and gas sector." But there is "no evidence that federal investigators are targeting Ted Stevens or any other Member of Congress in the investigation."

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Has Repatriated 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Past Two Weeks. The Washington Times (12/23, Seper, 88K) reports U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents "removed more than 2,300 illegal aliens from the country in the past two weeks on 35 flights to the Caribbean, Latin America, Asia and Africa -- one of the busiest periods of the year for ICE's Office of Detention and Removal Operations. Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said 852 of those removed had criminal records, and that another 21 flights this week will take 2,087 aliens to Central America and the Caribbean, including 515 who are criminal aliens. … In fiscal 2006, ICE removed more than 186,600 illegal aliens from the country, a record for the agency and a 10 percent increase over the number of removals during the previous fiscal year. More than 50,000 of them were repatriated to Central American and Caribbean Basin countries."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Attorneys Detail Potential Pitfalls For Witnesses In Congressional Hearings. In a "Rule of Law" column appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/23, A9, 2.04M) Adam Goldberg and Preston Burton, partners at Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, write, "As corporate America steels itself for an onslaught of investigations by the Democratically controlled Congress, consultants are busy advising companies on how best to prepare for and get through them. While one can do much to manage the fallout, navigating one of these investigations is a lot like surfing. Regardless of what you do, the biggest factor is still the size and nature of the wave. On this score, witnesses called before Congress have few protections." They note that Congress "does not necessarily recognize the attorney-client privilege and the protections that it gives individuals and companies," that there is a "very limited right to counsel," that "there is effectively no limit to what Congress can subpoena, or do with the information that it has obtained," and that "every now and then Congress appears to set a 'perjury trap' -- asking or compelling a witness to testify and then making a criminal referral for perjury to the Department of Justice when that witness fails to remember something or remembers something incorrectly."

OTHER NEWS:

Edwards, Obama Tied For Lead, Clinton Fourth, In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Research 2000 Iowa Poll surveyed 400 likely 2008 Iowa Democratic caucus goers (+/- 5%) over December 18-20. John Edwards and Sen. Barack Obama are tied at 22% each, followed by Gov. Tom Vilsack at 12%, Sen. Hillary Clinton 10%, Al Gore 7%, Sen. John Kerry 5%, Wesley Clark 4%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 4%, Sen. Evan Bayh 1%, Sen. Joseph Biden 1%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 1%, with 11% undecided.

DOJ_NMG_0108799

McCain Leads Giuliani By One Point In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Research 2000 Iowa Poll surveyed 400 likely 2008 Iowa Republican caucus goers (+/- 5%) over December 18-20. Sen. John McCain leads with 27%, followed by Rudy Giuliani at 26%, Gov. Mitt Romney 9%, Newt Gingrich 7%, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice 4%, Sen. George Allen 1%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Gov. Jeb Bush 1%, Gov. George Pataki 1%, Sen. Rick Santorum 1%, and Rep. Duncan Hunter 0%, with 22% undecided.

Aide Says Romney Presidential Run Will Begin In Early January. The AP (12/22) reports a "top adviser" to Gov. Mitt Romney said Romney will announce his bid for the presidency "in two phases early next month." Romney is expected to file FEC paperwork to create presidential campaign committee "as early as Jan. 2," as "as soon as the week of Jan. 8, Romney will hold a ceremony to officially declare his candidacy." The timing "is somewhat dependent on when Sen. John McCain of Arizona makes an expected announcement about his own campaign for the GOP nomination, the Romney aide said."

Rice Says US Ready To Elect Black President. The Washington Times/AP (12/23, Gearan) reports on its front page that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the US "is ready to elect a black president." Rice said in an interview, "Yes, I think a black person can be elected president." But "we should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time." The story notes that Rice "has said repeatedly she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls."

WPost Laments Shrinking Presidential Field, But Also Gilmore Candidacy. The Washington Post (12/23, A20, 690K) editorializes, "In theory, this should be the most wide-open presidential contest in decades. In reality, more than a year before the first vote, the field seems to be narrowing awfully fast. … It would be unfortunate if the departures portended a presidential race winnowed to a few almost before it begins. The country would benefit from a multitude of voices in both parties -- not just Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) on the Democratic side and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani on the Republican. … We're anxious to see some Davids tromping through the snows of Iowa and New Hampshire, not just a few big-footed Goliaths. And we'd like the voters to have some say in deciding which is which."

In a related editorial, the Washington Post (12/23, A20, 690K) says it is less than pleased that James Gilmore, "the highhanded, dissent-averse and altogether unsuccessful ex-governor of Virginia," is among those remaining in the field. The Post says, "Heaven help us. For if Mr. Gilmore does to the 50 states what he did to the Old Dominion, the federal government might as well declare bankruptcy now. … A former governor from the South, zealous about tax-cutting and allergic to opposing views, who stubbornly insists on ill-fated policies despite abundant and well-founded warnings that they are leading to ruin. Maybe this guy is presidential material after all."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule; at Camp David for Christmas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: BETHLEHEM _ 4 p.m. The Ad Hoc Committee for Bethlehem holds a procession creating a "circle of Light" around the White House to dramatize the situation in Bethlehem. Location: Lafayette Park. Contacts: Rev. Susan Wilder, 703-913-5913

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Generals: More Troops Needed In Iraq."

"Delivering Dual Benefits."

"A Sousa Band Of Indians."

DOJ_NMG_0108800

"Web Error Reveals Censure Of U.S. Judge."
"Meat And Milk From Cloning Are Safe, 2 FDA Scientists Say"
"OT Pushes Guards' Pay Past $100,000."
"'War On Christmas' Has A New Jingle: Money."

New York Times:

"District By District, Shiites Make Baghdad Their Own."
"Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In 'Broad Strategic Agreement.'"
"Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Abandoned."
"A Joint Attack On Many Perils Of Africa's Young."
"Seductively Easy, Payday Loans Often Snowball."
"In Shirt-Sleeve Holiday Season, Overcoats Linger On The Racks."
"From Scum, Perhaps The Tiniest Form Of Life."

Washington Post:

"Prosecutors Drop Duke Rape Counts."
"Va. Soldier, Tested In Combat In Iraq, Shifts Focus To Future, Family."
"Lerners Plan To Spend Millions More On Improvements To D.C. Ballpark."
"Schwarzenegger Remakes Himself As Environmentalist."
"Toyota Expects To Be World's No. 1 Automaker Next Year."

Washington Times:

"Judge Faults Iran In '96 Bombing."
"Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her."
"Ecuador's Leader To Oust U.S. From Base."
"'Entire City' Invited To Fenty's Bash."

Detroit Free Press:

"Last-Minute Michigan Holiday Shoppers Aim For Discounts."
"Toyota's '07 Sales Likely To Pass Gm's."
"Goodyear And Union End Strike."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Bolton Tapped As DeKalb Chief."
"Duke Rape Charges Dropped."
"Smooth Sailing At Airport."
"Diebold Hires Ex-Elections Chief."
"Judge Won't Delay Nichols Trial."
"Love Shack Order Delayed."

Dallas Morning News:

"Red-Light Camera Bill A Threat To City Coffers."
"Bush Library Could Mean Big Changes In Park Cities."
"Ousted Police Chief Bolton Lands New Job."
"Apartments Sue Over FB Ordinance."
"Data On 15,000 TWU Students Exposed."
"Experts: E-Cards Not Always Best."
"Mild Temps, Light Rain Expected For Weekend."

Houston Chronicle:

"Houstonian Dies In 12-Story Elevator-Shaft Fall."
"2 Houston-Area Hunting Accidents Kill 1, Injure 1."
"Feds Critical Of Safety Plan For Trailers At Refineries."
"Fallen Brazoria Soldier Helps Twin With His Dream."
"Culberson Firm On Metro Rail-Bypass Stance."
"Ex-State Ag Morales Enters Halfway House."
"New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Travel Delays; Duke Rape Case; Bush At Walter Reed; Terror Threats; Shuttle Landing; Amish Girl Goes Home; Day Care Difficulties; Person Of The Week.

CBS: Duke Rape Case; Duke Rape Case Analysis; Travel Delays; Gift Card Sales; Shuttle Landing; Terror Threats; Iraq Death Toll; Baghdad Neighborhood; Free Speech-Meaning Of Christmas; Belief In Santa Claus; Car Salesmen; Favorite Stories Of 2006.

NBC: Duke Rape Case; Travel Delays; Iraq Death Toll; Bush At Walter Reed; Military Holiday Greetings; Toyota Becomes World's Largest Automaker; Shuttle Landing; Us Population Shifts.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Iraqi-Trained Terrorists Could Be Planning Terror Attacks On Europe, US 2
NYPD Seeks Study On Train Tunnels' Vulnerability To Terrorism 2
Judge Attributes "Significant Responsibility" To Iran For Khobar Towers Bombing 2

Homeland Response:
DHS Releases New Chemical Plant Security Rules 2
DHS Admits Secure Flight Privacy Violations 3

War News:
Gates Sees "Broad Agreement" On Having Iraqis Take Lead 3
Al Qaeda Allies Claim Wider Base Of Support In Iraq 3
Five US Soldiers Killed In Iraq 4
Shia Begin To Remake Baghdad 4
Iraqi Citizens Sue Over Oil For Food Bank, Wheat Exporter 4
Flurry Of Calls Over Draft Reaches Spokesman 4

Corporate Scandals:
Siemens CEO Remains Positive 4
Justice Investigates Minerals Management Service 5
Potential Conflict Of Interest Seen For US Attorney 5
Smartmatic Blames US Scrutiny For Sale Of Voting-Machine Company 5

Criminal Law:
Nifong Drops Rape Charges In Duke Lacrosse Case 5
Bush's Pardon List Includes Several Never Sentenced To Jail 5

Civil Law:
Federal Appeals Court Sides With FEMA On Restart Of Katrina Housing Program 6

Civil Rights:
Pennsylvania At Risk Of Losing House Seat At Next Reapportionment 6
Abortion Case Brought By Departing Kansas AG Thrown Out 7
Justice Report Offers "Nightmarish Picture" Of Lubbock State School 7

Antitrust:
Murdoch Announces Agreement To Sell DirecTV Stake To Liberty 7
Dicks Sporting Goods Receives Antitrust Approval For Golf Galaxy Acquisition 7
Judge Asked To Unseal MediaNews Antitrust Documents 7

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Court Strikes Down Bush Administration Clean Air Regulations 7
Ninth Circuit Panel Halves Damages Stemming From Exxon Valdez Spill 8

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Federal Probe Into Stevens' Son Could Be Expanding 8

Immigration:
ICE Has Repatriated 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Past Two Weeks 8

Congress-Administration:
Attorneys Detail Potential Pitfalls For Witnesses In Congressional Hearings 8

Other News:
Edwards, Obama Tied For Lead, Clinton Fourth, In Iowa Caucus Poll 9
McCain Leads Giuliani By One Point In Iowa Caucus Poll 9
Aide Says Romney Presidential Run Will Begin In Early January 9
Rice Says US Ready To Elect Black President 9
WPost Laments Shrinking Presidential Field, But Also Gilmore Candidacy 9

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 9
Other: 9

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 9

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Iraqi-Trained Terrorists Could Be Planning Terror Attacks On Europe, US. ABC World News (12/22, story 4, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "British officials are on edge tonight concerning about a possible imminent terrorist attack. Intelligence sources tell ABC News that al Qaeda operatives in Britain are being encouraged to strike during the Christmas holidays. Britain's top policeman said he has no intelligence about exactly when an attack may occur, but counterterrorism police have never been busier." ABC went on to report, "One of the reasons British officials are anxious involves a new threat. Hundreds of European Muslims traveled to Iraq to join the insurgency, and ABC News learns intelligence officials fear some foreign fighters may return to Europe to execute attacks, and the US could be at risk as well. A new State Department report obtained by ABC News says foreign fighters in Iraq include Islamic radicals 'from France, Germany, Italy, Sweden, and the United Kingdom.' The report calls them 'Iraq war alumni' and concludes the 'radicalization is a high risk to US interests.' A major concern: those radicals will return from Iraq as heroes and may find fertile recruiting ground in Europe."

The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 7, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The police chief in London said today that al Qaeda might be planning a Christmastime attack." The AP (12/22) reports Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Ian Blair "said al-Qaeda represented the gravest threat to Britain since World War II and was of an 'unparalleled nature and growing.' 'The threat of another terrorist attempt is ever present,' he told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. 'Christmas is a period when that might happen. We have no specific intelligence to do (with) that.'"

NYPD Seeks Study On Train Tunnels' Vulnerability To Terrorism. The New York Times (12/23, B5, Neuman, Rashbaum, 1.16M) reports New York police commissioner Ray Kelly "said yesterday that he had asked the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to turn over a copy of a security analysis of the PATH train tubes beneath the Hudson River that shows they might be more vulnerable than previously thought to a small but powerful bomb. Mr. Kelly's request came after a government official provided a draft summary of the analysis to The New York Times because the official was concerned that the Port Authority had not acted with sufficient urgency in its response to the findings. The findings were presented to senior managers at the agency, which runs the PATH trains, last month, the official said." Kelly "called the new data on the PATH tubes 'a cause for concern,' although he said he believed the trains were safe." The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 7, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "a government report says train tunnels between New York and New Jersey are vulnerable to an attack. The report, obtained by the New York Times, warns a small bomb could trigger a flood inside those tunnels. The Port Authority, which operates the tunnels, insists they are safe."

Judge Attributes "Significant Responsibility" To Iran For Khobar Towers Bombing. The New York Times (12/23, A13, Lewis, 1.16M) reports, "A federal trial judge ruled Friday that the government of Iran bore significant responsibility for the June 25, 1996, bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, and ordered Tehran to pay more than $253 million in damages to surviving family members of many of the American airmen killed there. Judge Royce C. Lamberth overturned an earlier ruling by a United States magistrate judge who had found that there was insufficient evidence to tie Iran to the terrorist attack, in which 19 military service members were killed. In this case, as in several similar lawsuits, Iran did not participate in the trial, holding that as a sovereign government it could not be sued in an American court." Lambeth "ruled that Iran lacked sovereign immunity under the law, which was amended about 10 years ago to cover acts of terrorism, and entered a default judgment — that is, a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs because there was no response from the other side." He "was persuaded of Iran's involvement by testimony from Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the F.B.I., who had taken a deep personal interest in the investigation, and from the bureau's former deputy chief counterterrorism official, Dale Watson."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Releases New Chemical Plant Security Rules. The Washington Post (12/23, A22, 690K) reports, "The nation's chemical companies would have to submit to new security inspections and provide the government with plans for protecting themselves from terrorist attacks under proposed rules released yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security. The rules, scheduled to take effect April 4, closely follow the recommendations of the chemical industry and result from legislation President Bush signed into law in October. Companies would be required to assess their own vulnerabilities and provide the government with plans for fixing them under the new rules, which were released for public comment. Industry representatives welcomed their arrival." According to the Post, Democrats "view the new rules as too soft on industry and have sought to require manufacturers, in some cases, to replace toxic materials with safer but more expensive substitutes."

DHS Admits Secure Flight Privacy Violations. The AP (12/22) reports DHS "admitted Friday it violated the Privacy Act two years ago by obtaining more commercial data about U.S. airline passengers than it had announced it would. Seventeen months ago, the Government Accountability Office, Congress' auditing arm, reached the same conclusion: The department's Transportation Security Administration 'did not fully disclose to the public its use of personal information in its fall 2004 privacy notices as required by the Privacy Act.' Even so, in a report Friday on the testing of TSA's Secure Flight domestic air passenger screening program, the Homeland Security department's privacy office acknowledged TSA didn't comply with the law. But the privacy office still couldn't bring itself to use the word 'violate.' Instead, the privacy office said, 'TSA announced one testing program, but conducted an entirely different one.'" TSA spokesman Christopher White "noted the GAO's earlier conclusions and said, 'TSA has already implemented or is in the process of implementing each of the DHS privacy office recommendations.'"

CNET News.com (12/23, McCullagh) adds, "The Transportation Security Agency, operating under the auspices of Homeland Security, had publicly pledged two years ago--in official notices describing the Secure Flight program--that it "will not receive" or have access to dossiers on American travelers compiled by a Beltway contractor. That promise turned out to be untrue, according to a report published Friday by DHS' privacy office. The commercial data 'made its way directly to TSA, contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program,' the report says. … The report, and a second one critiquing a government database called Matrix, was released on the last business day before Christmas, a tactic that federal agencies and publicly traded companies sometimes use to avoid drawing attention to critical findings. Neither report appears on the DHS.gov or TSA.gov home pages, or even on the home page of the DHS privacy office, but rather was linked to from a subpage on the DHS privacy site."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Sees "Broad Agreement" On Having Iraqis Take Lead. The New York Times (12/23, A12, Cloud, O'Neil, 1.16M) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "said Friday that American and Iraqi officials were in 'broad strategic agreement' about how to address the violence here, and he stressed that success 'will only be achieved with a joint effort with the Iraqis taking the lead.' The Times adds, "The policy review has created tensions between White House officials who have been pressing for a so-called surge — the temporary addition of American troops to quell violence in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar Province — and military leaders, who have warned that the move could slow the rate at which Iraqi troops move to the forefront." Gates "seemed to emphasize the need for Iraqi troops to play a larger part, saying that he was impressed with the Iraqi government's determination 'to take a leadership role in dealing with some of these security problems and then economic reconstruction.'"

The Financial Times (12/23, Negus) reports, "US commanders in Baghdad are understood to have told Mr Gates what the joint chiefs in the Pentagon have already concluded: that a surge in troop levels would be counter-productive because it could not be sustained for a long period, and would reduce the pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian militias. While it is unclear whether Mr Gates will endorse the views of military leaders, Mr Bush this week side-stepped a question about whether he would ignore the advice of his commanders." However, the Los Angeles Times (12/23, Barnes, 850K) has a different take, saying in a front-page report that "op U.S. military commanders in Iraq have decided to recommend a 'surge' of fresh American combat forces, eliminating one of the last remaining hurdles to proposals being considered by President Bush for a troop increase."

Lawmakers Might Resist "New Way Forward." The Los Angeles Times (12/23, Gerstenzang, 850K) reports, "As President Bush considers whether to temporarily boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, few members of Congress are stepping forward forcefully to promote the idea," mostly reacting with a "mix of silence, skepticism and outright opposition. ... Some members of Congress are asking what mission the troops would be charged with performing and questioning the likelihood of success."

Al Qaeda Allies Claim Wider Base Of Support In Iraq. The Washington Post (12/23, A17, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Forces allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed yesterday to have broadened their base of support among Iraqi Sunnis, saying that 70 percent of tribal sheiks and a number of previously independent insurgent groups have pledged allegiance to what has been called the Islamic State of Iraq under its emir, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi." An audiotape "attributed to Baghdadi and released on the Internet invited officers in ousted president Saddam Hussein's disbanded army to join the insurgents. ... Since the death last summer of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the brutal leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, once-disparate Sunni insurgent groups have portrayed themselves as increasingly unified, with political as well as military goals. ... The insurgents appear well aware of the Bush administration's current policy review, saying that U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0108804

military forces in Iraq are staggering and 'starting to look for flight.'"

Insurgents Offer US 30-Day Truce. CNN.com (12/22) reports that in the tape "a speaker identified as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahideen Shura Council, said that if U.S. forces begin withdrawing from Iraq immediately and leave their heavy weaponry behind, 'we will allow your withdrawal to complete without anyone targeting you with any explosive or anything else.'"

AFP (12/23) also reports the offer, saying, "Abu Omar al-Baghdadi also charged that Washington had attempted to open communications through Saudi intermediaries but said he had rebuffed the overture, in the voice recording whose authenticity could not immediately be verified."

Five US Soldiers Killed In Iraq. The Iraq death toll for December was mentioned by both CBS and NBC. The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 8, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "December's been another especially deadly month for American forces in Iraq. Today the military announced five more deaths in Anbar province. That brings the total for the month to 76." NBC Nightly News (12/22, story 3, 0:25, Williams, 9.87M) ran a similar brief item, and the Washington Post (12/23, A17, Trejos, 690K) and the Washington Times/AP (12/23, Torchia) also have reports.

Shiites Begin To Remake Baghdad. The New York Times (12/23, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports on its front page, "Large portions of Baghdad have become Shiite in recent months, as militias press their fight against Sunni militants deeper into the heart of the capital, displacing thousands of Sunni residents. At least 10 neighborhoods that a year ago were mixed Sunni and Shiite are now almost entirely Shiite, according to residents, American and Iraqi military commanders and local officials. For the first years of the war, Sunni militants were dominant, forcing Shiites out of neighborhoods and systematically killing bakers, barbers and trash collectors, who were often Shiites. But starting in February, after the bombing of a shrine in the city of Samarra, Shiite militias began to strike back ... Sunnis have grown suspicious [of the 'Shiite-dominated government"s promises]." The Times adds, "The debate reaches to the heart of the American enterprise here. While President Bush is considering more troops, some in the Shiite-dominated government say the Americans should stay out of the sectarian fight in Baghdad and let the battle run its course." Meanwhile, Sunni Arabs contend "that an emboldened [Shiite] fringe will conduct broader killings without being stopped by the government, or, some fear, with its help. That could, in turn, draw Sunni countries into the fight and lead to a protracted regional war, precisely the outcome that Americans most fear."

Iraqi Citizens Sue Over Oil For Food Bank, Wheat Exporter. The AP (12/23, Neumeister) reports, "[Seven] Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying they were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted. ... The suit, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks at least $200 million in damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act." The suit "said the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003." The Washington Post (12/23, A10, 690K) runs an abbreviated version of the story.

Flurry Of Calls Over Draft Reaches Spokesman. The New York Times (12/23, A14, Lichtblau, 1.16M) reports on Dick Flahavan, the "de facto media contact" for Selective Service: "With the military draft out of business since 1973, the Selective Service just doesn't get a lot of calls these days. But by midday Friday, Mr. Flahavan's office had fielded dozens of inquiries, not just from reporters but from some anxious parents as well, all with some variation of the same urgent question: Are you reinstituting the draft?" Calls resulted from "a Hearst wire service article noting that the Selective Service was making plans for a 'mock' draft exercise that would use computerized models to determine how, if necessary, the government would get some 100,000 young adults to report to their local draft boards. ... With President Bush saying that he wants to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps, the military strained near the breaking point and the secretary of veterans affairs suggesting publicly this week that a reconstituted draft could 'benefit' the country, even the notion of a mock exercise seemed to strike a nerve." The Times adds, "Although senior military officers agree that the armed forces are stretched, they also agree that a return to the draft is not the best way to fill the ranks."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens CEO Remains Positive. Financial Times (12/23, Milne) reports, "Fighting to save his reputation - and that of Europe's largest engineering group - amid a €420m ($553m) bribery scandal," Siemens CEO Klaus Kleinfeld "has already had to undergo the indignity of giving up a 30 per cent pay rise and becoming perhaps the most unpopular manager in Germany after a former division became insolvent. … But in an interview over lunch at the German group's Munich headquarters Mr Kleinfeld strikes a bullish note, annus horribilis or not. … Mr Kleinfeld is adamant that the Nokia deal will go ahead - almost certainly without financial penalties for Siemens. But there is little doubt that he is taxed by the bribery scandal and the bashing Siemens' reputation has received as a result. Mr Kleinfeld says he is determined not only that the truth comes out about what happened but that 'five years down the road I want people to say that Siemens [sets] an example for a transparent company.'"

DOJ_NMG_0108805

The Wall Street Journal (12/22, B4, Esterl, 2.04M) reported, "Siemens AG Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld said he is hopeful the financial scope of alleged fraud at the German conglomerate will shrink from the €420 million ($553 million) in transactions the company has identified as suspicious. Mr. Kleinfeld defended top management's role in the money-laundering and bribery investigation, saying that Europe's largest engineering company by sales has tightened compliance procedures in recent years. But he also acknowledged that the investigation, which has forced the delay of a €16 billion merger of the telecommunications equipment divisions of Siemens and Finland's Nokia Corp., has exposed shortcomings in corporate governance at the German company."

Justice Investigates Minerals Management Service. The Midland (TX) Reporter-Telegram (12/23) reports, "The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property. The new investigations are still in the early stages, said congressional officials who were briefed earlier this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator." They "are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters. … That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the FBI."

Potential Conflict Of Interest Seen For US Attorney. The San Diego Union-Tribune (12/23, Thornton, 324K) reports, "U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is, or was, a longtime client of financial adviser and pension whistle-blower Diann Shipione – a relationship that some lawyers said raises the specter of conflict of interest. Shipione, a vice president at UBS Financial, an investment banking and securities firm, is likely to be a key witness in the federal case brought by Lam's office against five former San Diego pension officials. Defense attorneys said Lam may have been improperly influenced by Shipione and that the entire case is tainted as a result. They said they intend to investigate and possibly seek dismissal of the case, but some legal experts said that without proof of egregious misconduct, such a severe remedy is unlikely."

Smartmatic Blames US Scrutiny For Sale Of Voting-Machine Company. Financial Times (12/23, Kirchgaessner) reports, "A company with ties to Venezuela yesterday blamed Washington's increasing scrutiny of foreign acquisitions of US assets for its decision to sell a California-based voting-machine company it acquired last year. The move by Smartmatic comes months after the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US (Cfius) opened an investigation into the national security implications of the company's ownership of Sequoia, a supplier of voting machines used in US elections. The inter-agency committee took the unusual step of investigating the deal months after it was completed, when a New York congresswoman, Carolyn Maloney, wrote to the then Treasury secretary, John Snow, with questions about the deal and whether the company had ties to the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Nifong Drops Rape Charges In Duke Lacrosse Case. The New York Times (12/23, Barstow, Wilson, 1.16M) reports, "The Durham district attorney dropped rape charges against three former Duke lacrosse players on Friday, but he said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges that carry equally stiff sentences. The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, who has faced relentless and rising criticism for his handling of the case, said he dismissed the rape charges because the accuser had begun to waver on crucial details." The Times adds, "[H]is decision, coming in a case that has already transfixed and divided this state and much of the nation, also intensified questions about Mr. Nifong himself. Since the first frenzied weeks of this case, Mr. Nifong's judgment has repeatedly come under fire. Defense lawyers, defendants' families and friends, bloggers and many experts have attacked him for making early outspoken comments about the case, setting up a lineup that violated police procedures, failing to interview the woman himself and sitting on evidence favorable to the defendants. Above all, they say, he ignored his basic obligation to seek the truth."

Bush's Pardon List Includes Several Never Sentenced To Jail. The Washington Times (12/23, 88K)

DOJ_NMG_0108806

reports President Bush "ave a pre-Christmas gift to 17 minor criminals, but even after adding these pardons and one sentence commutation to his record he remains one of the least-forgiving of presidents. Six of the federal offenses involved in the 16 pardons and one commutation issued Thursday were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes. Seven of the 17 weren't even sent to prison or jail, getting probation, small fines or other penalties instead. The longest sentence was nine years, for aiding cocaine distribution, followed by a six-year term for conspiracy to possess marijuana. With this batch, Mr. Bush has issued 113 pardons and commuted three sentences in his nearly six years in the White House, according to spokesman Tony Fratto."

CIVIL LAW:

Federal Appeals Court Sides With FEMA On Restart Of Katrina Housing Program. The Washington Post (12/23, A22, Apuzzo, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court told the Bush administration yesterday that it does not need to immediately restart a housing program for thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims. The ruling by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit puts a restart on hold at least until March, when the court will hear arguments in the case. The court suspended an order by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who said last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency violated the Constitution when it eliminated short-term housing assistance. … Under Leon's order, FEMA told officials in Texas early this week to expect federal money for housing about 4,200 evacuees. Yesterday's ruling means FEMA can advise Texas that plans have changed." The New York Times (12/23, A14, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Last spring, FEMA began notifying thousands of families who were given emergency shelter after the storms that they did not qualify for long-term help in the form of rent and utility payments, shocking many families who had been given housing vouchers good for a year." The Houston Chronicle (12/23, Reinert, Carroll, 530K) reports, "The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, or ACORN, sued FEMA in August for failing to adequately explain why the housing benefits were ending. … In addition to the rental subsidies, estimated at $750 per family per month, Leon was pushing FEMA to make back payments for September, October and November. He also ordered the agency to explain to the evacuees why the assistance was denied in the first place and what they are required to do to reinstate it."

Louisiana Officials Upset By Distribution Of FEMA Housing Grants. The New York Times (12/23, A14, Lipton, 1.16M) reports, "FEMA trailers, the cramped, impersonal housing units that have come to define the federal response to major disasters, may be on the way out, thanks to $388 million in federal grants, announced Friday, that will test half a dozen cozier, more permanent models of postdisaster housing. … Mississippi came out on top in the contest for the grants, receiving $280.8 million, compared with $74.5 million for Louisiana, $16.5 million for Texas and $15.7 million for Alabama. Officials in Louisiana were furious, saying their state, which suffered the greatest losses in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year, had been shortchanged." Sen. Mary Landrieu is quoted as saying, ""FEMA has clearly learned very little from its mistakes, let alone basic math or a sense of fundamental fairness." However, FEMA officials "said Mississippi's big share simply reflected the creativity of its plans, as the financing was awarded competitively, based on how quickly the new models could be set up, how comfortable and safe they would be and how much they would cost, among other factors."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pennsylvania At Risk Of Losing House Seat At Next Reapportionment. The Philadelphia Inquirer (12/23, Fifield, 385K) reports, "New U.S. census data could mean the loss of congressional clout for both Pennsylvania and New Jersey and drops the Garden State from among the nation's 10-most-populous states." If the House "were reapportioned based on the numbers, Pennsylvania would be among seven states to lose a seat," while New Jersey would hold all of its 13 seats. Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, and Ohio "also would shed seats, while Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah would each gain one and Texas would pick up two."

Nevada Now Fastest-Growing State. NBC Nightly News (12/22, story 8, 1:05, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It has taken 19 years but tonight, Nevada has been knocked out of first place as the fastest-growing state in America. The new fastest growing state in the nation: not Nevada, it's in Arizona, according to the US Census Bureau's latest population report, which shows some 32,000 immigrants moving there, along with four times as many people relocating from California and elsewhere. Nevada is now the second-fastest growing state, followed by Idaho, Georgia and Texas. At the other end of the spectrum, losing population were Washington, D.C., along with Rhode Island, New York, and Louisiana, which by the way, lost more people than any other state largely because of Hurricane Katrina."

DOJ_NMG_0108807

Abortion Case Brought By Departing Kansas AG Thrown Out. The Washington Post (12/23, A3, Hegeman, 690K) reports Kansas Attorney General Phil Kline "charged a well-known abortion provider Friday with illegally performing late-term abortions, but a Sedgwick County judge threw out the charges only hours later. Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges against George Tiller at the request of Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston, who said her office had not been consulted." Kline, "who lost his reelection bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, said he would try to get Clark to reinstate the charges."

Justice Report Offers "Nightmarish Picture" Of Lubbock State School. The Dallas Morning News/AP (12/23, Peterson) reports, "Shoddy health care, substantial neglect and harmful treatment techniques have jeopardized the lives of Lubbock State School residents, federal investigators said in a report that criticized nearly every part of the facility. The U.S. Department of Justice report paints a nightmarish picture of the facility that cares for about 350 people with mental retardation and developmental disabilities. … Michael Jones, a spokesman for the state agency that oversees the state school, said he could not comment on the report's contents because 'it's still a potential legal matter.' But he would say the facility has a new management team that has worked hard to improve training and hire more medical professionals."

ANTITRUST:

Murdoch Announces Agreement To Sell DirecTV Stake To Liberty. USA Today (12/22, Lieberman, 2.27M) reported, "On Friday — three years, to the day, after News Corp. (NWS) took control of DirecTV — CEO Rupert Murdoch announced an agreement to turn over his controlling 38.5% interest in the No. 1 satellite company, as well as three regional sports networks and $550 million in cash, to Liberty in exchange for its 16.3% stake in News Corp. The deal, which values Liberty's shares at about $11 billion, ends a potential threat to Murdoch's control of News Corp. that Malone posed after he acquired his voting shares two years ago. Executives expect the deal to close in the middle of 2007 following approvals from News Corp. shareholders, federal antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission."

Murdoch, Malone Now Free To "Pursue Broader Ambitions." The Los Angeles Times (12/23, Menn, 850K) reports that the "long-awaited agreement…frees" Murdoch and Liberty CEO John Malone to each "pursue broader ambitions in his medium of choice. Murdoch expects faster growth in the Internet business than he does in U.S. satellite TV distribution." The Times writes, "By solidifying control of News Corp., Murdoch can more easily seek out deals like the 2005 acquisition of the MySpace.com social networking site. Meanwhile, Malone is unlikely to settle for the investment in El Segundo-based DirecTV Group Inc. that he gets from Murdoch."

Dicks Sporting Goods Receives Antitrust Approval For Golf Galaxy Acquisition. The AP (12/22) reported, "Dick's Sporting Goods Inc. on Friday said federal authorities have approved its pending $225 million acquisition of Golf Galaxy Inc. The companies agreed to the takeover in November, under which Dick's will pay Golf Galaxy shareholders $18.82 per share in cash."

Judge Asked To Unseal MediaNews Antitrust Documents. The Eureka Reporter (12/23) reports, "A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle. The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Court Strikes Down Bush Administration Clean Air Regulations. The Washington Post (12/23, A10, Heilprin, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court yesterday struck down the Bush administration's strategy for reducing smog, ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency's rules for forcing state cleanups do not meet requirements of the Clean Air Act. Judge Judith W. Rogers, writing for the three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said, 'EPA has failed to heed the restrictions on its discretion set forth in the Act.' The court ordered the agency to come up with another enforcement plan. … EPA in 2004 issued new smog standards requiring 474 counties, with about 159 million people living in them, to reduce pollution of smog-causing ozone and improve the air enough to meet federal health standards. The agency gave them three to 17 years to do so. The appellate panel said that was too long. It also said the agency was allowing 'backsliding' by states when it should have been directing them to order new emission controls on industrial plants, more public transportation, tougher vehicle-inspection programs or cleaner-burning gasoline."

DOJ_NMG_0108808

Ninth Circuit Panel Halves Damages Stemming From Exxon Valdez Spill. The CBS Evening News (12/22, story 5, 0:30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The world's biggest oil company got an early Christmas present today." The New York Times (12/23, A17, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "A federal appeals panel on Friday cut nearly in half the $4.5 billion punitive damage award against Exxon Mobil as a result of the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989. A majority of a three-judge panel said the company's negligent conduct, while 'particularly egregious,' was not intentional and did not warrant the maximum financial penalty that a lower court imposed. The panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, split on applying legal precedents to the company responsible for the worst oil spill in United States history. It cut the award for punitive damages to $2.5 billion." The Washington Post (12/23, D1, Kravets, 690K) reports, "The case, one of the nation's longest-running noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were damaged when the Exxon Valdez tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil. It is the third time the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive in light of U.S. Supreme Court precedent."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Federal Probe Into Stevens' Son Could Be Expanding. On its web site, Roll Call (12/22, Stanton) reports, "In a move that could signal a widening of the investigation into the son of Sen. Ted Stevens," federal investigators probing Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens "have issued a host of subpoenas to fishing industry executives and trade associations in Seattle, Alaska and Washington, D.C., sources familiar with the investigation said. Federal investigators with the FBI and the Department of Justice have been looking into Ben Stevens for at least a year as part of a broader ethics probe of a group of state lawmakers." The scandal "has swept up some of the state's most powerful families and companies, including the Stevenses, energy industry giant VECO Corp. and other entities in the oil and gas sector." But there is "no evidence that federal investigators are targeting Ted Stevens or any other Member of Congress in the investigation."

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Has Repatriated 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Past Two Weeks. The Washington Times (12/23, Seper, 88K) reports U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents "removed more than 2,300 illegal aliens from the country in the past two weeks on 35 flights to the Caribbean, Latin America, Asia and Africa -- one of the busiest periods of the year for ICE's Office of Detention and Removal Operations. Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said 852 of those removed had criminal records, and that another 21 flights this week will take 2,087 aliens to Central America and the Caribbean, including 515 who are criminal aliens. … In fiscal 2006, ICE removed more than 186,600 illegal aliens from the country, a record for the agency and a 10 percent increase over the number of removals during the previous fiscal year. More than 50,000 of them were repatriated to Central American and Caribbean Basin countries."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Attorneys Detail Potential Pitfalls For Witnesses In Congressional Hearings. In a "Rule of Law" column appearing in the Wall Street Journal (12/23, A9, 2.04M) Adam Goldberg and Preston Burton, partners at Orrick Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP, write, "As corporate America steels itself for an onslaught of investigations by the Democratically controlled Congress, consultants are busy advising companies on how best to prepare for and get through them. While one can do much to manage the fallout, navigating one of these investigations is a lot like surfing. Regardless of what you do, the biggest factor is still the size and nature of the wave. On this score, witnesses called before Congress have few protections." They note that Congress "does not necessarily recognize the attorney-client privilege and the protections that it gives individuals and companies," that there is a "very limited right to counsel," that "there is effectively no limit to what Congress can subpoena, or do with the information that it has obtained," and that "every now and then Congress appears to set a 'perjury trap' -- asking or compelling a witness to testify and then making a criminal referral for perjury to the Department of Justice when that witness fails to remember something or remembers something incorrectly."

DOJ_NMG_0108809

OTHER NEWS:

Edwards, Obama Tied For Lead, Clinton Fourth, In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Research 2000 Iowa Poll surveyed 400 likely 2008 Iowa Democratic caucus goers (+/- 5%) over December 18-20. John Edwards and Sen. Barack Obama are tied at 22% each, followed by Gov. Tom Vilsack at 12%, Sen. Hillary Clinton 10%, Al Gore 7%, Sen. John Kerry 5%, Wesley Clark 4%, Rep. Dennis Kucinich 4%, Sen. Evan Bayh 1%, Sen. Joseph Biden 1%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 1%, with 11% undecided.

McCain Leads Giuliani By One Point In Iowa Caucus Poll. The Research 2000 Iowa Poll surveyed 400 likely 2008 Iowa Republican caucus goers (+/- 5%) over December 18-20. Sen. John McCain leads with 27%, followed by Rudy Giuliani at 26%, Gov. Mitt Romney 9%, Newt Gingrich 7%, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice 4%, Sen. George Allen 1%, Sen. Sam Brownback 1%, Gov. Jeb Bush 1%, Gov. George Pataki 1%, Sen. Rick Santorum 1%, and Rep. Duncan Hunter 0%, with 22% undecided.

Aide Says Romney Presidential Run Will Begin In Early January. The AP (12/22) reports a "top adviser" to Gov. Mitt Romney said Romney will announce his bid for the presidency "in two phases early next month." Romney is expected to file FEC paperwork to create presidential campaign committee "as early as Jan. 2," as "as soon as the week of Jan. 8, Romney will hold a ceremony to officially declare his candidacy." The timing "is somewhat dependent on when Sen. John McCain of Arizona makes an expected announcement about his own campaign for the GOP nomination, the Romney aide said."

Rice Says US Ready To Elect Black President. The Washington Times/AP (12/23, Gearan) reports on its front page that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says the US "is ready to elect a black president." Rice said in an interview, "Yes, I think a black person can be elected president." But "we should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time." The story notes that Rice "has said repeatedly she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls."

WPost Laments Shrinking Presidential Field, But Also Gilmore Candidacy. The Washington Post (12/23, A20, 690K) editorializes, "In theory, this should be the most wide-open presidential contest in decades. In reality, more than a year before the first vote, the field seems to be narrowing awfully fast. … It would be unfortunate if the departures portended a presidential race winnowed to a few almost before it begins. The country would benefit from a multitude of voices in both parties -- not just Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) on the Democratic side and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani on the Republican. … We're anxious to see some Davids tromping through the snows of Iowa and New Hampshire, not just a few big-footed Goliaths. And we'd like the voters to have some say in deciding which is which."

In a related editorial, the Washington Post (12/23, A20, 690K) says it is less than pleased that James Gilmore, "the highhanded, dissent-averse and altogether unsuccessful ex-governor of Virginia," is among those remaining in the field. The Post says, "Heaven help us. For if Mr. Gilmore does to the 50 states what he did to the Old Dominion, the federal government might as well declare bankruptcy now. … A former governor from the South, zealous about tax-cutting and allergic to opposing views, who stubbornly insists on ill-fated policies despite abundant and well-founded warnings that they are leading to ruin. Maybe this guy is presidential material after all."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule; at Camp David for Christmas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: BETHLEHEM _ 4 p.m. The Ad Hoc Committee for Bethlehem holds a procession creating a "circle of Light" around the White House to dramatize the situation in Bethlehem. Location: Lafayette Park. Contacts: Rev. Susan Wilder, 703-913-5913

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Generals: More Troops Needed In Iraq."
"Delivering Dual Benefits."
"A Sousa Band Of Indians."
"Web Error Reveals Censure Of U.S. Judge."
"Meat And Milk From Cloning Are Safe, 2 FDA Scientists Say"
"OT Pushes Guards' Pay Past $100,000."

DOJ_NMG_0108810

"'War On Christmas' Has A New Jingle: Money."

New York Times:

"District By District, Shiites Make Baghdad Their Own."
"Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In 'Broad Strategic Agreement.'"
"Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Abandoned."
"A Joint Attack On Many Perils Of Africa's Young."
"Seductively Easy, Payday Loans Often Snowball."
"In Shirt-Sleeve Holiday Season, Overcoats Linger On The Racks."
"From Scum, Perhaps The Tiniest Form Of Life."

Washington Post:

"Prosecutors Drop Duke Rape Counts."
"Va. Soldier, Tested In Combat In Iraq, Shifts Focus To Future, Family."
"Lerners Plan To Spend Millions More On Improvements To D.C. Ballpark."
"Schwarzenegger Remakes Himself As Environmentalist."
"Toyota Expects To Be World's No. 1 Automaker Next Year."

Washington Times:

"Judge Faults Iran In '96 Bombing."
"Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her."
"Ecuador's Leader To Oust U.S. From Base."
"'Entire City' Invited To Fenty's Bash."

Detroit Free Press:

"Last-Minute Michigan Holiday Shoppers Aim For Discounts."
"Toyota's '07 Sales Likely To Pass Gm's."
"Goodyear And Union End Strike."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"Bolton Tapped As DeKalb Chief."
"Duke Rape Charges Dropped."
"Smooth Sailing At Airport."
"Diebold Hires Ex-Elections Chief."
"Judge Won't Delay Nichols Trial."
"Love Shack Order Delayed."

Dallas Morning News:

"Red-Light Camera Bill A Threat To City Coffers."
"Bush Library Could Mean Big Changes In Park Cities."
"Ousted Police Chief Bolton Lands New Job."
"Apartments Sue Over FB Ordinance."
"Data On 15,000 TWU Students Exposed."
"Experts: E-Cards Not Always Best."
"Mild Temps, Light Rain Expected For Weekend."

Houston Chronicle:

"Houstonian Dies In 12-Story Elevator-Shaft Fall."
"2 Houston-Area Hunting Accidents Kill 1, Injure 1."
"Feds Critical Of Safety Plan For Trailers At Refineries."
"Fallen Brazoria Soldier Helps Twin With His Dream."
"Culberson Firm On Metro Rail-Bypass Stance."
"Ex-State Ag Morales Enters Halfway House."
"New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Travel Delays; Duke Rape Case; Bush At Walter Reed; Terror Threats; Shuttle Landing; Amish Girl Goes Home; Day Care Difficulties; Person Of The Week.
CBS: Duke Rape Case; Duke Rape Case Analysis; Travel Delays; Gift Card Sales; Shuttle Landing; Terror Threats; Iraq Death Toll; Baghdad Neighborhood; Free Speech-Meaning Of Christmas; Belief In Santa Claus; Car Salesmen; Favorite Stories Of 2006.
NBC: Duke Rape Case; Travel Delays; Iraq Death Toll; Bush At Walter Reed; Military Holiday Greetings; Toyota Becomes World's Largest Automaker; Shuttle Landing; Us Population Shifts.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0108811

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 26, 2006 9:38 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Saturday, December 23, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061223.pdf; dojclips061223.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

London Police Chief Warns Of Terrorism (AP) 2
Police Leader Seeks Data On Tunnel Security (NYT) 2
Judge Links Iran To '96 Attack In Saudi Arabia (NYT) 3

Homeland Response:

Proposed Rules For Securing Chemical Plants Released (WP/AP) 4
Homeland Security Admits Violating Privacy (AP) 5
Feds: Homeland Security Project Didn't Protect Privacy (CNET) 6

War News:

Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In "Broad Strategic Agreement" (NYT) 7
US And Iraqis "agree On Broad Strategy" (FT) 8
U.S. Commanders In Iraq Recommend A "Surge" (LAT) 9
'A New Way Forward,' If With More Troops, Faces Resistance (LAT) 10
Al-Qaeda Allies Claim Bigger Base Of Support In Iraq (WP) 12
Insurgents Offer U.S. 30-day Truce To Get Out Of Iraq (CNN) 12
Ultimatum From Al Qaeda (AFP) 13
5 U.S. Troops Die In Iraq As Month's Toll Hits 70 (WP) 14
December A Very Bloody Month For U.S. Troops (WT/AP) 15
Shiites Remake Baghdad In Their Image (NYT) 16
Iraqis Sue Over Oil-for-food Program (AP) 18
Iraqis' Suit Targets 2 Firms In U.N. Oil-for-Food Program (WP) 19
Flurry Of Calls About Draft, And A Day Of Denials (NYT) 19

Corporate Scandals:

Siemens Chief Bullish In Spite Of Bribery Scandal (FT) 20
Siemens CEO Hopes New Audit Cuts Scope Of Suspected Fraud (WSJ) 21
U.S. Oil-gas Unit Is Subject Of Two Criminal Investigations (MRT) 22
Lam's Link To Pension Witness Challenged (SDUT) 24
Cfius Probe Blamed For Sale Of Voting-machine Company (FT) 25

Criminal Law:

Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Dropped (NYT) 26
Bush Pardons Short List (WT/AP) 28

Civil Law:

Appeals Court Allows FEMA To Hold Off On Funding (WP/AP) 29
FEMA Not Required To Restore Aid To Evacuees, Court Rules (NYT) 30
New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments (HC) 30
U.S. Gives Grants To 4 Gulf Coast States To Upgrade Disaster Housing (NYT) 32

Civil Rights:

Pa., N.J. Stand To Lose Clout (PHI) 33
Kansas Court Dismisses Abortion Charges (WP/AP) 33
DOJ Report Paints Nightmarish Picture Of Lubbock State School (DMN/AP) 34

Antitrust:

Liberty Media Deals For DirecTV (USAT) 35
DirecTV Deal Aids 2 Media Moguls (LAT) 36
Dick's Sporting Gets Antitrust Clearance (AP) 37
Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (ER) 37

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Federal Court Rejects EPA's Smog Strategy (WP/AP) 38
Appeals Panel Cuts Award In Valdez Spill By Exxon (NYT) 38
Damages Are Halved In Exxon Valdez Oil Spill (WP/AP) 39

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Subpoenas May Signal Wider Probe Into Son Of Sen. Stevens (RC) 40

Immigration:
Agents Remove 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Two Weeks (WT) 40

Congress-Administration:
Surf's Up On Capitol Hill (WSJ) 41

Other News:
Romney Set For Presidential Announcement (AP) 43
Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her (WT/AP) ... 44
The Narrowing Field (WP) 44
Another Inexplicably Jumps In (WP) 45

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

London Police Chief Warns Of Terrorism (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

LONDON (AP) — London's police chief said Friday the threat of a terror attack in Britain is growing and warned that the Christmas holidays were an especially dangerous period.

Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Ian Blair said al-Qaeda represented the gravest threat to Britain since World War II and was of an "unparalleled nature and growing."

"The threat of another terrorist attempt is ever present," he told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "Christmas is a period when that might happen. We have no specific intelligence to do (with) that."

He said al-Qaeda posed a greater threat than the Irish Republican Army's 1970-1997 failed campaign to force Northern Ireland out of the United Kingdom and into the Republic of Ireland, which killed 1,775 people.

The IRA usually did not aim to cause mass atrocities, did not want to die, gave warnings and was "heavily penetrated" by British intelligence agents, Blair said.

"None of those four apply with al Qaida and its affiliates," he said.

"It took 20 years to penetrate the IRA and I have no doubt that the intelligence services will be attempting that now, but it is a more difficult and a much more recent phenomenon," he said.

Home Secretary John Reid said on Dec. 10 that it was highly likely that terrorists would attempt an attack over the holiday period.

Last month, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller — who heads MI5, Britain's domestic spy service — said authorities were tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 suspects and that her agency had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London, which killed 52 commuters and the four bombers.

Police Leader Seeks Data On Tunnel Security (NYT)

By William Neuman, William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

The New York police commissioner, Raymond W. Kelly, said yesterday that he had asked the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to turn over a copy of a security analysis of the PATH train tubes beneath the Hudson River that shows they might be more vulnerable than previously thought to a small but powerful bomb.

Mr. Kelly's request came after a government official provided a draft summary of the analysis to The New York Times because the official was concerned that the Port Authority had not acted with sufficient urgency in its response to the findings. The findings were presented to senior managers at the agency, which runs the PATH trains, last month, the official said.

The government official said the analysis, which revealed a greater weakness in the tubes than was found in earlier tests, had so far not been shared with other government agencies.

Mr. Kelly called the new data on the PATH tubes "a cause for concern," although he said he believed the trains were safe.

DOJ_NMG_0108814

Last July, several people were arrested overseas in what the authorities said was a plot to set off bombs in the PATH system that would rupture the tubes and flood the tunnels. The trains have a weekday ridership of 230,000, and carry passengers in four single-track tubes between New Jersey and Manhattan.

Marc La Vorgna, a Port Authority spokesman, said that the agency was in contact with police officials yesterday.

The Port Authority has refused to discuss the analysis of the tubes, which found that a bomb made from a small amount of high explosives could puncture a large hole in the tube wall, allowing river water to flood the tube and other parts of the rail system. The analysis suggested that one tunnel would flood within six minutes, and that the entire system could be overwhelmed in a matter of hours.

Mr. La Vorgna said that the agency in recent weeks has significantly stepped up patrols by Port Authority police and increased bag searches in PATH stations.

But a reporter who toured four stations yesterday in the midafternoon, including the World Trade Center in Lower Manhattan and Exchange Place in Jersey City, saw only occasional uniformed police officers. No officers were seen stopping passengers to search their bags.

The study of the PATH tubes, which included blast analysis, computer modeling and other tests, was partly financed by the Department of Homeland Security, according to a spokesman for that agency, Russ Knocke. He said that a senior Homeland Security official, Assistant Secretary Robert B. Stephan, had met with Port Authority security officials last month. Mr. Knocke refused to say whether the Port Authority officials had informed Mr. Stephan of the updated blast and flooding data.

Gov. George E. Pataki of New York stressed that the data on the PATH tubes was preliminary, but he urged the Port Authority to move quickly.

"We want them not to wait until there's just the final, ultimate report but to act on any interim findings that they have coming along," Mr. Pataki said.

The agency's board voted this month to spend $180 million for security improvements in the PATH system.

The tests were originally commissioned as part of a joint effort by the Port Authority and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority to analyze underwater tunnels in both the PATH system and the subway.

The head of security for the transportation authority, which operates the subway, said that tests had not found similar weaknesses in the subway tubes.

"Notably, none of the vulnerability analysis has indicated that a small explosive device carried on a train would compromise the integrity of our tunnels," Lewis D. Schiliro, the director of interagency preparedness for the transportation authority, said in a statement.

The transportation authority runs trains through 14 subway tunnels under the Harlem and East Rivers, some of which have a construction that is similar in some ways to the PATH tubes under the Hudson River.

Tom Kelly, a spokesman for the transportation authority, refused to say how many of the under river tunnels were situated in bedrock or other strata below the riverbed and how many of them are made from metal tubes lying in the soft river silt, like the PATH tubes.

At least some of the riverbed tubes in the subway system are lined with concrete, which may make them stronger than the largely unlined PATH tubes.

Elliot G. Sander, the incoming chief executive of the transportation authority, said yesterday he was not prepared to discuss tunnel security before he takes charge of the agency next month.

Judge Links Iran To '96 Attack In Saudi Arabia (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — A federal trial judge ruled Friday that the government of Iran bore significant responsibility for the June 25, 1996, bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, and ordered Tehran to pay more than $253 million in damages to surviving family members of many of the American airmen killed there.

DOJ_NMG_0108815

Judge Royce C. Lamberth overturned an earlier ruling by a United States magistrate judge who had found that there was insufficient evidence to tie Iran to the terrorist attack, in which 19 military service members were killed. In this case, as in several similar lawsuits, Iran did not participate in the trial, holding that as a sovereign government it could not be sued in an American court.

But Judge Lamberth ruled that Iran lacked sovereign immunity under the law, which was amended about 10 years ago to cover acts of terrorism, and entered a default judgment — that is, a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs because there was no response from the other side.

Judge Lamberth wrote that he was persuaded of Iran's involvement by testimony from Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the F.B.I., who had taken a deep personal interest in the investigation, and from the bureau's former deputy chief counterterrorism official, Dale Watson.

As with several similar lawsuits, there is considerable uncertainty whether the 55 surviving relatives who participated in the lawsuit will ever be able to obtain any of the damages awarded them.

Shale D. Stiller, the lawyer who brought the case, acknowledged that obtaining money from Iran was an uncertain proposition. He said in an interview that his firm, DLA Piper, would try to have the judgment enforced by searching for Iranian government assets around the world and asking foreign courts to attach them — that is, to sequester them to possibly be awarded to the plaintiffs.

"What we have to do now is take the judgment and go all over the world and find assets that belong to the government of Iran," Mr. Stiller said.

Lawyers say, however, that courts around the world are typically reluctant to enforce judgments in cases that were won by default because they are open to challenge.

Mr. Stiller said that the fact of an unambiguous statement from a United States court of Iran's role "is more important to the families than any monetary award."

Prof. Ruth Wedgwood of the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University said that governments often found such judicial interventions unwelcome because they may come at a delicate time in bilateral relations. But she said such rulings had great value because "they officially categorize the behavior as illegal and often make clear facts everybody knows to be true" but are not acknowledged by governments for diplomatic reasons.

In his ruling, Judge Lamberth cited Mr. Freeh's testimony that six of the people who participated in the attack were trained by Iranian officials, sometimes in Iran, and received money and materials from the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security and the Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corp.

Judge Lamberth said he accepted testimony from other experts that the perpetrators were recruited by a senior official of the Revolutionary Guard at the Iranian Embassy in Damascus, Syria.

The Lamberth opinion is in distinct contrast to previous executive branch examinations, which broadly hinted of an Iranian role but never produced explicit conclusions. The Justice Department's 2001 indictment of many of those involved in the bombing mentioned Iran frequently but avoided pinning responsibility on Tehran.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Proposed Rules For Securing Chemical Plants Released (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

The nation's chemical companies would have to submit to new security inspections and provide the government with plans for protecting themselves from terrorist attacks under proposed rules released yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security.

The rules, scheduled to take effect April 4, closely follow the recommendations of the chemical industry and result from legislation President Bush signed into law in October.

Companies would be required to assess their own vulnerabilities and provide the government with plans for fixing them under the new rules, which were released for public comment. Industry representatives welcomed their arrival.

DOJ_NMG_0108816

"They are following the structure that Congress outlined," said Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, which represents the largest chemical makers. "The idea here is to set a security level that they want these facilities to achieve, commensurate with the risk that each facility represents."

The council's 133 members lobbied for the new rules and have spent $3.5 billion on security upgrades at their 2,000 facilities since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Jensen said.

Companies would have to conduct background checks on employees and better control access or face possible fines of as much as $25,000 a day and the risk of being shut down. But they may also contest government disapproval of their security plans.

Congress will probably have more than a little to say about the proposed new rules next month, in view of the reaction yesterday from critics, who included Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the outgoing chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

Collins, who co-wrote the legislation calling for the rules with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's incoming chairman, said the department is going too far in some areas, such as by assigning itself the power to preempt the legal authority of states and courts.

Democrats, who will take control of Congress next month, view the new rules as too soft on industry and have sought to require manufacturers, in some cases, to replace toxic materials with safer but more expensive substitutes.

Department of Homeland Security officials, however, say that the proposed rules, along with tighter security and the tracking of rail shipments of highly toxic materials, would reduce the likelihood of a chemical attack by terrorists.

Homeland Security Admits Violating Privacy (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Homeland Security Department admitted Friday it violated the Privacy Act two years ago by obtaining more commercial data about U.S. airline passengers than it had announced it would.

Seventeen months ago, the Government Accountability Office, Congress' auditing arm, reached the same conclusion: The department's Transportation Security Administration "did not fully disclose to the public its use of personal information in its fall 2004 privacy notices as required by the Privacy Act."

Even so, in a report Friday on the testing of TSA's Secure Flight domestic air passenger screening program, the Homeland Security department's privacy office acknowledged TSA didn't comply with the law. But the privacy office still couldn't bring itself to use the word "violate."

Instead, the privacy office said, "TSA announced one testing program, but conducted an entirely different one." In a 40-word, separate sentence, the report noted that federal programs that collect personal data that can identify Americans "are required to be announced in Privacy Act system notices and privacy impact assessments."

TSA spokesman Christopher White noted the GAO's earlier conclusions and said, "TSA has already implemented or is in the process of implementing each of the DHS privacy office recommendations."

Congress has been unhappy with TSA's domestic airline screening program for years — since it was called CAPPS II before it was tweaked and renamed Secure Flight. Federal law now bars TSA from implementing a domestic screening system until the GAO is satisfied it can meet 10 standards of privacy protection, accuracy and security.

Secure Flight has never passed all those tests, and White said there is no target date for implementing it. "We are more concerned with getting it right," White said.

Friday's report reinforced concerns on Capitol Hill.

"This further documents the cavalier way the Bush administration treats Americans' privacy," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who is set to become Senate Judiciary Committee chairman in January. "With this database program, first they ignored the Privacy Act, and now, two years later, they still have a hard time admitting it."

Leahy promised the new Congress will try to learn more about how the administration uses such databases. "Data mining technology has great potential," Leahy said, "but history shows that without adequate checks and balances and oversight, misuse and abuse of the public's personal information will be inevitable."

DOJ_NMG_0108817

Characterizing the Secure Flight problems as "largely unintentional," Homeland Security's privacy office attributed them to TSA's failure to revise the public announcement after the test changed.

The privacy office said TSA announced in fall 2004 it would acquire passenger name records of people who flew domestically in June 2004. Airline passenger name records include the flyer's name, address, itinerary, form of payment, history of one-way travel, contact phone number, seating location and even requests for special meals.

The public notices said TSA would try to match the passenger names with names on watch lists of terrorists and criminals.

But they also said the passenger records would be compared with unspecified commercial data about Americans in an effort to see if the passenger data was accurate. It assured the public that TSA would not receive commercial data used by contractors to conduct that part of the tests.

But the contractor, EagleForce, used data obtained from commercial data collection companies Acxiom, Insight America and Qsent to fill in missing information in the passenger records and then sent the enhanced records back to TSA on CDs for comparison with watch lists.

This was "contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program," Homeland Security's privacy office concluded. "EagleForce's access to the commercial data amounted to access of the data by TSA."

Another procedure originally thought to enhance privacy backfired. EagleForce augmented the 42,000 passenger name records with similar variations of the spelling of each first and last name so it asked for commercial data on 240,000 names.

Many of these variations were the actual names of real people whose records were then put into the test without any public notice, the report said. Eventually, the three companies supplied EagleForce with 191 million records, though many were duplicates.

Feds: Homeland Security Project Didn't Protect Privacy (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh

CNET News.com, December 23, 2006

A Department of Homeland Security program that linked details on millions of air travelers with profiles drawn from commercial databases was plagued by "privacy missteps" that misled the public, a new government report concludes.

The Transportation Security Agency, operating under the auspices of Homeland Security, had publicly pledged two years ago--in official notices describing the Secure Flight program--that it "will not receive" or have access to dossiers on American travelers compiled by a Beltway contractor.

That promise turned out to be untrue, according to a report published Friday by DHS' privacy office. The commercial data "made its way directly to TSA, contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program," the report says. (Click on "Secure Flight Report" to view a PDF version.)

The report, and a second one critiquing a government database called Matrix, was released on the last business day before Christmas, a tactic that federal agencies and publicly traded companies sometimes use to avoid drawing attention to critical findings. Neither report appears on the DHS.gov or TSA.gov home pages, or even on the home page of the DHS privacy office, but rather was linked to from a subpage on the DHS privacy site.

Jim Harper, a policy analyst with the free-market Cato Institute who serves on a Homeland Security advisory panel, said the reports show that the department needs to pay far more attention to privacy. "They didn't think ahead. They didn't study. They didn't pay attention to the privacy issues," Harper said. "It may need to be hammered home many more times."

Secure Flight was born in September 2004 when DHS ordered airlines to hand over the complete records of all passengers who traveled on a domestic flight in the month of June--which were in turn linked with information on those passengers drawn from commercial databases. (Secure Flight, which was put on hold in February in large part because of privacy concerns, was the successor to DHS' Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System.)

The agency's Secure Flight contractor, a McLean, Va.-based company called EagleForce, bought databases with personal information on Americans from three data-mining firms: Acxiom, Insight America and Qsent. The data included U.S. citizens' names, gender, spouse's names, address, date of birth, and in some cases Social Security numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0108818

The report from the Homeland Security privacy office takes pains to say that the privacy compromises over Secure Flight were "not intentional," and includes a list of seven recommendations to avoid similar mishaps in the future. Those include explaining to the public exactly what's going on and creating a "data flow map" to ensure information is handled in compliance with the 1974 Privacy Act.

This isn't the first report to take issue with Secure Flight. Last year, auditors at the U.S. Government Accountability Office reported that the program violated the Privacy Act.

In an interview with CNET News.com earlier this year, Peter Pietra, TSA's director of privacy policy, downplayed those concerns. Pietra said the agency disagrees with GAO's interpretation of the law.

A Matrix post-mortem

The second report released Friday represents a postmortem of a defunct project called the Matrix, or the Multistate Anti-Terrorism Information Exchange. Matrix ended in April 2005. (Click on "Matrix Report" for a PDF version.)

DHS provided most of the funding for Matrix, $8 million in 2003, with the Department of Justice tossing in $4 million. Operated by Seisint, which is now part of LexisNexis, the pilot project involved information sharing between state government, federal government, and commercial databases. At least 13 states participated, including California, Texas and New York.

Matrix quickly became controversial for a long list of reasons: It launched in July 2003 with no privacy policy in place. Few participating states ever conducted a self-audit to make sure abuse didn't happen. Neither the Justice Department nor DHS ever did. Privacy specialists weren't consulted until nearly three years after planning began. Even though Matrix was supposedly created as an antiterrorism network, only 2.6 percent of the cases investigated turned out to be terrorism-related.

Also raising questions was the unwillingness of LexisNexis and the participating governments to give a complete list of information accessible through Matrix. But a page captured by Archive.org from the former Matrix-at.org Web site lists records from criminal histories, driver's licenses and motor vehicle registrations, court documents, property ownership, professional licenses, and commercial databases including telephone directories. Other reports have said Social Security numbers, speeding tickets, and family members also are included.

The ACLU had been one of Matrix's most vocal critics. It charged that Matrix was "dangerous and Orwellian" and represented an intrusive data-mining program on innocent Americans.

DHS' privacy office said Friday that Matrix "was undermined, and ultimately halted, in large part because it did not have a comprehensive privacy policy from the outset to provide transparency about the project's purpose and practices and protect against mission creep or abuse."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In "Broad Strategic Agreement" (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, John O'Neil

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Friday that American and Iraqi officials were in "broad strategic agreement" about how to address the violence here, and he stressed that success "will only be achieved with a joint effort with the Iraqis taking the lead."

Mr. Gates spoke to reporters at the end of a three-day Iraq trip that included meetings with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, top American generals and a small group of enlisted soldiers.

He said he had directed Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top ground commander in Iraq, to work with Iraqi political and military leaders over the next few days to come up with specific recommendations on improving the security situation.

"They do have some concrete plans in mind, and putting flesh on those bones is exactly what General Casey and his team and the Iraqis will be doing in the days ahead," Mr. Gates said, according to [a news agency].

Mr. Gates also indicated that he would brief President Bush, possibly as early as this weekend, on the findings from his trip, his second to Iraq this year. Mr. Bush is in the midst of reviewing Iraq policy and has said no decisions on a change in strategy will be made until he receives proposals from Mr. Gates and the military.

DOJ_NMG_0108819

The policy review has created tensions between White House officials who have been pressing for a so-called surge — the temporary addition of American troops to quell violence in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar Province — and military leaders, who have warned that the move could slow the rate at which Iraqi troops move to the forefront.

Mr. Gates seemed to emphasize the need for Iraqi troops to play a larger part, saying that he was impressed with the Iraqi government's determination "to take a leadership role in dealing with some of these security problems and then economic reconstruction."

He also said that the Iraqis' willingness to step forward "seems to me to be significantly advanced since I was here a couple of months ago," when he visited Baghdad as a member of the Iraq Study Group.

"This is a very difficult situation, but I believe, based on what I've heard both from the American commanders and the Iraqis, that things are moving in a positive direction," he said. "But it's still going to be a long haul."

The American military announced the deaths of five service members, four of whom died in combat in Anbar Province on Thursday, and one who was killed west of Baghdad on Friday when a patrol came under mortar and machine-gun fire.

US And Iraqis "agree On Broad Strategy" (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

US defence secretary Robert Gates – fresh from a three-day visit to Baghdad – is expected to sit down on Saturday with George W Bush to discuss the White House's new Iraq policy.

The new defence secretary travelled to Iraq immediately after his swearing in this week to solicit the advice of US military commanders before he makes recommendations to the president. Mr Bush is expected early next year to unveil his new "way forward" for Iraq.

Mr Gates said before leaving Baghdad on Friday that US and Iraqi officials were in "broad strategic agreement", but declined to provide details on a short-term increase in troop levels and other specific proposals.

One option Mr Bush is considering is a short-term surge in US troop levels to attempt to quell the sectarian violence gripping the Iraqi capital.

US commanders in Baghdad are understood to have told Mr Gates what the joint chiefs in the Pentagon have already concluded: that a surge in troop levels would be counter-productive because it could not be sustained for a long period, and would reduce the pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian militias.

While it is unclear whether Mr Gates will endorse the views of military leaders, Mr Bush this week side-stepped a question about whether he would ignore the advice of his commanders.

Iraqi politicians meanwhile discussed forming a new ruling coalition – an issue at the heart of US planning.

The Shia-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is under pressure from both the US and Sunni Arabs to distance itself from the radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Shia politicians on Thursday were reported to have visited the venerated Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to seek his approval for a new government. On Friday they were planning a weekend meeting with Mr Sadr himself.

Several of Mr Sadr's followers said the radical cleric had agreed to allow his supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government, three weeks after he called a boycott to protest at Mr Maliki's meeting with President Bush in Jordan, in an apparent move to prevent the group from being sidelined altogether.

Dealing with Mr Sadr's movement has posed a dilemma for both Iraqi politicians and US policymakers. Mr Maliki is heavily beholden to the Sadrists, who are probably Iraq's largest mass movement and whose street presence far outweighs that of the prime minister's own Dawa party.

The Sadrist movement holds 30 seats in the 275-member parliament and three important ministries in the cabinet, yet its Mahdi Army militia is blamed for much of the sectarian violence that has killed many thousands since February.

However, it is unclear how much authority Mr Sadr wields over the loosely structured militia which is nominally loyal to him, and whether his personal influence has increased or reduced the level of sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0108820

On the one hand, Mr Sadr has issued statements condemning the violence and lashed out at his followers for failing to obey instructions, but on the other hand he may have used his political influence in Mr Maliki's government to protect militia leaders accused of carrying out sectarian killings.

US commanders say their Iraqi counterparts are pressured to release detained militia leaders, and also have reportedly chafed at Mr Maliki's decision to block raids on the militia's main support base of Sadr City.

Analysts meanwhile are divided as to whether sidelining Mr Sadr would help. A US congressional delegation which visited Iraq 10 days ago told Mr Maliki that he must break his ties with the radical cleric, but the Brussels-based International Crisis Group in a report released last week called on the US to "avoid steps to engineer a cabinet reshuffle aimed at sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr, which would further inflame the situation".

Meanwhile, British forces in the southern port city of Basra arrested seven members of a police unit accused of murdering their colleagues.

British military spokesmen said that one of the suspects was accused of complicity in the October 29 hijacking of a bus containing police translaters, trainers, and cleaning workers. The passengers were executed and their bodies dumped around Basra.

British military spokesman Major Charlie Burbridge said the raid was part of an effort to dissolve Basra's serious crimes unit, which he said had been a problem for several years.

U.S. Commanders In Iraq Recommend A "Surge" (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Top U.S. military commanders in Iraq have decided to recommend a "surge" of fresh American combat forces, eliminating one of the last remaining hurdles to proposals being considered by President Bush for a troop increase, a defense official familiar with the plan said Friday.

The approval of a troop increase plan by top Iraq commanders, including Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, comes days before Bush unveils a new course for the troubled U.S. involvement in Iraq. Bush still must address concerns among some Pentagon officials and overcome opposition from Congress, where many Democrats favor a blue-ribbon commission's recommendation for a gradual withdrawal of combat troops.

But the recommendation by the commanders in Iraq is significant because Bush has placed prime importance on their advice. The U.S. command in Iraq decided to recommend an increase of troops several days ago, prior to meetings in Baghdad this week with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, the defense official said.

Gates, who returned to Washington on Friday, will join Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley in meetings with President Bush Saturday at Camp David. White House Press Secretary Dana Perino said the meeting was part of the Iraq strategy review, and Bush was not expected to make a final decision on the administration's new policy.

Commanders have been skeptical of the value of increasing troops, and the decision represents a reversal for Casey, the highest ranking officer in Iraq. Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East who will step down in March, have long resisted adding more troops in Iraq, arguing that it could delay the development of Iraqi security forces and increase anger at the United States in the Arab world.

The defense official said commanders have not determined the exact number of extra troops they will request. Military officers have debated an increase of about 20,000, about five extra combat brigades. But while some officers think five extra brigades would be difficult to muster, others believe more troops will be required.

"People are warming to the realization that some sort of surge is necessary," said another military official.

The officials spoke on the condition their names not be revealed because Bush has not announced a final decision on his Iraq policy.

Bush recently called for an increase in the overall size of the Army and Marine Corps. But he stressed he has not made a decision on whether to send more troops to Iraq and wants to speak further with Gates.

DOJ_NMG_0108821

Some members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff remain skeptical of a surge, unconvinced that it will yield more positive results than other recent military operations to secure Baghdad or Iraq. But other military officers have said that a buildup in troops is America's last chance to roll back the sectarian violence, neutralize the insurgency and strengthen the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Many military officers maintain there is no middle ground strategy for Iraq, and that United States must either increase the force, gambling that the military can impose a measure of security on Iraq, or else begin to withdraw its forces.

Those skeptical about the efficacy of an increase argue that any new troops must be given clear instructions. However, defense officials say the U.S. commanders in Iraq have not settled on what that mission should be, although they are expected to decide before calling up new units.

Gates may have been alluding to that on Friday, when he told reporters he has asked Casey to make specific recommendations on how to improve security in Iraq and to work with Iraqi military leaders to "put flesh on those bones" of a new security plan.

"There is still some work to be done between Gen. Casey and his counterparts in the Iraqi government," Gates said. "But I do expect to give a report to the president on what I have learned and my perceptions."

Iraqi politics will be a key factor in deciding how to use extra U.S. military force. American diplomats are trying to engineer an ouster of the political faction of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr from the government and are trying to help set up a moderate coalition of Kurds, Sunnis and Shiites that is more willing to confront al-Sadr's militias.

The U.S. military now considers forces loyal to al-Sadr to be the top threat to the security of Iraq.

Al-Sadr controls 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament and six Cabinet seats in the current government, although the al-Sadr loyalists have been boycotting the government in protest of al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan in November.

Military officials were dismayed that one of the country's most influential clerics, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, did not immediately back efforts to establish a new coalition government. If al-Sistani insists that al-Sadr remain within the Shiite coalition, it would represent a blow to the U.S. goal of marginalizing the radical cleric.

"The goals are tied to the palace intrigue," the military official said. "We are watching them carefully."

A troop buildup has sparse political support, but is backed by Sen. John McCain R-Ariz., considered a front-runner for the GOP presidential nomination. Key Democratic lawmakers and some Pentagon officials, however, remain skeptical. Sen. Carl Levin D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services committee, is among those pushing for a timetable for withdrawal -- not a buildup of forces.

Several members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff also have expressed reservations. Because the Joint Chiefs are not part of the military's formal chain of command, the recommendation to increase or decrease will go from commanders in Iraq to Gates and then to Bush. But the Joint Chiefs retain an important advisory role.

Gen. James T. Conway, the new commandant of the Marine Corps and a member of the Joint Chiefs, emphasized the drawbacks of a surge in public comments last week.

"We would fully support, I think, as the Joint Chiefs, the idea of putting more troops into Iraq if there is a solid military reason for doing that, if there is something to be gained," he said. "We do not believe that just adding numbers for the sake of adding numbers -- just thickening the mix -- is necessarily the way to go."

Like Conway, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, has said extra troops must be given a clearly defined mission. "We would not surge without a purpose," Schoomaker said recently. "And that purpose should be measurable."

Conway suggested that adding more troops now would mean the military would be less ready to deploy in the future.

"You better make sure your timing is right," he said. "Because if you commit the reserve for something other than a decisive win or to stave off defeat, then you have essentially shot your bolt."

'A New Way Forward,' If With More Troops, Faces Resistance (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108822

— The leader of the Senate Democrats, Harry Reid of Nevada, seemed to open the door Sunday to supporting a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Two days later, he shut it.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), returned from two days in Iraq and stated his opposition to a troop surge. "It would create more targets," he said.

As President Bush considers whether to temporarily boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, few members of Congress are stepping forward forcefully to promote the idea. So far, the bulk of the political response has been a mix of silence, skepticism and outright opposition.Bush is considering whether to add as many as 30,000 troops to the force of about 140,000 already in Iraq, but he has not committed to the idea. The president is expected to launch a new Iraq strategy, which he calls a "new way forward," in early January — just as Democrats are moving into majority positions in the House and Senate after a midterm election widely interpreted as rejecting the president's conduct of the Iraq war.

Members of Congress have limited reach in shaping day-to-day policy in Iraq. The effect of their votes on spending for the war will play out only in months and years to come, and the president has demonstrated time and again his readiness to buck the tide of the Democrats' opposition.

But broad political opposition has historically put reins on unpopular military policies. Some members of Congress are asking what mission the troops would be charged with performing and questioning the likelihood of success.

Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican considered a front-runner for his party's presidential nomination in 2008, has been a leader of a limited group that has pressed for a more aggressive approach in Iraq, including the dispatch of more troops to stem the sectarian violence and insurgent attacks.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential candidate who won reelection to the Senate in November as an independent, has strongly favored sending additional troops.

McCain, Lieberman, and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) visited Baghdad last week. Collins said she was "not yet convinced that additional troops" would help bring a lasting peace.

Their comments aside, many Republican leaders have been reluctant to express themselves on the question, and Democrats who have spoken about it remain skeptical or oppose a troop increase.

The incoming Senate Republican leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, has made no public statements on whether to increase the deployment. He is waiting "to hear from the folks at the Pentagon," said a spokesman, Don Stewart.

On Sunday, Reid said on ABC News' "This Week" that he would go along with a troop surge if it lasted two or three months and was "part of a program to get us out of there ... by this time next year." But two days later, he came out against an increase. In a blog posting on the website Huffingtonpost.com, he wrote: "Frankly, I don't believe that more troops is the answer for Iraq .... I do not support an escalation of the conflict."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who is preparing to become House speaker, opposes sending more troops, as does the second-ranking House Democrat, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, all potential Democratic presidential candidates, also oppose a troop increase.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is also a potential Democratic presidential candidates, presented a nuanced response on NBC's "Today Show" earlier this week, when she said she was not in favor of an increase "unless it's part of a larger plan."

Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, a leading Democratic spokesman on military affairs, said in a telephone interview: "Put me down as skeptical."

He said that before he would support a surge, the divergent elements within the Iraqi government would have to move toward political reconciliation and begin delivering public services, and Bush would have to convince him that the troops he was sending would have a specific, achievable mission.

And Reed said the additional deployment would have to be much greater than 20,000, given the size of Baghdad and the number of militants operating there.

james.gerstenzang@
latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0108823

Al-Qaeda Allies Claim Bigger Base Of Support In Iraq (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

Forces allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed yesterday to have broadened their base of support among Iraqi Sunnis, saying that 70 percent of tribal sheiks and a number of previously independent insurgent groups have pledged allegiance to what has been called the Islamic State of Iraq under its emir, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi.

An 18-minute audiotape attributed to Baghdadi and released on the Internet invited officers in ousted president Saddam Hussein's disbanded army to join the insurgents. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a similar invitation last week to all former soldiers and officers to join the government's military.

The Sunni-dominated army was dissolved by L. Paul Bremer, then the U.S. administrator in Iraq, after American-led forces toppled Hussein's government in the spring of 2003. Many of its members are believed to have already joined the insurgency.

Maliki's invitation, issued last weekend, was part of the latest reconciliation effort aimed at ending the sectarian violence that has swept Iraq this year. Even as it has appealed to Sunnis, Maliki's Shiite-majority government has been unable to rein in its own side, including radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose militia is believed to be driving much of the violence.

Baghdadi's statement called on Sunnis to shun the faltering efforts to maintain a multiethnic unity government in Iraq, which it said were being negotiated by Saudi Arabia at the behest of the United States.

Since the death last summer of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the brutal leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, once-disparate Sunni insurgent groups have portrayed themselves as increasingly unified, with political as well as military goals. They declared the formation of an Islamic state in October, and yesterday's statement said that governors have been appointed in Sunni-dominated areas and Islamic law is being imposed at "the request of the people themselves." Judges have been appointed "to finish the disputes and stop the standing disagreements" among Sunni tribal leaders, and punishments are being meted out for crimes such as adultery, the statement said.

Baghdadi's invitation to Hussein's disbanded army is open to officers holding the rank of major and below, provided they can "recite at least three chapters" of the Koran and pass an exam on Islamic law. It added: "This is to make sure that he is free from his unbelief with Baath," Hussein's secular political party. In return, "we will provide him with travel, salary, food and lodging."

The statement, translated by the Washington-based SITE Institute, which monitors extremist Web sites, noted that President Bush has warned of the establishment of an "Islamic state from China to Spain" and added: "This liar is right."

The insurgents appear well aware of the Bush administration's current policy review, saying that U.S. military forces in Iraq are staggering and "starting to look for flight." Baghdadi offered Bush two weeks to decide to withdraw all U.S. forces, adding that they would be given one month to leave without interference, provided they left behind all equipment and heavy weapons.

Insurgents Offer U.S. 30-day Truce To Get Out Of Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- The leader of an umbrella organization for Iraqi insurgent groups is offering the United States a one-month truce to withdraw all U.S. forces from Iraq and turn over its military bases "to the mujahedeen of the Islamic state."

In an audiotape posted on Islamic Web sites Friday, a speaker identified as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahideen Shura Council, said that if U.S. forces begin withdrawing from Iraq immediately and leave their heavy weaponry behind, "we will allow your withdrawal to complete without anyone targeting you with any explosive or anything else."

"We say to Bush not to waste this historic opportunity that will guarantee you a safe withdrawal," al-Baghdadi said on the audiotape.

The United States was given two weeks to respond to the offer.

The Mujahideen Shura Council is an umbrella group formed in late 2005 that includes several terrorist and insurgent groups, including al Qaeda in Iraq.

On the audiotape, al-Baghdadi also called on officers from the former Iraqi army to join an "army of the Islamic state," promising them a house and a salary as long as they pass a "test of faith" intended to demonstrate the extent of their "hatred" for Saddam Hussein and his regime.

DOJ_NMG_0108824

The U.S. military Friday reported five U.S. troop deaths, while Iraqi authorities reported the discovery of a dozen bodies and the kidnapping of a Sunni imam in Baghdad.

One soldier was killed and another wounded when attackers targeted a coalition patrol west of the capital, the U.S. military said. Three Marines and a sailor assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died Thursday from wounds suffered during combat in Anbar province, the military also said.

The deaths bring the December U.S. military death toll to 73 and the overall total during the war to 2,955; seven U.S. contractors also have been killed.Other developments

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates concluded his three-day tour of Iraq to assess U.S. troop levels and Iraq's security situation. He was headed for Washington on Friday and was expected to issue a report of his consultations with U.S. troops, commanders and Iraqi officials to President Bush during the weekend.

Coalition forces in Baghdad killed an insurgent and detained 35 others Friday morning during raids aimed at al Qaeda in Iraq members, the U.S. military said. In Basra, about 1,000 British troops arrested four and seized weapons in a sweep to arrest police suspected of death squad activities. Iraqi troops in Diyala province also launched raids, detaining 13 people in a sweep that targeted "an illegal armed group cell."

The Shiite leadership says it will not exclude radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a statement that appeared to douse hopes for the emergence of a moderate political alliance that would include Sunni and Kurdish parties.

President Bush and first lady Laura Bush made bedside visits to 38 American service members at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center on Friday, The Associated Press reported. They joined Girl Scouts and children of hospital staff to wrap presents for families and children of wounded military personnel and were to head for Camp David later Friday for the Christmas holiday, AP reported.

Polish President Lech Kaczynski has approved a one-year extension through 2007 for his country's 900 troops to serve in Iraq, the AP cited his foreign policy adviser as saying Friday. They are mainly involved in training Iraqi security forces, AP reported.

Eight Marines have been charged in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians in Haditha last year, the Marine Corps announced Thursday.

Ultimatum From Al Qaeda (AFP)

AFP, December 23, 2006

Dec 23, 2006, DUBAI (AFP) - The head of an Al-Qaeda-dominated group in Iraq offered to give US troops a month to pull out free of attack in an audiotape posted on the Internet and demanded an answer within two weeks.

Abu Omar al-Baghdadi also charged that Washington had attempted to open communications through Saudi intermediaries but said he had rebuffed the overture, in the voice recording whose authenticity could not immediately be verified.

"We are offering you the opportunity to withdraw your troops in complete safety and we are expecting your response within two weeks," said the voice purporting to be that of Baghdadi, leader of a self-proclaimed Islamic emirate in western and north-central Iraq that is dominated by Al-Qaeda supporters.

"We appeal to President George W. Bush to seize this historic opportunity which should allow your troops to pull out in safety," it said.

Asked wether the US administration was checking on the authenticity of the tape or if it would answer the offer, Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, declined any comment.

Bush has faced intense political pressure to overhaul his Iraq policy, following the rout of his Republican party in mid-term elections, rock-bottom approval of his management of the Iraq war and mounting US combat deaths.

A policy review by the Iraq Study Group, a bi-partisan panel, recommended that all frontline US troops be withdrawn by early 2008.

But Bush made clear Wednesday that he was opposed to any precipitate withdrawal from Iraq and that in the short term US troop numbers might even rise.

"I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East; that they can't intimidate America," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108825

The voice recording also charged that US officials had made contact with the Al-Qaeda front organization through Saudi intermediaries in a bid to open up communication but said that the overture had been rebuffed.

"The giant has begun to collapse and is seeking to negotiate through various parties, particularly through its agents," it said.

"It conveyed to us through the Saud family (the royal family in Saudi Arabia), the dictators of the (Arabian) peninsula, its desire (to negotiate), claiming already to have sat down with all parties apart from us.

"But we told it: 'We don't negotiate with those who have shed the blood of our children.'"

US officials have expressed readiness to open up communications with insurgent groups in Iraq but have always excluded those with links to Al-Qaeda.

5 U.S. Troops Die In Iraq As Month's Toll Hits 70 (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 -- Five more American service members have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military reported Friday, in what is shaping up to be one of the deadliest months for U.S. forces this year.

Four of those deaths occurred Thursday in western Iraq's Anbar province, where Sunni insurgents are aggressively fighting U.S. troops. The fatalities included three Marines and a sailor assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7, the military said.

On Friday, one soldier died and another was wounded when they came under fire during a patrol west of the capital, according to the military.

Newly appointed Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates on Friday returned to the United States for consultations with President Bush. Gates will offer findings from three days of meetings with U.S. commanders and Iraqi leaders about possible shifts in U.S. war strategy.

Before leaving, Gates told reporters at Camp Victory in Baghdad that naval forces in the Persian Gulf have increased, the Associated Press reported. Denying that this was a direct reaction to Iran's refusal to rein in its nuclear program, he called it a signal to all Gulf countries that the United States will maintain an enduring presence in the region.

As of Thursday, 70 service members had been killed this month, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. Sixty were killed in action, and 10 died from noncombat causes such as accidents and illnesses, he said.

According to iCasualties.org, a Web site that tracks military casualties, the deadliest month this year has been October, with 110 deaths, including four non-Americans.

"We are in a tough fight, and we continue to conduct aggressive operations in support of the people of Iraq," Garver said.

U.S.-led forces have stepped up efforts to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad while continuing to fight insurgents in Anbar.

During multiple raids throughout the region Friday morning, coalition forces killed one suspected insurgent and detained 25 believed to be responsible for car bombings and other attacks against civilians and troops, the military said. They also captured an al-Qaeda financier, the military said.

U.S. forces are training Iraqi forces to take over security. Part of that training involves conducting joint operations to confiscate weapons caches and arrest suspected insurgents.

On Thursday, forces with the Iraqi army's 4th Division and U.S.-led coalition advisers captured a suspected leader of an insurgent cell and detained two others in Taji, north of Baghdad. The suspected cell leader, whose name was not released, planned car and roadside bombings against the convoys of Iraqi and coalition forces and helped set up illegal checkpoints, the military said.

Meanwhile, the purported leader of a militant group linked to al-Qaeda offered U.S. troops a one-month truce if they agreed to withdraw from Iraq and hand over their heavy weapons and military bases.

In a 19-minute speech posted on an insurgent Web site, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of Islamic State of Iraq, said the troops would not be attacked on their way out. "We tell Bush, 'Don't miss this historical opportunity that will guarantee you a safe withdrawal from Iraq,' " he said.

The authenticity of the tape could not be verified.

DOJ_NMG_0108826

Also Friday, the U.S. Embassy denied involvement in the escape of Iraq's former electricity minister from a police station in the Green Zone, the fortress-like compound that houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and British embassies.

Aiham al-Sammarae, an Iraqi-U.S. citizen who had lived in exile in a Chicago suburb until the 2003 U.S.-led occupation, had been awaiting trial on several corruption charges when he fled the station with the help of private security agents, Iraqi officials said.

Radhi al-Radhi, the head of Iraq's Public Integrity Commission, an anti-corruption panel investigating Sammarae, said in an interview shortly after the escape that he believed the agents were Americans.

December A Very Bloody Month For U.S. Troops (WT/AP)

By Christopher Torchia

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Insurgent attacks killed five more American troops west of the Iraqi capital, the military said yesterday, making December the second-deadliest month for U.S. servicemen in 2006.

So far this month, 76 American troops have died in Iraq, the same number that were killed in all of April.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates flew back to Washington yesterday to give President Bush his advice on transforming U.S. policy in Iraq after holding three days of talks in the war zone with military and political leaders.

Mr. Gates was scheduled to see the president at the mountain retreat of Camp David, Md., today.

Before leaving Baghdad, Mr. Gates declined to say whether he plans to recommend a short-term increase in U.S. troop levels, but said he thinks there is "a broad strategic agreement between the Iraqi military and Iraqi government and our military."

Britain's Defense Secretary Des Browne acknowledged yesterday he may have to increase the size of Britain's armed forces as a result of commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan -- echoing military expansion plans being considered in Washington.

Mr. Browne told the Times of London he could consider increasing the size of the armed forces from 95,560 because current deployments had left too little time for training exercises.

"People imagine that the best form of training is to be in Iraq or Afghanistan, but it's not true," Mr. Browne was quoted as saying by the newspaper. "While we are deploying troops in their thousands, we lose the chance to build up their basic skills."

Poland, which has 900 soldiers in Iraq, agreed yesterday to extend its mission in Iraq until the end of 2007. The Poles focus mainly on training Iraqi security forces and are based in an area south of Baghdad that is calmer than the capital.

Also yesterday, South Korean lawmakers endorsed a motion to extend the country's deployment in Iraq for another year, but cut the number of troops in half. The motion calls on the South Korean government to withdraw 1,100 troops of its 2,300-strong contingent in the relatively peaceful, northern city of Irbil by April.

The five U.S. deaths announced yesterday took place over two days. One soldier died and another was wounded yesterday when their patrol came under fire west of Baghdad, the military said. On Thursday, three Marines and one U.S. sailor died from wounds sustained in combat in western Anbar province.

Meanwhile, Shi'ites from parliament's largest bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, met yesterday in Najaf amid efforts to craft a new coalition that would include Kurds and one Sunni party. They had traveled to the holy city to seek approval for the plan from Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a revered Shi'ite cleric who is said to be alarmed at the bloodshed sweeping swathes of the country.

It was not clear whether such a coalition would be able to govern effectively without the backing of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's 30 loyalists in the 275-member parliament, and his six ministers in the 38-member Cabinet.

The builders of the new coalition are trying to exclude Sheik al-Sadr, whose faction has been an integral part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government but has been boycotting the parliament and Cabinet to protest Mr. al-Maliki's recent meeting with Mr. Bush.

Officials close to the militia leader said he has agreed to end the three-week boycott and allow supporters to rejoin the government.

Separately, the purported leader of an al Qaeda-linked militant group offered U.S. troops a one-month truce to withdraw from Iraq without being attacked, according to a speech posted on an Islamic Web site yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0108827

The authenticity of the tape of Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, could not be verified.

Shiites Remake Baghdad In Their Image (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 — As the United States debates what to do in Iraq, this country's Shiite majority has been moving toward its own solution: making the capital its own.

Large portions of Baghdad have become Shiite in recent months, as militias press their fight against Sunni militants deeper into the heart of the capital, displacing thousands of Sunni residents. At least 10 neighborhoods that a year ago were mixed Sunni and Shiite are now almost entirely Shiite, according to residents, American and Iraqi military commanders and local officials.

For the first years of the war, Sunni militants were dominant, forcing Shiites out of neighborhoods and systematically killing bakers, barbers and trash collectors, who were often Shiites. But starting in February, after the bombing of a shrine in the city of Samarra, Shiite militias began to strike back, pushing west from their strongholds and redrawing the sectarian map of the capital, home to a quarter of Iraq's population.

The Shiite-dominated government publicly condemns violence against Sunnis and says it is trying to stop the militias that carry it out. But the attacks have continued unabated, and Sunnis have grown suspicious.

Plans for a new bridge that would bypass a violent Sunni area in the east, and a proposal for land handouts in towns around Baghdad that would bring Shiites into what are now Sunni strongholds underscored these concerns.

Sunni political control in Baghdad is all but nonexistent: Of the 51 members of the Baghdad Provincial Council, which runs the city's services, just one is Sunni.

In many ways, the changes are a natural development. Shiites, a majority of Iraq's population, were locked out of the ruling elite under Saddam Hussein and now have power that matches their numbers.

The danger, voiced by Sunni Arabs, is that an emboldened militant fringe will conduct broader killings without being stopped by the government, or, some fear, with its help. That could, in turn, draw Sunni countries into the fight and lead to a protracted regional war, precisely the outcome that Americans most fear.

"They say they're against this, but on the ground they do nothing," said Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, a Sunni. He moved his family to the better-protected Green Zone in October.

The debate reaches to the heart of the American enterprise here. While President Bush is considering more troops, some in the Shiite-dominated government say the Americans should stay out of the sectarian fight in Baghdad and let the battle run its course. Getting involved would simply prolong the fight, they say.

At an army base in northern Baghdad, an Iraqi general moved his hand across a map of the capital. The city is dividing fast, he said, writing, "Sunni" and "Shiite" in graceful Arabic script across each neighborhood.

"Now we face a new style of splitting the neighborhoods," said the general, a Shiite. "The politicians are doing this."

Neighborhoods in the east — most vulnerable to Shiite militias from Sadr City, the largest eastern district and one of its poorest — have lost much of their minority Sunni populations since February. Even the solidly middle-class neighborhoods of Zayuna and Ghadier, very mixed as little as six months ago, are starting to lose Sunnis.

In Baladiyad, a once-mixed area of eastern Baghdad, workers smoothed mortar onto brick. A Shiite mosque was taking shape.

On the same block, a half-finished Sunni mosque stood deserted, its facade hung with peeling posters of last year's leaders. Less than a mile away, another mosque has never been used.

"They can't come here now," a Shiite worker said. "They are Sunni."

Further south, in the neighborhood of Naariya, a Shiite refugee family sat in a darkened living room in a house they recently occupied.

The house belonged to a Sunni family, but they had fled after a spate of killings, and the local office of Moktada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric, had arranged for Shiites to move in.

DOJ_NMG_0108828

The new family's scant belongings hung on the wall: a portrait of the father, now dead, and a broken revolver. Somebody else's clock chimed. Mattresses and couches of the previous owners packed the room.

"They told us it's safe here, it's a Shiite neighborhood," said Mustafa, one of the sons. "The Mahdi Army is protecting the area," he said, referring to Mr. Sadr's militia. Family members declined to give their name for safety reasons.

The family has no sympathy for the Sunnis. They fled Baquba, a relentlessly violent town north of Baghdad, after Sunni militants killed their father, a man in his 70's; kidnapped a brother; and shot another brother dead.

Around 400 Shiite families have fled from Baquba to Naariya and a nearby neighborhood, Baghdad Jedidah, over the past few months, said Mustafa, citing local officials in Mr. Sadr's office.

"We are a ship that sank under the ocean," said his mother, Aziza, 46.

Besides, Mustafa said, Shiite militias pursue only Sunnis with suspicious affiliations. The Sunni militias, on the other hand, "are killing anyone who is Shiite," Aziza said. (A relative in a separate conversation said one of Aziza's sons had killed more than 10 Sunnis since coming to Baghdad this fall. The family denied any involvement in militias.)

Aziza added, "My husband was an ordinary man."

But a divided Iraq can destroy ordinary people.

A Sunni man named Bassim, his Shiite wife and their three small children said Shiite militiamen forced them to leave their home in Huriya, west of the Tigris, one chilly afternoon this month. Bassim left two jobs as a butcher and a hospital cleaner because they were in very Shiite neighborhoods.

"My husband is a Sunni, but he has nothing to do with insurgents," said his wife, Zahra Kareem Alwan, holding her sobbing daughter on her hip in a school in Adel, a Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad where families took temporary refuge. Boxes of water were stacked in a corner.

Last week, the family was moved to an empty house farther west. They did not know the owner.

Shiite leaders argue that the Iraqi Army would not allow massacres. They say Americans will be embedded with units as a safety check.

In Huriya, it was an Iraqi Army unit that helped Ms. Alwan and other families into trucks and brought them to Adel. An American colonel advising the Iraqi Army unit that controls the area said that Shiites occupied the houses within 48 hours. Americans counted about 180 families who had fled. The Iraqi general said it was 50.

Shiite political leaders were skeptical.

"These are lies," said Hadi al-Amiri, head of the security committee in Parliament and of the Badr Organization, the armed wing of one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite parties.

"It's merely propaganda to create fears among Arabs," he added, a reference to Sunni Arab countries.

The main problem, Mr. Amiri said, was Sunni insurgents and their suicide bombs.

"They want to go back to the old equation, when they were the officers and the Shia were just soldiers and slaves," Mr. Amiri said, with an intensity that spoke of deep scars inflicted by the past government, referring to the loyalists to Saddam Hussein. "This will never happen again. They should believe in the new equation."

Using the unlikely analogy of Mr. Hussein draining the marshes in southern Iraq to destroy the marsh Arabs, Mr. Amiri talked about ways that Baghdad could be encircled to choke off the supply lines of Sunni militants, for instance, by fortifying a network of rivers, a dam, and several highways.

"He divided it, drained the water, and within two to three years it was a desert," he said. "I believe Baghdad will be like this."

Militias are already doing their part to defend Shiites. In a Shiite mosque in northern Baghdad, refugees from the embattled northern village of Sabaa al-Bour, many of them women in black abayas, gathered in October asking for food and shelter.

Killings of Shiites in the town had enraged leaders in Baghdad. But weeks had dragged on, and one morning in October, a volunteer walked through the refugees telling them to go back home.

The Mahdi Army was there now, she said. The town was now safe for Shiites.

Shiites are also making inroads on local and federal levels. Baghdad's municipal government is taking bids for designs of a bridge that would connect Greyat with Kadhimiya, two major Shiite areas in northern Baghdad on opposite sides of the Tigris River. Adhamiya, a Sunni area where the bridge is now and where it has been closed, would be bypassed altogether.

DOJ_NMG_0108829

"The former regime refused to make the connection because it would strengthen the Shia," said Naem al-Kaabi, a deputy mayor of Baghdad.

In another plan that appears intended to repopulate heavily Sunni-controlled areas with Shiites, the Ministry of Public Works has proposed giving land to victims of violence inflicted by Mr. Hussein and by insurgents since 2003. The plots would be in six towns outside Baghdad — Abu Ghraib, Taji, Salman Pak, Husseiniya, Mahmudiya and Latifiya, according to a local official familiar with the plan.

Sunni militants now control the towns and have conducted brutal campaigns to eliminate Shiites. Mr. Hussein gave favors to Sunni tribes there to protect against Shiites from the south. Few Sunnis claim compensation as victims of violence, since the application requires visits to police stations and hospitals, places no longer safe for Sunnis.

It was not clear how soon the plan would be carried out. A previous proposal, made by the Iraqi cabinet last year, would give some land in heavily Sunni west Baghdad to about 3,000 families, but names are still being registered.

In another indication of the current mood, a popular cellphone ring in eastern Baghdad, now largely Shiite, is a tune with the words: "If you can't beat me, don't fight me."

The Sunni houses in Naariya did not empty easily. A college student with a Sunni name said he hid in his house, as Shiite militiamen went into homes on his block in late September and marched people away. A few days later, his uncle, a 35-year-old refrigerator repairman, was taken. The body was found in Ur, a Shiite stronghold in north Baghdad.

But unlike a bomb blast, where everybody remembers how someone died, the Sunnis' losses seems to melt away. The Mahdi Army-controlled police station had no record of them.

Terrified, the men of the family scattered, settling on couches and in a garage of friends and family.

The student, Omar, is keeping a diary.

"One day I'll be a teacher," he said. "I should teach children what we passed through."

Iraqis Sue Over Oil-for-food Program (AP)

By Larry Neumeister,

AP, December 23, 2006

Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying they were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted.

The lawsuit, brought by seven Iraqi individuals seeking class-action status on behalf of northern Iraqis, said the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003.

The suit, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks at least $200 million in damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

According to the lawsuit, residents of the Irbil, Dokuk and Sulaimaniyah areas of Iraq claimed they did not receive the full benefits to which they were entitled.

The lawsuit said the companies stole from the Iraqis "by engaging in a brazen kickback scheme" in which money earmarked for the benefit of Iraqis was instead improperly transferred "into the coffers of Saddam Hussein's corrupt Iraqi regime or used to indemnify goods suppliers, including AWB, for the bribes they had paid Iraq."

The lawsuit said the companies disguised and misrepresented the kickbacks to make them appear to be legitimate costs. It also accused them of knowing or recklessly disregarding that money was being paid illegally to the government of Saddam Hussein.

BNP paid as much as $1.5 billion in kickbacks to Hussein's government while AWB paid more than $200 million, the lawsuit claims.

BNP is headquartered in Paris, France, but has offices in the United States, including New York. Edwina Frawley, a BNP spokeswoman, said she had no comment Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0108830

A government-commissioned report in Australia was released several weeks ago saying AWB paid $220 million in kickbacks to former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's regime from 1999 to 2003 to secure lucrative wheat contracts under the oil-for-food scheme.

Under the oil-for-food program, AWB, which had sold wheat to Iraq since 1948, sold 6.8 million tons to the nation, receiving more than $2.3 billion in payments, the lawsuit said.

"It's the first I've heard of it," AWB spokesman Peter McBride said of the lawsuit. "It would be an ill-conceived action, and if it's brought to fruition, it would be vigorously defended."

In late November, in response to the government-commissioned report, the wheat exporter accepted responsibility for the scandal and announced a corporate restructuring plan.

Iraq no longer permits AWB to send wheat there.

In October 2005, a U.N.-backed investigation said in a report that about 2,200 companies in the oil-for-food program, including corporations in the United States, France, Germany and Russia, paid a total of $1.8 billion in kickbacks and illicit surcharges to Saddam Hussein's government.

A message seeking comment from lawyers Gary Osen and Joshua Glatter was not returned Friday evening.

The lawsuit was filed in New York because, it says, "the defendants maintained offices, conducted or transacted substantial business and committed acts in New York."

Iraqis' Suit Targets 2 Firms In U.N. Oil-for-Food Program (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 22 -- Seven Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying the Iraqis were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted.

The lawsuit seeks class-action status on behalf of northern Iraqis. It alleges that the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

A government-commissioned report in Australia was released several weeks ago; it said AWB paid $220 million in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's government from 1999 to 2003 to secure lucrative wheat contracts under the oil-for-food plan.

In October 2005, a United Nations-backed investigation said in a report that about 2,200 companies in the oil-for-food program, including corporations in the United States, France, Germany and Russia, paid a total of $1.8 billion in kickbacks and illicit surcharges to Hussein's government.

In a related matter, the United Nations announced that the documents from that investigation will be stored for at least two years, and made available to U.N. member nations, if the secretary general approves. The papers will not be released to the public.

Flurry Of Calls About Draft, And A Day Of Denials (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — As the de facto media contact for the Selective Service System, Dick Flahavan is the Maytag repairman of government press people. With the military draft out of business since 1973, the Selective Service just doesn't get a lot of calls these days.

But by midday Friday, Mr. Flahavan's office had fielded dozens of inquiries, not just from reporters but from some anxious parents as well, all with some variation of the same urgent question: Are you reinstituting the draft?

So adamant was the denial that Mr. Flahavan, a bit beleaguered, had his staff members post an unplanned update Friday morning at the top of Selective Service's Web site: "No Draft on Horizon!"

DOJ_NMG_0108831

What prompted all this was a Hearst wire service article noting that the Selective Service was making plans for a "mock" draft exercise that would use computerized models to determine how, if necessary, the government would get some 100,000 young adults to report to their local draft boards.

The mock computer exercise, last carried out in 1998, is strictly routine, Selective Service officials said, and it will not actually be run until 2009 — if at all. The exercise has been scheduled several times in the last few years, only to be scuttled each time because of budget and staffing problems, and Mr. Flahavan said he would not be surprised if it was canceled this time around, too.

No matter. With President Bush saying that he wants to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps, the military strained near the breaking point and the secretary of veterans affairs suggesting publicly this week that a reconstituted draft could "benefit" the country, even the notion of a mock exercise seemed to strike a nerve.

Since the start of the war in Iraq, some Democrats and Internet bloggers have been stirring up talk of a "secret plan" by the Bush administration to resume the draft, and the mere mention of the idea summons Vietnam-era images of birthday-generated draft lotteries and draft evaders fleeing to Canada.

Mr. Flahavan, an associate director of the Selective Service who has worked there for nearly two decades, has seen fears of a draft enflamed before — most notably at the start of the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and the start of the Iraq war in 2003, as anxious parents would call to ask what effect their son's heart murmur would have on his draft status. He said he understood the anxiety caused by this week's latest round of reports, even if he found the whole thing somewhat irksome.

"People think, 'Aha, they're having an exercise, dusting off the plans, a draft must be right around the corner,' " he said.

The reality, said Mr. Flahavan, who spent most of Friday tamping down the fears, is that "this is much ado about nothing."

"None of that is accurate," he said.

White House officials did their part to dampen the speculation as well.

"The president's position has not changed," said Trey Bohn, a spokesman for the White House. "He supports an all-volunteer military, and the administration is not considering reinstating the draft."

Although senior military officers agree that the armed forces are stretched, they also agree that a return to the draft is not the best way to fill the ranks. Draftees, they say, are not as motivated as volunteers, and tend to leave as soon as possible, after spending much of their time in costly training. Re-enlistment rates are much higher among volunteers.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, has championed the idea of bringing back the draft, calling attention to what he sees as social and economic inequities in the volunteer military. The House rejected his bill in 2004, by 402 votes to 2. Mr. Rangel has said he will try again, but other Democratic leaders have been cool to the idea.

The exercise planned for 2009 would run computerized models to assign random lottery picks by birthday and simulate the processes for notifying those selected and for lodging conscientious objector claims.

William A. Chatfield, director of the Selective Service, said Friday that "we try to send out a signal of strength that we're prepared." The Selective Service, he said, needs to be ready "if something totally unforeseen should come upon us."

But for now, the chances of that happening are "very, very, very low," Mr. Chatfield said. "There's nothing even being discussed in a remote fashion, but you have people trying to create fear when there's nothing there."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens Chief Bullish In Spite Of Bribery Scandal (FT)

By Richard Milne

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

Klaus Kleinfeld, chief executive of Siemens, says he sympathises with the Queen Elizabeth II's complaint at Christmas in 1992 of having suffered an annus horribilis.

Fighting to save his reputation - and that of Europe's largest engineering group - amid a €420m ($553m) bribery scandal, Mr Kleinfeld has already had to undergo the indignity of giving up a 30 per cent pay rise and becoming perhaps the most unpopular manager in Germany after a former division became insolvent.

DOJ_NMG_0108832

A €20bn joint venture in telecommunications equipment with Nokia has been postponed for up to three months. There has also been talk of bans on Siemens conducting business in certain countries affected by the bribery scandal.

But in an interview over lunch at the German group's Munich headquarters Mr Kleinfeld strikes a bullish note, annus horribilis or not.

"We have managed to add €12bn to our top line - that is the size of a medium-sized Dax [the German blue-chip index] company."

The chief executive shows boyish enthusiasm as he discusses rises in profitability and the advantages of being a conglomerate.

Mr Kleinfeld is adamant that the Nokia deal will go ahead - almost certainly without financial penalties for Siemens.

But there is little doubt that he is taxed by the bribery scandal and the bashing Siemens' reputation has received as a result.

Mr Kleinfeld says he is determined not only that the truth comes out about what happened but that "five years down the road I want people to say that Siemens [sets] an example for a transparent company".

Many outside experts, lawyers of suspects in the scandal and even some Siemens managers argue that the group's culture has at least tolerated bribery, if not encouraged it.

Mr Kleinfeld feels that the hiring of an external law firm, Debevoise & Plimpton; outside auditors, Deloitte; and an anti-corruption expert, Watergate investigator Michael Hershman, show how serious the company is about addressing its problems.

Mr Kleinfeld was briefly responsible in 2004 for the telecoms division where the slush funds for the alleged bribery originated. The chief executive says he was so busy working on the restructuring of the division that he barely had any time for anything else. Shortly after the restructuring ended, he was named chief executive of the whole group.

But the suspect payments continued. Mr Kleinfeld says he learned about one suspect account in Switzerland at the end of January as part of Siemens' own investigations. When his offices were raided in mid-November he presumed it was an extension of that probe.

He says that, prior to prosecutors' investigations, he did not know of the alleged connection and scale of the various bribery schemes. Prosecutors say Mr Kleinfeld and Siemens are witnesses and not suspects in their investigation.

The chief executive talked to the US Securities and Exchange Commission and Department of Justice after the raids and in four subsequent conversations has sought approval for each of Siemens' clean-up efforts.

He says the alleged bribery was not a normal business practice, as lawyers for the suspects have argued, but a criminal enterprise. "You need three signatures to interfere with the SAP [payment bookings] system - and it is possible if, as it looks like here, they all work together."

Mr Kleinfeld underlines that with an average of 9m financial payments a day, oversight of all of them is difficult.

The idea that to wincontracts in some countries, bribes are necessary is swiftly rebuffed. "Particularly when we have transactions in these countries we were clear that the business management had to be more careful [with regard] to the[se] topics [bribery]," he says.

Mr Kleinfeld also defends Heinrich von Pierer, his predecessor as chief executive and the company's current chairman, from critics who say he should accept responsibility for the scandal and resign.

In a comment that underlines his unapologetically capitalist nature, which has often rubbed up the German public the wrong way, Mr Kleinfeld says: "This is not a political organisation. We have to run a company here in the best way possible and not be deflected."

Siemens CEO Hopes New Audit Cuts Scope Of Suspected Fraud (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

MUNICH, Germany -- Siemens AG Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld said he is hopeful the financial scope of alleged fraud at the German conglomerate will shrink from the €420 million ($553 million) in transactions the company has identified as suspicious.

DOJ_NMG_0108833

Mr. Kleinfeld defended top management's role in the money-laundering and bribery investigation, saying that Europe's largest engineering company by sales has tightened compliance procedures in recent years.

But he also acknowledged that the investigation, which has forced the delay of a €16 billion merger of the telecommunications equipment divisions of Siemens and Finland's Nokia Corp., has exposed shortcomings in corporate governance at the German company.

"I don't think anybody can claim they were not aware of the behavior that was expected from the top," Mr. Kleinfeld said in an interview at the company's headquarters, adding that he was "shocked" and "disappointed" by signs of wrongdoing.

Mr. Kleinfeld said the probe indicates Siemens isn't "best in class" when it comes to corporate governance. "With the knowledge I have today, I would fully back that view," said Mr. Kleinfeld, who joined the company in 1987 and became chief executive in January 2005.

Siemens said last week it had found €420 million in suspicious transactions dating back seven years -- twice the amount that German prosecutors had flagged last month after more than 200 police raided company offices. Prosecutors have arrested several current and former employees, including senior managers.

On Friday, six suspects taken into custody in the corruption investigation were released after questioning, prosecutors said. The suspects, including the ex-head of its telecommunications equipment unit, were detained in the November raids.

Investigators suspect that company officials funneled funds into secret bank accounts and bogus consulting contracts to pay bribes to potential customers abroad. Siemens itself hasn't been charged with any wrongdoing.

Among those jailed so far is Thomas Ganswindt, a former management-board member who left Siemens at the end of September. Mr. Ganswindt was released from custody Thursday after denying any wrongdoing, his lawyer said.

The corruption allegations are the strongest yet to hit Siemens, which is active in nearly 200 countries and has been enmeshed in other bribery scandals in the past. They also come at a delicate time for Mr. Kleinfeld, who is pushing hard to restructure unprofitable businesses.

Mr. Kleinfeld reiterated that Siemens believes the alleged wrongdoing was confined to its struggling telecommunications equipment unit and to a group of individuals who circumvented financial controls on their own initiative. He said Siemens is being "very conservative" in reaching the €420 million total for suspect transactions and that he is hopeful a follow-up audit will find some of those transactions to have been legitimate.

The 49-year-old executive said the conglomerate, whose range products include medical scanners and power turbines, has implemented stronger controls in recent years so that financial transactions require multiple signatures. The approval process for consulting contracts also was toughened last year, he added.

Siemens announced last week it had hired the law firm Debevoise & Plimpton LLP to make an independent inquiry into the company's financial controls. It also hired Michael Hershman, a co-founder of Transparency International, the nongovernmental corruption watchdog, as a private consultant.

Mr. Kleinfeld said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Department of Justice are "very happy" with last week's measures by Siemens, whose shares trade in Frankfurt and New York. In a regulatory filing last week, the company warned that the SEC and Justice Department could launch investigations of their own. SEC and Justice Department officials declined to comment.

Citing the criminal probe, Siemens and Nokia last week said they would delay the planned merger of their carrier networks businesses.

U.S. Oil-gas Unit Is Subject Of Two Criminal Investigations (MRT)

Midland (TX) Reporter-Telegram, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property.

The new investigations are still in the early stages, said congressional officials who were briefed earlier this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator.

The investigations are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters.

One of the Justice inquiries involves Interior officials in Denver who manage the government's fast-growing program to collect "royalties in kind," which are royalties in the form of oil and gas rather than in financial payments, people briefed on the investigation said.

That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the FBI.

Devaney, the department's inspector general, is already conducting two other investigations into suspected mismanagement of the minerals agency. And just last week, he issued a scathing criticism of the agency's system for auditing oil and gas royalty payments.Devaney is also finishing up an investigation into how the Interior Department signed 1,100 oil and gas leases in the late 1990s that inadvertently permitted companies to avoid up to $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The errors were made during the Clinton administration, but people briefed on Devaney's investigation said he had concluded that high-ranking agency officials either knew or should have known about the problem at least two years ago.

Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., said Thursday in a statement that Devaney had briefed his staff.

"The two criminal referrals by the Department of Interior's inspector general to the FBI and Justice Department are proof positive that the conflicts of interest between Bush administration regulators and those they regulate in the oil and gas industry are costing the American taxpayers billions in royalty revenues," Markey said.

Word of the criminal investigations surfaced just as the Interior Department announced Thursday that five big oil producers had voluntarily renegotiated leases and agreed to not exploit a loophole that could save them hundreds of millions of dollars each.

The leases gave companies an incentive to drill in deep waters in the Gulf of Mexico by letting them skip royalties on millions of barrels of oil and gas. But the leases omitted a standard escape clause that would have required the companies to pay in full if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Interior officials have said the mistake, if left unchanged, could cost the government as much as $10 billion.

The Interior Department said Thursday that it had concluded new deals with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil, Royal Dutch Shell and Walter Oil and Gas. Those companies hold about 17 percent of the flawed leases, according to Interior data.

But about 50 other companies have not yet agreed to change their leases. Among them is Chevron, one of the biggest potential beneficiaries of the error. Chevron and several partners could save more than $1 billion in royalties in years to come if the lease language is not changed.

Don Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, said company executives had met several times with government officials to resolve the matter. Campbell said his company "put a reasonable offer forward" and would "look forward to further discussions."

The new agreements did little to mollify the Interior Department's Republican and Democratic critics in Congress.

The incoming Democratic chairman and the retiring Republican chairman of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, suggesting that the leases might never have been valid and that the government might be able to force the companies to pay up.

Officials have provided few details about the new criminal investigations, except to say they are "related" to previous inquiries of the royalty-management program.

Started about six years ago, the royalty-in-kind program has become a multibillion dollar trading program run from Denver. Since President Bush took office, Interior officials and many of the industry's biggest producers have argued that the government should collect as much of its royalties as possible through "in kind" payments because, they say, the accounting is much simpler.

In 2005, the Interior Department collected about $3 billion worth of royalties in oil and gas -- about a third of the total. The government funnels much of the oil it receives to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, but it sells virtually all its natural gas and sends the cash to the Treasury.

DOJ_NMG_0108835

Congressional officials briefed this week by Devaney said he had cautioned that both of the criminal investigations would last several more months. Devaney said it was possible the investigations would not lead to criminal charges, though he suggested that they should lead at least to disciplinary actions.

Lam's Link To Pension Witness Challenged (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 23, 2006

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is, or was, a longtime client of financial adviser and pension whistle-blower Diann Shipione – a relationship that some lawyers said raises the specter of conflict of interest.

Shipione, a vice president at UBS Financial, an investment banking and securities firm, is likely to be a key witness in the federal case brought by Lam's office against five former San Diego pension officials.

Defense attorneys said Lam may have been improperly influenced by Shipione and that the entire case is tainted as a result. They said they intend to investigate and possibly seek dismissal of the case, but some legal experts said that without proof of egregious misconduct, such a severe remedy is unlikely.

Lam reported the relationship to Justice Department superiors as soon as it became apparent that Shipione could become a witness in the case. The department's ethics advisers concluded there was no issue.

"The Department of Justice has determined that there are no ethical or conflict issues that require Ms. Lam to be recused from the pension case," said Debra Hartman, Lam's spokeswoman, in an e-mail statement. Citing "pending litigation," Lam declined to answer questions about the nature and length of the relationship or whether it continues.

Shipione gained attention for her repeated warnings of abuses in the city retirement system when she was a board member. Although she was privately dismissed by her colleagues and system bureaucrats as a gadfly, her suspicions proved correct.

The city now faces a pension deficit of at least $1.43 billion; last month the Securities and Exchange Commission found that the city defrauded investors in 2002 and 2003 by not disclosing a massive pension deficit; and two criminal prosecutions of former pension officials are under way.

Under federal grand jury indictment are Shipione's former pension board colleagues, then-trustees Ronald Saathoff, Cathy Lexin and Teresa Webster, administrator Lawrence Grissom and pension system lawyer Loraine Chapin. They are charged with fraud and conspiracy in connection with actions that contributed to the deficit.

Shipione, who also declined an interview request but issued an e-mail statement, said, "As a matter of industry policy and my professional policy, I do not discuss any professional or client relationship matters."

'Ax to grind' Defense lawyers said they heard rumors that Shipione handled Lam's trust funds and that they sent letters to prosecutors asking for an explanation, to no avail.

"We're going to make a motion about that, that there's been a conflict of interest and some kind of prosecutorial misconduct," said Victor Sherman, lawyer for Saathoff. "We've written a number of letters to prosecutors, and all they do is stonewall; they send letters back that say, 'What difference does it make,' things like that.

"We think it's going to result in a dismissal because it's the result of improper influence. The U.S. attorney has been influenced by someone that has an ax to grind."

City Attorney Michael Aguirre said the move would be a smear tactic by the defense.

"If the Justice Department has made that judgment, then it becomes clear that this is just an effort to try and distract the focus from what it should be on – the wrongdoing of the defendants," Aguirre said.

"This is what people do when they are in a lot of trouble and they're desperate. If you don't have the law on your side, you attack the facts, and if you don't have the facts on your side, you attack the law, and if you don't have either on your side, you attack the prosecutor."

A gray area Legal experts said matters of recusal are a gray area.

"Part of my reaction is, what bad luck for Carol Lam," said University of San Diego law professor Shaun Martin. "I can only assume (the relationship) predated (the pension case). Assuming that it did, that's terrible luck, and it raises a slew of recusal issues that I'm quite sure they wish never existed and which probably explain their profound reluctance to talk about it with anyone.

"Financial planners usually have a very intimate relationship with their clients, and vice versa, so anytime someone with whom you have an intimate relationship is a witness, there's a real possibility of a conflict of interest. This is someone who knows all about the money you make and who presumably you've told quite a bit of private information to."

If the defense does file a motion, a judge could deny it or order that Lam or her entire office be recused from the case and that it be switched to a U.S. attorney in another district or to a special prosecutor. Such a move would add months or years to the litigation process and could kill the case, experts said.

Or, the judge could decide that the case should be dismissed, but that's about as likely as the state of California falling into the ocean, Martin said.

Extent of relationship "Based upon what we know now, which is just that they had a relationship, there's no way the case will be dismissed or the entire office will be recused," Martin said. "If something weird happened, if (Lam) was talking with (Shipione) about the case, then an extraordinary remedy would at least be in the ballpark.

"Assuming the only relationship is a pre-existing business relationship, the best that you could hope for is that Carol Lam couldn't be personally involved in the prosecution."

The outcome depends on the extent of the relationship, and the defense is likely to move for a hearing to discover whether Shipione played any role in determining whether to file charges and against whom, said criminal defense attorney Geoffrey C. Morrison, who is not involved in the case. The defense probably would seek to question Lam.

Disclosing the matter to the Justice Department was not enough, some experts said.

"We don't know at this point whether it was disclosed to the court or to the defense, but if not, it was a horrible mistake," Morrison said.

"When you don't disclose, you're denying them the opportunity to raise the issue, and if you're wrong about the impact of the conflict, you risk sanctions that are far more Draconian than had the conflict been disclosed at the outset."

Cfius Probe Blamed For Sale Of Voting-machine Company (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

A company with ties to Venezuela yesterday blamed Washington's increasing scrutiny of foreign acquisitions of US assets for its decision to sell a California-based voting-machine company it acquired last year.

The move by Smartmatic comes months after the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US (Cfius) opened an investigation into the national security implications of the company's ownership of Sequoia, a supplier of voting machines used in US elections.

The inter-agency committee took the unusual step of investigating the deal months after it was completed, when a New York congresswoman, Carolyn Maloney, wrote to the then Treasury secretary, John Snow, with questions about the deal and whether the company had ties to the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

The company's announcement underscores how influential Congress can be in forcing executive branch agencies, which have primary oversight over such deals, to investigate transactions on national security grounds.

The Smartmatic chief executive, Antonio Mugica, yesterday denied that any foreign government had ever held an ownership stake in the group, saying the company was "owned primarily by four young entrepreneurs and their families".

"Sequoia and Smartmatic are two great companies with very bright futures and we do not want the companies' ownership to be a distraction," Mr Mugica, a dual Spanish/Venezuelan citizen, said.

The agencies that comprise Cfius, including the Treasury, Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security, have markedly increased their scrutiny of foreign acquisitions this year, after the inter-agency panel was criticised by lawmakers for failing to block the takeover of five US port terminals by a Dubai-owned company.

DOJ_NMG_0108837

Non-US companies that acquire sensitive US assets, particularly in the fields of defence and technology, have traditionally applied voluntarily for Cfius review. Smartmatic did not apply for one until the government began to take an interest in the deal after it was completed.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Dropped (NYT)

By David Barstow And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., Dec. 22 — The Durham district attorney dropped rape charges against three former Duke lacrosse players on Friday, but he said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges that carry equally stiff sentences.

The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, who has faced relentless and rising criticism for his handling of the case, said he dismissed the rape charges because the accuser had begun to waver on crucial details.

The woman, who said she was attacked while performing as a stripper at a lacrosse team party last March, has repeatedly asserted that she endured violent penile penetration. She said this to the first doctor who saw her, to the sexual-assault nurse, to the sexual-assault doctor, to detectives and in her own handwritten statement to the police, records show. She also consistently said she was forced onto her hands and knees and raped from behind.

Yet when questioned again on Thursday afternoon by Mr. Nifong's investigator, the woman said for the first time that she could no longer be sure what had penetrated her.

Mr. Nifong said her uncertainty required him to act.

"Since there is no scientific or other evidence independent of the victim's testimony that would corroborate specifically penetration by a penis, the state is unable to meet its burden of proof with respect to this offense," he said in court papers.

But his decision, coming in a case that has already transfixed and divided this state and much of the nation, also intensified questions about Mr. Nifong himself. Since the first frenzied weeks of this case, Mr. Nifong's judgment has repeatedly come under fire. Defense lawyers, defendants' families and friends, bloggers and many experts have attacked him for making early outspoken comments about the case, setting up a lineup that violated police procedures, failing to interview the woman himself and sitting on evidence favorable to the defendants. Above all, they say, he ignored his basic obligation to seek the truth.

One defense lawyer, Wade M. Smith, said that after all the revelations, Mr. Nifong ought to "do the honorable thing" and drop the remaining charges. "We have this bare assertion and nothing else, and we've come three-quarters of a year down the road with the suffering of these people," Mr. Smith said.

Mr. Nifong declined interview requests Friday, but said in an e-mail message that his decision to dismiss the rape charges showed he was "willing to go in whatever direction the evidence takes me." And in a three-hour interview on Thursday, Mr. Nifong said he would not hesitate to drop all the charges if the accuser expressed doubt about the identity of the men she has accused when she sees all three defendants at a pretrial hearing set for February.

"If she came in and said she could not identify her assailants, then we don't have a case," Mr. Nifong said. On the other hand, he continued, "If she says, yes, it's them, or one or two of them, I have an obligation to put that to a jury."

The woman, a 28-year-old single mother who worked for an escort service, danced at an adult club and attended North Carolina Central University in Durham, told the police she was gang-raped by the three lacrosse players on March 13 after she and another dancer performed at the team party. The accuser said that her assailants did not wear condoms and that at least one ejaculated.

But despite extensive DNA testing, including tests sensitive enough to detect DNA from a single cell, Mr. Nifong has not linked any of the defendants — or any other members of the lacrosse team — to DNA on the rape kit swabs or the accuser's clothing.

Although the woman identified three lacrosse players as her rapists from an array of photographs, Mr. Nifong said she would get a better look at them at the pretrial hearing in February. "You can't always tell from a photograph," he said, adding,

DOJ_NMG_0108838

"The only real time that you're able to say if you have a misidentification is to put the person in the courtroom with the other people."

Mr. Nifong said he intends to ask the woman about her level of certitude after February's hearing. "It's an opportunity to say, 'Yes, I'm 100 percent certain these are the people who did it,' " he said. "It's also an opportunity to express doubt." Given the absence of physical evidence, he said, any doubts from the woman could end the prosecution for one or more of the defendants.

As it happened, as Mr. Nifong made those remarks on Thursday afternoon, the woman was expressing new doubts to his investigator, doubts that forced him to drop the rape charges late Friday morning.

Mr. Nifong's reversal escalated the mounting criticism of his conduct. Cracks in his case began to appear last spring when one suspect, Reade W. Seligmann, produced a cellphone log and other records showing that he left the party early. That alibi evidence raised questions about the timeline of the reported assault.

On Friday, defense lawyers responded with a barrage of new accusations of bad faith. In interviews and at a news conference, they accused Mr. Nifong and the woman of tailoring her account to minimize the impact of recently disclosed DNA tests that they say confirm their clients' innocence.

Those tests, conducted on rape kit swabs and underwear collected from the woman hours after the party, found traces of sperm and other DNA material from several men, none of them the defendants or their teammates. The results were not disclosed to the defense team until late October, almost seven months after they were provided to prosecutors.

"Now, since the revelation of exculpatory DNA tests, all of a sudden, there's no penile penetration," Joseph B. Cheshire, a lawyer for one of the players, said in an interview.

On Thursday, Mr. Nifong acknowledged knowing about those test results before any players were indicted last spring. He also acknowledged that the results were relevant and "potentially exculpatory," and he said he should have given the results to the defense before May 18, the day he signed a filing that said "the state is not aware of any additional material or information which may be exculpatory in nature."

But Mr. Nifong denied the defense team's contention that he had deliberately tried to hide the results or delay their release. Mr. Nifong, who is personally overseeing this case, said that given the volume of evidence he had not realized that he had failed to turn over those specific DNA test results. "That wasn't something I was concentrating on," he said.

For Mr. Nifong, Friday's announcement capped a week in which he seemed to be losing support and gaining critics from many quarters.

On Tuesday, the normally supportive editorial page of Durham's main newspaper, The Herald-Sun, described some of Mr. Nifong's actions as "flawed" and "inexplicable." On Thursday, Irving Joyner, a law professor monitoring the case for the state N.A.A.C.P., said for the first time that Mr. Nifong should consider recusing himself. The N.A.A.C.P. has been watching the case because the accuser is black and the defendants are white.

Woody Vann, a Durham defense lawyer who said he respects Mr. Nifong as a prosecutor, said in an interview that he did not know of a single lawyer in town who thought Mr. Nifong had a winnable case.

Robert C. Trenkle, another Durham defense lawyer, said that while Friday's retreat "makes perfect tactical sense," criticism was growing nonetheless. "I can't exactly figure out what Mike Nifong's doing other than committing career suicide and possibly inviting ethics charges," Mr. Trenkle said.

Led by defense lawyers, a team that includes some of the most prominent and experienced lawyers in the state, a growing chorus of critics is calling for Mr. Nifong to be removed from the case, and even investigated for prosecutorial misconduct.

Mr. Cheshire, the defense lawyer, asserted that Friday's action fit a broader pattern: "Mr. Nifong and his accuser are continually changing their stories to fit new evidence." The woman, for example, first said the players did not wear condoms, but after initial laboratory tests did not show the presence of semen, Mr. Nifong said it was possible that her assailants did wear condoms.

"I think he's got a conflict of interest between defending himself and prosecuting the case," Mr. Cheshire said.

Mr. Nifong rejected the notion of stepping aside. "We don't traditionally let the defense decide who gets to prosecute their case," he said. He also accused defense lawyers of using the new DNA test results as part of a campaign of "character assassination" against the accuser.

DOJ_NMG_0108839

"What is the best way to keep the case from coming to trial?" he asked. "Probably the best way is to attack the victim. If you can keep the victim from coming to court, if you make the victim say, 'Gee, this isn't worth it.' "

The remaining kidnapping charge refers to the woman's accusation that the three players held her captive while they assaulted her in a bathroom. Under North Carolina law, the other remaining charge, sexual offense, is any unwanted oral or anal sexual act or "penetration, however slight, by any object." Rape refers only to unwanted vaginal intercourse.

Mr. Nifong said the woman was resolved to go forward. "You can't make everybody back away from a fight," he said.

In Thursday's interview, Mr. Nifong addressed many of the questions that have been raised about his handling of this case, including his dealings with the news media, his controversial decision to show the accuser only photographs of members of the lacrosse team and his decision not to question the accuser himself about the events of March 13.

Mr. Nifong said he had not yet talked to the woman about the case because he preferred to rely on investigator interviews and to assess her credibility through talking with her about other things.

He also expressed remorse for some of the comments he made to reporters in the first weeks after the party. He said, for example, that he was wrong to refer to Duke lacrosse players as "a bunch of hooligans."

"I regret having used that word," he said.

Mr. Nifong, a 28-year career prosecutor, said he had not been contacted by the Justice Department, which has been asked to intervene by a North Carolina congressman. He declined to say, though, whether any state authorities, like the State Bar Association, had contacted him.

Almost lost in the uproar of the past week, a 42-page defense motion filed on Dec. 14 raised new questions about the woman's reliability in identifying the men who stand accused of kidnapping and sexual offenses.

The police showed her three sets of photographs during the first three weeks of the case, one with 24 lacrosse players, one with 12, and, after she failed to identify any suspects, one with all 46 white players.

She identified only one person with 100 percent certainty in two photo arrays as having been present at the team party. But that person, Dan Ross, was not there. He was 24 miles away in a dorm room in Raleigh.

The woman also identified the wrong player as having held up a broomstick while making a sexually crude remark to the two dancers.

As previously reported, she did not identify two of the defendants — Mr. Seligmann and David F. Evans — as attackers when she saw their pictures in the first photo arrays. She said it was harder than she thought because "the people in the photos looked alike," police investigators wrote. Yet she later identified Mr. Seligmann with 100 percent certainty and Mr. Evans with 90 percent certainty, saying he "looks just like him without the mustache." Mr. Evans has never had a mustache.

The final identification procedure contained photographs the police had taken of all 46 white lacrosse players. By not including any filler photographs of people who could not possibly be involved, the procedure appeared to violate Durham police, state and national standards for photo lineups and was called by the defense "a multiple-choice test in which there were no wrong answers."

Mr. Nifong said this technique was not a photo lineup as that term is applied to police guidelines. "What is a lineup?" he asked. "What if I have no idea who did the assault?"

Defense lawyers, though, said the identification procedures were so flawed and suggestive that the accuser should be barred from making an in-court identification at trial. Their motion attacking the lineups will be heard starting Feb. 5.

Mr. Cheshire, the lawyer for Mr. Evans, said he relished the opportunity to cross-examine the woman he calls "the false accuser." Mr. Nifong said it would be the most important pretrial hearing in the case — in part because of the ruling, in part because it will be the first time "my victim" is back in a room with members of the Duke lacrosse team.

"I have told the defense attorneys that if at any time the victim in this case tells me that she thinks that one of these people who have been identified was not her assailant, as soon as she tells me that, then that case will go away," he said. "I've said I'm not interested in prosecuting somebody that's innocent. But until she tells me that, until she tells me these are not the right guys, we're prosecuting this case."

Bush Pardons Short List (WT/AP)

DOJ_NMG_0108840

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

President Bush gave a pre-Christmas gift to 17 minor criminals, but even after adding these pardons and one sentence commutation to his record he remains one of the least-forgiving of presidents.

Six of the federal offenses involved in the 16 pardons and one commutation issued Thursday were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes.

Seven of the 17 weren't even sent to prison or jail, getting probation, small fines or other penalties instead. The longest sentence was nine years, for aiding cocaine distribution, followed by a six-year term for conspiracy to possess marijuana.

With this batch, Mr. Bush has issued 113 pardons and commuted three sentences in his nearly six years in the White House, according to spokesman Tony Fratto.

"Requests for executive clemency receive intense individualized consideration based upon an established set of objective criteria," Mr. Fratto said.

He said that most weight is given to the seriousness of the crime, how long ago it was committed, acceptance of responsibility and remorse, an applicant's conduct and contribution to society, and recommendations from the sentencing judge, probation officer and prosecutor.

Since World War II, the largest number of pardons and commutations -- 2,031 -- came from President Truman, who served 82 days short of eight years. Other recent presidents issued hundreds each, though Mr. Bush's father, George Bush, handed out only 77 pardons and commutations in four years in office.

A pardon amounts to federal forgiveness for one's crime, while a commutation merely cuts short an existing prison term.

On the pardons list were:

•Charles James Allen of Winchester, Va. -- conspiracy to defraud the United States. A former federal employee, Mr. Allen was convicted in 1979 for approving payments to James Hilles Associates Inc., a Virginia firm, for office supplies that were never delivered. In return, Mr. Allen received car parts, a radio, a freezer and other gifts from the firm. He was sentenced to a year of custody to be served by 30 days in jail, 90 days in a work-release program, and the remaining period on parole.

•William Sidney Baldwin Sr. of Green Pond, S.C. -- conspiracy to possess marijuana. Sentenced Oct. 27, 1981, to six years' imprisonment.

•Dale C. Critz Jr., Savannah, Ga. -- making a false statement. Sentenced July 13, 1989, to three years' probation.

•Mark Alan Eberwine of San Antonio -- conspiracy to defraud the United States by impeding, impairing, and obstructing the assessment of taxes by the Internal Revenue Service and making false declarations to the grand jury. Sentenced Feb. 1, 1985, as amended April 23, 1986, to two years imprisonment.

CIVIL LAW:

Appeals Court Allows FEMA To Hold Off On Funding (WP/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

A federal appeals court told the Bush administration yesterday that it does not need to immediately restart a housing program for thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims.

The ruling by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit puts a restart on hold at least until March, when the court will hear arguments in the case.

The court suspended an order by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who said last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency violated the Constitution when it eliminated short-term housing assistance. Leon said the agency did not explain its reasoning and provided victims only confusing computer-generated codes to explain its decisions.

Under Leon's order, FEMA told officials in Texas early this week to expect federal money for housing about 4,200 evacuees.

Yesterday's ruling means FEMA can advise Texas that plans have changed.

DOJ_NMG_0108841

"That's FEMA's Christmas present to the people of Texas and the United States," said Kevin Whelan, a spokesman for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit. "They managed to appeal long enough to be able to deny housing funding."

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said lawyers were reviewing the late-afternoon ruling and did not immediately know how the agency would respond.

The ruling by Judges David S. Tatel, Karen Lecraft Henderson and A. Raymond Randolph does not suspend Leon's order requiring FEMA to explain why evacuees were no longer eligible for funding. The letters that went out this summer contained vague and often contradictory computer codes rather than explanations, and Leon ordered the agency to put it in plain English.

FEMA said it was working on those new letters this week, and Whelan said about 4,000 evacuees have received letters.

FEMA Not Required To Restore Aid To Evacuees, Court Rules (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency does not have to reinstate immediately rental assistance to evacuees from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday, reversing a decision that a lower court judge had said he hoped would "get these people a roof over their heads before Christmas."

But FEMA still has to comply with part of the earlier order by the judge, Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, by providing families with clear explanations why they were denied assistance.

Responding to the ruling by a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, FEMA officials said they would immediately suspend plans to provide the money, leading to criticism from evacuees and their advocates.

"It's another setback," Wanda Jones, an evacuee in Houston, said in a statement issued by Acorn, the housing advocacy group that filed the lawsuit. "It's like a terrible roller coaster ride. Every time we go up, when we come down we lose more people."

Last spring, FEMA began notifying thousands of families who were given emergency shelter after the storms that they did not qualify for long-term help in the form of rent and utility payments, shocking many families who had been given housing vouchers good for a year.

Those families were allowed to appeal the agency's decision, but many said they received confusing, contradictory or incomplete instructions as they tried to do so.

In a preliminary injunction, issued on Nov. 29, Judge Leon said the agency's appeals process was so confusing that it denied evacuees their constitutional right to due process, and he ordered FEMA to immediately restore benefits, make retroactive payments and improve the appeals process. The appeals court stayed the first two parts of the injunction.

Aaron Walker, FEMA's chief spokesman, said the agency had already complied with the other part of the order. The agency "reached out to every household affected by the district court's order to more clearly identify their reason for ineligibility, outline the required remedies and allow them an additional 60 days to file an appeal with FEMA," he said.

The new order is temporary because the case has not yet gone to trial.

New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments (HC)

By Patty Reinert, Susan Carroll

Houston Chronicle, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just as federal housing money was to start flowing again to thousands of Texas-based hurricane evacuees, a federal appeals court put everything on hold Friday.

The ruling means that about 4,200 families in Houston, San Antonio and Austin who were left homeless by hurricanes Katrina and Rita will have to wait until at least February to find out whether the federal government is required to restore their rental assistance payments.

By then, the temporary housing program will have expired — unless Congress or President Bush extend it.

DOJ_NMG_0108842

Lakiesha Stredic, 25, took the news hard. She and her three children, ages 6, 4, and 3, are sleeping on the floor at a friend's house. They were evicted from their apartment on Houston's southwest side after she lost her job. For Christmas, Stredic picked up presents from a local charity — two toys for each child.

"My goodness," she said, sighing. "I'm in a really bad hole right now. It's stressing me out. I really need a place that I can call home for me and my kids."

She said she was counting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to come through with rental assistance. FEMA helped her get an apartment in Houston after the hurricane in the summer of 2005. She said she didn't realize the subsidy had run out until the apartment complex contacted her with a bill for $1,400, she said. By then it was too late. She paid $100 one week, then $200 the next, she said. But the electric company turned off the lights. And she wasn't making much progress paying down the rent anyway, she said.

"It was really unexpected when (the rental subsidy) stopped out of the blue," she said. "I don't know what to do now."

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, or ACORN, sued FEMA in August for failing to adequately explain why the housing benefits were ending. Last month, U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon ruled that FEMA unconstitutionally halted the payments and ordered them to reinstate them immediately.

Judge's order stymiedLeon has spent the past three weeks pushing FEMA to immediately restore the housing assistance.

In addition to the rental subsidies, estimated at $750 per family per month, Leon was pushing FEMA to make back payments for September, October and November. He also ordered the agency to explain to the evacuees why the assistance was denied in the first place and what they are required to do to reinstate it.

Under pressure from the court, FEMA had notified officials in Houston and elsewhere that it would restart the housing program Friday. FEMA appealed, and on Friday, three judges on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit partially suspended Leon's order.

The court said until it considers the full case early next year, FEMA does not need to restart the housing program or make any retroactive payments. But the agency is still required to immediately inform the evacuees of the reasons they were denied assistance and allow them to challenge the decisions.

FEMA said late Friday that it had notified Texas that it would rescind its plans for restoring the housing aid. Robert Johnson, the manager of Houston's Joint Hurricane Housing Task Force, said Friday that he had not seen the decision and referred comment to the mayor's press office, which did not return phone calls.

FEMA officials also said they had already complied with the part of Leon's order that the higher court upheld — to send letters to about 4,000 evacuees more clearly explaining what they can do to appeal FEMA's decisions. The agency will give them an additional 60 days to file and appeal if they believe the decision was "in error," FEMA officials said.

"It's like a terrible roller-coaster ride," said Wanda Jones of Houston, a Katrina survivor and member of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now which sued the government. "Every time we go up, when we come down we lose more people. But we're going to keep on riding and keep on fighting in court for our rights."

'Scrooges'For Katrina refugee Gregory Bernard, 43, the latest court decision means losing his rent subsidy in January and surviving on his $603 a month disability check. Bernard said he has congestive heart failure, and is too sick to work.

He left his apartment in central New Orleans after the hurricanes, he said, and has been trying to figure out how to get back there.

His rent in New Orleans was $400 before the storm, but now his former landlord wants $600. If he chooses a cheaper apartment, he's looking at a deposit for the apartment and deposits for his utilities.

If he stays, he can make his rent at his sprawling apartment in southwest Houston, but it'll probably mean losing his phone, he said. With $12 worth of food stamps, he's been buying deli meat and loaves of bread, Bernard said. That's what he plans to eat for Christmas dinner.

"Sometimes it's like I'm in the Twilight Zone here," he said. "The people here are nice, but I just really want to go home. I'm making it now, but I'm barely making it. I don't know how I'm going to get by."

U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Houston, called for the federal government to take a new approach to dealing with the refugee situation, calling the members of the Court of Appeals "scrooges."

DOJ_NMG_0108843

"Instead of spending time trying to figure out how to help these families, and the elderly and disabled, we are engaged in a legal battle," she said. " This is the wrong approach to take on the eve of a sacred holiday."

U.S. Gives Grants To 4 Gulf Coast States To Upgrade Disaster Housing (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — FEMA trailers, the cramped, impersonal housing units that have come to define the federal response to major disasters, may be on the way out, thanks to $388 million in federal grants, announced Friday, that will test half a dozen cozier, more permanent models of postdisaster housing.

The program will offer new housing from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to thousands of families, among the 100,000 still living in trailers across the Gulf Coast, by placing them over the coming year in these studier, roomier, better ventilated homes, many of which have front porches, large windows and even small attics.

Mississippi came out on top in the contest for the grants, receiving $280.8 million, compared with $74.5 million for Louisiana, $16.5 million for Texas and $15.7 million for Alabama.

Officials in Louisiana were furious, saying their state, which suffered the greatest losses in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year, had been shortchanged.

“FEMA has clearly learned very little from its mistakes, let alone basic math or a sense of fundamental fairness,” Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, said in a statement.

But officials of the agency said Mississippi’s big share simply reflected the creativity of its plans, as the financing was awarded competitively, based on how quickly the new models could be set up, how comfortable and safe they would be and how much they would cost, among other factors.

The grants come from an appropriation in which Congress directed FEMA to take an alternative approach to the customary trailers. The biggest single grant will finance the construction of units in Mississippi that look like A-roofed cottages, featuring a compact front porch, windows on three sides, more storage space and better ventilation. Like the existing trailers, they will be set up on wheels, so they can be driven into a disaster zone.

Louisiana officials, meanwhile, intend to use their grant to build what they are calling Katrina Cottages — compact single-family homes made of prefabricated panels, with a porch and up to three bedrooms — in heavily hit areas of New Orleans like Jackson Barracks.

The one model planned in Texas is based on a design that is already used by some 90,000 troops in Iraq. A small house made of prefabricated parts that can be moved by flatbed truck, it can be set up in eight hours by six people. It offers more living space than the trailers and is capable of being elevated so that it can be lifted out of the flood plain.

“It is not going to make the front of Architectural Digest,” said Gil H. Jamieson, a deputy director of FEMA, “but it is aesthetically pleasing.”

In some cases, these homes can be built on regular foundations, making them permanent or at least semipermanent housing, unlike the travel trailers, which are not considered sturdy enough to survive winds that could be produced by a tropical storm.

Federal officials said they could not yet predict how many new homes would be built with the available grant money or how many of the 101,000 families still in FEMA travel trailers or mobile homes across the Gulf Coast would be able to move into these new units.

The government will evaluate each of the six types of new homes to be built, to see whether they should be adopted permanently.

Mr. Jamieson said it was unlikely that FEMA would be able to replace the travel trailers completely. But it hopes that by the next major disaster, it will have cut the numbers significantly.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ_NMG_0108844

Pa., N.J. Stand To Lose Clout (PHI)

By Adam Fifield

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 23, 2006

New U.S. census data could mean the loss of congressional clout for both Pennsylvania and New Jersey and drops the Garden State from among the nation's 10-most-populous states.

Population estimates for July 1, 2006, released yesterday, show sluggish population growth in both states while the Sunbelt continued to surge.

North Carolina is now the nation's 10th-most-populous state, kicking Jersey to 11th.

If the U.S. House of Representatives were reapportioned based on the numbers, Pennsylvania would be among seven states to lose a seat, according to a report by the Election Data Services, a political consulting firm in Washington that specializes in analyzing census data for redistricting.

Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York and Ohio also would shed seats, while Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah would each gain one and Texas would pick up two, according to the study.

New Jersey also stands to lose one of its 13 congressional seats in the next reapportionment if current trends continue, said James W. Hughes, dean of Rutgers University's Edward J. Bloustein School of Planning and Public Policy.

"It's a pretty good chance we'll lose a seat," said Hughes, referring to the congressional reapportionment that will follow the 2010 census.

Election Data Services predicted that New Jersey would hold onto all 13 seats.

The 435 seats in the U.S. House of Representatives will be reapportioned after the 2010 census. Losing a congressional seat could compromise a state's clout and federal funding levels, said Election Data Services president Kimball Brace.

Referring to Pennsylvania's 19 U.S. representatives, he advised the state "to make use of that 19th member as much as you can for the next four years."

According to the census estimates, Pennsylvania ranks as the sixth-most-populous state, with 12.4 million residents. Its population gained 35,273, or 0.3 percent, over last year.

New Jersey, with 8.7 million residents, remains the most densely populated state, but it has been bumped off the top 10 list.

In the last year, the Garden State grew by just 21,410 people - 0.2 percent.

But 72,547 residents left New Jersey for other states. That number is more than three times that of four years ago.

The state grew because 54,058 people came from overseas, and there were 39,190 more births than deaths last year.

Hughes, of the Bloustein School, said he believes the state has probably experienced "the largest out-migration we've ever had."

He blamed expensive housing and high taxes.

Because of the high cost of operating in New Jersey, businesses that want to expand may decide "we're doing it in North Carolina," Hughes said.

State Assemblyman John Burzichelli (D., Gloucester) speculated on why North Carolina might have gotten the edge.

"They have good furniture prices down there," he joked.

Despite the ignominy of being number 11, Hughes said he doubted Jersey residents care.

"If they're stuck in gridlock... they might think it's a good thing population isn't growing any faster," he said.

Kansas Court Dismisses Abortion Charges (WP/AP)

By Roxana Hegeman

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

WICHITA, Dec. 22 -- Kansas's attorney general, a vocal opponent of abortion, charged a well-known abortion provider Friday with illegally performing late-term abortions, but a Sedgwick County judge threw out the charges only hours later.

Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges against George Tiller at the request of Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston, who said her office had not been consulted by Attorney General Phill Kline.

DOJ_NMG_0108845

Kline, who lost his reelection bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, said he would try to get Clark to reinstate the charges.

"We are pursuing a legal remedy to what we believe is a flawed decision by a district court judge," Kline said at a news conference in Topeka.

Kline said that he did consult Foulston about the case Thursday and that she did not object.

The 30 misdemeanor counts Kline filed against Tiller involve 15 abortions from July through November 2003. They were performed on patients 22 years old or younger, including a 10-year-old, according to the criminal complaint unsealed Friday.

Tiller's clinic, known for being one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a high-profile target of antiabortion protesters for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Kline has been investigating whether Tiller and other abortion providers performed illegal late-term abortions in Kansas or failed to report suspected child abuse, as required by law.

Under Kansas law, if a woman wants to obtain an abortion after the 22nd week of her pregnancy, a doctor must first determine whether the fetus could survive outside the womb. If the fetus is viable, the procedure can be used only to preserve the woman's physical or mental health.

The charges involve situations in which Tiller cannot demonstrate that a woman faced permanent damage to a major bodily function, or Tiller's conclusions that some patients' mental health would be harmed if they did not have abortions, Kline said.

Tiller and Planned Parenthood have repeatedly said that they have committed no wrongs and that the patient records Kline obtained contain no evidence of crimes by either the clinics or their doctors.

DOJ Report Paints Nightmarish Picture Of Lubbock State School (DMN/AP)

By By Liz Austin Peterson, Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, December 23, 2006

Shoddy health care, substantial neglect and harmful treatment techniques have jeopardized the lives of Lubbock State School residents, federal investigators said in a report that criticized nearly every part of the facility.

The U.S. Department of Justice report paints a nightmarish picture of the facility that cares for about 350 people with mental retardation and developmental disabilities.

One man died of an illness that could have been prevented if his doctors and nurses had done something as simple as modifying his diet. Another woman developed excruciating ulcers on her buttocks after lying in urine-soaked diapers. A third resident was grabbed, choked and thrown on the floor when he resisted receiving a shot.

"LSS's provision of health care falls alarmingly short of professional standards of care," said the report, which was issued Dec. 11 but was not posted on the department's Web site until Thursday.

Michael Jones, a spokesman for the state agency that oversees the state school, said he could not comment on the report's contents because "it's still a potential legal matter." But he would say the facility has a new management team that has worked hard to improve training and hire more medical professionals.

Many of the problems stemmed from severe staffing shortages and training issues, the report said.

Advocacy groups have long claimed abuse and neglect is rampant in Texas' state schools, and the report could give them more ammunition.

Dennis Borel, executive director of the Coalition of Texans with Disabilities, said the institutions are a relic of the 1850s and more of their residents should be moved into community settings.

"This should be an excellent incentive for the Legislature to examine the closing of unnecessary state schools in Texas," Borel said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales can file a civil rights lawsuit if Texas and the Justice Department cannot resolve the concerns raised by late January. But Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in the report he is confident that won't be necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0108846

The investigators documented scores of problems, including 17 deaths in a year and a half and possible violations of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act.

That law says states must treat individuals in the most integrated setting possible. But rather than seeking to move obviously capable residents into the community, officials seemed eager to keep them in the facility, the report said.

The investigators said the facility should develop and implement comprehensive guidelines, policies and procedures for planning residents' transitions to community life. It also recommended giving residents and their families better information about available community placements so they can make a good decision.

The report also raised serious concerns about the psychiatric services the facility provides to the roughly 200 patients with mental health issues.

Psychiatric assessments may be incomplete or inaccurate, the report said, because the school's psychiatrists did not adequately consider residents' medical issues, physical injuries, family and psychiatric histories, and medication regimes when trying to diagnose problems.

Many residents had vague diagnoses, which the investigators said exposes them to "counterproductive, even harmful interventions and to interventions that mask but do not correct underlying disorders."

The report called for a thorough psychiatric evaluation of all current residents, once officials develop standards for reliably diagnosing problems. Residents on psychotropic medications should be examined to ensure the drugs and dosage are appropriate.

The investigators also criticized the excessive use of mechanical, physical and chemical restraints and said most should only be used in true emergencies.

According to the report, several residents are kept in mechanical restraints, such as helmets with face guards, for nearly all of their waking hours no matter how they behave. Others are repeatedly given drugs to control their behavior without any documentation to justify the dosage.

"While undoubtedly well-intended, LSS's choice of behavioral interventions cannot be readily viewed as humane in effect," the report said.

ANTITRUST:

Liberty Media Deals For DirecTV (USAT)

By David Lieberman, Usa Today

USA Today, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK — Liberty Media (LINTA) Chairman John Malone, the executive once known as the "King of Cable," is back — this time with a plan that would make him the most powerful man in satellite television. And maybe more.

On Friday — three years, to the day, after News Corp. (NWS) took control of DirecTV — CEO Rupert Murdoch announced an agreement to turn over his controlling 38.5% interest in the No. 1 satellite company, as well as three regional sports networks and $550 million in cash, to Liberty in exchange for its 16.3% stake in News Corp.

The deal, which values Liberty's shares at about $11 billion, ends a potential threat to Murdoch's control of News Corp. that Malone posed after he acquired his voting shares two years ago.

Executives expect the deal to close in the middle of 2007 following approvals from News Corp. shareholders, federal antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission.

The companies also want the IRS to confirm that the deal will be largely tax free for News Corp. and will impose relatively low taxes on Liberty.

Liberty says it expects DirecTV CEO Chase Carey to continue to run the satellite company.

Yet this may be Malone's first big move to regain the media clout he had until 1999, when he sold Tele-Communications Inc., at the time the No. 1 cable company, to AT&T.

Liberty primarily invests in media and technology companies, although it owns a few assets, including QVC and Starz Encore.

DOJ_NMG_0108847

But once Malone has DirecTV, which has 15.6 million subscribers, and the sports channels — FSN Northwest, FSN Pittsburgh and FSN Rocky Mountain, which go to about 8.6 million homes — he'll be well-poised for another play.

For example, several analysts expect him to swap Liberty's 4% stake in Time Warner for the Atlanta Braves baseball team and about $1.5 billion in cash.

"The cash is the most important element since it would likely be non-taxable, and the company could use the proceeds to acquire other strategic assets around the Starz Media Group," writes A.G. Edwards analyst Michael Kupinski.

As a result, Liberty "could emerge as a significant entertainment/media company."

Investors also wonder whether Malone might see this as a good time to take DirecTV private, sell it to a phone company such as AT&T, or merge with its chief rival, EchoStar (DISH), known for its Dish Network.

Oppenheimer's Thomas Eagan, for one, says Malone probably won't fool around with DirecTV just yet.

The deal with Murdoch gives him enough shares to control the operation, the analyst says. Malone would have to pay a big tax bill if he sold his DirecTV shares before two years. And antitrust regulators probably wouldn't approve a deal that left consumers with just one satellite TV provider.

DirecTV Deal Aids 2 Media Moguls (LAT)

By Joseph Menn

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

A long-awaited agreement reached Friday in which News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch gains a bigger stake in his own company by trading his satellite TV interests to former cable kingpin John Malone frees each man to pursue broader ambitions in his medium of choice.

Murdoch expects faster growth in the Internet business than he does in U.S. satellite TV distribution. By solidifying control of News Corp., Murdoch can more easily seek out deals like the 2005 acquisition of the MySpace.com social networking site.

Meanwhile, Malone is unlikely to settle for the investment in El Segundo-based DirecTV Group Inc. that he gets from Murdoch.

Malone is expected to try to merge DirecTV with rival EchoStar Communications Corp., operator of the Dish Network. He also may team with a telephone company to offer the broadband and phone services that cable operators sell.

Friday's deal involves News Corp. swapping its 38.5% stake in DirecTV to Malone's holding company, Liberty Media Corp., for that firm's 16.5% stake in News Corp., valued at about $11 billion. Murdoch's ownership of voting stock in the New York company, parent of movie studio 20th Century Fox and the Fox television network, will rise from about 30% to about 38%.

Analysts saw more benefits for News Corp. than Liberty.

The elimination of Liberty's stake is tax-free for News Corp. and amounts to one of the largest share repurchases in history. That should increase earnings per share by almost 9%, wrote UBS analyst Aryeh Bourkoff.

News Corp. spokesman Andrew Butcher also confirmed that the company's regular $6-billion buyback plan, which had been on hold during the talks with Malone, would now resume. The company is authorized to spend the remaining $3.4 billion in that plan over the next 18 months, he said.

Malone moved to the background in the world of big media since selling Tele-Communications Inc., one of the largest cable television companies, in 1999 and has been hungry for a comeback. Relations between Murdoch and Malone, once close, grew strained after Malone acquired his News Corp. stake.

Friday's deal, which has been in the works for two years, is expected to close in mid-2007. Beyond the stock swap, it calls for News Corp. to send Englewood, Colo.-based Liberty $550 million in cash and three of the smallest of Fox's 16 regional cable sports networks — those based in the Northwest, the Rocky Mountain area and Pittsburgh.

Malone managed to get the DirecTV stock at an implied value of about $21 a share, analysts said, well below Thursday's $25 closing price. But even with that bargain and the extra cash changing hands, analysts expressed concerns about Liberty's new challenges in the satellite TV business, and Fitch Ratings downgraded its opinion of the company's creditworthiness.

Still, Liberty Chief Executive Greg Maffei said in a statement that the transaction was "a critical step" in the effort to change Liberty into a "well-positioned, focused operating company."

DOJ_NMG_0108848

Liberty expects to get four of DirecTV's 11 board seats, Liberty spokesman John Orr said.

"Our goal is to work with them, to be a good strategic partner," Orr said.

Effective control of DirecTV could lead to distribution of programming for such Liberty assets as Starz Entertainment and home shopping channel QVC.

Malone's chances of merging DirecTV and EchoStar are unclear because previous attempts have been thwarted by antitrust objections.

But the same issues that made DirecTV less appealing for Murdoch — including the faster growth of cable TV and cable's greater number of interactive features — would make it easier for Malone to argue that a dominant satellite service would not harm competition or consumers.

A DirecTV spokesman didn't return messages, and EchoStar declined to comment.

News Corp. Class A shares dropped 5 cents to $21.53. Liberty's tracking stock rose $4.23 to $97.87, and DirecTV's fell 45 cents to $24.55.

joseph.menn@latimes.com

Dick's Sporting Gets Antitrust Clearance (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

PITTSBURGH (AP) -- Dick's Sporting Goods Inc. on Friday said federal authorities have approved its pending $225 million acquisition of Golf Galaxy Inc.

The companies agreed to the takeover in November, under which Dick's will pay Golf Galaxy shareholders $18.82 per share in cash.

Dick's said the transaction received early clearance from a mandatory antitrust waiting period. The deal still needs approval by Golf Galaxy shareholders and is slated to close after Feb. 6, subject to customary closing conditions.

Golf Galaxy sells golf equipment through 65 stores, on Web sites and in catalogs.

Shares of Dick's fell 12 cents to close at $49.40 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (ER)

The Eureka Reporter, December 23, 2006

A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle.

The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

After the antitrust lawsuit was filed in July, Hearst and MediaNews asked the judge to seal certain documents containing business information they considered confidential.

In the motion filed Thursday, Media Alliance and the Bay Guardian argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential.

"These are the nation's biggest newspaper chains, and they're moving to destroy daily competition in the Bay Area and impose regional monopoly," said Bruce Brugmann, the Bay Guardian's editor and publisher. "They should not be able to do it in the middle of the night with sealed documents."

Hearst officials were reviewing the motion and could not comment Thursday, said spokesman Paul Luthringer. Representatives at MediaNews did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

New York-based Hearst has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers — on top of the seven it already owns. Hearst's investment helped finance MediaNews' purchase of the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market.

DOJ_NMG_0108849

The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet.

On Tuesday, Judge Illston barred Bay Area newspapers owned by MediaNews and Hearst from consolidating some of their business operations until the lawsuit is resolved.

When she issued a temporary restraining order against the alliance in November, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge some of their business operations.

The case is expected to go to trial next spring.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Federal Court Rejects EPA's Smog Strategy (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday struck down the Bush administration's strategy for reducing smog, ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency's rules for forcing state cleanups do not meet requirements of the Clean Air Act.

Judge Judith W. Rogers, writing for the three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said, "EPA has failed to heed the restrictions on its discretion set forth in the Act." The court ordered the agency to come up with another enforcement plan.

Smog is produced by nitrogen oxides reacting with other chemicals to create ground-level ozone, particularly in the summer months when the sun is hottest and brightest. Other major sources of the pollution are motor vehicle exhaust, gas vapors and chemical solvents.

In the stratosphere, ozone occurs naturally and is a beneficial shield against harmful ultraviolet rays.

EPA in 2004 issued new smog standards requiring 474 counties, with about 159 million people living in them, to reduce pollution of smog-causing ozone and improve the air enough to meet federal health standards. The agency gave them three to 17 years to do so.

The appellate panel said that was too long. It also said the agency was allowing "backsliding" by states when it should have been directing them to order new emission controls on industrial plants, more public transportation, tougher vehicle-inspection programs or cleaner-burning gasoline. Under the law, states that do not meet the standards risk losing federal highway dollars.

EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said yesterday that the agency will review the panel's decision to determine whether it will ask the full appeals court to hear the case.

Appeals Panel Cuts Award In Valdez Spill By Exxon (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — A federal appeals panel on Friday cut nearly in half the $4.5 billion punitive damage award against Exxon Mobil as a result of the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989.

A majority of a three-judge panel said the company's negligent conduct, while "particularly egregious," was not intentional and did not warrant the maximum financial penalty that a lower court imposed.

The panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, split on applying legal precedents to the company responsible for the worst oil spill in United States history. It cut the award for punitive damages to $2.5 billion.

In the decision, the majority wrote, "Exxon's reckless misconduct in placing a known relapsed alcoholic in command of a supertanker, loaded with millions of barrels of oil, to navigate the pristine and resource abundant waters of Prince William Sound, was reckless and warrants severe sanctions."

"The misconduct did not, however, warrant sanctions at the highest range allowable," the ruling added.

DOJ_NMG_0108850

Under the formulas used in such cases, the $4.5 billion was at the upper range permissible, representing a nine fold increase in the actual damages suffered by tens of thousands of fishermen, Alaska Natives and tourism businesses on whose behalf the suit was filed.

The case has bounced between the Circuit Court of Appeals and the District Court in Anchorage as Supreme Court precedents evolved, said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

Judges setting punitive damages have “a lot of flexibility,” Professor Tobias said, but they have to adhere to established standards in their calculations. One standard deals with the severity of the conduct and lets a judge set punitive damages up to 10 times actual damages.

A District Court judge, H. Russel Holland, had most recently used one of the highest multiples allowed by Supreme Court precedent, though he had lowered to $4.5 billion his original $5 billion that an earlier appeals panel had rejected.

That was still excessive, Judges Andrew J. Kleinfeld and Mary M. Schroeder wrote for the appeals panel.

Judge James R. Browning dissented, saying Exxon’s conduct was “extremely reprehensible,” “malicious” and “placed at massive risk and, ultimately, seriously injured the property and livelihood of tens of thousands of Alaskans.”

David Oesting, a lawyer for people harmed by the spill, said, “At least we’re back on track and on the way to closure.”

Damages Are Halved In Exxon Valdez Oil Spill (WP/AP)

By David Kravets

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 22 -- A federal appeals court on Friday cut in half a $5 billion jury award for punitive damages against Exxon Mobil in the 1989 oil spill that smeared black goo across 1,500 miles of Alaskan coastline.

The case, one of the nation's longest-running noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were damaged when the Exxon Valdez tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil.

It is the third time the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive in light of U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

"It is time for this protracted litigation to end," Chief Judge Mary Schroeder and Judge Andrew J. Kleinfeld wrote.

In dissent, Judge James R. Browning ruled that the $5 billion verdict should remain intact because there is "no principled means by which this award should be reduced."

This time, the court ordered a specific amount, $2.5 billion, in damages; its previous rulings demanded that a lower court come up with its own figures. U.S. District Judge H. Russel Holland of Anchorage grudgingly complied in 2002, reducing damages to $4 billion. Irving, Tex.-based Exxon again appealed.

The following year, the appeals court ordered Holland to reconsider his decision, balancing it against a Supreme Court ruling that said punitive damages usually could not be more than nine times general damages. The Anchorage jury awarded $287 million in general damages -- and issued punitive damages that were 17 times that amount.

Holland, appointed by President Ronald Reagan in 1984, declared Exxon's conduct "reprehensible" and set the figure at $4.5 billion plus interest, ruling that the Supreme Court's precedent did not directly apply to the case.

Exxon again appealed, arguing that it should have to pay no more than $25 million in punitive damages, which are meant to punish a company for misconduct.

The company, whose $36.1 billion profit last year was the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, said it has spent more than $3 billion to settle federal and state lawsuits and to clean the Prince William Sound area.

In October, Exxon Mobil reported a $10.49 billion profit in the third quarter, the second-largest quarterly figure ever recorded by a publicly traded U.S. company.

Exxon spokesman Dave Gardner criticized the court's decision, calling the spill "a tragic accident that Exxon Mobil deeply regrets."

Gardner did not say whether the company would appeal the decision but said that "in our opinion, the facts of this case do not warrant an award this size."

DOJ_NMG_0108851

In 1994, a federal jury found recklessness by Exxon and the captain of the Exxon Valdez, Joseph Hazelwood, who caused the tanker to run aground. That finding made Exxon liable for punitive damages.

The disaster, the worst oil spill in U.S. history, prompted Congress to pass a law in 1990 banning single-hull tankers such as the Exxon Valdez from domestic waters by 2015.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Subpoenas May Signal Wider Probe Into Son Of Sen. Stevens (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, December 23, 2006

In a move that could signal a widening of the investigation into the son of Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), federal investigators probing Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens (R) have issued a host of subpoenas to fishing industry executives and trade associations in Seattle, Alaska and Washington, D.C., sources familiar with the investigation said.

Federal investigators with the FBI and the Department of Justice have been looking into Ben Stevens for at least a year as part of a broader ethics probe of a group of state lawmakers dubbed by the local media "The Corrupt Bastards Club." The scandal has swept up some of the state's most powerful families and companies, including the Stevenses, energy industry giant VECO Corp. and other entities in the oil and gas sector.

There is no evidence that federal investigators are targeting Ted Stevens or any other Member of Congress in the investigation.

But federal investigators have begun to focus on the financial connections between Ben Stevens and Trevor McCabe, a former aide to the elder Stevens, said a source familiar with the investigation. Although details of federal subpoenas are supposed to be kept secret, The Seattle Times, the Anchorage Daily News and other local media reported earlier this month that a number of recent subpoenas seemed to center on the relationship between the younger Stevens, McCabe and a number of key players in the fishing industry, including Trident Seafoods, Icicle Seafoods and the At Sea Processors Association, a trade group.

Sources close to the investigation who asked not to be identified said that based on the information being sought, DOJ and the FBI appear now to be focusing on the relationship between Ben Stevens, McCabe and the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which provides millions of federal dollars to the state's fishing industry.

Ted Stevens created the board in 2003 to help the industry, which at the time was ailing financially. Since then, Stevens has earmarked millions of dollars to the group for grants each year. Companies, community groups and the state have used those grants for a host of activities, ranging from advertising campaigns in Japan to a decision to paint an Alaska Airlines jet to resemble a fish. The latter project received criticism both within the state and from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as wasteful spending.

The office of Ted Stevens did not comment for this story.

Ben Stevens formally served as chairman of AFMB's board, while McCabe is a member of the board. McCabe and Stevens have had financial dealings with a number of the companies and trade associations involved in AFMB, including the APA and a number of companies that received significant federal funding from the group during his time on the board. All told, Ben Stevens was paid more than $659,000 by fishing companies from 2000 to 2005, according to financial disclosure forms filed with the state.

In addition, Stevens received more than $243,000 from VECO Corp., which also is being investigated.

IMMIGRATION:

Agents Remove 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Two Weeks (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0108852

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents removed more than 2,300 illegal aliens from the country in the past two weeks on 35 flights to the Caribbean, Latin America, Asia and Africa -- one of the busiest periods of the year for ICE's Office of Detention and Removal Operations.

Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said 852 of those removed had criminal records, and that another 21 flights this week will take 2,087 aliens to Central America and the Caribbean, including 515 who are criminal aliens.

"By the end of this week, ICE's Air Transportation Unit will have facilitated the removal of more than 4,500 illegal aliens in 14 days, including 1,414 with criminal records," Mrs. Myers said. "Apprehending, detaining and removing criminal and other illegal aliens promotes public safety and protects the integrity of the immigration system."

This week's Caribbean/Latin American flights, which are regularly scheduled via the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS) aircraft, are destined to Colombia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Jamaica, Nicaragua and Haiti (one).

ICE spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said that in addition to the regularly scheduled flights using JPATS, ICE Detention and Removal personnel returned last week from two special charter removal missions: one to Africa that repatriated 82 Nigerian and 17 Liberian nationals, and another that returned 55 Filipinos and 12 Cambodians.

Ms. Koroma said that on the African charter flight more than 60 of those removed had criminal convictions, involving drug-smuggling, possession with intent to distribute drugs, weapons violations, sexual assault on children, burglary and bribery. The group, she said, included 17 Nigerians with forgery and fraud convictions.

She said that of the 55 Filipinos removed, 36 were criminal aliens and that 11 of the 12 Cambodian nationals removed also were criminal aliens. Their crimes included sexual offenses against children, sexual assaults, heroin smuggling, aggravated assault and homicide, she said.

The illegal aliens had been housed at various detention facilities across the country.

In fiscal 2006, ICE removed more than 186,600 illegal aliens from the country, a record for the agency and a 10 percent increase over the number of removals during the previous fiscal year. More than 50,000 of them were repatriated to Central American and Caribbean Basin countries using JPATS.

JPATS, managed by the Justice Department, provides regular international and domestic flights for the removal of deportable aliens. In 1995, the air fleets of the U.S. Marshals Service and the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service merged to create a more efficient and effective system for transporting prisoners and criminal aliens.

JPATS has three client agencies, the Bureau of Prisons, the Marshals Service and ICE, its largest user with more than 60 percent of flight hours during fiscal 2006. JPATS operates a fleet of aircraft that moves prisoners over long distances more economically and with higher security than commercial airlines.

Ms. Koroma said nearly all air movements are done aboard large and small jets that JPATS owns or leases.

She said ICE also manages alien transportation and repatriation flights via special charter missions.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Surf's Up On Capitol Hill (WSJ)

By Adam Goldberg And Preston Burton

The Wall Street Journal, December 23, 2006

As corporate America steels itself for an onslaught of investigations by the Democratically controlled Congress, consultants are busy advising companies on how best to prepare for and get through them. While one can do much to manage the fallout, navigating one of these investigations is a lot like surfing. Regardless of what you do, the biggest factor is still the size and nature of the wave. On this score, witnesses called before Congress have few protections.

DOJ_NMG_0108853

First, Congress does not necessarily recognize the attorney-client privilege and the protections that it gives individuals and companies. While Congress has frequently restrained itself, it has not always done so -- thus everything a client tells a lawyer, before or during an investigation, is theoretically open to congressional grabbing.

In 1998, for example, the Republican-controlled House subcommittee on oversight and investigation subpoenaed documents from a Democratic lawyer and his law firm in an investigation into a real estate lease with the federal government. The firm asserted privilege on its client's behalf; the subcommittee threatened to hold the law firm in contempt; the law firm turned the privileged documents over. Coincidentally -- or not -- shortly thereafter the D.C. Bar Association actually issued an ethics opinion stating that lawyers were ethically free to give Congress attorney-client privileged material when threatened with contempt after first objecting.

Similarly, the 1980s saw cases in which the Democratically controlled Congress rejected the privilege, including cases involving Ferdinand Marcos and Provident Life & Accident Company. Notably, Rep. John Dingell made clear his view that Congress honored the privilege at its sole discretion. Mr. Dingell is expected to be chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee when the Democrats take control in January.

From a public policy perspective, we should all hope that restraint is exercised in the imminent investigations. Open communication between clients and their lawyers fosters, rather than impedes, regulatory compliance. This policy can only be served, however, if people believe that the privilege's protections are real. It would be ironic if Congress, in its understandable zeal to oversee compliance with our nation's laws, actually undermines that compliance by sacrificing the attorney-client privilege.

Second, at a congressional hearing or deposition you have only a very limited right to counsel. For example, during hearings there are no "objections" to committee questions, and your lawyer may advise you solely with respect to your legal rights and not about anything else. This is particularly troublesome given that Congress can act as a stalking horse for the Department of Justice and other federal and state government investigators. In effect, Congress frequently acts like a grand jury investigation -- just one without the procedural and secrecy protections afforded grand jury targets.

Moreover, unlike prosecutors and regulators, there is effectively no limit to what Congress can subpoena, or do with the information that it has obtained. Releasing information to the press (even before one hearing is held or one witness is questioned) is frequently unnecessary to oversight or legislation -- but that does not prevent Congress from doing so from time to time.

Third, every now and then Congress appears to set a "perjury trap" -- asking or compelling a witness to testify and then making a criminal referral for perjury to the Department of Justice when that witness fails to remember something or remembers something incorrectly. These referrals are particularly poisonous, as they can greatly inflame media and public perception of a witness. Perjury referrals also serve as a great deterrent to witnesses providing testimony to Congress, by placing them between the rock of a potential perjury trap and the hard place of asserting their Fifth Amendment rights. This brings us to our last point.

Sadly, if witnesses intend to assert their Fifth Amendment protections, they must be prepared to be publicly humiliated. All too often, congressional committees feel the need to call a witness to Capitol Hill and question him even though they know that the witness will not answer their questions.

While some might find it hard to sympathize with Ken Lay and Bernie Ebbers -- who are among the most notable of those recently forced to assert their Fifth Amendment rights in public -- one should keep in mind that they were forced to suffer this experience long before any trial was held in which they had the rights of a defendant. At least 20 other people with far less purported villainy have been forced to suffer this experience in the last five years alone. While the media might benefit from such tactics, it is hard to see what public policy is served by forcing someone to invoke his constitutional right before 60 flashing cameras and then vilifying or dismissing him one minute later. Such needless vilification may affect jury pools and could taint the judicial process itself.

It is natural to ask why people who have done nothing wrong would refuse to answer questions, but our country's founders and the Supreme Court have provided the answer: Being innocent does not prevent your own words from being misused against you. There is already enough reputational pressure on an investigation's target not to assert his constitutional rights. We do not need congressional humiliation helping us along. The Fifth Amendment is there to protect the innocent and we hope Congress does not penalize people who avail themselves of this protection.

DOJ_NMG_0108854

While congressional investigations, like surfing, might be a fun spectator sport, they are no laughing matter for the participants caught in the wave. In fulfilling its important constitutional obligations, we hope Congress keeps this in mind.

Mr. Goldberg was as special associate counsel to President Clinton; Mr. Burton was one of the attorneys representing Monica Lewinsky. Both are partners at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP.

OTHER NEWS:

Romney Set For Presidential Announcement (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is poised to announce his campaign for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination in two phases early next month, a top adviser told The Associated Press on Friday.

The Massachusetts chief executive is expected to file paperwork as early as Jan. 2 with the Federal Election Commission, establishing a presidential campaign committee and permitting himself to begin raising money for his race on the first business day of the new year. Romney will leave office on Jan. 4.

As soon as the week of Jan. 8, Romney will hold a ceremony to officially declare his candidacy, said the adviser, a top aide who spoke on condition of anonymity in advance of the official filing.

The timing is somewhat dependent on when Sen. John McCain of Arizona makes an expected announcement about his own campaign for the GOP nomination, the Romney aide said. McCain has formed a presidential exploratory committee but held off declaring his candidacy.

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani has also formed an exploratory committee.

Before leaving for a 10-day ski vacation at his home in Deer Valley, Utah, Romney told reporters he would use the holiday gathering with his family to make a decision about a campaign. In total, 22 people will gather at the Romney vacation home outside Salt Lake City, including his five sons, their wives, his 10 grandchildren, and Romney's wife, Ann.

"I've got a lot of data. Now I have to sit down with my family and spend some time," the 59-year-old former venture capitalist said after ringing a Salvation Army bell at a downtown shopping mall. Romney gained international attention in 2002 as head of the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

"The real question is could I be able to make a real contribution to the people of this country, could I make America's future brighter, and that's something which I'll give consideration to over the holiday," the governor said.

While saying that he wanted to consult with his family, Romney dismissed any thought he might be dissuaded from a campaign because of any personal concerns they might express. In the past, Romney has said the only thing that would prompt an immediate end to his political career would be a change in the health of his wife, who has multiple sclerosis.

"You know, there are a lot of people that make a lot greater sacrifices than politicians _ myself included _ and I saw them in Guantanamo, I saw them at the border of North Korea and South Korea, I saw them in Iraq and Afghanistan," Romney said. "So, I'm not focused on the sacrifices that I or my family would make. I'm focused instead on the needs of this country and whether I could make a difference."

In one small sign he will likely mount a campaign, the governor could be overheard at a second charity stop outside Faneuil Hall asking a local comedian who happened by if he could help him write jokes for an appearance next spring at Washington's annual Gridiron Club dinner. The gathering is a regular stop for national politicians and White House aspirants.

Romney spent part of the week in Iowa and New Hampshire, two of the lead presidential voting states. Earlier this month he made a political trip through the South, before using personal money to fund a fact-finding trip to Japan, South Korea and China. He added to his foreign credentials this year with trips to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Iraq and Afghanistan.

In Iowa on Wednesday, Romney reiterated his support for President Bush and said a withdrawal from Iraq "would be a mistake."

In New Hampshire on Thursday, he deflected conservative concerns about his record on gay marriage and abortion. He said he now describes himself as "firmly pro-life," despite citing his tolerance for abortion rights during his 2002 gubernatorial campaign, after researching the embryonic stem cell issue.

DOJ_NMG_0108855

Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

America is ready to elect a black president, says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The nation's highest-ranking black government official, Miss Rice has said repeatedly she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls.

"Yes, I think a black person can be elected president," Miss Rice said in an interview.

The top U.S. diplomat also said Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars. She thinks the United States can win in Iraq, although the war thus far has been longer and more difficult than she had expected.

She made the remarks at a time when President Bush is under pressure from the public and members of Congress to find a fresh course in the long-running and costly war, which has shown no signs of nearing an end after taking the lives of almost 3,000 American troops.

"I know from the point of view of not just the monetary cost but the sacrifice of American lives a lot has been sacrificed for Iraq, a lot has been invested in Iraq," Miss Rice said.

Mr. Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed," Miss Rice said.

On politics, Miss Rice said the first successful black candidate will be "judged by all the things that Americans ultimately end up making their decision on: Do I agree with this person? Do I share this person's basic values? Am I comfortable that this person is going to make decisions when I'm not in the room that are very consequential?"

At the same time, she said, "we should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time."

Miss Rice declined to say whether she would like to see her predecessor, Colin L. Powell, become a candidate. Mr. Powell is a fellow black Republican.

"I'm not going to give Colin any advice and he's not going to give me any advice on this one," Miss Rice said.

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, is the most prominent black politician to emerge as a potential candidate for the 2008 presidential race.

Miss Rice was asked whether, watching Mr. Obama's rise, she thinks Americans are willing to put a black candidate in the White House.

Most people tell pollsters that whether a candidate is black doesn't matter to their votes.

More than eight in 10 black voters in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll say that it would make no difference to them. And other recent polling has found about the same number among the general public voicing that attitude.

Miss Rice said the Bush administration should be remembered for far more than the Iraq war. She recited foreign policy commitments and accomplishments including increased aid to fight AIDS and malaria in Africa and a peace deal ending two decades of North-South warfare in Sudan.

Miss Rice also said she has no reason to think North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in disarmament talks this week.

"They're signed on to denuclearization" in an agreement last year that was never implemented. "We'll see whether or not they follow through," Miss Rice said.

The talks ended yesterday in Beijing with no announced progress.

The Narrowing Field (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

IN THEORY, this should be the most wide-open presidential contest in decades. In reality, more than a year before the first vote, the field seems to be narrowing awfully fast. On the Democratic side, former Virginia governor Mark Warner, Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold, former South Dakota senator Tom Daschle and, this week, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh have announced they won't be running. On the Republican side, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee is leaving not just the Senate but the presidential race, and Virginia Sen. George Allen, once a leading contender, seems unlikely to toss his hat into the ring.

DOJ_NMG_0108856

To be honest, we'll miss some of these candidates more than others. It's not unheard of to have such early dropouts: Former vice president Al Gore emerged from the "Saturday Night Live" hot tub at this time four years ago to announce he wouldn't be a candidate in 2004. And the field of announced candidates will certainly grow. North Carolina's John Edwards, the former Democratic vice presidential nominee, is set to make his announcement next week, joining Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack in the Democratic field.

But it would be unfortunate if the departures portended a presidential race winnowed to a few almost before it begins. The country would benefit from a multitude of voices in both parties -- not just Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) on the Democratic side and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani on the Republican.

"Whether there were too many Goliaths or whether I'm just not the right David, the fact remains that at the end of the day, I concluded that, due to circumstances beyond our control, the odds were longer than I felt I could responsibly pursue," said Mr. Bayh, who just a few weeks earlier had formed an exploratory committee.

Call us quaint, but we liked it back when voters actually got to review candidates' qualifications and positions. Now, it seems, the first question potential supporters (read: donors) ask about candidates is not what they believe but whether they are electable. That sets up a vicious political cycle: A candidate seen as unelectable can't raise the daunting amounts ($25 million to $30 million by January 2008) needed to fuel a credible presidential race. But no candidate without a serious bank balance can be considered electable.

That problem has been exacerbated by the withering away of the federal matching fund system, which was designed to boost lesser-known primary candidates but has now become functionally irrelevant, because the top-tier candidates can raise more on their own than they would be permitted to if they accepted matching funds. An increasingly front-loaded primary system -- on the Democratic side, candidates will need enough to get through four contests in 15 days -- intensifies the need for an early pile of cash.

Perhaps our worries are premature; after all, at this point four years ago, hardly anyone had heard of former Vermont governor Howard Dean, who emerged as a leading contender for the Democratic nomination. Nonetheless, we're anxious to see some Davids tromping through the snows of Iowa and New Hampshire, not just a few big-footed Goliaths. And we'd like the voters to have some say in deciding which is which.

Another Inexplicably Jumps In (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

NOW COMES news that James S. Gilmore III, the highhanded, dissent-averse and altogether unsuccessful ex-governor of Virginia, is weighing a run for the Republican nomination for president. Heaven help us. For if Mr. Gilmore does to the 50 states what he did to the Old Dominion, the federal government might as well declare bankruptcy now.

Let's review the sorry Gilmore record. After taking office amid boom times in 1998, Mr. Gilmore immediately set about draining Virginia's coffers by promoting ill-advised tax cuts that, when the predictable economic downturn arrived, left the state penniless. He pushed ahead with his narrow political agenda of eliminating the state's car tax despite repeated warnings of the dire consequences, which included diverting funds that should have gone to transportation and public education. (If you're mad about traffic and the state's neglected roads, Mr. Gilmore is high on the list of people to blame.)

As a swan song near the end of his four-year term, Mr. Gilmore forced a bitter budget impasse with the legislature, unprecedented in Virginia, that enraged Republicans and Democrats alike and torpedoed the election prospects of his own party's nominee to succeed him as governor. When he finally left office in 2002 -- condemned by both liberal and libertarian think tanks for his managerial incompetence -- Mr. Gilmore bequeathed to his successor, Mark Warner, a budgetary mess that Mr. Warner spent a good part of his own governorship trying to clean up. All in all, a terrible performance by Mr. Gilmore.

DOJ_NMG_0108857

Let's summarize: A former governor from the South, zealous about tax-cutting and allergic to opposing views, who stubbornly insists on ill-fated policies despite abundant and well-founded warnings that they are leading to ruin. Maybe this guy is presidential material after all.

DOJ_NMG_0108858

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
London Police Chief Warns Of Terrorism (AP)..... 2
Police Leader Seeks Data On Tunnel Security (NYT)..... 2
Judge Links Iran To '96 Attack In Saudi Arabia (NYT)..... 3

Homeland Response:
Proposed Rules For Securing Chemical Plants Released (WP/AP)..... 4
Homeland Security Admits Violating Privacy (AP)..... 4
Feds: Homeland Security Project Didn't Protect Privacy (CNET) . 5

War News:
Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In "Broad Strategic Agreement" (NYT)..... 6
US And Iraqis "agree On Broad Strategy" (FT)..... 7
U.S. Commanders In Iraq Recommend A "Surge" (LAT)..... 8
'A New Way Forward,' If With More Troops, Faces Resistance (LAT)..... 9
Al-Qaeda Allies Claim Bigger Base Of Support In Iraq (WP)..... 10
Insurgents Offer U.S. 30-day Truce To Get Out Of Iraq (CNN) .. 11
Ultimatum From Al Qaeda (AFP)..... 12
5 U.S. Troops Die In Iraq As Month's Toll Hits 70 (WP)..... 12
December A Very Bloody Month For U.S. Troops (WT/AP)..... 13
Shiites Remake Baghdad In Their Image (NYT)..... 14
Iraqis Sue Over Oil-for-food Program (AP)..... 16
Iraqis' Suit Targets 2 Firms In U.N. Oil-for-Food Program (WP) . 17
Flurry Of Calls About Draft, And A Day Of Denials (NYT)..... 17

Corporate Scandals:
Siemens Chief Bullish In Spite Of Bribery Scandal (FT)..... 18
Siemens CEO Hopes New Audit Cuts Scope Of Suspected Fraud (WSJ)..... 19
U.S. Oil-gas Unit Is Subject Of Two Criminal Investigations (MRT)..... 20
Lam's Link To Pension Witness Challenged (SDUT)..... 21
Cfius Probe Blamed For Sale Of Voting-machine Company (FT)22

Criminal Law:
Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Dropped (NYT)..... 23
Bush Pardons Short List (WT/AP)..... 25

Civil Law:
Appeals Court Allows FEMA To Hold Off On Funding (WP/AP). 26
FEMA Not Required To Restore Aid To Evacuees, Court Rules (NYT)..... 26
New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments (HC)..... 27
U.S. Gives Grants To 4 Gulf Coast States To Upgrade Disaster Housing (NYT)..... 28

Civil Rights:
Pa., N.J. Stand To Lose Clout (PHI)..... 29
Kansas Court Dismisses Abortion Charges (WP/AP)..... 30
DOJ Report Paints Nightmarish Picture Of Lubbock State School (DMN/AP)..... 30

Antitrust:
Liberty Media Deals For DirecTV (USAT)..... 31
DirecTV Deal Aids 2 Media Moguls (LAT)..... 32
Dick's Sporting Gets Antitrust Clearance (AP)..... 33
Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (ER)..... 33

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Federal Court Rejects EPA's Smog Strategy (WP/AP)..... 33
Appeals Panel Cuts Award In Valdez Spill By Exxon (NYT)..... 34
Damages Are Halved In Exxon Valdez Oil Spill (WP/AP)..... 34

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Subpoenas May Signal Wider Probe Into Son Of Sen. Stevens (RC)..... 35

Immigration:
Agents Remove 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Two Weeks (WT)..... 36

Congress-Administration:
Surf's Up On Capitol Hill (WSJ)..... 37

Other News:
Romney Set For Presidential Announcement (AP)..... 38
Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her (WT/AP)..... 39
The Narrowing Field (WP)..... 39
Another Inexplicably Jumps In (WP)..... 40

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

London Police Chief Warns Of Terrorism (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

LONDON (AP) — London's police chief said Friday the threat of a terror attack in Britain is growing and warned that the Christmas holidays were an especially dangerous period.

Metropolitan Police Commissioner Sir Ian Blair said al-Qaeda represented the gravest threat to Britain since World War II and was of an "unparalleled nature and growing."

"The threat of another terrorist attempt is ever present," he told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "Christmas is a period when that might happen. We have no specific intelligence to do (with) that."

He said al-Qaeda posed a greater threat than the Irish Republican Army's 1970-1997 failed campaign to force Northern Ireland out of the United Kingdom and into the Republic of Ireland, which killed 1,775 people.

The IRA usually did not aim to cause mass atrocities, did not want to die, gave warnings and was "heavily penetrated" by British intelligence agents, Blair said.

"None of those four apply with al Qaida and its affiliates," he said.

"It took 20 years to penetrate the IRA and I have no doubt that the intelligence services will be attempting that now, but it is a more difficult and a much more recent phenomenon," he said.

Home Secretary John Reid said on Dec. 10 that it was highly likely that terrorists would attempt an attack over the holiday period.

Last month, Dame Eliza Manningham-Buller — who heads MI5, Britain's domestic spy service — said authorities were tracking almost 30 terrorist plots involving 1,600 suspects and that her agency had foiled five major plots since the July 2005 transit bomb attacks in London, which killed 52 commuters and the four bombers.

Police Leader Seeks Data On Tunnel Security (NYT)

By William Neuman, William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

The New York police commissioner, Raymond W. Kelly, said yesterday that he had asked the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey to turn over a copy of a security analysis of the PATH train tubes beneath the Hudson River that shows they might be more vulnerable than previously thought to a small but powerful bomb.

Mr. Kelly's request came after a government official provided a draft summary of the analysis to The New York Times because the official was concerned that the Port Authority had not acted with sufficient urgency in its response to the findings. The findings were presented to senior managers at the agency, which runs the PATH trains, last month, the official said.

The government official said the analysis, which revealed a greater weakness in the tubes than was found in earlier tests, had so far not been shared with other government agencies.

Mr. Kelly called the new data on the PATH tubes "a cause for concern," although he said he believed the trains were safe.

Last July, several people were arrested overseas in what the authorities said was a plot to set off bombs in the PATH system that would rupture the tubes and flood the tunnels. The trains have a weekday ridership of 230,000, and carry passengers in four single-track tubes between New Jersey and Manhattan.

Marc La Vorgna, a Port Authority spokesman, said that the agency was in contact with police officials yesterday.

The Port Authority has refused to discuss the analysis of the tubes, which found that a bomb made from a small amount of high explosives could puncture a large hole in the tube wall, allowing river water to flood the tube and other parts of the rail system. The analysis suggested that one tunnel would flood within six minutes, and that the entire system could be overwhelmed in a matter of hours.

Mr. La Vorgna said that the agency in recent weeks has significantly stepped up patrols by Port Authority police and increased bag searches in PATH stations.

DOJ_NMG_0108860

But a reporter who toured four stations yesterday in the midafternoon, including the World Trade Center in Lower Manhattan and Exchange Place in Jersey City, saw only occasional uniformed police officers. No officers were seen stopping passengers to search their bags.

The study of the PATH tubes, which included blast analysis, computer modeling and other tests, was partly financed by the Department of Homeland Security, according to a spokesman for that agency, Russ Knocke. He said that a senior Homeland Security official, Assistant Secretary Robert B. Stephan, had met with Port Authority security officials last month. Mr. Knocke refused to say whether the Port Authority officials had informed Mr. Stephan of the updated blast and flooding data.

Gov. George E. Pataki of New York stressed that the data on the PATH tubes was preliminary, but he urged the Port Authority to move quickly.

"We want them not to wait until there's just the final, ultimate report but to act on any interim findings that they have coming along," Mr. Pataki said.

The agency's board voted this month to spend $180 million for security improvements in the PATH system.

The tests were originally commissioned as part of a joint effort by the Port Authority and the Metropolitan Transportation Authority to analyze underwater tunnels in both the PATH system and the subway.

The head of security for the transportation authority, which operates the subway, said that tests had not found similar weaknesses in the subway tubes.

"Notably, none of the vulnerability analysis has indicated that a small explosive device carried on a train would compromise the integrity of our tunnels," Lewis D. Schiliro, the director of interagency preparedness for the transportation authority, said in a statement.

The transportation authority runs trains through 14 subway tunnels under the Harlem and East Rivers, some of which have a construction that is similar in some ways to the PATH tubes under the Hudson River.

Tom Kelly, a spokesman for the transportation authority, refused to say how many of the under river tunnels were situated in bedrock or other strata below the riverbed and how many of them are made from metal tubes lying in the soft river silt, like the PATH tubes.

At least some of the riverbed tubes in the subway system are lined with concrete, which may make them stronger than the largely unlined PATH tubes.

Elliot G. Sander, the incoming chief executive of the transportation authority, said yesterday he was not prepared to discuss tunnel security before he takes charge of the agency next month.

Judge Links Iran To '96 Attack In Saudi Arabia (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — A federal trial judge ruled Friday that the government of Iran bore significant responsibility for the June 25, 1996, bombing of Khobar Towers in Saudi Arabia, and ordered Tehran to pay more than $253 million in damages to surviving family members of many of the American airmen killed there.

Judge Royce C. Lamberth overturned an earlier ruling by a United States magistrate judge who had found that there was insufficient evidence to tie Iran to the terrorist attack, in which 19 military service members were killed. In this case, as in several similar lawsuits, Iran did not participate in the trial, holding that as a sovereign government it could not be sued in an American court.

But Judge Lamberth ruled that Iran lacked sovereign immunity under the law, which was amended about 10 years ago to cover acts of terrorism, and entered a default judgment — that is, a ruling in favor of the plaintiffs because there was no response from the other side.

Judge Lamberth wrote that he was persuaded of Iran's involvement by testimony from Louis J. Freeh, the former director of the F.B.I., who had taken a deep personal interest in the investigation, and from the bureau's former deputy chief counterterrorism official, Dale Watson.

As with several similar lawsuits, there is considerable uncertainty whether the 55 surviving relatives who participated in the lawsuit will ever be able to obtain any of the damages awarded them.

Shale D. Stiller, the lawyer who brought the case, acknowledged that obtaining money from Iran was an uncertain proposition. He said in an interview that his firm, DLA Piper, would try to have the judgment enforced by searching for Iranian government assets around the world and asking foreign courts to attach them — that is, to sequester them to possibly be awarded to the plaintiffs.

"What we have to do now is take the judgment and go all over the world and find assets that belong to the government of Iran," Mr. Stiller said.

DOJ_NMG_0108861

Lawyers say, however, that courts around the world are typically reluctant to enforce judgments in cases that were won by default because they are open to challenge.

Mr. Stiller said that the fact of an unambiguous statement from a United States court of Iran's role "is more important to the families than any monetary award."

Prof. Ruth Wedgwood of the Paul H. Nitze School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University said that governments often found such judicial interventions unwelcome because they may come at a delicate time in bilateral relations. But she said such rulings had great value because "they officially categorize the behavior as illegal and often make clear facts everybody knows to be true" but are not acknowledged by governments for diplomatic reasons.

In his ruling, Judge Lamberth cited Mr. Freeh's testimony that six of the people who participated in the attack were trained by Iranian officials, sometimes in Iran, and received money and materials from the Iranian Ministry of Information and Security and the Iranian Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corp.

Judge Lamberth said he accepted testimony from other experts that the perpetrators were recruited by a senior official of the Revolutionary Guard at the Iranian Embassy in Damascus, Syria.

The Lamberth opinion is in distinct contrast to previous executive branch examinations, which broadly hinted of an Iranian role but never produced explicit conclusions. The Justice Department's 2001 indictment of many of those involved in the bombing mentioned Iran frequently but avoided pinning responsibility on Tehran.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Proposed Rules For Securing Chemical Plants Released (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

The nation's chemical companies would have to submit to new security inspections and provide the government with plans for protecting themselves from terrorist attacks under proposed rules released yesterday by the Department of Homeland Security.

The rules, scheduled to take effect April 4, closely follow the recommendations of the chemical industry and result from legislation President Bush signed into law in October.

Companies would be required to assess their own vulnerabilities and provide the government with plans for fixing them under the new rules, which were released for public comment. Industry representatives welcomed their arrival.

"They are following the structure that Congress outlined," said Scott Jensen, a spokesman for the American Chemistry Council, which represents the largest chemical makers. "The idea here is to set a security level that they want these facilities to achieve, commensurate with the risk that each facility represents."

The council's 133 members lobbied for the new rules and have spent $3.5 billion on security upgrades at their 2,000 facilities since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, Jensen said.

Companies would have to conduct background checks on employees and better control access or face possible fines of as much as $25,000 a day and the risk of being shut down. But they may also contest government disapproval of their security plans.

Congress will probably have more than a little to say about the proposed new rules next month, in view of the reaction yesterday from critics, who included Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), the outgoing chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee.

Collins, who co-wrote the legislation calling for the rules with Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (D-Conn.), the committee's incoming chairman, said the department is going too far in some areas, such as by assigning itself the power to preempt the legal authority of states and courts.

Democrats, who will take control of Congress next month, view the new rules as too soft on industry and have sought to require manufacturers, in some cases, to replace toxic materials with safer but more expensive substitutes.

Department of Homeland Security officials, however, say that the proposed rules, along with tighter security and the tracking of rail shipments of highly toxic materials, would reduce the likelihood of a chemical attack by terrorists.

Homeland Security Admits Violating Privacy (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Homeland Security Department admitted Friday it violated the Privacy Act two years ago by obtaining more commercial data about U.S. airline passengers than it had announced it would.

DOJ_NMG_0108862

Seventeen months ago, the Government Accountability Office, Congress' auditing arm, reached the same conclusion: The department's Transportation Security Administration "did not fully disclose to the public its use of personal information in its fall 2004 privacy notices as required by the Privacy Act."

Even so, in a report Friday on the testing of TSA's Secure Flight domestic air passenger screening program, the Homeland Security department's privacy office acknowledged TSA didn't comply with the law. But the privacy office still couldn't bring itself to use the word "violate."

Instead, the privacy office said, "TSA announced one testing program, but conducted an entirely different one." In a 40-word, separate sentence, the report noted that federal programs that collect personal data that can identify Americans "are required to be announced in Privacy Act system notices and privacy impact assessments."

TSA spokesman Christopher White noted the GAO's earlier conclusions and said, "TSA has already implemented or is in the process of implementing each of the DHS privacy office recommendations."

Congress has been unhappy with TSA's domestic airline screening program for years — since it was called CAPPS II before it was tweaked and renamed Secure Flight. Federal law now bars TSA from implementing a domestic screening system until the GAO is satisfied it can meet 10 standards of privacy protection, accuracy and security.

Secure Flight has never passed all those tests, and White said there is no target date for implementing it. "We are more concerned with getting it right," White said.

Friday's report reinforced concerns on Capitol Hill.

"This further documents the cavalier way the Bush administration treats Americans' privacy," said Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who is set to become Senate Judiciary Committee chairman in January. "With this database program, first they ignored the Privacy Act, and now, two years later, they still have a hard time admitting it."

Leahy promised the new Congress will try to learn more about how the administration uses such databases. "Data mining technology has great potential," Leahy said, "but history shows that without adequate checks and balances and oversight, misuse and abuse of the public's personal information will be inevitable."

Characterizing the Secure Flight problems as "largely unintentional," Homeland Security's privacy office attributed them to TSA's failure to revise the public announcement after the test changed.

The privacy office said TSA announced in fall 2004 it would acquire passenger name records of people who flew domestically in June 2004. Airline passenger name records include the flyer's name, address, itinerary, form of payment, history of one-way travel, contact phone number, seating location and even requests for special meals.

The public notices said TSA would try to match the passenger names with names on watch lists of terrorists and criminals.

But they also said the passenger records would be compared with unspecified commercial data about Americans in an effort to see if the passenger data was accurate. It assured the public that TSA would not receive commercial data used by contractors to conduct that part of the tests.

But the contractor, EagleForce, used data obtained from commercial data collection companies Acxiom, Insight America and Qsent to fill in missing information in the passenger records and then sent the enhanced records back to TSA on CDs for comparison with watch lists.

This was "contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program," Homeland Security's privacy office concluded. "EagleForce's access to the commercial data amounted to access of the data by TSA."

Another procedure originally thought to enhance privacy backfired. EagleForce augmented the 42,000 passenger name records with similar variations of the spelling of each first and last name so it asked for commercial data on 240,000 names.

Many of these variations were the actual names of real people whose records were then put into the test without any public notice, the report said. Eventually, the three companies supplied EagleForce with 191 million records, though many were duplicates.

Feds: Homeland Security Project Didn't Protect Privacy (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh

CNET News.com, December 23, 2006

A Department of Homeland Security program that linked details on millions of air travelers with profiles drawn from commercial databases was plagued by "privacy missteps" that misled the public, a new government report concludes.

The Transportation Security Agency, operating under the auspices of Homeland Security, had publicly pledged two years ago--in official notices describing the Secure Flight program--that it "will not receive" or have access to dossiers on American travelers compiled by a Beltway contractor.

DOJ_NMG_0108863

That promise turned out to be untrue, according to a report published Friday by DHS' privacy office. The commercial data "made its way directly to TSA, contrary to the express statements in the fall privacy notices about the Secure Flight program," the report says. (Click on "Secure Flight Report" to view a PDF version.)

The report, and a second one critiquing a government database called Matrix, was released on the last business day before Christmas, a tactic that federal agencies and publicly traded companies sometimes use to avoid drawing attention to critical findings. Neither report appears on the DHS.gov or TSA.gov home pages, or even on the home page of the DHS privacy office, but rather was linked to from a subpage on the DHS privacy site.

Jim Harper, a policy analyst with the free-market Cato Institute who serves on a Homeland Security advisory panel, said the reports show that the department needs to pay far more attention to privacy. "They didn't think ahead. They didn't study. They didn't pay attention to the privacy issues," Harper said. "It may need to be hammered home many more times."

Secure Flight was born in September 2004 when DHS ordered airlines to hand over the complete records of all passengers who traveled on a domestic flight in the month of June--which were in turn linked with information on those passengers drawn from commercial databases. (Secure Flight, which was put on hold in February in large part because of privacy concerns, was the successor to DHS' Computer Assisted Passenger Prescreening System.)

The agency's Secure Flight contractor, a McLean, Va.-based company called EagleForce, bought databases with personal information on Americans from three data-mining firms: Acxiom, Insight America and Qsent. The data included U.S. citizens' names, gender, spouse's names, address, date of birth, and in some cases Social Security numbers.

The report from the Homeland Security privacy office takes pains to say that the privacy compromises over Secure Flight were "not intentional," and includes a list of seven recommendations to avoid similar mishaps in the future. Those include explaining to the public exactly what's going on and creating a "data flow map" to ensure information is handled in compliance with the 1974 Privacy Act.

This isn't the first report to take issue with Secure Flight. Last year, auditors at the U.S. Government Accountability Office reported that the program violated the Privacy Act.

In an interview with CNET News.com earlier this year, Peter Pietra, TSA's director of privacy policy, downplayed those concerns. Pietra said the agency disagrees with GAO's interpretation of the law.

A Matrix post-mortem

The second report released Friday represents a postmortem of a defunct project called the Matrix, or the Multistate Anti-Terrorism Information Exchange. Matrix ended in April 2005. (Click on "Matrix Report" for a PDF version.)

DHS provided most of the funding for Matrix, $8 million in 2003, with the Department of Justice tossing in $4 million. Operated by Seisint, which is now part of LexisNexis, the pilot project involved information sharing between state government, federal government, and commercial databases. At least 13 states participated, including California, Texas and New York.

Matrix quickly became controversial for a long list of reasons: It launched in July 2003 with no privacy policy in place. Few participating states ever conducted a self-audit to make sure abuse didn't happen. Neither the Justice Department nor DHS ever did. Privacy specialists weren't consulted until nearly three years after planning began. Even though Matrix was supposedly created as an antiterrorism network, only 2.6 percent of the cases investigated turned out to be terrorism-related.

Also raising questions was the unwillingness of LexisNexis and the participating governments to give a complete list of information accessible through Matrix. But a page captured by Archive.org from the former Matrix-at.org Web site lists records from criminal histories, driver's licenses and motor vehicle registrations, court documents, property ownership, professional licenses, and commercial databases including telephone directories. Other reports have said Social Security numbers, speeding tickets, and family members also are included.

The ACLU had been one of Matrix's most vocal critics. It charged that Matrix was "dangerous and Orwellian" and represented an intrusive data-mining program on innocent Americans.

DHS' privacy office said Friday that Matrix "was undermined, and ultimately halted, in large part because it did not have a comprehensive privacy policy from the outset to provide transparency about the project's purpose and practices and protect against mission creep or abuse."

WAR NEWS:

Gates Says Iraqis And U.S. Are In "Broad Strategic Agreement" (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, John O'Neil

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0108864

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 — Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said Friday that American and Iraqi officials were in "broad strategic agreement" about how to address the violence here, and he stressed that success "will only be achieved with a joint effort with the Iraqis taking the lead."

Mr. Gates spoke to reporters at the end of a three-day Iraq trip that included meetings with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, top American generals and a small group of enlisted soldiers.

He said he had directed Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the top ground commander in Iraq, to work with Iraqi political and military leaders over the next few days to come up with specific recommendations on improving the security situation.

"They do have some concrete plans in mind, and putting flesh on those bones is exactly what General Casey and his team and the Iraqis will be doing in the days ahead," Mr. Gates said, according to [a news agency].

Mr. Gates also indicated that he would brief President Bush, possibly as early as this weekend, on the findings from his trip, his second to Iraq this year. Mr. Bush is in the midst of reviewing Iraq policy and has said no decisions on a change in strategy will be made until he receives proposals from Mr. Gates and the military.

The policy review has created tensions between White House officials who have been pressing for a so-called surge — the temporary addition of American troops to quell violence in Baghdad and Sunni-dominated Anbar Province — and military leaders, who have warned that the move could slow the rate at which Iraqi troops move to the forefront.

Mr. Gates seemed to emphasize the need for Iraqi troops to play a larger part, saying that he was impressed with the Iraqi government's determination "to take a leadership role in dealing with some of these security problems and then economic reconstruction."

He also said that the Iraqis' willingness to step forward "seems to me to be significantly advanced since I was here a couple of months ago," when he visited Baghdad as a member of the Iraq Study Group.

"This is a very difficult situation, but I believe, based on what I've heard both from the American commanders and the Iraqis, that things are moving in a positive direction," he said. "But it's still going to be a long haul."

The American military announced the deaths of five service members, four of whom died in combat in Anbar Province on Thursday, and one who was killed west of Baghdad on Friday when a patrol came under mortar and machine-gun fire.

US And Iraqis "agree On Broad Strategy" (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

US defence secretary Robert Gates – fresh from a three-day visit to Baghdad – is expected to sit down on Saturday with George W Bush to discuss the White House's new Iraq policy.

The new defence secretary travelled to Iraq immediately after his swearing in this week to solicit the advice of US military commanders before he makes recommendations to the president. Mr Bush is expected early next year to unveil his new "way forward" for Iraq.

Mr Gates said before leaving Baghdad on Friday that US and Iraqi officials were in "broad strategic agreement", but declined to provide details on a short-term increase in troop levels and other specific proposals.

One option Mr Bush is considering is a short-term surge in US troop levels to attempt to quell the sectarian violence gripping the Iraqi capital.

US commanders in Baghdad are understood to have told Mr Gates what the joint chiefs in the Pentagon have already concluded: that a surge in troop levels would be counter-productive because it could not be sustained for a long period, and would reduce the pressure on the Iraqi government to clamp down on sectarian militias.

While it is unclear whether Mr Gates will endorse the views of military leaders, Mr Bush this week side-stepped a question about whether he would ignore the advice of his commanders.

Iraqi politicians meanwhile discussed forming a new ruling coalition – an issue at the heart of US planning.

The Shia-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki is under pressure from both the US and Sunni Arabs to distance itself from the radical Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr. Shia politicians on Thursday were reported to have visited the venerated Shia cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, to seek his approval for a new government. On Friday they were planning a weekend meeting with Mr Sadr himself.

Several of Mr Sadr's followers said the radical cleric had agreed to allow his supporters to rejoin the Iraqi government, three weeks after he called a boycott to protest at Mr Maliki's meeting with President Bush in Jordan, in an apparent move to prevent the group from being sidelined altogether.

Dealing with Mr Sadr's movement has posed a dilemma for both Iraqi politicians and US policymakers. Mr Maliki is heavily beholden to the Sadrists, who are probably Iraq's largest mass movement and whose street presence far outweighs that of the prime minister's own Dawa party.

DOJ_NMG_0108865

The Sadrist movement holds 30 seats in the 275-member parliament and three important ministries in the cabinet, yet its Mahdi Army militia is blamed for much of the sectarian violence that has killed many thousands since February.

However, it is unclear how much authority Mr Sadr wields over the loosely structured militia which is nominally loyal to him, and whether his personal influence has increased or reduced the level of sectarian violence.

On the one hand, Mr Sadr has issued statements condemning the violence and lashed out at his followers for failing to obey instructions, but on the other hand he may have used his political influence in Mr Maliki's government to protect militia leaders accused of carrying out sectarian killings.

US commanders say their Iraqi counterparts are pressured to release detained militia leaders, and also have reportedly chafed at Mr Maliki's decision to block raids on the militia's main support base of Sadr City.

Analysts meanwhile are divided as to whether sidelining Mr Sadr would help. A US congressional delegation which visited Iraq 10 days ago told Mr Maliki that he must break his ties with the radical cleric, but the Brussels-based International Crisis Group in a report released last week called on the US to "avoid steps to engineer a cabinet reshuffle aimed at sidelining Moqtada al-Sadr, which would further inflame the situation".

Meanwhile, British forces in the southern port city of Basra arrested seven members of a police unit accused of murdering their colleagues.

British military spokesmen said that one of the suspects was accused of complicity in the October 29 hijacking of a bus containing police translaters, trainers, and cleaning workers. The passengers were executed and their bodies dumped around Basra.

British military spokesman Major Charlie Burbridge said the raid was part of an effort to dissolve Basra's serious crimes unit, which he said had been a problem for several years.

U.S. Commanders In Iraq Recommend A "Surge" (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Top U.S. military commanders in Iraq have decided to recommend a "surge" of fresh American combat forces, eliminating one of the last remaining hurdles to proposals being considered by President Bush for a troop increase, a defense official familiar with the plan said Friday.

The approval of a troop increase plan by top Iraq commanders, including Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, comes days before Bush unveils a new course for the troubled U.S. involvement in Iraq. Bush still must address concerns among some Pentagon officials and overcome opposition from Congress, where many Democrats favor a blue-ribbon commission's recommendation for a gradual withdrawal of combat troops.

But the recommendation by the commanders in Iraq is significant because Bush has placed prime importance on their advice. The U.S. command in Iraq decided to recommend an increase of troops several days ago, prior to meetings in Baghdad this week with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, the defense official said.

Gates, who returned to Washington on Friday, will join Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley in meetings with President Bush Saturday at Camp David. White House Press Secretary Dana Perino said the meeting was part of the Iraq strategy review, and Bush was not expected to make a final decision on the administration's new policy.

Commanders have been skeptical of the value of increasing troops, and the decision represents a reversal for Casey, the highest ranking officer in Iraq. Casey and Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top commander in the Middle East who will step down in March, have long resisted adding more troops in Iraq, arguing that it could delay the development of Iraqi security forces and increase anger at the United States in the Arab world.

The defense official said commanders have not determined the exact number of extra troops they will request. Military officers have debated an increase of about 20,000, about five extra combat brigades. But while some officers think five extra brigades would be difficult to muster, others believe more troops will be required.

"People are warming to the realization that some sort of surge is necessary," said another military official.

The officials spoke on the condition their names not be revealed because Bush has not announced a final decision on his Iraq policy.

Bush recently called for an increase in the overall size of the Army and Marine Corps. But he stressed he has not made a decision on whether to send more troops to Iraq and wants to speak further with Gates.

Some members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff remain skeptical of a surge, unconvinced that it will yield more positive results than other recent military operations to secure Baghdad or Iraq. But other military officers have said that a buildup in troops is

DOJ_NMG_0108866

America's last chance to roll back the sectarian violence, neutralize the insurgency and strengthen the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Many military officers maintain there is no middle ground strategy for Iraq, and that United States must either increase the force, gambling that the military can impose a measure of security on Iraq, or else begin to withdraw its forces.

Those skeptical about the efficacy of an increase argue that any new troops must be given clear instructions. However, defense officials say the U.S. commanders in Iraq have not settled on what that mission should be, although they are expected to decide before calling up new units.

Gates may have been alluding to that on Friday, when he told reporters he has asked Casey to make specific recommendations on how to improve security in Iraq and to work with Iraqi military leaders to "put flesh on those bones" of a new security plan.

"There is still some work to be done between Gen. Casey and his counterparts in the Iraqi government," Gates said. "But I do expect to give a report to the president on what I have learned and my perceptions."

Iraqi politics will be a key factor in deciding how to use extra U.S. military force. American diplomats are trying to engineer an ouster of the political faction of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr from the government and are trying to help set up a moderate coalition of Kurds, Sunnis and Shiites that is more willing to confront al-Sadr's militias.

The U.S. military now considers forces loyal to al-Sadr to be the top threat to the security of Iraq.

Al-Sadr controls 30 seats in the Iraqi parliament and six Cabinet seats in the current government, although the al-Sadr loyalists have been boycotting the government in protest of al-Maliki's meeting with Bush in Jordan in November.

Military officials were dismayed that one of the country's most influential clerics, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, did not immediately back efforts to establish a new coalition government. If al-Sistani insists that al-Sadr remain within the Shiite coalition, it would represent a blow to the U.S. goal of marginalizing the radical cleric.

"The goals are tied to the palace intrigue," the military official said. "We are watching them carefully."

A troop buildup has sparse political support, but is backed by Sen. John McCain R-Ariz., considered a front-runner for the GOP presidential nomination. Key Democratic lawmakers and some Pentagon officials, however, remain skeptical. Sen. Carl Levin D-Mich., the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services committee, is among those pushing for a timetable for withdrawal -- not a buildup of forces.

Several members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff also have expressed reservations. Because the Joint Chiefs are not part of the military's formal chain of command, the recommendation to increase or decrease will go from commanders in Iraq to Gates and then to Bush. But the Joint Chiefs retain an important advisory role.

Gen. James T. Conway, the new commandant of the Marine Corps and a member of the Joint Chiefs, emphasized the drawbacks of a surge in public comments last week.

"We would fully support, I think, as the Joint Chiefs, the idea of putting more troops into Iraq if there is a solid military reason for doing that, if there is something to be gained," he said. "We do not believe that just adding numbers for the sake of adding numbers -- just thickening the mix -- is necessarily the way to go."

Like Conway, Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army chief of staff, has said extra troops must be given a clearly defined mission. "We would not surge without a purpose," Schoomaker said recently. "And that purpose should be measurable."

Conway suggested that adding more troops now would mean the military would be less ready to deploy in the future.

"You better make sure your timing is right," he said. "Because if you commit the reserve for something other than a decisive win or to stave off defeat, then you have essentially shot your bolt."

'A New Way Forward,' If With More Troops, Faces Resistance (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

— The leader of the Senate Democrats, Harry Reid of Nevada, seemed to open the door Sunday to supporting a temporary increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq. Two days later, he shut it.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), returned from two days in Iraq and stated his opposition to a troop surge. "It would create more targets," he said.

As President Bush considers whether to temporarily boost the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, few members of Congress are stepping forward forcefully to promote the idea. So far, the bulk of the political response has been a mix of silence, skepticism and outright opposition.Bush is considering whether to add as many as 30,000 troops to the force of about 140,000 already in Iraq, but he has not committed to the idea. The president is expected to launch a new Iraq strategy, which he calls a "new way forward," in early January — just as Democrats are moving into majority positions in the House and Senate after a midterm election widely interpreted as rejecting the president's conduct of the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0108867

Members of Congress have limited reach in shaping day-to-day policy in Iraq. The effect of their votes on spending for the war will play out only in months and years to come, and the president has demonstrated time and again his readiness to buck the tide of the Democrats' opposition.

But broad political opposition has historically put reins on unpopular military policies. Some members of Congress are asking what mission the troops would be charged with performing and questioning the likelihood of success.

Sen. John McCain, the Arizona Republican considered a front-runner for his party's presidential nomination in 2008, has been a leader of a limited group that has pressed for a more aggressive approach in Iraq, including the dispatch of more troops to stem the sectarian violence and insurgent attacks.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, the Democrats' 2000 vice presidential candidate who won reelection to the Senate in November as an independent, has strongly favored sending additional troops.

McCain, Lieberman, and Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) visited Baghdad last week. Collins said she was "not yet convinced that additional troops" would help bring a lasting peace.

Their comments aside, many Republican leaders have been reluctant to express themselves on the question, and Democrats who have spoken about it remain skeptical or oppose a troop increase.

The incoming Senate Republican leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, has made no public statements on whether to increase the deployment. He is waiting "to hear from the folks at the Pentagon," said a spokesman, Don Stewart.

On Sunday, Reid said on ABC News' "This Week" that he would go along with a troop surge if it lasted two or three months and was "part of a program to get us out of there ... by this time next year." But two days later, he came out against an increase. In a blog posting on the website Huffingtonpost.com, he wrote: "Frankly, I don't believe that more troops is the answer for Iraq.... I do not support an escalation of the conflict."

Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who is preparing to become House speaker, opposes sending more troops, as does the second-ranking House Democrat, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland.

Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, all potential Democratic presidential candidates, also oppose a troop increase.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is also a potential Democratic presidential candidates, presented a nuanced response on NBC's "Today Show" earlier this week, when she said she was not in favor of an increase "unless it's part of a larger plan."

Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island, a leading Democratic spokesman on military affairs, said in a telephone interview: "Put me down as skeptical."

He said that before he would support a surge, the divergent elements within the Iraqi government would have to move toward political reconciliation and begin delivering public services, and Bush would have to convince him that the troops he was sending would have a specific, achievable mission.

And Reed said the additional deployment would have to be much greater than 20,000, given the size of Baghdad and the number of militants operating there.

james.gerstenzang@
latimes.com

Al-Qaeda Allies Claim Bigger Base Of Support In Iraq (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

Forces allied with al-Qaeda in Iraq claimed yesterday to have broadened their base of support among Iraqi Sunnis, saying that 70 percent of tribal sheiks and a number of previously independent insurgent groups have pledged allegiance to what has been called the Islamic State of Iraq under its emir, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi.

An 18-minute audiotape attributed to Baghdadi and released on the Internet invited officers in ousted president Saddam Hussein's disbanded army to join the insurgents. Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki issued a similar invitation last week to all former soldiers and officers to join the government's military.

The Sunni-dominated army was dissolved by L. Paul Bremer, then the U.S. administrator in Iraq, after American-led forces toppled Hussein's government in the spring of 2003. Many of its members are believed to have already joined the insurgency.

Maliki's invitation, issued last weekend, was part of the latest reconciliation effort aimed at ending the sectarian violence that has swept Iraq this year. Even as it has appealed to Sunnis, Maliki's Shiite-majority government has been unable to rein in its own side, including radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, whose militia is believed to be driving much of the violence.

Baghdadi's statement called on Sunnis to shun the faltering efforts to maintain a multiethnic unity government in Iraq, which it said were being negotiated by Saudi Arabia at the behest of the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0108868

Since the death last summer of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the brutal leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, once-disparate Sunni insurgent groups have portrayed themselves as increasingly unified, with political as well as military goals. They declared the formation of an Islamic state in October, and yesterday's statement said that governors have been appointed in Sunni-dominated areas and Islamic law is being imposed at "the request of the people themselves." Judges have been appointed "to finish the disputes and stop the standing disagreements" among Sunni tribal leaders, and punishments are being meted out for crimes such as adultery, the statement said.

Baghdadi's invitation to Hussein's disbanded army is open to officers holding the rank of major and below, provided they can "recite at least three chapters" of the Koran and pass an exam on Islamic law. It added: "This is to make sure that he is free from his unbelief with Baath," Hussein's secular political party. In return, "we will provide him with travel, salary, food and lodging."

The statement, translated by the Washington-based SITE Institute, which monitors extremist Web sites, noted that President Bush has warned of the establishment of an "Islamic state from China to Spain" and added: "This liar is right."

The insurgents appear well aware of the Bush administration's current policy review, saying that U.S. military forces in Iraq are staggering and "starting to look for flight." Baghdadi offered Bush two weeks to decide to withdraw all U.S. forces, adding that they would be given one month to leave without interference, provided they left behind all equipment and heavy weapons.

Insurgents Offer U.S. 30-day Truce To Get Out Of Iraq (CNN)

CNN.com, December 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- The leader of an umbrella organization for Iraqi insurgent groups is offering the United States a one-month truce to withdraw all U.S. forces from Iraq and turn over its military bases "to the mujahedeen of the Islamic state."

In an audiotape posted on Islamic Web sites Friday, a speaker identified as Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of the Mujahideen Shura Council, said that if U.S. forces begin withdrawing from Iraq immediately and leave their heavy weaponry behind, "we will allow your withdrawal to complete without anyone targeting you with any explosive or anything else."

"We say to Bush not to waste this historic opportunity that will guarantee you a safe withdrawal," al-Baghdadi said on the audiotape.

The United States was given two weeks to respond to the offer.

The Mujahideen Shura Council is an umbrella group formed in late 2005 that includes several terrorist and insurgent groups, including al Qaeda in Iraq.

On the audiotape, al-Baghdadi also called on officers from the former Iraqi army to join an "army of the Islamic state," promising them a house and a salary as long as they pass a "test of faith" intended to demonstrate the extent of their "hatred" for Saddam Hussein and his regime.

The U.S. military Friday reported five U.S. troop deaths, while Iraqi authorities reported the discovery of a dozen bodies and the kidnapping of a Sunni imam in Baghdad.

One soldier was killed and another wounded when attackers targeted a coalition patrol west of the capital, the U.S. military said. Three Marines and a sailor assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 died Thursday from wounds suffered during combat in Anbar province, the military also said.

The deaths bring the December U.S. military death toll to 73 and the overall total during the war to 2,955; seven U.S. contractors also have been killed.Other developments

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates concluded his three-day tour of Iraq to assess U.S. troop levels and Iraq's security situation. He was headed for Washington on Friday and was expected to issue a report of his consultations with U.S. troops, commanders and Iraqi officials to President Bush during the weekend.

Coalition forces in Baghdad killed an insurgent and detained 35 others Friday morning during raids aimed at al Qaeda in Iraq members, the U.S. military said. In Basra, about 1,000 British troops arrested four and seized weapons in a sweep to arrest police suspected of death squad activities. Iraqi troops in Diyala province also launched raids, detaining 13 people in a sweep that targeted "an illegal armed group cell."

The Shiite leadership says it will not exclude radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a statement that appeared to douse hopes for the emergence of a moderate political alliance that would include Sunni and Kurdish parties.

President Bush and first lady Laura Bush made bedside visits to 38 American service members at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center on Friday, The Associated Press reported. They joined Girl Scouts and children of hospital staff to wrap presents for families and children of wounded military personnel and were to head for Camp David later Friday for the Christmas holiday, AP reported.

DOJ_NMG_0108869

Polish President Lech Kaczynski has approved a one-year extension through 2007 for his country's 900 troops to serve in Iraq, the AP cited his foreign policy adviser as saying Friday. They are mainly involved in training Iraqi security forces, AP reported.

Eight Marines have been charged in the killings of 24 Iraqi civilians in Haditha last year, the Marine Corps announced Thursday.

Ultimatum From Al Qaeda (AFP)

AFP, December 23, 2006

Dec 23, 2006, DUBAI (AFP) - The head of an Al-Qaeda-dominated group in Iraq offered to give US troops a month to pull out free of attack in an audiotape posted on the Internet and demanded an answer within two weeks.

Abu Omar al-Baghdadi also charged that Washington had attempted to open communications through Saudi intermediaries but said he had rebuffed the overture, in the voice recording whose authenticity could not immediately be verified.

"We are offering you the opportunity to withdraw your troops in complete safety and we are expecting your response within two weeks," said the voice purporting to be that of Baghdadi, leader of a self-proclaimed Islamic emirate in western and north-central Iraq that is dominated by Al-Qaeda supporters.

"We appeal to President George W. Bush to seize this historic opportunity which should allow your troops to pull out in safety," it said.

Asked wether the US administration was checking on the authenticity of the tape or if it would answer the offer, Gordon Johndroe, a White House spokesman, declined any comment.

Bush has faced intense political pressure to overhaul his Iraq policy, following the rout of his Republican party in mid-term elections, rock-bottom approval of his management of the Iraq war and mounting US combat deaths.

A policy review by the Iraq Study Group, a bi-partisan panel, recommended that all frontline US troops be withdrawn by early 2008.

But Bush made clear Wednesday that he was opposed to any precipitate withdrawal from Iraq and that in the short term US troop numbers might even rise.

"I want the enemy to understand that this is a tough task, but they can't run us out of the Middle East; that they can't intimidate America," he said.

The voice recording also charged that US officials had made contact with the Al-Qaeda front organization through Saudi intermediaries in a bid to open up communication but said that the overture had been rebuffed.

"The giant has begun to collapse and is seeking to negotiate through various parties, particularly through its agents," it said.

"It conveyed to us through the Saud family (the royal family in Saudi Arabia), the dictators of the (Arabian) peninsula, its desire (to negotiate), claiming already to have sat down with all parties apart from us.

"But we told it: 'We don't negotiate with those who have shed the blood of our children.'"

US officials have expressed readiness to open up communications with insurgent groups in Iraq but have always excluded those with links to Al-Qaeda.

5 U.S. Troops Die In Iraq As Month's Toll Hits 70 (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 -- Five more American service members have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military reported Friday, in what is shaping up to be one of the deadliest months for U.S. forces this year.

Four of those deaths occurred Thursday in western Iraq's Anbar province, where Sunni insurgents are aggressively fighting U.S. troops. The fatalities included three Marines and a sailor assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7, the military said.

On Friday, one soldier died and another was wounded when they came under fire during a patrol west of the capital, according to the military.

Newly appointed Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates on Friday returned to the United States for consultations with President Bush. Gates will offer findings from three days of meetings with U.S. commanders and Iraqi leaders about possible shifts in U.S. war strategy.

Before leaving, Gates told reporters at Camp Victory in Baghdad that naval forces in the Persian Gulf have increased, the Associated Press reported. Denying that this was a direct reaction to Iran's refusal to rein in its nuclear program, he called it a signal to all Gulf countries that the United States will maintain an enduring presence in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0108870

As of Thursday, 70 service members had been killed this month, said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. Sixty were killed in action, and 10 died from noncombat causes such as accidents and illnesses, he said.

According to iCasualties.org, a Web site that tracks military casualties, the deadliest month this year has been October, with 110 deaths, including four non-Americans.

"We are in a tough fight, and we continue to conduct aggressive operations in support of the people of Iraq," Garver said.

U.S.-led forces have stepped up efforts to quell sectarian violence in Baghdad while continuing to fight insurgents in Anbar.

During multiple raids throughout the region Friday morning, coalition forces killed one suspected insurgent and detained 25 believed to be responsible for car bombings and other attacks against civilians and troops, the military said. They also captured an al-Qaeda financier, the military said.

U.S. forces are training Iraqi forces to take over security. Part of that training involves conducting joint operations to confiscate weapons caches and arrest suspected insurgents.

On Thursday, forces with the Iraqi army's 4th Division and U.S.-led coalition advisers captured a suspected leader of an insurgent cell and detained two others in Taji, north of Baghdad. The suspected cell leader, whose name was not released, planned car and roadside bombings against the convoys of Iraqi and coalition forces and helped set up illegal checkpoints, the military said.

Meanwhile, the purported leader of a militant group linked to al-Qaeda offered U.S. troops a one-month truce if they agreed to withdraw from Iraq and hand over their heavy weapons and military bases.

In a 19-minute speech posted on an insurgent Web site, Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, the leader of Islamic State of Iraq, said the troops would not be attacked on their way out. "We tell Bush, 'Don't miss this historical opportunity that will guarantee you a safe withdrawal from Iraq,' " he said.

The authenticity of the tape could not be verified.

Also Friday, the U.S. Embassy denied involvement in the escape of Iraq's former electricity minister from a police station in the Green Zone, the fortress-like compound that houses the Iraqi government and U.S. and British embassies.

Aiham al-Sammarae, an Iraqi-U.S. citizen who had lived in exile in a Chicago suburb until the 2003 U.S.-led occupation, had been awaiting trial on several corruption charges when he fled the station with the help of private security agents, Iraqi officials said.

Radhi al-Radhi, the head of Iraq's Public Integrity Commission, an anti-corruption panel investigating Sammarae, said in an interview shortly after the escape that he believed the agents were Americans.

December A Very Bloody Month For U.S. Troops (WT/AP)

By Christopher Torchia

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Insurgent attacks killed five more American troops west of the Iraqi capital, the military said yesterday, making December the second-deadliest month for U.S. servicemen in 2006.

So far this month, 76 American troops have died in Iraq, the same number that were killed in all of April.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates flew back to Washington yesterday to give President Bush his advice on transforming U.S. policy in Iraq after holding three days of talks in the war zone with military and political leaders.

Mr. Gates was scheduled to see the president at the mountain retreat of Camp David, Md., today.

Before leaving Baghdad, Mr. Gates declined to say whether he plans to recommend a short-term increase in U.S. troop levels, but said he thinks there is "a broad strategic agreement between the Iraqi military and Iraqi government and our military."

Britain's Defense Secretary Des Browne acknowledged yesterday he may have to increase the size of Britain's armed forces as a result of commitments in Iraq and Afghanistan -- echoing military expansion plans being considered in Washington.

Mr. Browne told the Times of London he could consider increasing the size of the armed forces from 95,560 because current deployments had left too little time for training exercises.

"People imagine that the best form of training is to be in Iraq or Afghanistan, but it's not true," Mr. Browne was quoted as saying by the newspaper. "While we are deploying troops in their thousands, we lose the chance to build up their basic skills."

Poland, which has 900 soldiers in Iraq, agreed yesterday to extend its mission in Iraq until the end of 2007. The Poles focus mainly on training Iraqi security forces and are based in an area south of Baghdad that is calmer than the capital.

Also yesterday, South Korean lawmakers endorsed a motion to extend the country's deployment in Iraq for another year, but cut the number of troops in half. The motion calls on the South Korean government to withdraw 1,100 troops of its 2,300-strong contingent in the relatively peaceful, northern city of Irbil by April.

DOJ_NMG_0108871

The five U.S. deaths announced yesterday took place over two days. One soldier died and another was wounded yesterday when their patrol came under fire west of Baghdad, the military said. On Thursday, three Marines and one U.S. sailor died from wounds sustained in combat in western Anbar province.

Meanwhile, Shi'ites from parliament's largest bloc, the United Iraqi Alliance, met yesterday in Najaf amid efforts to craft a new coalition that would include Kurds and one Sunni party. They had traveled to the holy city to seek approval for the plan from Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, a revered Shi'ite cleric who is said to be alarmed at the bloodshed sweeping swathes of the country.

It was not clear whether such a coalition would be able to govern effectively without the backing of radical Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's 30 loyalists in the 275-member parliament, and his six ministers in the 38-member Cabinet.

The builders of the new coalition are trying to exclude Sheik al-Sadr, whose faction has been an integral part of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government but has been boycotting the parliament and Cabinet to protest Mr. al-Maliki's recent meeting with Mr. Bush.

Officials close to the militia leader said he has agreed to end the three-week boycott and allow supporters to rejoin the government.

Separately, the purported leader of an al Qaeda-linked militant group offered U.S. troops a one-month truce to withdraw from Iraq without being attacked, according to a speech posted on an Islamic Web site yesterday.

The authenticity of the tape of Abu Omar al-Baghdadi, leader of al Qaeda in Iraq, could not be verified.

Shiites Remake Baghdad In Their Image (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 22 — As the United States debates what to do in Iraq, this country's Shiite majority has been moving toward its own solution: making the capital its own.

Large portions of Baghdad have become Shiite in recent months, as militias press their fight against Sunni militants deeper into the heart of the capital, displacing thousands of Sunni residents. At least 10 neighborhoods that a year ago were mixed Sunni and Shiite are now almost entirely Shiite, according to residents, American and Iraqi military commanders and local officials.

For the first years of the war, Sunni militants were dominant, forcing Shiites out of neighborhoods and systematically killing bakers, barbers and trash collectors, who were often Shiites. But starting in February, after the bombing of a shrine in the city of Samarra, Shiite militias began to strike back, pushing west from their strongholds and redrawing the sectarian map of the capital, home to a quarter of Iraq's population.

The Shiite-dominated government publicly condemns violence against Sunnis and says it is trying to stop the militias that carry it out. But the attacks have continued unabated, and Sunnis have grown suspicious.

Plans for a new bridge that would bypass a violent Sunni area in the east, and a proposal for land handouts in towns around Baghdad that would bring Shiites into what are now Sunni strongholds underscored these concerns.

Sunni political control in Baghdad is all but nonexistent: Of the 51 members of the Baghdad Provincial Council, which runs the city's services, just one is Sunni.

In many ways, the changes are a natural development. Shiites, a majority of Iraq's population, were locked out of the ruling elite under Saddam Hussein and now have power that matches their numbers.

The danger, voiced by Sunni Arabs, is that an emboldened militant fringe will conduct broader killings without being stopped by the government, or, some fear, with its help. That could, in turn, draw Sunni countries into the fight and lead to a protracted regional war, precisely the outcome that Americans most fear.

"They say they're against this, but on the ground they do nothing," said Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, a Sunni. He moved his family to the better-protected Green Zone in October.

The debate reaches to the heart of the American enterprise here. While President Bush is considering more troops, some in the Shiite-dominated government say the Americans should stay out of the sectarian fight in Baghdad and let the battle run its course. Getting involved would simply prolong the fight, they say.

At an army base in northern Baghdad, an Iraqi general moved his hand across a map of the capital. The city is dividing fast, he said, writing, "Sunni" and "Shiite" in graceful Arabic script across each neighborhood.

"Now we face a new style of splitting the neighborhoods," said the general, a Shiite. "The politicians are doing this."

Neighborhoods in the east — most vulnerable to Shiite militias from Sadr City, the largest eastern district and one of its poorest — have lost much of their minority Sunni populations since February. Even the solidly middle-class neighborhoods of Zayuna and Ghadier, very mixed as little as six months ago, are starting to lose Sunnis.

DOJ_NMG_0108872

In Baladiyad, a once-mixed area of eastern Baghdad, workers smoothed mortar onto brick. A Shiite mosque was taking shape.

On the same block, a half-finished Sunni mosque stood deserted, its facade hung with peeling posters of last year's leaders. Less than a mile away, another mosque has never been used.

"They can't come here now," a Shiite worker said. "They are Sunni."

Further south, in the neighborhood of Naariya, a Shiite refugee family sat in a darkened living room in a house they recently occupied.

The house belonged to a Sunni family, but they had fled after a spate of killings, and the local office of Moktada al-Sadr, a Shiite cleric, had arranged for Shiites to move in.

The new family's scant belongings hung on the wall: a portrait of the father, now dead, and a broken revolver. Somebody else's clock chimed. Mattresses and couches of the previous owners packed the room.

"They told us it's safe here, it's a Shiite neighborhood," said Mustafa, one of the sons. "The Mahdi Army is protecting the area," he said, referring to Mr. Sadr's militia. Family members declined to give their name for safety reasons.

The family has no sympathy for the Sunnis. They fled Baquba, a relentlessly violent town north of Baghdad, after Sunni militants killed their father, a man in his 70's; kidnapped a brother; and shot another brother dead.

Around 400 Shiite families have fled from Baquba to Naariya and a nearby neighborhood, Baghdad Jedidah, over the past few months, said Mustafa, citing local officials in Mr. Sadr's office.

"We are a ship that sank under the ocean," said his mother, Aziza, 46.

Besides, Mustafa said, Shiite militias pursue only Sunnis with suspicious affiliations. The Sunni militias, on the other hand, "are killing anyone who is Shiite," Aziza said. (A relative in a separate conversation said one of Aziza's sons had killed more than 10 Sunnis since coming to Baghdad this fall. The family denied any involvement in militias.)

Aziza added, "My husband was an ordinary man."

But a divided Iraq can destroy ordinary people.

A Sunni man named Bassim, his Shiite wife and their three small children said Shiite militiamen forced them to leave their home in Huriya, west of the Tigris, one chilly afternoon this month. Bassim left two jobs as a butcher and a hospital cleaner because they were in very Shiite neighborhoods.

"My husband is a Sunni, but he has nothing to do with insurgents," said his wife, Zahra Kareem Alwan, holding her sobbing daughter on her hip in a school in Adel, a Sunni neighborhood in western Baghdad where families took temporary refuge. Boxes of water were stacked in a corner.

Last week, the family was moved to an empty house farther west. They did not know the owner.

Shiite leaders argue that the Iraqi Army would not allow massacres. They say Americans will be embedded with units as a safety check.

In Huriya, it was an Iraqi Army unit that helped Ms. Alwan and other families into trucks and brought them to Adel. An American colonel advising the Iraqi Army unit that controls the area said that Shiites occupied the houses within 48 hours. Americans counted about 180 families who had fled. The Iraqi general said it was 50.

Shiite political leaders were skeptical.

"These are lies," said Hadi al-Amiri, head of the security committee in Parliament and of the Badr Organization, the armed wing of one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite parties.

"It's merely propaganda to create fears among Arabs," he added, a reference to Sunni Arab countries.

The main problem, Mr. Amiri said, was Sunni insurgents and their suicide bombs.

"They want to go back to the old equation, when they were the officers and the Shia were just soldiers and slaves," Mr. Amiri said, with an intensity that spoke of deep scars inflicted by the past government, referring to the loyalists to Saddam Hussein. "This will never happen again. They should believe in the new equation."

Using the unlikely analogy of Mr. Hussein draining the marshes in southern Iraq to destroy the marsh Arabs, Mr. Amiri talked about ways that Baghdad could be encircled to choke off the supply lines of Sunni militants, for instance, by fortifying a network of rivers, a dam, and several highways.

"He divided it, drained the water, and within two to three years it was a desert," he said. "I believe Baghdad will be like this."

Militias are already doing their part to defend Shiites. In a Shiite mosque in northern Baghdad, refugees from the embattled northern village of Sabaa al-Bour, many of them women in black abayas, gathered in October asking for food and shelter.

Killings of Shiites in the town had enraged leaders in Baghdad. But weeks had dragged on, and one morning in October, a volunteer walked through the refugees telling them to go back home.

The Mahdi Army was there now, she said. The town was now safe for Shiites.

DOJ_NMG_0108873

Shiites are also making inroads on local and federal levels. Baghdad's municipal government is taking bids for designs of a bridge that would connect Greyat with Kadhimiya, two major Shiite areas in northern Baghdad on opposite sides of the Tigris River. Adhamiya, a Sunni area where the bridge is now and where it has been closed, would be bypassed altogether.

"The former regime refused to make the connection because it would strengthen the Shia," said Naem al-Kaabi, a deputy mayor of Baghdad.

In another plan that appears intended to repopulate heavily Sunni-controlled areas with Shiites, the Ministry of Public Works has proposed giving land to victims of violence inflicted by Mr. Hussein and by insurgents since 2003. The plots would be in six towns outside Baghdad — Abu Ghraib, Taji, Salman Pak, Husseiniya, Mahmudiya and Latifiya, according to a local official familiar with the plan.

Sunni militants now control the towns and have conducted brutal campaigns to eliminate Shiites. Mr. Hussein gave favors to Sunni tribes there to protect against Shiites from the south. Few Sunnis claim compensation as victims of violence, since the application requires visits to police stations and hospitals, places no longer safe for Sunnis.

It was not clear how soon the plan would be carried out. A previous proposal, made by the Iraqi cabinet last year, would give some land in heavily Sunni west Baghdad to about 3,000 families, but names are still being registered.

In another indication of the current mood, a popular cellphone ring in eastern Baghdad, now largely Shiite, is a tune with the words: "If you can't beat me, don't fight me."

The Sunni houses in Naariya did not empty easily. A college student with a Sunni name said he hid in his house, as Shiite militiamen went into homes on his block in late September and marched people away. A few days later, his uncle, a 35-year-old refrigerator repairman, was taken. The body was found in Ur, a Shiite stronghold in north Baghdad.

But unlike a bomb blast, where everybody remembers how someone died, the Sunnis' losses seems to melt away. The Mahdi Army-controlled police station had no record of them.

Terrified, the men of the family scattered, settling on couches and in a garage of friends and family.

The student, Omar, is keeping a diary.

"One day I'll be a teacher," he said. "I should teach children what we passed through."

Iraqis Sue Over Oil-for-food Program (AP)

By Larry Neumeister,

AP, December 23, 2006

Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying they were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted.

The lawsuit, brought by seven Iraqi individuals seeking class-action status on behalf of northern Iraqis, said the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003.

The suit, in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks at least $200 million in damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

According to the lawsuit, residents of the Irbil, Dokuk and Sulaimaniyah areas of Iraq claimed they did not receive the full benefits to which they were entitled.

The lawsuit said the companies stole from the Iraqis "by engaging in a brazen kickback scheme" in which money earmarked for the benefit of Iraqis was instead improperly transferred "into the coffers of Saddam Hussein's corrupt Iraqi regime or used to indemnify goods suppliers, including AWB, for the bribes they had paid Iraq."

The lawsuit said the companies disguised and misrepresented the kickbacks to make them appear to be legitimate costs. It also accused them of knowing or recklessly disregarding that money was being paid illegally to the government of Saddam Hussein.

BNP paid as much as $1.5 billion in kickbacks to Hussein's government while AWB paid more than $200 million, the lawsuit claims.

BNP is headquartered in Paris, France, but has offices in the United States, including New York. Edwina Frawley, a BNP spokeswoman, said she had no comment Friday.

A government-commissioned report in Australia was released several weeks ago saying AWB paid $220 million in kickbacks to former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's regime from 1999 to 2003 to secure lucrative wheat contracts under the oil-for-food scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0108874

Under the oil-for-food program, AWB, which had sold wheat to Iraq since 1948, sold 6.8 million tons to the nation, receiving more than $2.3 billion in payments, the lawsuit said.

"It's the first I've heard of it," AWB spokesman Peter McBride said of the lawsuit. "It would be an ill-conceived action, and if it's brought to fruition, it would be vigorously defended."

In late November, in response to the government-commissioned report, the wheat exporter accepted responsibility for the scandal and announced a corporate restructuring plan.

Iraq no longer permits AWB to send wheat there.

In October 2005, a U.N.-backed investigation said in a report that about 2,200 companies in the oil-for-food program, including corporations in the United States, France, Germany and Russia, paid a total of $1.8 billion in kickbacks and illicit surcharges to Saddam Hussein's government.

A message seeking comment from lawyers Gary Osen and Joshua Glatter was not returned Friday evening.

The lawsuit was filed in New York because, it says, "the defendants maintained offices, conducted or transacted substantial business and committed acts in New York."

Iraqis' Suit Targets 2 Firms In U.N. Oil-for-Food Program (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

NEW YORK, Dec. 22 -- Seven Iraqi citizens filed a $200 million lawsuit Friday against a prominent European bank and an Australian wheat exporter, saying the Iraqis were cheated out of humanitarian goods when the companies permitted the U.N. oil-for-food program to be corrupted.

The lawsuit seeks class-action status on behalf of northern Iraqis. It alleges that the bank, BNP Paribas, and AWB Limited, the largest humanitarian goods provider under the oil-for-food program, cheated the citizens of Iraq from June 10, 1999, to June 3, 2003.

The suit, filed in U.S. District Court in Manhattan, seeks damages under the federal Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, and the International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

A government-commissioned report in Australia was released several weeks ago; it said AWB paid $220 million in kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's government from 1999 to 2003 to secure lucrative wheat contracts under the oil-for-food plan.

In October 2005, a United Nations-backed investigation said in a report that about 2,200 companies in the oil-for-food program, including corporations in the United States, France, Germany and Russia, paid a total of $1.8 billion in kickbacks and illicit surcharges to Hussein's government.

In a related matter, the United Nations announced that the documents from that investigation will be stored for at least two years, and made available to U.N. member nations, if the secretary general approves. The papers will not be released to the public.

Flurry Of Calls About Draft, And A Day Of Denials (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — As the de facto media contact for the Selective Service System, Dick Flahavan is the Maytag repairman of government press people. With the military draft out of business since 1973, the Selective Service just doesn't get a lot of calls these days.

But by midday Friday, Mr. Flahavan's office had fielded dozens of inquiries, not just from reporters but from some anxious parents as well, all with some variation of the same urgent question: Are you reinstituting the draft?

So adamant was the denial that Mr. Flahavan, a bit beleaguered, had his staff members post an unplanned update Friday morning at the top of Selective Service's Web site: "No Draft on Horizon!"

What prompted all this was a Hearst wire service article noting that the Selective Service was making plans for a "mock" draft exercise that would use computerized models to determine how, if necessary, the government would get some 100,000 young adults to report to their local draft boards.

The mock computer exercise, last carried out in 1998, is strictly routine, Selective Service officials said, and it will not actually be run until 2009 — if at all. The exercise has been scheduled several times in the last few years, only to be scuttled each time because of budget and staffing problems, and Mr. Flahavan said he would not be surprised if it was canceled this time around, too.

No matter. With President Bush saying that he wants to increase the size of the Army and the Marine Corps, the military strained near the breaking point and the secretary of veterans affairs suggesting publicly this week that a reconstituted draft could "benefit" the country, even the notion of a mock exercise seemed to strike a nerve.

DOJ_NMG_0108875

Since the start of the war in Iraq, some Democrats and Internet bloggers have been stirring up talk of a "secret plan" by the Bush administration to resume the draft, and the mere mention of the idea summons Vietnam-era images of birthday-generated draft lotteries and draft evaders fleeing to Canada.

Mr. Flahavan, an associate director of the Selective Service who has worked there for nearly two decades, has seen fears of a draft enflamed before — most notably at the start of the Persian Gulf war in 1991 and the start of the Iraq war in 2003, as anxious parents would call to ask what effect their son's heart murmur would have on his draft status. He said he understood the anxiety caused by this week's latest round of reports, even if he found the whole thing somewhat irksome.

"People think, 'Aha, they're having an exercise, dusting off the plans, a draft must be right around the corner,' " he said.

The reality, said Mr. Flahavan, who spent most of Friday tamping down the fears, is that "this is much ado about nothing."

"None of that is accurate," he said.

White House officials did their part to dampen the speculation as well.

"The president's position has not changed," said Trey Bohn, a spokesman for the White House. "He supports an all-volunteer military, and the administration is not considering reinstating the draft."

Although senior military officers agree that the armed forces are stretched, they also agree that a return to the draft is not the best way to fill the ranks. Draftees, they say, are not as motivated as volunteers, and tend to leave as soon as possible, after spending much of their time in costly training. Re-enlistment rates are much higher among volunteers.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, has championed the idea of bringing back the draft, calling attention to what he sees as social and economic inequities in the volunteer military. The House rejected his bill in 2004, by 402 votes to 2. Mr. Rangel has said he will try again, but other Democratic leaders have been cool to the idea.

The exercise planned for 2009 would run computerized models to assign random lottery picks by birthday and simulate the processes for notifying those selected and for lodging conscientious objector claims.

William A. Chatfield, director of the Selective Service, said Friday that "we try to send out a signal of strength that we're prepared." The Selective Service, he said, needs to be ready "if something totally unforeseen should come upon us."

But for now, the chances of that happening are "very, very, very low," Mr. Chatfield said. "There's nothing even being discussed in a remote fashion, but you have people trying to create fear when there's nothing there."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Siemens Chief Bullish In Spite Of Bribery Scandal (FT)

By Richard Milne

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

Klaus Kleinfeld, chief executive of Siemens, says he sympathises with the Queen Elizabeth II's complaint at Christmas in 1992 of having suffered an annus horribilis.

Fighting to save his reputation - and that of Europe's largest engineering group - amid a €420m ($553m) bribery scandal, Mr Kleinfeld has already had to undergo the indignity of giving up a 30 per cent pay rise and becoming perhaps the most unpopular manager in Germany after a former division became insolvent.

A €20bn joint venture in telecommunications equipment with Nokia has been postponed for up to three months. There has also been talk of bans on Siemens conducting business in certain countries affected by the bribery scandal.

But in an interview over lunch at the German group's Munich headquarters Mr Kleinfeld strikes a bullish note, annus horribilis or not.

"We have managed to add €12bn to our top line - that is the size of a medium-sized Dax [the German blue-chip index] company."

The chief executive shows boyish enthusiasm as he discusses rises in profitability and the advantages of being a conglomerate.

Mr Kleinfeld is adamant that the Nokia deal will go ahead - almost certainly without financial penalties for Siemens.

But there is little doubt that he is taxed by the bribery scandal and the bashing Siemens' reputation has received as a result.

Mr Kleinfeld says he is determined not only that the truth comes out about what happened but that "five years down the road I want people to say that Siemens [sets] an example for a transparent company".

Many outside experts, lawyers of suspects in the scandal and even some Siemens managers argue that the group's culture has at least tolerated bribery, if not encouraged it.

DOJ_NMG_0108876

Mr Kleinfeld feels that the hiring of an external law firm, Debevoise & Plimpton; outside auditors, Deloitte; and an anti-corruption expert, Watergate investigator Michael Hershman, show how serious the company is about addressing itsproblems.

Mr Kleinfeld was briefly responsible in 2004 for the telecoms division where the slush funds for the alleged bribery originated. The chief executive says he was so busy working on the restructuring of the division that he barely had any time for anything else. Shortly after the restructuring ended, he was named chief executive of the whole group.

But the suspect payments continued. Mr Kleinfeld says he learned about one suspect account in Switzerland at the end of January as part of Siemens' own investigations. When his offices were raided in mid-November he presumed it was an extension of that probe.

He says that, prior to prosecutors' investigations, he did not know of the alleged connection and scale of the various bribery schemes. Prosecutors say Mr Kleinfeld and Siemens are witnesses and not suspects in their investigation.

The chief executive talked to the US Securities and Exchange Commission and Department of Justice after the raids and in four subsequent conversations has sought approval for each of Siemens' clean-up efforts.

He says the alleged bribery was not a normal business practice, as lawyers for the suspects have argued, but a criminal enterprise. "You need three signatures to interfere with the SAP [payment bookings] system - and it is possible if, as it looks like here, they all work together."

Mr Kleinfeld underlines that with an average of 9m financial payments a day, oversight of all of them is difficult.

The idea that to wincontracts in some countries, bribes are necessary is swiftly rebuffed. "Particularly when we have transactions in these countries we were clear that the business management had to be more careful [with regard] to the[se] topics [bribery]," he says.

Mr Kleinfeld also defends Heinrich von Pierer, his predecessor as chief executive and the company's current chairman, from critics who say he should accept responsibility for the scandal and resign.

In a comment that underlines his unapologetically capitalist nature, which has often rubbed up the German public the wrong way, Mr Kleinfeld says: "This is not a political organisation. We have to run a company here in the best way possible and not be deflected."

Siemens CEO Hopes New Audit Cuts Scope Of Suspected Fraud (WSJ)

By Mike Esterl

The Wall Street Journal, December 22, 2006

MUNICH, Germany -- Siemens AG Chief Executive Klaus Kleinfeld said he is hopeful the financial scope of alleged fraud at the German conglomerate will shrink from the €420 million ($553 million) in transactions the company has identified as suspicious.

Mr. Kleinfeld defended top management's role in the money-laundering and bribery investigation, saying that Europe's largest engineering company by sales has tightened compliance procedures in recent years.

But he also acknowledged that the investigation, which has forced the delay of a €16 billion merger of the telecommunications equipment divisions of Siemens and Finland's Nokia Corp., has exposed shortcomings in corporate governance at the German company.

"I don't think anybody can claim they were not aware of the behavior that was expected from the top," Mr. Kleinfeld said in an interview at the company's headquarters, adding that he was "shocked" and "disappointed" by signs of wrongdoing.

Mr. Kleinfeld said the probe indicates Siemens isn't "best in class" when it comes to corporate governance. "With the knowledge I have today, I would fully back that view," said Mr. Kleinfeld, who joined the company in 1987 and became chief executive in January 2005.

Siemens said last week it had found €420 million in suspicious transactions dating back seven years -- twice the amount that German prosecutors had flagged last month after more than 200 police raided company offices. Prosecutors have arrested several current and former employees, including senior managers.

On Friday, six suspects taken into custody in the corruption investigation were released after questioning, prosecutors said. The suspects, including the ex-head of its telecommunications equipment unit, were detained in the November raids.

Investigators suspect that company officials funneled funds into secret bank accounts and bogus consulting contracts to pay bribes to potential customers abroad. Siemens itself hasn't been charged with any wrongdoing.

Among those jailed so far is Thomas Ganswindt, a former management-board member who left Siemens at the end of September. Mr. Ganswindt was released from custody Thursday after denying any wrongdoing, his lawyer said.

The corruption allegations are the strongest yet to hit Siemens, which is active in nearly 200 countries and has been enmeshed in other bribery scandals in the past. They also come at a delicate time for Mr. Kleinfeld, who is pushing hard to restructure unprofitable businesses.

DOJ_NMG_0108877

Mr. Kleinfeld reiterated that Siemens believes the alleged wrongdoing was confined to its struggling telecommunications equipment unit and to a group of individuals who circumvented financial controls on their own initiative. He said Siemens is being "very conservative" in reaching the €420 million total for suspect transactions and that he is hopeful a follow-up audit will find some of those transactions to have been legitimate.

The 49-year-old executive said the conglomerate, whose range products include medical scanners and power turbines, has implemented stronger controls in recent years so that financial transactions require multiple signatures. The approval process for consulting contracts also was toughened last year, he added.

Siemens announced last week it had hired the law firm Debevoise & Plimpton LLP to make an independent inquiry into the company's financial controls. It also hired Michael Hershman, a co-founder of Transparency International, the nongovernmental corruption watchdog, as a private consultant.

Mr. Kleinfeld said the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission and U.S. Department of Justice are "very happy" with last week's measures by Siemens, whose shares trade in Frankfurt and New York. In a regulatory filing last week, the company warned that the SEC and Justice Department could launch investigations of their own. SEC and Justice Department officials declined to comment.

Citing the criminal probe, Siemens and Nokia last week said they would delay the planned merger of their carrier networks businesses.

U.S. Oil-gas Unit Is Subject Of Two Criminal Investigations (MRT)

Midland (TX) Reporter-Telegram, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Justice Department has begun two criminal investigations into the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service, which is already the focus of several inquiries into its collection of royalties for oil and gas produced on federal property.

The new investigations are still in the early stages, said congressional officials who were briefed earlier this week by Earl E. Devaney, the Interior Department's chief independent investigator.

The investigations are an unexpected development in what has already become a broad examination of the Interior Department's oversight of companies that pump more than $60 billion worth of oil and gas each year from publicly owned land and coastal waters.

One of the Justice inquiries involves Interior officials in Denver who manage the government's fast-growing program to collect "royalties in kind," which are royalties in the form of oil and gas rather than in financial payments, people briefed on the investigation said.

That investigation is being run by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section, which examines suspected criminal violations by federal employees. The focus of the second investigation is unclear, but it is being conducted by the inspector general with help from the FBI.

Devaney, the department's inspector general, is already conducting two other investigations into suspected mismanagement of the minerals agency. And just last week, he issued a scathing criticism of the agency's system for auditing oil and gas royalty payments.Devaney is also finishing up an investigation into how the Interior Department signed 1,100 oil and gas leases in the late 1990s that inadvertently permitted companies to avoid up to $10 billion in royalties over the next five years. The errors were made during the Clinton administration, but people briefed on Devaney's investigation said he had concluded that high-ranking agency officials either knew or should have known about the problem at least two years ago.

Rep. Ed Markey, D-Mass., said Thursday in a statement that Devaney had briefed his staff.

"The two criminal referrals by the Department of Interior's inspector general to the FBI and Justice Department are proof positive that the conflicts of interest between Bush administration regulators and those they regulate in the oil and gas industry are costing the American taxpayers billions in royalty revenues," Markey said.

Word of the criminal investigations surfaced just as the Interior Department announced Thursday that five big oil producers had voluntarily renegotiated leases and agreed to not exploit a loophole that could save them hundreds of millions of dollars each.

The leases gave companies an incentive to drill in deep waters in the Gulf of Mexico by letting them skip royalties on millions of barrels of oil and gas. But the leases omitted a standard escape clause that would have required the companies to pay in full if oil prices rose above about $34 a barrel. Interior officials have said the mistake, if left unchanged, could cost the government as much as $10 billion.

The Interior Department said Thursday that it had concluded new deals with BP, ConocoPhillips, Marathon Oil, Royal Dutch Shell and Walter Oil and Gas. Those companies hold about 17 percent of the flawed leases, according to Interior data.

DOJ_NMG_0108878

But about 50 other companies have not yet agreed to change their leases. Among them is Chevron, one of the biggest potential beneficiaries of the error. Chevron and several partners could save more than $1 billion in royalties in years to come if the lease language is not changed.

Don Campbell, a spokesman for Chevron, said company executives had met several times with government officials to resolve the matter. Campbell said his company "put a reasonable offer forward" and would "look forward to further discussions."

The new agreements did little to mollify the Interior Department's Republican and Democratic critics in Congress.

The incoming Democratic chairman and the retiring Republican chairman of the House Government Reform Committee sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, suggesting that the leases might never have been valid and that the government might be able to force the companies to pay up.

Officials have provided few details about the new criminal investigations, except to say they are "related" to previous inquiries of the royalty-management program.

Started about six years ago, the royalty-in-kind program has become a multibillion dollar trading program run from Denver. Since President Bush took office, Interior officials and many of the industry's biggest producers have argued that the government should collect as much of its royalties as possible through "in kind" payments because, they say, the accounting is much simpler.

In 2005, the Interior Department collected about $3 billion worth of royalties in oil and gas -- about a third of the total. The government funnels much of the oil it receives to the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, but it sells virtually all its natural gas and sends the cash to the Treasury.

Congressional officials briefed this week by Devaney said he had cautioned that both of the criminal investigations would last several more months. Devaney said it was possible the investigations would not lead to criminal charges, though he suggested that they should lead at least to disciplinary actions.

Lam's Link To Pension Witness Challenged (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton

The San Diego Union-Tribune, December 23, 2006

U.S. Attorney Carol Lam is, or was, a longtime client of financial adviser and pension whistle-blower Diann Shipione – a relationship that some lawyers said raises the specter of conflict of interest.

Shipione, a vice president at UBS Financial, an investment banking and securities firm, is likely to be a key witness in the federal case brought by Lam's office against five former San Diego pension officials.

Defense attorneys said Lam may have been improperly influenced by Shipione and that the entire case is tainted as a result. They said they intend to investigate and possibly seek dismissal of the case, but some legal experts said that without proof of egregious misconduct, such a severe remedy is unlikely.

Lam reported the relationship to Justice Department superiors as soon as it became apparent that Shipione could become a witness in the case. The department's ethics advisers concluded there was no issue.

“The Department of Justice has determined that there are no ethical or conflict issues that require Ms. Lam to be recused from the pension case,” said Debra Hartman, Lam's spokeswoman, in an e-mail statement. Citing “pending litigation,” Lam declined to answer questions about the nature and length of the relationship or whether it continues.

Shipione gained attention for her repeated warnings of abuses in the city retirement system when she was a board member. Although she was privately dismissed by her colleagues and system bureaucrats as a gadfly, her suspicions proved correct.

The city now faces a pension deficit of at least $1.43 billion; last month the Securities and Exchange Commission found that the city defrauded investors in 2002 and 2003 by not disclosing a massive pension deficit; and two criminal prosecutions of former pension officials are under way.

Under federal grand jury indictment are Shipione's former pension board colleagues, then-trustees Ronald Saathoff, Cathy Lexin and Teresa Webster, administrator Lawrence Grissom and pension system lawyer Loraine Chapin. They are charged with fraud and conspiracy in connection with actions that contributed to the deficit.

Shipione, who also declined an interview request but issued an e-mail statement, said, “As a matter of industry policy and my professional policy, I do not discuss any professional or client relationship matters.”

'Ax to grind' Defense lawyers said they heard rumors that Shipione handled Lam's trust funds and that they sent letters to prosecutors asking for an explanation, to no avail.

“We're going to make a motion about that, that there's been a conflict of interest and some kind of prosecutorial misconduct,” said Victor Sherman, lawyer for Saathoff. “We've written a number of letters to prosecutors, and all they do is stonewall; they send letters back that say, 'What difference does it make,' things like that.

DOJ_NMG_0108879

"We think it's going to result in a dismissal because it's the result of improper influence. The U.S. attorney has been influenced by someone that has an ax to grind."

City Attorney Michael Aguirre said the move would be a smear tactic by the defense.

"If the Justice Department has made that judgment, then it becomes clear that this is just an effort to try and distract the focus from what it should be on – the wrongdoing of the defendants," Aguirre said.

"This is what people do when they are in a lot of trouble and they're desperate. If you don't have the law on your side, you attack the facts, and if you don't have the facts on your side, you attack the law, and if you don't have either on your side, you attack the prosecutor."

A gray area Legal experts said matters of recusal are a gray area.

"Part of my reaction is, what bad luck for Carol Lam," said University of San Diego law professor Shaun Martin. "I can only assume (the relationship) predated (the pension case). Assuming that it did, that's terrible luck, and it raises a slew of recusal issues that I'm quite sure they wish never existed and which probably explain their profound reluctance to talk about it with anyone.

"Financial planners usually have a very intimate relationship with their clients, and vice versa, so anytime someone with whom you have an intimate relationship is a witness, there's a real possibility of a conflict of interest. This is someone who knows all about the money you make and who presumably you've told quite a bit of private information to."

If the defense does file a motion, a judge could deny it or order that Lam or her entire office be recused from the case and that it be switched to a U.S. attorney in another district or to a special prosecutor. Such a move would add months or years to the litigation process and could kill the case, experts said.

Or, the judge could decide that the case should be dismissed, but that's about as likely as the state of California falling into the ocean, Martin said.

Extent of relationship "Based upon what we know now, which is just that they had a relationship, there's no way the case will be dismissed or the entire office will be recused," Martin said. "If something weird happened, if (Lam) was talking with (Shipione) about the case, then an extraordinary remedy would at least be in the ballpark.

"Assuming the only relationship is a pre-existing business relationship, the best that you could hope for is that Carol Lam couldn't be personally involved in the prosecution."

The outcome depends on the extent of the relationship, and the defense is likely to move for a hearing to discover whether Shipione played any role in determining whether to file charges and against whom, said criminal defense attorney Geoffrey C. Morrison, who is not involved in the case. The defense probably would seek to question Lam.

Disclosing the matter to the Justice Department was not enough, some experts said.

"We don't know at this point whether it was disclosed to the court or to the defense, but if not, it was a horrible mistake," Morrison said.

"When you don't disclose, you're denying them the opportunity to raise the issue, and if you're wrong about the impact of the conflict, you risk sanctions that are far more Draconian than had the conflict been disclosed at the outset."

Cfius Probe Blamed For Sale Of Voting-machine Company (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, December 23, 2006

A company with ties to Venezuela yesterday blamed Washington's increasing scrutiny of foreign acquisitions of US assets for its decision to sell a California-based voting-machine company it acquired last year.

The move by Smartmatic comes months after the Committee on Foreign Investment in the US (Cfius) opened an investigation into the national security implications of the company's ownership of Sequoia, a supplier of voting machines used in US elections.

The inter-agency committee took the unusual step of investigating the deal months after it was completed, when a New York congresswoman, Carolyn Maloney, wrote to the then Treasury secretary, John Snow, with questions about the deal and whether the company had ties to the government of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez.

The company's announcement underscores how influential Congress can be in forcing executive branch agencies, which have primary oversight over such deals, to investigate transactions on national security grounds.

The Smartmatic chief executive, Antonio Mugica, yesterday denied that any foreign government had ever held an ownership stake in the group, saying the company was "owned primarily by four young entrepreneurs and their families".

"Sequoia and Smartmatic are two great companies with very bright futures and we do not want the companies' ownership to be a distraction," Mr Mugica, a dual Spanish/Venezuelan citizen, said.

DOJ_NMG_0108880

The agencies that comprise Cfius, including the Treasury, Justice Department and Department of Homeland Security, have markedly increased their scrutiny of foreign acquisitions this year, after the inter-agency panel was criticised by lawmakers for failing to block the takeover of five US port terminals by a Dubai-owned company.

Non-US companies that acquire sensitive US assets, particularly in the fields of defence and technology, have traditionally applied voluntarily for Cfius review. Smartmatic did not apply for one until the government began to take an interest in the deal after it was completed.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Charges Of Rape Against 3 At Duke Are Dropped (NYT)

By David Barstow And Duff Wilson

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

DURHAM, N.C., Dec. 22 — The Durham district attorney dropped rape charges against three former Duke lacrosse players on Friday, but he said he would continue to pursue kidnapping and sexual offense charges that carry equally stiff sentences.

The district attorney, Michael B. Nifong, who has faced relentless and rising criticism for his handling of the case, said he dismissed the rape charges because the accuser had begun to waver on crucial details.

The woman, who said she was attacked while performing as a stripper at a lacrosse team party last March, has repeatedly asserted that she endured violent penile penetration. She said this to the first doctor who saw her, to the sexual-assault nurse, to the sexual-assault doctor, to detectives and in her own handwritten statement to the police, records show. She also consistently said she was forced onto her hands and knees and raped from behind.

Yet when questioned again on Thursday afternoon by Mr. Nifong's investigator, the woman said for the first time that she could no longer be sure what had penetrated her.

Mr. Nifong said her uncertainty required him to act.

"Since there is no scientific or other evidence independent of the victim's testimony that would corroborate specifically penetration by a penis, the state is unable to meet its burden of proof with respect to this offense," he said in court papers.

But his decision, coming in a case that has already transfixed and divided this state and much of the nation, also intensified questions about Mr. Nifong himself. Since the first frenzied weeks of this case, Mr. Nifong's judgment has repeatedly come under fire. Defense lawyers, defendants' families and friends, bloggers and many experts have attacked him for making early outspoken comments about the case, setting up a lineup that violated police procedures, failing to interview the woman himself and sitting on evidence favorable to the defendants. Above all, they say, he ignored his basic obligation to seek the truth.

One defense lawyer, Wade M. Smith, said that after all the revelations, Mr. Nifong ought to "do the honorable thing" and drop the remaining charges. "We have this bare assertion and nothing else, and we've come three-quarters of a year down the road with the suffering of these people," Mr. Smith said.

Mr. Nifong declined interview requests Friday, but said in an e-mail message that his decision to dismiss the rape charges showed he was "willing to go in whatever direction the evidence takes me." And in a three-hour interview on Thursday, Mr. Nifong said he would not hesitate to drop all the charges if the accuser expressed doubt about the identity of the men she has accused when she sees all three defendants at a pretrial hearing set for February.

"If she came in and said she could not identify her assailants, then we don't have a case," Mr. Nifong said. On the other hand, he continued, "If she says, yes, it's them, or one or two of them, I have an obligation to put that to a jury."

The woman, a 28-year-old single mother who worked for an escort service, danced at an adult club and attended North Carolina Central University in Durham, told the police she was gang-raped by the three lacrosse players on March 13 after she and another dancer performed at the team party. The accuser said that her assailants did not wear condoms and that at least one ejaculated.

But despite extensive DNA testing, including tests sensitive enough to detect DNA from a single cell, Mr. Nifong has not linked any of the defendants — or any other members of the lacrosse team — to DNA on the rape kit swabs or the accuser's clothing.

Although the woman identified three lacrosse players as her rapists from an array of photographs, Mr. Nifong said she would get a better look at them at the pretrial hearing in February. "You can't always tell from a photograph," he said, adding, "The only real time that you're able to say if you have a misidentification is to put the person in the courtroom with the other people."

DOJ_NMG_0108881

Mr. Nifong said he intends to ask the woman about her level of certitude after February's hearing. "It's an opportunity to say, 'Yes, I'm 100 percent certain these are the people who did it,' " he said. "It's also an opportunity to express doubt." Given the absence of physical evidence, he said, any doubts from the woman could end the prosecution for one or more of the defendants.

As it happened, as Mr. Nifong made those remarks on Thursday afternoon, the woman was expressing new doubts to his investigator, doubts that forced him to drop the rape charges late Friday morning.

Mr. Nifong's reversal escalated the mounting criticism of his conduct. Cracks in his case began to appear last spring when one suspect, Reade W. Seligmann, produced a cellphone log and other records showing that he left the party early. That alibi evidence raised questions about the timeline of the reported assault.

On Friday, defense lawyers responded with a barrage of new accusations of bad faith. In interviews and at a news conference, they accused Mr. Nifong and the woman of tailoring her account to minimize the impact of recently disclosed DNA tests that they say confirm their clients' innocence.

Those tests, conducted on rape kit swabs and underwear collected from the woman hours after the party, found traces of sperm and other DNA material from several men, none of them the defendants or their teammates. The results were not disclosed to the defense team until late October, almost seven months after they were provided to prosecutors.

"Now, since the revelation of exculpatory DNA tests, all of a sudden, there's no penile penetration," Joseph B. Cheshire, a lawyer for one of the players, said in an interview.

On Thursday, Mr. Nifong acknowledged knowing about those test results before any players were indicted last spring. He also acknowledged that the results were relevant and "potentially exculpatory," and he said he should have given the results to the defense before May 18, the day he signed a filing that said "the state is not aware of any additional material or information which may be exculpatory in nature."

But Mr. Nifong denied the defense team's contention that he had deliberately tried to hide the results or delay their release. Mr. Nifong, who is personally overseeing this case, said that given the volume of evidence he had not realized that he had failed to turn over those specific DNA test results. "That wasn't something I was concentrating on," he said.

For Mr. Nifong, Friday's announcement capped a week in which he seemed to be losing support and gaining critics from many quarters.

On Tuesday, the normally supportive editorial page of Durham's main newspaper, The Herald-Sun, described some of Mr. Nifong's actions as "flawed" and "inexplicable." On Thursday, Irving Joyner, a law professor monitoring the case for the state N.A.A.C.P., said for the first time that Mr. Nifong should consider recusing himself. The N.A.A.C.P. has been watching the case because the accuser is black and the defendants are white.

Woody Vann, a Durham defense lawyer who said he respects Mr. Nifong as a prosecutor, said in an interview that he did not know of a single lawyer in town who thought Mr. Nifong had a winnable case.

Robert C. Trenkle, another Durham defense lawyer, said that while Friday's retreat "makes perfect tactical sense," criticism was growing nonetheless. "I can't exactly figure out what Mike Nifong's doing other than committing career suicide and possibly inviting ethics charges," Mr. Trenkle said.

Led by defense lawyers, a team that includes some of the most prominent and experienced lawyers in the state, a growing chorus of critics is calling for Mr. Nifong to be removed from the case, and even investigated for prosecutorial misconduct.

Mr. Cheshire, the defense lawyer, asserted that Friday's action fit a broader pattern: "Mr. Nifong and his accuser are continually changing their stories to fit new evidence." The woman, for example, first said the players did not wear condoms, but after initial laboratory tests did not show the presence of semen, Mr. Nifong said it was possible that her assailants did wear condoms.

"I think he's got a conflict of interest between defending himself and prosecuting the case," Mr. Cheshire said.

Mr. Nifong rejected the notion of stepping aside. "We don't traditionally let the defense decide who gets to prosecute their case," he said. He also accused defense lawyers of using the new DNA test results as part of a campaign of "character assassination" against the accuser.

"What is the best way to keep the case from coming to trial?" he asked. "Probably the best way is to attack the victim. If you can keep the victim from coming to court, if you make the victim say, 'Gee, this isn't worth it.' "

The remaining kidnapping charge refers to the woman's accusation that the three players held her captive while they assaulted her in a bathroom. Under North Carolina law, the other remaining charge, sexual offense, is any unwanted oral or anal sexual act or "penetration, however slight, by any object." Rape refers only to unwanted vaginal intercourse.

Mr. Nifong said the woman was resolved to go forward. "You can't make everybody back away from a fight," he said.

In Thursday's interview, Mr. Nifong addressed many of the questions that have been raised about his handling of this case, including his dealings with the news media, his controversial decision to show the accuser only photographs of members of the lacrosse team and his decision not to question the accuser himself about the events of March 13.

DOJ_NMG_0108882

Mr. Nifong said he had not yet talked to the woman about the case because he preferred to rely on investigator interviews and to assess her credibility through talking with her about other things.

He also expressed remorse for some of the comments he made to reporters in the first weeks after the party. He said, for example, that he was wrong to refer to Duke lacrosse players as "a bunch of hooligans."

"I regret having used that word," he said.

Mr. Nifong, a 28-year career prosecutor, said he had not been contacted by the Justice Department, which has been asked to intervene by a North Carolina congressman. He declined to say, though, whether any state authorities, like the State Bar Association, had contacted him.

Almost lost in the uproar of the past week, a 42-page defense motion filed on Dec. 14 raised new questions about the woman's reliability in identifying the men who stand accused of kidnapping and sexual offenses.

The police showed her three sets of photographs during the first three weeks of the case, one with 24 lacrosse players, one with 12, and, after she failed to identify any suspects, one with all 46 white players.

She identified only one person with 100 percent certainty in two photo arrays as having been present at the team party. But that person, Dan Ross, was not there. He was 24 miles away in a dorm room in Raleigh.

The woman also identified the wrong player as having held up a broomstick while making a sexually crude remark to the two dancers.

As previously reported, she did not identify two of the defendants — Mr. Seligmann and David F. Evans — as attackers when she saw their pictures in the first photo arrays. She said it was harder than she thought because "the people in the photos looked alike," police investigators wrote. Yet she later identified Mr. Seligmann with 100 percent certainty and Mr. Evans with 90 percent certainty, saying he "looks just like him without the mustache." Mr. Evans has never had a mustache.

The final identification procedure contained photographs the police had taken of all 46 white lacrosse players. By not including any filler photographs of people who could not possibly be involved, the procedure appeared to violate Durham police, state and national standards for photo lineups and was called by the defense "a multiple-choice test in which there were no wrong answers."

Mr. Nifong said this technique was not a photo lineup as that term is applied to police guidelines. "What is a lineup?" he asked. "What if I have no idea who did the assault?"

Defense lawyers, though, said the identification procedures were so flawed and suggestive that the accuser should be barred from making an in-court identification at trial. Their motion attacking the lineups will be heard starting Feb. 5.

Mr. Cheshire, the lawyer for Mr. Evans, said he relished the opportunity to cross-examine the woman he calls "the false accuser." Mr. Nifong said it would be the most important pretrial hearing in the case — in part because of the ruling, in part because it will be the first time "my victim" is back in a room with members of the Duke lacrosse team.

"I have told the defense attorneys that if at any time the victim in this case tells me that she thinks that one of these people who have been identified was not her assailant, as soon as she tells me that, then that case will go away," he said. "I've said I'm not interested in prosecuting somebody that's innocent. But until she tells me that, until she tells me these are not the right guys, we're prosecuting this case."

Bush Pardons Short List (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

President Bush gave a pre-Christmas gift to 17 minor criminals, but even after adding these pardons and one sentence commutation to his record he remains one of the least-forgiving of presidents.

Six of the federal offenses involved in the 16 pardons and one commutation issued Thursday were drug crimes, while others included bank fraud, mail fraud, the acceptance of a kickback, a false statement on a loan application and conspiracy to defraud the government over taxes.

Seven of the 17 weren't even sent to prison or jail, getting probation, small fines or other penalties instead. The longest sentence was nine years, for aiding cocaine distribution, followed by a six-year term for conspiracy to possess marijuana.

With this batch, Mr. Bush has issued 113 pardons and commuted three sentences in his nearly six years in the White House, according to spokesman Tony Fratto.

"Requests for executive clemency receive intense individualized consideration based upon an established set of objective criteria," Mr. Fratto said.

He said that most weight is given to the seriousness of the crime, how long ago it was committed, acceptance of responsibility and remorse, an applicant's conduct and contribution to society, and recommendations from the sentencing judge, probation officer and prosecutor.

DOJ_NMG_0108883

Since World War II, the largest number of pardons and commutations -- 2,031 -- came from President Truman, who served 82 days short of eight years. Other recent presidents issued hundreds each, though Mr. Bush's father, George Bush, handed out only 77 pardons and commutations in four years in office.

A pardon amounts to federal forgiveness for one's crime, while a commutation merely cuts short an existing prison term.

On the pardons list were:

·Charles James Allen of Winchester, Va. -- conspiracy to defraud the United States. A former federal employee, Mr. Allen was convicted in 1979 for approving payments to James Hilles Associates Inc., a Virginia firm, for office supplies that were never delivered. In return, Mr. Allen received car parts, a radio, a freezer and other gifts from the firm. He was sentenced to a year of custody to be served by 30 days in jail, 90 days in a work-release program, and the remaining period on parole.

·William Sidney Baldwin Sr. of Green Pond, S.C. -- conspiracy to possess marijuana. Sentenced Oct. 27, 1981, to six years' imprisonment.

·Dale C. Critz Jr., Savannah, Ga. -- making a false statement. Sentenced July 13, 1989, to three years' probation.

·Mark Alan Eberwine of San Antonio -- conspiracy to defraud the United States by impeding, impairing, and obstructing the assessment of taxes by the Internal Revenue Service and making false declarations to the grand jury. Sentenced Feb. 1, 1985, as amended April 23, 1986, to two years imprisonment.

CIVIL LAW:

Appeals Court Allows FEMA To Hold Off On Funding (WP/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

A federal appeals court told the Bush administration yesterday that it does not need to immediately restart a housing program for thousands of Hurricane Katrina victims.

The ruling by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit puts a restart on hold at least until March, when the court will hear arguments in the case.

The court suspended an order by U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon, who said last month that the Federal Emergency Management Agency violated the Constitution when it eliminated short-term housing assistance. Leon said the agency did not explain its reasoning and provided victims only confusing computer-generated codes to explain its decisions.

Under Leon's order, FEMA told officials in Texas early this week to expect federal money for housing about 4,200 evacuees.

Yesterday's ruling means FEMA can advise Texas that plans have changed.

"That's FEMA's Christmas present to the people of Texas and the United States," said Kevin Whelan, a spokesman for the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, which brought the lawsuit. "They managed to appeal long enough to be able to deny housing funding."

FEMA spokesman Aaron Walker said lawyers were reviewing the late-afternoon ruling and did not immediately know how the agency would respond.

The ruling by Judges David S. Tatel, Karen Lecraft Henderson and A. Raymond Randolph does not suspend Leon's order requiring FEMA to explain why evacuees were no longer eligible for funding. The letters that went out this summer contained vague and often contradictory computer codes rather than explanations, and Leon ordered the agency to put it in plain English.

FEMA said it was working on those new letters this week, and Whelan said about 4,000 evacuees have received letters.

FEMA Not Required To Restore Aid To Evacuees, Court Rules (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

The Federal Emergency Management Agency does not have to reinstate immediately rental assistance to evacuees from Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, a federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday, reversing a decision that a lower court judge had said he hoped would “get these people a roof over their heads before Christmas.”

But FEMA still has to comply with part of the earlier order by the judge, Richard J. Leon of Federal District Court for the District of Columbia, by providing families with clear explanations why they were denied assistance.

Responding to the ruling by a three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, FEMA officials said they would immediately suspend plans to provide the money, leading to criticism from evacuees and their advocates.

DOJ_NMG_0108884

"It's another setback," Wanda Jones, an evacuee in Houston, said in a statement issued by Acorn, the housing advocacy group that filed the lawsuit. "It's like a terrible roller coaster ride. Every time we go up, when we come down we lose more people."

Last spring, FEMA began notifying thousands of families who were given emergency shelter after the storms that they did not qualify for long-term help in the form of rent and utility payments, shocking many families who had been given housing vouchers good for a year.

Those families were allowed to appeal the agency's decision, but many said they received confusing, contradictory or incomplete instructions as they tried to do so.

In a preliminary injunction, issued on Nov. 29, Judge Leon said the agency's appeals process was so confusing that it denied evacuees their constitutional right to due process, and he ordered FEMA to immediately restore benefits, make retroactive payments and improve the appeals process. The appeals court stayed the first two parts of the injunction.

Aaron Walker, FEMA's chief spokesman, said the agency had already complied with the other part of the order. The agency "reached out to every household affected by the district court's order to more clearly identify their reason for ineligibility, outline the required remedies and allow them an additional 60 days to file an appeal with FEMA," he said.

The new order is temporary because the case has not yet gone to trial.

New Ruling Puts Freeze On FEMA Payments (HC)

By Patty Reinert, Susan Carroll

Houston Chronicle, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Just as federal housing money was to start flowing again to thousands of Texas-based hurricane evacuees, a federal appeals court put everything on hold Friday.

The ruling means that about 4,200 families in Houston, San Antonio and Austin who were left homeless by hurricanes Katrina and Rita will have to wait until at least February to find out whether the federal government is required to restore their rental assistance payments.

By then, the temporary housing program will have expired — unless Congress or President Bush extend it.

Lakiesha Stredic, 25, took the news hard. She and her three children, ages 6, 4, and 3, are sleeping on the floor at a friend's house. They were evicted from their apartment on Houston's southwest side after she lost her job. For Christmas, Stredic picked up presents from a local charity — two toys for each child.

"My goodness," she said, sighing. "I'm in a really bad hole right now. It's stressing me out. I really need a place that I can call home for me and my kids."

She said she was counting on the Federal Emergency Management Agency to come through with rental assistance. FEMA helped her get an apartment in Houston after the hurricane in the summer of 2005. She said she didn't realize the subsidy had run out until the apartment complex contacted her with a bill for $1,400, she said. By then it was too late. She paid $100 one week, then $200 the next, she said. But the electric company turned off the lights. And she wasn't making much progress paying down the rent anyway, she said.

"It was really unexpected when (the rental subsidy) stopped out of the blue," she said. "I don't know what to do now."

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, or ACORN, sued FEMA in August for failing to adequately explain why the housing benefits were ending. Last month, U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon ruled that FEMA unconstitutionally halted the payments and ordered them to reinstate them immediately.

Judge's order stymiedLeon has spent the past three weeks pushing FEMA to immediately restore the housing assistance.

In addition to the rental subsidies, estimated at $750 per family per month, Leon was pushing FEMA to make back payments for September, October and November. He also ordered the agency to explain to the evacuees why the assistance was denied in the first place and what they are required to do to reinstate it.

Under pressure from the court, FEMA had notified officials in Houston and elsewhere that it would restart the housing program Friday. FEMA appealed, and on Friday, three judges on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit partially suspended Leon's order.

The court said until it considers the full case early next year, FEMA does not need to restart the housing program or make any retroactive payments. But the agency is still required to immediately inform the evacuees of the reasons they were denied assistance and allow them to challenge the decisions.

FEMA said late Friday that it had notified Texas that it would rescind its plans for restoring the housing aid. Robert Johnson, the manager of Houston's Joint Hurricane Housing Task Force, said Friday that he had not seen the decision and referred comment to the mayor's press office, which did not return phone calls.

DOJ_NMG_0108885

FEMA officials also said they had already complied with the part of Leon's order that the higher court upheld — to send letters to about 4,000 evacuees more clearly explaining what they can do to appeal FEMA's decisions. The agency will give them an additional 60 days to file and appeal if they believe the decision was "in error," FEMA officials said.

"It's like a terrible roller-coaster ride," said Wanda Jones of Houston, a Katrina survivor and member of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now which sued the government. "Every time we go up, when we come down we lose more people. But we're going to keep on riding and keep on fighting in court for our rights."

'Scrooges'For Katrina refugee Gregory Bernard, 43, the latest court decision means losing his rent subsidy in January and surviving on his $603 a month disability check. Bernard said he has congestive heart failure, and is too sick to work.

He left his apartment in central New Orleans after the hurricanes, he said, and has been trying to figure out how to get back there.

His rent in New Orleans was $400 before the storm, but now his former landlord wants $600. If he chooses a cheaper apartment, he's looking at a deposit for the apartment and deposits for his utilities.

If he stays, he can make his rent at his sprawling apartment in southwest Houston, but it'll probably mean losing his phone, he said. With $12 worth of food stamps, he's been buying deli meat and loaves of bread, Bernard said. That's what he plans to eat for Christmas dinner.

"Sometimes it's like I'm in the Twilight Zone here," he said. "The people here are nice, but I just really want to go home. I'm making it now, but I'm barely making it. I don't know how I'm going to get by."

U.S. Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Houston, called for the federal government to take a new approach to dealing with the refugee situation, calling the members of the Court of Appeals "scrooges."

"Instead of spending time trying to figure out how to help these families, and the elderly and disabled, we are engaged in a legal battle," she said. " This is the wrong approach to take on the eve of a sacred holiday."

U.S. Gives Grants To 4 Gulf Coast States To Upgrade Disaster Housing (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — FEMA trailers, the cramped, impersonal housing units that have come to define the federal response to major disasters, may be on the way out, thanks to $388 million in federal grants, announced Friday, that will test half a dozen cozier, more permanent models of postdisaster housing.

The program will offer new housing from the Federal Emergency Management Agency to thousands of families, among the 100,000 still living in trailers across the Gulf Coast, by placing them over the coming year in these studier, roomier, better ventilated homes, many of which have front porches, large windows and even small attics.

Mississippi came out on top in the contest for the grants, receiving $280.8 million, compared with $74.5 million for Louisiana, $16.5 million for Texas and $15.7 million for Alabama.

Officials in Louisiana were furious, saying their state, which suffered the greatest losses in Hurricanes Katrina and Rita last year, had been shortchanged.

“FEMA has clearly learned very little from its mistakes, let alone basic math or a sense of fundamental fairness,” Senator Mary L. Landrieu, Democrat of Louisiana, said in a statement.

But officials of the agency said Mississippi’s big share simply reflected the creativity of its plans, as the financing was awarded competitively, based on how quickly the new models could be set up, how comfortable and safe they would be and how much they would cost, among other factors.

The grants come from an appropriation in which Congress directed FEMA to take an alternative approach to the customary trailers. The biggest single grant will finance the construction of units in Mississippi that look like A-roofed cottages, featuring a compact front porch, windows on three sides, more storage space and better ventilation. Like the existing trailers, they will be set up on wheels, so they can be driven into a disaster zone.

Louisiana officials, meanwhile, intend to use their grant to build what they are calling Katrina Cottages — compact single-family homes made of prefabricated panels, with a porch and up to three bedrooms — in heavily hit areas of New Orleans like Jackson Barracks.

The one model planned in Texas is based on a design that is already used by some 90,000 troops in Iraq. A small house made of prefabricated parts that can be moved by flatbed truck, it can be set up in eight hours by six people. It offers more living space than the trailers and is capable of being elevated so that it can be lifted out of the flood plain.

“It is not going to make the front of Architectural Digest,” said Gil H. Jamieson, a deputy director of FEMA, “but it is aesthetically pleasing.”

DOJ_NMG_0108886

In some cases, these homes can be built on regular foundations, making them permanent or at least semipermanent housing, unlike the travel trailers, which are not considered sturdy enough to survive winds that could be produced by a tropical storm.

Federal officials said they could not yet predict how many new homes would be built with the available grant money or how many of the 101,000 families still in FEMA travel trailers or mobile homes across the Gulf Coast would be able to move into these new units.

The government will evaluate each of the six types of new homes to be built, to see whether they should be adopted permanently.

Mr. Jamieson said it was unlikely that FEMA would be able to replace the travel trailers completely. But it hopes that by the next major disaster, it will have cut the numbers significantly.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Pa., N.J. Stand To Lose Clout (PHI)

By Adam Fifield

The Philadelphia Inquirer, December 23, 2006

New U.S. census data could mean the loss of congressional clout for both Pennsylvania and New Jersey and drops the Garden State from among the nation's 10-most-populous states.

Population estimates for July 1, 2006, released yesterday, show sluggish population growth in both states while the Sunbelt continued to surge.

North Carolina is now the nation's 10th-most-populous state, kicking Jersey to 11th.

If the U.S. House of Representatives were reapportioned based on the numbers, Pennsylvania would be among seven states to lose a seat, according to a report by the Election Data Services, a political consulting firm in Washington that specializes in analyzing census data for redistricting.

Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York and Ohio also would shed seats, while Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah would each gain one and Texas would pick up two, according to the study.

New Jersey also stands to lose one of its 13 congressional seats in the next reapportionment if current trends continue, said James W. Hughes, dean of Rutgers University's Edward J. Bloustein School of Planning and Public Policy.

"It's a pretty good chance we'll lose a seat," said Hughes, referring to the congressional reapportionment that will follow the 2010 census.

Election Data Services predicted that New Jersey would hold onto all 13 seats.

The 435 seats in the U.S. House of Representatives will be reapportioned after the 2010 census. Losing a congressional seat could compromise a state's clout and federal funding levels, said Election Data Services president Kimball Brace.

Referring to Pennsylvania's 19 U.S. representatives, he advised the state "to make use of that 19th member as much as you can for the next four years."

According to the census estimates, Pennsylvania ranks as the sixth-most-populous state, with 12.4 million residents. Its population gained 35,273, or 0.3 percent, over last year.

New Jersey, with 8.7 million residents, remains the most densely populated state, but it has been bumped off the top 10 list.

In the last year, the Garden State grew by just 21,410 people - 0.2 percent.

But 72,547 residents left New Jersey for other states. That number is more than three times that of four years ago.

The state grew because 54,058 people came from overseas, and there were 39,190 more births than deaths last year.

Hughes, of the Bloustein School, said he believes the state has probably experienced "the largest out-migration we've ever had."

He blamed expensive housing and high taxes.

Because of the high cost of operating in New Jersey, businesses that want to expand may decide "we're doing it in North Carolina," Hughes said.

State Assemblyman John Burzichelli (D., Gloucester) speculated on why North Carolina might have gotten the edge.

"They have good furniture prices down there," he joked.

Despite the ignominy of being number 11, Hughes said he doubted Jersey residents care.

"If they're stuck in gridlock... they might think it's a good thing population isn't growing any faster," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0108887

Kansas Court Dismisses Abortion Charges (WP/AP)

By Roxana Hegeman

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

WICHITA, Dec. 22 -- Kansas's attorney general, a vocal opponent of abortion, charged a well-known abortion provider Friday with illegally performing late-term abortions, but a Sedgwick County judge threw out the charges only hours later.

Judge Paul W. Clark dismissed the charges against George Tiller at the request of Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston, who said her office had not been consulted by Attorney General Phill Kline.

Kline, who lost his reelection bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, said he would try to get Clark to reinstate the charges.

"We are pursuing a legal remedy to what we believe is a flawed decision by a district court judge," Kline said at a news conference in Topeka.

Kline said that he did consult Foulston about the case Thursday and that she did not object.

The 30 misdemeanor counts Kline filed against Tiller involve 15 abortions from July through November 2003. They were performed on patients 22 years old or younger, including a 10-year-old, according to the criminal complaint unsealed Friday.

Tiller's clinic, known for being one of the few in the country to perform late-term abortions, has been a high-profile target of antiabortion protesters for decades. The clinic was bombed in 1985, and Tiller was shot in both arms by a protester in 1993.

Kline has been investigating whether Tiller and other abortion providers performed illegal late-term abortions in Kansas or failed to report suspected child abuse, as required by law.

Under Kansas law, if a woman wants to obtain an abortion after the 22nd week of her pregnancy, a doctor must first determine whether the fetus could survive outside the womb. If the fetus is viable, the procedure can be used only to preserve the woman's physical or mental health.

The charges involve situations in which Tiller cannot demonstrate that a woman faced permanent damage to a major bodily function, or Tiller's conclusions that some patients' mental health would be harmed if they did not have abortions, Kline said.

Tiller and Planned Parenthood have repeatedly said that they have committed no wrongs and that the patient records Kline obtained contain no evidence of crimes by either the clinics or their doctors.

DOJ Report Paints Nightmarish Picture Of Lubbock State School (DMN/AP)

By By Liz Austin Peterson, Associated Press

The Dallas Morning News, December 23, 2006

Shoddy health care, substantial neglect and harmful treatment techniques have jeopardized the lives of Lubbock State School residents, federal investigators said in a report that criticized nearly every part of the facility.

The U.S. Department of Justice report paints a nightmarish picture of the facility that cares for about 350 people with mental retardation and developmental disabilities.

One man died of an illness that could have been prevented if his doctors and nurses had done something as simple as modifying his diet. Another woman developed excruciating ulcers on her buttocks after lying in urine-soaked diapers. A third resident was grabbed, choked and thrown on the floor when he resisted receiving a shot.

"LSS's provision of health care falls alarmingly short of professional standards of care," said the report, which was issued Dec. 11 but was not posted on the department's Web site until Thursday.

Michael Jones, a spokesman for the state agency that oversees the state school, said he could not comment on the report's contents because "it's still a potential legal matter." But he would say the facility has a new management team that has worked hard to improve training and hire more medical professionals.

Many of the problems stemmed from severe staffing shortages and training issues, the report said.

Advocacy groups have long claimed abuse and neglect is rampant in Texas' state schools, and the report could give them more ammunition.

Dennis Borel, executive director of the Coalition of Texans with Disabilities, said the institutions are a relic of the 1850s and more of their residents should be moved into community settings.

"This should be an excellent incentive for the Legislature to examine the closing of unnecessary state schools in Texas," Borel said.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales can file a civil rights lawsuit if Texas and the Justice Department cannot resolve the concerns raised by late January. But Assistant Attorney General Wan J. Kim said in the report he is confident that won't be necessary.

DOJ_NMG_0108888

The investigators documented scores of problems, including 17 deaths in a year and a half and possible violations of the federal Americans with Disabilities Act.

That law says states must treat individuals in the most integrated setting possible. But rather than seeking to move obviously capable residents into the community, officials seemed eager to keep them in the facility, the report said.

The investigators said the facility should develop and implement comprehensive guidelines, policies and procedures for planning residents' transitions to community life. It also recommended giving residents and their families better information about available community placements so they can make a good decision.

The report also raised serious concerns about the psychiatric services the facility provides to the roughly 200 patients with mental health issues.

Psychiatric assessments may be incomplete or inaccurate, the report said, because the school's psychiatrists did not adequately consider residents' medical issues, physical injuries, family and psychiatric histories, and medication regimes when trying to diagnose problems.

Many residents had vague diagnoses, which the investigators said exposes them to "counterproductive, even harmful interventions and to interventions that mask but do not correct underlying disorders."

The report called for a thorough psychiatric evaluation of all current residents, once officials develop standards for reliably diagnosing problems. Residents on psychotropic medications should be examined to ensure the drugs and dosage are appropriate.

The investigators also criticized the excessive use of mechanical, physical and chemical restraints and said most should only be used in true emergencies.

According to the report, several residents are kept in mechanical restraints, such as helmets with face guards, for nearly all of their waking hours no matter how they behave. Others are repeatedly given drugs to control their behavior without any documentation to justify the dosage.

"While undoubtedly well-intended, LSS's choice of behavioral interventions cannot be readily viewed as humane in effect," the report said.

ANTITRUST:

Liberty Media Deals For DirecTV (USAT)

By David Lieberman, Usa Today

USA Today, December 22, 2006

NEW YORK — Liberty Media (LINTA) Chairman John Malone, the executive once known as the "King of Cable," is back — this time with a plan that would make him the most powerful man in satellite television. And maybe more.

On Friday — three years, to the day, after News Corp. (NWS) took control of DirecTV — CEO Rupert Murdoch announced an agreement to turn over his controlling 38.5% interest in the No. 1 satellite company, as well as three regional sports networks and $550 million in cash, to Liberty in exchange for its 16.3% stake in News Corp.

The deal, which values Liberty's shares at about $11 billion, ends a potential threat to Murdoch's control of News Corp. that Malone posed after he acquired his voting shares two years ago.

Executives expect the deal to close in the middle of 2007 following approvals from News Corp. shareholders, federal antitrust officials and the Federal Communications Commission.

The companies also want the IRS to confirm that the deal will be largely tax free for News Corp. and will impose relatively low taxes on Liberty.

Liberty says it expects DirecTV CEO Chase Carey to continue to run the satellite company.

Yet this may be Malone's first big move to regain the media clout he had until 1999, when he sold Tele-Communications Inc., at the time the No. 1 cable company, to AT&T.

Liberty primarily invests in media and technology companies, although it owns a few assets, including QVC and Starz Encore.

But once Malone has DirecTV, which has 15.6 million subscribers, and the sports channels — FSN Northwest, FSN Pittsburgh and FSN Rocky Mountain, which go to about 8.6 million homes — he'll be well-poised for another play.

For example, several analysts expect him to swap Liberty's 4% stake in Time Warner for the Atlanta Braves baseball team and about $1.5 billion in cash.

"The cash is the most important element since it would likely be non-taxable, and the company could use the proceeds to acquire other strategic assets around the Starz Media Group," writes A.G. Edwards analyst Michael Kupinski.

DOJ_NMG_0108889

As a result, Liberty "could emerge as a significant entertainment/media company."

Investors also wonder whether Malone might see this as a good time to take DirecTV private, sell it to a phone company such as AT&T, or merge with its chief rival, EchoStar (DISH), known for its Dish Network.

Oppenheimer's Thomas Eagan, for one, says Malone probably won't fool around with DirecTV just yet.

The deal with Murdoch gives him enough shares to control the operation, the analyst says. Malone would have to pay a big tax bill if he sold his DirecTV shares before two years. And antitrust regulators probably wouldn't approve a deal that left consumers with just one satellite TV provider.

DirecTV Deal Aids 2 Media Moguls (LAT)

By Joseph Menn

The Los Angeles Times, December 23, 2006

A long-awaited agreement reached Friday in which News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch gains a bigger stake in his own company by trading his satellite TV interests to former cable kingpin John Malone frees each man to pursue broader ambitions in his medium of choice.

Murdoch expects faster growth in the Internet business than he does in U.S. satellite TV distribution. By solidifying control of News Corp., Murdoch can more easily seek out deals like the 2005 acquisition of the MySpace.com social networking site.

Meanwhile, Malone is unlikely to settle for the investment in El Segundo-based DirecTV Group Inc. that he gets from Murdoch.

Malone is expected to try to merge DirecTV with rival EchoStar Communications Corp., operator of the Dish Network. He also may team with a telephone company to offer the broadband and phone services that cable operators sell.

Friday's deal involves News Corp. swapping its 38.5% stake in DirecTV to Malone's holding company, Liberty Media Corp., for that firm's 16.5% stake in News Corp., valued at about $11 billion. Murdoch's ownership of voting stock in the New York company, parent of movie studio 20th Century Fox and the Fox television network, will rise from about 30% to about 38%.

Analysts saw more benefits for News Corp. than Liberty.

The elimination of Liberty's stake is tax-free for News Corp. and amounts to one of the largest share repurchases in history. That should increase earnings per share by almost 9%, wrote UBS analyst Aryeh Bourkoff.

News Corp. spokesman Andrew Butcher also confirmed that the company's regular $6-billion buyback plan, which had been on hold during the talks with Malone, would now resume. The company is authorized to spend the remaining $3.4 billion in that plan over the next 18 months, he said.

Malone moved to the background in the world of big media since selling Tele-Communications Inc., one of the largest cable television companies, in 1999 and has been hungry for a comeback. Relations between Murdoch and Malone, once close, grew strained after Malone acquired his News Corp. stake.

Friday's deal, which has been in the works for two years, is expected to close in mid-2007. Beyond the stock swap, it calls for News Corp. to send Englewood, Colo.-based Liberty $550 million in cash and three of the smallest of Fox's 16 regional cable sports networks — those based in the Northwest, the Rocky Mountain area and Pittsburgh.

Malone managed to get the DirecTV stock at an implied value of about $21 a share, analysts said, well below Thursday's $25 closing price. But even with that bargain and the extra cash changing hands, analysts expressed concerns about Liberty's new challenges in the satellite TV business, and Fitch Ratings downgraded its opinion of the company's creditworthiness.

Still, Liberty Chief Executive Greg Maffei said in a statement that the transaction was "a critical step" in the effort to change Liberty into a "well-positioned, focused operating company."

Liberty expects to get four of DirecTV's 11 board seats, Liberty spokesman John Orr said.

"Our goal is to work with them, to be a good strategic partner," Orr said.

Effective control of DirecTV could lead to distribution of programming for such Liberty assets as Starz Entertainment and home shopping channel QVC.

Malone's chances of merging DirecTV and EchoStar are unclear because previous attempts have been thwarted by antitrust objections.

But the same issues that made DirecTV less appealing for Murdoch — including the faster growth of cable TV and cable's greater number of interactive features — would make it easier for Malone to argue that a dominant satellite service would not harm competition or consumers.

A DirecTV spokesman didn't return messages, and EchoStar declined to comment.

News Corp. Class A shares dropped 5 cents to $21.53. Liberty's tracking stock rose $4.23 to $97.87, and DirecTV's fell 45 cents to $24.55.

joseph.menn@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0108890

Dick's Sporting Gets Antitrust Clearance (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

PITTSBURGH (AP) -- Dick's Sporting Goods Inc. on Friday said federal authorities have approved its pending $225 million acquisition of Golf Galaxy Inc.

The companies agreed to the takeover in November, under which Dick's will pay Golf Galaxy shareholders $18.82 per share in cash.

Dick's said the transaction received early clearance from a mandatory antitrust waiting period. The deal still needs approval by Golf Galaxy shareholders and is slated to close after Feb. 6, subject to customary closing conditions.

Golf Galaxy sells golf equipment through 65 stores, on Web sites and in catalogs.

Shares of Dick's fell 12 cents to close at $49.40 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Judge Asked To Unseal Documents In Newspaper Antitrust Case (ER)

The Eureka Reporter, December 23, 2006

A media advocacy group and an alternative weekly newspaper asked a federal judge Thursday to unseal key documents in an antitrust case involving MediaNews Group Inc. and the San Francisco Chronicle.

The Oakland-based Media Alliance and the San Francisco Bay Guardian filed a motion with U.S. District Judge Susan Illston to make public court records in a lawsuit that challenges a business partnership between MediaNews and the Hearst Corp, the Chronicle's publisher.

After the antitrust lawsuit was filed in July, Hearst and MediaNews asked the judge to seal certain documents containing business information they considered confidential.

In the motion filed Thursday, Media Alliance and the Bay Guardian argued that the public's First Amendment right to access the court filings outweighed the defendants' interest in keeping them confidential.

"These are the nation's biggest newspaper chains, and they're moving to destroy daily competition in the Bay Area and impose regional monopoly," said Bruce Brugmann, the Bay Guardian's editor and publisher. "They should not be able to do it in the middle of the night with sealed documents."

Hearst officials were reviewing the motion and could not comment Thursday, said spokesman Paul Luthringer. Representatives at MediaNews did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

New York-based Hearst has invested $300 million in a complex deal that gives Denver-based MediaNews three more Bay Area newspapers — on top of the seven it already owns. Hearst's investment helped finance MediaNews' purchase of the Contra Costa Times, the San Jose Mercury News and Monterey County Herald earlier this year.

San Francisco businessman Clint Reilly filed the federal antitrust lawsuit to block the deal, claiming it would limit competition for readers and advertising in the Bay Area newspaper market.

The newspaper companies maintain the arrangement is not anticompetitive because readers and advertisers have other media venues such as the Internet.

On Tuesday, Judge Illston barred Bay Area newspapers owned by MediaNews and Hearst from consolidating some of their business operations until the lawsuit is resolved.

When she issued a temporary restraining order against the alliance in November, Illston said she had been under the impression that Hearst's investment was solely an equity stake, but an April 26 memo had surfaced suggesting it actually was a bid to merge some of their business operations.

The case is expected to go to trial next spring.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Federal Court Rejects EPA's Smog Strategy (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

A federal appeals court yesterday struck down the Bush administration's strategy for reducing smog, ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency's rules for forcing state cleanups do not meet requirements of the Clean Air Act.

Judge Judith W. Rogers, writing for the three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, said, "EPA has failed to heed the restrictions on its discretion set forth in the Act." The court ordered the agency to come up with another enforcement plan.

DOJ_NMG_0108891

Smog is produced by nitrogen oxides reacting with other chemicals to create ground-level ozone, particularly in the summer months when the sun is hottest and brightest. Other major sources of the pollution are motor vehicle exhaust, gas vapors and chemical solvents.

In the stratosphere, ozone occurs naturally and is a beneficial shield against harmful ultraviolet rays.

EPA in 2004 issued new smog standards requiring 474 counties, with about 159 million people living in them, to reduce pollution of smog-causing ozone and improve the air enough to meet federal health standards. The agency gave them three to 17 years to do so.

The appellate panel said that was too long. It also said the agency was allowing "backsliding" by states when it should have been directing them to order new emission controls on industrial plants, more public transportation, tougher vehicle-inspection programs or cleaner-burning gasoline. Under the law, states that do not meet the standards risk losing federal highway dollars.

EPA spokeswoman Jennifer Wood said yesterday that the agency will review the panel's decision to determine whether it will ask the full appeals court to hear the case.

Appeals Panel Cuts Award In Valdez Spill By Exxon (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, December 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22 — A federal appeals panel on Friday cut nearly in half the $4.5 billion punitive damage award against Exxon Mobil as a result of the Exxon Valdez oil spill in 1989.

A majority of a three-judge panel said the company's negligent conduct, while "particularly egregious," was not intentional and did not warrant the maximum financial penalty that a lower court imposed.

The panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in San Francisco, split on applying legal precedents to the company responsible for the worst oil spill in United States history. It cut the award for punitive damages to $2.5 billion.

In the decision, the majority wrote, "Exxon's reckless misconduct in placing a known relapsed alcoholic in command of a supertanker, loaded with millions of barrels of oil, to navigate the pristine and resource abundant waters of Prince William Sound, was reckless and warrants severe sanctions."

"The misconduct did not, however, warrant sanctions at the highest range allowable," the ruling added.

Under the formulas used in such cases, the $4.5 billion was at the upper range permissible, representing a ninefold increase in the actual damages suffered by tens of thousands of fishermen, Alaska Natives and tourism businesses on whose behalf the suit was filed.

The case has bounced between the Circuit Court of Appeals and the District Court in Anchorage as Supreme Court precedents evolved, said Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond.

Judges setting punitive damages have "a lot of flexibility," Professor Tobias said, but they have to adhere to established standards in their calculations. One standard deals with the severity of the conduct and lets a judge set punitive damages up to 10 times actual damages.

A District Court judge, H. Russel Holland, had most recently used one of the highest multiples allowed by Supreme Court precedent, though he had lowered to $4.5 billion his original $5 billion that an earlier appeals panel had rejected.

That was still excessive, Judges Andrew J. Kleinfeld and Mary M. Schroeder wrote for the appeals panel.

Judge James R. Browning dissented, saying Exxon's conduct was "extremely reprehensible," "malicious" and "placed at massive risk and, ultimately, seriously injured the property and livelihood of tens of thousands of Alaskans."

David Oesting, a lawyer for people harmed by the spill, said, "At least we're back on track and on the way to closure."

Damages Are Halved In Exxon Valdez Oil Spill (WP/AP)

By David Kravets

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 22 -- A federal appeals court on Friday cut in half a $5 billion jury award for punitive damages against Exxon Mobil in the 1989 oil spill that smeared black goo across 1,500 miles of Alaskan coastline.

The case, one of the nation's longest-running noncriminal legal disputes, stems from a 1994 decision by an Anchorage jury to award the damages to 34,000 fishermen and other Alaskans. Their property and livelihoods were damaged when the Exxon Valdez tanker struck a charted reef, spilling 11 million gallons of crude oil.

It is the third time the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit ordered the Anchorage court to reduce the $5 billion award, the nation's largest at the time, saying it was unconstitutionally excessive in light of U.S. Supreme Court precedent.

"It is time for this protracted litigation to end," Chief Judge Mary Schroeder and Judge Andrew J. Kleinfeld wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0108892

In dissent, Judge James R. Browning ruled that the $5 billion verdict should remain intact because there is "no principled means by which this award should be reduced."

This time, the court ordered a specific amount, $2.5 billion, in damages; its previous rulings demanded that a lower court come up with its own figures. U.S. District Judge H. Russel Holland of Anchorage grudgingly complied in 2002, reducing damages to $4 billion. Irving, Tex.-based Exxon again appealed.

The following year, the appeals court ordered Holland to reconsider his decision, balancing it against a Supreme Court ruling that said punitive damages usually could not be more than nine times general damages. The Anchorage jury awarded $287 million in general damages -- and issued punitive damages that were 17 times that amount.

Holland, appointed by President Ronald Reagan in 1984, declared Exxon's conduct "reprehensible" and set the figure at $4.5 billion plus interest, ruling that the Supreme Court's precedent did not directly apply to the case.

Exxon again appealed, arguing that it should have to pay no more than $25 million in punitive damages, which are meant to punish a company for misconduct.

The company, whose $36.1 billion profit last year was the highest ever by any U.S. corporation, said it has spent more than $3 billion to settle federal and state lawsuits and to clean the Prince William Sound area.

In October, Exxon Mobil reported a $10.49 billion profit in the third quarter, the second-largest quarterly figure ever recorded by a publicly traded U.S. company.

Exxon spokesman Dave Gardner criticized the court's decision, calling the spill "a tragic accident that Exxon Mobil deeply regrets."

Gardner did not say whether the company would appeal the decision but said that "in our opinion, the facts of this case do not warrant an award this size."

In 1994, a federal jury found recklessness by Exxon and the captain of the Exxon Valdez, Joseph Hazelwood, who caused the tanker to run aground. That finding made Exxon liable for punitive damages.

The disaster, the worst oil spill in U.S. history, prompted Congress to pass a law in 1990 banning single-hull tankers such as the Exxon Valdez from domestic waters by 2015.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Subpoenas May Signal Wider Probe Into Son Of Sen. Stevens (RC)

By John Stanton

RollCall.com, December 23, 2006

In a move that could signal a widening of the investigation into the son of Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), federal investigators probing Alaska Senate President Ben Stevens (R) have issued a host of subpoenas to fishing industry executives and trade associations in Seattle, Alaska and Washington, D.C., sources familiar with the investigation said.

Federal investigators with the FBI and the Department of Justice have been looking into Ben Stevens for at least a year as part of a broader ethics probe of a group of state lawmakers dubbed by the local media “The Corrupt Bastards Club.” The scandal has swept up some of the state’s most powerful families and companies, including the Stevenses, energy industry giant VECO Corp. and other entities in the oil and gas sector.

There is no evidence that federal investigators are targeting Ted Stevens or any other Member of Congress in the investigation.

But federal investigators have begun to focus on the financial connections between Ben Stevens and Trevor McCabe, a former aide to the elder Stevens, said a source familiar with the investigation. Although details of federal subpoenas are supposed to be kept secret, The Seattle Times, the Anchorage Daily News and other local media reported earlier this month that a number of recent subpoenas seemed to center on the relationship between the younger Stevens, McCabe and a number of key players in the fishing industry, including Trident Seafoods, Icicle Seafoods and the At Sea Processors Association, a trade group.

Sources close to the investigation who asked not to be identified said that based on the information being sought, DOJ and the FBI appear now to be focusing on the relationship between Ben Stevens, McCabe and the Alaska Fisheries Marketing Board, which provides millions of federal dollars to the state’s fishing industry.

Ted Stevens created the board in 2003 to help the industry, which at the time was ailing financially. Since then, Stevens has earmarked millions of dollars to the group for grants each year. Companies, community groups and the state have used those grants for a host of activities, ranging from advertising campaigns in Japan to a decision to paint an Alaska Airlines jet to resemble a fish. The latter project received criticism both within the state and from Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) as wasteful spending.

DOJ_NMG_0108893

The office of Ted Stevens did not comment for this story.

Ben Stevens formally served as chairman of AFMB's board, while McCabe is a member of the board. McCabe and Stevens have had financial dealings with a number of the companies and trade associations involved in AFMB, including the APA and a number of companies that received significant federal funding from the group during his time on the board. All told, Ben Stevens was paid more than $659,000 by fishing companies from 2000 to 2005, according to financial disclosure forms filed with the state.

In addition, Stevens received more than $243,000 from VECO Corp., which also is being investigated.

IMMIGRATION:

Agents Remove 2,300 Illegal Aliens In Two Weeks (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents removed more than 2,300 illegal aliens from the country in the past two weeks on 35 flights to the Caribbean, Latin America, Asia and Africa -- one of the busiest periods of the year for ICE's Office of Detention and Removal Operations.

Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads ICE, said 852 of those removed had criminal records, and that another 21 flights this week will take 2,087 aliens to Central America and the Caribbean, including 515 who are criminal aliens.

"By the end of this week, ICE's Air Transportation Unit will have facilitated the removal of more than 4,500 illegal aliens in 14 days, including 1,414 with criminal records," Mrs. Myers said. "Apprehending, detaining and removing criminal and other illegal aliens promotes public safety and protects the integrity of the immigration system."

This week's Caribbean/Latin American flights, which are regularly scheduled via the Justice Prisoner and Alien Transportation System (JPATS) aircraft, are destined to Colombia, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Jamaica, Nicaragua and Haiti (one).

ICE spokeswoman Kadia H. Koroma said that in addition to the regularly scheduled flights using JPATS, ICE Detention and Removal personnel returned last week from two special charter removal missions: one to Africa that repatriated 82 Nigerian and 17 Liberian nationals, and another that returned 55 Filipinos and 12 Cambodians.

Ms. Koroma said that on the African charter flight more than 60 of those removed had criminal convictions, involving drug-smuggling, possession with intent to distribute drugs, weapons violations, sexual assault on children, burglary and bribery. The group, she said, included 17 Nigerians with forgery and fraud convictions.

She said that of the 55 Filipinos removed, 36 were criminal aliens and that 11 of the 12 Cambodian nationals removed also were criminal aliens. Their crimes included sexual offenses against children, sexual assaults, heroin smuggling, aggravated assault and homicide, she said.

The illegal aliens had been housed at various detention facilities across the country.

In fiscal 2006, ICE removed more than 186,600 illegal aliens from the country, a record for the agency and a 10 percent increase over the number of removals during the previous fiscal year. More than 50,000 of them were repatriated to Central American and Caribbean Basin countries using JPATS.

JPATS, managed by the Justice Department, provides regular international and domestic flights for the removal of deportable aliens. In 1995, the air fleets of the U.S. Marshals Service and the now-defunct U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service merged to create a more efficient and effective system for transporting prisoners and criminal aliens.

JPATS has three client agencies, the Bureau of Prisons, the Marshals Service and ICE, its largest user with more than 60 percent of flight hours during fiscal 2006. JPATS operates a fleet of aircraft that moves prisoners over long distances more economically and with higher security than commercial airlines.

Ms. Koroma said nearly all air movements are done aboard large and small jets that JPATS owns or leases.

She said ICE also manages alien transportation and repatriation flights via special charter missions.

DOJ_NMG_0108894

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Surf's Up On Capitol Hill (WSJ)

By Adam Goldberg And Preston Burton

The Wall Street Journal, December 23, 2006

As corporate America steels itself for an onslaught of investigations by the Democratically controlled Congress, consultants are busy advising companies on how best to prepare for and get through them. While one can do much to manage the fallout, navigating one of these investigations is a lot like surfing. Regardless of what you do, the biggest factor is still the size and nature of the wave. On this score, witnesses called before Congress have few protections.

First, Congress does not necessarily recognize the attorney-client privilege and the protections that it gives individuals and companies. While Congress has frequently restrained itself, it has not always done so -- thus everything a client tells a lawyer, before or during an investigation, is theoretically open to congressional grabbing.

In 1998, for example, the Republican-controlled House subcommittee on oversight and investigation subpoenaed documents from a Democratic lawyer and his law firm in an investigation into a real estate lease with the federal government. The firm asserted privilege on its client's behalf; the subcommittee threatened to hold the law firm in contempt; the law firm turned the privileged documents over. Coincidentally -- or not -- shortly thereafter the D.C. Bar Association actually issued an ethics opinion stating that lawyers were ethically free to give Congress attorney-client privileged material when threatened with contempt after first objecting.

Similarly, the 1980s saw cases in which the Democratically controlled Congress rejected the privilege, including cases involving Ferdinand Marcos and Provident Life & Accident Company. Notably, Rep. John Dingell made clear his view that Congress honored the privilege at its sole discretion. Mr. Dingell is expected to be chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee when the Democrats take control in January.

From a public policy perspective, we should all hope that restraint is exercised in the imminent investigations. Open communication between clients and their lawyers fosters, rather than impedes, regulatory compliance. This policy can only be served, however, if people believe that the privilege's protections are real. It would be ironic if Congress, in its understandable zeal to oversee compliance with our nation's laws, actually undermines that compliance by sacrificing the attorney-client privilege.

Second, at a congressional hearing or deposition you have only a very limited right to counsel. For example, during hearings there are no "objections" to committee questions, and your lawyer may advise you solely with respect to your legal rights and not about anything else. This is particularly troublesome given that Congress can act as a stalking horse for the Department of Justice and other federal and state government investigators. In effect, Congress frequently acts like a grand jury investigation -- just one without the procedural and secrecy protections afforded grand jury targets.

Moreover, unlike prosecutors and regulators, there is effectively no limit to what Congress can subpoena, or do with the information that it has obtained. Releasing information to the press (even before one hearing is held or one witness is questioned) is frequently unnecessary to oversight or legislation -- but that does not prevent Congress from doing so from time to time.

Third, every now and then Congress appears to set a "perjury trap" -- asking or compelling a witness to testify and then making a criminal referral for perjury to the Department of Justice when that witness fails to remember something or remembers something incorrectly. These referrals are particularly poisonous, as they can greatly inflame media and public perception of a witness. Perjury referrals also serve as a great deterrent to witnesses providing testimony to Congress, by placing them between the rock of a potential perjury trap and the hard place of asserting their Fifth Amendment rights. This brings us to our last point.

Sadly, if witnesses intend to assert their Fifth Amendment protections, they must be prepared to be publicly humiliated. All too often, congressional committees feel the need to call a witness to Capitol Hill and question him even though they know that the witness will not answer their questions.

While some might find it hard to sympathize with Ken Lay and Bernie Ebbers -- who are among the most notable of those recently forced to assert their Fifth Amendment rights in public -- one should keep in mind that they were forced to suffer this experience long before any trial was held in which they had the rights of a defendant. At least 20 other people with far less purported villainy have been forced to suffer this experience in the last five years alone. While the media might benefit from such tactics, it is hard to see what public policy is served by forcing someone to invoke his constitutional right before 60 flashing cameras and then vilifying or dismissing him one minute later. Such needless vilification may affect jury pools and could taint the judicial process itself.

DOJ_NMG_0108895

It is natural to ask why people who have done nothing wrong would refuse to answer questions, but our country's founders and the Supreme Court have provided the answer: Being innocent does not prevent your own words from being misused against you. There is already enough reputational pressure on an investigation's target not to assert his constitutional rights. We do not need congressional humiliation helping us along. The Fifth Amendment is there to protect the innocent and we hope Congress does not penalize people who avail themselves of this protection.

While congressional investigations, like surfing, might be a fun spectator sport, they are no laughing matter for the participants caught in the wave. In fulfilling its important constitutional obligations, we hope Congress keeps this in mind.

Mr. Goldberg was as special associate counsel to President Clinton; Mr. Burton was one of the attorneys representing Monica Lewinsky. Both are partners at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe LLP.

OTHER NEWS:

Romney Set For Presidential Announcement (AP)

AP, December 22, 2006

Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is poised to announce his campaign for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination in two phases early next month, a top adviser told The Associated Press on Friday.

The Massachusetts chief executive is expected to file paperwork as early as Jan. 2 with the Federal Election Commission, establishing a presidential campaign committee and permitting himself to begin raising money for his race on the first business day of the new year. Romney will leave office on Jan. 4.

As soon as the week of Jan. 8, Romney will hold a ceremony to officially declare his candidacy, said the adviser, a top aide who spoke on condition of anonymity in advance of the official filing.

The timing is somewhat dependent on when Sen. John McCain of Arizona makes an expected announcement about his own campaign for the GOP nomination, the Romney aide said. McCain has formed a presidential exploratory committee but held off declaring his candidacy.

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani has also formed an exploratory committee.

Before leaving for a 10-day ski vacation at his home in Deer Valley, Utah, Romney told reporters he would use the holiday gathering with his family to make a decision about a campaign. In total, 22 people will gather at the Romney vacation home outside Salt Lake City, including his five sons, their wives, his 10 grandchildren, and Romney's wife, Ann.

"I've got a lot of data. Now I have to sit down with my family and spend some time," the 59-year-old former venture capitalist said after ringing a Salvation Army bell at a downtown shopping mall. Romney gained international attention in 2002 as head of the Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

"The real question is could I be able to make a real contribution to the people of this country, could I make America's future brighter, and that's something which I'll give consideration to over the holiday," the governor said.

While saying that he wanted to consult with his family, Romney dismissed any thought he might be dissuaded from a campaign because of any personal concerns they might express. In the past, Romney has said the only thing that would prompt an immediate end to his political career would be a change in the health of his wife, who has multiple sclerosis.

"You know, there are a lot of people that make a lot greater sacrifices than politicians _ myself included _ and I saw them in Guantanamo, I saw them at the border of North Korea and South Korea, I saw them in Iraq and Afghanistan," Romney said. "So, I'm not focused on the sacrifices that I or my family would make. I'm focused instead on the needs of this country and whether I could make a difference."

In one small sign he will likely mount a campaign, the governor could be overheard at a second charity stop outside Faneuil Hall asking a local comedian who happened by if he could help him write jokes for an appearance next spring at Washington's annual Gridiron Club dinner. The gathering is a regular stop for national politicians and White House aspirants.

Romney spent part of the week in Iowa and New Hampshire, two of the lead presidential voting states. Earlier this month he made a political trip through the South, before using personal money to fund a fact-finding trip to Japan, South Korea and China. He added to his foreign credentials this year with trips to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, Iraq and Afghanistan.

In Iowa on Wednesday, Romney reiterated his support for President Bush and said a withdrawal from Iraq "would be a mistake."

In New Hampshire on Thursday, he deflected conservative concerns about his record on gay marriage and abortion. He said he now describes himself as "firmly pro-life," despite citing his tolerance for abortion rights during his 2002 gubernatorial campaign, after researching the embryonic stem cell issue.

DOJ_NMG_0108896

Rice: Black President A Real Option, But Not Her (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan

The Washington Times, December 23, 2006

America is ready to elect a black president, says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The nation's highest-ranking black government official, Miss Rice has said repeatedly she will not run for president, despite high popularity ratings and measurable support in opinion polls.

"Yes, I think a black person can be elected president," Miss Rice said in an interview.

The top U.S. diplomat also said Iraq is "worth the investment" in American lives and dollars. She thinks the United States can win in Iraq, although the war thus far has been longer and more difficult than she had expected.

She made the remarks at a time when President Bush is under pressure from the public and members of Congress to find a fresh course in the long-running and costly war, which has shown no signs of nearing an end after taking the lives of almost 3,000 American troops.

"I know from the point of view of not just the monetary cost but the sacrifice of American lives a lot has been sacrificed for Iraq, a lot has been invested in Iraq," Miss Rice said.

Mr. Bush would not ask for continued sacrifice and spending "if he didn't believe, and in fact I believe as well, that we can in fact succeed," Miss Rice said.

On politics, Miss Rice said the first successful black candidate will be "judged by all the things that Americans ultimately end up making their decision on: Do I agree with this person? Do I share this person's basic values? Am I comfortable that this person is going to make decisions when I'm not in the room that are very consequential?"

At the same time, she said, "we should not be naive. Race is still an issue in America. When a person walks into a room, race is evident. It's something that I think is going to be with us for a very, very long time."

Miss Rice declined to say whether she would like to see her predecessor, Colin L. Powell, become a candidate. Mr. Powell is a fellow black Republican.

"I'm not going to give Colin any advice and he's not going to give me any advice on this one," Miss Rice said.

Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, Illinois Democrat, is the most prominent black politician to emerge as a potential candidate for the 2008 presidential race.

Miss Rice was asked whether, watching Mr. Obama's rise, she thinks Americans are willing to put a black candidate in the White House.

Most people tell pollsters that whether a candidate is black doesn't matter to their votes.

More than eight in 10 black voters in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll say that it would make no difference to them. And other recent polling has found about the same number among the general public voicing that attitude.

Miss Rice said the Bush administration should be remembered for far more than the Iraq war. She recited foreign policy commitments and accomplishments including increased aid to fight AIDS and malaria in Africa and a peace deal ending two decades of North-South warfare in Sudan.

Miss Rice also said she has no reason to think North Korea is serious about dismantling its nuclear weapons. "That's what we're testing" in disarmament talks this week.

"They're signed on to denuclearization" in an agreement last year that was never implemented. "We'll see whether or not they follow through," Miss Rice said.

The talks ended yesterday in Beijing with no announced progress.

The Narrowing Field (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

IN THEORY, this should be the most wide-open presidential contest in decades. In reality, more than a year before the first vote, the field seems to be narrowing awfully fast. On the Democratic side, former Virginia governor Mark Warner, Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold, former South Dakota senator Tom Daschle and, this week, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh have announced they won't be running. On the Republican side, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee is leaving not just the Senate but the presidential race, and Virginia Sen. George Allen, once a leading contender, seems unlikely to toss his hat into the ring.

To be honest, we'll miss some of these candidates more than others. It's not unheard of to have such early dropouts: Former vice president Al Gore emerged from the "Saturday Night Live" hot tub at this time four years ago to announce he wouldn't be a candidate in 2004. And the field of announced candidates will certainly grow. North Carolina's John Edwards, the former Democratic vice presidential nominee, is set to make his announcement next week, joining Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack in the Democratic field.

DOJ_NMG_0108897

But it would be unfortunate if the departures portended a presidential race winnowed to a few almost before it begins. The country would benefit from a multitude of voices in both parties -- not just Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) and Barack Obama (Ill.) on the Democratic side and Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani on the Republican.

"Whether there were too many Goliaths or whether I'm just not the right David, the fact remains that at the end of the day, I concluded that, due to circumstances beyond our control, the odds were longer than I felt I could responsibly pursue," said Mr. Bayh, who just a few weeks earlier had formed an exploratory committee.

Call us quaint, but we liked it back when voters actually got to review candidates' qualifications and positions. Now, it seems, the first question potential supporters (read: donors) ask about candidates is not what they believe but whether they are electable. That sets up a vicious political cycle: A candidate seen as unelectable can't raise the daunting amounts ($25 million to $30 million by January 2008) needed to fuel a credible presidential race. But no candidate without a serious bank balance can be considered electable.

That problem has been exacerbated by the withering away of the federal matching fund system, which was designed to boost lesser-known primary candidates but has now become functionally irrelevant, because the top-tier candidates can raise more on their own than they would be permitted to if they accepted matching funds. An increasingly front-loaded primary system -- on the Democratic side, candidates will need enough to get through four contests in 15 days -- intensifies the need for an early pile of cash.

Perhaps our worries are premature; after all, at this point four years ago, hardly anyone had heard of former Vermont governor Howard Dean, who emerged as a leading contender for the Democratic nomination. Nonetheless, we're anxious to see some Davids tromping through the snows of Iowa and New Hampshire, not just a few big-footed Goliaths. And we'd like the voters to have some say in deciding which is which.

Another Inexplicably Jumps In (WP)

The Washington Post, December 23, 2006

NOW COMES news that James S. Gilmore III, the highhanded, dissent-averse and altogether unsuccessful ex-governor of Virginia, is weighing a run for the Republican nomination for president. Heaven help us. For if Mr. Gilmore does to the 50 states what he did to the Old Dominion, the federal government might as well declare bankruptcy now.

Let's review the sorry Gilmore record. After taking office amid boom times in 1998, Mr. Gilmore immediately set about draining Virginia's coffers by promoting ill-advised tax cuts that, when the predictable economic downturn arrived, left the state penniless. He pushed ahead with his narrow political agenda of eliminating the state's car tax despite repeated warnings of the dire consequences, which included diverting funds that should have gone to transportation and public education. (If you're mad about traffic and the state's neglected roads, Mr. Gilmore is high on the list of people to blame.)

As a swan song near the end of his four-year term, Mr. Gilmore forced a bitter budget impasse with the legislature, unprecedented in Virginia, that enraged Republicans and Democrats alike and torpedoed the election prospects of his own party's nominee to succeed him as governor. When he finally left office in 2002 -- condemned by both liberal and libertarian think tanks for his managerial incompetence -- Mr. Gilmore bequeathed to his successor, Mark Warner, a budgetary mess that Mr. Warner spent a good part of his own governorship trying to clean up. All in all, a terrible performance by Mr. Gilmore.

Let's summarize: A former governor from the South, zealous about tax-cutting and allergic to opposing views, who stubbornly insists on ill-fated policies despite abundant and well-founded warnings that they are leading to ruin. Maybe this guy is presidential material after all.

DOJ_NMG_0108898

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 26, 2006 9:40 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Sunday, December 24, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061224.pdf; agnb061224.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

War News:
Bush Meets With Gates, War Cabinet At Camp David 1
Al-Sistani Balks At Plan For Iraq 3
Rich Blames Kerik For Failing To Train Iraq's Police 3
Military Reports Killing Prominent Taliban Leader 3
Taliban May Be Arming, Training In Pakistan.....3

Corporate Scandals:
Private Equity Groups Coming Under Increased Scrutiny 3
US Attorney In Northern California Taking Interest In Corporate Scandals.....4

Criminal Law:
Bush Called "Most Pro-Prisoner President" In History 4
O'Malley Finds Himself In Midst Of Capital Punishment Debate 4

Civil Rights:
FL13 Democratic Candidate Takes Voting Machine Dispute To Courts.....5
WPost Blasts Bush Over Failure To Respond To Question On DC Voting Rights.....5
Gender Pay Gap In US No Longer Narrowing 5
Professor Says Departments At Fault Over Taser Misuse 5

Antitrust:
Computer Chip Industry Probe Noted 5

Environment/Indian Affairs:
EPA Approves Hydrogen-Powered Zero-Emission Cars 6
Timber Firms' Green-Friendly Reputation Challenged 6

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Texas Cigarette Tax To Increase In New Year.....6
Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Handgun Permits.....6

Congress-Administration:
GOP Retirements Could Allow Democrats To Increase Majority In 2008.....6

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 7
Other: 7

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 7

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Gates, War Cabinet At Camp David. ABC World News (12/23, lead story, 1:55, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "For some time now, President Bush has insisted he can't make a decision about a new strategy in Iraq without hearing from his new Secretary of Defense, Robert Gates." ABC (Morrell): "Today for the first time, President Bush convened his new war council. The White House says they did not make any decisions about a new strategy for Iraq but the President is said to be pleased with their progress. ... Gates went to Iraq to see if a surge of up to 30,000 US troops would stem the violence. Soldiers told him they need more boots on the ground. Iraqi leaders said they would not object to additional forces and even top military commanders who originally opposed an escalation now agree it is necessary." Gen. Jack Keane (ret.): "I would characterize it as momentum." Morrell: "Retired Gen. Jack Keane has been pushing for a surge since last summer, even recommending it to President Bush." ... Morrell: "With that change of heart by commanders in Baghdad, the path now seems clear for a troop surge although polls show the American people are not on board; just 17% favor more forces."

The CBS Evening News (12/23, story 5, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The President is at Camp David for the holiday weekend but it's not quite a vacation." CBS (Chen): "Wrapping up a whirlwind first week on the job, Robert Gates went straight to Camp David to see the boss, eager to deliver his impressions after three days on the ground with US forces in Iraq. ... Gates quickly moved to set himself apart from his predecessor. Gates sat down with small groups of enlisted troops to get their views on what should be done next. ... Gary Sick worked with Gates during the Ford and Carter years." Gary Sick: "He's looking for ways to really deal with problems in a very rational, realistic way, and he isn't, I think, really taken with grand schemes and, you know, ideological visions."

NBC Nightly News (12/23, story 3, 0:30, Cork, 9.87M) reported, "The President was meeting with his national security team, spending time with Bob Gates and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. ... The Administration is considering ... five US brigades into Baghdad to secure that area with three Iraqi brigades. We are told by the Pentagon there are many generals on the ground who have for some time wanted more troops, but they felt under the old regime that request would have fallen on deaf ears."

Print coverage played up alleged objections to the troop-surge idea within the Pentagon. The AP (12/23, Loven) reports, "President Bush, drafting an overhaul of his faltering and unpopular war plan, heard Saturday from a Pentagon chief who had just returned from Iraq with a positive impression of Iraqi leaders' plans to address sectarian violence. ... White House officials declined to disclose any details of the conversations."

"Voices At Pentagon" Not Convinced Surge Will Help. The Houston Chronicle/AP (12/24, Loven) runs a modified version of this article, calling the war strategy "troubled" rather than "faltering and unpopular." The AP adds, "Some important voices at the Pentagon, however, are not convinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good. Democrats about to take control of Congress and other war critics fear that American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are threatened with an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers and forced to meet specific benchmarks." Bush "now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years but still could address some doubts in the military about a short-term boost in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/24, A8, Baker, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Gates brought back from Baghdad a plan put forth by Iraqi leaders that would redefine the U.S. mission to focus more on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-led government tries to contain Shiite militias. He also brought back views from U.S. commanders." However, "The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted additional troops unless a clear, achievable mission is defined and believe the White House is putting forward an ill-conceived idea in a desperate bid to salvage the situation. The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the top commanders in Iraq, have decided to recommend the surge, a position that if true could make it easier for Bush to go forward even if Pentagon generals remain unenthusiastic. ... A Pentagon official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions, said it would be an exaggeration to say that Casey is pushing for additional troops," suggesting that Casey "told Gates in Iraq that an infusion of U.S. forces would not help him politically with the Iraqi government and could impede reconciliation efforts."

Casey Reportedly Open To Having More Troops In Baghdad. The New York Times (12/24, Gordon, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "The American military command in Iraq is now willing to back a temporary increase in American troops in Baghdad as part of a broader Iraqi and United States effort to stem the slide toward chaos, senior American officials said Saturday. ... Until recently, the top ground commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has argued that sending more American forces into Baghdad and Anbar Province, the two most violent regions of Iraq, would increase the Iraqi dependency on Washington, and in the words of one senior official, 'make this feel more like an occupation.'" However, Casey and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno "indicated they were open to a troop increase when Mr. Gates met with them in Baghdad this week. ... The key to any new strategy, some officials said, would be a binding commitment by the Iraqi government that it would provide far more troops as well, and take other steps to try to slow the sectarian violence."

DOJ_NMG_0108901

Al-Sistani Balks At Plan For Iraq. The AP (12/24, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "A U.S.-backed plan to form a political coalition of Iraq's Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds — a glimmer of hope in a nation torn by sectarian violence — failed to win the crucial support of the top Shiite cleric Saturday." Lawmakers "said they were told the unity of Shiites, who have the largest bloc in parliament, had to come first." Sistani "holds no political post and rarely emerges from his home and adjacent office. But his word is considered law by many Shiites. Despite this, Shiite militants, including members of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, have not heeded al-Sistani's appeals for peace in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/24, A14, Trejos, Sarhan, 690K) reports, "Sistani's endorsement of the proposal was considered key. But during the meeting, Shiite leaders said, Sistani called on them to keep the 130-member United Iraqi Alliance intact." The Post adds that Prime Minister "Maliki and the Dawa party, part of the United Iraqi Alliance, have been unenthusiastic about the proposal from the beginning because they believe that isolating Sadr would exacerbate tensions. Maliki is beholden to Sadr, who supported his bid to become prime minister."

Rich Blames Kerik For Failing To Train Iraq's Police. The New York Times' Frank Rich (12/24) writes publisher Judith Regan lost "her job after enriching O. J. Simpson for a sleazy book project, yet Regan's "worst offenses can't compare even with those of her former lover, Bernard Kerik, the Giuliani-era New York City police commissioner who was appointed by President Bush in 2003 to train Iraqi's police. Mr. Kerik promised to stay 'as long as it takes to get the job done,' then fled months later without explanation and without the job even started. Today the Iraqi police he failed to train are not only useless but are also routinely engaged in sectarian violence, including torture, helping to ensure that Iraq is more dangerous for everyone than ever, American troops included. Mr. Kerik has never been held accountable for that failure, only for less lethal and unrelated graft in New York."

Military Reports Killing Prominent Taliban Leader. NBC Nightly News (12/23, story 6, 0:20, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The US military says an air strike killed the highest-ranking member of the Taliban since 2001. He is said to have been a close associate of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban leader. The Taliban denies the claim."

The New York Times/AP (12/24, Press) adds, "Mr. Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Mullah Omar, is the highest-ranking Taliban leader that the coalition has reported killing or capturing since the American-led invasion in late 2001. Afghan officials made no immediate confirmation, and no visual proof was offered to support the report. An American spokesman said that "various sources" were used to confirm Mr. Osmani's identity."

The Washington Post (12/24, A14, Constable, 690K) reports, "U.S. military officials in Kabul, the Afghan capital, said Osmani had been operating on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border. Afghan officials have complained for months that senior Taliban insurgents are able to move freely in parts of Pakistan's border regions, but the government of Pakistan has denied the assertions, insisting that the Taliban is based in Afghanistan and that the Afghan government should control its own borders."

Taliban May Be Arming, Training In Pakistan. The Los Angeles Times (12/24, Watson, 850K) reports, "Confidential documents obtained by The Times show that for at least two years, U.S. military intelligence agencies have warned American commanders that Taliban militants were arming and training in Pakistan, then slipping into Afghanistan with the help of Pakistani border control officers." The Times calls these doubts "reminiscent of the 1990s, when Islamabad insisted the intelligence service did not help found, train and arm the Taliban, though Pakistani heavy weapons and military officers were found among Taliban units." The Times adds, "Intelligence warnings have for months documented U.S. worries about Pakistan's role in providing a haven for Afghan insurgents."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Private Equity Groups Coming Under Increased Scrutiny. The New York Times (12/24, Duhigg, 1.16M) reports that despite attempt to avoid "suspicions," private equity firms are "finding themselves under attack in certain quarters." For example, "In Germany, political candidates have assailed takeover investors as 'locusts.' Oregon regulators last year refused to sell Portland General Electric to a buyout fund, citing a public outcry. And the Justice Department has started an investigation of possible collusion among some of the biggest private equity groups." Meanwhile, "other regulators are also threatening to bring greater scrutiny to private equity firms, a threat that the hedge fund business is already facing. Regulators, such as Richard Blumenthal, the attorney general of Connecticut, say they may shift their focus to private equity groups."

DOJ_NMG_0108902

US Attorney In Northern California Taking Interest In Corporate Scandals. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/24, 384K) profiles US Attorney Kevin Ryan, "the tough-talking point man for the Bush administration's federal law enforcement efforts in Northern California, has taken a high-profile interest in investigating whether Bay Area companies and executives fraudulently backdated stock-option grants." Over the summer, Ryan "dedicated a federal task force of prosecutors and investigators to the financial scandal that has swept up dozens of companies, led to two criminal indictments and prompted a rash of executive resignations." To add "more investigative firepower," Ryan is "also focusing on whether employees who received the backdated options lied on their individual tax returns." The Chronicle noted that Ryan brings this investigation "amid reports of high-profile defections and low morale among his prosecutors as well as a falling caseload at a US attorney's office whose territory extends from Monterey County to the Oregon border and which has about 100 prosecutors in three branches."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Called "Most Pro-Prisoner President" In History. The New York Times Magazine's Chris Sullentrop (12/24) writes that the G.O.P. "is beginning to embrace the idea that prisoners have not only souls that need saving but also flesh that needs caring for in this world. Increasingly, Republicans are talking about helping ex-prisoners find housing, drug treatment, mental-health counseling, job training and education. They're also reconsidering some of the more punitive sentencing laws for drug possession. … Prison reform is not a highly advertised position of the Republican Party either, but a growing number of social conservatives are trying to make it a centerpiece of the Christian-conservative agenda. The most striking aspect of the Second Chance Act may be the cross-section of Republicans, from every wing of the party, who support it. Senator Arlen Specter, the top-ranked contender for the award of Least Favorite Republican among movement conservatives, is a lead sponsor, as is Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who may be Christian conservatives' top choice for the 2008 presidential nomination. Among the House sponsors of the bill are Mike Pence, an Indiana congressman who is a leader of the conservative caucus in the House and a darling of Washington's conservative press corps, and Dan Lungren, a California representative and former California attorney general who helped write California's three-strikes law (which he still supports)." Sullentrop goes on to write, "When George W. Bush took office in 2001, he did not dismantle the Clinton-era re-entry programs; rather, he adapted them to fit his faith-based agenda. Despite his strong support for capital punishment, President Bush may be the most pro-prisoner president in American history — at least if you disregard the war on terror (an admittedly enormous caveat). Certainly in terms of rhetoric, Bush has done more to advance the interests of prisoners than either Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. The Second Chance Act takes its name from the 2004 State of the Union address in which Bush asked Congress to pass a $300 million program to help prisoners as they re-enter society.'"

O'Malley Finds Himself In Midst Of Capital Punishment Debate. The Washington Post (12/24, C1, Wagner, Rich, 690K) reports, "The emotionally charged, polarizing issue of the death penalty was barely mentioned during the campaign for Maryland governor. And it hardly seemed something that Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley would be eager to wade into during his first months in office, when he plans to focus on 'the things we agree on.' Yet the confluence of national currents and a Maryland court ruling last week halting executions on a technicality could make the death penalty a defining issue of O'Malley's tenure. In effect, Maryland suddenly has a moratorium on executions, and the new governor, who is personally opposed to capital punishment, could play a pivotal role in determining when -- and whether -- it resumes. … Under the ruling by the Court of Appeals, new regulations must be drafted before the state may put more prisoners to death -- and early signs from O'Malley and his aides suggest that he sees no reason to rush that process."

DOJ_NMG_0108903

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FL13 Democratic Candidate Takes Voting Machine Dispute To Courts. The Washington Post (12/24, A5, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "A battle over who won the congressional election in Florida's 13th District is in the courts and could be debated in Congress itself. Christine Jennings, the Democrat, informed Congress last week that she was contesting the election, claiming that electronic voting machines malfunctioned and that state officials wrongly certified the election in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan. She also filed a lawsuit asking for access to the source code of the machines, manufactured by Election Systems & Software Inc. Two weeks after the Nov. 7 election, the state certified Buchanan as the winner by 369 votes. Jennings wants a new vote. If she prevails, the Democratic gains in the midterm elections will increase to 31 House seats." The Post notes that on Election Day, "18,000 Sarasota County voters who went to the polls registered no choice in the congressional race. Jennings argued that that was evidence of a machine glitch, but the state indicated that it found no evidence of one. ES&S also rejected her argument, and Buchanan said she should concede.

WPost Blasts Bush Over Failure To Respond To Question On DC Voting Rights. The Washington Post (12/24, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes that Post reporters asked President, "Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?" during an interview last week. President Bush responded, "I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes. … I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes." The Post notes, "In fact no one was asking that the president comment on specific legislation. He could easily have responded this way: 'I know that citizens of the District of Columbia pay taxes for their country, and I know many of them have gone to war for their country. They should have a say in how their country is ruled. I look forward to working with Congress to find the best way to make that happen.' Instead we get squirming evasions and feeble humor. To be honest, we don't find it funny; if anything, it's pathetic that six years into his presidency Mr. Bush can't bring himself to endorse basic rights for residents of his current hometown."

Gender Pay Gap In US No Longer Narrowing. The New York Times (12/24, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "Throughout the 1980s and early '90s, women of all economic levels — poor, middle class and rich — were steadily gaining ground on their male counterparts in the work force. … Largely without notice, however, one big group of women has stopped making progress: those with a four-year college degree. The gap between their pay and the pay of male college graduates has actually widened slightly since the mid-'90s. For women without a college education, the pay gap with men has narrowed only slightly over the same span." The Times adds, "A decade ago, it was possible to imagine that men and women with similar qualifications might one day soon be making nearly identical salaries. Today, that is far harder to envision. … Last year, college-educated women between 36 and 45 years old, for example, earned 74.7 cents in hourly pay for every dollar that men in the same group did, according to Labor Department data analyzed by the Economic Policy Institute . A decade earlier, the women earned 75.7 cents."

Professor Says Departments At Fault Over Taser Misuse. Larry Karson, a professor of criminal justice at the University of Houston, writes in the Houston Chronicle (12/24, 530K) that "another politician, this time state Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston, has joined the band wagon for 'fixing' the Taser problem by suggesting that legislation is needed to put a moratorium on the use of the stun guns by the police." Karson argued that while "there have been numerous cases nationwide of poorly trained officers and negligent managers who have allowed the continued misuse of Tasers," the fault "doesn't always fall at the feet of the street officers." Rather he suggested that the "for real reason Tasers are consistently misused in some departments, look to management."

ANTITRUST:

Computer Chip Industry Probe Noted. In an article on the year's top computer-related news stories, PC World (12/24, Ben Ames) reports on its Web site that the Department of Justice launched a probe in October "of sales practices in the SRAM memory chip market, serving subpoenas to Cypress Semiconductor, Mitsubishi Electric, Samsung Electronics, Sony Electronics, and Toshiba." The investigation came shortly after the Justice Department won

DOJ_NMG_0108904

"convictions and multimillion-dollar fines for price fixing in the closely related DRAM industry." In December, the Justice Department also turned "its focus to graphics chips makers, demanding documents from AMD and Nvidia as part of an antitrust investigation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Approves Hydrogen-Powered Zero-Emission Cars. The Los Angeles Times (12/24, 850K) reports the EPA "has cleared the way for automakers to produce hydrogen-powered fuel-cell cars to meet zero-emission vehicle requirements in California and 10 other states. In a waiver signed last week, EPA officials approved amendments adopted in 2003 by the California Air Resources Board that allow manufacturers to produce fuel cells as an alternative to battery-powered cars and light trucks previously required by the state. … Automakers had mixed reactions. General Motors spokesman Dave Barthmuss said fuel-cell vehicles were 'very viable to be a portion of any automaker's compliance strategy.'" Ford Motor Co. "said that much uncertainty remains about fuel-cell vehicles, and that the company agrees with a U.S. Energy Department forecast that the vehicles won't be available in large numbers before 2015."

Will Notes Challenges Facing New Ford CEO. In his column for the Washington Post (12/24, B7, 690K) George Will writes, "If Alan Mulally, Ford Motor Co.'s chief executive, is looking for fresh words to inspirit his troubled company -- words to replace 'The Way Forward,' which rang hollow as Ford slid further backward. … Henry Ford, according to Mulally, said that if, when he founded his company, he had asked potential customers what they wanted, they would have said faster horses. Mulally has bet the company on its ability to develop 'curb appeal' products that people do not yet know they want and to develop them before the company, which burned through about $6 billion in the last two quarters of 2006, burns the rest of its borrowed cash."

Timber Firms' Green-Friendly Reputation Challenged. The Washington Post (12/24, A3, Harden, 690K) reports, "Two of the nation's largest timber companies, Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek Timber, have polished their public images for years by participating in a program that certifies that their logging is environmentally friendly. But in separate challenges this month from the far corners of the United States, environmental groups in Washington state and in Maine are accusing Weyerhaeuser Co. and Plum Creek Timber Co. of using the forest industry's green-labeling program as a cover while they log in ways that harm endangered spotted owls in Washington and violate forestry laws in Maine. The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine have demanded in documents sent to the Sustainable Forestry Board that it revoke certification for the companies until they comply with standards they have pledged to uphold. Both companies say the demands are unjustified and show ignorance of relevant facts."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Texas Cigarette Tax To Increase In New Year. The Dallas Morning News (12/24, Brooks, 500K) reports taxes on cigarettes in Texas are scheduled to "go up at least $1 per pack and about $12 per carton" after the New Year. Anticipation is "already rising among smokers and nonsmokers" and "convenience stores are bracing for a drop in sales. Discount shops are running out of some brands." Meanwhile, distributors are "liquidating their inventories. And federal agents are keeping an eye on the situation after tax increases in other states led to robberies and smuggling rings."

Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Handgun Permits. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (12/24, 223K) reports that "Texans who are 55 or older are more likely to get concealed handgun permits than those who are in their 20s, 30s and 40s, according to Texas Department of Public Safety statistics," a figure that "falls in line with national surveys that indicate seniors are more likely than any other age group to be gun owners." The Star-Telegram writes, "In Texas, 42 percent of those who have concealed handgun permits are 55 or older. Texans who are 60 or older have about 25 percent of the permits issued, statistics show."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Retirements Could Allow Democrats To Increase Majority In 2008. The Washington Post (12/24, A4, Murray, 690K) reports, "The Republicans' stinging losses last month could be magnified in 2008 if veteran GOP Senate and House members decide to retire, including numerous lawmakers who will be 70 or older on that Election Day. .. GOP leaders are particularly fearful that the Democrats will be able to expand their narrow House and Senate majorities if some of Congress's biggest Republican names call it quits." The Post notes Sen. Ted Stevens was born on Nov. 18, 1923, while in the House, as many as 30 Republicans may retire, according to operatives from both parties, with senior lawmakers including Reps. Ralph Regula (Ohio), 82, and C.W. Bill Young of Florida, who turned 76 on Dec. 16, leading the list." Sen. John Warner "has indicated that he may seek a sixth term, if he remains in good health." The Post goes on to report that Sen. Wayne Allard "has been the subject of considerable speculation" because "he promised to serve only two terms when he was elected in 1996. Colorado just elected a Democratic governor, and the state is considered fertile ground for the Democrats' Western expansion efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0108905

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule; at Camp David for Christmas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: No events scheduled.

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Iran Rejects Resolution Against Nuclear Program."
"Schwarzenegger Breaks Leg Skiing."
"The Man Behind The Obama-Mania."
"Aiding And Abetting The Taliban?"

New York Times:

"Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops."
"For Young Offenders, Justice As Impoverished As Africa."
"Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place."
"Testing The Waters, Obama Tests His Own Limits."
"Hotel Log Hints At Illicit Desire That Dr. Freud Didn't Repress."

Washington Post:

"Special Agent."
"Trees For All The Troops."
"Sanctions On Iran Approved By U.N."
"Clinton, Obama Clearing The Field."
"Lebanon's Slow Slide From Hope To Deadlock."

Washington Times:

"U.N. Panel OKs Curbs On Iran Trade."
"Bridging A Faith Divide."
"Air Strike Kills Top Taliban Tactician."
"Olmert To Remit Withheld Taxes, Lift Roadblocks."

Detroit Free Press:

"Michigan Soldiers Come Home For The Holidays."
"Man Arraigned In Killing Of Detroit Mom, Daughter."
"Pistons Swat Undermanned Hawks."

Dallas Morning News:

"Oak Cliff Loses An Anchor."
"Dyncorp Has Big Role, Little Oversight In War Efforts."
"Arlington Volunteers Rebuild Church In New Orleans."
"Girl, 2, Fatally Stabbed In Group Of Kids."
"Chance Of White Christmas In Forecast For Area."
"Rangers Trade Danks For Pitching Help."
"Tech's Knight Ties Record For Coaching Wins."
"West End Is On The Mend."
"Police: 2-Year-Old May Have Been Stabbed By Child."

Houston Chronicle:

"GOP Rival Threatens Craddick's House Rule."
"Shuttle Crew Welcomed Home In Houston."
"Seniors More Likely To Get Concealed Gun Permits."
"Fire-Devastated Towns Hope For Wet Texas Winter."
"Proposed Bill Would Lock In Texas Tuition Rates."
"Bars, Wine-Tasting Rooms Lure Houston Renters."
"West Point Officers Say Duty Called Too Late."
"Holidays Enhance Grief For Fallen Soldiers' Families."
"Denver Travelers May Not Be Home For Christmas."
"Evidence Suggests Freud's Slip With Sister-In-Law."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Bush Meets With Gates; Iran Sanctions; Overstretched Military; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Travel Delays; Last-Minute Shopping; Documentary On Race; Horse Racing; Kentucky Artist.

DOJ_NMG_0108906

CBS: Last-Minute Shopping; Travel Delays; Iran Sanctions; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Bush Meets With Gates; Iraq's Christians At Christmas; Texas Tech Basketball; Weekend Journal-Peace On Earth; Snow Globes.

NBC: Travel Delays; Iran Sanctions; Bush Meets With Gates; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Taliban Death; Christmas In Afghanistan; Last-Minute Shopping; Duke Rape Case; Sewing; Christmas Greetings.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

War News:
Bush Meets With Gates, War Cabinet At Camp David 1
Al-Sistani Balks At Plan For Iraq 2
Rich Blames Kerik For Failing To Train Iraq's Police 2
Military Reports Killing Prominent Taliban Leader 3
Taliban May Be Arming, Training In Pakistan 3

Corporate Scandals:
Private Equity Groups Coming Under Increased Scrutiny 3
US Attorney In Northern California Taking Interest In Corporate Scandals 3

Criminal Law:
Bush Called "Most Pro-Prisoner President" In History 3
O'Malley Finds Himself In Midst Of Capital Punishment Debate .. 4

Civil Rights:
FL13 Democratic Candidate Takes Voting Machine Dispute To Courts 4
WPost Blasts Bush Over Failure To Respond To Question On DC Voting Rights 4
Gender Pay Gap In US No Longer Narrowing 4
Professor Says Departments At Fault Over Taser Misuse 5

Antitrust:
Computer Chip Industry Probe Noted 5

Environment/Indian Affairs:
EPA Approves Hydrogen-Powered Zero-Emission Cars 5
Timber Firms' Green-Friendly Reputation Challenged 5

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Texas Cigarette Tax To Increase In New Year 6
Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Handgun Permits. 6

Congress-Administration:
GOP Retirements Could Allow Democrats To Increase Majority In 2008 6

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 6
Other: 6

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 6

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Meets With Gates, War Cabinet At Camp David. ABC World News (12/23, lead story, 1:55, Muir, 8.78M) reported, "For some time now, President Bush has insisted he can't make a decision about a new strategy in Iraq without hearing from his new Secretary of Defense, Robert Gates." ABC (Morrell): "Today for the first time, President Bush convened his new war council. The White House says they did not make any decisions about a new strategy for Iraq but the President is said to be pleased with their progress. ... Gates went to Iraq to see if a surge of up to 30,000 US troops would stem the violence. Soldiers told him they need more boots on the ground. Iraqi leaders said they would not object to additional forces and even top military commanders who originally opposed an escalation now agree it is necessary." Gen. Jack Keane (ret.): "I would characterize it as momentum." Morrell: "Retired Gen. Jack Keane has been pushing for a surge since last summer, even recommending it to President Bush." ... Morrell: "With that change of heart by commanders in Baghdad, the path now seems clear for a troop surge although polls show the American people are not on board; just 17% favor more forces."

The CBS Evening News (12/23, story 5, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The President is at Camp David for the holiday weekend but it's not quite a vacation." CBS (Chen): "Wrapping up a whirlwind first week on the job, Robert Gates went straight to Camp David to see the boss, eager to deliver his impressions after three days on the ground with US forces in Iraq. ... Gates quickly moved to set himself apart from his predecessor. Gates sat down with small groups of enlisted troops to get their views on what should be done next. ... Gary Sick worked with Gates during the Ford and Carter years." Gary Sick: "He's looking for ways to really deal with problems in a very rational, realistic way, and he isn't, I think, really taken with grand schemes and, you know, ideological visions."

NBC Nightly News (12/23, story 3, 0:30, Cork, 9.87M) reported, "The President was meeting with his national security team, spending time with Bob Gates and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. ... The Administration is considering ... five US brigades into Baghdad to secure that area with three Iraqi brigades. We are told by the Pentagon there are many generals on the ground who have for some time wanted more troops, but they felt under the old regime that request would have fallen on deaf ears."

Print coverage played up alleged objections to the troop-surge idea within the Pentagon. The AP (12/23, Loven) reports, "President Bush, drafting an overhaul of his faltering and unpopular war plan, heard Saturday from a Pentagon chief who had just returned from Iraq with a positive impression of Iraqi leaders' plans to address sectarian violence. ... White House officials declined to disclose any details of the conversations."

"Voices At Pentagon" Not Convinced Surge Will Help. The Houston Chronicle/AP (12/24, Loven) runs a modified version of this article, calling the war strategy "troubled" rather than "faltering and unpopular." The AP adds, "Some important voices at the Pentagon, however, are not convinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good. Democrats about to take control of Congress and other war critics fear that American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are threatened with an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers and forced to meet specific benchmarks." Bush "now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years but still could address some doubts in the military about a short-term boost in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/24, A8, Baker, Ricks, 690K) reports, "Gates brought back from Baghdad a plan put forth by Iraqi leaders that would redefine the U.S. mission to focus more on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-led government tries to contain Shiite militias. He also brought back views from U.S. commanders." However, "The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted additional troops unless a clear, achievable mission is defined and believe the White House is putting forward an ill-conceived idea in a desperate bid to salvage the situation. The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the top commanders in Iraq, have decided to recommend the surge, a position that if true could make it easier for Bush to go forward even if Pentagon generals remain unenthusiastic. ... A Pentagon official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions, said it would be an exaggeration to say that Casey is pushing for additional troops," suggesting that Casey "told Gates in Iraq that an infusion of U.S. forces would not help him politically with the Iraqi government and could impede reconciliation efforts."

Casey Reportedly Open To Having More Troops In Baghdad. The New York Times (12/24, Gordon, Sanger, 1.16M) reports, "The American military command in Iraq is now willing to back a temporary increase in American troops in Baghdad as part of a broader Iraqi and United States effort to stem the slide toward chaos, senior American officials said Saturday. ... Until recently, the top ground commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has argued that sending more American forces into Baghdad and Anbar Province, the two most violent regions of Iraq, would increase the Iraqi dependency on Washington, and in the words of one senior official, 'make this feel more like an occupation.'" However, Casey and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno "indicated they were open to a troop increase when Mr. Gates met with them in Baghdad this week. ... The key to any new strategy, some officials said, would be a binding commitment by the Iraqi government that it would provide far more troops as well, and take other steps to try to slow the sectarian violence."

Al-Sistani Balks At Plan For Iraq. The AP (12/24, Abdul-Zahra) reports, "A U.S.-backed plan to form a political coalition of Iraq's Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds — a glimmer of hope in a nation torn by sectarian violence — failed to win the crucial support of the top Shiite cleric Saturday." Lawmakers "said they were told the unity of Shiites, who have the largest bloc in parliament, had to come first." Sistani "holds no political post and rarely emerges from his home and adjacent office. But his word is considered law by many Shiites. Despite this, Shiite militants, including members of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, have not heeded al-Sistani's appeals for peace in Iraq."

The Washington Post (12/24, A14, Trejos, Sarhan, 690K) reports, "Sistani's endorsement of the proposal was considered key. But during the meeting, Shiite leaders said, Sistani called on them to keep the 130-member United Iraqi Alliance intact." The Post adds that Prime Minister "Maliki and the Dawa party, part of the United Iraqi Alliance, have been unenthusiastic about the proposal from the beginning because they believe that isolating Sadr would exacerbate tensions. Maliki is beholden to Sadr, who supported his bid to become prime minister."

Rich Blames Kerik For Failing To Train Iraq's Police. The New York Times' Frank Rich (12/24) writes publisher Judith Regan lost "her job after enriching O. J.

DOJ_NMG_0108909

Simpson for a sleazy book project, yet Regan's "worst offenses can't compare even with those of her former lover, Bernard Kerik, the Giuliani-era New York City police commissioner who was appointed by President Bush in 2003 to train Iraqi's police. Mr. Kerik promised to stay 'as long as it takes to get the job done,' then fled months later without explanation and without the job even started. Today the Iraqi police he failed to train are not only useless but are also routinely engaged in sectarian violence, including torture, helping to ensure that Iraq is more dangerous for everyone than ever, American troops included. Mr. Kerik has never been held accountable for that failure, only for less lethal and unrelated graft in New York."

Military Reports Killing Prominent Taliban Leader. NBC Nightly News (12/23, story 6, 0:20, Siegenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The US military says an air strike killed the highest-ranking member of the Taliban since 2001. He is said to have been a close associate of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban leader. The Taliban denies the claim."

The New York Times/AP (12/24, Press) adds, "Mr. Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Mullah Omar, is the highest-ranking Taliban leader that the coalition has reported killing or capturing since the American-led invasion in late 2001. Afghan officials made no immediate confirmation, and no visual proof was offered to support the report. An American spokesman said that "various sources" were used to confirm Mr. Osmani's identity."

The Washington Post (12/24, A14, Constable, 690K) reports, "U.S. military officials in Kabul, the Afghan capital, said Osmani had been operating on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border. Afghan officials have complained for months that senior Taliban insurgents are able to move freely in parts of Pakistan's border regions, but the government of Pakistan has denied the assertions, insisting that the Taliban is based in Afghanistan and that the Afghan government should control its own borders."

Taliban May Be Arming, Training In Pakistan. The Los Angeles Times (12/24, Watson, 850K) reports, "Confidential documents obtained by The Times show that for at least two years, U.S. military intelligence agencies have warned American commanders that Taliban militants were arming and training in Pakistan, then slipping into Afghanistan with the help of Pakistani border control officers." The Times calls these doubts "reminiscent of the 1990s, when Islamabad insisted the intelligence service did not help found, train and arm the Taliban, though Pakistani heavy weapons and military officers were found among Taliban units." The Times adds, "Intelligence warnings have for months documented U.S. worries about Pakistan's role in providing a haven for Afghan insurgents."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Private Equity Groups Coming Under Increased Scrutiny. The New York Times (12/24, Duhigg, 1.16M) reports that despite attempt to avoid "suspicions," private equity firms are "finding themselves under attack in certain quarters." For example, "In Germany, political candidates have assailed takeover investors as 'locusts.' Oregon regulators last year refused to sell Portland General Electric to a buyout fund, citing a public outcry. And the Justice Department has started an investigation of possible collusion among some of the biggest private equity groups." Meanwhile, "other regulators are also threatening to bring greater scrutiny to private equity firms, a threat that the hedge fund business is already facing. Regulators, such as Richard Blumenthal, the attorney general of Connecticut, say they may shift their focus to private equity groups."

US Attorney In Northern California Taking Interest In Corporate Scandals. The San Francisco Chronicle (12/24, 384K) profiles US Attorney Kevin Ryan, "the tough-talking point man for the Bush administration's federal law enforcement efforts in Northern California, has taken a high-profile interest in investigating whether Bay Area companies and executives fraudulently backdated stock-option grants." Over the summer, Ryan "dedicated a federal task force of prosecutors and investigators to the financial scandal that has swept up dozens of companies, led to two criminal indictments and prompted a rash of executive resignations." To add "more investigative firepower," Ryan is "also focusing on whether employees who received the backdated options lied on their individual tax returns." The Chronicle noted that Ryan brings this investigation "amid reports of high-profile defections and low morale among his prosecutors as well as a falling caseload at a US attorney's office whose territory extends from Monterey County to the Oregon border and which has about 100 prosecutors in three branches."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Bush Called "Most Pro-Prisoner President" In History. The New York Times Magazine's Chris Sullentrop (12/24) writes that the G.O.P. "is beginning to embrace the idea that prisoners have not only souls that need saving but also flesh that needs caring for in this world. Increasingly, Republicans are talking about helping ex-prisoners find housing, drug treatment, mental-health counseling, job training and education. They're also reconsidering some of the more punitive sentencing laws for drug possession. … Prison reform is not a highly advertised position of the Republican Party either, but a growing number of social conservatives are trying to make it a centerpiece of the Christian-conservative agenda. The most striking aspect of the Second Chance Act may be the cross-section of Republicans, from every wing of the party, who support it. Senator Arlen Specter, the top-ranked contender for the award of Least Favorite Republican among movement conservatives, is a lead sponsor, as is Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who may be Christian conservatives' top choice for the 2008 presidential nomination. Among the House sponsors of the bill are Mike Pence, an Indiana congressman who is a leader of the conservative caucus in the House and a darling of Washington's conservative press corps, and Dan Lungren, a California representative and former California attorney general who helped write California's three-strikes law (which he still supports)." Sullentrop goes on to write, "When George W. Bush took office in 2001, he did not dismantle the Clinton-era re-entry programs; rather, he adapted them to fit his faith-based agenda. Despite his strong support for capital punishment, President Bush may be the most pro-prisoner president in American history — at least if you disregard the war on terror (an admittedly enormous caveat). Certainly in terms of rhetoric, Bush has done more to advance the interests of prisoners than either Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. The Second Chance Act takes its name from the 2004 State of the Union address in which Bush asked Congress to pass a $300 million program to help prisoners as they re-enter society.'"

DOJ_NMG_0108910

O'Malley Finds Himself In Midst Of Capital Punishment Debate. The Washington Post (12/24, C1, Wagner, Rich, 690K) reports, "The emotionally charged, polarizing issue of the death penalty was barely mentioned during the campaign for Maryland governor. And it hardly seemed something that Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley would be eager to wade into during his first months in office, when he plans to focus on 'the things we agree on.' Yet the confluence of national currents and a Maryland court ruling last week halting executions on a technicality could make the death penalty a defining issue of O'Malley's tenure. In effect, Maryland suddenly has a moratorium on executions, and the new governor, who is personally opposed to capital punishment, could play a pivotal role in determining when -- and whether -- it resumes. … Under the ruling by the Court of Appeals, new regulations must be drafted before the state may put more prisoners to death -- and early signs from O'Malley and his aides suggest that he sees no reason to rush that process."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FL13 Democratic Candidate Takes Voting Machine Dispute To Courts. The Washington Post (12/24, A5, Goldfarb, 690K) reports, "A battle over who won the congressional election in Florida's 13th District is in the courts and could be debated in Congress itself. Christine Jennings, the Democrat, informed Congress last week that she was contesting the election, claiming that electronic voting machines malfunctioned and that state officials wrongly certified the election in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan. She also filed a lawsuit asking for access to the source code of the machines, manufactured by Election Systems & Software Inc. Two weeks after the Nov. 7 election, the state certified Buchanan as the winner by 369 votes. Jennings wants a new vote. If she prevails, the Democratic gains in the midterm elections will increase to 31 House seats." The Post notes that on Election Day, "18,000 Sarasota County voters who went to the polls registered no choice in the congressional race. Jennings argued that that was evidence of a machine glitch, but the state indicated that it found no evidence of one. ES&S also rejected her argument, and Buchanan said she should concede.

WPost Blasts Bush Over Failure To Respond To Question On DC Voting Rights. The Washington Post (12/24, B6, 690K), in an editorial, writes that Post reporters asked President, "Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?" during an interview last week. President Bush responded, "I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes. … I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes." The Post notes, "In fact no one was asking that the president comment on specific legislation. He could easily have responded this way: 'I know that citizens of the District of Columbia pay taxes for their country, and I know many of them have gone to war for their country. They should have a say in how their country is ruled. I look forward to working with Congress to find the best way to make that happen.' Instead we get squirming evasions and feeble humor. To be honest, we don't find it funny; if anything, it's pathetic that six years into his presidency Mr. Bush can't bring himself to endorse basic rights for residents of his current hometown."

Gender Pay Gap In US No Longer Narrowing. The New York Times (12/24, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "Throughout the 1980s and early '90s, women of all economic levels — poor, middle class and rich — were steadily gaining ground on their male counterparts in the work force. … Largely without notice, however, one big group of women has stopped making progress: those with a four-year college degree. The gap between their pay and the pay of male college graduates has actually widened slightly since the mid-'90s. For women without a college education, the pay gap with men has narrowed only slightly over the same span." The Times adds, "A decade ago, it was possible to imagine that men and women with similar qualifications might one day soon be making nearly identical salaries. Today, that is far harder to envision. … Last year, college-educated women between 36 and 45 years old, for example, earned 74.7 cents in hourly pay for every dollar that men in the same group did, according to Labor Department data analyzed by the Economic Policy Institute . A decade earlier, the women earned 75.7 cents."

DOJ_NMG_0108911

Professor Says Departments At Fault Over Taser Misuse. Larry Karson, a professor of criminal justice at the University of Houston, writes in the Houston Chronicle (12/24, 530K) that "another politician, this time state Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston, has joined the band wagon for 'fixing' the Taser problem by suggesting that legislation is needed to put a moratorium on the use of the stun guns by the police." Karson argued that while "there have been numerous cases nationwide of poorly trained officers and negligent managers who have allowed the continued misuse of Tasers," the fault "doesn't always fall at the feet of the street officers." Rather he suggested that the "for real reason Tasers are consistently misused in some departments, look to management."

ANTITRUST:

Computer Chip Industry Probe Noted. In an article on the year's top computer-related news stories, PC World (12/24, Ben Ames) reports on its Web site that the Department of Justice launched a probe in October "of sales practices in the SRAM memory chip market, serving subpoenas to Cypress Semiconductor, Mitsubishi Electric, Samsung Electronics, Sony Electronics, and Toshiba." The investigation came shortly after the Justice Department won "convictions and multimillion-dollar fines for price fixing in the closely related DRAM industry." In December, the Justice Department also turned "its focus to graphics chips makers, demanding documents from AMD and Nvidia as part of an antitrust investigation."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA Approves Hydrogen-Powered Zero-Emission Cars. The Los Angeles Times (12/24, 850K) reports the EPA "has cleared the way for automakers to produce hydrogen-powered fuel-cell cars to meet zero-emission vehicle requirements in California and 10 other states. In a waiver signed last week, EPA officials approved amendments adopted in 2003 by the California Air Resources Board that allow manufacturers to produce fuel cells as an alternative to battery-powered cars and light trucks previously required by the state. … Automakers had mixed reactions. General Motors spokesman Dave Barthmuss said fuel-cell vehicles were 'very viable to be a portion of any automaker's compliance strategy.'" Ford Motor Co. "said that much uncertainty remains about fuel-cell vehicles, and that the company agrees with a U.S. Energy Department forecast that the vehicles won't be available in large numbers before 2015."

Will Notes Challenges Facing New Ford CEO. In his column for the Washington Post (12/24, B7, 690K) George Will writes, "If Alan Mulally, Ford Motor Co.'s chief executive, is looking for fresh words to inspirit his troubled company -- words to replace 'The Way Forward,' which rang hollow as Ford slid further backward. … Henry Ford, according to Mulally, said that if, when he founded his company, he had asked potential customers what they wanted, they would have said faster horses. Mulally has bet the company on its ability to develop 'curb appeal' products that people do not yet know they want and to develop them before the company, which burned through about $6 billion in the last two quarters of 2006, burns the rest of its borrowed cash."

Timber Firms' Green-Friendly Reputation Challenged. The Washington Post (12/24, A3, Harden, 690K) reports, "Two of the nation's largest timber companies, Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek Timber, have polished their public images for years by participating in a program that certifies that their logging is environmentally friendly. But in separate challenges this month from the far corners of the United States, environmental groups in Washington state and in Maine are accusing Weyerhaeuser Co. and Plum Creek Timber Co. of using the forest industry's green-labeling program as a cover while they log in ways that harm endangered spotted owls in Washington and violate forestry laws in Maine. The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine have demanded in documents sent to the Sustainable Forestry Board that it revoke certification for the companies until they comply with standards they have pledged to uphold. Both companies say the demands are unjustified and show ignorance of relevant facts."

DOJ_NMG_0108912

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Texas Cigarette Tax To Increase In New Year. The Dallas Morning News (12/24, Brooks, 500K) reports taxes on cigarettes in Texas are scheduled to "go up at least $1 per pack and about $12 per carton" after the New Year. Anticipation is "already rising among smokers and nonsmokers" and "convenience stores are bracing for a drop in sales. Discount shops are running out of some brands." Meanwhile, distributors are "liquidating their inventories. And federal agents are keeping an eye on the situation after tax increases in other states led to robberies and smuggling rings."

Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Handgun Permits. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (12/24, 223K) reports that "Texans who are 55 or older are more likely to get concealed handgun permits than those who are in their 20s, 30s and 40s, according to Texas Department of Public Safety statistics," a figure that "falls in line with national surveys that indicate seniors are more likely than any other age group to be gun owners." The Star-Telegram writes, "In Texas, 42 percent of those who have concealed handgun permits are 55 or older. Texans who are 60 or older have about 25 percent of the permits issued, statistics show."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Retirements Could Allow Democrats To Increase Majority In 2008. The Washington Post (12/24, A4, Murray, 690K) reports, "The Republicans' stinging losses last month could be magnified in 2008 if veteran GOP Senate and House members decide to retire, including numerous lawmakers who will be 70 or older on that Election Day. .. GOP leaders are particularly fearful that the Democrats will be able to expand their narrow House and Senate majorities if some of Congress's biggest Republican names call it quits." The Post notes Sen. Ted Stevens was born on Nov. 18, 1923, while in the House, as many as 30 Republicans may retire, according to operatives from both parties, with senior lawmakers including Reps. Ralph Regula (Ohio), 82, and C.W. Bill Young of Florida, who turned 76 on Dec. 16, leading the list." Sen. John Warner "has indicated that he may seek a sixth term, if he remains in good health." The Post goes on to report that Sen. Wayne Allard "has been the subject of considerable speculation" because "he promised to serve only two terms when he was elected in 1996. Colorado just elected a Democratic governor, and the state is considered fertile ground for the Democrats' Western expansion efforts."

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule; at Camp David for Christmas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session.

US House: Not in session.

Other: No events scheduled.

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Iran Rejects Resolution Against Nuclear Program."
"Schwarzenegger Breaks Leg Skiing."
"The Man Behind The Obama-Mania."
"Aiding And Abetting The Taliban?"

New York Times:
"Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops."
"For Young Offenders, Justice As Impoverished As Africa."
"Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place."
"Testing The Waters, Obama Tests His Own Limits."
"Hotel Log Hints At Illicit Desire That Dr. Freud Didn't Repress."

Washington Post:
"Special Agent."
"Trees For All The Troops."
"Sanctions On Iran Approved By U.N."
"Clinton, Obama Clearing The Field."
"Lebanon's Slow Slide From Hope To Deadlock."

Washington Times:
"U.N. Panel OKs Curbs On Iran Trade."
"Bridging A Faith Divide."
"Air Strike Kills Top Taliban Tactician."
"Olmert To Remit Withheld Taxes, Lift Roadblocks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Michigan Soldiers Come Home For The Holidays."
"Man Arraigned In Killing Of Detroit Mom, Daughter."
"Pistons Swat Undermanned Hawks."

Dallas Morning News:
"Oak Cliff Loses An Anchor."
"Dyncorp Has Big Role, Little Oversight In War Efforts."
"Arlington Volunteers Rebuild Church In New Orleans."
"Girl, 2, Fatally Stabbed In Group Of Kids."
"Chance Of White Christmas In Forecast For Area."
"Rangers Trade Danks For Pitching Help."

DOJ_NMG_0108913

"Tech's Knight Ties Record For Coaching Wins."
"West End Is On The Mend."
"Police: 2-Year-Old May Have Been Stabbed By Child."

Houston Chronicle:
"GOP Rival Threatens Craddick's House Rule."
"Shuttle Crew Welcomed Home In Houston."
"Seniors More Likely To Get Concealed Gun Permits."
"Fire-Devastated Towns Hope For Wet Texas Winter."
"Proposed Bill Would Lock In Texas Tuition Rates."
"Bars, Wine-Tasting Rooms Lure Houston Renters."
"West Point Officers Say Duty Called Too Late."
"Holidays Enhance Grief For Fallen Soldiers' Families."
"Denver Travelers May Not Be Home For Christmas."
"Evidence Suggests Freud's Slip With Sister-In-Law."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Bush Meets With Gates; Iran Sanctions; Overstretched Military; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Travel Delays; Last-Minute Shopping; Documentary On Race; Horse Racing; Kentucky Artist.
CBS: Last-Minute Shopping; Travel Delays; Iran Sanctions; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Bush Meets With Gates; Iraq's Christians At Christmas; Texas Tech Basketball; Weekend Journal-Peace On Earth; Snow Globes.
NBC: Travel Delays; Iran Sanctions; Bush Meets With Gates; Iraq Sectarian Violence; Olmert-Abbas Meeting; Taliban Death; Christmas In Afghanistan; Last-Minute Shopping; Duke Rape Case; Sewing; Christmas Greetings.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0108914

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Tuesday, December 26, 2006 9:41 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, December 24, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061224.pdf; dojclips061224.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

War News:
New Pentagon Chief Briefs Bush On Iraq (AP)....1
Bush, Gates Consult Over Iraq War Strategy (HC/AP)....3
Gates Gives Bush Evaluation Of Iraq War (WP)....4
Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops (NYT)....5
Top Shiite Cleric Balks At Plan For Iraq (AP)....6
Key Iraqi Cleric Rejects U.S. Bid For Moderate Political Bloc (WP)....7
Yes, You Are The Person Of The Year! (NYT)....8
U.S. Airstrike Kills Close Ally Of Bin Laden, Pentagon Says (NYT/AP)....10
Taliban Figure Killed In Airstrike, U.S. Says (WP)....11
Aiding And Abetting The Taliban? (LAT)....11

Corporate Scandals:
Can Private Equity Build A Public Face? (NYT)....14
U.S. Attorney On The Record: Kevin Ryan (SFC)....17

Criminal Law:
The Right Has A Jailhouse Conversion (NYT)....21
Md. Death Penalty May Come To Fore (WP)....27

Civil Rights:
Election Challenge For Florida District Is Taken To The House (WP)....29
Quasi-Freedom Agenda (WP)....30
Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place (NYT)....31
Taser Debate (HC)....33

Antitrust:
2006: The Year In PCs And Chips (PCWORLD)....35

Environment/Indian Affairs:
EPA OKs Fuel-cell Car Production (LAT)....36
Ford Tries To Outrace The Repo Man (WP)....37
Two Timber Firms Pretending To Be 'Green,' Groups Allege (WP)....38

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Cigarette Tax Set To Take A Big Leap (DMN)....40
Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Weapons Permits (AP)....42

Congress-Administration:
Parties Urge Aging Lawmakers To Hang On For One More Term (WP)....42

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

WAR NEWS:

New Pentagon Chief Briefs Bush On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 24, 2006

President Bush, drafting an overhaul of his faltering and unpopular war plan, heard Saturday from a Pentagon chief who had just returned from Iraq with a positive impression of Iraqi leaders' plans to address sectarian violence.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates finished his first week on the job by delivering a report to Bush on the three days he spent talking with Iraqi leaders, U.S. commanders and American soldiers. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, who traveled with Gates to Iraq, helped make the presentation.

The early-morning meeting at Camp David in Maryland's mountains lasted about an hour. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Hadley's deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is coordinating the administration's Iraq review, also participated.

White House officials declined to disclose any details of the conversations. Bush is meeting with his national security team again Thursday at his ranch in Crawford, Texas.

"The president is pleased with the progress being made" to design a new policy, said Blain Rethmeier, a Bush spokesman. "The president is leaving all options on the table on the way forward."

With public support for the war falling as violence and U.S. deaths rise, Bush has been eager to show he is ready to make changes — even while he rejects calls from Democrats, who take control of Congress next month, for significant troop withdrawals to begin soon. The president has talked often in recent weeks about the long commitment America must make to Iraq.

He is expect to announce his revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between the New Year's Day and his Jan. 23 State of the Union address.

"If you're serving on the front lines halfway across the world, it is natural to wonder what all this means for you," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq."

There are several signs that a proposal to add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq — as a way to control escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad — is gaining favor at the White House.

The Los Angeles Times reported Saturday that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and other military leaders in Iraq, who had been the primary voices skeptical of a "surge" in troops, have decided to endorse the idea.

But Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, spokesman for Casey, said Saturday, "As of this time, General Casey has not recommended more troops be sent here." Rethmeier would neither confirm nor deny the Times story.

Bush has said he has changed his mind and now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years, but still could address some doubts in the military about the drain of even a short-term boost in Iraq.

And while saying he has not decided whether to deploy more U.S. soldiers, the president gave another nod to military leaders this week by making clear he agrees that any such troop infusion must have a mission that is clear and achievable.

During Gates' trip to Iraq, several soldiers told him they thought a short-term increase in troop levels would help. But the defense secretary repeatedly declined to say whether he would recommend such an increase.

Some important players at the Pentagon remain unconvinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good by giving Iraqis incentive not to make their own inroads. Democrats and other critics also fear American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are forced by the prospect of an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers to make progress.

While in Baghdad, Gates did praise Iraqi leaders for having "some concrete plans in mind" to deal with the deadly militias that have brought the country to the brink of civil war between the Shiite majority and Sunni minority. He left Casey with the assignment of putting "flesh on those bones" in consultations over the next few days with the Iraqi government, which has had little success so far reining in the militias or quelling the bloodshed.

Bush has said all along that U.S. troops cannot come home until Iraqis are able to secure and defend their own country without significant American assistance.

The military component of Bush's upcoming plan has drawn the most attention, but it is only one part of what is expected to be a multi-pronged strategy.

It also will include a way to improve the dismal economic picture in Iraq and a new approach to both diplomacy in the region and to the delicate — and deadly — political situation inside Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0108917

Bush, Gates Consult Over Iraq War Strategy (HC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Moving closer to an overhaul of troubled war strategy, President Bush today heard firsthand from his new Pentagon chief, just back from a visit to Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, finishing up his first week on the job, spent three days in Iraq before heading straight to Camp David in Maryland to report to the president on his conversations with Iraqi leaders and U.S. commanders and soldiers. While in Iraq, Gates expressed confidence that Iraqis can take the lead in reducing the violence and warned Iran and Syria not to meddle in their neighbor's affairs.

Bush, who is spending Christmas at the presidential retreat, was joined by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Hadley's deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is coordinating the administration's Iraq review.

A White House spokesman, Blain Rethmeier, said "the president is pleased with the progress being made" on crafting a new policy. The White House would provide no details of the hourlong discussion.

Bush has said he cannot settle on a revised war plan without input from Gates, who took over from Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Defense Department on Monday. The president is expect to announce his revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between the New Year's Day and Jan. 23, when he gives his State of the Union address.

The president is considering adding thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq as a way to control escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad.

The Los Angeles Times reported today that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and other military leaders in Iraq once skeptical of a "surge" in troops have decided to endorse the idea. Rethmeier would neither confirm nor deny the story.

Some important voices at the Pentagon, however, are not convinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good.

Democrats about to take control of Congress and other war critics fear that American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are threatened with an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers and forced to meet specific benchmarks.

Bush has changed his mind and now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years but still could address some doubts in the military about a short-term boost in Iraq.

While saying he has not decided whether to deploy more U.S. soldiers, the president has given another nod to military leaders by making clear he agrees that any such mission is only feasible if there is a defined mission that is clear and achievable.

Before leaving Baghdad, Gates would not say whether he supports a short-term troop increase. He did speak optimistically about Iraq's political leaders' commitment to taking over their own security and ability to deal with the militias that have brought the country to the brink of civil war.

The military component of Bush's upcoming plan has drawn the most attention. But it is only one part of what is expected to be a multi-pronged strategy.

It also will include a way to improve the economic picture in Iraq and a new approach to both diplomacy in the region and to the delicate — and deadly — political situation inside Iraq.

An anti-American, most Sunni insurgency has been replaced this year as the chief source of violence by bloodshed between Sunni and Shiite factions.

With public support for the war falling as violence and U.S. deaths rise, Bush has been eager to show he is ready to make changes, even while he rejects calls from many Democrats for significant troop withdrawals to begin soon. The president has talked often in recent weeks about the long commitment America must make to Iraq.

"Things are moving in a positive direction. But it's going to be a long haul," Gates said during his visit.

Looking ahead, the president has called a meeting of his National Security Council on Thursday at his Crawford, Texas, ranch.

"If you're serving on the front lines halfway across the world, it is natural to wonder what all this means for you," the president said today in his weekly radio address, taped before he left Washington on Friday for the holiday.

DOJ_NMG_0108918

"I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq."

Also today, Bush called El Salvador's president, Tony Saca, to thank the country for extending its troop presence in Iraq.

Despite public sentiment against it, El Salvador's legislature this month approved Saca's request. The contingent scheduled to remain another year could be smaller than the 380 soldiers that have been in Iraq, mainly for humanitarian and rebuilding work.

———

Associated Press writer Lolita C. Baldor contributed to this report.

Gates Gives Bush Evaluation Of Iraq War (WP)

By Peter Baker And Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Defense Secretary Shares Post-Trip Impressions as Strategy Review Continues

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates headed to Camp David yesterday to brief President Bush and his national security team on his impressions from Iraq as the administration accelerated a debate over a proposed short-term escalation in troop levels to turn around the war.

Gates brought back from Baghdad a plan put forth by Iraqi leaders that would redefine the U.S. mission to focus more on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-led government tries to contain Shiite militias. He also brought back views from U.S. commanders on the ground, who have said publicly that they are open to a so-called surge in troops if their mission is clearly defined.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted additional troops unless a clear, achievable mission is defined and believe the White House is putting forward an ill-conceived idea in a desperate bid to salvage the situation. The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the top commanders in Iraq, have decided to recommend the surge, a position that if true could make it easier for Bush to go forward even if Pentagon generals remain unenthusiastic.

It was unclear, however, whether Casey was genuinely supporting a buildup or simply restating privately what he has already said publicly. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea," if sending more troops would help achieve strategic objectives, he said at a Baghdad news conference with Gates last week.

The White House and Pentagon officially had no comment. A Pentagon official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions, said it would be an exaggeration to say that Casey is pushing for additional troops.

"To say that Casey wants more forces, that isn't the case," the official said. Indeed, he said, Casey told Gates in Iraq that an infusion of U.S. forces would not help him politically with the Iraqi government and could impede reconciliation efforts.

"Casey's position all along has been, 'If you want to put additional forces in, I'm not opposed to that -- if it serves the strategic purpose, which is to put Iraqis in the lead,' " the official said.

Casey and Gates agreed that under the current "clear, hold and build" approach, more U.S. troops would be useful only as part of a broader reconstruction effort to hold areas after they have been cleared. This would involve immediate work such as garbage removal, followed by infrastructure projects.

Gates met for an hour at the presidential retreat with Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II.

"The president is pleased with the progress being made" in the strategy review, White House spokesman Blain K. Rethmeier said. He declined to discuss the briefing in detail.

During his trip, Gates was presented a two-pronged plan by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in which U.S. forces would target Sunni insurgents in Baghdad's outer neighborhoods instead of Shiite militias while Iraqi forces would take over security of the city center. Maliki would work to contain his fellow Shiite, Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia. Under the plan, Maliki would accept an increase in U.S. troops in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0108919

Bush had hoped to unveil a fresh approach to Iraq before Christmas but delayed a decision until next month so Gates could make his own evaluation. Gates, who was sworn in to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld on Monday, had privately been critical of the war. The National Security Council will meet again Thursday at Bush's ranch near Crawford, Tex.

Bush used his weekly radio address to pay tribute to troops serving far from families at Christmas.

"I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq," he said. "The American people are keeping you in our thoughts and prayers, and we will make sure you have the resources you need to accomplish your mission."

Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23 — The American military command in Iraq is now willing to back a temporary increase in American troops in Baghdad as part of a broader Iraqi and United States effort to stem the slide toward chaos, senior American officials said Saturday.

President Bush and his advisers were told Saturday of the new position when Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates met with them at Camp David, an administration official said.

Until recently, the top ground commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has argued that sending more American forces into Baghdad and Anbar Province, the two most violent regions of Iraq, would increase the Iraqi dependency on Washington, and in the words of one senior official, "make this feel more like an occupation."

But General Casey and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who has day-to-day command of American forces in Iraq, indicated they were open to a troop increase when Mr. Gates met with them in Baghdad this week.

"They are open to the possibility of some increase in force," a senior Defense Department official said. "They are supportive of taking steps to support the Iraqis in their plan, including the possible modest augmentation in U.S. combat forces."

"Nobody has decided anything yet and they have not made a formal recommendation," the official continued. "They are open to the idea of such an option and are weighing how best to execute it and what the traffic will bear with the Iraqis."

The possible increase in troops, officials said, ranges from fewer than 10,000 to as many as 30,000.

Politically, winning the support of American generals for the additional troops is crucial to Mr. Bush if he hopes to make the increase part of the new strategy he is expected to announce in early January.

Over the past two weeks, Mr. Bush has appeared at odds with the generals in some of his comments, as the White House veered toward strategies that involve a greater show of force and some members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff questioned whether a "surge" in forces would make a lasting difference.

The Camp David meeting convened by President Bush included Mr. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, for what the White House called a chance for Mr. Gates, who took office this week, to report on his findings. Mr. Bush plans to convene a full meeting of the National Security Council on Thursday at his ranch in Crawford, Tex.

The key to any new strategy, some officials said, would be a binding commitment by the Iraqi government that it would provide far more troops as well, and take other steps to try to slow the sectarian violence. The government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has repeatedly stressed the desire to take charge of the security situation in Baghdad, but failed to send most of the reinforcements the Americans requested this summer during a beefed-up effort to quell the violence.

It is unclear how Mr. Bush plans to enforce any commitments from Mr. Maliki, but Mr. Gates said in Baghdad before flying home that he sensed "a broad strategic agreement between the Iraqi military and Iraqi government and our military."

"There is still some work to be done," he said. "But I do expect to give a report to the president on what I've learned and my perceptions." Mr. Gates was joined on his Iraq tour by officials from the White House and other parts of the government.

Administration officials, who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to publicly discuss internal deliberations, said that General Casey had not yet submitted a formal recommendation to Mr. Gates and Mr. Bush. Mr. Gates, they said, asked General Casey to enter into final discussions with Iraqi officials on the specifics of their role.

DOJ_NMG_0108920

But officials said General Casey was coming closer to the position of General Odierno that a greater a show of force would be critical to the effort to contain the Sunni insurgency and tamp down the violence by Shiite militias. The shift in the general's position was first reported in The Los Angeles Times on Saturday.

General Casey has long argued that the principal emphasis of American policy should be on training Iraqi security forces, and handing over responsibility to the Iraqi military and police. In a plan General Casey presented in Washington in June, he anticipated reducing some American combat troops in September. But his plan was shelved after the surge in violence in Iraq.

As the sectarian killings escalated, the White House began to explore the option of sending more troops as a broader strategy to secure Baghdad. The idea was raised in a November memo prepared by Mr. Hadley. Mr. Bush discussed the option during a recent meeting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff that was organized as part of the administration's Iraq strategy review.

Some generals appeared notably unenthusiastic. Some members of the Joint Chiefs appeared worried about the strain it would place on the Army and the Marines. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander for the Middle East, told Congress last month that adding 20,000 troops would improve security, but argued that the effect would only be temporary because the United States military was not large enough to sustain such an increase indefinitely.

As for General Casey, he suggested Wednesday that he was neither the originator of the idea nor actively lobbying for it. At the same time, he indicated that he was not adamantly opposed to it. "Additional troops have to be for a purpose," the general said. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea, but what I want to see happen is, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress toward our strategic objectives."

Should Mr. Bush decide to send more troops, General Casey's backing for a such a step would help the president deal with Congressional critics, who have pressed the administration to begin a withdrawal. It would also aid him with Republicans, some of whom were taken aback this week when Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state who also served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Mr. Bush had not yet clearly defined a role for additional troops that made it worth the projected casualties and deeper American involvement.

Mr. Gates said during the trip that he did not believe that Iraqi leaders were deeply split on the question of an increase in the American presence. Mr. Maliki proposed a plan to Mr. Bush in their meeting last month in Amman, Jordan, under which the Iraqis would assume direct command of its 10 Army divisions and a National Police division by June.

The Iraqi prime minister also proposed that his government assume the primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over the next several months while most American forces would move to the periphery of the city. The idea of moving American troops to the capital's outskirts is consistent with General Casey's long-term plan, but the Iraqi time frame is far more compressed. Some of Mr. Bush's aides have expressed concern that the Iraqis' desire for control outstrips their capacity.

However, as a political matter, officials said, it is crucial that Mr. Bush be able to announce that any increase in American troops will be made in parallel with a similar commitment by the Iraqis, and that the eventual goal of the strategy is to put the Iraqis in the lead. The Iraqis promised to send two brigades of Iraqi Army troops this summer, but most of the troops never arrived.

Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who oversees the training of Iraq's security forces, said this week that he was overhauling his training efforts so that Iraqi Army units would be easier to deploy, including providing more pay.

"We've got two or three brigade headquarters and six additional battalions that are scheduled now over the next couple of months to come to Baghdad," he said. An Iraqi battalion nominally has more than 700 soldiers, but the actual number is often far less, since many soldiers are on scheduled leaves or absent without leave.

Top Shiite Cleric Balks At Plan For Iraq (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 24, 2006

A U.S.-backed plan to form a political coalition of Iraq's Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds — a glimmer of hope in a nation torn by sectarian violence — failed to win the crucial support of the top Shiite cleric Saturday.

Lawmakers who presented the plan to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf said they were told the unity of Shiites, who have the largest bloc in parliament, had to come first.

DOJ_NMG_0108921

By shunning the coalition plan, al-Sistani sought to unite the Shiite's fractured 130-member United Iraqi Alliance. But his decision — which carries great weight with the country's Shiite majority — significantly weakens American hopes for a national unity government and strengthens the hand of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Sistani's decision may not doom the proposed coalition, but it significantly reduces its chances.

"There are obstacles in the face of forming this coalition, because al-Sistani does not support it," said Hassan al-Suneid, a top aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

An official close to al-Sistani, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media, said the cleric "will not bless nor support any new bloc or front. He only supports the unity of the Shiites."

The proposed coalition — which would not have included al-Sadr's supporters — could have isolated the militant cleric, commander of a militia army blamed for many sectarian attacks.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday in separate roadside blasts near Baghdad, the U.S. military said. One bomb exploded southeast of the capital near a patrol searching for "suspected terrorists," it said. That blast also wounded four other U.S. soldiers. The other bomb exploded southwest of Baghdad, near a patrol delivering supplies to units in the area.

Police in Baghdad said they discovered 47 bodies — apparent victims of violence between Sunni and Shiites.

Meanwhile, President Bush met with his new defense secretary Robert Gates at his presidential retreat in Camp David, Md., to discuss military options for Iraq including a proposal to send thousands more troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq to try to quell escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad.

The president is expect to announce a revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between New Year's Day and Jan. 23, when he gives his State of the Union address.

In Iraq, the focus was on politics. Several weeks ago, 30 Iraqi lawmakers and six Cabinet ministers who support al-Sadr launched a boycott of the government. They were protesting a meeting between the prime minister and President Bush.

Now the 275-member Iraqi parliament is in virtual paralysis.

On Saturday, the same Shiite delegation in Najaf that courted al-Sistani tried to persuade al-Sadr to bring his supporters back into government. Al-Sadr did not give a definite answer, according to some of those who met with him.

"He will give his final decision whether to rejoin the government and parliament after Eid al-Adha," Khaled al-Attiya, an independent who is parliament's deputy speaker, said after the meeting. Iraq's Shiites will celebrate the holiday from Dec. 31 to Jan. 4.

Some of al-Sadr's aides had earlier said he would soon end his political boycott and call off attacks by his militia, at least temporarily.

But al-Sistani's rejection of the new coalition — which would have excluded al-Sadr's supporters — strengthened his hand.

Al-Sistani holds no political post and rarely emerges from his home and adjacent office. But his word is considered law by many Shiites.

Despite this, Shiite militants, including members of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, have not heeded al-Sistani's appeals for peace in Iraq. Many Iraqis on both sides of the sectarian divide view militias as their only form of defense.

One of al-Sadr's key demands is a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq.

Without progress toward political reconciliation in Iraq, some observers say, the security situation in the country is likely to remain grim.

In violence on Saturday, an Iraqi military intelligence officer was killed in a drive-by shooting south of Baghdad, police said. Six civilians were killed when a mortar shell hit a house in Baqouba, north of the capital. U.S.-led forces raided a militant hide out in Ramadi, west of Baghdad, killing one person and detaining nine.

Key Iraqi Cleric Rejects U.S. Bid For Moderate Political Bloc (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Saad Sarhan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 23 -- Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric has rejected calls for a U.S.-backed effort to form a bloc of moderate Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish leaders to isolate extremists in the government, Shiite leaders said Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0108922

Members of the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite coalition in parliament, said they discussed the bloc with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani during a two-hour meeting at his home in Najaf on Saturday.

U.S. leaders say that such a bloc, proposed by national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley in a leaked Nov. 8 White House memo, would dampen the influence of firebrand Shiite cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr by bolstering his political rivals.

Sistani's endorsement of the proposal was considered key. But during the meeting, Shiite leaders said, Sistani called on them to keep the 130-member United Iraqi Alliance intact.

"Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani is against any coalition that might weaken the United Iraqi Alliance," said Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party.

Maliki and the Dawa party, part of the United Iraqi Alliance, have been unenthusiastic about the proposal from the beginning because they believe that isolating Sadr would exacerbate tensions. Maliki is beholden to Sadr, who supported his bid to become prime minister.

In recent days, spokesmen for Sistani have denied media reports that he had tentatively approved the coalition and said he was neither supporting nor opposing it and was interested simply in keeping Shiites united.

Basher al-Assadi, a deputy to Sistani, said the cleric "has not given his blessing to the new alliance because it is not complete, as other forces have been excluded from it."

Abdul Karim al-Inazi, another member of the Dawa party, said the leaders do not want to exclude Sadr from the political process. Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament. "We believe the Sadr trend is one of the important blocs," Inazi said. "They are present, and we do not want any group to be weakened."

To some extent, Sadr has already isolated himself from other Shiite leaders, some of whom consider him too confrontational. Last month, he ordered his loyalists to withdraw from parliament to protest Maliki's decision to meet in Jordan with President Bush.

Shortly after ending their discussion with Sistani on Saturday, the Shiite leaders visited Sadr at his home in Najaf and urged him to allow his loyalists to return to government.

Haidar al-Ubadi, a senior official of the Dawa party, said, "Our brothers in the Sadr bloc are on their way to returning to the government and the parliament."

But other participants said Sadr's response was not definitive and more discussions were needed. "I hope that this crisis will be over soon, just after one or two meetings with his eminence and the Sadr bloc," Inazi said.

Meanwhile, the southern city of Samawah remained under curfew a day after clashes between Iraqi forces and Shiite militiamen loyal to Sadr, in which five people were killed and 17 were wounded, the Associated Press reported.

Southwest of Baghdad, a U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Saturday while delivering supplies, the U.S. military said. A separate roadside blast killed one U.S. soldier and wounded four others on patrol southeast of the capital, the Associated Press reported. In Diyala province, four police officers were killed in clashes with armed groups, local police said.

Sarhan reported from Najaf. Special correspondent Waleed Saffar in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Yes, You Are The Person Of The Year! (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

TIME'S choice for 2006 Person of the Year — "You" — was a bountiful gift of mirth to America, second only to the championship Donald Trump-Rosie O'Donnell bout as a comic kickoff to the holiday season. The magazine's cover stunt, a computer screen of Mylar reflecting the reader's own image, was so hokey that Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert merely had to display it on camera to score laughs. The magazine's disingenuous rationale for bestowing its yearly honor on its readers was like a big wet kiss from a distant relative who creeps you out.

According to Time, "You" deserve to be Person of the Year because you — "yes, you," as the cover puts it — "control the Information Age" and spend a lot of time watching YouTube and blogging instead of, well, reading dead-tree media like Time. The pronouncements ginned up to inflate this theme include the observation that "Thomas Paine was in effect the first blogger" (which presumably makes the Old Testament in effect the first Facebook). The desperation of Time to appear relevant and hip

DOJ_NMG_0108923

— "fantastically cutting-edge and New Media," as Nora Ephron put it in a hilarious essay for The Huffington Post — was embarrassing in its nakedness.

And sad. This editorial pratfall struck me, once a proud Time staff member, as a sign that my journalistic alma mater might go the way of the old Life. Like Time today, Life in the late 1960s was a middle-of-the-road publishing fixture sent into an identity crisis by the cultural revolution that coincided with a calamitous war. The fabled weekly finally shut down in 1972, the year Rolling Stone celebrated its fifth anniversary.

Let's hope publishing history doesn't repeat itself. So in Time's defense, let me say that the more I reflected on its 2006 Person of the Year — or perhaps the more that Mylar cover reflected back at me — the more I realized that the magazine wasn't as out of touch as it first seemed. Time made the right choice, albeit for the wrong reasons.

As our country sinks deeper into a quagmire — and even a conclusive Election Day repudiation of the war proves powerless to stop it — we the people, and that includes, yes, you, will seek out any escape hatch we can find. In the Iraq era, the dropout nostrums of choice are not the drugs and drug culture of Vietnam but the equally masturbatory and narcissistic (if less psychedelic) pastimes of the Internet. Why not spend hour upon hour passionately venting in the blogosphere, as Time suggests, about our "state of mind or the state of the nation or the steak-frites at the new bistro down the street"? Or an afternoon surfing from video to video on YouTube, where short-attention-span fluff is infinite? It's more fun than the nightly news, which, as Laura Bush reminded us this month, has been criminally lax in unearthing all those "good things that are happening" in Baghdad.

As of Friday morning, "Britney Spears Nude on Beach" had been viewed 1,041,776 times by YouTube's visitors. The count for YouTube video clips tagged with "Iraq" was 22,783. Not that there is anything wrong with that. But compulsive blogging and free soft-core porn are not, as Time would have it, indications of how much you, I and that glassy-eyed teenage boy hiding in his bedroom are in control of the Information Age. They are indicators instead of how eager we are to flee from brutal real-world information that makes us depressed and angry. This was the year Americans escaped as often as they could into their private pleasure pods. So the Person of 2006 was indeed you — yes, you.

Unless it was Borat. The often uproarious farce that took its name from that hopelessly dense and bigoted fictional TV correspondent from Kazakhstan was the year's most revealing hit movie. It was escapism incarnate, and we couldn't eat it up fast enough. "Borat" also encapsulated the rising xenophobia that feeds American fantasies of the ultimate national escape: fencing off our borders from the world. If its loutish title character hadn't been invented by Sacha Baron Cohen for us to ridicule and feel morally superior to, then Lou Dobbs would have done it for him.

The second most revealing movie hit of this escapist year was "Casino Royale." Though technically an updating of the old Bond franchise — it is, nominally at least, set in the present — its screenplay actually hewed closely to the original Ian Fleming novel of 1953. The film merely changed the villain from a lethal Soviet operative to a terrorist financier, thereby recasting the confusing, hydra-headed threat of Al Qaeda and its ilk as a manageable, easily identifiable enemy that 007 could vanquish as decisively as the ham-fisted Iron Curtain Commies. Better still, Daniel Craig's James Bond smites the terrorists in two hours plus change, not the 24 hours it takes Kiefer Sutherland's Jack Bauer. There could be no happier fairy tale for a country looking in the eye of defeat.

"Christ, I miss the cold war," M, Bond's boss at British intelligence, says early on in "Casino Royale." M — the reassuring Judi Dench — speaks for the entire audience. Nostalgia for the cold war, which America won unambiguously, was visible everywhere this year as we lost a war that has divided the country. In Florida, there was a joyous countdown to Fidel Castro's imminent demise. At NASA, there was a new plan to return to the moon. Throughout the news media, there was a Hannibal Lecterish pleasure in the excruciating physical decline of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB spy murdered by poison. As the CNN anchor John Roberts put it rather gleefully, "For many of us, headlines out of London seemed like a James Bond movie or a distant echo of the cold war." Heaven knows those headlines were easier to take than those coming out of the hot war — or, for that matter, out of London itself when terrorists struck there 18 months ago. It's no surprise that "Casino Royale" sold way more tickets than "World Trade Center" and "United 93" combined.

The most revealing index of our lust for escapism this year cannot be found at YouTube or the multiplex, however, but in the sideshow villains who distracted us from main news events in the Middle East: James Frey, Mel Gibson, Michael Richards and Judith Regan. It was a thrill beyond schadenfreude to watch them be soundly thrashed and humiliated for their sins.

DOJ_NMG_0108924

FAR be it for me to defend any of them; Mr. Gibson once threatened to have my "intestines on a stick" after I raised the notion that the author of "The Passion of the Christ" might be an anti-Semite. But our over-the-top pleasure in their comeuppance still seems like escapist fare. It may be satisfying to see "Apocalypto" fade fast after its opening weekend or watch Ms. Regan lose her job after enriching O. J. Simpson for a sleazy book project. Yet something is out of whack when these relatively minor miscreants are publicly stoned and the architects of a needless catastrophe that has cost thousands of American and Iraqi lives escape scot-free. On the same day that Ms. Regan was canned, the fired Donald Rumsfeld was given a 19-gun salute and showered with presidential praise in a farewell ceremony at the Pentagon.

For that matter, Ms. Regan's worst offenses can't compare even with those of her former lover, Bernard Kerik, the Giuliani-era New York City police commissioner who was appointed by President Bush in 2003 to train Iraqi's police. Mr. Kerik promised to stay "as long as it takes to get the job done," then fled months later without explanation and without the job even started. Today the Iraqi police he failed to train are not only useless but are also routinely engaged in sectarian violence, including torture, helping to ensure that Iraq is more dangerous for everyone than ever, American troops included.

Mr. Kerik has never been held accountable for that failure, only for less lethal and unrelated graft in New York. Paul Bremer, whose early decisions as our Iraqi viceroy all but guaranteed our defeat, received the highest civilian award from the president. So did both George Tenet, who presided over the "slam dunk" intelligence that sped us to war, and Gen. Tommy Franks, who let Osama bin Laden get away. Even now, no generals have been fired for their failures in Iraq; the only one to lose his job was the former Army chief of staff, Eric Shinseki, who antagonized Mr. Rumsfeld before the war by correctly warning that hundreds of thousands of American troops would be needed to secure Iraq. But never mind. That's ancient history. We can avoid confronting these morally grotesque skeletons in our closet as long as we can distract ourselves with Michael Richards's meltdown.

Besides, it's time for the home front to party. Whatever else is to be said about Time's Mylar cover, it's news you can literally use: it is just a paper shredder away from being recycled as the most glittering of New Year's Eve confetti.

U.S. Airstrike Kills Close Ally Of Bin Laden, Pentagon Says (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 23 (AP) — A leading Taliban military commander described as a close associate of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban leader Mullah Muhammad Omar was killed in an airstrike this week close to the border with Pakistan, the United States military said Saturday. A man identifying himself as a Taliban spokesman denied the report.

The commander, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, , was killed Tuesday by an American airstrike as he traveled by vehicle in a deserted area in Helmand Province in the south, the United States military said. Two of his associates were also killed, it said.

Mr. Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Mullah Omar, is the highest-ranking Taliban leader that the coalition has reported killing or capturing since the American-led invasion in late 2001.

Afghan officials made no immediate confirmation, and no visual proof was offered to support the report. An American spokesman said that "various sources" were used to confirm Mr. Osmani's identity.

A man who identified himself as Qari Yousef Ahmadi and who said he was a Taliban spokesman denied that Mr. Osmani had been killed, saying that the airstrike had instead killed Mullah Abdul Zahir, a group commander, and three other Taliban fighters. "I confirm that Osmani is alive and is in Afghanistan," Mr. Ahmadi said by telephone from an undisclosed location.

Col. Tom Collins, an American military spokesman, said that officials had waited four days to announce the news in part so that they could be sure it was Mr. Osmani who died in the strike.

Mr. Osmani, the Taliban's chief military commander in southern Afghanistan, played a central role in attacks including roadside bombs, suicide attacks and kidnappings, Colonel Collins said.

Mr. Osmani, among "co-equals" at the top of the Taliban leadership chain just under Mullah Omar, was in charge of the movement's finances, Colonel Collins said.

He said that Mr. Osmani had been using both sides of the Afghan-Pakistan border, and that the United States military had been tracking him "for a while."

DOJ_NMG_0108925

Taliban Figure Killed In Airstrike, U.S. Says (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Militia Disputes Report On Bin Laden Associate

A top Taliban leader and close associate of Osama bin Laden has been killed in a U.S. airstrike in southern Afghanistan near the Pakistani border, the U.S. military said in a statement Saturday.

Akhtar Mohammad Osmani was traveling in a deserted area of Helmand province on Tuesday when his vehicle was struck, immediately killing him and two unidentified people, the U.S. military said. Osmani was described as the highest-ranking member of the Taliban killed since late 2001.

"Osmani was in the top ring of the Taliban leadership, and he was also a close associate of Osama bin Laden," said Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. military spokesman. Collins said Osmani also had close ties to Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, an Afghan militia leader once allied with the United States who is now an anti-American fugitive.

The Taliban denied that Osmani had been killed.

U.S. military officials in Kabul, the Afghan capital, said Osmani had been operating on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border. Afghan officials have complained for months that senior Taliban insurgents are able to move freely in parts of Pakistan's border regions, but the government of Pakistan has denied the assertions, insisting that the Taliban is based in Afghanistan and that the Afghan government should control its own borders.

In an interview in his Washington office last week, Mohammed Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States, repeated this assertion, saying the Afghan government had not done enough to stop the revived insurgency.

"Ten percent of the problem is in Pakistan, and 90 percent of it is in Afghanistan," Durrani said. "We are doing our best, and we are doing more than anyone else in the region to stop terrorism and solve the problems on our side of the border. Our question is, what the hell is everyone doing on the other side? Why is Pakistan being constantly blamed?"

Osmani's reported death could put a major dent in Taliban operations in Helmand province, a vast, dry region where the insurgents have been able to operate freely in the lawless and cash-rich environment created by the heavy presence of opium poppy cultivation and drug trafficking.

The province has become increasingly engulfed in violence despite aggressive combat operations by British troops based there. On Dec. 12, a suicide bomber attempted to assassinate the governor in his compound, killing six policemen and two civilians. In an effort to stem the bloodshed, NATO agreed to a peace pact with Taliban leaders in one district of Helmand in September, but insurgent attacks surged elsewhere in the province.

During the Taliban's rule from 1996 to 2001, Osmani was known as one of its most influential, hard-line Islamic ideologues. This made it especially ironic that in recent months he was commanding insurgent operations in Helmand, where the Taliban once banned opium growing as un-Islamic. Since the Taliban was ousted, Helmand has become the country's top producer of opium poppies.

Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist and author of the book "Taliban," told the Associated Press that Osmani was also instrumental in some of the Taliban's most notorious actions, including the demolition of the ancient Buddha statues in Bamian and the trial of Christian aid workers, both of which occurred in 2001, several months before the Taliban was toppled by U.S.-led forces. The aid workers were rescued by U.S. Special Forces.

Aiding And Abetting The Taliban? (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 24, 2006

Pakistanis appear to be helping fighters attack Afghan border police.

AFGHANISTAN — The guerrillas followed a dirt road from the Pakistan border through a valley surrounded by low, grassy mountains to their target: an Afghan police post.

Not long after sunset, they opened fire from several sides. For almost four hours, scores of suspected Taliban fighters outgunned the lightly armed Afghan border police, and almost overran their camp.

DOJ_NMG_0108926

Then, as quickly as it started, the fight ended. The militants picked up their dead and wounded and fled back into sanctuaries, three miles away, in one of the loosely governed tribal areas of Pakistan.

"A hundred armed Taliban men passed through the Pakistani border with their equipment, and with their rocket-propelled grenade launchers," said Qasim Khail, commander of the Afghan border police's 2nd Brigade, which guards the post here. "And they retreated the same way. There are only two escape routes out of here, and both of them end at a Pakistani border post."

Confidential documents obtained by The Times show that for at least two years, U.S. military intelligence agencies have warned American commanders that Taliban militants were arming and training in Pakistan, then slipping into Afghanistan with the help of Pakistani border control officers.

Pashtuns signed pact

On Sept. 5, Pashtun tribal leaders in Pakistan's North Waziristan border region signed a pact with the central government led by President Pervez Musharraf, an avowed ally of the U.S. in its declared war on terrorism.

Under the agreement, the Pakistani army, which had fought fierce battles with pro-Taliban militants, withdrew from the region, leaving a tribal force in charge of border posts. In return, the tribesmen foreswore giving support, training and sanctuary to Taliban and Al Qaeda-linked fighters, although some foreigners were allowed to remain.

But the violence has not abated. Instead, Afghan officials and the U.S. military say that since the pact was signed, cross-border attacks have surged.

Like many Afghans, Khail believes that despite Musharraf's persistent denials, his country's Inter-Services Intelligence agency still supports the Taliban and at least some of its allies. The intelligence documents show that the U.S. military shared this suspicion as recently as the start of this year.

Doubts about Pakistan's denials are reminiscent of the 1990s, when Islamabad insisted the intelligence service did not help found, train and arm the Taliban, though Pakistani heavy weapons and military officers were found among Taliban units.

Pakistan has historically sought influence in Afghanistan, in part because of a border dispute dating back to 1893, when the British drew a border, called the Durand Line, that divided the Pashtun tribal areas.

When Musharraf was forced to publicly turn against the Taliban after the Sept. 11 attacks, some in Pakistan's security establishment warned that it could lose influence in Afghanistan, a strategic crossroads between oil-rich Central Asia and the energy-starved Indian subcontinent. The increasing influence of rivals like India, Iran, Russia and China have confirmed such fears.

Here in Khowst province, which borders North Waziristan, militants have killed at least 12 Afghan border police and wounded 52 since early September, Khail said.

Most villagers have family ties that cross the border. They believe that their government is too weak to defend them and they are drifting toward the real power in the region, the Taliban, added Khail, who like most of the Taliban is Pashtun.

In October, Khail said, Taliban fighters who attacked a border post took the body of an Afghan border policeman back to Pakistan, where they mutilated it and paraded it around a village. Khail soon got a phone call from a Pakistani police officer, who told the Afghan commander that he could pick up the Afghan's remains at the border in exchange for the body of a Taliban militant. Among the three Pakistanis attending the exchange was a man in a Pakistani police uniform, Khail said.

"The Pakistani police know everything about the border problems," he charged. "The Pakistanis are giving them the weapons and they are arranging the Taliban attacks. They are training them and they give them food. There are hundreds of training camps there in Pakistan."

Repeated warnings

Intelligence warnings have for months documented U.S. worries about Pakistan's role in providing a haven for Afghan insurgents.

A map prepared in early 2005 for a U.S. Army Special Operations task force warned that officers at Pakistani border control posts were "assisting insurgent attacks." It showed militants' infiltration routes from Pakistan, several of which crossed from North Waziristan to Khowst province, where members of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network who have long been based in Afghanistan are still active.

DOJ_NMG_0108927

On Jan. 19 of this year, a report from the U.S. military's Joint Intelligence Task Force said that Al Qaeda continued "to provide expertise and resources, such as weapons, training, and fighters to anti-coalition groups including the Taliban" and its allies, among which is Gulbuddin Hekmatyar's Hizb-i-Islami militia.

In a separate report the same month, the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, or DIA, identified six eastern provinces, including Khowst, as "Al Qaeda strongholds."

"These locations allow Al Qaeda members easy entrance and exit over the Afghanistan/Pakistan border," it added.

The document identified Al Qaeda's commander in Afghanistan as Khalid Habib, and said "Al Qaeda maintains close ties to the Taliban and has received technical support and training from Pakistani militant groups."

It warned that armed Afghans, Arabs and Pakistanis who might attack U.S. forces were in Afghanistan. And it said Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence directorate posed "a HIGH intelligence threat to U.S. and Coalition forces."

Pakistani intelligence agencies were recruiting sources among Afghan interpreters for U.S. forces, collecting information on U.S. counterintelligence operations, the report said. It also noted continued risks for the U.S. military posed by spies for Iran, Russia and India.

The DIA report said Iranian spies gathered information from the U.S. Embassy's Afghan guards, interviewed Afghan visitors and shadowed American staff. It described the Iranians as a "critical threat."

Another DIA report from early this year said senior Taliban leaders in Pakistan were directing operations that had led to a fourfold increase in suicide bombings. It said the bombings were carried out to boost Taliban morale and to show financial backers that it was worth funding the insurgency.

Like several other intelligence reports, the "Warning Assessment for Afghanistan" suggested Mullah Mohammed Omar, the Taliban's supreme leader, may have split with other senior commanders over the increased used of suicide bombings. Omar's faction appeared "concerned about collateral damage turning the populace against the movement," it said.

Remains of the battle

After the Nov. 27 battle at Lizha, about 12 miles southwest of a U.S. base in this border region, Khail's men counted 27 Taliban rocket-propelled grenade blast sites. One RPG exploded in the small, empty room where the police normally slept.

The 25 Afghan police defending the post had four RPGs; one hit a Taliban guerrilla as he crawled toward a gap in the camp's wall.

Days after the battle, the charred and blood-soaked remains of the patu blanket that he had worn lay on the ground, along with dried soybeans that he had spilled, about 15 yards from the barrier.

At least five militants were killed in the battle; the fighters took the bodies of three back with them. Afghan police, who did not suffer casualties, buried the other two near the dirt road leading to Pakistan. One of the dead men's black size 10 shoes lay at one end of his stony grave.

The raid was the third on the border post in as many months. Each time, the militants approached through the Zhawar Valley, which leads to an area of North Waziristan dominated by Taliban commander Jalaluddin Haqqani. His forces have a reputation for kidnappings, suicide bombings and other terrorist attacks.

Haqqani became the Taliban's supreme military commander on the eve of the 2001 war with U.S. and allied Afghan forces, and has escaped several U.S. airstrikes. His men appear determined to seize the Lizha camp; each attacking force is bigger and better-armed than the last, Khail said.

Abdul Ghafaar, the Lizha post's commander, said he radioed Khail in Khowst for help when his police came under attack Nov. 27. Khail said he immediately phoned the nearby U.S. base, which promised to send aircraft. But the besieged police post never saw one.

NATO, which took over command of U.S. troops in eastern Afghanistan in October, said a support aircraft flew over the area but did not attack enemy forces.

Khail recently invited five tribal elders to his office in the hope of persuading them to help stop attacks on the border posts. The elders weren't sympathetic.

"They attacked my house," Haji Shad Raan said. "They have killed hundreds of our elders and they will try to kill us too. Now the first question you have to answer is, 'Who should I defend, my house or your post?' "

DOJ_NMG_0108928

When Khail spoke, he was nearly pleading. "I know that your tribe is very brave, and I know that your tribesmen are very brave," he said he told them. "But all I complain about is that the enemy shoots at me from your door. The enemy shoots at me from your mosque. Can you do this much and stop them from shooting at me from your doorstep? Can't you?"

After the meeting, Khail said he understood why the elders were supporting his enemies. The Taliban is stronger, and in Pashtun culture, that commands respect and allegiance.

"We don't need a government that has no power or the ability to protect us," Gul Ahmad Khan told the police commander. "We know that this government is very weak. It only stands with the power of foreigners and nothing else."

paul.watson@latimes.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Can Private Equity Build A Public Face? (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

ON the upper floors of a soaring Midtown Manhattan skyscraper, behind heavy glass doors that do not bear his name, sits Stephen A. Feinberg, one of the country's most powerful — and anonymous — financiers.

Over the last few years Mr. Feinberg's $24 billion investment fund, Cerberus Capital Management, named after the mythological three-headed dog that guards the gates of hell, has quietly acquired some of the world's best-known companies. The car rental chains National and Alamo, as well as parts of Air Canada and the retailers Mervyn's and Albertson's, are now all within the Feinberg empire.

Last month, when Mr. Feinberg secured a majority stake in General Motors' financing arm, GMAC, he gained control of America's seventh-largest financial institution. Through another company it controls, I.A.P. Worldwide Services, Cerberus is poised to become one of the Army's largest contractors in Iraq. Earlier this month, Cerberus and other funds offered to invest up to $3.4 billion in the Corporation">Delphi Corporation, the auto parts giant.

All told, Cerberus has a controlling interest in more than 45 companies that employ more than 250,000 people and generate $50 billion in revenue each year, more than the sales of Microsoft, Motorola or PepsiCo. The fund has earned an average annual return of about 22 percent over the last seven years, according to its marketing materials, and Institutional Investor magazine estimated that Mr. Feinberg took home a $75 million paycheck in 2004. The executive ranks of Cerberus include former Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and former Vice President Dan Quayle.

For all of that, however, very little is known about Cerberus beyond its intimidating name — a reflection of how greatly Wall Street players like Mr. Feinberg value secrecy, and the pivotal role stealth plays in amassing and deploying the vast pools of capital that private equity investors control.

"Secrecy is very important to how takeover deals get done," said Henry T. Hu, a professor of corporate and securities law at the University of Texas at Austin. "Secrecy gives you access to private information. It lets you bid on companies before the competition is aware they are for sale. Secrecy is part of how this industry works."

But it also has its downside. Although many backers of Cerberus say Mr. Feinberg, 46, is known for his loyalty to investors and partners, his analytical savvy and his creative takeover strategies, the fund's tactics in the bare-knuckled and risky arena of distressed-debt investing have given Cerberus its share of bruises. Court documents detail legal brawls in which investors accuse Cerberus of orchestrating secretive deals that transgressed legal and ethical boundaries, accusations the firm denies.

"These guys come from a different background than other buyout firms," said Joel M. Simon, a principal at XRoads, a financial advisory firm, when asked to describe how Cerberus operates. "When you play in the distressed arena, you develop sharp elbows. They have a reputation as tough negotiators who avoid public attention."

That reputation can also be a liability. Cerberus has lost out on deals because of its secretive image, and it risks attracting the kind of regulatory scrutiny the takeover industry as a whole is trying to avoid. So Cerberus is trying to change. In the spirit of greater openness, it recently built a Web site to give the public a sliver-sized glimpse of the firm. Along with high-profile hires of political heavyweights, Cerberus has become a major political donor. It has distanced itself from its roughneck roots by hiring dozens of image-improving blue-chip executives and, during the GMAC announcement, went so far as to let a senior manager appear at a press conference for the first time in the fund's history.

DOJ_NMG_0108929

But don't ask for a photo of Mr. Feinberg, an interview with him or even a visit to the company's Park Avenue headquarters — there are only so many shifts that Cerberus is willing to embrace. And the changes that Cerberus refuses to adopt speak to the struggles that many takeover groups confront as they try to establish an image as good corporate citizens rather than opportunists looking for a fast buck.

"The public wants to know who is buying up corporate America," said Felix G. Rohatyn, a well-regarded dean of Wall Street's investment banking industry. "It will be interesting to see how far those at the top are willing to pull back the veil."

THE son of a World War II veteran, Mr. Feinberg founded Cerberus in 1992 with $10 million, a plan to speculate in the debt of troubled public companies and a reputation for honest and tough negotiations. Distressed-debt investors get paid by shouldering aside other stakeholders and gambling that faltering companies can be rehabilitated. Over the years, analysts and investors say, Cerberus excelled by gaining control of companies in bankruptcy smackdowns and developing restructuring plans that helped them become profitable.

Some of those more secretive tactics, however, drew complaints and lawsuits. In 2000, Cerberus invested $42 million in the debt of WSNet Holdings, a small provider of satellite television programming. Over the next two years, according to shareholder lawsuits, Cerberus forced the company into bankruptcy by secretly buying up the bonds of companies WSNet hoped to acquire and forbidding WSNet executives from pursuing deals. Through bankruptcy proceedings, the fund tried to take control of the company, lawsuits contend. The suits also contend that Cerberus installed directors at WSNet who maximized Cerberus's profits at the expense of other stakeholders. The claims were settled for a relatively small amount in 2005, by which time Cerberus had recouped its initial investment in WSNet, according to the lawsuits.

Cerberus contended in court documents that the claims were meritless. Cerberus insiders also point out that courtroom hyperbole is not uncommon when bondholders and equity investors battle for a company, and that litigation has become a routine sideshow in distressed-debt deals. But similar complaints dogged the Cerberus investment in the debt of the Coram Healthcare Corporation, a home health care company.

In 2000, when Coram declared bankruptcy, the company's executives proposed a restructuring plan that would give total ownership to Cerberus and other bondholders. Coram's equity investors, including the real estate magnate Sam Zell, would have gotten nothing. Mr. Zell and other shareholders then discovered that the company's chief executive, who helped propose the plan, was secretly receiving nearly $1 million a year from Cerberus, in addition to his Coram salary, according to court documents. A federal bankruptcy judge ruled that a conflict of interest existed.

Cerberus argued that the Coram dispute was a result of sloppy recordkeeping and not deceptive business tactics, according to sources who requested anonymity because of confidentiality agreements. They note that even the court agreed that Coram's chief executive had brought an operational expertise to the company, and that it was not clear any damages resulted from the failure to disclose the additional payments. In 2003, Cerberus and two other investors agreed to pay $56 million to Coram, partially to settle the conflict-of-interest claims.

By then, Cerberus was looking beyond debt investing. The company had amassed an investment pool of more than $5 billion and was expanding into private equity, a focus that grew when distressed-debt opportunities began disappearing in late 2003. The shift to takeover deals required Cerberus to develop a friendlier image that was more attractive to the boards of companies the firm hoped to acquire.

"When you sit down with a company's board, you want them to know who you are," said Brett H. Barth of BBR Partners, a money management firm that has invested with Cerberus. "Distressed debt is all about having a small piece of the pie and making it bigger at everyone else's expense. In private equity, you own the whole pie. You have to convince people you're focused on different things."

Cerberus began hiring well-known executives to introduce the firm to corporate boards. Today, it employs 140 nonfinancial professionals, including the former chairman of the Rite Aid Corporation, a onetime special adviser to Ford Motor and dozens of other blue-chip executives.

DOJ_NMG_0108930

"Preserving our reputation is vitally important to us," said Timothy F. Price, the senior operations manager of Cerberus. "We don't want anyone from a company we've bought calling another board and saying, 'Stay away from these guys.' "

Cerberus says that when it plugs its seasoned executives into turnaround situations, it generates impressive results. After its purchase of Aozora Bank in Japan in 2003, for instance, new management helped increase net income 412 percent within three years and cut the number of nonperforming loans.

Its new army of familiar faces, its track record and its deep, deep pockets have made Cerberus well known within a strata of the financial sector where buying and selling companies are everyday activities. "The relationship between Cerberus and G.M. got better and better as the deal advanced," said Walter G. Borst, who as treasurer of General Motors helped to negotiate the Cerberus purchase of the stake in GMAC earlier this year. "They did everything they said they were going to do."

But the anonymity of Cerberus — and its reputation for strong-arm tactics — became liabilities when the firm tried to invest in Air Canada two years ago. To keep Cerberus out of the mix, politicians and the airline's directors asked a Canadian billionaire to save the company. Cerberus was seen at the time "as American piranhas looking to rip the place to pieces," said Robert A. Milton, chief executive of Air Canada's parent, ACE Aviation Holdings.

After unions scuttled the billionaire's deal, Cerberus stepped back in and wasted little time lining up local support. Mr. Feinberg hired Brian Mulroney, the former Canadian prime minister, as an adviser and promised not to resell the firm's Air Canada stake — today valued at about $347 million — for at least two years. The airline relented.

"They've been very supportive and knowledgeable investors, and as long as they're making money, they're willing to make hard decisions that invest in the company's future," Mr. Milton said.

The deal was a turning point for the fund. "When our deals were small, we could stay below the radar, but with Air Canada, we realized that we were losing out because people thought we were bad guys," said Mr. Price at Cerberus. "We realized we can't buy national icons without telling people who we are."

To add a higher-profile sheen, Cerberus hired Mr. Snow and spent more than $2.5 million with lobbying firms from 2003 to 2006, according to federal records. Those dollars were spent in part to discourage politicians from regulating private investment pools like Cerberus. Mr. Feinberg personally donated more than $100,000 to primarily Republican causes in the last three electoral cycles, according to federal filings.

Yet Cerberus still keeps a relatively tight lock on its doors.

"I think our guys would be embarrassed if our pictures were in the paper," Mr. Price said. "If I have time to be a celebrity, what message does that send to our 45 portfolio companies who we're asking to work all day?"

WHILE firms like Cerberus continue to eschew celebrity, some people say that greater transparency in the takeover world is not so easily avoided. In fact, they say, it is crucial.

"When you take control of a major company, you have a real responsibility to the employees, to the customers, to the communities they live in, to the public," Mr. Rohatyn said. "The people who run enormous funds understand that responsibility. They understand if they don't introduce themselves, suspicion will grow."

Avoiding those suspicions is a major preoccupation of private equity's founding fathers, who were famously condemned as barbarians at the gates when the industry made its first big splash in the 1980s. Since then, many would-be barbarians have worked hard to become respected executives and members of the corporate establishment. Anonymity has been swapped for high-profile socializing and philanthropy. For example, Henry R. Kravis, a star of the '80s buyout scene, now serves on the board of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, while the name of the corporate raider Carl C. Icahn now graces buildings at Princeton, Choate Rosemary Hall and a New York stadium. But those changes might be more window dressing than genuine transparency.

"Private equity investors realize they need a better public image," said Mr. Hu, the professor. "But they don't want to give up the secrecy and tactics that have made this industry so profitable. They want to be in control of how they are seen, rather than throwing open the doors."

However, that strategy may not be working. Private equity firms are finding themselves under attack in certain quarters. In Germany, political candidates have assailed takeover investors as "locusts." Oregon regulators last year refused to sell Portland General Electric to a buyout fund, citing a public outcry. And the Justice Department has started an investigation of possible collusion among some of the biggest private equity groups.

DOJ_NMG_0108931

OTHER regulators are also threatening to bring greater scrutiny to private equity firms, a threat that the hedge fund business is already facing. Regulators, such as Richard Blumenthal, the attorney general of Connecticut, say they may shift their focus to private equity groups. "It's the same cast of characters, the same secrecy, and they probably deserve the same attention," Mr. Blumenthal said.

So some private equity executives are firing back.

Stephen A. Schwarzman, chairman of one of the world's largest private equity firms, the Blackstone Group, notes that 48 percent of its investment capital comes from state and government pension funds. He also notes that Blackstone-owned companies have created 25,000 new jobs in the last five years (while also filling Blackstone's coffers). "Most of our profits go to retired firemen and teachers, nurses and government employees," Mr. Schwarzman said. "It's important that we educate Americans about how hedge funds and private equity play completely different roles."

Mr. Schwarzman's firm is expected to soon join other private equity giants, the Carlyle Group, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group, to announce the formation of the Private Equity Council, a trade association that plans to remind the public and politicians about the brighter side of takeover deals.

Cerberus insiders deride Mr. Schwarzman's sentiments as self-serving. But they acknowledge that Cerberus's preference for secrecy may be pulling the industry's publicity campaign off course. Senior executives at other private equity funds have begun whispering to one another and to Cerberus executives, partners and investors that Cerberus and Mr. Feinberg, having achieved financial prominence, need to renounce their secretive ways.

Some steps are occurring: At least two Cerberus executives have begun talking regularly to journalists, the company lists its address on its Web site and it has hired a public relations firm.

"We're talking about the firm with whoever asks about us, while still respecting the privacy of the people involved," said Mr. Price at Cerberus. "We don't need to be self-aggrandizing rock stars to be of service to America and open in our dealings."

But friends of Mr. Feinberg say he is a deeply private and humble man who does not want to be known by the world at large, and Cerberus executives say that many calls for greater visibility are simply competitors justifying their own showboating.

"Why does someone have to become a public figure just because he's successful?" Mr. Price asked. "It's hard for any of us to take time away from our day to day jobs to talk to outsiders, and Steve is the last guy who can afford to spend time away from our portfolio companies. Why do we have to give up our privacy for everyone else?"

U.S. Attorney On The Record: Kevin Ryan (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, December 24, 2006

Kevin Ryan, the tough-talking point man for the Bush administration's federal law enforcement efforts in Northern California, has taken a high-profile interest in investigating whether Bay Area companies and executives fraudulently backdated stock-option grants.

Over the summer, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California dedicated a federal task force of prosecutors and investigators to the financial scandal that has swept up dozens of companies, led to two criminal indictments and prompted a rash of executive resignations.

Ryan's office is investigating more than 25 companies. About 15 to 20 percent have troubling red flags, he says. These investigations could go on for years, although sources in federal law enforcement suggest another indictment is imminent. To add more investigative firepower, Ryan is also focusing on whether employees who received the backdated options lied on their individual tax returns.

Ryan brings this investigation amid reports of high-profile defections and low morale among his prosecutors as well as a falling caseload at a U.S. attorney's office whose territory extends from Monterey County to the Oregon border and which has about 100 prosecutors in three branches.

Ryan, a San Francisco native, spent 11 years as a deputy district attorney in Alameda County before then-Gov. Pete Wilson appointed him to the San Francisco bench. He left that post when President Bush appointed him.

The following has been edited for space and clarity.

DOJ_NMG_0108932

Q: When did your office start looking at backdating and at what point did your thinking crystallize that this was something you wanted to prosecute?

A: As you know, in the Brocade case, we had been looking at this for about 18 months before the indictment. I talked to folks about this issue, internally and externally, to try to get a sense of what people were thinking about it. I felt at the end of the day that it was something we really needed to step up and become the leader in because, and I think it's bearing true, a lot of the activity happened in the Silicon Valley.

Whether it turns out to be criminal or not remains to be seen. Whether it turns out to be purely administrative and something that the Securities and Exchange Commission can handle or class-action lawsuits can handle, there seriously is an issue with the Silicon Valley during this period of time.

Q: This whole backdating thing seems a little abstract. Can you make it concrete and tell us why we should care about backdating and who's harmed?

A: I hear that argument all the time whether or not there was self-enrichment, whether or not the market cares, whether or not the market reacts to these things, and you need to understand that sometimes the way we look at an issue as prosecutors is one of the things we are trying to ensure is the integrity of the market and that the books and records are accurate.

For the industry itself, it's taken a very serious look at it and people are losing their jobs behind it. People who are heads of companies, lawyers for companies have all been asked to leave because of what has happened. That's one earmark that it is a serious problem. We're looking at the issue of whether or not there was fraud and criminal intent.

Did this happen in a vacuum? Did this happen because people didn't know what they were doing? Did this happen because people were sloppy? Or did this happen because someone knew the rules, and were people defrauded?

Q: How do you find the harm?

A: The harm is lying to the SEC, lying under oath, lying to the market, not stating your books. If I'm investing in a company and there are 300, 400, 500, 600 million dollars of options that have been backdated that might affect net income for the company, I want to know that. The tax consequences of this are going to be a big part of it.

Q: Do you think that may be individual fraud or people trying to escape taxes by misstating when they actually ...?

A: Well, I mean there have been some relatively high-profile cases recently where it has been reported by you folks of individuals selecting their own grant base -- a hundred million dollars you know, and I think it is not a stretch to assume that it was done for purposes of either avoiding the tax bill, whether it's capital or regular gains. You know the big issue today and you've reported on it, the Wall Street Journal has reported on it recently, is also the grant date and the backdating of the grant date, but now the backdating of the exercise date for purposes of capital gains, partial capital gains.

Q: It's pretty hard for that to be a mistake, isn't it?

A: Yes. Well, it can happen. A lot of the presentations we have heard say that this was done by someone who really didn't know the rules and someone who probably should have been keeping a better eye on that person. Or, we are really hands-on and we didn't know the rules and we should have been keeping an eye on it.

Q: How many cases are you investigating and what percentage are criminal in nature?

A: Well, I think typically we will not answer a question like that, but since the FBI has publicly announced that the last time they talked about this, there were about 53 cases they were involved in investigating for potential criminal conduct, and I have publicly stated of those 53, at least 50 percent of those companies are located in the Northern District of California. We are seeing troubling indicators in about 15 to 20 percent of those companies right now. We haven't finished all of our investigations; we haven't scrubbed all these companies. But we are seeing a handful or more of cases that have red flags that would suggest that we need to keep going.

Q: What are those red flags?

A: If a company comes in, then fires its CEO and head of HR and says, "We have a problem and we are about to restate 300, 400, 500 million dollars," those are all red flags. Often times these cases come to us in a variety of forms. We can get a whistle-blower coming to us. We can get an insider coming to us. We can get a phone call. We created years ago the first 800 number for securities fraud. If you thought something squirrelly was going on in the company, call the 800 number and let us know.

DOJ_NMG_0108933

So we do have a universe of cases -- 150, 180 -- that the SEC is looking at. Then we start parsing that down into our district. How many of these cases are in our district. We start reading the newspaper to see who is restating, who is refiling their 8-Ks, their 10-Ks, their 10-Qs. Who got laid off? And why? And what is the story there? That has an impact on us. We will start looking at companies because of that kind of conduct. And we will start prioritizing and reprioritizing. And oftentimes we will already know or have a sense of what's going on.

Q: As companies conduct these self-investigations, are they reporting to you and the SEC their findings?

A: Yes, they are. They make presentations to us. They come in and tell us what the review process found. Sometimes that can shed light, sometimes it cannot shed any light at all.

Q: Is it true that you are creating a database of lawyers conducting these investigations to judge their credibility?

A: I wouldn't say we are creating a database. We know pretty much the universe of folks doing these things. Like any other profession, reputations mean a lot. If you have a reputation for honesty, integrity, and you are known as someone not to try to pull the wool over someone's eyes, that reputation follows you around and sometimes if you have a contrary reputation, we're a suspicious lot. That's what we do.

Q: There has been a lot of talk lately about the "Thompson Memo" (a set of guidelines drafted by the Department of Justice in 2003 in the wake of Enron and WorldCom to combat corporate wrongdoing) and allegations that the DOJ placed undue pressure on companies to cooperate in these investigations.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty made some revisions to that memo this week. Can you talk a little bit about that? Do you think all of this cooperation has been entirely voluntary on the part of companies? Also, one of the principal problems you face in these cases is the statute of limitations. Have you gotten some of these companies to waive that?

A: Yes, companies have come in and agreed to "toll" stop the clock running (on the statutory period) in an effort to cooperate. With regard to the Thompson/McNulty memo, clearly there has been a shift. I will say that I understand the debate. We are clearly aware of what's happened.

In our office in four-plus years, I have never had anyone complain about the process and whether or not we were heavy-handed in our request. I understand the need to really change the process such that the perception and, if in fact true, the reality that we somehow were sending message out interfering with the attorney-client privilege, we didn't want to do that, that was not the intent of the Thompson Memo, that was not the intent of our prosecutors. We have always had to depend to a certain extent in these types of cases on the cooperation of the lawyers for the firms we are investigating.

Q: Is the McNulty memo going to slow things down or make it more difficult to get cooperation?

A: I don't know if it will slow things down or not. Clearly there was a policy decision that this is the way we are going to go and that's what we are going to do. My experience is that most companies have cooperated with us, and they understand the value of that. Now if they choose not to, that's fine, too.

Q: At what point do you decide to indict?

A: The classic things we're looking for: What is the history of the company? Have they had a history of malfeasance? Have they done this in the past? Have they come in and addressed the issue internally? Have they gotten rid of the people who have violated the code of ethics for the company? Have they made every effort to come up with a solid compliance program to make sure this would never happen again? Has this happened in the past? Have they ignored the indicators (that they) may have some rogue employees or a rogue division within the company? What would be the impact to the company? Would it be a death knell to the company to indict the company? Are there appropriate or reasonable alternatives, such as deferred prosecution agreements that would have the same impact and not put a company out of business and not put people out of their IRAs and retirement plans?

Q: We have been told that more indictments are coming and we have been told that another indictment is in the pipeline from your office in the backdating probe. Can you tell us who, when or how many?

A: No, I won't comment on that. Again, we have seen troubling indicators in a handful of these cases. We are really burrowing down into those cases. And there are red flags sufficient to keep us focused on those cases. At the end of the day, the grand jury is the ultimate decider whether or not there is sufficient evidence to bring a case forward. The last chapter has not been written, but I am not going to say who, how many and when.

DOJ_NMG_0108934

Q: There is the perception that you are more reluctant to go after some individuals and companies than others. Does the prominence or the importance of a person to an industry or a company factor into the investigation and your decision to take action?

A: I have been in law enforcement my entire career. My position is that if someone has violated the law and there is sufficient evidence to bring forth charges under our guidelines then that's what's going to happen. As long as I'm U.S. attorney, that's what's going to happen. Sometimes we have to make difficult calls involving prominent people, powerful people.

Q: How did this become so widespread?

A: Looking at the valley here, I think we saw a confluence of events. You had these companies with a lot of potential, some of them were cash-starved, some of them didn't have money to pay high salaries up front, in many of them there was a belief that there would be a big payoff down the road in the dot-com boom.

So there was an effort to come up with creative ways to recruit people, to retain people, to motivate people, to incentivize people to help the company grow. I think the way the accounting rules for backdating were set up in the '90s created the opportunity for mischief. I think there was an opportunity for those willing to partake in it to engage in this kind of conduct. It was kind of a perfect storm.

Q: Is there a Typhoid Mary running around? Was there a secret seminar that everyone went to?

A: Maybe we will have an answer to that someday in the future. It was clearly a practice. You have to remember, like a lot of things it wasn't illegal or necessarily improper to backdate your options. What was illegal is if you didn't account for it in your compensation. Then the question is: Why did one company account for it properly and why did one company not?

Q: What is the IRS' interest?

A: I brought the IRS (in) early. The immediate thing that grabbed me was the tax implications of this. The individuals who were exercising these options, there could be hundreds of millions of dollars, or tens of millions of dollars. How are they carrying them on their personal taxes? How did they file? Also, what's the company doing? How is the company carrying it? Are they deducting $100 million for compensation-related expenses? The IRS is fully engaged in this. The interesting thing about the IRS is that they have a six-year statute of limitations for criminal tax, no statute of limitations for civil. They bring a little bit of extra room for us on the issue of statute of limitations.

Q: At the time you created the task force, there was speculation that was a means to get more firepower at a time when there had been a lot of reports about high-profile defections from your office and reports of low morale. Can you address that?

A: Well, let me just say this: When I became the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, there were 12 vacancies in my office. There are 12 vacancies now. We have 10-15 percent sometimes 20 percent attrition rate every year. Most large or super-large offices also do. The average tenure of (an assistant U.S. attorney) is about eight years.

The situation becomes a bit more complex in a place like San Francisco, where folks can't afford to buy a home on a government salary. I don't know if you know what we make, but local DAs and deputy city attorneys make far more money than we do and have a better retirement than career (assistant U.S. attorneys).

So many people have left. Some have left for judgeships, some have left for partnerships in firms, and some have left for other reasons. I came in. I had a mandate. I did my job and we've invigorated that office. We have good career prosecutors working these cases. I'll put them up against anyone at anytime, including those who have left.

Q: Some of the attorneys who have left were considered real lifers, not the kind of people who would leave because they couldn't buy a house. There has been a lot of criticism over the handling of the office because of the stream of departures that are perceived as being a result of your leadership style.

A: I am not going to make any excuses for any decisions we have made. We have done a heck of a job. We've invigorated that office. Our numbers are high. Our cases are high. If you can point to another office that has a BALCO, that has a Brocade, that has an option-dating task force, that has done the cases we've done, I'd be happy to talk about it. Our work has not suffered as a result of these departures.

Q: The legal press has taken you to task for the number of criminal filings your office has been responsible for, a number that your office has disputed. They claim these numbers are a low for your tenure and for the office in the past 12 years. What are the numbers? And is it that they are ignoring how complex these high-profile cases are?

DOJ_NMG_0108935

A: That's part of the reason. Our numbers are at the highest or the highest they have been in my tenure. These are complicated cases. I could go out right now and indict 100 low-end drug or gun cases to jump my numbers up if that was what my goal was as the U.S. attorney. That's not my goal. You also have to factor in that it's a post-9/11 world.

The FBI completely realigned its resources after 9/11 and took case agents off narcotics and other squads and put them into counterintelligence that does not necessarily result in cases, and they put them into terrorism cases. They are protecting the American public and they are working on counterintelligence cases that may not result in a criminal prosecution ever. Our job changed completely and utterly after 9/11. The numbers are not what drive us.

People come and go for a variety of reasons. I will not be here forever and most of the people in that office won't be career people. It's not built to be a career institution if you look at the way the retirement is set up for folks. That's just the way it is.

Q: Do you have enough seasoned prosecutors to prosecute every backdating case that warrants it?

A: Yes.

Q: As recently as March, a Justice Department audit said morale wasn't good in your organization.

A: I remember Bob Mueller (former U.S. attorney) gave a speech to Congress. He said when you take over any organization, one third are against you, one third are for you, and one third are in the middle. People are sometimes unhappy for a variety of reasons. If I am not drawing criticism, I figure I am not doing my job. When I was a judge, at the end of every day, you made a temporary friend and a permanent enemy. I imagine there are people who don't like the direction I have taken this office under this administration and they're unhappy about it.

Q: How would you assess morale?

A: I think morale is generally pretty good. I think there are some people who are unhappy.

Q: What about your own future? You just said you won't be there forever. Would you care to be more specific?

A: I think a lot of this is up to God. I serve at the pleasure of the president. Everybody knows that there are two years left on his term. I am one of the longest-serving U.S. attorneys. If you look now, about 60 percent of the people in my class, if you will, have already moved on. So, there will come a day when I pack my bags and leave the federal building.

Q: Do you have a federal judgeship in mind?

A: No, I don't comment on that.

Kevin Ryan

Age: 49

Title: U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California

Education: Bachelor of arts in history from Dartmouth College; law degree from the University of San Francisco

Work experience: Began his career as a prosecutor with the Alameda County district attorney's office; appointed by then-Gov. Pete Wilson to San Francisco Municipal Court in 1996; became a member of the San Francisco Superior Court in 1999; nominated by President Bush to serve as the 48th U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California in May 2002, confirmed by the Senate in July 2002.

On the Record interviews are available online at sfgate.com/chronicle/ontherecord.

Participating in this interview were Business Editor Ken Howe, Deputy Business Editor Alan T. Saracevic, Assistant Business Editors David Tong and Sam Zuckerman, staff writers Jessica Guynn and Bob Egelko, and editorial assistant Steve Corder.

Page F - 1

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Right Has A Jailhouse Conversion (NYT)

By Chris Suellentrop

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

Not too long ago, you could tell whether an election was under way by watching prime-time television and counting the number of ominous recitatives about prisoners and ex-prisoners in the commercials. This fall, however, the seven million

Americans who are in the custody of the state — in prison or jail, on probation or parole — did not loom large on nightly TV; in fact, as has been the case for nearly a decade, they barely received any notice at all. Prisoners are no longer the charged political symbols and campaign-season scapegoats they once were.

This decline in the exploitation of crime coincides with an odd and surprising change in the politics of crime. The G.O.P., the party of Richard Nixon's 1968 law-and-order campaign and the Willie Horton commercial, is beginning to embrace the idea that prisoners have not only souls that need saving but also flesh that needs caring for in this world. Increasingly, Republicans are talking about helping ex-prisoners find housing, drug treatment, mental-health counseling, job training and education. They're also reconsidering some of the more punitive sentencing laws for drug possession. The members of this nascent movement include a number of politicians not previously known for their attention to prisoners' rights. Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama, a former federal prosecutor whom The New Republic once accused of being stained "with the taint of racism," wants to reduce the penalty for possession of small amounts of crack. Referring to mandatory-minimum sentences, Representative Bob Inglis of South Carolina, whose district is home to Bob Jones University, declared on the floor of the House: "I voted for them in the past. I will not do it again." Perhaps most remarkably, the outgoing Republican-controlled Congress came tantalizingly close to passing the Second Chance Act, a bill that focuses not on how to "lock them up" but on how to let them out. The bill may become law soon, if Democrats continue to welcome the new conservative interest in rehabilitation.

By some measures, the Second Chance Act is a small bill. It authorizes less than $100 million over two years to address a significant problem: about 700,000 ex-offenders (the population of a good-size American city) will leave prison in 2007 — and two-thirds of them are likely to be rearrested within three years. The bill would provide states with grants to develop model programs for prisoners returning to society. Those states that accept the grants will be asked to re-examine any laws and regulations that make it unreasonably difficult for ex-offenders to reintegrate themselves into their communities — the classic example is the ban on allowing felons to receive a barber's license. (If the felon in question is Sweeney Todd, of course, the ban might make sense. But a blanket prohibition that includes check bouncers and marijuana users seems overly broad.) The bill also provides money to faith-based organizations and other nonprofits for prisoner-mentoring programs. Finally, it requires states to measure how well their programs achieve the bill's main goal: reducing the rate of recidivism among recently released prisoners.

No one expects the Second Chance Act to solve the prisoner-re-entry problem overnight. The bill's authors are probably too confident that drug treatment, education and housing assistance can reduce recidivism on their own. Such services, many criminologists say, are effective only when paired with the tight supervision of ex-offenders. Some researchers point to the "broken windows" response to crime and suggest trying a similar approach with prisoner re-entry: quickly punish any small violations of the terms of a prisoner's release with graduated sanctions while returning ex-offenders to prison only for new crimes, not for technical parole violations like missing a meeting with a probation officer. The Second Chance Act does nothing to support this sort of approach.

As policy, then, the bill won't be an elixir. But as a symbolic political gesture, the Second Chance Act completely reverses recent practice. For the first time in decades, Congress is poised to pass a bill that aims to make the lives of prisoners and ex-prisoners easier, not more difficult. In the 1990s, Democratic and Republican Congresses scrapped the Pell Grant program for prisoners, barred drug offenders from receiving federal student loans and cut highway money for states that did not revoke or suspend the driver's licenses of drug felons. Now leading politicians of both parties are proposing that states remove laws and regulations that wall off the ex-criminal class from the community. Rather than eliminating education and substance-abuse treatment programs, Congress may well finance them. When I met with Mark Earley, a former political star of the Christian right and a present-day prison reformer, I began explaining to him why I was surprised by the Second Chance Act and the so-called "re-entry movement" surrounding it. He knew why I was surprised: "First of all," he said, by the very fact "that there is common ground" between Republicans and Democrats. "And second of all, it's this?"

Many liberals and Democrats — from Senator Joe Biden to members of the Congressional Black Caucus like Stephanie Tubbs Jones, a representative from Cleveland, and Danny Davis, a representative from Chicago — are sponsors of the Second Chance Act. Still, the issue is not a top priority for the party. In their recent blueprint for Democratic success, "The Plan," Rahm Emanuel, the influential Illinois congressman, and Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, wrote only one paragraph on crime — and that was mostly a hymn to the achievements of the 1994 crime bill. The campaign document for House Democrats, "A New Direction for America," promises action on national security, the economy, higher education, energy, health care and retirement. The words "crime" and "prisons" never appear.

DOJ_NMG_0108937

Prison reform is not a highly advertised position of the Republican Party either, but a growing number of social conservatives are trying to make it a centerpiece of the Christian-conservative agenda. The most striking aspect of the Second Chance Act may be the cross-section of Republicans, from every wing of the party, who support it. Senator Arlen Specter, the top-ranked contender for the award of Least Favorite Republican among movement conservatives, is a lead sponsor, as is Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who may be Christian conservatives' top choice for the 2008 presidential nomination. Among the House sponsors of the bill are Mike Pence, an Indiana congressman who is a leader of the conservative caucus in the House and a darling of Washington's conservative press corps, and Dan Lungren, a California representative and former California attorney general who helped write California's three-strikes law (which he still supports). "For liberals in criminal justice, he's like the devil, almost," says a key liberal lobbyist for the bill, Gene Guerrero of George Soros's Open Society Policy Center.

The Second Chance Act would seem an unlikely bill to be advanced during an election year. At every level of government, after all, elections are thought to encourage tough-on-crime legislation. Recalling his time in the Illinois Legislature, Barack Obama, an early sponsor, says: "We used to have a joke. Let's say the offense was that defacing property was a Class C misdemeanor, or a Class A misdemeanor. Suddenly somebody would jack it up to a Class 2 felony. And it was always before election time. And we'd say, 'You know, it's not a good idea to leap all the way to the maximum penalty, because you'll have nothing to come back with next election.' You know, you want to take it in stages."

With the Second Chance Act, however, three of what were the most endangered senators in America — Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Mike DeWine of Ohio — put their names on the bill; all lost their re-election bids. Their support for the legislation wasn't an issue in their losses, but even that fact is remarkable. In today's political environment, crime policy has so receded from controversy that the Republican-led House Judiciary Committee could approve the Second Chance Act in July under the assumption that the full House might take it up on the eve of an election in which the Republican majority was at stake.

What has changed? It's true that crime rates have declined in recent years (notwithstanding a slight uptick last year), but for the last quarter of the 20th century, crime policy was impervious to fluctuations in street crime. If crime went up, politicians got tough on crime. If crime went down, politicians still got tough on crime. At the state level, at least, that is no longer the case — and a large shift in public opinion has much to do with it. In 1994, crime and health care were the two top issues that Americans thought the government should tackle. Nine years later, less than 1 percent of Americans named crime as a top political issue.

If safer streets had something to do with the change in public attitudes, so did another development: the changing place of crime in the national debate over moral values. Over the past decade, as the political scientists William Galston and Elaine Kamarck have suggested, the culture war of the 1970s and 1980s that revolved around race has been replaced by one that revolves around religion. A side effect has been a radically different crime debate. If the Second Chance Act fails to pass, it will not be because the two parties cannot agree on the importance of rehabilitation programs in prisons. But it may be because they disagree on the role religious organizations should play in rehabilitation.

This September, Mark Earley ascended to a lectern at the Washington Convention Center to recite a political act of contrition. Earley, who is white, seemed among the least likely attendees of the Congressional Black Caucus's annual legislative conference to rouse the mostly African-American audience of liberal activists, Capitol Hill staff members, lobbyists and members of Congress to sermon-listener cries of "Amen," "Yes, sir" and "Tell it!" The most successful Christian conservative politician to emerge from the State of Virginia, Earley represented the district of Pat Robertson and Ralph Reed for 10 years in the Old Dominion Legislature. In 1997, he ran for attorney general on a platform that combined socially conservative positions on abortion and other issues with a dollop of tough-on-crime rhetoric — and won.

Now Earley came to confess his sins. In front of an audience filled with former prisoners who were attending a job fair connected to the conference, Earley cast his arms wide and proclaimed: "I was wrong. I repent!"

"I'm 52 years old," he said at the beginning of his remarks, "and for the first 48 years of my life, I didn't think much about prisoners. And when I did, it went something like, I'm glad I'm not one, and I'm glad they are where they are." He continued: "And I really pretty much had the view that prisoners were at the end of the line. That if you were in prison, you had no hope, you'd made a mess of your life, and it was better for me that you were there, because my family could be safe."

DOJ_NMG_0108938

He went on: "I was elected to the Virginia Legislature and served 10 years, from '87 to '97, in the Senate of Virginia, and quite frankly, spent most of my time in the Legislature working on how to put more people in jail and keeping them there longer. Virginia, like most states in the '80s, abolished parole, instituted three strikes and you're out, lowered the age at which juveniles could be tried as adults from 16 to 14." Earley told the crowd that these policies helped increase the American prison population "tenfold in the last 30 years." Unlike most politicians who say such things, Earley wasn't bragging. He was apologizing.

Like many Republicans and Christian activists, Earley's prison-house conversion dates from an encounter with Chuck Colson, the Watergate crook turned Christian evangelist. When Earley lost the Virginia governor's race in 2001 to Mark Warner, Colson asked Earley to take over Prison Fellowship, the ministry that Colson founded in the mid-1970s. Earley declined on the assumption that devoting himself to prisoners was tantamount to throwing his life "down a dark hole." Over the next few months, Earley read his Bible and was struck by the number of criminals who play starring roles: Moses, for example, murdered a man and became a fugitive. Paul presided over the stoning of Stephen, the first Christian martyr. Earley came to a realization: "If Moses or Paul had lived in Virginia or any state in the United States today, they would be serving, had they been caught, a multiple-decade prison sentence." He took the job.

Of course, it's easy to admit the error of your political ways when you've left office and don't have to worry about voters punishing you for your change of heart. But Earley is far from alone in his apostasy from the usual anti-crime politics. Howard Coble, a congressman from North Carolina and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security in the last Congress, said in 2003 that the internment camps for Japanese-Americans during World War II were "appropriate at the time." And yet when Coble first introduced the Second Chance Act to the full judiciary committee this summer, he called the bill "an enlightened departure" from the politics of "lock them up and throw away the key."

"At one point, I may have embraced that theory," Coble told me over the phone from his home in Greensboro, N.C., during the August Congressional recess. "I still embrace the theory of locking the cell door if an offender has been convicted of a crime. But I don't say throw the key away. I say, keep the key handy, so the same key that locked that door can also unlock it." Coble's words recalled those of Alexander Maconochie, a Scottish prison warden who reformed Norfolk Island, the Alcatraz of 19th-century Australia, by inventing the concept of indeterminate sentencing — an incentive-based system involving early release for hard work and good behavior: "When a man keeps the key of his own prison, he is soon persuaded to fit it to the lock."

For most of the 20th century, indeterminate sentencing and rehabilitation were consensus policies in the United States. The decision to call the state agencies that run prisons departments of "corrections" was intended to reflect the rehabilitative nature of their work. But in 1974, a sociologist named Robert Martinson published an article called "What Works?" in the neoconservative journal The Public Interest. John Dilulio, President Bush's first director of faith-based initiatives, once called Martinson's essay "arguably the single most influential article ever published in that influential journal." Martinson answered the question he posed by concluding that "with few and isolated exceptions," there was no evidence that any rehabilitation programs successfully reduced recidivism. His article and the subsequent media attention it received — along with the high crime rates of the 1970s — are credited with shifting the emphasis in crime policy from rehabilitation to punishment and "just desserts." Martinson later retracted his argument: in a 1979 article in The Hofstra Law Review, he acknowledged that some rehabilitation programs had "an appreciable effect," while emphasizing that other programs were actually harmful. But the political environment was not as receptive to a more nuanced approach. Following California's lead in 1977, state after state abandoned rehabilitation and indeterminate sentencing in favor of punishment and fixed sentences.

Today's revival of rehabilitation began during the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency. The Clinton administration had been as punishment-oriented as its Republican predecessors. With the exception of a few liberal members of Congress — mostly members of the Congressional Black Caucus who represent urban districts — Democrats in the 1990s abandoned prison reform. The two defining moments of Democratic crime politics in the 1990s were Clinton's decision as governor of Arkansas to allow the execution of the mentally impaired Ricky Ray Rector in 1992 and the passage of the 1994 crime bill; along with banning assault weapons and putting 100,000 cops on the street, the bill also prominently featured longer sentences for criminals and a federal three-strikes law.

DOJ_NMG_0108939

But in the spring of 1999, Janet Reno turned to Jeremy Travis, then the director of the National Institute of Justice, and asked, "What are we doing about all the people coming out of prison?" It began to dawn on Reno, Travis and others that the mandatory sentences Congress and state legislatures created over the preceding decades had an unintended side effect: automatic release. More and more prisoners were leaving prison without having to earn their release, because the incentives to change their behavior had been removed. That seems obvious: what else would you expect from states that abolished parole and replaced discretionary sentencing with fixed sentences? Yet few lawmakers and corrections professionals seemed to have considered the consequences. In October 1999, Reno and Travis held a news conference promoting the idea of prisoner "re-entry," a word Travis came up with that rebranded the unpopular notion of prisoner rehabilitation. "Re-entry" shifts the emphasis from the criminal to the community — from how an inmate is treated to how safe you and your neighbors will be when he or she is released. In that sense, re-entry preys on the public fear of a nation of Willie Hortons, but it does so in the service of going "softer" on crime.

Even as Reno and Travis were promoting the idea of prisoner re-entry, Matt Salmon, a Republican congressman from Arizona, was championing the No Second Chances Act, a bill that would take federal money away from states that released a prisoner who then committed a crime in another state. The political climate seemed unfriendly. Yet Reno and Travis's initiative aroused little opposition — or much notice of any kind.

Criminologists of both parties hope that the decreasing importance of crime as a political issue will make it possible to have a more sober discussion of the subject at last. They want to see a less ideologically charged debate and one that rests more closely on sound research. There's only one problem: a shocking paucity of such evidence to inform the policy debate. As Christy Visher, a researcher from the Urban Institute, put it in the May 2006 issue of Criminology and Public Policy, "There is no consensus answer to the question Do prisoner-re-entry programs work?"

And yet there is a consensus to not do what we are doing. Criminologists largely agree that increasing the use of incarceration at some point becomes counterproductive and crime actually starts to rise. Many researchers suggest that we're at that point already. In his book on re-entry, "They All Come Back," Travis notes that only about 25 percent of the violent-crime reduction in the 1990s was because of "incapacitation" — the fact that would-be criminals were locked up and unable to commit more crimes. Michael Jacobson, who worked as the New York City corrections commissioner under Rudy Giuliani, points out that the city's nation-leading decline in street crime during the 1990s coincided with a decline in the use of incarceration as a weapon of crime control. San Diego, the No. 2 city in crime reduction from 1993 to 2001, also sent fewer people to prison during that period.

The best way to deter crime, according to most researchers, is to increase the swiftness and the certainty of arrest for people who break the law, not to increase the severity of their sentences. Many experts would like to see some kind of return to indeterminate sentencing, though they disagree on the particulars. Ultimately, they'd like to see sentencing turn from an Industrial Age policy, a one-size-fits-all assembly line, to an Internet Age policy of personalization. Joan Petersilia, a leading researcher on parole, recommends using statistical risk profiles, similar to those employed by auto insurers, to determine which ex-offenders should receive the most support or supervision from re-entry programs. She argues in her book "When Prisoners Come Home" that "from a victim's standpoint, there is no benefit from determinate sentencing or automatic-prisoner-release schemes," because you "replace a rational, controlled system of earned release for selected inmates with automatic release for nearly all inmates."

Outside the criminology community, conservatives have embraced re-entry to save lives, to save souls and also to save money. Putting aside Medicaid, spending on corrections has been the fastest-growing item in state budgets in recent years. Partly for this reason, Louisiana and Mississippi — the two states, Michael Jacobson notes in his book, "Downsizing Prisons," with the highest rates of per capita incarceration in the country — embraced sentencing reform in 2001. Louisiana eliminated some mandatory sentences and required that the first two "strikes" for offenders be violent, rather than nonviolent, felonies. Mississippi, which had abolished discretionary parole in 1995, decided to bring it back for nonviolent first-time offenders. By 2003, 18 states had implemented similar reforms. Under the Republican governor, John Engler, Michigan repealed all of its mandatory-minimum drug laws.

DOJ_NMG_0108940

When George W. Bush took office in 2001, he did not dismantle the Clinton-era re-entry programs; rather, he adapted them to fit his faith-based agenda. Despite his strong support for capital punishment, President Bush may be the most pro-prisoner president in American history — at least if you disregard the war on terror (an admittedly enormous caveat). Certainly in terms of rhetoric, Bush has done more to advance the interests of prisoners than either Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. The Second Chance Act takes its name from the 2004 State of the Union address in which Bush asked Congress to pass a $300 million program to help prisoners as they re-enter society: "In the past, we've worked together to bring mentors to children of prisoners, and provide treatment for the addicted, and help for the homeless. Tonight I ask you to consider another group of Americans in need of help. This year, some 600,000 inmates will be released from prison back into society. We know from long experience that if they can't find work, or a home, or help, they are much more likely to commit crime and return to prison. So tonight, I propose a four-year, $300 million prisoner re-entry initiative to expand job-training and placement services, to provide transitional housing, and to help newly released prisoners get mentoring, including from faith-based groups. America is the land of second chance, and when the gates of the prison open, the path ahead should lead to a better life."

Democrats were flabbergasted. Representative Stephanie Tubbs Jones calls it "the only thing that George W. Bush has ever said at a State of the Union that made me stand up and cheer." Representative Danny Davis says, "I always tell people that when he said that, I was the first person up to applaud, even though I was on the Democratic side of the aisle."

According to Mark Earley, Bush's speech "very subtly sent a signal to conservative Republicans that it's O.K. to talk about rehabilitation and doing something for prisoners as they're coming back into society, and prisoners' kids."

There are few, if any, senators more closely identified with the Christian conservative movement than Sam Brownback. Like a growing number of conservatives, Brownback is a political proponent of the so-called new-evangelical causes, which range from AIDS in Africa and slavery in Sudan to poverty and the Prison Rape Elimination Act, a bill that helped build the coalition of Democrats and Republicans in the re-entry movement. Even when he disagrees with his fellow religious conservatives, he gives faith-based reasons for doing so. A convert to Catholicism, he has said his religion informs his support for a less punitive approach to immigration reform. In February, he held a hearing intended to foster debate on whether the death penalty can be reconciled with Pope John Paul II's call to create "a culture of life."

Brownback also routinely mentions prison reform — especially the faith-based variety — in public speeches. During Alberto Gonzales's confirmation hearing to become attorney general, he made a special point of asking Gonzales about his plans to reduce prison recidivism. He wrote a letter to The Washington Post in February complaining about an op-ed by the U.C.L.A. psychologist David Farabee, who dismissed the Second Chance Act as a return to "the intuitively appealing programs that we correctly rejected 30 years ago." Brownback countered in his letter, "We should not be resigned to allowing generation after generation to return to prison because they don't have the tools to break the cycle."

When I visited him earlier this year, Brownback seemed highly aware of the dangers, even for a conservative Republican from Kansas, of seeming the slightest bit soft on crime. "I wouldn't say I represent the mainstream of this," he insisted. "I think we have to prove results" — that is, demonstrate an actual reduction in recidivism rates among newly released prisoners. He continued: "I personally favor a number of these faith-based approaches. But if there are other approaches, let's try them. This is an enormous problem, and since the '70s, we have basically just said we'll lock people up."

Later, in his office in the Senate Hart Building, Brownback implicitly raised the specter of Willie Horton — the fear that he and the other sponsors of the bill would be blamed for crimes committed by the formerly incarcerated: "Imagine you get one bad prisoner coming out and committing a heinous crime, which is likely to happen. And people's reaction is, they get mad. They don't want this guy out on the streets that's doing this. If you can't show, look, by doing these programs we are cutting the recidivism rate overall, I don't think it will stand the blowback when that situation inevitably happens."

Chris Cannon, a Utah conservative who is the bill's Republican point man in the House, is less circumspect than Brownback. On crime, Cannon can sound like a liberal Democrat, if liberal Democrats still talked the way he did during my first phone conversation with him in August: "Republicans have taken a pretty harsh position, just locking people up." And: "The system has a very strong tendency to change them for the worse. Everybody knows that, I think." And: "Our current system is fundamentally immoral."

DOJ_NMG_0108941

A few weeks later, in his Congressional office, Cannon was just as adamant: “I think society has a huge obligation to prisoners. I think that obligation transcends our current view, which is: Lock them up, hide them away, keep my daughter safe, keep my house safe, if he or she burgles, I want that person gone. Out of sight, out of mind. Away. I think that violates the fundamental concepts of who we are as Americans.

“Nobody thinks this is a bill that solves our moral dilemma,” he went on. “Maybe I should say moral crisis. But it is a first step, an agreeable first step, and it allows us to take a look at where we ought to think about ending up.” But even Cannon occasionally realizes he’s treading on dangerous political ground. After this preamble, apropos of nothing, he declared: “In this whole thing, nobody is being soft on crime. Nobody is saying, let these people out. It’s about after someone is found to have committed a crime, what do we do to help that person become a useful, productive member of society?” Which, of course, involves letting them out.

Cannon and his allies toiled hard on behalf of the Second Chance Act, and they helped shepherd it through the House, where the Republican leadership pledged to schedule a vote if the Senate did the same. But despite their efforts, the outgoing Congress failed to move forward. The first sign of trouble came in the summer. When the bill reached the House Judiciary Committee, Representative Louie Gohmert of Texas tried to amend it so that it explicitly, rather than implicitly, authorized the financing of faith-based organizations. Gohmert’s proposed amendment drew enthusiastic support from Republicans, but it alienated Democrats, who would have scuttled the bill in the Senate. The bill’s Democratic supporters accept that the Bush administration will allocate some of the funds to Christian organizations. But they draw the line at direct legislative authorization to finance religious organizations. Such an authorization was anathema to them unless it contained additional language restricting faith-based groups from proselytizing and from discriminating on the basis of religion in their hiring decisions. To keep the bill on course, four Republicans — including Cannon and Coble — turned against their colleagues and joined with Democrats to defeat Gohmert’s amendment.

In the Senate, with 37 co-sponsors and the support of Republican leaders, the bill seemed sure to pass. But in mid-December, as the legislative term came to an end, Senator Tom Coburn — a Christian conservative from Oklahoma who has said, “As a physician, I believe that we ought to be doing drug treatment rather than incarceration” — ignored personal appeals from Brownback, Specter and others and put a hold on the bill. Coburn supports the bill’s objectives and calls it “a good act,” but his fiscal-conservative conscience overcame his social-conservative one. He demanded the termination of other federal programs that, in his view, served similar purposes. The bill’s supporters must have felt betrayed, as some assumed that Coburn had pledged not to prevent the bill’s passage. Even so, the bill seems likely to pass, with some modifications, in the next legislative session.

In order for that to happen, the Democrats will have to take a step similar to the one Bill Clinton encouraged them to take in the 1990s, when they conceded that the country’s desire for changes in affirmative action, welfare and crime policy was more than just a proxy for racism. By passing the Second Chance Act, Democrats can acknowledge that the Christian desire to improve the lives of prisoners is more than a mere proxy for evangelism. And in doing so, they can re-embrace a cause of their own: the creation of a criminal-justice system that is more humane and more just. The current moment is, in Michael Jacobson’s view, “the best opportunity of the last 25 years for altering the way in which the United States has used incarceration.” But if that moment is to be seized, if there’s any possibility to reform a prison system that almost everyone thinks has failed, both parties are going to have to rely, at least a little bit, on faith.

Md. Death Penalty May Come To Fore (WP)

By John Wagner And Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

The emotionally charged, polarizing issue of the death penalty was barely mentioned during the campaign for Maryland governor. And it hardly seemed something that Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley would be eager to wade into during his first months in office, when he plans to focus on "the things we agree on."

Yet the confluence of national currents and a Maryland court ruling last week halting executions on a technicality could make the death penalty a defining issue of O'Malley's tenure.

DOJ_NMG_0108942

In effect, Maryland suddenly has a moratorium on executions, and the new governor, who is personally opposed to capital punishment, could play a pivotal role in determining when -- and whether -- it resumes.

"I think the chances of someone being executed on O'Malley's watch decrease very significantly as a result of the court's opinion," said Timothy Maloney, a lawyer and former Prince George's County delegate.

That's due largely to a broad shift in dynamics that has sprung from a narrow ruling.

Before last week, halting executions in Maryland would have required legislation from a General Assembly that in recent years has shown a waning appetite to take up the issue. Despite his personal beliefs, O'Malley seemed unlikely to champion a messy cause that could crowd out his early priorities.

Now, however, executions are not likely to resume without action from his administration. Under the ruling by the Court of Appeals, new regulations must be drafted before the state may put more prisoners to death -- and early signs from O'Malley and his aides suggest that he sees no reason to rush that process.

Given new questions about lethal injection that have arisen in California, Florida and other states, O'Malley could also seize the opportunity for a broader discussion about the wisdom of the death penalty, lawmakers and advocates on both sides of the issue say.

The night of the ruling, O'Malley said he was certain that "all of this will spark a renewed debate as to whether all of the money we spend prosecuting death penalty cases might be better spent fighting violent crime and saving lives."

O'Malley has said little since to suggest what form that debate should take. But it would be well within Annapolis tradition to appoint a commission to study the issue, pushing off any possibility of an execution in the state.

Michael Paranzino, the head of Throw Away the Key, a Kensington-based nonprofit organization that supports capital punishment, said he expects that O'Malley will welcome the opportunity to effectively impose a moratorium on the death penalty.

By doing little or nothing, Paranzino said, O'Malley and other death penalty opponents might accomplish their goal without paying the political price that a strong stand could entail. There appears to be no recent polling done on the issue in Maryland, but 53 percent of voters supported the death penalty in a 2004 poll conducted for the Baltimore Sun.

"I do expect them to move slowly and appoint commissions and stall, stall, stall," Paranzino said. "If the Republican Party has any pulse left in this state, that's the kind of issue they could take to the voters" as a campaign issue four years hence.

Carol Hirschburg, a leading GOP political consultant in Maryland, said it was unclear whether the issue would get traction, however.

"I can't imagine people are going to picket the State House and get him to reinstate the death penalty," Hirschburg said. "O'Malley seems to have lucked into a pretty good situation, given his views."

Politics aside, the high court's ruling has the most immediate effect on the six inmates on Maryland's death row.

Vernon L. Evans Jr., whose case prompted last week's ruling, remains under a death warrant, and three other condemned men are believed to have exhausted their appeals to the point that they could have been executed in 2007, said Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions.

"I'm sure there's a good bit of relief," said Henderson, whose organization was a co-plaintiff in the case of Evans, convicted of the 1983 murders of two people at a Pikesville hotel. "This at least puts everything on hold. They're all still under death sentences, but the likelihood of executions in 2007, I would say, is pretty nil."

Such developments are frustrating for many relatives of murder victims, including Anne Furst McCloskey, who watched for more than a decade as the man who murdered her brother in Baltimore County in 1981 was twice sentenced to death and finally spared.

Although her brother's killer, Derrick White, remains in prison, he became eligible for parole less than a year after his death sentence was overturned, she said.

"There has to be some final judgment on killers," McCloskey said.

The pace of executions in Maryland pales compared with many other states -- five prisoners have been put to death since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976 -- but the issue has generated considerable debate in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0108943

Prompted by concerns about racial disparities in the death penalty's application, former governor Parris N. Glendening imposed a moratorium on executions in May 2002. That was overturned in January 2003, when Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. became Maryland's first Republican governor in a generation. Two inmates have been put to death during Ehrlich's tenure.

It is possible that Ehrlich could try to push through emergency regulations needed to restart the death penalty before leaving office Jan. 17. Aides say his legal counsel is reviewing options. But that appears highly unlikely to succeed.

The regulations would go before a joint legislative panel for a hearing, and the hearing would be set by the co-chairmen, Sen. Paul G. Pinsky and Del. Anne Healey, Prince George's Democrats who oppose the death penalty.

O'Malley has said he is hopeful Ehrlich will leave the issue for the new administration. In an interview last week, the governor-elect mentioned a case pending in federal court that could shed light on whether Maryland's use of lethal injection constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment." It is unclear when a ruling might be issued, but activists on both sides of the issue do not expect an O'Malley administration to issue regulations before then.

Moreover, O'Malley aides suggest that it is entirely reasonable to give an incoming corrections secretary several months to review the state's death penalty procedures. That Cabinet post is widely considered one of the most difficult for O'Malley to fill and could still be open when he takes office.

It is possible that O'Malley's administration could decline to submit new regulations for the duration of his term, in effect creating a moratorium that lasts as long as he is in office.

Aides say that strategy has drawbacks, and it is one that would bring protest at some point from Republicans. "If there's going to be a policy change, that should come under the jurisdiction of the General Assembly," said incoming House Minority Leader Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), a death penalty supporter.

Some powerful voices in the legislature, including Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., predicted that executions will resume in Maryland in cases that warrant the punishment. But Miller (D-Calvert) acknowledged that the process to get there is "very cumbersome."

Other lawmakers suggested that O'Malley, who has promised to enforce the law regardless of his personal beliefs, could leave the issue to the legislature, asking lawmakers to create a framework for moving forward. Legislation that allowed executions to resume would be subject to a filibuster in the Senate, however, and is not certain to pass, said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

In coming weeks, lawmakers will be looking at O'Malley to signal where the process is headed, said Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), vice chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

"It's in his lap, absolutely," Rosenberg said.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Election Challenge For Florida District Is Taken To The House (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

A battle over who won the congressional election in Florida's 13th District is in the courts and could be debated in Congress itself.

Christine Jennings, the Democrat, informed Congress last week that she was contesting the election, claiming that electronic voting machines malfunctioned and that state officials wrongly certified the election in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan. She also filed a lawsuit asking for access to the source code of the machines, manufactured by Election Systems & Software Inc.

Two weeks after the Nov. 7 election, the state certified Buchanan as the winner by 369 votes. Jennings wants a new vote. If she prevails, the Democratic gains in the midterm elections will increase to 31 House seats.

On Election Day, 18,000 Sarasota County voters who went to the polls registered no choice in the congressional race. Jennings argued that that was evidence of a machine glitch, but the state indicated that it found no evidence of one. ES&S also rejected her argument, and Buchanan said she should concede.

DOJ_NMG_0108944

On Wednesday, Jennings officially contested the election with the House Administration Committee, which usually does not take any action until an election dispute moves through the courts. Buchanan has 30 days to respond. He is likely to be sworn in next week.

Jennings's challenge, which has highlighted long-standing concerns this year about the reliability of electronic voting technology, faces long odds against success. According to a report by the Congressional Research Service, most of the 105 contested elections since 1933 have been decided against the challenger.

ES&S has opposed sharing its programming code, saying that it is confidential and that its machines elsewhere worked just fine.La. House Seat at Risk

Population estimates released by the Census Bureau last week suggest that the loss of population in Louisiana from Hurricane Katrina could result in the state's losing one of its seven congressional seats, according to Election Data Services Inc., a consulting firm.

According to the analysis, 2006 population estimates would give five states -- Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah -- an additional seat each in Congress, while Texas would gain two seats. Seven states would lose seats -- Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. This year, Georgia and Nevada joined the list of states that would gain seats, while Massachusetts and Louisiana joined the list of states that would lose seats.

These estimates are based on 2006 figures, not 2010 figures, which ultimately will provide the basis for Congress to allocate seats to each state. But the estimates show a general trend in population growth and its impact on the political map.New Note in Vilsack Story

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who is pursuing the Democratic presidential nomination, said Friday that he received a letter that could help him find his birth mother. Vilsack, who was adopted in Pittsburgh shortly after he was born 56 years ago, said he would think over what to do with the material.

"You have to have time to think about things like this," said Vilsack, according to the Associated Press. "This is a decision nobody else can make."

Vilsack has already made his life story a part of his campaign persona. He was adopted at a young age and then grew up with a mother who battled alcoholism and a father who had financial difficulties. At a time when voters are forming their basic views of presidential candidates, the new development, if pursued, could spark great interest in Vilsack's life story.

Vilsack said the letter recently arrived at his Des Moines campaign offices from a nun who worked at a home for unwed mothers. "It was a place for young women [to] go to have their babies and then decide whether to leave them there," Vilsack said, according to the AP. He added that the letter said birth records are still available if he wants them.

Quasi-Freedom Agenda (WP)

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

For President Bush, democracy doesn't begin at home.

POLITICIANS OFTEN treat the disenfranchisement of U.S. citizens who live in the District of Columbia as a parochial issue, a concern of Washingtonians alone. It is parochial, of course, in the way that achieving democracy in Iraq is a parochial issue for Iraqis and achieving democracy in China a parochial issue for Chinese. But as President Bush has stated so eloquently, the freedom of Iraqis and Chinese is also a concern for all humanity. "[I]t is the policy of the United States to seek and support the growth of democratic movements and institutions in every nation and culture," he said in his second inaugural address. So why not Washington, D.C.?

Post reporters asked Mr. Bush that question during an interview last week. Here is how he dodged:

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

DOJ_NMG_0108945

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

In fact no one was asking that the president comment on specific legislation. He could easily have responded this way: "I know that citizens of the District of Columbia pay taxes for their country, and I know many of them have gone to war for their country. They should have a say in how their country is ruled. I look forward to working with Congress to find the best way to make that happen."

Instead we get squirming evasions and feeble humor. To be honest, we don't find it funny; if anything, it's pathetic that six years into his presidency Mr. Bush can't bring himself to endorse basic rights for residents of his current hometown.

In that same stirring address two years ago, Mr. Bush said that "rights must be . . . secured by free dissent and the participation of the governed." He didn't qualify the principle; there was no asterisk, as in: *except for majority-Democratic cities. Either he believes in democracy, or he doesn't.

Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

Throughout the 1980s and early '90s, women of all economic levels — poor, middle class and rich — were steadily gaining ground on their male counterparts in the work force. By the mid-'90s, women earned more than 75 cents for every dollar in hourly pay that men did, up from 65 cents just 15 years earlier.

Largely without notice, however, one big group of women has stopped making progress: those with a four-year college degree. The gap between their pay and the pay of male college graduates has actually widened slightly since the mid-'90s.

For women without a college education, the pay gap with men has narrowed only slightly over the same span.

These trends suggest that all the recent high-profile achievements — the first female secretary of state, the first female lead anchor of a nightly newscast, the first female president of Princeton, and, next month, the first female speaker of the House — do not reflect what is happening to most women, researchers say.

A decade ago, it was possible to imagine that men and women with similar qualifications might one day soon be making nearly identical salaries. Today, that is far harder to envision.

"Nothing happened to the pay gap from the mid-1950s to the late '70s," said Francine D. Blau, an economist at Cornell and a leading researcher of gender and pay. "Then the '80s stood out as a period of sharp increases in women's pay. And it's much less impressive after that."

Last year, college-educated women between 36 and 45 years old, for example, earned 74.7 cents in hourly pay for every dollar that men in the same group did, according to Labor Department data analyzed by the Economic Policy Institute. A decade earlier, the women earned 75.7 cents.

The reasons for the stagnation are complicated and appear to include both discrimination and women's own choices. The number of women staying home with young children has risen recently, according to the Labor Department; the increase has been sharpest among highly educated mothers, who might otherwise be earning high salaries. The pace at which women are flowing into highly paid fields also appears to have slowed.

Like so much about gender and the workplace, there are at least two ways to view these trends. One is that women, faced with most of the burden for taking care of families, are forced to choose jobs that pay less — or, in the case of stay-at-home mothers, nothing at all.

If the government offered day-care programs similar to those in other countries or men spent more time caring for family members, women would have greater opportunity to pursue whatever job they wanted, according to this view.

The other view is that women consider money a top priority less often than men do. Many may relish the chance to care for children or parents and prefer jobs, like those in the nonprofit sector, that offer more opportunity to influence other people's lives.

DOJ_NMG_0108946

Both views, economists note, could have some truth to them.

"Is equality of income what we really want?" asked Claudia Goldin, an economist at Harvard who has written about the revolution in women's work over the last generation. "Do we want everyone to have an equal chance to work 80 hours in their prime reproductive years? Yes, but we don't expect them to take that chance equally often."

Whatever role their own preferences may play in the pay gap, many women say they continue to battle subtle forms of lingering prejudice. Indeed, the pay gap between men and women who have similar qualifications and work in the same occupation — which economists say is one of the purest measures of gender equality — has barely budged since 1990.

Today, the discrimination often comes from bosses who believe they treat everyone equally, women say, but it can still create a glass ceiling that keeps them from reaching the best jobs at a company.

"I don't think anyone would ever say I couldn't do the job as well as a man," said Christine Kwapnoski, a 42-year-old bakery manager at a Sam's Club in Northern California who will make $63,000 this year, including overtime. Still, Ms. Kwapnoski said she was paid significantly less than men in similar jobs, and she has joined a class-action lawsuit against Wal-Mart Stores, which owns Sam's Club.

The lawsuit is part of a spurt of cases in recent years contending gender discrimination at large companies, including Boeing, Costco, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley. Last month, the Supreme Court heard arguments in a case against Goodyear Tire and Rubber.

At Sam's Club, Ms. Kwapnoski said that when she was a dock supervisor, she discovered that a man she supervised was making as much as she was. She was later promoted with no raise, even though men who received such a promotion did get more money, she said.

"Basically, I was told it was none of my business, that there was nothing I could do about it," she said.

Ms. Kwapnoski does not have a bachelor's degree, but her allegations are typical of the recent trends in another way: the pay gap is now largest among workers earning relatively good salaries.

At Wal-Mart, the percentage of women dwindles at each successive management level. They hold almost 75 percent of department-head positions, according to the company. But only about 20 percent of store managers, who can make significantly more than $100,000, are women.

This is true even though women receive better evaluations than men on average and have longer job tenure, said Brad Seligman, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the lawsuit.

Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., a lawyer for Wal-Mart, said the company did not discriminate. "It's really a leap of logic to assume that the data is a product of discrimination," Mr. Boutrous said. "People have different interests, different priorities, different career paths" — and different levels of desire to go into management, he added.

The other companies that have been sued also say they do not discriminate.

Economists say that the recent pay trends have been overlooked because the overall pay gap, as measured by the government, continues to narrow. The average hourly pay of all female workers rose to 80.1 percent of men's pay last year, from 77.3 percent in 2000.

But that is largely because women continue to close the qualifications gap. More women than men now graduate from college, and the number of women with decades of work experience is still growing rapidly. Within many demographic groups, though, women are no longer gaining ground.

Ms. Blau and her husband, Lawrence M. Kahn, another Cornell economist, have done some of the most detailed studies of gender and pay, comparing men and women who have the same occupation, education, experience, race and labor-union status. At the end of the late 1970s, women earned about 82 percent as much each hour as men with a similar profile. A decade later, the number had shot up to 91 percent, offering reason to wonder if women would reach parity.

But by the late '90s, the number remained at 91 percent. Ms. Blau and Mr. Kahn have not yet examined the current decade in detail, but she said other data suggested that there had been little movement.

During the 1990s boom, college-educated men received larger raises than women on average. Women have done slightly better than the men in the last few years, but not enough to make up for the late '90s, the Economic Policy Institute analysis found.

DOJ_NMG_0108947

There is no proof that discrimination is the cause of the remaining pay gap, Ms. Blau said. It is possible that the average man, brought up to view himself the main breadwinner, is more committed to his job than the average woman.

But researchers note that government efforts to reduce sex discrimination have ebbed over the period that the pay gap has stagnated. In the 1960s and '70s, laws like Title VII and Title IX prohibited discrimination at work and in school and may have helped close the pay gap in subsequent years. There have been no similar pushes in the last couple of decades.

Women have continued to pour into high-paid professions like law, medicine and corporate management where they were once rare, but the increases seem to have slowed, noted Reeve Vanneman, a sociologist at the University of Maryland.

Medicine offers a particularly good window on these changes. Roughly 40 percent of medical school graduates are women today. Yet many of the highest paid specialties, the ones in which salaries often exceed $400,000, remain dominated by men and will be for decades to come, based on the pipeline of residents.

Only 28 percent of radiology residents in 2004-5 were women, the Association of American Medical Colleges has reported. Only 10 percent of orthopedic surgery residents were female. The specialties in which more than half of new doctors are women, like dermatology, family medicine and pediatrics, tend to pay less.

Melanie Kingsley, a 28-year-old resident at the Indiana University School of Medicine, said she had wanted to be a doctor for as long as she could recall. For a party celebrating her graduation from medical school, her mother printed up invitations with a photo of Dr. Kingsley wearing a stethoscope — when she was a toddler.

As the first doctor in her family, though, she did not have a clear idea of which specialty she would choose until she spent a summer working alongside a female dermatologist in Chicago. There, she saw that dermatologists worked with everyone from newborns to the elderly and worked on nearly every part of the body, and she was hooked.

"You get paid enough to support your family and enjoy life," said Dr. Kingsley, a lifelong Indiana resident. "Yeah, maybe I won't make a lot of money. But I'll be happy with my day-to-day job, and that's the reason I went into medicine — to help other people." She added: "I have seen people do it for the money, and they're not very happy."

The gender differences among medical specialties point to another aspect of the current pay gap. In earlier decades, the size of the gap was similar among middle-class and affluent workers. At times, it was actually smaller at the top.

But the gap is now widest among highly paid workers. A woman making more than 95 percent of all other women earned the equivalent of $36 an hour last year, or about $90,000 a year for working 50 hours a week. A man making more than 95 percent of all other men, putting in the same hours, would have earned $115,000 — a difference of 28 percent.

At the very top of the income ladder, the gap is probably even larger. The official statistics do not capture the nation's highest earners, and in many fields where pay has soared — Wall Street, hedge funds, technology — the top jobs are overwhelmingly held by men.

Taser Debate (HC)

By Larry Karson

Houston Chronicle, December 24, 2006

Another politician, this time state Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston, has joined the band wagon for "fixing" the Taser problem by suggesting that legislation is needed to put a moratorium on the use of the stun guns by the police.

Make no mistake about it: There have been numerous cases nationwide of poorly trained officers and negligent managers who have allowed the continued misuse of Tasers because, as one blogger remarked, the devices are treated as a "motivational tool" to control the citizens the police are supposed to be serving. Just go to YouTube and you will get an eyeful of incompetent cops performing negligent, if not criminal, acts with the devices.

From stunning an individual multiple times because they wouldn't "comply" with an order (think about how well you would comply, as well as understand someone's instructions, after 50,000 volts jolted your system) to using them on people who didn't immediately conform to verbal directions (but were otherwise nonaggressive and may not have even understood the commands being given to them), Tasers have had had a trackrecord of misuse since their introduction to police work.

But the fault doesn't always fall at the feet of the street officers— even if the suspect does after being Tased. For the real reason Tasers are consistently misused in some departments, look to management.

DOJ_NMG_0108948

Good police policy allows officers several options to control a situation. For example, if words or physical control won't work the officer may have no choice but to use an Oleoresin Capsicum (OC) "pepper" spray or a baton. To defend themselves or to establish control in a fight, they also have the choice of using the Taser — not as a replacement for words and not as a substitute for physically directing someone, which is when much of the Taser misuse seems to happen; but when the confrontation is going to turn into a fight. My point is, officers need a variety of tools.

For over 150 years, police have only had their presence and "prestige" — their hands, their nightstick or baton, and their gun — to control criminals. In recent years OC spray was added, but it has limited use, at best. It's the Taser that has proven most effective in controlling the violent and in preventing officers from being injured while attempting to make an arrest. Speaking from the other side of the fence, I'd rather be Tasered than have a couple of upset officers whaling away on me with nightsticks in a fight, possibly breaking some bones in the process. (That's not to mention that if the officers swing for my head because they feel they are losing ground, that in itself is deadly force that can quickly lead to deadly consequences.)

But the other issue that comes into play, especially in Harris County, is the concept of "fearing for one's life." Every time an officer discharges his or her weapon, that is almost always the first thing the officer or deputy says about the decision: "I feared for my life."

Make no mistake. It's why most officers do shoot a suspect; and they aren't lying when they say it. But for the extremely small percentage of officers who get in a bad shooting that reasoning is also the stay-out-of-jail card accepted by the Harris County district attorney and his hand-picked grand jury — and he has five grand juries to choose from — which then historically nobills the deputy or officer.

In 2004, the Chronicle reported that only half of the 189 shootings by officers in Harris County were of suspects carrying a gun or a knife. On average, approximately one shooting a month was of someone who had no weapon. Yet, in only the most egregious cases is an officer ever even considered for prosecution.

And that is where the Taser, as Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt keeps having to remind us, comes into play. For without that alternative tool now carried by most HPD officers and many Harris County deputies, many more officers would have no choice but to use their gun instead of the Taser whenever they were in fear for their lives.

We, the community, have offered our officers an alternative to using deadly force. Though not always a feasible choice, as Chief Hurtt has stated, in at least 39 instances since December 2004, officers who could otherwise have been justified in using deadly force felt they had an opportunity to stun the suspect instead of shooting him. That figure easily surpasses whatever numbers of individuals are suspected of having died from the electrical charge of the stun gun.

What Rep. Colemanshould do is file a bill that prevents any law enforcement agency in Texas from requiring a signed affidavit from someone making a complaint against a police department, an officer or a deputy before an investigation is initiated for the misuse of force or for any other misconduct.

The Department of Justice has directed numerous other police departments to accept anonymous, verbal and unsworn complaints for investigation. Even federal agencies are mandated to investigate all allegations against their own agents, whether sworn or not. Yet in protecting its departments and their officers, local law enforcement continues to demand sworn affidavits and limit to whom and how a complaint can be made. Who in their right mind would identify themselves as a complainant against an officer allegedly trafficking in narcotics or associating with a drug cartel or organized crime?

If abused, assaulted or Tasered by an officer, many may expect the officer to harass or pursue them if they identify themselves as a complainant to the police. Yet, local police departments continue to demand a sworn affidavit before an investigation is initiated.

Why? They claim they don't want to take the time and trouble investigating the unsubstantiated complaints that they believe would get filed. But they actually use the affidavit as a filtering device to minimize complaints against their departments and to protect their own officers.

I know that the Houston Police Department wouldn't hesitate to investigate one of its own for a narcotic trafficking violation. But after all the corruption that has been reported on the Texas-Mexico border does anyone actually think everyone trusts the police to not protect one of their own?

DOJ_NMG_0108949

When it comes to officer misconduct, any complaint should be investigated. That's where I suggest Rep. Coleman needs to focus his attention.

Chief Hurtt and Mayor Bill White have monitored the actions ofHPD officers and are commissioning a study of the use of Tasers by the department. Both are appropriate responses to an issue that is of concern to all in the community. As part of their commission, these two leaders also need to include members of the community as they are the ones most subject to getting Tasered by the police.

But let's not throw out the baby with the bath water when it comes to Tasers: After all, 39 individuals are alive here who might otherwise have been dead and buried but for the discretion of HPD's finest.

And I suspect that Houston Texans lineman Fred Weary made 40, as unjust and undeserved as the use of the Taser against him may have been.

Karson is a lecturer in the Department of Criminal Justice at the University of Houston-Downtown. He can be e-mailed at karsonl@uhd.edu.

ANTITRUST:

2006: The Year In PCs And Chips (PCWORLD)

By Ben Ames

PC World, December 24, 2006

Vendors in the PC and chip industries moved boldly in 2006, changing the marketplace map through mergers, recalls, layoffs, and lawsuits. Oh, and they launched some impressive new products too, keeping Moore's Law moving as they built smaller, faster chips and cooler, more efficient computers. Here, in chronological order, we share a sampling of the biggest events of the past 12 months. Apple Releases Macs That Run on Intel Chips

In January Apple Computer sold its first Mac PCs that run on chips from Intel instead of on chips from IBM and Motorola, fulfilling a promise made in June 2005. Apple substitutes Intel's Core Duo chip for the PowerPC and G4 chips in its iMac and 15-inch MacBook Pro, soon followed by the Mac mini and 13-inch MacBook.

The move also let Apple expand from its own operating system. In April, Apple launches its Boot Camp software, enabling Intel-based Macs to run their choice of Apple's OS X or Microsoft's Windows XP. AMD Announces ATI Acquisition

In July Advanced Micro Devices announces it would buy Canadian graphics chip vendor ATI Technologies for $5.4 billion. Integrating its processors with ATI's chip sets would allow AMD to sell platforms of integrated technologies, competitive with Intel bundles like Centrino, Viiv, and VPro, analysts say. Another effect of the merger is to leave Nvidia as the only independent graphics chip vendor in the market.

By November, Nvidia also says it will expand, paying $357 million to buy PortalPlayer, a maker of semiconductors for digital music players. Battery Recall Begins

Dell recalls 4.1 million notebook batteries in August as a growing number of customers report they could short-circuit, causing some to overheat and catch fire. Within days, other vendors join the recall, leading to 8.1 million recalls of the lithium ion cells manufactured by Sony. Other PC vendors affected by the largest recall in consumer electronics history include Apple, Fujitsu, Hitachi, Lenovo, and Toshiba. Intel Reorganizes, Lays Off Thousands

In September, Intel lays off 10,500 workers--about 10 percent of the workforce--as Chief Executive Paul Otellini enacts a promised reorganization that has already included the sale of its media and signaling business, the firing of 1000 executives, and the sale of its XScale smart phone chip division. Otellini blames slowing growth in the PC market when he predicts Intel's annual profits will reach only $9.3 billion for 2006, down from $12.1 billion in 2005. Analysts point out that Intel had also lost revenue by slashing prices on its chips in an effort to slow gains in market share by rival AMD. Justice Department Investigates SRAM Market

The Department of Justice launches a probe in October of sales practices in the SRAM memory chip market, serving subpoenas to Cypress Semiconductor, Mitsubishi Electric, Samsung Electronics, Sony Electronics, and Toshiba. The investigation comes shortly after the Justice Department wins convictions and multimillion-dollar fines for price fixing in the closely related DRAM industry. By December, the Justice Department also turns its focus to graphics chips makers, demanding documents from AMD and Nvidia as part of an antitrust investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0108950

Meanwhile, AMD continues another antitrust fight, continuing its long-running suit against Intel over accusations that the much larger chip-maker intimidated vendors from using AMD chips. That case is scheduled to come before a judge in April 2009. HP Tops Dell as World's Largest PC Vendor

Hewlett-Packard overtakes Dell in October as the world's largest PC vendor, capping a year when Dell had reported a series of sagging profits and the start of an accounting investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. HP has its own problems, coping with a spying scandal on its board of directors that leads to criminal investigations and the resignation of chief executive Patricia Dunn. But Dell is unable to stop its loss of market share even when the company ends its longtime allegiance to Intel and begins selling PCs powered by chips from AMD as well. Dell Chief Executive Kevin Rollins says the company was also hurt by slashing prices in order to bolster market share, and pledges to spend $100 million to hire more sales and call-center workers. Intel Launches Quad-Core Processors for PCs

Intel launches the first quad-core processors for mainstream desktops and servers, continuing its effort to rebound from a loss of sales to AMD. The new chips include the Core 2 Extreme QX6700 for gamers and Xeon 5300 for servers, coming just a few months after Intel launches a new family of dual-core chips including the "Conroe" Core 2 Duo for desktops and "Woodcrest" Xeon 5100 for servers.

Still, the arms race continues, as AMD emphasizes its advantage in power efficiency and pledges to launch its own quad-core processor by the second quarter of 2007, the "Barcelona" quad-core Opteron 8000 for servers.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA OKs Fuel-cell Car Production (LAT)

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, December 24, 2006

The hydrogen-powered vehicles will meet the state's zero-emission requirements.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has cleared the way for automakers to produce hydrogen-powered fuel-cell cars to meet zero-emission vehicle requirements in California and 10 other states.

In a waiver signed last week, EPA officials approved amendments adopted in 2003 by the California Air Resources Board that allow manufacturers to produce fuel cells as an alternative to battery-powered cars and light trucks previously required by the state.

"This is a real Christmas gift for all of us," Air Resources Board Chairman Dr. Robert Sawyer said in a statement. "All Californians will breathe easier because of this measure, and the technology that makes these clean cars possible can now be made available to everyone."

Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington have adopted California's rules, touted by state regulators as the toughest in the world. The rules were amended after automakers challenged them in court.

"This waiver simply reflects the prominence of fuel cells," EPA spokesman John Millett said. "Fuel cells have really taken off."

Fuel cells use hydrogen and oxygen to run an electric motor.

Automakers had mixed reactions. General Motors spokesman Dave Barthmuss said fuel-cell vehicles were "very viable to be a portion of any automaker's compliance strategy."

"A lot of milestones are being met, and a lot of progress is really being made" in developing the vehicles, he said.

GM plans to put 100 fuel-cell vehicles on the road next year as a demonstration project, he added.

Barthmuss also said the air board should be willing to review its requirements so they stay in line with the "pace of technology."

DOJ_NMG_0108951

Ford Motor Co. spokeswoman Jennifer Moore said that much uncertainty remains about fuel-cell vehicles, and that the company agrees with a U.S. Energy Department forecast that the vehicles won't be available in large numbers before 2015.

But California officials who fought for the measures painted a rosier picture, noting that the waiver also covers hybrid and super-low-polluting, gasoline-powered vehicles known as partial zero-emission vehicles.

California initially adopted its regulations in 1990, requiring that 10% of new cars sold in the state by major manufacturers by 2003 be zero-emission vehicles. The rules have been modified several times since, largely because of legal challenges by automakers.

Currently, they call for 2% of new cars from the six biggest automakers to be zero-emission vehicles, 2% to be gasoline-electric hybrids and 6% to be partial zero-emission vehicles.

Ford Tries To Outrace The Repo Man (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

DEARBORN, Mich. -- If Alan Mulally, Ford Motor Co.'s chief executive, is looking for fresh words to inspirit his troubled company -- words to replace "The Way Forward," which rang hollow as Ford slid further backward -- he might try: "Lay off the cheeseburgers, America -- you're killing yourself, which is your business, but you're also killing Ford, which is my business." That exhortation is not pithy but is oddly pertinent.

The average weight of American men (191 pounds) and women (164 pounds) has increased 25 pounds since 1960. And according to one study, in 2003 Americans' 223 million cars and light trucks burned an extra 39 million gallons of fuel for every additional pound of passenger weight. So Americans are using almost a billion gallons of gasoline more each year than they would if they were as (comparatively) svelte as they were in 1960. Because Ford is more a truck company than a car company (its big moneymakers are F-Series pickups, and sport-utility vehicles such as the Explorer are classified as trucks), it has been hit especially hard by changing consumer preferences produced by high gasoline prices. That is one reason Ford lost $5.8 billion in the third quarter.

Mulally, 61, is frequently described as having "boyish" looks and pep. But it has been only three months since William Clay Ford Jr., Henry's great-grandson, replaced himself with Mulally (Ford remains the company's executive chairman), who is going to find this an aging experience.

Already he has taken one of the great gambles in the history of American business, one perhaps unavoidable if Ford is to avoid bankruptcy. Ford has taken $23 billion in loans, most of that sum secured by almost everything Ford owns -- physical assets, patents, trademarks. The market value of Ford's outstanding stock is $15.4 billion. "The data," Mulally serenely acknowledges, "say we're going out of business."

Perhaps he is serene because he has seen, and seen off, conditions that were, if not worse, really bad. After Sept. 11, when the commercial airline market froze, Mulally, who then was at Boeing, oversaw the downsizing of that company's payroll from 127,000 to 52,000.

Still, the most difficult military maneuver is a retreat under fire, because it can become a rout, and the same is true of a corporate contraction. However many people Ford hires -- at reduced wages -- to replace some of the approximately 38,000 United Auto Workers employees who have agreed to buyouts, many of them will never have built a car. This could mean quality problems, which could further depress Ford's market share, driving a downward spiral.

Mulally's vision for Ford is forward-looking nostalgia. He wants to restore Ford to the role it had in "the middle America that we grew up with." But to "spiff up the blue oval" -- Ford's trademark -- he must market cars designed on the assumption that gasoline prices "are staying up." He talks about the need to "take the hard decisions" and "rationalize our product family" with a "simplified product portfolio." He stops short of talking -- yet -- about scrapping brands. But why is the company still making the Mercury, the average age of whose buyers is 55? Perhaps because it cost General Motors $1 billion -- payments to dealers, etc. -- to eliminate the Oldsmobile brand.

DOJ_NMG_0108952

Mulally says production efficiencies can solve half the company's economic problem. That will not suffice unless Ford efficiently produces exciting products. Mulally, a quick study, already has a rudimentary grasp of Detroit-speak: He says Ford must develop new products "with curb appeal -- the 'wow' factor."

But in 2001, with much fanfare, Ford rolled out a new version of a 1950s success, the Thunderbird. It was underpowered, handled badly and is no longer in production. Recently, the company heavily advertised the Lincoln Zephyr. But now it is called the MKZ. Why? This is the behavior of a company whose left hand does not know what its other left hand is doing.

Seventy percent of the people who go through O'Hare International Airport, Mulally says, are not going to Chicago. His point is that a snapshot of customers -- moving targets -- does not tell you where they are heading. Henry Ford, according to Mulally, said that if, when he founded his company, he had asked potential customers what they wanted, they would have said faster horses. Mulally has bet the company on its ability to develop "curb appeal" products that people do not yet know they want and to develop them before the company, which burned through about $6 billion in the last two quarters of 2006, burns the rest of its borrowed cash.

georgewill@washpost.com

Two Timber Firms Pretending To Be 'Green,' Groups Allege (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Environmentalists Want Companies' Lucrative Certification Revoked

SEATTLE -- Two of the nation's largest timber companies, Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek Timber, have polished their public images for years by participating in a program that certifies that their logging is environmentally friendly.

But in separate challenges this month from the far corners of the United States, environmental groups in Washington state and in Maine are accusing Weyerhaeuser Co. and Plum Creek Timber Co. of using the forest industry's green-labeling program as a cover while they log in ways that harm endangered spotted owls in Washington and violate forestry laws in Maine.

The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine have demanded in documents sent to the Sustainable Forestry Board that it revoke certification for the companies until they comply with standards they have pledged to uphold.

Both companies say the demands are unjustified and show ignorance of relevant facts.

The requests mark the first time that mainstream environmental groups have publicly attempted to turn the forest industry's green certification process against big timber companies by insisting that they be suspended from the program, the Sustainable Forestry Initiative, said William H. Banzhaf, president of the forestry board, which oversees certification.

Green labeling is a major marketing tool in the timber industry. It allows companies to reach a bigger marketplace while assuring increasingly sophisticated consumers that their purchases are not harming the environment.

As worry about global warming increases, green building codes are becoming politically fashionable. They have recently been adopted for private construction in the District, Montgomery County and Pasadena, Calif. Eighteen states and 11 federal agencies use such codes for their own buildings. And green codes often give credit to builders who use timber certified to have been logged in a sustainable way.

The timber industry's main lobby, the American Forest & Paper Association, developed the Sustainable Forest Initiative in 1994. That was a year after the Forest Stewardship Council, a group of environmentalists, forestry experts, sociologists and indigenous groups, created another certification system that is often described as far less friendly to the interests of big timber companies.

The competing certification regimes are usually referred to by initialisms -- SFI and FSC -- that can be easily confused. Some environmentalists say this is an intentional industry effort to muddy the green-labeling waters and confuse the public. Timber companies dispute that assertion.

Unlike the industry-created SFI program, FSC rules allow virtually no cutting of old-growth forests, nor do they allow operators to log off a diverse stand of trees and replace it with a plantation forest dominated by a single species, which is often done to enhance the commercial value of forestland.

DOJ_NMG_0108953

Home Depot, Ikea and Williams-Sonoma are among the major retailers that have announced their preference for FSC-certified lumber or paper. The U.S. Green Building Council, which oversees green standards for construction in the District and Montgomery County, among other places, credits only builders that use FSC lumber. But other retailers, such as OfficeMax, have preferences that do not distinguish between certification systems.

The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine argue that the Sustainable Forest Initiative could lose all credibility if its board does not suspend Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek until they clean up their forestry practices.

Banzhaf, president of the Sustainable Forestry Board, said the complaints from responsible environmental groups in Washington and Maine are an "important" challenge to the certification system and will be thoroughly investigated.

At the same time, Banzhaf defends the integrity of the SFI certification process, noting that since 2002 it has been "independent of all influence by the forestry trade association."

The program hires third-party certification companies and is financed through licensing fees and foundation grants, he said. Its board members include leaders of major environmental groups, such as the Nature Conservancy, as well as senior state foresters and the heads of several major timber companies, including Plum Creek and Weyerhaeuser.

The separate but nearly simultaneous challenges to the forest industry's certification program appear to be a coincidence.

Over the past year, the Natural Resources Council of Maine has used the state's freedom-of-information law to uncover 18 previously unpublicized violations of state forestry laws by Plum Creek, the largest private owner of timberland in the United States, with more than 900,000 acres in Maine.

The council learned that Plum Creek, without public notice, had been fined $57,000 for its repeated forestry violations, the largest such fine in Maine's history. The violations included cutting too much timber without proper plans and failing to notify the state about clear-cuts.

"Our concern is that consumers in Maine are being routinely misled into thinking that Plum Creek is managing sustainably, when, in fact, they are not complying with basic laws," said Cathy Johnson, the group's project director for the North Woods.

Maine's chief forester, Alec Giffen, confirmed Plum Creek's violations between 1998 and 2002. "We have not had any other case that involved a $57,000 fine, nor have we had any other case where there was this number of noncompliant timber harvests," he said.

But Giffen said Plum Creek self-reported many of the violations and has taken corrective actions. "They have a good compliance history since 2002," he said.

An executive at Plum Creek said it would be "absurd" to revoke the company's SFI certification.

"We get it right 99 percent of the time," said Jim Lehner, who was general manager for Plum Creek's northeast region during the time of the violations and is now its director of community affairs. "It was certainly a mistake. We made a mistake. The fine was a big one. We haven't had any violations since."

Lehner said the Natural Resources Council of Maine is trying to discredit Plum Creek as part of its campaign to halt the company's plans for large-scale residential development in the North Woods around Moosehead Lake.

In Washington state, the Seattle Audubon Society does not allege that Weyerhaeuser, the largest manager of timberlands in the world, broke any state or federal laws. But Audubon says that the company logged its forestland in southwestern Washington in a way that harmed the habitat of four endangered Northern spotted owls and violated SFI certification standards by failing to "protect known sites" of imperiled creatures.

Northern spotted owls were placed on the federal endangered species list in 1990, but their numbers have declined by 50 percent since then in Washington state, in part because of continued loss of habitat.

To protect the reclusive birds, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service urges timber companies in the Northwest to refrain from logging more than 60 percent of older trees in areas around known owl nests. Those areas are called owl circles.

The Audubon group, however, cites government and industry estimates showing that circles around four owls on Weyerhaeuser land were much more aggressively cut, leaving between 8 percent and 22 percent of the suitable habitat.

That logging concerned James Michaels, a supervising biologist for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and an expert on spotted owls. His agency wrote a letter to Weyerhaeuser last year, asking the company to stop.

DOJ_NMG_0108954

"It was enough of an issue to raise a flag with us to say we wanted to work with Weyerhaeuser so as not to put those birds at risk," Michaels said.

After Weyerhaeuser was warned about the risk, Michaels said, it suspended further plans for cutting trees near the birds and has been willing to work with federal officials.

A Weyerhaeuser spokesman, Frank Mendizabal, said the company "has not received any notice from any public agency that we have caused any harm" to the owls.

He said that Audubon's assertions that the company has violated SFI standards are without merit and that Weyerhaeuser "operates at the highest standards" for sustainable forestry.

Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek have 45 days to respond to the certification challenges by the Seattle Audubon Society and the National Resources Council of Maine. A full investigation by the SFI system is likely to take several months.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Cigarette Tax Set To Take A Big Leap (DMN)

By Karen Brooks

The Dallas Morning News, December 24, 2006

AUSTIN – Every time he stands outside a nonsmoking bar shivering in the cold winter air, Camel Light cigarette dangling from his lips, Chris Maddock feels punished.

And he likes it.

JIM MAHONEY/DMN Don Novak wrote a check for his purchase Wednesday at Smokey's Discount Cigarettes on Plano Road in Dallas. He plans to start buying his cigarettes in Oklahoma.

That's why the 34-year-old Austin man is looking forward to Jan. 1, when cigarettes go up at least $1 per pack and about $12 per carton after Texas officially increases the tax on cigarettes to help pay for a property-tax cut.

Maybe, finally, it'll make him quit.

"I invite the tax. I'm all for anything that makes it harder for me, both individually and in society, to smoke," he said. "I love things like that. I love smoking bans, I love feeling marginalized and having to pay more for what really is a habit that's bad for my health."

Anticipation is already rising among smokers and nonsmokers and their respective big-money advocates, more than a week before the tax hits convenience stores and smoke shops across Texas.

Convenience stores are bracing for a drop in sales. Discount shops are running out of some brands. Distributors are liquidating their inventories. And federal agents are keeping an eye on the situation after tax increases in other states led to robberies and smuggling rings.

And many smokers are vowing to either kick the habit or look outside state lines for their cigarettes – given that a pack-a-day habit will cost an additional $30 a month after New Year's Day.

Don Novak of Dallas, annoyed at both the cost and the premise of the new tax, plans to make regular cigarette runs to Oklahoma to stock up.

"It might cost me $10 in gas, but I'll just have the satisfaction that I'm buying for a cheaper price up there," said Mr. Novak, 55.

In El Paso, smoker Bonnie Carreno could easily trek across the Mexican border into Juarez for some cheap smokes – if she can get them back into Texas without declaring them and paying the tax at the border, the scenario tax opponents are afraid will happen.

Along with the regular border customs enforcement, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms plans to coordinate with other agencies at all levels to be extra vigilant about cigarette smuggling, officials there said.

Still, it won't be difficult to bring in a few packs at a time under the radar for personal use. But after 20 years of smoking, Ms. Carreno, a 36-year-old nuclear medicine tech, isn't even going to bother.

"It's a good excuse to go ahead and quit," she said. "I've been wanting to for a while, anyway. Everybody knows it's not good for you to begin with."

Impetus for quitting

That's music to Dawn Wiatrek's ears. The spokeswoman for the American Cancer Society in Austin is hoping that more of the state's smokers – about 20 percent of adults – stub out their habit.

"We certainly expect to see an impact," she said, adding that it's still too early to say whether people are quitting already. "Along with the New Year's resolutions that tend to kick in, this is a sort of added incentive. We do expect to see additional people quitting for good."

Retired lawyer Susan Portman says most of her buddies are going to quit. But Ms. Portman, 53, of Coppell, stocked up on her favorite Skydancer brand recently at Smokey's Discount Cigarettes. She was surprised to see the stock dwindling already and grabbed the four cartons left before the price jumps from $17 to nearly $30.

"The people that wait to stock up are going to get screwed," Ms. Portman said. "There's not going to be a cigarette to be had anywhere in this city, and right before New Year's."

Some distributors, in an effort to clear the decks before they have to pay the tax on whatever inventory they have on Jan. 1, have told retailers that they're going to halt new supplies until after the New Year.

"It's shocking, and everybody I know who smokes is intending to quit," Ms. Portman said. "So I can't imagine this is going to raise any money for the state, and it's going to be a hassle for those of us who say, 'This is my only vice, leave me alone.' ... I don't know what we're going to do. Cut back, that's for sure. I smoke a lot, and I can't do that when it's this much more."

At Smokey's, customers have started to figure out that they should grab their packs while they can still afford them, the owner said.

"This week it's really kicked in," said Kim Nikolis, who has owned Smokey's for 13 years. "We doubled our business today. It's just now that people are starting to figure out that, oh my god, it's coming. ... Wholesalers are running out of some brands. I've talked to them, and there have been people buying steadily for the past two months. I guess they just want to save a little money. I don't think they're going to stop smoking."

Boost OK'd in May

Texas lawmakers passed the tax hike in May after one of the most contentious legislative battles of the past two years – the fight over how to fund public schools and fix an unconstitutional property tax system.

The Legislature cut school property taxes and replaced that revenue with a new state business tax and the higher cigarette tax. Sales tax from cars was also tweaked to provide additional revenue.

The cigarette tax hike is expected to bring in $680 million over the next year. But it didn't come without a huge fight from Big Tobacco and convenience stores, wholesalers who worry about smuggling from Mexico and other states, and smokers groups who said they were being unfairly taxed.

Texas had one of the lowest cigarette tax rates in the nation. Now it joins New York with one of the top 10 highest taxes in the nation.

When a smaller tax hike hit New York a few years ago, police reported break-ins at convenience stores citywide and a soaring black market that prompted the ATF to form a task force to combat it The city's proximity to Canada and the fact that neighboring states carried cigarettes well below the New York prices compounded the problem.

The agency could form a similar task force in Texas if it needs to, said Special Agent Tom Crowley, the ATF's spokesman in Dallas.

It will also be watching for people taking advantage of smoke shops at the state's three Indian reservations that, by virtue of their federal status, can sell tax-free cigarettes, he said. While it's not illegal to buy cigarettes there, it's illegal to resell them without paying the tax.

The governor of the Tigua Indians, who live on the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo in El Paso, said he expects a brief spike in sales right after the tax goes into effect. But he's uncertain about what will happen to their single smoke shop in the long term.

Scott Fisher, an executive of a trade association for convenience stores, said he'll probably quit smoking his premium Merits – calling the decision a "no-brainer."

DOJ_NMG_0108956

As for smuggling, he advised his members to watch out for people evading the taxes – although he said some areas, like sSouth Texas, may be uniquely insulated from that due to the increasing drug violence in Nuevo Laredo along the border to Matamoros.

"I don't know how much of a factor that's going to be for them because of, frankly, the danger to Americans," Mr. Fisher said. "I'm a smoker, and for a dollar a pack, I wouldn't step foot over there."

Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Weapons Permits (AP)

AP, December 24, 2006

HOUSTON - Texans who are 55 or older are more likely to get concealed handgun permits than those who are in their 20s, 30s and 40s, according to Texas Department of Public Safety statistics.

That falls in line with national surveys that indicate seniors are more likely than any other age group to be gun owners.

In Texas, 42 percent of those who have concealed handgun permits are 55 or older. Texans who are 60 or older have about 25 percent of the permits issued, statistics show.

Former legislator Jerry Patterson, who wrote the Texas concealed weapons law, said getting the permit is often a question of time and money, factors that favor seniors.

"There are a whole bunch of folks in the 30-to-40 range who say they'll do that someday," Patterson said.

Residents who want a permit must pass criminal background checks, take a 10-hour handgun safety course and show proficiency in shooting.

The state also makes permits cheaper for seniors, who get a half-price discount. The permit normally costs $140.

Although studies show seniors are more worried about crime than younger people, U.S. Justice Department statistics indicate people who are 65 or older are much less likely to fall victim to violent crime or property crime.

More than 72,000 people in Texas have concealed handgun licenses. One of them is 70-year-old Karl Virtue, who got a gun last year after fighting with a man he caught stealing from a neighborhood construction site.

He said some seniors are attracted to guns because they can no longer physically defend themselves.

"When I was younger I never had to worry, because nobody was going to go out of their way to give me a hard time," Virtue said. "But when you get old, you feel you've lost your mojo. You feel more vulnerable."

Virtue now owns a 9 mm handgun.

"The old geezers in Texas are well-armed," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Parties Urge Aging Lawmakers To Hang On For One More Term (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

After 2006 Losses, GOP Particularly Fears Open Seats

The Republicans' stinging losses last month could be magnified in 2008 if veteran GOP Senate and House members decide to retire, including numerous lawmakers who will be 70 or older on that Election Day.

Sen. Tim Johnson's sudden illness was a reminder to both parties that the balance of power in Congress is fragile indeed. But Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, is a youthful 59. Republican and Democratic leaders are scrambling to persuade colleagues who qualified for Medicare back during the administration of President Bush's father to hold on for at least one more term.

GOP leaders are particularly fearful that the Democrats will be able to expand their narrow House and Senate majorities if some of Congress's biggest Republican names call it quits. Party leaders dread retirements because they create open seats, which tend to generate costly and highly competitive primaries and general-election races. "The next election cycle could be very challenging," conceded Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), the incoming chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. By losing the majority, he said, "we've lost one of the most powerful reasons for members to stay."

DOJ_NMG_0108957

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), born Nov. 18, 1923, is the oldest member of "Club 21," the unusually large class of 21 Republican senators who face reelection in 2008. Seven of those Republicans were born before World War II, including at least four who represent states that could flip Democratic.

In the House, as many as 30 Republicans may retire, according to operatives from both parties, with senior lawmakers including Reps. Ralph Regula (Ohio), 82, and C.W. Bill Young of Florida, who turned 76 on Dec. 16, leading the list. Democrats are nervous, too. Days after the Nov. 7 election, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) called the 12 Democratic senators whose terms are up in 2008 -- including Sens. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.), 82, and John D. Rockefeller IV, who turns 70 next year -- to encourage them to stay put.

For now, at least, Republican leaders are reasonably optimistic that they can keep retirements to a trickle. In a recent Washington Post interview, incoming Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) predicted that every member of Club 21 would seek reelection. A few members have already announced their candidacies.

"While the recent election did not go my party's way, I come out of the campaign more determined than ever to fight for Alaska's interests in Washington, D.C.," Stevens, a longtime appropriator and outgoing chairman of the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, said in a statement on Nov. 16.

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee who turns 80 on Feb. 18, has indicated that he may seek a sixth term, if he remains in good health. "I've heard people as old or older than me talking about reelection," marveled Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), 73, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

"I have my track shoes on," joked Club 21 member Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, still feisty at 70, who said he intends to seek another term. Roberts chaired the Senate Intelligence Committee.

For some lawmakers, 2008 is a touchy subject. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who turns 65 on Dec. 11, 2008, is pondering his options, which include seeking a fifth Senate term and/or running for president a second time. He bristled last week when asked about his plans as he walked off the Senate floor. "You're going to ask me that right here?" he responded testily, darting off without answering.

Some political operatives view what happened in 1996 -- two years after the Republicans won control of the House and Senate -- as instructive on what might happen in the 2008 election cycle. Eight Democrats and six Republicans retired from the Senate that year. In the House, 30 Democrats and 23 Republicans retired or left to run for higher office.

The 1996 retirees included such prominent figures as Democratic Sens. Sam Nunn (Ga.), Bill Bradley (N.J.) and Howell Heflin (Ala.), and GOP Sens. Alan K. Simpson (Wyo.) and William S. Cohen (Maine). But in the House, Democrats were able to persuade some of their veterans to seek reelection. Reps. John D. Dingell (Mich.), now 80, and Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who turns 77 in June, survived 12 years in the minority and will become committee chairmen in January. Rangel will head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and Dingell will reclaim the chairmanship of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

"We tend to think the most likely to go are the folks who are older, or see the writing on the wall, in states or districts that are trending against them," said Amy Walter, who monitors House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "It's a lot more random."

One Republican who has been the subject of considerable speculation is Sen. Wayne Allard of Colorado, who is 63. He promised to serve only two terms when he was elected in 1996. Colorado just elected a Democratic governor, and the state is considered fertile ground for the Democrats' Western expansion efforts. Republicans are worried enough about their hold on the Allard seat that even some GOP politicians with ambitions to succeed him are hoping he breaks his term-limit pledge.

"Run, Senator, run," said Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who is rumored to covet the Senate seat. "An open seat fight we just don't need."

Pat Toomey, a former congressman from Pennsylvania and president of the Club for Growth, said his group, which backs fiscally conservative Republican candidates, is bracing to compete in as many as 40 House races in the next cycle. "It's a big challenge, figuring out how we step up to play in that many races," Toomey said.

What remains to be seen is how well House Republicans adjust to minority status, given that many have never experienced it and may find it very frustrating. On the other hand, Walter said: "Whether they are in the minority or the majority, they are still a member of Congress. And when you retire, you can never get that stature back."

DOJ_NMG_0108958

DOJ_NMG_0108959

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

War News:
New Pentagon Chief Briefs Bush On Iraq (AP) 1
Bush, Gates Consult Over Iraq War Strategy (HC/AP) 2
Gates Gives Bush Evaluation Of Iraq War (WP) 3
Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops (NYT) 4
Top Shiite Cleric Balks At Plan For Iraq (AP) 6
Key Iraqi Cleric Rejects U.S. Bid For Moderate Political Bloc (WP) 7
Yes, You Are The Person Of The Year! (NYT) 7
U.S. Airstrike Kills Close Ally Of Bin Laden, Pentagon Says (NYT/AP) 9
Taliban Figure Killed In Airstrike, U.S. Says (WP) 9
Aiding And Abetting The Taliban? (LAT) 10

Corporate Scandals:
Can Private Equity Build A Public Face? (NYT) 12
U.S. Attorney On The Record: Kevin Ryan (SFC) 15

Criminal Law:
The Right Has A Jailhouse Conversion (NYT) 19
Md. Death Penalty May Come To Fore (WP) 24

Civil Rights:
Election Challenge For Florida District Is Taken To The House (WP) 26
Quasi-Freedom Agenda (WP) 26
Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place (NYT) 27
Taser Debate (HC) 29

Antitrust:
2006: The Year In PCs And Chips (PCWORLD) 30

Environment/Indian Affairs:
EPA OKs Fuel-cell Car Production (LAT) 31
Ford Tries To Outrace The Repo Man (WP) 32
Two Timber Firms Pretending To Be 'Green,' Groups Allege (WP) 33

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Cigarette Tax Set To Take A Big Leap (DMN) 35
Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Weapons Permits (AP) 36

Congress-Administration:
Parties Urge Aging Lawmakers To Hang On For One More Term (WP) 37

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

WAR NEWS:

New Pentagon Chief Briefs Bush On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer
AP, December 24, 2006

President Bush, drafting an overhaul of his faltering and unpopular war plan, heard Saturday from a Pentagon chief who had just returned from Iraq with a positive impression of Iraqi leaders' plans to address sectarian violence.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates finished his first week on the job by delivering a report to Bush on the three days he spent talking with Iraqi leaders, U.S. commanders and American soldiers. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, who traveled with Gates to Iraq, helped make the presentation.

The early-morning meeting at Camp David in Maryland's mountains lasted about an hour. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Hadley's deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is coordinating the administration's Iraq review, also participated.

White House officials declined to disclose any details of the conversations. Bush is meeting with his national security team again Thursday at his ranch in Crawford, Texas.

"The president is pleased with the progress being made" to design a new policy, said Blain Rethmeier, a Bush spokesman. "The president is leaving all options on the table on the way forward."

With public support for the war falling as violence and U.S. deaths rise, Bush has been eager to show he is ready to make changes — even while he rejects calls from Democrats, who take control of Congress next month, for significant troop withdrawals to begin soon. The president has talked often in recent weeks about the long commitment America must make to Iraq.

He is expect to announce his revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between the New Year's Day and his Jan. 23 State of the Union address.

"If you're serving on the front lines halfway across the world, it is natural to wonder what all this means for you," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq."

There are several signs that a proposal to add thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq — as a way to control escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad — is gaining favor at the White House.

The Los Angeles Times reported Saturday that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and other military leaders in Iraq, who had been the primary voices skeptical of a "surge" in troops, have decided to endorse the idea.

But Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, spokesman for Casey, said Saturday, "As of this time, General Casey has not recommended more troops be sent here." Rethmeier would neither confirm nor deny the Times story.

Bush has said he has changed his mind and now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years, but still could address some doubts in the military about the drain of even a short-term boost in Iraq.

And while saying he has not decided whether to deploy more U.S. soldiers, the president gave another nod to military leaders this week by making clear he agrees that any such troop infusion must have a mission that is clear and achievable.

During Gates' trip to Iraq, several soldiers told him they thought a short-term increase in troop levels would help. But the defense secretary repeatedly declined to say whether he would recommend such an increase.

Some important players at the Pentagon remain unconvinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good by giving Iraqis incentive not to make their own inroads. Democrats and other critics also fear American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are forced by the prospect of an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers to make progress.

While in Baghdad, Gates did praise Iraqi leaders for having "some concrete plans in mind" to deal with the deadly militias that have brought the country to the brink of civil war between the Shiite majority and Sunni minority. He left Casey with the assignment of putting "flesh on those bones" in consultations over the next few days with the Iraqi government, which has had little success so far reining in the militias or quelling the bloodshed.

Bush has said all along that U.S. troops cannot come home until Iraqis are able to secure and defend their own country without significant American assistance.

The military component of Bush's upcoming plan has drawn the most attention, but it is only one part of what is expected to be a multi-pronged strategy.

It also will include a way to improve the dismal economic picture in Iraq and a new approach to both diplomacy in the region and to the delicate — and deadly — political situation inside Iraq.

Bush, Gates Consult Over Iraq War Strategy (HC/AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press

Houston Chronicle, December 24, 2006

WASHINGTON — Moving closer to an overhaul of troubled war strategy, President Bush today heard firsthand from his new Pentagon chief, just back from a visit to Iraq.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates, finishing up his first week on the job, spent three days in Iraq before heading straight to Camp David in Maryland to report to the president on his conversations with Iraqi leaders and U.S. commanders and soldiers. While in Iraq, Gates expressed confidence that Iraqis can take the lead in reducing the violence and warned Iran and Syria not to meddle in their neighbor's affairs.

Bush, who is spending Christmas at the presidential retreat, was joined by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Hadley's deputy, J.D. Crouch, who is coordinating the administration's Iraq review.

DOJ_NMG_0108961

A White House spokesman, Blain Rethmeier, said "the president is pleased with the progress being made" on crafting a new policy. The White House would provide no details of the hourlong discussion.

Bush has said he cannot settle on a revised war plan without input from Gates, who took over from Donald H. Rumsfeld at the Defense Department on Monday. The president is expect to announce his revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between the New Year's Day and Jan. 23, when he gives his State of the Union address.

The president is considering adding thousands of U.S. troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq as a way to control escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad.

The Los Angeles Times reported today that Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, and other military leaders in Iraq once skeptical of a "surge" in troops have decided to endorse the idea. Rethmeier would neither confirm nor deny the story.

Some important voices at the Pentagon, however, are not convinced that a significant troop increase would help and, in fact, worry it could do more harm than good.

Democrats about to take control of Congress and other war critics fear that American troops will remain mired unless the Iraqis are threatened with an imminent withdrawal of U.S. soldiers and forced to meet specific benchmarks.

Bush has changed his mind and now believes the Army and Marine Corps should be increased in overall size. This process would take years but still could address some doubts in the military about a short-term boost in Iraq.

While saying he has not decided whether to deploy more U.S. soldiers, the president has given another nod to military leaders by making clear he agrees that any such mission is only feasible if there is a defined mission that is clear and achievable.

Before leaving Baghdad, Gates would not say whether he supports a short-term troop increase. He did speak optimistically about Iraq's political leaders' commitment to taking over their own security and ability to deal with the militias that have brought the country to the brink of civil war.

The military component of Bush's upcoming plan has drawn the most attention. But it is only one part of what is expected to be a multi-pronged strategy.

It also will include a way to improve the economic picture in Iraq and a new approach to both diplomacy in the region and to the delicate — and deadly — political situation inside Iraq.

An anti-American, most Sunni insurgency has been replaced this year as the chief source of violence by bloodshed between Sunni and Shiite factions.

With public support for the war falling as violence and U.S. deaths rise, Bush has been eager to show he is ready to make changes, even while he rejects calls from many Democrats for significant troop withdrawals to begin soon. The president has talked often in recent weeks about the long commitment America must make to Iraq.

"Things are moving in a positive direction. But it's going to be a long haul," Gates said during his visit.

Looking ahead, the president has called a meeting of his National Security Council on Thursday at his Crawford, Texas, ranch.

"If you're serving on the front lines halfway across the world, it is natural to wonder what all this means for you," the president said today in his weekly radio address, taped before he left Washington on Friday for the holiday.

"I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq."

Also today, Bush called El Salvador's president, Tony Saca, to thank the country for extending its troop presence in Iraq.

Despite public sentiment against it, El Salvador's legislature this month approved Saca's request. The contingent scheduled to remain another year could be smaller than the 380 soldiers that have been in Iraq, mainly for humanitarian and rebuilding work.

———

Associated Press writer Lolita C. Baldor contributed to this report.

Gates Gives Bush Evaluation Of Iraq War (WP)

By Peter Baker And Thomas E. Ricks, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Defense Secretary Shares Post-Trip Impressions as Strategy Review Continues

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates headed to Camp David yesterday to brief President Bush and his national security team on his impressions from Iraq as the administration accelerated a debate over a proposed short-term escalation in troop levels to turn around the war.

Gates brought back from Baghdad a plan put forth by Iraqi leaders that would redefine the U.S. mission to focus more on fighting Sunni insurgents while the Shiite-led government tries to contain Shiite militias. He also brought back views from U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0108962

commanders on the ground, who have said publicly that they are open to a so-called surge in troops if their mission is clearly defined.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff have resisted additional troops unless a clear, achievable mission is defined and believe the White House is putting forward an ill-conceived idea in a desperate bid to salvage the situation. The Los Angeles Times reported yesterday that Gen. George W. Casey Jr. and Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the top commanders in Iraq, have decided to recommend the surge, a position that if true could make it easier for Bush to go forward even if Pentagon generals remain unenthusiastic.

It was unclear, however, whether Casey was genuinely supporting a buildup or simply restating privately what he has already said publicly. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea," if sending more troops would help achieve strategic objectives, he said at a Baghdad news conference with Gates last week.

The White House and Pentagon officially had no comment. A Pentagon official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the discussions, said it would be an exaggeration to say that Casey is pushing for additional troops.

"To say that Casey wants more forces, that isn't the case," the official said. Indeed, he said, Casey told Gates in Iraq that an infusion of U.S. forces would not help him politically with the Iraqi government and could impede reconciliation efforts.

"Casey's position all along has been, 'If you want to put additional forces in, I'm not opposed to that -- if it serves the strategic purpose, which is to put Iraqis in the lead,' " the official said.

Casey and Gates agreed that under the current "clear, hold and build" approach, more U.S. troops would be useful only as part of a broader reconstruction effort to hold areas after they have been cleared. This would involve immediate work such as garbage removal, followed by infrastructure projects.

Gates met for an hour at the presidential retreat with Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch II.

"The president is pleased with the progress being made" in the strategy review, White House spokesman Blain K. Rethmeier said. He declined to discuss the briefing in detail.

During his trip, Gates was presented a two-pronged plan by Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in which U.S. forces would target Sunni insurgents in Baghdad's outer neighborhoods instead of Shiite militias while Iraqi forces would take over security of the city center. Maliki would work to contain his fellow Shiite, Moqtada al-Sadr and his Mahdi Army militia. Under the plan, Maliki would accept an increase in U.S. troops in Baghdad.

Bush had hoped to unveil a fresh approach to Iraq before Christmas but delayed a decision until next month so Gates could make his own evaluation. Gates, who was sworn in to succeed Donald H. Rumsfeld on Monday, had privately been critical of the war. The National Security Council will meet again Thursday at Bush's ranch near Crawford, Tex.

Bush used his weekly radio address to pay tribute to troops serving far from families at Christmas.

"I want our troops to know that while the coming year will bring change, one thing will not change, and that is our nation's support for you and the vital work you do to achieve a victory in Iraq," he said. "The American people are keeping you in our thoughts and prayers, and we will make sure you have the resources you need to accomplish your mission."

Commander Said To Be Open To More Troops (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 23 — The American military command in Iraq is now willing to back a temporary increase in American troops in Baghdad as part of a broader Iraqi and United States effort to stem the slide toward chaos, senior American officials said Saturday.

President Bush and his advisers were told Saturday of the new position when Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates met with them at Camp David, an administration official said.

Until recently, the top ground commander in Iraq, Gen. George W. Casey Jr., has argued that sending more American forces into Baghdad and Anbar Province, the two most violent regions of Iraq, would increase the Iraqi dependency on Washington, and in the words of one senior official, “make this feel more like an occupation.”

But General Casey and Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, who has day-to-day command of American forces in Iraq, indicated they were open to a troop increase when Mr. Gates met with them in Baghdad this week.

“They are open to the possibility of some increase in force,” a senior Defense Department official said. “They are supportive of taking steps to support the Iraqis in their plan, including the possible modest augmentation in U.S. combat forces.”

“Nobody has decided anything yet and they have not made a formal recommendation,” the official continued. “They are open to the idea of such an option and are weighing how best to execute it and what the traffic will bear with the Iraqis.”

The possible increase in troops, officials said, ranges from fewer than 10,000 to as many as 30,000.

DOJ_NMG_0108963

Politically, winning the support of American generals for the additional troops is crucial to Mr. Bush if he hopes to make the increase part of the new strategy he is expected to announce in early January.

Over the past two weeks, Mr. Bush has appeared at odds with the generals in some of his comments, as the White House veered toward strategies that involve a greater show of force and some members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff questioned whether a "surge" in forces would make a lasting difference.

The Camp David meeting convened by President Bush included Mr. Gates, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, for what the White House called a chance for Mr. Gates, who took office this week, to report on his findings. Mr. Bush plans to convene a full meeting of the National Security Council on Thursday at his ranch in Crawford, Tex.

The key to any new strategy, some officials said, would be a binding commitment by the Iraqi government that it would provide far more troops as well, and take other steps to try to slow the sectarian violence. The government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki has repeatedly stressed the desire to take charge of the security situation in Baghdad, but failed to send most of the reinforcements the Americans requested this summer during a beefed-up effort to quell the violence.

It is unclear how Mr. Bush plans to enforce any commitments from Mr. Maliki, but Mr. Gates said in Baghdad before flying home that he sensed "a broad strategic agreement between the Iraqi military and Iraqi government and our military."

"There is still some work to be done," he said. "But I do expect to give a report to the president on what I've learned and my perceptions." Mr. Gates was joined on his Iraq tour by officials from the White House and other parts of the government.

Administration officials, who spoke anonymously because they were not authorized to publicly discuss internal deliberations, said that General Casey had not yet submitted a formal recommendation to Mr. Gates and Mr. Bush. Mr. Gates, they said, asked General Casey to enter into final discussions with Iraqi officials on the specifics of their role.

But officials said General Casey was coming closer to the position of General Odierno that a greater a show of force would be critical to the effort to contain the Sunni insurgency and tamp down the violence by Shiite militias. The shift in the general's position was first reported in The Los Angeles Times on Saturday.

General Casey has long argued that the principal emphasis of American policy should be on training Iraqi security forces, and handing over responsibility to the Iraqi military and police. In a plan General Casey presented in Washington in June, he anticipated reducing some American combat troops in September. But his plan was shelved after the surge in violence in Iraq.

As the sectarian killings escalated, the White House began to explore the option of sending more troops as a broader strategy to secure Baghdad. The idea was raised in a November memo prepared by Mr. Hadley. Mr. Bush discussed the option during a recent meeting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff that was organized as part of the administration's Iraq strategy review.

Some generals appeared notably unenthusiastic. Some members of the Joint Chiefs appeared worried about the strain it would place on the Army and the Marines. Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander for the Middle East, told Congress last month that adding 20,000 troops would improve security, but argued that the effect would only be temporary because the United States military was not large enough to sustain such an increase indefinitely.

As for General Casey, he suggested Wednesday that he was neither the originator of the idea nor actively lobbying for it. At the same time, he indicated that he was not adamantly opposed to it. "Additional troops have to be for a purpose," the general said. "I'm not necessarily opposed to the idea, but what I want to see happen is, if we do bring more American troops here, they help us progress toward our strategic objectives."

Should Mr. Bush decide to send more troops, General Casey's backing for a such a step would help the president deal with Congressional critics, who have pressed the administration to begin a withdrawal. It would also aid him with Republicans, some of whom were taken aback this week when Colin L. Powell, the former secretary of state who also served as chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said Mr. Bush had not yet clearly defined a role for additional troops that made it worth the projected casualties and deeper American involvement.

Mr. Gates said during the trip that he did not believe that Iraqi leaders were deeply split on the question of an increase in the American presence. Mr. Maliki proposed a plan to Mr. Bush in their meeting last month in Amman, Jordan, under which the Iraqis would assume direct command of its 10 Army divisions and a National Police division by June.

The Iraqi prime minister also proposed that his government assume the primary responsibility for security in Baghdad over the next several months while most American forces would move to the periphery of the city. The idea of moving American troops to the capital's outskirts is consistent with General Casey's long-term plan, but the Iraqi time frame is far more compressed. Some of Mr. Bush's aides have expressed concern that the Iraqis' desire for control outstrips their capacity.

However, as a political matter, officials said, it is crucial that Mr. Bush be able to announce that any increase in American troops will be made in parallel with a similar commitment by the Iraqis, and that the eventual goal of the strategy is to put the Iraqis in the lead. The Iraqis promised to send two brigades of Iraqi Army troops this summer, but most of the troops never arrived.

DOJ_NMG_0108964

Lt. Gen. Martin Dempsey, who oversees the training of Iraq's security forces, said this week that he was overhauling his training efforts so that Iraqi Army units would be easier to deploy, including providing more pay.

"We've got two or three brigade headquarters and six additional battalions that are scheduled now over the next couple of months to come to Baghdad," he said. An Iraqi battalion nominally has more than 700 soldiers, but the actual number is often far less, since many soldiers are on scheduled leaves or absent without leave.

Top Shiite Cleric Balks At Plan For Iraq (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 24, 2006

A U.S.-backed plan to form a political coalition of Iraq's Shiites, Sunni Arabs and Kurds — a glimmer of hope in a nation torn by sectarian violence — failed to win the crucial support of the top Shiite cleric Saturday.

Lawmakers who presented the plan to Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani in the holy city of Najaf said they were told the unity of Shiites, who have the largest bloc in parliament, had to come first.

By shunning the coalition plan, al-Sistani sought to unite the Shiite's fractured 130-member United Iraqi Alliance. But his decision — which carries great weight with the country's Shiite majority — significantly weakens American hopes for a national unity government and strengthens the hand of the radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Al-Sistani's decision may not doom the proposed coalition, but it significantly reduces its chances.

"There are obstacles in the face of forming this coalition, because al-Sistani does not support it," said Hassan al-Suneid, a top aide to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

An official close to al-Sistani, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media, said the cleric "will not bless nor support any new bloc or front. He only supports the unity of the Shiites."

The proposed coalition — which would not have included al-Sadr's supporters — could have isolated the militant cleric, commander of a militia army blamed for many sectarian attacks.

Two U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday in separate roadside blasts near Baghdad, the U.S. military said. One bomb exploded southeast of the capital near a patrol searching for "suspected terrorists," it said. That blast also wounded four other U.S. soldiers. The other bomb exploded southwest of Baghdad, near a patrol delivering supplies to units in the area.

Police in Baghdad said they discovered 47 bodies — apparent victims of violence between Sunni and Shiites.

Meanwhile, President Bush met with his new defense secretary Robert Gates at his presidential retreat in Camp David, Md., to discuss military options for Iraq including a proposal to send thousands more troops to the 140,000 already in Iraq to try to quell escalating violence, particularly in Baghdad.

The president is expect to announce a revamped Iraq strategy in a speech to the nation between New Year's Day and Jan. 23, when he gives his State of the Union address.

In Iraq, the focus was on politics. Several weeks ago, 30 Iraqi lawmakers and six Cabinet ministers who support al-Sadr launched a boycott of the government. They were protesting a meeting between the prime minister and President Bush.

Now the 275-member Iraqi parliament is in virtual paralysis.

On Saturday, the same Shiite delegation in Najaf that courted al-Sistani tried to persuade al-Sadr to bring his supporters back into government. Al-Sadr did not give a definite answer, according to some of those who met with him.

"He will give his final decision whether to rejoin the government and parliament after Eid al-Adha," Khaled al-Attiya, an independent who is parliament's deputy speaker, said after the meeting. Iraq's Shiites will celebrate the holiday from Dec. 31 to Jan. 4.

Some of al-Sadr's aides had earlier said he would soon end his political boycott and call off attacks by his militia, at least temporarily.

But al-Sistani's rejection of the new coalition — which would have excluded al-Sadr's supporters — strengthened his hand.

Al-Sistani holds no political post and rarely emerges from his home and adjacent office. But his word is considered law by many Shiites.

Despite this, Shiite militants, including members of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army, have not heeded al-Sistani's appeals for peace in Iraq. Many Iraqis on both sides of the sectarian divide view militias as their only form of defense.

One of al-Sadr's key demands is a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq.

Without progress toward political reconciliation in Iraq, some observers say, the security situation in the country is likely to remain grim.

In violence on Saturday, an Iraqi military intelligence officer was killed in a drive-by shooting south of Baghdad, police said. Six civilians were killed when a mortar shell hit a house in Baqouba, north of the capital. U.S.-led forces raided a militant hide out in Ramadi, west of Baghdad, killing one person and detaining nine.

DOJ_NMG_0108965

Key Iraqi Cleric Rejects U.S. Bid For Moderate Political Bloc (WP)

By Nancy Trejos And Saad Sarhan, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 23 -- Iraq's most revered Shiite Muslim cleric has rejected calls for a U.S.-backed effort to form a bloc of moderate Shiite, Sunni Arab and Kurdish leaders to isolate extremists in the government, Shiite leaders said Saturday.

Members of the United Iraqi Alliance, the dominant Shiite coalition in parliament, said they discussed the bloc with Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani during a two-hour meeting at his home in Najaf on Saturday.

U.S. leaders say that such a bloc, proposed by national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley in a leaked Nov. 8 White House memo, would dampen the influence of firebrand Shiite cleric and militia leader Moqtada al-Sadr by bolstering his political rivals.

Sistani's endorsement of the proposal was considered key. But during the meeting, Shiite leaders said, Sistani called on them to keep the 130-member United Iraqi Alliance intact.

"Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani is against any coalition that might weaken the United Iraqi Alliance," said Hasan Suneid, a Shiite lawmaker with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's Dawa party.

Maliki and the Dawa party, part of the United Iraqi Alliance, have been unenthusiastic about the proposal from the beginning because they believe that isolating Sadr would exacerbate tensions. Maliki is beholden to Sadr, who supported his bid to become prime minister.

In recent days, spokesmen for Sistani have denied media reports that he had tentatively approved the coalition and said he was neither supporting nor opposing it and was interested simply in keeping Shiites united.

Basher al-Assadi, a deputy to Sistani, said the cleric "has not given his blessing to the new alliance because it is not complete, as other forces have been excluded from it."

Abdul Karim al-Inazi, another member of the Dawa party, said the leaders do not want to exclude Sadr from the political process. Sadr controls 30 seats in parliament. "We believe the Sadr trend is one of the important blocs," Inazi said. "They are present, and we do not want any group to be weakened."

To some extent, Sadr has already isolated himself from other Shiite leaders, some of whom consider him too confrontational. Last month, he ordered his loyalists to withdraw from parliament to protest Maliki's decision to meet in Jordan with President Bush.

Shortly after ending their discussion with Sistani on Saturday, the Shiite leaders visited Sadr at his home in Najaf and urged him to allow his loyalists to return to government.

Haidar al-Ubadi, a senior official of the Dawa party, said, "Our brothers in the Sadr bloc are on their way to returning to the government and the parliament."

But other participants said Sadr's response was not definitive and more discussions were needed. "I hope that this crisis will be over soon, just after one or two meetings with his eminence and the Sadr bloc," Inazi said.

Meanwhile, the southern city of Samawah remained under curfew a day after clashes between Iraqi forces and Shiite militiamen loyal to Sadr, in which five people were killed and 17 were wounded, the Associated Press reported.

Southwest of Baghdad, a U.S. soldier was killed by a roadside bomb Saturday while delivering supplies, the U.S. military said. A separate roadside blast killed one U.S. soldier and wounded four others on patrol southeast of the capital, the Associated Press reported. In Diyala province, four police officers were killed in clashes with armed groups, local police said.

Sarhan reported from Najaf. Special correspondent Waleed Saffar in Baghdad contributed to this report.

Yes, You Are The Person Of The Year! (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

TIME'S choice for 2006 Person of the Year — "You" — was a bountiful gift of mirth to America, second only to the championship Donald Trump-Rosie O'Donnell bout as a comic kickoff to the holiday season. The magazine's cover stunt, a computer screen of Mylar reflecting the reader's own image, was so hokey that Jon Stewart and Stephen Colbert merely had to display it on camera to score laughs. The magazine's disingenuous rationale for bestowing its yearly honor on its readers was like a big wet kiss from a distant relative who creeps you out.

According to Time, "You" deserve to be Person of the Year because you — "yes, you," as the cover puts it — "control the Information Age" and spend a lot of time watching YouTube and blogging instead of, well, reading dead-tree media like Time. The pronouncements ginned up to inflate this theme include the observation that "Thomas Paine was in effect the first blogger" (which presumably makes the Old Testament in effect the first Facebook). The desperation of Time to appear relevant and hip —

DOJ_NMG_0108966

"fantastically cutting-edge and New Media," as Nora Ephron put it in a hilarious essay for The Huffington Post — was embarrassing in its nakedness.

And sad. This editorial pratfall struck me, once a proud Time staff member, as a sign that my journalistic alma mater might go the way of the old Life. Like Time today, Life in the late 1960s was a middle-of-the-road publishing fixture sent into an identity crisis by the cultural revolution that coincided with a calamitous war. The fabled weekly finally shut down in 1972, the year Rolling Stone celebrated its fifth anniversary.

Let's hope publishing history doesn't repeat itself. So in Time's defense, let me say that the more I reflected on its 2006 Person of the Year — or perhaps the more that Mylar cover reflected back at me — the more I realized that the magazine wasn't as out of touch as it first seemed. Time made the right choice, albeit for the wrong reasons.

As our country sinks deeper into a quagmire — and even a conclusive Election Day repudiation of the war proves powerless to stop it — we the people, and that includes, yes, you, will seek out any escape hatch we can find. In the Iraq era, the dropout nostrums of choice are not the drugs and drug culture of Vietnam but the equally masturbatory and narcissistic (if less psychedelic) pastimes of the Internet. Why not spend hour upon hour passionately venting in the blogosphere, as Time suggests, about our "state of mind or the state of the nation or the steak-frites at the new bistro down the street"? Or an afternoon surfing from video to video on YouTube, where short-attention-span fluff is infinite? It's more fun than the nightly news, which, as Laura Bush reminded us this month, has been criminally lax in unearthing all those "good things that are happening" in Baghdad.

As of Friday morning, "Britney Spears Nude on Beach" had been viewed 1,041,776 times by YouTube's visitors. The count for YouTube video clips tagged with "Iraq" was 22,783. Not that there is anything wrong with that. But compulsive blogging and free soft-core porn are not, as Time would have it, indications of how much you, I and that glassy-eyed teenage boy hiding in his bedroom are in control of the Information Age. They are indicators instead of how eager we are to flee from brutal real-world information that makes us depressed and angry. This was the year Americans escaped as often as they could into their private pleasure pods. So the Person of 2006 was indeed you — yes, you.

Unless it was Borat. The often uproarious farce that took its name from that hopelessly dense and bigoted fictional TV correspondent from Kazakhstan was the year's most revealing hit movie. It was escapism incarnate, and we couldn't eat it up fast enough. "Borat" also encapsulated the rising xenophobia that feeds American fantasies of the ultimate national escape: fencing off our borders from the world. If its loutish title character hadn't been invented by Sacha Baron Cohen for us to ridicule and feel morally superior to, then Lou Dobbs would have done it for him.

The second most revealing movie hit of this escapist year was "Casino Royale." Though technically an updating of the old Bond franchise — it is, nominally at least, set in the present — its screenplay actually hewed closely to the original Ian Fleming novel of 1953. The film merely changed the villain from a lethal Soviet operative to a terrorist financier, thereby recasting the confusing, hydra-headed threat of Al Qaeda and its ilk as a manageable, easily identifiable enemy that 007 could vanquish as decisively as the ham-fisted Iron Curtain Commies. Better still, Daniel Craig's James Bond smites the terrorists in two hours plus change, not the 24 hours it takes Kiefer Sutherland's Jack Bauer. There could be no happier fairy tale for a country looking in the eye of defeat.

"Christ, I miss the cold war," M, Bond's boss at British intelligence, says early on in "Casino Royale." M — the reassuring Judi Dench — speaks for the entire audience. Nostalgia for the cold war, which America won unambiguously, was visible everywhere this year as we lost a war that has divided the country. In Florida, there was a joyous countdown to Fidel Castro's imminent demise. At NASA, there was a new plan to return to the moon. Throughout the news media, there was a Hannibal Lecterish pleasure in the excruciating physical decline of Alexander Litvinenko, the former KGB spy murdered by poison. As the CNN anchor John Roberts put it rather gleefully, "For many of us, headlines out of London seemed like a James Bond movie or a distant echo of the cold war." Heaven knows those headlines were easier to take than those coming out of the hot war — or, for that matter, out of London itself when terrorists struck there 18 months ago. It's no surprise that "Casino Royale" sold way more tickets than "World Trade Center" and "United 93" combined.

The most revealing index of our lust for escapism this year cannot be found at YouTube or the multiplex, however, but in the sideshow villains who distracted us from main news events in the Middle East: James Frey, Mel Gibson, Michael Richards and Judith Regan. It was a thrill beyond schadenfreude to watch them be soundly thrashed and humiliated for their sins.

FAR be it for me to defend any of them; Mr. Gibson once threatened to have my "intestines on a stick" after I raised the notion that the author of "The Passion of the Christ" might be an anti-Semite. But our over-the-top pleasure in their comeuppance still seems like escapist fare. It may be satisfying to see "Apocalypto" fade fast after its opening weekend or watch Ms. Regan lose her job after enriching O. J. Simpson for a sleazy book project. Yet something is out of whack when these relatively minor miscreants are publicly stoned and the architects of a needless catastrophe that has cost thousands of American and Iraqi lives escape scot-free. On the same day that Ms. Regan was canned, the fired Donald Rumsfeld was given a 19-gun salute and showered with presidential praise in a farewell ceremony at the Pentagon.

DOJ_NMG_0108967

For that matter, Ms. Regan's worst offenses can't compare even with those of her former lover, Bernard Kerik, the Giuliani-era New York City police commissioner who was appointed by President Bush in 2003 to train Iraqi's police. Mr. Kerik promised to stay "as long as it takes to get the job done," then fled months later without explanation and without the job even started. Today the Iraqi police he failed to train are not only useless but are also routinely engaged in sectarian violence, including torture, helping to ensure that Iraq is more dangerous for everyone than ever, American troops included.

Mr. Kerik has never been held accountable for that failure, only for less lethal and unrelated graft in New York. Paul Bremer, whose early decisions as our Iraqi viceroy all but guaranteed our defeat, received the highest civilian award from the president. So did both George Tenet, who presided over the "slam dunk" intelligence that sped us to war, and Gen. Tommy Franks, who let Osama bin Laden get away. Even now, no generals have been fired for their failures in Iraq; the only one to lose his job was the former Army chief of staff, Eric Shinseki, who antagonized Mr. Rumsfeld before the war by correctly warning that hundreds of thousands of American troops would be needed to secure Iraq. But never mind. That's ancient history. We can avoid confronting these morally grotesque skeletons in our closet as long as we can distract ourselves with Michael Richards's meltdown.

Besides, it's time for the home front to party. Whatever else is to be said about Time's Mylar cover, it's news you can literally use: it is just a paper shredder away from being recycled as the most glittering of New Year's Eve confetti.

U.S. Airstrike Kills Close Ally Of Bin Laden, Pentagon Says (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Dec. 23 (AP) — A leading Taliban military commander described as a close associate of Osama bin Laden and the Taliban leader Mullah Muhammad Omar was killed in an airstrike this week close to the border with Pakistan, the United States military said Saturday. A man identifying himself as a Taliban spokesman denied the report.

The commander, Mullah Akhtar Muhammad Osmani, , was killed Tuesday by an American airstrike as he traveled by vehicle in a deserted area in Helmand Province in the south, the United States military said. Two of his associates were also killed, it said.

Mr. Osmani, regarded as one of three top associates of Mullah Omar, is the highest-ranking Taliban leader that the coalition has reported killing or capturing since the American-led invasion in late 2001.

Afghan officials made no immediate confirmation, and no visual proof was offered to support the report. An American spokesman said that "various sources" were used to confirm Mr. Osmani's identity.

A man who identified himself as Qari Yousef Ahmadi and who said he was a Taliban spokesman denied that Mr. Osmani had been killed, saying that the airstrike had instead killed Mullah Abdul Zahir, a group commander, and three other Taliban fighters. "I confirm that Osmani is alive and is in Afghanistan," Mr. Ahmadi said by telephone from an undisclosed location.

Col. Tom Collins, an American military spokesman, said that officials had waited four days to announce the news in part so that they could be sure it was Mr. Osmani who died in the strike.

Mr. Osmani, the Taliban's chief military commander in southern Afghanistan, played a central role in attacks including roadside bombs, suicide attacks and kidnappings, Colonel Collins said.

Mr. Osmani, among "co-equals" at the top of the Taliban leadership chain just under Mullah Omar, was in charge of the movement's finances, Colonel Collins said.

He said that Mr. Osmani had been using both sides of the Afghan-Pakistan border, and that the United States military had been tracking him "for a while."

Taliban Figure Killed In Airstrike, U.S. Says (WP)

By Pamela Constable, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Militia Disputes Report On Bin Laden Associate

A top Taliban leader and close associate of Osama bin Laden has been killed in a U.S. airstrike in southern Afghanistan near the Pakistani border, the U.S. military said in a statement Saturday.

Akhtar Mohammad Osmani was traveling in a deserted area of Helmand province on Tuesday when his vehicle was struck, immediately killing him and two unidentified people, the U.S. military said. Osmani was described as the highest-ranking member of the Taliban killed since late 2001.

"Osmani was in the top ring of the Taliban leadership, and he was also a close associate of Osama bin Laden," said Col. Tom Collins, a U.S. military spokesman. Collins said Osmani also had close ties to Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, an Afghan militia leader once allied with the United States who is now an anti-American fugitive.

DOJ_NMG_0108968

The Taliban denied that Osmani had been killed.

U.S. military officials in Kabul, the Afghan capital, said Osmani had been operating on both sides of the Afghan-Pakistani border. Afghan officials have complained for months that senior Taliban insurgents are able to move freely in parts of Pakistan's border regions, but the government of Pakistan has denied the assertions, insisting that the Taliban is based in Afghanistan and that the Afghan government should control its own borders.

In an interview in his Washington office last week, Mohammed Ali Durrani, Pakistan's ambassador to the United States, repeated this assertion, saying the Afghan government had not done enough to stop the revived insurgency.

"Ten percent of the problem is in Pakistan, and 90 percent of it is in Afghanistan," Durrani said. "We are doing our best, and we are doing more than anyone else in the region to stop terrorism and solve the problems on our side of the border. Our question is, what the hell is everyone doing on the other side? Why is Pakistan being constantly blamed?"

Osmani's reported death could put a major dent in Taliban operations in Helmand province, a vast, dry region where the insurgents have been able to operate freely in the lawless and cash-rich environment created by the heavy presence of opium poppy cultivation and drug trafficking.

The province has become increasingly engulfed in violence despite aggressive combat operations by British troops based there. On Dec. 12, a suicide bomber attempted to assassinate the governor in his compound, killing six policemen and two civilians. In an effort to stem the bloodshed, NATO agreed to a peace pact with Taliban leaders in one district of Helmand in September, but insurgent attacks surged elsewhere in the province.

During the Taliban's rule from 1996 to 2001, Osmani was known as one of its most influential, hard-line Islamic ideologues. This made it especially ironic that in recent months he was commanding insurgent operations in Helmand, where the Taliban once banned opium growing as un-Islamic. Since the Taliban was ousted, Helmand has become the country's top producer of opium poppies.

Ahmed Rashid, a Pakistani journalist and author of the book "Taliban," told the Associated Press that Osmani was also instrumental in some of the Taliban's most notorious actions, including the demolition of the ancient Buddha statues in Bamian and the trial of Christian aid workers, both of which occurred in 2001, several months before the Taliban was toppled by U.S.-led forces. The aid workers were rescued by U.S. Special Forces.

Aiding And Abetting The Taliban? (LAT)

By Paul Watson, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, December 24, 2006

Pakistanis appear to be helping fighters attack Afghan border police.

AFGHANISTAN — The guerrillas followed a dirt road from the Pakistan border through a valley surrounded by low, grassy mountains to their target: an Afghan police post.

Not long after sunset, they opened fire from several sides. For almost four hours, scores of suspected Taliban fighters outgunned the lightly armed Afghan border police, and almost overran their camp.

Then, as quickly as it started, the fight ended. The militants picked up their dead and wounded and fled back into sanctuaries, three miles away, in one of the loosely governed tribal areas of Pakistan.

"A hundred armed Taliban men passed through the Pakistani border with their equipment, and with their rocket-propelled grenade launchers," said Qasim Khail, commander of the Afghan border police's 2nd Brigade, which guards the post here. "And they retreated the same way. There are only two escape routes out of here, and both of them end at a Pakistani border post."

Confidential documents obtained by The Times show that for at least two years, U.S. military intelligence agencies have warned American commanders that Taliban militants were arming and training in Pakistan, then slipping into Afghanistan with the help of Pakistani border control officers.

Pashtuns signed pact

On Sept. 5, Pashtun tribal leaders in Pakistan's North Waziristan border region signed a pact with the central government led by President Pervez Musharraf, an avowed ally of the U.S. in its declared war on terrorism.

Under the agreement, the Pakistani army, which had fought fierce battles with pro-Taliban militants, withdrew from the region, leaving a tribal force in charge of border posts. In return, the tribesmen foreswore giving support, training and sanctuary to Taliban and Al Qaeda-linked fighters, although some foreigners were allowed to remain.

But the violence has not abated. Instead, Afghan officials and the U.S. military say that since the pact was signed, cross-border attacks have surged.

Like many Afghans, Khail believes that despite Musharraf's persistent denials, his country's Inter-Services Intelligence agency still supports the Taliban and at least some of its allies. The intelligence documents show that the U.S. military shared this suspicion as recently as the start of this year.

DOJ_NMG_0108969

Doubts about Pakistan's denials are reminiscent of the 1990s, when Islamabad insisted the intelligence service did not help found, train and arm the Taliban, though Pakistani heavy weapons and military officers were found among Taliban units.

Pakistan has historically sought influence in Afghanistan, in part because of a border dispute dating back to 1893, when the British drew a border, called the Durand Line, that divided the Pashtun tribal areas.

When Musharraf was forced to publicly turn against the Taliban after the Sept. 11 attacks, some in Pakistan's security establishment warned that it could lose influence in Afghanistan, a strategic crossroads between oil-rich Central Asia and the energy-starved Indian subcontinent. The increasing influence of rivals like India, Iran, Russia and China have confirmed such fears.

Here in Khowst province, which borders North Waziristan, militants have killed at least 12 Afghan border police and wounded 52 since early September, Khail said.

Most villagers have family ties that cross the border. They believe that their government is too weak to defend them and they are drifting toward the real power in the region, the Taliban, added Khail, who like most of the Taliban is Pashtun.

In October, Khail said, Taliban fighters who attacked a border post took the body of an Afghan border policeman back to Pakistan, where they mutilated it and paraded it around a village. Khail soon got a phone call from a Pakistani police officer, who told the Afghan commander that he could pick up the Afghan's remains at the border in exchange for the body of a Taliban militant. Among the three Pakistanis attending the exchange was a man in a Pakistani police uniform, Khail said.

"The Pakistani police know everything about the border problems," he charged. "The Pakistanis are giving them the weapons and they are arranging the Taliban attacks. They are training them and they give them food. There are hundreds of training camps there in Pakistan."

Repeated warnings

Intelligence warnings have for months documented U.S. worries about Pakistan's role in providing a haven for Afghan insurgents.

A map prepared in early 2005 for a U.S. Army Special Operations task force warned that officers at Pakistani border control posts were "assisting insurgent attacks." It showed militants' infiltration routes from Pakistan, several of which crossed from North Waziristan to Khowst province, where members of Osama bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network who have long been based in Afghanistan are still active.

On Jan. 19 of this year, a report from the U.S. military's Joint Intelligence Task Force said that Al Qaeda continued "to provide expertise and resources, such as weapons, training, and fighters to anti-coalition groups including the Taliban" and its allies, among which is Gulbuddin Hekmatyar's Hizb-i-Islami militia.

In a separate report the same month, the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, or DIA, identified six eastern provinces, including Khowst, as "Al Qaeda strongholds."

"These locations allow Al Qaeda members easy entrance and exit over the Afghanistan/Pakistan border," it added.

The document identified Al Qaeda's commander in Afghanistan as Khalid Habib, and said "Al Qaeda maintains close ties to the Taliban and has received technical support and training from Pakistani militant groups."

It warned that armed Afghans, Arabs and Pakistanis who might attack U.S. forces were in Afghanistan. And it said Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence directorate posed "a HIGH intelligence threat to U.S. and Coalition forces."

Pakistani intelligence agencies were recruiting sources among Afghan interpreters for U.S. forces, collecting information on U.S. counterintelligence operations, the report said. It also noted continued risks for the U.S. military posed by spies for Iran, Russia and India.

The DIA report said Iranian spies gathered information from the U.S. Embassy's Afghan guards, interviewed Afghan visitors and shadowed American staff. It described the Iranians as a "critical threat."

Another DIA report from early this year said senior Taliban leaders in Pakistan were directing operations that had led to a fourfold increase in suicide bombings. It said the bombings were carried out to boost Taliban morale and to show financial backers that it was worth funding the insurgency.

Like several other intelligence reports, the "Warning Assessment for Afghanistan" suggested Mullah Mohammed Omar, the Taliban's supreme leader, may have split with other senior commanders over the increased used of suicide bombings. Omar's faction appeared "concerned about collateral damage turning the populace against the movement," it said.

Remains of the battle

After the Nov. 27 battle at Lizha, about 12 miles southwest of a U.S. base in this border region, Khail's men counted 27 Taliban rocket-propelled grenade blast sites. One RPG exploded in the small, empty room where the police normally slept.

The 25 Afghan police defending the post had four RPGs; one hit a Taliban guerrilla as he crawled toward a gap in the camp's wall.

DOJ_NMG_0108970

Days after the battle, the charred and blood-soaked remains of the patu blanket that he had worn lay on the ground, along with dried soybeans that he had spilled, about 15 yards from the barrier.

At least five militants were killed in the battle; the fighters took the bodies of three back with them. Afghan police, who did not suffer casualties, buried the other two near the dirt road leading to Pakistan. One of the dead men's black size 10 shoes lay at one end of his stony grave.

The raid was the third on the border post in as many months. Each time, the militants approached through the Zhawar Valley, which leads to an area of North Waziristan dominated by Taliban commander Jalaluddin Haqqani. His forces have a reputation for kidnappings, suicide bombings and other terrorist attacks.

Haqqani became the Taliban's supreme military commander on the eve of the 2001 war with U.S. and allied Afghan forces, and has escaped several U.S. airstrikes. His men appear determined to seize the Lizha camp; each attacking force is bigger and better-armed than the last, Khail said.

Abdul Ghafaar, the Lizha post's commander, said he radioed Khail in Khowst for help when his police came under attack Nov. 27. Khail said he immediately phoned the nearby U.S. base, which promised to send aircraft. But the besieged police post never saw one.

NATO, which took over command of U.S. troops in eastern Afghanistan in October, said a support aircraft flew over the area but did not attack enemy forces.

Khail recently invited five tribal elders to his office in the hope of persuading them to help stop attacks on the border posts. The elders weren't sympathetic.

"They attacked my house," Haji Shad Raan said. "They have killed hundreds of our elders and they will try to kill us too. Now the first question you have to answer is, 'Who should I defend, my house or your post?' "

When Khail spoke, he was nearly pleading. "I know that your tribe is very brave, and I know that your tribesmen are very brave," he said he told them. "But all I complain about is that the enemy shoots at me from your door. The enemy shoots at me from your mosque. Can you do this much and stop them from shooting at me from your doorstep? Can't you?"

After the meeting, Khail said he understood why the elders were supporting his enemies. The Taliban is stronger, and in Pashtun culture, that commands respect and allegiance.

"We don't need a government that has no power or the ability to protect us," Gul Ahmad Khan told the police commander. "We know that this government is very weak. It only stands with the power of foreigners and nothing else."

paul.watson@latimes.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Can Private Equity Build A Public Face? (NYT)

By Charles Duhigg

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

ON the upper floors of a soaring Midtown Manhattan skyscraper, behind heavy glass doors that do not bear his name, sits Stephen A. Feinberg, one of the country's most powerful — and anonymous — financiers.

Over the last few years Mr. Feinberg's $24 billion investment fund, Cerberus Capital Management, named after the mythological three-headed dog that guards the gates of hell, has quietly acquired some of the world's best-known companies. The car rental chains National and Alamo, as well as parts of Air Canada and the retailers Mervyn's and Albertson's, are now all within the Feinberg empire.

Last month, when Mr. Feinberg secured a majority stake in General Motors' financing arm, GMAC, he gained control of America's seventh-largest financial institution. Through another company it controls, I.A.P. Worldwide Services, Cerberus is poised to become one of the Army's largest contractors in Iraq. Earlier this month, Cerberus and other funds offered to invest up to $3.4 billion in the Corporation">Delphi Corporation, the auto parts giant.

All told, Cerberus has a controlling interest in more than 45 companies that employ more than 250,000 people and generate $50 billion in revenue each year, more than the sales of Microsoft, Motorola or PepsiCo. The fund has earned an average annual return of about 22 percent over the last seven years, according to its marketing materials, and Institutional Investor magazine estimated that Mr. Feinberg took home a $75 million paycheck in 2004. The executive ranks of Cerberus include former Treasury Secretary John W. Snow and former Vice President Dan Quayle.

For all of that, however, very little is known about Cerberus beyond its intimidating name — a reflection of how greatly Wall Street players like Mr. Feinberg value secrecy, and the pivotal role stealth plays in amassing and deploying the vast pools of capital that private equity investors control.

DOJ_NMG_0108971

"Secrecy is very important to how takeover deals get done," said Henry T. Hu, a professor of corporate and securities law at the University of Texas at Austin. "Secrecy gives you access to private information. It lets you bid on companies before the competition is aware they are for sale. Secrecy is part of how this industry works."

But it also has its downside. Although many backers of Cerberus say Mr. Feinberg, 46, is known for his loyalty to investors and partners, his analytical savvy and his creative takeover strategies, the fund's tactics in the bare-knuckled and risky arena of distressed-debt investing have given Cerberus its share of bruises. Court documents detail legal brawls in which investors accuse Cerberus of orchestrating secretive deals that transgressed legal and ethical boundaries, accusations the firm denies.

"These guys come from a different background than other buyout firms," said Joel M. Simon, a principal at XRoads, a financial advisory firm, when asked to describe how Cerberus operates. "When you play in the distressed arena, you develop sharp elbows. They have a reputation as tough negotiators who avoid public attention."

That reputation can also be a liability. Cerberus has lost out on deals because of its secretive image, and it risks attracting the kind of regulatory scrutiny the takeover industry as a whole is trying to avoid. So Cerberus is trying to change. In the spirit of greater openness, it recently built a Web site to give the public a sliver-sized glimpse of the firm. Along with high-profile hires of political heavyweights, Cerberus has become a major political donor. It has distanced itself from its roughneck roots by hiring dozens of image-improving blue-chip executives and, during the GMAC announcement, went so far as to let a senior manager appear at a press conference for the first time in the fund's history.

But don't ask for a photo of Mr. Feinberg, an interview with him or even a visit to the company's Park Avenue headquarters — there are only so many shifts that Cerberus is willing to embrace. And the changes that Cerberus refuses to adopt speak to the struggles that many takeover groups confront as they try to establish an image as good corporate citizens rather than opportunists looking for a fast buck.

"The public wants to know who is buying up corporate America," said Felix G. Rohatyn, a well-regarded dean of Wall Street's investment banking industry. "It will be interesting to see how far those at the top are willing to pull back the veil."

THE son of a World War II veteran, Mr. Feinberg founded Cerberus in 1992 with $10 million, a plan to speculate in the debt of troubled public companies and a reputation for honest and tough negotiations. Distressed-debt investors get paid by shouldering aside other stakeholders and gambling that faltering companies can be rehabilitated. Over the years, analysts and investors say, Cerberus excelled by gaining control of companies in bankruptcy smackdowns and developing restructuring plans that helped them become profitable.

Some of those more secretive tactics, however, drew complaints and lawsuits. In 2000, Cerberus invested $42 million in the debt of WSNet Holdings, a small provider of satellite television programming. Over the next two years, according to shareholder lawsuits, Cerberus forced the company into bankruptcy by secretly buying up the bonds of companies WSNet hoped to acquire and forbidding WSNet executives from pursuing deals. Through bankruptcy proceedings, the fund tried to take control of the company, lawsuits contend. The suits also contend that Cerberus installed directors at WSNet who maximized Cerberus's profits at the expense of other stakeholders. The claims were settled for a relatively small amount in 2005, by which time Cerberus had recouped its initial investment in WSNet, according to the lawsuits.

Cerberus contended in court documents that the claims were meritless. Cerberus insiders also point out that courtroom hyperbole is not uncommon when bondholders and equity investors battle for a company, and that litigation has become a routine sideshow in distressed-debt deals. But similar complaints dogged the Cerberus investment in the debt of the Coram Healthcare Corporation, a home health care company.

In 2000, when Coram declared bankruptcy, the company's executives proposed a restructuring plan that would give total ownership to Cerberus and other bondholders. Coram's equity investors, including the real estate magnate Sam Zell, would have gotten nothing. Mr. Zell and other shareholders then discovered that the company's chief executive, who helped propose the plan, was secretly receiving nearly $1 million a year from Cerberus, in addition to his Coram salary, according to court documents. A federal bankruptcy judge ruled that a conflict of interest existed.

Cerberus argued that the Coram dispute was a result of sloppy recordkeeping and not deceptive business tactics, according to sources who requested anonymity because of confidentiality agreements. They note that even the court agreed that Coram's chief executive had brought an operational expertise to the company, and that it was not clear any damages resulted from the failure to disclose the additional payments. In 2003, Cerberus and two other investors agreed to pay $56 million to Coram, partially to settle the conflict-of-interest claims.

By then, Cerberus was looking beyond debt investing. The company had amassed an investment pool of more than $5 billion and was expanding into private equity, a focus that grew when distressed-debt opportunities began disappearing in late 2003. The shift to takeover deals required Cerberus to develop a friendlier image that was more attractive to the boards of companies the firm hoped to acquire.

DOJ_NMG_0108972

"When you sit down with a company's board, you want them to know who you are," said Brett H. Barth of BBR Partners, a money management firm that has invested with Cerberus. "Distressed debt is all about having a small piece of the pie and making it bigger at everyone else's expense. In private equity, you own the whole pie. You have to convince people you're focused on different things."

Cerberus began hiring well-known executives to introduce the firm to corporate boards. Today, it employs 140 nonfinancial professionals, including the former chairman of the Rite Aid Corporation, a onetime special adviser to Ford Motor and dozens of other blue-chip executives.

"Preserving our reputation is vitally important to us," said Timothy F. Price, the senior operations manager of Cerberus. "We don't want anyone from a company we've bought calling another board and saying, 'Stay away from these guys.' "

Cerberus says that when it plugs its seasoned executives into turnaround situations, it generates impressive results. After its purchase of Aozora Bank in Japan in 2003, for instance, new management helped increase net income 412 percent within three years and cut the number of nonperforming loans.

Its new army of familiar faces, its track record and its deep, deep pockets have made Cerberus well known within a strata of the financial sector where buying and selling companies are everyday activities. "The relationship between Cerberus and G.M. got better and better as the deal advanced," said Walter G. Borst, who as treasurer of General Motors helped to negotiate the Cerberus purchase of the stake in GMAC earlier this year. "They did everything they said they were going to do."

But the anonymity of Cerberus — and its reputation for strong-arm tactics — became liabilities when the firm tried to invest in Air Canada two years ago. To keep Cerberus out of the mix, politicians and the airline's directors asked a Canadian billionaire to save the company. Cerberus was seen at the time "as American piranhas looking to rip the place to pieces," said Robert A. Milton, chief executive of Air Canada's parent, ACE Aviation Holdings.

After unions scuttled the billionaire's deal, Cerberus stepped back in and wasted little time lining up local support. Mr. Feinberg hired Brian Mulroney, the former Canadian prime minister, as an adviser and promised not to resell the firm's Air Canada stake — today valued at about $347 million — for at least two years. The airline relented.

"They've been very supportive and knowledgeable investors, and as long as they're making money, they're willing to make hard decisions that invest in the company's future," Mr. Milton said.

The deal was a turning point for the fund. "When our deals were small, we could stay below the radar, but with Air Canada, we realized that we were losing out because people thought we were bad guys," said Mr. Price at Cerberus. "We realized we can't buy national icons without telling people who we are."

To add a higher-profile sheen, Cerberus hired Mr. Snow and spent more than $2.5 million with lobbying firms from 2003 to 2006, according to federal records. Those dollars were spent in part to discourage politicians from regulating private investment pools like Cerberus. Mr. Feinberg personally donated more than $100,000 to primarily Republican causes in the last three electoral cycles, according to federal filings.

Yet Cerberus still keeps a relatively tight lock on its doors.

"I think our guys would be embarrassed if our pictures were in the paper," Mr. Price said. "If I have time to be a celebrity, what message does that send to our 45 portfolio companies who we're asking to work all day?"

WHILE firms like Cerberus continue to eschew celebrity, some people say that greater transparency in the takeover world is not so easily avoided. In fact, they say, it is crucial.

"When you take control of a major company, you have a real responsibility to the employees, to the customers, to the communities they live in, to the public," Mr. Rohatyn said. "The people who run enormous funds understand that responsibility. They understand if they don't introduce themselves, suspicion will grow."

Avoiding those suspicions is a major preoccupation of private equity's founding fathers, who were famously condemned as barbarians at the gates when the industry made its first big splash in the 1980s. Since then, many would-be barbarians have worked hard to become respected executives and members of the corporate establishment. Anonymity has been swapped for high-profile socializing and philanthropy. For example, Henry R. Kravis, a star of the '80s buyout scene, now serves on the board of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, while the name of the corporate raider Carl C. Icahn now graces buildings at Princeton, Choate Rosemary Hall and a New York stadium. But those changes might be more window dressing than genuine transparency.

"Private equity investors realize they need a better public image," said Mr. Hu, the professor. "But they don't want to give up the secrecy and tactics that have made this industry so profitable. They want to be in control of how they are seen, rather than throwing open the doors."

However, that strategy may not be working. Private equity firms are finding themselves under attack in certain quarters. In Germany, political candidates have assailed takeover investors as "locusts." Oregon regulators last year refused to sell Portland General Electric to a buyout fund, citing a public outcry. And the Justice Department has started an investigation of possible collusion among some of the biggest private equity groups.

DOJ_NMG_0108973

OTHER regulators are also threatening to bring greater scrutiny to private equity firms, a threat that the hedge fund business is already facing. Regulators, such as Richard Blumenthal, the attorney general of Connecticut, say they may shift their focus to private equity groups. "It's the same cast of characters, the same secrecy, and they probably deserve the same attention," Mr. Blumenthal said.

So some private equity executives are firing back.

Stephen A. Schwarzman, chairman of one of the world's largest private equity firms, the Blackstone Group, notes that 48 percent of its investment capital comes from state and government pension funds. He also notes that Blackstone-owned companies have created 25,000 new jobs in the last five years (while also filling Blackstone's coffers). "Most of our profits go to retired firemen and teachers, nurses and government employees," Mr. Schwarzman said. "It's important that we educate Americans about how hedge funds and private equity play completely different roles."

Mr. Schwarzman's firm is expected to soon join other private equity giants, the Carlyle Group, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group, to announce the formation of the Private Equity Council, a trade association that plans to remind the public and politicians about the brighter side of takeover deals.

Cerberus insiders deride Mr. Schwarzman's sentiments as self-serving. But they acknowledge that Cerberus's preference for secrecy may be pulling the industry's publicity campaign off course. Senior executives at other private equity funds have begun whispering to one another and to Cerberus executives, partners and investors that Cerberus and Mr. Feinberg, having achieved financial prominence, need to renounce their secretive ways.

Some steps are occurring: At least two Cerberus executives have begun talking regularly to journalists, the company lists its address on its Web site and it has hired a public relations firm.

"We're talking about the firm with whoever asks about us, while still respecting the privacy of the people involved," said Mr. Price at Cerberus. "We don't need to be self-aggrandizing rock stars to be of service to America and open in our dealings."

But friends of Mr. Feinberg say he is a deeply private and humble man who does not want to be known by the world at large, and Cerberus executives say that many calls for greater visibility are simply competitors justifying their own showboating.

"Why does someone have to become a public figure just because he's successful?" Mr. Price asked. "It's hard for any of us to take time away from our day to day jobs to talk to outsiders, and Steve is the last guy who can afford to spend time away from our portfolio companies. Why do we have to give up our privacy for everyone else?"

U.S. Attorney On The Record: Kevin Ryan (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, December 24, 2006

Kevin Ryan, the tough-talking point man for the Bush administration's federal law enforcement efforts in Northern California, has taken a high-profile interest in investigating whether Bay Area companies and executives fraudulently backdated stock-option grants.

Over the summer, the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California dedicated a federal task force of prosecutors and investigators to the financial scandal that has swept up dozens of companies, led to two criminal indictments and prompted a rash of executive resignations.

Ryan's office is investigating more than 25 companies. About 15 to 20 percent have troubling red flags, he says. These investigations could go on for years, although sources in federal law enforcement suggest another indictment is imminent. To add more investigative firepower, Ryan is also focusing on whether employees who received the backdated options lied on their individual tax returns.

Ryan brings this investigation amid reports of high-profile defections and low morale among his prosecutors as well as a falling caseload at a U.S. attorney's office whose territory extends from Monterey County to the Oregon border and which has about 100 prosecutors in three branches.

Ryan, a San Francisco native, spent 11 years as a deputy district attorney in Alameda County before then-Gov. Pete Wilson appointed him to the San Francisco bench. He left that post when President Bush appointed him.

The following has been edited for space and clarity.

Q: When did your office start looking at backdating and at what point did your thinking crystallize that this was something you wanted to prosecute?

A: As you know, in the Brocade case, we had been looking at this for about 18 months before the indictment. I talked to folks about this issue, internally and externally, to try to get a sense of what people were thinking about it. I felt at the end of the day that it was something we really needed to step up and become the leader in because, and I think it's bearing true, a lot of the activity happened in the Silicon Valley.

DOJ_NMG_0108974

Whether it turns out to be criminal or not remains to be seen. Whether it turns out to be purely administrative and something that the Securities and Exchange Commission can handle or class-action lawsuits can handle, there seriously is an issue with the Silicon Valley during this period of time.

Q: This whole backdating thing seems a little abstract. Can you make it concrete and tell us why we should care about backdating and who's harmed?

A: I hear that argument all the time whether or not there was self-enrichment, whether or not the market cares, whether or not the market reacts to these things, and you need to understand that sometimes the way we look at an issue as prosecutors is one of the things we are trying to ensure is the integrity of the market and that the books and records are accurate.

For the industry itself, it's taken a very serious look at it and people are losing their jobs behind it. People who are heads of companies, lawyers for companies have all been asked to leave because of what has happened. That's one earmark that it is a serious problem. We're looking at the issue of whether or not there was fraud and criminal intent.

Did this happen in a vacuum? Did this happen because people didn't know what they were doing? Did this happen because people were sloppy? Or did this happen because someone knew the rules, and were people defrauded?

Q: How do you find the harm?

A: The harm is lying to the SEC, lying under oath, lying to the market, not stating your books. If I'm investing in a company and there are 300, 400, 500, 600 million dollars of options that have been backdated that might affect net income for the company, I want to know that. The tax consequences of this are going to be a big part of it.

Q: Do you think that may be individual fraud or people trying to escape taxes by misstating when they actually ...?

A: Well, I mean there have been some relatively high-profile cases recently where it has been reported by you folks of individuals selecting their own grant base -- a hundred million dollars you know, and I think it is not a stretch to assume that it was done for purposes of either avoiding the tax bill, whether it's capital or regular gains. You know the big issue today and you've reported on it, the Wall Street Journal has reported on it recently, is also the grant date and the backdating of the grant date, but now the backdating of the exercise date for purposes of capital gains, partial capital gains.

Q: It's pretty hard for that to be a mistake, isn't it?

A: Yes. Well, it can happen. A lot of the presentations we have heard say that this was done by someone who really didn't know the rules and someone who probably should have been keeping a better eye on that person. Or, we are really hands-on and we didn't know the rules and we should have been keeping an eye on it.

Q: How many cases are you investigating and what percentage are criminal in nature?

A: Well, I think typically we will not answer a question like that, but since the FBI has publicly announced that the last time they talked about this, there were about 53 cases they were involved in investigating for potential criminal conduct, and I have publicly stated of those 53, at least 50 percent of those companies are located in the Northern District of California. We are seeing troubling indicators in about 15 to 20 percent of those companies right now. We haven't finished all of our investigations; we haven't scrubbed all these companies. But we are seeing a handful or more of cases that have red flags that would suggest that we need to keep going.

Q: What are those red flags?

A: If a company comes in, then fires its CEO and head of HR and says, "We have a problem and we are about to restate 300, 400, 500 million dollars," those are all red flags. Often times these cases come to us in a variety of forms. We can get a whistle-blower coming to us. We can get an insider coming to us. We can get a phone call. We created years ago the first 800 number for securities fraud. If you thought something squirrelly was going on in the company, call the 800 number and let us know.

So we do have a universe of cases -- 150, 180 -- that the SEC is looking at. Then we start parsing that down into our district. How many of these cases are in our district. We start reading the newspaper to see who is restating, who is refiling their 8-Ks, their 10-Ks, their 10-Qs. Who got laid off? And why? And what is the story there? That has an impact on us. We will start looking at companies because of that kind of conduct. And we will start prioritizing and reprioritizing. And oftentimes we will already know or have a sense of what's going on.

Q: As companies conduct these self-investigations, are they reporting to you and the SEC their findings?

A: Yes, they are. They make presentations to us. They come in and tell us what the review process found. Sometimes that can shed light, sometimes it cannot shed any light at all.

Q: Is it true that you are creating a database of lawyers conducting these investigations to judge their credibility?

A: I wouldn't say we are creating a database. We know pretty much the universe of folks doing these things. Like any other profession, reputations mean a lot. If you have a reputation for honesty, integrity, and you are known as someone not to try to pull the wool over someone's eyes, that reputation follows you around and sometimes if you have a contrary reputation, we're a suspicious lot. That's what we do.

DOJ_NMG_0108975

Q: There has been a lot of talk lately about the "Thompson Memo" (a set of guidelines drafted by the Department of Justice in 2003 in the wake of Enron and WorldCom to combat corporate wrongdoing) and allegations that the DOJ placed undue pressure on companies to cooperate in these investigations.

Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty made some revisions to that memo this week. Can you talk a little bit about that? Do you think all of this cooperation has been entirely voluntary on the part of companies? Also, one of the principal problems you face in these cases is the statute of limitations. Have you gotten some of these companies to waive that?

A: Yes, companies have come in and agreed to "toll" stop the clock running (on the statutory period) in an effort to cooperate. With regard to the Thompson/McNulty memo, clearly there has been a shift. I will say that I understand the debate. We are clearly aware of what's happened.

In our office in four-plus years, I have never had anyone complain about the process and whether or not we were heavy-handed in our request. I understand the need to really change the process such that the perception and, if in fact true, the reality that we somehow were sending message out interfering with the attorney-client privilege, we didn't want to do that, that was not the intent of the Thompson Memo, that was not the intent of our prosecutors. We have always had to depend to a certain extent in these types of cases on the cooperation of the lawyers for the firms we are investigating.

Q: Is the McNulty memo going to slow things down or make it more difficult to get cooperation?

A: I don't know if it will slow things down or not. Clearly there was a policy decision that this is the way we are going to go and that's what we are going to do. My experience is that most companies have cooperated with us, and they understand the value of that. Now if they choose not to, that's fine, too.

Q: At what point do you decide to indict?

A: The classic things we're looking for: What is the history of the company? Have they had a history of malfeasance? Have they done this in the past? Have they come in and addressed the issue internally? Have they gotten rid of the people who have violated the code of ethics for the company? Have they made every effort to come up with a solid compliance program to make sure this would never happen again? Has this happened in the past? Have they ignored the indicators (that they) may have some rogue employees or a rogue division within the company? What would be the impact to the company? Would it be a death knell to the company to indict the company? Are there appropriate or reasonable alternatives, such as deferred prosecution agreements that would have the same impact and not put a company out of business and not put people out of their IRAs and retirement plans?

Q: We have been told that more indictments are coming and we have been told that another indictment is in the pipeline from your office in the backdating probe. Can you tell us who, when or how many?

A: No, I won't comment on that. Again, we have seen troubling indicators in a handful of these cases. We are really burrowing down into those cases. And there are red flags sufficient to keep us focused on those cases. At the end of the day, the grand jury is the ultimate decider whether or not there is sufficient evidence to bring a case forward. The last chapter has not been written, but I am not going to say who, how many and when.

Q: There is the perception that you are more reluctant to go after some individuals and companies than others. Does the prominence or the importance of a person to an industry or a company factor into the investigation and your decision to take action?

A: I have been in law enforcement my entire career. My position is that if someone has violated the law and there is sufficient evidence to bring forth charges under our guidelines then that's what's going to happen. As long as I'm U.S. attorney, that's what's going to happen. Sometimes we have to make difficult calls involving prominent people, powerful people.

Q: How did this become so widespread?

A: Looking at the valley here, I think we saw a confluence of events. You had these companies with a lot of potential, some of them were cash-starved, some of them didn't have money to pay high salaries up front, in many of them there was a belief that there would be a big payoff down the road in the dot-com boom.

So there was an effort to come up with creative ways to recruit people, to retain people, to motivate people, to incentivize people to help the company grow. I think the way the accounting rules for backdating were set up in the '90s created the opportunity for mischief. I think there was an opportunity for those willing to partake in it to engage in this kind of conduct. It was kind of a perfect storm.

Q: Is there a Typhoid Mary running around? Was there a secret seminar that everyone went to?

A: Maybe we will have an answer to that someday in the future. It was clearly a practice. You have to remember, like a lot of things it wasn't illegal or necessarily improper to backdate your options. What was illegal is if you didn't account for it in your compensation. Then the question is: Why did one company account for it properly and why did one company not?

Q: What is the IRS' interest?

DOJ_NMG_0108976

A: I brought the IRS (in) early. The immediate thing that grabbed me was the tax implications of this. The individuals who were exercising these options, there could be hundreds of millions of dollars, or tens of millions of dollars. How are they carrying them on their personal taxes? How did they file? Also, what's the company doing? How is the company carrying it? Are they deducting $100 million for compensation-related expenses? The IRS is fully engaged in this. The interesting thing about the IRS is that they have a six-year statute of limitations for criminal tax, no statute of limitations for civil. They bring a little bit of extra room for us on the issue of statute of limitations.

Q: At the time you created the task force, there was speculation that was a means to get more firepower at a time when there had been a lot of reports about high-profile defections from your office and reports of low morale. Can you address that?

A: Well, let me just say this: When I became the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, there were 12 vacancies in my office. There are 12 vacancies now. We have 10-15 percent sometimes 20 percent attrition rate every year. Most large or super-large offices also do. The average tenure of (an assistant U.S. attorney) is about eight years.

The situation becomes a bit more complex in a place like San Francisco, where folks can't afford to buy a home on a government salary. I don't know if you know what we make, but local DAs and deputy city attorneys make far more money than we do and have a better retirement than career (assistant U.S. attorneys).

So many people have left. Some have left for judgeships, some have left for partnerships in firms, and some have left for other reasons. I came in. I had a mandate. I did my job and we've invigorated that office. We have good career prosecutors working these cases. I'll put them up against anyone at anytime, including those who have left.

Q: Some of the attorneys who have left were considered real lifers, not the kind of people who would leave because they couldn't buy a house. There has been a lot of criticism over the handling of the office because of the stream of departures that are perceived as being a result of your leadership style.

A: I am not going to make any excuses for any decisions we have made. We have done a heck of a job. We've invigorated that office. Our numbers are high. Our cases are high. If you can point to another office that has a BALCO, that has a Brocade, that has an option-dating task force, that has done the cases we've done, I'd be happy to talk about it. Our work has not suffered as a result of these departures.

Q: The legal press has taken you to task for the number of criminal filings your office has been responsible for, a number that your office has disputed. They claim these numbers are a low for your tenure and for the office in the past 12 years. What are the numbers? And is it that they are ignoring how complex these high-profile cases are?

A: That's part of the reason. Our numbers are at the highest or the highest they have been in my tenure. These are complicated cases. I could go out right now and indict 100 low-end drug or gun cases to jump my numbers up if that was what my goal was as the U.S. attorney. That's not my goal. You also have to factor in that it's a post-9/11 world.

The FBI completely realigned its resources after 9/11 and took case agents off narcotics and other squads and put them into counterintelligence that does not necessarily result in cases, and they put them into terrorism cases. They are protecting the American public and they are working on counterintelligence cases that may not result in a criminal prosecution ever. Our job changed completely and utterly after 9/11. The numbers are not what drive us.

People come and go for a variety of reasons. I will not be here forever and most of the people in that office won't be career people. It's not built to be a career institution if you look at the way the retirement is set up for folks. That's just the way it is.

Q: Do you have enough seasoned prosecutors to prosecute every backdating case that warrants it?

A: Yes.

Q: As recently as March, a Justice Department audit said morale wasn't good in your organization.

A: I remember Bob Mueller (former U.S. attorney) gave a speech to Congress. He said when you take over any organization, one third are against you, one third are for you, and one third are in the middle. People are sometimes unhappy for a variety of reasons. If I am not drawing criticism, I figure I am not doing my job. When I was a judge, at the end of every day, you made a temporary friend and a permanent enemy. I imagine there are people who don't like the direction I have taken this office under this administration and they're unhappy about it.

Q: How would you assess morale?

A: I think morale is generally pretty good. I think there are some people who are unhappy.

Q: What about your own future? You just said you won't be there forever. Would you care to be more specific?

A: I think a lot of this is up to God. I serve at the pleasure of the president. Everybody knows that there are two years left on his term. I am one of the longest-serving U.S. attorneys. If you look now, about 60 percent of the people in my class, if you will, have already moved on. So, there will come a day when I pack my bags and leave the federal building.

Q: Do you have a federal judgeship in mind?

A: No, I don't comment on that.

Kevin Ryan

Age: 49

Title: U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California

Education: Bachelor of arts in history from Dartmouth College; law degree from the University of San Francisco

Work experience: Began his career as a prosecutor with the Alameda County district attorney's office; appointed by then-Gov. Pete Wilson to San Francisco Municipal Court in 1996; became a member of the San Francisco Superior Court in 1999; nominated by President Bush to serve as the 48th U.S. attorney for the Northern District of California in May 2002, confirmed by the Senate in July 2002.

On the Record interviews are available online at sfgate.com/chronicle/ontherecord.

Participating in this interview were Business Editor Ken Howe, Deputy Business Editor Alan T. Saracevic, Assistant Business Editors David Tong and Sam Zuckerman, staff writers Jessica Guynn and Bob Egelko, and editorial assistant Steve Corder.

Page F - 1

CRIMINAL LAW:

The Right Has A Jailhouse Conversion (NYT)

By Chris Suellentrop

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

Not too long ago, you could tell whether an election was under way by watching prime-time television and counting the number of ominous recitatives about prisoners and ex-prisoners in the commercials. This fall, however, the seven million Americans who are in the custody of the state — in prison or jail, on probation or parole — did not loom large on nightly TV; in fact, as has been the case for nearly a decade, they barely received any notice at all. Prisoners are no longer the charged political symbols and campaign-season scapegoats they once were.

This decline in the exploitation of crime coincides with an odd and surprising change in the politics of crime. The G.O.P., the party of Richard Nixon's 1968 law-and-order campaign and the Willie Horton commercial, is beginning to embrace the idea that prisoners have not only souls that need saving but also flesh that needs caring for in this world. Increasingly, Republicans are talking about helping ex-prisoners find housing, drug treatment, mental-health counseling, job training and education. They're also reconsidering some of the more punitive sentencing laws for drug possession. The members of this nascent movement include a number of politicians not previously known for their attention to prisoners' rights. Senator Jeff Sessions of Alabama, a former federal prosecutor whom The New Republic once accused of being stained "with the taint of racism," wants to reduce the penalty for possession of small amounts of crack. Referring to mandatory-minimum sentences, Representative Bob Inglis of South Carolina, whose district is home to Bob Jones University, declared on the floor of the House: "I voted for them in the past. I will not do it again." Perhaps most remarkably, the outgoing Republican-controlled Congress came tantalizingly close to passing the Second Chance Act, a bill that focuses not on how to "lock them up" but on how to let them out. The bill may become law soon, if Democrats continue to welcome the new conservative interest in rehabilitation.

By some measures, the Second Chance Act is a small bill. It authorizes less than $100 million over two years to address a significant problem: about 700,000 ex-offenders (the population of a good-size American city) will leave prison in 2007 — and two-thirds of them are likely to be rearrested within three years. The bill would provide states with grants to develop model programs for prisoners returning to society. Those states that accept the grants will be asked to re-examine any laws and regulations that make it unreasonably difficult for ex-offenders to reintegrate themselves into their communities — the classic example is the ban on allowing felons to receive a barber's license. (If the felon in question is Sweeney Todd, of course, the ban might make sense. But a blanket prohibition that includes check bouncers and marijuana users seems overly broad.) The bill also provides money to faith-based organizations and other nonprofits for prisoner-mentoring programs. Finally, it requires states to measure how well their programs achieve the bill's main goal: reducing the rate of recidivism among recently released prisoners.

No one expects the Second Chance Act to solve the prisoner-re-entry problem overnight. The bill's authors are probably too confident that drug treatment, education and housing assistance can reduce recidivism on their own. Such services, many criminologists say, are effective only when paired with the tight supervision of ex-offenders. Some researchers point to the "broken windows" response to crime and suggest trying a similar approach with prisoner re-entry: quickly punish any small violations of the terms of a prisoner's release with graduated sanctions while returning ex-offenders to prison only for new crimes, not for technical parole violations like missing a meeting with a probation officer. The Second Chance Act does nothing to support this sort of approach.

DOJ_NMG_0108978

As policy, then, the bill won't be an elixir. But as a symbolic political gesture, the Second Chance Act completely reverses recent practice. For the first time in decades, Congress is poised to pass a bill that aims to make the lives of prisoners and ex-prisoners easier, not more difficult. In the 1990s, Democratic and Republican Congresses scrapped the Pell Grant program for prisoners, barred drug offenders from receiving federal student loans and cut highway money for states that did not revoke or suspend the driver's licenses of drug felons. Now leading politicians of both parties are proposing that states remove laws and regulations that wall off the ex-criminal class from the community. Rather than eliminating education and substance-abuse treatment programs, Congress may well finance them. When I met with Mark Earley, a former political star of the Christian right and a present-day prison reformer, I began explaining to him why I was surprised by the Second Chance Act and the so-called "re-entry movement" surrounding it. He knew why I was surprised: "First of all," he said, by the very fact "that there is common ground" between Republicans and Democrats. "And second of all, it's this?"

Many liberals and Democrats — from Senator Joe Biden to members of the Congressional Black Caucus like Stephanie Tubbs Jones, a representative from Cleveland, and Danny Davis, a representative from Chicago — are sponsors of the Second Chance Act. Still, the issue is not a top priority for the party. In their recent blueprint for Democratic success, "The Plan," Rahm Emanuel, the influential Illinois congressman, and Bruce Reed, president of the Democratic Leadership Council, wrote only one paragraph on crime — and that was mostly a hymn to the achievements of the 1994 crime bill. The campaign document for House Democrats, "A New Direction for America," promises action on national security, the economy, higher education, energy, health care and retirement. The words "crime" and "prisons" never appear.

Prison reform is not a highly advertised position of the Republican Party either, but a growing number of social conservatives are trying to make it a centerpiece of the Christian-conservative agenda. The most striking aspect of the Second Chance Act may be the cross-section of Republicans, from every wing of the party, who support it. Senator Arlen Specter, the top-ranked contender for the award of Least Favorite Republican among movement conservatives, is a lead sponsor, as is Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, who may be Christian conservatives' top choice for the 2008 presidential nomination. Among the House sponsors of the bill are Mike Pence, an Indiana congressman who is a leader of the conservative caucus in the House and a darling of Washington's conservative press corps, and Dan Lungren, a California representative and former California attorney general who helped write California's three-strikes law (which he still supports). "For liberals in criminal justice, he's like the devil, almost," says a key liberal lobbyist for the bill, Gene Guerrero of George Soros's Open Society Policy Center.

The Second Chance Act would seem an unlikely bill to be advanced during an election year. At every level of government, after all, elections are thought to encourage tough-on-crime legislation. Recalling his time in the Illinois Legislature, Barack Obama, an early sponsor, says: "We used to have a joke. Let's say the offense was that defacing property was a Class C misdemeanor, or a Class A misdemeanor. Suddenly somebody would jack it up to a Class 2 felony. And it was always before election time. And we'd say, 'You know, it's not a good idea to leap all the way to the maximum penalty, because you'll have nothing to come back with next election.' You know, you want to take it in stages."

With the Second Chance Act, however, three of what were the most endangered senators in America — Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Jim Talent of Missouri and Mike DeWine of Ohio — put their names on the bill; all lost their re-election bids. Their support for the legislation wasn't an issue in their losses, but even that fact is remarkable. In today's political environment, crime policy has so receded from controversy that the Republican-led House Judiciary Committee could approve the Second Chance Act in July under the assumption that the full House might take it up on the eve of an election in which the Republican majority was at stake.

What has changed? It's true that crime rates have declined in recent years (notwithstanding a slight uptick last year), but for the last quarter of the 20th century, crime policy was impervious to fluctuations in street crime. If crime went up, politicians got tough on crime. If crime went down, politicians still got tough on crime. At the state level, at least, that is no longer the case — and a large shift in public opinion has much to do with it. In 1994, crime and health care were the two top issues that Americans thought the government should tackle. Nine years later, less than 1 percent of Americans named crime as a top political issue.

If safer streets had something to do with the change in public attitudes, so did another development: the changing place of crime in the national debate over moral values. Over the past decade, as the political scientists William Galston and Elaine Kamarck have suggested, the culture war of the 1970s and 1980s that revolved around race has been replaced by one that revolves around religion. A side effect has been a radically different crime debate. If the Second Chance Act fails to pass, it will not be because the two parties cannot agree on the importance of rehabilitation programs in prisons. But it may be because they disagree on the role religious organizations should play in rehabilitation.

This September, Mark Earley ascended to a lectern at the Washington Convention Center to recite a political act of contrition. Earley, who is white, seemed among the least likely attendees of the Congressional Black Caucus's annual legislative conference to rouse the mostly African-American audience of liberal activists, Capitol Hill staff members, lobbyists and members of Congress to sermon-listener cries of "Amen," "Yes, sir" and "Tell it!" The most successful Christian conservative politician to emerge from the State of Virginia, Earley represented the district of Pat Robertson and Ralph Reed for 10 years in the Old Dominion Legislature. In 1997, he ran for attorney general on a platform that combined socially conservative positions on abortion and other issues with a dollop of tough-on-crime rhetoric — and won.

DOJ_NMG_0108979

Now Earley came to confess his sins. In front of an audience filled with former prisoners who were attending a job fair connected to the conference, Earley cast his arms wide and proclaimed: "I was wrong. I repent!"

"I'm 52 years old," he said at the beginning of his remarks, "and for the first 48 years of my life, I didn't think much about prisoners. And when I did, it went something like, I'm glad I'm not one, and I'm glad they are where they are." He continued: "And I really pretty much had the view that prisoners were at the end of the line. That if you were in prison, you had no hope, you'd made a mess of your life, and it was better for me that you were there, because my family could be safe."

He went on: "I was elected to the Virginia Legislature and served 10 years, from '87 to '97, in the Senate of Virginia, and quite frankly, spent most of my time in the Legislature working on how to put more people in jail and keeping them there longer. Virginia, like most states in the '80s, abolished parole, instituted three strikes and you're out, lowered the age at which juveniles could be tried as adults from 16 to 14." Earley told the crowd that these policies helped increase the American prison population "tenfold in the last 30 years." Unlike most politicians who say such things, Earley wasn't bragging. He was apologizing.

Like many Republicans and Christian activists, Earley's prison-house conversion dates from an encounter with Chuck Colson, the Watergate crook turned Christian evangelist. When Earley lost the Virginia governor's race in 2001 to Mark Warner, Colson asked Earley to take over Prison Fellowship, the ministry that Colson founded in the mid-1970s. Earley declined on the assumption that devoting himself to prisoners was tantamount to throwing his life "down a dark hole." Over the next few months, Earley read his Bible and was struck by the number of criminals who play starring roles: Moses, for example, murdered a man and became a fugitive. Paul presided over the stoning of Stephen, the first Christian martyr. Earley came to a realization: "If Moses or Paul had lived in Virginia or any state in the United States today, they would be serving, had they been caught, a multiple-decade prison sentence." He took the job.

Of course, it's easy to admit the error of your political ways when you've left office and don't have to worry about voters punishing you for your change of heart. But Earley is far from alone in his apostasy from the usual anti-crime politics. Howard Coble, a congressman from North Carolina and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, Terrorism and Homeland Security in the last Congress, said in 2003 that the internment camps for Japanese-Americans during World War II were "appropriate at the time." And yet when Coble first introduced the Second Chance Act to the full judiciary committee this summer, he called the bill "an enlightened departure" from the politics of "lock them up and throw away the key."

"At one point, I may have embraced that theory," Coble told me over the phone from his home in Greensboro, N.C., during the August Congressional recess. "I still embrace the theory of locking the cell door if an offender has been convicted of a crime. But I don't say throw the key away. I say, keep the key handy, so the same key that locked that door can also unlock it." Coble's words recalled those of Alexander Maconochie, a Scottish prison warden who reformed Norfolk Island, the Alcatraz of 19th-century Australia, by inventing the concept of indeterminate sentencing — an incentive-based system involving early release for hard work and good behavior: "When a man keeps the key of his own prison, he is soon persuaded to fit it to the lock."

For most of the 20th century, indeterminate sentencing and rehabilitation were consensus policies in the United States. The decision to call the state agencies that run prisons departments of "corrections" was intended to reflect the rehabilitative nature of their work. But in 1974, a sociologist named Robert Martinson published an article called "What Works?" in the neoconservative journal The Public Interest. John Dilulio, President Bush's first director of faith-based initiatives, once called Martinson's essay "arguably the single most influential article ever published in that influential journal." Martinson answered the question he posed by concluding that "with few and isolated exceptions," there was no evidence that any rehabilitation programs successfully reduced recidivism. His article and the subsequent media attention it received — along with the high crime rates of the 1970s — are credited with shifting the emphasis in crime policy from rehabilitation to punishment and "just desserts." Martinson later retracted his argument: in a 1979 article in The Hofstra Law Review, he acknowledged that some rehabilitation programs had "an appreciable effect," while emphasizing that other programs were actually harmful. But the political environment was not as receptive to a more nuanced approach. Following California's lead in 1977, state after state abandoned rehabilitation and indeterminate sentencing in favor of punishment and fixed sentences.

Today's revival of rehabilitation began during the final years of Bill Clinton's presidency. The Clinton administration had been as punishment-oriented as its Republican predecessors. With the exception of a few liberal members of Congress — mostly members of the Congressional Black Caucus who represent urban districts — Democrats in the 1990s abandoned prison reform. The two defining moments of Democratic crime politics in the 1990s were Clinton's decision as governor of Arkansas to allow the execution of the mentally impaired Ricky Ray Rector in 1992 and the passage of the 1994 crime bill; along with banning assault weapons and putting 100,000 cops on the street, the bill also prominently featured longer sentences for criminals and a federal three-strikes law.

DOJ_NMG_0108980

But in the spring of 1999, Janet Reno turned to Jeremy Travis, then the director of the National Institute of Justice, and asked, "What are we doing about all the people coming out of prison?" It began to dawn on Reno, Travis and others that the mandatory sentences Congress and state legislatures created over the preceding decades had an unintended side effect: automatic release. More and more prisoners were leaving prison without having to earn their release, because the incentives to change their behavior had been removed. That seems obvious: what else would you expect from states that abolished parole and replaced discretionary sentencing with fixed sentences? Yet few lawmakers and corrections professionals seemed to have considered the consequences. In October 1999, Reno and Travis held a news conference promoting the idea of prisoner "re-entry," a word Travis came up with that rebranded the unpopular notion of prisoner rehabilitation. "Re-entry" shifts the emphasis from the criminal to the community — from how an inmate is treated to how safe you and your neighbors will be when he or she is released. In that sense, re-entry preys on the public fear of a nation of Willie Hortons, but it does so in the service of going "softer" on crime.

Even as Reno and Travis were promoting the idea of prisoner re-entry, Matt Salmon, a Republican congressman from Arizona, was championing the No Second Chances Act, a bill that would take federal money away from states that released a prisoner who then committed a crime in another state. The political climate seemed unfriendly. Yet Reno and Travis's initiative aroused little opposition — or much notice of any kind.

Criminologists of both parties hope that the decreasing importance of crime as a political issue will make it possible to have a more sober discussion of the subject at last. They want to see a less ideologically charged debate and one that rests more closely on sound research. There's only one problem: a shocking paucity of such evidence to inform the policy debate. As Christy Visher, a researcher from the Urban Institute, put it in the May 2006 issue of Criminology and Public Policy, "There is no consensus answer to the question Do prisoner-re-entry programs work?"

And yet there is a consensus to not do what we are doing. Criminologists largely agree that increasing the use of incarceration at some point becomes counterproductive and crime actually starts to rise. Many researchers suggest that we're at that point already. In his book on re-entry, "They All Come Back," Travis notes that only about 25 percent of the violent-crime reduction in the 1990s was because of "incapacitation" — the fact that would-be criminals were locked up and unable to commit more crimes. Michael Jacobson, who worked as the New York City corrections commissioner under Rudy Giuliani, points out that the city's nation-leading decline in street crime during the 1990s coincided with a decline in the use of incarceration as a weapon of crime control. San Diego, the No. 2 city in crime reduction from 1993 to 2001, also sent fewer people to prison during that period.

The best way to deter crime, according to most researchers, is to increase the swiftness and the certainty of arrest for people who break the law, not to increase the severity of their sentences. Many experts would like to see some kind of return to indeterminate sentencing, though they disagree on the particulars. Ultimately, they'd like to see sentencing turn from an Industrial Age policy, a one-size-fits-all assembly line, to an Internet Age policy of personalization. Joan Petersilia, a leading researcher on parole, recommends using statistical risk profiles, similar to those employed by auto insurers, to determine which ex-offenders should receive the most support or supervision from re-entry programs. She argues in her book "When Prisoners Come Home" that "from a victim's standpoint, there is no benefit from determinate sentencing or automatic-prisoner-release schemes," because you "replace a rational, controlled system of earned release for selected inmates with automatic release for nearly all inmates."

Outside the criminology community, conservatives have embraced re-entry to save lives, to save souls and also to save money. Putting aside Medicaid, spending on corrections has been the fastest-growing item in state budgets in recent years. Partly for this reason, Louisiana and Mississippi — the two states, Michael Jacobson notes in his book, "Downsizing Prisons," with the highest rates of per capita incarceration in the country — embraced sentencing reform in 2001. Louisiana eliminated some mandatory sentences and required that the first two "strikes" for offenders be violent, rather than nonviolent, felonies. Mississippi, which had abolished discretionary parole in 1995, decided to bring it back for nonviolent first-time offenders. By 2003, 18 states had implemented similar reforms. Under the Republican governor, John Engler, Michigan repealed all of its mandatory-minimum drug laws.

When George W. Bush took office in 2001, he did not dismantle the Clinton-era re-entry programs; rather, he adapted them to fit his faith-based agenda. Despite his strong support for capital punishment, President Bush may be the most pro-prisoner president in American history — at least if you disregard the war on terror (an admittedly enormous caveat). Certainly in terms of rhetoric, Bush has done more to advance the interests of prisoners than either Jimmy Carter or Bill Clinton. The Second Chance Act takes its name from the 2004 State of the Union address in which Bush asked Congress to pass a $300 million program to help prisoners as they re-enter society: "In the past, we've worked together to bring mentors to children of prisoners, and provide treatment for the addicted, and help for the homeless. Tonight I ask you to consider another group of Americans in need of help. This year, some 600,000 inmates will be released from prison back into society. We know from long experience that if they can't find work, or a home, or help, they are much more likely to commit crime and return to prison. So tonight, I propose a four-year, $300 million prisoner re-entry initiative to expand job-training and placement services, to provide transitional housing, and to help newly released prisoners get mentoring, including from faith-based groups. America is the land of second chance, and when the gates of the prison open, the path ahead should lead to a better life."

DOJ_NMG_0108981

Democrats were flabbergasted. Representative Stephanie Tubbs Jones calls it "the only thing that George W. Bush has ever said at a State of the Union that made me stand up and cheer." Representative Danny Davis says, "I always tell people that when he said that, I was the first person up to applaud, even though I was on the Democratic side of the aisle."

According to Mark Earley, Bush's speech "very subtly sent a signal to conservative Republicans that it's O.K. to talk about rehabilitation and doing something for prisoners as they're coming back into society, and prisoners' kids."

There are few, if any, senators more closely identified with the Christian conservative movement than Sam Brownback. Like a growing number of conservatives, Brownback is a political proponent of the so-called new-evangelical causes, which range from AIDS in Africa and slavery in Sudan to poverty and the Prison Rape Elimination Act, a bill that helped build the coalition of Democrats and Republicans in the re-entry movement. Even when he disagrees with his fellow religious conservatives, he gives faith-based reasons for doing so. A convert to Catholicism, he has said his religion informs his support for a less punitive approach to immigration reform. In February, he held a hearing intended to foster debate on whether the death penalty can be reconciled with Pope John Paul II's call to create "a culture of life."

Brownback also routinely mentions prison reform — especially the faith-based variety — in public speeches. During Alberto Gonzales's confirmation hearing to become attorney general, he made a special point of asking Gonzales about his plans to reduce prison recidivism. He wrote a letter to The Washington Post in February complaining about an op-ed by the U.C.L.A. psychologist David Farabee, who dismissed the Second Chance Act as a return to "the intuitively appealing programs that we correctly rejected 30 years ago." Brownback countered in his letter, "We should not be resigned to allowing generation after generation to return to prison because they don't have the tools to break the cycle."

When I visited him earlier this year, Brownback seemed highly aware of the dangers, even for a conservative Republican from Kansas, of seeming the slightest bit soft on crime. "I wouldn't say I represent the mainstream of this," he insisted. "I think we have to prove results" — that is, demonstrate an actual reduction in recidivism rates among newly released prisoners. He continued: "I personally favor a number of these faith-based approaches. But if there are other approaches, let's try them. This is an enormous problem, and since the '70s, we have basically just said we'll lock people up."

Later, in his office in the Senate Hart Building, Brownback implicitly raised the specter of Willie Horton — the fear that he and the other sponsors of the bill would be blamed for crimes committed by the formerly incarcerated: "Imagine you get one bad prisoner coming out and committing a heinous crime, which is likely to happen. And people's reaction is, they get mad. They don't want this guy out on the streets that's doing this. If you can't show, look, by doing these programs we are cutting the recidivism rate overall, I don't think it will stand the blowback when that situation inevitably happens."

Chris Cannon, a Utah conservative who is the bill's Republican point man in the House, is less circumspect than Brownback. On crime, Cannon can sound like a liberal Democrat, if liberal Democrats still talked the way he did during my first phone conversation with him in August: "Republicans have taken a pretty harsh position, just locking people up." And: "The system has a very strong tendency to change them for the worse. Everybody knows that, I think." And: "Our current system is fundamentally immoral."

A few weeks later, in his Congressional office, Cannon was just as adamant: "I think society has a huge obligation to prisoners. I think that obligation transcends our current view, which is: Lock them up, hide them away, keep my daughter safe, keep my house safe, if he or she burgles, I want that person gone. Out of sight, out of mind. Away. I think that violates the fundamental concepts of who we are as Americans.

"Nobody thinks this is a bill that solves our moral dilemma," he went on. "Maybe I should say moral crisis. But it is a first step, an agreeable first step, and it allows us to take a look at where we ought to think about ending up." But even Cannon occasionally realizes he's treading on dangerous political ground. After this preamble, apropos of nothing, he declared: "In this whole thing, nobody is being soft on crime. Nobody is saying, let these people out. It's about after someone is found to have committed a crime, what do we do to help that person become a useful, productive member of society?" Which, of course, involves letting them out.

Cannon and his allies toiled hard on behalf of the Second Chance Act, and they helped shepherd it through the House, where the Republican leadership pledged to schedule a vote if the Senate did the same. But despite their efforts, the outgoing Congress failed to move forward. The first sign of trouble came in the summer. When the bill reached the House Judiciary Committee, Representative Louie Gohmert of Texas tried to amend it so that it explicitly, rather than implicitly, authorized the financing of faith-based organizations. Gohmert's proposed amendment drew enthusiastic support from Republicans, but it alienated Democrats, who would have scuttled the bill in the Senate. The bill's Democratic supporters accept that the Bush administration will allocate some of the funds to Christian organizations. But they draw the line at direct legislative authorization to finance religious organizations. Such an authorization was anathema to them unless it contained additional language restricting faith-based groups from proselytizing and from discriminating on the basis of religion in their hiring decisions. To keep the bill on course, four Republicans — including Cannon and Coble — turned against their colleagues and joined with Democrats to defeat Gohmert's amendment.

DOJ_NMG_0108982

In the Senate, with 37 co-sponsors and the support of Republican leaders, the bill seemed sure to pass. But in mid-December, as the legislative term came to an end, Senator Tom Coburn — a Christian conservative from Oklahoma who has said, "As a physician, I believe that we ought to be doing drug treatment rather than incarceration" — ignored personal appeals from Brownback, Specter and others and put a hold on the bill. Coburn supports the bill's objectives and calls it "a good act," but his fiscal-conservative conscience overcame his social-conservative one. He demanded the termination of other federal programs that, in his view, served similar purposes. The bill's supporters must have felt betrayed, as some assumed that Coburn had pledged not to prevent the bill's passage. Even so, the bill seems likely to pass, with some modifications, in the next legislative session.

In order for that to happen, the Democrats will have to take a step similar to the one Bill Clinton encouraged them to take in the 1990s, when they conceded that the country's desire for changes in affirmative action, welfare and crime policy was more than just a proxy for racism. By passing the Second Chance Act, Democrats can acknowledge that the Christian desire to improve the lives of prisoners is more than a mere proxy for evangelism. And in doing so, they can re-embrace a cause of their own: the creation of a criminal-justice system that is more humane and more just. The current moment is, in Michael Jacobson's view, "the best opportunity of the last 25 years for altering the way in which the United States has used incarceration." But if that moment is to be seized, if there's any possibility to reform a prison system that almost everyone thinks has failed, both parties are going to have to rely, at least a little bit, on faith.

Md. Death Penalty May Come To Fore (WP)

By John Wagner And Eric Rich, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

The emotionally charged, polarizing issue of the death penalty was barely mentioned during the campaign for Maryland governor. And it hardly seemed something that Gov.-elect Martin O'Malley would be eager to wade into during his first months in office, when he plans to focus on "the things we agree on."

Yet the confluence of national currents and a Maryland court ruling last week halting executions on a technicality could make the death penalty a defining issue of O'Malley's tenure.

In effect, Maryland suddenly has a moratorium on executions, and the new governor, who is personally opposed to capital punishment, could play a pivotal role in determining when -- and whether -- it resumes.

"I think the chances of someone being executed on O'Malley's watch decrease very significantly as a result of the court's opinion," said Timothy Maloney, a lawyer and former Prince George's County delegate.

That's due largely to a broad shift in dynamics that has sprung from a narrow ruling.

Before last week, halting executions in Maryland would have required legislation from a General Assembly that in recent years has shown a waning appetite to take up the issue. Despite his personal beliefs, O'Malley seemed unlikely to champion a messy cause that could crowd out his early priorities.

Now, however, executions are not likely to resume without action from his administration. Under the ruling by the Court of Appeals, new regulations must be drafted before the state may put more prisoners to death -- and early signs from O'Malley and his aides suggest that he sees no reason to rush that process.

Given new questions about lethal injection that have arisen in California, Florida and other states, O'Malley could also seize the opportunity for a broader discussion about the wisdom of the death penalty, lawmakers and advocates on both sides of the issue say.

The night of the ruling, O'Malley said he was certain that "all of this will spark a renewed debate as to whether all of the money we spend prosecuting death penalty cases might be better spent fighting violent crime and saving lives."

O'Malley has said little since to suggest what form that debate should take. But it would be well within Annapolis tradition to appoint a commission to study the issue, pushing off any possibility of an execution in the state.

Michael Paranzino, the head of Throw Away the Key, a Kensington-based nonprofit organization that supports capital punishment, said he expects that O'Malley will welcome the opportunity to effectively impose a moratorium on the death penalty.

By doing little or nothing, Paranzino said, O'Malley and other death penalty opponents might accomplish their goal without paying the political price that a strong stand could entail. There appears to be no recent polling done on the issue in Maryland, but 53 percent of voters supported the death penalty in a 2004 poll conducted for the Baltimore Sun.

DOJ_NMG_0108983

"I do expect them to move slowly and appoint commissions and stall, stall, stall," Paranzino said. "If the Republican Party has any pulse left in this state, that's the kind of issue they could take to the voters" as a campaign issue four years hence.

Carol Hirschburg, a leading GOP political consultant in Maryland, said it was unclear whether the issue would get traction, however.

"I can't imagine people are going to picket the State House and get him to reinstate the death penalty," Hirschburg said. "O'Malley seems to have lucked into a pretty good situation, given his views."

Politics aside, the high court's ruling has the most immediate effect on the six inmates on Maryland's death row.

Vernon L. Evans Jr., whose case prompted last week's ruling, remains under a death warrant, and three other condemned men are believed to have exhausted their appeals to the point that they could have been executed in 2007, said Jane Henderson, executive director of Maryland Citizens Against State Executions.

"I'm sure there's a good bit of relief," said Henderson, whose organization was a co-plaintiff in the case of Evans, convicted of the 1983 murders of two people at a Pikesville hotel. "This at least puts everything on hold. They're all still under death sentences, but the likelihood of executions in 2007, I would say, is pretty nil."

Such developments are frustrating for many relatives of murder victims, including Anne Furst McCloskey, who watched for more than a decade as the man who murdered her brother in Baltimore County in 1981 was twice sentenced to death and finally spared.

Although her brother's killer, Derrick White, remains in prison, he became eligible for parole less than a year after his death sentence was overturned, she said.

"There has to be some final judgment on killers," McCloskey said.

The pace of executions in Maryland pales compared with many other states -- five prisoners have been put to death since the U.S. Supreme Court reinstated the death penalty in 1976 -- but the issue has generated considerable debate in recent years.

Prompted by concerns about racial disparities in the death penalty's application, former governor Parris N. Glendening imposed a moratorium on executions in May 2002. That was overturned in January 2003, when Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. became Maryland's first Republican governor in a generation. Two inmates have been put to death during Ehrlich's tenure.

It is possible that Ehrlich could try to push through emergency regulations needed to restart the death penalty before leaving office Jan. 17. Aides say his legal counsel is reviewing options. But that appears highly unlikely to succeed.

The regulations would go before a joint legislative panel for a hearing, and the hearing would be set by the co-chairmen, Sen. Paul G. Pinsky and Del. Anne Healey, Prince George's Democrats who oppose the death penalty.

O'Malley has said he is hopeful Ehrlich will leave the issue for the new administration. In an interview last week, the governor-elect mentioned a case pending in federal court that could shed light on whether Maryland's use of lethal injection constitutes "cruel and unusual punishment." It is unclear when a ruling might be issued, but activists on both sides of the issue do not expect an O'Malley administration to issue regulations before then.

Moreover, O'Malley aides suggest that it is entirely reasonable to give an incoming corrections secretary several months to review the state's death penalty procedures. That Cabinet post is widely considered one of the most difficult for O'Malley to fill and could still be open when he takes office.

It is possible that O'Malley's administration could decline to submit new regulations for the duration of his term, in effect creating a moratorium that lasts as long as he is in office.

Aides say that strategy has drawbacks, and it is one that would bring protest at some point from Republicans. "If there's going to be a policy change, that should come under the jurisdiction of the General Assembly," said incoming House Minority Leader Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), a death penalty supporter.

Some powerful voices in the legislature, including Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., predicted that executions will resume in Maryland in cases that warrant the punishment. But Miller (D-Calvert) acknowledged that the process to get there is "very cumbersome."

Other lawmakers suggested that O'Malley, who has promised to enforce the law regardless of his personal beliefs, could leave the issue to the legislature, asking lawmakers to create a framework for moving forward. Legislation that allowed executions to resume would be subject to a filibuster in the Senate, however, and is not certain to pass, said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

In coming weeks, lawmakers will be looking at O'Malley to signal where the process is headed, said Del. Samuel I. Rosenberg (D-Baltimore), vice chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

"It's in his lap, absolutely," Rosenberg said.

DOJ_NMG_0108984

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Election Challenge For Florida District Is Taken To The House (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

A battle over who won the congressional election in Florida's 13th District is in the courts and could be debated in Congress itself.

Christine Jennings, the Democrat, informed Congress last week that she was contesting the election, claiming that electronic voting machines malfunctioned and that state officials wrongly certified the election in favor of Republican Vern Buchanan. She also filed a lawsuit asking for access to the source code of the machines, manufactured by Election Systems & Software Inc.

Two weeks after the Nov. 7 election, the state certified Buchanan as the winner by 369 votes. Jennings wants a new vote. If she prevails, the Democratic gains in the midterm elections will increase to 31 House seats.

On Election Day, 18,000 Sarasota County voters who went to the polls registered no choice in the congressional race. Jennings argued that that was evidence of a machine glitch, but the state indicated that it found no evidence of one. ES&S also rejected her argument, and Buchanan said she should concede.

On Wednesday, Jennings officially contested the election with the House Administration Committee, which usually does not take any action until an election dispute moves through the courts. Buchanan has 30 days to respond. He is likely to be sworn in next week.

Jennings's challenge, which has highlighted long-standing concerns this year about the reliability of electronic voting technology, faces long odds against success. According to a report by the Congressional Research Service, most of the 105 contested elections since 1933 have been decided against the challenger.

ES&S has opposed sharing its programming code, saying that it is confidential and that its machines elsewhere worked just fine.La. House Seat at Risk

Population estimates released by the Census Bureau last week suggest that the loss of population in Louisiana from Hurricane Katrina could result in the state's losing one of its seven congressional seats, according to Election Data Services Inc., a consulting firm.

According to the analysis, 2006 population estimates would give five states -- Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Nevada and Utah -- an additional seat each in Congress, while Texas would gain two seats. Seven states would lose seats -- Iowa, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Missouri, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania. This year, Georgia and Nevada joined the list of states that would gain seats, while Massachusetts and Louisiana joined the list of states that would lose seats.

These estimates are based on 2006 figures, not 2010 figures, which ultimately will provide the basis for Congress to allocate seats to each state. But the estimates show a general trend in population growth and its impact on the political map.New Note in Vilsack Story

Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who is pursuing the Democratic presidential nomination, said Friday that he received a letter that could help him find his birth mother. Vilsack, who was adopted in Pittsburgh shortly after he was born 56 years ago, said he would think over what to do with the material.

"You have to have time to think about things like this," said Vilsack, according to the Associated Press. "This is a decision nobody else can make."

Vilsack has already made his life story a part of his campaign persona. He was adopted at a young age and then grew up with a mother who battled alcoholism and a father who had financial difficulties. At a time when voters are forming their basic views of presidential candidates, the new development, if pursued, could spark great interest in Vilsack's life story.

Vilsack said the letter recently arrived at his Des Moines campaign offices from a nun who worked at a home for unwed mothers. "It was a place for young women [to] go to have their babies and then decide whether to leave them there," Vilsack said, according to the AP. He added that the letter said birth records are still available if he wants them.

Quasi-Freedom Agenda (WP)

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

For President Bush, democracy doesn't begin at home.

POLITICIANS OFTEN treat the disenfranchisement of U.S. citizens who live in the District of Columbia as a parochial issue, a concern of Washingtonians alone. It is parochial, of course, in the way that achieving democracy in Iraq is a parochial issue for Iraqis and achieving democracy in China a parochial issue for Chinese. But as President Bush has stated so eloquently, the freedom of Iraqis and Chinese is also a concern for all humanity. "[I]t is the policy of the United States to seek and support the growth of democratic movements and institutions in every nation and culture," he said in his second inaugural address. So why not Washington, D.C.?

DOJ_NMG_0108985

Post reporters asked Mr. Bush that question during an interview last week. Here is how he dodged:

Do the residents of the District of Columbia -- should they have a vote in the House?

I will look at what Congress proposes. I will look carefully at what Congress proposes.

But what is your philosophical view of that? Because we've gone to Iraq to provide freedom for people in Iraq, and the people in this country --

I understand that. You're trying to get me to opine on specific legislation that may be forthcoming, and I look forward to working with Congress on that.

I'm actually asking you to opine on general --

That's my answer. (Laughter.)

-- philosophy on whether --

I know what you're trying to ask me to opine on, and I'm answering that there is -- I will look and see what Congress proposes.

In fact no one was asking that the president comment on specific legislation. He could easily have responded this way: "I know that citizens of the District of Columbia pay taxes for their country, and I know many of them have gone to war for their country. They should have a say in how their country is ruled. I look forward to working with Congress to find the best way to make that happen."

Instead we get squirming evasions and feeble humor. To be honest, we don't find it funny; if anything, it's pathetic that six years into his presidency Mr. Bush can't bring himself to endorse basic rights for residents of his current hometown.

In that same stirring address two years ago, Mr. Bush said that "rights must be . . . secured by free dissent and the participation of the governed." He didn't qualify the principle; there was no asterisk, as in: *except for majority-Democratic cities. Either he believes in democracy, or he doesn't.

Gender Pay Gap, Once Narrowing, Is Stuck In Place (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, December 24, 2006

Throughout the 1980s and early ’90s, women of all economic levels — poor, middle class and rich — were steadily gaining ground on their male counterparts in the work force. By the mid-’90s, women earned more than 75 cents for every dollar in hourly pay that men did, up from 65 cents just 15 years earlier.

Largely without notice, however, one big group of women has stopped making progress: those with a four-year college degree. The gap between their pay and the pay of male college graduates has actually widened slightly since the mid-’90s.

For women without a college education, the pay gap with men has narrowed only slightly over the same span.

These trends suggest that all the recent high-profile achievements — the first female secretary of state, the first female lead anchor of a nightly newscast, the first female president of Princeton, and, next month, the first female speaker of the House — do not reflect what is happening to most women, researchers say.

A decade ago, it was possible to imagine that men and women with similar qualifications might one day soon be making nearly identical salaries. Today, that is far harder to envision.

“Nothing happened to the pay gap from the mid-1950s to the late ’70s,” said Francine D. Blau, an economist at Cornell and a leading researcher of gender and pay. “Then the ’80s stood out as a period of sharp increases in women’s pay. And it’s much less impressive after that.”

Last year, college-educated women between 36 and 45 years old, for example, earned 74.7 cents in hourly pay for every dollar that men in the same group did, according to Labor Department data analyzed by the Economic Policy Institute. A decade earlier, the women earned 75.7 cents.

The reasons for the stagnation are complicated and appear to include both discrimination and women’s own choices. The number of women staying home with young children has risen recently, according to the Labor Department; the increase has been sharpest among highly educated mothers, who might otherwise be earning high salaries. The pace at which women are flowing into highly paid fields also appears to have slowed.

Like so much about gender and the workplace, there are at least two ways to view these trends. One is that women, faced with most of the burden for taking care of families, are forced to choose jobs that pay less — or, in the case of stay-at-home mothers, nothing at all.

DOJ_NMG_0108986

If the government offered day-care programs similar to those in other countries or men spent more time caring for family members, women would have greater opportunity to pursue whatever job they wanted, according to this view.

The other view is that women consider money a top priority less often than men do. Many may relish the chance to care for children or parents and prefer jobs, like those in the nonprofit sector, that offer more opportunity to influence other people's lives.

Both views, economists note, could have some truth to them.

"Is equality of income what we really want?" asked Claudia Goldin, an economist at Harvard who has written about the revolution in women's work over the last generation. "Do we want everyone to have an equal chance to work 80 hours in their prime reproductive years? Yes, but we don't expect them to take that chance equally often."

Whatever role their own preferences may play in the pay gap, many women say they continue to battle subtle forms of lingering prejudice. Indeed, the pay gap between men and women who have similar qualifications and work in the same occupation — which economists say is one of the purest measures of gender equality — has barely budged since 1990.

Today, the discrimination often comes from bosses who believe they treat everyone equally, women say, but it can still create a glass ceiling that keeps them from reaching the best jobs at a company.

"I don't think anyone would ever say I couldn't do the job as well as a man," said Christine Kwapnoski, a 42-year-old bakery manager at a Sam's Club in Northern California who will make $63,000 this year, including overtime. Still, Ms. Kwapnoski said she was paid significantly less than men in similar jobs, and she has joined a class-action lawsuit against Wal-Mart Stores, which owns Sam's Club.

The lawsuit is part of a spurt of cases in recent years contending gender discrimination at large companies, including Boeing, Costco, Merrill Lynch and Morgan Stanley. Last month, the Supreme Court heard arguments in a case against Goodyear Tire and Rubber.

At Sam's Club, Ms. Kwapnoski said that when she was a dock supervisor, she discovered that a man she supervised was making as much as she was. She was later promoted with no raise, even though men who received such a promotion did get more money, she said.

"Basically, I was told it was none of my business, that there was nothing I could do about it," she said.

Ms. Kwapnoski does not have a bachelor's degree, but her allegations are typical of the recent trends in another way: the pay gap is now largest among workers earning relatively good salaries.

At Wal-Mart, the percentage of women dwindles at each successive management level. They hold almost 75 percent of department-head positions, according to the company. But only about 20 percent of store managers, who can make significantly more than $100,000, are women.

This is true even though women receive better evaluations than men on average and have longer job tenure, said Brad Seligman, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the lawsuit.

Theodore J. Boutrous Jr., a lawyer for Wal-Mart, said the company did not discriminate. "It's really a leap of logic to assume that the data is a product of discrimination," Mr. Boutrous said. "People have different interests, different priorities, different career paths" — and different levels of desire to go into management, he added.

The other companies that have been sued also say they do not discriminate.

Economists say that the recent pay trends have been overlooked because the overall pay gap, as measured by the government, continues to narrow. The average hourly pay of all female workers rose to 80.1 percent of men's pay last year, from 77.3 percent in 2000.

But that is largely because women continue to close the qualifications gap. More women than men now graduate from college, and the number of women with decades of work experience is still growing rapidly. Within many demographic groups, though, women are no longer gaining ground.

Ms. Blau and her husband, Lawrence M. Kahn, another Cornell economist, have done some of the most detailed studies of gender and pay, comparing men and women who have the same occupation, education, experience, race and labor-union status. At the end of the late 1970s, women earned about 82 percent as much each hour as men with a similar profile. A decade later, the number had shot up to 91 percent, offering reason to wonder if women would reach parity.

But by the late '90s, the number remained at 91 percent. Ms. Blau and Mr. Kahn have not yet examined the current decade in detail, but she said other data suggested that there had been little movement.

During the 1990s boom, college-educated men received larger raises than women on average. Women have done slightly better than the men in the last few years, but not enough to make up for the late '90s, the Economic Policy Institute analysis found.

There is no proof that discrimination is the cause of the remaining pay gap, Ms. Blau said. It is possible that the average man, brought up to view himself the main breadwinner, is more committed to his job than the average woman.

DOJ_NMG_0108987

But researchers note that government efforts to reduce sex discrimination have ebbed over the period that the pay gap has stagnated. In the 1960s and '70s, laws like Title VII and Title IX prohibited discrimination at work and in school and may have helped close the pay gap in subsequent years. There have been no similar pushes in the last couple of decades.

Women have continued to pour into high-paid professions like law, medicine and corporate management where they were once rare, but the increases seem to have slowed, noted Reeve Vanneman, a sociologist at the University of Maryland.

Medicine offers a particularly good window on these changes. Roughly 40 percent of medical school graduates are women today. Yet many of the highest paid specialties, the ones in which salaries often exceed $400,000, remain dominated by men and will be for decades to come, based on the pipeline of residents.

Only 28 percent of radiology residents in 2004-5 were women, the Association of American Medical Colleges has reported. Only 10 percent of orthopedic surgery residents were female. The specialties in which more than half of new doctors are women, like dermatology, family medicine and pediatrics, tend to pay less.

Melanie Kingsley, a 28-year-old resident at the Indiana University School of Medicine, said she had wanted to be a doctor for as long as she could recall. For a party celebrating her graduation from medical school, her mother printed up invitations with a photo of Dr. Kingsley wearing a stethoscope — when she was a toddler.

As the first doctor in her family, though, she did not have a clear idea of which specialty she would choose until she spent a summer working alongside a female dermatologist in Chicago. There, she saw that dermatologists worked with everyone from newborns to the elderly and worked on nearly every part of the body, and she was hooked.

"You get paid enough to support your family and enjoy life," said Dr. Kingsley, a lifelong Indiana resident. "Yeah, maybe I won't make a lot of money. But I'll be happy with my day-to-day job, and that's the reason I went into medicine — to help other people." She added: "I have seen people do it for the money, and they're not very happy."

The gender differences among medical specialties point to another aspect of the current pay gap. In earlier decades, the size of the gap was similar among middle-class and affluent workers. At times, it was actually smaller at the top.

But the gap is now widest among highly paid workers. A woman making more than 95 percent of all other women earned the equivalent of $36 an hour last year, or about $90,000 a year for working 50 hours a week. A man making more than 95 percent of all other men, putting in the same hours, would have earned $115,000 — a difference of 28 percent.

At the very top of the income ladder, the gap is probably even larger. The official statistics do not capture the nation's highest earners, and in many fields where pay has soared — Wall Street, hedge funds, technology — the top jobs are overwhelmingly held by men.

Taser Debate (HC)

By Larry Karson

Houston Chronicle, December 24, 2006

Another politician, this time state Rep. Garnet Coleman, D-Houston, has joined the band wagon for "fixing" the Taser problem by suggesting that legislation is needed to put a moratorium on the use of the stun guns by the police.

Make no mistake about it: There have been numerous cases nationwide of poorly trained officers and negligent managers who have allowed the continued misuse of Tasers because, as one blogger remarked, the devices are treated as a "motivational tool" to control the citizens the police are supposed to be serving. Just go to YouTube and you will get an eyeful of incompetent cops performing negligent, if not criminal, acts with the devices.

From stunning an individual multiple times because they wouldn't "comply" with an order (think about how well you would comply, as well as understand someone's instructions, after 50,000 volts jolted your system) to using them on people who didn't immediately conform to verbal directions (but were otherwise nonaggressive and may not have even understood the commands being given to them), Tasers have had had a trackrecord of misuse since their introduction to police work.

But the fault doesn't always fall at the feet of the street officers— even if the suspect does after being Tased. For the real reason Tasers are consistently misused in some departments, look to management.

Good police policy allows officers several options to control a situation. For example, if words or physical control won't work the officer may have no choice but to use an Oleoresin Capsicum (OC) "pepper" spray or a baton. To defend themselves or to establish control in a fight, they also have the choice of using the Taser — not as a replacement for words and not as a substitute for physically directing someone, which is when much of the Taser misuse seems to happen; but when the confrontation is going to turn into a fight. My point is, officers need a variety of tools.

For over 150 years, police have only had their presence and "prestige" — their hands, their nightstick or baton, and their gun — to control criminals. In recent years OC spray was added, but it has limited use, at best. It's the Taser that has proven most effective in controlling the violent and in preventing officers from being injured while attempting to make an arrest. Speaking from the other side of the fence, I'd rather be Tasered than have a couple of upset officers whaling away on me with nightsticks in a fight, possibly breaking some bones in the process. (That's not to mention that if the officers swing for my head because they feel they are losing ground, that in itself is deadly force that can quickly lead to deadly consequences.)

But the other issue that comes into play, especially in Harris County, is the concept of "fearing for one's life." Every time an officer discharges his or her weapon, that is almost always the first thing the officer or deputy says about the decision: "I feared for my life."

Make no mistake. It's why most officers do shoot a suspect; and they aren't lying when they say it. But for the extremely small percentage of officers who get in a bad shooting that reasoning is also the stay-out-of-jail card accepted by the Harris County district attorney and his hand-picked grand jury — and he has five grand juries to choose from — which then historically nobills the deputy or officer.

In 2004, the Chronicle reported that only half of the 189 shootings by officers in Harris County were of suspects carrying a gun or a knife. On average, approximately one shooting a month was of someone who had no weapon. Yet, in only the most egregious cases is an officer ever even considered for prosecution.

And that is where the Taser, as Houston Police Chief Harold Hurtt keeps having to remind us, comes into play. For without that alternative tool now carried by most HPD officers and many Harris County deputies, many more officers would have no choice but to use their gun instead of the Taser whenever they were in fear for their lives.

We, the community, have offered our officers an alternative to using deadly force. Though not always a feasible choice, as Chief Hurtt has stated, in at least 39 instances since December 2004, officers who could otherwise have been justified in using deadly force felt they had an opportunity to stun the suspect instead of shooting him. That figure easily surpasses whatever numbers of individuals are suspected of having died from the electrical charge of the stun gun.

What Rep. Colemanshould do is file a bill that prevents any law enforcement agency in Texas from requiring a signed affidavit from someone making a complaint against a police department, an officer or a deputy before an investigation is initiated for the misuse of force or for any other misconduct.

The Department of Justice has directed numerous other police departments to accept anonymous, verbal and unsworn complaints for investigation. Even federal agencies are mandated to investigate all allegations against their own agents, whether sworn or not. Yet in protecting its departments and their officers, local law enforcement continues to demand sworn affidavits and limit to whom and how a complaint can be made. Who in their right mind would identify themselves as a complainant against an officer allegedly trafficking in narcotics or associating with a drug cartel or organized crime?

If abused, assaulted or Tasered by an officer, many may expect the officer to harass or pursue them if they identify themselves as a complainant to the police. Yet, local police departments continue to demand a sworn affidavit before an investigation is initiated.

Why? They claim they don't want to take the time and trouble investigating the unsubstantiated complaints that they believe would get filed. But they actually use the affidavit as a filtering device to minimize complaints against their departments and to protect their own officers.

I know that the Houston Police Department wouldn't hesitate to investigate one of its own for a narcotic trafficking violation. But after all the corruption that has been reported on the Texas-Mexico border does anyone actually think everyone trusts the police to not protect one of their own?

When it comes to officer misconduct, any complaint should be investigated. That's where I suggest Rep. Coleman needs to focus his attention.

Chief Hurtt and Mayor Bill White have monitored the actions ofHPD officers and are commissioning a study of the use of Tasers by the department. Both are appropriate responses to an issue that is of concern to all in the community. As part of their commission, these two leaders also need to include members of the community as they are the ones most subject to getting Tasered by the police.

But let's not throw out the baby with the bath water when it comes to Tasers: After all, 39 individuals are alive here who might otherwise have been dead and buried but for the discretion of HPD's finest.

And I suspect that Houston Texans lineman Fred Weary made 40, as unjust and undeserved as the use of the Taser against him may have been.

Karson is a lecturer in the Department of Criminal Justice at the University of Houston-Downtown. He can be e-mailed at karsonl@uhd.edu.

ANTITRUST:

2006: The Year In PCs And Chips (PCWORLD)

By Ben Ames
PC World, December 24, 2006

Vendors in the PC and chip industries moved boldly in 2006, changing the marketplace map through mergers, recalls, layoffs, and lawsuits. Oh, and they launched some impressive new products too, keeping Moore's Law moving as they built smaller, faster chips and cooler, more efficient computers. Here, in chronological order, we share a sampling of the biggest events of the past 12 months. Apple Releases Macs That Run on Intel Chips

In January Apple Computer sold its first Mac PCs that run on chips from Intel instead of on chips from IBM and Motorola, fulfilling a promise made in June 2005. Apple substitutes Intel's Core Duo chip for the PowerPC and G4 chips in its iMac and 15-inch MacBook Pro, soon followed by the Mac mini and 13-inch MacBook.

The move also let Apple expand from its own operating system. In April, Apple launches its Boot Camp software, enabling Intel-based Macs to run their choice of Apple's OS X or Microsoft's Windows XP. AMD Announces ATI Acquisition

In July Advanced Micro Devices announces it would buy Canadian graphics chip vendor ATI Technologies for $5.4 billion. Integrating its processors with ATI's chip sets would allow AMD to sell platforms of integrated technologies, competitive with Intel bundles like Centrino, Viiv, and VPro, analysts say. Another effect of the merger is to leave Nvidia as the only independent graphics chip vendor in the market.

By November, Nvidia also says it will expand, paying $357 million to buy PortalPlayer, a maker of semiconductors for digital music players. Battery Recall Begins

Dell recalls 4.1 million notebook batteries in August as a growing number of customers report they could short-circuit, causing some to overheat and catch fire. Within days, other vendors join the recall, leading to 8.1 million recalls of the lithium ion cells manufactured by Sony. Other PC vendors affected by the largest recall in consumer electronics history include Apple, Fujitsu, Hitachi, Lenovo, and Toshiba. Intel Reorganizes, Lays Off Thousands

In September, Intel lays off 10,500 workers--about 10 percent of the workforce--as Chief Executive Paul Otellini enacts a promised reorganization that has already included the sale of its media and signaling business, the firing of 1000 executives, and the sale of its XScale smart phone chip division. Otellini blames slowing growth in the PC market when he predicts Intel's annual profits will reach only $9.3 billion for 2006, down from $12.1 billion in 2005. Analysts point out that Intel had also lost revenue by slashing prices on its chips in an effort to slow gains in market share by rival AMD. Justice Department Investigates SRAM Market

The Department of Justice launches a probe in October of sales practices in the SRAM memory chip market, serving subpoenas to Cypress Semiconductor, Mitsubishi Electric, Samsung Electronics, Sony Electronics, and Toshiba. The investigation comes shortly after the Justice Department wins convictions and multimillion-dollar fines for price fixing in the closely related DRAM industry. By December, the Justice Department also turns its focus to graphics chips makers, demanding documents from AMD and Nvidia as part of an antitrust investigation.

Meanwhile, AMD continues another antitrust fight, continuing its long-running suit against Intel over accusations that the much larger chip-maker intimidated vendors from using AMD chips. That case is scheduled to come before a judge in April 2009. HP Tops Dell as World's Largest PC Vendor

Hewlett-Packard overtakes Dell in October as the world's largest PC vendor, capping a year when Dell had reported a series of sagging profits and the start of an accounting investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. HP has its own problems, coping with a spying scandal on its board of directors that leads to criminal investigations and the resignation of chief executive Patricia Dunn. But Dell is unable to stop its loss of market share even when the company ends its longtime allegiance to Intel and begins selling PCs powered by chips from AMD as well. Dell Chief Executive Kevin Rollins says the company was also hurt by slashing prices in order to bolster market share, and pledges to spend $100 million to hire more sales and call-center workers. Intel Launches Quad-Core Processors for PCs

Intel launches the first quad-core processors for mainstream desktops and servers, continuing its effort to rebound from a loss of sales to AMD. The new chips include the Core 2 Extreme QX6700 for gamers and Xeon 5300 for servers, coming just a few months after Intel launches a new family of dual-core chips including the "Conroe" Core 2 Duo for desktops and "Woodcrest" Xeon 5100 for servers.

Still, the arms race continues, as AMD emphasizes its advantage in power efficiency and pledges to launch its own quad-core processor by the second quarter of 2007, the "Barcelona" quad-core Opteron 8000 for servers.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

EPA OKs Fuel-cell Car Production (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0108990

From Times Staff And Wire Reports

The Los Angeles Times, December 24, 2006

The hydrogen-powered vehicles will meet the state's zero-emission requirements.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has cleared the way for automakers to produce hydrogen-powered fuel-cell cars to meet zero-emission vehicle requirements in California and 10 other states.

In a waiver signed last week, EPA officials approved amendments adopted in 2003 by the California Air Resources Board that allow manufacturers to produce fuel cells as an alternative to battery-powered cars and light trucks previously required by the state.

"This is a real Christmas gift for all of us," Air Resources Board Chairman Dr. Robert Sawyer said in a statement. "All Californians will breathe easier because of this measure, and the technology that makes these clean cars possible can now be made available to everyone."

Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont and Washington have adopted California's rules, touted by state regulators as the toughest in the world. The rules were amended after automakers challenged them in court.

"This waiver simply reflects the prominence of fuel cells," EPA spokesman John Millett said. "Fuel cells have really taken off."

Fuel cells use hydrogen and oxygen to run an electric motor.

Automakers had mixed reactions. General Motors spokesman Dave Barthmuss said fuel-cell vehicles were "very viable to be a portion of any automaker's compliance strategy."

"A lot of milestones are being met, and a lot of progress is really being made" in developing the vehicles, he said.

GM plans to put 100 fuel-cell vehicles on the road next year as a demonstration project, he added.

Barthmuss also said the air board should be willing to review its requirements so they stay in line with the "pace of technology."

Ford Motor Co. spokeswoman Jennifer Moore said that much uncertainty remains about fuel-cell vehicles, and that the company agrees with a U.S. Energy Department forecast that the vehicles won't be available in large numbers before 2015.

But California officials who fought for the measures painted a rosier picture, noting that the waiver also covers hybrid and super-low-polluting, gasoline-powered vehicles known as partial zero-emission vehicles.

California initially adopted its regulations in 1990, requiring that 10% of new cars sold in the state by major manufacturers by 2003 be zero-emission vehicles. The rules have been modified several times since, largely because of legal challenges by automakers.

Currently, they call for 2% of new cars from the six biggest automakers to be zero-emission vehicles, 2% to be gasoline-electric hybrids and 6% to be partial zero-emission vehicles.

Ford Tries To Outrace The Repo Man (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

DEARBORN, Mich. -- If Alan Mulally, Ford Motor Co.'s chief executive, is looking for fresh words to inspirit his troubled company -- words to replace "The Way Forward," which rang hollow as Ford slid further backward -- he might try: "Lay off the cheeseburgers, America -- you're killing yourself, which is your business, but you're also killing Ford, which is my business." That exhortation is not pithy but is oddly pertinent.

The average weight of American men (191 pounds) and women (164 pounds) has increased 25 pounds since 1960. And according to one study, in 2003 Americans' 223 million cars and light trucks burned an extra 39 million gallons of fuel for every additional pound of passenger weight. So Americans are using almost a billion gallons of gasoline more each year than they would if they were as (comparatively) svelte as they were in 1960. Because Ford is more a truck company than a car company (its big moneymakers are F-Series pickups, and sport-utility vehicles such as the Explorer are classified as trucks), it has been hit especially hard by changing consumer preferences produced by high gasoline prices. That is one reason Ford lost $5.8 billion in the third quarter.

Mulally, 61, is frequently described as having "boyish" looks and pep. But it has been only three months since William Clay Ford Jr., Henry's great-grandson, replaced himself with Mulally (Ford remains the company's executive chairman), who is going to find this an aging experience.

Already he has taken one of the great gambles in the history of American business, one perhaps unavoidable if Ford is to avoid bankruptcy. Ford has taken $23 billion in loans, most of that sum secured by almost everything Ford owns -- physical assets, patents, trademarks. The market value of Ford's outstanding stock is $15.4 billion. "The data," Mulally serenely acknowledges, "say we're going out of business."

DOJ_NMG_0108991

Perhaps he is serene because he has seen, and seen off, conditions that were, if not worse, really bad. After Sept. 11, when the commercial airline market froze, Mulally, who then was at Boeing, oversaw the downsizing of that company's payroll from 127,000 to 52,000.

Still, the most difficult military maneuver is a retreat under fire, because it can become a rout, and the same is true of a corporate contraction. However many people Ford hires -- at reduced wages -- to replace some of the approximately 38,000 United Auto Workers employees who have agreed to buyouts, many of them will never have built a car. This could mean quality problems, which could further depress Ford's market share, driving a downward spiral.

Mulally's vision for Ford is forward-looking nostalgia. He wants to restore Ford to the role it had in "the middle America that we grew up with." But to "spiff up the blue oval" -- Ford's trademark -- he must market cars designed on the assumption that gasoline prices "are staying up." He talks about the need to "take the hard decisions" and "rationalize our product family" with a "simplified product portfolio." He stops short of talking -- yet -- about scrapping brands. But why is the company still making the Mercury, the average age of whose buyers is 55? Perhaps because it cost General Motors $1 billion -- payments to dealers, etc. -- to eliminate the Oldsmobile brand.

Mulally says production efficiencies can solve half the company's economic problem. That will not suffice unless Ford efficiently produces exciting products. Mulally, a quick study, already has a rudimentary grasp of Detroit-speak: He says Ford must develop new products "with curb appeal -- the 'wow' factor."

But in 2001, with much fanfare, Ford rolled out a new version of a 1950s success, the Thunderbird. It was underpowered, handled badly and is no longer in production. Recently, the company heavily advertised the Lincoln Zephyr. But now it is called the MKZ. Why? This is the behavior of a company whose left hand does not know what its other left hand is doing.

Seventy percent of the people who go through O'Hare International Airport, Mulally says, are not going to Chicago. His point is that a snapshot of customers -- moving targets -- does not tell you where they are heading. Henry Ford, according to Mulally, said that if, when he founded his company, he had asked potential customers what they wanted, they would have said faster horses. Mulally has bet the company on its ability to develop "curb appeal" products that people do not yet know they want and to develop them before the company, which burned through about $6 billion in the last two quarters of 2006, burns the rest of its borrowed cash.

georgewill@washpost.com

Two Timber Firms Pretending To Be 'Green,' Groups Allege (WP)

By Blaine Harden, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

Environmentalists Want Companies' Lucrative Certification Revoked

SEATTLE -- Two of the nation's largest timber companies, Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek Timber, have polished their public images for years by participating in a program that certifies that their logging is environmentally friendly.

But in separate challenges this month from the far corners of the United States, environmental groups in Washington state and in Maine are accusing Weyerhaeuser Co. and Plum Creek Timber Co. of using the forest industry's green-labeling program as a cover while they log in ways that harm endangered spotted owls in Washington and violate forestry laws in Maine.

The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine have demanded in documents sent to the Sustainable Forestry Board that it revoke certification for the companies until they comply with standards they have pledged to uphold.

Both companies say the demands are unjustified and show ignorance of relevant facts.

The requests mark the first time that mainstream environmental groups have publicly attempted to turn the forest industry's green certification process against big timber companies by insisting that they be suspended from the program, the Sustainable Forestry Initiative, said William H. Banzhaf, president of the forestry board, which oversees certification.

Green labeling is a major marketing tool in the timber industry. It allows companies to reach a bigger marketplace while assuring increasingly sophisticated consumers that their purchases are not harming the environment.

As worry about global warming increases, green building codes are becoming politically fashionable. They have recently been adopted for private construction in the District, Montgomery County and Pasadena, Calif. Eighteen states and 11 federal agencies use such codes for their own buildings. And green codes often give credit to builders who use timber certified to have been logged in a sustainable way.

The timber industry's main lobby, the American Forest & Paper Association, developed the Sustainable Forest Initiative in 1994. That was a year after the Forest Stewardship Council, a group of environmentalists, forestry experts, sociologists and indigenous groups, created another certification system that is often described as far less friendly to the interests of big timber companies.

DOJ_NMG_0108992

The competing certification regimes are usually referred to by initialisms -- SFI and FSC -- that can be easily confused. Some environmentalists say this is an intentional industry effort to muddy the green-labeling waters and confuse the public. Timber companies dispute that assertion.

Unlike the industry-created SFI program, FSC rules allow virtually no cutting of old-growth forests, nor do they allow operators to log off a diverse stand of trees and replace it with a plantation forest dominated by a single species, which is often done to enhance the commercial value of forestland.

Home Depot, Ikea and Williams-Sonoma are among the major retailers that have announced their preference for FSC-certified lumber or paper. The U.S. Green Building Council, which oversees green standards for construction in the District and Montgomery County, among other places, credits only builders that use FSC lumber. But other retailers, such as OfficeMax, have preferences that do not distinguish between certification systems.

The Seattle Audubon Society and the Natural Resources Council of Maine argue that the Sustainable Forest Initiative could lose all credibility if its board does not suspend Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek until they clean up their forestry practices.

Banzhaf, president of the Sustainable Forestry Board, said the complaints from responsible environmental groups in Washington and Maine are an "important" challenge to the certification system and will be thoroughly investigated.

At the same time, Banzhaf defends the integrity of the SFI certification process, noting that since 2002 it has been "independent of all influence by the forestry trade association."

The program hires third-party certification companies and is financed through licensing fees and foundation grants, he said. Its board members include leaders of major environmental groups, such as the Nature Conservancy, as well as senior state foresters and the heads of several major timber companies, including Plum Creek and Weyerhaeuser.

The separate but nearly simultaneous challenges to the forest industry's certification program appear to be a coincidence.

Over the past year, the Natural Resources Council of Maine has used the state's freedom-of-information law to uncover 18 previously unpublicized violations of state forestry laws by Plum Creek, the largest private owner of timberland in the United States, with more than 900,000 acres in Maine.

The council learned that Plum Creek, without public notice, had been fined $57,000 for its repeated forestry violations, the largest such fine in Maine's history. The violations included cutting too much timber without proper plans and failing to notify the state about clear-cuts.

"Our concern is that consumers in Maine are being routinely misled into thinking that Plum Creek is managing sustainably, when, in fact, they are not complying with basic laws," said Cathy Johnson, the group's project director for the North Woods.

Maine's chief forester, Alec Giffen, confirmed Plum Creek's violations between 1998 and 2002. "We have not had any other case that involved a $57,000 fine, nor have we had any other case where there was this number of noncompliant timber harvests," he said.

But Giffen said Plum Creek self-reported many of the violations and has taken corrective actions. "They have a good compliance history since 2002," he said.

An executive at Plum Creek said it would be "absurd" to revoke the company's SFI certification.

"We get it right 99 percent of the time," said Jim Lehner, who was general manager for Plum Creek's northeast region during the time of the violations and is now its director of community affairs. "It was certainly a mistake. We made a mistake. The fine was a big one. We haven't had any violations since."

Lehner said the Natural Resources Council of Maine is trying to discredit Plum Creek as part of its campaign to halt the company's plans for large-scale residential development in the North Woods around Moosehead Lake.

In Washington state, the Seattle Audubon Society does not allege that Weyerhaeuser, the largest manager of timberlands in the world, broke any state or federal laws. But Audubon says that the company logged its forestland in southwestern Washington in a way that harmed the habitat of four endangered Northern spotted owls and violated SFI certification standards by failing to "protect known sites" of imperiled creatures.

Northern spotted owls were placed on the federal endangered species list in 1990, but their numbers have declined by 50 percent since then in Washington state, in part because of continued loss of habitat.

To protect the reclusive birds, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service urges timber companies in the Northwest to refrain from logging more than 60 percent of older trees in areas around known owl nests. Those areas are called owl circles.

The Audubon group, however, cites government and industry estimates showing that circles around four owls on Weyerhaeuser land were much more aggressively cut, leaving between 8 percent and 22 percent of the suitable habitat.

That logging concerned James Michaels, a supervising biologist for the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and an expert on spotted owls. His agency wrote a letter to Weyerhaeuser last year, asking the company to stop.

DOJ_NMG_0108993

"It was enough of an issue to raise a flag with us to say we wanted to work with Weyerhaeuser so as not to put those birds at risk," Michaels said.

After Weyerhaeuser was warned about the risk, Michaels said, it suspended further plans for cutting trees near the birds and has been willing to work with federal officials.

A Weyerhaeuser spokesman, Frank Mendizabal, said the company "has not received any notice from any public agency that we have caused any harm" to the owls.

He said that Audubon's assertions that the company has violated SFI standards are without merit and that Weyerhaeuser "operates at the highest standards" for sustainable forestry.

Weyerhaeuser and Plum Creek have 45 days to respond to the certification challenges by the Seattle Audubon Society and the National Resources Council of Maine. A full investigation by the SFI system is likely to take several months.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Cigarette Tax Set To Take A Big Leap (DMN)

By Karen Brooks

The Dallas Morning News, December 24, 2006

AUSTIN – Every time he stands outside a nonsmoking bar shivering in the cold winter air, Camel Light cigarette dangling from his lips, Chris Maddock feels punished.

And he likes it.

JIM MAHONEY/DMN Don Novak wrote a check for his purchase Wednesday at Smokey's Discount Cigarettes on Plano Road in Dallas. He plans to start buying his cigarettes in Oklahoma.

That's why the 34-year-old Austin man is looking forward to Jan. 1, when cigarettes go up at least $1 per pack and about $12 per carton after Texas officially increases the tax on cigarettes to help pay for a property-tax cut.

Maybe, finally, it'll make him quit.

"I invite the tax. I'm all for anything that makes it harder for me, both individually and in society, to smoke," he said. "I love things like that. I love smoking bans, I love feeling marginalized and having to pay more for what really is a habit that's bad for my health."

Anticipation is already rising among smokers and nonsmokers and their respective big-money advocates, more than a week before the tax hits convenience stores and smoke shops across Texas.

Convenience stores are bracing for a drop in sales. Discount shops are running out of some brands. Distributors are liquidating their inventories. And federal agents are keeping an eye on the situation after tax increases in other states led to robberies and smuggling rings.

And many smokers are vowing to either kick the habit or look outside state lines for their cigarettes – given that a pack-a-day habit will cost an additional $30 a month after New Year's Day.

Don Novak of Dallas, annoyed at both the cost and the premise of the new tax, plans to make regular cigarette runs to Oklahoma to stock up.

"It might cost me $10 in gas, but I'll just have the satisfaction that I'm buying for a cheaper price up there," said Mr. Novak, 55.

In El Paso, smoker Bonnie Carreno could easily trek across the Mexican border into Juarez for some cheap smokes – if she can get them back into Texas without declaring them and paying the tax at the border, the scenario tax opponents are afraid will happen.

Along with the regular border customs enforcement, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms plans to coordinate with other agencies at all levels to be extra vigilant about cigarette smuggling, officials there said.

Still, it won't be difficult to bring in a few packs at a time under the radar for personal use. But after 20 years of smoking, Ms. Carreno, a 36-year-old nuclear medicine tech, isn't even going to bother.

"It's a good excuse to go ahead and quit," she said. "I've been wanting to for a while, anyway. Everybody knows it's not good for you to begin with."

Impetus for quitting

That's music to Dawn Wiatrek's ears. The spokeswoman for the American Cancer Society in Austin is hoping that more of the state's smokers – about 20 percent of adults – stub out their habit.

DOJ_NMG_0108994

"We certainly expect to see an impact," she said, adding that it's still too early to say whether people are quitting already. "Along with the New Year's resolutions that tend to kick in, this is a sort of added incentive. We do expect to see additional people quitting for good."

Retired lawyer Susan Portman says most of her buddies are going to quit. But Ms. Portman, 53, of Coppell, stocked up on her favorite Skydancer brand recently at Smokey's Discount Cigarettes. She was surprised to see the stock dwindling already and grabbed the four cartons left before the price jumps from $17 to nearly $30.

"The people that wait to stock up are going to get screwed," Ms. Portman said. "There's not going to be a cigarette to be had anywhere in this city, and right before New Year's."

Some distributors, in an effort to clear the decks before they have to pay the tax on whatever inventory they have on Jan. 1, have told retailers that they're going to halt new supplies until after the New Year.

"It's shocking, and everybody I know who smokes is intending to quit," Ms. Portman said. "So I can't imagine this is going to raise any money for the state, and it's going to be a hassle for those of us who say, 'This is my only vice, leave me alone.' ... I don't know what we're going to do. Cut back, that's for sure. I smoke a lot, and I can't do that when it's this much more."

At Smokey's, customers have started to figure out that they should grab their packs while they can still afford them, the owner said.

"This week it's really kicked in," said Kim Nikolis, who has owned Smokey's for 13 years. "We doubled our business today. It's just now that people are starting to figure out that, oh my god, it's coming. ... Wholesalers are running out of some brands. I've talked to them, and there have been people buying steadily for the past two months. I guess they just want to save a little money. I don't think they're going to stop smoking."

Boost OK'd in May

Texas lawmakers passed the tax hike in May after one of the most contentious legislative battles of the past two years – the fight over how to fund public schools and fix an unconstitutional property tax system.

The Legislature cut school property taxes and replaced that revenue with a new state business tax and the higher cigarette tax. Sales tax from cars was also tweaked to provide additional revenue.

The cigarette tax hike is expected to bring in $680 million over the next year. But it didn't come without a huge fight from Big Tobacco and convenience stores, wholesalers who worry about smuggling from Mexico and other states, and smokers groups who said they were being unfairly taxed.

Texas had one of the lowest cigarette tax rates in the nation. Now it joins New York with one of the top 10 highest taxes in the nation.

When a smaller tax hike hit New York a few years ago, police reported break-ins at convenience stores citywide and a soaring black market that prompted the ATF to form a task force to combat it The city's proximity to Canada and the fact that neighboring states carried cigarettes well below the New York prices compounded the problem.

The agency could form a similar task force in Texas if it needs to, said Special Agent Tom Crowley, the ATF's spokesman in Dallas.

It will also be watching for people taking advantage of smoke shops at the state's three Indian reservations that, by virtue of their federal status, can sell tax-free cigarettes, he said. While it's not illegal to buy cigarettes there, it's illegal to resell them without paying the tax.

The governor of the Tigua Indians, who live on the Ysleta del Sur Pueblo in El Paso, said he expects a brief spike in sales right after the tax goes into effect. But he's uncertain about what will happen to their single smoke shop in the long term.

Scott Fisher, an executive of a trade association for convenience stores, said he'll probably quit smoking his premium Merits – calling the decision a "no-brainer."

As for smuggling, he advised his members to watch out for people evading the taxes – although he said some areas, like sSouth Texas, may be uniquely insulated from that due to the increasing drug violence in Nuevo Laredo along the border to Matamoros.

"I don't know how much of a factor that's going to be for them because of, frankly, the danger to Americans," Mr. Fisher said. "I'm a smoker, and for a dollar a pack, I wouldn't step foot over there."

Older Texans More Likely To Hold Concealed Weapons Permits (AP)

AP, December 24, 2006

HOUSTON - Texans who are 55 or older are more likely to get concealed handgun permits than those who are in their 20s, 30s and 40s, according to Texas Department of Public Safety statistics.

That falls in line with national surveys that indicate seniors are more likely than any other age group to be gun owners.

DOJ_NMG_0108995

In Texas, 42 percent of those who have concealed handgun permits are 55 or older. Texans who are 60 or older have about 25 percent of the permits issued, statistics show.

Former legislator Jerry Patterson, who wrote the Texas concealed weapons law, said getting the permit is often a question of time and money, factors that favor seniors.

"There are a whole bunch of folks in the 30-to-40 range who say they'll do that someday," Patterson said.

Residents who want a permit must pass criminal background checks, take a 10-hour handgun safety course and show proficiency in shooting.

The state also makes permits cheaper for seniors, who get a half-price discount. The permit normally costs $140.

Although studies show seniors are more worried about crime than younger people, U.S. Justice Department statistics indicate people who are 65 or older are much less likely to fall victim to violent crime or property crime.

More than 72,000 people in Texas have concealed handgun licenses. One of them is 70-year-old Karl Virtue, who got a gun last year after fighting with a man he caught stealing from a neighborhood construction site.

He said some seniors are attracted to guns because they can no longer physically defend themselves.

"When I was younger I never had to worry, because nobody was going to go out of their way to give me a hard time," Virtue said. "But when you get old, you feel you've lost your mojo. You feel more vulnerable."

Virtue now owns a 9 mm handgun.

"The old geezers in Texas are well-armed," he said.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Parties Urge Aging Lawmakers To Hang On For One More Term (WP)

By Shailagh Murray, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, December 24, 2006

After 2006 Losses, GOP Particularly Fears Open Seats

The Republicans' stinging losses last month could be magnified in 2008 if veteran GOP Senate and House members decide to retire, including numerous lawmakers who will be 70 or older on that Election Day.

Sen. Tim Johnson's sudden illness was a reminder to both parties that the balance of power in Congress is fragile indeed. But Johnson, a South Dakota Democrat, is a youthful 59. Republican and Democratic leaders are scrambling to persuade colleagues who qualified for Medicare back during the administration of President Bush's father to hold on for at least one more term.

GOP leaders are particularly fearful that the Democrats will be able to expand their narrow House and Senate majorities if some of Congress's biggest Republican names call it quits. Party leaders dread retirements because they create open seats, which tend to generate costly and highly competitive primaries and general-election races. "The next election cycle could be very challenging," conceded Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), the incoming chairman of the House Republican campaign committee. By losing the majority, he said, "we've lost one of the most powerful reasons for members to stay."

Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), born Nov. 18, 1923, is the oldest member of "Club 21," the unusually large class of 21 Republican senators who face reelection in 2008. Seven of those Republicans were born before World War II, including at least four who represent states that could flip Democratic.

In the House, as many as 30 Republicans may retire, according to operatives from both parties, with senior lawmakers including Reps. Ralph Regula (Ohio), 82, and C.W. Bill Young of Florida, who turned 76 on Dec. 16, leading the list. Democrats are nervous, too. Days after the Nov. 7 election, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) called the 12 Democratic senators whose terms are up in 2008 -- including Sens. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.), 82, and John D. Rockefeller IV, who turns 70 next year -- to encourage them to stay put.

For now, at least, Republican leaders are reasonably optimistic that they can keep retirements to a trickle. In a recent Washington Post interview, incoming Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (Ky.) predicted that every member of Club 21 would seek reelection. A few members have already announced their candidacies.

"While the recent election did not go my party's way, I come out of the campaign more determined than ever to fight for Alaska's interests in Washington, D.C.," Stevens, a longtime appropriator and outgoing chairman of the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, said in a statement on Nov. 16.

Sen. John W. Warner of Virginia, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee who turns 80 on Feb. 18, has indicated that he may seek a sixth term, if he remains in good health. "I've heard people as old or older than me talking about reelection," marveled Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), 73, the outgoing chairman of the Senate Finance Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0108996

"I have my track shoes on," joked Club 21 member Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas, still feisty at 70, who said he intends to seek another term. Roberts chaired the Senate Intelligence Committee.

For some lawmakers, 2008 is a touchy subject. Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who turns 65 on Dec. 11, 2008, is pondering his options, which include seeking a fifth Senate term and/or running for president a second time. He bristled last week when asked about his plans as he walked off the Senate floor. "You're going to ask me that right here?" he responded testily, darting off without answering.

Some political operatives view what happened in 1996 -- two years after the Republicans won control of the House and Senate -- as instructive on what might happen in the 2008 election cycle. Eight Democrats and six Republicans retired from the Senate that year. In the House, 30 Democrats and 23 Republicans retired or left to run for higher office.

The 1996 retirees included such prominent figures as Democratic Sens. Sam Nunn (Ga.), Bill Bradley (N.J.) and Howell Heflin (Ala.), and GOP Sens. Alan K. Simpson (Wyo.) and William S. Cohen (Maine). But in the House, Democrats were able to persuade some of their veterans to seek reelection. Reps. John D. Dingell (Mich.), now 80, and Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), who turns 77 in June, survived 12 years in the minority and will become committee chairmen in January. Rangel will head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee, and Dingell will reclaim the chairmanship of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

"We tend to think the most likely to go are the folks who are older, or see the writing on the wall, in states or districts that are trending against them," said Amy Walter, who monitors House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "It's a lot more random."

One Republican who has been the subject of considerable speculation is Sen. Wayne Allard of Colorado, who is 63. He promised to serve only two terms when he was elected in 1996. Colorado just elected a Democratic governor, and the state is considered fertile ground for the Democrats' Western expansion efforts. Republicans are worried enough about their hold on the Allard seat that even some GOP politicians with ambitions to succeed him are hoping he breaks his term-limit pledge.

"Run, Senator, run," said Rep. Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.), who is rumored to covet the Senate seat. "An open seat fight we just don't need."

Pat Toomey, a former congressman from Pennsylvania and president of the Club for Growth, said his group, which backs fiscally conservative Republican candidates, is bracing to compete in as many as 40 House races in the next cycle. "It's a big challenge, figuring out how we step up to play in that many races," Toomey said.

What remains to be seen is how well House Republicans adjust to minority status, given that many have never experienced it and may find it very frustrating. On the other hand, Walter said: "Whether they are in the minority or the majority, they are still a member of Congress. And when you retire, you can never get that stature back."

DOJ_NMG_0108997

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, December 27, 2006 9:36 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Wednesday, December 27, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061227.pdf; agnb061227.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Reassures Allies "Extraordinary Renditions" Have Ended ...3
Rights Groups Concerned About Fingerprint Database ...3
Saudis Release 18 Former Guantánamo Detainees ...3

Homeland Response:

Senate Report Dismisses Able Danger Concerns ...4
Experts Say Modified Backscatter Machines Will Be Less Effective ...4
Hope Still Seen For New Orleans ...4

War News:

Bush To Meet With National Security Team To Consider Iraq Options ...4
Iraqi High Court Affirms Saddam's Death Sentence ...6
US Iraq War Dead Exceeds Those Killed On 9/11 ...7
British Demolition Of Basra Police Station Draws Fallout ...7
Troops In Ramadi Face Increasingly Hostile Population ...8
Escaped Iraqi Minister Emerges In Jordan ...8
Military Links Iranians Captured In Baghdad To Insurgency ...8
Iran Seeking To Project Influence In Afghanistan ...8
Growing Afghan Heroin Poppy Yield Fuel's US Consumption ...8
NATO Urged To Court Afghani Hearts And Minds ...8
Pentagon Seeks To Make Military More Muslim-Friendly ...9

DOJ:

DOJ Attorneys May Receive Comp Time ...9
Interim Arkansas US Attorney Wants To Focus On Job, Not Appointment Process ...9

Corporate Scandals:

Faked Documents May Be Focus Of Apple Case ...10
CNET To Pay Former COO $750,000, Reprice Options ...10
More Stock Options Prosecutions Expected Next Year ...11
SEC Launches Probe Of UnitedHealth Options Practices ...12
Former FBI Chief Freeh To Monitor DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe ...12
SEC To Amend Rules On Executive Compensation Disclosure ...12

Criminal Law:

Police Groups Urge Congress To Increase Spending On Law Enforcement ...13
Canadian Gold Medal Winner Detained In US On Child Abduction Charge ...13
Pittsburgh ID Thief Charged With Forging Leniency Letter ...13
Kansas Attorney General To Seek Renewal Of Abortion Provider Charges ...14
Houston Police Investigating International Flight Luggage Dumped In Trash Bin ...14
Security Experts Predict Worsening Cyber Crime In 2007 ...14
Suburban Houston Rapist Preys On Men ...14
Slow Pace Of Virginia's DNA Review Criticized ...15
Law Requires Disinterment Of Murderer Buried At Arlington Cemetery ...15
Figure In Alaskan Land-Use Dispute Pleads To Incest Charges ...16
WPost Urges Broad Death Penalty Debate In Maryland ...16

Civil Law:

FBI Leak Case Files Missing ...16
Court Approves Creditor Vote On Seracare Bankruptcy Plan ...17
Small Businesses Fight Federal Contracting Rules ...17

Civil Rights:

Courts Seek Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Defendants ...17

Antitrust:

Experts Say Delta's Antitrust Objections May Be Overstated ...18
McClatchy Sells Flagship Star Tribune To Private Equity Group ...18
Private Equity Council To Enter Lobbying Arena ...19
Reliance Prepares For Bid From Hutchison Essar ...19

Environment:
House Democrats Seek To Redistribute Oil Money To Conservation Efforts 20
Administration Will Propose Listing Polar Bears As Threatened 20
Anadarko Sells Two Natural-Gas Fields For $1.6 Billion 20
Nature Conservancy Renting Land From Some Farmers To Protect Species 20
NYTimes Argues For Cutting Livestock Production To Avoid Global Warming 21
FDA Praised For Stance On Animal Cloning 21

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Virginia Drug Ring Suspected Of Selling $8 Million In Cocaine, 11 Charged 21
Mexico-Based Drug Ring Suspects To Appear In Court 21
Gift Cards Used As "Virtual Currency" For Drug Deals 21
Report: Supplies Of Potent Heroin From Afghanistan Increasing In US 22
Security Measures At Virginia Federal Courthouse Come Under Fire 22

Immigration:
Dallas Suburb Sued Over Ban On Renting To Illegal Aliens . 23

Tax:
US Virgin Islands Decries IRS Tax Crackdown 24
Luxury Skyboxes At College Stadiums Draw Tax Scrutiny 24
WSJournal Warns GOP Not To Agree To Payroll Tax Hike ... 25

Congress-Administration:
Fifth Circuit Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw His Nomination 25
Bush's AIDS Initiative Beset By Poor Record Keeping 25
Earmark Moratorium Not Foolproof 25
Democratic Pledge To Engage GOP Could Prove Troublesome For Vulnerable Lawmakers 26
Some Companies Fail To Warn Medicare Part D Recipients Of Drug Plan Changes 26
Bushes' Gift Exchange Noted 26
Email About Bush's Medical Center Visit Makes Unusual Apology 26
NYTimes Urges Congress To Freeze Tax Break To Provide Healthcare To Children 27

Other News:
Stocks Up Despite "Disappointing" Retail Sales 27
President Ford Dead At 93 27
DC Settles Dispute With Retailer 28
2008 Presidential Announcements Seen As "Hardly Meaningless." 28
Schwarzenegger Undergoes Surgery For Broken Leg 28
DC Marriage Strengthening Program Examined 28
Best-Off In US Said To Benefit From Trade Deficit 29
Middle Class "Squeeze" Seen As Byproduct Of Economic Success, Stress 29
NYTimes Says Union Rules Protecting Senior Teachers Need To End 29
US Signals Support For Ethiopian Move Against Somali Islamists 29
Iranian Parliament Votes To "Revise" IAEA Relations 30
Assad May Be Seeking Closer Ties With West 31
Israel Approves New West Bank Settlement Despite Vow To US 31
Mubarak Says New Laws Will Increase Democracy In Egypt 31
South Korean Officials Says US Offered To Remove North From Terror List 32
Sudan May Be Willing To Accept UN Force In Darfur 32
US Reaching Out To Leftist Critics In Latin America 32
Surgeon Says Castro Doesn't Have Cancer 32
Russia Relies On UN "Tantrum" As Diplomatic Weapon 33
China Seeks To Curb Vehicle Production Rate 33
Blair Flight Missed Runway Exit 33

The Big Picture:
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 33

Washington's Schedule:
Today's Events In Washington 34

DOJ_NMG_0109000

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Reassures Allies "Extraordinary Renditions" Have Ended. The Financial Times (12/27, Dinmore) reports the US is "telling its overseas allies that it has stopped 'extraordinary renditions' and needs their help to empty Guantánamo's prison cells. But human rights groups dispute this assertion and a question mark hangs over 200 'war on terror' detainees who could be held indefinitely without trial." But the Administration's "response is seen as confused and inadequate. Analysts attribute this to internal divisions over how far to roll back controversial counter-terrorism practices - including torture, secret prisons, detention without trial, and renditions - as the price for rekindling transatlantic relations." European delegations "have been assured that 'extraordinary renditions' ended, or mostly ended, in 2003. US officials note that the lawsuits brought against the US by former detainees relate to events in 2003 or earlier, when even Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has admitted that 'mistakes' happened." Visiting Europeans "have been told that the US reserves the right to carry out renditions, but - as Ms Rice declared in a major statement a year ago - it would respect the sovereignty of other countries and would not send detainees to countries where the US believed they might be tortured." Diplomats say Secretary Rice "has been influential in advocating change to detention policies she sees as damaging relations with allies, while Dick Cheney, vice-president, and David Addington, his chief of staff, are seen as obstacles."

Rights Groups Concerned About Fingerprint Database. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Richey) reports, "The US government is building a massive database designed to identify individual terror suspects from fingerprints on objects such as a tea glass in an Iraqi apartment or a shell casing in an abandoned Al Qaeda training camp." The Monitor continues, "The database is being created in part by forensic specialists searching for and preserving evidence overseas. They are collecting unidentified latent fingerprints in places once occupied by Al Qaeda and other suspected terrorists. … The information is feeding into a computerized system designed to match a name with an unidentified fingerprint." The Monitor adds, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff calls the program 'a quantum step forward in security.' … '(It) gives us the ability to identify the unknown, unidentified terrorist,' he said in a recent speech. 'It also creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp, or building a bomb in a safe house, or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield.'" The Monitor notes, "Not everyone sees the creation of such a database as progress. Privacy advocates and civil libertarians say it could lead to a dangerous erosion of American rights. Privacy advocates voice concern .. 'Our assessment of these systems is that many that are undertaken with a goal of identifying terrorists eventually become systems of mass surveillance directed toward the American public,' says Marc Rotenberg, president of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington."

DHS Investigating Contractor's Missing Handguns. The Washington Post (12/27, A2, Lengel, 690K) reports DHS said Tuesday "that it is investigating how four handguns recently went missing from its headquarters in Northwest Washington." Spokesman Jarrod Agen said the guns "belonged to Paragon Systems of Chantilly, which provides security for the department's facility on Nebraska Avenue NW," and noted that they "do not belong to DHS nor are they under the control of DHS."

Saudis Release 18 Former Guantánamo Detainees. The AP (12/27) reports, "The Saudi government said Tuesday it had released 18 men who were detained after returning to their homeland from the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay. The Saudis, who returned to the kingdom in May and June, were released after they finished their sentences, Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki said." The AP notes, "Saudi officials have said former Guantanamo inmates are taken into custody on their return to investigate whether they have any connections to Islamic militant groups."

DOD Official Defends Guantánamo Courthouse. The Los Angeles Times (12/26, Williams, 850K) reports on the planned construction of "a $125-million legal complex" at the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, noting that "although the Pentagon estimates that no more than 80 of the 400 or so terrorism detainees here will ever be tried, …Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, insists the legal facility is vital to bringing terrorism suspects to justice. Even with back-to-back trials, he said, it would take over a decade to prosecute an expected 60 to 80 detainees using one courtroom. 'We're fiscal conservatives by definition. We're not building the Taj Mahal here, Stimson said." The Times notes that the ACLU is pushing Congress to "deny funding" to the complex.

DOJ_NMG_0109001

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate Report Dismisses Able Danger Concerns. The AP (12/27, Flaherty) reports, "A lengthy Senate investigation has debunked charges by a Republican congressman that military analysts identified Mohamad Atta and other Sept. 11 hijackers before the attacks, according to a committee aide familiar with the report." The AP continues, "In a letter to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sens. Pat Roberts and John D. Rockefeller dismissed suggestions by Rep. Curt Weldon that defense analysts ignored analysis that could have prevented the attacks. Roberts, a Republican, is outgoing chairman and Rockefeller is the senior Democrat who will assume the chairmanship Jan. 4 month when the new Congress convenes. … They concluded 'there was no evidence Mohamad Atta or any hijackers were identified prior to 9/11,' said the committee aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the aide was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject." The AP adds, "An internal Defense Department assessment already had dismissed Weldon's charges as unfounded. But the letter from Roberts and Rockefeller is the first rejection from Capitol Hill. The letter was obtained and first reported Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times. … Weldon, a 10-term Republican who lost his seat in the Nov. 7 election, repeatedly contended a secret military unit called 'Able Danger' searched large amounts of data to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. … In September, the Pentagon's inspector general found some employees recalled seeing an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist before the attacks. But the report said those accounts 'varied significantly' and witnesses were inconsistent at times in their statements."

Experts Say Modified Backscatter Machines Will Be Less Effective. USA Today (12/27, Frank, 2.27M) reports the "controversial" backscatter X-ray machines to be tested at a US airport for the first time starting next month have been modified in order to "quiet critics such as the American Civil Liberties Union who have helped block its use in airports by saying the vivid images seen by screeners invade passenger privacy. The altered images will show only cartoon-like black-and-white outlines of each passenger. But the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is facing questions from experts who say the agency has weakened the effectiveness of the low-intensity X-rays." Spokeswoman Ellen Howe said that the agency is not "endorsing this particular technology, we're testing it."

Hope Still Seen For New Orleans. In a Washington Post op-ed (12/27, A19), Duke University Professor William Chafe says, "Nearly 16 months after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans remains devastated. In the Lower Ninth Ward (primarily black and poor), mid-city (mixed-race and middle class) and Lakeside (richer and whiter), houses are boarded up and ruined; shattered windows reveal rooms full of debris; perhaps one in 10 places has a FEMA trailer parked outside, as a few returning residents desperately try to reclaim what they have lost. Thousands of small businesses have disappeared. Even in the French Quarter, which was left largely intact after Katrina, shopkeepers despair of being able to survive given the decline in tourism." But in this "season that celebrates the birth of a child in what today would be called a homeless shelter, a remarkable resiliency of spirit remains in New Orleans. Yes, only half the population there in August 2005 has returned. The suicide rate has increased 300 percent, and less than half of the schools and hospitals that existed 16 months ago are functioning. But energy, engagement and love persist, creating tiny ripples of hope, from thousands of individual acts of courage."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With National Security Team To Consider Iraq Options. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 2, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush plans a working vacation while in Crawford this week. He has called his national security team to Texas to discuss the much-anticipated speech on the way forward in Iraq." NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 2, 2:05, O'Donnell, 9.87M) said the President "will be spending some time working on retooling his war strategy, and advisors say he's being deliberate, he's asking about options and the consequences, including adding more US troops. And today, a senior military official says that the deployment orders are ready to go, just needing another signature for another brigade. That would be 3,500 more soldiers from the 82nd Airborne who would go to Kuwait with the possibility of going into Iraq." The AP (12/27, Baldor) notes Defense Secretary Robert Gates has signed the orders that "will send the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday. … The 82nd Airborne unit…will replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which had served as the reserve force based in Kuwait but has been deployed into Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0109002

The AP (12/27, Riechmann) reports that at the Pentagon, officials said Gates "isn't likely to offer a single solution but, rather, a broad set of recommendations for changing the course in Iraq." Bush will "host a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at the ranch, but is not expected to make any final decision on what he says will be a new way forward in Iraq." Secretary Rice is expected to attend Thursday's meeting, along with Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and NSA Stephen Hadley.

Another AP story (12/27, Ben Feller) reports, "Determined not to be rushed…Bush has spent weeks figuring out a new war plan in Iraq. All the while, the American public's expectations have been headed in one direction -- up. Anticipation is high not just because people are weary of war, but also because of the way Bush has gone about deciding his next move." The AP adds, "Saddled with a reputation for stubbornness, Bush has gone the other direction. He has made a visible effort to seek advice -- from the military, diplomats, academics, retired generals, a special study commission, Iraqi officials, Republican leaders, even Democrats he once ridiculed. By the time he announces his Iraq plan in January, roughly two months will have passed since a humbling election for Republicans brought a promise of a 'new way forward.'" The AP adds, "There might as well be a drum roll."

State Department To Report On Bush's Abandoned "Eight Pillars" Policy. The Washington Post (12/26, Kessler, 690K) reports that last year Bush "announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around 'eight pillars' of US policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure." But "never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on." Every Wednesday, the State Department issues "a 30-page public report that details exactly how the US government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan." The Post adds, "In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met."

Biden's Opposition To "Surge" Option Seen As Harbinger Of Coming Debate. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Levey, 850K) reports, "After years of playing a marginal role in the Iraq war, congressional Democrats plan to move quickly in January to assert more control and undercut any White House effort to increase troop levels." As Bush "prepares to outline his own plan for Iraq in a major speech in the next few weeks, Democratic leaders will counter with weeks of oversight hearings, summoning military officers, administration officials and foreign policy experts to Capitol Hill." The Democratic plans "put Congress on a collision course with Bush over the direction of the nearly 4-year-old war. And they signal a new phase in a war that has been directed almost exclusively by the White House with little dissent from the Republican-controlled Capitol." Sen. Joseph R. Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "said Tuesday that he intends to call key administration officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to testify at a series of hearings."

The Washington Post (12/27, A5, Pincus, 690K) reports, "Biden said that his committee will begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and that if Bush has not released his plan by then, he might start with experts and 'those proposing alternatives' to what the president may do." Rice "has agreed to appear, but not until after Bush has presented his new strategy to the nation. Gates will be asked to appear." Biden "said he does not plan to call former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but he added: 'That's not something that's totally off the table.'"

Under the headline "Biden Previews Democrats' Tack Against Troop Plan," the Wall Street Journal (12/27, Dreazen, 2.04M) says "the tensions between the two parties over the war seem certain to escalate if the Bush administration goes through with its tentative plan to send as many as 20,000 new US forces to Iraq." White House officials "say such a troop 'surge' almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's planned speech to the country early next year to lay out a new strategy for fighting the war."

The New York Times (12/27, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that as Bush "flew to his Texas ranch on Tuesday, a spokesman for the National Security Council urged the senator to wait for Mr. Bush to present his new Iraq policy next month before passing judgment. 'President Bush will talk soon to our troops, the American people and Iraqis about a new way forward for Iraq that will lead to a democratic, unified country that can govern, defend and sustain itself,' said Gordon Johndroe, the council spokesman." The Times adds, "The date has not been scheduled, but administration officials said it would be before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23. … One plan under consideration is to send an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq in a bid to restore order."

DOJ_NMG_0109003

The Washington Times (12/27, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Republicans "so far seem divided on a surge, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona pushing the idea and Foreign Relations Committee member Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota saying he can't support sending more troops."

The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 2, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) also reported that Biden "laid down some markers for the President." CBS (Assuras) added, "During a conference call…Biden told us that sending more troops to Iraq would be the absolute wrong strategy, expanding actually on comment he is made earlier on CBS." Biden: "We should be drawing down troops, putting pressure on the Iraqi government to settle their sectarian differences rather than putting more troops in and acting as apartheid cops. … I'm saying what the Baker commission said, start a drawdown. Make it clear to them by the end of next year we're not going to be there to save them. They have got to begin to make hard political decisions. We can't solve it for them with 30,000 more troops." CBS also reported that "on that conference call, Russ, Senator Biden told us that he intends to run for president in 2008."

The Financial Times (12/27, Washington) reports Biden, "one of the leading Democratic critics of US policy in Iraq, joins Tom Vilsack, governor of Iowa, and Dennis Kucinich, the Ohio congressman who ran unsuccessfully in 2004, as the party's only declared candidates for the 2008 race. 'It is my intention to seek the [Democratic] nomination, and it's my intention sometime in the month of January to set up the appropriate mechanism to be able to raise money for that purpose,' Mr Biden said at the end of a conference call about Iraq policy."

The AP (12/27, Flaherty) says Biden "took advantage of a quiet holiday week to draw attention to his own proposal for Iraq, which includes beginning a drawdown of U.S. forces and finding a political settlement among the various ethnic factions there."

More Commentary On Bush's Options. Jack Keane, a retired Army general, and Frederick W. Kagan, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, write in the Washington Post (12/26, A19, 690K), "Reports on the Bush administration's efforts to craft a new strategy in Iraq often use the term 'surge' but rarely define it. … We need to cut through the confusion. Bringing security to Baghdad -- the essential precondition for political compromise, national reconciliation and economic development -- is possible only with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops lasting 18 months or so. Any other option is likely to fail. … The only 'surge' option that makes sense is both long and large."

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (12/26, A19, 690K), "Watching…Bush in recent weeks has become a grim kind of reality TV show. In almost every news conference, speech and photo opportunity, the topic is the same: what to do about the grinding war in Iraq. Bush has let the facade crack open -- admitting that his strategy for victory isn't working -- but then he struggles to rebuild it with new words of confidence. The stress of the job -- so well hidden for much of the past six years -- has begun to show on Bush's face." He "often looks burdened, distracted, haunted by a question that has no good answer."

Iraqi High Court Affirms Saddam's Death Sentence. The AP (12/27, Torchia) reports Iraq's "highest court rejected Saddam Hussein's appeal Tuesday and said the former dictator must be hanged within 30 days for ordering the killing of scores of Shiite Muslims in 1982." The decision "came on a particularly bloody day in Baghdad, where at least 54 Iraqis died in bombings and police discovered 49 apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. Separately, the US military announced the deaths of seven American soldiers."

The story on Saddam's execution was the lead on each of the networks last night. ABC World News (12/26, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The ruling means Hussein could be sent to the gallows any day now, as soon as tomorrow." The CBS Evening News (12/26, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Some experts warn of stepped up attacks now that an appeals court has ruled Saddam must hang within a matter of weeks." A White House spokesman "said this was a great day for the Iraqi people saying Saddam Hussein has received the due process that he denied the Iraqi people for so long." NBC Nightly News (12/26, lead story, 3:15, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Hussein, the so-called butcher of Baghdad, is out of options. He's lost his final appeal and is to be executed by hanging less than a month from now."

DOJ_NMG_0109004

The New York Times (12/27, A1, Glanz, 1.16M) reports on its front page the court "ruled that the man whose brutal reign began in 1979 and ended with the American-led invasion in 2003 must go to the gallows within 30 days." No "further appeals are possible, and" Saddam's "final legal recourse appears to be a clause in the Iraqi Constitution stating that the Iraqi president must approve all death sentences." In a front page article, the Washington Post (12/27, A1, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) also reports officials "in the Iraqi government have already begun to address the logistics and security measures for the execution, possibly a closed and secret one, according to sources familiar with the preparations." USA Today (12/27, Jervis, 2.27M) and the Los Angeles Times (12/27, Zavis, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) run similar reports.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/27, A8, 2.04M) writes, "A case can be made that the cause of justice would be most fully served if Saddam were spared the punishment he meted so promiscuously to others. But that determination belongs to the Iraqi people and their elected leaders, so many of whom participated in the trial as victims or the kin of victims. The day Saddam dies will be their judgment day."

US Iraq War Dead Exceeds Those Killed On 9/11. The AP (12/27, McShane), in an article published in over 100 papers and websites, reports that "according to a count by The Associated Press," the number of US military personnel killed in the war in Iraq climbed to "at least 2,977—four more than the number killed" on September 11, 2001, with a military announcement of "the deaths of six more American soldiers" on Christmas. .

December Toll Rises To 87. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Trejos, 690K) reports on the announcement by military officials that "seven more American service members have been killed in Iraq," making December, during which 87 troops have died so far, "the second deadliest month of the year for troops." 105 service members were killed in October. "Military officials and analysts have attributed the rise in US casualties in recent months to the larger number and greater visibility of American troops in Baghdad, plus the intensity of the Sunni insurgency in Anbar."

The AP (12/27, Frayer), in an article published in over 60 papers and websites, adds that the seven troops killed came amid "a string of car bombs and other blasts" in Baghdad. The AP details the explosions' toll on the civilian population, and notes that "a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, …Sunni Islam's holiest shrine in Baghdad, and a regular target of Shiite mortar teams." The piece notes the eclipse of the 9/11 death toll, along with Bush's assertions that "the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking Saddam's ouster in Iraq, Bush has said."

The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Zavis, 850K) adds, "Three car bombs exploded within minutes at a west Baghdad intersection jammed with holiday shoppers, one of a series of attacks reported Tuesday that killed at least 97 Iraqis and injured scores. Three U.S. soldiers also died when a roadside bomb exploded as they were removing explosive devices from a route northwest of the capital, the command said. … Witnesses said the area was full of shoppers preparing for the Eid Athar holiday, which takes place over the New Year's period."

British Demolition Of Basra Police Station Draws Fallout. The Financial Times (12/27, Negus) reports on the "political backlash" generated by UK forces' demolition of "a Basra police station that they claim was used as a base for death squads." Local officials "have condemned Monday's raid," but a British military spokesman suggested that other Iraqi officials approved the move. "Over 1,000 British troops participated in the raid that culminated in the demolition of the Jamiat police station. A British spokesman said 127 prisoners were discovered in the basement, some of them with their kneecaps shot off, their hands or feet crushed, or with cigarette or electrical burns." The Times adds that the station was associated with Basra's Serious Crimes Unit, which was recently disbanded over perceived corruption.

LA Times Praises British Move. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, 850K) editorializes in favor of the "important message" British troops sent to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki by destroying the police station in Basra associated with the city's Serious Crimes Unit: "Torturers and murderers must be rooted out even when they act under color of the law, and even when reining them in offends political sensitivities." The Times writes that the move "freed 127 prisoners, many of whom showed signs of torture. The headquarters long had been suspected of being infiltrated by death squads linked to tribal rivalries and organized crime." The piece concludes that success in Iraq "will depend on a willingness by Maliki and his successors to establish one rule of law in Iraq. The British and, yes, the Americans, won't be there forever."

DOJ_NMG_0109005

Troops In Ramadi Face Increasingly Hostile Population. The Washington Post (12/27, A13, Bruce, 690K) reports on the difficulties faced by US troops patrolling Ramadi, focusing on the Army's 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment, noting that "Most of the guys here can remember the moment when their frustration killed their empathy. When they no longer felt guilty about knocking down doors. No longer cared to hand out candy." The Post relates the resentment among local people at US tactics intended to "get the people who lay roadside bombs and find the material used to produce them." The piece generally focuses on the troops' low morale and lake of motivation.

Escaped Iraqi Minister Emerges In Jordan. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Madhani, 617K) reports that Aiham Alsammarae, an engineer formerly from Chicago and Iraq's erstwhile electricity minister, "who has been on the lam since escaping last week from an Iraqi jail where he was being held on corruption charges has surfaced in" Amman, Jordan. US diplomats in Baghdad denied any U.S. involvement in spiriting Alsammarae out of Iraq. "Alsammarae said he fled with the help of a 'multinational' group." The Tribune notes that Alsammarae holds dual US-Iraqi citizenship.

Military Links Iranians Captured In Baghdad To Insurgency. The New York Times (12/27, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports that citing "credible evidence," chief military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV said that two Iranian nationals detained in Baghdad 'and their Iraqi associates' are linked "to criminal activities, including attacks against American forces. Evidence also emerged that some of the detainees were involved in shipments of weapons to illegal armed groups in Iraq. In its first official confirmation of last week's raids, the military said it had confiscated maps, videos, photographs and documents in one of the raids on a site in Baghdad. The military confirmed the arrests of five Iranians, and said that three of them had since been released.' The arrests serve as the 'first evidence of the link' between Tehran and the Iraqi insurgency. The Times reports some Iraqis said that "the compound of Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, who met with President Bush in Washington three weeks ago" was the subject of a US Raid, but that "a spokesman for Mr. Hakim said he had not heard of a raid on the compound."

Iran Seeking To Project Influence In Afghanistan. In a nearly 2,400-word front page story, the New York Times (12/27, A1, Rohde, 1.16M) reports on Iran's "drive to become a bigger player in Afghanistan, as it exploits new opportunities to spread its influence and ideas farther across the Middle East." Iran has "distributed its largess, more than $200 million in all, mostly here in the west but also in the capital, Kabul." Iran's ambassador, Muhammad Reza Bahrami, "portrayed his government's activities as neighborly good works, with a certain self-interest. Iran, he said, is eager to avoid repeating the calamities of the last 20 years, when two million Afghan refugees streamed over the border." But there are "indications of other motives. Iranian radio stations are broadcasting anti-American propaganda into Afghanistan."

Growing Afghan Heroin Poppy Yield Fuel's US Consumption. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Therolf, 617K) reports, "The amount of high-quality heroin in America is surging because of an increasing supply from Afghanistan, and with it the fear that record-breaking poppy harvests after the U.S. invasion are fueling more addictions and overdose deaths back home. According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7 percent in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied. Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14 percent actually could be significantly higher."

NATO Urged To Court Afghani Hearts And Minds. In a USA Today op-ed, Sarah Holewinski, executive director of CIVIC, the Campaign for Innocent Victims in Conflict, writes, about the plight of the families of unintended victims of US military operations in Afghanistan, profiling one father of two girls who "were killed when a U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0109006

bomb missed its target and exploded in their playground. He says he never saw an American face, never received an apology. At the time, the United States had no program in place to provide compensation for his loss or aid for his family. Meanwhile, the Taliban brought cotton to wrap the dead and food, money and medical care for his wife's severe head injury. That's straight out of the insurgency playbook. And it's one reason the insurgents are winning small battles everyday." Holewinski calls on NATO forces in the country to "recognize what America has learned the hard way in Iraq: You can't win the war if you don't win the people," noting that US forces now compensate such victims, having adapted to the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. She concludes, "The point is not to put a dollar value on human lives, but to offer a gesture of respect reflecting a sense of common humanity—and to recognize the simple truth that Afghanistan will be won one civilian at a time."

Pentagon Seeks To Make Military More Muslim-Friendly. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Whittle, 59K) reports on efforts by the DOD and the military to recruit American Muslims into the military, "which needs officers and troops who can speak Arabic and other relevant languages." Moreover, "Pentagon officials say they are striving for mutual understanding with Muslims at home and abroad and to win their support for US war aims." Muslim prayer rooms in military installations, imams recruited to serve as chaplains, and observances of Muslim religious events are among the military's retention tactics. "'There is a message here, and that is that Muslims and the Islamic religion are totally compatible with Western values,' says Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England in an interview. For the past two years, Mr. England has hosted an iftar, the feast that ends the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, at the Army Navy Country Club in Arlington, Va. His guests have included ambassadors, leaders of the Muslim-American community, and Muslims who serve in the US armed forces." The Monitor concludes by detailing a "new Middle East Cultural Outreach Program created by the Marine Corps" whose "goal is to educate recruiters to avoid cultural no-nos and foster good relations with Arab-American communities."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorneys May Receive Comp Time. The Federal Times (12/27, Friedman) reports, "More than 9,000 Justice Department attorneys can now receive comp time for after-hours business travel, two years after most federal employees won that right." The Times continues, "On Dec. 20, the president signed HR 4057, which allows the department's lawyers to claim compensation time when their work requires travel during irregular hours, such as evening or weekend flights to attend morning meetings. The House passed the bill in March. The Senate followed on Dec. 6." The Times adds, "Federal workers have been able to claim comp time for official travel since Congress passed the 2004 Workforce Flexibility Act. But the Justice Department had excluded its lawyers, citing a 1999 law that limits their overtime pay. That left about 4,000 department attorneys and 5,400 assistant United States attorneys ineligible for comp time. The new bill, sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., makes all of the lawyers eligible regardless of the 1999 rule. … The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, hailed the bill-signing as an 'important legislative victory.'"

Interim Arkansas US Attorney Wants To Focus On Job, Not Appointment Process. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (12/27, Satter) reports, "Newly appointed as interim U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas through a maneuver that has drawn criticism from the state's two reigning Democrats, Tim Griffin says he hopes to turn the spotlight off the way he got the job and onto his plan to aggressively fight crime through cooperative efforts. … 'I am honored by the attorney general's decision to name me U. S. attorney,' Griffin said Wednesday, his first day on the job. 'I look forward to working with Sen. [Mark] Pryor and Sen. [Blanche] Lincoln to make Arkansas safer,' he said after a long day that began with being sworn in by Chief U. S. District Judge Leon Holmes and ended with many of his books and papers yet to be moved into a corner office from a smaller space down the hall that he has occupied since September." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "Just five days earlier, the U. S. Department of Justice announced that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales planned to appoint the 38-year-old lawyer from Magnolia to the post that Bud Cummins earlier announced he was vacating after five years. … Sens. Pryor and Lincoln immediately expressed dismay that the interim appointment came during a congressional recess, under a provision of the Patriot Act that allows the fill- ing of a vacancy without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate. … The surprise announcement 'denied the Senate the opportunity to carefully consider and evaluate Mr. Griffin's qualifications and denied the American people the transparency the standard nomination process provides,' Lincoln said through a spokesman."

DOJ_NMG_0109007

The AP (12/27) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Griffin's appointment is meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. Roehrkasse said they have asked the Arkansas senators to meet with Griffin so that they may help support a Congressional nomination in the future. … Roehrkasse sad Griffin was chosen because of his experience working as a federal prosecutor in Arkansas and in the Justice Department. … However, Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas only Republican U.S. congressman John Boozman, said a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the newly-elected Democratic-majority Congress being and Griffin's prior association with Rove."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Faked Documents May Be Focus Of Apple Case. The California Recorder (12/27, Scheck) reports, "It must be some consolation for Apple Computer that the company's annual report is going to be published during the slowest news week of the year. … Given the uncomfortable admissions about its past stock options practices -- and the cost to the company -- that Apple will have to make in the delayed SEC filing due by Friday, less public attention is probably a good thing. … But the lull is unlikely to last long. According to people with knowledge of Apple's situation, federal prosecutors are looking closely at stock option administration documents that were apparently falsified by company officials to maximize the profitability of option grants to executives." The Recorder continues, "The faked documents were revealed in a three-month internal probe -- conducted by Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges -- that concluded in October, said individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity because it remains the subject of criminal and civil government investigations." The Recorder adds, "The falsification of documents is perhaps the key issue for government officials trying to determine which of their 100-plus backdating investigations will be pursued as criminal matters and which will be limited to civil SEC inquiries. … 'When there are falsified documents, the government views them as an intent to defraud, because people generally don't falsify documents unless they're trying to make things different from reality,' said Keith Krakaur, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York working on backdating cases. … Krakaur was speaking generally and not about Apple, with which he's not involved. But he has been in the middle of one of the most contentious options cases yet: He represented Kobi Alexander, the former CEO of Comverse Technology who was indicted by Brooklyn federal prosecutors on charges of backdating option grants. Krakaur is no longer working on that case, and Alexander has been living as a fugitive in Namibia for the past several months. … Krakaur and other defense lawyers -- including several in San Francisco who asked to remain anonymous for fear of affecting local probes -- said government lawyers are focusing on falsified records as a means of proving that executives knew their actions were wrong. … Since the fruits of Apple's internal investigation were disclosed to San Francisco federal prosecutors in October, the U.S. Attorney's Office has shown great interest in the case, said individuals with knowledge of the probe. … And while it's not yet clear who the prosecutors' focus is, Apple released a statement in October that 'the investigation raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants.'"

CNET To Pay Former COO $750,000, Reprice Options. Bloomberg (12/27, Heiskanen) reports, "Cnet Networks Inc., a provider of online news and information, will pay $750,000 to Barry Briggs, who resigned as president and chief operating officer, and reprice stock options held by nine individuals including Briggs." Bloomberg continues, "Briggs will receive the payment when he leaves the company Jan. 12, San Francisco-based Cnet said today in a regulatory filing. Cnet said Briggs, who resigned on Dec. 11, also remains eligible to receive a bonus for 2006. … Briggs, two other executives and five independent directors agreed to reprice some stock options they hold, Cnet said in the filing. The options were vested by 2005 and had exercise prices set below fair market value on the day they were granted. The directors also agreed to repay any after-tax gains from exercised options that vested with discounted prices." Bloomberg adds, "Cnet's co-founder and former chief executive officer, Shelby Bonnie, stepped down in October after the company found that some stock options had been backdated. Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, was named to replace Bonnie. Briggs's resignation left Ashe to sort out the company's finances, deal with federal options probes and fend off encroaching competition from companies including Yahoo! Inc. … Ashe's base salary was set at $500,000 and he may get a bonus of as much as $400,000 a year, Cnet said in the filing today. He also received options for 1.5 million Cnet shares that vest in installments beginning in October 2007. … Bonnie also agreed to have his options repriced, Cnet said today. The company said he didn't exercise any options, so there was no need for repayment."

DOJ_NMG_0109008

More Stock Options Prosecutions Expected Next Year. The AP (12/27, Gordon) reports, "Eighteen chief executives swept out. More than 100 public companies under federal investigation and more than $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc." The AP continues, "The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives." The AP adds, "Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings. .. .Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports. … The Justice Department will 'continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in Northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. 'The final chapter hasn't been written yet.'" The AP notes, "Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era. … The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference."

The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A1, Maremont, Forelle) reports, "Eugene Isenberg is the little-known chief executive of a modest-sized oil-services company in Houston. But he stands out in one way: He is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history. In the past 19 years, he has pocketed more than $450 million. … The key to this wealth: stock options, in abundance. His employer, Nabors Industries Ltd., has lavished more than 25 million options on him over the years. … They became lucrative partly because of Nabors's generally rising stock price, but also because of some controversial moves that gave the options more punch. When Nabors's stock fell below the price at which the options could be exercised, temporarily making them worthless, Nabors let him trade in some of his options for new ones with lower exercise prices. And when Mr. Isenberg cashed some options in, Nabors 'reloaded' him, replacing those he'd exercised with the same number of new ones." The Journal adds, "Stock options were hailed two decades ago as a remedy for runaway executive pay. Academics, politicians and investors, tired of seeing CEOs pocket big money for a so-so job, pushed to have stock options become a primary method of compensating executives. Options -- granting the right to buy stock tomorrow at today's price -- would pay off only if the company's stock went up. To advocates they were the ideal carrot, an incentive for good work that aligned executives' interests with those of shareholders. … That happened -- sometimes. But at many companies, options morphed into the biggest executive bonanza yet, pouring out cash like a stuck ATM, and sorely disappointing those who thought options would moderate executive pay. … Instead of replacing big bonuses, options became an additional form of pay slathered on top of already-generous packages. Employers doled out options in ever-growing numbers, in part because, until recently, accounting rules meant companies didn't have to treat this largess to executives as an expense. And like Nabors, some used repricing, reloading and other tactics that made it even easier for executives to score huge hauls." The Journal notes, "This year, options practices exploded in one of the biggest corporate-fraud scandals in decades. Some companies and executives stole from shareholders, by pretending that options had been issued earlier than they really were, at more favorable prices. At least 130 U.S. corporations are under investigation for possible backdating of option grants. Some have admitted to it. More than 60 executives and directors of public companies have lost their jobs so far, 17 of them chief executive officers. After probable backdating was exposed at giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., the CEO had to resign and give up about $200 million of stock-options value. The company said it will have to restate past earnings by as much as $1.7 billion."

DOJ_NMG_0109009

SEC Launches Probe Of UnitedHealth Options Practices. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, B8) reports, "UnitedHealth Group Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has launched a formal investigation into its stock-options practices." The Journal continues, "The Minnetonka, Minn., health insurer had been the subject of an informal SEC inquiry since April. … 'The company has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the SEC,' UnitedHealth said in an SEC filing." The Journal adds, "The company has delayed financial reports while it reviews its stock-options practices, which have led to an internal probe, a management shake-up and a restatement of financial results. UnitedHealth has said that using current accounting practices, the pretax charges for stock-based compensation expense are likely to range from $400 million to $600 million for the period 1994-2005, as well as from $25 million to $60 million for 2006." The Journal notes, "The company has said it has substantially completed its analysis of the adjustments made to its financial statements and has asked for consultation on certain interpretive issues with the SEC's top accounting official. UnitedHealth said it will review these issues with SEC staff before completing its restatement of historical financial statements and filing quarterly reports for the quarters ended June 30 and Sept. 30, 2006. … UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies have come under scrutiny by the SEC, and many of those are being investigated by the Justice Department."

Former FBI Chief Freeh To Monitor DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe. The Detroit News (12/26, Shepardson) reports, "DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation." The News continues, "The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said." The News adds, "The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department. … Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe. … At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said."

The AP (12/27) reports, "Freeh is a member of the Gavel Consulting Group, which consists of former federal judges 'who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations,' according to the group's Web site." The AP adds, "In 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials. … In 2005, DaimlerChrysler acknowledged that the Justice Department was investigating whether the company had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations."

SEC To Amend Rules On Executive Compensation Disclosure. The Deal (12/27, Block) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is changing newly adopted rules governing the disclosure of executive and director compensation." The Deal continues, "In a statement released Friday, the agency said it is altering the requirements for disclosing the value of stock option awards and giving firms more flexibility in how they report those expenses." The Deal adds, "The SEC said the new rules should more closely conform with the reporting of stock option awards under standards in the Financial Accounting Standards Board's rule FAS 123. That rule requires recognition of the costs of stock option awards over the period in which an employee is required to provide service in exchange for the award. … Using this same approach when disclosing executive compensation will give investors a better idea of the compensation earned by an executive or director during a particular reporting period, the SEC explained in its announcement." The Deal notes, "The SEC compensation rules were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay regulations in 14 years. The SEC received more than 20,000 comment letters, a record, before adopting the new rules in July."

DOJ_NMG_0109010

The New York Times (12/27, Norris) reports, "The change in the way grants of stock options are to be explained to investors is a victory for corporations that had opposed the rule when it was issued in July, and a defeat for institutional investors that had backed the S.E.C.'s original rule." The Times adds, "Christopher Cox, the commission chairman, said yesterday that he viewed the decision as 'a relative technicality' that improved the rule. When the rule was adopted in July, Mr. Cox said it was aimed at providing information that would allow shareholders to 'make better decisions about the appropriate amount to pay the men and women entrusted with running their companies.' … In announcing the new rule on Friday, he said 'the new disclosure requirements will be easier for companies to prepare and for investors to understand.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Groups Urge Congress To Increase Spending On Law Enforcement. The Washington Times (12/27, Seper, 88K) reports, "The International Association of the Chiefs of Police is urging Congress to step up its support for law-enforcement agencies after what it calls 'years of deep budget cuts and a disturbing rise in crime rates.'" Joseph Carter, chief of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Transit Police Department and president of the IACP, said "law-enforcement agencies are stretched too thin: crime rates rise. … We are hopeful that the 110th Congress will take our suggestions to heart and not only completely fund important programs, but also establish new programs and enhance others that will help state, local and tribal law enforcement keep our homeland and hometowns safe."

Canadian Gold Medal Winner Detained In US On Child Abduction Charge. The AP (12/27, Witte) reports, "A federal judge on Tuesday ordered Canadian Olympic gold-medalist Myriam Bedard to temporarily remain in the custody of U.S. marshals after being charged with violating a child custody order by bringing her 12-year-old daughter to the United States." The AP continues, "U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar scheduled a hearing for Friday in Baltimore to address whether the U.S. government has the authority to detain the former biathlon champion pending extradition to Canada." The AP adds, "Kevin McCants, an attorney representing Bedard, said he was working on an arrangement that would enable his client to return voluntarily to Quebec on Friday to face the charge. McCants said the holidays have made it difficult to negotiate, but he has been in touch with Canadian prosecutors. … Bedard, 37, was arrested Friday night in Maryland after U.S. marshals found her and her 12-year-old daughter, Maude, at a Columbia hotel. Bedard, of Quebec, Canada, has been in the custody of U.S. marshals since the arrest. Her daughter is back in the custody of Bedard's ex-husband, Jean Paquet. … Bedard faces up to 10 years in prison on the child abduction charge, but her attorneys contend she didn't break the law. .. .Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Jackson argued that Bedard should be detained because she was a flight risk."

Pittsburgh ID Thief Charged With Forging Leniency Letter. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/27, Ove) reports, "A man whose prosecution three years ago was announced as part of an identity theft crackdown dubbed 'Operation Identity Crisis' is in trouble again after trying to fool a notoriously no-nonsense federal judge with a forged letter asking for leniency." The Post-Gazette continues, "U.S. marshals are looking for James M. Lyle, 22, of the West End, who was released from federal prison in May, after he failed to appear Thursday for a probation violation hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Alan Bloch. … Mr. Lyle, who had more than 3 million credit card numbers on his computer when Pittsburgh police arrested him in 2003, was arrested again last month on new theft charges stemming from an August online purchase of a laptop computer with a stolen credit card. … That new arrest meant he had violated the terms of his probation from his previous federal case, according to a filing by the U.S. Probation Office." The Post-Gazette adds, "At a hearing before Judge Bloch on Dec. 13, Mr. Lyle admitted the new offense and the judge placed him on home detention until a space opens up for a six-month term at a Downtown halfway house. … At that hearing, Mr. Lyle also presented the judge with a letter purportedly from Timothy Savina, his boss at British Petroleum in Scott where he had been working, indicating that Mr. Lyle was turning his life around and shouldn't go back to jail. .. .But Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway thought the letter looked suspicious and asked police to check it out." The Post-Gazette notes, "After the forgery came to light, Judge Bloch scheduled a new hearing for Dec. 21, at which time there was a good chance Mr. Lyle would go to jail. But Mr. Lyle didn't show and the judge, who has a reputation as the toughest on the federal bench in Pittsburgh, issued a warrant for his arrest. … Mr. Lyle had been arrested by Pittsburgh police for credit card theft before 2003, but after another arrest that year authorities decided to lump him together with 11 other defendants as part of 'Operation Identity Crisis,' a joint effort of the U.S. Justice Department, U.S. Postal Inspectors, Federal Trade Commission, U.S. Secret Service and various banks."

DOJ_NMG_0109011

Kansas Attorney General To Seek Renewal Of Abortion Provider Charges. The AP (12/27) reports District Judge Paul W. Clark "agreed Tuesday to let Kansas' attorney general, a vocal abortion opponent, try to persuade him to reinstate charges against a well-known abortion provider." Judge Clark "scheduled a hearing for Wednesday after Attorney General Phill Kline asked him to reconsider his decision to dismiss the case against Dr. George Tiller over a jurisdictional issue." Kline, who "lost his re-election bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, filed 30 misdemeanor counts last week accusing Tiller of illegally performing 15 late-term abortions." On Friday, Clark had "dismissed the charges after Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston argued that Kline didn't have the authority to file the charges."

Houston Police Investigating International Flight Luggage Dumped In Trash Bin. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/27) reports, "Authorities were trying to figure out how dozens of pieces of luggage belonging to international air travelers ended up in a trash bin behind a Houston pet store. FBI special agent Rolando Munoz said 68 pieces of luggage from various international flights were discovered. He said the luggage was turned over to Continental Airlines to sort out." Harris County Sheriff's Sgt. Dana Wolfe "said tags on the bags showed some of the travelers were going to or from London and Dubai. The Houston Police Department is handling the case, Munoz and Wolfe said."

Security Experts Predict Worsening Cyber Crime In 2007. The Washington Post (12/27, D1, Krebs, 690K) reports, "It was the year of computing dangerously, and next year could be worse. That is the assessment of computer security experts, who said 2006 was marked by an unprecedented spike in junk e-mail and more sophisticated Internet attacks by cybercrooks. Few believe 2007 will be any brighter for consumers, who already are struggling to avoid the clever scams they encounter while banking, shopping or just surfing online. Experts say online criminals are growing smarter about hiding personal data they have stolen on the Internet and are using new methods for attacking computers that are harder to detect." The Post notes, "At any given time, between 3 million and 4 million compromised computers are active on the Internet, according to Gadi Evron, who managed Internet security for the Israeli government before joining Beyond Security, an Israeli security firm. And that estimate only counts spam bots."

Hotel Conglomerate CEO Calls For International Cooperation To Fight Cyber Crime. In a Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) op-ed, Leading Hotels of the World President and CEO Paul McManus writes, "With the Web now the shopping mall of choice for time-crunched consumers, cyber-thieves are 'dressing up' Web sites and tweaking competitors' domain names to capture unsuspecting shoppers." McManus adds, "What's needed is a set of international laws protecting business and consumers against Internet fraud plus a global squad of cyber crime-busters to enforce them. The U.S. has specific computer fraud laws and the FBI takes 'thousands of complaints' annually through its Internet Crime Complaint Center (www.ic3.gov). But perpetrators who zero in on businesses like mine often work in countries with no laws protecting Web users and lax or little cooperation with U.S. or other foreign law-enforcement agencies. Collaboration is the only realistic solution for the private sector to protect brands from online pirates."

Suburban Houston Rapist Preys On Men. The AP (12/27, Porretto) reports, "A rapist who has struck at least five times since April in and around Baytown has not only spread fear in this working-class community but also piqued the interest of those who study the criminal mind. The reason: He preys on other men. … That makes him something of a rarity in the world of crime." The AP reports that "experts say male-on-male rape sometimes stems from sexual encounters gone bad. But that does not appear to be the case with the rapist in this oil-refining town of 70,000 people about 30 miles east of Houston. … Instead, he methodically identifies and stalks young men and attacks them at gunpoint or knifepoint in or near their homes, according to police Capt. Roger Clifford. Sometimes he robs his victims, too, but rape appears to be the primary motivation, police said." The AP adds, "The U.S. Justice Department says one in 33 men in the United States has been a victim of a rape or attempted rape, compared with one in six women. Experts say men are far less likely to report a rape to authorities, because they fear being perceived as weak or see the attack as an assault on their masculinity. … In fact, investigators in Baytown fear there may be other victims of the rapist who are too ashamed to come forward. … Three of the attacks have occurred in the city, the other two on the outskirts of town. The most recent attack was Nov. 30. Clifford would not give details of the rapes but said at least one victim managed to thwart the attack."

DOJ_NMG_0109012

Slow Pace Of Virginia's DNA Review Criticized. The Washington Post (12/27, B1, Rondeaux) reports, "A year after Virginia's crime lab launched an unprecedented review of old cases that experts said could free dozens of wrongly convicted people, the project appears to be years from completion, and some are questioning the credentials of the private company selected to do the DNA testing." The Post continues, "Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) ordered a full review of the cases last December after an analysis of old evidence revealed that two men were not guilty of sexual assault. Warner pardoned the men, who became part of a wave of exonerations that reignited a national debate over post-conviction DNA testing. … At the time, Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara predicted that the retesting project would be completed within two years and could free dozens of innocent inmates. But now, just days from retirement, Ferrara has revised his prediction, saying changes at the lab have stalled progress. … 'We got nowhere for a while. It has suffered some delays because of staff turnover,' Ferrara said. 'But we're as interested and as anxious to see this thing through as everyone else. We could see as many as 30 possible exonerations when this is all over with.'" The Post adds, "The physical evidence came to light in 2001, when an inmate asserted his innocence under a new state law that for the first time granted the right to request testing of newly discovered evidence more than 21 days after sentencing. Lab analyst Mary Jane Burton, who retired in 1988 and died in 1999, and two other lab workers meticulously preserved pieces of clothing smeared with blood, semen or saliva before DNA testing got underway in the early 1990s. A cursory review of a small sample of Burton's files has exonerated five former convicts. … Earlier this year, legal experts speculated that the retesting effort could be slowed when Ferrara, 64, announced in August plans to retire by the end of this year. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has not selected Ferrara's successor, but the state's Forensic Science Board has interviewed several internal and external candidates, and a decision is expected next month, Virginia officials familiar with the process said. … The evidence review entails a painstaking, multi-step process of separating out cases contained in 660 boxes packed with thousands of files from 1973 through 1988, identifying suspects convicted in each case and determining if physical evidence samples can be tested for DNA."

Law Requires Disinterment Of Murderer Buried At Arlington Cemetery. The Washington Post (12/27, B5, Bahrampour) reports, "The remains of a man convicted of murdering an elderly Hagerstown, Md., couple will be removed from Arlington National Cemetery as part of a bill signed into law by President Bush." The Post continues, "Bush signed the $3.2 billion bill, the Veterans Benefits, Health Care and Information Technology Act of 2006, on Friday. … The bill seeks to improve benefits and health care for veterans and their families. It also requires the Secretary of the Army to remove the cremated ashes of Russell Wayne Wagner, who was convicted of murdering Daniel Davis, 84, and Wilda Davis, 80, in 1994. … 'Arlington Cemetery is reserved as a place of honor for men and women who have served their nation in the armed services. It is appropriate to remove the remains of individuals, who, by their own criminal actions, have brought dishonor to themselves and the memory of their service,' said Tony Frato, a White House spokesman." The Post adds, "Wagner died in early 2005 of a heroin overdose while serving two life sentences. An Army private who served during the Vietnam War and was honorably discharged in 1972, Wagner was eligible for parole at the time of his death, which made him eligible for an Arlington service. He was buried with honors in August 2005. .. But after publicity about the case and pressure from the couple's family and Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Barbara A.

DOJ_NMG_0109013

Mikulski (D-Md.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), the case was revisited."

Figure In Alaskan Land-Use Dispute Pleads To Incest Charges. The Washington Post (12/27, A2, Harden) reports, "Robert Hale, a Bible-toting father of 15 who calls himself Papa Pilgrim, became an anti-government celebrity in Alaska by driving a bulldozer across a national park that encircles his land. … The Lord told him that using the bulldozer to clear 14 miles of derelict road through the park was a loving thing to do, Hale said in an interview three years ago. … 'In order for me to love my children, I have to be a provider,' Hale said then, explaining that he needed the bulldozer to fetch supplies for his children, whom he and his wife were home-schooling in an ultra-strict Christian way. … He said his children read only the Bible, always bathed with their clothes on and were not allowed to see one another naked." The Post adds, "Yesterday in a Palmer, Alaska, courtroom, Hale, 65, answered very different questions about his behavior and his family: He pleaded no contest to multiple charges that he raped one of his daughters. … The plea, which came three weeks before Hale was to face trial on 27 felony charges of rape, incest and coercion, punctuates an implausible saga that stretches from Texas to the outback of eastern Alaska. It is a story by turns picaresque, outrageous and sad. … Hale and his now-estranged wife, Kurina, who calls herself Country Rose, and their children, who all have names from the Bible, bought a 410-acre ranch inside Wrangell-St. Elias National Park, the largest national park in the United States. … Much of the money for the $450,000 purchase in 2002 came from the Alaska permanent fund dividend. It is an oil-funded annual payment that this year was worth $1,107 to each state resident. After Hale and his family moved to Alaska in 1998, the dividend provided the onetime subsistence farmers -- who also earned money performing gospel music -- with more cash than they had ever had. … The ranch, which they named Hillbilly Heaven, is an in-holding, which means it is surrounded by federal land controlled by the National Park Service. Under the 1980 law that established much of the vast national park system in Alaska, in-holders are guaranteed 'reasonable and feasible' access to their property. … Hale's bulldozer romp stretched that guarantee beyond the breaking point. The Park Service cited Hale for violating federal law. … But land-rights activists, who in Alaska and across the West have complained for decades about persnickety law enforcement in and around federal parks, adopted Hale and his family as camera-ready symbols of America's frontier spirit."

WPost Urges Broad Death Penalty Debate In Maryland. The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) editorializes, "The Maryland Court of Appeals has thrown a big wrench into the state's already anemic death penalty enforcement. It ruled last week that Maryland's procedures for lethal injection were adopted without adequate legislative oversight." The court action is "an opportunity for a much broader discussion of the utility, justice, necessity and morality of capital punishment. It comes at a propitious moment. Incoming governor Martin O'Malley (D) personally opposes the death penalty. He did not appear inclined to dismiss the court ruling as a mere technicality -- which, formally speaking, is all it really is. That's good. Maryland doesn't need a big debate about how it kills people, but the time is ripe to debate whether it should stop."

CIVIL LAW:

FBI Leak Case Files Missing. The New York Sun (12/27, Gerstein) reports, "The FBI is missing nearly a quarter of its files relating to investigations of recent leaks of classified information, according to a court filing the bureau made last week." The Sun continues, "In response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, the FBI said it identified 94 leak investigations since 2001, but that the investigative files in 22 of those cases 'are missing' and cannot be located. 'There is no physical slip of paper on the shelf which indicates that the file has been charged out to a particular FBI employee, so therefore there is no way of knowing where the file may actually be,' an official in the bureau's records division, Peggy Bellando, wrote in a December 22 declaration. … 'That's an amazing number,' an academic who has studied the FBI's record-keeping procedures, Athan Theoharis of Marquette University, said in an interview yesterday. 'These are very sensitive investigations. ... They could be called to account for whether they are monitoring reporters. These are records that should be handled very well.'" The Sun adds, "Over the past decade, the FBI has waged an epic struggle to computerize and automate its records systems. The agency abandoned a $170 million 'Virtual Case File' project last year after years of Congressional hearings and critical evaluations led to the conclusion that the system would never be implemented successfully. … One frequent critic of government database programs, Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union, said that record makes it understandable that a substantial proportion of the leak files would be mislaid. … 'It's par for the course,' Mr. Steinhardt said. He noted that the Justice Department has already put about 1 million case records into a database, called OneDOJ, that is being made widely available even though the files may contain unverified or erroneous data. 'They want to distribute it to law enforcement in every city in the United States, but here the FBI can't manage its own files,' the critic said."

DOJ_NMG_0109014

Court Approves Creditor Vote On Seracare Bankruptcy Plan. The AP (12/27) reports, "SeraCare Life Sciences Inc., which makes medical supplies from blood plasma, has won court approval to send its shareholder-backed bankruptcy plan to creditors for a vote." The AP continues, "Judge Louise DeCarl Adler of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in San Diego on Thursday signed off on the biotechnology company's disclosure statement, which outlines its plan to exit Chapter 11 through a rights offering to existing shareholders. … Under bankruptcy law, a judge must approve such a statement before a company can send its plan to creditors for a vote." The AP adds, "A group of SeraCare shareholders, led by hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, has agreed to backstop a $20.2 million rights offering that would finance the company's bankruptcy exit. The group holds over 30 percent of SeraCare's common stock. … Shareholders, last in line for repayment in a Chapter 11 case, will get one share in the reorganized company for each share they own, along with the right to participate in the rights offering, which will offer shares at $4.75 each. Options and warrants will be reinstated after SeraCare emerges from bankruptcy. … Harbinger will also buy SeraCare's bank debt and allow it to use the cash collateral securing the debt without paying default interest through June 2007. … The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department have been investigating SeraCare, which on March 15 announced it would restate its financial results for the first three quarters of 2005. SeraCare's chairman, chief executive and financial chief were fired in March, just before the company filed for bankruptcy protection."

Small Businesses Fight Federal Contracting Rules. The New York Times (12/27, Nixon) reports, "In 1995, Joseph N. Cooper won a multiyear contract worth up to $8 million to do public relations for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. He received the contract through a Small Business Administration program established to increase opportunities for small companies. … But not long after the work was under way, the deal was awarded instead to three multimillion-dollar companies, which were listed as disadvantaged in contract documents. After years of trying to win the contract back, Mr. Cooper filed a false-claims lawsuit against the companies, asserting that they had committed fraud by saying they were small businesses." The Times continues, "This year, to Mr. Cooper and his lawyer's surprise, the court ruled that although evidence showed the companies were indeed not small businesses, fraud had not been committed because the I.N.S. knew their true status when the work was awarded to the companies — J. Walter Thompson, the Bernard Hodes Group and Cass Communications. … The case was dismissed. … 'We were floored,' Mr. Cooper said in an interview. 'The ruling essentially said that I was right, the companies were not small, but so what.'" The Times adds, "That experience points to the kind of Catch-22 world that some small-business owners face when they challenge the awarding of government contracts. … Many studies have shown that hundreds of government contracts set aside for small business are being awarded to large corporations. Federal laws provide several mechanisms that allow small-business owners who suspect that contracts have been awarded to large companies to protest. .. .But small-business owners say that the rules in many cases impose nearly impossible standards on them. Even if they do succeed in protesting an award, they say, and prove that federal agencies are intentionally awarding small-business contracts to big companies, there are almost no penalties. Often, the large companies get to keep the contacts. … Congress may be more receptive to their calls for change next year, when two longtime critics of the practice assume leadership positions for the committees overseeing small business."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Courts Seek Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Defendants. The AP (12/27) reports, "A program in Cuyahoga County (OH) courts, started in response to concerns mirrored in the justice system nationwide, aims to better understand and deal more efficiently with people who are mentally ill." The AP continues, "The county and several other communities across Ohio have established mental health courts to specifically handle such defendants. In the Cleveland-area program, some municipal and common pleas judges oversee mental health cases and try to place defendants with psychological problems into court-supervised treatment programs. … 'We're not dealing with a high population of people with really good, secure home lives,' Municipal Judge Kathleen Keough said. 'We get people whose life has been in upheaval for years and who don't know any of their rights. No stability. Nobody really to count on.'" The AP adds, "In the past, those awaiting trial who showed signs of mental illnesses, such as depression or schizophrenia, tended to stay in jail two to three times longer than others while officials determined if they were competent to stand trial. Because those people might need close supervision and daily medications, the cost of keeping them behind bars can be as much as double that for others." The AP notes, "The program in Cuyahoga County sprang from an initiative started three years ago to try to better handle mentally ill defendants. … Recent studies indicate that mental disorders affect one of every four adults in the United States. Yet a recent U.S. Department of Justice study found that more than half the inmates in the nation's prisons and jails have mental health problems. … Part of that can be traced to fewer psychiatric hospitals, said Dr. Philip J. Resnick, director of forensic psychiatry at Case Western Reserve University. In 1960, more than 550,000 people were in psychiatric hospitals throughout the country, Resnick said. With the closing of many of the hospitals, that number has dropped to about 70,000. … The Bureau of Justice Assistance, part of the U.S. Justice Department, helps to administer the federal government's Mental Health Courts Program. The program funds projects that seek to improve the way courts help adults with mental disabilities or illnesses. Mental health courts generally deal with nonviolent offenders."

DOJ_NMG_0109015

ANTITRUST:

Experts Say Delta's Antitrust Objections May Be Overstated. The Deal (12/27, Lindell) reports, "Delta Airlines Inc. is using the looming specter of antitrust regulation as a key reason to fight an $8.5 billion takeover bid from US Airways Group Inc., but antitrust experts say Delta's argument is exaggerated." The Deal continues, "The airline's Dec. 19 warning about the antitrust risks titled, 'Proposed US Airways/Delta Merger Would Be Highly Anticompetitive' begins with a statement that the two airlines have 'overlapping networks.' … While it is true that the two nationwide carriers compete in many routes, the notion that antitrust problems make the deal a nonstarter "is just silly," according to a former government antitrust official. … The Department of Justice 'is clearly going to look at this, and it's probably going to take four to five months,' but Delta's warning that the review will take a year is not correct, according to the lawyer who asked that his name not be used." The Deal adds, "In a Dec. 21 response to Delta's antitrust analysis, US Air acknowledges that some shuttle services between New York and Washington would have to be sold off, and that there are competitive problems with flights between Cincinnati and Charlotte, N.C., as well as Cincinnati and Philadelphia. Two city pair overlaps, according to US Air, is a far cry from the alarmist Delta report that identified more than 30 overlapping city pairs. … The key issue now is how US Air can proceed because Delta is in bankruptcy. Under bankruptcy rules, US Air can't launch a hostile bid for its competitor, but it can lobby creditors to put pressure on Delta. … One path could be joining with US Air to file premerger notification forms with the government, which would initiate an in-depth official review. That review would give the parties, and the bankruptcy judge, a clear view of what divestitures would be required to get the deal done."

McClatchy Sells Flagship Star Tribune To Private Equity Group. The AP (12/27, Freed) reports, "Newspaper publisher The McClatchy Co. said on Tuesday that it will sell its flagship newspaper Star Tribune to a private equity firm for $530 million, a sharp drop from the $1.2 billion it paid to acquire the newspaper just eight years ago." The AP continues, "McClatchy said it decided to sell the newspaper to Avista Capital Partners through a private bidding process 'after a strategic reevaluation of its portfolio of holdings' following McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder for $4.5 billion earlier this year." The AP adds, 'McClatchy faces a large tax bill from selling off 12 other newspapers earlier this year as part of its purchase of Knight Ridder. It said the tax benefit of selling the Star Tribune at a loss is worth $160 million, raising the total value of the deal to $690 million. McClatchy said it would use the money to pay down its Knight Ridder debt." The AP notes, "McClatchy chairman and CEO Gary Pruitt said in a written statement that the Star Tribune 'is a profitable business that has generated significant returns for the company over the years. However, as we continue to analyze our business following the Knight Ridder acquisition, it became clear that selling the Star Tribune strengthens

DOJ_NMG_0109016

McClatchy's competitive position.' … 'This deal came about because of very specific conditions involving the Star Tribune and today's changing media landscape. We have no plans to sell any other newspapers,' Pruitt said in an e-mail to McClatchy employees."

Private Equity Council To Enter Lobbying Arena. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "A group of major private-equity firms has tapped a former videogame lobbyist to lead a trade group to promote the industry's interests here." The Private Equity Council, "set to begin operations early next year, said in a statement that Douglas Lowenstein will serve as its first president and chief executive officer. To take the post, he is stepping down as president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the US videogame industry." The Washington Post (12/27, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) says "the Private Equity Council, is backed by such leaders in the burgeoning business of company buyouts as Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts."

Bloomberg (12/27, Cole) reports, "Private-equity firms and management have announced a record $718 billion of takeovers in 2006, Bloomberg data show. Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and other firms were sued in November by investors who claim they conspired to hold down prices they pay when buying companies. The U.K. market regulator also is researching market abuse in private-equity transactions. … The council 'will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy,' according to the statement. … Other members of the council include Apollo Management LP, Bain Capital LLC, Hellman & Friedman, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners, Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and KKR."

Texas Pacific Is World's Top Buyout Group. The Financial Times (12/27, Smith) reports, "Texas Pacific Group has beaten Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts to become the world's most prolific buy-out group in 2006, notching up 17 deals with an aggregate value of just over $101bn." The Times continues, "The figures reflect an extraordinary year for private equity in which the value of announced deals has risen to a record $700bn, more than double the record set in 2005 and 20 times bigger than in 1996, according to Thomson Financial, the data provider." The Times adds, "The wave of private equity deal activity, accounting for nearly one-fifth of all global mergers and acquisitions, has helped underpin a huge rise in the value of stock markets globally. … TPG notched up high-profile deals across the world, including Australia's Qantas airline, Las Vegas casino giant Harrah's, and Univision, the US's largest Spanish-language broadcaster. No other buy-out group has ever done more than $100bn worth of deals in a single year, a coup for TPG in an environment where being known as the biggest buy-out group helps open doors to the financing community and company boardrooms." The Times notes, "Blackstone, which topped the US league table, took part in global deals worth $93bn, while KKR, number one in Europe, managed a world total of $78bn. Bain Capital took part in $85bn worth of deals. … The US also regained its crown from Europe as the world's most active private equity market, recording $403bn of announced deals, treble that of 2005."

Reliance Prepares For Bid From Hutchison Essar. The Financial Times (12/27, Yee, Mitchell, Parker) reports, "Reliance Communications, India's second-largest mobile operator, is in talks with at least four private equity firms about combining forces to make an offer for Hutchison Essar, a smaller rival." The Times continues, "Vodafone Friday confirmed it was considering the acquisition of a controlling stake in Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-biggest mobile operator. .. Reliance's talks with private equity firms underlines the likelihood of a bidding war for Hutchison Essar, which has an enterprise value of about $14bn." The Times adds, "Shares in Hong Kong-listed Hutchison Telecommunications International, which holds 67 per cent of Hutchison Essar, rose 8 per cent on Vodafone's statement, to a record high of HK$19.08. Reliance declined to comment. However, people familiar with the company said it was in talks with Apax, Blackstone, Carlyle and KKR. … On Thursday, Vodafone's board gave the go-ahead for management to prepare an offer for Hutchison Essar. Leading Vodafone investors have reacted cautiously but positively to the prospect of a $13.5bn-plus offer for Hutchison Essar. Vodafone's shares closed down 1.2 per cent at 142p Friday. … Vodafone is seeking to counter slowing revenue growth in its core European businesses by increasing its presence in emerging markets. Hutchison Telecommunications International said in a statement it had "been approached by various potentially interested parties", which it did not identify, and cautioned that a transaction was not guaranteed."

DOJ_NMG_0109017

ENVIRONMENT:

House Democrats Seek To Redistribute Oil Money To Conservation Efforts. The AP (12/26, Hebert) reports, "Democrats in the U.S. House of Representatives in the first weeks of the new Congress plan to establish a dedicated fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, using money from oil companies. … That is only one legislative hit the oil industry is expected to take next year as a Congress run by Democrats is likely to show little sympathy to the cash-rich, high-profile business." The AP continues, "Whether the issue is rolling back tax breaks -- some approved by Congress only 18 months ago -- pushing for more use of ethanol and other biofuels instead of gasoline, or investigations into shortfalls in royalty payments to the government, oil industry lobbyists will spend most of their time playing defense." The AP adds, "Details of a renewable fuels fund have yet to be worked out. Nonetheless, it is one of the initiatives the House will take up during its first 100 hours in session in January, according to aides to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader. At least some of the money -- revenue gained by rolling back some tax breaks -- will go to a program to support research into making ethanol from sources other than corn. … But the oil issue likely to be first out of the legislative block in January concerns the ability of the federal government to recover royalties many lawmakers believe have been unfairly avoided by oil and gas companies drilling in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico." The AP adds, "The Interior Department has been trying to get more than 50 companies to rework 1998-99 drilling leases that allow the companies to avoid paying billions of dollars in royalties because of a government mistake in writing the leases. Recently five companies agreed to a compromise to pay royalties on future production under the leases, but not from oil and gas already taken from the federal waters. … Most of the other companies argue that the leases represent a binding contract and have not even talked to Interior officials about them."

Higher Energy Prices Forecast For 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Scherer, 59K) reports that some analysts are forecasting higher energy prices in 2007, adding, "If the forecast comes true, energy could be a dominant factor in the economic outlook for 2007 because, unlike this year, the potential increases would come when the economy is expected to be struggling." Some "energy analysts are beginning to think 2007 will be a case of déjà vu for consumers and business. In this scenario, prices start to ratchet up in the spring, peak sometime in the summer at a new record, and then fall back to lower levels later in the year." The Monitor adds that the relatively warm winter and slowing US economic growth are "keeping a lid on prices."

Administration Will Propose Listing Polar Bears As Threatened. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration has decided to propose listing the polar bear as threatened under the Endangered Species Act, putting the U.S. government on record as saying that global warming could drive one of the world's most recognizable animals out of existence." The Administration's proposal, "which was described by an Interior Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity -- stems from the fact that rising temperatures in the Arctic are shrinking the sea ice that polar bears need for hunting. The official insisted on anonymity because the department will submit the proposal today for publication in the Federal Register, after which it will be subject to public comment for 90 days."

Anadarko Sells Two Natural-Gas Fields For $1.6 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C4, Biers) reports, "Anadarko Petroleum Corp. agreed to sell two Louisiana natural-gas fields for $1.6 billion to EXCO Resources Inc., in its latest push to reduce debt after a pair of large acquisitions. The sale covers Anadarko's Vernon and Ansley fields, which produce 192 million cubic feet of natural gas a day, or about 11% of the company's gas production." Anadarko "has been busy this year, purchasing Oklahoma City oil and natural-gas developer Kerr-McGee Corp. and Denver natural-gas producer Western Gas Resources for $21 billion over the summer before implementing an aggressive asset-sale program in the fall to reduce debt. The EXCO sale brings the total revenue from the asset sales to $8.1 billion."

Nature Conservancy Renting Land From Some Farmers To Protect Species. The New York Times (12/27, Kowal, 1.16M) reports from Mount Vernon, Washington, "The standoff here between farmers and environmentalists was familiar in the modern West. … This year, though, the standoff ended -- at least for three longtime farmers in this fertile valley, who began collaborating with their former enemies to preserve wildlife and their livelihoods." The Nature Conservancy "is renting land from the three farmers on behalf of migrating Western sandpipers, black-bellied plovers, dunlins, marbled godwits and other shorebirds. From private and public funds, including a grant from the federal Environmental Protection Agency, the farmers…will together receive up to $350,000 for three years of labor, expenses and the use of 210 acres, said Kevin Morse, the Skagit Delta project manager for the conservancy." The farmers "see the Nature Conservancy's willingness to pay them as an acknowledgment that they should not be expected to sacrifice their land or their living for wildlife. This approach effectively turns shorebirds into another crop to manage, instead of grounds for a lawsuit."

DOJ_NMG_0109018

NYTimes Argues For Cutting Livestock Production To Avoid Global Warming. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) editorializes that "livestock are responsible for about 18 percent of the global warming effect, more than transportation's contribution. The culprits are methane — the natural result of bovine digestion -- and the nitrogen emitted by manure. Deforestation of grazing land adds to the effect." The Times adds, "The human passion for meat is certainly not about to end anytime soon." But "our health and the health of the planet depend on pushing livestock production in more sustainable directions."

FDA Praised For Stance On Animal Cloning. The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) editorializes, "A recent poll by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology indicates that a majority of Americans get queasy at the thought of clonal animal products lining supermarket shelves. But to its credit, the FDA stuck to the science -- the great bulk of which supports its reported conclusion. … According to the Pew poll, a large number of Americans object to animal cloning out of religious concerns, views that anti-cloning groups will no doubt exploit to distract the public from the scientific evidence. But the FDA's job, in this as in other matters, is to fairly assess the science."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Virginia Drug Ring Suspected Of Selling $8 Million In Cocaine, 11 Charged. The AP (12/26) reported federal authorities "say they've charged 11 people believed to be involved in a Hampton Roads drug-dealing ring that has sold a ton of cocaine worth more than $8 million over the last 13 years. … Most of the suspects have been arrested over the last 10 days. … Drug Enforcement Administration officials worked with state and local authorities on the case, which officials said is one of the largest drug cases in the last 13 years." Virginia's Richmond Times Dispatch, WDBJ-TV in Roanoke, and WTKR-TV in Norfolk used the AP story.

The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (12/27, McGlone) reports an informant "told the DEA that in 1993 he began buying crack from Naeron B. Mudie, a Jamaican native who had moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, according to a 34-page affidavit filed in court by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Mudie and six others are charged in a separate indictment with related crimes."

Mexico-Based Drug Ring Suspects To Appear In Court. The Washington Times (12/26, Seper, 88K) reported two men "believed to be high-ranking members of a Mexico-based smuggling ring are scheduled to appear…in federal court in San Diego to discuss future court dates and arrange for legal representation. Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix, 37, and Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, were named last week in a seven-count federal grand jury indictment on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges in an operation that dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade. The ring flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin. … A decision by federal prosecutors on whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date."

Gift Cards Used As "Virtual Currency" For Drug Deals. The CanWest News Service (12/26) reported, "Those gift cards that countless Boxing Day shoppers will be cashing in today are also landing under the Christmas trees of organized-crime groups, who use them as 'virtual currency' for drug deals and money laundering, according to the RCMP. A recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration." RCMP officers "said such cards are now accepted as valid currency between crime syndicates. Instead of a suitcase of cash, operatives might show up for a drug deal with a fistful of gift cards."

DOJ_NMG_0109019

The Canadian Press (12/26) reported a recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States "identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … When poorly managed, prepaid-card programs can be a 'vehicle for money laundering and terrorist financing,' conceded Gord Jamieson, director of risk management and security at Visa Canada. But he said his company has taken a number of steps to prevent its cards from being used for criminal purposes. Prepaid Visa cards available to individual applicants have a deposit limit of $500 in Canada and cannot be reloaded or used at an ATM."

Report: Supplies Of Potent Heroin From Afghanistan Increasing In US. The Los Angeles Times (12/26, 850K) reported, "Supplies of highly potent Afghan heroin in the United States are growing so fast that the pure white powder is rapidly overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, prompting fears of increased addiction and overdoses. Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, a jump of nearly 75% in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said. … According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7% in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14% in 2004, the latest year studied. … Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that more heroin was reaching the United States from Afghanistan. 'We are NOT seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin,' Garrison K. Courtney wrote in an e-mail to The Times." The Boston Globe used the Times story.

UPI (12/26) cited the Times story and wrote that a report from the DEA "said Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States since 2001. Another DEA report said that heroin from Afghanistan may take up more than 14 percent of the Unites States market." The Washington Times used the UPI story.

On its Web site, FOX News (12/26) reported the Times "cited a Drug Enforcement Administration report it obtained as saying that the poppy fields in Afghanistan have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the U.S. The heroin from Afghanistan is the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center. According to the DEA report, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market from 1980 through 1985, with a 47% to 54% share, but that dropped to 6% for much of the 1990s, as the Taliban cracked down on poppy production."

In Los Angeles, the AP (12/26) reported heroin-related deaths "have soared nearly 75 percent countywide in three years and experts believe potent Afghan heroin, which is overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, may be to blame. … A Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times shows Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States, doubling from 7 percent in 2001 to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied." The San Francisco Chronicle used the AP story.

Security Measures At Virginia Federal Courthouse Come Under Fire. The Washington Post (12/27, B1, Markon) reports, "Jim Savage has been living in a world of guard shacks, green security poles and Jersey barricades lining the street outside his home next to the federal courthouse in Alexandria. … They were put there for the trial of a terrorist, Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, and they were supposed to come down when the trial was over. Seven months after it ended, they are still there." The Post continues, "So Savage, who calls the security measures an eyesore, mounted a one-man crusade to have them removed. He retrieved a judge's order saying the additional security was supposed to be temporary and tried to meet with the judge. He contacted the City of Alexandria, but was told the federal government has jurisdiction over his street. … Yesterday, Savage learned that his campaign will probably meet with only mixed success. The U.S. Marshals Service said plans are in the works to remove most of the barricades and to replace them with a permanent security wall near the courthouse. Officials said the wall will be more attractive than the faded concrete barricades and will fit with the neighborhood's architecture. … 'This idea of some sort of a Berlin Wall really fits. It will be like Checkpoint Charlie,' Savage, a former criminal investigator for the U.S. Army, said when told about the plans by a reporter. 'The fact is that a court order allows these security measures to be present, and the basis for that order is over. To put up something permanent with the expectation that maybe you might have a terrorist trial in the future is really stretching things.'" The Post notes, "John Hackman, the acting U.S. marshal for Alexandria, said he understood the concerns of Savage and other residents at the Carlyle Towers condominium complex. 'We are doing our best to reach a balance that will provide security as well as the aesthetic that the neighborhood requires,' Hackman said. 'But terrorism is not something where we say okay, we had a trial, and it goes away. We need to be constantly vigilant, and obviously the Alexandria court has high-profile cases.' … Michael Kulstad, a marshal's spokesman, said the agency investigated 1,111 threats or 'inappropriate communications' to members of the judiciary nationwide in fiscal 2006, including to judges, prosecutors and witnesses. Just last week, a federal prisoner was indicted in Richmond on charges of sending a letter bomb to the federal courthouse there."

DOJ_NMG_0109020

IMMIGRATION:

Dallas Suburb Sued Over Ban On Renting To Illegal Aliens. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Bustillo, 850K) reports Farmers Branch, Texas, "a Dallas suburb that has barred landlords from renting to illegal immigrants," was "sued Tuesday by two civil rights groups that allege the controversial ordinance turns property owners into immigration agents and violates federal law." The challenge "by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund seeks to derail a new law that would require property managers to check the immigration status of apartment renters." The ordinance, "approved last month, is set to take effect Jan. 12." Farmers Branch – "a city of 28,000 north of Dallas that is about 37 percent Hispanic -- is one of dozens of U.S. municipalities that, frustrated with federal government inaction, have adopted tough local measures to stem illegal immigration." But "the Farmers Branch ordinance is seen as a turning point for Texas, a state that largely has avoided the kind of confrontational immigration policies commonplace elsewhere."

The AP (12/27, Garay) reports, "The lawsuit claims the measure, scheduled to take effect Jan. 12, is so poorly drafted that it excludes even legal immigrants from renting. … 'Immigration enforcement must be left to the federal government, not each local municipality,' said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. [Otherwise Texas will end up with a patchwork system that is impractical and unenforceable.'" The AP notes, "On Friday, the owners of three apartment complexes filed a lawsuit asking a federal court to declare the rent law unconstitutional. In another lawsuit filed earlier this month, a Farmers Branch resident alleged that the mayor repeatedly violated the state's open meetings laws to deliberate the ordinances."

Illegal Immigrants' Living Conditions Anger Some. NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 10, 2:50, Brokaw, 9.87M) reported that in Colorado, an extended family of 18 illegal immigrants "live in this four-bedroom house which is zoned for a single family," but the families "defend this living arrangement as just extended family." It's "the double standard when it comes to illegal immigrants and the law that angers many Americans." Ian Hawkins, construction worker: "My biggest problem with it is when people show up here and they don't follow the rules."

US Said To Have "Long Heritage" Of Illegal Immigration. In a New York Times op-ed (12/27), author William Hogeland says, "The immigrant experience in the United States is justly celebrated, and perhaps no aspect of that experience is more quintessentially American than our long heritage of illegal immigration." Descendants of the "great immigration experiences of the 19th and 20th centuries visit the Ellis Island Immigration Museum to learn of the tribulations of ancestors who risked much to become Americans. Those of us whose ancestors risked everything as illegal immigrants, and in the process helped found a nation, owe our forebears a debt of gratitude, too. Without their daring disregard of immigration laws, we might not be here today."

Housing Market Slowdown Puts Crimp In Hispanic Immigration. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Miroff, 690K) reports in a front page story that Hispanic immigration "to the Washington region has always followed a seasonal pattern, as the winter puts a chill on outdoor labor and drives workers south. But with home sales and housing starts dropping after years of steady growth, many Hispanic workers -- legal and illegal -- say the good times are gone." Demographers who "track migration patterns and embassy staff members say it's too soon to tell exactly how the housing construction decline has affected the region's Hispanic population. But stories of departing workers abound. Some workers say they're headed home; others, spurred by rumors of construction jobs, try their fortunes in the Carolinas, Georgia, New Orleans."

Immigration System's Goals Said To Be In Conflict. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A1, Jordan, 2.04M) reports in an approximately 2600 word story on the case of Brazilian immigrant Zandro Souza, who worked his way to become a successful chef on Martha's Vineyard. During "a final interview with a U.S. immigration official in Providence, R.I., the Souzas' five-year effort to win legal status hit a wall." The Souzas' 11-year-old son, Igor, "is blind and developmentally delayed." Souza says "he has paid almost all of Igor's medical bills -- about $20,000 annually -- out of pocket, without insurance or help from government programs. He feared accepting aid would jeopardize his family's attempt to gain permanent U.S. residency." According to Souza, 'the immigration official told him that if Mr. Souza and his wife died, their son could become a 'public charge.' Although the family tried to prove that Igor would be cared for if his parents passed away, the U.S. government earlier this year denied green cards to the couple and their son and placed them in deportation proceedings. This time the government cited another reason for rejection -- that they applied for and entered on tourist visas but intended to stay permanently." The Souzas' story "shows how compassion can collide with hard-nosed financial considerations as the U.S. decides which immigrants should be admitted and which should be turned back."

DOJ_NMG_0109021

TAX:

US Virgin Islands Decries IRS Tax Crackdown. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A4, Matthews) reports, "For decades, the U.S. Virgin Islands was a friendly place for business owners looking to skirt U.S. taxes. Too friendly, Congress declared back in 2004, changing the relevant statute. Since then, the Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service have been cracking down. … Now, elected officials and business leaders in the U.S. territory are complaining that the federal government has gone too far and the tax crackdown is threatening the local economy and government revenue. They are lobbying Congress to ease up. … 'While these changes were aimed at preventing tax abuse by persons who neither lived nor worked in the Virgin Islands, the changes went too far, forcing many legitimate businesses to close their doors,' Charles Turnbull, governor of the Virgin Islands (population about 109,000), told a Senate committee this year." The Journal adds, "The controversy is a reminder that what looks like an odious tax dodge to the Treasury and IRS can look like a well-justified tax break to individuals and communities that benefit from it. The tension comes as the Treasury is under pressure to collect more of the taxes that are legally owed. The IRS estimates about 17% of all taxes owed -- about $290 billion every year -- go unpaid. … In June 2004, the IRS warned companies in what is known as the Economic Development Commission program to avoid manipulating residency and income rules to qualify for the tax break. The Treasury and IRS also began implementing new regulations that significantly lengthened the time a person seeking the tax break had to live in the Virgin Islands. The old rule required a resident to be on the Islands for 122 days a year on average, over three years, to qualify. The new ones required a resident to spend at least 183 days, or roughly six months, every year. … The Treasury and IRS began enforcing the new regulation in earnest in early 2005, and -- to the consternation of some on the Islands -- the IRS asserted that it had authority to go back as far as it wanted without regard to the statute of limitations. IRS spokesman Terry Lemons wouldn't estimate how many audits are in the works, saying only that the Virgin Islands is facing increased scrutiny."

Luxury Skyboxes At College Stadiums Draw Tax Scrutiny. . The Wall Street Journal (12/27, B1, Golden) reports, "This week, college football bowl games dominate television sports programming. But, off screen, little-known tax breaks are spurring the latest scrimmage over commercialism in college athletics. Some academics and legislators, contending that college football's multibillion-dollar building boom detracts from schools' educational mission, are targeting tax laws that treat payments for luxury seating and naming rights as charitable gifts." The Journal continues, "Two congressional committees have looked into the tax breaks in recent months, seeking information from the National Collegiate Athletic Association and hearing testimony from critics. The tax benefits have also figured in a controversy at the University of Michigan over a proposed $226 million stadium renovation. … The tax perquisites 'could be the Achilles' heel of stadium expansions, a way to put the brakes on,' says former University of Michigan President James Duderstadt." The Journal adds, "Over the past decade, many football powerhouses have upgraded their stadiums, and the spending spree shows little sign of abating. Michigan plans to build 83 luxury suites at its stadium, known as 'The Big House.' The University of Texas recently embarked on a $175 million stadium reconstruction, adding 47 luxury suites. Partly as a result of debt payments on capital outlays, colleges' athletic spending is increasing more than three times as fast as their overall spending, according to the NCAA. … Universities typically finance these renovations by issuing tax-exempt bonds. They then make payments on the debt by leasing the new luxury suites and other preferred seating to individuals or corporations. Suites -- usually featuring 16 seats, catered food, televisions and high-speed Internet access -- are priced at $50,000 to $90,000 a year."

DOJ_NMG_0109022

WSJournal Warns GOP Not To Agree To Payroll Tax Hike. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) editorializes, "When these columns warned last month against a tax increase next year to 'save' Social Security, White House officials said we were hooting at phantoms. Well, the more we listen to senior Republicans, the more worried we get." White House spokesman Tony Snow "was…noncommittal on taxes, saying that 'I'm not ruling it up and I'm not ruling it down.' More than one GOP Senator has told us privately he's open to the idea. And no less a political student than Bill Thomas, the soon-to-retire Chairman of House Ways and Means, recently told a public forum that 'I wish I were a bit more comfortable in listening to some of the noises that are currently being made' by his GOP colleagues. Uh, oh." The Journal adds that "what liberals dearly want is to raise the payroll tax cap," which would "eviscerate" President Bush's "most impressive domestic achievement: the pro-growth tax cuts. If the tax cap were eliminated entirely, the President would be signing into law one of the largest tax hikes in US history, or more than $1.3 trillion in new taxes over the first 10 years alone." Also, "a tax increase of any kind with GOP fingerprints would remove the one big political brand advantage that Republicans still have over Democrats."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Fifth Circuit Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw His Nomination. The New York Times and Washington Post run an AP story this morning (12/27) reporting, "Michael Wallace, a Jackson lawyer, sent a letter to President Bush asking that his name be withdrawn from nomination to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Though Mr. Wallace wrote that he believed most senators would consent to his nomination," he said the incoming Judiciary Committee chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, "made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with consensus nominees.'"

Bush's AIDS Initiative Beset By Poor Record Keeping. The Washington Times/AP (12/27, A1, Beamish) reports, "President Bush's ambitious AIDS-fighting program in poor countries has pushed so hard for fast results that basic record keeping and accountability often went by the wayside, making it hard to judge the true success, according to government audits and officials." The AP adds, "Investigators found the three-year-old, $15-billion program has overcounted and undercounted thousands patients it helped or was unable to verify claims of success by local groups that took US money to prevent the spread of disease or care for AIDS victims and their children." The Bush Administration "says it has worked to fix the problems that were found in multiple countries and outlined in several audits reviewed by The Associated Press. 'It's not good enough for the auditors to hear from the mission that we did A, B and C but we can't prove it to you, or there's no documentation to prove that we did it,' said Joe Farinella, a top watchdog inside the U.S. Agency for International Development."

Earmark Moratorium Not Foolproof. USA Today (12/27, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Billions of taxpayer dollars will continue to flow next year to thousands of projects sought by lawmakers, despite Democratic leaders' vow to place a moratorium on so-called congressional earmarks when they take control of Congress next week. … Projects authorized in prior years and not yet completed will be largely unaffected by the moratorium unless federal agencies choose to stop funding them, officials say. In addition, more than 2,600 projects won passage in a 2007 defense appropriations bill before the moratorium was announced." USA Today adds, "Even new projects could win funding if lawmakers persuade agencies to continue paying for them."

The AP (12/27, Taylor) also says the Democrats' move "will hardly stop horse trading in Washington or moves by lawmakers to try to steer taxpayer money back home. Nor will it touch billions of dollars in already budgeted Pentagon earmarks, which go to everything from research into better body armor for overseas troops to finding bone marrow matches to treat leukemia patients." The "temporary ban on earmarks…has been greeted with applause by budget hawks and is seen as a savvy political move. But many in the rank and file are not happy. 'I've had my share of calls and they weren't to wish me a Merry Christmas,' said incoming Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis."

DOJ_NMG_0109023

Democratic Pledge To Engage GOP Could Prove Troublesome For Vulnerable Lawmakers. The New York Times (12/27, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "After chafing for years under what they saw as flagrant Republican abuse of Congressional power and procedures, the incoming [Democratic[majority has promised to restore House and Senate practices to those more closely resembling the textbook version of how a bill becomes law: daylight debate, serious amendments and minority party participation." But "pledges to engage Republicans legislatively carry risks. If Democrats do not follow through or revert to practices they have spent recent years condemning, they are certain to come under attack from watchdog groups and Republicans." Moreover, Republicans "are hoping Democrats stick to their guns and allow the minority a stronger voice on legislation. The opposition leadership said it would take the opportunity to put forward initiatives that could be potentially troublesome for newly elected Democrats in Republican-leaning districts who within months will have to defend their hard-won seats." Republicans "see the ability to force tough votes…as having two potential benefits: It can put vulnerable Democrats on record with positions that might not be popular at home, or it can fracture the untested Democratic majority."

Some Companies Fail To Warn Medicare Part D Recipients Of Drug Plan Changes. The New York Times (12/27, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Some prescription drug plans did not inform Medicare beneficiaries of impending changes in their costs and benefits, as they were required to do, Bush administration officials and Congressional aides said Tuesday." This "could be a serious omission in a program where beneficiaries need accurate information to choose among dozens of competing private plans." Administration "officials have told Congress that they may give these beneficiaries a six-week extension of the open-enrollment period, which ends Sunday. Beneficiaries could use the extra time to compare the options that will be available to them in 2007. … The administration informed Congress of the problem last week. Administration officials said they would consider imposing penalties on companies that did not provide the necessary information to beneficiaries. 'There could be penalties for plans that did not send out the annual notice of change on time,' said Jeff Nelligan, a spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services."

Medicare Part D Said To Hurt Small Pharmacies. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 10, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Millions of Americans face a deadline this Sunday, that's when the open enrollment period ends for Medicare part 'D'. First time users need to sign up and current recipients to want to change their coverage need to do so by New Year's Eve. For many seniors, Medicare part 'D' is perplexing, but for many mom-and-pop pharmacies, it may be deadly." CBS (Andrews) added that seniors "get Medicare coverage through private insurance companies which in turn have lowered the fees and reimbursements they pay" the pharmacies, which cuts into their margins. A "lot of small town pharmacists are selling to big chains like Walgreens or Rite Aide which hire pharmacists to work for them."

Bushes' Gift Exchange Noted. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 3, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The first family did get time to exchange Christmas gifts at Camp David. The President gave the First Lady earrings, the First Lady gave the President a new suit, biking shoes and a Sam Moore CD. The couple also made an online donation to a group that fights malaria in the name of his parents."

Wording Of White House Pool Report Raises Eyebrows. Under the headline "Bush Levitates," the Washington Times (12/27, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column, "Official White House pool report, dated yesterday: 'After a dense morning fog cleared, President George W. Bush lifted off from Camp David with first lady Laura Bush for a weeklong trip to his Texas ranch after spending Christmas at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland.'"

Email About Bush's Medical Center Visit Makes Unusual Apology. The Washington Post (12/27, A17, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush's pre-Christmas visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center caused some unexpected problems, judging from an e-mail alert we received. There were the usual traffic rerouting and parking restrictions, from 8 p.m. on Dec. 21 until 2 p.m. the next day. The e-mail lists 12 such changes likely to frustrate drivers and includes an apology: Traffic will be blocked temporarily around the campus and re-routed if necessary. Sorry for the incontinence during this mission." Adds the Post, "We're sorry, too."

DOJ_NMG_0109024

NYTimes Urges Congress To Freeze Tax Break To Provide Healthcare To Children. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "Thanks to the 2001 tax cut law, over the next four years the federal government will forgo some $30 billion so America's wealthiest taxpayers can claim bigger write-offs for expenses like dependents and mortgage interest. One-third of those tax cuts kicked in this year, with the rest scheduled to take effect in 2008 and 2010. … Over roughly the same period, the government is looking at a $14 billion shortfall in its share of financing for a crucial federal-state program that provides health insurance to poor children, the so-called Schip, or State Children's Health Insurance Program. Without full financing, 1.5 million children will be cut from the program or underserved. … The new Democratically controlled Congress must move quickly to prevent that. When it convenes in the new year, Congress should pass a law to freeze the tax write-offs at 2007 levels. … The children urgently need to win this one, and only the new Congress can help them."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Up Despite "Disappointing" Retail Sales. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "Stocks entered what investors sometimes call the year-end silly season, putting in widespread gains on thin trading activity as investors ignored disappointing retail-sales reports. Some analysts credited a sharp decline in oil prices, the biggest in more than a month. Others said the few influential investors at work in the year's waning days were simply betting that the rally that began in July would last through year's end." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "ended its three-session slump and rebounded 64.41 points, or 0.52%, to 12407.63. It is up 15.8% this year, less than 70 points from the record 12471.32 hit one week ago. … The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.44%, or 6.14 points, to 1416.90, up 13.5% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.51%, or 12.33 points, to 2413.51, ahead 9.4% for the year." NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 6, 0:15, Holt, 9.87M) also noted the stock numbers.

ABC World News (12/26, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In this country, Christmas is over. Frenzy in the stores is not. The first read on the shopping season, spending from Thanksgiving to Christmas was 6.6% higher than last year. Good. But not as good as forecast. So, as stores reopen today, retailers were hoping post-Christmas sales would rescue Christmas sales." ABC (Stone) added, "Shoppers swarmed the stores this crucial holiday weekend. But the final burst of buying didn't make the cut." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 4, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 5, 2:15, Holt, 9.87M) ran similar reports.

President Ford Dead At 93. The AP (12/27, Smith, Cannon) reports this morning, "Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr., who became the 38th president of the United States as a result of some of the most extraordinary events in American history and sought to restore the nation's confidence in the basic institutions of government, died Tuesday. His wife, Betty, reported the death in a statement." President Bush issued a statement about the death shortly after midnight: "President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country. ... [H]e assumed the Presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division. With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the Presidency. … The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader."

Stories in the Los Angeles Times (12/27, Jackson, 850K), Washington Post (12/27, Smith, Cannon, 690K), New York Times (12/27, Naughton, Clymer, 1.16M) and USA Today (Nichols, Vanden Brook, 2.27M), among others, also note the former President's passing.

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/27, 850K) says "Ford will be remembered most for one act: his pardon of Nixon, just one month after the resignation. … The pardon was a mistake, inconsistent with the fundamental principle that everyone, including the president, is equal before the law." The Times adds, "Ford's intention, some believe, was to prove that he could act as his own man and follow his own conscience. Others suggest he was influenced by the ghost of his own father, an abusive man who was devastated when Ford's mother divorced him and who died before the son had a chance to forgive him. … He may have been too nice a guy."

DOJ_NMG_0109025

DC Settles Dispute With Retailer. The Washington Post (12/27, D03, Shin) reports, "USA Discounters, a Virginia Beach retailer, has agreed to limit what it charges District customers paying with credit and to pay $50,000 into a consumer-protection fund to settle allegations that it imposed finance charges that weren't properly disclosed." The Post continues, "The company sells furniture, electronics, computers and other items, largely to customers with poor credit and with a special focus on members of the military. In addition to locations in the District and Lanham, it has eight other stores near Fort Belvoir, the Norfolk naval installation, Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, Fort Benning in Georgia, and Fort Hood in Texas. … The company denies any wrongdoing, said Timothy W. Dorsey, USA Discounters' vice president and general counsel." The Post adds, "The voluntary agreement, reached Thursday with the D.C. attorney general's office, stemmed from agency concerns that the majority of the company's customers, who buy merchandise using the chain's in-house financing program, routinely paid substantially higher markups than did customers using cash. … Customers buying on credit typically pay in installments over a limited period. For example, at the USA Discounters in Northeast Washington yesterday, a recliner upholstered with the Redskins logo was on sale for twice-monthly installments of $36 for 24 months -- for a total of $1,728. A coffee table was being offered for twice-monthly payments of $19 for 24 months, or a total of $912. … Customers can try to negotiate for a reduced price, Dorsey said. Those armed with cash can often get better deals. … But because credit customers regularly paid substantially more, the D.C. attorney general's office alleged that USA Discounters was making customers pay finance charges without telling them. Under the federal Truth in Lending Act, costs imposed on credit customers and not on cash customers are considered finance charges and must be disclosed, the agency said."

2008 Presidential Announcements Seen As "Hardly Meaningless." The New York Times (12/27, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "On Thursday, John Edwards is planning to announce what has been clear to much of the world since the end of the last presidential election: He is running for president in 2008. A similar declaration is expected shortly from Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, followed, in all probability, by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John McCain." The Times adds that "for all the very orchestrated hoopla about to be heaped on American voters over the next few weeks, presidential announcements have become, more often than not, vestigial remnants of the way presidential politics were once conducted (or at least the way they are remembered). Rather than being big moments in which candidates lay down ideological markers and discuss what they would do as president, announcements are more of a pro forma exercise of the obvious. … But if formal announcements hold little drama, they are hardly meaningless. Their timing and staging reflect how presidential politics are changing in the United States in 2008, and offer a glimpse at problems each candidate faces one year before the Iowa caucus. The announcements are an insight into how campaigns are adapting to the pressures of the Internet, the demands of fund-raising, the broad range of avenues for reaching voters and mobilizing supporters, and the particular dynamics of the '08 campaign, crowded with candidates, many of them celebrities."

Schwarzenegger Undergoes Surgery For Broken Leg. The New York Times/AP (12/27, Schou) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's "broken leg was put back together with wires and screws Tuesday, and the 'Terminator' star should make a full recovery, though he will probably be on crutches during his inauguration next week, officials aid." The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Nicholas, 850K) notes that "while the governor was under anesthesia, he relinquished the powers of office to Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante. Schwarzenegger resumed his duties about 10:45 a.m. when his doctors pronounced him fit." The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Nicholas, 617K), among other papers across the nation, also reports the story this morning. ABC World News (12/26, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the governor "will likely be on crutches for his second inauguration that comes next month." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) also ran a brief story on the skiing accident.

DC Marriage Strengthening Program Examined. The Washington Times (12/27, Ward, 88K) reports on Nisa Muhammad's "Wedded Bliss" program, "which will receive $1.3 million in federal money over the next four years, is aimed at helping black couples." Muhammad's program "is one of many that churches and religious groups are using to strengthen marriages and foster new ones. Wedded Bliss is an eight-week class that encourages couples to marry by helping them build intimacy and teaching communication skills."

DOJ_NMG_0109026

Best-Off In US Said To Benefit From Trade Deficit. In his Washington Post column (12/27, D1), Steven Pearlstein says, "With Democrats about to take charge on Capitol Hill, we're going to be hearing a lot about the widening income gap between rich and poor." It would be "an exaggeration, of course, to argue that our large and persistent trade deficit is the major factor in rising inequality. After all, inequality also is rising in countries with trade surpluses. But I think the deficit does help explain why so much of the country's income gains have gone into the pockets of investment bankers, money managers, real estate developers, wealthy families and corporate executives loaded up with stock options. I'm sure these folks believe they are pulling away from the pack because they work harder and create more economic value than the rest of us. But in the coming debate, we need to remember that they are also the lucky beneficiaries of a runaway trade deficit and the bubble-prone economy it has created."

Middle Class "Squeeze" Seen As Byproduct Of Economic Success, Stress. In his Washington Post column (12/27, A19), Robert Samuelson says, "Americans cannot escape these realities. The economy will remain precarious if it remains productive. The new technologies and products we celebrate inflict anxiety by redefining middle-class society. The causes of our success are also the sources of our stress. Of course, many of today's complaints (growing inequality, eroding health insurance) are legitimate and, to some extent, might be corrected. But the remedies -- assuming they didn't make matters worse -- would succeed only temporarily, because they would not erase the basic dilemma. The middle-class 'squeeze' never vanishes."

NYTimes Says Union Rules Protecting Senior Teachers Need To End. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The United States has a long and shameful history of dumping its least effective, least qualified teachers into the schools that serve the neediest children. The No Child Left Behind Act requires the states to end this practice." To do that "districts will need to abandon union rules that basically guarantee senior teachers the right to change schools whenever they want," because "school managers, who are increasingly being held accountable for student performance, need to be able to hire the candidate best suited for the position."

US Signals Support For Ethiopian Move Against Somali Islamists. The AP (12/27, Hassan) reports soldiers of the transitional government of Somalia, "joined by troops from neighboring Ethiopia, advanced toward" the capital of Mogadishu "as Islamic fighters dug in and promised a 'new phase' in the war — a chilling pronouncement from a movement that has threatened suicide attacks." State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos "appeared to endorse Ethiopia's military action, saying it had 'genuine security concerns' about the growth of powerful Islamic militias next door."

The New York Times (12/27, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the US "signaled its support for the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia, calling it a response to 'aggression' by Islamists who have since the summer been consolidating power in the country." But the Ethiopian military presence "has nonetheless been awkward for American officials."

The Financial Times (12/27, England) reports the "bombardment by Ethiopian fighter jets and artillery…marked a dramatic escalation of the conflict in the Horn of Africa nation." The Washington Post (12/27, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports in a front page story, "UN officials warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa." Former US Ambassador David Shinn said, "One wonders how long they can hang on in this situation, because eventually it's going to turn into a nasty guerrilla war, and I don't think the Ethiopians have the stomach to carry on with that kind of campaign."

The New York Times (12/27, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports American officials "have given Ethiopia, one [of] its closest allies in Africa, their tacit approval to do what is necessary to neutralize the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of sheltering terrorists with Al Qaeda. But American officials have asked Ethiopia to avoid strikes that could kill large numbers of civilians, and so far Ethiopia seems to be cooperating."

DOJ_NMG_0109027

The Washington Post (12/27, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports the Ethiopian troops "fought their way closer to the Somali capital of Mogadishu on Tuesday, pushing back militias loyal to the Islamic Courts movement that has until now controlled much of the country and vowed to wage a guerrilla war against Ethiopia lasting 'years and years and years.'" UN officials "warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa." It was "unclear Tuesday whether Ethiopian troops were preparing to invade Mogadishu or merely surround it."

Somalia Conflict Said To Require Diplomatic Solution. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (12/27, A8), Jonathan Stevenson, professor of strategic studies in the Strategic Research Department at the U.S. Naval War College, says, "The primary combatants are Somalia's secular Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which is internationally recognized and politically supported by the U.S., and the Islamist 'Islamic Courts Union' that holds sway on the ground. They are backed militarily by two fierce rivals, Ethiopia and Eritrea, respectively. The military balance appears indeterminate. Ethiopia has deployed 15-20,000 troops in Somalia. Eritrea has provided arms to the Islamic Courts militias and sent only about 2,000 troops to support them; but the Islamic Courts hold more territory than the TFG and have greater indigenous assets and popular support. Even if Somalia does not become a terrorist redoubt, it could become a potent fount of regional geopolitical instability and perhaps the next 'field of jihad' unless diplomatic attention is rallied to rescue the situation."

Administration Position On Somalia Said To Be "Somewhat Confused." The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "Having floundered through a series of failed Somalia strategies, the administration appears to have a somewhat confused view of the latest fighting. Earlier this month it pushed for a U.N. Security Council resolution that called for an end to foreign intervention, the deployment of a peacekeeping force and negotiations between the rival Somali governments. President Bush spoke yesterday with the president of Uganda, which had offered peacekeepers. Yet even while reiterating its call for negotiations, the administration also appears to be supporting the Ethiopian offensive: The State Department said that Ethiopia had a right to defend itself against the Islamists and that its troops were there at the invitation of a legitimate authority, the transitional government. Maybe the Ethiopian forces will crush the Islamists and their al-Qaeda allies and thereby rescue the United States from its predicament. More likely, the administration will have to prepare for much more active U.S. engagement in what is emerging as a hot new front in the war on terrorism."

Iranian Parliament Votes To "Revise" IAEA Relations. The AP (12/27) reports Iran's parliament "voted Wednesday to urge the government to 'revise' ties with the U.N. nuclear agency in a move seen as likely to reduce the country's cooperation with the international atomic authority." The vote came "four days after the U.N. Security Council decided to impose limited sanctions on Iran for its refusal to cease enrichment of uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs." Members of Iran's ruling hierarchy "had repeatedly urged the government to cut ties with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, if the Security Council imposes sanctions." Wednesday's vote "in parliament stopped short of recommending a severance of relations with the IAEA, but it put the Vienna-based agency on notice that business would not be as usual."

Before the vote, the New York Times (12/27, Fathi, 1.16M) reported "two high-level officials said they doubted that Iran would bar nuclear inspectors and drop out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Hard-line politicians "and conservative newspapers in Iran had called for taking those strong actions."

The Financial Times (12/27, Bozorgmehr) reports the UN Security Council vote "was dismissed by President Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday as 'illegal' and 'superficial.'" Iran's policy "seems to be neither to accept the UN demand, nor make any immediate threats to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty or to deliberately upset the oil market." However, "the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who is thought to be the key decision maker, has not yet reacted to the UN resolution."

The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A6, 2.04M) reports President Ahmadinejad "said the U.N. resolution -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany and supported unanimously by the Security Council -- could change Iran's relationship with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog." Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, "said the resolution made his country more 'decisive in realizing our nuclear aims.' He said it would step up enrichment activities."

DOJ_NMG_0109028

Iran Objects To Blair Claims It Poses "Threat" To Region. AFP (12/27) reports Iran "summoned Britain's ambassador in Tehran to its foreign ministry to hear its 'strong objections' to British Prime Minister Tony Blair's claim that the Islamic republic poses a threat to the region." The "official IRNA agency said Geoffrey Adams was told by Ibrahim Rahimpour, the foreign ministry's director general for western European affairs, that Iran expects Britain 'to stop the tirade of allegations' against it." Rahimpour "also criticised Britain for misrepresenting Iran's civilian nuclear program, after it co-sponsored a UN Security Council resolution last Saturday that imposed sanctions on Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes."

WSJournal Says State Department Backing For UN Resolution Was "Unenthusiastic." The Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Among the least surprising news coming out of the holiday weekend is that Iran denounced even the U.N. Security Council's tepid sanctions resolution against its nuclear weapons program. More surprising -- and encouraging -- is that the U.S. State Department also seems unenthusiastic." The "charade was even more than the State Department could bear to endorse wholeheartedly. Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's right-hand man, praised the resolution for isolating Iran but added that 'We don't think this resolution is enough in itself.' And he suggested that the U.S. would now work to form coalitions outside of the U.N. to add pressure on Tehran. It's about time."

Assad May Be Seeking Closer Ties With West. The Washington Times (12/27, Athanasiadis, 88K) reports, "Recent visits by Syrian President Bashar Assad to US-allied Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are prompting speculation that Syria is seeking to leave the Iranian orbit and pursue closer ties with the West." Such a move "would fulfill a major recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, which suggested it might be possible through diplomacy to pry Syria away from Iran." In "another apparent overture yesterday, Mr. Assad told visiting Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, that he was willing to host a conference where all the factions of Iraq could seek a consensus on the country's future."

In a USA Today letter to the editor (12/27), Syrian Ambassador Imad Moustapha says, "It is always refreshing to hear moderate, wise voices from the United States calling for what diplomacy is really about: dialogue and engagement ('A two-way street with Syria,' The Forum, Dec. 20). Syria has repeatedly called upon this Administration to abandon its policies toward Syria and work together toward a more constructive policy in the Middle East. Former secretaries of State Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and James Baker — who, unlike Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had a direct working relationship with Syria — consider their engagement with Syria as one that served U.S. national interests. Syria is ready and willing to engage, but this needs courage and vision from the other side."

Israel Approves New West Bank Settlement Despite Vow To US. The AP (12/27, Nessman) reports officials said Israel "has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip…breaking a promise to the US to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories." Construction in the northern West Bank town of Maskiot "began months ago, but the project only received final approval from the Defense Ministry last week, said Dubi Tal, head of the Jordan Valley regional council." Geoff Anisman, a spokesman for the US Embassy in Tel Aviv, said, "The US view on settlements remains unchanged." The Washington Post (12/27, A10, 690K) runs a short version of the AP story.

The New York Times (12/27, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the move prompted "Palestinian anger and American concern. The announcement, by the Defense Ministry and settler groups, seemed to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who had offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas." In an editorial, the New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) says that "the idea of a comprehensive peace between Israelis and Palestinians seems a distant dream. Yet it represents the best long-term assurance of Israel's survival as a secure Jewish democracy at peace with its Arab neighbors. Every new settlement planted on the West Bank creates a needless obstacle to the realization of that dream."

Mubarak Says New Laws Will Increase Democracy In Egypt. The Washington Post/AP (12/27, A15) reports, "President Hosni Mubarak said Tuesday that laws to be passed in 2007 would improve democracy and abolish Egypt's 25-year state of emergency, but rights activists said they doubted the long-serving leader would liberalize the country." Mubarak "asked lawmakers to amend 34 articles in the Egyptian constitution to 'consecrate the people's sovereignty as a source of power and give parliament more authority to monitor the government.'"

DOJ_NMG_0109029

South Korean Officials Says US Offered To Remove North From Terror List. The AP (12/27) reports South Korea's main nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, said the US "offered to remove North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if the communist regime dismantles its atomic weapons program." Chun said the "proposal was just one of the incentives the US spelled out last week at six-nation nuclear disarmament talks with the North, along with offers of security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations." US diplomats "have declined to discuss specifics of their talks with the North Koreans, and State Department spokeswoman Amanda Rogers-Harper would not confirm Chun's report."

Mystery Novel Set In North Korea Compared To "Gorky Park." The Washington Post (12/27, A17, Kessler, 690K) reports "A Corpse in the Koryo," by James Church, "is a crackling good mystery novel, filled with unusual characters involved in a complex plot that keeps you guessing to the end. It has received rave reviews -- as a mystery novel." But the book "has also caused a stir among Asia specialists because it offers an unusually nuanced and detailed portrait of one of the most closed societies on Earth -- North Korea. Much like Martin Cruz Smith's novel 'Gorky Park,' which depicted life in the Soviet Union in the early 1980s through the eyes of police inspector, 'A Corpse on the Koryo' provides a vivid window into a mysterious country through the perspective of its primary character -- Inspector O."

Sudan May Be Willing To Accept UN Force In Darfur. The Washington Post (12/27, A8, Linzer, 690K) reports Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "has suggested that he would be willing to accept a peacekeeping force with United Nations troops in Darfur, where his counterinsurgency campaign has left hundreds of thousands of civilians dead and millions homeless." Under "mounting pressure from the Bush administration to respond to UN plans for a cease-fire, Bashir appeared to accept some of Secretary General Kofi Annan's proposals in a letter sent over the weekend."

US Reaching Out To Leftist Critics In Latin America. McClatchy (12/27, Bachelet) reports the Bush Administration has "refused to talk to foes such as Iran, North Korea and Cuba, but it has no such qualms about some of its sternest critics in Latin America, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." Less than "two weeks after Chavez won re-election earlier this month, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas met with the Venezuelan foreign minister to ease tensions between the two countries." Chavez "responded by attacking U.S. counter-drug efforts, so it's unclear if the charm offensive will work. But the move is part of a broader effort by U.S. officials to court leftist leaders who just weeks ago were warily viewed as pro-Chavez populists. This includes President-elects Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, who recently heralded the rise of a socialist Latin America."

Surgeon Says Castro Doesn't Have Cancer. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Marx, 617K) reports, "In the first independent diagnosis of Fidel Castro, a prominent Spanish surgeon said Tuesday the ailing 80-year-old leader does not have cancer and is recuperating slowly from intestinal surgery." Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido "traveled to Havana last Thursday to examine Castro at the request of Cuban authorities. Garcia Sabrido has returned to Madrid, where he told reporters that Castro's condition is stable and he does not require additional surgery." But Garcia Sabrido "declined to clarify what ailment Castro is suffering from. Cuban officials have said Castro's health condition is a state secret, and his Cuban doctors reportedly are sequestered." Similar stories appear in today's New York Times (12/27, McKinley, 1.16M), while the Washington Times and Washington Post run the same AP report on Castro's health (12/27, Giles).

ABC World News (12/26, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The doctor says Castro is recovering from intestinal surgery and is eager to get back to work. Castro has not been seen in public since July, which has sparked speculation about his health and his future." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 6, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted the doctor "said Castro is in stable condition."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Fawthrop, 59K) analyzes the prospects for a post-Castro Cuba, where "experts have ruled out any dramatic lurch toward a liberal market economy that might undermine the island nation's heritage as the persistent holdout of traditional Communist policies. More relaxed social attitudes may also evolve gradually. Still, no one doubts that change is afoot."

DOJ_NMG_0109030

Russia Relies On UN "Tantrum" As Diplomatic Weapon. The Washington Post (12/27, A10, Lynch, 690K) reports Russia has "brandished a new weapon in its diplomatic arsenal: the Security Council tantrum." Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin "barged out of the U.N. chamber Dec. 11, canceling a crucial meeting on Iran's nuclear program. Asked to explain why the 15-nation council's major powers would not be able to address the Iranian nuclear crisis, Churkin said: 'Because. Because I said so.'" The Post adds Churkin's "outburst reflected anger over a U.S. decision to raise concern about political developments in Belarus, a Russian ally that has gained international condemnation for its repressive policies. But it also echoed a classic Soviet practice at the United Nations dating back to 1945, when Soviet strongman Joseph Stalin's envoy, Andrei Gromyko, also used bluster to exact political concessions, threatening to pull out of the new organization unless the Security Council veto was expanded."

China Seeks To Curb Vehicle Production Rate. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A2, Fairclough, 2.04M) reports China's "economic planners are waving a yellow flag at the nation's auto industry, warning that growth in car makers' production capacity is outstripping demand and calling for limits on further expansion." Passenger car sales "have been increasing at a torrid rate, making China the world's second-largest vehicle market by unit sales after the U.S. But car companies, rushing to cash in on the growth, have been adding assembly lines at an even faster rate, the planners said." The National Development and Reform Commission, "which sets China's industrial policy, said overcapacity is threatening the auto industry's health and laid out guidelines to rein in growth."

China's Illegal Power Plants, Coal Mines Challenge Beijing's Authority. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, Oster, 2.04M) reports that illegally-built power plants in China "have had unintended -- and detrimental -- consequences. By eschewing even basic environmental safeguards, they stand out as polluters even in an industry that is one of China's leading sources of emissions, officials say. They also have driven up the demand for and price of coal, the country's most abundant source of fuel. That, in turn, has spawned thousands of illegal coal mines that have contributed to more than 4,000 coal-mining deaths in China this year." The Journal adds, "One fifth of the power plants in China are illegal, according to government estimates -- enough to light up all of the U.K. While the electricity they supply is essential to power China's growth, the uncontrolled manner in which they are multiplying, often under the protection of local authorities, poses a challenge to Beijing's authority and its grip on energy policy."

Blair Flight Missed Runway Exit. The Washington Post/AP (12/27, A13) reports a commercial jet "carrying British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his family missed a runway exit and struck some lights after landing at Miami International Airport on Tuesday. The plane was not damaged and no injures were reported, officials said." British Airways Flight 209 "from London ran over a couple of airfield lights after landing around 6:15 p.m., but it did not leave the pavement and it taxied to the gate under its own power, airport spokesman Marc Henderson said."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Gerald Ford Dies At 93."
"Vendor's Reefer Sadness."
"Hezbollah Rises From Ruins Of Its Beirut home."
"Iraqi Court Upholds Death For Hussein."
"Democrats Will Soon Get A Say On Iraq."
"Accident Is A Bad Break For Gov.'s Privacy."

USA Today:

"More Officials In Midwest, South Adding Spanish Lessons To Training."
"Soul (And Rap And Funk) Loses 'Godfather'."
"Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s."
"Nuclear Cases."

New York Times:

"Gerald R. Ford, 38th U.S. President, Dies."
"Iraqi Court Says Hussein Must Die Within 30 Days."
"Iran Is Seeking More Influence In Afghanistan."
"S.E.C. Changes Reporting Rule On Bosses' Pay."
"Strategy, Not Drama, in 'I Intend To Run In '08'."
"As Minds Age, What's Next? Brain Calisthenics."

DOJ_NMG_0109031

Washington Post:
"Gerald R. Ford, 93, Dies; Led In Watergate's Wake."
"Iraqi Court Upholds Hussein's Sentence."
"Williams Leaves A Legacy Of Contrasts."
"7 U.S. Troops Added To Rising Toll In Iraq."
"Ethiopians Closing In On Capital of Somalia."
"U.S. Wants Polar Bears Listed As Threatened."
"Immigrants' Jobs Vanish With Housing Slowdown."

Washington Times:
"Selling Couples On Marriage."
"Biden To Fight Troop Surge."
"Gerald Ford Dies At 93."
"Saddam To be Hanged Within 39 Days."
"Baltimore Homicides Rises DC Likely To Record Drop."
"AIDS Program Loses Track OF Funds, Results."
"Assad Inspires 'Flip' Theories."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ford Dies."
"Lutz: Fuel Rules Could Doom US SUV, Truck Sales."
"Ford's Mulally Toyota Exec Talk In Japan."
"Michigan Micro-Districts Put Up A Fight To Survive."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Ex-President Ford Dies."
"Saddam Hanging Could Be 'Any Day'."
"Mars Rovers Mission Rolls On."
"James Brown's Funeral Expected To Draw Thousands."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Saddam's Execution; Pipeline Explosion; Retail Sales; Denver Airport Reopens; Tsunami Money; Castro's Health; Schwarzenegger Recovering; New Gadgets; People OF The Year.
CBS: Saddam's Execution; Biden-Iraq; First Family's Christmas; Retail Sales; Florida Tornados; Castro's Health; Schwarzenegger Recovering; Heartburn Medication Risks; Improving Schools-Cincinnati; Medicare Part 'D'; Mainstream Opera.
NBC: Saddam's Execution; Way Forward-Iraq; Pipeline Explosion-Nigeria; Tsunami Remembered; Retail Sales; Stock Market; FDA Report-Cloning; Caring For The Injured; Heartburn Medication Risks; Illegal Immigration Debate; James Brown Obit.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Crawford, Texas.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: IRAQ _ 11 a.m. The Center for American Progress holds a telephone briefing on Iraq, with former Assistant Defense Secretary Lawrence Korb and Brian Katulis, both of the center. Notes: Callin number: 800-862-9098.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
US Reassures Allies "Extraordinary Renditions" Have Ended 3
Rights Groups Concerned About Fingerprint Database 3
Saudis Release 18 Former Guantánamo Detainees 3

Homeland Response:
Senate Report Dismisses Able Danger Concerns 3
Experts Say Modified Backscatter Machines Will Be Less Effective 4
Hope Still Seen For New Orleans 4

War News:
Bush To Meet With National Security Team To Consider Iraq Options 4
Iraqi High Court Affirms Saddam's Death Sentence 6
US Iraq War Dead Exceeds Those Killed On 9/11 6
British Demolition Of Basra Police Station Draws Fallout 7
Troops In Ramadi Face Increasingly Hostile Population 7
Escaped Iraqi Minister Emerges In Jordan 7
Military Links Iranians Captured In Baghdad To Insurgency 7
Iran Seeking To Project Influence In Afghanistan 7
Growing Afghan Heroin Poppy Yield Fuel's US Consumption 8
NATO Urged To Court Afghani Hearts And Minds 8
Pentagon Seeks To Make Military More Muslim-Friendly 8

DOJ:
DOJ Attorneys May Receive Comp Time 8
Interim Arkansas US Attorney Wants To Focus On Job, Not Appointment Process 8

Corporate Scandals:
Faked Documents May Be Focus Of Apple Case 9
CNET To Pay Former COO $750,000, Reprice Options 9
More Stock Options Prosecutions Expected Next Year 10
SEC Launches Probe Of UnitedHealth Options Practices 10
Former FBI Chief Freeh To Monitor DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe 11
SEC To Amend Rules On Executive Compensation Disclosure. 11

Criminal Law:
Police Groups Urge Congress To Increase Spending On Law Enforcement 12
Canadian Gold Medal Winner Detained In US On Child Abduction Charge 12
Pittsburgh ID Thief Charged With Forging Leniency Letter 12
Kansas Attorney General To Seek Renewal Of Abortion Provider Charges 12
Houston Police Investigating International Flight Luggage Dumped In Trash Bin 12
Security Experts Predict Worsening Cyber Crime In 2007 13
Suburban Houston Rapist Preys On Men 13
Slow Pace Of Virginia's DNA Review Criticized 13
Law Requires Disinterment Of Murderer Buried At Arlington Cemetery 14
Figure In Alaskan Land-Use Dispute Pleads To Incest Charges 14
WPost Urges Broad Death Penalty Debate In Maryland 14

Civil Law:
FBI Leak Case Files Missing 15
Court Approves Creditor Vote On Seracare Bankruptcy Plan 15
Small Businesses Fight Federal Contracting Rules 15

Civil Rights:
Courts Seek Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Defendants 16

Antitrust:
Experts Say Delta's Antitrust Objections May Be Overstated 16
McClatchy Sells Flagship Star Tribune To Private Equity Group 16
Private Equity Council To Enter Lobbying Arena 17
Reliance Prepares For Bid From Hutchison Essar 17

Environment:
House Democrats Seek To Redistribute Oil Money To Conservation Efforts 18
Administration Will Propose Listing Polar Bears As Threatened. 18
Anadarko Sells Two Natural-Gas Fields For $1.6 Billion 18
Nature Conservancy Renting Land From Some Farmers To Protect Species 18
NYTimes Argues For Cutting Livestock Production To Avoid Global Warming 19
FDA Praised For Stance On Animal Cloning 19

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Virginia Drug Ring Suspected Of Selling $8 Million In Cocaine, 11 Charged 19
Mexico-Based Drug Ring Suspects To Appear In Court 19
Gift Cards Used As "Virtual Currency" For Drug Deals 19

Report: Supplies Of Potent Heroin From Afghanistan Increasing In US 19
Security Measures At Virginia Federal Courthouse Come Under Fire 20

Immigration:

Dallas Suburb Sued Over Ban On Renting To Illegal Aliens..... 20

Tax:

US Virgin Islands Decries IRS Tax Crackdown..... 21
Luxury Skyboxes At College Stadiums Draw Tax Scrutiny..... 22
WSJournal Warns GOP Not To Agree To Payroll Tax Hike 22

Congress-Administration:

Fifth Circuit Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw His Nomination .. 22
Bush's AIDS Initiative Beset By Poor Record Keeping 22
Earmark Moratorium Not Foolproof 23
Democratic Pledge To Engage GOP Could Prove Troublesome For Vulnerable Lawmakers..... 23
Some Companies Fail To Warn Medicare Part D Recipients Of Drug Plan Changes 23
Bushes' Gift Exchange Noted 23
Email About Bush's Medical Center Visit Makes Unusual Apology 24
NYTimes Urges Congress To Freeze Tax Break To Provide Healthcare To Children 24

Other News:

Stocks Up Despite "Disappointing" Retail Sales..... 24
President Ford Dead At 93 24
DC Settles Dispute With Retailer 25
2008 Presidential Announcements Seen As "Hardly Meaningless."..... 25
Schwarzenegger Undergoes Surgery For Broken Leg 25
DC Marriage Strengthening Program Examined 25
Best-Off In US Said To Benefit From Trade Deficit..... 26
Middle Class "Squeeze" Seen As Byproduct Of Economic Success, Stress 26
NYTimes Says Union Rules Protecting Senior Teachers Need To End 26
US Signals Support For Ethiopian Move Against Somali Islamists 26
Iranian Parliament Votes To "Revise" IAEA Relations..... 27
Assad May Be Seeking Closer Ties With West..... 27
Israel Approves New West Bank Settlement Despite Vow To US28
Mubarak Says New Laws Will Increase Democracy In Egypt..... 28
South Korean Officials Says US Offered To Remove North From Terror List..... 28
Sudan May Be Willing To Accept UN Force In Darfur..... 28
US Reaching Out To Leftist Critics In Latin America..... 28
Surgeon Says Castro Doesn't Have Cancer 29
Russia Relies On UN "Tantrum" As Diplomatic Weapon 29
China Seeks To Curb Vehicle Production Rate..... 29
Blair Flight Missed Runway Exit..... 29

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 30

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 30

DOJ_NMG_0109034

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Reassures Allies "Extraordinary Renditions" Have Ended. The Financial Times (12/27, Dinmore) reports the US is "telling its overseas allies that it has stopped 'extraordinary renditions' and needs their help to empty Guantánamo's prison cells. But human rights groups dispute this assertion and a question mark hangs over 200 'war on terror' detainees who could be held indefinitely without trial." But the Administration's "response is seen as confused and inadequate. Analysts attribute this to internal divisions over how far to roll back controversial counter-terrorism practices - including torture, secret prisons, detention without trial, and renditions - as the price for rekindling transatlantic relations." European delegations "have been assured that 'extraordinary renditions' ended, or mostly ended, in 2003. US officials note that the lawsuits brought against the US by former detainees relate to events in 2003 or earlier, when even Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has admitted that 'mistakes' happened." Visiting Europeans "have been told that the US reserves the right to carry out renditions, but - as Ms Rice declared in a major statement a year ago - it would respect the sovereignty of other countries and would not send detainees to countries where the US believed they might be tortured." Diplomats say Secretary Rice "has been influential in advocating change to detention policies she sees as damaging relations with allies, while Dick Cheney, vice-president, and David Addington, his chief of staff, are seen as obstacles."

Rights Groups Concerned About Fingerprint Database. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Richey) reports, "The US government is building a massive database designed to identify individual terror suspects from fingerprints on objects such as a tea glass in an Iraqi apartment or a shell casing in an abandoned Al Qaeda training camp." The Monitor continues, "The database is being created in part by forensic specialists searching for and preserving evidence overseas. They are collecting unidentified latent fingerprints in places once occupied by Al Qaeda and other suspected terrorists. … The information is feeding into a computerized system designed to match a name with an unidentified fingerprint." The Monitor adds, "Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff calls the program 'a quantum step forward in security.' … '(It) gives us the ability to identify the unknown, unidentified terrorist,' he said in a recent speech. 'It also creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp, or building a bomb in a safe house, or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield.'" The Monitor notes, "Not everyone sees the creation of such a database as progress. Privacy advocates and civil libertarians say it could lead to a dangerous erosion of American rights. Privacy advocates voice concern .. 'Our assessment of these systems is that many that are undertaken with a goal of identifying terrorists eventually become systems of mass surveillance directed toward the American public,' says Marc Rotenberg, president of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington."

DHS Investigating Contractor's Missing Handguns. The Washington Post (12/27, A2, Lengel, 690K) reports DHS said Tuesday "that it is investigating how four handguns recently went missing from its headquarters in Northwest Washington." Spokesman Jarrod Agen said the guns "belonged to Paragon Systems of Chantilly, which provides security for the department's facility on Nebraska Avenue NW," and noted that they "do not belong to DHS nor are they under the control of DHS."

Saudis Release 18 Former Guantánamo Detainees. The AP (12/27) reports, "The Saudi government said Tuesday it had released 18 men who were detained after returning to their homeland from the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay. The Saudis, who returned to the kingdom in May and June, were released after they finished their sentences, Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki said." The AP notes, "Saudi officials have said former Guantanamo inmates are taken into custody on their return to investigate whether they have any connections to Islamic militant groups."

DOD Official Defends Guantánamo Courthouse. The Los Angeles Times (12/26, Williams, 850K) reports on the planned construction of "a $125-million legal complex" at the detention facility at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, noting that "although the Pentagon estimates that no more than 80 of the 400 or so terrorism detainees here will ever be tried, …Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, insists the legal facility is vital to bringing terrorism suspects to justice. Even with back-to-back trials, he said, it would take over a decade to prosecute an expected 60 to 80 detainees using one courtroom. 'We're fiscal conservatives by definition. We're not building the Taj Mahal here, Stimson said." The Times notes that the ACLU is pushing Congress to "deny funding" to the complex.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Senate Report Dismisses Able Danger Concerns. The AP (12/27, Flaherty) reports, "A lengthy Senate investigation has debunked charges by a Republican congressman that military analysts identified Mohamad Atta and other Sept. 11 hijackers before the attacks, according to a committee aide familiar with the report." The AP continues, "In a letter to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sens. Pat Roberts and John D. Rockefeller dismissed suggestions by Rep. Curt Weldon that defense analysts ignored analysis that could have prevented the attacks. Roberts, a Republican, is outgoing chairman and Rockefeller is the senior Democrat who will assume the chairmanship Jan. 4 month when the new Congress convenes. … They concluded 'there was no evidence Mohamad Atta or any hijackers were identified prior to 9/11,' said the committee aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the aide was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject." The AP adds, "An internal Defense Department assessment already had dismissed Weldon's charges as unfounded. But the letter from Roberts and Rockefeller is the first rejection from Capitol Hill. The letter was obtained and first reported Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times. … Weldon, a 10-term Republican who lost his seat in the Nov. 7 election, repeatedly contended a secret military unit called 'Able Danger' searched large amounts of data to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks. … In September, the Pentagon's inspector general found some employees recalled seeing an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist before the attacks. But the report said those accounts 'varied significantly' and witnesses were inconsistent at times in their statements."

DOJ_NMG_0109035

Experts Say Modified Backscatter Machines Will Be Less Effective. USA Today (12/27, Frank, 2.27M) reports the "controversial" backscatter X-ray machines to be tested at a US airport for the first time starting next month have been modified in order to "quiet critics such as the American Civil Liberties Union who have helped block its use in airports by saying the vivid images seen by screeners invade passenger privacy. The altered images will show only cartoon-like black-and-white outlines of each passenger. But the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is facing questions from experts who say the agency has weakened the effectiveness of the low-intensity X-rays." Spokeswoman Ellen Howe said that the agency is not "endorsing this particular technology, we're testing it."

Hope Still Seen For New Orleans. In a Washington Post op-ed (12/27, A19), Duke University Professor William Chafe says, "Nearly 16 months after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans remains devastated. In the Lower Ninth Ward (primarily black and poor), mid-city (mixed-race and middle class) and Lakeside (richer and whiter), houses are boarded up and ruined; shattered windows reveal rooms full of debris; perhaps one in 10 places has a FEMA trailer parked outside, as a few returning residents desperately try to reclaim what they have lost. Thousands of small businesses have disappeared. Even in the French Quarter, which was left largely intact after Katrina, shopkeepers despair of being able to survive given the decline in tourism." But in this "season that celebrates the birth of a child in what today would be called a homeless shelter, a remarkable resiliency of spirit remains in New Orleans. Yes, only half the population there in August 2005 has returned. The suicide rate has increased 300 percent, and less than half of the schools and hospitals that existed 16 months ago are functioning. But energy, engagement and love persist, creating tiny ripples of hope, from thousands of individual acts of courage."

WAR NEWS:

Bush To Meet With National Security Team To Consider Iraq Options. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 2, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "President Bush plans a working vacation while in Crawford this week. He has called his national security team to Texas to discuss the much-anticipated speech on the way forward in Iraq." NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 2, 2:05, O'Donnell, 9.87M) said the President "will be spending some time working on retooling his war strategy, and advisors say he's being deliberate, he's asking about options and the consequences, including adding more US troops. And today, a senior military official says that the deployment orders are ready to go, just needing another signature for another brigade. That would be 3,500 more soldiers from the 82nd Airborne who would go to Kuwait with the possibility of going into Iraq." The AP (12/27, Baldor) notes Defense Secretary Robert Gates has signed the orders that "will send the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday. … The 82nd Airborne unit…will replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which had served as the reserve force based in Kuwait but has been deployed into Iraq."

The AP (12/27, Riechmann) reports that at the Pentagon, officials said Gates "isn't likely to offer a single solution but, rather, a broad set of recommendations for changing the course in Iraq." Bush will "host a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at the ranch, but is not expected to make any final decision on what he says will be a new way forward in Iraq." Secretary Rice is expected to attend Thursday's meeting, along with Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and NSA Stephen Hadley.

Another AP story (12/27, Ben Feller) reports, "Determined not to be rushed…Bush has spent weeks figuring out a new war plan in Iraq. All the while, the American public's expectations have been headed in one direction -- up. Anticipation is high not just because people are weary of war, but also because of the way Bush has gone about deciding his next move." The AP adds, "Saddled with a reputation for stubbornness, Bush has gone the other direction. He has made a visible effort to seek advice -- from the military, diplomats, academics, retired generals, a special study commission, Iraqi officials, Republican leaders, even Democrats he once ridiculed. By the time he announces his Iraq plan in January, roughly two months will have passed since a humbling election for Republicans brought a promise of a 'new way forward.'" The AP adds, "There might as well be a drum roll."

DOJ_NMG_0109036

State Department To Report On Bush's Abandoned "Eight Pillars" Policy. The Washington Post (12/26, Kessler, 690K) reports that last year Bush "announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around 'eight pillars' of US policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure." But "never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on." Every Wednesday, the State Department issues "a 30-page public report that details exactly how the US government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan." The Post adds, "In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met."

Biden's Opposition To "Surge" Option Seen As Harbinger Of Coming Debate. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Levey, 850K) reports, "After years of playing a marginal role in the Iraq war, congressional Democrats plan to move quickly in January to assert more control and undercut any White House effort to increase troop levels." As Bush "prepares to outline his own plan for Iraq in a major speech in the next few weeks, Democratic leaders will counter with weeks of oversight hearings, summoning military officers, administration officials and foreign policy experts to Capitol Hill." The Democratic plans "put Congress on a collision course with Bush over the direction of the nearly 4-year-old war. And they signal a new phase in a war that has been directed almost exclusively by the White House with little dissent from the Republican-controlled Capitol." Sen. Joseph R. Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "said Tuesday that he intends to call key administration officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to testify at a series of hearings."

The Washington Post (12/27, A5, Pincus, 690K) reports, "Biden said that his committee will begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and that if Bush has not released his plan by then, he might start with experts and 'those proposing alternatives' to what the president may do." Rice "has agreed to appear, but not until after Bush has presented his new strategy to the nation. Gates will be asked to appear." Biden "said he does not plan to call former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but he added: 'That's not something that's totally off the table.'"

Under the headline "Biden Previews Democrats' Tack Against Troop Plan," the Wall Street Journal (12/27, Dreazen, 2.04M) says "the tensions between the two parties over the war seem certain to escalate if the Bush administration goes through with its tentative plan to send as many as 20,000 new US forces to Iraq." White House officials "say such a troop 'surge' almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's planned speech to the country early next year to lay out a new strategy for fighting the war."

The New York Times (12/27, Cooper, 1.16M) reports that as Bush "flew to his Texas ranch on Tuesday, a spokesman for the National Security Council urged the senator to wait for Mr. Bush to present his new Iraq policy next month before passing judgment. 'President Bush will talk soon to our troops, the American people and Iraqis about a new way forward for Iraq that will lead to a democratic, unified country that can govern, defend and sustain itself,' said Gordon Johndroe, the council spokesman." The Times adds, "The date has not been scheduled, but administration officials said it would be before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23. … One plan under consideration is to send an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq in a bid to restore order."

The Washington Times (12/27, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Republicans "so far seem divided on a surge, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona pushing the idea and Foreign Relations Committee member Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota saying he can't support sending more troops."

The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 2, 2:00, Mitchell, 7.66M) also reported that Biden "laid down some markers for the President." CBS (Assuras) added, "During a conference call…Biden told us that sending more troops to Iraq would be the absolute wrong strategy, expanding actually on comment he is made earlier on CBS." Biden: "We should be drawing down troops, putting pressure on the Iraqi government to settle their sectarian differences rather than putting more troops in and acting as apartheid cops. … I'm saying what the Baker commission said, start a drawdown. Make it clear to them by the end of next year we're not going to be there to save them. They have got to begin to make hard political decisions. We can't solve it for them with 30,000 more troops." CBS also reported that "on that conference call, Russ, Senator Biden told us that he intends to run for president in 2008."

The Financial Times (12/27, Washington) reports Biden, "one of the leading Democratic critics of US policy in Iraq, joins Tom Vilsack, governor of Iowa, and Dennis Kucinich, the Ohio congressman who ran unsuccessfully in 2004, as the party's only declared candidates for the 2008 race. 'It is my intention to seek the [Democratic] nomination, and it's my intention sometime in the month of January to set up the appropriate mechanism to be able to raise money for that purpose,' Mr Biden said at the end of a conference call about Iraq policy."

DOJ_NMG_0109037

The AP (12/27, Flaherty) says Biden "took advantage of a quiet holiday week to draw attention to his own proposal for Iraq, which includes beginning a drawdown of U.S. forces and finding a political settlement among the various ethnic factions there."

More Commentary On Bush's Options. Jack Keane, a retired Army general, and Frederick W. Kagan, a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, write in the Washington Post (12/26, A19, 690K), "Reports on the Bush administration's efforts to craft a new strategy in Iraq often use the term 'surge' but rarely define it. … We need to cut through the confusion. Bringing security to Baghdad -- the essential precondition for political compromise, national reconciliation and economic development -- is possible only with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops lasting 18 months or so. Any other option is likely to fail. … The only 'surge' option that makes sense is both long and large."

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (12/26, A19, 690K), "Watching…Bush in recent weeks has become a grim kind of reality TV show. In almost every news conference, speech and photo opportunity, the topic is the same: what to do about the grinding war in Iraq. Bush has let the facade crack open -- admitting that his strategy for victory isn't working -- but then he struggles to rebuild it with new words of confidence. The stress of the job -- so well hidden for much of the past six years -- has begun to show on Bush's face." He "often looks burdened, distracted, haunted by a question that has no good answer."

Iraqi High Court Affirms Saddam's Death Sentence. The AP (12/27, Torchia) reports Iraq's "highest court rejected Saddam Hussein's appeal Tuesday and said the former dictator must be hanged within 30 days for ordering the killing of scores of Shiite Muslims in 1982." The decision "came on a particularly bloody day in Baghdad, where at least 54 Iraqis died in bombings and police discovered 49 apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. Separately, the US military announced the deaths of seven American soldiers."

The story on Saddam's execution was the lead on each of the networks last night. ABC World News (12/26, lead story, 3:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The ruling means Hussein could be sent to the gallows any day now, as soon as tomorrow." The CBS Evening News (12/26, lead story, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Some experts warn of stepped up attacks now that an appeals court has ruled Saddam must hang within a matter of weeks." A White House spokesman "said this was a great day for the Iraqi people saying Saddam Hussein has received the due process that he denied the Iraqi people for so long." NBC Nightly News (12/26, lead story, 3:15, Holt, 9.87M) reported, "Hussein, the so-called butcher of Baghdad, is out of options. He's lost his final appeal and is to be executed by hanging less than a month from now."

The New York Times (12/27, A1, Glanz, 1.16M) reports on its front page the court "ruled that the man whose brutal reign began in 1979 and ended with the American-led invasion in 2003 must go to the gallows within 30 days." No "further appeals are possible, and" Saddam's "final legal recourse appears to be a clause in the Iraqi Constitution stating that the Iraqi president must approve all death sentences." In a front page article, the Washington Post (12/27, A1, Raghavan, Trejos, 690K) also reports officials "in the Iraqi government have already begun to address the logistics and security measures for the execution, possibly a closed and secret one, according to sources familiar with the preparations." USA Today (12/27, Jervis, 2.27M) and the Los Angeles Times (12/27, Zavis, Hennessy-Fiske, 850K) run similar reports.

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (12/27, A8, 2.04M) writes, "A case can be made that the cause of justice would be most fully served if Saddam were spared the punishment he meted so promiscuously to others. But that determination belongs to the Iraqi people and their elected leaders, so many of whom participated in the trial as victims or the kin of victims. The day Saddam dies will be their judgment day."

US Iraq War Dead Exceeds Those Killed On 9/11. The AP (12/27, McShane), in an article published in over 100 papers and websites, reports that "according to a count by The Associated Press," the number of US military personnel killed in the war in Iraq climbed to "at least 2,977—four more than the number killed" on September 11, 2001, with a military announcement of "the deaths of six more American soldiers" on Christmas. .

December Toll Rises To 87. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Trejos, 690K) reports on the announcement by military officials that "seven more American service members have been killed in Iraq," making December, during which 87 troops have died so far, "the second deadliest month of the year for troops." 105 service members were killed in October. "Military officials and analysts have attributed the rise in US casualties in recent months to the larger number and greater visibility of American troops in Baghdad, plus the intensity of the Sunni insurgency in Anbar."

The AP (12/27, Frayer), in an article published in over 60 papers and websites, adds that the seven troops killed came amid "a string of car bombs and other blasts" in Baghdad. The AP details the explosions' toll on the civilian population, and notes that "a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, …Sunni Islam's holiest shrine in Baghdad, and a regular target of Shiite mortar teams." The piece notes the eclipse of the 9/11 death toll, along with Bush's assertions that "the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking Saddam's ouster in Iraq, Bush has said."

DOJ_NMG_0109038

The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Zavis, 850K) adds, "Three car bombs exploded within minutes at a west Baghdad intersection jammed with holiday shoppers, one of a series of attacks reported Tuesday that killed at least 97 Iraqis and injured scores. Three U.S. soldiers also died when a roadside bomb exploded as they were removing explosive devices from a route northwest of the capital, the command said. … Witnesses said the area was full of shoppers preparing for the Eid Athar holiday, which takes place over the New Year's period."

British Demolition Of Basra Police Station Draws Fallout. The Financial Times (12/27, Negus) reports on the "political backlash" generated by UK forces' demolition of "a Basra police station that they claim was used as a base for death squads." Local officials "have condemned Monday's raid," but a British military spokesman suggested that other Iraqi officials approved the move. "Over 1,000 British troops participated in the raid that culminated in the demolition of the Jamiat police station. A British spokesman said 127 prisoners were discovered in the basement, some of them with their kneecaps shot off, their hands or feet crushed, or with cigarette or electrical burns." The Times adds that the station was associated with Basra's Serious Crimes Unit, which was recently disbanded over perceived corruption.

LA Times Praises British Move. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, 850K) editorializes in favor of the "important message" British troops sent to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki by destroying the police station in Basra associated with the city's Serious Crimes Unit: "Torturers and murderers must be rooted out even when they act under color of the law, and even when reining them in offends political sensitivities." The Times writes that the move "freed 127 prisoners, many of whom showed signs of torture. The headquarters long had been suspected of being infiltrated by death squads linked to tribal rivalries and organized crime." The piece concludes that success in Iraq "will depend on a willingness by Maliki and his successors to establish one rule of law in Iraq. The British and, yes, the Americans, won't be there forever."

Troops In Ramadi Face Increasingly Hostile Population. The Washington Post (12/27, A13, Bruce, 690K) reports on the difficulties faced by US troops patrolling Ramadi, focusing on the Army's 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment, noting that "Most of the guys here can remember the moment when their frustration killed their empathy. When they no longer felt guilty about knocking down doors. No longer cared to hand out candy." The Post relates the resentment among local people at US tactics intended to "get the people who lay roadside bombs and find the material used to produce them." The piece generally focuses on the troops' low morale and lake of motivation.

Escaped Iraqi Minister Emerges In Jordan. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Madhani, 617K) reports that Aiham Alsammarae, an engineer formerly from Chicago and Iraq's erstwhile electricity minister, "who has been on the lam since escaping last week from an Iraqi jail where he was being held on corruption charges has surfaced in" Amman, Jordan. US diplomats in Baghdad denied any U.S. involvement in spiriting Alsammarae out of Iraq. "Alsammarae said he fled with the help of a 'multinational' group." The Tribune notes that Alsammarae holds dual US-Iraqi citizenship.

Military Links Iranians Captured In Baghdad To Insurgency. The New York Times (12/27, Tavernise, 1.16M) reports that citing "credible evidence," chief military spokesman Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV said that two Iranian nationals detained in Baghdad 'and their Iraqi associates' are linked "to criminal activities, including attacks against American forces. Evidence also emerged that some of the detainees were involved in shipments of weapons to illegal armed groups in Iraq. In its first official confirmation of last week's raids, the military said it had confiscated maps, videos, photographs and documents in one of the raids on a site in Baghdad. The military confirmed the arrests of five Iranians, and said that three of them had since been released.' The arrests serve as the 'first evidence of the link' between Tehran and the Iraqi insurgency. The Times reports some Iraqis said that "the compound of Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, who met with President Bush in Washington three weeks ago" was the subject of a US Raid, but that "a spokesman for Mr. Hakim said he had not heard of a raid on the compound."

Iran Seeking To Project Influence In Afghanistan. In a nearly 2,400-word front page story, the New York Times (12/27, A1, Rohde, 1.16M) reports on Iran's "drive to become a bigger player in Afghanistan, as it exploits new opportunities to spread its influence and ideas farther across the Middle East." Iran has "distributed its largess, more than $200 million in all, mostly here in the west but also in the capital, Kabul." Iran's ambassador, Muhammad Reza Bahrami, "portrayed his government's activities as neighborly good works, with a certain self-interest. Iran, he said, is eager to avoid repeating the calamities of the last 20 years, when two million Afghan refugees streamed over the border." But there are "indications of other motives. Iranian radio stations are broadcasting anti-American propaganda into Afghanistan."

DOJ_NMG_0109039

Growing Afghan Heroin Poppy Yield Fuel's US Consumption. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Therolf, 617K) reports, "The amount of high-quality heroin in America is surging because of an increasing supply from Afghanistan, and with it the fear that record-breaking poppy harvests after the U.S. invasion are fueling more addictions and overdose deaths back home. According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7 percent in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied. Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14 percent actually could be significantly higher."

NATO Urged To Court Afghani Hearts And Minds. In a USA Today op-ed, Sarah Holewinski, executive director of CIVIC, the Campaign for Innocent Victims in Conflict, writes, about the plight of the families of unintended victims of US military operations in Afghanistan, profiling one father of two girls who "were killed when a U.S. bomb missed its target and exploded in their playground. He says he never saw an American face, never received an apology. At the time, the United States had no program in place to provide compensation for his loss or aid for his family. Meanwhile, the Taliban brought cotton to wrap the dead and food, money and medical care for his wife's severe head injury. That's straight out of the insurgency playbook. And it's one reason the insurgents are winning small battles everyday." Holewinski calls on NATO forces in the country to "recognize what America has learned the hard way in Iraq: You can't win the war if you don't win the people," noting that US forces now compensate such victims, having adapted to the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. She concludes, "The point is not to put a dollar value on human lives, but to offer a gesture of respect reflecting a sense of common humanity—and to recognize the simple truth that Afghanistan will be won one civilian at a time."

Pentagon Seeks To Make Military More Muslim-Friendly. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Whittle, 59K) reports on efforts by the DOD and the military to recruit American Muslims into the military, "which needs officers and troops who can speak Arabic and other relevant languages." Moreover, "Pentagon officials say they are striving for mutual understanding with Muslims at home and abroad and to win their support for US war aims." Muslim prayer rooms in military installations, imams recruited to serve as chaplains, and observances of Muslim religious events are among the military's retention tactics. "'There is a message here, and that is that Muslims and the Islamic religion are totally compatible with Western values,' says Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England in an interview. For the past two years, Mr. England has hosted an iftar, the feast that ends the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, at the Army Navy Country Club in Arlington, Va. His guests have included ambassadors, leaders of the Muslim-American community, and Muslims who serve in the US armed forces." The Monitor concludes by detailing a "new Middle East Cultural Outreach Program created by the Marine Corps" whose "goal is to educate recruiters to avoid cultural no-nos and foster good relations with Arab-American communities."

DOJ:

DOJ Attorneys May Receive Comp Time. The Federal Times (12/27, Friedman) reports, "More than 9,000 Justice Department attorneys can now receive comp time for after-hours business travel, two years after most federal employees won that right." The Times continues, "On Dec. 20, the president signed HR 4057, which allows the department's lawyers to claim compensation time when their work requires travel during irregular hours, such as evening or weekend flights to attend morning meetings. The House passed the bill in March. The Senate followed on Dec. 6." The Times adds, "Federal workers have been able to claim comp time for official travel since Congress passed the 2004 Workforce Flexibility Act. But the Justice Department had excluded its lawyers, citing a 1999 law that limits their overtime pay. That left about 4,000 department attorneys and 5,400 assistant United States attorneys ineligible for comp time. The new bill, sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., makes all of the lawyers eligible regardless of the 1999 rule. … The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, hailed the bill-signing as an 'important legislative victory.'"

Interim Arkansas US Attorney Wants To Focus On Job, Not Appointment Process. The Arkansas Democrat-Gazette (12/27, Satter) reports, "Newly appointed as interim U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas through a maneuver that has drawn criticism from the state's two reigning Democrats, Tim Griffin says he hopes to turn the spotlight off the way he got the job and onto his plan to aggressively fight crime through cooperative efforts. … 'I am honored by the attorney general's decision to name me U. S. attorney,' Griffin said Wednesday, his first day on the job. 'I look forward to working with Sen. [Mark] Pryor and Sen.

DOJ_NMG_0109040

[Blanche] Lincoln to make Arkansas safer,' he said after a long day that began with being sworn in by Chief U. S. District Judge Leon Holmes and ended with many of his books and papers yet to be moved into a corner office from a smaller space down the hall that he has occupied since September." The Democrat-Gazette continues, "Just five days earlier, the U. S. Department of Justice announced that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales planned to appoint the 38-year-old lawyer from Magnolia to the post that Bud Cummins earlier announced he was vacating after five years. … Sens. Pryor and Lincoln immediately expressed dismay that the interim appointment came during a congressional recess, under a provision of the Patriot Act that allows the fill- ing of a vacancy without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate. … The surprise announcement 'denied the Senate the opportunity to carefully consider and evaluate Mr. Griffin's qualifications and denied the American people the transparency the standard nomination process provides,' Lincoln said through a spokesman."

The AP (12/27) reports, "Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Griffin's appointment is meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. Roehrkasse said they have asked the Arkansas senators to meet with Griffin so that they may help support a Congressional nomination in the future. … Roehrkasse sad Griffin was chosen because of his experience working as a federal prosecutor in Arkansas and in the Justice Department. … However, Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas only Republican U.S. congressman John Boozman, said a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the newly-elected Democratic-majority Congress being and Griffin's prior association with Rove."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Faked Documents May Be Focus Of Apple Case. The California Recorder (12/27, Scheck) reports, "It must be some consolation for Apple Computer that the company's annual report is going to be published during the slowest news week of the year. … Given the uncomfortable admissions about its past stock options practices -- and the cost to the company -- that Apple will have to make in the delayed SEC filing due by Friday, less public attention is probably a good thing. … But the lull is unlikely to last long. According to people with knowledge of Apple's situation, federal prosecutors are looking closely at stock option administration documents that were apparently falsified by company officials to maximize the profitability of option grants to executives." The Recorder continues, "The faked documents were revealed in a three-month internal probe -- conducted by Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges -- that concluded in October, said individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity because it remains the subject of criminal and civil government investigations." The Recorder adds, "The falsification of documents is perhaps the key issue for government officials trying to determine which of their 100-plus backdating investigations will be pursued as criminal matters and which will be limited to civil SEC inquiries. … 'When there are falsified documents, the government views them as an intent to defraud, because people generally don't falsify documents unless they're trying to make things different from reality,' said Keith Krakaur, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York working on backdating cases. … Krakaur was speaking generally and not about Apple, with which he's not involved. But he has been in the middle of one of the most contentious options cases yet: He represented Kobi Alexander, the former CEO of Comverse Technology who was indicted by Brooklyn federal prosecutors on charges of backdating option grants. Krakaur is no longer working on that case, and Alexander has been living as a fugitive in Namibia for the past several months. … Krakaur and other defense lawyers -- including several in San Francisco who asked to remain anonymous for fear of affecting local probes -- said government lawyers are focusing on falsified records as a means of proving that executives knew their actions were wrong. … Since the fruits of Apple's internal investigation were disclosed to San Francisco federal prosecutors in October, the U.S. Attorney's Office has shown great interest in the case, said individuals with knowledge of the probe. … And while it's not yet clear who the prosecutors' focus is, Apple released a statement in October that 'the investigation raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants.'"

CNET To Pay Former COO $750,000, Reprice Options. Bloomberg (12/27, Heiskanen) reports, "Cnet Networks Inc., a provider of online news and information, will pay $750,000 to Barry Briggs, who resigned as president and chief operating officer, and reprice stock options held by nine individuals including Briggs." Bloomberg continues, "Briggs will receive the payment when he leaves the company Jan. 12, San Francisco-based Cnet said today in a regulatory filing. Cnet said Briggs, who resigned on Dec. 11, also remains eligible to receive a bonus for 2006. … Briggs, two other executives and five independent directors agreed to reprice some stock options they hold, Cnet said in the filing. The options were vested by 2005 and had exercise prices set below fair market value on the day they were granted. The directors also agreed to repay any after-tax gains from exercised options that vested with discounted prices." Bloomberg adds, "Cnet's co-founder and former chief executive officer, Shelby Bonnie, stepped down in October after the company found that some stock options had been backdated. Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, was named to replace Bonnie. Briggs's resignation left Ashe to sort out the company's finances, deal with federal options probes and fend off encroaching competition from companies including Yahoo! Inc. … Ashe's base salary was set at $500,000 and he may get a bonus of as much as $400,000 a year, Cnet said in the filing today. He also received options for 1.5 million Cnet shares that vest in installments beginning in October 2007. … Bonnie also agreed to have his options repriced, Cnet said today. The company said he didn't exercise any options, so there was no need for repayment."

DOJ_NMG_0109041

More Stock Options Prosecutions Expected Next Year. The AP (12/27, Gordon) reports, "Eighteen chief executives swept out. More than 100 public companies under federal investigation and more than $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc." The AP continues, "The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives." The AP adds, "Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings. .. .Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports. … The Justice Department will 'continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out,' U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in Northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. 'The final chapter hasn't been written yet.'" The AP notes, "Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era. … The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference."

The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A1, Maremont, Forelle) reports, "Eugene Isenberg is the little-known chief executive of a modest-sized oil-services company in Houston. But he stands out in one way: He is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history. In the past 19 years, he has pocketed more than $450 million. … The key to this wealth: stock options, in abundance. His employer, Nabors Industries Ltd., has lavished more than 25 million options on him over the years. … They became lucrative partly because of Nabors's generally rising stock price, but also because of some controversial moves that gave the options more punch. When Nabors's stock fell below the price at which the options could be exercised, temporarily making them worthless, Nabors let him trade in some of his options for new ones with lower exercise prices. And when Mr. Isenberg cashed some options in, Nabors 'reloaded' him, replacing those he'd exercised with the same number of new ones." The Journal adds, "Stock options were hailed two decades ago as a remedy for runaway executive pay. Academics, politicians and investors, tired of seeing CEOs pocket big money for a so-so job, pushed to have stock options become a primary method of compensating executives. Options -- granting the right to buy stock tomorrow at today's price -- would pay off only if the company's stock went up. To advocates they were the ideal carrot, an incentive for good work that aligned executives' interests with those of shareholders. … That happened -- sometimes. But at many companies, options morphed into the biggest executive bonanza yet, pouring out cash like a stuck ATM, and sorely disappointing those who thought options would moderate executive pay. … Instead of replacing big bonuses, options became an additional form of pay slathered on top of already-generous packages. Employers doled out options in ever-growing numbers, in part because, until recently, accounting rules meant companies didn't have to treat this largess to executives as an expense. And like Nabors, some used repricing, reloading and other tactics that made it even easier for executives to score huge hauls." The Journal notes, "This year, options practices exploded in one of the biggest corporate-fraud scandals in decades. Some companies and executives stole from shareholders, by pretending that options had been issued earlier than they really were, at more favorable prices. At least 130 U.S. corporations are under investigation for possible backdating of option grants. Some have admitted to it. More than 60 executives and directors of public companies have lost their jobs so far, 17 of them chief executive officers. After probable backdating was exposed at giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., the CEO had to resign and give up about $200 million of stock-options value. The company said it will have to restate past earnings by as much as $1.7 billion."

SEC Launches Probe Of UnitedHealth Options Practices. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, B8) reports, "UnitedHealth Group Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission has launched a formal investigation into its stock-options practices." The Journal continues, "The Minnetonka, Minn., health insurer had been the subject of an informal SEC inquiry since April. … 'The company has cooperated and will continue to cooperate with the SEC,' UnitedHealth said in an SEC filing." The Journal adds, "The company has delayed financial reports while it reviews its stock-options practices, which have led to an internal probe, a management shake-up and a restatement of financial results. UnitedHealth has said that using current accounting practices, the pretax charges for stock-based compensation expense are likely to range from $400 million to $600 million for the period 1994-2005, as well as from $25 million to $60 million for 2006." The Journal notes, "The company has said it has substantially completed its analysis of the adjustments made to its financial statements and has asked for consultation on certain interpretive issues with the SEC's top accounting official. UnitedHealth said it will review these issues with SEC staff before completing its restatement of historical financial statements and filing quarterly reports for the quarters ended June 30 and Sept. 30, 2006. … UnitedHealth is one of the largest companies to be ensnared in the options-backdating scandal, in which companies manipulated the dates that options were awarded to provide additional compensation to executives. More than 130 companies have come under scrutiny by the SEC, and many of those are being investigated by the Justice Department."

DOJ_NMG_0109042

Former FBI Chief Freeh To Monitor DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe. The Detroit News (12/26, Shepardson) reports, "DaimlerChrysler AG has hired former FBI director Louis Freeh to serve as an outside monitor as it nears the end of a two-year internal investigation that has uncovered multiple instances of bribery by company employees, according to people familiar with the situation." The News continues, "The massive internal investigation found employees at the automaker's Mercedes division bribed officials in Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, the people said." The News adds, "The bribery allegations, brought to light in 2004 by company whistle-blowers, also are the focus of a civil investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission and a criminal probe by the Justice Department. … Company officials would not comment on the findings of the internal probe. … At its height, the internal investigation led by prominent Washington, D.C., attorney Robert Bennett involved 85 lawyers and nearly as many accountants reviewing millions of documents and conducting hundreds of interviews. The company's legal, accounting and consulting bills connected to the probe have topped tens of millions of dollars, a person familiar with the matter said."

The AP (12/27) reports, "Freeh is a member of the Gavel Consulting Group, which consists of former federal judges 'who can provide strategic advice to corporations and law firms on anticipated actions in business, litigation and investigations,' according to the group's Web site." The AP adds, "In 2004, the Securities and Exchange Commission opened an inquiry after a DaimlerChrysler employee said he was fired for complaining that the company was using secret bank accounts to bribe government officials. … In 2005, DaimlerChrysler acknowledged that the Justice Department was investigating whether the company had paid bribes to foreign officials with the knowledge of its senior executives. The company said it is continuing to cooperate with the investigations."

SEC To Amend Rules On Executive Compensation Disclosure. The Deal (12/27, Block) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission is changing newly adopted rules governing the disclosure of executive and director compensation." The Deal continues, "In a statement released Friday, the agency said it is altering the requirements for disclosing the value of stock option awards and giving firms more flexibility in how they report those expenses." The Deal adds, "The SEC said the new rules should more closely conform with the reporting of stock option awards under standards in the Financial Accounting Standards Board's rule FAS 123. That rule requires recognition of the costs of stock option awards over the period in which an employee is required to provide service in exchange for the award. … Using this same approach when disclosing executive compensation will give investors a better idea of the compensation earned by an executive or director during a particular reporting period, the SEC explained in its announcement." The Deal notes, "The SEC compensation rules were the most extensive overhaul of executive-pay regulations in 14 years. The SEC received more than 20,000 comment letters, a record, before adopting the new rules in July."

The New York Times (12/27, Norris) reports, "The change in the way grants of stock options are to be explained to investors is a victory for corporations that had opposed the rule when it was issued in July, and a defeat for institutional investors that had backed the S.E.C.'s original rule." The Times adds, "Christopher Cox, the commission chairman, said yesterday that he viewed the decision as 'a relative technicality' that improved the rule. When the rule was adopted in July, Mr. Cox said it was aimed at providing information that would allow shareholders to 'make better decisions about the appropriate amount to pay the men and women entrusted with running their companies.' … In announcing the new rule on Friday, he said 'the new disclosure requirements will be easier for companies to prepare and for investors to understand.'"

DOJ_NMG_0109043

CRIMINAL LAW:

Police Groups Urge Congress To Increase Spending On Law Enforcement. The Washington Times (12/27, Seper, 88K) reports, "The International Association of the Chiefs of Police is urging Congress to step up its support for law-enforcement agencies after what it calls 'years of deep budget cuts and a disturbing rise in crime rates.'" Joseph Carter, chief of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Transit Police Department and president of the IACP, said "law-enforcement agencies are stretched too thin: crime rates rise. … We are hopeful that the 110th Congress will take our suggestions to heart and not only completely fund important programs, but also establish new programs and enhance others that will help state, local and tribal law enforcement keep our homeland and hometowns safe."

Canadian Gold Medal Winner Detained In US On Child Abduction Charge. The AP (12/27, Witte) reports, "A federal judge on Tuesday ordered Canadian Olympic gold-medalist Myriam Bedard to temporarily remain in the custody of U.S. marshals after being charged with violating a child custody order by bringing her 12-year-old daughter to the United States." The AP continues, "U.S. Magistrate Judge James K. Bredar scheduled a hearing for Friday in Baltimore to address whether the U.S. government has the authority to detain the former biathlon champion pending extradition to Canada." The AP adds, "Kevin McCants, an attorney representing Bedard, said he was working on an arrangement that would enable his client to return voluntarily to Quebec on Friday to face the charge. McCants said the holidays have made it difficult to negotiate, but he has been in touch with Canadian prosecutors. … Bedard, 37, was arrested Friday night in Maryland after U.S. marshals found her and her 12-year-old daughter, Maude, at a Columbia hotel. Bedard, of Quebec, Canada, has been in the custody of U.S. marshals since the arrest. Her daughter is back in the custody of Bedard's ex-husband, Jean Paquet. … Bedard faces up to 10 years in prison on the child abduction charge, but her attorneys contend she didn't break the law. .. .Assistant U.S. Attorney Philip Jackson argued that Bedard should be detained because she was a flight risk."

Pittsburgh ID Thief Charged With Forging Leniency Letter. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (12/27, Ove) reports, "A man whose prosecution three years ago was announced as part of an identity theft crackdown dubbed 'Operation Identity Crisis' is in trouble again after trying to fool a notoriously no-nonsense federal judge with a forged letter asking for leniency." The Post-Gazette continues, "U.S. marshals are looking for James M. Lyle, 22, of the West End, who was released from federal prison in May, after he failed to appear Thursday for a probation violation hearing before Senior U.S. District Judge Alan Bloch. … Mr. Lyle, who had more than 3 million credit card numbers on his computer when Pittsburgh police arrested him in 2003, was arrested again last month on new theft charges stemming from an August online purchase of a laptop computer with a stolen credit card. … That new arrest meant he had violated the terms of his probation from his previous federal case, according to a filing by the U.S. Probation Office." The Post-Gazette adds, "At a hearing before Judge Bloch on Dec. 13, Mr. Lyle admitted the new offense and the judge placed him on home detention until a space opens up for a six-month term at a Downtown halfway house. … At that hearing, Mr. Lyle also presented the judge with a letter purportedly from Timothy Savina, his boss at British Petroleum in Scott where he had been working, indicating that Mr. Lyle was turning his life around and shouldn't go back to jail. .. .But Assistant U.S. Attorney Brendan Conway thought the letter looked suspicious and asked police to check it out." The Post-Gazette notes, "After the forgery came to light, Judge Bloch scheduled a new hearing for Dec. 21, at which time there was a good chance Mr. Lyle would go to jail. But Mr. Lyle didn't show and the judge, who has a reputation as the toughest on the federal bench in Pittsburgh, issued a warrant for his arrest. … Mr. Lyle had been arrested by Pittsburgh police for credit card theft before 2003, but after another arrest that year authorities decided to lump him together with 11 other defendants as part of 'Operation Identity Crisis,' a joint effort of the U.S. Justice Department, U.S. Postal Inspectors, Federal Trade Commission, U.S. Secret Service and various banks."

Kansas Attorney General To Seek Renewal Of Abortion Provider Charges. The AP (12/27) reports District Judge Paul W. Clark "agreed Tuesday to let Kansas' attorney general, a vocal abortion opponent, try to persuade him to reinstate charges against a well-known abortion provider." Judge Clark "scheduled a hearing for Wednesday after Attorney General Phill Kline asked him to reconsider his decision to dismiss the case against Dr. George Tiller over a jurisdictional issue." Kline, who "lost his re-election bid in November and leaves office in three weeks, filed 30 misdemeanor counts last week accusing Tiller of illegally performing 15 late-term abortions." On Friday, Clark had "dismissed the charges after Sedgwick County District Attorney Nola Foulston argued that Kline didn't have the authority to file the charges."

Houston Police Investigating International Flight Luggage Dumped In Trash Bin. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (12/27) reports, "Authorities were trying to figure out how dozens of pieces of luggage belonging to international air travelers ended up in a trash bin behind a Houston pet store. FBI special agent Rolando Munoz said 68 pieces of luggage from various international flights were discovered. He said the luggage was turned over to Continental Airlines to sort out." Harris County Sheriff's Sgt. Dana Wolfe "said tags on the bags showed some of the travelers were going to or from London and Dubai. The Houston Police Department is handling the case, Munoz and Wolfe said."

DOJ_NMG_0109044

Security Experts Predict Worsening Cyber Crime In 2007. The Washington Post (12/27, D1, Krebs, 690K) reports, "It was the year of computing dangerously, and next year could be worse. That is the assessment of computer security experts, who said 2006 was marked by an unprecedented spike in junk e-mail and more sophisticated Internet attacks by cybercrooks. Few believe 2007 will be any brighter for consumers, who already are struggling to avoid the clever scams they encounter while banking, shopping or just surfing online. Experts say online criminals are growing smarter about hiding personal data they have stolen on the Internet and are using new methods for attacking computers that are harder to detect." The Post notes, "At any given time, between 3 million and 4 million compromised computers are active on the Internet, according to Gadi Evron, who managed Internet security for the Israeli government before joining Beyond Security, an Israeli security firm. And that estimate only counts spam bots."

Hotel Conglomerate CEO Calls For International Cooperation To Fight Cyber Crime. In a Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) op-ed, Leading Hotels of the World President and CEO Paul McManus writes, "With the Web now the shopping mall of choice for time-crunched consumers, cyber-thieves are 'dressing up' Web sites and tweaking competitors' domain names to capture unsuspecting shoppers." McManus adds, "What's needed is a set of international laws protecting business and consumers against Internet fraud plus a global squad of cyber crime-busters to enforce them. The U.S. has specific computer fraud laws and the FBI takes 'thousands of complaints' annually through its Internet Crime Complaint Center (www.ic3.gov). But perpetrators who zero in on businesses like mine often work in countries with no laws protecting Web users and lax or little cooperation with U.S. or other foreign law-enforcement agencies. Collaboration is the only realistic solution for the private sector to protect brands from online pirates."

Suburban Houston Rapist Preys On Men. The AP (12/27, Porretto) reports, "A rapist who has struck at least five times since April in and around Baytown has not only spread fear in this working-class community but also piqued the interest of those who study the criminal mind. The reason: He preys on other men. … That makes him something of a rarity in the world of crime." The AP reports that "experts say male-on-male rape sometimes stems from sexual encounters gone bad. But that does not appear to be the case with the rapist in this oil-refining town of 70,000 people about 30 miles east of Houston. … Instead, he methodically identifies and stalks young men and attacks them at gunpoint or knifepoint in or near their homes, according to police Capt. Roger Clifford. Sometimes he robs his victims, too, but rape appears to be the primary motivation, police said." The AP adds, "The U.S. Justice Department says one in 33 men in the United States has been a victim of a rape or attempted rape, compared with one in six women. Experts say men are far less likely to report a rape to authorities, because they fear being perceived as weak or see the attack as an assault on their masculinity. … In fact, investigators in Baytown fear there may be other victims of the rapist who are too ashamed to come forward. … Three of the attacks have occurred in the city, the other two on the outskirts of town. The most recent attack was Nov. 30. Clifford would not give details of the rapes but said at least one victim managed to thwart the attack."

Slow Pace Of Virginia's DNA Review Criticized. The Washington Post (12/27, B1, Rondeaux) reports, "A year after Virginia's crime lab launched an unprecedented review of old cases that experts said could free dozens of wrongly convicted people, the project appears to be years from completion, and some are questioning the credentials of the private company selected to do the DNA testing." The Post continues, "Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner (D) ordered a full review of the cases last December after an analysis of old evidence revealed that two men were not guilty of sexual assault. Warner pardoned the men, who became part of a wave of exonerations that reignited a national debate over post-conviction DNA testing. … At the time, Virginia crime lab director Paul Ferrara predicted that the retesting project would be completed within two years and could free dozens of innocent inmates. But now, just days from retirement, Ferrara has revised his prediction, saying changes at the lab have stalled progress. … 'We got nowhere for a while. It has suffered some delays because of staff turnover,' Ferrara said. 'But we're as interested and as anxious to see this thing through as everyone else. We could see as many as 30 possible exonerations when this is all over with.'" The Post adds, "The physical evidence came to light in 2001, when an inmate asserted his innocence under a new state law that for the first time granted the right to request testing of newly discovered evidence more than 21 days after sentencing. Lab analyst Mary Jane Burton, who retired in 1988 and died in 1999, and two other lab workers meticulously preserved pieces of clothing smeared with blood, semen or saliva before DNA testing got underway in the early 1990s. A cursory review of a small sample of Burton's files has exonerated five former convicts. … Earlier this year, legal experts speculated that the retesting effort could be slowed when Ferrara, 64, announced in August plans to retire by the end of this year. Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) has not selected Ferrara's successor, but the state's Forensic Science Board has interviewed several internal and external candidates, and a decision is expected next month, Virginia officials familiar with the process said. … The evidence review entails a painstaking, multi-step process of separating out cases contained in 660 boxes packed with thousands of files from 1973 through 1988, identifying suspects convicted in each case and determining if physical evidence samples can be tested for DNA."

DOJ_NMG_0109045

Law Requires Disinterment Of Murderer Buried At Arlington Cemetery. The Washington Post (12/27, B5, Bahrampour) reports, "The remains of a man convicted of murdering an elderly Hagerstown, Md., couple will be removed from Arlington National Cemetery as part of a bill signed into law by President Bush." The Post continues, "Bush signed the $3.2 billion bill, the Veterans Benefits, Health Care and Information Technology Act of 2006, on Friday. … The bill seeks to improve benefits and health care for veterans and their families. It also requires the Secretary of the Army to remove the cremated ashes of Russell Wayne Wagner, who was convicted of murdering Daniel Davis, 84, and Wilda Davis, 80, in 1994. … 'Arlington Cemetery is reserved as a place of honor for men and women who have served their nation in the armed services. It is appropriate to remove the remains of individuals, who, by their own criminal actions, have brought dishonor to themselves and the memory of their service,' said Tony Frato, a White House spokesman." The Post adds, "Wagner died in early 2005 of a heroin overdose while serving two life sentences. An Army private who served during the Vietnam War and was honorably discharged in 1972, Wagner was eligible for parole at the time of his death, which made him eligible for an Arlington service. He was buried with honors in August 2005. .. But after publicity about the case and pressure from the couple's family and Sens. Larry E. Craig (R-Idaho), Barbara A. Mikulski (D-Md.) and Ken Salazar (D-Colo.), the case was revisited."

Figure In Alaskan Land-Use Dispute Pleads To Incest Charges. The Washington Post (12/27, A2, Harden) reports, "Robert Hale, a Bible-toting father of 15 who calls himself Papa Pilgrim, became an anti-government celebrity in Alaska by driving a bulldozer across a national park that encircles his land. … The Lord told him that using the bulldozer to clear 14 miles of derelict road through the park was a loving thing to do, Hale said in an interview three years ago. … 'In order for me to love my children, I have to be a provider,' Hale said then, explaining that he needed the bulldozer to fetch supplies for his children, whom he and his wife were home-schooling in an ultra-strict Christian way. … He said his children read only the Bible, always bathed with their clothes on and were not allowed to see one another naked." The Post adds, "Yesterday in a Palmer, Alaska, courtroom, Hale, 65, answered very different questions about his behavior and his family: He pleaded no contest to multiple charges that he raped one of his daughters. … The plea, which came three weeks before Hale was to face trial on 27 felony charges of rape, incest and coercion, punctuates an implausible saga that stretches from Texas to the outback of eastern Alaska. It is a story by turns picaresque, outrageous and sad. … Hale and his now-estranged wife, Kurina, who calls herself Country Rose, and their children, who all have names from the Bible, bought a 410-acre ranch inside Wrangell-St. Elias National Park, the largest national park in the United States. … Much of the money for the $450,000 purchase in 2002 came from the Alaska permanent fund dividend. It is an oil-funded annual payment that this year was worth $1,107 to each state resident. After Hale and his family moved to Alaska in 1998, the dividend provided the onetime subsistence farmers -- who also earned money performing gospel music -- with more cash than they had ever had. … The ranch, which they named Hillbilly Heaven, is an in-holding, which means it is surrounded by federal land controlled by the National Park Service. Under the 1980 law that established much of the vast national park system in Alaska, in-holders are guaranteed 'reasonable and feasible' access to their property. … Hale's bulldozer romp stretched that guarantee beyond the breaking point. The Park Service cited Hale for violating federal law. … But land-rights activists, who in Alaska and across the West have complained for decades about persnickety law enforcement in and around federal parks, adopted Hale and his family as camera-ready symbols of America's frontier spirit."

WPost Urges Broad Death Penalty Debate In Maryland. The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) editorializes, "The Maryland Court of Appeals has thrown a big wrench into the state's already anemic death penalty enforcement. It ruled last week that Maryland's procedures for lethal injection were adopted without adequate legislative oversight." The court action is "an opportunity for a much broader discussion of the utility, justice, necessity and morality of capital punishment. It comes at a propitious moment. Incoming governor Martin O'Malley (D) personally opposes the death penalty. He did not appear inclined to dismiss the court ruling as a mere technicality -- which, formally speaking, is all it really is. That's good. Maryland doesn't need a big debate about how it kills people, but the time is ripe to debate whether it should stop."

DOJ_NMG_0109046

CIVIL LAW:

FBI Leak Case Files Missing. The New York Sun (12/27, Gerstein) reports, "The FBI is missing nearly a quarter of its files relating to investigations of recent leaks of classified information, according to a court filing the bureau made last week." The Sun continues, "In response to a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, the FBI said it identified 94 leak investigations since 2001, but that the investigative files in 22 of those cases 'are missing' and cannot be located. 'There is no physical slip of paper on the shelf which indicates that the file has been charged out to a particular FBI employee, so therefore there is no way of knowing where the file may actually be,' an official in the bureau's records division, Peggy Bellando, wrote in a December 22 declaration. … 'That's an amazing number,' an academic who has studied the FBI's record-keeping procedures, Athan Theoharis of Marquette University, said in an interview yesterday. 'These are very sensitive investigations. ... They could be called to account for whether they are monitoring reporters. These are records that should be handled very well.'" The Sun adds, "Over the past decade, the FBI has waged an epic struggle to computerize and automate its records systems. The agency abandoned a $170 million 'Virtual Case File' project last year after years of Congressional hearings and critical evaluations led to the conclusion that the system would never be implemented successfully. … One frequent critic of government database programs, Barry Steinhardt of the American Civil Liberties Union, said that record makes it understandable that a substantial proportion of the leak files would be mislaid. … 'It's par for the course,' Mr. Steinhardt said. He noted that the Justice Department has already put about 1 million case records into a database, called OneDOJ, that is being made widely available even though the files may contain unverified or erroneous data. 'They want to distribute it to law enforcement in every city in the United States, but here the FBI can't manage its own files,' the critic said."

Court Approves Creditor Vote On Seracare Bankruptcy Plan. The AP (12/27) reports, "SeraCare Life Sciences Inc., which makes medical supplies from blood plasma, has won court approval to send its shareholder-backed bankruptcy plan to creditors for a vote." The AP continues, "Judge Louise DeCarl Adler of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in San Diego on Thursday signed off on the biotechnology company's disclosure statement, which outlines its plan to exit Chapter 11 through a rights offering to existing shareholders. … Under bankruptcy law, a judge must approve such a statement before a company can send its plan to creditors for a vote." The AP adds, "A group of SeraCare shareholders, led by hedge fund Harbinger Capital Partners, has agreed to backstop a $20.2 million rights offering that would finance the company's bankruptcy exit. The group holds over 30 percent of SeraCare's common stock. … Shareholders, last in line for repayment in a Chapter 11 case, will get one share in the reorganized company for each share they own, along with the right to participate in the rights offering, which will offer shares at $4.75 each. Options and warrants will be reinstated after SeraCare emerges from bankruptcy. … Harbinger will also buy SeraCare's bank debt and allow it to use the cash collateral securing the debt without paying default interest through June 2007. … The Securities and Exchange Commission and the Justice Department have been investigating SeraCare, which on March 15 announced it would restate its financial results for the first three quarters of 2005. SeraCare's chairman, chief executive and financial chief were fired in March, just before the company filed for bankruptcy protection."

Small Businesses Fight Federal Contracting Rules. The New York Times (12/27, Nixon) reports, "In 1995, Joseph N. Cooper won a multiyear contract worth up to $8 million to do public relations for the Immigration and Naturalization Service. He received the contract through a Small Business Administration program established to increase opportunities for small companies. … But not long after the work was under way, the deal was awarded instead to three multimillion-dollar companies, which were listed as disadvantaged in contract documents. After years of trying to win the contract back, Mr. Cooper filed a false-claims lawsuit against the companies, asserting that they had committed fraud by saying they were small businesses." The Times continues, "This year, to Mr. Cooper and his lawyer's surprise, the court ruled that although evidence showed the companies were indeed not small businesses, fraud had not been committed because the I.N.S. knew their true status when the work was awarded to the companies — J. Walter Thompson, the Bernard Hodes Group and Cass Communications. … The case was dismissed. … 'We were floored,' Mr. Cooper said in an interview. 'The ruling essentially said that I was right, the companies were not small, but so what.'" The Times adds, "That experience points to the kind of Catch-22 world that some small-business owners face when they challenge the awarding of government contracts. … Many studies have shown that hundreds of government contracts set aside for small business are being awarded to large corporations. Federal laws provide several mechanisms that allow small-business owners who suspect that contracts have been awarded to large companies to protest. .. .But small-business owners say that the rules in many cases impose nearly impossible standards on them. Even if they do succeed in protesting an award, they say, and prove that federal agencies are intentionally awarding small-business contracts to big companies, there are almost no penalties. Often, the large companies get to keep the contacts. … Congress may be more receptive to their calls for change next year, when two longtime critics of the practice assume leadership positions for the committees overseeing small business."

DOJ_NMG_0109047

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Courts Seek Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Defendants. The AP (12/27) reports, "A program in Cuyahoga County (OH) courts, started in response to concerns mirrored in the justice system nationwide, aims to better understand and deal more efficiently with people who are mentally ill." The AP continues, "The county and several other communities across Ohio have established mental health courts to specifically handle such defendants. In the Cleveland-area program, some municipal and common pleas judges oversee mental health cases and try to place defendants with psychological problems into court-supervised treatment programs. … 'We're not dealing with a high population of people with really good, secure home lives,' Municipal Judge Kathleen Keough said. 'We get people whose life has been in upheaval for years and who don't know any of their rights. No stability. Nobody really to count on.'" The AP adds, "In the past, those awaiting trial who showed signs of mental illnesses, such as depression or schizophrenia, tended to stay in jail two to three times longer than others while officials determined if they were competent to stand trial. Because those people might need close supervision and daily medications, the cost of keeping them behind bars can be as much as double that for others." The AP notes, "The program in Cuyahoga County sprang from an initiative started three years ago to try to better handle mentally ill defendants. … Recent studies indicate that mental disorders affect one of every four adults in the United States. Yet a recent U.S. Department of Justice study found that more than half the inmates in the nation's prisons and jails have mental health problems. … Part of that can be traced to fewer psychiatric hospitals, said Dr. Philip J. Resnick, director of forensic psychiatry at Case Western Reserve University. In 1960, more than 550,000 people were in psychiatric hospitals throughout the country, Resnick said. With the closing of many of the hospitals, that number has dropped to about 70,000. … The Bureau of Justice Assistance, part of the U.S. Justice Department, helps to administer the federal government's Mental Health Courts Program. The program funds projects that seek to improve the way courts help adults with mental disabilities or illnesses. Mental health courts generally deal with nonviolent offenders."

ANTITRUST:

Experts Say Delta's Antitrust Objections May Be Overstated. The Deal (12/27, Lindell) reports, "Delta Airlines Inc. is using the looming specter of antitrust regulation as a key reason to fight an $8.5 billion takeover bid from US Airways Group Inc., but antitrust experts say Delta's argument is exaggerated." The Deal continues, "The airline's Dec. 19 warning about the antitrust risks titled, 'Proposed US Airways/Delta Merger Would Be Highly Anticompetitive' begins with a statement that the two airlines have 'overlapping networks.' … While it is true that the two nationwide carriers compete in many routes, the notion that antitrust problems make the deal a nonstarter "is just silly," according to a former government antitrust official. … The Department of Justice 'is clearly going to look at this, and it's probably going to take four to five months,' but Delta's warning that the review will take a year is not correct, according to the lawyer who asked that his name not be used." The Deal adds, "In a Dec. 21 response to Delta's antitrust analysis, US Air acknowledges that some shuttle services between New York and Washington would have to be sold off, and that there are competitive problems with flights between Cincinnati and Charlotte, N.C., as well as Cincinnati and Philadelphia. Two city pair overlaps, according to US Air, is a far cry from the alarmist Delta report that identified more than 30 overlapping city pairs. … The key issue now is how US Air can proceed because Delta is in bankruptcy. Under bankruptcy rules, US Air can't launch a hostile bid for its competitor, but it can lobby creditors to put pressure on Delta. … One path could be joining with US Air to file premerger notification forms with the government, which would initiate an in-depth official review. That review would give the parties, and the bankruptcy judge, a clear view of what divestitures would be required to get the deal done."

McClatchy Sells Flagship Star Tribune To Private Equity Group. The AP (12/27, Freed) reports, "Newspaper publisher The McClatchy Co. said on Tuesday that it will sell its flagship newspaper Star Tribune to a private equity firm for $530 million, a sharp drop from the $1.2 billion it paid to acquire the newspaper just eight years ago." The AP continues, "McClatchy said it decided to sell the newspaper to Avista Capital Partners through a private bidding process 'after a strategic reevaluation of its portfolio of holdings' following McClatchy's purchase of Knight Ridder for $4.5 billion earlier this year." The AP adds, 'McClatchy faces a large tax bill from selling off 12 other newspapers earlier this year as part of its purchase of Knight Ridder. It said the tax benefit of selling the Star Tribune at a loss is worth $160 million, raising the total value of the deal to $690 million. McClatchy said it would use the money to pay down its Knight Ridder debt." The AP notes, "McClatchy chairman and CEO Gary Pruitt said in a written statement that the Star Tribune 'is a profitable business that has generated significant returns for the company over the years. However, as we continue to analyze our business following the Knight Ridder acquisition, it became clear that selling the Star Tribune strengthens McClatchy's competitive position.' … 'This deal came about because of very specific conditions involving the Star Tribune and today's changing media landscape. We have no plans to sell any other newspapers,' Pruitt said in an e-mail to McClatchy employees."

DOJ_NMG_0109048

Private Equity Council To Enter Lobbying Arena. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C4, Mullins, 2.04M) reports, "A group of major private-equity firms has tapped a former videogame lobbyist to lead a trade group to promote the industry's interests here." The Private Equity Council, "set to begin operations early next year, said in a statement that Douglas Lowenstein will serve as its first president and chief executive officer. To take the post, he is stepping down as president of the Entertainment Software Association, which represents the US videogame industry." The Washington Post (12/27, D1, Birnbaum, 690K) says "the Private Equity Council, is backed by such leaders in the burgeoning business of company buyouts as Blackstone Group, Carlyle Group and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts."

Bloomberg (12/27, Cole) reports, "Private-equity firms and management have announced a record $718 billion of takeovers in 2006, Bloomberg data show. Carlyle, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and other firms were sued in November by investors who claim they conspired to hold down prices they pay when buying companies. The U.K. market regulator also is researching market abuse in private-equity transactions. … The council 'will become a leading advocate for the domestic and international private equity industry as well as a resource for those seeking to better understand the industry's role in the rapidly evolving global economy,' according to the statement. … Other members of the council include Apollo Management LP, Bain Capital LLC, Hellman & Friedman, Madison Dearborn Partners LLC, Providence Equity Partners, Silver Lake Partners, Texas Pacific Group, Thomas H. Lee Partners LP and KKR."

Texas Pacific Is World's Top Buyout Group. The Financial Times (12/27, Smith) reports, "Texas Pacific Group has beaten Blackstone and Kohlberg Kravis Roberts to become the world's most prolific buy-out group in 2006, notching up 17 deals with an aggregate value of just over $101bn." The Times continues, "The figures reflect an extraordinary year for private equity in which the value of announced deals has risen to a record $700bn, more than double the record set in 2005 and 20 times bigger than in 1996, according to Thomson Financial, the data provider." The Times adds, "The wave of private equity deal activity, accounting for nearly one-fifth of all global mergers and acquisitions, has helped underpin a huge rise in the value of stock markets globally. … TPG notched up high-profile deals across the world, including Australia's Qantas airline, Las Vegas casino giant Harrah's, and Univision, the US's largest Spanish-language broadcaster. No other buy-out group has ever done more than $100bn worth of deals in a single year, a coup for TPG in an environment where being known as the biggest buy-out group helps open doors to the financing community and company boardrooms." The Times notes, "Blackstone, which topped the US league table, took part in global deals worth $93bn, while KKR, number one in Europe, managed a world total of $78bn. Bain Capital took part in $85bn worth of deals. … The US also regained its crown from Europe as the world's most active private equity market, recording $403bn of announced deals, treble that of 2005."

Reliance Prepares For Bid From Hutchison Essar. The Financial Times (12/27, Yee, Mitchell, Parker) reports, "Reliance Communications, India's second-largest mobile operator, is in talks with at least four private equity firms about combining forces to make an offer for Hutchison Essar, a smaller rival." The Times continues, "Vodafone Friday confirmed it was considering the acquisition of a controlling stake in Hutchison Essar, India's fourth-biggest mobile operator. .. Reliance's talks with private equity firms underlines the likelihood of a bidding war for Hutchison Essar, which has an enterprise value of about $14bn." The Times adds, "Shares in Hong Kong-listed Hutchison Telecommunications International, which holds 67 per cent of Hutchison Essar, rose 8 per cent on Vodafone's statement, to a record high of HK$19.08. Reliance declined to comment. However, people familiar with the company said it was in talks with Apax, Blackstone, Carlyle and KKR. … On Thursday, Vodafone's board gave the go-ahead for management to prepare an offer for Hutchison Essar. Leading Vodafone investors have reacted cautiously but positively to the prospect of a $13.5bn-plus offer for Hutchison Essar. Vodafone's shares closed down 1.2 per cent at 142p Friday. … Vodafone is seeking to counter slowing revenue growth in its core European businesses by increasing its presence in emerging markets. Hutchison Telecommunications International said in a statement it had "been approached by various potentially interested parties", which it did not identify, and cautioned that a transaction was not guaranteed."

DOJ_NMG_0109049

ENVIRONMENT:

House Democrats Seek To Redistribute Oil Money To Conservation Efforts. The AP (12/26, Hebert) reports, "Democrats in the U.S. House of Representatives in the first weeks of the new Congress plan to establish a dedicated fund to promote renewable energy and conservation, using money from oil companies. … That is only one legislative hit the oil industry is expected to take next year as a Congress run by Democrats is likely to show little sympathy to the cash-rich, high-profile business." The AP continues, "Whether the issue is rolling back tax breaks -- some approved by Congress only 18 months ago -- pushing for more use of ethanol and other biofuels instead of gasoline, or investigations into shortfalls in royalty payments to the government, oil industry lobbyists will spend most of their time playing defense." The AP adds, "Details of a renewable fuels fund have yet to be worked out. Nonetheless, it is one of the initiatives the House will take up during its first 100 hours in session in January, according to aides to Nancy Pelosi, the Democratic leader. At least some of the money -- revenue gained by rolling back some tax breaks -- will go to a program to support research into making ethanol from sources other than corn. … But the oil issue likely to be first out of the legislative block in January concerns the ability of the federal government to recover royalties many lawmakers believe have been unfairly avoided by oil and gas companies drilling in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico." The AP adds, "The Interior Department has been trying to get more than 50 companies to rework 1998-99 drilling leases that allow the companies to avoid paying billions of dollars in royalties because of a government mistake in writing the leases. Recently five companies agreed to a compromise to pay royalties on future production under the leases, but not from oil and gas already taken from the federal waters. … Most of the other companies argue that the leases represent a binding contract and have not even talked to Interior officials about them."

Higher Energy Prices Forecast For 2007. The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Scherer, 59K) reports that some analysts are forecasting higher energy prices in 2007, adding, "If the forecast comes true, energy could be a dominant factor in the economic outlook for 2007 because, unlike this year, the potential increases would come when the economy is expected to be struggling." Some "energy analysts are beginning to think 2007 will be a case of déjà vu for consumers and business. In this scenario, prices start to ratchet up in the spring, peak sometime in the summer at a new record, and then fall back to lower levels later in the year." The Monitor adds that the relatively warm winter and slowing US economic growth are "keeping a lid on prices."

Administration Will Propose Listing Polar Bears As Threatened. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Eilperin, 690K) reports, "The Bush administration has decided to propose listing the polar bear as threatened under the Endangered Species Act, putting the U.S. government on record as saying that global warming could drive one of the world's most recognizable animals out of existence." The Administration's proposal, "which was described by an Interior Department official who spoke on the condition of anonymity -- stems from the fact that rising temperatures in the Arctic are shrinking the sea ice that polar bears need for hunting. The official insisted on anonymity because the department will submit the proposal today for publication in the Federal Register, after which it will be subject to public comment for 90 days."

Anadarko Sells Two Natural-Gas Fields For $1.6 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C4, Biers) reports, "Anadarko Petroleum Corp. agreed to sell two Louisiana natural-gas fields for $1.6 billion to EXCO Resources Inc., in its latest push to reduce debt after a pair of large acquisitions. The sale covers Anadarko's Vernon and Ansley fields, which produce 192 million cubic feet of natural gas a day, or about 11% of the company's gas production." Anadarko "has been busy this year, purchasing Oklahoma City oil and natural-gas developer Kerr-McGee Corp. and Denver natural-gas producer Western Gas Resources for $21 billion over the summer before implementing an aggressive asset-sale program in the fall to reduce debt. The EXCO sale brings the total revenue from the asset sales to $8.1 billion."

Nature Conservancy Renting Land From Some Farmers To Protect Species. The New York Times (12/27, Kowal, 1.16M) reports from Mount Vernon, Washington, "The standoff here between farmers and environmentalists was familiar in the modern West. … This year, though, the standoff ended -- at least for three longtime farmers in this fertile valley, who began collaborating with their former enemies to preserve wildlife and their livelihoods." The Nature Conservancy "is renting land from the three farmers on behalf of migrating Western sandpipers, black-bellied plovers, dunlins, marbled godwits and other shorebirds. From private and public funds, including a grant from the federal Environmental Protection Agency, the farmers…will together receive up to $350,000 for three years of labor, expenses and the use of 210 acres, said Kevin Morse, the Skagit Delta project manager for the conservancy." The farmers "see the Nature Conservancy's willingness to pay them as an acknowledgment that they should not be expected to sacrifice their land or their living for wildlife. This approach effectively turns shorebirds into another crop to manage, instead of grounds for a lawsuit."

DOJ_NMG_0109050

NYTimes Argues For Cutting Livestock Production To Avoid Global Warming. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) editorializes that "livestock are responsible for about 18 percent of the global warming effect, more than transportation's contribution. The culprits are methane — the natural result of bovine digestion -- and the nitrogen emitted by manure. Deforestation of grazing land adds to the effect." The Times adds, "The human passion for meat is certainly not about to end anytime soon." But "our health and the health of the planet depend on pushing livestock production in more sustainable directions."

FDA Praised For Stance On Animal Cloning. The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) editorializes, "A recent poll by the Pew Initiative on Food and Biotechnology indicates that a majority of Americans get queasy at the thought of clonal animal products lining supermarket shelves. But to its credit, the FDA stuck to the science -- the great bulk of which supports its reported conclusion. … According to the Pew poll, a large number of Americans object to animal cloning out of religious concerns, views that anti-cloning groups will no doubt exploit to distract the public from the scientific evidence. But the FDA's job, in this as in other matters, is to fairly assess the science."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Virginia Drug Ring Suspected Of Selling $8 Million In Cocaine, 11 Charged. The AP (12/26) reported federal authorities "say they've charged 11 people believed to be involved in a Hampton Roads drug-dealing ring that has sold a ton of cocaine worth more than $8 million over the last 13 years. … Most of the suspects have been arrested over the last 10 days. … Drug Enforcement Administration officials worked with state and local authorities on the case, which officials said is one of the largest drug cases in the last 13 years." Virginia's Richmond Times Dispatch, WDBJ-TV in Roanoke, and WTKR-TV in Norfolk used the AP story.

The Hampton Roads Virginian-Pilot (12/27, McGlone) reports an informant "told the DEA that in 1993 he began buying crack from Naeron B. Mudie, a Jamaican native who had moved to Hampton in the early 1990s to establish a drug trade, according to a 34-page affidavit filed in court by the DEA and the U.S. Attorney's Office. Mudie and six others are charged in a separate indictment with related crimes."

Mexico-Based Drug Ring Suspects To Appear In Court. The Washington Times (12/26, Seper, 88K) reported two men "believed to be high-ranking members of a Mexico-based smuggling ring are scheduled to appear…in federal court in San Diego to discuss future court dates and arrange for legal representation. Francisco Javier Arellano-Felix, 37, and Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, 31, were named last week in a seven-count federal grand jury indictment on racketeering, drug trafficking and money laundering charges in an operation that dominated the Mexican drug trade for more than a decade. The ring flooded the United States with hundreds of tons of cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin. … A decision by federal prosecutors on whether to seek the death penalty will be made by Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales at a later date."

Gift Cards Used As "Virtual Currency" For Drug Deals. The CanWest News Service (12/26) reported, "Those gift cards that countless Boxing Day shoppers will be cashing in today are also landing under the Christmas trees of organized-crime groups, who use them as 'virtual currency' for drug deals and money laundering, according to the RCMP. A recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration." RCMP officers "said such cards are now accepted as valid currency between crime syndicates. Instead of a suitcase of cash, operatives might show up for a drug deal with a fistful of gift cards."

The Canadian Press (12/26) reported a recent organized-crime threat assessment for Canada and the United States "identified gift cards and prepaid debit cards as one of the tools in the financial-crime kit of organized crime. The assessment was compiled by the RCMP, the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. … When poorly managed, prepaid-card programs can be a 'vehicle for money laundering and terrorist financing,' conceded Gord Jamieson, director of risk management and security at Visa Canada. But he said his company has taken a number of steps to prevent its cards from being used for criminal purposes. Prepaid Visa cards available to individual applicants have a deposit limit of $500 in Canada and cannot be reloaded or used at an ATM."

Report: Supplies Of Potent Heroin From Afghanistan Increasing In US. The Los Angeles Times (12/26, 850K) reported, "Supplies of highly potent Afghan heroin in the United States are growing so fast that the pure white powder is rapidly overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, prompting fears of increased addiction and overdoses. Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 239 in 2005, a jump of nearly 75% in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said. … According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7% in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14% in 2004, the latest year studied. … Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that more heroin was reaching the United States from Afghanistan. 'We are NOT seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin,' Garrison K. Courtney wrote in an e-mail to The Times." The Boston Globe used the Times story.

DOJ_NMG_0109051

UPI (12/26) cited the Times story and wrote that a report from the DEA "said Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States since 2001. Another DEA report said that heroin from Afghanistan may take up more than 14 percent of the Unites States market." The Washington Times used the UPI story.

On its Web site, FOX News (12/26) reported the Times "cited a Drug Enforcement Administration report it obtained as saying that the poppy fields in Afghanistan have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the U.S. The heroin from Afghanistan is the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center. According to the DEA report, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market from 1980 through 1985, with a 47% to 54% share, but that dropped to 6% for much of the 1990s, as the Taliban cracked down on poppy production."

In Los Angeles, the AP (12/26) reported heroin-related deaths "have soared nearly 75 percent countywide in three years and experts believe potent Afghan heroin, which is overtaking lower-quality Mexican heroin, may be to blame. … A Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times shows Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States, doubling from 7 percent in 2001 to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied." The San Francisco Chronicle used the AP story.

Security Measures At Virginia Federal Courthouse Come Under Fire. The Washington Post (12/27, B1, Markon) reports, "Jim Savage has been living in a world of guard shacks, green security poles and Jersey barricades lining the street outside his home next to the federal courthouse in Alexandria. … They were put there for the trial of a terrorist, Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, and they were supposed to come down when the trial was over. Seven months after it ended, they are still there." The Post continues, "So Savage, who calls the security measures an eyesore, mounted a one-man crusade to have them removed. He retrieved a judge's order saying the additional security was supposed to be temporary and tried to meet with the judge. He contacted the City of Alexandria, but was told the federal government has jurisdiction over his street. … Yesterday, Savage learned that his campaign will probably meet with only mixed success. The U.S. Marshals Service said plans are in the works to remove most of the barricades and to replace them with a permanent security wall near the courthouse. Officials said the wall will be more attractive than the faded concrete barricades and will fit with the neighborhood's architecture. … 'This idea of some sort of a Berlin Wall really fits. It will be like Checkpoint Charlie,' Savage, a former criminal investigator for the U.S. Army, said when told about the plans by a reporter. 'The fact is that a court order allows these security measures to be present, and the basis for that order is over. To put up something permanent with the expectation that maybe you might have a terrorist trial in the future is really stretching things.'" The Post notes, "John Hackman, the acting U.S. marshal for Alexandria, said he understood the concerns of Savage and other residents at the Carlyle Towers condominium complex. 'We are doing our best to reach a balance that will provide security as well as the aesthetic that the neighborhood requires,' Hackman said. 'But terrorism is not something where we say okay, we had a trial, and it goes away. We need to be constantly vigilant, and obviously the Alexandria court has high-profile cases.' … Michael Kulstad, a marshal's spokesman, said the agency investigated 1,111 threats or 'inappropriate communications' to members of the judiciary nationwide in fiscal 2006, including to judges, prosecutors and witnesses. Just last week, a federal prisoner was indicted in Richmond on charges of sending a letter bomb to the federal courthouse there."

IMMIGRATION:

Dallas Suburb Sued Over Ban On Renting To Illegal Aliens. The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Bustillo, 850K) reports Farmers Branch, Texas, "a Dallas suburb that has barred landlords from renting to illegal immigrants," was "sued Tuesday by two civil rights groups that allege the controversial ordinance turns property owners into immigration agents and violates federal law." The challenge "by the American Civil Liberties Union and the Mexican American Legal Defense and Education Fund seeks to derail a new law that would require property managers to check the immigration status of apartment renters." The ordinance, "approved last month, is set to take effect Jan. 12." Farmers Branch – "a city of 28,000 north of Dallas that is about 37 percent Hispanic -- is one of dozens of U.S. municipalities that, frustrated with federal government inaction, have adopted tough local measures to stem illegal immigration." But "the Farmers Branch ordinance is seen as a turning point for Texas, a state that largely has avoided the kind of confrontational immigration policies commonplace elsewhere."

DOJ_NMG_0109052

The AP (12/27, Garay) reports, "The lawsuit claims the measure, scheduled to take effect Jan. 12, is so poorly drafted that it excludes even legal immigrants from renting. … 'Immigration enforcement must be left to the federal government, not each local municipality,' said Lisa Graybill, legal director of the ACLU of Texas. [Otherwise Texas will end up with a patchwork system that is impractical and unenforceable.'" The AP notes, "On Friday, the owners of three apartment complexes filed a lawsuit asking a federal court to declare the rent law unconstitutional. In another lawsuit filed earlier this month, a Farmers Branch resident alleged that the mayor repeatedly violated the state's open meetings laws to deliberate the ordinances."

Illegal Immigrants' Living Conditions Anger Some. NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 10, 2:50, Brokaw, 9.87M) reported that in Colorado, an extended family of 18 illegal immigrants "live in this four-bedroom house which is zoned for a single family," but the families "defend this living arrangement as just extended family." It's "the double standard when it comes to illegal immigrants and the law that angers many Americans." Ian Hawkins, construction worker: "My biggest problem with it is when people show up here and they don't follow the rules."

US Said To Have "Long Heritage" Of Illegal Immigration. In a New York Times op-ed (12/27), author William Hogeland says, "The immigrant experience in the United States is justly celebrated, and perhaps no aspect of that experience is more quintessentially American than our long heritage of illegal immigration." Descendants of the "great immigration experiences of the 19th and 20th centuries visit the Ellis Island Immigration Museum to learn of the tribulations of ancestors who risked much to become Americans. Those of us whose ancestors risked everything as illegal immigrants, and in the process helped found a nation, owe our forebears a debt of gratitude, too. Without their daring disregard of immigration laws, we might not be here today."

Housing Market Slowdown Puts Crimp In Hispanic Immigration. The Washington Post (12/27, A1, Miroff, 690K) reports in a front page story that Hispanic immigration "to the Washington region has always followed a seasonal pattern, as the winter puts a chill on outdoor labor and drives workers south. But with home sales and housing starts dropping after years of steady growth, many Hispanic workers -- legal and illegal -- say the good times are gone." Demographers who "track migration patterns and embassy staff members say it's too soon to tell exactly how the housing construction decline has affected the region's Hispanic population. But stories of departing workers abound. Some workers say they're headed home; others, spurred by rumors of construction jobs, try their fortunes in the Carolinas, Georgia, New Orleans."

Immigration System's Goals Said To Be In Conflict. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A1, Jordan, 2.04M) reports in an approximately 2600 word story on the case of Brazilian immigrant Zandro Souza, who worked his way to become a successful chef on Martha's Vineyard. During "a final interview with a U.S. immigration official in Providence, R.I., the Souzas' five-year effort to win legal status hit a wall." The Souzas' 11-year-old son, Igor, "is blind and developmentally delayed." Souza says "he has paid almost all of Igor's medical bills -- about $20,000 annually -- out of pocket, without insurance or help from government programs. He feared accepting aid would jeopardize his family's attempt to gain permanent U.S. residency." According to Souza, 'the immigration official told him that if Mr. Souza and his wife died, their son could become a 'public charge.' Although the family tried to prove that Igor would be cared for if his parents passed away, the U.S. government earlier this year denied green cards to the couple and their son and placed them in deportation proceedings. This time the government cited another reason for rejection -- that they applied for and entered on tourist visas but intended to stay permanently." The Souzas' story "shows how compassion can collide with hard-nosed financial considerations as the U.S. decides which immigrants should be admitted and which should be turned back."

TAX:

US Virgin Islands Decries IRS Tax Crackdown.

The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A4, Matthews) reports, "For decades, the U.S. Virgin Islands was a friendly place for business owners looking to skirt U.S. taxes. Too friendly, Congress declared back in 2004, changing the relevant statute. Since then, the Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service have been cracking down. … Now, elected officials and business leaders in the U.S. territory are complaining that the federal government has gone too far and the tax crackdown is threatening the local economy and government revenue. They are lobbying Congress to ease up. … 'While these changes were aimed at preventing tax abuse by persons who neither lived nor worked in the Virgin Islands, the changes went too far, forcing many legitimate businesses to close their doors,' Charles Turnbull, governor of the Virgin Islands (population about 109,000), told a Senate committee this year." The Journal adds, "The controversy is a reminder that what looks like an odious tax dodge to the Treasury and IRS can look like a well-justified tax break to individuals and communities that benefit from it. The tension comes as the Treasury is under pressure to collect more of the taxes that are legally owed. The IRS estimates about 17% of all taxes owed -- about $290 billion every year -- go unpaid. … In June 2004, the IRS warned companies in what is known as the Economic Development Commission program to avoid manipulating residency and income rules to qualify for the tax break. The Treasury and IRS also began implementing new regulations that significantly lengthened the time a person seeking the tax break had to live in the Virgin Islands. The old rule required a resident to be on the Islands for 122 days a year on average, over three years, to qualify. The new ones required a resident to spend at least 183 days, or roughly six months, every year. … The Treasury and IRS began enforcing the new regulation in earnest in early 2005, and -- to the consternation of some on the Islands -- the IRS asserted that it had authority to go back as far as it wanted without regard to the statute of limitations. IRS spokesman Terry Lemons wouldn't estimate how many audits are in the works, saying only that the Virgin Islands is facing increased scrutiny."

DOJ_NMG_0109053

Luxury Skyboxes At College Stadiums Draw Tax Scrutiny. . The Wall Street Journal (12/27, B1, Golden) reports, "This week, college football bowl games dominate television sports programming. But, off screen, little-known tax breaks are spurring the latest scrimmage over commercialism in college athletics. Some academics and legislators, contending that college football's multibillion-dollar building boom detracts from schools' educational mission, are targeting tax laws that treat payments for luxury seating and naming rights as charitable gifts." The Journal continues, "Two congressional committees have looked into the tax breaks in recent months, seeking information from the National Collegiate Athletic Association and hearing testimony from critics. The tax benefits have also figured in a controversy at the University of Michigan over a proposed $226 million stadium renovation. … The tax perquisites 'could be the Achilles' heel of stadium expansions, a way to put the brakes on,' says former University of Michigan President James Duderstadt." The Journal adds, "Over the past decade, many football powerhouses have upgraded their stadiums, and the spending spree shows little sign of abating. Michigan plans to build 83 luxury suites at its stadium, known as 'The Big House.' The University of Texas recently embarked on a $175 million stadium reconstruction, adding 47 luxury suites. Partly as a result of debt payments on capital outlays, colleges' athletic spending is increasing more than three times as fast as their overall spending, according to the NCAA. … Universities typically finance these renovations by issuing tax-exempt bonds. They then make payments on the debt by leasing the new luxury suites and other preferred seating to individuals or corporations. Suites -- usually featuring 16 seats, catered food, televisions and high-speed Internet access -- are priced at $50,000 to $90,000 a year."

WSJournal Warns GOP Not To Agree To Payroll Tax Hike. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) editorializes, "When these columns warned last month against a tax increase next year to 'save' Social Security, White House officials said we were hooting at phantoms. Well, the more we listen to senior Republicans, the more worried we get." White House spokesman Tony Snow "was…noncommittal on taxes, saying that 'I'm not ruling it up and I'm not ruling it down.' More than one GOP Senator has told us privately he's open to the idea. And no less a political student than Bill Thomas, the soon-to-retire Chairman of House Ways and Means, recently told a public forum that 'I wish I were a bit more comfortable in listening to some of the noises that are currently being made' by his GOP colleagues. Uh, oh." The Journal adds that "what liberals dearly want is to raise the payroll tax cap," which would "eviscerate" President Bush's "most impressive domestic achievement: the pro-growth tax cuts. If the tax cap were eliminated entirely, the President would be signing into law one of the largest tax hikes in US history, or more than $1.3 trillion in new taxes over the first 10 years alone." Also, "a tax increase of any kind with GOP fingerprints would remove the one big political brand advantage that Republicans still have over Democrats."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Fifth Circuit Nominee Asks Bush To Withdraw His Nomination. The New York Times and Washington Post run an AP story this morning (12/27) reporting, "Michael Wallace, a Jackson lawyer, sent a letter to President Bush asking that his name be withdrawn from nomination to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit. Though Mr. Wallace wrote that he believed most senators would consent to his nomination," he said the incoming Judiciary Committee chairman, Senator Patrick J. Leahy, "made it clear two weeks ago that he intends to permit vacancies to be filled only with consensus nominees.'"

Bush's AIDS Initiative Beset By Poor Record Keeping. The Washington Times/AP (12/27, A1, Beamish) reports, "President Bush's ambitious AIDS-fighting program in poor countries has pushed so hard for fast results that basic record keeping and accountability often went by the wayside, making it hard to judge the true success, according to government audits and officials." The AP adds, "Investigators found the three-year-old, $15-billion program has overcounted and undercounted thousands patients it helped or was unable to verify claims of success by local groups that took US money to prevent the spread of disease or care for AIDS victims and their children." The Bush Administration "says it has worked to fix the problems that were found in multiple countries and outlined in several audits reviewed by The Associated Press. 'It's not good enough for the auditors to hear from the mission that we did A, B and C but we can't prove it to you, or there's no documentation to prove that we did it,' said Joe Farinella, a top watchdog inside the U.S. Agency for International Development."

DOJ_NMG_0109054

Earmark Moratorium Not Foolproof. USA Today (12/27, Wolf, 2.27M) reports, "Billions of taxpayer dollars will continue to flow next year to thousands of projects sought by lawmakers, despite Democratic leaders' vow to place a moratorium on so-called congressional earmarks when they take control of Congress next week. … Projects authorized in prior years and not yet completed will be largely unaffected by the moratorium unless federal agencies choose to stop funding them, officials say. In addition, more than 2,600 projects won passage in a 2007 defense appropriations bill before the moratorium was announced." USA Today adds, "Even new projects could win funding if lawmakers persuade agencies to continue paying for them."

The AP (12/27, Taylor) also says the Democrats' move "will hardly stop horse trading in Washington or moves by lawmakers to try to steer taxpayer money back home. Nor will it touch billions of dollars in already budgeted Pentagon earmarks, which go to everything from research into better body armor for overseas troops to finding bone marrow matches to treat leukemia patients." The "temporary ban on earmarks…has been greeted with applause by budget hawks and is seen as a savvy political move. But many in the rank and file are not happy. 'I've had my share of calls and they weren't to wish me a Merry Christmas,' said incoming Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey, D-Wis."

Democratic Pledge To Engage GOP Could Prove Troublesome For Vulnerable Lawmakers. The New York Times (12/27, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "After chafing for years under what they saw as flagrant Republican abuse of Congressional power and procedures, the incoming [Democratic[majority has promised to restore House and Senate practices to those more closely resembling the textbook version of how a bill becomes law: daylight debate, serious amendments and minority party participation." But "pledges to engage Republicans legislatively carry risks. If Democrats do not follow through or revert to practices they have spent recent years condemning, they are certain to come under attack from watchdog groups and Republicans." Moreover, Republicans "are hoping Democrats stick to their guns and allow the minority a stronger voice on legislation. The opposition leadership said it would take the opportunity to put forward initiatives that could be potentially troublesome for newly elected Democrats in Republican-leaning districts who within months will have to defend their hard-won seats." Republicans "see the ability to force tough votes…as having two potential benefits: It can put vulnerable Democrats on record with positions that might not be popular at home, or it can fracture the untested Democratic majority."

Some Companies Fail To Warn Medicare Part D Recipients Of Drug Plan Changes. The New York Times (12/27, Pear, 1.16M) reports, "Some prescription drug plans did not inform Medicare beneficiaries of impending changes in their costs and benefits, as they were required to do, Bush administration officials and Congressional aides said Tuesday." This "could be a serious omission in a program where beneficiaries need accurate information to choose among dozens of competing private plans." Administration "officials have told Congress that they may give these beneficiaries a six-week extension of the open-enrollment period, which ends Sunday. Beneficiaries could use the extra time to compare the options that will be available to them in 2007. … The administration informed Congress of the problem last week. Administration officials said they would consider imposing penalties on companies that did not provide the necessary information to beneficiaries. 'There could be penalties for plans that did not send out the annual notice of change on time,' said Jeff Nelligan, a spokesman for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services."

Medicare Part D Said To Hurt Small Pharmacies. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 10, 2:50, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "Millions of Americans face a deadline this Sunday, that's when the open enrollment period ends for Medicare part 'D'. First time users need to sign up and current recipients to want to change their coverage need to do so by New Year's Eve. For many seniors, Medicare part 'D' is perplexing, but for many mom-and-pop pharmacies, it may be deadly." CBS (Andrews) added that seniors "get Medicare coverage through private insurance companies which in turn have lowered the fees and reimbursements they pay" the pharmacies, which cuts into their margins. A "lot of small town pharmacists are selling to big chains like Walgreens or Rite Aide which hire pharmacists to work for them."

Bushes' Gift Exchange Noted. The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 3, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) reported, "The first family did get time to exchange Christmas gifts at Camp David. The President gave the First Lady earrings, the First Lady gave the President a new suit, biking shoes and a Sam Moore CD. The couple also made an online donation to a group that fights malaria in the name of his parents."

DOJ_NMG_0109055

Wording Of White House Pool Report Raises Eyebrows. Under the headline "Bush Levitates," the Washington Times (12/27, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside The Beltway" column, "Official White House pool report, dated yesterday: 'After a dense morning fog cleared, President George W. Bush lifted off from Camp David with first lady Laura Bush for a weeklong trip to his Texas ranch after spending Christmas at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland.'"

Email About Bush's Medical Center Visit Makes Unusual Apology. The Washington Post (12/27, A17, Kamen, 690K) reports in its "In the Loop" column, "President Bush's pre-Christmas visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center caused some unexpected problems, judging from an e-mail alert we received. There were the usual traffic rerouting and parking restrictions, from 8 p.m. on Dec. 21 until 2 p.m. the next day. The e-mail lists 12 such changes likely to frustrate drivers and includes an apology: Traffic will be blocked temporarily around the campus and re-routed if necessary. Sorry for the incontinence during this mission." Adds the Post, "We're sorry, too."

NYTimes Urges Congress To Freeze Tax Break To Provide Healthcare To Children. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "Thanks to the 2001 tax cut law, over the next four years the federal government will forgo some $30 billion so America's wealthiest taxpayers can claim bigger write-offs for expenses like dependents and mortgage interest. One-third of those tax cuts kicked in this year, with the rest scheduled to take effect in 2008 and 2010. … Over roughly the same period, the government is looking at a $14 billion shortfall in its share of financing for a crucial federal-state program that provides health insurance to poor children, the so-called Schip, or State Children's Health Insurance Program. Without full financing, 1.5 million children will be cut from the program or underserved. … The new Democratically controlled Congress must move quickly to prevent that. When it convenes in the new year, Congress should pass a law to freeze the tax write-offs at 2007 levels. … The children urgently need to win this one, and only the new Congress can help them."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Up Despite "Disappointing" Retail Sales. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, C1, Browning, 2.04M) reports, "Stocks entered what investors sometimes call the year-end silly season, putting in widespread gains on thin trading activity as investors ignored disappointing retail-sales reports. Some analysts credited a sharp decline in oil prices, the biggest in more than a month. Others said the few influential investors at work in the year's waning days were simply betting that the rally that began in July would last through year's end." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "ended its three-session slump and rebounded 64.41 points, or 0.52%, to 12407.63. It is up 15.8% this year, less than 70 points from the record 12471.32 hit one week ago. … The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 0.44%, or 6.14 points, to 1416.90, up 13.5% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index advanced 0.51%, or 12.33 points, to 2413.51, ahead 9.4% for the year." NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 6, 0:15, Holt, 9.87M) also noted the stock numbers.

ABC World News (12/26, story 3, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In this country, Christmas is over. Frenzy in the stores is not. The first read on the shopping season, spending from Thanksgiving to Christmas was 6.6% higher than last year. Good. But not as good as forecast. So, as stores reopen today, retailers were hoping post-Christmas sales would rescue Christmas sales." ABC (Stone) added, "Shoppers swarmed the stores this crucial holiday weekend. But the final burst of buying didn't make the cut." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 4, 2:30, Mitchell, 7.66M) and NBC Nightly News (12/26, story 5, 2:15, Holt, 9.87M) ran similar reports.

President Ford Dead At 93. The AP (12/27, Smith, Cannon) reports this morning, "Gerald Rudolph Ford Jr., who became the 38th president of the United States as a result of some of the most extraordinary events in American history and sought to restore the nation's confidence in the basic institutions of government, died Tuesday. His wife, Betty, reported the death in a statement." President Bush issued a statement about the death shortly after midnight: "President Ford was a great American who gave many years of dedicated service to our country. ... [H]e assumed the Presidency in an hour of national turmoil and division. With his quiet integrity, common sense, and kind instincts, President Ford helped heal our land and restore public confidence in the Presidency. … The American people will always admire Gerald Ford's devotion to duty, his personal character, and the honorable conduct of his administration. We mourn the loss of such a leader."

Stories in the Los Angeles Times (12/27, Jackson, 850K), Washington Post (12/27, Smith, Cannon, 690K), New York Times (12/27, Naughton, Clymer, 1.16M) and USA Today (Nichols, Vanden Brook, 2.27M), among others, also note the former President's passing.

In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (12/27, 850K) says "Ford will be remembered most for one act: his pardon of Nixon, just one month after the resignation. … The pardon was a mistake, inconsistent with the fundamental principle that everyone, including the president, is equal before the law." The Times adds, "Ford's intention, some believe, was to prove that he could act as his own man and follow his own conscience. Others suggest he was influenced by the ghost of his own father, an abusive man who was devastated when Ford's mother divorced him and who died before the son had a chance to forgive him. … He may have been too nice a guy."

DOJ_NMG_0109056

DC Settles Dispute With Retailer. The Washington Post (12/27, D03, Shin) reports, "USA Discounters, a Virginia Beach retailer, has agreed to limit what it charges District customers paying with credit and to pay $50,000 into a consumer-protection fund to settle allegations that it imposed finance charges that weren't properly disclosed." The Post continues, "The company sells furniture, electronics, computers and other items, largely to customers with poor credit and with a special focus on members of the military. In addition to locations in the District and Lanham, it has eight other stores near Fort Belvoir, the Norfolk naval installation, Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, Fort Benning in Georgia, and Fort Hood in Texas. … The company denies any wrongdoing, said Timothy W. Dorsey, USA Discounters' vice president and general counsel." The Post adds, "The voluntary agreement, reached Thursday with the D.C. attorney general's office, stemmed from agency concerns that the majority of the company's customers, who buy merchandise using the chain's in-house financing program, routinely paid substantially higher markups than did customers using cash. … Customers buying on credit typically pay in installments over a limited period. For example, at the USA Discounters in Northeast Washington yesterday, a recliner upholstered with the Redskins logo was on sale for twice-monthly installments of $36 for 24 months -- for a total of $1,728. A coffee table was being offered for twice-monthly payments of $19 for 24 months, or a total of $912. … Customers can try to negotiate for a reduced price, Dorsey said. Those armed with cash can often get better deals. … But because credit customers regularly paid substantially more, the D.C. attorney general's office alleged that USA Discounters was making customers pay finance charges without telling them. Under the federal Truth in Lending Act, costs imposed on credit customers and not on cash customers are considered finance charges and must be disclosed, the agency said."

2008 Presidential Announcements Seen As "Hardly Meaningless." The New York Times (12/27, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "On Thursday, John Edwards is planning to announce what has been clear to much of the world since the end of the last presidential election: He is running for president in 2008. A similar declaration is expected shortly from Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, followed, in all probability, by Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, Barack Obama and John McCain." The Times adds that "for all the very orchestrated hoopla about to be heaped on American voters over the next few weeks, presidential announcements have become, more often than not, vestigial remnants of the way presidential politics were once conducted (or at least the way they are remembered). Rather than being big moments in which candidates lay down ideological markers and discuss what they would do as president, announcements are more of a pro forma exercise of the obvious. … But if formal announcements hold little drama, they are hardly meaningless. Their timing and staging reflect how presidential politics are changing in the United States in 2008, and offer a glimpse at problems each candidate faces one year before the Iowa caucus. The announcements are an insight into how campaigns are adapting to the pressures of the Internet, the demands of fund-raising, the broad range of avenues for reaching voters and mobilizing supporters, and the particular dynamics of the '08 campaign, crowded with candidates, many of them celebrities."

Schwarzenegger Undergoes Surgery For Broken Leg. The New York Times/AP (12/27, Schou) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's "broken leg was put back together with wires and screws Tuesday, and the 'Terminator' star should make a full recovery, though he will probably be on crutches during his inauguration next week, officials aid." The Los Angeles Times (12/27, Nicholas, 850K) notes that "while the governor was under anesthesia, he relinquished the powers of office to Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante. Schwarzenegger resumed his duties about 10:45 a.m. when his doctors pronounced him fit." The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Nicholas, 617K), among other papers across the nation, also reports the story this morning. ABC World News (12/26, story 7, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the governor "will likely be on crutches for his second inauguration that comes next month." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 7, 0:15, Mitchell, 7.66M) also ran a brief story on the skiing accident.

DC Marriage Strengthening Program Examined. The Washington Times (12/27, Ward, 88K) reports on Nisa Muhammad's "Wedded Bliss" program, "which will receive $1.3 million in federal money over the next four years, is aimed at helping black couples." Muhammad's program "is one of many that churches and religious groups are using to strengthen marriages and foster new ones. Wedded Bliss is an eight-week class that encourages couples to marry by helping them build intimacy and teaching communication skills."

DOJ_NMG_0109057

Best-Off In US Said To Benefit From Trade Deficit. In his Washington Post column (12/27, D1), Steven Pearlstein says, "With Democrats about to take charge on Capitol Hill, we're going to be hearing a lot about the widening income gap between rich and poor." It would be "an exaggeration, of course, to argue that our large and persistent trade deficit is the major factor in rising inequality. After all, inequality also is rising in countries with trade surpluses. But I think the deficit does help explain why so much of the country's income gains have gone into the pockets of investment bankers, money managers, real estate developers, wealthy families and corporate executives loaded up with stock options. I'm sure these folks believe they are pulling away from the pack because they work harder and create more economic value than the rest of us. But in the coming debate, we need to remember that they are also the lucky beneficiaries of a runaway trade deficit and the bubble-prone economy it has created."

Middle Class "Squeeze" Seen As Byproduct Of Economic Success, Stress. In his Washington Post column (12/27, A19), Robert Samuelson says, "Americans cannot escape these realities. The economy will remain precarious if it remains productive. The new technologies and products we celebrate inflict anxiety by redefining middle-class society. The causes of our success are also the sources of our stress. Of course, many of today's complaints (growing inequality, eroding health insurance) are legitimate and, to some extent, might be corrected. But the remedies -- assuming they didn't make matters worse -- would succeed only temporarily, because they would not erase the basic dilemma. The middle-class 'squeeze' never vanishes."

NYTimes Says Union Rules Protecting Senior Teachers Need To End. The New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The United States has a long and shameful history of dumping its least effective, least qualified teachers into the schools that serve the neediest children. The No Child Left Behind Act requires the states to end this practice." To do that "districts will need to abandon union rules that basically guarantee senior teachers the right to change schools whenever they want," because "school managers, who are increasingly being held accountable for student performance, need to be able to hire the candidate best suited for the position."

US Signals Support For Ethiopian Move Against Somali Islamists. The AP (12/27, Hassan) reports soldiers of the transitional government of Somalia, "joined by troops from neighboring Ethiopia, advanced toward" the capital of Mogadishu "as Islamic fighters dug in and promised a 'new phase' in the war — a chilling pronouncement from a movement that has threatened suicide attacks." State Department spokesman Gonzalo Gallegos "appeared to endorse Ethiopia's military action, saying it had 'genuine security concerns' about the growth of powerful Islamic militias next door."

The New York Times (12/27, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the US "signaled its support for the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia, calling it a response to 'aggression' by Islamists who have since the summer been consolidating power in the country." But the Ethiopian military presence "has nonetheless been awkward for American officials."

The Financial Times (12/27, England) reports the "bombardment by Ethiopian fighter jets and artillery…marked a dramatic escalation of the conflict in the Horn of Africa nation." The Washington Post (12/27, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports in a front page story, "UN officials warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa." Former US Ambassador David Shinn said, "One wonders how long they can hang on in this situation, because eventually it's going to turn into a nasty guerrilla war, and I don't think the Ethiopians have the stomach to carry on with that kind of campaign."

The New York Times (12/27, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports American officials "have given Ethiopia, one [of] its closest allies in Africa, their tacit approval to do what is necessary to neutralize the Islamists, whom American intelligence agents have accused of sheltering terrorists with Al Qaeda. But American officials have asked Ethiopia to avoid strikes that could kill large numbers of civilians, and so far Ethiopia seems to be cooperating."

The Washington Post (12/27, A1, McCrummen, 690K) reports the Ethiopian troops "fought their way closer to the Somali capital of Mogadishu on Tuesday, pushing back militias loyal to the Islamic Courts movement that has until now controlled much of the country and vowed to wage a guerrilla war against Ethiopia lasting 'years and years and years.'" UN officials "warned of a humanitarian crisis in Somalia, while fears remained high that Ethiopia's aggressive military campaign could have disastrous consequences not only for Somalia but across the Horn of Africa." It was "unclear Tuesday whether Ethiopian troops were preparing to invade Mogadishu or merely surround it."

Somalia Conflict Said To Require Diplomatic Solution. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (12/27, A8), Jonathan Stevenson, professor of strategic studies in the Strategic Research Department at the U.S. Naval War College, says, "The primary combatants are Somalia's secular Transitional Federal Government (TFG), which is internationally recognized and politically supported by the U.S., and the Islamist 'Islamic Courts Union' that holds sway on the ground. They are backed militarily by two fierce rivals,

DOJ_NMG_0109058

Ethiopia and Eritrea, respectively. The military balance appears indeterminate. Ethiopia has deployed 15-20,000 troops in Somalia. Eritrea has provided arms to the Islamic Courts militias and sent only about 2,000 troops to support them; but the Islamic Courts hold more territory than the TFG and have greater indigenous assets and popular support. Even if Somalia does not become a terrorist redoubt, it could become a potent fount of regional geopolitical instability and perhaps the next 'field of jihad' unless diplomatic attention is rallied to rescue the situation."

Administration Position On Somalia Said To Be "Somewhat Confused." The Washington Post (12/27, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "Having floundered through a series of failed Somalia strategies, the administration appears to have a somewhat confused view of the latest fighting. Earlier this month it pushed for a U.N. Security Council resolution that called for an end to foreign intervention, the deployment of a peacekeeping force and negotiations between the rival Somali governments. President Bush spoke yesterday with the president of Uganda, which had offered peacekeepers. Yet even while reiterating its call for negotiations, the administration also appears to be supporting the Ethiopian offensive: The State Department said that Ethiopia had a right to defend itself against the Islamists and that its troops were there at the invitation of a legitimate authority, the transitional government. Maybe the Ethiopian forces will crush the Islamists and their al-Qaeda allies and thereby rescue the United States from its predicament. More likely, the administration will have to prepare for much more active U.S. engagement in what is emerging as a hot new front in the war on terrorism."

Iranian Parliament Votes To "Revise" IAEA Relations. The AP (12/27) reports Iran's parliament "voted Wednesday to urge the government to 'revise' ties with the U.N. nuclear agency in a move seen as likely to reduce the country's cooperation with the international atomic authority." The vote came "four days after the U.N. Security Council decided to impose limited sanctions on Iran for its refusal to cease enrichment of uranium — a process that produces the material for either nuclear reactors or bombs." Members of Iran's ruling hierarchy "had repeatedly urged the government to cut ties with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog, if the Security Council imposes sanctions." Wednesday's vote "in parliament stopped short of recommending a severance of relations with the IAEA, but it put the Vienna-based agency on notice that business would not be as usual."

Before the vote, the New York Times (12/27, Fathi, 1.16M) reported "two high-level officials said they doubted that Iran would bar nuclear inspectors and drop out of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty." Hard-line politicians "and conservative newspapers in Iran had called for taking those strong actions."

The Financial Times (12/27, Bozorgmehr) reports the UN Security Council vote "was dismissed by President Ahmadi-Nejad on Sunday as 'illegal' and 'superficial.'" Iran's policy "seems to be neither to accept the UN demand, nor make any immediate threats to withdraw from the Non-Proliferation Treaty or to deliberately upset the oil market." However, "the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, who is thought to be the key decision maker, has not yet reacted to the UN resolution."

The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A6, 2.04M) reports President Ahmadinejad "said the U.N. resolution -- drawn up by Britain, France and Germany and supported unanimously by the Security Council -- could change Iran's relationship with the International Atomic Energy Agency, the U.N.'s nuclear watchdog." Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, "said the resolution made his country more 'decisive in realizing our nuclear aims.' He said it would step up enrichment activities."

Iran Objects To Blair Claims It Poses "Threat" To Region. AFP (12/27) reports Iran "summoned Britain's ambassador in Tehran to its foreign ministry to hear its 'strong objections' to British Prime Minister Tony Blair's claim that the Islamic republic poses a threat to the region." The "official IRNA agency said Geoffrey Adams was told by Ibrahim Rahimpour, the foreign ministry's director general for western European affairs, that Iran expects Britain 'to stop the tirade of allegations' against it." Rahimpour "also criticised Britain for misrepresenting Iran's civilian nuclear program, after it co-sponsored a UN Security Council resolution last Saturday that imposed sanctions on Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programmes."

WSJournal Says State Department Backing For UN Resolution Was "Unenthusiastic." The Wall Street Journal (12/27, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "Among the least surprising news coming out of the holiday weekend is that Iran denounced even the U.N. Security Council's tepid sanctions resolution against its nuclear weapons program. More surprising -- and encouraging -- is that the U.S. State Department also seems unenthusiastic." The "charade was even more than the State Department could bear to endorse wholeheartedly. Nicholas Burns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's right-hand man, praised the resolution for isolating Iran but added that 'We don't think this resolution is enough in itself.' And he suggested that the U.S. would now work to form coalitions outside of the U.N. to add pressure on Tehran. It's about time."

Assad May Be Seeking Closer Ties With West. The Washington Times (12/27, Athanasiadis, 88K) reports, "Recent visits by Syrian President Bashar Assad to US-allied Yemen and the United Arab Emirates are prompting speculation that Syria is seeking to leave the Iranian orbit and pursue closer ties with the West." Such a move "would fulfill a major recommendation of the Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, which suggested it might be possible through diplomacy to pry Syria away from Iran." In "another apparent overture yesterday, Mr. Assad told visiting Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, that he was willing to host a conference where all the factions of Iraq could seek a consensus on the country's future."

DOJ_NMG_0109059

In a USA Today letter to the editor (12/27), Syrian Ambassador Imad Moustapha says, "It is always refreshing to hear moderate, wise voices from the United States calling for what diplomacy is really about: dialogue and engagement ('A two-way street with Syria,' The Forum, Dec. 20). Syria has repeatedly called upon this Administration to abandon its policies toward Syria and work together toward a more constructive policy in the Middle East. Former secretaries of State Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and James Baker — who, unlike Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, had a direct working relationship with Syria — consider their engagement with Syria as one that served U.S. national interests. Syria is ready and willing to engage, but this needs courage and vision from the other side."

Israel Approves New West Bank Settlement Despite Vow To US. The AP (12/27, Nessman) reports officials said Israel "has approved a new settlement in the West Bank to house former Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip…breaking a promise to the US to halt home construction in the Palestinian territories." Construction in the northern West Bank town of Maskiot "began months ago, but the project only received final approval from the Defense Ministry last week, said Dubi Tal, head of the Jordan Valley regional council." Geoff Anisman, a spokesman for the US Embassy in Tel Aviv, said, "The US view on settlements remains unchanged." The Washington Post (12/27, A10, 690K) runs a short version of the AP story.

The New York Times (12/27, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports the move prompted "Palestinian anger and American concern. The announcement, by the Defense Ministry and settler groups, seemed to run counter to the prevailing effort by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who had offered a series of gestures to the Palestinians several days ago, after meeting with the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas." In an editorial, the New York Times (12/27, 1.16M) says that "the idea of a comprehensive peace between Israelis and Palestinians seems a distant dream. Yet it represents the best long-term assurance of Israel's survival as a secure Jewish democracy at peace with its Arab neighbors. Every new settlement planted on the West Bank creates a needless obstacle to the realization of that dream."

Mubarak Says New Laws Will Increase Democracy In Egypt. The Washington Post/AP (12/27, A15) reports, "President Hosni Mubarak said Tuesday that laws to be passed in 2007 would improve democracy and abolish Egypt's 25-year state of emergency, but rights activists said they doubted the long-serving leader would liberalize the country." Mubarak "asked lawmakers to amend 34 articles in the Egyptian constitution to 'consecrate the people's sovereignty as a source of power and give parliament more authority to monitor the government.'"

South Korean Officials Says US Offered To Remove North From Terror List. The AP (12/27) reports South Korea's main nuclear envoy, Chun Yung-woo, said the US "offered to remove North Korea from Washington's list of states sponsoring terrorism if the communist regime dismantles its atomic weapons program." Chun said the "proposal was just one of the incentives the US spelled out last week at six-nation nuclear disarmament talks with the North, along with offers of security guarantees, a peace treaty and normalization of relations." US diplomats "have declined to discuss specifics of their talks with the North Koreans, and State Department spokeswoman Amanda Rogers-Harper would not confirm Chun's report."

Mystery Novel Set In North Korea Compared To "Gorky Park." The Washington Post (12/27, A17, Kessler, 690K) reports "A Corpse in the Koryo," by James Church, "is a crackling good mystery novel, filled with unusual characters involved in a complex plot that keeps you guessing to the end. It has received rave reviews -- as a mystery novel." But the book "has also caused a stir among Asia specialists because it offers an unusually nuanced and detailed portrait of one of the most closed societies on Earth -- North Korea. Much like Martin Cruz Smith's novel 'Gorky Park,' which depicted life in the Soviet Union in the early 1980s through the eyes of police inspector, 'A Corpse on the Koryo' provides a vivid window into a mysterious country through the perspective of its primary character -- Inspector O."

Sudan May Be Willing To Accept UN Force In Darfur. The Washington Post (12/27, A8, Linzer, 690K) reports Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir "has suggested that he would be willing to accept a peacekeeping force with United Nations troops in Darfur, where his counterinsurgency campaign has left hundreds of thousands of civilians dead and millions homeless." Under "mounting pressure from the Bush administration to respond to UN plans for a cease-fire, Bashir appeared to accept some of Secretary General Kofi Annan's proposals in a letter sent over the weekend."

US Reaching Out To Leftist Critics In Latin America. McClatchy (12/27, Bachelet) reports the Bush

DOJ_NMG_0109060

Administration has "refused to talk to foes such as Iran, North Korea and Cuba, but it has no such qualms about some of its sternest critics in Latin America, including Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez." Less than "two weeks after Chavez won re-election earlier this month, the U.S. ambassador in Caracas met with the Venezuelan foreign minister to ease tensions between the two countries." Chavez "responded by attacking U.S. counter-drug efforts, so it's unclear if the charm offensive will work. But the move is part of a broader effort by U.S. officials to court leftist leaders who just weeks ago were warily viewed as pro-Chavez populists. This includes President-elects Daniel Ortega of Nicaragua and Ecuador's Rafael Correa, who recently heralded the rise of a socialist Latin America."

Surgeon Says Castro Doesn't Have Cancer. The Chicago Tribune (12/27, Marx, 617K) reports, "In the first independent diagnosis of Fidel Castro, a prominent Spanish surgeon said Tuesday the ailing 80-year-old leader does not have cancer and is recuperating slowly from intestinal surgery." Dr. Jose Luis Garcia Sabrido "traveled to Havana last Thursday to examine Castro at the request of Cuban authorities. Garcia Sabrido has returned to Madrid, where he told reporters that Castro's condition is stable and he does not require additional surgery." But Garcia Sabrido "declined to clarify what ailment Castro is suffering from. Cuban officials have said Castro's health condition is a state secret, and his Cuban doctors reportedly are sequestered." Similar stories appear in today's New York Times (12/27, McKinley, 1.16M), while the Washington Times and Washington Post run the same AP report on Castro's health (12/27, Giles).

ABC World News (12/26, story 6, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The doctor says Castro is recovering from intestinal surgery and is eager to get back to work. Castro has not been seen in public since July, which has sparked speculation about his health and his future." The CBS Evening News (12/26, story 6, 0:25, Mitchell, 7.66M) noted the doctor "said Castro is in stable condition."

The Christian Science Monitor (12/27, Fawthrop, 59K) analyzes the prospects for a post-Castro Cuba, where "experts have ruled out any dramatic lurch toward a liberal market economy that might undermine the island nation's heritage as the persistent holdout of traditional Communist policies. More relaxed social attitudes may also evolve gradually. Still, no one doubts that change is afoot."

Russia Relies On UN "Tantrum" As Diplomatic Weapon. The Washington Post (12/27, A10, Lynch, 690K) reports Russia has "brandished a new weapon in its diplomatic arsenal: the Security Council tantrum." Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin "barged out of the U.N. chamber Dec. 11, canceling a crucial meeting on Iran's nuclear program. Asked to explain why the 15-nation council's major powers would not be able to address the Iranian nuclear crisis, Churkin said: 'Because. Because I said so.'" The Post adds Churkin's "outburst reflected anger over a U.S. decision to raise concern about political developments in Belarus, a Russian ally that has gained international condemnation for its repressive policies. But it also echoed a classic Soviet practice at the United Nations dating back to 1945, when Soviet strongman Joseph Stalin's envoy, Andrei Gromyko, also used bluster to exact political concessions, threatening to pull out of the new organization unless the Security Council veto was expanded."

China Seeks To Curb Vehicle Production Rate. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, A2, Fairclough, 2.04M) reports China's "economic planners are waving a yellow flag at the nation's auto industry, warning that growth in car makers' production capacity is outstripping demand and calling for limits on further expansion." Passenger car sales "have been increasing at a torrid rate, making China the world's second-largest vehicle market by unit sales after the U.S. But car companies, rushing to cash in on the growth, have been adding assembly lines at an even faster rate, the planners said." The National Development and Reform Commission, "which sets China's industrial policy, said overcapacity is threatening the auto industry's health and laid out guidelines to rein in growth."

China's Illegal Power Plants, Coal Mines Challenge Beijing's Authority. The Wall Street Journal (12/27, Oster, 2.04M) reports that illegally-built power plants in China "have had unintended -- and detrimental -- consequences. By eschewing even basic environmental safeguards, they stand out as polluters even in an industry that is one of China's leading sources of emissions, officials say. They also have driven up the demand for and price of coal, the country's most abundant source of fuel. That, in turn, has spawned thousands of illegal coal mines that have contributed to more than 4,000 coal-mining deaths in China this year." The Journal adds, "One fifth of the power plants in China are illegal, according to government estimates -- enough to light up all of the U.K. While the electricity they supply is essential to power China's growth, the uncontrolled manner in which they are multiplying, often under the protection of local authorities, poses a challenge to Beijing's authority and its grip on energy policy."

Blair Flight Missed Runway Exit. The Washington Post/AP (12/27, A13) reports a commercial jet "carrying British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his family missed a runway exit and struck some lights after landing at Miami International Airport on Tuesday. The plane was not damaged and no injures were reported, officials said." British Airways Flight 209 "from London ran over a couple of airfield lights after landing around 6:15 p.m., but it did not leave the pavement and it taxied to the gate under its own power, airport spokesman Marc Henderson said."

DOJ_NMG_0109061

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Gerald Ford Dies At 93."
"Vendor's Reefer Sadness."
"Hezbollah Rises From Ruins Of Its Beirut home."
"Iraqi Court Upholds Death For Hussein."
"Democrats Will Soon Get A Say On Iraq."
"Accident Is A Bad Break For Gov.'s Privacy."

USA Today:
"More Officials In Midwest, South Adding Spanish Lessons To Training."
"Soul (And Rap And Funk) Loses 'Godfather'."
"Nuclear Traffic Doubles Since '90s."
"Nuclear Cases."

New York Times:
"Gerald R. Ford, 38th U.S. President, Dies."
"Iraqi Court Says Hussein Must Die Within 30 Days."
"Iran Is Seeking More Influence In Afghanistan."
"S.E.C. Changes Reporting Rule On Bosses' Pay."
"Strategy, Not Drama, in 'I Intend To Run In '08'."
"As Minds Age, What's Next? Brain Calisthenics."

Washington Post:
"Gerald R. Ford, 93, Dies; Led In Watergate's Wake."
"Iraqi Court Upholds Hussein's Sentence."
"Williams Leaves A Legacy Of Contrasts."
"7 U.S. Troops Added To Rising Toll In Iraq."
"Ethiopians Closing In On Capital of Somalia."
"U.S. Wants Polar Bears Listed As Threatened."
"Immigrants' Jobs Vanish With Housing Slowdown."

Washington Times:
"Selling Couples On Marriage."
"Biden To Fight Troop Surge."
"Gerald Ford Dies At 93."
"Saddam To be Hanged Within 39 Days."
"Baltimore Homicides Rises DC Likely To Record Drop."
"AIDS Program Loses Track OF Funds, Results."
"Assad Inspires 'Flip' Theories."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ford Dies."
"Lutz: Fuel Rules Could Doom US SUV, Truck Sales."
"Ford's Mulally Toyota Exec Talk In Japan."
"Michigan Micro-Districts Put Up A Fight To Survive."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Ex-President Ford Dies."
"Saddam Hanging Could Be 'Any Day'."
"Mars Rovers Mission Rolls On."
"James Brown's Funeral Expected To Draw Thousands."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Saddam's Execution; Pipeline Explosion; Retail Sales; Denver Airport Reopens; Tsunami Money; Castro's Health; Schwarzenegger Recovering; New Gadgets; People OF The Year.
CBS: Saddam's Execution; Biden-Iraq; First Family's Christmas; Retail Sales; Florida Tornados; Castro's Health; Schwarzenegger Recovering; Heartburn Medication Risks; Improving Schools-Cincinnati; Medicare Part 'D'; Mainstream Opera.
NBC: Saddam's Execution; Way Forward-Iraq; Pipeline Explosion-Nigeria; Tsunami Remembered; Retail Sales; Stock Market; FDA Report-Cloning; Caring For The Injured; Heartburn Medication Risks; Illegal Immigration Debate; James Brown Obit.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule. In Crawford, Texas.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: IRAQ _ 11 a.m. The Center for American Progress holds a telephone briefing on Iraq, with former Assistant Defense Secretary Lawrence Korb and Brian Katulis, both of the center. Notes: Callin number: 800-862-9098.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0109062

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, December 27, 2006 9:37 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, December 27, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061227.pdf; dojclips061227.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 27, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

US Tries To Assure Allies That Extraordinary Renditions Are Over (FT) 3
US Creates Terrorist Fingerprint Database (CSM) 4
Contractor's Handguns Missing From Homeland Security Vault (WP) 6
Saudi Arabia Frees 18 Ex-Gitmo Detainees (AP) 7
Guantanamo Needs Courthouse, Pentagon Says (LAT) 7

Homeland Response:

U.S. Senators Put To Rest Conspiracy Theory Behind Military Analysis Of Sept. 11 Attacks (FINDLAW/AP) 8
TSA Modifies Screening Machines (USAT) 9
Hope For New Orleans (column) (WP) 9

War News:

Gates Sending Brigade Of 82nd To Kuwait (AP) 11
Bush In Texas To Rethink Iraq Course (AP) 11
Bush's Iraq Plan Gets Big Build-up (AP) 12
Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP) 13
Democrats Prepare For A Battle On The War (LAT) 15
Biden To Fight Troop Buildup In Iraq (WP) 16
Biden Previews Democrats' Tack Against Troop Plan (WSJ) 17
Biden Opposes A Troop Increase In Iraq, Foreshadowing A Fight With The Bush Administration (NYT) 18
Biden To Fight Troop Surge (WT) 19
Biden To Run For White House In 2008 (FT) 20
Biden Vows To Fight Any Iraq Troop Boost (AP) 21
The Right Type Of 'Surge' (WP) 22
Bush's New Look On Iraq: Weary (WP) 23
Iraq Court Upholds Saddam Death Sentence (AP) 24
Iraqi Court Says Hussein Must Die Within 30 Days (NYT) 26
Iraqi Court Upholds Hussein's Sentence (WP) 28
Saddam To Hang Within 30 Days (USAT) 30
Saddam's Death Sentence Is Upheld (LAT) 31
Saddam Heads To The Gallows (WSJ) 32
Military Deaths In Iraq Exceed 9/11 Toll (AP) 32
7 U.S. Troops Added To Rising Toll In Iraq (WP) 33
U.S. Soldiers' Death Toll Climbs In Iraq (AP) 34
Car Bombs Strike Iraq's Shopping District (LAT) 36
Backlash After UK Forces Hit Basra Police Station (FT) 37
Basra Raid Sends Message (LAT) 38
On A Mission In A Hard Place (WP) 38
Iraqi Fugitive With Chicago Connections Surfaces In Jordan (CHIT) 39
US Says Captured Iranians Can Be Linked To Attacks (NYT) 40
Iran Is Seeking More Influence In Afghanistan (NYT) 41
Afghan Heroin Supply Surges In U.S. (CHIT) 45
NATO Must Follow U.S. Lead In Helping Afghan Civilians (USAT) 46
Uncle Sam Wants US Muslims To Serve (CSM) 47

DOJ:

Justice Attorneys Win Comp Time (FEDTIMES) 48
New U.S. Attorney Says Job Matters, Not How He Got It (ARKDG) 49
New United States Attorney Wants Focus Away From Appointment Process (AP) 50

Corporate Scandals:

Faked Documents May Be At Core Of Apple Case (LAW) 51
Cnet Will Pay Former Operations Chief Briggs $750,000 (Update5) (BLOOM) 53
Toll Of The Stock Options Scandal Heavy In 2006 (AP) 53
Open Spigot Bosses' Pay: How Stock Options Became Part Of The Problem (WSJ) 54
UnitedHealth Faces Formal Probe (WSJ) 61
DCX Probe Spans Globe (DETNEWS) 61
Ex-FBI Chief Freeh Aids DaimlerChrysler Bribe Probe (AP) 63
SEC Amends Rules On Disclosing Executive Compensation (LAW) 63
S.E.C. Changes Reporting Rule On Bosses' Pay (NYT) 64

Criminal Law:

Police Chiefs Eye More Federal Aid (WT) 66
Canadian Gold Medalist Detained On Child Abduction Charge (AP) 67
ID Thief Forges Leniency Letter (PPG) 68
Kansas Judge Lets Attorney General Press Abortion Case (USAT/AP) 68
Pet Store Owners Find Airline Luggage Lost From International Flights In Houston Trash Bin (AP) 69
Cybercrooks Deliver Trouble (WP) 69
Leading Cyber-Pirates Of The World (WSJ) 71
Rapist Preys On Men In Suburban Houston (AP) 72
Virginia DNA Review Hobbled (WP) 73
Law Mandates Disinterment Of Murderer (WP) 74
Backwoods Celebrity Faces Long Prison Term For Incest (WP) 75
Maryland's Death Penalty (WP) 76

Civil Law:

FBI Says Files In Leak Cases Are 'Missing' (NYS) 77
Seracare Wins OK For Plan Vote (AP) 78
Small Businesses Fight Fickle Rules (NYT) 78

Civil Rights:

Courts Seek New Ways To Handle Mentally Ill Criminal Defendants (AP) 80

Antitrust:

Delta's Antitrust Objections To Merger May Be Overstated (DEAL) 81
McClatchy Co. Flagship Newspaper Star Tribune Sold To Private Equity Group For $530 Million (FINDLAW/AP) ... 82
Private-Equity Group Taps Veteran Lobbyist (WSJ) 83
Private Funds Prepare To Lobby (WP) 83
Carlyle, Blackstone, Buyout Firms Form Lobby Group (Update1) (BLOOM) 84
Texas Pacific Tops Buy-outs With $101bn (FT) 84
Reliance Prepares For Hutchison Essar Bid (FT) 85

Environment:

House Democrats Want To Redistribute Big Oil Money To Conservation, Renewables (AP) 86
2007 Energy Outlook: Costs Up (CSM) 87
U.S. Wants Polar Bears Listed As Threatened (WP) 89
EXCO To Buy Two Gas Fields From Anadarko (WSJ) 90
Farmers And Conservationists Form A Rare Alliance (NYT) .. 91
Meat And The Planet (NYT) 92
Clone On The Range (WP) 93

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Authorities Bust Multi-million Dollar Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring (AP) 93
Arrests Break Up Hampton Roads Cocaine Ring, DEA Says (VAPILOT) 94
Mexican Drug-kingpin Suspects In Court Today (WT) 95
Gift Cards Just The Ticket For Organized Crime (CNS) 95
Gift Cards Popular With Underworld Set (CP) 96
Afghan Heroin's Surge Poses Danger In U.S. (LAT) 97
Afghan Heroin Taking Over U.S. Market (UPI) 99
Afghan Heroin Blamed For Surge Of Overdoses In Los Angeles (FOX) 99
News Briefs From Southern California (AP) 99
Remnants Of A Trial Prompt A Crusade (WP) 100

Immigration:

Lawsuits Challenge Texas Town's Immigration Law (LAT) . 101
Civil Rights Groups Sue Over Rent Law (FINDLAW/AP) 102
Our Founding Illegals (NYT) 102
Immigrants' Jobs Vanish With Housing Slowdown (WP) 103
Cost Of Care A Disabled Son Imperils Family's Immigration Hope (WSJ) 104

Tax:

Tax Haven Wants Its Welcome Mat Back (WSJ) 108
Tax Breaks For Skyboxes (WSJ) 109
The Payroll Tax Trap (WSJ) 111

Congress-Administration:

Mississippi: Judicial Nominee Withdraws (NYT/AP) 112
Lawyer Asks Bush To Revoke His Nomination To The Bench (WP/AP) 113
AIDS Program Loses Track Of Funds, Results (WT/AP) 113
Crackdown On 'Earmarks' Still Leaves Room For Some (USAT) 114
Ban On Pet Projects Won't Stop Trading (AP) 115
With Promises Of A Better-Run Congress, Democrats Take On Political Risks (NYT) 116
Drug Plan Companies Failed To Tell Of Changes (NYT) 118
Inside The Beltway (WT) 119
Frist Isn't Resting, On His Laurels Or Otherwise (WP) 120
An Early Test For Lawmakers (NYT) 121

Other News:

Festive Mood Sustains Stock Indexes Despite Retail Worries In Light Trading (WSJ) 122
Former President Ford Dies At 93 (WP) 123
Gerald Ford Dies At 93 (LAT) 132

DOJ_NMG_0109065

Gerald R. Ford, 38th U.S. President, Dies (NYT).....138
Ford Dies At 93 (USAT).....148
The Ford Presidency (LAT) 151
Retailer Settles Dispute With D.C. (WP).....152
Strategy, Not Drama, In 'I Intend To Run In '08' (NYT) 153
Schwarzenegger's Leg Is Repaired In Surgery (NYT/AP) 154
Accident Is A Bad Break For Gov.'s Privacy (LAT) 155
Schwarzenegger Cleared To Resume Duties After Surgery (CHIT).....157
Selling Couples On Marriage (WT).....157
Of Public Debt And Private Wealth (WP).....161
Myths And The Middle Class (WP).....162
Bumping In Schools (NYT) 163
Somalian Troops Advance Toward Capital (AP).....164
U.S. Signals Backing For Ethiopian Incursion Into Somalia (NYT) 165
Ethiopia Forces Somali Islamist Retreat (FT).....166
Ethiopians Closing In On Capital Of Somalia (WP) 167
Islamists Retreat In Somalia (NYT) 169
What's Going On In Somalia? (WSJ) 171
War In Somalia (WP) 172
Iran's Parliament Votes To Revise Ties With The U.N. Nuclear Agency (USAT/AP).....173
Iran Parliament Debates Reply To U.N. Penalties (NYT) 174
Iran 'revises' Co-operation With IAEA (FT).....174
Iran To Hasten Nuclear Work Despite U.N. Vote (WSJ).....175
Iran Summons UK Ambassador Over Blair Remarks (AFP).175
Iran Irresolution (WSJ) 176
Assad Inspires 'Flip' Theories (WT) 177
'Syria Is Ready And Willing To Engage' (USAT).....178
Israel Settlement Breaks Promise To U.S. (AP) 178
Despite Pledge, Israel Approves New Settlement (WP/AP)...179
Israel Plans First Settlement In 10 Years (NYT) 180
Israel's Mixed Messages (NYT) 181
Mubarak Vows Greater Democracy (WP/AP) 182
South Korea: U.S. Made North An Offer (AP) 182
The Book On North Korea (WP).....183
Sudan May Allow U.N. Force In Darfur (WP).....184
New U.S. Strategy In Latin America: Turn On The Charm (MCT) 185
No Cancer For Castro, Surgeon Says (CHIT) 186
Spanish Doctor Denies Castro Has Cancer (NYT) 187
Castro Called Cancer-free (WT/AP) 188
Castro's Ailment Not Malignant, Spanish Surgeon Says (WP/AP).....189
As Castro Fades, A Crop Of New Leaders (CSM).....190
Russian Continues The Tantrum Tradition At U.N. (WP) 191
China Urges Auto Makers To Limit Their Expansion (WSJ) 192
Illegal Power Plants, Coal Mines In China Pose Challenge For Beijing (WSJ).....193
Tony Blair On Jet That Struck Lights On Miami Runway (WP/AP).....196

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Tries To Assure Allies That Extraordinary Renditions Are Over (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The US is telling its overseas allies that it has stopped "extraordinary renditions" and needs their help to empty Guantánamo's prison cells. But human rights groups dispute this assertion and a question mark hangs over 200 "war on terror" detainees who could be held indefinitely without trial.

European diplomats say Washington is reacting to pressure from parliamentary investigations, lawsuits from former prisoners, and calls by friendly governments, including the UK, to close Guantánamo, the prison camp at a US naval base in Cuba.

However, the administration's response is seen as confused and inadequate. Analysts attribute this to internal divisions over how far to roll back controversial counter-terrorism practices - including torture, secret prisons, detention without trial, and renditions - as the price for rekindling transatlantic relations.

Washington was particularly stung by a report last month by a committee of the European parliament that condemned the alleged complicity of governments in the CIA's illegal detention and transportation of prisoners.

DOJ_NMG_0109066

It concluded that there were at least 1,245 overflights or stopovers by CIA aircraft in Europe, and that some probably involved prisoner transfers. Several highly publicised cases were documented.

Delegations from Europe visiting Washington since then have been assured that "extraordinary renditions" ended, or mostly ended, in 2003. US officials note that the lawsuits brought against the US by former detainees relate to events in 2003 or earlier, when even Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has admitted that "mistakes" happened.

The European committee defined "extraordinary rendition" as an "extra-judicial practice whereby an individual suspected of involvement in terrorism is illegally abducted, arrested and/or transferred into the custody of US officials and/or transported to another country for interrogation which, in the majority of cases, involves incommunicado detention and torture".

Visiting Europeans have been told that the US reserves the right to carry out renditions, but - as Ms Rice declared in a major statement a year ago - it would respect the sovereignty of other countries and would not send detainees to countries where the US believed they might be tortured.

John Sifton, a researcher for Human Rights Watch, strongly disputes the assertion that extraordinary renditions stopped in 2003. He said there had been people arrested in 2006 who were still unaccounted for, and others transported by the US from Pakistan, outside all judicial process, to the Middle East.

Human rights groups believe there are large numbers of prisoners in US custody who are unaccounted for and were not included in the 14 transferred to Guantánamo when President George W. Bush acknowledged for the first time in September the existence of secret CIA detention facilities, which he then ordered to be closed.

The US had also crafted a concept of "constructive custody" or "proxy detention", Mr Sifton said. This involved allies, such as Pakistan, Jordan and Morocco, holding detainees at the request of the US and allowing the US free access to them.

Andrew Tyrie, a British opposition MP who recently visited Washington, said the Bush administration was engaged in a fierce debate over the impact of more controversial US practices in the wake of the September 2001 attacks by al-Qaeda. "It is vital we send a message to moderate Muslims that these practices are no longer in our armoury against terrorism," he said, adding the US was also keen to revive the strong transatlantic bonds that existed before the invasion of Iraq.

Mr Bush says he wants to close Guantánamo, which will be five years old next month. But it is far from clear how or when this will happen.

Low-risk prisoners are being sent to other countries, following complex negotiations over conditions of their release or continued detention. According to the Pentagon, about 380 prisoners have left the prison since 2002. About 395 remain, of whom some 85 are now eligible for transfer or release.

The Military Commissions Act, signed by Mr Bush in October, was intended to speed the process of putting on trial Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the 9/11 attacks, and other prominent militants before special tribunals. Experts believe, however, that constitutional challenges will set this back a very long time.

Believing that only some 50 detainees would be tried, allies are concerned that 200 other prisoners, designated as high-risk, would be detained indefinitely without trial and barred from challenging their detention in the federal courts. Complicating the process is Washington's fear that releasing more detainees will lead to a flood of legal cases against the US.

Diplomats say Ms Rice has been influential in advocating change to detention policies she sees as damaging relations with allies, while Dick Cheney, vice-president, and David Addington, his chief of staff, are seen as obstacles. The removal of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary this month may have undermined the hardliners, however.

"We have no desire to be the world's jailer and do not hold detainees for any longer than necessary," said Jeffrey Gordon, a Pentagon spokesman.

But he also said there was a "significant amount of evidence" to justify holding "unlawful enemy combatants" and prevent their return to the battlefield.

US Creates Terrorist Fingerprint Database (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0109067

The US government is building a massive database designed to identify individual terror suspects from fingerprints on objects such as a tea glass in an Iraqi apartment or a shell casing in an abandoned Al Qaeda training camp.

The database is being created in part by forensic specialists searching for and preserving evidence overseas. They are collecting unidentified latent fingerprints in places once occupied by Al Qaeda and other suspected terrorists.

The information is feeding into a computerized system designed to match a name with an unidentified fingerprint.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff calls the program "a quantum step forward in security."

"(It) gives us the ability to identify the unknown, unidentified terrorist," he said in a recent speech. "It also creates a powerful deterrent for anybody who has ever spent time sitting in a training camp, or building a bomb in a safe house, or carrying out a terrorist mission on a battlefield."

Not everyone sees the creation of such a database as progress. Privacy advocates and civil libertarians say it could lead to a dangerous erosion of American rights. Privacy advocates voice concern

"Our assessment of these systems is that many that are undertaken with a goal of identifying terrorists eventually become systems of mass surveillance directed toward the American public," says Marc Rotenberg, president of the Electronic Privacy Information Center in Washington.

"When Secretary Chertoff says we are trying to identify people who were in safe houses in Iraq with terrorists, that is a very small part of the story," Mr. Rotenberg says. "The technology used to identify a terrorist in a safe house in Iraq is the exact same technology that can be used to identify a war protester in a Quaker meeting house in southern Florida."

Last year, the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) announced the completion of a database system that collects electronic fingerprints of both the index and middle fingers of every noncitizen entering the US. The system now documents 64 million travelers. The Homeland Security database is being linked with the FBI's database of more than 40 million subjects.

The effort prevented 1,300 convicted criminals and immigration law violators from entering the US, and blocked 1,000 others from gaining visas, according to Mr. Chertoff.

Now, Homeland Security is upgrading from a two-finger to a 10-finger system. In effect, it requires foreign visitors to submit to the kind of extensive fingerprinting usually reserved for criminals. But officials say that collecting all 10 prints ensures compatibility with the FBI database, and increases the investigative utility of the computerized system.

"Ten prints allows us to run not only against the database of known felons or known terrorists where we have fingerprints linked to a particular name, it lets us run against the databases we are collecting for latent fingerprints that are picked up in battlefields or safe houses or training camps all over the world," Chertoff said.

An unidentified latent print from a known terror safe house could provide an early warning by triggering an investigation if it matches someone trying to gain entry into the US, officials say.

Privacy advocates say the system is being presented to the American public and Congress as an antiterrorism tool. But they warn it could vastly increase the government's ability to track and investigate US citizens.

"It makes it sound as though this will have a limited purpose - terrorism, and a limited scope - non-Americans, but the reality is that the system is not going to be so limited," says Lee Tien of the Electronic Frontier Foundation based in San Francisco. "They will be using it for every kind of law enforcement there is. They will be collecting fingerprints on Americans, and it will be used for every general purpose." Fingerprinting part of ID science

Fingerprinting is a subset of a rapidly developing area of identification science called biometrics. Researchers are studying how to identify individuals in a crowd by using computers to match unique facial characteristics to those same characteristics on a driver's license photo. The federal and state governments are assembling databases preserving the DNA of convicted criminals. And studies are underway to use eye scans to identify individuals. But by far the government's largest identifying database relates to fingerprints, and it may soon grow larger.

In 2005, Congress passed the Real ID Act, which instructs DHS to develop a single standard for all state-issued driver's licenses and identification cards. The ID is expected to include a biometric identifier. Many experts say the most likely candidate will be a fingerprint.

If adopted, that action would create for the first time a government database of fingerprints of virtually every adult American citizen. "This could come home to Americans very, very quickly," Rotenberg says.

DOJ_NMG_0109068

Privacy advocates say they are hopeful that the new Democratic Congress will exert an aggressive oversight posture and study the implications of the fingerprint program before it is in place. An Oregon lawyer and his fingerprints

They point to the case of Oregon lawyer Brandon Mayfield.

The case began in mid-March 2004, shortly after terrorist bombs ripped through commuter trains in Madrid, Spain, killing 191 people and injuring 1,400. After the attacks, Spanish authorities found fingerprints on a plastic bag with detonators.

The FBI ran the prints through its computer system and found no matches, but identified several close nonmatches. Mr. Mayfield was the fourth of 20 close nonmatches.

Three FBI fingerprint examiners studied the Madrid fingerprint, and concluded that it had been made by Mayfield.

Mayfield's print was in the FBI's database because he had served in the armed forces and had earlier been charged with a crime.

FBI investigators learned that Mayfield had converted to Islam and had married an Egyptian immigrant. He also had served as the attorney in a custody case for a man who was convicted of conspiring to aid the Taliban and Al Qaeda.

Justice Department officials say this information was unknown to the three examiners when they matched Mayfield's print to the Madrid bombing.

Spanish officials had their doubts about the match. They rejected the FBI's conclusion and continued to investigate.

The FBI dismissed the skepticism of Spanish authorities. One official in the investigation wrote: "I spoke with the lab this morning and they are absolutely confident that they have a match on the print. No doubt about it!!!! They will testify in any court you swear them into."

The FBI began surveilling Mayfield and his family, including covertly entering his home and office. Mayfield was arrested and held in prison for two weeks.

Concerned about the possibility of a mistake, a federal judge ordered an independent analysis of the fingerprint. That analyst also concluded that the print belonged to Mayfield. Two million dollar settlement

That same day, Spanish authorities identified an Algerian man as the real source of the fingerprint.

Eventually, the FBI retracted its earlier conclusion. Last month the Justice Department agreed to pay Mayfield a $2 million settlement and issued a formal apology.

The Justice Department Inspector General's review of the case earlier this year warned about using a large database like the FBI's. "The enormous size of the (FBI) database and the power of the ... program can find a confusingly similar candidate print," the report says.

Mayfield says he was singled out because of his Muslim faith.

The Justice Department concluded that the fingerprint examiners were not aware that Mayfield was a Muslim with a connection to a convicted Al Qaeda supporter when they made the initial match. But later the examiners became aware of those facts, contributing to the FBI's reluctance to investigate whether they had fingered an innocent man, according to the Justice Department review.

Asked about the Mayfield case after his Nov. 30 speech, Chertoff acknowledged that mistakes had been made. But he added that mistakes are made in the criminal justice system, and no one suggests repealing the criminal code.

"We should make our techniques better but we shouldn't throw the whole process out because there are inevitable mistakes," he said.

Contractor's Handguns Missing From Homeland Security Vault (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

The Department of Homeland Security said yesterday that it is investigating how four handguns recently went missing from its headquarters in Northwest Washington.

Jarrod Agen, a department spokesman, said the guns belonged to Paragon Systems of Chantilly, which provides security for the department's facility on Nebraska Avenue NW.

"DHS is investigating the report," Agen said. "Paragon guns do not belong to DHS nor are they under the control of DHS."

DOJ_NMG_0109069

A person familiar with the investigation and who requested anonymity while the probe is underway said four .40-caliber handguns vanished about two weeks ago from a vault where Paragon security officers store their weapons.

Attempts to reach Paragon officials for comment yesterday afternoon and evening were unsuccessful.

Saudi Arabia Frees 18 Ex-Gitmo Detainees (AP)

AP, December 26, 2006

The Saudi government said Tuesday it had released 18 men who were detained after returning to their homeland from the U.S. military prison in Guantanamo Bay.

The Saudis, who returned to the kingdom in May and June, were released after they finished their sentences, Interior Ministry spokesman Lt. Gen. Mansour al-Turki said. His comments, which did not specify the men's alleged crimes, came in a statement carried by the official Saudi Press Agency.

Last week the kingdom freed 11 ex-detainees from Guantanamo who had completed short sentences after their return.

The United States says its military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, holds terror suspects — usually people captured in Afghanistan, Pakistan or other hotspots of the war on terror.

Saudi officials have said former Guantanamo inmates are taken into custody on their return to investigate whether they have any connections to Islamic militant groups.

So far, 53 Saudis have been released from Guantanamo — all this year. Another 75 Saudis remain at the prison in Cuba, according to Kateb al-Shimri, a lawyer who represents relatives of Saudis held at the U.S. base.

Guantanamo Needs Courthouse, Pentagon Says (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams,

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

GUANTANAMO BAY, CUBA — Although the Pentagon estimates that no more than 80 of the 400 or so terrorism detainees here will ever be tried, it is moving forward with plans for a $125-million legal complex.

Air Force Col. Morris Davis, chief prosecutor of the suspected Al Qaeda and Taliban supporters, says he expects to file charges against 10 to 20 prisoners soon after new trial rules are presented to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates next month.

ADVERTISEMENT

The Supreme Court in June found the Bush administration's military tribunal system unconstitutional, and Congress passed the Military Commission Act in September to replace it. But less than 20% of the prisoners held here are expected to face charges under the new commissions. "At the end of the day, I think the total will be about 75, give or take a few," Davis says.

Much of the legal work is done in Washington or in other U.S.-based offices of the military's judicial network — not at Guantanamo Bay.

Still, Davis says, there is just one courtroom here, in a converted air terminal that also houses legal staff and a high-security lockup. The new compound would have three courtrooms, restaurants, parking and accommodations for at least 800 people.

"It's going to take longer to do these trials one at a time in one courtroom," Davis said. A more rigorous pace could be undertaken if the complex is ready by July, as the Pentagon envisions.

Cully Stimson, deputy assistant secretary of Defense for detainee affairs, insists the legal facility is vital to bringing terrorism suspects to justice. Even with back-to-back trials, he said, it would take over a decade to prosecute an expected 60 to 80 detainees using one courtroom.

"We're fiscal conservatives by definition. We're not building the Taj Mahal here, Stimson said.

Doubts about the future of Guantanamo and the logic of investing in an operation many U.S. allies want to see shut down may doom the building project.

Calling the complex "a massive boondoggle," the American Civil Liberties Union has urged the incoming Democratic-controlled Congress to deny funding.

"No one thinks more than a few dozen detainees will ever be tried there," said Chris Anders, the ACLU legislative counsel. "I just don't see the next Congress authorizing any significant construction for additional courtrooms."

DOJ_NMG_0109070

There is nothing in either the Military Commissions Act or in the rules governing courts-martial that requires war-crimes trials to be conducted in a courtroom — or even at this remote naval base, Anders said.

The Pentagon earlier this month backed down from a plan to fast-track the legal compound without approval from Congress; it is expected to be part of a supplemental funding request in February or March.

"We want these procedures to be full and fair, and do not want the lack of facilities to be a reason to delay the process," Pentagon spokesman Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon said.

Davis says he expects to have cases ready to try by March. But Navy Cmdr. Pat McCarthy, the staff judge advocate, said no one is certain how long the rule-writing and legal challenges to the Military Commissions Act could take.

The dispute over whether and how much to invest in facilities for holding and trying terrorism suspects has been fueled by demands from European allies and human-rights activists for release or trial of the men here — most of whom will mark five years in detention in 2007.

"I think it is excessive," University of Richmond law professor Carl Tobias said of the legal-complex proposal. "They only scheduled 10 [trials] to date and with so much legal uncertainty, I think this is going to get a thorough review" by a skeptical Congress.

Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, a lawyer for a Bahraini prisoner being held without charges, said the Pentagon "will be lucky if they can even bring cases against the 10" charged earlier due to lack of evidence, lost contact with witnesses and shifting definitions of what amounts to terrorism.

Among those now at Guantanamo are 14 prisoners deemed by the U.S. government to be "high-value" detainees who were transferred from secret CIA prisons — including alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed.

At least 100 others at the facility have been cleared by annual Administrative Review Board hearings that deemed them to be negligible threats to U.S. or allied security.

And the governments of Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan and Yemen remain in negotiations with the State Department for transfer of their citizens.

Guantanamo jailers expect the prison population to drop to 200 and stay there, even if the rest of the inmates are never tried. Rear Adm. Harry B. Harris Jr., commander of operations here, said the number should be closer to 300 because "they are all dangerous men."

About 160 of the detainees have just been moved into concrete cells with steel doors at a new $38-million maximum-security prison, Camp 6. Another 90-plus are confined in a similarly restrictive facility, Camp 5, which was completed two years ago.

The new construction — Camp 6 has a medical clinic and two meeting rooms for legal visits — and existing cells were modified "to improve quality of life for both detainees and the guard force," said Cmdr. Robert Durand, spokesman for the Joint Task Force operating the prisons.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

U.S. Senators Put To Rest Conspiracy Theory Behind Military Analysis Of Sept. 11 Attacks (FINDLAW/AP)

By Anne Flaherty, Associated Press Writer

AP, December 27, 2006

(AP) - WASHINGTON-A lengthy Senate investigation has debunked charges by a Republican congressman that military analysts identified Mohamad Atta and other Sept. 11 hijackers before the attacks, according to a committee aide familiar with the report.

In a letter to members of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Sens. Pat Roberts and John D. Rockefeller dismissed suggestions by Rep. Curt Weldon that defense analysts ignored analysis that could have prevented the attacks. Roberts, a Republican, is outgoing chairman and Rockefeller is the senior Democrat who will assume the chairmanship Jan. 4 month when the new Congress convenes. NB.

DOJ_NMG_0109071

They concluded "there was no evidence Mohamad Atta or any hijackers were identified prior to 9/11," said the committee aide, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the aide was not authorized to speak publicly on the subject.

An internal Defense Department assessment already had dismissed Weldon's charges as unfounded. But the letter from Roberts and Rockefeller is the first rejection from Capitol Hill. The letter was obtained and first reported Tuesday by the Los Angeles Times.

Weldon, a 10-term Republican who lost his seat in the Nov. 7 election, repeatedly contended a secret military unit called "Able Danger" searched large amounts of data to link four Sept. 11 hijackers to al-Qaida more than a year before the attacks.

In September, the Pentagon's inspector general found some employees recalled seeing an intelligence chart identifying Atta as a terrorist before the attacks. But the report said those accounts "varied significantly" and witnesses were inconsistent at times in their statements.

At the time, Weldon questioned the "motives and the content" of the report and rejected its conclusions, which he said relied on cherry-picked testimony. Weldon could not be reached Tuesday for comment.

According to the committee aide, Roberts and Rockefeller found similar problems in their investigation.

Weldon lost his seat to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy admiral who called for troops to be withdrawn from Iraq by the end of 2007.

Just weeks before the election, the FBI raided the homes of Weldon's daughter and a close friend in an investigation of whether the congressman improperly helped the pair win lobbying and consulting contracts.

TSA Modifies Screening Machines (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, December 27, 2006

A new airport screening machine that peers through travelers' clothing has been modified so it won't show intimate body parts when it's tested at a U.S. airport for the first time starting next month.

RELATED: X-ray tests both security, privacy

The modification to the controversial "backscatter" X-ray machine seeks to quiet critics such as the American Civil Liberties Union who have helped block its use in airports by saying the vivid images seen by screeners invade passenger privacy. The altered images will show only cartoon-like black-and-white outlines of each passenger.

But the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) is facing questions from experts who say the agency has weakened the effectiveness of the low-intensity X-rays.

"You don't see fine detail," said Robert Gould, a radiology professor at the University of California, San Francisco. "It's conceivable to me that (the modified machines) would miss plastic explosives."

Plastic explosives are a major threat because they evade checkpoint metal detectors and a small amount could blow apart a jet.

"I would bet that I could take some plastic explosives, put them on my upper thigh, and the blurring would let me get the stuff on board," said Andrew Karam, a physicist and fellow at the Center for Advanced Defense Studies, a national security think tank.

Backscatter X-rays will debut at Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport, and a few other airports will follow. The TSA has lab-tested the machines and will use covert agents to test them in airports before any broader rollout. "We aren't endorsing this particular technology, we're testing it," TSA spokeswoman Ellen Howe said.

Manufacturer American Science and Engineering of suburban Boston got $722,000 from the TSA to program its backscatter machine so body parts wouldn't be visible to security screeners. The machines will be used only on passengers who require extra screening beyond a metal detector and who opt for the X-ray over a pat-down.

American Science Vice President Joe Rice said the $100,000 machine finds ceramic weapons and small metal objects that metal detectors can miss. "I'm sure there are ways to defeat this technology," Rice said. "But this type of technology is a dramatic leap forward from what is available today."

Hope For New Orleans (column) (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0109072

By William H. Chafe

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Nearly 16 months after Hurricane Katrina, New Orleans remains devastated. In the Lower Ninth Ward (primarily black and poor), mid-city (mixed-race and middle class) and Lakeside (richer and whiter), houses are boarded up and ruined; shattered windows reveal rooms full of debris; perhaps one in 10 places has a FEMA trailer parked outside, as a few returning residents desperately try to reclaim what they have lost. Thousands of small businesses have disappeared. Even in the French Quarter, which was left largely intact after Katrina, shopkeepers despair of being able to survive given the decline in tourism. Repeatedly, people declare: "I have not received a single dollar of federal aid."

Yet in this season that celebrates the birth of a child in what today would be called a homeless shelter, a remarkable resiliency of spirit remains in New Orleans. Yes, only half the population there in August 2005 has returned. The suicide rate has increased 300 percent, and less than half of the schools and hospitals that existed 16 months ago are functioning.

But energy, engagement and love persist, creating tiny ripples of hope, from thousands of individual acts of courage -- ripples that can, in words Robert Kennedy uttered 40 years ago in South Africa, "build a current" able to topple the mightiest walls of oppression.

In the Lower Ninth Ward, more than a hundred volunteers gather in a Catholic school (St. Mary of the Angels) to help secure -- with the community -- a foothold toward starting anew. Some are college students, others grandparents and hippies. All have come to live and work with local residents. Most spend their days gutting houses so that returning residents can be eligible for federal rebuilding funds. Tearing down sheetrock infested with toxic mold is dangerous work. Others toil in the kitchen, helping members of the "Rainbow Tribe" -- a commune -- prepare Brunswick stew, macaroni and cheese, and fried chicken for 150.

No one sees this as a lark. The unpaid staff briefs workers on the hazards they will face, insisting that respirators fit snugly so that no toxins are inhaled. The kitchen crew tests every dish to be sure it has reached a temperature high enough to eliminate any chance of food poisoning. Everyone is deadly serious -- and also clearly moved by the importance of the mission. They are white and black, male and female. They respect the integrity and autonomy of the neighbors they are there to help, committed not to fall into old hierarchies of white and black, male and female.

In the civil rights movement, such people called themselves a "beloved community" -- people transformed by an ethos of love and justice into becoming soldiers for justice. If redemption can follow tragedy in New Orleans, these volunteers -- in partnership with community residents -- will be the ones to make it happen.

But the signs of hope are not just in the courage of people in the Ninth Ward. They are there as well in the celebration of community among those less afflicted by poverty, people who have come back to New Orleans out of love for their city in order to make it the kind of place they want their children to grow up in. They have their own rituals.

On a Sunday, in a small bar, 30 neighborhood residents gather for a weekly get-together. White and black, gay and straight, old and young, they listen to their favorite jazz quartet and vocalist. They hug, laugh, cheer. They welcome strangers in their midst, anxious to talk about what they've been through. A father dances with his young daughter. The cook mingles with those eating from the buffet she's prepared, embracing her friends. In its own way this, too, is a "beloved community" -- people sustained by a history of caring about each other and about something in New Orleans that has made their spirits fresh and engaged.

From one perspective, the future of New Orleans is bleak. Surely no governmental body, least of all FEMA, has given anyone reason for confidence. But this is no ordinary place, and these are no ordinary people. Rooted in their history is a vision -- admittedly utopian -- that affirms the possibilities of living in biracial peace; prizes grace, hospitality and humor; and fights like hell against bureaucrats who refuse to acknowledge the human potential for rising above self-interest and cynicism. Maybe -- just maybe -- there is reason to hope.

William H. Chafe, a history professor at Duke University, writes about race and gender. He recently returned from a weekend as a volunteer in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0109073

WAR NEWS:

Gates Sending Brigade Of 82nd To Kuwait (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, December 27, 2006

Defense Secretary Robert Gates has signed orders that will send the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday.

The decision to send the unit was first reported earlier this month. The soldiers, who are based at Fort Bragg, N.C., are expected to be deployed into Iraq early next year, and the move could be part of a short-term surge of troops to the battlefront to quell the ongoing violence.

The 82nd Airborne unit — which would include as many as 3,300 soldiers — will replace the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which had served as the reserve force based in Kuwait but has been deployed into Iraq.

Army officials said Tuesday that they were not aware a final decision had been made on sending the unit to Kuwait. But two senior defense officials, who requested anonymity because the announcement had not yet been made public, said Gates had signed the order Tuesday — the first of his week-old tenure as Pentagon chief.

Gates was in Iraq last week meeting with U.S. military commanders and Iraqi officials.

He met with President Bush on Saturday to relay what he saw and learned during his three days in Iraq. He is scheduled to travel to Crawford, Texas, to meet with Bush on Thursday to discuss options for changes in the Iraq strategy. He and other military leaders have said that all options are on the table. Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, will also meet with Bush on Thursday.

Some of the options for a new strategy in Iraq that have been under discussion by U.S. officials include an increase in troops, to help tamp down the violence, particularly in Baghdad, and to beef up the training of Iraq soldiers.

There are 134,000 troops in Iraq. The U.S. military has consistently kept a reserve force in Kuwait that can easily and quickly be deployed into Iraq, or other places in the region, as needed.

Gates took over the top job at the Pentagon last week after the resignation of Donald H. Rumsfeld.

Bush In Texas To Rethink Iraq Course (AP)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, December 27, 2006

President Bush went to his ranch Tuesday to rethink U.S. involvement in Iraq as his spokesman hailed a Baghdad court's decision upholding the death sentence for former Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Saddam, who was deposed by the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, is to be hanged within 30 days.

"Today marks an important milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel told reporters aboard Air Force One to Texas, where Bush was to meet this week with his national security team.

Iraq's highest appeals court on Tuesday upheld the Nov. 5 sentence against Saddam for ordering the killing of 148 Shiites in Dujail in 1982, following an attempt on his life. Chief Judge Aref Shahin said the sentence must be implemented within 30 days, and could be carried out as early as Wednesday.

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long, so this is an important day for the Iraqi people," Stanzel said.

The 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade, which would include as many as 3,300 soldiers, has been ordered to go to Kuwait shortly after the new year, senior defense officials said Tuesday. Defense Secretary Robert Gates has approved the deployment, which had been reported earlier this month, said officials who requested anonymity because the announcement had not yet been made public

DOJ_NMG_0109074

At the Pentagon, officials said Gates isn't likely to offer a single solution but, rather, a broad set of recommendations for changing the course in Iraq. A senior Defense Department official, who spoke only on condition of anonymity because Gates' advice to Bush is secret, said the recommendations "would involve many aspects of how we can do things differently."

Bush, saddled with low approval ratings for his handling of Iraq, will host a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at the ranch, but is not expected to make any final decision on what he says will be a new way forward in Iraq.

Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley will attend the meeting.

Stanzel said there could be other National Security Council meetings before the president makes up his mind and delivers a speech to announce his decisions. The speech is expected before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Bush is under mounting pressure to change U.S. involvement in Iraq where violence continued to escalate this month.

On Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that seven more American soldiers had died, pushing the U.S. military death toll for the month to 90. With five days remaining in the month, December is already the second deadliest month for the U.S. military this year, behind the 105 soldiers killed in October.

The latest deaths also brought the number of U.S. military members killed since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,978 — five more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Stanzel said Bush continues to question advisers and think through the consequences of various U.S. actions. "Our forces, coalition forces in Iraq are continuing to take the fight to the enemy, and the president will announce a new way forward when he's comfortable" with his decision, he said.

When the president arrived in Texas, about 50 well-wishers, squinting in the sunshine, welcomed him as he walked down the steps of the plane with Mrs. Bush and her mother, Jenna Welch. The president spent the Christmas holiday with his family at the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland.

Mrs. Bush gave the president a new blue suit, biking shoes and country singer Sam Moore's CD titled "Overnight Sensational." He gave her amber-colored citrine earrings to match the triple-strand citrine necklace he gave her for her birthday.

As part of a family gift name drawing, the Bushes donated mosquito nets in the name of former President George H.W. Bush through Malarianomore.org, a mission set up to urge individuals, organizations and institutions to protect families from malaria.

Bush's Iraq Plan Gets Big Build-up (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, December 27, 2006

Determined not to be rushed, President Bush has spent weeks figuring out a new war plan in Iraq. All the while, the American public's expectations have been headed in one direction — up.

Anticipation is high not just because people are weary of war, but also because of the way Bush has gone about deciding his next move.

Saddled with a reputation for stubbornness, Bush has gone the other direction. He has made a visible effort to seek advice — from the military, diplomats, academics, retired generals, a special study commission, Iraqi officials, Republican leaders, even Democrats he once ridiculed.

By the time he announces his Iraq plan in January, roughly two months will have passed since a humbling election for Republicans brought a promise of a "new way forward."

There might as well be a drum roll.

"He has built up expectations," said David Gergen, a former White House adviser in the administrations of presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Clinton. "People are saying, 'OK, if you've spent all this time and effort on it, you better have a pretty darn good plan.'"

The ostensible goal of that plan will be to get Iraq on a path to govern itself and help the United States fight terrorism. Bush is also out to win back some of the American people, who want to know the war has an end in sight.

Recent history shows the trouble with high expectations.

DOJ_NMG_0109075

The Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan commission of Washington elders, this month offered Bush a stark, comprehensive plan to change course. It was so highly anticipated that when it was not embraced by the White House in toto, it seemed to fall flat and fade from view.

Bush now faces his own test of great expectations, largely of his own doing. He's promised a new approach, yet even his new defense secretary, Robert Gates, has acknowledged that "there are no new ideas in Iraq."

Indeed, some of the main ideas under consideration — sending in more troops, embedding more U.S. advisers in Iraqi units, engaging in more aggressive diplomacy — aren't novel. And if Bush does come up with a remarkably fresh approach after nearly four years of war, that will raise the question of why he hadn't thought of it before.

Even with that seemingly no-win set of expectations, the president does have room to succeed, said Kathleen Hall Jamieson, director of the Annenberg Public Policy Center at the University of Pennsylvania.

"It doesn't have to be new. It has to be new for him," said Jamieson, who specializes in presidential rhetoric.

Bush and his defense team set the expectations in the first place, assuring that Iraq had stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction, and promising that U.S. troops would be viewed as liberators. Now the president can reset the expectations.

What people want is to hear Bush explain a clear route to an honorable outcome — one in which it is clear that the war left Iraq and the U.S. better off, Jamieson said.

"There are times when a country roots for a leader. I think that's what happening with this," Jamieson said. "A lot of people who voted for Democrats want the president to succeed. I think he has some advantage coming in, because the public so desperately wants success."

Desperate, and skeptical.

Bush's approval for handling the situation in Iraq was at 27 percent in an AP-Ipsos poll this month — his lowest-ever approval level on Iraq in that poll. Only a third of Americans said Iraq would end up as a stable, democratic nation.

"I think the American people understand this war perhaps better than anybody gives them credit for," said Leon Panetta, who was President Clinton's chief of staff and a member of the Iraq Study Group. "If they believe that the president has approached this with what he calls 'fresh eyes' — if he takes a comprehensive approach — then they're going to give him some room."

Bush used a year-end news conference last week to help frame the expectations.

He promised to work with Democrats and be flexible about war tactics. But his only prediction for 2007 in Iraq was sober: "It's going to require difficult choices and additional sacrifices, because the enemy is merciless and violent."

The president also braced America to think long-term. His goals aren't changing. He talks of the war on terror as the calling of a generation, one that "is going to require a sustained commitment from the American people. "

That's a world away for those looking for a firm date when U.S. troops will come home.

Gergen, the former White House adviser, said it's unrealistic to expect Bush to come up with a plan so dazzling it will rally the country. But it may extend the nation's patience.

"That has to be his goal, from a political perspective," Gergen said. "For a president, buying time to try something new is often the most important thing you can do in a crisis."

The White House puts some of the blame on the media for rising expectations. Spokesman Tony Snow, who spends every briefing fending off requests for details about Bush's plan, told reporters this week to "take a deep, cleansing breath."

Even the timing of Bush's Iraq speech has been sucked into the expectations game.

First, word emerged that his Iraq address would occur by Christmas. When the date then was set for sometime after the new year, the White House said it never had locked in the timing, but still had to answer questions about a "delay."

Asked whether the president felt a sense of urgency to announce his strategy sooner, rather than later, given the rising death toll in Iraq, White House deputy press secretary Scott Stanzel told reporters on Tuesday: "He's wanting to make sure that we give all consideration to all the options. ... Coalition forces in Iraq are continuing to take the fight to the enemy, and the president will announce a new way forward when he's comfortable announcing that."

Old Iraq Strategy Lives On In Weekly Progress Reports (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0109076

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

A year ago, President Bush announced a new plan for Iraq, framed around "eight pillars" of U.S. policy for victory. In the past month, the president and his national security team have been busily working on a new recipe for success in Iraq, having declared the previous plan a failure.

But never mind what the politicians are doing. The bureaucracy churns on.

The State Department continues every Wednesday to issue a 30-page public report that details exactly how the U.S. government is meeting the goals set forth in the president's now-abandoned plan. The report frames the data around Bush's storied eight pillars, which include such goals as "Defeat the Terrorists and Neutralize the Insurgents" (Pillar 1) and "Increase International Support for Iraq" (Pillar 7).

In many ways, the report is a microcosm of the administration's lost year in Iraq. The reams of details aimed at touting success belie the fact that few of the goals are being met.

The report is often upbeat as it presents some of the most minuscule factoids of the situation in Iraq. The Dec. 13 report noted that on Dec. 7, 40 sheikhs from across Diyala province met "to discuss ways to maintain peace and stability" and that on Dec. 9, U.S. soldiers discovered a factory for making improvised explosive devices in a house in Baqubah.

But the bottom-line graphs tell a story of failure. Under Pillar 5 ("Help Iraq Strengthen Its Economy") the reports show that week after week, the Iraqis cannot meet their goals for crude oil production. Another chart shows that efforts to build a 15-day supply of all refined products, such as diesel and gasoline, are woefully behind schedule, reaching a peak of a four-day supply.

Under Pillar 7, increasing international support, the trends are on the decline. The first report of the year showed that 28 countries, in addition to the United States, contributed 23,000 troops to coalition forces. By last week's report, the number of countries had fallen to 25 -- and the number of troops was down to 16,860, a decrease of more than 25 percent. Italy recently dropped off the list when the last of its troops departed.

One figure has not really budged: the $20 billion apportioned for rebuilding Iraq (under Pillar 4, "Help Iraq Build Government Capacity and Provide Essential Services"). That is because the administration ran out of money for rebuilding Iraq, in part because about 25 percent was diverted to security. The latest report says that all but $4 billion has been disbursed.

A State Department official, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he is not authorized to talk to reporters about the report, said it still plays an important role because it provides the administration with a single set of numbers about the situation in Iraq. Previously, State and Defense department officials might have arrived at meetings armed with different data, but "now everyone is talking off the same sheet on music," he said.

There is also a classified version of the report, which includes details on counterterrorism operations, given to top policymakers on Fridays.

The report is prepared not by State Department officials but by a team of about 10 people hired by a management consulting firm. The firm, BearingPoint, has a $2 million contract to produce the report and to manage the process of running Iraq policy in the administration, the State Department official said.

Below the level of the top policymakers, working groups from across the government implement Iraq policy day by day. The BearingPoint employees, who work out of offices in the State Department, arrange the meetings, set the agendas, take notes and provide summaries of the discussions, the official said. They also maintain the Web site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad.

The twists and turns of American policy are imperfectly reflected in the report. "Operation Together Forward," the effort this summer to bolster security in Baghdad, which was later deemed a disappointment, was the subject of several upbeat reports but then seemed to fade in importance. During the spike in violence in October, the report noted that the Iraqi Ministry of Interior had recalled a police brigade for more training after "possible complicity with sectarian violence," though it brightly added that the training "will improve the professionalism and confidence within the national police."

The report seemed uncertain how to treat the release of a report by the Iraq Study Group, the independent bipartisan panel that criticized the administration's policy and spurred the White House to come up with a new plan. The earliest mention of the study group's report, in the Dec. 13 edition, came under Pillar 3, "Help Iraqis to Forge a National Compact for Democratic Government."

DOJ_NMG_0109077

The headline said it all: "Iraqi Leaders Blast Iraq Study Group's Report." The State Department, perhaps in an effort to demonstrate the unity of Iraqi leaders, then devoted a whole page to negative quotes about the panel's recommendations.

The Dec. 20 report featured one curious item. Under the rubric of increasing international support, the report highlighted a visit to Damascus, Syria, by Sens. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) and Christopher J. Dodd (D-Conn.). The senators "arrived in Syria December 19 to discuss how Damascus could help bring stability and security in Iraq," the report said, noting that another senator, Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), met with Syrian President Bashar al-Assad in early December.

The State Department had strongly discouraged the trips, saying Syria is a key source of problems in Iraq.

Democrats Prepare For A Battle On The War (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON — After years of playing a marginal role in the Iraq war, congressional Democrats plan to move quickly in January to assert more control and undercut any White House effort to increase troop levels.

As President Bush prepares to outline his own plan for Iraq in a major speech in the next few weeks, Democratic leaders will counter with weeks of oversight hearings, summoning military officers, administration officials and foreign policy experts to Capitol Hill.

The Democratic plans put Congress on a collision course with Bush over the direction of the nearly 4-year-old war. And they signal a new phase in a war that has been directed almost exclusively by the White House with little dissent from the Republican-controlled Capitol.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden, D-Del., the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said Tuesday that he intends to call key administration officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to testify at a series of hearings.

At the same time, the chairmen of both armed services committees and the House International Relations Committee also plan to hold hearings.

"I hope the president and his people will listen," Biden said.

Biden, who was elected to the Senate during the Vietnam War and who is planning a 2008 presidential run, has been among the most outspoken critics of Bush's Iraq policies and Tuesday called any increase in troops "the absolute wrong strategy."

His plan for hearings as well as those of the other committee chairmen highlight just how much the political landscape in Washington has changed as a more critical and assertive Democratic Congress moves to directly challenge the president's management of the unpopular war.

Democrats took control of Congress after an election that turned on the electorate's unhappiness with the war. But Democrats have struggled for years to articulate an alternative to the Bush administration's policies.

As recently as last year, when Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., called for the withdrawal of American troops from Iraq, many in the party agonized over whether that position would permanently tar Democrats as weak. But as discontent with the war has grown, sapping Bush's popularity, Democratic lawmakers have become increasingly outspoken in their criticisms.

Senior party leaders now appear to be uniting behind the call for a phased withdrawal of U.S. forces, a position that was bolstered by the release in November of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group's report.

The report did not set a specific timetable for withdrawing troops, but did suggest numerous changes in the administration's policies, including more diplomatic engagement with Iraq's neighbors, another prescription being embraced by congressional Democrats.

"Democrats and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group have both laid down a road map for the president to begin the withdrawal of American troops from the civil war in Iraq," incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said last week. "It is now up to the president to follow that course."

Until now, Democratic lawmakers had few forums for their complaints and suggestions beside the Sunday-morning political talk shows. With control of both chambers of Congress, the party now has the power to schedule hearings, subpoena documents and even put conditions on how the administration spends money on the war in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0109078

On Tuesday, a Bush spokesman would only say that the president recognized the "oversight role" of Congress.

"We hope they will use this oversight role in an appropriate fashion," deputy press secretary Scott Stanzel said from Crawford, Texas, where the president is spending the Christmas holiday. "That's what the American people expect -- for both sides to work together for the common good."

Bush has met with the new Democratic leaders, but has shown little inclination to accept their counsel on the war. Rather than talk of reducing the number of U.S. soldiers in Iraq, the White House has focused in the weeks since the release of the Iraq Study Group report on a temporary increase in troops that proponents say will help control the growing sectarian violence.

Senior congressional Democrats, including Biden, have fiercely attacked that plan, arguing that the best way to force Iraqis to take responsibility for halting the violence between Sunnis and Shiites is to begin a phased withdrawal.

A number of GOP senators -- including Susan Collins of Maine and Norm Coleman of Minnesota, who are up for re-election in 2008 -- have already expressed skepticism about the surge in troop strength. Other Republicans, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, a presidential hopeful, were early backers of sending more troops to Iraq.

Only 12 percent of Americans support a troop increase, compared to 52 percent who prefer a timetable for withdrawal, a recent Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll found.

The flood of congressional hearings in January promises to shed unfavorable light on the way the Bush administration has prosecuted the war in Iraq. But even Biden acknowledged that, short of cutting off funding, Congress has limited ability to compel the White House to dramatically change course.

Though Congress has in the past used its power over the budget to challenge the foreign policies of presidents -- including cutting funding to the government of South Vietnam in the mid-1970s -- no leading Democrat thus far has called for withholding money for military operations in Iraq.

"We should not exaggerate the ability of the United States Foreign Relations Committee or the Congress to get a president to act in a manner in which the Congress thinks is more rational or more appropriate," Biden said Tuesday. "There's nothing the United States Congress can do by a piece of legislation to alter the conduct of a war that a president decides to pursue."

"This is President Bush's war," he said.

Biden To Fight Troop Buildup In Iraq (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said yesterday that he would oppose any plan by President Bush to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I totally oppose the surging of additional troops into Baghdad, and I think it is contrary to the overwhelming body of informed opinion, both people inside the administration and outside the administration," Biden told reporters yesterday. He said he plans to hold hearings for his panel next month in a bid to influence the president's decision.

Bush is said to be studying a plan to send as many as 30,000 additional troops to Iraq, possibly to help stabilize Baghdad, as part of a new strategy to improve security and stem the escalating sectarian violence. Biden contended that such a move "will not have any positive effect, except extremely temporarily."

The remarks from Biden, who said yesterday that he will announce next month his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, came as Bush headed to his Crawford, Tex., ranch for a review of the U.S. strategy in Iraq. The president is scheduled to host a meeting of the National Security Council at the ranch tomorrow, to be attended by Vice President Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley. But he is not expected to immediately release a final decision on a new strategy.

Biden said that one problem with the present discussion of a buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq is that no one can specify exactly what the president may be studying. He and others have asked for specifics on the troops' mission, the number involved and how long they would be in Iraq.

Bush said at a Dec. 20 news conference that "there's got to be a specific mission that can be accomplished with the addition of more troops before, you know, I agree on that strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0109079

Some key Republicans, including Sens. John McCain (Ariz.) and Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.), have come out in favor of increasing troop levels. McCain said earlier this month, during a trip to Iraq, that he believes "there is still a compelling reason to have an increase in troops here in Baghdad and in Anbar province in order to bring the sectarian violence under control" and to "allow the political process to proceed."

On Sunday, Graham, who had just returned from Iraq, said security in Baghdad has deteriorated to the point that a troop increase is necessary, though it should be "co-joined with political reform." During an appearance on ABC News's "This Week with George Stephanopoulos," Graham said that "more troops in Anbar would help stop the insurgency flow from Syria into Baghdad" and that "more troops in Baghdad would give the politicians some breathing room."

Incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) said recently that if U.S. military commanders support a buildup, "just for a short period of time, we'll go along with that." But a period of 18 months to 24 months would be too long, he said.

Biden noted yesterday that retired Gen. Jack Keane, a former Army vice chief of staff, helped produce an American Enterprise Institute study that called for 20,000 additional U.S. troops in Baghdad to clear and hold neighborhoods for about 18 months.

Biden said he does not think that even that would work. He stressed that "if the president does make this surge, I hope he levels with the American people and makes it clear the minimum that they're going to be there for 18 months."

Biden said that his committee will begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and that if Bush has not released his plan by then, he might start with experts and "those proposing alternatives" to what the president may do. He is planning three days of hearings each week for three weeks and will include past and present administration officials.

Rice has agreed to appear, but not until after Bush has presented his new strategy to the nation. Gates will be asked to appear. Biden said he does not plan to call former defense secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, but he added: "That's not something that's totally off the table."

Biden said that he hopes to generate "some bipartisan consensus in the Senate" but that he does not expect to do more than try to influence Republican senators who could then affect Bush's decisions. He said that, at his last meeting with Bush, after the November elections, he told the president, "all we can do is try to . . . cooperate with you, and when we disagree with you, try to influence your decision by making the case to the public at large that we should change course."

Biden Previews Democrats' Tack Against Troop Plan (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee said no new U.S. troops should be sent to Iraq, setting up a potential political battle over President Bush's tentative plan to deploy tens of thousands of additional forces to try to stabilize the country.

Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden also said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would testify before his panel early next year. The hearing would give the new Democratic majority in Congress its first opportunity to question senior Bush administration officials about their handling of Iraq. The remarks were the clearest indication to date that Democrats are planning a full-blown push to prevent the administration from sending more troops to Iraq and to ensure that the White House pays a political price if it were to do so.

Mr. Biden, who announced yesterday he will seek his party's 2008 presidential nomination, made the comments as hopes for a bipartisan solution to the Iraq crisis fade. Lawmakers from both parties had hoped the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker III, a Republican, and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton might offer a blueprint for a way forward in Iraq that members of both parties could embrace.

But the two sides remain far apart. The White House has rejected the commission's calls to withdraw most U.S. troops within 18 months and to hold direct negotiations with Syria and Iran, while Democrats have lined up behind a proposal to begin pulling U.S. forces out of Iraq early next year.

The tensions between the two parties over the war seem certain to escalate if the Bush administration goes through with its tentative plan to send as many as 20,000 new U.S. forces to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0109080

White House officials say such a troop "surge" almost certainly will be the centerpiece of Mr. Bush's planned speech to the country early next year to lay out a new strategy for fighting the war. Mr. Bush is set to meet with Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Defense Secretary Robert Gates and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley in Crawford, Texas, tomorrow to discuss the speech, though a Bush aide said he doesn't expect the president to reach any final conclusions at the session.

Administration officials, meanwhile, hailed an Iraqi appellate court's decision yesterday to uphold the death sentence against ousted leader Saddam Hussein, who is set to be hanged within 30 days. Deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said the ruling is an "important milestone in the Iraqi people's efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

Mr. Biden yesterday used a conference call with reporters to make clear that he would work hard to prevent the White House from ordering more troops to Iraq. He said such a move would strain the already overstretched U.S. military to the breaking point, while doing little to resolve the underlying political disputes fueling Iraq's civil war.

"I totally oppose the surging of additional American troops," he said. "I think it is the absolute wrong strategy."

Mr. Biden is the latest high-profile Democrat to come out against increasing U.S. troop levels. The incoming House speaker, Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California, opposes the idea, as does the incoming Senate Majority Leader, Harry Reid of Nevada. Other prominent Democratic opponents include Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, a likely presidential candidate; Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the party's 2004 nominee for the White House; and Michigan Sen. Carl Levin, the incoming chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The strongest supporters of the "surge" idea, outside the White House, are Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain and Connecticut Sen. Joseph Lieberman, an independent.

Most Senate Democrats have for now coalesced around a proposal by Mr. Levin to begin withdrawing most American forces next April. Mr. Biden is closely associated with a second plan that calls for dividing Iraq into three quasi-independent sectarian regions, an idea rejected by the Iraq Study Group and the White House.

During yesterday's call, Mr. Biden said he would hold three weeks of hearings beginning Jan. 9 to examine the various proposals on Iraq, including the partition plan. He said Ms. Rice has agreed to testify after Mr. Bush gives his national address on Iraq, and that Mr. Gates might also testify.

Mr. Biden acknowledged Democrats could do little to force the administration's hand on the matter, since the final decision rests with Mr. Bush. "This is President Bush's war," he said.

Biden Opposes A Troop Increase In Iraq, Foreshadowing A Fight With The Bush Administration (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

WASHINGTON, Dec. 26 — Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on Tuesday rejected a troop increase for Iraq, foreshadowing what could be a contentious fight between the Bush administration and Congress.

Mr. Biden, a Democrat, announced that he would begin hearings on Iraq on Jan. 9 and expected high-ranking officials, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, to appear.

As President Bush flew to his Texas ranch on Tuesday, a spokesman for the National Security Council urged the senator to wait for Mr. Bush to present his new Iraq policy next month before passing judgment.

“President Bush will talk soon to our troops, the American people and Iraqis about a new way forward for Iraq that will lead to a democratic, unified country that can govern, defend and sustain itself,” said Gordon Johndroe, the council spokesman.

The date has not been scheduled, but administration officials said it would be before the State of the Union address on Jan. 23. Mr. Bush, who intends to write the speech this week, is to hold a National Security Council meeting on Thursday at his ranch to discuss Iraq policy. Vice President Dick Cheney, Ms. Rice, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, are expected to attend.

DOJ_NMG_0109081

One plan under consideration is to send an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq in a bid to restore order. “I totally oppose this surging of additional American troops into Baghdad,” Mr. Biden said. “It’s contrary to the overwhelming body of informed opinion, both inside and outside the administration.”

Mr. Biden, who said he planned to run for president in 2008, made his critique during a teleconference call with reporters. He continued to press his proposal for a partitioning of Iraq into three autonomous states — controlled by Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds — to be sustained with what he called an equitable distribution of the country’s oil wealth.

He did not say what he would do if the administration went ahead with a temporary increase in American combat forces, and it is unclear whether the Democrats have the power to stop such a move.

While Congress could hold up funding for the war in Iraq, the administration retains the upper hand in determining the American course there, especially since it is unlikely that a Congress that is so evenly split between Republicans and Democrats will speak with a unified voice.

One thing remains certain, though: President Bush will remain under pressure to talk to Iran and Syria about the deteriorating situation in Iraq in particular and the Middle East in general, as is called for by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III, the former Republican secretary of state, and Lee H. Hamilton, the former Democratic congressman.

While the Bush administration has indicated that American officials will not heed the suggestion that they enlist help from Iran and Syria, there continues to be a drumbeat of calls for the United States to talk to those countries.

Earlier this month, three Democratic senators — Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Bill Nelson of Florida and John Kerry of Massachusetts — ignored protests from the Bush administration and flew to Damascus to meet with the Syrian president, Bashar al-Assad. On Tuesday, Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania became the first Republican to follow suit.

Mr. Specter said before leaving the United States that other Republican lawmakers might follow him to Damascus. He said there was growing concern that the administration’s policies in the Middle East were not working.

Although the United States still has an embassy in Damascus, it has been represented there by a chargé d’affaires since Mr. Bush recalled the ambassador, Margaret Scobey, after the assassination of Rafik Hariri, the former Lebanese prime minister, in February 2005.

Since then contact between the two governments have been kept to low-level officials, and last week Ms. Rice reiterated that the United States planned to keep its associations with Damascus in the deep freeze.

Biden To Fight Troop Surge (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, December 27, 2006

The incoming Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday said he will try to block President Bush from sending an additional 30,000 troops to Iraq, calling it "the absolute wrong strategy."

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware plans three straight weeks of congressional hearings on Iraq policy next month in hopes of persuading the president to abandon a plan he is thought to be seriously considering.

"We've already broken Iraq. We're about to break the United States military" by sending more troops, said Mr. Biden, who is seeking the 2008 presidential nomination.

Mr. Bush early next month will announce a new strategy for the war, and is thought to favor a temporary increase in troop levels in what has been dubbed a "surge."

Mr. Biden said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has agreed to testify before his panel after the president announces his plans. Other likely panel witnesses are Iraq Study Group leaders James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, and new Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates.

The committee also will hear from a variety of academics, former and current administration officials, military leaders and Peter W. Galbraith, a former U.S. ambassador to Croatia, who has called for formally partitioning Iraq into three sovereign nations.

The idea is to hear from all those who "have rational although different views as to how to proceed in Iraq," in an attempt to build consensus, Mr. Biden said.

DOJ_NMG_0109082

"Hopefully there is still some opportunity to influence President Bush's decision," he said.

Voters dealt Mr. Bush a blow last month in midterm elections that propelled Democrats to House and Senate majorities. Soon after the elections, the Iraq Study Group recommended the U.S. begin a withdrawal of combat troops.

Incoming Democratic leaders promise a change of course on the war, which yesterday reached a death toll surpassing that of the September 11 terrorist attacks.

Many Democrats oppose increasing the number of troops in Iraq, where nearly 150,000 are already stationed.

Republicans so far seem divided on a surge, with Sen. John McCain of Arizona pushing the idea and Foreign Relations Committee member Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota saying he can't support sending more troops.

Mr. Biden favors beginning to withdraw U.S. troops, and thinks one way to get to that point is to divide Iraq into three mostly autonomous regions with a weak central government in Baghdad. He notes the Iraqi constitution calls for such a federal system, and says it should be partnered with a plan for sharing in oil revenues.

Mr. Biden worked with Leslie H. Gelb, president emeritus of the Council on Foreign Relations, in proposing the plan in May. He said yesterday he will call Mr. Gelb as a witness.

The three weeks of hearings will begin Jan. 9, will run three to four days per week, and will include discussion of the need to bring Iraq's neighbors to the negotiating table, Mr. Biden said.

He said Republicans should realize the Iraq situation holds huge political implications for their party in 2008 -- both in congressional elections and in the race for the White House.

"The last thing that John McCain or any other Republican ... running for president wants to inherit is a war in Iraq that is even further deteriorating than it is now," Mr. Biden said.

He said Democrats cannot remain silent on war policy, but noted he thinks it is the Republicans on the panel who can help pressure Mr. Bush into changing his mind.

"There is nothing the United States Congress can do by a piece of legislation to alter the course of a war the president decides," he said.

Mr. Biden recently told Mr. Bush as much during a visit to the White House, saying: "Mr. President, this is your war."

Balancing the personalities -- and competing potential presidential contenders from both parties who sit on his committee -- might be easier said than done. Among the possible hopefuls on the panel are Democratic Sens. Barack Obama of Illinois, John Kerry of Massachusetts and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, and Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska.

When asked how having so many possible 2008 candidates at the dais would affect these hearings, Mr. Biden laughed.

"I hope it's not going to have a lot of impact, although I am sure there are going to be folks who will prepare more thoroughly," he said.

Also expected to be an outspoken voice on the panel is Sen.-elect James H. Webb Jr., an anti-war Virginia Democrat who unseated Republican George Allen last month.

Mr. Bush announced this month he would seek an expanded armed forces, adding thousands of troops to the size of the Army and Marine Corps.

The Washington Times reported last week that senior military officials and the Joint Chiefs of Staff are pressuring Mr. Bush to seek a larger military and that the Joint Chiefs are "cool at best" to the Iraq Study Group proposal.

Biden To Run For White House In 2008 (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo in Washington

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The field of Democratic presidential hopefuls grew yesterday after Joseph Biden, the Delaware senator, announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Mr Biden, one of the leading Democratic critics of US policy in Iraq, joins Tom Vilsack, governor of Iowa, and Dennis Kucinich, the Ohio congressman who ran unsuccessfully in 2004, as the party's only declared candidates for the 2008 race.

DOJ_NMG_0109083

"It is my intention to seek the [Democratic] nomination, and it's my intention sometime in the month of January to set up the appropriate mechanism to be able to raise money for that purpose," Mr Biden said at the end of a conference call about Iraq policy.

While Mr Biden is considered a presidential long shot, his voter name recognition will rise in the coming weeks as he holds a series of high-profile congressional hearings on Iraq. Yesterday he repeated his opposition to increasing US troop numbers in Iraq amid speculation that President George W. Bush will next month announce a US military surge in Iraq to help curb the violence.

"We've already broken Iraq, we're about to break the United States' military," Mr Biden said, announcing his candidacy as the US military death toll in Iraq reached 2,977, overtaking the number of people killed in the 2001 al-Qaeda attacks on the US.

One of the few Republican voices calling for more troops in Iraq is John McCain, the Arizona senator, who is considered one of the frontrunners for his party's presidential nomination. But in recent weeks Rudy Giuliani, the former New York mayor, has edged ahead of Mr McCain in polls of Republican voters.

As a six-term senator who next week becomes chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee, Mr Biden is a respected congressional voice on foreign policy. But opinion polls place him far behind senators Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama, both of whom are contemplating presidential bids.

A recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll found that only 4 per cent of respondents who said they would vote in the Democratic primaries expressed a preference for Mr Biden. Some 37 per cent favoured Ms Clinton and 18 per cent preferred Mr Obama.

The roster of Democrats hoping to move to the White House in 2008 is expected to expand in the coming weeks. John Edwards, the former South Carolina senator who became John Kerry's running mate in 2004, is expected to announce soon whether he will seek the presidency again.

But some potential candidates have decided not to pursue the presidency. Evan Bayh, the Indiana senator, and Mark Warner, the former popular Democratic governor of Virginia, both recently announced they would not seek the party's nomination.

Biden Vows To Fight Any Iraq Troop Boost (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, December 27, 2006

Incoming Senate Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph Biden, a potential Democratic presidential candidate, said Tuesday he would oppose any effort by President Bush to increase U.S troops in Iraq as part of a new war strategy.

Biden also announced he has summoned Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to testify before his committee next month to discuss the administration's new plan for Iraq as soon as it is made public.

The Delaware Democrat took advantage of a quiet holiday week to draw attention to his own proposal for Iraq, which includes beginning a drawdown of U.S. forces and finding a political settlement among the various ethnic factions there.

Biden has spoken candidly of his desire to run for president and has made repeated visits in the past year to early voting states like Iowa and New Hampshire. But he is trying to find room on a crowded stage of Democratic contenders that includes Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Barack Obama of Illinois.

Biden warned that congressional Republicans — not Democrats — would suffer in the 2008 elections if they do not join him in speaking out against Bush and opposing troop increases in Iraq.

"Absent some profound political announcement . . . I can't imagine there being an overwhelming, even significant support for the president's position," he told reporters during a telephone conference call Tuesday.

If the violence continues two years from now, "every one of those Republican senators — and there's 21 of them up for re-election — knows that that is likely to spell his or her doom," Biden said.

Bush has not announced whether he plans to increase the number of troops in Iraq, but administration officials say that option is among several being considered. Also, Bush last week said he wants to expand the size of the Army and Marine Corps to lessen the strain on ground forces.

DOJ_NMG_0109084

The move was seen by many military experts as laying the groundwork to announce early next month a planned surge in forces in Iraq.

Military experts and some ground commanders are skeptical that a surge in ground forces could work to settle the violence in Iraq. Those concerns were expressed in a new bipartisan report on Iraq.

"Sustained increases in U.S. troop levels would not solve the fundamental cause of violence in Iraq, which is the absence of national reconciliation," the Iraq Study Group concluded.

But others, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., — another possible presidential contender — and experts at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, say a surge in forces could hold off the insurgency long enough to build up the Iraqi security forces and form a political settlement.

Biden, who will head the Foreign Relations Committee when Democrats take control of Congress next month, said he wants to hear from Rice on Jan. 9. The senator said she has agreed to testify, but only after Bush announces his plan on Iraq.

The president is expected to deliver a speech on Iraq sometime before his State of the Union address on Jan. 23.

Biden said he hopes the hearings will generate bipartisan consensus in Congress that will pressure the president to abandon talk of increasing troop levels in Iraq. There are currently an estimated 140,000 troops in the country.

"Even with the surge of troops, in a city of 6 million people you're talking about a ratio that would still be roughly above one to 100," Biden said of Baghdad. "It's bound to draw down support that we need in other parts of Iraq, including Anbar province."

Biden also said he believes Democrats' political vulnerability on Iraq is limited.

"I think we'll only have to accept responsibility for the war if we remain silent," he said.

Biden said he delivered this message in a recent meeting at the White House, where he told Bush: "Mr. President, this is your war."

The Right Type Of 'Surge' (WP)

By Jack Keane And Frederick W. Kagan

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Reports on the Bush administration's efforts to craft a new strategy in Iraq often use the term "surge" but rarely define it. Estimates of the number of troops to be added in Baghdad range from fewer than 10,000 to more than 30,000. Some "surges" would last a few months, others a few years.

We need to cut through the confusion. Bringing security to Baghdad -- the essential precondition for political compromise, national reconciliation and economic development -- is possible only with a surge of at least 30,000 combat troops lasting 18 months or so. Any other option is likely to fail.

The key to the success is to change the military mission -- instead of preparing for transition to Iraqi control, that mission should be to bring security to the Iraqi population. Surges aimed at accelerating the training of Iraqi forces will fail, because rising sectarian violence will destroy Iraq before the new forces can bring it under control.

Any military strategy must of course be accompanied by a range of diplomatic, political, economic and reconciliation initiatives, but those alone will not contain the violence either. Success in Iraq today requires a well-thought-out military operation aimed at bringing security to the people of Baghdad as quickly as possible -- a traditional counterinsurgency mission.

Of all the "surge" options out there, short ones are the most dangerous. Increasing troop levels in Baghdad for three or six months would virtually ensure defeat. It takes that long for newly arrived soldiers to begin to understand the areas where they operate. Short surges would redeploy them just as they began to be effective.

In addition, a short surge would play into the enemy's hands. Both Sunni insurgents and Shiite militias expect the U.S. presence to fade away over the course of 2007, and they expect any surge to be brief. They will naturally go to ground in the face of a short surge and wait until we have left. They will then attack the civilian population and whatever Iraqi security forces remain, knowing them to be easier targets than U.S. soldiers and Marines. They will work hard to raise the level of sectarian violence in order to prove that our efforts have failed.

We have seen this pattern so many times before that we can be virtually certain the enemy will follow it in the face of a short surge. The only cure is to maintain our presence long enough either to root out the hiding enemy or to defeat him when he becomes impatient. A surge that lasted at least 18 months would achieve that aim. It would also provide time to bring Iraqi forces up to the level needed to fight whatever enemy remains.

DOJ_NMG_0109085

The size of the surge matters as much as the length. Baghdad is a large city. Any sound military plan will break the problem of bringing security to the Iraqi capital into manageable parts. But there remains a minimum level of force necessary to make adequate progress in a reasonable time.

U.S. forces working with Iraqi troops can clear neighborhoods fairly quickly. Unfortunately, past endeavors such as Operation Together Forward relied too much on that ability. We sent forces into the city that were large enough to clear a few neighborhoods at a time but not large enough to maintain the security they had established. Any plan for bringing security to Baghdad must include forces for the "hold" phase as well as the "clear" phase.

Clearing and holding the Sunni and mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhoods in the center of Baghdad, which are the keys to getting the overall levels of violence down, will require around nine American combat brigades (27 battalions, in partnership with Iraqi forces, divided among some 23 districts). Since there are about five brigades in Baghdad now, achieving this level would require a surge of at least four additional combat brigades -- some 20,000 combat troops. Moreover, it would be foolhardy to send precisely as many troops as we think we need. Sound planning requires a reserve of at least one brigade (5,000 soldiers) to respond to unexpected developments. The insurgents have bases beyond Baghdad, especially in Anbar province. Securing Baghdad requires addressing these bases -- a task that would necessitate at least two more Marine regiments (around 7,000 Marines). It is difficult to imagine a responsible plan for getting the violence in and around Baghdad under control that could succeed with fewer than 30,000 combat troops beyond the forces already in Iraq.

It is tempting to imagine that greater use of Iraqi forces could reduce the number of U.S. troops needed for this operation. The temptation must be resisted. We should of course work with the Iraqi government to get as many trained and reliable Iraqi troops as possible into Baghdad, and we should pair our soldiers and Marines with Iraqis as much as we can. But reducing the violence in the Sunni and mixed neighborhoods in Baghdad is the most critical military task the U.S. armed forces face anywhere in the world. We cannot allow that mission to fail simply because some Iraqi units don't show up, aren't at full strength or are less reliable than we had hoped.

The United States faces a dire situation in Iraq because of a history of half-measures. We have always sent "just enough" force to succeed if everything went according to plan. So far nothing has, and there's no reason to believe that it will. Sound military planning doesn't work this way. The only "surge" option that makes sense is both long and large.

Jack Keane is a retired Army general. Frederick W. Kagan is a resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Bush's New Look On Iraq: Weary (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, December 26, 2006

Watching President Bush in recent weeks has become a grim kind of reality TV show. In almost every news conference, speech and photo opportunity, the topic is the same: what to do about the grinding war in Iraq. Bush has let the facade crack open -- admitting that his strategy for victory isn't working -- but then he struggles to rebuild it with new words of confidence.

The stress of the job -- so well hidden for much of the past six years -- has begun to show on Bush's face. He often looks burdened, distracted, haunted by a question that has no good answer. When a photographer captures him at ease, as in a sweet Texas-romance picture of Bush and his wife, Laura, that appeared in People magazine last week, it's as if he has escaped the Iraq sweatbox.

I grew up in a Washington that was struggling with the nightmare of a failing war in Vietnam. The government officials of that time were people who behaved as if they'd never known failure in their lives. They had the rosy confidence of the chosen -- "the best and the brightest," as David Halberstam put it. But then the war began to grind them down. I see that same meat grinder at work now. Bush and his officials are strong characters; they work hard not to let you see them sweat. But the anguish and exhaustion are there.

DOJ_NMG_0109086

Bush is not a man for introspection. That's part of his flinty personality -- the tight, clipped answers and the forced jocularity of the nicknames he gives to reporters and White House aides. That's why this version of reality TV is so poignant: This very private man has begun to talk out loud about the emotional turmoil inside. He is letting it bleed.

Bush opened the emotional curtain at a news conference last week. A reporter noted that Lyndon Johnson hadn't been able to sleep well during the Vietnam War and asked Bush if this was a "painful time" for him. He gave an unexpectedly personal answer: "Most painful aspect of my presidency has been knowing that good men and women have died in combat. I read about it every night. And my heart breaks for a mother or father or husband or wife or son and daughter. It just does. And so when you ask about pain, that's pain."

Bush's "state of denial," as Bob Woodward rightly called it, has officially ended. He actually spoke the words "We're not winning" last week in an interview with The Post, coupling it with the reverse: "We're not losing." But in truth, he cannot abide the possibility that Iraq will not end in victory. So a day after his "not winning" comment, he half took it back, saying: "I believe that we're going to win," and then adding oddly, as if to reassure himself: "I believe that -- and by the way, if I didn't think that, I wouldn't have our troops there. That's what you've got to know. We're going to succeed."

Policy debates in this White House are often described as battles between competing advisers -- Dick Cheney wants this; the Joint Chiefs favor that; Condi Rice favors a third outcome. This kind of analysis implies that Bush isn't really master of his own house, but I think it's a big mistake. The truth is that with this president, the only opinion that finally matters is his own. And he's a stubborn man. Military leaders can tell him it's a mistake to surge troops into Baghdad, but that doesn't mean he will listen.

Bush says he doesn't care what happens now to his poll numbers, and I believe him. He broke through the political barriers a while ago. I sense that, as he anguishes about Iraq, he has in mind the judgment of future historians. He said it plainly in an interview in October with conservative talk show host Bill O'Reilly: "Look, history is interesting. I read three books on George Washington last year. And my opinion is that if they're still analyzing the first president, the 43rd president ought to be doing what he thinks is right. And eventually, historians will come and realize whether . . . the decisions I made made sense."

What makes reality TV gripping is that it's all happening live -- the contestants make their choices under pressure, win or lose. So too with Bush. He is making a vast wager -- of American lives, treasure and the nation's security -- that his judgments about Iraq were right. The Baker-Hamilton report gave him a chance to take some chips off the table, but Bush doesn't seem interested. He is still playing to win. The audience is shouting out advice, but the man under the spotlight knows he will have to make this decision alone.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

Iraq Court Upholds Saddam Death Sentence (AP)

By Christopher Torchia

AP, December 27, 2006

Iraq's highest court rejected Saddam Hussein's appeal Tuesday and said the former dictator must be hanged within 30 days for ordering the killing of scores of Shiite Muslims in 1982.

The sentence has already stoked Iraq's sectarian rage, with the Shiite majority demanding Saddam's death and his fellow Sunni Arabs calling the trial tainted.

"From tomorrow, any day could be the day" Saddam is sent to the gallows, the chief judge said. Saddam was condemned to death for his role in the execution of 148 Shiite Muslims from the small northern town of Dujail, after a 1982 assassination attempt.

The decision came on a particularly bloody day in Baghdad, where at least 54 Iraqis died in bombings and police discovered 49 apparent victims of sectarian reprisal killings. Separately, the U.S. military announced the deaths of seven American soldiers.

In upholding the sentence, imposed Nov. 5, the Supreme Court of Appeals also affirmed death sentences for two of his co-defendants, including his half brother. And it said life imprisonment for a third was too lenient and demanded he be given the death penalty, too.

DOJ_NMG_0109087

Saddam's hanging "must be implemented within 30 days," said Aref Shahin, chief judge of the appeals court. "From tomorrow, any day could be the day of implementation."

The White House called the ruling a milestone in Iraq's efforts "to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long. So this is an important day for the Iraqi people," said deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel, who was aboard Air Force One flying from Washington to Waco, Texas.

Some international legal observers, however, called Saddam's trial unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government.

The ruling raised doubts about whether other victims of Saddam's ruthless regime — including families of Kurds gassed in the late 1980s — will ever testify in court about their suffering.

But the announcement delighted Shiites, who endured persecution under Saddam and are eager to remove a symbol of the old regime.

Some Shiites are concerned that insurgents, many of them Sunni Arabs, will try to disrupt or prevent the execution.

"We were looking forward to this day so as to achieve justice, though it comes late," said Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker. "The government should speed up implementing the verdict in order not to give any chance to the terrorists."

Under Iraqi law, the appeals court decision must be ratified by President Jalal Talabani and Iraq's two vice presidents. One of the two deputies is, like Saddam, a Sunni Arab.

Talabani, a Kurd, has said he is opposed to the death penalty. But he previously deputized Vice President Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite Muslim, to sign execution orders on his behalf.

Abdul-Mahdi has said he would sign a death warrant for Saddam.

The Sunni vice president, Tariq Al-Hashimi, has also pledged to support Saddam's execution as part of a deal that gave him the job last April 22, witnesses at the meeting told The Associated Press in October.

Raed Juhi, a spokesman for the High Tribunal court that convicted Saddam, said the judicial system would ensure Saddam is executed even if the presidency does not ratify the decision.

"We'll implement the verdict by the power of the law," Juhi said.

He did not elaborate on the statement, which implied that Saddam's case might divide the government.

Saddam is being held at Camp Cropper, an American military prison close to Baghdad's airport. The U.S. military has had Saddam Hussein in its custody, on behalf of the Iraqis, since his capture. Military officials, however, were not able to say Tuesday whether the former dictator is being turned over to the Iraqis now, in anticipation of his execution.

It's not clear where the hanging will take place. It might occur at Camp Cropper or, perhaps, at a Baghdad prison where the new Iraqi government has carried out other executions. It's also uncertain if the public or press will be allowed to witness the hanging, or if the execution will be announced only afterward.

Human Rights Watch, an international rights group, said figures in the U.S.-backed Iraqi government had undermined the credibility of Saddam's trial. Those officials publicly criticized a judge early in the case, leading to his resignation.

The rights group also cited other "political interference."

"Imposing the death penalty, which is indefensible in any case, is especially wrong after the unfair proceedings of the Dujail trial," said Richard Dicker, director of the group's International Justice Program.

As an example of Iraqi government interference, Dicker noted Mouwafak al-Rubaie, Iraq's national security adviser, announced the decision of the appeals court before the court itself did.

Al-Rubaie told AP of the decision about an hour before the chief judge announced it.

Shiite residents of Baghdad had no doubts about the fairness of the verdict. "We are very happy," said Riyah Abdul Sattar in Sadr City, a neighborhood where Shiite militias are strong. "We will get rid of him for sure."

There was disappointment, though, in Tikrit, a mostly Sunni Arab city north of Baghdad that lies near Saddam's hometown of Ouja.

"It is a political verdict that has no relation to law or justice," said Saad Ibrahim Khelil. "I do believe it's a kind of pressure against the (Sunni-led) resistance."

DOJ_NMG_0109088

The appeals court also upheld death sentences for Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and intelligence chief during the Dujail killings, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court, which issued the death sentences against the Dujail residents.

The court concluded that the life sentence given former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan was too lenient, and returned his case to the High Tribunal for reconsideration. Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder.

"We demand that he be sentenced to death," said Shahin, the chief appeals judge.

At his trial, Saddam argued that the Dujail residents who were killed had been convicted in a legitimate Iraqi court for trying to assassinate him.

Saddam's televised trial was watched throughout Iraq and the Middle East as much for theater as for substance. The fallen dictator was ejected from the courtroom repeatedly for political harangues, and his half brother once showed up in long underwear and sat with his back to the judges.

Three defense lawyers and a witness were murdered during the course of its 39 sessions.

Saddam is currently in the midst of another trial, charged with genocide and other crimes during a 1987-88 military crackdown on Kurds in northern Iraq.

An estimated 180,000 Kurds died during the operation. That trial was adjourned until Jan. 8.

Saddam was captured while hiding in a hole in the ground near his home village north of Baghdad in December 2003, eight months after he fled the capital ahead of advancing American troops. He had a pistol in the hole, but never fired.

Iraqi Court Says Hussein Must Die Within 30 Days (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 — An Iraqi appeals court on Tuesday upheld the death sentence against Saddam Hussein and ruled that the man whose brutal reign began in 1979 and ended with the American-led invasion in 2003 must go to the gallows within 30 days.

It was the court of last resort for Mr. Hussein, who received his death sentence on Nov. 5 from the Iraqi High Tribunal, a court set up specifically to pass judgment on his years in power. No further appeals are possible, and his final legal recourse appears to be a clause in the Iraqi Constitution stating that the Iraqi president must approve all death sentences.

That clause offers Mr. Hussein only the slenderest of hopes. Jalal Talabani, the Iraqi president, has said that he is formally against the death penalty, but he has permitted the hangings of many Iraqis convicted of capital crimes. And the Constitution may be trumped by an article in the charter of the tribunal stating that its sentences may be commuted by no one, not even the president.

The appeals verdict, covering one case involving the execution of 148 men and boys in the northern town of Dujail in 1982, came even as Mr. Hussein was facing trial on charges that he ordered the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds, whose bodies have in some instances been exhumed from grisly mass graves and minutely described in the courtroom.

The decision of the nine-judge appeals court was announced on short notice by the chief judge, Aref Shahen, after another day of the numbing violence that has gradually engulfed this country after the bursts of optimism that followed Mr. Hussein's fall from power in March 2003 and his capture by American forces in December of that year.

Judge Shahen delivered the verdict to a few reporters assembled at the Council of Ministers building within the heavily guarded Green Zone as the rest of the country settled into its nighttime curfew. There were none of the theatrical outbursts contrived by Mr. Hussein to disrupt the trial and the appeal, because he was not present to hear the verdict.

The judge said simply that the appeals court had approved the verdict against Mr. Hussein, who was formally charged with crimes against humanity, and two co-defendants, who had also received death sentences in the Dujail killings, and that they now faced "execution by hanging until death" within 30 days.

The court also approved lesser sentences against three other defendants and the tribunal's acquittal of a fourth, Judge Shahen said. In addition, the court sent the case of one man, Taha Yassin Ramadan, back to the tribunal, saying his life sentence was too lenient "compared to the crimes that were committed."

DOJ_NMG_0109089

The entire session, which was televised, took no more than 15 minutes, and after taking a few questions Judge Shahen abruptly rose from his seat and left the room.

Before leaving, the judge left no doubt about where he stood on the issue of constitutional approval of the court's decision. "Nobody is entitled, including the president, to exempt or commute the verdict issued by this court," he said.

"The punishment is mandatory and should be executed within 30 days from the date it was issued," he said.

Hiwa Osman, a media adviser for Mr. Talabani, said shortly after the verdict that the president's office was still studying the decision and had not yet come to a conclusion on whether approval was needed.

"It's a bit too early for us to judge because we are digesting all this new information," Mr. Osman said. "We will wait for the case to come to us through the proper channels as decided by the court."

The decision capped a day of searing violence in Iraq. The police found 41 bodies dumped around Baghdad, apparently the victims of death squad killings, and at least 45 people died in bombings, including a triple car-bombing in the Baghdad neighborhood of Baya.

The American military announced that five more American service members had died as a result of roadside bombs. A single bomb near a patrol northwest of Baghdad killed three soldiers on Tuesday, the military said, and another bomb killed two soldiers southwest of the capital the day before, on Christmas.

After the Baya bombings, a bus driver, Husam Abdul Wahid, 18, was shivering in a blanket at Yarmouk Hospital after receiving wounds to his abdomen, foot and hand. He said he had been waiting to pick up passengers when he heard a blast to one side of an intersection and rushed, unhurt, with others into nearby shops.

"After a while we came out to see what happened," Mr. Wahid said.

"Another car detonated about 30 meters away," plunging shrapnel into his body, he said.

Reaction to the appeals court verdict appeared to be muted in neighborhoods across Iraq that were occupied with far more immediate concerns. In Kirkuk, where Kurdish and Shiite neighborhoods celebrated the Nov. 5 verdict against Mr. Hussein while Sunni areas protested, the streets were quiet, residents said.

In the heavily Shiite southern city of Basra, the police fanned out across city streets but largely withdrew when little reaction materialized.

And the scene was tense but quiet in Sadr City, the Shiite slum in northwestern Baghdad, as American military vehicles patrolled the outskirts and local militiamen moved along the streets.

Dr. Salem Najim, an ophthalmologist in Basra, noted that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had made it clear recently that he believed that Mr. Hussein should be executed at the earliest possible date — a pronouncement that many pointed to as evidence of political interference in the trial.

Considering that kind of interference, the result came as little surprise, Mr. Najim said, comparing it to a flavorless meal. "It is like frozen food," he said.

The verdict was criticized by some groups, including Human Rights Watch, which said that it "was imposed after a deeply flawed trial" and recommended that the decision to execute Mr. Hussein be reversed.

A similar view was expressed by Miranda Sissons, leader of the Iraq program at the International Center for Transitional Justice in New York, who said the haste of the appeals court's decision indicated that it could not have been thoroughly considered.

"This judgment is not surprising, but the speed is very troubling," Ms. Sissons said. The verdict in the Dujail case "deserved a careful review process, but the signs today are that that hasn't happened," she said.

Ms. Sissons said it was also unfortunate that a death sentence meant that trials on other suspected crimes would never go forward, denying justice to other victims of Mr. Hussein's brutality.

But at the American Embassy in Baghdad, a spokeswoman, Ginger Cruz, praised the "courageous effort" of the Iraqi judges and others at the tribunal, which she said ensured "that justice prevails for the atrocities Saddam Hussein and his regime committed against the Iraqi people."

DOJ_NMG_0109090

Some Iraqis said they feared that when Wednesday dawned and the overnight curfew lifted, the sealing of Mr. Saddam's fate would spark violence. But there was little evidence to support those worries late Tuesday, even in places most prone to those problems.

In Adhamiya, a mostly Sunni neighborhood that might have been expected to protest the decision, the streets were quiet after a particularly horrific afternoon in which a family of five was trapped in a burning car after a bomb exploded.

The father, screaming for help, escaped the car as residents tried to extinguish the flames with blankets and water. But two young children and an infant died with their mother in the fire.

As night fell and the court's verdict was read, there appeared to be little energy left on the streets for much reaction to a legal decision.

Iraqi Court Upholds Hussein's Sentence (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan And Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 -- Iraq's highest court upheld Saddam Hussein's death sentence Tuesday, opening the way for the former Iraqi president to be hanged within 30 days, Iraqi judicial officials said.

Officials in the Iraqi government have already begun to address the logistics and security measures for the execution, possibly a closed and secret one, according to sources familiar with the preparations.

Under Iraq's constitution, the execution can proceed only if ratified by President Jalal Talabani and the country's two vice presidents. There was no immediate comment from the three Tuesday.

If they uphold the decision, as many Iraqis expect, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki would have 30 days to order Hussein's execution. People close to him said Tuesday he would do so quickly.

Capping a trial that was controversial from the start, the decision split the Iraqi public along the fault lines of sect and history. Shiite Muslims and Kurds, whose groups suffered most under Hussein's rule, generally celebrated. Many of Hussein's fellow Sunni Arabs, however, warned that hanging the former president would intensify the current insurgency and sectarian killings.

It remains unclear whether a hanging would be carried out at a pre-announced time, with public observers present. Among several proposals before Maliki is one that calls for Hussein to be executed in secret as early as next week.

His body would then be formally identified by independent observers and the death revealed to the Iraqi public and the rest of the world, according to an official familiar with the proposal. The goal of such an approach would be to reduce retaliatory attacks by Sunnis and other loyalists.

On Tuesday, Iraqi politicians, including some Sunnis, issued calls for a speedy execution, expressing concern that a delay could cause more sectarian bloodshed and division.

"The people who wanted Saddam to be hanged and the people who were defending Saddam both were expecting this verdict," said Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker widely seen as neutral by Sunnis and Shiites. Many people would like the execution to happen quickly, Othman said, "because they're afraid that he might escape from prison. The more it's delayed, the more people will talk about it. It will be a divisive thing in society."

Tuesday's decision came 51 days after Hussein was sentenced to death for crimes against humanity for the killings of 148 Shiite men and boys from the town of Dujail after an assassination attempt there in 1982.

The U.S-backed trial was marred by allegations of bias and by courtroom speeches and outbursts from the defendants. Intended to deliver justice to Iraqis oppressed under Hussein, the proceedings unfolded against a backdrop of escalating sectarian strife that took thousands of lives and widened the gap between Sunnis and Shiites.

Talabani, a Kurd, is firmly against the death penalty. But in past cases he has deputized one of the vice presidents -- Adel Abdel-Mehdi, a Shiite, and Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni -- to sign execution orders on his behalf. All three signatures are required for an execution order to be valid.

Some analysts in Baghdad questioned whether Hashemi would endorse the execution. But they also noted that he had recently called on President Bush at the White House.

DOJ_NMG_0109091

If the government does not send Hussein to the gallows, the Iraqi High Tribunal's code would ensure his execution by other means, legal experts said.

Several officials close to Maliki, a Shiite, said Tuesday that he plans to proceed with the execution as soon as legally possible. "Definitely," said Sadiq Rikabi, a political adviser to the president. "This is in order to open a new page in the history of the Iraqi people."

The nine-judge appeals court also upheld execution sentences for Barzan Ibrahim, Hussein's half brother, and former judge Awad Haman Bander for their roles in the Dujail killings. The judges also changed the sentence of former vice president Taha Yassin Ramadan from life to death.

"In the name of the good Sunnis, the liberal Sunnis, the patriotic Sunnis, we are happy to hear this decision," said Mithal al-Alousi, an influential Sunni politician. "The people are asking us to make political pressure to execute Saddam immediately. We need to close this file. There's no other way for Iraq to move forward."

Saleh al-Armouti, one of Hussein's lawyers, warned against a hanging. "The region now will be more in flames, and the resistance will increase across the Arab world," he said, speaking by telephone from neighboring Jordan. "His absence will lead to more strife and civil war inside Iraq."

Armouti said that Hussein, who is being held at Camp Cropper, a U.S. military prison near Baghdad airport, had expected the appeals court's decision. "His morale is very high," Armouti said. "He doesn't fear death. His will and his faith are very strong."

International human rights groups criticized the Dujail trial as unfair and improperly run, describing it as a victor's court. Human rights activists said they had hoped the appeals court would carry out a careful and comprehensive legal review and correct what they viewed as major flaws in the conduct of the trial.

"We think, given the unfairness in the proceedings, it would be indefensible to execute Saddam Hussein regardless of the crimes alleged in Dujail in 1982," said Richard Dicker, director of the International Justice Program of New York-based Human Rights Watch.

Dicker criticized the appeals court for reaching a decision so soon after Hussein's attorneys filed an appeal, which they did Dec. 3. He said the former president's defense team did not even receive the written judgment from the trial until weeks after the verdict was pronounced, which delayed their preparation for the appeal. "The whole manner in which this has unfolded suggests a highly politicized, nonjudicial approach to what is such an important case," Dicker said.

Bassam Ridha, who serves as a government liaison to the Iraqi High Tribunal, disputed charges that the government had interfered in the judicial process. "It was a very fair process," Ridha said, adding that the trial met international legal standards. "What we are doing is not a human rights violation. Where were these activists when my people were slaughtered?"

In Dujail, residents described the decision as bringing them a step nearer the closure they have awaited for nearly 25 years. "Now I feel that there is actually a God up there in Heaven," said Haiyder Hamed, 43, a farmer.

Other residents wondered what the future would bring in a world without Hussein. "Executing Saddam is achieving justice on earth and in heaven," said Hussein Mahmoud, 28, a police officer. "But will executing him bring Iraq as it used to be or will it make Iraq a burnt land?"

In Mosul, college student Sardar Mohamad Hassan, 25, said Hussein should not be executed because he still faces charges of crimes against humanity in at least a dozen other cases.

In the current phase of the trial, Hussein and six co-defendants are accused of orchestrating the killing or wounding of hundreds of thousands of Kurds with poison gas and other weapons during the so-called Anfal campaign of the late 1980s. Hussein is scheduled to return to court on Jan. 8.

Ridha said the Anfal trial would continue even if Hussein is executed and that Kurdish victims would get the justice they seek. "If Saddam Hussein is gone, it doesn't mean all these guys go free," he said.

In the northern city of Tikrit, Hussein's home town, residents reacted angrily to the decision. "We should not pour oil on the fire," said Khairallah Muhammad 45, a merchant. "This verdict is going to be the end to America, and it will be another Vietnam."

At Hannah restaurant in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood, employees and regular customers crowded around the butcher's table to talk about the possible execution. Each said he had a relative or friend who had been imprisoned or killed by Hussein's government.

DOJ_NMG_0109092

Sadiq Esa, 31, said he wants more than to see him executed. "I swear to God, I will kill him with my own hands," he said, sipping a cup of sweet tea at a table covered with raw meat and blood.

Jafar Hani, the 22-year-old butcher, called Hussein a "monster." As he diced and skewered pieces of meat, he said, "The whole world wants him to be put in the center of Baghdad so everyone can see him hang."

Special correspondents Saad al-Izzi, Naseer Nouri, Waleed Saffar, Muhanned Saif Aldin and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Saddam To Hang Within 30 Days (USAT)

By Rick Jervis

USA Today, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD — Iraq's highest court said Tuesday that Saddam Hussein must be hanged within 30 days. The decision generated uncertainty about the timing of an execution and concern over whether his death could spark more violence.

INTERACTIVE GRAPHIC: Saddam's rise and fall

The court rejected an appeal by the former Iraqi dictator, who was convicted and sentenced to death Nov. 5 for ordering the killings of 148 Shiite Muslims in the town of Dujail in 1982.

"From tomorrow, any day could be the day" for the execution, said Aref al-Shahin, the court's chief judge.

The Iraqi government has not announced any details of plans to send Saddam to the gallows. There were no announcements Tuesday of plans for curfews in Baghdad. Curfews would probably be imposed for an event as politically sensitive as Saddam's execution.

The White House called the decision a milestone in Iraq's efforts "to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law."

"Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long. So this is an important day for the Iraqi people," said deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel.

Some, however, such as Human Rights Watch, condemned the sentence as unfair because of alleged interference by the Shiite-dominated government in Saddam's trial.

Under Iraqi law, any death sentence must be certified by the council made up of Iraq's president and two vice presidents. Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, has opposed the death penalty in the past but has also said he would deputize a vice president to sign an execution order on his behalf. Vice President Tariq al-Hashemi, a Sunni like Saddam, might also be reluctant to certify the execution. The other vice president, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, is a Shiite.

Basam Ridha, an adviser to Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said the presidency council cannot delay or alter Saddam's sentence under Iraqi law.

Ridha said Iraqi officials will meet in the next few days to discuss when to send Saddam to hang. "We're anxious to do it as soon as we can," he said. "We want to put an end to it."

A prompt execution would short-circuit an ongoing trial in which Saddam and former top aides are accused of killing tens of thousands in a genocidal campaign against the Kurds in the late 1980s. That trial is in recess until Jan. 8.

Some Iraqi politicians said Saddam's execution would aggravate efforts at a political reconciliation between Iraq's Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish factions - and could intensify the Sunni-led insurgency.

"Saddam has done so many bad things in this country. There are tens of thousands of victims who would like this man to be killed," said Mahmoud Othman, a leading Kurdish lawmaker. "But at the same time, it may create more rifts for the people." Many Shiite residents of Baghdad were delighted. "We are very happy," said Riyah Abdul Sattar in Sadr City. "We will get rid of him for sure."

But Ala'a al-Sayid, 28, a Shiite government worker, said hanging Saddam "will offer the people nothing. The armed groups in Iraq will use this event for their personal purposes. They will call Saddam a martyr, not because they love him, but for their own gain."

Although Sunnis were the main backers of Saddam's rule, loyalty to Saddam is no longer a main motivation of Sunni insurgents, said Anthony Cordesman, a scholar at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. Ordinary Iraqis, he said, "are far more concerned about the future, about ethnic and sectarian divisions, about their personal security."

DOJ_NMG_0109093

Contributing: Zaid Sabah, Matt Kelley, wire reports

Saddam's Death Sentence Is Upheld (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Molly Hennessy-fiske

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein's date with the executioner could come any day, after an appeals court upheld the deposed Iraqi leader's death sentence Tuesday, saying he must hang for ordering mass slayings in a Shiite Muslim town in 1982.

The decision, announced at a hastily convened news conference in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone, could fan surging bloodshed between Iraq's ascendant Shiite Muslim majority and a disaffected Sunni Arab minority that had long been favored under Saddam. Government and security officials said they were bracing for more violence when the sentence is carried out but insisted that any surge would be short-lived.

Aref Shahin, chief judge of the appeals panel, said there was no further legal recourse for Saddam, and the Iraqi executive is free to send him to the gallows "any day ... starting from tomorrow." The execution must be carried out within 30 days.

President Jalal Talabani and his two deputies have to sign off on the execution order before it is implemented. Talabani, a Kurd, opposes the death penalty but has in previous cases deputized a vice president to sign on his behalf.

The Iraqi High Tribunal had handed down death sentences against Saddam and two co-defendants Nov. 5 for orchestrating an attack on the Shiite town of Dujail in the wake of a failed assassination plot against him. Hundreds were detained, tortured and forced out of there homes, and more than 100 men and boys were executed after a summary trial.

Under Iraqi law, the verdicts and sentences automatically went for review before a nine-judge appeals chamber.

The White House called the appeals court ruling a milestone in efforts to replace the rule of a tyrant with the rule of law. "Saddam Hussein has received due process and legal rights that he denied the Iraqi people for so long," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

But legal experts said the verdict came too soon, just three weeks after defense attorneys filed lengthy appeals on Saddam's behalf, reinforcing claims the trial was politically tainted.

Some Kurds had also hoped for a delay so Saddam can finish standing trial for a separate 1980s military campaign against the ethnic minority that prosecutors have described as genocide.

"It is not acceptable to finish everything with the Dujail case and leave 180,000 victims with no trial," complained Vian Dizayee, a member of the Kurdish parliament in the northern city of Irbil. Baghdad lawyer Hibba Mansouri predicted government leaders would not postpone Saddam's execution for the sake of the Kurdish trial.

Four other defendants received prison terms ranging from 15 years to life, and one was acquitted at the prosecution's request.

Tribunal spokesman Raed Juhi said the panel deliberated for three days before deciding to uphold the death sentences against Saddam, his half-brother Barzan Ibrahim and intelligence chief, Awad Hamed Bandar.

The judges also concluded that the life sentence against former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was too lenient and referred his case back to the tribunal for the death penalty. They did not alter the lesser sentences.

When the decision was announced on national television, victims' families in Dujail burst into tears and ululations, saying justice would finally be served and calling for a swift execution.

But residents in Saddam's hometown of Tikrit seethed, dismissing the trial as political theater staged by the United States and its Shiite allies in government.

"Implementing the verdict is like driving ... Iraq into hell," said Ismail Mohammed, a 48-year-old teacher. "It is an American verdict and has nothing to do with the will of the Iraqis."

The announcement, which came as dusk fell, did not provoke any immediate outbursts, but tension was high in some predominantly Sunni areas.

"A lot of blood will follow as consequence of this political verdict," warned Osama Mohammed, a 19-year-old college student in Ramadi, a center of the Sunni-driven insurgency west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0109094

Saleh Mutlaq, leader of the second-largest Sunni political party, said more Iraqis were dying now than under Saddam.

"I feel the government is not qualified to push (a death sentence) under this situation," he said. "I think this verdict is going to increase the violence and decrease the chance of reconciling."

But the decision delighted Shiites, who were brutally repressed under Saddam.

"We wish to see Saddam hanged on our TV screens," said Sattar Jabar, a 32-year-old contract worker in the southern city of Basra.

Ali Haidari, a 38-year-old journalist who was the first witness at Hussein's trial, watched the announcement on television in the living room where pictures of his seven brothers slain in Saddam's reprisals are lined up on a wall.

Haidari said his 67-year-old mother burst into "happy tears" and started ululating. His 5-year-old daughter, who refers to Saddam as "the dog" when she sees him on television, was jumping on the sofa and singing.

"This was the wish of all the martyrs, the prisoners who suffered during Saddam's regime," he said by telephone.

International reaction was mixed Tuesday. British Prime Minister Tony Blair, a strong ally of the U.S. effort in Iraq, reiterated his opposition to the death penalty, but he said the Iraqi decision "does give us a very clear reminder of the total and barbaric brutality of that regime."

Human rights groups urged the Iraqi government not to implement the sentence after a trial they said was deeply flawed.

The New York-based Human Rights Watch said there were regular failures to disclose key evidence, violations of defendants' rights to confront witnesses and "lapses of judicial demeanor."

Three defense lawyers and a witness were killed during the nine-month trial, which also featured angry showdowns between the judges and Saddam. The former dictator rejected the legitimacy of the court and said he had the right to act against the Dujail victims.

Times staff writers Raheem Salman, Salar Jaff, Mohammed Rasheed and Saif Hameed in Baghdad and Kim Murphy in London and special correspondents in Baghdad, Basra and Tikrit contributed to this report.

Saddam Heads To The Gallows (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

The decision by Iraq's Court of Appeals to uphold Saddam Hussein's death sentence means that the former Iraqi dictator must, by law, hang within 30 days. If that seems rushed, consider that the victims of the Dujail massacre for which Saddam was convicted have waited nearly a quarter of a century for justice to be done.

The Dujail massacre ranks among the lesser of Saddam's atrocities in the magnitude of death: About 150 Shiites were summarily executed (some of them apparently in human meat grinders) in retaliation for an attempt on Saddam's life. By contrast, the "Anfal" campaign of the late 1980s took the lives of as many as 180,000 Iraqi Kurds. Still, it seems appropriate that the Iraqi government chose to try him first for Dujail, for the sake of example as well as expediency. The very specificity of his crime, and its political motivations so reminiscent of Hitler's revenge against the Czech town of Lidice in World War II, are somehow easier to comprehend than his larger mass murders.

Critics of Saddam's sentence have argued that it is the result of a politicized judicial process, marred by procedural flaws and a conclusion that was foregone. But if anyone is to blame for making a mockery of the proceedings it was Saddam himself, whose repeated outbursts before the court could not disguise that Iraq's new government had given the country something it had never known before: a real trial, methodical and almost fully transparent.

A case can be made that the cause of justice would be most fully served if Saddam were spared the punishment he meted so promiscuously to others. But that determination belongs to the Iraqi people and their elected leaders, so many of whom participated in the trial as victims or the kin of victims. The day Saddam dies will be their judgment day.

Military Deaths In Iraq Exceed 9/11 Toll (AP)

By Larry Mcshane

AP, December 27, 2006

In a span of a few hours, 2,973 people were killed in the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In a span of 45 months, the number of American troops killed in Iraq exceeded that grim toll as the war continues.

DOJ_NMG_0109095

The milestone in Iraq came on Christmas, nearly four years after the war began, according to a count by The Associated Press.

The U.S. military on Tuesday announced the deaths of six more American soldiers, pushing the U.S. military death toll since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,977 — four more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

President Bush has said that the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad, and that going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking regime change in Iraq.

Democratic leaders point out that there has not been any credible evidence linking Iraq to the Sept. 11 attacks and have said the war in Iraq detracted from efforts against al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

"The president believes that every life is precious and he grieves for each one that is lost," deputy White House press secretary Scott Stanzel said Tuesday. "The hardest decision the president has ever made has been to send our young men and women in uniform into harm's way.

"The president will ensure that their sacrifice was not made in vain."

The 9/11 death toll includes the 2,749 killed at the World Trade Center, 184 at the Pentagon and 40 passengers aboard United Flight 93.

Those killed in Iraq came from across the United States, including more than 50 residents of Alabama, more than 30 from Nebraska and more than 40 from Kentucky.

A number of them enlisted to fight in Iraq, feeling it was a way to battle international terrorism in the wake of the 9/11 attacks.

Jonathan Lootens, from upstate New York, joined the Army, telling family members: "This is something I have to do."

"It did impact him and make him feel like he should serve," his father, Robert Lootens, said Tuesday. "He felt that this was his time."

The 25-year-old sergeant was killed during his second tour of duty when a roadside bomb went off near his vehicle in the city of Kirkuk. His father says more than enough Americans have died in the conflict.

"I want the boys to come home, you know," he said. "Personally, I can't see where we're really accomplishing anything over there anymore."

Marine Lance Cpl. John Edward Hale was only 15 and living in Louisiana when the planes hit the World Trade Center. He joined the Marines last year after high school, and had been in Iraq only three months when he was killed by a roadside bomb.

Michael Glover joined the Marines after his boyhood neighborhood — the Belle Harbor section of Queens — lost several residents in the Sept. 11 attacks. One of his best friends, an equities trader at Cantor Fitzgerald LP, was among those who died at the trade center.

Glover was killed by a sniper while on patrol in Fallujah.

The rising death toll was an emotional reminder of loss for family members of Sept. 11 victims, some who said the war had gone on long enough. Sally Regenhard's son Christian, a firefighter and a Marine, was killed at the trade center on Sept. 11.

"I just would like this war to stop in whatever way we need to," Regenhard said. "I can hardly tolerate it when I see these beautiful people. It reminds me of my son. ... These people are being massacred."

7 U.S. Troops Added To Rising Toll In Iraq (WP)

By Nancy Trejos

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 -- Seven more American service members have been killed in Iraq, the U.S. military reported Tuesday. It is the second deadliest month of the year for troops.

With five days left in December, 87 service members have died, according to figures provided by the military and news releases of combat deaths. The deadliest month this year was October, when attacks in Baghdad and the western Iraqi province of Anbar killed 105 U.S. troops.

The total number of U.S. military deaths in the Iraq war announced by the Pentagon is 2,961.

DOJ_NMG_0109096

Military officials and analysts have attributed the rise in U.S. casualties in recent months to the larger number and greater visibility of American troops in Baghdad, plus the intensity of the Sunni insurgency in Anbar.

"We are continuing to conduct operations. We're doing that aggressively," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We are fighting a tough war against a tough enemy, and unfortunately we take casualties."

As 2006 began, there was talk on Capitol Hill of withdrawing some U.S. troops by the end of the year. But rising sectarian violence in Baghdad forced President Bush to instead shift troops from other parts of Iraq to the capital, preventing a withdrawal. With no end to the violence, Bush ends the year with more than 140,000 U.S. troops on the ground in Iraq and faced with the decision of whether to send even more.

Although much of the focus of the war has shifted to Baghdad, analysts say the battle in Anbar remains just as intense.

"You have had to limit the number of troops deployed in Anbar and deploy more to Baghdad. This makes U.S. forces more vulnerable in Anbar because you're thinner on the ground," Anthony H. Cordesman, an analyst for the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said by phone in Washington. Insurgents have increased the number of attacks "faster than we've been able to make countermeasures effective."

Iraqi civilians have suffered the most casualties in the war. In the latest count available, the U.N. Assistance Mission for Iraq found that the number of civilians killed in Iraq reached a record monthly high of 3,709 in October.

On Tuesday, at least 54 civilians died in car bombings and mortar attacks in the capital and elsewhere, hospital officials told the Associated Press.

Three car bombs exploded simultaneously in Baghdad's mostly Shiite neighborhood of Bayaa, killing 10 people and wounding about 40, the U.S. military said. Abdul Kareem al-Kinani, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry, said there were 14 fatalities and 69 injuries.

A car bomb in the mostly Shiite neighborhood of New Baghdad killed six civilians and wounded nine others, according to an Interior Ministry official who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to talk to the media.

Sunnis were also targeted. In the Sunni enclave of Adhamiyah, a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, killing at least 15 people and wounding 37, according to Iraqi TV reports. The bomb tore through markets and kebab stands during the late afternoon rush, according to Iraqi TV.

In the mixed southern Baghdad neighborhood of Dora, national policemen fought armed groups Tuesday evening, Kinani said. Several mortar rounds also fell on the outskirts of the neighborhood, he said.

Most of the U.S. casualties were also the result of bombs. On Monday, one soldier was killed and two wounded when a roadside bomb exploded near their patrol southwest of Baghdad, the U.S. military said. A roadside bomb killed two soldiers and wounded one southwest of Baghdad while they were conducting operations aimed at preventing insurgents from planting such explosives, the military said.

On Tuesday, a roadside bomb detonated near a patrol as it was clearing a route, killing three soldiers northwest of the capital. Another soldier was injured.

Also on Tuesday, a soldier was killed and two were injured when their vehicle rolled over along a dirt canal trail during a combat reconnaissance mission south of Baghdad.

U.S. Soldiers' Death Toll Climbs In Iraq (AP)

By Lauren Frayer

AP, December 27, 2006

A string of car bombs and other blasts killed at least 54 Iraqis on Tuesday, including 17 outside Baghdad's most venerated Sunni mosque, while U.S. troops battled Shiite militiamen in Baghdad.

Seven more American soldiers died, the U.S. military said, pushing the December death toll to 90 in one of the bloodiest months for the American troops in Iraq this year. Some 105 troops were killed in October.

President Bush is weighing whether to send thousands more troops to Iraq, but a senior Democratic senator, Joseph Biden, said Tuesday he would fight such a move.

DOJ_NMG_0109097

In the most lethal incident Tuesday, three parked cars exploded one after another in western Baghdad, police and Iraqi media reported. The blasts killed 25 people and wounded 55, one physician said by telephone, as he watched the victims being carried into Yarmouk hospital.

The doctor, who has provided information in the past, spoke on condition of anonymity because of security concerns.

Perhaps the most politically significant attack came in Azamiyah, a Sunni enclave of Iraq's capital, where a car bomb exploded near the Abu Hanifa mosque, according to Iraqi media.

That blast killed 17 and wounded 35, said a physician at the nearby Nuaman Hospital, who has provided information to the Associated Press in the past. He also asked to remain anonymous out of concern for his safety.

The explosion tore through a busy square at the start of the evening rush hour, when merchants were selling clothing and kebabs. The mosque itself was not damaged, witnesses said.

The mosque is Sunni Islam's holiest shrine in Baghdad, and a regular target of Shiite mortar teams. One person was killed in shelling there last month.

Abu Hanifa, who lived in the 8th century, was one of Islam's most important scholars and founded the Hanafi school of Islamic law, embraced by many Muslim cultures.

The mosque has long been associated with Sunni activism. U.S. Marines fought a fierce battle there on April 10, 2003, the day after the iconic Saddam Hussein statue fell in central Baghdad. Saddam and one of his sons were believed to be hiding nearby.

U.S. troops, meanwhile, exchanged fire with Shiite militiamen in east Baghdad, near Sadr City, the stronghold of anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

An AP reporter embedded with the soldiers watched the Americans set up roadblocks, occupy homes and engage in gun battles with militia fighters across the border of Sadr City.

U.S. troops crouched on rooftops, hiding behind laundry hanging on a clothesline. Bursts of gunfire ricocheted off rudimentary cement houses.

The gunbattles waned as darkness fell. At least six mortars fell on a U.S. military base nearby, but caused no injuries.

Sadr City is believed to be the chief base of operations for al-Sadr's militia, the Mahdi Army.

Pressured by Iraqi politicians in late October, American soldiers dismantled barbed-wire barricades that controlled traffic in and out of the area. Since then they have rarely ventured into the district.

The latest U.S. deaths brought the number of members of the U.S. military killed since the start of the Iraq war in March 2003 to at least 2,978 — five more than the number killed in the Sept. 11 attacks in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Bush has said the Iraq war is part of the United States' post-Sept. 11 approach to threats abroad. Going on the offense against enemies before they could harm Americans meant removing the Taliban from power in Afghanistan, pursuing members of al-Qaida and seeking Saddam's ouster in Iraq, Bush has said.

There has been no direct evidence of links between Saddam's regime and the Sept. 11 attacks. Democratic leaders have said the Bush administration has gotten the U.S. bogged down in Iraq, detracting from efforts against al-Qaida and other terrorist groups.

The AP count of members of the U.S. military killed in Iraq includes at least seven military civilians. Prior to the deaths announced Tuesday, the AP count was 15 higher than the Defense Department's tally, last updated Friday.

At least 2,377 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military's numbers.

Stanzel, the White House spokesman, said Bush grieves for each member of the armed forces who has died. "We will be fighting violent jihadists for the peace and security of the civilized world for many years to come," he said.

While officials say Bush is considering all options in his hunt for a new strategy, the U.S. president is thought to favor a surge of up to 30,000 more American troops .

Biden, the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on Tuesday called that option "the absolute wrong strategy," especially when it came to stabilizing Baghdad.

"Even with the surge of troops, in a city of 6 million people you're talking about a ratio that would still be roughly above one to 100," Biden said.

DOJ_NMG_0109098

In another Baghdad attack Tuesday, a bomb hidden in a CD player exploded in a busy market district after a man dropped it off at an electronics repair shop. The bomb killed five people and wounded 14 others, police said.

In Kirkuk, 180 miles north of the Iraqi capital, a roadside bomb killed three civilians — including an 8-year-old girl — and wounded six others, police said.

Police found 49 bodies bearing signs of torture dumped across the country, mostly in Baghdad.

Elsewhere, Jordanian Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit said Tuesday that a former Iraqi Cabinet minister who escaped from a Baghdad prison this month had arrived in Jordan on a U.S. plane.

Ayham al-Samaraie, a former minister of electricity with dual U.S. and Iraqi citizenship, was serving time for corruption when he escaped in mid-December.

Lou Fintor, spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, said the U.S. government was not involved in al-Samaraie's escape "in any way."

Car Bombs Strike Iraq's Shopping District (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Three car bombs exploded within minutes at a west Baghdad intersection jammed with holiday shoppers, one of a series of attacks reported Tuesday that killed at least 97 Iraqis and injured scores.

Three U.S. soldiers also died when a roadside bomb exploded as they were removing explosive devices from a route northwest of the capital, the command said. At least 2,979 U.S. service personnel have been killed since the start of the Iraq war in 2003, according to the Web site icasualties.org.

Tuesday's bombings took place in a commercial district full of shops and car mechanics, overturning fruit stalls, torching cars and sending thick black smoke into the morning sky. At least 26 people were killed and 54 injured, police said.

Witnesses said the area was full of shoppers preparing for the Eid Athar holiday, which takes place over the New Year's period.

Aqeel Abdul Hadi, a 45-year-old real estate broker, had just stepped out of his car to view a house for sale when the first car bomb exploded behind him.

"We turned and we saw traffic policemen wounded and running from the explosion scene. I froze on the spot," he said, still shaken. "People rushed to evacuate the wounded ... Minutes later the second car bomb went off at the gathering people, killing, burning and wounding them."

Hadi said he saw one man die in front of him. The man's three children were injured.

"They were carrying shopping bags. They were shopping for the New Year," Hadi said. "When I saw this, I took my car and drove away as the third explosion happened."

The attack happened in a religiously mixed area where Shiite Muslim militiamen have been chasing out Sunni residents, part of an ongoing cycle of sectarian violence. Militiamen from the Mahdi Army, loyal to radical Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, in the past have set up checkpoints at the intersection, residents said.

The first blast caught Jamal Fawaz, a 62-year-old guidance counselor, on his way to a nearby school.

"I took cover behind my car, and then the second and the third explosions took place," he said. "The pressure and the sound of the third explosion was huge."

Fawaz fell to the ground and broke his glasses before scrambling into his car and driving off.

Retaliation appeared to be quick. In the afternoon, a car bomb exploded in a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad, killing 20 people and injuring 35, police said. The vehicle was parked in a lot behind a row of takeaway food outlets near Abu Hanifa, Baghdad's largest Sunni mosque.

Police on Monday recovered the bullet-riddled bodies of 41 unidentified men, some of whom showed signs of abuse, scattered around Baghdad. Another body was found with a single bullet to the head in Kut, 100 miles southeast of the capital, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0109099

Four roadside bombs exploded in another coordinated attack on a police patrol in east Baghdad, killing the officer in charge and injuring nine other people, said the Ministry of Interior, which oversees police.

Another bomb tore through the used clothing section of Baghdad's central Bab Al Sharji market, killing five people and injuring 15. The device was hidden in a pile of garbage, police said.

Police said at least two other people were killed in Baghdad, a senior border security official killed by gunmen on his way to work and a civilian killed in an exchange of fire between U.S. forces and the Mahdi Army militia. There was no immediate comment from the U.S. military on that incident.

Mahdi militiamen have taken to the streets in recent days following a series of U.S. raids in areas bordering their eastern Sadr City stronghold in the capital, residents said.

In Kirkuk, 180 miles north of Baghdad, a child was killed and five other people injured when a bomb exploded near a primary school.

Times staff writers Mohammed Rashied in Baghdad and special correspondents in Baghdad, Kirkuk and Hilla contributed to this report.

Backlash After UK Forces Hit Basra Police Station (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, December 27, 2006

The British military's demolition of a Basra police station that they claim was used as a base for death squads has caused a political backlash, creating possible complications for the British campaign to purge the southern port city's notoriously corrupt police force.

However, in an environment where militias, criminal gangs, political parties and factions within the police force all overlap in a patchwork of often competing alliances, it is difficult to tell exactly how widespread is the opposition to the British move against what they called a rogue police unit.

Several local leaders, including the head of the city council and a Basra police commander, have condemned Monday's raid. Mohammed al-Ibadi, provincial council chairman, said the council had decided to cut off ties with British forces pending an explanation of why they destroyed an "Iraq government building flying the Iraqi flag" and removed detainees he described as suspected terrorists.

But a British military spokesman said it was unaware of any boycott by the full council, and some local officials including the governor offered their support for the operation, which involved Iraqi as well as British forces.

Over 1,000 British troops participated in the raid that culminated in the demolition of the Jamiat police station.

A British spokesman said 127 prisoners were discovered in the basement, some of them with their kneecaps shot off, their hands or feet crushed, or with cigarette or electrical burns.

He said the police station was a base of a criminal gang associated with the local Serious Crimes Unit, which had access to weaponry, vehicles and police intelligence used in death squad activity. He said the gang might have targeted competitors, as well as "anyone they did not like the look of or [who] had crossed them in some way".

British officials also say that the unit was associated with the capture of two British soldiers in September 2005, which precipitated a raid on Jamiat station to free them. It was also said to be involved in the abduction and murder of 17 police employees in October.

Basra citizens frequently complain about their police force, which many say is the product of a local authority that is fractured between several large Shia Islamist factions, including the Fadila party, the radical Sadrist movement, and the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, plus a handful of smaller ones.

In the absence of clear dominance by one faction or the other, each has cultivated its allies within the police force.

Last summer, in response to a surge in violence, Nouri al-Maliki, prime minister, deployed the army on the streets and formed a special security committee to tackle the port city's anarchy – a move opposed by some local politicians.

DOJ_NMG_0109100

Some citizens have praised Mr Maliki for taking a firm hand against local corruption. Militias such as the Mahdi Army, however, are believed to have strong roots in the city's extensive slums, where many people reportedly blame the British for the lack of any im- provements in their conditions over the past three years.

At least twice in the past the Basra provincial council has promised to cut off relations with British forces, but such boycotts have been relatively short-lived.

Basra Raid Sends Message (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, December 27, 2006

IN RAIDING AND DESTROYING an Iraqi police station where crimes were said to be committed, not solved, British forces sent an important message to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki: Torturers and murderers must be rooted out even when they act under color of the law, and even when reining them in offends political sensitivities.

The Christmas Day assault on the so-called Serious Crimes Unit in Basra by more than 1,000 British and Iraqi troops freed 127 prisoners, many of whom showed signs of torture. The headquarters long had been suspected of being infiltrated by death squads linked to tribal rivalries and organized crime. A British officer described the British-led operation as "part of a long-term rehabilitation of the Iraqi police service."

The assault followed a raid earlier this month in Basra during which British and Danish forces detained five tribal leaders with ties to Shiite militias. With Britain expected to reduce its 7,000-member force in Iraq next year, British forces have been trying to weaken rogue forces in Basra, for which they have security responsibilities.

Although Iraqi military officials obviously signed off on the British plan, some local officials complained that they weren't consulted and that the operation amounted to overkill. The complaint is misplaced. If, as the British say, the station was the scene of atrocities and impending executions, the officials themselves were remiss. They can't reasonably complain about a show of force designed to save lives and stop torture.

The question is whether the Iraqi government, which has troubling ties to Shiite militias, will do more than acquiesce in operations such as this. On Oct. 31, the Maliki government ordered the U.S. to remove checkpoints outside Sadr City, the stronghold of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr — checkpoints that were set up to help find a captured U.S. solider. No wonder U.S. national security advisor Stephen J. Hadley, in a now-famous memo, questioned whether Maliki "is both willing and able to rise above the sectarian agendas being promoted by others."

Whether or not President Bush approves a temporary "surge" of U.S. troops to help stabilize Baghdad, the president's benchmark of success — an Iraq that can "govern itself, sustain itself and defend itself" — ultimately will depend on a willingness by Maliki and his successors to establish one rule of law in Iraq. The British and, yes, the Americans, won't be there forever.

On A Mission In A Hard Place (WP)

The Washington Post, December 27, 2006

RAMADI, Iraq --

The soldiers of Combat Outpost Iron set out to help one Ramadi neighborhood get back to normal. The troops tried to learn local tribal politics. Passed out Beanie Babies. Drank tea. Attempted Arabic.

Lt. Brian Braithwaite said he truly felt they were making a difference.

Then in early November, Braithwaite's Bradley Fighting Vehicle hit a roadside bomb filled with gasoline, setting his gunner on fire. In the muffled intensity of pulling his friend to safety, Braithwaite said he heard sounds coming from the homes of the people they were trying to help. Laughing. Cheering. Celebrating his friend's near-death.

Braithwaite's unit, the 1st Battalion, 36th Infantry Regiment, has been in the capital of western Iraq's Anbar province since June. Most of the guys here can remember the moment when their frustration killed their empathy. When they no longer felt guilty about knocking down doors. No longer cared to hand out candy.

"Hearts and minds," the soldiers shrug. They joke like this often. The few Iraqis still living in Ramadi have had their homes raided and streets patrolled for three years now. Every time a window is broken, a bedroom is trashed or husbands are questioned, the glares become harsher. Compliance with U.S. troops turns to hatred.

DOJ_NMG_0109101

They are only trying to get the people who lay roadside bombs and find the material used to produce them. No other goal is ever mentioned.

Roadside bombs have become too powerful for the troops to feel safe in Bradleys or tanks. Patrols are almost all on foot. This day, they walk through the garbage dump, once a farmer's field. A plank takes them across sewage, and they head toward the first house.

Bracing the weight of their gear, they run with bent knees. They hop the walls that separate the houses to avoid the streets. Roadside bombs -- a soldier lost both legs to one while crossing the intersection here a few days earlier. The ladder they carry is worthless. So they tear many of the walls down. Home to home. It takes time. They are slow.

In their first few months in Iraq, mind-numbing boredom created an itch for action. They went out to dare fire. But now they feel done, as one medic puts it. They heft on full combat gear just to step outside to relieve themselves.

Many seem to have lost their taste for TV. It shows them the news of Iraq -- which is all about the fighting in Baghdad these days. Not much is mentioned of Ramadi.

Iraqi Fugitive With Chicago Connections Surfaces In Jordan (CHIT)

By Aamer Madhani

Chicago Tribune, December 27, 2006

A Chicago-area engineer who has been on the lam since escaping last week from an Iraqi jail where he was being held on corruption charges has surfaced in Jordan.

Speaking to reporters Tuesday in the Jordanian capital, Prime Minister Marouf al-Bakhit said Aiham Alsammarae "arrived in Amman as an American and on an American plane," according to The Associated Press. Al-Bakhit did not say exactly when the Oak Brook engineer arrived in Jordan or elaborate on the escape. It also was unclear whether the plane the prime minister spoke of belonged to the U.S. military or was a private aircraft.

Lou Fintor, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad, vigorously denied any U.S. government involvement in transporting the former Iraqi electricity minister out of Iraq. Alsammarae escaped Dec. 17 from the Baghdad jail inside the sprawling compound that houses the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi government. Alsammarae said he fled with the help of a "multinational" group.

"We unequivocally deny the U.S. government assisted in any transportation of Mr. Alsammarae out of Iraq," Fintor said in a telephone interview from Baghdad.

Al-Bakhit added that the Iraqi government had not requested the extradition of Alsammarae, who said in a telephone interview with the Tribune last week that he planned to return to Chicago after the new year. Alsammarae, 55, a secular Sunni, also maintained his innocence and said he fled because he feared he would be killed if he remained in the custody of the Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry forces.

In the interview with the Tribune, he would not reveal where he was other than to say that he was in "a very safe place."

U.S. officials in Baghdad and Washington, who could face the difficulty of balancing respect for Iraq's judicial system and sovereignty against concerns over a U.S. citizen's safety, have declined to say how they would respond if Alsammarae were to turn up in the United States.

But on Tuesday, a State Department spokeswoman went as far as to say that the U.S. government "supports the Iraqi government's effort to resolve the matter." She did not go into details about whether the U.S. would cooperate if Iraq calls for Alsammarae's extradition.

Dania Alsammarae, the daughter of the former electricity minister, said she has spoken with her father daily since his escape but he never has told her or other family members where he is or what he has been doing since fleeing Iraq.

"My dad wouldn't tell us any details but has been calling regularly to let us know that he continues to be safe," said the daughter, who lives in Dublin. "If the prime minister of Jordan is saying he is there, then I believe it to be true."

Alsammarae, who served as the electricity minister under the first Iraqi government following the fall of Saddam Hussein's regime, was found guilty in October on one count of corruption, but that charge was overturned earlier this month. He still faced at least five more corruption-related charges at the time of his escape, according to Iraqi authorities.

DOJ_NMG_0109102

Alsammarae and his wife, Amira, moved to Chicago in 1976 to study for advanced degrees at the Illinois Institute of Technology. They had planned to return to Iraq but ended up staying permanently after Hussein consolidated power over the Iraqi government in 1979.

Alsammarae, who holds dual U.S.-Iraqi citizenship, opened an engineering firm in west suburban Downers Grove. He returned to Iraq after the fall of Hussein's regime and was selected by the top U.S. occupation administrator, Paul Bremer, to serve as the country's electricity minister.

US Says Captured Iranians Can Be Linked To Attacks (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

BAGHDAD, Dec. 26 — The American military said Tuesday that it had credible evidence linking Iranians and their Iraqi associates, detained here in raids last week, to criminal activities, including attacks against American forces. Evidence also emerged that some of the detainees were involved in shipments of weapons to illegal armed groups in Iraq.

In its first official confirmation of last week's raids, the military said it had confiscated maps, videos, photographs and documents in one of the raids on a site in Baghdad. The military confirmed the arrests of five Iranians, and said that three of them had since been released.

The Bush administration has described the two Iranians still being held late Tuesday night as senior military officials. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell IV, the chief spokesman for the American command, said that the military, in the raid, had "gathered specific intelligence from highly credible sources that linked individuals and locations with criminal activities against Iraqi civilians, security forces and coalition force personnel."

General Caldwell made his remarks by e-mail in response to a query about the raids, first reported Monday in The New York Times. "Some of that specific intelligence," he said via e-mail, "dealt explicitly with force-protection issues, including attacks on MNF-I forces."

MNF-I stands for Multinational Force-Iraq, the official name of the American-led foreign forces there.

American officials have long said that the Iranian government interferes in Iraq, but the arrests, in the compound of one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, were the first since the American invasion in which officials were offering evidence of the link.

The raids threaten to upset the delicate balance of the three-way relationship between the United States, Iran and Iraq. The Iraqi government has made extensive efforts to engage Iran in security matters in recent months, and the arrests of the Iranians could scuttle those efforts.

Some Iraqis questioned the timing of the arrests, suggesting that the Bush administration had political motives. The arrests came just days before the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution imposing sanctions against Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

The Bush administration has rejected pressure to open talks with Iran on Iraq.

The Iraqi government has kept silent on the arrests, but Tuesday night officials spoke of intense behind-the-scenes negotiations by Iraq's government and its fractured political elite over how to handle the situation.

Iraq's president, Jalal Talabani, had invited the two Iranians during his visit to Tehran, his spokesman said on Sunday, but by Tuesday, some Iraqi officials began to question if Mr. Talabani had in fact made the invitation. His office was unavailable for comment Tuesday night.

"We know when they caught them they were doing something," said one Iraqi official, who added that the Iranians did not appear to have formally registered with the government.

Some political leaders speculated that the arrests were intended to derail efforts by Iraqis to deal with Iran on their own by making Iraqis look weak.

But the military seemed sure of what and whom it had found.

DOJ_NMG_0109103

At about 7 p.m. on Wednesday, the military stopped a car in Baghdad and detained four people — three Iranians and an Iraqi. The military released two of them on Friday and the other two on Sunday night, General Caldwell said. The Iranian Embassy confirmed the releases.

But the more significant raid came in predawn hours of the next morning, when American forces raided a second location, the general said. The military described it as "a site in Baghdad," but declined to release further details about the location.

Iraqi leaders said last week that the site was the compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite political leaders, who met with President Bush in Washington three weeks ago. A spokesman for Mr. Hakim said he had not heard of a raid on the compound.

A careful reading of General Caldwell's statement makes it clear, however, that the location itself was of central importance. The military gathered "specific intelligence from highly credible sources that linked individuals and locations with criminal activities," it said. The crimes were against Iraqi civilians, security forces and Americans.

In that raid, American forces detained 10 men, 2 of them Iranians. They seized documents, maps, photographs and videos, at the location, the military said. The military declined to say precisely what the items showed, nor did it specify if the Iranians themselves were suspected of attacking Americans, or if the Iraqis arrested with them were suspected, or both.

Some Iraqis questioned the American motives, saying that the operation seemed aimed at embarrassing Mr. Hakim, the driving force behind a new political grouping backed by the United States to distance militants from the political process.

One Iraqi politician suggested that the tip for the raid had come from a source within Mr. Hakim's own party, known by the acronym Sciri, in an effort to weaken or unseat him.

However it was led there, the military said it had found evidence of wrongdoing. By questioning the detainees and investigating the materials, the military found evidence that connected some of those detained "to weapons shipments to armed groups in Iraq," General Caldwell said.

The military did not specify the types of weapons.

The allegation, if true, would mark the first time since the American invasion that Iranian military officials were discovered in the act of planning military action inside Iraq. American officials have long accused them of supplying arms and money from Iran, but never of traveling to Iraq and actively taking part in plotting violent acts here.

American officials accused Iran of designing and shipping new powerful, armor-piercing bombs to Iraq as early as summer 2005.

American officials have on occasion offered evidence of Iranian involvement: A weapons shipment bearing serial numbers believed to belong to an official Iranian manufacturer was intercepted last year. The most recent allegations, if true, would appear to draw a line back to Tehran more directly than ever.

General Caldwell said that the detainees were still in American custody and that the military was "engaged in ongoing discussions with the government," about their status. An official in the Iranian embassy in Baghdad said its diplomats had tried to see the detainees but were not allowed to, a refusal that violated international rules, the official said.

Iran Is Seeking More Influence In Afghanistan (NYT)

By David Rohde

The New York Times, December 27, 2006

ISLAM QALA, Afghanistan — Two years ago, foreign engineers built a new highway through the desert of western Afghanistan, past this ancient trading post and on to the outside world. Nearby, they strung a high-voltage power line and laid a fiber-optic cable, marked with red posts, that provides telephone and Internet access to the region.

The modernization comes with a message. Every 5 to 10 miles, road signs offer quotations from the Koran. "Forgive us, God," declares one. "God is clear to everyone," says another. A graceful mosque rises roadside, with a green glass dome and Koranic inscriptions in blue tile. The style is unmistakably Iranian.

All of this is fruit of Iran's drive to become a bigger player in Afghanistan, as it exploits new opportunities to spread its influence and ideas farther across the Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0109104

The rise of Hezbollah, with Iran's support, has demonstrated the extent of Tehran's sway in Lebanon, and the American toppling of Saddam Hussein has allowed it to expand its influence in Iraq. Iran has been making inroads into Afghanistan, as well. During the tumultuous 1980s and '90s, Iran shipped money and arms to groups fighting first the Soviet occupation and later the Taliban government. But since the United States and its allies ousted the Taliban in 2001, Iran has taken advantage of the central government's weakness to pursue a more nuanced strategy: part reconstruction, part education and part propaganda.

Iran has distributed its largess, more than $200 million in all, mostly here in the west but also in the capital, Kabul. It has set up border posts against the heroin trade, and next year will begin work on new road and construction projects and a rail line linking the countries. In Kabul, its projects include a new medical center and a water testing laboratory.

Iran's ambassador, Muhammad Reza Bahrami, portrayed his government's activities as neighborly good works, with a certain self-interest. Iran, he said, is eager to avoid repeating the calamities of the last 20 years, when two million Afghan refugees streamed over the border.

"Our strategy in Afghanistan is based on security, stability and developing a strong central government," he said. "It not only benefits the Afghan people, it's in our national interest."

Still, there are indications of other motives. Iranian radio stations are broadcasting anti-American propaganda into Afghanistan. Moderate Shiite leaders in Afghanistan say Tehran is funneling money to conservative Shiite religious schools and former warlords with longstanding ties to Iranian intelligence agencies.

And as the dispute over Iran's nuclear program has escalated [leading the United Nations Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran on Dec. 23], Iranian intelligence activity has increased across Afghanistan, American and Afghan officials say. This has included not just surveillance and information collection but the recruitment of a network of pro-Iranian operatives who could attack American targets in Afghanistan. [On Dec. 20 in London, British officials charged the interpreter for NATO's commanding general in Afghanistan with passing secrets to Iran.]

Discerning Iranian motives is notoriously difficult. Government factions often have competing agendas. Even so, the question of Iran's intentions in Afghanistan has come under a microscope in recent weeks amid debate in Washington over whether the United States should begin dealing with Tehran as part of a possible solution in Iraq. Some American officials have suggested that Iran's seeming cooperation in Afghanistan may be something of a model for Iraq.

So far, even as it declines to talk with the Iranians about Iraq, the Bush administration has adopted a posture of uneasy detente over Afghanistan. American officials say that they are watching closely, and no evidence has emerged of recent arms shipments to Iranian proxies, as there have been in Iraq, or of other efforts to destabilize the country. Iran's Shiite leaders appear to be maintaining their historic opposition to the Sunni Taliban, who consider Shiites heretics. Iran, they also say, is failing to gain popular support among Afghans, 80 percent of whom are Sunni Muslims.

Of far greater concern, according to American, European and Afghan officials, is Pakistan, America's ostensible ally against terrorism. They say the Pakistanis have allowed the Taliban to create a virtual ministate and staging base for suicide attacks just across Afghanistan's eastern border. Suicide attacks have quintupled, from 23 in 2005 to 115 this year, killing more than 200 Afghan civilians.

[It is too early to know if the Bush administration's position will be at all affected by the latest source of tension between Washington and Tehran — the American arrests of several Iranians in Baghdad on Dec. 20 and 21 on suspicion of conducting attacks on Iraqi security forces.]

Western diplomats say that Iran's goals in Afghanistan are to hasten the withdrawal of American troops, prevent the Taliban from regaining power and keep the Afghan west firmly under Tehran's sway.

"Keep this area stable, but make it friendly for them," said a senior European diplomat in western Afghanistan. "Make it difficult for outsiders to operate here."

Afghanistan, analysts say, is one example of the way Iran is increasingly spending its oil money in a variety of countries to realize its self-image as an ascendant regional power. One Western official said that by focusing on high-profile construction projects, diplomacy and public relations, Iran was, in effect, employing American cold-war tactics to increase its soft power in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0109105

In Iraq, that means not just financing an array of Shiite political parties and militias; the Iranian ambassador in Baghdad, Hassan Kazemi-Qomi, said Tehran was already providing power and planned to build three hospitals and set up a $1 billion loan fund for Iraqi businesses. Similarly, Iran gave Hezbollah not just weapons and training but also the money for roads, schools and social services that made it the de facto government in southern Lebanon. Iran has a strong and growing presence in Syria, too.

Iranian officials cast themselves as a counterweight to the United States, which they say has mishandled opportunities to stabilize both Afghanistan and Iraq.

"U.S. policies, particularly under the current administration, have created a huge amount of resentment around the world," said a senior Iranian official, who requested anonymity because he was not authorized to comment publicly. "I'm not saying Iran is gaining power all over the world. I'm saying the U.S. is losing it fast."

A History of Intervention

Afghanistan, a fragile mosaic of ethnic and religious groups, has long been susceptible to intervention from more powerful neighbors. As the world's largest predominantly Shiite country, Iran is the traditional foreign backer of Afghanistan's Shiites, roughly 20 percent of the country's population.

During the anti-Soviet jihad of the 1980s, Iranian Revolutionary Guards financed and trained fundamentalist Shiite militias, as well as Sunni fighters. In the civil war after the Russian withdrawal in 1989, Iran became a patron of the Northern Alliance, while Pakistan supported the ultimately victorious Taliban.

When the Taliban were ousted in 2001, Iran promised to help stabilize Afghanistan. In Germany that December, it was Iranian diplomats who stepped in to save foundering talks to form a new Afghan government, persuading the Northern Alliance to accept the agreement. Soon after, Iran pledged $560 million in aid and loans to Afghanistan over five years, a "startling" amount for a nonindustrialized nation, according to James Dobbins, the senior American envoy to Afghanistan at the time.

A week later, President Bush situated Iran on the "axis of evil." But even as they assailed that characterization, Mr. Dobbins said, Iranian officials privately offered to train Afghan soldiers. The Bush administration rejected the offer.

Today, the American reconstruction effort dwarfs Iran's. The United States has spent a total of $4.5 billion since 2001, according to Afghan officials. But while the United States has built more than 1,000 schools, government buildings and clinics, and paved more than 730 miles of roads, a 2005 government audit found that reconstruction had been slowed by inconsistent financing, staff shortages and poor oversight. Amid rising Taliban attacks and public perception of corruption in the government of President Hamid Karzai, recent polls show optimism declining across the country.

Iranian officials said they had focused on roads and power as a quick way to strengthen Afghanistan's economy. A major project has involved upgrading roads linking Afghanistan with the Iranian port of Chabahar, on the Gulf of Oman.

In many ways, Muhammad Reza Dabbaghi embodies Iran's new approach in Afghanistan. Mr. Dabbaghi, a 46-year-old engineer, is the top executive here for the Iranian company that built the new 70-mile highway linking western Afghanistan to Iran two years ago, is paving much of the northwestern city of Herat and hopes to build the new railway, all with Iranian government financing.

As his staff served sweet cookies from southeastern Iran, he handed over a glossy color brochure and CD-ROM touting his company's work. Mr. Dabbaghi, a fastidious man in a stylish blazer and slacks, said his company was trying to work in neighboring countries, but he complained that the United States was spreading "mass propaganda," lobbying governments not to hire Iranian companies, especially in Afghanistan.

In Kabul, American contractors, advisers and aid projects clearly dominate the city, but Iran is there, too. In addition to a handful of Iranian advisers at government ministries, Iranian experts have trained more than 1,200 Afghan teachers, librarians and diplomats.

Last year, the Iranian Embassy opened the Iranian Corner, a room in Kabul University's main library filled with computers, books and magazines promoting Iran's ancient culture and modern achievements. Librarians say it is more popular than the adjoining American Corner, sponsored by the United States Embassy, primarily because it has a better Internet connection. Unlike in Iran, where the government blocks thousands of Web sites, the Iranian Corner offers open Internet access.

DOJ_NMG_0109106

Afghanistan's economic reliance on Iran has increased in another way, as Taliban attacks have slowed the economy. Each morning, hundreds of Afghan men line up outside the Iranian missions in Herat and Kabul for visas to work in Iran. Iranian officials said they expected to issue up to 450,000 visas to Afghans this year, nearly twice the 250,000 issued in 2005.

Signs of Influence

In the murky world of western Afghanistan, centuries of Iranian influence have left many local people with a perception of Iran as all-powerful nemesis. Many said their lives would be in danger if they publicly criticized Iran or its Afghan proxies. Behind every suspicious event in the Afghan west, they contend, lies an Iranian hand.

Such accounts are clearly exaggerated. Still, Western and Afghan officials say that, beyond its much-trumpeted reconstruction program, Iran is also engaging in a range of activities it is less eager to publicize.

Qari Ahmad Ali, a Shiite commander once backed by Iran, said that since 2001, his former patrons had funneled millions of dollars to Shiite religious schools and charities in western Afghanistan. He said the Sadaqia Madrasa, one of the largest Shiite religious schools in Herat, was at the center of an effort to spread Shiite fundamentalism.

"Iran does not have military activities," Mr. Ali said. "They have political and social activities."

Muhammad Siddique Tawakulay, the Sadaqia school's cultural director, said it received no assistance from Iran. "We are saying the truth and the facts," he said, before giving a tour of the school. But a second, unsupervised tour produced evidence of Iranian influence.

In a small ground-floor room, photos of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the leader of the Iranian revolution, were for sale. The main library had two dozen books published in Iran that criticized Israel and the United States. One, "Dark Star," had a photo of a Hasidic Jew with a star of David burning ominously on its cover. A religious magazine printed in Iran assailed the United States for supporting Israel's attacks on Lebanon last summer.

Shopkeepers said that during the Lebanon fighting, madrasa officials distributed posters praising Hezbollah. One of them, still hanging in a local shop, featured photographs of dead Lebanese children and a heroic image of the Hezbollah leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah.

A senior Afghan intelligence official said that Radio Mashhad, a state-run station in northeastern Iran's largest city, broadcast anti-American messages over the border.

"Iran is providing a lot of assistance for religious and cultural activities in Afghanistan," said the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the secret nature of his work. "That is the easy way to build influence."

Moderate Shiites agreed. "We worry about the situation," said Abbas Noyan, a Shiite member of Parliament. "Right now, the Iranians have a strong hand."

In interviews, three Shiite officials said new religious schools were being built with Iranian money. They also said that more Afghans were celebrating formerly obscure Shiite religious holidays.

Iran's influence appeared to wane two years ago, after the United States doubled aid to Afghanistan and removed Ismail Khan, the governor of Herat and a powerful Iranian-backed warlord who dominated the west.

Since then, though, American troops have turned responsibility for Herat over to the Italians, and this year, the United States cut aid to Afghanistan by 30 percent. Iran, meanwhile, has kept its aid money flowing steadily and continued to back its proxies in the region, according to a Western diplomat.

The last known example of Iranian weapons shipments came in late 2004, when Tehran provided weapons and training to a junior commander loyal to Mr. Khan. Since then, the commander is suspected of having orchestrated a bombing and other incidents to pressure the Afghan government into reinstating Mr. Khan.

In February, Herat experienced its first religious violence in decades. Six people were killed as Sunnis and Shiites staged gun battles on city streets, according to religious leaders. Some local officials blamed Mr. Khan's protégé for fomenting the violence. Others attributed it to rising grass-roots Sunni-Shiite tensions.

As in Iraq, the American-backed effort to build a democracy has fostered a Shiite revival here. Shiites now serve as governors in 4 of 34 provinces, including Herat. Hard-line Sunnis in Herat said they chafed at being ruled by Shiites, blamed Iran for the Shiite rise and expected more violence.

In Kabul, though, Afghan government officials, desperate for aid, say they have decided to trust Iran's intentions.

DOJ_NMG_0109107

“History may prove that overly optimistic,” said Jawed Ludin, President Karzai’s chief of staff. “But it is in our interests today to trust our Iranian neighbors and expect the same in return.”

Afghan Heroin Supply Surges In U.S. (CHIT)

By Garrett Therolf

Chicago Tribune, December 26, 2006

LOS ANGELES -- The amount of high-quality heroin in America is surging because of an increasing supply from Afghanistan, and with it the fear that record-breaking poppy harvests after the U.S. invasion are fueling more addictions and overdose deaths back home.

According to a Drug Enforcement Administration report obtained by the Los Angeles Times, Afghanistan's poppy fields have become the fastest-growing source of heroin in the United States. Its share of the U.S. market doubled from 7 percent in 2001, the year U.S. forces overthrew the Taliban, to 14 percent in 2004, the latest year studied.

Another DEA report, released in October, said the 14 percent actually could be significantly higher.

Not only is more heroin being produced from Afghan poppies coming into the United States, it is also the purest in the world, according to the DEA's National Drug Intelligence Center.

Despite the agency's own reports, a DEA spokesman denied that increased quantities of heroin were reaching the United States from Afghanistan.

"We are not seeing a nationwide spike in Afghanistan-based heroin," Garrison Courtney wrote in an e-mail to the Times.

He said in an interview that the report that showed the growth of Afghanistan's U.S. market share was one of many sources the agency used to evaluate drug trends. He refused to provide a copy of DEA reports that could provide an explanation.

The agency declined to give the Times the report on the doubling of Afghan heroin into the U.S. A copy was provided by the office of Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), a member of the Senate Caucus on International Narcotics Control.

The impact is being felt in Feinstein's home state. Heroin-related deaths in Los Angeles County soared from 137 in 2002 to 282 in 2004 before dropping to 239 in 2005, still a jump of nearly 75 percent in three years, a period when other factors contributing to overdose deaths remained unchanged, experts said.

The jump in deaths was especially prevalent among users older than 40, who lack the resilience to recover from an overdose of unexpectedly strong heroin, according to a study by the county's Office of Health Assessment and Epidemiology.

"The rise of heroin from Afghanistan is our biggest rising threat in the fight against narcotics," said Orange County sheriff's spokesman Jim Amormino. "We are seeing more seizures and more overdoses."

While Afghan heroin is having an increasing impact in the United States, police say they have seen almost none of it sold in Chicago.

Most of the heroin in Chicago comes in a light brown powder form produced in Colombia and Mexico and trafficked to Chicago from Mexico cartels, especially through the state of Durango.

Although most Afghan heroin in the U.S. is moved through Mexican channels as well, it is dealt mostly west of the Mississippi River, said a member of the Chicago Police Department's heroin task force, who asked not to be identified.

The potent Afghan heroin, which the DEA says sells for about $90 a gram in southern California, has prompted warnings from some officials who deal with addicts that they reduce the amount of the drug they use. Many addicts seeking the most euphoric high employ a dangerous calculation to gauge how much of the drug they can consume without overdosing. An unexpectedly powerful bundle of heroin, therefore, can be deadly.

"I tell people, 'If you're using it, only use half or three-quarters of what you used to,' because of the higher potency," said Orlando Ward, director of public affairs at the Midnight Mission on Los Angeles' Skid Row.

Health workers in boutique rehab centers and health clinics for the homeless say increasing numbers of clients are addicted to more powerful heroin.

"My patients say it's more available and cheaper," said Michael Lowenstein, a doctor at the Waismann Method detoxification center in Beverly Hills.

DOJ_NMG_0109108

Antonio Maria Costa, executive director of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime warned world health authorities in October of the increase in Afghan heroin.

From 1980 through 1985, Afghan heroin dominated the U.S. market, with a 47 percent to 54 percent share, according to the DEA.

Afghanistan's share dwindled to 6 percent for much of the 1990s, as competition from Southeast Asia and Colombia grew. Meanwhile, the Taliban was cracking down as it gained territory, virtually eliminating poppy production after taking over the country.

Once the fundamentalist Islamic government was overthrown in 2001 with the help of U.S. forces, Afghans turned again to the poppy trade to survive in one of the poorest countries in the world.

A report released Nov. 28 by the World Bank said U.S. and European efforts to end Afghanistan's $2.3 billion opium business were failing.

The production of opium used to produce heroin reached its highest level ever in Afghanistan this year. It accounted for more than one-third of Afghanistan's gross domestic product and 90 percent of the world's supply of illicit opium, mainly supplying Asia and Europe, according to the report.

Los Angeles Times; Tribune staff reporter David Heinzmann contributed to this report from Chicago.

NATO Must Follow U.S. Lead In Helping Afghan Civilians (USAT)

By Sarah Holewinski

USA Today, December 27, 2006

In Kabul a few weeks ago, I met Sahib Dad, an Afghan father. During the 2001 U.S. invasion, two of his girls were killed when a U.S. bomb missed its target and exploded in their playground. He says he never saw an American face, never received an apology. At the time, the United States had no program in place to provide compensation for his loss or aid for his family. Meanwhile, the Taliban brought cotton to wrap the dead and food, money and medical care for his wife's severe head injury. That's straight out of the insurgency playbook. And it's one reason the insurgents are winning small battles everyday.

(Photo -- Afghan-Pakistan border: Damage from a U.S. airstrike in January that targeted, but missed, al-Qaeda's Ayman al-Zawahiri; 17 people died. / By Mohammad Zubair, AP)

There is still time to avoid defeat (or a bloody debacle) in Afghanistan. But NATO forces, which in October took command of military operations there from the United States, must recognize what America has learned the hard way in Iraq: You can't win the war if you don't win the people.

Because of its experiences in Iraq and Afghanistan, the United States is gradually, and belatedly, accepting what is still a radical principle in modern warfare — that militaries have a responsibility to compensate and comfort the civilians they harm, even if the harm is accidental. The U.S. military now hands out condolence payments for loss of life, injury and property. The payments are characterized in the military lawyer's handbook as a "symbolic gesture" only, but it's a gesture that is so important. The payments — usually a few thousand dollars — don't assign blame. They show compassion for families struggling with loss.

The rationale of helping those we harm is expressed in the new U.S. Army Field Manual on Counterinsurgency — the definitive guide for boots on the ground. The manual states that in modern guerrilla warfare, a clear offense is winning the "hearts and minds" of the populace. Troops are told that any actions that undermine the trust of the population — "even those that provide a short-term military advantage" — help the enemy. But the new NATO force in Afghanistan, its troops drawn largely from European countries, has no policy and dedicates no common funds to help Afghan civilians harmed by its operations. Alliance officials should publicly correct that oversight and do so quickly.

Bolstering U.S. programs in place to help war victims is easy with an influx of cash from NATO countries, and nobody — least of all Afghan widows, orphans, the injured — has time to wait for a reinvented wheel.

Every civilian death gives the insurgency ammunition to claim that NATO forces are the enemy of the Afghan people — particularly if nothing is done to rectify the harm.

DOJ_NMG_0109109

NATO officials have blamed much of their collateral damage on the Taliban, pointing out that civilians are being used as human shields. Despite the difficulties that troops face in distinguishing friend from foe, when bombs from the air kill non-combatants, Afghans naturally blame those who dropped the bombs.

During a televised speech two weeks ago, Afghan President Hamid Karzai wept at the loss of innocent Afghan lives in the midst of coalition bombing of terrorist strongholds. He has strongly urged foreign troops to exercise more caution. NATO officials can and should respond with a pledge of more than words.

The point is not to put a dollar value on human lives, but to offer a gesture of respect reflecting a sense of common humanity — and to recognize the simple truth that Afghanistan will be won one civilian at a time.

Uncle Sam Wants US Muslims To Serve (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2006

As US troops battle Islamic extremists abroad, the Pentagon and the armed forces are reaching out to Muslims at home.

An underlying goal is to interest more Muslims in the military, which needs officers and troops who can speak Arabic and other relevant languages and understand the culture of places like Iraq and Afghanistan. The effort is also part of a larger outreach. Pentagon officials say they are striving for mutual understanding with Muslims at home and abroad and to win their support for US war aims. Among the efforts to attract and retain Muslim cadets:

• West Point and the other service academies have opened Muslim prayer rooms, as have military installations.

• Imams serve full- and part-time as chaplains at the academies and some bases.

• Top non-Muslim officers and Pentagon officials have taken to celebrating religious events with Muslims overseas and here in the US.

"There is a message here, and that is that Muslims and the Islamic religion are totally compatible with Western values," says Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England in an interview.

For the past two years, Mr. England has hosted an iftar, the feast that ends the daytime fast during the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, at the Army Navy Country Club in Arlington, Va. His guests have included ambassadors, leaders of the Muslim-American community, and Muslims who serve in the US armed forces.

President Bush also hosted an iftar at the White House in October, as he has done for several years. Gen. Robert Magnus, the assistant commandant of the Marine Corps, held one the same month at the Marine Corps Barracks in Washington for defense attachés from predominantly Muslim nations.

The US armed services don't recruit by religion, but the Pentagon estimates at least 3,386 Muslims were serving in the US military as of September. No precise figures are available because, while US service members are surveyed on their religion, they aren't required to disclose it. Advocacy groups put the number at 15,000, saying many are reluctant to reveal their religion. African-Americans represent the largest share of Muslims in uniform, they add.

However uncertain the progress, the military is intensifying its outreach.

On June 6 - the anniversary of D-Day, he notes - Mr. England helped dedicate a new Islamic prayer center at the Quantico Marine Corps Base near Washington, whose 6,100 marines include about 24 Muslims, according to Lt. Cmdr. Abuhena Saifulislam, a Navy chaplain who serves as their imam.

The Marines also have allowed Muslims in their ranks at Quantico some dispensations to make it easier to practice their religion, says Lieutenant Commander Saifulislam, a US citizen born and raised in Bangladesh. During Ramadan, "they're allowed to have some time off to prepare for their fasting break and not to go to physical training" while fasting, he says.

Muslim troops say misunderstandings and friction with non-Muslims in uniform arise sometimes, but practicing Islam in a military at war with extremists who profess the same faith isn't a burden, they add.

Petty Officer Third Class Nicholas Burgos, a Sunni Muslim training to be a Navy SEAL, or commando, says instructors sometimes goad him by calling him "Osama bin Burgos" or asking if he's training to help the Taliban. But "it's all in good fun," he insists.

DOJ_NMG_0109110

"It's all about how much mental stress you can deal with while you're in training," Petty Officer Burgos says. "I just laugh or have a smirk on my face."

His father, Asadullah Burgos, is the part-time imam at the US Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., whose roughly 4,000 cadets include 32 Muslims, 12 of whom are foreign students.

"There's been some insults and some taunting, but it's been handled at the cadet level," Imam Burgos says. "Usually that's due to ignorance."

Col. John Cook, the senior chaplain at West Point, says that after media reports about the academy's new Muslim prayer room, he got a call from a self-described "concerned citizen" who fretted that "the Muslims are taking over the world."

"I told him, 'I'm a Christian chaplain, but I have the responsibility to provide for other faith groups,' " Colonel Cook says. Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish cadets all have their own chapels at West Point, he notes.

Marine Sgt. Jamil Alkattan, a Sunni Muslim of Syrian heritage from South Bend, Ind., says his religion, his knowledge of Arabic, and his familiarity with Arab culture were major assets during two tours in Iraq.

Not only was he able to teach fellow marines key Arabic phrases and explain that all Muslims aren't extremists, he says, but he also was able to befriend locals, who brought him vital intelligence. "They would come to me and say, 'I know where bombs are,' and this and that," Sergeant Alkattan says. "I never got to sleep. They would come at night time and tell me, 'Hey, I think these guys [insurgents] are trying to set you guys up,' or, 'I've seen these guys with an IED [improvised bomb].' I think it stopped a lot of things that could have happened."

Under a new Middle East Cultural Outreach Program created by the Marine Corps, Sergeant Alkattan is one of six Arab-American marines selected to be stationed in major American cities as liaisons to the Arab-American community and advisers to recruiters.

The program was conceived by Gunnery Sgt. Jamal Baadani, a Muslim born in Cairo who emigrated to Michigan when he was 10.

"It is not a direct recruiting program," says Sergeant Baadani, but its goal is to educate recruiters to avoid cultural no-nos and foster good relations with Arab-American communities. The "overall objective ... is to develop solid relationships with the Arab and Muslim communities for the 21st and 22nd centuries. This isn't something that's just a Band-Aid treatment."

DOJ:

Justice Attorneys Win Comp Time (FEDTIMES)

By Daniel Friedman

Federal Times, December 27, 2006

More than 9,000 Justice Department attorneys can now receive comp time for after-hours business travel, two years after most federal employees won that right.

On Dec. 20, the president signed HR 4057, which allows the department's lawyers to claim compensation time when their work requires travel during irregular hours, such as evening or weekend flights to attend morning meetings. The House passed the bill in March. The Senate followed on Dec. 6.

Federal workers have been able to claim comp time for official travel since Congress passed the 2004 Workforce Flexibility Act. But the Justice Department had excluded its lawyers, citing a 1999 law that limits their overtime pay. That left about 4,000 department attorneys and 5,400 assistant United States attorneys ineligible for comp time. The new bill, sponsored by Rep. Jon Porter, R-Nev., makes all of the lawyers eligible regardless of the 1999 rule.

The National Association of Assistant United States Attorneys, which represents 5,400 assistant U.S. attorneys, hailed the bill-signing as an "important legislative victory."

"This legislation . . . will provide DOJ attorneys with the benefits Congress intended to confer in 2004 and the same benefits as are provided to attorneys employed in other agencies," the group said in a statement.

Executive Director Dennis Boyd said the association has lobbied for the bill for almost two years in the face of unrelated political delays.

"It's hard for me to believe how much time and effort it took to get a two-sentence bill passed," Boyd said.

Justice had no immediate comment.

New U.S. Attorney Says Job Matters, Not How He Got It (ARKDG)

By Linda Satter

Arkansas Democrat-Gazette, December 27, 2006

Newly appointed as interim U. S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas through a maneuver that has drawn criticism from the state's two reigning Democrats, Tim Griffin says he hopes to turn the spotlight off the way he got the job and onto his plan to aggressively fight crime through cooperative efforts.

"I am honored by the attorney general's decision to name me U. S. attorney," Griffin said Wednesday, his first day on the job. "I look forward to working with Sen. [Mark] Pryor and Sen. [Blanche] Lincoln to make Arkansas safer," he said after a long day that began with being sworn in by Chief U. S. District Judge Leon Holmes and ended with many of his books and papers yet to be moved into a corner office from a smaller space down the hall that he has occupied since September.

Just five days earlier, the U. S. Department of Justice announced that Attorney General Alberto Gonzales planned to appoint the 38-year-old lawyer from Magnolia to the post that Bud Cummins earlier announced he was vacating after five years.

Sens. Pryor and Lincoln immediately expressed dismay that the interim appointment came during a congressional recess, under a provision of the Patriot Act that allows the fill- ing of a vacancy without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate.

The surprise announcement "denied the Senate the opportunity to carefully consider and evaluate Mr. Griffin's qualifications and denied the American people the transparency the standard nomination process provides," Lincoln said through a spokesman.

Pryor's press secretary, Michael Teague, complained that unless the appointment is followed up by a formal nomination, it could end up being a sneaky way for the Bush administration to reward an insider with a plum job without having to prove his qualifications and ability to be nonpartisan. Teague cited Griffin's strong ties to the Republican Party and his reputation as an aggressive former GOP campaign researcher, at one point under Karl Rove, Bush's main political adviser and deputy chief of staff.

"We hope we're wrong that they're trying to circumvent the process by never nominating him," Teague reiterated on Friday, but he added that the administration might think that Griffin will "just evolve into the U. S. attorney" from the interim post he now holds. Later Friday, Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse addressed those concerns directly, indicating that Griffin's appointment is indeed meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. "We have asked that Sen. Pryor meet with the acting U. S. attorney," Roehrkasse said. "We are hopeful that by working with the two U. S. senators from Arkansas, we will make a nomination that the senators support and the Congress approves."

Roehrkasse explained, "When a U. S. attorney resigns, there is a need for someone to fill that position." He noted that often, the first assistant U. S. attorney in the affected district will serve as the acting U. S. attorney until the formal nomination process begins for a replacement. But in this case, "the first assistant is on maternity leave," he said, referring to Jane Duke, who gave birth to twins earlier than expected the same week of the announcement. "Tim was chosen because of his significant experience working as a federal prosecutor in both Arkansas and in the Justice Department in Washington, D. C.," Roehrkasse said.

Asked how soon the formal nomination process might begin, he said, "We've put the meeting request out there. That's what we're working on right now." Under the Patriot Act, the intent of appointments by the attorney general is to aid national security by ensuring that key law enforcement posts aren't left unoccupied. Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas' only Republican U. S. congressman, John Boozman, also defended Griffin's appointment on Friday, noting that it is not the same as a "true recess appointment," in which the president nominates someone to the position, often for the duration of the current Congress. "It's not unprecedented to make acting appointments, for whatever reason," James said, noting that President Clinton did the same thing.

He said Boozman believes that a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the combination of a new Democratic-majority Congress being seated in January and Griffin's prior association with Rove, a Republican stalwart.

DOJ_NMG_0109112

The process could quickly become very political, and, "He may not get a fair shake as far as his qualifications," James said of Griffin. James added that Boozman believes that Griffin is qualified.

Griffin acknowledged Wednesday, after being sworn in as the district's 43 rd chief federal prosecutor, "The way one is appointed to be U. S. attorney is a political process. It is a political appointment. But the moment you become U. S. attorney, politics stop.... There is no room for politics in the U. S. attorney's office. Politics stop at the door."

He added, "My job is to make sure all Arkansans are treated equally under the law."

Indeed, U. S. attorneys across the country are generally of the same political party as the president who nominates them. While they are required to be lawyers, many have little actual courtroom experience and heavily rely on the "career" prosecutors in the office to handle the day-today legal machinations.

Many also have used the office as a steppingstone to an elected office. Griffin declined to discuss his future beyond his new job.

Griffin's legal experience includes 10 years as a JAG (Judge Advocate General) officer in the U. S. Army Reserve, and the prosecution of 40 criminal cases as an Army prosecutor at Fort Campbell, Ky., including a case in which a solider pleaded guilty to the attempted murder of his platoon sergeant. Griffin also served as senior counsel to the House Government Reform Committee and was an associate with a New Orleans law firm.

He graduated with honors, both from Hendrix College in Conway and Tulane Law School in New Orleans.

Cummins, a Bush appointee who said he is leaving to pursue other interests, said he told the Justice Department more than a year ago that he would be leaving, to give the department time to find a replacement.

He also defended Griffin on Friday, calling him a friend who is "very competent" and "very capable."

"I'm not being critical of Sen. Pryor," Cummins said Friday. "I can certainly understand their position. But I think it will eventually all work out."

He explained, "It would not surprise me at all if they ultimately put Tim through the normal nomination process."

Cummins, whom Pryor press secretary Teague praised as "a fantastic U. S. attorney" who "is respected on both sides of the aisle," said he is "100 percent confident that Tim understands that we don't do politics at the U. S. attorney's office." He said the department makes that clear to its incoming prosecutors. Griffin, who now supervises about 25 attorneys and 35 support staff members, has worked as an assistant under Cummins since September, and also worked in the Arkansas office in 2001 and 2002 as a special assistant, to gain experience.

During that time, he organized and coordinated the department's Project Safe Neighborhoods initiative, a Bush administration effort to reduce firearm-related violence through close cooperation between state and federal law officers that he says is still a pet project of his.

Griffin said that since 2001, the office has seen a 390 percent increase in the number of firearm-related cases it has taken on — often taking over local cases, with local prosecutors' consent, to ensure that violators face the stricter penalties available in federal court. That includes an absence of parole. Griffin noted that he has talked with his counterpart in the state's Western District, U. S. Attorney Bob Balfe, about "working as closely as possible, forging a seamless relationship, particularly where our districts meet, so we can be aggressive in fighting crime in the Eastern District, the Western District or both." He said he also plans to work closely with U. S. attorneys in neighboring states "because criminals aren't concerned with artificial borders." He recently completed a year of active duty in the U. S. Army, including a stint in Iraq. He and his wife of two years, Elizabeth, have no children.

"I've had a lot of jobs in my life, and what I've tried to do in each and every one of them is perform with excellence," Griffin said. "Bud has set a great example as U. S. attorney. He set the standard, and I am going to work hard to meet that standard to the best of my ability."

To those who doubt him, he said, "I am going to ask them to judge me on my performance."

New United States Attorney Wants Focus Away From Appointment Process (AP)

AP, December 27, 2006

LITTLE ROCK (AP) - Efforts to fight crime, and not how he was put into his job, should be the public's focus in looking at the U.S. attorney's office, the new occupant of that post said after he was sworn in last week.

Tim Griffin was named interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas by the White House after Congress adjourned for the year, in what is called a "recess" appointment. At the time his selection was announced, Sen. Mark Pryor, D-Ark., said he was concerned that the appointment circumvented the usual approval process, which includes confirmation by the U.S. Senate.

Griffin, 38, a former assistant to President Bush adviser Karl Rove, was sworn in Wednesday as the interim U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Arkansas. He replaced Bud Cummins, who held the position for five years.

Both Pryor and U.S. Sen. Blanche Lincoln, also D-Ark., expressed dismay that the appointment came without going through the usual process of being nominated by the White House, screened by the Senate Judiciary Committee and voted on by the Senate.

"We hope we're wrong that they're trying to circumvent the process by never nominating him," Pryor spokesman Michael Teague said.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse said Griffin's appointment is meant to be temporary, at least until it can go through the formal nomination process. Roehrkasse said they have asked the Arkansas senators to meet with Griffin so that they may help support a Congressional nomination in the future.

Roehrkasse sad Griffin was chosen because of his experience working as a federal prosecutor in Arkansas and in the Justice Department.

However, Ryan James, spokesman for Arkansas only Republican U.S. congressman John Boozman, said a full Senate confirmation process could be unfair to Griffin because of the newly-elected Democratic-majority Congress being and Griffin's prior association with Rove.

The process could quickly become very political, James said.

"He may not get a fair shake as far as his qualifications," James said.

But Griffin said there is no room for politics in the U.S. attorney's office.

"It is a political appointment. But the moment you become U.S. attorney, politics stop ... There is no room for politics in the U.S. attorneys office. Politics stop at the door."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Faked Documents May Be At Core Of Apple Case (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, December 27, 2006

It must be some consolation for Apple Computer that the company's annual report is going to be published during the slowest news week of the year.

Given the uncomfortable admissions about its past stock options practices -- and the cost to the company -- that Apple will have to make in the delayed SEC filing due by Friday, less public attention is probably a good thing.

But the lull is unlikely to last long. According to people with knowledge of Apple's situation, federal prosecutors are looking closely at stock option administration documents that were apparently falsified by company officials to maximize the profitability of option grants to executives.

The faked documents were revealed in a three-month internal probe -- conducted by Quinn Emanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges -- that concluded in October, said individuals familiar with the case who requested anonymity because it remains the subject of criminal and civil government investigations.

The falsification of documents is perhaps the key issue for government officials trying to determine which of their 100-plus backdating investigations will be pursued as criminal matters and which will be limited to civil SEC inquiries.

DOJ_NMG_0109114

"When there are falsified documents, the government views them as an intent to defraud, because people generally don't falsify documents unless they're trying to make things different from reality," said Keith Krakaur, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York working on backdating cases.

Krakaur was speaking generally and not about Apple, with which he's not involved. But he has been in the middle of one of the most contentious options cases yet: He represented Kobi Alexander, the former CEO of Comverse Technology who was indicted by Brooklyn federal prosecutors on charges of backdating option grants. Krakaur is no longer working on that case, and Alexander has been living as a fugitive in Namibia for the past several months.

Krakaur and other defense lawyers -- including several in San Francisco who asked to remain anonymous for fear of affecting local probes -- said government lawyers are focusing on falsified records as a means of proving that executives knew their actions were wrong.

"They view that as intent," he said.

Since the fruits of Apple's internal investigation were disclosed to San Francisco federal prosecutors in October, the U.S. Attorney's Office has shown great interest in the case, said individuals with knowledge of the probe.

And while it's not yet clear who the prosecutors' focus is, Apple released a statement in October that "the investigation raised serious concerns regarding the actions of two former officers in connection with the accounting, recording and reporting of stock option grants."

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling wouldn't comment beyond what is in the public filings. But individuals with knowledge of the case said those ex-officers are Nancy Heinen and Fred Anderson, the company's former general counsel and chief financial officer, respectively.

Heinen departed the company last spring -- before the options scandal blew up -- and sources familiar with her situation said the departure was the result of a tiff with CEO Steve Jobs unrelated to options. Reached last week, Heinen lawyers Cristina Arguedas and Miles Ehrlich wouldn't discuss their client.

Anderson, who retired as CFO in 2004, was an Apple board member until he resigned in October. His lawyer, Jerome Roth of Munger, Tolles & Olson, declined to comment on his client's situation.

One outstanding question with possibly huge implications for the company is what kind of liability Jobs -- the superstar CEO credited with much of Apple's success -- will face.

In its October SEC filing, Apple said that, "in a few instances," Jobs "was aware that favorable grant dates had been selected, but he did not receive or otherwise benefit from these grants and was unaware of the accounting implications." The statement said no current Apple executive was suspected of wrongdoing.

But in recent weeks, Jobs has apparently decided that he needs his own legal representation, separate from Apple's lawyers at O'Melveny & Myers, and has hired his own attorney to deal with the SEC and Justice Department.

While it will likely take some time -- perhaps a matter of months -- for the government to decide whether to file criminal charges against Jobs, the 10(k) filing on Friday should provide plaintiffs lawyers with some ammunition for their suits against the company.

"We anticipate it's going to be a very substantial restatement, based on the option grants on record," said Mark Molumphy, a partner at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon & McCarthy representing shareholders in a securities class action against Apple.

In its October SEC filing, Apple said "stock option grants made on 15 dates between 1997 and 2002 appear to have grant dates that precede the approval of those grants."

Dowling, the Apple spokesman, said the company is going to adhere to its plan to file the 10(k) by Friday, a date reached in an accord with NASDAQ after Apple announced the options issues would prevent them from filing by the normal Dec. 15 deadline.

But even if Apple misses the filing date, the company may get a reprieve from the normal sanction of delisting, if only because the exchange would be hesitant to prevent normal trading of a company of such great significance to investors.

"Who's served by the delisting of Apple?" asked Jahan Raissi, a partner at Shartsis Friese who represents companies in SEC matters. "If it was Joe's Shlock and Poultry Farm, then sure, get them out of there. But not Apple."

DOJ_NMG_0109115

Cnet Will Pay Former Operations Chief Briggs $750,000 (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Ville Heiskanen

Bloomberg, December 27, 2006

Dec. 26 (Bloomberg) -- Cnet Networks Inc., a provider of online news and information, will pay $750,000 to Barry Briggs, who resigned as president and chief operating officer, and reprice stock options held by nine individuals including Briggs.

Briggs will receive the payment when he leaves the company Jan. 12, San Francisco-based Cnet said today in a regulatory filing. Cnet said Briggs, who resigned on Dec. 11, also remains eligible to receive a bonus for 2006.

Briggs, two other executives and five independent directors agreed to reprice some stock options they hold, Cnet said in the filing. The options were vested by 2005 and had exercise prices set below fair market value on the day they were granted. The directors also agreed to repay any after-tax gains from exercised options that vested with discounted prices.

``The idea is to cancel all the gains from backdating," said Charles Elson, director of the Weinberg Center for Corporate Governance at the University of Delaware. ``It's also important to ensure this doesn't happen again. It needs to be a dual approach."

Cnet's co-founder and former chief executive officer, Shelby Bonnie, stepped down in October after the company found that some stock options had been backdated. Neil Ashe, the company's head of strategy, was named to replace Bonnie. Briggs's resignation left Ashe to sort out the company's finances, deal with federal options probes and fend off encroaching competition from companies including Yahoo! Inc.

CEO Compensation Set

Ashe's base salary was set at $500,000 and he may get a bonus of as much as $400,000 a year, Cnet said in the filing today. He also received options for 1.5 million Cnet shares that vest in installments beginning in October 2007.

Bonnie also agreed to have his options repriced, Cnet said today. The company said he didn't exercise any options, so there was no need for repayment.

Cnet identified the directors involved as John ``Bud" Colligan, Peter Currie, Jarl Mohn, Elizabeth Betsey Nelson and Eric Robison. It said the other executives in the repricing agreements were Ashe and Joe Gillespie, chief marketing officer.

Shares of Cnet rose 17 cents, or 1.9 percent, to $9.35 at 4 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They have declined 36 percent this year.

When Briggs resigned, Cnet spokeswoman Martha Papalia said it was unrelated to the options probes. Cnet said in June that the U.S. Justice Department and Securities and Exchange Commission were investigating grants made by the company.

Cnet found some instances of backdating when it examined option grants from 1996 through 2003. The company plans to restate some results to correct accounting for options and hasn't detailed the expected changes.

By backdating options, companies retroactively set grant dates to days when their shares traded at a relatively low price. The practice can increase the value of the grants to executives and other recipients if the underlying shares rise.

Backdating also lets the issuer record a lower, albeit erroneous, cost for the options, which can inflate earnings.

Toll Of The Stock Options Scandal Heavy In 2006 (AP)

By Marcy Gordon, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, December 27, 2006

More prosecutions are expected to be brought next year

WASHINGTON -- Eighteen chief executives swept out. More than 100 public companies under federal investigation and more than $5 billion in profits erased by restatements. Indictments so far: five former top executives at two companies, Brocade Communications Systems Inc. and Comverse Technology Inc.

The toll of the stock options timing affair -- corporate America's scandal of the year -- has been heavy. Federal officials say more prosecutions will be brought in 2007 over manipulation of the timing of stock option grants to enrich top company executives.

DOJ_NMG_0109116

Nearly every business day, more companies report federal or internal investigations. New lawsuits by shareholders are filed. More businesses disclose that because past option grants may have distorted their financial results, they may have to restate earnings.

Next year could well bring more restatements, and companies' stock could be stripped from public trading because reviews of options grants made them late in filing their quarterly financial reports.

The Justice Department will "continue to be engaged for perhaps years to come, as we work these cases out," U.S. Attorney Kevin Ryan, who heads a task force in Northern California pursuing options timing cases, said recently at a gathering of attorneys. "The final chapter hasn't been written yet."

Many of the companies ensnared in the scandal are in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry, where stock options for employees created legions of millionaires in the dot-com era.

The prized perks allow executives and employees to buy shares of their company's stock in the future at a set price. If the stock rises before the options are exercised, the employee can buy the stock at the predetermined, lower price, then sell it at the higher, current price -- and pocket the difference.

Among the wide swath of companies caught up in internal or government investigations: Apple Computer Inc., Barnes & Noble Inc., Caremark Rx Inc., Issaquah-based Costco Wholesale Corp., Seattle-based F5 Networks, Gap Inc., The Home Depot Inc., McAfee Inc., Monster Worldwide Inc., Restoration Hardware Inc., Staples Inc. and UnitedHealth Group Inc.

Some prominent executives at blue-chip companies have lost their jobs in the affair, including former UnitedHealth CEO William McGuire, who engineered the company's ascent from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest.

A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square, with the scandal claiming at least 59 senior executives or board directors at 32 companies as of mid-December.

Will there be more? Slightly more than 2,000 public companies, or 29 percent of those in the United States that give stock options to executives, have timing issues, said Erik Lie, an associate professor of finance at the University of Iowa, and Randall Heron, an Indiana University associate finance professor. Their research last year helped focus attention on a widespread pattern of conduct.

"I suspect the number of companies will continue to grow, but I don't expect at the end of the day we're going to see that many enforcement actions" by federal authorities, said Lynn Turner, a former chief accountant of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"You just can't do something this big with the same amount of resources."

SEC Chairman Christopher Cox has pledged vigorous pursuit of cases and said recently that new charges will be brought in the near future. The agency is focusing on cases of serious fraud, with elements such as deliberately lying or forging documents.

At the same time, officials at the Justice Department are discussing whether to ease some of its harsher guidelines for prosecuting companies, crafted in the aftermath of corporate scandals that included Enron Corp. and WorldCom Inc.

Some officials believe that the guidelines may have led prosecutors to overreach when targeting some companies and pressuring them to cooperate in investigations of wrongdoing by executives.

The Internal Revenue Service is conducting its own investigation of companies for possible tax-law violations.

Open Spigot Bosses' Pay: How Stock Options Became Part Of The Problem (WSJ)

By Mark Maremont And Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, December 27, 2006

Eugene Isenberg is the little-known chief executive of a modest-sized oil-services company in Houston. But he stands out in one way: He is among the highest-paid corporate executives in history. In the past 19 years, he has pocketed more than $450 million.

The key to this wealth: stock options, in abundance. His employer, Nabors Industries Ltd., has lavished more than 25 million options on him over the years.

DOJ_NMG_0109117

They became lucrative partly because of Nabors's generally rising stock price, but also because of some controversial moves that gave the options more punch. When Nabors's stock fell below the price at which the options could be exercised, temporarily making them worthless, Nabors let him trade in some of his options for new ones with lower exercise prices. And when Mr. Isenberg cashed some options in, Nabors "reloaded" him, replacing those he'd exercised with the same number of new ones.

Stock options were hailed two decades ago as a remedy for runaway executive pay. Academics, politicians and investors, tired of seeing CEOs pocket big money for a so-so job, pushed to have stock options become a primary method of compensating executives. Options -- granting the right to buy stock tomorrow at today's price -- would pay off only if the company's stock went up. To advocates they were the ideal carrot, an incentive for good work that aligned executives' interests with those of shareholders.

That happened -- sometimes. But at many companies, options morphed into the biggest executive bonanza yet, pouring out cash like a stuck ATM, and sorely disappointing those who thought options would moderate executive pay.

Instead of replacing big bonuses, options became an additional form of pay slathered on top of already-generous packages. Employers doled out options in ever-growing numbers, in part because, until recently, accounting rules meant companies didn't have to treat this largess to executives as an expense. And like Nabors, some used repricing, reloading and other tactics that made it even easier for executives to score huge hauls.

WSJ's Mark Maremont, Charles Forelle and James Bandler discuss2 their yearlong investigation of stock-options abuses such as backdating, including what has happened since the first article appeared in March.

• The Biggest Paydays: See a chart of executives who have profited most from stock options, from 1992 to 2005.

• Plus, complete coverage3

This year, options practices exploded in one of the biggest corporate-fraud scandals in decades. Some companies and executives stole from shareholders, by pretending that options had been issued earlier than they really were, at more favorable prices. At least 130 U.S. corporations are under investigation for possible backdating of option grants. Some have admitted to it. More than 60 executives and directors of public companies have lost their jobs so far, 17 of them chief executive officers. After probable backdating was exposed at giant insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc., the CEO had to resign and give up about $200 million of stock-options value. The company said it will have to restate past earnings by as much as $1.7 billion.

Nabors's Mr. Isenberg offers an example of the huge wealth CEOs have gained through stock options. Now, some of his option grants appear to raise questions about how they were dated. A number came on days when the stock hit its lowest close for the month or the quarter. At other companies, a series of low-price grants has been a pattern that has suggested possible dating problems. At the least, the favorable grant dates added to Mr. Isenberg's mammoth options gains.

A spokesman for Nabors said its legal department did an internal review and found "no irregularities in its grant practices." Nabors showed internal documents to The Wall Street Journal that the company said provide evidence the grants were properly dated. Some of the documents bolster that assertion. The spokesman, citing Mr. Isenberg's record in lifting Nabors from a company in bankruptcy court to one with a market value of more than $9 billion today, also said that "Nabors strongly believes that Mr. Isenberg is appropriately compensated."

The backdating scandal at scores of companies shows one way stock options, once seen as an executive-pay reform, have often been distorted by corporate officials and their consultants. Nell Minow, a longtime corporate-governance advocate, calls backdating "just another in an endless and unstoppable series of mechanisms to subvert the purpose of stock options." A vocal proponent of options in the early 1990s, Ms. Minow now regrets that stance. "Options became completely disconnected from shareholder interests," she says. "I grossly underestimated the capacity of corporate boards and corporate managers to circumvent the principles we established."

From 1992 to 2001, the average value of option grants to CEOs of S&P 500 companies soared nearly tenfold, according to data compiled by Kevin J. Murphy of the University of Southern California. The result was that options, which in 1992 made up less than a quarter of the average CEO's pay, by 2001 provided more than half of pay packages -- packages that were much larger. Companies have started doling out fewer options in the past few years, but grants remain far more generous than a decade ago.

DOJ_NMG_0109118

In 1985, Miami financier Victor Posner pulled down $12.7 million, putting him atop lists of best-paid CEOs that year. Last year, 393 executives earned more than that, thanks largely to gains from exercising options, according to Standard & Poor's ExecuComp, which tracks executive pay at about 1,800 public companies. The top 2005 earner was Barry Diller of IAC/InterActiveCorp., with $295 million, nearly all from options.

Defenders of options, who remain numerous, say options shouldn't be judged by a few giant packages. Many companies have given out options judiciously, say defenders, some of whom attribute rising executive pay to tight competition for top managers. Others say stock options have helped to foster innovation, by giving young but cash-poor companies a currency with which to attract talent.

Some supporters of options even give them partial credit for the long bull market that began in 1982, figuring that options help focus top executives on the key issue for shareholders: the stock price. Frederic W. Cook, a New York compensation consultant, calls the stock option "the most perfect equity derivative that's ever been invented: It's simple, elegant, easily understood, and it gives you a little piece of the action."

Popular Demand

Stock options usually give recipients a 10-year window to buy the company's stock at the price when the options are granted. If someone gets options when the stock trades at $50 and it goes to $75, the holder can cash out at the $50 "exercise price" -- also called a "strike price" -- and nail a $25 profit on each option. Options usually don't "vest," or become exercisable, for at least a year after they're granted.

Stock options appeared at least as early as the 1920s, says Carola Frydman, an assistant professor of finance at Massachusetts Institute of Technology who has studied the history of executive pay. The modern era began in 1950, when Congress, reversing a court ruling, gave options substantial tax advantages over ordinary income. By the middle of that decade, they accounted for nearly a third of CEO compensation at large industrial companies.

"In the 1950s, they called it the period of stock-option opulence," says Ms. Frydman. "They didn't know what was coming."

